FIRST REPORT.

TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

Your Majesty having been graciously pleased to issue a Commission reciting that “differences of Practice have arisen from varying Interpretations put upon the Rubrics, Orders, and Directions for regulating the course and conduct of Public Worship, the Administration of the Sacraments, and the other Services contained in the Book of Common Prayer according to the use of the United Church of England and Ireland, and more especially with reference to the Ornaments used in the Churches and Chapels of the said United Church and the Vestments worn by the Ministers thereof at the time of their Ministration,”—and that “it is expedient that a full and impartial inquiry should be made into the matters aforesaid with the view of explaining or amending the said Rubrics, Orders, and Directions, so as to secure general Uniformity of practice in such matters as may be deemed essential,”—and enjoining your Commissioners “to make diligent inquiry into all and every the matters aforesaid, and to report thereupon from time to time as to” them, “or any Ten or more of” them, “may appear to be most expedient, having regard not only to the said Rubrics, Orders, and Directions contained in the said Book of Common Prayer, but also to any other laws or customs relating to the matters aforesaid, with power to suggest any alterations, improvements, or amendments with respect to such matters or any of them as” they, “or any Ten or more of” them, “may think fit to recommend,”

We, Your Majesty's Commissioners, have, in accordance with the terms of Your Majesty's Commission, directed our first attention to the question of the Vestments worn by the Ministers of the said United Church at the time of their Ministration, and especially to those the use of which has been lately introduced into certain Churches.

We find that whilst these Vestments are regarded by some witnesses as symbolical of Doctrine, and by others as a distinctive Vesture whereby they desire to do honour to the Holy Communion as the highest act of Christian Worship, they are by none regarded as essential, and they give grave offence to many.

We are of opinion that it is expedient to restrain in the public services of the United Church of England and Ireland all variations in respect of Vesture from that which has long been the established usage of the said United Church, and we think that this may be best secured by providing aggrieved parishioners with an easy and effectual process for complaint and redress.

We are not yet prepared to recommend to Your Majesty the best mode of giving effect to these conclusions, with a view at once to secure the objects proposed and to promote the peace of the Church; but we have thought it our duty in a matter to which great interest is attached not to delay the communication to Your Majesty of the results at which we have already arrived.

We have placed in the Appendix the Evidence of the witnesses examined; the Documents referred to in the Evidence or produced before the Commissioners; the Cases which had been submitted to eminent Counsel on either side of the question, together with the Opinions thereupon; also the Report on the subject made by the Committee of the Lower House of the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury, and the Resolutions passed by the Upper as well as the Lower House of that Convocation; and the Resolution passed by the Convocation of the Province of York.

All which we humbly beg leave to submit to Your Majesty.

* We agree to the main proposition contained in this Report, and have therefore signed it, upon the understanding that it does not exclude the consideration of cases, in which the authority of the Bishop and the rights of the Parishioners and Congregations are carefully guarded.

A. J. B. BERESFORD HOPE.

† In signing this Report, I think it right to express my conviction that any power to "restrain" the "variations in respect of Vesture," to which the Report refers, ought to be limited to cases in which "grave offence" is likely to be given by introducing such "Vesture" into Churches against the mind of the people; and also to state that by "aggrieved parishioners" I understand to be meant those who, being bonâ fide Members and Communicants of the Church of England, have a reasonable ground for "complaint and redress."

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY IN THE CHAIR.

REV. DANIEL WILSON, M.A., rural dean and vicar of Islington, called in and examined.

1. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) I believe you are a rural dean and vicar of Islington?—I am.

2. How long have you been vicar of Islington?—Rather more than 35 years.

3. And your father before you?—My father was there eight years before me.

4. Was there any change in the service in the beginning of your father's time?—No change at all; and his predecessor, Dr. Strahan; was vicar 52 years. I believe no changes have taken place in the mode of conducting public worship in the parish of Islington for 100 years, or for 95 years at least.

5. What vestments do you use?—We use the surplice, the hood, and scarf in reading prayers; and in preaching we use the black gown and the cassock.

6. Is that practice uniform in your parish?—It is.

7. And generally in the churches of your parish is there any variation?—I am not aware of any; indeed, I am quite sure there is no variation.

8. (Earl of Harrowby.) What number of churches are there in your parish?—The number of consecrated churches is 24, and licensed temporary churches—iron churches—six, making altogether 30 churches where public worship is performed.

9. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) What is the population of the parish?—The population is supposed to approach very nearly 200,000. We furnish accommodation in our churches for 35,000, as near as possible.

10. What is your mode of administering the Holy Communion?—I repeat the words once to each railful of communicants.

11. How do you reconcile that with the rubric?—Simply as a matter of pure necessity.

12. What number have you?—In some of our churches we have had as many as 300 or 350 present at once at the Lord's table; in my own church it has sometimes approached 200. When I first became vicar, the sacrament was administered to every one or two persons. I was compelled by positive necessity to make a change. My health was not very strong; I very nearly fainted under the fatigue, and was compelled by the necessity of the case to do what your Grace is aware the bishops are accustomed to do at the time of confirmation, the rubrics being very nearly the same in reference to each. I was obliged by the necessities of the case to vary the mode of administration. I perhaps may be permitted to add that where the numbers are small, I quite feel that to administer to each individual is the correct and preferable plan. It is simply with me a matter of necessity.

13. There were some injunctions given by the late Bishop of London, were there not, about the use of the surplice in preaching?—Not as to the use of the surplice; but there were a number of injunctions given in his last charge. I have a copy of the notes then taken you if wish me to refer to them. I will explain the matter as fully as possible. It did not touch the surplice, nor did it touch the mode of administering the Lord's Supper. It touched upon using the prayer for the Church militant after the sermon. If you will allow me to refer to the document which I have I can tell you precisely. Do you wish me to go through all the points of the late Bishop's charge?

14. Will you mention what were the points touched upon in his injunctions?—Not to allow private baptism except in cases of sickness. That is always adhered to now; not to allow strangers unknown to officiate without showing letters of orders to the bishop.

15. Is that adhered to?—I think it is. The Bishop of London is aware that certain individuals resident in our parish have been permitted by his lordship to officiate. The third injunction had reference to the diocesan inspector being admitted to our schools; it was just at the time when diocesan inspection began;—the fourth not to repeat the marriage service after it had been performed by the registrar. Then others were more in the form of requests: Complete attention to the rubric; holy days to be observed, especially Ash Wednesday and Ascension Day, Easter Monday and Tuesday; Holy Communion once a month; no part of the sacramental service to be omitted; baptism, if possible, to be administered after the second lesson. Then there were other things which we called directions. There was to be no psalm at the beginning of the service; all notices in the church were to be given by the clergyman; when Saints' days fell on Sunday, the Sunday lessons were to be used, the epistle and gospel for the Saints' days; all holy days to be given out; prayer for Ember weeks to be used; the responses in Communion service not to be sung. I think these were the principal points, as far as I took them down at the time.

16. May I ask you what are the weekly services that you have in the church?—The services in my church are as follows: On Sundays, three full services, with the public catechising of children after the second lesson every Sunday afternoon; on a week day, prayers every Wednesday morning and every Friday morning, and on all Saints' days, and a public catechising of children on the first Wednesday in every month, in the church. The sacrament of the Lord's Supper is administered twice every month, on the first and third Sunday.

17. In Saints' days do you include Ash Wednesday and Ascension Day?—I include those, certainly. The Lord's supper is administered on all the great festivals in addition to twice a month. This last month we have had successive sacraments. In reference to the Bishop of London's charge, I have here a copy of the remonstrance sent to me at the time when the Bishop pressed these points. I have a copy of an address, signed by nearly 3,000 of the inhabitants of Islington, addressed to the clergy on the subject. I have also my letter which I sent to the Bishop at the time, enclosing that address. The only point I am anxious to show is that we did not act in opposition to the Bishop, but with his concurrence at that time.

18. (Bishop of London.) You spoke of injunctions; what do you mean by injunctions?—It is now twenty-five years since this occurred, and I have not opened these papers during that time till coming here to-day. I fancy that for our own convenience at the time we drew up from the Bishop's charge certain things which we considered he enjoined, and certain things which he directed but did not absolutely enjoin, and certain things which were permissive.

19. There was no document under the Bishop's hand and seal requiring you to do or to abstain from any particular practice?—No. I have the minutes of everything that passed, which were very carefully collated by those who were present at the time. I have the minutes of everything that passed between the Bishop and ourselves on that occasion, if the Commissioners wish to see them. Perhaps I may be permitted to read the last sentence from these notes just before the Bishop dismissed us. It was as follows: "In conclusion the Bishop said he thought he might rely on the wish of the Islington clergy to comply with his recommendations; that he was not prepared to lay any injunctions on them at present as to these matters, although he thought it must ultimately come to that, that he must enforce the use of the prayer for the Church militant; but he would not at present, but would take time." Then after that, and before I had time to reply to this address of the parishioners, signed by nearly 3,000, the Bishop issued a circular, of which I have a copy here, in which, among other things, he says, "I extended the expression of that hope"—that is, the hope in reference to the offertory, which he was anxious to have, but did not enjoin,—he wished to have the offertory sentences read, but he did not enjoin any collection to be made at the time; that was to be left to each clergyman,—"I extended the expression of that hope to some other points of ritual uniformity which I spoke of as desiring their introduction, but as leaving the time of introducing them to your judgment, being persuaded that an agreement on the part of the clergy on these matters would remove most of the apparent difficulties." Lord Harrowby and Lord Shaftesbury were in private communication with the Bishop at that time, and I believe this circular was very much the result. I have a letter from Lord Shaftesbury, written at the very time when we received this circular, saying we might consider that circular as setting us at liberty. Upon that I wrote to the parishioners, stating what liberty the Bishop had given us, and I sent my answer with the letter which I have here to the Bishop of London, and we so far satisfied his lordship that nothing more was said on the subject.

20. Then I am right in supposing that there never was any injunction issued, that it was the Bishop's advice, and that the whole passed after the delivery of the charge in a private conversation and in private communication?—Yes. In fact, in my answer I took the liberty of thanking the Bishop for the very kind manner in which he had dealt with us. There was nothing of direct opposition. At the same time, the feeling on the part of the parishioners was strong, as expressed in this address that I have by me. In one of our churches, Trinity Church, the largest in the parish, I see from these minutes that Mr. Fell, the incumbent, stated, that, owing to the fear—it was merely a fear—that he was going to make changes, half his congregation stayed away the next Sunday.

21. Were these communications between yourself and the Bishop of London made known to the clergy of the diocese, or merely to the clergy of Islington?—They became gradually known because letters appeared in the newspapers on the subject.

22. In point of fact the Bishop of London did not insist upon the things which he had advised?—Certainly not.

23. And in process of time many things which he mentioned fell throughout the diocese into disrepute?—Yes. I do not mean to say that the Bishop was not himself personally vexed. The Bishop would have been glad if we could have seen our way at once to acquiesce, but he felt the force of our objections. We had a long conversation on the subject, of which I have the minutes here, and at the close the Bishop felt that under the circumstances he could not and did not feel at liberty to enjoin these things.

24. You mentioned two points as to the mode of conducting divine service, to which I wish to draw your attention; first, as to using the words to the whole of the communicants drawn together at one time. Are the words used in the singular or in the plural; are they the words prescribed by the rubric?—Some of our clergy use the singular. I use the plural myself, but I have not the least objection, if your Lordship will prefer it, to use the singular.

25. The other point is with regard to the black gown. Have you ever looked into the question of the legality of the black gown?—I have not.

26. You have never examined the question?—No. I have never examined the question, taking it simply as the common practice.

27. As the common practice which you found?—Quite so. The point I was anxious to press with regard to the uniformity of practice in our parish was simply this, that during these hundred years, or nearly so, that is during the time of Bishop Lowth, Bishop Porteus, Bishop Randolph, Bishop Howley, Bishop Blomfield, and your Lordship, the services have been conducted as they are now without any objection being made by the ordinary for the time being.

28. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) In addition to the services you have mentioned, have you any separate litanies with or without sermon, and separate administrations of the Holy Communion without any other service?—Not the Communion. On Wednesday morning we have the litany and a sermon only.

29. And on Friday?—On Friday, the whole morning service.

30. Have you any evening service on the week days?—No; not at my church.

31. You have no separate administrations of the Holy Communion at an early hour?—None. None without the whole service.

32. Are there any in the churches of your parish as far as you know?—I am not aware of it. There may be a morning communion, but I am not aware of it. The late Bishop of London recommended early communions.

33. Is your service at all musical, or is it all read?—We chant the Venite and Te Deum, and the usual canticles, but the rest of it is read.

34. I suppose you have hymns?—Always two hymns. That is the case in all our churches. In some two or three they also chant the psalms where they have a choir.

35. Am I to understand from the interesting facts you have told us that you dropped the use of the prayer for the Church militant?—No. We never used it except when the sacrament was administered. We never used it in my father's time, and I am quite sure it was never used in Dr. Strahan's time, because my father was very particular to make no change when he became vicar. Those who knew Dr. Strahan and Dr. Gaskin, who was the afternoon lecturer, would feel that they were not persons likely to make changes.

36. What are the different conditions of life of the persons who come to your services? Do those who come to the morning, afternoon, and evening services represent different phases of social life?—Yes; the afternoon service is composed very much of servants and persons of that class.

37. Is that at three o'clock?—At half-past three o'clock.

38. What is the evening service?—The evening service is much the same as the morning service.

39. Is it attended by a higher class of persons?—Yes, higher than the afternoon. My church stands in the midst of the tradesmen of Islington. Highbury represents the gentry.

40. What is the proportion of free sittings to appropriated sittings in your church?—I am sorry to say the free sittings are few. The church holds 1,400. We have 900 appropriated seats and 500 free seats.

41. Have you any service at which, by consent of the seat-holders, you throw all your seats open?—I attempted it at one time, but I was obliged to drop it, it gave so much offence to the seat-holders.

42. Are the seats annual hirings?—They are let under a Local Act of Parliament.

43. Can you give us any information as to the questions I have just asked you regarding other churches in your parish?—Yes.

44. As to the general tariff of service, do you suppose the same social distinctions exist in the other churches?—To some extent. A few of the other churches have afternoon services, and generally morning and evening.

45. Very few churches have three services a day?—Some three or four.

46. Have you ascertained how many churches have a week day service?—All, I think.

47. Wednesdays, Fridays, and holy days?—All have a week day evening service, either on Wednesday, Thursday, or Friday.

48. Not week day morning services?—I think not.

49. Do they observe the holy days?—All of them, I believe.

50. All the holy days, or only the great ones?—Not the week days, I think.

51. I meant holy days in distinction to Sundays?—No; I do not think the holy days are observed in any church except my own.

52. Ash Wednesday and Ascension Day?—Yes, Ash Wednesday, Ascension Day, and the Holy Week.

53. Is there communion on Ascension Day in any of the churches?—On Ascension Day I have not generally had it. This year it occurred within three days of the first Sunday of the month, when I always have a sacrament. Then there is Whit Sunday when I have a sacrament, and Trinity Sunday.

54. (The Rev. Robert Gregory.) There were, you say, sometimes nearly 200 communicants. Was that about the average number in your own church at one time on the same Sunday?—I said approaching 200 at one time; perhaps now you might say 150.

55. One hundred and fifty would be the average?—Yes; 140 or 150 at one time.

56. About how many people are there in your own district still?—About 10,000.

57. You say there has been a continuation of the same custom in your parish for nearly 100 years? May I ask if that continuation of the same custom has succeeded in getting the dissenters altogether out of Islington?—No; I am not aware that any particular custom would do that. There is a great deal of vacant land in the parish of Islington. We have 3,000 acres, and the dissenters are selling their property in the city and coming up to us.

58. Are there a great number of dissenting chapels in your parish?—A considerable number.

59. Are there many Roman Catholics in your parish?—Yes.

60. A great many?—Not a great many; only Duncan Street Chapel, I think.

61. Are the Roman Catholics a very thriving body?—I am not aware at all. I fancy they come very much from the City of London to Duncan Street Chapel. I should say out of 200,000 we may have 3,000 Roman Catholics in the parish.

62. During the 35 years you have been vicar has there been a large increase in the number of communicants?—Do you mean throughout the parish?

63. In relation to the number of the parishioners?—It is not likely to occur in connection with the parish church, because the population has remained the same. Throughout the parish the number of communicants is very large.

64. Has the average of persons who are communicants greatly increased in the parish as the population has increased?—Certainly. I have no hesitation about that. I should say it is from 5,000 to 8,000; but I really cannot speak positively.

65. How many curates have you?—Two.

66. What do the offertories actually taken in your own church amount to?—About 100*l.* a year. That is simply at the time of the Lord's supper.

67. I mean all the collections?—From 400*l.* to 500*l.* a year.

68. We may say 450*l.*?—Yes.

69. Amongst the communicants at your church are there many of the poorer class in life?—Certainly; a very large number.

70. Would there be 150?—I have two sacraments, one on the first Sunday of the month, and one on the third Sunday of the month, and I have altogether about 300 communicants.

71. Is it generally the evening or the morning?—The evening. There are a very large number of the working class, almost entirely of the humbler class.

72. Would there be 150 then, do you think?—100 to 150.

73. May I ask what age they are, whether many of them are younger people, under 30?—Many of them are young persons after confirmation. We have every year about 700 young persons in the parish presented to the Bishop of London for confirmation, and of that number I should say from one third to a half come to the Lord's supper.

74. (Dean of Westminster.) May I ask whether at the time of the Holy Communion the table stands in the body of the church?—It stands at the east end, not in the body of the church.

75. May I ask whether at the time of the celebration of the communion you read the whole of the exhortation which begins, "Dearly beloved in the Lord, ye that mind to come"?—Yes, we read the whole of that.

76. In the other exhortation do you read the whole or only the first sentence?—When we give notice of the Lord's supper we only read the first three or four sentences, which is very common.

77. In the case of the other you read the whole?—Certainly.

78. (Sir R. J. Phillimore.) I understand you to say that the late Bishop of London gave no injunctions about the use of the surplice?—Not about the surplice.

*Rev.
D. Wilson,
M.A.*

20 June 1867.

Rev.
D. Wilson,
M.A.
20 June 1867.

79. Did he not in his charge recommend the use of the surplice?—What he said was this—I have the document before me—he did not enjoin the surplice, but he said that it might be a matter of convenience, where there was only one officiating clergyman, that the dress should not be changed after the sermon when reading the offertory and the prayer for the Church militant, and therefore as a matter of convenience he permitted it, but he never enjoined it.

80. That is an error on my part. I thought that in his charge he had recommended to his clergy to preach in their surplice?—Certainly not. I am perfectly certain on that subject.

81. You have never considered the law at all as to the black gown, have you?—No, I have not considered it. I do not see any reference in any of our Church services to the subject.

82. Nor in the canons?—I am not very familiar with the canons, but I am not aware of anything.

83. I think you said that necessity compelled you in administering the Holy Communion to read the words to the whole rail?—Certainly.

84. You have only one administration of the Holy Communion on the Sunday in your church, have you?—One on the first Sunday, and one on the third Sunday.

85. Only once on the Sunday?—Only once.

86. Have you ever considered what the effect might be of having it oftener on the Sunday, whether it would enable you to read the words to each communicant?—Do you mean twice on the same Sunday.

87. Yes; oftener on the same Sunday?—In some of our churches, for instance St. James, the sacrament is administered twice on the same day, and the numbers are 300 at each communion.

88. Have you ever considered whether with regard to your own church, the more frequent administration of the Holy Communion on the Sunday itself would enable you to address the words to each communicant?—I have considered the subject, certainly. I think there are difficulties in the way. I think the great majority of the people would still adhere to the usual day, the first Sunday in the month. Then if we are to adhere strictly to the rubric, and read the whole of the exhortation, supposing we had the sacrament every Sunday, I imagine that lengthened notice of the Lord's supper must be read every Sunday in the year. The consequence would be that the service would be lengthened by the offertory, the prayer for the Church militant, and also the notice for the next Sunday.

89. My question rather went to your having it three or four times, or twice, on the same Sunday. You have considered that, too, I dare say?—I do not think it would much alter the thing.

90. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) I hope in asking you the questions I am about to put, you will believe that I am not doing so in any critical spirit. The Commission under which we are sitting states this—"Whereas it has been represented unto Us that differences of practice have arisen from varying interpretations put upon the rubrics, orders, and directions for regulating the course and conduct of public worship, the administration of the sacraments, and the other services contained in the Book of Common Prayer, according to the use of the United Church of England and Ireland, and more especially with reference to the ornaments used in the churches and chapels of the said United Church, and the vestments worn by the ministers thereof at the time of their ministration." Having reference to these terms of the Commission will you be kind enough to state what are the ornaments of your church; and you will be good enough to understand that in answering this question and describing those ornaments, it is important to bear in mind the distinction adverted to by the Judicial Committee in the case of Liddell v. Westerton between "ornaments, in the sense of decorations" of churches, and ornaments in the sense of "the several articles used in the services." Now it is as to these last that the Commissioners wish information. What are the ornaments that are used in your church?

—I am afraid I do not understand your question. I should say that we have no ornaments.

91. For example, what are the coverings of the communion table?—The usual covering of velvet.

92. Have you more than one?—Only one. Of course when the sacrament is administered we place the white cloth on the table.

93. I am coming to that. Have you any different colour that you use in Lent?—No difference at all.

94. Any different pulpit covering?—No difference at all. We never make any change.

95. Have you any candlesticks?—No.

96. Were there ever any that you remember?—I am not aware of any being in use.

97. Are you aware whether there are any belonging to the parish or not?—I think there are two large candlesticks belonging to the parish.

98. Have you any idea how long they have gone out of use?—I cannot tell you. I have no recollection at all.

99. I think you stated in answer to his Grace that you had no vestments of any kind excepting the surplice?—The surplice, the hood, and the scarf.

100. And the black gown?—And the black gown and cassock.

101. Will you be good enough to say whether these are used at all the public services?—At all the public services.

102. Is there any difference at any time; for instance do you use the hood in the communion service?—Certainly, I should say that on a week day, in administering the sacrament of Baptism, I do not always put on the hood.

103. The general rubric as to ornaments, directs the ornaments of the ministers to be used "at all times of their ministration." Will you be kind enough to say whether in the cases of private baptism, or the administration of the communion to sick persons, any vestments or ornaments are used?—None at all; not when we administer in a private house.

104. What do you use for the administration of the Holy Communion to sick persons?—We have a small cup and paten of silver, which is used specially for that purpose.

105. You do not use any surplice?—No.

106. Neither for baptism nor communion?—Not in a private house.

107. When children are catechised do you catechise them in a surplice or not?—Usually in the surplice. Sometimes it occurs after I preach. I continue then to wear my black gown.

108. Will you be so good as to state what are the authorized directions upon which you rely generally for guidance as to the use in your church of the ornaments of the church and of the ministers. Is there anything besides the rubrics on which you rely?—Nothing beyond the rubrics that I know of.

109. Not the canons of 1603?—I am not aware of it. I consider that I am guided by the rubrics as modified by long practice and habit; of course I am aware what the rubric is with reference to the ornaments of the minister.

110. Would you be kind enough to say whether you consider the canons of 1603 are at all binding on you with regard to ornaments, either of the church or of the minister. For instance, the 58th canon of 1603 is entitled, "Ministers reading divine service and administering the sacraments to wear surplices, and graduates therewithal hoods." Do you consider that canon binding upon you?—It is difficult for me to say. I can say that I consider very many of the canons are altogether superseded in the present day. I do not consider that I am bound by every individual canon, certainly not, if you mean that.

111. My question applied to ornaments of the church and ornaments of the ministers, and to nothing else?—I should say then that I do not feel bound.

112. Do you consider yourself at liberty to introduce into your church any ornaments of the church or of the ministers which are recognized in the authorized directions, even though they have fallen into disuse?—No, I should not.

113. What would be your reason for thinking that you were not at liberty to do so?—I should consider long established custom sufficient.

114. In the Preface "Concerning the service of the Church," there is a passage which refers to the discretion of the bishop with regard to the modes of conducting divine service. Referring to that, how do you think it bears on the liberty, or not, of making any changes in what have been the old modes of conducting service? Do you think the clergyman is at liberty, without consulting the bishop, to make such changes?—I should think that in any important change which a clergyman desired to make he ought certainly to consult the bishop.

115. You think he is not free to do it without?—I think not, unless it is something which it is known the bishop has allowed generally in the diocese without admonition. You are perhaps referring to the administration of the Lord's supper.

116. Yes, it would include that?—I should consider, with regard to that, that the practice is so frequent, and the ordinary not having put any prohibition upon it, that I should feel at liberty to adopt it.

117. Now, referring to the general rubric touching "the accustomed place of the church, chapel, or chancel" to be used for the morning and evening prayer, where are these said in your church?—From the reading desk.

118. Always?—Always.

119. Do you preface the morning or evening prayer with any hymn or psalm or the like?—Never.

120. In the first rubric of the morning and evening prayers there occur these words, "read" and "say"; and in the other rubrics of the same, and of other services there are the words, "said or sung." Do you consider that those words have different meanings?—I have not studied the question.

121. And therefore it does not affect your mode of conducting the service. You are not regulated in your mode of conducting the service by any difference of meaning?—I am by the word "said" certainly; and, in other places, by the word "read" of course; therefore, I consider that the more correct mode. The other I consider rather to refer to cathedrals, and places where there are choirs.

122. What is your practice as to the use of the Athanasian creed?—We use it invariably whenever the rubric directs it.

123. Where do you say the litany from?—From the reading desk.

124. Do you say the litany immediately after morning prayer on Sundays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, or do you use it as a separate service, either in the morning, or at a later period?—I use it on the Wednesday morning as a separate service when I preach, in order not to make the service too long.

125. Do you consider yourself then free to separate the litany on the days appointed for it without reference to the Ordinary though the rubric speaks of its being used "at other times when it shall be commanded by the Ordinary"?—In the case of our own diocese the ordinary is known to allow and permit it, and to direct it to be read when he is himself present.

126. You are aware that the general practice has been to combine in one continuous service the morning prayer, the litany, and the communion service?—Yes.

127. Do you consider yourself at liberty to use them separately as if three separate services?—Not unless I have the sanction of the ordinary, either tacitly implied or expressed.

128. As you do not consider that this liberty now exists, or as you think its existence may perhaps be doubtful, do you think it would be expedient that the liberty should be clearly recognized?—I do.

129. How do you understand the expression in the rubric of the communion service "The table, at the communion time having a fair white linen cloth

"upon it"?—That that shall be placed upon the communion table before the administration of the sacrament.

130. What I rather meant was, do you consider that the whole of the communion-table should be covered with it, or simply the surface?—I think it a matter quite indifferent.

131. Do you consider that you are at liberty to place the Lord's table where you like without the sanction of the ordinary?—I should say not, certainly.

132. The rubric directs that "the priest standing at the north-side of the table shall say the Lord's prayer, with the collect following." What do you understand by "the north side"?—Supposing this to be the table, I stand here. (The witness explained the position of the north and south sides.)

133. In fact you mean the end?—Yes; not with your back to the congregation, certainly.

134. Do you stand at the same place throughout all the communion service?—During the whole of it, but not when I am preparing the elements for consecration; I then go in front for a few moments while I uncover the elements and place them conveniently for consecration.

135. But you do not consecrate them in front?—No, I consecrate them at the north end.

136. I think you said that, with regard to the preaching in the black gown, you founded it simply upon custom, not, as far as you are aware, upon any direction?—I have not studied the question.

137. Do you preach the sermon after the Nicene creed?—After the Nicene creed.

138. Is there always a sermon when you celebrate the Holy Communion on Sundays?—Always a short sermon.

139. How often is the Holy Communion celebrated in your church?—Twice every month.

140. When the alms are collected after reading the offertory sentences are they placed on the Lord's table?—They are always.

141. At what period of the Communion service are the bread and wine for the Communion placed on the Lord's table?—Before the service begins, as a matter of convenience.

142. A rubric states that "At the time of the celebration of the Communion, the communicants being conveniently placed for the receiving of the holy sacrament, the priest shall say this exhortation," "Dearly beloved in the Lord," &c. How do you manage for their being conveniently placed?—Those that are seated in the gallery come down into the middle aisle and the communicants are all seated in the body of the church.

143. In fact there is a pause in the service in order to effect that?—After the sermon there is a pause for the congregation to retire; and for the communicants who are not conveniently placed to place themselves where they may conveniently receive the elements.

144. Are persons who are not going to communicate compelled to leave the church, or are they at liberty to remain if they like?—They invariably leave the church. There is no injunction, but the habit is always to leave.

145. They are not told that they are forbidden to stay?—Certainly not.

146. I think that you have said already that you consider you are always bound to use the longer of the two exhortations at the time of communion?—I always use both of them, I consider myself bound to do that.

147. Do you act upon the rubric "Upon the Sundays and other holy-days (if there be no Communion) shall be said all that is appointed at the Communion, until the end of the General Prayer (For the whole state of Christ's Church militant here in earth)"?—Always, and I use one of the short prayers at the close before the blessing. I thought you were asking me as to prayer days when there is no sermon. When there is no sermon, and no sacrament, we always use the prayer for the Church militant before the blessing.

J. Wilson,
M.A.
20 June 1867.

148. How do you interpret the rubric "it shall suffice that the bread be such as is usual to be eaten." Do you think it prohibits you from using any other kind of bread?—I should think so.

149. (Mr. Cardwell.) I think you said that there was one occasion when the rumour of an intended change in the ceremonies produced an effect on the congregation of one of the churches?—Yes; so I find it here on referring to my papers. I have no recollection of it, but I find it here on record. Mr. Fell stated it to Bishop Blomfield.

150. What was that effect?—The Rev. Mr. Fell stated that when after the bishop's pastoral letter he had collected at the offertory, half his congregation had stayed away, and his churchwarden declared that he would never so collect again.

151. Is it your opinion that the parishioners of Islington generally would be sensitive upon the subject of any change?—They would be sensitive of any change; anything they are not accustomed to.

152. Can you state to the Commission what the probable effect would be of any change upon the greater or less attendance of the parishioners at the churches in Islington?—It would drive many to dissent. They would leave the church altogether.

153. You were asked about the reading of the Athanasian creed, and I think you said that you read it on every occasion on which it was enjoined by the rubric?—Invariably.

154. Has that always been the practice?—Invariably. I never remember any other.

155. Was it so in the time of your predecessors?—Always, as far as I know. It was in my father's time certainly; and I have no doubt it was the same in Dr. Strahan's time.

156. (Mr. John Abel Smith.) Has there been any attempt in the parish to introduce new practices, or novel practices?—Yes, there has. In one church recently built, St. Saviour's. There they have daily prayers. It has proved an utter failure; three, four, and five persons assemble, and that is all; and the founder of the church himself is utterly disappointed with the result.

157. (Rev. Robert Gregory.) Do you say that from your personal knowledge, or from hearsay?—I have it from one of the churchwardens of the parish.

158. (Sir W. P. Wood.) At what o'clock is the service?—I think it is seven or eight o'clock in the evening.

159. (Dr. Payne Smith.) Have you ever been requested to make any changes in your mode of conducting service at Islington?—I was requested about 20 years ago. One of the parishioners desired daily prayers. He wrote to the Bishop of London about it, and intimated that legal proceedings might be taken on the subject. In consequence of that, I had a case drawn, and submitted it to Dr. Lushington, stating what services I had at the church, and inquiring how far I was subject to any interference. His answer was entirely in my favour. I sent Dr. Lushington's opinion to the late Bishop of London, and his lordship was satisfied.

160. Since that time, which you say was 20 years ago, you have had no application?—No. I cannot say that I have not heard of something upon the subject, but no application has been made to me.

161. (Mr. John Abel Smith.) Are there any practices in the church to which you refer, other than those you have referred to, of a new character?—There are no vestments at St. Saviour's. They use the surplice just as we do. I know it from the churchwarden.

162. (Dr. Twiss.) One or two questions have been asked you which I should like to have a little further explanation upon. A canon has been read to you in reference to the use of the surplice and the hood. Do you observe that canon as a matter of practice?—I use the surplice and the hood as a matter of practice. Do you mean whether I do it because of that canon?

163. No?—I do not understand your question.

164. You were asked what your opinion was upon the question of law, and I now want to know what your practice is?—My practice is to use the surplice and the hood.

165. Then in practice you comply with that canon?—I do.

166. You were also asked whether in the administration of private baptism, and the visitation of the sick, you wore certain ornaments of the minister?—I do not.

167. Will you allow me to read to you the rubric: "The order for morning and evening prayer daily to be said and used throughout the year. The morning and evening prayer shall be used in the accustomed place of the church, chapel, or chancel, except it shall be otherwise determined by the ordinary of the place; and the chancels shall remain as they have done in times past. And here is to be noted that such ornaments of the church, and of the ministers thereof, at all times of their ministrations shall be retained and be in use, as were in this Church of England by the authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of King Edward the Sixth." Do you conceive that that order for morning and evening prayer has any application whatever to the service, either for private baptism in a house, or for the visitation of the sick?—No, I do not.

168. In regard to the rail in your church, how many communicants may come up to it?—From 16 to 18 conveniently.

169. Does your congregation consist mainly or almost altogether of your parishioners?—Certainly; the seat-holders mainly reside in the district itself, the parochial legal district.

170. They are not strangers in fact?—They are not strangers. I do not say that in the evening we have not persons from the bordering districts, but they all come from the parish of Islington; we have only six or eight out of 900 seat-holders in my church who do not reside in the parish of Islington.

171. (Bishop of Oxford.) I think you said there had been a change in the mode of administering the Holy Communion; that it had been administered to each communicant individually, and that it was now administered to the whole railful?—Yes.

172. Have you ever ascertained what difference of time it took with 150 communicants to act according to the strict letter of the rubric, or not to act upon it?—No, I have not; but I do not think that the fatigue is simply connected with the time. I think there is something in the fact of going from one to another which very much increases the fatigue. Of course there must be a certain difference of time.

173. You mentioned two other points of practice. You mentioned coming before the table to prepare the elements before consecration, and that you then returned to the north side. Do you ground that return upon rubric or upon custom?—Upon rubric, I should say; but I do not know that I can refer to that.

174-5. I will read the exact words: "When the priest standing before the table hath so ordered the bread and wine that he may with the more readiness and decency break the bread before the people, and take the cup into his hands, he shall say the prayer of consecration as followeth." Do you go back to the north end to obey any rubric or custom?—I do not see any reference to it; it is more from custom, perhaps.

176. You said that the rubric, which specially enjoins that the priest himself at a given time is to put the elements upon the table, was not observed?—I am not aware that it ever has been.

177. I think you said you did not observe the rubric from its inconvenience. What inconvenience has occurred?—The inconvenience of having to break off the service to go into the vestry to bring the elements on the table, but I would rather put it upon ancient custom.

178. (Earl Beauchamp.) With regard to those who attend your parish church, of what class of life are they principally?—Chiefly tradesmen; either London tradesmen who have their private houses in Islington, or Islington tradesmen.

179. There is within your parish a very large number of persons who live by manual labour, I believe?—Yes.

180. Can you give us any idea of the proportion of those who attend the parish church? What accommodation have you for them?—I have about 500 free seats out of 1,400.

181. (Bishop of London.) Do you count the Memorial Hall in that?—No. There is a hall erected in memory of my father, which the Bishop of London has licensed for divine worship, immediately at hand. The seats there are free and open to any one, so that one might probably regard them as additional sittings to the parish church.

182. (Earl Beauchamp.) As a chapel of ease?—Yes.

183. You have the same services there?—Yes.

184. I understood you to say that in St. James's, Islington, there was an evening celebration of the Holy Communion?—Yes, as well as morning.

185. But you do not consider an evening celebration of the Holy Communion to be any innovation. The services had always continued the same; you made no change in the mode of conducting it?—You may, if you like, consider that an innovation. In my father's time he had an early sacrament at eight o'clock in the morning; but so few attended, that I have altered it to the evening, and the result has been a very much larger attendance.

186. Can you state the numbers that attended in the morning?—From 30 to 40, and now we have 120 in the evening, many from among the working classes.

187. Was there any reason why that early service should not have been continued?—One was substituted for the other.

188. I think you told us that it was always your habit to wear a scarf?—I am always in the habit of wearing a scarf. The late bishop particularly enjoined it. He said that his clergy were to be considered as chaplains to himself, and he particularly enjoined that his clergy should all wear the scarf.

189. It was worn in consequence of that injunction of Bishop Blomfield?—That is my recollection.

190. That would be a change in the ornaments of the minister within your recollection?—It is difficult for me to say; my impression is—but I cannot speak positively on the subject—that Bishop Blomfield desired his clergy to wear the scarf.

191. (Bishop of Gloucester.) I wish to ask you two or three questions, and I should be obliged if you would kindly answer the first in the way in which I put it to you. Has any request or petition for an increase of the services in your church been made to you at any time? You mentioned one instance 20 years ago. May I ask whether there has been any request or petition made to you since that time?—I

THE REV. CHARLES JAMES LE GEYT, M.A., called in and examined.

209. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) You are the incumbent of Saint Matthias', Stoke Newington?—Yes.

210. How long have you been incumbent?—Nine years.

211. Who was your predecessor?—Mr. Mangin.

212. On entering upon your new charge did you make any changes in the service?—None whatever. When I first entered on the charge I went on exactly as I found things.

213. For how long?—About twelve months.

214. At the end of the twelve months, that is to say, about eight years ago, you made some changes?—One change.

have no recollection of any, I have heard that a petition has been in course of signature, but it has never reached me.

192. Then it would be fair to infer that there is no desire in your general congregation for any increase of Divine service upon what already exists?—Certainly.

193. May I ask whether any change is permitted or tolerated of the lessons appointed on week days when the Apocrypha is read?—I never make any change myself.

194. Sometimes it is done without your sanction?—I believe it may occasionally be done without my sanction. It is possible. I do not say it has not been done. I have always been in the habit of reading it, many of the parishioners object to it, but I have adhered to it.

195. You would then answer in the affirmative the question whether it has ever so happened in your Church?—It has happened I believe that the lessons have been changed, but I have never sanctioned it.

196. You mentioned that you did not read the offertory sentences or the prayer for the Church militant when there was no celebration of the Holy Communion?—I do not.

197. At what time are your collections made?—The collections are made at the doors as the congregation leave the church.

198. Suppose there were to be a Holy Communion and a collection coincident?—We avoid that purposely in a general way.

199. (Rev. W. G. Humphry.) Do you consider that the use of the scarf originated in Islington with the request of the Bishop of London?—I cannot answer the question.

200. You do not recollect?—No; I cannot say. I dare say it was worn before. I have no recollection and no knowledge of any change of any sort. You can probably bear me out in that matter as to Bishop Blomfield.

201. I never heard of it?—I understood he was anxious about it.

202. Is there any other ornament of the minister that is worn?—No other but the hood.

203. You wear bands?—Yes.

204. You consider that an ornament founded upon use and custom rather than on an interpretation of the Rubric?—Yes.

205. Do you use the collect before the sermon?—Always.

206. Not an extemporary prayer?—No, very rarely. Now and then when I have been preaching to children I have, but my usual practice is a collect, followed by the Lord's Prayer.

207. Similarly at the end of the sermon?—At the end of the sermon the usual collect.

208. Have you at any time observed any falling off in your congregation which you can attribute to your use, or non-use, or disuse of any practices?—We keep so invariably to the same practice that there has been no occasion for it. The church is always full on Sunday whenever we assemble—sometimes crowded.

215. What change was that?—The restoration of the use of lights on the altar.

216. Did you make any subsequent change?—The use of vestments within the last two years.

217. Will you define what you mean by "vestments"?—Those that are called the "eucharistic vestments," the chasuble for the celebrating clergyman, and the dalmatic and tunicle for the deacon and sub-deacon.

218. On the introduction of these changes did you find any remonstrance on the part of your parishioners?—None whatever. On the contrary, the vestments were purchased by them, and presented to me with the request that I would use them.

Rev.
C. J. Le Geyt,
M.A.

20 June 1867.

219. You think it was with the consent of the whole congregation?—I have no doubt of it, with the exception of very few.

220. Do you think your congregation was affected by the introduction of lights which took place six years before?—The first introduction of lights was previous to my incumbency. I hardly know the particulars. When I came they were clamorous for them, but from circumstances which occurred I delayed the adoption of them for twelve months. Long before I adopted them they were asking for them.

221. Do you say they were introduced before you came?—Yes, and for some time they had been disused.

222. What was the population of your district?—It now is nearly 10,000; it commenced with only 2,000 fifteen years ago.

223. There are two other churches, I believe, in the parish besides your own, are there not?—Yes, in the mother parish.

224. Have they adopted the same customs?—No, they have not.

225. Is your congregation, as far as you can judge, exclusively from your own district?—Certainly not exclusively from my own district.

226. Is it principally?—I should think not.

227. Then there are a good number of strangers?—Yes, a great number of strangers and a fair proportion of residents, but from the nature of the parishioners I could not expect it to be exclusively from them. They are a class of people that go to no place of worship at all, a large number of them.

228. How many does your church hold?—900.

229. Out of 10,000 I should hope you might get 900 from your own district. From those within your own district you do not think you have remonstrances?—I have never had a remonstrance of any kind or sort during my incumbency, on the subject of these observances, from anybody. On the contrary the pressure upon me has always been in the other direction.

230. As far as you can judge, what is the effect upon the people of your district of this use of vestments and lights?—The attendance in the church is extremely good, and the number of communicants constantly increasing.

231. What is the number of communicants at present?—Every Sunday we have about 160 or 170 communicants, and on the great festivals about 400, as Easter and Whitsunday.

232. Are the rest of the congregation desired to remain while the Holy Communion is administered;—Not desired to remain; a great many of them do as a matter of fact.

233. Are they encouraged to do so?—We explain to them that they may do so if they like. I have not urged them to remain.

234. You have advised it?—In some cases I have advised it.

235. On what ground do you advise it?—On the ground that I find no reason for their being told to withdraw, and that it is well for them to be present at the celebration of the great act of worship in the church. They could not communicate every time we have the Communion. It would be too frequent for them to do so, and we do not see why we should order them to withdraw. We find no provision for it.

236. (Bishop of London.) How many curates have you?—Two.

237. You have a large choir I suppose?—A large choir.

238. Do the persons who assist in the choir take part in parochial duty generally and assist you in other ways?—Some of them do. They are all amateurs and volunteers. Some do and some do not.

239. Do you find that these services have interested them very much?—Very greatly indeed.

240. And induced them to take a great deal of interest in the general work of the parish?—Yes, and to go through a great deal of self-denial to carry them on. They are men of business in the City.

241. Do these persons attend every day?—Some few men of business attend every day. I have a few who come every morning before they go to the City.

242. At what hour?—Eight o'clock, to sing at the morning prayers.

243. There is no payment?—No.

244. Probably to the boys there is some?—No payment to them at all.

245. Where do the boys come from?—They come from the parish mostly, and from families residing in the neighbourhood. Within two or three years their class has been raised merely by chance—boys of a higher class have come into the choir.

246. You said that lights were used. You do not mean for the purpose of giving light?—No.

247. They are used as symbolical?—As symbolical.

248. Besides that, is incense used?—Yes.

249. How long is it since that was first introduced?—Two years last Easter.

250. Was that on the request of the congregation?—At the same time that the vestments were adopted.

251. And the vestments were adopted at the request of the congregation?—Yes.

252. Were they a present from the congregation?—A present from the congregation entirely.

253. Where did the pattern of them come from? Who made them? I do not ask for the name of the manufacturer, but where did the pattern of them come from? How did you know what vestments to get?—From the old English patterns of vestments, I believe from old authorities.

254. From pictures?—From pictures and from brasses and various other sources. We found many persons perfectly well acquainted with the way of making them.

255. Perhaps they had been in the habit of making them for other people?—It must have been so—we were not the first.

256. When they first began in the Church of England were they not used anywhere else?—I imagine they must have got them from these old sources,—pictures, brasses, and vestments still remaining.

257. Are they the same as those used in the Church of Rome?—Not quite the same shape as those used in the modern Church of Rome, but the old Catholic shape.

258. Slightly differing?—Slightly differing.

259. Who swings the incense?—In the first instance we used the incense according to the use prescribed, I believe, throughout the Church of Rome, and in the Church of England before it was disused;—the priest using it.

260. Does the priest use it now?—No. I gave that up last winter in conjunction with other churches. It is merely brought in and burnt now. I have given up "censing persons and things," as it is called.

261. That was in consequence of the decision of Convocation?—Yes; and it was believed to be your Lordship's wish also. Several clergymen determined to do so.

262. Are there certain persons employed in the celebration of the Lord's Supper, or in the adjuncts of it, who are not clergymen?—Only in that way, to bring in incense, and assist in that kind of way.

263. Are they dressed in any particular way?—In surplice and cassock, as the choir. They are mostly choir members in fact.

264. Are there any processions?—In this kind of way; before service on great occasions we come in at a door at the bottom of the church and sing a hymn going up to the chancel.

265. Is there any one preceding?—A boy carrying a cross.

266. Was the cross a present too?—I found that in the parish when I came.

267. Do you consider that to be one of the ornaments of the church?—I think so. We have every reason to believe it was found in all the old inventories.

268. It is looked upon as an ornament in the technical sense of the term?—I think so.

269. Not merely an adornment, but a thing to be used in the celebration of divine service?—Yes.

270. Is there one on the Communion table?—On a ledge behind the Communion table.

271. A moveable cross?—Yes.

272. Is that looked upon as an ornament of divine worship?—I believe so.

273. You use it as such?—We use it as such.

274. It is not merely an adornment of the church, but it has to do with celebration of divine worship?—I take it as one of the ornaments.

275. In the technical sense of the word?—Yes.

276. How often is the Holy Communion administered?—Every morning.

277. How many communicants are there generally?—The average of daily communicants is about six or eight.

278. And on Sundays?—Three times on Sundays; twice in the early morning, and once at 11 o'clock.

279. What is the number of communicants at those times?—About 50 or 60 at each of the earlier ones, and about the same number at the mid-day one.

280. With regard to the scarves or stoles, they are of various colours, I suppose, and different kinds?—Yes.

281. Can you give me any account of the various colours that are used?—There are four different colours.

282. Which are they?—The green is the usual colour when there is no festival season going on.

283. That is worn over the surplice?—Exactly the same way as the ordinary black scarves.

284. And at other times?—Red is used on certain days, also white, and violet in Lent and at funerals.

285. Do you consider that they are pointed out in the rubrics or in the canons?—I believe that they all come under the term "ornaments." When we investigate the ornaments we find they were of this nature, garments of different colours and forms.

286. With regard to the persons who attend, many of them of course do live in the neighbourhood?—A great number are residents and ratepayers.

287. A great number are residents and ratepayers in the district?—Yes.

288. Are there any who come from a distance?—Some few always come from a distance; and there are some regular communicants who reside at some distance from the church.

289. Were the persons who requested you to introduce these changes members of the choir, or who?—No, not particularly so. The members of the choir were included in the requisition. They were all communicants.

290. Of course there is a vestry held for the election of churchwardens every year?—Yes.

291. Of what sort of persons does that vestry consist?—Ratepayers in the parish, and tradesmen.

292. Do any come to it except those in the habit of worshipping in the church?—Occasionally we have had a few.

293. Have they ever expressed any opinion on the subject of these things?—No. At the last two meetings, the only two meetings at which I have had any, not worshippers, they expressed no opinion on the ceremonial; they merely gave their votes.

294. Do you suppose the vestry is a fair representation of the parishioners?—Being so very small it is scarcely fair, because few people come, but it is open of course to them.

295. Do the poor come in considerable numbers to your church?—Very fair numbers.

296. What numbers, do you suppose?—It is very difficult to say, from the way in which they dress. I can scarcely estimate the numbers, but I think on Sundays I have always about 200 working people in church.

297. How many does the church hold?—Nine hundred.

298. And the population is about 9,000?—Ten thousand.

299. Is it your opinion, as it is certainly the opinion of many clergymen, that these services actually attract the ignorant poor; that they are the means of bringing them to church when they otherwise would stay away?—I have every reason to think so, from the nine years experience I have had.

300. Have you any fact you could mention?—Yes; I could mention several cases of persons who have looked in at the church on Sunday evening, and have come again and again until they have put themselves under the clergy for instruction, and become communicants. I could point to several poor families where that has been the case.

301. (Dean of Westminster.) With regard to these ornaments, do you use them because they were enjoined by authority of Parliament in the second year of King Edward VI., or for any other reason?—That was my authority for using them. I used them because I was asked to do so, and they were presented; and the authority on which I justified my use of them was that you have mentioned.

302. Not the general usage of the church?—No; that rubric.

303. With regard to the colours and pattern of these vestments, do you consider you have proof that they are the colours and the pattern that were used in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI.?—We imagine that we have as near proof as possible, if not actual proof.

304. From the circumstances you mentioned to the Bishop of London, the brasses, and so on?—Yes; and from ancient vestments actually remaining; and also from written records of the vestments in use.

305. The colours which are now used you consider to be exactly the same as the colours used in the second year of the reign of Edward VI.?—That I am unable to say; because there have been the Sarum use, and the Roman use, and various uses with regard to the colour. I do not profess to be sufficiently skilled in all these details to answer accurately.

306. But if they are not of the same colour and pattern as those used in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI. what is the authority on which you use them?—I think in the reign of Edward VI. there were various colours. The use was not determined, and there is great difficulty in ascertaining it.

307. You have the opportunity, you think, of ascertaining what these various colours were?—I should think hardly precisely. I am afraid I am not able to reply to that, from insufficient knowledge on the matter.

308. The patterns you consider exact by what were used in the reign of Edward VI.?—I believe there is no doubt at all about the patterns. There is a great difference of opinion about the use of colours in what is called the Sarum use and the Roman use; which I do not profess to understand thoroughly.

309. At the time of the celebration of the Holy Communion, does the Lord's table stand in the body of the church?—It stands in the chancel; removed about two feet from the chancel wall, the east wall.

310. Not in the body of the church?—I suppose not.

311. Do you before the communion read the whole of the exhortation inviting the communicants to come?—Which of the exhortations do you mean?

312. The exhortation immediately before the invitation to draw near?—The long exhortation beginning "Dearly beloved in the Lord?"

313. Yes.—We do not use that every Sunday; only at times.

314. On what ground?—Because it seemed, at the weekly communion, to be unnecessary to use so long an exhortation, and we found there was authority in the early days of the Church of England for the use of the short exhortation only.

315. (Mr. Walpole.) What is that authority?—In the Prayer Book of Edward VI. In the case of weekly communion it allowed the use of the shorter exhortation only.

Rev.
C. J. Le Geyt,
M.A.
20 June 1867.

316. (Dean of Westminster.) Which do you call the shorter exhortation?—The one beginning “Ye that do truly and earnestly repent you of your sins.”

317. Do you use that which announces the celebration of the Holy Communion?—I use this four times a year in full, before the great feasts.

318. At the time of the celebration of the Holy Eucharist what are the gestures you use with regard to the sacramental elements?—At what part?

319. At the time of the consecration?—With regard to the sacramental elements, the only gesture used is in kneeling before the altar at the time of the consecration, and in taking the paten and chalice into the hand.

320. Is the cup or the paten lifted up?—Before the last winter we were in the habit of raising the paten and the chalice to about a level with the head; but since last winter, I, with other clergymen in London gave up that practice on the same ground on which we gave up the use of “censing persons and things;” and now we merely take the paten and chalice into the hand, without so lifting them up.

321. Do the communicants or the celebrating clergy use any other posture in receiving except kneeling?—I have never seen any.

322. (Bishop of London.) No prostration?—No; I have not seen any.

323. (Sir R. J. Phillimore.) Would you object to saying what the amount you receive from the offertory is? If you have any objection I will not press it?—I have not the least objection. I have 200*l.* a year.

324. (Bishop of London.) Do you mean that is the whole of the offertory, or what you receive?—What I receive personally. The whole of the offertory is 1,000*l.* a year.

325. (Sir R. J. Phillimore.) I did not mean personally?—The offertory yields 1,000*l.* a year.

326. Is that increased or diminished since you have been in the parish?—It has rather increased within the last few years.

327. Is your church open all day?—With the exception of two hours in the middle of the day for the servants to go home to their dinners.

328. Do you know whether it is ever frequented by persons for the purpose of private worship?—Yes; particularly in such times as Lent and Advent; there are persons in the church frequently.

329. Going in and out?—Yes. On Good Friday the church was never empty from seven in the morning to eight at night.

330. Have you seen them saying their prayers?—Yes; going into their seats or reading books of devotion.

331. Do you administer the Holy Communion to each individual communicant, or to a rail at a time?—To each individual.

332. I understand you to say that the use of the incense now is not censing persons and things, but it is brought in in some way. Will you explain that?—The incense is put into a censer held by one of the assistants, one of the boys, and simply allowed to burn itself out.

333. At what time?—It is used at four different times during the service.

334. What are those times?—At the beginning of the service, at the gospel, at the offering of the alms, and the elements, before the prayer for the Church militant, and at the time of the consecration.

335. I do not know whether I heard you rightly. What is your usual attendance at church on Sundays?—The church is quite full. I conclude with 800 or 900 persons every Sunday.

336. Your church is as full as it can hold?—Quite; and in the evening overflowing.

337. Has there been an increase or decrease?—A decided increase. I suppose owing to the population having so much increased the last few years.

338. As I understand, you discontinued the practice of censing persons and things, and you discontinued the elevation of the paten and cup, partly in obedience to the wish of Convocation, and partly in obedience to the wish of your ordinary?—And to the opinion of the nine lawyers who were consulted. I expressed this at the time in a public statement I made.

339. That is to say, since you thought it was not according to law you desisted?—Quite so; and as we thought a wish had been expressed by the Bishop.

340. I think the Bishop of London asked you about the lights on the altar being symbolical. What do you mean by that? Symbolical of what?—I take the meaning of the word in the Injunctions of Edward VI. as symbolising Christ as the very Light of the World.

341. You think your authority for using the lights is the Injunction of Edward VI?—I can scarcely take that to be the authority. I believe that these Injunctions explain the use of them at that time.

342. I think I understood you to say to the Dean of Westminster that your use of the ornaments rests upon this rubric: “And here it is to be noted, that such ornaments of the church, and of the ministers thereof, at all times of their ministration shall be retained and be in use as were in this Church of England by the authority of parliament in the second year of the reign of king Edward the Sixth?”—Yes.

343. That was the authority on which you ground your right to use the ornaments?—Yes, including the lights.

344. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) You mentioned some ornaments of your church, the lights, for example, on the Communion table. Have you any ornaments at the altar besides?—Only the cross; and occasionally vases of flowers are placed on the ledge at the back of the altar.

345. Have you any different kinds of coverings of the altar?—Yes.

346. How many different kinds?—Four different colours.

347. What are the colours?—Red, green, white, and violet. Black is used sometimes on Good Friday.

348. Do you think you have any authority for using those different colours?—I believe our authority for using the different colours is the practice of the whole of the Western Church. It is so very doubtful what the practice of the Sarum use was.

349. Do you believe you have any recent authority for using them; any recent legal decisions?—Of course in the decision of the Knightsbridge case, which referred to a certain period, we thought that seemed to settle the question.

350. Are you aware whether in the Knightsbridge case the same colours were used as you are using now?—I thought so.

351. If so, would you think that that was your warrant for using them now?—I believe so; I believe that to be the case.

352. The decision of the Privy Council in Liddell v. Westerton was in these words: “Next, as to the embroidered cloths, it is said that the canon orders a covering of silk, or of some other proper material; but that it does not mention, and therefore by implication excludes, more than one covering. Their Lordships are unable to adopt this construction. An order that a table shall always be covered with a cloth, surely does not imply that it shall always be covered with the same cloth, or with a cloth of the same colour or texture. The object of this canon seems to be to secure a cloth of a sufficiently handsome description, not to guard against too much splendour. In practice, as was justly observed at the bar, black cloths are in many churches used during Lent, and on the death of the Sovereign, and some other occasions; and there seems nothing objectionable in the practice. Whether the cloths so used are suitable or not, is a matter to be left to the discretion of the ordinary.” Are you aware whether there are any colours that were in use, either for altar cloths or for vestments in the Church of England? Are there any inventories or records of any sort that mention the colours?—A great many inventories which seem to show the use of the four colours for altar cloths, and another use also.

353. Then, with regard to the ornaments of the ministers, you have mentioned some; I think you mentioned a chasuble and tunicles. Who uses the tunicle?—The tunicle is used by the sub-deacon, and the dalmatic by the deacon.

354. In other words, the epistoler and gospeller?—Yes.

355. Are there any other vestments used besides these at the time of the celebration of the Holy Communion?—The vestment beneath, called the alb.

356. Is the surplice ever used beneath?—Not at celebration.

357. Is there anything used for fastening the alb?—A girdle round the waist.

358. Is there any other vestment of any kind? Is there what is called a maniple?—The maniple is used on the arm.

359. What is your authority for using any of these?—We find they are all included in the Inventories, and in the directions for the ornaments of the ministers, at the period to which we referred, in the old service books.

360. It is suggested that the Commissioners may not know what is meant by the Inventories. Will you be kind enough to tell us what you understand by them?—These Inventories are the old authoritative records of the ecclesiastical property of different churches.

361. Have you any idea of the date when they were first made?—I believe it was about 1552.

362. (Mr. Walpole.) Are there any inventories since the year 1552 which mention these vestments?—I really cannot remember what is the latest date I have seen; I believe some to be much later than that.

363. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) Will you be good enough to say what vestment you use in the morning prayer, in the evening prayer, and in the litany?—The plain surplice.

364. Any stole?—The surplice with the stole.

365. At all three of the services?—At all three of the services.

366. With regard to the evening prayer, do you ever use any lights then?—Yes; at evening service frequently we use lights.

367. Do you use anything else,—incense?—Yes; on certain occasions we use incense at the singing of the Magnificat.

368. Do you use any other vestment at the evening service besides a surplice?—A cope, sometimes.

369. When is that used?—From the beginning of the service. One of the clergymen wears it during the service, especially at the Magnificat. If one clergyman only were there, he would put it on at that time.

370. In the ministration of private baptism, or of private communion, or in the visitation of the sick, do you ever use any vestments?—I always use a surplice on those occasions.

371. A surplice only, or a surplice and stole?—A surplice and stole.

372. And for the administration of the Holy Communion have you any proper vessels?—Yes.

373. Will you tell the Commissioners what are the authorized directions upon which you rely for the use of whatever ornaments you employ?—Reference to the old service books, to the records of what was in use at the period to which the rubric refers us.

374. I mean authorized directions; such as would be considered to be binding at the present day?—That rubric, I should say, almost entirely.

375. Do you rely at all on the canons of 1603?—Yes, of course.

376. Do you think there is any authority in any of the previous canons? Have you any reason to think that the pre-reformation canons are now of any authority? Do you refer to them in any way?—I am almost afraid to answer that question; I am not well up, I must confess, in the historical details.

377. As far as you know, you do not found your practice upon any such authority as that?—On those I have mentioned.

378. But not on any pre-reformation canons?—No.

379. From what you have already told the Commissioners, do you consider yourself at liberty to introduce into your church ornaments of the church or ministers which were recognized in those directions, though they have been out of use for a long time?—I think so.

380. What rule or what principle would guide you in re-introducing those things; would it be your own wish of conforming to the law, or the wish of your congregation; or what would be the motive?—I should be actuated by a double motive: first, my own desire to conform to the law of the Church, and my own conviction of the importance of it; secondly, and greatly, by the wish of my people. I have been more weighed by the latter, from circumstances.

381. It is suggested that you should be asked whether you consider the introduction of these vestments for the altar, or vestments for the ministers in time of service, to be essential to the service?—I can hardly say "essential," but of great importance. I mean not so essential that I could desire to force them upon an unwilling congregation, certainly not, but of great importance.

382. Remembering the direction in the Preface "Concerning the service of the Church," about reference to the bishop and archbishop in cases of doubt, how would you apply that with regard to what you think is your supposed right of re-introducing anything? Do you think you need ask the bishop of the diocese beforehand, or should you feel at liberty to do it without?—I have never thought it was necessary, except in case of dispute or opposition, that reference should be had to him.

383. To revert to the question just asked, it is suggested to inquire on what ground you think it is of great importance to re-introduce those things?—First, for the edification of the people, and for the setting forth of the truths taught by the services more plainly and clearly.

384. There is a rubric, you remember, which speaks of "the accustomed place of the church, chapel, or chancel" where the morning and evening prayer is to be said?—Yes.

385. Where do you say morning and evening prayer?—From the chancel.

386. That is the usual place in your church?—Yes.

387. Do you think the expression, "accustomed place" in the rubric, means to refer to an existing custom, or to what was the old custom at the time the rubric was prepared?—I take it to mean the place in which it was formerly said.

388. You think that that expression, "the chancels shall remain as they have done in times past," is meant to support that view?—I think so; that they were to remain as they were before the Reformation.

389. Have you any hymn or anthem at the beginning of morning or evening prayer?—Not at the beginning of morning and evening prayer.

390. Do you found your mode of conducting the service, whether in reading or singing, or whatever it may be, upon any language in the rubric?—The rubrics are constantly directing that the service shall be "said or sung."

391. You think that those words have different meanings?—I can hardly say that clearly; there has been so much dispute as to whether they have different meanings.

392. I do not ask you to pledge yourself to any opinion, but what do you think?—My impression is that they always refer to one use, a musical recitation.

393. Perhaps I need hardly ask you whether you always use the Athanasian creed at the times appointed?—Always.

394. Where do you say the litany?—From the desk at the chancel steps.

395. When you say that, do you mean inside the chancel, or outside?—At the bottom of the steps.

Rev.
C. J. Le Geyt,
M.A.
20 June 1867.

396. What is your authority for using a litany desk?—Instead of saying it from the usual place?

397. Yes?—We find it used in so many cathedrals, for instance, and in college chapels.

398. Are you aware of any old directions in any of the earlier Prayer Books as to where it should be used?—My impression is that there was; I cannot tell you where, precisely, now.

399. Do you think that that direction in the Communion service, as to "the place where they are accustomed to say the litany," may refer to it?—It seems to infer that there was a special place for the litany.

400. Do you say the litany always after the morning prayer on Sundays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, or do you ever use it as a separate service?—As a separate service.

401. I was going to ask you whether you ever say the litany in the afternoon or the evening?—We say it on Sunday afternoons.

402. Do you think you have any authority to say it then?—The Prayer Book does not seem to prescribe that the litany shall follow "immediately after" the morning prayer, provided that it is said "after the morning prayer."

403. Do you not think the direction before the litany implies that you are bound to ask the Bishop first?—I never thought so.

404. Do you consider you are at liberty to separate the morning prayer and the litany and the communion service, and to say them as separate services?—Yes.

405. What is your practice with regard to covering the altar with a linen cloth? Do you cover it all over?—The whole of the altar is covered with a linen cloth.

406. The front, I mean?—No; the whole of the table is covered; the flat surface on the top.

407. Should you think that you had any liberty to remove the altar out of the accustomed place for the convenience of communicants?—Not the least. I should fancy not.

408. Do you think you would need the Bishop's sanction for that?—I should have thought so.

409. Is there anything in the Prayer Book which leads you to think so?—I should take it from the direction that "the chancel shall remain as in times past," and the evidence being clearly that the altar was at the east end.

410. There is a rubric directing the priest to stand at the north side of the table to say the Lord's Prayer and the collect at the beginning of the Communion service; what do you understand by the "north side"?—The northern part of the table.

411. The northern part of the front?—Yes.

412. (Earl of Harrowby.) The northern part of the west end?—Not the "end."

413. The northern part of the west side?—Yes, of the west side.

414. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) That is to say, you would be standing with your back to the people?—I should be standing with my back to the people.

415. Have you any idea at all how that expression, "standing at the north side of the table," originated?—From the different position of the altar, I have always understood it to be.

416. Did you ever turn your attention to the position of the priest under the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., when he began the service?—Yes; he was ordered to stand "in the midst of the altar."

417. Do you recollect that the second Prayer Book Edward VI. had this order changed? Instead of beginning with the "Gloria in Excelsis," the priest was ordered to begin with the Lord's Prayer and the collect following; and it was then, I think, that this change in the rubric first took place, ordering the priest to go to the north side?—Yes.

418. Do you think that that might have arisen from the alteration of the service altogether?—I think so.

419. Have you any idea whether there was any use to begin at the south side when he got to the altar?—I have never heard of the practice.

420. In what vestment do you preach the sermon in the morning?—In the surplice always.

421. Supposing you were the celebrant, or that the epistoler and gospeller had got the vestments you spoke of, would they preach in them?—I believe they would preach in those. I have never had occasion to settle the question from the order of my services.

422. Do you always preach in the morning after the Nicene creed?—No, we do not; rarely. We preach before the communion service, immediately after the morning prayer.

423. Is that a recent alteration?—Within the last two years.

424. Had you any particular reason for making that change?—Partly from the length of the services and the inconvenience of it, and partly from the fact that it was more convenient in consequence of wearing vestments.

425. Do you think you have any authority to change the place of the sermon?—I thought we had authority to preach after morning prayer, and that we were not commanded to have a sermon in the communion service, by the rubric.

426. There is an expression in the communion service after the Nicene creed, "Then shall follow the sermon;" do you think that only means that if there is a sermon it shall be then, or do you think it means that you need not have a sermon at all then?—I thought it must mean the first of the two; otherwise it would order a sermon at every celebration, and we should have three every Sunday.

427. Are you aware whether, in any other church, it has been at all the custom to omit the sermon in the communion service?—I believe there are several churches in England at the present time in which that practice is followed.

428. Is it a very old practice?—I believe so; I cannot say.

429. That you only mention from hearsay?—Yes.

430. How often is the communion celebrated in your church?—Every day.

431. Are the alms that are collected duly presented, according to the rubric, on the Lord's table?—Yes.

432. At what part of the service is the bread and wine for the sacrament placed on the Lord's table?—After the collection of the offertory; immediately before the prayer for the Church militant.

433. Where are they up to that time?—On the credence table.

434. Do you consider that the credence table is a recognized ornament of the church?—I believe so.

435. Have you any idea whether there is any decision on the subject?—I believe so, clearly.

436. In Liddell v. Westerton?—Yes.

437. I merely wished to ask what was your authority?—It would be that.

438. There is a rubric which says "At the time of the celebration of the communion, the communicants being conveniently placed for the receiving of the holy sacrament, the priest shall say this exhortation," "Dearly beloved in the Lord," and so on. What do you do as to arranging the communicants? Do you make any pause for that purpose?—No.

439. You simply go straight on with the service?—We simply go straight on with the service.

440. Any person goes out who likes?—Quite so.

441. And those who wish to remain do so?—Exactly.

442. Do you find any inconvenience or confusion arising from that?—Not the least.

443. I thing you said that you did not always read the longer exhortation?—Exactly.

444. Should you think you are not bound to do so?—I should think we are not bound to do so.

445. What is your view with regard to the direction, "When the priest, standing before the table, hath so ordered the bread and wine," and so on? Do you change your position at that time?—Yes; I come to the centre from the north side.

446. Do you remain there the rest of the service?—We remain there. There is no direction to return, that I can find.

447.—How do you interpret the rubric, “It shall suffice that the bread be such as is usual to be eaten?” Do you think you may use any other kind of bread than that?—I believe it to mean that you may use other kind of bread, but that that is sufficient where the other cannot be had or is not provided.

448. The Bishop of London asked you a question with regard to the altar cross, whether you considered it an ornament in the sense of a thing used for the service; would you be kind enough to tell us whether you make any actual use of it in the service?—None whatever. It simply stands there as an ornament.

449. And it is perpetually there?—It is perpetually there.

450. What rule guides you in the change of the colours of the vestments and altar cloths?—We change them according to certain seasons.

451. What guides you to the change?—We take what is called the Western use; the Roman use more particularly.

452. Have you any idea whether there was any other custom?—Unquestionably the Sarum use; a great variety of colours.

453. What do you understand by the Western use?—I should have said the Roman use more properly.

454. You said you administered to every communicant separately?—Yes.

455. Do you ever find that at all tedious to the people or wearisome to yourself?—I think not. I never thought of entertaining the question. I never felt it so.

456. It is suggested that there is another use, besides the Western use;—the Eastern or the Greek use? Did you ever refer to that at all in your mode of using the vestments or colours?—No. I cannot say I have. I do not think it has anything to do with us.

457. Do you view it as a guide?—I think not.

458. Do you ever have incense in processions?—We carry the censer in processions.

459. You were referring to the Injunctions of 1547, touching the two lights being symbolical, and I think you said that you did not found your practice upon those Injunctions; but can you tell me whether you have any idea of their being recognised or not as law in the first Prayer Book of Edward VI.?—I thought the Injunctions were somewhat doubtful. There was a question as to their subsequently having been repealed, so that I should not rest my practice upon that so much as upon the rubric, and the judgment referring to the practice in the time of Edward VI.

460. At what time in the evening service is incense used?—At the Magnificat.

461. (Earl of Harrowby.) Are any crossings used in your church?—By the ministers?

462. Yes?—They are sometimes. There is no rule that they should be so.

463. (Mr. Cardwell.) Is there any other church in your district of 10,000 persons?—No, there is not at present.

464. (Rev. R. Gregory.) You said the alms amounted to 1,000*l.* a year?—Yes.

465. Are there any wealthy persons in your parish who contribute large sums?—Very few; scarcely any wealthy persons.

466. What proportion of the 1,000*l.* a year comes in copper?—A very large proportion. I can scarcely tell you the statistics, but a very large proportion.

467. (Dr. R. Payne Smith.) There are one or two points in your evidence which I do not quite understand. You spoke of kneeling to the elements?—No, at the consecration.

468. What part of the service is it? Is it merely in the prayer in which the rubric orders that the celebrant shall kneel,—the prayer before you rise up to pronounce the words of consecration?—No; after that.

469. In the course of the consecration prayer?—Yes.

470. In what part of the consecration prayer?—After the pronouncing of the words of consecration.

471. Do you, when you take the bread and wine from the credence table, kneel in putting them on the table?—No.

472. The only time when you kneel is in the course of the prayer of consecration?—Yes.

473. Have you any particular reason for preferring the Roman use to the Sarum use as regards the colours?—Only from the great difficulty of arriving accurately at the details of the Sarum use. We should be very glad if we could, but it is so very difficult to get at the details of the Sarum use on many points.

474. (Rev. H. Venn.) With respect to the vestments, which I think you called the cope and the chasuble, which you wear in administering the sacrament?—Not the cope, but the chasuble only, in administering the sacrament.

475. Is that chasuble of one colour?—Of four colours, according to the time of year at which it is used; just as the season may be.

476. Is that an expensive vestment?—It may be very cheap, or it may be enormously costly. It entirely depends on the material of which it is made. Ordinarily it is not very costly.

477. But it is capable of having precious stones in it?—Yes.

478. Have you any idea what is the most expensive one you have heard of in use?—About 40*l.* or 50*l.* I have heard of some, but have not seen them, much more expensive. I meant actually in use.

479. Your church is a new church, I think, is it not?—It has been built about 15 years.

480. What is the parish church?—S. Mary's, Stoke Newington.

481. Then your church commenced upon this system?—Almost exactly.

482. All the congregation has been gathered for the last 15 years upon this system?—Yes.

483. Has it drawn many from the other churches and from the parish church?—We certainly have some. I can scarcely say whether it has drawn many. I should say some few, but I can hardly tell. We have certainly parishioners of the mother church, among our regular attendants.

484. The service was commenced by your predecessors on this system, and therefore all who joined this church came in fact because they preferred this system?—Yes.

485. And some from the parish church attend?—Yes.

486. I do not know whether you have mentioned whether you mingle water with the wine?—Yes, I do.

487. When does that take place?—Before placing the bread and wine on the holy table. When it is taken from the credence table and before it is placed on the holy table, a little water is mixed with the wine.

488. In the presence of the congregation?—Yes.

489. Is the whole of the service intoned?—Yes.

490. Not the lessons?—No; the lessons and those parts for instruction of the people are read, but the prayers are intoned after the manner of cathedral services.

491. I do not know whether it is fair to ask whether you find that Romanists attend your worship?—No, very rarely indeed. Occasionally I have heard of such a thing; but I do not know of any well authenticated instance.

492. Have many of your congregation left you to go over to Rome?—No, clearly not. I can say not more than five or six persons in the last nine years, who were regular members of the congregation.

493. But you are unable to speak to a large number, because they come as strangers?—Of course they may. I am speaking of communicants, not those we know nothing of.

Rev.
C. J. Le Cyt,
M.A.
20 June 1867.

494. (Mr. J. Abel Smith.) In whose gift is the district church?—Alternately in the crown and the bishop.

495. From whom did you receive the presentation?—From Lord Derby.

496. You were good enough to state that you understood certain things to be implied by the lighted candles; could you also state what doctrine or meaning you attach to the vestments?—The vestments I take to mean a distinctive dress for the priest at the time of celebrating the Holy Communion.

497. Not as implying any particular opinion or doctrine?—I can hardly say that. I should say it would imply doctrine.

498. What doctrine?—I should certainly think the use of the chasuble would imply the belief in the doctrine of sacrifice,—Eucharistic sacrifice,—that being the object of a distinctive dress.

499. Will you explain to me what you mean by that, for I do not quite understand how you connect that with the sacrifice?—It has been thought that the priest offering this sacrifice at the Holy Communion should have a distinctive dress to mark him off from the rest of the ministers, as being the principal priest in office, offering the sacrifice at the time.

500. Have you anything analogous to or resembling the elevation of the Host? Do you bring the elements forward to the front of the altar and lift them up?—No, not at all.

501. You said that you considered yourself at liberty to make certain changes without reference to the ordinary. Do you consider yourself bound to obey the injunctions of the ordinary if he forbids any practice in the Church?—Ordinarily, I should certainly say "Yes." It must depend, if I may venture to say so, on the kind of prohibition that it was. If it appeared to be contrary to a permission of the Church, or an order of the Church, it would raise a question; for instance, in such matters as lights upon the altar.

502. (Mr. Walpole.) As a matter of fact, did you ask the consent of the ordinary, or apply to the ordinary, before these alterations were made?—No.

503. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) Do I gather from your last answer to Mr. J. Abel Smith that you mean you think you are bound to disobey the ordinary if in your judgment he sets himself above the law?—If it is clear that it is contrary to the law.

504. You just now said to Mr. Abel Smith that you considered these vestments symbolical of sacrifice. Are we to gather from that, that you mean a carnal sacrifice?—Certainly not.

505. "A sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving"?—More than that.

506. How much more?—A commemorative sacrifice as representing continually and "showing forth" the Lord's death.

507. Anything in the sense of sacrifice under the Jewish law?—A representative sacrifice.

508. A representative sacrifice?—Yes.

509. Mr. Venn just asked you whether among your congregation you had any who came from the services of the mother church of Stoke Newington. In order to understand the drift of that, I must ask you very briefly (for I do not want to travel into hearsay) what the character of the services at the mother church is? Are they very plain, and of an unadorned sort, or of rather an adorned sort?—They have been plain and unadorned. They have lately been more adorned. They have choral services now, whereas they were quite plain, read services.

510. And frequent communions?—I cannot say how frequent. I think not very frequent.

511. They do not come from the point of absolute extreme difference?—No; not quite that.

512. Have you any mission chapels in your parish?—I am sorry to say we have not.

513. You stated the number of communicants on ordinary Sundays. What is the average number of communicants on great days like Easter or Whitsunday, or Christmas?—Close upon 400.

514. Do you mean all the three celebrations taken together?—Yes; all three taken together.

515. What are the hours of the early communions?—Seven and eight o'clock.

516. And the other?—Eleven o'clock.

517. What are your afternoon services on Sunday?—At half-past three the litany is sung, the children are catechised, and baptisms are administered.

518. Have you any evening service?—Evening prayers and sermon at seven o'clock.

519. What services have you in the week days besides the daily communion?—Morning prayer and evening prayer.

520. Every day?—Yes, and the litany on Wednesday and Friday.

521. What are your holy day services?—We have two celebrations of the communion on holy days; morning prayer and evening prayer, with a sermon.

522. What number of communicants have you on those days?—On ordinary holy days about 50 to 60.

523. Have you noticed a difference in the social condition of the worshippers at the different hours?—Yes.

524. What is your experience as to that?—The poor mostly come early.

525. On Sunday?—Yes.

526. Do they come to the early communion?—Yes; they like the early communion better. They come to it more frequently.

527. The 11 o'clock service is composed of the better-to-do class?—Yes.

528. And the evening service?—The evening services are largely attended by the poorer class.

529. Do you apply that to the seven o'clock or to the half-past three o'clock service?—To the seven o'clock service.

530. What is the character of the congregation at the half-past three o'clock service?—Children and servants very greatly. Because of the simple instruction and the catechising they come in great numbers.

531. Have you observed the number of communicants from the very poor class increase or decrease?—I have observed them increase very much within the last few years.

532. Do they like these novel vestments or not?—I find they do always.

533. Do you find any difference as to liking or disliking in the different classes of society?—Yes; it is, perhaps, hardly fair for me to say so in the character of my church, but I believe we find more difficulty with the partially educated class.

534. The middle class?—Yes.

535. Then you conceive that a very adorned form of worship attracts most the highest and lowest strata of society?—I think so.

536. And the middle or lower middle class dislike it most?—I think so. I have generally found that to be the case.

537. I gather from what you said that dislike had not with you amounted to positive opposition?—Never the least in the world. That made me say it was scarcely fair for me to say that; so many of that class, the middle class, have attended my church regularly.

538. Have you taken pains to ascertain what church, if any, those church people in your parish go to, who do not belong to your congregation?—Yes, I have taken pains to ascertain that. I find that most of them go to dissenting chapels. The church people go either to neighbouring parishes, West Hackney or St. Mary's, where they have a partial choral service.

539. What is the character of the service in West Hackney?—Partially choral.

540-I. Is that Mr. Norris's church?—Mr. Lamb's.

542. Have you found that any go to what are called "low church" churches?—Yes, some few do. We have one close to us.

543. Has that drawn much from your parish?—No, none at all that I have seen.

544. Have you drawn from them?—I am told that our church has done so. We are very close to them.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY IN THE CHAIR.

Rev. GEORGE COSBY WHITE, M.A., called in and examined.

G. C. White,
M.A.
24 June 1867.

545. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) You are the perpetual curate of St. Barnabas, Pimlico?—I am.

546. How long have you been so?—Since last September.

547. Who was your predecessor?—My predecessor was Mr. Liddell; but I was his locum tenens there, and had been so for 10 years.

548. You were a stipendiary curate before?—Yes.

549. And now you are perpetual curate? You are the incumbent?—Yes.

550. How many services have you in the week, beginning with Sunday?—On Sunday our services are as follows; celebration of the Holy Communion at seven; a second celebration at eight; a service for our school children and other children, consisting of morning prayer and a short sermon, at half-past nine; morning prayer and litany at half-past 10, followed by a third celebration with sermon; an afternoon service at half-past three, with catechising or baptisms; and a second evening service with sermon at seven. Occasionally we have litany and sermon at a quarter to nine p.m. in Advent and Lent; but the list I have given is the permanent list of services.

551. What are your week-day services?—Our week-day services are, on ordinary days, a celebration of the Holy Communion at seven; morning prayer at eight; litany on Wednesday and Friday at noon; and evensong at eight. There is a second celebration on Thursday at 10 a.m.; on holy days there are celebrations of the Holy Communion at 7, 8.45, and 11. Sermons are preached at the eve service, and in the course of the 11 o'clock celebration. There is also a sermon every Friday evening, and additional services in Advent and Lent, which vary from year to year according to circumstances.

552. At your Sunday celebrations of the Holy Communion respectively, about what number attend?—The average last year on ordinary Sundays—that is, excluding great festivals—was about 160 every Sunday.

553. Including all the three celebrations?—All the three celebrations. I think I am rather understating than overstating the number attending; I think the average was 165.

554. At which time are there the greater number of communicants?—There are rather more at the two early celebrations than there are at the late celebration.

555. What vestments do you wear on week days when the Holy Communion is not celebrated?—Surplice, stole, and hood.

556. Any particular colour of stole?—Coloured stoles.

557. How many colours?—Four colours.

558. How are they settled and arranged?—The colour of the stole corresponds with the colour of the altar cloth.

559. How is the colour of the altar cloth arranged?—A white altar cloth is used at the great festivals, a green one at ordinary times, a purple one in Lent and Advent, and a red one on the days of the martyrs.

560. Will you describe your dress, and if I may say so, your attitudes, if there are any peculiar ones, during the celebration of the Holy Communion?—We use the same dress exactly during the celebration of the Holy Communion as at matins and evensong,—surplice, hood, and stole. We make no difference whatever.

561. You have not adopted what are called the vestments?—No.

562. Have you anything particular to remark with regard to gestures?—I have nothing particular to remark.

563. You do not think that there is anything at all peculiar in your gestures?—I do not think so.

564. (Bishop of London.) I forget whether you were in charge of St. Barnabas's at the time of the Liddell v. Westerton judgment?—I was.

565. Several changes took place in consequence of that judgment; have things continued much as they were since then?—I think the introduction of the coloured stoles is the only alteration. The furniture of the church remains precisely what it was.

566. The lights are not lighted, are they?—Yes; the lights are lighted.

567. Have they always been?—They have almost always been lighted. The necessities of the church required it; but I light them now always and on principle.

568. Not for the purposes of light?—Not for the purposes of light.

569. That matter did not come into discussion in the appeal in the Liddell v. Westerton case?—No, it did not.

570. Would you tell us what are the ornaments of the church? I mean thereby, ornaments in the technical sense of the word. What is on the Communion table? Is there anything but the chalice, the paten, and so on?—No; nothing at all.

571. There is no moveable cross on it?—No.

572. In fact your service, with the exception of the lights and the coloured stoles, may be called a simple choral service?—I should call it so.

573-4. It differs, in fact, hardly appreciably from that at St. Paul's, Knightsbridge?—No, hardly appreciably; I should think that the coloured stoles are perhaps the only appreciable difference.

575. Are there flowers on the Communion table?—Yes.

576. They are not in flower pots, are they?—No. They have been in use ever since I have been at the church.

577. You do not consider them as ornaments of the church in the technical sense of the word?—No.

578. There are merely there for decoration?—Exactly.

Rev.
G. C. White,
M.A.
24 June 1867.

579. The church is generally quite full?—The church is overcrowded.

580. Of course it could not be fuller if you had the vestments?—It would be quite impossible that it should be fuller. I have done all I can to relieve the pressure by means of additional services, but we have got to the full length of our tether now in that respect.

581. Have you any request to adopt the vestments?—From private individuals I have, again and again.

582. But not from any body of the parishioners assembled in vestry?—No.

583. You have a vestry, I suppose?—Yes.

584. And that is quite satisfied with the present state of things?—I have never had any complaint at all.

585. (Dean of Westminster.) On what ground do you wear these differently coloured stoles?—On the same ground on which we use differently coloured altar cloths.

586. On what ground do you use differently coloured altar cloths?—Our use of the differently coloured altar cloths was justified by the Privy Council. They are (with one exception) the very altar cloths which were approved by the Privy Council.

587. You do it because the Privy Council sanctioned them?—The altar cloths were one of the questions submitted to the Privy Council for their decision; the Privy Council approved of these altar cloths, and I have, of course, continued to use them.

588. On what ground do you not adopt the chasuble, alb, and other vestments?—I have several reasons. (To the Archbishop of Canterbury.) Unless your Grace thinks it necessary, I would decline to answer that question, if I may be allowed to do so, in all submission.

589. (Bishop of London.) In answer to one question by the Dean of Westminster, you stated that you adopted the differently coloured stoles under the decision of the Privy Council; but these things, according to that decision of the Privy Council, were for the discretion of the ordinary. I understand your view to be this; that as the Privy Council was the court of appeal from the ordinary's court, the decision of the Privy Council was really the decision of the ordinary?—Exactly.

590. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) I think you say that the cross on your altar is not a moveable cross?—It is not on the altar at all.

591. Will you explain how it is placed?—It is on the sill of the east window.

592. Have you a shelf, or as it is sometimes incorrectly called a super-altar, on the Lord's table?—We have that which was legalised by the Privy Council.

593. Do the candlesticks stand on that or on the altar table itself?—They stand upon that.

594. You think that the position of the cross is justified by the decision of the Privy Council?—The Privy Council did not order the cross to be removed from the church; they ordered it to be removed from the place which it then occupied.

595. Have you introduced any other coloured altar cloths since the judgment of the Privy Council?—I have replaced a purple one, which was worn out, by a new one.

596. Do you think that that judgment prevents you from introducing any other colours, or that it would be a liberty beyond the judgment to do so?—I have never considered that question.

597. Will you tell us whether in private baptism or in private communions you use any vestments?—I always use my surplice on both occasions.

598. Would you say why you do that? What is your rule for doing it?—I think the words "at all times of their ministration" probably cover it. I have always considered that those words cover such cases as the ministration of baptism privately, and the administration of the Holy Communion to the sick.

599. Do you reserve the sacrament for sick persons under any circumstances?—No, I do not.

600. Have you ever found any difficulty arising out of its not being reserved; for instance, has it ever occurred in your experience that when you have been preparing to administer to a sick person, the person has died before you have completed your preparation, and so you have not been able to administer the sacrament?—I do not remember any such case.

601. Will you tell us how you place the linen cloth upon the Lord's table; does it cover the whole of it or only the surface of it?—I do not quite understand your question.

602. Does the linen cloth at the time of the celebration of the Holy Communion cover the whole of the table, and hang down in front, or merely cover the surface of it?—It covers the top and the sides.

603. (Earl of Harrowby.) But not the front?—Not the front.

604. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) You mean by the sides what would be commonly called the ends; you do not mean the front; it does not fall in front of the altar?—It does not fall in front.

605. It lies upon the top?—Yes.

606. On what would be commonly called the two ends?—Yes.

607. What is your position in celebrating the Holy Communion?—At what portion of the office?

608. At the beginning of the office where do you stand?—In front of the altar.

609. At which part?—To the north.

610. At the northern part of the front?—Yes.

611. Do you remain there throughout the office, or do you change your position?—If I am alone and read the epistle, I move to the epistle side, and read the epistle from that side.

612. If you were assisted by others; for instance, if you had assistance in the gospel, what should you do then?—I should do what the rubric directs me to do.

613. Will you refer to that part of the rubric?—"When the priest, standing before the table hath so ordered the bread and wine."

614. You go then to the centre of the Lord's table before consecration?—Yes.

615. Do you consecrate in the front?—Yes.

616. Do you remain there throughout the rest of the service, or do you change your place again?—I remain there throughout, till the end of the service.

617. When you distribute the remains of the Sacrament to any persons who come to receive it, in what position are they?—Kneeling.

618. Who is responsible for the cleansing of the vessels after the end of the Communion service; is it done by the clerk or sacristan?—By the clergyman who may be celebrating the Holy Communion.

619. Is that done at the time?—Yes.

620. Is it done in the vestry or in the church?—In the church.

621. Would you be good enough to describe in what way it is done?—It is done by pouring wine and water into the chalice, which is consumed by the celebrant.

622. (Rev. Robert Gregory.) How many persons does St. Barnabas's church hold?—I have heard it variously stated, but I believe, according to the ordinary rules of measurement, it is supposed to contain from about 500 to 600 people.

623. What is the population of the district?—The population of the district at this moment I believe to be verging upon 6,000, because we have just had 750 added to it by a large lodging house that has been built.

624. What number of clergymen are there in the parish ministering?—Five.

625. What is the amount of your offertory every year?—The gross amount averages, I should say, about 1,300*l.*—from 1,200*l.* to 1,300*l.*

626. What is the largest number of communicants you have had on Easter Day?—We had 734 last Easter Day.

627. At the consecration of St. Barnabas's were not there vestment riots?—No.

628. Were not there disturbances outside St. Barnabas's?—Great disturbances; not at the time of the consecration, but shortly after.

629. Was not it in consequence of the vestments then used?—No.

630. What vestments were used?—Surplice, stole, and hood.

631. Nothing else at all at that time?—Nothing else at all at that time.

632. You say it was not the use of these vestments that created the disturbance, what was it?—I was not formally connected with the church, and therefore I will not pretend to say.

633. (Dr. Payne Smith.) As to the colours, purple, I suppose, is that which in other churches is called violet?—Yes.

634. That is the Western sequence of colours?—Yes.

635. The judgment, as one reads it, in Liddell v. Westerton, only authorizes altar cloths; it does not authorize any sequence of colours?—No, it does not.

636. Only a change of altar cloths?—Only a change of altar cloths.

637. (Rev. H. Venn.) May I ask you whether, as to the offertory which you speak of, you have other collections in your church after the sermons, or are all the collections in your church made by means of the offertory?—They are all made by means of the offertory.

638. May I ask to what the offertory is devoted?—The offertory is devoted to the maintenance of four clergy, the ordinary expenses of divine service, the sustentation of the charities of the parish, and to various other extra-parochial objects, such as church societies. The relief of the poor is, of course, one object.

639. Therefore, as I understand you, all the parochial collections are made through the offertory?—They are made through the offertory.

640. Do you use the mixed chalice in your church?—Yes.

641. At what time do you mix it?—When the elements are brought and placed on the altar.

642. Is there a cruet for water on the Lord's table?—Upon the credence table.

643. The mixture takes place before it is brought, or is that cruet-stand brought as one of the ornaments of the church on the Lord's table? I understood you to say that the mixture takes place at the Lord's table?—Yes; the wine and the water are brought in two separate vessels. The wine is poured into the chalice and then the water is added to it.

644. Is the mixture made on the Communion-table; or where?—The chalice is in the hand of the person celebrating the Holy Communion when the wine is poured into it and when the water is poured into it.

645. (Earl of Harrowby.) It is neither the one nor the other?—It is neither the one nor the other. I wish to be perfectly distinct. I do not know whether I have made myself clear.

646. (Rev. W. G. Humphry.) It is after the wine has been removed to the Lord's table that this is done?—The wine is not removed to the Lord's table at all. The water and the wine are brought to the person celebrating the Holy Communion; the wine is poured first into the chalice, and the water is poured in afterwards.

647. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) What takes place is at the Communion table, but not on the Communion table?—It takes place at the Communion table. The person celebrating the Holy Communion does not leave the Lord's table.

648. (Rev. H. Venn.) Upon what rubric or ordinance of the Church do you use the mixed chalice?—It has been the usage of the Church at all times.

649. Pre-Reformation times?—Pre-Reformation times. So far as I know, in a great number of places in England, ever since the Reformation. I have never known any other use during the 20 years I have been in holy orders.

650. I think as the great object of our inquiry is to ascertain variations, perhaps you will allow me to ask you whether you use incense?—No, I do not.

651. Are there in your church confessional boxes?—There are not.

652. Is it common bread or wafer bread that you use as the element?—Pure wheaten bread.

653. (Mr. Walpole.) Is there any break in your service after the sermon, and between that and the time of administering the Holy Communion, so as to allow those persons to go out who do not intend to remain?—Those persons are at full liberty to go out who do not wish to remain.

654. But is there any pause in the service?—There is a short pause immediately after the prayer for the Church militant.

655. Is that pause long enough to allow persons to go out, without disturbing the service that is going to be commenced?—We endeavour to avoid disturbance as much as possible.

656. I mean, as a matter of fact, are persons who do not intend to remain, generally out of the church before you proceed?—I desire that they should all be clear of the church before the confession begins.

657. With regard to the congregations in your church, are they principally derived from persons within your own ecclesiastical district?—Of 600 people, whose names were entered in a book at Easter, as intending to communicate on Easter day, I should say not more than 60 would have been found to live more than three quarters of a mile from the church. I do not mean to say that they all come from my own district, but that they come from within a circle of about three-quarters of a mile around the church, many of them of course from the parish of St. Paul's, to which St. Barnabas was a chapel-of-ease.

658. But independently of those who communicate, is the general body of your congregation composed of persons who come from your own ecclesiastical district, or are they strangers?—I think there are very few strangers. I do not mean to say that they all come from the immediate district, but I think it is a distinctly local congregation. I think that if you take a radius of about three-quarters of a mile there are very few people outside that.

659. They are within your local neighbourhood, but they may be in a different ecclesiastical district?—They may be in a different ecclesiastical district?

660. (Sir W. Page Wood.) Do you know the population of your district?—I cannot say quite certainly because of certain changes which have taken place recently. We have had an addition of a large lodging house for 750 persons; but I should think the population of my district is very nearly 6,000 now.

661. With reference to the custom of mixing water with the wine, have you ever celebrated, or been present yourself in other churches during the time of the administration of the Holy Communion where the water has not been mixed, or do you represent it as universal wherever you have been present?—I have moved about very little indeed, but I should think that certainly in by very much the larger number of churches that I have known anything about, it has been the custom.

662. Would you absent yourself from the Communion where the water was not mixed?—I do not think I should ask such a question before I went to a church.

663. Do you deliver the Holy Communion into the hands of those who are communicating?—It is the rule of the Church. I have always requested the clergy to do so. There are certain cases of infirm persons, in which an exception is made, but it is the rule of the Church, and it is my direction to the clergy who assist me, so to do.

664. Does any elevation take place after the consecration?—No.

665. (Mr. J. Abel Smith.) With regard to the classes of which your congregation is composed, does it belong to the upper classes or the middle or the lower classes? Have you any idea what proportion of the poor attend?—There is a very large proportion of poor; our list of communicants, which we keep pretty carefully, would show you that we have a very large number indeed of poor communicants.

Rev.
G. C. White,
M.A.

24 June 1867.

666. Your general congregations then have a large mixture of poor?—A very large mixture of poor.

667. Are they your own poor?—Our own poor.

668. Do you think your services have tended to attract the poor?—I think they have, very decidedly.

669. Do you think that they come really for religious objects, or that they are induced by charity, or anything of that kind?—We have not so much to give as to be able to bribe them in any way, and I do not think, from my experience of the London poor, that they are open to that sort of thing.

670. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) Have you any mission chapels, or school chapels, or other places where you hold services in your parish?—No; we have not.

671. St. Barnabas's then is the only place of worship available for your congregation?—It is.

672. Have you heard any complaints in your parish that the only legal place of worship they have got is a church where they must always find a choral service?—I have never heard any such objection made.

673. You are inclined to think that your parishioners (I am not talking of the congregation who go there from predilection but of your legal parishioners) find no grievance in having to attend a choral service?—I think not.

674. You just said in answer to Mr. John Abel Smith that you had a large proportion of the poor; have you ever tested the different social characteristics of the different services?—Yes; on Sunday morning the earliest celebration is attended very largely by the poor.

675. Could you tell us the proportionate numbers at the three celebrations, roughly?—It varies a little with winter and summer. I am almost afraid to trust myself to give it you.

676. Do you draw a broad distinction between the services? Do few go to the early and many to the late, or vice versa; or are the numbers equally distributed?—The numbers at the two early celebrations on Sunday preponderate slightly over the number at the late celebration; and on the great festivals, very decidedly. For instance at Easter, out of 734 communicants, 556 communicated at early celebrations. I happen to remember that, and can state it as a fact.

677. Do you think that the fact of a service being short induces the poor to come there; that they can do so with less social or domestic inconvenience?—Quite so. No doubt it does. They are able to get back and cook their Sunday dinner afterwards.

678. It is your opinion therefore that the division of services attracts people to church who would otherwise not be able to go?—No doubt.

679. I understand you to say that at the mid-day communion, the upper classes chiefly attend?—Yes; and a few aged people.

680. Have you much fluctuation of attendance between your Sunday morning service and the commencement of the Communion service; or do, generally speaking, the same congregation come in for the previous service and stay to the Communion?—It is difficult to say; the church is so very much crowded. There is a little going in and out between the services. We make a pause in order that people may do so if they will.

681. I think you stated that your afternoon services are two repetitions of the evening service?—Yes.

682. What are the different social characteristics of the two?—Three fourths of the afternoon congregation are children. The service is specially intended for our schools. Perhaps three fourths is a little too much to say; two thirds, perhaps.

683. Is the congregation at the evening service from the upper or the lower class?—From the lower and middle class.

684. What is the average number of communicants at the early week day communion?—Twelve; it was last year twelve and a fraction.

685. To what class of life do they belong?—All classes.

686. They are not merely the inmates of St. Barnabas's College?—Certainly not.

687. What attendance at Communion have you at the later Communion on Saints' days?—An average of 28.

688. Have you observed anything of the social characteristics of the attendants at the common daily services—morning and evening prayer?—The attendance at evening prayer at 8 o'clock is much larger than at matins; and the congregation is almost entirely composed of the poor and middle-class people.

689. What number do you think you have at that service?—I should think the average at the evening service on week days is from 100 to 150.

690. It is smaller at the morning service?—Very considerably smaller.

691. Suppose you were to give up the daily service would it create a sensation?—A very great sensation. I should hope and think.

692. It would not be taken apathetically?—It would be a very great loss I have no doubt.

693. And it would be felt over a considerable area of society as a loss?—Well, no; I do not think it would be felt as that much beyond our own immediate district.

694. I meant your own district?—Yes, it would.

695. It would be felt through your district?—Yes.

696. What is the age of your communicants generally; are they old or young?—They are of all ages.

697. I suppose you have prepared confirmation classes?—I have people under preparation for confirmation, almost all the year round.

698. After they are confirmed do you find that you keep them in hand, and that they become tolerably regular communicants?—I think they do.

699. Do you think you would have them so well in hand if you did not give them so many opportunities of communicating?—No.

700. Do you conceive that it is necessary or desirable for a clergyman to multiply occasions for Communion in order to keep his hold over his congregation and keep them Christians?—Most desirable.

701. You do not, therefore, look upon your multiplied communions as a mere ceremonial advantage?—Each increase that has been made in the number of celebrations has tended to increase the number of communicants. I would multiply the number of celebrations now if I could do so; but there is not the time to do it.

702. Every one of them has brought its practical gain?—Every one of them has brought its practical gain.

703. Excepting in Lent and Advent, and these early celebrations, have you any short occasional week day services in the way of litanies?—We have the litany on Wednesday and Friday.

704. With or without sermon?—Without sermon.

705. How is it attended?—Rather largely.

706. As largely as the 8 o'clock service?—The school children come on Friday; and I should think on Friday there are very often 250 people in the church.

707. Of what class of life are they?—Of the better class.

708. Do you ever find that persons of the lower middle class or working men snatch the time from their hours of recreation or meal time?—No.

709. Do families sit together, or are the sexes separated?—The sexes are separated.

710. Do you consider that desirable?—I consider it is of the greatest importance in a free church.

711. To prevent scandal and annoyance?—To prevent scandal and annoyance.

712. Have you ever tried the other system?—No.

713. Still, it is your experience that it is desirable?—Yes.

714. Are the seats in any way appropriated in your church?—In no way.

715. I do not mean "let," but appropriated?—No.

716. First come, first served?—First come, first served.

717. Do they come early for the purpose?—Yes they do, an hour before service time on Sunday evening. The church is always open.

718. Do you think that the entire non-appropriation of sittings is or is not desirable?—I consider that where the church accommodation is inadequate to the wants of the population, which is the case in our neighbourhood, it is essential.

719. You said to Mr. Perry that your cross was not on the Lord's table, but on a ledge; are we to gather that the flowers are similarly placed?—The flowers are placed on the super-altar.

720. Not on the table itself?—No.

721. There is nothing on the table except the communion vessels?—No.

722. In short, you conceive that your appointments at St. Barnabas's, with the exception of the coloured stoles, are exactly those which were legalised by the Privy Council in the case of Liddell v. Westerton?—Yes; because no alteration has been made.

723. Neither in going beyond or below?—They are just what they were. I mean to say the church is exactly what it was after that judgment was carried out.

724. (Earl of Harrowby.) What guides you in the choice of colours? What authority have you for vestments and for altar cloths?—For stoles, do you mean?

725. Yes?—I said that the stoles followed the same rule as the altar cloths.

726. What guides you as to the altar cloths?—The custom of the Western Church.

727. Where or how do you find that recorded? As I understand, supposing some one should prefer another colour, you would say, "No; it is not the custom of the Western Church." What is your authority for that? What is the custom of the Western Church to which you refer?—The custom of the Western Church is to use these four colours.

728. Where do you find that recorded? What is your guide if anybody disputed the point? What should you refer to?—I suppose there are many old authorities to which they might be referred.

729. Is that authority the authority for the use of those colours in other churches than the Church of England, or the authority for the use in the Church of England?—I suppose that is the very question which was urged very strongly when those altar cloths were the subject of litigation.

730. What is the book you refer to, or what is the custom you refer to as guiding you in the choice of colours?—The universal custom of the Western Church, the custom that prevails throughout the whole of the Western Church.

731. What do you mean by the Western Church? The Church of Rome, and the churches in communion with it.

732. Then you hold yourself to be in communion with the Church of Rome?—No, I do not.

733. Then what is it that guides you, as you say that you follow the custom of the Western Church, and that the Western Church means the Church of Rome and the churches in communion with it? Unless we are in communion with the Church of Rome, what is it that brings you to adopt those colours?—I found those colours in use. (To the Archbishop.) I should be very glad to defend the principle if your Grace thinks it well I should do so. I went to St. Barnabas's at the time these very altar cloths were the subjects of litigation. They having been legalised, I suppose that is a sufficient justification for my use of them, or rather my continuing to use them. I am quite ready, if your Grace thinks fit, to enter into a defence of the use of altar cloths.

734. As far as I understand, the effect of that judgment is not to say that they are the right colours, but that they are not illegal. There is no judgment of the Privy Council that these four colours are the colours that ought to be used; they only say there is nothing so very much against them that we should order them to be removed; and it is in the discretion of the ordinary to say whether they are the right colours or not. Is not that the effect of the judgment? I want to know what dictates the choice of those particular colours more than any others? You said the custom of the Western Church?—If your Grace thinks fit that I should enter into a defence of it, I am ready to do so; but I respectfully submit that my justification of the use of these altar cloths is a sufficient one, when I say that the question was submitted to the Privy Council, and that their use was not declared by the Privy Council to be illegal. I should give that answer to anybody who asked me why I used them.

735. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) May I put the case thus: without analysing what the colours are, they run in four classes, in compliance with the spirit of the Prayer Book,—the first class, for the greatest days; the second, for the lesser holy days; the third, for ordinary days; and the fourth, for times of mourning, like Lent and Advent?—Yes; I mentioned that before.

736. (Earl of Harrowby.) Have you a vestry?—Yes.

737. How is it constituted? Are all the members of it ratepayers?—They are all ratepayers.

738. And it meets at regular times?—On Easter Tuesday, for the election of churchwardens, which is the only business it has to transact.

739. Have you had the election of a churchwarden since the constitution of the district?—Yes.

740. Have you had any expression of opinion upon the occasion?—None whatever.

741. In regard to the offertory, have the churchwardens a share in the distribution, or how is it distributed?—There has never been any difficulty at all about it. The churchwardens have been perfectly of accord.

742. I mean, does it in any way practically pass through their hands?—They sign all cheques.

743. (Bishop of London.) Since the district was constituted?—Before that time all cheques were signed by the churchwardens of the mother church; but now the money is paid into the bank every Monday, and no payments are made at all except by cheques signed by the incumbent and both of the churchwardens.

744. (Earl of Harrowby.) I think you said the custom of mixing the chalice has been constant, as far as you have known it, ever since you have been connected with the church?—Yes.

745. In what churches 20 years ago was this the practice?—It was done in the church in which I was ordained 20 years ago.

746. Which is that?—The parish church of Wantage. I have not been in very many churches. It was also used in the parish of Chisethurst in Kent; those are the only two other churches in which I have served as a curate.

747. Do you exhort the people to stay to witness the celebration of the Sacrament when they do not partake of it?—Do you mean, do I exhort them publicly or privately?

748. Privately.—Under certain circumstances I do.

749. You think it advisable that they should?—With certain limitations I do—very great limitations.

750. In individual cases you advise it?—In individual cases.

751. Are there processions in your church?—We sing hymns in procession on the great festivals.

752. You enter the church singing hymns?—We enter the church singing hymns.

753. (Sir Joseph Napier.) As to the coverings or cloths you spoke of, were they used for covering the stone structure that was removed?—Yes.

754. That was removed on account of its being an altar fixed?—It was removed by order of the Privy Council.

Rev.

24 June 1867,

755. For the reasons given in the judgment?—For the reasons given in the judgment.

756. The cloths, I believe, were those that are ordered by the canon?—Yes.

757. The 82nd canon is: "Whereas we have no doubt but that in all churches within the realm of England convenient and decent tables are provided and placed for the celebration of the Holy Communion, we appoint that the same tables shall from time to time be kept and repaired in a sufficient and seemly manner and covered in time of divine service with a carpet of silk or other decent stuff thought meet by the ordinary of the place if any question be made of it, and with a fair linen cloth at the time of the ministration"?—Yes.

758. I suppose that it is under that canon that these cloths are continued now?—I suppose so.

759. If any question should be raised about colour or quality that was to be disposed of by the bishop?—Yes.

760. Is there any canon similar to that with regard to the stole?—No.

761. I suppose you take these matters as to the manner of conducting the services of the Church to be part of the common order of the Church?—Part of the common order of the Church.

762. And every particular is ascertained from some common authority accessible to all the ministers?—Yes.

763. Is there any other deviation in your church from the prescribed rubric in the Book of Common Prayer with regard to the celebration of the Holy Communion than the mixing of the water?—I do not admit that to be a deviation from the rubric. I do not wish to imply that I regard it as a deviation from the rubric.

764. I want to know whether there is any deviation from the mode of celebrating the Holy Communion prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, with the exception of using the water?—As I said, I do not regard that as a deviation from the mode prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer. I should be very sorry to do anything which I did not believe to be thoroughly and entirely justified by the Book of Common Prayer.

765. It may be so; but where is there anything in the Book of Common Prayer as to the use of the water?—I think that the usage of the Church in all times, the immemorial usage of the Church, is quite distinct upon that head, and that water has always been used with the wine.

766. What I meant by my question is this: besides that which is expressly prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer is there any other deviation in your celebration of the Holy Communion except the use of the water?—I am not aware that there is.

767. I should perhaps use the word "addition" instead of deviation?—I am not aware that there is.

768. You do not think it necessary, as I understand you, to have any different dress; in that you follow the 58th canon?—We use the same dress exactly for morning and evening prayer and for the celebration of the Holy Communion.

769. You exactly follow the 58th canon with the exception that you add the stole to the dress there prescribed; the canon directing that the surplice and hood shall be used at all times?—Yes.

770. You have no other addition than the stole?—No.

771. (Lord Portman.) I do not think I understand how your list of communicants is obtained?—It has been my custom for the last ten years, before the Easter Communion, to ask all persons who intend to communicate in the church, to write their names and addresses in a book kept for that purpose in the vestry, or to send them in to one of the clergy.

772. Does that apply to the Communion through the whole year?—No, it does not.

773. The list in fact is a list of those who communicate at Easter?—At Easter only.

774. I think I understood you to say that you had never attended in any church, as far as you know, where the water had not been mixed with the wine. Is that so?—Never "attended" in any church, I did not say. I thought the question was "ministered" in any church. I meant I had not "ministered." If I said "attended" it should be corrected, because I cannot pretend to say what has happened in churches with which I was not connected.

775. (Earl of Harrowby.) You are not aware that you have partaken of the Communion except where the wine has been mixed with water?—No.

776. (Rev. W. G. Humphry.) Do you use the stole in the Office of Baptism?—Yes.

777. Do you make any change of it in the course of that service?—No.

778. Do you use the sign of the cross in that service in any other way than that prescribed in the Prayer Book; for instance, do you sign the water with the sign of the cross?—Always.

779. At the benediction of the water?—Yes, always.

780. And in the consecration prayer in the Holy Communion do you use the sign of the cross?—Yes.

781. Do you use any form of benediction of your stole or other vestment?—No.

782. Do you use any bowing or prostration in the creed or in any other service, other than at the name of the Lord Jesus?—I always bow my head at the words "and was made man."

783. And you encourage your congregation to do so?—I have never given any directions to anybody on the subject.

784. Do they follow your example in that matter?—I dare say many do; but as I do not see what happens, I cannot tell you.

785. Is that the only time at which you make any prostration or bowing?—I simply bow my head moderately at those words. It does not amount to anything like prostration.

786. At the Doxology you do?—Always. I was taught to do so by the old people at Wantage in the church in which I first ministered. I learned the custom there. The old men and women in the parish did so habitually.

787. Do you make any bow in passing before the altar?—Yes.

788. Always when you cross from one side to the other side?—No, not when I cross, but in approaching the altar, or in going away from it.

789. Do you use any prayer or litany in the course of the church service other than is prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer?—Not any.

790. In your early celebrations do you use the whole of the Communion service?—The whole of the Communion service.

791. (Mr. Hubbard.) After the Prayer for the Church militant there comes an address beginning "Dearly beloved," and prefaced to that is the rubric to the effect that "At the time of the celebration of the Communion, the communicants being conveniently placed for the receiving of the Holy Sacrament, the priest shall say this exhortation." Do you make any pause between the Prayer for the Church militant and that address, so as to enable communicants to be conveniently placed?—Yes, we do.

792. I understood you to say that with regard to the elements, the bread which you use is pure wheaten bread. Will you tell me whether in the course of the consecration prayer you recite it as a whole or whether you break it up into sections?—I recite it as a whole.

793. You introduce no actions or words other than those prescribed by the rubric attached to the consecration prayer?—No.

794. (Bishop of Gloucester.) You mentioned that on Easter Day the number of communicants was as many as 700?—Very nearly 750.

795. What do you conceive to be the number at the greatest of the three celebrations?—There were four celebrations on Easter Day. The largest number was at five o'clock in the morning, when there were 267.

796. Did you then, 267 persons being present, administer singly and separately to each one?—Most assuredly.

797. By how many clergymen were you assisted on that occasion?—I am doubtful whether it was two or four. We generally endeavour to have four, but I do not think we had more than two or three on that morning.

798. If I said then there were not more than three present besides yourself that would be correct?—Yes.

799. At the commencement of the sermon do you use any prayer, or any form of words, preceding it?—We always use the invocation of the Holy Trinity.

800. You stated that you used the whole Communion service at each one of your three celebrations on Sunday?—Yes.

801. Do you always use the address beginning "Dearly beloved in the Lord"?—Only at the last of the three celebrations. We use the longer of these two exhortations at the late celebration—at the two early ones it is omitted.

802. With regard to the mixed chalice, what amount of water do you put into the cup?—A very small quantity.

803. So that the object is to conserve a custom rather than for any other purpose?—That is the object; the strongest point to urge in favour of it is the unquestionable fact that our Blessed Lord himself used a mixed cup.

804. You have mentioned what you believe to be the custom where your observation has been directed, but you have not yet answered the question as to the rubrical authority. There being no direction in the Prayer Book it seems fair to ask you on what authority do you adopt that which is not so mentioned in our present Prayer Book?—"Quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus traditum est," would be my answer to that.

805. Are you aware that that has been considered by what we may term responsible legal authority to be more than doubtful?—I heard with great surprise, for the first time in my life the other day, that it was more than doubtful. I do not think before that I thought very much about it. I was taught to do so as a deacon, and as I say I have never faltered in my practice since.

806. There had not come under your consideration the case submitted on behalf of a certain society called the "English Church Union" to nine lawyers?—Yes; that is what I am now referring to.

807. It is only within a short time that you have become cognizant of the opinions there given?—I knew nothing about it till that case. I had gone on not questioning the thing at all, and was surprised to find that there was any doubt at all as to the legality of the custom.

808. Do you use any hymns in the Communion service?—Yes.

809. Will you mention the place where you introduce the hymns?—We sing a hymn sometimes before the commencement of the Communion office after the morning prayer or litany, as the case may be, and we sing a hymn immediately after the consecration.

810. Immediately after the consecration and before the reciprocity of the celebrant?—No; while the celebrant is receiving.

811. At what time is the sermon preached, at the time specified in the rubric, or any part of the morning service?—At the time specified in the rubric, after the Nicene Creed.

812. Do you ever terminate the service on week days at the third collect; that is, omitting all that follows when there is no anthem?—On litany days we do.

813. (Earl Beauchamp.) With reference to the mixed chalice, you say it has been used continuously in the Church of England from very early times; can you mention the names of any who are known to have used it?—I heard of a parish the other day, the name of which I have forgotten, where the custom has been an unbroken one.

814. Are you aware that Bishop Andrewes invariably practised it?—No doubt, and Bishop Cosin also.

815. With regard to the colours used for the altar cloths, you used the expression that "the Privy Council judgment had legalised them;" is it your opinion that the Privy Council judgment gave any legality to the use of those coverings which were not in use before?—It would perhaps be more correct to say that it affirmed their legality. The legality of their use was called in question and the Privy Council decided that they were not illegal.

816. They were not legalised in that sense?—No.

817. With regard to the colours used in the stoles and the altar cloths, as far as you know, they are those in use in the Church of England in the second year of King Edward the Sixth?—Yes.

818. Is it within your knowledge that the rubric in force at that time was this "That at Easter the ministers of the altar were to use white vestments"?—No.

819. What is the date of those canons to which you were referred?—1603.

820. The rubric in the Book of Common Prayer referring to the ornaments of the church and of the minister in its present shape, is of the date of 1662, therefore that would override the canons in your judgment?—Yes.

821. Therefore that canon of 1603 is no guide whatever to what was in use in the Church of England in the second year of King Edward the Sixth?—Certainly not.

822. Have you ever been presented by any of your parishioners for not wearing legal vestments, or vestments which they might hold to be legal?—I have not.

823. Do you take any fees for baptisms?—Never.

824. (Bishop of Oxford.) You spoke of having found a great gain in the number of communicants from every added celebration?—Yes.

825. Has that led you to adopt evening communions?—No.

826. Will you state why it has not?—Because I am perfectly certain that the poor are quite ready to come in the morning if opportunity is offered to them. The number of poor people who come habitually to the Holy Communion in our church is quite a sufficient answer to anybody who says that they are unwilling to come and cannot come.

827. You have mentioned that you wear a stole; do you wear a scarf?—No.

828. What is the difference between your stole and a narrow scarf?—I do not know that there is any difference.

829. Are scarves generally worn by the clergy in the churches around your church, and in the churches you frequent?—I think stoles are worn in most of the churches round me; certainly in all those in which I am in the habit of ministering to help friends from time to time.

830. Do you, at the end of the gospel, in your church, say "Thanks be to God for His Holy Gospel"?—I say "Thanks be to Thee, O Lord."

831. Do you know any rubric that warrants the interposition of these words?—No.

832. Do you use any words before the gospel?—"Glory be to Thee, O Lord."

833. Does that rest on any rubric?—Not that I am aware of.

834. Do you use the Exhortation provided in the Prayer Book every week when you give notice of Holy Communion?—No, we do not.

835. Do you use it at any time of the year?—At certain fixed times of the year; before all the great festivals.

836. When you so use it, at what period of the service do you use it?—After the Nicene Creed, before the sermon.

837. Have you any warrant from the rubric for using it there?—The rubric which specifies that all other notices are to be given at that time.

838. Are you not aware that there is a special rubric ordering you to do it after the sermon?—I do not remember at this moment.

839. Do you ground the putting of it into that place of the service on custom, or on what do you ground it?—I think I ground it on the rubric as to the notices.

840. Do you think it can be justified as a notice when it is an exhortation, and another place is appointed for it?—No; it cannot be justified.

841. Do you use the longer exhortation immediately before the Communion in the celebration?—Every Sunday.

842. The one preceding "Ye that do truly, &c."?—Yes.

843. Do you do that at every celebration?—No; as I mentioned before, not at the two early celebrations.

844. On what grounds do you consider yourself at liberty to omit it?—That ordinarily the people present at these celebrations are regular communicants, and very many of them would hear it at a later celebration; and also perhaps a little for the sake of shortening the service.

845. You do not consider the rubric for its universal use imperative?—I forget at this moment what it is, but I know that there is some dispensing power.

846. (Archbishop of Armagh.) In the Liturgy of 1549 there is this rubric as to water being put into the wine, "putting ye wine into the chalice or els in some faire or convenient cup prepared for that use (if the chalice will not serve) putting thereto a little pure and cleane water." That rubric was dropped and in its place there is this: "When there is a Communion, the priest shall then place upon the table so much bread and wine as he shall think sufficient." What do you understand by the omission of all mention of water in all subsequent rubrics? Does not that, in your opinion, amount to a prohibition of the use of water?—I think not.

847. Why then was it left out of all subsequent rubrics, and wine alone mentioned?—I think I have said all that I can say upon that subject; I am not an antiquarian.

848. (Earl Beauchamp.) The rubric of 1549, which you have before you, with regard to mixing water with the wine in the chalice, was omitted in the second book of King Edward, in 1552?—Yes.

849. And is omitted in the book of 1559?—Yes.

850. And in the book of 1604?—Yes.

851. But in the year 1662 the present rubric was inserted?—Yes.

852. (Bishop of London.) When you introduced the lighting of the candles, did you do it upon conviction of the legality of doing so?—Certainly.

853. On what was that grounded?—Because the Privy Council distinctly gave the force of law to the injunctions of Edward the Sixth.

854. I think you will find that is a mistake; it is to the rubric; but, however, that was your view of it, that they gave the force of law to the injunctions of Edward the Sixth?—Yes.

855. (Dr. Twiss.) Is it then your view that the judgment of the Privy Council gave the force of law entirely to the injunctions of Edward the Sixth?—Yes, I think so.

856. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) With reference to the mixed chalice, his Grace the Archbishop of Armagh asked you what you made of the fact that that rubric directing it in the first Prayer Book of Edward the Sixth was omitted in all subsequent prayer-books, what I would ask you is this, do you think that the fact of the omission of it amounts to a prohibition of the old usage?—I do not.

857. I think one answer of yours was a little misunderstood. You said that you grounded your practice of the mixed chalice partly on the fact of your having found it in the church when you came, and partly on the general custom of the church?—No, I meant to say in the churches in which I had ministered.

858. I thought you made a remark also about the universal practice of the Church?—Of the universal Church.

859. I wished to clear up that point before asking you this question. When you said the general or universal custom of the Church, you did not mean the general custom of the Church of England?—No, but the custom of the Church Catholic.

860. Would you be good enough to say whether you separate your services at all into morning prayer, Communion service, and litany, or whether you use them continuously as one service?—We make a distinct separation after the litany and before the Communion office begins.

861. Do you use any lights on the altar at evening?—No.

862. When do you publish the bans of marriage?—After the Nicene Creed.

863. Not after the second lesson?—No.

864. You mentioned that a pause was made to allow of non-communicants retiring if they wished; may I ask whether they may remain if they desire to do so?—Yes.

865. You do not put any difficulty in the way of their doing it?—Certainly not.

866. (Bishop of Oxford.) Are you aware that the rubric as to which you have been questioned (that is, one rubric in the Liturgy of 1549), which orders the mixing of water with the wine, after the water has been so mixed with the wine, proceeds: "and setting both the bread and wine upon the altar;" therefore, after water has been so mixed with the wine, it speaks of "the bread and wine"?—Yes, I should have referred to that; it is of course one of the most obvious points of defence of the practice that could be alleged.

The REV. C. J. LE GEYT, M.A., recalled and further examined.

Rev.
C. J. Le Geyt,
M.A.

24 June 1867.

867. (Earl of Harrowby.) I think you said that your parish consisted of 10,000 people?—Yes.

868. And that your church would hold about 900 people?—About that.

869. You have different services, of course?—Yes.

870. And therefore, of course, more than 900 people in the course of the day will attend?—Yes.

871. I think you said that 200 of the poor attended?—I should say about 200.

872. What is the character of the major part of the inhabitants of your parish?—Principally the middle and lower middle class and the poor.

873. I think you said a considerable proportion of your congregation came from without?—Yes.

874. Can you state at all what proportion?—It is quite impossible for me to say, there are so many of whom I can have no knowledge, and who would not allow me to know them in any way.

875. Is it a very fluctuating body, or is there a fixed body which you look upon as your permanent congregation?—A fixed body, whose faces, as to the majority of them, one knows very well.

876. Where do those whom you look upon as your fixed congregation reside?—I can hardly say; a great many in the near neighbourhood, but a great many in the outlying parishes.

877. Your congregation can hardly be called a parochial congregation?—Not distinctly parochial.

878. You have two churchwardens?—Yes.

879. One is of your own choice?—Yes.

880. And one is chosen by the vestry?—Yes.

881. Is he chosen annually by a considerable number of people assembling?—By about twenty or thirty persons.

882. Those persons, of course, are ratepayers of the parish?—They are.

883. Have you ever had any difference of opinion among that body?—Do you mean on the question of the churchwardenship, or the ceremonies of the church?

884. On either the churchwardenship or on any other questions?—There was a slight question this year as to the election of churchwarden, but irrespective of ecclesiastical matters altogether.

885. Local questions?—Local questions.

886. I think you stated that you had a considerable offertory; can you tell in what proportion the offertory comes from within your own parish?—In a very considerable proportion, for the wealthier portion of the congregation have been parishioners.

887. Who manages the distribution of the funds so collected; what is your course of proceeding?—As a matter of fact, the money is in the hands of the senior churchwarden, by consent of the incumbent and the other churchwarden; it has been so from the beginning, simply for the sake of convenience.

888. Is the local congregation increasing or not?—I think so decidedly.

889. How is it as to the occupation of seats; is there any assignment of seats?—None whatever.

890. Everybody takes what first comes?—Yes.

891. Do they come much before the time with a view to secure sittings?—Yes, a long time before.

892. Is there any separation of the sexes?—Yes, in the middle of the church; we find that necessary in a free and open church.

893. Has there been any complaint that strangers coming in prevented those of the parish from finding a seat?—Only at very great seasons, such as Easter and Christmas, when there has been a great crowd; at no other times.

894. Were you the first person to introduce vestments in your parish?—I was.

895. What guided you in the selection of the vestments?—Do you mean in the kind of vestments to be used?

896. Yes.—The use of the Church at the Reformation, and, as far as we could ascertain, as I mentioned before, the English use, especially the ancient Gothic vestments.

897. I think you said the Sarum use had been abandoned for that of the Western Church?—The details of the Sarum use were so very obscure that we were almost obliged to take the Roman use.

898. Is there any recognised authority by which a clergyman wishing to act according to the rules of his Church can be guided authoritatively in knowing what vestments to use and what not to use?—He would be able to ascertain without much difficulty what was in use at the time referred to in that rubric. His great difficulty, perhaps, would be about colour; he would find various colours used, but he would have no difficulty about the kind of vestment.

899. It would be left open to him to take some interpretation of the use of Sarum, or to take that which is common in the Church of Rome?—I imagine so. I do not know what authority is to decide the question.

900. There is no book of authority to guide a clergyman in the Church of England, if he uses vestments, to ascertain what vestments he ought to use?—As to colour there is none that I know of.

901. Therefore you conceive every clergyman, in regard to the colour of the vestments, has it left to his own discretion?—At present it is so, as to which use he adopts.

902. You have adopted certain usages, I think, in deference to what you consider to be the instructions of the rubric of Charles the Second. You look upon that as your authority for using certain things which were not in use in the time of Queen Elizabeth and 19199.

Charles the First?—I hardly know to what your Lordship refers.

903. In regard to vestments, for instance, the vestments were not used before the rubric of 1662, and they are expressly prohibited by the canon?—For a time they were prohibited.

904. You use them in deference to that rubric of 1662?—Yes, the rubric takes you back to the period before that.

905. You use them in deference to the rubric of 1662, and the supposed revival of the practice in the first Prayer Book of Edward the Sixth?—Yes.

906. Do you rest any part of your action upon pre-Reformation usage, which you imagine to have been in existence before the first book of Edward the Sixth?—Only so far as I believe it has been ruled (I cannot give the exact judgment) that pre-Reformation canons are of authority now, for instance Archbishop Reynolds's canons in, I think, the twelfth century; but I am not sufficiently skilled in these authorities to say, only so far as this, I believe these pre-Reformation canons have authority as defining what is to be used. They seem to be referred to by the subsequent enactments.

907. Do you hold the rubric of Charles the Second to be authoritative and compulsory, or to be optional?—I am not sure that I clearly understand you when you say the rubric of Charles the Second.

908. I mean the rubric in the Act of Uniformity?—The ornament rubric?

909. Yes.—I conceive it was intended to be compulsory.

910. And therefore, as a matter of conscience, you think you ought to obey it?—Yes.

911. And you act in consequence of that?—I do.

912. You conceive that ought to be compulsory over the whole Church?—Except under such circumstances as I mentioned before, it would of course be extremely inadvisable to compel the use of it under certain circumstances, but I believe that to be the intention of the Church of England; I should be sorry to say that I thought every clergyman was compelled to do so.

913. But the language is compulsory and there are penalties affixed?—I thought so; I thought the churchwardens could present you for neglect.

914. Are there penalties affixed to the neglect of that Act of Uniformity?—I have always thought so.

915. If it were not so you would be inclined, perhaps, to defer to the opinion of your bishop on certain points, but you consider that your liberty of action is controlled by that rubric?—I think so.

916. There are certain things that you did abandon in consequence of the wish of the bishop?—Those are minor points.

917. These questions of the vestments you considered to be major and essential points?—Quite so. My feeling was that my parishioners and communicants claiming these things as their right, and pointing to this rubric as their authority, I was bound to give these things to them.

918. Was it the petition of your parishioners or of your congregation?—Of the congregation; the communicants, I am speaking of.

919. Has the bishop forbidden any other things than the censuring of persons and things and the raising of the elements?—I think not,—not that I am aware of.

920. You imagine that you have complied with all that he has required of you?—The bishop never gave any express directions on the subject. I believe, in his charge, he implied a wish which was in harmony with the opinion of the Convocation Committee.

921. You consider that in abandoning those two usages you have complied with his opinion?—I thought so.

922. (Sir Joseph Napier.) As I understand you, you for some years followed the general usage of the Church?—Up to within the last two years.

923. You conducted the ministrations “as this Church and realm has received the same”?—I hardly know how to answer that question. I conducted it in the way in which I found the majority of churches did.

924. I think you said you restored the lights?—When I went I restored the lights that had been used previously.

925. They had been used and disused for a time?—Yes.

926. And then you restored them?—Yes.

927. At that time you introduced the incense?—Not at that time, but some years subsequently,—within the last two years.

928. At the same time with the vestments?—Yes.

929. I think, with regard to some of the matters, you have found that you had come to an erroneous conclusion?—I can hardly say that I have been satisfied of that, but there seemed such a very strong opinion on the subject that we felt it our duty to bend to that opinion.

930. I take it for granted that unless in a case where you are clear against the bishop you would conform to his wishes, unless you are clearly satisfied that you ought to put your own construction?—Yes.

931. Have you read the directions of the address of the archbishops and a great number of the bishops about the year 1851*?—I do not think I have; I do not remember reading it.

932. In regard to the Holy Communion, have you any manual independent of the Prayer Book or the Catechism that you use for the instruction or guidance of the persons who attend the Communion?—None whatever, except those usual little books that everybody buys for their private devotions.

933. Are there any in addition to those which you generally use in the way of a general catechism or primer?—No, nothing special.

934. Do you retain the lights still?—Yes.

935. I suppose you are aware that some of the counsel who were consulted by the Church Union were of opinion that they were not legal?—Yes.

936. But you differ from them?—Yes.

937. I think you said that the opinion of convocation had influenced you?—Yes.

938. Are you aware of the opinion which they expressed about the matter?—At this moment I forget what the precise opinion of Convocation was upon the particular point of lights.

939. Do you remember that they stated they considered it was a sufficient compliance with the law of the Church to conform to the 58th canon, with regard to the dress, to use the surplice?—Yes, I remember that.

940. You do not think that that opinion was overruled?—I thought it was not necessary to act upon it in the present stage of the question. Of course we were unwilling to yield anything, believing our ground to be sure, and where there was strong evidence that we ought not to yield; we did not do so.

941. I see you refer to the Knightsbridge case and to the decision there. In reference to that rubric in the present Prayer Book do you take the words "the authority of Parliament" to refer to all the antecedent matters that were previously authorized by Parliament; or do you take it as it is limited by the decision in the Knightsbridge case to what is prescribed by the Act 2nd and 3rd Edward VI., or rather, prescribed by the Prayer Book?—I have taken it as applying to all.

942. You differ from the Judicial Committee?—I suppose I must appear to do so in that case.

943. In some matters you have acted in accordance with the opinion of the Judicial Committee in that case?—Yes.

944. And in others you have not?—In others I suppose I have not.

945. What would be the sources of authority from which a person wishing to conform to the rules of the Church would get all these directions?—In regard to these observances?

946. Yes?—From the old service books of the Church, which were the authorities before and at the Reformation.

947. All the services that had been published before the time of Edward VI.?—Yes, those that were in the Church before the Reformation.

948. Then you do not think that the Prayer Book with the canons and rubrics would be sufficient guidance to a clergyman performing his duty?—I think not; it never has been so in the history of the Church. There never has been one book only.

949. You say you have a procession with a boy carrying a cross, and that is used in the service as one of the ornaments of the church?—Yes.

950. In that also you differ from the Judicial Committee?—I was not aware that they had held that a cross carried in procession was illegal.

951. As used in the service?—I was not aware of it.

952. It is not used merely as a decoration, but simply as part of the service?—It is simply carried before the procession.

953. I think, with regard to the Exhortation, you said your ground of shortening it was on account of finding a short form in an early Prayer Book?—My ground of shortening it was that the frequency of Communion makes it unnecessary to use that long exhortation. It was exhorting people who did not seem to need it.

954. You think you were authorized to do so by what?—By the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., which seemed to contemplate the same circumstances.

955. Do you think that that Prayer Book is part of the authorized formularies of the Church at present?—No, we must go by our present Prayer Book, of course, but the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. may be a guide to one, in certain matters where there is doubt.

956. You take these matters of dress and ornament to be more part of the common order of the Church?—Yes.

957. And that the Church having power to decree rites and ceremonies, whatever is the law of the Church you are quite willing to adhere to?—Yes, whatever is decided by the proper authority.

958. If the law were settled you would feel no difficulty in point of conscience?—I believe none whatever.

959. (Sir W. P. Wood.) I think you said on Thursday last that you considered these vestments that you use highly important, but you did not consider them essential?—Exactly.

960. You have, perhaps, celebrated at other churches without using them?—Frequently.

961. Do you place the Holy Communion into the hands of the communicants as directed by the rubric?—I do.

962. Invariably?—Invariably.

963. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) In the selection of the colours for the vestments that you use are you guided by any description of the colours in the inventories of the church goods in old times?—I have not been personally guided by them; I have only been confirmed in it by them; I adopted what is called the Roman use of the four colours.

964. In your answer to Sir Joseph Napier did you mean that a procession is a part of the service?—No, not literally a part of the service; it is merely in the coming in that the procession takes place. It is before the service commences.

965. You do not consider the procession a part of the service?—I think not.

966. You spoke of the Cross as being used in the celebration of divine service?—Yes, I see the difficulty. The procession generally can scarcely be called part of the service. It either comes before or after. I take the service to commence with the words of the opening portion.

967. Strictly speaking it is no part of the divine service?—No.

968. Have you any confessionals in your church?—No, none.

* Vide Appendix A.

969. (Dr. Twiss.) You have just alluded to the inventories. Is there any inventory of the date of the second year of Edward the Sixth?—I believe nearly all the inventories, to be about the date of 1552. I am not sure; I have not seen many.

970. There is no inventory of that date?—I have not seen any; I cannot say of certainty.

971. The Carlton Ride inventories are 1552, I think?—Yes.

972. You stated, in regard to deferring to the injunctions of the ordinary, that as to lights upon the altar that would be a question upon which you could not defer to him?—I conceive that to be the case.

973. You say you re-introduced them?—Yes.

974. Upon what authority do you rely?—Upon that rubric, in that they were part of the ornaments in use in the church in the second year of Edward VI.

975. I presume you looked into that question?—I did, as far as I was able.

976. I see you state you do not rely on the injunctions of Edward VI.?—Not entirely; not as authorities.

977. You merely say as explanatory of the use?—Yes.

978. Now, taking the rubric prefixed to the Prayer Book of 1662, how do you arrive at the conclusion that the use of lights is authorized by authority of Parliament?—On this ground, that whatever was used publicly at that period must have been by authority of Parliament, or I thought it would not have been used.

979. You say "must have been"?—I concluded that it was so; that the use of the Church at that period was by authority of Parliament.

980. Do you consider that everything that was in use in the Church prior to the first Act of Uniformity of Edward VI. was in use by authority of Parliament?—I should say everything in use at that period was. I should confine myself to that,—the period to which we are referred.

981. Do you mean directly, or by inference?—I am not sure that I rightly understand your question.

982. When you say it was "by authority of Parliament," do you refer at all to the fact that the statute of Edward VI. did not require the new Prayer Book to be used before the Feast of Pentecost, and therefore it indirectly authorized the use of lights?—Yes.

983. That is your conclusion?—Yes. But I think I ought to say that I really have never been able to go so thoroughly into these matters. Other men have gone into them very minutely. I have not followed all the arguments. I have not had time to do it; certainly not during the week since I was summoned here; so that I do not feel quite competent to answer these questions.

984. (Lord Portman.) I think you did not state this fact, whether you used bread or wafer in the Holy Communion?—Bread always.

985. You did not state by what rubric or by what authority you mixed water with the wine?—There is no definite rubric in the Prayer Book for mixing the water and wine; I take it as one of the old customs that we are allowed to use.

986. You mentioned the number of vestments which you were in the habit of using. I have here a list of vestments which has been sent to me by a Mr. Rodwell. I am rather curious to know whether one of the vestments mentioned by him is in use by you, it is called, I think, an "amice." Do you use the amice?—Yes.

987. What do you suppose it to mean?—Symbolically, you mean?

988. Yes?—The symbolism is various. Some old writers suppose it to have been symbolical of the crown of thorns. It used to be placed first on the head, and then, as now, it is worn round the neck.

989. It is a small square piece of linen?—Yes.

990. Should you think it would be right to say that it was in memory of the rag of linen with which the Jews blindfolded our Blessed Lord?—That is one of the old symbolical meanings put forth. There are several.

991. And of the napkins which the angels folded in the tomb?—Yes, that is another.

992. Have you affixed any meaning to the position in which you stand when you read the epistle, the south end of the altar, and then passing to read the gospel at the other end?—There is a symbolical meaning attached to the change from one side to the other.

993. Would it be right to say, in your opinion, that it is to set forth the removal of the gospel from the Jews and its proclamation to the Gentiles?—Yes; that is one of the meanings. All these ceremonies have various old symbolical meanings, which may be held or not.

994. Will you inform us what is your practice in the case of some of the consecrated elements not being consumed by the communicants?—I consider the priest should consume them himself, ordinarily, except in case of great quantity.

995. In your practice have you ever cases of that sort, where a large quantity is left?—We then follow the rubric exactly, call a communicant up and give it to him.

996. Do you make any use of the first rubric in the Order of the Administration of the Lord's Supper, the words being these: "So many as intend to be partakers of the Holy Communion, shall signify their names to the curate at least some time the day before"?—No, I cannot say that I do.

997. There are two words used by you (I rather think they were used by Mr. Perry) which I do not find in the Prayer Book; I should like to know what is meant by them. What do you mean by the word "gospeller"?—The person who reads the gospel.

998. Do you find that name in the Prayer Book or the Bible?—No; not in the Bible or in the Prayer Book that I know of.

999. By "epistoler" you mean the person who reads the epistle?—Yes.

1000. Not being the "priest" mentioned?—I scarcely see the bearing of that question.

1001. The priest is one person, the gospeller is some one else, and the epistoler is some one else. Is that so?—Yes.

1002. There are three parties?—Yes.

1003. In answer to questions 425 and 426, with reference to preaching the sermon, you say: "I thought it must mean the first of the two, otherwise it would order a sermon at every celebration, and we should have three on every Sunday"?—It is awkwardly expressed. I meant we should then have three sermons, at seven, eight, and eleven in the morning, besides the ordinary sermons, which would be an inconvenience.

1004. Your reason for altering the time of the sermon, you say, was partly from the fact that it was more convenient in consequence of wearing vestments?—Yes, partly.

1005. That is the justification in your opinion?—It is one reason, but not an important one.

1006. (Rev. W. G. Humphry.) With reference to the rubric of 1549, where it is said that the priest is to wear "a white alb plain with a vestment or cope," do you consider that those words, "vestment or cope," apply to two different things?—Yes, I believe so.

1007. What do you understand by "vestment"?—The chasuble.

1008. Do you wear the chasuble or the cope?—The chasuble, at the Communion.

1009. Have you ever seen, or do you know of any picture representing the dress of a ministering priest in the Holy Communion between 1549 and 1662?—I do not know that I have ever seen a picture representing it.

Rev.
C. J. Le Geyt,
M.A.
24 June 1867.

1010. You know of brasses, perhaps?—Brasses I am quite sure of. It is clear from brasses.

1011. You have said that you adopted these ornaments for the edification of your people?—Yes.

1012. Did you teach or explain to the people the symbolical meaning of them?—Yes.

1013. The chasuble and the amice, I think, you have already explained?—Yes.

1014. What would be the meaning of the cope as distinct from that of the chasuble?—I never heard any symbolical meaning of the cope. It is simply taken as an ornamental vestment, not for use at Communion; but to be used at other times, in processions and so on, as a handsome vestment. I never heard of any symbolical meaning attaching to it.

1015. I think you stated that it is used in the evening service, especially at the Magnificat?—Yes, at certain times.

1016. Why is it used especially at the Magnificat?—The Magnificat being specially the song of the Incarnation, the thanksgiving for our Lord's Incarnation, was always treated with special honour in the Church.

1017. What is the symbolical meaning of incense?—It is various. The commonest symbolism of it is the ascent of prayer. There are, however, a great many symbolical meanings attached to it.

1018. What is your authority for the symbolical meanings?—I take chiefly the instance in the Book of Revelation, the incense there signifying our Lord's intercession.

1019. For the symbolical meanings of these things, generally, what is your authority?—The works of ancient writers of all kinds.

1020. And you from time to time explain these matters to your people?—Yes.

1021. And you think they understand them?—I think they can scarcely fail to do so.

1022. You use the stole in baptism?—Yes.

1023. Do you change it in the course of the service?—No, we do not change it.

1024. Do you use the sign of the cross in the benediction of the water of baptism?—Yes.

1025. You make it over the water?—Yes.

1026. Do you use the sign of the cross in the prayer for the consecration of the elements in the Holy Eucharist?—Yes.

1027. Do you use it at any other times?—Not of necessity, I have seen it used at various times. I think I use it occasionally, as at the blessing at the end of the service, but it is not of necessity.

1028. Do you use it at the commencement of your sermon?—We have not done so.

1029. Do you use any bowings or prostration other than those at the name of the Lord Jesus; in the Creed, for instance?—Bowings at the mention of the Incarnation.

1030. And the Doxology?—At the Doxology always.

1031. Do your people follow your example in that respect?—Yes; the congregation always do so.

1032. Do you encourage or teach them to do so?—I have said nothing about it except incidentally.

1033. Is there any actual prostration of persons in your congregation? Do they throw themselves on their knees at these times?—I have seen persons kneel in the Creed—some few persons.

1034. Do you use oil for any purposes?—No.

1035. Do you use any form of benediction of the vestments?—No.

1036. In the Visitation of the Sick do you use vestments? Do you use the surplice and the hood?—In the Communion of the Sick, not in the Visitation.

1037. Not in going through the office of the Visitation of the Sick?—No.

1038. (Mr. Hubbard.) When your people are reciting the psalms in the morning and evening services, do you announce the day of the month or the number of the psalm?—No, we do not.

1039. You let them find it out for themselves?—Yes.

1040. Do you find, with respect to those who are not used to it, that it leads to some confusion in not having the day of the month or the psalm hinted to them?—I think it does cause inconvenience sometimes to individuals, but then they get accustomed to the use.

1041. I would refer you now to the rubric prefixed to the exhortation in the Communion service which generally follows after the Prayer for the Church militant,—“At the time of the celebration of the communion, the communicants being conveniently placed for the receiving of the Holy Sacrament, the priest shall say this exhortation.” Do you make any pause between the Prayer for the Church militant and the reading of that address?—None.

1042. How do you carry out the injunction that they shall be conveniently placed?—I never understood it to mean that there was to be a change of posture at that time.

1043. What do you understand it to mean?—I really do not understand the full meaning of it. I always thought it to refer to some old custom, the catechumens, for instance, leaving the church at a certain period, and, in cathedrals, the custom at certain period of the Communion office for the communicants to draw nearer. It is the custom in some parish churches now,—one I know in Oxfordshire,—for the communicants all to come up into the chancel, from the immense size of the church.

1044. In both these instances you have referred to, the consequence is a separation between the communicants and the non-communicants?—Yes, I suppose it would be.

1046. You proceed so immediately from the prayer to the exhortation, that there is no time for the non-communicants to withdraw without making some amount of interruption to the exhortation?—We make no pause at all.

1047. Referring to the rubrics at the end of the Communion service with regard to the bread which is to be used, the rubrics enjoin that “The bread and wine for the Communion shall be provided by the curate and the churchwardens at the charges of the parish,” also “To take away all occasion of dissension, and superstition, which any person hath or might have concerning the bread and wine, it shall suffice that the bread be such as is usual to be eaten; but the best and purest wheat bread that conveniently may be gotten;” and a third rubric is: “If any of the bread and wine remain unconsecrated, the curate shall have it to his own use.” Do you comply with all those rubrics?—I think we do, except the last one. I cannot say I have ever taken care to secure the bread and wine that may have remained in the vestry unconsecrated.

1049. I understood you to say that what you use is not wafer or wafer bread?—We use the ordinary bread.

1050. The usual bread is of a kind which could be applied by the curate to his own use if he was so minded?—Yes.

1051. In the consecration prayer do you recite it as a whole from beginning to end, or do you break it up into sections?—Only by the act of consecration. I mean by the necessary actions. In no other way.

1052. That is to say, you interrupt it only so far as it is necessary to comply with the rubric?—I think so. I do not know of any other interruption, if I understand you rightly.

1053. Do you, for instance, make any pause after the consecration of the bread?—Only, as I said on Thursday, I kneel then just for a moment.

1054. That forms an interruption in the course of the consecration prayer?—Yes, for a moment.

1055. By "kneeling" you do not mean a mere inclination but an actual kneeling?—An actual kneeling; but only for a moment.

1056. Do you find any direction for that interruption in the prayer?—Not in the rubrics in the Prayer Book.

1057. What is your precedent for that practice?—The use of the Church at the time to which we refer for so many points in the services which the Prayer Book does not tell us of.

1058. Where do you find that use laid down?—In the old service books at the time of Edward VI., and of course previous to that time.

1059. In fact, the precedent or justification of that break in the service is an ante-Reformation sanction?—I should think so; but post-Reformation use clearly.

1060. Can you get any evidence of post-Reformation use?—I think I could if I were allowed time. I know men who can. I believe there is no doubt about it.

1061. (Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol.) In regard to the mixed chalice, you mentioned in your answer to Mr. Venn that you used the mixed chalice?—Yes.

1062. What do you understand the mixed chalice to mean?—Simply the mixing of the wine with water at the time of communion.

1063. I mean what symbolical meaning do you attach to it?—There again, there are various symbolical meanings. It may mean the two sacraments, and the water and blood flowing from our Lord's side.

1064. Upon what rubrical authority do you justify or base this usage of the mixture?—On the same on which I base other usages. I mentioned to Mr. Hubbard just now, that there were certain usages authorized at a certain period which have not been forbidden.

1065. You do not then in any way justify that by any rubric, or the omission of any rubric in our present prayer book, as compared with other prayer books, but you base it wholly upon pre-Reformation authority?—No; I cannot say that, because it has been a custom of the Church of England, which has been left out simply, not prohibited. I am afraid I can hardly give the date for the authority.

1066. Do you then infer that what has been specified and omitted, the omission notwithstanding, is permissive?—I think in some cases it is; omission does not amount to a prohibition. That is my opinion merely.

1067. I will put the question again; Do you infer that what has been specified and omitted is permissible, that omission notwithstanding?—I should hardly feel able to give an answer which would embrace all such cases. I think it must depend upon the particular cases very much.

1068. To narrow it I will say I am putting the question not generaliter, but specifically with regard to the mixed chalice?—I should think that in such a case as that the omission was no prohibition.

1069. Have you read the case that was submitted by several archbishops and bishops of our Church to four distinguished lawyers?—Recently; yes, I have seen it.

1070. Are you aware that it is the judgment of those four lawyers that the ceremonial mixing of water with the wine appeared to them illegal?—Yes.

1071. Have you also seen a case submitted by a certain association called "The English Church Union"?—Yes.

1072. Are you aware of the state of the opinion with regard to the mixed chalice?—Yes.*

1073. Should you infer, from that record of opinion, that there was no doubt on the subject?—No; I should not infer that there was no doubt upon it. It has been the very doubt that has been one's authority, to a certain extent, in continuing the practice. I mean there have been such strong legal opinions in direct opposition to those you have mentioned.

1074. You would consider that three opinions stating it to be lawful would have such weight with you as to justify your continuance of the practice?—I think so.

1075. You stated that you had no place for confession in your church; do you receive confession prior to the Holy Communion being received?—If persons come to me for the purpose.

1076. You do not then encourage it?—I hardly know what your lordship means by that question. I simply state what is directed by the Church, and explain that to the communicants. If they need it I am ready to receive them.

1077. I will add to the word "encourage", "in your public ministrations"?—In preaching, for instance?

1078. Yes?—I have always taken that line of preaching, following the directions of the Prayer Book entirely, on that point.

1079. You mentioned in your answers to Mr. Hubbard that you used a cope in your church; was I correct in understanding you to say it was simply when the Magnificat was chanted?—Or in going into service on great occasions, great festivals. The cope was used in processions chiefly, in ancient times.

1080. Would it be correct, from your point of view, to say that the chasuble had a sacrificial signification, but the cope was rather ornamental and processional?—I thought so, but I may be mistaken.

1081. Do you use any hymns during the Communion service?—We only use the "Agnus Dei," "O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world," after the consecration.

1082. The point of the introduction of the hymn would be after the act of consecration?—After the act of consecration.

1083. While you yourself are receiving?—Yes.

1084. You mentioned that communicants and non-communicants were mixed together in the general congregation?—Yes.

1085. Do they adopt the same posture so that it would be difficult to recognize who were and who were not about to receive?—Generally speaking, I think they do. I do not know of any difference in their posture.

1086. The non-communicants do not then usually remain as mere sitters by?—Not sitters by, certainly.

1087. (Earl Beauchamp.) With regard to the question of the mixed chalice, you have told us it was in use throughout the Church; by that you do not mean merely the Church of Rome or the Eastern Church?—No.

1088. Is it within your knowledge that it is practised in Scotland?—I believe so; always.

1089. Has it always been the custom?—I cannot tell you how long, but I believe it is generally practised in Scotland.

1090. In regard to the question about colours and the vestments, are we to assume that you wish, in using the Roman sequence of colours, to imitate the Church of Rome as closely as possible, or that there being in your opinion some doubt as to the precise nature of the colours used in the Church of England in the second year of Edward VI., you used the Roman order as most nearly giving effect to the rubric of the Church of England?—That was my idea.

1091. You have also told us that you affixed doctrinal significance to the use of the chasuble?—Yes.

1092. Do you draw any distinction between the doctrine of the Church of England and the doctrine of the Church of Rome as signified by the use of the chasuble?—My answer to that would be that I believe both the Church of Rome and the Church of England contemplate a sacrifice in the Holy Eucharist; and without going into any points of distinction, so far the symbolism would be the same, that the priest is sacrificing in each case.

1093. Only so far as they agree?—Only so far as they agree.

1094. With regard to the authority for the use of these things in the Church of England in the second year of Edward VI., is the Act of Henry VIII. within your knowledge?—Yes; the 25th Henry VIII. legalizes it.

1095. That gave the authority of Parliament to all old canons till further order was taken?—Yes.

1096. You have told us that your offertory yields you about 1,000*l.* a year?—Yes.

1097. Are there not parochial subscriptions in the parish?—Yes, a school fund and clubs for the relief of the poor.

1098. You do not find that large sum which you receive at the offertory diminishes in any way your parochial subscriptions?—Not the least in the world.

1099. (Bishop of Oxford.) You mentioned that on the greater festivals you had 400 communicants at a time occasionally?—Yes, in the course of the day, at the three communions.

1100. What is the maximum number attending one?—200.

1101. How do you distribute the elements to those 200, repeating the words separately to each one and putting the elements into their hands, or repeating the words once for all?—The first of these usages,—separately to each one.

1102. Do you find that that use prolongs the service prodigiously, and is very fatiguing and exhausting to the congregation?—I have not found it prove fatiguing or exhausting. It necessarily must be long, but I have never thought myself allowed to do anything else.

1103. Do you use the exhortation provided in the Prayer Book, the longer exhortation whenever you celebrate the Holy Communion?—The one beginning “Dearly beloved in the Lord”?

1104. Yes?—No, we do not, as a rule.

1105. What is your warrant for omitting that?—Only the practice, or permission in the first book of Edward VI., which I thought contemplated a similar state of circumstances to our frequent communions.

1106. Are you aware that some years back the matter was considered by the bishops and a resolution agreed to by them?—No, I did not remember that.

1107. Who is your churchwarden?—At the present moment Mr. Brett is one and Mr. Robert Porter the other.

1108. How long has Mr. Brett been churchwarden?—For six or seven years, I think.

1109. Mr. Brett had much to do, had he not, with the building of the church?—Yes, he had.

1110. You mentioned that you had adopted these vestments mainly because they were given you by your parishioners, and it was their wish?—It was so.

1111. Do you include your churchwarden, Mr. Brett, amongst these?—Yes; both the churchwardens presented the vestments to me and told me they expressed the wish of the congregation that I should wear them.

1112. Has the same general approval followed the other alterations or restorations that you have made in the services?—Since the introduction of the vestments?

1113. Yes?—I can hardly tell your Lordship, because I have not had occasion to refer to the churchwardens upon such points, as they are minor points; for instance, the use of incense at the Magnificat. They have had nothing to do with it. I have never sought an expression of their opinion.

1114. You have had no remonstrances on any point?—No remonstrances at all.

1115. Do you use the other exhortation at the giving notice of the Communion?—The longer one, four times a year.

1116. At what period of the service do you use it?—After the Nicene Creed.

1117. What is your warrant for using them at that time; are you aware that the rubric prescribes a different time?—No; I was not aware of that.

1118. You stated that the use of lights had been dropped by your predecessor?—Yes.

1119. Was there any remonstrance made to him at the time by the parishioners against the dropping? A very strong remonstrance, I believe.

1120. You do not know of your own knowledge?—I know there was a remonstrance. I do not know the details of it.

1121. Do you know whether it was signed by a large number of the parishioners?—I fully believe that it was, from my recollection of it, nine years ago.

1122. Do I understand you to say that you restored them at the request of the parishioners?—Yes.

1123. (Earl Stanhope.) You were asked (v. No. 366) on this very point of lights, “with regard to the evening prayer, do you ever use any lights,” and you said, “Yes, at evening services frequently we use lights;” will you have the goodness to explain the word “frequently”?—I did not quite understand the bearing of the question; because of course we must use lights ordinarily at evening service, except in the bright days of summer.

1124. Am I to understand by the word “frequently” that in the bright days of summer you discontinue the lights?—Not exactly so, we never discontinue them entirely, as a matter of fact.

1125. The drift of my question was to learn whether you used candles only for the purpose of affording light, or symbolically?—I do not know whether that was the bearing of the question the other day. I do not know that we use them symbolically. We use them for the increase of beauty and brightness. On festivals we light more candles than on ordinary Sundays.

1126. You desire to distinguish festivals by having more lights than on common occasions?—Yes.

1127. (Mr. J. Abel Smith.) Have you more than two on the Communion table?—No; only two on the Communion table. These are not lighted at all in the evening.

1128. (Archbishop of Armagh.) What authority have you for adopting the rubrics or usages of the pre-Reformation services?—Mainly the difficulty of knowing what to do in certain cases; the Prayer Book not prescribing details of divine worship one is obliged to turn somewhere to know what to do.

1129. Do you consider yourself at liberty to follow all or any of the usages of the Church in England before the Reformation when it was in communion with the Church of Rome, at your discretion?—No; that would be going a great deal too far.

1130. Where would you draw the line of distinction?—There would be some clearly prohibited, or the prohibition clearly implied by the teaching of the Prayer Book and the rubrics of the Prayer Book; but where they would not seem to be in any way prohibited, and where simply matters of convenience, we have adopted them.

1131. Being left out of our Prayer Book and not adopted in it, does not that amount to a prohibition?—That was the question the Bishop of Gloucester was asking me. I thought not.

1132. In the Act of Charles II. for the uniformity of public prayer it is stated in the preamble the object of the Act is, “that nothing conduceth more to settlement of the peace of this nation, or to the honour of our religion and the propagation thereof than universal agreement in the public worship of Almighty God; and to the intent that every person within this realm may certainly know the rule to which he is to conform in public worship, and the administration of the sacraments and other rites and ceremonies of the Church of England, and the manner how.” Now, is it not directly opposed to the spirit of that portion of the Act of Uniformity to introduce the usages that were rejected and abolished at the Reformation?—We thought no more so than that each individual clergyman should introduce his own usages, which he does now, so that you hardly find the same usages in two churches throughout the kingdom. That has been one great difficulty; the utter absence of uniformity in all these details.

1133. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) You said that there are two candlesticks only on the Communion table usually?—Never more than two.

1134. Under any circumstances?—Never under any circumstances.

1135. You spoke of a great many more lights. Where are those lights?—They are placed in various portions of the chancel at festival times, some on a ledge, some hanging from the roof. Some are merely brought in and taken away afterwards.

1136. On the Communion table you never have more than two?—On the Communion table we never have more than two.

1137. Do you hold that an ornament or practice which was prescribed in the book of 1549 and omitted in the subsequent books is not now prohibited unless contrary to the rubrics of the book of 1662 or the canons of 1603?—All I felt able to say just now in answer to a similar question was, I could hardly give a general reply. I think it must depend on the usage in question. One can see so clearly that a certain usage was intended to be prohibited that one would never think of restoring it, but other things the English Church seems to show she has not prohibited though she has dropped them out.

1138. How long did the Communion service itself occupy when you had 260 communicants?—About an hour and a half.

The witness withdrew.

The REV. BENJAMIN WEBB, M.A., called in and examined.

1146. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) You are the incumbent of St. Andrew's, Wells Street?—I am.

1147. How long have you been so?—Five years.

1148. Who was your predecessor?—Mr. Murray.

1149. I am not aware whether you use "the vestments"?—No, I do not wear vestments.

1150. What is the size of your church?—It holds 1,250 people.

1151. And how many are there in your district?—Between 5,000 and 6,000.

1152. Do you think your congregation are principally from your own district?—No, not principally.

1153. Then a good number of persons in your own district are virtually prevented from going to church at present?—My district contains a great number of shopkeepers who do not reside, and a great number of foreigners; but a considerable number of the poor come. I do not think anyone is excluded. It is a free church, and the people come as they like.

1154. Do you think all those who come to church can find seats?—Those who come in good time can.

1155. (Mr. J. Abel Smith.) It is generally full?—It is always full.

1156. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) What are your services on Sundays?—There is an early Communion at 8; and at 9, quite lately, I have set up a morning service and Communion for people who could not get in at 11, o'clock, rather a shorter service; and at 11, I have a full service with Communion again. Then at  $\frac{1}{2}$  past 3, and again at 7 in the evening. I have three Communion services in the day.

1157. At the great festivals, what is the average number of communicants on the three occasions?—Between 500 and 600 at all three celebrations, I think; but it is difficult to count when they get so numerous as that.

1158. What is the number on ordinary Sundays?—Yesterday there were about 140, I should think, at all three.

1139. You had the morning service before that?—We had the morning service before that. There were three assisting me on that occasion.

1140. You have stated in your answer to Lord Harrowby that there were many of your congregation of whom you had no knowledge. Does this mean that there are so many strangers in your congregation each service?—No; I meant that there are a great many attendants who come I know not whence. I know them by sight but I cannot trace them any way. I believe it is the case in all London churches. I may come to know them in case of illness, or any need of a clergyman, but in no other way can I get at them.

1141. You do not mean to say that you are aware of a good number of persons in your congregation who were not in your district?—Yes, that I mean to say. I said so. I am sure there are a great many not in the district.

1142. Is your vestry a select vestry or appointed by the congregation?—The ratepayers are members of our vestry. It is not appointed by the congregation.

1143. Are any collections made in your church except through the offertory?—Merely by means of the alms boxes at the door; nothing else.

1144. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) Is that money put into the offertory afterwards?—Not always presented at the altar.

1145. (Sir R. J. Phillimore.) Are you aware of the third part of the 30th canon which says it was far from the purpose of the Church of England to forsake and reject the churches of Italy, France, Spain, and Germany?—Yes, I am aware of that.

1159. On week days what are your services?—We have service every morning and every evening, at 10 and at 5; and celebration of Communion on all Wednesdays, and sometimes on Friday in addition.

1160. During the celebration of the Holy Communion do any of the non-communicants remain in your church?—A certain number do, just as people like: there is no rule about it.

1161. Do you advise it?—No, I believe I never have advised it, but I do not think I have ever been asked.

1162. You would not feel yourself justified in refusing?—No, I should not.

1163. With respect to the offertory, when is that used in your church?—At every service on Sundays, but not on week days.

1164. What is the average sum in the year?—It is a growing sum. I can tell you last year's offertory. That was about 2,500*l.*

1165. How is that spent?—All the expenses of the church and parish are paid out of it.

1166. With regard to curates; does it pay any of the curates?—They are paid entirely out of the offertory.

1167. How many curates have you?—I have two paid ones and one not paid.

1168. (Archbishop of Armagh.) There has been no change in your services since I preached there a year or two ago?—No change.

1169. (Earl Stanhope.) Do you use lights in your church?—They are not lighted. I have candles on the altar; but they are only lighted when it is dark in the church and when wanted.

1170. At the celebration of the Holy Communion are the elements lifted up?—No; there is no elevation in the technical sense.

1171. There is no change in the customary service on that occasion?—I hardly know how to answer that question.

Rev. B. Webb,
M.A.

Rev. B. Webb,
M.A.
21 June 1867.

1172. Is there any act of reverence besides kneeling?—No.

1173. Nor, as I understood you, any lifting up of the Holy Sacrament?—No; there is no exhibition of the Holy Sacrament.

1174. Do you repeat the appointed words in delivering the element to each communicant?—Yes.

1175. Have you found it inconvenient in consequence of the large number?—It would be more convenient if the words were shorter, no doubt; but I think there is no option.

1176. What is the greatest length of service that you have had in administering the Holy Communion, independent of the morning service?—We never have less than four clergymen to administer, so that I think we are never later than two o'clock on a great festival.

1177. Commencing at 11?—Commencing at 11.

1178. (Bishop of Oxford.) You are aware of the rubric at the beginning of morning and evening prayer, which says, "And here it is to be noted, that such ornaments of the Church, and of the ministers thereof, at all times of their ministration, shall be retained, and be in use, as were in this Church of England by the authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI."?—Yes.

1179. Your attention has been called to that?—Yes.

1180. We have been told in this room that in the opinion of many clergymen that rubric permits if it does not enjoin the use of what you are no doubt familiar with as the vestments?—Yes.

1181. I wish to ask you whether you so understand that rubric?—I do.

1182. What is the ground upon which, so understanding it, you feel at liberty not to use those vestments?—I have no excuse except that I do not wish to do it, considering that my congregation have no desire for it, so far as I know. It is a matter of christian charity, expediency, and prudence only with me.

1183. You feel that as they have been long obsolete, you are in conscience allowed to act upon christian wisdom and prudence as to restoring them?—I hope I am.

1184. Would the same, in your judgment, apply to the use of incense?—I doubt whether incense is contemplated under that rubric.

1185. Would the same apply to lighting the lights at all times, at the time of the celebration of the Holy Communion?—It does apply to that, in my judgment.

1186. Are you in the habit of mixing water with the wine at the celebration?—I am.

1187. Would you state to us any rubric on which you justify that practice?—There is no existing rubric to justify that practice, I admit.

1188. Would you justify it on the ground that Bishop Andrewes and the like practised it, and apparently thought that they were not violating any rubric then?—That is my own reason for mixing it certainly.

1189. Do you at the celebration of every Communion use the longer as well as the shorter exhortation to the communicants?—I do not.

1190. Would you tell us any ground upon which you think yourself at liberty to omit the longer?—The absolute necessity of shortening the service, nothing more.

1191. You mentioned having had Communions at different hours of the day?—Yes.

1192. Have you, amongst others, had them in the evening?—Never.

1193. Will you state to the Commissioners any reason why you have not?—It seems abhorrent to my mind altogether. I believe the whole tradition of the Church is against it.

1194. Do you at any time use the exhortation to the parishioners concerning receiving the Holy Communion? There are two, one cautioning them and one exhorting them? Do you use those at any time of the year?—No, I do not.

1195. Not at all?—Not at all.

1196. (Earl Beauchamp.) With regard to evening Communion, you conceive there is no reason why all classes, poor as well as rich, should not receive the Communion early in the morning if they are so minded?—I am sure the poor can, if minded to do so, if you have an early Communion for them.

1197. If the time of the service is not too long, and it is a proper time of the day?—That is my opinion.

1198. What district is assigned to your church; what is the population?—Between 5,000 and 6,000.

1199. Are they of the higher or poorer class?—Almost all poor.

1200. Do you find that the poor attend your services to any large extent?—A considerable extent, and a growing extent.

1201. Is there any reason for the growing extent of their attendance?—I think the parish is being worked a little more diligently—that is the only reason, I think.

1202. To what services do they chiefly come?—They come to the early Communion on Sundays, and on Sunday evenings, more generally than any other time.

1203. Will you state the amount you receive from the offertory collections in the course of the year?—About 2,500*l.*

1204. In addition to that, are there any subscriptions for parochial purposes, schools, and the like?—Yes, very large.

1205. They are well supported?—About 4,000*l.* was our whole income last year, putting subscriptions with people's names in, in addition to the anonymous gifts of the offertory.

1206. Have you any reason to believe that your mode of conducting divine service is unsatisfactory to the congregation or the parishioners?—No, I have every reason to think it is satisfactory.

1207. You never received any remonstrance?—Never once.

1208. (Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol.) You mentioned that you do not use vestments in your church. Have you ever been requested by any members of your congregation to use them?—Two or three times I have, I think.

1209. Has it assumed the nature of a formal petition in writing, such as that you would feel some weight might be attached to it?—No.

1210. Do you use coloured stoles or the plain black stoles?—We use the plain black stole always.

1211. In preaching the sermon, do you use any prayer at the commencement of it?—No.

1212. Do you use an ascription of glory to the Holy Trinity?—Yes, I do.

1213. Do you use any hymns during the Communion service?—Anthems we use, but not hymns.

1214. During the Communion service?—During the Communion service.

1215. Will you say at what parts in the service?—While the people are communicating.

1216. (Mr. Hubbard.) Do you give out the day and the number of the psalm in morning and evening service?—No.

1217. Supposing that a person happens not to recollect the day of the month, is he not in some difficulty to find out his place?—I never heard of that being a difficulty. They could ask their neighbours.

1218. Do you give out the chapter or book of the lessons which you read?—Yes.

1219. Can you give any reason for giving the information in one instance in which they are only listening, and not giving it in the other in which they have to take part?—There are two reasons. In the first place, the rubric orders you to give out the lessons, when it does not order you to give out the day of the month; and next, a daily service is contemplated; and I suppose the Church imagines that people would come daily to church, and would know what day of the month it was.

1220. In preparing for the celebration of the Holy Communion what bread do you use; is it leavened bread or unleavened bread, or is it what is called wafers?—It is common bread pressed under a great weight for the occasion.

1221. So as to prevent its crumbling, and be more fit for its purpose?—Yes.

1222. But it is bread which is available for ordinary use?—Yes.

1223. In reciting the consecration prayer, do you recite it as a whole, or do you make any pause in it?—No perceptible pause.

1224. You do not, after the consecration of the bread, make a pause sufficiently long to enable you to kneel?—No, I do not.

1225. If you order an anthem to be performed during the time that the people are communicating, is not there some danger that the words with which you address them may be lost owing to the sound of the music and the singing of the anthem?—To a stranger to the church it might be so, but not, I think, to those who habitually attend the church.

1226. Do you think there is no danger of their losing the effect of your address to them by the effect of the music of the anthem?—I think not.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY IN THE CHAIR.

Rev. BENJAMIN WEBB, M.A., recalled, examination continued.

1227. (Rev. W. G. Humphry.) I wish to ask you one more question as to the celebration of the Holy Communion; is it your custom to deliver the Communion in both kinds into the hands of the communicants—the cup, as well as the bread?—Yes, if they wish to take it; but if they do not wish to take the cup, I do not insist upon it.

1228. Do you in preaching, always wear the surplice and hood?—Yes.

1229. Morning and evening?—Morning and evening.

1230. To what do you refer as your authority for so doing?—There is no authority for any other preaching vestment that I know of. I know of no rules on the matter.

1231. Will you refer to the 58th canon, in which the minister is to wear the surplice when ministering the sacraments and other rites of the church?—I do not know very much about the canons; I do not think that that would be my own reason for wearing the surplice; but simply that, wearing a surplice ordinarily, I know of no rule for putting on a black gown to preach in, and so I keep on my surplice.

1232. I think I understood from your answer to the Bishop of Oxford that you consider that the rubric referring us to the second year of the reign of King Edward VI. justifies you in using what are called the vestments, if you thought proper on other grounds?—That is my opinion.

1233. You do not think that the 58th canon, which enjoins the minister to wear a surplice and hood "in administering the Sacraments and other rites of the Church," excludes the use of those vestments in preaching?—I should think not: because I imagine the rubric is a later authority, having been re-enacted in 1662.

1234. I presume you always wear the stole?—Always.

1235. What would be your authority for so doing?—I imagine that to be one of the vestments which one is bound to wear under the first rubric: and as it 19199.

is a matter of custom to wear it, I have always worn it without question or dispute on the matter.

1236. You consider that it stands on the same authority as the chasuble and cope and other vestments?—That is my opinion on the matter.

1237. (Dean of Ely.) I have not heard the previous part of your examination, and therefore I have really very little to ask at present. There is, however, just one point on which I should like to ask a question. With regard to your interpretation of the meaning of the "north side of the table" what is your practice at St. Andrews?—At the time of the Communion?

1238. At the time of the Communion.—The northern part of the west side.

1239. In consecrating where do you stand?—In the middle, according to the rubric.

1240. You arrange the elements and then say the consecration prayer in the centre of the west side?—Yes, I do.

1241. (Sir J. Napier.) In your evidence I see you first refer to lights. You do not light them when they are placed on the Communion table?—I do not light them at the time of Communion unless it should be a dark morning.

1242. Afterwards, in the subsequent part, you mentioned that you think the lights come within the rubric about the ornaments?—I do think so.

1243. Do you give that rubric a more extended construction than the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council give it in the Westerton case?—I hardly know what their limits were, at the moment.

1244. Their limits were that it was confined to the ornaments that were prescribed by the first Prayer Book of Edward VI.?—We do not go beyond that: I think that is the limit.

1245. Are the lights prescribed in the first Prayer Book?—They are prescribed in the Injunctions, if I remember, and I think that the Injunctions are two years earlier than the Prayer Book—1547.

Rev. B. Webb,
M.A.
27 June 1867.

1246. You confine it to what is prescribed in the first Prayer Book?—And the Injunctions of course. I do not suppose that the Prayer Book got rid of the Injunctions—the Injunctions of 1547.

1247. You mentioned you had given your attention to the rubric, and the rubric refers back to the time of Edward VI. I wish to know whether you confine it to what is prescribed in the first Prayer Book, or whether you go behind the first Prayer Book?—Do you mean to ask me whether I think that this rubric that “such ornaments of the church and of the ministers thereof, at all times of their ministration shall be retained, and be in use, as were in this Church of England, by the authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of King Edward the Sixth,” only means things that were specified in the book of 1549?

1248. Yes?—Yes, I think so; that is my meaning.

1249. You observe in that rubric the word “retained” is introduced for the first time. It is not in the previous rubric?—It is in the rubric of 1662, you mean for the first time?

1250. Yes?—Yes, that is so.

1251. What precise force would you give to the word “retained” as there introduced?—I do not know what force to give the word as introduced there under those circumstances.

1252. Supposing that any of the vestments had at that time been prohibited, do you think the word “retained” would be properly applicable to those vestments?—I think it might. I do not think it would have been the best word to use; but I think it would have covered the presumed intention.

1253. Do you think, in speaking of matters that had been prohibited and disused as unlawful, the word “retained” would be a proper word to use?—The question would arise whether they had been prohibited in a thoroughly satisfactory manner and with proper authority.

1254. I am supposing them to have been unlawful, both disused, in fact and unlawful at the time that rubric was framed. Do you think then that the word “retained” would be a proper word, and would be applicable to those unlawful vestments?—Do you mean unlawful in the year 1662?

1255. Yes, before the making of the rubric?—I think the question would rather be what would have made them unlawful.

1256. You say you doubt whether incense is contemplated under the rubric?—I have my doubts on that point.

1257. Is that merely because it is not prescribed by the Prayer Book of Edward VI.?—Yes, that is the reason.

1258. With regard to the mixed chalice, I see you seem to put it mainly on the ground of the authority of some eminent persons, such as Bishop Andrewes; one witness mentioned that Bishop Cosin also practised it; is that your opinion?—It is my opinion.

1259. Can you refer me to any authority for that?—Not at the moment. It is difficult to answer such questions as that without books to refer to.

1260. It is your opinion that Bishop Cosin practised it?—It is my opinion.

1261. You do not think that would come within the rubric?—In what sense?

1262. Using it in the service as an article in the service—mixing the wine with the water?—You mean the fact of it not being in the rubric?

1263. Do you simply justify your opinion on the authority of those one or two cases?—I know, of course, that there is no rubric ordering the mixed chalice now; but it was my notion that there was no infringement of the rubric by retaining a practice of such great antiquity.

1264. Do you think it was the intention of the authorized Book of Common Prayer to allow additions to be made according to the learning or judgment of the particular clergyman?—I do not know.

1265. Do you think it is competent for a clergyman of his own choice to add to the rites and ceremonies prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer?—No, not generally; but with reference to this point I imagine that multitudes of clergymen were in the habit of mixing the chalice, and that the omission of the rubric would not much affect their practice.

1266. A great many do not?—I say nothing about imposing that rule upon others. I have no wish to do so.

1267. If the object was to have uniformity in those matters that would be a breach of uniformity?—Yes, it would, of course.

1268. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) Sir Joseph Napier has called your attention to the words “shall be retained and be in use.” Has it ever struck you that the tense of the verb on which “retained” depends is the future, “shall” indicating that “retain” does not point to antecedent use, but to that which is to be for the future?—That has crossed my mind and I think there is a great deal to be said upon it.

1269. Has it ever struck you, whether the introduction of the words “shall be retained” is intended rather to strengthen than to diminish the force of the words “be in use”?—I think that is very probable.

1270. That, in short, the reformers of the Prayer Book in 1661 meant to make the ceremonial of the Church of England more ample than it was in the years between 1549 and 1662?—I feel convinced that that was their intention.

1271. The Prayer Book at that time was revised by certain divines like Bishop Cosin; would their own antecedent practice lead us to believe they would be more favourable to the use of these vestments?—Undoubtedly; it leads to the notion that they would be more favourable.

1272. Is there any instance on record, in your recollection, of any of them having used such vestments?—Cosin was in the habit, we know, of using them at Durham.

1273. What vestments?—A cope, it is said.

1274. Is there any record of his having used the chasuble?—I think not.

1275. The alb or tunicle?—I imagine that the alb goes with the cope. If a man wear a cope or a chasuble I presume he would wear an alb underneath it.

1276. You can state in evidence that there is documentary evidence that Bishop Cosin, who was the moving spirit of this revision, used the cope in Durham?—Yes, there is certainly evidence to that effect.

1277. Is there evidence that he used it after the revision?—I believe there is that also.

1278. His using the cope after 1662 is my question?—It is said copes were retained in use in Durham till Bishop Warburton's time, and I suppose there is no doubt of the fact.

1279. (Earl of Harrowby.) In the cathedral?—Yes.

1280. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) I believe Durham is the cathedral of which Dr. Cosin was prebendary before the restoration and bishop afterwards?—It is so.

1281. Therefore you assume that the special retention of copes after 1662 in the cathedral of which Bishop Cosin was prelate throws some light on the meaning of this rubric?—I should say so.

1282. You stated in answer to the Dean of Ely that you stood at the prayer of consecration in front of the Lord's table, according to the rubric; with what rubric do you consider you comply, in so doing?—The rubric immediately before the prayer of consecration; “When the priest standing before the table” and so on.

1283. You consider “before the table” means at the broad part of the table and not at the end?—I do so consider it.

1284. Is it from the literal construction of the words, or from the literal construction of the words coupled with historic evidence, that you so take it?—It is both from the literal construction of the words and from the historical evidence.

1285. You consider that there is historical evidence that clergymen of the Church of England have continuously interpreted those words in that sense?—I think so.

1296. And without judging the liberty of other clergymen, you conceive they have taken a right judgment in so doing?—That is my view.

1297. Has it ever occurred to you that these words "standing before the table" were first introduced into the Prayer Book in 1662—whereas in the rubric of 1549 we have the words "turning still to the altar," and that in the intervening Prayer Books no similar words occurred, while in 1662 the correlative words "standing before the table" appear for the first time?—I have noticed that.

1288. How do you interpret the introduction of those words for the first time?—I think it shows the intention of the authorities at that time to mark the position of the priest where it is described in the rubric viz. "standing before the table," so as to remove any doubt on the matter.

1289. You stated, in answer to the Bishop of Oxford, that though you considered the rubric taken literally to prescribe the vestments, you conceive their long disuse justifies you on grounds of christian prudence in not personally reviving them?—That is what I said.

1290. Are you of opinion then that on grounds of christian prudence it would be harmless or desirable to forbid them, and bring back therefore the use of the Church of England to what it is in your church?—I think it would be a most fatal step if the licence that is still allowed by the rubric were restricted.

1291. In what way fatal, if the licence that is very little made use of were restricted?—I think it would be a very great grievance to many minds; I think that persons now, both clergy and laity, in great numbers, are satisfied with not acting up to the full meaning of the rubric, but that they would think it would be a great injury and a great alteration in the position of the Church of England if such a rubric were now removed from the Prayer Book.

1292. Have any of your congregation expressed to you an opinion adverse to the alteration of that rubric?—Yes, those with whom I have talked and taken counsel, I think, agree with me in thinking it would be a matter much to be deplored if any alteration were made in the rubric, though they do not press me to use the vestments.

1293. On the ground of its altering the formal status of the Church of England?—On that ground.

1294. With respect to the primitive Church, and to the Eastern Church with which his Grace has been in communication?—More with respect to the primitive Church, so far as any of my people have spoken to me.

1295. Your service is what is commonly called the cathedral service?—Yes, it is.

1296. You find that generally popular?—It is very popular indeed.

1297. You have a congregation of various classes of society?—Of all classes.

1298. The intellectual as well as the poor?—Yes, of all classes, lawyers, physicians, and other educated persons as well as the poor.

1299. St. Andrew's church has a large proportion of the educated and intellectual classes in its congregation?—It has.

1300. Are they attracted to St. Andrew's church by the character of your services?—Undoubtedly.

1301. You think they would not be so attracted by a plain service?—I am sure they would not.

1302. And you think therefore that the amount of ornament there is in your service tends to their spiritual good?—I think so.

1303. Have you found that the amount of ornament in your service leads them to popery?—No, I think not.

1304. Does it deter them from popery?—Certainly, it has that effect in some cases.

1305. Is it repellent to persons who have tendencies to dissent or the contrary?—Such cases as have come before me of persons working up from dissent require such a service as mine and would not be satisfied with anything lower.

1306. What phases of dissent?—Unitarianism is what I have been most thrown in with.

1307. You have been considerably thrown in with Unitarianism?—Yes, in a good many instances.

1308. I suppose explicit and implicit Unitarianism?—Yes, more explicitly than implicitly.

1309. And you conceive that this ornate service is more likely to win the Unitarian frame of mind to the truth than a more plain and unadorned one?—I do not know that I should say that: but such Unitarians as have come to me have been under the influence of strong religious feelings and a sort of reaction from their own system; and such a system as we offer at St. Andrew's seems to me to meet their wants.

1310. Have you ever come across persons who having been perverted to the Church of Rome have returned to our Church?—Yes, I have had examples of that.

1311. What has been the effect of your service on that tone of mind?—I should say such persons feel that we approach to the primitive ideal, with anything short of which they would not be satisfied.

1312. Are they persons who have returned from the Church of Rome from weariness at its ceremonial, or from other and deeper reasons?—Not from weariness of its ceremonial but from deeper reasons.

1313. Persons who have returned from the Church of Rome under the influence of those deeper reasons are satisfied, and are retained in the Church of England by that modicum of service which you give them?—They are satisfied with that phase of doctrine which I suppose our service represents.

1314. Have you ever come across persons who are still in the Church of Rome but dissatisfied with it?—I have.

1315. What is your experience of them?—I have had to receive foreigners to Communion in the English Church after full consideration.

1316. Then you can say that your system of worship, as you believe, works against and not for popery?—It works against popery, no doubt.

1317. In the persons of individuals?—In the persons of individuals, and generally.

1318. Do the poor and uneducated like your service, or would they like a more plain one?—I have every reason to think they like it.

1319. They come chiefly to your evening service?—They do.

1320. Is your church large enough to hold the congregation that you have got?—No, it is not.

1321. You have adopted the expedient of giving more services?—Yes, I have added a second morning service.

1322. Which is well attended?—It is hopefully attended; it is at an inconvenient hour, but a great many come.

1323. Has it thinned your later morning service?—Not at all.

1324. When you have come to the extreme tether of your services, what do you propose to do?—We are now trying to enlarge the church.

1325. Seriously trying to enlarge the church?—We have taken serious steps.

1326. Suppose those steps are successful, do you believe your services would be sufficiently attractive to different minds to fill the enlarged church?—I have no doubt of it.

1327. (Mr. J. Abel Smith.) Have you any confession?—Not as a formal system; but where persons come and require it I hold myself not at liberty to refuse to receive them.

1328. Is there any peculiar form of absolution?—No, I have no peculiar form; only the form in the Prayer Book.

1329. (Dean of Westminster.) The form for the visitation of the sick?—I use that in extreme cases.

1330. (Dean of Lincoln.) Do you use a litany of any form, or any other service which is not found in the Book of Common Prayer or prescribed by authority?—No, not any.

Rev. B. Webb,

1331. You say that you use water with the wine in the administration of the Sacrament?—Yes.

1332. Do you consider that mixture to be essential to the validity of the Sacrament?—No.

1333. Our reformers insist on a distinct reading of the service as opposed to the rapid recitation of the Romish clergy; do you think that distinct reading to be profitable and necessary?—I think it most essential.

1334. Is it the custom of your church to sing psalms at the time when the people are communicating?—We sing anthems.

1335. Is that prescribed by any rubric?—No, it is not prescribed by any existing rubric.

1336. I observe, in answer to a question, you have stated that there is no prayer before the sermon?—There is not.

1337. How do you reconcile that with the 55th canon?—No doubt it is not to be reconciled with literal obedience to the canons.

1338. Have you any solution of the difficulty by which you feel you can omit it?—No: only I imagine that the bidding prayer is not acceptable to the people; in my case, especially, we are obliged to be very particular about not lengthening the service, and so we have got a custom of having no prayer before the sermon.

1339. Do you ever act upon the first direction in the Communion service—“So many as intend to be partakers of the Holy Communion shall signify their names to the curate, at least some time the day before”?—No, I do not.

1340. And you do not always read the exhortation?—No.

1341. (Mr. Walpole) Your attention was called on the last occasion to the two exhortations or invitations at the time of Holy Communion, for the congregation to attend, and I think you said that you used the shorter form and not the longer one?—I never omit the short one, beginning “Ye that do truly and earnestly repent,” but as I said, I omit the longer one.

1342. Upon what authority do you omit the longer one?—I do not know that there is any authority, but where the Communion is administered every Sunday, as it is with us, those exhortations seem to be of less importance.

1343. Will you look at the two rubrics. Do they not seem to require that each of these exhortations should be read? The first says—“At the time of the celebration of the Communion, the communicants being conveniently placed for the receiving of the Holy Sacrament, the priest shall say this exhortation” Is not that a command?—It is very stringent.

1344. The next goes on to say, with an adverb of time,—“Then” (that is after that prayer has been read) “shall the priest say to them that come to receive the Holy Communion, “Ye that do truly and earnestly repent you of your sins,” and so on?—It is very true. I found the custom existing in my church when I succeeded to it, and did not alter it.

1345. It was merely the continuance of a custom you found?—That is so.

1346. I only wished to know whether you thought there was any specific authority for the omission?—No, I do not think there is.

1347. (Rev. H. Venn.) In your last examination you stated that the last year's offertory was about 2,500*l.*, and then you added that all the expenses of the church and parish are paid out of it?—Yes.

1348. To what expenses of the parish did you allude?—Schools, the relief of the poor, and every possible expense.

1349. Then there are no collections made in your parish excepting at the offertory?—No. I expressly said last time that there was about 1,500*l.* subscribed in addition to the offertory. In respect to expenses, I said the total sum received was about 4,000*l.*, of which 2,500*l.* was received from anonymous gifts, and about 1,500*l.* from persons who subscribe, with their names, to institutions.

1350. Therefore the offertory goes to diminishing the expenses of the schools?—A certain proportion does.

1351. And is the choir paid out of that?—Yes, every expense is paid. There is no other source of income.

1352. Will you state the amount your choir costs you?—I think about a 1,000*l.* a year.

1353. Then I presume they are altogether professional singers?—They are.

1354. Can the congregation join in those services?—Well, they do join a great deal:—too much some times.

1355. Then the object is they should not join?—No, there is psalmody and hymnody in which they are expected and desired to join; and there is ornate music in which they had better not join.

1356. I think I have seen sometimes advertisements of certain musical performances in your church?—I think not.

1357. I am not sure that it was your church?—You have never seen it of my church. I have never advertised a musical service.

1358. You were mentioning in answer to another question, that at the preaching of the sermon, though you use no prayer at the commencement of it, you use an ascription of glory to the Holy Trinity?—That is our custom.

1359. Do you then turn to the Communion table?—No, I do not.

1360. Do you use crossings?—I do not.

1361. You said in answer to a question put to you on the last occasion, that you had no “new” vestments. I want to understand what you mean by the word “new”?—I did answer the Archbishop that I did not wear vestments, but I think his Grace said the vestments, not new vestments, if I remember rightly.

1362. The practical question I wish to come to is, do you use the stole?—I use the stole.

1363. You do not consider the stole a vestment?—I imagine that everything a clergyman wears during his ministrations is a vestment. The surplice I take to be a vestment in the general sense.

1364. (Bishop of London.) By the stole you mean a black scarf?—Yes, I think the stole and the scarf are identical; that is my theory.

1365. (Rev. H. Venn.) I think you mentioned that your population is 5,000 or 6,000?—Yes.

1366. Have you any other church within the district?—No, I have not.

1367. Is your district a separate parish?—It is a Peel district.

1368. Have you burials in your district?—Occasionally a body is brought to the church, but not as a rule, because we have no cemetery.

1369. When they are brought what is the ceremony that you use; is there any deviation from the Prayer Book; do you use lights on those occasions?—No, I have never had occasion to use them.

1370. Is there any recitation when the body is brought and placed in the church other than that which is prescribed in the Prayer Book?—No.

1371. (Dr. Payne Smith.) What do you mean by the “northern part of the west side of the altar.” Do you mean the northern corner?—No, I mean towards the northern corner.

1372. You divide the altar front, according to the “Directorium,” into five parts?—I do not know what the “Directorium” says. I imagine there is a middle, a northern, and a southern part.

1373. It has been a good deal debated as to what exactly is meant by the “north side.” I want to know whether you are satisfied generally with standing in the position you have described?—I do not think it means the north “end.”

1374. (Rev. R. Gregory.) You say that you adopt a cathedral service. If the use of the cathedral church of the diocese were made the standard, would your church conform to the use then existing in the diocese?—I really hardly know what the ritual at St. Paul's Cathedral is.

1372. I will put the question in this way; does your ritual conform to the cathedral service of your own diocese?—I supposed that cathedral service in the sense intended by the questioner, meant a musical service, and did not affect matters of ritual at all.

1376. Are you aware of any substantial difference between your use and the use of the cathedral of St. Paul?—I should say not, chorally;—but as to what the ritual may be, as to the questions upon which I have been examined, as to how they are understood by the cathedral dignitaries, I have no idea; for of late years I have not attended the services at the cathedral.

1377. (Mr. Cardwell.) How is your congregation composed as regards parishioners and persons who are non-parishioners?—I have already said I have a majority of non-parishioners; but a great many parishioners of different classes do attend, and none are excluded.

1378. The attendance is very large, is it not?—Very large.

1379. Do people come early in order to obtain seats?—They do.

1380. And are seats reserved for the parishioners?—No; there are hardly any reserved seats. Some of the congregation have, I believe, a sort of right to two or three seats, but there is no reservation strictly so called.

1381. The whole population is what?—Between 5,000 and 6,000.

1382. Is there a sufficient supply of church accommodation for the whole population of the district?—My district is peculiarly situated, as I have already explained. There are a great many foreigners, non-resident tradesmen, and so forth. I do not know what accommodation would be actually wanted for my parishioners if the congregation was exclusively confined to them, but certainly the church is not large enough for its present needs.

1383. That is, it is not large enough to include all the persons who come to it, the majority of them being from a distance?—That is true.

1384. If you were limited to the inhabitants of the district or parish, different arrangements necessarily would have to be made from those which are actually in force; I mean as to obtaining seats, and so on?—My church was, I believe, consecrated as a free church; I have no option in the matter. My churchwardens are not certain that they have power to assign seats. We are helpless in the matter.

1385. Your church, I believe, is the first of those which, under the act of 1843, were commonly called the "Peel District Churches"?—It is.

1386. It was intended, therefore, for the benefit of the poor population of the district in which it is placed?—No doubt.

1387. That intention is so far frustrated that the larger part of the congregation actually come from a distance?—No; that assumes that the poor would come in sufficient numbers to fill it.

1388. I am assuming nothing. I am only asking as a fact whether of the number of persons who do come the greater proportion are persons who come from a distance?—That is true. There is a full church, and more non-parishioners than parishioners; but you cannot go on to draw the conclusion that any parishioners are excluded.

1389. I have not drawn any conclusion yet. In so far as the object of establishing a Peel district in that place was to bring the poor inhabitants of that place to the church, it is only so far accomplished as to refer to a minority of the present congregation?—That is, of course, true.

1390. Supposing that the object for which Peel districts were created was that which was to be exclusively pursued in your church, it would be necessary to make different arrangements from those which exist at the present moment with regard to the allocation of seats and so forth?—A further question would arise. I said just now the church was consecrated as a free church, whatever that may mean. It has been a matter of great inconvenience to myself and the churchwardens, but we doubt whether we have the right to assign seats; and it is a very great difficulty.

1391. (Dr. Twiss.) Can you at all explain what is meant by its being consecrated as a free church?—In the schedule returned to the Church Building Commissioners at the time of consecration, there was an alteration to the effect that the church should not contain so many free seats, but that all the seats should be free. It was altered at the last moment; it was to be a free church, whatever that may mean. I do not know exactly what it means.

1392. (Mr. Cardwell.) The form of service you have described in your former answers is an attraction to those persons who come from a distance?—No doubt it is.

1394. But what do you say as to those who live in the parish and do not come?—Everyone who knows a London parish knows how difficult it is to make acquaintance with such people. I am learning my people more and more, but it must be a work of years.

1395. You are not able to say whether a service more conformable to what is more usual in other churches in the neighbourhood would bring more or fewer of the parishioners?—I think it would bring fewer. That is my opinion; but of course it is a difficult matter to prove such a thing as that.

1396. You have no reason to think that those who do not now come are in any degree deterred from coming by the circumstance that the service is somewhat different?—No, I have no reason to think that.

1397. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) Your attention was called by Mr. Beresford Hope to the rubric just before the consecration: "When the priest, standing before the table, hath so ordered the bread and wine;" have you ever considered whether the word "standing" is the emphatic word and not the word "before"?—I thought them both of about equal emphasis, both "standing" and "before."

1399. Your attention was called to the 55th canon, and you were asked how you accounted for the variation between the canon and your practice as to the prayer before the sermon. Do you think the 55th canon refers at all to parochial churches?—I really am so ignorant of the canons that I do not know how to answer that question.

1400. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) Have you formed an opinion?—I have not.

1401. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) Sir Joseph Napier drew your attention to the decision of the Privy Council as to the ornaments of the Church, and I think you stated to him that you were content with what was prescribed in the Prayer Book of 1549 as referred to by the Prayer Book of 1662?—Yes, I think I am content with that.

1402. Would you say that you think the present Prayer Book prohibits everything that is not prescribed?—No, I should not say that.

Rev. B. Webb,
M.A.
27 June 1867.

1403. You said, I think, that you do not use lights at the celebration of the Holy Communion?—No, I do not.

1404. Do you use them at evensong?—Yes, they are lighted.

1405. Always, whether in summer or winter, without regard to light?—No, they are not lighted when the church is light, as at this time of the year.

1406. Do you know whether either of your predecessors had the candles lighted at the celebration of Holy Communion or at evensong?—I do not know; I am not aware of having made any change.

1407. Referring to question 1169, do you consider that the lighting of candles when it is not dark is prohibited, and is that your reason for not lighting them?—I imagine that the result of the judgment in the St. Barnabas' case was that they were not to be lighted, and I have conformed to that.

1408. Do you mean the judgment in the Consistory Court or in the Privy Council?—Dr. Lushington's judgment in the Consistory Court.

1409. I think you said you were not aware that the Injunctions of 1547 had any authority?—I hardly remember what I said, but I incline to think they had authority.

1410. Will you tell us whether you have any variety of altar cloths in your church?—I have.

1411. What are their colours?—White, green, black, violet, and red.

1412. As no colours are either prescribed or prohibited in the Prayer Book, or in the canons of 1603, do you consider that you are free to choose the colours which seem most suitable?—Left to myself I should try to find out what were the colours in the old English Church, and to use them: but having inherited a church with a set of altar cloths I have allowed them to go on in use.

1413. Are you, or would you be, at all guided in your choice by the colours given in the inventories of old English church ornaments?—I think these are of great moment in finding out what the English rule was, which, I believe, is not clearly ascertained amongst ritualists.

1414. You are perhaps aware that the inventories made when the second Prayer Book of Edward VI. came into use, often contained what were called assignments of church ornaments for the use of the parish. Do you refer to them at all as interpreting the general rubric on ornaments?—I should do so very much indeed.

1415. Have you any cross on or near the altar or Lord's table, in your church?—There is a cross.

1416. Was it there when the church was consecrated, or was it substituted for a previous one?—The present cross was not there when the church was consecrated, but I think it probable there was one then.

1417. Was there one painted on the wall?—No, not one painted on the wall.

1418. Have you any cross or other emblem carried in procession in your church?—Only a verge.

1419. Are all the services of your church choral?—The early Communion is not choral, but all the other services are.

1420. Are all the choir paid?—There are volunteers in addition, but the staple of the choir is a professional one.

1421. Do the choir as a rule remain until the end of the Holy Communion in order to assist at the celebration?—They do.

1422. (Sir R. J. Phillimore.) Is it your opinion that any of the poor of your parish are excluded from your services in consequence of the attendance of other persons?—No, I think not; they are not excluded to my knowledge.

1423. I suppose your churchwardens would hold it to be their duty, and you would hold it to be your duty, to seat parishioners before you seated strangers?—That is their duty, I suppose.

1424. Do you know any case in which a parishioner has been excluded and a stranger put in his place?—I know no such case.

1425. Is it your opinion then that your services are such as to attract the poor to your church?—I should say so certainly.

1426. As far as your knowledge goes?—As far as my knowledge goes.

1427. Do you think if there were no strangers in your church it would be so far empty, or filled by your parishioners?—I am afraid it would be empty, or comparatively so.

1428. (Dean of Westminster.) I think you said that occasionally you used the form of absolution prescribed in the Order for the Visitation of the Sick?—Yes, I do, of course.

1429. Do you always use that form when you administer absolution?—Do you mean in private cases?

1430. Yes?—I have used the form in the Communion Service sometimes, when I thought it more appropriate.

1431. But in the visitation of the sick?—No, I have sometimes used that where I thought it more fitting, and at other times I have used the absolution in the Communion Service.

1432. In the Order for the Visitation of the Sick, you sometimes use one form and sometimes the other?

—No, in the Order for the Visitation of the Sick I should of course exclusively use the one there given.

1433. Do you use it frequently?—I hardly know how to answer; a good many times—not very commonly perhaps.

1434. You also said that the partakers of the Holy Communion did not signify their names to you?—No, they do not.

1435. On what ground do you not comply with that rubric?—I wish I could comply with it.

1436. On what ground do you not comply with it?—I know of no method of enforcing it.

1437. (Earl of Harrowby.) Except by repelling them from the Communion?—Yes; which I imagine I have no right to do.

1438. (Dean of Westminster.) Do you, in conformity with the rubric, repel any one?—I have never had occasion to do so.

1439. Is the Athanasian Creed in your church said or sung?—Sung.

1440. Always?—Always.

1441. (Bishop of London.) With regard to the rubrics, am I correct in forming the opinion that you follow some of them and pass others by?—My intention is to follow them all.

1442. But there are great practical difficulties?—There are great practical difficulties as to some.

1443. And in point of fact where those difficulties occur, you use the discretion which you conceive the clergy of the Church of England have as to minor matters?—That is my course and my opinion.

1444. You have therefore adopted a service which you think is on the whole most conducive to edification in your own particular circumstances?—That is my view.

1445. Have you been pressed to use vestments?—I have been asked to do so, and I have had the offer of vestments.

1446. But you have not complied because you do not think you would more edify your people or increase your congregation?—No, I think my congregation have confidence in me now, and I should be very sorry to lose it by making unnecessary changes, which would not carry them along with me.

1447. Probably that applies equally to making the service more completely a parochial service. You think they are accustomed to the other, and it is better to go on as you are?—I think so.

1448. The church is tolerably full?—The church is full to overcrowding.

1449. To recur for one moment to the question about the seats: I do not quite understand by what authority the churchwardens do not assign seats to parishioners. Do you know?—I do not know, but there is that difficulty from the fact that the church was said to be consecrated as a free church.

1450. It is a sort of tradition?—More than a tradition, I believe.

1451. You have looked very carefully into it?—Yes, the churchwarden did: and we found the schedule before referred to, which was handed over to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, by the former Church Building Commissioners.

1452. Is the churchwarden a solicitor of considerable eminence?—Yes.

1453. And he has looked into it?—Yes.

1454. You could not refer to any Act of Parliament by which it is lawful to set aside the general law of the Church for what are called free churches?—No, I could not.

1455. You said, I think, that altogether about 4,000*l.* was collected?—Yes; that was our income last year.

1456. You have no idea that that would be collected out of so poor a district if the congregation were confined to your parishioners?—I am afraid that, like any of our neighbours, we should be nearly insolvent if we were confined to the district itself.

1457. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) I am requested to ask you whether, in your opinion, a Peel district church has not the same object as that of any other parish?—It has no other object, in my opinion.

1458. In answer to a former question you said you administered the cup to those who chose to take it. Do you administer the sacrament in such cases in one kind only?—No, but some persons will not take the cup in their hands, and you have to enable them to drink by holding it to them.

1459. Are the seats fixed or are they chairs?—There are fixed-seats and chairs; chairs in the interstices and vacant places; benches and chairs.

1460. If you succeeded in increasing your parochial congregation you would lose the means of maintaining the services. What attempts are made to increase the attendance of the parishioners?—We do the best we can to make people come to church, and we are hoping to enlarge the church, which will meet that difficulty.

The witness withdrew.

The Very Rev. the DEAN OF CARLISLE, called in, and examined.

1461. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) How long have you been Dean of Carlisle?—Ten years and a half.

1462. Have any changes been made in the cathedral service in your time?—The only change has been that the dean and canons read the lessons. I introduced that custom.

1463. Will you describe what are the services on Sunday?—The usual cathedral choral service; except the Communion service, which is read.

1464. At what hour do the services take place?—At 11 in the morning and three in the afternoon.

1465. At what hour are the week-day services?—At 10 in the morning, and three in the afternoon.

1466. They are of course all choral?—All entirely choral.

1467. How often is the Holy Communion celebrated?—Once a month.

1468. What is the average number of communicants each time?—About 40 or 50.

1469. On the Sunday service is the choir full?—Yes.

1470. Have you a service in the nave?—No, unfortunately we have no nave.

1471. Have you two sermons on Sunday?—Yes.

1472. Have you any sermons on the week days?—No; except, on occasional days. I introduced a sermon on Ascension Day, and on Christmas Day.

1473. What are the congregations on the week days?—They are very small.

1474. Then you do not find that the week day cathedral service is very attractive?—No, I think not.

1475. Not so much so as you could wish?—We have fewer persons in Carlisle who would be likely to attend a daily service than in most cities, the inhabitants being nearly all business people; there are very few persons of leisure.

1476. From your own knowledge can you tell us what the influence of your cathedral service is on the minds of the people?—I can speak decidedly though sorrowfully, that it certainly keeps away the working classes. They have given me as a reason, that they cannot follow the choral service. Mechanics and respectable people of that class have often stated that as an objection.

1477. (Archbishop of Armagh.) Have any of the clergy of the parochial churches in Carlisle adopted what are called ritualistic practices or vestments?—None at all.

1478. Then you cannot say anything as to whether in such cases the congregations have been increased or decreased?—No, there is nothing of the sort; but there is very inferior singing.

1479. (Bishop of Oxford.) Are the services in Carlisle cathedral conducted strictly according to the rubrics?—They are conducted as they have been for the last hundred years; I cannot tell whether that is consistent with the rubrics or not; I took them as I found them and I carried them on.

1480. You have rather regarded custom than rubric?—I certainly have.

1481. As an illustration, do you use the cope in the celebration of the Holy Communion?—No.

1482. May I ask why you do not use it?—Because it has not been used for 150 years; that is my reason.

1483. At the time of the celebration of the Holy Communion by whom are the elements placed on the table?—They are placed on the table before the service begins.

1484. Not at the time ordered by the rubric?—No, they are arranged at the time by a minor canon, placed in position, if I may so speak, on the table; but the elements are placed there before the service begins.

1485. At what hour is the Holy Communion celebrated in the cathedral?—Immediately after service at morning prayer.

1486. At no other time?—At no other time except on saints' days, on certain days.

1487. On all saints' days?—No, on Ascension Day, Christmas Day, and such days.

1488. Is the Holy Communion administered every Sunday?—Once a month, on the first Sunday in the month.

1489. Can you state the reason why the rubric, which orders that in cathedrals it should be administered every Sunday and on saints' days, is not observed?—I cannot tell; I found it so.

1490. I suppose it is in your own power to order it?—That your lordship knows better than I do.

1491. The reason of its not being done is because you found it not so?—I have simply carried it on as I found it, without any alteration.

1492. (Earl Beauchamp.) I believe it has been stated (you will correct me if I am wrong) that you had some dislike to a cathedral service at the time you were appointed Dean of Carlisle, and that since you have been appointed dean, and since you have been called upon by your duty to attend the cathedral service, you have very much modified the opinion which you formerly entertained?—I never disliked cathedral service; I had never been accustomed to it. Certainly

Rev. B. Webb,
M.A.

Dean of Carlisle.

- Dean of Carlisle.
27 June 1867.
- it has improved on acquaintance. I cannot say I ever disliked it.
1493. Do you always administer to each communicant separately?—Always.
1494. (Bishop of Gloucester). With regard to the celebration of the Holy Communion, has any request ever been preferred to you for more frequent Communion?—Never.
1495. At the celebration of the Holy Communion do other than communicants remain in the cathedral?—Not that I am aware of.
1496. Is there a prayer before the sermon?—Yes; sometimes the bidding prayer and sometimes a collect.
1497. When the Communion is not administered, which would be three or four Sundays out of the month, as the case may be, do you then read the Prayer for the Church militant?—Yes, always.
- 1498-9. And terminate with the collect?—With the collect and the blessing.
1500. (Dean of Ely). You spoke of the choral service keeping mechanics away; am I to conclude from that that you think a musical service in general keeps mechanics away, or merely that it is the high musical service at your cathedral?—I cannot answer that question; I can speak only from my own experience. Some parts of the country are much more musical than others. I should think in Yorkshire it would probably draw people. Unfortunately the Cumberland people are very unmusical, and it rather repels them.
1501. You do not, therefore, draw a general conclusion against the introduction of a considerable element of music into the service?—Do you mean in a cathedral or in a parish church?
1502. In a parish church?—I should draw a very wide distinction between the two. If you mean a full choral service in a parish church, I should think it inexpedient, because a large number of persons would not be able to partake in and enjoy it; but if you mean merely the singing of the canticles and so forth, I do not, of course, see any objection to it.
1503. I wish to draw a distinction between what we call in cathedrals, technically, "services," that is to say, an elaborate composition for the Te Deum and so on, and the mere introduction of music. I apprehend you would not draw a conclusion, against music, but against the more elaborate form of music probably?—I should object to the chanting of the Psalms.
1504. Because the mechanics would not understand them?—No; and I prefer the simple chanting of the services,—the canticles; not what we call "services" in cathedrals.
1505. With regard to the communicants, you stated there were something like 40?—The average monthly number is about 40, and 60 on the festivals.
1506. Are those communicants persons chiefly connected with the dean and chapter?—No; of course, they are included, but two thirds of them belong to the town.
1507. Is there any parish attached to the cathedral?—There is a parish church, unfortunately, under the walls of the cathedral.
1508. The cathedral, as cathedral, has no parochial duties?—No; the parish church has Sacrament service while ours is going on; so that it is distinct from it.
1509. Therefore, there are no persons except persons like the dean and his family, the canon and his family, and the persons connected with the cathedral, whose special duty it is, so to speak, to go to the cathedral church; there are no parishioners?—No parishioners. We have no parish. There are persons who regularly attend the morning service of the cathedral with their families, and who attend the Communion.
1510. As a matter of choice?—Yes.
1511. Are the lay clerks among these communicants?—Several of them.
1512. I think you stated that the Communion service proper was not choral?—No; no part of it. It is musical. The responses in the Communion are sung, and the service is read by the clergyman.
1513. For instance, what is the practice with regard to the Gloria in excelsis at the end? Is that sung?—It is said.
1514. Are the lay clerks retained for the purpose of taking a part in the Communion service?—Two of them collect the alms, and they generally attend; but it is left open, I think, whether they think proper to attend.
1515. The choristers are not present?—No.
1516. And only those of the lay clerks who wish to be communicants?—Exactly so.
1517. (Dr. Twiss). Did you find any copes in the vestiary of the cathedral on your appointment?—I did, I have two in my possession at this moment. They are rather in a decayed state, but I have them.
1518. Have you any record of how late they have been worn?—No; I have heard about 150 years ago, but I have no data to go upon.
1519. Have you any statute of your cathedral requiring them to be provided or to be worn?—I cannot say; I do not think there is, but I am not sure. I think it speaks of "accustomed habits" or something of that kind.
1520. What is the date of your statutes?—Henry VIII., the new foundation.
1521. They have not been reformed since Henry the Eighth's time?—I think not.
1522. (Sir J. Napier). I suppose you frequently have seen a bishop ministering in the cathedral?—Never any but our own bishop.
1523. Has the archbishop?—No.
1524. When the bishop ministers does he wear the cope or chasuble?—No.
1525. Or with the pastoral staff in his hand?—No.
1526. Did you ever know a bishop do that?—I have no personal knowledge.
1527. Nor an archbishop?—Nor an archbishop.
1528. (Mr. Beresford Hope). Have you any extra services in Lent or any other season of the year?—No; there is no difference in Lent, except that we have no musical service on Wednesdays and Fridays.
1529. How many coverings have you for the Lord's table?—One.
1530. Is that red?—Crimson.
1531. Have you any colour for Lent?—No.
1532. You retain the same covering?—The same. There is but one covering always on.
1533. Are there any candlesticks on the Lord's table?—None.
1534. Have you any in your possession?—No.
1535. Have you no record that they have been in use?—None.
1536. Have you made attempts to attract the working classes to your cathedral by extra services, such as there are in some other cathedrals?—Not by extra services; by personal influence I have endeavoured to do so, but they prefer going to the parish churches.
1537. Is Carlisle amply provided with parish churches?—It is becoming so. It has been very much the reverse.
1538. The parish in which the cathedral stands has got its own parish church?—It is under the walls of the cathedral. I am now endeavouring to remove it.
1539. In short, no one comes to the cathedral who does not like to do it?—No.
1540. There are supposed to be means of worship for everyone independently of the cathedral?—That is the hypothesis. There are 9,000 people in the parish and one church. Therefore you may judge of the provision.
1541. You have no extra litanies?—No, nothing; no extra services of any kind.
1542. (Earl of Harrowby). What number does your cathedral hold?—About 650 or 700.
1543. (Mr. J. Abel Smith). Are there a great many Dissenters in Carlisle?—Not more in proportion than in other towns.
1544. Does any particular form of dissent prevail; are there Presbyterians?—All sorts.

1545. Not particularly Presbyterians?—No; there are Wesleyans, Independents, Baptists, and Quakers.

1546. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) Any Roman Catholics?—Yes; there is a Roman Catholic Chapel. They are rather flourishing. There are a great many Irish.

1547. (Dean of Lincoln.) You have observed that the choral service keeps away the working classes. What do you think is the general effect of that kind of service on other classes of society?—Many undoubtedly like it. Some attend, being, I should say, chiefly attracted by it; but they are principally the middle class and tradespeople.

1548. (Rev. H. Fenn.) How many years were you at Cheltenham before you went to Carlisle?—32 years.

1549. While you were at Cheltenham had you any opportunity of witnessing the rate of progress of what are called ritualistic services; have you any personal knowledge respecting them?—I should say not; no, I think not. They were not much adopted in any church in Cheltenham. There was choral service in one church in Cheltenham, and only one.

1550. That, probably, would not come under your observation?—I did not attend it in any way, but it was well attended.

1551. From your experience of Cheltenham and Carlisle, can you speak to the fact whether ritualistic and choral services find favour with religious people generally, or whether they are regarded with apprehension and dislike?—That is a very wide question.

1552. If you have no evidence to give of the fact, the question drops?—Undoubtedly many object to a choral service. Some religious persons very much object to it. I should say that there is a large body of religious people who would object to it and do object to it. That is a fact I am acquainted with. It is so much a matter of religious taste, that some people will be attracted and some repelled by it, as far as I can judge; but certainly, with regard to the larger body of religious persons that I am acquainted with, they would reject it. That I can say most distinctly. All the religious people that I am acquainted with would object to ritualism, so called, altogether; but they would not object to choral services altogether. I see the distinction very clearly, as far as my experience goes.

1553. (Rev. R. Gregory.) You said that on saints' days the Holy Communion was not celebrated at the 11 o'clock service. What time is it celebrated?—Not at all.

1554. You said that the Lord's table is only covered with a cloth of one colour; is black never used at the death of a bishop or a dean?—Not since I have been there. There is no provision for it that I am acquainted with. You mean for mourning?

1555. Yes. If the Queen were to die would you put it into black?—I cannot tell. I should be very sorry to have to decide but I cannot tell until the event took place.

1556. In what vestment do you preach?—In the surplice always; in the surplice, scarf, and hood.

1557. (Mr. Cardwell.) I understood you to say that all the religious persons with whom you have been acquainted at Cheltenham and at Carlisle would object to the introduction of what are called ritualistic services?—Yes.

1558. Can you state of your own knowledge what effect the introduction of what are called the vestments would be likely to have in Carlisle?—It is impossible to calculate. I cannot tell.

1559. Have you ever considered whether it would be prudent, with a view to drawing larger congregations to the churches?—I should expect it would drive them out; but that is a matter of opinion.

1560. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) Have you any morning or evening service at all that is not choral—early morning service?—No, none.

1561. Have you any cross on the altar or the wall?—There are just the letters I.H.S.

• 19199.

1562. Is there any cross or ornament?—I believe it is a golden cross, but I really never studied it, on the front of the Communion table on the cloth.

1563. Are there any other old ornaments of the church besides the cope?—None that I am aware of.

1564. Do you ever use any hymn or psalm before the morning or evening service?—Before the sermon in the evening.

1565. I mean at the beginning of the morning or evening service?—No; there is nothing of the kind.

1566. Are there any alterations made in the appointed lessons?—None that I know of. If you ask me personally, I never read the Apocrypha.

1567. Is the Athanasian Creed always used at the appointed times?—Always.

1568. The collects are preceded by the following rubric: "Note, that the Collect appointed for every Sunday, or for any Holy day that hath a Vigil or Eve, shall be said at the Evening service next before." Is this observed in your cathedral?—Always.

1569. Is the principal minister at the time of the Holy Communion always assisted by a gospeller and epistoler?—Yes.

1570. Does the celebrant himself sometimes read the gospel?—The epistle and gospel are read by the dean or the canon at the ordinary Communion service.

1571. Are banns of marriage ever published in your cathedral?—Never.

1572. Is notice given on Sundays after the Nicene Creed of "what holy days or fasting days are in the week following to be observed"?—Some are.

1573. Have you ever any early communion?—No.

1574. How are the alms for the poor, if there are any, or other donations of the dean and clergy offered: it is the custom in some cathedrals to have them offered kneeling, is that the custom with you?—No; it is the ordinary manner. They are collected by the sub-sacrist and brought up to the minor canon, who receives them in a dish and lays them upon the table.

1575. What is your practice with regard to the rubrical permission to omit the word "oblations" in the prayer for the whole state of Christ's Church militant?—You mean when there is no Communion?

1576. When there is no Communion, or when there is a Communion. Do you use the word "oblations" when there is a Communion?—Always.

1577. And omit it when there is no Communion?—Always.

1578. What is the practice in your cathedral as to the two exhortations to be used in giving warning for the celebration of the Holy Communion? Do you give notice, for example, of the Holy Communion immediately after the Nicene Creed?—Yes.

1579. Then do you use one of those two notices?—Yes, a portion of it,—the first portion of it.

1580. Do you use it at all after the sermon, as seems to be contemplated by the rubric?—No.

1581. What is the habit, in your cathedral, as to using the two exhortations at the time of the celebration of the Communion; do you use both the longer and the shorter always?—Yes; we use the ordinary one. You mean in the celebration?

1582. At the celebration?—Yes; we use them both.

1583. Do you feel at liberty to omit the longer one?—It never struck me to do so.

1584. Does any old custom remain in your cathedral of the communicants coming out of their places at the time of reading the short exhortation?—No.

1585. What is your practice as to persons who are not intending to communicate at the celebration of the Holy Communion?—They go away.

1586. Are they allowed to remain if they choose, or would they be forbidden?—The case has not occurred.

1587. The sixth rubric after the Communion service says: "If any of the bread and wine remain unconsecrated," and so on; giving a direction as to what is to be done with what is consecrated, and what is to be done with what is not consecrated. Is that rubric strictly observed?—Strictly.

1588. Have you ever heard or known of an instance in your cathedral of the consecrated elements being taken into the vestry and consumed?—No; never.

1589. Who is responsible for the cleansing and putting away of the vessels?—The sub-sacrist.

1590. What is the usual number of communicants in your cathedral on saints' days and on feast days? Are they larger than on ordinary Sundays?—On Christmas Day and Easter Day they would be larger.

1591. And have you a large number on Ascension Day or not?—We had a very large number this year. They are increasing.

1592. About how many were there?—Between 60 and 70.

1593. Is it a recent practice to have celebrations on Ascension Day?—No; I think it was so before I came, but I cannot positively say.

1594. Have you any baptisms in your cathedral?—No parochial duties at all.

1595. You said, I think, that there was a parochial church either near or connected with the cathedral?—Yes; the parochial church is the remains of the cathedral nave. It is bricked off and separated from the cathedral.

1596. Has the parochial church vessels for the Holy Communion of its own?—Yes; it has nothing to do with us.

1597. I think you said you never had any marriages in your church?—I rather think there was one by special licence, but I did not perform it.

1598. Have you in your cathedral any mitre, or cross, or anything of that kind, carried in procession?—No, nothing; a mitre is carried before the bishop. I believe the bishop's silver staff.

1599. I meant before yourself?—No.

1600. You have no old ornament?—Only the silver staff.

1601. What has it got on the top of it?—A knob.

1602. (Sir R. J. Phillimore.) Could you tell us what the amount of your offertory is in the year?—The average is about 30 shillings a month exclusive of the feast days and ordinations, and occasions of that kind.

1603. Have you ever tried the plain services in your cathedral on the Sunday after the two choral services or between the two choral services?—No.

1604. It has been done in some cathedrals, Salisbury for instance, but that has never been tried by you?—No.

1605. You say you have no nave at all?—There are two arches. There is a small remnant of the nave which I hope to restore to the cathedral very shortly.

1606. (Dean of Westminster.) Are you the ordinary of your cathedral; do you consider yourself the ordinary?—In the absence of the bishop; he is our visitor.

1607. But is he the ordinary?—That is a legal question which I am not prepared to answer.

1608. When a chapter of the Apocrypha is appointed to be read, what portion of Scripture is substituted for it, and by whose authority?—I do not believe anybody changes it but myself.

1609. Do you choose regular portions?—If you wish to know my practice I read straight through Job or Proverbs as long as the Apocrypha is appointed. I never read the Apocrypha.

1610. In the Order for the Visitation of the Sick, has it been your practice to use the absolution?—I have no parochial duties in Carlisle as dean.

1611. Do the communicants signify their names to you?—No.

1612. (Bishop of London.) I understand from your evidence that the order of things is conducted principally by custom?—Distinctly so.

1613. That custom descended to you from your predecessor?—Yes.

1614. And probably to him from his predecessors?—Yes.

1615. In fact you find it difficult to make changes in the cathedral service?—I have never attempted any at all.

1616. Is that because you dislike all changes?—I am perfectly satisfied with the state of things as they are.

1617.—Looking to the constitution of a cathedral body, it is a place where changes are not made easily, is it not?—I do not know.

1618. There are old customs in many cathedrals; one is that mentioned just now of presenting the money collected at the offertory kneeling; that is not the case at Carlisle?—No.

1619. Bowing towards the Communion table as the canons and dean go out, does that exist?—It exists in one instance, certainly.

1620. But not on the part of the Dean and Chapter generally?—On the part of a minor canon.

1621. But it is not the custom of the cathedral?—No, not of the cathedral body. It is the custom of an individual.

1622. Do you place the bread and wine on the Holy table before the celebration?—Yes, the sub-sacrist does that.

1623. The sub-sacrist is a singing man?—Yes.

1624. Is there any credence table?—No.

1625. Is there any place that looks as if it ever had been a credence table?—No, none.

1626. Do you suppose there ever was a credence table?—I cannot say; I have never seen any.

1627. There is nothing like one remaining?—No.

1628. With regard to these copes have they ever been examined by an antiquarian society?—Yes.

1629. What age did they pronounce them to be?—That I do not know exactly.

1630. Is it possible they may be 300 years old?—I cannot tell. They might, by their appearance, be 300 years old.

1631. There is nothing to prove that they were worn 100 years ago?—No.

1632. That is mere conjecture?—Mere conjecture. We have no evidence at all on the subject of their use.

1633. Do you think it likely, if they had ever been worn, they would ever have been dropped by so stationary a body as the dean and canons?—I am no judge of my predecessors.

1634. You say the working classes as a body do not come to the cathedral?—No, not as much as I could wish.

1635. But you have large congregations at times in the cathedral?—Regularly, good congregations; but they are chiefly of the middle class—shopmen and people of that kind—not actually mechanics.

1636. Do you preach in the afternoon?—Always.

1637. Is that service more largely attended than the morning service?—Yes, it is very fairly attended.

1638. Perhaps the preaching more than anything else brings them there?—I am no judge of that.

1639. The persons who frequent the cathedral generally absent themselves from their parish churches of course?—Not those that come in the afternoon. That is why the afternoon congregation is larger than the morning one; it is not simply the preaching, but there is no service in the afternoon in Carlisle except in the cathedral, and one lecture, which your lordship may remember, in St. Cuthbert's; therefore persons who attend their parish churches in the morning are at liberty to come to the cathedral in the afternoon, and that makes the congregation better.

1640. But the regular cathedral service cannot be attended by any persons in the morning unless they absent themselves from their parish churches?—No.

1641. There is no precinct so large as to make a congregation?—No.

1642. Nothing but the families of the dean and canons?—Nothing.

The witness withdrew.

The Hon. and Very Rev. the DEAN OF YORK called, and examined.

Dean of York

1643. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) How many years have you been the Dean of York?—Nine years.

1644. Have any changes taken place in the cathedral services since you became dean?—They have been made rather fuller. The members of the choir have been enlarged, and the services have been rather increased.

1645. How have the services been increased?—Previous to my appointment there was no afternoon sermon at any time of the year. There is now an afternoon sermon from Michaelmas to Lady Day.

1646. What are the services on Sundays?—The services on Sundays are three services during the winter and two at this period of the year.

1647. At what time are those services?—Last winter they were at half-past ten, four, and half-past seven.

1648. The service at half-past seven is in the nave, I believe?—In the nave.

1649. At these services, is the nave well filled?—Remarkably.

1650. About what is the number on the average?—They average not less than 2,000 and sometimes 3,000.

1651. What are your week-day services?—The week-day services are two full morning and evening prayer, the former at ten o'clock in the morning and the latter at four in the afternoon.

1652. How are these attended?—The morning service is attended indifferently. The hour is not a convenient hour for people in business; but the afternoon service is remarkably well attended all the year through.

1653. Have you sermons on the saints' days?—No. We had sermons on saints' days, but they were not attended at all, and it was considered rather an injury to the attendance than otherwise; and at the request of several of the regular attendants, the saints' days' sermons were transferred to the Sunday afternoon. Since that, certainly, the congregation has rather increased on the saints' days than otherwise. We have also on certain saints' days the Holy Communion.

1654. What are those saints' days?—The Circumcision, the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin, St. Peter's, All Saints' Day, and Holy Thursday. On the latter a sermon has been preached from time immemorial.

1655. What is the attendance at the Sunday morning service?—Very good indeed.

1656. And on Sunday afternoons?—The Sunday services in the cathedral have been always remarkably well attended.

1657. I think you said you had increased the singers?—Yes.

1658. In what proportion?—When I came to York they had been reduced to the lowest possible standard, namely, three men and five boys.

1659. On each side?—On each side. Now we have six men and seven boys, and occasionally eight, on each side.

1660. Have you choral Communion sometimes?—On the first Sunday in the month.

1661. Where is the singing introduced?—It is merely the Sanctus and the Gloria in excelsis.

1662. When the short exhortation in the Holy Communion is used, at those words, "draw near with faith," do the whole congregation advance towards the communion table?—No; they come to the chancel steps, as they are called, at the commencement of the Communion service, immediately after the Prayer for the Church militant, at the time the non-communicants retire.

1663. Are there candlesticks on your Communion table?—Yes.

1664. When are the candles lighted?—There are no candles in them.

1665. (Bishop of London.) You do not wear a cope?—No.

1666. Are there any in the cathedral?—No; we have a cope chest, but we have no cope.

1667. You have no means of knowing whether such a thing has been worn of late years, within the last 100 years?—I should think not.

1668. What is the mode in which the elements are placed on the holy table?—They are placed there before the service begins.

1669. You do not consider that the rubric obliges you to have them placed at a particular time in the middle of the service?—I am not prepared to say that.

1670. At all events it is not done?—It is a matter of convenience more than anything else.

1671. What position does the officiating minister, the celebrant, occupy at the consecration of the elements?—I myself, when I take that part of the service, read the commandments and the first part of the Communion service at the north end of the Communion table. At the commencement of the consecration prayer I arrange the elements, and I then read the consecration prayer in the centre of the table with my back to the congregation.

1672. Is that followed by all the canons or is it left to the discretion of each one?—I leave it to their discretion; and I do not positively know how it is, but I believe some do and some do not.

1673. In fact there is a good deal of following of custom in the cathedral?—Yes.

1674. It is not so much the rubrics or the canons, but the custom of the cathedral?—I, individually, endeavour to adhere to the rubric as closely as I can.

1675. You said there are large congregations at the cathedral, does that affect the congregations in the parish churches?—I am hardly able to answer that question. I have heard it commented upon in both ways. Some think that it does and some think that it does not.

1676. They must be persons who have parish churches to go to, of course?—The nave services, in my private opinion, make very little difference to the congregations in the parish churches; because, since they have been held in the evening of the Sunday, they have been attended almost exclusively by the working classes and working men, nine tenths of whom, I have been assured from various quarters, never go to any other place of worship at all.

1677. What is the order of preachers; who preaches at these services?—We have a succession of preachers. Sometimes the canons, sometimes myself, and sometimes strangers.

1678. Has it been customary for a long time to introduce strangers to preach in the cathedral?—No, not until the nave services were established.

1679. In the choir, I presume, nobody preaches except the dean or another member of the Chapter?—Very rarely.

1680. (Dean of Westminster.) Do persons who intend to receive the Holy Communion signify their names to you beforehand?—No.

1681. Have you any grounds for not observing that rubric?—We have no power of carrying it out.

1682. Do any instances occur to your memory of repelling anyone from the Communion?—No, never.

1683. Where does the Communion table stand?—It stands underneath the altar screen.

1684. Is that at the east end of the church?—Not at the extreme east end, but the east end with the exception of the Lady Chapel.

1685. Do you read the Athanasian creed?—No.

1686. Is it used in the church?—Always upon the days appointed.

1687. Is it read or sung?—Sung.

1688. By whom is it sung?—By the choir.

Canon of York.
June 1867.

1689. Not by the minister?—By the minor canons.
1690. Is it by the minor canons or by the singing men?—Both.

1691. (Sir R. J. Phillimore.) Can you tell us at all what the amount of your offertory is in the year?—Last year it was 472*l.*

1692. Have you upon that formed any opinion as to whether the cathedral service attracts the poorer classes in York?—Certainly.

1693. You think it does?—There is no question about it.

1694. You have no credence table, I suppose, from what you have said?—No credence table at all.

1695. Does there appear to be any ledge in the wall or anything of that sort where it might be used?—No, I think not.

1696. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) Have you any early morning service on week days or on Sundays?—On the great festivals we have an early communion.

1697. Do you read the morning prayers early on week-days or Sundays?—No, except upon rare occasions. I have had an 8 o'clock service previous to Convocation opening.

1698. Is there a cross on your altar or on the reredos?—No.

1699. Is there anything remaining in the cathedral of that kind?—I think not.

1700. You said you had no copes remaining?—No, there are no copes.

1701. Is there any record of when they were last used in your cathedral at all?—Yes, I think there is, but I am afraid I cannot give you any very accurate statement upon it; not since the Reformation, I believe.

1702. Are there any old customs remaining in your cathedral about using extra lights at particular festivals, as for instance, Easter or Christmas?—None at all.

1703. Have you more than one covering for the altar?—Yes, we have three.

1704. What are the colours;—One is a dark violet, for Lent; one is green, and the other is an old crimson one which I found there.

1705. What is your authority for using those colours?—I have no authority to give. They happened to be presents to the cathedral; one of them I found there.

1706. In fact you think you may exercise your choice as to the colours?—I do not think I am acting contrary to law.

1707. I think you were not asked whether you had any stoles in use in your cathedral for the minister?—The clergy generally wear either the stole or a scarf.

1708. Are they black or of different colours?—Black.

1709. All black?—All black.

1710. Is there any ornament upon them of any kind?—None at all.

1711. Do you begin the morning or evening prayer with any psalm or anthem or hymn?—No.

1712. Is there any hymn or anthem sung at all in the course of the Communion service?—No.

1713. Does any old custom exist of singing, for instance, the Agnus Dei?—I think not.

1714. Are there any alterations made in the appointed lessons?—No.

1715. Is the Apocrypha used in its order?—We use the calendar as it is appointed.

1716. Is the Apocrypha omitted by any of the canons?—No; we use the Apocrypha for two months in the year.

1717. Whenever it is ordered?—Whenever it is ordered.

1718. Is the collect for a festival used on a vigil or eve according to the rubric?—Always.

1719. Have you any marriages in your cathedral?—None.

1720. Is notice always given after the Nicene Creed of the saints' days and other days?—No, not from the altar steps.

1721. There is a notice given but not from the altar?—Occasionally there is a printed notice.

1722. No formal notice given by one of the ministers?—None.

1723. I do not think you have been asked how often the Holy Communion is celebrated in your cathedral?—Every Sunday, on Holy Thursday on four saints' days, and twice on the festivals.

1724. Have you any early communion on a Sunday?—On Whit Sunday, on Christmas Day, and on Easter Sunday.

1725. What is your practice with regard to giving notice of the Communion; do you use either of the exhortations after the Nicene Creed, or do you give some general notice in your own words?—In former days when there was only a monthly Communion—I am now speaking of the time before my connexion with the cathedral occurred—there was the ordinary notice which is given in parish churches. Since the weekly Communion has been established no notice is given.

1726. Do you use both the longer and the shorter exhortation at the time of celebration?—Yes, every Sunday.

1727. Is there any objection made to persons who are not going to communicate remaining in the cathedral, or may they do so if they please?—I take no notice. It is occasionally done; but very rarely.

1728. Are there any baptisms in your cathedral?—None at all.

1729. In fact, you have no sort of parochial duties connected with it?—No; it is not a parish church in any way.

1730. (Rev. R. Gregory.) How many communicants are there at the Communion; what is the average?—Last winter they averaged every Sunday about 40, and on the first Sunday in the month they were, I think, somewhere about 70.

1731. And on high festivals?—Last Easter we had 200.

1732. In what vestments do you preach?—Surplice, hood, and stole.

1733. What prayer do you use before the sermon?—The bidding prayer.

1734. (Rev. H. Venn.) Is there in York the same intense love among the working classes for choral services which there used to be, I mean generally?—I think the love is very intense. I am not able to say, because I am not able to speak from my own testimony as to what it used to be.

1735. It is a characteristic of the York working classes?—Peculiarly so.

1736. Have they not choral societies among themselves?—Yes, they have a very flourishing choral society.

1737. And the working classes take part in the congregation with the choir?—To a certain extent.

1738. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) Your attention has no doubt been called to the rubric: "And here is to be noted, that such ornaments of the church, and of the ministers thereof at all times of their ministration, shall be retained, and be in use, as were in this Church of England, by the authority of Parliament, in the second year of the reign of King Edward the Sixth;" do you obey that rubric?—No, I must say I do not.

1739. What are your grounds for not obeying it?—I believe if I was to obey it, I ought to wear, according to the canon, a cope, the cope over the surplice or alb; and I am not prepared to say that if I were ordered to do it I should refuse.

1740. Not being ordered to do it you do not conceive yourself bound to revive it?—I do not feel at this present moment disposed to raise the question.

1741. (Bishop of Gloucester.) How many times is the Holy Communion administered in the cathedral?—Every Sunday, and on the festivals twice.

1742. (Earl Beauchamp.) Something has been said about customs remaining in the cathedrals; I believe I am correct in saying that the custom in the Cathedral Church of York, many years ago, was that Holy Communion should only be celebrated once a month?—That was the custom.

1743. And that in consequence of an injunction of Archbishop Harcourt the Dean and Chapter were compelled to obey the rubric which prescribes a weekly celebration?—It was so.

1744. The custom was of no value; when the visitor enforced the law it was found not to be a valid excuse against the injunction of the archbishop?—Certainly it was not.

1745. (Bishop of Oxford.) Have you ever found in experience that any offence has been given by the mode which you mentioned of consecrating with your back to the people?—No, not the slightest.

1746. Have you noticed whether the good attendance at your cathedral is only owing to the Yorkshire people's love of music, or whether it appears to you to be a religious act, from your observation of them?—I should say very strongly a religious act.

1747. Not simply to hear the music?—No.

1748. Do you find by experience that the mode of consecrating that you mentioned prevents your being heard at all?—Not the least.

1749. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) Is the mixed chalice used?—No.

REV. ROBERT GREGORY.
REV. T. W. PERRY.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY IN THE CHAIR.

Rev. JOHN EDWARD KEMPE, M.A. called in and examined.

1750. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) You are the rector of St. James's, Westminster?—I am.

1751. How long have you been so?—For exactly 14 years.

1752. Can you state whether any changes have taken place in the order of the services since you have been there?—A few changes of a very trifling character; chiefly in the introduction of a larger musical element into the services. When I first came to St. James's there were no chants at all. There were only psalms or hymns sung, one after the morning prayer and the other before the sermon. Soon after I came into the parish I introduced the chanting of the canticles, and recently, within the last two years, we have also chanted the "Kyrie" after the Commandments. Within the last eight months we have introduced the chanting of the Psalms in the evening service.

1753. Not in the morning or afternoon services?—Not in the morning or afternoon.

1754. Do you find that change acceptable to the congregation?—It was, I think, very much the wish of the congregation that it should be done. When I first came there was a remonstrance made about the chanting of the canticles. A very influential member of my congregation called upon me and expressed some misgivings. He said that he did not object to the thing itself, but that he thought it might be a first step towards further changes, which he very much deprecated. That is the only thing in the shape of an objection that I ever heard.

1755. With respect to the Communion office, do you introduce any singing there?—None at all.

1756. You never have done so?—No.

1757. What is the dress in which you officiate?—Surplice and hood. I wear a scarf also.

1758. A plain scarf?—A plain scarf, being a chaplain. But I wore it before I was a chaplain. I found the scarf in use in the church, and I had been in the habit of using it in the diocese of London from my first coming into it, and I continued it as a matter of course.

1759. Have you any anthems in any of your services?—No, never.

1760. In the celebration of the Holy Communion, at what time do you place the elements on the table?—Immediately after the collecting of the alms, and before the Prayer for the Church militant. The elements, unconsecrated, are already on the table, but I transfer from the rear of the table, as it were, from a sort of super-altar, such quantity as may be necessary for the number of communicants, both of the bread and of the wine.

1761. And in consecrating the elements where do you stand?—At the north side.

1762. At the north end, in fact?—Yes.

1763. In the Communion office do you read both the exhortations, the longer and the shorter one?—Yes, both.

1764. And when the shorter one is used do your congregation advance bodily towards the Communion table or remain in their seats, and come up as they communicate?—They remain in their seats till they come up to communicate.

1765. With respect to the Prayer for the Church militant, do you use it on Sunday morning when there is no celebration of the Holy Communion?—No, never.

1766. How do you justify that?—Merely by custom.

1767. Have you any candlesticks on your Communion table?—None; excepting in the winter when it is very dark. We then use some candlesticks which have been in the Church for a great many years—three branch candlesticks—merely for the sake of light; for no other purpose. They do not remain on the Communion table afterwards.

1768. What week-day services have you?—Morning prayer daily at 8 o'clock. On saints' days, morning prayer, with the Communion service, again at 11; and on Fridays, morning prayer with the Litany again at 11. On Wednesdays we have a special service for the police force, the litany and an address at a quarter past 12.

*Rev.
J. E. Kempe
M.A.*

1 July 1867

Rev.
J. E. Kempe,
M.A.
July 1867.

1769. Do you observe all the saints' days and holy days?—We observe all the saints' days and holy days.

1770. On which of those saints' days or holy days have you a sermon?—On none excepting Ascension Day, Good Friday, Christmas Day, and Ash Wednesday. On Ash Wednesday we divide the service, taking a portion of it at 8 o'clock and the rest at the 11 o'clock service; morning prayer at 8; and the Litany, Communion, and Communion service, with the sermon, at 11.

1771. On any of these occasions is the Holy Communion celebrated; I mean, on the saints' days and holy days?—Not on account of their being saints' days.

1772. Of course whenever there is a preface in the Communion service for a special occasion you do celebrate it?—We do not celebrate the Holy Communion on saints' days, as such.

1773. But on Ascension Day, Easter Day, and Christmas Day?—Yes.

1774. You celebrate the Holy Communion whenever there is a preface proper for the day?—On all those days for which there is a preface.

1775. (Dean of Westminster.) Did you find the daily service in use when you came or did you introduce it?—I found it. It has been, I believe, in existence ever since the church was first opened. There were three daily services when I first came; there was a service at 11 o'clock in the morning and at 3 o'clock in the afternoon as well as the morning service at 8 o'clock.

1776. How many attendants are there at the morning service generally?—It varies very much indeed; at this time of year there are sometimes from 20 to 30, but in the winter the attendance does not average more than five or six.

1777. Is the Athanasian Creed read or sung?—It is always read, but we have been thinking of singing it. It has not been done yet.

1778. Has it always been the custom to read it in the time of your predecessors?—Yes.

1779. Is it read on all the days when it is ordered?—Yes. It might be by accident omitted, but it is intended that it should be read.

1780. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) Do you preach in a black gown or surplice?—The gown always.

1781. You said you had no lights on the altar; do you happen to know whether there were any in the time of your predecessors?—I have no reason to think there were any. The only lights I know of are those I referred to,—simply brass candlesticks with three branches, evidently intended only for the purpose of giving light.

1782. You do not know of any belonging to the church?—I do not know of any. I do not think any exist or have ever existed.

1783. Do you divide the services on the Sunday morning or are the Morning Prayer, the Litany, and the Communion Service all said together?—The Morning Prayer, Litany, and Communion Service are said together.

1784. How do you distribute the elements; are they given severally to each person?—Yes.

1785. Are the words repeated to each?—Yes.

1786. What number of communicants may you have on ordinary Sundays?—We have a Communion every Sunday—at 8 o'clock in the morning on the second, fourth, and fifth Sundays (if there be a fifth Sunday); and at the noon-day service on the first and third Sundays in the month. I should say that the average number at the early Communion, taking it all the year round, is from 20 to 25. The average number at the other Communion, taking it all the year round, is from 80 to 90. The numbers have considerably diminished of late, I think from the habit of persons going out of town on the Sunday.

1787. Have you found any inconvenience at all from repeating the words to each person?—No inconvenience arises; because having three curates I have a large staff, but I suppose at a large Easter Communion, with two or three hundred communicants, there might be inconvenience if the number of ministering clergymen were not so large.

1788. The late Communion on Easter Day is attended by about 300?—No; the two Communions—early and noon-day together—used to exceed 300—but not for the last four or five years.

1789. Can you account for that decrease?—I account for it, as I say, by the increasing habit of persons going out of town for vacations, and on the Sundays, also.

1790. How many have you at the Christmas Communion?—We have two Communions always on the great festivals; at 8 o'clock, and again at noon. I should think, as far as I can recollect, we may now have 40 or 50 at the early Communion on Christmas Day, and about 100 or 120 at the noon-day Communion.

1791. What is the population of your district or parish?—It is difficult to say, because there are conventional districts cut out of the parish church district, but the district connected with the parish church, exclusive of the conventional districts connected with two chapels within the parish, is about 12,000.

1792. When you say "conventional" you mean they have not been legally assigned?—Yes; one of them is a district of about 5,000 and the other of about 2,000.

1793. Which of your services do you find the poor attend most?—I should say the evening service on Sundays. There is a fair sprinkling of them at the other services. They are almost equally divided between the morning, afternoon, and evening services, but the greater number is in the evening.

1794. Have you any public catechizing?—In Lent always I have public catechizing, on Friday afternoons.

1795. But not every Sunday?—No.

1796. What class of persons come to the catechizing?—There is a general invitation issued throughout the parish, but it is never responded to. Therefore I am obliged to supply the material from the schools.

1797. (Mr. Cardwell.) Long acquaintance with St. James's probably enables you to say what the feeling of your parishioners would be with regard to the introduction of what are called the vestments?—I think the parish would be unbearable if I were to attempt it.

1798. (Rev. R. Gregory.) How many persons does your church hold?—Sir Christopher Wren estimated it at 2,000, but I should think the church would be very full with 1,200 or 1,500.

1799. About how much do the offertories amount to during the course of the year; the offertories and collections for all purposes?—I am not prepared to say. You mean including collections for charity sermons?

1800. Yes, for all charitable purposes?—From 1,200*l.* to 1,400*l.* a year.

1801. You say that in the evening you have a musical service; is that a service at which the middle-class, the tradesman class of persons, attend chiefly?—Yes, almost entirely.

1802. Are not the seats at St. James's so allocated that the gentry have them in the morning and afternoon, and only the tradesman class in the evening?—There is an arrangement made under an Act of Parliament which was brought in by Bishop Blomfield by which the seats are let again for a very small rent in the evening—at half-a-crown a sitting; and a good many sittings are let; but it cannot be said to have been a success. I think it produces on an average from 40*l.* to 50*l.* a year, but many of the seats are let again to those who rent them for the morning and afternoon services, not so much because they desire to occupy them as because they desire to have the complete command over them.

1803. My point was, do you find a musical service more attractive to persons of the tradesman class than a plainly read service?—The musical service has not been introduced long enough for me to say that. I found it, was very attractive in some of the district churches, and a wish was expressed on the part of some of the congregation that we should introduce the chanting of the Psalms; that is the only difference that has been made in the parish church; but as far as I can see it has made no impression on the congregation; but the time for trying it has not been favourable, because at this time of year the congregations in the evening are not so large as they are when the evenings are shorter.

1804. (Dr. Payne Smith.) Do you use the stole?—I do not myself, but my curates do.

1805. You probably wear a scarf?—I wear a scarf.

1806. And is the stole that your curates wear black or of various colours?—Plain black.

1807. In the same way, as regards the Lord's table, do you have various colours or only one colour?—Only one.

1808. And that colour is red?—Yes, it is merely a cloth on the top.

1809. Have you ever been requested by any member of your congregation to make any change towards more ornate services?—No, never.

1810. Your congregations are perfectly satisfied with your present method of conducting the service?—I have every reason to hope so.

1811. To the best of your belief?—To the best of my belief.

1812. (Dr. Twiss.) What do you mean by musical service?—Chanting more than was customary. When I first came there used to be simply, as I said, psalms and hymns sung, now we chant the canticles and the Psalms; nothing more than that.

1813. You chant the portions which may be "said or sung"?—Not the creeds. The creeds are to be "sung or said" as you are aware, but we do not chant them.

1814. You chant nothing but what may be "said or sung" according to the rubric?—Nothing else.

1815. What do you mean by half-a-crown a sitting; half-a-crown for the whole year?—Half-a-crown per annum.

1816. In fact, a sort of payment for retaining the seat?—For retaining the seat.

1817. Can you without difficulty explain the distinction between the scarf which you wear and the black stole?—The stole worn under that name by my curates, is a broad strip of silk not folded in any way. The scarf is a double silk folded round and sewn together. That is the only difference.

1818. Are they different appreciably to look at?—If you examine them pretty closely they are certainly. One is much smaller than the other.

1819. (Mr. J. Abel Smith.) Do the labouring poor attend St. James's?—Not very much.

1820. Do you know whether they go anywhere?—They do not go more to the district churches than they do to the parish church, but I think they go quite as much; there is a sad want of attendance on the part of the labouring poor.

1821. Are there any large dissenting chapels in the neighbourhood?—There is one large dissenting chapel called Craven Chapel, and there is also a Scotch church.

1822. Is it largely attended by the poor?—I have no reason to believe it is even so largely attended as the churches connected with the Established Church.

1823. Is there any church in your district in which what are called ritualistic practices prevail?—In my parish?

1824. Yes?—I should not call them ritualistic practices, but there is a church in which the choral service has been and is being very fully carried out.

1825. Do you think that attracts or repels the poor?—I think that it attracts them. It is a church the circumstances of which are peculiar. From the time of its erection until recently, no form of service whatever appeared to attract the poor into it, although built in the midst of an extremely poor district. We had men of considerable preaching power there.

They attracted certain congregations, but not the poor to any adequate extent.

1826. Have you any objection to mention where it is?—In Berwick Street, St. Luke's church. Mr. Brookfield preached there for some time; and when I came to St. James's there was a Mr. Jones there who was an attractive preacher. They collected congregations mostly from without the district, but never, I think, a thorough representation of the poor of the district. The present incumbent (also named Jones) has introduced a full choral service, and the effect has certainly been very marked. A large portion of the congregation, no doubt, is drawn from without; but there is a much larger attendance of the poor of the district than, so far as I can ascertain, ever was found before in the church.

1827. Do you know how often the services there are held?—They are the regular services of the church, Sunday morning and evening; and I think there is an afternoon service, but that is a subordinate service.

1828. You mentioned £2000 or 1,4000 a year as being the produce of the offertory at St. James's; does that include charity sermons?—Including charity sermons.

1829. You do not at all recollect how much there is strictly speaking in the offertory, at the Holy Communion?—On an average nearly 3000 a year.

1830. I suppose that goes in matters of charity?—A great portion of it is devoted to the clothing of the boys of a school which appears to have been founded in days when there were very few poor and a great number of rich in the parish; and when they did not know what to do with the offertory money. A school was founded called the "offertory school," and the boys of that school, eighty of them, are clothed with the offertory money, and that absorbs now the greater portion of it.

1831. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) You have not told us how many absolutely free sittings there are in St. James's?—Absolutely free, about 500.

1832. Do any pew holders give up their pews so as to be virtually free sittings when they do not use them?—Not formally, but practically they are given up. They are not filled up until a certain time after the service has commenced.

1833. Practically speaking, there are more than 500 sittings for the people who drop into the evening service?—Yes, many more.

1834. And they make good use of them?—In certain times of the year very good use. At this time of the year the church is thinly attended in the evening. People go out to walk in the parks.

1835. You informed us that you had only one cloth for the Lord's table; do we gather from that that you make no difference in Lent?—In Lent we have a black cloth.

1836. Then you have red for ordinary occasions, and black in Lent?—Yes.

1837. Do you cover the table with a linen cloth only on the top, or all over?—Only on the top.

1838. You informed us that at the prayer of consecration you stand at the north end; may I ask whether you have adopted that because you found it customary, or from a consideration of the rubrics?—Entirely from custom.

1839. You have not considered that the Prayer Book of 1549 orders the priest "to stand humbly before the midst of the altar;" that there is no similar direction in the three intermediate Prayer Books, and that that of 1662 puts in the novel direction about the priest standing before the table?—I am not unaware of all those circumstances, but I thought that custom over-rode them all.

1840. You adopt that position from custom?—From custom entirely.

1841. Have you any consecrated churches or chapels of ease in your own district, putting aside the conventional districts?—One; St. Philip's, Regent Street.

1842. Is it under your immediate direction?—No.

Rev.
J. E. Kempe,
M.A.

1 July 1867.

1843. You do not hold yourself responsible for the character and number of the services there?—Not at all.

1844. From your own personal responsibility you only answer for St. James's itself?—I only answer for St. James's itself.

1845. What class of life are the attendants at the early Sunday Communions?—Every class that exists in the parish.

1846. Do you find a special attendance of poor at all at the earlier or the mid-day Communion?—The poor people, so far as they come at all, come more at the mid-day than at the early Communion. There are seldom any poor at the early Communion.

1847. Do you think people come to Communion when it is a short service who would be deterred by the length and consequent fatigue when it follows the whole morning service?—I have no means of answering that question, because I think that the early hour deters them, without any reference to the length of the service.

1848. You have no independent litanies except on a week day; never on a Sunday?—Never on a Sunday.

1849. (Earl of Harrowby.) How long has St. Luke's choral service been in operation?—About four years now, I think.

1850. Can you tell me what is the cost of your music and how that cost is defrayed?—We pay 50*l.* a year out of the pew rents to the choir, 25*l.* to the choir master, and 25*l.* for music and for sundry miscellaneous expenses.

1851. Has the introduction of the chanting of the canticles and the Psalms added 100*l.* a year to your expenses?—No, it has added nothing.

1852. It does not make any difference?—No; the choir were there and were very willing; in fact, rather desired it.

1853. It made no difference in your expenses?—No; but in the case of St. Luke's, to which I referred, it has made a considerable difference.

1854. Have you any information upon that point as to the expense of St. Luke's?—I think I could give general information. I do not pretend that it is very accurate.

1855. What should you say the cost is there?—I should think the cost of the choir is 100*l.* a year, as far as I can ascertain.

1856. (Dean of Ely.) With regard to the use of what are called the vestments, and incense, and the like, have you any knowledge as to the present increase or decrease of the practice?—No knowledge beyond what I derive from sources open to every one.

1857. (Earl of Harrowby.) In regard to St. Luke's, are there incense or vestments there?—No; merely choral service.

1858. (Dean of Ely.) Have you any knowledge as to the absolute extent of ritualism at this present time. I mean the extent of the use of the vestments and incense?—None that is peculiar to myself; none but what everybody else has.

1859. Have you any knowledge as to the increasing taste for a musical service?—Yes, decidedly; so far as my own parish is concerned I should say that it is a taste that is very rapidly increasing and extending itself very widely; and I have had some remarkable illustrations of the manner in which it extends to those who are extremely sensitive about what is called ritualism and what may be considered to be Romanizing tendencies in service; how those persons, almost in the same breath, have expressed their warm approval of choral service and their strong disapproval of what are called ritualistic practices.

1860. Then, drawing the distinction between what may be called for shortness' sake a ritualistic service and a choral service, you say that there is a strongly increasing taste for the latter, though you are not able to speak as to the former?—I think there is, decidedly.

1861. Is that feeling shared in by the poor people?—Not to the same extent, I think, as amongst the better class, but I think it is an increasing feeling amongst them.

1862. I think it has been said in evidence on some former occasion, that the taste rather belonged to the upper and lowest classes, and was not so much shared in by the middle class; do you confirm that?—I think the middle class share it to the full.

1863. You mean that they have a strong desire for a good musical service?—Yes, as far as I can judge, quite as much as the upper classes, if not more.

1864. I think you spoke of the seats being let in St. James's; are they let under a special Act of Parliament?—The evening sittings are.

1865. But are the sittings let for the morning and afternoon services?—That is a question that at one time agitated the parish a great deal, and there is a very great deal of difficulty in answering it. I cannot answer it, and very eminent lawyers are divided about it.

1866. You can answer whether they are let?—They are let, but whether legally or not it is impossible for me to say. There is no doubt that a letting up to a certain point is legal, because the Act of Parliament by which the parish is constituted expressly provides that a certain sum (30*l.* a year) shall be paid out of the pew rents; but the question is how far the pew rents may be legal, how far their legality may extend.

1867. (Rev. W. G. Humphry.) At St. Luke's, Berwick Street, is the choral service a completely choral service from beginning to end or only the chanting of the Psalms?—Completely choral from beginning to end, and with a surpliced choir.

1868. Can you tell me if there is anything peculiar in the doctrine that is preached at St. Luke's church?—Certainly, it is not what is generally considered to be symbolised by ritualism.

1869. Would it be the reverse; could you classify it at all as having anything peculiar to it?—I should rather call it broad church.

1870. A combination of the broad church teaching with choral service?—Yes.

1871. You say that you wear a scarf with your surplice; do you wear it also with the gown in preaching?—Yes.

1872. The same scarf?—Yes.

1873. Could you refer to authority for wearing it with the gown?—I never have taken pains to seek any authority for it. It is a matter of custom.

1874. And the same with regard to wearing it with the surplice?—Yes.

1875. Do you deliver the cup always into the hand of each communicant?—Always.

1876. Do you ever find that any decline to receive it?—Never, upon any ground that I could understand to involve a principle. There have been paralysed persons whose hands shook so that they could not receive it.

1877. Have you reason to believe that any of your parishioners are attracted away to what are called ritualistic churches?—Yes, I believe some are, but not many for the population.

1878. You have never had an application made to you to establish such service yourself?—Never. The reason that has been given to me for persons attending the Chapel Royal, for instance, in preference to the parish church, is that it was a choral service, not that it was ritualistic.

1879. (Bishop of Gloucester.) You have daily service in your church at St. James's?—Yes.

1880. Do you terminate it, as I have heard it is sometimes terminated, at the end of the third collect?—No, never.

1881. Do you, when the Apocrypha is appointed to be read, make any change in the lessons, or read those which are appointed?—I read those which are appointed.

1882. Could you tell me whether the same rules prevail as to St. Luke's, Berwick Street; is there, for instance, daily service there?—Yes.

1883. And your other answers would also apply to St. Luke's?—I should think so, but I cannot answer for that.

1884. Could you tell me the number of the morning congregation at the daily service?—I mentioned that at this time of the year it was 20 or 30, but in the winter and out of the season it is much smaller.

1885. (Earl Beauchamp.) I believe you are chaplain to the Bishop of London?—No, I am chaplain to the Queen.

1886. That entitles you to wear the scarf?—Yes, but I wore it before I was chaplain to the Queen.

1887. Do you preach in the gown?—Always in the gown.

1888. Why?—It has been customary. I never have preached in a surplice, except I found it was the custom of the church. I found the use of the gown prevailed at St. James's and I continued it. I believed it was the prevailing custom of the Church of England.

1889. You celebrate the Holy Communion in a surplice?—Yes.

1890. On the ground of custom as well?—Yes.

1891. You have not formed any opinion on the legality of the use of the gown in the pulpit or the surplice in the Communion?—No. The question was presented to me very early in my ministry by a very eminent man, Archdeacon Vincent Bayley, whose curate I was. I have a letter of his in my pocket in which he refers to the law on the matter, but I never could find out upon what ground he rested it. He says that an incumbent should preach in his surplice, but no one but an incumbent has a right to preach in a surplice.

1892. Did I understand you to say there were 500 free seats in St. James's church?—Quite as many as that.

1893. Does that include the accommodation for the school children?—We have no school children in the church at all. It includes the accommodation which would be for the children if they were there.

1894. In the galleries?—The gallery which was once appropriated to the school children is now occupied by the choir.

1895. Is that included in the 500 free sittings?—Yes; but that gallery does not hold more than 40.

1896. Where are the other free sittings?—Some of them run down the centre of the church and some are under the gallery. Others are at the north-west and south-west doors. Others run up the sides of the aisles. In fact they are dispersed all over the church in various places. The best portion of the church, the very centre of all, contains about 120 free sittings.

1897. Are they occupied by the labouring classes?—Very little.

1898. I think you told us there was an increasing taste for musical service. Do you find that your services at St. James's are better attended than they were; for instance, is the attendance at the Holy Communion increasing or decreasing?—Decreasing, I should say, certainly. It has nothing to do, I think, with the form of the service, but it has to do with the circumstances I mentioned before,—the habit of persons going out of town on the Sunday, the church being filled almost entirely by strangers, and a different set of people every Sunday.

1899. Is there any credence table?—There is no credence table.

1900. Why is there not?—I did not find one, and did not think it necessary to introduce it. I thought I sufficiently fulfilled the requirement of the rubric by placing the bread and wine required for consecration on the table at the [time appointed by the rubric; that is, immediately before the prayer for the Church militant.

1901. It is placed on the table?—The quantity that is required is placed there, a vessel containing the wine standing on a super-altar. I transfer from the larger vessel to smaller ones, that is to the chalices, so much of the wine as will be required for the number of persons that attend, and I transfer from a large dish to the patens so much bread as will be required. I place upon the table as much as will be required of both elements.

1902. It was placed there before?—I do not pretend to justify the practice, except by saying that I found it, and it seemed to me satisfactory.

1903. Can you tell us at all the class of persons who go to St. Luke's, Berwick Street, as choristers?—I should think they are young men employed in shops during the week and boys in schools.

1904. Have you any habitual attendants at St. James's corresponding with the young men who form the choir at St. Luke's, Berwick Street?—Yes; a large number, in the evening service particularly.

1905. Any on Sunday morning?—A fair sprinkling, I should say, but not a large number.

1906. And regular attendants?—Some but not all regular attendants.

1907. You said there was no singing in the Communion office. That followed an answer that you had introduced yourself the singing of the "Kyrie"?—I understood the question to refer to that portion of the service which is only used when the Holy Communion is administered.

1908. Does that include the offertory sentences and the prayer for the Church militant?—No; we do not read those on Sundays when the Holy Communion is not celebrated.

1909. What do you mean by the Communion office?—I mean that portion which generally follows the sermon, commencing with the offertory and going on to the administration of the Holy Eucharist.

1910. When you celebrate the Holy Communion early, do you begin with the Lord's Prayer?—Yes.

1911. (Bishop of Oxford.) Have you introduced the custom of evening Communion?—No.

1912. Is it introduced into any of the churches depending upon St. James's, under you?—It has been introduced into St. Philip's, Regent Street; but I cannot say that St. Philip's is dependent upon me. I do not exercise any control over it.

1913. It has not been done there with your consent?—Not with my consent, nor in spite of any opposition of mine. I have expressed no feeling about it. I have no control over it.

1914. Have you met, in your own congregation or elsewhere, with any desire for a service with a higher ritual, though short of vestments?—No, certainly not.

1915. When you mentioned that a good deal of the best part of the church was given to the poor, did you refer to the free sittings in the centre?—In the centre. They are very unsatisfactory as sittings, but they are in the best part of the church.

1916. Am I wrong in gathering from your answer that really, in point of fact, the poor have the worst places in St. James's church?—I think they have; taking all things together, when the accommodation, is good, the situation is bad, and vice versa.

1917. Have you noticed any difference in the numbers, increasing or decreasing, at your early daily services?—On the whole, I think it has rather decreased.

1918. How many should you estimate it at?—I mentioned about 20 to 30 at this time of year, and in the winter about half a dozen.

1919. (Earl Stanhope.) In reply to a former question you mentioned a large chapel of Dissenters in your parish; but you were not asked to what sect of Dissenters it belonged?—They are Independents.

1920. Have you ever adopted the practice of mixing water with the wine in the Holy Communion?—Never.

1921. Can you trace the existence of daily morning service for many years past at St. James's?—I have reason to believe ever since the church was consecrated, but not at the present early hour.

Rev.
J. E. Kempe,
M.A.
1 July 1867.

1922. Was that not unusual in former times in the London churches?—I should not suppose that it was usual. It appears to have been Archbishop Tenison's desire. He was rector of St. Martin's at the time when St. James's was taken out of St. Martin's, and he endowed a chapel in the parish and made special provision for a daily service there. There is no provision for a daily service in the act of parliament constituting St. James's a parish; but I should think it was by the wish of Archbishop Tenison that the daily service was introduced. I judge from what he did in regard to the chapel of his own founding.

1923. There has been daily service as far back as you can trace?—Yes. In fact there was service three times a day when I came into the parish,—three o'clock in the afternoon, in addition to the morning service at 8 and again at 11; but I found that day after day nobody came either at 11 or at 3. I had an account taken of the number of persons who attended at 3, and I submitted that to Bishop Blomfield at the end of my first year, and consulted him as to the desirableness of continuing the service. He was of opinion that it was not desirable to continue it under those circumstances. I have tried it since then at later hours, but with very little if any success; and therefore I have abandoned it altogether except in Lent. During Lent, at half past five, I have evening prayer, and that is moderately well attended, by perhaps 10 or a dozen persons, but never more.

1924. (Archbishop of Armagh.) Are we to understand that your congregation is perfectly satisfied with the manner in which divine service is carried on in your church?—I have no reason at all to doubt it.

1925. No suggestions have been made by any considerable body or portion of the congregation for any change?—None whatever.

1926. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) Is the clerk in orders included in the three curates you said you had?—Yes.

The witness withdrew.

Rev. G. Nugee,
M.A.

THE REV. GEORGE NUGEE, M.A., called in and examined.

1927. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) You are, I believe, the incumbent of Wymering?—I am vicar of Wymering and rector of Widley.

1928. Are they two churches?—They are united benefices; two parishes with distinct vestries.

1929. A curate, I suppose, officiates in one church?—Yes; I have a school-chapel, and also what is called a fort-chapel. The Government allows me to use one of the casemated batteries in the Hilsea lines. I have four places of worship.

1930. Two parish churches?—Yes.

1931. Are the services in each of these churches exactly the same?—Not as regards the daily services. On Sundays they are identically the same as regards hours: matins half-past 10 in the morning, evensong at half-past 3. On week days the service at Wymering is daily celebration in the morning, daily matins, and daily evensong.

1932. And daily celebration of the Holy Communion?—Yes, for years past.

1933. What is the distance between the two churches?—I should think about a mile; it is about 25 minutes walk over the hill. Widley Church is on the north side of the hill, and Wymering is on the south side.

1934. How long have you been incumbent?—About nine years.

1935. Who was your predecessor?—My own brother. I am patron and incumbent.

1936. Did you make any alteration in the mode of conducting service?—Yes; the services too were merely one in each church on Sunday formerly; now there are about six or seven services every Sunday, not to mention daily services.

1937. Are the services on Sunday the same in each church?—They are in nearly every respect the same. The vestments are used in both churches.

1938. Will you state what the services are on Sunday?—An early celebration in the morning at 8 o'clock; matins at half-past 10, followed by Holy Communion and sermon; evensong at half-past 3. That is at Wymering.

1939. Is there any sermon?—There is a sermon in the afternoon too. At Widley there is service at half-past 10 and half-past 3, and a sermon at both services; and on the evening of Sunday I have a seven o'clock service at a school-chapel at Cosham, which holds three or four hundred people. It is a choral evensong.

1940. What are the week-day services?—Every morning at half-past 7, through winter and summer, there is a celebration; matins at half-past 8; evensong at 5; Litany at 12 on Wednesdays and Fridays.

1941. What is the population of Wymering?—The population of the united parishes is little under 2,000, which includes a few soldiers at Hilsea Barracks.

1942. What is the population of Wymering alone?—It is about half that; I cannot say exactly. I think Widley is a little more than Wymering.

1943. What numbers attend the morning celebration in the week day?—The communicants in the morning are mainly confined to the religious bodies that I have there,—the sisterhood and a few of the parishioners. I can scarcely tell the average, but I think it would be about 10.

1944. You spoke of a sisterhood; what is that?—There is a sisterhood and also a body of young men training for offices in the Church, and for mission work, and so on. There are about 12 of them.

1945. What vestments do you use?—The cope and chasuble. I have no vestments as yet for deacon and sub-deacon, because I have no use for them.

1946. When do you use the cope?—At marriages, at the Magnificat, and other processional occasions.

1947. You change the dress in the middle of the service?—Yes.

1948. Is there a pause in the service?—No; there is no pause at all in the course of the Magnificat.

1949. Do you go to the vestry?—Yes.

1950. There must be some pause then?—No; I move just before the lesson ends. It does not take a minute.

1951. Is your service choral throughout?—Yes, always throughout, except on certain plain days.

1952. What hymns do you use?—The Salisbury hymnal for the words. The hymn tunes I have collected from various quarters.

1953. Is music used in the celebration of the Holy Communion?—Yes; I may say we have three gradations; one is a perfectly plain service without any singing; the second is a sung service without an organ accompaniment; the third is a high celebration with organ accompaniment and sung throughout.

1954. When do you make these differences?—On an ordinary day, at early celebration, it is perfectly plain; on a minor festival of the church we sing the service without the organ accompaniment, and on great festivals we have the organ.

1955. What do you call the minor festivals?—Any of the black letter days of the English calendar.

1956. Will you mention them?—St. Swifthin's, or the Venerable Bede, or St. Cecilia, any that have been retained in the English calendar.

1957. At what time do you place the elements on the holy table?—At the proper place,—at the oblations.

1958. Where do you consecrate the elements? Where do you stand?—At the centre of the altar.

1959. How much of the Communion service do you pronounce with your back to the congregation?—Not very much; I usually stand round. I have not altered that habit very much in my church. At the consecration I certainly always have my back to the congregation. I read the epistle and gospel facing the people. Ritually my church is not very minute; I have retained the bolder features of ritual, but I have not adopted the very great minutiae of ritual.

1960. Where do you read the Prayer for the Church militant?—A little to the north side of the altar, not quite in the centre.

1961. The greater portion of the Communion service is read with your back to the congregation?—I always say the prayers with my back to the congregation.

1962. In what vestment do you preach?—In the alb and stole; it is what is called an alb-surplice; it is not a tight alb.

1963. Is there elevation of the consecrated elements in your church?—A slight elevation.

1964. What is the object of that?—Its Catholic use.

1965. You merely follow it as a custom without any meaning?—I myself certainly attach some meaning to it, but I do not regard it in a superstitious point of view that I am aware of. I do not wish to introduce it except as being a custom of the Church throughout the world, east and west.

1966. Have you any collections beside those of the offertory; any collections after sermons?—No, merely the offertory.

1967. What does your offertory amount to in the course of the year?—The offertory is about 2l. a week. From the very day I adopted the vestments the pence trebled themselves. I never knew what a poor man's penny was before, but from the very day I adopted the ritual of the Church the pence trebled themselves, and it is now really a considerable sum. That is a fact which rather startled me, and I thought it as well to mention it.

1968. I suppose all the sittings in your church are free?—It is a very ancient church, a thousand years old. There are plenty of free sittings and the whole church is regarded as quasi free, but sittings are assigned from time to time to the parishioners.

1969. Have you any music in the celebration of the Holy Communion?—Yes, on high festivals.

1970. In what part does it occur?—There is, of course, the Kyrie, the Introit, the Creed, the Sanctus, the Gloria in excelsis, and the Sursum corda. In fact, wherever music is available it is used.

1971. Do you confine yourself to the direction of the rubric as regards the singing or saying?—I think so. I do not know that I sing anywhere beyond where it is prescribed or permitted.

1972. Do you introduce any hymn in the Holy Communion?—During the communicating there is a soft hymn sung at times.

1973. You do not think that interrupts the devotion?—On the contrary, I think it increases it, and I have every reason to believe it.

1974. (Archbishop of Armagh.) When you introduced the vestments and changed the service, did any of your parishioners object?—No; I had no formal objection at all.

1975. Did any leave the church in consequence of your change of service?—Not, I think, in consequence of the vestments; I think the only thing to which there has been objections has been the incense. Some of my parishioners have spoken to me about that as not liking it, but they have never left the church on account of it.

1976. What authority is there for preaching in an alb? I suppose what you call an "alb-surplice" is an alb?—I do not know whether I may go into the law of the question; it is in reality a surplice that I preach in. I call it an alb-surplice simply because it is closer in the sleeves than usual.

1977. That appears to me to be a new vestment altogether; we have an alb and a surplice, but this is a kind of half and half?—You may call it a surplice if you please. I do not wear the cord round; I do not wear it as an alb; it is with a stole pendant; it is a surplice.

1978. You say your parishioners in Wymering are about 1,000?—Yes.

1979. How many attend morning service?—The church itself is, as I say, mainly attended by the religious bodies which I have established in my parish.

1980. I do not mean the early services but the second service on Sunday? There is a Communion early in the morning?—On Sundays it is as full as a church can be; each church holds 400 or 500 people. There used to be four people on a Sunday afternoon.

1981. (Earl Stanhope.) You have mentioned incense; will you explain your mode of using it?—I use it at the introit, at the oblations; I do not use it personally at the consecration.

1982. You state you received remonstrances or objections from some of your parishioners?—Only saying that they did not quite like incense, but now I think they are familiarised with it, and there is no difficulty raised; that was at starting.

1983. Have you adopted the practice of lights on the Lord's table?—For many years.

1984. You do not mean that you found it established?—No; my brother did not adopt them, but he was intending to adopt them.

1985. You light the candles on the altar without reference to giving light, but as a symbol?—We generally have lights about the altar at evening service, but I never light the great altar lights except at the Sacrament.

1986. As I understand, you light the candles not to give light in the evening?—No, not merely for utilitarian purposes.

1987. Symbolically?—Certainly.

1988. Do you make any increase in those lights on saints' days?—Yes.

1989. Have you adopted the practice of mixing water with the wine at the Holy Communion?—Yes, for many years; in fact always.

1990. What do you intend to symbolise by that?—I do not know whether it is pertinent to the question, but it is a signification I believe of the two natures of our Lord—his divine and human nature.

1991. Who is your diocesan?—The Bishop of Winchester.

1992. Have you ever received any remonstrance from the Bishop on the subject of these practices?—No, not a word for the last three years. About six years ago, when I began a higher choral service, a few of the parishioners raised a memorial. They sent it to me first and then to the Bishop. I said at the time "I decline to read this thing; it will be better for you to send it to the Bishop." They sent it to the Bishop of Winchester, and he wrote to me and said "What does it all mean, will you tell me?" I wrote back, simply stating that, of course, as my spiritual father, I was bound to listen to his monition, which I was prepared to do. I said if he would kindly write to me in a letter as to anything which I did which was abnormal or illegal in the church, I would tell his lordship exactly what I should do. I said I should send it to Sir Robert Phillimore and abide by his decision. I have never had a word with the Bishop of Winchester since then. He has been to visit my parish. He has consecrated a cemetery and visited the sisterhood. He gave them his benediction in the most fatherly manner, and expressed himself delighted with the working of the institution.

1993. From what you now state, I think that I misunderstood your former answer. I understood you to state that the only practice which had caused objections on the part of your parishioners was the use of incense. From your last answer I conclude that another part also, namely, the use of the choral service, has also been objected to?—Yes; I am dividing the inquiry into two parts. You asked me a question in reference to anything like reproaches on the part of my people, and I referred more especially to the time when I adopted the vestments about three years ago. Previous to that time that memorial to the Bishop of Winchester was the only protest.

Rev. G. Noye,
M.A.
July 1867.

1994. Has any other portion of these practices besides the choral service and the use of incense led to objection on the part of any of your parishioners?—I am not aware of any.

1995. Do you find families who were in the habit of attending before cease to attend in consequence?—Not since the adoption of the vestments. If there was any falling away from the church it was in the early part, at the very beginning, but that was counterbalanced by the dissenting chapel being shut up, the proprietor of that chapel being in my choir at the present moment, and being one of my chief supporters. He has not gone away from the church on account of the vestments, or incense, or anything else. On the contrary, he, with the other members of the choir, presented the church with a most beautiful gemmed processional cross.

1996. I gather from your answer that some families ceased to attend the service in consequence of some of the earlier practices. Have those families since returned or do they still continue to absent themselves?—Many of them have returned. Several of those who still keep away from the church are persons whose lives, if they were looked into, would at once show the cause.

1997. You stated that persons who formerly attended the service ceased to attend, and you say that their lives are such as may explain that?—Yes.

1998. Still if those persons attended the service at an earlier period the cause you assign cannot be the only one?—The fact was this: I was brought into personal collision with some of them. As long, for instance, as things were easy-going in the parish and nobody took the slightest notice of whether their wives were churched or not, they did not mind; but when I said I would not church a dishonest woman by the side of an honest matron, and took my stand on a high view of things, it was the cause of what I have mentioned.

1999. Am I to understand that you refused to administer the rite of churching when you were not perfectly satisfied of the character of the person?—Yes.

2000. (Bishop of Oxford.) Can you trace any distinct effect upon the poor of your parish from your changing the service from the high choral to the vestmented service?—No, I can trace no effect but what is for the better; I cannot see any deterioration.

2001. I did not ask good or bad, but can you trace any effect?—I think the whole tone of my parish has been raised. I have every reason to believe that drunkenness which in my parish was proverbial on Sunday and the non-church-going spirit which formerly existed have disappeared. The fashion in my parish now is to go to church; certainly results as regards numbers would prove that.

2002. To your own knowledge have the poor taken any interest in the vestments?—They like them very much.

2003. Will you give any proof of that beyond your own impression?—I cannot, excepting the offertory, which is very good evidence, I think, in England, because if you do things meanly the poor man will be mean, but if you are magnificent he will give something more liberally; that is a law which I have distinctly ascertained.

2004. You have farmers in your parish?—Yes.

2005. Can you trace its effects upon them?—My communicants have increased in that class and also among the poor.

2006. Can you trace any effect on the wealthy classes in your parish?—I think the wealthy classes as such are in favour of it. I must state, that the influence of my church upon the young officers in Portsmouth has been most marked and material; I regard that as my mission. When I went down there, I did not know what my mission was, but I have every reason now to believe that my mission has been amongst the young officers of the regiments that come into Portsmouth. There are always 5,000 men in garrison. The regiments are changed nearly every three months. The young officers come over to my church four miles from Portsmouth. My parish joins on to Portsea. It is four miles walking and eight minutes by train. The influence I have on the young officers is most marked, and it is a matter of proverb at Southsea and Portsmouth, that whereas they used to lounge about Southsea Common on Sunday now the question is, "Have you been to Wymering?" The marked change in the devotional posture of the young officers is to me most remarkable. The number of communicants among young officers that go there on Sundays, their devotion and their general attention is most marked. That is regarded in our neighbourhood as a great feature of our work.

2007. Does it apply to any members of the army below the officers?—The artillery at Hilsea are in my parish. Many of the sergeants are very fond of coming to church, and are continually attending there.

2008. You said you had not in your church any of the minutiae of ritualism, will you explain what you mean by that?—For instance, changing the epistle and the gospel side, the deacon coming and taking the book away, and changing about; all that kind of minutiae I have particularly avoided. The Saxon character is a simple, grand character, and should be treated as such. What the Saxon wants is a grand ritual in its bolder and nobler features, without all the minutiae which would suit an Italian. That would not suit a Saxon.

2009. I think you said you have been in the habit of censuring persons and things?—Not persons, but things—oblations.

2010. Is the incense swung?—Yes, it is used in the ordinary way in the censer.

2011. What is incensed if persons are not?—Oblations mainly, and the altar is incensed round in the ordinary way.

2012. Is the gospeller incensed?—No.

2013. It is only the holy table and the sacred elements as I understand?—Incense is used at the introit, but not with reference to any person or thing, except with reference to the Deity.

2014. Is the incense used at the time of singing the Magnificat?—Yes.

2015. What is incensed at that time?—It is merely offered to the Deity.

2016. Towards the sky?—It is raised up.

2017. You mentioned that upon one occasion a complaint had been sent to you which you desired should be sent on to your Bishop?—Yes.

2018. Was that complaint solely confined to the introduction of the choral service, or was any ritual question mixed up in it?—There was no ritual question at that time; it was in very early days, long before I adopted the vestments.

2019. Are we to understand that it was the introduction of the choral service and not what may be called high ritual which provoked opposition?—Yes; it was the first beginning of the movement in my parish, which of course began first in the choral form.

2020. You stated in your letter to the Bishop of Winchester that your course would be to send his letter to Sir Robert Phillimore, and that you should then be guided by Sir Robert Phillimore's direction as to the attention you gave to it?—Yes.

2021. Did you mean to convey by that that you would obey if you were instructed that the law would make you obey, and not obey if you were instructed that the law would not make you obey?—I felt that the Bishop was amenable to the law as well as myself and that the law was our common standing point, and the only chance of peace and unanimity would be an ultimate reference to the law.

2022. Have you not had other services than those which have been described in your parish?—Do you mean in the parish church?

2023. I mean connected with the public service in your church?—Not that I am aware of. To what kind of service does your Lordship refer?

2024. To observance of the May Queen, for instance; does that in any way join itself on to any service in your church?—None whatever, except an ordinary matin service. I have been very careful to keep free from festivities of that description anything like a sacramental service. It has been a very jubilant matin service and evensong.

2025. At the time of celebration do your assistants stand in any particular relation as to position to yourself?—I have no deacon or sub-deacon, I have not staff enough; but the sacristan and two acolytes stand and serve the elements. The sacristan is the post-master of the town.

2026. Have you been able to trace any tendency in the services you have introduced to lead persons towards the Church of Rome?—On the contrary, it has kept them from it; and, moreover, I may state this, that as long as I confined myself simply to what I may call the Anglican system and high choral service, the Roman Catholics from Portsmouth used to come over to listen to the music; but directly I adopted the Catholic vestments, and made myself a claimant to any Catholic privileges as member of a branch of the Church Catholic, Bishop Grant, of Southwark, sent down an order to Portsmouth forbidding any member of the Roman Catholic Church to come to Wymering Church; and, moreover, a preacher came to preach against me for a quarter of an hour from the pulpit, which he did at the Roman Catholic chapel at Portsea. As long as I retained the Anglican service they did not come, but directly I adopted the Catholic service they began immediately to oppose me. Surely that is indicative that they do not consider this Catholic movement in their favour; in fact, I know, on the contrary, that they regard it with a great deal of jealousy.

2027. You mentioned that you used the mixed chalice; will you state whether you consider that consistent with the rubric of the Church of England?—Yes, I do.

2028. The words are: "And when there is a Communion, the priest shall then place upon the table so much bread and wine as he shall think sufficient." Will you explain to the Commission how you understand that to permit the putting wine mingled with water, instead of wine alone?—It is not forbidden.

2029. Is there not another thing ordered to be put on—wine, not wine and water?—It does not say wine alone.

2030. (Earl Beauchamp.) How many years have you been in orders?—I was about eight years at St. Paul's, Knightsbridge. I suppose I have been in orders nearly 20 years.

2031. Your experience has been varied?—Yes, from London to the country; but it has always been, of course, in a particular element. I began the movement in London with Mr. Bennett in the first beginning of it.

2032. What is the result of your observation with regard to the effect of the various types of service? When the services have been made more hearty, has there been a corresponding growth of devotion on the part of the congregation?—I have every reason to believe so, especially in reference to the Holy Communion.

2033. You told us that at Wymering, some years ago, there was only one service on Sunday, and also one only at Widley?—That is all.

2034. When that state of things existed, was there any eager demand for change?—It was before my time.

2035. Do you know whether people who were subjected to that state of things were very anxious for higher privileges?—I should think so from this: the Bishop of Winchester at last ordered that there should be two services in each church. I presume, therefore, there must have been some complaint made of which I am not cognizant.

2036. Do you find as a rule that where there is the absence of religious privileges persons are anxious to receive them; or, on the contrary, that the providing religious privileges induces the congregation to appreciate them?—I think so; the more you put the privileges before the people, the more they will avail themselves of them.

2037. In all these observances which you follow up at Wymering it is your object, as far as you possibly can, to obey the rubric, neither going beyond it, nor falling short of it?—That has really been my object; and I should be sorry to be unfaithful in any way.

2038. It is your belief that you are merely giving effect to the law and the spirit of the Church of England in carrying this out?—Yes, certainly; and also (which is one object, that always has been a great object to my mind) the ultimate effect which the course of years may produce in favouring the re-union of Christendom; the adoption of anything that may, consistently with the English Church, favour ultimately the great question of the re-union of the whole of Christendom.

2039. You mean that where you find observances prevailing over the whole of Christendom which were not forbidden by the Church of England, that would rather weigh with your mind?—That has been the great motive of my action. If the Eastern Church agrees with the Western Church on any given point, and I can satisfy myself that it was in the Levitical law and in the Church of the Apocalypse—as, for instance, incense—I should have no hesitation in adopting it, and abide the issue as to whether the Church of England could legally sanction it or not. I felt that the Church of England was a body of the Church Catholic; and I felt certain that the time would come when she would not go against scripture or against the Catholic Church.

2040. (Bishop of Gloucester.) You have stated most frankly and openly your ultimate desire, and you have also stated your desire to conform to the rubric of the Church of England. With regard to censuring things, which I understand you to do, I think you stated that you answered your bishop in regard to a point that might be a cause of difference between you, that you would refer it to Sir Robert Phillimore?—I did in early times in regard to the music and so on.

2041. In regard to censuring things, are you aware that Sir Robert Phillimore has expressed his judgment?—I am aware of it.

2042. Are you aware that eight other lawyers besides Sir Robert Phillimore have expressed their judgment?—I am.

2043. Are you aware that the Lower House of Convocation of this province has expressed its judgment?—I am.

2044. How then can you reconcile the maintenance of censuring things with what you have stated, you having previously stated a desire to conform to what was the law?—Let us ascertain the law; pendente lite I hold my own, but let us ascertain the law. That is what we are now doing.

2045. Then you would not now rely upon any answer that Sir Robert Phillimore might give upon any point?—When I referred to Sir Robert Phillimore, it was of course as an advocate and as a person who would give a real legal opinion. Now I presume that the thing will go into a higher court altogether, and the Church will speak. It will be then for me to forget Sir Robert Phillimore in the voice of the Church.

2047. Have you any place for confession in or connected with, either of your churches?—I do not quite understand what you mean by "place for confession."

2048. I believe the technical term is a confessional box, but I do not know whether I may use a term that sufficiently expresses what I wish to ask. I am obliged to use the word place, that I may obtain the candid answer which I am sure you will give?—Confessions are frequently heard in my church; they are generally heard just at the rail by the sacristy door; the priest sits within the rail, and those who confess kneel outside the rail.

2049. Do you receive confession before the reception of the Holy Communion on the part of the person confessing?—Not as of obligation in any way. I do not impose it.

2050. Do you recommend any manual or catechism relative to the Holy Communion for the use of the members of your flock?—Not any special book. I think the book brought out by Mr. Prynne of Plymouth is one of the best.

2051. You do not, however, recommend any special book?—No, I do not adopt any special book.

2053. You have also stated that you are aware that the term now is "wine" in the present Prayer Book, without any mention of water. Did you not state that you considered that the mixing of water was not now prohibited?—I do not now quite follow your argument. I really do not feel quite competent to go into the rubrical question here; for, to tell the truth, I have been so much lately abroad, that I hardly remember what a rubric is. I am not competent to go minutely into the legal question. I am very anxious to state to the Commission all the results of the thing, but I really do not feel competent to give an official statement with regard to a legal argument. I satisfied myself most distinctly at the time as to the course to be adopted, and I adopted it.

2054. I rather wish to ask on what you ground your present practice of mixing water with the wine?—The general ground which I go upon in the first instance is the Church Catholic throughout the world, which is the grand base on which I take my stand; the Church of England must settle the question for herself.

2056. Do you infer that what has been specified, viz., mixing water and wine, which is omitted in our present Prayer Book, wine only being mentioned, is permissible, that omission notwithstanding?—Yes.

2058. Do you on December 16th celebrate the Communion differently in regard to a festival called the "O Sapiaentia"?—No, that is not a minor festival; it refers to an antiphon.

2059. You answered that you celebrate the Holy Communion in a different way on the black letter days; I wish to ascertain whether it is on the black letter saint days, or all other black letter days?—It is not on every black letter day, because some of them are blank, as it were; but wherever the Communion of Saints is concerned, where it is a minor saint or an apostle, then we recognize it.

2060. Then you would not celebrate the Communion differently on the 4th of July on the translation of the remains of Martin, bishop and martyr?—Wherever a saint of the Church is concerned, it is regarded as a minor festival, and as such we regard it.

2061. Though it may be not in honour of his sufferings, but of the translation of his remains?—Whatever concerns the honour of the saint, life or death.

2063. The nativity of the Virgin Mary you celebrate with white, and in a somewhat different way?—It is regarded as a minor festival.

2064. (Rev. W. G. Humphry.) Do you teach your parishioners to consider the vestments as symbolical of doctrine?—What I have taught my parishioners is this; the Church is the bride of Christ, and the earthly bride has her ornaments, and therefore the heavenly bride ought to have them. I do not see in what way a chasuble can be expressive of any particular doctrine, except generally as setting forth the magnificence of the Sacrament and the beauty of the spouse of Christ.

2065. You would not make any difference between the chasuble and the cope as symbolical of doctrine?—No, I cannot see any difference in that respect.

2066. Nor as regards the stole?—The stole is for the special office of the priesthood.

2067. Do you use the amice?—Yes.

2068. The alb and the tunicle?—The alb but not the tunicle as yet.

2069. You attach no particular doctrine to any of these vestments?—No.

2070. What is your average number of communicants?—About fifty on a Sunday.

2071. How many on a great festival?—About 150, it used to be sometimes about thirty.

2072. When you say "used to be," at what time do you mean?—When I first went there.

2073. Has the number increased since you have adopted the vestments?—Materially.

2074. You say when you adopted the vestments the number of pence contributed by the poor was very much increased?—Yes.

2075. Did you make any special appeal to the poor at that time?—None whatever.

2076. It was purely voluntary on their part?—Purely voluntary.

2077. Do you deliver the cup to each one of the communicants?—Always.

2078. They always receive it?—Always in their hands if they require it.

2079. They never decline to receive it?—No, not that I am aware of.

2080. You spoke of the Anglican system of vestments; what do you mean by that?—I think I said "Anglican system of choral service."

2081. As distinct from the Catholic system?—What I meant was this: that as long as we confined ourselves to what we call the cathedral service, that is, the higher order of musical service, then there was no difficulty raised against us; but directly we adopted the Catholic vestments and a higher ritual at the altar, then the Roman Catholic Bishop immediately forbade them to come to us.

2082. Do you use both the exhortations in the Communion?—Not always; not ordinarily on Sundays.

2083. You omit the longer one?—Generally.

2084. Have you any authority for so doing?—I do not know that I have.

2085. You do not connect any particular doctrine with incense?—No; it is merely symbolical of the prayers of the saints.

2086. What are lights on the altar symbolical of?—Of the two natures of the Saviour; His divine and human nature.

2087. (Lord Ebury.) You have stated that you use eucharistic vestments; do you consider them absolutely necessary?—No.

2088. (Dean of Ely.) You stated that the pence from the poor were trebled upon the adoption of the vestments; do you mean that the poor people were there before and did not give, or was it the effect of the vestments to increase the number of the poor, so that the increased number increased the amount of the offerings?—I think the increased magnificence of the service, the adoption of the costlier office altogether, had the effect indirectly on the illiterate mind of raising their appreciation of the office, inducing them to give in proportion to their feelings.

2089. You think the introduction of the vestments increased the liberality of the poor?—Certainly.

2090. You stated that you used the cope and the chasuble?—Yes.

2091. In the first Prayer Book of King Edward VI. we read of the vestment or cope. The vestment you assume to be the chasuble?—Yes; or what is called in the old list of my church, which is in the sixth year of King Edward VI. (four years after the rubrics), the cheerible.

2092. You use both the chasuble and the cope?—Yes.

2095. I ask the question because you stated that you used the cope at the time of reading or singing the Magnificat?—And at marriages or funerals.

2096. We will take the Magnificat; on what authority do you use it during the singing of the Magnificat?—The ancient use of the Church, the Sarum use, and Bishop Andrewes' use.

2097. Without any reference to any rubric in any edition of the English Prayer Book?—Yes; there is no rubric which bears upon it, either for or against.

2099. Not being forbidden, in so many words, you consider yourself at liberty to use it?—To do that as to do many other things.

2100. You stated that you preach in what you call an alb surplice; I am not going to quarrel with a name, but I want to know, as a matter of fact, where you get the pattern from for that and for other vestments?—My vestments are the old Sarum form, not the modern Italian form.

2101. You said, I think, that we have no patterns of the Sarum use?—I think we have; we have the ancient chasuble remaining in our cathedrals, and at Salisbury particularly we have most magnificent vestments remaining, which were the use of the Sarum Church.

2102. And these have been copied for your use?—Yes; that is to say, the particular form of the chasuble. The cope, of course, is a full flowing robe, which requires no pattern.

2103. You consider that your patterns are the genuine representation of the old Sarum use?—Of the old English Church.

2104. Who supplies these vestments? I ask the question because I think it is understood, as matter of law, that the parish are bound to supply the clergyman's vestments. Does your parish supply these vestments?—My parish has not supplied the vestments as far as they have gone, but I believe they would give me the remainder if I wanted them. The way I did it in the first instance, with regard to the vestments, was this: it was Easter Tuesday, at the vestry, and after the election of the churchwardens I said, "Now, gentlemen, I have got a question to bring before you." They said, "What is it?" I said, "The fact is this: certain articles belonging to the church are missing." They said, "What are these articles?" They looked very alarmed. "Is it the plate?" "No," I said, "but there are many other articles;" and then I produced my list, which I got from the Record Office; Mr. Mackenzie Walcott sent it to me, signed by the vicar at the time, including all the personalty of the church; and I said, "Now, the law supposes that you, Mr. Churchwarden, are in possession of these things at the present moment. Where are they? You will probably ask me what they are? I know right well

" what they are; but, gentlemen, I want to ask you " where they are?" Then they drew very long faces. I said, "Well, to cut the matter short, either you must restore these things, or the parish, or I must restore them, but I will make you all happy; I have so far restored them;" and on the next Sunday I adopted them; but since that they have given me various things, as regards vestments and ornaments of the church, and I am sure if I wanted a tunic or dalmatic to-morrow they would be too glad to give it to me.

2105. When you say "they," do you mean individuals or the parish, as a parish in vestry?—The parish would, I believe, do it.

2106. Have you a church rate?—Every year, and we have no difficulty about it.

2107. You think there would be no difficulty in case of the need of vestments, and no objection raised by the vestry to putting them on the rates?—I really could not say that. I can certify that a great mass of my people would be too glad to contribute to anything of the kind, but whether the majority of outsiders—men of property in the parish—coming from Portsmouth to vote against me, would not override such a thing, I could not say.

2108. You said you used incense during the Magnificat. Have you any particular reason for using it during the Magnificat rather than any other part of the service?—No, only its Catholic use; it is a recognition of the Incarnation, which would not apply to incense at the Nunc dimittis.

2109. In what way do you read the service? Do you chant it or read it?—I always intone or chant the service.

2110. Do you chant it in such a way that ordinary people can understand it?—I am always careful that every word I utter is heard in the church, from beginning to end; it has been one of my principles of action, lucid reading of the lessons, epistle, and gospel, and clear chanting. If my curate does not chant clearly, I get rid of him.

2111. You believe that the service as chanted in your church is as intelligible as if it were read by an ordinary reader?—A great deal more so.

2112. You stated you were patron of the living?—Yes.

2113. Does that give you any advantage in introducing those changes which would possibly not exist in another parish where the clergyman had no such influence?—I do not think it does; it is merely an accident. The fact is this, that at Wymering I am only vicar, while at Widley I am rector. Mr. Thistlethwaite is my lay rector at Wymering, and he has resigned over to me the chancel, formally and distinctly, on condition of myself and my successors keeping it in order; so that were it not for that I should have no power in the chancel at all.

2114. Your position as patron does not give you any advantage?—None whatever.

2115. I think you gave this answer, "If the Church Catholic say so and so, the Church of England must settle the question for herself"?—I did say those words.

2116. Will you kindly inform the Commissioners what you mean by that phrase?—I mean this: the whole question of ritual in the Church of England is in abeyance at the present moment, and in doubt. Pending the final solution of the difficulty we have but to follow the Church Catholic, and abide the issue of the Church of England in her councils and in the law courts and then, of course, we shall see whether she is antagonistic to the Church Catholic or not. I believe that she is not.

2117. (Sir Joseph Napier.) I suppose you regard the Communion service as sacrificial and propitiatory?—I do not quite know what you mean by propitiatory. It is a sacrifice.

2118. I think you said you were extremely anxious to encourage re-union with the Church of Rome?—Not with the Church of Rome specially, but with the whole of Christendom.

Rev. G. Noyes,
M.A.

1 July 1867.

Rev. G. Nugee,
M.A.
1 July 1867.

2119. With the Western Church?—Yes, but with the Eastern Church particularly. I consider the Eastern church has retained all that is truly catholic.

2120. As part of "Christendom" do you count the Protestant Churches?—Sweden and Norway. I am most anxious for union with the Protestant Churches of Sweden and Norway.

2121. What would you say as to Scotland?—I am most anxious that it should all be re-united. I think this is one of the great steps towards it, indirectly.

2122. Do you think you are at liberty to adopt any use or practice of what you call the Catholic Church, although not allowed by the Church of England?—If it is not forbidden, I think we are at liberty to use it, if it is consistent with all the Church's other formularies.

2123. You think that any use that is not expressly disallowed and prohibited may be used?—I believe that the Church of England did not, comparatively speaking, alter her outward appearance at the Reformation, at least very little; that she was the same; that she altered doctrines, but as regards the ritual and ceremonial she altered but very little indeed; so that in the eyes of the people the Reformation was little more than a mere question of theology.

2124. Do you use any interpolated prayers, such as those which are given in the Prayer Book for the Communion service?—I do not myself use any interpolated prayers.

2125. Where do you get your directions as to the mode of performing the service from?—The Church Catholic throughout the world as far as I can gather. I do not know any particular book.

2126. Supposing when a clergyman is ordained he wishes to conform loyally to the Church of England, where, according to your view, is he to get his directions?—He must go to some of the books.

2127. What books?—There is a Directorium and other things, which are most minute in all their explanations.

2128. Are you aware that the old books were ordered to be destroyed in the time of Edward VI.?—I do not know; I do not think it concerns me very much.

2129. If the books were destroyed, where is a clergyman of the Church of England to get his directions?—From the traditions of the Church which have come down.

2130. Is it your opinion that a clergyman could not conform or know how to conform without being trained and familiarized with all those traditions?—It ought to be part of his training.

2131. (Earl of Harrowby.) You stated that you used no interpolated prayers in your church; are they used by any of the clergy within the Church?—Not that I am aware of. You do not mean private prayers before service and so on?

2132. I mean uttered prayers, in a lower tone of voice possibly?—Not that I am aware of.

2134. Taking that view, how is a clergyman guided in selecting out of all that preceded the Reformation, and all that is actually outside the rubric, what he shall individually, in each congregation, adopt?—I presume that every clergyman must use his own discretion, and do what he thinks best for his individual flock. For instance, if it is desirable to begin with altar lights, he would do so. If he thought it better to begin with vestments, without altar lights, he would do so. I could not trace out any individual line of action; he must use his own discretion in reference to his own particular flock, which he is supposed to know.

2135. Every individual clergyman, according to your view, is at liberty to pick out of the previous customs of the Church that have not been in use habitually, and that are not distinctly prescribed by the rubric, progressively what he thinks will most suit his own peculiar position with regard to his congregation?—The result I aim at is the restoration of the whole character of the Church of England in her proper ancient form. He must use his discretion as regards the first, second, and third steps towards that ultimate result. I can say no more. It is a sad sight that any individual priest in the Church of England should be obliged to select; but as things are he is obliged to do so.

2136. What is the type that he has to work up to?—The type is that which I think many of our churches now have arrived at, which is the high ritual of the Communion service.

2137. What is that type taken from; what is the basis of it; what should you say is the authority upon which it rests?—From apostolic times, and the united opinion and action of the Eastern and the Western Churches.

2138. Therefore you go back to whatever record we have of primitive times?—Certainly.

2140. Do they all agree amongst themselves?—I would not vouch for the Church of England, certainly.

2141. I meant those books of reference to which the clergyman is bound to look?—I think they all agree so far as the general question is concerned; there may be a little minutia upon which they disagree.

2143. There is no other standard to which you can refer?—No; unless he goes and studies for himself all the minutia.

2144. What proportion of your congregation are from within your own parish?—The great mass of them.

2145. What is the expense of your service?—The choir are paid nothing, except that the surplices of a few of the boys are washed. I have no expense. I did pay the organist until very lately, but the organ is now played by one of the brothers, and very ably played.

2146. In your case there is no extra expense incurred by the adoption of the higher ritual?—My object was to establish, if possible, a normal parochial system consistent with the lowest village parish. I thought that, as such, it ought not to rest with a rich incumbent at all, but that it should be such as any parish could, with an earnest incumbent, adopt and secure. That is the case with me, for it is practically no expense.

2148. They all prescribe the particular moments and things to which the incense is to be applied?—Those are the salient points in the Communion service in which incense is used.

2149. It is the common agreement of the Churches?—Of the east and west as far as I can gather.

2150. You talk of Catholic privileges and the Anglican system; how do you distinguish the Anglican system from Catholic privileges?—By the Anglican system I meant the cathedral system which was adopted within the last few years in our parochial churches, which was considered to be a great advance on the parochial system. That was purely Anglican, because you do not hear that abroad.

2151. Then you think that the Anglican system as embodied in the cathedral service did not represent the highest ritual that was continued in the Church of England after the Reformation?—No; I think the altar service has been completely lost and dropped.

2152. You think the cathedral service was a reduced and simple service, though Anglican, as compared with the parochial service?—It was a more elaborate service than the parochial service. I believe it was competent from the time of the Reformation for any parish church to adopt the cathedral service; if they were able to do so.

2156. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) Are we to gather from what you said, that you consider what you called the Anglican services, namely, services before the introduction of vestments and incense, as uncatholic?—No, I did not say that.

2157. They are Catholic in their spirit, although they do not go so far as you yourself would like to go?—Exactly.

2159. In adopting or rejecting any form, do you ask yourself, "Was this found in the Church of England before the Reformation, or was it not?"—Yes, I always inquire that in the first instance.

2160. For instance, if your churchwardens were to provide for you a set of vestments of the Greek Church, would you find yourself at liberty to wear them?—No.

2161. After all, what you have brought before us as Catholic consent, is really the consent of the historical Church of England?—Yes.

2162. Modified and restricted by the successive rubrics of vernacular Prayer Books?—I presume so.

2163. Therefore in testing any point would you ask these two questions, first, is it Catholic in itself? second, is it implicitly or explicitly excluded by the Prayer Book?—Yes, on an honest view of the whole question.

2164. Therefore I presume you put the use of the vestments in the Communion service on a different footing from the use of the cope at the Magnificat?—Yes, I think so.

2165. You consider the latter doubtful?—There would be more evidence for the one than for the other.

2166. Would not there be more authority for the one than for the other?—I suppose evidence is authority.

2167. Authority and evidence are very different things. Is there not, according to your reading of the rubric, positive authority for the one, and no positive authority for the other?—Yes, the chasuble is no doubt ordered for the Sacrament.

2168. The chasuble or cope?—Yes.

2169. And neither chasuble nor cope by any existing rubric for the Magnificat?—It is not ordered for the Magnificat, certainly.

2170. (Mr. J. Abel Smith.) What is the annual amount of your offertory?—I really do not know; it is about 2*l.* a Sunday, and on great days it may reach various sums; I can scarcely say, but nothing very great.

2171. How do you use it?—It is applied to the poor. There are certain fixed pensioners who have so much a week, and the rest goes towards the supply of the wants of the church, the lighting and so on; there is no rate for lighting.

2172. Do the churchwardens agree with you?—Entirely; we have four churchwardens, two to each church. The vestments introduced at Widley were only introduced about three months ago. I have had them for three years at Wymering, but the church at Widley was very empty, and my curates with my sanction introduced vestments there, and the church is now full.

2174. Is there no dissenting chapel now in your parish?—There is a small school, that is all, but the dissenting chapel, as such, is shut up. Mr. Thom, the proprietor of it, is in my choir, and he is a weekly communicant.

2175. There is no such opposition to your views as shows itself in public collection of the people for worship in any other way?—There is a little prayer meeting in that school chapel, that is all; that professes to be the Church of England, not dissent.

2176. How many is it attended by?—By a handful; it is a small room.

2177. How is the ministering clergyman paid?—I do not know.

2178. Is he a clergyman of the Church of England?—I am sorry to say they have had clergymen of the Church of England to come over, and it is a great question whether I shall not bring the whole question before the Admiralty. One of the chaplains was induced to do the act of schism of coming into my parish and doing that sort of thing; that was recently. It is a question which will probably come before the Admiralty. There was a Huntingdonian minister who used to come there.

2179. Do you conceive yourself on the whole to be acting with the sanction of the Bishop of Winchester?—It is a tacit sanction; he does not interfere with me at all. Of course I do not suppose he would acquiesce in everything I do; but certainly his Lordship has shown great forbearance and kindness to me, and whenever I have asked him anything he has always done it, and never raised any opposition or difficulty.

2180. Have you any peculiar form of absolution?—Only that in the Prayer Book.

2181. I mean for the priest who receives the confession in the church?—I have the Prayer Book absolution form and no other.

2182. In answer to a question with regard to incensing the altar, you said, I think, that it was incensed in the ordinary way; will you tell me what that means?—The ordinary way is to walk round it and to incense it.

Rev. G. Nuqee,

1 July 1867.

2183. But ordinary where?—It is the western use, that is all I can say.

2184. What do you mean by the western use?—The use of the Church throughout the western world, the Latin world.

2185. By the Latin use you mean the Roman use?—Yes; and I believe the eastern use is very similar.

2186. Is there any other use in the west than the Roman use?—There is the eastern use, which is very similar. It may differ in one or two little minutiae, which of course I do not consider.

2187. Which form of absolution do you use in the Prayer Book?—Under what circumstances do you mean?

2188. In cases of confession?—The form in the Visitation of the Sick.

2189. (Dr. Twiss.) Are your parishes united parishes?—It is a united benefice.

2190. Have you any knowledge of where the persons who have withdrawn from attending your parish church resort to for Divine Service?—I believe some go to the neighbouring parish churches, a few.

2191. What is the distance of the nearest other parish church than your own?—It would be about two miles.

2192. Is the service there also choral?—It is a plain service apparently; I am referring more particularly to Bedhampton, where I believe one lady goes.

2193. I understand there is no other place of religious worship except in that small school-room?—No other place in my parish.

2194. What do you mean by the term religious bodies?—I have a sisterhood which I established in London eight or nine years ago. They have charge of the Government hospitals. They have now charge of Aldershot and Portsea hospitals, and the Government are proposing to us to take another one also. They have an orphanage and schools, and they visit my parish, and in fact it is a complete organization of nursing sisters.

2196. You spoke of a processional cross; when is that made use of?—On great festivals, walking before the choir.

2197. In church?—In the church or outside the church.

2198. Have you any processions outside?—Yes, in the churchyard sometimes.

2199. And you there wear a surplice or a cope, or some dress of that kind?—Yes, a surplice or cope, as the case may be.

2200. Are those processions introductory to the ordinary service?—They are.

2201. You spoke of wearing a cope at marriages and funerals; are they different ones?—It is a black for funerals and white for marriages.

2202. You spoke of a sacristan and acolytes; who appoints them?—The sacristan is the clerk of the parish, appointed by the parish. He happens to be the postmaster of the parish.

2203. And the acolytes?—The acolytes are boys of the choir, appointed by myself.

2204. Are they paid?—No, no more than that their surplices are washed.

2205. Do they come within the rails?—Yes.

2206. And the sacristan also?—Yes; they serve the elements.

2207. (Mr. Walpole.) What is the number of the population in the united parishes?—A little under 2,000.

2208. How many does your church hold?—I think we may hold about 500, Widley about 300, and the school chapel about 300. In the Fort Chapel I have had 700 working-men, navvies. That is where the earthworks are being raised by the Government.

2209. Is your church chiefly attended by your own parishioners?—I think mainly so; their own seats are filled. Of course there are strangers, such as the officers I have mentioned.

2210. They come from Ports-mouth?—Yes.

2211. That is outside your parish?—Yes, but at the same time the Hulsea officers, the Artillery, are in my parish.

2212. Can you give me an idea of the number of people who go to the churches in the neighbouring parishes from your parish?—No, but I could count heads very easily; there are very few, comparatively speaking, and these I believe are mainly remnants of the dissenters; they were deprived of their dissenting chapel from the fact of the proprietor shutting it up. They profess themselves to be of the Church of England.

2213. When you have your processions, of what do they consist?—The choir and the clergy.

2214. Nothing but the choir and clergy?—No.

2215. Are there any banners?—Yes.

2216. Any crucifix?—No crucifix as such, but there is a cross.

2217. I think you mentioned in an earlier part of your evidence, that you chiefly had reverted to the traditions of the Church with reference to these matters; can the traditions of the Church be better explained than by continuous usages?—We can see the remnants of the Catholic use in continuous usage, but you must remember the storms the Church of England has gone through, and the utter subversion of her altars and ritual system. If it were not for the Reformation we might assume that her present state was her normal state, but with such facts as history gives as regards the Puritans we can easily explain the shattered and shipwrecked state of our ritual.

2218. Beginning with the first of Elizabeth, when the Prayer Book was settled much in its present form, have you any reason to suppose that the usages of the Church were at that time very different from what they were at the beginning of this century with regard to ritualism?—I think so, for her own chapel had a crucifix and candles.

2220. Have you any list of goods?—Yes, of the sixth of Edward VI., four years after the rubric, which I may assume went on through the reign of Elizabeth.

2221. Why do you assume that that was going on through Elizabeth's reign?—There is no evidence to prove that it was not. May we not assume that they were continued then, especially when we know what her own private use was?

2222. Are you aware of what are called the Advertisements of 1654?—Yes.

2223. Do they refer to any vestments like those which are now in use in your church?—I do not know that they do.

2224. You are probably aware, historically, of the great controversy which took place between the Puritans, who, you say, subverted the Church, and the great divines of our Church, with respect to vestments; do you find any mention in that controversy of anything more than the surplice and hood?—Yes, I think so, certainly.

2225. Do you find it mentioned in Hooker?—No; I do not think he touched on the question of ritual at all.

2226. When you come down to the usage of James the First's time, when another Prayer Book was issued, slightly altered, and, contemporaneously with that, certain canons were made which referred to the vestments which were to be used by the clergy, do you think that the traditions of the Church would warrant you in saying that the vestments now in use in your church were used then?—I cannot say whether they were used at that particular time or in any particular church, but I have a right to assume that they were used.

2227. Would not the assumption rather be the other way, when the canons distinctly declared what vestments were to be used?—But the rubric distinctly states that the ornaments are to be as they were in the time of Edward VI. I may put that rubric against any canon you can produce.

2228. Have you any evidence other than that—the inference drawn from that rubric—that those vestments were used in the beginning of the reign of James I.?—I do not know that I have any other evidence that I can adduce at this moment.

2229. Going to the Savoy conference, when the question was again mooted with reference to the Prayer Book?—You must recollect that as regards all the minutiae of the rubrical argument I am not quite prepared to go into it.

2230. Have you any tradition since the Reformation of the continuous use of the vestments which are now in use?—Continuous usage, certainly not, because they have been broken at intervals.

2231. Have you any evidence as far as you know at the time when the present Prayer Book was settled in the reign of Charles II. except so far as you would infer it from the rubric, that they contemplated the use of those vestments, or that those vestments were in fact used after the Savoy conference?—I suppose you are aware that one of the bishops argued for the restoration of them.

2232. I am not talking about an argument, but about the fact. Are you aware as a matter of fact that the vestments now in use in your church were used after the Savoy conference or not in the parochial churches?—I have no evidence at all, except of course we know that the copes have been used at Windsor and so on.

2233. That is to say, in the cathedral or collegiate churches?—It may be so.

2234. (Dean of Lincoln.) Do you maintain that any custom, not expressly forbidden by our Church, may be safely revived if such a custom extensively prevailed in the ancient Church, and was strongly recommended by some of the fathers?—And, as I added, backed by the Levitical law and the Church of the Apocalypse.

2235. Take an instance; would you revive the custom of infant communion?—No; I do not know that I should.

2236. Do you permit and recommend non-communicants to remain in the church during the celebration of the Holy Communion?—I do.

2238. You do not rest that entirely on the practice of the ancient Church?—The ancient Church, I believe, has not always been uniform upon that point.

2239. Are you aware that the practice is severely condemned by St. Chrysostom?—I am quite aware that in the early Church it was not uniform.

2240. Do you allow the use of incense, not only in the celebration of the Holy Communion, but also at funerals and on other solemn occasions and rites?—We use it in processions, and we have used it at funerals.

2241. In reference to the ancient Church to which you alluded, is there any clear evidence of the use of incense in public worship during the first three centuries of the Christian Church?—That is a matter of history which I cannot remember, but Dr. Littledale's pamphlet will tell you of the earliest date as a matter of history, which of course I go by; I refer you to that. I assume that the Church Catholic has never been without incense. I can scarcely imagine her falling away from the model in the Apocalypse.

2242. I wish to know whether you think these assertions of Dr. Littledale are perfectly tenable; whether the quotations he uses may not be interpreted in a figurative and mystical sense?—I believe all that he states is capable of the most positive evidence.

2243. You spoke of the moral character of persons who have left your church; may I ask whether you observe the first directions in the rubric, requiring that all people who intend to communicate should give previous notice of that intention?—No; I have not done so. I find it impossible to do it.

2245. How do you reconcile that with Article 28?—I follow the Church Catholic throughout the world. I go upon the general principle. If the Church of England disapproves of it, she has to say so. She has not as yet, as far as I know, in any way disapproved of it.

2246. Of course you know the passage to which I refer—"The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance carried about, lifted up, or worshipped"?—The emphasis there is on the words "Christ's ordinance." Of course we have not His direct injunction on the subject.

2247. (Rev. H. Venn.) May I ask you to explain what your parishes are; I think you are the vicar of Wymering?—Yes, and rector of Widley.

2247a. I think I understood from you that there was one chapel in your parish, which was served by Lady Huntingdon's minister?—No; there is a dissenting chapel outside my parish, established by a gentleman some time ago, served by a Huntingdonian minister.

2248. You allude to Purbrook?—Yes.

2249. Purbrook is not in your parish?—No; that was established a long time before anything like ritual development took place in our parishes. It was established, I am sorry to say, from personal motives. It was established by Mr. Deverell before anything like the vestment question arose in the Church of England.

2250. What I wanted to know was simply whether his church was on the outside of your parish?—It is outside my parish altogether.

2251. Has he any property in your parish?—Yes, he has; and he has lately bought some more.

2252. How near is Mr. Poole's church to yours?—It is very near to my church, over the hill at Widley; within about a quarter of an hour's walk.

2253. (Dr. Payne Smith.) I think you said you followed the Sarum use as much as possible as regards your vestments?—The form of them, but not the colour.

2254. Do you consider the Sarum use still binding in any respect?—No; I do not. I very much prefer the other use, because I think the Sarum use, in the event of anything like an effort being made for further re-union, would be a hindrance to us.

2255. You think there is another use that was so largely followed that it deserves to be called the western use?—Yes; that is the Latin use.

2256. You are no doubt aware that even in Italy there are very considerable differences?—They use yellow, and that is partly from poverty; they cannot afford to supply all the colours.

2257. Even in great places does the same use prevail at Naples and at Rome?—I do not know whether it does, but great latitude is allowed.

2258. Still there is a use?—Yes; what we call the four colours. It is evidently the Latin use.

2259. As regards the vesting of the Lord's table, do you follow those four colours or the Sarum use?—The western use, not the Sarum use.

2260. As regards vestments, do you consider there is any authority whatever for these vestments in early times?—I believe that the Church vestments have come down from the Roman vestments of the day. I had reason to prove that by a fresco in Italy, where

Rev. G. Nugee,
M.A.
1 July 1867.

a Roman citizen in his toga, with his hand in his breast, is standing by the figure of St. Clement in his chasuble, and the two are as identical in fold and shape as anything can possibly be. I believe that the Church vestment has come down from the Roman vestment.

2261. Do you know the date of that fresco?—It would be about the third century. It is that which was discovered the other day in the crypt of S. Clementi.

2262. Is it not the case that there is a dated Mosaic at S. Pudentiana in which there is nothing of the sort—where the dress is very much like the surplice with a stole upon it, though probably the stole looks as if it were fixed?—I do not know that at all. This is a fresco that I speak of, and there are those vestments.

2263. As regards the bread that you use at the Lord's Supper, is it fermented or unfermented bread?—I use the ordinary bread.

2264. That is contrary to the use of the Latin Church, is it not?—Yes; that is the eastern use. I should prefer following the Western Church and having wafer bread.

2265. As a matter of fact you follow the Eastern Church?—Yes.

2266. You said that in the Communion you prefer those who do not communicate to remain; does not the very word "mass" come from "missa"—from the catechumens being sent away?—That is one explanation of the word.

2267. The Latin word is "missa," is it not?—Yes.

2268. That at all events is a very probable explanation?—Yes; it comes at the end of the service, and not in any way at the middle of the service.

2270. As a matter of fact the catechumens were certainly at one time sent away before the mysteries?—Before the mysteries. The audientes and the catechumens were dismissed before the mysteries. It was a sort of catechetical office which is still virtually retained in the English Church.

2272. Your school would be considered as catechumens?—Well, they are scarcely that. They are too young for that.

2273. You spoke of the cope as much the same as the chasuble. You use them in the same way?—No, I make a distinction. The chasuble is the sacramental dress. I said that the rubric said the chasuble or cope. I felt the Church of England left rather a latitude. The western use is the chasuble simply, as far as I can gather.

2274. I think I understood you to say you consider the state of the Church of England in the 19th century to be that of a Church without law, or something like that?—Rather exlex; and that pending the decision of the law we are in the painful position of acting up to the best dictates of our conscience and hearts with reference to the restoration of life amongst our people; the re-union of Christendom being the great object of our prayers and labours.

2275. (Rev. R. Gregory.) I think you said you had three different ways of celebrating the Holy Communion. Do you celebrate in any one of them with simply the surplice?—Never without a chasuble, except in private communions in the visitation of the sick. We do not then use the chasuble.

2276. Have you ever evening communions?—No.

2277. You must know the poor people of your own parish very well by sight; do you see them actually in church?—Certainly.

2278. The great majority of them?—I cannot say the great majority of them, but a very fair proportion of them.

2279. (Mr. Cardwell.) Will you look at that memorial from certain inhabitants of the parish, to the Bishop of Winchester [a document being shown to the witness*]; have you seen that before?—I have not read, or seen, or heard of it. It raises the question of the sisters and brothers. It goes into the whole question of the parish. It objects to the system, it objects to the brotherhood, to chanting, and in fact it objects to the whole place. I never saw it before, and I really do not think it is worth reading, looking at the names. It is only signed by about twelve people.

2280. I think you said no formal memorial that you are aware of had been made against the mode of proceeding in your parish?—I divided my time into two parts; first, before the introduction of the vestments, and when the more choral Anglican system prevailed.

2281. Did I understand you to say that no formal memorial has been presented so far as you know against the introduction of the vestments and other ritual proceedings in your parish?—I am not aware of any; I was not aware of that.

2282. The memorial you have just had shown to you, you never saw before?—No; that has been done now, if I may make a guess, by the new Protestant Association which was established about a month ago in the neighbourhood by some London society connected with Portsmouth.

2283. Will you have the kindness to allow me to read you this description, and you will state whether you agree with it, or in what points you dissent from its being an accurate description. They say that they will "bring to the attention of the Bishop of Winchester the details of the morning service in Wymering church on Easter Sunday last. The church was lighted by numerous candles supported "by candelabra"?—There are only two altar candles as such.

2284. "Those candelabra were tastefully decorated with flowers"?—There are standards before the altar, the usual clusters, which almost every church has.

2285. "Flowers and plants were also placed in other parts of the church"?—From nine years back.

2286. "The chancel was profusely decorated"?—Not very profusely.

2287. "The congregation sat in silence for about 15 minutes"?—During what time?

2288. "Then singing was heard without"?—Yes; before the service began. Then the procession began outside.

2289. "Becoming more distinct until the door on the South-west was reached"?—Yes, certainly.

2290. "Then the congregation rose en masse, and a procession entered"?—Yes. We could scarcely get in, I beg leave to state.

2291. "First, came a person dressed in white, bearing a brass cross"?—That was the sacristan, the postmaster of the town.

2292. "Suspended on a pole painted in various colours"?—It is enamelled with Scotch pebbles, presented by the choir about a month ago, and he was wearing his surplice.

2293. "He was followed by two acolytes in scarlet and white"?—Yes.

2294. "One of whom bore a brass implement like a mason's trowel"?—The boat for the incense.

2295. "And the other a censer which he swung to and fro"?—That is perfectly true.

2296. "Filling the church with the smoke and fumes of the incense"?—Yes.

2297. "About 20 choristers chanting, 'Jesus Christ is risen to-day,' were preceded and followed by men bearing elaborate banners"?—The church banners. There are two.

2298. "The Rev. George Nugee, the vicar of Wymering, with book in hand, closed the procession"?—Yes.

* Vide Appendix B.

2299. "He had on a black robe, reaching to his feet?"—That is my cassock.

2300. "Reaching to his feet?"—Yes, it is not very long.

2301. "This robe was covered by a white surplice?"—Yes.

2302. "Reaching to within five or six inches of the ground?"—A long surplice.

2303. "And he wore on his head a peculiarly shaped hat?"—The biretta.

2304. "Which we are told is called the biretta. The procession moved up the church in very slow order. The banners were placed on each side of the chancel?"—Yes.

2305. "And the choristers took their seats?"—Yes.

2306. "After which the service began. The psalms and responses were chanted by the choir, and some of the prayers were omitted?"—I do not know about that. The service was said down to the prayer of St. Chrysostom, because our Litany service is at a different time.

2307. "Before the Communion service a number of candles in the chancel were lighted?"—Yes.

2308. "In addition to those already mentioned as burning. The vicar retired, and again appeared wearing a white satin cape?"—A white silk chasuble.

2309. "Which had a large cross both before and behind?"—Yes; what are called the "T-crosses," from the shoulders down; a quasi cross.

2310. "He also wore a chasuble?"—He could not wear a cape and also a chasuble too.

2311. "And something like a bib of violet colour?"—How could he with the chasuble? The chasuble comes right round and excludes every other thing; it is impossible.

2312. "Which we understand is called an alb?"—An alb is merely that which is under the chasuble, and is white, not violet.

2313. "Two curates now walked up to the Communion table, and the incense having been lighted the censer was handed to the vicar, who waved it about the Communion table?"—No; that is not the fact. At the beginning of the introit I merely raise it three times.

2314. "He also took the bread and wine and held them out once or twice towards the table?"—What does that mean?

2315. "It is said here that the vicar did so?"—I do not know what he means. Does he mean that I placed them on the table?

2316. "I do not know what he means?"—I cannot understand it. The acolytes bring it to the table; I then place it on the table in the ordinary way, according to the rubric.

2317. "Held them out once or twice towards the table, and then bowed. All this time the choristers were chanting 'Christ our Passover'?"—Is that the oblations?

2318. "I do not know what it is. It is their statement?"—I did not bow then; and as for holding the elements towards the altar I do not understand what it means. This is perfectly false about "Christ our Passover" being sung all the time. "Christ our Passover" is never sung in our sacramental office at all. It was sung by the procession long before; therefore that is perfectly false. And as to holding out the bread once or twice towards the altar, I cannot conceive what he means.

2319. "Is Admiral Sir Lucius Curtis a landowner in the parish?"—He has very little land in the parish. He occupies a house, but his land is in a neighbouring parish.

2320. "Is Admiral Warren?"—Merely a passing resident for about a year or two; he lodges there.

2321. "Captain Matthews?"—He resides in my parish, in Wymering. He is an old man who never comes to church. I sometimes go and take him the Sacrament. I do not think he knows comparatively anything of the work of the church. He has been there perhaps once or twice in the last five years.

2322. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) You were asked some questions with reference to the mixed chalice. You were asked whether you considered that the omission of the direction in the second Prayer Book of Edward VI. and subsequent prayer books, amounted to a prohibition of its use, and I think you said you did not?—No; I do not.

2323. You were also asked how you could justify the term "wine" as applied to that mixture. Are you aware that in the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. there was a direction to add water to the wine?—I am rather out of date in those things at present. The real minutiae of rubrics I am not au fait at. I cannot answer those questions.

2324. That direction was omitted, as has been noticed, in the second book?—Yes.

2325. But the wine and water so mixed and put on the altar, as directed in the first book, is called "wine" after it is so put on?—Yes.

2326. You are aware also that in our present Catechism this answer occurs, in reply to a question about the Sacrament: "Bread and wine, which the Lord hath commanded to be received"?—Yes.

2327. Could you say whether there is any reason to believe that the cup as used by our Lord at the institution was a mixed cup or not? Is it believed that our Lord followed the Passover practice?—I believe it has generally been believed so; that a certain amount of bread and wine was reserved for the after part of the Passover with water, and that it was so used; instead of using it in the ordinary Passover way, he applied it in the sacramental form to the new Passover.

2328. If our Lord used the mixed cup and the Catechism speaks of the "wine which the Lord hath commanded to be received," that might be a justification for the term "wine" applied to the mixed cup now?—Yes; I do not know why it should not.

2329. With regard to the question as to omissions in the rubric, are you aware that there was a direction in the first Prayer Book, at the taking of the chalice, that the priest should do it "without any elevation, or showing the sacrament to the people"?—Yes.

2330. Do you know whether that direction is omitted in the second Prayer Book?—No.

2331. Well, it was omitted. Being omitted in the second Prayer Book, if there is nothing contrary, that might be an argument in favour of elevation now? Being omitted in the second Prayer Book, on the principle of omission being prohibition, that might be an argument for elevation now?—Yes.

2332. It might be?—Yes.

2333. Are you aware whether in the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. there were any other special directions in the consecration prayer that were omitted in the second book. For instance, the taking of the "bread" and "the cup" into the hands of the priest—were those directions omitted in the second book?—Yes.

2334. Should you think that as all the priests of that day, from 1549 down to 1552, had been using the book of 1549, which gave those directions, which are called the manual acts, that therefore the mere fact of their being left out in the second book would be taken by them as a prohibition; that they would all leave off a custom they had been used to all their lives?—No, I think not.

2335. You were asked by Lord Harrowby whether you considered a clergyman was at liberty to choose whatever he liked in restoring things not in habitual use and not prescribed in the Prayer Book, and you said that as there were no laws he must judge for himself; do you mean to say that there are no laws by which you may be guided at all in your choice in restoring things that are not prescribed in the Prayer Book?—The unanimous action of the Western and Eastern Church is what I said.

2336. Should you say that the discretion of the Bishop had anything to do with it?—Not if it came in conflict with the unanimous action of the Eastern and Western Churches.

Rev. G. Nugee,
M.A.
1 July 1867.

2337. You were asked by Sir Joseph Napier whether it was not the fact that the old books to which you made a reference had been destroyed, and therefore could not be supposed to be allowed to be resorted to. Are you aware whether, if there are not old books, there are old laws of the Church of England touching ritual matters, which are still in force?—There are a great many of them referred to in the Directorium.

2339. Do you know whether that law was revived by the statute of the 1st of Elizabeth, c. 1.?—Yes.

2340. Supposing that to be the law (I do not say it is), would not that be a definite source for you to go to for information, without having to range where you please?—Yes.

2341. Again, the Prayer Book of 1549, I suppose, may be taken as the standard of service at the beginning of the Reformation. Would it satisfy you to act up to what were the practices under that first book?—I think there are many things not prescribed there which one would wish to retain. Whether I should insist upon them I will not say.

2342. If you wanted to explain a doubtful point in the present Prayer Book, would you naturally go back to the Prayer Book of 1549, to do so?—Yes, I should.

2343. Mr. Walpole asked you whether you thought that there were any vestments in the reign of Elizabeth, such as you have been speaking of, in use, and I believe you said that you were not aware that that was the case?—No. I said I had a right to conclude that there were such, but I have no positive evidence.

2344. Do you know whether the "Interpretations" of the Injunctions of Elizabeth which were issued in 1564, I think, gave any direction as to what was to be used in the celebration of the Holy Communion in parish churches?—No.

2345. They directed that the cope should be used in all the parish churches. That was two years after the first Prayer Book of Elizabeth was issued. Then it would be fair to assume, at all events, that the use of the cope in parish churches had gone on for these two years?—Yes. The fact is, I must plead ignorance of these little rubrical minutiae. I have been away for a long time, and I am really at sea upon these matters, which were familiar to me, but I quite acquiesce in all that has been said, and I think it is a very fair argument.

2346. You were asked by two or three Commissioners, I think, whether the celebration of the Communion in your church on the black letter days was different from the celebration on other days. Do you mean to say, that you alter the services in any way on those days?—On the contrary, the service is literally and verbally the same. It is only a question of chanting. On minor festivals I chant the service without the accompaniment of the organ.

2347. Do you mean that you mark those days, being in the calendar, by having some change of altar vestments?—No; the altar cover is altered. If it is a virgin saint, for instance, it is white; if it is a martyr it is red.

2348. Do you always preach the sermon after the Nicene Creed in the morning?—Always.

2349. At what period of the Communion service do you go to the middle of the altar?—At the oblation.

2350. You said, I think, that you used hymns in the celebration?—Only during the communicating of the people.

2351. Do you consider that the first Prayer Book of 1549 would be any warrant for your doing that so far as post-Reformation practice is concerned?—I cannot say.

2352. Do you use lights at even-song in your church?—Not at the altar; never the sacramental lights.

2353. Do you use any lights in reading the gospel?—No.

2354. You spoke of incense at various parts of the Communion service; do you incense the consecrated elements?—I do not personally. The incense is merely brought in and burnt, without reference to the celebrant; merely by the acolyte.

2355. In speaking of the different classes of persons who attend your service, I do not think you said whether you have any farmers who attend?—Yes; my churchwarden attends; he is a farmer.

2356. You were asked a question with regard to the attendance of catechumens during the Communion of the people, and you said that your school-children attend?—On saints' days always in a body. On Sundays they do not come so much in a body.

2357. Would you draw a distinction between your school-children and the ancient catechumens?—It was only an idea which I had with respect to age.

2358. Were the catechumens baptised persons or not?—I believe there was a certain age attached to the idea of catechumens.

2359. In the ancient church to which you refer?—There would be no difference because they communicated very young.

2360. Were the persons called catechumens persons preparing for baptism?—They were preparing for baptism at all ages.

2361. Then their case would not be parallel to that of your school children who are baptized?—No.

2362. (Sir R. J. Phillimore.) I came into the room after your examination had begun, and I heard my own name mentioned. I think you said you did me the honour of consulting me. How long ago was that?—I did not consult your opinion exactly. I think Mr. Pollock did ask your opinion on one or two points.

2363. How long ago was that?—It must have been at least seven years ago.

2364. Not on any points now at issue?—No. I think it was about the approach to the chancel. I mentioned the fact to my bishop, that I was prepared to abide by your opinion in the event of his raising any question; which, however, he did not.

2365. Mr. Cardwell has asked you questions as to that memorial, of which I know nothing. It is complained here that there are phantoms coming out in your parish: "From these places are continually issuing forth phantoms." Have you any phantoms in your parish?—I suppose it refers to the young men wearing the cassock when they come to church. They wear their ordinary dress.

2366. It is said there are associates of the Inquisition in your parish. Do you know anything of them?—Oh dear, no.

2367. Is it your opinion that if the rubric of the Prayer Book directly orders you to pursue a particular course, you would be justified in disobeying that rubric because it was not consistent with your notions of what the Catholic Church was? I am speaking of a plain rubric. Supposing there was a plain rubric ordering you to do a particular thing, would you, as a clergyman of the Church of England, think yourself authorized to disobey that rubric because you thought it was contrary to Catholic principle?—No. If there is a positive injunction in the Prayer Book (and I have sworn to obey the Prayer Book) I obey the injunction but when the Prayer Book does not say anything about a question, I fall back on the Church Catholic for my authority.

2368. Then I am correct in supposing that you do not mean to say that you would think yourself justified in disobeying a plain precept of the Prayer Book?—Certainly not. I hope I am loyal to the Church of England, and I desire to be so.

2369. (Dean of Westminster.) You said, I think, that in cases where the rubric says nothing you are justified in going back both to the general usages of the Western Church, and also to the usages prescribed in the Levitical law?—I said this. I would fall back on the united action of the Western and Eastern Churches provided it were scriptural—Levitical and the Church of the Apocalypse.

2370. Are there any dresses or usages you observe which are prescribed in the Levitical law?—Of course we do not follow the dresses of the Aaronic priesthood; but it is generally supposed the Church Catholic adopted the vestments because the pattern of heavenly things was given them in the temple.

2371. Do you wear any dress prescribed by the Levitical law—a “breastplate,” or an “ephod,” or a “robe,” or a “bordered coat,” or a “mitre,” or a “girdle,”?—No.

2372. You mentioned certain pictures in the church of S. Clemente of Rome?—Yes.

2373. Are you aware of the persons who gave these pictures to the Church of S. Clemente, and the date when they were given by those persons?—The third century, I believe, not earlier; but that has been discussed in some very able articles, and I think it is a doubtful question.

2374. Has a foreign bishop ever officiated in your church?—He has never officiated in my church. He has been present in the church several different times.

2375. But he has not taken any part in the service?—Never.

2376. What foreign bishop was it?—It was the late Bishop of Iona; but I have had others. He never officiated in my parish church.

2377. Did he wear any dress?—He wore his cassock, the ordinary dress; a cassock and a black gown, which he wore about the place as well as in the church.

2378. Where was he seated in the church?—He sat in the chancel of the church.

2379. He took no part in the service?—No part of the parish church service for a second.

2380. He did not pronounce the benediction?—No.

2381. You spoke of the patterns of those dresses being taken from some old copes in the cathedral church of Salisbury; do you mean to say that those are the patterns from which all the chasubles in the Church of England are derived?—You mean in present use?

2382. Yes?—No.

2383. Supposing these vestments, the chasuble and the like, became universal in the Church of England, would that diminish from their significance or value in your eyes?—No, not that I am aware of. On the contrary, I should think.

2384. In speaking of Sir Robert Phillimore you said that you did not feel yourself bound to defer to the opinion of Sir Robert Phillimore, or the nine lawyers, or the opinion of the Convocation of the province of Canterbury, because you are waiting for the expression of the voice of the Church. Through what organ do you expect the voice of the Church to be pronounced which will over-rule these authorities?—It must have the final voice of Convocation to make it anything like acceptable in my own personal sight.

2385. Convocation has pronounced its opinion?—Only an opinion. If they will endorse any decision of the legislature of the country, then of course that is a different matter.

2386. What I wanted to ask you is what is the organ through which the voice of the Church is to be finally expressed?—Convocation.

2387. Convocation has expressed it?—Only as an opinion.

2388. You said you were waiting for some other voice?—No, I meant that. I mean the Church of England speaking by representation.

2389. You think Convocation has not spoken yet?—No; it has only expressed an opinion.

2390. (Bishop of London.) Are you in the habit of giving notice for persons to be prayed for in church?—Do you mean the sick.

2391. Any persons?—Only the sick.

2392. These notices never include persons who are deceased?—Never that I am aware of.

2393. No list is sent to you by a certain society?—No; I have never adopted that.

2394. You have seen the list?—Yes. I do not object to prayers for the departed, but I have not used them in my parish church, or in any other place.

2395. They are not used, in fact, in your church?—No.

2396. Does the celebration of the Lord's Supper at funerals take place in your church?—We very seldom have had it. If they express a wish to have the Communion early they can have it in the middle of the burial service. In that case the psalm is used as the introit, and then the Communion service is commenced.

2397. Is it incorporated in the middle of the funeral service?—Yes; and when they leave the church they go out in the ordinary way to the burial ground.

2398. After the administration of the Holy Communion?—After the administration of the Holy Communion.

2399. That is interposed between the part in the church and the part at the grave?—Yes; that has been our custom.

2400. Do you claim any authority for that?—Nothing in particular. I prefer almost that they come to Communion early, separate by itself, and I should urge them to do so when there is anything like a doubt on the subject; but the use of the Communion during funerals is fully recognized.

2401. By the term “Communion,” or by any other name?—“Communion” is our term. We do not use the word “mass” in our parish.

2402. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) You said that the anthem “Christ our Passover” is sung on Easter Eve in procession?—Yes, and on Easter Day.

2403. You know that that anthem takes place instead of the Venite on Easter Day?—Yes.

2404. Are we to understand the hymn takes place in the middle of the service?—I do not know that there is any harm in duplicating it.

2405. It is used in the middle of the service as well as in the procession?—Yes. We do not omit it in the middle of the service certainly. We keep strictly to the rubric in these things. We sing it twice. It happens to be the popular hymn of the day, and the one with which the choir are most familiar in walking in procession.

2406. You said that in the case of absolution you used the confession in the Visitation of the Sick?—The absolution, not the confession.

2407. By what authority do you use that form of absolution in your private confessions?—In the absence of any other.

The witness withdrew.

JOHN DEVERELL, Esquire, called in and examined.

J. Deverell, Esq.

2408. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) What parish do you reside in?—I reside in the parish of Farlington, Hampshire, and in the district of Purbrook, which has been carved out of Farlington.

2409. Do you live in the parish of Wymering, or in any parish over which Mr. Nugee presides?—I live on the borders of it, and a considerable portion of my estate is in Wymering parish, and some little portion in Wedley parish.

J. D. Verrell, Esq.
1 July 1857.

2410. You are a parishioner?—Yes; I pay tithes to Mr. Nugee, to Mr. Poole, and to Mr. Richards.

2411. You do not attend either of those churches; It has not been your habit to attend?—I have attended at all of them.

2412. You do not habitually attend?—No; for some years I have not done so.

2413. Have you left either of those churches for any particular reason?—I will be as brief as possible. I have made a short summary since I came up to town this morning. About the year 1844 or 1845 I was desirous of erecting a church at Purbrook, Purbrook being on the north side of Portsdown Hill, and the parish church, as was very common in former days, being at the extreme south end of the parish. The rector and patron of the parish did not coincide with me as to the church, and he proceeded to lay the foundation of a church at Purbrook. That church went on very slowly. It was either the year 1844 or 1845. In 1851 it was approaching completion. That was about five or six years. It was being built, and generally understood to be built, and the bishop so understood it, as a district church, as contra-distinguished from a chapel of ease. The Rev. Mr. Hayes, a man of property, was nominated by the patron to this church. He came to reside there in 1851. From causes which I will explain, differences arose between Mr. Hayes the rector and the bishop. Mr. Hayes said, "I understand you are not all very united in your church views here; I come for the sake of peace, and if any difference arises I shall refer it to the bishop." The rector and patron said, "I shall have the reference made to me." Upon this Mr. Hayes resigned and gave up the charge.

2414. What is the name of the patron?—The Rev. Edward T. Richards. He is patron and rector. For four or five years after Mr. Hayes retired nothing was done. There was a difference of opinion, I believe, between the Bishop and the patron as to the incumbent's being at liberty to follow the counsel of his Bishop if at variance with the directions of the patron. After the lapse of four or five years the rector and the Bishop came to an understanding, and then the rector said to the Bishop "I desire now to have the church consecrated as a chapel of ease." The Bishop said, "If you can get the consent of the parishioners to have it made a chapel of ease," (of course the Commissioners are aware there are certain regulations to be observed about the law,) "I cannot resist it. But, you must get a vote of the vestry on the matter." A vestry was convened with unusual speed, and it was held in March 1856. At that vestry it was proposed by the rector to the parishioners that the church should be consecrated as a chapel of ease. I, as one of the leading parishioners, I may say the leading parishioner in the parish, in common with the vast majority of the people, said, "We do not desire to have a chapel of ease, but we wish to have a district church." I then said to the rector "There is a large gathering of the parishioners"—I suppose such a vestry as was never held before in Farlington,—"let us avoid division; I do not want to have the matter decided exactly as I wish, but if you will appoint the Rev. Thomas Bagley" (who had been curate to Mr. Andrew Nugee, the brother of the gentleman who has just gone out,) "to the district church of Purbrook, I will double your endowment for Mr. Bagley's life to the satisfaction of our bishop; and, moreover, I will give him a house to live in rent free for his life." I had got Mr. Bagley's consent to accept it, if offered to him by the Bishop. He was a thorough Christian, but upon some Church matters which I need not now advert to, there was a difference between us. I had been in the habit of attending the church at Widley where Mr. Bagley had officiated, and I had been the means of rebuilding this church, and had learned with my family to esteem and respect Mr. Bagley. The rector said, "No, I will not accept Mr. Bagley." I replied, "I will make you one more offer before we come to a division, whether it is to be a district church or a chapel of ease. If you will appoint the gentleman who is present in the vestry as your curate, and who has canvassed this parish from one end to the other" (Mr. Winwood, who had just received a title to orders on the rector's nomination), "I will double his stipend, but I will not give him the house, because I understand he has other pecuniary means." The rector also declined to accept this offer. The consequence was, that a division took place in the vestry. I took a vote on the question; I had 74 votes and the rector had 14. The result was that the rector went the following morning to the Bishop, who was engaged in a consecration at Romsey, and said, "I have been out-voted in the vestry. If your lordship will license my church I shall be satisfied." He had previously observed to me several years ago, "Do you think I would do duty in an unconsecrated building?" I replied that "the late Archbishop had licensed a great many school buildings." The result of it was the Bishop declined to license the church. I went to the Bishop a few days afterwards, and said, "My lord, you see what a state we have been kept in for years. Here is my proposal to build and endow a church." He said, "I will endorse that proposal." The Church Commissioners were then sitting, and I carried in the proposal sanctioned by the Bishop. There was a struggle before the Commissioners, which went on for several months. The Bishop said, "He must now either have Purbrook Church consecrated, or your offer will be accepted, for the Archbishop and Commissioners have in Dec. 1856 agreed to accept it." At last, at the eleventh hour, (I believe only 48 hours before the expiration of the time) the rector signed a consent to consecrate it as a district church, but nothing was done in 1857. I went away to Brighton. I was weary of it, the state of things in the Church was so lamentable. I corresponded with the Bishop, and in 1858 this church, having been begun in 1844 or 1845, was, at last, consecrated. The Bishop came to Purbrook. The state of the burial ground was very incomplete; there was no fence or anything round it. The church was finished. When we came to the consecration service the Bishop refused to allow Mr. Brown, who was to be the incumbent, to officiate in any part of the service. Whether the Bishop was right or not, I am giving no opinion, but it was his own act. There was something in the dress that offended his Lordship—Mr. Brown had a cross on it. The Bishop also took off the communion cloth, which he considered too gaudy; there were also some candlesticks, and these he required to be removed. I believe, besides this, there was a super-altar. Mr. Brown came, and, to show my good will to the church, before the Bishop had left the village I presented Mr. Brown with 50*l.* to build a church-yard wall, which he was very thankful for; and during Mr. Brown's incumbency, though I differed widely from him on church matters, we were friends, but I could not go to the church. He had the candlesticks and everything replaced. I parted with him on the best terms. After Mr. Brown left, Mr. Peel was nominated, a gentleman of whom I knew very little, but I found he came from Wargrave in Berkshire. He was presented, and upon that occasion I went to him by the Bishop's order (I was then churchwarden of Purbrook) to request that the super-altar should be again removed from the Communion table. He was then at the rector's house, and I presented him with a memorial signed by nine-tenths of the parishioners. The result of it was that Mr. Peel continued there only nominally. I believe he read himself in, but I do not think he ever again did the service in the church at all. We saw no more of Mr. Peel, but any stray clergyman was put in that they could find. Then Mr. Peel, his duty having been performed as I have stated, after a lapse of some months retired from the scene altogether, and a Mr. Barker was put in. Mr. Barker never appeared in the village at all. I believe he read himself in, but at the expiration of six months he also retired. I should tell you that before the Bishop would accept the resignation of Mr. Brown, the first incumbent, he insisted that the candlesticks and a super-altar, and the vases, which had been replaced, should be removed, but the moment Mr. Brown had resigned, in defiance of the Bishop all these ornaments were replaced on the Communion table. I did not interfere with it. The Bishop, I thought, must be weary and sick of the thing. Then at that time I was driven (I do not hesitate to say I was driven) in self-defence,—seeing that these symbols of Popery, (as I considered them,) were replaced, and that they were calculated to mislead my own children, and also the villagers,—to take the only step left to me, namely, to build, as a temporary arrangement, a free church, in which the services of the Church of England should be performed. I selected a minister from Gloucester, who had been seven years in one church there, in one of Lady Huntingdon's chapels, and being satisfied with him, I brought him down. I gave him 150*l.* a year, and a house that I had offered to Mr. Bagley. He has since continued to perform the services of the church.

2415. Will you specify the particular articles which were so offensive to you that you thought it right to build this church?—Candlesticks, the super-altar, and the vases, which the Bishop had ordered to be removed. At that time the matter had not been legally decided, or I considered the Bishop was the best judge of those things, and as he had first removed these symbols from the Communion table, and then desired me as churchwarden to do it; when I became sequestrator, having the entire power of the church, and supplying it, I had to pay some of the costs of providing the church and of the sequestration. I removed these things in compliance with the Bishop's direction. I left the Bishop to decide that. He had refused to consecrate the church, and I considered he was the best judge of these matters. I am not here to give an opinion. It would be impertinent of me to do so. These were symbols. As I considered, they were unimportant things, so to speak, as compared with the doctrine which they symbolised, and I decided that I had no alternative on account of this constant change of ministers, and the restoring of these symbols, but to build my church as a temporary arrangement. I consider it so now, till a happier state of things shall arise. In Purbrook I had to supply my own church and that church, and to prove that I was a good churchman (I was in a very difficult position) I went to the parish church, the district church, in the morning, and I went to my own church in the evening; and to show your Grace that nothing went on different from the ordinary services of the Church of England, almost every clergyman (and I could name several) who came down to officiate at Purbrook Church, came to my church in the evening, there being morning and afternoon service at Purbrook, and morning and evening at my church. At the expiration of six months, the Rev. Alfred Poole was nominated. Of course, knowing what had occurred in the diocese of London, and that that had been confirmed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, I did not feel better satisfied with the prospect before me then, and I felt still more resolved to maintain my own church. I have continued to do so, and there has been a most continued and large congregation. Admiral Grey, the second in command at the dockyard, came to reside at Purbrook while this was going on, and he took sittings there, and during the whole time he brought his wife and family to my church, and since he has left he has written to me stating that he has never known services better performed. I mention this because when I was told that I was misleading the poor, and so on, it was a great consolation to me to know that Admiral Grey and others approved of what I did. I did not contemplate coming here to-day, but when I received the summons I felt it my duty to go on Sunday (yesterday) to Purbrook Church to satisfy myself as to its present state. I had not been within the walls of it since I had left it as sequestrator. I am on friendly terms with Mr. Poole. The last time I parted with him, as I did with Mr. Nugee, I shook hands with him although we differ in opinion. When I went into Purbrook Church yesterday, I found on the Communion table a super-altar, which is a ledge, and upon that a cross, four vases with flowers, and two candlesticks, which evidently had been lighted; there were also some geraniums and other things, and some banners. As far as Purbrook is concerned that is the state of the case. I was instrumental in rebuilding one of Mr. Nugee's churches, which had been shut up; I exerted myself and got a little Norman church built. I raised the money, partly subscribed to it myself, and got that church rebuilt when the old rector was there, before the Nugee family came to reside. It is a curious fact, as I told Mr. Nugee just now,—“that it was a turn of 48 hours whether he or a friend of mine became the patron of Wymering and Widley.” The advowson had been advertised for sale. I was told there was an influence at work that induced Mr. Nugee's brother to persuade his father to take the living out of the market, and then it fell into the hands of the Rev. George Nugee. After this I went on Saturday to Widley. I thought it right, as the Commissioners might wish to know what was going on in Widley Church, to go there and see. I knew no more than you did, till I received this summons, what was in the church. I had heard that it was not nearly so distasteful to the people as what was going on at Wymering. There I found two very large candles, which I understood (I do not know this of my own knowledge, but evidence can be got of it; I am sure Mr. Nugee would admit it) are lighted every Sunday by what they call an acolyte, before the Communion service; there were also on each side of the Communion Table the letters “I. H. S.” on one side, and “B. V. M.” on the other. I did not know what I should see when I went there.

2417. Was it embroidered?—I cannot say. Mr. Nugee would have told you the same thing. You really could not see any part of the ordinary dress of the clergyman. He had come over the hill with a biretta. I had never seen one of them before. There was a funeral going on, and, from his peculiar clothes down to his heels, you could not distinguish whether he had a coat and trowsers on. I should like to show the spirit with which I was actuated when I went to see Mr. Peel, as I have before stated, by desire of the Bishop, and I should much like to read the memorial, which was signed by nine tenths of the parishioners. It alludes to the ornaments and these innovations in the Purbrook Church—“21st June 1859.—Reverend Sir,—The undersigned are inhabitants of the district just committed to your pastoral care. They take the liberty of addressing to you this memorial, partly to welcome you to this field of labour, and partly to express to you their earnest hope that constant concord may prevail between themselves and you. They are far from wishing to anticipate the contrary, for to presume that discord must arise would be to presume that your ministry would be not merely nullified, but actually provocative of evil. Nevertheless, many have been compelled of late years to observe attempts made in the Church of England to reintroduce usages which, being the insignia of Rome, had been either directly forbidden, or else quietly allowed to drop into oblivion. And they therefore feel called on thus to express their hope that no such attempts will be renewed or made here. It appears to them, by whatever plea these innovations (for such they practically are) have been defended, they are deeply to be regretted by all who love the Church of England, and who venerate the Christian religion. That they have not produced peace is obvious; and should it be urged that they tend to give solemnity to our worship, and authority to our ministers, may it not be replied, as to our worship, those usages must be best which best harmonise with the pure, simple, and spiritual character of our faith, and as to our clergy, that authority can alone be edifying which rests upon the plain fidelity of him who claims it. In fact, as they believe that the faith of Christ unvitiated and unobscured by human inventions is the only source of happiness, virtue, and salvation, they pray that God may give you grace to preach and themselves grace to hear it in such a way that your ministerial connexion with this place may be sealed with His present and eternal blessings."

2418. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) Was that addressed to Mr. Poole?—To Mr. Peel in the rector's house. That memorial was taken up and presented by me. He said, "I will not receive it." I put it down on the chair in the rector's presence. Mr. Peel threw the address down on the carpet. I picked it up, and I was then shown out of the room. This is a plain, unexaggerated statement.

2419. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) How long did Mr. Peel stay?—He never came again.

2420. (Bishop of London.) I understand that it is many years since you ceased to be present at either of these parish churches?—I was at Widley for a long time, during the whole time Mr. Bagley officiated there, and my children went there. I went to Purbrook Church during the time I was sequestrator.

2421. In what year did you finally absent yourself from the parish church?—When I ceased to be sequestrator. It was in 1860.

2422. Then you continued to attend the parish church up to the year 1860?—At the parish church at Widley so long as Mr. Bagley and his successor as curate remained.

2423. I do not understand what was the exact reason for your leaving it, and establishing another church at that time?—I was pained with the state of things in Purbrook church—the replacing of these symbols, and the whole system; and I considered that these were symbols of the doctrine. I should not have cared so much if they were not symbolical.

2424. I understand first that you disapproved of these things; and, secondly, you considered the Bishop had disapproved of them, and they had no right to be there?—Certainly.

2425. Were you churchwarden then?—I was.

2426. Why did you not present them to the Bishop?—I took them off when I was there as sequestrator, and it was of no use. I did it practically. I would not trouble the Bishop further.

2427. When you found them there were you still churchwarden?—No, I got tired of it.

2428. Who were the churchwardens?—I believe some of the inhabitants; I was wearied out.

2429. Were they persons of different opinions?—One of them, I believe is. I believe, generally, the inhabitants, in order to secure that there may be no trouble about the burials, have put in one person as chapelwarden.

2430. They generally put in a person who agrees with the incumbent?—I think Mr. Taylor was put in, but on that point as to what was going on in Purbrook, I really do not know.

2431. It is the constitutional mode of the laity expressing their opinion with regard to the service of the Church of England, to exercise it through their own churchwardens, appealing to the Bishop?—Yes.

2432. There is a vestry, I suppose, in your parish?—You can hardly call it a vestry. There was one vestry held for the appointment of chapelwarden, but there was no other vestry held. None of the parochial business is done there.

2433. In electing the chapelwardens was no care taken to appoint a person who would represent their opinions?—I ceased to go there. I must be honest, and say, I felt it hopeless, and when Mr. Poole came he seemed to be permanently there, and I said, "I can do no more."

2434. You did not go to Wymering Church when you were unable to go to your own?—That would have been worse.

2435. How do you know; you never went?—It was too notorious. Mr. Nugee is my tenant. I have been rather blamed that I did not turn him out; but I said I would not do so because Mr. Nugee differed from me.

2436. You were blamed by parishioners?—Yes.

2437. Is it of your knowledge that a large body of the parishioners are greatly opposed to these practices?—I believe a great many close to the church are. One of the principal farmers comes from just opposite Mr. Nugee's church, two miles, to my church, and has sittings there.

2438. Is there a large congregation in this building you have erected?—Yes, it is very full.

2439. What sort of persons does it consist of?—There is every description. There is now Lady Hayes, the daughter of Lady Pakenham, and her family.

2440. (Mr. Walpole.) How many altogether does it hold?—From 180 to 200.

2441. (Bishop of London.) What is the size of the parish?—It is not a very large district. I should think there are 300. The great number of these people come from Purbrook, but they come from all directions, from Mr. Nugee's parishes.

2442. Do they come from any other parishes besides these three?—Yes, they come from Mr. Richards' parish.

2443. Not from any others?—I should scarcely think any come except those, because there is a church at Waterloo which is satisfactory.

2444. Where was Admiral Grey living?—Just out of the district. It is curious to see how the parishes run in and out.

2445. Was he living in any of those three parishes when he did live there?—No, he was living in Southwick.

2446. There was a parish church there?—Nearly four miles distant from his house.

2447. Perhaps it was because of the distance that he came to you?—There were other churches near. I can only speak of the fact that he did come.

2448. Are they all of the same pattern?—No. Practically a man with such a family as Admiral Grey, eight or ten children, could not take his children to Southwick Church from Purbrook.

2449. He would naturally have gone where?—To Purbrook, which was close to him.

2450. Have you any reason to know why he did not go there?—I have no right to express what I do not know.

2451. Your impression is that he did not go there because he disapproved of the service?—Yes.

2452. Is it your impression that a number of persons in that neighbourhood are prevented from attending their parish church on account of the sort of service that takes place there?—Yes, they are dissatisfied with the system.

2453. Are you certain of that?—That is my impression.

2454. Perhaps your minister is so good a preacher that he attracts all the people?—I should not say that that would be the result. It is very difficult to give an opinion as to what leads persons' minds to come there.

2455. You are a magistrate?—Yes, and have been for many years.

2456. Are you a barrister?—No, I am not.

2457. Do you consider that it was the uncertainty of the law in carrying out the Bishop's wishes that caused the whole of this mischief?—I consider that it certainly was, because all this state of things at Wymering has been represented to the Bishop, and he has done nothing. My impression is that the Bishop's hands are tied by the uncertain state of the law.

2458. So that you never thought with your friends of applying to a court of law to settle these matters?—No.

2459. Why not?—I once thought I would try the question of building a church and getting a clergyman of the Church of England established, but I was morally certain that I should immediately have had the officiating clergyman put into the Ecclesiastical Court.

2460. That is not the point. There is no doubt that would be illegal. But why did you not, having individually been very liberal and willing to contribute to the support of the clergyman, and spending your money very freely in this manner, never think of proceeding by a court of law against this gentleman?—Because I thought the state of the law was such that it was imposing a great duty on the Bishop, and I was not inclined so to spend my own money.

2461. But the Bishop would have had nothing to do with it except to sign his name?—I should not have liked to have risked expenses of legal proceedings in the uncertain state of the law.

2462. Have you ever looked into the law on this question?—I have read almost everything that has come up on the subject, and it seemed to me very difficult—I have a great dread of the Ecclesiastical Courts. They are very expensive.

2463. You took legal advice as to whether it would be wise to proceed?—I cannot say I took formal legal advice.

2464. You consulted an eminent civilian?—Yes, I did consult people. I have read all that I could lay my hands upon. Although I was not a barrister, I was a solicitor in tolerably active practice. I was the means many years ago of putting down (and the late Archbishop and the Bishop of Winchester thanked me for it) the Rev. Robert Taylor, whose blasphemy was going on at the Rotunda, Blackfriars. The present Lord Chancellor was the counsel, and I got up the whole evidence for the prosecution.

2465. Are any of the farmers of these parishes in the habit of coming to your church?—Unquestionably, from Mr. Nugee's parish and from over the hill.

2466. How many farmers are there in Mr. Nugee's parish?—There are not a great many farmers there. Mr. Pettis comes, and several of the inhabitants, Sir Lucius Curtis sometimes.

2467. He is not a farmer. How many farmers do you suppose absent themselves from the parish church?—The two principal farmers, Mr. Pettis from Wymering, and Mr. Randall from Farlington.

2468. One, in fact, from Mr. Nugee's parish?—Yes, and some shopkeepers and other persons.

2469. Do the poor come to your chapel?—You would say so if you had been there yesterday. And also a number of children.

2470. Do the poor not go to the parish church?—I should say very few comparatively.

2471. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) How long ago is it since you came to reside in Farlington?—I bought the estate in December 1837; it was conveyed to me then.

2472. At that time Purbrook was a part or hamlet of the old parish?—Yes.

2473. Was your house in Purbrook or Farlington?—In Purbrook district.

2474. When you first went to Farlington did you attend the parish church?—I went to the parish church.

2475. How long did you continue to attend there?—I continued to attend there for some considerable time. I found the parish in a lamentable state when I went there, and I succeeded in getting a commutation of the tithes. *There was not a person who would undertake it until I entered upon it. They told me it was utterly hopeless, but I succeeded in getting a very good commutation, so much so that when the Assistant Tithe Commissioner reported to the Bishop (it being private property), he said that we had given the rector 50*l.* a year more than he would have got under a compulsory measure.

2476. How long during this residence in Farlington did you continue to attend Farlington parish church?—

I think it must have been till about the year 1843 or 1844. I will tell you the circumstances under which I left. Mr. Richards had a very large family. I proposed that, as soon as I finished my house that I would build a large schoolroom there in the shape of a cross. Sir Henry Thompson had done the same thing at Fareham. I got a drawing of this. I met Mr. Richards and said, "Now I propose to build this schoolroom, you have it licensed by the Bishop, and give us one service there." I felt it would not do, with his large family, to impose upon him a second clergyman. He said to me, "You come to church next Sunday and you will hear my views on church building." It was Advent Sunday, and the Bishop had desired a sermon to be preached for the Diocesan Church Building Society, to which I had always been a subscriber. I went to the church. I well remember the day. It was blowing a southwester, and rained, and it was no trifle to cross Portsdown Hill. Mr. Richards had specially invited me to come. He said, "There are those who give their pounds who ought to have given their tens," (I well remember the words,) "and persons giving their tens who ought to be giving hundreds, and persons giving their hundreds who ought to be giving their thousands for church building. There are those who can build large houses and furnish them, and ornament them in the most costly way, who think no house too mean for God to be worshipped in." I exchanged looks with my wife. I said, "We do not go to church to have our feelings disturbed. What was predicated when I came here that I should be in the same position as the rest of the parish, has come to pass, and I think it is time that we left the church." If I went into detail you would sit here till midnight to hear the efforts I have made to get a gospel and plain ministry into my own locality.

2477. Then you consider that what Mr. Richards said in that sermon was personally offensive to you?—Most unquestionably.

2478. Intended to be directed to you?—I was specially invited, and I think you must admit it was.

2479. Had there been any difference of opinion between you and Mr. Richards before that?—I had done all I could. I found almost everybody at variance with him.

2480. What had led to a difference of opinion between yourself and him?—At that time I had not come to any open rupture with him.

2481. You spoke of having offered to build a church in Purbrook. Was that offer made before this sermon was preached?—I think it must have been after, but it is very difficult after so many years to charge my memory.

2482. What was the reason your offer was not accepted?—For this reason: I said, "I propose to build a schoolroom which can be used after the pattern of Sir Henry Thompson's." I drew it in the shape of a cross, so that it would be established for boys and girls, and also open for divine service. When I made this proposal to him, I meant this building to have cost me 500*l.* or 600*l.*, and I would have built it so substantially that it might ultimately have been consecrated if desired. I had great facilities for building then, having a brickyard.

2483. Was there any difference of opinion between you with regard to this proposed building, arising from the fact that you wanted to have the patronage, or you wished the Bishop to have it and not the rector?—It was not proposed to have a consecrated building; merely to have it licensed by the Bishop, so that it would have been in the entire control of Mr. Richards.

2484. Did you make any proposal about the building not being consecrated at that time?—When he rejected this offer and I left the church, I had the ground measured, and I found that under the old Church Building Acts I was just the distance that would justify me in building the church. I must, in explanation, say that when I left Farlington, and this offer of the schoolroom had been rejected, it was my intention at once to have begun to build a church. Then the rector, who had never spoken of it—I cannot tell what was in his mind,—at once proceeded to lay the foundation of Purbrook Church, which went on for a series of years. He occupied the ground and prevented my doing anything.

2485. What I wish to ascertain is, whether the reason of your leaving Farlington Church was on account of any dispute between yourself and the rector of Farlington, or whether it was on account of so-called ritual practices that you found in the church?—There was no such thing known in those days; happily, we knew nothing of this in the rural districts; this has all sprung up since. I am speaking of the year 1844 or 1845.

2486. Though you reside in Purbrook, which is not very far off, if you are dissatisfied with the services in Purbrook Church, why should you not attend the services in Farlington Church? Are there any ritual practices there now which you object to?—After what you have heard of how I have been received at Farlington rectory, and various circumstances that have occurred there, and if I were to state to you all that took place over the tomb of my wife, which I do not wish to do, you would see I could not go there. I should rather go nowhere.

2487. It is not on account of any ritual practices that you do not go now?—I do not go there, and there are very few that do go there.

2488. You built this chapel after the church at Purbrook was erected?—Yes; and after it was consecrated, I waited with a hope that something would be done. I did not want to have it all my own way. Mr. Bagley was a person who held very decided Church opinions; but he was a thoroughly good man, and myself and my family would only have been too happy and too thankful to have made him comfortable. I was the cause of getting him the curacy of Portsmouth through the instrumentality of the Bishop, and explained to the Bishop how he was oppressed. We got him the curacy, and, unfortunately, he fell a victim to the work in that parish. I have always felt thankful that I made him the offer. I believe if it had pleased God he had come to the village of Purbrook he might have lived; but he was worn out at Portsmouth.

2491. I think you mentioned that you offered assistance in some form or other for the minister you wished to have appointed to Purbrook Church?—I offered to double his salary and give him a house.

2492. Was that to be a permanent endowment or during his lifetime?—During his lifetime. Of course he might be turned out to-morrow, and then perhaps I should have endowed a man I did not approve of.

2493. Do you recollect writing a letter touching this subject in the "Guardian" in 1859?—I dare say I did.

2494. Do you remember whether there was any answer to that letter by Mr. Richards?—I dare say there was.

2495. Do you recollect whether there was a second answer by Mr. Skinner?—Possibly there was, but I have not kept the papers, and, as I said to Mr. Nugee, some time since, "You follow your course and I will pursue mine, but it is no use writing in the public papers, that does no good whatever."

2496. (Rev. R. Gregory.) Is your building licensed as a dissenting chapel?—Yes, it is licensed for members of the Church of England protesting in self-defence against the Romanizing principles and practices as carried out in this locality.

2497. As a dissenting chapel, is it not?—It is licensed as a place of religious worship under the Religious Worship Act, which is perfectly legal. I do not consider that I have left the Church of England.

2498. You have known the neighbourhood for a long time. When you knew Wymering church 20 years ago was it well attended by farmers and poor people?—Yes, there was a very full attendance, and at Widley too; I have seen Widley overflowing. I do not know how it is attended now.

2499. You do not know whether it is well attended or not now?—I am told that it is attended by a great many persons not parishioners. Sir Lucius Curtis, Bart., has just opened a service in his school-room in Widley, and there is an evening service there, where part of the Church of England service is read. The whole of the Church of England service is read in my church, with the exception that we do not read the Athanasian Creed. As to the state of things in Wymering Church, I dare say Mr. Nugee has told you straightforwardly what he has done, but that petition to the Bishop which Mr. Venn requested me to bring up describes accurately what took place there on Easter Sunday, and it is a petition not got up for this purpose but got up for presentation to the Bishop. If you were to read it you would really be surprised at what goes on.

2500. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) Have you a Communion table in your chapel?—I have.

2501. Where does it stand?—Just where it would in a church.

2502. At the east end?—Yes.

2503. Has it got a cloth upon it?—Yes, and the letters "I.H.S."

2504. What is the colour of the cloth?—It is purple.

2505. Is it velvet?—No.

2506. Have you a different cloth for Lent?—No.

2507. Does your minister wear the surplice?—He wears the surplice and a black scarf, and he preaches in a black gown; and I will undertake to say that the majority of the gentlemen in this room, if they went into my church, would not be able to distinguish it from an ordinary church served by a Church of England clergyman. That is what they are so angry with me for. I said, "I am not a Baptist or a Wesleyan; I am a member of the Church of England." They said, "We would not have cared if you had had a regular dissenting chapel." "But," I said, "that is just what I do not want to have."

2508. Where did that gentleman officiate before he went to you?—He was seven years in Lady Huntingdon's chapel at Gloucester. He is not an extreme man.

2509. Did he wear a surplice and scarf there?—I do not think he did.

2510. He adopted the surplice and scarf at your request?—Yes.

2511. You do not object then to a certain amount of formality and ritualism?—It is the custom of the country to wear a surplice. I have been used to it all my life. I bought the surplice and even the gown.

2512. Did not you object to "I.H.S." on the Communion table cloth?—No, I did not, because I put it there.

2513. You only object to it at the side?—I do not object to it at the side. I did not say that I did. I object to "B.V.M." decidedly.

2514. You have not got that in your chapel?—Certainly not.

2515. Is your chapel free?—Yes, a few sittings are let. The seat-renters wish to support it. I give my minister 150*l.* a year and a house to live in, and I suppose I let sittings to the amount of 25*l.* or 30*l.*, but all the sittings for the poor are free.

2516. Is it near your own residence?—Yes, on the borders of the park; but I removed it purposely out of the village of Purbrook, because I would not, as it were, thrust it offensively upon Purbrook Church. I hope some day or other to have a change; if Mr. Richards would sell me the advowson of Purbrook Church I would double the building, and shut up my church, or make a library of it or something else. Or I hope the Bishop, being petitioned by a large portion of the inhabitants of a district who are dissatisfied with the minister, may be empowered to examine the clergyman and license (not consecrate) the building pro tempore. It seems to me, if I may be allowed to express an opinion, that this is the only way in which these evils can be met.

2517. You are therefore an advocate for a large change in our ecclesiastical law and system?—Such a change as that. I do not like what my friend Mr. Yorke advocates in a book he once wrote, which I wish you would read. It is called "Ultra Parochialism." I am a great advocate for the parochial system, but I think you may drive the thing too far. I think in my case, if the Bishop could have done what he had not the power to do, namely, license my church, it would not have been a perpetual evil; and I am of opinion if that could be done now, if there were laymen who were as willing to put their hands in their pockets as they ought, you would find a great deal of this ritualism would be suppressed by the plain preaching of the simple truth of the Gospel; for there is no doubt that the poor people will follow the plain teaching of the Gospel.

2518. If your principles were carried out would not gentlemen who are fond of ritualism build chapels more easily, and more than they do now?—Unquestionably, but I should have no fear of the result.

2519. (Dean of Ely.) Did I understand you that clergymen officiate in this church or chapel of yours?—No; I would not put a clergyman in that position. They have come there to attend the service, when I was sequestrator of Purbrook, and had to provide for Purbrook Church for the two services. They used to come to my church, as I have stated, to the evening service.

2520. No clergyman officiated?—No.

2521. You spoke of having taken certain ornaments away from the Lord's Table, and their being replaced; by whom were they replaced?—By whoever came into authority after me; by the clergyman for the time being. Mr. Poole has got an excess of those things that the Bishop removed. I went yesterday after the service was over, anticipating that the question might be asked me. I thought it was right, in order to give you evidence, to tell you exactly what was in Purbrook Church.

2522. And the ornaments that you objected to were two candlesticks and several vases?—There were four vases, two candlesticks with candles, and a shelf or superaltar.

2523. Those were the things you objected to?—Yes, and I am pretty sure there were bannets.

2524. You objected to seeing upon the Lord's table two candlesticks and two or three vases?—I think they were not necessary there.

2525. Those are what you objected to?—Yes.

2526. Are there any vestments now used in Purbrook Church?—I believe not; but I saw a pamphlet the other day, saying that vestments were wanted, and they only wanted money to procure them. I should also state that a lady whose husband has been there 40 years told me on Saturday that she, like myself, had been obliged to send her daughter elsewhere. She would not send her to Mr. Poole to be examined for confirmation. She sent her to a neighbouring parish. My minister examined several children, and prepared them for confirmation, and then, in order to pass them, he spoke to the clergymen of Fareham and of Bishop's Waltham, the clergyman of Portsea having objected and written to the Bishop. Mr. Nugee followed these children into the parish church at Fareham, and the children were actually turned out unconfirmed. One or two of them were afterwards confirmed here through his Lordship when I came up to town. As I was residing in town it was perfectly regular. My own daughter went to Winchester, where she was confirmed.

2527. (Bishop of Gloucester.) You mentioned that the minister now in the chapel came from Gloucester; I did not catch his name?—The Rev. Thomas Roberts.

2528. How long ago did he come to you?—He came on the 8th January 1860, and he had been seven years at Gloucester. I believe he was very much respected there.

2529. (Earl Beauchamp.) With regard to the poor coming to your meeting house, are they your own tenants?—Many of them are, and many are not my own labourers. I leave every person perfectly free. I have labourers working for me who do not come to my church. I am very thankful to see them there if they come, and my daughters have a large school.

2530. What place of worship do they attend?—Either Mr. Richards' or Mr. Poole's, or wherever they think fit. I should be very sorry to constrain anybody.

2531. You are aware that some of the poor do attend their parish churches?—I believe they do, but I do not know it of my own knowledge, because I do not see them there. When I pay them for the Good-Friday, which I always do, I say to my paymaster, "Ascertain that they have been at some place of worship; if they have been at no place of worship, do not pay them. Let them go where they please, to a Roman Catholic chapel if they please to do so; but if they do not go to any place of worship you are not to pay them."

2532. They all know that you observe whether they go there or not?—I never influence them.

2533. You do not interfere with them?—I do not constrain them. They know, of course, I should be glad, as every gentleman would be, to see his labourers come to be instructed. I have a large night school, which I maintain myself. I built that at the other end of the parish, and I had 25 average attendance all last winter.

2534. They pay for that?—They pay twopence each per week, and I pay the rest. I have got a good master.

2535. You told us, I think, that some farmers from Wymering parish attended your services?—Mr. Pittis does.

2536. Does he come regularly?—Yes, and has regular sittings. He lives opposite Mr. Nugee.

2537. Does he attend regularly?—He very rarely misses, and the principal farmer on the other side of the hill, close to Mr. Richards' church, Mr. Osman Randall, has also sittings, and comes regularly.

2538. May I ask the date when your place of worship was registered under the Religious Worship Act?—It was in January 1860.

2539. That was subsequent to the decision of the Consistorial Court of London, which was delivered in the year 1856?—Yes.

2540. Which recognized the legality of what you have described as the Romanizing practices?—I do not describe them as the Romanizing practices. I describe them as what my Bishop objected to.

J. Deverell, Esq.

1 July 1867.

J. Deverell, Esq.

1 July 1867.

2541. You have told us that this meeting house is registered as of members of the Church of England protesting against Romanizing practices?—Yes, and alluding to Mr. Nugee's as well.

2542. Your meeting house was registered in the year 1860, and the Romanizing practices to which you refer were the super-altar and the two candlesticks?—And what was going on at Wymering besides.

2543. Are you prepared to state that Mr. Nugee, or the incumbent of Wymering at that time, was in the habit of wearing vestments?—I do not think he did. I did not go to Mr. Nugee's church, therefore I cannot say.

2544. (Archbishop of Armagh.) You left your ancient church on account of certain practices, you say not Romanizing practices, but such as you thought unusual and unedifying?—It was the defiance of the Bishop's authority, the constant putting back of these things, and so on, which was irritating to my feelings. One day one person was in, another day there was another, and then the incumbent himself was never there, as I have explained.

2545. They were hurtful to your conscience, were they?—They were, certainly, and I could have stood a great deal of it, because I hope my principles have been formed for more than 40 years.

2546. I think you said you are an attached member of the Church of England?—I am.

2547. And you made the best arrangement in your power to secure for yourself and family the means of worshipping after the accustomed manner of the Church of England to the best of your belief?—I did.

2548. You were forced to employ a dissenter because you thought the neighbouring clergy were departing from the practice and doctrine of the Church of England?—Yes.

2549. Were many of the parishioners moved by the same motive?—The memorial which has been read was signed by, I think, about nine tenths of the inhabitants of the district.

2550. They strongly object to these innovations?—Many do, very strongly.

The witness withdrew.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY IN THE CHAIR.

REV. WILLIAM JAMES EARLY BENNETT, M.A., called in and examined.

Rev. W. J. E.
Bennett, M.A.

4 July 1867.

2551. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) You are the incumbent of Frome?—Yes.

2552. How long have you been so?—Since the year 1852. It must be 15 years.

2553. Have you made any change in the service since you became incumbent?—Yes, very many changes.

2554. What were the services before you came, as far as you know?—When I came I found them to be on Sunday morning at 11 o'clock, afternoon service at 3, and another afternoon service at half-past 6, a service on Wednesday and Friday, and a celebration of the Holy Communion once a month.

2555. Were the saints' days observed, do you know?—No, never observed at all.

2556. Do you know whether Ash Wednesday, Ascension Day, and Christmas Day were observed?—Christmas Day was observed, but not Ascension Day. Ash Wednesday, I believe, was observed; but I am not quite certain about that.

2557. Will you tell me what changes you have made in the services on Sunday. Tell me the order of your services on Sunday at the present time?—There is celebration of the Holy Communion every morning.

2558. Do you mean every morning in the week?—Yes; twice on the first Sunday in the month, and three times on all the great festivals. There is also morning and evening prayer every day. On Sunday morning prayer; at 3 o'clock the Litany with catechising; and in the evening the old service that was still remaining, at half-past 6. On great festivals we have additional services of various kinds, short services, such as litanies. In Lent there are many short services.

2559. Of what are these short services composed?—A litany, a hymn, and a sermon. It is so generally, and particularly in Lent.

2560. Do you use the surplice?—We use the surplice always in the matins and evensong, at all times, except during the Holy Communion.

2561. What else do you use at other times?—At the Holy Communion we use the vestments.

2562. Will you describe them?—The chasuble, dalmatic, and tunicle.

2563. Do you use those vestments at any other time, or any portion of them?—No, we never use them except at that time.

2564. Not at the Magnificat?—No.

2565. How do you justify using the vestments?—That would take a long time to answer.

2566. I do not want you to go through the whole argument?—How I justify it, would take a long time.

2567. It might be a very short answer, I should think?—I will make it as short as I can. I justify it upon the Catholic usage of the Church throughout the world, interpreted by our canons and Prayer Book.

2568. You have heard that there is very great difference of opinion among lawyers as to the legality of these vestments?—Yes, I have heard that.

2569. You think you are competent to decide that when learned lawyers differ?—Yes, until it is prohibited by some act of the Church.

2570. Then you act upon the principle that every clergyman is at liberty, in things which the Church has not forbidden, to exercise his own discretion as to the usage which each in his own opinion believes to be according to Catholic usage?—Not any usage; but those usages which are very plain to him and to his congregation.

2571. Plain; in what sense?—Not forbidden by the law, and desired by the people. I consider that the consent of the congregation and parishioners is of very great consequence.

2572. You do not act at all in conformity with the opinion of your Bishop?—My Bishop has never said a word to me on the subject.

2573. Do you use incense?—Yes.

2574. Do you incense persons and things?—We incense the altar and the Holy Gospel.

2575. You hold that to be legal—to swing the censer?—Yes; if I thought it illegal I should not do it.

2576. What is your practice with respect to lights?—We always burn lights at the Sacrament.

2577. How many lights have you?—Two.

2578. You never have more than two, have you?—Never more than two upon the altar; there are lights surrounding, the usual lights, but they have nothing to do with the altar.

2579. With respect to musical services, will you tell me what choral service you have?—In the matins and evensong I have the service entirely intoned as in a cathedral. I have anthems and services. In the Holy Communion I have the music all through.

2580. With respect to the mixed chalice, do you use pure wine or wine and water?—We pour the wine first, and then add a little water in the chalice for consecration.

2581. And that you justify on the same principle, do you, of usage?—Yes; the same principle as the vestments and the lights.

2582. Do you introduce any singing in the celebration of the Holy Communion?—Yes; we sing a hymn at the offertory. We sing the Kyrie eleison and the usual parts, the Gloria, and the Creed. What is not in the Prayer Book is a hymn which we use at the offertory.

2583. That is to say during the sentences being read?—After one or two of the sentences have been read, we sing a eucharistic hymn.

2584. You have no authority for that in the rubric, have you?—We have no authority in the rubric to direct us; but there is no authority to direct other hymns which are sung at matins and evensong in every church throughout England.

2585. What do you infer from that?—I consider that I have a right to use the same liberty which other churches use.

2586. But then the liberty which others use is in most instances between two services, not in the middle of one service. There is some distinction there?—I have heard hymns sung as the preacher is going up into the pulpit, which is in the middle of the service, being after the Nicene Creed.

2587. (Archbishop of Armagh.) You said you used the vestments, by which I understand the chasuble, cope, and dalmatic?—Not the cope. I should use the cope if I were wealthy enough to have one, but I am not; the chasuble, dalmatic, and tunicle are all that I use.

2588. You said you were authorized to do so by the Catholic usage of the Church interpreted by our canons?—And Prayer Book.

2589. Where do you find in the canons the chasuble mentioned, or any authority to use it?—I said that it was a difficult question to answer off-hand, but I could produce the answer if I had time and the references, because the canons are involved in very great obscurity. I say the canons of the Church, not only the canons of the English Church, but the canons of the universal Church which are not forbidden by the canons of the English Church. It would require a great deal of time to answer that question. I beg particularly to remark that, and also that I can only answer off-hand in the shortest possible way.

2590. Do you not think that we are bound by our own canons, by the canons of our own Church, with respect to the vestments we use in divine service, and that we should not go round the world for the canons?—No; by the canons interpreted by the various injunctions and other authoritative decrees that have passed throughout the history of the English Church and have been pro and con at all times.

2591. Have any of the congregation objected at any time to the use of the vestments?—I thought that this would form the most important part of the proceedings, therefore I have brought a letter in which I was invited to do this very thing. I always told the people that I thought that was the correct usage of the Church of England, and I never interfered nor did I attempt to do so till I was publicly invited to do it by the document presented to me officially by the churchwardens and the communicants of the congregation. Then I thought it was my bounden duty to follow what they desired, considering it to be the law of the Church. If you wish to have this in evidence, here is the document.

2592. (Earl Stanhope.) What is the date of it?—November 15th, 1865.

2593. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) By whom is it signed?—By the churchwardens officially, and a number of the communicants in the name of all the rest. It is as follows: "All glory be to God." (The reason of that is that it is Bishop Ken's motto; he lies buried in our churchyard.) "Rev. and dear Sir,—We, communicants of the parish church of St. John the Baptist, Frome-Selwood, desire to make an offering to Almighty God of the enclosed sum of 30 guineas to be employed, subject to your full approval and sanction, in providing the proper and legal vestments to be used by the celebrant and his assistants at the Office of the Holy Eucharist in the above-named church. You have always taught us that, together with the restoration of the material fabric of our own church should be combined the restoration of the beauty and dignity of Christian worship within its walls, and more particularly so in all that appertains to the Holy Altar and to those who minister thereat. In accordance, therefore, with this teaching we present our united offering, and we have much pleasure in doing so at this time as a token of our thankfulness to God in having spared you to complete another year of your life and labours amongst us. May it please Him to grant you many happy returns of your birthday, and to fulfil your heart's desire of seeing the old church fully restored, both within and without, to its former glory and beauty, and your people as lively stones built up more and more firmly in the great spiritual temple which cannot be removed. This, reverend and dear sir, is the sincere prayer of yours faithfully and affectionately,"—then come the names of the churchwardens and a number of communicants.

2594. (Archbishop of Armagh.) Was that signed by all the parishioners?—By a great number of the communicants; not by all the parishioners. Those who were not communicants would have nothing to do with it.

2595. Did any dissent from that?—I never heard of any.

2596. (Earl of Harrowby.) Do you mean the whole body of the communicants?—No; a certain number representing others.

Rev. W. J. F. Bennett, M.A.

4 July 1867.

Rev. W. J. E.
Bennett, M.A.
4 July 1867.

2597. How is it stated there?—There are signatures of 21 men and 35 women, and the two churchwardens.

2598. (Archbishop of Armagh.) What is the population of your parish?—Our parish is divided into the old parish church and two new district churches. Those that remain connected with the old parish church are about 5,000.

2599. You made this great change at the solicitation of 50 people out of a population of 5,000?—I wish I had to deal with the 5,000; but at least 3,000 of them are Dissenters. I have not any doubt that if I had to deal with them they would be most glad to accede to what has been done.

2600. Did you consider that these vestments would make an additional bar to the Dissenters returning to our Communion?—No, certainly not. If I had thought so I should not have done what I did, but I thought it an additional reason to bring them into the Church, because I thought that the more distinctive the Church is from dissent the better for the church.

2601. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) We do not see on this paper that the signatures are on behalf of others?—No; it does not say so; but it never was contemplated that it should be brought forward in an official way. It was a friendly act of so many amongst ourselves. If you like to have another document you shall have one within a week, signed by a hundred more. It was only a friendly act. I thought it would be an interesting thing to show that we work harmoniously together.

2602. (Archbishop of Armagh.) Then this was not a call from the parish, nor can it be understood in any sense to be a call from your parishioners; only a certain number of persons who attended the Communion wished you to wear these vestments, being a very small number out of such a large body?—No, I cannot allow that inference. There is an inference involved in that question. If you would like to have it tested within a week, I will poll the parishioners, and the Communicants, and send up the document; but, I repeat, it is not fair to make that inference.

2603. That is what appears before the Commissioners?—Any one may make the inference if they please.

2604. At what time do you use the chasuble?—At all times of the celebration of the Holy Communion.

2605. Is there any mysterious signification in the chasuble or in wearing it?—That is a question which involves doctrine. If I am to be launched into doctrine, of course that again will involve an immensely long discussion.

2606. I think it does not require a very long answer, to say whether there is any doctrine involved in your using the chasuble?—I think there is.

2607. What is that doctrine?—The doctrine of the sacrifice.

2608. Do you consider yourself a sacrificing priest?—Yes.

2609. In fact, sacerdos, a sacrificing priest?—Distinctly so.

2610. What authority have you in the Prayer Book for that?—That again would involve a long answer. It has been so interpreted by our divines, the divines of our Church from the time of the Reformation downwards.

2611. Then you think you offer a propitiatory sacrifice?—Yes, I think I do offer a propitiatory sacrifice.

2612. Do you use confession?—Yes.

2613. On what occasions?—On all occasions.

2614. You do not then confine confession to the two occasions mentioned in the Prayer Book, that of persons wishing to attend the Sacrament and in the Visitation of the Sick?—I do not confine it to that, but it virtually is that, because the Communion being every day persons coming to that, may of course require important spiritual advice any day.

2615. Do you use any form of absolution?—Yes.

2616. What form?—The form provided in the Prayer Book in the Visitation of the Sick.

2617. You know at one time that was allowed, but that in the second book of Edward VI. the permission was withdrawn, does not that amount to a prohibition; does it not by implication prohibit the use of it?—I cannot answer that off-hand, because there may be some other succeeding alterations in the rubric which I am not aware of at the present moment. But when we are told to give absolution we must give it in some form, and seeing that we have no other form provided but that, it seems natural to recur to that.

2618. Where are you told to give a form of absolution?—We are to give absolution.

2619. Where?—In the address to the people in the service of the Holy Communion. They are invited to “receive the benefit of absolution, together with ghostly council and advice.”

2620. Is it not said “by the ministry of God’s holy word”?—We give a form of absolution in matins and evensong which is involved in words. By parity of reasoning we should give a form of absolution to those that are penitent.

2621. There is none provided by the Church. There was one provided, but it was withdrawn, and the very wording was changed at the same time. “Let him come to me.....and open his grief; that by the ministry of God’s holy word, he may receive the benefit of absolution, together with ghostly council and advice.” Is not there a distinct meaning in absolution by the ministry of God’s holy word?—I should think that was the meaning, that the priest pronounced it by the authority of God’s word.

2622. Wheatly, I think, says, there is no form provided, but that God’s word is to be applied according to the case of the penitent. You mix water, I believe with the wine?—Yes, I pour in a small quantity of water, two or three drops.

2623. On what canon or what authority do you do so; have you any authority in the Prayer Book for doing so?—There is no authority in the Prayer Book. It is done by the authority of the Catholic Church; and the Prayer Book does not forbid that which is the usual custom of the Church.

2624. Are you not aware that that is violating the custom of our Church of England for nearly 300 years?—No, I am not aware of that.

2625. For what purpose do you use the lights, as symbolical, or to give light?—As symbolical.

2626. (Earl Stanhope.) Who is your diocesan?—The Bishop of Bath and Wells.

2627. I understood you to say that you had not received any objection on the part of your Diocesan?—I have not received any objection.

2628. Do you apply that to the former Bishop as well as to the present Bishop?—The former Bishop died within a few months after I came; therefore he had no opportunity of objecting. Our present Bishop has been Bishop from within a few months after I went there.

2629. I understood you to say that the memorial which you put in bears date 1865; but many of the alterations that you have made were probably made at an earlier date?—There were various alterations in the services, but the adoption of the vestments was not until then.

2630. I meant my present question to apply to any of those alterations, whether as against those alterations any objections had been made by any portion of your congregation?—No, none.

2631. So far as you know have any families that were in the habit of attending your church before these alterations ceased to attend subsequently to them?—When I first came to the parish a great many left the church, but that was before I opened my mouth. Since that time I do not remember any leaving; perhaps there may have been one family, but I do not remember more than one.

2632. Have any of those who left the church returned to it since, and do they now attend it?—Not only have a great many returned, but a great many Dissenters have been brought into the Church. There is hardly a month but I receive in some way members of dissenting families into the Church.

2633. I think you stated that out of 5,000 people in your district, as many as 3,000 probably belong to the Dissenters?—I am afraid they are either Dissenters, or of no religion at all.

2634. You have mentioned the lights that you put upon the Lord's table; do you increase them upon the saints' days?—No, there are always two.

2635. You mentioned other lights besides?—Those are the ordinary lights in the chancel, to light the chancel. They are lighted at other times.

2636. They have no symbolical meaning?—No.

2637. In celebrating the Holy Communion is it your habit to hold up the elements?—Yes, to lift them up.

2638. Is there any other mark of veneration shown by yourself or by the congregation, on those occasions, beyond kneeling?—No, no mark beyond kneeling.

2639. No prostration?—No prostration.

2640. With regard to the rite of churching of women, do you feel yourself at liberty to discriminate between cases, or do you administer the rite when it is asked for?—We make a distinct rule not to church women unless they are married.

2641. Has that always been the practice in your church in your time?—I think so. We generally make a form of thanksgiving for unmarried women in the usual prayer of the general thanksgiving.

2642 (Earl Beauchamp.) With regard to the 3,000 Dissenters that you told us exist in the district, that state of things existed before your arrival at Frome?—Yes, but I did not say they are all Dissenters. They are Dissenters or unbelievers attending no place of worship.

2643. Have you any reason to suppose that number has increased or diminished since your arrival?—Decidedly, it has greatly diminished. When I said just now that there is hardly a month but we get some portion of dissenting families into the Church, that would show that dissent is decreasing.

2644. You find that those persons who now conform become regular attendants at church, and regularly receive the Holy Communion?—Yes, they are, I might almost say, the most regular.

2645. With regard to the former state of the parish, was there any change in the covering of the altar cloths before your time; was there a black altar cloth?—Yes, at my first coming there was a black altar cloth for Lent and funerals, and a red one for common days.

2646. Who was your predecessor?—Mr. Philott.

2647. He was not a high ritualist?—I do not suppose there were any high ritualists then.

2648. Something has been said with regard to the symbolism of the chasuble; the whole theory of symbolism is a matter of pious ingenuity, is it not? Some persons attach a symbolical meaning to everything. There is a symbolical meaning attached to the surplice as much as to the chasuble?—Yes, I think in reading the ancient books which interpret the symbolism, you find there is a symbolical meaning attached to the chasuble, and therefore I do not answer that question according to my own idea.

2649. And also as to the surplice?—And also as to the surplice.

2650. And in fact there is no matter of ecclesiastical ornament that has not been made the subject of symbolism?—No, they are all classified; the stole and all have a symbolical meaning.

2651. It would not be hard to devise a symbolical meaning even to the Geneva preaching gown?—No. Ours is an Oxford or Cambridge gown.

2652. It is your desire in every possible way, as far as you can, to conform to the law and the spirit of the Church of England?—Decidedly. For instance, I should consider reservation of the blessed Sacrament distinctly prohibited by the English Church, though I should like very much to be allowed to make it.

2653. You find practical inconvenience arising from the prohibition of the practice?—Yes, the blessing to the sick would be incalculable.

2654. But being prohibited by the law of the Church of England you obey?—I scrupulously adhere to it. Sometimes I should have to celebrate three times in a day, over and over again. Therefore, I strictly observe that rule, because it is distinctly pronounced by the Church.

2655. With regard to the devotions of the poor, do you find that in proportion to the spiritual privileges afforded them they make use of them?—You mean in receiving the Sacrament?

2656. No; in the higher type of service?—Yes; as far as I can judge they all appreciate it very much.

2657. Have you observed in your experience of Frome that in the alterations you have made successively, the more ornate the service has become the greater has been the devotion and attention of the poor?—Decidedly. If we had our churchwardens here they would tell you more about that than I can do.

2658. The address which you have read was signed as you have told us, by the churchwardens. Do either of these gentlemen still continue in office?—Yes; they are both in office now.

2659. They have been re-elected since the presentation of that address?—Yes, by the parish; the parish churchwarden, of course.

2660. He has been elected more than once?—No; he was elected once and then re-elected.

2661. That was subsequent to the presentation of that address and the consequent adoption of the vestments?—Yes.

2662. Do you find that there is any difficulty on the part of the poor with regard to attending the Holy Communion early in the morning?—No; it is the time that they are most able to come. They will come early, sometimes at half-past 6 o'clock in the morning. They come then and go back to their necessary domestic work afterwards, which they could not do on an ordinary day at 11 o'clock, the usual time.

2663. You think that decidedly preferable to a celebration of the Holy Communion in the evening?—I should consider it sacrilege to celebrate in the evening.

2664. You find that, practically, celebrating the Holy Communion early in the morning gives all the poorer classes the opportunity of attending?—Exactly so; or rather the working classes, servants, and so on.

2665. With regard to the subject of confession; in receiving oral confessions you conceive you are only fulfilling the words which the Church puts into your mouth in the exhortation in the Holy Communion?—Decidedly.

2666. Nothing more and nothing less?—Nothing more and nothing less.

2667. When you were at St. Barnabas', I believe, some disturbances took place, or rather were apprehended?—They were not only apprehended but they did take place.

2668. Had those disturbances a reference to any ritual practices?—No; we had no ritual practices at that time.

2669. It was an agitation against the use of the surplice and the choral service?—It was, I think, principally the choral service. I do not like to speak of persons. It was owing to the letter which was written; what is called "the Durham letter," and Cardinal Wiseman's "papal aggression." Those were the two principal causes.

2670. The services which were established by yourself at St. Barnabas' are now accepted generally throughout the country as a sort of standard of public worship; are they not?—If I am to answer fully I think a great deal of the bitterness of feeling against St. Barnabas' church was owing to a rood screen which was placed across the chancel, with a cross on the top of it; also to my using the invocation of the Holy Trinity before the sermon. I do not think it was the choral service so much as these particular things.

Rev. W. J. E.
Bennett, M.A.

4 July 1867.

2671. The question of the legality of the rood screen was subsequently brought to a decision?—Yes; and the question of a stone altar. These things, I think, were the provoking causes.

2672. Do you know from your own experience that the opposition to the use of the vestments is anything like equal in amount or in intensity to the agitation which existed at St. Barnabas' at the time to which I am referring?—I can, of course, only speak of my own church. If I am to compare that with other places I am unable to judge.

2673. You can only speak to that within your own knowledge?—Yes; within my own knowledge at St. Barnabas' and at Frome.

2675. (Bishop of Gloucester.) In regard to the number of the communicants in the daily celebration of the Holy Communion, I do not think you told the Commission what that is?—I should think about 20. I may as well observe that there are many who come but do not receive the Holy Communion. The average of those who receive I should say is 20. Many come in for worship without receiving—perhaps they will receive on Sunday only.

2676. What would the attendances on the Sunday morning be?—The average attendance is about 80.

2677. Have you it once or twice on the Sunday?—Once on the ordinary Sundays, twice on the first Sunday in the month, when it is meant for older people who have been used to go at that time.

2678. I understand you to say there are as many as 80 on an average on the Sunday celebration?—Yes; on an ordinary Sunday. On great festivals of course there are more.

2679. Do you administer the elements to each one separately?—Always.

2680. You mentioned that some were present who were not communicants; does that happen to any extent on Sundays when the congregation would be larger?—No; there may be a few, but not to any extent.

2681. Do you encourage staying without communicating?—Yes; I encourage people to do so, because they learn what it is by witnessing it. A great many though they are not yet received as communicants, still I wish them to come to learn.

2682. You mentioned your use of vestments. I should be glad to know whether you regard these vestments as representing a doctrine, or simply worn honoris causâ?—I should say, both. The honoris causâ would involve a doctrine.

2683. I have the pleasure of having before me a paper which bears your name, contributed to a series of essays entitled "Some Results of the Tractarian Movement of 1833," and in that you state the doctrine represented by vestments. If I read it I will ask you only to say whether such is now your opinion, or whether you in any degree modify it. If you wish to modify it, pray do so. This is what you say:—"The ancient vestments present to crowds of worshippers the fact that here, before God's altar, is something far higher, far more awful, more mysterious than aught that man can speak of, namely, the presence of the Son of God in human flesh subsisting." Would you wish to retain that?—Decidedly.

2684. You mention what incense represents on the same page. I will read it and take the liberty of asking whether you wish to maintain that. "The incense is the mediation of Jesus ascending from the altar to plead for the sins of men"?—I do not mean that the incense pleads, but the intercession represented by the incense pleads.

2685. Do you introduce any prayers during the service of the Holy Communion, either at the daily celebration or on Sundays?—I never introduce any prayer except what is in the Prayer Book.

2686. Do you make pauses for the introduction of special private prayers?—Yes, we do that.

2688. My question is,—is this prayer used in the service in any way as apparently stated in this volume?—No; it is not used out aloud in any way whatever, but there are many prayers in Bishop Wilson's Communion Office used for private devotion. There are a number of prayers introduced in the office books for the Holy Communion which persons are desired to use privately, and that is one which we use privately.

2689. Then I understand that that which is alluded to in the tract referred to is a private prayer, privately used?—Decidedly.

2690. Do you observe, by any change in the Communion service, such as introducing more music, what are called the black-letter saints' days?—No; we do not use any particular service for those days.

2691. There might be some difference made between the celebration of the service of the Holy Communion on those days and other days, by an introduction of more music; is there such a use?—No; there is no difference.

2692. You mentioned that you incensed things; have you considered the decision of the matter in a case that was submitted on behalf of the society entitled "The English Church Union"?—I have heard of it, but I do not consider that I am in the least bound by the opinions of any lawyers until they are judicially announced.

2693. Are you also aware that the Southern Convocation has expressed an opinion on the subject?—Yes.

2694. You mentioned that which I am sure we should all feel to be your mind,—the desire to conform to the law of the Church of England; now, if there be any generally adopted custom in the Eastern and the Western Churches, and not specified in our Prayer Book, should you consider yourself at liberty to adopt it?—I should consider myself at liberty to adopt it if it were not forbidden by the English Church.

2695. Should you consider yourself at liberty to adopt it if it had been allowed, and if that permission or allowance had afterwards disappeared from the pages of the Service Book?—I must be very well convinced that it had disappeared.

2696. You mentioned one case with respect to the absolution in the Visitation of the Sick; there is an omission in our present Prayer Book of the permission to use that form of absolution in the case of private persons; do you regard that omission as in any degree implying a prohibition?—No; it might have been accidentally omitted.

2697. (Mr. Hubbard.) You have been long enough now at Frome to judge of the effect upon the ordinary lower classes of this county of what is considered more ornate ritual; is it your opinion, that introducing more music and more general ornamental accessories into the service than have been hitherto used has had the effect of attracting those classes to our Church, and not only of attracting them, but of enabling them to receive and retain a devotional impression?—That is decidedly my opinion.

2698. Then you think there is a useful result to be found in the movement which is now under consideration, quite apart from any opinion as to its exact legal position?—I do not quite understand the meaning of the word "useful."

2699. I mean useful as regards the people with whom you have to deal?—Useful for the benefit of their souls, decidedly.

2700. You stated that of those who attend the Holy Communion many of them often are not at that moment communicants?—That is so.

2701. But you stated that they stayed for the purpose of learning and being instructed in the nature of the Holy Sacrament. You do not encourage them to stay under the idea that by attending they are themselves taking part in the religious office if they are not communicants?—They are taking part in prayer.

2703. You stated that in preparing the elements for the Holy Communion you added some water to the wine, and you were asked whether you used wine or wine and water. I imagine the proportion you do use is very slight, such as to suffice for the symbolical intention, but not so much as to alter the general character, or even the name of what you use?—No; that would be contrary to the rule of the Church. It is a very small quantity of water.

2704. In fact so small a quantity that that which is the result of the mixture must still be called wine, and could not properly be called by any other name?—Decidedly.

2705. You stated that you lifted up the elements after consecration; to what extent do you lift them up?—It may not be to the same extent every time; nor can each celebrating priest elevate them to the same height; there is no rule about it; it is simply a gentle elevation.

2706. Some elevation is inevitable?—Yes.

2707. You must raise the cup and the paten from the Communion table in order to perform the act of consecration?—Yes; one elevation takes place before the consecration, and there is another elevation after the consecration. There are two elevations. The priest cannot take up the cup without an elevation. That is not for the purpose of adoration.

2708. In either case do you elevate the paten or the cup with the view of presenting them to the adoration of the people?—Yes, distinctly, in the latter case. It signifies to the people that the act of consecration has taken place.

2709. That, in truth, is the fact which you wish to express to them by raising it up and presenting it to their notice?—Yes.

2710. In the case of the consecration prayer, do you pronounce it as a whole, or do you make a pause after the consecration of the bread in order to make any prostration?—We never use any prostration; only kneeling.

2711. Do you, after the consecration of the bread, make a pause in the consecration prayer for the purpose of making a kneeling?—There is no pause, it is a simultaneous act.

2712. It is not an absolute kneeling, but an inclination only?—Yes; what is called a genuflexion.

2713. Does a genuflexion mean touching the ground?—Touching the ground with one knee.

2714. (Dean of Ely.) I think you stated that you had vestments, incense, and lights?—Yes.

2715. In what order did the introduction of those things follow each other; were they introduced simultaneously or one after the other?—The lights were first introduced.

2716. For how long were they used?—I should say for 10 years. The next was the introduction of the vestments according to that invitation; and the next was the use of the incense.

2717. The incense was asked for as well as the vestments?—Yes, but not publicly.

2718. How long ago was that; was it some considerable period after the introduction of the vestments?—Three or four months afterwards; it seemed to follow in natural order.

2719. Were vessels presented for the purpose of using the incense?—Yes.

2720. I understood you to say that you incensed the Holy Gospel?—Yes.

2721. Will you explain what you meant by that?—The gospeller, who is the deacon, takes the book of the Holy Gospels in his hand, the sub-deacon takes the censer and incenses it.

2722. Incenses the book?—Incenses the book.

2723. Is incense used in any other service besides that of the Holy Communion?—We do not use it at any time but the Holy Communion.

2724. You do not use it during the reading or the singing of the Magnificat?—No.

2725. Have you anything peculiar with regard to the Magnificat?—Nothing whatever.

2726. You stated that there was a hymn sung at the offertory; does that take the place of the offertory sentences?—No; I said that we read one or two sentences first and then conclude with a hymn, the whole of the congregation joining in that hymn.

2727. Then you consider that you have a discretion as to how many of the sentences may be read?—Yes, according to the time.

2728. And then that the remaining time during the collection may properly be taken up with a hymn?—With singing a eucharistic hymn.

2729. Is there a hymn also during the communication of the worshippers?—No. On great festivals we sing the Agnus Dei, and sometimes on ordinary Sundays, but not always.

2730. Are there any other churches in Frome besides that in which you minister?—We have two district churches which are independent of the parish church, and we have two chapels of ease which are under the parish church. The same order and ritual is observed at one of these chapels of ease, and therefore our people are divided into five different congregations really.

2731. Do many of the non-parishioners attend that church in which you minister?—Yes, a great many. The incumbents of the town, have agreed among themselves to permit their people to go to whichever church they please, and therefore many of my people go to their churches, and many of their people come to my church.

2732. Then there are three incumbents independent of each other?—Yes.

2733. Is it in one of the churches of those incumbents that there is a ritual service like yours?—In one of the chapels of ease.

2734. The other two independent churches, as I may call them, have not got a ritualistic service, using that term for shortness' sake?—No.

2735. Is it quite a plain service in one or both of them, or is it musical?—One is more musical than the other. At one place they chant the hymns, but there is nothing approaching to a ritualistic celebration.

2736. These three churches are, I understand, all different from one another?—Yes.

Rev. W. J. E.
Bennett, M.A.
4 July 1867.

2738. So that in Frome persons can satisfy their own tastes as to the kind of service they will attend?—Exactly so.

2739. But it is with the entire approbation of the other incumbents that they do so?—Yes.

2740. There is no jealousy felt on the part of one incumbent if one of his parishioners goes to another church because he likes the service better?—No; that appertains to all the offices of the Church amongst ourselves, such as visiting the sick, and so on.

2741. When you spoke of the population being 5,000, did it include those other churches or only those who do come to your own church?—The town is about 12,000; 5,000 to our parish. The remainder is divided between the other two churches.

2742. (Earl of Harrouby.) Are the chapels of ease in your division?—Yes.

2743. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) Were the two district churches founded during your incumbency?—One chapel of ease has existed for many years, the other was built about three years ago.

2744. (Dean of Ely.) And the two district churches?—The two district churches have been long built. They were built before my time.

2745. Is your church perfectly free?—Perfectly free.

2746. There are no pew rents?—None.

2747. Is that a new arrangement, or has it always been so?—When I came I found that a certain number of persons did pay pew rents, and thinking it illegal it was at once abolished.

2748. Any poor person coming to your church is sure to be accommodated?—Yes.

2749. Have the arrangements in that respect been improved during your incumbency?—Yes; when I came the church was full of pews, high pews with square seats and tables in the middle. Those have all been abolished, and rows of seats opened for the people.

2750. Then the improved attendance at your church may possibly and perhaps ought to be partly attributed to the improved arrangements for the accommodation of the people?—No doubt, partly so.

2751. It is not entirely due to the character of the service in the church?—No, I should not be able to say that.

2752. But you think that since the introduction of the vestments there has been a decided improvement?—In the Holy Communion service.

2753. Not in the general attendance of the church?—No, I think that remains as it was, but there has been a great increase of devout communicants, especially among the young.

2754. Is the church generally as full as it can well be?—The church holds about 1,000 persons, and of course in country towns people are not so much given to going to church early, but in the evening it is always very full.

2755. How is the morning service at which the eucharistic vestments are used attended?—I have said that there are every day generally about twenty.

2756. I am not speaking about the communicants, but with regard to the general attendances on Sunday at the great morning services at which the eucharistic vestments are used, is the church generally tolerably full?—Yes, from 80 to 100 persons communicate, and, perhaps 150 persons are present.

2757. That is not the whole congregation, is it?—We never have a late celebration; it is generally at 8 o'clock in the morning; never later than 9, if choral.

2758. Your Communion on the Sunday does not follow the matins as is the case in most churches?—No; we scrupulously avoid it, except on the first Sunday in the month, and then it is separate. A fresh bell rings, and it is quite a separate service altogether.

2759. Therefore there is no opportunity of telling what the effect of the vestments is on the general congregation, because the general congregation, as a rule, are not there?—They are not there.

2760. What vestments do you use in the administration of private communion to sick people?—The surplice or alb and stole.

2761. Not the eucharistic vestments?—No.

2762. Is the service in your church chanted?—Always.

2763. Is it chanted in such a way that ordinary persons can understand the words?—Yes, I think so. We use the Gregorian tones all in unison.

2764. The priest's part, of course, is monotoned?—Yes.

2765. In your opinion it is monotoned in such a way that it is as intelligible to ordinary people as if it were read?—We are always striving to that point.

2766. Did I understand you to use this phrase—that the elevation of the elements took place for the purpose of adoration?—Yes; I consider the first elevation for the purpose of consecration to be totally distinct. After the consecration both the elements are elevated for the purpose of people knowing that the consecration has taken place, and that they may have the opportunity of adoring and praying.

2767. Would you hold that the phrase "the adoration of the elements" was a proper orthodox phrase?—It is the adoration not of the elements, but of that which is hidden under them.

2768. I understood you to say, in answer to the Bishop of Gloucester, with reference to those prayers, "We use certain prayers." By "we" did you mean the inhabitants of Frome?—Yes. I have taught many to use that prayer for the unity of Christendom, and that is what I alluded to. I believe that is the prayer which is used continually throughout the churches such as ours for the purpose of Christian charity and Christian unity with Dissenters and with all the Church.

2769. I only wish to know whether by the word "we" you referred to a practice at Frome, or to what was the practice in a larger circle of churches which were doing the same thing?—I think I alluded to a larger circle of churches which were doing the same thing.

2770. In concert?—Yes; there is a society for promoting the unity of Christendom; that is what I alluded to. We are bound by our society to use that prayer daily.

2771. It was not with reference to Frome only, but you had a wider view in using the word "we"?—Yes.

2772. (Sir Joseph Napier.) Is it a rule of the Catholic Church that the minister, with the consent of the congregation, may select the ceremonial?—If by the Catholic Church you mean the Roman and the Greek Churches, and the Church throughout the world, the ceremonial is so distinctly laid down in their rules that they cannot deviate.

2773. I understood you before to say that you thought it most important to get the consent of the people?—In teaching people up to the point that I think right, of course it is wise and prudent to teach them gradually; and, therefore, teaching them as I did the doctrine, they would naturally follow to the practice.

2774. Do you think it is part of the Church arrangement that the ceremonial should be suitable to the doctrine?—Exactly.

2775. If there was any change made by the Church in the doctrine, there would naturally be a change in the ceremonial?—Exactly; or the ceremonial would have no more meaning.

2776. I understood you to say that you desire that your ministrations should conform to the common order of the national Church of England?—I did not use the word "common."

2777. Are you not aware of that expression, "the common order of the Church"?—What ought to be the common order.

2778. I mean the common order established by law: Whatever is the common order established by law, is it not your desire to follow in your ministrations?—Yes; I can say that decidedly.

2779. Every national Church has got the power to fix its own common order?—Yes.

2780. Where do you find the authority for saying that every rule that is not expressly prohibited is allowed?—I find it in the common usage of the Church in all other things.

2781. If the national Church has got the power to ordain its own rites and ceremonies, where do you find the authority for going outside its regulations to pick and choose amongst what you call the rules of the Catholic Church?—Because the national Church only takes up a few points of ritual and of doctrine, and it leaves all others open as they were before.

2782. Would you take it that if the national Church had altered its doctrine in any particular, that although it had not expressly condemned a certain ceremonial that you were at liberty to use that ceremonial although not suitable to the doctrine?—If it had condemned the doctrine, certainly the condemnation of the ceremonial would of course follow.

2783. Do you use the chrism and the ampulla in baptism?—No, we do not.

2784. Are they expressly condemned?—No; I should say it would be quite lawful to use them, provided the people desired it, and it would be edifying to them.

2785. (Earl of Harrowby.) What is your guide in the selection of ceremonies and vestments not actually prescribed by the Prayer Book?—Those which are in use by the Catholic Church throughout Christendom.

2786. Your rule is everything which is prescribed by the Catholic Church anywhere that is not absolutely prohibited?—In the English Church.

2787. Where do you get the authority for what is prescribed as the general use of the Catholic Church?—By studying the books of that Church. Our own Sarum missal for instance.

2788. Is there any one acknowledged standard amongst the clergy by which they can tell to what they ought to work up?—No; except the Sarum missal.

2789. You believe that every English clergyman ought to work up to the Sarum missal if he can, except in points absolutely prohibited?—Yes.

2790. And that is the standard?—That is the standard.

2791. That is the standard which you would acknowledge?—Yes.

2792. Have you now reached the utmost point of accommodation to the Sarum missal, or have you other approximations still to make, as fast as you can get the congregation to agree to them?—I should not like to confine myself to say that I should never do anything more than I have done. I have nothing in my mind now.

2793. You feel now that you have satisfied yourself that yours is the type which the English Church ought to work up to?—No, I have not. I should like the chrism to be used, and I should like the bishops to anoint in confirmation, and to use the sign of the cross, and I should like a great deal more if you ask me my likings.

2794. There are no other points that you are working up to now, within what you consider the permitted usages?—I have nothing in my intention at the present moment, beyond what I have described.

2796. I understand if any usage is positively condemned by authority you at once acquiesce?—I gave one instance, a special instance—of the reservation.

2797. You believe that nothing you now practice has been legally condemned?—At the time of the cholera, when I was at St. Barnabas, I did carry the Blessed Sacrament from street to street and from house to house, and administered it. I was rebuked for that by the then Bishop of London. It was a work of necessity. Such times of necessity do not happen very often.

2798. Have you any system of processions in your church?—Yes, on great festivals we have processions of the choir and clergy with banners.

2799. What authority have you for the banners?—The same as all other ceremonial usages; the usage of the Church not prohibited by the English Church.

2800. Is that the use of Sarum, or what use is it?—I do not know, I never observed that in the Sarum books.

2801. I want to know what is a clergyman to do; what is to be his standard in all those things not positively prescribed by the Prayer Book. You adopted these banners, what did you adopt them from?—General usage.

2802. General usage where?—Throughout the Church. I have seen school festivals. I have seen children bringing their banners into church in processions.

2803. I mean the particular banners with particular paintings upon them?—You may have various banners.

2804. May I ask what you have inscribed on your banners?—We have one which has a cross on it, and another an embroidered Agnus Dei, and another a representation of our patron saint, Saint John the Baptist. We have another belonging to a society, which we have called "The Society of the Holy Child Jesus," which is to take care of little children.

2805. In what way is He imaged on the banner?—He is imaged in painting, surrounded by and blessing little children.

2806. Have you any image of the Virgin Mary upon any of your banners?—No.

2807. Have you any inscription upon your altar cloths alluding to the Virgin Mary?—None whatever.

2808. You are aware that B. V. M. has been employed?—Not in my church. We have a lady chapel dedicated to the Blessed Virgin in our church, but we have no symbols of that except painted glass.

2809. There are no special services appropriated to that lady chapel?—No.

2810. What are the colours that you employ in the vestments?—We use white and purple, that is all that we have; but we should use the green and the red if we had them. They are very costly, and we cannot afford to purchase them.

2811. What would guide you in the use of the colours of the vestments?—The use of the Church throughout the world.

2812. Is it uniform all over the world?—I believe it is not. The Greek Church differs from the Roman use. There is no remaining authority for the Sarum missal except in our own country, the colours are different.

2813. You are aware that the colours of the Roman Church and the colours of the use of Sarum were different?—Yes, and the Roman differ in different countries; Spain has a different colour from France.

2814. What would guide you in the choice of your colours?—That which I found most generally prevailing in the Communion abroad.

2815. In the Church of Rome?—In the Church of Rome. There are two uses; the people contend about those two uses, the Sarum which is English, and the Roman use which is general.

2816. I thought in the former case you said you took the use of Sarum as your standard?—Yes, but there is a great difference in the colours even in the Roman Communion; Spain has different colours from France, and so has Belgium.

2817. What is to guide an English clergyman in the choice of colours when he uses vestments?—I have taken those colours which I found prevailing in the altar cloths before we adopted the vestments.

Rev. W. J. E. Bennett, M.A.
4 July 1867.

Rev. W. J. E.
Bennett, M.A.

4 July 1867.

2818. You found the altar cloths there of different colours?—Yes, and we kept to those colours; that was the principle on which we went.

2819. What number of curates have you?—There are five.

2820. Are they in any part maintained by the offertory?—They are partly maintained by the offertory and partly by stipends and endowments which belong to them.

2821. What does your offertory amount to in the year?—The usual average for ordinary purposes is about 500*l.* a year, but lately we have been engaged in restoring our church, and it has amounted on an average to 2,000*l.*

2822. Is that 500*l.* appropriated to parish purposes only, or to external religious purposes as well?—To parish purposes partly, and to external religious purposes also.

2823. How is that 500*l.* divided?—We divide it into three portions: one for the churchwardens, one for myself to supply schools, and the other for the poor.

2824. When you say for the churchwardens, that is for the service of the church?—Yes, what we call churchwardens' expenses are the necessary expenses of the church.

2825. Such as warming the church, and for the choristers, and so on?—Yes.

2826. (Mr. J. Abel Smith.) Do you include the curates in that amount?—No; the Easter dues are now made part of the offertory. Easter Day is dedicated to Easter dues.

2827. (Earl of Harrowby.) Have you flowers on the Communion table?—We have flowers on great festivals.

2828. The congregations in Frome are hardly parochial; there is an understanding among the clergy that they shall not attach themselves to parochial divisions?—Yes, the whole of the parochial ministrations are considered to be open.

2829. How is that with regard to the visitation of the sick?—We keep that rule also.

2830. So that you visit the sick of your congregation and not of your parishes?—If they belong to one of the other churches we send them to the clergy of that church.

2831. So that the system at Frome now is rather a congregational than parochial system?—Yes.

2832. What length of time had you been urging upon your congregation the proper vestments before they came forward to offer them to you?—I do not think that I can say I ever urged them, I only explained the doctrine of the Church from time to time. I would say there are vestments which corresponded with that doctrine, and we were privileged to use them.

2833. I think the paper you put in said that it was in compliance with your wishes. It runs thus: "You have always taught us that together with the restoration of the material fabric of our own church, should be combined the restoration of the beauty and dignity of Christian worship within its walls, and more particularly so in all that appertains to the holy altar and to those who minister thereat." The words "those who minister thereat," of course, allude to the vestments?—Yes.

2834. I think you told us that you had been pressing upon them this view; I only wanted to know whether it had been a continuous teaching upon that point?—No, it was accidental, as circumstances brought it out; it was never purposed.

2835. Still it was rather in compliance with your wishes than entirely spontaneous?—Yes, they knew that.

2836. You say there has been an increase of communicants since the vestments have been used; I think you said that the increase was principally among the younger people?—Yes, naturally; because, of course, every congregation increases in its younger part, by the nature of things.

2837. How are churchwardens chosen, since the congregations and parishes are not made exactly to coincide?—They are churchwardens for the whole parish, for certain civil purposes, but only for ecclesiastical purposes our own churchwardens.

2838. Then there are churchwardens in two senses?—It is the usual way in district churches; the whole parishioners meet to elect the churchwardens.

2839. There are two sets of churchwardens in Frome, the general churchwardens for the whole secular parish and then special churchwardens for the district churches?—Yes.

2840. Who chooses the special churchwardens for the district churches?—Their own congregations.

2841. Therefore the churchwardens are congregational and not parochial?—I should say the aspect of our town is congregational.

2842. There are churchwardens elected by the whole secular parish?—Yes.

2843. Over and above that there are churchwardens elected for each church?—Yes.

2844. Who have a right of voting and who do vote practically in the selection of those churchwardens?—The congregation of each church elect their own churchwarden.

2845. Supposing there were any dispute, who would have a right of voting in such cases?—All ratepayers would have a right to vote in the parish church for their parish churchwarden.

2846. I mean for the district church?—I presume only the members of their own congregation, but I do not know what the law is.

2847. Is it the inhabitants of the district who elect your churchwarden or those who frequent your church?—The whole of the town elect our churchwardens.

2848. The whole town elect the churchwardens of your church?—Yes, it is the churchwarden of the whole town for certain civil purposes.

2849. Therefore your churchwarden is elected by the vestry of the whole of Frome?—Yes.

2850. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) Do you recollect under what Act of Parliament your two district churches were built?—No.

2851. Your attention has never been called to it?—No.

2852. Do the incumbents of those two churches receive all the fees?—Yes.

2853. That being the case, they have never taken advantage of Lord Blandford's Act to make their own church rates?—No, we have no church rate in our town.

2854. In the course of the evidence you have given us, you have relied on the usage of the Catholic Church as your guarantee for the different forms you have adopted. By that do you mean the use of the whole Church eclectically collected by yourself or the use of the Church as represented by the historical Church of England?—As represented by the historical Church of England.

2855. In short do you agree with what the 30th canon says: "Nay, so far was it from the purpose of the Church of England to forsake and reject the Churches of Italy, France, Spain, Germany, or any such like Churches in all things which they held and practised, that, as the Apology of the Church of England confesseth, it doth with reverence retain those ceremonies, which do neither endamage the Church of God, nor offend the minds of sober men; and only departed from them in those particular points wherein they were fallen both from themselves in their ancient integrity and from the Apostolical Churches, which were their first founders"?—That is the principle.

2856. You would hold that as your guide?—Yes.

2857. Therefore in adopting any ceremony you would consider whether it was one of those customs of the Church of England which it had held?—Yes.

2858. For instance, suppose your churchwardens were to give you Eastern vestments, would you wear them?—Decidedly not, I should think they had no right to do so.

2859. Then you are an English Churchman?—I hope so.

2860. Therefore you hold the rites of the English Church, only restricted on those points in which since the Reformation the reformed Prayer Books have restricted them?—Yes.

2861. A short time ago, you used the word “sub-deacon,” which I do not find in our Prayer Book, may I ask you who the sub-deacon is?—Going to the source from which we get the vestments, of course the deacon is the gospeller, and what is called the sub-deacon is the epistoler. Those words are used in the Prayer Book.

2862. When you spoke of the sub-deacon, you meant the clergyman who reads the epistle?—Yes. We have really no sub-deacon.

2863. That word in fact was a mistake. You used the word sub-deacon, because in some other churches the sub-deacon was the man who was the epistoler?—Yes, it is that officer who, in the celebration, wears that particular vestment called the tunicle, 2864. (Mr. J. Abel Smith.) Is the sub-deacon mentioned in the Prayer Book?—No.

2865. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) Therefore, you would adopt no rite which you thought symbolised any doctrine which the Church of England repudiated?—No decidedly not. If I thought that the doctrine was against what we were using in symbols I should avoid it.

2866. For instance, the doctrine of transubstantiation?—I cannot answer that; what transubstantiation means, I never could understand.

2867. Should you think it an unintelligible doctrine?—I think it an unintelligible doctrine.

2868. You think the doctrine of the Sacrament in the Church of England is an intelligible one?—Decidedly.

2869. Therefore you do not hold transubstantiation?—No.

2870-1. By the words “the ministry of God’s holy word,” i.e. Gospel or God’s spell, do you understand it means that office which ministers of the Gospel have to perform?—I think that the “ministry of God’s holy word” means that authority which God’s word has given to His priests and bishops.

2872. You do not understand it to mean the mere reading of the Bible to the persons?—Certainly not.

2873. And therefore you consider that as you are called upon to give the “benefit of absolution,” together with “ghostly counsel,” you must do something more than simply give ghostly counsel?—Yes.

2874. The “and” is distinctive there?—Yes.

2875. Have you any confessional boxes in your church?—No, none.

2876. They have them in the Roman churches?—Yes.

2877. Therefore you differ, and intentionally differ from the Roman forms in not having them?—It is a matter of taste, but if we were to have two or three confessions going on in the church at the same time, we must then be in different places.

2878. Are your confessions compulsory?—No.

2879. In the Church of Rome, I believe confession is the compulsory prelude to Communion?—Yes, we should not deny the Communion to those who do not confess; decidedly not.

2880. You consider denying the Communion to those who have not confessed to be one of those particular points in which the Church of Rome has fallen from itself in its ancient integrity, and from the Apostolic Churches in the words of the 13th canon?—My own opinion is that it has done so by making confession compulsory.

2881. (Mr. J. Abel Smith.) With regard to the processions to which you have alluded, have you any processions outside your church?—We have often had processions outside, when we have been to lay the foundation stone of our district chapel, or to have the chapel consecrated when our Bishop has been with us. Rev. W. J. E. Bennett, M.A.

2882. You have no religious processions or anything of that character?—We have processions at funerals.

2883. Have you any stations?—We have the via crucis, which are in effect stations in the churchyard.

2884. What are those stations?—They are the history of our Lord and His passion,—the different stages, or stations of His passion.

2885. How are they exhibited or made known?—They are open in the churchyard.

2886. Is it sculpture?—Yes.

2887. Set up in the churchyard?—Yes.

2888. At the beginning of your examination you spoke of having a litany, you did not say the litany; do you mean the Litany of the Church?—Yes; no other litany but our own.

2889. You have been a great many years in the Church?—Yes.

2890. How many?—Thirty-seven years.

2891. As I understand, you did not adopt the vestments till last year?—No. I had the vestments prepared at St. Barnabas, but the tumult arising, of course it was inexpedient to provoke people any more, and they were withdrawn; and then I myself was also withdrawn.

2892. During the whole of that period you abstained from doing that which you thought necessary?—I abstained, because it would have been no use, I should think, with an unwilling people.

2893. With regard to the attendance at your church, can you give us any idea of the ordinary attendance at morning service?—Of course the weather always makes a difference. I suppose we have about 500 or 600 people at morning service, at matins.

2894. It is about half full?—About half full.

2895. With regard to the Dissenters, I understand they are decreasing in your district?—I think they are.

2896. Are they also decreasing in the other districts of the town?—I cannot speak to that.

2897. Do you think they are decreasing more in your district than in the other districts?—I should not like to say. I can only speak as to what comes under my own practical observation—such as their children being brought to baptism; and continually coming in to be admitted to the Holy Communion, and so on.

2898. Is there much feeling of dissension or hostility between yourself and the Dissenters in the town?—None; we are very good friends. Only last Monday, in our church festival, there were three or four dissenting ministers at the evening services.

2900. Have you ever taken any pains to ascertain how many of any particular class are in the habit of attending your church at any particular service? Do you know at all with regard to the strictly labouring poor, whether they come, and in what numbers they come, or to what services they come?—Their favourite time of coming to the celebration of Holy Communion is early in the morning. They very seldom come to the matins at the usual time, eleven o’clock. They come a good deal at three o’clock, and they come in crowds at half-past six, which, I believe is the usual course of the English people.

2901. At your evening service the church is crowded?—It is.

2902. You stated, in answer to a former question, that you considered the power of reserving the elements, as conferring an incalculable blessing on the sick, may I ask what you meant by that?—In times of disease, such as the cholera, when it was really the case with myself, it would be physically impossible to celebrate the communion over and over again, when people were dying in your very presence.

Rev. W. J. E.
Bennett, M.A.

4 July 1867.

2903. What you meant was, that it really was essential to the power of communicating at all?—Yes; I should scrupulously abstain from doing it if I had time to use the consecration service.

2904. You also said that you considered the evening communion a sacrilege?—Yes.

2905. May I ask what you meant by that?—Because numbers of the people after having had a full meal—dinner, and having drunk wine, and in the case of the poor, beer, are apt to come to the service in a state which St. Paul has described as sacrilege.

2906. It has no bearing on the fact of fasting before the receipt of the sacrament?—That is a rule of the Church, but that would not apply to such an extreme case as late in the day, after dinner.

2907. Where do you find the rule of fasting, as a rule in the Church?—In the fathers of the Church, and in the rules throughout Christendom.

2908. Are there no orders for it in the English Church?—None.

2909. Where is the confession received in your church?—Generally in the sacristy. On occasions such as Lent it might be in a little chapel. We have three or four chapels in our church; quiet places, where we might go for that purpose, but it is generally in the sacristy.

2910. Is the confession made kneeling?—Yes.

2911. Do you believe that your course of ministration, the ornate services which you have adopted for several years, has had a tendency to drive people into the Roman Communion or to keep them out of it?—It has had a tendency to keep them in the English Church.

2912. You have had some trouble with some of your curates, have you not, on that point?—I have had those who went to the Church of Rome.

2913. How many have left to go to Rome?—In the whole course of my experience?

2914. Yes; I mean your curates?—Two curates, one of whom has come back.

2915-16. With regard to when you are abroad, refusing to attend a Church of England place of worship, would you have any objection to telling me upon what principle you do not do so?—I consider that the Roman Communion coming here with bishops, altars, and churches of their own are guilty of an act of schism in this country. By parity of reasoning I consider when we go abroad, and send our bishops, and put altars against altars, and bishop against bishop, that we also are guilty of an act of schism, and therefore, I will not be a partaker in that schism.

2917. In a pamphlet you have just published you give a copy of your ordination vow which is in these words, "Will you give your faithful diligence always so to minister the doctrine and Sacraments and the discipline of Christ as the Lord hath commanded and as this Church and realm hath received the same according to the commandments of God, so that you may teach the people committed to your care and charge with all diligence to keep and observe the same." Do you conceive that you are yourself the judge of what is the meaning of the words "as this Church and realm hath received the same"?—No, certainly not.

2918. Who is to be the judge?—The Church.

2919. What do you mean by "the Church"?—The Church in sacred synod assembled.

2920. You do not recognize any other authority than that?—I recognize the office of the Bishop in the things that pertain to the office of the Bishop, but in those things which are beyond and above the office of the Bishop I should pay no attention to it.

2921. Your authority then would be what?—I should appeal to the Church.

2922. (Dr. Twiss.) The person whom you call a sub-deacon is, I suppose, in holy orders?—Yes.

2923. Is he in priest's orders?—Sometimes he is in deacon's orders, and sometimes in priest's orders.

2924. Are there occasions when a clergyman in priest's orders wears the tunic, which is the dress in the Western Church of the sub-deacon?—In the usual custom of the Church there are three officers to celebrate: one is the priest, another is the deacon, and the third is the sub-deacon. If a Bishop celebrate he is no longer a Bishop, but a priest. I was wrong in using the word sub-deacon, I ought to have said epistoler.

2925. Then you consider the tunic to be the dress of the epistoler and not of the sub-deacon?—Yes.

2926. You spoke of processions round the churchyard in regard to the stations?—No, not in regard to the stations. Those are two distinct things; there are stations and there are processions, but they are not necessarily joined together.

2927. The processions have no connection with the stations?—No; except on one occasion; on last Good Friday.

2928. You said you considered the Church of England, or the books to which you referred in regard to the law of the Church of England, only to speak upon certain points; I do not wish to bind you to terms, but you mean that they only direct you up to a certain point, and do not go beyond that, so that you have to go elsewhere for certain matters of ritual or ceremonial?—Yes, unavoidably.

2929. In looking at the Prayer Book and the rubric, do you at all take into consideration the Act of Uniformity?—The Act of Uniformity gives us the Prayer Book.

2930. Do you remember in the Act of Uniformity of Charles II. this provision; "And be it enacted that no form or order of common prayer, administration of sacraments, rites, or ceremonies shall be openly used in any church other than what is prescribed in the said book"?—Yes, "other than is prescribed in the said book," in conformity with the Catholic usage.

2931. I understood you said that you thought the book was defective, in that it did not supply you with everything you wanted?—It does not; and in every church there are numbers of things done which are not in the Prayer Book, such, for instance, as the Gloria, that is said before the gospel; all churches use the Gloria, but it is not in the Prayer Book.

2932. You do not think that that provision of the Act of Uniformity limits you in regard to rites and ceremonies?—No.

2933. (Dean of Lincoln.) You are aware that our Reformers were most anxious to secure the uniformity of worship in the Church of England; do you think it necessary or desirable to endeavour to carry out their wishes in that respect?—No, I think it is not desirable.

2934. Do you think that in giving the elements to the communicants it is (I do not say more correct or more in conformity with the rubric, but) essential to the validity of the Sacrament to address the words to each person separately?—I think so; but there is an order of the Prayer Book which over-rides my opinion as to the validity.

2936. You say it is essential to the validity?—I give my opinion because the Church has used these words and commands them to be used.

2937. All words that are used, although commanded by the Church, are not of the essence of the Sacrament?—Then the Church would be in error in commanding them.

2938. That does not follow at all. Suppose you adopt the mixture of water with the wine, is that of the essence of the Sacrament in the Romish Church?—The Church has appointed that.

2939. Is it of the essence of the Sacrament?—No, I should say not.

2940. (Rev. H. Venn.) I think you have not told us whether you have made any alterations in the way of performing funerals since you came to Frome?—Yes, I have made some alterations. The general course of funerals is the same as it was; but there have been occasions when we have added ceremonial to the funeral.

2941. Will you state what those added ceremonials are?—The ceremonial has been always added at the express wish of the persons, never by my suggestion, but by their express wish. We have had lights placed at the side of the coffin; and on one occasion we used incense where it had been expressly asked for. At an ordinary funeral where nothing is said, it is performed in the usual way as in all churches.

2942. With regard to the Holy Communion?—We celebrate Holy Communion whenever it is wished.

2943. That is, of course, when the friends wish it?—Yes.

2944. In any of your private ministrations, do you use what is called a portable altar?—My custom is to have a little basket or box, which contains a surplice and all the things necessary for the administration of the Holy Communion, and in that is what might be called a portable altar, a little piece of wood upon which we place the holy vessels, because, as everyone knows, in poor people's houses we cannot get everything decent.

2945. Upon that wood are there crosses?—Yes.

2946. Five crosses?—Five crosses.

2947. (Dr. Payne Smith.) You spoke of "adoration"; do you mean by that the genuflection that you make after the consecration?—Yes; I should say that to make the genuflection is an act of adoration.

2948. Does your congregation in any way join in this adoration, or whatever it is?—They are all engaged in prayer and worship. How far each man's mind is engaged in one thing more than another I do not know; it is one great act of adoration throughout from beginning to end, but more particularly then.

2949. It is not symbolized in any way by any external act?—No, not by the congregation.

2950. You also said you considered you had a right to revive anything, even though it had been dropped or discontinued by our Church, with reference to the rubrics of 1549 and 1662—anything omitted in the latter rubric?—I do not think such an omission would affect it.

2951. Do you think that a practice which has been omitted stands in any respect on a different footing from one that has been retained?—Good practices have been omitted from negligence and carelessness.

2952. I mean omitted from the rubric, I am not speaking of these omitted by practice; but do you think if it is omitted in the rubric the omission absolutely goes for nothing?—It would depend upon corroborative points.

2953. You have not, as a matter of fact, at all events, considered that it was a discouragement?—It would depend upon what the omission was.

2954. Take the rubric which has been referred to enjoining the use of the absolution in the Office for the Visitation of the Sick; the rubric enjoins its use at other times. You do not think that the omission of it is equal to a recommendation of its disuse?—No. I think it was an accidental omission, taking a view of the question from corroborative and correlative points.

2955. In the same way you regard the omission of the rubric prescribing the mixing of water in the chalice?—That is an omission; but as there is no prohibition I think I am justified in doing it. I should think the omission amounted practically to nothing.

2956. You spoke of its being a sacrilege to have Communion in the evening. Evening commences technically at noon, but I suppose you did not refer to that technical meaning?—No; I object to its being late at night.

2957. You really meant not what is technically the evening but a Communion late at night?—Yes.

2958. I think you have spoken of your services as having been a means of bringing back several Dissenters to the church. Do you consider that ritualistic services, if I may use that term, are more favourably received by Dissenters than by lukewarm members of our Church?—I think the course of the Dissenters themselves shows that, because they are themselves adopting musical services. They are chanting the psalms and introducing organs, all of which they inveighed against at the time when they separated from the Church. They are now returning to all those things which they formerly objected to.

2960. (Rev. R. Gregory.) You said you had a certain number of communicants every day and on Sundays. You did not tell us how many communicants you had on Easter Sunday at all the celebrations?—I should say about 500.

2961. Did you administer to all those 500 separately and individually?—Yes.

2962. Did you find that it was very exhausting to do it, or were you able to do it by a little management without much difficulty?—It was exhausting, but we have five curates, and we all help. We have four at a time to administer, though we only want one to celebrate. We have four to administer, and therefore if you cut them into three parts and then cut those three parts into four you find it not so very great.

2963. Are many of those communicants poor people?—Yes; a proper average.

2964. The labouring classes of the parish?—Yes.

2965. Have you many of the class of shopkeepers in your parish?—I have manufacturers. I have no gentry; our population consists of manufacturers, tradespeople, the usual lawyers and doctors, and then mechanics and labouring people.

2966. Have you any idea how many persons communicated at your church on the Easter Sunday before you were appointed or the first Easter after you were appointed?—No, I cannot say that. I should say about 200 would be the number, as far as my memory goes.

2967. You said you collected from the offertory about 500*l.* a year; does that include all you collect for charitable purposes in the parish?—We never have anything in the parish except through the offertory. We never have any subscriptions.

2968. The 500*l.* includes all?—Yes.

2969. You said you have no church rates in your parish; were there any in your predecessor's time?—Yes. At the first vestry meeting to which I was called, I proposed to abolish them. Certain parties were against their being abolished; but we put it to the vote of the vestry, and it was carried.

2970. Has it left you any great deficit?—No; on the contrary. As I say, the Easter dues and every kind of payment on the part of the people is through the offertory. There is no payment of any sort or kind.

2971. Are the Easter dues included in the 500*l.*, or over and above it?—It is all included, except the special case which has called upon us lately to restore and rebuild the old church.

2972. Does the number you have just given me include what is collected at the two chapels under your care, or does it refer only to the parish church?—It includes the two chapels, but not the district churches.

2973. How are the curates who minister in these chapels of ease paid?—Partly from myself and from the offertory, and partly from little endowments which belong to them from bequests which are left in the parish.

Rev. W. J. E. Bennett, M.A.

4 July 1867.

Rev. W. J. E.
Bennett, M.A.
4 July 1867.

2974. That applies to all the curates in the parish; they are paid partly by local endowments and partly by the offertory?—Yes.

2975-6. (Mr. Cardwell.) I believe I should rightly interpret your sentiments if I were to say, that in contending for what are called ritual observances, you are not really contending for any external thing, but for the doctrines which lie hidden under them?—Yes.

2977. "The vestments are used with a specific respect to the divine person of the Son of God; to advance His glory; to set forth His real presence. and to vivify His sacrifice upon the cross"?—Yes.

2978. You do not contend then for any æsthetic purpose, but strictly for a doctrinal purpose?—Decidedly. The æsthetic purpose forms an accident afterwards, but is not the object.

2979. "The object is to convey religious impressions, and to guard religious doctrine"?—Yes.

2980. Are those doctrines accurately expressed in these words, "The real objective presence of our Blessed Lord, the sacrifice offered by the priest and the adoration due to the presence of our Blessed Lord"?—Yes.

2981. The contest on the subject of whether the vestments and ritual observances should be retained you regard as being a struggle between Catholicity and Protestantism?—Yes.

2982. Your opinion is "that those who advocate ritual observance have in their advocacy depending upon Catholic tradition a clear and consistent ground to stand upon"?—Yes.

2983. "That they should deny all assumed authority in the State to interfere in matters spiritual"?—Yes.

2984. "That the State is a power naturally antagonistic to the Church"?—Yes.

2985. "That the Church of England had in the time of William III. Dutch Presbyterianism so forced upon her, that to this day she has never fully recovered from the poison then so unhappily introduced into her system"?—Why should you quote words that I have written? I have not had any occasion to alter that opinion. I should explain the word "State" to be such as the State is now—consisting of all kinds of religion.

2986. I think you do not approve of the object of approaching to uniformity in all these matters?—No, I think that has been our destruction.

2987. On the contrary, you consider the Act of Uniformity to have been a cause of schism?—Decidedly; the cause of the whole of the misfortunes of our Church.

2988. Although there is only one Church there might be a thousand ways of worship?—Yes.

2989. There might, for instance, be here a Church "noted for its austere simplicity, and in another place "one noted for its elaborate ritual"?—Yes; I could worship in both if called upon.

2990. And that if there needs must be any legislation you "would recommend the abolition of the Act of Uniformity"?—Yes.

2991. In these several churches, some of which were to be "noted for their austere simplicity and "some for their elaborate ritual," who would decide in each case what the form of observance should be?—The Church as the ultimate appeal, the Bishop as the proximate appeal.

2992. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) You some time ago, I think, had a litany at 5 o'clock in the morning?—Yes.

2993. Does that still continue?—No, that has been given up. It attracted for a time, but it did not continue to do so.

2994. You have not told us whether you have Communion on saints' days; I presume you have?—Always.

2995. You were asked a question about the authority on which you adopted the vestments. May I ask you whether you rest your practice as to the vestments in any degree upon the interpretation of the rubric on ornaments given by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in 1857, in the case of Liddell v. Westerton?—No; I should not rest upon that authority at all.

2996. Why not?—Because I should not rest upon any authority which came from the State.

2997. You consider the Judicial Committee as being a State authority, and not an Ecclesiastical authority?—Exactly.

2998. May I ask whether your attention has been called to a "Case" with reference to the Ornaments of "the minister" submitted by "several Archbishops and Bishops of the United Church of England and "Ireland"?—No, I have not seen it; I have heard of it.

2999. You have not seen in any other form out of this book the following passage: "That the word 'ornaments' contained in the rubric includes Vestments, has been decided by the Privy Council in the judgment delivered in the case of Liddell v. Westerton, a printed copy of which accompanies this case. The passage bearing upon this point will be found at page 111. The same judgment, moreover, decides that the ornaments contemplated "by this Rubric were those prescribed by the Prayer Book put forth by the authority of the Statute "2 & 3 Edward VI. chap. 1." You have not seen that passage on page 4?—No.

3000. You are aware that the old English Canons have been held to be still statute law by the 1st of Elizabeth?—Yes.

3001. As those canons prescribed Ornaments and Practices, should you feel that the existence of that law is a limit to your choice?—No, I should say not. It would be a national canon, which would not limit the greater, which is the Catholic canon.

3002. You were asked several questions about the absolution in the Visitation of the Sick. You were asked how you explained the fact of the order to use a particular form of absolution in the first Prayer Book being omitted in the second Prayer Book, and not subsequently re-introduced. Do you consider that the fact of that omission is a prohibition to your using that particular form of absolution?—No. I have answered that question before, I think.

3003. In fact you would consider that there having been that form ordered, and there being no direction to use any form now, you are at liberty to use what was used formerly?—I should naturally recur to that which had been used.

3004. Are you aware whether any present bishop of the Church has given any decision or any judgment on that subject?—No.

3005. You were asked, with regard to the use of this absolution, how you could reconcile the use of a form of absolution with that direction in the exhortation which occurs in these words: "that by the ministry of God's holy word, he may receive the benefit of absolution"?—Yes.

3006. Do you consider that that expression, "the ministry of God's holy word," means your doing what God in His Holy Word ordered to be done with regard to the remission of sins?—Yes, with regard to the authority conveyed.

3007. When you were ordained I need hardly say that these words were addressed to you by the bishop at the imposition of hands, "Receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work of a Priest in the Church of God, now committed unto thee by the imposition of our hands. Whose sins thou dost forgive, they are forgiven; and whose sins thou dost retain, they are retained. And be thou a faithful Dispenser of the Word of God and of His holy Sacraments; In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, Amen." Those words were addressed to you when you were ordained a priest of the Church of England?—Yes.

3008. Should you say that the expression "dispenser of the word of God" there, means the same thing as "the ministry of God's holy word" in the exhortation?—I should think that they run in parallel lines one with the other.

3009. When our Lord gave the mission to His Apostles, He said to them; "Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained." Do you consider that this authority, which was conferred upon you, implies what our Lord then ordered His Apostles to do?—Yes.

3010. Then in using any form of absolution which incorporated the idea which our Lord Himself expresses, you would consider that you were ministering that word?—Yes.

3011. Do you know whether the mixed chalice is distinctly ordered in any of those old English canons to which I referred?—No, I am not aware of it.

3012. Do you consider that the Agnus Dei which was used in 1549 may be regarded as a warrant for your present use of hymns in the Communion service?—It may be; I do not take it so.

3013. Did you ever hear as a fact whether, up to about a year ago, there was a practice of singing a hymn or psalm in the Communion service in Guernsey in all the churches?—No.

3014. You said, I think, that you do not think you are authorized to reserve the sacrament for the sick, having regard to the rubric about consuming the remains of the sacrament?—I think it is against one of the Articles. There is no rubric against it.

3015. May I ask you to attend carefully to the wording of this question: Would it content you, as a maximum, to have in your church the same sort of services as could be historically proved to have been used in connexion with the first Prayer Book of Edward VI.?—Yes.

3016. You were asked by Sir Joseph Napier whether, if the doctrine of the Church of England had changed, the vestments might not also change?—If the doctrine were to change the Church would be gone.

3017. With reference to that question, do you consider that the doctrine of the Church of England has not changed since the Prayer Book of 1549 ordered the vestments?—It has been the same doctrine that it has ever been.

3018. Dr. Twiss drew your attention to the expression "rites and ceremonies" in the Act of Uniformity; have you ever considered whether that expression "rites and ceremonies" means very often in the Act of Uniformity nothing more than the services in the book, and not the mode of conducting the services?—I never thought of it.

3019. Did you ever find any practical difficulty in the use of the first collect in the Communion of the sick, from its being inapplicable to many cases; and do you think it would be convenient to have a second collect?—The office for the Communion of the sick being without a creed, involves the necessity of previous preparation on the part of the person who is to receive; and that involves the confession, or the examination of faith and of morals, so that the collect begins abruptly.

3020. I am afraid I did not explain myself. My question simply went to this: whether you found that the words, assuming as they do, that the person was sick and probably at the point of death, are very often inapplicable, to chronic cases of illness for example?—Yes.

3021. (Sir R. J. Phillimore.) You have been asked by several Commissioners a question to this effect: who is to decide in each church as to the lawfulness of the variety of the vestments used. You are aware that at the close of the preface in the Prayer Book there are these words: "And forasmuch as nothing can be so plainly set forth but doubts may arise in the use and practice of the same; to appease all such diversity (if any arise), and for the resolution of all doubts concerning the manner how to understand, do, and execute the things contained in this book, the parties that so doubt or diverse-ly take anything shall always resort to the Bishop of the diocese, who by his discretion shall take order for the quieting and appeasing of the same; so that the same order be not contrary to anything contained in this book. And if the Bishop of the diocese be in doubt, then he may send for the resolution thereof to the Archbishop." I ask whether you do not think that it is competent to the Bishop, and that he is the proper authority to decide upon questions of this kind when they are in dispute?—No, I should say it was not the proper and sufficient authority in itself; that we must have an appeal; and all the Church recognizes the law of appeal.

3022. I mean in the first instance. If there be a diversity of opinion as to the propriety or impropriety of using certain ornaments, would it not be the duty of the Bishop, in the first place, to make a decision on that question, and would it not be the duty of the clerk to have recourse to him?—My own practice would answer that question.

3023. Is he not the person appointed under the Prayer Book to appease all such diversities, and for the resolution of all such doubts?—It would be a happy thing if he could. He could not.

3024. Is he not the person to be appealed to in the first instance?—If there is a diversity of opinion or doubt; but where there is no doubt, and no diversity of opinion, there is no need for that.

3025. I am speaking of in the first instance. Do I understand that you set no value upon this?—No; that does not follow.

3026. Do you ascribe to the Bishop any authority according to these words? I mean any authority in the matter of regulating the ornaments and vestments of the church and of the minister?—I should say no, always considering an ultimate authority to be over him.

3027. That would be only saying that there would be an appeal from his authority?—Yes.

3028. If there is an appeal from his authority, he has an authority to exercise, has he not, in the first instance?—Yes; I should say he had authority in the first instance.

3029. Then the appeal would lie from his authority to the Archbishop, would it not?—Yes.

3030. And that is the only authority which the Prayer Book seems to have contemplated, the only appellate jurisdiction?—It contemplates that neither Archbishop nor Bishop would decide anything contrary to the rules of the Catholic Church. If they did it would be so unhappy a thing that we should never resort to it.

3031. It says, "so that the same order be not contrary to anything contained in this Book." I wanted to know what amount of authority you would be inclined to ascribe to the Bishop under the words which I have read, and also under the general law; and I understand you to say that in the first instance the Bishop would have an authority to exercise?—It would depend on the circumstances upon which the authority was called to bear; for instance, if they were trivial or immaterial things, you would naturally follow the Bishop's advice; but if they were important things, such as vestments, the Bishop would have no authority.

3032. In the matter of the ornaments of the minister, do you not think that, according to the general law of the Church, apart from the Prayer Book, the ordinary is the person to have the authority to decide in the matters of ritual?—No.

3033. Will you tell me what your opinion is, before the first statute of Edward VI. upon the subject, who had authority to govern in each diocese the question of ritual?—The Bishop had authority to direct and order everything in his diocese, subject to the use of the Catholic Church, and no right to say anything contrary to that.

3034. I am asking you, under the general law of the Church whether the Bishop would not be the authority in the first instance to decide all matters of ritual in his diocese?—I have answered that, yes.

Rev. W. J. E. Bennett, M.A.

4 July 1867.

MINUTES OF EVIDENCE TAKEN BEFORE

1 July 1867. 3035. Do you think that there is any different law in the Church of England now upon that point?—I should think the Church of England wishes that law to be kept.

3036. Your answer is, that you think the Bishop would be the right person?—I think in all matters the Bishop should be the person to decide, always considering that the Bishop would decide according to the law of the Church.

3037. There would be an appeal from him?—Yes. If he decided contrary to the law, there would be an appeal.

3038. There would be an appeal to the Archbishop in that case?—Yes.

3039. Would you consider the decision of the Archbishop final?—No.

3040. To what would you appeal afterwards?—To the Church.

3041. What do you mean by an appeal to the Church?—In synod assembled, in which the whole Church might speak, and not one individual.

3042. In England would you consider the convocation to be that synod?—No, it is not a synod. I should refer to the Catholic usage.

3043. What is the synod?—An aggregate body of the Church called together, and by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost deciding points. Convocation is not a sacred synod, it is a parliament.

3044. Do you mean a synod in England?—A synod in England, a national synod.

3045. As distinct from the convocation?—Yes.

3046. If the national synod came to a decision you would be bound by that?—I should feel myself bound by that.

3047. (Mr. J. Abel Smith.) Would the national synod include laity?—Yes; I said according to the ancient usages of the Church.

3048. (Sir R. J. Phillimore.) You have some inscription to this effect “μηδεν άνευ επισκοπου”?—Yes.

3049. That is what you inscribe upon your church?—Yes; that is at St. Barnabas' church.

3050. (Mr. Cardwell.) At Frome as well?—No.

3051. (Dean of Westminster.) You said when the rubric was silent you referred to Catholic usage?—Yes.

3052. May I ask whether, amongst the Catholic usages, you have adopted the kiss of peace?—No.

3053. The use of fans in the Holy Eucharist?—No.

3054. Is your table planted in the middle of the church?—No.

3055. You said you considered these vestments of essential importance?—I consider them, having been adopted, to be to any one who has adopted them of essential importance, because to go back from that would be to deny the doctrine you meant to teach by that.

3056. Supposing these vestments were worn by persons holding entirely different doctrines from those you hold, would that invalidate their significance in your eyes?—That comes to the question whether it would invalidate the whole sacrament or not. I dare not say it would.

3057. Of what do you consider the chasuble to be significant?—I think, according to the writings of the liturgical authors, it signifies the office of a priest.

3058. Of a priest performing a sacrifice?—Of a priest performing a sacrifice.

3059. Of what do you consider the cope to be symbolical?—A mere processional vestment used out of doors.

3060. Merely for magnificence?—Yes.

3061. Of what do you consider the two lights to be significant?—Of the living Saviour, His two natures.

3062. In the sacrament or out of the sacrament?—In the sacrament.

3063. Of what do you consider the water and the wine to be symbolical?—Do you ask me what I think?

3064. That is all I can ask?—What the Church thinks.

3065. I ask what you think?—Of the Blood and Water which came from our Lord's side.

3066. Why do you not wear the chasuble in private administration of the Holy Eucharist?—Because the law of the Church does not sanction the use of the chasuble except in the public ministration.

3067. Are there any rubrics which you do not observe?—I am afraid there are.

3068. On what ground do you not observe them?—Accident. I have never intentionally violated them if they were brought before me.

3069. I will mention one; do the communicants always signify their names to you before receiving the Holy Communion?—No. Virtually they do by always having the privilege of coming to confession. When ever they come without it (and strangers may come that I know nothing of) I should not feel justified in rejecting them from the altar steps.

3070. Do you use the long exhortation?—Sometimes, not always.

3071. Do you consider the canons of 1604 have any binding effect upon you?—I should think they were to a great degree binding, but interpreted by other canons and other customs always.

3072. Supposing that the Act of Uniformity were so far relaxed as that this rubric as to ornaments were to disappear, should you still feel justified in continuing the ornaments by catholic usage?—The principle I should go upon would be what I have said.

3073. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) Do you consider the reservation of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper prohibited by the words at the close of the 28th Article; namely, “The sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped”?—Yes.

3074. Do you not consider the elevation of the elements to be forbidden by the same words in the Article?—No; because that refers to the procession of the host, which is lifted up and carried for the people to adore in the church and in the streets, not to the elements during the consecration.

The witness withdrew.

REV. EDMUND CLAY, M.A., called in and examined.

Rev. E. Clay,
M.A.

3075. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) You are the incumbent of St. Margaret's, Brighton?—I am.

3076. How long have you been so?—From the year 1856.

3077. Will you state what are the services in your church on Sunday?—The 11 o'clock service, consisting of the morning prayer and sermon; afternoon service at a quarter past 3, litany and sermon; and evening prayer with sermon at 7 o'clock.

3078. How often is the Holy Communion celebrated?—The first Sunday in the month, the third Sunday evening in the month, and all the special festivals for which there is a proper preface.

3079. What are your week day services?—Wednesday morning in the church at half-past 11, litany and sermon, and during Advent and Lent, Friday also. Other services are in the school-room; the fishermen's and working men's club-rooms.

3080. What is the population of your district?—I have no district but a conventional one. Brighton, as your Grace perhaps is aware, is not divided into parishes at all.

3081. What number does your church hold?—Between 1,100 and 1,200.

3082. Is it generally full on Sunday morning?—Quite full.

3083. And at the evening service also?—Yes, it is quite full.

3084. Then you have a conventional district, you say?—Yes.

3085. You visit the poor within a certain conventional district?—Yes; I take charge of the poor for spiritual and temporal relief.

3086. Is there a fair proportion of the poor attending your church, do you think?—In the evening, and a good proportion in the morning. About 300 sittings out of 1,100 are entirely free. I have erected a gallery lately for the fishing people, entirely for their accommodation.

3086a. Do they occupy it?—Very fairly. Of course at certain times they are at sea, and unable to attend if they would.

3087. With respect to musical service, what singing have you in your church?—The hymns of the Church. We chant the Canticles and the Glorias. We read the Psalms.

3088. Certain hymns are sung, when?—Between the prayers and the Holy Communion, and between the pre-Communion service and the sermon.

3089. What number of communicants have you on ordinary Sunday mornings, on an average?—Our average number would be about 270.

3090. Out of a church which holds between 1,100 and 1,200?—Yes; we have had as many as over 400.

3091. (Mr. J. Abel Smith.) Is that on Easter Day?—On Good Friday. On Easter Day, taking the morning and evening Communion, I dare say the aggregate amount would exceed 500.

3092. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) Does your congregation come principally from within the conventional district?—No; it is gathered from all parts of Brighton, many of them being visitors.

3093. Of your own experience, can you give any facts (not opinions) connected with the influence which a higher ritualistic service has produced?—I am acquainted with facts which have come under my notice in visitation of sick persons and others. I recollect a fact which occurred between three and four years ago,—a very striking fact I felt it to be at the time. I am not permitted to give the name of the father and mother, as they laid me under a promise not to bring it publicly forward, and therefore I thought I was not at liberty to mention it to the bishop; but I will state the facts as they came under my own personal cognizance. I received a letter from a lady, stating that she had been visiting Brighton with her father and mother, that she was an only child, 18 years of age; she had been attending a highly ritualistic church, and in one of her attendances there formed the acquaintance of one of the clergy officiating. She was invited to conversation in the vestry of the church. After that, she frequently repeated a visit of that kind, made confession, and it ended thus: that she expressed great distress of mind, feeling very dissatisfied with her position in the Church of England; and she thought that she must either embrace Roman Catholicism, or give up religion altogether. She stated in this letter further, that the clergyman she had seen on those occasions told her that he really felt that there were but these two alternatives, either infidelity or the Roman Church for her, and advised her to communicate with some Roman Catholic priest in London. She said she had done so, and had been in the habit of attending his instructions, and had been advised by him to be baptized into the Romish Church; but she hesitated because she was placed under a promise not to communicate it to her father and mother, she being under age. At the last moment she felt great hesitation, and wrote to ask me to give a honest opinion about it. She did not give her name, but gave initials, and I was to send it to a special place somewhere in Oxford Street, a bookseller's or library. I hesitated at first to reply, but I did reply, stating that I declined to hold any clandestine correspondence with her; that her first and most sacred duty was to communicate my letter to her father and mother; and that unless she did so, I did not feel at liberty to enter into further communication with her; that any qualms of conscience she had could never be silenced unless she did that, which was her first duty. I did not hear again for several weeks; I think a month or six weeks elapsed; and then I received a communication from the mother, a lady in a high position of life, and at her request I came up to London, and saw her and the father, and the young lady too. I had several long communications with them. What the result was I am not now prepared to say; but certainly as to the young girl, her mind was entirely alienated from the Church of England, and deeply impregnated with the idea that the Romish Church alone afforded an asylum for her. I expressed a wish that the father would communicate the facts to the bishop of the diocese, as I felt it ought to be one in which his lordship's advice, counsel, and influence should be used; but his expression was, "If these facts were brought forward publicly, they would bring down my grey hairs with sorrow to the grave." He was an old general in the army, occupying a high position. I parted from him in that way. I have not heard from him since. I had great hopes that the young girl was restored to a more balanced state of mind, and that she was reconciled and restored to the Church of England.

3094. Should you object to give the name of the clergyman?—I did not feel it right even to ask it at the time. I felt it was a very difficult position for me. I did not even ask the name. I know the church; but unless your Grace presses it, I will not mention it. The church was mentioned in which she formed the acquaintance of the clergyman, but I did not even ask the name of the clergyman, and do not know it.

3095. You do not know it now?—No.

3096. You know the church which she attended?—Yes.

3097. I think you may fairly state the church?—It was St. Paul's church at Brighton.

3098. You do not know the individual clergyman?—No.

3099. (Dean of Westminster.) Do the clergy in that church wear vestments, or adopt any of these peculiar practices?—I am not prepared to say on my personal observation, as I have not myself visited it for the purpose of ascertaining. It has the reputation of being what is termed in common language a ritualistic church, but I have never witnessed the service myself.

3100. Do you know whether they wear vestments or use incense, or anything of that sort?—I do not know from personal observation.

3101. You spoke of your having evening Communion; on Easter Sunday, for example, what is the average attendance?—On an average I should say we have from 275 to 300; decidedly larger than the morning attendance, as a rule.

3102. Do you find any disadvantages resulting from it?—No; on the contrary, it is exceedingly quiet, solemn, and devout.

3103. (Mr. J. Abel Smith.) No sign of intemperance?—No, never.

3104. (Dean of Westminster.) Did you find any persons in your congregation made any objection to the introduction of evening Communion?—No. On the contrary, I think I may say quite the opposite.

3105. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) You mentioned the church of St. Paul's, Brighton, as being the church which this young lady attended; and you said, I think, that you have not visited the church, so that you cannot speak in an exact way as to whether they use vestments or not?—No, I have not.

3106. But I suppose you can tell us as a matter of your belief, whether they do or do not use them?—I really could not say as a matter of my own knowledge; opinion or belief is forbidden me.

3107. I mean special eucharistic vestments?—I really could not say, because I have never had an opportunity of attending the church. I can only judge from hearsay, and I really never asked the question of anybody who attended whether they did wear them.

Rev. E. Clay,

3108. You are not aware that they do not wear them?—I do not know that they do not. It has the reputation of being a ritualistic church. I have been told of their being worn in other churches in Brighton, but I could not say of St. Paul's.

3109. You instanced this case in answer to his Grace's question, as to whether you knew anything of the effects of ritual practices in churches in Brighton?—Yes.

3110. Do you know of any other case of persons taking the same course towards joining the Church of Rome; persons, I mean, who had attended services in Brighton where there were not ritual practices?—Do you mean a similar case?

3111. Do you know of any case of a person who had attended a church or churches in Brighton, where there were no ritual practices, joining the Church of Rome on the ground of being dissatisfied with the Church of England?—No. I know of no case.

3112. That was not my question. My question was,—Whether you knew of any person who had left the Church of England and joined the Church of Rome, having attended churches where there were not ritual practices, and left on the ground of dissatisfaction with the Church of England?—No, I do not. But if you will allow me to explain, his Grace put to me the question as to the results of any ritualistic practices or church. I gleaned from the information given to me by this young person in a letter, that the result of her attending St. Paul's and confession there was, that she was alienated from the Church of England and drawn towards the Church of Rome; and that this arose from the conversations she had held, and what had passed at the confessional, which had evidently been practised by her in the church of St. Paul's.

3113. In regard to evening Communion, what kind of attendance have you?—Our average attendance must be between 270 and 300. It has exceeded 400.

3114. Would you tell us what is your reason for having evening Communion in preference to any other hour of the day?—We have Communion in the evening for the sake of the poor, the working classes, servants, and professional men (I mean specially now medical men, who, as you are aware, cannot attend morning service). It was desirable to try it. I tried it really as an experiment, but I found it succeed so marvellously, and it seemed to be so much appreciated, that I have continued it.

3115. Have you tried whether a like success might not attend an early morning Communion?—I did try, but I did not find anything like the same success. Certainly none of the poor attended.

3116. Have you had at all recently an evening Communion specially for young persons newly confirmed?—It has been always my practice after confirmation to have an immediate Communion for the young people confirmed on the following Sunday.

3117. Did you recently have one in the evening for them?—No, not specially for them.

3118. Or invite them specially to come to it?—Not specially for them; certainly not. I always invite them. I had two on the occasion to which I fancy you refer, the late confirmation in Brighton.

3119. I mean at the end of last year?—No; not for young persons under confirmation.

3120. You did not invite young persons who had been confirmed on that day or previously, to come to the evening Communion rather than to morning Communion?—Certainly not; but I should have no objection to doing so.

3121. Did you have any evening Communion last Good Friday?—I did.

3122. I have seen a statement (of course I cannot say whether it is true or not) that on that occasion you invited generally Dissenters to come to it, or wished your congregation to invite them?—I did not make use of the word "Dissenters." Certainly in my morning sermon, dwelling on the spirit of that beautiful collect in our Church which laments our "unhappy divisions," and prays for unity, I pointed out that Good Friday seemed to be an occasion when the national festival of the passover, of which we are beautifully reminded in the Lord's Supper, might be an occasion when those who differed with us on ecclesiastical forms might meet at the common table of the Lord, and there partake together in love, once at least in the year. I dwelt upon that. The sermon was a sermon on Christian unity. The text I can give you. I remember it well: "Endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." I did then certainly urge all who had friends or acquaintances, though they differed from us, being technically termed "Dissenters," or (as it is well expressed) "non-conforming members of the national Church," to invite them to come to the Lord's table.

3123. Did it occur to you that that might be an infraction of the 27th canon,—“Schismatics not to be admitted to the Communion”?—No, it did not, any more than our universal breach of the 74th canon, for instance.

3124. Where are the morning and evening prayers said from in your church?—From lecterns.

3126. Has there been any alteration in that respect lately in your church?—Yes; we had two lecterns, and we now only have one, which turns, the Bible being on one side and the Prayer Book on the other. It was for the sake of the congregation hearing better.

3127. Is there any peculiarity in your church as to the mode of saying the General Thanksgiving?—The congregation join in it.

3128. In the whole of it?—Yes.

3129. When, for instance, that sentence is said "particularly to those who desire" and so on, do they say it?—No; only the officiating clergyman.

3130. In the Litany, where the sentence occurs relating to the sick, do you insert there any expression such as "especially those for whom our prayers are desired"?—We do.

3131. You do not see that it is an infraction of the rubric?—No.

3132. You think it a liberty that you may fairly use?—I have heard a Bishop of the Church use it.

3133. (Mr. Cardwell.) From your acquaintance with Brighton can you tell us what the effect of the introduction of vestments is upon the people there as regards extending, or the contrary, the influence of the Church of England among them?—It is very difficult for me to give an opinion, because there are doubtless many who assemble in those churches where they are used who approve of them. On the other hand, perhaps, as I am more acquainted with a very large body who very highly disapprove of them it would be an unfair thing for me to conclude one way or another. Those that I am best acquainted with are decidedly opposed to them. I believe there is a very strong feeling against it.

3134. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) It is only a matter of opinion?—Only a matter of opinion.

3135. (Rev. R. Gregory.) When you have the Holy Communion in the evening, at what part of the service do you begin; do you begin at very beginning of the service?—Yes.

3136. At the Lord's Prayer?—Yes.

3137. When do you put the bread and wine on the altar?—It is brought in where the rubric directs, I place it on the table then.

3138. What amount do you collect in the course of the year for charities of all kinds, by offertories and all kinds of collections in church?—We collected by free-will offerings during the year 1866, for instance, for purposes irrespective of the support of the ministry or the fabric, upwards of 1,300*l.*, a great portion of which was for foreign missions.

3139. (Dr. Payne Smith.) Is the fabric supported by offerings, chiefly in your church?—By offerings in boxes and by pew-rents.

3140. What is the proportion of the voluntary offerings?—The voluntary offerings I have just referred to were over 1,300*l.* The offerings specially for the work of the ministry, the support of the clergy, and fabric, and so forth, amounted to over 1,100*l.* in addition to that.

3141. Of course you have no church rates?—No endowment, no church rates, no anything, in fact, in that shape. The incumbent of the church, myself, pays about 600*l.* a year to be permitted to minister within the walls of the church. It is a private proprietary consecrated chapel, but there is a rental of 400*l.*, within a few pounds, to pay to the trustees. The expenses of about 200*l.* fall upon the clergyman.

3142. Have you ever known any scandals arise from persons going to the Holy Communion in the evening?—Never.

3143. You have never seen anybody come in an unfit state?—No.

3144. You have never heard of it?—No; never.

3145. (Rev. H. Venn.) You said just now that it was within your knowledge that there was a very considerable body of church people to whom these ritualistic practices are distasteful and who are opposed to them?—Yes.

3146. May I ask you whether that feeling exists in the lower grades of society, or in the middle classes, or in both?—I think in both.

3147. Have you ever heard any grounds alleged for this feeling?—For instance, a case occurred in the course of my parochial ministrations of this sort within the last 12 months. I was requested to visit a person in great distress. She was a widow lady who had come down to Brighton. She had two daughters, and the younger of them was in delicate health, about 18 years of age. She said to me that she was very much alarmed for her general condition; that she was in the habit of undergoing severe penances, which had been imposed by a clergyman, but not a clergyman in Brighton. He was a clergyman then officiating in London. She gave me one instance: the night before she spoke to me she had kneeled upon a marble slab bare-kneed for four hours repeating certain penitential psalms and prayers, which were imposed as a penance, in consequence of her having confessed to some sins of temper or infirmity of that sort. They were anxious that I should reason with her.

3148. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) This is within your own knowledge and experience, is it?—I was the clergyman to whom the mother stated the fact. I was called upon to visit this lady for the purpose of speaking to her and her daughter for the purpose of pointing out the impropriety and the unwisdom of these proceedings. The family were being exceedingly anxious about both her mental and bodily health.

3149. As a penance which she was ordered to undergo?—Yes.

3150. (Dr. Twiss.) Did you see the young lady afterwards?—I did not see the young lady, but the mother stated this to me. Her elder sister also corroborated it.

3151. (Earl of Harrowby.) Why did not you see the young lady?—I called several times, but I never was successful in obtaining an interview.

3152. (Dr. Twiss.) She declined to see you, in fact?—She declined to see me.

3153. (Mr. J. Abel Smith.) Do you believe the existence of ritualistic practices in Brighton has been generally favourable to the cause of religion or otherwise?—That would involve an opinion which would only be my opinion and not worth much. I do not think so myself, but it is my private opinion.

3154. You know no facts?—Facts of what sort? They are very difficult to get at. I do not apprehend how I can illustrate the cause of true religion being benefited or otherwise.

3155. I said religious feeling and religious habits?—I know as a matter of fact some that have been alienated from the Church by it. Some allured to Rome; some alienated towards dissent; separated from the Church.

3156. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) What is the covering of the Lord's table in your chapel?—An ordinary velvet covering.

3157. Red?—Red.

3158. With any decoration on it?—The monogram.

3159. Have you a different one for Lent?—No; it is the same always.

3160. Do you say the words of administration to the whole rail full or to each communicant separately?—To the whole rail.

3161. May I ask on what ground?—It is the ground of convenience. It would be almost impossible to administer to between 300 and 400 persons, after a full service, separately.

3162. How many clergy, if any, have you assisting you?—One, as a rule. We have attempted four, but there was not room.

3163. As a matter of fact, have you heard that Communions as large as yours have been celebrated and the words used to each communicant?—Possibly it is so, but I do not know that it has ever been brought before me.

3164. Do you use the Athanasian Creed?—Yes.

3165. In all your services you conduct the service according to the Prayer Book?—Entirely.

3166. Is it your opinion that a multiplication of occasions of Communion increases the number of communicants?—I should not consider so in my own case. I mean to say if I were to have it every Sunday I should not expect to have more communicants in the month than we have now when we celebrate twice regularly and on each festival of the Church.

3167. Would not other people come in to whom the alternate Sunday might not be convenient, if they could get the advantage of every Sunday?—During one month, the month of May we had several festivals—Whitsunday, Trinity Sunday, besides the ordinary Sundays upon which we usually administer, and we found on those occasions the numbers were less; that the total was pretty much the same at the end of the month.

3168. Do you consider it an advantage to have a separate Communion service? I am not speaking of the hour, but of a Communion service separated from the other services. Do more people come when they have not to attend a previous service?—The evening service is an illustration of that. I think they do attend in larger numbers, but I am not sure it is because we have it separate from the other services.

3169. What do you find the effect of your separate Litany? Do you find that popular?—I do.

3170. Do you know any instances of persons having been driven to the Church of Rome by attendance on and enjoyment of ritualistic services?—I know of cases. I have received Popish recusants. I received about 30 during the last few years, and I think I made a note that 11 of those stated to me in the presence of witnesses that they had toppled over, if I may use the expression, having been allured very much indeed through extreme ritualistic services.

3171. In what space of time was that?—Within the last seven years I have received that number. I could not select which of them made that statement.

3172. Do you recollect any instance of these so-called ritualistic services at an earlier date than three or four years ago?—I can remember one case last year. I received a mother and her son together. They had gone over and then came back. She had two other sons whom she has failed to recover because they were placed in a monastery in Belgium, and she distinctly said to me that she had become a Romanist in consequence of her mind having been upset by the ritualistic services and the teaching that she had received. That was within the last twelve months.

3173. She came back to the Church of England?—Yes; she was very unhappy. I met with her in

Rev. E. Clay,
M.A.
4 July 1867.

Brighton. She sought my pastoral visitations, and she came back, and openly renounced the Church of Rome in my church, with her son.

3174. A lady rapidly impressionable, I should suppose?—Her son was 18 years of age. It is a very sad case, because her two sons she could not recover. I believe she has not got them back yet.

3175. With your system of worship have you received many converts from dissent?—I think I have baptised adults from dissent, between 20 and 30, and I think I have received upwards of 40.

3176. I apprehend there is a class of mind to which your form of service is agreeable?—I think so. I think many Non-conformists are attracted and would be attracted to the service of the Church of England thus conducted.

3177. And you suppose a more ornamental form of service may be attractive to other minds?—Possibly it may.

3178. Therefore considering what a large institution the Church of England is, and with what great variety of mind it has to deal, you would be for giving considerable leave and license in the way of performing the service?—In the matter of the mere performance of the service, where no doctrine was involved or symbolised, certainly I should.

3179. You would be for a wide toleration within what was reasonably and honestly the doctrine of the Church of England?—Decidedly, I should.

3180. (Earl of Harrowby.) Is your congregation a fluctuating one or one of permanent residents at Brighton?—It partakes largely of both. There are a great many residents, but Brighton itself, as you are aware, is a place of residence for a few years with some, for a few months with others. It partakes very considerably of both. It is always changing.

3181. (Dean of Ely.) In what vestment do you preach?—A gown.

3182. A university gown?—Yes.

3183. Never in the surplice?—Never in the surplice. I found the gown used and I followed the rule I found prevailing for 30 years previous to my incumbency.

3184. As frequently as the Holy Communion is administered you put on your gown and change back again to the surplice?—Yes.

3185. You spoke of the Thanksgiving being spoken generally by the congregation, is that a peculiar rite at your church?—I think it prevails in some churches in the diocese. It does at Hastings. The first time I ever heard it was when the late Archbishop was holding a confirmation at Tunbridge Wells. I happened to mention it to some of my congregation, and suddenly they adopted it.

3186. It has been adopted in your time?—It is a matter more of the congregation than the minister.

3187. You spoke of a feeling existing against ritualistic services; did you intend to include in the term "ritualistic service" a musical choral service?—No.

3188. What is commonly called a cathedral service?—No. What I mean by it would be the use of vestments, incense, and some of the extreme things which have excited a great deal of opposition.

3189. You have no experience which teaches you that there is any feeling against what is commonly called the cathedral service, or choral service?—I have not in my own case. I daresay my people, not being accustomed to it, and probably not liking it, would object to it. I did once attempt, being very fond of music, to have the Psalms chanted in the evening, but I found a very strong expression of disapproval.

3190. You do not include that in what you said of the feeling against the ritualistic services?—No; not at all.

3191. (Bishop of Gloucester.) You mentioned having a service in your church on Wednesdays and Fridays?—Wednesdays and Fridays during Advent and Lent. Wednesday only as a rule.

3192. Why do you not have a daily service in your church?—For two or three reasons. In the first place the rubric itself in the Church Prayer Book relieves me and excludes me from the use of the Church Service.

3193. "Not being let by sickness or some other urgent cause;" what is the urgent cause?—Pardon me; it runs thus: "All priests and deacons are to say daily the morning and evening prayer, either privately or openly, not being let by sickness or some other urgent cause." Then follows this, "And the curate that ministereth in every parish church or chapel," and so on. The ground upon which I wish to excuse myself is, that the second clause explains and limits who the ecclesiastics are who are to use the daily morning and evening prayer, namely, the minister of the parish church or chapel; i.e. one who has "the cure of souls." I am neither the one nor the other. I have no cure of souls.

3194. Do you then, feeling yourself permitted to disuse or not to use daily service, privately say the morning and evening prayer?—That would enter upon my private life and domestic arrangements, which, with deference to your lordship, I do not think I ought to be called upon to answer. I am quite prepared to answer it. But I appeal to his Grace the President. I venture to urge, if I may be permitted, that the second clause really expounds the previous one, and that the "all priests and deacons" is explained only by the fact of their being curates of a parish church or chapel. I may further say that by Act of Parliament I am absolved from it, because the Houses of Legislature, by the consent of the Bishop of the diocese, 40 years back, passed an Act of Parliament which prescribed my duties, and not only prescribed my actual duties, but they even took away from me a part of the Prayer Book: and I have always reasoned if they are permitted to do that I certainly might be justified in pleading a laxity in some other respects. What I mean is this: an Act of Parliament was passed 40 years back which took from me the liberty to use a part of the Prayer Book: some of the very important services of the Prayer Book; nay, deprived me of one of the Holy Sacraments of the Church, ordained by Christ himself. It has taken from me the power of administering Holy Baptism. That exists at the present day. I have appealed to the Bishop and to the vicar, but still that is the Act of Parliament. I am not permitted to use Holy Baptism. I am not permitted to use the churching service for women.

3195. On Wednesdays when you have a service, and the lesson of the day appointed is from the Apocrypha, do you ever alter it, or are you cognizant of any minister in your church doing so?—The case has not occurred. I ought to explain to you (I did mention it, I think,) that it is the Litany service that we use at half past 11 o'clock on the Wednesday, not the morning prayer. It is supposed that the morning prayer is at the parish church. Whether it is so or not, I am not prepared to say.

3196. You mention administering the Holy Communion to rail-falls at a time; have you ever thought whether having more frequent Communions would prevent your being so necessitated to infringe on the rubric?—No, I have not. I have followed the practice which I have observed the Bishops set at confirmation; and which Bishops officiating in my church seem to express their approval of. It has never crossed my mind that we might obviate it. I do not think it would do so if we had weekly or daily Communions.

3197. Then you are of opinion that if you had offered weekly Communion, there would be none or presumably none that would attend except at the times when you do by your usage administer it?—I understood I was not to offer an opinion about these matters. I have no opinion; I have never really given it consideration.

3198. You have not however tried by multiplying Communions to obviate the larger numbers?—During the month of May I had an opportunity of testing

it. We had the first Sunday in the month, then followed Whit Sunday, then Trinity Sunday, then the usual third Sunday evening. I do not think it would be possible for us to have carried our services through the day and administered individually. I am sure it would not be acceptable to my congregation.

3199. So that it would be right to say then an increase in the times of celebrating the Holy Communion would not be acceptable to your congregation?—I do not think it would be acceptable.

3200. Have you collections at your church?—Yes.

3201. At what time do you collect the offerings?—On days when Holy Communion is administered we collect during the offertory.

3202. On Sundays when the Holy Communion is not administered?—At the doors.

3203. You therefore terminate the service on those days on which the Holy Communion is not administered in the pulpit?—Yes, with the blessing.

3204. And do not read the offertory or the Prayer for the Church militant?—No.

3205. (Earl Beauchamp.) You told us just now, of a lady who had two sons in Belgium who had become members of the Church of Rome; how long ago is it since she became a member of the Church of Rome?—It was within the last year that I received her back into the Church of England. I cannot tell when she had become a member of the Church of Rome.

3206. As much as five years ago?—I really could not say; I do not recollect. I do not think I asked her.

3207. You told us that you preached in your gown; do you wear the scarf?—I am not a chaplain. I wear a black stole.

3208. You mean the narrow stole, and not the loose flowing scarf?—No.

3209. Do you use any extemporary prayer before the sermon?—I use an ordinary collect. Sometimes I do not confine myself to a collect. I use a few verses out of the Psalms sometimes; and I, sometimes use the form of the bidding prayer.

3210. Have you any extemporaneous prayer?—All that is so far extemporaneous.

3211. Do you ever use any prayer which is not a set form or a pre-existing composition, such as a collect?—Which is not contained in the Prayer Book?

3212. Yes?—Certainly. For instance, verses of the Psalm are not contained in the Prayer Book. I have used those and formed them into a prayer.

3213. How do you justify that practice?—The bidding prayer permits us—"in this form," I have always understood we might pray thus.

3214. Am I to understand that the form of prayer which you compose out of the Psalms is in the form or to the same effect as the bidding prayer—"Let us pray for Christ's Holy Catholic Church," and so on?—I did not say that. What I mean to say is that I consider the clergy at liberty when in the pulpit to use either a collect or a form of prayer which they may compose. I recollect during the Indian famine the Bishop of Oxford recommended to his clergy a very beautiful form, which I often used in the pulpit at the time in the shape of a kind of litany.

3215. You have told us that you used hymns, but I do not think you mentioned at what time they were used. Does the service begin with a hymn?—No; I stated that we used it at the close of the prayers, and just before the sermon. At the evening service I conclude with one.

3216. You justify your use of the hymn before the sermon on the ground of custom, I presume?—Custom: I fancy one of the Injunctions of Queen Elizabeth allows it, does not it? I think I have seen it printed in some hymn books.

3217. You told us there are 300 free seats. Part of them are in the gallery?—Yes.

3218. What proportion are in the gallery?—They are both downstairs and upstairs. You must be 19199.

aware that this chapel of which I speak is a private proprietary chapel, for which the clergyman pays two trustees a certain large sum of money. The seats are regulated by the schedule of the Act of Parliament, not by the clergyman. He has nothing to do with it.

3219. I ask as to a matter of fact; as to the accommodation?—The accommodation would be about 300 free sittings, on the ground floor and part in the gallery. They are both up and down.

3220. Are they in the best part of the church?—No; decidedly not. Unhappily, I am sorry to say they are not.

3221. They are out of the way?—No, not out of the way; but they are not so nice as some of the others.

3222. Are they the same size, or wider, or narrower?—Yes; they are the same size. They are some of them pews, but they are not in the best part of the church; decidedly not. Some of them are in very good parts; but they are all in parts where they can hear and see. That is a matter which the clergyman has no control over. It was decided by the Act of Parliament when the chapel was originally built.

3223. Do you use any hymn before or after the blessing in the Holy Communion?—Before the sermon.

3224. But at any period subsequently?—After the Church militant prayer.

3225. Or at any other period in the Holy Communion subsequent to that?—Not now. I have used one till within 12 months.

3226. At what period of the service?—After the elements have been administered.

3227. What hymn was that?—Any particular hymn?—No particular hymn. I had reason to think it was not strictly correct, and I omitted it.

3228. Am I to understand that you wish to conform as much as you possibly can to that which you consider to be strictly correct?—Certainly.

3229. It is your desire to conform as much as possible to all the directions that are given?—Yes.

3230. Do you read the exhortations in the Holy Communion all through?—I am referring particularly to that one which gives notice?—No, I do not.

3231. "When the minister giveth warning for the celebration of the Holy Communion (which he shall always do upon the Sunday or some Holy day immediately preceding) after the sermon or homily ended he shall read this exhortation following"?—I have read what has been the custom for many years to a certain period.

3232. How far?—Down to the words "partakers of the kingdom of heaven."

3233. In that particular your practice is not strictly correct?—I think it is the practice which in most churches has been followed.

3234. Do you read at the celebration of the Holy Communion the longer exhortation as well as the shorter?—All that is prescribed I read.

3235. You read the longer one all through?—Yes.

3236. I think you said you had only one covering for the holy table?—Only one.

3237. Did you ever, for instance, on the occasion of the death of the Prince Consort, make any difference?—I do not think the table was covered. The pulpit was.

3238. Is it the practice to drape the pulpit when there is any death of that kind?—I think that is the only case. In the case of any of the Royal family it would be draped in black.

3239. With regard to the evening Communion, are the majority of the communicants at that time of the higher or of the lower classes?—The poorer, decidedly, in the evening. There is a large proportion of the poor.

3240. (Archbishop of Armagh.) Were you the first minister in this church, or was there a clergyman before you?—Thirty years before I entered upon it it had been opened. Three or four clergymen preceded me.

3241. Did you continue to conduct the services in the way they were conducted before you came?—I have added to the number of services, but I followed what I found in existence except the evening service.

3242. Are your services well attended?—The church is exceedingly full. Full to inconvenience.

3243. Has there been any desire expressed by any number of your congregation for any changes in the mode of conducting public service?—No.

3244. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) Have you the Holy Communion on the days for which proper pre-faces are appointed?—Always.

3245. Is the Communion service always used on Ash Wednesday?—Always.

3246. If the deacon reads the morning or evening prayer, is the absolution omitted if a priest is present?—The case has never occurred during my incumbency.

3247. Is notice given in your church after the Nicene Creed what holidays or fasting days are in the week following to be observed?—If there is any notice to be given we give it there.

3248. If you celebrate the Holy Communion more than once in any day, do you always receive the Sacrament yourself on each occasion, according to the 21st canon?—I do.

3249. When the Apocrypha is ordered as the lesson for any day on which you have service, do you substitute some other?—I do not think the case has occurred to me, not having daily service.

Adjourned to Monday next at Twelve o'clock.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY IN THE CHAIR.

THEODORE THOMAS FORD, Esquire, called in and examined.

T.T.Ford, Esq.

8 July 1867.

3250. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) You have been employed, I believe, by a society to collect evidence on certain points?—Yes, to some extent.

3251. By what society?—The Church Association.

3252. How long have you been in their employment?—About six months.

3253. You receive a salary from them?—Yes.

3254. What parts of the country have you visited in the course of those six months?—I have been to a great many parts. I hardly know how to enumerate them all, but I have been, amongst other towns, to Brighton, Birmingham, Taunton, Bridgewater, and Oxford.

3255. To Oxford only, or to other parts of the diocese of Oxford?—To other parts also. Those are some of the parts I have been to, and there are some few others.

3256. You have been called to give evidence as to what you have seen. What facts are you able to testify to in respect to any ritualistic practices?—I should be prepared to testify to the facts of ritualism in one church in Brighton, and some in the diocese of Oxford also, if required.

3257. What facts do you wish to bring forward as to ritualistic practices with which you have been acquainted?—Does your Grace mean with reference to any particular church?

3258. From your experience and knowledge can you state anything with reference to ritualistic practices which you have witnessed in any church which you may choose to select?—I would take the church at Brighton first, and tell the Commission what I saw there.

3259. To what church in Brighton do you refer?—It is the church of Mr. Beanlands, St. Michael and all Angels. I think Mr. Beanlands is the incumbent. I attended there on the 16th of June last.

I was present at the morning service, the 11 o'clock service, and the Communion service also. The church was highly decorated with flowers in the shape of crosses, triangles, and wreaths. The chancel was still more highly decorated. There were paintings also in some parts of the church. The chancel, perhaps, is the most important part to which I would refer. The screen which was between the chancel and the church was decorated with candles and with flowers. There were four large candles upon each side of the screen, and between these candles were five large festoons of flowers. The Communion table was placed in the usual place at the east end of the church, with steps ascending to it; either two or three steps, I am not quite sure which. It was covered with a cloth upon which were embossed six or eight figures of, I suppose, the apostles or some of the saints, I could hardly say which, being in the body of the church. On the Communion table were two super-altars, and on the table itself were two blocks of wood covered with some material, I do not know of what kind, but it looked like satin, and on these two blocks were two candles. There was a cross on one of the super-altars, and on the other one were, I think, four candles, with flowers between them.

3260-1. (Earl Stanhope.) Lighted candles?—The two candles which were lighted were the two on the blocks on the table, and there were two candles at the foot of the table, which were also lighted before the Communion service. At the back of the Communion table was a stone reredos, I think it is so called, and in the centre panel of that was a painted figure of our Lord, and some flowers round it. Over that were a few candles also over his head, and at the side of the reredos were also paintings of the twelve apostles. That was the ornamentation of the chancel, speaking in general terms, as accurately as I can remember it. The Communion service was commenced with the backs of the clergy to the people. There were three clergymen who ministered at the time. Their backs were turned to the people during the opening prayer and the collect. During the commandments, I think, one turned round to the people while the other two stood at the side of the table with their backs to the people, and then they had the sermon. I am not sure as to the exact time at which the sermon was preached, but after the sermon there was a procession formed from the vestry of the three ministers, who were dressed in heavily gold-laced "chasubles,"—I think that is the name they go by. They were headed by a person in a surplice with a large brass or gilt crucifix, not a cross, and with that they marched up to the Communion table. I may say that the garment of the centre clergyman had a large cross upon its back, and inside that cross was also embroidered a crucifix with the figures of St. John and Mary at the foot of it. The candles, of course, were lighted. In the consecration prayer the bread and wine were elevated as high as the eyebrows of the clergyman, and after that they fell down on their knees before it, bowing the head. I think those were the main features of the service.

3262. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) You seem to have visited many other churches; are there any peculiarities in other churches which you have noticed besides the one you have been describing?—There is one church at Brighton which I saw some time ago, but that was before I was at all in connection with this society; and there the peculiarity was that the whole Communion place had been turned into a kind of stage. The stage had been carried along I should think as high as the top of the former Communion table, and then, on that stage, the whole service was performed. I was only there at the evening service, but the great peculiarity there which I have referred to was that the clergyman preached from the stage instead of from the pulpit.

3263. (Dean of Lincoln.) Were there steps to it?—Yes.

3264. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) What is the name of the church?—I think it is St. James's church. It is in St. James's street, but I am not quite sure as to the name of the church. It was originally Mr. Maitland's chapel.

3265. (Bishop of London.) How many churches, do you suppose you have visited with the object you mention?—Perhaps 10 or 12 only, to observe them closely. Of course I have seen a great many in a more cursory way, but I have not observed them very closely.

3266. In how many was there a service similar to that which you have described at St. Michael's, Brighton?—I have seen hardly any quite similar to the church of St. Michael's. I think that is the most extreme.

3267. Can you point out any difference between St. Michael's and the other churches?—There is a difference in the vestments which are worn.

3268. What is that difference?—In some of the churches there are no vestments at all worn; in other churches, for instance, they have only the cross on the back.

3269. By "no vestments" do you mean nothing but the surplice?—Yes, and the usual hood and cassock.

3270. You have seen none that you know of exactly the same in appearance, or so advanced, as St. Michael's, Brighton?—I have not seen any quite so advanced as at St. Michael's, Brighton.

3271. Have you made a report to the society which employed you?—A report as to the particular church to which I have been referring, but not a general report.

3272. Was the church of St. Michael's full?—Yes.

3273. Were the people attentive?—On the whole, yes.

3274. As much as in another church?—Hardly so, in this respect, I should say, that they were equally attentive to the forms of the service, but there was a great deal more of inattention generally than I think you would see in an ordinary church.

3275. Did any other persons seem to have come on the same errand as yourself?—I am not aware of anybody else.

3276. Was any dissatisfaction expressed as you came out of the church by persons who were there?—No, I was not aware of any.

3277. You have not mentioned whether incense was used?—There was no incense used.

3278. Was the Holy Communion administered?—Yes.

3279. And incense was not used?—No.

3280. What was the number of communicants?—I should think almost half the congregation stayed to the Communion.

3281. Of course you yourself stayed?—Yes, but I did not partake.

3282. The rest of the congregation stayed to witness it?—About half.

3283. You said you had been employed in looking at these churches, and, as I understood, there were a great many in which ritual practices existed?—Yes.

3284-5. Of course ritual practices must to a certain extent exist in all places of worship; what, speaking roughly, do you mean by ritual practices?—I should say that such a departure from the accustomed usage, as the clergymen turning their backs to the people, was a ritual practice; and I should say that lighting the candles was a ritual practice.

3286. Unusual practices?—Unusual practices—practices which we are not accustomed to.

3287. (Sir R. J. Phillimore.) Did I understand you to say that you stayed during the Holy Communion and did not partake of it?—Yes.

3288. In what part of the church did you stay?—In one of the seats.

3289. Did you contribute to the offertory?—No, I did not.

3290. What was the amount of the offertory in this church?—I do not know.

3291. Were you not instructed to inquire what the amount of the offertory was by those who employed you?—No.

3292. Had not you a list of questions given you? What was the nature of your instructions?—They were perfectly general.

3293. Have you got them with you?—No, they were vivâ voce.

3294. From whom?—From the chairman of our association.

3295. Who is he?—Mr. Colquhoun.

3296. How many were they, do you remember?—I think in this case my instructions were vivâ voce from the vice chairman, Mr. Andrews.

3297. Do you remember how many there were?—They were to go and see what was done at those churches, and report.

3298. To go and see what was done at certain churches and report upon it, I suppose?—Do I understand you to refer to any particular churches, or to the general instructions?

3299. I want to know the general nature of the instructions given to you before you set out on this expedition?—They were inter alia to collect evidence generally as to the general feeling of the people, and to observe, as far as I was able, what was the extent of ritualism and the general feeling about it.

3300. Were you told what ritualism was; how did you know what was meant by the word "ritualism"?—People put such different constructions upon the word. We have had a gentleman examined here who thought all choral services were ritual. Do you consider a choral service to be ritual?—No.

3301. Your instructions were not given to you in writing?—No.

3302. Was a list of churches given to you for you to go to?—No.

T. T. Ford, Esq.,
8 July 1867.

T.T. Ford, Esq.
8 July 1867.

3303. Did you select them yourself?—Yes; almost by chance, in fact.

3304. I suppose you only went into particular churches; you did not go into any church where you did not think there were any particular practices?—Not for the purpose of observing. Of course I did not spend all my Sunday in those churches.

3305. Was it part of your commission to report upon cases in which there was a defect in obeying the directions of the Prayer Book?—The commission was so indefinite that I cannot say it was in those terms.

3306. Was it within the scope of your commission to go into churches and report where you had reason to think that the rubrics were neglected?—No.

3307. Did you report upon any case where the rubric was neglected?—Only this one to which I have referred.

3308. You have been speaking of cases in which you think there was a ritual excess. Were you appointed to go into any places where there was a ritual defect?—No.

3309. What was the date of your appointment?—It was early in the year.

3310. What year?—This year.

3311. Is it going on?—It has come to an end.

3312. Was your salary to be by the year, or by the six months, or by the number of churches that you visited, or what did it depend upon?—It was to be by the year; it was an indefinite arrangement, which I was willing to close at any time the association liked.

3313. Is it closed now?—It is to be closed now; it is not closed at this moment, but it will be closed.

3314. It is in process of being closed?—Yes.

3315. What is the society called?—It is a society called the "Church Association."

3316. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) You mentioned that you saw some paintings in St. Michael's church; can you tell us whether you thought any of them objectionable paintings?—There was one of the Virgin and Child, the Virgin having a halo round her head. I should think that was unusual.

3317. Where was that?—It was in the centre aisle, on the wall; a fresco painting over the archway in the aisle.

3318. Do you mean up above the arch?—Yes.

3319. It was not at the side of the arch, but at the top of the arch, right above?—At the top, I think. Of course, I am speaking from memory.

3320. Do you think you might have confused it with a banner hanging up?—No, I do not think I could have done so. There were banners also.

3321. Are you sure there was a picture there of the Virgin and Child?—I am as sure as my memory will serve me.

3322. Except that, which you are doubtful about, you did not see any objectionable picture?—I, of course, saw nothing objectionable, as a picture, at all.

3323. But you object to pictures, that is what you mean?—It is of course a question more or less of degree. I should not object to one picture, or to a picture per se, but I think if you saw a church studded with them you might have fair grounds for objection.

3324. You say "studded" with them; can you tell us about how many pictures there were in this church?—I make that reply of course only to your question as to how far I should think pictures objectionable.

3325. Will you answer my present question: About how many pictures did you notice in this church?—I think there were eight, four on each side of the middle aisle. There were three or four on each side in the same position as the one of the Virgin and Child to which I have referred. There was a painting over one of the doors in the left hand aisle, and I think there was a painting in the chancel, but there was a green veil over it, so that I could not see underneath it.

3326. I think what you have just said explains what you said before; you did not mean that these pictures were over the chancel arch but over the arches of the two sides of the church?—Yes.

3327. What was the form of the pictures to which you refer? Were they square or oval?—They were round, I think.

3328. Were they inserted in any architectural circle?—Yes; I think there was a cornice of plaster round them. They seemed inserted; or perhaps they were painted on the wall.

3329. A circle which was part of the fabric of the church?—Yes; I think so.

3330. Do you know what was the nature of these pictures? Were they mosaics, or what do you think they were?—I can hardly tell, but they looked like paintings, either on the wall or upon some material fastened on to the wall.

3331. You have said that you saw one picture with a green curtain over it, therefore you could not distinguish what the picture was?—I said I saw what I supposed to be a picture, not that I saw it; because, of course, I could not see it with a green curtain over it; but there was a picture on the east wall of the side aisle, which had a green curtain hanging over the top of it.

3332. Was it a large picture?—A small one, I think.

3333. Do you think you might have mistaken it for a boarding covered with a green cloth,—a large arch? I believe there is such a thing in that church. Do you think it might have been a boarding which filled up the arch?—I do not quite understand what you mean by a "boarding."

3334. Was the picture of which you speak in an arch at the side of the chancel?—It was over the doorway which leads into the vestry, I think.

3335. Near the doorway?—Yes.

3336. Did it look like a place which was intended, for example, for an organ? Was it large enough for that?—No, certainly not.

3337. I gather from what you say that you did not observe what it was, so that you cannot give us any definite statement about it?—I think I have given all the information I can give. It was a picture.

3338. You mentioned that over the reredos in the chancel there was suspended a figure of our Lord?—There was, a painted one.

3340. A painted figure, I suppose, would be a picture?—I think it is on the reredos.

3341. Was it carved?—No; painted.

3342. It was a painting?—Yes.

3343. Do you know what the subject of it was?—I think it was the Ascension of our Lord, as far as I could tell.

3344. You mentioned also, that by the sides of it there were figures of what you thought were the twelve apostles?—Yes.

3345. You did not examine them very carefully, perhaps; you were at a distance?—I did not examine them very carefully.

3346. The church you are speaking of is, as you told us, St. Michael's and all Angels?—I believe that is the name of the church; I was so informed.

3347. Do you think they might have been figures of angels and not of the apostles?—I cannot say what they might have been; I thought they were the apostles.

3348. In fact, you did not observe them sufficiently clearly to give a very positive answer?—I was in the body of the church, and of course could only see them generally. I did not afterwards go and examine them.

3349. It was a kind of examination which at all events was not very satisfactory for definite and positive evidence?—I should say that it was quite satisfactory for the evidence that I have to give, that there were twelve figures. As to what they were it might require some little care to look into them.

3350. You said you were not sure of the time at which the sermon was preached; are you able, on recollection, to say whether it was after the Nicene Creed or not?—I think it was, but I am not sure upon that subject.

3351. You said that then the clergy went out and there was a procession; are you quite sure about that?—I am not sure to this extent, whether the sermon was then, or whether the sermon was before the Communion service altogether; but after the sermon the procession was formed from the vestry.

3352. After the sermon the procession was formed?—That is my recollection of it.

3353. Not after the end of the morning prayer?—To the best of my recollection after the sermon.

3354. You said that after what you described as the elevation of the chalice they fell down on their knees; will you tell us who you meant by "they"?—I meant the three clergymen who were ministering.

3355. You are quite sure it was the three and not the celebrant only?—I believe it was the three.

3356. In what part of the church was the morning prayer said?—In the chancel.

3357. Not at the altar?—No.

3358. Near what part; near the screen of which you spoke?—In the stalls.

3359. You said you were authorized by the Church Association to collect evidence; for what purpose were you to collect evidence?—That I do not know exactly.

3360. Are you a member of the Association?—Yes.

3361. Are you on the council or committee of the Association?—I am on the council.

3362. Being on the council would you not be likely to know their course of proceeding?—Well, in newly formed societies, things are sometimes done with a good deal of carelessness, and I am not aware what was the exact object.

3363. You said that one reason for your collecting this evidence was to ascertain what was the feeling of people with regard to such practices?—Yes.

3364. Will you explain how you thought you could collect the feeling of people by going into a church and taking notes of what was done?—I did not expect to get at the feeling of people by that means.

3365. Have you taken any other means with regard to this particular church to ascertain the feeling of people?—Yes.

3366. Will you tell us what means you have taken?—I have talked a great deal to people who took an interest in the matter.

3367. Do you mean the members of the congregation?—Yes; I have met clergymen and I have met members of the congregations who have taken an interest in the matter.

3368. Members of the congregation of this church?—No.

3369. So that you cannot at all tell what is the feeling on the subject among the members of this congregation?—No.*

3370. Have you any positive information as to the feeling of the people in Brighton, who are not members of this congregation?—Brighton is a large place, and, of course, there would be those who would feel strongly upon one side and some upon the other side.

3371. My question was whether positively you know anything about it?—Do you mean as to the practice in that particular church?

3372. Yes?—No, I do not.

3373. You mentioned having made a report to the Association of what you had seen. Can you produce the report which you made with regard to this particular church?—I cannot do so at this moment.

3374. Can you put it in as evidence afterwards?—I have not got it here.

3375. What is to prevent you sending it to his Grace?—I have no objection to do that. I have no doubt the council would gladly send it to his Grace without any trouble, if his Grace were desirous to see it.

3376. Among your directions for taking evidence with regard to different churches, had you any directions as to taking drawings or photographs?—Yes, I had.

3377. Have you to any extent complied with that direction?—I have.

3378. (Mr. Cardwell.) You said you were directed to report on the general feeling; does that mean at Brighton particularly or throughout the country generally?—In the country generally.

3379. Have you obtained any information upon that subject?—Yes, I have of course obtained some information.

3380. Are you able to give the Commission any information which would show them the effect produced by the introduction of what are called the vestments in regard to increasing or diminishing the influence of the Church of England upon the parishioners?—I could give the evidence of conversations which I have had with various persons with regard to that, and I could give the general impression which I have formed in my own mind on the subject.

3381. Can you give any general result which would have the nature of a fact?—I do not quite understand the term "which would have the nature of a fact."

3382. Could you as a fact state to us, either in particular parishes or generally, the result of the introduction of vestments, as regards extending or diminishing the influence of the Church?—I could state the facts as to certain parishes. There was one parish which I visited at the beginning of this year, near Bridgewater, at a place called Northmoor Green, where there was a clergyman who indulged in these practices. I saw the churchwardens of that parish, and they told me that the population in that parish was about 800, of whom about 600 were attached to the Church of England. They told me that the attendance at that church was reduced to seven members; and I have since had a communication from them in which they offer to give evidence before this Commission that the attendance is reduced to one.

3383. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) With regard to the facts you have stated, do you know them of your own knowledge, or have you heard them from other persons?—I have said that I heard them from the churchwardens only. Of course I do not know them of my own knowledge.

3384. (Lord Portman.) Have you ever visited the church at Northmoor Green?—No.

3385. Are you aware of any peculiar circumstances connected with the services of the church at Northmoor Green, independent of the vestments?—You mean personally aware, not by hearsay?

3386. Personally aware of it?—No; I have already observed that I have no personal knowledge of anything at Northmoor Green; it is wholly upon the information to which I have referred.

3387. (Dr. Twiss.) You spoke of seeing two superaltars at Brighton; what did you mean by two superaltars?—A double ledge.

3388. Will you explain that?—A covered ledge with a covered ledge over that again—two tiers,—covered the same as the cloth of the Communion table. I am not prepared to say that there were not three. It is very difficult always to see exactly, with the flowers and candles.

3389. You spoke of certain lights being lighted at the entrance of the chancel, or elsewhere?—Yes.

3390. Where were those lights? Is there a screen, or a rood loft, or what?—I did not mean at the entrance of the chancel. I meant at the foot of the Communion table, one on each side and two on the Communion table; on those little slabs I have referred to.

3391. You spoke of certain lights being lighted round the head of the figure or painting of our Saviour?—They were not lighted on that occasion, but the cornice was marked with the smoke make.

T. T. Ford, Esq.

8 July 1867.

* Vide Appendix D.

T.T.Ford, Esq.
8 July 1867.

3392. I think you said candles, did you not?—Yes, candles also; over the head, half a dozen candles.

3393. Not lighted?—Not lighted.

3394. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) Were these two super-altars a part of the Lord's table?—As far as I could see they were placed on the Lord's table.

3395. You cannot answer whether they were part of its substance, or not?—No.

3396. (Dean of Ely.) How many candles were lighted at St. Michael and all Angels, Brighton, during the celebration of the Holy Communion?—Four.

3397. Four were lighted?—Yes.

3398. I think you said you had been employed upon your mission about six months?—During my spare time in six months. I have not been engaged wholly on this.

3399. In that time you have visited about 10 or 12 churches?—I should think so.

3400. Have those visits been on Sundays or on other days?—Sometimes one and sometimes the other.

3401. Out of those which you have visited, this church of St. Michael and all Angels, Brighton, is the most extreme in its ritualism?—Yes.

3402. Has your commission come to an end because you conceive that you have exhausted the churches which are likely to afford you any evidence upon this subject?—No.

3403. (Rev. W. G. Humphry.) Did you, in the discharge of your duty, inquire for ritualistic churches?—No, I heard of them incidentally.

3404. Do you consider that you have heard of all the ritualistic churches in England?—No.

3405. You have heard of some few?—Yes, and those I had time and opportunity to visit I visited.

3406. (Bishop of Gloucester.) You mentioned having visited 10 or 12 churches; you have also mentioned that you draw a distinction between ritualistic services and choral services; have you visited any churches in which there was simply a choral service without any vestments?—You mean with the specific object of observing? Of course, I have often attended churches which have had a choral service without vestments.

3409. Have the stoles been black or coloured?—In some black, and in one, at least, coloured; and in some embroidered with crosses.

3410. In those churches in which there were black stoles and a choral service, did you, with your own eyesight, observe anything that it is necessary for you to communicate to the Commission as to the effect produced on the worshippers by such a service?—I hardly see how I can answer that question, because it is not possible for me to speak to the effect on the worshippers.

3411. I will put the question in another and still simpler form. You have drawn a distinction, as I understand, between churches in which vestments are used, churches in which coloured stoles are used, and again churches in which black stoles and choral services are used; having drawn that distinction, you will no doubt have observed the general devotional aspects of the worshippers; if so, be pleased to state your observation?—I do not draw such a distinction in such a definite form as you have put it in, because you seem to find the use of vestments in various degrees. It would be impossible to divide or subdivide churches into three such definite classes without a most careful examination, far more than I have been able to give. I can only speak of individual churches as I have seen them. I am quite unable to divide them into three such definite classes as you have suggested.

3412. Therefore you would wish to modify the statement previously made to the Commission, that there was in your mind a difference between ritualistic churches and churches in which there were no vestments used—between choral service churches, to take your own words, and ritualistic churches?—I am not aware that I ever made any such statement in that form.

3413. (Earl Beauchamp.) I did not quite gather the precise ground on which you object to these ritualistic services. Is it on the ground of their illegality, or on the ground of their being hostile to devotion?—That would open a very large question indeed.

3415. Were the instructions which guided you in making these observations directed principally to the legality, or your own à priori sense of what divine service ought to be?—I should say as regards the instructions, as I have before stated, they were so general that they did not distinguish at all. No doubt, in my own mind, I looked at the services with a view both to see what I might think personally objectionable, and what I might think, as far as my little knowledge of law is concerned, were illegal.

3416. You mentioned pictures that you saw in the church of St. Michael's and all Angels, Brighton; have you seen pictures in other churches? Have you ever been in St. Peter's, Pimlico?—No, I have not.

3417. Or in St. George's, Hanover Square?—No. Of course I have seen a picture in a church. These things are questions of degree very largely.

3418. What were the principles which guided you in calling our attention to these pictures; the character of the pictures themselves, or of all pictures altogether?—It was to give a general impression of what the tout ensemble of the church was like.

3419. Then you would not object to a picture of Moses and Aaron?—I do not of course object to pictures in their right places.

3420. Do you consider the right and left hand sides of the Communion table to be objectionable places for pictures?—I think they would be, under existing circumstances, decidedly.

3421. You told us that at the church of St. Michael's there were four candles lighted. The four candles were not on the Lord's table, but two on the Lord's table and two in front; is that so?—Two were in two little candlesticks on the Lord's table and two were in front.

3422. I think you told us that incense is not used in St. Michael's?—It is not.

3423. Have you seen incense used anywhere?—Yes.

3424. At what period of the service?—I saw it used at St. Mary Magdalen's, in Munster Square, upon one occasion when I was there. It was in the Communion service, but I took no particular note then of the exact state of things.

3425. During the last six months in which you have devoted your leisure time to making these observations you have not come across any service where incense has been used?—Only that one in Munster Square.

3426. Was that within the last six months?—Yes, it was on Good Friday. I may say that my looking at churches has been altogether a subsidiary thing; I have not made that at all a primary object.

3427. (Bishop of Oxford.) You said you had visited several parts of the diocese of Oxford?—Yes.

3428. Will you tell the Commission the places and the churches you visited in that diocese?—Of such as I am prepared to give evidence upon, there were three churches in the town of Oxford itself, St. Philip's and St. James', I think is the name of one, and St. Thomas' is the name of another. There is also an iron church in Stockmore Street, on the Cowley Road, which I went to see.

3429. Were there any others in the diocese of Oxford?—I have been to see Bloxham Church.

3430. Any other?—A church at Mursley.

3431. Any others?—I think not.

3432. Did you attend a service at Mursley Church?—No.

3433. Did you attend a service at Bloxham Church?—As I passed through Bloxham I happened to go into the church and daily service was just concluding as I went in.

3434. Did you notice any peculiarities in its conduct?—I did not observe the service at all.

3435. You saw no peculiarities then?—Not in the service; it was so near the end of the service that I observed nothing.

3436. Have you attended service in any of the other three churches you have named?—Yes.

3437. In which of them?—I attended the Communion service in St. James and St. Philip's twice I think.

3438. Did you see whether the clergy had any dress on besides the surplices, the stole, coloured or uncoloured, and the academical hood?—They had not, as far as I am aware.

3439. Was there any incense used?—No.

3440. Was there anything that struck you as peculiar in the service that you yourself witnessed?—There was what I should have called an excessive ornamentation of the chancel. With reference to the service the peculiarity was that the backs of the clergy were turned to the people.

3441. Through the whole service or in part?—In part.

3442. At what part?—At the opening of the Communion service, the Lord's Prayer and the collect were said with the backs of the clergy to the people.

3443. It was in the Communion service?—Yes; almost all the prayers in the Communion service were said in that attitude.

3444. Were you rendered unable to hear the service by the clergy adopting that posture?—It was much more difficult to hear.

3445. I ask you whether you could hear?—In that case, I think, I heard. T.T. Ford, Esq.

3446. Was there any other peculiarity that struck you?—They lighted the candles both at the foot of the Communion table and the two candles on the ledge of the reredos at the back of the Communion table. 8 July 1867.

3447. At the time of or before the celebration; or when?—Before the celebration, continuing throughout the service.

3448. This was, of course, at morning service?—At the 8 o'clock service in the morning.

3449. Was the church at all dark?—Quite light. There is one point I should like to mention, that on the clergy entering the church and passing by the Communion table they bowed to it, and after partaking of the bread and wine, two of them made the sign of the cross on their bodies. That is one ritualistic observance which I should consider extreme.

3450. You saw that yourself?—I saw that myself.

3451. You were in front of them, then, when they so came in?—No.

3452. How did you see them if you were standing behind them?—It is not a difficult thing to see the hand pass in this way when you stand behind a person.

3453. Do you mean that if you stood behind a person you would be able to see, supposing he merely raised his hand so (describing by gesture), that he was making the sign of the cross on the other side of his body?—I have no doubt I could distinguish, if he were to do it in a pronounced way at all.

3454. Was there anything else in the service which you thought peculiar?—There were the unusual postures of the clergy; the taking up of positions at the various sides of the altar, and forming into three, and that kind of thing; but that was all. There was nothing further than that with regard to the service.

3455. You said you observed a very great ornamentation of the chancel. Will you state what that was?—I have a photograph of it here (the witness producing the same).

3456. I rather wanted you to state what you saw in the way of ornamentation?—There were two flags, a flag on each side of the chancel, as you entered; a banner with crosses.

3457. What day was this? Was it on a Sunday?—It was on Sunday May the 12th.

3458. Was it the feast of the dedication of the church, or anything particular?—No, I think it was the third Sunday after Easter.

3459. I only wanted to know whether there was any peculiar reason for the banners?—Not that I am aware of.

3460. Was there anything else in the ornamentation?—In the place of the commandments, where the commandments usually are, at the east end of the church, were two curtains or screens made of white material with scarlet stripes, and there were flowers at the side of the table. There were two candelabra on each side of the table. The candles themselves were highly decorated with gold and blue, and a variety of ornamental forms, but I think, perhaps, the photograph will give your lordship the best idea of it.

3461. Were the candles in these candelabra lighted?—No.

M.A.
11 July 1867.

3462. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) You have been summoned because it is believed you can adduce some facts which may tend to illustrate the effect of ritualistic practices. Can you state any facts—not opinions?—Of what character? It is a very wide question.

3463. Facts which tend to show the influence of ritualistic practices one way or another. Either facts which show that ritualistic practices do advance the interests of the Church in this country, or facts which show that they do not do so?—I can only answer your Grace's question by stating what appears to me the common sense view of the question. Since the time that the ritual practices now spoken of have been in abeyance, it appears to me that the service of the Holy Communion has been gradually going down hill, so that till within our own memory it has come to the point of being an occasional service instead of being the one central act of worship in the Church. A few years ago, within my own memory, when I went into the parish in which I now am, the Holy Communion was celebrated four times a year. It was celebrated in the meanest possible manner, though the year before I came some little improvement had been made. But in the whole neighbourhood in which I live, I can truly say that in every church into which I ever went at that period I saw nothing but the meanest furniture on the Lord's table; and in no church in the neighbourhood was the Holy Communion celebrated more than four times a year. From that time, as we all know, there has been a vast alteration. First of all, our minds were turned to the recovery of forgotten doctrines; they afterwards naturally were turned to the state of our churches. Our churches were then a disgrace to the Church and to the country. They were ruins for the most part, the chancels especially.

3464. This hardly applies to ritualistic practices?—I meant to say that I thought the restoration of our churches was bringing us back naturally, in a common sense point of view, to the recovery of these practices. I mean to say that after a doctrine was recovered, practices were recovered, our chancels were restored, as the rubric desired them to be, to the state in which they were in times past. Afterwards our choirs were restored. In many places the choristers were vested in surplices, thereby taking away the distinctive appearance of the clergyman at the Holy Communion, at which the practice of the universal Church has been that he should wear a distinct vestment. And I think that as we returned to ornamentation of the church, painted windows, colours on the walls, and so forth, the return to vestments was quite natural. We cannot be surprised at it. As I believe myself that the leaving off those vestments was the commencement of the degradation of the one central service of the Church to a mere occasional office, so I think that the restoration of the Holy Communion to its proper place, and the restoration of our churches, naturally bring us back to that which always has been the practice of the universal Church, a distinct vestment at the Holy Communion.

3465. Then you approve of the introduction of vestments?—Not universally. I have never introduced them myself.

3466. Do you think them essential?—Not essential; otherwise, I should use them.

3467. You think they are conducive altogether to the welfare of the church?—I think they are legal.

3468. That is another question?—I think they would be conducive to the Church's welfare. I am speaking, I may say, rather against my own personal inclinations. I have never been accustomed to them, but I do think that that which Bishop Wilson prayed for, and which Adam Clarke the Wesleyan distinctly regretted the loss of, must be conducive to edification, after the prejudice against it has passed away.

3469. What did Bishop Wilson pray for?—The restoration of the first service of Edward the Sixth. You will find it in his "Sacra Privata," [as follows (Works, vol. v., p. 72, Angl. Cath. Library):—

"Private devotions, taken out of the most ancient offices of the Church; to render our present communion service more agreeable to apostolic usage, and more acceptable (I hope) to God, and beneficial to all that partake thereof. Until it shall please Him to put it into the hearts and power of such as ought to do it, to restore to us the first service of Edward VI., or such as shall be more conformable to the appointment of Christ and His apostles and their successors. Which may the Divine Majesty vouchsafe to grant, for His sake who first ordained this Holy Sacrament. Amen."]

3470. And Adam Clarke also?—I cannot give you now the exact reference, but I will supply it. I made a note of it some time ago. [It is in his Commentary on Exodus xxviii. 2, as follows:—

"Should not the garments of all those who minister in holy things still be emblematical of the things in which they minister? Should they not be for glory and beauty expressive of the gospel ministry, and that beauty of holiness without which none can see the Lord? As the high priest's vestments under the law were emblematical of what was to come, should not the vestments of the ministers of the gospel bear some resemblance of what is come? Is, then, the dismal black, now worn by almost all kinds of priests and ministers, for glory and beauty? Is it emblematical of anything that is good, glorious, and excellent? How unbecoming the glad tidings announced by Christian ministers is a colour emblematical of nothing but mourning and woe, sin, desolation, and death! How inconsistent the habit and office of these men! Should it be said, 'These are only shadows, and are useless because the substance is come,' I ask, Why, then, is black almost universally worn? why is a particular colour preferred, if there be no signification in any? Is there not a danger that in our zeal against shadows we shall destroy or essentially change the substance thereof? Would not this sort of argumentation exclude water in baptism, and bread and wine in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper? The white surplice in the service of the Church is almost the only thing that remains of the ancient and becoming vestments which God commanded to be made for glory and beauty. Clothing emblematical of office is of more consequence than is generally imagined. Were the great officers of the crown and the officers of justice to clothe themselves like the common people, when they appear in their public capacity, both their persons and their decisions would be soon held in little estimation."—ADAM CLARKE, Comment. Exodus, xxviii. 2.]

3471. (Archbishop of Armagh.) I think I understand that you are in favour of the restoration of the eucharistic vestments, as they are called?—I should be sorry to answer "yes," if it implied that I meant an immediate use or an introduction of them till they should tend to the edification of the people by being acceptable. I think they are in abeyance. I am not learned in these historical matters, but my own impression is, that they have been in abeyance since the Advertisements of Queen Elizabeth which were expressive of the lay mind, and I think the consequences of that abeyance, as I have just stated, were bad. I think that as the lay mind is informed on the subject, and they become acceptable to the lay mind, they will be conducive to edification.

3472. Are you then in favour of their re-introduction as merely ornamental or as symbolizing some doctrine?—As the distinct vestment which has always been in use at the service of the Holy Communion. There has always been, I believe from the beginning, a distinct vestment for that particular service, distinguishing it, as I conceive, as the highest act of worship, the service of the Christian Church. I think it desirable to return to that; not immediately, but as the minds of men become familiarized with it, I believe if vestments were thus introduced, they would tend to edification.

3473. I do not exactly understand that as an answer to the question. Is it merely as a matter of ornament you would have them introduced, or would you have the eucharistic vestments restored as symbolizing doctrine?—It is rather difficult for me to give a direct answer to that question. I think the introduction of vestments would tend to the restoration of the service of the Holy Communion to its proper place in the Church of England. This, as I said before, had been degraded in our own memory to a mere occasional service. The Order for the Administration of the Holy Communion was printed in many of our Prayer Books in a smaller type than the order for the Morning and Evening Service. I think the re-introduction of these vestments would tend to place the Holy Communion in its proper position in the services of the Church.

3474. You are aware that many who have introduced them, perhaps all, have introduced them as sacrificial?—I am not aware of anything of the kind, nor would I in any way adopt the term. I call them the eucharistic vestments.

3475. Then it would be honoris causâ, not to shadow forth a sacrificing priest?—My best answer to that is, that I myself hold the doctrine of what is commonly called the eucharistic sacrifice in the same sense that Bishop Wilson held it, and in no other; in that sense in which our great divines have used it. I mention Bishop Wilson as being one of the most approved of our divines. In the sense in which he called it a "sacrifice" I call it so. I believe it to be a commemorative sacrifice, and also to be the communication of our Blessed Lord in a mysterious manner to ourselves; but when I speak of the vestments I wish not to go into definitions of doctrine, but to call it the one act of worship instituted by our Blessed Lord himself; and, therefore, whatever may be the doctrine, the highest act of worship that we possess.

the Holy Communion, priest and people plead, in the highest possible way, the sacrifice of our Blessed Lord once offered.

3477. (Earl Stanhope.) You have mentioned that you had seen the Holy Eucharist degraded into a mere occasional service; how often, speaking not of cathedrals but of parish churches, do you desire to see the celebration?—I celebrate every Sunday.

3478. And that is the system which you desire to see established?—Most indisputably.

3479. Do you approve of the use of crosses or crucifixes during the Communion?—I have a cross on a ledge. I have had it for many years.

3480. Is it a crucifix or a cross?—A cross.

3481. You mentioned the objections which you had seen prevailed in some cases to these practices. What is your experience as to the amount of those objections?—I merely know what I read in the newspapers. I learn from the newspapers that persons are prejudiced against them, as being taught to suppose they are necessarily connected with popery.

3482. My object was to elicit from you any observations you might have made yourself?—I live, not in the diocese of Salisbury but in the county of Wilts, and of course I cannot but see what passes in the county papers. We know there has been a little excitement, nothing to what one remembers in the surplice riots 30 years ago, but there has been a little excitement, though I do not believe the eucharistic vestments are used in that diocese. One has seen public meetings and things of that sort, in which I think the people have been taught to believe that they are necessarily connected with popery; I think therefore a good many are against them, and I think a good many would be for them.

3483. Have you known of many cases in which individuals or families have ceased to attend the parish church in consequence of those alterations?—I have known many instances in which persons have ceased to attend their parish church in consequence of practices in connexion with the Holy Communion. I know a very important place in which quiet members of the Church of England have for years abstained from communicating because the Holy Communion was administered to a railful at a time, and they had not the comfort of individually receiving it. I know instance after instance of that.

3484. On the other hand, have you known instances of persons being unwilling to attend the services in which the ritualistic practices were in full extent carried out?—I am very little away from my own parish and I have attended but once a service of this kind.

3485. Of your own knowledge you cannot give any information?—No.

3486. (Bishop of Oxford.) Did I understand you to say that you had any knowledge at all of a tendency to Roman Catholicism being caused by a more ornamented ritual in our churches?—No, I have no reason whatever for believing it. As I said before, I cannot think that that which Bishop Wilson would approve of could possibly be necessarily connected with popery.

3487. You mentioned just now in answer to Earl Stanhope one instance of offence caused by the administration of the Holy Communion to a rail of communicants; have you known offence caused by any other peculiar practice in the Holy Communion on the one side or on the other?—I have known very great distress of mind in many individuals at the great irreverence in the mode of celebration.

3488. Will you state what you mean by irreverence?—I mean apparent carelessness on the part of the clergyman,—a mean cloth; mean furniture—the vessels placed on the table by the clerk. I have even known this, the consecrated bread and wine left, not according to the rubric to be consumed by the clergy and communicants, but left to the clerk to be disposed of. I have known quiet persons deeply shocked by those practices.

Rev.
H. W. Bradon,
M.A.
11 July 1867.

3489. You were asked whether you yourself use vestments?—I do not use them.

3490. You were also asked whether you considered them enjoined in the strict letter of the law?—I think they are within the strict letter of the law, but that they have been for a very long time in abeyance.

3491. You therefore feel yourself at liberty to use your discretion upon that point?—I should not, as an individual, after so long an abeyance, like to take the responsibility of using vestments; certainly not, unless I was clearly satisfied in my own mind that the whole of my communicants wished it, but I am ready to do so immediately if my Bishop orders me.

3492. Would you consider that your Bishop's desire that you should not use them would be enough to deter you?—I should undoubtedly take his advice.

3493. Seeing that you do not yourself, in consequence of this abeyance, use them, you see no objection probably to altering the rubric which may be held by some persons to enjoin them?—I have a very great and decided objection to it.

3494. Will you state why?—I should distinctly say that I think my ministry would be very seriously affected; I think the alteration of that rubric would be a distinct disturbance of the settlement entered into in the year 1662; I think it would be a decided narrowing of the basis upon which that settlement was made; I think it would be an avowed attack upon doctrine held by the best English divines; and I know for a certainty that it would shock and distress the minds of many of the Church of England.

3495. When you say you know that do you mean to tell us that that is your opinion about it, or that such direct communications have been made to you that it is not an opinion but a matter of fact?—I have had direct communications made to me within the last month.

3496. (Earl Beauchamp.) What was it that you say Adam Clarke was so anxious for?—I found a note which I made in my own reading, and which of course I could verify, that he distinctly laments the loss of the vestments of the clergy. It is in his Commentaries upon Exodus; and he decidedly wished that they should be restored. (Vide Q. 3470.)

3497. At the service of the Holy Communion?—I cannot say whether he meant specially that, or ornamental vestments generally.

3498. He regretted the loss of the higher type of service?—Of the higher type of vestments.

3499. I believe you are a rural dean?—I am.

3500. How many years have you been so?—Not above three years.

3501. (Bishop of Gloucester.) You said that you approved of the vestments, or rather of the gradual introduction of vestments in certain places; what I wish to ask you is (what you have not, I think, quite fully answered), whether you consider that the vestments represent doctrine; or that they are used simply to add honour to the celebration of the Holy Communion; or that they are used as being sanctioned by good and ancient custom?—I think the two last, and not the first. I now understand the question as your lordship has put it so clearly. I approve of them honoris causâ. I cannot say that they are necessary to doctrine, for I do not use them myself. If I thought they were necessary to doctrine I should use them. If I were shipwrecked, and had no vestments at all, I should consider the Sacrament equally valid.

3502. You would consider the dignity and not the essence, if I may so say, of the Sacrament affected by the use of vestments?—Yes.

3503. (Mr. Hubbard.) As a rural dean you must be acquainted with the opinion of the clergy in your deanery; are you able to state that the opinion you have expressed is shared by them as to the point that an alteration of the rubric touching vestments would be a serious and painful shock to their consciences and feelings?—I have never discussed the subject in my rural deanery; I may say I have purposely avoided it.

3504. (Rev. W. G. Humphry.) Have you any church in your neighbourhood, or deanery, in which ritualistic vestments are used?—None.

3505. You have had no opportunity of knowing what would be the effect of such vestments upon the parishioners?—No.

3506. In your own mode of celebrating the Holy Communion, what is your position?—I stand in the centre of the altar.

3507. With your back to the people?—I object to that expression. I stand looking the same way that the people look.

3508. You face eastwards?—Yes, as directed by the Bishops at the last review.

3509. Have you lighted candles on the Communion table?—I have candles on a ledge, but they are not lighted during the celebration of the Holy Communion.

3510. Are they there for use in the evening?—They are there "for the signification that Christ is the very true light of the world;" and I use them in the evening whenever I go for any purpose to the Lord's table.

3511. For the purpose of giving light?—For the purpose of giving light. When the chancel is lighted they are lighted.

3512. Do you use incense?—No.

3513. What is the population of your parish?—Between 400 and 500.

3514. What is the name of it?—Latton, in the county of Wilts and the diocese of Gloucester and Bristol.

3515. What is the average number of communicants at your weekly communions?—The average number at the weekly Communions is about nine. My population is divided; I have a district church; at Latton church, the church of which I am now speaking (for the other has only occasional service), out of a population of 308, the number of communicants is 70, and they average about nine on each occasion, other than the great festivals.

3516. You have attributed the decline in the manner of celebrating the Holy Communion to the abeyance of vestments, caused by the injunctions or advertisements of Queen Elizabeth?—Yes.

3517. You consider that that document caused a decline in the mode of celebrating the Holy Communion?—Of course it did.

3518. Do you consider that the only cause? Do you attribute the slovenliness and disuse you speak of solely to these injunctions?—No; certainly not solely, but in part. All I meant to say was, that the taking away of the distinctive vestments from the Holy Communion tended to lower it.

3519. You have said that an alteration of the rubric or direction at the commencement of Morning Prayer would, in your opinion, be an undoing of the settlement of 1662; you used the expression "the settlement of 1662"?—Yes.

3520. May I ask you what you referred to when you used that expression?—I think it is the basis upon which the comprehensiveness of our Church is founded. With regard to the particular point in question, you are aware that the question was raised by the Puritans that this very rubric would bring back the use of the vestments. The Bishops in their reply considered the matter, and then referred them to their general answer on vestments. You will remember that the rubric was distinctly kept after objection was made, and after due consideration was given; it was deliberately adopted.

3521. What did the Puritans object to in 1662?—They particularly objected to that rubric remaining in the Prayer Book, on the ground that it would be the means of reintroducing the cope and the alb.

3522. (Dean of Ely.) With regard to the attendance of persons who do not intend to communicate, do they or do they not remain during the Communion?—No, they do not. In the case of persons about to become communicants I advise them to do so, but they do not otherwise stay.

3523. Except in special cases, where you have a special reason, you do not encourage persons to remain during the celebration who do not intend to communicate?—I have never encouraged it. I have an opinion on the subject, but I have never encouraged them to stay.

3524. You stated, I think, that there were no eucharistic vestments used in your rural deanery?—None.

3525. And no incense?—No incense.

3526. And no candles lighted during the Holy Communion?—No.

3527. (Sir J. Napier.) I suppose you do not hold the vestments to be essential?—Certainly not.

3528. (Earl of Harrowby.) I think you said you conceived that these garments had dropped out of use, and that the decay of reverence for the Lord's Supper had been the consequence?—Yes.

3529. You said, dropped out of use within our memory?—No; I said in consequence of the advertisements of Queen Elizabeth. What I said with regard to our memory was, that within our memory the Holy Communion was degraded almost to the position of an occasional service, so little was it thought of.

3530. When was the time that these garments began to drop out of use?—I presume in the reign of Elizabeth.

3531. When was the time that they flourished?—Up to that period universally; from the beginning there was in the Christian Church a distinct vestment for the Holy Communion.

3532. You mean from Edward VI. to Queen Elizabeth?—I include that period.

3533. For those few years?—During the last months of Edward VI.'s reign they may have been discontinued, but I should not like to draw any argument from the state of the Church in such a period of confusion as that.

3534. Ever since the time of Elizabeth and her advertisements only one usage has prevailed in the Church of England?—Yes, for the most part.

3535. Do you use cloths of different colours on the Communion table?—No, I do not vary them.

3536. Do you consider that the rubric in its present form gives permission, but that it is not compulsory?—I think it would be compulsory if the Ordinary enjoined it, but under the whole circumstances of the case I feel myself justified in not obeying it.

3537. I think you founded an argument on certain words being retained at the Savoy Conference. You are aware that after that objection was made by the Puritans the form of the rubric was altered?—Yes, so slightly that I do not attach the slightest importance to the alteration.

3538. The words "retained in use" were introduced?—Yes, I am perfectly aware there was a slight alteration.

3539. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) You have talked of a distinctive dress having gone out after the advertisements. You do not by that mean to contend that copes were not occasionally used in cathedrals and collegiate churches, and bishop's chapels?—No, I meant in parish churches.

3540. (Dean of Lincoln.) You have expressed yourself strongly opposed to any alteration of the rubrics. May I ask you, do you observe the rubric which requires that persons who intend to communicate should signify their intention of doing so?—I do not; my parish is so very small that I know the number of communicants. If a person appeared of whom I did not approve, I should immediately desire him to abstain, and if a person who had been a communicant misconducted himself I should immediately admonish him not to come without giving me notice. Practically I observe the rubric, but literally I do not.

3541. (Dr. Payne Smith.) You spoke of nine as the average number of your communicants; about how many have you on festivals; for instance, on Easter Sunday?—I should think 30. Before I had weekly Communion I had a great many more.

3542. You have found the number attending on the great festivals less since you had weekly Communion?—Yes. Some persons now come to the weekly Communion in preference to coming to the larger ones. At the great festivals, families are very much occupied, and it is found a very great convenience to communicate on the Sunday after Easter, or during Eastertide, instead of on Easter Sunday.

3543. Does the number of communicants on the whole increase?—Yes; slightly.

3544. Then it must have been very small before you established more frequent Communion?—I have already said that my communicants are 70, and I think that is a very great proportion out of 308. Before I established the practice, I should say that at the ordinary monthly Communion my average was about 20, and on the great festivals 35 to 40. Now I should say that the monthly Communion is not noticed, and there is a weekly average of about 9 or 10. At the great festivals, Easter, Whitsuntide, Christmas, and our Feast Sunday, they come to about 20 or 25, or perhaps more.

3545. I did not quite understand an answer you gave in reference to the position in which you stand when celebrating the Holy Communion?—I stand looking eastward.

3546. By what direction?—I object altogether to take to myself the opprobrious expression which has been used, of turning my back to the people. I look in the same direction that my people do; I look eastward.

3547. I understood you to say that you were directed by the Bishop?—I follow the directions of the Bishops in the last review. You will recollect that the Puritans objected to the rubric before the lesson, in which it is desired that the priest shall then turn and address the people, so that he shall be heard. The Puritans objected to that, and said, "Why he is always turning to the people." The Bishops said, "No, it is but right, that when he addresses the people, he should turn to them, and be heard by them; it is but right that when he is leading their prayers, he should turn from them."

3548. I simply wanted to know what Bishops you were referring to?—I was alluding to the Savoy Conference.

3549. You have twice given a very strong opinion that a distinct vestment has always been in use; have you considered that question much?—I believe it to be so, but I cannot say more than that; I have no doubt about it.

3550. You have not taken much trouble in forming that opinion?—I am not very learned in these matters.

3551. You have a strong opinion, but have taken little trouble in forming that opinion?—I have a strong opinion.

3552. (Mr. Cardwell.) You are guided in your interpretation of the rubric by usage, I think you say?—You mean the general rubric referring to ornaments?

3553. That which refers to vestments?—Yes.

3554. You would consider it a great responsibility to alter a practice which usage has sanctioned?—I should; unless I were quite certain that the whole of my communicants wished it, and then I should consider it a certain responsibility. I should not do it myself without consulting my Bishop.

3555. You consider the rubric part of the settlement of 1662 of which you spoke?—I do most distinctly.

3556. And you interpret that rubric by usage?—Yes. If you mean to say that I think the rubric has been observed, of course I do not think so. The rubric has not been observed. It has been from that time in abeyance.

3557. But as interpreted by usage, do you consider it part of the settlement of 1662?—No, certainly not;

I think the settlement was the retention of that rubric after it had been objected to by the Puritans.

3558. Suppose you were told that those who introduced the vestments introduced them as symbolizing doctrine, would that make any difference in your opinion as to the expediency of introducing them?—If the vestments themselves necessarily symbolized Roman doctrine, it would; if otherwise, not.

3559. It has been stated by Mr. Bennett, in a pamphlet which he has recently published, that the vestments are wanted not for themselves, but for the doctrines which lie hidden under them. And then the doctrine is said to be threefold; first, "the real objective presence of our Blessed Lord; secondly, the sacrifice offered by the priest; and thirdly, the adoration due to the presence of our Blessed Lord in the Holy Eucharist." I would ask you whether it is for those purposes that you wish the vestments?—I must decline answering a question which in any way puts into my mouth the words of any person. I am quite prepared to state the doctrines I hold, if I am asked; but I will not be bound by the statement of another person, or give any answer founded upon it.

3560. The object I wish to attain is, whether in your opinion the introduction of vestments introduced for a purpose like that would, in your parish, or within the limits of your knowledge, have a beneficial effect or the contrary upon the people for whom the services are intended?—I am quite prepared to answer you as to the doctrines I preach in my own pulpit, and I am quite prepared to say whether I think the introduction of vestments would tend to inculcate those doctrines or not; but I will not take the words of another person whoever he be. I will take the language of the Church of England, if you please.

3561. I do not wish to know the doctrines that you hold. What I want to know is whether, if those who introduced the vestments avowedly introduced them for those purposes, it would still, in your judgment, be beneficial to introduce them in the part of the country with which you are connected?—I do not, as I said before, wish to introduce them until the minds of persons really approve of them. If any one wishes to introduce them for the purpose of introducing erroneous doctrine, I do not approve of that. I approve of them if they are intended to symbolize doctrine held by the Church of England.

3562. You are not prepared to say what the feeling of your parishioners, or the people in your neighbourhood, would be on the subject?—I think, as far as I know the feelings of my own parishioners, they have perfect confidence in me. I think there is a sort of feeling against popery; but I am quite certain there is no feeling against what I believe to be the sound doctrine of the Church of England.

3563. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) Will you be kind enough to say whether you know of any cases of persons having been kept from joining the Church of Rome by attending churches where vestments are used, or where other so-called ritual practices are adopted?—I could not of my own knowledge.

3564. Do you at all rest your conviction, that the vestments are legal upon the decision of the Privy Council in 1857?—Not in the least.

3565. Do you have a celebration of the Holy Communion on Ascension Day?—Always.

3566. How many communicants are there then?—About the same number,—nine.

3567. (Dean of Westminster.) You spoke of the great distress that might be occasioned by the disturbance of the settlement of 1662; do you think distress would be occasioned if the present Prayer Book were altogether withdrawn and the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. restored?—I think it would cause distress to a great many minds in the other direction, and I do not wish it.

3568. You spoke of the "lay mind" in the Church having been expressed in the injunctions of Queen Elizabeth; are you aware of any canon of the clergy having been passed on the subject of the vestments in the reign of James I.?—Yes.

3569. Do you mean injunctions or advertisements?—Advertisements.

3570. (Bishop of London.) You stated the number of communicants every Sunday; are they the same persons, or different people?—Different people. Some one or two, or three, may be the same.

3571. What is the whole number?—Nine, ten, or eleven; it does sometimes come up to fifteen.

3572. Three or four fresh ones communicate every Sunday?—Yes.

3573. You stated, I think, that the use of the surplice by choirs had made the vestments more necessary for fear the clergyman should be mistaken for a chorister?—I think it makes the distinctive dress more desirable.

3574. That might be avoided by not wearing the surplice in the choir, might it not?—Certainly it might. That is a question of decency.

3575. I understand that there are various things which are commonly called ritualistic practices which you do not observe; may I ask whether there is any adoration of the sacred elements in your church?—I do not know what is in the minds of other people.

3576. You are aware that there is in other churches?—Do you mean what is commonly called genuflection.

3577. No, I mean prostration?—There is nothing of the kind.

3578. You do not wear a biretta?—Something like a cap?

3579. Such as a Roman Catholic priest wears?—No; I wear a college cap.

3580. Of course not at the administration of the Holy Communion?—No; I have been very much shocked by seeing a Bishop put his cap on the Holy table; not the present Bishop.

3581. Do you wear a surplice of the ordinary length?—I do not know what is the ordinary length.

3582. Does your cassock show below?—Yes; I think it much more decent than showing the legs.

3583. Do you use flowers in your church?—No; except at the great festivals.

3584. Have you flower pots on the Communion table?—No.

3585. In point of fact, am I right in concluding that yours is not a ritualistic service?—It is not what is commonly called so. I dare say some of my brethren would call it so.

3586. It is not what is called a ritualistic service?—No.

3587. And yet, of course, there is a great deal of devotion?—I hope so.

3588. In fact, the Lord's Supper is administered in a way that has raised the celebration of the Lord's Supper to its proper place?—I hope it is tending to do so.

3589. Does it occur to you therefore that you have attained by a common Church of England service that which you think the ritualistic service is productive of?—No. I think if vestments were universally adopted, by the universal consent of the lay mind, they would be a greater help than the service which I have.

3590. I understood you to say that ever since the vestments had been dropped, which I presume is the time of Edward VI., we have been going downhill, as we may call it, in the understanding and appreciation of the Lord's Supper?—Yes.

3591. Does it occur to you that it is possible to go too far in the other direction?—I would rather go too far than too short.

3592. You would rather hold the doctrine of transubstantiation, for example?—No, I cannot conceive anything which would make me hold that.

3593. Then you do not think it desirable to go beyond a moderate limit in the respect paid to the elements?—I think the utmost reverence is due to the whole service.

3594. But it is possible, of course, to go into the doctrine of transubstantiation?—That is not a question of reverence, I think. I should hope that the reverence which I pay at the Holy Communion is quite as high as any Roman Catholic priest pays; but that is another question altogether.

3595. Your statement is that ever since the dropping of vestments we have been going down too much?—Yes.

3596. It might be maintained, and I should like to know whether you consider it a good argument, that by adopting these vestments we may go too much in the other direction, and arrive at the doctrine of transubstantiation?—I have no fear whatever of that.

3597. Do you not think it possible?—Possible; but I do not think it at all likely from what I see going on about me.

3598. No person with whom you are acquainted has adopted the doctrine of transubstantiation?—No.

3599. You do not know any Roman Catholics?—Yes, I know Roman Catholics, but I do not know any member of the Church of England who holds anything like the doctrine of transubstantiation.

3600. But persons may leave the Church of England in consequence of holding it?—I know some few who left the Church of England some years ago, but I do not know why they left it.

3601. Supposing it were held that there is a danger of that kind, and that you might teach a doctrine by the vestments which would lead to transubstantiation, would it be your opinion that it would be right to check the vestments?—I do not think that possible. I do not think that that which Bishop Wilson prayed for could possibly lead to it.

3602. Then you believe in the infallibility of Bishop Wilson?—I believe in the infallibility of no man, but I respect his opinion as much as that of any man.

3603. You do not approve of everything he did?—I am not, as I said before, learned in these matters. Bishop Cosin was a favourer of vestments, and I may add that he wrote against transubstantiation.

3604. If, therefore, it were necessary to restrain these things, what authority should you refer to do it, having the power of restraining them?—The law, if it is against the law.

3605. Do you mean an Act of Parliament?—No, the law as it stands. If those things are against the law let them be stopped by law.

3606. What do you mean by "the law"?—Of course our whole Prayer Book, which is part of the Act of

The witness withdrew.

Mr. CHRISTIAN CLARK SPILLER called in and examined.

3613. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) You are, I believe, churchwarden at St. Alban's, Holborn?—Yes.

3614. By whom were you appointed?—By the people, on Easter Monday.

3615. I do not think it is necessary to go through all the details of ritual which are practised at that church, for they are pretty well known; but I will ask you what is your impression as to the influence of those practices. Can you mention any facts which show the good or the evil influence of these ritualistic practices at St. Alban's?—I should wish to point out the increased number of communicants from year to year. Last Easter Sunday we had 515 communicants, I believe that all those who attend the church regularly are communicants.

3616. How long have you been resident in the district?—I was born in it.

3617. You have been resident in it ever since the church was built?—Yes.

3618. Have you attended the church ever since it has been built?—Yes. I joined the movement originally in a little room where something like 15 or 18 people assembled, till the Bishop of London consecrated the church; and I have been connected with it ever since. I have been to pretty nearly every service.

3619. Have you seen a great increase in the congregation since the church has been opened?—A wonderful increase from year to year.

Uniformity, obedience to which can be enforced by a court of law. If any of these practices are illegal I for one have no objection whatever to their being prohibited by a court of law.

3607. I think you misapprehend my question, which is this:—supposing it be held that these practices lead to romanizing, and that it is necessary to restrain them, have you any opinion as to how they ought to be restrained, by what authority?—If you wish me to answer the question, I will give you my individual opinion. I think if the compact of the Church of England is to be violated, if its basis is to be narrowed, if we are not to be the comprehensive Church that we have hitherto been, I would prefer it to be done by an Act of Parliament rather than by any act of the Church. They would then take the responsibility.

3608. You would wish Convocation to be consulted?—I would wish Convocation to be consulted. I believe it to be constitutional to do so. I should prefer it being an act of the State to an act of the Church. I wish our present comprehensiveness to remain untouched. I wish toleration for all.

3609. You do not think it necessary to wait for a general council?—No.

3610. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) You have said that throughout all the prayers you face eastward; do you read all the prayers so?—Every one. I have done so for 28 years.

3611. Have you known any instance of that giving offence?—It has never given the slightest offence to any individual; quite the contrary. When I came there first the reading desk faced the people. Nothing could exceed the carelessness and irreverence that I saw every Sunday; lolling in every direction, sitting up and apparently listening to the prayers, and so on. Ever since I have adopted the practice I mention, I have been told, and believe, that kneeling is almost universal. Several members of my congregation have said to me "Now, sir, I quite understand what you mean, that you are leading our devotions, and we 'by Amen' are joining in them. We never did so before."

3612. (Earl of Harrowby.) Is your voice audible to the whole congregation when you turn your back to them?—Perfectly. I have ascertained it over and over again.

Mr.
C. C. Spiller.

3620. The number of communicants has increased?—Yes. I have sent in copies of my pamphlet, entitled "Four Years' Experience at St. Alban's," and if you read that, I am sure you will get a great deal more out of it than from me now. I have brought a few copies with me; I wrote it deliberately, and it is the truth and nothing but the truth. This is it: it is a letter which I wrote to the Editor of the Literary Churchman.

FOUR YEARS' EXPERIENCE AT ST. ALBAN'S, HOLBORN.—By One of the Churchwardens.—Sir, It has been suggested to me that some account of my four years' experience of the work in the new district of St. Alban's may be of service at the present time, when misstatements and prejudices are so rife. I therefore venture on the following letter; in the hope that a plain statement of facts may disarm much opposition, and prove to Churchmen generally that there is a great work going on there, with the evident blessing of Almighty God. I will first endeavour to give a description of this new district, formed out of the parish of St. Andrew, Holborn. It is bounded on the east by Leather Lane, on the west by Gray's Inn Lane, on the south by Holborn, and on the north by Liquorpond Street. I have known it for more than thirty years, and have known it only as full of the very poorest class; and, what is worse, a rallying point for thieves and prostitutes. The only work which to my knowledge went on there was a large school in Baldwin's Gardens, and occasionally some preaching. The district abounds in lanes and alleys, full of lodging-houses, where every room is promiscuously occupied by male and female, young and old; eating, drinking, and sleeping together, in places so filthy that a farmer would think them unfit for his pigs. The greater portion of the inhabitants consists of vendors of fish and vegetables, very poor shopkeepers, plenty of our Irish brethren, and numbers of Italians and foreigners. The streets are thronged every day; but on a Sunday morning they are a perfect fair. In winter they are obnoxious to the sight and smell; and in summer the hot sun renders the air perfectly unendurable. This description, which would apply equally well to many other wretched spots in London and in all our large towns, is by no means exaggerated, and it would be well if those who—while living at home at ease, and smelling the sweetly perfumed air of the country—criticise severely the shortcomings of their brethren, were to take duty for a month in some of these wretched districts; they would return home "sadder but wiser men." The sin-degraded man, the half-starved woman, the diseased and scantily-clothed child, form a picture of squalor and misery which it is to be hoped few could contemplate without deep pain and commiseration.

Mr.

The incumbent, the Rev. A. H. Mackonochie, was appointed in 1862, and when I think of the small beginning upon which the clergy had to work, I can compare the progress of the church to nothing less than the growth of the grain of mustard seed.

About a score of us met at first for worship in a small room in Baldwin's Gardens, at the corner house on the right hand as you enter the gates; and that being afterwards required for another purpose, we removed to a front room on the basement floor, underneath a printing office, in Greville Street.

At length the day came for the church to be consecrated by the Bishop of London (February 21st, 1863). Much there was to be done, and well done it was by Christ's volunteers; and none who knew the devoted priests of St. Alban's will doubt that their best efforts were used to make the ceremonial as beautiful and impressive as possible. On this occasion the munificent founder handed over his loving gift to God and His Church. The inscription over the two entrances will fully illustrate his intentions. Over the north door is written, "Free for ever to Christ's poor, this church is built and endowed, in thankful acknowledgment of His mercies, by a humble steward of God's bounty." And over the south door, "To the glory of God, and in memory of St. Alban the Martyr, upon a site given by Wm. Henry, second Baron Leigh, this church is erected by a Merchant of London."

There were sermons daily during the octave, and never to be forgotten by me was the sight of all the ragged, shoeless children—stunted blossoms of humanity, with heads uncombed, and faces thoroughly dyed with dirt—who thronged to see their beautiful new church. They presented a touching contrast, indeed, to those who had been privileged participators in the opening services—a contrast exhibiting all the difference between the occupants of the west-end drawing-room and these their fellow-mortals, redeemed by the same Blessed Saviour, and looked upon as equally His children by their Heavenly Father.

But now the work was to be begun in earnest; and so much, not from neglect, but from the great size of the old parish, was there to be done, that nothing but the firmest faith could ever hope to bring order out of such a chaos. Nevertheless, earnest and loving hearts had resolved to do their best.

For two years after the church had been consecrated we could not get any premises suitable for the schools; and schools should be the stepping-stones to the church. We therefore had to hire rooms in some of the neighbouring courts. At last the lease of a building adjoining the church was to be sold for 1,500*l.*, including law costs, &c., and we were perplexed as to how so large a sum of money was to be raised, in addition to the offertory; but our kind friends took the matter up with earnestness, and in the course of two years it was all paid off. The premises are ill adapted for schools, but we indulge the hope that the noble landlord, who has already been so generous to us, will extend the term of years, and that the necessary funds will be forthcoming to substantially repair and adapt them for the purpose. I may also add, that they are used for the meetings of the various associations connected with the church. We are not likely to get a grant from any society, and as the neighbourhood cannot do much, we must rely solely on the liberality of the congregation.

I will now give a few statistics of the numbers of communicants, baptisms, and school children. The number of baptisms during the four years the church has been consecrated is 1,200.

The number of celebrations of Holy Communion in 1863 was 74 early, with 279 communicants, and the number of late services was 36, with 928 communicants. In 1864, 304 early celebrations with 2,697 communicants, and 78 late celebrations with 2,300 communicants. Total communicants in 1863, 1,207, and in 1864, 4,997.

I give the two last years, 1865 and 1866, a little more elaborately, as it may be interesting to my readers to know the relative proportions on the Sundays and festivals:—

This is independent of gifts sent privately, of money subscribed for decorations, of treats to the poor, and also of the payment for the school premises. And here I would mention too that there are no church-rates, tithes, or Easter offerings; and that, in fact, the parish as a parish pays absolutely nil.

Every dispassionate and unprejudiced mind, I trust, will agree with me, that such evidence as this is eminently satisfactory. By looking at these statistics the reader will perceive the number that attend at the early celebrations. It is very gratifying to see about 70 people (the average number) receiving the Holy Communion on a Sunday morning, at the eight o'clock service, when all is so hushed and awe-inspiring that you instinctively feel that God is with you of a truth.

The average number of communicants on Sunday is between two and three hundred. Compare this with the small number who remain in many of our large parish churches—for this, the chief act of the Church's worship. I believe that nearly all the regular members of the congregation are communicants.

It will be perceived that the number of baptisms amounts to 1,200. It is a sad but yet hopeful sight on Tuesday evening, after the Second Lesson, to see the poor children (who may almost be said to be picked out of the kennel), now with clean faces and dress, brought to the font to receive the holy rite of baptism, in the presence and with the prayers of the whole congregation. I remember once 40 of these poor children, of all ages, from the infant to the grown-up boy and girl, baptized on one night. Ah! my good Christian reader, there are thousands of these neglected ones in all our large towns whom the National Church has omitted to seek out and teach the Christian verities! They are quite as much heathens as the more favoured savage ten thousand miles off; but we suppose that to some of our philanthropists "distance lends enchantment to the view;" and yet this text is in the Holy Bible—"They made me keeper of the vineyards, but mine own vineyard have I not kept."

The number of children attending our schools is about 400.

I do not think it necessary or within my province to speak of the plans adopted for working the parish thoroughly. In fact, I only aim at giving an external view of the work going on. It has been said of ritualism that it is only the young and enthusiastic who are impressed, but amongst the congregation are numbers of aged people, fathers and mothers of families, and numbers of young men who are attending to their legal and medical studies in London; and surely it is very desirable to get such persons to become habitual communicants in this great city of temptation? Over and over again have parents expressed their very great acknowledgments for the great mercies their children have received by attending at the St. Alban's services. As for the illiberal remarks made about "man-millinery," it is very evident that persons who really believe in such remarks have not risen up to the height of the great argument. These externals are the representatives of interior verities. The man of the world knows how necessary externals are in worldly things, and yet he affects to deny their place or usefulness in Divine things. Some few persons, perhaps, may use the man-millinery argument sincerely, but it is not so with the many. The hatred of ritual is real, because ritualism really advances true religion. People like to be thought religious, whether they are so or not, and the kind of religion which ritualism is associated with is of a very practical kind, and gives a great deal more trouble than that which boasts it is so spiritual as to have no connexion with anything outward and visible. The Bible shows clearly enough how the Divine Author of human nature has desired things external to be used in the cause of religion; and, although Christ's Gospel of Grace has indeed superseded the old law of "an eye for an eye," we have no reason to suppose that it has suspended the laws of man's moral nature, made habit less important in forming character, made external things less capable of conveying inward truths, or made man less open to the influences of the forms under which he approaches his Father in Heaven.

This, at least, will be admitted on all hands, that the ritualist clergy only use their ritual as a means to increase and deepen spiritual religion. Men of great piety themselves, they act only from the most sincere convictions. Look at the amount of their stipends,—are they not a very mockery of remuneration? Would not mere food and clothing in many cases be beyond their reach, were they not devoting private fortune, as well as ease, time, comfort, and all that they have, to the hardest service the Church has for her sons to undergo? And this, too, without either hope or prospect of advancement in the future? Surely nothing but deep convictions, and a deep earnestness and truthfulness of character, could sustain them in this. So then, when people talk about the ritualists deserting the teaching of the Church of England, it might be well for them to ask, may not the ritualists be right? The ritualists believe that they teach none other doctrine than that of the Reformed Church of England, than that of Holy Scripture, than that of the English Prayer Book. They see that no persecution arises when men consistently break through these obligations, both of Scripture and the Church. A Broad Churchman may neglect or explain away the teaching of the Bible; a Low Churchman may set at nought the plain words of the Prayer Book, and the world never thinks of rising up in indignation. But it gets very angry, and is afflicted with a sudden zeal for both Prayer Book and Bible, directly the ritualist makes the very natural demand for equal toleration to obey the law of the Church.

With regard to the assertions made of its leading to Rome, however that may have been, through persecution, in former years (and in all great movements some will topple over), I can only say, that I have not heard of one regular communicant who has gone over; but I have heard of many who had been prevented so doing, and I have heard of others who had gone over, but who rejoined the English Church, brought back again by St. Alban's services.

Here would I ask, is it agreeable to our Blessed Lord's teaching that we should ever be at variance with our fellow Christians, by this ceaseless cry of "No peace with Rome?" Ah! if we had more love for one another, and less hatred for those who differ from us as conscientiously as we do from them, we should glorify the Gospel of the Common Redeemer more than we do. In vain do we implore the outpouring of the Holy Ghost for the evangelizing of the world, when the spiritual officers of His Church are so bitter against one another. Look at the sad and humiliating diagrams of the religions of the world. What do we find, after nearly 2,000 years, but that three-fourths of the human race are enemies to God and his Christ!

Again, we have short and frequent services—three celebrations of Holy Communion on a Sunday morning—to accommodate those who can ill spare two hours in the middle of the day. This, we suppose, is an innovation; and so are the keeping of the Church's festivals. Our last harvest festival is another innovation; and yet, though held on a week-day, all the services were thronged, and we had the pleasure of handing-over to the Farringdon Dispensary nearly 50*l.* collected at the offertory. Clergymen have often expressed surprise at the solemn and beautiful service of the mid-day choral celebration of Holy Communion, and they had no idea that the English office could be made so effective; and yet there are very few town parishes where they could not carry out a choral service. Surely twelve boys and six men could be found by every earnest rector or incumbent. Our choirmen are engaged during the day in city offices and warehouses; they kindly volunteer, and we dare venture to say that God will remember their labour of love to Him in that day. How desirable, too, to get the young to be interested in the Church's services, and not to be so isolated from their clergy as under the parson-and-clerk system. It would engage them in many an idle hour, and keep them from many temptations; but most of all, it would break down that barrier now existing between the clergy and people.

Another most valuable feature is, that the church is open all day. We all know how the poor are huddled together in these districts, and how desirable it is to offer them the opportunity of coming when they like. It is very seldom that the church is entirely empty. Who is there that cannot appreciate the value of being alone at times, to collect his thoughts, and think of his immortal prospects? Then, how much more do the poor need somewhere to go to say their prayers, living as they do in one room, and surrounded as they are by noisy children?

The clergy, too, have told me of many disappointments they have had in seeing those who had been impressed with the truth leaving the neighbourhood, as they could not now live amidst what they have now learnt to shrink from as the depravity with which it abounds.

Another feature I should like to mention as eminently suggestive is the inviting the poor to bring the bodies of their departed ones, and have the last solemn office of the Church read over their remains previous to being taken to the cemetery. I believe there is an additional charge at the cemetery for reading the service in the cemetery chapel, and on that account, I fear, it is very often omitted. I have been deeply impressed myself at these services, and I would humbly venture to say that where they are neglected a very advantageous time for making a godly impression is lost. When can there be a more suitable time for stirring up the mind to the things of eternity than in affliction? The poor feel all these little attentions of the clergy, and are pleased to think they receive them the same as "their betters." What a theme to dwell upon is the sympathy of Christ! It is His loving sympathy to all, but more especially to those who are neglected by the world, which tells so much with those who are full of trouble and heavy laden.

Strangers have been struck with the earnestness and heartiness of the services; and I know those who came, instigated by others, to scoff and ridicule, who have been silently rebuked by their consciences when they saw the congregation so earnest and devout; and such persons have gone away convinced that that vast congregation kneeling at the time of Holy Communion was a witness to a real inward work done in their secret hearts. Speaking from my own knowledge, I may say that I have very often been impressed with the heartiness of the congregational responses and singing, and have wished that many who write and speak so bitterly were present to witness it; and the thought has struck me, that if they had hearts glowing with love to God, they would rejoice in hearing His praises sung so heartily.

Perilous times seem coming on. The lowest strata of society are feeling the pressure of poverty more and more. Who are doing the most to bring religion home to these people? Surely it is the ritualists, as they are called. It is very hard, we know, to impress upon these poor people that Christ is a loving Saviour, and that God is merciful to all who call upon Him. But when they see men and women really doing all they can to weep with those who weep, and to help and assist them as far as lies in their power, they are induced to listen to the teaching of Holy Writ. I know that everything is done to help and assist the poor in their temporal as well as spiritual wants by loving and devoted hearts, who do it for Christ's sake; and I cannot refrain from mentioning the kind consideration of the clergy and the people during this winter. The day before Christmas Day about sixty families were supplied with beef and plum-pudding for the morrow. On New Year's Eve nearly 400 poor children were treated with tea and cake, entertained with a magic lantern, and sent home with presents from a Christmas tree, contributed by the congregation. Another evening, about 250 poor men and women, parents of the children and poor communicants, were regaled with a supper; and on the second Sunday after the Epiphany, when the weather was so severe, I put a short notice on the seats, asking for an especial collection on behalf of the poor, and at mid-day celebration and at evening prayer the offertory amounted to nearly 50*l.* Those who were absent from illness and the inclemency of the weather sent their contributions during the week, and the gross amount came to 80*l.* All this was quietly done.

In conclusion, I would ask—is this and like work to be stigmatized as dishonest by those who are ignorant of its real teaching? Every test that can be applied, such as communion, reverence, devotion, and almsgiving, teaches us that these congregations are moved to do all this for the love of Christ, and to glorify their Father who is in Heaven. Ought they then to suffer persecution because they think that the services should be carried out as they used to be in the best days of the Anglican Church? The people love their clergy because they know their self-denial and devotedness, and the anti-ritualistic speeches are simply laughed at. All the remarks about confession and priestly power, as it is called, are simply absurd in their estimation, just as if they had not a grain of common sense, and did not know what they were doing. I can truly say, that I know men of intellect and fathers and mothers of families, who were once as bitter against it as they are now earnest for it. It is voluntary on their part; and they know very well that the clergy subject themselves to the same discipline; and it is a very poor and low aspect for the platform clergy to take, that their fellow-ministers are not pure-minded, but delight in hearing continually (which is against all moral experience) the lapses of sin and the struggles against the world, the flesh, and the devil. A clergyman once said to me, that if the clergy knew more of the hidden sins of their people they would preach much more effectively. I now reiterate once more my sincere conviction that this movement is of God, that the men are too earnest, sincere, and self-denying for that to be doubted. Instead, therefore, of treating it with contempt and abuse, I think it is the wisest thing for all to take Gamaliel's advice, "Refrain from these men and let them alone: for if this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to nought: but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it; lest haply ye be found even to fight against God," for His ways are not our ways, nor His thoughts our thoughts.

C. C. SPILLER,

London, May 1867.

Parishioners' Churchwarden.

P.S.—The offertory for the fourth year ending last Easter Day is over 2,000*l.*, and the number of communicants on Easter Day was 515.

3621. Are the communicants inhabitants of the district?—No, they are persons who come from a distance as well as from the district.

3622. What is the proportion?—The fact is this, —if the services of the church were not carried on in the way they are, we should not have six communicants on a Sunday. I have watched St. Andrew's, Holborn, the parish church, from my house, which was opposite, and I have noticed that there were not above a dozen communicants in a month; I have counted them on several occasions. I never in my life saw a more devoted congregation than that of St. Alban's. That is my experience of it. When I joined it I had not anything to do with ritualism or anything of the kind, but everything I have seen there has forced this upon me, that if you want to get the lower class you must have some such services as these. That is my opinion now, and against all my former opinions in every way. Personally I do not care anything about ritual one way or other; but I see that the people consider it an exponent of doctrine, and there is no mistake about the earnestness of their feeling in the matter. I defy anyone to go to that church without seeing that it is one of the most living churches that anybody can go to. Day after day have I attended there and seen earnest and sincere people give their money. Last year there was 2,185*l.* given, and whether they gave a sovereign or a farthing nobody knew; I went round with the bags, and collected that amount last year. The fact is the clergy are always hard at work, morning, noon, and night: the people see they are in earnest and they help them. That is really, I believe, the secret of success.

3623. You have set all this forth in your pamphlet?—Yes. I was not a high churchman before I joined. I joined it as a moderate man, but all these things have been forced upon me. Over and over again clergymen of great eminence have said to me, "If you want to stir up the lowest classes you must have this kind of services."

3624. Do the poor attend the church in the morning or in the evening?—They come to the earlier services; we do not get them at 11 o'clock, or to such high services; we then get mostly people from a distance; but the poor come to the earlier service, and we always find them come of a week day evening. Whenever we have a sermon we have a congregation which ordinarily would be called a good Sunday congregation; that is to say, the church is about three-fourths full, and this are many poor people.

3625. What proportion of the poor in the district do you think come to the Holy Communion?—I cannot tell you that, but I know a great many come.

3626. What do you say as regards the tradesmen of the district?—There are so very few. It is nearly all poverty there, and there are such a number of Italians, Dissenters, Roman Catholics, and others.

3627. (Mr. J. Abel Smith.) What is the population of the district?—The return is 8,500.

3628. (Earl Stanhope.) How many years have you been churchwarden?—Ever since the church has been opened; this is my fifth year; it was consecrated by the Bishop in 1862.

3629. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) Do you distribute the alms from the offertory to the poor who attend the church and the Holy Communion, or generally to the poor of the district?—It goes for the support of the church, the relief of the poor, and for the many works carried on in the parish.

3630. For the poor of the district generally, without special reference to their attending the church?—Just so. On the second Sunday after Epiphany there was a great deal of poverty, for the weather was very severe, and I put a notice in the seats, asking the people to give, and without warning 80*l.* was subscribed, which was divided among the poor. We gave to them whether Jews, Roman Catholics, or anybody else.

3631. (Sir R. J. Phillimore.) You say the offertory was 2,185*l.*?—Yes.

3632. That was for a year?—That was last year. It rose up from 600*l.* to 900*l.*, 1,500*l.*, and now to 2,100*l.* odd.

3633. (Rev. H. Venn.) You say in this paper that you have known the parish for 30 years?—I was born in it. I was baptised at St. Andrew's, Holborn.

3634. You also say in this paper that before this church was built, there was only one school, and occasional preaching?—That was all. The City Mission used to work there. It is a very poverty-stricken district.

3635. Are you aware now of an infant school with 200 children in Baldwin's Gardens?—There may be a school of that kind, but I did not think it worth while going into it, whether there were one or two schools more or less. I knew there was that school in Baldwin's Gardens; and supposing there is an infant school with 100 or 200 children, that is no great deal in a large district like that.

3636. Are you aware that for very many years, within the last 30 years, there has been a large school connected with St. John's Chapel, Bedford Row?—The only one that I know of is in Baldwin's Gardens. St. John's Chapel, Bedford Row, is a dissenting chapel, and it is now Mr. Noel's.

3637. (Dean of Ely.) You are confounding two things. Mr. Venn is speaking of a St. John's, Bedford Row, which is now pulled down?—That is not in our district.

3638. (Rev. H. Venn.) They had a large school in that district?—I dare say they had, but then St. Andrew's is such a large parish, and that is nearly a mile away from us.

3639. That is all within the district of Baldwin's Gardens?—No, our district is bounded on one side by Gray's Inn Lane, and on the other side by Leather Lane. The only school in our district is Baldwin's Gardens school, that I know of.

3640. And this infant school of which you take no account?—Yes.

3641. Is there not a Sunday school?—There is a Sunday school attached to St. Peter's Church in Saffron Hill, and one attached to St. Andrew's, Holborn.

3642. And a very large one in Baldwin's Gardens?—I am not aware of it; I dare say there is.

3643. I will not press it further, but your statement that there is only one school, and occasional preaching, I think you now see is erroneous?—I think it is quite enough; you might as well go into all the little day schools of the neighbourhood.

3644. With reference to the preaching, are you alluding to the preaching of the curates of St. Andrew, Holborn?—No, it was done mostly by the London City Mission and people of that class.

3645. Are you aware whether the district was regularly visited by the city missionaries?—I dare say it was; in my opinion that is not so good as a churchman and a clergyman doing it; I think the poor pay more attention to a clergyman.

3646. Were you acquainted with any of those district visitors?—No.

3647. You do not know whether any of them have gone into the church since?—I cannot say, St. Andrew's is a very large parish.

3648. With regard to the poor in the neighbourhood of your church, you have spoken of them as a very poverty-stricken set?—Yes, it is only for you to go and walk in the district to see it.

3649. I understand from you that they are favourably disposed towards the church?—I did not say anything of the kind. I only say that they receive the ministrations of the clergymen, and that they send about 400 children to the schools, and now they are collecting their halfpence and pennies, and giving voluntarily towards the defence fund. That is the only way in which I can get at the like or dislike on their part.

3650. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) When you spoke of the school at Baldwin's Gardens as being the only provision of which you were aware, you meant, perhaps, the only provision made by the parish church?—No; that is not made by the parish church at all. I think the Baldwin Garden's school is supported by Mr. Martin and divers other people.

3651. Do you mean that there was no school provided by the parish church?—None, other than the charity schools in Hatton Garden.

3652. Will you tell us, if you know, whether there are any considerable number of tradespeople in the district who attend the church?—I cannot exactly say, for, as I said before, there are so few that are very well off, and there is such a number of Roman Catholics, Italians, and foreigners of every kind.

3653. (Dean of Ely.) I think you stated that it is not the great 11 o'clock service but the early morning service at which the poor people attend?—Yes, and the week day-services.

3654. Is the mode of the early service to which the poor go and the 11 o'clock service the same?—No, it is not, because the 11 o'clock service is choral.

3655. It is not choral at the early morning service?—No.

3656. But the vestments are used?—Yes.

3657. Is incense used?—No.

3658. The vestments are the only piece of ritualism in the early service?—Just so; it is the same as in any other church.

3659. Is the mode of reading the service the ordinary mode, or is it what is called monotoned?—No, it is read.

3660. It is read so that the poor people can understand?—Just so; you would not know it from any other church except for the vestments.

3661. The vestments are the only distinction between it and an ordinary church?—Just so.

3662. At the 11 o'clock service in what way is the clergyman's part performed, is it read, chanted, or what?—It is partly read.

3663. Not chanted?—Some portions of it, such as the verses given out just after the confession, are chanted.

3664. Is it not monotoned as it would be in a cathedral?—Yes, in some parts, 3665. Is it monotoned in such a way as to be intelligible?—Very plain and distinct.

3666. It is plain to all people in the church?—To all people. Of course some clergymen will intone more clearly than others.

3667. But there is manifestly an intention that it shall be audible?—Certainly.

3668. And you believe that in general it is audible?—Yes; I can always fully understand it myself.

3669. And is the reading of Holy Scripture also audible and clear?—Very clear. We have had frequent commendations on the way in which the Scriptures are read.

3670. (Rev. W. G. Humphry.) I have been informed that many persons who have been Dissenters have now become regular attendants at St. Alban's church. Can you say whether that is or is not the case from your own knowledge?—Well, I cannot say that; but I know this very well, that if it had not been for St. Alban's church, hundreds would have gone over.

3671. Gone over to where?—Gone to the Roman Catholic Church.

3672. (Mr. J. Abel Smith.) You said, in answer to the Dean of Ely, that the only difference in the church was as to the eucharistic vestments?—That is all. Of course we use incense, but at the consecration only.

3673. Is there not an elevation of the elements for adoration?—There was, but that has been given up. When that report, with the opinions given by the legal advisers, was presented, Mr. Mackonochie gave it up because it was doubtful whether it was legal or not. It was given up at Christmas.

3674. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) Who provided the vestments?—They were gifts from the congregation—given by members of the congregation. In fact, we had them in our possession a year and a half before using them.

3675. (Mr. J. Abel Smith.) Are the candles lighted at the time of the celebration of the Holy Communion?—Yes.

3676. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) At the early Communion as well as the others?—Yes, at every Communion.

3677. (Earl of Harrowby.) Were these vestments given you by parishioners, or by members of the congregation not parishioners?—By members of the congregation.

3678. Not parishioners?—I have told the Commissioners that there are hardly a score of people of any importance in the parish; they are so exceedingly poor. Really, if we were to rely on the parishioners, we should fail indeed.

3679. (Bishop of London.) The vestments were not provided by the churchwardens?—No; they were presented to Mr. Mackonochie, and he said, "You must give me liberty as to when I think it proper to use them," and they gave them unconditionally.

3680. The churchwardens were not consulted?—No, not in the gift of them.

3681. Nor in the choice of them?—No; there are four sets; one or two had been given. The last two were presented through me.

3682. But you are only one of the churchwardens?—I consulted Mr. Hubbard about it, and Mr. Hubbard was against it, and against incense; and what could be done?

3683. So you acted for both?—No; the fact is this: the third set of vestments I did not present at all. It was only the last set of vestments, and as they were so notoriously used, of course I did not think anything about it. I believe I have done everything to the best of my ability. I only know this, I have worked very hard for it,—endeavouring to do good and restore peace between all parties.

3684. (Earl of Harrowby.) How is your vestry constituted; who assemble there?—We put notices on the church doors, calling the vestry together; the notices are signed by the incumbent and churchwardens.

Mr.
C. C. Spiller.
11 July 1867.

C. Mr.
C. C. Spiller.
11 11 July 1867.

3685. What number of people assemble at the vestry?—We do not get many.

3686. How many; 4, 5, 10, or what number?—We perhaps get 8 or 10 or 6; sometimes hardly enough to form a quorum.

3687. Are those 10 all of one mind?—It is, "Who will you propose"? The incumbent chooses his churchwarden and the people choose theirs. My name is mentioned, and one proposes and another seconds it.

3688. Is there any division of opinion upon it?—No, there is not interest enough for that. The fact is there is no one who cares about serving the office. I do not wonder at it. I am there at half-past 7 o'clock in the morning and at 9 or 10 at night, and have been so for five years, and hardly know what it is to have a holiday. I give up all my spare time for the good of the church.

3689. With reference to this 2,185*l.* to which you have referred, how is it expended?—I have not brought the statement, but every year there is the annual statement made out by an accountant, and it goes for the support of the schools, district visiting, orphanage schools, paying the organist, verger, and usual expenses of the church.

3690. What portion of that goes to the maintenance of the clergy?—The only amount that is paid for the expense of the curates is this,—we have six curates. Three are volunteers, and we pay to the Clergy House for their maintenance, 30*l.* a year for each. Their services are given gratuitously.

3691. Should you be able to maintain that kind of service unless you drew people from a distance?—I cannot say what we could do or what we could not do. It is introducing a new system to show what the church's work is, and it is a sort of model.

3692. Is the church filled before the service begins?—It is crammed every service.

3693. Is it filled before the service begins?—We will say, evening service begins at seven; at six the people begin to arrive and unless you are there by half-past six you cannot get a seat at all.

3694. Do any people of the parish try to get in and not find seats?—Plenty of them come.

3697. Have you ever visited other churches in that part of the world where congregations have been brought together without the help of these rites?—If you go to the churches in the neighbourhood you will find them comparatively empty.

3698. Have you ever been to other churches—new churches?—What kind of churches do you mean?

3699. Churches established in the north-east of London of late years?—No; I cannot say I have. The fact is I have not time to do so. My business occupies me from seven in the morning until ten at night, and Sunday is my only day.

3700. You believe that a congregation cannot be collected out of a poor district without attractions of this kind?—That is what I believe.

3701. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) May I ask what your business is?—I am a stationer and book-seller.

3702. In the district?—I was; I am not living in the district now. I have lately been pulled down for the Holborn Valley Improvement, and I am now living in Westbourne Grove, but I believe that they wish to have my services, and there has been one of the church houses, a mission house, which has been taken in my name to qualify me.

3703. Are the congregation ever invited to offer prayers for the departed?—I never heard of it in my life. There are a great many false reports.

The witness withdrew.

Mr. J. Martin.

Mr. JOHN MARTIN called in and examined:

3704. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) Where do you reside?—In Montague Place, Russell Square.

3705. You are not an inhabitant of St. Alban's district?—I am not.

3706. Are you at all connected with St. Alban's church?—Not with the church.

3707. Have you any knowledge of the practices there from your own experience?—I have never been into the church. I only know the practice of the church from what I have heard.

3708. You have been superintendent of the city missionaries visiting in that district?—I have.

3709. We do not take hearsay evidence; but can you of your own knowledge tell us anything of the influence of the practices in that church?—By information which I have personally and through communication with the city missionaries, as well as from visiting myself, calling upon many of the inhabitants, I can state that scarcely any of the poor and working classes of the parish attend the services of the church from the objections which they have to the practices and to the mode of conducting the service.

3710. That you have discovered from your own visits?—I have heard frequently from the different missionaries who have given me the information as to the numbers of persons in their districts. The four missionaries occupy the whole parish, and have for 20 years had it divided amongst them, and knowing all the persons they have stated to me that not more than about 8 or 10 in each district, to their knowledge, attend the services of the church regularly or occasionally. A few months ago, seeing a statement by Mr. Mackonochie in a letter, that there was no reason to believe that the inhabitants of the parish were averse to the services, I took the opportunity, as there was a suit about to be promoted against Mr. Mackonochie in reference to the services, and understanding that the Bishop of London wished to have the request from an inhabitant backed up by statements from householders and residents concurring with him, I took the opportunity of calling with a memorial expressing a desire that the Bishop should take steps to get the points in dispute settled, whether they were legal or illegal. I therefore called upon between 40 and 50 shopkeepers, householders, and others, asking them whether they were favourable or otherwise to the services conducted at St. Alban's. When they had expressed an opinion that they were unfavourable, I said there was a question going to be raised as to their legality or otherwise, and asked whether they were disposed to sign a memorial to that effect. Among the persons that I called upon, the half of whom, at least, I had never seen before, and knew nothing of, there was not a single individual in favour of the services as conducted at the church. Everyone, except four or five, signed the memorial. Those four or five merely declined to do it because the clergy dealt with them for coals, or potatoes, or bread, &c. All the others signed. I did not take steps to go further because I did not want a greater number of signatures, and because of the time it occupied; but on all hands the persons I did call on said, "You have only to go to so and so, my neighbours, and they will sign it." A week or two afterwards, at Easter, I put a petition in favour of Lord Shaftesbury's Vestment Bill into the hands of the assistant-master of our school, and told him that he might occupy a few hours in the holidays in going round and getting signatures. He did call at random on about 100 persons, and when he brought the signatures he stated that he had not met with a single person who was opposed to it; but three or four said, "We will not sign because we think everybody should do as he likes."

3711. How long have you been connected with the National school in Baldwin's Gardens?—34 years.

3712. How often do you visit the school?—Regularly five times a week.

3713. Do many of the former scholars reside in the district?—A considerable number; but I have no means of telling exactly. It is so changeable that I cannot say what number; a considerable number.

3714. What clergymen visited the school before the erection of St. Alban's?—The minister and curates for the time being of St. Peter's, Saffron Hill, at which the children always have attended divine worship.

3715. And still attend?—And still attend.

3716. The clergymen of St. Alban's do not visit it now?—They do not.

3717. Have you declined to place the school under the minister of St. Alban's?—Immediately almost after the consecration of St. Alban's, the rector of St. Andrew's, Holborn, who is the president of the school, informed me that he could no longer give the annual sermons that had been accustomed to be given there, because it was in St. Alban's parish, and we must look to St. Alban's for support. Shortly afterwards two or three of the influential members of the committee met the rector of St. Andrew's to confer upon the subject, and we asked him whether he was prepared, as president of the schools, to move that they be placed in connexion with St. Alban's church. His answer was that he was not, because he was convinced that to do so would be injurious to the school, therefore nothing was done. No motion was ever made to that effect.

3718. Have you yourself heard any reasons alleged by individuals for not attending services at St. Alban's?—When I went with the memorial to ask their views upon the subject, I met with various reasons given by different people why they objected to it. The most general reason was that they thought it was a popish place, or worse than popish, as they said.

3719. Had these persons been inside the church?—I cannot say as to all of them. Some said they had. I cannot say as to all. I did not ask them.

3720. (Lord Portman.) You know as a fact that some of them had been there?—Yes.

3721. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) Have you ever by any chance counted the attendance of the poor at St. Alban's church?—Not myself.

3722. You cannot speak of it to your own knowledge?—I cannot.

3723. Have you observed any improvement in the district tradespeople owing to the ministration of St. Alban's?—I have not.

3724. Do you know of parents who dislike the ministration of St. Alban's nevertheless sending their children to St. Alban's schools?—I do; two instances happened to come before me accidentally.

3725. Have you any profession besides being superintendent?—I am a solicitor.

3726. (Bishop of London.) Do you think that the people in the district of St. Alban's understand that that is their parish church?—I think they make scarcely any distinction. Persons accustomed to go to St. Andrew's still think St. Andrew's is their parish. If, for instance, a man wants to get married who lives in that parish he would still go to St. Andrew's, and it is not easy to make them understand the distinction of the division into ecclesiastical districts.

3727. Do any look upon it as a private chapel?—I do not know that.

3728. Do any look upon it as a Roman Catholic church?—I do not know. Some of them seem to do so. I have heard of a gentleman going there and asking where the church was, being within 100 yards, and a man living there said that he did not know of any Church of England place of worship there. Mr. J. Martin.

3729. Is it possible that that would be the case?—Yes; I should think it is possible. 11 July 1867.

3730. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) You spoke of the services of the city missionaries in that district; do you know whether they at all discourage people going to St. Alban's?—They profess never to advise people as to the place of worship to which they shall go, and I believe they adhere to that very faithfully. It is their duty to make them, if they can, desire to go to a place of worship, and then to choose for themselves.

3731. They tell them that they may go either to dissenting places or wherever they like?—Yes.

3732. You are not aware that they distinctly discourage their going to St. Alban's?—I am not, unless their advice is distinctly asked.

3733. You mentioned that in endeavouring to get up that memorial some 40 or 50 persons were called upon?—I did.

3734. Were they taken indiscriminately?—As to the first six or eight that I went to, I went to persons who I thought would not approve of the church, and who would be likely to sign the memorial. In several instances they said to me, "I think so and so, and so and so, will probably be likely to take the same view, and sign." Then I went in that way to persons I had never seen or known anything of.

3735. Were the names of these persons suggested to you at all by the city missionaries?—Two or three.

3736. Then you did not take, for example, a single street or side of a street, and go to each house in succession and ask their opinions?—No. I did take about six houses I think, in succession in one street. In Verulam Street. A man said he thought the people up there would probably, from what he knew of them, be likely to be persons in favour of the memorial.

3737. In the course of your canvass did you meet with any persons who expressed themselves favourable to the services?—Not one.

3738. Did you avoid going to any persons who you had reason to think might be favourable?—No. I do not know a single person in the whole parish that I have reason to think is favourable.

3739. (Mr. J. Abel Smith.) Has the district been very carefully visited by city missionaries for some years?—For a great many years.

3740. Can you tell us how many families are regularly visited by the missionaries?—The four missionaries occupy the whole parish. They have in their districts about 1,860 families which they call "visitable."

3741. It is a separate parish now, is it not?—Yes; they have about 1,860 what they call "visitable families;" that is, families of the working classes to whom they suppose they may get access.

3742. Are they visited with any regularity?—They endeavour to get through their districts once a month, but from the largeness of the districts they do not do so, I should think, above once in six weeks; perhaps not always that.

3743. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) I did not quite understand what the 1,860 families were to which you referred; was it only in St. Alban's district, or was it the average of each city missionary's work?—Only St. Alban's.

3744. You think about 1,860 visitable families are in St. Alban's district?—Yes.

3745. Of which you visited the heads of about 40?—Individually.

3746. Therefore you visited about one fortieth of the heads of the visitable families?—Yes.

3747. Your memorial is one fortieth of the public opinion of St. Alban's district?—No, I did not call upon any of the others at all.

3748. I thought you said the memorial was signed by about 40?—Yes.

Mr. J. Martin.
11 July 1867.

3749. Out of 1,860?—Yes; but the 1,860 families are chiefly lodgers: the 40 are householders.

3750. Did you take pains to ascertain whether these 40 who did sign it went to any place of worship?—I incidentally heard so from them; some I knew who did; and, incidentally, some mentioned where they did go. I do not think I asked any of them.

3751. Incidentally you fancy you heard that some proportion of these 40 do go to some place of worship?—Some do.

3752. What place of worship?—Some go to St. Andrew's; some to Trinity Church, which is another district of the parish; some to St. Peter's Church, which is another district of the parish.

3753. Did you select persons you believed were members of the Church of England?—No; I made no difference.

3754. Some of them may go to Nonconformist places of worship?—One or two, certainly.

3755. (Earl of Harrowby.) Was it, in your canvass on this occasion, your purpose to exhaust the whole population of the parish?—Not at all.

3756. What was your purpose?—Merely to get as many names as would be sufficient to satisfy the Bishop of London that the promoter of the suit was not merely acting on his own unsupported opinion, and I understood 20 or 30 would be quite sufficient for that purpose.

3757. Therefore any argument to be drawn as to the feeling of the parish from your only having asked 40 or 50 has no foundation?—I should not think people generally know anything about it.

3758. (Dean of Ely.) The point that we are particularly desiring information upon is the vestments and ritualistic practices connected with them; I think the vestments have only been comparatively recently introduced at St. Alban's; do you know that?—I do not know.

3759. Do you know whether St. Alban's was regarded more favourably by the inhabitants before the introduction of the vestments than it has been since? Has it produced any effect on the feeling of the inhabitants, to your knowledge?—I am not aware that it has.

3760. Is not there a large Roman Catholic population in that neighbourhood?—Very considerable.

3761. You stated that there was an opinion that this was a popish or worse than a popish church?—Yes.

3762. If so, I presume it would be possibly regarded with favour by this Roman Catholic population; do you know whether any of this Roman Catholic population attend this church?—I do not know.

3763. (Mr. Hubbard.) You have taken great interest in the National school in Baldwin's Gardens?—I have.

3764. You give to it a great deal of your own personal time and attention?—I do.

3765. Do the numbers of that school maintain themselves as they were some 8 or 10 years ago?—Three years ago the school was larger than it ever had been for 30 years; I cannot tell at all why, and in the last year and a half it has fallen again to the number that it was 10 years ago.

3766. It still contains a very satisfactory list of scholars?—It does.

3767. Are you aware how many children there are in the infant school, which is almost opposite, I believe, to the National school?—About 150 or 160.

3768. In the National school how many are there at the present time?—270.

3769. Do you know how many children attend the school connected with St. Alban's church?—I only know it from the printed letters of Mr. Mackonochie and the churchwardens.

3770. Do you recollect the number?—In the day school, I think, 330, the infant school and day school.

3771. The population of the whole district is stated to be about 8,000; that would imply upwards of 1,000 children of school age, would it not?—Yes.

3772. So that there would appear to be abundant room for more schools even than now exist, even allowing for the recently established ones in connexion with the Church?—There are a great many more children in other schools, besides those you have mentioned.

3773. You are aware that this district was partly in the district of St. Andrew's, Holborn, before?—Yes.

3774. Are you aware of the opinion which Mr. Blunt formed, that it would be very desirable that this new system should have a fair trial in a district where all past efforts had entirely failed to touch the people?—I am not aware of that at all.

3775. (Earl Beauchamp.) You told us that there had been no improvement in the neighbourhood visible since St. Alban's church was opened; has there been any deterioration?—My opinion, and the opinion of others, who are most acquainted with the district, is that for the last 10 or 15 years it has been gradually getting more deteriorated, owing to the influx of Irish from St. Giles's and Saffron Hill.

3776. And that has increased as metropolitan improvements have gone on?—Yes.

3777. I think you told the Dean of Ely that you did not know when the vestments were introduced into St. Alban's?—I did.

3778. Can you tell us when the practice of elevation was introduced?—I do not know.

3779. Or the practice of lighting candles?—I do not know exactly.

3780. Or the use of incense?—I do not know.

3781. (Bishop of Oxford.) You have mentioned the impression made and conveyed to you by those who have been at these services; will you tell me whether they knew when they gave you that information who you were, and your connexion with the City Mission, and the like?—On the occasion of my visit with the memorial?

3782. I did not name that; I asked as to those who conveyed to you the information as to their judgment of those services?—I should think almost everybody that I called upon knew me, though I did not know some of them.

3783. And probably when you went round with the memorial you were equally well known?—To most of them.

3784. (Archbishop of Armagh.) You said that you had never reckoned the number of poor attending St. Alban's; did you employ an agent to reckon them?—I have.

3785. Was he a trustworthy person, one in whom you could have confidence?—Yes.

3786. What report did he give you as to the numbers?—He attended the church last Sunday week in the morning. The church was full, but he could not recognize in the congregation more than eight persons that he thought came under the description of the working classes. In the evening he did the same; he stood at one door, and a friend of his at the other door, to see all the congregation as they came out. One of them counted seven at the Baldwin's Gardens door, and the other counted three at the Brook Street door; he knows 1,000 or thereabouts by sight in the district; and neither of them knew one as living in the district, though they seemed to be of the working classes. On Friday morning last, (it is a sort of thing I do not much like to do) in consequence of hearing in the other room Mr. Spiller telling a gentleman that the early service in the weekday and the evening service on Wednesday and Friday, when there is a sermon, were the times when the poor attended; I got a person to go last Friday morning to the early service, and the whole congregation, including the clergy, choristers, and officials, was 20, of whom two were poor. Last night, being Wednesday night, this person attended. I was particularly anxious he should do so, because Mr. Spiller had said that the church was usually three parts full on a Wednesday evening. As I said, he went there last night, and the congregation consisted of between 80 and 85 persons, eight of whom appeared to be working people.

3787. Then the report you received goes to the point that St. Alban's church is not of much service to the working people; that they do not attend it?—That is my conviction.

3788. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) Are the missionaries under you ordained ministers of the Church of England?—No.

The witness withdrew.

HENRY RICHMOND DROOP, Esq. called in and examined.

3793. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) You are acquainted with St. Thomas's, Stamford Hill, I believe?—Yes.

3794. Mr. Kingsford is the incumbent of that church?—Yes.

3795. Are vestments used?—No; there are no vestments. There are no lights and no incense. The chief things that are objected to, I think, are that he stands at the front of the Communion table, instead of on the north side, that he intones and chants the whole of the service except the post Communion service, that he had, until lately, choristers in surplices placed immediately before the Communion table, and another thing I may mention which I only knew lately, that is, that he uses a hymn which is a translation from the Roman hymn book.

3797. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) Do you know these things of your own knowledge?—Yes.

3798. You have attended the services and seen or heard them?—I have attended the services several times within the last two or three years, and especially two Sundays ago.

3799. All these things you state are from your own knowledge and experience?—Yes.

3800. You have no other ritualistic practice to mention, except those?—There are, a good many small things. There is the invocation, for instance.

3801. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) What invocation?—Before the sermon.

3802. The invocation of whom?—Instead of having a prayer before the sermon he uses the invocation, "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."

3803. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) Did you know St. Thomas's church before these innovations were introduced?—Yes; I had been attending at the church all my life until these innovations began.

3804. What sort of congregation was it before?—The church was very full indeed for a church with pews. All the pews were taken, and there was a great difficulty in obtaining seats.

3805. The persons attending the church were generally residents in the district, were they?—Yes. Almost all the persons, with two or three exceptions, excluding from the computation the children of the parish schools, who had pews were residents in the district. That of course I know only from having asked the persons who were familiar with the congregation.

3806. What is the state of the congregation now from your own knowledge?—The congregation is reduced fully to about one fourth. The communicants were very numerous, and now they are reduced (taking the Sunday I was there) to 30.

3807. What was the number of communicants before, as far as you know?—I believe 150 was the average.

3808. Since these innovations have been introduced, what celebrations of the Holy Communion

3789. None of them?—None of them.

3790. Are you yourself a member of the Church of England?—Yes.

3791. Was it at the 11 o'clock service that the person whom you employed attended?—On Sunday, yes.

3792. Did that person attend and count the poor at the very early Communion service on Sunday?—No.

Mr. J. Martin.

11 July 1867.

have taken place?—Before these innovations took place there was a monthly Communion, once every month, a celebration in the morning and a celebration at mid-day; besides that there were the same celebrations on the great festivals; since that Mr. Kingsford has also added other Communion services early in the morning.

3809. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) How often?—Every Sunday and every saint's day. These Communion services early in the morning I have not attended myself, but the churchwarden of the parish has shown me a list of the figures in the churchwarden's book, and from that I learn that there was an average of only seven at these additional morning celebrations. I have also seen the figures for the occasions when there was a celebration in the middle of the day as well as in the morning, and these are reduced enormously, from an average of 148 to an average of 33.

3810. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) From your own knowledge do the poor attend this church or do they go elsewhere?—A great many go elsewhere. I believe only a few of the poor do attend this church now.

3811. Did many of the poor attend it before?—The free seats were very full before, and now they are very empty.

3812. Of your own knowledge do you know any thing about the protest of the pew renters after these innovations were introduced?—There was a protest sent in, which was signed by 103 pew renters, and I believe that the total number of pew renters was 129. This was a protest which was addressed to the trustees of the church, protesting against these alterations being made. I have a copy of the protest with me.

3813. (Bishop of Oxford.) Do you know whether that translation of a Roman hymn that you alluded to, is one which is in "Hymns Ancient and Modern"?—It is.

3814. It is the hymn which we all know?—Yes. The doctrine is rather modified in the translation, I think.

3815. Does Mr. Kingsford use prayers also, and collects translated from the Roman, that you knew of?—No; not that I know of.

3816. You do not know, for instance, whether the collects and prayers, most of them in the English Prayer Book, are not so translated from the Roman?—I know that some of those are translated from the Roman missal, but then they are authorized by the Church of England. They do not contain the same doctrine.

3817. I was not speaking about doctrine but about the origin. I understood you the objection to it was not on account of its doctrine, but that it was translated from the Roman?—My objections were, first, that it was translated from a Roman hymn-book, and that it was a hymn which was used for the adoration of the elements.

3818. You mean the original was?—Yes.

3819. My question was whether you were aware that the major part of the Communion service of the Church of England was translated from the office of the mass as used in the Church of Rome?—I am aware that some parts are translated,—considerable parts are translated, but with modifications and alterations.

H. R. Droop,
Esq.

Esq.

3820. (Rev. W. G. Humphry.) How long ago were the changes made in this church?—In November 1865.

3821. Were they all made together?—There were first some alterations the year before made in the chancel of the church. We did not suspect any doctrinal meaning in them, and we did not object much at the time, or, rather, did not object at all, publicly or formally. The other alterations were all made in November 1865.

3822. Was there any preparation for that in the teaching or preaching of the clergy of the church? Did they lead the congregation to expect them, and did they prepare them for it?—Mr. Kingsford preached some sermons about the desirability of having ceremonies, and of having a gorgeous service, but beyond that there was no teaching of doctrine before the innovations were made.

3823. One or more sermons were preached setting forth the desirableness of a more gorgeous ceremonial?—Two sermons.

3824. Not connected with doctrine?—No.

3825. You say “we” objected; you include yourself and whom besides?—First of all the objections came originally from the pew renters, of whom I was not one. My mother was a pew renter. After that I joined in an address by about 12 of the principal pew renters to the Bishop of London. I signed that letter, being one of the members of the committee, and on behalf of my mother.

3826. Did the incumbent endeavour to reconcile the objectors by any public teaching or preaching?—I think not. I think he refused to make any alterations at our request, and said he should not make any concessions.

3827. Thereupon did the objecting pew renters withdraw from the church?—Most of the objecting pew renters withdrew, but some of them were obliged to remain because the other churches were too far off.

3828. (Dean of Ely.) Is this a parish church?—It is a district chapel.

3829. Are the pews well let?—The pews were all let.

3830. Is a considerable proportion of the accommodation left for the poor?—Yes; I suppose about 150 or 200 seats.

3831. Out of how many?—Out of 750.

3832. Those were left quite free for the poor?—Yes.

3833. Is that the present condition of things?—Yes; except that a great many pews are vacant now.

3834. You have not got rid of pews in any way?—No.

3835. Were the objections to these changes shared by the poor, or were they entirely objections from the pew renters?—I believe, as far as I know, the poor shared in them quite as much as the rich, but except so far as the diminution in the number of communicants shows the fact it is impossible to test it.

3836. You think the number of communicants has diminished?—It has diminished to almost one fifth of what it was.

3837. The number of persons communicating upon any particular occasion; but as I understand, there are more frequent Communion services now, therefore it is quite possible there may be as many communicants, although at any given time there may be fewer persons communicating?—Altogether there were on an average at the eight times during the six winter months, when there were two celebrations, 148 communicating, and now taking the same times there is an average of 33. Taking the other times by themselves, those in which there is only a morning Communion, for the year 1866, there was an average of only seven, and for these last few months there has been an average of about five, and I believe that the persons who communicated at these other times are a peculiar class of persons who communicate constantly, and that they do not affect the average.

3838. You think the actual number of persons attending Holy Communion is less than it was, although the number of opportunities of attending is increased?—Yes; very much less.

3839. Did the clergyman consult the people in any way before he made these changes?—He did not.

3840. You spoke of a protest; can you tell me against what particular points that protest is directed?—Mr. Kingsford issued a circular announcing that he should make certain alterations. That circular announced particularly that there were to be the choristers in surplices, and it also announced the Invocation, and also (what I omitted to mention before) that the non-communicants ought to attend at the Communion service.

3841. Then there are three points,—the choristers in surplices, the Invocation of the Holy Trinity before the sermon, and the attendance of non-communicants at the time of the celebration; those are the three points against which this protest was directed?—Not altogether. The circular mentioned some other things. He had already adopted the standing in the middle of the table.

3842. Was that one of the things which you protested against?—I think at that time we hardly understood what it meant.

3843. As I understand there was an actual protest, —a written document—I want to know what were the points against which you protested?—We did not enumerate any points.

3844. Did you say certain changes had been made which you objected to, or did you make use of phraseology of that kind?—Certain changes which he was going to make which we objected to.

3845. You did not specify any particular point against which you protested?—Our protest was drawn up immediately after this circular was issued, a few days afterwards, and it was a protest against his altering the services.

3846. In the manner described in the circular?—Yes. That circular also included changes in the service, and our objection was partly to its being done entirely without our consent, and without any regard for what we wished. We also suspected there was some erroneous doctrine involved. We did not understand the matter.

3847. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) Have you any free sittings in your church?—I estimated about 150 or 200.

3848. How many rented seats?—There must be 120 pews, each with five seats in it; that is 600 sittings.

3849. I think I heard you state earlier in your evidence that the latter part of the Communion service was read, and not monotoned?—Yes.

3850. Did the people object to that; I want to know, in fact, how much of the service is intoned or sung, and how much is merely read?—We do not object at all to anything being read.

3851. Where does the reading begin?—I think after the sermon.

3852. All the later part of the service was merely read?—Yes; on the particular occasion when I was present.

3853. Have you candles on the Lord's table?—No.

3854. No candles at all?—No.

3855. Then it was not a very highly ritualistic service if the Communion service was read and there were no candles?—No, it was not.

3856. Who was the clergyman before Mr. Kingsford?—A Mr. Heathcote.

3857. He had no practices that were considered ritualistic?—No. He was a high churchman decidedly, but his service was not all ritualistic.

3858. Not at all musical?—No; except that the Venite and other canticles were chanted, and psalms and hymns in metre were sung.

3859. (Sir W. P. Wood.) Was your objection principally to there being any change at all?—In the first place, I think it was to there being any change at all.

3860. (Earl of Harrowby.) You were apprehensive when changes in that direction were being made that they would go further?—Yes; and some other persons were much more apprehensive than I was.

3861. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) You speak of a hymn being used at the adoration of the elements; do you mean to imply by that, that the clergy and people adore the elements?—I said that the hymn was used which was used by the Roman Catholics for the adoration of the elements. At the time it was used at St. Thomas's I explained, I think, that it was used before the Communion service began.

3862. Are you a parishioner of that district now?—My mother is a parishioner of that district.

3863. Does the fact of you not being a parishioner now account at all for you not attending the church as much as you did?—No; I am still on Sundays always staying in the parish, but I have gone away to another church because I did not like the service there.

3865. Do you know whether any of the congregation have left to attend a higher ritual service in the neighbourhood, for instance, at St. Matthias's?—Not that I know of; I believe not.

3866. (Sir E. J. Phillimore.) You know this church well, and have known it a long while?—Yes.

3867. What was the amount of the offertory under the old system?—The only thing I can say about it is this—

3868. Do you know what the amount was?—I do not know the amount; but I will say this, that Mr. Kingsford some two or three years ago, before these alterations were instituted, announced that he had plenty of money from the offertory to provide for the visitors of the district.

3869. You do not know what the amount was; you cannot draw any comparison between the amount under the old system and under the new?—I know it has immensely diminished.

3870. How do you know that?—I have forgotten the figures, but I have been told what they are.

3871. What are your means of knowledge? Were you churchwarden under the old system?—No.

3872. How do you know anything about what was collected under the old system?—I have seen some figures drawn up by the present churchwarden.

3873. Under the old system?—Yes.

3874. I am speaking now of what it was before the present clergyman came. Do you know (perhaps you do not, and if so, say so,) what the amount of the offertory was before the present clergyman came?—Not before the present clergyman came. The present clergyman came in 1861. We have had three years of the old system with our present clergyman.

3875. Do you know what the amount of the offertory was between 1861 and 1863?—I cannot give you the figures.

3876. What were the number of celebrations under the old system, if I may so speak?—Once every month and on the greater festivals.

3877. How often on every Sunday?—Two celebrations on every Sunday.

3878. That is to say, once every Sunday in the month?—Two celebrations, morning and mid-day.

3879. How many celebrations are there now?—H. R. Droop, Esq.
There are the two celebrations on the Sundays and feast days, and besides, there is a celebration every Sunday and saint's day when there are a sufficient number of communicants. 11 July 1867.

3880. At what hour in the morning?—Eight o'clock.

3881. Do you ever attend?—No; I never attend it.

3882. You do not know what number of communicants there are, of course?—I have had the figures given me by the churchwarden, from his book.

3883. It is a question which came before the Court of Arches a short time ago?—Yes.

3884. Where do the poor sit in your church?—A part of them sit in front, close to the Communion rails, and a part of them sit at the back of the church. A part of them sit in the back rows of the gallery.

3885. The pews are all let, are they?—The pews used to be all let.

3886. They are all to be let now?—Yes.

3887. (Bishop of London.) As to the offertory, do I understand you to say that in the first three years it was sufficient to pay for the district visitors?—Yes.

3888. How do you know that?—Mr. Kingsford announced that it was sufficient.

3889. It is not sufficient for that now? Has he announced that?—I have not heard him announce it, but I hear it is not.

3890. Is it mere hearsay?—It is mere hearsay of course. It is hearsay from the persons whose business it is to know.

3891. You are a barrister, I think?—Yes.

3892. And a member of Trinity College, Cambridge?—Yes.

3893. You have attended services at the Temple?—No, I have not.

3894. At Trinity College Chapel?—Yes.

3895. Is there any important difference between the services now to which you object, and that which is used at Trinity College Chapel?—Yes.

3896. In what respect?—Of course the position of the priest at Communion table is different.

3897. Is the mixed chalice used?—The mixed chalice was used at St. Thomas's. I do not know whether it is used now or not. Another difference between the two services is that the prayers are intoned and not read. Sometimes it is more intelligible than at others, but I have been in the church when I could not understand what was being said. At Trinity College, of course, the prayers are read quite distinctly.

3898. Are they not intoned?—They are not.

3899. In the changes that were made about the Communion table and the chancel, were they made according to any model with which you are acquainted or any system you have read of?—I compared what I knew of these changes with what was directed in the Directorium Anglicanum, and I found that in almost every particular they were identical.

3900. The Court has decided and set everything right, has it not?—The Court has altered some things. The whole matter was referred to Archdeacon Sinclair, and many things, he thought, were not worth the expense of altering. He said they were objectionable in themselves, but not so objectionable that it was necessary to alter them.

3901. Has the decision of the Court given satisfaction to the parishioners?—It has not done us much good.

3902. You are much where you were?—We are almost entirely where we were. What we wanted was to have the services put so that we liked them.

3903. Did you bring that before the Court?—We had no means of doing so.

3904. Why did not you bring them before the Court?—We brought the whole case before your Lordship, and you suggested that the thing which had been manifestly done illegally was the altering of the church.

H. R. Droop,
Esq.
11 July 1867.

3905. You thought it was not wise to go into court unless you were sure to win?—We thought it a doubtful question, and that it would involve a good deal of expense.

3906. You have read the rubric as to vestments which has caused a good deal of trouble?—Yes.

3907. That does not affect your case in the least, does it?—No.

3908. So that no alteration or improvement of that would at all help you out of your difficulties?—No, certainly not.

3909. Do you conceive then that such difficulties are altogether irremediable?—If some one or other had authority to decide between a clergyman and his parishioners as to how the service shall be conducted, and had power to enforce that, the difficulty would be met.

3910. You mean to prevent changes being introduced at the arbitrary will of the clergyman?—Yes.

3911. Against the will of the congregation?—Yes, or, under some circumstances, against the will even of a minority of the congregation.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY IN THE CHAIR.

Rev. ARTHUR DOUGLAS WAGNER, M.A., called in and examined.

Rev.
A. D. Wagner,
M.A.
15 July 1867.

3912. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) You are, I believe, the incumbent of St. Paul's, Brighton?—I am the perpetual curate of St. Paul's, Brighton.

3913. I believe you have seen certain statements* which Mr. Clay has made in his evidence before us, with reference to your church?—Yes, I have a copy of his evidence in my pocket.

3914. Is there any part of that evidence, which you wish to comment upon or in reference to which you wish to vindicate yourself?—I have written down a few remarks and perhaps it would save time and ensure accuracy if I were to read them.

"It is with regret that I feel compelled to state in reference to Mr. Clay's evidence before the Ritual Commission, a copy of which has been kindly shown to me, that so far at least as it relates to St. Paul's church and to the clergy ministering there, I have every reason to think that it is most inaccurate if not at variance with the truth.

"My reasons for making this assertion are as follows:—

"(I.) I have not the smallest recollection myself of having ever conversed with any young lady, who would exactly answer to the description which Mr. Clay has given of the nameless heroine, if I may so term her, of his romance, nor has my curate Mr. Gibson. Mr. Payne, the other curate of St. Paul's, is now absent, and I have been unable to communicate with him, but I am quite sure from what I know of him that he would think more severely than I should of any person joining the Church of Rome, and that he at least cannot be the clergyman intended. There is no one else but we three who is at all likely to have heard the young lady's confession in the vestry of St. Paul's.

"(II.) Granting even the possibility of my having forgotten, amid the number of persons who have asked spiritual advice of me, a circumstance which occurred between three and four years ago, Mr. Clay's story carries on the face of it positive evidence of careless diction and of inaccuracy of statement, as I will venture briefly to point out: For

"(1.) Mr. Clay professes to relate to the Royal Commission certain facts which 'have come under his notice in the visitation of sick persons.' But his own words almost immediately following show that the story in question does not in the least correspond to this description, for he states how he came to know of it, i. e., he received a letter from a stranger who was then living in London. It was not, then, 'in the parochial visitation of the sick' that this 'fact' came under his notice.

"(2.) He says that the lady in question, in one of her attendances at a 'highly ritualistic church' formed the acquaintance of one of the clergy, and was invited to conversation in the vestry. Whatever may be thought of the felicity of Mr. Clay's description of St. Paul's church, on which, as being a mere matter of opinion, I offer no comment, I am quite sure that neither I myself, nor any of the clergy of St. Paul's, would have travelled out of our way to enter gratuitously into conversation with a lady personally unknown to us, unless she had herself asked us for advice, or had expressed some wish to speak to us. This may seem, and really is, a very small matter, but as the whole story from beginning to end is related in such a way as to represent us in the most odious light, I think I am justified in drawing attention to it.

"(3.) I am very confident that I have never said to any one seeking my spiritual advice that there were for him or her 'but these two alternatives, either infidelity or the Roman Church, for such is almost the exact opposite of my religious belief. I consider infidelity to be no alternative for any doubting Christian to adopt. Rather I look upon it as most detestable folly, and as wicked rebellion against Almighty God, and therefore I feel quite sure that I never made the silly observation imputed to me by Mr. Clay, nor as a matter of fact have I ever advised any person to communicate with a Roman Catholic priest in London or elsewhere for the resolution of his or her religious difficulties. Had I ever given such advice to any one seeking my counsel, I feel sure I should have recollected it.

"This is all that really concerns myself or the clergy of St. Paul's. I leave the refutation of the rest, as, for instance, Mr. Clay's statement that a Roman Catholic priest made it a condition of admission into the Roman Catholic Church that the person so admitted should keep the matter a secret, to common sense, and to those whom it may more immediately concern."

3915. How long have you been perpetual curate of St. Paul's, Brighton?—I was appointed to it in January 1850.

3916. Have you made any changes in the ritual since you came there?—There have been some changes since the church was opened. In the first instance there was no service on week days, and there was a Communion only once a fortnight. The choir at that time were not in surplices.

3917. Will you state what addition you have made to the services, as to the celebration of the Holy Communion, or anything with respect to ritual?—At the present time there is a celebration of the Holy Communion three times on the Sunday, and once on every week day. There are two evening services, one in the afternoon and the other in the evening. The last is an addition. The choir are in surplices.

3918. Have you any processions?—On great festivals the clergy walk into the chancel, in order, in surplices.

3919. Singing or chanting?—Sometimes singing a psalm or hymn.

3920. Are there any banners?—No.

3921. What is the number of your communicants on the great festivals and on ordinary Sundays?—On Easter Day the largest number we have had has been about 663. I think that was the largest.

3922. That is, in the three celebrations?—It was in four celebrations. On Easter Day we have an early celebration at five o'clock.

3923. What is the number on ordinary Sundays?—From 170 to 200. There were 170 yesterday, and probably there would be 30 or 40 more when the town is full.

3924. Is the service intoned?—Yes, when there is any clergyman who can do it. I cannot myself intone.

3925. What hymns do you use?—"Hymns Ancient and Modern," and "The Hymnal Noted." The two are bound up together.

3926. Do you introduce any hymn during the celebration of the Holy Communion?—No, none whatever.

3927. Have you a choral celebration sometimes?—On the Sunday, the Gloria in excelsis, the Creed, and the Sanctus are sung.

3928. Do you use the vestments?—No, not at the present time.

3929. In consecrating the elements, where do you stand?—In the front of the altar.

3930. Do you offer all the prayers in the Holy Communion in that position?—Yes, the whole facing east.

3931. Including the prayer for the Church militant?—Yes.

3932. Do you use incense?—No.

3933. Do you use the mixed chalice?—Yes.

3934. Do you use lights?—Yes.

3935. Will you tell me what lights you use and when you use them?—There are two lights. They are not on the altar but close to the altar. They are lighted at the celebration of the Holy Communion.

3936. Are they lighted at any time when they are not wanted for light?—Yes, they are always lighted at the Holy Communion.

3937. How many does your church hold?—About 1,200.

3938. At what services is it quite full, and at what services is it not quite full?—It is quite full at 11 o'clock in the morning and at 7 in the evening. It is not full at the other services; at these only a small number are present.

3939. You have services every day?—Yes.

3940. What number have you in the morning?—Does your Grace mean at the celebration of the Holy Communion, or at morning and evening prayer?

3941. At the celebration of the Holy Communion?—There are on the average about eight or ten communicants, and perhaps there may be five or six other persons. I should think the average would be sixteen or seventeen persons in the church, and about eight or ten communicants.

3942. Then you encourage persons to remain although they do not communicate?—Yes, I have done so.

3943. You encourage it?—Yes, I have often preached about it and begged them to do so.

3944. May I ask your reason for so doing?—I believe the Holy Eucharist to be the great act of Christian worship, the sacrifice of the New Covenant, and therefore every Christian ought to participate in it, and join with the priest in offering it to God.

3945. Is the offertory collected every day?—There is an offertory at every celebration of the Holy Communion, and at the morning and evening service on Sunday. There is an offertory at every service on Sunday.

3946. What does it amount to in the course of the year?—I think last year the offertory at St. Paul's was about 1,800*l*.

3947. What is that devoted to?—It is partly devoted to the payment of the church expenses, and the clergy, and partly to the relief of the poor.

3948. By "the clergy" do you mean some of the curates?—I have seven curates.

3949. Therefore the stipends of some of those curates are paid out of the offertory?—The pew rents and the offertory are all thrown into one common fund, and the curates are paid out of the joint fund, as are all the expenses of the church.

3950. What is the average number at the week day morning service?—I should think about 80, or from that to 100, would be an average morning congregation, and about the same in the evening. It of course varies very much, sometimes being a great many more, and sometimes less.

3951. What is the population of your district?—There are about 10,000, I think, in the district; then there are three other churches, temporary churches, all in the same district.

3952. They are a species of chapel of ease?—There is a clergyman for each one of them.

3953. He is not an independent incumbent?—No, I have no legal district, it is only a conventional district.

3954. The whole 10,000 constitute a conventional district?—Brighton is all one parish, and the vicar assigns certain portions of it for convenience to different clergymen, but it might all be changed at his wish.

3955. Therefore it is useless to ask you whether your congregations consist principally of persons from your own district?—It is impossible to say. There are a great many who come out of it, but they come from all parts of Brighton, and persons in my district go to other churches. The parochial system may be said to be extinct in Brighton.

3956. How are the alms to the poor, derived from the offertory, distributed; are they confined to your own district?—I divide them; they are partly given to the clergy and partly to the district visitors, and there is a large sum given to the support of St. Mary's hospital, which may really be considered as alms given to the district. Between 300*l.* and 400*l.* a year is given in that way. There are special offertories, on particular days, for that purpose, and the people know beforehand that the alms will be devoted to that.

3957. What is St. Mary's hospital?—It is a charitable institution, partly a penitentiary, partly an orphanage, and partly a nursery for poor children, and a school.

3958. I rather collect from your evidence that the alms are distributed in your own district?—Entirely. I give 50*l.* a year out of the alms to the vicar of the parish to do anything he likes with, and the rest is distributed by me.

3959. As far as concerns the poor it is confined to the poor of your own district?—Exclusively.

3960. You stated just now that you had seven curates, and as regards Mr. Clay's allegations you answered for two curates; can you answer for all the seven?—Four of them are not working in St. Paul's. It could not have happened to them. Mr. Gibson, Mr. Payne, and myself are the only three to whom it is at all likely to have happened. Of course I could not positively say so, but I feel as certain as possible that I am the person referred to by Mr. Clay. I am constantly in the church, and therefore any person who is wishing to speak would probably speak to me. I am there three or four days a week regularly for the very purpose of seeing people who wish for advice, or for hearing confessions.

3961. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) You have not told us the number of the communicants at your dependent chapels or churches?—There is a celebration of the Holy Communion every Sunday in each of them.

3962. At what hour?—I must go through them all; they vary.

3963. Generally are they 11 o'clock Communion or early Communion?—At one church they are alternately at half-past 7 o'clock, and at 11. At another there are two, one at eight and the other at 11.

3964. What have you observed as to the attendance of the poor at those early Communion? Do you get them there?—The poor who do communicate at all almost always go to the early Communion.

3965. The hour suits them?—The earlier the better. I have a Communion at half-past 6 on Sunday, and almost all the poor who do communicate come to that in preference to any other service. It is almost entirely poor people or servants at that hour.

3966. I suppose the length of the ordinary Sunday service also deters them?—It would interfere with their day's work.

3967. The length of an ordinary morning service and Communion following deters the poor?—I cannot say what is the reason, but they do, as a matter of fact, come to the earliest Communion that we have.

3968. They like an early hour?—Those who are communicants, I think, do.

3969. You think they come to an early Communion as readily as they would to an evening Communion?—I never tried an evening Communion, so I cannot say.

3970. Have you any separate litanies?—The litany on Sunday afternoon is said separately; the evening service follows it a few minutes afterwards.

3971. You never have it on a week day?—Not now; I used to have one separately.

3972. You have not told me the average attendance at the Sunday Communion in these churches or chapels?—In one of them it is about 30, in another about 20 or 15, and in another about 12.

3973. You have three such churches or chapels?—Yes.

3974. You did not include them in the estimate you gave his Grace?—No; they are quite separate.

3975. They are the upper and middle classes who attend the Communion in the middle of the day?—Yes, I think so.

3976. Have you any staff of district visitors?—Yes, there are some district visitors. The whole district is mapped out, but unfortunately there are often several districts vacant.

3977. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) You said that the vestments were not used at the present time; have they ever been used?—About eight or nine years ago I used them for about a year, and then the bishop wrote to me expressing his annoyance at it, and begged me to discontinue it, which I did, and have refrained from wearing them since, expecting a legal settlement of the whole matter. I have never raised the question since.

3978. What did your congregation think of your dropping them?—I should think that many of them must have been very sorry about it; many of them wished for them very much; but I have repressed any such expression of feeling as much as I could. I have no doubt that if I were to introduce them tomorrow they would be very glad to see them restored.

3979. (Rev. W. G. Humphry.) Do you use coloured stoles?—Yes.

3980. Do you change the colours with the season?—Yes.

3981. Do you change the stole in baptism?—I do not always do so. Do you mean during service?

3982. In the course of the service?—No.

3983. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) You spoke of confession; I think you acknowledge you practise confession?—Yes; I am always at the church for three days a week during certain hours for the purpose of hearing confessions, or of giving spiritual advice, as the case may be.

3984. Have you a confessional?—No, I hear them in the vestry.

3985. Do you require them to confess periodically?—I do not require anybody to confess. It is quite voluntary on the part of everyone.

3986. Do you exhort them to confess?—I have spoken of it as a great spiritual blessing, and advised people to confess.

3987. (Mr. J. Abel Smith.) Are penances imposed?—Whenever a person makes a confession, of course there is always some penance enjoined; it may be saying a prayer. It usually would be saying some one or two prayers. It would be one's duty to impose some penance or other.

3988. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) Do you impose any penance involving corporal pain?—It is not, perhaps, a question one ought to speak about. I have never myself, certainly, imposed any such penance, but I cannot say as to others.

3989. (Earl of Harrowby.) What form of absolution do you use?—The one in the Visitation of the Sick.

3990. (Mr. J. Abel Smith.) Do you always wear a surplice when you receive confession?—Always, and a stole.

3991. (Archbishop of Armagh.) Are you authorised by any rubric to use the form of absolution to which you have referred?—I conceive so. I could not at the moment say. Is not there some direction that that form of absolution is to be used in private confessions?

3992. In the first book of Edward the Sixth, but not in the second. It was purposely left out?—Its mention in the first book would indicate the practice of the Church, I suppose.

3993. (Earl of Harrowby.) I think you said that in the service of the church in addition to "Hymns Ancient and Modern," you used another book, "The Hymnal Noted;" does that contain a litany to Jesus?—No, it does not. There is a small appendix besides, containing a few hymns, in which it is. There are really three parts.

3994. You do not employ that litany to Jesus?—No, not in the service of the church.

3995. Do you recollect a hymn in that book in which are these lines—

“Faith of our fathers”—

invoking the faith of our fathers,

“Faith and prayer

Shall win our country back to Thee”?

—I think that is in our hymn book.

3996. What do you understand by that, that our country is to be won back to the faith of our fathers?—The hymn never has been used at St. Paul's. I believe it is in the book, but it never has been used. I do not recollect any occasion on which it has been used. I have not the slightest objection to answer the question. I think England has fallen away very grievously from Christianity, and one may very much wish that it should be restored again.

3997. You do not think “the faith of our fathers” means the Romish Church, and that we are to be won back to that?—I suppose it means that we shall be won back to the Catholic faith, which the Athanasian Creed says unless we believe we cannot be saved.

England has grievously fallen away from that in many points.

3998. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) With reference to the question that his Grace asked you just now about your other curates—Mr. Clay's statement is, that the fact which he referred to occurred between three and four years ago; have the other assistant curates, to whom you have not referred, come to you since that time?—Most of them have come since that time.

3999. Was any one of them there at that time?—No, I do not think so.

4000. What, as far as you know, has been the effect on the tradespeople in Brighton of the services at St. Paul's? Have any prejudices that they had been removed? Do they attend in any number?—My impression is that there is much less prejudice against it than there used to be; at one time it was extremely unpopular, but I do not think it is so at this moment.

4001. Of what does your choir consist; is it a voluntary choir?—Entirely so, all but one or two.

4002. What sort of persons are the young men in the choir?—Tradesmen's assistants, drapers' assistants, and young men of that kind; and one is in a grocer's shop.

The witness withdrew.

Adjourned.

WRITTEN EVIDENCE IN REFERENCE TO STATEMENTS BY THE REV. A. D. WAGNER AND J. DEVERELL ESQ.

REJOINDER from Rev. E. CLAY in reference to REMARKS by the Rev. A. D. WAGNER as to part of Mr. Clay's Evidence.

DEAR SIR,

Brighton, July 25, 1867.

I HAVE the honour to acknowledge your letter of the 23rd, and its enclosure of Rev. A. D. Wagner's evidence. You request me to “send in writing any rejoinder” I may desire to make.

i. I beg to say that in my evidence before the Royal Commission I did not name the Rev. A. D. Wagner as the clergyman who conversed with and confessed the young person I referred to. I distinctly stated I did not know, and do not to this day know, the name of the clergyman who addressed her.

ii. Whatever may be the worth of Mr. Wagner's criticism upon the “careless diction” and “inaccuracy of statement” which he says characterises my evidence, (mine being vivâ voce, his carefully prepared in writing,) I do again thus solemnly reassert the truth of the statement I made of this case before the Commission.

I solemnly declare, that as far as I can recall the facts and conversation, every word of the facts I mentioned were true. They were indelibly impressed on my mind and memory.

The letters were in my possession till lately, and my fear is that I destroyed them some nine months ago when moving my desks and books. I also have a vivid recollection of a personal interview with father, mother, and daughter.

It is impossible I could have been mistaken.

I do not attempt to account for Mr. Wagner's oblivion or ignorance of the case.

He admits “the possibility of having forgotten” it “amid the number of persons who have asked spiritual “advice of him”; and that he attends St. Paul's church three or four days a week regularly for the very purpose of “hearing confession.”

Whether Mr. Wagner was or was not the confessor and director, or one of his clergy past or present, I have not affirmed, not having evidence of such fact; but the statement made by me of what occurred to the young person, I repeat again, was related to me as having taken place in St. Paul's church, Brighton.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your faithful servant,

EDMUND CLAY.

W. F. Kemp, Esq.,
&c. &c.,

COMMENTS by the Rev. E. T. RICHARDS upon the Evidence of JOHN DEVERELL, Esquire.

2413.—Mr. Deverell's “short summary” refers to so many things in the history of church matters in the parish of Farlington during the last 23 years, that it becomes necessary, for the justification of my conduct as rector of the parish, to give some additional details. These details will, I believe, set Mr. Deverell's statement in an intelligible and true light.

I am glad of the opportunity of correcting the evidence,* but regret that matters of a personal character should have occupied so large a portion of his statement.

As long ago as 1826, it appeared to be a matter of first importance to have a chapel of ease at Purbrook, which is two miles distant from the parish church of Farlington, and contained a population of nearly 300 out of an otherwise widely scattered population of 790. The attempt to get one built failed through want of sufficient means.

In 1830 a site was offered, but before the plans could be matured a proposal to build a church at Waterloo, one mile distant from Purbrook, and just beyond the boundary of the parish, stopped all immediate prospect of building one in Purbrook.

In 1839—which was about the time that Mr. Deverell came to reside in the neighbourhood—I mentioned to the Bishop of Winchester my wish to get a church built in Purbrook, but his lordship was of opinion that a second church was not wanted.

It was about this time that I had my first interview with Mr. Deverell, when he immediately introduced the subject of the spiritual destitution of Purbrook, and asked me if I thought “that 400*l.* would be sufficient for the squire of the parish to contribute towards a chapel.” (I believe these were his very words.) I immediately replied that if he would guarantee that sum, I would undertake to get a chapel built within a year. Mr. Deverell said, “Oh! there is no hurry—I must build my house first—and then perhaps I shall give a great deal more.”

At a convenient opportunity, I renewed the subject, when the conversation turned upon whether the intended building should be consecrated, but Mr. Deverell maintained that it should be used in the double capacity of a chapel and a schoolroom, "because," he said, "if it does not answer, it may be converted to any common or profitable purpose, and there will be no loss of investment," or words to that effect. I insisted upon consecration as a sine quâ non, and Mr. Deverell declined to move further in the matter. This is what Mr. Deverell refers to when he says (2414) that the rector "observed to him several years ago, 'Do you think that I would do duty in an unconsecrated building?'"

Upon another occasion of my asking him to sell, he offered to give a site, but immediately added a condition upon which he said he had consulted, and had the concurrence in opinion of, Archdeacon Wilberforce, the present Bishop of Oxford, that the patronage of the intended chapel should be vested in the bishop of the diocese, and not in the rector of Farlington.

The real cause of Mr. Deverell's leaving his parish church will be found to partake more of a personal character than of a church question.

In his charge of September 1841 the Bishop of Winchester requested his clergy to preach sermons simultaneously during the next Advent season in behalf of the Diocesan Church Building Society, and at the same time strongly recommended for their perusal the charge of Archdeacon Samuel Wilberforce. When he had left the church I asked Dr. Dealtry, the Chancellor, if the Bishop meant to recommend the adoption of the offertory, which was mentioned in the Archdeacon's charge. He said he would ask the Bishop, and wrote that evening from Alverstoke Rectory to tell me of his lordship's sanction, with the proviso that in "reading the offertory . . . . . you will probably read also the prayer for the whole state of Christ's Church militant." During the following Advent I preached the sermon for the Diocesan Church Building Society, and announced my intention of raising a fund by means of the weekly offertory for the purpose of building either a church or schoolroom; or both, in the village of Purbrook. I quoted in that sermon the words of the Homily, "they builded, decked, and trimmed up their own houses, and suffered God's house to be in rain and decay," &c. I

1. Mr. Deverell says (2413), "From causes which I will explain differences arose between Mr. Hayes, the rector, and the Bishop. Mr. Hayes said, 'I understand you are not all very united in your church views here; I come for the sake of peace, and if any difference arises, I shall refer it to the Bishop.' The rector and patron said, 'I shall have the reference made to me.' Upon this Mr. Hayes resigned, and gave up the charge."

2. Mr. Deverell says (2414), "For four or five years there was a difference of opinion between the Bishop and the patron as to the incumbent being at liberty to follow the counsel of his Bishop if at variance with the directions of the patron."

3. Mr. Deverell says, "The Bishop said, 'If you can get the consent of the parishioners to have it made a chapel of had used the same words in a former sermon before Mr. Deverell came into the parish. Mr. Deverell had regularly attended his parish church of Farlington up to this day, when, on leaving the church, he said to his wife—I will give his own words, proclaimed to the famous vestry of March 1856, which is referred to in evidence (2414) "As I was leaving the church, I said to my wife ' . . . Mr. Richards has preached at me; we can never enter this church again.'" He has kept his word to the letter, as far as regards his attending the services.

In 1842 a site was obtained. It was conveyed to the Church Commissioners in 1849, under 58 & 59 Geo. 3, as the Act under which the chapel was to be built, and that Act expressly reserves to the rector those rights of which the Act 8 and 9 Victoria, which the Commissioners compelled me to adopt, has deprived me.

In 1843 the foundations of the new church were laid, and when, in the month of June, I wrote to the Bishop, informing him of my intention of "attaching it, either as a chapel of ease, or as a district church, to Farlington, according to the circumstances that may then" (when built) "exist to guide us," the Bishop replied that "as at present advised," he disapproved of the site, and that no church was wanted there at all. (Mr. Deverell says that the rector and patron of the parish did not coincide with him.) I had not asked his opinion for three or four years—since the time he declined to co-operate. I suggested that the rural dean should report upon the site, but the Bishop declined the interference. The work was accordingly suspended for more than a year. At length the Bishop gave his consent, upon the condition that the church should "be built entirely out of funds supplied by me or my personal friends."

The church was ready for consecration in 1850, when Mr. Hayes, at the recommendation of a mutual friend, was nominated by me to the Bishop to serve the church. He came to reside near Purbrook, although the church was not yet consecrated, and became acquainted with his neighbour, Mr. Deverell.

I will now answer severally such points in Mr. Deverell's evidence as seem to me to require a supplementary explanation.

1. My answer is, that Mr. Hayes agreed that it would be right to carry out in Purbrook Church the Rubrics of the Prayer Book, and five points were specially noted.—Daily Service; The Offertory; Baptism after the 2nd Lesson; Catechising after the 2nd Lesson at Evening Prayer, and Observance of Feasts and Fasts.

After some months' residence at Purbrook, Mr. Hayes, without any previous intimation of a change in his opinions, wrote that he thought it right to inform me that in case a difference of opinion should hereafter arise between him and his parishioners respecting the offertory, he should feel it his duty to appeal to the Bishop, and abide by his decision. I maintained, in the words of my unanswered letter to the Bishop (5th May 1852), that—

I considered the Prayer Book express, the point important, and the Bishop not endued with any power to dispense with what is "not contrary to anything contained in this book" of Common Prayer, "having also, with your Lordship's express sanction, through the late Dr. Dealtry, commenced it in my own church ten years ago, and continued it ever since, so that there could be nothing new or startling to the congregation of Purbrook." Mr. Hayes simply demurred to my opinion, and resigned, informing the Bishop of what he had done.

2. The Bishop hesitated to consecrate, although I twice wrote to explain that the opinion which I had expressed to Mr. Hayes was founded upon my interpretation of the law of the Church. I got no answer for five long years, when at the instance of my churchwarden, Captain Aldham, R.N., an opening was made for my addressing the Bishop again. I then submitted to the terms insisted on by the Bishop, viz., "that I should abstain from pledging my curate or substitute to any particular course in the case supposed," and I added, "that all along it had been very far from my wish to write or act in a spirit of opposition to his lordship." The Bishop concluded his correspondence by writing (2nd February 1856),—

"I may truly say that while adopting myself the course which I considered my duty imperatively required, I am not conscious of having entertained the least unfriendly feeling towards you, so, on the other hand, have I never thought that there was anything intended personally against myself in your own line of conduct; nor have I had any cause to complain of the manner in which you maintained your views, although I could not agree in respect to them."

3. A few days before the vestry was held—it was convened in the usual legal way—resident ratepayers, repreease . . . . . I cannot resist it. But you must get the vote of a vestry. . . . . A vestry was convened with unusual speed. . . . . A division took place in the vestry. . . . . I had 74 votes, and the rector had 14.

senting more than 50 votes, expressed to my curate, Mr. Winwood, to Captain Aldham, my churchwarden, and to myself, their readiness to attend the vestry, and vote for opening the church, to be under my control as a chapel of ease. All (not including Mr. Deverell's immediate dependants, with whom we did not interfere,) seemed to be unanimous. There was no surmise of any opposition, except a lurking fear that Mr. Deverell, who invariably opposed me, might thwart at last what we thought so nearly accomplished. But to my surprise, I was informed the night before the vestry, that Mr. Deverell's emissaries had been round the parish and induced the voters to come forward and take his side for a "District Church." Nobody knew the meaning of the word "District"—it was the first time it had been mentioned. The vestry took place, when Mr. Deverell, as—to use his own words—"one of the leading parishioners, I may say, the leading parishioner," obtained the majority for a district. There were many of these 74 votes given by persons resident six miles distant from the parish—some who never attended any place of worship. There were women brought up to vote, and labourers of Mr. Deverell, who, on account of their poverty, had never paid rates before, the collector having been placed at the churchyard gate for the purpose of receiving the rates. Moreover, these voters had all been invited to dine at the public-house to which the vestry was adjourned, and rabbit-shooting was promised to the men the next day. To show that the votes of the vestry did not represent the real feeling and wishes of the inhabitants of Purbrook, a memorial to the Bishop, written spontaneously by one of the poorest, and immediately responded to three or four days after the vestry, by almost every one in the district, is here given—a literal copy. It speaks the unforced feelings of those amongst whom my principal parochial work had been exercised for so many years.

"My Lord,

"We, the undersigned, of the vilage of Purbrook, do feel disappointed at the prospect of having our Church withheld from us. we feel the disappointment the more keenly from being led to suppose we should so shortly have had the pleasure of seeing it opened to us. could your Lordship come amongst us your Lordship would see how much the Church is wanted, being in the vilage, and the Parish Church quite at the extremity. Two miles, my Lord, is a long distance for the aged and infirm, with a long hill to climb, the consequence of which keeps many from Church who would be very thankful to go.

"wishing to be where for many years under our true and faithful minister, who have always been kind towards us. he still wishing to continue his kindness by trying his best efforts to have the gospel preached to us at our vilage Church.

"most humbly beging your Lordship to pardon this intrusion, & praying your Lordship to carry out your Lordship's intention of condescending to come and consecrate our Church of ease to Farlington, we remain, my Lord, your Lordship's most humble and obedient servants."

4. I was not aware, before I read this evidence, that the Bishop had endorsed Mr. Deverell's proposal previously to its being laid before the Church Commissioners, for his Lordship had wished me success when he told me to convene a vestry, because he could not legally consecrate without the consent of the parishioners.

Mr. Deverell's alleged correspondence with the Bishop seems to account for the rejection by the Church Commissioners of my earnest protest against the injustice about to be inflicted upon me and that portion of my parishioners, which was the mainspring of my parochial work.

After a long and fruitless endeavour to induce the Commissioners to reverse their decision as to the district, or to state the reasons for what they were doing, after my request to be allowed to appear before them in person (as it now appears that Mr. Deverell had done when he had the privilege of "carrying in his proposal" to the sitting Commissioners), had been rejected without any reason being assigned, I appealed, as a last resort, to my Bishop, in the hope that his influence would be able to prevent the injustice of removing from me the mainspring of my parochial work, which was about to be inflicted. The Bishop's answer was that "the subject had undergone the fullest consideration, and the more fully I have examined it, the more fully I have been confirmed in the opinion that a district should be assigned," &c.

5. On the day of consecration, March /58, the Bishop sent for me to speak about the churchyard fence, which he had been informed was in an untidy state. Mr. Sumner, the chancellor, then entered, and told him that there was an embroidered green silk covering for the altar, and candlesticks (there was no super-altar), when his lordship informed me that both the embroidered green silk covering and the candlesticks were "contrary to the judgment."—

4. Mr. Deverell says, "I went to the Bishop . . . and said, 'Here is my proposal to build and endow a Church.' He said, 'I will endorse that proposal.' The Church Commissioners were then sitting, and I carried in the proposal, sanctioned by the Bishop. The Bishop said, 'He must either have Purbrook Church consecrated, or your offer will be accepted.' I corresponded with the Bishop, and in 1855 this Church was at last consecrated."

5. The Bishop also took off the communion cloth, which he considered too gaudy; there were also some candlesticks, and these he required to be removed. I believe . . . there was a super-altar.

6. Mr. Peel was nominated . . . I went to him by the Bishop's order (I was then churchwarden of Purbrook) . . . He was then at the rector's house, and I presented him with a memorial, signed by nine-tenths of the parishioners . . . 2418 . . . That memorial was . . . presented by me. He said, "I will not receive it." I put it down on the chair in the rector's presence. Mr. Peel threw the address down on the carpet. I picked it up, and was then shown out of the room. This is a plain, unexaggerated statement.

7. Mr. Peel . . . after a lapse of some months, retired from the scene altogether, and a Mr. Barker was put in. . . . At the expiration of six months he also retired.

8. I selected a minister from Gloucester, who had been seven years in one church there.

9 (2415). Candlesticks, the super-altar, and the vases which the Bishop had ordered to be removed . . . I removed these things, &c.

10. To prove that I was a good churchman . . . I went to the parish church, the district church in the morning, and I went to my own church in the evening.

11 (2420). In what year did you finally absent yourself from the parish church? . . . It was in 1860 . . . at the parish church of Widley.

12 (2486.) . . . Farlington Church? Are there any ritual practices there now which you object to?

I thought differently,* but the Bishop persisted in his opinion, and ordered the Chancellor to have them removed. He then selected a brown cloth table-cover, highly embroidered with many-coloured flowers, from the drawing-room of his host, and ordered it to be placed on the altar. The rejected green silk has the frontal embroidered with flowers of gold thread; it had been borrowed from Mr. Keble, and was probably seen by the Bishop when he reopened Hursley Church, after its restoration in 1846.

6. Mr. Deverell told Mr. Peel that the memorial had been signed at a public meeting convened by him in his schoolroom. It appeared, however, that Mr. Deverell had returned home on Monday afternoon, June 21, the very day on which the memorial was signed, and the day after Mr. Peel had read himself in . . . and immediately sent his emissaries round to the villagers to require their attendance at his schoolroom in the evening . . . the memorial was the result, and when presented to Mr. Peel, rejected upon the ground that it was not a public memorial; for Mr. Peel remarked that he had done duty in Purbrook Church on Sunday, and had been in and out of the village and immediate neighbourhood, looking for a house, during the past week, and had heard nothing about this memorial. He handed it back to Mr. Deverell, and in so doing it fell to the ground, on account of Mr. Deverell's suddenly withdrawing his hand. This is corroborated by a letter which I have received from Mr. Peel; he says, "I certainly was not guilty of the discourtesy of throwing it on the floor; it fell, and I perfectly well remember picking it up, and putting it on his hat, which was on a chair. You certainly did not in my hearing tell him to leave the house." Mr. Deverell's angry words, accompanied with violent gesticulation, and the oft-repeated threat, "You shall hear of this again in the newspapers," were such as to attract the attention of persons both within and without the house.

7. The reason for Mr. Peel's and Mr. Barker's retiring was that the Bishop served them with monitions either to reside within the district, or resign within a fortnight, and there was no house in which a gentleman with a family could reside.

8. Mr. Deverell announced through a newspaper that he had appointed a minister of the Church of England, from St. Mary's Chapel, Gloucester, to officiate in his church of Christ's Church, Purbrook. The real fact was that he was a preacher in a Lady Huntingdon's meeting house in St. Mary's Square, not Chapel, Gloucester.

On being called upon to explain, Mr. Deverell wrote to a newspaper that Mr. Roberts—the Huntingdonian preacher—was "a regularly ordained minister of the Church of England, although not episcopally ordained—the difference being that a regularly ordained minister was a regular minister, and episcopally ordained was one who was subject to Parliament."

9 (2415). Mr. Deverell had reported that these articles of church furniture were in use, but while, in compliance with the Bishop's order, he had removed the candlesticks and vases, some one told him that he had not removed the super-altar, when he asked "Which is the super-altar?"

10. Mr. Deverell ought to have added another incident as evidence of his boasted churchmanship. He was not content in attending the parish church at times, but in order to palm off the cheat the better on his ignorant tenants and followers, he went so far as to seek for them by indirect means, through the agency also of one of his Church of England clergymen, the rite of confirmation at the hands of the Bishop of Winchester! This act of profane deceit—most strict secrecy having been enjoined upon the candidates—was happily discovered; the Bishop informed, just in time, after he had entered the church; and the girls from Mr. Deverell's meeting-house at Purbrook were ordered by his lordship to put on their bonnets and leave the church at Fareham.

11. The parish church of Widley has nothing to do either with the parish of Farlington or the district church of Purbrook. Mr. Deverell absented himself from his parish church of Farlington since December 1841. He then attended St. George's Chapel, Waterloo, adjoining this parish, but in the course of years difficulties arose between him and the incumbent, and the incumbent resigning, another incumbent was appointed, whom he afterwards wished to nominate to Purbrook. On account of some fresh difficulties he took refuge in the less congenial parish church of Widley.

12. I have already stated the reason why Mr. Deverell did "not attend the services in Farlington Church," viz., because he supposed that I had preached at him. He here

* See the case of Westerton v. Liddell.

After what you have heard of how I have been received at Farlington Rectory, and various circumstances that have occurred there, and if I were, to tell you all that took place over the tomb of my wife, which I do not wish to do, you would see I could not go there. I should rather go nowhere.

gives, amongst other allegations, the reason of leaving Farlington Church, a scene over his wife's tomb. It would be utterly wrong and improper in me to introduce what "took place over the tomb of my wife" into the matter fairly before the Ritual Commission, but as there is so much wrong implied in this oft-repeated, even before a public vestry, and there refuted accusation, I must be pardoned for stating briefly the history of this personal virus. Mr. Deverell erected a tomb without asking permission to do so, and instructed the mason whom he employed to take especial care not to show me the inscription, which both he and the mason knew to be an invariable custom whenever a monument was erected, either by rich or poor. No scene "took place over the tomb," but I remonstrated with the mason in my house. To avoid asking my permission Mr. Deverell applied for a faculty to complete the tomb, and was chagrined at being obliged to ask it at last. In connexion with this case is an unfounded complaint about exorbitant fees charged for the vault of this lamented lady, but really I do not feel that I am called upon to enter upon all these personalities. I am quite ready to explain and defend my conduct under all personal collisions with him, but these hardly affect the question before the Commission, which is restricted to an examination of what concerns the ritual of my parish.

The ritual of my parish is, what it has been for years, and just such as prevails in the vast majority of English country parishes. The dilapidated state of the church itself would ill accord with any increased ritualism in respect of the services.

I will conclude what I have to say by summing up briefly under distinct heads the points which are touched upon in the above answers, of which I have evidence in my possession, and which I am ready to produce.

1. The scheme for a new church in the parish at Purbrook was bond fide on my part.

2. This scheme was opposed by Mr. Deverell on personal grounds, as shown by himself, disliking me because of the alleged preaching at him, the scene "over the tomb of my wife," and the like.

3. Mr. Deverell, on his own showing, was not satisfied that the rubrics of the Prayer Book should be carried out in this church, whereas I felt it to be my duty to take care that in a new church more care should be had to the due observance of these rubrics than in the old building had been found practicable. Hence arose a deep-seated opposition on the part of Mr. Deverell.

4. Mr. Deverell has made it appear that he had enlisted the Bishop on his side, who threw all manner of hindrances in the way of the consecration and establishment of the church, and used his influence with the Church and Ecclesiastical Commissioners so as ultimately to force from me unfair terms, of which I all along disapproved.

5. The whole of Mr. Deverell's case shows a persistent maintenance of his claim to dictate to me how the church of Purbrook should be administered, not by the law of the Church but by the predilections and fancies of Mr. Deverell, who is practically a Dissenter—a claim which never for an instant could be conceded.

6. The animus of Mr. Deverell is declared by his acts—the acts of a Dissenter, for he has established a schism—avowedly setting up a Huntingdonian Dissenter, though calling himself a clergyman of the English Church—that "church" being a meeting-house, and nothing more than a centre of division and sin, whereby he has attempted to delude everybody, from the Bishop and Admiral Grey down to the poorest labourer in the village.

7. Nothing can possibly justify this, and nothing approaches to the justification of it; for Purbrook Church is not an extreme place, and at Farlington there is no "ritual" at all; while at Waterloo and other neighbouring churches there is to be found the most complete abeyance of the full requirements of order and law of the English branch of the Catholic Church of Christ.

Most of this portion of Mr. Deverell's evidence may be described as an exhibition of personal feeling against the rector of his parish, and of a strange misconception of the English Church as exhibited in the Book of Common Prayer.

BELOVED BRETHREN,

We have viewed with the deepest anxiety the troubles, suspicions, and discontents which have of late in some parishes accompanied the introduction of ritual observances exceeding those in common use amongst us.

We long indulged the hope that, under the influence of charity, forbearance, and a calm estimate of the small importance of such external forms, compared with the blessing of united action in the great spiritual work which is before our Church, these heats and jealousies might, by mutual concessions, be allayed. But since the evil still exists, and in one most important feature has assumed a new and more dangerous character, we feel that it is our duty to try whether an earnest and united address on our part may tend, under the blessing of God, to promote the restoration of peace and harmony in the Church.

The principal point in dispute is this:—Whether, where the letter of the rubric seems to warrant a measure of ritual observance, which yet, by long, and possibly by unbroken practice, has not been carried out, the Clergy are either in conscience required, or absolutely at liberty to act each upon his own view of the precept, rather than by the rule of common practice. Now as to this question we would urge upon you the following consideration: “First, that any change of usages with which the religious feelings of a congregation have become associated, is in itself so likely to do harm, that it is not to be introduced without the greatest caution. Secondly, that beyond this, any change which makes it difficult for the congregation at large to join the service is still more to be avoided. Thirdly, that any change which suggests the fear of still further alterations is most injurious; and, Fourthly, that according to the rule laid down in the Book of Common Prayer, “where anything is doubted, or diversely taken,

“concerning the manner how to understand, do, and execute the things contained in that book, the parties that so doubt or diversely take anything, shall always resort to the Bishop of the diocese, who, by his discretion shall take order for the quieting and appeasing of the same, so that the same order be not contrary to anything contained in that book.”

The fair application of these principles would, we believe, solve most of the difficulties which have arisen. It would prevent all sudden and startling alterations; and it would facilitate the reception of any change which was really lawful and desirable. We would, therefore, first urge upon our Reverend Brethren, with affectionate earnestness, the adoption of such a rule of conduct. We would beseech all who, whether by excess or defect, have broken in upon the uniformity and contributed to relax the authority of our ritual observances, to consider the importance of unity and order, and by common consent to avoid whatever might tend to violate them. In recommending this course as the best under present circumstances, we do not shut our eyes to the evil of even the appearance of any discrepancy existing between the written Law and the practice of the Church. But there are many cases where the Law may be variously interpreted; and we believe that we are best carrying out her own principles, in urging you to have recourse, in all such cases, to the advice of her chief pastors.

But, beyond mere attempts to restore an unusual strictness of ritual observance, we have to deal with a distinct and serious evil. A principle has of late been avowed and acted on, which, if admitted, would justify far greater and more uncertain changes. It is this: That, as the Church of England is the ancient Catholic Church settled in this land before the Reformation, and was then reformed only by the casting away of certain strictly defined corruptions; therefore, whatever form, or usage, existed in the Church before its Reformation, may now be freely introduced and observed, unless there can be alleged against it the distinct letter of some formal prohibition.

Now, against any such inference from the undoubted identity of the Church before and after the Reformation, we feel bound to enter our clear and unhesitating protest. We believe that at the Reformation, the English Church not only rejected certain corruptions; but also, without in any degree severing her connexion with the ancient Catholic Church, intended to establish one uniform ritual, according to which her public services should be conducted. But it is manifest that a licence, such as is contended for, is wholly incompatible with any uniformity of worship whatsoever, and at variance with the universal practice of the Catholic Church, which has never given to the officiating ministers of separate congregations any such large discretion in the selection of ritual observances.

We therefore beseech any who may have proposed to themselves the restoration of what, under sanction of this principle, they deemed a lawful system, to consider the dangers which it involves; to see it in its true light, and to take a more just and sober view of the real position of our Church; whilst, with equal earnestness, we beseech others who, either by intentional omission, or by neglect and laxity, may have disturbed the uniformity and weakened the authority of our prescribed ritual, to strengthen the side of order by avoiding all unnecessary deviations from the Church's rule.

Such harmony of action, we are persuaded, would, under God's blessing, go far towards restoring the peace of the Church. This happy result would more clearly exhibit her spiritual character. The mutual relations of her various members would be more distinctly perceived, and our lay brethren would more readily acknowledge the special trust commanded to us, as stewards of the mysteries of God, “for the “edifying of the body of Christ.” They would join with us in asserting, and, if need be, defending for themselves, as much as, for us, the true spiritual freedom of the Church. They would unite with us in a more trustful spirit, and therefore with a more ready will, in enlarging her means and strengthening her powers for the great work she has to do amongst the swarming multitudes of our great towns at home, and of our vast dominions abroad; and that Church which has so long received from the hands of God such unequalled blessings, might continue to be, yea and become more and more, “a praise in the earth.”

Address of the Bishops.

Having thus gone through the principal doctrinal matters, to which our attention has recently been called, I must not omit to say a few words in respect to ritual differences.

It was my misfortune to be unable to concur with the great majority of the Bishops in an Address which they have set forth on this subject to the Clergy of their Dioceses. If ritual differences were the principal matters which at present cause divisions amongst us, I should fully recognise the fitness of such an united effort to produce harmony.

But is this the fact? Is it not rather true that differences on incomparably higher matters, grave questions of doctrine, are those which really interfere with the unity and peace of the Church?

Is it then accordant with the true dignity—or even very manifestly consistent with the first duty—of Bishops, to close their eyes, and seal their mouths, against the daring violation of an article of the Creed, and to look at nothing but little ritual irregularities?

These are matters which, so far as they may transgress the laws of the Church, ought, in my opinion, to be dealt with by every Bishop in his own diocese; for they cannot be dealt with justly or effectively without looking to the specialities of every particular case. When, therefore, zeal for “the faith once delivered to the saints” was insufficient to draw from us a declaration of our adherence to Catholic truth in the great article of “One Baptism for the remission of Sins,” and of our determination to stand by the plain, dogmatic teaching of our Church, that “the inward and spiritual grace” of that sacrament is “a death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness,”—I deemed it little short of mockery to put forth an united address to our clergy, praying them to submit to us, as doubts, these small matters, many of which do not seem to them to be doubtful at all.

Neither could I join in “entering a clear and unhesitating protest against the principle, that as the Church of England is the ancient Catholic Church settled in this land before the Reformation, and was then reformed only by the casting away of certain strictly defined corruptions, therefore whatever form or usage existed in the Church before its reformation may now be freely introduced and observed, unless there can be alleged against it the distinct letter of some formal prohibition.”

To this principle (making reasonable allowance for the terms in which it is expressed—not by those who profess, but by those who condemn it) I am disposed to ascribe much of weight and justice. Where any office in the prescribed ritual, though not in express words, yet in its plain spirit, or according to the analogy of the service-book in general, rejects an ancient usage or practice, which it may be attempted to engraft upon it anew, there I should think the attempt unreasonable or culpable.

But where no prohibition, expressed or implied, and no reason drawn from the particular office, or from the general tone and nature of our Liturgy, is opposed to the introduction of a Catholic usage practised before Edward the Sixth’s reign, I am not prepared to say that such a thing is always improper—much less merits the reprobation of the whole episcopal body.

The Convocation of 1640, in its eighth canon, distinctly recognises the principle, against which my Right Reverend Brethren, out of Convocation, have felt it their duty to protest. That canon “commends it to all good and well-affected people, members of this Church, that they be ready to tender unto the Lord—acknowledgment, by doing reverence and obeisance, both at their coming in and going out of the said churches—according to the most ancient custom of the primitive Church in the purest times, and of this Church also for many years of the reign of Queen Elizabeth.”

Nay, that the practice of “doing due and lowly reverence, when in time of divine service the name of the Lord Jesus shall be mentioned,” had been observed before any canon or rubric ordered it, is plain from the order itself given in the 18th canon of 1603, which expressly says of the practice, “as hath been accustomed.”

In truth, on what other principle can we justify our own most proper and edifying service at the consecrating of every new Church? Where is the modern canon which enjoins or authorizes it?

For these reasons, and for others which it is not necessary to state, I ventured to urge my brethren to relinquish the proposed letter to the clergy—a measure which seemed to me manifestly nugatory, and which professes to be excused only by the common-place phrase “under present circumstances”—and instead of it I advised, that, as honest churchmen and faithful bishops, we should go to the foot of the throne, there dutifully lay before her Majesty a plain statement of what those “present circumstances” are—the country agitated from one extremity to another by religious differences—all confidence in the rulers of the Church shaken—individual clergymen and laymen flying from the communion of such a Church, by reason of the paralysis under which it seems to them to be dragging on a worthless and lifeless existence;—a widely extended suspicion that many more—some it may be of our very best, most learned, most attached brethren—will soon follow; above all, I proposed that we should submit to her Majesty, that the only reasonable hope of staying the progress of the contagion is, that she will be graciously pleased, in accordance with the practice of the best and wisest of her predecessors, and with the dictates of constitutional law, to call together the authorities of the Church in Convocation, and empower and require them to deliberate on the existing evils, and devise and submit for her Majesty’s sanction such remedies as to their united wisdom shall seem meet.

To do less than this seemed to me, I repeat, nugatory; to affect to heal our manifold disorders by a few honeyed words, and an appeal to feelings and good nature against a professed principle, seemed to be worse than nugatory—to endanger that portion of public respect which is still conceded to us—and, worst of all, to expose the high office, which we bear, to lasting dishonour and degradation.

But although I thus decline to subscribe the Episcopal Address, and while I fully admit the right of the clergy to practise all that is not forbidden by the law of the Church, while, too, I would applaud the exercise of that right to the utmost, whensoever their own people agree with them in its exercise,—I yet am bound to warn them of the rashness of exercising it against the liking and without the concurrence of their people.

Will they say that the practices which they use are only the outward expression, familiar in the ancient Church, of Catholic feelings and Catholic principles—feelings and principles which are their own; I answer, that they ought to consult, not for the indulgence of their own feelings, but for the edification of their people. Common worship ought to be the expression of common feeling. If they are anxious that their people should join them in the outward expression of high Catholic feeling, let them wait till they shall be enabled by God’s blessing to elevate the tone of their people’s devotion to a level with their own. Meanwhile let them be cautious how they call on them to join in practices, which suit not lower, that is ordinary, feelings. To act otherwise is in the strictest sense of the word preposterous: it is to place an effect before its proper cause; to force the expression of sentiments which are not yet, and cannot soon or easily be inculcated—nay, against which any premature attempt to inculcate them can hardly fail to raise an insuperable obstacle.

Yet there is one consideration which must not be omitted.

It may be truly urged, that the common prayer of the faithful being not primarily nor chiefly designed to edify man, but to worship God, and God having been pleased to reveal to us something respecting the worship of Him in heaven—that it is formal, ceremonial, aye, and musical, choral, antiphonal—divine worship upon earth ought to be a representation, after our poor measure, of what we read of the worship of the heavenly hosts. It is easy, therefore, to conceive a state of feelings in a parish, which ought not to regulate the service of the Church; which ought not to be allowed to prescribe what is sometimes called the plainness and simplicity of Protestant worship. Let us hope, however, that these cases are not only exceptional, but also rare.

Neither am I disposed to recommend any consideration of popular feeling, beyond the particular congregation intrusted to the minister’s charge. If that congregation prefers a more ornate or elaborate service than many or all the parishes around it, I should consider it an invasion of Christian and even of civil liberty, to control the services of any Church at the bidding of those who do not belong to it. Yet instances have of late been very frequent, in which the prejudices and passions of a whole town have been made to bear on some peaceful portion of it, assembling under their proper pastor, and worshipping God with more of reverential and, it may be, ceremonial observance, than accords with the devotional habits and taste of their neighbours. In the metropolis, we know, this tyrannical and domineering spirit has led to outrages disgraceful to a civilized people. I wish I could add, that we have ourselves witnessed no instances of a similar kind.

But, without alluding to particular cases, let me make one general remark. Where the congregation consists mainly of the poorest orders, there we commonly observe a great love of a majestic and even elaborate service. The ornaments of their Church—the storied glass—the painted and it may be gilded walls—the Table of the Lord, elevated above the rest, and decked with sober yet costly furniture—the pealing organ—the chanted Psalms—the surpliced choristers—the solemnity of the whole ritual—gladdens, while it elevates, their minds; they recognize in it their own high privilege as Christians, and rejoice to find themselves equal participants with their richest neighbours in the homage thus paid to the common Lord and Father of all. In truth, when we consider the little which the poor man has to delight his heart, and touch his imagination, in his own squalid home, we ought to rejoice that he can find enjoyment in the House of Prayer, his Father's House. For this reason, few occurrences have affected me more, than the lamentations of the poor worshippers in one of the districts of the metropolis, when they saw, or thought they saw, at the dictation of a riotous and lawless mob of strangers, the approaching surrender of the ritual which they loved, and which was their weekly—to many among them the daily—solace of that poverty to which the providence of God had consigned them. Incidents such as this cannot be separated from the general character of the proceedings of the past winter. The rioters at St. Barnabas's were stimulated to their violence by the words and deeds of men of a far higher order than their own.

In particular, at a meeting held at the Freemasons' Hall on December 5, 1850, over which a Noble Lord, justly renowned for his benevolence, presided, the following were a few of many things which may well excite the attention of sober members of our Church. The Noble Chairman himself opened the proceedings with a speech, in which, having first declared himself strongly against the then recent "Papal Aggression," he thus proceeded:—"But enough of this outside mischief; let us turn our eyes to that which is within" (great cheering and waving of hats)—"from Popery in flower to Popery in the bud" (cheers and laughter)—"from the open enemy to the concealed traitor—from the menace that is hurled at our Church to the doctrine that is preached from our pulpits—from the foreign assailant to the 'foes that are of a man's own household.'" He then enlarged on "the manifest tendency in many of our clergy in faith and practice to the faith and practice of the Church of Rome"—"the adoption of rites, ceremonies, and language fitted only to a Popish meridian—the teaching of false and heretical doctrines—the practice of auricular confession—the most monstrous perhaps of all the monstrous practices of the Roman system"—(with what knowledge of our English system and of the Word of God, on which it is founded, this particular was thus dealt with, we have already seen; but he adduced another instance)—"the sacerdotal forgery of a sacrificing priesthood, and the necessary and inevitable train of abominable superstitions." (Great cheering.)

Now upon this, if anything I could say should be deemed worthy of the attention of this Christian nobleman, I would ask one or two questions. Does his Lordship mean by "a sacrificing priesthood" those priests who profess to offer any sacrifice except "the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving"—and the "commemorative sacrifice," or rather the commemoration of the sacrifice of our Blessed Lord? If he does, let him name any one such priest within the Church of England. I myself never heard of one, nor do I believe that his Lordship ever did. But if by the phrase he refers merely to those who claim the Divine commission to consecrate the elements at the Lord's Supper, and offer "the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving," and the commemorative sacrifice—then I must not be afraid to tell him, that, before he sets himself up as a "Master of our Israel," it would be well for him to inform himself in the rudiments of our system.

The Noble Lord was followed by a gallant officer, who, with a hardihood which might be not unsuitable to him on other occasions, was pleased to say, "I do not like the professions of the Tractarians in this matter—what had they done with reference to the Papal Aggression? They called it 'Schism.' They only employed that nice, convenient, little word 'Schism.'"

This gentleman, I doubt not, goes to church. Now it might be a matter of some curiosity to ascertain whether it ever crossed his mind, that schism—from which he every Sunday prays to be delivered—is a sin? and that therefore to condemn the Pope's brief as an act of schism, was not only the most appropriate course for bishops and priests to take, but was also a far graver condemnation than could be pronounced by the greatest masters of vituperation on all the platforms of all the halls in London? Did it also ever occur to him to inquire, what is the nature and how wide the comprehension of that sin? above all, how near an approach to it he makes, who indulges in ignorant and fanatical abuse of the rulers and ministers of the Church to which he professes to belong?

Of the other speakers, the most eminent in rank, and probably in knowledge, was a noble Earl, who distinguished himself by the coolness and caution with which he spoke. He knew enough of the Articles and Liturgy of his Church to have some grave misgivings lest the doctrines and practices which had called forth the indignant eloquence of those who had preceded him were really authorized by that Church. He therefore said, "We have a right to ask of the rulers of the Church, and ascertain for our own satisfaction, and beyond a doubt, whether the practices complained of are according to the laws and canons of our Church (cheers). If they are, then I say it is our bounden duty—holding the opinions we hold as to the Gospel of Christ—to endeavour to get these laws altered" (cheers), "and our beloved Church purified from these errors." (Loud cheers.) His Lordship further said, "That we should endeavour by some means or other to check the progress of these opinions, either by a determined expression of our own views, or some other course, I am convinced is right."

Now on this, by far the most important speech of the day, we may be permitted to ask the following questions: Did the noble Earl, and those whom he addressed, do what he said "it was their bounden duty" to do? Did they "ask the rulers of their Church" the questions which they were bound to ask? Which of those rulers, if any, did they ask? What answers did they receive to their inquiries? Again, has he, or those who act with him, yet made up their minds what course they shall take to "check the opinions" which he complains of, and to "purify their beloved Church from its errors?" Is that course "a determinate expression of their own views?" Have they any views in which they agree? If they have, what are those views, and, above all, what are "their Church's errors?" An answer to these questions would probably be very useful to the cause of truth, aye, and of peace; for they might test the real authority of the Theology of Freemasons' Hall.

This meeting must yet detain me a little longer. One of the speakers, seconding a vote of thanks to the chairman, after complimenting those who had preceded him "on sentiments so sound, and principles so Christian" as they had delivered, expressed his regret that sentiments equally sound, and principles equally Christian, had "not proceeded from him who occupied the most distinguished position in that diocese." (Cheers.) "Had the Bishop of London," (hissing and excitement,) "had that prelate expressed his disapprobation of that which had been the cause of their now assembling together, he firmly believed they would not have had to enter their present protest." (Cheers.)

It was immediately after this hissing and excitement at the bare mention of their Bishop, that the noble chairman, in acknowledging the honour done to him by their vote of thanks, said, "While he thanked them most sincerely for this mark of their esteem, he most fervently thanked Almighty God who had called him to preside over such a meeting, and to be in some measure a leader in such a work; and he did thank God emphatically, because he gathered from the expressions which had been used, from the manner in which they had received the resolutions, and from the manner in which they had received the heart-stirring addresses of the speakers, that this was no passing sentiment, no evanescent determination," &c.

Now, why have I dwelt on this meeting? Certainly not for the purpose of exposing, what most of us must think, the absurdity, and, as we have been sorry to see, the profaneness, of some of its sayings—but to mark one of its results—a result far more important, than has followed from any or all the other meetings which the late popular fever called forth. No fewer than 320,000 signatures are said to have been appended to the address to her Majesty which emanated from it, headed by many most respectable noblemen, members of Parliament, and other distinguished laymen. That those who signed this address approved the language used at the meeting, or were generally cognizant of it, I do not believe; but such a manifestation of feeling from so large a body of men, not accustomed, it may be, to consider deeply the matters involved in these discussions—but many, very many of them, grave, reflecting, faithful members of the Church to which they profess to belong—such a manifestation of feeling, I say, from so large a body of such men, cannot be regarded otherwise than as a matter highly deserving the consideration of every reflecting minister in our Church. If it tells us the extent to which delusion has been carried, it tells us also the dangers which follow from rash and unreflecting innovation.

APPENDIX B.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSED (1867) TO THE RIGHT REVEREND THE LORD BISHOP OF WINCHESTER BY CERTAIN INHABITANTS OF THE PARISHES OF WIDLEY AND WYMERING, AND TRANSMITTED BY HIS LORDSHIP TO THE ROYAL COMMISSIONERS.

TO THE RIGHT REVEREND THE LORD BISHOP OF WINCHESTER.

We, the undersigned, inhabitants of Widley and Wymering, parishes in your Lordship's diocese, humbly implore your Lordship to lend an attentive ear to the heartfelt cry of our distress. We, from our childhood, with our countrymen generally, have been accustomed to the scriptural and spiritual worship of God in our parish churches; but of late years all this has been changed. We now feel most painfully that our churches have been turned into mass houses; and our touchingly simple services exchanged for somethings which appear to us a masquerade, if they be not indeed the services of the Roman Catholic Communion, which we have been taught to dread and to deprecate. The desire for peace among ourselves, and the utmost confidence in the paternal care of your Lordship, have hitherto restrained us from making our trouble known in this manner; but the evil increases, and our homes, and our hearts, and our consciences will no longer permit us to remain silent.

In connection with our own parish church at Wymering there has long been something very like conventual life, and now a Priory is added called "St. Augustin's," and from these places are continually issuing forth phantoms, until lately only read of or seen in Roman Catholic countries. Thus our rural population is made accustomed, by the daily processions and perpetual appearance of these "sisters" and "brothers," to Romish institutions in connection with our English Protestant religion; and our light and healthful highways are darkened, and to our English sense rendered loathsome and terrible by these associations of the Inquisition. Then in our churches there are processions of choristers, priests, and acolytes; there are chantings and banners and garlands; there are smoking incense, and candles burning at noon-day, and brazen crosses lifted high upon the Communion table, and embroidered crosses covering the vestments of the officiating clergy. The parishioners are thus driven from the churches where they wish to worship God, who is a spirit, in spirit and in truth; and if these churches are now filled, they are filled by persons from distant parts who congregate to witness strange histrionic performances.

Necessity then compels your memorialists to charge their vicar with introducing practices foreign to the usages of their Reformed Protestant English Church, and they respectfully ask your Lordship's attention to the details of the morning service in Wymering Church on Easter Sunday last:—

The church was lighted by numerous candles supported by candelabra. These candelabra were tastefully decorated with flowers. Flowers and plants were also placed in other parts of the church; the chancel was profusely decorated. The congregation sat in silence for about fifteen minutes; then singing was heard without, becoming more distinct until the door on the south-west was reached. Then the congregation rose en masse, and a procession entered. First came a person dressed in white bearing a brass cross, suspended on a pole, painted in various colours. He was followed by two acolytes in scarlet and white, one of whom bore a brass implement like a mason's trowel, and the other a censer which he swung to and fro, filling the church with the smoke and fumes of the incense. About twenty choristers chanting "Jesus Christ is risen to-day" were preceded and followed by men bearing elaborate banners. The Reverend George Nugée, the vicar of Wymering, with book in hand, closed the procession. He had on a black robe reaching to his feet. This robe was covered by a white surplice reaching to within five or six inches of the ground, and he wore on his head a peculiarly shaped hat, which we are told is called a BIRETTA. The procession moved up the church in very slow order; the banners were placed on each side of the chancel, and the choristers took their seats, after which the service began. The psalms and responses were chanted by the choir, and some of the prayers were omitted. Before the Communion service a number of candles in the chancel were lighted in addition to those already mentioned as burning. The vicar retired, and again appeared, now wearing a white satin cape, which had a large cross both before and behind: he also wore a CHASUBLE, and something like a bib of violet colour, which we understand is called an ALB. The two acolytes now walked up to the Communion table, and the incense having been lighted, the censer was handed to the vicar, who waved it about the Communion table. He also took the bread and wine and held them out one or twice toward the table, and then bowed. All this time the choristers were chanting "Christ our Passover." After the Communion service Mr. Nugée preached from St. John ii. 19 and 21—"Destroy this temple and in three days I will raise it up; but he spake of the temple of his body." The object and the aim of this sermon was to enforce the doctrine of real presence in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. After the sermon Mr. Nugée returned to the table, the choristers again chanting. When this ceased seven or eight "Sisters of Mercy" went up and kneeled and the Sacrament was administered.

We, the undersigned, live in the midst of these practices, and we feel that they are intended to remove all the landmarks of our Christian Protestantism, and to substitute for them doctrines which our forefathers resisted unto death. Especially do we see and feel that these practices are so openly carried out that the peoples may have no doubt that in these churches they have a SACRIFICING PRIESTHOOD. But this, we know, our Protestant Church strongly condemns in her Articles and elsewhere. We therefore earnestly implore your Lordship to use your authority to remove these practices of which we complain, and restore to us the use of our churches, and the service to which we are so heartily attached. And most ardently do we pray that the Eternal God may be with you in the discharge of your onerous and responsible duties; and that He will give you grace and courage to maintain in all the churches of your vast diocese, the true doctrine and the pure worship of our Reformed Communion against all attempts to corrupt them. And thus will your memorialists ever pray.

APPENDIX C.

COMMUNICATION from the Rev. BRADLEY ABBOT,
Perpetual Curate of Christ Church, Clapham.

The Parsonage, Union Grove,
Wandsworth Road, S.,
19th July, 1867.

Christ Church, Clapham, was consecrated in May 1862 by the Bishop of Winchester.

From 1856 till its consecration, I held the position of missionary curate to that portion of Clapham which now forms the ecclesiastical district of Christ Church, Clapham.

The church cost about 4,000*l.*; of this sum 1,000*l.* were given by a gentleman who possesses the greater part of the land which forms my district.

I myself advanced about 1,500*l.*; about 750*l.* were obtained from Church Building Societies. The remainder was made up by subscriptions.

A few months after the consecration of the church a representation was made to me by the churchwardens that my manner of conducting the public offices was Romish, and distasteful to themselves and to certain other members of the congregation.

In answer to my offers to meet the wishes of the dissentients, I was met by the statement that any changes that I was willing to make would be insufficient unless I agreed to read the prayers instead of saying them, as I did, on one note. This I felt the majority of the congregation would not wish, after consultation with whom I decided not to give way, and to continue my practice of intoning.

This decision I communicated to the churchwardens.

About a fortnight after, one of the churchwardens called upon me and said he had been authorized to inform me, that, as I was not prepared to give up intoning, the party in the congregation which he represented had determined to retire from the church, and that they had resolved to give me no peace of mind or body as long as I remained the minister of Christ Church, and that they would do their best to starve me out of the parish.

Acting on this determination, about six families, to the best of my recollection, left the church.

My ritual then consisted of a simple choral service, sung by an unsurprised choir. I had two lights upon the altar, to which they did not allude, only one altar cloth, no eucharistic vestments, and no coloured stoles.

After the departure of the dissentients, my congregation, being united, gradually urged me to have a more ornate and elaborate ritual.

They first presented me with cassocks and surplices for my choir; then in succession with four stained glass windows, an organ, the eucharistic vestments, a cope, thurible and incense boat, reredos, sedilia, &c., &c., &c.

They further consented to have a weekly offertory.

This state of things, commencing with November 1862, continued uninterrupted till May 1865.

In the spring of 1865 some excitement stirred up the religious world, and it aroused the attention of a few of my parishioners who had not attended Christ Church since 1862.

Anonymous letters were sent to the Bishop of Winchester complaining of Popish practices in Christ Church.

Finding no notice taken of these, one man wrote, making the same charges, and signed his name.

The Bishop, I was told, replied and asked for particulars. This his correspondent could not give, not having ever attended the services.

My services at that time consisted of a daily celebration of Holy Communion at 7.15 a.m., with a second celebration (choral) on Sundays and festivals at mid-day; matins (plain) at 8 o'clock; choral evensong at 8 o'clock; Litany on Wednesdays and Fridays at 12 o'clock; a special choral service for the police in church on Wednesdays at noon, immediately after Litany; incense was used on festivals.

After some correspondence, the Bishop recommended to the man above referred to, that a certain number of persons who objected to the mode of conducting the services in Christ Church should attend all the offices for two weeks, and then form a deputation and wait upon him to state their objections.

This about ten of them did.

They attended the church on two Sunday mornings (on one of which a member of the present Ritual Commission, Mr. Beresford-Hope, happened to be present) and on two Sunday evenings, and, as I learned from letters received during the week, very painfully interfered with the devotion of my regular congregation by their gestures, note-taking, and sketching myself and others as we appeared in vestments.

On the Monday following the second Sunday a deputation of 13 parishioners and non-parishioners, none of whom were worshippers at Christ Church, visited the Bishop of Winchester and stated their objections.

I was summoned by his Lordship to hear and answer their objections on the following Wednesday.

The Bishop told me their complaints and statements; some of them were so manifestly false that I refused to answer them, and requested his Lordship to summon the two churchwardens and ask them.

This he did, and he was fully satisfied with their evidence in reply to the statements.

I, however, offered to prove the inaccuracy of their particular statement, that very few of my parishioners attended church because they disapproved of the mode of conducting the services.

At his Lordship's suggestion, a memorial to himself as Bishop was placed in the porch on the following Sunday, to be signed by such of my parishioners as were regular attendants at Christ Church, and were willing to testify their approval of the mode in which the various services were conducted.

This memorial, with another signed at the same time by non-parishioners, is now in the possession of the Bishop of Winchester, with the signatures and residences of between 700 and 800 persons habitually worshipping in Christ Church, and the majority resident within my district.

I would mention that I informed the leading member of the 13 dissentients of this memorial, and offered to submit it on the following Monday to his scrutiny.

My offer was refused.

At the same time, hoping to come to terms with the 13 persons, I asked him to consult them and to name the conditions on which they would return to their parish church.

His answer was, "nothing less than my expulsion from the ministry."

The 13 endeavoured to get up a counter-memorial to the Bishop, but failed.

To return to my interview with the Bishop: he recommended me to conciliate the 13. I told him it would be difficult to do so.

He gave me a fortnight to consider.

In the meantime the Rural Dean, the Rev. Mr. Nicholl, called upon me, and we talked matters over.

At the end of a fortnight, understanding from the Rev. Robert Gregory and the Rural Dean with what concessions the Bishop of Winchester would be satisfied, I was prepared to make them.

The following letter, a copy of which Mr. Nicholl at the Bishop's request gave me, will show you clearly the points I gave up:—

"Winchester House, St. James Square, 23rd June, 1865.

"MY DEAR MR. NICHOLL,
Christ Church, Clapham.

"I request you will inform the members of the deputation who called upon me in reference to the ritual of the above church, that I have since been in communication with the incumbent on the subject of their complaint.

"Mr. Abbot has considered the subject in a very conciliatory spirit, and with my entire approval he has consented to make several important alterations.

"The high screen between the chancel and the nave surmounted by a cross is to be taken down, and a low screen, of which I have approved the pattern, is to be substituted in its place.

"All the candelabra are to be removed, and the only lights remaining will be the two on the communion table.

"The personal crossings will not be persisted in in future.

"Incense will only be used on the great festivals; that is, I believe, on five occasions in the year.

"No banners in processions.

"It is my earnest hope that these considerable concessions will be met in a corresponding spirit, and that it will be remembered that where fundamental doctrines are not in question, which I have great grounds for believing are not involved in the present case, our Church allows within certain assignable limits much latitude in her ritual.

"I am,

"My dear Mr. Nicholl,

"Very faithfully yours,

"C. WINTON.

"Rev. J. R. Nicholl,

"Rural Dean."

I retained the choral services the same as before: the two lights on the altar at the Holy Communion, processions with the processional cross within the church on all festivals, the use of incense during the greater festivals, the eucharistic vestments, the cope, &c.

The effect of the concessions upon the 13 was, as far as I could judge from their manner and from what I was frequently hearing, to raise a bitter hostility towards myself.

My concessions to the Bishop were received with a feeling of satisfaction by those of my parishioners who were in the habit of worshipping at other churches.

To my own congregation they caused disappointment, so much so, that about a year ago I wrote to the Bishop and stated the disappointment of my congregation, and asked permission to use incense more frequently, and to be allowed more chancel tapers on the greater festivals.

His Lordship refused my application, and I lost many gifts of various things to the church through the disappointment that was caused by our maimed ritual.

BRADLEY ABBOT,
Perpetual Curate.

APPENDIX D.

The following documents were produced to the Commissioners by the Rev. T. W. Perry, as bearing upon the statement of T. T. Ford, Esq., (Questions 3256-61 and 3363-69), in reference to St. Michael and All Angels, Brighton. Mr. Perry stated that the correspondence and memorial arose out of representations which had been made to the Bishop of Chichester and the vicar of Brighton, not, however, by any member of the congregation or any one entitled to complain of the services.

No. 1.—From the Churchwardens of St. Michael and All Angels to the Bishop of Chichester.

St. Michael and All Angels, Brighton,
23rd January 1867.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR LORDSHIP,

We have the honour to forward to your Lordship a copy of a memorial (the original we have sent to the vicar), which we have received, signed by a large number of influential persons, who are communicants, usually worshipping in this church.

The Memorial, as your Lordship will perceive, desires us to communicate to you the "satisfaction" of the said communicants with the "services" in this church, and their "earnest hope that those services, as at present conducted, may not be interfered with, unless it shall be ascertained that they are in any respect contrary to the law of the Church of England or at variance with the rightful authority of the Ordinary, to which [they] are desirous of yielding a loyal obedience."

We beg respectfully to inform your Lordship that we concur in the prayer of the memorial, and would humbly express our earnest hope, with that of the memorialists, that the clergy of St. Michael's may be allowed to continue, without hindrance, the present mode of conducting the services, on the ground (1) that they are not contrary to the law of the Church of England, and (2) that they are approved of by the congregation generally, and, as far as we know, by all the communicant portion of them.

From the correspondence that has passed between the Vicar of Brighton and the Rev. Charles Beanlands our esteemed incumbent, and the Rev. Thomas W. Perry, assistant curate, it is evident your Lordship and the Vicar have been misinformed in some particulars relating to the "dresses" of the clergy. We assure your Lordship that the only "dresses" worn by the clergy are the surplice, hood, and stole at the ordinary services, and the eucharistic vestments during the celebration of the Holy Communion.

It is right your Lordship should know that the daily services are well attended every morning and evening, and that upon Sundays the church is generally inconveniently overcrowded by a devout congregation.

Your Lordship will also be glad to hear that the number of communicants every Sunday averages from 150 to 200, and upon the great festivals from 300 to 400. We feel sure that these facts will speak for themselves, and that your Lordship, perceiving the good fruits arising from the earnest ministrations of our clergy, and from the system of worship carried on in this church, you will not seek to deprive us of the privileges we at present enjoy, and the liberty of worshipping God in any form consistent with the law of the Church of England.

With profound respect, we remain

Your Lordship's faithful servants,

COLIN LINDSAY, } Churchwardens of WILLIAM BARWELL, } St. Michael's, Brighton.

To the Right Rev.

The Lord Bishop of Chichester.

P.S.—Should the correspondence between the vicar of Brighton and the clergy of St. Michael's be published, we would respectfully submit that this letter should be included.

No. 2.—From the Churchwardens of St. Michael and All Angels to the Vicar of Brighton.

St. Michael and All Angels, Brighton,
REV. AND DEAR SIR, 23rd January 1867.

WE have the honour to transmit you a memorial we have, as churchwardens of St. Michael's, received from the communicant portion of the congregation of this church, the purport of which is to inform the Bishop of the diocese and yourself of their "satisfaction" with the services as at present performed therein, and also their "earnest hope that those services, as at present conducted, may not be interfered with, unless it shall be ascertained that they are in any respect contrary to the law of the Church of England, or at variance with the rightful authority of the Ordinary, to which [they] are desirous of yielding a loyal obedience."

In forwarding a copy of this memorial to the Bishop we have informed his Lordship that we concur in the prayer of the memorialists, and trust that our clergy and our congregation may be allowed without hindrance to worship God in any mode, provided it be agreeable to the law of the Church of England.

We have preferred sending the original memorial to you rather than to the Bishop, because we think you are in a better position to judge of the character of the signatures than his Lordship can be; and we believe you will find that a very fair proportion of them are of persons well known in Brighton as of position and influence. In case that the correspondence between our esteemed incumbent and the Rev. Thomas W. Perry (assistant curate), and yourself should be made public, we request that this letter and that addressed to the Bishop (a copy of which we enclose) may be included,

We remain,

Yours faithfully,

COLIN LINDSAY, }
WILLIAM BARWELL, } Churchwardens of St. Michael's,
Brighton.

To the Rev. the Vicar of Brighton.

No. 3. Copy of the Memorial referred to in the preceding letters.

"TO THE HON. COLIN LINDSAY, AND CAPTAIN WILLIAM BARWELL, R.N., CHURCHWARDENS OF SS. MICHAEL AND ALL ANGELS, BRIGHTON.

"We the undersigned members of the congregation of SS. Michael and All Angels, Brighton, (being communicants,) understanding that objections are now made to the mode in which the services have been hitherto ordered in this church, hereby express our satisfaction with those services; and wish you, as the Churchwardens, respectfully to represent to the Vicar of this parish and to the Bishop of this diocese, our earnest hope that those services, as at present conducted, may not be interfered with, unless it shall be ascertained that they are in any respect contrary to the law of the Church of England, or at variance with the rightful authority of the Ordinary, to which we are desirous of yielding a loyal obedience."

No. 4.—Reply of the Bishop of Chichester.

Palace, Chichester,
DEAR SIRS, January 25, 1867.

I HAVE to acknowledge the receipt of the copy you have forwarded to me of a memorial, signed by a large number of persons, who are communicants, usually worshipping in the church of St. Michael and All Angels, Brighton. The original you inform me has been sent to the Vicar of Brighton, from whom doubtless, as well as from myself, the memorial will obtain the attention which is due to it.

I remain, Gentlemen,

Your faithful Diocesan and affectionate Brother in Christ.

A. T. CICESTER.

To the Hon. Colin Lindsay and Captain Wm. Barwell, R.N., Churchwardens of St. Michael and All Angels, Brighton.

APPENDICES.

No. 5.—Reply of the Vicar of Brighton.

MY DEAR SIRs,

Brighton Vicarage,
January 28th, 1867.

I SHOULD earlier have had the pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of the memorial, and to thank you for the spirit of kindness which breathes through the communications which accompany it, but for the serious difficulty of the task implied in the reason of the transmission of the original to myself, rather than to the Bishop of the diocese.

The reason you assign is that "I am in a better position to judge of the character of the signatures than the Bishop can be," and you further express your belief, "that I shall find a very fair proportion of them to be persons well known in Brighton as of position and influence."

Hence it is that I make this trespass upon your time, and add that there are so many names "without description" of occupation, and "with description" of residence, not to be found in Brighton Directory of 1866, that I would gladly accept the aid of our mutual friend Mr. Perry, if he will kindly grant it, to ascertain who the parties really are.

Your suggestion shall meet with the attention to which it is entitled. If the correspondence between Mr. Beanland, Mr. Perry, and myself be made public, your letter and address to the Bishop shall be included in the publication.

Believe me my dear sirs,
Yours faithfully,
H. M. WAGNER.

Hon. Colin Lindsay, } Churchwardens
Captain W. Barwell, } of St. Michael's,
Brighton.

APPENDIX E.

COMMUNICATION FROM W. PETERS, Esq., OF COMPTON TERRACE, BRIGHTON.

8, Compton Terrace, Brighton,
10th July 1867.

SIR,

I HAVE the honour to request that you will bring under the consideration of Her Majesty's Commissioners on Ritualism the following facts, and a few observations, offered with the view of connecting them with each other and with the object of the Royal Commission.

2. I trust that I cannot in any way mislead, by pointing for these facts to the authority of Mr. A. J. Stephens, in quoting and referring to his edition of the Book of Common Prayer published in 1849 by the Ecclesiastical History Society, a reproduction (with notes legal and historical) of the "Sealed Book" of the Court of Chancery.

3. The first fact which I would notice is, that although the Sealed Books are made part of the Act of Uniformity of King Charles the Second, and of equal legal authority with the manuscript Book of Common Prayer belonging to that statute, there is now no direct appeal to that manuscript when it becomes necessary for the decision of cases where the Sealed Books differ from each other. For that manuscript, and all the manuscripts of the Books of Common Prayer attached to all the English Acts of Uniformity, have been lost or stolen from the Parliamentary Records; "consequently" (Mr. Stephens observes*) "the only manuscript Book of Common Prayer that is known to be in existence is the manuscript book belonging to the Irish Statute of Uniformity, 17 & 18 Car. II. c. 6."

4. In all the Sealed Books, the fortieth page, which contains the rubric commencing "The Order," and ending "second year of the reign of King Edward the Sixth," is cancelled. In Mr. Stephens' edition of the Chancery Book the very strokes of the pen of the Commissioner are traced and printed in blue ink across the text†; it is struck out even to the catchword; and in a note, on the authority of Dr. Elrington marked "C.R.E." it is stated that "this order does not appear in the MS. Book, Dublin."

5. The rubric thus distinctly struck out has been interpolated in another part of the Sealed Books, where it appears, as in most of our ordinary prayer books, just before the Morning Service. I use the word "interpolated" advisedly, and will give my reasons.

6. In the late Charge of the Bishop of Cork, which I quote from the "Times" of the 11th October last, it is distinctly stated that "the rubric to which so much importance is attached in England, and which has acquired

"such questionable renown, is not to be found in the old Prayer Book of the Irish Church, as we know by the manuscript preserved in the Rolls Office, Dublin."

7. I will next quote, in further evidence of interpolation, from a letter regarding the "Sealed Book" of the Court of Queen's Bench, which was addressed by Mr. George James Berrey to Mr. Stephens,‡ on the 15th March 1849. On the subject of this rubric he writes thus:—

"I should advert to a circumstance which, though perhaps trifling, strikes me as rather singular. Immediately before the ordinal occurs a leaf containing its title, which title is printed; but under this title is written in imitation of printing—

London,
'Printed by the Printers to the 'King's most Excellent
'Majesty.'

"Now this certainly does not seem to me a thing very likely to have occurred in the original manuscript; and its insertion here is inconsistent with the Commissioners having struck out the corresponding part of the general title-page of the book; and any reasons which I can conceive there having been for its insertion in the one place would, I should have imagined, have been equally weighty for its insertion in the other."

8. This is very like a suggestion of interpolation. But I have yet further to add on this subject that whilst the Sealed Book of the Court of Queen's Bench is open to this remark of Mr. Berrey with the book before him, the rubric in question does not appear at all, except as it stands cancelled on the 40th page, in the Sealed Book of the Court of Common Pleas. Mr. Ernest Hawkins§, who inspected this book for Mr. Stephens, wrote to him on the 28th February 1849, as follows:—

"The page of directions entitled 'The Order for Morning and Evening Prayer,' which is scratched through with a pen where it occurs before the calendar, is omitted altogether in its proper place immediately after the calendar."

9. Mr. Hawkins and others may use the term "proper place" because it has a place in our ordinary Prayer Books. But Mr. Stephens shows that although, by confining the privilege of printing them within narrow limits, endeavor was made to keep the text sound and in conformity with the statute, the book has been tampered with throughout this century, and may have been all along.

10. That this rubric should have been cancelled by the Commissioners, and not reinserted in the Book of the Court of Common Pleas, seems to invalidate the claim of all the other Sealed Books to possess it. But there is direct evidence of the interpolation of this as well as other leaves, to which attention may be advantageously directed. I confine myself to the rubric itself.

11. The Rev. W. K. Clay, referring to the Ely "Sealed Book," wrote as follows to Mr. Stephens on the 10th May 1849:—

"The three leaves above-mentioned, with the three cancels, were lying loose in their proper places until about eight years ago, when, at the request of the Very Reverend the Dean of Ely, Dr. Peacock, they were duly pasted in under my own inspection."

12. Thus this page, without any attestation of the Commissioners, and without even a catchword to indicate its position, though catchwords were in use, has been introduced into the Ely book, and we have direct evidence of interpolation on the authority of the interpolator himself.

13. Were there no other test, the Commissioners appointed by Royal Commission to collate the Sealed Books with the manuscript annexed to the Act, "whose positive duty it was to make the printed book before them correspond as minutely as possible" with that manuscript, and who "seemingly discharged their duty with the most scrupulous accuracy," would hardly tear out here and strike out there, then reinsert and reprint and insert in other places, without some note to give authority to the insertions.

14. Of these insertions, "a fact apparent on mere inspection," being of "much rougher appearance than the rest," Mr. Stephens observes, that they "seem indeed to have been printed in haste, and bound up with the rest of the book in a damp and unpressed state."

15. The Irish manuscript, which ought to have been, barring local modifications, an exact counterpart of the English, is an authentic official document, and would appear to be the next legal authority in the absence of the original manuscript, which has been lost or stolen. The absence of the rubric in that manuscript confirms the Act of the Commissioners in cancelling it in the English which is cancelled. This is proved by the identity of two elaborate woodcuts, one at the head of the page, the other forming the initial letter T; the watermark of the paper upon which it is printed is found upon other leaves in the book. The only difference between the cancelled page and the one now standing is, that in the second the catchword is omitted.

It may be well also to notice that the other cancel to which Mr. Clay refers tells its own tale. The prayer "O God, whose nature and property &c." was originally printed upon the fourth leaf of sheet D, after the "Prayer for all conditions of men." It being determined to place it after the Ember Prayers, it was erased by two cross strokes of a pen from its original position, but of course it could not be thrown back into its new position without reprinting; accordingly the leaf D 3 was reprinted, with the insertion of the prayer. Upon this reprinted leaf I have to observe as follows:—

First, the woodcuts and the watermark of the paper tell the same tale as in the case of the ornament rubric, namely, that the leaf was printed by the same printers as the rest of the book: or rather the watermark tells something more, and the tale (if I am correct in my conclusions) is very curious.

The watermark, which is apparently intended for a bunch of grapes, occurs in the prefatory matter, but I have not found it in the subsequent part of the book; in fact the paper upon which the book itself is printed appears to be somewhat better than that which is used for the prefatory matter, and this I suppose gave rise to Mr. Clay's remark as to the "paper of the cancels, being much coarser and thinner than the rest."

The leaf of which I am now speaking does appear inferior to those amongst which it is found, but it is undoubtedly the same (as the watermark proves) as some of that used for the prefatory matter. What then is the conclusion? Simply this: that the reprinting of leaf D 3 was not ordered until the book had been printed, and at that time the printers were engaged, or had been lately engaged, upon the prefatory matter, the prefatory matter being always printed last: in fact, the stock of paper used for the book was probably exhausted, the printers were using a new lot, and it was a piece of this new paper that they used for the reprint of D 3.

Again the appearance of D 3 explains what Mr. Clay says about the inferiority of the type: he says, "the type is by no means so good and clear." This statement is not quite correct; the type is the same, but the printer's workmanship is inferior; the leaf has not been carefully imposed (as I think the printers call it), and consequently the eye can detect the printing on the other side of the paper. It is possible also that the type may have somewhat suffered from use, for I observe that the printing of the earlier part of the Prayer Book is clearer and better than the later part; and this insertion was, as I have shown, printed last of all.

It may, perhaps, be not altogether useless to add that the sheet presents one little mark of carelessness. Two symbols are used throughout the book to mark titles; one the ordinary ¶, the other, ¶. The occasional prayers are printed with the second of these, but the inserted leaf uses the first, and that even for the catchword at the foot of the page, although the reference is to a title bearing the second symbol.

I think I ought to say, in conclusion, that the prayer "O God, whose nature and property, &c.," and the "Ornament rubric," are erased in the same way, namely, by two crossing lines, and that, so far as I can judge, the lines have been drawn by the same hand, and with the same ink; but upon this point it is impossible to speak with any certainty.

H. GOODWIN.

MEMORANDUM from W. J. THOMS, Esq., House of Lords, on the MS. Prayer Book attached to the Act of Uniformity of 1662.

IN the course of a conversation with the Dean of Westminster on Tuesday week (30th July), after calling my attention to a pamphlet of Mr. Hull, on the subject of the supposed loss of the Book of Common Prayer attached to the Act of Uniformity, the Dean expressed a wish to see the tower (formerly a portion of the Abbey) in which the original Acts of Parliament were till lately kept, the rooms in the Victoria Tower where the Acts are now deposited, and the Act of Uniformity itself.

I promised to make the necessary arrangements for his doing so, on the following Thursday (1st August).

My attention having been called by the Dean to the Prayer Book before alluded to, when settling with the person who arranges the Acts in the Victoria Tower to be in the way at the time the Dean had appointed to come, I spoke to him about the book; and he then told me, that when the Acts were removed he had found, among other books, MS. Journals, &c. a manuscript Prayer Book, which he had handed over to the chief clerk, Mr. Smith.

I at once felt satisfied that that was the book respecting which there seems to have been so much mistaken anxiety; but the accidental absence of Mr. Smith prevented my then examining the book, and until I had seen it and positively ascertained the fact, I thought it better, in case I should prove mistaken, not to mention to the Dean that the book was in Mr. Smith's custody.

Mr. Smith, who came to me in the library a few minutes after the Dean had left, at once said the Prayer Book was in his custody, showed it to me, and I communicated the fact on the same evening to the Dean.

WILLIAM J. THOMS.

Library, House of Lords,
8th August 1867.

** An inspection of this MS. Prayer Book has proved to the Commissioners that the "Order for Morning and Evening Prayer daily to be said and used throughout the year" is identical in all respects with that which is ordinarily prefixed to the Book of Common Prayer.

APPENDIX F.

MEMORIAL ON THE DOCTRINE OF THE EUCHARIST.

East Brent, May 30, 1867.

MY DEAR LORD ARCHBISHOP,

ON behalf of some who have taken private counsel together in the present distress, and have subscribed their names to the paper which I forward with this letter, I beg leave to place it in your Grace's hands.

It is proposed to make the paper public, upon hearing from your Grace that you have received it.—I am, my dear Lord Archbishop, most faithfully and truly yours,

GEORGE A. DENISON.

The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, &c.

TO HIS GRACE CHARLES THOMAS, LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY, PRIMATE OF ALL ENGLAND, AND METROPOLITAN, &c.

WHEREAS, at this present time, imputations of disloyalty to the Church of England are current, to the discredit of those who have been, some of them for many years, inculcating and defending the Doctrines of the Real Objective Presence, of the Eucharistic Sacrifice, and of the Adoration of CHRIST in the Blessed Sacrament; And whereas, by reason of these imputations the minds of many are troubled: We therefore, the undersigned, exercising the office of the Priesthood within the Church of England, beg respectfully to state to your Grace, and through your Grace to our Right Reverend Fathers in GOD the Bishops of your Province, and to the Church at large, what we believe to be the mind of our LORD, touching the said Doctrines, as expressed in Holy Scripture, and as received by the Church of England in conformity with the teaching of the Catholic Church in those ages to which the Church of England directs us as "most pure and uncorrupt," and of "the old godly doctors," to whom she has in many ways referred us,—declaring hereby both what we repudiate, and what we believe, touching the said Doctrines.

(1.) We repudiate the opinion of a "Corporal Presence of CHRIST'S natural Flesh and Blood;" that is to say, of the Presence of His Body and Blood as They "are in Heaven;" and the conception of the mode of His Presence, which implies the physical change of the natural substances of the Bread and Wine, commonly called "Transubstantiation."

We believe that, in The Holy Eucharist, by virtue of the Consecration, through the Power of The HOLY GHOST, The Body and Blood of our Saviour CHRIST, "the inward part, or thing signified," are Present, really and truly, but Spiritually and ineffably, under "the outward visible part or sign," or "form of Bread and Wine."

(2.) We repudiate the notion of any fresh Sacrifice, or any view of the Eucharistic Sacrificial offering as of something apart from the One All-sufficient Sacrifice and Oblation on the Cross, Which Alone "is that perfect Redemption, Propitiation, and Satisfaction for all the Sins of the whole world, both original and actual," and Which Alone is "meritorious."

We believe that, as in Heaven CHRIST, our Great High Priest, ever offers Himself before The Eternal FATHER, pleading by His Presence His Sacrifice of Himself once offered on the Cross; so on Earth, in the Holy Eucharist, that same Body, once for all sacrificed for us, and that same Blood, once for all shed for us, Sacramentally Present, are offered and pleaded before The FATHER by the Priest, as our Lord ordained to be done in Remembrance of Himself, when He instituted the Blessed Sacrament of His Body and Blood.

(3.) We repudiate all "adoration" of "the Sacramental Bread and Wine," which would be "idolatry;" regarding them with the reverence due to them because of their Sacramental relation to the Body and Blood of our LORD: we repudiate also all adoration of "a Corporal Presence of CHRIST'S Natural Flesh and Blood,"—that is to say, of the Presence of His Body and Blood as They "are in Heaven."

We believe that CHRIST Himself, really and truly, but Spiritually and ineffably, Present in the Sacrament, is therein to be adored.

Furthermore, in so far as any of the undersigned, repudiating and believing as herein-before stated, have used, in whatever degree, a Ritual beyond what had become common in our Churches, we desire to state, that we have done so, not as wishing to introduce a system of worship foreign to the Church of England, but as believing that, in so doing, we act in harmony with the principles and the law of the Church of England, and as using that liberty which has, in such matters, been always allowed to her Clergy and her People; having at heart the promotion of the Glory of GOD in the due and reverent Celebration of The Holy Eucharist, as the central act of Divine Worship.

In making the above statement, we desire expressly to guard ourselves against being supposed to put it forth as any new exposition of The Faith; nor do we seek to elicit from your Grace, or from our Right Reverend Fathers in GOD the Bishops of your Province, any declaration in regard to the subjects upon which we have here stated our belief; we wish only thus publicly to make known this our profession of Faith, for the quieting of the minds of others, and for the satisfaction of our own consciences.

EXTRACTS from "The Law of Ritualism, examined in its relation to the Word of God, to the Primitive Church, to the Church of England, and to the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. By the Right Rev. John Henry Hopkins, D.D., LL.D. Bishop of Vermont, New York, 1866."*

INTRODUCTION.

Necessity of Form and Order in Public Worship.

THE subject on which several of my esteemed brethren are pleased to ask my opinion has been familiar to my own mind for many years, although it is only of late that it has begun to excite any general attention. Amongst a large proportion of my fellow Christians, the ritual or ceremonial part of divine worship is thought to be a matter of perfect indifference. For, since true religion is acknowledged to be a spiritual life in the soul, granted to the humble disciple of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, through FAITH, they have concluded that its outward form has received no corresponding care from the Almighty. God looks on the heart. And if that be right, the external expression of devotion is left free to all the varieties of human taste and feeling (p. 1.)

I am quite aware that although my line of argument will be entirely scriptural, yet the same objection may be made to my conclusions which has been so zealously urged against the English Ritualists, namely, that they are in danger of drawing too near to the Church of Rome. To this I can only reply, in advance, that our glorious Reformation was directed, not against the Ritualism of Rome, so far as it retained the sanction of the Bible and the Primitive Church, but against those false and corrupt doctrines by which she had so grossly innovated upon the pure Creed of the Gospel. The main labours of my ministerial life have been devoted to our controversy with Rome, to the defence of our martyred Reformers, and to the vindication of our own Scriptural, Apostolic, and really Catholic system. I have nothing to retract or to alter, in all my former publications on that subject; nor is there a sentence in the present work which can justly be considered inconsistent with the position which I have hitherto maintained, as the uncompromising antagonist of Popery. That there are some features of Ritualism, in which the Church of Rome and the Oriental Churches are in closer accordance with the primitive practice than we are, may, indeed, be granted. But it will be seen in the following pages that it was otherwise at the time when our Reformation was established under Edward VI., and that these matters do not involve the slightest change in our Liturgy or Articles. Nor do I mean to be understood as recommending any alteration in our ordinary mode of worship. To this, neither my habits nor my advanced age would lead me to incline. But my personal tastes and my life-long associations furnish no sufficient warrant for a judgment which condemns any of my brethren, either here or elsewhere, who seek for a closer accordance with what they regard as a better standard, on the highest authority. On the ground of law, I may be obliged to grant that their argument is entitled to confidence. Yet it does not follow from this that I should take any active part in their course, so long as I feel doubtful of its expediency.—(pp. 4, 5.)

The Law of Ritualism.

Every thing in His Church should have a meaning, appropriate to His work of mercy to our fallen and perishing world. And hence the official garments of His ministers should remind the beholder of His purity and love, and express, as far as they can express, their relation to their divine Master. They are ambassadors from the King of Heaven; and as the ambassadors of every earthly sovereign are expected to appear officially, on public occasions, in the insignia of their respective governments, much more should the representatives of Christ bear some plain mark of their distinctive character. Thus the garments of the High Priest were all symbolical of Christ. The breastplate, containing the Urim and Thummim, was a symbol of His divine judgment and omniscience; the purple and gold, of His royalty; the crimson, of His atoning blood; the blue, of His heavenly kingdom; and the white, of His perfect righteousness, extended to His faithful people. And this last, which presented the principle to be most constantly followed by the Church, whose union to Christ is the only ground of salvation, was therefore the chief mark in the garments of the sacred priesthood among the Jews, and passed from them, as we have seen, to the Gentiles, on the strongest ground of Scriptural consistency.

APPENDICES

There are many good and respectable Christians in our day who regard this matter of distinctive ministerial garments with contempt, and sometimes even with positive aversion, because they look upon it as one of the corruptions of Romanism. But the ancient Church of God is not to be regarded with contempt by any man who professes to believe the Bible. That sacred institution was divine, and was given by the Almighty Himself, to His own chosen and peculiar people. None but a fool would say that the Church of the Jews had any connexion with the system of Popery. Nor will any sensible man pretend that the Reformation of the sixteenth century was occasioned by the dress or ecclesiastical order of the Church of Rome, which are in no respect more splendid or imposing than the usages of the Oriental Churches of Greece and Russia. It would have been mere madness to plunge the religion of Europe into confusion for a cause of no more consequence than this. It was not ministerial dress, but corruption in doctrine, and government, and morals, which called for Reformation.

For myself, I must honestly confess that I regret the retention of any black whatever in the dress of the Ministry. The white is Scriptural and of divine authority, having a clear symbolical reference to the Saviour and the righteousness of the saints. The use of black came in, at first, through the monks, and it was the authority of the Pope which introduced it into the Churches of Europe, when he gave his sanction to the Black Friars (Fratres Predicatores), and made them the preachers everywhere, long before the Reformation. This was the real origin of the custom which led the people throughout the whole Continent to look upon black as the proper color for the preacher. But it is totally unwarranted by Scripture and the Primitive Church. And it is equally unwarranted by right reason. For the ambassadors of Christ are the heralds of the Gospel,—“good tidings of great joy to all people.” And their garments should be the emblems of purity and joy, and not those of sin and mourning.—(pp. 37-41).

One cannot but observe how plainly the Thirtieth Canon of that Church [of England] lays down the true principle, namely, that it was not “the purpose of the Church of England to forsake and reject the Churches of Italy, France, Spain, Germany, or any such like Churches,” excepting “in those particular points wherein they were fallen both from themselves in their ancient integrity, and from the Apostolic Churches which were their first founders.”

This was, undoubtedly, the original design of the Reformation. Indeed, it was the only ground on which reformation could be justified. And hence I confess myself unable to perceive the wisdom or the justice of any needless alteration. For why should we object to those solemn and impressive features in the worship of God which had their origin in the divine system given to Israel,—which were adopted by the early Christian Gentiles,—which were in general use throughout the whole East and West before the sixteenth century,—which remained in the Reformed Church of England during the first five years of Edward VI., and were then believed, by her best divines, to need no change?—(pp. 62, 63.)

To my mind, therefore, the legal position of our English brethren in this matter of Ritualism is justifiable with respect to its main design, and stands on a far higher ground of Scripture, law, and reason, than that of their adversaries. So long as the great doctrines of the Reformation are faithfully preached by the clergy, I can see no danger that a solemn, rich, and attractive ritual will ever lead any one to Popery. Is it not more reasonable to believe that the restoration of the old ceremonial which existed in the second year of Edward the Sixth would give our Church the advantage which now forms the most alluring characteristic of Rome? For what but her superior claim of outward grandeur and impressiveness, operates so powerfully to keep her own votaries steadfast in their allegiance, and to draw so many others into the snare of error? Has not truth as good a right as falsehood to be adorned with beauty? And is it to be questioned that religion should favorably affect the senses, in order that it may better reach the soul?

I say not this because I feel the slightest inclination toward the old Ritual, which was certainly the established rule in the second year of King Edward VI. Personally, I prefer the more simple ceremonial to which I have been accustomed all my life, and men can hardly be expected to adopt new tastes and habits at the age of seventy-five. But I cannot condemn the ordinances which the wisdom of God appointed for His chosen people. I cannot argue against the Gentile Churches for taking the Church of Israel for their model, because that was the only model which was in truth divine. Whatever my individual taste and habits may be, I owe all my religious allegiance, in this and every other subject connected with the Gospel, to the WRITTEN WORD OF GOD. And when I see that the Rubric of the English Prayer Book is in accordance with that Word, substantially enjoining the same principles of “glory and beauty” in the outward ceremonial of the Sanctuary, my reverence for the Bible compels me to acknowledge that a splendid and impressive Ritual can neither be hostile to the doctrines of a pure faith, nor unfavorable to the exercise of a spiritual devotion.—(pp. 64, 65.)

Many years ago I took the liberty to improve my own vestments by adopting the forms of the alb and the surplice, which are appointed by the law of the Church; as also by laying aside the bands, and the black gown, in the service of the Sanctuary. This, however, so far as I know, was attributed, not to any reverence for ecclesiastical consistency, but rather to an affectation of singularity. But the time may come when the question will demand attention; and then, if I am not much mistaken, a far more extensive change will be adopted by my respected brethren, not only in form, but in color also. Men may endeavour to make light of these matters, as being things of indifference. But nothing should be esteemed of indifference which stands connected with religious worship. And no Christian who reveres the Bible will undervalue the subject of ministerial costume, when he remembers that it was thought worthy of being specially regulated by the God of Israel.—(pp. 70, 71.)

Surely, then, if ever there was a case of difference in lesser things which called for kindly toleration, the claim of liberty for our brethren who desire to restore the ancient Ritual would seem to have the strongest right of allowance. And this is the extent to which I should be willing to go, on the point of expediency. I have shown, at large, my reasons for believing, as I certainly do believe, that they have the law of the Church on their side. But if I had the power, I would not seek to enforce that law, after it has been so long disused,—disused, indeed, until neither our ministers nor our people, for the most part, have any knowledge of its history or meaning. I regard the object of the Ritualists as legally defensible, and have sustained it accordingly. At this day, however, it must be considered an experiment, which I am quite willing to have fairly tried, but on whose beneficial results, upon the whole, I do not feel qualified to pronounce any positive judgment.—(p. 78.)

Therefore, although I deem that the testimony of the Fathers is a fair warrant for a verdict in favor of the Ritualists, and that the rubric referring to the second year of Edward VI. is yet more authoritative in its character, I could not recommend any legislation which should infringe on the liberty which our Church has so long enjoyed; nor would I disturb the peace of those who might be alarmed, and perhaps alienated, by any Conventional act that would appear to them, however erroneously, to favour Romanism.

Yet, on the other hand, I should not advocate any authoritative interference with those who desired to conform, in this matter of Ritualism, to the ancient standard. They do not propose to add or diminish with respect to the doctrines or Liturgy of the Church. They only desire to present her solemn service in the manner that prevailed in the early years of the Reformation; and this, in my opinion, they have a legal right to do. In England they have found that many congregations have zealously sustained them; nor can I doubt that many will sustain them amongst ourselves. It would probably become, therefore, only a more marked distinction between parties which already exist; and as the Church has included these parties from the beginning of her history, I do not perceive that any danger would be incurred by allowing them to appear in a more decided form. Unity in the same faith, the same government, and the same Liturgy need not, and, as it seems to me, could not, be unfavorably affected by a richer ministerial dress, by two lights burning on the altar, by burning a little frankincense, or by a greater manifestation of outward reverence. And if these things are found to be attractive to many, and operate beneficially in bringing them to the House of God, and enabling them to take a pleasure in the forms of religion, why should not the Church most willingly allow instead of trying to repress them?

Time will decide, and nothing but time can decide, the question, "whether an increase of Ritualism is advisable, or whether the present average of parochial practice is best fitted to carry on the work of the Church, in such a country as ours." I doubt whether any man can estimate, with sufficient accuracy, the various elements which belong to such a subject, so as to form anything like a positive opinion. Success, after all, must be the ultimate standard. And that can only be determined by time, after a fair trial.

I am willing, however, to state my impressions, and the reader may take them for what they may be worth, according to his own judgment. I incline, then, to regard it as most probable that this Ritualism will grow into favor by degrees until it becomes the prevailing system. The old, the fixed, and the fearful will resist it. But the young, the ardent, and the impressible will follow it more and more. The spirit of the age will favor it, because it is an age of excitement and sensation. The lovers of "glory and of beauty" will favor it, because it appeals with far more effect to the natural tastes and feelings of humanity. The rising generation of the clergy will favor it, because it adds so much to the solemn character of their Office, and the interest of their service in the House of God. And the opposition arising from its resemblance to Romanism will die away, as men learn to understand that Popery does not consist in the Ritualism which it pleased the Lord to order for His own chosen people; but in Papal and priestly despotism, in false doctrine, in the worship of the Virgin and the Saints, in Purgatory and Indulgences, in Transubstantiation and pretended miracles, in persecution and intolerance, and in all the other perilous corruptions which are in direct conflict with the unerring Word of God. These, and not matters of mere Ritual, are properly Romanism; and these, and only these, called for the work of Reformation.

CONCLUSION.

Probable Increase of Ritualism.

In conclusion, I would only say that my approval, of Ritualism begins and ends with the Bible. There I find the celestial guidance which, rightly interpreted, can lead no man astray. And when I read the system of divine worship prescribed by the Lord Himself for His chosen people, and see that He commanded the incense, and the holy anointing oil, and the seven-branched light, and the ministerial garments of "glory and beauty," for His ministers, how shall I doubt that these things must always be acceptable in His sight, when they stand connected with that pure faith which is the only animating spirit of devotion?

Yet, while on strictly Scriptural grounds I approve this Ritualism, I do it as a matter of external order, in nowise essential to our acceptance with Christ. "By grace ye are saved through FAITH," said the Apostle, "and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God." If the ceremonial law were essential to salvation, the Gentiles could not have been declared free. The heart must be changed and sanctified by the Holy Spirit, or outward forms can profit us nothing. For forms are but the body of religion. The living, loving, animating Faith in the glorious Redeemer is its SOUL.

I have no fear, however, that the advocates of Ritualism are in any danger of forgetting this fundamental principle of the Gospel. Nor can I comprehend the notion that the use of solemn, beautiful and impressive forms must be hostile to the spirit of Christian devotion.

I have only to state in conclusion, that I am an advocate for Ritualism, so far as it is fairly warranted by the Bible and the law of the Church, and can make its way with the free choice of Ministers and people. It is not likely that I shall bear any active part in it, as my age is too advanced for my habits to be changed. But I have little doubt that my children will behold the "glory and the beauty" of our public worship brought back to the first stage in the Reformation, in accordance with the rule which has never been formally renounced, and still remains in the rubric of the English Prayer Book. And I trust that the work, conducted as it should be, in the spirit of a pure and living Faith, and with the Christian grace of peace and charity, will add attractiveness to the cause of truth, and increase the influence of the glorious Gospel.—(pp. 79—83.)

COPY OF A DECLARATION OF THE AMERICAN BISHOPS AGAINST RITUALISM.

APPENDICES.

THE DECLARATION.

Whereas at a meeting of the House of Bishops, held in the city of New York in the month of October, the subject of ritualism was brought to the notice of the House and considered with a great degree of unanimity; and—

Whereas, on account of the absence of a number of the right reverend members of the House, and the fact that the House was not sitting as a co-ordinate branch of the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America, it was regarded as inexpedient to proceed to any formal action; and—

Whereas it was nevertheless regarded as highly desirable that an expression of opinion on the part of the episcopate of this Church should be given with respect to ritualistic innovations. Therefore, the undersigned bishops, reserving each for himself his rights as ordinary of his own diocese, and also his rights as a member of the House of Bishops, sitting in General Convention, do unite in the Declaration following:—

We hold, in the language of the 34th Article of Religion, that "every particular or national Church hath authority to ordain, change, and abolish ceremonies or rites of the Church, ordained only by man's authority, so that all things be done to edifying;" and also, in the language of the same Article, that, "It is not necessary that traditions and ceremonies be in all places one, or utterly like; for at all times they have been divers, and may be changed according to the diversity of countries, of times and men's manners, so that nothing be ordained against God's Word;" and also, that this Church was duly organized as a "particular and national Church" in communion with the Universal or Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church of Christ, and that this organization, which took place immediately after the American Revolution, was settled under the careful direction and advice, and with the cordial co-operation, of godly, well-learned, and justly venerated divines, who were well acquainted with the history of the Church of England before and since her blessed Reformation, and who thoroughly understood what was and is still required by the peculiarities of this country and its people.

We hold, therefore, that the ceremonies, rites, and worship then established, ordained, and approved by common authority, as set forth in the Book of Common Prayer of this Church, are the law of this Church, which every bishop, presbyter, and deacon of the same has bound himself, by subscription to the Promise of Conformity in Article VII. of the Constitution, to obey, observe, and follow; and that no strange or foreign usage should be introduced or sanctioned by the private judgment of any member or members of this church, clerical or lay.

We further hold, that while this Church is "far from intending to depart from the Church of England in any essential point of doctrine, discipline, or worship, or further than local circumstances require," it yet has its peculiar place, character, and duty as a "particular and national church;" and that no Prayer Book of the Church of England, in the reign of whatever sovereign set forth, and no laws of the Church of England, have any force of law in this Church, such as can be justly cited in defence of any departure from the express law of this Church, its liturgy, its discipline, rites and usages.

And we, therefore, consider that in this particular national Church any attempt to introduce into the public worship of Almighty God usages that have never been known, such as the use of incense, and the burning of lights in the order for the Holy Communion,—reverences to the Holy Table or to the elements thereon, such as indicate or imply that the sacrifice of our Divine Lord and Saviour, "once offered," was not a "full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world,—" the adoption of clerical habits hitherto unknown, or material alterations of those which have been in use since the establishment of our Episcopate,—is an innovation which violates the discipline of the Church, "offendeth against its common order, and hurteth the authority of the magistrate, and woundeth the consciences of the weak brethren."

Furthermore, that we be not misunderstood, let it be noted that we include in these censures all departures from the laws, rubrics, and settled order of this Church, as well by defect as by excess of observance, designing to maintain in its integrity the sound Scriptural and Primitive, and therefore the Catholic and Apostolic, spirit of the Book of Common Prayer.

A note from Bishop Eastburn to the Christian Witness states,—

I beg to call attention to the important fact, that the twenty-eight signatures appended to this Declaration are those of bishops who hold various ecclesiastical and doctrinal views, and who have nevertheless felt themselves constrained to unite in one common statement in regard to practices which they have felt to be a deplorable injury to our beloved and honoured Communion. And I cannot but affectionately express the hope, that, impressed by this unanimity of feeling on the part of so large a number of the chief ministers of our Church, those of my dear brethren in the ministry who have practised any of these innovations on our usages will see it fit to discontinue them, and to adhere to that ancient simplicity which is so in harmony with our Liturgy, Articles, and Offices, and in the exercise of which we have hitherto, by the Divine blessings, enjoyed so large a measure of prosperity, and have been growing from year to year in the respect and confidence of the people of this country. It is also my earnest trust and prayer, that the laity of our diocese will do their part in discountenancing the novelties here condemned, and in maintaining the scriptural, simple, and Protestant character of our public worship by which it has ever been distinguished.

APPENDIX H.

To the Most Reverend CHARLES THOMAS, Lord Archbishop of CANTERBURY, Primate of all England and Metropolitan and to the Royal Commissioners on Ritual.

The humble Memorial of the President and Council of the English Church Union.

Sheweth,

1. That upon Saturday the 3rd of February 1866 the following Memorial was presented by the Earl of Carnarvon on behalf of a large and influential deputation to the Archbishop of Canterbury at Lambeth Palace.

“We, the undersigned clergy and lay communicants of the Church of England respectfully object to any alteration being made in the Book of Common Prayer respecting the ‘ornaments of the Church and of the ministers thereof,’ and the mode and manner of performing Divine Service ‘according to the use of the Church of England.’”

That the said Memorial was signed by 2,995 of the clergy and 36,008 lay communicants of the Church of England, making altogether, clergy and lay, 39,003.

That other similar memorials were presented to the Lord Archbishop on the same occasion signed by 102 clergy, and 2,513 lay persons.

2. That upon 9th of July last the Lord Redesdale presented to the House of Lords a petition, of which the following is a copy:—

“The humble petition of the undersigned clergy and lay communicants of the Church of England,

Sheweth,

“That a bill has been introduced into your Right Honourable House intituled ‘An Act for the better enforcing uniformity in the clerical vestments and ornaments to be worn by ministers of the “ ‘United Church of England and Ireland in the performance of public worship.’

“That your petitioners object, independently of other reasons, to any alteration being made in the formularies or in the Laws and Ordinances of the Church, which has not been previously sanctioned by the bishops and clergy of both provinces in their convocation.

“Your petitioners therefore pray your Right Honourable House not to pass the said Bill.

“And your petitioners shall ever pray.”

That the above petition was signed by 655 clergy, 6,249 men, and 2,510 women, in all 9,414 clergy and laity.

That this petition would have been more largely signed if clergy and lay communicants had not concluded it was too late in the session for the Vestments Bill to pass into Law this year.

And your Memorialists will ever pray.

Signed on behalf of the President and Council.

COLIN LINDSAY,
President.

APPENDIX I.

THE ORNAMENTS OF THE MINISTER.

CASE SUBMITTED TO COUNSEL on behalf of several Archbishops and Bishops of the united Church of England and Ireland; together with the joint opinion thereon of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, Sir HUGH M. CAIRNS, Q.C., Mr. MELLISH, Q.C., Mr. BARROW.

GILLET J. OTTAWAY, Solicitor, 39, Essex Street, Strand.

(Rivingtons, London, Oxford, and Cambridge, 1866.)

CASE.

IN consequence of an attempt which has been made of late years to revive the use, by the Officiating Minister, of certain vestments and ornaments during the performance of Divine Service, some of the Bishops of the Established Church are desirous of obtaining an Opinion as to what is the present state of the law upon the subject.

This Case has accordingly been prepared, and is submitted to Counsel for that purpose.

The Statute at present in force by which the use of the Common Prayer Book is enjoined, is the 13th and 14th Car. II. c. 4., commonly called the “Act of Uniformity.” After a recital in the 1st section of the Act, amongst other things, that the Commissioners appointed for that purpose by the King had framed the Book of Common Prayer,—by the 2nd section it is provided that all and singular ministers in any Cathedral, Collegiate or Parish Church or Chapel shall be bound to say and use the Morning Prayer, Evening Prayer, Celebration and Administration of both the Sacraments, and all other the Public and Common Prayer, in such order and form as is mentioned in the said Book.

By the 3rd and 6th sections it is provided that every Incumbent; then or thereafter promoted to any Ecclesiastical benefice, shall, upon some Lord’s Day, openly read the Morning and Evening Prayer appointed to be read by and according to the said Book of Common Prayer, and shall openly before the congregation declare his unfeigned assent and consent to the use of all things in the said book contained and prescribed; and a particular form of words is enjoined by which that declaration is to be made.

Such being the requirements of the Statute, it will be found, on reference to the Prayer Book itself, that immediately preceding the Order for Morning Prayer stands this Rubric:—

“And here is to be noted, that such Ornaments of the Church and of the Ministers thereof at all times

"of their ministrations, shall be retained and be in use, as were in this Church of England, by the authority of Parliament, in the 2nd year of the reign of King Edward the Sixth."

That the word "Ornaments" contained in the Rubric includes Vestments has been decided by the Privy Council in the judgment delivered in the case of Liddell v. Westerton, a printed copy of which accompanies this Case. The passage bearing upon this point will be found at page 111. The same judgment, moreover, decides that the Ornaments contemplated by this Rubric were those prescribed by the Prayer Book put forth by the authority of the Statute 2 & 3 Edw. VI. cap. 1.

Upon reference to the Rubrics of that Prayer Book (1549), it will be found that the directions as to Vestments are as follow:—At the commencement of the Communion Service the Rubric stands thus:—

"The Priest that shall execute the holy ministry shall put upon him the vesture appointed for that ministration, that is to say, a white albe, plain, with a vestment or cope. And when there be many Priests or Deacons, then so many shall be ready to help the Priest in the ministration as shall be requisite, and shall have upon them likewise the vestures appointed for their ministry, that is to say, albes with tunicles."

(N.B.—The word "vestment" in this Rubric is understood to be synonymous with "chasuble.")

Again, at the conclusion of the Service, in the same Prayer Book there is a Rubric, which, after providing for the use of the Litany on Wednesdays and Fridays, proceeds thus:—

"And though there be none to communicate with the Priest, yet these days after the Litany ended, the Priest shall put upon him a plain albe or surplice, with a cope, and shall say all things at the altar (appointed to be said at the celebration of the Lord's Supper) until after the offertory."

It will be observed that the two Rubrics above cited apply to the vestments to be used at the Celebration of the Lord's Supper only. But at the end of the Prayer Book are to be found some provisions under the title "Certain Notes for the more plain explication and decent ministration of things contained in this Book;" and among these Notes is the following:—

"In the saying or singing of matins and evensong, baptizing and burying, the Minister in Parish Churches or Chapels annexed to the same shall use a surplice; and in all Cathedral Churches and Colleges the Archdeacons, Deans, Provosts, Masters, Prebendaries, and Fellows being graduates, may use in the choir, besides their surplices, such hoods as pertaineth to their several degrees which they have taken in any University within this realm; but in all other places every minister shall be at liberty to use any surplice or no. It is also seemly that graduates when they do preach should use such hoods as pertaineth to their several degrees. And whensoever the Bishop shall celebrate the Holy Communion in the Church or execute any other public ministration, he shall have upon him, besides his rochette, a surplice or albe, and a cope or vestment; and also his pastoral staff in his hand, or else borne or holden by his chaplain."

These are all the Rubrics in the Prayer Book of 1549 which bear upon the subject of vestments to be worn or used by the Clergy (a further Rubric upon a vestment of another kind will be alluded to presently), and thus it would at first sight appear that all that is necessary for the understanding of the Rubric is to ascertain what are the precise articles intended by the several words "albe," "vestment" or "chasuble," "cope," "tunicle," "surplice," "hood," and "rochette."

If this view be correct, it would follow that those of the Clergy, who seek to revive the use of such of these habits as have become obsolete, have law on their side, so far that they ought at any rate to be unmoled in their endeavours, even if they ought not to receive positive active support from their Diocesan.

But on the other hand it is perfectly clear, as matter of history, that, notwithstanding these and other enactments, to which the attention of Counsel will be presently directed, the use in Parish Churches of the alb, vestment, cope, and tunicle has been obsolete for the last three hundred years; and the question therefore arises, what is the sense in which the Rubric in the present Prayer Book is to be understood? Did the words of that Rubric convey to the minds of those who framed it a different meaning from what they seem to convey, and were they, in consequence, used in such different meaning?

It is thought advisable to draw attention in the first instance to certain Statutes, and to other documents which, although not Statutes, seem to have been recognized as having authority upon the point; and afterwards, to set out some few passages from contemporaneous writings, and to state some historical facts, which may assist in showing the interpretation which was given to those Statutes, &c. at the time when they were first promulgated, and thenceforward to the date of the last revision.

The Statute of 2 and 3 Edw. VI. (1548) was not long allowed to remain in force. It was followed by a Statute, 5 and 6 Edw. VI. cap. 1. (1552), the 5th Section of which declares that "the King's Most Excellent Majesty, with the authority of Parliament, hath caused the aforesaid Order of Common Service" (meaning the Prayer Book of 1549) "to be faithfully and godly perused, explained, and made fully perfect, and by the aforesaid authority hath annexed and joined it so explained and perfected to this present Statute."—Adding a form for consecrating Archbishops, Bishops, Priests and Deacons, &c. And it then provides that the former Statute of 1548 should be applied for establishing the Book of Common Prayer "now explained and hereto annexed." By the Book annexed to this Statute the directions as to Vestments were entirely altered. The Rubrics at the commencement and conclusion of the Communion Service were omitted; and at the beginning of the book, before the commencement of the Order for Morning Prayer, was a direction that—

"The Minister at the time of the Communion, and at all other times in his ministration, shall use neither alb, vestment, nor cope; but being an Archbishop or Bishop he shall have and wear a rochet, and being a Priest or Deacon shall have and wear a surplice only."

The two Acts of Uniformity above mentioned were repealed by a Statute, 1. Mary, Sess. II. cap. 2 (1553), which enacted that all such Divine Service and administration of the Sacraments as were most commonly used in England in the last year of King Henry VIII., and none other, should be used throughout the realm after the 20th day of December 1553.

This Statute, however, was repealed in its turn by the 1. Eliz. cap. 2, so far only as it concerned the use of the book of 1552, and was therefore left in force so far as it prohibited the use of King Edward's first Prayer Book of 1549. But the Statute of Elizabeth has given rise to some complication of the question. By the 3rd section it is enacted that "all and singular Ministers in any Cathedral or Parish Church be bounden to say and use the Matins, Evensong, Celebration of the Lord's Supper, and administration of each of the Sacraments, and all the common and open prayer in such order and form as is mentioned in the said book so authorized by Parliament in the said 5th and 6th years of the Reign of King Edward the Sixth, with one alteration or addition of certain lessons to be used on every Sunday in the year, and the form of the Litany altered and corrected, and two sentences only added in the delivery of the Sacrament to the Communicants, and NONE OTHER OR OTHERWISE."

But there is a proviso contained in the 25th section, which is in these words: "Provided always, and be it enacted, that such Ornaments of the Church and of the Ministers thereof shall be retained and be in use, as was in this Church of England by authority of Parliament, in the second year of King Edward VI.—Until other order shall be taken by the authority of the Queen's Majesty with the advice of her Commissioners appointed and authorized under the Great Seal of England for Causes Ecclesiastical, or of the Metropolitan of this Realm."

It was probably to give effect to this proviso that an alteration, in addition to those specified in the 3rd section, was introduced into the Rubrics of Queen Elizabeth's book.

This alteration consisted in omitting the Rubric as to vestments placed at the commencement of King

APPENDICES. Edward VI.'s second Prayer Book, and substituting the following:

"And here it is to be noted that the Minister at the time of the Communion, and at all other times in his ministrations, shall use such Ornaments in the Church as were in use by authority of Parliament, in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI., according to the Act of Parliament set in the beginning of this book," i.e. the Statute of Uniformity above quoted, which was printed at length at the beginning of the book.

Nearly contemporaneous with this Statute, were the Injunctions issued by the Queen, not, however, under any Parliamentary authority, but under her Prerogative as supreme head of the Church. (Cardwell's "Documentary Annals," vol. I. page 210, Note, Oxford Ed. 1844.) They were entitled "Injunctions given by the Queen's Majesty concerning both the Clergy and the laity of this realm." It is to the 30th that attention should be directed. It is in these terms:—

"XXX.—ITEM, Her Majesty being desirous to have the prelacy and clergy of this realm to be had as well in outward reverence, as otherwise regarded for the worthiness of their ministries, and thinking it necessary to have them known to the people in all places and assemblies, both in the Church and without, and thereby to receive the honour and estimation due to the special messengers and ministers of Almighty God, willeth and commandeth, that all Archbishops and Bishops, and all other that be called or admitted to preaching or ministry of the Sacraments, or that be admitted into vocation ecclesiastical, or into any society of learning in either of the Universities or elsewhere, shall use and wear such seemly habits, garments, and such square caps, as were most commonly and orderly received in the latter year of King Edward VI.; not thereby meaning to attribute any holiness or special worthiness to the said garments, but as Saint Paul writeth: "Omnia decenter et secundum ordinem fiant."

The Archbishops and Bishops afterwards in 1559 drew up "Interpretations and further considerations" of these Injunctions. (Cardwell's "Doc. Ann.," vol. I. pp. 236-238, where the authority for this assertion is cited.) Among them will be found the following:—

ITEM, That all Bishops and others, having any living ecclesiastical, shall go in apparel agreeable; or else, within two monitions given by the ordinary, to be deposed or sequestered from his fruits, according to the discretion of his said ordinary, or his lawful deputy."

At the end of the "Interpretations, &c." which have any direct reference to the Injunctions themselves, others are added under various titles, such as "Concerning the Book of Service," "Concerning Burials and Matrimony," and so forth; and among the "Interpretations" under the first of these heads is the following:—First, "That there be used only but one apparel; as the cope in the ministrations of the Lord's Supper, and the Surplice in all other ministrations; and that there be no other manner and form of ministering the Sacraments, but as the Service book doth precisely prescribe, with the declaration of the Injunctions; as for example, the common bread."

The next step in legislation was the issuing a document known at the time by the name of the "Advertisements," in March 1564-5, finally authorized by Royal proclamation, March 1565-6. (Strype's "Parker," par. 214. Harrison's "Historical Inquiry," p. 107.) They were drawn up by Commissioners acting under the powers referred to in the 25th section of the Statute of Uniformity above mentioned.

The part of the Advertisements material to this case is as follows:—

ITEM. In ministrations of the Holy Communion in the Cathedral and Collegiate Churches the principal Minister shall use a cope, with gospeller and epistoler agreeably; and at all other prayers to be sayde at the Communion Table, to use no copes but surplices."

ITEM. That the Deane and Prebendaries weare a surplices with a silke hooede in the quyer; and when they preache in the Cathedral or Collegiate Church to weare their hooede."

ITEM. That every Minister sayinge any publique prayers, or ministringe of the Sacramentes, or other rites of the Church, shall weare a comely surplices, with sleeves, to bee provided at the charges of the parishe." (Cardwell's "Doc. Ann." vol. I. p. 326.]

No other attempt to alter or explain the existing law was made until the publication in 1604 of the Canons, which have remained in force ever since.

Those that are material are as follows:—

XXIV.

"Copes to be worn in Cathedral Churches by those that administer the Holy Communion."

"In all Cathedral and Collegiate Churches, the Holy Communion shall be administered upon principal Feast-days, sometimes by the Bishop, if he be present, and sometimes by the Dean, and at sometimes by a Canon or Prebendary, the principal Minister using a decent cope, and being assisted with the Gospeller and Epistoler agreeably, according to the Advertisements published ann. 7 Elizabethæ: The said Communion to be administered at such times, and with such limitation as is specified in the Book of Common Prayer, Provided, That no such limitation by any construction shall be allowed of, but that all Deans, Wardens, Masters, or Heads of Cathedral and Collegiate Churches, Prebendaries, Canons, Vicars, Petty Canons, Singing-men, and all others of the Foundation, shall receive the Communion four times yearly at the least."

XXV.

"Surplices and hoods to be worn in Cathedral Churches when there is no Communion."

"In the time of Divine Service and Prayers in all Cathedral and Collegiate Churches, when there is no Communion, it shall be sufficient to wear Surplices: saving that all Deans, Masters, and Heads of Collegiate Churches, Canons and Prebendaries, being Graduates, shall daily, at the times both of Prayer and Preaching, wear with their surplices, such Hoods as are agreeable to their degrees."

LVIII.

"Ministers reading Divine Service, and administering the Sacraments, to wear Surplices and Graduates therewithal Hoods."

"Every Minister saying the Public Prayer, or ministering the Sacraments or other Rites of the Church, shall wear a comely Surplice with sleeves, to be provided at the charge of the parish; and if any question arise touching the matter, decency, or comeliness thereof, the same shall be decided by the discretion of the Ordinary. Furthermore, such Ministers, as are Graduates shall wear upon their surplices at such times, such hoods as, by the orders of the Universities, are agreeable to their degrees, which no Minister shall wear (being no Graduate) under pain of suspension. Notwithstanding, it shall be lawful for such Ministers as are not Graduates, to wear upon their surplices, instead of hoods, some decent tippet of black, so it be not silk."

Contemporaneously with the Canons was the publication of a revised Liturgy in 1604, the Rubric at the commencement of which was in these words:—

"And here it is to be noted that the Minister at the time of the Communion, and at all other times in his ministrations, shall use such ornaments in the Church, as were in use by authority of Parliament, in the second year of King Edward VI., according to the Act of Parliament set in the beginning of this book."

The Act of Parliament here referred to is the Statute of Elizabeth, which was re-printed at the beginning of the revised book, before a Royal proclamation by which the use of that book was enjoined.

This state of things remained unchanged until the revision of the Liturgy in 1662; when the Statute of Uniformity was passed, which, together with the Rubric of that Book, has already been set out.

But it must be added that the Statute provides in the 28th section for the printing of the Act itself, with the book annexed thereto, and for the exemplification, under the Great Seal, of certain copies, which, when so exemplified, were to be deemed and taken to be good and available in law to all intents and purposes. In the sealed copies the Statute of Elizabeth was re-printed before that of Charles; and both are referred to in the Table of Contents, under the title "An Act for the Uniformity of Common Prayer."

It is now proposed to draw attention to some matters which may assist in determining the sense in which the language of these several enactments, from the Statute of Elizabeth to that of Charles, was understood. And it may be as well to advert, in the first instance, to some expressions in the correspondence which took place between the English Divines and those on the Continent, especially at Zurich, upon the controversy as to vestments, which (having existed in and before the time of Edw. VI.) was revived with considerable force almost immediately upon the passing of the Statute and the publication of the Injunctions of Elizabeth.

Among the letters written to Zurich for advice upon the matter is one from Bishop Horn to Gualter, dated the 16th July 1565. Although this date is subsequent to the "Advertisements," the state of things which he adverts to had arisen and had formed the subject of correspondence for some time previously. The letter in question is given by Burnet in the Appendix to his "History of the Reformation," but is there quoted very incorrectly. The following is an extract from the letter as it appears in the "Epistolæ Tigurinae," p. 84 of Appendix to the "Zurich Letters, 1558-1579," published by the Parker Society:—

"Res nostræ ita se habent, quod ut vos vicinas Gallicas, sic nos intestinas papisticas timemus insidias. Primate papistici in publicis custodiis, reliqui exilium affectantes, scriptis quibusdam in vulgus disseminatis, sese in gratiam, nos in odium vocant, ansam minutam sane et ejusmodi nacti. Controversiâ nuper de quadratis pileis et superpellicis inter nos ortâ, exclamârunt papistæ, non esse quam profitemur unanimum in religione fidem, sed variis nos opinionibus duci, nec in unâ sententiâ stare posse. Auxit hanc calumpniâ publicum senatus nostri decretum de profligandâ papistica potestate ante nostram restitutionem sancitum, quo, sublatâ reliquâ fœce, usus pileorum quadratorum et superpelliceorum ministris remanebat; ita tamen ut superstitionis opinione careret, quod disertis decreti verbis cavetur. Tolli hoc decretum non potest, nisi omnium regni ordinum, quorum consensu constitutum fuit, conspiratione atque consensu. Nobis, penes quos tunc non fuit sancienti vel abrogandi auctoritas, pileis et superpellicis uti, vel aliis locum dare injunctum est. Usi his sumus, ne munera christiana, per nos deserta, occuparent adversarii."

It will at once be remarked that some confusion between the Statute and Injunction is apparent in this extract. It must be clear that Horn had in his mind the requirements of the Injunctions, which alone contain a passage at all answering this description, "ita tamen ut superstitionis opinione careret, ut disertis decreti verbis cavetur." It seems to be equally clear that it is the Statute of Uniformity to which he alludes as the "publicum senatus nostri decretum," which alone would satisfy the description, "Tolli hoc decretum non potest," &c.

Again, in speaking in the last sentence above quoted of the injunction to wear the caps and surplices or give place to others, it may be uncertain whether he is alluding to the XXX. Injunction coupled with the "Interpretation" above set forth, or to the 4th, 5th, and 6th sections of the statute of Elizabeth. At first sight this injunction would seem to relate only to the habits to be worn, not during ministration in the church, but in every-day life, and it is so treated by Burnet in the remarks he makes upon it. He says, "Ministers wearing such apparel as might distinguish them from the laity was certainly a means to keep them under great restraint upon every indecency in their behaviour, laying them open to the censures of the people; which could not be, if they were habited so that they could not be distinguished from other men." (Burnet, "Reformation," P. II. Book III. Vol. III. pp. 798, 799. Oxford Ed. 1829.) And in a letter, written in July 1566, from Humphrey and Sampson to Bullinger, among "some blemishes which still attach to the Church of England," is found, "6. The Popish habits are ordered to be worn out of church, and by Ministers in general; and the Bishops wear their linen garments, which they call a rochet, while both parties wear the square cap, tippets, and long gowns borrowed from the Papists." Yet, from the collocation of the passage in Bishop Horn's letter, and especially from the preceding sentence (publicum senatus decretum, quo, sublatâ reliquâ fœce, &c.), it seems clear that he is referring to the Act of Uniformity, which has no enactment as to vestments used in every-day life, but only to such as may be included in the word ornaments, in the 25th Section of the Statute and in the Rubric in the Prayer Book.

The object of quoting this passage from Bishop Horn's letter is to show that, notwithstanding the inconsistencies here adverted to, the interpretation put upon the Statute of Elizabeth by him and the party he was representing was, that while it preserved the use of the square cap and surplice, it had swept away the other dregs of Romish practices.

This view is confirmed by a letter from Bishop Sandys to Archbishop Parker, which is quoted by Cardwell ("Conferences," page 36) from Strype's "Annals." The Bishop says:—"The last book of Service is gone through, with a proviso to retain ornaments that were in use in the 1st and 2nd years of King Edward until it please the Queen to take other order for them. Our gloss upon this text is, that we shall not be forced to use them; but that others in the mean time shall not convey them away, but that they may remain for the Queen."

Again, the interpretation put upon the law is exemplified by the practice which held good in the Church after the Statute of Uniformity and before the appearance of the Advertisements. The history of their publication is given by Burnet, and may be shortly stated in his own words. "The matter being thus settled (i.e. by the passing of the Act of Uniformity), there followed great variety in practice; many conforming themselves in all points to the law, while others did not use either the surplice or the square cap and hood according to their degree." (Burnet, "Reformation," Part III. Book II. Vol. V. p. 587.) He then goes on to relate the appointment of a Commission to make Orders for suppressing these variations and reducing all to one uniform practice; from which Commission the Advertisements afterwards emanated.

Now, with regard to this passage, it may be remarked that Burnet was probably quoting from a MS. dated February 1564, found among Secretary Cecil's papers, which gives a summary of the variations from uniformity which were then prevalent. It is important to remark that its date is before the issuing of the Advertisements, so that the question of uniformity was to be decided by the then existing law. It is taken from Strype's "Life of Archbishop Parker," Vol. I. pp. 301, 302, and is as follows:—

Varieties in the Service and Administration used.

"Some say the Service and Prayers in the Chancel; others in the body of the Church; some say the same in a seat made in the Church; some in the pulpit with their faces to the people; some keep precisely the order of the book; others intermeddle psalms in metre. Some say in a surplice; others without a surplice.

"The table standeth in the body of the Church in some places; in others it standeth in the Chancel. In some places the table standeth altarwise, distant from the wall yard. In some others in the middle of the Chancel north and south. In some places the table is joined, in others it standeth upon tressels; in some the table hath a carpet, in others it hath none.

"Some with the surplice and cap; some with surplice alone; others with none; some with chalice; some with a communion cup; others with a common cup; some with unleavened bread and some with leavened. [He might have added some with wafers, some with common manchet bread.] Some receive kneeling, others standing, others sitting.

"Some baptize in a font, some in a basin; some sign with the sign of the Cross, others sign not. Some minister in a surplice, others without.

"Some with a square cap; some with a round cap; some with a button cap; some with a hat; some in scholars clothes, some in others."

Considering how minutely every point of variance is mentioned in this document, it can hardly be considered possible that any use of the alb, cope, and other vestments enjoined by the Rubric of 1549 could have been passed over without notice; and the passage in italics, in the quotation from Burnet at p. 23, can only be true on the supposition that the surplice, square cap, and academical hood were all that the law required—or, at any rate, that such was Burnet's opinion.

Again, Burnet, in the records attached to his Supplement, gives a letter from Bullinger to Humphrey and Sampson, dated May 1566. It is true that this is after the Advertisements of 1565-6, but it is clear from the context of the letter that it related to the same controversy which was the subject of Horn's letter previously quoted. It will be found in Burnet's "History of the Reformation," Book VI. No. 77. Ed. Oxon, 1829, Vol. VI. p. 427. It contains this passage:—

APPENDICES.

"Nunquam probaverim si vestrum jubeamini exequi ministerium, ad aram crucifixi imagine oneratam magis quam ornatam, et in veste missaticâ, hoc est in albâ et in capâ, quæ a tergo quoque ostendet crucifixi imaginem. Attamen ex literis allatis ex Angliâ intelligo, nulla, nunc est de ejusmodi vestitu contentio, sed questio, est an liceat ministris evangelicis portare pileum rotundum vel quadratum et vestem albam, quam vocant superpelliceum, quâ minister ornatus a vulgo discernatur. Et an oporteat ministerium vel stationem sacram citius relinquere, quam hujusmodi uti vestibus."

Again, Strype, in his "Annals of the Reformation," Vol. I. Part II. Chapter xli., gives a summary of the reasons which were throughout the contest urged against the use of the garments. It is not necessary to set them out, but it is sufficient to remark that every one of them would apply with tenfold force to the use of the alb, chasuble, &c., and they were actually applied to the use of the square cap and surplice only.

For these reasons it is submitted that the disuse of these vestments before the publication of the Advertisements in 1565-6 is rendered highly probable.

It should, however, be remarked that in the letter above quoted (pp. 21-22) from Humphrey and Sampson to Bullinger, and which seems to have been an answer to the one last quoted from him, one of their complaints, which immediately precedes the one previously set out, is this:—5. "The sacred habits, namely, the cope and surplice, are used at the Lord's Supper." The date of this letter is July 1566, by which time the Advertisements had appeared, which did expressly require the use of the cope during the celebration of the Communion in Cathedral and Collegiate Churches, as has before been pointed out. Such limited use as this might well be consistent with this complaint on the part of Humphrey and Sampson, but it would by no means follow that the cope was ever used in parish churches at this time.

It is also to be remarked, as connected with the interpretation of the Statute, that among the vestments, the use of which is required by the Rubric of the first Prayer Book of Edw. VI., is the chrysom, or chrism, in the Baptismal Service. The direction to use the "Ornaments of the Church," authorized by that Prayer Book, was never construed to include that vestment; indeed, the form of words accompanying its use was omitted in every subsequent Prayer Book.

It seems therefore highly probable that the construction put upon the Statute of Elizabeth and the Rubric of her Prayer Book, independently of the Advertisements, in those very days, was, that they required in parish churches the use of no more than the surplice, and did not intend to enforce the use of the alb, chasuble, vestment, and tunicle, prescribed by the Rubric of Edw. VI.

Of course, after the publication of the Advertisements in 1565-6, the disuse of the vestments would be no guide to the interpretation of the Statute, and it becomes unnecessary to this part of the case, to pursue the inquiry as to what was done after their appearance.

But it still remains to be seen what was the sense in which the corresponding Rubric was used in the two Prayer Books of 1604 and 1662.

Upon this point two suggestions have been made by some of the clergy, whose ability and research entitle their opinion to consideration. The first is, that the framers of the present Rubric were in this position:—they found a certain form of words in the Rubric of Queen Elizabeth's book which in their view had not been repealed, but explained and modified by the Advertisements; and they therefore thought that, by adopting Queen Elizabeth's form of words, they were in reality adopting the modified sense which the Advertisements had attached to them.

This view is supported by the History of the Hampton Court Conference held in the year 1604, and of the Savoy Conference in the year 1661. Both these Conferences preceded revisions of the Liturgy. At both the Non-conformists were represented, and made strenuous endeavours to procure certain alterations in the Liturgy as it then stood. The Hampton Court Conference was brought about by a petition presented to King James I. soon after his accession. The Puritans represented themselves to be groaning under a common burden of rites and ceremonies, from which they prayed to be eased and relieved. They mention what they are pleased to term certain offences, which they pray may be some removed, some amended, and some qualified. Among them, "In the Church Service that the cross in baptism, interrogatories ministered to infants, confirmations, as superfluous, may be done away; Baptism not to be administered by women and so explained; the cope, and surplice not urged," and other matters of offence which is not necessary to advert to. (Cardwell's "conferences," page 131.) The proceedings of the Conference are very long; but what is material to this point may be stated shortly, namely, that the king refused to allow any alteration in the obligation to wear the surplice (Cardwell's "Conferences," pp. 200, 210, 211), but evidently without any intention to revive the use of the vestments of the Prayer Book of 1549; for it has been shown above (pages 15, 16, 17) that by the Canon of 1604 the use of the cope was confined to the cathedral and collegiate Churches, and the surplice was enjoined in parish churches. Still, notwithstanding the Canons, in the Prayer Book as revised by James, and which is therefore contemporaneous with them, the Rubric was allowed to stand verbatim as it had appeared in Elizabeth's Prayer Book of 1559.

The Savoy Conference was held by virtue of a Royal Commission dated 25 March, 1661, which defined the objects to be pursued, and the method taken in the proceedings. They were expressed thus:—"To advise upon and review the Book of Common Prayer, comparing the same with the most ancient Liturgies, which have been used in the Church in the primitive and purest times: and to that end to assemble and meet together from time to time, and at such times within the space of four calendar months now next ensuing, in the Master's lodgings in the Savoy, in the Strand, in the County of Middlesex, or in such other place or places as to you shall be thought fit and convenient; to take into your serious and grave considerations the several directions, rules, and Forms of Prayer, and things in the said Book of Common Prayer contained, and to advise and consult upon and about the same, and the several objections and exceptions which shall now be raised against the same. And if occasion be, to make such reasonable and necessary alterations, corrections, and amendments therein, as by and between you and the said Archbishop, Bishops, Doctors, and persons hereby required and authorised to meet and advise as aforesaid, shall be agreed upon to be needful or expedient for the giving satisfaction unto tender consciences, and the restoring and continuance of peace and unity in the Churches under our protection and government; but avoiding, as much as may be, all unnecessary alterations of the Forms and Liturgy where-with the people are already acquainted, and have so long received in the Church of England." [Cardwell's "Conferences," p. 258.]

In dealing with the question at this Conference, no objection was taken that the Rubric, as it had stood in James's Prayer Book, had revived the use of the objectionable vestments; but the grievance on this point which was complained of was, "That (under the Rubric as it then was) public worship may not be celebrated by any minister that dare not wear a surplice;" and so, when stating their objections seriatim to the different parts of the Prayer Book as it then stood, the objection to this Rubric appeared in these words:—"Forasmuch as this Rubric seemeth to bring back the cope, albe, and other vestments forbidden by the Common Prayer Book, 5 and 6 Edward VI., and so our reasons alleged against ceremonies under our 18th general exception, we desire it may be wholly left out." (Cardwell's "Conferences," p. 314.)

And the sense in which the Rubric was understood by the Bishops who managed the Conference on the other side, will appear from the answer they made to this requisition. It is in these terms:—"For the reasons given in our answer to the 18th general, whither you refer us, we think it fit that the Rubric continue as it is." (Cardwell's "Conferences," page 351.) And on referring to the answer given to the 18th general exception set out above, it will be found to be in these terms:—"We are now come to the main and principal demand, as it is pretended, viz., the abolishing laws which impose any ceremonies, especially three—the surplice, the sign of the cross, and kneeling;" and after giving at great length their reasons against the changes proposed, they say,—"There hath so much been said, not only of the lawfulness but also of the conveniency of those ceremonies mentioned, that nothing can be added. This, in brief, may here suffice for the surplice: that reason

"and experience teaches that decent ornaments and habits preserve reverence, and are therefore necessary to the solemnity of royal acts and acts of justice, and why not as well to the solemnity of religious worship? And in particular, no habit more suitable than white linen, which resembles purity and beauty, wherein angels have appeared (Rev. xv.), fit for those whom the Scriptures call angels; and the habit was ancient." (Cardwell's "Conferences," pages 345, 350.)

Moreover, it appears from the Journals of this same Convocation, that on March 4, 1664, "the Archbishop wished all his brother Bishops to use all care that all Ministers should read the Divine Service according to the Book, without any omission, in surplice and hood;" and this would seem to have met with the approval of the House, since it was formally entered on the Journals. (Cardwell's "Synodalia," Convocation, 1661, Sess. CXL., 4 Martii, 1664.)

Again, in 1681, Stillingfleet, as is said, made large overtures to the Dissenters, one of which was that the surplice should be taken away: (Cardwell's "Conferences," page 396, note.)

It ought, moreover, to be remarked that, although the difference is not great, the Rubric of 1662 was not allowed to continue as it was at the time of the Conference; and bearing in mind the objection and answer just adverted to, this variation in the language used is, perhaps, not without its significance. In the Statute of Elizabeth, the provision of the 25th Section was that such ornaments, &c. "shall be retained and be in use." In the Rubric of Elizabeth's Prayer Book the words are—"The minister, &c. shall use, &c." In the Rubric of James's Prayer Book the words are still "The minister, &c. shall use;" but in the present Prayer Book the words are "Such ornaments, &c. shall be retained and be in use, &c." (See pages 10, 11, 17, and 4 of this case for the precise language of each Rubric.) It may, perhaps, be fairly contended that the change in the form of this Rubric was intentional, and for the express object of limiting its application to such of the ornaments of the 2nd Edward VI. as could be said to be retained, and that, consequently, it would not apply to any which had then (1662) become obsolete, the introduction of which would not be a retention, but a restoration or revival.

It will be further observed that the words which in the former Rubrics were "at the time of the Communion, and at all other times in his ministration," now stand "at all times of their ministration." No doubt the two expressions amount to the same thing, but the mode of expressing the first seems more natural when the writer had in his mind the fact that the ornaments used at the Communion differed from those used at the other times of ministration, and the latter seems to be rather the language of a person who did not intend to recognize any such difference. But if no alteration was intended, why not have left the Rubric unaltered?

But apart from any considerations which may arise from examining minutely the language of the Rubric, some further light may be thrown upon the intention of its framers by adverting to the expressed opinions of some of those who, having been present at the Savoy Conference, were also members of Convocation, and as such took an active part in the revision of the Prayer Book. Among these were Frewen, Archbishop of York; Sheldon, Bishop of London, and afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury; Cosin, Bishop of Durham; Henchman, Bishop of Sarum; Morley, Bishop of Worcester; and Sparrow, afterwards Bishop of Exeter.

We find in Archbishop Frewen's Visitation Articles for the diocese and province of York in 1662 the following inquiries:—

"Have you a decent surplice, one or more, for your parson, vicar, or curate, or lecturer, to wear in the time of public ministration?"

"Doth he read the Book of Common Prayer?"

"etc."
And doth he wear the surplice while he performs that office in the offices mentioned in the Common Prayer Book?" (Harrison's "Hist. Inquiry," p. 176.)

Again, Bishop Cosin, in his Visitation Articles of 1662, required the surplice to be worn with the habit (which clearly means the gown; Harrison's "Historical Inquiry," page 175, note z) by the minister at the reading or celebrating any divine office; and among the inquiries made in each parish, he asks whether the lecturer read service, and that in a surplice, and whether in lecturing he use the ecclesiastical habit appointed for all ministers in the Church? (Cosin's Works, Vol. IV. p. 508-510.)

Eight years later than this, 1670, we find in a letter written by Sheldon, then Archbishop of Canterbury, to the Commissary Dean, and Archdeacon of Canterbury, concerning the King's directions to the Clergy, recommendations as to the performance of Divine Service, which he states he had sent to all the Bishops of his province; among which he enjoins that they require the parsons, vicars, and curates, "that in their own persons in their churches they do decently and solemnly perform the Divine Service by reading the prayers of the Church as they are appointed and ordered in and by the Book of Common Prayer, without addition to or diminishing from the same, or varying, either in substance or ceremony, from the order and method which by the said book is set down, wherein, I hear, and am afraid, too many do offend; and that, in the time of such their officiating, they ever make use of and wear their priestly habit, the surplice and hood." (Cardwell's "Doc. Ann." vol. II. pp. 328-329.)

Henchman and Morley were the prelates who acted for the Church party in framing King Charles's Declaration concerning ecclesiastical affairs, put forth in 1660. (Cardwell's "Doc. Ann." vol. II. p. 286.) This document deals seriatim with the four principal grievances then urged by the Dissenters, namely, kneeling at the reception of the Communion; the use of the cross in baptism; bowing at the name of Jesus; and the use of the surplice. As to the latter, the Declaration states:—

"For the use of the surplice we are contented that all men be at liberty to do as they shall think fit, without suffering in the least degree for wearing or not wearing it; provided that that liberty do not extend to our own Chapel, Cathedral or Collegiate Churches, or to any College in either of our Universities, but that the several Statutes and Customs for the use thereof in the said place be there observed as formerly."

The second suggestion is that the language of the Rubric ("such ornaments shall be retained as were in this Church of England by authority of Parliament," &c.) refers to the different sources from which the different ornaments of the Prayer Book of 1549 were derived. The word "authority," it is said, has not the meaning given to it at the present time, but means "authorship." The use of the vestment prescribed by the Rubric at the commencement of the Communion Service (p. 5) was a continuation of the ancient Ritual, and therefore not existing by the authority of Parliament in the sense of being originated by Parliament. But the two other Rubrics in Edward's First Book (pp. 5 & 6) originated the use of the surplice (alone or combined with the cope in certain cases), and these, therefore, to the exclusion of the first, are the enactments referred to as expressing what was authorized (i.e., originated) by Parliament. And moreover it is urged, that although this interpretation would legalize the use of the cope in combination with the surplice abstractedly, yet that the occasions on which such use would be legal would still be found to have been regulated by the Advertisements and Canons, and would thus be confined to the administration of the Communion in cathedral and collegiate churches. Although this view is at variance with the judgment given by the Privy Council, yet many of the reasons given above would support it; and in addition the following may be adduced:—

Of the Bishops, Sparrow (afterwards Bishop of Exeter) assisted the Bishop of the Savoy Conference, and was one of the three members of the Lower House of Convocation appointed to assist in revising the Prayer Book in 1661. In 1657 he published "A Rationale of the Prayer Book," and republished it in 1684, after he had succeeded to the See of Exeter. He wrote thus:—"Of the ornaments to be used in Divine Service. The Minister in time of his ministration shall use such ornaments as were in use in the 2nd Edward VI., Rubric 2, viz., a surplice at the ordinary ministration, and a cope at the Holy Communion in Cathedral and Collegiate Churches.—Queen Eliz. Artic. set forth anno 7."

Again, Baxter, in his "English Nonconformity," had repeated the objection to the Rubric made by the Nonconformists at the Savoy Conference (p. 32), with the addition, that the revival of the vestments thus enforced would be contrary to the Canon. He is thus answered by Bingham, the great Church antiquary, writing in the year 1706. Bingham quotes the present

APPENDICES.

Rubric, and as its parallel the Rubric at the end of the Prayer Book of 1549, and the 58th Canon; and he adds: "Where is now the contradiction between this Canon and the Rubrics? They all speak of surplices and hoods, but of no other ornaments belonging to private ministers. And Mr. Baxter might have known this, had he either consulted the old Rubric or Hamon l'Estrange, who compares the new and the old together." (Bingham's "French Church," Vol. III. p. 7.) Again, L'Estrange, to whom Bingham refers, published in 1659, and again in 1680, "The Alliance of Divine Offices," in which he printed the Common Prayer Book of James I. side by side with the two Liturgies of Edward VI. He sets out the Rubric of James's Book (p. 17), and to explain the reference to the "use of the authority of Parliament in the second year of Edward VI.," he prints the Rubric from the end of the book (p. 6), passing over without notice the Communion Rubric (p. 5).

Lastly, Gibson, in his Codex (p. 390), 2nd Edit. Oxford, 1761, sets out the Communion Rubric of 1549, and marks it in the margin as obsolete.

It is, moreover, very remarkable that this view is supported by the earliest document which can be cited as containing an authoritative interpretation of the Rubrics of 1549, namely, the "Interpretations," &c., mentioned at p. 13 of this case. For it will be remembered that the Bishops directed the use of one apparel only, viz., the cope at the Communion, and the surplice on all other occasions, thus forbidding the use of the alb, chasuble, and tunicle, mentioned in the first Rubric, p. 5.

It will be seen that if the latter suggestion be well founded, the effect would be simply to establish the state of things provided by Queen Elizabeth's Advertisements. The use of the cope would be legal in cathedral or collegiate churches, but no authority for the alb, chasuble, dalmatic, and tunicle could be established.

But besides the vestments above mentioned, there has latterly been introduced into the celebration of the Communion Service by the same school of clergymen the use of a large number of lighted candles placed on the Communion table, with the burning of incense at certain parts of the Service, and the mixing of water with the sacramental wine, the use of wafers as bread, and the introduction of hymns before and after the prayer of Consecration, and at the time of administering the elements.

One authority for the use of lights and incense is alleged to be the Rubric in our present Prayer Book coupled with the Injunctions put forth by Edward VI., previous to the Statute of 1548, among which will be found the following:—

"3. ITEM. That such images as they" (i.e. certain ecclesiastical persons previously mentioned) "know in any of their cures, &c., they shall forthwith take down and destroy the same, and shall suffer from henceforth no torches or candles, tapers or images of wax to be set afore any image or picture, but only two lights upon the high altar, before the Sacrament, which for the signification that Christ is the very true light of the world, they shall suffer to remain still," &c.

And it is also contended (and it is an argument which is applicable to the use of the vestments as well as to lights, &c.) first that whatever was once in use and not specifically abolished by authority of Parliament, must still be lawful, and secondly, that the rubric at all events must be explained by the Injunction just quoted, which it is said either had or had not the authority of Parliament in the 2nd year of Edward VI. If it had, it enjoins two lights. If it had not, it does not abolish the custom which had always prevailed of having many lights.

Whether the rubric can be considered an authority for this practice would turn upon the point whether lights and incense can be considered to be included within the description of such "ornaments of the Church and of the ministers, as were in this Church of England, by authority of Parliament in the 2nd year of King Edward VI." It has already been observed that the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of Liddell v. Westerton has decided that the word "ornament" is used in the sense of "apparatus" or "instrumentum," and that the words, "as were by authority of Parliament," &c., restrict the meaning to ornaments, the use of which in the Church was provided for by the Statute of Uniformity, 2 and 3 Edward VI. cap. 1. Now (as has been before observed) the Statute itself does not directly contain any provision as to ornaments; it only makes compulsory the use of a Prayer Book, in which are found Rubrics which contain directions as to the use of certain ornaments. It might, perhaps, be sufficient to point out that in the whole of the Prayer Book of 1549 not a syllable will be found which makes the smallest allusion to the use of either altar-lights or incense; but whatever may be the strength of the argument derived from the absence of any such direction, it would seem to be much increased by a reference to the Injunction just quoted.

But the answer to the dilemma proposed would seem to be that, although this Injunction cannot be considered as having itself the force of a statute, and therefore the two lights mentioned would not be ornaments in use by authority of Parliament, yet it is apprehended it may be used to illustrate the Rubric of the Prayer Book so far as this, that the latter cannot be construed to permit, by its silence, articles positively ordered by the Injunction to be removed. The question would thus become narrowed to the legality of two lights only; and as to this Counsel are referred to the judgment of Dr. Lushington in the case of Liddell v. Westerton above referred to. The result at which that learned judge arrived is set out at p. 53 of the judgment sent herewith. It will be observed that although the case was subject to two subsequent appeals, the point as to lights was not alleged as matter of appeal before either the Court of Arches or the Privy Council, so that there was no possibility that Dr. Lushington's judgment should be reviewed.

It is apprehended that the reasons given by Dr. Lushington for decrees against the use of altar lights may be applied with still greater effect to the use of incense. With respect to this, however, it is to be observed that Edward VI.'s first Prayer Book was compiled from the several missals then in use, which contained directions for the use of incense at certain places in the celebration, all of which directions were carefully omitted from the new Prayer Book, and have never since at any revision been restored.

With regard to the practice of mixing water with wine, the use of wafers, and the introduction of hymns, as above stated, it is not easy to discover what is the precise authority relied on. But it is apprehended that the absence of any directions in the Rubric, except as to the bread, coupled with the provisions of the second section of the Act of Uniformity, is of itself a sufficient prohibition of these practices.

As to the bread, the Rubric at the end of the Communion Service declares that "it shall suffice that the bread be such as is usual to be eaten, but the best and purest wheat bread that may be gotten." It would probably be contended that the words "it shall suffice" are only directory; but the use of the common bread had been insisted on as far back as 1559 by the Bishops in their Interpretation of the Queen's Injunctions (ante, p. 13), with a direction that it be made thicker and broader than it was then commonly used. (Cardwell's "Doc. Ann." Vol. I. p. 238.) There can hardly be any doubt that the object of this direction was to introduce a broad distinction between the wafer of the Mass and the bread of the Protestant Communion Service; and it was not by any means probable that the Rubric of 1662 should have been meant to authorize a practice which would destroy that distinction.

Upon this statement of facts, which is believed to contain all the essential enactments on this point, with such references to contemporaneous history as throw any light upon the subject, Counsel are requested to advise in consultation upon the following questions:—

I. Suppose a clergyman of the Established Church of England to administer the Holy Communion in a parish church, habited in the vestments prescribed by King Edward the Sixth's first Prayer Book (1549), does he infringe the law, and commit an offence cognizable by any legal tribunal?

II. Suppose him to introduce into the Communion Service the use of two or more lights on the Communion table, not burnt for the sake of giving light, but as an ingredient in the Service itself; or the use of incense burnt in thuribles or censers for censuring persons or things; or the ceremonial mixing of water with the sacramental wine; or the use of wafers instead of bread such as is usual to be eaten; or the use of hymns before or after the Prayer of Consecration, or at the time of administering the elements; does he thereby infringe the law and commit an offence cognizable by any legal tribunal?

III. What would be the best way in which to raise these questions so as to obtain a decision upon them?

OPINION.

I. We are of opinion that the first question should be answered in the affirmative.

A careful consideration of the language of the Act of Uniformity of 1662, and the rubric of the Prayer Book, and a comparison of that language with the previous rubrics and enactments applicable to the question, lead us to the conclusion that the intention of the Legislature was not to revive or restore the use of any ornaments which had become obsolete. The Statute of Elizabeth, as altered by the Advertisements, had been recognized both by the Liturgy and Canons of James in 1604, and appears unquestionably to have been in force down to 1662; and since there is nothing in the statute of that year (except so far as it establishes the rubric) which touches the point, it is by the rubric alone that the practice, which had been established by the advertisements, can have been altered or repealed. We do not think that the rubric has, or was intended to have, this effect. On the contrary, it would seem to apply only to such ornaments of the minister as are common to all times of his ministration, and to point to a retention of such as were then in use, rather than to a revival of such as had been displaced by the Advertisements. This interpretation is supported by the universal practice which has prevailed from 1662 down to the present time, and which affords a "contemporaneous exposition" of the rubric, to which great weight would be attached by every Court of Law in England.

II. We are of opinion that the second question should also be answered in the affirmative.

We think that the use of lights in the manner indicated in the question is illegal. The point is, in fact, res judicata, having been settled by Dr. Lushington's judgment, to which we have been referred.

We think the use of incense in the way suggested clearly unauthorized and illegal.

The ceremonial mixing of water with the wine, as a significant act in the course of the service, appears to us to be illegal.

We think that wafers would not be considered to be bread within the meaning of the Rubric referred to.

The introduction of hymns, either immediately before or after the prayer of consecration, or during the administration of the elements, appears to us to be unauthorized and illegal, since it would interfere with the unbroken continuity of the service.

III. In answer to the third question, we consider that a proceeding under the Church Discipline Act of 1840 would be the only way to raise these questions so as to obtain a decision upon them.

THE ORNAMENTS OF THE MINISTER.

FURTHER REASONS for the Opinion given, May 1866, by SIR ROUNDELL PALMER, SIR H. M. CAIRNS, MR. MELLISH, and MR. BARROW.

GILLETT J. OTTAWAY, Solicitor, 39, Essex Street, Strand.

(Rivingtons, London, Oxford, and Cambridge, 1867.)

Dear Sir, Temple, 17th June, 1867.

A request having been conveyed to me a few days ago from one of the Commissioners just appointed to enquire into the Rubrics, &c. that I would state in a more detailed form than has hitherto been published, the reasons which led to the opinion given by Sir R. Palmer, Sir H. M. (now Lord) Cairns, Mr. Mellish, and myself, I thought the matter sufficiently important to justify me in mentioning it to Sir Roundell Palmer, who most kindly drew up the reasons which follow down to his own initials.

These have been submitted to Mr. Mellish, and he has given me authority to express his entire concurrence with them. For obvious reasons no communication could be made to Lord Cairns.

My own observations, which follow Sir R. Palmer's initials, have also been submitted to and approved of by him.

As you were the Solicitor by whom the Case was submitted to us, I have thought it right that this paper should be placed at your disposal.

Yours very faithfully,

FRANCIS BARROW.

Gillett J. Ottaway, Esq.,

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER writes thus:—

The grounds of my own opinion may be thus stated:—

I. It is a clear principle of law, that in the exposition of the words of a law or other written instrument, which has been received and acted upon in one consistent and uniform manner from the time of its enactment, or execution, for a long subsequent period, that interpretation is to be preferred (supposing the words of the document in any way to admit of it) which is in accordance with the subsequent practice and usage, and not that which is contrary thereto. "Contemporanea expositio fortissima est in lege," &c. And the application of this rule is most necessary, and the reasons for it most forcibly apply, when the subject matter of the law is a thing of great public importance, and of constant, daily, and notorious use.

II. It is also a principle of law, that a prior enactment or provision is not to be deemed to be repealed or altered, except by express words, or really necessary implication: and this rule applies most forcibly, when the effect of such repeal would be to revive some earlier law, which had itself been, on consideration of its effect, expressly and deliberately repealed or altered: and when the implication is derived from words occurring, not in the body of any Statute, but in a subordinate and directory part of another document, confirmed by Statute.

III. My opinion did not at all proceed upon the notion that the vestments, &c. of the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. had become abrogated by mere desuetude: but I considered, that they had been made actually ILLEGAL, by the exercise of the legislative power given to the Crown by the Statute 1 Eliz. cap. 2, section 25; i.e. that the advertisements of 1565-6 were issued by the Royal authority and had the force of law under that Statute; and that, if this had not been the case, the Canons of 1604, to which both the King and the Metropolitan were parties, would be sufficient for the same purpose.

IV. It is clear, that the Act of Uniformity of Charles II. did not repeal, but left in force, the Act of 1 Eliz. cap. 2. with everything which had been done under the authority of that Statute, except so far as the particular enactments of the Act of Car. 2. were at variance therewith. The use, therefore, of the very language of sect. 25 of the Act 1 Eliz. cap. 2, in what is (erroneously) called the Rubric prefixed to Charles II.'s Prayer Book, is quite intelligible, if it was intended merely to leave the law as to vestments, &c. in the state in which it then stood under that section.

V. The words of the so-called "Rubric" of 1662, when accurately weighed, do not seem to me to be intended, nor to be apt in themselves, to restore anything which at that date was not "retained" and "in use" in the Church of England. An enactment that certain things shall be retained and be in use naturally implies, that the former state of things is, so far, to be continued; not, that a new state of things is to be then introduced, or (what amounts to the same thing) that an old state of things, long before prohibited by law, and also disused in practice, is, for the future, to be revived and brought into use again.

VI. It is to be noted that this so-called Rubric appears, on the face of it, to relate only to The order for Morning and Evening Prayer daily to be said and used throughout the year, not expressly mentioning the Communion office, nor any other special office. And the "ornaments" of which it speaks are those "of the Church and of the Ministers thereof at all times of their ministration." These words may, without any violence to their grammatical sense, mean either of two things: (1) Ornaments which are always and in all ministrations to be equally and indifferently used (and which, therefore, would necessarily be used during the order for Morning and Evening Prayer, to which this "Rubric" primarily, if not solely, relates); or (2) Ornaments, some of which are to be used at some times, and others at other times, of the ministration of the minister. Of these two senses the former appears to me to be the more natural and probable in such a "Rubric;" if it be the correct one, then this "Rubric" has no reference at all to any special Eucharistic vestments, &c., and fails to support any argument in their favour. And that this is the correct interpretation is, to my mind, strongly confirmed by two arguments. The first, that in the former notice, for which this was substituted, though introduced by the Title "The order where Morning and Evening Prayer shall be used and said," the words were "at the time of the Communion, and at all other times of his ministration," which words necessarily extended to ornaments which might be in use at the time of the Communion, though not at the time of Morning or Evening Prayer. The change (coinciding with the effect of the 58th Canon, which provided for the use of the Surplice by every Minister saying the Public Prayer, or "ministering the Sacraments or other Rites of the Church,") omitted, certainly not without purpose, the express reference to the time of Communion. The other argument is, that from date of this change, till the last few years, the authors of the change themselves, and the whole clergy of every grade, proved, by their uniform practice, that they so intended and understood it.

APPENDICES.

R. P.

It may seem presumptuous in me to attempt to add anything to what Sir Roundell Palmer has so well and so forcibly stated, and with which I have authority to say that Mr. Mellish entirely concurs. But Sir Roundell himself has pressed me to add one or two considerations which occurred to my own mind, and which I offer, not in the idea that every fact to which I allude could be necessarily available for arguing the case in a court of law, but rather to shew how strongly the history of what occurred at the Savoy Conference tends to confirm the opinion which we formed.

An examination of the commission under which that conference was held will shew that its object was to make such reasonable and necessary alterations in the Book of Common Prayer (viz. the book revised by James I. in 1603) as should be agreed on to be needful or expedient, for giving satisfaction to tender consciences, and the restoring and continuance of peace and unity in the Church;—but with a concluding caution, that the commissioners were to avoid all unnecessary alterations of the forms and liturgy, "wherewith people are already acquainted, and have so long received in the Church of England."

On the assembling of the commission, objections were urged by the Nonconformists, first to certain cardinal points of practice generally, and afterwards specifically to some parts of the book, which brought these points into prominence.

Their main grievances were three:—the use of the surplice, the sign of the cross in baptism, and kneeling at the reception of the Communion. Their specific objections included one to the so-called Rubric, as it stood in James' book (verbatim as it has appeared in Elizabeth's of 1559), as follows:—

"And here it is to be noted, that the minister at the time of the Communion, and at all other times of his ministration, shall use such ornaments in the church as were in use by authority of Parliament in the second year of King Edward VI. according to the Act of Parliament set in the beginning of this book.

"This Rubric, they said, seems to bring back the alb, cope, &c." Now it is to be observed, that the utmost they could say was, that the Rubric seemed to bring back the vestments. They could not with truth say, that it had brought them back, or that it required them to be used: for it is all subject to the limitation "according to the Act of Parliament set in the beginning of the book;" and this was none other than the statute of Elizabeth, which required the use of the vestments, only until the other order should be taken under the 25th section. But the objection, being taken, had to be answered by the church party; and they answered in this way. They first dealt with the general objection, and explained at length their reasons for the retention of the surplice; and then to the specific objection to this "Rubric," they replied, that, for the reasons previously given in answer to the objection to the surplice, they thought it fit that the Rubric continue as it then was.

It seems to me that nothing can be plainer than that both parties were contending, the one to abolish, and the other to retain the surplice, and the surplice alone. This was the object of attack when the Nonconformists objected to the Rubric; for the very form of their objection shows that no real grievance was felt in respect of the use of the alb, cope, &c.

The Church party, on the other hand, were determined to keep the surplice; and I think, considering what we know of their feeling towards their opponents, it is not difficult to account for the method in which this determination was carried out. It is well known that they most earnestly desired to avoid even the appearance of the smallest concession, and, moreover, they had before them the very commission under which the Savoy Conference had met, which deprecated all unnecessary changes. They, therefore, took the words of Elizabeth's statute (25th section), and substituted them for the words of Elizabeth's

(and James') Rubric, merely introducing the words "at all times of their ministration;" these latter being a substitution for the words "at the time of the communion, and at all other times of their ministration," as they stood in Elizabeth's and James' book. If, then, they were taunted with having made any concession to the other party, they had an easy answer: "What concession is there in taking Elizabeth's own words out of her statute, and substituting them for those in her Prayer Book?" If, on the other hand, they were accused of being so bigoted as to refuse to make any amendment where reason and common sense required it, their answer was equally ready. They would say, "It is not true that we have made no alteration. We have introduced a direction for the retention of Edward VIth vestments, and the word can only be applied to such as the Rubric finds in existence, and cannot apply to such as have been legally abolished for a hundred years."

I am aware that two objections have been taken to this interpretation. It has been said, that the Rubric of Charles must have the same meaning as the statute of Elizabeth. This I do not dispute. But because it had the same meaning, it by no means follows that it should have the same effect. A word or sentence, which ex vi termini involves a reference to the time at which it is used, cannot do otherwise than produce a result which varies with the time.

It has also been said that if the intention of those who framed the Rubric was what we supposed, they have used a most singular form of expression; and it is remarked that this was done, not by ignorant men, not used by a parliamentum indoctum, but used by learned theologians—men, acquainted with, and fully alive to, all the controversies which had in the interval disturbed the country and a large part of Christendom on the very subject. This argument would no doubt have considerable weight if the point had been then under legislation for the first time. But it must be remembered that what had to be done was to revise something that the framers had before them, and to revise it in such a way that no further alteration should be made than what was actually necessary for their purpose.

But, however these objections may be dealt with, the broad inquiry still remains. Taking the history of the whole transaction, considering the objects as defined by the Savoy Commission and the limits of authority therein laid down, the objection made to the Rubric on the one side and the answer given on the other, is it for one moment to be believed that the framers of the present Rubric really and deliberately intended to restore the use of vestments, the bare phantoms of which would have set the country in a flame from one end to the other; and that they made the alteration with that intention?

It always seemed to me that the obvious reply might be made in few words. Since an alteration was made in the Rubric, we have a right to say that it was such as was deemed necessary or expedient for the restoring and continuance of peace and unity in the Church, within the terms of the Savoy Commission. Moreover, that since it was within the spirit of that Commission that all necessary alterations were to be avoided, this particular alteration would not have been made if it had been thought that the former Rubric was unobjectionable. What then is the difference between the faulty Rubric and the sound? Compare them, and it will be found that the only absolutely new idea introduced is that conveyed by the word "retain." Strike out this word, and the Rubric is open to the objection that it seems to bring back the alb, cope, &c. Insert it, and that objection is removed, but at the same time the use of the surplice is preserved. Does not the whole history of the proceeding shew that this was exactly what the church party meant to do.

Before I conclude, I desire to join Sir Roundell Palmer and Mr. Mellish in repudiating the idea which has been imputed to us, that we thought the mere disuse of the vestments for a hundred years in any way operated as a repeal of the law. I thought and still think that the other order contemplated by the 1 Eliz. cap. 2. sect. 25. had been taken by the advertisements and canons, and that the law enacted by the latter still remains in force, being untouched by the Rubric of 1662.

APPENDIX K.

DISPUTED RITUAL ORNAMENTS AND USAGES.

A CASE submitted on behalf of the ENGLISH CHURCH UNION; with the opinions thereon of HER MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE (SIR R. PHILLIMORE, Q.C.); SIR FITZROY KELLY, Q.C. (NOW LORD CHIEF BARON); SIR W. BOVILL, Q.C. (NOW LORD CHIEF JUSTICE OF COMMON PLEAS); MR. W. M. JAMES, Q.C.; DR. DEANE, Q.C.; MR. J. D. COLERIDGE, Q.C., M.P.; MR. C. G. PRIDEAUX; MR. J. HANNEN; and MR. J. CUTLER, PROFESSOR OF LAW, KING'S COLLEGE, LONDON.

GEORGE HENRY BROOKS, Doctors' Commons, London,
(Honorary Proctor to the English Church Union).

(London, Oxford, and Cambridge: Rivingtons, Waterloo Place.—The English Church Union Office, 11, Burling Street, Strand, W.C.)

In preparing the following Case for publication a few additional proofs have been inserted, as calculated to make it more generally useful; they are distinguished thus [*]. Also some authorities, to which only a reference was given when the Case was originally submitted to Counsel, are now set out in full.

It is important to observe that any deficiency of evidence in this case as to the use—of, e.g., Altar Lights or Incense under the Prayer Book of 1549, and subsequently—cannot fairly be accounted as conclusive upon the subject: so many additional proofs of the retention of ancient Ecclesiastical Usages and Ornaments in the Church of England, during the period in question, have latterly been brought to light, that it is highly presumable more will be furnished by further examination of Documents in the Record Office and elsewhere.

T. W. P.

English Church Union Office,
December 3, 1866.

DOUBTS having been expressed as to the legality of reviving in the Services of the Church of England some ancient Ecclesiastical Usages; and also of restoring the use of certain "Ornaments of the Church and of the Ministers thereof," on which, it is believed, no direct Judicial Decision has been given; though the General Rubric which relates to them was interpreted by the Judicial Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council, on the 21st March 1857, in the case of Liddell v. Westerton: the Opinion of Counsel is desired with a view of meeting various Objections which have been made to them, and more especially to those mentioned in a Case prepared for the Opinion* recently taken, by the Opponents of such Usages and Ornaments, from the Attorney-General (Sir Roundell Palmer, Q.C.), Sir Hugh M. Cairns, Q.C., Mr. Mellish, Q.C., and Mr. Barrow; and dated May 29, 1866.

In the Objections advanced against the matters in question much stress has been laid upon the following points, numbered as Objections 1 to 16.

In answer to these Objections, and in support of the position of those who seek to follow out the liberty which they conceive to be consistent with the Law, the following points are relied upon. They are numbered as Answers 1 to 16 to correspond with the Objections.

Obj. 1. (a) The expression in the Judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (Moore's Report, p. 156) that "the word 'Ornaments' applies, and in this Rubric is confined to those articles the use of which in the Services and Ministrations of the Church is prescribed by the First Prayer Book of Edward the Sixth."

(b) It is alleged that the word "prescribed" in this exposition of the Rubric excludes every Ornament and Usage not distinctly mentioned in the Book.

(c) It is further alleged, in confirmation of this view, that the several Acts of Uniformity, taken together, inhibit the use of "any other rite, ceremony, order, form, or manner of Mass" (as the Communion Service was called in the 1st of these Acts, 2 & 3 Edw. VI. c. 1), or of other Service which the Acts legalize.

* "The Ornaments of the Minister.—Case submitted to Counsel on behalf of several Archbishops and Bishops of the United Church of England and Ireland; together with the joint Opinion thereon of the Attorney-General, Sir Hugh M. Cairns, Q.C., Mr. Mellish, Q.C., Mr. Barrow, Gillett J. Ottaway, Solicitor, 39, Essex-street, Strand. RIVINGTONS, London, Oxford, and Cambridge, 1866."

ANS. 1. (a) The Committee of the Privy Council say also, shortly after the passage quoted (in Obj. 1) above (Moore, p. 159), that "the same dresses, and the same utensils, or articles, which were used under the First Prayer Book of Edward VI. may still be used."

(b) They further say (p. 187) that "they are not prepared to hold that the use of all articles not expressly mentioned in the Rubric, although quite consistent with and even subsidiary to the service, is forbidden."

(c) As regards the requirements of the Acts of Uniformity to use no other "rite, ceremony, order," or "form" of Service than that provided in the Prayer Book, it is believed that this language was only designed to be conservative of the matter of the Services, and is not the rule for Ornaments and Usages in performing the Services.

The technical meaning of these terms, as used in the Acts of Uniformity and in the Title to the Prayer Book, is shown by the following examples:—

(1) "A Proclamation" of King Edward VI., Feb. 6, 1547-8, "against them that do innovate, alter, or leave done any rite or ceremony in the Church of their private authority," orders "that no manner [of] person, of what estate, order, or degree soever he be, of his private mind, will, or fantasy, do omit, leave done, change, alter or innovate any order, rite or ceremony commonly used and frequented in the Church of England, and not commanded to be left done at any time, in the reign of our late Sovereign Lord, his Highness' Father, other than such as his Highness, by the advice aforesaid [i.e., the Duke of Somerset and others of his Council], by his Majesty's visitors, injunctions, statutes or proclamations hath already or hereafter shall command to be omitted, left, innovated, or changed . . . ." (Cardwell, Doc. Ann.-L., p. 43.)

The words "used and frequented" seem to show that the "order, rite or ceremony" mentioned was something in the nature of a Service, and not the mere Accessories of a Service.

(2) In the Homily "Of Common Prayer and Sacraments" it is said:—

"And although there are retained by the order of the Church of England, besides these two [Sacraments of Baptism and the Supper of the Lord], certain other Rites and Ceremonies about the institution of ministers in the Church, Matrimony, Confirmation of Children, by examining them of their knowledge in the articles of the faith and joining thereto the prayers of the Church for them, and likewise for the Visitation of the Sick; yet no man ought to take these for Sacraments, in such signification and meaning as the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper are . . . ."

(3) A proceeding under the statute 1 Elizabeth, c. 2, § 4.—"A person of the name of Flemming was indicted (1 Leon. 295; vide Godb. 119), upon this statute and punished according to it, because he had given the Sacrament of Baptism in a different form to that which is hereby prescribed. In Rev v. Sparks (3 Mod. 79), an indictment for using alias preces in the Church, and alio modo, seems to have been judged insufficient, because such prayers may be used, upon some extraordinary occasion, and so no crime; and it was said that the indictment ought to have alleged that the defendant used other forms and prayers instead of those enjoined, which were neglected by him; 'for otherwise every parson may be indicted that useth prayers before his sermon, other than such which are required by the Book of Common Prayer.'" (Stephens's Eccl. Stat. I., p. 365.)

Obj. 2. (a.) Dr. Lushington gave this Judicial Opinion against lighted Candles in the Case Westerton v. Liddell:—"I hold that all lighted Candles on the Communion Table are, from the premises I have already stated, contrary to Law, except when they are lighted for the purpose of giving necessary light; and I think that this exception must necessarily be engrafted even upon the positive prohibition to set lights on the Lord's Board at any time; but the exception must be confined to the necessity, and the use of lighted Candles on the Communion Table limited to that necessity, when it arises from natural causes, and it may be, the peculiar structure of the edifice." (Moore, p. 70.) Also the following observations of the learned Judge, upon which, in part, he founded this Opinion, are relied upon:—

(b.) "The Mass is gone, root and branch, extirpated by the authority of Parliament, especially in the establishment of the Book of Common Prayer. What becomes then of an ordinance which relates to the Mass? The accessory is extinguished with the priu-

APPENDICES.

cipal, and all that was prescribed to be done at the celebration of Mass is wholly extinguished." (Moore, p. 68.)

(c.) "Where is the High Altar now? . . . abolished, and a Communion Table in its stead." (Ibid.)

Ans. 2. (a.) Dr. Lushington's Opinion was not followed up by any Decree on the subject; it is submitted, therefore, that the Consistory Court of London has not prohibited the lighting of the candles. It is further submitted that the interpretation given to the Rubric by the Judicial Committee has reversed the Opinion of Dr. Lushington.

Moreover, the obiter dictum of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, that, according to the Injunctions of 1547, "the High Altar was to remain as it had been before, with lights upon it before the Sacrament" (Moore, p. 165), is adverse to this opinion; for this order had not been annulled when the Book of 1549 came into use; therefore, it is submitted, it applied to that Book no less than to the previous Liturgy.

(b.) Dr. Lushington does not refer to the Acts of Parliament, by which the sweeping change of which he speaks was effected, beyond saying "especially in the establishment of the Book of Common Prayer." It is submitted (1), that in this matter we are concerned only with the two prayer books legalized by the two Statutes 2 and 3 Edw. VI. c. 1, and 13 and 14 Car. II. c. 4. (2) That both these Books retain nominatim, in the Office for the Holy Communion, all that was accounted essential for the Mass. Besides this, the Book of 1549 retains the very name itself, and expressly calls the Holy Table an Altar. (3) That the preface to the book of 1662 contains, in reference to the two Books of 1604 and 1559, these words, "We are fully persuaded in our judgments (and we here profess it to the world), that the Book as it stood before established by law doth not contain in it anything contrary to the Word of God, or to sound doctrine, or which a godly man may not with a good conscience use and submit unto, or which is not fairly defensible against any that shall oppose the same." And (4), That the Statute of Uniformity of 1662, speaking of the Book of 1559, says (in the Preamble) that it was "agreeable to the Word of God, and usage of the primitive Church . . . very comfortable to all good people desirous to live in Christian conversation, and most profitable to the estate of this realm." Moreover, it is to be noticed, that the Act of Uniformity of 1552 (which established the Second Prayer Book of Edward VI., the very book which, with a few important changes, was adopted in 1559), says of the First Prayer Book of Edward VI., that it was "a very godly order . . . agreeable to the Word of God, and the Primitive Church; very comfortable to all good people desiring to live in Christian conversation, and most profitable to the state of this realm."

(c.) Hence it is submitted that neither the term Mass nor Altar has been abolished by Law, although the words are disused in the present Book. But, even had these terms been legally abolished, the term "Sacrament" is still retained, and the Lights are enjoined to be "before the Sacrament."

Obj. 3. An Opinion which has been held, that King Edward VIth's Injunction of 1547, which prohibited pertain then existing Ornaments and Usages, but by imbecillation allowed the rest, and expressly retained (in No. 3) "two lights upon the High Altar before the Sacrament" had no "authority of Parliament" when the Prayer Book of 1549 came into use, because the power to issue such Injunctions had been taken away by 1 Edw. VI., c. 12, and that, consequently, even this supposed authority for the use of the two Lights under the First Prayer Book cannot be claimed.

Ans. 3. The enquiry in Cranmer's Visitation Articles of 1548 for the "two Lights upon the High Altar," is evidence that the Injunctions of 1547 were then in force. These Injunctions are also recognized in the Prayer Book of 1549 in the following Rubric at the end of "The Communion" as to the Litany: "Upon Wednesdays and Fridays, the English Litany shall be said or sung in all places, after such form as is appointed by the King's Majesty's Injunctions; or as is or shall be, otherwise appointed by his Highness." If the Injunctions of 1547 had ceased to be of any Parliamentary authority in 1549 (owing to the Statute, 1 Edw. VI. c. 12), then there was no law against the two Lights.

Obj. 4. Certain later Injunctions said to have been issued by the same King (A.D. 1549), commanding all

"Parsons, Vicars," &c., in reading the former Injunctions, to leave out "all such as make mention of the Popish Mass, of Chantries, of Candles upon the Lord's Board or any such thing." The second of these Injunctions forbids the "setting any light upon the Lord's Board, at any time," and finally enjoins "to use no other ceremonies than are appointed in the King's Book of Common Prayer." It is said that, even if the Injunctions of 1547 continued to be in force generally in 1549, those portions were nevertheless repealed which are mentioned in these passages.

Ans. 4. The alleged Royal Injunctions of 1549, first found in Burnet, are not reliable evidence; on the contrary, externally and internally they afford proofs of not being Royal injunctions, and of being at least two years later than their supposed date. Recent researches by the Editor of the new edition of Burnet's Reformation (where they first appeared) have failed to discover them. The alleged date (1549) is wholly conjectural. They disagree, in Art. IX., with the Offices for Baptism and the Visitation of the Sick in the Prayer Book of 1549, in directing "That no man maintain . . . . . oil, chrisem . . . . . or any other such abuses and superstitions, contrary to the King's Majesty's proceedings;" whereas "oil" and "chrisem" were expressly ordered in those Offices, and therefore were not likely to be abolished a few months afterwards. And they are even more advanced in these prohibitions than were Bishop Ridley's Injunctions of 1550. But, if they were Royal Injunctions, they could not have the "authority of Parliament," supposing the repealing Statute, 1 Edw. VI. c. 12, had the effect which is alleged. Besides, they prove too much, so far as regards the contention that the Candles may be lighted to afford light, for they forbid "any light upon the Lord's Board at any time." Moreover, if these alleged Royal Injunctions of 1549 are genuine, or even if they were only Episcopal Injunctions, they show that the Injunctions of 1547 were then in force; for certain parts of them are professedly repealed by these supposed Injunctions of 1549.

Obj. 5. That the Act of Uniformity of 1559 sanctions the Ornaments of Edward's second year only, "until other order shall be taken" in the way there described; and that this other order was taken by certain Advertisements of Elizabeth in the year 1565, and further by the Canons of 1604. On these Advertisements especially much stress is laid.

Ans. 5. The Advertisements of Elizabeth, probably, were never legally published. Mr. Stephens, referring to them (Eccl. Stat., I. 370), says, "Which other order (at least in the way prescribed in this Act) was never made; and therefore, legally, the Ornaments of Ministers in performing Divine Service are the same now as they were in the 2nd of Edward VI." Dr. Burn (Eccl. Law, III. 437) says—"Which other order as to this matter was never taken." And Strype (Life of Parker, p. 158) states, that by a writing on the back side of the fair copy that was sent to the Secretary when they were first framed, it seems they were not presently published nor authorized. For these are the words written upon them by the Secretary's own hand:—Mar. 1564. Ordinances accorded by the Archbishop of Canterbury, &c. in his Province. These were not authorized nor published." See also Parker Correspondence, pp. 233-37; Cardwell, Doc. Ann., I. 321; and Collier, Eccl. Hist., 495. But, if they were legally published in conformity with the terms of the Elizabethan Act of Uniformity, neither these Advertisements nor the Canons of 1604 were meant to limit the Rubric, but were called for by the great and increasing disorders and the opposition to even the Surplice. Moreover, they do not forbid the use of anything besides the Cope and Surplice. The design of both was simply to secure the use of such Ornaments as were absolutely necessary.

The Puritans, both at that period and subsequently, certainly held the Rubric to be in force. * [And even Richard Baxter, in his Account of the Proceedings of the Savoy Conference, in 1661, thus speaks:— "And here, because they would abate us nothing at all considerable, but made things far harder and heavier than before, I will annex the Concessions of Archbishop Ussher, Archbishop Williams, Bishop Morton, Bishop Holdsworth, and many others in a Committee at Westminster (before mentioned), 1641."

Then, in a list of these concessions, under the head of "Considerations of the Book of Common Prayer," he mentions the following:—"3. Whether the Rubrick should not be mended, where all vestments in time of Divine Service are now commanded; which were used, 2 Edw. VI." (Sylvester's Life and Times of Baxter, 1696. Pt. II., pp. 369 and 371.)*

On the Church side, too, Bishop Cosin, in his three Series of Notes on the Book of Common Prayer, all written between 1619 and 1660, advocates the Ornaments of the Second Year of Edward VI., and asserts them to be lawful also. Thus, e. g., in the Third Series, written probably before 1640, he says,—“Such Ornaments, &c. Without which (as common reason and experience teaches us) the Majesty of Him that owneth it, and the work of His Service there, will prove to be of a very common and low esteem. The particulars of these Ornaments (both of the Church and of the Ministers thereof, as in the end of the Act of Uniformity),” i. e., of Elizabeth, “are referred not to the fifth of Edw. VI., as the Service itself is in the beginning of that Act; for in that fifth year were all Ornaments taken away (but a Surplice only), both from Bishops and Priests, and all other Ministers, and nothing was left for the Church but a font, a table, and a linen cloth upon it (at the time of Communion only), but to the second year of that King, when his Service-book and Injunctions were in force by Authority of Parliament. And in those books many other Ornaments are appointed; as, two Lights to be set upon the Altar or Communion-table, a Cope or Vestment for the Priest and for the Bishop besides their Albes, Surplices, and Rochets; the Bishop's Crosier-staff to be holden by him at his ministration and ordinations; and those Ornaments of the Church which, by former laws, not then abrogated, were in use by virtue of the Statute 25 Hen. VIII., and for them the Provincial Constitutions are to be consulted, such as have not been repealed, standing then in the second year of King Edward VI., and being still in force by virtue of this Rubric and Act of Parliament.” (Works, Ang. Cath. Lib. V., p. 438.) See also First Series, p. 42; and Second Series, pp. 230-33.

Obj. 6. (a.) That the XXXth of the Elizabethan Injunctions of 1559, by endeavouring to secure that “the prelacy and clergy” might be “known to the people in all places and assemblies, both in the Church and without,” provided that they “shall use and wear such seemly habits, garments, and caps as were most commonly and orderly received in the latter year of King Edward VI.,” and that, coupling this with a letter from Bishop Horn to Gualter, on July 16, 1565 (in which “it seems clear that he is referring to the Act of Uniformity,” of 1559, and, therefore, to the “Ornaments” required by that Statute and by the Ornament Rubric of the Prayer Book of 1559), it shows (“notwithstanding the inconsistencies” which the Objection refers to) that “the interpretation put upon the Statute of Elizabeth by him and the party he was representing, was, that while it preserved the use of the square cap and surplice, it had swept away the other dregs of Romish practices.” (Case for Opinion of the Attorney-General and Others, p. 22.)

(b.) It is further urged “that this view is confirmed by a letter from Bishop Sandys to Archbishop Parker, which is quoted by Cardwell (Conferences, p. 86) from Strype's Annals. The Bishop says:—“The last Book of Service is gone through with a proviso, to retain the Ornaments which were used in the 1st and 2nd year of King Edward, until it please the Queen to take other order for them: our gloss upon this text is, that we shall not be forced to use them: but that others in the meantime shall not convey them away, but that they may remain for the Queen.”

(c.) Again, it is said, that having regard to the “varieties in the Service and Administration used” in 1564-5, as shown in a summary of the returns made to Secretary Cecil (Strype's Parker, p. 152), and considering how minutely every point of variance is mentioned in this document, it can hardly be considered possible that any use of the Albe, Cope, and other vestments enjoined by the Rubric of 1549, could have been passed over without notice; therefore, the objection infers “that the surplice, square cap, and academical hood were all that the law required,” especially as Bishop Burnet (Reformation, Pt. iii. Bk. ii. Vol. v. p. 587) says that after the passing of the Act of Uniformity, in 1559, “there followed great variety in practice, many conforming themselves in all points to the law, while others did not use either the surplice or the square cap and hood according to their degree.”

(d.) Reliance is also placed upon the following passage in a letter from Bullinger to Humphrey and Sampson, May 1, 1566, as also showing the contemporaneous interpretation of the Act of Uniformity of 1559:—“I could never approve of your officiating, if so commanded, at an Altar laden, rather than adorned, with the image of Him that was crucified, and in the appropriate dress of the Mass, that is in the Albe or Cope, on the back part of which also the same image is represented. But, as far as I can understand by a letter from England, there is now no dispute concerning habits of this kind; but the question is, whether it be lawful for the Ministers of the Gospel to wear a round or square cap, and a white garment which they call a surplice, by the wearing of which the minister may be distinguished from the people?”—(Zurich Letters, Appendix No. III. p. 845.)

(e.) Further, it is said that “It is also to be remarked, as connected with the interpretation of the Statute [of Elizabeth], that among the Vestments, the use of which is required by the Rubric of the First Prayer Book of Edw. VI., is the chrysom, or chrism, in the Baptismal Service. The direction to use the ‘Ornaments of the Church’ authorized by that Prayer Book, was never construed to include that Vestment; indeed the form of words accompanying its use was omitted in every subsequent Prayer Book.” (Case for Opinion of the Attorney-General, &c., p. 27.)

Ans. 6. (a.) The object of the 30th Injunction was not to secure by an appointed dress the recognition of the Clergy, as such, when ministering “in the church;” for it would not be supposed that laymen were officiating: the design was to distinguish them from the laity by prescribing the habits they were to wear in the church, whether ministering or not, as well as out of the Church. This view is supported by the following passage in a letter from Archbishop Parker to Sir Wm. Cecil, April 30, 1565, only a few weeks earlier than the letter of Horn to Gualter referred to in Obj. 6. The Archbishop is relating what he did to procure “conformity” from Mr. Sampson and Dr. Humphrey, and writes, “I shewed them these were the orders they must observe: to wear the cap appointed by Injunction, to wear no hats in their long gowns, to wear a surplice with a non-regent hood in their quires at their colleges, according to the ancient manner there; to communicate kneeling in wafer-bread.” (Parker Correspondence, p. 240.)

(b.) It should be noticed, with regard to the interpretation of the “other order” as to the Ornaments given in the letter of Sandys to Parker, quoted in Obj. 6, that Strype says of it (Ann. I. p. 84), “But this must be looked upon as the conjecture of a private man.” And it is highly important to consider that, in the subsequent controversies as to the Ornaments, it was not alleged that they were illegal, but that they were objectionable. Moreover, had they been illegal, there would have been no need to take any “other order” respecting them beyond stating that the Law as it stood did not authorize them. So far, however, was this from being the case, that four years after—viz., in 1563—in a paper entitled “General Notes of Matters to be moved by the Clergy in the next Parliament and Synod,” it was proposed, under the head of “Matters worthy of Reformation, concerning Rites, &c., in the Book of Common Prayer,” “That the use of Vestments, Copes, and Surplices be from henceforth taken away.” (Cardwell's Synodalia II., p. 495.)

(c.) The Returns made to Secretary Cecil in 1564-5, and referred to in Obj. 6 (c.), were caused by the Queen's letter to Archbishop Parker, Jan. 24th, 1564-5, complaining of the Bishops for suffering “the Laws, good Usages, and Ordinances of our Realm” to be disobeyed; it would, therefore, be surprising if the Returns had shewn “any use” of the Ornaments “enjoined by the Rubric of 1549.” But the Return does not profess to give all the Varieties, and is obviously nothing more than a general summary. That it did not include everything may be gathered from the fact that, in the certificate returned from Canterbury Cathedral, it is mentioned that Copes were worn there when “the Holy Communion is ministered,” yet Copes are not named in Secretary Cecil's Return. Bishop Burnet's allegation of conformity to the Law on the part of “many,” apparently referred to what occurred in 1559, just after the Act of Uniformity was passed: it would be no proof that matters had not changed for the worse six years afterwards.

(d.) The letter of Bullinger to Humphrey and Sampson, cited in Obj. 6 (d.), does not show that the Ornament Clause of the Elizabethan Act of Uniformity was held in 1566 to be legally limited; rather the circumstances, that the question was asked of Bullinger, and that he said "if so commanded," imply that the law was in force, and might be resorted to. Bullinger's remark, that "as far as I can understand by a letter from England, there is now no dispute concerning habits of this kind," i.e., "the Albe or Cope," but that the "question" was limited to "a round or square cap, and a white garment, which they call a Surplice," proves no more than that only these were absolutely required. But, indeed, another application made by Humphrey and Sampson in July, only two months after, and in reply to this very letter, shews that Bullinger was not rightly informed even as to the Cope; for they say, "Not only ..... are the square cap and gown required in public, but the sacred garments are used in Divine Service; and the Surplice or white dress of the choir, and the Cope, are re-introduced ...." (Zurich Letters, 1st Series, No. lxxi. p. 159). Also in the Appendix to this Letter, entitled "Some blemishes which still attach to the Church of England," it is stated that—"5. The sacred habits, namely, the Cope and Surplice, are used at the Lord's Supper." Both these statements are general, and do not in the least imply that they were merely contemplating the case of the use of the Cope in Cathedrals, as required by the Advertisements.

(e.) The reference in Obj. 6 (e.) to the use of "the chrysom, or chrism, in the Baptismal Service," is not ad rem; for, first, it was not an ornament of the Minister, and therefore has nothing to do with the question of what vestment he is to wear; and next, it is not contended that every Ornament or Usage employed under the Prayer Book of 1549 is still legal, notwithstanding that, as in this case, that portion of the Service which necessitated the Ornament or Usage has been withdrawn from the later Prayer Books, and was designed not to be used.

Obj. 7. It is contended that, arguing from the premises contained in Obj. 6, "It seems, therefore, highly probable that the construction put upon the Statute of Elizabeth and the Rubric of her Prayer Book, independently of the Advertisements, in those very days, was that they required in Parish Churches the use of no more than the Surplice, and did not intend to enforce the use of the Alb, Chasuble, Vestment, and Tunicle, prescribed by the Rubric of Edw. VI." (Case for the Opinion of the Attorney-General, &c., p. 28.)

Ans. 7. The point relied upon in Obj. 7 is no proof that the Statute and Rubric of Elizabeth did not legalise the Ornaments used under the Prayer Book of 1549; it only shows (what, indeed, is not denied) that a lower standard than the legal one was suffered, and that not even the requirement of the "Interpretations" of the Injunctions, to wear the Cope in parish churches, was then generally insisted upon by the Bishops.

Obj. 8. That the words "shall be retained and be in use," though continued in the re-enacted Rubrics of 1662, did not contemplate all the lawful Ornaments of King Edward's second year, but only such of them as were in actual use, or were expressly named in the revised Prayer Book of 1662 and the Canons of 1604.

Ans. 8. The Rubric of 1662 (except the words "at all times of their ministration") appears to have been taken verbatim by Bishop Cosin from the Act of Uniformity of 1559; for, in his Durham Prayer Book of 1619 (Durham Library, D. III.), which appears to have been prepared for or used at the Revision of 1661, he thus refers the MS. alteration made in his Durham Prayer Book to that Act:—"*** Such ornaments of the Church, & of the ministers thereof at all times of their ministrations, shall be retained & be in use, as were in this Church of England by the Authority of Parliament in the Second year of y<sup>e</sup> Reign of K. Edw. vi. These are y<sup>e</sup> words of y<sup>e</sup> Act itself, v. Supra." The words "shall be retained and be in use" are equivalent to the expression "shall use" in the Prayer Book of 1559. Nothing whatever had been done to qualify these words for two years, i.e., until the publication, in 1561, of the "Interpretations and further considerations" of the Injunctions of 1559; consequently, during that period, at least, the Rubric must have referred to the full Ornaments of King Edward's second year. Moreover, from 1561 to 1565, Copes were compulsory in parish churches, according to the "Interpretations" of the Injunctions. Therefore, there is no reason for giving to the expression "retained and be in use" the restricted meaning which is claimed for it.

Obj. 9. That the expression "at all times of their ministration," being a variation of the language of the previous Rubrics, was intended to secure the use of precisely the same ORNAMENTS OF THE MINISTER in the performance of all the Services of the Church.

Ans. 9. The expression "at all times of their ministration" must mean, grammatically, the same thing as the expression "at the time of the Communion, and at all other times in his ministration;" and there is no evidence (as it is believed) to show any intention to the contrary. The changes may have been designed to correct the negligence of the period by securing the use of suitable Ornaments, e.g., the Surplice, the Paten, and Chalice, in private ministrations; whereas the "Certain Notes for the more plain explication and decent ministration of things contained in this book," i.e., the Book of 1549, allowed a "liberty" in this respect. But it is submitted that the mere wording of the Rubric of 1662 cannot be so construed as to order the same Ornaments for all ministrations.

Obj. 10. That "the framers of the present Rubric were in this position:—They found a certain form of words in the Rubric of Queen Elizabeth's Book which in their view had not been repealed, but explained and modified, by the Advertisements; and they therefore thought that, by adopting Queen Elizabeth's form of words, they were in reality adopting the modified sense which the Advertisements had attached to them." (Case for Opinion of the Attorney-General, &c., p. 29.)

Ans. 10. There is no evidence, it is believed, to shew that the Revisers of 1661 held the opinion attributed to them in Obj. 10. Bishop Cosin was a leading Reviser; his Notes, ranging from about 1630 to 1656, afford strong proof that during that period he did not consider the Rubric of 1559 to have been "explained and modified" by any subsequent proceedings: on the contrary, he says, e.g., "..... according to this Rubric, are we still bound to wear albs and vestments, as have been so long time worn in the Church of God, howsoever it is neglected. For the disuse of these ornaments, we may thank them that came from Geneva, and in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign, being set in places of Government, suffered every negligent priest to do what him listed, so he would but profess a difference and opposition in all things (though never so lawful otherwise) against the Church of Rome, and the Ceremonies therein used." (Notes, First Series, p. 42; Oxf. Ed.)

That Bishop Cosin was correct in attributing this state of things to "disuse" of what the Law prescribed, is witnessed by the following words of George Withers when writing to the Prince Elector Palatine in 1564, for he says that in 1549 "Altars, organs, the theatrical dresses of the Papists, and other things of like kind, were retained under the name of Ornaments of the Church and of the Ministers thereof; and that, by Elizabeth, "the Ceremonies, which, as was above stated, were retained in the Church at the first reformation of Edward, are restored under the same name." (Zurich Letters, 2nd Series, No. LXII., p. 160.)

The Rubric as it then stood was altered by using (as Bishop Cosin remarks in his MS. revision of it) "the words of the Act itself" i.e., the Act of 1559. It had hitherto been couched in the language of the Rubric of the Book of 1559; and in that Rubric (though, of course, it was intended to express the same thing as the Statute) it was said "that the Minister, at the time of the Communion, and at all other times in his Ministration, shall use such Ornaments in the Church" as were there referred to. It was with the utmost difficulty (as the history of the time shows) that the Puritan party could be induced to wear even the Surplice in Church; and therefore they would certainly avoid it elsewhere, e.g., in the churchyard at funerals, and in the private Ministration of Sacraments. The words of the Statute could not be claimed as sanctioning this; it is at least highly probable, therefore, that the words of the Act were chosen as not being doubtful; and this view is supported by the fact that, in the Rubric of 1662, the "Ministers" are directed to "use" the Ornaments of Edward's second year "at all times of their Ministration."

Further, in resorting to the words of the Act of 1559 for the new Rubric, no reference whatever was made by the Revisers to the power given to the Crown to take "other order;" so that the new Rubric was altogether unqualified, and the "second year of the reign of King Edward the Sixth" is taken as the absolute standard for legal Ornaments, notwithstanding the lax practice of the subsequent period.

Moreover, this unqualified re-enactment of the Rubric in 1662 was not done per accidens, but deliberately and in the face of the remonstrance from the Puritans at the Savoy Conference, that "this Rubric seemeth to bring back the Cope, Albe, &c., and other vestments forbidden by the Common Prayer Book, 5 and 6 Edward VI." (Cardwell's Conferences, p. 314)—an inference which the Bishops did not repudiate in their Answer; nor did they, so far as is known, offer any explanation which might disabuse the minds of the Puritans when they afterwards said, in their "Rejoinder" to this Answer of the Bishops, "We have given you reason enough against the imposition of the usual ceremonies, and would you draw forth those absolute ones to increase the burden?" (Documents relating to the Act of Uniformity; London; 1862.)

Obj. 11. That the mind of the framers of the Rubric of 1662 is shown by contemporary Visitation Articles. (e.g., Bishop Cosin in 1662), and that these do not enquire for those ornaments of the second year of Edward VI. which are now sought to be revived.

e.g. (a) Frewen, Archbishop of York; who, in his Visitation Articles of 1662, does not enquire for any other vestment than "a decent surplice, one or more."

(b) Bishop Cosin; who, in 1662, "required the Surplice to be worn with the habit (which clearly means the gown: Harrison's Hist. Inquiry, p. 175, note Z) by the Minister at the reading or celebrating any Divine Office."

(c) Sheldon, Archbishop of Canterbury; who, in 1670, enjoined by Letter that the Clergy, when "officiating," should "ever make use of and wear their priestly habit, the surplice and hood." (Card. Doc. Ann. II., p. 329.)

(d) Sparrow, Bishop of Exeter; who, in his "Rationale of the Prayer Book," published in 1657, and republished in 1684—i.e., after the last Revision—wrote thus:—"Of the Ornaments to be used in Divine Service. The Minister, in time of his Ministration, shall use such Ornaments as were in use in the 2nd Edw. VI., Rubric 2, viz., a Surplice at the ordinary ministration, and a cope at the Holy Communion in Cathedral and Collegiate Churches.—Queen Eliz. Art., set forth anno 7."

(e) Bingham, who, replying to Baxter in 1706, compares the Rubric and the 38th Canon, and says—"Where is now the contradiction between this Canon and the Rubrics? They all speak of Surplices and hoods, but of no other ornaments belonging to private Ministers. And Mr. Baxter might have known this, had he either consulted the old Rubric or Hamon L'Estrange, who compares the new and the old together." (French Church, III., p. 7.)

(f) Gibson, in his Codex (p. 390), 2nd ed., Oxf., 1761, sets out the Communion Rubric of 1549, and marks it as obsolete."

Ans. 11. The mind of the Bishops, &c., at the last review must be held to be shown by the writings of Bishop Cosin (the chief reviewer) rather than by the Visitations and the other Ecclesiastical enquiries of the period, for it was useless to ask for Ornaments which the Bishops knew were not in existence, when it was not asked whether the Cope was used as required by the 24th Canon of 1603. The Bishops had enough to do then to secure obedience to that minimum of Ornaments which the Canons of 1603 absolutely required; it was unlikely, therefore, that they should attempt to enforce the letter of the Rubric.

In reference to the particular examples cited in support of the Objection here noticed, it may be replied thus:

(a) Archbishop Laud did not enquire for more vestments than Archbishop Frewen did, yet it cannot be denied that he wished to restore Ornaments which had fallen into disuse.

(b) Bishop Cosin's limited requirements in 1662 prove no more than that he considered it needful to enforce this minimum of dress for the Clergy. The Inquiry of Bishop Montague, in 1638, proves the laxity then, and it certainly had not been improved by the events of the great Rebellion: he asks, "Doth your Minister officiate Divine Service in due place, upon set times, in the habit and apparel of his Order, with a surplice, an hood, a gown, a tippet; not in a cloak, or sleeveless jacquet, or horseman's coat? for such I have known."

(c) The occasion of Sheldon's letter was, as he says, the "making and publishing the late Act [22 Charles II. c. 1, A.D. 1670] for preventing and suppressing Conventicles." This he considered to be a reason for then calling upon the Clergy to shew "an exemplary conformity;" therefore he required them to "ever make use of and wear their priestly habit, the surplice and hood." All that this proves is, that they did not "ever" wear it, and that therefore it was necessary to put a stop to such negligence.

(d) The reference to the reprint of Sparrow's Rationale would prove too much; it would shew that there had been no revision at all in 1662, for the edition of 1684 does not adapt the old text of 1657 to the altered language of the revised Prayer Book. The same is true of the edition of 1676: thus, to take only two instances, the first Rubric before the Communion Service is printed thus (p. 211): "So many as intend to be partakers of the Holy Communion shall signifie their names to the Curate, overnight, or before Morning Prayer, or immediately after." Again (p. 288), in the Visitation of the Sick, the Rubrics as to Confession and Absolution are printed as follows:—"Here shall the sick person make a special confession, if he feels his conscience troubled with any weighty matter." "After which confession the Priest shall absolve him." A comparison of these Rubrics with the present Prayer Book will shew that the revised language is not adopted.

(e) It will be seen by referring to Bingham, vol. x., p. 123, that he only quotes two of the Ornament Rubrics of 1549, viz., those commencing "In the saying or singing of Matins and Evensong," &c.; "And whensoever the Bishop shall celebrate," &c. He altogether ignores the Vestment Rubric at the beginning of the Communion Service, and then says, "Now this was it that led Mr. Baxter into his mistake. He had heard something of albes and other ornaments in use in King Edward's time, but he unluckily puts the Bishop's robes upon every private Minister; whereas no other ornaments belonged to them but only hood and surplice—the one enjoined, the other allowed or recommended." The "mistake," however, was Bingham's, not Baxter's. But even had Bingham been correct, his statement proves that the Bishops ought to wear the Ornaments prescribed by the Book of 1549, yet this is denied.

No greater weight, however, is due to Bingham's testimony (though he appeals to L'Estrange) than is due to Wheatly, who calls his Commentary on the Prayer Book (Lond., 1759), "The substance of everything liturgical in Bishop Sparrow, Mr. L'Estrange, Dr. Comber, Dr. Nichols, and all former Ritualists, Commentators, or others, upon the same subject; collected and reduced into one continued and regular method, and interspersed all along with new observations."

Wheatly, therefore, did not consider that he was contradicting Sparrow and L'Estrange; yet he thus speaks of the Rubric on Ornaments (p. 92):—"..... to know what they are, we must have recourse to the Act of Parliament here mentioned—viz., in the second year of the reign of King Edward the Sixth; ..... so that by this Act we are again referred to the first Common Prayer Book of King Edward VI. for the habits in which ministers are to officiate; where there are two rubrics relating to them, one prescribing what habits shall be worn in all public ministrations whatsoever, the other relating only to the habits that are to be used at the Communion."

The italics are his own.

He then quotes the Rubrics, viz.:—"In the saying," &c. "And whenever the Bishop," &c. "Upon the day," &c. And then adds, "These are the ministerial Ornaments enjoined by our present Rubric."

After describing the Surplice, Hood, and Rochette, he says (p. 96), "The other things prescribed and enjoined by the forementioned Rubrics (though now grown obsolete and out of use) are the Alb, the Cope, the Tunicle, and the Pastoral Staff."

(f) With respect to the remark of Bishop Gibson, it should be noted that he makes exactly the same observation in reference to "The Habit of a Bishop in administering the Communion," as ordered in "2 Edw. VI." All, however, that he states of both Rubrics is that they are "obsolete;" he does not deny them to be law.

Obj. 12. (a) That "the use in parish churches of the Albe, Vestment, Cope, and Tunicle, has been obsolete for the last three hundred years."

And that (b.) a Rubric not enforced during this period, or at least the greater part of it, cannot be legally acted upon now, even where both clergy and people desire it to be carried out.

Ans. 12. (a.) This alleged universal disuse for three centuries is contradicted by the partial earlier use, and by the later not inconsiderable revival before the Rebellion.

(b.) It is submitted that disuse cannot render the Ecclesiastical Law inoperative. Dr. Lushington expressly affirmed this in Westerton v. Liddell:—"I wholly deny that the Statute of Edward the Sixth, passed in the second year of his reign, or the Statute of Uniformity, can be affected by non-usage. By the law of England, no Statute can fall into desuetude. It is true that a Statute may become obsolete in one sense—that is, not enforced. It is true that no call can be made on the judges of the land to enforce it; that by common consent a statute may be dormant; but if ever a Court is called upon to carry it into execution, it must do so. The case of wager of battle is all powerful to prove this." (Moore, p. 45.) Other authorities have said the same thing. If the Objection were sound, the Daily Service in Parish Churches or the Weekly Communion in Cathedrals could not be legally revived after a similar long period of neglect, notwithstanding the plain language of the Rubric.

Moreover, it may fairly be contended that, if a discretionary power was given to the Bishops and used by them to sanction the disuse of the Vestments which the "Interpretations" of the Injunctions of 1559 and the "Advertisements" of 1565 provided, it follows that they have a discretionary power to sanction the revival of Ornaments, especially as they are still in terms legally recognized.

Obj. 13. In support of this supposed understanding, by the Bishops and others, of the meaning of the Rubric before, at, and after the Revision of 1661, reference is made to the following alleged evidence:—

(a.) The Hampton Court Conference in 1604, at which it is said "the King refused to allow any alteration in the obligation to wear the Surplice (Cardwell's Conferences, pp. 201, 210, 211), but evidently without any intention to revive the use of Vestments of the Prayer Book of 1549; . . . ." (Case for Opinion, p. 30.)

(b.) The Declaration of Charles II. concerning Ecclesiastical Affairs, in 1660, which stated that "For the use of the Surplice we are contented that all men be at liberty to do as they shall think fit, without suffering in the least degree for wearing or not wearing it; provided that that liberty do not extend to our own Chapel, Cathedral or Collegiate Churches, or to any College in either of our Universities, but that the several Statutes and Customs for the use thereof in the said place be there observed as formerly." (Card. Doc. Ann. II., p. 299.)

(c.) The Commission for the Savoy Conference, March 25, 1661, which directed the "avoiding, as much as may be, all unnecessary alterations of the Forms and Liturgy wherewith the people are already acquainted, and have so long received in the Church of England." (Card. Conf., p. 300.)

(d.) That "in dealing with the question at this Conference, no objection was taken that the Rubric, as it had stood in James's Prayer Book, had revived the use of the objectionable Vestments; but the grievance on this point which was complained of was, 'That (under the Rubric as it then was) public worship may not be celebrated by any minister that dare not wear a Surplice.'" (Card. Conf., p. 310.)

(e.) That the Bishops, in replying to the Puritan objections against Ceremonies, did not defend nominatim any other Vestment than the Surplice. And that this proves they had no intention of retaining anything besides. (Card. Conf., p. 350.)

(f.) That in the Convocation, March 4, 1664, "The Archbishop wished all his brother Bishops to use all care that all Ministers should read the Divine Service according to the Book, without any omission, in Surplice and Hood." (Cardwell's Synodalia, p. 636.)

(g.) That, "in 1681, Stillingfleet, as is said, made large overtures to the Dissenters, one of which was, that the Surplice should be taken away." (Card. Conf., p. 396; Note.)

Ans. 13. In reference to the evidence produced for the sense in which the Bishops are supposed to have understood the Rubric before, at, and after the Revision of 1661, it may be replied as follows:—

(a.) It would simply have aggravated the difficulties then attendant upon securing the use of the Surplice by the non-conformists, had the King argued for other vestments at the Hampton Court Conference.

However, the mind of the Convocation at this period, on this subject, may be readily gathered from the principle embodied in the following passage of Canon XXX., A.D. 1603-4; it also shews the mind of the King then, for the Canons were sanctioned by the Crown:—

" . . . . . the abuse of a thing doth not take away the lawful use of it. Nay, so far was it from the purpose of the Church of England to forsake and reject the Churches of Italy, France, Spain, Germany, or any such like Churches, in all things which they held and practised, that as the Apology of the Church of England confesseth, it doth with reverence retain those Ceremonies which do neither endamage the Church of God, nor offend the minds of sober men: and only departed from them in those particular points wherein they were fallen both from themselves in their ancient integrity, and from the Apostolical Churches, which were their First Founders."

(b.) The liberty conceded by Charles the Second's Declaration might have been claimed for the future non-use of the Surplice quite as pertinently as against any future use of other vestments: indeed the Puritans complained bitterly afterwards that the revised Book deprived them of their liberty as to the Surplice.

(c.) In retaining the Rubric on Ornaments substantially in its old form, the revisers did in fact comply with the King's direction not to make "unnecessary alterations of the Forms and Liturgy:" yet in doing so they preserved the legal authority for further Ornaments than were then in use.

(d.) No question whatever appears to have been made about the Ornament Rubric when the Book of 1604 was published, therefore no discussion was likely to arise then upon the legal effect of that Rubric.

(e.) The circumstance that the Bishops, at the Savoy Conference, defended only the Surplice, is no proof that they did not mean to retain other vestments; for they did not say anything in defence of the Cope in Cathedrals, yet that was expressly ordered in the Canons of 1604.

(f.) The Archbishop's expression of his wishes in Convocation, in 1664, only shows the laxity of the times as to the Surplice, and the need of correcting it.

(g.) Stillingfleet's alleged overture to the Dissenters in 1681, to omit the Surplice, shared the fate of the fresh attempts made at that time to revise the Prayer Book; but it no more proves that other vestments were not legal than that the Surplice itself was not binding in law.

Obj. 14. That the expression "authority of Parliament" refers to the different sources from which the different Ornaments of the Prayer Book of 1549 were derived; some, viz. the vestments mentioned at the beginning of the Communion Service, being a "continuation of the ancient Ritual;" others, viz. "the Surplice, alone or combined with the Cope in certain cases," and mentioned in "the two other Rubrics" at the end of the Communion Service, were "originated by Parliament;" and that, therefore, "authority" of Parliament means "authorship" by Parliament: hence that "authority of Parliament" refers only to the Ornaments thus newly "originated" in the Book of 1549, and not to those which it continued from the old Ritual.

Ans. 14. It is submitted that the suggestion of the words "authority of Parliament" being applicable to one part of the Prayer Book of 1549, and not to another, cannot be maintained. But if it could, then it would prove that "a continuation of the ancient Ritual" in that Book was lawful without "authority of Parliament;" therefore as that ancient Ritual is embodied in the ancient Canon Law of the Church of England, which is held to be in force now by the reviving Statute of 1 Eliz. c. 1., it must be lawful now, even though not prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, or included in the Rubric for Ornaments. The suggestion that "authority" means "authorship" requires some proof before it need be discussed.

Obj. 15. It is contended (in reference to the use of Vestments, Lights and Incense, and in opposition to an alleged claim, "first, that whatever was once in use, and not specifically abolished by authority of Parliament, must still be lawful; and, secondly, that the Rubric, at all events, must be explained by the Injunction," No. 3 of 1547, touching the retention of the two Lights), that:—

(a.) The Judicial Committee, in Liddell v. Westerton, "restrict the meaning [of the Rubric] to Ornaments, the use of which in the Church was provided for by the Statute of Uniformity 2 and 3 Edw. VI., c. i., and that that Statute "only makes compulsory the use of a Prayer Book, in which . . . . not a syllable will be found which makes the smallest allusion to the use of either Altar-lights or Incense." (Case for Opinion, p. 43.)

(b.) The Rubric of the Prayer Book "cannot be construed to permit, by its silence, articles positively ordered by the Injunction [of 1547] to be removed. The question would thus become narrowed to the legality of two Lights only; and as to this, it is alleged that Dr. Lushington decided against the lighting of the Candles, in Westerton v. Liddell; and that, as there was no appeal from the Consistory Court, "there was no possibility that Dr. Lushington's judgment should be reviewed."

(c.) It is urged, "that the reasons given by Dr. Lushington for decrees against the use of Altar-lights may be applied with still greater effect to the use of Incense." And that in the Prayer Book of 1549 the directions given for its use in the old Missals were omitted.

Ans. 15. With regard to the several points urged, in Obj. 15, against Vestments, Lights, and Incense, it is answered thus:—

(a.) In the Prayer Book of 1549 "not a syllable will be found which makes the smallest allusion to the use of" coverings for the Altar, or to the linen cloth for the time of celebration of the Holy Communion, any more than to "Altar-lights or Incense;" yet it cannot be reasonably doubted that the former were "compulsory," and it is equally reasonable to conclude, therefore, that the latter had not been abolished.

(b.) The argument here raised admits, for its purpose at least, the lawfulness of the Injunctions of 1547; therefore, it logically supports the lighting of the Candles, even against Dr. Lushington's adverse Opinion, which, indeed, was not a decision.

(c.) If "the reasons given by Dr. Lushington" are not, as it is believed, of any force to maintain his Opinion against Altar-lights, they are not, it is submitted, of any force against Incense. On the contrary, if the Injunctions of 1547 are, as is believed, an adequate legal authority and historical witness for the use of Altar-lights in 1549, they are equally so for the use of Incense then. For the 3rd Injunction orders the clergy to remove such "images as they know in any of their cures to be or have been so abused with pilgrimage or offerings of anything made thereunto, or shall be hereafter censured unto." (Cardwell, Doc. Ann., I. p. 7.) This at once shows that the use of Incense with Censers was intended to be continued in the Services. And as there is no evidence, it is believed, of any prohibition of its use under the Prayer Book of 1549, or, indeed, any complaint of it even in subsequent Injunctions which ordered the disuse of other "imitations of the Popish Mass," it may most fairly be presumed to have been "used under" the Book of 1549, and so, upon the principle laid down by the Judicial Committee, it "may be used" legally now.

The omission, in the Prayer Book of 1549, of such directions as were given about it in the old Missals is no argument against its legality then or now; for even the Missals, and, as has been already shown, (a.), the Book of 1549, did not mention everything in Rubrics. There is no Rubrical authority for the alternate recitation of the Psalter—a practice strenuously opposed by the Puritans.

Moreover, there is historical proof that it was used "at the Altar" in Ely Cathedral as late as about 1770, and, therefore, could not then have been considered illegal.

Obj. 16. (a.) In reference "to the practice of mixing water with the wine, the use of wafers, and the introduction of hymns" into the Communion Service "before and after the Prayer of Consecration, and at the time of administering the Elements," it is said "that the absence of any directions in the Rubric, except as to the bread, coupled with the provisions of the 2nd section of the Act of Uniformity, is of itself a sufficient prohibition of these practices." (Case for Opinion of the Attorney General, &c., p. 45.)

(b.) Further, with regard to the Rubric as to the bread, it is contended "that the use of the common bread had been insisted on so far back as 1559 by the Bishops in their Interpretation of the Queen's Injunctions, with a direction that it be made thicker and broader than it was then commonly used." (Card. Doc. Ann. I., p. 238.) There can hardly be any doubt that the object of this direction was to introduce a broad distinction between the wafer of the Mass and the bread of the Protestant Communion Service; and it was not by any means probable that the Rubric of 1662 should have been meant to authorize a practice which would destroy that distinction." (Ibid.)

(c.) It is also objected that Bishop Cosin's proposal to mention wafer bread in the Rubric, not having been adopted by the Revisers in 1661, shows that they did not intend the present Rubric to sanction it.

Ans. 16. (a.) The absence of Rubrical directions is not, it is contended, prohibitory. Thus, with regard to the Mixed Chalice, though no Rubric now orders it, as was the case in the Book of 1549, Bishop Cosin says (Notes, 1st Series, p. 153, Oxford Ed.), "Our Church forbids it not, for aught I know, and they that think fit may use it, as some most eminent among us do at this day."

The same principle applies to the use of Hymns in the Communion Service; and, indeed, in the Book of 1549 the Agnus Dei was ordered to be sung during the Communion of the people. Further, it is submitted that an expression in a Letter of Dec. 27, 1549, quoted further on (p. 47), implies that other Hymns were then also sung.

(b.) It is abundantly evident from the following citations that a particular kind of bread was from the first designed by the Rubric, and that ordinary bread was intended to be the exception to, and not the rule of the Rubric.

1. The Rubric in the First Prayer Book directs a particular kind of bread, in these words:—"For avoiding of all matters and occasion of dissension, it is meet that the bread prepared for the Communion be made through all this realm, after one sort and fashion; that is to say, unleavened and round, as it was afore, without all manner of print, and something more larger and thicker than it was, so that it may be aptly divided in divers pieces. . . ."

2. The Rubric in the Second Prayer Book is as follows:—"And to take away the superstition, which any person hath or might have in the bread and wine, it shall suffice that the bread be such as is usual to be eaten at the table with other meats, but the best and purest wheaten bread that conveniently may be gotten."

3. The Rubric of the Second Book is continued in all the subsequent Books of 1559, 1604, and 1662. The interpretation of it must be, it is submitted, taken from the following proceedings respecting it in Elizabeth's reign.

In the Injunctions of Elizabeth, A.D. 1559, the following is directed:—

"Item. Where[as], also, it was in the time of King Edward the Sixth used to have the Sacramental bread of common fine bread; it is ordered for the more reverence to be given to these holy mysteries, being the Sacraments of the Body and Blood of Our Saviour Jesus Christ, that the same Sacramental bread be made and formed plain, without any figure thereupon, of the same fineness and fashion round, though somewhat bigger in compass and thickness, as the usual bread and wafer, heretofore named singing cakes, which served for the use of the private mass." (Cardwell, Doc. Ann. I., p. 234.)

In the "Interpretations and further considerations" of the Injunctions, A.D. 1561 (not 1559, as they are dated in the Case for Opinion), it is ordered:—

"Item. That there be no other manner and form of ministering the Sacrament but as the Service Book doth precisely prescribe, with the declaration of the Injunctions; as, for example, the common bread," [i.e., the "common fine bread," which was to be made in "fashion round," like a wafer, "though somewhat bigger in compass and thickness."]

"Item. That the Communion bread be thicker and broader than it is now commonly used." (Strype, Ann. I., p. 213; Cardwell, Doc. Ann. I., 2.)

In a letter of Archbishop Parker to Secretary Cecil, April 12, 1566, he says:—

"... My Lord of London can best answer for his own jurisdiction; but this I can say, that where[as] I have sent, divers days, three and four of my chaplains to serve in the greatest parishes, what for lack of surplice and wafer bread, they did mostly but preach. And one of my chaplains serving last Sunday [7th of April, the Sixth Sunday in Lent] at a parish, and being informed that divers communicants would have received, the table made already accordingly, while he was reading the Passion, one man of the parish drew from the table both cup and the wafer bread, because the bread was not common, and so the minister derided, and the people disappointed." (Parker Correspondence, p. 278.)

About the same date, in a paper entitled "The state of the Church of England, as described by Percival Wiburn," a Puritan, it is stated that:—

"In the administration of the [Lord's] Supper, for the greater reverence of the Sacrament, little round unleavened cakes are reintroduced by the Queen, which had heretofore been removed by the public laws of the realm, for the taking away superstition." (Zurich Letters, 2nd Series; Appendix, No. IV., p. 358.)

Again, in May 1566, Coverdale, Humphrey, and

APPENDICES.

Sampson, writing to Farrell, Viret, Beza, and others, from London, say thus:—

“Our affairs are not settled for the better, but, alas! are sadly deteriorated. For it is now settled and determined that an unleavened cake must be used in place of common bread.” (Ibid., No. I., p. 121.)

Once more; in consequence of controversies on the subject, Archbishop Parker wrote to Sir William Cecil, on January 8, 1571, as follows:—

“Sir,—When upon the return of my Lord of London [Sandys] from the Court, we had communication of the Communion bread, and he seeming to signify to me that your Honour did not know of any rule passed by law in the Communion Book that it may be such bread as is usually eaten at the table with other meats, &c., I thought it good to put you in remembrance, and to move your consideration in the same. For it is a matter of much contention in the realme, where most part of Protestants think it most meet to be in wafer bread, as the Injunction prescribeth; divers others, I cannot tell of what spirit, would have the loaf bread, &c..... They that like not the Injunction force much the Statute in the Book. I tell them that they do evil to make odious comparisons betwixt Statute and Injunction, and yet I say and hold that the Injunction hath authority by proviso of the Statute. And whereas it is said in the note, that to ‘take away the superstition which any person hath or might have in the bread and wine, it shall suffice that the bread be such as is usually to be eaten at the table with other meats, &c.’; ‘it shall suffice,’ I expound, where either there wanteth such fine usual bread, or superstition be feared in the wafer bread, they may have the Communion in fine usual bread, which is rather a toleration in these two necessities, than is in plain ordering, as is in the injunction.” (Parker Correspondence, No. CCLXXXIII., p. 375.)

And on the 6th of February, 1571, the Archbishop again writes to Secretary Cecil in these words:—

“Sir,—As you desired, I send you the form of the bread used, and was so appointed by my late Lord of London [Grindal] and myself, as we took it not disagreeable to the Injunction. And how so many Churches hath of late varied I cannot tell; except it be the practice of the common adversary, the Devil, to make variance and dissension in the Sacrament of Unity.” (Ibid., p. 378.)

(c.) The non-adoption of Bishop Cosin’s proposal in 1661, to order wafer bread, is no proof whatever that the Bishops intended to prohibit it, by giving a different interpretation to the Rubric from that which the foregoing extracts prove to have been authoritatively assigned to it.

Besides the foregoing specific grounds of reply to the Objections previously enumerated, the following Documents are also submitted for consideration, as affording a special or general support to the Ritual practices now impugned. They prove what was intended to be and what was the Ceremonial aspect of the Services of the Prayer Book of 1549; and (as the Judicial Committee refer to that Book, and to what was “prescribed in” and was “used under” it, as being the “Authority of Parliament” referred to in the Rubric on Ornaments in the present Prayer Book) it is submitted that the like description of Service is lawful at the present time.

(1.) A Letter written on April 26, 1549, by Martin Bucer and Paul Fagius, to the Ministers at Strasburg. In this Letter, after saying, “We yesterday waited upon the Archbishop of Canterbury, that most benevolent and kind father of the Churches and of godly men, who receives and entertains us as brethren,” they continue thus:—“The cause of religion, as far as appertains to the establishment of doctrines, and the definition of rites, is pretty near what could be wished [here they enlarge upon the need of a suitable ministry]. As soon as the description of the ceremonies now in use shall have been translated into Latin we will send it to you. We hear that some concessions have been made both to a respect for antiquity and to the infirmity of the present age; such, for instance, as the vestments commonly used in the Sacrament of the Eucharist, and the use of Candles; so also in regard to the commemoration of the dead, and the use of chrisam; for we know not to what extent or in what sort it prevails. They affirm that there is no superstition in these things, and that they are only to be retained for a time, lest the people, not having yet learned Christ, should be deterred by too extensive innovations from embracing His religion, and that rather they may be won over. This circumstance, however, greatly refreshed us, that all the Services in the churches are read and sung in the vernacular tongue, that the doctrine of justification is purely and soundly taught, and the Eucharist administered according to Christ’s ordinance, private masses having been abolished..... At Lambeth, from the house of the Archbishop of Canterbury, near London. (Original Letters, Parker Society, p. 535.)

*[The Book of 1549, as actually published, proves that the writers had not misunderstood their informants.]*

(2.) A MS. Letter in the Record Office (State Papers “Domestic,” Edw. VI., vol. vii.) from the Duke of Somerset to Cardinal Pole, dated June 4, 1549, and replying to the Cardinal’s Letters “of the Sixth of Mai.” In it the Duke (after discussing some questions as to the relative claims and positions of England and the Roman See) informs the Cardinal, who was then at Rome, of the completion of the New Prayer Book, and tells him, “We have delivered to those which brought your Letters the Boke of Common Service, the same whereof heire before we have spoken, agreed on in the Parliament.” He further invites his judgment upon it, expressing his belief that the Cardinal “shal be satisfied” if he should point out “eny faulte” in it; and concludes by inviting him to return to England, adding “we are not in much feare but that it may well be if ye did se thinges here with your eyes, and conferred with learned men the reasons and causes of our doinges, the which now ye do not learn, but by report, which in tyme and distance encreaseth, and made them which favoereth not the thing ys exaggerated to the worse; ye wold peradventure condiscend your self, and be in all poyntes satisfied, as at this present many both of busshops and other learned men be, which at the first did mich repyne, fare you well.”

*[This letter is strong evidence that the Services, as conducted under the First Prayer Book, were meant to have the same general external aspect which they had borne when the old Service Books were in use; else the Duke of Somerset could never have thought that Cardinal Pole would have been in “all poyntes satisfied.” But if the Rubrics of the Book of 1549 had been exclusive, the Eucharist must have been celebrated without either Cross or Lights, or Incense, or Altar Coverings, or even the Linen Cloth; for none of these were prescribed in that Book. The Cardinal, however, was not likely to dispense with what he would have accounted important if not essential.]*

(3.) A letter from John Hooper to Henry Bullinger, dated London, Dec. 27, 1549, nearly seven months after the Prayer Book of 1549 had come into use throughout the kingdom, in which he says:—

“The Altars are here in many churches changed into tables. The public celebration of the Lord’s Supper is celebrated three times a day. Where they used heretofore to celebrate in the morning the Mass of the Apostles; they now have the Communion of the Apostles; where they had the Mass of the Blessed Virgin, they now have the Communion, which they call the Communion of the Virgin; where they had the principal, or high Mass, they now have, as they call it, the high Communion. They still retain their Vestments, and the Candles before they Altars; in the churches they always chant the hours, and other hymns relating to the Lord’s Supper, but in our own language. And that popery may not be lost, the Mass-priests, although they are compelled to discontinue the use of the Language, yet most carefully observe the same tone and manner of chanting to which they were heretofore accustomed in the Papacy. God knows to what perils and anxieties we are exposed by reason of men of this kind.....” (Original Letters, Parker Society, p. 71.)

(4.) The Inventories of Church Goods made in pursuance of the Commissions issued in the last years of Edward the Sixth, i.e., after the Second Prayer Book had been published, which required only the use of the Surplice. These Commissions show that in very numerous cases the Commissioners, in pursuance of the “discretion” reposed in them, “left for use in the Church” Altar Crosses, Altar Candlesticks, Copes, Tunicles, Albes, and, occasionally, Censers, &c.—Ornaments these which certainly were not obligatory, but, on the contrary, are usually (though, it is believed, incorrectly) supposed to have been unlawful at that time.

The following examples may suffice on this occasion, though they are but a small portion of similar evidence which is to be found in the Record Office, Fetter-lane, where these Inventories are now deposited. The first three inventories are given in full, as illustrations of these valuable Documents:—

*[IV. The following is a summary of the Assignments made to the Churches in nine Counties: they are all of the same period; viz., the 6th and 7th Edw. VI. The details are given in the Church Review from Sept. 30, 1865 to April 23, 1866.

The Royal Commissioners deliver the goods to the Churchwardens "safely to be kept and preserved, and the same and every part thereof to be forthcoming at all times hereafter when it shall be required."

The figures show the number of Churches in each County to which the several Articles were assigned.

Ornaments.	Cope.	Vestment or Chasuble.	Tunicle.	Amice.	Alb.	Stole.	Surplice.	Altar Cloth.	Linen do.	Corporal.	Chalice.	Paten.	Two Cruets.	PYX.

Bucks } Continued.	9	2	5	1	4	1	—	1	3	2	—

In Bucks forty other churches are mentioned as having each Two Candlessticks.

It may be said, perhaps, with regard to the foregoing summary, that the terms of the Assignment are not sufficiently definite to show that all these Articles were left for use in the Services; but it may be replied, that the contrary theory would prove too much, inasmuch as it is clear that some of the Articles were positively required by the Rubrics of the Second Book, viz., the Surplice, the Linen Altar Cloth, and the Chalice.

There are, however, other Inventories to which this exception cannot be taken, and the positive language of them may also fairly be regarded as corresponding to the terms above quoted, and so as being interpretative of them. The following are some examples:—

HAMPSHIRE.—Articles assigned "for the use of the Parish," in the number of Churches mentioned under each Article:

Cope.	Vestment.	Chasuble.	Tunicle.	Amice.	Alb.	Stole.	Girdle.	Surplice.	Rochet.	Altar Cloth.	Linen Altar Cloth.	Corporal.

1	3	1	8	3	2	1	2	1	10	6	1	2

HEREFORDSHIRE.—Out of the Inventories of 64 Churches, there were "reserved to the use of the Parish" Copes in 50 instances, also Vestments in 23 cases, and in 18 cases Vestments to make a Cope.

ESSEX AND CAMBRIDGESHIRE.—The following Articles were assigned to the number of Churches mentioned in the following terms, either "For the Divine Service," or "Delivered for Divine Service," or "To remain for Divine Service," or "For the use of the Church," or "For the administration," or "For the administration within the same Church," or "Appointed for Divine Service," or "For the only maintenance of Divine Service":

Ornaments.	Cope.	Vestment.	Alb.	Surplice.	Rochet.	Altar Cloth.	Linen Table Cloth.	Corporal.	Chalice.	Paten and Basin.	Ever Towel.	Christiamity.	Hess Cloth.
ESSEX	96	29	7	55	4	17	45	—	88	1	3	36	5
CAMBRIDGE-SHIRE	131	73	4	45	28	33	30	2	150	5	—	42	—

KENT.—These articles were "Left in the Church for the ministraton of Divine Service" in the following instances:

Ornaments.	Cope.	Alb.	Surplice.	Chalice.	Paten.	Altar Cloth.	Table Cloth.	Pall.	Bells.
CANTERBURY	7	6	3	3	3	2	3	1	4

DORSETSHIRE.—Upwards of 260 Churches had assigned to them at least one Cope or Vestment, "To the Church's use there appointed by the said Commissioners."

With regard to the Colours of the various Vestments in the foregoing Inventories, there occur Red, Green, White, Yellow, Blue, Brown, and Black.]*

These, out of many examples which can be produced, go very far, if not entirely, to prove (what the Act of Uniformity which authorized the 2nd Prayer Book of Edward VI. and other considerations tend to show) that the lower standard of Ritualism, which that Book required was set up in order not to compel the obedience of the foreign party and their adherents to Ornaments and Ceremonies which they strongly objected to; and not with the view of prohibiting the higher standard, which the First Book recognized, whether Clergy and people objected to it or not. But however this may be, it seems impossible to contend that the King's Commissioners were acting illegally in leaving "for use" in the Churches the ornaments above mentioned.

*[A Letter was issued by the Privy Council to Archbishop Cranmer on April 30, 1548, "to arm Churchwardens," as Strype says, "with an answer to such greedy courtiers and gentlemen as used often to resort to them; and in their own, or the Council's name, required these goods of their Churches to be yielded up to them; and threatened them if they did not." The letter runs thus:

"After our right hearty commendation. Whereas we are informed that the Churchwardens and Parochians of divers parishes do alienate and sell away their Chalice, Crosses of Silver, Bells, and other Ornaments of the Church: which were not given for that purpose to be alienated at their pleasure; but either to be used to the intent they were at first given, or to some other necessary and convenient service of the Church. Therefore this is to will and require you immediately, upon the sight hereof, to give straight charge and commandment, on the King's Majesty's behalf, to every parish Church within your diocese, that they do in nowise sell, give, or otherwise alienate any Bells, or other Ornaments, or Jewels belonging unto their Parish Church, upon pain of his highest displeasure, as they will answer to the contrary at their peril. Thus fare you well. From Westminster the last day of April 1548.—Your loving friends. E. SOMERSET" and 9 others. (Strype's Cranmer, Bk. 2, Chap. 8.)

Thus, as the Inventories show, numerous Ornaments were preserved in the Churches during the whole time in which the First Prayer Book was in use, i.e., until Nov. 1, 1552. Many of these Ornaments were absolutely required by the Rubrics of that Book; and there can be no reasonable doubt that most of, if not all, the rest were, more or less, "used under" the same Book; otherwise they would probably have been put "to some other necessary and convenient service of the Church," as they might have been under the terms of the Council's Letter.

This was the condition of the Ornaments when the Second Prayer Book came into use, in 1552. The general Rubric of that Book as to Ornaments is in these words—"And here it is to be noted that the Minister at the time of Communion, and at all other times in his ministrations, shall use neither Alb, Vestment, nor Cope: but being Archbishop or Bishop, he shall have and wear a Rochet; and being a Priest or Deacon, he shall have and wear a Surplice only."

It is submitted that (having regard to the historical considerations connected with the Second Book) it may not unfairly be contended that this Rubric was not prohibitory of other Ornaments than those named in it; and that the expressions "shall use" and "shall have and wear . . . only," might mean that nothing more was compulsory, the numerous other Ornaments which, as the Inventories show, were left for use in the Church furnish very strong support to this view. No doubt in many places the clergy and people had a lingering or a strong attachment to the Ornaments; and so it is exceedingly likely that the Commissioners used the "discretion" reposed in them by leaving what was not inconsistent with the Services of the Second Book.]*

The especial attention of Counsel is also respectfully requested to the following points, in reference to the subsequent Questions 1 to 6, which are submitted for their Opinion:—

I. That as Counsel will probably be guided in their proposed answer to Question 1 by the interpretative dictum of the Judicial Committee—that what was "used under the Prayer Book of 1549 may still be used"—therefore this principle must be applied in answering the remaining questions. So that if the Ornaments and Usages to which they relate were "used under" that Book, they are lawful now if not opposed to or at variance with the Rubrics and Services of the present Book.

II. That the terms, Order, Form, Rite, Ceremony (as employed in the several Acts of Uniformity and in the Title and Contents of the Prayer Book) refer to the language, structure, and character of the Services, and not to the Ornaments and Ceremonial of them.

(a.) Order and Form mean arrangement and expression. See Note in Stephen's Eccl. Stat. i., p. 365, quoted supra, pp. 6.

(b.) Rite and Ceremony, mean Offices which are not strictly Sacraments or Prayers. See proofs, quoted supra, pp. 5, 6.

III. That the Rubrics were not designed to be and are not exclusive and exhaustive; they are only incidentally directory, and did not prescribe everything in the nature of Ornament or Usage, as was the case too with the old Missals. The First Prayer Book did not mention a Linen Cloth for the Celebration of Holy Communion, or Altar Coverings. It assumed an existing use.

The Attorney-General gave an Opinion on Dec. 5, 1865, "that the use of the Stole, although it may not be expressly enjoined in Edw. Vith's First Prayer Book, is yet perfectly legal." There is not the slightest allusion to it in the first or in any subsequent Prayer Book.

IV. That the Ancient Canons were in force in 1549, and these enjoined many Ornaments and Usages; and this would account for many things not mentioned in the Prayer Book, e.g. Lights at the Celebration of the Holy Communion; for Archbishop Reynolds's Constitution of 1322 says, "let two Candles, or one at the least, be lighted at the time of High Mass."

V. That the Prayer Book of 1549 did not introduce new Ornaments and Usages, but merely continued the old ones which were employed when the Missal was in use (i.e., up to June 1549) except where they were not suited to the altered Services.

VI. That the Doctrine on the Eucharist (as well as in all other Services) has been uniform in all the Prayer Books from 1549 to 1662. The Statutes and Prefaces profess this. Latimer, in his "Disputation at Oxford," 1554, speaking of the Books, of 1549 and 1552 said, "I find no great diversity in them (they are one Supper of the Lord); but I like the last very well." (Works, 504. See also supra, p. 8, b.)

VII. That such Ornaments and Usages as were merely omitted in the Second Book were not meant to be prohibited, but only were not intended to be enforced upon such objectors as Bucer and the foreign party of the time and their adherents, e.g. the manual acts—viz., taking the bread, &c., at the Consecration, as ordered in the First Book.

QUESTION 1.—THE VESTMENTS.

It is alleged by some that the Vestments, although ordered in the Book of 1549, almost immediately fall into disuse. But that they were in use at least a year and a half after the Prayer Book of 1549 was published is clear from what occurred in Hooper's case. He was nominated in July 1550 to the see of Gloucester, but scrupled to use the habits. Archbishop Cranmer "wrote to Cambridge to Martin Bucer for his judgment, who, upon occasion of this controversy, wrote two Epistles—one to Hooper, and another to the Archbishop, both de re vestiaria. That to the latter was in answer to these two queries, which Cranmer had sent for his resolution about:—

"I. Whether, without offending God, the ministers of the Church of England may use those garments which are now used, and prescribed to be used by the magistrates?"

"II. Whether he that affirms it unlawful, or refuseth to use these garments, sinneth against God, because he saith that is unclean which God hath sanctified; and against the magistrate, who commandeth a political order?"

Bucer to both these questions gave his resolution in the affirmative, in his answer to the Archbishop, dated December 8. But he thought, considering how the habits had been occasion to some of superstition, and to others of contention, that it were better, at some good opportunity, wholly to take them away?"

In this letter to Hooper, dated November 4, Bucer said "that there might be some great good follow from the use at present of the garments—namely, that if we suffered the Gospel to be first preached, and well noted, men would afterwards better and more easily be persuaded to let go the outward customs." (Strype's Cranmer, 303.)

So, too, has it been contended that at and after the Revision of 1661 the Rubric was not held to have re-enacted all the Ornaments prescribed by the Prayer Book of 1549. But in reply it may be mentioned that in 1668 proposals with a view to comprehension were made by Baxter and his party; and, in a List of "The most necessary Alterations of the Liturgy" which they then made, they proposed, among other things, that "The Rubric for the old Ornaments, which were in use in the second year of Edward VI. [be] put out." (Sylvester's "Life and Times of Baxter" Lond., 1696, Part III., p. 39.)

It should be noted also that Bishop Gibson, though marking the Rubric "obsolete" (see supra, p. 30), says elsewhere, in a Note upon the words "other order" in the statute of 1559, "Which other order (at least in the method prescribed by this Act) was never yet made; and, therefore, legally, the Ornaments of Ministers in preparing Divine Service, are the same now as they were in 2 Edward VI." (Codex I., p. 297. Ed. 1761.)

APPENDICES.

*[In reference to the Objections urged against the legality of the Vestments, drawn from their long disuse and from the absence of enquiries touching anything but the Surplice in Visitation Articles before and after the Revision of 1661, some Answer is furnished by "An Abstract of the Metropolitan Visitation of the Most Reverend Father in God William [Laud], by God's Providence Lord Archbishop of Canterbury his Grace, holden in the year of our Lord God, 1635." The returns made by his Vicar-General, Sir Nathaniel Brent, afford proofs not only of the general decay and neglect which prevailed at that period even in the Cathedrals where the Canons of 1603 as to the Cope were not obeyed, but also that some effort was then made to remedy the evil. The Abstract is contained in the Preface to the Calendar of State Papers, Domestic Series, Charles I., 1635; edited by John Bruce, Esq., 1865. The following passages occur therein:—

"NORWICH, April 6, 7, 8.—The Cathedral Church is much out of order ..... The Copes are fair, but want mending."

"BUNGAY, April 20.—..... Mr. Davies, lecturer of Beccles, a man of more than seventy years of age, did never wear the Surplice, nor use the Cross in Baptism. I was told that all the Bishops there have tolerated him because he is a very quiet and honest man, but now he hath promised reformation."

"WORCESTER, June 1, 2, et 3.—The Cathedral Church ..... They have no Copes, but are ordered to buy some before the Feast of the Annunciation."

"GLOUCESTER, June 8 et 9.—In the Cathedral Church many things amiss. No Cope."

"WINCHESTER, Junii 19, 20, 22, et 23.—The Cathedral Church is very much in decay ..... They have no Copes."

"CHICHESTER, Junii 27 et 30.—The Cathedral Church somewhat out of repair ... There are no Copes. They are willing to buy some, but protest that they are exceeding poor."*

QUESTION 2.—LIGHTED CANDLES.

1. They were enjoined by Archbishop Reynold's Constitutions of 1322. (See supra IV., p. 61.)

2. They were retained by the Injunctions of 1547, No. 3, in order to honour Christ, not men, as lights before images and pictures did.

3. The Injunctions of 1547 were in force in 1548; for Cranmer's Visitation Articles enquire for the two lights. (See Ans. 3, p. 10.) Also, he enquires, "Item, whether they have read the King's Majesty's Injunctions every quarter of the year, the first holy day of the same quarter." (Cardwell, Doc. Ann. i. 53.)

They were in force in 1549 and 1550, for the Prayer Book of 1549 recognizes them in this Rubric at the end of "The Communion"—viz., "Upon Wednesdays and Fridays the English Litany shall be said or sung in all places, after such form as is appointed by the King's Majesty's Injunctions: or as is or shall be otherwise appointed by his highness." And some of them, including the one as to the lights, are professedly repealed and are ordered to be omitted in the "reading" of these Injunctions, viz., by the supposed Royal Injunctions of the supposed date of 1549, and by Ridley's Injunctions of 1550.

4. The lights were intended to be retained when the Book of 1549 was being prepared. See the Letter of Bucer to Fagius (supra, p. 44).

5. There was an implied retention of them under the Book of 1549 when it was published. See the Letter of Somerset to Pole (supra, p. 45).

6. They were in actual use in Dec. 1549. See the Letter of Hooper to Bullinger (supra, p. 46).

7. They were not legally abolished in Edward's reign, though forbidden by some Episcopal Injunctions.

8. The Inventories made after the Second Prayer Book was published assign Candlesticks for the Altar in the following and similar phrases: "for the only maintenance of Divine Service," and "for the use of the Church"—this implies the lighting of Candles—they could not have been illegal then, else the Royal Commissioners could not have exercised their "discretion" in leaving them.

9. The Injunctions of 1547 were abolished by Mary in common with other Ecclesiastical proceedings of Edw. VI. This restored the old Missal Service, and with it, of course, the Lights. * [Thus, e.g., Strype mentions, under date of August 21, 1553, that "Mass began at St. Nicholas Cole Abbey, sung in Laten, and Tapers set on the Altar and a Cross." (Ecl. Memorials III. 22.)]*

10. The Injunctions of 1547 were mainly incorporated with the Elizabethan Injunctions of 1559: but no mention was made of Lights, therefore the revived use of them in Mary's reign was not prohibited. Moreover, the Statute and Rubric of 1559 legally revived the Ornaments of Edward's second year, and therefore, of course, the Two Lights.

11. The Two Lights were used in the Queen's Chapel (and in other places) at the celebration of the Holy Communion; therefore, they could not have been illegal. Some of the Bishops remonstrated against their use, but never even suggested that they were unlawful.

Bishop Cox, writing to Gualter on Feb. 12, 1571, says of the Queen that she "has always been so exceedingly scrupulous in deviating even in the slightest degree from the laws prescribed." (Zurich Letters, 1st Series, No. XCIV., p. 234.)

12. These lights have never since been prohibited.

13. James the First directed Maw and Wren, the Chaplains to Prince Charles, to have "Tapers" (among other things) in the Prince's Chapel at Madrid. They could not, therefore, have been illegal.

14. Bishop Cosin (Notes, 2nd and 3rd Series) expressly says that "two lights upon the Communion Table or Altar" were used in Edward's second year, and were therefore strictly required by the Rubric in his own time. * [See also a full discussion of Bishop Cosin's testimony in the "Hierurgia Anglicana" (Lond., 1848, pp. 187-190.) It may be mentioned that there is a picture of the Altar of St. Paul's Cathedral prepared for the Celebration of the Holy Communion, and having Two Lighted Candles upon it, in a small Book published in "London, 1698," by "Samuel Keble, at the Turk's Head, in Fleet-street," and entitled "The Holy-days or the Holy Feasts and Fasts, as they are observed in the Church of England (throughout the year) Explained; and the Reasons why they are Yearly Celebrated. With Cuts before each day."*]

Wheatly (Common Prayer, p. 105) says the same thing as Cosin in these words:—"I must observe still farther, that among other Ornaments of the Church then in use, there were two Lights enjoined by the Injunctions of King Edward VI. (which Injunctions were also ratified by the Act of Parliament here mentioned) to be set upon the Altar, as a significant ceremony to represent the light which Christ's Gospel brought into the world. And this, too, was ordered by the very same Injunction which prohibited all other Lights and Tapers that used to be superstitiously set before images or shrines, &c. And these Lights, used time out of mind in the Church, are still continued in most, if not all, Cathedral and Collegiate Churches and Chapels, so often as Divine Service is performed by candle-light, and ought also, by this Rubric, to be used in all Parish Churches and Chapels at the same times."

15. The two lights could not be needed to give light at the afternoon Service in former days, for the usual hour of Service was 2.0 or 3.0 o'clock. They would, moreover, afford very inadequate light for reading at the Altar—though, indeed, there was nothing to be read there at Evening Prayer.

16. The expression "before the Sacrament" does not mean before the reserved Sacrament: only one light was required for this, as is shown by Cardinal Pole's Inquiry in 1557, "Whether there do burn a lamp or a candle before the Sacrament"—i.e., as his Injunctions of 1566 show, before the "tabernacle sett in the midst of the High Altar." There can be no reasonable doubt that two Lights were used at the Mass in Queen Mary's reign.

Cranmer, of course, approved the Injunctions of 1547, if, indeed, he was not the author of them. His Visitation Articles of 1548, founded upon them, must, therefore, be regarded as a reliable "contemporaneous exposition of them;" and his inquiry is, "Whether they suffer any torches, candles, tapers, or any other lights to be in your churches, but only two lights upon the High Altar." (Card. Doc. Ann., I. p. 51.) But, in fact, the reserved Sacrament does not seem to have been commonly kept on the Altar at that period; the Tabernacle appears to have been a later introduction, and was perhaps due to Cardinal Pole himself. At all events, the following passages shew that, at that time, the Sacrament, when reserved, was either suspended in a Pyx (which was often made in the form of a Dove), or was kept in an Aumbrye or Locker made in the wall of the Church.

Strype relates that in October, 1547 (the very year of the Injunctions), "A French lad of this College [St. John's, Cambridge], a cizer to one Mr. Stafford there, had one night, in hatred to the Mass, secretly cut the string whereby the pyx hung above the Altar in the chapel." (Memorials of Cranmer, 163.)

The Devonshire rebels, in 1549, demanded in their 4th Article—"We will have the Sacrament hang over the high Altar, and there to be worshipped, as it was wont to be; and they which will not thereto consent, we will have them dy like Heretics against the holy Catholic Faith." Cranmer answered them thus:—".....Is this the holy Catholic faith, that the Sacrament should be hanged over the Altar and worshipped? And they be heretics that will not consent thereto. .... Innocent III., about 1215 years after Christ, did ordain that the Sacrament and Chrism should be kept under lock and key. But yet no motion he made of hanging the Sacrament over the high Altar, nor of the worshipping of it. After him came Honorius III., and he added further, commanding that the Sacrament should be devoutly kept in a clean place, and sealed; and that the priest should often teach the people reverently to bow down to the Host, when it is lifted up in the Mass time, and when the priest should carry it to the sick folkes. And although this Honorius added the worshipping of the Sacrament, yet he made no mention of the hanging thereof over the high Altar, as your Article proposeth. Nor, how long after, or by what means, that came first up into this realm, I think no man can tel. And in Italy it is not yet used until this day." (Strype's Cranmer, App. 97.)

So, again, in the "Fardle of Facions," printed in 1555, the following occurs:—"Upon the right hand of the highe aulter that there should be an almotie, either cutte into the wall, or framed upon it, in the which they woulde have the Sacrament of the Lord's Bodye, the holy oyle for the sicke, and chrisnatorie, alwaie to be locked.

"At each ende [of the Altar] a candlestick, and a booke towards the meddes." (See P.S. to Neale and Webb's Translation of Durandus, p. cxxxv.)

*[An old bequest to the Parish of St. Dionis, Backchurch, London, which now produces an annual income of about 500*l.*, helps to shew the distinction between the Two Altar-lights for the celebration of the Eucharist and the Light before the Reserved Sacrament—the latter being a perpetual Light. The bequest is derived from the Will of Giles de Kelsey, dated Feb. 18th, 1377, in which he devises as follows:—

"Also I devise to my executors all my tenement, with the appurtenances situate in Lime-street, in London, between the tenement of Richard Preston, on the one part, and the tenement late of John de Stodey on the other part, and the said street of Lime-street on the east part, and the place called Leadenhall on the west part; to have and to hold to my said executors, from the time of my decease unto the end of ten years then next following fully to be complete, to find thereout and sustain a lamp burning every day and night, before the High Altar in the aforesaid church of St. Dionis, which said tenement, with the appurtenances after the said ten years fully completed, I devise to remain to the rector and parishioners of the aforesaid church of St. Dionis, and their successors, rectors, and parishioners for the time being, to find thereout and sustain the lamp aforesaid burning every day and night before the aforesaid High Altar for ever. And the whole of the profits arising from the aforesaid tenement beyond the sustentation of the lamp aforesaid, and the reparation and sustentation of the tenement aforesaid, I leave for the amending and sustentation of the books, vestments, and ornaments of the aforesaid church."

The word "Sacrament" was not at that time limited to the consecrated species any more than it is now. Cranmer, in his "Answer to Gardiner" (Works, Parker Society, I., p. 3), mentions three senses in which he used the word in his argument—viz. (1) of "the sacramental bread, water, or wine;" (2) of Christ's "Sacramental Presence" "in the outward Sacrament;" (3) of "the whole ministration and receiving the Sacraments." It is believed that the Injunction refers to this last sense, i.e., to the whole Celebration.

QUESTION 3.—INCENSE.

1. The reasons No. 2 and 3 given for the lawfulness of the Two Lights apply also to Incense.

2. The 3rd Injunction of 1547 directs the Clergy to remove "such images as they know in any of their Cures to be or have been so abused with pilgrimage or offerings of anything made thereunto, or shall be hereafter censured unto." This clearly shows that Censing was intended to continue.

3. There is no evidence of any subsequent prohibition of it; even when, as in Ridley's Injunctions of 1550, many things were ordered to be disused, in order not to "counterfeit the Popish Mass." Nor does there seem ever to have been any complaint of it; perhaps because it was accounted Scriptural, having regard to the prophecy of Malachi (i. 11), that "from the rising of the sun even unto the going down of the same, My Name shall be great among the Gentiles, and in every place Incense shall be offered unto My Name, and a Pure Offering."

4. The Inventories of the Church Goods made in 6th and 7th years of Edw. VI. (i.e., after the Second Prayer Book had come into use) constantly mentions Censers as being among the Ornaments then in the Church: and in many instances they are named among the Goods assigned by the Royal Commissioners "for the use of the Parish."

5. In the list of the furniture of Bishop Andrewes' Chapel, 1643, is mentioned "a triquertrall censer, wherein the clerk putteth frankincense at the reading of the first lesson." The "first lesson" may mean the Epistle, and so would shew that the Incense was used at reading the Gospel; especially as the furniture described is all connected with the Altar: or it may mean the first lesson in the Evening Prayer, and so would imply Censing at the Magnificat, according to the old custom of using Incense both at the Benedictus and Magnificat in honour of the Incarnation.

6. In Archbishop Sancroft's "Form of Dedication and Consecration of a Church or Chapel," 1685—i.e., twenty-three years after the last revision of the Prayer Book—there in this direction:—"So likewise when a censer is presented and received they say, 'While the King sitteth at His Table, my spikenard sendeth forth the smell thereof (Can. i. 12). Let my prayer be set forth before Thee as Incense; and let the lifting up of my hands be as the evening sacrifice' (Ps. cxli. 2)."

7. In Cole's MSS. (Br. Mus. 5873, p. 82, d.) it is stated, "that it was the constant practice on the greater Festivals at Ely to burn incense at the Altar in the Cathedral, till Dr. Thomas Green, one of the Prebendaries, and now Dean of Salisbury, 1779, a finical man, though a very worthy one, and who is always taking snuff up his nose, objected to it, under pretence that it made his head to ach."

8. There seems to be no evidence of any such thing as what has been called "a stationary incense pot," but only of Censers for using Incense in 1549. It is submitted that, if used at all, it can only be legally used in such manner as it was used under the First Prayer Book.

*[9. No other authority (except custom) can be quoted for Organs than for Censers; indeed Censers are quite as often, if not more frequently, named in the Inventories of Goods left for the use of the Church; moreover, they are mentioned in common with other Ornaments—e.g., the Surplice, the Chalice, and the Paten (see pp. 55 and 56)—which unquestionably were positively required for the Services of the Church.]*

QUESTION 4.—THE MIXED CHALICE.

1. It was ordered in the following part of a Rubric in the Prayer Book of 1549—"... putting the wine into the Chalice... putting thereto a little pure and clean water," and has never since been forbidden, though the entire Rubric was omitted in the Second Prayer Book: so that if only the Rubrics of the Second Book were to be followed, there was no direction even to place the bread and wine on the Altar.

2. It was directed in a Rubric of Bishop Andrewes' "Form of Consecration of a Church or Chapel;" also in his Notes on the Common Prayer. And it was used (says Wheatly) "in the King's Chapel Royal, all the time that Bishop Andrewes was Dean of it."

3. In the directions for Prince Charles's Chapel, at Madrid, it was ordered "That the Communion be celebrated in due form, with an oblation of every communicant, and admixing of water with the wine." Collier, E. H. ii., p. 726.) The expression "due form" implies that it was considered the proper, if not customary form.

4. Bishop Cosin considered it lawful. See supra, Ans. 16 (a), p. 39.

*[Wheatly thus concludes his argument respecting it:—"And indeed it must be confessed that the mixture has, in all ages, been the general practice, and for that reason was enjoined, as has been noted above, to be continued in our own Church, by the first Reformers. And though in the next review the order for it was omitted, yet the practice of it was continued in the King's Chapel Royal all the time that Bishop Andrewes was Dean of it; who also, in the form that he drew up for the Consecration of a Church, &c., expressly directs and orders it to be used. How it came to be neglected in the Review of our Liturgy in King Edward's reign, I have not yet been able to discover. I am apt to suspect that it was thrown out upon some objection of Calvin or Bucer, who were no friends to any practice for its being ancient and Catholic, if it did not happen to suit with their fancy or humour. But whatever may have been the cause of laying it aside, since there is no reason to believe it essential, and since the Church has liberty to determine for herself in things not essential, it must be an argument sure of a very indiscreet and over-hasty zeal, to urge the omission of it as a ground for separation." (Common Prayer, 275.)*

APPENDICES.

QUESTION 5.—WAFER-BREAD.

In addition to the evidence given already on this point (supra, pp. 40-43), the following statement of Wheatly is important. He says, "The fifth rubric is designed to take away all those scruples which over-conscientious people used to make about the Bread and Wine. As to the Bread, some made it essential to the Sacrament to have leavened, others unleavened; each side, in that as well as in other matters of as small moment, superstitiously making an indifferent thing a matter of conscience." Then, after referring to what was probably done at the institution and to the practice of the Early Church, he mentions the Rubrics and Injunctions quoted (supra, pp. 40-41), and then adds, "Though Bishop Cosin observes upon our present Rubric, that 'It is not here commanded that no unleavened or wafer bread be used; but it is only said, that the other bread may suffice. So that though there was no necessity, yet there was a liberty yet reserved of using wafer-bread, which was used in divers Churches of the Kingdom, and Westminster for one, till the seventeenth of King Charles.' For which reason, perhaps, though the Scotch Liturgy continues the Rubric that was first inserted in the fifth year of King Edward; yet a parenthesis is inserted, to shew that the use of wafer-bread is lawful; (though it be lawful to have wafer-bread, it shall suffice, and so on, as in the Rubric of our own Liturgy." (Common Prayer, 311-14.

QUESTION 6.—HYMNS, &amp;c., IN THE CELEBRATION OF THE HOLY COMMUNION.

1. In the Book of 1549, it was ordered that—"In the Communion time the clerks shall sing, 'O Lamb of God,' &c., beginning so soon as the Priest doth receive the Holy Communion; and when the Communion is ended, then shall the clerks sing the Post-Communion," i.e., certain sentences of Scripture which were provided.

2. The letter of Hooper to Bullinger (see supra, p. 46), describing the mode of Celebration under the First Prayer Book, says—"In the Churches they always chant the hours, and other hymns relating to the Lord's Supper."

3. There is no authority for the common practice of singing hymns at any other service: unless the Rubric which provides for the singing of "the Anthem," after the Third Collect of Morning and Evening Prayer, may be held to sanction a Hymn for an Anthem.

4. It is a very common practice among what is called "the Evangelical party" to sing a hymn before the conclusion of the Communion Service: though, of course, this custom is not here mentioned as having any authority.

5. They are not illegal, unless the ascription before the Gospel, "Glory be to thee, O Lord," and that after the Gospel, "Thanks be to thee, O Lord," are illegal.

6. They are not things said by the Minister as part of the Service, but are only accompanying acts on the part of the Choir or People.

7. They do not so much "break the continuity of the Service" as other common practices—e.g., the singing a Hymn while the Priest goes into the Vestry to put on a Black Gown for the Sermon; the pause for him to change it again before he resumes the Communion Service at the Offertory; the time usually allowed for the departure of persons not intending to communicate.

Having regard, therefore, to the preceding statements; and especially to the language of the Judicial Committee in Liddell v. Westerton, that the Ornament Clause in the Act of Uniformity of 1559 and the successive forms of the Rubric on Ornaments in the Prayer Books of 1559, 1604, and 1662, "all obviously mean the same thing, that the same Dresses and the same Utensils or Articles which were used under the First Prayer Book of Edward the Sixth may still be used;" and also giving careful attention to the Ancient Canons of the Church of England, which have been held in Court, and elsewhere, to be still law by 1 Eliz. c. 1, except where they have been expressly repealed—

YOUR OPINION, as full and as definite as possible, is therefore requested upon the legality or otherwise of using the Articles or Practices mentioned under the following heads; viz. :—

1. The Vestments prescribed in the First Prayer Book of Edward VI. for use by the Minister in celebrating the Holy Communion; namely, "a white Alb, plain, with a Vestment [i.e., Chasuble] or Cope." The assisting Ministers also wearing "Albes with Tunicles."

2. The placing of two lighted Candles on the Lord's Table, or upon a ledge near to it, not for the purpose of giving light, but "for the signification that Christ is the very true Light of the World."

3. The burning of Incense in any way, or in such manner as it was employed and for such uses as it was put to in the Second Year of King Edward the Sixth viz., in Censers, and for censuring persons and things in the course of the Service, especially during the celebration of the Holy Communion, either by the officiating Minister, or by others authorized by him.

4. The adding "a little pure and clean water" to the wine after it has been poured into the Chalice in readiness for Consecration, as prescribed in the Prayer Book of 1549.

5. The use of unleavened or leavened bread in the form of Wafers, or in any other shape varying from the customary way in which bread ordinarily eaten is employed for the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

6. The Singing of Hymns, Introits, or Anthems—(i.) at the beginning of the Communion Service; (ii.) after the officiating Minister has read "one or more of" the Offertory sentences "as he thinketh most convenient in his discretion;" (iii.) during the pause for him to have "so ordered the Bread and Wine, that he may with the more readiness and decency break the Bread before the people, and take the cup into his hands;" (iv.) after the Prayer of Consecration, during the Communion of the Clergy and People; and (v.), lastly, at the end of the Service.

In asking this Opinion it is desired to call the attention of Counsel to the fact that there is no wish to urge, much less force, upon unwilling Clergy or People obedience to a Rubric which for a very long period has been neglected, or to imply unfaithfulness on the part of those who do not follow its directions. The object is simply to ascertain what liberty it concedes to those Clergy who desire to conform to it by employing the Ornaments and Usages which were, it is believed, "used under the First Prayer Book of Edward VI.;" and who wish to avail themselves of such liberty in the mode of conducting Divine Service as (being not contrary to Law, or to that interpretation of the Rubric above quoted as given in 1857 by the ultimate Court of Appeal in Causes Ecclesiastical), is found to be the most edifying to their People.

June 21, 1866.

OPINIONS.

1. We are of opinion that the Vestments mentioned in the First Prayer Book of Edward VI., namely, "a white albe plain, with a vestment or cope," may lawfully be used by the Minister in celebrating the Holy Communion, and that the assisting Ministers may also wear "albes with tunicles."

We think that the language of the Rubric, "that such Ornaments of the Church and of the Ministers thereof ..... shall be retained, and be in use, as were in this Church of England by the authority of Parliament, in the Second Year of the Reign of King Edward the Sixth," adopted as they are from the 1 Eliz. c. 2, s. 25, must be construed in the sense in which they were used in that statute, and that they must therefore be taken to authorize the use of, at least, those articles which were prescribed in the First Prayer Book of Edward VI.

We think that the interpretation we have put upon the Rubric is confirmed by the authority of the judgment of the Privy Council in Liddell v. Westerton. (See Note A.)

2. We are of opinion that the placing of two Lighted Candles on the Lord's Table, though not used for the purpose of giving light, is not unlawful.

Dr. Lushington has expressed an opinion to the contrary in Liddell v. Westerton, but no Decree was pronounced on the point; there was, therefore, no Judicial determination of this question either by Dr. Lushington or the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

3. We are of opinion that the burning of Incense in Censers for censuring persons or things in the course of the Service is not lawful. We know of no sufficient authority for using Incense any other way.

4. We have considered the argument in favour of this usage. But upon the whole we think that, as the mixing of water with the wine is not mentioned in the present Rubrics relating to the administration of the Lord's Supper, it is not authorized. (See Note B.)

5. We are of opinion that there is nothing to forbid the use of leavened or unleavened bread in the form of wafers or any other shape. (See Note C.)

6. We think that the singing of Hymns, Introits, or Anthems during the Communion Service is not authorized, but that they may be used at the beginning and end.

JAMES HANNEN.

July 13th, 1866.

I have no hesitation in declaring my concurrence in the answer of the Queen's Advocate to the first question proposed (the question relating to the Vestments), having expressed my opinion to that effect at the consultation held on the 25th of June last, but I cannot with propriety now be a party to any opinion on the remaining points of the case. (See Note D.)

FITZROY KELLY.

Temple, July 14th, 1866.

1. The words of the Rubric in the First Prayer Book of Edward VI., that "the Priest that shall execute the holy Ministry, shall put upon him the Vesture appointed for that ministration, that is to say, a white Albe plain, with a Vestment or Cope;" and the further direction in the same Rubric, that the "Priests or Deacons" helping "shall have upon them likewise the vestures appointed for their ministry, that is to say, Albes with Tunicles," describe the Ornaments of the Ministers at the specified times of their ministration. These Ornaments "were in this Church of England by the authority of Parliament, in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI.;" as such they are, in my opinion, now legal under the Prayer Book of 1662.

2. Taking the Lighted Candles to be Ornaments and apart from all symbolism, I am of opinion that two Lighted Candles on the Lord's table, even when not for the purpose of giving light, are not illegal.

3. I am strongly of opinion, that the burning of Incense in any way and for any purpose in the course

Note A.—The Rubric to the Prayer Book of Jan. 1st, 1604, adopts the language of the Rubric of Elizabeth. The Rubric to the present Prayer Book adopts the language of the Statute of Elizabeth; but they all obviously mean the same thing, that the same dresses and the same utensils or articles which were used under the First Prayer Book of Edward VI. may still be used.—Liddell v. Westerton, Moore's P. C. Report, p. 159.

Note B.—Since giving this Opinion, I am bound to say that further enquiry and consideration satisfies me that the contrary Opinion admits of a very good argument. R. P.

Note C.—I think the letter of Archbishop Parker to Sir William Cecil, January 8, 1571 (quoted at page 42 of the Case), is of great importance, as an almost contemporaneous exposition of this law:—

"Sir,—When upon the return of my Lord of London [Sandys] from the Court, we had communication of the Communion bread, and he seeming to signify to me that your Honour did not know of any rule passed by law in the Communion Book that it may be such bread as is usually eaten at the table with other meats, &c. I thought it good to put you in remembrance, and to move your consideration in the same. For it is a matter of much contention in the realm, where most part of Protestants think it most meet to be in wafer-bread, as the Injunction prescribeth; divers others, I cannot tell of what spirit, would have the loaf bread, &c. . . . They that like not the Injunctions force much the Statute in the Book. I tell them that they do evil to make odious comparisons betwixt Statute and Injunction; and yet I say and hold that the Injunction hath authority by proviso of the Statute. And whereas it is said in the note, that to 'take away the superstition which any person hath or might have in the bread and wine, it shall suffice that the bread be such as is usually to be eaten at the table with other meats, &c.;" 'it shall suffice' I expound, where either there wanteth such fine usual bread, or superstition be feared in the wafer-bread, they may have the Communion in fine usual bread, which is rather a toleration in these two necessities, than is in plain ordering, as is in the Injunction." R. P.

Note D.—Sir F. Kelly had, in the meantime, been made Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer.

of any of the Services is unlawful. There is no direction that the officiating Minister should do such a thing; and he may not authorize others to do it.

4. I have some doubt on the lawfulness of "adding a little pure and clean water" to the wine. It seems to have been the practice of the Church from the earliest times; is not contrary to the Rite as commemorative; and I strongly incline to the opinion that such addition is not illegal.

5. I am of opinion that the use of bread in the form of Wafers is illegal. The words in the 20th Canon, 1604, "fine white bread," and the words and form of the Rubrics and Service of the Holy Communion, shut out altogether, as it seems to me, the substitution of Wafers for bread ordinarily eaten.

6. Strictly speaking, I apprehend no Hymn or Anthem may lawfully be used in the course of any of the Services, except at the end of the 3rd Collect for Morning and Evening Prayer. But it has been so usual to introduce Hymns, Introits, or Anthems at the beginning of the Communion Service, and before the Sermon, that I do not think any Court would punish a Clergyman who followed the custom. But the question is not confined to the lawfulness of the practice at the beginning of the Service, but includes other portions of that Service. I am clearly of opinion that no Hymn or Anthem can legally be introduced either after reading one or more of the Offertory sentences, or during the pause for the Priest to have "ordered the bread and wine," or after the Prayer of Consecration during the Communion of the Clergy and People.

At the end of the Service, when all is over, I see no illegality in the use of a Hymn or Anthem.

J. PARKER DEANE.

Temple, August 7th, 1866.

On the 1st, 2nd, 5th, and 6th questions I agree with the Queen's Advocate and Mr. Hannen. On the 3rd question I am of opinion that sufficient evidence as to the use of Incense under the Prayer Book of 1549 is not adduced in the Case to prevent my agreeing with the Queen's Advocate and Mr. Hannen that the burning of Incense in Censers for the purpose of censuring persons and things is not lawful.

On the 4th question I am of opinion that the "adding a little pure and clean water" to wine before the Chalice is put upon the Communion Table is perfectly legal.

JOHN CUTLER.

August 20th, 1866.

I am of opinion that the "adding a little pure and clean water" to the wine before the chalice is put upon the Communion Table is not illegal.

Upon all the other questions submitted to me I agree with the Queen's Advocate and Mr. Hannen.

C. G. PRIDEAUX.

Sept. 7th, 1866.

I am of opinion that the use of the vestments is clearly legal.

I have read the Case printed as a Case submitted on the part of the "several Archbishops and Bishops" to Counsel, and the Opinion of Counsel thereon, and, with the most unfeigned respect for the Counsel whose names appear as subscribing the Opinion, I am really unable to bring my mind to entertain a doubt upon the subject.

I could easily understand the Case and the reasons of the Opinion if the question were the converse of that which is the actual question to be determined, viz., if the question were whether any proceedings could be successfully taken against Clergymen not using the Ornaments which "were in this Church of England by the Authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI."

But the disuse, which may be suggested as an excuse in a penal proceeding for not strictly following a prescribed rule because it has become obsolete, does not seem to me to afford the slightest ground for imputing illegality to those who obey the very letter of the rule, and decline to avail themselves of such excuse.

To say, as appears to me to have been said, that the words "shall be retained and be in use" did, in the Rubric at the time when the Rubric was made, mean "There is only to be a retainer of things which, being then prescribed, have since been and continue to be in use at this day, and that the use of things then prescribed and now fallen into disuse is forbidden"— seems to me to be a most unnatural interpretation, and the most violent implication.

If they did not at the time mean so, of course no subsequent desuetude can make obedience to the prescribed rule now illegal. But if at the time they meant so, it certainly is a most singular form of expression, not used by ignorant men, not used by a parliamentum indoctum, but used by learned theologians—men acquainted with and fully alive to all the controversies which had in the interval disturbed the country and a large part of Christendom, on this very subject.

I am satisfied that the Privy Council did not take any such view, and that the effect and plain language of their decision in Westerton's case was, that everything as to the Ornaments of the Church and of the Ministers which was lawful in the second year of Edward the Sixth, has continued to be and is lawful to this day. On the opposite construction, I am unable to conceive why there should have been any reference to that year of Edward the Sixth at all.

With regard to the question of the Lights, it appears to me to be determined by exactly the same principles, subject to this question of fact,—“Are the two Lighted Candles properly included within the category of “Ornaments of the Church?”

Being of opinion that they are strictly ornaments, I am satisfied that they are legal.

In so advising I proceed on this ground—that the foundation of Dr. Lushington's judgment or dictum against them (which would otherwise be conclusive with me) is in effect removed by the decision of the Privy Council; viz., that the Court cannot look into any supposed Theological tendency of the Ornament, whether more or less Protestant or more or less Roman, but simply to the prescriptions of the authorized Ritual. By that authorized Ritual, not revoked by any revocation now in force, Two Lighted Candles were to be placed, or were allowed to be placed, on the Altar. Whether it is to be called an Altar or a Communion Table seems to me to be immaterial on this part of the case. The same thing is meant. The words shew that the Two Candles were not placed there for anything connected with the distinction between an Altar of Sacrifice and a Communion Table—for anything at issue between Roman Catholicism and Protestantism; for they were so placed to remind the worshippers that our Lord was “the Light of the World.”

With regard to the question of the Bread, I am of opinion that there is no illegality in the use of anything which in ordinary language may be called Bread, whether it be loaf or cake, leavened or unleavened, so that it be the best and purest wheaten bread, and so that it be bread that may be broken before the people. I cannot satisfy myself that a Wafer is in this sense of the word bread; nor that it is lawful to mix Water with the Wine. I think it is not lawful to vary the prescribed form at all. Adding to it varying, and I do not find any evidence that at the time when the present Prayer Book was compiled the word wine was understood to mean wine mixed with water.

I find myself unable to arrive at the conclusion that it is now lawful to use Incense during any part of the Service, or to use Introits or Hymns during the celebration of the Sacrament of the Holy Communion. But for the established practice, I should have been much inclined to think that the use of Hymns during any part of the Service is illegal. A hymn is in truth a prayer, or praise, or thanksgiving in rhythmical words; and it is difficult to prescribe limits to what may be introduced into the Service under the form or pretence of a hymn.

But although the Communion Service is technically one Service, it is practically and substantially composed of three distinct parts—the ordinary Communion Service of Sundays and Holy Days, the Sermon, and the Service proper and peculiar to the actual administration of the Sacrament: and, as the established usage has sanctioned the use of a hymn before the first and between the first and second, I am unable to see why it should be illegal to use a hymn or introit before or after the third part of the same Service.

Lincoln's Inn, Nov. 10th, 1866.

1. We are of opinion that the Vestments prescribed in the First Prayer Book of Edward VI. for the use of the Minister and those who assist him in celebrating the Holy Communion may now be lawfully used.

2. We are of opinion that the use of Two Lighted Candles upon the Altar, not for the purpose of giving light, but “for the signification that Christ is the very “true Light of the World,” is not now lawful.

3, 4, and 6. We are also of opinion that the burning of Incense, the adding of Water to the Wine administered in Holy Communion, and the singing of Hymns, Introits, and Anthems in the manner suggested in the questions respectively, are none of them now lawful.

5. We are not able to express a decided opinion as to the use of Wafer-Bread in Holy Communion, but we are disposed to think that it would be held by a Court to be not lawful.

No. II.

The following OPINION as to the VESTMENTS and ALTAR LIGHTS was given by the present Lord Chancellor (Lord Chelmsford) and Dr. Deane, on May 23rd 1857, subsequently to the Judgment of the Privy Council in Liddell v. Westerton. It should be remembered, in reading it, that the letters of Bucer, Somerset, and Hooper (quoted in this Case, supra pp. 44-47), together with some other arguments now produced, were not brought to the notice of Counsel at that time; else it is probable they would have had less difficulty in expressing their Opinion in favour of the lawfulness of the Two Lights on the Altar.

OPINION.

“Upon the question of Dress we are of opinion that the present Prayer Book, taken in conjunction with the First Prayer Book of Edward VI., sanctions the use of the vestments worn by Mr. Lowder in the ministrations of the Holy Communion; and that he may, in executing the holy ministry, lawfully put on a white alb plain, with a vestment, and that such dress is ‘according to the form prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer made and published by authority of Parliament.’

“But this dress has been so long allowed to go out of use, that we cannot advise Mr. Lowder that the wearing such dress is now ‘legally obligatory,’ in the sense that a Priest of the Church of England not wearing such dress is liable to punishment or censure as for an offence.

“With respect to the use of Lights, there is very great difficulty in forming a satisfactory opinion. There is no doubt that in 1547 two lights before the Sacrament were to remain. (1 Card. Doc. An. p. 51.) The First Prayer Book, which is the only one which need now be considered, and the 2nd and 3rd Edward VI. c. 1, are entirely silent as to these two or any lights. But the retaining of the two lights by authority so recent as the Injunctions of 1547, the use of the word ‘Mass,’ the whole tenor both of the Prayer Book and statute, and the silence of both on the subject, which was not without importance, would strongly induce the belief that the two lights were not to be removed.

“On the other hand, considerable weight might be and has been given to the Rubric of 1549, specifying what the minister shall do, and what vessels or ornaments are to be in use at the Holy Communion. And the argument expressio unius exclusio alterius has been strongly relied upon. However, in answer to this it may be observed that rituals in force when lights were certainly in use do not mention the lights.

“But a further argument against the two lights is drawn from the Articles in 1559 (1 Cardw. Doc. An. 75) and the Visitation Injunctions, 1550 (1 Cardw. Doc. An. 93), in both of which the setting any light on the Lord’s Board at any time is forbidden. And these are said to afford evidence of the contemporary practice in matters of rites and ceremonies, and to prove that candles upon the Lord's table are not among the ornaments which were in this Church of England by authority of Parliament in the second year of King Edward VI.

"We are inclined to the opinion that this argument fails on two grounds. First, taking the whole context of the Second Article (1 Cardw. Doc. An. 75), and the Injunctions (Ib. p. 93), the prohibition is directed to practices counterfeiting the Popish Mass, in the celebration of which numerous lights are at different times set upon the Altar, and moved and removed in the course of the Service. The setting of lights is given as an instance, among many others, in which the Popish Mass was counterfeited, and the passages must be very much strained to be brought to bear against the two standing lights sanctioned so recently. Secondly, the argument proves too much, for if it be good for anything, it goes to the extent of forbidding any lights at any time. So that even on the darkest day and in the darkest church no light of any kind could at any time be placed on the Communion table. Dr. Lushington, in his judgment in the St. Paul and St. Barnabas case, felt the pressure of this objection, which he could only relieve by saying that an exception must be grafted upon the positive prohibition; yet the text of the Articles and Injunctions admits of no such exception.

"On the whole we are therefore of opinion that two lights on the Communion table are not forbidden by law, and that Mr. Lowder may continue the use of such lights; but in this matter, as well as in that of dress, usage to the contrary has so long prevailed that we do not consider that he is liable to punishment or censure for celebrating the Holy Communion without lights.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF LOWER HOUSE OF CONVOCATION OF THE PROVINCE OF CANTERBURY ON RITUAL. PRESENTED JUNE 26, 1866.

ON February 9, 1866, the Lower House communicated to the Upper House, by the Prolocutor, the Resolutions following:—

"That this House, recognising the evils which may arise from an excess of Ritualism, deprecates nevertheless any attempt to avert those possible evils by the introduction of changes into the Book of Common Prayer.

"In coming to this Resolution, the House by no means intends to express approval of deviations of any kind from Church Order.

"That this Resolution be communicated to their Lordships of the Upper House, with an humble request that they would take the subject into their consideration, and adopt such measures as they shall see fit, in conjunction with this House, for clearing the doubts and allaying the anxieties that exist upon it."

The same evening the Prolocutor received and communicated to the Lower House the following answer of the Upper House:—

"That this House desires to concur with the Lower House in the address presented by it; and that, with a view to granting its request, the Lower House be directed to inquire by a Committee as to such measures as may seem to them fit for clearing the doubts and allaying the anxieties to which the address alludes, and to communicate to this House such Report, and also the judgment of the Lower House upon it."

The Committee named in obedience to the above direction report as follows:—

In order to perform in a satisfactory manner the task imposed upon them, the Committee have deemed it necessary, in the first place, to direct their attention to the present condition of Ritual practice in the Church of England.

Ritual practice in the Church of England may be conveniently arranged under three heads:—

First, there are practices which have in past times been matter of controversy, even to the extent of becoming sources of nonconformity, but which now are universally accepted within the Church, and which nonconformists themselves would scarcely allege as grounds for separation. To this class belong the use of the surplice, the sign of the Cross in Baptism, the ring in marriage, and kneeling at the Holy Communion.

Secondly, there are practices about which members of the Church are generally agreed, differing only as to the extent to which it may be prudent and for edification that such practices should be developed. The chief example of this class is the use of music in the service of the Church. The Prayer Book is evidently composed upon the supposition that a large portion of it should be used musically; and all agree that a certain amount of music is helpful to devotion, and in every way commendable: but between the introduction of a very slight musical element and the full Choral Service there are many degrees. As to the amount which should be introduced in any particular case, it is manifest that the circumstances of the congregation for whom the service is intended must be taken into consideration; and, after all, judgments will probably differ. To this same class belong the use of surplices for choristers, and the decoration of the church on festival occasions.

But, thirdly, there are practices, not falling under either of the preceding heads, the adoption of which, in any degree, is at the present time a source of anxiety and alarm to many members of the Church of England.

To these last practices the Committee, having regard to the terms of their appointment, limit their Report.

The Committee think it well to lay down at the outset the general principle, that the most important thing to be done is to ascertain whether any given practice is, or is not, agreeable to the mind of the Church of England. It is not sufficient that a practice be of great antiquity, or of very general prevalence in other parts of Christendom. These are circumstances of great importance; and, if the Church of England has retained the practice in question, are doubtless among the reasons why she retained it. But, after all, the question is, whether the Church of England has really retained, or by just implication recognised, the practice; and if this point be made clear, then any alarm which may have arisen from the adoption of a practice, when it was regarded as the act of individuals, will probably soon subside when such practice is admitted to be agreeable to the mind of the Church. For example, some years ago the introduction of Credence Tables, in churches where they did not previously exist, was looked upon with marked suspicion; but that suspicion vanished when it had been declared by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council,* that the Credence was a proper adjunct to the Lord's Table, as being almost essential to compliance with the directions of the Rubric.

Next in order to the assertion of the general principle, that regard be had to the mind of the Church of England, the Committee would observe that the evidence of that mind is not of one, but of many periods and of many kinds. It consists, partly of the recognition of general principles of the Church Catholic, and of their retention, as such, by our Branch of it at the time of the Reformation; partly of particular precedents of our own; partly of Statute Law; partly of Canon; partly of definite direction from time to time by lawful authority; partly of prescriptive use.

The Committee would observe further that it is precisely from the fact that there exist divers sources of authority, that the Church has derived the power, so necessary to her free development and active usefulness, of permitting differences of practice according to the different circumstances and requirements of different times, places, and congregations. That this is so, the Committee consider to be a part of the happiness of the Church of England. They would, therefore, earnestly deprecate all attempts to limit this power. They do not desire to see attempts to establish a uniformity of Ritual practice incompatible with the permissive power above referred to; attempts tending to disunion rather than to peace, and creating a sense of grievance, rather than a feeling that all are dealt with by authority in the same spirit of tenderness and consideration, forbearance and equal justice. Any attempt to establish the universal rule of a high ceremonial would be dangerous to the peace and well-being of the Church. Equal danger would be incurred by any attempt to debar those who value a high ceremonial from the free use of it within the limits of the law; especially if others were left to follow their own private interpretation of the rule of Church order.

* Withdrawn from the Committee.

* Liddell v. Westerton.

The Committee proceed to inquire how the adoption and permission of differences of Ritual practice within the limits of the law ought to be regulated.

The proper solution of this question, may, they think, be found mainly in the application of two principles.

1st, resort to the fatherly counsel of the Bishop, and dutiful acquiescence in the judgment of the lawful authority, which is responsible for the regulation of the diocese, and which is charged with seeing that the order of Divine Service prescribed by law be neither on the one hand neglected or curtailed, nor on the other hand exaggerated or exceeded, so as to cause needless offence to CHRIST's people.

2ndly, discreet and charitable consideration of the circumstances of different places and congregations.

With regard to the first of these two principles, the Committee would draw attention to the following direction, declaring the mind of the Church as to the regulation of Ritual:

"And forasmuch as nothing can be so plainly set forth, but doubts may arise in the use and practice of the same; to appease all such diversity (if any arise), and for the resolution of all doubts concerning the manner how to understand, do, and execute the things contained in this Book, the parties that so doubt, or diversely take anything shall alway resort to the Bishop of the Diocese, who by his discretion shall take order for the quieting and appeasing of the same; so that the same order be not contrary to anything contained in this Book. And if the Bishop of the Diocese be in doubt, then he may send for the resolution thereof to the Archbishop."*

Upon this rule the Committee observe, that two distinct cases appear to be contemplated in it; (1) the case of doubt arising in the mind of an individual as to how to understand, do, and execute the things contained in the Book of Common Prayer; and (2) the case of diversity of opinion between two parties. In either case resort is to be had to the Bishop of the Diocese for the quieting and appeasing such doubt or diversity.

With regard to the second of the two principles above enunciated, the Committee are of opinion, that, within the limits prescribed by law, great consideration is due to the wishes of the congregation, and, in the case of new churches, to the intention of founders, as to the manner in which Divine Service shall be performed; but that every congregation, being in itself a member of the general congregation of CHRIST's flock, is bound to consider, not only what may be most edifying to itself, but what may be most conducive to the peace and influence of the whole National Church.

The Committee further suggest that some distinction may be properly allowed between country parishes in which there is only one church accessible to the inhabitants, and large cities in which there are many. The Committee think that in large cities a considerable variety of Ritual may be wisely permitted (provided only there be no violation of law), believing that, whilst to some a high Ritual is distracting rather than edifying, there are others to whose devotion it is an aid and incitement.

Having laid down the above principles, and made some remarks upon their application, the Committee now proceed to consider certain Ritual matters which fall under the third of the heads enumerated in the second page of this Report, observing that in so doing they have no intention of attempting any authoritative declaration of the law of the Church of England. The Committee have confined themselves to the following as being amongst the most important:—

A. Vestments.

The Committee remark, in the first place, that it had been the custom of the Church, from very early times down to the period of the Reformation, to mark the superior dignity of the Holy Eucharist by the use of special vestments; and that under the First Book of King Edward VI., those which had been used in this country for many ages before were retained. The Rubric of the Second Book of King Edward VI., however, prescribed the use of the surplice only. The subsequent Book of Queen Elizabeth recalled the usage which prevailed under the First Book, until other order should be taken. By the Advertisements of Queen Elizabeth (A.D. 1565), the use of the cope in cathedrals and collegiate churches, and of the surplice in parish churches, was prescribed.

The Rubric prefixed to the present Book of Common Prayer* provides, as is well known, that "such ornaments of the Church, and of the ministers thereof at all times of their ministrations, shall be retained, and be in use, as were in this Church of England, by the authority of Parliament, in the second year of the reign of King Edward the Sixth."

With regard to this Rubric, the Committee would, in the first place, refer to the opinion expressed concerning its meaning by the Judicial Committee of Privy Council in the case of Liddell v. Westerton. Speaking of the present Rubric, and those similar to it, and occupying the same places in the Prayer Books of Queen Elizabeth and King James, their Lordships say:—"The Rubric to the present Prayer Book adopts the language of the Statute of Elizabeth; but they all obviously mean the same thing, that the same dresses and the same utensils or articles which were used under the First Prayer Book of Edward the Sixth may still be used."

This interpretation of the Rubric would appear to recognise and legalise that dress for the administration of the Holy Communion which is described in the Rubric preceding the Communion Office, in the First Book of King Edward VI.;† though it is right to observe that the question of vestments was not before the Court, and that therefore the dictum of the Committee of Privy Council is not to be taken as a settlement of the question, and as excluding all doubts as to the actual state of the law.

With regard to usage, the Committee remark, that during the reigns of Queen Elizabeth, King James I., and King Charles I., one at least of the vestures specially appointed for the Communion Office, namely, the cope, was frequently used, and that under authority, in Cathedral Churches and Royal Chapels; and that there is evidence of the use of the same vesture during the same period in some College Chapels, Chapels in Episcopal Palaces, and even in some Parish Churches. The same usage continued in more than one Cathedral after the Restoration, and in the Cathedral Church of Durham down to the middle of the last century. But the general clerical vesture during the whole of the period above referred to was undoubtedly the surplice, in accordance, so far as relates to Parish Churches, with the Advertisements of Queen Elizabeth,‡ which, while ordering the use of the cope in Cathedral and Collegiate Churches, enjoined the use of the surplice in all the ministrations

* For convenience of reference, this important Rubric is here printed in the successive forms which it has assumed:—

King Edward's Second Book (1552).

"And here it is to be noted that the Minister at the time of the Communion, and at all other times in his ministrations, shall use neither alb, vestment, nor cope; and, being Archbishop or Bishop, he shall have and wear a rochet; and being a priest or deacon, he shall have and wear a surplice only."

Queen Elizabeth (1559).

"And here it is to be noted that the Minister at the time of the Communion, and at all other times in his ministrations, shall use such ornaments in the Church as were in use, by authority of Parliament, in the second year of the reign of King Edward the Sixth, according to the Act of Parliament set in the beginning of this Book."

King James (1604).

Same as the preceding.

Present Book of Common Prayer (1662).

"And here it is to be noted that such ornaments of the Church, and of the Ministers thereof, at all times of their ministrations, shall be retained, and be in use, as were in this Church of England, by the authority of Parliament, in the second year of the reign of King Edward the Sixth."

† The Rubric is as follows (1549):—"The priest that shall execute the holy ministry shall put upon him the vesture appointed for that ministrations, that is to say, a white albe plain, with a vestment or cope. And where there be many priests or deacons, there so many shall be ready to help the priest in the ministrations as shall be requisite; and shall have upon them likewise the vestures appointed for their ministry, that is to say, albes, with tunicles."

‡ The following are the Advertisements to which reference is made:—"Item. In ministrations of the Holy Communion in the Cathedral and Collegiate Churches, the principal minister shall use a cope, with gossypier and epistoler agreeably; and at all other prayers to be sayde at the Communion table, to use no copes but surplices."

"Item. That every minister sayinge any publique prayers, or ministrating of the Sacramentes or other rites of the Church, shall wear a comely surplice with sleeves, to be provided at the charges of the parishes; and that the parishes provide a decent table standinge on a frame for the Communion table."

APPENDICES.

of the Parish Churches; and this was subsequently embodied in the Canons of 1603.*

Supposing the interpretation of the Rubric suggested by the Judicial Committee of Privy Council to be the true one, the Committee think it essential to observe that there is no appearance of any endeavour on the part of the Ecclesiastical authorities, through whose influence the Rubric assumed its present form at the last revision of the Book of Common Prayer, to insist upon its being brought into active operation; while there is abundant evidence to show that the Prelates of the period immediately succeeding the last revision recognized the surplice as the sufficient clerical vesture, whether in the celebration of the Eucharist or at other times; and this recognition appears to be fortified by the proceedings of some of the leading lawyers of the time, as evidenced in the Bills of Comprehension prepared by them in the year 1667.

On the whole, the Committee are of opinion that the use of the vestments in Parish Churches cannot be regarded as binding upon the consciences of the clergy; and that the use of the surplice by the Parochial Clergy, at all times of their ministrations, is a sufficient compliance with the rule of the Church of England.

B. Altar-lights.

The Committee observe, concerning lights, First, that from very early times they have been recognized by Christians as significant of many holy things; as, for example, of religious joy; and pre-eminently as symbolical of The Divine Nature, and of CHRIST our LORD, The Light of the world.

Secondly, that time out of mind in the East and subsequently to the time of St. Jerome in the West also, lights have been symbolically used both by day and night on various occasions of Divine Service, as at baptisms, burials, the reading of the Gospel, and the Celebration of the Holy Communion.

With regard to the precedents to the Church of England since the Reformation, the Committee remark that, by the Injunctions of King Edward VI. in 1547, two lights were enjoined to be left upon the High Altar, "for the signification that Christ is the very true Light of the world," when other lights, burnt before images and pictures, were ordered to be removed.

The subsequent history of Altar-lights is involved in much obscurity; but candles and candlesticks have remained to the present day in Cathedrals, Collegiate Churches, Royal Chapels, and in many Parish Churches. In some instances the candles appear to have been lighted during the Celebration of the Holy Communion; but the instances which can be quoted are few, and the evidence not beyond question.

The case of Altar-lights (that is, of candles placed upon the LORD'S Table, and lighted during the Celebration of the Holy Communion, when not required for the purpose of giving necessary light,) stands, as regards recent judicial proceedings, as follows:—In delivering Judgment in the Consistory Court of London, in the cases of Westerton and Beal v. Liddell and others, in the year 1855, Dr. Lushington is reported to have said, "I hold that all lighted candles on the Communion table are, from the premises I have already stated, contrary to law, except when they are lighted for the purpose of giving necessary light; but the exception must be confined to the necessity, and the use of lighted candles on the Communion table limited to that necessity, when it arises from the deficiency of the requisite light from natural causes, and, it may be, the peculiar structure of the edifice." The precise legal weight to be assigned to the language here used by Dr. Lushington in giving his Judgment is matter of debate, the question of Altar-lights, as above defined, being (as the Committee understand) not before the Court. The

*The following are the Canons:—

"Canon 24. Copes to be worn in Cathedral Churches by those that administer the Communion.

"In all Cathedral and Collegiate Churches the Holy Communion shall be administered upon principal feast days, sometimes by the Bishop, if he be present, and sometimes by the Dean, and at sometimes by a Canon or Prebendary; the principal minister using a decent cope, and being assisted with the gospeller and epistler agreeably, according to the Advertisements published anno 7 Eliz."

"Canon 58. Ministers reading Divine Service, and administering the Sacraments, to wear surplices, and graduates therewithal hoods."

"Every minister saying the public prayers, or ministering the Sacraments or other rites of the Church, shall wear a decent and comely surplice, with sleeves, to be provided at the charge of the parish. And if any question arise touching the matter, decency, or comeliness thereof, the same shall be decided by the discretion of the Ordinary. Furthermore, such ministers as are graduates shall wear upon their surplices at such times such hoods as by the orders of the Universities are agreeable to their degrees, which no minister shall wear (being no graduate) under pain of suspension. Notwithstanding, it shall be lawful for such ministers as are not graduates to wear upon their surplices, instead of hoods, some decent tippet of black, so it be not silk."

candles and candlesticks were not ordered to be removed: in this particular no appeal was made against the judgment; and the question of Altar-light was, therefore, not brought before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

The Committee think it right to remark, that, according to some eminent authorities, the Injunctions of King Edward VI. (1547) are included among the Ritual provisions of the second year of his reign, as having the authority of Parliament; and that consequently the present Ritual Rubric actually authorises, not two candles merely, but two lights upon the Holy Table. On the other hand it ought to be added, that this interpretation of the Rubric is apparently opposed to that given by the Judicial Committee of Privy Council in the case of Liddell v. Westerton, in which the Judges said:—"Their Lordships, after much consideration, are satisfied that the construction of this Rubric, which they suggested at the hearing of the case, is its true meaning, and that the word 'ornaments' applies, and in this case Rubric is confined, to those articles, the use of which in the services and ministrations of the Church is prescribed by the Prayer Book of Edward the Sixth."

Upon the whole, the Committee observe that the use of Altar-lights, as above defined, is not without precedent in the Church of England since the Reformation; although it is a use which has not been generally adopted at any period since the Reformation.

C. Incense.

The Committee observe that there is no proof of the use of incense in the Apostolical age. The burning of incense, however, in a standing vessel, for the twofold purpose of sweet fumigation, and of serving as an expressive symbol, has undoubtedly been used from ancient times. The practice of censuring Ministers and ornaments, and of swinging censers, is of much more recent origin.

The Committee next observe that the use of incense is not prescribed by the rubrical law of the Church of England; and that the censuring of Ministers or ornaments has no authority, either in the laws or in the practice of that Church since the Reformation. The burning of incense, however, in a standing vessel has been practised since the Reformation in some Churches and Chapels, Cathedral, Collegiate, Royal, Episcopal, and Parochial. Instances may be found down to the middle of the last century.

Under these circumstances the Committee are of opinion that the censuring of Ministers or ornaments is inadmissible. With regard to the simpler use of incense above described, the Committee think it sufficient to remark that it should not be introduced without the sanction of competent ecclesiastical authority.

D. The Elevation of the Elements after Consecration.

This practice having been expressly forbidden* by the First Book of Edward VI., and discountenanced by the usage of the English Church ever since, is, in the opinion of the Committee, inadmissible.

E. The Encouragement of Noncommunicants to remain during the celebration of the Holy Communion.

The Committee observe that in the ancient Church the presence of non-communicants during the celebration of the Holy Communion was not allowed except in special cases, and as the last stage in the course of a penitential discipline; and that no argument can be drawn from ancient practice in favour of the view which regards such presence in the light of a privilege for Christians in general.

The rubrical directions with regard to the presence or withdrawal of those who do not intend to be partakers of the Holy Communion, are not explicit. In the first Prayer Book of King Edward VI. there is this Rubric, following the Offertory: "Then so many as shall be partakers of the Holy Communion shall tarry still in the quire, or in some convenient place nigh the quire, the men on the one side, and the women on the other side. All other (that mind not to receive the said Holy Communion) shall depart out of the quire, except the Minister and Clerks." But in all the subsequent editions of the Prayer Book there is no corresponding Rubric. Nevertheless the withdrawal of non-communicants has become the recognized practice of the English Church.

The Committee further observe that the practice of *The Rubric following upon the words of Institution (1549) is as follows:—

"These words before rehearsed are to be said, turning still to the Altar, without any elevation or showing of the Sacrament to the people."

proceeding to the celebration of the Holy Communion in the presence of the general congregation, including (as it almost certainly will) a large number of persons who do not intend to communicate, and many of whom are not communicants at all, as it is opposed to the usage of the ancient Church, so likewise has, as the Committee fear, a tendency to produce a diminution rather than an increase of reverence for the Holy Mysteries of the Body and Blood of CHRIST.

The Committee think, therefore, that, while the attendance during Celebration of persons not intending to communicate is not formally and distinctly forbidden, such attendance is contrary to the spirit and usage of the Church of England, and should not therefore be encouraged as an ordinary practice.

F. The use of Wafer Bread.

The question has been brought before the Committee by a Churchwarden, whether it be right "that the bread consecrated for the Holy Communion be not bread such as is usual to be eaten, divided into pieces convenient to be taken either with the fingers or in the palm of the hand, but unleavened bread of the thickness of a wafer."

A Rubric on the subject of the bread was introduced in King Edward's Second Book,* and is nearly identical with that which is found in the present Book of Common Prayer, and which is as follows: "To take away all occasion of dissension and superstition which any hath or might have concerning the bread and wine, it shall suffice that the bread be such as is usual to be eaten; but the best and purest wheat bread that conveniently may be gotten." It may be observed that, in the Scotch Liturgy, a parenthesis was added, "though it be lawful to have wafer bread;" but this parenthesis is not found in any of the English Prayer Books.

The conclusion to which the Committee have come is as follows: that the use of bread, such as is described in the question above stated, if not actually forbidden, is certainly discouraged, and that the use of bread, "such as is usual to be eaten," is most in accordance with the mind of the Church of England.

The Committee decline to enter into the consideration of any other Ritual practices and questions. Several have been brought under their notice, and the Committee have discussed them carefully; but they have determined not to deal with them in their Report—partly, because they do not consider them to be among the number of those things which are causing serious anxiety; and partly, because they are persuaded that in many things Ritual practice can neither be directed nor restrained to any good purpose by external interference, but must rather be committed to the good sense of the officiating minister, endeavouring to perform his holy functions for the edification of the people in the spirit of the Book of Common Prayer.

The Committee would, however, very strongly represent that the English Church has, by the general structure of her Services, and particularly by the article on Ceremonies prefixed to the Book of Common Prayer,† declared herself opposed to a minute and burdensome ceremonial, and that she has indicated by her rubrical directions equal opposition to Services rendered indecent and unintelligible by a rapid and inaudible mode of utterance.

Again, the Committee would direct their remonstrance against the adoption of a phraseology borrowed from foreign Communions, and which is, in some instances, as applied to the ministrations of the Church of England, novel and offensive.

With regard to a resort to judicial proceedings, the Committee earnestly trust that such a course may not be found necessary. If resorted to, it would, in the opinion of the Committee, tend to promote, rather than to allay, dissension. They are further of opinion that, to attempt to establish a rule applicable to all places and congregations alike, their diverse characters and circumstances notwithstanding, (which would be the necessary tendency of judicial proceedings,) is to attempt to establish a uniformity which cannot be obtained except at the price of peace.

* The Rubric in King Edward's First Book is as follows:—
"For avoiding of all matters and occasion of dissension, it is meet that the bread prepared for the Communion be made, through all this realm, after one sort and fashion; that is to say, unleavened, and round, as it was afore, but without all manner of print, and something more larger and thicker than it was, so that it may be aptly divided into divers pieces; and every one shall be divided in two pieces at the least, or more, by the discretion of the minister, and so distributed. And men must not think less to be received in part than in the whole, but in each of them the whole body of our Saviour Jesu Christ."

† "Of Ceremonies; why some be abolished, and some retained."

At the same time the Committee would remark, that both excesses and defects in Ritual Observance are symptoms of a deep-seated evil, namely, the want of a more effective working of the Diocesan system; such as would afford better and more frequent opportunities for consultation between the Bishop and the Clergy and People of his Diocese.

In bringing their Report to a conclusion, the Committee would represent that the subject of Ritualism cannot be sufficiently considered without a reference to the position of the Church of England in relation, on the one hand, to the Greek and Latin Branches of the Church Catholic, and to other foreign bodies of Christians who have retained many features of ancient Ritual; and, on the other hand, to the Nonconformist bodies of our own country. They desire, therefore, to observe that, great as is the value of those ancient Ritual usages which the Church of England has inherited from undivided Christendom, and the retention of which may hereafter be found to conduce materially to the restoration of Unity, it must, nevertheless, be carefully borne in mind that the National Church of England has a holy work to perform towards the Nonconformists of this country; and that every instance, not only of exceeding the law, but of a want of prudence and tenderness in respect of usages within the law, can hardly fail to create fresh difficulties in the way of winning back to our Church those who have become estranged from her Communion.

The Committee deem it right further to declare that, in their opinion, the adoption of the usages discussed by them has, as a general rule, had its origin in no other motive than a desire to do honour to the most Holy and Undivided TRINITY, and to render the services of the English Church more becoming in themselves, and more attractive to the people. None are more earnest and unwearied in delivering the Truth of CHRIST'S Gospel, none more self-denying in ministering to the wants and distresses of the poor, than very many of those who have put in use these observances. In the larger number of the practices which have been brought under the notice of the Committee—they do not say in all of them—they can trace no proper connection with the distinctive teaching of the Church of Rome. They are, further, of opinion that some advance in Ritual is the natural sequel to the restoration and adornment of Churches which has so remarkably prevailed during the last twenty-five years, and which is itself closely connected with the revival and growth of religious life during the present century; and, although by the terms of their appointment the inquiries of the Committee have been confined to the subject of excess in matters of Ritual, yet they must remark that there are errors of defect widely prevailing amongst us (such as neglect of plain rules of the Prayer Book and curtailment of its offices) which are no less repugnant to the spirit and order of the Church of England than the addition of unsanctioned ceremonial. Excess of Ritualism is, in fact, the natural reaction from unseemly neglect of solemn order.

‡ The Committee respectfully commend their Report to the consideration of the House; with earnest prayer to ALMIGHTY GOD that it may assist towards clearing doubts and allaying anxieties.

Resolution of Lower House of Convocation of the Province of Canterbury, dated June 28th, 1866.

"That this House adopts the Report presented by the Committee on Ritual appointed at the session of February 9th, as being a temperate statement on the subject of Ritual practice in the Church of England, and as calculated to assist in clearing doubts and allaying anxieties, and requests the Prolocutor to communicate the same to the Upper House with this their Judgment upon it."

Judgment referred to.

"That with regard to the six points of Ritual which have been specially discussed in the Report, the Judgment of the House is as follows:—

"1. The use in parish churches of the surplice is a sufficient compliance with the directions of the Church.

"2 That, without pronouncing on the legality of vestments prescribed in the First Book of King Edward the Sixth, or of altar-lights, the House considers that they should not be introduced into any parish Church without reference to the Bishop; and that a similar reference should be made with regard to the introduction of incense in the simpler manner described in the Report.

“3. That the House expresses its entire disapproval of the practice of censuring persons and things, and of all elevation of the elements after consecration; and considers that the presence of non-communicants, excepting in special cases, during the celebration of the Holy Communion and the use of wafer-bread are to be discouraged.”

III.

Resolution of Upper House of Convocation, dated June 29th, 1866, on presentation of the Report and Judgment of the Lower House.

“That the Report communicated to this House by the Lower House, of their Committee on Ritual Observances, with the Judgment of the Lower House thereon, be received; and that the thanks of this House are given for the care and attention bestowed on the said Report and Judgment, and that they shall receive from his Grace the President of this House the most careful consideration.”

IV.

Resolutions of Upper House of Convocation, dated February 13th and 14th 1867.

1. “Resolved,—That having taken into consideration the Report made to this House by the Lower House concerning certain Ritual observances, we have concluded that, having regard to the dangers (1) of favouring errors deliberately rejected by the Church of England, and fostering a tendency to desert her communion; (2) of offending even in things indifferent devout worshippers in our Churches, who have been long used to other modes of service, and thus of estranging many of the faithful laity; (3) of unnecessarily departing from uniformity; (4) of increasing the difficulties which prevent the return of separatists to our communion;—we convey to the Lower House our unanimous decision that, having respect to the considerations here recorded, and to the Rubric concerning the service of the Church in our Book of Common Prayer, to wit,— “Forasmuch as nothing can be so plainly set forth but doubts may arise in the use and practice of the same, to appease all such diversity (if any arise), and for the resolution of all doubts concerning the manner how to understand, do, and execute the things contained in this book, the parties that so doubt or diversely take anything shall always resort to the Bishop of the Diocese, who, by his discretion, shall take order for the quieting and appeasing of the same, so that the same order be not contrary to anything contained in this book: and if the Bishop of the Diocese be in doubt, then he may send for the resolution thereof to the Archbishop:”—

“Our judgment is, that no alterations from long-sanctioned and usual Ritual ought to be made in our Churches until the sanction of the Bishop of the Diocese has been obtained thereto.”

2. “That the Resolution concerning Ritualism at which this House arrived on the 13th inst. be communicated to the Lower House, and that their concurrence therein be invited.”

V.

Resolution of Lower House of Convocation, dated February 15th, 1867.

“That this House, having respect to the Ritual observances treated of in the Report presented to this House on the 26th of June 1866, do concur in the judgment of the Upper House, viz.—That no alterations from long-sanctioned and usual Ritual ought to be made in our Churches until the sanction of the Bishop of the Diocese has been obtained thereto.”

RESOLUTION OF THE CONVOCATION OF THE PROVINCE OF YORK, 20TH MARCH 1867.

“In Full Synod,

“RESOLVED, That whereas certain vestments and Ritual Observances have recently been introduced into the services of the Church of England; this House desires to place on record its deliberate opinion that these innovations are to be deprecated, as tending to favour errors rejected by that Church, and as being repugnant to the feelings of a large number both of the laity and Clergy.

“And this House is further of opinion that it is desirable that the Minister in public prayer and the administration of the sacraments and other rites of the Church should continue to use the surplice, academical hood or tippet for non-graduates, and the scarf or stole these having received the sanction of long-continued usage.”

SECOND REPORT.

TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

1. Since we made our First Report to Your Majesty in relation to the Vestments worn by the ministers of the United Church of England and Ireland at the time of their ministrations, we have proceeded to consider the other part of the subject pointed out in Your Majesty's Commission as the most pressing.

2. The use of Lighted Candles in celebrating the Holy Communion, when they are not needed for the purpose of giving light, and the use of Incense in the public services of the Church, are the matters connected with this part of the subject to which our attention has been mainly directed.

3. We have taken evidence and have availed ourselves of the information furnished by the arguments in the recent suits before the Court of Arches of Martin v. Mackonochie and Flamank v. Simpson, both in respect of Lights used at the celebration of the Holy Communion, and also in respect of the use of Incense as part of the public services of the Church.

4. The use of Lighted Candles at the celebration of the Holy Communion has been introduced into certain Churches within a period of about the last twenty-five years. It is true that there have been Candlesticks with Candles on the Lord's Table during a long period in many Cathedral and Collegiate Churches and Chapels, and also in the Chapels of some Colleges, and of some Royal and Episcopal Residences, but the instances that have been adduced to prove that Candles have been lighted, as accessories to the Holy Communion, are few and much contested.

5. With regard to Parish Churches, whatever evidence there may be as to Candlesticks with Candles being on the Lord's Table, no sufficient evidence has been adduced before us to prove that at any time during the last three centuries Lighted Candles have been used in any of these Churches as accessories to the celebration of the Holy Communion until within about the last twenty-five years.

6. The use of Incense in the public services of the Church during the present century is very recent, and the instances of its introduction are very rare; and so far as we have any evidence before us, it is at variance with the Church's usage for 300 years.

7. Under these circumstances, and in conformity with the principles which guided us in our First Report, we are of opinion that it is expedient to restrain in the public services of the Church all variations from established usage in respect of Lighted Candles and of Incense.

8. With regard, then, to Lights and Incense, as well as Vestments, we think that a speedy and inexpensive remedy should be provided for parishioners aggrieved by their introduction; and the remedy which we recommend is the following: — First, that whenever it shall be found necessary that order be taken concerning the same, the usage of the Church of England and Ireland as above stated to have prevailed for the last 300 years shall be deemed to be the rule of the Church, in respect of Vestments, Lights, and Incense; and, secondly, that parishioners may make formal application to the Bishop in camera, and the Bishop on such application shall be bound to enquire into the matter of the complaint, and if it shall thereby appear that there has been a variation from established usage, by the introduction of Vestments, Lights, or Incense in the public services of the Church, he shall take order forthwith for the discontinuance of such variation, and be enabled to enforce the same summarily. We also think that the determination of the Bishop on such application should be subject to appeal to the Archbishop of the Province in camera, whose decision thereon shall be final: Provided always, that if it should appear to either party that the decision of the Bishop or Archbishop is open to question on any legal ground, a case may be stated by the party dissatisfied, to be certified by the Bishop or Archbishop as correct, and then submitted by the said party for the decision of the Court of the Archbishop without pleading or evidence, with a right of appeal to Your Majesty in Council, and with power for the Court, if the statement of the case should appear to be in any way defective, to refer back such case to the Bishop or Archbishop for amendment.

9. Precautions should be taken against frivolous applications being brought before the Bishop; and with this view, we further recommend that the application should be made either by one or more of the Church or Chapel Wardens, or by at least five resident parishioners, who shall be householders and declare themselves to be members of the United Church, in places where the population exceeds 1,000, and by at least three such persons where the population is less than that number.

10. Our intention, in making this recommendation, is simply to provide, for parishioners aggrieved by the introduction of variations from established usage in respect of Vestments, Lights, and Incense, a special facility for restraining such variations, without interfering in other respects with the general law of the Church as to Ornaments, or the ordinary remedies now in force.

11. In submitting these recommendations to Your Majesty, we desire to state that we are anxious in no degree to abridge or curtail any of the rightful liberties heretofore enjoyed by the Clergy and Laity of the United Church. The National Church may well include men of varying shades of opinion, so long as they can combine in a conscientious acceptance of her recognized formularies and appointed rites. But this large comprehension seems to us to render it most desirable that in the celebration of the Church's rites there shall be introduced no novel practices, which are welcome only to some, but are offensive to others. All members of the Church being expected to join devoutly in one common form and order of service are, as we conceive, entitled to expect that no unaccustomed form be used giving to the service a new tendency and significance by which the devotion of many is impeded.

12. We have made some progress in the Revision of the Rubrics, Orders, and Directions contained in the Book of Common Prayer, and our recommendations on this subject will be presented to Your Majesty in our next Report. A Committee of the Commission has been for some time engaged in preparing materials for the Revision of the Lectionary.

13. In the Appendix to this Report will be found the Evidence taken before us, and the Arguments of Counsel as well as the Judgment of the Official Principal of the Court of Arches in the cases of Martin v. Mackonochie and Flamank v. Simpson.

† In appending our names to this Report, we the undersigned members of Your Majesty's Commission, are compelled to dissent from the recommendations contained in the paragraphs 8 and 9.

We are of opinion that continued usage in ordinary circumstances ought in matters ceremonial to be so far the rule as to protect unwilling parishioners from arbitrary change, even though the change may seem to be within the letter of the law; but we cannot approve of any attempt to stereotype by legislation for perpetual observance any use not actually enjoined. Such legislation even thirty years ago would have prohibited much which is now generally adopted, and all but universally approved. We cannot advise the introduction of a new rule of Ornaments for the Established Church. We think such a rule unnecessary, and we believe that the attempt to introduce it would be dangerous. We deprecate particular enactments on these subjects; and we are of opinion that offence, whether caused by excess or defect in divine service, may be removed by strengthening the hands of the Bishop, with appeal to the Archbishop.

We are convinced that the Ritual of the Church must be regulated by living authority, acting, as such authority always must act, under a strong sense of individual responsibility and under public observation, although the complete avoidance of offence must after all depend upon the prevalence of good sense and good feeling in each parish; even if all the greater circumstances of ceremonial could be distinctly fixed by law, there must still remain questions of gesture and posture which may involve much offence, but which no law can completely regulate.

* We beg leave, in adding our names to the Report, to lay before Your Majesty the following considerations, which we think ought to be embodied in any recommendations on the subject to which the Report refers.

The Church of England has always contained within it two parties, one caring much for outward observance and ceremonial, the other careless about or even hostile to them; and these two historical parties represent two classes of minds which always have and probably always will exist, and proclaim their existence, in a free country. If, therefore, the Church of England is to remain the National Establishment of a free country, room for both must be found in it, as far as is consistent with general uniformity "in such Matters as may be deemed essential." Within such limits a variety and elasticity of outward observance appears to us to be desirable. We will not join in any recommendations which have for their single object the attainment in the services of the Church of a rigid uniformity in matters not essential.

The present Report to Your Majesty is concerned only with two matters,—the use of Incense and of Lighted Candles. We venture to submit that we cannot consider either the retention or the suppression of these two articles amongst the matters to be deemed essential. They have in themselves, and in their origin, no doctrinal significance; and the interpretations put upon them, as well by those who adopt them as by those who object to them, are of the most uncertain and conflicting kinds. We therefore think that they should be restrained only when they give offence to the parishioners; and, so far as the recommendation proposed in the Report is intended to secure this object, we concur in it, and we believe the remedy suggested to be effectual and sufficient. Any further remarks on the mode of securing such other uniformity as may be deemed desirable appear to us best reserved for our next Report.

JOHN DUKE COLERIDGE.

ARTHUR P. STANLEY.

Being unable to concur in the above Report, I beg leave humbly to lay before Your Majesty the reasons for my dissent therefrom.

In the terms of Your Royal Commission, Your Majesty was graciously pleased to direct us to make full and impartial inquiry, so as to secure general uniformity of practice in such matters as may be deemed essential.

These words appear to imply, as is indeed obviously the case, that it is not necessary, even if desirable, that absolute uniformity should prevail.

It must be remembered that all ceremonies, whether performed in an ornate or slovenly manner, must be the expression of doctrine; and that in the Church of England, as in other religious bodies, the two aspects of sacramental belief, briefly described as the objective and subjective, have always existed. Each of these aspects may be true, but, if exhibited so as to exclude the consideration of the other, the just proportions of the truth are obscured. It follows then that neither side should be excluded from view, but that the balance should be evenly held. An illustration is found in the two varying methods of delivery of the Holy Sacrament to communicants, adopted in the Prayer Books of 1549 and 1552 respectively.

By the wisdom of the rulers of the Church in the early days of the reign of Queen Elizabeth these two forms were combined into one harmonious whole; and while an ornate ceremonial, corresponding to high doctrinal views of the Holy Communion, prevailed in Cathedral and Collegiate Churches, and in the Chapels of certain Colleges, and of some Royal and Episcopal Houses, it is true that in most parish churches the standard of ritual conformed to the Prayer Book of 1552, rather than to those forms which, though neglected in practice by the people, were prescribed by the wisdom of Queen Elizabeth and her counsellors.

Disregard of ceremonial in our services continued almost down to the present day; and the alienation of the population, especially among the lower orders, from regular attendance at religious worship, may be fairly attributed to the want of life and heartiness which well ordered services promote.

The Arches Court of the Archbishop of Canterbury has recently declared the ceremonial use of Incense unlawful. It will not be necessary, therefore, to express an opinion upon a practice which, though largely enjoined under the dispensation of the Old Testament, and forming no insignificant feature of the worship of Heaven as set forth in the Revelation of St. John the Divine, has been disused among us for many years.

The use of Lights as accessory to the Holy Communion has been declared lawful by the same high authority; and if the innocent and edifying reason alleged for this usage by the Royal Injunctions of King Edward VI. be borne in mind, together with the fact that the Church as well of the East as of the West, and some Protestant bodies, have invariably followed this custom, the danger of superstition appears so remote, that I cannot recommend restraint in a matter upon which an authoritative judgment has been now pronounced.

A time when wide latitude in matters of high doctrine is tolerated if not encouraged within the Church does not appear suitable for curtailing a ceremonial observance to which no superstitious meaning is attached. The only accusation brought against Lights is that their use prevails in the Church of Rome; but if the custom be in itself harmless, that circumstance affords no more reason for proscribing it than the three Creeds, or the Surplice.

In this matter I cannot persuade myself to bring into the category of things in which uniformity must be deemed essential a practice which has so largely prevailed in Christian communities, and which is judicially declared to be not only innocent in itself, but also not contrary to law.

If then in this respect uniformity is found to be not essential, I humbly conceive that by the terms of Your Majesty's gracious Commission I am precluded from recommending legislation tending to prohibition.

It may be added that many customs now generally accepted have occasioned far greater disturbance than has attended the practices to which exception is now taken; and it has been found that a declaration of the law has greatly tended to allay the dissatisfaction which was felt when the state of the law and the reason of the customs had not been fully considered.

The machinery proposed in the Report to give effect to the grief of parishioners in the cases of Vestments and Lights appears calculated to promote disturbance rather than peace, and to be incapable of adaptation to the varying circumstances of parishes and congregations of a widely different character.

The Commissioners unanimously recommended in their First Report that, to secure the peace of congregations, and to prevent breaches of Christian charity, parishioners aggrieved by the use of unusual vesture on the part of the ministering clergy should have an easy and effectual process of complaint and redress. But assenting to the reasonable proposition of the First Report, that the use of Vestments that have been long disused should be restrained (by which term I do not understand prohibition) where distasteful to parishioners, whether the actual legality of the practice be established or not, I am not prepared to recommend so serious a curtailment of liberty of many devout congregations as would follow if the recommendations of my brother Commissioners were adopted in their integrity.

BEAUCHAMP.

It is with much regret that I find myself unable to concur in this Second Report, agreed to by the majority of the Commissioners, and therefore I humbly beg leave to lay before Your Majesty my reasons for not signing the same.

The 4th, 5th, and 6th Clauses (though containing a correct summary of the conclusions arrived at by most of the Commissioners as to the absence of "sufficient evidence" to prove the use, during the last 300 years, of Lighted Candles on the Lord's Table "as Accessories to the Holy Communion," and also with regard to "the use of Incense in the Public Services of the Church") do not afford a complete view of the subject. It is important, therefore, to observe that insufficient evidence of usage is no adequate proof of non-usage; and, further, that in this case the sources of information known to the Commissioners are too few to warrant any positive statement as to the extent of use or disuse in the long period of three centuries; nor is it probable, from the nature of the case, that any more explicit records should have been kept than those already produced. Moreover it would be quite as difficult to prove usage in respect of other Ornaments and Practices which the Judicial Committee of Your Majesty's Privy Council in 1857 decided to be lawful, viz., Altar or other Crosses employed as internal decorations of Churches, the use of various coloured Altar Cloths in the same Church, a moveable Ledge on the Lord's Table, and the bringing of the Bread and Wine from a Credence Table to the Altar at the time of the Offertory.

The 7th Clause proposes to apply to "Lighted Candles" and "Incense" the same "principles" of restraint "which guided us in our First Report" as to Vestments. But the case of Lighted Candles during the Celebration of the Eucharist is not parallel with the other two practices. The Lawfulness of this use of Lighted Candles has just been decided in the Arches Court of Canterbury, (though, indeed, an Appeal has since been lodged with the Privy Council,) and this Second Report states that "The use of Lighted Candles at the Celebration of the Holy Communion has been introduced into certain Churches within a period of about the last twenty-five years;" whereas one ground for complaint of the Vestments is their very recent introduction: while it is also alleged that they are of doubtful Legality, because they were not specifically in question when the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council declared, in 1857, "that the same Dresses and the same Utensils, or Articles, which were used under the First Prayer Book of Edward the Sixth, may still be used." This latter objection appears to be of small importance, for it was necessary that their Lordships should (as they did) interpret the Rubric on the "Ornaments of the Church, and of the Ministers thereof," in order to adjudicate upon those Ornaments which were actually under their consideration. Incense, at present, stands in a different position from both the Vestments and the Lighted Candles; for the Arches Court has decided it to be unlawful "to bring in Incense at the beginning or during the Celebration, and remove it at the close of the Celebration of the Eucharist." It is requisite also to consider that the Vestments, the Lighted Candles, and the Incense are not by any means equally disliked, though it is no doubt true that by very many persons the whole three are alike the subject of complaint.

The 8th Clause provides the mode of restraint, and is objectionable on the following grounds:—

1. Because it makes the practice of a period of very general indifference and even of opposition to the plainest and most positive Laws of the Church of England and Ireland "the rule of the Church" for the future, "whenever it shall be and necessary that order be taken concerning" the use of "Vestments, Lights, and incense;" whereas no such expedient was resorted to when the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, only eleven years ago, declared the Lawfulness of Ornaments, which, to say the least, had been quite as much opposed as these, and, among other reasons, on the same ground of long continued and general disuse.

2. Because it leaves no discretion whatever to the Bishop, if Parishioners complain to him of "a variation from established usage, by the introduction of Vestments, Lights, or Incense in the Public Services of the Church;" but compels him, without any regard to the circumstances of the case, to "take order forthwith for the discontinuance of such variation;" thus introducing a novel and most arbitrary rule, entirely contradictory of the two important principles, upon which the Order in the Book of Common Prayer, for appeasing diversity and resolving doubts "concerning the Service of the Church," is founded, viz., First, the inherent discretion of the Episcopate; and, Secondly, the recognized subjection of that discretion to every Law which binds alike the Bishop and his Clergy, in many cases the Laity also.

3. Because it might, and probably would, deprive entire Congregations of their liberty, or rather right, to have their Services conducted according to the Laws of the Church of England; notwithstanding that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council said, in 1857, "Although their Lordships are not disposed in any case to restrict within narrower limits than the Law has imposed the discretion which, within those limits, is justly allowed to Congregations, by the rules, both of the Ecclesiastical and the Common Law Courts, the directions of the Rubric must be complied with; . . . ." Cases already exist, and will probably increase, of a Parish containing several Consecrated or Licensed Churches or Chapels, the Ministers of which have no Legally assigned Cure of Souls; these places of Divine Worship are more or less available for all the Inhabitants; and the Services, varying as they do in their simplicity or ornateness, are adapted to different classes of Parishioners, while not disturbing general Parochial Unity. But this Clause, construed as it must be with the next following, would put it in the power of any three or five resident Householder Parishioners, who shall "declare themselves to be Members of the United Church," to prevent the use of Vestments, Lights, and Incense (however lawful) in any such Church or Chapel in their Parish; and this, too, wholly irrespective of the fact of their own habitual attendance at, and preference for, the Services of the Mother Church of the Parish, or of some other Church or Chapel in their own or even in another Parish.

4. Because (while it would rightly protect a minority or a majority of Parishioners from having Vestments, Lights, or Incense introduced, contrary to their wishes, into those Services in their own Churches or Chapels which they wish to or do frequent) it affords no security whatever to any minority or majority who (being loyal and earnest in their desire to have those Services of the Church which they are accustomed to attend conducted in conformity with the Rules of the Prayer Book,) would, for the sake of others, so far forego their own wishes as to be content with the use of such Ornaments in Services held at times and in places which could not interfere with those Services which others have been accustomed or desire to attend.

The object of the 9th Clause is to prevent "frivolous applications being brought before the Bishop;" but it seems inadequate for its purpose, on two grounds:—

1. Because it does not require that the Church or Chapel Warden or Wardens should act only at the authorized instigation of Parishioners: this is an important consideration, in proposing to clothe them with a new power of Official complaint, in addition to their present authority to make Presentments.

2. Because as this Report deals chiefly, though not entirely, with Ornaments which are accessory to the Celebration of the Holy Communion, so it appears to me to be of primary importance that the recognized complainants against such accessories should not merely "declare themselves to be Members of the Church of England," but should also be known to be bonâ fide Members and Communicants of the said Church.

The 10th Clause purports to be explanatory of the three previous Clauses, and declares that their object "is simply to provide . . . a special facility for restraining such variations" as they refer to, "without interfering in other respects with the general Law of the Church as to Ornaments, or the ordinary remedies now in force." This, however, is a proposal much to be deprecated for the following reason:—

Because, on the one hand, it involves the hitherto unapplied and objectionable principle of exceptional and repressive Legislation in reference to the observance of particular points in the Church's Law of Ornaments, which Law nevertheless it is not proposed to repeal; while, on the other hand, it leaves all non-observance of the same Law to the unaided power of existing remedies.

The 11th Clause, while professing great toleration, is likely, if acted upon, to prove seriously detrimental to the best interests of the Church, by being a bar to all real improvement in the conduct of her Services. Hitherto "the rightful liberties" which are here recognized as having been "heretofore enjoyed by the Clergy and Laity of the Church of England," have at various times, and especially during the last thirty years, broken through stereotyped forms of neglect and disobedience, which custom, or ignorance, or prejudice had maintained; and thus most material changes have been effected which are now commonly allowed to be generally beneficial, though at the time when they were first attempted, and even long after, they encountered precisely the same objections which this Clause sustains; sometimes, too, in the form of such unreasoning and violent, not to say Lawless, opposition as it may be hoped will not again be manifested.

But this Clause, though reasonably advocating the inclusion in the "National Church" of "men of varying shades of opinion," (a subject, however, which seems scarcely within the terms of Your Majesty's Commission,) inconsistently opposes those varieties of Ceremonial which are the natural accompaniments of opinions thus allowed to have a free development. The condition of "this large comprehension" of "opinion" is stated to be, "a conscientious acceptance of" the "recognized formularies and appointed rites" of the Church of England. The advocates of a revived Ceremonial themselves claim to act upon this very principle in ordering the Public Services. Therefore the conclusion would appear to be, either that, as Your Majesty's Commission indicates, "general uniformity of practice" must be limited to "such matters as may be deemed essential," or it must be extended to the fullest details of all that is required by the Ecclesiastical Laws. It is obvious that so rigid a compliance is neither possible nor desirable in the existing condition of the Church of England; nor indeed has it ever been maintained since the passing of the First Statute of Uniformity in 1549. To "secure," as our Commission suggests, "essential" Uniformity, it does not appear to me necessary to insist upon that strictness of practice, as opposed to liberty of opinion, which this Clause of the Report seems to urge. Unquestionably it is "most desirable that in the celebration of the Church's Rites there shall be introduced no novel practices, which are welcome only to some, but offensive to others;" yet, while it may be hoped that charity alone will generally prevent changes calculated to lead to such a result, it cannot be concealed that quite as great, perhaps greater, scandal is caused by disregard of positive rules in conducting the Services of the Church; and still more, it must be feared, by notoriously contradictory teaching, which is complained of as being irreconcilable with her "recognized formularies."

For these reasons, and because I fear that the proposals now made, so far from promoting peace, tend towards provoking a strife which may seriously risk a disruption in the Church of England, I humbly think I shall best discharge my duty to Your Majesty by withholding my signature from this Second Report.

THE REV. JOHN FULLER RUSSELL B.C.L., F.S.A., called in and examined.

Rev.
J. F. Russell,
B.C.L., F.S.A.

28 Nov. 1867.

1. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) I believe you are the rector of Greenhithe?—Yes.

2. We wish to make some inquiry with reference to the use of altar lights in the Church of England since the Reformation. Are you tolerably conversant with that subject?—I have given some little attention to it.

3. Can you bring before us any instances which are not before us already, which have come to light lately with reference to this question,—as to the use of altar lights in the Church of England since the Reformation?—There are several examples from the time of Elizabeth, and further on, particularly during the Caroline period, during the rule of Laud and the bishops of his time.

4. Will you enumerate those instances?—I have here the Hierurgia Anglicana, edited by myself, which was published in the year 1848. It was published in numbers, beginning in 1843 and finishing in 1848.* I find that on the 6th March 1560, Dr. Bill, Dean of Westminster, preached in the Queen's (Elizabeth's) chapel, "where on the Table standing altarwise was placed a cross and two candlesticks with two tapers in them burning."

5. (Dr. Payne Smith.) Was that in the Queen's private chapel?—In the Queen's private chapel. In the same year, on the 24th March, "in the afternoon, Bishop Barlow, one of King Edward's bishops, now Bishop of Chichester, preached in his habit before the Queen. His sermon ended at five of the clock; and presently after her chapel went to evening song, the cross, as before, standing on the altar and two candlesticks and two tapers burning in them; and service concluded, a good anthem sung." Strype's Annals, pp. 196, 197. That is at page 4 of the Hierurgia.

6. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) In the first instance you referred to is the hour of the day mentioned?—

* Vide (A.) Mr. Russell's Supplementary Letter in Appendix.

No, there is no notice of that. These are both taken from Strype. The next instance is taken from a letter of Thomas Sampson to Peter Martyr, January 6th, 1560, (Zurich letters, p. 63, 8vo. 1842,) which is in the same page of the Hierurgia. He says, "What can I hope when three of our lately appointed bishops are to officiate at the Table of the Lord, one as priest, another as deacon, and a third as sub-deacon, before the image of the crucifix, or at least not far from it, with candles, and habited in the golden vestments of the Papacy, and are thus to celebrate the Lord's Supper without any sermon."

7. (Dr. Payne Smith.) Does it appear where those bishops were to minister?—In the private chapel of the Queen. The next instance occurs in 1565, in a Roman Catholic work entitled, "The Fortress of the Faith," by Thomas Stapleton, 4to, 1565, page 152 where I find this inquiry: "Why do not Protestants allow the blessed crucifix of our Saviour; why burn they no light before it, as they see the Queen's most gracious Majesty doth?" Then in 1565, at the christening of the child of Lady Cicile, wife of John Earl of Great Friesland, Marquis of Bawden, at the Palace, Westminster, September 30th, taken from Leland's Collectanea, vol. 2, pp. 691, 692, 8vo. 1770, I find among the ornaments of the altar, "two candlesticks of crystal, two ships of mother-of-pearl, one tablet of gold set with diamonds, another ship of mother-of-pearl, two pair of candlesticks of gold, two great candlesticks double gilt, with lights of virgin wax, and a cross."

8. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) What is a ship?—I suppose it is for incense; a boat.

9. (Mr. Walpole.) In what church or chapel was that?—That of the Palace, Westminster, which would of course be the private chapel of the Queen.

10. (Archbishop of Canterbury.) These instances which you have given us are all well known; have you anything to state which has been discovered lately?—All those instances are well known, except

Rev.
J. F. Russell,
B.C.L., F.S.A.

the one I quoted from Stapleton, which, I think, has been lately discovered. I have not seen it elsewhere. I discovered it myself some short time ago. Then Bishop Cosin refers to the lights in the Queen's chapel as having been retained there "during her whole reign, and so are "they in all the King's and in many cathedral "churches, besides the chapels of divers noblemen, "bishops, and colleges to this day." He is writing in 1640, or a little before that, probably 1632, before the Rebellion. That is from Cosin's notes on the Prayer Book at the end of Nicholls Commentary (p. 17, fol. 1712), and it is at page 7 of the Hierurgia. Then we find very little else, that I am aware of, in the way of allusion to lights being used in the reign of Elizabeth; and very little in the time of James the First, except that* for the furniture of the chapel, when the Prince went to Spain, in 1622, tapers were enjoined to be among the ornaments that were to be used in his private chapel. (See Collier's Eccl. Hist. ii., p. 726, fol. 1714.)

11. (Mr. J. Abel Smith.)—At Madrid?—At Madrid. Then we have abundant evidence that candles were used by Bishop Andrewes, as we find in "Canterbury's Doom." We have there a "plan" of his private chapel, and among the plate for the chapel we find two candlesticks gilt for tapers, 60 ounces at 5s. 6d. the ounce. This plan was found among the papers of Archbishop Laud, and is given in Prynne's "Canterbury's Doom", who quotes it against the Archbishop as having been copied in his own chapel,—affirming that his own chapel was furnished on the same plan; the furniture &c., being arranged after the plan that Andrewes had used before. Then it would appear from Spalding's "Troubles in Scotland" that at the coronation of Charles the First at Edinburgh in 1633, there were two wax candles which were "on light" on the altar: See the edition of 1829, published at Aberdeen, at page 16, and quoted in Robertson's "How shall we conform to the Liturgy?" (page 89, first edition). Then we find in "Canterbury's Doom," pp. 62 and 63, an allusion to the candlesticks and tapers standing and likewise burning in the daytime in Archbishop Laud's chapel. The quotation from "Canterbury's Doom" is as follows (page 338 of the Hierurgia), alluding to the furniture in the Archbishop's chapel at Lambeth:—
"Upon this new altar he had much superstitious
"Romish furniture, never used in his predecessor's
"days; as, namely, two great silver candlesticks with
"tapers in them, besides basons and other silver
"vessels (with a costly Common Prayer Book stand-
"ing on the altar, which, as some say, had a crucifix
"on the bosses), with the picture of Christ receiving
"His last supper with His disciples in a piece of
"arras, hanging just behind the midst of the altar,
"and a crucifix in the window directly over it.
"This new altar furniture of his was proved and "attested upon oath by Sir Nathaniel Brent, Dr.
"Featly, Dr. Haywood (his own popish chaplain),
"who justified his lord that he did it in imitation of "the King's chapel at Whitehall, where he had seen
"not only tapers and candlesticks standing, but like-
"wise burning, in the day time on the altar." Here is incidental proof of the candles being lighted in the Royal Chapel at Whitehall, in Charles's time. It appears that the lights gave great offence to the Puritans at that time, and they specifically allude to several cases in which lights were used. In a copy of verses entitled "Lambeth Fair, wherein you have all the "bishop's trinkets sent to sale," which was published in 4to. in 1641; and cited at page 256 of the Hierurgia, you have these rhymes:—

"Wax candles, tapers, another cries and calls,
"These brought I with me from Cathedral Paul's.
"They'll scare the devil, and put him to flight,
"When he perceives a consecrated light.
"When we at matins, and evensong were,
"We had them by us then devoid of fear.
"They'll bring delight unto your eyes and nose,
"They burn so clear, and smell so like a rose."

* Vide (B.), letter in Appendix.

And further on we have these lines:—

"And when you think that it hath burnt enough,
"Then blow it out, you shall not smell the snuff."

Then in 1641, in a book the title of which is "Mercury's Message," is the copy of a letter sent to "William Laud, Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, "now prisoner in the Tower; printed in the year
"of our Prelates fear, 1641,"—(at page 362 of the Hierurgia);—

"Altars next you raise,
"And waxen tapers must upon them blaze;
"Yea, in these heaps of stone such worth is found,
"That passers by must bow to 'em down to the "ground."

A little earlier, in the time of James the First, 1605, in a book entitled "Certain Demands with their Grounds," page 29, we read this: "As for copes, "surplices, crosses, candles at noondays, and such "like superstitious ornaments, rites, and ceremonies
" . . . . we affirm that they ought . . . .
"to be cast away." Neale, in his "History of the Puritans" (vol. 2, page 9, edition 1837), states that Warminstre, one of the representatives of Worcester in the Convocation of 1640, said, in a speech which was published as a tract, "I know not why we have "candles in the daytime;" and he goes on to say, "I "wish there may not be so much as an emblem of "a fruitless prelacy or clergy in the church, that "fill the candlestick, but give no light." Now that may perhaps be doubtful as an authority; yet it might mean, that the feeble rays of tapers at noonday were put out, as it were, by the noontide sun. It seems a natural interpretation. One does not see what the great objection was simply to the candles, unless they were lighted.* The lighting seems principally to have been the objection on the part of the Puritans. In a volume entitled "A large Supplement to the Canterburian Self-Conviction" (4to., 1641, pages 85 to 88) there is a long assault on the opinions and practices of the Caroline divines. Among other things it is stated as the practice of the divines of that time, to which the writer objects, "that the chancel and altar must not only be dedi-
"cate with prayers and unctions, but with lighted
"candles, burning incense, and many other such "toys." We find a poetical allusion to altar lights in a poem, entitled "To a fair lady weeping for her "husband committed to prison by the Parliament,
"1643:—

"She keeps an altar on her brow,
"Her eyes two tapers on each side,
"Where superstitious lovers bow."

In the narrative of the rifling and defacing of the cathedral church of Peterborough, in Gunton's History of the Church at Peterborough (folio, 1686), there is an account of the destruction of the screen which was at the back of the Holy Table, and also an engraving, which I have given in the Hierurgia, in which the candles are represented on the altar burning. 1643 was the time of the desecration of the screen, but the volume was published in 1686.

12. (Sir Travers Twiss.) What was the period at which the screen was built?—It was an early screen; it was middle-pointed. This is not a very good portraiture of it, but it was evidently of the decorated period.

13. Pre-Reformational?—Yes.

14. (Dean of Lincoln.) Was the destruction accidental?—It was done by the soldiers during the rebellion of 1643. It says, "The high altar was "pulled down with ropes, laid low, and levelled
"with the ground. It had no imagery work on it,
"or anything else that might justly give offence."
Then we have, of course, a great many examples of the restoration of candles during the Caroline period, but they are not specified as being lighted. There are so many examples of their being used in the churches generally, that it seems hardly necessary, perhaps, to go into that matter. They were prohibited and turned out of all the churches at the Great Rebellion; and the allusion to them is so general that there can be no doubt that they were in very common use in parish churches, as well as in cathedral and collegiate churches.

15. (Sir Travers Twiss.) Will you read the allusion to which you refer?—In Prynne's direct statement in "Canterbury's Doom" (page 59), "They [the Committee of the House of Lords] first trailed this Romish fox to his own kennel at Lambeth, where having unkenneled, they chased him from thence, by his hot Popish scent, to the King's own royal chapel at Whitehall, and Westminster Abbey, from thence to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge; from thence to Canterbury, Winchester, and most other cathedrals in England, and from them to our parish churches and chapels, all which he miserably defiled, corrupted with Popish superstitions, crucifixes, altars, bowings, ceremonies, tapers, copes, and other innovations."

16. I thought you said there were some orders to turn them out?—Yes; there are several; for instance, the declaration of the Commons in 1641, which orders that the churchwardens of every parish church and chapel respectively do forthwith remove the Communion Table from the east end of the church, and that all tapers, candlesticks, and basins be removed from the Communion Table. In Nalson's "Impartial Collection," (vol. 2, pp. 481, 482, folio, 1683, p. 30 of the Hierurgia):—"It is this day ordered by the Commons in Parliament assembled, that the churchwardens of every parish church and chapel respectively do forthwith remove the Communion Table from the east end of the church chapel, or chancel into some other convenient place; and that they take away the rails and level the chancels, as heretofore they were before the late innovations; that all crucifixes, scandalous pictures of any one or more persons of the Trinity, and all images of the Virgin Mary shall be taken away and abolished; and that all tapers, candlesticks, and basins be removed from the Communion Table."* Perhaps I may be allowed to refer to Dr. Cosin and the prebendaries of Durham just before the rebellion. In the articles of the Commons' declaration and impeachment upon the complaint of Peter Smart, who was one of the prebendaries of Durham, and who was very much opposed to Dr. Cosin and the other prebendaries, at pages 7 and 10, (page 36 of the Hierurgia), he says:—"That the said dean and prebendaries did use an excessive number of candles more upon a saint's day than upon the Lord's day, and caused the same candles to be lighted in the said church in a new, strange, and superstitious manner, burning two hundred wax candles in one candlemas night, whereof there were about sixty upon and about the altar, where there was no use of light, nor service then said; whereupon a Popish priest spake, 'Let us Papists resort to the said church, to see how Dr. Cosin and the prebendaries of Durham do play our apes.' Dr. Cosin set up some of these candles himself, and caused others with ladders to set up more round about the quire, some of which the said dean sent his servant to take down; but Dr. Cosin did struggle with him in time of prayer, to the great disturbance of the congregation. The manner of lighting the candles was this; they caused two choristers in their surplices to come from the west end of the quire, with lighted torches in their hands, who, after sundry bowings by the way, to and at the altar, did light the candles upon the same with their torches; which done they returned backwards with many bowings, their faces toward the altar, till they came to the quire door; which ceremony of lighting the excessive number of candles came into the said church after Dr. Cosin was prebendary." In a book entitled, "A Catalogue of Superstitious Innovations in the Change of Services and Ceremonies, of Presumptuous Irregularities, and Transgressions against the Articles of Religion, Act of Parliament for Uniformity, Canons, Advertisements, Injunctions, and Homilies," and so forth, "London, printed for Joseph Hunscoott, 1642," at page 26 we find this: "They offended in burning of wax candles in excessive number, two or three hundred at a time, when and where there was no use of light, as namely on Candlemas day 1627, when the days were lengthened two hours, and service might be done an hour before daylight was gone, as it was in Westminster Abbey this yeere 1641, no candles being lighted there at evening prayer."* In a volume, which I have not with me of Addison's poems, published by Curll (a noted publisher at the beginning of the eighteenth century in 1719, there is a Latin poem, written in 1664 by Addison, on a wall or fresco painting of the Last Judgment, which was put up over the Holy Table in the chapel at Magdalen College, Oxford, and a picture in which the Holy Table is represented with two candlesticks upon it, and the candles in them burning.

17. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) Is that in the Hierurgia?—No, it is not.

18. Have you the picture to produce?—I gave the picture to Mr. Perry.

19. (Earl of Harrowby.) And the verses?—No; the verses are a description of the painting, merely incidentally introduced. The painting is the subject upon which Addison wrote the verses, and there is an English translation given of the poem, and a picture to illustrate it, with the Last Judgment represented in the style of that time (not what we should altogether admire), painted above the altar, which has a canopy over it protruding. It is rather a small Table, but the drapery is so arranged that no one can stand at the two ends very well, for it comes out in this way (describing by gesture). There are two books upon it lying in front with book-markers hanging down in this way, in front of the altar, with the two candlesticks and lights on a re-table.

20. How is that connected with Addison's poem?—Simply that the poem was on the picture above.

21. There is an engraving of a picture in the same book?—Yes.

22. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) You think there is reasonable ground to infer that this is a picture of the real thing?—There is no doubt about it, because it says so. I think I have now produced almost all the evidence I have as to lighted candles.

23. (Earl Stanhope.) Have you been able, in any of the cases you allege, to obtain any probable presumption as to whether the candles were lighted for devotional purposes, or simply to give light as the evening drew on?—I apprehend that the great opposition of the Puritans to the candles was to their being lighted ritually, and in one of those examples, certainly, at St. Paul's, it is stated directly that they were lighted at matins.

24. The Puritans brought a great many unfounded charges, did they not, against members of the Church?—No doubt they did.

25. Is it not very possible that they may have imputed to distinguished members of the Church that they used altar lights, when in reality these lights were only used for the purpose of seeing more clearly?—There are two or more specific examples to the contrary. I submit that it is stated distinctly that they were burning in the day time in the King's chapel.

26. Your instances have chiefly applied, I think, to royal chapels, and to the chapel of the Archbishop at Lambeth?—Yes.

27. Have you been able to make any researches with respect to the practice in any parish churches?—No; not as to the lighting of the candles. I think there is no doubt from what I have stated that there is plenty of evidence that candles were used in the parish churches and complained of as being in general use, as for example, where Prynne says that Laud defiled all the churches with tapers.

28. You are not prepared to produce any instance in which it appears that the candles were lighted in the parish churches?—I am not.

29. It is possible, without giving any opinion on the point, that the practice might exist in chapels or in cathedrals, and yet be altogether unknown in the great body of the parish churches?—I suppose that if the candles were there at the time, they would be lighted, because the cathedral churches were looked up to as the pattern churches of the diocese.

30. Clearly not in all cases. In many instances the cathedral services differ from the services in the parish churches, do they not?—I apprehend they are both ruled by the same rubrics. There may be a difference in regard to the costliness and the grandeur of the services, and the means provided for carrying them out, there being larger endowments in the case of cathedrals; but I am satisfied that the rubrics rule the whole of the services of the Church in the smallest parish church as much as in the grandest cathedral; if the practice was admitted to be right in a cathedral, or a royal chapel, of course it could not be per se wrong in a parish church.

31. You are not prepared to carry these instances later in point of time than you have now alleged?—Not as to the lighting of the candles in the day time. There are plenty of examples of altar candlesticks being given to cathedrals and parish churches after the Restoration, if it be wished that I should go into that matter.

32. Perhaps you will have the goodness to state the latest year in which you think any instance of candles being lighted can be cited?—It appears that as regards the use of lights "before the Sacrament," as late as 1698 there is a picture of the altar at St. Paul's Cathedral prepared for the celebration of the Holy Communion, and having two lighted candles upon it. The book was published by Samuel Keble at the Turk's Head, in Fleet Street, and entitled "The Holy Days, or the Holy Feasts and Fasts as they are observed in the Church of England throughout the Year, explained, and the Reasons why they are yearly celebrated, with Cuts before each Day." The book is dated 1698.

33. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) Have you got the book?—No.

34. (Earl Stanhope.) Have you found any passages in any distinguished divines belonging to the Church of England,—any prelates, for example, of the time of Charles the First,—distinctly defending the practice or avowing the practice of lighted candles?—Dr. Donne defends the practice of lights in the day time generally in a Sermon. I can refer to the passage if you wish. It is in my book. Dr. Donne alludes to the practice of having a great many lights on the Purification, as if it were still existing in our Church.

35. (Mr. Walpole.) Will you refer to page 43 of this pamphlet, and page 80 of the sermons, folio, 1640?—"I would not be understood to condemn all use of candles by day in divine service, nor all churches that have or do use them; for so I might condemn even the Primitive Church in her pure and innocent estate. And therefore, that which Lactantius, almost three hundred years after Christ, says of those lights, and that which Tertullian, almost a hundred years before Lactantius, says in apprehension thereof, must necessarily be understood of the abuse and imitation of the Gentiles therein; for, that the thing itself was in use before either of these times I think admits little question. About Lactantius's time fell the Eliberitan Council, and then the use and the abuse was evident; for in the 34th Canon of that Council it is forbidden to set up candles in the churchyard, and the reason that is added declares the abuse . . . that the souls of the faithful departed should not be troubled. Now the setting up of lights could not trouble them, but these lights were accompanied with superstitious invocations, with magical incantations, and with howlings and ejaculations which they had learned from the Gentiles; and with these the souls of the dead were, in those times, thought to be affected and disquieted. It is in this ceremony of lights as it is in other ceremonies. They may be good in their institution, and grow ill in their practice. So did many things which the Christian Church received from the Gentiles in a harmless innocency, degenerate after into as pestilent superstition there, as amongst the Gentiles themselves. For ceremonies which were received but for the instruction and edification of the weaker sort of people were made real parts of the service of God and meritorious sacrifices. To those ceremonies, which were received as helps to excite and awaken devotion, was attributed an operation and an effectual power, even to the ceremony itself; and they were not practised, as they should, significative, but effective; not as things which should signify to the people higher mysteries, but as things as powerful and effectual in themselves as the greatest mysteries of all, the sacraments themselves. So lights were received in the Primitive Church, to signify to the people that God the Father of lights was otherwise present in that place than in any other; and then men came to offer lights by way of sacrifice to God; and so, that which was providently intended for man, who indeed needed such lights, was turned upon God, as though He were to be supplied by us. But what then? Because things good in their institution may be depraved in their practice, as says Calvin, Instit., c. 4., 10., § 14. . . shall therefore the people be denied all ceremonies for the assistance of their weakness."

(Rev. T. W. Perry.) Then the passage, in a copy I have, runs on thus:—"I say, no; I think these kind of helps very behoveful of them. All that I strive for is but moderation. . . We must not be hasty in condemning particular ceremonies, for in so doing, in this ceremony of lights, we may condemn the Primitive Church that did use them, and we condemn a great and noble part of the Reformed Church, which doth use them at this day."

36. (Earl of Harrowby.) You consider there that he refers to Lutherans?—Yes.

37. (Earl Stanhope.) Do you consider that passage to imply that lights were then in use in the Church of England? does it not rather seem to imply that Dr. Donne, conceiving this practice to be sanctioned in the Primitive Church, would have been well pleased to see it as a help to devotion of the mind? can you construe that as saying that there was any use of lights in England when he wrote it?—I find in the same sermon which contains the foregoing quotation, that he states that they were in use on Candlemas day in our Church.

38. Will you read that sentence?—"The oblation of this day's purification is light; so the day names it Candlemas day; so your custom celebrates it with many lights." That is at page 345 of the Hierurgia. I believe that was preached at St. Paul's.

39. Was Dr. Donne Dean of St. Paul's in the year when he wrote or preached that sermon?—That I do not know, but I will add that.

40. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) He was Dean of St. Paul's from 1621 to 1631?—(Witness.) The volume was published in 1640, after his death.

41. (Earl Stanhope.) It is possible he may as a layman have written this sermon?—He could not have preached the sermon as a layman, but he might have written part of it when a layman.

42. (Earl Beauchamp.) Something has been said with regard to candles being used merely for the purpose of giving light: are you prepared to state whether it is in your knowledge or not that the time of celebrating the Holy Communion was usually after the sun was up?—I believe it was early.

43. It was always early no doubt, but since the Reformation, have you any reason to suppose that the celebration of the Holy Communion took place before sunrise?—I should think not.*

44. And so again with regard to the time of evensong; in the Caroline period that would be in the afternoon?—I believe so.

45. At 3 o'clock?—Yes, usually.

46. And the service would be over before dark?—Yes; I think we have hardly any trace of evening service, in the modern acceptation of the term.

47. In point of fact, the use of candles, whether lighted or unlighted, must have been symbolical, rather than useful?—Yes, I conclude so. I think that is warranted by the quotation about St. Paul's: "matins and evensong." Both evensong and matins were then said in the daytime.

48. The rubrics governing both the cathedrals and the parish churches, you would take the facts that you find as regards the cathedral as indicating what ought to be done in parish churches rather than as an exceptional observance?—Laud and the bishops of that time maintained that the cathedral churches were to be the rule for the daughter churches, that the same rubrics were to govern both.†

49. And the great object of Archbishop Laud was to enforce the rubric and the law?—To enforce the rubric and the law.

50. Am I correct in saying that after the Great Rebellion, and subsequently to the Restoration, a lower type of ritual prevailed? Would you draw any distinction between the ritual of the Church of England before the Great Rebellion and after?—I conclude that, from the great destruction that took place of the Church property during the Rebellion, means could not be found afterwards to supply the great deficiency, which had been caused by the devastations and robberies that had taken place, especially in regard to smaller churches; but at the same time we find that at the Restoration people very liberally replaced in the larger churches and cathedrals altar candlesticks, plate, and ornaments of that kind, which had been destroyed or melted down during the Commonwealth.

51. Will it be correct to say, as a rule, subject of course to exception, that before the Great Rebellion, where you find candles mentioned, you would assume from your general knowledge that they were lighted, but that after the Rebellion the rule was that they would be unlighted?—As a rule I should think they would be, except that we have examples posterior to the Restoration period in which we see they are lighted.

51a. On points so minute you have great difficulty in bringing positive evidence one way or the other?—There is great difficulty.

52. (Bishop of Gloucester.) I desire only to ask you what you would infer as to the time at which the candles would have been lighted; would they have been lighted at the beginning of the service, at the beginning of the Communion service, or at some particular time in that service?—I find no trace of any interruption of the service for the lighting of the candles; therefore, I presume they were lighted at the beginning of the service.

53. At the beginning of the whole service, or of the Communion service?—As to that I do not think there is any evidence.

54. (Earl of Harrowby.) You referred to a procession coming in to light the candles, but it was not said whether it was before or after?—I do not think there is any particular statement on the point.

55. (Bishop of Gloucester.) It would be your general opinion, however, that they were not lighted at any period in the Communion service, but lighted at any rate at the commencement of that service?—I conclude so.

56. (Sir W. P. Wood.) In the course of your researches have you ascertained what course was pursued by the non-jurors in this matter of lights, or by Sancroft and Ken in their chapels?—There is a form of consecration by Sancroft in which candlesticks are mentioned.

57. As being lighted?—No; it is merely that candlesticks are presented. There is a prayer attached, to be used at the time.*

58. You have not otherwise found any account of it?—No, not as regards the non-jurors specifically.

59. (Mr Hubbard.) You have been able to trace for a great many years past the practices of the clergy with reference to altar lights; do you think the practice has been gaining ground recently?—I think it has.

60. Under the impression that the practice is perfectly legal, and in accordance with the feeling of the Church?—I think so, certainly.

61. Do you think that it is a practice which stands on a different ground from the use of vestments or incense, and that it is much more largely adopted?—I should say it has been more largely adopted; though there may not be quite such conclusive proof of its legality, as there is, in my opinion, for the lawfulness of vestments.

62. Have you yourself the same conviction with regard to the use of incense that you have with regard to the use of lights?—Not to the same extent.

63. Have you considered the question of incense by itself?—I have some authorities on the point as to its use during the time before the Rebellion. It was certainly used in the churches by Bishop Andrewes, Archbishop Laud, Bishop Cosin, and others at that time; and I find Herbert, speaking of it, advising that the church should be perfumed with incense.

64. You find individual instances of the use of incense, but do you find any declaration of the Church's voice on the subject of as clear a description as that which is contained in the Injunctions of Edward VI. with regard to lights?—No.

65. Therefore it does not stand on the same clear and distinct ground?—It does not, I think.

66. (Bishop of London.)—Am I right in supposing that your contention is simply this, that Queen Elizabeth used these things in her private chapel, and that Archbishop Laud would have been glad to re-introduce them; but that the evidence does not really go beyond that?—I think that they were very generally introduced during the time of Archbishop Laud.

67. Elsewhere than in his private chapel?—Yes.

68. Do you take your stand on what Dr. Donne said?—Rather on the assertions of the Puritans; the complaints that they made.

69. It has been pointed out that these might have been exaggerations, and very likely were?—They might in some cases, while in some cases they seem to be assertions which are not contradicted.

70. With regard to Dr. Donne and these Candlemas practices which you have read about, can you tell us what the practice on Candlemas was?—I believe the practice was to bring a number of lights into the church. The ante-Reformation practice was to celebrate the Purification with lights; hence the origin of the word "Candlemas."‡

71. By "lights," do you mean putting lights before the elements on the Lord's table?—Setting them up or bringing them in.

72. Bringing them into the church?—Yes; I have an early picture of the Purification, about the year 1480, in which a guild are represented as holding lights; some are in surplices, and some are not.

73. That is a different practice, is it not, from the lighting of candles on the Communion Table before the elements?—Yes.

74. So that it has nothing to do with it, in fact?—Only so far as that the principle of lights, i.e., their symbolical use, is recognized in both.

75. With regard to the other evidence derived from Dr. Donne, does it not strike you that when he is justifying lights, he is saying that they are not against the law of God, but he is not at all entering into the question of whether they are according to the law of England?—I do not think he goes into that matter.

76. Therefore he is merely saying that, according to primitive practice, there was nothing shocking or wrong religiously, in having lights?—I think so.

77. And when he mentions the number of reformed churches that have lights he alludes to the Lutherans, I suppose?—I imagine so.

78. He seems thereby rather to imply that they are different from us?—In regard to the festival of the Purification he expressly refers, as it would seem, to a practice in the church in which the sermon was preached.

79. In the passage contrasting the Lutherans with us in point of fact it seems to prove that we did not use them; do you not think so?—Well, I am hardly prepared to say that.

80. In some of these cases that you alluded to they were lights at evensong, were they not?—Yes.

81. And then evensong was at 5 o'clock, so that of course they were not lights before the elements of the Lord's supper?—No; there is no trace of late celebrations at that time.

82. They would not have anything to do with that practice?—No.

83. And your attention has been directed to this, that in London it is very difficult to say when you require candles, and when you do not, for the purpose of light?—No doubt.

84. Many of these cases were in London?—Some were; not all.

85. You have known days in London in March, when you could not see at 12 o'clock without candles in your own room?—Yes. But there was no necessity for their being lighted on the Holy Table that I am aware of.

86. Do you happen to have read a book by Canon Oakley, who is now a member of the Roman Catholic Church, in which he describes the state of things while he was a clergyman of the Church of England, and says, "we were delighted with a foggy day, because it enabled us to have the candles lighted"?—I have heard it referred to, but I have not read the book.

87. So that a person who was anxious to have the candles lighted, and knew it was unlawful, might light them on a foggy day, and shelter himself under the fog?—Yes.

88. In fact, all you have endeavoured to prove is that there was a partial practice, and that the practice was under such high sanction that it could not be considered absolutely illegal?—Yes.

89. That is all that you contend for?—I think that it was general to a large extent during the Caroline period.

90. On what do you suppose they justified the legality?—I should say, the ornament rubric, and in particular the Injunction of Edward VI.

91. Not the Prayer Book of Edward VI.?—The Injunction.

92. You have read the decision of the Privy Council on the subject of ornaments generally, in which it seems to be laid down that nothing that is not within the four corners of the Book of Edward VI. can be introduced under that rubric?—I apprehend that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council rather modified that declaration afterwards, by admitting that there were other things in use in the service, such as organs, for instance, which were not specified in the first Prayer Book of Edward VI.*

93. So that you do not consider that we are bound within the limits of the Book?—No.

94. You grant that there is no authority for the use of lighted candles before the elements, in the Book of Edward VI.?—Only by implication. It is not mentioned, certainly. Other things are not mentioned, which were necessary, and which you cannot suppose could have been designedly omitted; for instance, the coverings of the altar.

95. About incense: in the example you gave to Mr. Hubbard on the subject of incense, do you contend that there is any proof that incense was used devotionally, I will call it, as opposed to use for cleanliness or sanitary purposes?—I think there is such proof; for instance, in the "Plan of Bishop Andrewes chapel," it is stated distinctly that the clerk put incense into a censer "at the reading of the first lesson," whatever that may mean; which would imply a particular time and a particular use.

96. (Dean of Ely.) The first case that you quoted to us was that of Dr. Bill preaching before Queen Elizabeth; is there any evidence in that case that the Holy Communion was administered?—I am not aware that there is.

97. There is no evidence therefore that in that case the candles spoken of were used as part of the Holy Communion?—I think not. Perhaps I might find some more evidence upon that point. It does not appear in the quotation.

98. Because the important thing is not whether candles were lighted; but whether they were lighted as a part of the administration of the Holy Sacrament in conformity with the Injunctions of Edward VI.?—Yes.†

99. Therefore if the candles were lighted, and it was merely in the service, when the sermon was preached, and so forth, it would not affect that point?—No, so far as regards celebration.

100. In the next case that you gave us, that of Bishop Barlow, I think it is stated distinctly that the service was an afternoon service. It was 5 o'clock in the afternoon; and we hear of an anthem being sung, and so forth?—Yes.

101. Therefore in that case it was clearly not a case of the administration of the Holy Communion?—Just so.

102. In the next instance you gave us, the letter of Sampson to Peter Martyr, he states that three bishops were to officiate before the Queen with candles in a certain way. Is there any evidence that they did officiate in the way that is described, or may it not be merely Sampson's fear as to what they were likely to do?—I think it was more than a fear. I think there can be very little doubt that they did officiate.

103. You have no distinct evidence that they did?—I cannot refer to it at this moment.

104. Perhaps if you find any distinct evidence that they did, you will give a note on the subject?—I will.‡

105. Because unless persons writing in the great panic in which the advanced Reformers were in those days, to their friends on the continent, as to the doings in England, state positively that a thing has been done, of course the weight of their testimony is considerably diminished. It is a different thing to say, "they are going to do so and so," and that they have done it.—In the next case you gave us, the writer of the work, I think, was a Roman Catholic. Stapleton?—Yes.

* Vide (K.), letter, Appendix.

† Vide (L.), letter, ibid.

‡ Vide (M.), letter, ibid.

105. And the words that he used are, "Why burn not Protestants lights as Her Majesty does?" That would seem, I suppose, to be evidence that the supposed practice in Her Majesty's chapel was an exceptional practice, would it not?—Yes.

107. Because he says, "Why do Protestants not burn lights as Her Majesty does?" which seems to imply that in common parish churches the practice of Her Majesty's chapel was not carried out?—That it was not general, at least.

108. In the next instance that you gave us, the extract from an inventory of articles connected with the christening of a child of Lady Cicile, at the Palace of Westminster, among the ornaments were enumerated "two candlesticks with lights;" that being in an inventory, I presume that "lights" simply meant candles?—It was not an inventory. It is a description of what took place at the time. It is a description of the chapel furniture.

109. Is it stated that the candles were lighted?—Merely "lights." I believe the service was in the evening.

110. Then it has no connexion with the use of lights at the Holy Sacrament?—No, not necessarily.

111. And not possibly?—No.

112. You mentioned that tapers were to be taken by the Prince Charles to Madrid. Do you think it possible that as Prince Charles was going to a Roman Catholic country to court a Roman Catholic princess, he would have his chapel arranged with something like exceptional grandeur for that purpose?—I should apprehend that would have been rather a compromise of principle, and that he simply followed the rule at home. I think Bishop Andrewes may have had to do with that arrangement, and he in his chapel had the same ornaments; and it would appear that they were the same in the chapel of James the First, and, as we read, of Charles the First.

113. Was Andrewes a bishop at the time Prince Charles went to Madrid?—He was.

114. (Earl of Harrowby). Bishop of London?—No; Bishop of Winchester.

115. (Dean of Ely). It is stated, I think, in "Canterbury's Doom," that candles were burning in Laud's chapel in the daytime?—Yes, I infer so.

116. And it is made an accusation against him on the ground that they were never used in his predecessor's days?—They were regarded as an innovation which he justified on the example of the King's chapel.

117. The charge was that they "were never used in his predecessor's days." Those words are correct?—In the days of Archbishop Abbot, who had not used them.

118. Those are the correct words?—Yes.

119. He justified them on the ground that they were in imitation of the chapel at Whitehall?—Yes.

120. Therefore we are again referred to the Royal Chapel as the example?—Yes.

121. The next case that you gave us was, I think, a quotation from a book called the "Lambeth Fair;" in those verses that you quoted the charge is about the using of lights at matins and evensong?—Yes.

122. The two are thrown together; therefore it would seem that in that case there is no special reference to the use of lights as a part of the Holy Communion?—Not necessarily.

123. It is evensong as much as the other?—It is an example of the use of lights in the daytime.

124. But not the use of lights as part of the Holy Communion?—No.

125. In a quotation that you gave us as to certain demands of the Puritans in the year 1605, the date of James the First, there are a number of things which they wished to be taken away; they say "as for copes, candles at noondays, &c., we affirm that they ought to be cast away;" do you regard that as evidence of the general use of candles at noonday, or what conclusion do you draw from it?—That they were in use, I will not say "general use," but in frequent use in churches, or else they would not have been made a cause of complaint.

126. Then, there is no distinct connexion with the lighting at the Holy Communion?—Only that "noonday" would seem to imply that it would be about the time of the late or "high" celebration, after the morning service.

127. You next instanced, from "Neale's History of the Puritans," a speech by Warminstre as to why we should have candles in the daytime; that you mentioned as being doubtful, therefore I say nothing about it?—Ambiguous.

128. In the next instance I think you quoted Fryne, as saying that Laud corrupted all our churches with tapers?—Yes.

129. Do you infer from that, that before Laud's time there were no tapers in the churches, or what do you infer?—I apprehend that there had been a great relaxation of discipline, and that he re-introduced those in common with other things at that time which he thought desirable and lawful.

130. When Laud became Archbishop of Canterbury do you suppose that the churches were free from tapers and that he re-introduced them?—To a great extent.

131. In Nalson's "Impartial Collection" it is stated that it was ordered by the House of Commons to remove "the Communion Table and to take away the rails," and so forth, "and other things which were not there until the recent innovations." Those recent innovations of course were Laud's innovations?—We may suppose so.

132. And that also seems to imply that those candles were introduced by Laud, and were not there before?—To a great extent.

133. With regard to the articles of impeachment of Dr. Cosin, at Durham, do you think that all the charges made against him there are worthy of credit?—I believe they were exaggerated in some respects.

134. Some of them, if I remember right, he distinctly denies?—Yes.

135. Therefore the assertion concerning the excessive number of candles and the way in which they are lighted would be liable to doubt?—I think he denies the excessive number of candles, but no more. He does not deny the manner in which they were lighted.

136. That was on Candlemas night?—Yes.

137. So that it was for illumination, but as the Puritans thought, for excessive illumination?—It was stated that it was before dark; that they were not necessary for light.

138. In the picture you showed to us of Peterborough Cathedral you said that there were lighted candles upon the altar; was the altar in that case prepared for the Holy Communion?—No, I think not.

139. Therefore that also has no bearing whatever upon this special point?—No.

140. So that in that picture at Peterborough there is no evidence whatever of the use of candles lighted in the Holy Communion?—No.

141. But there is evidence that they were lighted at other times apparently?—Yes.

142. In the corresponding case you referred to, the picture upon which Addison's poem was made, at Magdalen College, Oxford, there is there also, you say, a picture of an altar with candles lighted; can you tell us whether in that case the altar is prepared for the Holy Communion?—There are no sacramental vessels upon it; there are books.

143. No special preparation for the Holy Communion?—No.

144. In the case of the picture of 1698, of the altar in St. Paul's, prepared for Holy Communion, you stated that the lights were burning?—So I am informed. I have not seen the picture.

145. Then the only case in which we have a pictorial representation of the altar prepared for the Holy Communion, with lights burning, is subsequent to the Revolution of 1688?—Yes.*

146. It is a striking fact that the strongest case for lights upon the altar should be, not during the Laudian period, but subsequent to the Revolution of 1688?—There is, I believe, another engraving of a later time, I think of a marriage, in which the candles are represented as lighted, but I cannot refer to it now.†

147. That is during a marriage?—Yes, I think a royal marriage.

148. I wish to refer to one phrase in that passage which you were good enough to quote from Dr. Donne in which he defends lights. He speaks of their being used in "all churches." By "all churches," of course he does not mean churches in this country, but churches throughout the world in different ages?—Yes.

149. And that passage from Dr. Donne is not at all a defence of a practice in the Church of England, but a general defence of lights upon their own merits as a part of divine worship?—Yes.

150. Can you tell us whether the churchwarden's accounts give any evidence concerning the consumption of wax candles in parish churches?—I think there are a few references to the use of candles on certain festivals, Christmas day and so forth.

151. I will read a few lines, which occur as part of the Report of the Committee of the Lower House of the Convocation of Canterbury on this subject, and I wish to ask you whether they coincide with your own view of the case:—"The subsequent history of altar lights is involved in much obscurity, but candles and candlesticks have remained to the present day in cathedrals, collegiate churches, royal chapels, and in many parish churches. In some instances the candles appear to have been lighted during the celebration of the Holy Communion, but the instances which can be quoted are few, and the evidence not beyond question?"—I quite agree with that statement.‡

152. (Sir J. Napier.) I observe that in page 329 of the Hierurgia Anglicana you quote from a work published by divers ministers of sundry counties in England, in which they say, "not content with this, they must have all, except candles lighted, that are upon the Popish altars where Mass is used upon their high altar?"—Yes.

153. Would you collect from that, that at that time in the parish churches they used lighted candles?—They were not lighted, I apprehend, at that time.

154. That is shortly before the Savoy Conference?—Yes; very shortly after the Restoration.

155. From your research you would say that the general use at that time in England was not to light the candles?—I should think not. They were not lighted in the day-time.

156. Are there any reliable instances that would go to show the general use of the parochial clergy, in the parochial churches, with regard to lighting candles at the Communion?—I am not aware of any.

157. You have given us all that your research could supply?—In the main. There may be more, but I think I have given generally the result of my inquiry.

158. (Earl of Harrowby.) You are aware that Laud was offered a cardinal's hat by the Pope?—Which he refused.

159. (Mr. Beresford Hope.) The Bishop of London very properly pointed out to you, that which we all feel, that the subject on which Dr. Donne's sermon was preached was Candlemas day, which was an exceptional case?—Yes.

160. Then I think his lordship went on to ask you, and you assented, that therefore there was no parity or connection between Candlemas day and burning the lights upon the Lord's Table at the Sacrament?—Yes.

161. Do you stand to that?—Yes.

162. Then standing to that, how would you explain this, that the Injunction of 1547 gives as the reason for these lights "before the Sacrament," whatever they be, that Christ is the "very true Light of the world," and that the origin of Candlemas day symbolism is the passage in the song of Simeon, "a light to lighten the Gentiles"?—I should say that Dr. Donne defended the symbolical use of lights, and for the same reason that is alleged in the Injunction.

163. Is not there a very strong family likeness between the general reason of the Injunction and the particular reason for a large illumination on Candlemas day?—The purport of the symbolism would, I consider, be the same.

164. Therefore if you assume the symbolism to be innocent and devoid of superstition, the two would, as the lawyers say, pretty well run on all fours?—Exactly.

165. Therefore, is it your opinion (I ask you as a person who has studied the matter) that if it be an innocent and edifying thing to have lights on Candlemas day, in special memory of the "light" of the Nunc Dimittis, the same principle might apply to having them on other days?—I think so, certainly.

166. And, without going into doctrinal questions, with which we have nothing to do here, considering how very near the ceremonial of the Lord's Supper brings us to the idea of our Lord, there might be a special congruity in having lights during the time of the celebration of the Lord's Supper?—There would be, I think, certainly.

167. Carrying out the idea which the Nunc Dimittis gives us?—Yes.

168. Do I understand you to tell us that, though the instances are few, and some of them not beyond suspicion, you believe there might be a good deal more behind,—a great many more instances of lighted tapers on the Lord's Table, in the Church of England?—It is very possible that there might be, because the evidence that has been obtained is not nearly so much as might possibly be obtained in the writings of that period.

169. You think the writings of that period have not been well overhauled?—Not thoroughly.

170. Nor the parish registers?—I should say, certainly not.

171. You think an inquiry, conducted by a careful archaeologist, might get more out?—I think it might, because we have discovered things recently that were not known before.

172. By "we," you mean archaeologists?—Yes, generally, and those who are interested in this question.

173. And you think, then, that even the 15,000 clergy of the Church of England, though they may not all of them be antiquarians, might discover a little by looking at their old registers?—It is very likely.

174. It is a question, in fact, that has not been sifted?—Not sufficiently.

175. For example, if you had had more than half a day's notice to appear before us to day, you might have had more to tell us?—It is possible that I might.

176. In fact, you have merely come up to give us extemporary evidence?—Exactly. I only had notice of attendance last night.

177. Your thoughts had not been turning on this matter particularly?—Not very recently.

178. Then you think the haze that overlies the whole matter may, without pronouncing any opinion, tell as much for one side as for the other?—Yes. I think that a great deal might be yet discovered on the point which has not yet been discovered.

179. Then you think it is quite possible that the custom of lighted tapers, though not a general one, may have been in vogue over various parts of the country?—Certainly, during the Caroline period.

180. And possibly during Queen Elizabeth's reign?—And possibly at other times.

181. That being the case, how can you defend the very modified answer you gave the Bishop of London, that it was not absolutely illegal?—I consider it is perfectly legal; I meant that it was legal, though perhaps not very customary.

182. Then by saying that it was not absolutely illegal, you meant it was legal, but not customary?—Yes, that there was certainly legal authority for the use, though it might not have been very generally acted upon.

183. Do you think, as an expert, as a person who understands the investigation of documents, you—I do not mean you alone but inquirers—could by further research find out more of what has happened since 1688 than we know at present?—I think it is very likely.

184. The Dean of Ely pointed out to you that there were no sacramental elements or vessels represented on the Lord's Table in the Peterborough picture; has it occurred to you that these need not and would not have been put on the Table till the offertory?—They need not, of course.

185. Then that may be a picture of the Lord's Table at Peterborough as dressed for the Communion at the beginning of the Communion Service?—Provided the linen cloth is visible, which may be questioned.

186. I suppose you have studied the rubrics as well as the mere architectural and artistic adornments of the Church?—Yes.

187. You offer yourself as a theological expert?—Yes.

188. Does it seem to you that, supposing it were lawful to light the candles at other services, there is anything so peculiarly different in the Communion service as to make them incongruous for that service, if they were congruous for other services?—Certainly not; they would be more congruous for the Communion than for any other service.

189. Then you do not think that that instance of the candles that were lighted at the evening service, on March 24th, in Elizabeth's reign, which was the first evensong of the Annunciation, and was therefore probably observed with special pomp, would militate against their being lighted at a morning service, or a morning Communion?—Certainly not.

190. Have you had much experience of the habits and customs of our own day in church?—In many churches the lights are lighted at evensong as well as at the celebration, and in many churches they are not lighted at the celebration, and are lighted at evensong.

191. And in other churches they are lighted at both?—Yes.

192. And some are only lighted at celebration, and not at evensong?—Yes.

193. There are a great many churches and chapels in which there are candlesticks and tapers on the Lord's Table, when they are only lighted in a fog, or at evensong?—Yes.

194. Do you apprehend that any proportion of the incumbents of these churches would like to carry out the symbolism of the Injunction, but do not light the candles out of prudence, or out of deference to Dr. Lushington's dictum?—I think that many forbear to do it on account of the offence it might give to their congregations, but I doubt whether this forbearance is due, in any case, solely to Dr. Lushington's opinion.

195. (Earl of Harrowby.) You said that you found that there were in churchwardens' accounts statements of expenses incurred for wax-lights at certain festivals?—There are one or two allusions to it, which I might mention.

196. Were those confined to those festivals?—That I cannot say.

197. You mentioned that they were for certain festivals?—I think there are one or two I might mention. "Paid for four pounds of candles upon Christmas day, in the morning, for the Mass, 12d." That is in the churchwardens' account in the parish of Abington, Berkshire, in 1561, Hierurgia, p. 3.

198. You have an account of the expenses incurred of that nature, but no mention of any expenditure for wax-candles?—No, I have not.

199. That would seem to imply that, as far as you had information, no expenditure was incurred, by the parish at least, for wax candles, except on festivals?—I should imagine not. Probably many examples might be given if they were sought for, of this kind.

200. Have you not been seeking for all these things for some time?—Not lately.

201. People who are interested in the subject have done so?—I think there have been examples given in other places.

202. These examples are of the general expenditure of the churchwardens?—I think not, but for specific purposes.

203. (Mr. J. Abel Smith.) It appeared to me that of the instances you gave, a large proportion were drawn from protests by those who disagreed with the use of candles, and the only instance of defence you gave us, that I am aware of, was that of Dr. Donne's sermon. Can you account for the fact of those persons who approved of the use of candles not saying anything in answer to so many violent protests that you have alluded to?—I am not aware of all that has been said on the other side. But in reference to one case in particular, in regard to Archbishop Laud, he defends the practice on the authority of the Chapel Royal, and there might have been many other examples, which have not come down to us, of the same kind.

204. Do I understand that you have not sought for these arguments?—I have not come across them. The statements are of such a general kind on the part of the Puritans that it would be difficult, probably to find that other parties had replied severally to those statements. They are statements, which seem to have caused great disturbance and trouble at the time. The Puritans made these accusations very confidently; and we have the proof of the candlesticks being removed by authority of Parliament from the churches when the Parliament had power to do so.

205. Am I right in supposing that you mean that as far as you know there is no published defence of the use of candles except the one you have alluded to?—I am not aware of any particular one in regard to lights in the day-time.

206. I think your evidence with regard to the use of candles came down to the close of the 17th century?—Yes.

207. Do you know at all what has been the practice in parish churches during the last century?—I am not prepared to say. There have been candles and candlesticks on the altar during that period, but whether they have been lighted at celebration I cannot say.

208. Have you any belief that they were lighted?—I am not prepared to say. I do not know.*

209. You do not know what the practice of the Church of England was, generally, during the last century?—I apprehend it was very slovenly, that things ritual were neglected very much, and that this would have been neglected in particular, being expensive.†

210. (Sir Travers Twiss.) You made use of an expression about Archbishop Laud "enforcing the rubric," what rubric do you allude to?—I allude to the general regulations of the Church, as set forth in the Prayer Book and Canons.

211. You use the term "rubric" in a general sense?—Yes.

212. Are you aware of any instance in which Archbishop Laud required by authority the lighting of candles in the parish churches at the Communion service?—I am not prepared to produce any example.

213. Have you any instance that you know of? I think in that book, the Hierurgia, there is a reference to the Visitation Articles of Bishop Montague?—Yes.

214. Bishop Montague was a bishop who approved of ornate ceremonial, I think?—Yes.

215. Are you aware whether in those Articles of inquiry, to which your attention has been called, there was any requirement on his part to use lighted candles at the Communion service?—I think not.

216. He does go specially into what he conceives to be required for the celebration of the Communion, I think, does he not?—He does.

217. I think you have a reference to bowing to the altar?—Yes.

218. Have you any instance that you know of Bishop Andrewes, in his Articles, inquiring into the use of lighted candles?—No.

219. In fact, I gather from what you say, that there are no Articles of Visitation that you are acquainted with, in which they are required to be used?—Not that I am aware of.

220. (Earl Beauchamp.) Do you mean you are not acquainted with Bishop Andrewes' Visitation Articles, or that they do not contain the statement?—I am not aware that there are any extant. I do not know of any.

221. (Earl of Harrowby.) Are there Visitation Articles of every bishop in those days?—Not in existence.

222. (Sir Travers Twiss.) Are you aware whether there are any Visitation Articles of Bishop Andrewes?—I am not aware that there are.

223. Are you familiar with Bishop Andrewes' works in the Anglo-Catholic Library?—I am familiar with some of Andrewes's works but not with the reprints of them in the Anglo Catholic Library.

224. You are not aware whether there are Visitation Articles in that collection?—I am not aware that there are.*

225. It was suggested, I think, at the Savoy Conference, that the Puritans raised no objection to lights?—They raised a strong objection to the authority of the ornament rubric. They did not specify lights that I am aware of.

226. You referred to the Injunctions of Edward the Sixth?—Yes.

227. Are you aware that by those Injunctions all candlesticks are directed to be removed from the churches?—All those that had been in use for superstitious purposes.

228. There is no exception in the passage?—All those that had been in use for superstitious purposes are to be removed.

229. I will read the passage. I gather, of course, and you are entitled to the inference, that by referring to those lights previously they would be an exception. I refer to the articles of 1547. The contention on this part of the case is that in the first Prayer Book of Edward the Sixth, there is a reference in the rubric at the end of the Communion service that on Wednesdays and Fridays the English Litany shall be read in the form authorized by the Injunctions?—Which recognised the authority of the Injunctions.

230. The Injunctions are referred to as the directory for this Litany, and it is stated in those Injunctions that "immediately before high Mass the priests "with other of the choir shall kneel in the midst of "the church, and sing or say plainly and distinctly the "Litany which is set forth in English, with all the "suffrages following, and none other procession or "Litany to be had or used but the said Litany in English, adding nothing thereto but as the King's Grace "shall hereafter appoint." There at once we see that it was very apposite to point to these Injunctions as furnishing the rule for this English Litany. I do not wish to enter on the legal question at all, but I only ask the question as you have referred to these Injunctions, not in regard to the Litany, but for the purpose of illustrating or supporting the view in regard to the altar lights. I only wish to ask you if these Injunctions are taken to be revived or re-enacted in substance by the Act of Parliament, whether you are aware of this provision in the Injunctions,—28th of the Injunctions of 1547, page 17: "That they shall take away, utterly extinct, and "destroy all shrines, covering of shrines, all tables, "candlesticks, trindils or rolls of wax, pictures, paintings, and all other monuments of foreign miracles, "pilgrimages, idolatry, and superstition: so that "there remain no memory of the same in walls, glass "windows, or elsewhere, within their churches or "houses." That is an Injunction to remove "all "candlesticks"?—Yes.

231. The other passage to which reference is made in regard to the altar lights is this passage: "But only "two lights upon the high altar before the Sacrament, which for the signification that Christ is "the very true Light of the world, they shall suffer "to remain still." Now from your reading in regard to the practice of Archbishop Laud or the Royal Chapel, or any of the episcopal chapels of this period, do you conceive that what is directed to be done by this Injunction was done in respect to the altar lights?—I apprehend that it was with a view of obeying that Injunction that the altar lights were used.

232. Do you find, as a matter of fact, that the two lights were placed before the Sacrament?—I think that they were used at celebration.

233. What do you understand by the words "before the Sacrament"?—Simply at the celebration. The statement "before the Sacrament" may be rather ambiguous. I am perfectly satisfied that it had not to do with the reserved Sacrament; that it was not before a Sacrament that was reserved in a pyx, or in a tabernacle, or in an aumbrye that the lights were to be used; but as they had heretofore been used at the celebration.

234. My object was to ask you, if it was within your own knowledge, to point out to us, looking at the expression of Laud, "enforcing the rubric and "the law" upon this point, whether you find from these statements that Laud had set up the two lights upon the high altar before the Sacrament?—Not before a reserved Sacrament. There was no reserved Sacrament at that time.

235. Were there lights set up in front of the Sacrament?—I suppose they were burned, as they had been before, and are now, on the altar, usually at each end of the altar, during the celebration. I do not think any such sense can be imposed on the word "before," as would imply a reservation, which I do not believe was admitted at that time. The custom had been abolished, I think, even at the time of the issuing of the Injunctions, certainly in 1548, and that all that was done previously was, certainly not to burn lights before a reserved Sacrament, but simply to have a lamp or one light, (a mere wick floating in oil in a cresset,) to mark where it was, as we see to this day in foreign countries. I think it is a perfectly distinct custom from the other.*

236. (Earl Beauchamp.) You would translate "before the Sacrament" ante Sacramentum, not coram Sacramento?—I would conceive it to mean at the celebration.

237. That would be ante Sacramentum?—Yes. I do not think any great stress should be laid on the word. I think the tradition has always been kept up, and that the two candles were to be on the altar at the celebration whether lighted or unlighted.

238. (Dean of Lincoln.) You have referred to authorities which describe, as regards the use of lights, the practice in the private chapel of Queen Elizabeth?—Yes.

239. Do you consider that such authorities describe

* Vide (S.), letter, Appendix.

* Vide (T.), letter, Appendix.

the common and general, or a peculiar and exceptional practice?—The practice might have been to a certain extent exceptional, but I think that the Queen continued the practice supposing that she was legally authorized to do so.

240. If exceptional, does it not lead us to conclude that, notwithstanding the known wishes and influence of the Queen, she was unable to bring about a practice which was found to give so much offence to large classes of society?—I think that she found that in that, and many other ritual practices she was obliged to give way to the Puritanical feeling of the time, which militated equally against Archbishop Parker's endeavours to provide every decent conformity to the regulations of the Prayer Book, which he had great difficulty in enforcing, and could not fully enforce after all.

241. You have quoted, in support of your views respecting the practice and opinions of some of our eminent divines, the assertions of opponents and satirists; do you think that the opponents and satirists are witnesses on whose testimony we can rely?—To a great extent. Their statements were perhaps exaggerated; but there must have been some cause for so much remark on the subject. If the offence had not been given, the complaints would not have existed.

242. (Rev. H. Venn.) May I ask you, in continuation of the question that has just been put to you, whether you have read Archbishop Laud's own answer to the charges against him?—Some time ago. I have read a good part of his answer, but I think he fully admits and justifies a great deal that was alleged against him.

243. Are you aware that he denies the truth of the greater part of them?—I am not aware that he denies anything in regard to the charges with respect to the altar candles. I think he may have said that the statements were exaggerated, the same as Bishop Cosin did, but I cannot at this moment refer to the passages, nor have I read them very recently, therefore I cannot speak definitely upon them.

244. You have probably compared together those publications of Prynne in a general way, and the way in which Laud met those charges?—I have compared the attacks upon Laud by Prynne, Burton, and others, and Laud's speech, which he made in the Star Chamber at the Censure of Bastwick, Burton, and Prynne. The points he takes up are principally the position of the Holy Table, i.e., "altarwise at the upper end of the chancel," and what was then called the adoration towards the altar, which he very strenuously defends, and quotes the precedent of the Knights of the Garter, and others who had done it all along. He quotes Bishop Jewel in defence of it. I think the candles were not mentioned.

245. He mentions those as the two ceremonies which he, if allowed, would introduce?—Those were specifically mentioned. I do not think that Laud in that speech refers to candlesticks. At all events, Laud does not take any notice of any attack respecting them. He dwells only on certain specific points, adoration towards the altar, the position of the altar; and I think there may be some other minor things.

246. And the rails?—Yes. But the kneeling at the altar and the position of the altar were objected to as strongly as the candles.

247. I understand you are not prepared to say that Laud ever admitted the charge that he introduced lights upon the altar?—I am not prepared to say that he admitted it; but he quotes, as I stated, the authority of the King's chapel for his own practice, and he quotes Bishop Andrewes as his example on these points. So far he does defend the use of the candles.

248. I do not quite see what you mean. You say he does not, and then that he does?—He certainly quotes, as I have stated, the authority of the King's Chapel and of Bishop Andrewes.*

249. I think I understood from you that you consider the right to put candles upon the altar arises from the Injunctions of 1547?—Yes.

250. Do you recollect whether these were before an act of uniformity or not?—Before.

251. Therefore they were before there was any rubric?—They were before the introduction of the first Book.

252. Are you aware that after that first Book was introduced there were other royal Injunctions issued in 1549?—Archbishop Cranmer issued, not Injunctions, but Articles of inquiry founded upon the Injunctions of 1547, in which he asks whether the two candles remain.

253. I am not alluding to that; I am alluding to what were sometimes called "Articles of Royal Visitation," issued in 1549?—I believe there is some doubt as to the time when they were issued; I think they were issued later, and not in the second year of Edward VI.

254. Do you recollect those Injunctions?—I am not certain that I do recollect any undoubted Royal Injunctions of 1549.

255. And that there are these words in them "Item for an uniformity: that no minister do counterfeit the Popish mass;" and then it goes through a great many particulars; "or setting any light upon the Lord's board at any time"?—Yes; I believe it has been argued by the present Lord Chancellor that it might not refer to that distinct practice; that it might refer to the practice of putting candles on and off the Holy Table during celebration.

256. Your attention has been drawn to this?—Yes, I have noticed it; I remember it.

257. And therefore, prima facie, it requires the removal of the lights?—I think it need not refer to that particular custom of using the two lights at the celebration.

258. You think you must give some interpretation to this in order to get rid of what appears a direct royal prohibition?—I cannot say that it was so at that time. It was later than the second year of Edward VI., whatever authority it might have, which I am not at this moment disposed to say, because I have not thoroughly gone into the matter.

259. I will read the next few lines. "And finally to use no other ceremonies than are appointed in the King's Book of Common Prayer"?—Yes.

260. It is clear, therefore, that it was published after the King's Book of Common Prayer?—Yes.

261. The former Injunctions being before the King's Book was out, and this is after the King's Book was out?—In the fourth year at least.

262. You are aware that these matters, as you stated, were very much debated in the time of the Charleses?—Yes.

263. Do you recollect that it was a common expression among some of the Church authorities, as against the Puritans, that they were accustomed to say that the Church had reserved only three ceremonies, which they called the three "innocent" ceremonies?—I am not aware of any specific statement of the kind. I know that there were three or more ceremonies which were very much objected to.

264. I am now asking, on the other hand, whether those three were defended?—They were generally imposed, I apprehend, and the others were not.

265. Do you recollect what those three ceremonies were?—One would be the cross in baptism; then, I suppose, kneeling at the rails; and the ring in marriage. There were other things that the Puritans objected to very strongly as well.

266. Those were the three ceremonies which the defenders of our ritual maintained?—Yes, but not those only.

267. Perhaps you recollect the name of Bishop Morton?—Yes.

268. And that he wrote a book entitled "A Treatise on the Three innocent Ceremonies of the Church of England"?—I do not remember the book by that name.

269. If the lights on the altar had been then contended for by Bishop Morton, or any of those parties who defended that, there would have been more than three ceremonies?—There were undoubtedly more ceremonies objected to than those.

270. Defended as ceremonies of the Church of England?—There were other ceremonies or observances objected to, which were equally ceremonies of the Church of England, such as the use of godfathers and godmothers.

271. Those are not ceremonies?—No, not exactly; but, for instance, the bowing at the Holy Name.

272. My argument is that when Bishop Morton published a tract on the three ceremonies, and defended them as the only three the Church of England adopted, it was excluding lights on the altar?—Then it equally excluded the surplice.

273. What is not a ceremony?—It was deemed so; strictly so, neither is the other. One is but if not of the clergy, the other is an ornament of the church.

274. When we come to later days, to the Savoy Conference, to which you have alluded, might into discussion of the subject of lights then being brought on discussion?—I am not aware of anything particular on the point.

275. You are not aware of this remark which Baxter makes:—"Dr. Bates urged Dr. Gunning, "that on the same reasons they so imposed the cross and surplice they might bring in holy water, lights, and abundance of such ceremonies of Rome which we have cast out"?—Dr. Gunning, I think, said "the more the better" or something of that kind.

276. "And so I think we ought to have had more and not fewer, if we do well." Therefore Dr. Bates takes it for granted that lights were cast out?—Well, that I cannot say.

277. And Dr. Gunning allows that they were, and only regrets it?—That depends, perhaps, upon what lights were referred to.

278. I think there cannot be a doubt in your mind as to what is meant by "lights"?—The altar lights had been in use prior to the Rebellion certainly.

279. However, you recollect this?—Yes.

280. And as far as Dr. Bates, Richard Baxter, and Dr. Gunning go, they all allowed that lights were cast out?—Yes.

281. You mentioned Mr. Stapleton and his work, a Roman Catholic work, attacking our Prayer Book?—Yes.

282. Are you aware whether any answer was given to that?—I am not prepared to say.

283. It would make a strong case if an answer were given to it saying, "We have cast them out"?—Yes; but the fact was unquestioned at the time, that Elizabeth did burn altar lights, and it is confirmed by other statements which we have.

284. The Church of England was reproached for not burning lights as the sovereign did?—"Protestants" were so.*

285. The answer to that is what you would like to find?—Yes, I am not acquainted with that.

286. Do you remember in the case of Jewel that anything of the same kind was said by his opponent Harding?—I am not aware that there is.

287. Because Harding charged the same thing, and Jewel answered him. Jewel's answer was, "We have cast them out."?—Yes (spoken doubtfully).†

288. (Dr. Payne Smith.) Allusion has just been made to the Articles of 1549. Those, I think, followed the publication of the first Prayer Book of King Edward, do they not? At all events, they were subsequent?—Yes, certainly.

289. And their object, in fact, was to amend the previous Injunctions of King Edward?—I presume so, but I am not aware of the authority under which they were issued. I think there is some doubt upon it.

290. They are called "Articles to be followed and "observed according to the King's Majesty's Injunctions and proceedings." The first is "that all parsons, vicars, and curates omit in the reading of the injunctions all such as make mention of the Popish Mass or chantries, or candles upon the altar, or any other such thing." Do you not think it follows from that that the king abolished the previous authorities for having lights upon the high altar?—Admitting that, for the sake of argument,—I would say then that the authority had been in existence before, namely, in the second year; and that we have nothing to do with what took place after the second year. This was subsequent to the second year, therefore, the fact of their having been abolished by authority, if it were so, after the second year, shows that they were existing, by authority in the second year.

291. There is here an authority for the disuse?—There is very little doubt that they were prohibited by some episcopal Injunctions, at a subsequent period to the time of their first introduction, but not during the second year, and we find from the Inventories, that the candlesticks were allowed to remain in a great number of instances up to the fifth or sixth year of Edward the Sixth; and in fact up to the putting forth of the second Prayer Book.

292. Still, passing over your argument, it would bear on the meaning of the present rubric, as to what things were retained. If there be proof here that these things had been abolished, of course they could not very well be the things spoken of in the present rubric as being retained? At all events, that may be rubric?—I do not lay any stress on the used as an argument in this sense. I think the rubric word "retained" in this sense. I think the rubric binds us to use the same ornaments as were "in this Church of England" in the second year of Edward the Sixth, and that anything done subsequently to that year has nothing to do with the question. The words "shall be retained" may as reasonably be understood in a prospective as in a retrospective sense.*

293. Would not these Articles throw light on the Prayer Book of Edward the Sixth in that place?—I think not, at the time of its issue. They may have been put forth afterwards to amend it perhaps, or to interfere with it in some way in preparation for the second Book.

294. I think your evidence then goes on to refer to the use of the candlesticks by Queen Elizabeth as an authority for them;—did not Queen Elizabeth her Injunctions of 1559 expressly abolish candles and rolls of wax?—That is almost word for word in the Injunctions of Edward the Sixth, which include the order for the altar lights.

295. She does not include it; she mentions the abolition of candlesticks?—Certainly. I do not think that has any weight, because it is only copied from the Injunction of Edward the Sixth.

296. Edward the Sixth's Injunction had an exception, and this had not?—Yes, she leaves out the exception.

297. The exception is omitted, and it is made more general?—Yes.†

298. Is it not the case that at the commencement of Queen Elizabeth's reign it was uncertain in what way her own feelings were; with respect, for instance, to the evidence you gave of Sampson, was he not a man of rather extreme opinions?—Yes.

299. And one who even suffered imprisonment rather than wear a surplice?—Yes.

300. And even was deprived of the deanery of Christchurch?—Yes.

301. Would not the evidence which you gave as to his letter to Peter Martyr rather be the alarm that he felt during the time when the Queen's personal feelings were uncertain, than anything founded on fact?—We have the authority of Cosin for stating * Vide (V.), letter, Appendix.

† Vide (W.), letter, ibid.

* Vide (X.), letter, Appendix.

† Vide (Y.), letter, ibid.

that the candles were retained in her chapel during her reign.

302. Would not the explanation of this letter of Sampson to Peter Martyr be that the Queen's position being at first uncertain, and nobody knowing which side she would take, he was alarmed?—He might have been alarmed, but he was alarmed at the ceremonies that were to be imposed upon the clergy who were going to officiate.

303. Is it not the fact that the first indication of the Queen's feeling was when the Bishop of Carlisle, Dr. Oglethorpe, was about to celebrate the Communion before her?—Yes.*

304. And up to that time there was great alarm on the part of the Protestants as to what course she might take, which would explain his feeling?—Yes.

305. What time did you say was the usual time for matins and evensong?—Matins would be early in the day, I apprehend, and evensong would be in the afternoon.

306. You think that matins would not be so early, as that lights would be wanted for the purpose of giving light?—Not necessarily.

307. You referred to Bishop Cosin and the accusation as to there being an immense number of candles at Candlemas. Was he not also accused of having service at 6 o'clock in the morning?—He had an early service.

308. Would not lights be wanted for the natural purpose of giving light?—Yes, but not on the altar.

309. That was one of the accusations against him?—Yes.

310. In fact, generally, were the services very early?—Yes.

311. Does not Strype mention that the consecration of Archbishop Parker was between five and six in the morning?—I am not aware.

312. You are the editor of the Hierurgia Anglicana?—Yes.

313. It is quoted there?—I cannot remember everything that is in the book.

314. Is it not also the case that Archbishop Parker in his visitations ordered the service to be by 8 o'clock in the morning?—That, I apprehend, would not require candle light, but of course circumstances have altered since then.

315. Is it not mentioned that Archbishop Laud consecrated a church at 9 o'clock in the morning?—I cannot state exactly.

316. Generally, I think, the services were early?—They were early undoubtedly.

317. And the same with regard to evensong?—Yes, undoubtedly.

318. In the first case you mentioned, after the sermon was over, at 5 o'clock in the afternoon, they then proceeded to evensong?—Yes.

319. So that, in fact, the lights may have been required both at matins and evensong for the natural purpose of giving light?—They might possibly; not necessarily.

320. They might have been retained for that purpose?—Yes; but there was no service at the Holy Table that would require lights there in particular.

321. With regard to the baptism of the child of Lady Cecile, does not it say, not merely that they were lights, but lights of a certain kind of wax?—Virgin wax.

322. Does not that rather prove that the word "lights" there means candles?—I do not think it need prove it.

323. It mentions what they were made of?—Yes.

324. A light of virgin wax, as long as it was of wax, must be a taper?—Yes.

325. Consequently, so far as the literal construction goes, it suggests that they were tapers?—Wax candles are called tapers; I believe the technical term for candles on the altar would be "altar tapers;" they are usually tapering. †

326. That is no proof that they were lighted, their being called lights of virgin wax?—If I am not mistaken, candles are specified as well in other parts of the statement.

327. I think the word "lights" continually occurs all through?—It does occur, but I am satisfied that service was late in the evening from the account.

328. And something exceptional?—Yes. There were other times at which the same thing was done. I could have alleged other examples where there were ceremonies in which the candles were used on the altar, though not specifically stated to be lighted.

329. In the third part of the Homily "Against the peril of Idolatry," are not candles spoken of as leading to idolatry, and therefore is it not the wholesome doctrine of our Church that candles are not to be used?—It may be so; if so, it is in the same category with organs and choral services, for both are mentioned as leading on to idolatry in, I think, the same Homily.*

330. At that time both were disapproved of?—Possibly.

331. And, therefore, if restored, it is a restoration and not a continuance of observance?—Yes. †

332. (Rev. T. W. Perry.) I think you expressed an opinion that the Puritans' objection was generally to lighting the candles?—Yes.

333. Do you remember anything to show that the Puritans thought it a very absurd thing to have candles unlighted?—Yes.

334. Can you give us any instance of it?—After the Restoration there were one or two instances. I will supply that afterwards. ‡

335. I would ask you do you remember a case of Hickerlingill?—Yes. [The following is the passage:—"For what signification of light can this ceremony be, any more than a stick? A candle unlighted is no more a significant ceremony of light than a stick, before the fire touches it, is a firebrand."—Ceremony Monger. Ed. 1693, p. 80.]

336. You referred on two or three occasions to what was done in the cathedrals, and some of the Commissioners asked you whether you thought the cathedrals were to be taken as patterns for the parish churches; and there was an objection taken, on the part of some of the Commissioners, that they might not be patterns to the parish churches. Can you produce any evidence at all to show that the cathedrals were intended to be patterns for the parish churches?—Laud makes that statement. §

337. Are you at all acquainted with Elizabeth's letter to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of the 22nd January 1561?—Yes.

338. Do you remember this passage, that they they were to take care "diligently to provide that whatsoever ye shall devise, either in this or any other like point, to the reformation of this disorder, that the order and reformation be of one sort and fashion, and that the things prescribed may accord in one form, as nigh as they may; specially, that in all collegiate and cathedral churches, where cost may be more probable, i.e. allowed, one manner be used; and in all parish churches also, either the same, or at the least the like, and one manner throughout our realm?" Cardwell Doc. Ann. I. p. 294. Do you not think that passage would go very much to show that cathedrals were intended to be patterns?—Yes.

339. Will you tell us, as shortly as you can, on what ground you yourself would defend the use of lights?—On the Injunction of Edward the Sixth, in the first instance; the interrogation of Cranmer in his Articles of Visitation in the second year of Edward the Sixth; the ornament rubric and the continued use of candles and candlesticks on the Holy

Table from that time, more or less, to the present day, the traditional use, whether lighted or unlighted. I cannot conceive that candles would have been there at all if there had not been a prior use of them, as lights in the first instance, founded on the Injunction.

340. Are you aware of any other authority which you consider to have the force of law at the present time?—Bishop Cosin refers to certain Provincial Constitutions, “such as have not been repealed, standing then in the second year of King Edward “VI.,” as being in full force, by virtue of this [ornament] rubric and Act of Parliament and we are to consult them, he says, for the authority for lights specifically.

341. You referred on three or four occasions to the practice in Queen Elizabeth’s chapel. It was thought by some of the Commissioners that that practice could not be taken as an authority for what was done in the parish churches any more than the cathedrals; but do you think that the Queen was likely to do an illegal thing?—Certainly not.* We have Bishop Cox’s statement to the contrary, as to her great particularity in the observance of the law, which I can quote. Cox, Bishop of Ely, in a letter dated February 12th, 1571, writes, with reference to its being supposed that she only carried out those things for her own pleasure, and not in submission to the law, “This is not only false, but injurious, both to the Queen and the ministers of the Word, to wit, that we humour Her Royal Highness, and make her more decided in ordering everything according to her own pleasure. But far be anyone from suspecting anything of the kind in so godly and religious a personage, who has always been so exceedingly scrupulous in deviating even in the slightest degree from the laws prescribed.”

342. Do you remember any passage of Bishop Jewel’s to that effect?—No. [The passage is as follows:—“But this woman, excellent as she is, and earnest in the cause of religion, notwithstanding she desires a thorough change as early as possible, cannot, however, be induced to effect such change without the sanction of law.” Jewel to P. Martyr, Lond., Apr. 14, 1559; Zurich Letters, No. 6, 1st series, p. 17.]

343. You referred to Dr. Donne’s sermon about the use of lights on Candlemas day; it seems to have been thought that that would be no proof of the use of altar lights. Is there anything to show at what time of the day those lights were used?—Not that I am aware of.

344. Then they might have been used at the celebration?—There is nothing to prohibit it that I see, but still I apprehend that the custom was that the lights were brought in by the hands of the people. That is what I understand by the allusion there.

345. But the lights might have been used in the morning service as well as in the evening service?—There is nothing in Donne’s sermon to contradict it, because he is not defending the use of lights to give light, but when used for a symbolical purpose, and therefore I suppose the lights were used at any rate, in the day time.

346. Supposing the lights were used in the morning and there was a celebration, then probably there might have been two lights on the altar?—There might have been.

347. It would not prove that there were not?—It would not prove that there were not.

348. What do you understand to be the general objection that is now taken to lighted candles; what do you understand to be the popular objection?—That they have something to do with transubstantiation; with which they have no connection.

349. Does one ground of complaint appear to be the absurdity of lighting candles in the daytime?—Yes.

350. Then it would be equally absurd to light them at an afternoon service in the daytime?—Certainly.

351. With reference to a question that was asked you about the ornaments and ceremonies being shut up in the four corners of the Prayer Book, can you give any particular instance, anything like a crucial test, that that could not have been the case in the first Prayer Book of Edward the Sixth?—The linen cloth is not mentioned.

352. So that if it were illegal to use anything that was not mentioned, the linen cloth would then have been illegal?—Yes.

353. There can be no doubt that it was used?—None.

354. With regard to the case of Sampson’s objecting to officiate before the Queen on account of her having the vestments, the lights, and the crucifix, you were asked whether that went to show that they did officiate, or only that they might be going to officiate; do you think there can be any doubt that they were going to officiate, and that it was the custom so to officiate?—I think there can be no doubt.

355. Do you remember the year when that occurred.—1560.

356. Then it was soon after Elizabeth’s accession?—Yes, in her third year.

357. When all the old ornaments, unless abolished, would be in use, having been restored by Mary. Mary restored all the old service?—Yes.

358. Therefore it is a fair presumption that in the Queen’s chapel the service was going on as it had been before?—Yes, in regard to the altar lights, cross, and vestments.

359. It was not likely, you think, that for an occasion these three bishops would have been required to officiate?—No. I apprehend it was the custom at the time.*

360. With reference to the case of Prince Charles’s chapel at Madrid, do you think it is likely that the King wished to set before the people at Madrid what was the legal and proper service of the Church of England at that time, or do you think that it was merely, as has been suggested, to win the affections of the Princess?—Collier states distinctly it was that a face of the Church of England might appear and the worship be kept up in the Prince’s apartment at Madrid, that the King gave the chaplains above mentioned the following instructions,—that the face of the Church of England might appear,—that is, as I understand, should be displayed there as it was at home.

361. In the case of Smart v. Cosin, which was referred to, do you remember any judgment that was given upon it, by Judge Yelverton, I think?—I think Bishop Cosin states distinctly that at one time Judge Yelverton had been opposed to his interpretation of the ornament rubric, but that afterwards Judge Yelverton had come to his conclusion on the subject.

362. Reference was made to various Visitation Articles, and you were asked the question whether lights, for example, were inquired for in these Visitation Articles: do you think it was very likely that, looking at the state of things at that time, the bishops would have inquired for them?—I think not; not at the Restoration.

363. Is not the general object of Visitation Articles to inquire whether they have in use such things as are absolutely essential and required by some strictly defined rubric or canon?—Certainly.

364. Therefore it was not very likely that the bishops would have inquired for lights which were not specifically mentioned in any law at that time, especially when there was so much neglect in other points?—I think so; and I find the expression “other church ornaments” used in the inquiries. The particular articles are not specified.†

365. For example now, in those Visitation Articles do you happen to remember whether there are any of them that do not enquire for the use of the cope ?

* Vide (F2), letter, Appendix.

† Vide (H2), letter, Appendix.

—Yes.

366. Therefore the mere omission of an inquiry would not prove that the thing was unlawful?—No, certainly not.

367. With regard to a question which you were asked about the meaning of the lights before the Sacrament, you have given some answers in reference to that; do you think that the Vistation Articles of Cranmer in 1548 go to show that it meant the two lights upon the altar?—I think so, certainly.

368. Have you any evidence at all, or do you think there is any reason to believe, that two lights ever were used before the reserved Sacrament?—I have none, but the reverse.

369. Now with regard to the supposed Royal Injunctions and Royal Articles of 1549, are you aware whether they have any date at all attached to them?—I believe not; they have no date.

370. Is there any reason to believe that they are in existence anywhere now?—I am not aware of it.

371. So that probably they can hardly be taken as evidence?—They rest on the sole authority of Burnet, if I am not mistaken.

372. You were asked, with regard to the case of Dr. Bates, whether his language did not imply that lighted candles had been got rid of in the Church of England, and whether Gunning's answer did not seem to assume that they were. When he said that they were cast out, do you think he might mean that they were cast out in fact, not necessarily that they were cast out in law?—I should infer so.

373. That is to say, that they had gone out of use entirely?—In practice they were gone out.

374. With regard to the Injunctions of 1547, to which Dr. Twiss referred, I should like to call your attention for a moment to that 28th Injunction, about which he asked you a question. You were asked whether that 28th Injunction did not order that all candlesticks should be taken away. But that Injunction refers, does it not, to monuments of superstition, and classes these candlesticks as being among the monuments of superstition?—Certainly.

375. Do you think that these Injunctions could be self-contradictory?—Certainly not.

376. Therefore is there any reason to suppose that the 28th Injunction militates against the 3rd Injunction?—Certainly not.

377. The 3rd Injunction also orders the monuments of superstition to be taken away, does it not?—Yes.

378. But it says that the candles, the two lights before the Sacrament, are to remain "for the signification that Christ is the very true Light of the world"?—Yes.

379. Therefore that Injunction did not intend to uphold superstition?—Certainly not.

380. Would you infer that the candlesticks which the 28th Injunction ordered to be taken away are those candlesticks, images, and shrines which the 3rd Injunction ordered to be taken away?—I should infer so.

381. Having, therefore, nothing to do with the two altar candlesticks?—Certainly not.

382. You were asked by Mr. Hubbard whether you think that incense stands upon the same ground as the altar lights, and I understood you to say, perhaps not quite the same?—Not so distinctly.

383. Have you paid attention to the 3rd Injunction of 1547 about images? It says there that "such images as . . . be or have been . . . or shall hereafter be censured unto they . . . shall . . . take down." Would not that imply that the practice of using incense in churches was to go on though the censuring of images was to cease?—Certainly that the censuring of images was to cease.*

384. Do you consider it to imply that censuring was to go on?—That it might imply as much.

385. (Dean of Westminster.) Have you any notion of the number of churches at this moment in which candles are lighted during the celebration of the Holy Communion, or at any other time, by daylight?—I should imagine several hundreds.

386. Do you imagine that that proves the legality of the practice at the present time?—It need not prove it.

387. Can you tell me, either from your reading or your experience, whether in former times or the present the lighting of candles during the celebration of the Holy Communion was deemed an essential part of the rite?—It seems from the very first, to have been considered part of the original institution; and the custom can be traced so very early, that some writers on Ritual have arrived at the conclusion that it is essential, not to the validity of course, but to the due celebration of the rite.

388. You would not, yourself, consider that it was essential?—Certainly not to its validity.

389. I think you spoke of there being no instance of the use of it since the Restoration?—I think there are examples of candles having been lighted on the altar, and probably in the day time, and at celebration.

390. In speaking of the Caroline period, therefore, in your evidence, you meant not Charles II. but Charles I.?—Generally speaking, what would perhaps be called the Laudian period, but there are later examples.

391. With regard to incense, have you in the course of your reading met with any instances of the persons to whom incense was offered or used in church?—I have no example of censuring persons.

392. (Bishop of St. David's.) Do you happen to be acquainted, either from personal observation or from your reading, with the practice of the Roman Catholic Church as to the ceremonies they observe on Candlemas day?—I have never witnessed them.

393. Do you happen to be aware of the fact that on Candlemas day, in the Roman Catholic Church, where those ceremonies may be supposed to be most strictly observed, that is, in the Pope's chapel at Rome, no additional candle is lighted during the celebration of mass, and the only peculiar ceremony of the day consists in the presenting of unlighted candles to the Pope to receive his benediction; that then the mass is concluded; and after that a ceremony takes place of a procession in an adjoining apartment with lighted candles; but that is the occasion on which the candles are lighted, and not at all during the celebration of the mass?—Yes (spoken doubtfully).

394. Whether you are acquainted with that or not, supposing for a moment that it be the fact, what resemblance does that profusion of candles which I understand were lighted at St. Paul's, bear either to this ceremony of the Church of Rome, or to any other ceremony that you are acquainted with? Do you understand from Dr. Donne's sermon that those candles were lighted during the celebration of the Holy Communion?—There is no evidence one way or the other. I do not infer it.

395. Then I would ask you, if Dr. Donne had been himself asked by what authority or under what law, or by what right, he had this profusion of lighted candles on that day, what answer do you conceive he either would or might have given to that question?—I suppose it may have been a traditional custom that had been handed down; only usage, I should imagine.

396. Still, that would have an origin if it had been handed down from the pre-Reformation times?—It may have been possibly handed down from the pre-Reformation times.

397. They would have followed the practice of the Roman Catholic Church, it is to be presumed, which would not be the case if these candles were lighted during the celebration of the Holy Communion?—No. It might have been a usage which had been retained, perhaps, in a very mutilated form. I do not know.

398. If it were, according to such a tradition, derived from the pre-Reformation Church, those candles would not have been lighted during the Holy Communion, but would have simply served the purpose of some general illumination afterwards, and, therefore, had no reference at all to it?—Possibly; although they appear to have been burned for the reason assigned in the Injunction.

399. If so, those candles were lighted without any rule, law, or order, but merely at the pleasure of the dean of the cathedral; would not that be the case?—Yes.

400. He would not have conceived that in causing these candles to be lighted he was enforcing any rubric, or the observance of any law, would he?—I imagine not.

401. I understood you to say, in answer to a question of Lord Beauchamp's, that Laud's great object was to restore the observance of the rubric, and to enforce the law, or something to that effect?—Yes.

402. I do not understand from what evidence that appeared to be the case. Did your answer rest upon any evidence, or was it only a conclusion of your own from your general idea of Laud's character and conduct?—He expressly states that his object was simply to carry out the law of the Church.*

403. In what particular does he support the law?—I do not know that I could refer to any particular at this time, but when charged with introducing innovations, he throws himself back upon the authority of the law of the Church, and deprecates the idea of being thought to introduce novelties. His whole objection was against that charge. He denied it altogether.

404. Why should he be entitled to greater credit for that wish to enforce the law than Dr. Donne for lighting these candles, which it appears you do not think were enjoined, if indeed authorized or sanctioned by any law?—I do not see, on the face of Dr. Donne's statement, that he had anything to do with the lights beyond finding them there; and referring to them in his sermon, he says, "as your custom celebrates it with many lights." He is speaking to the people who were there.

405. Those candles were lighted either according to law or not according to law, and not merely at his own pleasure. If one dignitary of the Church does that, have we any ground to suppose that another might not do the like?—So many things have been done that are contrary to law, on the strength of past usage, that I do not think that would warrant anything one way or the other.

406. You have cited many complaints made by the Puritan party against Laud's proceedings, and those I think of one of the other bishops; did you understand that those complaints of those proceedings were made as being peculiar to those parties, or as being a sample of the proceedings which were common among the bishops of that day?—As common among the bishops of that day, particularly, of course, those that Laud himself appointed. He appointed a great many during his time. They were called his "creatures"—Bishop Wren and others.†

407. Did the language of those complainants warrant that conclusion, that they were considered as samples of the ordinary proceedings of the bishops of that day?—I think so, certainly of the Caroline bishops.

408. You cited instances which in your opinion prove that?—Yes, and I can cite others; they talk of "our bishops" without exception, and even good Bishop Hall, though he was Calvinistically inclined, was afterwards persecuted as severely as were his colleagues.

409. There is a letter of Cranmer's, of the date of 1547, in which there is this passage, "This is to advertise your lordship that my Lord Protector's Grace, with the advice of others the King's Majesty's Council, for certain considerations them thereunto moving, hath fully resolved that no candles should be borne upon Candlemas day." Were you aware of that?—I do not remember it.

Adjourned to Wednesday next at Twelve o'clock.

[The following Supplementary Letter of the Rev. J. Fuller Russell, and NOTES upon it by a Member of the Commission (Sir J. Napier), are here added for the sake of the Historical and other Information contained in them.]

DEAR SIR, Greenhithe, 7 Dec. 1867.

I HAVE the honour to acknowledge your communication of yesterday's date, and hasten to avail myself of the courteous permission which, in consideration of the short notice of attendance for examination which I received, the Royal Commissioners on Ritual have given me to send "any additional information in the form of a letter or memorandum to be added as an appendix to" my "evidence." This, in order to confine my supplementary statements within the narrowest limits practicable, I proceed to do in the form following:—

To my answer to question 4, and after the words "finishing in 1848," insert:—

A. [Before giving any specific examples, I beg to mention the Royal Injunction of 1547 (1 Edw. VI.), viz., "And shall suffer . . . only two lights upon the high altar, before the Sacrament, which, for the signification that Christ is the very true Light of the world, they shall suffer to remain still." "These being termed lights," says Dr. Fuller, "shows that they were not lumina cæca, "but burning." (Church History, p. 374, fol. 1655.) Cranmer in his Visitation Articles of 1548 (2 Edw. VI.) inquires in the words of the Injunction, "Whether they suffer . . . only two lights upon the high altar." The Injunction accords with a provincial Constitution of Archbishop Reynolds, in 1322 (confirmed by the unrepealed statutes 25 Hen. VIII. c. 19., and 35 Hen. VIII. c. 16.), viz., "Let two candles, or one at the least, be lighted at the time of Mass." (Johnson's Canons, vol. ii. p. 338); and Lyndwood, chaplain to Archbishop Chicheley, and afterwards (in 1442) Bishop of St. David's, commenting upon this Constitution, says, "Note, that the candles to be burned at the celebration of the Mass must be of wax rather than any other material. For the candle so burning signifieth Christ Himself, Who is the brightness of the eternal light." (Lib. iii. fol. lxxii., Paris, 1506.) Bishop Cosin writes that "in the latter end of King Edward's time they used ['the two lights'] in Scotland itself, as appears from Calvin's Epistle to Knox, and his fellow-reformers there, anno 1554 (Ep. 206), where he takes exception against them for following the custom of England." (Notes in Nicholls's Commentary, p. 17 fol. 1712; Hierurgia, p. 7.) This incidental evidence in regard to the custom of England at this date is given by Calvin as follows:—"Some of my friends have complained that you press on them so particularly the Anglican ceremonies, so that you are very certainly too much attached to your country. Certainly lights, crosses, and these kind of trifles, no one, I think, can doubt, flow from superstition." To proceed to specific examples.]

In my answer to question 10, between the words "except that," and "for the furniture of the chapel," insert:—

B. [as appears from a contemporary engraving in the British Museum, two lighted candles, and two chalices with patens, between them, stood on the altar (prepared for celebration, and placed, apparently, with its ends east and west, in the midst of the choir,) at his coronation,† and that]

In my evidence given after my answer to question 11, between the words "unless they were lighted" and "the lighting seems principally," add:—

C. [Or used, at all events, as directed in the Injunction of 1547, ritually and symbolically (as, e.g., by the Early Church during the service hours both of light and darkness), and as part of the pre-Reformation furniture of the altar.]

In my answer to question 16, after the quotation which ends with the words "Communion Table," add:—

D. ["Two ordinances of the Lords and Commons, assembled in Parliament, for the speedy demolishing of all organs, images, and all manner of superstitious monuments in all cathedral or parish churches and chapels throughout the kingdom, &c., 4to. 1644," (reprinted in The Harleian Miscellany, vol. v. pp. 440-442, 8vo. 1810,) ordain "That in all and every the churches and chapels, as well cathedral and collegiate as other churches and chapels, and other usual places of public prayer, authorized by law within this realm of England and dominion of Wales, all altars and tables of stone shall, before the first day of November in the year of our Lord God 1643 be utterly taken away and demolished; and also all Communion Tables removed from the east end of every such church, chapel, or place of public prayer, and chancel of the same, and shall be placed in some other fit and convenient place or places of the body of the said church, chapel, or other place of public prayer; or of the body of the chancel of every such church, chapel, or other such place of public prayer. And that all rails whatsoever, which have been erected near to, before, or about any altar or Communion Table in any of the said churches or chapels, or any such place of public prayer as aforesaid, shall, before the said day, be likewise taken away. . . . And that all tapers, candlesticks, and basins shall, before the said day, be removed and taken away from the Communion Table in every such church, chapel, or other place of public prayer; and neither the same nor any such like shall be used about the same, at any time after the said day. . . . And be it further ordained, that all and every such removal of the said altars, tables of stone, Communion Tables, tapers, candlesticks, and basins, crucifixes and crosses, images and pictures as aforesaid, taking away of the said rails . . . shall be done and performed . . . in all and every of the said parish churches or chapels, or usual places of public prayer belonging to any parish, by the churchwarden or churchwardens of every such parish for the time being respectively." Every candid reader of these ordinances must, I think, admit that they convey the impression that, at the date of their promulgation, tapers and candlesticks were commonly to be found in the churches "within this realm."]

In my evidence following my answer to question 16, after the quotation ending "lighted there at evening prayer," add:—

E. [About 1682, a Nonconformist inquires, "But does any man dare speak against bowing and ducking, and cringing to the east, to the altar, towards the lighted candles?" (The Black Nonconformist, Hickeringill's Works, vol. ii. p. 87.) In the British Museum is preserved a large contemporary print, engraved by Allard from a painting or drawing by R. de Hooge, of the coronation of William and Mary in Westminster Abbey in 1689, in which twenty tapers are figured as burning on the altar, and eight upon the re-table. In a medallion at the side of the view of the coronation their majesties are represented receiving the blessed Sacrament at the altar so ornamented. There is not any reason for impugning the general accuracy of these representations.]

To my answer to question 39, add:—

F. [There is nothing in the volume which contains the sermon to show the year in which it was preached, but it may be concluded from internal evidence that it was delivered in St. Paul's Cathedral before the civic authorities. I infer this from the language with which it concludes: "That as this noble city hath justly acquired the reputation and the testimony of all who have had occasion to consider their dealings in that kind, that they deal most faithfully and most justly, most providently, in all things which are committed to their trust for pious uses from others, not only in a full employment of that which was given, but in an improvement thereof, and then an improvement of that improvement to the same pious use, so every man in his particular may propose to himself some of those blessed examples which have risen amongst yourselves, and follow that, and exceed that, that as your lights are torches and not petty candles, and your torches better than other torches, so he also may be a larger example to others than others have been to him, for herein is your Father glorified if you bear much fruit, and that it is the end of all that we all do, that men seeing it may glorify our Father which is in heaven." (LXXX. Sermons, &c., p. 86, fol. 1640.) That Donne's sermon was preached in St. Paul's Cathedral before the Lord Mayor, &c., may be also inferred from the following statement:—"Feby. 2 [1559-60], being Candlemas Day, . . . in the afternoon, according to old custom, the mayor and aldermen and all the crafts went to St. Paul's, and there heard a sermon." (Nichols's Progresses of Queen Elizabeth, vol. i. p. 82, 4to. 1823.) Candlemas was one of the four great feasts on which it was customary for the Lord Mayor and corporation to go to evensong at St. Paul's and

To my answer to question 43, add:—

G. [Bishop Sparrow says:—"The usual hour for the solemnity of this service was anciently, and so should be, nine of the clock morning." Rationale upon the Book of Common Prayer, p. 244, 12mo. 1668.]

To my answer to question 48, add:—

H. [e.g., Laud says, in reference to the altarwise position of the Holy Table:—"And though it stood in most parish churches the other way, yet whether there be not more reason the parish churches should be made conformable to the cathedral and mother churches, than the cathedrals to them, I leave to any reasonable man to judge. . . . May the Holy Table stand this way in the King's chapel or cathedrals, or bishops' chapels, and not elsewhere? Surely, if it be decent and fit for God's service, it may stand so (if authority please) in any church. But if it advance or usher in any superstition and popery, it ought to stand so in none." A speech delivered in the Star Chamber on Wednesday, the 14th of June 1637, &c., pp. 53, 55, 4to. 1637.]

To my answer to question 57, add:—

I. [More correctly, two sentences of Holy Scripture to be said by the chaplains at the presentation of candlesticks, viz., Ps. cxix. 105, and Ps. xxxvi. 9. Both these texts have reference to the symbolical signification of altar lights.]

To my answer to question 70, add:—

J. [Bishop Sparrow, in allusion to this practice, cites the words of St. Bernard, viz.:—"We go in procession two by two, carrying candles in our hands, which are lighted, not at a common fire, but a fire first blessed in the church by the bishop. . . . And from this usage and the many lights set up in the church this day, it is called Candelaria or Candlemas." (Rationale, pp. 231, 232, 12mo. 1668.) The learned and candid Roman Catholic ritualist, Dr. Rock, remarks:—"The Purification, a festival common to the Latin and Greek churches, is rendered peculiar by the blessing of wax tapers, which are carried burning by those who form the procession, which takes place afterwards. The symbolical meaning attributed to this ceremony is that the faithful should, with the holy Simeon, recognize in the infant Jesus the salvation which the Lord had prepared before 'the face of all people.'—A Light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of the people of Israel." (Hierurgia, or the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, vol. ii. pp. 593, 594, 8vo. 1832.) The Rationale which was set forth by authority cir. 1541, to explain the meaning and justify the usage of certain rites and ceremonies of the Church, says, "Bearing candles on Candlemas Days is a very good usage in memory of Christ, the spiritual Light, of whom Simeon did prophesy, as is read in the Church this day." Collier's Eccl. Hist. vol. ii. p. 197, fol. 1714.]

To my answer to question 92, add:—

K. [And in accordance with this admission they affirm the legality of the credence or side table (an "ornament" which was denounced, in common with lights, incense, &c., as a Popish innovation, by the Caroline Puritans), and also of embroidered altar cloths, and frontals of the ecclesiastical colours.]

To my answer to question 98, add:—

L. [Or, at any rate, I submit, for the symbolical reason in the Injunction, and not for the purpose of affording necessary light.]

To my answer to question 104, add:—

M. [In fulfilment of this promise, I have made some investigation on this point, and I find that there is distinct evidence that they did, as far as one bishop is concerned, e.g., "And so much," says Strype, "these furnitures of her chapel disgusted some good men, that one of her chief bishops (viz., Cox, bishop of Ely), being appointed to minister the Sacrament before her there, made it a matter of conscience to do it in a place which he thought so dishonoured by images; and could scarce be brought to officiate there, denying it a great while; and when he did it, it was with a trembling conscience, as he said, 'And to plead for himself, and to give his humble advice to the Queen, he wrote her a letter in a most submissive manner; acquainting her both with his conscience, that would not a great while permit him to minister in her chapel, namely, because the lights and cross remained.' (Annals, vol. i. part i. p. 260, 8vo. 1824.) Strype gives the letter in an appendix. Cox does not venture to deny or question the legality of the lights, and finishes his epistle as follows:—"Bear with me, most gracious Sovereign; for

"the tender mercy of God, force not my conscience so sore. Your highness knoweth, 'Qui facit contra conscientiam, edificat in gehennam.'"]

To my answer to question 145, add:—

N. [With the exception of the engraving of the coronation of James I.]

To my answer to question 146, add:—

O. [There are, in fact, at least two engravings of a later time in which the altar candles are represented as burning.* One (in the British Museum) is a prospect of the choir of St. Paul's on the General Thanksgiving, Dec. 31, 1706 (when Queen Anne and both Houses of Parliament were present), and a lighted candle is figured on the re-table of the altar. There are no other lights or candles, and only the south part of the Holy Table is portrayed. The other is a print of the marriage (to which I alluded from memory in my answer to question 147) of the Princess Anne to William Charles, Prince of Orange and Nassau, on March 14, 1733, in the Royal Chapel at St. James's. Tapers are figured as burning on the altar, which stands under a canopy. The marriage took place by candle light, but the altar lights were not needed to afford necessary light, as the chapel is represented as profusely illuminated by candles in chandeliers and sconces. Not improbably the Dean of the Royal chapels at that period agreed with his contemporary, Wheatley, who, after citing the Injunction of 1547, and the symbolical meaning of altar lights, adds:—"And these lights, used time out of mind in the Church, are still [in 1720] continued in most, if not all, cathedral and collegiate churches and chapels, so often as divine service is performed by candle light; and ought also, by this rubric, to be used in all parish churches and chapels at the same time." (A Rational Illustration of the Book of Common Prayer, p. 109, 8vo. 1741.) Thus, at the beginning of the last century, it was considered that the Injunction was sufficiently obeyed by lighting the altar tapers "so often as divine service is performed by candle light," and we may conclude that the tapers, when lighted at those times, were so lighted in compliance with a customary rule handed down from earlier days, and originally due to the Injunction. Even so recently as the beginning of the present century, viz., in 1807, in St. Paul's Cathedral were a pair of silver-gilt altar candlesticks, two feet nine inches high, with the inscription, In lumine tuo videbimus lumen. De tenebris vos vocavit in admirabile lumen suum. Sic luceat lux vestra coram hominibus. Malcolmi's Londinium, vol. iii. pp. 144, 145.]

To my answer to question 151, add:—

P. [The fact of Cox's objection to celebrate with lights, which I had forgotten, and the pictures of the coronation of James I. and of William and Mary, which I had not seen when I made the above reply, prompt me to demur to the last six words of that statement.]

To my answer to question 208, add:—

Q. [In York cathedral, in 1736, were "two silver candlesticks weighing fifty-three ounces," the gift of Lord Beaumont; and a writer in that year, records that "from All Saints to Candlemas the choir is illuminated at every service by seven large branches, besides a wax candle fixed at every stall. . . . These, with two large wax tapers for the altar, are all the lights commonly made use of. But on the vigils of particular holy days the four grand dignitaries of the church have each a branch of seven candles placed before them at their stalls." (Drake's Eboracum, p. 524, fol. 1736.) The branches were not more needed to afford light on the above vigils than on other days. They were consequently used ceremonially.]

To my answer to question 209, add:—

R. [An illustration of the above statement may be alleged an example of neglect in regard to an observance strictly enjoined by a rubric which was inserted in the Prayer Book in 1662, in accordance with the Scotch Liturgy and the first Book of Edward VI. viz., "The priest shall then [immediately before the prayer for the 'whole state of Christ's Church'] place upon the Table so much bread and wine, &c." "The new rule, we know," says Canon Robertson, "was exceedingly little heeded in the following times. Hickes (quoted in Tract 81, p. 275) writes that it was 'almost never since observed in cathedral or parochial churches. I say almost never, because I never knew or heard but of two or three persons, which is a very small number, who observed it.'" How shall we conform to the Liturgy of the Church of England? p. 201, 8vo. 1844.]

* I have ascertained since I made the above statement, that at p. 78, vol. vi. of Picart's Religious Ceremonies, fol. 1731-37, is a print of the Administration of the Holy Communion at St. Paul's, in which the altar candles are represented as burning.

To my answer to question 224, add:—

S. [I am informed that in the volume containing his minor works there are two sets of Articles to be inquired of by the churchwardens at the triennial visitation. I have not seen them.]

To my answer to question 235, add:—

T. [The two practices are widely different; the one consisting in burning wax candles on the altar at the time of celebration, the other in keeping a lamp or light burning continually before the reserved Sacrament.† Thomas Becon (who played his part in the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth) refers to both. "Pope Innocent the Third," he says, "bearing rule, Eustace, Abbot of Flare, came out of Normandy into England, and, among other devices, caused that light should bren [burn] alway in the churches before the little God's body." (Reliques of Rome, fol. 81, 12mo. 1563.) Concerning "candles burning at Mass," he writes, "Pope Gregory the First commanded that priests should have light at their Mass, and that there should be set upon the altar a candle, brenning all the mass time." (Fol. 141, Ibid.) In allusion to this usage, and describing what he had himself witnessed and probably practised, he says elsewhere:—"After all these things [the ceremonies; &c. of the Mass], ye truss up your trinkets, ye shut your book, ye fold up your corporas cloth, ye wind up your chalice, ye put off your fool's coat, your vestment, your stole, your fannel [maniple], your girdle, your alb, and your amice, ye put out the candle, and solemnly making courtesy to your God, that hangeth over the altar, ye trudge out of church." (The displaying of the Popish Mass Works, vol. ii. fol. lii. edit. of 1560.) The latter practice, of burning a lamp before the reserved Sacrament, is incidentally alluded to in a very rare book in my possession, written about 1529, by a chaplain or minor canon of some cathedral. Censuring the cathedral dignitaries for their custom of merely "putting in an appearance" in choir during divine service, he says:—"Afterwards come in our masters and lords of the close, covered with gray amices, and having on a very white surplice, . . . so fine and thin that a man may see through it. . . . They have three or four servants waiting upon them, and two chaplains, which follow hard at their masters' heels. . . . They sing either nothing at all, or else very little; . . . but yet they resort to the choir very worshipfully, they do highly honour the lamp, they do make great reverence to the saints, and so after they have once presented and shewed themselves in the church, anon after they desire friendly and loving departing, they go forth of the choir, committing the residue of the divine service to the chaplains." (A work entitled of the old God and the new, of the old Faith and the new, of the old Doctrine and the new, or original beginning of Idolatry, sign. M 2, 8vo. 1534.) It is noteworthy, as showing to which of the above practices the Injunction of 1547 refers, that the reason given by Lyndwood, in his comment upon Archbishop Reynolds's Constitution respecting altar lights, for their use at celebration is precisely the same as that assigned in the Injunction.

To my answer to question 248, add:—

U. [I doubt whether I clearly comprehended question 247. If its object was to inquire whether Laud admitted the truth of the charge that he introduced lights on the Holy Table in his chapel, I would reply, that, so far as I know, he nowhere denies the charge, but defends his chapel furniture on the authority of the chapels of Bishop Andrewes and his royal master; e.g., he said at his trial, "The furniture of the altar is no other than such as is in † That the continual reservation of "the Sacrament" had ceased in 1543—the year in which Cranmer issued his inquiry about altar lights—may be concluded from "The Order of the Communion," set forth at Easter in that year, in which the celebrant is directed to "consecrate so much [of 'the Sacrament of the Body'] as will serve the people, and any levation or lifting up" is forbidden. The late A. W. Pugin states that "the blessed Sacrament was never reserved at the high altar of a church, excepting in a golden dove, or pyx, suspended over the altar." Dublin Review, No. xx., p. 337. Is it not incredible that the Sacrament was so reserved, with two lights constantly burning on the altar before it, (which must have been the case upon the supposition that the Injunction and Cranmer's inquiry, founded upon it, do not refer to lights at celebration,) at a time when elevation was prohibited, and the priest was enjoined to consecrate just enough ("so much") wafer bread, as would be required for Communion? Again, it seems yet more incredible, that the Injunction had reference to the reserved Sacrament, when we remember its words, "suffer to remain," and that these are employed in regard to two lights, whereas Cromwell, the Vicar-General, by an Injunction in 1536, abolished the use of all lights "afore any image or picture," excepting two or three specified single lights; one of which was "the light before the Sacrament of the altar." If the Injunction referred to two lights before the reserved Sacrament, it speaks of what really had no existence as remaining, and deliberately increased instead of reducing the number of lights before the pyx, going beyond the requirement of Cardinal Pole, who, when reviving the reservation of the blessed Sacrament and its light, enjoins in his Legatine Constitutions of 1555, where it can be afforded, "ut perpetuo lampas vel cereus coram sanctissimo hoc Sacramento ardeat." Doc. Ann. Vol. I. pp. 146, 147.

* use in the King's own chapel at Whitehall, and had been there used ever since, and before my time." (Canterbury's Doom, p. 466.) "I took the pattern of the credentia from Bishop Andrewes's chapel." Ibid. p. 467.]

To my answer to question 284, add:—

V. [Stapleton does not "attack our Prayer Book;" nor reproach "the Church of England," for not following the example of her Sovereign as to lights, but certain "Protestants," who, while affirming that the Queen was the "supreme governour of their religion," denied it in their practice. "We know and confess," he writes, "in words they say so; . . . but we see in their doings they deny it themselves to be so. Otherwise, why do not Protestants allow the blessed crucifix of our Saviour, why burn they not light before it, as they see the Queen's most gracious Majesty doth? Why do the ministers of Kent, and certain of Oxford, repine and resist against Her Majesty's commandment touching external behaviour and orders in the church?" (A Fortress of the Faith, p. 152.) In reference to the same class of persons, he elsewhere remarks:—"We know to wear in the church holy vestments, and to be apparelled priestlike, seemeth so absurd to the Puritans of our country, to the zealous Gospellers of Geneva, that they resist herein not only the laws and ordinances of the Church stubbornly, which St. Paul biddeth them obey and submit themselves unto, but also they withstand disobediently the commandment of their Sovereign and Liege Princess, unto whom also the Apostle chargeth them to be subject and obedient. . . . If these men do acknowledge and believe that the Queen's Majesty is supreme governour in all spiritual causes, why do they not obey Her Highness' command in the seemly apparel of spiritual rulers, and wearing of vestments in the church?" Ibid., reverse of p. 134.]

After my answer to question 287, add:—

W. [Harding says:—"Concerning ceremonies, if ye shew us not the use of chrisin in your churches, if the sign of the cross be not borne before you in processions and otherwheres used, if holy water be abolished, if lights at the gospel and communion be not had, if peculiar vestments for deacons, priests, and bishops be taken away, and many such other the like, judge ye, whether ye have duly kept the old ceremonies of the Church." Jewel did not reply, "We have cast them out." He answers, "Ye come in with processions, with lights, with torches, with tapers, with chrisin, with oil, with tunicles and chisibles, with holy water and holy bread, and I know not what else; as if all these things had descended directly from the Apostles, and without the same the Church of God were no Church. Verily, M. Harding, we hate not any of all these things, for we know they are the creatures of God. But you have so defiled and berayed them with your superstitions . . . that we can no longer continue them without great conscience." (Works, p. 20, fol. 1609.) Subsequently he cites Lactantius in condemnation of the practice of setting up lights in churches "to the honour of God." (Ibid. p. 21.) A perfectly different reason to that of the Injunction of 1547. It will be observed that Jewel forbears to comment upon Harding's allusion to "the sign of the cross," and does not specifically mention "lights at communion.")

To my answer to question 292, add:—

X. [The words "shall be retained and be in use" occur in the Act of Uniformity of 1559, and are equivalent to the expression "shall use," in the ornament rubric of the same year.]

To my answer to question 297, add:—

Y. [Because it was no longer needed, altar lights being among the "ornaments" enjoined by the Act of Uniformity of 1559, and by the ornament rubric of that year. That such was the case, and was considered to be so at the time when that rubric was framed, appears from the following extract from a letter of Dr. Sandys to Archbishop Parker:—"Our gloss upon this text is that we shall not be forced to use them, but that others, in the mean time, shall not convey them away, but that they may remain for the Queen." (Strype's Annals, vol. i. Part I. p. 122.) The ornaments which were to "remain for the Queen," were inter alia, especially the altar cross and lights, which, we know, remained in her chapel accordingly; and she not only retained those ornaments therein, but moreover constrained some of her bishops to "use them," and there is not a particle of evidence that the reluctant prelates ever dreamed of opposing her command on this point on the plea of its illegality.]

Rev.
F. Russell,
C.L., F.S.A.

To my answer to question 303, add:—

Z. [It is said that the Queen on Christmas Day, 1558, commanded Dr. Oglethorpe, Bishop of Carlisle, when standing ready to say Mass before her, not to elevate the consecrated Host, "but to omit the ceremony because she liked it not." (Strype's Annals, vol. i. part i. p. 73.) An English litany was, however, used before this event in the Royal Chapel, "which they," says the Queen's annalist, Darcie, in reference to the Roman prelates, "held as execrable." Annals. The true and Royal History of the famous Empress Elizabeth, &c. p. 13, 4to. 1625.]

To my answer to question 325, add:—

A 2. [Dr. Johnson in his Dictionary (Todd's Edition, 4to. 1814,) defines a "light" to be "anything that gives light, a taper;" and a "taper" to be both "a wax candle" and "a light." He illustrates the last definition thus:—

"If any snatch the pure taper from my hand, and hold it to the devil, he will only burn his own fingers, but shall not rob me of the reward of my good intention." Bp. Taylor.

"There the fair light,

"Like Hero's taper in the window plac'd

"Such fate from the malignant air did find,

"As that expos'd to the boist'rous wind."

Waller.

May not these and like examples* warrant the inquiry whether when, e.g., Laud is accused of defiling churches, &c. with "tapers," lighted tapers, or "lights" (in the sense in which that word is employed in the Injunction of 1547, and by Archbishop Crammer in his Visitation Articles), may not be meant?

I may add that "the lights of virgin wax" on the Holy Table in the Chapel Royal at the christening of the child of Lady Cicile were, in fact, not lumina cæca. This is clear from other statements in the narrative whence the extract in the Hierurgia was made. The ceremony took place on the last day of the month of September; the child was brought to the chapel at 5 p.m., evensong followed, and after that the christening. "Then" says the account, "the child was carried home in manner as it was brought with great number of torches lighted . . . for that then it was within night."

To my answer to question 329, add:—

B 2. [The Homily (which Prynne alleges against Laud, Canterbury's Doom, p. 467) refers to the practice (copied from a custom of the "Gentiles idolaters") of lighting candles "at noon-time or at midnight, before" images, "therewith to honour them; for other use," it adds, "is there none in so doing;" and of offering "up to the Giver of light, the light of a wax candle for a gift." (Homilies, pp. 207, 208, 8vo. 1824.) Here is no allusion to that symbolical "signification" of altar lights mentioned in the Injunction, which is neither idolatrous nor amenable to the charge of putting any one "in peril of idolatry." If, however, the Homily will bear the construction of being condemnatory of altar lights, it ought not to be overlooked that, as I stated in my evidence, the Homilies also condemn choral services and organs. Reference is made to these in the "second part of the Sermon of the place and time of prayer," as follows:—"A woman said to her neighbour, 'Alas, gossip, what shall we now do at church, since we cannot hear the like piping, singing, chanting, and playing upon the organs that we could before?' But, dearly beloved, we ought greatly to rejoice and give God thanks that our churches are delivered out of all those things which displeased God so sore." (Ibid., p. 311.) See Master Edward Dering's complaint (in 1573) of the impossibility of reconciling the teaching of the above Homily with the practice of the Church. Post. Addition to answer to question 359.]

To my answer to question 331, add:—

C 2. [Upon the hypothesis that the use of altar lights was not merely discontinued in fact, but legally prohibited in common with choral services and organs, which I believe cannot be established.]

To my answer to question 334, add:—

D 2. [Hickeringill, for example, writes:—"He [the 'ceremony-monger,'] does not say the Mass indeed in Latin; but his hood, his cope, his surplice, his rochet, his altar railed in, his candles, and cushions and book thereon, his bowing to it, his bowing or rather nodding at the name of Jesus, his organs, his violins, his singing men, his singing boys, with their alternate jabbering and

The darkness of our noddles, or to tempt the chandlers to turn down-right papists, as the more suitable religion for their trade; for ours mocks them with hopes only. He gapes, and stares to see the lucky minute when the candles should be lighted; but he is cheated, for they do not burn out in an age." Works, vol. ii. p. 405.]

To my answer to question 336, add:—

E 2. [The notorious Puritan, Henry Burton, says:—"But besides all this, these men have one special sanctuary to fly unto, and that is their cathedral churches.

"These be their old high places not removed.

"These be those nests and nurseries of superstition and idolatry, wherein the old beldame of Rome hath muzzled up her brood of popelings, and so preserved her usum

"We bring in no innovations, no new rites, but what hath been in use ever since the Reformation, and that in the most eminent places, even the mother churches of the land. Now, all that we go about is to reduce in-

"ferior churches to an unity and conformity to their 'mother churches.' Thus do our master builders plead." For God and the King: the sum of two Sermons preached on the fifth of November last in St. Matthew's, Friday Street, 1636, p. 158, 4to. 1636.]

To my answer to question 359, add:—

G 2. [And even in 1573, as appears from the following statement:—"In the second volume of the Homilies it is said thus: that the costly and manifold furniture of vestments late used in the Church is Jewish, and maketh us more willingly (in such apparel of Christians) to become Jewish. If I do subscribe to this, how can I subscribe to the ceremonies in cathedral churches, where they have the priest, deacon, and sub-deacon in copes and vestments, all as before? In another Homily, fol. 271, it is said of piping, singing, chanting, playing upon organs, goodly sights, &c., that they greatly displease God, and filthily defile His holy temple. If they will have me subscribe to this, then I must not subscribe to the contrary, that our ceremonies are all good, and according to the Word of God." An Answer unto Four Articles, by Master Edward Dering. A part of a Register, &c., pp. 83, 84, 4to. cir. 1590.]

To my answer to question 364, add:—

H 2. [Dr. Dee, Bishop of Peterborough, inquires: "Have you . . . a comely large surplice with all other church ornaments necessary for the celebration of God's holy service and administration of the blessed Sacraments?" (Articles to be inquired of throughout the whole diocese of Peterborough, &c., 1634, 4to. 1634.) Altar candlesticks may sometimes have been comprehended when not named. This supposition receives some support from the fact that a rubric in the Prayer Book set forth "for the use of Scotland," in 1636, directs that "the Holy Table, having at communion time a carpet and a fair linen cloth upon it, and other decent furniture meet for the high mysteries there to be celebrated, shall stand, &c." (Folio edition of 1637.) If it be true that the Visitation Articles, issued after 1662, do not require altar candlesticks, it is equally true that they do not, in any case, prohibit them, and the mere omission of inquiries respecting them cannot be alleged in proof of their illegality; for, if so, the eucharistic vestments, organs, and credence tables (all which the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has pronounced to be lawful) are also illegal, as no mention is made of them in the Articles in question. It would seem that the bishops of the Restoration contented themselves with requiring the minimum in regard to "ornaments," in consideration of the reluctance or inability of semi-puritan churchwardens to go to the expense of restoring them,* and also of the poverty of the parochial clergy. In illustration of this forbearance on the part of the above prelates may be mentioned the practice of a distinguished prelate of our own day, the venerable Bishop of Exeter,

* An example of later date than the above quotations, occurs in the following extract from an account of the funeral of the Queen of George II. in Westminster Abbey, 1737. "The choir of the chapel-royal, attending there in their proper habits, with wax tapers in their hands, and the dean and prebendaries in their copes; . . . joined the procession."—Gentleman's Magazine, vol. vii., p. 765.

* Thus, in 1695, a Puritan writes, "In some topping churches you shall see huge unlighted candles, . . . but the meaner churches are forced to shift without them." (Notes upon the Bishop of Salisbury's Four late Discourses, &c., p. 25, London, 1695.)

who, while maintaining the legal obligation of the use of the vestments and his determination to "enjoin the minister, be he who he may," to wear them when provided by churchwardens at the charge of the parish, yet has never made them a subject of inquiry at his visitations.]

To my answer to question 384, add:—

I 2. [Before I dismiss the subject of incense, I beg to offer a few illustrations of its ritual use in the Church of England since the Reformation. Mention has been made of its combustion at a particular part of the service ("as," says Prynne, "in the Popish Mass and churches," Canterbury's Doom, p. 123) in the chapel of Bishop Andrewes. Prynne records, "In Peter House there was on the altar a pot, which they usually called the incense pot;" and he mentions "a little boat, out of which the frankincense is poured, which Dr. Cosins had made use of in Peter House, where he burned incense." (Ibid. pp. 74, 123.) The nonconforming historian, Neale, observes, "The altars in cathedrals [temp. Charles I.] were adorned with the most pompous furniture. . . . Upon some altars there was a pot called the incense pot, and a knife to cut the sacramental bread." (History of the Puritans, vol. ii. pp. 247, 248, 8vo. 1794.) In allusion to the use of incense by the Caroline clergy, a Puritan writer remarks:—"As for the ceremonies of breaking the Host in three parts, the giving the pax, and so forth, our men will never strain at such gnats; . . . they take in worse ceremonies than these, to wit, surplices, rochets, copes, candles, incense, organs, cornets, chancels, altars, rails." (A Parallel or brief Comparison of the Liturgy with the Mass Book, &c., by R. B. K., p. 93, 4to. 1641.) Another Puritan, writing in 1641, in reference to the same party, says:—"They tell us . . . that the chancel and altar must not only be dedicate with prayers and unctions, but with lighted candles, burning incense, and many other such toys." (A Large Supplement of the Canterburian's Self-conviction, p. 85, 4to. 1641.) "What prescription," asks Henry Burton, "can that cathedral church at Wolverhampton, in Staffordshire, plead for her goodly costly new altar, with the dedication thereof, within these two or three years last past, in which dedication all the Roman rites were observed, as censings, &c.?" (For God and the King, &c., p. 161.) Other quotations on this subject might be made from the works of writers in the first half of the 17th century, but the above may perhaps suffice to show that the practice of burning incense ritually was not uncommon in our Church at that period. I can discover but little trace of the use of incense after the Restoration, except in the Royal Chapel at Whitehall, and at coronations.† Cole, indeed, relates that it was burned at the altar in Ely Cathedral until 1779; and Archbishop Sanroff's "Form of Consecration of new Altar Plate," (Hierurgia, p. 128) prescribes: "So likewise when a censer is presented and received, they [the chaplains] say, 'While the King sitteth at his table, my spikenard sendeth forth the smell thereof. (Cant. i. 12.) Let my prayer be set forth before Thee as the incense, and let the lifting up of my hands be as the evening sacrifice.' (Ps. cxli. 2.)"

To my answer to question 402, add:—

J 2. [Laud says expressly, that "whatever he did in these respects was according to both law and canon, and with the consent and liking of the people, no command issuing from him against the one or without the other." See his History, pp. 156, 224, 416.]

To my answer to question 406, add:—

K 2. [The Puritan Smart complains that, "Most of the bishops of our time . . . busy themselves in nothing more than in setting up altars with all manner of superstitious furniture, crosses, crucifixes, candles, candlesticks, &c. Our bishops think it their bounden duty, as soon as ever themselves are consecrated, to fall to the consecration of churches, churchyards, altars, organs, images, crucifixes, tapers, &c. Our bishops think they seek the kingdom of God, and the righteousness thereof, when they persuade his Majesty [Charles I.] to restore altars, organs, images, and all manner of massing trinkets, more brave than ever they were in the time of Popery. Our bishops teach and maintain stoutly that altars, images, crosses, crucifixes, candlesticks, &c. are not repugnant to our religion, nor contrary to the authority of Scripture; [and] . . . would have them brought in again according to the pattern and

† Since the above was written, I have met with the following extract from the account-books of the churchwardens of the parish of Solihull, Birmingham:—"1685.—Paid to George Bird for mending the altar stone, 8d.; 11s. paid for bread and wine and frankincense for the first sacrament, 15s. 2d."

"after the example of the King's Royal Chapel, and . . . labour with all their might and main that the offence may be spread through all the King's dominions, both cathedral and parish churches." Canterbury's Cruelty, &c., by Peter Smart, Introduction, 4to. 1643.

I believe I have now accomplished the task which the Royal Commissioners on Ritual have courteously allowed me to undertake; but before I conclude this communication, I would, with all humility, add a very few words. I was asked towards the close of my examination, whether in my opinion, lights are essential to the eucharistic rite, and I answered, "Certainly not to its validity." On that head, of course, no doubt can exist; but as to whether they be essential to its meet celebration, perhaps an affirmative opinion may not unreasonably be entertained. The result of the little investigation which I have been able to give to the subject, inclines me to believe that lights formed part of the original institution of the Lord's Supper, and, as such, were immediately adopted into use by the Apostolic and Primitive Church; and so on by all other churches in their celebration of the Holy Communion down to the close of the fifteenth century. I am persuaded that lights "on" or at the Holy Table, "before the Sacrament," employed as an instructive accessory, subsidiary to and beautifying the eucharistic rite, and setting forth that "our Saviour Christ, both God and Man," is the "very true Light of the world," were authoritatively retained "in this Church of England" at the Reformation, and (with the exception of that calamitous but providentially brief period when both throne and altar lay shattered in the dust, and the "Book of Common Prayer" was "cast out" as superstitious and unclean,) have ever since legally continued in our Church.

For the above considerations, and as one whose own practice stops far short of the advanced ritual development of these days, I venture most respectfully and very earnestly to deprecate any step, in any quarter, which would control the liberty of our Church in reference to a usage so innocuous, so significant, so catholic, so primitive, and so apostolic as that of lights at celebration.

I have the honour to be,

Dear Sir,

Your faithful servant,

JOHN FULLER RUSSELL.

W. F. Kemp, Esq.,
&c., &c.

P.S.—Since the foregoing letter was completed, I have met with certain passages bearing upon my evidence, which I may perhaps be permitted to add here. The four following citations, are highly important as proofs that high altars with lights, vestments, and the cross, at celebration, and lights at the administration of the Sacrament of Holy Baptism, were "retained" and "in use," by lawful authority, "in this Church of England," subsequently to the enactment of the first Book of Edward VI., and even as late as the latter portion of his fourth year. The four passages in question occur in a volume entitled, "An oversight and deliberation upon the holy Prophet Jonas, made and uttered before the King's Majesty, and his most honourable council by John Hoper, in Lent last past. Comprehended in seven sermons, Anno 1550." Hoper was, at that time, "elect and sworn Bishop of Gloucester." In his "epistle dedicatory," he says: "It is a fond opinion, most gracious King, and unmeet for a christian man to bear the magistrates of God in hand, that in case the Doctrine of Christ, and His Holy Sacraments should not be decked and set forth with these plausible and well liking ceremonies (that is to speak plainly,) with papistical superstition, it were to be feared of sedition and tumults. . . . Most gracious King and noble counsellors, as ye have taken away the Mass from the people, so take from them her fathers also; the altar, vestments, and such like as apparelled her. And let the Holy Communion be decked with the holy ceremonies that the high and wise Priest, Christ, decked and apparelled her in first of all." This "epistle" is dated "An. 1550, September 6."

In Hoper's fourth sermon, he remarks: "But this prayer of Jonas is so acceptable, it might be thought of

* "During the first seven centuries of the Church, altars were made indifferently of wood, stone, and metal." (Pugin in Dublin Review, No. xx., p. 335.) The Lord's Table (Mensa Christi) are the words of the Sarum Missal) was, in almost all cases, of stone "in this Church of England," & Edw. vi., and the order for the substitution of wooden for stone tables was not issued until Nov. 1550; and "when," says an eye-witness, "altars were pulled down, . . . then were all churches without any law, spoiled of all their ornaments, as of copes, vestments, altar cloths, corporaxes, chalices, crosses, candlesticks, censers, cruets, books, and all other things belonging thereto." (An Exhortation to all men to take heed of Rebellion, &c., made by John Christopherson, sig. Y. iii. 12<sup>mo</sup>. 1554.) Christopherson was Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, and Dean of Norwich.

Rev.
J. F. Russell,
B.C.L., F.S.A.

"some men, that the place where Jonas prayed in, should have bettered it, as the foolish opinion of the world is at this time, that judgeth the prayer said at the high altar to be better than that which is said in the quire, that in the quire better than it that is said in the body of the church. . . . This I would wish, that the magistrates should put both the preacher, minister and the people, in one place, and shut up the partition called the chancel that separateth the congregation of Christ, one from the other." In his sixth sermon, in allusion to Holy Baptism, he observes: "The matter and element of this Sacrament is pure water; whatsoever is added, oil, salt, cross, lights, and such other, be inventions, of men, and better it were they were abolished, than kept in the Church. . . . I pray the King's Majesty and his most honourable council to prepare a ship, as soon as may be, to send them home again to their mother church, the bosom and breast of man." In the same sermon, Hoper says, in reference to the administration of the Holy Eucharist: "If we have bread, wine, a table, and a fair table cloth, let him [the minister] not be solicitous nor careful for the rest, seeing they be no things brought in by Christ, but by Popes; unto whom, if the King's Majesty and His honourable council have good conscience, they must be restored again; and great shame it is for a noble king, emperor, or magistrate, contrary unto God's Word, to detain and keep from the devil and his minister any of their goods and treasure, as the candles, vestments, crosses, altars, for if they be kept in church as things indifferent, at length they will be maintained as things necessary."

When the time at which these words were spoken, and the persons to whom they were addressed, are considered, can a doubt possibly exist as to the authoritatively permitted use of lights "under" the first Book, and that the absence of any rubric in that Book prescribing their use, was not held to exclude them? Moreover, the alleged Royal Injunctions of 1549, which forbid "any light upon the Lord's board at any time," are thus disposed of. Had they then existed, Hoper, instead of earnestly soliciting the King and His council to restore lights, altar-candles, &c., to the pope and the devil, would rather have congratulated his hearers upon the fact of the royal prohibition of those "ornaments" and of their consignment to the above-mentioned personages. Hoper, like his contemporary Becon, and the Puritans of the Elizabethan and Caroline period, seems to have deemed it a sufficient condemnation of a ceremony, ornament, or usage to assign its origin to a Pope. It will have been observed that he objected to the sign of the cross in Holy Baptism. In his sixth sermon, he says, in regard to the Lord's Supper: "I would wish it were commanded by the magistrates that the communicators and receivers should do it standing or sitting." The preceding quotations are made (the spelling being modernized) from the original edition of the sermons, (that of 1550,) in my possession.

The ornaments and ritual in Queen Elizabeth's chapel did not escape the animadversions of the early Puritans. Thus Henry Barrow writes, "Her Majesty hath found comfort in receiving it [the blessed Sacrament] at the Lord Archbishop Grace's hands, with his rich cope on his shoulders, berayed with all his pontificalibus, the English Mass-book in his hands, yea (by your leave) with the round wafer. I will not here speak of attiring the chapel and high altar that day, and other court ceremonies."—A brief discovery of the false Church, p. 109, 4to. 1590. The author of the "Admonition to the Parliament," (cir. 1572) observes, "As for organs and curious singing, though they be proper to popish deans, I mean to cathedral churches, yet some others also must have them. The Queen's chapel and these churches (which should be spectacles of christian reformation) are rather patterns and precedents to the people of all superstitions." Archbishop Whitgift, in reply, indignantly exclaims, "Your slanderous speech of the Queen's Majesty's chapel, which you also say to be a pattern and precedent to the people, of all superstitions, is rather severely to be punished, than with words confuted."—An answer to a certain libel intituled an Admonition to the Parliament, p. 258, 4to. 1573. Subsequently, he says, "I doubt not but that cathedral churches shall be able to withstand both your opprobrious speeches, and the greediness of all their adversaries, so long as it shall please God to bless the land with so virtuous and learned a Queen, and so wise and discreet counsellors."—Ibid. p. 280.

The following extract from a letter of James I. to his son Charles and Buckingham, when at Madrid, proves that the ornaments in the Prince's chapel there were provided by the express command of the King who was perfectly satisfied as to their lawfulness: "My sweet Boys, I write

"now this seventh letter unto you upon the seventeenth of March, sent in my ship, called the Adventure, to my two Boys adventurers, whom God ever bless! And now to begin with Him,—a Jove principium, I have sent you, my Baby, two of your chaplains, fitted for this purpose, Mawe and Wren,* together with all stuff and ornaments fit for the service of God. I have fully instructed them so as all their behaviour and service shall, I hope prove decent and agreeable to the purity of the Primitive Church; and yet as near the Roman form as can lawfully be done, for it hath ever been my way to go with the Church of Rome usque ad aras."—Nichols' Progresses of James I., vol. iv. pp. 831, 832. 4to. 1828.

The allusions to candle-lighting in the "third part of the sermon against peril of idolatry," strictly agree with and need mean no more than the following quotations from the Injunctions of 1547, one of which, it will be remembered, enjoins altar lights. "They shall suffer from henceforth no torches, nor candles, tapers, or images of wax, to be set before any image or picture . . . If they [the clergy] have heretofore declared to their parishioners anything, to the extolling or setting forth of pilgrimages, relics, or images, or lighting of candles, kissing, kneeling, decking of the same images . . . they shall now openly, before the same, recant, and reprove the same . . . And the parson, vicar, and curate, shall diligently . . . call upon, exhort, and move their neighbours, to confer and give . . . to the said chest, declaring unto them, whereas hitherto they have been diligent to bestow much substance . . . upon . . . decking of images, offering of candles, . . . they ought at this time, to be much more ready to help the poor and needy . . . Also . . . money given or bequeathed, to the finding of torches, lights, tapers, and lamps, shall be converted to the same use." It may be observed, by the way, that the above Homily was considered, in times past, to condemn not all ritual use but the superstitious abuse of lights; as otherwise e.g. Dr. Donne was not the man to have defended, as he has, the "use of candles by day in divine service," in a sermon preached, in his own cathedral, before the Lord Mayor and corporation of London.

One of my examiners laid great stress upon the inquiry as to post-reformation examples of the use of altar lights at actual celebration; the important point to be ascertained seems to me to be rather, whether lights were lawfully retained on or at the Holy Table (not for the purpose of affording necessary light, but) for the symbolical reason of the Injunction. If it can be shewn that their retention on that ground was lawful, does it not follow, of course, that their use at celebration was so? If, indeed, they had relation, to "any corporal presence of Christ's natural body and blood," this could not be affirmed, but, notoriously, they had no such relation even in pre-reformation times. This appears, e.g. from Lyndwood's (before cited) "note" on Archbishop Reynolds' Constitution; from the fact that St. Isadore of Seville, in the seventh century, assigns the same symbolical meaning to the lights as Lyndwood's signification (Orig. vii. 12); and that Durandus (Bishop of Mende in 1286), although he gives a different signification to them, yet makes no allusion to any Romish doctrine concerning the Holy Eucharist. He says, "At the horns of the altar two candlesticks are placed to signify the joy of Jews and Gentiles at the Nativity of Christ: which candlesticks, by means of a flint, have their wicks lighted . . . Now the light of the candlestick, is the faith of the people."—The symbolism of churches and church ornaments, &c., p. 70. 8vo. 1843.

Another of my examiners was of opinion, that the word "lights," in a certain example of its use, might mean "candles;" but even upon the assumption that it did, no conclusive evidence that the candles were not burning could thence be derived. Examples, in plenty, may be found of the sole employment of the word candles, when lighted candles are meant. Thus we see Donne says, "it is forbidden to set up candles in the church-yard, &c., . . . Now the setting up of lights could not trouble them." Again, in a letter from the Earl of Worcester to the Earl of Salisbury, July 22, 1609, we read, "Yesternight, about ten or eleven of the clock, the King's stable was set on fire, by negligence of a candle set on a post, which fell upon the litter, and burnt the stable."—Nichols' Progresses of James I. Vol. ii., p. 262.

That the word "Sacrament" in the Injunction of 1547 cannot mean reserved Sacrament, will appear from the following considerations. The Injunction was put forth in the September of the above year. "The order of the Com-* Chaplain to Bishop Andrewes, Master of St. Peter's College, Cambridge, and Bishop in succession of Hereford, Norwich, and Ely.

"munion" was issued with a Proclamation on March 8, 1548. The "Order" (as we have seen) does not recognize, but rather virtually prohibits the practice of reservation in a pyx, &c.; the Injunction was continued in force, side by side with the "Order;" consequently, it is highly probable that the word "Sacrament" in the Injunction was designed to have the same meaning as it has in the "Order;" but that the phrase "Sacrament" in the latter document does not stand for reserved Sacrament is (apart from other considerations) plain from the Proclamation which accompanies and prefaces the "Order," and which prescribes that the "blessed Sacrament be ministered unto our people, only after such form and manner as hereafter . . . is set forth and declared, willing every man with due reverence and Christian behaviour to come to this holy Sacrament and most blessed Communion." "Sacrament" has, here, evidently the same meaning as that assigned to it by Cranmer, viz.: "Sometime by this word (Sacrament) I mean the whole ministration and receiving of the Sacraments, either of Baptism, or of the Lord's Supper." (An Answer of the most Reverend Father in God, Thomas Archbishop of Canterbury, &c., unto a crafty and sophisticated Cavillation, devised by Stephen Gardiner, &c., Preface, sig. A. 2, fol. 1551.) If, then, it be highly probable, that "Sacrament" in the Injunction was intended to have the same import as "Sacrament" in the "Order of Communion," the conclusion necessarily follows, that it is equally probable that it did not mean reserved Sacrament. And this high probability is, I think, converted into certainty by the statements following. Hoper, afterwards Bishop of Gloucester, writing in 1547, in reply to Gardiner, says, "The bread lift up over the priest's head, nor kept in the box, is not a Sacrament." (An Answer unto my Lord of Winchester's, Book intitled a Detection of the Devil's Sophistry, &c., sig. H 2. 4to. 1547.) As Hoper really was what was afterwards styled a puritan, this fact per se has not any great significance, but when coupled with what I have next to relate, it becomes important. Hoper's coadjutor, Cranmer, in the above year licensed (according to Strype) "an earnest preacher," one Thomas Hancock, "whose mouth had been stopped by a strict inhibition from preaching in the former King's reign." This "diligent declaimer against Papal abuses," in a sermon preached (in 1547) in St. Thomas's, Salisbury, denounced "the idol of the altar," and when, in consequence, he was charged by the mayor of Salisbury with "the breach of a Proclamation, lately set forth by the Lord Protector, 'That no nicknames should be given unto the Sacrament, as Round Robin, or Jack in the Box,' . . . replied, 'That it was no Sacrament, but an idol, as they used it.'" (Memorials of Archbishop Cranmer, p. 176, fol. 1694.) Here we find one of Cranmer's chosen agents, whose opinions must have been well known to Cranmer, and who was indeed specially licensed by the Archbishop to preach them, making the same assertion as Hoper, contemporaneously with the date of the promulgation of the Injunction. May it, then, not unreasonably be inferred from this fact, that Cranmer so far agreed with Hoper and Hancock, that, at all events, he would have refused to sanction the application of the word "Sacrament" to the reserved consecrated species in that document? But there is no necessity to resort to inference in regard to Cranmer's views of the Holy Eucharist at the time of the publication of the Injunction. "This year [1547] the Archbishop," says Strype, "put forth a very useful Catechism, . . . wrote originally in the German language, translated into Latin by Justus Jones, junior, and thence turned into the vulgar tongue by the said Archbishop or his special order." (Ibid. pp. 159, 160.) This Catechism contains an "Instruction of the Lord's Supper;" and Gardiner, seeking to convict Cranmer of subsequent inconsistency on that subject, insisted that the doctrine of the corporal presence was therein taught. Cranmer in his Answer (before cited) denies this charge, and says, "In that Catechism I teach, not (as you do) that the Body and Blood of Christ is contained in the Sacrament being reserved, but that in the ministration thereof we receive the Body and Blood of Christ, whereunto it may please you to add or understand this word (spiritually), then is the doctrine of my Catechism sound and good in all men's ears which know the true doctrine of the Sacraments." (An Answer, &c., p. 269.)

Thus it appears by Cranmer's own words, that his sentiments concerning the blessed Sacrament, when he set forth the Catechism, were not at variance (as Gardiner wished to show,) with those which he maintained in his Defence of the true and Catholic doctrine of the Sacrament, and which he defends in his Answer. Now at p. 211 of that Answer, we read, "As water in the font or vessel hath not the reason and nature of a Sacrament, but when it is put to the use of christening, and then it is changed into the proper nature and kind of a Sacrament, . . . such is the change of the bread and wine in the Lord's Supper." Again, at p. 232, the Archbishop quotes from his Defence* the lines which follow: "Our Saviour Christ . . . has given us warning that we should not give credit unto such teachers as would persuade us to worship a piece of bread, to kneel to it, . . . to light candles to it, to shut it up in a chest or a box." The above, then, were unquestionably Cranmer's opinions at the date of the publication of the Injunction of 1547, of which he is presumed to have been the author, and which he undoubtedly approved; and also when, in the next year, he in his Visitation Articles inquire whether (1) the "two lights upon the high altar" are duly retained; (2) the Injunctions "read every quarter of the year; and (3) the Communion is ministered as it is set forth by the King's Majesty in the Book of the Communion?" And this being the case, can any other conclusion be arrived at than this, viz., that the term "Sacrament" in the Injunction has no relation to the (so-called) "idol" of the pyx, but was designed to signify "the most blessed Communion," or, in other words, the whole Celebration? It is my belief that this conclusion is correct, a belief which, once more, is confirmed by the fact that Cranmer in his Visitation Articles, upon one occasion indeed, calls the consecrated wafer "the Sacrament," but when insisting upon its non-reservation, as, e.g., when he asks "Whether they had upon Good Friday last the Sepulchres with their lights, having the Sacrament therein?"† Assuredly that interpretation of the word "Sacrament" in the Injunction, which involves and requires assent to the theory that the consecrated species was to remain over the high altars with two lights constantly burning before it, at the very time when even its temporary reservation in a sepulchre, on one day in the year, was made a subject of visitatorial inquiry as a forbidden practice; and also that reservation in the one case was commanded by the authorities who forbade it in the other is manifestly untenable.

J. F. R.

* The original edition of this work appeared very early in 1550, when, as we know upon Hoper's testimony, lights were authoritatively in use at celebration.

† On the gospel side of the chancel, and nearly opposite the sedilia, we generally find an arch forming a recess or canopy to an altar tomb: this was used as a sepulchre for the reservation of the blessed Sacrament, from Maundy Thursday till Easter Sunday Morning, which was anciently practised in the Sarum rite. (Pugin in Dublin Review, No. XX., p. 334.) Cromwell enjoins in 1534, "ye shall . . . suffer from henceforth no candles, tapers, or images of wax, to be set afore any image or picture, but only the light that commonly goeth across the church, by the roodloft, the light before the Sacrament of the altar, and the light about the sepulchre which, for the adorning of the church and Divine Service ye shall suffer to remain still." &c. Wilkins' Concilia, vol. iii. p. 816, fol. 1737.

NOTES ON THE SUPPLEMENTARY LETTER OF THE REV. J. F. RUSSELL.

The Injunctions of the year 1547, and the Visitation Articles of the year 1548, to which Mr. Russell first refers, do not seem to me to bear on the question of fact, as to what was the usage of the National Reformed Church in respect of lighted candles at the Lord's Table. The reference to the Provincial Constitution of the year 1322, containing directions as to the celebration of mass, is subject to the same observation.

The Injunctions of Queen Elizabeth, to which Mr. Russell has not referred, contain no exception whatsoever in favour of lights; and the 9th enquiry of the first set of Visitation Articles that followed these Injunctions is in these words:—

"Whether they use to declare to their parishioners any thing to the extolling or setting forth of vain and superstitious religion, pilgrimages, relics, or images, or lighting of candles, and kissing, kneeling, or decking of the same images?" (See Cardw. Doc. Annals, vol. i., 213, and the note to cl. iv.; pp. 221, 243, edit. 1844.)

Mr. Russell next refers to a statement attributed to Cosin, and found in the notes of Nicholls. It has been inserted in the Hierurgia Anglicana, of which Mr. Russell is Editor. It is in these words:—"In the latter end of King Edward's time they used them [the two altar lights] in Scotland itself, as appears from Calvin's epistle to Knox and his fellow reformers there, anno 1554 (Ep. 206), where he takes exception against them for "following the custom of England."

These notes of Nicholls have been much discredited with reference to Cosin's supposed annotations. It is enough to call attention to the fact, that the date of the epistle of Calvin (1554) is in the reign of Queen Mary, not of King Edward VI. Next, on referring to the Epistle, it turns out to be a letter, not to Knox in Scotland, but to Cox when in exile at Frankfort.

In his reply Cox says, "As to the use of lights we never had any." (See the St. Albans case, third day, p. 27; Teignmouth case, first day, p. 28.)

Cosin's undeniable opinion as to the use of lights, is to be found in his reply, made on oath, to the charges preferred against him by Peter Smart. It is published in an authentic form in his works. (See vol. iv. p. 390.) He makes no claim whatsoever to use lighted candles for any other purpose than that of giving light that was needed. They were lighted (as he states) "that the people all about might have the better use of them for singing the Psalms, and reading the lessons out of the Bible."

As to Donne's sermon, to which Mr. Russell again refers, the extract given requires to be supplemented. The following passage immediately precedes what Mr. Russell has extracted, and published in the Hierurgia, p. 197:—

Dr. Donne says, "There was a particular holyday amongst the heathen that bore the name of this day, accensio luminum, a superstitious multiplying of lamps and torches in divine service. This superstition Lactantius reproves, &c. &c. Let that man but consider seriously the sun, and he will see that God, who could spare him so glorious a light as the sun, needs not his candle. And, therefore, says Tertullian (reprehending the same superstition) we do not shorten our days by setting up lights at noon, &c." After the passage extracted by Mr. Russell, this follows immediately: "These superstitious lights are not the lights we call for here,—let your light shine out; but your light,—the light of good works, let that shine out."

Mr. Russell has not referred to Jeremy Taylor's Rule of Conscience, Book III. Ch. IV. Rule xx. s. 7, where he speaks of the lighting of candles to represent the Epiphany. "They are unbefitting the gravity and purity and spirituality of the Christian religion; but also the manner of teaching these truths by symbolical things and actions is too low, too suspicious, too dangerous to be mingled with the Divine Liturgies. Christ may as he please consign his own good things that he gives us; but he consigns no good and represents none but what he also gives and effects in that ministrations and under that sign. But a symbolical rite of human invention to signify what it does not effect, and then introduced into the solemn worship of God, is so like those vain imaginations and representations forbidden in the Second Commandment, that the very suspicion is more against edification than their use can pretend to." Vol. XIV. page 111 (Heb. edition).

In the Hierurgia, p. 28-9, an extract is given from the MS. of Nicholas Ferrar, in which it is stated that there were candlesticks with wax candles on the Communion Table, and many other candles of the same sort were set up in every part of the Church and on all the pillars of the stalls. "And these were not for the purposes of superstition, but for real use."

Mr. Russell gives an extract from Strype (vol. I. p. 260) as to Bishop Cox officiating in the Queen's private chapel. In the same page of Strype it appears that before this time the Queen had used the lighted candles in her private chapel as adjuncts to the crucifix: that she had laid them aside upon the earnest addresses made to her by her Bishops, that in her Injunctions it might be enjoined that all images should be removed out of the churches; wherein they did prevail: that not long after the Queen resumed burning lights, and the image of the crucifix upon the altar in her oratory, and that the Archbishop of Canterbury performed his part by applying himself honestly to the Queen for divers reasons to remove them.

Mr. Russell has not directed our attention to the evidence that shows this intermittent use of the candles with the crucifix to have been confined to the Queen's private chapel (see Zurich Lett., p. 17; Jewel to Peter Martyr; p. 54, same to same; Sampson to Peter Martyr, p. 62.) From the letter of Bishop Parkhurst to Bullinger, in April 1563, it appears that the candles in the Queen's chapel were no longer lighted at all. (See Zurich Lett., p. 129; Cardw. Doc. Ann., vol. I. p. 268-9, note. Ed. 1844.)

Mr. Russell has made an addition to his answer to Q. 208. The question related to the usage of parish churches, as to having candles lighted at the celebration of Holy Communion. Mr. Russell was asked, "Have you any belief that they were lighted?" His answer is, "I am not prepared to say. I do not know." The addition that he has made is, that "in York cathedral in 1736 were two silver candlesticks, &c., and a writer in that year records that from All Saints to Candlemas the choir is illuminated at every service, &c." He refers to Drake's Eboracum, p. 524. It is also quoted in the Hierurgia Ang., p. 196. On referring to Drake's work, it turns out to be 'evening,' not 'every.'

In the Hierurgia, p. 354, extracts are given from a work there cited, in which it is said: "In some topping churches you shall see huge unlighted candles (for what use nobody alive can tell); but the meaner churches are forced to shift without them."

As to Laud, Mr. Russell says that, so far as he knows, Laud no where denies the charge that he introduced 'lights' on the holy table in his chapel. But it is important to know what is here meant by 'lights'? (See Mr. Russell's note to his answer to question 325.) The charge already stated by Mr. Russell is, in the words of Prynne, that Laud had not only tapers and candlesticks standing, "but likewise burning in the daytime, on the altar." (See his evidence and the Hier. Anglic., p. 339.) From Laud's defence it appears that he admitted that he had "candlesticks with tapers, but not burning."

This defence is set forth in Rushworth's Historical Collections, vol. II., second part, p. 279. This is cited in the Hier. Anglic., p. 162, on the question of the use of copes; and the words of Laud's defence, in which he says that he had candlesticks with tapers, but not burning, is there extracted. In p. 339 it is not in any way referred to. It has not been brought under our notice by Mr. Russell.

In referring to Jewel's reply to Harding, Mr. Russell says, "Subsequently he cites Lactantius, in condemnation of the practice of setting up lights in churches to the honour of God." Mr. Russell has overlooked an important passage in this part of the reply of Jewel: "Touching your lights and tapers, Beatus Rhenanus, a man of great learning and judgment, doubteth not but ye borrowed the use thereof from the heathen. I grant that Christians in old times had lights in their churches, when they met together for their common prayers; but it appears by the ancient fathers that the same lights served to solace them against the dark, and not for any use of religion."

One of the additional authorities to which Mr. Russell refers, is the work entitled "A large Supplement of the Canterbury Self-conviction." It is described by him in the Hierurgia in these words: "This is the second edition of Bailie's infamous Canterbury Self-conviction, lauded by Prynne." (Hier. Ang., p. 357, n.) The same man was the author of the Parallel of the Liturgy with the Mass Book, which Mr. Russell also cites. It is the Scotch liturgy, not the English.

Why he should go back to Peter Smart, as an authority I cannot discover. In the Hierurgia, p. 22, n., Smart is first introduced to our notice by Mr. Russell, as "this pestilent fellow." In the note to page 33 this cautionary notice against him is inserted: "The following illustrations of the Caroline ritual are taken from the writings of a virulent Puritan, and are in many particulars shamelessly untrue, e.g., in regard to adoration of saints, angels, and images. This will further appear by comparing the charges made against the saintly Cosin, with his reply to them."

In the Hierurgia, p. 39, Cosin's defence is stated to have been so well proved by Smart's own witnesses, that Mr. Glover, one of Smart's lawyers, told him openly at the Bar of the House of Lords that he was ashamed of him, and could not in conscience plead for him any longer. Why, the reply of Cosin should now be ignored requires explanation.

I have thought it right to confine my remarks at present to such matters in Mr. Russell's supplementary letter as seemed to me to bear on the question of the usage of the National Reformed Church in respect of lighted candles at the Lord's Table or in the public services. This is a question of fact, to be decided according to the evidence.

APPENDICES.

[The Letters in Appendices (A.) and (B.) are inserted here, at the request of the writers, with the view of correcting certain statements contained in the printed evidence attached to the First Report.]

APPENDIX A.

LETTER from the REV. J. BICKNELL, Incumbent of St. Saviour's, Highbury.

41, Highbury Hill, N.
November 26, 1867.

Sir,

I should be obliged if the Ritual Commissioners will allow me to make some remarks on the evidence given before them respecting my church (S. Saviour's, Highbury) by the Vicar of Islington.

The evidence is contained in answer 156.

1. The Rev. D. Wilson first states that the number assembling at S. Saviour's for daily prayers on week-days is "3, 4, or 5; and that is all."

The fact is, as appears from a list kept regularly for some months, that the number varied during that time from 9 to 36, and that the average was 22. On only one occasion, previous to the list being kept, the number was as low as 4; on another it rose to 51. But I believe the average of the above list to be a fair return.

2. The Rev. D. Wilson states that "The founder is utterly disappointed."

Whether Mr. Wilson wishes it to be understood that the founder is "utterly disappointed" with the result of daily prayers at S. Saviour's, or with the general result of the church, seems doubtful. In either case, the fact is, that the founder is most thoroughly satisfied, and considers the result far better than he could have anticipated. In proof of this assertion, I refer to a letter published by him in the "Guardian," September 18, 1867; wherein he gives to Mr. Wilson's statement on this point his "unqualified denial." And I also beg permission to quote (by his authority) the following extracts from a letter written to me after the publication of Mr. Wilson's evidence:—

"The questions you put are, (1) Are you 'utterly disappointed' with the results of S. Saviour's, or with the attendance, as far as you know, at daily prayers? (2) Whether you have told either of my churchwardens, or any one, that you are? I answer to all alike, certainly not. . . . If I were utterly disappointed, or at all disappointed, I should be utterly wanting in thankfulness to Him who . . . has enabled me to provide church accommodation for Aberdeen Park . . . I should also fail in gratitude to you who have so ably, boldly, and devotedly fulfilled your ministry since the consecration of S. Saviour's. How the Vicar of Islington can have had the hardihood to use the words in connexion with S. Saviour's, I cannot think. It is most charitable to put his mis-statement down to the account of ignorance. But if there was ever a 'great success' (to use the slipshod language of the day) it is S. Saviour's as one of the Islington churches."

Having thus shown what the real facts are, as to the points in Mr. Wilson's evidence to which I have now referred, I hope I may request of the Commissioners that this my letter may appear in the Appendix to their Report, and may have attention so directed to it that my reply may meet with as wide a circulation as the statements which have called it forth.

Yours obediently,
JOHN BICKNELL,
Incumbent of S. Saviour's,
Highbury.

The Secretary to the Ritual Commission.

APPENDIX B.

[The following Letter was sent with enclosures by the Bishop of Winchester to the Chairman of the Commission.]

Southwick Park, Fareham,
October 29, 1867.

My Lord,

The evidence given by the Rev. George Nugee, the vicar of Wymering, before the Ritual Commission, with reference to the chancel of Wymering church and my rights, as lay rector, over it, having been so very incorrect, I felt called upon, as soon as I became aware of it, to ask him for an explanation. I have now the honour to enclose to your lordship a copy of the correspondence which has passed between us, and I would venture to request your lordship to be good enough to lay the same before the Commissioners, in order that Mr. Nugee's admission of his error, as well as his explanation, may be brought to their notice.

I think it right that the real facts should be made known to the Commissioners, and trust for my own sake, if for no other reason, that the Commissioners will see fit to add the correspondence as an Appendix to their Report, and thus to refute in a public manner the error under which Mr. Nugee laboured at the time he gave his evidence, and to prevent it from compromising at any future time the rights of myself or my successors over the chancel.

I have the honour to be,

My Lord,

Your lordship's obedient servant,

The Right Reverend THOS. THISTLETHWAYTE,
The Bishop of Winchester,
&c., &c.,
Farnham Castle.

(Enclosure 1.)

Dear Sir,

Southwick, Sept. 16, 1867.

I HAVE just been reading a report of your evidence as given before the Ritual Commission in London, and printed in the "Hampshire Telegraph" of Sept. 14 last.—I know not, of course, whether it has been taken down by their own reporter, or may have been copied from some other paper, but I was greatly startled by reading what I must think has been quite a misconception on the part of the reporter. I will copy it word for word from the "Hampshire Telegraph" as having come from you:—

"Mr. Thistlethwayte is my lay rector at Wymering, and he has resigned over to me the chancel formally and distinctly on condition of myself and my successors keeping it in order, so that were it not for that I should have no power in the chancel at all."

Now, as I have no knowledge or idea of this resignation of my rights over the chancel, nor ever had, I must look upon this passage as a total misapprehension on the part of the reporter, and shall feel much obliged by your letting me know what you did say about the chancel, as it concerns my rights most materially both now and hereafter. Neither have I the power, as tenant for life, or the wish, to circumscribe or prejudice the rights and powers of my successors.

I remain, &c.

To the Rev. Geo. Nugee,

THOS. THISTLETHWAYTE.

(Enclosure 2.)

Dear Sir,

Wymering, Cosham, Hants,
Sept. 17, 1867.

The report does not convey the true purport of my evidence. The facts are these. A legacy having been left by my late father, as patron of the living of Wymering and Widley, towards the restoration of the parish church of Wymering, you agreed to allow the chancel to be restored out of that money according to the plans submitted to and sanctioned by the Bishop of Winchester, in due conformity with the rubric that "the chancels shall remain as they have done in times past."

You will remember that I referred you to that rubric at the time in my letter, the legal observance of which I made a condition of my acquiescing as executor in the application of the said legacy to the restoration of the chancel.

To this you agreed by letter, stating on your part a condition that I should keep the chancel so restored in good repair, and, so far as I could, bind my successors to do the same. It is evident that you can no more bind your successors than I can mine, except by a moral obligation to acquiesce in an arrangement so honourably made between us.

I am, dear sir,
Yours truly,
GEO. NUGEE.

To T. Thistlethwayte, Esq.

(Enclosure 3.)

Dear Sir, Southwick, Sept. 18, 1867.

As I consider this matter about my rights over the chancel at Wymering to be of deep moment to myself and to require a distinct settlement at this present time, after so public an assertion on your part before the Commission that I had formally and specially resigned them to you, which, if not the exact words (as I understand), you do not deny to be the meaning of what you said. Now I have looked over (I believe) all the correspondence I had with you about Wymering church, and cannot myself find anything tending to a resignation of my rights over the chancel, but, on the contrary, a distinct assertion of them, in my protest about the alteration in the pews in the chancel which I had not understood from the plans. But as you say you have my letter giving my assent to your proposal, and stipulating that you should keep the chancel in repair and, so far as you could, bind your successors to do the same, may I beg the favor of you to give me the date of your letter making the proposal, and citing the rubrics, and a copy of my reply in those terms, as I can find nothing approaching to it, and you will greatly oblige,

Dear sir,
Yours truly,
THOS. THISTLETHWAYTE.

To the Rev. Geo. Nugee.

(Enclosure 4.)

Dear Sir, Wymering, Cosham, Hants.
Sept. 20, 1867.

ON referring to the connected correspondence about the restoration of Wymering church, I find that I have not stated the facts with sufficient accuracy, my error consisting in this, that I confounded in memory "restoration" with "repairs," and the "chancel" with the new side buildings attached to it. This will be seen from the following extracts. Thus, in your letter dated Dec. 6, 1859, you gave your consent to the plans for the restoration of Wymering church, (1.) on condition of the legacy of 1,200*l.* being devoted to that purpose, and (2.) "on condition of a clause being inserted in the faculty, stating that you and your successors, as lay rectors, are, and shall be, exempt from all liability for repairs to the new buildings,—viz., a side aisle and vestry which it is proposed to attach to the chancel wall." Again, in your letter dated March 21, 1860, you further agree to the work being completed if I gave you a written guarantee that in the event of any deficiency of funds I would make myself responsible for the restoration of the chancel in accordance with the plans and without any expense to you. In that letter I now see that you state explicitly that "as lay impropiator I am liable to the repairs of the chancel." Again, in your letter dated March 27, 1860, you say that your completing the restoration of the chancel before the body of the church at Wymering "I accept as a sufficient guarantee that I shall not be called upon under any circumstances as lay rector to contribute towards the restoration of the chancel." I think it must have been those words, under any circumstances, which, floating in my memory, must have caused the confusion. Whereas I now see plainly that you referred only to the restoration of the chancel at that time and to the future repairs of the new buildings.

With regard to the other point touching the rights of the lay rector, what was really in my mind when I spoke of the chancel being resigned over to me "formally and distinctly" (I assume that those very words were used by me), was that by your adoption of the plans as sanctioned by the Bishop of Winchester and the vestry you had so far formally given up the chancel for the ministrations of the church, the pews having been abolished and choir stalls set up in their place. Such an act on your part I accepted as a formal recognition of the rubric to which I referred in my letter to you dated Feb. 20, 1860, and on the legal fulfilment of which I allowed the legacy to be applied towards the restoration of the chancel. I think that the foregoing explanation will be satisfactory to you, and serve as a settlement of the question.

Believe me,
Yours truly,
GEORGE NUGEE.

To T. Thistlethwayte, Esq.

TO THE ROYAL COMMISSIONERS ON RITUAL.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I FIND that one or two statements in my evidence (No. 2,113) call for some correction and explanation.

Thus (1st), I am reported as having said that Mr. Thistlethwayte, as lay rector of Wymering church, "has assigned over to me the chancel formally and distinctly." He did not do so by any formal instrument, but I accepted Mr. Thistlethwayte's formal adoption of the plans sanctioned by the Bishop of Winchester and the vestry as tantamount to a full and formal recognition of the rubric that "the chancels shall remain as they have done in times past." Accordingly the pews were abolished and proper stalls for the choir set up in their place.

2ndly, I am reported as having said that I and my successors were bound to keep the chancel in repair. I ought to have said, the new buildings adjoining the chancel, for Mr. Thistlethwayte stipulated that I and my successors should keep them in repair, while he and his successors would still be liable for the repairs of the chancel as such.

3rdly, I am reported as having said, that "were it not for Mr. Thistlethwayte having so assigned over the chancel to me, I should have no power in the chancel at all." So sweeping a statement has been rightly objected to by some friends as contrary to the real rights of the Church both before and after the Reformation, and I beg to withdraw it.

I have the honour to be,
My Lords and Gentlemen,
Your obedient Servant,
GEO. NUGEE,
Vicar of Wymering.

Wymering,
November 28, 1867.

APPENDIX C.

I.

MEMORIAL adopted at a Public Meeting held in St. James's Hall, November 19th, 1867.

To the Commissioners appointed, to inquire into the Rubrics, Orders, and Directions for regulating the course and conduct of Public Worship, &c., according to the use of the United Church of England and Ireland.

The humble memorial of the undersigned Clergyman and Laymen, being Communicants,—

Sheweth,—

1. That the use of high ceremonial in churches and chapels is part of the common and statute law of the Church of England, and is the subject of a rubric of the present Book of Common Prayer, relating to ornaments of churches and vestments of ministers, which rubric has received a legal interpretation from the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, as follows:

"The Rubric to the present Prayer Book adopts the language of the statute of Elizabeth, but they all* obviously mean the same thing, that the same dresses and the same utensils or articles which are used under the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. may still be used."—Liddell v. Westerton.

2. That such use, although in many particulars long in abeyance, is held by many of her clergy and laity to be the proper outward expression of her doctrine, a help to devotion, and a means of teaching; and the disuse to have resulted in very serious loss to the life and devotion of our congregational worship.

3. That such abeyance in the Church of England, together with its continued existence elsewhere, has caused the revival of high ceremonial to be regarded as an introduction of novelties in worship, and to be matter for suspicion.

4. That, therefore, such revival should not be effected in any case without great care and caution, and due regard for the feelings of the congregation and the legal rights of the Ordinary.

5. That to impose any restraint upon such revival other than the restraints above specified, would require ex post

* Speaking of the present Rubric and those similar to it, and occupying the same places in the Prayer Books of Queen Elizabeth and King James, their Lordships say "the Rubric," as in text of memorial.—Report of Committee of Lower House of Convocation of Canterbury on Ritual 1866.

facto legislation, which is, upon general principles, most objectionable; and which, in this particular instance, would operate with grave and manifest injustice against one section of the clergy and laity; and would, further, contravene obligations with respect to ceremonial entered into by clergy under the existing law; thereby setting a precedent for the contravention of all other obligations alike entered into, and which ex post facto legislation, if it could be obtained, would have the further evil consequence of narrowing the basis of the Church of England.

A large number of your memorialists are not in the habit of using high ceremonial, or worshipping in churches where it is used; but nevertheless, in common with their brethren who do so worship, they humbly submit that, for all the reasons above stated, it is most inexpedient to promote any alteration of the existing law, or in any way to restrain the lawful liberty of the clergy and the rights of the laity.

II.

MEMORIAL to the Royal Commissioners appointed to inquire into the Rubrics, Orders, and Directions for regulating the course and conduct of Public Worship, &c., according to the use of the United Church of England and Ireland.

The humble memorial of the Vice-Presidents and Council of the Church Association—

Sheweth,—

That your Memorialists acknowledge with satisfaction the decision announced in the first report of the Royal Commission, "That it is expedient to restrain in the public services of the United Church of England and Ireland all variations in respect of vesture from that which has long been the established usage of the said United Church."

A Church established by law is bound by a compact, expressed or implied, with the State; and the Church of England, when reformed under Edward the Sixth, re-established under Queen Elizabeth, and restored and settled under Charles the Second, was expressly admitted to its position and privileges with a full record of its doctrines, and an equally clear setting forth of its order of worship. Nor could any departure from either of these be tolerated without the consent and assent of both parties,—the Church and the State. And that this was understood by both is plain from their acts; for the Church maintaining in her Articles (19 and 34) that she hath power to decree rites and ceremonies, did, after careful examination, reject many rites formerly in use, explaining in her Book of Common Prayer ("Preface concerning the Service of the Church" and "of Ceremonies"), that she adopted her present service as simple, not burthensome, and such as to allow room for the full teaching of Holy Scripture; and she also declares why, reviewing the Salisbury, York, and other Uses, she has rejected these as containing "many things, whereof are some untrue, some uncertain, some vain and superstitious." And further, she lays it down that an excessive multitude of ceremonies is a burden "intolerable to Christian people." Many of these she declares to be so dark, "that they did more confound and darken than declare and set forth Christ's benefits unto us."

Therefore, forbidding divers Uses, she declared that, "from henceforth all the whole Realm shall have but one Use"; and she adds this weighty caution:—"that though the keeping or omitting of a ceremony, of itself considered, is but a small thing, yet the wilful and contemptuous transgression of a common order and discipline is no small offence before God." And, further, in Article 34, she says, "Whosoever, through his private judgment, doth openly break the traditions and ceremonies of the Church, which be ordained by common authority, ought to be rebuked openly."

This being the mind of the Church, not less clear was the judgment of the State. For on the re-establishment of the Church, in the first year of Elizabeth (Chapter 1 and 2), the State passed two Acts, one of Supremacy, the other of Uniformity; the former statute vesting in the Crown supremacy in all Ecclesiastical causes, the latter statute requiring strict conformity to the Book of Common Prayer, and forbidding all rites and ceremonies but those sanctioned therein. And upon the settlement of the Church at the Restoration, the new Act of Uniformity expressly enforced the directions and penalties of the preceding Acts with reference to the revised Book of Common Prayer. And this is reasonable. For if the State preserves to the Church her position and endowments it has a right to understand what religion is taught and what order of worship is observed. So jealously did the authorities, both of Church and State, watch over this uniformity of worship and those common Articles of faith, that, as no deviation was suffered from either on any plea, so if any special service was at any time required, it could not be had without the authority of the Sovereign, directing it through the Archbishop as Primate of the Church. And as no clergyman had any right or licence to change, omit, or add to the public ministrations, as prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, so, if he had any doubts respecting the meaning of any direction therein contained, he was not suffered to exercise his own judgment, or to follow his own will, but "the parties that so doubt or diversely take anything shall always resort to the Bishop of the Diocese, who, by his discretion, shall take order for the quieting and appeasing of the same, so that the same order be not contrary to anything contained in this book, and if the Bishop of the Diocese be in doubt, then he may send for the resolution thereof to the Archbishop."

Yet in the face of this clear declaration of the mind of the Church and the Legislature and this Use of the Realm, declared by law and fixed by custom, unvaried through 300 years, a section of clergymen, organized within the last 30 years, have set up after their own fancy (as is abundantly proved by their evidence before the Commission) strange ornaments and ceremonies, which have had no place within the Church since the Settlement of the Reformation. And in adopting these, as they themselves declare, they set aside the order of the Church, which has said that the whole Realm shall have but one Use. At times they follow the Use of Sarum, at other times that of York; at all times they imitate the ceremonies of Rome, reviving, as they contend, the rites which, by the Church of England, have been rejected as "superstitious and vain."

And when the Archbishops and Bishops of the Church, whom these clergymen have solemnly pledged themselves to obey and to submit themselves to their godly judgments, and to whom they have sworn canonical obedience, have with unanimous voice collectively denounced these practices in 1851, 1866, and 1867; and when the Ordinary of each Diocese in which these clergymen are found has addressed to them again and again advice, warning, and remonstrance, they have refused to obey the Bishops and the Church, and have thus incurred the Church's sentence that "the wilful and contemptuous transgression and breaking of a common order and discipline is no small offence before God."

In such a case, so plain and undeniable, it could not be doubted but that the Royal Commissioners, who include Prelates, Ministers of State, members of both Houses of Parliament, and men learned in the law, would do as the Commissioners have done and condemn these innovations on the usage of the Reformed Church.

It is true, as these clergymen allege, that the ceremonies which they have introduced into the services of the Church are symbolical of certain doctrines, and intended to shadow them forth. But this, so far from extenuating, aggravates the offence; for these doctrines, no less "repugnant to the plain words of Scripture," than to the teaching of the Reformers, founders of our Church, have been rejected by the Church of England. And not only are they violating the Church's order by strange uses, but they are breaking the Church's Articles of Faith by their heresies.

It is certain that the injury they thus inflict on the United Church of England and Ireland is grave and serious. The great body of the nation is warmly attached to the Reformed doctrines of our Protestant Church: therefore when clergymen, repudiating the name of Protestant, seek reunion with the two corrupt Churches from which our Church has separated, adopt their ceremonies and preach their dogmas, and ask that they should be "left in peace" to practise and teach them, they are assuredly, alienating from our Church the affections of intelligent and faithful laymen, and infusing into the public mind such distrust as will produce, if continued, disastrous results.

Your Memorialists, therefore, appeal to the Commissioners to complete the work on which they have entered, and not to regard it as effected until they have suggested to Her Majesty for the consideration of Parliament, a remedy for these evils; so that every clergyman "who wilfully breaks the common order and discipline of the Church" may be restrained, and if he perseveres be then suspended and deposed.

 Mr. Droop.

Counsel for Respondent.

Mr. W. M. James, Q.C.
 Mr. Prideaux, Q.C.
 Dr. Tristram.
 Mr. E. Charles.

Proctor for Promoter, Messrs. MOORE & CUREY, instructed by Mr. J. M. DALE.

Proctor for Respondent, Mr. GEORGE H. BROOKS.

FIRST DAY.

The Registrar reads a minute whereby the Delegates of the Official Principal resigned their powers to try this cause to the Right Hon. Sir R. J. Phillimore, and made a minute to the same effect in the Court Book. Mr. Edward Morton Walsh is sworn as short-hand writer for the Promoter, and Mr. Thomas Meredith for the Respondent.

(Mr. Stephens.) Perhaps it may be almost superfluous for me to remark that from the resignation of the two surrogates or commissaries and the entry on the records of the Court, whatever power your Lordship may have delegated to them has now been exhausted, and whatever powers you had before the issuing of the Commission are now again absolutely vested in your Lordship.

May I now be permitted to ask your Lordship how many counsel you will hear on each side? Is it unlimited, or will you restrict it according to the usual practice of this Court to two counsel? It is a matter of perfect indifference to me.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think it would be sufficient to hear two counsel in this case, but if any application is made to me, considering the important character of the proceedings, I will listen to that application; at present it will be sufficient to say that I will hear two counsel.

(Mr. Stephens.) I think my learned friend and myself should come to some understanding on the subject at the present moment.

(Mr. James.) Your Lordship sees it is a very important case.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am not at all inclined in this case to deprive myself of the benefit of any assistance I can derive from counsel, and if either of the leaders are of opinion that it is expedient that more than two counsel should be heard I think I should hear more.

(Mr. Stephens.) Your Lordship must perceive the position in which I as counsel for the Promoter am placed. Supposing Mr. Coleridge and myself, in order to save your Lordship's time, do not think proper to avail ourselves of the assistance of our learned friends, Dr. Swabey and Mr. Droop, and that the opposite side think it proper to call for the assistance of Dr. Tristram and Mr. Charles, your Lordship will perceive that the opposite side will receive a degree of assistance which we have not received.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Why? I do not understand. I do not propose to exclude Dr. Swabey and Mr. Droop, but to hear them.

(Mr. Stephens.) Then your Lordship will hear four counsel on each side.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I will certainly hear three and perhaps four counsel.

(Mr. Stephens.) Your Lordship, as I understand, will certainly hear three counsel?

(The Dean of the Arches.) Certainly.

(Mr. Stephens.) If your Lordship pleases, before I open the articles I propose to call two or three witnesses. They will not occupy your Lordship's attention long.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Before you open the articles?

(Mr. Stephens.) That was my intention.

(Mr. James.) I do not know whether that is the usual course. It does not seem to me to be a very convenient course, because one ought to know upon what articles you are going to examine witnesses.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think it will be convenient that you should make a short statement to the Court as to the subject upon which these witnesses are to be examined before you call them.

(Mr. Stephens.) If your Lordship pleases. In the responsive allegation put in by the Respondent, it is charged that some of the facts of the case have been untruly stated. All I propose to do at the present stage is to call evidence so far as regards that particular point, and it is only with respect to the elevation.

(Mr. James.) I do not know what dispute there is between us.

(Mr. Stephens.) It is with regard to the third article; it is the responsive allegation, "Whereas in the third article it is pleaded that the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie—"

(The Dean of the Arches.) Would not the more regular course be that you should prove the averments contained in your articles?

(Mr. Stephens.) As I understand, they are admitted, my Lord.

(Mr. James.) I should have thought the whole thing was admitted for all the purposes of this argument.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No; this question of the elevation of the patent is not admitted.

(Mr. Stephens.) How can it be admitted when it is stated in the responsive allegation to the third article, that it is in part untruly pleaded?

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then the best course will be to call your witnesses to prove that part of the case.

(Mr. Stephens.) That was the course I was about to pursue.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I see no objection to it at all.

(Dr. Swabey.) We will now call Mr. Beames. The evidence will be confined entirely to the third of our articles, the third paragraph of their responsive allegation, which my learned friend has pointed out, at all events not fully admitting the statement in our third article. I think all the rest of the articles are fully admitted, at least sufficiently admitted for our purpose.

Mr. FRANCIS BEAMES SWORN, examined by Dr. Swabey.

1. Were you present at St. Alban's Church on Sunday, the 23rd of December last?—I was.

2. And on Christmas day following that Sunday?—Yes, I was.

3. Was that at the 11 o'clock, or at the half-past 11 o'clock service?—About that time.

4. (The Dean of the Arches.) Which service; the 11 or the half-past 11 o'clock service?—I think they call it the second service; about a quarter-past 11 the bell tolled.

5. (Mr. Swabey.) Was Mr. Mackonochie one of the officiating clergymen on that day?—The gentleman I see present (pointing to Mr. Mackonochie) was the gentleman that officiated.

6. On both days was Mr. Mackonochie there?—Yes, he was there on both days.

7. I do not want to know wholly what you saw, but direct your attention to that part of the service where the communion was celebrated; were you present during that?—Yes, I was.

8. Did you attend particularly to what took place during the reading of the prayer of consecration?—Yes, I did.

9. Was your attention attracted to anything the clergyman did with the paten?—Something I had never seen before; the paten was put above the head at one part of the service (describing the elevation).

10. (The Dean of the Arches.) Just do that again; you say it was lifted up?—The paten was elevated above the head.

11. Above the head?—Yes, as high as the vestments on the arm would allow.

12. Was it above the head?—Yes, above the head, decidedly.

13. (Dr. Swabey.) Can you tell his Lordship at what particular time that elevation took place?—It was at the time in the Prayer-book, which I have here—I do not know whether it is called the consecration prayer, but it is at the consecration of the bread and wine—where it says, or somewhere about that part, "The same night that he was betrayed he took bread."

14. Was that the time?—As near as I can recollect that was the time.

15. Will you just run your eyes over the words that follow? You say the elevation took place after those words?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, he says at the time.

(The Witness.) About the time.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The paten was elevated at the time these words were uttered, "In the same night that he was betrayed he took bread." That is what I have taken down.

16. (Dr. Swabey.) What did the clergyman do with the paten after he had so elevated it?—He returned it.

17. To where?—He returned it, as far as I recollect, to the place from which he took it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Let me have that answer.

(Mr. James.) "He returned it to the place from whence he took it."

18. (The Dean of the Arches.) What was that place; the holy table I suppose?—Yes, the communion table.

19. (Dr. Swabey.) Did anything attract your notice with regard to the chalice or cup?—The same thing; an elevation took place of that in the same manner, though not at the same time.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Describe how it took place

20. (Dr. Swabey.) Just refer to the words of the Prayer-book, and then, perhaps, you will be able to tell his Lordship exactly what took place with respect to the cup?—I think it was about the time of these words: "Drink ye all of this."

21. (The Dean of the Arches.) What happened then?—Then the cup was elevated.

22. How?—In the same manner (describing as before).

23. Elevated above the head?—Yes, above the head.

24. (Dr. Swabey.) Did the cup and paten remain long in that position above the head?—Oh, quite an appreciable time.

25. Either before or after the elevation did you notice whether the clergyman knelt or not?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Do not lead the witness.

(The Witness.) Yes, the surrounding clergymen; some of the clergymen knelt and prostrated themselves on the steps.

(The Dean of the Arches, to Dr. Swabey.) What was your question?

(Dr. Swabey.) Whether before or after the elevation and during the prayer of consecration the witness noticed any kneeling on the part of the clergyman?

(The Dean of the Arches.) Clergymen or clergyman?

(Dr. Swabey.) I intended it, my Lord, with regard to the officiating priest.

(The Witness.) The three clergymen knelt.

26. (Dr. Swabey.) First of all with regard to the clergyman who had elevated the cup and paten?—He prostrated himself.

27. (The Dean of the Arches.) Am I to take it in this way—"Mr. Mackonochie then prostrated himself"?—I do not know as to Mr. Mackonochie; it was the gentleman to whom I have pointed.

28. What is it that I understand you to say, that he then prostrated himself?—On his knees with his head to the ground.

(Dr. Swabey.) You say that he knelt on his knees, and inclined his head.

(Mr. Prideaux.) He did not say so.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The words are these, "Mr. Mackonochie then prostrated himself on his knees with his head to the ground." It is important to get the exact words.

29. (Dr. Swabey.) Did you observe whether the other clergymen knelt in the same way?—Two others in the same manner on the step behind him.

30. Referring to the Prayer-book, tell us at what particular time this kneeling took place?—At the time when the cup containing the liquor was elevated.

31. I presume the clergyman while he was holding up the cup did not kneel?—Certainly not.

32. When did he kneel?—After he had replaced it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is the meaning of this answer, "At the time when the cup containing the liquor was elevated;" I suppose it refers to the other clergymen?

(Dr. Swabey.) That was what I was coming to.

33. Who do you mean knelt at the time when the cup was elevated?—The two assistant clergy.

34. (The Dean of the Arches.) And when was it that Mr. Mackonochie knelt?—He knelt immediately afterwards.

35. (Dr. Swabey.) After the cup was replaced, as I understand?—Yes.

36. And did the same kneeling take place when the paten was elevated?—In the same way.

37. This was on the 23rd of December?—The 23rd of December; the Sunday before Christmas-day.

38. (The Dean of the Arches.) And on the Christmas-day following?—Yes.

The Reverend HENRY MALIN sworn, examined by Mr. Coleridge, Q.C.

40. I believe you are a clergyman of the Church of England?—I am.

41. Do you live at Blackheath?—I live in that neighbourhood.

42. Have you a church there?—No.

43. Have you attended on any occasion the services at St. Alban's?—I attended on the 30th of December last, and on the 13th of January.

(Mr. James.) I do not think the 13th of January is charged.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, only the 30th of December; they charge the 25th and 30th of December.

44. (Mr. Coleridge.) Very well, we will take the first. We will confine it to that. I will just take you to this, if you please. I do not want to ask you about any other portions of the service; but be good enough to confine your attention to the prayer of consecration, and to what took place during that prayer when you were there. First of all, did Mr. Mackonochie consecrate on the 30th of December?—Mr. Mackonochie did not.

45. But although he did not consecrate, was he present?—Yes.

46. Was he one of the clergymen?—Yes, he was the assisting priest.

47. He was one of the assisting clergymen?—Yes.

48. Was he at the altar?—Yes, he was there.

49. If he did not consecrate I do not ask you as to those portions of the charge which refer to the elevation of the paten and cup, but did he during the prayer of consecration kneel or prostrate himself or do any thing of that sort?—All the clergy except the consecrating clergyman knelt after the words of consecration were uttered. There was a pause in the middle of the prayer immediately after the consecration of the paten.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The consecration of the paten?

(Mr. Coleridge.) He means of the bread, my Lord.

50. (The Dean of the Arches.) You say there was a pause?—There was a pause, and the paten was elevated above the head of the consecrating clergyman, and then a special prostration on the part of the clergy took place.

51. (The Dean of the Arches.) What do you mean by a special prostration?—Some of them were already kneeling and they threw their bodies forward, and it was observable in several of the members of the congregation as well.

52. (Mr. Coleridge.) I must confine you to what you observed yourself?—I am speaking of what I observed myself.

53. I understand you say they moved themselves forward. Were any of them standing?—The consecrating priest was standing.

54. Yes of course, but were any of the others standing?—No.

55. You say the consecrating priest was standing; what did he do after he had said the words of the consecration prayer and elevated the paten above his head as you have described?—After he had replaced it on the altar, the same ceremony took place on his part as the others.

56. You mean he knelt?—He knelt.

57. (The Dean of the Arches.) I have not got who the consecrating clergyman was. You say it was not Mr. Mackonochie?—On the 30th of December it was not.

58. (Mr. Coleridge.) Do you happen to know who

39. Your evidence applies to both days?—To both days.

(Mr. James.) I have no question to ask this witness.

it was?—I do not know the gentleman personally, but I believe it was Mr. Walker.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I only wanted to know who it was not, that was all.

59. (Mr. Coleridge.) Mr. Mackonochie, you say, was present as one of the assisting clergymen when this was done?—He afterwards administered the cup.

60. You say the bread was consecrated and elevated over the head of the priest, and then you say this prostration or kneeling was done by the consecrating priest. Was that in the middle of the prayer?—In the middle of the prayer.

61. (The Dean of the Arches.) Stop. I have not got that down yet. This throwing of the body forward was in the middle of the prayer?—Yes.

62. (Mr. Coleridge.) And also this kneeling of the priest after the consecration of the bread?—Yes.

63. Do I understand you that the consecrating priest knelt down after he had consecrated the bread?—I am now speaking of nearly a year ago; to the best of my knowledge.

64. Just pay attention to me. You never can be assumed to speak, except to the best of your recollection, you know. Are we to understand that after the consecrating priest had consecrated the bread and raised it over his head, as described, and then placed it on the table, he then knelt down, and proceeded with the rest of the consecration prayer?—He then went on with the rest of the prayer.

65. When you speak of this kneeling or prostration, was it for any lengthened time?—For a very appreciable or perceptible period.

66. (The Dean of the Arches.) What is the expression you make use of?—A very appreciable or perceptible time.

67. (Mr. Coleridge.) Was it time enough to make a marked pause in the consecration prayer itself?—It was a decidedly marked pause.

68. Having done that you say he proceeded with the rest of the consecration prayer; what did he do with the chalice?—The chalice was elevated on the 30th of December in the same way.

69. Before or after the words, "This is my blood"?—Afterwards; I may say partly contemporaneously, and partly after.

70. (The Dean of the Arches.) Let me see if I have got your answer rightly. You say, "he did the same with the chalice"?—Yes, the consecrating clergyman elevated the chalice above his head in the same way as he had done with the paten.

71. And then what did he do?—There was the same prostration after that.

72. (Mr. Coleridge.) What I want to know is this; the words of consecration, as we commonly observe, are said, and at the same time one hand is placed on one or other of the elements, whichever is being consecrated at the time. How was that done?—I did not see.

73. Before or after?—Before the elevation.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The rubric is, "And here he shall lay his hand on every vessel."

74. (Mr. Coleridge.) You say the elevation was after that?—After the act of consecration.

75. Was the chalice placed upon the table?—To the best of my belief it was.

76. And after that was done there was a second kneeling?—Yes.

77. Was that of the same sort, lasting for the same time and making the same pause in the prayer that the former one had done?—Yes, it appeared to me so.

Cross-examined by Mr. Prideaux.

78. Was it contemporaneously with saying the words, "This is my body," or immediately afterwards?—Immediately afterwards.

79. Are you sure of it?—I feel sure of it.

80. Did you particularly observe?—Yes.

81. It was immediately afterwards, was it not.

You told us just now it was almost cotemporaneous?—Yes, it was almost, but it was not precisely. I am confining myself now to the 30th of December,

82. That I understand; was it also immediately after the consecration of the cup that the kneeling took place; was it almost cotemporaneous in that case also?—It was a similar act.

83. You say the other clergymen were kneeling during the whole of the prayer of consecration?—I believe so.

84. Were you kneeling?—Yes.

85. During the whole time of the prayer of consecration?—I will not be positive about that.

86. (The Dean of the Arches.) You were kneeling?—I will not be positive about it.

87. Cannot you recollect?—I am not certain.

88. (Mr. Prideaux.) Do you mean to say that you do not know whether you did kneel or not?—I am not certain; but I believe I was kneeling.

89. Is it your practice when you are not assisting at the holy communion to kneel during the prayer of consecration?—Yes.

90. And of course I need not ask you whether when you communicate, not assisting at the celebration, you also kneel?—Yes, of course, I also kneel.

91. (The Dean of the Arches.) This will be the answer: "Of course I kneel when I communicate"?—Of course.

92. (Mr. Prideaux.) When you celebrate yourself do you kneel when you receive the consecrated elements?—Yes.

93. I will ask you one other question, what do you mean by prostration? You say the other clergymen were kneeling?—There was a special bending of the body forward on the occasion to which I allude.

94. In other words a reverential bending downwards?—I should speak of it as somewhat excessive.

95. That is the description you give—a somewhat excessive bending forwards?—A somewhat excessive bending forwards.

96. Nothing more than that will you undertake to say?—I think that fairly represents it.

97. Will you undertake to say it was nothing more in your judgment than a somewhat excessive bending forward at the time of consecration?—I should say it was very excessive.

Re-examined by Mr. Coleridge.

98. That, you see, is the use of cross-examination; but were those clergymen on their knees at the time they bent forward?—Yes.

99. Then it was something beyond bending their knees?—Oh, certainly; it was a bending of the upper part of the body.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I want to ask this witness a question.

100. Did you say you were a clergyman at Blackheath?—Yes.

101. By prostration, have I got your meaning correctly when you say the clergymen were kneeling?—The assistant clergy were already kneeling.

102. And while they were so kneeling they bent forward?—Yes.

103. You say in a very excessive manner; do you mean that their bodies touched the ground?—I really cannot say whether their bodies actually touched the ground; I should say not.

104. Did their foreheads touch the ground?—I really cannot say; I was some way behind them.

105. You were behind them at the time?—I was in the nave of the church.

106. Were you behind them all the time they were doing these things?—Yes.

(Mr. Stephens.) I have no more witnesses to call, my Lord; I do not know whether my learned friend, Mr. James, has any witnesses.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You had better go on with your case.

(Mr. Stephens.) My Lord, in this case the articles allege, "That by an Act of Parliament passed in a session of Parliament holden in the first year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, cap. 2, and by another Act of Parliament passed in a session of Parliament holden in the 13th and 14th years of the reign of King Charles 2nd, cap. 4; and by another Act of Parliament passed in a session of Parliament holden in the 28th and 29th years of the Queen, cap. 122, and by the 14th, 36th, and 38th of the constitutions and canons ecclesiastical, treated upon by the Bishop of London, president of the convocation for the province of Canterbury and the rest of the bishops and clergy of the said province, and agreed upon with the licence of His Majesty King James I., in their synod begun at London in the year of our Lord 1603, ratified by his said Majesty's letters patent under the great seal of England, all clerks and ministers in holy orders are, among other things, bound to say and use the Book of Common Prayer and administration of the sacraments, and other rites and ceremonies of the church, according to the use of the United Church of England and Ireland."

The second article alleges, "That Alexander Heriot Mackonochie was and is a clerk in holy orders of the United Church of England and Ireland, and was during the entire of the year 1866 the lawful incumbent and perpetual curate of the new parish of St. Alban, Holborn." The third article alleges, "That the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie has in his said church, and within two years last past (to wit on Sunday, the 23rd day of December, on Christmas-day last past, and on Sunday the 30th of December, all in the year of our Lord 1866), during the prayer of consecration in the order of administration of the Holy Communion elevated the paten above his head and permitted and sanctioned such elevation, and taken into his hands the cup, and elevated it above his head during the prayer of consecration aforesaid, and permitted and sanctioned the cup to be so taken and elevated, and knelt or prostrated himself, and sanctioned such kneeling or prostrating by other clerks in holy orders." The fourth article is of a merely formal character. The fifth article alleges "That the said A. H. Mackonochie has in his said church, and within two years last past (to wit on Sunday, the 23rd day of December, on Christmas-day last past, and on Sunday the 30th day of December, on Christmas-day last past, and on Sunday the 30th day of December, all in the year of our Lord 1866; and on Sunday the 13th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1867), used lighted candles on the communion table; during the celebration of the Holy Communion at times when such lighted candles were not wanted for the purpose of giving light, and permitted and sanctioned such use of lighted candles." The sixth article is merely formal. The seventh article states, "That the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie has in his said church, and within two years last past (to wit on Sunday the 23rd day of December, on Christmas-day last past, and on Sunday the 30th day of December, all in the year of our Lord 1866), used incense for censuring persons and things in and during the celebration of the Holy Communion, and permitted and sanctioned such use of incense." The eighth alleges, "That he the said A. H. Mackonochie has in his said church, and within two years last past (to wit on Sunday the 13th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1867), unlawfully used incense, in and during the celebration of the Holy Communion, and permitted and sanctioned such unlawful use of incense." The ninth article is of a merely formal character. The tenth states, "That the said A. H. Mackonochie has in his said church and within two years last past (to wit, on Sunday the 23rd day of December, on Christmas-day last past, and on Sunday the 30th of December, all in the year of our Lord 1866, and on Sunday the “ 13th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1867), during the celebration of the Holy Communion mixed water with the wine used in the administration of the Holy Communion, and permitted and sanctioned such mixing, and the administration to the communicants of the wine and water so mixed.” The eleventh article is merely formal. The twelfth article prays that there shall be taken and read as part of these articles “ A certain printed paper pamphlet marked with the letter A, intituled ‘ St. Alban’s, ‘ Holborn. An Address to his Parishioners, by the ‘ Perpetual Curate.’ ” The thirteenth article is merely formal. The fourteenth states, “ That on the complaint of John Martin of Baldwin’s Gardens, in the said parish or ecclesiastical district, the Right Reverend Archibald Campbell, Lord Bishop of London, has, by virtue of an Act of Parliament, made and passed in a session of Parliament holden in the third and fourth years of the Queen, cap. 86, sent the case in the first instance by Letters of Request under his hand and seal to the judge of the Arches Court.”

The first allegation in the responsive allegation admits that Mr. Mackonochie is the incumbent of St. Alban’s.

With reference, my Lord, to the remainder of that allegation, and also with reference to the second allegation, I am perfectly ready to read them in extenso, but I submit they have nothing to do with the matters in issue. We should have taken the opinion of the Court on this matter, but we did not wish to incur the expense. The allegations in question are really nihil ad rem. The first allegation gives an account of the population of the parish; and that the parish has been for many years past a common resort of thieves and prostitutes. The second allegation states that Mr. Mackonochie’s stipend has only been 150*l.* per annum. It then gives the number of services since Advent Sunday, 1866; that on Easter Sunday, 1867, the Holy Communion was administered to 515 persons, and that during the last year there have been 17,392 communicants; that 2,000*l.* have been received by the offertory during the year. It alludes to the day schools, and that the spiritual wants of the parish have required the assistance of five curates. Then Mr. Mackonochie speaks of himself in the following language, that he has “ with the most unwearied zeal and self-devotion faithfully and diligently discharged his duty as a minister in accordance with and in conformity to the laws, canons, and constitutions of the Church of England, and has conducted himself and the services of the said church without any complaint on the part of and to the great satisfaction of the majority of the inhabitants of the said district, amongst whom he is held in high esteem and regard as well for the manner in which he with the cooperation of his curates performs his public ministrations, as for his attention to the schools and also to the poor and sick of the said parish or ecclesiastical district, and that such esteem, satisfaction, and regard continue undiminished up to the present time. That from the time he became incumbent of the said parish up to the present time, neither of the two churchwardens of the said parish, one of whom is appointed by the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie and the other by the inhabitants of the said parish in vestry assembled, has presented or made any complaint against the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie to the Lord Bishop of the diocese at his visitations, or have they presented or made any complaint against him to the Archdeacon.” Such I believe is a correct abstract of the allegations. Nos. 1 & 2; and it is quite clear they have nothing to do with the matters in issue.

Respecting the third allegation it is as follows:— “ Whereas in the third article given in and admitted as amended in this cause, it is pleaded that the said A. H. Mackonochie has, to wit, on Sunday the 23rd day of December, on Christmas-day last past, on Sunday the 30th day of December, all in the year 1866, during the prayer of consecration in “ the order of the administration of the Holy Communion elevated the paten above his head, and permitted and sanctioned such elevation; and taken into his hands the cup and elevated it above his head during the prayer of consecration aforesaid, and permitted and sanctioned the cup to be so taken and elevated, and knelt or prostrated himself before the consecrated elements during the prayer of consecration, and permitted and sanctioned such kneeling or prostration by other clerks in holy orders. Now the same is in part untruly pleaded, for the party proponent alleges that whilst he admits that the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie did on the said two Sundays and on Christmas-day during the prayer of consecration kneel and sanction kneeling by other clerks before the Lord’s table, he denies that his said party did on the said two Sundays, and on the said Christmas-day, kneel or prostrate himself before the consecrated elements aforesaid, or permit and sanction such kneeling or prostration by other clerks in Holy Orders, as in the third article pleaded; and he further alleges that whilst he admits that he did on the said two Sundays and Christmas-day, in the said third article mentioned, elevate and sanction the elevation by other clerks of the paten and cup above his head, as in the said third article pleaded, yet that such elevation of the paten and cup has been wholly discontinued by the said A. H. Mackonochie during the administration of the Holy Communion ever since the said 30th day of December 1866, and long prior to the institution of this suit; that such practice was discontinued in consequence of legal advice and in compliance with the expressed wish of the Lord Bishop of the Diocese of London, and with a resolution of Convocation, as was well known to the Promoter of this suit before he instituted the same.” In the fourth allegation the defendant denies that the elevation of the paten and the taking and elevation of the cup so discontinued as aforesaid, and the kneeling and prostration charged in the said article, are severally unlawful additions to and variations from the form and order prescribed and appointed by the said statutes and by the said Book of Common Prayer.” The fifth allegation states that the fifth article is “ in part untruly pleaded, for the party proponent alleges that on the said three Sundays and Christmas-day in the said fifth article mentioned, the lighted candles were not placed on the communion table, but upon a narrow moveable ledge of wood resting on the said table, and that the said candles were so placed and kept lighted not during the celebration of the Holy Communion only, as falsely alleged in the said fifth article, but also during the whole of the reading of the communion service, including the epistle and gospel, and during the singing after the reading of the Nicene Creed, and during the delivery of the sermon.” In the sixth allegation “ the Defendant denies that the use of such lighted candles is an unlawful addition to, and variation from, the form and order prescribed and appointed by the said statutes and by the said Book of Common Prayer.” And in the seventh allegation he admits that “ on the 23rd day of December, on Christmas-day last past, and on Sunday the 30th December, he used incense for censuring persons and things in and during the celebration of the Holy Communion, and permitted and sanctioned such use of incense, but the party proponent alleges that ever since the said 30th day of December 1866 the said A. H. Mackonochie, as was well known to the promoter of this suit prior to the institution thereof, desisted from so doing, and has ever since discontinued the said ceremony, on being apprised by the opinion of counsel that such usage was of a doubtful legality, and that he has never since reintroduced the said ceremony, as appears in the published address of the said A. H. Mackonochie to his parishioners dated January 1867, and exhibited and appended to the articles brought in and admitted in this cause.” In the eighth allegation the Defendant “ admits that he has in “ his said church, to wit, on Sunday the 13th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1867, caused and allowed incense to be burned during the reading of the prayer of consecration and afterwards until the time for the administration of the Communion to the people, and permitted and sanctioned such use of incense, but that he denies that he used the same unlawfully or that such use is unlawful.” The ninth allegation states, “That he denies that such uses of incense as in the seventh and eighth articles alleged are severally an unlawful addition to and variation from the form and order prescribed and appointed by the said statutes and by the said Book of Common Prayer and administration of the sacraments and other rites and ceremonies of the church, and are contrary to the said statutes, and to the 14th, 36th, and 38th of the said constitutions and canons as in the ninth article alleged.” In the tenth allegation “ the Defendant admits the 10th article ” (which relates to the mixed chalice) “ to be true ;” but in the eleventh he denies that such mixing and administration of the wine and water as in the said 10th article alleged is an unlawful addition to and variation from the form and order prescribed and appointed by the said statutes and by the said Book of Common Prayer.

In the twelfth allegation he admits the address that was published in January 1867, and in the thirteenth allegation “ he denies that the complainant—” I do not know whether your Lordship thinks it is requisite that I should go into this statement respecting the complainant, but I will read it in extenso, if it is thought desirable that I should do so.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You had better take your own course.

(Mr. Stephens.) Very well, my Lord. The statement has nothing to say to the matters in issue, and therefore I need not read it.

The promoter in this suit, my Lord, is Mr. John Martin, a gentleman well known and respected for his energy and self-devotion in the promotion of many public measures of benevolence during the last 30 years. Mr. Martin has personally superintended the management of two large schools within what is now called the parish of St. Alban's. These schools are known by the name of “Baldwin's Gardens National Schools.” Hence the great anxiety of the promoter that the parochial clergy of St. Alban's should use the rites and ceremonies prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer, and that they should likewise teach the doctrines of the Protestant faith. All the charges in the articles fall under one class ; they are other rites and ceremonies than those prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer, and the offences charged are offences against the Acts of Uniformity as a whole.

The questions that have been substantially raised in this case are not between ritual and no ritual, but between the simple and pure ritual of the reformed church, and a ritual unauthorized by that church and borrowed from the Church of Rome. There is a doctrine within the ceremonial, which is now the subject of complaint, that gives it a significance and an influence,—because it symbolises the errors, it symbolises the superstitions, it symbolises the corruptions, and finally it symbolises the idolatries from which the church, under the blessings of Divine Providence, was freed at the time of the Reformation and by the subsequent Acts of Uniformity.

Before I proceed, my Lord, to comment in detail upon the respective allegations in the articles, I think it desirable, in order to elucidate such comments, to draw your Lordship's attention to the provisions of the Acts of Uniformity of Edward VI., of Elizabeth, and of Charles II., because such statutes apply to all the allegations in the articles.

The principle upon which our reformers proceeded in framing such Acts of Parliament has been most ably and clearly stated by one of the most learned, one of the most able, and one of the most respected judges that ever presided in any ecclesiastical court in this country. I allude to Dr. Lushington, who in Westerton and Liddell, page 80 of Moore's report, is reported to have said : “ Upon what principle did the Church proceed ? Upon the principle of excluding from the Church of England all forms of worship ; all ceremonies ; all observances ; all ornaments ; which had misled the people from the true worship of God, and transferred it to forbidden objects,—which had inculcated superstitious notions and led to superstitious practices. And this was the reason and this the foundation of the Acts and all the proceedings of the Reformation.”

I will now ask your Lordship's attention to the provisions of the 13th & 14th Charles II., cap. 4., the Act of Uniformity now in force. The second section, after reciting “ that nothing can conduce more to the settling of the peace of this nation, nor to the honour of our religion, and the propagation thereof, than an universal agreement in the worship of Almighty God, and to the intent that every person in this realm may certainly know the rule to which he is to conform in public worship and administration of Sacraments, and other rites and ceremonies of the Church of England,” enacts—“ that all ministers shall be bound to say and use the Morning Prayer, Evening Prayer, celebration and administration of both the sacraments, and all other the public and common prayer in such order and form as is mentioned in the book annexed and joined to this present Act, intituled ‘The Book of Common Prayer, and administration of the sacraments and other rites and ceremonies of the Church according to the use of the Church of England.’”

The phraseology of this statute is almost identical, so far as regards the questions now in issue, with the preceding Acts of Uniformity ; and it therefore becomes expedient to direct attention to the first Act of Uniformity, when the language was first used, and to consider the meaning then ascribed to it.

Although at the termination of the reign of Henry VIII.—the jurisdiction of the Pope had been abolished and the supremacy of the Crown established ; although monasticism had been abolished ; although the Old and New Testaments had been translated into English and disseminated among the people ; although religious formularies had been published in English, such as primers, litanies, and psalters ; although a reformed edition of the Salisbury Breviary and the missal had been circulated ;—yet the doctrines of the Church of Rome prevailed. The ancient canons and constitutions and the old service books were in full force. Henry VIII., when he died, had left 600*l.* per annum to the dean and canons of Windsor, in order that two priests might be for ever employed in saying masses for his soul in St. George's Chapel, where he was buried. Lord Chancellor Wriothesley and the great majority of leading men at that time were Roman Catholics.

Perhaps I cannot afford your Lordship a better illustration of the state of things which existed immediately anterior to the reign of King Edward VI. than by referring your Lordship to Cardwell's Liturgies, page vi. of the preface : “ Edward VI., on succeeding to the throne, found the cause of the Reformation advanced to the following extent : “ The Church of England was a distinct body, acknowledging no allegiance whatever to the Church of Rome. The Bible had been translated into English ; and though close limits had been placed on the circulation of it, it had been publicly declared to be ‘the only touchstone of true learning.’ The Litany and other portions of the public service had also been translated and published together with many forms of private prayer, in order that all ‘such as are ignorant of any strange or foreign speech may have what to pray in their own acquainted and familiar language with fruit and understanding.’ Several superstitious ceremonies and flagrant abuses had been removed, having also been exposed to public contempt ; and commissioners " had been appointed to alter the services of the church, to draw up a new code of ecclesiastical laws, and to correct other superstitious practices still remaining." . . . . . " When the impediments presented by the character of Henry had been removed by his death, it seemed as if a new impulse had suddenly risen up within the nation; displaying at once the maturity of its strength, and rejoicing as a giant to run its course."

I will now direct your Lordship's attention to four statutes that were enacted in the first year of the reign of Edward VI. relating to doctrine and to matters of religion. The first is 1 Edward VI., cap. 1. It is an Act "against such as shall unreverently speak against the sacrament of the altar and of the receiving thereof, under both kinds." This statute was to check the violent and irreverent language which was used against the sacrament in defiance of the severest penal legislation, by the moderate penalties of fine and imprisonment, and it also provides for the cup as well as the bread being administered to the people.

The second statute is the 1st Edward VI., cap. 2. It is an Act for "the election of bishops and what seal and style they and other spiritual persons exercising jurisdiction shall use." I have no observations to make upon that statute.

The next is a very important statute. It is the 1st Edward VI., cap. 12, sect. 2. That statute, I believe, is not to be found in the ordinary editions of the statutes of the realm, and is only to be found in the folio edition.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is it in your book, Mr. Stephens.

(Mr. Stephens.) No, my Lord, it is not. I will hand this folio up to your lordship if you wish. This statute repealed the statute of the 5th Richard II., statute 2., cap. 5., and the statute of 2nd Henry V., cap. 7., which were made against the Lollards, and had been put in force in the reign of Henry VIII. It also repealed the 25th Henry VIII. cap. 14., concerning the punishment of heretics and Lollards; the statute of the six articles, (the 31st Henry VIII., cap. 14.,) which, as your Lordship no doubt remembers, enforced under the penalty of death: I. The doctrine of Transubstantiation; II. The denial of the cup to the laity; III. The celibacy of priests; IV. Vows of chastity; V. Private mass; and VI. Auricular confession. Such, I believe, are the principal provisions of that statute. It also repealed the statute of the 34th & 35th Henry VIII., cap. 1., abolishing all books contrary to the doctrine set forth since 1540 to be set forth by the King, prohibiting under heavy penalties all teaching contrary to such doctrine, and placing restrictions on the circulation and reading of the Bible in English.

(Mr. Prideaux.) What statute is that you are referring to?

(Mr. Stephens.) The 34th & 35th Henry VIII., cap. 1. The statute of the 34th and 35th Henry VIII., cap. 5., was also abolished, which had in some degree qualified the statute of the six articles. Then comes the very important language of this statute, (the 1st Edward VI., cap. 12. s. 2) which abolishes "all and every other Act or Acts of Parliament concerning doctrine and matters of religion." Now I submit to your Lordship the effect of the 1 Edward VI. c. 12 is, that every existing Act of Parliament at that time, namely in 1547, relating to doctrine or other matters of religion, became repealed; and that every document issued under any such Act, or deriving authority from any such Act, lost its statutory authority. Therefore, at this time there was a tabula rasa of all Acts of Parliament relating to doctrine or other matters of religion, and all documents emanating from such Acts of Parliament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is what I want to know. Your argument is that there is a tabula rasa relating to all that went before?

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly, my Lord. I now call your Lordship's attention to 1 & 2 Edward VI., cap.

14. That I believe is only to be found in extenso, in the folio edition of the Statutes of the Realm. It is "An Act whereby certain Chantries, colleges, free chapels, and the possession of the same be given to the King's majesty."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is in your collection, is it not? It is in your book, Mr. Stephens. You do an injustice when you say it is not. I have got it here in your own book.

(Mr. Stephens.) My Lord, I am not in the habit of doing that. I see it is in my book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You will find it at page 294 of your own book.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am much obliged to your Lordship for that information. The sections which appear to me to be applicable to the questions at issue are sections 4, 5, 6, 7, and 19. I mention this to save your Lordship trouble. Section 5 is the important section, but I will very shortly direct your Lordship's attention to the effect of the other sections. This Act, after condemning "the vain opinions of purgatory and masses satisfactory," which "by nothing more is maintained than by the abuse of trentals, chantries, and other provisions," and reciting that "The conversion of these to godly uses, as in the erecting of grammar schools for the education of youth, and for the further augmenting of the universities and better providing for the poor and needy, must be committed to the Crown," provides in substance, that all colleges, chantries, and free chapels with certain exceptions (section 19), and "All lands assigned for the finding of a priest or the maintenance of any anniversary or obit or of any light or lamp in any church or chapel, should from the Easter following belong to the king."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Are you reading the 5th section?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then it is not quite identical with your book, because in your book it is this way: "The said priest shall have or hold." However it does not signify, the substance is here. Just read that 5th section from the beginning.

(Mr. Stephens.) "Also where part of the issues or revenues of any manors, lands, tenements, rents, or other hereditaments, hath, by any of the ways or means above said, been given, assigned, or appointed to be bestowed," now come the important words, "to the finding and maintenance."

(The Dean of the Arches.) "Employed wholly" is the phrase in your edition, and there is a note to the word "wholly" which is printed in italics. It is "assigned or appointed to go or to be employed to the finding or maintenance wholly;" and there is a learned note to the word "wholly."

(Mr. Stephens.) There is not a statute in that book, of which the text was not taken from a copy of the Queen's printers.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is very likely; all I want to know is, which is the right one to be followed; your copy is different from the one I have.

(Mr. Stephens.) I should respectfully contend, my Lord, that the edition which has been printed by the order of the Record Commission should be trusted.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, but you have put the word "wholly" in italics.

(Mr. Stephens.) My Lord I am afraid you are on the 4th section.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No, the 5th.

(Mr. Stephens.) The sections in the folio edition do not always run the same as in the ordinary edition of the statutes of the realm.

(Mr. Coleridge.) Your Lordship is reading quite correctly from what is the 5th section in the ordinary edition, but it is the 4th section in the edition my friend is reading from.

(Mr. Stephens.) That is what has given rise to the mistake.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The 4th section begins

"Provided always, and be it enacted, that when and so soon."

(Mr. Stephens.) That is the 3rd section in the book from which I am quoting.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then the 6th section will be the one.

(Mr. Stephens.) My Lord, the sections are different in my edition of the Ecclesiastical statutes from the edition published by the Record Commissioners.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I see it is the same language as in the 6th.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord, precisely the same. And also where part of the issues or revenues of any manors, lands, tenements, rents, or other hereditaments, hath by any of the ways or means above said been given, assigned, or appointed to be bestowed or employed to the finding or maintenance of any anniversary or obit, or any other like thing, intent, or purpose, or of any light or lamp in any church or chapel to have continuance for ever." Then it goes on, "From the Easter following, all the revenues for the support of any light or lamp vested in the Crown."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, I see that.

(Mr. Stephens.) Therefore, every endowment for the support of lights or lamps anterior to this statute, was taken away, and the property vested in the Crown. From the provisions of the Ecclesiastical Statutes which were enacted in the first of Edward the VI., it is clear, that the Reformation was in a state of transition. Parliament merely remedied (1), the gross abuses of the communion in one kind only, (2), and of trentals and chantries, and put it in the power of the King's council to remedy other flagrant abuses, and prepare the way for the new service, which was then in the course of preparation, by repealing all Acts of Parliament relating to doctrine and matters of religion, and thus removing all practical obstacles to the exercise of the King's ecclesiastical supremacy. It appears that in August 1547, some months before the session of Parliament a visitation had been commenced and injunctions issued, containing many salutary regulations for the removal of various abuses which had existed. But it is also quite clear that in those injunctions several abuses, several remnants of Popery, remained, and the reason why they had been retained is obvious—various Acts of Parliament were then in existence which prevented the council from removing such abuses.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say this was in August 1547. What is the date of the statute which you say made a tabula rasa of all those preceding statutes?

(Mr. Stephens.) The session commenced November 4th, 1547, therefore the statute would take effect from the commencement of the session.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is that the 1st Edward VI., chapter 12?

(Mr. Stephens.) All the statutes of the 1st Edward VI. would bear the date November 4th, 1547.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then those injunctions issued, of course, previous to that?

(Mr. Stephens.) They did, my Lord, in August. I will now refer to the liturgies of Edward VI. (Parker Society's edition, page 3). After the end of the session the council, besides issuing "the order of the communion" in English, by which the sacrament was to be administered to the laity in both kinds, issued orders through the Archbishop of Canterbury. Those orders will be found in 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 45.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The last book which I took down of that editor was Cardwell's Liturgies.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes; that was only for a reference to "the order of the communion." This is the Archbishop's letter to the Bishop of London against candles, ashes, palms, &c. in churches. It orders that no candles should be borne on Candlemas-day. And in 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, pages 47 and 48, it is said: "In the King's Majesty's visitation, among other godly injunctions commanded to be generally observed through all parts of this his highness' realm, one was set forth for the taking down of all such images as had at any time been used with pilgrimages, offerings, or censings—"

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is this the injunction?

(Mr. Stephens.) No, this is a letter from the Archbishop to the Bishop of London. It then orders that "all images remaining in any church or chapel within your diocese be taken away." This letter is dated the 21st of February 1547. Therefore, my Lord, we have in 1547 a prohibition against candles on Candlemas-day, palms in churches, and likewise an order for the removal of all images, whether those images had been abused or not.

(Mr. James.) The Archbishop says so, that is all.

(Mr. Stephens.) That is what I have distinctly stated; he issued orders.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I quite understand that.

(Mr. Stephens.) So I apprehended, my Lord; but I am explaining it to my friend Mr. James. These were orders issued to the Archbishop of Canterbury.

(Mr. James.) Who issued the orders?

(Mr. Stephens.) The council.

I now come to the 2nd and 3rd Edward VI. cap. 1, which is the first Act of Uniformity of Edward VI. It commences by reciting that there had been in England "divers forms of common prayer, that is to say, the use of Sarum, of York, of Bangor, and of Lincoln, and besides the same now of late much more divers and sundry forms and fashions have been used in the cathedral and parish churches of England and Wales, as well concerning the mattens or morning prayer and the even song as also concerning the Holy Communion, commonly called the Mass, with divers and sundry rites and ceremonies concerning the same, and in the administration of other sacraments of the church."

The words here used, "rites and ceremonies concerning the same," clearly shew that the Legislature applied the words "rites and ceremonies" to the separate acts done by the priests and ministers during the celebration of mass.

The Statute then goes on, "And as the doers and executors of the said rites and ceremonies in other form than of late years they have been used, were pleased therewith, so others not using the same rites and ceremonies were thereby greatly offended, and albeit the King's majesty with the advice of his most entirely beloved uncle, the Lord Protector, with other of his Highness council, hath heretofore divers times assayed to stay innovations or new rites."—In Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 42, the proclamation issued on the 6th of February 1547-8, is printed—

(The Dean of the Arches.) We are now in 1548, are we not?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord, but I am only submitting to your Lordship my observations upon the construction of the Act of Uniformity, as to what was considered to be the meaning and the intent of those words, and I refer to the proclamation which was issued and printed in Cardwell.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I see.

(Mr. Stephens.) This proclamation directed—"That no manner of person, of what estate, order, or degree soever he be, should of his private mind, will, or fantasy do, omit, leave undone; change, alter, or innovate any order, rite, or ceremony commonly used and frequented in the Church of England." I submit, my Lord, this shows, even so far back as the 6th of February 1547, the anxiety and the intention that there should be only one uniform rite and ceremony for the performance of divine worship.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And this section, as I understand your argument, to which you are referring, about "assaying to stay innovations, or new rites," refers back to that proclamation?

(Mr. Stephens.) I think I have a right to assume it, and such is the object of my observation. It is only to show that if you take all the Acts of Parliament, all the proclamations, and all the visitation articles issued at that time, there is but one spirit that pervades the entire, namely, that there should be but one uniform order, rite, form, and manner of administering the sacraments and performing the services of the church.

I will now proceed, with the Act: "Hath heretofore at divers times assayed to stay innovations or new rites concerning the premises, yet the same hath not had such good success as his highness required in that behalf, whereupon his highness, by the most prudent advice aforesaid, being pleased to bear with the frailty and weakness of his subjects in that behalf, of his great clemency hath not only been content to abstain from punishment of those that have offended in that behalf, (for that his highness taketh that they did it of a good zeal,) but also to the intent a uniform, quiet, and godly order should be had concerning the premises, hath appointed the Archbishop of Canterbury and certain distinguished men "to consider and ponder the premises, and thereupon having as well eye and respect to the most sincere and pure Christian religion taught by the Scriptures as to the usages in the primitive church"

Now, my Lord, I inquire what is the meaning of the words, "the usages in the primitive church." It is clear the compilers of the Prayer Book dealt with the "usages in the primitive church," and intended only such usages as were included therein to be continued and used, in order that there should be one convenient meet, order, rite, and fashion throughout the kingdom. Unless such a construction be given to the language, it is perfectly useless.

The Statute then proceeds: "should draw and make one convenient, and meet, order, rite, and fashion of common and open prayer, and administration of the sacraments, to be had and used in His Majesty's realm of England and in Wales, the which at this time, by the aid of the Holy Ghost, with one uniform agreement, is of them concluded, set forth, and delivered to his highness, to his great comfort and quietness of mind, in a book entitled 'The Book of Common Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church after the use of the Church of England;' wherefore the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and the Commons, in this Parliament assembled, considering as well the most godly travail of the King's highness, the Lord Protector, and of other his highness' council, in gathering and collecting the said archbishop," and so forth, as the godly prayers, orders, rites, and ceremonies in the said book mentioned, and the considerations of altering those things which be altered, and retaining those things which be retained in the said book."

[Therefore, my Lord, all things which were not retained in this Act of Parliament, or in the Book of Common Prayer that was annexed to this Act of Parliament, were, as I submit, absolutely excluded:] "but also to the honour of God, and great quietness which by the grace of God shall ensue" "upon the one and uniform rite and order in such common prayer, and rites and external ceremonies to be used throughout England and in Wales."

(Mr. James.) Is the word "external" there?

(Mr. Stephens.) "External ceremonies."

(Mr. Prideaux.) "In the copy I have it is "external."

(Mr. Stephens.) "External ceremonies." Therefore in order that there should be this one uniform order and prayer, all "external ceremonies" were abolished and the Statute enacts, "That all and singular the ministers in any cathedral or parish church shall be bounden to say and use the mattens, evensong, celebration of the Lord's Supper, commonly called the Mass, and administration of each of the sacraments and all their common and open prayer, in such order and form as is mentioned in this book, and none other or otherwise."

It is idle to say, that recourse can now be had to any usage, any statute, or to any book anterior to this period. Every person was bound, in order to ascertain what ceremonies were to be used, external or otherwise, to go to this Book of Common Prayer and to no other. Which likewise enacts, "That if any manner of parson, vicar, or other whatsoever minister, that ought or should sing or say Common Prayer mentioned in the said book, or minister the sacraments, shall refuse to use the said Common Prayers or to minister the sacraments in such cathedral or parish church: in such order and form as they be mentioned and set forth in the said book, or shall use, wilfully and obstinately, standing in the same, any other rite, ceremony, order, form, or manner of mass, openly or privily, or mattens, evensong, administration of the sacraments, or other open prayer, than is mentioned and set forth in the said book," he then becomes liable to certain penalties.

These enactments prohibit the use, not only of any "other rite, order, form, or manner" of Mass or other service, but "any other rite or ceremony of mass or other service," that is, any single ceremony not prescribed by this Prayer Book. Consequently the introduction of a single ceremony not prescribed by this Prayer Book is, I respectfully submit, clearly illegal. And I shall be enabled to establish that for the performance of any of the services prescribed in the 1st Book of Edward VI., there is no occasion to go beyond that statute, or to introduce any of those ceremonies which had been abolished.

The 7th section of this Act states, "that it shall be lawful for all men, as well in churches, chapels, oratories, or other places, to use openly any psalms or prayer taken out of the Bible, at any due time, not letting or omitting thereby the service or any part thereof mentioned in the said book." Under this section any psalm or prayer may be taken out of the Bible—it therefore establishes that no deviation from the one uniform rite and order was to be allowed except what was expressly permitted under this section.

The 8th section provides "That the books concerning the said services shall, at the costs and charges of the parishioners of every parish and cathedral church, be attained and gotten before the Feast of Pentecost next following, or before; and that all such parishes and cathedral churches, or other places, where the said books shall be attained and gotten before the said Feast of Pentecost, shall within three weeks next after the said books so attained and gotten, use the said service, and put the same in use according to this Act." The churchwardens were therefore bound to provide the books containing the services of the church. They were to be provided at the cost of the parishioners. And why? Because the provisions of this Statute prohibited reference to any other book.

I will now direct your Lordship's attention to the First book of Edward VI.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The Prayer Book.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord, the first Prayer Book which was annexed to this statute; I am now reading from the book published by the Parker Society, called the Liturgies of Edward VI. The preface (page 17) after reciting the inconveniences which had arisen from the difficulty of ascertaining what was to be read or done during the services of the church, states at page 18, "These inconveniences therefore considered, here is set forth such an order whereby the same shall be redressed; and for a readiness in this matter, here is drawn out a calendar for that purpose, which is plain and easy to be understood: wherein (so much as may be) the reading of holy scripture is so set forth that all things shall be done in order, without breaking one piece thereof from another. For this cause be cut off anthems, responds, invitatories, and such like things as did break the continual course of the reading of the scripture. Yet because there is no remedy but that of necessity there must be some rules: therefore certain rules are here set forth, whichas they be few in number, so they be plain and easy to be understood. So that here you have an order for prayer (as touching the reading of holy scripture).

“ much agreeable to the mind and purpose of the old fathers, and a great deal more profitable and commodious than that which of late was used. It is more profitable, because here are left out many things whereof some be untrue, some uncertain, some vain and superstitious; and is ordained nothing to be read but the very pure word of God—the holy scriptures, or that which is evidently grounded upon the same; and that in such a language and order as is most easy and plain for the understanding, both of the readers and hearers. It is also more commodious, both for the shortness thereof, and for the plainness of the order, and for that the rules be few and easy.

“ Furthermore by this order the curates shall need none other books for their public service but this Book and the Bible, by the means whereof the people shall not be at so great charge for books as in time past they have been.”

It is quite clear, that the Legislature intended no other books to be used except “this book” (the Prayer Book) “and the Bible.” Thus showing, that all the old books and formularies were not to be used, and that the ceremonies omitted from Edward’s first book, and for which it would have been necessary to refer to the old service books, were altogether discontinued.

Can language be more conclusive than that? Supposing it was wanted to exclude all the old canons, constitutions, and service books, and all the old external ceremonies, what more forcible language could be composed than that used on the present occasion? Its exclusive character likewise receives forcible illustration from the exception in the 7th section of this Act of Uniformity.

Then there is another passage at page 19: “And for so much as nothing can almost be so plainly set forth but doubts may rise in the use and practising of the same: To appease all such diversity (if any arise), and for the resolution of all doubts concerning the manner how to understand, do, and execute the things contained in this book, the parties that so doubt, or diversely take anything, shall always resort to the bishop of the diocese, who by his discretion shall take order for the quieting and appeasing of the same, so that the same order be not contrary to anything contained in this book.”

Does not the language of this book show that the Legislature considered that all the old laws and formularies for the performance of divine worship had been abolished, otherwise there would have been some restrictive words “upon the discretion of the bishop,” for it could not have been for one moment supposed that the bishop was to be put above all law.

(The Dean of the Arches.) How do you interpret those words, “or diversely take anything?”

(Mr. Stephens.) Whenever doubts arise.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Just read those words again.

(Mr. Stephens.) They are in the present Prayer-book. I believe since the Act of Uniformity this provision has not been carried out in the way that it was done anterior to the Act of Charles the Second, and there are certainly much greater powers in this clause than is generally supposed.

I will now read the passage again: “And forso much as nothing can, almost, be so plainly set forth but doubts may rise in the use and practising of the same: to appease all such diversity (if any arise), and for the resolution of all doubts concerning the manner how to understand, do, and execute the things contained in this book, the parties that so doubt, or diversely take anything, shall always resort to the bishop of the diocese, who by his discretion shall take order for the quieting and appeasing of the same, so that the same order be not contrary to anything contained in this book.” But, of course, if there was any custom, or if there was any statute for the regulation of the performance of divine service, it would override the power of the bishop. The bishop would not have an absolute power, he would have precisely the like power that your Lordship (I say it with due submission) has in construing an Act of Parliament according to equity and justice. The Bishop would not have an absolute discretion, because an absolute discretion is unknown to our law. The Legislature intended that no person should go beyond the Book of Common Prayer. And if in the manner of performing Divine service any doubts arose, then the bishop was to have the power of determining those doubts.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Would not that rather point to this, the Legislature having contemplated the possibility of doubts arising as to the performance of the service?

(Mr. Stephens.) No, my Lord, it means—not as to any doubt regarding the performance of the services of the church, because, as I submit, no doubt could arise if persons honestly and conscientiously dealt with the language of the Act of Parliament; but it is to meet cases of clergymen setting up their opinions against the spirit and the words of the Act of Parliament, thinking themselves above all law and guided only by their own discretion.

At that period of our history the object of the Legislature was to put down priest rule and priestcraft, which your Lordship is well aware were then in full force.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say it did not contemplate any person honestly doubting, but that it dealt with dishonest persons.

(Mr. Stephens.) Precisely so, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And that the rubric was framed to meet the case of dishonest persons who wanted to evade the statute.

(Mr. Stephens.) That is what I contend.

(Mr. James.) And the bishop, I suppose, might be equally dishonest?

(Mr. Stephens.) I do not wish that interpellation to be put in. I was speaking of the bishop as a judge.

(The Dean of the Arches.) These interpellations are very inconvenient.

(Mr. Stephens.) I was speaking of the bishop as a judge. And I was also speaking of conceited clergymen. I do not think these interruptions should be permitted, otherwise we shall not terminate this case on this side of Christmas.

(Mr. James.) I beg your pardon; but really sometimes the temptation is too great.

(Mr. Stephens.) In Lanfranc’s Canons it is directed “of all altars that they be of stone” (2 Johnson’s Canons, p. 8, Oxford ed. 1851). In the Injunctions issued by the Bishop of London for uniformity in his diocese—

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is the date of the injunctions?

(Mr. Stephens.) 1550. They are Bishop Ridley’s injunctions of the 4th year of King Edward VI. (1 Cardwell, Doc. Ann. 94.) These Injunctions are to enforce uniformity on the basis of the new Prayer Book, and in them the bishop forbids the setting of any light upon the Lord’s board. At page 94 they recite that “in divers places some use the Lord’s board after the form of a table, and some as an altar, whereby dissention is perceived to arise among the unlearned; therefore wishing a godly unity to be observed in all our diocese, and for that the form of a table may more move and turn the simple from the old superstitious opinions of the Popish mass, and to the right use of the Lord’s Supper; exhorts the curates, churchwardens, and questmen here present to erect and to set up the Lord’s board after the form of an honest table, decently covered, in such place of the quire or chancel as shall be thought most meet by their discretion and agreement, so that the ministers with the communicants may have their place separated from the rest of the people; and to take down and abolish all other by-altars or tables.” I do not think I can give your Lordship a more apt illustration respecting the power of the bishop to enforce the provisions of the Act of Uniformity. Nothing, I believe, was at that period considered of more importance by a great number of persons who were secretly inclined to Popery, than the altar, and objections were made to the communion table. But here we find all altars were ordered to be removed.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I remember when the stone altar case was argued in the Court of Arches drawing Sir Herbert Jenner Fust's attention to that rubric, and he declined in fact to hold anything further than that it referred to proceedings in court, and that the bishop had no jurisdiction out of his court in camera.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am aware of the passage.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You know the whole thing was very much discussed.

(Mr. Stephens.) The bishop, I apprehend, in his court is primary judge of his diocese, and he can hold a court wherever he thinks proper. His chancellor has not the absolute power that the bishop has.

(The Dean of the Arches.) However, the question does not really arise here.

(Mr. Stephens.) All that I want to establish is, that the object of this provision in the Act of Uniformity, giving the bishop the power of interference, was, that there should be an easy mode of correcting clergymen who disobeyed the Book of Common Prayer, namely, by not following it out according to its spirit and letter.

I now wish, my Lord, to refer to the 6th volume of Foxe's Actes and Monuments, at page 5.

(The Dean of the Arches.) In order that I may follow you, what is the proposition that you are now seeking to establish by these authorities; that the bishop had power?

(Mr. Stephens.) That he had jurisdiction in matters of doubt, my Lord. I shall only give your Lordship one more reference upon that point.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am not wishing to curtail your authorities, I only wish to know the proposition that they are to support.

(Mr. Stephens.) It is this proposition,—that it was not lawful to go out of this Act of Parliament for the due performance of the services of the church, and that if the Act was not carried out according to its spirit and letter, the bishop had a right, and I submit he has so at the present moment, to compel any clergyman to observe and obey the language of the Act of Uniformity. We find in the 6th volume of Foxe's Actes and Monuments a summary of the reasons used to justify and enforce compliance with Bishop Ridley's order. This document was appended to the council's order to Bishop Ridley to take down altars and place communion tables in their stead, and at page 6 the reasons are given. The fifth and sixth reasons I wish to refer to: "Christ did institute the sacrament of his body and blood at his last supper at a table and not at an altar, as it appeareth manifestly by the three evangelists; and St. Paul calleth the coming to the holy communion the coming unto the Lord's Supper; and also it is not read that any of the apostles or the primitive church did ever use any altar in ministration of the holy communion. Wherefore, seeing the form of a table is more agreeable to Christ's institution and with the usage of the apostles and of the primitive church than the form of an altar, therefore the form of a table is rather to be used than the form of an altar in the administration of the holy communion."

The sixth and last reason is this: "It is said in the preface of the Book of Common Prayer, that if any doubt do arise in the use and practicing of the same book, to appease all such diversity the matter shall be referred unto the bishop of the diocese, who by his discretion shall take order for the quieting and appeasing of the same, so that the same order be not contrary unto anything contained in that book."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then Bishop Ridley must have thought that if there was a stone altar in existence at that time, he had a right to take it away and put a wooden table, although it is not mentioned in the Prayer Book of King Edward VI.

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I was trying to see to what extent the discretion of the bishop would go in your view. You say it would go to this length, that although nothing is said in the book of King Edward VI., with regard to the material of the altar (and I suppose, as a matter of fact, stone altars then existed), the bishop would have power, under those words, to change the material of the table.

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly, my Lord, for the proper performance of divine service.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It would not be found in that statute, it would be something that he would import into the words of that statute.

(Mr. Stephens.) The reasons given by Bishop Ridley were approved of by the Privy Council, and circulated all over the country. There we get a construction which shows how the language of the preface of the Book of Common Prayer, giving the bishop jurisdiction in doubts, was then understood, and how exclusive the Prayer Book was treated as to rites and ceremonies.

(Mr. James.) It says nothing about rites and ceremonies.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am discussing the spirit of the Prayer Book. I contend if altars can be removed, rites and ceremonies and "all external ceremonies," not authorised by the Prayer Book, can be suppressed.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I suppose it was under that authority that the material of the table was changed.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord, it was so undoubtedly.

I will now come to the consideration of the preface in the 1st book of Edward VI., as to ceremonies. Your Lordship will find it at page 155 of the Liturgies of Edward VI., the book from which I have been reading. This preface as to ceremonies is in our present Prayer Book, a mere reprint of that in the first book of Edward VI.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Are you leaving the part about ceremonies now?

(Mr. Stephens.) I am proceeding with the preface about ceremonies. I will now read from page 155. The title is, "Of Ceremonies, why some be abolished and some retained." "Of such ceremonies as be used in the church, and have had their beginning by the institution of man, some at the first were of godly intent and purpose devised, and yet at length turned to vanity and superstition; some entered into the church by indiscreet devotion, and such a zeal as was without knowledge; and for because they were winked at in the beginning, they grew daily to more and more abuses, which not only for their unprofitableness, but also because they have much blinded the people and obscured the glory of God, are,—what? "worthy to be cut away and clean rejected. Other there be, which although they have been devised by man, yet it is thought good to reserve them still, as well for a decent order in the church (for the which they were first devised), as because they pertain to edification, whereunto all things done in the church, (as the apostle teacheth) ought to be referred. And although the keeping or omitting of a ceremony, (in itself considered) is but a small thing: yet the wilful and contemptuous transgression, and breaking of a common order and discipline is no small offence before God. 'Let all things be done among you,' (saith St. Paul,) 'in a seemly and due order,' the appointment of the which order pertaineth not to private men." Every part of this preface shows that the framers of Edward VI.'s first book had only two ways of dealing with ceremonies. They (1) either abolished them or (2) they expressly retained them. It is impossible, as I submit to your Lordship, to put any other construction upon this language.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say they either abolished them or expressly retained them. You are speaking of ceremonies now?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord, I am now dealing with ceremonies.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say that is a universal proposition without exception. They either abolished or expressly retained them?

(Mr. Stephens.) I wish to put it in that way. I am afraid I have not expressed myself clearly.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I only want to understand the limits of your proposition.

(Mr. Stephens.) The proposition I would lay down is this,—that every part of this preface shows that the framers of Edward's first book had only two ways of dealing with those ceremonies that had been previously in use. They either abolished them or they retained them. If they retained them then those ceremonies would be found in the first book of Edward VI.

(The Dean of the Arches.) They would be expressly mentioned.

(Mr. Stephens.) They would be expressly mentioned.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I wanted to know what you meant by "retain." As I understand you mean by "retain" that there would be express mention of them in that book of Edward VI.

(Mr. Stephens.) Express mention of them, and if mention was not made of them—

(The Dean of the Arches.) They would be abolished.

(Mr. Stephens.) They would be abolished.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That I understand to be your proposition.

(Mr. Stephens.) If you cannot prove by the first book of Edward VI. that there is a ceremony retained in it, it was abolished.

(The Dean of the Arches.) By "retained" you mean mentioned in the rubric as the book?

(Mr. Stephens.) Precisely so, the rubric is part of the book.

With reference to the words "are worthy to be cut away and clean rejected," can your Lordship question that the use of this language, in reference to ceremonies that it was not "thought good to reserve," shows that the observance of these reserved ceremonies was not optional but compulsory upon every minister? Therefore the reserved ceremonies must have been only the ceremonies reserved by the Prayer Book, as otherwise ministers would not be enabled to know what they were, because all the old service books had been destroyed. How was it possible for them to import into the services of the Church any ceremonies except those that were expressly mentioned in the first book of Edward VI.? Where were they to get their information? The old service books had been all destroyed.

I will now proceed with the preface: "Therefore no man ought to take in hand nor presume to appoint or alter any public or common order in Christ's church, except he be lawfully called and authorized thereunto. And whereas, in this our time, the minds of men be so diverse, that some think it a great matter of conscience to depart from a piece of the least of their ceremonies (they be so addicted to their old customs); and again, on the other side, some be so new fangled that they would innovate all things and so despise the old that nothing can like them, but that is new: It was thought expedient not so much to have respect how to please and satisfy either of these parties, as how to please God, and profit them both. And yet lest any man should be offended (whom good reason might satisfy), here be certain causes rendered why some of the accustomed ceremonies be put away, and some retained and kept still."

Such language clearly supports the proposition which I ventured to submit to your Lordship, that this preface shows, its framers had only two ways of dealing with the ceremonies,—that they either (1) retained them or (2) rejected them? Some accustomed ceremonies are by express language "put away," and those that are not put away are "kept still." Where are they kept? In this Prayer Book. "Some are put away because the great excess and multitude of them hath so increased in these latter days that the burden of them was intolerable, wherof Saint Augustine in his time complained, that they were grown to such a number that the estate of christian people was in worse case (concerning that matter) than were the Jews. And he counselled that such yoke and burden should be taken away, as time would serve quietly to do it. But what would Saint Augustine have said if he had seen the ceremonies of late days used among us, wherunto the multitude used in his time was not to be compared? This our excessive multitude of ceremonies was so "great and many of them so dark, that they did more confound and darken than declare and set forth Christ's benefits unto us. And besides this, Christ's Gospel is not a ceremonial law (as much of Moses law was), but it is a religion to serve God, not in bondage of the figure or shadow, but in the freedom of the Spirit, being content only with those ceremonies which do serve to a decent order and godly discipline, and such as be apt to stir up the dull mind of man to the remembrance of his duty to God by some notable and special signification whereby he might be edified.

"Furthermore, the most weighty cause of the abolishment of certain ceremonies was, that they were so far abused partly by the superstitious blindness of the rude and unlearned, and partly by the unsatiable avarice of such as sought more their own lucre than the glory of God; that the abuses could not well be taken away, the thing remaining still. But now as concerning those persons, which peradventure will be offended, for that some of the old ceremonies are retained still, if they consider that without some ceremonies it is not possible to keep any order or quiet discipline in the church, they shall easily perceive just cause to reform their judgments. And if they think much that any of the old do remain and would rather have all devised anew, then such men (granting some ceremonies convenient to be had,) surely where the old may be well used, there they cannot reasonably reprove the old (only for their age) without bewraying of their own folly. For in such a case, they ought rather to have reverence unto them for their antiquity, if they will declare themselves to be more studious of unity and concord than of innovations and newfangledness which (as much as may be with true setting forth of Christ's religion) is always to be eschewed. Furthermore such shall have no just cause with the ceremonies reserved to be offended. For as those be taken away which were most abused, and did burden men's consciences, without any cause; so the other that remain"—

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are dealing now with the first Prayer Book of Edward VI.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I was following you in the new Prayer Book; it is exactly the same, word for word; I do not think there is a word different.

(Mr. Stephens.) They are identically the same, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then your argument would be that all the ceremonies abused were taken away by the first Prayer Book of Edward VI.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, and all that were not abused were retained.

(The Dean of the Arches.) By the first Prayer Book?

(Mr. Stephens.) I am now dealing with the first Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I understand you. Excuse me putting these questions, for I am endeavouring to follow your argument. I do not wish to interrupt you.

(Mr. Stephens.) Your Lordship does not interrupt me. I assure you it assists me very much to learn what is passing from time to time in your Lordship's mind. The Preface goes on: "are retained for a discipline and order, which (upon just causes) may be altered and changed, and therefore are not to be esteemed equal with God's law. And moreover they be neither dark nor dumb ceremonies, but are so set forth that every man may understand what they do mean, and to what use they do serve. So that it is not like that they, in time to come, should be abused as other have been. And in these all our doings we condemn no other nations, nor prescribe anything but to our own people only. For we think it convenient that every country should use such ceremonies, as they shall think best to the setting forth of God's honour and glory, and to the reducing of the people to a most perfect and godly living, without error or superstition; and that they should put away other things which from time to time they perceive to be "most abused, as in men's ordinances it often chanceth diversely in divers countries."

The object of the Prayer Book was to put down those ceremonies which in England had been abused and were found useless, perfectly irrespective of whether they were used in other countries, and consequently, if lights, for instance, were used in the Lutheran Church, that would be no reason for their being used in the Church of England, because they had been abolished by this Act of Parliament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you say the stone altar was abolished by that Act of Parliament?

(Mr. Stephens.) I am not upon that question at present.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say lights were abolished by that Act of Parliament?

(Mr. Stephens.) I do, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Let me see. You say that Act of Parliament abolished the lights. That is one of the things we shall have to consider by-and-by.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes; I will come to it by-and-by.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is no hurry at all. I want to get what you say correctly.

(Mr. Stephens.) I submit that, inasmuch as neither lighted candles nor candlesticks are mentioned in the first book of Edward VI., neither of them can, as a matter of right, be introduced into our churches.

(Mr. James.) Nor gas.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Your proposition goes that legitimate length.

(Mr. Stephens.) I did not put the proposition. Candlesticks, are introduced as ornaments. But I do not think the word "candlestick" can be found in any one of the Acts of Uniformity. I test it in this way—How could the churchwardens be compelled to put a candlestick on the Holy Table except for the purpose of giving light? It is a different thing putting a candlestick on the Holy Table with a candle in it, and afterwards lighting that candle, because not only is there an ornament not mentioned in the Acts of Uniformity, but in addition to that a religious ceremony is introduced.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I quite see the argument. The reason I put the question of stone altars was, because you have been insisting upon the lawfulness of Ridley's injunction which removed the stone altars.

(Mr. Stephens.) Upon Ridley's injunction, supported by the Order in Council.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I should like to understand that. Do you say Ridley's order, supported by an Order in Council, was equivalent to an Act of Parliament?

(Mr. Stephens.) No.

(The Dean of the Arches.) How did the Order in Council operate? What does it show?

(Mr. Stephens.) It shows the construction that the highest authorities in the land placed upon the first book of Edward VI. as to the powers of the Bishop under the Act of Uniformity.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Just apply that argument to the question of the stone altar. It is only a criterion of the extent to which it goes. It seems to be admitted that stone altars were de facto in existence at the time of the first Prayer Book, and that they were removed by this injunction of Bishop Ridley's. They are not spoken of at all in the Prayer Book one way or the other. Then that was an alteration of an ornament of the Church by the authority of the bishop without the consent of Parliament, was it not?

(Mr. Stephens.) No, my Lord; I can never admit that the Church or a prelate has any power, except under an Act of Parliament, to exercise jurisdiction over the people.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I agree with you, and I want to try that proposition. How came what Ridley did to be lawful with respect to the substitution of a different material for the altar table?

(Mr. Stephens.) I only cited it to show (I am not arguing the question of altars now) how exclusive the Prayer Book was, so much so,—that if any doubt arose upon its construction, the Bishop was the proper judge to determine, and none other; acting like your Lordship in carrying out an Act of Parliament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) He had authority, under those words which gave the parishioner right to resort to the bishop, to alter the material of which the altar was framed?

(Mr. Stephens.) No doubt, if the bishop thought it led to superstition, because one of the primary objects of the Act of Uniformity was to put down superstition.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Although it was not mentioned in the Prayer Book?

(Mr. Stephens.) Although it was not mentioned in the Prayer Book; and for this reason, because it was against the spirit of the Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is what I want to know. You say he had that power?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, because it was against the spirit of the Prayer Book. The observations which your Lordship has made (and for which I am deeply indebted) as to the ornaments, show, that a clergyman has no right (and I say it unhesitatingly) to put a single ornament upon the holy table. The duty of putting ornaments for the performance of divine service belongs to the churchwardens, and if they do not provide the proper furniture, for the use of the clergyman, they are punishable.

(Adjourned for a short time.)

Your Lordship may remember that we were discussing the preface on ceremonies, in the first book of Edward VI., and I was directing your Lordship's attention to the very strict and exclusive language that is used, not only in the Act of Uniformity but in the Book of Common Prayer, which is part of our statute law.

The language of this statute is essentially different from that of the Council of Trent, when dealing with the sacrifice of the mass. I beg to refer your Lordship to the canons and decrees of the Council of Trent, published by Mr. Buckley of Christchurch, Oxford, p. 43. The edition I propose to quote from is London, 1851.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Perhaps you will refer to the session. My copy is not the same as that to which you are referring.

(Mr. Stephens.) It is the 22nd session, and the 5th chapter, dealing with the ceremonies of the mass. "The Ceremonies and Rites of the Mass." "And whereas such is the nature of man that without external helps he cannot be easily upraised to the meditation of divine things, on this account has holy mother church instituted certain rites, to wit, that certain things be pronounced in the mass in a softened, and others in a raised tone. She has likewise made use of ceremonies such as mystic benedictions, lights, fumigations of incense, vestments, and many other things of this kind, derived from an apostolical discipline and tradition, whereby both the majesty of so great a sacrifice might be commended and the minds of the faithful be excited by these visible signs of religion and piety to the contemplation of those most sublime things which lie hidden in this sacrifice."

How very different the language of this chapter is from the language to which I have directed your Lordship's attention in the preface on ceremonies in the Prayer Book. In the preface on ceremonies in the Prayer Book, the rights of the laity as to what rites and what ceremonies shall be used in the churches of this country are most rigidly reserved; nothing is left, and in my opinion nothing ought to be left, to the discretion of the minister except it be under the words of an Act of Parliament. The clergy are not a different class and distinct from the laity. They are not a class of men standing between the laity and our Creator. We therefore find, my Lord, that in almost every case where a ceremony is directed to be used in the first book of Edward VI., which, if unexplained would be a “dark and dumb” ceremony, an explanation of such ceremony is given, thus affording an additional, and, as I most respectfully submit, a conclusive proof that the Book of Common Prayer was to be the exclusive guide as to the rites and ceremonies which were to be performed within our churches. The minister has no discretionary power except when it is expressly given to him. He is bound, and rightly bound, by the Acts of Uniformity. If a clergyman does not agree with the spirit and principle of the Acts of Uniformity he would have no right of institution to his living, and the very moment he objects to the spirit and the language of the Acts of Uniformity, from that moment, if he be a conscientious man, he ought no longer to retain the status which a minister of our church has nor to receive the pay of the Established Church.

I will now direct your Lordship's attention in detail, to what I have submitted to you generally, viz., that looking through the first book of Edward VI., where there is a “dark and dumb ceremony” mentioned, an explanation of its meaning is given, and it will be found that no dark and dumb ceremonies, such as lighted candles, when not required for light, the use of incense, as a religious ceremony, and the mixing of water with the sacramental wine, are allowed by the laws of this country.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you say that neither lights nor incense, nor mixing the water with the wine, were allowed by the first Prayer Book of Edward VI.?

(Mr. Stephens.) I submit, generally speaking; that not only by the statutes of Edward VI., but by every Act of Uniformity, dark and dumb ceremonies without explanation are excluded.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I was calling your attention especially to what we are now upon, the Prayer Book of Edward VI.

(Mr. Stephens.) It was only parenthetically I made that general allusion.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not mean to limit you to that, but we are upon that now.

(Mr. Stephens.) I thought your Lordship would have a better note and a clearer view of the argument by a general statement. But I apply the observation without reservation to the Second Act of Uniformity of Edward VI. and to the Acts of Elizabeth and Charles II. I extend it likewise to the practice of the church from the time of Edward VI. down to the present time, except during the reign of Mary, when our land was covered with a cloud of spiritual darkness.

I now beg to refer your Lordship in the first instance to page 108 of the Liturgies of Edward VI.

(Mr. James.) I am afraid you are not reading from the same copy I have got. I have Cardwell's Liturgies.

(Mr. Stephens.) My friend, Mr. James, is not perhaps aware of the difference between “Cardwell's Liturgies” and the “Liturgies of Edward VI.” I am reading from a book called “Liturgies of King Edward VI.,” published by the Parker Society.

At page 108, on the sign of the cross, it directs: “Receive the sign of the Holy cross both in thy forehead and in thy breast”—and the following explanation is given—“in token that thou shalt not be ashamed to confess thy faith in Christ crucified, and manfully to fight under his banner against sin, the world, and the devil, and to continue his faithful soldier and servant unto thy life's end. Amen.” There we have an explanation of the reason of the sign of the cross.

I will now direct your Lordship's attention to page 112, as to the chrisom: “Then the godfathers and godmothers shall take and lay their hands upon the child, and the minister shall put upon him his white vesture commonly called the chrisom, and say: “Take this white vesture for a token of the innocency, which by God's grace in this Holy Sacrament of Baptism is given unto thee, and for a sign” (here we get the explanation) “whereby thou art admonished, so long as thou livest, to give thyself to innocency of living, that after this transitory life thou mayest be partaker of the life everlasting. Amen.” “Then the priest shall anoint the infant upon the head, saying, Almighty God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath regenerate thee by water and the Holy Ghost, and hath given unto thee remission of all thy sins; he vouchsafe to anoint thee with the unction of his Holy Spirit, and bring thee to the inheritance of everlasting life. Amen.”

As to the ring in marriage, at page 129: “Then the man leaving the ring upon the fourth finger of the woman's left hand, the minister shall say, Let us pray. O Eternal God, Creator and Preserver of all mankind, Giver of all spiritual grace, the Author of everlasting life, send thy blessing upon these thy servants, this man and this woman, whom we bless in thy name, that as Isaac and Rebecca (after bracelets and jewels of gold given of the one to the other for tokens of their matrimony) lived faithfully together; so these persons may surely perform and keep the vow and covenant betwixt them made whereof this ring given and received is a token and pledge.” Without this explanation it would be a dumb ceremony.

At page 139 extreme unction. “If the sick person desire to be anointed, then shall the priest anoint him upon the forehead or breast only, making the sign of the cross, saying thus, As with this visible oil, thy body outwardly is anointed, so our Heavenly Father, Almighty God, grant of His infinite goodness that thy soul inwardly may be anointed with the Holy Ghost, who is the spirit of all strength, comfort, relief, and gladness.” That would have been a dark and dumb ceremony without the explanation.

Now I beg to refer your Lordship to the ordering of deacons. I propose to read from page 170: “Then the bishop laying his hands severally upon the head of every one of them shall say, ‘Take thou authority to execute the office of a deacon in the church of God committed unto thee: in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. Amen.’ Then shall the bishop deliver to every one of them the New Testament, saying, ‘Take thou authority to read the gospel in the church of God, and to preach the same if thou be thereunto ordinarily commanded.’” That would have been a dark and dumb ceremony without the explanation.

At page 179, in the ordering of priests: “The bishop shall deliver to every one of them the Bible in the one hand, and the chalice or cup with the bread in the other hand, and say, Take thou authority to preach the word of God, and to minister the holy sacraments in this congregation.” Without those words that would have been a dark and dumb ceremony.

Again at page 185, in “The Ordering of Bishops:” “Then shall the archbishop put into his hand the pastoral staff, saying, Be to the flock of Christ a shepherd, not a wolf; feed them, devour them not; hold up the weak, heal the sick, bind together the broken, bring again the outcasts, seek the lost; be so merciful that you be not too remiss, so minister discipline that ye forget not mercy, that when the Chief Shepherd shall come, ye may receive the immarcescible crown of glory, through Jesus Christ our Lord.” That would have been a dark and dumb ceremony without this explanation.

From these extracts an explanation is afforded of the expression “dark and dumb” ceremonies. And what does it prove? That every dark and dumb ceremony that is mentioned in our Prayer Book is explained. What are lighted candles but a dark and dumb ceremony?

(Mr. James.) Not dark at all events I should fancy.

(Mr. Stephens.) It is a dark and dumb ceremony, when candles are lighted not for the purpose of giving light, but in order to symbolize Roman Catholic doctrine.

I now beg to direct your Lordship's attention to 5 Collier's Ecclesiastical History, page 104, octavo edition, 1852. This is the rationale of the rites and ceremonies of the church in England and was published towards the termination of the reign of Henry VIII. It is not an authorized document, but it is a manuscript, partly in Bishop Gardiner's handwriting, and I put it forward, therefore, for what it is worth, as representing the views of his party. It is intitled "Ceremonies to be used in the Church of England, together with an explanation of the meaning and significance of them." That title will be found at page 104, and I am about to read from page 110.

The title is, "Ceremonies used in the Mass. And the ceremonies thereof are not dumb, but they be expressives and declaratives of the same passion, to the intent, that by such signs and ceremonies, they that be present thereat, may the better be admonished and reduced into the memory of the same. And, first, it is, to be understood that the priest is to be a common minister in the name and stead of the congregation, and as the mouth of the same not only renders thanks to God for Christ's death and passion, but also makes the common prayers and commends the people and their necessities in the same to Almighty God. The priest, therefore, when he shall say mass, says it not in his common apparel which he daily uses, but puts upon him clean and hallowed vestments, partly representing the mysteries which were done at the passion, partly representing the virtues which he himself ought to have that celebrates the mass." The question of vestments is not before your Lordship; but in order to save my learned friend any trouble when he comes to reply, I use it for the purpose of showing that vestments cease to be a dumb and dark ceremony, because an explanation is given why they are worn. First, he putteth on the amice, which, as touching the mystery, signifies the veil with which the Jews covered the face of Christ when they buffeted him in time of His passion, and as touching the minister it signifies faith, which is the head, ground, and foundation of all virtues, and therefore he puts that upon his head first. Secondly, he puts upon him the albe, which, as touching the mystery, signifieth the white garment wherewith Herod clothed Christ in mockery, when he sent him to Pilate; and as touching the minister it signifies the pureness of conscience and innocency he ought to have, especially when he sings the mass. The girdle, as touching the mystery, signifies the scourge with which Christ was scourged; and as touching the minister it signifies the continent and chaste living, or else the close mind which he ought to have at prayers when he celebrates. The stole, as touching the mystery, signifieth the ropes or bands that Christ was bound with to the pillar when he was scourged; and as touching the minister it signifieth the yoke of patience which he must bear as the servant of God, in token whereof he puts also the phanon on his arm, which admonisheth him of ghostly strength and godly patience that he ought to have to vanquish and overcome all carnal infirmity. The over vesture or chesible, as touching the mystery, signifies the purple mantle that Pilate's soldiers put upon Christ after they had scourged him; and as touching the minister it signifies charity, a virtue excellent above all other."

At page 113 follows the offertory: . . . "At which time the minister, laying the bread upon the altar, makes the chalice, mixing the water with the wine, signifying thereby, how that blood and water ran out of Christ's side in His passion, and admonishes us of the inseparable coupling and joining of Christ and His church."

"Then, after the offertory done, the priest washes his hands, acknowledging himself not to be so clean but that he has ever need more to be washed, according to the saying of David, 'Wash me, Lord, more and more from my wickedness, and cleanse me from my sin.'"

Then follows the gospel. And at page 114 it is stated, "Then the priest begins to represent in this Sacrifice of the Mass, the most painful and bloody sacrifice once offered for our salvation upon the cross, and prays the Father to accept these gifts prepared for the consecration, and inclining His body, makes a cross upon the altar and kisses it, signifying thereby the humble inclining and obedience of Christ to his Father's will, to suffer His passion upon the altar of His cross for our salvation."

At page 115: "And likewise the substance of wine into His precious blood, which He lifteth up, both that the people with all reverence and honour may worship the same, and also to signify thereby partly Christ's exaltation upon the cross for our redemption, which was figured by the serpent set up by Moses in the desert, and partly signifying that triumphant advancement and exaltation whereto God the Father because of His passion has exalted Him above all creatures, bidding the people to have it in remembrance as oft as they shall do the same. After the which the priest extends and stretches forth his arms in form of a cross, declaring thereby, that according to Christ's commandment, both he and the people not only have fresh remembrance of the passion, but also of His resurrection and glorious ascension."

At page 116: "And therefore the minister takes the kiss of peace from the blessed sacrament, and sends it to the people, saluting each other in osculo sancto, as biddeth St. Paul, admonishing them thereby of the fraternal and mutual peace and concord which they ought to have, without which peace and concord, this communion or sacrament of common communion is to them nothing profitable, but much to their hurt."

At page 106 [I am now going to the rites and ceremonies observed about the sacrament of baptism]: "And then he puts hallowed salt into his mouth, to signify the spiritual salt, which is the Word of God, wherewith he should be seasoned."

And, at page 109: "Finally, the minister puts a candlelight in the right hand of him that is baptized, in token that he should through all his lifetime, show before all men, a light of good example and godly works; that he may be always in readiness with the saints to meet our Lord, and receive the fruition of everlasting joy."

Here we have dark and dumb ceremonies, but an explanation is given, so that the people may clearly and distinctly understand what is meant by them.

I want to know from the Acts of Uniformity (and the questions in issue must be decided upon the Acts of Uniformity) where is the authority for lighting the candles upon the holy table on Sunday during daylight? Can you compel the parishioners, can you compel the churchwardens (for they are the persons who are responsible), to levy a rate for the purpose of providing wax candles in order that there may be lighted wax candles on the holy table when there is daylight? Can you compel them to provide censers pots? Can you compel them to provide frankincense? Can you compel them to provide a cruets for the holding of water, in order to mix it with the sacramental wine? If you cannot, how is it possible for my friends to reconcile the rites and ceremonies under discussion, with the language of the present Act of Uniformity, where it absolutely and positively provides, that there shall be only one uniform rite and ceremony, and in order to ascertain what that uniform rite and ceremony is, that you shall not go beyond the Book of Common Prayer. We likewise find in the Act of Uniformity of Charles II. every ornament of the church that is essentially requisite to carry out the service prescribed by it, and every direction to carry out the ceremonies that are therein prescribed. These "dark and dumb" ceremonies were rightfully abolished, for they, in point of fact, owe their origin not to the usage of the primitive church, but to priest rule and priestcraft.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You have not left the first Prayer Book of King Edward VI.?

(Mr. Stephens.) I am still upon it. I am generally illustrating the preface as to ceremonies in the first Prayer Book, but which is applicable to the Prayer Book now in force.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I thought you might be turning to another subject.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am dealing with the preface on ceremonies generally.

(The Dean of the Arches.) In the first Prayer Book?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. Your Lordship followed me with the Prayer Book of Charles II., and you found that the language was identical, at least I so understood your Lordship.

(The Dean of the Arches.) They are quite identical.

(Mr. Stephens.) Then the observations I am now making in reference to the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. fully apply to the statute of Charles II.

There is a pamphlet entitled, "A Plea for the threatened Ritual of the Church of England, by James Skinner, M.A., Vicar of Newland, Great Malvern, and Warden of the Beauchamp Charity, late Fellow of the University of Durham, and sometime senior curate of St. Barnabas, Pimlico," published in London, 1865. Mr. Skinner is a gentleman well known, a man of position and learning, and in that pamphlet he says, "Ritual and ceremonial are not only not defensible, they are intolerable as mere ecclesiastical literature or as religious aestheticism, or as the philosophy of worship, or any other formalism. They are not even to be endured as mere securities for decency and reverence. They are the signs of realities or they are nothing." "They are the expression of the mind of the Spirit or they are nothing. They are the witnesses of momentous truth or they are nothing. They are no mere accident to religion. They belong to the very substance of religion. They are not the mere adjuncts and decorations of religion, they are the natural and spontaneous exhibition of religion."

(Mr. Pridcaux.) What page are you reading?

(Mr. Stephens.) Pages 20 and 21 of Mr. Skinner's pamphlet.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Can Mr. Skinner's pamphlet have any authority at all?

(Mr. Stephens.) No, but I am making it part of my argument, to show what are the objects of these dark and dumb ceremonies.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You have a perfect right to do so. I wanted to know how you would press it upon me.

(Mr. Stephens.) The language that I have quoted from Mr. Skinner's pamphlet shows the object of using the rites and ceremonies in question, and I think it would have been very advisable for Mr. Skinner, before he had preached and published this sermon, to have referred to the preface on ceremonies in the Book of Common Prayer, and he would have discovered that the ceremonies that have been retained "were for discipline and for order."

I now beg to refer to a book that I think will illustrate the inconveniences and absurdities which would result if your Lordship should come to a decision that it is optional for any parochial clergyman, however conscientious, to depart from the strict spirit and letter of the Act of Uniformity, more especially as, when doubts arise he has the power of appealing to the bishop. And with all due respect to Sir Herbert Jenner Fust, I should say he has a right to appeal to the bishop in camera as well as in court.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You must not understand me as saying that Sir Herbert Jenner Fust said he had not any right, but he said he thought the bishop could not enforce his orders except through his court.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am very much indebted to your Lordship, but I do not exactly coincide in that position of law.

This is a very curious book which I hold in my hand, but it contains valuable information. It is entitled, "The Ritual Reason why," edited by Charles Walker, a gentleman of great learning. This book is published by Hayes, London. It professes to be an explanation of some 450 points of ritual. That is to say 450 points of difference from the spirit and letter of the Book of Common Prayer.

At page 118: "Why does the priest uncover the oblations at the end of the invocation?" The answer is, "To prepare them for the consecration which follows. As a symbolical act, this unveiling represents the stripping off of our Lord's garments at the crucifixion."

At page 53: "What is the pneuma or slur?" Answer. "It consists of a few notes either sung to the concluding syllable of the psalms, or played on the organ." "When is it used?" "At the end of the "psalms for the day, and at the end of the Canticles, Benedictus, and Magnificat in the choir service, and of the Te Deum on festivals; and at the end of the sequence in the Holy Eucharist." At page 54: "Why are the psalms finished with a pneuma?" Answer. "As a sign of our reluctance to quit the praises of God even for instruction and prayer."

I will now read from page 60: "Will you explain these incensations of the altar and choir?" Answer. "The altar represents Christ, and by the incense with which the priest surrounds it, he signifies the truth of Christ's divinity, the solemn oblation of incense being an act of worship due to God alone. (Exod. xxx. 37.) It is also typical of the mercy seat, and the cloud of incense which surrounds it symbolizes the intercessions which in union with that of our great High Priest surround the throne of God on every side. The altar is censured in the midst, first, because that is the place of honour, being the spot where the blessed sacrament is consecrated." Here there is a note which I will read, "After the priest has censured the cross with three motions of the censer he censures the upper part or retable, first twice towards the gospel side, then twice towards the epistle side, then he censures the altar itself, first on the epistle side, as described above. This signifies that the gospel existed in the purpose of God before all time and was therefore really anterior to the law."

I will now return to the text: "Afterwards on the epistle side first, because to the Jewish church first the ministry of intercession was committed, then the gospel side, because it is now committed to the Christian church; then again from the gospel to the epistle side, in token that Jew and Gentile are all one in Christ. The congregation are censured in acknowledgment that through the incarnation all are partakers of the divine nature, and in order, first the clergy, next the choir, lastly the laity, to show that though all one in Christ all members have not the like honour. But whereas men are only in a certain sense partakers of the divine nature, which is directly allied to the human alone in Christ; therefore the priest alone censures the altar, while the choir and people are censured by an inferior minister." I am anxious to ascertain from my learned friends, whether they disavow carrying out these directions, when the censuring of persons and things took place at St. Alban's in December 1866.

Is it for one moment to be said, that with the Prayer Book in my hand, I am to go into a parish church and to be in profound ignorance of the ceremonies that are used? I confess that I do not know, looking at the Prayer Book, and speaking as a member of the Protestant Church, what incense means, because I find no direction for the religious use of incense in the Book of Common Prayer. For the like reason I do not know what lighted candles, upon the Communion Table during daylight, mean. I do not know why the sacramental wine is mixed with water, because I do not find any directions for it in the Book of Common Prayer.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I wanted to know your argument. You say there is no mention of mixing water with wine in any of the Books of Common Prayer?

(Mr. Stephens.) Excepting the first Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the book we are upon now.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am speaking generally of symbolical ceremonies, and I respectfully submit to your Lordship that no symbolical ceremony can be now used in any parish church except we find an explanation of that ceremony in the present Book of Common Prayer. I am not to go into a church and see a parcel of dark and dumb ceremonies which puzzle me, and of which I am profoundly ignorant, because I derive my religious opinions, so far as regards the ceremonies of the church, from the Book of Common Prayer, and I derive my faith from the Bible, and exclusively so, as containing the Word of the living God.

There is a passage in the preface on ceremonies which I will read again: "This our excessive multitude of ceremonies was so great, and many of them

"so dark, that they did more confound and darken than declare and set forth Christ's benefits unto us;" so long as the service was in Latin it was necessary to have the lighted candles and incense, and a variety of gestures and ceremonies, in order that there might be something that the laity could attend to and take an interest in.

My Lord, I will again ask, What are lighted candles during daylight but a dark and dumb ceremony which has been clean rejected? What is incense used in the performance of divine worship but a dark and dumb ceremony which has been clean rejected? What is the mixed chalice, the mixing of water with the sacramental wine, but a dark and dumb ceremony which has been clean rejected?

I will now proceed to direct your Lordship's attention to four very eminent writers to show the views of the Protestant Church in respect of ceremonies.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Church of England writers?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord; when I use the word Protestant I mean the Church in England.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That is a dark and dumb ceremony indeed.

(Mr. Stephens.) I will first direct your Lordship's attention to Nicholls on the Book of Common Prayer. Your Lordship knows how very confused Nicholls is for reference. I am not going to quote from the additional notes. The edition which I have is the second folio edition, dated 1712, and is the last edition. I cannot of course give the page, but it is on "ceremonies," and your Lordship will find it at the commencement of the book. The writer is dealing with ceremonies, some to be abolished and some to be retained, and he says, "In the first book of Edward VI. there are indeed many ceremonies prescribed, but those we have nothing to do with now. For there water is enjoined to be mixed with the wine in the administration of the Lord's Supper, and crossing in the consecration prayer; the bread was to be unleavened and round; exorcism was used in the office of baptism; and the infant was anointed after dipping thrice, and was to have the chrisom (or white vesture) put upon him; the bishop was to cross the confirmed person in the forehead; bracelets and jewels were to be given in matrimony as tokens of spousage; the sick person upon desire, was to be anointed on the forehead and the breast; the priest was to cast earth upon the corpse, and to recommend his soul to God; the church woman was to offer up her chrisom; and crossing, knocking upon the breast, and other gestures were permitted to be used. These are ceremonies in the strictest sense, and it was for these that this preface was made to apologize, more than for the few ceremonies, if they be such, which are now retained."

In "Stillingfleet on Separation," the edition of 1591, at page 393, there is this passage: "As to the ceremonies in the Roman Church and ours, there are these considerable differences, that,—(1) they have a mighty number, as appears by their rituals and ceremonies, and the great volumes written in explication of them; we very few, and those so very easy and plain; that it requires as great skill not to understand ours as it doth to understand theirs."

"(2.) They place great holiness in theirs, as appears by the forms of consecration of their water, oil, salt, wax, vestments, &c., but we allow none of these, but only the use of certain ceremonies, without any preceding act of the Church, imparting any peculiar holiness attributed to them.

"(3.) They suppose great virtue and efficacy to be in them for the purging away some sorts of sins. We utterly deny any such thing belonging to our ceremonies, but declare that they are appointed only for order and decency.

"(4.) They make their ceremonies being appointed by the church to become necessary parts of divine worship, but our church looks upon them, even

"when determined as things in their own nature indifferent, but only required by virtue of that general obedience, which we owe to lawful authority; so that as to ceremonies themselves there is a vast disparity between the Roman Catholic Church and ours, and no man can pretend otherwise that is not grossly ignorant, or doth not wilfully misunderstand the state of the controversy between them and us."

I will now refer to an address of one bishop, who I am sorry to say is no more, and to the charge of another bishop in his visitation court, and I quote from their learned labours in order to maintain the general proposition which I ventured to state to your Lordship, that no ceremonies can be used in our church except such as are expressly mentioned in the Acts of Uniformity. One is by the late Bishop of Chester.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is it a charge?

(Mr. Stephens.) No, my Lord, an ordination address. I have done everything. I could to procure a copy of the address, but have not been able to get one, either at Chester or elsewhere, but it is quoted in the fourth edition of a pamphlet upon "Priestly Eucharistic Vestments," by the Reverend John Deck, published in London, 1866.

(The Dean of the Arches.) He gives the address, you say?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, and I have no doubt about his giving the address correctly.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I want to hear what the bishop says.

(Mr. Stephens.) These are the solemn and earnest words of the late Bishop of Chester in his last ordination address: "Our church hath its liturgy and ritual, simple, yet solemn, framed in accordance with the language of scripture and after the model of primitive practice; a reasonable service; consistent in its substance; devotional in its accompaniments; adapted alike to direct the understanding and impress the heart. But there are persons who are not content with its simplicity, who wish to superadd to it a variety of unauthorized forms and fantastical ceremonies and theatrical pageantries, such as, since the time of the Reformation, have been unknown in our public services. It would be a sufficient condemnation of such vain additions, that they are destitute of authority, and unsuitable to the simple character of our spiritual worship. But what is more, being in many instances imitations of the ceremonial of the Church of Rome, they create in many minds a painful misgiving, that more is meant than even meets the eye, and that there is a secret desire or aim to depart not only from the simplicity of our ritual but from the purity of our doctrine. Thus suspicions are engendered, men's minds are disquieted and alienated; the peace of the church is broken. Is the minister who is the cause of this, faithful to his duty? Even if he have no ulterior design, even if he meditates no secret treachery (far be it from me to speak otherwise than with that charity which thinketh no evil), yet even so, how can he justify himself for giving occasion for such scandal and such discord, merely for the sake of introducing presumptuous innovations, and overlaying our simple ritual with a tissue of incongruous excrescences?" It is evident, therefore, my Lord, so far as regards the late Bishop of Chester, that he in spirit supported the view which I have attempted to urge before your Lordship, namely, that a clergyman cannot under any circumstances go beyond the Book of Common Prayer for "ceremonies."

That is the opinion of an English bishop. I will now give you the opinion of an Irish prelate. It is a charge to the clergy of the united dioceses of Cork, Cloyne, and Ross.

(The Dean of the Arches.) By the present Bishop of Cork?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. I am quoting from the 5th edition, 1866. This charge was delivered by an ecclesiastical judge in his Court of Visitation. His Lordship when discussing the innovations and strange performances that have recently been introduced into our churches, says: "We see men in these degenerate days, ministers and pastors of our church, so they are called, perverting, not preaching the Gospel; subverting, not building up souls; making very little of Christ and his work, and very much of themselves and their own. They turn away the minds of men immortal, so far as they can, from the fulness and all sufficiency of Christ and the gracious work of the Spirit, to beggarly elements of human device unknown to pure and early times, and endeavour to fix them on sights and shows, on dresses of clergy, on colours, on forms and figures; on turning now to this side and this thing, and again bending and bowing to that side and that thing, one time gabbling in one part of the service and again muttering in another, as if clergymen were showmen or necromancers, and the laity were only babies to be amused, or fools to trifle with and not teach."

I now intend to refer to another subject. It is to the use of the word "mass." Your Lordship will find at page 76 of the Liturgies of Edward VI., "The Supper of the Lord, or holy communion, commonly called the mass," and I wish to make one or two observations in reference to that title.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The first Prayer Book?
(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord.

The word "mass" is used as a title, a mere title. It is not in the service, nor is it in the rubrics. And the letter of the council to Bishop Bonner, dated 24th June 1549, shows that it was not intended that the new service should be a continuation of the old in all matters not expressly forbidden.

In support of that proposition I refer your Lordship to I Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 76. This is a letter of the council (it is in the third year of Edward VI., 1549), to Bishop Bonner for the reformation of certain masses at St. Paul's. "After hearty commendations, having very credible notice that within that your cathedral church there be as yet the Apostles' mass and Our Lady's mass, and other masses of such peculiar name under the defence and nomination of Our Lady's communion, and the Apostles' communion, used in private chapels, and other remote places of the same, and not in the chancel, contrary to the King's Majesty's proceedings, the same being for the misuse displeasing to God, for the place, Paul's, in example not tolerable, for the fondness of the name, a scorn to the reverence of the communion of the Lord's body and blood; we for the augmentation of God's honour and glory, and for the consonance of His Majesty's laws, and the avoiding of murmur, have thought good to will and command you, that from henceforth no such masses in this manner be in your church any longer used; but that the holy blessed communion according to the Act of Parliament, be ministered at the high altar of the church, and in no other places of the same, but only at such time, as your high masses were wont to be used; except some number of people desire (for their necessary business) to have a communion in the morning, and yet the same to be executed in the chancel at the high altar, as it is appointed in the book of the public service, without cautele or digression from the common order. . . . What does this letter show? It shows that the Book of Common Prayer was dealt with, as the only source for directions respecting the Service of the Church, and especially at the Holy Communion.

Now, my Lord, in Walgrave's case, Dyer, 203 A and 203 B—

(The Dean of the Arches.) Unless my memory fails me the cases are all numbered.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord. But the paging is only on one side of the leaf, and, therefore, would be cited either as 203 or 203 A. It was a discussion on the statute of 1 Elizabeth, chapter 2, and it was there laid down that the meaning of Parliament appears to be, that the superstitious service in the church should be abolished and the new service planted in lieu thereof.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What was the case itself? Perhaps there is a marginal note.

(Mr. Stephens.) It was an indictment.

(The Dean of the Arches.) For not obeying the Common Prayer Book?

(Mr. Stephens.) For celebrating the private mass against the former statute in the 1st of the Queen. I have only cited it for the purpose of showing that whatever mode was prescribed for the performance of divine service anterior to the passing of the Acts of Uniformity was abolished, and a new and another and a different service was substituted instead thereof.

May I ask your Lordship to look at I Cardwell, page 77. It is the council's letter to Bishop Bonner. I wish to direct attention to the words, "Without cautele or digression from the same." They are towards the end of the 77th page.

The Sarum missal and other pre-Reformation service books had appended to them, a number of directions for the performance of the service called "Cauteles." A translation of the Cauteles of the mass will be found in the Directorium Anglicanum, page 83; the Directorium also designates some directions in it, and gives at page 189 some additional cauteles. Consequently "without cauteles" means that nothing is to be added to the prescribed service from the former cauteles or from any other directions.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then "cautele" would be used rather in the sense of rubrical direction, or something of that kind?

(Mr. Stephens.) It would be used in the sense of a rubrical direction. Therefore, if any additional ceremonies were wanted it would require a cautele to be issued from some authority, otherwise it would be in the power of every parish priest to introduce any rites and ceremonies he thought proper, and instead of having one uniform order in every Roman Catholic church, there would be different modes of performing the services of the church.

It has been urged, or it may be urged, that the lights remained as part of the mass ritual, because the first book of Edward VI. retained the very name itself of "Mass." It does no such thing; any more than the XXVth article asserts "those five commonly called sacraments" to be such, or than the VIIIth article affirms the authorship of "that which is commonly called the Apostles' Creed." The double titles of the Athanasian Creed, the Feasts of the Nativity, Presentation, &c., show that the Reformers sought to make themselves understood,—and as the idea of "communion" was not then familiar to the people, the old term "mass" was added to explain it. Therefore any argument upon that point appears to me not worth very much.

In 6 Foxe's Actes and Monuments (page 83), there are "the articles which the King's council required Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, to subscribe, July 15, 1550." Article 10 is as follows, "That upon good and godly considerations it is ordered in the said book and order, that the sacrament should not be lifted up and showed to the people to be adored, but to be with godly devotion received as it was first instituted." And it was provided by the 12th article, "that for like godly and good considerations by the same authority of Parliament, all mass books, cow-chers, graills, and other books of the service in Latin heretofore used, should be abolished and defaced, as well for certain superstitions in them contained as also to avoid dissension, and that the said service in the church should be through the whole realm in one uniform conformity, and no occasion through these old books to the contrary."

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is the date of that?

(Mr. Stephens.) 1550, my Lord.

What can more strongly illustrate the proposition that the first Act of Uniformity was then considered as the only place to which parish ministers could have recourse for carrying out the performance of divine worship, than the foregoing extract?

Ridley's Works (page 121, Parker Society's edition), contain the opinions of Ridley and Latimer upon the subject of the mass. Ridley says: "But forasmuch

"as things done in the mass tend openly to the overthrow of Christ's institution, I judge that by no means, either in word or deed, I ought to consent unto it."

Latimer states, "The very marrow bones of the mass are altogether detestable, and therefore by no means to be borne withal, so that of necessity the mending of it is to abolish it for ever. For if you take away oblation and adoration, which do hang upon consecration and transubstantiation, the most papists of them all will not set a button by the mass, as a thing which they esteem not, but for the gain that followeth thereon."

I submit, therefore, to your Lordship I have satisfactorily explained the use of the word "mass" in the 1st book of Edward VI., in the communion service, and that it does not in the slightest degree affect the spirit or the language of that Book, or in any degree control it. That word has no operation—can have no operation.

It appears from the official acts of the King's visitors (archbishops and bishops) that they considered all ceremonies not prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer were unlawful.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I thought you mentioned the injunctions.

(Mr. Stephens.) No, not the injunctions. Perhaps I may state to your Lordship one fact, that if you take all the visitation articles, to which I shall have to refer presently, of the different bishops from the period of the Reformation down to the last visitation article which I shall quote—

(The Dean of the Arches.) Down to where?

(Mr. Stephens.) Down to or about the time of the Act of Uniformity.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Charles II.'s Act?

(Mr. Stephens.) The Act of Uniformity of Charles II.

Your Lordship will not find in their inquiries, minute as they are, whether the parochial authorities have candles or candlesticks, or whether they have incense, or whether they have a cruet for water to mix with the Sacramental wine. No inquiries can be found in reference to such matters.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Nor as to vestments, as far as I recollect.

(Mr. Stephens.) My Lord, I am not discussing that question.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is so as a matter of fact. There is no inquiry as to vestments, is there?

(Mr. Stephens.) There is no inquiry as to vestments. No doubt that is so.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Your argument of course is, that they could not have been in use or they would have been inquired about.

(Mr. Stephens.) Precisely so. I shall direct your Lordship's attention to all these articles of visitation at some future stage in the argument, for the purpose of showing the contemporaneous usage.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I see the force of your argument.

(Mr. Stephens.) Because if they were required, is it likely, is it probable, that in such important matters we should find no trace of them?

I will now refer your Lordship to Dr. Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 74.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Upon this particular point?

(Mr. Stephens.) It is upon the question generally. These articles were issued under the royal injunctions of 1549.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That would be when?

(Mr. Stephens.) The 3rd of Edward the 6th. They were issued under the royal injunctions of 1549, and immediately after the publication of the first Book of Common Prayer: "That all parsons, vicars, and curates omit in the reading of the injunctions all such as make mention of the popish mass of chantries, of candles upon the altar, or any other such like thing."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Where is that about candles upon the altar, or any such like thing?

(Mr. Stephens.) In the first article. It is right that I should in the first instance read a note of Dr. Cardwell's. He is dealing with the issuing of these injunctions: "But though issued after the publication of the Prayer Book these articles are of the same year and afford evidence of the contemporary practice in matters of rites and ceremonies. They prove accordingly, that candles upon the Lord's table, being especially mentioned (see article 2), as not included among those ceremonies, which were appointed in the Book of Common Prayer, are not among those ornaments which were in this Church of England by authority of Parliament in the 2nd year of King Edward VI."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Dr. Cardwell fixes the date of these as the 21st of January 1549.

(Mr. James.) I do not know whether they are any authority.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Go on with your argument, Mr. Stephens; Mr. James will show us, by-and-by, that they are of no authority if they are not.

(Mr. Stephens.) The second article is, "For an uniformity, that no minister do counterfeit the popish mass as to kiss the Lord's table; washing his fingers at every time in the communion; blessing his eyes with the paten or sudary; or crossing his head with the paten; shifting of the book from one place to another. Laying down and licking the chalice of the communion; holding up his fingers, hands, or thumbs joined towards his temples; breathing upon the bread or chalice; showing the sacrament openly before the distribution of the communion; ringing of the sacring bells, or setting any light upon the Lord's board at any time; and finally to use no other ceremonies than are appointed in the King's Book of Common Prayers, or kneeling, otherwise than is in the said book."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Now, as I understand your argument, those injunctions have for their object to execute the provisions of the Common Prayer Book.

(Mr. Stephens.) That is what I cite them for. They show that no ceremony was to be used in our church except it was mentioned in the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., and that they excluded every other Book of Ritual. From this Second Article we likewise find what sort of things were considered to be Ceremonies not appointed by the King's Book.

I will now refer your Lordship to the Remains of Archbishop Cranmer, the Parker Society's edition, entitled "Remains and Letters," page 159. It is entitled, "Articles of Enquiry at the Visitation of the Cathedral Church of Canterbury, 1550." The second article is, "Whether any of this church do keep or observe diligently and inviolably, without colour or fraud, the book called the Common Prayer, according to the rules of the same, and the statute of Parliament authorizing the same book; and whether you use any other ceremonies at the communion or other divine service than is mentioned or allowed in the same book."

(The Dean of the Arches.) "Mentioned or allowed," is it?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord, "mentioned or allowed in the same book."

Bishop Ridley in his Visitation Articles inquires, "Whether any minister useth wilfully and obstinately any other rite, ceremony, order, form or manner of communion, mattens, or evensong, ministration of sacraments, or open prayers, than is set forth in the Book of Common Prayer." (1 Cardwell's Doc. Ann. p. 92.)

I shall again have occasion to refer your Lordship to these visitation articles, and it is very requisite at this stage of the argument to direct your Lordship's attention to their great authority. The prelates were with others especially intrusted with the duty of interpreting and enforcing the Acts of Uniformity. I need only give your Lordship a reference to the statutes. The statutes of 2 & 3 Edward VI., chapter 1, section 4, and 1 Elizabeth, chapter 2, section 18, empower the bishop of the diocese to join himself to any justice of oyer or of assize for trying offences against the Act of Uniformity. And, 2 & 3 Edward VI., chapter 1, section 12, and 1 Elizabeth, chapter 2, section 23, give all archbishops, bishops, and other ordinaries power to inquire in their visitations, synods, or elsewhere within their jurisdiction, and to punish by ecclesiastical censures all offenders against the Act. Thus under 2 & 3 Edward VI., chapter 1, the Bishops were authorised both to superintend the enforcement of the Act by the lay Tribunals and to enforce it themselves, and one of the specified modes of enforcing the Act, was by inquiries in their visitations.

Consequently Visitation Articles or injunctions interpreting the Acts of Uniformity, when issued by a Bishop, are entitled to the deepest respect, being publicly set forth by persons specially authorised to interpret them, and should be received as authorities for showing and irrefragably establishing the contemporaneous usage.

There has been, from the reign of Mary, a contemporaneous usage direct in opposition to the rites and ceremonies which are now the subject of discussion. It is however, desirable at this stage of the argument, that I should refer to three cases in order to show the effect of usage, because this is a very important point.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, it is. There is no legal form of visitation articles. It was left to the direction of each bishop to frame his visitation articles as he liked, and he might omit or he might add according to his mood.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) My experience is that even in these days the visitation articles in different dioceses are very different. Some are minuter than others, and we must bear that in mind when we are considering and weighing the value of these articles.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am much obliged to your Lordship for mentioning it. If the Visitation Articles were in one form it would not be of very great importance; but when different forms were issued by different bishops, and whatever the forms were no allusion is made as to the rites and ceremonies which are now attempted to be set up—it very much fortifies my argument.

(The Dean of the Arches.) As I understand, your argument is a negative and a positive argument.

(Mr. Stephens.) A negative and a positive argument.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say that what they ordered is a proof of complying with the requisitions of the statute, and what they did not order is a proof that they thought it was not proper they should order it.

(Mr. Stephens.) Precisely so. And it should also be borne in mind, that visitation articles differ, and many visitation articles go into the minutest particulars.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Some of them.

(Mr. Stephens.) Take every one of these visitation articles, take the visitation articles that go into the minutest particulars, and no inquiries are made whether candles had been furnished, or whether candles had been lighted during the performance of the communion service? or whether incense had been used during the communion service? or whether water had been mixed with the wine at the communion service?

If the ceremonies in question were legal, is it likely that on such important matters, symbolical of Roman Catholic doctrine, we should not have found some trace of them? But we find none.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You do not push your argument on the visitation articles quite so far as this, as to say that no ornament could be allowable that was not mentioned in these visitation articles.

(Mr. Stephens.) I do not; but I show the omission of the ornaments that are now under consideration, from the Acts of Uniformity and from the visitation articles, which I submit, is strong evidence to prove, that it was not the intention of the Acts of Uniformity to allow, nor was it the practice to have, such ornaments.

This point of contemporaneous usage is very important, and I trust your Lordship will not consider me irksome for pressing it in my argument.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Certainly not, "Fortissima est in lege."

(Mr. Stephens.) I will now refer your Lordship to 3 Clark and Finnelly, page 354. The case is The Magistrates of Dunbar v. The Duchess of Roxburgh. Lord Brougham in giving judgment says, "Where a statute uses language of doubtful import, the acting under it for a long course of years may well give an interpretation to that obscure meaning, and reduce that uncertainty to a fixed rule: "Optimus legis interpret consuetudo, which is sometimes termed 'contemporanea expositio;' and where you can carry back the usage for a century, and have no proof of a contrary usage before that time, you fairly reach the period of 'contemporanea expositio.'"

(The Dean of the Arches.) What was the subject of that suit? Let me have the marginal note. I suppose it was connected with property.

(Mr. Stephens.) The marginal note is, "Maintenance of the poor, construction of statutes, force of usage."

There is a case well known to your Lordship of Gorham v. The Bishop of Exeter, 15 Queen's Bench, page 73. Lord Campbell in giving judgment in that case—

(The Dean of the Arches.) This case went through all the courts?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Sir Fitzroy Kelly argued it?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord. Lord Campbell says, "Were the language of statute 25 Henry VIII., chapter 19, obscure, instead of being clear, we should not be justified in differing from the construction put upon it by contemporaneous and long-continued usage. There would be no safety for property or liberty, if it could be successfully contended that all lawyers and statesmen have been mistaken for centuries as to the true meaning of an old Act of Parliament." See also Pochin v. Duncombe, 1 Hurl. and Norm. 856; Fermoy Peerage Case, 5 House of Lords Cases, 176.

I likewise refer your Lordship to Moore's Report of the Westerton v. Liddell case, page 65. When Dr. Lushington says:—"Now I do not say these visitation articles can have the effect of repealing the statute just before passed, for clearly they could not; but it is evident, that immediately after the statute of Edward passed, the public lights on the Lord's board were deemed by the highest authorities in this realm not to be sanctioned by that statute or the Book of Common Prayer, but that such custom was prohibited. It appears to me that a stronger contemporaneous exposition could not possibly be found—and it is most important, because, if it be accepted as the true exposition of the 2nd and 3rd of Edward VI. and the first Book of Common Prayer, it clearly operates as a repeal of the injunctions of 1547."

(The Dean of the Arches.) How did the Privy Council deal with the question of the visitation articles? Do you recollect that?

(Mr. Stephens.) The visitation articles were only slightly alluded to.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not think much was said about that. As a matter of fact I mean there was no great weight laid upon them by the Privy Council.

(Mr. Stephens.) No, there was not; because they were not brought prominently before the Privy Council. I do not believe the visitation articles have been ever so much discussed as in this case.

I now propose to go into another branch of the subject, which will occupy some little time. It is the destruction of the service books in use previously to the enactment of the first Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then this will be a convenient time to adjourn.

SECOND DAY.

Thursday, December 5, 1867.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Before you resume your argument, Mr. Stephens, I want to call your attention to this. On looking through the notes of the argument which you addressed to the Court yesterday I find there is one point on which I wish to be quite certain that I have not misunderstood you. It is with regard to the effect of the injunctions. If I did not misunderstand you, your argument was that the injunctions of the bishops before and after the statute of the first Prayer Book had no legal authority or force per se, but that they derived whatever authority they had from the statutes.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, they can do nothing ultra the statute law.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is so, is it?

(Mr. Stephens.) It is a principle of the English constitution that everyone, from the Sovereign to the most humble of her subjects, is bound to obey the spirit and the letter of the statute law. We recognise no authority beyond that.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It was only with respect to the injunctions of that particular time that my remark went; I gather from what you say, that I correctly understood you, that those injunctions issued by the bishops could have no legal force except in so far as they executed the provisions of the statute?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, and I should respectfully contend that even the canons and the constitutions fall under that principle.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do not let me anticipate your argument.

(Mr. Stephens.) Perhaps it is requisite for me to state that the bishops assembled in convocation have no power ultra the statute law.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is no question about that. I wanted to know what authority you ascribe to the injunctions issued at the time of the first Prayer Book, and I think I quite understand you.

(Mr. Stephens.) I only intend to deal with the injunctions and visitation articles as contemporanea expositio.

With your Lordship's permission I will now proceed to discuss the destruction of the service books in use previously to the enactments of the first Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You left off with the visitation articles. You now take up this point?

(Mr. Stephens.) The object of destroying the ancient service books was, that the clergy should be confined exclusively to the rites and ceremonies prescribed by the Prayer Books, and if all the service books were destroyed, there was no source of authoritative information from whence the clergy could acquire any knowledge respecting the ceremonies of the church, anterior to the reign of Edward VI.

I am now going to quote from I Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 85, in which there is an order of the Privy Council of December 25th, 1549. The Privy Council issued an order to Archbishop Cranmer, directing him to "Command the dean and prebendaries of the cathedral churches, the parson, vicar, or curate and churchwardens of every parish within your diocese, to bring and deliver unto you or your deputy, any of them, for their church and parish at such convenient place as you shall appoint, all antiphoners, missals, grailes, processions, manuals, legends, pies, portasses, journals, and ordinals, after the use of Sarum, Lincoln, York, or any other private use, and all other books of service, the keeping whereof should be a let to the usage of the said Book of Common Prayers, and that you take the same books into your hands, or into the hands of your deputy, and them so deface and abolish that they never after may serve either to any such use, as they were provided for, or be at any time a let to that godly and uniform order, which by a common consent is now set forth."

Cranmer's Mandate communicating this order to his archdeacon is only dated the 4th February 1549-50, and therefore it would seem, that the acting upon the order of the Privy Council was postponed until after the passing of the statute 3 and 4 Edward VI., cap. 10, to which your Lordship's attention shall be immediately directed.

That statute is intituled "An Act for the abolishing and putting away of divers books and images," and your Lordship will find it at page 329 of my collection of Ecclesiastical Statutes; it recites that there had been set forth a book entitled "The Book of Common Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments," &c., "to be used and observed in the Church of England agreeable to the order of the primitive church, much more comfortable unto his loving subjects than other diversity of service, as heretofore of long time hath been used, being in the said book ordained, nothing to be read but the very pure word of God, or which is evidently grounded upon the same; and in the other things corrupt, untrue, vain, and superstitious, and, as it were, a preparation to superstition; which, for that they be not called in, but permitted to remain undefaced, do not only give occasion to such perverse persons as do impugn the order and godly meaning of the King's said Book of Common Prayer, to continue in their old accustomed superstitious service, but also minister great occasion to diversity of opinions, rites, ceremonies, and services." [It seems as if this recital had been prepared to meet the state of things at the present moment in our church.] It is then enacted "That all books called antiphoners, missals, grailes, processions, manuals, legends, pies, portasses, ordinals, or other books, or writings whatsoever, heretofore used for service of the church, written or printed in the English or Latin tongue, other than such as are or shall be set forth by the King's Majesty, shall be by authority of this present Act clearly and utterly abolished, extinguished, and forbidden for ever to be used or kept in this realm, or elsewhere within the King's dominions." Not only were they forbidden to use these books, but they were forbidden to keep them.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That was the statute referred to by Sir John Dodson, when he was Dean of Arches, in the Westerton and Liddell case?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, it was. I shall have to comment on the judgment of Sir John Dodson, and I shall respectfully contend before your Lordship that his judgment is not one that ought to be acquiesced in.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think that seemed to be the view of the Privy Council.

(Mr. Stephens.) Precisely so.

I will now refer your Lordship to the third and fourth Edward VI., cap. 10, section 5, at page 330 of my Edition of the Ecclesiastical Statutes: "Any person or persons may use, keep, have, and retain any primers in the English or Latin tongue, set forth by the late king of famous memory, King Henry the Eighth, so that the sentences of invocation, or prayer to saints, in the same primers be blotted or clearly put out of the same." This shows that all books prescribed and used for the service of the church were to be abolished, and that no book was to be used at this time except the first Prayer Book of Edward VI.

I now refer your Lordship to 6 Foxe, Actes and Monuments, page 83. The date is July 15th, 1550. It gives the articles which the King's council required Gardiner to subscribe at that date. The 12th article is as follows: "That all mass-books, cowchers, “grails, and other books of the service in Latin, heretofore used, should be abolished, and defaced, as well for certain superstitions in them contained as also to avoid dissension; and that the said service in the church should be through the whole realm in one uniform conformity and no occasion through those old books to the contrary.”

In the reign of Elizabeth the old service books that had been in use before the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. were strictly prohibited. The reason is obvious, that if any reference had been made to them, it would have interfered with the spirit and letter of Elizabeth Act of Uniformity. If they had been allowed to remain in existence precisely the same mischiefs would have been let in which both the first and second Prayer Books of Edward VI. had attempted to correct, viz., the diversities of practices.

In 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 299, your Lordship will find the articles that were agreed upon by the bishops in 1561, and one of their resolutions was, “service books, grails, antiphoners, and others be defaced and abolished by order in visitations.”

I will now direct your Lordship's attention to a series of important documents in 1566, in Peacock's English Church Furniture—London, 1866, is the edition from which I am about to read. It is stated in the introduction that, “The series of documents here printed exist in a mutilated manuscript preserved among the miscellaneous papers in the Episcopal Registry at Lincoln.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) Who is Mr. Peacock? What is he?

(Mr. Stephens.) He describes himself as “F.S.A., &c.,” whatever &c. may mean. There is no interpretation clause.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is the page?

(Mr. Stephens.) I am now going to read from page 9. The MS. “has no title other than the inscription, ‘Inventarium Monumentorum Superstitionis’ on the outside of its parchment cover. The volume consists of returns made in the 8th year of Elizabeth to certain royal commissioners by the churchwardens of 150 parishes in the county of Lincoln, of such articles of church furniture as had been used in the previous reign, but were in 1566 considered by the authorities to be superstitious or unnecessary.”

In reference to this book it is but fair to state (for I have studied it with a considerable amount of attention) that it is a valuable book, and entitled to every possible consideration. Almost all the returns published by Mr. Peacock, record the destruction of the mass books and other service books belonging to the parishes at the end of Mary's reign. There are only four instances of books remaining undefaced, which is rather a remarkable fact. The first instance is Ffulletbie, at page 81, where there is a direction to deface them by the 1st of May. They are spoken of as follows:—“Item, a mass book torn in pieces. Three other books of papistry they have, and the same books they must make awaie, a (sic) this side the 1st of May, and certify.” The next is Gunbie, at page 92, where a processioneer remained with many other illegal things; viz., “a sepulker a pix and a pax.” Then at Corringham, at page 61, there is a “grail and a manuell, which remained in the custody of the vicar.” And at Scotter, (p. 132.) there is a “mass book and a manuel, and a processioneer remaining, much of it defaced.” It is a very important fact, that in only four cases is all mention of the service books omitted:—Barkeston, (page 39); Market Deepinge, (page 67); Deeping James, (page 69); and Tedforth, (page 151).

(The Dean of the Arches.) What are the authorities that he refers to? You said these were removed by authority. What does Mr. Peacock say was the authority? Was it an order in council?

(Mr. Stephens.) All that Mr. Peacock professes to do is to print these records accurately, but the reason for which I cite from Mr. Peacock is, to show how effectually the directions of the Act of Parliament and also the directions of the bishops were carried out, because we see in this case (and I shall have to quote from this book very often in the course of my argument) every book was destroyed, with the few exceptions have mentioned; and what we do find is this, that the books mentioned in these four places were left with other things, about which there could be no question as to their illegality.

All that Mr. Peacock says is, it was mentioned that they were destroyed by “public authority,” but he refers to something else which I think I shall be able to explain.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It was after Queen Elizabeth's advertisements?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, I am coming to that. Your Lordship's question, I thought, was as to whether he went into the nature of the authority.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Oh, no.

(Mr. Stephens.) I beg your Lordship's pardon.

At Tallington, it is stated, (p. 150.) “mass books and cowchers were burnt, spoiled and defaced at the Queen's Majesty's Visitation.” At Welbie, (page 158,) “A mass book torn in pieces and painted to make hangings thereof; and it goes on—“Item a manual, a processioneer, [i.e., a Procession Book,] legends, and such like Popish peltrie was burnt in the first of Elizabeth at Grantham, according to the commandment of the Queen's Highness' Visitors, that now is, George Weston and William Kyrton then churchwardens.” Market Reason (p. 124) they were taken away by one South, the Queen's Majesty's Pursuevant. I am going through those cases respecting which your Lordship asked me for information.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not want to give you that trouble. All I wanted to know was to whom the author was referring when he said “authority,” whether it was an order in council, an order from the Queen, or an order in visitation.

(Mr. Stephens.) Or whether it was his own construction.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes.

(Mr. Stephens.) Then I must refer your Lordship to page 57, Braunceton—“A mass book, a grail, a portess, and a manuel cut in pieces before my Lord of Lincoln four years since, when he was there and preaching.” That is most important, because the bishop seems to have directed it.

By the statute of 3 James I. cap. 5, s. 25, “No person shall bring from beyond the seas, nor shall print, sell, or buy any popish primers, lady's psalters, manuals, rosaries, popish catechisms, missals, breviaries, legends, and lives of saints, containing superstitious matter printed or written in any language whatsoever, nor any other superstitious books printed or written in the English tongue.”

I will now direct your Lordship's attention to Grindal's Remains, to show that the provisions in the statutes quoted to-day, have been carried out by prelates. My first quotation is from Grindal's Remains (Parker Society's edition, page 135.) That would be in the year 1571. “The churchwardens, and minister shall see that antiphoners, mass-books, grailles, portesses, processionals, manuals, legends, and all other books of late belonging to their church or chapel, which served for the superstitious Latin service, be utterly defaced, rent, and abolished.” Then at page 159 (that was in 1576) we find the like directions. “And if they be not (abolished) through whose fault that is, and in whose keeping they remain.”

I will now go to the 18th of Elizabeth, 1586; and direct attention to the Archbishop of Canterbury's (Whitgift) licence to bring in Popish books, (2 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, p. 30.) “Whereas sundry books are from time to time set forth in the parts beyond seas by such as are addicted to the errors of Popery; yet, in many respects, convenient to be had by some of the learned of this realm; con“taining also oftentimes matter in them against the state of this land, and slanderous unto it, and therefore no fit books to pass through every man’s hand freely; in consideration whereof, I have tolerated Ascanius de Renialme, merchant book-seller, to bring into this realm from the parts beyond seas some few copies of every such sort of books, upon this condition only, that any of them be not shewed or dispersed abroad, but first brought to me, or some other of Her Majesty’s Privy Council, that so they may be delivered, or directed to be delivered forth unto such persons only as by us, or some of us, shall be thought most meet men, upon good considerations and purposes to have the reading and perusal of them.” Thus we find, how strict the regulations were as to the slightest knowledge being disseminated among the people, or even among the clergy, in reference to the old service books, although they were published abroad.

I will now come to the time of Charles I., 1628–1637, and direct the attention of the Court to 5 Laud’s Works, p. 414, the Anglo-Catholic Library edition. In Laud’s visitation articles for the diocese of London in 1628, at which time he was Bishop of London, the 27th article of inquiry is, “Whether there be any in your parish who are known or suspected to conceal or keep hid in their houses any mass books, portesses, breviaries, or other books of Popery or superstition; or any chalices, copes, vestments, albes, or other ornaments of superstition uncanceled or undefaced, which is conjectured they keep for a day as they call it.” Your Lordship asked me a question yesterday about vestments, whether there was any inquiry in any visitation articles about the vestments, and I ventured to state to your Lordship that I was not aware of any.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I should be glad to have any authority on that point.

(Mr. Stephens.) Here it amounts to a prohibition on the part of Laud that he considered they were illegal, because he classes vestments with other illegal things.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Chalices, for instance.

(The Dean of the Arches.) “Copes and albs;” anything else specially?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, chalices.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No other vestments?

(Mr. Stephens.) No other vestments. I only cited this passage to elucidate the question respecting the mass books and breviaries and other books of superstition. I read the entire of it in consequence of a question which your Lordship did me the favour to put to me yesterday.

At page 448 of the same volume, in Archbishop Laud’s articles of 1637, for the Peculiars of Canterbury, the 33rd article corresponds with the 29th article of 1628.

The question naturally arises whether the policy of the provisions of these statutes was right or wrong.

We have seen that from the days of Cranmer to those of Laud, the possession of Roman Catholic service books by clergymen or by laymen of the Church of England was strictly prohibited, not only by the express words of repeated Acts of Parliament, but likewise by visitation articles, and by the Resolutions of all the bishops, because such books would encourage ceremonies and ornaments not prescribed by the Prayer Book.

The necessity and the wisdom of that prohibition cannot be better illustrated than by referring to a book which seems intended to furnish the so-called “Catholic” clergy of the present day, with that knowledge, which Cranmer and Laud thought proper to withhold, not only from the laity but from the clergy. I allude to the “Directorium Anglicanum,” edited by Dr. Lee; and however much I may differ from the theological opinions of that gentleman, I regard him with sentiments of respect for his undoubted learning and laborious research. But, my Lord, I quote this work as a very high authority upon this point, as speaking the opinion of an influential class in this country. This book has gone through several editions, and at the time that the second edition from which I am about to quote was published, Dr. Lee was associated with Dr. Pusey, as clerical members of the Council of the Church Union, and they were the two most distinguished members of it. Moreover, after several editions of this book were published, and only a few months since, Dr. Lee was instituted to the living of All Saints, Lambeth.

I will now direct your Lordship’s attention to the preface, page VI. “It has been sometimes alleged that the rubrics of the Book of Common Prayer are in themselves a full and complete guide for the priest in performing divine service, and also (with the canons of 1603) for the ornaments of the church and of the ministers thereof. The canons of 1603 and their bearing upon the rubrics will be disposed of subsequently. In regard to the ‘ornaments’ it is patent to every one that we are remanded back to a stated period in which the aforesaid ‘ornaments’ were in use in this Church of England by authority of Parliament, viz., the second year of the reign of Edward VI.”

“As to the rubrics being a complete code of ritual directions, the experience of every parish priest attests that they are insufficient. Nor is any slight thrown upon our Service Book or upon its revisers by this admission. The rubrics are perfectly sufficient for the guidance of any clergyman moderately acquainted with the traditions of Catholic ritual and the real and ancient use of the English Church.”

At page VII. we find this paragraph: “Such a manual as the clergy had for the better understanding and interpretation of the rubrics of the Missal and other office books, and such a guide as Catholic tradition and knowledge of the old English service books afforded to the first revisers of those books, and to the officiating priests of that day, is now attempted to be given in the present volume. That such a work is necessary is only too well known to every clergyman. The recently ordained deacon and priest have had generally no official training or example. The college chapel, and only too often the cathedral of the diocese, have, with some favoured exceptions, worthy of all honour, been rather beacons to warn them off the rocks of irreverent slovenliness and ritual irregularity, than stars to guide them how to offer, or to assist in offering acceptable sacrifices in the Church of God. They have thus been forced to follow the mode of ‘conforming to the liturgy’ as practised in some church which most approves itself to their partially informed instincts, the selection probably being made from circumstances of proximity or from something else equally accidental.

“The argument for a ritual is not within the scope of these remarks. We have a ritual, and must use it, whether we like it or not. It behoves us to use it aright, and not curtail and mar its fair proportion. Every part of the church must have a ritual, and as there is but one Catholic church, so the ritual of every portion thereof will have a family likeness, and be one in spirit, though diverse in details. Ritual and ceremonial are the hieroglyphics of the Catholic religion, a language understood of the faithful, a kind of parable in action, for as of old, when He walked upon the earth, our blessed Lord, still present in His divine and human nature in the Holy Eucharist on the altars of His Church, still spiritually present at the common prayers, does not speak unto us ‘without a parable’; but as our Lord’s ‘visage was marred more than any man, and his form more than the sons of men,’ so has it fared, at least in his church in this land, with the aspect of his worship on earth. For the last three hundred years, brief but brilliant periods excepted, our ritual has lost all unity or significance of expression.”

Then at page XIX. of the preface where he is discussing the first Prayer Book of 1549, he says,

"The statutable authority of the ancient canon law seems perfectly clear, and Edward's first book has been pronounced by the Court of Final Appeal to be the statutable authority for ornaments, and is to be regarded, as referred to in the rubric 'by the authority of Parliament in the second year of Edward VI,' as the reformed exponent of the old canons and provincial constitutions."

"To sum up, firstly, the rubric remands us back to the old canons and constitutions passed before the Reformation, to such of which it gives statutable authority, as are not 'contrariant or repugnant' to subsequent enactments on the subject; and secondly, to Edward's first book, as has been shown at pages XVI, XVII, and determined by the Privy Council; and thirdly, to the injunctions of 1547, which were in force by authority of Parliament in the second year."

At page 36 of the book, and not of the preface, there is a note upon "the position of the hands and feet." I am only going to show your Lordship what folly would be 'propagated if books of this kind were allowed to go forth by authority, and it is quite clear that to put down and suppress books of this character was the object of the Legislature. "The hands of all the ministers should be joined before the breast with the fingers extended. The chief exceptions are in collects and similar prayers, the intonations of the creed, the prefaces, and the consecration prayer to the words 'body and blood,' and of the Gloria in excelsis; in these cases the celebrant (only) holds his hands open and extended, the palms facing each other." And then there is a very rich and ludicrous passage, "The feet are put close together. In sitting, the same rule is observed; the legs should not be crossed, and the hands should be placed in the lap."

Now, my Lord, coupled with all this deference to the minute directions respecting (1) the position of the hands, the feet, and especially the hands in the lap, (2) the provisions of the rubric and (3) the canons of the pre-Reformation Church,—we find a very strange disregard for what Protestants regard, as of infinitely higher importance, and in respect of which they have the strongest and the purest feelings of reverence. I will direct your Lordship's attention to two passages on that point, and I shall then end my quotations from this "Catholic" work. At page 38 in a note, there is this language: "It must be admitted that the introduction of the Ten Commandments was a singular and grievous innovation for which no ancient precedent whatever can be found;" and at page 272, after citing the 82nd canon of the canons of 1603-4, he refers to the Ecclesiologist, "which" (he says) "rightly states that there is no authority for placing them east of the chancel. If, however, the table of commandments is set up at the east of the chancel, it should be distempred in scrolls upon the wall, thus making no construction necessary for them, and allowing them to bear a part in the decorative colouring of the building." [And how is this to be done?] "They should be as small as possible in size and quite undemonstrative."

Now, my Lord, I should like to know why are not the Ten Commandments to be placed in such a manner as the people may read them in our parish churches?

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not want to interrupt you, I am sure, but there is no question about the Ten Commandments before me to-day.

(Mr. Stephens.) No, there is not. I am quoting this publication to illustrate the policy of the Act.

Why, I ask, are the Ten Commandments only to be placed in our parish churches "as small as possible in size, and quite undemonstrative?" I have carefully considered that question, and the only objection I can find, looking at the spirit of this book is, because the Second Commandment forbids the bowing down to or worshipping before graven images. I will now leave that book and its author and proceed to 1552, the fifth year of Edward VI.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Are you going to pass away altogether from the consideration of the first Prayer Book now?

(Mr. Stephens.) I have gone through the first Act of Uniformity of Edward VI., and I now propose to go through the second Act, then the Act of Elizabeth, and subsequently that of Charles II.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You have not finished your argument on the first Act of Uniformity. You will return to that, because there is that question remaining of mixing water with the wine.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am going to deal with all the articles and the responsive allegations separately. The reason I allude to the statutes in the first instance is, because the provisions in the statutes apply to the pleadings generally; but I intend to deal in detail with the question of lights and every other ceremony mentioned in the articles.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Quite so, I understand.

(Mr. Stephens.) I refer your Lordship to the 5th and 6th of Edward VI., c. 1, section 5, which you will find at p. 332 of my edition of the Ecclesiastical Statutes. It enacts that the Prayer Book, which was then annexed to the statute of 5 & 6 Edward VI., should be "of like force, authority, and value as the same like foresaid book entitled 'The Book of Common Prayer' was before, and to be accepted, received, used, and esteemed in like sort and manner, and with the same clauses, provisions and exceptions, to all intents, constructions, and purposes, as by the Act of Parliament made in the second year of the King's Majesty's reign was ordained, limited, expressed and appointed for the uniformity of service and administration of the sacraments throughout the realm, upon such several pains as in the said Act of Parliament is expressed." Then, my Lord, the 6th section provides that if any person shall "willingly and wittingly hear and be present at any other manner or form of common prayer of administration of the sacraments, of making of ministers in the churches, or of any other rites contained in the book annexed to this Act, than is mentioned and set forth in the said book, or that is contrary to the form of sundry provisions and exceptions contained in the aforesaid former statute," he shall be punished.

The effect of this section is, that any person who attended a service according to the first Book of Edward VI. was to be punished,—thus showing that no ceremony or prayer was to be adopted other than that prescribed in the second book of Edward VI., and excluding all the old ceremonies and prayers not expressly sanctioned.

It should be borne in remembrance, that the like law was in force when our present Prayer Book was enacted; and that such book, like the second book of Edward VI., contains no directions for mixing water with the sacramental wine; nor for the use of incense as a ceremony; nor for lighted candles on the Communion Table when not required for light; nor for the elevation of the elements above the head of the celebrant. The second Prayer Book of Edward VI. and the Prayer Books of Elizabeth and Charles II. were substantially the same, although the Prayer Book in 1662 varied in many respects from Elizabeth's Prayer Book. And I will venture to read to your Lordship an extract from the preface of 1 Stephens's "Book of Common Prayer" upon that point, (page 169.) "The Sentences, the Epistle and Gospels, and other extracts from the Bible (except the Psalter, the Ten Commandments, and other portions of the Communion Service) were taken generally from the version of 1611. The absolution was ordered to be pronounced by the 'priest' alone, instead of the 'minister.' The book of Bel and the Dragon was re-inserted in the calendar of lessons. The prayers for the King, the Royal Family, the clergy, and people, together with the Prayer of St. Chrysostom, and the Benediction were “ printed in the order both of morning and evening service, instead of being left as formerly at the end of the Litany. The evening service which previously began with the Lord’s Prayer, was now opened with the Sentences, the Exhortation, the Confession, and Absolution, printed as in the morning service. In the Litany, the words ‘rebellion’ and ‘schism’ were added to the petition respecting ‘sedition, privy conspiracy,’ &c. In a subsequent petition, the words ‘bishops, priests, and deacons’ were employed instead of ‘bishops, pastors, and ministers of the church.’

“ Among the occasional prayers and thanksgivings were now introduced a second prayer, ‘In the time of dearth and famine,’ the two prayers for the Ember Weeks, the prayers for the Parliament and for all conditions of men, a thanksgiving for restoring public peace at home, and the general thanksgiving. New collects were appointed for the third Sunday in Advent and for St. Stephen’s day. The genealogy which previously made part of the gospel for the Sunday after Christmas, was now omitted. A distinct collect, epistle, and gospel were provided for a sixth Sunday after the Epiphany. The gospels for the Sunday next before Easter, and for Good Friday were shortened, having formerly contained within them respectively the second lesson for the morning. In several places, as in one of the collects for Good Friday, in those for the fifth and sixteenth Sundays after Trinity, for St. Simon and St. Jude, and in other places, the word ‘Church’ was used for ‘congregation.’ A distinct collect was supplied for Easter-even. The first of the anthems used on Easter day was added. A distinct epistle was provided for the day of the Purification. The last clause respecting Saints departed was added to the prayer for the church militant. The rubric was added as to ‘covering what remaineth of the consecrated elements with a fair linen cloth.’

“ The Order in Council respecting kneeling at the Lord’s supper, which had been introduced in 1552, and removed by Queen Elizabeth, was shortened and restored with this alteration instead of ‘any real and essential presence there being of Christ’s natural flesh and blood,’ it is now read, ‘any corporal presence of Christ’s natural flesh and blood.’ An office was appointed for the baptism of such as are of riper years, and some alterations made in the other offices of baptism. The preface to confirmation was curtailed and the clause respecting the undoubted salvation of baptized infants dying before the commission of actual sin was placed after the office for infant baptism. Some changes were made in the offices for confirmation and matrimony; and in the rubric at the end of the latter, the receiving the communion on the day of the marriage was no longer made imperative. In the visitation of the sick, the words ‘if he humbly and heartily desire it’ were added, and the prayers that follow appeared now for the first time. In the order for burial, the first rubric respecting persons dying unbaptized or excommunicate was added. Forms of prayer were supplied to be used at sea.”

There are many other minor alterations amounting, as Dr. Tenison computed, to about 600 in number.

These important and minute amendments are illustrative of the fact, that at all periods of our Church history the greatest attention and care seems to have been bestowed in making the Prayer Book for the time being as perfect as possible, in order that it should be the exclusive guide for the clergy in the performance of divine service.

I will now proceed, my Lord, to another point, viz. : “the inventories of the church goods.” In the case that is called “the English Church Union case” there are some passages to which I am desirous of directing the attention of the Court. It has become a public and official, nay a parliamentary document, inasmuch as the Ritual Commissioners have thought proper to publish it in the appendix to their first report. I therefore deal with it as a public document.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is it, if it is not the opinion of counsel? In what class do you place it?

(Mr. Stephens.) It is not an unpublished opinion as between private individuals, but it has now become a public document, the property of the country, if I may so say. In the ordinary course of business, an opinion given to a litigant party is dealt with as a private document.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It has no more authority than it had before the Ritual Commissioners printed it.

(Mr. Stephens.) I do not say it has more authority, but there is a degree of publicity given to it, which a private opinion does not possess.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is simply the opinion of counsel.

(Mr. Stephens.) Simply the opinion of counsel, and published by the Ritual Commissioners. If it had been an unpublished opinion of counsel I should not have referred to it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not wish to restrain you. I only say it can have no authority except as an opinion of counsel.

(Mr. Stephens.) It can have no authority except as an opinion of counsel.

(Mr. James.) It is the opinion of counsel upon the facts laid before them.

(Mr. Stephens.) Precisely so.

(Mr. James.) I do not wish to interrupt, but I never did hear a reference made in the course of an argument to the opinion of living counsel.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I shall not prevent Mr. Stephens referring to it, if, in the exercise of his discretion he wishes to do so. It is entirely in his discretion. I only say that I shall deal with those opinions simply as the opinions of counsel on the facts then laid before them, and not as binding me in any way whatever.

(Mr. James.) Or binding the counsel?

(Mr. Stephens.) It is said that it is not usual to refer to the private opinions of counsel. It may be so; but when the opinions of counsel are published by a Royal Commission printed and published at the public expense as a parliamentary document they cease to have a private character.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Both opinions were published?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, both. My friend can refer to the opinions of the opposite side.

(Mr. James.) I shall certainly do no such thing.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Let there be no altercation between counsel. If you think it useful in your case by all means refer to it.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am much obliged to your Lordship I wish to show that the statement of this case is inaccurate. I am citing from the Edition published by Rivingtons, page 47. It says, “The inventories of church goods made in pursuance of the commissions issued in the last years of Edward VI., i.e., after the second Prayer Book had been published, which required only the use of the surplice. These commissions show, that in very numerous cases the commissioners, in pursuance of the ‘discretion’ reposed in them, left for use in the church”—[the words for use are in italics]—“Altar crosses, altar candlesticks, copes, tunicles, albes, and occasionally censers, &c.—ornaments, these, which certainly were not obligatory, but, on the contrary, are usually (though it is believed, incorrectly) supposed to have been unlawful at that time.”

It is requisite, in order to explain this passage satisfactorily, to go into an explanation of the inventories of church goods in the sixth year of Edward VI., and likewise to explain the assignments. The distinction is between the “inventories” and the “assignments,” because it is only those ornaments that were mentioned in the assignments that were left for the use of the church.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you say those only?

(Mr. Stephens.) Those only, my Lord. In 1552 commissioners were appointed in every county.

(The Dean of the Arches.) These inventories were first of all in a place called Carlton Ride, and then removed?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Are they published in a volume by themselves?

(Mr. Stephens.) No, my Lord. At least I do not believe they are. The best information upon the subject that I am aware of, is in a series of Papers to which I shall refer you presently in the Church Review of 1865 and 1866, volumes 5 and 6.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I thought there might be a volume containing them altogether. I remember having occasion to look into them a long time ago, but they were in manuscript then. I see they are now at the Record Office, in Fetter Lane.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. The commission for the county of Bedford has been published in the first volume of Stephens' edition of the Book of Common Prayer, page 351; and the commission to the town of Northampton, dated May 16th, 1552, will be found in the same book at page 359. At page 356 there is a commission dated 16th January 1552-3, granted to certain general commissioners who were to take action upon the certificates of the county commissioners.

In 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, p. 110, there is a copy of the "Instructions given by the King's Majesty to the Marquis of Northampton, and to the rest of his Highness' Commissioners appointed for the survey of church goods within His Majesty's county of Northampton." And at page 112 will be found the instructions issued to those Commissioners. "The Commissioners are to cause due inventories to be made, by bills or books indented of all manner of goods, plate, jewels, bells and ornaments as yet remaining or anywise forthcoming or belonging to any churches, chapels, fraternities, or guilds;" . . . "They shall also give good charge and order, that the same goods, and every part thereof, be at all times forthcoming to be answered, leaving nevertheless in every parish church or chapel of common resort, one, two, or more chalices or cups, according to the multitude of the people in every church or chapel, and also such other ornaments as by their discretion shall seem requisite for the divine service in every such place for the time." The inventories are mentioned first, and then the assignments, and the distinction between them is clearly shown in these instructions.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What they did not assign to the parish they sold or took to themselves.

(Mr. Stephens.) They first made an inventory of every thing that was in the church; then they selected what they thought ought to be used, namely, ornaments that were legal and proper for use in the church, and assigned them to the churchwardens for the use of the parish. The other goods in the inventories were either taken away, or were left with the churchwardens for safe custody.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I quite understand. The Commission issued between the two statutes, or was it after the statute of the second Prayer Book?

(Mr. Stephens.) Between the two. That is exactly the point.

(The Dean of the Arches.) According to that date it would be so.

(Mr. James.) What year of Edward was that? I see that some of the assignments were in the 6th and 7th of Edward.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The second Prayer Book is in the 5th and 6th of Edward VI.

(Mr. James.) There is a date that caught my eye that the assignments were in the 6th and 7th of Edward VI.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The Commission issued between the two Prayer Books, and was carried into execution after the second Prayer Book.

(Mr. Stephens.) I will deal with that presently.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Can you give us the date of the Commission?

(The Dean of the Arches.) It will come out in due time; but do not interrupt your argument, Mr. Stephens, but give it us when convenient.

(Mr. Stephens.) The date of the first Commission, my Lord?

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, I think you are right, I think it was issued between the two Prayer Books.

(Mr. Stephens.) I will supply the date to your Lordship in a few minutes. Mr. Droop will find it for me, in order to save the time of the Court.

In the English Church Union case we find at pages 48-52 the inventories of the parish of Strode, Rochester, dated the 24th July 1552, the sixth year of Edward VI. This document affords an illustration of the ordinary form of these documents. The inventory speaks of the Church goods as committed to the custody of the churchwardens, safely to be kept and be forthcoming at all times when it shall be required; and after enumerating the articles, it is stated towards the end of page 49, "Out of the particulars within written the said Commissioners have appointed and delivered unto the said Churchwardens to the use and behoof of the said church, and common prayers to be ministered and used in the same church these particulars following," and they are then set forth. These concluding statements are the assignments, and, as I have said before, are of considerable importance as showing what at that date were considered legal ornaments for the use of the church.

(Mr. Droop.) My Lord, the first commission Dr. Stephens cited is at page 354 of the first volume of Stephens on the Book of Common Prayer. There is no date to that. It is addressed to the Marquis of Northampton and some other people, and it is for the county of Bedford. The next one is at page 359, and it is for the town of Northampton. It is dated the 16th of May, the sixth year of Edward VI., which, as your Lordship is aware, would be 1552.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Those are separate commissions.

(Mr. Droop.) They are separate commissions, to remove ornaments.

(The Dean of the Arches.) In all these cases there was not one commission, but a variety of commissions.

(Mr. Droop.) Commissions issued to different towns and counties.

(The Dean of the Arches.) A separate commission to each diocese, not one commission with a set of commissioners who went round to the different dioceses, but a separate commission to each diocese.

(Mr. Droop.) Then, my Lord, there is the commission which is to be found at p. 356 of Stephens; which is dated the 16th of January, in the sixth year of Edward VI. Edward VI. began his reign on the 28th January 1546-7. Therefore this subsequent commission was in 1552-3, and it recites the former ones. I am now going to show how the instructions in 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, p. 110, were connected with the Commission. It recites that there were Commissions issued to the different counties, and also that certain instructions were sent separately to the different Commissioners; and as we have got those instructions in Cardwell, I submit that they must have been the instructions referred to in this Commission as sent to the former Commissioners.

(Mr. Stephens.) I was at page 49 of the Church Union case. The inventory mentions, as your Lordship will find, at page 49, about the middle of the page two old latten candlesticks. I think there is likewise a censer.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There are a great many vestments mentioned, one of white damask, one of black velvet, a vestment of blue, and so on.

(Mr. Stephens.) I will take the two latten candlesticks.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What do you understand by "latten candlesticks"?

(Mr. Stephens.) They are a species of metal; iron plate, covered with tin.

(Mr. James.) Worth 6*d.*, I see.

(Mr. Stephens.) No matter what they are worth. The candlesticks were not assigned for the use of the church, on the face of that document.

(The Dean of the Arches.) At the top of page 50 it appears what was assigned: "A cope of white damask; a vestment of white damask; a cope of red velvet; a vestment of red velvet; a hearse cloth; 3 surplices; 2 chalices; 2 altar cloths; a cloth to hang before the table of yellow and blue silk;" and it is said "In the inventory this is called a cloth for the high altar."

(Mr. Stephens.) But no candlesticks, no censers, no cruets.

(Mr. James.) There do not seem to have been censers in the inventory.

(Mr. Stephens.) There are "candlesticks." They are in the inventory, but they are not assigned, that is the distinction. Now, my Lord, at pages 47 and 59 of the Church Union case, considerable stress is laid upon the fact, that in a very large number of instances vestments and copes were assigned for use in the church in 1552, after the passing of Edward the Sixth's second Act of Uniformity. But although this is the case as regard the assignments in July, August, September, and October 1552, yet the only subsequent assignments with dates are three sets of assignments in 1553. I will now refer your Lordship to the 5th volume of the Church Review of 1865, at page 1077. It relates to St. Paul's Cathedral. And at page 941, to 28 churches in Buckinghamshire.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Are those inventories or assignments that you are referring to?

(Mr. Stephens.) They are assignments.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The passages you are referring me to are assignments only?

(Mr. Stephens.) Assignments only. I will read the passage: "Inventories of the 4th, 5th, 6th of May, 7 Edward VI. (1553), for 28 churches in the hundred of Bucks." Each church seems (then) only to have been allowed a chalice, paten, surplice, altar-cloths and bells, but no mention of vestments.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the seventh year of King Edward VI.?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That would be after the second Prayer Book?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, the date is 1553. Then at page 1244 we find the phrase used in assignments to churches, "Left in the parish church of" so-and-so, and then follow the items. It then goes on "It should be stated in none of the city assignments (May anno 7; and therefore some seven or eight months later than the rural assignments) do any copes or vestments appear as having been ceded."

There is also one undated set of assignments relating to nine churches in Exeter containing merely surplices. The latest assignment that I can find of copes is on the 4th of October 1552, Church Review, vol. 6, p. 266.

(The Dean of the Arches.) 1552 is the latest?

(Mr. Stephens.) The latest; but the second Prayer Book was only to be used after All Saints' Day, the 1st of November 1552. Edward the 6th's second book was not circulated, until shortly before the 1st of November 1552, an order having been given on the 27th of September to stop its being issued.

(The Dean of the Arches.) How does that appear?

(Mr. Stephens.) In Lathbury's History of Convocation, second edition, p. 142, there is this passage: "The Act of Parliament by which the book was ratified passed in April 1552, but in September an order came to Grafton in anywise to stay from uttering any of the books. If any were distributed to the Company of Stationers, they were not to be circulated. The order for inserting the rubric is in the Har: Coll: and is dated Oct. 27, 1552. It was a letter to the Lord Chancellor. The book was printed two months before the order was issued

"so that the sheet must have been cancelled in the copies which were not in circulation. It occurs in three copies in my possession."

The best evidence that the assignment of copes and vestments for use in divine service, had regard to the first book of Edward VI., and not to the second book, is to be found in the commission to Sir Richard Cotton, and others, of 16th January 1552-3. That would be in the 6th of Edward (1 Stephens on the Prayer Book, p. 356). I am only referring to this matter for the purpose of showing, that these assignments applied to acts done under the first book. This commission was directed to sundry persons to collect all the ready money and jewels appearing in the inventories for the King's use, and to leave out one or more chalices "for use in the churches," and they are further authorized (page 357) "after the honest and comely furniture of coverings for the communion-table, and surples or surplices for the minister or ministers in the said churches or chapels by your discretion to distribute or cause to be distributed and given freely to the poor people in every parish where the same churches and chapels stand, and be, the residue of the linen, ornaments, and implements of the said churches and chapels in such order and sort as may be most to God's glory and our honour. And we give unto seven, six, five, or four of you full power and authority to sell or cause to be sold to our use, all and singular copes, vestments, altar-cloths, and other ornaments whatsoever remaining or being within any of the said churches or chapels, not appointed by this our commission to be left in the said churches or chapels, or to be distributed to the poor as afore is declared, and also to sell or cause to be sold to our use by weight all pieces or parcels of metal, except the metal of great bell saunse bell in every of the said churches or chapels."

What is the effect of this commission? Why that the King's Council in January 1552-3 considered chalices, surplices, and linen cloths for the communion-table, the only necessary or desirable ornaments of the church.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Some copes were appointed to be left?

(Mr. Stephens.) Some were.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do I understand what you have read rightly, that according to that authority some copes were appointed to be left, and some to be sold?

(Mr. Stephens.) I will read the whole paragraph again. It will explain this difficulty. "They have full power and authority after the honest and comely furniture," this is what is to be left, "of coverings for the communion-table, and surplice or surplices for the minister or ministers in the said churches or chapels, by your discretions to distribute or cause to be distributed, or given freely to the poor people in every parish where the same churches and chapels stand, and be, the residue of the linen ornaments and implements of the said churches and chapels in such order and sort as may be most to God's glory and our honour. And we give unto you full power and authority to sell or cause to be sold to our use all and singular copes, vestments, altarcloths, and other ornaments whatsoever remaining." So that every ornament not mentioned in the previous part which I have read was to be sold.

(The Dean of the Arches.) How does it go on?

(Mr. Stephens.) "Whatsoever remaining or being within any other of the said churches or chapels not appointed by this our Commission to be left in the said churches or chapels or to be distributed to the poor as afore is declared, and also to sell or cause to be sold to our use by weight, all parcels or pieces of metal except the metal of the great bell, saunse bell in every of the said churches or chapels."

I now propose to call your Lordship's attention to the statute of 1 Mary, session 2, cap. 2, ss. 1 and 2. I am quoting from the "Statutes of the Realm," the folio edition published by the Record Commission. It is "an Act for the repeal of certain statutes made in the reign of King Edward VI." I may shortly state to your Lordship the effect of the statute. It repealed the two Prayer Books of Edward VI., and all the other statutes of his reign relating to the church, and enacted by the 2nd section, that "All such divine service and administration of sacraments as were most commonly used in England, in the last year of Henry VIII. shall be used through the realm after the 20th day of December 1553, and no other kind of service nor administration of sacraments." Therefore every single thing was repealed under this statute so far as regarded the Prayer Books that had been previously in use and everything was thrown back to the last year of Henry VIII.

I will now make a few remarks on Elizabeth's Statute of Uniformity, 1 Elizabeth, cap. 2, and very shortly state to your Lordship the effect of that statute. The 1st section recites, that the statute of the 5th and 6th Edward VI. c. 1. for one uniform order of Common Prayer and of common service and prayer, had been repealed. The 2nd section repeals the statute of 1 Mary, session 2, cap. 2. so far only as it concerned the Second Book of Common Prayer of Edward VI.; and enacts that that book with certain alterations and additions shall be in full force. The 3rd section mentions the alterations that were made between the second book of Edward VI. and the Book of Common Prayer allowed by this statute, and also compels the clergy to use such Prayer Book with the like obligations as they had been bound to use the second Prayer Book of Edward VI. The 4th section prohibits the use of any other rite or ceremony than those prescribed; and the 9th section prohibits any person from procuring any minister to use any other rite or ceremony.

These negative sections are not in express words repeated in the Act of Uniformity of Charles II. But the 24th section of that Act makes them applicable to and in force with reference to the existing Book of Common Prayer.

In the 25th section of Elizabeth's Act of Uniformity there is a proviso "That such ornaments of the church and of the ministers thereof shall be retained and be in use as was in this Church of England by authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI. until other order shall be therein taken by the authority of the Queen's Majesty, with the advice of her Commissioners appointed and authorized under the great seal of England, for causes ecclesiastical, or of the metropolitan of this realm."

The object of Mary was to bring back the Roman Catholic Use, and therefore she fixed upon the last year of Henry VIII. and referred to the divine service which was "most commonly used" in that year. If Queen Elizabeth had wished to retain all Roman Catholic practices, or even all the Roman Catholic ornaments in the performance of divine worship, the last year of Henry VIII. would have been selected instead of the second of Edward VI., and the phrase "most commonly used" would have been substituted for the words "by authority of Parliament."

As to the expression "by authority of Parliament," I beg to refer your Lordship to Mr. Moore's report of the case of Westerton and Liddell, page 160. The Privy Council decided that the words "by authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI." refer exclusively to Edward's first book. It will be more convenient to defer the detailed discussion as to the effect of this proviso until I discuss the rubric immediately preceding the Morning Prayer in our present Prayer Book relating to the ornament of the church and of the ministers thereof. It is needless to discuss the question whether Elizabeth made that "other order" or not. It does not appear to me that it affects the questions that are under the consideration of your Lordship.

(The Dean of the Arches.) At present you give no construction to these words: "until further order," in that section?

(Mr. Stephens.) I have given no construction of those words, because I believe the words do not affect any of the questions in issue in this case.

(Mr. James.) I believe there is no dispute that that statute of Elizabeth is still in force?

(Mr. Stephens.) You admit that?

(Mr. James.) If anything can be taken as admitted, I should think it might be taken that the statute of Elizabeth is in full force.

(Mr. Stephens.) Oh, certainly it is in full force.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I should have thought that was quite clear.

(Mr. Stephens.) No doubt it is.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Mr. James agrees with you.

(Mr. James.) I merely say, if there is one piece of common ground between us, it is that the statute of Elizabeth is in full force.

(Mr. Stephens.) Then upon that we are agreed, for the first time since I commenced.

I will now read the 27th section of Elizabeth's Act of Uniformity: "All laws, statutes, and ordinances wherein or whereby any other service, administration of sacraments, or Common Prayer is limited, established, or set forth to be used within this realm, or any other the Queen's dominions or countries, shall from henceforth be utterly void and of none effect."

My learned friend has admitted that this repealing clause has not been in any degree modified by "the Act of Uniformity" of Charles II., that is common ground; or by any other statute; that is agreed.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I did not understand Mr. James to say that.

(Mr. James.) No, I did not.

(Mr. Stephens.) Then what did you say?

(The Dean of the Arches.) You had better proceed with your argument.

(Mr. Stephens.) This statute is in full force. In Walgrave's case in Dyer, to which I referred yesterday (page 203 A), it said of this statute of Elizabeth, that the meaning of the Parliament "appears [to be] that the superstitious service in the church"——

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think you read it yesterday.

(Mr. Stephens.) I did; but it is equally applicable here, "should be abolished, and the new service planted in lieu thereof."

It is quite clear that at this period of our history all laws, statutes, and ordinances, except the Prayer Book mentioned in the statute of Elizabeth, and the reference to the First Prayer Book of Edward VI., respecting the ornaments of the minister and of the church were repealed. Therefore, whatever authority the canon law may have had down to this time, this statute would operate to repeal and deprive of all authority such part of it as related to the performance of divine service.

The contemporanea expositio, receives illustration from a very curious document entitled, "An admonition to all such as shall intend hereafter to enter the state of matrimony, godly and agreeable to laws." Dr. Cardwell in a note states, (1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 316.) "This table appears to have been set forth in the first instance in the year 1560, but was now (1563) published by authority and has ever since declared the law as to prohibited degrees." This table is quoted in the advertisements of the year 1564, and in the 99th canon of the canons of 1603, and it has likewise been printed in Sparrow's articles. At section X. it says, "It is further ordained that no parson, vicar, or curate do preach, treat, or expound of his own voluntary invention, any matter of controversy in the Scriptures, if he be under the degree of a master of arts, except he be licensed by his ordinary thereunto;

"but only for instruction of the people read the homilies already set forth, and such other form of doctrine, as shall be hereafter by authority published, and shall not innovate or alter anything in the church, or use any old rite or ceremony which is not set forth by public authority."

I will now proceed to 1564, and quote very shortly from the correspondence of Archbishop Parker (pages 224, 225, and 226 Parker's Society's Edition.) The Queen, complains, that there has crept into the church open and manifest disorder by diversities of opinion, and especially in rites and ceremonies, and that she has "determined to have all such diversities, varieties, and novelties amongst them of the clergy and our people, as breed nothing but contention" . . . "reformed and repressed and brought to one manner of uniformity;" . . . "And as the several cases shall appear to require reformation so to proceed by order, injunction, or censure, according to the order and appointment of such laws and ordinances as are provided by Act of Parliament, and the true meaning thereof, so as uniformity of order may be kept in every church, and without variety and contention."

(The Dean of the Arches.) You cite these authorities to show that one uniform order was to be kept?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, in order to prove the contemporanea expositio. In 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, (page 355,) there are Archbishop Parker's Visitation Articles, in 1569, the 12th year of Elizabeth. At page 355 it is asked, "Whether Divine service be said or sung by your minister or ministers in your several churches duly and reverently, as it is set forth by the laws of this Realm without any kind of variation." . . . "Whether your priests, curates, or ministers do use in the time of the celebration of divine service to wear a surplice, prescribed by the Queen's Majesty's injunctions and the Book of Common Prayer. And whether they do celebrate the same divine service in the chancel or in the church, and do use all rites and orders prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, &c., and none other." (Page 356.)

In Grindal's Injunctions ("The Remains of Archbishop Grindal," Parker, Society's edition, p. 123,) there is the following article: "Upon every Sunday and holiday ye shall in your church or chapel, at convenient hours, reverently and distinctly say or sing the Common Prayer, appointed by the laws of this realm, both in the forenoon and afternoon, standing in a pulpit or seat appointed for that purpose, and so turning your face towards the people, as they may best hear the same." "And upon every Wednesday and Friday in the forenoon (not being holy-day) ye shall in like manner say the Litany and other prayers appointed for the day, and likewise the Evening Prayer every Saturday and holy-even, and shall also at all times requisite and convenient, duly and reverently minister the two holy Sacraments, that is to say, Baptism and the Lord's Supper, commonly called the Holy Communion, according to such order as is set forth in the Book of Common Prayer and administration of the Sacraments." In the 4th article "Ye shall not deliver the communion bread unto the people into their mouths but into their hands; nor shall use at the ministration of the Communion any gestures, rites or ceremonies not appointed by the Book of Common Prayer, as crossing or breathing over the sacramental bread and wine, nor any shewing or lifting up of the same to the people, to be by them worshipped and adored, nor any such like."

I now come to the reign of James I. and propose to quote from the 14th Canon of the canons of 1603. "The Common Prayer shall be said or sung distinctly and reverently upon such days as are appointed to be kept holy by the Book of Common Prayer, and their eyes, and at convenient and usual times of those days, and in such place of every church as the bishop of the diocese or ecclesiastical ordinary of "the place shall think meet for the lagreness or straitness of the same, so as the people may be most edified. All ministers likewise shall observe the orders, rites, and ceremonies prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, as well in reading the Holy Scriptures and saying of prayers as in administration of the sacraments without either diminishing in regard of preaching or in any other respect, or adding anything in the matter or form thereof." It will be observed that rites and ceremonies are here spoken of as things to be done in the saying the Public Prayers and in the Administration of the Sacrament.

To the same effect are Archbishop Bancroft's Articles in 1605, which will be found in 2 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, p. 104, that the clergy are to follow the Book of Common Prayer. The like in Archbishop Abbott's Visitation Articles in 1616, (2 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, p. 171,) the minister is there enjoined to follow the Book of Common Prayer without any omission or addition.

In 1619 we have the like Injunctions in Andrewes' Minor Works, (page 130) and the churchwardens are directed to inquire: "Whether doth your minister observe the orders, rites, and ceremonies prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, in reading public prayers and the Litany, in administering the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, in solemnizing matrimony, in visiting the sick, burying the dead, churching of women, in such manner and form as in the said book is enjoined, without omission or addition."

(The Dean of the Arches.) You cite Andrewes as an authority?

(Mr. Stephens.) I do. And I cite likewise the Visitation Articles of Laud (5 Laud's Works, page 423) in the year 1635: "And doth he duly observe the orders, rites, and ceremonies prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, without omission or addition?"

I now propose to quote from the Constitutions and Canons of the Church, of 1640, merely for the purpose of showing what were the opinions of Archbishop Laud and the two convocations respecting the objects of the Reformation.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Ratified by the crown?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. I am reading from 5 Laud's Works, page 625: "At the time of the reforming of this church from that gross superstition of Popery, it was carefully provided that all means should be used to root out of the minds of the people both the inclination thereunto, and memory thereof; especially of the idolatry committed in the mass, for which cause all Popish altars were demolished."

Adjourned for a short time.

I will now proceed to direct your Lordship's attention to the Act of Uniformity of Charles II. The second section is substantially the same phraseology as the two preceding Acts of Uniformity namely "To the intent that every person within this realm may certainly know the rule to which he is to conform in public worship and administration of the Sacraments and other rites and ceremonies of the Church of England." It is the language of the two preceding statutes, and therefore all the observations I have made in reference to the two preceding statutes and all that I have cited from the injunctions and visitation articles apply to these words.

The 24th section enacts "That the several good laws and statutes of this realm, which have been formerly made and are now in force for the uniformity of prayer and administration of the Sacraments within this realm of England, and places aforesaid, shall stand in full force and strength, to all intents and purposes whatsoever for the establishing and confirming of the said book," that is the Prayer Book now in use; which brings in the 27th section of the Act of Uniformity of Elizabeth, which my learned friend, Mr. James, (I am very sorry he is not here,) admitted was common ground between us.

(Mr. Prideaux.) What Mr. James admitted was that the statute was in force.

(Mr. Stephens.) Then if the statute is in force the 27th section is in force.

The concluding words of this section are, "And shall be applied, practised, and put in use for the punishing of all offences contrary to the said laws, with relation to the book aforesaid, and no other." The effect of this section is to apply to the last Act of Uniformity the provisions of 1 Elizabeth c. 2. sections 4 & 9, prohibiting the use of any other rite or ceremony, and also prohibiting any person from procuring any minister to use any rites other than those prescribed in our present Prayer Book.

The alterations made in 1662, are thus referred to in the preface to our present Prayer Book. "And as to the several variations from the former book, whether by alteration, addition, or otherwise, it shall suffice to give this general account: that most of the alterations were made, either first for the better direction of them that are to officiate in any part of divine service, which is chiefly done in the calendars and rubrics; or, secondly, for the more proper expressing of some words or phrases of ancient usage in terms more suitable to the language of the present times, and the clearer explanation of some other words and phrases, that were either of doubtful signification, or otherwise liable to misconstruction; or, thirdly, for a more perfect rendering of such portions of Holy Scriptures, as are inserted into the Liturgy; which, in the Epistles and Gospels especially, and in sundry other places, are now ordered to be read according to the last translation; and that it was thought convenient that some Prayers and Thanksgivings, fitted to special occasions, should be added in their due places; particularly for those at sea, together with an office for the Baptism of such as are of riper years; which, although not so necessary when the former book was compiled, yet by the growth of Anabaptism, through the licentiousness of the late times, crept in among us, is now become necessary, and may be always useful for the baptizing of natives in our plantations, and others converted to the faith. If any man, who shall desire a more particular account of the several alterations in any part of the Liturgy shall take the pains to compare the present book with the former, we doubt not but the reason of the change may easily appear." The alterations and additions are to be found in my edition of the Book of Common Prayer, page 169 of the introduction, and to which I have directed the attention of the Court.

In 1662 the statute of 3 & 4 Edward VI. c. 10 was in force, having been revived by the statute 1 James I. c. 25, s. 48. Is it reasonable to suppose that the Legislature intended to restore "the ornaments of the church, and the ministers thereof," and at the same time to destroy all the books containing the information how such ornaments were to be used, and respecting the use of which, there are no directions in the Statute of Uniformity? The mere fact of an ornament having existed, or the mere fact of an ornament being mentioned in the first book of Edward VI., does not warrant the ceremony, because that would be arguing from the accident to the substance, instead of from the substance to the accident. I care not what ornaments may be in the first book of Edward VI.: because unless there is an authority to use those ornaments, they are perfectly useless.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Let me understand you. "I care not what ornaments are mentioned in the first book of Edward VI." Is that so?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. The mention of ornaments cannot justify ceremonies for using such ornaments.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is another proposition. Which am I to take down? You say, "I care not what ornaments are mentioned in the first book of Edward VI., unless"—something existed?

(Mr. Stephens.) Unless there be an express direction to use ceremonies for the use of such ornaments.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Let me take down those words: "I care not what ornaments are mentioned in the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., unless there be express directions to use ceremonies for the use of such ornaments." Have I got that down correctly?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. There is one point, my Lord, upon which I wish to be clear. You will bear in mind that in my opening I did not put this case before the Court as one of ornaments, but as one of rites and ceremonies. I am dealing with rites and ceremonies, and I am not dealing with ornaments. I wish that that distinction should be borne in mind through the whole course of my argument.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you extend that to all the subjects of the Articles here?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, they apply only to rites and ceremonies.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Including candlesticks?

(Mr. Stephens.) I am not here to contend whether candlesticks are legal ornaments or not. I will for the purposes of this argument, and only for the purposes of this argument, admit that candlesticks may be legal ornaments, and that candles may be put into those candlesticks.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is a little variation from what you said yesterday, is it not?

(Mr. Stephens.) But the very moment the candles are lighted they cease to be ornaments and become ceremonies.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is your proposition?

(Mr. Stephens.) That is my proposition.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It a little varies from yesterday, because I think you contended that candlesticks were illegal.

(Mr. Stephens.) Probably so, but I have no recollection of it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have taken it down so.

(Mr. Stephens.) It is very probable your Lordship is right and that I am wrong. What I want to urge is that the Court could not compel churchwardens—

(The Dean of the Arches.) My note was this, "Lights were abolished by this book of Edward VI. and candlesticks."

(Mr. Stephens.) What I intended to say was this that candlesticks are not mentioned throughout the first book of Edward VI.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I will take down your present proposition, whatever it is. Are you now about to contend that candlesticks are legal or illegal?

(Mr. Stephens.) I do not care whether they are legal or illegal. The point I now put with reference to candlesticks is, that churchwardens cannot be compelled to supply candlesticks. It is an abstract proposition. If they supplied gas that would dispense with candlesticks.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I thought you made it a reversible argument, and said whatever the churchwardens could not be compelled to supply was not a legal ornament.

(Mr. Stephens.) The point now in issue is not a question of ornaments.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That I quite understand.

(Mr. Stephens.) It is a question of ceremony.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You will set me right if I am wrong, but I thought you contended yesterday for a proposition to this effect, whatever the churchwardens are not compellable to place in the church cannot be a legal ornament.

(Mr. Stephens.) That is what I said.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And you made the test of the lawfulness of the ornament the power of compelling the churchwardens to put it there.

(Mr. Stephens.) Exactly so.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is what I understood. I only want to understand you.

(Mr. Stephens.) Exactly; because I affirm that a clergyman has no right to put a single ornament upon the holy table. It is the duty of the churchwardens to do so, and if the churchwardens do not provide the proper ornaments for the use of the service they would be punishable in an ecclesiastical court. What the clergyman has a right to, is the use of the proper ornaments of the Church for carrying out the provisions of the Act of Uniformity.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think I have got your argument, according to your own statement.

(Mr. Stephens.) I hope it is clear that the questions raised in this case are not questions of ornaments, but of ceremonies.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have got that down.

(Mr. Stephens.) That will be quite sufficient.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Perhaps it is premature. You will by-and-by discuss each of the individual subjects by itself.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Perhaps then it is premature to put anything down about candles.

(Mr. Stephens.) After I have gone through the Acts of Uniformity I intend to discuss each of the subjects per se, and I think that I shall be able to establish, that the rites and ceremonies in question are nothing more than so many remnants of Popery.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then will be the proper time to take down the argument. I have taken down this, "This is a case of rites and ceremonies, and "we are not dealing with ornaments," and I have also taken down this, "I care not what ornaments are mentioned in the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. "unless there be express directions to use ceremonies, for the use of such ornaments,"

(Mr. Stephens.) Precisely. I am desirous to refer your Lordship to 4 Cosin's Works, p. 510 (1662). The reason I do so, is to show the construction that was placed upon the last Act of Uniformity, immediately after it was passed, by a prelate entitled to the highest authority and respect. In Cosin's Visitation Articles in 1662, it is enquired of the churchwardens, "Doth [the clergyman] use any other words "or form than what is prescribed in the Book of "Common Prayer in the public reading of the daily "Morning and Evening Service, and in the Litany, "which is to be added to the Morning Service upon "Sundays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, weekly, and at "all other times when it is appointed by the bishop: "as likewise at the reading of the Communion Service "and the administration of the two sacraments " (Baptism and the Lord's Supper); at the celebration of matrimony, churching of women after "child-birth, burying the dead, and pronouncing "God's commination against impenitent sinners? "And doth he all these without omission, addition, "or alteration of any of them, using all the rites and "ceremonies appointed in that book?"

I will now, without referring to a number of other authorities, proceed to 1670. That was in the 22nd of Charles the Second. I am going to read an extract from Archbishop Sheldon's "Letter concerning the "King's directions to the Clergy." Your Lordship will find the passage I am about to read at page 328 of 2 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, beginning at the second line from the bottom: "And, next, that you "require of them, as they will answer the contrary, "that in their own persons in their churches, they "do decently and solemnly perform the divine service by reading the prayers of the Church as they "are appointed and ordered in and by the Book of "Common Prayer, without addition to or diminishing "from the same, or varying either in substance or "ceremony from the order and method which by the "said book is set down, wherein I hear and am "afraid too many do offend, and that in the time of "such their officiating they ever make use of and "wear their priestly habit, the surplice and hood, "that so by their due and reverent performance of "so holy a worship they may give honour and "worship to God, and by their own example instruct

"the people of their parishes what they ought to "teach them in their doctrine."

I will not fatigue your Lordship by any more authorities in reference to the Injunctions and Visitation Articles, because I think those that have been cited have clearly established that no clergyman of the Church in England has a right to add any rite or ceremony to the Book of Common Prayer, except it has been expressly allowed or enjoined by the Acts of Uniformity.

The bishops had a power to sit with the Judges of Assize for the purpose of determining offences against the Acts of Uniformity and punishing unfaithful clergy. When I use the term "unfaithful" clergy, I mean those clergy who disregarded both the language and spirit of the Acts of Uniformity with reference to the rites and ceremonies therein prescribed, and illegally added other rites and ceremonies. Such men were unfaithful clergy, and were unworthy to hold their benefices.

I will now direct your Lordship's attention to Newberry and Goodwin (1 Phillimore, p. 282); this was a proceeding against a clergyman for not complying with the Acts of Uniformity.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I may as well say at once that it was for making additions and alterations.

(Mr. Stephens.) The very same thing that you are doing. That is your very offence.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I mean omissions and alterations.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You (Mr. Prideaux) need not interrupt Mr. Stephens, I shall look at every case cited with the greatest possible attention.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I merely wish to make a correction, I should have said "omissions and alterations."

(Mr. Stephens.) The Judgment of Sir John Nicholl will speak for itself. "The law directs that a clergyman is not to diminish in any respect or to add to "the prescribed form of worship." [That is our very complaint.] "Uniformity in this respect is "one of the leading and distinguishing principles of "the Church of England. Nothing is left to the discretion and fancy of the individual. If every minister "were to omit, alter or add, according to his own "taste, this uniformity would soon be destroyed, and "though the alteration might begin with little things, "yet it would extend itself to more important things "in the public worship of the Established Church, and "even in the Scriptures themselves the most important passages might be materially altered under the "notion of giving a more correct version, or omitted "altogether as an unauthorized interpolation."

I will likewise read a passage from Westerton and Liddell (Moore's Report, p. 187), confirmatory of the judgment of Sir John Nicholl. "Their Lordships "entirely agree with the opinions expressed by the "learned judges in Faulkner and Lichfield, that in "the performance of the services, rites, and ceremonies ordered by the Prayer Book, the directions "contained in it must be strictly observed, and that "no omission, and no addition, can be permitted."

(The Dean of the Arches.) They go on to say, which may be material or not to read for your argument, "But they are not prepared to hold that the "use of all articles not expressly mentioned in the "rubric although quite consistent with and subsidiary "to the service is quite forbidden."

(Mr. Stephens.) I shall deal with it in a subsequent part of the case. The language applies to articles that are of intrinsic utility. Take the case of the credence table. Why was the legality of the credence table sanctioned? Because it was subsidiary to the performance of the Church Service: that was the principle. I am sure I need not press upon your Lordship (I mention it with the deepest respect for your Lordship) that whatever has been the judgment of the Judicial Committee is binding upon this Court.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Certainly it is binding upon me.

(Mr. Stephens.) I believe your Lordship has judicial cognisance of the fact, that my learned friends went to the Court of Queen's Bench upon a voyage of discovery to ascertain what was the meaning of the Articles,—and what they attempted to establish in the Court of Queen's Bench was this: that the promoter had not stated an ecclesiastical offence on the face of the Articles.

(Mr. Prideaux.) And on the citation and letters of request.

(Mr. Stephens.) That was treated as so much moonshine.

(Mr. Prideaux.) If you state what we did, I have no objection, taking care that you do so correctly.

(Mr. Stephens.) The citation was referred to in the judgment.

(Mr. Prideaux.) You cannot go out of it.

(Mr. Stephens.) It was treated as moonshine. My learned friend feels, of course, very sensitive on this point. I make every allowance for him. My learned friends went to the Court of Queen's Bench for the purpose of restraining this Court from proceeding with this case. I will read to your Lordship what the Lord Chief Justice said. But what a position my learned friends would have been in, supposing that the Queen's Bench had held that the Ecclesiastical Court had no jurisdiction. In that case I should have felt it my bounden and painful duty to have advised my client to indict Mr. Mackonochie at the Old Bailey for a misdemeanor.

They applied for a prohibition, on the ground that there was not any ecclesiastical offence stated in the Articles. But what does the Lord Chief Justice say in reference to the construction of the Acts of Uniformity? I will read from the short-hand writer's notes the Judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, to which tribunal my learned friends applied as having a superior jurisdiction to this Court, in order to correct its inaccuracies, as if your Lordship did not know what was an ecclesiastical offence. Lord Chief Justice Cockburn said, "The question is, whether when an Act of Parliament says that in the administration of the sacrament or in the performance of any other rite of the Church, the minister shall conform strictly to the directions of the Prayer Book, if he does something not contained in those directions, anybody can say that that is not a matter for spiritual cognisance, and whether that is not such a departure as to constitute an offence. You may introduce anything into the administration of the rites of the Church, and then say, because it is something more than is enjoined, and is not in terms prohibited, therefore it is not an offence. I take it that what the Act of Parliament mean was, that persons should not follow their own imaginations or judgments and wills in these matters, but should conform to the directions which are given in the Book of Common Prayer." This was the Judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, within the last few days, and is in strict conformity with the Judgment of Sir John Nicholl in this Court. I should be guilty of a very unjustifiable intrusion upon your Lordship's time if I were to make a single comment upon the effect of these Judgments, because if correct, this case is practically and substantially undefended. That I assert without any fear of legitimate contradiction.

I will now proceed to the consideration of the rubric immediately preceding the order of Morning Prayer; and I beg to direct your Lordship's attention to its language. "And here is to be noted, that such ornaments of the church, and of the ministers thereof, at all times of their ministrations, shall be retained, and be in use, as were in this Church of England, by the authority of Parliament, in the second year of the reign of King Edward the Sixth."

I submit that the true sense of the rubric under consideration, is to define the ornaments to be used in lawful ceremonies,—not per se to make a ceremony lawful in opposition to clauses of the Act of which it forms a part. The whole must be read together. The Rubric under consideration is exclusive so far as regards rites and ceremonies.

I directed your Lordship's attention yesterday to the Liturgies of Edward VI. In the preface to the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. it is stated (page 19): "Furthermore by this order, the curates shall need none other books for their public service but this book and the Bible." Therefore the Legislature declared that the only two books which could be used in our churches, or from which the clergy could take any directions or orders, were the Book of Common Prayer and the Bible.

To secure that "the order and form" of prayer should not be left to the caprice of any person, but should be absolute upon the clergy, the preface in question after reciting, (and the like language is used in our present Prayer Book,) "that heretofore there hath been great diversity in saying and singing in churches within this realm, some following Salisbury use, some Hereford use, and some the use of Bangor, some of York, some of Lincoln," enjoins "that now from henceforth all the whole realm shall have but one use." And perhaps your Lordship would be so kind as to make a note that I have referred you to the 2nd and 3rd Edward VI., c. 1, s. 1, which I brought in detail under your consideration yesterday, and which provides, that no other "rite, ceremony, order, form, or manner of performing divine service shall be used except as is prescribed in the Prayer Book."

I have already directed your Lordship's attention to 1 Elizabeth, c. 2, s. 27, where it is provided that all laws, statutes, and ordinances whereby any other service is set forth to be used are abolished, and that repealing clause has not been in any degree modified by the 13 and 14 Charles II., c. 4, and is now in force.

How could the letter and the spirit of these enactments be carried out, if altar-lights were to be lighted at particular times; if incense was also to be used at specified times; if water was to be mixed with the Sacramental wine at the Holy Communion; and other ceremonies of a like character were to be used; of which there is no trace in the Acts of Uniformity? If it was illegal for a clergyman to have in his possession, or to use any of the old Service Books, I should like to know from what source it is, that the clergy of this country are to receive directions for the use of lighted candles, of incense, or of mixing water with the Sacramental wine. They are ceremonies of which no trace is to be found in the Acts of Uniformity, and their only authority is, and I put it in the most charitable way, the imagination of several, perhaps conscientious, clergymen.

Your Lordship will perhaps take a note that I have referred you (at this stage of the argument), in order to save the time of the Court, to the 3rd and 4th of Edward VI. c. 10, s. 1., and likewise to the statute of 3 James I. c. 5, s. 25.

The case stands thus: certain ancient ceremonies and ornaments were used in the performance of divine service anterior to the Acts of Uniformity. The elaborate directions as to these ceremonies and ornaments in the previous Service Books were altogether omitted in the Books of Common Prayer that were issued in the reigns of Edward VI., of Elizabeth, and of Charles II., and the preface on ceremonies explained why some ceremonies were abolished, and some were retained. Every rite and ceremony was abolished except those rites and ceremonies that are expressly retained in the Acts of Uniformity. How then can it be for one moment contended that any of the ancient ceremonies and ornaments can now be used so long as it is conceded that the laws of this country are to be exclusively derived from Parliament?

The absence of the rubric on ornaments from the Irish Prayer Book of Charles II. shows its subordinate importance.

If the rubric under consideration was of great importance, is it not surprising that no allusion is made to it in the manuscript Book of Common Prayer that is now in Dublin?

(The Dean of the Arches.) We had a good deal of evidence before us upon that in the Ritual Commission, which seemed to explain how that had taken place.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am only speaking of facts. Perhaps your Lordship is not aware that I have published a manuscript copy of the Irish Book of Common Prayer.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes. There is no doubt it was omitted, but whether it was an accident or not is a very different question. The fact of the omission is unquestionable I believe.

(Mr. Stephens.) And that is the very point upon which I wish to make one or two observations. Your Lordship says "by accident."

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not know. I am sure how it was. Do not misunderstand me. What I say is, there is no doubt as to its omission, from whatever cause it arose, and if you think the fact of its omission can in any way avail you in your present argument you are quite entitled to use it.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am much indebted to your Lordship; and I will only make one observation more. This rubric is now put forward as being one of essential importance, and we find that in the manuscript Book of Common Prayer for Ireland it is omitted.

Now, let us consider, in the first place, how it was that in 1662 any Act of the Legislature passed for Ireland. Perhaps your Lordship has no judicial knowledge of the fact, but in Ireland religious feelings are sometimes rather warm, and of course the Book of Common Prayer would naturally excite a considerable amount of attention. What was the course pursued with reference to the Irish Book of Common Prayer? First it passed the House of Commons and the House of Lords in Ireland, and after that it passed the House of Commons and the House of Lords in England, and yet, my Lord, it passed sub silentio.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Your argument is that this rubric is not binding in Ireland at all now?

(Mr. Stephens.) No, I did not say that. I did not put forward that proposition. I am not bound to do it for the purpose of this case.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are certainly not bound to do anything you do not like.

(Mr. Stephens.) The proposition I started with was this—if this rubric possessed the great importance which recent discoverers or experts imagine, is it likely that it would have been omitted, unless by design, from the Irish Book of Common Prayer which had to go through the Irish House of Commons and the Irish House of Lords, and afterwards through the English House of Commons and the English House of Lords, and subsequently required the assent of the Sovereign before it had any binding operation?

(The Dean of the Arches.) You give no opinion as to whether it is binding in Ireland or not?

(Mr. Stephens.) No.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not know that it is necessary that you should do so.

(Mr. Stephens.) I respectfully submit to your Lordship that it is not.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are aware that it was very gravely doubted whether this rubric was in the English Manuscript Book, but since the Ritual Commission was appointed a search was made and we found it in the custody of the Record Keeper of the House of Lords.

(Mr. Stephens.) A very valuable discovery.

Respecting the words "by authority of Parliament," a great deal has been said and written upon them. It is only the old way of citing a statute. The words mean simply a quotation of the 2nd and 3rd Edward VI. cap. 1. That is all that was meant. The rest is all imagination.

I will refer your Lordship very shortly to the statutes supporting that proposition. The 3rd of Charles I. c. 1, s. 7, recites, "And whereas also by authority of Parliament in the five and twentieth "year of the reign of King Edward III." The 5th and 6th Edward VI. c. 1, s. 5, quotes the Act of 2 & 3 Edward VI. as made in the second year: and the repealing statute of 1 Mary, session 2, c. 2. cites it, in like manner.

The 1 Elizabeth, c. 2, s. 25, says, "As was in this Church of England by authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of King Edward the Sixth," and the preamble says, "Authorised by Act of Parliament holden in the fifth and sixth years of our said late Sovereign Lord King Edward the Sixth."

I hope we shall hear no more about this "authority of Parliament." The foregoing authorities were not referred to in the case of Westerton and Liddell. But I venture to refer to them, because if Westerton and Liddell required any support, it would be aided by the statutable construction which has been placed upon those words.

In Moore's Report, (page 32,) Dr. Lushington says, "The next question is, am I justified in prosecuting this enquiry by endeavouring to ascertain what was the law as to ornaments prior to the second year of Edward VI.? It is a very grave question whether the words, 'by authority of Parliament in the second year of King Edward VI.,' do not confine the enquiry to what was done in that year, and in that year only, or, in other words, to what is prescribed by the First Prayer Book. The inclination of my opinion is, that the enquiry is so circumscribed, and for this reason; the direction is not confined to the ornaments of the church but applies to the ornaments 'of the church' and the ministers thereof at all times of their ministration. I apprehend it to be clear, that as orders are to be found in the first book regulating the ornaments of the ministers, reference, so far as relates to the ornaments of ministers, must be looked for in the first book alone, for it would be productive of the greatest confusion, and contrary to all sound rules of construction when you have precise directions in the book specially referred to, to go back to former times where you might find ornaments utterly inconsistent with those specially prescribed. Then, if this be so, as to the ornaments of the minister, should not the same construction be applied to the ornaments of the church, which are comprised in the very same sentence and governed by the very same words?"

"But suppose that I am in error here, and that I ought to embark on a voyage of discovery to ascertain what was in use by the authority of Parliament before the second year of Edward VI., where am I to stop, and what light have I to guide me? I have not heard it asserted that there is any Act of Parliament prior to the second of Edward VI. which specifically regulated, or attempted to regulate, or indeed refers at all to ornaments in churches. If there be no Act of Parliament applicable to the case, can I go further still and enquire whether anything was done by virtue of an Act of Parliament applicable to this case, though not done directly by the Act of Parliament itself?"

Therefore, so far as Dr. Lushington is concerned, he says, I take the first book of Edward VI., and beyond that I will not travel, for the very moment I do so, I shall get into inextricable confusion. That opinion is supported by the Judicial Committee. In Westerton and Liddell (Moore, page 160), their Lordships say: "It was urged at the bar that the present rubric, which refers to the second year of Edward VI., cannot mean ornaments mentioned in the first Prayer Book, because, as it is said, that Act was probably not passed, and the Prayer Book was certainly not in use till after the expiration of the second year of Edward VI., and that, therefore, the words 'by authority of Parliament' must mean by virtue of canons or royal injunctions, having the authority of Parliament, made at an earlier period. There seems no reason to doubt that the Act in question received the royal assent in the “ second year of Edward VI. It concerned a matter of great urgency which had been long under consideration, and was the first Act of the Session ; it passed through one house of Parliament on January the 15th, 1549, N.S., and the other on the 21st of the same month ; and the second year of the reign of Edward the 6th did not expire till January the 28th. In the Act of the 5th and 6th Edward VI. cap. 1. sec. 5. it is expressly referred to as ‘ the Act made in the second year of the King’s Majesty’s reign.’ Upon this point, therefore, no difficulty can arise. It is very true that the new Prayer Book could not come into use until after the expiration of that year, because time must be allowed for printing and distributing the books ; but its use, and the injunctions contained in it were established by authority of Parliament in the second year of Edward VI., and this is the plain meaning of the rubric.”

The services and ornaments in use previously to the establishment of Edward VI.’s first book are nowhere spoken of as being “ by authority of Parliament.” If they are not spoken of as being “ by authority of Parliament,” those statutes to which I have directed the attention of the Court have swept away all customs, canons, and old service books.

The statute 1 Mary, Session 2, c. 2, by which Mary abolished the Reformation services, enacted that “ all such divine service and administration of sacraments as were most commonly used in England in the last year of Henry the 8th shall be used through the realm.” The Act of 1st Mary, sess. 2, c. 3. s. 3. speaks of the “ Mass or other such divine service, sacraments, or sacramentals, as were most commonly frequented and used in the last year of the reign of the late sovereign lord King Henry the 8th, or that at any time hereafter shall be allowed, set forth, or authorized by the Queen’s Majesty.”

It will be perceived from these references to the statutes of Mary that it is not attempted to be said that they were “ by authority of Parliament.” This statute likewise places upon a like basis the service most commonly used under Henry VIII., and that which should be set forth by Queen Mary.

In 5 Foxe’s Actes and Monuments, p. 170, the 15th article directs “ That no parson shall from henceforth alter or change the order and manner of any fasting-day that is commanded and indited by the Church, or of divine prayer, or of service otherwise than is specified in the said injunctions [in the former injunctions of 1536] until such time as the same shall be so ordered and transposed by the King’s Highness’ authority.” In this passage, it is assumed that the service then in use could be altered by the King’s authority alone, which proves that they were not in use by any Parliamentary authority. The like appears from a proclamation of King Edward’s council, which will be found in 1 Cardwell’s Documentary Annals, p. 43, “ That no manner of person, of what estate, order, or degree soever he be, of his private mind, will, or fantasy do omit, leave done, change, alter, or innovate any order, rite, or ceremony commonly used and frequented in the Church of England, and not commanded to be left done at any time in the reign of our late sovereign lord, His Highness’ father, other than such as His Highness, by the advice aforesaid, by His Majesty’s visitors injunctions, statutes, or proclamations, hath already, or hereafter shall command to be omitted, left, innovated, or changed.” Not the slightest allusion is here made to statutory authority.

Two meanings have been ascribed to this rubric. It has been contended it means that (1) all the ornaments authorized by the First book of Edward the Sixth shall be now used in the United Church. I respectfully contend, that such only of the ornaments authorized by Edward’s First book shall be used, as are requisite for carrying out the service of the Church, as prescribed by the Prayer Book now in use.

In Moore’s Report, p. 166, it is stated, “ Their Lordships, after much consideration, are satisfied “ that the construction of this rubric which they suggested at the hearing of the case, is its true meaning, and that the word ‘ ornaments’ applies, and in this rubric is confined to those articles the use of which in the services and ministrations of the Church is prescribed by the Prayer Book of Edward VI.

“ The term ‘ ornaments’ in ecclesiastical law is not confined as by modern usage, to articles of decoration or embellishment, but it is used in the larger sense of the word ‘ ornamentum,’ which according to the interpretation of Forcellini’s Dictionary is used ‘ pro quocumque apparatu seu instrumento.’ All the several articles used in the performance of the services and rites of the Church are ‘ ornaments.’ Vestments, books, cloths, chalices, and patens are amongst church ornaments ; a long list of them will be found extracted from Lyndwood in Dr. Phillimore’s edition of Burn’s Ecclesiastical Law, vol. 1, pp. 375-7. In modern times organs and bells are held to fall under this denomination.”

“ When reference is had to the first Prayer Book of Edward the Sixth with this explanation of the term ‘ ornaments,’ no difficulty will be found in discovering amongst the articles of which the use is there enjoined ornaments of the Church as well as ornaments of the ministers. Besides the vestments differing in the different services the rubric provides for the use of an English Bible, the new Prayer Book, a poor man’s box, a chalice, a corporas, a paten, a bell, and some other things.”

There are, or may be, several ornaments mentioned or necessarily implied in the first Prayer Book which cannot be used for any of the ceremonies prescribed in our present Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That proposition amounts to this, that there may be ornaments prescribed in the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. which are not now lawful.

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly. But, my Lord, this rubric, I also submit, cannot mean that the minister is, for the purpose of using any such ornaments, to introduce additional ceremonies beyond those prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer. Such a construction would be inconsistent with, and repugnant to the Acts of Uniformity and to the canons by which the interpretation of statutes is governed.

In reply to your Lordship’s question that you so kindly put to me as to the ornaments, I beg to refer your Lordship to the first book of Edward VI., p. 112, Parker Society’s edition.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Perhaps, before you leave this argument, at any time that is most convenient to you, you will consider, if it accords with your line of argument, what would have been the consequence, if this rubric had not been there, if this rubric, “ And, here, it is to be noted,” and so forth, had been omitted in the English Prayer Book as it is in the Irish Prayer Book.

(Mr. Stephens.) Your Lordship is now putting the question to me that you did this morning, only in another form.

(The Dean of the Arches.) If in the course of your argument, you find it convenient to deal with it, it would be of some assistance to the Court.

(Mr. Stephens.) Perhaps your Lordship would put the question quite irrespective of the Irish Prayer Book ?

(The Dean of the Arches.) Oh, yes. We have nothing to do with the Irish Prayer Book here, but you mentioned that it was omitted in the Irish Prayer Book. If it is convenient for you to take that course of argument I should be glad to hear what would be the state of the Church of England with regard to ornaments supposing that rubric were not there.

(Mr. Stephens.) I will consider it with great care. I shall not conclude to-day, and I will afford your Lordship every possible assistance.

(The Dean of the Arches.) If it is convenient to you I mean.

(Mr. Stephens.) Whether convenient or not I will endeavour to do so. Any suggestion from your Lordship will be met by me with the deepest respect. I now refer to the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., p. 112. "Then the priest shall anoint the infant upon the head," consequently he must have used some vessel for the oil. At page 139, "If the sick person desire to be anointed, then shall the priest anoint him upon the forehead or breast only, making the sign of the cross, saying thus—'As with this visible oil thy body outwardly is anointed.'" To perform this rite or ceremony a chrismatory containing the oil would be requisite. Is it to be said that the ornaments are to be kept when the service is gone?

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is the ornament of the chrismatory mentioned?

(Mr. Stephens.) It would follow as a matter of course.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But as a matter of fact it is not mentioned?

(Mr. Stephens.) No, it is not. There would be no occasion to mention it. If the Legislature directs anything to be done, it does not require that there should be an express provision specifying certain vessels necessary for carrying out such directions. We find that the service is gone, but the service could not be performed without the ornament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is no question about performing that service now it is gone.

(Mr. Stephens.) While the service existed, there must have been an ornament for the purpose of performing the service,—but inasmuch as the service is gone, the ornament is likewise gone.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You would say that whether mentioned or not it is prescribed by implication in the first Prayer Book?

(Mr. Stephens.) Undoubtedly, as subsidiary to the service on the same principle as that of the credence table in Westerton and Liddell.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It seems to me that their Lordships appear to have used two different expressions. In page 156 of Moore's Report they say this rubric is "confined to those articles the use of which in the Services and Ministrations of the Church is prescribed." There it would seem, if you take that alone, as if the article itself must be specified. Then if you look at page 159 there is a little variation in the language. "The rubric to the present Prayer Book adopts the language of the statute of Elizabeth, but they obviously mean the same thing, that the same dresses, and the same utensils or articles which were used under the first Prayer Book of Edward may still be used." There is a slight difference. In the one case, it says they are prescribed. In the other case it is put as if it were a question of de facto use.

(Mr. Stephens.) Your Lordship may remember I argued that case before the Privy Council upon the statute of Edward VI., and the first Prayer Book, and I think, with all due deference, that language at pages 156, 159, may be reconciled with what their Lordships stated at page 157, because they there defined what they thought requisite to carry out the principles of the Book of Common Prayer—an English Bible, the New Prayer Book, a poor man's box, a chalice, a corporas, a paten, and a bell.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Those things were actually specified in the book?

(Mr. Stephens.) The argument I ventured to press upon their Lordships was this, that those ornaments which were so specifically mentioned were amply sufficient to carry out all the provisions of the Book of Common Prayer, and therefore being amply sufficient, other ornaments could not be introduced.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And they admitted the credence table as being subsidiary to the service, the words of the rubric requiring a table of that kind?

(Mr. Stephens.) Precisely so.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I want clearly to understand your argument, with regard to this chrismatory. The chrismatory is not specified in the catalogue of ornaments or articles to be used, but you say, inasmuch as oil was to be used, there must have been something to contain that oil?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That service has gone?

(Mr. Stephens.) That service has gone.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And you ask whether that ornament could be now in force?

(Mr. Stephens.) I submit that the ornament could not be retained if the service was gone. If the service existed, then according to the ordinary construction of statutes, there would be a right to import everything that was necessary to carry out the directions of parliament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is what I wanted to understand. Supposing the service to remain, and the article to be necessary as subsidiary to the service, although not mentioned specifically, eo nomine, in the first Prayer Book, you would hold it to be necessary on the same principle upon which the credence table was allowed.

(Mr. Stephens.) Exactly. It is so with the credence table. Now, my Lord, I will proceed to 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, p. 263. In the year 1559 there was "A declaration of certain articles of religion set out by the order of both archbishops, metropolitans, and the rest of the bishops for the uniformity of doctrine." In section 8, p. 265, it says, "Although in the administration of baptism, there is neither exorcism, oil, salt, spittle or hallowing of the water now used, and for that they were of late years abused and esteemed necessary, where they pertain not to the substance and necessity of the sacrament, that they be reasonably abolished, and yet the sacrament full and perfectly ministered to all intents and purposes, agreeable to the institution of our Saviour Christ."

Andrewes in his Minor Works, page 26, states "that chrisu is very ancient yet never but as a ceremony, which though we retain not, yet the invocation of the grace of the Holy Ghost we do." Therefore, as far as regards this ceremony, to which I have directed your Lordship's attention, it undoubtedly is gone.

The rubric under consideration must be construed consistently with the other parts of our present Prayer Book, with the previous Acts of Uniformity, and with the XXXIX. articles.

The Statutes of Uniformity respectively treat the Prayer Book for the time being as a complete code of directions for all rites and ceremonies to be used in divine service. The preamble of the statute 13 and 14 Charles II. c. 4., is "To the intent that every person in the realm may know the rule to which he is to conform in public worship." Supposing that some of the prescribed ornaments of the church cannot be used in performing any of the ceremonies enjoined in the Prayer Book,—nevertheless, the rubric cannot mean, that the minister is to introduce additional services for the purpose of using them. The minister would thus have a choice which ceremony he should introduce for the purpose of using any particular ornament, exempti gratiâ, anointing in baptism, and extreme unction. But a sufficient effect is given to this Rubric, if it be understood only to mean, that whenever a ceremony enjoined by the Prayer Book can be performed either with one of the prescribed ornaments, or with another ornament—the prescribed ornament is to be used.

The preface to the Book of Common Prayer, indicates the spirit in which the Prayer Book should be construed, "For we are fully persuaded in our judgments (and we here profess it to the world) that the book as it stood before established by law, doth not contain in it anything contrary to the Word of God, or to sound doctrine, or which a godly man may not with a good conscience use and submit unto or which is not fairly defensible against any that shall oppose the same, if it shall be allowed such just and favorable construction as in common equity ought to be allowed to all human writings, & especially such as are set forth by authority, and “ even to the very best translations of the Holy Scripture itself.”

In the case of the King v. Hall (1 Barnewall and Cresswell, page 136), it is laid down: “ The meaning of particular words in Acts of Parliament, as well as in other instruments, is to be found not so much in a strict etymological propriety of language, nor even in popular use, as in the subject or occasion on which they are used, and the object that is intended to be attained.”

If a case be within the literal meaning of the words of a statute, but not within the object which the Legislature had in view, the literal meaning of the words will not be acted upon, but the object of the statute will be carried out. In support of that proposition I refer your Lordship to the case of Simpson v. Unwin, (3 Barnewall and Adolphus, p. 135) Lord Tenterden there says: “ I think this is not a case within the Statute of 2 & 3 George III., c. 19, sections 1 and 4. It clearly is not within the object which the legislature had in view, and although it may be within the literal meaning of the words, taken by themselves, we must not give to them a construction which will not only be contrary to the general intention of the legislature, but which will lead to this absurd consequence that a party who might at the last moment of the day, on the 1st of February, lawfully kill a partridge or pheasant, would be guilty of an offence by having the same partridge or pheasant in his possession at the earliest moment of the second. And I am strongly inclined to think that the first section applies to living birds only, both on account of the absurdity which would otherwise follow, and because section 2 contains an express exception as to living pheasants, and all the objects of the statute are satisfied if the meaning be restricted to living birds only.” That was a decision in opposition to the literal construction of the words, because the literal construction of the words would have led to an absurdity, and would have been in direct opposition to the spirit and letter of the Act.

Then, my Lord, in the case of Salkeld v. Johnson (1 Hare, page 208), it was held, that a clear verbal construction must be rejected in favour of the obvious intention of the legislature.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is the nature of that case? Will you read the marginal note?

(Mr. Stephens.) It is as follows: “ The statute of 2 and 3 Will. IV., c. 100, brings down the period of legal memory from the time of the First Richard to the time of the commencement of two incumbencies (not being together less than 60 years) and three years of a third incumbency; but does not create a new ground of exemption or destroy the right to tithes upon fair proof of a non-payment or non-render during two such incumbencies, and three years of a third in cases where proof of non-payment or non-render from the time of the 1st Richard I. would, before the statute of 2 & 3 William IV., c. 100, have established no exemption. The proof of the title of the vicar to some small tithes and that the other small tithes had never been paid to the rector, is not necessarily sufficient to establish the right of the vicar to such other small tithes, especially where some of the evidence is opposed to the vicar's claim.” (See also Henderson v. Bise, 3 Stark. 158; Wells v. Porter, 3 Bing. N.S., 722; Elsworth v. Cole, 2 M. & W. 31.)

Now, I submit to your Lordship that the rubric as to ornaments is a general clause, and the rubrics giving detailed directions as to the particular services are special provisions, and if they conflict the latter must prevail.

I also submit that when the general words, which appear to conflict with the particular clause of the same statute, are words of reference to a previous statute, as in the rubric under discussion; and acquire their conflicting force from what is found, not in the statute in which they occur, but in the statute incorporated by reference, it is peculiarly true, that they must be restrained by reason and right, and by the manifest intention of the makers of the later statute.

I will shortly refer to the case of The King v. The Poor Law Commissioners in the parish of St. Pancras (6 Adolphus & Ellis, page 7). In the construction of statutes, the Courts give to them such an interpretation as is consistent with the plain policy of their provisions; and the judgment of Mr. Justice Coleridge in this case seems to incorporate all the law upon the subject. “ It is in my opinion so important for the Court in construing modern statutes to act upon the principle of giving full effect to their language, and of declining to mould that language in order to meet either an alleged convenience or an alleged equity upon doubtful evidence of intention, that nothing will induce me to withdraw a case from the operation of a section which is within its words, but clear and unambiguous evidence that so to do is to fulfil the general intent of the statute, and also that to adhere to the literal interpretation is to decide inconsistently with other and overruling provisions of the same statute. “ When the evidence amounts to this the Court may properly act upon it, for the object of all rules of construction being to ascertain the meaning of the language used, and it being unreasonable to impute to the Legislature inconsistent intents upon the same general subject matter; what it has clearly said in one part must be the best evidence of what it has intended to say in the other; and if the clear language be in accordance with the plain policy and purview of the whole statute, there is the strongest reason for believing that the interpretation of a particular part inconsistently with that, is a wrong interpretation. The Court must apply in such a case the same rules which it would use in construing the limitations of a deed; it must look to the whole context and endeavour to give effect to all the provisions, enlarging or restraining if need be for that purpose, the literal interpretation of any particular part.”

There is another case to which I am anxious to direct your Lordship's attention. It is that of Brett v. Brett (3 Adams, p. 216), and I am going to read an extract from the judgment of Sir John Nicholl, “ The key to the opening of every law is the reason and spirit of the law. It is the ‘animus imponentis,’ the intention of the lawmaker expressed in the law itself, taken as a whole. Hence to arrive at the true meaning of any particular phrase in a statute, that particular phrase is not to be viewed, detached from its context in the statute; it is to be viewed in connexion with its whole context—meaning by this as well the title, and preamble, as the purview or enacting part of the statute. It is to the preamble more especially that we are to look for the reason or spirit of every statute; rehearsing, as it ordinarily does, the evils sought to be remedied, or the doubts purported to be removed by the statute, and so evidencing, in the best and most satisfactory manner, the object or intention of the Legislature, in making and passing the statute itself.”

This rubric is nothing more than a mere section of the Act of Uniformity, and must be overruled, if it be inconsistent with the plain policy and purview of the Act of Uniformity.

Down to this point, I have argued upon the assumption, that the rubric as to ornaments, included all the ornaments either expressly mentioned in Edward the Sixth's first book, or required for performing the services directed by that book. But the sounder and more reasonable construction of this rubric is, that it only refers to the ornaments expressly mentioned in Edward VI.'s first book. This seems to be the construction placed upon the rubric by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Westerton and Liddell (Moore's Report, page 157), as all the ornaments they specify are expressly mentioned in that book.

In construing this Rubric, we should bear in mind the objects that our reformers had in view; which are thus forcibly stated by Dr. Lushington, in Westerton and Liddell: "The great object of our reformers was to remove, first, those errors in doctrine which they believed had crept into the church, and next those usages and practices, which though perhaps in themselves innocuous, they judged were auxiliary by their abuse, to superstition and the maintenance of error; in a word, that our reformers intended, so far as they had the means or knowledge, to reform the church in doctrine and practice, according to Scripture and apostolical example."—(Moore's Report, p. 47.)

Having now, my Lord, concluded my observations upon the Acts of Uniformity, I will proceed to consider the subject of elevation.

I submit to your Lordship that the elevation of the elements is a ceremony not appointed by the Acts of Uniformity, and consequently illegal. It is a matter of perfect unimportance what precise object Mr. Mackonochie had in view when he elevated the elements. The mere fact of elevation, such as that which is the subject of the present charge is a violation of the laws ecclesiastical.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There are two kinds of elevation I think charged?

(Mr. Stephens.) There is only elevation above the head charged.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I thought there were two.

(Mr. Stephens.) Only elevation above the head.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Only one that is in the Articles.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is only one charge that I am trying now as to elevation, which is elevation above the head?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord, only one under the Articles.

Your Lordship perhaps will bear in mind that throughout the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. there is only one ceremony expressly prohibited. It is in the Communion Service where a rubrical direction is annexed to the prayer of consecration of the elements. It is as follows: "These words before rehearsed are to be said, turning still to the altar, without any elevation, or showing the sacrament to the people." The reason of this exception is obvious. The repudiation of the doctrine of transubstantiation was the cardinal point of the Reformation, so far as doctrine was concerned.

It was the test applied by Romanists under Mary, and that which resulted in the martyrdom of our leading Reformers.

What is the object of the elevation of the elements above the head? It is, in point of fact, for the congregation to adore them. In Lyadwood, (page 231, Notes upon a canon of Archbishop Peckham's, 3rd book, 23rd title,) there is this note upon the word "elevation:" "Ut populus illud adoret."

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is the date?

(Mr. Stephens.) The date of my edition is 1679.

This statement is corroborated by Dr. Rock's Hierurgia, page 100. "Up to the 11th century, the elevation did not take place until about the end of the canon. Towards the year 1047 Berengarius began to broach his errors concerning the Holy Eucharist. Not only were the heterodox opinions of this innovator immediately anathematized by several councils, but the whole Latin church unanimously adopted a ceremonial at the Celebration of Mass—the elevation—which should at the same time furnish a most significant condemnation of the new doctrine of Berengarius, and be an unequivocal and practical profession of faith concerning the real presence of Christ in the Sacrament, in which bread and wine are transubstantiated into the body and blood of Jesus, uplifted by the priest, and adored by the people at the elevation. In the Greek and eastern churches, the ceremony of the elevation, which has always been observed by them, does not take place until just before the Communion."

I will now solicit your Lordship's attention to a book I cited yesterday, called "The Ritual Reason Why," page 121, No. 284. This is the question, "Why does he genuflect after each consecration?" The answer is, "In lowliest worship of our Lord now present under the forms of bread and wine." Page 126, No. 291. "Why does he elevate the blessed Sacrament after either consecration?—Answer. For two reasons; first as presenting the sacrifice to the Father, under the separate forms which represent his soul and body parted in death; and as showing the Lord's death before the people by this act, and again as exhibiting to them Christ really though invisibly present to receive their homage. In this, the priest imitates St. John the Baptist who was not content with worshipping his Lord, but pointed him out to the people, saying, 'Behold the Lamb of God.' Then at page 160, "What is the Agnus Dei?—Answer. It is an anthem sung by the choir during the communion of the priest, and is a prayer to our Lord now present on the altar—the 'Lamb as it had been slain.' The choir sing thrice, O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy upon us."

I propose to refer your Lordship to a book that I ventured to bring under your attention this morning, Dr. Lee's "Directorium Anglicanum." Dr. Lee, as I have already mentioned, has been recently instituted to a Benefice in our church, and in this book will be found what he contends ought to be done in our Protestant churches in respect of elevation during the consecration prayer (pages 59, 60, and 61). Your Lordship will find that the directions are very analogous to those which were considered essentially requisite to carry out the doctrine of Transubstantiation in Rock's Hierurgia. At page 59 Dr. Lee says, "The celebrant at the consecration prayer inclines humbly, extensis manibus. Before the recital of the words of institution the celebrant should remove the pall from the chalice. At the words 'body' and 'blood' he should make a cross over the elements. At the words 'Who, in the same night,' he should rest his elbows on the altar, bowing down. The paten, and also the chalice, are held in the left hand; the sign of the cross being made with the right hand. After the words 'this is my body which is given for you,' the 'hostia' should be placed on the paten, and the celebrant, with his assistants, should reverently genuflect. Then rising, the celebrant should at once elevate It with the first finger and thumb of both hands, for the worship of the faithful, while he is saying, 'Do this in remembrance of me.' After the words, 'This is my Blood of the New Testament' he should place the chalice on the centre of the corporal, and with his assistants, genuflect again; after which he should in like manner elevate the chalice with both hands, while he is saying 'Do this, as oft as ye shall drink it in remembrance of me.' After the consecration, the celebrant will keep the fingers and thumbs of each hand joined until after the ablutions. The lay assistants at the altar and members of the choir should be instructed to bow profoundly at the consecration and elevation. It is quite wrong to turn to the people at the breaking of the bread, lifting up of the paten, and showing of the cup."

According to the rubric the bread is to be taken into the hands before the words "This is my body" have been pronounced; and therefore an elevation at that time cannot be for the purposes of adoration. Again, the taking of the cup is to be before the words "took the cup." The priest is to lay his hands on every vessel after the word "this," and before the words "my blood of the New Testament."

My Lord, I cannot reconcile these directions of Dr. Lee in this book which is to set everybody right, with the directions in the rubric. The former are in strict accordance with the Roman Catholic Service books, but not with the Protestant Prayer Book.

A Pamphlet upon the "Elevation of the Host, a liturgical essay," by Dr. Littledale, who describes himself as a priest of the Church of England, contains the following passage upon the distinctive peculiarity of the ceremony of elevation:—"The ceremony of the elevation of the wafer and chalice which takes place in the canon of the mass is to all outward appearance the most distinctive peculiarity which marks off the Roman Catholic ritual of the Holy Eucharist from that employed by Protestant bodies. The latter have usually a special place set apart in their places of worship for their communion. They employ peculiar vessels for the purpose. They assign the conduct of the service to some principal minister; they embody in it the original words of consecration; they hedge the ordinance round with some tokens of mystery and reverence. So far, there is a likeness to the proceedings enjoined by the missal, but the essential difference which exists is most clearly exhibited by the total absence of any ceremony resembling that of elevation, or even distinctly akin to it. The fact has by no means escaped the observation of controversialists, and much polemical rhetoric has been spent on the depreciation of the Roman custom. The results have not been important, for not only has it continued in full force everywhere in all churches of the Latin obedience, but it has made its appearance in many of those Anglican shrines where the ritual movement of the last quarter of a century has made itself prominently felt."

In the Communion Office of 1549, the elevation of the elements was forbidden.—"These words are to be said without any elevation or shewing to the people." After the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. it was not deemed requisite to insert this particular prohibition in the subsequent Prayer Books. No directions, however, were given to the minister to perform this ceremony, and consequently he could not perform it without the introduction of a ceremony not directed by the Legislature.

The most conclusive evidence that the prohibition of elevation was omitted in Edward VI.'s second book merely because everyone then understood that all ceremonies not mentioned in the Prayer Book were prohibited, and not with any intention of repealing the prohibition as has been alleged, is afforded by the XXVIIIth Article originally drawn up as the XXIXth Article in 1552, about the same time as Edward's second book. It is set out in 1 Cardwell's Synodalia (page 29.) "Transubstantiation, or the change of the substance of bread and wine into the substance of Christ's body and blood, cannot be proved by Holy Writ, but is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, and hath given occasion to many superstitions.

"Forasmuch as the truth of man's nature requireth that the body of one and the self same man cannot be at one time in divers places but must needs be in some one certain place, therefore the body of Christ cannot be present at one time in many and divers places. And because (as Holy Scripture doth teach) Christ was taken up into heaven, and there shall continue unto the end of the world, a faithful man ought not either to believe or openly to confess the real and bodily presence (as they term it) of Christ's flesh and blood in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

"The sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not commanded by Christ's ordinance to be kept, carried about, lifted up, nor worshipped."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is it "real and bodily presence," or "real or bodily presence"?

(Mr. Stephens.) "Real and bodily presence." I will now direct your Lordship's attention to the XXVth Article.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not know what articles you are referring to. The date of the present "Articles of Religion" is 1571.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am now about to refer to the present "Articles of Religion." The XXVth Article declares that "Sacraments ordained of Christ be not only badges or tokens of Christian men's profession, but rather they be certain sure witnesses and effectual signs of grace, and God's good will towards us, by the which he doth work invisibly in us, and doth not only quicken but also strengthen and confirm our faith in him.

"There are two sacraments ordained of Christ our Lord in the gospel, that is to say, Baptism and the Supper of the Lord.

"Those five commonly called sacraments, that is to say, Confirmation, Penance, Orders, Matrimony, and Extreme Unction, are not to be counted for sacraments of the gospel, being such as have grown partly of the corrupt following of the apostles, partly are states of life allowed in the Scriptures, but yet have not like nature of sacraments with Baptism and the Lord's Supper, for that they have not any visible sign or ceremony ordained of God.

"The sacraments were not ordained of Christ to be gazed upon, or to be carried about; but that we should duly use them. And in such only as worthily receive the same they have a wholesome effect or operation; but they that receive them unworthily purchase to themselves damnation, as Saint Paul saith."

I will now refer to the XXVIIIth Article, the 2nd paragraph. "Transubstantiation (or the change of the substance of bread and wine) in the Supper of the Lord, cannot be proved by Holy Writ, but is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, overthroweth the nature of a sacrament, and hath given occasion to many superstitions.

"The body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten, in the Supper only after a heavenly and spiritual manner. And the mean whereby the body of Christ is received and eaten in the Supper is faith. The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped."

This, my Lord, is in point of fact treating it as an axiom that the use of a sacrament in any mode not ordained by Christ, was wrong.

Our reformers placed these salutary guards upon Transubstantiation in order to prevent the occurrence in the Protestant Church of those awful abuses that existed and do still exist in the Church of Rome upon the subject.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you read that last paragraph as a prohibition, "The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped?"

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly I do. If it be lawful to elevate because not forbidden, is it lawful also to worship? Or if the latter be held to be forbidden by the Article, then the former must be so, for they stand in the same clause.

Elevation is a ceremony; and no clergyman has a right to use any ceremony not appointed by the Book of Common Prayer, or which is not set forth by public authority. In 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, (page 93,) Bishop Ridley ordered "that the minister do use only the ceremonies and gestures appointed by the Book of Common Prayer, and none other, so that there do not appear in them any counterfeiting of the Popish Mass."

Can any one doubt that the elevating of the elements above the head is anything more or less than the counterfeiting of the Popish Mass?

In the same page of Cardwell there is likewise another very important passage in which Bishop Ridley forbids "shewing the sacrament openly before the distribution or making any elevation thereof, ringing of the sacring bell, or setting any light upon the Lord's board."

In that admonition to which I have referred your Lordship "no parson . . . shall innovate or alter any thing in the Church, or use any old rite or ceremony

"which is not set forth by public authority" (1 Cardwell, Doc. Ann. 316).

In Grindal's Injunctions of 1571 ("Grindal's Remains," p. 124), it is directed, "Ye shall not deliver the Communion bread unto the people into their mouths, but unto their hands; nor shall use at the ministration of the Communion any gestures, rites or ceremonies not appointed by the Book of Common Prayer, as crossing or breathing over the sacramental bread and wine, nor any showing or lifting up of the same to the people, to be by them worshipped and adored, nor any such like; nor shall use any oil or chrism, tapers, spatle, or any other Popish ceremony in the ministration of the Sacrament of Baptism."

The writings of Becon and Bishop Jewel in the time of Elizabeth, and of Bishop Cosin, shortly before the Restoration, and of Bishop Bull in the time of Anne—illustrate how utterly inconsistent the "elevation of the elements" is with the views of Protestant divines, and how obnoxious the ceremony of "elevation" has been considered at various periods of our Reformation History.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Before you leave this subject, of course, whenever it is convenient, you will consider the answer which is put in to the fact alleged of the elevation. You are now dealing with the charge of elevation. There is an answer put in upon that subject as to the fact, as to the amount of the elevation, and as to the time when it took place, and when it was discontinued. I do not mean to interrupt the citation of your authorities, but before you leave the charge altogether, you will probably think it right to notice that. You can go on with your course now and you will perhaps consider it to-morrow.

(Mr. Stephens.) I will deal with that to-morrow. It would equally apply to incense.

(The Dean of the Arches.) only suggested it that it should not escape your memory.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am obliged to your Lordship, but it has not escaped my memory. The Defendant commits the illegal act of elevation in December 1866, then issues a pamphlet and says, I give it up, not because I think it unlawful. On the contrary, I think it lawful, and I think it is the right of my parishioners to have this elevation. And then, in answer to the Articles, he alleges that the elevation complained of is lawful. Really, my Lord, I do not think it is requisite to trespass upon the attention of your Lordship any further upon that point. There is no legal condonation in this case.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Well, deal with it as you like. It is not a question that the Court could leave wholly unnoticed, therefore I mentioned it to you.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am very much indebted to your Lordship.

In Becon's Works, ("Prayers and other Pieces of Thomas Becon," page 359: Parker Society's edition,) it is said, "The massmonger doth utterly abuse those holy mysteries, while he in his most abominable mass lift them up as the Calf of Aharon, according to the decree of Pope Honorius III., and sheweth them to the people both to be gazed upon and to be worshipped; which thing, what other is it than to speak unto them that are present on this wise—Behold your Maker; down upon your marrowbones before this your God; reverence Him, worship Him, honour Him, call upon Him, offer sacrifice unto Him, give thanks unto Him?" . . . "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God and Him alone shalt thou serve. Verily, our Saviour Christ did not institute those godly mysteries that we should worship them, but that we should eat and drink them for a remembrance of his death. 'Take,' saith he, 'eat,' 'drink.'"

In the works of Bishop Jewel, [Sermon and Harding, p. 10,] there is a passage illustrative of the present subject. It is from his sermon on the Lord's Supper preached at Paul's Cross in 1560. He says, "The fourth matter that remaineth to be touched is the adoration, a great matter full of danger, and full of jeopardy and so much the more dangerous, for that it is an honour only belonging unto God, and yet without any warrant of God's word. Christ that best knew what ought to be done herein when he ordained and delivered the Sacrament of His body and blood, gave no commandment that any man should fall down to it or worship it. St. Paul that took the Sacrament at Christ's hand, and, as he had taken it, delivered it to the Corinthians, never willed adoration or godly honour to be given unto it. The old doctors and holy fathers of the Church, St. Cyprian, St. Chrysostom, St. Ambrose, St. Hierome, St. Augustine, and others that received the Sacrament of the apostles hands, and (as it may be thought) continued the same in such sort as they had received it, never made mention in any of all their books of adoring or worshipping the Sacrament. It is a very new device, and as it is well known, came but lately into the Church."

"Once again I say, for the space of a thousand and two hundred years after Christ's ascension into heaven, this worshipping of the sacrament was never known or practised in any place within the whole Catholic Church of Christ throughout the whole world."

I now propose to read a passage from 5 Cosin's Works, "Notes on the Book of Common Prayer," page 340.

(The Dean of the Arches.) When do you say those notes were made?

(Mr. Stephens.) I will give your Lordship an explanation.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You do not touch upon that now?

(Mr. Stephens.) Not now, I intend to touch upon it when I come to the question of lights. I shall not forget to comment upon those notes.

What I am going to read is a commentary on the words, "Took bread . . . took the cup." "At these words the priest was appointed by the first liturgy set forth in the second year of King Edward VI, to take the bread and cup into his hands (which is still observed among us), but he was not appointed to make any elevation of them, as the new Roman Catholics do at their mass where the priest saying "Hoc est Corpus meum suddenly lifts up the wafer over his head, and afterwards the chalice; that the people may all fall down upon their knees and worship them, which rite neither we, nor any of the Reformed or Protestant churches observe, but (in regard to the peril of idolatry) have wholly omitted."

I am now about to cite from the 4 volume of Cosin, p. 334. He is treating on "Differences in Religion between England and Rome." I will read from the 13th paragraph: "That all the ceremonies used by the Roman church in the administration of the sacraments (such as are spittle and salt at baptism, the five crosses upon the altar and sacrament of the Eucharist, the holding of that sacrament over the priest's head to be adored, the exposing of it in their churches to be worshipped by the people, the circumgestation and carrying of it abroad in procession upon their Corpus Christi Day, and to their sick for the same, the oil and chrism in confirmation, the anointing of the ears, the eyes, and noses, the hands and reins of those that are ready to die, the giving of an empty chalice and paten to them that are to be ordained priests, and many others of this nature now in use with them) are of necessity to salvation to be approved and admitted by all other churches."

All which, in their several respects, we hold, some to be pernicious, some unnecessary, many false, and many fond, and none of them to be imposed upon any church, or any Christian, as the Roman Catholics do upon all Christians and all churches whatsoever, for matters needful to be approved for eternal salvation." It will be perceived that even Cosin speaks of the holding of the sacrament over the priest's head to be adored, as not one of the doctrines of the Church of England.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Elevation is charged but not adoring.

(Mr. Prideaux.) There is no charge of adoring, and there is no question of doctrine, as I understand it, at all.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The charge is "elevating to a greater degree than necessary." Those are the words of your Articles.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My Lord, we are not come here to defend the great Catholic doctrine of the worship of the Redeemer in the Eucharist. The Article simply charges elevation above the head.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is very important that we should be clear upon this. The amended Articles are here, and to prevent mistake I will just read from the amended Articles what relates to this question of elevation. That Mr. Mackonochie (I need not read the dates)—"During the Prayer of Consecration in the order of the administration of the Holy Communion elevated the paten above his head and permitted and sanctioned such elevation and took into his hands the cup and elevated it above his head during the Prayer of Consecration aforesaid, and permitted and sanctioned the cup to be so taken and elevated and knelt or prostrated himself before the consecrated elements during the Prayer of Consecration, and permitted and sanctioned such kneeling or prostrating by other clerks in Holy Orders. That such elevation of the paten and such taking and elevation of the cup, and such kneeling and prostrating are severally unlawful additions to, and variations from the form and order prescribed," and so forth.

(Mr. Stephens.) My Lord, I shall first prove the elevation, and I shall then contend, that adoration is a consequence of that elevation.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Of course it is competent for you to argue the one must necessarily follow the other. But it is not the charge against Mr. Mackonochie as I read it. Just look at the Letters of Request; "By the elevation of the paten during or after the prayer of consecration in the order for the administration of the Holy Communion in his said parish church, in a greater degree and otherwise than by merely taking the same into his hands, as prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer, and in a greater degree than is necessary in order to conform with the requirements of such book, and by permitting and sanctioning such elevation, and by the taking into his hands and elevating the cup during or after the prayer of consecration aforesaid, contrary to the said Book of Common Prayer, and by permitting and sanctioning such taking and elevating and by bowing, kneeling, or prostrating himself before the consecrated elements." Those are the charges and you cannot go beyond them.

(Mr. Stephens.) The Defendant has had recourse to elevation. Having done that act, I as a matter of comment have a right to put my own construction in reference to the object of such elevation.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You have a right to say that elevation could only be for one purpose; only he is not charged with that.

(Mr. Stephens.) My Lord, I commenced my argument on this point with the quotation from Lyndwood, "Ut populus illud adoret," and that is the object of elevation and no other.

(The Dean of the Arches.) At the same time, remember that he is not charged with adoration.

(Mr. Stephens.) I shall be perfectly satisfied if I establish the elevation above the head.

Now, my Lord, in a work entitled "The Corruptions of the Church of Rome," by Dr. Bull, late bishop of St. David's,—I am reading from the edition of 1851, published by the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is that an essay or is it a bit of a sermon, or anything of that sort?

(Mr. Stephens.) It appears in the preface that this compilation was first published in 1725, by Dr. Hicks, in Bishop Bull's own lifetime, and there is no trace of Bishop Bull ever having disowned it, that I am aware of.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I believe Dr. Hicks was a non-juror?

(Mr. Stephens.) He was, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What you are going to read will be found in his works, no doubt. If you will make use of it as part of your argument, I will find it by-and-by.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am reading from page 89 of the pamphlet: "But the worst ceremony of all is the elevation of the Host to be adored by the people, as very Christ Himself, under the appearance of bread, whole Christ, God, and man, while they neglect the old 'Sursum Corda,' the lifting up their hearts to Heaven where whole Christ indeed is. A practice this is, which nothing can excuse from the grossest idolatry, but their gross stupidity, or rather infatuation, in thinking that a piece of bread can by any means whatsoever, or however consecrated and blessed, become their very God and Saviour, a very sad excuse indeed."

(Mr. Droop.) I believe, my Lord, that this quotation is not in the Anglo-Catholic edition of Bull's works. It may save your Lordship's time if I mention that.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There are several editions of Bull's works.

(Mr. Droop.) I only say the passage is not, I think, in the Anglo-Catholic edition. I have searched for it there.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You mean to say it is doubtful whether Bull wrote it?

(Mr. Droop.) Oh no.

(The Dean of the Arches.) At all events I can look at the pamphlet, Valeat quantum. It will go with the other authorities.

(Mr. Stephens.) I will now again refer to Bishop Ridley's works, page 401, "In the stead of the Lord's holy table they give the people with much solemn disguising, a thing which they call their mass, but in deed and in truth it is a very masking and mockery of the true supper of the Lord, or rather I may call it a crafty juggling, whereby these false thieves and jugglers have bewitched the minds of the simple people, that they have brought them from the true worship of God unto pernicious idolatry; and make them to believe that to be Christ our Lord and Saviour, which indeed is neither God nor man, nor hath any life in itself, but in substance is the creature of bread and wine, and in use of the Lord's table, is the Sacrament of Christ's body and blood." And at page 409 commencing with the paragraph "O thou now wicked and bloody see," [London] there are these words, ". . . Thy God, which is the work of Thy hands, and whom thou sayest thou hast power to make; that thy deaf and dumb God (I say) will not indeed nor cannot (although thou art not ashamed to call Him thy maker) make thee to escape the revenging hand of the high and Almighty God."

In 6 Foxe's Actes and Monuments, p. 553, there is a Declaration set forth, dated 8th of May 1554.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is that you are going to cite? Foxe is not very accurate, you know.

(Mr. Stephens.) It is entitled "A copy of a certain declaration drawn and sent abroad, out of prison, by Master Bradford, Master Saunders, and divers other godly preachers," etc.; and I am going to read the eighth paragraph of this Declaration. "We confess and believe the Sacraments of Christ, which be Baptism and the Lord's Supper, that they ought to be ministered according to the Institution of Christ, concerning the substantial parts of them: and that they be no longer sacraments than they be had in use and used to the end for which they were instituted. And here we plainly confess that the mutilation of the Lord's Supper, and the subtraction of the one kind from the lay people is anti-Christian. And so is the doctrine of transubstantia-

"tion of the sacramental bread and wine after the words of consecration as they be called. Item the reservation and carrying about of the same: Item the mass to be a propitiary sacrifice for the quick and dead, or a work that pleaseth God."

In the first book of Edward VI., a whole series of prayers are interspersed between the consecration and the receiving of the elements. In Shipley's Liturgies, p. XII, and pp. 53 and 65, we find that these prayers were interposed, first, "Oblation of Sacrifice," "Lord's Prayer," "Pax Domini," "Christ our Paschal Lamb," "Invitation," "Confession," "Absolution," "Comfortable Words," and "Prayer of humble Access."

In the second book of Edward VI. and in the book of 1662, the receiving of the elements immediately follows the consecration prayer, all the intermediate prayers being placed before the consecration or after the receiving. As this alteration was simultaneous with the condemnation of worshipping the sacraments in the Articles of 1552, it is highly probable that it was intended to prevent the possibility of any prayers being supposed to be addressed to the Sacrament. In Shipley's Liturgies (p. 66) it is said, "For the same reason probably, the 'Agnus Dei,' directed by the first book to be sung during the Communion was omitted in the second book."

Bishop Ridley, in his Injunctions which he issued in 1550 (Works, p. 319), prohibits the "saying the Agnus Dei before the communion, shewing the sacrament openly before the distribution, or making any elevation thereof," that is while the consecrated elements were on the communion table.

In the Sarum Missal the Agnus Dei is said by the priest with part of the consecrated wafer in his hand, so that it might easily be regarded as addressed to the presence in the Wafer (Walker, 74).

In "The Ritual Reason Why" (page 160), it is asked, "What is the 'Agnus Dei?'" Answer: "It is an anthem sung 'by the choir during the communion of the priest and is a prayer to our Lord now present on the altar.'"

In Becon's Prayers (page 278) there is this passage: "Then do ye say the 'Agnus' which Pope Sergius also commanded that it should be said at mass, a little before the receiving of the Host. And here again ye play the abominable idolaters. For looking upon the bread, ye look yourselves and worship it, saying in Latin, 'Agnus Dei qui tollis,' &c. 'O Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world, have mercy upon us.' Thrice do ye call 'that bread which ye hold in your hands 'the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world.' Oh, intolerable blasphemy! Was there ever idolater that worshipped a piece of broken bread for God? What marvel is it that the Jews, the Turks, and all other infidels be so loth to come unto the Christian religion when they see so manifest idolatry committed. When they behold a piece of a thin wafer cake honoured for God? Certainly, this abominable idolatry which ye mass-mongers maintain and commit at your mass hath been and is the occasion that innumerable thousands of souls have been and are daily damned."

In Grindal's Remains, in the "Fruitful Dialogue between Custom and Verity" (pages 72 and 73), it is stated: "For this word 'Transubstantiation,' whereby they signify turning of the bread into the body of Christ, was never neither spoken, neither heard, neither thought of, among the ancient fathers, or in the old Church. But about 500 years past, Pope Nicholas II. in a Council holden at Lateranum, in Rome, confirmed that opinion of the changing of bread, and would have made it an article of faith and placed it in the 'Credo.' After which time ensued Corpus Christi Day, Masses of Corpus Christi, Reservation of the Sacrament with honour, with canopies, with censing, with kneeling, with worshipping, and adoration, and with so much as any man could devise. For they thought they could not do too much to him after that the Bishop of Rome had allowed him for a God."

I wish now to refer to Bishop Stillingfleet's Opinion

(Mr. Prideaux.) We are not here to defend the popish doctrines.

(Mr. Stephens.) This, my Lord, is Bishop Stillingfleet's opinion of popery. It is an edition edited by Dr. Goode, Dean of Ripon.

(Dean of the Arches.) Does it really bear upon this case what Bishop Stillingfleet's opinion of popery was?

(Mr. Prideaux.) My Lord, we are not here to defend popery.

(Mr. Stephens.) I did not say that you were.

(Dean of the Arches.) If Mr. Stephens thinks it will further his argument to quote this, I certainly will not stop him.

(Mr. Stephens.) I opened the case by saying, and I say it again for my learned friend's edification, that the rites and ceremonies of which we complain, if they symbolize anything, symbolize popery, nothing more, nothing less.

There is only one reference to which I shall now direct your attention on this part of the case. It respects adoration, and it is to shew, that adoration was repudiated even by the innovators among the non-jurors. I refer your Lordship to the fifth volume of Hall's Fragmenta Liturgica (London, 1718), and to the concluding words of the preface, pp. 5, 6: "Upon the whole, here is nothing introduced without unexceptionable warrant, nothing of late beginning. Here is no application to saints or angels, no of images, no praying the dead out of purgatory, no adoration of worship of the consecrated elements; nothing that supposes a corporal presence, either by trans- or con-substantiation, in short nothing but what is primitive and agreeable to scripture and practised by the best recommended and enlightened ages." The reason I have referred to these authorities in reference to adoration, is to establish that the elevation of the elements can be for no other purpose than that of adoration.

There is one observation that I wish to make upon the Directorium Anglicanum. At pages 90, 91, and 89, Dr. Lee has published the Cautels of the Sarum Missal containing various minute directions upon the same subject. These cautels which of course presupposed transubstantiation are found equally suited for carrying out practically the doctrines of the ultraritualists whatever those doctrines may be.

I will now come to a publication called the "Hymnal Noted with an appendix, revised, and greatly enlarged" — the second edition. My Lord, this Hymnal Noted is used in the church of St. Albans.

(Mr. Prideaux.) There is no charge against us for using that Hymn Book.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am going to quote from it as part of my observations.

(Dean of the Arches.) I daresay it is used at St. Alban's, but there is no proof of it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not object to my friend reading from the Hymnal Noted, but I do object to his statement that it is used at St. Albans.

(Dean of the Arches.) If any specific charge is to be founded upon the book called "The Hymnal Noted," undoubtedly it is not in the Articles before me.

(Mr. Stephens.) We accuse Mr. Mackonochie of elevating the elements; and that the elevation of the elements is for the purpose of adoration.

(Dean of the Arches.) I must remind you that he is not charged with adoration; I shall not try that question.

(Mr. Stephens.) Still I have a right to show the object of the elevation.

(Dean of the Arches.) You have a right to say, if you think it expedient, not only that there was elevation, but that that elevation must have been for certain purposes. I cannot restrict you in any argument you like to use of that kind, but what I say distinctly and positively is that I am not sitting here under these Articles to try any question of adoration of the Holy Communion.

(Mr. Stephens.) What I understand your Lordship has to try is the question of elevation?

(The Dean of the Arches.) Certainly.

(Mr. Stephens.) Then I adduce arguments to show that it is for the purpose of adoration.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You charge Mr. Mackonochie with elevating and adoring. That charge should have found its way into the Letters of Request and the Articles.

(Mr. Stephens.) I want to show what is meant by the word "elevation." It is a Roman Catholic practice.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I can say no more. Any evidence to show that elevation is contrary to the statutes and doctrines and teaching of the Church of England I will listen to as long as you like. Any argument to show that elevation was rejected by the Church of England because it necessarily led to Roman error is of course quite legitimate, but if the argument is to be that Mr. Mackonochie must have adored because he elevated, then I do not see why you do not charge him with adoration as well as with elevation.

(Mr. Stephens.) I want to refer to the "Hymnal Noted," for the purpose of showing the practical meaning of the word "elevation."

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not object to my friend referring to the "Hymnal Noted," but I object to his statement that this is used at St. Albans.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is no evidence of it.

(Mr. Stephens.) This is the "Hymnal Noted," published by Mr. Palmer.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are perfectly aware that it is not proved that it is used at St. Albans. You can prove it if you like. There is plenty of time to prove it, if you like to do so?

(Mr. Stephens.) I need not take the trouble of proving it. I only use the book to illustrate what is meant by the word "elevation." That is the way in which I propose to use it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am quite willing to hear you at any length to which you like to go?

(Mr. Stephens.) I am much indebted to your Lordship.

In this "Hymnal Noted," there are 12 Hymns on the Eucharist Nos. 211-222, and all except No. 220 are to be found either verbatim or in a different translation from the same Latin Original, in the "Crown of Jesus," a Roman Catholic book of devotions with which I have no doubt your Lordship is familiar.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I never saw it in my life.

(Mr. Stephens.) I beg your Lordship's pardon. This is a Roman Catholic Book of Devotions recommended by Cardinal Wiseman and other Roman Catholic archbishops and bishops.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have no connexion with Cardinal Wiseman or the other bishops.

(Mr. Stephens.) I will then give your Lordship a short abstract of this valuable publication. In the "Hymnal Noted," which I hold in my hand, Nos. 211, 212, 213, and 216 are to be found in the "Crown of Jesus," at pages 662, 663, 652, and 664. They are all in the "Crown of Jesus," appropriated to the Exposition of and Benediction with the Reserved Sacrament. Nos. 218 and 219, in The Hymnal Noted, will be found in the "Crown of Jesus," at pages 649 and 651, and are appropriated to a procession of the Sacrament. In the St. Albans Hymnal, No. 214, will be found at page 2 of the "Crown of Jesus," and is part of an act of spiritual communion addressed to "the Saviour present within the tabernacle on the altar," and to which an indulgence of 100 days is promised. Nos. 215 and 217 in the St. Albans Hymnal correspond with the hymns in the "Crown of Jesus," pages 587 and 586. Those are hymns to the Sacrament. Nos. 221 and 222 in the St. Albans Hymnal will be found at pages 181 and 182 in the "Crown of Jesus" at Hearing Mass.

Now, my Lord, I will read the first verse of No. 215, at page 223 of the Hymnal Noted :

"Hail, Thou living Bread from Heaven,
Sacrament of awful might!
I adore Thee—I adore Thee
Every moment, day and night."

I submit, my Lord, that that language wherever it is to be found, is in direct violation of the 28th Article, not only in spirit but in the letter.

In No. 216 of the "Hymnal Noted," page 223,—

"Prostrate I adore Thee, Deity unseen,
Who Thy glory hidest, 'neath these shadows mean."

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not like to interrupt, but I cannot see the connexion between this and the charge of elevation.

(Dean of the Arches.) I see none, but if Mr. Stephens likes to make it part of his argument he can do so.

(Mr. Stephens.) What is the reason of "elevation" as laid down in Lyndwood? "Ut populus illud adoret," and I make these hymns part of my observations to show the meaning that is attached to "elevation" by the congregation at St. Albans! It is impossible to deny that these hymns in their primary and literal meaning involve: first, the doctrine of transubstantiation; secondly, the adoration of the elements; doctrines contrary to the formularies of the Church of England. This is not surprising, because these hymns, as I have mentioned to your Lordship, were for the use of the Church of Rome which holds those doctrines.

Adjourned to to-morrow at 10 o'clock.

THIRD DAY.

Friday, December 6, 1867.

(Mr. Stephens.) Your Lordship did me the favour yesterday of directing my attention to the statement that Mr. Mackonochie had discontinued the practice of elevation since 1866. That is the elevation above the head.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes.

(Mr. Stephens.) I will now direct your Lordship's attention to the third article.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Read the article.

(Mr. Stephens.) I will do so. I had prepared an abstract to save the time of the Court. The 3rd Article is, "That the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie has in his said church, and within two years last past (to wit, on Sunday the 23rd day of December, on Christmas Day last past, and on Sunday the 30th day of December, all in "the year of our Lord 1866), during the Prayer of Consecration, in the order of the administration of the Holy Communion, elevated the paten above his head, and permitted and sanctioned such elevation; and taken into his hands the cup, and elevated it above his head during the Prayer of Consecration aforesaid; and permitted and sanctioned the cup to be so taken and elevated; and knelt or prostrated himself before the consecrated elements during the Prayer of Consecration, and permitted and sanctioned such kneeling or prostrating by other clerks in Holy Orders."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the recital; and it goes on in the 4th paragraph, "That such elevation of the paten, and such taking and elevation of the cup, and such kneeling and prostrating,

“ are severally unlawful additions to and variations from the form and order prescribed and appointed by the said statutes and by the said Book of Common Prayer and administration of the sacraments and other rites and ceremonies of the Church and are contrary to the said statutes, and to the said 14th, 36th and 38th of the said constitutions and canons, and also to an Act of Parliament passed in a session of Parliament holden in the 13th year of Queen Elizabeth, Chapter 12, and to the 25th and 28th of the Articles of Religion herein referred to.” Now read the 3rd Article of the Plea. You need not read the earlier part of it reciting your charge.

(Mr. Stephens.) That is in the 3rd paragraph of the Responsive Allegations.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Go to the words “ Now the same is in part untruly pleaded.”

(Mr. Stephens.) “ For the party proponent alleges that whilst he admits that the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie did on the said two Sundays and on Christmas Day during the Prayer of Consecration kneel, and sanction kneeling by other clerks before the Lord’s table, he denies that his said party did, on the said two Sundays and on the said Christmas Day, kneel or prostrate himself before the consecrated elements, or permit and sanction such kneeling or prostration by other clerks in holy orders, as in the 3rd article pleaded: And he further alleges that whilst he admits that he did, on the said two Sundays and Christmas Day in the said 3rd article mentioned, elevate and sanction the elevation by other clerks of the paten and cup above his head, as in the said 3rd article pleaded, yet that such elevation of the paten and cup has been wholly discontinued by the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie during the administration of the Holy Communion ever since the said 30th day of December 1866, and long prior to the institution of this suit. That such practice was discontinued in consequence of legal advice, and in compliance with the expressed wish of the Lord Bishop of the diocese of London and with a resolution of Convocation, as was well known to the promoter of this suit before he instituted the same.” Does your Lordship wish me to read any more?

(The Dean of the Arches.) No. That is the answer. We have got the charge and the answer now.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I ask whether my learned friend admits the allegation that the practice has been discontinued as stated in the answer.

(Mr. Stephens.) What I have stated is, that the elevation of the paten and the cup above the head of the minister was discontinued at the end of 1866.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That is to say, the 30th of December.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, immediately anterior to the 1st of January 1867.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Very well.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is admitted by the counsel for the promoter of the office of the Judge on this occasion that this peculiar kind of elevation, namely, the elevation above the head, was discontinued after the 30th of December 1866, and no more is admitted.

(Mr. Stephens.) I was about to state that Mr. Mackonochie, at the time of discontinuing the elevation of the paten and cup, and the censuring of persons and things, issued an address to his parishioners, explaining why he discontinued such practices. There can be no doubt as to that address, because it is annexed to the articles.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I suppose it is not disputed that that is the address of Mr. Mackonochie.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord, certainly not.

(Mr. Stephens.) In this address Mr. Mackonochie states that he discontinued these practices under protest; that he believes them to be legal, and the right of the congregation, and that he cannot regard their relinquishment as more than temporary.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Have you got a loose copy of the address there? (A copy was handed to the Court.)

(Mr. Stephens.) If your Lordship will turn to page 2, seven lines from the end of the page, commencing with the word “ Moreover,” after referring to the Report of the Committee of the Lower House of Convocation, and to the legal opinion obtained by the English Church Union, Mr. Mackonochie states:—“ Moreover, just before the appearance of the legal opinion, our bishop in his charge appealed to us to consider what appears to him the error of our course, referring especially to the then expected legal opinion. All these considerations (but especially the wish of the bishop and the opinion of Convocation) have moved me, after consultation with other parish priests, to make such alterations as will bring our service into harmony with the expressed wishes of the Lower House of Convocation. These will consist in discontinuing the use of incense for ‘ censuring persons and things,’ and in discontinuing the elevation of the blessed sacrament as at present practised. I must tell you, for your own satisfaction, that the less obtrusive elevation indicated in the words of the Prayer Book, “ Here the priest is to take the paten into his hand,” and “ Here he is to take the cup into his hand,” is quite sufficient for the ritual purpose, that, namely, of making the oblation of the holy sacrifice to God. The use of incense will now be discontinued at the introit, gospel, and offertory. Before the consecration prayer the censer will be brought in. At the consecration incense will be put into it by the thurifer, but it will not be used, as at present, for ‘ censuring persons and things.’ This is a mode of using incense allowed by the ecclesiastical opinion, and not disallowed by the legal one. I give them up under protest,”—[your Lordship will find that the words “ under protest” are in a different type from the rest of the page]—“ in deference to the remonstrance of the bishop, and the expressed wish of the Lower House of Convocation; but personally, I believe, as I believed then, that they are legal, and your right. I must add, that I cannot regard their relinquishment as more than temporary.”

If Mr. Mackonochie had admitted that the practices he discontinued were illegal, and had promised that they would be permanently discontinued, there might have been some hardship in taking proceedings against him; but Mr. Mackonochie asserts that those practices of which we complain are legal, that they are the right of his congregation, and he has taken issue with us upon their legality.

I have no doubt my learned friends will comment upon this in their reply, in order to prove the hardship of the present proceedings against Mr. Mackonochie; but your Lordship will bear in mind that we ask for no punishment of Mr. Mackonochie beyond that of admonition.

It would be an idle waste of your Lordship’s time if I were to enter into a discussion as to whether Mr. Mackonochie, by the publication of the address to his parishioners, has condoned his offence. If a clergyman for a series of years has been guilty of illegal practices, and the very moment he hears that proceedings are about to be instituted against him for such illegalities, writes an address such as the defendant in this case has done, it would be absurd to contend that that would be a condonation of his offence. Such a defence would be exactly worth the price of this address, namely, one penny.

With your permission, my Lord, I will now resume my argument in reference to the question of Elevation, which will, I trust, be concluded in the course of a very short period of time. May I respectfully solicit your Lordship to read the notes of the evidence of the Reverend Mr. Malin? Your Lordship is aware, that in making this application the notes of Counsel are of no authority, and that the highest authority are the notes of the Judge.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The Rev. Henry Malin said "he lived at Blackheath, and he attended St. Alban's Church. He was there on the 30th of December and the 13th of January last. Mackonochie did not consecrate on the 13th of January; he was present assisting at the altar. Immediately after the consecration of the bread, there was a pause; the paten was elevated above the head of the consecrating clerk" (I think he said "clergyman" and I took it down as "clerk" for a shorter word). "Some of the clergy were already kneeling, and they threw their bodies forward. This was in the middle of the pause. The consecrating clerk afterwards knelt. This was in the middle of the prayer. Mackonochie afterwards administered the cup. I am speaking of a year ago. After kneeling he went on with the rest of the prayer. It was a very appreciable or perceptible time, a decidedly marked pause. He did the same with respect to the chalice, elevated it above his head, with the same prostration afterwards. The elevation was after the act of consecration."

(Mr. Stephens.) That is sufficient, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) "The chalice was placed on the table." I must read the cross-examination by Mr. Frideaux. "I feel sure it was almost contemporaneously, not precisely immediately afterwards; and so with the cup, it was a similar act, I believe I was kneeling, I am not certain; it is my practice when not assisting to kneel during the prayer of consecration. Of course I kneel when I communicate. I kneel when I celebrate myself, receiving the sacred elements. There was a somewhat excessive bend forward—a very excessive bending forward." Then he says, in answer to a question that I put to him, whether the face was prostrated so as to touch the ground, "I cannot say; I was some way behind them all the time."

(Mr. Stephens.) I am much indebted to your Lordship.

In the Responsive Allegation, paragraph 3, Mr. Mackonochie admits kneeling before the Lord's table during the prayer of consecration; he denies kneeling or prostrating himself before the consecrated elements; but from the evidence taken on Wednesday it appears, that kneeling took place after the elements had been consecrated.

Whatever may be the object of that kneeling, it was an additional ceremony not prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer. I care not for the object as regards the purposes of this immediate argument. Throughout the Prayer Book, and especially throughout the Communion service, there are express provisions as to the minister's attitude, directing when he is to stand, when he is to kneel, when he is to turn to the people, and when he is to turn to the Communion table. Therefore, if the Legislature had intended that the minister should kneel or prostrate himself, or stand up again, at other parts of the communion service, it would have been expressly directed.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are arguing upon this part as to these directions (it is necessary that I should understand it), as to the position of the clergyman kneeling, standing, and so on. Are you arguing that they are obligatory or directory, because there is a distinction between the two?

(Mr. Stephens.) What I am arguing is this, that they are not discretionary, but obligatory.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Not merely directions, but obligatory.

(Mr. Stephens.) When an Act of Parliament says anything shall be done, it is obligatory, and it is not left to the discretion of any man, be he whom he may, to deviate from the strict language of the statute law.

I will respectfully direct your Lordship's attention to the rubric belonging to the prayer immediately before the consecration prayer in the office of the communion: "Then shall the priest, kneeling down at the Lord's table, say in the name of all them that shall receive the communion this prayer following." The rubric before the consecration prayer is, "When the priest standing before the table hath so ordered the bread and wine." Here the Priest is to stand before the table, and there is no subsequent direction in the consecration prayer for him to kneel.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Of course your argument is that, as there is no subsequent direction, he has no option.

(Mr. Stephens.) Of course, my Lord, no option; that is to say, with regard to kneeling during the consecration prayer.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say that would be contrary to the rubric.

(Mr. Stephens.) Clearly, my Lord. Whatever Mr. Mackonochie's motive for this ceremony of kneeling during the consecration prayer may be, it is undoubtedly susceptible of the interpretation that it is done for the purpose of adoration. How strictly the leading Reformers of the Protestant Church were opposed to kneeling, or otherwise directing any adoration towards the consecrated elements, appears from the passage which I am going to read from Archbishop Cranmer's Works on the Lord's Supper. It is from the Parker Society's edition, and is entitled "The Works of Archbishop Cranmer on the Lord's Supper." I am now proposing to read an extract from page 38: "Thus our Saviour Christ, like a most loving pastor and saviour of our salvation, hath given us warning beforehand of the perils and dangers that were to come, and to be wise and ware that we should not give credit unto such teachers as would persuade us to worship a piece of bread, to kneel to it, to nod to it, to creep to it, to follow it in procession, to lift up our hands to it, to offer lighted candles to it, to shut it up in a chest or box, to do all other honour to it that we do unto God; having always this pretence or excuse for our idolatry, 'Behold, here is Christ.'"

I will now, my Lord, proceed to the second charge, namely, the use of lighted candles during daylight.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then the discussion upon elevation may be considered to be closed.

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly, my Lord.

I submit to your Lordship, as my first proposition, that lighted candles on the holy table during divine service, when not required for the purpose of giving light, are illegal, and that they have not been authorized by the Acts of Uniformity.

For a considerable period of time lighted candles during daylight have been intimately connected with the rites of the Roman Catholic Church; and before the Reformation, when mass was performed, the use of lighted candles and of tapers universally prevailed.

In Rock's Hierurgia, page 41, will be found a mystic signification given of the lights of the mass: "In the holy sacrifice of the mass the Christian has the most abundant cause imaginable for joy. The altar then becomes the throne of God made man, and angels and cherubims surround it in prostrate adoration. The Church, in her primitive days, to manifest her lively glowing faith and joyfulness, produced this emblem of lights. She still continues to retain their use. While these wax tapers, therefore, proclaim our exultation for the actual presence of our blessed Redeemer, they typify the light and glory of the Gospel diffused throughout the world by that Orient from on high, Christ Jesus."

I intend, in reference to the use of lights immediately before the Reformation, to state to your Lordship several propositions. I do not refer to all the authorities and to the various canons in support of those propositions, for this reason,—that it would occupy a considerable portion of time; and I merely do so, as introductory of the Injunctions of 1547.

It is necessary to distinguish between the different modes in which lights were used.

The lights required at the mass, and the lights burnt before the reserved sacrament and before relics and images, were altogether distinct. The lights required at mass were enjoined in the Sarum missal, like the lights at baptism; and when the Sarum missal was superseded by the Prayer Book omitting any directions as to tapers, and taper bearers, these ceremonies became illegal.

But the lights referred to in King Edward's Injunctions were lights burnt before the reserved sacrament. The object of King Edward's Injunctions was to prohibit all other lights before the sacrament except the two lights before the reserved sacrament. If the Injunctions of 1547 referred to the lights at mass, it would have been a complete alteration of the existing practice of having lights held by acolytes,—a practice which was enjoined by the Sarum missal,—what would have been the result? It would have been a prohibition of the use of lights.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Are you now on the first set of the Injunctions?

(Mr. Stephens.) No, I have not come to them. I am only making some prefatory observations respecting lighted candles before the Reformation.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I understand.

(Mr. Stephens.) If your Lordship at any subsequent period wishes me to argue the question in extenso of the different kinds of lights, I am perfectly ready to do so.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I quite understand your argument. It appears there were two sets of lights, one burnt before the images, and the other before the holy elements.

(Mr. Stephens.) I will now discuss the effect of the Injunctions of 1547. Edward VI. came to the throne on the 28th of January 1547, and the first Book of Common Prayer was not agreed upon until January 1549. In the first year of his reign, certain Ecclesiastical Ordinances or Injunctions were issued, by which, inter alia, it was directed "that all deans, archdeacons, parsons, vicars, and other ecclesiastical persons shall faithfully keep and observe" the Injunctions, &c., and the 3rd article of these Injunctions directs that they "shall suffer from henceforth no torches or candles, tapers or images of wax, to be set afore any image or picture, but only two lights upon the high altar before the Sacrament" (1 Cardwell's Doc. Ann., pages 5, 7).

Your Lordship will, perhaps, bear in mind the words, "two lights upon the high altar before the sacrament." There are two conditions for these lights: first, they must be upon the high altar; and, secondly, they must be before the sacrament, that is, before the reserved sacrament, "which, for the signification that Christ is the very true light of the world, they shall suffer to remain still."

In order to carry out the language of this Injunction the lights depended upon the existence of the altar and the presence of the sacrament. When altars were abolished, and when reservation was abolished, and the Sacrament consequently was not present, what was the result? Why that the lights were ipso facto abolished. That "before the sacrament" in these Injunctions of 1547 means the reserved sacrament, appears from comparing their language with that of the Injunctions issued in the reign of Henry VIII. And I may say parenthetically that this language corresponds substantially with the 7th article of the Injunctions of 1538.

In 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 5, the King says, "That part of them were given unto them heretofore by authority of his most dearly beloved father King Henry VIII. of famous memory." What does that paragraph allude to? it alludes to Cromwell's Injunctions of 1536 and 1538; and it may not be unimportant cursorily to consider their general object and effect.

The directions in the Injunctions of 1547, respecting the two lights, were taken from the Injunctions of Cromwell; in fact the greatest part of the Injunctions of 1547 were only a repetition of the Injunctions that had been issued in the reign of Henry VIII., when Cromwell was vicegerent of his ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

At the time when Cromwell's Injunctions were issued, namely, in 1536-38, the doctrine of the Church was defined by the Articles set out by Convocation, and published by the King's authority in 1536. The Formularies of Faith, at page 11 (I am quoting from the Oxford edition of 1825), enunciated the doctrine of the corporal presence. The two sets of Injunctions issued by Cromwell in 1536 and 1538 are to be found in the 5 Foxe's Actes and Monuments (pages 165, 168, edition 1838). The Injunctions of 1538 are likewise to be found in 4 Burnet's History of the Reformation (p. 101, Nares' edition).

With regard to the Injunctions of 1547, the first 19 of them are substantially repetitions of the Injunctions of 1536 and 1538. The 3rd Injunction of 1547 substantially corresponds with the 7th Injunction of 1538 respecting lights. In the 5th vol. of Foxe's Actes and Monuments, page 169, and at the 4th paragraph, your Lordship will find this language: "shall suffer from henceforth no candles, tapers, or images of wax to be set before any images or pictures, but only the light that commonly goeth about the cross of the church by the rood-loft, and the light before the sacrament of the altar, and the light about the sepulchre." Your Lordship will perhaps notice the words, "the light before the sacrament of the altar." Can anything be more clear than that language?

(The Dean of the Arches.) It goes on, "which, for the adorning of the church and divine service, ye shall suffer to remain."

(Mr. Stephens.) I only stopped where I did because I was merely discussing what was the meaning of the "altar," and the meaning of the two lights.

The language in the Injunctions of 1547 respecting the lights is to be found in the Injunctions in the reign of Henry VIII., and at the time when the corporal presence was held.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say these lights were connected with the doctrine of the corporal presence.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, and I prove it by reference to these Injunctions.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I quite understand.

(Mr. Stephens.) I submit that the lights before the sacrament in the Injunctions of 1547 correspond with the lights "before the sacrament of the altar" in the Injunctions of Cromwell. It has been denied by a gentleman whose work I have not got here, but I may mention his name, Mr. Chambers.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I have his book here,—"Chambers' Lights before the Altar."

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are very rash, Mr. Prideaux.

(Mr. Stephens.) The Injunctions of Cromwell only allowed one light before the sacrament, but "the light" does not necessarily mean a single candle or lamp; in fact the "light across the rood-loft," the "light of the cross or rood-loft," and "the light about the sepulchre," which are mentioned in these Injunctions, did not consist each of a single candle or lamp.

The Injunctions of Edward VI., it is thought, must necessarily be anti-Roman; that is the hypothesis. But what is the real state of the case? Why, that in 1547 the Act of the Six Articles; and the unreformed mass, including elevation and adoration of the host, were in force. Hence in ordering the removal of candles from before images and shrines in aisles and side chapels, it was only sought to concentrate candle worship "upon the high altar before the sacrament," "where for a time longer they were to be suffered to remain still."

In Moore, page 166, the Judicial Committee in Liddell and Westerton say, "The object of these Injunctions appears to have been to abolish the worship

“ or superstitious veneration of images and relics ; but they left entirely untouched the service of high mass, and made no declaration as to the nature of the Sacrament then administered.”

It was not competent in 1547, at the time these Injunctions were issued, for the Crown to have abolished the lights before the Sacrament. The Injunctions of 1547 were in some respects, strange as it may appear, more Popish in their character than the Injunctions of 1538.

I will now refer to the 5th volume of Foxe's Actes and Monuments, page 168. The 3rd Injunction of 1538 directs, “ That ye shall discourage no man privily or apertly from the reading or hearing of the said Bible, but shall expressly provoke, stir, and exhort every person to read the same, as that which is the very lively Word of God, that every Christian person is bound to embrace, believe, and follow if he look to be saved ; admonishing them, nevertheless, to avoid all contention and altercation therein, and to use an honest sobriety in the inquisition of the true sense of the same, and to refer the explication of the obscure places to men of higher judgment in Scripture.”

The 7th Injunction of 1547, (1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 9,) directs, that the clergy shall discourage no man authorised and licensed thereunto from the reading of any part of the Bible, “ either in Latin or English.” The words in the Injunctions of 1547, “ authorised and licensed thereunto,” were introduced in obedience to the directions of the 34th and 35th of Henry VIII., chapter 1, section 2, which prohibited women and the lower classes of men from reading the Bible. In fact, wherever we find priest-rule and priest-craft, every possible obstacle is raised against the laity reading the Bible.

I will now refer your Lordship to the 31st of Henry VIII., chapter 14. It will be found in the folio edition of the Statutes of the Realm, page 740. When the Injunctions of 1547 were issued, the “ Six Articles Act ” was in force, and under that Act the denial of transubstantiation was punishable by death. When the Injunctions of 1547 were issued, “ The necessary Doctrine and Erudition of a Christian man ” was in force by authority of Parliament. In the “ Formularies of Faith,” under the title of “ Sacrament of the Altar ”—(I am citing from the Oxford edition of 1825, at page 262)—this passage will be found, “ But in this most high sacrament of the altar, the creatures which be taken to the use thereof, as bread and wine, do not remain still in their own substance, but by the virtue of Christ's word in the consecration be changed and turned to the very substance of the body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ.”

This passage proves that transubstantiation was then the doctrine of the Church ; consequently Edward VI. could not by virtue of his prerogative have prohibited the placing of lights before the sacrament.

What was the object of these two lights upon the high altar before the sacrament ? It was a mode of showing adoration to the sacrament which had been previously adopted in showing adoration to images. That the reserved sacrament was at this time usually hung over the altar, appears from the demands made by the Devonshire rebels in 1549, and from the answer to them by Cranmer.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You will find it in Robertson's book.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes ; I have a reference to Robertson.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is in Cranmer's works, vol. 1, page 18, in an edition of Jenkins. That was in the year 1549.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord.

I propose to read some of the answers to the 15 articles of the Devonshire rebels in 1549. I refer for that purpose to Cranmer's Remains and Letters (page 172, Parker Society's edition). The 4th article is : “ We will have the sacrament hang over the “ high altar, and there to be worshipped, as it was wont to be ; and they which will not thereto consent, we will have them die like heretics against the holy Catholic Faith.” [Such, my Lord, was their religious toleration and Christian charity.]

“ What say you, oh ignorant in things pertaining to God ? Is this the holy Catholic faith, that the sacrament should be hanged over the altar and worshipped. And be they heretics that will not consent thereto ? I pray you, who made this faith ? Any other but the Bishops of Rome ? And that more than a thousand years after the faith of Christ was full and perfect ! Innocent III., about 1215 years after Christ, did ordain that the sacrament and chrisem should be kept under lock and key ; but yet no mention is made of hanging the sacrament over the high altar, nor of the worshipping of it. After him came Honorius III., and he added further, commanding that the Sacrament shall be devoutly kept in a clean place sealed, and that the priest should often teach the people reverently to bow down to the host when it was lifted up in the mass time”—[that is according to the use of S. Alban, my Lord,]—“ and when the priest should carry it to the sick folks. And although this Honorius added the worshipping of the sacrament, yet he made no mention of the hanging thereof over the high altar, as your article propoeth. Nor how long after or by what means that came first up into this realm, I think no man can tell. And in Italy it is not yet used until this day. And in the beginning of the Church it was not only not used to be hanged up, but it was also utterly forbid to be kept up.”

It is only by looking at the language of these Injunctions, and the Injunctions passed in the reign of Henry VIII., coupled with the Act of the Six Articles,—that we accurately ascertain the signification assigned to the lights with the sacrament upon the altar and in front of the sacrament there. The signification depends upon the connexion ; and if the connexion be wanting, the signification fails. In Stephens' Ecclesiastical Statutes (page 348), the meaning of the words “ before the sacrament ” may be further illustrated by referring to the statute of the 1st of Mary, session 2. c. 3.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What are you citing from ? Is it a note, or text, or what ?

(Mr. Stephens.) From the first volume of Stephens' Ecclesiastical Statutes, page 348.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the statute of Mary.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. I am referring your Lordship to chapter 3. section 4. “ Or if any person or persons at any time or times after the said 20th day of December shall contemptuously, unlawfully, or maliciously, of their own power or authority, pull down, deface, spoil, abuse, break, or otherwise irreverently handle or order, the most blessed, comfortable, and holy sacrament of the body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ, commonly called the sacrament of the altar, being or that shall be in any church or chapel, or in any other decent place, or the pix or canopy wherein the same sacrament is or shall be.”

The sacrament here spoken of must be the reserved wafer, as it is spoken of as in a pix under a canopy. In Cranmer's Remains, (Parker Society's Edition, p. 154,) your Lordship will find that his Grace issued Visitation Articles some time after Easter, in 1548.

These Visitation Articles are, for the most part, founded on the King's Injunction of 1547. But Cranmer likewise acts upon the proclamation as to fasting ; the proclamation and letter as to lights on Candlemas day, ashes and palms ; the letter directing all images to be removed ; and the new order of communion.

I will now refer your Lordship to 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 51.

(Mr. Stephens.) They do. But I am proposing to quote from page 49. Your Lordship told me it would be convenient if I cited the page of the work from which I made the quotation.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is a great convenience, no doubt.

(Mr. Stephens.) I now intend to cite from Archbishop Cranmer's Enquiries, at page 51: "Whether ye suffer any torches, candles, tapers, or any other lights to be in your churches, but only two lights upon the high altar?" It may seem strange that the words "before the sacrament" should be omitted; but lights were never placed except before images or relics, or before the sacrament; and, as all images were now taken out of the churches, the King's Injunctions could only be disobeyed either by having lights before the sacrament in other parts of the church, or by having more than two lights upon the high altar before the sacrament. The words, "before the sacrament," therefore, became unnecessary.

The Visitation Articles that were issued immediately after the first Act of Uniformity are very important in their character respecting the use of lighted candles; and it will be found, that not the slightest pretence exists for saying that the prelates, when exercising their judicial and episcopal functions, recognised the legality of such lights after the enactment of the first Book of Common Prayer.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say not after the first Book of Common Prayer of Edward the Sixth?

(Mr. Stephens.) I assert that the prelates, when exercising their judicial or purely episcopal functions, did not, during the reign of Edward VI., recognise the legality of "lighted candles" after the enactment of the first Book of Common Prayer. And the like observation applies to all the Visitation Articles that have been issued since the reign of Mary, down to the present time.

In 1549, Injunctions were issued by the King's visitors, which was after the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. I now propose to read the first section of those Injunctions, "That all parsons, vicars, and curates omit in the reading of the Injunctions all such as make mention of the Popish mass, of chantries, of candles upon the altar, or any other such like thing." 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 74.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What Injunctions are referred to there?

(Mr. Stephens.) The Injunctions that were issued in the third of Edward VI. The title says, "That all parsons," &c., "omit in the reading of the Injunctions."

(The Dean of the Arches.) "Omit in the reading of the Injunctions;"—were those words in the Injunction?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. "Articles to be followed and observed." The Articles are from Johnson's Manuscripts, cited in Burnet's History of the Reformation.

(The Dean of the Arches.) My reference is that those words be omitted. I suppose, therefore, that those words were in the Injunctions?

(Mr. Stephens.) Of course. Those Injunctions were issued by the Crown or by the Council, they were then communicated to the Archbishop, who afterwards issued Articles in accordance with the Injunctions.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Those are the same Injunctions of 1547?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Not those requiring candles; the subsequent ones.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I had a little difficulty in reconciling the two. As I understood, those Articles you are now reading were issued in 1549; and the words are, "That all persons omit in the reading of the Injunctions" such and such things. I want to know what Injunctions those were. You say the Injunctions of 1547?

(Mr. Stephens.) Those were the Injunctions of 1547.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Were they?

(Mr. Stephens.) That is what I believe.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I think there can be no doubt, my Lord, that the Injunctions referred to in the paragraph that my friend has just read mean the Injunctions of 1547. I think there can be no doubt about that.

(Mr. Stephens.) Very well. Then you admit that?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes. There can be no doubt about it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I follow the argument now.

(Mr. Stephens.) I will read the note of Cardwell upon this article. "Articles to be followed. Instructions given in charge to the visitors on a new royal visitation, and differing in some respects from the former Injunctions. For instance, in the Injunctions (No. 2), and in Cranmer's Articles founded upon them (No. X.), two lights were allowed upon the high altar. In these Articles it is forbidden that there should be any 'candles upon the altar,' or 'any light upon the Lord's table at any time.' (See also Bishop Ridley's Injunctions (No. XXI.) and Burnet's History of the Reformation, vol. 2, page 209.) It is clear that these Articles were drawn up after the Act of Uniformity had passed (January 21, 1549), which enjoined that the new (the first) Book of Common Prayer should be used from the following Whit-Sunday; as may be shown, not only from the second, but also from the eighth Article, which was taken from the following rubric of that Book." Then it states the rubric, "The curate of every parish, once in six weeks at the least, upon warning by him given upon some Sunday or holy day, half an hour before evensong, openly in the church, instruct and examine so many children of his parish sent unto him as the time will serve, and as he shall think convenient, in some part of this Catechism."

(The Dean of the Arches.) You need not trouble yourself further. This omission in 1549 refers to the Injunctions of 1547?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord. I will, with permission of the Court, read the entire note. "But though issued after the publication of the Prayer Book these Articles are of the same year, and afford evidence of the contemporary practice in matters of rites and ceremonies. They prove, accordingly, that candles upon the Lord's table being especially mentioned (see Article 2) as not included among those ceremonies which were appointed in the Book of Common Prayer, are not among those ornaments which were in this Church of England by authority of Parliament in the 2nd year of King Edward VI." The 2nd section of the Injunctions of 1549 directs that there shall be no "setting any light upon the Lord's board at any time;" and enjoins the minister finally, to use no other ceremonies than are appointed in the King's Book of Common Prayer, or kneel otherwise than in the said Book."

It is therefore clear that in 1549 the "setting any light upon the Lord's board at any time," was illegal. And this omission in the Injunction respecting the lights likewise shows that, whatever sanction had been given to the lighted candles in 1547, was no longer in force.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes.

(Mr. Stephens.) And that the provisions in the first Book of Common Prayer had precluded the fulfilment of the Injunction of 1547.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Wait a moment, that is a larger proposition. I must take that down too. If I may use the expression, you say in fact the Injunctions of 1547 have been absorbed in the first Prayer Book.

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly, that is my contention; which, as your Lordship may perhaps bear in mind, was the spirit of the argument I ventured to address to your Lordship when discussing the provisions of the Acts of Uniformity.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Before you leave the subject altogether just let me have your opinion as to the legal authority of those Injunctions of 1547; whether they had legal authority or not. You may give me your opinion upon that any time before you leave this subject.

(Mr. Stephens.) If I correctly understand your Lordship, you wish me to go into an argument upon the effect of the Proclamation Act.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not, indeed. I only wish your opinion as to whether these Injunctions of 1547 had legal authority, or whether they were Injunctions issued by the Crown without legal authority.

(Mr. Stephens.) The Injunctions of 1547 never had any statutable authority.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is what I want to know your mind upon. You say then they were merely directions of the Crown.

(Mr. Stephens.) Merely directions, and as such they could have no statutable authority.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That was the opinion of Dr. Lushington.

(Mr. Stephens.) It was.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Now do not let me trouble you any further. Go on with your argument, Mr. Stephens.

(Mr. Stephens.) The word "finally" in this Injunction is a summing up of the preceding prohibitions, and we learn what were considered ceremonies not appointed by the Book of Common Prayer.

I will now deal with the Injunctions of 1550, in order to show the construction that was placed upon the Act of Uniformity, and upon the Injunctions of 1547.

In 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 93—

(The Dean of the Arches.) That would be Ridley's Injunction for the visitation of London. I think it is 82 in my own edition of Cardwell's.

(Mr. Stephens.) It is page 93, in the edition of Cardwell I am quoting from, at which place will be found the Injunctions issued by Bishop Ridley in 1550.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, I quite see your argument.

(Mr. Stephens.) The first paragraph says, "that there be no reading of such Injunctions as extolth and setteth forth the Popish mass, candles, images, chantries, neither that there be used any superlataries or trentals of communions." And then, my Lord, towards the end of the next article, it prohibits, "shewing the sacrament openly before the distribution, or making any elevation thereof, ringing of the sacring bell, or setting any light upon the Lord's board." And it directs "finally that the minister in time of the Holy Communion do use only the ceremonies and gestures appointed by the Book of Common Prayer, and none other, so that there do not appear in them any counterfeiting of the Popish mass." Here we have an express prohibition as to the setting of any light upon the Lord's board, and in direct connection with the first Act of Uniformity of Edward VI.

(The Dean of the Arches.) They were the same Injunctions that ordered the taking down of the stone altars.

(Mr. Stephens.) I will now refer your Lordship to the later writings of Bishop Hooper, page 127, Parker Society's edition.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What year did he write them in?

(Mr. Stephens.) In 1551.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Between the two Prayer Books?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord. And I now propose to quote from the 40th Article: "that you do not read any such Injunctions as extolth and setteth forth the Popish mass, candles images, chantries, and such like."

(The Dean of the Arches.) This is the Visitation Articles of Gloucester.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord. What can be a clearer exposition of the contemporanea expositio, than the writings of Bishop Hooper? For to have lighted candles upon the Lord's table during the communion service, would have been a ceremony; and if it were a ceremony established by Act of Parliament, the bishop would have had no right to interfere with it. The 41st Article is in stronger language: "That none of you do counterfeit the Popish mass in blessing the Lord's Board." And then, my Lord, in shewing "the sacrament openly before the distribution of the same, or making any elevation thereof, ringing the sacring bell, or setting any light upon the Lord's Board." If these lights had any authority it was not probable that Bishop Hooper would have issued these Injunctions; their legality would have been immediately disputed.

Under the Articles of 1549, specifying what is to be omitted, will be found (1) chantries, (2) the Popish mass, (3) images, and (4) candles upon the altar. Chantries were abolished on the 4th November 1547, by the 1st Edward VI., cap. 14. This Act by implication repealed the 35th Injunction of Edward VI.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Which never had any legal authority.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That is what my friend says.

(Mr. Stephens.) What I respectfully stated to your Lordship was, that they had not statutable authority. And if they had statutable authority, the first Act of Uniformity operated as a repealing Act. The reason is obvious, because they were inconsistent with the first Act of Uniformity, and I challenge my friends on the opposite side, when they come to reply, to prove that these Injunctions of 1547 had any statutable authority.

I will now proceed to direct your Lordship's attention to 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 20, section 35; "That all chantry priests shall exercise themselves in teaching youth to read and write, and bringing them up in good manners and other virtuous exercises." Consequently, in the Articles of the King's Visitors in 1549; in the Injunctions of Ridley in 1550; and in the Articles of Bishop Hooper of 1551;—the clergy were properly directed when they read the Injunctions of 1547, to omit all those parts of them which related to chantries.

The King's visitors, Ridley and Hooper, were also right in directing the omission of such of the Injunctions of 1547 as made mention of the Popish mass, which had been abolished by the first Act of Uniformity. Again, Bishops Ridley and Hooper were equally right in directing the omission of any injunctions relating to images; because we find in 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 48, that an order had been issued by the King's Council in February 1547-8, directing, "That all the images remaining in any church or chapel within your diocese be removed and taken away." The King's Visitors in 1549, and Bishops Ridley and Hooper were equally right in directing the omission in the reading of the Injunctions of 1547 of all such as made mention of candles upon the altar, that is, of the Injunction for "two lights upon the high altar before the sacrament;" for the following reasons, (1) the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. did not mention lighted candles upon the altar. It would therefore be an additional and unauthorized ceremony, and—

(The Dean of the Arches.) Not an unauthorized ornament, but an unauthorized ceremony.

(Mr. Stephens.) The contention in the case is not about ornaments. It is exclusively upon Rites and Ceremonies,—standing upon quite a different basis from ornaments.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I quite understand.

(Mr. Stephens.) (2) The reservation of the sacrament was virtually prohibited by Edward's first book. (The office of the "Communion of the Sick," Liturgies of Edward VI. page 141.)

(Mr. Prideaux.) Will you kindly give me the name of the book you are quoting from?

(Mr. Stephens.) Liturgical Services of Edward VI., page 141. I have no objection to give you every information.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am quite sure of that. Then, perhaps, now you will kindly give me the two Acts of Parliament that enforce the Irish Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Now I object entirely to any negotiations between you, Mr. Stephens, and Mr. Prideaux, because the Court suffers.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My friend kindly said he would give me any reference I required.

(Mr. Stephens.) It was only to carry out your Lordship's wish.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes; but there is a third power concerned, who is very much interested in keeping the peace.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am quite sure my friend will give me every information; he has said so.

(Mr. Stephens.) I will give you every information respecting the Church in England, of which you require a great deal.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am much obliged to you.

(Mr. Stephens.) I will now direct your Lordship's attention to page 85 in conjunction with page 141. The reservation of the sacrament was virtually prohibited by Edward's first book. That is at page 85 of the Liturgies. The minister was not allowed to reserve any of the consecrated bread and wine, except for the purpose of administering it to the sick on the same day.

That the Protestant reformers did not approve of lighted candles at noon-day at the time of Edward's first book appears very plainly from Bishop Latimer's sermon of the Plough. I am now citing from the sermons of Bishop Latimer, page 70 of the Parker Society's edition. This sermon was preached on the 15th January 1548-9, the day on which the first Act of Uniformity was read the third time in the House of Lords. The bishop says, "Where the devil is resident, and hath his plough going, there away with books and up with candles, away with Bibles and up with beads; away with the light of the gospel, and up with the light of candles; yea, at noon-day. Where the devil is resident, that he may prevail, up with, all superstition and idolatry, censuring, painting of images, candles, palms, ashes, holy water, and new service of man's inventing, as though man could invent a better way to honour God with, than God himself hath appointed."

That lighted candles had been abolished in England in 1551, appears from the controversy in that year between Bishop Gardiner and Archbishop Cranmer. In 1548, Archbishop Cranmer put forth a catechism, which was in fact a translation of a catechism published in Germany by Justus Jonas, one of the principal Lutheran leaders. The original work had a frontispiece representing an altar with candles lighted.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That was the Lutheran practice to have candles on the altar.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. The frontispiece was omitted by Cranmer; but Gardiner, in a book written by him, and delivered to the King's Council on the 19th January 1550, and published by Gardiner in France and by Cranmer in England in 1551, comments upon it in terms which show that lighted candles had then been abolished in England.

I now refer to Cranmer's Lord's Supper, pp. 9, 226, and 227. At page 9 your Lordship will find "The title of the book of Stephen Gardiner, an explication and assertion of the true Catholick faith."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is "Cranmer's Lord's Supper" the title of the book you are quoting from?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, the Parker Society's edition: "An explication and assertion of the true Catholick faith touching the most blessed sacrament of the altar, with a confutation of a book written against the same." I must ask your Lordship to refer to page 226. Gardiner there says, "But with such matter he filleth his leaves and forgetteth himself, maketh mention of the catechism by him translate, the original whereof confuteth these two parts of this book in few words being printed in Germany; where, besides the matter written, is set forth in "picture the manner of the ministering of this sacrament. Where is the altar with candle-light set forth, the priest apparelled after the old sort, and the man to receive kneeling, bare-head and holding up his hands, while the priest ministereth the host to his mouth;—a matter as clear contrary to the matter of this book as is light and darkness." At page 201, "In this fourth book the author entreateth of the eating and drinking of Christ's body and blood, and in the first part thereof travaileth to confirm his purpose, and in the second part answereth as he can to his adversaries, and so taketh occasion to speak of adoration. His chief purpose is to prove that evil men receive not the body and blood of Christ in the sacrament." To this Cranmer replies at page 227 (Lord's Supper): "And as concerning the catechism I have sufficiently answered in my former book. But in this place may appear to them that have any judgment what pithy arguments you make, and what dexterity you have in gathering of authors' minds, that would gather any mind and make an argument here of a picture, neither put in my book nor of me devised, but invented by some fond painter or carver, which paint and grave whatsoever their idle hands can fancy. You should rather have gathered your argument upon the other side that I mislike the matter, because I left out of my book the picture that was in the original before."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Would you just tell me in one sentence the catechism he was referring to; what was it? Was it a Lutheran, a catechism sent from the continent to Cranmer, or what?

(Mr. Stephens.) A Lutheran catechism, and translated by Cranmer.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say the Lutheran catechism had this picture appended to it as a frontispiece.

(Mr. Stephens.) It had; but not in the edition which was published by Cranmer.

The book I am now proposing to cite from is 2 Strype's Cranmer (Memorials, pp. 46, 47). Strype says, of the grounds charged by Gardiner against Cranmer, that he in this catechism held "the corporal presence."—"The one was a picture that stood before the book, where was an altar with candles lighted, and the priest apparelled after the old sort, putting the wafer into the communicant's mouth. . . . But to both Cranmer, in his next book against Gardiner, made answer that as to the picture it was that set before the Dutch edition of the book, and so none of his doing; and that he afterwards caused the Popish picture to be altered into a picture representing Christ eating his last supper with his disciples."

May I be permitted to ask what did Cranmer "mislike," and what was deemed Popish in this rejected frontispiece? Can anyone doubt that it was the lighted candles; for there was nothing else?

I will now go to another branch of my argument, viz., the destruction of candlesticks. In the Church Review for 1866, pp. 219 and 265, are published the assignments of more than 130 Essex churches, in not one of which a candlestick or a censer is assigned for use in divine service. In the Church Review, page 375, are published more than 160 assignments to churches in Cambridge, which, with only one apparent exception, contain no assignment of a candlestick or a censer.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not wish to interrupt my friend, my Lord; and of course I desire that what your Lordship thinks proper to be commented upon should be commented upon; but it really does seem to me to be going a tremendous way to introduce assertions in a periodical for the purpose of proving various things that were done many many years ago.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You see this is a very peculiar case, and information is given to the Court from a great variety of sources. What weight I may attach to it by-and-by is another matter, but I do not think it necessary to shut out anything that Counsel may choose to bring before the Court in the way of authority from books.

(Mr. Pridcaux.) I am sure your Lordship will pardon me for calling your attention to this matter.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Quite so. There is no doubt that if we were to be very strict in this matter the opinions of periodical reviews would probably not be allowed by the Court to be introduced into the argument; but this is a case, as I have said before, of a very peculiar kind; and I am not disposed to shut out any information which the Counsel really think the Court ought to possess. I must, of course, trust, as we must always do, to the honorable relation which is understood to exist between Counsel and the Court that they will only bring forward such things as they really think necessary. What weight I may attach to it by-and-by is another matter.

(Mr. Pridcaux.) I assure you I have no desire to keep from your Lordship anything that you think may be of service.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Quite so; and it will be a very proper remark for you to make, by-and-by, as to what weight the Court should attach to it.

(Mr. Stephens.) Your Lordship is aware why I quote these assignments; namely, for the purpose of showing the contemporanea expositio.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Of course one understands the value of the argument of contemporanea expositio, and the bearing and meaning of the omission of these articles in the assignments upon them; one understands that perfectly well; but I presume the book you refer to, the Church Review, is not merely a statement, but gives authority for that statement.

(Mr. Stephens.) It gives authority.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I presume you would not otherwise cite it.

(Mr. Stephens.) Of course I should not cite it, if it were a mere dictum; clearly not. I believe these assignments to be a most valuable collection of documents.

(Mr. Droop.) Perhaps your Lordship will allow me to state that, as regards the Essex Inventories, I have referred to them to a certain extent, and have compared them with those printed in the Church Review; and I have found, so far as regards Essex, that these assignments appear to be correct. But of course proper evidence could be given of the documents themselves if necessary.

(The Dean of the Arches.) We shall see, by-and-by, what the bearing of these things will be; and in the meantime, Mr. Stephens, you had better proceed with your argument.

(Mr. Stephens.) The apparent exception of which I speak is the parish of Stuntney; and that is mentioned in the English Church Union case, page 53, as well as in page 375 of the Church Review. In this case there is no regular assignment; and instead of the inventory concluding, "All which parcels above written be delivered and committed, &c., to be at all times forthcoming to be answered, [except and reserved the aforesaid chalice, &c., (the articles assigned) delivered to — churchwardens for the only maintenance of divine service in the said parish.]" The Stuntney Inventory substituted for the words in brackets the following: "and to serve in the same chapel for the only maintenance of divine service there." Consequently the Stuntney Inventory made no distinction between what was delivered for use in the Church and what was delivered for safe custody.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I see here "one vest of green bandk;" what is that?

(Mr. Stephens.) I do not know what it is.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I suppose it is "horse Latin."

(Mr. Stephens.) My Lord, in the Church Review, page 376, you will find that the Manen inventory is in the same form, and the Clapton Inventory has no assignment.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And does the Church Review again agree with the Church Union case?

(Mr. Stephens.) There is no difference.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then there are two altar candlesticks in both?

(Mr. Stephens.) There are two altar candlesticks, but they are not assigned.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I hardly see the object for which they were introduced.

(Mr. Stephens.) That, my Lord, has really been a problem that I have not been able to solve.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I observe this for the first time, that this English Church Union case does refer to the book you are citing, the Church Review.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord, it does; and I am much obliged for that remark. I am now upon the Manen Inventory, and the Dutten Inventory, and neither of them contain candlesticks or censers. But the Manen Inventory contains a corporas and case; and both of them contain bells, articles not included in any Cambridgeshire assignment. In the Church Review, page 720, are published four other Cambridgeshire Inventories specifically mentioning altar candlesticks; and three of those also include censers; and yet in all such cases they are not included in the assignments.

These four inventories are published as the only Cambridgeshire Inventories besides Stuntney, which mention candlesticks in connexion with the altar. But the Church Review, page 688, states that candlesticks occur in an overwhelming majority of inventories.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is the date of this, 1551? I suppose they are different dates.

(Mr. Stephens.) Different dates.

(Mr. Droop.) It is July and August 1552.

(The Dean of the Arches.) These latter ones would be 1552. I do not mind about the months, but I want the year.

(Mr. Stephens.) The object is to show that before the second Act came into force—

(The Dean of the Arches.) I quite see your argument that they came between the first and second Act.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. I now refer to the Church Review, at page 746, which is in the sixth year of Edward VI. The Eastham Inventory contains the following memorandum: "Item, the vicar and his predecessors, time out of mind, found two lights with two small candlesticks upon the high altar, which he likewise challenged as his own, and had also the old wax after the lights were abrogated as things appertaining 'ad altaragium.'"

"After the lights were abrogated," refers, no doubt, to the promulgation of Edward's first book of 1549; especially as the next sentence is, "Item, the same took, cut, and destroyed the books of Popish service, after the new service was set forth, as monuments of superstition."

(The Dean of the Arches.) This purports to be an extract from the State Papers,—from the manuscript State Papers, I presume.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. So far as I can judge, this document contains a valuable collection of information upon the subject, and I have, with my friend Mr. Droop, carefully examined the entries.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Showing, according to your argument, two things; first, the de facto existence of these candles in the new inventory; and, secondly, the absence of their assignment when the matter was dealt with.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord; and in connection with the date to which your Lordship so kindly referred.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Quite so; in connection with the date between the first and second Prayer Books.

(Mr. Stephens.) I will now refer to the English Church Union case, page 56. We find there a table of articles assigned for the use of the parish of Bungay, in which it is alleged that not only candlesticks, but crosses, censers, and paxes, were included in the assignments. But in fact, the list in the Church Review, at pages 81, 113, and 171, though entitled "Assignments to Churches in Hampshire," are, as explained at page 218 of the Church Review, mere extracts from the inventories.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What volume of the Church Review are you quoting from?

The English Church Union case, at page 55, contains a table of articles alleged to be assigned for the use of the church in certain churches in Berkshire and Buckinghamshire. But, comparing the terms of the assignment with those of the Kent, Essex, and Cambridgeshire churches, it will be found, that the Commissioners had merely delivered the goods to the churchwardens for safe custody, without specifying which of them might be used in the service of the church,—just as in the Stuntney and Manen cases mentioned at page 688 of the Church Review.

(The Dean of the Arches.) These Commissioners had a discretion reposed in them as to what they would leave and what take away by the terms of the Commission, if I remember rightly.

(Mr. Stephens.) They had. They were to judge what was proper to be left.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Just so. So I thought.

(Mr. Stephens.) They, of course, would be bound by the provisions of the first Act of Uniformity.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The words of the Commission are of course important.

(Mr. Stephens.) I think your Lordship was referred to the language of the Commissioners yesterday.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes. I was only saying what was passing through my mind about that. I quite follow your argument; and one reference is as good as many for that purpose.

(Mr. Stephens.) I have placed these inventories in classes, in order to show what reliance can be placed on the statements in the Church Union case.

I beg now to refer your Lordship to the Injunctions of Elizabeth which were issued after the passing of the Act of Supremacy and the Act of Uniformity (statutes 1 Elizabeth, caps. 1 and 2). A copy of these Injunctions will be found in 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 210. Those Injunctions were issued to the clergy in June 1559; and they repeat most of Edward's Injunctions of 1547. But there is a very important alteration, viz., the Injunctions as to "abused images" and "the two lights upon the altar" were omitted.

(The Dean of the Arches.) As to the images and as to the lights.

(Mr. Stephens.) As to the two lights upon the altar. I do not wish in any part of my argument to disconnect the two lights from the "altar," or from "before the sacrament," when I am dealing with the Injunctions of 1547.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You said as to images and lights.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, I said as to abused images and the two lights on the altar, they were omitted. I believe I stated to your Lordship that the Injunctions of 1547 required that two lighted candles should be on the altar.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes.

(Mr. Stephens.) At page 221 of Cardwell's Documentary Annals, the 23rd Article states, "That they shall take away, utterly extinct and destroy, all shrines, coverings of shrines, all tables, candlesticks. . . ."

In the same volume, at page 242 in the Articles of Visitation which followed upon the Injunctions, the same clause is retained which was in the Injunctions of Edward; namely, "Whether in their churches and chapels all images, shrines, all tables, candlesticks, trindals, and rolls of wax, pictures, painting, and all other monuments of feigned and false miracles, pilgrimages, idolatry, and superstition be removed, abolished, and destroyed."

If the constituted authorities in the time of Elizabeth were desirous of having two lights upon the Holy Table as directed by the Injunctions of 1547, it seems inexplicable why in the Injunctions and in the Visitation Articles of 1559 there is no mention of them, when repeating almost verbatim clauses that stood in juxtaposition. The Injunctions of 1559 show that all the Injunctions directed to be omitted by the King's visitors Injunctions, Ridley and Hooper, were omitted by Elizabeth; while almost all the others were retained. Of the Injunctions of 1547, all, with the following 13 exceptions, were repeated without much alteration in the Injunctions of Elizabeth. These are the exceptions. No. 3 as to abused images and lights. The 27th as to the abuse of such ceremonies as holy water.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is not the 26th omitted?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes; but I am classifying them. The 4th, 9th, 19th, 21st, and the 36th, relating to the mass, confessions, or other Pre-Reformation services.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What happens to them? Are they retained?

(Mr. Stephens.) They are omitted in Elizabeth's Injunctions. The 34th respecting Henry VIII.'s primer. The 11th as to recantation of false doctrine. The 35th, as to chantry priests (abolished by the 1st Edward VI. cap. 14). The 6th, "That parsons, &c., should provide curates in their absence." The 26th, to which your Lordship directed my attention, providing that every dean, archdeacon, . . . "shall preach by himself, personally, twice every year at the least, either in the place where he is intitled or in some church where he has jurisdiction, or else which is to the said place appropriate or united." The 5th, exhorting fathers and mothers, &c., to bestow their children to learning, &c.

Thus, of the 36 Injunctions of 1547, 23 are substantially repeated in Elizabeth's Injunctions; and of the 13 omitted, all of them, with the exception of 5, 6, 11, and 26, appear to be omitted because they were inconsistent with the then existing law. The omission of the Injunctions as to lights from Elizabeth's Injunctions, though in most points her Injunctions so closely followed those of Edward VI., shows that it was not intended to revive that Injunction. It remains, therefore, wholly set aside by Mary, and not revived.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think part of your argument was, that there had been direct prohibition in some of the Injunctions as to these candles?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is no direct prohibition in these Injunctions of Elizabeth, but there was an omission.

(Mr. Stephens.) There was no direct prohibition; but there was no occasion for it, the Injunctions were not in force, and therefore there would be no occasion for a prohibition.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes. I only wanted to see what your argument was.

(Mr. Stephens.) My learned friend, Mr. Droop, reminds me that I have already directed your Lordship's attention to 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 221, where there was a general prohibition of candlesticks.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, that is the very thing. I only want to call your attention to what you said with regard to those Injunctions of 1547. You say 23 were substantially repeated, and 13 omitted, and you say several of them appear to be omitted because they were inconsistent with the existing law. Upon that I ask you whether there was not direct prohibition as to candlesticks; and you say, "No; it was not necessary."

(Mr. Stephens.) It was not necessary, because we do not find lighted candles, nor do we find them treated as a ceremony.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I quite understand that. You say there had been these Injunctions prohibiting them, and that there was this omission in the Injunctions of Elizabeth.

(Mr. Stephens.) Quite so, my Lord. I now come to the Remains of Archbishop Grindal (page 159 of the Parker Society's edition). In the articles of inquiry by Archbishop Grindal in 1571, the 6th article inquires "Whether all phanons, pixes, paxes, hand bells, sacring bells, censers, chrismatories, crosses, candlesticks, holy water, stocks, images, and such other relics and monuments of superstition and idolatry, be utterly defaced, broken, and destroyed; and, if not, where and in whose custody they remain." Now, what does this prove? Why, that in the time of Elizabeth, in 1571, censers and candlesticks were spoken of as so many "relics and monuments of superstition and idolatry." That is the language of Archbishop Grindal.

Before proceeding to my next point,—the authorized destruction of candlesticks and censers,—I wish to direct attention to a passage which had escaped my notice, and for which I am indebted to Mr. Dale. It is at page 173 of Grindal's Remains. I have read the 6th article at page 159, and I now wish to direct the attention of the Court to article 55. It is as follows: "Whether there be any which of late have bequeathed in their testaments any jewels, plates, ornaments, cattle, or grain, or other moveable stocks, annuities, or sums of money, for the erection or finding of any obits, diriges, trentals, torches, lights, tapers, lamps, or any such like use now by law forbidden."

I will now proceed to show the authorized destruction of candlesticks and censers; and for that I will cite Peacock's Church Furniture, page 9,—a publication to which I have already directed your Lordship's attention. That work proves the destruction of candlesticks, of cruets, censers, chrismatories, and also of altar stones in Lincolnshire, at the commencement of Elizabeth's reign, in the 150 churches mentioned. Your Lordship asked me the source from which this gentleman obtained his information, and I now refer your Lordship to page 9, to show that it is a reprint of documents in the episcopal registry at Lincoln.

Of the 150 churches mentioned in these Inventories, 133 appear to have had one or more candlesticks at the end of Mary's reign; but in April 1566 these had been sold, broken, defaced, returned to the owners, taken away by the priest, or otherwise got rid of, except in six instances.

Those instances are Billingsborowe, at page 49; Gretford, at page 90; Gunbie, at page 92; Pilhame, at page 123; Swynested, at page 149; and Welton-juxta-Louth, at page 160. That those exceptional cases of candlesticks still remaining were due, not to their being allowed by law, but to the negligence or disaffection of the clergy and churchwardens, appears from the following circumstances:—At Billingsborowe, (page 49,) the churchwardens mention, that they are "to make away with the candlesticks and other things remaining afore Easter next." In all these six cases candlesticks are retained with other things, which, in the other inventories are usually mentioned to be destroyed, and in some of them with things that are manifestly illegal. At Gunbie we find them left with a sepulchre and a pax: (page 92.) At Gretford, a cross cloth with the image of the Trinity (page 90). At Pilhame there is a cross of latten, a sacring bell, three altar stones, and a pix (page 123). At Welton-juxta-Louth, a holy water fat (page 160). There are in this summary only 13 cases out of 150 in which any exceptional ornaments remain.

What can be more conclusive than that? Candlesticks and censers are spoken of in terms which show that they could not possibly have been legal. At Bardney we find "one crosse of latten, one pear of censers, ij. hand-belles, 2 candlestickes of latten, one pix, with other metal of papistry. Sold to Robt. Fowler, and he saith they be defacid. Itm., one vestmt. sold to Jhonbeestan, and he hath defacid it. Itm., ij. candellstickes off wood, broken and defacid by the sam churchwardins above sayd" (page 37). At Harbrough, "Itm., other mass-books, with the rest of such faned fables and peltering popish books, a<sup>o</sup> vi. Queen Elizabeth, by the aforesd churchwardens. Itm., other hand-belles, cricete, candlestickes, and censers, with a sacring belle,

"and the rest appertaining to the Popish service, sold and defaced 4 year agoo, Robt. Phillipson and James Hall (as we thinck) then churchwardens" (page 93). And at Riskington, "all other Popish peltrie, as candlestickes, censers, chrismatories, and suche like, were restored to Thomas Grave of Ashbie, the executor of Sir Robt. Grave, a<sup>o</sup> primo Elizabeth, of whom we borrowid the same in Quene Mari's tyme" (page 130).

I think, my Lord, I have now established the authorized destruction of candlesticks and of censers in the reign of Elizabeth.

[The Court adjourned for a short time.]

I am now going to discuss, with your Lordship's permission, the lighted candles in Queen Elizabeth's chapel. Reliance, no doubt, will be placed upon the use of lighted candles in the private chapel of Queen Elizabeth. But supposing she had used them during the entire of her reign (which she did not), such a practice would neither establish a usage, nor render that which was illegal by statute legal. The Princess Mary having mass in her private chapel during her brother's reign, which was clearly an illegal act, may well be cited against Elizabeth's equally illegal act of having lighted candles in her private chapel. In neither case does the doing the thing make it a legal act. The conduct of Queen Elizabeth was not sanctioned by the chief prelates of her time, or by any large majority of the people; but it arose from the craft of some disguised Papists, who had acquired a secret influence over the Queen at an early period of her reign, inimical to the Protestant faith.

I will now refer your Lordship to a sermon which was preached by Bishop Burnet before the House of Commons on the 31st January 1688. It was published in London in 1689, and I will hand up the book to your Lordship.

Now what does Bishop Burnet say in 1688, when he preached before the House of Commons? "Here suffer me to tell you, that in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign, our adversaries saw no hopes of retrieving their affairs, which had been spoiled by Queen Mary's persecution, but by setting on foot divisions among Protestants upon very inconsiderable matters. I myself have seen the letters of the chief bishops of that time, from which it appears that the Queen's stiffness in retaining some ceremonies, flowed not from their councils, but from the practices of some disguised Papists."

It may be here remarked that even as early as 1551 it was considered by the Council of Trent "that there was no better way to demolish the Church of Heresy, but by mixtures of doctrines, and by adding of ceremonies more than be at present permitted."

In support of what Bishop Burnet stated in his sermon before the House of Commons, I will refer your Lordship to a work which has been recently published, called "Rome's Tactics," by Dr. Goode, Dean of Ripon, 1867. I am going to read from page 7. "The following instructions were sent in 1551, from the Council of Trent to the Jesuits of Paris, through Casa, Archbishop of Benevento. The report of these instructions rests upon the testimony of a convert from Romanism in 1566, of the name of Samuel Mason, who had been bred up with the Jesuits at Paris, and who, coming over to this country, was, after his recantation, appointed by Archbishop Adam Loftus to the cure of a parish near Dublin, where he died." At page 9:—"Ye are not to preach all after one method, but to observe the place wherein you come. If Latheranism be prevalent, then preach Calvinism; if Calvinism, then Lutheranism. If in England, then either of them, or John Huss's opinion, Anabaptism, or any that are contrary to the Holy See or [of] St. Peter, by which your function will not be suspected, and yet you may still act on the interest of the Mother Church; there being, as the Council

"are agreed on, no better way to demolish that Church of heresy but by"—what?—"mixtures of doctrines, and by adding of ceremonies, more than be at present permitted."

(The Dean of the Arches.) But who is it says that?

(Mr. Prideaux.) The convert from Popery.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I mean, they are not Dr. Goode's own words?

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly not. I will hand the book up to your Lordship. I quoted from pages 7 and 9.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is Panzani.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. And, my Lord, we are at this moment equally exposed to the like crafty devices for the corruption of the Protestant Faith as at any previous period of our history.

That the case of Elizabeth's chapel was exceptional, may be inferred from the way in which it is spoken of in reference to the cross or crucifix and lighted candles, in the Zurich letters of 1558 to 1579, page 63, published by the Parker Society.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I recollect the book was very much quoted in the Stone Altar case.

(Mr. Stephens.) These letters extend over that period of time, from 1578 to 1579, and I have given them to your Lordship in accordance with your expressed wish. I am now reading from page 63, a letter from Thompson Sampson to Peter Martyr, dated January 6th, 1560. "Oh! my father, what can I hope for when the ministry of the Word is banished from Court? while the crucifix is allowed, with lights burning before it. The altars indeed are removed, and images also, throughout the kingdom. The crucifix and candles are retained at the Court alone. And the wretched multitude are not only rejoicing at this, but will imitate it of their own accord. What can I hope, when three of our lately appointed bishops are to officiate at the table of the Lord, one as priest, another as deacon, and a third as subdeacon, before the image of the crucifix, or at least not far from it, with candles, and habited in the golden vestments of the Papacy, and are thus to celebrate the Lord's supper without any sermon? What hope is there of any good, when our rulers are disposed to look for religion in these dumb remnants of idolatry, and not from the preaching of the lively Word of God? What can I hope when injunctions are laid upon those appointed to preach, not to handle vice with too much severity; when the preachers are deemed intolerable if they say anything that is displeasing."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Who is the writer of that letter?

(Mr. Stephens.) Thompson Sampson.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And to whom is he writing?

(Mr. Stephens.) He is writing to Peter Martyr.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Peter Martyr was a Lutheran, was he not?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. "But whither is my warmth of feeling carrying me away? I must be silent, though I have scarcely touched upon the heads of the misery that is hanging over us. Eternal Lord, have mercy on us, through Jesus Christ our God and Saviour. I will propose this single question for your resolution, for I wish my father to employ you as my medium of correspondence with Masters Bullinger and Bernardine. It is this, whether the image of the crucifix placed on the table of the Lord with lighted candles, is to be regarded as a thing indifferent; and, if it is not to be so considered, but as an unlawful and wicked practice, then I ask, suppose the Queen should enjoin all the bishops and clergy either to admit this image together with the candles into their churches, or to retire from the ministry of the word, what should be our conduct in this case? Should we not rather quit the ministry of the word and sacraments than that these relics of the Amorites should be admitted? Certain of our friends, indeed, appear 21795.

"in some measure inclined to regard these things as matters of indifference. For my own part, I am altogether of opinion, that, should this be enjoined, we ought rather to suffer deprivation."

I will now refer to page 54. I believe your Lordship has a copy.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No; but I remember these letters very well. They were all cited in the Stone Altar case. One was a very memorable letter of Cox to Cassander.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. I believe that was cited by your Lordship.

The letter I now propose to quote is dated the 16th November 1559, from John Jewel to Peter Martyr.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Peter Martyr was not an Episcopal clergyman, was he?

(Mr. Stephens.) He was a Protestant.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I mean he was not a member of our Church, as far as I recollect.

(Mr. Stephens.) He was a Lutheran, my Lord. He thus writes:—"Religion among us is in the same state which I have often described to you before. The doctrine is everywhere most pure; but as to ceremonies and maskings there is a little too much foolery. That little silver cross of ill-omened origin still maintains its place in the Queen's chapel. Wretched me! This thing will soon be drawn into precedent."

These letters were written in the autumn of 1559, shortly after these lights had been introduced into the Queen's chapel. It would seem that there were no lights in her chapel in June, when the Injunctions were issued, as Froude gives the following account of their being introduced in October. I am now going to cite from 7 Froude's History of England, page 145, October 1549. "Nor was this all. The Queen seemed to accept the conditions which the marriage would imply and oblige; and, as if to separate herself distinctly from the Protestant party, she gave orders for the restoration of the crucifix in the Chapel Royal. Angry words were exchanged between the Council and the chaplain. Bedford spoke with bitter surprise to Cecil, and the order was suspended for a day or two. But on the Sunday following, service was performed with the altar in full costume, and the priests in orthodox vestments."

Then, my Lord, there is a note in Spanish,* and I will hand the book up to your Lordship, in order to correct the translation which I am going to read. The note is on the right-hand side, and the translation I believe to be as follows:—"The Queen commanded that a crucifix and some candles should be placed on the altar. On this account, a dispute arose between her chaplains and the members of her Council, who neglected to do what the Queen had commanded on that evening. On the Saturday, at vespers, it was done; and on the Sunday there were vestments for the altar and clergy, of such dresses as with us. Bedford at that time spoke insolently to Cecil on the subject."

(The Dean of the Arches.) I see he uses the word "velas." That will be "candles."

(Mr. Stephens.) "The Queen commanded a crucifix and some candles should be placed on the altar."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the letter of the Spanish ambassador, is it?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It might only have been what he heard. Of course he could not have been present.

* "La Reina mandó que se pusiese en la Altar un Crucifijo y unas velas por lo qual hubo tanto ruido entre su Capellano y los del consejo que dejó de hacerse lo que la Reina mandaba aquella tarde. El Sabado, a Vesperas, fué hecho, y el Domingo hubo vestimiento y clérigos en vestidos como nosotros usamos."—(De Quadra to the Bishop of Arras, October 9th.)

"Bedford deshonoró estos dias a Cecil sobre lo del Crucifijo."—(De Quadra to De Feria, October 27th.—MS. Simancas.)

(Mr. Stephens.) I put it in as an historical fact, for what it is worth.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are quite entitled to put it in on that ground.

(Mr. Prideaux.) As a modern statement of an historical fact.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No. It is the statement of the Spanish ambassador writing at that time.

(Mr. Prideaux.) But it was what was said at that time.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes. The value of all evidence, of course, must be decided by its undergoing a thorough sifting.

(Mr. Stephens.) I will now refer your Lordship to 1 Strype's Annals of the Reformation, page 297. The date is 1559-60, and I am citing from the Oxford edition. "Upon the 6th of March 1559-60, Dr. Bill, Dean of Westminster, preached in the Queen's chapel, where, on the table, standing altar-wise, was placed a cross and two candlesticks, with two tapers in them burning." Again, at page 298: "The same day, in the afternoon, Bishop Barlow, one of King Edward's bishops, now Bishop of Chichester, preached in his habit before the Queen. His sermon ended at 5 o'clock, and presently after her chapel went to evensong, the cross, as before, standing on the altar, and two candlesticks and two tapers burning in them; and service concluded, a good anthem was sung."

This service appears to have been at 7 o'clock in the evening at a time that the Eucharist is not administered.

(Mr. Prideaux.) At a time that it ought not to be administered, you should say.

(Mr. Stephens.) Then, as a matter of course, it would not be administered. In 1562 these lights were destroyed, or taken out of the Queen's chapel. In the Zurich letters (page 122, Letter LIII.), there is a letter dated August 20th, 1562, from Bishop Parkhurst to Henry Bullinger: ". . . After I had written this, lo! good news was brought me, namely, that the crucifix and candlesticks in the Queen's chapel are broken in pieces, and, as some one has brought word, reduced to ashes. A good riddance of such a 'cross' as that! It has continued there too long already, to the great grief of the godly, and the cherishing of I know not what expectations in the Papists. Moreover, the pseudo bishops, who are in the Tower of London, will very soon render an account of their breach of faith, so I hear. Farewell."

Whatever was the practice of Queen Elizabeth with respect to lighted candles on the communion table at the commencement of her reign, it is clear, that when she assented to the Homilies, she had given up lighted candles in her chapel.

I will now refer your Lordship to the Second Book of Homilies, pp. 241-242.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is the homily upon?

(Mr. Stephens.) "Against the peril of idolatry." It is the third part of the sermon, page 241 of the edition of 1846, published by the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge. The Second Book of Homilies, as your Lordship is aware, was settled at convocation held in January 1562-3, and was printed, I think, in 1563. (Correspondence of Archbishop Parker, ed. Parker Society, page 177, in not., 1 Strype's Annals, 307.) In the third part of the Homily against the peril of idolatry, when speaking of the Romish practice of lighting candles before images, a statement is made illustrative of the practice now complained of in this case: "What should it mean, that they, according as did the Gentile idolaters, light candles at noon time or at midnight, before them, but therewith to honour them? For other use is there none in so doing. For in the day it needeth not, but was ever a proverb of foolishness, to light a candle at noon time."

(The Dean of the Arches.) You cite this as showing a practice?

(Mr. Stephens.) I cite this as showing the practice. I cite it likewise as showing the opinion of the highest ecclesiastical authority in this country.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I mean, not as a law.

(Mr. Stephens.) It was settled by convocation in January 1562. I do not know what that authority may be.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It illustrates the practice, no doubt.

(Mr. Stephens.) It would not only illustrate the practice, but would likewise illustrate the opinion of the highest ecclesiastical authority in the country next, of course, to the Crown, because the Sovereign is the head of the Church. I will now refer your Lordship again to that part of this sermon, which is to be found at page 269. In the passage that I am about to read to your Lordship, it will be found that the words of Jerome are quoted with approbation. "Neither let any man object and allege against me the rich temple that was in Jewry, the table, candlesticks, incense, ships, platters, cups, mortars, and other things, all of gold. Then were those things allowed of the Lord when the priests offered sacrifices, and the blood of beasts was accounted a redemption of sins. Howbeit, all these things went before in figure, and they were written for us, upon whom the end of the world is come."

At page 286 will be found a sermon for the repairing and keeping clean of churches.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is the Homily for repairing churches.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes. It is in the second book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Mr. Stephens has been quoting from the second book all along.

(Mr. Stephens.) "As touching the other point, that Solomon's Temple was a figure of Christ: we know that now in the time of the clear light of Christ Jesus, the Son of God, all shadows, figures, significations, are utterly gone; all vain and unprofitable ceremonies, both Jewish and heathenish, fully abolished."

In the works of Bishop Jewell (page 176), "Defence and Apology."

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is the famous book known as "Jewell's Apology—"

(Mr. Stephens.) It is so. Harding says: "Concerning ceremonies, if ye shew us not the use of chrism in your churches, if the sign of the cross be not borne before you in processions and other wheres used, if holy water be abolished, if lights at the Gospel and Communion be not had, if peculiar vestments for deacons, priests, bishops be taken away, and many such other the like, judge ye whether ye have duly kept the old ceremonies of the Church."

The Bishop of Salisbury replies (p. 177): "But now let us a little examine the particulars of your bill. Ye come in with processions, with lights, with torches, with tapers, with chrism, with oil, with tunicles and chesibles, with holy water and holy bread, and I know not what else; as if all these things had descended directly from the apostles, and without the same the Church of God were no Church." Again, at page 178: "Touching your lights and tapers, Beatus Rhenamus, a man of great learning and judgment, doubted not but ye borrowed the use thereof from the heathens. I grant the Christians in old times had lights in their churches, when they met together for their common prayers; but it appeareth by the ancient fathers, that the same lights served to solace them against the dark, and not for any use of religion."

I will now refer your Lordship to Gorham's Reformation Gleanings, page 434.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Who is Gorham?

(Mr. Stephens.) I thought your Lordship was aware of the famous case "The Bishop of Exeter v. Gorham."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is that the same man?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. At page 434 is a letter with which Mr. Gorham has nothing to say except the publication of it. It is from Bishop Parkhurst to Rodolph Gualter, and is dated March 4th, 1568: "About the beginning of November a certain youth, under influence of great zeal for God, entered the Queen's Chapel, and threw down on the ground, with great force, the golden cross together with the images connected with it; then stamping on it with his feet, he broke it in pieces in the sight of all, who were assembled for common prayer; for it was done publicly. From that time, no cross was seen there; it was abolished, and it will for ever be abolished as a mischievous thing."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That has nothing to do with the lighted candles; it is only as to the cross.

(Mr. Stephens.) Only as to the cross. But the cross, as your Lordship is aware, was connected with the candles.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I thought the legend had been that the Queen's fool had broken the cross, and that Lord Burleigh got him to do it.

(Mr. Stephens.) It may have been so; but I am only reading to your Lordship what appears in the book I am quoting from.

The distinction between Edward's lights (I am now speaking of lights under the Injunctions of 1547) and Elizabeth's lights is clear. Edward's lights were in honour of the corporal presence in the reserved Sacrament; Elizabeth's lights were simply in honour of the crucifix. And I challenge my friends to show that there is any evidence of any connection between the lighted candles in Queen Elizabeth's chapel and the Communion. Queen Elizabeth's lights, like the Lutheran lights, were lights burned before and in honour of the crucifix, and were burnt at other services as well as at the Communion. That, I respectfully submit to your Lordship, is the distinction.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is that the case with the Lutheran lights?

(Mr. Stephens.) I believe so, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That they are burnt at other times besides at the Communion?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think they always do have lights on the altar tables through the North of Germany, and use those lights.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I want to know whether that is to be taken with regard to the Lutherans.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Nothing is to be taken with regard to the Lutherans. This is nothing more than a little historical gossip between myself and Mr. Stephens. Before you leave this subject, Mr. Stephens, can you point out to me any instance in which Prelates or any Council told Queen Elizabeth that she was transgressing the law in having these lights.

(Mr. Stephens.) Your Lordship will perceive that what Elizabeth did was exceptional, because it was in her private chapel, where there was not open or public prayer. The Queen did not attempt to force the lighted candles upon a single parish church. Whatever she did in her private chapel, she did according to her own notions of the Royal prerogative.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is no doubt at all the Queen's chapel had singular privileges attached to it.

(Mr. Stephens.) The Queen's chapel had peculiar privileges, and it must be borne in mind, that those privileges were not exercised at St. Paul's or at Westminster Abbey; and, as your Lordship knows, private chapels stand upon a very different basis from parish churches.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Certainly. I only meant if there had been such an authority it would have been valuable. I have not found any as far as my researches have gone.

(Mr. Stephens.) No doubt it would have been valuable; but I think I have assigned a reason to your Lordship why there should be none.

I now proceed to deal with another branch of this case, and it is this: that the Puritans never raised any objection against lighted candles; and I need hardly say to your Lordship that the Puritans would have done so had they been used in parish churches.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What would be the inference from that? It is a very curious fact, certainly; but what is your inference?

(Mr. Stephens.) What the Puritans objected to was unlighted candles; and therefore objecting only to unlighted candles clearly proves, that there could not have been lighted candles; for they were morbidly sensitive about the most trivial matters of ceremony.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Oh, I see. I am obliged to you. That was rather veiled in your first proposition, that the Puritans never objected to lighted candles.

(Mr. Stephens.) Exactly; and we find no complaint in all their writings respecting altar lights.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is so, is it?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord; and it seems to me almost conclusive evidence upon this subject.

(The Dean of the Arches.) They objected to candles altogether, lighted or unlighted.

(Mr. Stephens.) They objected to candles altogether. As your Lordship is aware, at that time, the candles were in many churches in the candlesticks unlighted; but the Puritans never made a charge as to the candles being lighted; the charge they always made was, "the candles are unlighted," and we object to them as so many remnants of Popery.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And you say, à fortiori, they would have objected to them if they had been lighted.

(Mr. Stephens.) That is my argument. My Lord, there is a book that was published in 1575, intituled "A brief Discourse of the Troubles begun at Frankfurt in the year 1554 about the Book of Common Prayer and Ceremonies."

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am afraid I must ask you to lend me that book by-and-by, because I have not a copy.

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly, my Lord. I am about to read a letter, which will be found at page 51, from Calvin to Richard Cox.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is Bishop Cox?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. I will read the address to your Lordship. "To the worshipful my loving brethren in the Lord, Master Richard Cox, and the rest of the clergymen who now remain at Frankfurt." And at page 52 he says, "Verily no man well instructed or of a sound judgment will deny (as I think) that lights and crossings, or such like trifles, sprang or issued out of superstition; whereupon I am persuaded, that they which retain these ceremonies in a free choice, or when they may otherwise do, they are over greedy and desirous to drink off the dregs; neither do I see to what purpose it is to burden the Church with trifling and unprofitable ceremonies, or, as I may term them with their proper name, hurtful and offensive ceremonies, whereas there is liberty to have a simple and pure order. But I keep in and refrain myself, lest I should seem to begin to move a new contention of that matter, which, as you report, is well ended."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That must be the same Bishop Cox to whom Cassander wrote.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, it must be the same. In this letter he is addressed as "Master."

(The Dean of the Arches.) I forget whether you read this passage at page 54: "Because Master Calvin objected to them as matters of lights," &c.

(Mr. Stephens.) No, I have not read that passage.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You may think it worth while to read it, perhaps.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, I am going to read it; but before I do so it is requisite for me to solicit your Lordship's attention to the original letters relative to the English Reformation,—the second portion, page

757. Your Lordship will find them in the Parker Society's edition. The date of those letters is 1537 to 1558; and I am going to read from the second portion of them. The letter of Calvin which I have read to your Lordship out of "The Troubles at Frankfort," Whitehead, Cox, and others replied to it on behalf of the English congregation at Frankfort, on the 31st September 1555, and said "you object 'to us 'lights and crosses.' As for lights, we never 'had any; and with respect to crosses, if we ever 'made use of them, these friends of yours have not 'imposed upon you."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That would show that they never had any.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It shows a strong practice, certainly; but it does not go on to show "they are contrary to the law."

(Mr. Stephens.) No, my Lord; there was no occasion for that; because the Injunctions and the Visitation Articles expressly prohibited them.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, but this is an English divine writing to Calvin. Then would it not have been almost natural for him to have said, "We have not had any lights, they are contrary to law."

(Mr. Stephens.) If there was a law prohibiting the lighted candles, or if there was no enactment upon the subject there would have been no occasion to have said that. What I wish to urge upon your Lordship is this, that the very moment Edward's Act of Uniformity passed, the Injunctions of 1547, so far as they related to lights before the sacrament, were abolished by operation of that Act.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have followed your elaborate argument throughout, and I have taken notes of that; but I merely put it to you whether that letter can be cited as going beyond evidence of de facto non-use.

(Mr. Stephens.) It is evidence to this extent, that they never heard of lighted candles upon the communion tables of our churches.

(The Dean of the Arches.) He says, "as to lights, we never had any." It is very strong as to the fact of non-user, certainly.

(Mr. Stephens.) Your Lordship has put precisely the same interpretation as to the effect of this document that I have ventured to do; but the expression of any opinion upon the law as to what was legal or illegal would have had no effect.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes; but it would be the à fortiori argument, would it not: "We could not have any lights, they are contrary to law; you are making a false charge against us, because we could not have any lights, they being contrary to law."

(Mr. Stephens.) At all events I think it proves the usage. It is conclusive evidence as to that.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, that is evidence of considerable weight on that point, as to the non-user of lights at that time certainly.

(Mr. Stephens.) I now refer your Lordship to page 54 of the book that I have already cited, "The History of the Troubles at Frankfort (1554)." The authors of "The Troubles at Frankfort," writing in 1575, and being strong Puritans, say of this letter of Calvin's (Letter LIII.), "Because that Master Calvin in his letter maketh mention of lights, some might gather that he was unduly informed that in the English book, lights were prescribed, (the contrary whereof appeareth by the description before,) where it is manifest to such as be learned, that he useth the figure auxesis, and that this is his argument a majore ad minus, for so much as lights and crossings; be two of the moste ancientest ceremonies, having continued in the church above thirteen hundred years, are yet for such causes abolished. How much more ought all other that have not had the like continuance, and yet abased, be utterly removed?" Here the Puritans admit that the lights were abolished before 1555. This letter is also quoted in Gorham's Reformation Gleanings page 347.

My Lord, there is a curious and very scarce publication, called Hickeringill's Works. He was rector of All Saints, Colchester, and the edition from which I am about to cite is the edition of 1716. It appears, that the Puritans during the reign of Charles II., William and Mary, and Anne, only complained of unlighted candles. In the second volume of this publication, page 107, it is said, "Clergy and laity who have but bowed at the name of Jesus, or to the altar, or set up everlasting candles thereon; for the Papists light them, and burn them upon the altar in imitation, for most of their religion is only apish mimicry of the primitive times and Christians, who were glad because of persecution to meet in private conventicles in cells and cellars and by stealth in the night, and consequently did all as the Papists now do usually at noon-day in their chiefest churches; they obscure the windows with hangings, and do all (perhaps in fee with the chandlers) by candle-light; or thinking, as some idle townsmen do (that burn the day) that bought light is best." At page 405. "It is so very like Popery; that I confess, when I came from beyond the sea about 1660 to Paul's or Whitehall I thought I was in Spain or Portugal only the candles on our altars most nonsensically stand neglected,—to signify what? The darkness of our noddles, or to tempt the chandlers to turn downright Papists as the most suitable religion for their trade." At page 441: "Our fops, with less reason, do set up candles too on the altar, as well as the Papists. We must still be like them and be popish asses, without as much as popish reasoning, silly though it be. Ours is nonsense. For what signification of light can this ceremony be any more than a stick? A candle unlighted is no more a significant ceremony of light than a stick before the fire touches it is a fire-brand. I am not only ashamed of my fops, but really am ashamed to use any words about it. It is needless to expose it, and yet it is retained as a thing of value because that foppery amongst others made my ceremony-monger a man of value, for without them he had still sate in the seat which best becomes him—the lowest stool in the church."

(Mr. Prideaux.) What do you say is the date of these statements, Mr. Stephens?

(Mr. Stephens.) 1716.

In the third volume (page 156), it is said: "Even the tackers and highfliers too, at least those of them that will not adore the wafer God upon the altar as devoutly as now they adore the bare altar and blind candles."

(The Dean of the Arches.) I see the title of the chapter is "Concerning unlighted candles on the altar, also church music and other popish symbols."

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. Now it is right I should direct your Lordship's attention to one passage in the third volume, at page 187. I will hand the book up to your Lordship, for I have got a full note of the passage, and because it is one that rather tells against me than for me.

(The Dean of the Arches.) "The multitude of these church babblers is not the one half of those that have the wit and grace to hold their peace; and of those that do it, the most of them do it merely apishly, because they see others do it; and those others are set on by the nonsensical and superstitious high-flyers, that seeing how the weathercock of preferment (upon the top of the church steeple) points, and stands East or so, then they, after the cathedral nonsensical mode, in hopes of a deanery, or prebendary, or a bishoprick, bow to the East, to the altar, to anything, to nothing, to candles lighted at noon day, (as I have know them in Westminster Abbey on Candlemas-day; and I know not, whether they so creep to the cross still every Christmas day, every boy with a lighted candle in his hand, just as they do in Popish countries). But at Westminster Abbey and Paul's, (and I believe at some other places,) they bow to the candles unlighted all the year after." And it goes on to say that the singing men and boys alternately read every other verse. That would rather point to the fact of the candles being only lighted on Candlemas day.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. I thought it right to draw your Lordship's attention to that.

(The Dean of the Arches.) At the first blush it would seem so, and what I wish to draw your attention to is, that the usage of lighted candles on Candlemas Day was not abolished then.

(Mr. Stephens.) There might have been a fog on the 2nd of February.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There might have been. I mean that this writer had seen them lighted at noon day on that particular Candlemas Day; that is my inference from that passage.

(Mr. Stephens.) And I believe it is the legitimate one. But it appears that, even though lighted on Candlemas Day, it was an exceptional ceremony, and was done on no other occasion.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Have you read the whole of this 6th Chapter? It contains matters that do not concern the Court, but it is a very curious chapter indeed.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, it is a very curious chapter.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I never read anything more curious. I see here (it has nothing to do with this case) "David had nothing to do when he was young but sit on a hill, and bide two sheep, and thereby it made him a courtier."

(Mr. Stephens.) This publication contains Puritanical feelings of the bitterest character, and it seems to me, if lighted candles had existed in our churches we should have found complaints respecting them in Hickeringill.

In reference to the passage in Hickeringill respecting lighted candles on Candlemas Day; I wish to refer to the language of the Dean of Ely, in the Lower House of Convocation, when discussing the subject of Ritualism. (Chronicle of Convocation, 1866, p. 401.) "To show the extreme difficulty of arriving at a true judgment on historical evidence, I may mention, that on preaching at the Chapel Royal lately the candles on the altar were lighted. Supposing that, after the manner of a Zurich letter, I had mentioned the fact in writing to the Continent, and 200 years hence my letter had turned up. It would be evidence very difficult to be got rid of, whereas the truth was that on that day there was a London fog, and it would have been difficult to have read the Communion service without lights of some kind. If, then, we take contemporary letters without knowing all the surrounding circumstances of the events narrated, we are liable to be led into error. There are then great doubts whether there ever was what might be called a 'use' for lighted candles on the Lord's table since the Reformation or not. My own feeling is that there was no such use, and I am against the use of such lights."

I will now go to the reign of James I., and I wish to refer your Lordship to Bishop Andrewes' Minor Works, Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology. I will admit that Bishop Andrewes had candlesticks and tapers upon the communion table of his chapel; but it is very improbable that he had lighted candles in the day time. At page 97, Appendix F, of Bishop Andrewes' works, the following is a description of the Bishop's chapel. "Two candlesticks with tapers. The daily furniture for the altar."

I will now refer your Lordship to Andrewes' Pattern of Catechistical Doctrine, pages 370, 372.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I suppose that is the page of his works generally?

(Mr. Stephens.) No; it is a separate volume. It is in the library of the Anglo-Catholic Theology. Bishop Andrewes, in speaking of some of "the superfluous and wicked ceremonies of the Papists borrowed from the heathen;" says, "Their burning of tapers in their churches at noon day is altogether a pagan custom." I think, therefore, it is quite clear that I have given a definition as to the word "taper" in the furniture of Bishop Andrewes' chapel, namely, that it does not mean a lighted candle.

I will now refer your Lordship to Andrewes' Minor Works, page 33. In his answer to the 18th chapter of the First Book of Cardinal Perron's reply, he says, "There were lights; there was incense used by the primitive church in their service; not for any mystical meaning, but (as it is thought) for this cause, that where the Christians in time of persecution had their meetings,—most commonly in crypts, in caves and grotts under ground, places dark and so needing light, and dampish and so needing good savours,—they were enforced to provide lights against the one, and incense against the other. After when, peace came, though they had churches then above ground, with light and air enough, yet retained they both the lights and the incense, to show themselves to be the sons and successors of those ancient Christians which in former times had used them (though upon other occasion), showing their communion in the former faith by the communion of the former usages. Whereto the after ages devised meanings and significations of their own, which from the beginning were not so."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you think, in that passage where he refers to burning tapers at noon-day, he is referring to the continual burning of candles all day, or only to another kind of burning? "Burning candles in their churches at noon-day is altogether a Pagan custom." That is what I have taken down. Do you think Bishop Andrewes meant by that a continual burning of candles, or an occasional lighting of them?

(Mr. Stephens.) My Lord, he meant it as a ceremony. All I wanted to show was that in the description of this furniture, when it speaks of tapers being on the communion table, they were not lighted tapers, because that would be inconsistent with the passages which I have read from Bishop Andrewes' writings.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think it is clear the use of the word "tapers" did not mean a burning light.

(Mr. Stephens.) Precisely so.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That may be my imperfect knowledge of the subject, but it would appear so.

(Mr. Stephens.) I now come to the reigns of Charles I. and Charles II. There can be no doubt that during these reigns there was an inclination among some of the leading men of the Church and State to effect a re-union between the Churches of England and of Rome.

Before attention is directed to the conduct of Archbishop Laud in reference to the introduction of candles, it may be expedient to ascertain, whether implicit reliance can be placed upon the loyalty of that prelate for the maintenance of the Protestant faith; or in other words, whether upon questions like these which are now the subject of discussion, the language or the actions of Archbishop Laud should be regarded with absolute confidence.

Upon this subject I will refer again to a work that I have this morning quoted, called "Rome's Tactics," by the Dean of Ripon; and I am going to read from pages 35—37.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think you have referred me more than once to Archbishop Laud as a considerable authority.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am now speaking of Archbishop Laud in reference to candles.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But I mean, when you make that general attack upon him, I think you have yourself referred to him, unless I am mistaken, more than once, as an authority in your favour.

(Mr. Stephens.) I may have referred to him; but only for what he has done in reference to his Visitation Articles.

"So far is Dr. Heylin, (Heylin's Life of Laud, Book 4, under year 1639,) the friend of Laud, and chaplain to Charles I., from denying the truth “ of this representation, that he quotes the passage as “ to the universities, &c., embracing Catholic opinions,

“ as showing how far they had proceeded towards
“ this happy reconciliation.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is there more than the folio edition of that book, which you are citing from?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, I have a second edition, and I will, if your Lordship wish, bring it down tomorrow to refer to some of these passages.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Pardon me one moment; but you are quoting from Dean Goode's book, are you not?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) He gives us the references, of course. It will not be any authority until we have verified them. I suppose you have got some extracts, Mr. Stephens, that you want to use.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. They are at page 35 of Dean Goode's publication. “The two secretaries “ Windebank and Cottington, and Dr. Goodman, “ Bishop of Gloucester, afterwards openly joined “ the Church of Rome. The King and Archbishop “ Laud allowed themselves to be drawn some way “ towards it, but on a nearer view shrank from “ committing themselves altogether to it; their con-“ sciences unwillingly detecting some points to which “ they feared to give approval.”

“ That Archbishop Laud looked favourably upon
“ the project of a reconciliation with Rome, and “ acted in many respects with an eye to the pro“ motion of it (though, it is to be hoped, with a “ considerable reserve in the extent to which his “ concessions would have gone), can hardly be “ doubted; even from the statement of his friend
“ Heylin himself. Dr. Heylin, referring to a tract “ called ‘The English Pope,’ printed at London in “ the same year, 1643, says, ‘He well tells us that “ ‘after Con. had undertook the managing of the “ ‘affairs, matters began to grow towards some “ ‘agreement;’ and then, stating what it was sup“ posed the Pope was likely to yield, he adds, ‘and “ ‘to obtain a reconciliation upon these advantages,
“ ‘the Archbishop had all the reason in the world
“ ‘to do as he did in ordering the Lord's table to “ ‘be placed where the altar stood, and making the “ ‘accustomed reverence in all approaches towards “ ‘it, and accesses to it; in beautifying and adorn“ ‘ing churches, and celebrating the divine service
“ ‘with all due solemnities, in taking care that all “ ‘offensive and exasperating passages should be “ ‘expunged out of such books as were brought to “ ‘the press; and for reducing the extravagancy of “ ‘some opinions to an even temper. . . . And “ ‘if he approved auricular confession, and showed “ ‘himself willing to introduce it into the use of the “ ‘Church, as both our authors say he did, it is no “ ‘more than what the liturgy commends for the “ ‘care of the penitent (though we find not the “ ‘word ‘auricular’ in it) or what the canons have “ ‘provided for, as the point of security for such as “ ‘shall be willing to confess themselves.’

“ Such is the statement of Dr. Heylin himself.”

“ But when, after raising the expectations of the “ Romanists, the King and Archbishop, impelled prob“ ably by various motives, impeded their proceed“ ings, they became doubly the objects of their hatred, “ especially with the Jesuits, to whose views, indeed,
“ however much they might be inclined towards “ effecting, if possible, a union with the Church of “ Rome, they were probably to a great extent opposed.
“ And the object of the Jesuits being, as expressed
“ in one of the documents already quoted, to bring “ about a ‘universal catholic monarchy,’—an object “ which to this day they have more at heart than “ any other—they were as anxious to get rid of “ those who, while they approximated to them in “ some points, opposed their main scheme as of more “ thorough opponents.”

I will now direct your Lordship's attention to the Hierurgia Anglicana (page 14). The Hierurgia Anglicana, whatever its authority may be worth, shews that candles were introduced by Laud at Whitehall, at Lambeth, at Windsor, and at Canterbury (pp. 16, 21). I may likewise remark that Bishop Cosin did the like at Durham (pp. 22, 45).

(The Dean of the Arches.) Lighted candles?

(Mr. Stephens.) Candles and candlesticks; not lighted candles.

(The Dean of the Arches.) As far as I understand, these citations you now refer to, refer to candlesticks and tapers only.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. But as Whitehall, Lambeth, Windsor, Canterbury, and Durham were precisely the places where, if anywhere, they must have been retained, such an introduction proves their novelty?

(The Dean of the Arches.) But then this is the introduction of candles unlighted.

(Mr. Stephens.) Candles unlighted.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But do you say the introduction of candles even unlighted is a novelty?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes.

(Mr. Prideaux.) It does not say unlighted.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I used the word “unlighted” because I assumed it from the context.

(Mr. Stephens.) When I make use of the word “candles” I mean unlighted candles, that being the proper expression. This Hierurgia consists of complaints against candlesticks and candles or tapers; thus, proving that they were a novelty.

I do not deny that the candlesticks with candles in them, which Elizabeth had set up on the Communion table of her chapel, were retained under James I. and Charles I. I do not deny that Bishop Andrewes had candlesticks and candles standing on the Communion table in his chapel; I do not deny that there were candles on the Communion table in the chapel at Durham in 1629; and that during Laud's primacy between 1633 and 1641 there were candlesticks and candles on the Communion table in his chapel, and also in several cathedrals. Again I admit that since the Restoration there have been, in some cathedrals and college chapels, candlesticks with or without candles on the Communion table.

(The Dean of the Arches.) As there is in the Queen's Chapel Royal now.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. But these admissions have no bearing on the question whether lighted candles in the day time at the Communion service are now lawful. To answer the charge in the Articles it must be shown that the candles on the Communion table were lighted at the Communion Service when not required for light, and not merely in the evening when they might be considered as required for giving light. I challenge the Counsel on the opposite side to show that in any cathedral in this country, or in any parish church, there have been lighted candles upon the Holy table during the Communion service when there was daylight; that is to say, a sufficient amount of daylight to perform the offices of the church.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There has been some dispute as to whether Cosin's notes were made before or after the Prayer Book.

(Mr. Stephens.) Bishop Cosin, by his practice and by his notes in reference to lights, has caused some misapprehension upon the subject. Bishop Cosin, however, never used lighted candles before the Sacrament. If he never used lighted candles before the Sacrament, how could the Injunctions of 1547 apply; but even if he did, that act per se would not have rendered the use of lighted candles legal. It is, however, remarkable that neither Bishop Cosin nor any other prelate, when making inquiries respecting the ornaments of the Church, ventured in their Injunctions or visitation articles, to ask for lighted candles, for candles, or even for candlesticks. Not a single visitation article can be produced where such an inquiry has been made. And the reason is obvious: because the Prelates knew that neither the statute law nor the canon law justified the use of lighted candles during daylight upon the Holy table in our churches. If lighted candles were required or in use, is it for one moment to be supposed that the eminent divines to whom I have referred your Lordship would not have made some inquiry upon the subject in their visitation articles, which were so very extensive and minute: and framed, not in one form, but in different forms, and settled by different chancellors?

Bishop Cosin's notes were not published in his lifetime, and their ultimate publication by Dr. Nicholls in 1709, thirty years after his death, do not seem to have been intended by Cosin. In fact these notes were never intended but for his own private use; and consequently he did not attempt nor take any pains, as appears upon examination of the notes, to express himself correctly; and we are not bound to assume that by lights he meant lighted candles. On the contrary, he meant candles. That view of the case is supported by the references from Bishop Andrewes' works, to which I have ventured to direct your Lordship's attention.

I will now refer your Lordship to Wheatley, on the Book of Common Prayer. (Page 92 of the Cambridge edition of 1858.) Wheatley, after extracting Cosin's notes respecting lights, adds, "These lights used time out of mind in the church are still continued in most, if not all, cathedral and collegiate churches and chapels so often as divine service is performed by candle light."

Why, no one ever questioned the legality of having candles in a church during darkness. But this, my Lord, shows how Cosin's notes of 1720, eleven years after Nichols had published them, were understood as applying to divine service when performed by candle light. Is it possible for anyone to elicit an argument from such premises in favour of lighted candles, or would the Court be justified in drawing a conclusion that lighted candles were used in our churches during the daylight?

I am now about to refer to 5 Cosin's Works—
(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the one that contains his notes.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes; it is a book to which the Court directed my attention yesterday. I wish to quote from page 440, and I will also direct your Lordship's attention to page 231. It is observable that Cosin, whenever he quotes the Injunctions of 1547, leaves out those very important words "before the sacrament." And he no where intimates that there is any connection between the lights on the Holy table and the Communion. I am now about to read from page 440: "Among other ornaments of the church, also then in use, in the second year of King Edward VI., there were two lights appointed by his Injunctions, which the Parliament had authorized him to make, and whereof otherwhiles they made mention as acknowledging them to be binding." And at page 231: "Among other ornaments of the church that were then in use, the setting of two lights upon the Communion table or altar was one, appointed by the King's Injunctions set forth about that time and mentioned or ratified by the Act of Parliament here named." But those are not the lights mentioned in the Injunctions of 1547. The lights mentioned in the Injunctions of 1547 are two lights upon the high altar and before the reserved sacrament.

In 1658 Cosin was charged with burning candles superstitiously; and his answer to this charge shows, that he regarded candles on the Communion table merely as ornaments to be used for lighting the church when required. (4 Cosin's Works, page 390.) Fuller, enumerating the charges made against Cosin by Smart, says: "He was accused of lighting 200 wax candles about the altar on Candlemas Day." (Ibid. page 394.) Cosin, in a letter written in 1658, in reply to this charge, and published in 1659, says: "That by the local statutes of that church (whereunto Mr. Smart was sworn as well as myself) the treasurer was to give order, that the provision should every year be made of a sufficient number of wax lights for the service of the choir during all the winter time; which statute I observed when I was chosen into that office, and had order from the dean and chapter by capitular act to do it; yet upon the "Communion table they that used to light the candles (the sacrist and the vergers) never set more than two fair candles with a few small sizes near to them which they put there of purpose that the people all about might have the better use of them for singing the psalms, and reading the lessons out of the bible. But two hundred was a greater number than they used all the church over, either upon Candlemas night or any other; and that there were no more (sometimes many less) lighted at that time than at the like festivals in Christmas holidays, when the people of the city came in greater company to the church, and therefore required a greater store of lights."

What is the deduction from these premises? Why, that the two candles on the Communion table were regarded by Cosin as part of the lights required for lighting the church. But, my Lord, the private notions of Bishop Cosin or the private notions of other persons with reference to lighted candles cannot influence the legal interpretation of a statute, even though they were themselves its framers, because the Court cannot go beyond the statute for its interpretation.

I need hardly cite to your Lordship the case of Brett v. Brett, where your Lordship will find that proposition laid down by one of your Lordship's predecessors, Sir John Nicholl. The case is reported in 3 Adams.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think you cited it to me the other day. I have a note of it.

(Mr. Stephens.) It was on some other point. The reference is 3 Adams, 217; and I only cite it to show, that it is no matter what were the opinions of Bishop Cosin, or of any other prelate, in reference to the legal construction of the Prayer Book. (Salkeld v. Johnson, 2 Exchequer Reports, 273; Arding v. Bonner, 2 Jur. N.S., 763; Fellowes v. Clay, 4 Q.B., 360.) The Court can only be guided by what the legislature has said, and not by what the framers thought it said. In fact, there is no warrant for saying, that lighted candles were used in the church for symbolical purposes after the passing of the Act of Uniformity of Charles II.

Perhaps there were few prelates more respected by all parties than Archbishop Leighton; and it seems clear, from the language he used in the fourth of his published sermons, that lighted candles for symbolical purposes could not, shortly after the passing of Charles II. Act of Uniformity, have been used by any of those congregations who dissented from the errors of Rome, either in England or Scotland. Your Lordship is doubtless aware that Leighton was consecrated Bishop of Dunblane by the Bishop of Winchester and two other English bishops in 1661. In 1669 he was appointed by the Crown Commendator of Glasgow. He was elected Archbishop of Glasgow on October 27th, 1671, by a congé d'élire to the Chapter of Glasgow; and in 1674 he resigned his archbishopric into the hands of the King.

I will now refer to the Archbishop's sermon (3 Leighton's Works, p. 51, Sermon 4): "What is the shining of the True Church? Doth not a church then shine when church service is raised from a decent and primitive simplicity, and decorated with pompous ceremonies, with rich furniture and gaudy vestments? Is not the church then beautiful? Yes, indeed; but all the question is, whether this be the proper genuine beauty, or no? Whether this be not strange fire, as the fire that Aaron's sons used, which became vain, and was taken as strange fire? Methinks it cannot be better decided than to refer it to St. John in his Book of the Revelations. We find there the descriptions of two several women; the one riding in state, arrayed in purple, decked with gold and precious stones and pearls, Rev. xvii. 3; the other in rich attire too, but of another kind, chap. 12, clothed with the sun, and a crown of twelve stars on her head. The other's decorement was all earthly; this woman's is all celestial. What need she borrow light and beauty from “precious stones; that is clothed with the sun and crowned with stars? She wears no sublunary ornaments, but, which is more noble, she treads upon them, the moon is under her feet. Now, if you know (as you do all, without doubt,) which of these two is the spouse of Christ, you can easily resolve the question. The truth is, those things seem to deck religion, but they undo it. Observe where they are most used, and we shall find little or no substance of devotion under them; as we see in that apostate Church of Rome. This painting is dishonourable for Christ's spouse, and besides, it spoils her natural complexion. The superstitious use of torches and lights in the church by day, is a kind of shining, but surely not commanded here. No, it is an affront done both to the sun in heaven and to the Sun of Righteousness in the Church.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) But would not that rather point to there being lights in the day at the time he wrote that?

(Mr. Stephens.) No, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) He writes against it.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Would he write against a thing that did not exist?

(Mr. Stephens.) No; but the lights were in use in the Roman Catholic church.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Oh, you do not think he was alluding to the other lights?

(Mr. Stephens.) No, clearly not. He was drawing a distinction between the apostate Church of Rome and our own, saying that one depended upon fine shows, upon processions, upon music, and so forth, and the other upon the pure Word of God.

My proposition is, that lighted candles, when not used for the purpose of giving light, are ceremonies, and not merely ornaments or decorations. That lighted candles during the daylight are not treated as mere decorations, but as articles used in the performance of the services and rites of the church, appears from the Directorium Anglicanum (page 34). The author, in dealing with “altar lights,” says, “These should be lighted immediately before the communion service by the clerk in cassock, or in cassock and surplice. He should make a reverence before ascending to light them, and commence on the Epistle side.” And at page 35: “It should be observed that these two eucharistic lights, should never be used as mere candles for lighting the sanctuary. Other brackets for candles, or the corona and standard lights, are sufficient for that purpose. The two lights are symbols, and in honorem sacramenti, and must be cæca lumina, save when celebration is intended. The judgment in the Knightsbridge case decided their strict legality. When matins, litany, and communion, or matins and communion, are celebrated together, the lights should not be lighted till just before the communion office begins. Other lights may be lit at the gospel, at the offertory, or immediately before the consecration or canon. Two lights are the minimum according to the plain existing law of the Church of England.”

I will shortly draw your Lordship's attention to the distinction between the cross and the altar lights. (Moore's Report, page 175.) In Westerton and Liddell the cross was retained as a mere architectural decoration by the Privy Council, because it was an emblem of the Christian faith, held in great repute and used by the early Christians; but it was expressly excluded, as your Lordship may remember, from use in the services of the church.

The distinction between the credence table and the lights will also appear from Moore's Report (page 187). The credence table was allowed by the Privy Council because it was an article not merely “consistent with,” but “subsidiary to the service,” in fact as a mere adjunct to the communion table, and perfectly unimportant whether it was used or not. Such, I believe, was the principle of the decision upon that point.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The principle was that the rubric required the holy elements to be taken from a separate place before they were put upon the holy table; the rubric required it.

(Mr. Stephens.) But it was regarded as a mere adjunct to the communion table.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Certainly.

(Mr. Stephens.) Subsidiary to the proper performance of the service of the church.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Certainly.

(Mr. Stephens.) The distinction here is, that all the services of the church can be performed without the lighted candles, and without mixing water with the sacramental wine; in fact, these ceremonies are neither “consistent with” nor “subsidiary to the service.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) I suppose it would be difficult to find the existence of a credence table in any of the Visitation Articles.

(Mr. Stephens.) I believe so.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is there any order ordering the churchwardens to procure a credence table?

(Mr. Stephens.) I have a slight impression it occurs in one or two instances, but I am not certain.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It may be worth considering in that view of the case. Your argument is, of course, that from Edward VI. to the present time there has been no order ordering the churchwardens to procure candlesticks or candles. But then I am not aware of any order ordering the churchwardens to procure credence tables.

(Mr. Stephens.) Very few churches have credence tables; they are not common.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No; but you see the bearing of my remark. One must be cautious how one admits the negative argument as to candles and candlesticks, because it would apply equally to what is unquestionably lawful, namely, the credence table.

(Mr. Stephens.) There is a great distinction between the two things.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There may be a distinction between the two things, but you will bear in mind what I say as to the negative argument.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, I see the effect of your Lordship's observation. I was about to refer your Lordship to Moore's Report, page 187: “Now what is a credence table? It is simply a small side table on which the bread and wine are placed before the consecration, having no connection with any superstitious usage of the Church of Rome. Their removal has been ordered on the ground that they are adjuncts to an altar; their Lordships cannot but think that they are more properly to be regarded as adjuncts to a Communion table.” Is there not a very great distinction between the lighted candles and the credence table? What are lighted candles? Can anyone doubt that they are an addition to the services ordered by the Prayer Book, and that therefore they stand upon quite a different basis from the credence table? They are an addition in the performance of the services of the church. The legitimate deduction from Westerton and Liddell is, that lighted candles on the Communion Table, when not used for giving light, are illegal. I refer your Lordship to Moore's Report, from page 17 to page 70.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the earlier judgment.

(Mr. Stephens.) It is the earlier judgment.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You must remember, in dealing with that, that the greater part of Dr. Lushington's judgment was reversed.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am aware of that, my Lord, but I do not think this part which I am going to read was. Dr. Lushington held—

(The Dean of the Arches.) The question of lighted candles was not taken up to the Privy Council; it stood entirely on the decision of the Court below.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes; and there is another fact in Westerton and Liddell distinguishing it from the present case. Your Lordship may remember that there was an affidavit from Mr. Liddell, stating that the candles were not lighted.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I know it did not go up. I think the question of lighted candles was not even mooted in the Arches Court.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The fact is the candles were not lighted, and therefore when Dr. Lushington decided that they were lawful ornaments, Mr. Liddell said, "Well, that is all I want, my candles are not 'lighted,'" and there the matter stopped.

(Mr. Stephens.) Therefore it is not analogous to the present question, there being no question of lighted candles in Westerton and Liddell.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Just so. There is no doubt what Dr. Lushington decided was that candlesticks and candles were lawful, but it was not lawful to light them during the service. That was the substance of his decision. But there is this to be remarked, he did not make any decree upon it, and it was more a judicial dictum than an abstract decision; because I do not think the question of lighted candles was before him. Nobody accused Mr. Liddell of having lighted candles, but only of having candlesticks and candles on the altar. Dr. Lushington decided they were lawful, and he went a little further than the ratio decidendi required, and said they must not be lit.

(Mr. Stephens.) I think that is substantially the state of the case.

My Lord, you will find at pages 156 and 187 of Moore's report of Westerton and Liddell, their Lordships say "the word 'ornaments' applies, and in 'this rubric is confined to those articles the use of which, in the services and ministrations of the church is prescribed by the Prayer Book of Edward VI.," and "that in the performance of the services, rites, and ceremonies ordered by the Prayer Book, the directions contained in it must be strictly observed; that no omission and no addition can be permitted."

The question, therefore, appears to be this: Do any of the Prayer Books of Edward VI., Elizabeth, and Charles II., make any mention of candlesticks, altar lights, or lighted candles? I apprehend it cannot be contended for one moment, that there is the slightest allusion to such ornaments of the Church; nor do we find in any of our Prayer Books any directions for lighting candles in the performance of divine worship.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The first proposition would apply to unlighted candles; the second applies to lighted candles alone.

(Mr. Stephens.) To lighted candles alone.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Your first proposition, which is a perfectly true one, that lighted candles are not mentioned eo nomine in either of the Prayer Books would apply to candles and candlesticks.

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly. First, I submit that candles and candlesticks are ornaments—

(The Dean of the Arches.) I quite understand your proposition. And then you say, secondly, the Prayer Book contains no direction for the use of such ornaments, and therefore their introduction is an additional ceremony.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, in the performance of divine service. Therefore, I submit that, under the authority of Westerton and Liddell, and of the Acts of Uniformity, lighted candles on the Communion Table in the performance of divine service are illegal.

I do not think, under the circumstances, I need any longer trespass upon the attention of your Lordship to-day, and I will therefore conclude the observations which I have thought it necessary to make on this branch of the subject, and will proceed to my next point to-morrow morning.

(The Dean of the Arches.) To-morrow I will sit until half-past three; and I am ready to sit at ten, if you think necessary, in order to give you an opportunity of concluding your argument.

(Mr. Stephens.) I will do my best.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I beg you to understand, I do not wish to curtail you. These cases are not like ordinary cases. They require an immense citation of authorities; and the Judge puts questions to Counsel which lead to discussion, and no doubt have the effect of lengthening the case; but the Judge must necessarily do that in order that he may follow the argument. This is no ordinary case; it requires an immense amount of documentary evidence and rare books from various sources, which in an ordinary case it is not necessary to have recourse to. Therefore, Mr. Stephens, I do not in the least wish to curtail your argument.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am very much obliged to your Lordship.

Adjourned to to-morrow, 10 o'clock.

FOURTH DAY.

Saturday, December 7, 1867.

(Mr. Stephens.) I propose, my Lord, to deal with the subject of Incense, and will very shortly state the Articles and the Responsive Allegation, so far as they apply to the matter now under our consideration. The charge as to Incense is contained in the 7th and 8th paragraph of the Articles: "That the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie has in his said church, and within the two years last past (to wit, on Sunday the 23rd day of December, on Christmas Day last past, and on Sunday the 30th day of December, all in the year of our Lord 1866, used incense for censuring persons or things in and during the celebration of the holy communion, and permitted and sanctioned such use of incense." "That the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie has in his said church, and within two years last past, to wit, on Sunday the 13th day of January in the year of our Lord 1867, unlawfully used incense in and during the celebration of the holy communion." In the Responsive Allegation, paragraph 7, Mr. Mackonochie admits having used in December 1866 incense for censuring persons and things, but states that he has discontinued it since the 30th December 1866, and refers to his address to his parishioners.

In the Responsive Allegation, at paragraph 7, Mr. Mackonochie admits having in December 1866 used incense for censuring persons and things, but states that he has discontinued it since December 1866, and refers to his address to his parishioners. At paragraph 9 Mr. Mackonochie denies that the use of incense alleged in the 7th and 8th Articles is unlawful. In the Responsive Allegation, at paragraph 8, Mr. Mackonochie admits that on the 13th January he caused and allowed incense to be burned during the reading of the prayer of consecration, and afterwards till the time of the administration of the Communion to the people; but he denies that he used it unlawfully, or that such use is unlawful. I believe, my Lord, I have now stated accurately what appears upon the Articles and upon the Responsive Allegation; and no admissions of counsel one way or the other, except they are entered on the pleadings, can in the slightest degree affect your judgment in dealing with this case.

Edward the VI.'s First Book was compiled from the several missals then in use which contained directions for the use of incense at certain places at the celebration of divine service. The Prayer Book of Edward VI., of Elizabeth, and Charles II. do not contain any directions, either express or implied, for the use of incense, nor is the word "Incense" mentioned. There is not the slightest allusion to incense pots or censers as ornaments. But, my Lord, I care not one farthing whether there were incense pots or not, or any other ornaments of a like character, for this reason, that the question before the Court is not one of ornaments, but one of ceremonies.

I submit that if incense be used as an act of religious worship, or as a symbol of prayer, it is an unauthorized addition to the Book of Common Prayer, and it is performing the services of the church in a different manner from that which is prescribed by the Acts of Uniformity.

The Sarum Missal contains several directions for the use of incense. At page 42 of Walker's Liturgy of the Church of Sarum, will be seen, how like are the practices as to censuring persons and things in the Church of Rome, to the practices at St. Alban's in 1866, and for a long time anterior to that period: in fact, such practices never ceased until it was well known that proceedings were about to be instituted against Mr. Mackonochie. I will now read the rubric from Walker:—"Then the deacon handing him the censer kisses his hand, and the priest incenses the midst and either side of the altar, first on the right part, afterwards on the left, and immediately in the midst. Then the deacon incenses the priest, and after this the priest kisses the text or book, out of which the sub-deacon executes his ministry. . . . At the end of the Alléluya, Sequence, or Tract, the deacon before he goes to the lectern to read the Gospel, incenses the altar in the midst only, for he shall never incense the lectern, either at mass or matins, before he reads the Gospel" (page 47). . . . Having done which, he receives the censer from the deacon, and incenses the sacrifice thrice in the form of a cross, and round the chalice or sacrifice, and then he incenses the place between himself and the altar. . . . After this, the priest is incensed by the deacon and the sub-deacon, and the sub-deacon gives him the text to kiss, then the acolyte incenses the choir; beginning with the rulers; then the upper grade on the decani side [beginning with the dean himself in cathedrals, or, if he be absent, at the nearest stall], then the upper grade in the cantoris side, then the lower grades in like manner, the boy bowing to each one as he incenses him, the sub-deacon following with the text for each one to kiss." (Page 51.)

The directions for the use of incense in the Sarum Missal, are not inserted in the First Book of Edward VI.; and if they were not inserted in the First Book of Edward VI., can there be a stronger argument in order to establish that they were not intended to be used?

It is clear Bishop Ridley considered that the symbolical use of incense was not authorized during divine service. In his works it is said (Parker Society's edition, p. 90): "Many other actions there be, which are lawful and honest in private places, which are neither comely nor honest not only in churches but also in other assemblies of honest people. Tertulian saith he used sometimes to burn frankincense in his chamber, which was then used by idolators, and is so still in the Romish churches. But he joineth withal; but not after such a rite or ceremony, nor after such a fashion, nor with such preparation or sumptuousness, as it is done before the idols."

In a paper entitled "The Hurt of hearing the Mass—"

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is the reference?
(Mr. Stephens.) The second volume of Bradford's works, page 310, Parker Society's edition. This paper was written by John Bradford in Queen Mary's reign, and it enumerates the censuring of the sacrament among the parts of the mass, placing it among other things which are unquestionably abolished: "The Agnus Dei, Pope Sergius about the year of our Lord 700 brought into the mass. Innocentius ordained the pax to be given to the people. Pope Leo commanded the sacrament to be censed. Bonifacius put in his foot for the covering of the altars. Pelagius brought out the commemoration of the dead to be had in the mass. Vigilius ordained that the priest should say mass with his face towards the East."

Your Lordship will observe that it was Pope Leo who commanded the sacrament to be censed; and I should like to know from my friends whether there is any authority for commanding the sacrament to be censed anterior to that period.

In Bishop Pilkington's works, page 129 (Parker Society's edition), there is an exposition upon the prophet Aggeus, in which he says: "The Pope's church hath all things pleasant in it to delight the people withal. As for the eyes, their God hangs in a rope, images gilded, painted, carved most finely, copes, chalices, crosses of gold and silver, banners, &c., with relics and altars; for the ears, singing, ringing, and organs piping; for the nose, frankincense sweet; to wash away sins (as they say) holy water, of their own hallowing and making; priests, an infinite sort; masses, trentals, diriges, and pardons, &c., written with Scripture. But where the Gospel is preached, they knowing that God is not pleased but only with a pure heart, they are content with an honest place appointed to resort together in, though it were never hallowed by bishop at all, but only have a pulpit, a preacher to the people, deacon for the poor, or a table for the Communion, with bare walls, or else written with Scriptures, having God's eternal word always sounding among them in their sight and ears; and last of all they should have good discipline, correct faults, and keep good order in all their meetings. But as they wept to see this second house no more costly nor pleasant to the eye, so our poor Papists weep to see our churches so bare, saying they be like barns, there is nothing in them to make curtesy unto, neither saints nor yet their old little god. But hereafter it appears whether of these churches God is more delighted withal. For although these ceremonies, [here incense or frankincense is enumerated and dealt with as a ceremony] "in the Old Law were given by Moses for the hardness of the people, to keep them exercised that they fall not to idolatry of the Gentiles, yet is there no mention of either of these in the New Testament, nor yet commandment now, neither to us nor them, but forbidden to be used of all, both of us and them. We be no longer under shadows, but under the truth. Christ hath fulfilled all, and taken away all such dark kind of ceremonies, and hath placed the clear light of his Gospel in his Church, to continue to the end! But the Pope hath thrust the Church full of more blind and wicked ceremonies than ever Moses did."

Your Lordship may remember that I directed your attention to the fact that it was a Pope who first introduced frankincense as a ceremony into the Church, and as a mode of carrying out the system of the Church of Rome, which essentially consists in priest-rule and priest-craft. Every one of the ceremonies in this case owes its origin, not to the New Testament, but to man's invention, and that man a Pope.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That passage that you have read is from Bradford?

(Mr. Stephens.) Bradford, p. 310.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What did you say about organs? You read something about organs piping, but I did not catch what it was. He seems to be as severe against organs as against anything else.

(Mr. Stephens.) Organs are allowed as subsidiary in our Church services on the like principle as the credence table.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The writer you cite is as severe against organs as anything else, is he not?

(Mr. Stephens.) The sentence commences thus:—
“The Pope’s Church hath all things pleasant in it to delight the people withal. As for the eyes, therein God hangs in a rope, images gilded, painted, carved most finely, copes, chalices, crosses of gold and silver, banners, &c., with relics and altars; for the ears, singing, ringing, and organs piping.”

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am told that this is from Pilkington, and not from Bradford?

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes. The reference before was from Bradford, p. 310; this is from Pilkington, p. 129. It was I that misled Mr. Stephens unintentionally, when I asked about organs piping. I asked what page of Bradford.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am very much obliged to your Lordship, as I have been for every question your Lordship has put to me throughout this argument.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Of course I can have but one object,—to understand your argument.

(Mr. Stephens.) Then follow the words, “ringing, organs piping,” which seem to me not very important. Certain false, erroneous, and unscriptural doctrines were laid down by the Church of Rome, so as to put man’s conscience in trammels. And how were such principles carried out? By every species of music, fine dresses, and processions, and by exalting the priesthood as a set of men between the Creator and the rest of mankind.

I will now direct your Lordship’s attention to a book I have previously cited, namely, Peacock’s Church Furniture. I am going to quote from pages 92 and 90. Of the 150 churches mentioned in the Inventories, 79 appear at the end of Mary’s reign to have one or more censers. In April 1566 these had been sold, broken, defaced, returned to the owners, taken away by the priest, or otherwise got rid of, except in two instances.

In both of these cases, they are remaining together with other illegal ornaments; namely, at Gunbie (p. 72), with a “sepulker and a pax,” which at this period were clearly illegal. At Gretford (p. 90) with a cross cloth with the image of the Trinity. Here only the upper part of the censer was remaining, the nether part having been stolen away.

In support of incense, reliance has been or may be placed upon the following verse, alleged to be a prophecy of the use of incense in the Christian Church: Malachi, c. 1, v. 11. It is referred to, my Lord, in “The Church Union Case” (p. 72); I will read the text. “For from the rising of the sun, even unto the going down of the same, my Name shall be great among the Gentiles; and in every place incense shall be offered unto my Name, and a pure offering; for my Name shall be great among the Heathen, saith the Lord of Hosts.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think I might relieve you from that part of the argument. Certainly, I shall not consider that citation as having any weight with me in reference to the lawfulness of the use of incense.

(Mr. Stephens.) I thought so, but it was mentioned in the Church Union case.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not wish to curtail your argument, and I do not complain of your commenting upon it; but it will save time if I say that it will not have the slightest weight with me.

(Mr. Stephens.) Any intimation your Lordship makes will experience from me the greatest respect. I will not therefore refer to Bishop Jewel on this point.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Of course I am not to be taken, from being silent, as admitting that. I wish it to be understood that silence does not give consent.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You consent to nothing; I understand you. It will give consent to nothing that I am aware of. What I say about this citation is, that I certainly should not be influenced in my decision as to whether incense was lawful in the churches of these times, by a reference to the prophet Malachi.

(Mr. Stephens.) Will your Lordship take the reference to 1 Jewel, page 110 (Sermon and Harding).

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, certainly; and, as I have said before, you have a reply.

(Mr. Stephens.) I have not the slightest fear that my friends will attempt to discuss with me that the quotation in question from the prophet Malachi, justifies the use of incense in our churches under the Acts of Uniformity. I will just refer your Lordship to 2 Jewel, pp. 712 and 713; and 5 Andrewes’ Sermons, pp. 324 and 355; and I may perhaps be permitted to remark that at page 358 Bishop Andrewes treats the use of incense as something belonging to the Jewish law as a type of prayer.

(The Dean of the Arches.) If you wish to read these, do; but I do not think it is necessary.

(Mr. Stephens.) I really do not wish to do so. All I want to show is, that the premises on which the counsel in the Church Union case gave their opinions are inaccurate, especially as it has been published by the Ritual Commissioners.

(The Dean of the Arches.) On behalf of the Ritual Commissioners, whom I represent with Mr. Coleridge here, your junior, I must say both opinions are put in. The opinions taken on your side are also printed.

(Mr. Stephens.) The language of Bishop Andrewes as to the use of incense for any symbolical purpose is the more important, as the principal evidence of incense being used in the church is connected with him. In Andrewes’ minor works (pages xcvi. and xcvi.), “The following description of Bishop Andrewes’ chapel is taken from Brynne’s Canterbury’s Doom (pages 121–124). E. A triquarteral censer, wherein the clerk putteth incense at the reading of the first lesson. H, the navicula, like the keel of a boat with a half cover and a foot, out of which the frankincense is poured.” In the Hierurgia Anglicana, page 8, there is a copy of the plan to which this description refers.

The burning of incense at the first lesson may have been a memorial of the Old Dispensation, when the burning of incense was part of the prescribed service to God. At any rate, this burning of incense at the first lesson has nothing in common with the censuring of persons and things, nor (which is very important) with the burning of incense after the elements have been consecrated, and while they remain unconsumed.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say it has nothing to do with the censuring of persons and things, or burning incense after the elements have been consecrated and while they remain unconsumed?

(Mr. Stephens.) Those are the words I used.

In Bishop Andrewes’ Minor Works, at page 159 will be found “a coppie of the Forme used by the Lo. Bishop of Elye in consecrating the newe church plate of the cathedrall church of Worcester.” At page 162: “Lastly he bringeth the censer, which the bishop likewise sets on, and the chaplains say”

Now, my Lord, no censer was given or belonged to Worcester cathedral, and Bishop Andrewes either consecrated a censer for his own use, or added his own censer to the plate to be consecrated, in order to use the whole of his form of consecration. What of that? Immediately opposite to this direction, or rubric, or anything else any person likes to call it, written in italics, we find this note: “The censer was my Lo: own.” In other words, no censer was given to or belonged to Worcester Cathedral, and Bishop Andrewes either consecrated a censer for his own use or added his own censer to the plate to be consecrated in order to use the whole of his form of consecration. Respecting this “form of consecrating Church plate,” I affirm, my Lord, as a matter of law, that any form for the consecration of Church plate in a Church is illegal.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is it illegal?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. There is no power but Parliament that can impose any religious form. Where is the authority in either of the Acts of Uniformity of Edward VI., or Elizabeth, or Charles II., for the consecration of the Church plate? No archbishop, no bishop, no convocation, no national synod, per se, has the slightest right to impose any additional form to those forms that are prescribed by the Acts of Uniformity. The clergy can neither add to the Act of Uniformity, nor can they omit therefrom. And, my Lord, I assert among the other blessings of the Reformation, that principle of law which I have laid down to your Lordship is to my mind one of the greatest, viz., that the clergy of this country have no right, in the performance of Divine Service, to impose forms or rites or ceremonies not prescribed by the Prayer Book, or to omit any of the forms, rites, or ceremonies prescribed by that book, without the consent and assent of the two Houses of Parliament, and the subsequent consent of the Sovereign.

In 3 Fuller's Church History (p. 348, (Ed.) London, 1837): "Another falls foul upon him [Bishop Andrews] for the ornaments of his chapel as popish and superstitious in the superabundant ceremonies thereof to which I can say little. But this I dare affirm, that wheresoever he was, a parson, a dean or a bishop, he never troubled parish, college, or diocesan with pressing other ceremonies upon them than such which he found used there before his coming thither; and it had not been amiss, if such who would be accounted his friends and admirers had followed him in the footsteps of his moderation, content without the enjoining their private practices and opinions upon others."

I need hardly say this passage is upon the character and death of Bishop Andrewes.

In the Hierurgia Anglicana, page 184, there is a form of consecrating a censer used by Archbishop Sancroft in 1685, in the reign of James II. This form is evidently taken from Bishop Andrewes; and on the only occasion that Archbishop Sancroft is recorded to have used it, there was no censer to consecrate. That, your Lordship will find at pages 122 and 125 of the Hierurgia Anglicana.

I now propose to refer to 7 Bishop Wilson's works (p. 280). It is clear about the time of passing the Act of Uniformity of Charles II. that incense was not used in the performance of divine service. In fact, Dr. Sherlock was accused of Popery. And why? Because he used incense, as it was erroneously thought, as an act of worship. I will read the passage. "As he lived, so he died—"

(The Dean of the Arches.) Which of the Sherlocks, the dean or the bishop? There were two Sherlocks.

(Mr. Stephens.) This is the dean. "As he had lived, so he died, a member as well as an ornament of the Church of England; notwithstanding the reproach raised and industriously spread abroad that he was a Papist in disguise. This was said both by Papists and Dissenters; and both had the same end in propagating the calumny,—the dis-service of the Church, which he adorned by his most exemplary life. After all, there was no ground for this slanderous report, except such as might shame those that built anything thereon. It was said, for instance,—[this, my Lord, is the Popery of which he was accused,]—'that he burnt incense in the church. Now, the truth of that matter was this. His worthy patron, Charles Earl of Derby, the Easter after the Restoration, desiring to countenance by his own presence the now re-established worship of the Church, chose to receive the Lord's Supper at his parish church rather than in his chapel at Latham. The doctor, suspecting what he found too true, that the chancel had been as little regarded as the Lord's Supper, which had not been administered in that church for some years past, went a few days before to see things put in order; and, cleansing the chancel, which, it seems, had been more frequented by dogs and swine than men, it raised such an insufferable stench that he was obliged to order frankincense to be burned the "day before the solemnity, that his congregation might not be discomposed by such an unexpected nuisance. This was improved so far as to make him a Papist."

Such was the opinion of that time in reference to incense. Incense was only used by the Romanists in order to carry out some of their superstitious and idolatrous ceremonies; and the mere fact of using it was considered a proof that a man was not a true and faithful son of the reformed Church. We shall, probably, have a great array of historical evidence as to the use of incense. No doubt, my Lord, incense was used for the purpose of fumigation. For example, incense was used in our churches for the purpose of fumigation during the Plague. I shall ask my friends when I come to reply: have you produced a single instance, sanctioned by any authority entitled to respect, of frankincense or incense being used for the purpose of a ceremony in the reformed church? No doubt, my Lord, incense may be used, it would be idle for me to say that incense may not be used, for the purpose of fumigation. I do not complain of that, but I do complain that it should be used in the ceremonies of the church,—introduced at a particular period, for the purpose of giving some species of signification—I care not what the signification is—to the Holy Communion. It is a ceremony that is not warranted or justified by the Acts of Uniformity. Its introduction, as in the present case, at a particular period of the service, namely, the Holy Communion, is nothing more or less than symbolical of the corruptions and idolatry of the Church of Rome.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you know what Luther said about it? I have the passage before me: "Nec candelas nec thurificationem prohibemus; sed non exigemus; esse hoc liberum."

(Mr. Stephens.) I care not for all the silly gossip that may be produced one way or the other. I rest the case of the Promoter upon the highest authority in this land, viz., the statute law. I care not one farthing for any practice or dicta in opposition to the positive language of the Acts of Uniformity.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Your argument is quite distinct. You say incense may be used for fumigation, but that it assumes a very different character when used as an addition to the services of the church, or accompanying any of the services of the church.

(Mr. Stephens.) As a ceremony. Your Lordship has now most accurately taken down my argument.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Whatever the result may be, I think there cannot be any dispute in any candid mind, that the two things are very distinct and different.

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly. I challenge the learned counsel on the opposite side to show me how they escape the Acts of Uniformity in the use of incense. And the like observation applies to every one of the questions before your Lordship.

I now propose to cite Dodwell on the use of incense. It is "a discourse concerning the use of incense in divine offices."

(The Dean of the Arches.) He is a Roman Catholic writer, is he not?

(Mr. Stephens.) Oh no, my Lord. He was not a Roman Catholic. He was born in 1641, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin,—

(The Dean of the Arches.) Like many other good men.

(Mr. Stephens.) Where, my Lord, the Protestant faith has been purely preserved. He was a friend of Bishop Jeremy Taylor, of Dr. Hicks, and of Lloyd, Bishop of St. Asaph.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Lloyd and Hicks were both non-jurors?

(Mr. Stephens.) They were. I am, my Lord, about to quote from Dodwell (Preface, page 1). It is entitled Part of the letter which occasioned the following discourse: "The Church of England, the best reformed, and of which I myself am a member, has left off the use of incense [thus implying "that leaving off incense was part of the reformation], though practised by all our churches, before our quarrel with the Church of Rome. I would therefore fain know what just reasons she had, when she reformed, to lay it aside. I think I have a good cause to enquire, because I find that it was commanded by God to his Church, and never since, that I know of, repealed."

The only other authority I shall cite upon this branch of the case is Bennett on the "Principles of the Book of Common Prayer," page 155,—a book that I believe is very familiar to your Lordship.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No, I never read it. Is it Mr. Bennett of Rome? What is the date of the author? Is it a book on the Articles?

(Mr. Stephens.) No. This is a book on the principles of the Book of Common Prayer. I assume your Lordship wants to know the edition.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No; I only want to know when the author lived, or when he wrote it. I know nothing about it.

(Mr. Droop.) I believe the date is somewhere about 1710.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is it not the same Bennett who wrote on the Articles? There is a very learned book on the Articles about that time.

(Mr. Droop.) I believe it is the same person; I will not assert that it is, but I have an impression that it is.

(Mr. Stephens.) The author describes himself as the Rev. W. J. E. Bennett, M.A., late student of Christchurch, Oxford, and incumbent of St. Paul's, Knightsbridge. At page 155, in dealing with the ceremonies that have been abolished, he says: "The burning of incense as a part of the services of God, the consecration and adoration of crosses and crucifixes." "The elements to be consecrated before the people, and their falling down to worship it."

(The Dean of the Arches.) I daresay if I should find it necessary to refer to some of the rare books you have quoted, I might ask you to lend me them.

(Mr. Stephens.) It will, my Lord, afford me great pleasure.

(The Dean of the Arches.) This, I see, [alluding to Dodwell] is entirely on the use of incense in divine offices.

(Mr. Stephens.) It is. Dodwell is a very scarce book.

I have concluded my observations so far as regards incense; and I submit to your Lordship, upon the authorities I have cited, that the use of incense in the manner described in these Articles is an unlawful addition to the ceremonies of the Church.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The Bennett you quoted from is certainly the existing Mr. Bennett, because he was a student of Christ Church when I was, and unquestionably he was incumbent of St. Paul's, Knightsbridge. You are under a mistake, Mr. Droop, in thinking that this was the Bennett of 1709.

(Mr. Droop.) Yes, I find I am.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There was a Bennett who, about 1709, wrote a very learned book on the Thirty-nine Articles, to which I have had the necessity of referring. But I see this is the living Mr. Bennett.

(Mr. Droop.) The other Mr. Bennett of 1709 wrote on the Articles.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes; but that is not the book to which Mr. Stephens referred. It is a book by the present Mr. Bennett.

(Mr. Stephens.) That is the book that was written, probably, shortly after he was at college with your Lordship.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No; when he was at Knightsbridge; because he says that he is incumbent of St. Paul's, Knightsbridge. Therefore the book handed up to me is a book written when he was incumbent of St. Paul's, Knightsbridge.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am indebted to your Lordship. I read his description when I cited the Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is so. Do you still cite him as an authority, or must I strike him out?

(Mr. Stephens.) Oh no. I am very glad that Mr. Bennett has given his opinion in the manner he has done on incense and upon the other ceremonies that have been abolished.

I will now proceed to consider the Mixed Chalice.

The fourth charge against Mr. Mackonochie is that in December 1866 and in January 1867 he mixed water with the sacramental wine, and permitted and sanctioned such mixing, and the administration to the communicants of the wine so mixed. That is admitted to be true in paragraph 10 of the Responsive Allegations, Article 10.

I submit (1), that the mixing of the water with the wine is an additional rite and ceremony not prescribed in the Prayer Book; and (2), that the consecration and administration to the communicants of a mixture of "wine and water," instead of "wine" alone, makes the whole service a different form or order of administering the sacrament of the Lord's Supper from that which is prescribed in the Prayer Book.

I will not trespass on your Lordship's attention as to the earlier canons on this subject; but I will give your Lordship two illustrations, to establish the significance which the Roman Catholics attached, and do attach, to the mixing of water with the wine in the Holy Communion.

I beg to refer your Lordship to 5 Collier's Ecclesiastical History, for a "Rationale of Ceremonies," probably issued between 1539 and 1543; that is, towards the end of the Reign of Henry VIII. The title is, "A Rationale of Ceremonies to be used in the Church of England, together with an Explanation of the meaning and Significancy of them." That title will be found at page 104 of Collier, and the following passage at page 113: "Then follows the offering, whereby we learn to prepare ourselves, by God's grace, to be an acceptable oblation to him, to the intent that we may be partakers of the blessed sacrifice which he offered for us upon the cross. At which time, the minister, laying the bread upon the altar, makes the chalice, mixing the water with the wine, signifying, thereby, how that blood and water ran out of Christ's side in his passion, and admonishes us of the inseparable coupling and joining of Christ and his church."

I now wish to refer your Lordship to the second rubric in Walker's Liturgy of the Church of Sarum (page 74). "Meanwhile the sub-deacon receives bread and wine and water with the chalice, and prepares it for the administration of the Eucharist, first seeking a blessing of the water from the priest thus: 'Bless.' The priest replies: 'The Lord; may it be blessed by Him out of whose side there came blood and water. In the name, &c.'"

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is in the Sarum Missal.

(Mr. Stephens.) It is my Lord, in the Sarum Missal.

In the Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent, the 22d session, c. 7, "On the water to be mixed with the wine to be offered in the chalice." The Holy Synod in the next place observes, "That it hath been enjoined by the Church on priests to mix water with the wine that is to be offered in the chalice; as well because it is believed that Christ our Lord did so, as also because from his side there came out blood and water which sacramental mystery is renewed by this mixture; and whereas in the Revelation of the blessed John, the peoples are called waters, the union of that faithful people with Christ their head is hereby represented."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Those are the only two reasons that are given, I think.

(Mr. Stephens.) The only two. From what is here stated, it is the "Holy Synod" that decrees this, upon which I shall have to comment at some future stage of my argument.

In the ordinary of the mass according to the Roman use at the oblation of the chalice, the prayer explains, that the mixture of the wine and water signifies the uniting of the divine and human nature in the person of our Saviour.

I will refer your Lordship to "The Crown of Jesus," and there can be no doubt as to the Popery of that book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I daresay not from the sound.

(Mr. Stephens.) Oh, my Lord, it is the real article. I think I have referred to it, because I stated to your Lordship that the hymnal at St. Alban's contains many hymns taken out of this book.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Your Lordship remembers that there is no evidence that it is used at St. Alban's.

(Mr. Stephens.) I now refer to the "Crown of Jesus," page 194.

(The Dean of the Arches.) This is a book I must certainly borrow of you.

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly, my Lord. I will read the recommendation of this book by Cardinal Wiseman, Dr. Cullen, and other Roman Catholic archbishops and bishops. This is Cardinal Wiseman's recommendation: "I shall be happy to see the 'Crown of Jesus' in the hands of all members of my flock. N. Card. Wiseman." Then we come to the recommendations of the Most Reverend the Archbishops of Ireland: "I thank you very much for the 'Crown of Jesus'; you may affix my recommendation, and add my name in any way you wish, after that of his Eminence." That is dated February 19th, 1862, and signed by Dr. Cullen, "Archbishop of Dublin, Primate of Ireland." "I sincerely congratulate you on the good and great work which you have accomplished in giving to our Catholic people such an admirable book of devotion as 'The Crown of Jesus.' Surely there was never in the world a Catholic Prayer Book more worthy of the title which it bears, 'A Complete Catholic Manual.' It would be hard indeed to think of anything that could enter into the composition of such a book that is wanting here. I should rejoice exceedingly to see it widely circulated in this diocese."

I direct the attention of the Court to the following words, in reference to the observation I made with regard to the hymnal used at St. Alban's. "The beautiful hymns with which it abounds add in a remarkable degree to its value as a book of devotion. I trust that our people, for whom sacred song has always had such attractions, will soon make themselves familiar with these charming hymns. + Joseph, Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of all Ireland. Drogheda, 17th February 1862."

"I am obliged for the copy of your excellent book 'The Crown of Jesus,' and I shall encourage its circulation. + John, Archbishop of Tuam, 22nd February 1862."

"I am satisfied that 'The Crown of Jesus' may be placed in the hands of the faithful, and I approve of its use and circulation in the diocese of Cashel and Emly. + Patrick, Archbishop of Cashel and Emly. Thurles, 21st February, 1862."

I may perhaps remark, that the archbishops do not describe themselves as "Titular."

There can, however, be no doubt as to the purity of this book, and I will proceed to read from it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) By whom is this book printed and published? As my friend has sat down, I will take this opportunity of asking your Lordship kindly to ask my learned friend to inform you, for my information, by whom this book is written.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I daresay he will lend you a copy when he has done, and then you can look at it. I will ask him to do so.

(Mr. Prideaux.) If your Lordship pleases, I may find it necessary to refer to the book.

(Mr. Stephens.) I shall be most happy to supply my friend with a copy of the "Crown of Jesus," and I will likewise give him a table referring to the hymns in "The Crown of Jesus," which are to be found in the hymnal noted that is used at St. Alban's.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I wonder my friend insists upon this.

(The Dean of the Arches.) We must do things legally. We have no evidence whatever about the hymnal being used at St. Alban's which correspond with a number of these.

(Mr. Stephens.) I use it as a part of my argument.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not object to the use of the hymnal, but I do object to my friend saying that it is used at St. Alban's.

(Mr. Stephens.) We find at page 194, "pouring wine and water into the chalice:"—"Oh! God + who, in creating human nature, didst wonderfully dignify it, and hast still more wonderfully renewed it, grant that by the mystery of this water and wine we may be made partakers of His divinity who vouchsafed to become partaker of our humanity, Jesus Christ, Thy Son our Lord, who liveth and reigneth with Thee in the Unity of, &c."

Then at the bottom of the page, there is a note: "A small quantity of water is added to the wine, as a memorial of the union of the divine and human nature in Christ, and also in remembrance of what occurred when Our Lord's side was opened with the lance;—there came forth blood mingled with water." I think I have clearly established that this mixing of water with the wine in the Holy Communion is a rite that is practised in the Roman Catholic Church.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That could hardly be denied.

(Mr. Stephens.) I do not know what will be denied.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Go on, if you please. You have established it as far as this is concerned.

(Mr. Stephens.) And likewise that it owes its origin to some decree of some pope, to which I have directed the attention of the Court.

Since the Reformation, the only trace of the mixed chalice is in the first Book of Common Prayer, where it is directed that the water should be mixed with the wine at the Communion.

(The Dean of the Arches.) "A little pure and clean water."

(Mr. Stephens.) Will your Lordship permit me to direct your attention to the Liturgies of Edward VI., page 85. You will see in the second rubric, towards the end, "And putting the wine into the chalice, or else into some fair and convenient cup prepared for that use (if the chalice will not serve), putting thereto," as your Lordship most accurately has expressed it, "a little pure and clean water." In all subsequent Books of the Common Prayer "bread and wine" are exclusively mentioned.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think you had better read to the end of the next sentence, because it is just possible that some argument may be raised about it, as it occurs to me, "putting thereto a little pure and clean water, and setting forth the bread and wine upon the altar." And therefore, after the wine had "had a little pure and clean water" added to it, the rubric goes on to say, "and setting the bread and wine upon the altar."

(Mr. Stephens.) I see the argument. I was going to meet it. I am deeply indebted to your Lordship for reminding me of it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is as well that your attention should be drawn to it.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. I am obliged to your Lordship.

I have stated that in all subsequent Books of Common Prayer "bread and wine" are exclusively mentioned in the Holy Communion, and no allusion is made to "water," nor to any vessel for holding the water.

As the practice of mixing water with the wine was required by the First Prayer Book of Edward VI., but "wine" only has been mentioned in the subsequent Prayer Books, it amounts, in fact, to a direct prohibition of the practice, because it evinces an intention to abandon it or to exclude it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say the omission amounts to a direct prohibition of the practice.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, because it evidences an intention to exclude it, coupled with what I have previously said, that there is no provision for a vessel to hold the water.

The First Book of Edward VI. was intended to be a complete account of all the rites and ceremonies to be performed in divine service. All ceremonies not expressly mentioned and retained in that Book were abolished.

In order to save your Lordship's time, perhaps you will take a reference to Cranmer's Remains, page 159, and also to 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 93, which direct that at the time of the Holy Communion no ceremonies or gestures are to be used, except those appointed by the Book of Common Prayer. It would be, in itself, most improbable that Cranmer and the other revisers of 1552 should have intended Edward's second book to be treated differently from the first book.

The Act of 5 & 6 Edward VI. c. 1. s. 5, establishing the second book, is most explicit upon the point, declaring that the second book "to be of like force, authority, and value as the same like fore-book intituled 'The Book of Common Prayer,' was before, and to be accepted, received, used, and esteemed in like sort and manner, and with the same clauses of provisions and exceptions, to all intents, constructions, and purposes, as by the Act of Parliament made in the second year of the King's Majesty's reign was ordained, limited, expressed, and appointed for the uniformity of service and administration of the sacraments throughout the realm, upon such several pains as in the said Act of Parliament was expressed." The Elizabethan Act of Uniformity repeated almost verbatim the provisions of the 2 & 3 Edward VI. c. 1, establishing Edward's first book; and therefore it must be construed as prohibiting all ceremonies not mentioned in the Prayer Book which it establishes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I see what you mean; it is that Elizabeth's statute must be construed as prohibiting all ceremonies not mentioned in Elizabeth's book.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The word "it" misled me. I see now.

(Mr. Stephens.) The Visitation Articles of the different archbishops and bishops, agree in interpreting the Elizabethan Act of Uniformity in like manner. I have read them to such an extent that I need not further trespass upon the time of the Court. It is clear that the omission from Edward VI.'s second book, of any direction to mix water with the sacramental wine, rendered such mixing unlawful.

It was a ceremony,—and neither in the second book of Edward VI. nor in the Act of Uniformity of Elizabeth, nor in the Act of Uniformity of Charles II. is there any direction for the mixing of water with the sacramental wine. Therefore the mixing of the water with the wine is an additional and an illegal ceremony, and in one of the most holy and sacred parts of our service.

There is one person, my Lord,—I believe he is living at the present moment,—a gentleman for whom sentiments of deep respect are entertained for his learning,—I allude to the Rev. William Maskell—

(The Dean of the Arches.) The works of Maskell are well known.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am now about to refer your Lordship to the preface of Maskell's Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England, according to the use of Sarum. I cite the second edition, London, 1846, page 134 of the preface: "There are many examples by which we might prove that priests of the Church of England, since the removal of the order in the year 1552, nevertheless have mixed water with the wine in the celebration of the holy Eucharist. The case of Bishop Andrewes has been already mentioned. The author of an answer to Mr. Leslie,

"in 1719, speaks of the practice being continued by some. And in the reign of King James, when Prince Charles visited Spain, among the royal orders drawn up for directing the English service which was to be observed in the prince's family during his stay at Madrid was,—IV. That the communion be celebrated in due form, with an oblation of every communicant, and admixing water with the wine.' There is an argument, however, which we cannot but allow might in this matter have had very considerable weight with men before 1662; viz., that the Common Prayer Books from 1552 until then, rested not upon sufficient authority; and therefore Bishop Andrewes and Bishop Overall in their departure from the rubrics of the later books were but observing that order which alone, during the entire period of which I am now speaking, was binding upon the Church of England. It was not possible, neither would it have been wise, that they should in all things have returned to the first book of 1549, better though it was than that of 1552, as they were ready to acknowledge, but they were enabled with safe consciences to adopt some certain and few observances authorized by it to the improvement of the liturgy then established, and which they generally used."

Now let us see what Mr. Maskell says respecting the Act of Uniformity of Charles II. I do not think it is possible to quote a higher authority upon this point than Mr. Maskell. It is quite clear that he is writing against his private feelings. "But since 1662 I cannot but look upon the question as essentially different, and Mr. Palmer appears to draw the line very narrowly when he says (as above) that the Church of England has not abolished the custom. It is not necessary that every ancient practice which is no longer to be observed, should particularly be mentioned; the mere omission of directions must in many cases be allowed to be sufficient. More than this; the statute 1 Eliz. c. 1, which enforces the Act of 2 & 3 Edward, c. 1, ordains that all ministers shall be bound to say, and use the mattens, evensong, administration of each of the sacraments, and all other common and open prayer, in such order and form as is mentioned in the said book so authorized by Parliament, and none other or otherwise." And the statute 14 Charles II. enacts, "That the former good laws and statutes of this realm which have been formerly made and are still in force for the uniformity of prayer and administration of the sacraments shall stand in full force and strength to all intents and purposes whatsoever, for the establishing and confirming the said book herein-before mentioned to be joined and annexed to this Act.

"Therefore, although we may regret that this primitive practice, sanctioned by the constant observance of it by the universal Church for 1500 years, is not now included among the rites according to which we celebrate the holy Eucharist, yet, as it is not essential to the valid consecration and administration of the cup, and has been forbidden by the rubric of our present order of communion, the wise and proper course for the ministers of the Church of England to pursue, must be to consecrate wine only, without any mixture of water. The intention and object with which anciently the mixture was ordered were mystical, and to be signified by a public adding of the water to the wine, that those who were present might see and acknowledge its hidden meaning. So that if this mixture be not public as of old, and explained to the people, the purpose of it must be lost, and disobedience to the rubric be accompanied by no reasonable benefit whatever."

At the beginning of Elizabeth's reign the vessels previously used for mixing water with the wine, instead of being retained as ornaments of the church, were systematically sold, destroyed, or otherwise disposed of. We may, therefore, infer that the two crucets which we find mentioned among the ornaments of the church in the inventories of Edward VI.'s reign, and in Peacock's Church Ornaments, were intended one for wine and the other for water.

Of the 150 churches mentioned in these inventories, 91 appear to have had one or more crucets at the end of Mary's reign; but in April 1566 these had been sold, broken, defaced, returned to the owner, taken away by the priest, or otherwise got rid of, except in five instances in which one crucet remained.
