Respecting these five exceptional cases, we find at Gunbie (page 92 of Peacock's Church Furniture) numerous illegal ornaments remain with the crucet; such, for instance, as a sepulcher and a pax. At Scotter (page 133) a crucet remains with a canopy and holy-water can, and a mass-book and manual. At Stevenbie (p. 145), a crucet remains with, inter alia, a pyx, a latten cross, and a sacring bell, and it is mentioned apparently as an admission of what is wrong that they remain undefaced and unbroken.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) A latten cross.

(Mr. Stephens.) It is iron plate covered with tin. At Osbornie (page 120), the return is: "The crucet the vicar hath;"—not the churchwardens. At Willerton (page 162): "One cope, three vestments, an alb, and a crucet remaineth in the house of the said churchwardens." I think I have, therefore, disposed of those five cases where the crucets had not been taken possession of under the commission.

One of the principal reasons for the abolition of the mixed chalice in Edward VI.'s Second Book was that many of the Reformers considered that the admixture of water with the sacramental wine was a violation of the principle embodied in the 19th Article, that "the sacraments must be duly administered according to Christ's ordinance in all those things that are of necessity requisite to the same." I believe I have mentioned to your Lordship that a Pope was the origin of this mixing of the water with the sacramental wine. And now I will refer you to the Catechism of 1662.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Our present Catechism?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. One of the things ordained by Christ and of necessity requisite, is the receiving of "wine." One of the questions in the Catechism is, "What is the outward part or sign of the Lord's supper?" The answer is, "Bread and wine, which the Lord hath commanded to be received." The Romanists allege that the sacrament had been, in fact, instituted with wine and water; but, to make out their case, they were obliged to rely exclusively upon the Fathers and the early liturgies, and to place upon the words of the Bible an interpretation contrary to their natural sense.

In the Catechism of the Council of Trent (page 214, the Dublin edition of 1829)—it is stated: "With the wine used in the sacred mysteries, the Church of God, however, has always mingled water, because, as we know on the authority of councils and the testimony of S. Cyprian, (Cyp. lib. 1. Ep. 3. Trid. Sess. 22, de Sacrif. Miss. c. 7, Can. 9) our Lord himself did so;"—relying on the authority of the councils and not upon the Bible as containing the inspired Word of God.

I will now refer your Lordship to the Sixth Article of the Thirty-nine Articles,—part of the statute law of the land. The Church of England has in that Article laid down that "Holy Scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation," including, of course, sufficient directions for the administration of the sacrament. The Reformers, my Lord, had to ascertain from the Bible itself what they were commanded to do; and as the Bible only told them that Christ used wine—the fruit of the vine—they could not have continued the use of wine and water. I refer your Lordship to Matthew, chapter xxviii., 22nd and 25th verses; Mark, chapter xiv., 22nd and 25th verses; Luke, chapter xxii., 17th and 18th verses.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Does not that rather beg the question? Might not wine, in the passages to which you have referred, mean wine with water in it?

(Mr. Stephens.) I think not.

(The Dean of the Arches.) If it was a common usage, I mean. In classical times it was not an uncommon thing to put water into the wine.

(Mr. Stephens.) We shall see presently what the Reformers meant.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I meant in reference to your quotations as to the word "wine."

(Mr. Stephens.) I will clear up that by Becon. We shall ascertain what is the meaning of the word. What is the common acceptation of the word wine?

(The Dean of the Arches.) What was the wine of that country at the time the Lord's Supper was instituted; is not that the question? Was it pure wine, or was it wine with a little water in it?

(Mr. Stephens.) I will cite a few authorities on the subject presently. If it be held that "wine," and "wine and water" are the same it would be an illogical deduction.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am not expressing my opinion at all, but merely saying that it is not quite conclusive to say wine was used, if contemporaneous usage would show that wine always had water in it.

(Mr. Stephens.) Contemporaneous usage, my Lord?

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am unaware how any usage since the passing of the Book of Edward VI.—

(The Dean of the Arches.) You misunderstand me; I am speaking of the use of the word "wine" in the New Testament.

(Mr. Stephens.) I beg your Lordship's pardon; I will now deal with Becon. This objection to the mixed chalice was held by Becon, who was intimately connected with the Edwardian Reformers. He was chaplain to Archbishop Crammer in March 1547. He and Ridley were made by Crammer two of the six preachers in Canterbury Cathedral. During the reign of Edward VI., he wrote one of the Homilies set forth in that reign. It is therefore clear, he was in the confidence of Archbishop Crammer during the reign of Edward VI. I am now going to cite from Becon's Prayers, p. 359. This is a comparison between the Lord's Supper and the Pope's mass. "Christ in that his most holy banquet delivered to his disciples mere pure and unmixed wine, to be the sign of the shedding of his blood. 'I will not drink hereafter,' saith he, 'of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I shall drink it with you new in the kingdom of my Father.' 'Christ,' saith Chrysostom, 'when he gave this mystery, gave wine; yea, and after his resurrection, in the bare table of the mystery, he used wine; 'of the fruit of the vine,' saith he, which bringeth forth wine, not water.'"

After citing these passages from Scripture, Becon then goes on, "The mass-monger useth not pure wine in his sacrifice, but wine mingled with water, contrary to the institution of Christ, according to the decree of Pope Alexander the First; Clement in his canon utterly forbidding that the priest in his mass should offer any liquor but wine only. Chrysostom writeth that the Lord Jesu after his resurrection did not drink water but wine, that he might destroy and utterly pluck up by the roots the heresy of them which use water in the mysteries."

I now propose to cite an extract from the works of Archbishop Whitgift (2nd volume, page 541). It was the opinion of Archbishop Whitgift that the mixed chalice was an error, and that the purer administration of the sacrament was with wine; and Cartwright even terms it a gross abuse.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Just tell me what is the document you are reading? Is it from the Articles of Visitation, or what?

to the Admonition." "It is not to be denied but that this abuse is very ancient, and was in Justin Martyr's time, in Tertullian's and Cyprian's times, even as also there were other abuses crept into the supper of the Lord, and that very gross, as the mingling of water with wine, and therein also a necessity and great mystery placed; as it may appear both by Justin Martyr and Cyprian; which I therefore by the way do admonish the reader of, that the antiquity of this abuse of private Communion be not prejudicial to the truth; no more than the mingling of water with that opinion of necessity that those fathers had of it is, or ought to be, prejudicial to that that we use in ministering the cup with pure wine according to the institution."

Then Whitgift says, "This is your accustomed manner (but it is beside all good manners), to wipe away ancient and learned authority by objecting unto the authors, some unperfection in their writings, or errors in their times. Is this a good reason? water was of necessity required in Cyprian's time, in the administration of the supper—"

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. "Is this a good reason? Water was of necessity required in Cyprian's time in the administration of the supper, and that was an error; therefore the communion at that time and long before ministered to the sick, and carried to private persons being absent, was unlawful. Such be your arguments, and such be your kind of answering, which may be plausible to the ignorant people, but nothing pleasant to such as be learned. This one thing I will desire the reader to consider, (that is, if our sacraments now be more sincerely ministered than they were in Justin's, Tertullian's, and Cyprian's time, being so near the Apostles), what there should be for you so bitterly to weigh against this church in that respect."

These passages treat the admixture of the water with wine as a corrupt alteration of Christ's ordinance.

I will now refer your Lordship to the XXth of the XXXIX. Articles. The limitation that the Church can ordain nothing contrary to God's Word is carefully provided for in the XXth and XXXIVth articles.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I understand your argument now to be, that this is contrary to God's Word, as well as forbidden by the laws of the Church?

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly, and I rely upon the Thirty-nine Articles.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You contend, and of course there is great force in it, that it is omitted in all the other Prayer Books, and therefore prohibited; and also you contend that it was prohibited on the ground that it is contrary to God's Word.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. And mixing the water with the Sacramental wine is the introduction of a new ceremony for which there is no direction in the second book of Edward VI., Elizabeth, or Charles II. That appears to me to be decisive of the question.

It is laid down in the XXth Article that, "It is not lawful for the Church to ordain anything that is contrary to God's word written." And the XXXIVth Article, speaking of the traditions of the Church, says, "It is not necessary that traditions and ceremonies be in all places one or utterly like, for at all times they have been divers, and may be changed according to the diversities of countries, times, and men's manners, so that nothing be ordained against God's Word." The XXVIIIth Article, in condemning the misuse of the sacrament of the Lord's supper, declares, "The sacrament was not by Christ's ordinance reserved or carried about, lifted up or worshipped."

This language treats it as an axiom, that the use of a sacrament in any mode not ordained by Christ was a wrong.

I will now refer your Lordship to Fulke's Defence of the Translation of the Bible, page 523. The date is 1583. Fulke says, "The authority of the Holy Scriptures with us is more worth than the opinion of all the men in the world. In the Scripture we "find 'the fruit of the vine.' Water we find not; therefore we account not water to be of any necessity in the celebration of the Lord's Supper. In the Primitive Church we know water was used first of sobriety, then of ceremony, and at length it grew to be counted of necessity. The Armenians; therefore, are commendable in this point, that they would never depart from the authority of the Scriptures to yield to the custom, practice, or judgment of any man."

Rogers on the Thirty-nine Articles, (Parker Society's edition, page 294,) is the next authority I propose to cite. This book was first published in 1586, and was republished in 1607, with a dedication to Archbishop Bancroft. This book is illustrative of the opinions that were entertained on the subject of the mixed chalice in the time of Elizabeth. Under Article XXX., Rogers (page 6) lays down this proposition: "The people must be partakers not only of the bread but also of the wine when they approach unto the Lord's table." And under the title of "The Adversaries unto this Truth," which is in the same page, Rogers complains of the impiety of certain sects by altering this ordinance of God, and he enumerates them; first by adding to the wine; secondly, taking therefrom.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What does that mean? I do not understand it.

(Mr. Stephens.) The explanation that Rogers gives is, using no wine at all.

(Mr. Prideaux.) There were heretics of that kind.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I really do not understand it. "Taking therefrom" is using no wine at all?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is an odd way of expressing it.

(Mr. Stephens.) "Some by taking therefrom." Then he gives an illustration: "The Dacians use no wine at all." That is the explanation he gives. Then he says "confounding the elements." And, fourthly, "changing the elements." Rogers at page 296 likewise remarks, "Some by confounding the elements. So the Muscovites do mingle bread and wine together; and the Papists make a mixture of wine and water, maintaining that water must be mixed with wine at the consecration of the blood, and that the mixture of water with wine without sin cannot be omitted."

We therefore have a distinction drawn by Whitgift, Rogers, Fulke, and a number of other authorities,—between "wine" and "wine and water."

(The Dean of the Arches.) You will deal with that question I referred to in the Prayer Book before you leave it.

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly, my Lord.

I am now about to quote Nowell's Catechism. This catechism was compiled by Nowell, Dean of St. Paul's, and was approved by the convocation of 1562, but not published till 1570. He is therefore an author entitled to every respect and authority. At pages 212 and 213 are the following questions and answers.

Question.—"Now tell me the order of the Lord's supper."

Answer.—"It is even the same which the Lord Christ did institute; who, in the same night that he was betrayed, took bread; and when he had given thanks, he brake it, and gave it to his disciples, saying, 'Take, eat; this is my body which is given for you: do this in remembrance of me.' Likewise after supper, he took the cup; and when he had given thanks he gave it to them, saying, 'Drink ye all of this; for this is my blood of the New Testament which is shed for you and for many, for remission of sins. Do this, as oft as ye shall drink it, in remembrance of me.' For so oft as ye shall eat this bread and drink of this cup, ye shall show the Lord's death till he come." He says, "This is the form and order of the Lord's supper, which we ought to hold and holily to keep till he come."

Question.—“Dost thou say, that there are two parts in this sacrament also, as in baptism?”

Answer.—“Yea; the one part the bread and wine, the outward sign, which are seen with our eyes, handled with our hands, and felt with our taste; the other part, Christ himself, with whom our souls, as with their proper food, are inwardly nourished.”

Question.—“And dost thou say that all ought alike to receive both parts of the sacrament?”

Answer.—“Yea, verily, master, for sith the Lord hath expressly so commanded, it were a most high offence in any part to abridge his commandment.”

Question.—“Why would the Lord have here two signs to be used?”

Answer.—“First, he severally gave the signs both of his body and blood, that it might be the more plain express image of his death which he suffered, his body being torn, his side pierced, and all his blood shed, and that the memory thereof so printed in our hearts should stick the deeper. And, moreover, that the Lord might so provide for and help our weakness, and thereby manifestly declare that as the bread for the nourishment of our body so his body hath most singular force and efficacy spiritually to feed our souls; and as with wine men’s hearts are cheered, and their strength confirmed, so with his blood our souls are relieved and refreshed; that certainly assuring ourselves that he is not only our meat but also our drink, we do not anywhere else but in him alone seek any part of our spiritual nourishment and eternal life.”

These extracts lay great stress on what our Blessed Saviour has commanded. It also explains the symbolism of the bread and wine—so as to exclude water. It also fixes the Convocation of 1562, from which the Articles proceeded, with “wine.”

I think it may therefore be considered as established, that in the reign of Elizabeth it was considered as a matter of essential importance, that the sacrament should be administered in “wine,” and not in “wine” and “water.”

In March 1603–4, at the beginning of James I.’s reign, that part of the Church Catechism was added in which the sacraments are explained. We find that the wine is here mentioned as that which “The Lord hath commanded to be received.”

Question.—“What is the outward part or sign of the Lord’s Supper?”

Answer.—“Bread and wine, which the Lord hath commanded to be received.”

Question.—“What are the benefits whereof we are partakers thereby?”

Answer.—“The strengthening and refreshing of our souls by the body and blood of Christ, as our bodies are by the bread and wine.”

From 1604 down to the present moment our Church has commanded that every child shall be taught that Christ commanded wine to be received in the sacrament. Our Church has at the same time taught in the Articles, that it is essential the sacrament should be duly administered according to Christ’s holy ordinance. Is any clergyman, so long as he is a minister of our Church, to be permitted to deviate from what his parishioners have been taught is Christ’s ordinance, and to substitute “wine and water” for “wine?” The Catechism and Articles of the Church of England contain much to encourage, and nothing to discountenance, the views held by Becon and Rogers, that the admixture of water with the sacramental wine was absolutely contrary to Christ’s institution, and therefore unlawful. Is a parishioner of St. Albans, who holds these views to be excluded from receiving in accordance with our Articles and Acts of Uniformity the Holy Communion in his parish church?

The canons were passed in 1604, after the Catechism had been added. By the 21st Canon: “Furthermore, no bread or wine newly brought shall be used; but first the words of institution shall be rehearsed, when the said bread and wine be present upon the Communion table. Likewise the minister shall “deliver both the bread and the wine to every communicant severally.” In this canon, “wine” is mentioned three times, and there is not the slightest allusion, directly or indirectly, to the admixture of “wine and water.”

I now beg to direct your Lordship’s attention to the Communion rubrics of 1662. In the rubric immediately before the prayer for the church militant, “And when there is a communion the priest shall then place upon the table so much bread and wine as he shall think sufficient.” Then in the rubric before the prayer of consecration, “When the priest standing before the table hath so ordered the bread and wine.” In the note on the consecration prayer the word “wine” is likewise used. In the rubric, before the Lord’s Prayer, “If the consecrated bread or ‘wine’ be all spent.” Then in the last rubrics of the communion service “bread and wine” are mentioned three times. In no part of the Prayer Book is there, by name or in spirit, any allusion to the admixture of water with the sacramental wine.

In reference to the argument that “wine” may include wine and water, both in 1604 and 1662 it was contrary to the use of the English language to express “wine and water” by “wine.” The distinction between using pure “wine” and using “wine and water” was regarded as of great importance by both Roman Catholics and Protestants; therefore it was not in the slightest degree probable that any ambiguous phrase would have been used. By the Protestant authors whom I have quoted, the Catechism of the Council of Trent and other Roman Catholic works, the “wine” and the “water” are separately spoken of. In Walker on the Liturgy of Sarum (page 47), it is said, “Meanwhile the subdeacon receives ‘bread and wine and water with the chalice.’ And I think it will be found that when the Roman Catholic missals, alluding to the mixed chalice, speak of it as ‘wine and water’ and not ‘wine’ alone.

I will now refer your Lordship to Nicholls on the Book of Common Prayer. There is great difficulty in quoting the references in this publication. I am now referring to page 29 of the Appendix. It comes after the additional notes on the Act of Uniformity. It is a pamphlet entitled “The Puritans’ Objection against the Common Prayer answered.” Dr. Nicholls in 1711 appended to his Commentary on the Prayer Book a supplement containing, among other Tracts, “Answers by Mr. Thomas Hutton” to some ministers of the diocese of Exeter, who, it appears, refused to subscribe to the Book of Common Prayer. These answers were printed in 1606, and are to be found at page 29 of Nicholls. The exception is to the last rubric of the communion: “Every parishioner shall communicate at least three times in a year; of which Easter to be one; and shall also receive the sacraments and other rites according to the order in the book appointed.” So that more sacraments are hereby often to be received than one. And by “other rites” is thought to insinuate ashes, holy water, and other Popish rites.

The answer upon the words “other rites” is this: “A man must receive according to the order in the book prescribed; namely, bread, not a wafer cake; leavened, not unleavened; wine alone for the other element, not wine mingled with water; in the morning, not after supper, &c.; for this order our Church followeth.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is that Dr. Nicholls’ opinion that you are reading?

(Mr. Stephens.) It is “Reasons exhibited to the Bishop of Exeter by some ministers of his diocese for their refusal to subscribe to the Book of Common Prayer, with brief answers thereunto made by Mr. Thomas Hutton.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then the authority is Thomas Hutton.

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I could not make out who was the authority. Perhaps I can borrow that amongst other books from you. Are you going to leave the subject of the first Prayer Book now, because I want you to deal with my question?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Your argument, as I understand it, is two-fold; first of all, that this element of water is omitted in all Prayer Books subsequent to the first Prayer Book of Edward VI.; and that the omission is, having regard to all the circumstances, tantamount to a prohibition; and then you say that prohibition in itself is reasonable, and in accordance with the doctrines of the Church of England, for it is founded on strict adherence to the letter of the Word of God. Now, this Prayer Book of Edward VI.—

(Mr. Stephens.) I beg your Lordship's pardon. There is another point. In order to mix the water with the wine there must be an express rubrical direction; and in the absence of that, the mixing of water with the wine would be the introduction of a new ceremony.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I did not mean to exclude that, for I have got it here. But that particular head does not refer to the question I am going to put. This book of Edward VI., which, according to the Legislature, was made "by the aid of the Holy Ghost," I see, in the rubric to which you refer me contains these words: "And putting the wine into the chalice, or else in some fair or convenient cup prepared for that use (if the chalice will not serve), putting thereto a little pure and clean water." And then it goes on in these words, "And setting both the bread and wine upon the altar." Therefore at that time the use of the word "wine" must have been conceived to include wine that had "a little pure and clean water" in it.

(Mr. Stephens.) No, I think not.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is what I want you to direct your attention to. You say the word "wine" cannot possibly mean wine and water.

(Mr. Stephens.) I do.

(The Dean of the Arches.) How is that reconcilable with the use of "wine" here; because it is called "wine" after "a little pure and clean water" has been put to it;—"putting thereto a little pure and clean water," and then, "and setting both the bread and wine upon the altar." I am not expressing the slightest opinion on the subject.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am aware of that, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am only putting to you a point which, as it appears to me, as you have to reply, will be just as convenient for you to direct your attention to in the reply as now.

(Mr. Stephens.) I will deal with it at the present moment.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I say, after having water put to it it is still called "wine."

(Mr. Stephens.) Your Lordship may remember that in all the rubrical directions respecting the mixed chalice, when speaking of the communion "wine and water," the "wine" and the "water" are always separately mentioned; and in proof of that position I refer to the Sarum Missal.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have got the whole of that argument down. My observation is addressed to this:—that in the time of Edward VI., as to the use of the word "wine," it would be held proper to call the element "wine" although there was "a little pure and clean water" in it.

(Mr. Stephens.) I think not.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think it must have been according to the rubric, must it not? However, it does not signify.

(Mr. Stephens.) The mixing of water with the wine is a ceremony not sanctioned by the present Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think I need not trouble you to repeat that argument. I fully understand it. My observation leaves untouched the force of your argument, that having been specified here it is not specified in any other Prayer Book, and also that it requires a positive rubrical direction; otherwise it is an additional ceremony. I need not trouble you with that.

(Mr. Stephens.) I have now concluded my observations so far as regards the mixed chalice, and I respectfully submit to your Lordship, that the mixing of the water with the wine is an importation of a new ceremony, not authorized or directed by the Acts of Uniformity, and as such is illegal.

I now propose to make a few general observations applicable to all the charges made against the Defendant.

The first observation that I have to make is, that where the legislature intended to give a discretionary power of varying the service, it has done so in explicit terms, by stating that one of certain alternatives shall be adopted. First, my Lord, in the choice of sentences before the morning and evening prayer, and at the offertory. Secondly, in the choice of an exhortation giving notice of the communion, and of a collect for the Queen, and of collects to be used after the offertory, when there is no communion. Thirdly, in the choice between a sermon on the duties of man and wife, and the exhortation at the end of the marriage service. Fourthly, in the choice of the time for administering baptism. Fifthly, in supplying the Sundays after Trinity, when their number exceeds the provision made for them, out of the supernumerary collects, epistles, and gospels for the Sundays after Epiphany. Sixthly, in the choice between the "Te Deum" and the "Benedicite," and the "Benedictus" and the "Jubilate." And I may likewise state, the choice of the sentences at the offertory, and the collects to be used after the offertory, and the time for baptism, are expressly stated to be in the "discretion of the minister."

It may be maintained (1) that any observance which was sanctioned by the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., and is not expressly prohibited in the present Prayer Book, but is merely omitted, may now be used; and it probably will be the defence, or it may be the defence set up for mixing water with the sacramental wine. And that (2) anything which was forbidden by the first Book of Edward VI., if the prohibition be not continued in express words, and nothing said on the subject in our present Book of Common Prayer, may be restored. This probably may be the defence set up for the elevation.

On this principle the following observances may be re-introduced. But as they are not binding on the clergy, uniformity in performing divine service would be at an end.

I will now, by the first Book of Edward VI., test the mischiefs that would inevitably arise, if the principles contended for on the opposite side be sanctioned by this court. At page 29 of the Liturgies of Edward VI., in the rubric prefixed to the "Venite," there are these words: "Then shall be said or sung without any invitatory this psalm, Venite." Let us contrast that with the Prayer Book of 1662. The prohibition has been removed, and nothing is said against using invitatories to this Psalm. Consequently, certain short sentences, varied according to the ecclesiastical season, may be introduced before the first verse, and after each of the five verses into which the psalm was divided, and after the "Gloria Patri" at the end. What would become of uniformity; what would become of the "one order and rite," if that was to be permitted?

In the Annotated Book of Common Prayer, by Blunt, page 8.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I suppose of the Preface.

(Mr. Stephens.) No; the Morning Prayer. Mr. Blunt says, "Until the translation of our offices into English it was the custom to sing the Venite in a different manner from that now used; with the addition, that is, of Invitatories. These were short sentences (varied “ according to the Ecclesiastical season) which were sung before the first verse after each of the five verses into which it was then divided, and also after the Gloria Patri at the end. Thus in Trinity season, “ Laudemus Jesum Christum; quia ipse est redemptor omnium sæculorum,” would be sung before and after the first and also after the third and fifth divisions indicated in the Latin version above; after the second, fourth, and Gloria Patri would be sung “ Quia ipse est redemptor omnium sæculorum,” only; and at the conclusion, the whole of the response as at the beginning. These invitatories were altogether set aside, as regards the Venite, in 1549; and, as has been already shown, the ‘sentences’ were substituted for them at the commencement of divine service in 1552.”

This is a very good illustration of the mischief that would result if deviation from the strict letter and spirit of the Act of Uniformity be sanctioned by this court.

At page 77, in the Communion Office of Edward’s First Book, an introit was appointed to be used after the collect, “Almighty God, unto whom all hearts be open.” In the Prayer Book of 1662, this rubric was omitted, but nothing is said in that book expressly prohibiting the singing an introit in this its ancient place. Consequently it may be restored. What becomes of uniformity? The first Prayer Book of Edward VI. (page 108), in the Baptism service, after the prayer “Almighty and Immortal God, the aid of all that need,” &c., the Priest exorcised the child. How did the Prayer Book of 1662 deal with that? The exorcism by the Priest is omitted in the present Prayer Book, but it is not expressly forbidden. The principle may be tested in this way: Exorcism by the priest is omitted in the present Prayer Book, but it is not expressly forbidden; consequently exorcism may at all events be restored by bishops whenever they perform the service of baptism. I do not pledge myself to the statement that the inferior clergy could do it, but only the prelates, under the last clause of the 72nd Canon.

At page 112 of the First Book, when dealing with public baptism, after the words “I baptize thee,” &c., the minister is directed to put upon the child “a white vesture commonly called the chrisom.” In the Prayer Book of 1662, this direction is omitted, but it is not prohibited, consequently it may be restored.

At page 189, in the Visitation of the Sick, this rubric will be found: “If the sick person desire to be anointed, then shall the priest anoint him upon the forehead or breast only, making the sign of the cross, saying thus: ‘As with this visible oil thy body outwardly is anointed.’” Although this language is omitted from the Prayer Book of 1662, it is not prohibited—therefore it may be restored.

What becomes of the spirit and language of the Acts of Uniformity, if it is to be held that, at the mere will and pleasure of a clergyman any observance which was sanctioned by the First Prayer Book of Edward VI., and not expressly prohibited in the present Book of Common Prayer, but is merely omitted, may be restored? Or that anything which was forbidden by the First Prayer Book of Edward VI., if the prohibition be not continued in express words or nothing said on the subject in our present Prayer Book, may be restored? Why the effect would be, that Divine Service would be performed in our churches utterly at variance with the spirit and the letter of every Act of Uniformity, and many of the pernicious and idolatrous doctrines of the Church of Rome would be fostered in our Church. If these absurd and ridiculous theories be upheld, it would be in direct opposition to the construction that has been placed on the Book of Common Prayer by the courts of law, by convocation, by the prelates, and by usage.

(Adjourned for a short time.)

In support of the observations I ventured to address to your Lordship before the adjournment of the Court,

I beg to refer you to page 103, of a charge which the Bishop of Llandaff delivered in 1866.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The present bishop? (Mr. Stephens.) Yes. The Bishop of Llandaff states, in a note at page 103, when discussing the last Act of Uniformity: “Upon this statute a theory has been founded, that our ritual should be improved by the supplementing of our present rubrics from the ritual of the Pre-reformation Church; and this theory, I fear, has been acted upon in some cases to a degree most painful to churchmen of moderation and sobriety. It is easy to conceive what extravagances it might lead to, as, in fact, it has led those who have endeavoured practically to apply it.” His Lordship then refers in support of his views to a pamphlet, entitled “The Prayer Book as it is,” a pamphlet by the Rev. William Gresley, pages 17 and 18, for examples of these extravagances, where it is stated:—“Besides, the details which they insist upon, are often of a capricious and unsatisfactory character. One great expert has discovered that it was customary to have always an uneven number of collects. Such, he says, was the rule in the Sarum use; and the number of petitions in the Lord’s Prayer is odd. Therefore he thinks that in Advent and Lent, and at other times when a fourth collect is added, we ought to take another from those at the end of the Communion service, in order to make up the requisite number. Another insists upon our always using the Benedicite in Lent, because it was used in the pre-Reformation times, though there is not a single penitential expression in the whole canticle, and though our Church gives us full liberty to use it or not, as we please. Another thinks it highly commendable to have a midnight communion on Christmas Eve, but almost heretical if a clergyman should think of having a nocturnal celebration to usher in the new year. Another, for ritual reasons, insists upon the priest standing when he himself partakes of Holy Communion though the Church directs all to kneel. Surely the priest ought to set an example of reverence. The same ritualist thinks that the deacons ought to tie their stoles under the right arm because it is the use of the Western Church. Another has discovered that lights on the altar are so important that if during the celebration they should happen to go out, and there should be no means of relighting them, it is a deadly sin to go on with the celebration. I am bound, however, to say, that the writer who quotes this rule does not appear to think it very stringent. Good Friday celebration is to some an abomination. The non-mixing of water with the wine stamps the character of a man as a very indifferent churchman in the estimation of others. I feel that I am exposing myself to most exceedingly rough handling in presuming to speak lightly of these things.”

I am now going to cite to your Lordship a Report, with which your Lordship is familiar, it is the Report of the Ritual Commissioners, p. 120. Let us see what were the views of the two archbishops and the bishops of the Church in England upon this question in 1851; and whether they do or do not accord with the propositions which I have ventured to submit to your Lordship’s consideration.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Who was the Archbishop at that time? Howley or Sumner?

(Mr. Stephens.) Sumner; and Musgrave was the Archbishop of York. A principle has of late been avowed and acted on, “which, if admitted, would justify far greater and more uncertain changes. It is this,—that as the Church of England is the ancient Catholic Church, settled in this land before the Reformation, and was then reformed only by the casting away of certain strictly defined corruptions; therefore, whatever form or usage existed in the Church before its Reformation may now be freely introduced and observed, unless there can be alleged against it the distinct letter of some formal prohibition.”

"Now, against any such inference from the undoubted identity of the Church before and after the Reformation, we feel bound to enter our clear and unhesitating protest. We believe that at the Reformation, the English Church not only rejected certain corruptions, but also, without in any degree severing her connexion with the ancient Catholic Church, intended to establish one uniform ritual, according to which her public services should be conducted. But it is manifest that a licence such as is contended for, is wholly incompatible with any uniformity of worship whatsoever, and at variance with the universal practice of the Catholic Church, which has never given to the officiating ministers of separate congregations any such large discretion in the selection of ritual observances."

"We therefore beseech any one who may have proposed to themselves the restoration of what, under sanction of this principle, they deemed a lawful system, to consider the dangers which it involves, to see it in its true light, and to take a more just and sober view of the real position of our Church; whilst, with equal earnestness, we beseech others who, either by intentional omission, or by neglect and laxity, may have disturbed the uniformity and weakened the authority of our prescribed ritual, to strengthen the side of order by avoiding all unnecessary deviations from the Church's rule." Now, my Lord, that was issued by the two Archbishops and almost all of their suffragan prelates in 1851, and fully justifies almost every proposition that I have made in reference to the construction of the Acts of Uniformity.

I will now refer your Lordship to what took place in 1867, in the Province of Canterbury. It is a Resolution of the Upper House of Convocation, in February 1867.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is in the Ritual Commissioners' Report?

"Resolved, that, having taken into consideration the report made to this House by the Lower House concerning certain ritual observances, we have concluded, that having regard to the dangers, (1) of favouring errors deliberately rejected by the Church of England, and fostering a tendency to desert her communion; (2) of offending, even in things indifferent, devout worshippers in our churches, who have been long used to other modes of service, and thus of estranging many of the faithful laity; (3) of unnecessarily departing from uniformity; (4) of increasing the difficulties which prevent the return of separatists to our communion; we convey to the Lower House our unanimous decision that, having respect to the considerations here recorded, and to the rubric concerning the service of the Church in our Book of Common Prayer, to wit: 'Forasmuch as nothing can be so plainly set forth but doubts may arise in the use and practice of the same, to appease all such diversity (if any arise), and for the resolution of all doubts concerning the manner how to understand, do, and execute the things contained in this book, the parties that so doubt or diversely take anything shall always resort to the bishop of the diocese, who, by his discretion, shall take order for the quieting and appeasing of the same, so that the same order be not contrary to anything contained in this book; and if the bishop of the diocese be in doubt, then he may send for the resolution thereof to the archbishop:'"

"Our judgment is, that no alterations from long-sanctioned and usual ritual ought to be made in our churches until the sanction of the bishop of the diocese has been obtained thereto."

My Lord, can it be for one moment supposed, that the prelates would have issued the foregoing documents without carefully ascertaining that their views were in every respect correct? Is it possible, looking at the spirit and at the language of these documents, that they could justify or approve of the introduction of new and novel ceremonies,—such as those which are now under discussion, viz. the use of incense in the performance of the services of the church; the elevation of the elements; the lights upon the holy table during daylight; or the mixing of water with the sacramental wine at the holy communion? There has not been, from the passing of the first Act of Uniformity down to the present moment, one of the Bishops who has ever enquired at his visitation whether there were censer-pots; whether there were candlesticks and candles for giving light during the holy Communion; or for a cruet to hold water in the administration of the holy Communion.

I submit, my Lord, taking the language of the Acts of Parliament, and of the Visitation Articles, it is impossible to put any other construction than that which I have ventured to put upon them, viz., that any deviation from the one uniform rite, ceremony, order, form, or manner, prescribed in the Acts of Uniformity is illegal.

What do the Prelates say? That there is some party "fostering certain doctrines in the Church," and that such doctrines are errors. Consequently, my Lord, the principles and practices of this party are inconsistent with the doctrines of the Protestant Church. There is not, my Lord, through the entire of these resolutions a single word that could be construed as offering the slightest palliation for the innovations that have crept into the Church within the last few years, and which are regarded with abhorrence by all faithful sons of the Church.

If it were requisite to adduce any proof that there is a party in our Church, which, to use the language of the bishops' resolutions, "favouring errors,"— (Mr. Prideaux.) I do not like to interrupt my friend, but are we to go into the question of the various parties of the Church?

(The Dean of the Arches.) This is Mr. Stephens' peroration. We have gone through all the articles; and Mr. Stephens is putting before me, in the way that it seems best to him, the observations which have any bearing more or less upon the case; therefore, certainly, I shall not interrupt him.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My friend may be as Protestant as he likes, without any further interruption.

(The Dean of the Arches.) May I ask the favour of you not to interrupt again?

(Mr. Stephens.) I was pointing out to your Lordship the language of the bishops' resolutions, which states, there is a party in our Church "favouring errors deliberately rejected by the Church of England, and fostering a tendency to desert her Communion."

In order to illustrate the accuracy of that charge I will refer to an essay which has been recently published by a beneficed clergyman in our Church, the Revd. E. L. Blenkinsopp, which essay is contained in a book entitled "The Church and the World" (page 212, edition London, 1866). As to the authority of this book, it has received at least the qualified approbation of one prelate of the Church. It has been presented to the Upper House of Convocation of Canterbury, and thanks have been presented to the donor of this book.

Now what does Mr. Blenkinsopp say? "The great Catholic Revival of our day has brought all these branches nearer to each other, especially the two Western branches. Anglicans are reproached by Protestants with their resemblance to Romans. They say a stranger entering into a church where ritual is carefully attended to might easily mistake it for a Roman service. Of course he might; the whole purpose of the great revival has been to eliminate the dreary Protestantism of the Hanoverian period, and restore the glory of Catholic worship. Our churches are restored after the medieval pattern, and our ritual must accord with the Catholic standard. Our Book of Common Prayer is no Protestant invention. It is not the creation of the sixteenth century. The Eucharistic office is only a variety of the “ Western rite. The fast and feast days are nearly the same; the collects, epistles, and gospels are nearly the same; the altar and its ornaments are nearly the same; the habits and vestments of the priesthood are the same; the actions are the same; the plain song is the same. Is it any wonder that they may be mistaken? Take our matins and evensong—what are they but five of the ancient seven offices compressed into two, with these two differences, and we may well be proud of them,—1. That they are primarily public and not private, as is the use of the Roman;—2. That the whole Psalter, and not merely parts of it, is sung through publicly twelve times a year. Here again, we see the same plain song, the same canticles, the same order of the books of Scripture. And in those churches where the Catholic revival obtains, the ancient tones for the Psalms are daily sung as they were in the days of Gregory the Great; and the ancient metrical hymns are again resuming their place. And not only this, but the same round of Christian seasons, marked by their own appropriate colours, instructs the eye as well as the ear and preaches Christ and His Redemption. Further, ritual like painting and architecture is only the visible expression of divine truth. Without dogma, without an esoteric meaning, Ritual is an illusion and a delusion, a lay figure without life or spirit, a vox et præterea nihil. The experience of the last century shows, that it is impossible to preserve the Catholic faith except by Catholic ritual. The experience of the present century equally makes manifest the fact, that the revival of the Catholic Faith must be accompanied by the revival of Catholic ritual; and still more, that the surest way to teach the Catholic faith is by Catholic ritual.”

I shall only trouble the Court with two more lines from page 290 of this publication, and I only cite them as a gloss upon what I have read to your Lordship. The extraordinary words I am about to read, are likewise the language of Mr. Blenkinsopp: “ Protestantism has produced all the heresy and schism, and infidelity for the last 300 years, from Martin Luther to Joe Smith.”

That, my Lord, is the language of a beneficed clergyman of our Church, who, entertaining those opinions, thinks it consistent with his public obligations to receive at the hands of that Church which he thus so unworthily speaks of, the status of a beneficed clergyman, and the pecuniary emoluments incident to that position.

I do not think, my Lord, I can terminate my argument in more appropriate language than that which has been used by one of the most distinguished prelates of this age. I allude to the late Archbishop Whately, Archbishop of Dublin, who, in a treatise entitled “On the Kingdom of Christ,” page 114 of the Sixth Edition (1860), thus writes:—“It is worth observing how distinctly our Church repudiates the notion of ‘Sacrifice,’ ‘Temple,’ &c., not merely by omitting the application of those terms in the rubrics and Communion Service, and not merely by dwelling on the ‘sufficiency’ of the ‘one oblation of Christ once offered,’ but also by studiously introducing in that service the word ‘sacrifice’ in the other senses in which it is applicable, viz., first in the offertory to ‘alms,’ (‘With such sacrifices God is well pleased,’) and afterwards to the ‘sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving,’ and again to the ‘sacrifice of ourselves, our souls and bodies.’ And in addition to this, a distinct rubric is subjoined to explain that ‘no adoration is intended or allowed’ of the bread and wine of the Eucharist.”

“Will it be credited that in the nineteenth century the principles here inculcated have been gravely stated in print to be ‘subversive’ of our Church with ‘its Altars, Temples, Sacrificing Priests, and ‘adoration of the Eucharistical bread and wine?’—all of which the writer would have seen in simply looking over the Prayer Book to be utterly alien from our Church! The mistake of Tacitus who represents the Jews as adoring the effigy of an ass, was nothing to this; because Gentiles not being admitted into the Temple of Jerusalem, had nothing but hearsay to trust to.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) I will communicate with counsel as soon as I can make the arrangements with regard to appointing days for the further hearing of this case.

(Adjourned.)

FIFTH DAY.

Thursday, January 9, 1868.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Before the arguments in this case are resumed, the Court has to express its regret at an event which has happened since the last sitting in this case, namely, the death of one of the junior counsel, Mr. Charles, a gentleman of great promise, and of whose future career much expectation was reasonably entertained.

(Mr. James.) Perhaps your Lordship will allow me, as one of Mr. Charles’s dearest friends, to express my cordial thanks for this expression from your Lordship.

(Mr. Coleridge.) My Lord, in this case I am with my learned friend Mr. Stephens for the promoters of this suit, and I have now to invite your Lordship’s attention to some further argument on their behalf. My learned friend Mr. Stephens, indeed, has left those who have to follow him in this discussion but the crumbs and fragments of argument. It is not at all by way of praise of my learned friend, which would be very unbecoming and perhaps suspicious in me if I were to presume to bestow it, but as some kind of apology for the brevity and tenuity of my own contribution to this matter, that I say the argument of my learned friend will be looked upon hereafter as the great storehouse of fact and authority upon all the wide range of subjects connected with the matter now under discussion.

My Lord, I certainly am not about to enter into any rivalry with him. I shall not provoke comparison as to his research and my own, or as to his learning and mine, which would be entirely disadvantageous to myself; but, Biremis præsidio Scaphæ tutus, I shall endeavour to keep in those shallower waters which are fitter for my little craft, and shall endeavour to address to you a short and I hope an intelligible argument on the various points as to which we ask your Lordship’s judgment. The argument will not interfere with, but may, at all events, stand side by side without interfering with, the great argument of my friend, which most of us here have either heard or read with admiration.

Now, my Lord, in order to make as intelligible as I can the observations which I am to address to you, I propose to contend before your Lordship for four propositions, which, if it will be at all convenient to your Lordship, I will hand up.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I shall be very much obliged to you for so doing.

(Mr. Coleridge.) First of all I shall contend that all the various acts which are charged in these articles against Mr. Mackonochie are either proved or have been admitted to have been done by him in point of fact. Next, I shall contend that these various acts so proved or admitted to have been done in point of fact are each and all of them unlawful. Thirdly, that they are unlawful because they are either prohibited by the law or are unauthorized by the law. And fourthly, that in these matters,—without pretending to commit myself to a proposition more general than I am obliged to contend for,—in these matters the absence of authority is the presence of prohibition.

Those being the propositions for which I shall contend, I propose in the first instance to take the case of the elevation and the prostration. I will read, with your Lordship's leave, the third article: "The said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie has in his said church, and within two years last past, to wit, on Sunday the 23rd December, on Christmas Day last past, and on Sunday, 30th December, all in the year of our Lord 1866, and during the prayer of consecration in the order of the administration of the Holy Communion, elevated the paten above his head, and permitted and sanctioned such elevation, and taken into his hands the cup and elevated it above his head during the prayer of consecration aforesaid, and permitted and sanctioned the cup to be so taken and elevated, and knelt or prostrated himself, and sanctioned such kneeling or prostration by other clerks in holy orders." That is the charge. Mr. Mackonochie, in his responsive allegation, makes this answer to it: He says that whereas it is pleaded that he has on Sunday the 23rd day of December, on Christmas Day last past, on Sunday the 30th day of December, all in the year 1866, during the prayer of consecration in the order of administration of the Holy Communion, elevated the paten above his head, and permitted and sanctioned such elevation, and taken into his hands the cup and elevated it above his head during the prayer of consecration aforesaid, and permitted and sanctioned the cup to be so taken and elevated, and knelt or prostrated himself before the consecrated elements during the prayer of consecration, and permitted and sanctioned such kneeling and prostration by other clerks in holy orders, that it is in part untruly pleaded, for he says that, while he admits that he did on the said two Sundays and on Christmas Day, during the prayer of consecration, kneel and sanction kneeling by other clerks before the Lord's Table, he denies that he did on the said two Sundays and on Christmas Day kneel or prostrate himself before the consecrated elements aforesaid, or permit and sanction such kneeling or prostration by other clerks in holy orders, as in the third article pleaded. He further alleges that he has since a certain time discontinued it.

My Lord, it was difficult to know exactly how much of the charge Mr. Mackonochie admitted, and how much of the charge he intended to say was untruly alleged, and it became, therefore, necessary to call witnesses before your Lordship to ascertain the precise facts of the case, in order that the pleadings might be applied to those facts as proved, and your Lordship will find that the fact in this case as to the elevation and prostration is most material. I will read it from the shorthand writer's note, and I have no doubt that if it varies in any way from your Lordship's you will be good enough to correct me. I cannot read it from my own note, because I examined the witness myself.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Whose evidence is it?

(Mr. Coleridge.) The Reverend Henry Malin's, "First of all did Mr. Mackonochie, &c." (The learned Counsel read from the shorthand writer's notes the examination, cross-examination, and re-examination of the Reverend Henry Malin.) Therefore, we have from Mr. Malin, who was examined and cross-examined and examined by your Lordship at considerable length, an exact statement of what it was that Mr. Mackonochie did and sanctioned others doing, at all events as far as the matter of prostration is concerned, upon the occasion to which Mr. Malin's evidence applies. Mr. Mackonochie does not deny in the responsive allegation, as I understand it, that there is anything untruly pleaded with regard to the elevation of the cup, because as far as that part of the article is concerned, he does admit it in terms, but with regard to the prostration he says he does not admit it. It is difficult, after the evidence that has been given to us, to see in what other terms the article could have been framed, or what part of the article it is that Mr. Mackonochie asserts is untruly pleaded. At all events, there is the evidence given by a thoroughly competent person, and it will be for your Lordship by-and-by to say, when you come to look at the words of the consecration prayer, whether what Mr. Mackonochie has done in this case is not, in fact and in principle, entirely unauthorized, and therefore illegal.

Before I go further I will ask your Lordship just to look at Mr. Mackonochie's own admission, which is to be found at page 83 of this print.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Give me the reference to the book itself.

(Mr. Coleridge.) It will be enough for my purpose to refer your Lordship to Mr. Mackonochie's paper, in which you will find there is a distinct admission of the elevation of the cup and of the paten, because he goes on to say that that has been discontinued since a particular period of time to which he refers, but that that less obtrusive elevation which is sanctioned, as he says, by the words of the consecration prayer itself, is quite sufficient for all ritual purposes, and of course that would be continued. Now, my Lord, I say that which is charged in the articles, and which is admitted by Mr. Mackonochie or is proved by the evidence to which I have referred your Lordship, is unlawful.

Of course I am to show your Lordship why I say it is unlawful. First of all, I say there is not a single syllable about it in the prayer of consecration itself.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the elevation.

(Mr. Coleridge.) The elevation and the prostration as well. It will be desirable that I should draw your Lordship's attention to the very words of the prayer of consecration, because a good deal turns upon the variation which has taken place in this portion of the prayer in the various prayer books and service books to which attention has already been called, and to which I will proceed to call your Lordship's attention in a moment. Now this prayer, with which we are all more or less familiar, after the invocation at the beginning proceeds: "Hear us, O Merciful Father, we most humbly beseech thee; and grant that we, receiving these thy creatures of bread and wine according to thy Son our Saviour Jesus Christ's holy institution, in remembrance of his death and passion, may be partakers of his most blessed body and blood, who in the same night that he was betrayed took bread" [There the margin is, "here the priest is to take the paten into his hands"] "and when he had given thanks [and here to break the bread], he brake it and gave it to his disciples, saying, take, eat; [and here to lay his hand upon all the bread] this is my body, which is given for you; do this in remembrance of me. Likewise, after supper he took the cup [here he is to take the cup into his hand] and when he had given thanks he gave it to them, saying, drink ye all of this, for this [and here to lay his hand upon every vessel (be it chalice or flagon) in which there is any wine to be consecrated] is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for you and for many, for the remission of sins. Do this as oft as ye shall drink it, in remembrance of me." Those are the words of the consecration prayer. It will not be perhaps immaterial to look for a moment at one or two, and only one or two, of the other service books which may be said to throw a light on the present service book of the Church of England, for the purpose of seeing in what respects they differ from the Prayer Book of the Church of England, and that, as the result of that difference, whenever anything like an oblation or an offering up before the people of the representative sacrifice which is said to be performed in the blessed sacrament, when there is anything of that kind to be done, how distinctly it is provided for in the words of the service books themselves. When you find therefore that the service book of the Church of England—all or many of these service books being in existence before its last revision—when you find that there is no distinct oblation, and that there is no provision made for that which is supposed to be symbolized by the elevation, the fair argument, I submit to your Lordship, is that such elevation is not only not authorized, but is distinctly intended not to take place, and is therefore, by clear and necessary inference, forbidden.

I will take first the Savoy conference. I have it in the useful set of reprints of Mr. Hall, the Reliquiæ Liturgicæ and the Fragmenta Liturgicæ. This is from the Reliquiæ.

The Dean of the Arches.) Let me see it. That was after the Restoration I think.

Mr. Coleridge.) "Here the bread is to be brought to the minister, and received by him, and if put upon the table, and then the wine in like manner, or if they be set there before, however let him bless them, praying in these or the like words." I need not trouble your Lordship with that. "Then or immediately before this prayer, let the minister read the words of the institution, saying, Hear what the apostle Paul saith."

The Dean of the Arches.) You are reading the propositions, are you not, which were made by the conference; can you give me any reference to the number?

Mr. Coleridge.) No, my Lord, this is the service book, as I understand it.

The Dean of the Arches.) I think there was no service book before the Prayer Book.

Mr. Coleridge.) The preface is, "To the Right Reverend Bishops, &c. Having already given you our judgment of several things in the Book of Common Prayer, and our desires for the altering of some parts of it, leaving the rest unaltered, we here tender you some of the said alterations which in our former paper we showed to be needful; and some additional forms in Scripture phrase (as near as we well could) suited to the nature of the several parts of worship. The texts are cited in the margin, to justify partly the matter and partly the phrase. If any be misapplied (which we hope will not be found), we shall be willing, upon information, to retract such misapplication. If some of the prayers here offered seem of too great a length, the substance of them being allowed, we shall, upon conference and mutual consideration, endeavour to contract them;" and so forth. Then they submit it to the bishops. Then there is the Sacrament, which is called, "The order of celebrating the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ."

The Dean of the Arches.) Is it the answer of the bishops to the exceptions of the Presbyterian ministers you are reading from?

Mr. Coleridge.) No, my Lord, it is submitted to the bishops. The title of the book is "Reformation of the Liturgy, as it was presented to the Right Reverend Bishops by the Divines appointed by His Majesty's Commission," to treat with them about the alteration of it.

The Dean of the Arches.) I daresay you will let me look at your copy.

Mr. Coleridge.) Certainly, my Lord. It goes through the service book, and makes certain alterations, and where it alters it sets out a fresh service. This is the service that they propose for the celebration of the Holy Communion.

The Dean of the Arches.) Who proposed it?

Mr. Coleridge.) These divines, my Lord; the divines appointed by His Majesty as commissioned to do it. It is the Savoy Liturgy.

Mr. James.) That was in Charles I.'s time, I think.

Mr. Coleridge.) No, it was in 1661, in the time of Charles II.

The Dean of the Arches.) Certain persons were ordered to review the Book of Common Prayer, and to compare the same after the most ancient liturgy used in the Church, and they were to assemble and meet together for that purpose according to the terms of the warrant, if I remember right.

Mr. Coleridge.) It is called by Mr. Hall, who reprints it, the "Savoy Liturgy."

Mr. James.) It is the one which the Puritan divines failed to get.

The Dean of the Arches.) I think it is what the Presbyterian divines suggested. I think that is it.

Mr. Coleridge.) I read it, my Lord, for an object which will appear in a moment, and I only wish to read a very short portion.

The Dean of the Arches.) I have not the least wish to interrupt you, but I only wanted to know what it was.

Mr. Coleridge.) It is headed "the Order for administering the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ." The words of the institution are read from the eleventh chapter of the First Epistle to the Corinthians; and then, after the words of institution are read, no order is given for any direct consecration or holding in the hand of the bread or anything of the sort. "Then let the minister say, This bread and wine, being set apart and consecrated to this holy use by God's appointment are now no common bread and wine, but sacramentally the body and blood of Christ. Then let him thus pray, Most merciful Saviour," and so forth. "Then let the minister take the bread and break it in the sight of the people, saying, The body of Christ was broken for us, and offered once for all to sanctify us." Then shall he say, Behold the sanctified Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world." "In like manner let him take the cup and pour out the wine in the sight of the congregation, saying, We were redeemed with the precious blood of Christ as of a lamb without blemish and without spot."

Then, my Lord, there is the Nonjuring Liturgy, which is the one I was going to draw your attention to first, which is called the Communion Office, taken partly from primitive liturgies and partly from the first English Revised Common Prayer Book; I need not trouble your Lordship with anything more. This is taken partly from primitive liturgies and partly from the first English Revised Prayer Book, and was printed in 1718. The preface explains from what sources it was drawn up. They say the greatest part is taken from the first English Prayer Book, and then they conclude. "Upon the whole, here is nothing introduced without unexceptionable warrant, nothing of late beginning. Here is no application to saints or angels, or worship of images; no praying the dead out of purgatory; no adoration of the consecrated elements; nothing that supposes a corporeal presence either by trans- or con-substantiation; in short, nothing but what is primitive and agreeable to Scripture, and practised by the best recommended and enlightened ages."

Your Lordship sees that there is no adoration of the consecrated elements, nothing that supposes a material presence either by trans- or by con-substantiation, and when you come to look at the part where the consecration takes place, the priest is to say—"When his hour was come to offer the propitiatory sacrifice upon the cross, when he who had no sin himself mercifully undertook to suffer death for our sins, in the same night that he was betrayed, he [here the priest is to take the paten into his hands] took bread, and when he had given thanks he [and here to break the bread] brake it, and gave it to his “disciples saying, Take, eat, [and here to lay his hand upon all the bread] this is my body which is given for you. Do this in remembrance of me. Then the prayer for the moment ends, and the people say, Amen.” “Then shall the priest say, Likewise after supper he [here he is to take the cup into his hand] took the cup, and when he had given thanks he gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of this for [and here to lay his hand upon every vessel (be it chalice or flagon) in which there is any wine and water to be consecrated] this is my blood of the New Testament which is shed for you, and for many, for the remission of sins: Do this as oft as ye shall drink it in remembrance of me.” Then, my Lord, follows a regular act of oblation. “Wherefore having in remembrance his passion, death, and resurrection from the dead, his ascension into heaven, and second coming with glory and great power to judge the quick and the dead, and to render to every man according to his works, we offer to thee our King and our God, according to his holy institution, this bread and this cup, giving thanks to thee through him, that thou has vouchsafed us the honour to stand before thee, and to sacrifice unto thee. And we beseech thee to look favourably on these thy gifts which are here set before thee, O thou self-sufficient God, and do thou accept them to the honour of thy Christ; and send down thine Holy Spirit, the witness of the passion of our Lord Jesus, upon this sacrifice, that he may make this [here the priest shall lay his hand upon the bread] bread the body of thy Christ, and this [and here upon every vessel (be it chalice or flagon) in which there is any wine and water] cup the blood of thy Christ, that they who are partakers thereof may be confirmed in godliness;” and so the prayer goes on. Now I read that for the purpose of showing that having the English service book before them and desiring to make an act of formal oblation, to make an offering, a sacrifice, they put it in distinctly into their service; and nobody, with this service book in their hands, could doubt that the persons who drew this out intended that there should be an oblation to God of the consecrated elements, whatever that might mean, and that that should be done either by way of sacrifice or as representing the sacrifice that had before been performed.

The next Prayer Book that it is worth while to call attention to at all is the Scotch Prayer Book. Your Lordship will find it in the valuable set of reprints that Mr. Pickering published some years ago of all the service books, if you have it. It is printed from the first Prayer Book of Charles I., and it never had force in England.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are referring to Laud's Prayer Book?

(Mr. Coleridge.) Yes, my Lord, I read it from a common Scotch Prayer Book, but I have no reason to doubt that it at all varies, or that the common Scotch Prayer Book is otherwise than perfectly correct.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is the date of the book you are reading from?

(Mr. Coleridge.) This particular book is one that I have had some years. It was printed in Edinburgh in 1849, but I may say that I have compared it with the original Scotch Prayer Book, or at least with Pickering's reprint, and that it is perfectly correct.

(Mr. James.) No doubt it is correct.

(Mr. Coleridge.) In this Prayer Book the order is as follows:—“Then the presbyter, standing at such part of the holy table as he may with most ease and decency use both his hands, shall say the prayer of consecration as follows”—I do not want to read what is unnecessary, such as the early part of the prayer—“did institute, and in his holy gospel command us to continue a perpetual memory of that his precious death and sacrifice until his coming again, who in the night that he was betrayed took bread [at these words ‘took bread’ the presbyter that officiates is to take the paten in his hand and here to break the bread] and when he had given thanks, he brake it, and gave it to his disciples, saying, Take, eat; this is my body which is given for you. Do this in remembrance of me. Likewise after supper he took the cup [at these words ‘took the cup’ he is to take the chalice in his hand, and lay his hand upon so much of the wine, be it in chalice or flagons, as he intends to consecrate], and when he had given thanks he gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of this, for this is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for you, and for many, for the remission of sins. Do this as oft as ye shall drink it in remembrance of me.” Then comes the formal oblation, which is the prayer which is called “the oblation.”—“Wherefore, O Lord and Heavenly Father, according to the institution of thy dearly beloved Son, our Saviour Jesus Christ, we thy humble servants do celebrate and make here before thy divine Majesty, with these thy holy gifts, which we now offer unto thee” [these words are printed in a larger type than the rest in all the books that I have seen] “the memorial thy Son hath willed us to make, having in remembrance his blessed passion and precious death, his mighty resurrection and glorious ascension, rendering unto thee most hearty thanks for the innumerable benefits procured unto us by the same. Hear us, O merciful Father, we most humbly beseech thee, and of thy Almighty goodness vouchsafe to bless and sanctify with thy Word and Holy Spirit these thy gifts and creatures of bread and wine, that they may be to us the body and blood of thy most dearly beloved Son.” I say there again, when a distinct and definite act of oblation was intended, the compilers of that Prayer Book, who were, if my learned friend will forgive me for once for differing from him, no small men, and men certainly not, as I should venture to think, otherwise than thoroughly sound English divines, when they direct that a formal act of oblation should be made, Laud and those who drew up the Prayer Book and put it into the prayer, were not satisfied—I say not whether they were right or wrong,—but they were not satisfied in point of fact with the condition of the English Prayer Book; thinking, in fact, that a formal act of oblation of the consecrated elements should be made, they put into the service the formal act of oblation, without which nobody can use the service, and which, being in the service, of course is a statement on the part of those who use it, that it is perfectly lawful and right to make a distinct offering before the people of those elements which have just been consecrated, by the words set forth.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then your argument would be that Archbishop Laud and those who compiled the Scotch Prayer Book meant to make a difference between the Scotch Prayer Book and the English.

(Mr. Coleridge.) Certainly; it does not follow, of course, that Laud may not have thought the English Prayer Book perfectly sufficient for its purpose, and that he may not have been well content, as many other men have been, to accept the state of things in which he found himself. And we, like him, if we had to frame something for ourselves, to be carried into effect in another country or in a different state of things, might put into that something which was wanting in the service which we are in the habit of administering. It would show, as I apprehend, that we think that there is something which we conceive had better be done and had better exist, which does not exist in the service from which we are making the difference.

I think there is only one other matter, which perhaps is hardly worth while to consider, but if your Lordship is the least curious about it you will find that the same thing is to be found in the service book of the Irvingite persuasion. You will find that very strong views are to be found of a certain kind in their liturgy, which is, at all events, a most interesting book. You will find an order of Holy Communion in which the precedent of the Scotch office is very nearly followed, and that there are distinct acts of oblation and consecration put in, although in many respects it agrees with our own service book.

What I say then is, that reviewing all these various service books, and I may just enumerate those that I have put before your Lordship—first of all, our own book, then the non-jurors' book, then the Savoy book, and the Scotch book, or the book of Archbishop Laud—it will appear distinctly that neither prostration nor elevation was intended by the service books of the Church of England, because where elevation and offering is intended to be made it is provided for by the distinct words of the service books themselves; some of those service books, being written by persons who had the English service books before them, and who were not desirous, if they could avoid it, of differing at all or altering at all the English service book which was at that time in existence. Now, if your Lordship turns from this row of what may be termed English compilations to the Roman service—and if you look at what the Roman missal prescribes in the canon of the mass—there you will see perfectly plainly that when adoration and elevation are intended, they are set forth in terms as plain as plain can be. Nobody could possibly doubt what is the intention, and in what way that intention is to be carried into effect; and when your Lordship looks at that, and remembers that the persons who compiled the English service book had the Roman service book before them, and compiled it with a view to the Roman service-book, and to making such differences from the Roman service book as they considered essential—well, one cannot say in this world that anything in this kind of subject matter is demonstration, but it is as near demonstration as can be—that what they distinctly omitted, not simply as a matter of unauthorized practice, but as distinct rubrical enactment, that what they omitted from their reformation of the Roman service, they omitted because they intended it not to take place, and omitted it for the purpose of forbidding, by clear and necessary inference, its taking place for the future.

Turning for a moment to the Roman missal, if your Lordship looks at the canon of the mass, you will find it as follows: Generally speaking, I think it is about the middle of the book where the act of consecration begins:—"Tenens manus expansas super oblata dicit, Hanc igitur oblationem servitutis nostræ sed et cunctæ formulæ tuæ quæ sumus Domine ut placatus accipias diesque nostros in tua pace disponas atque ab æterna damnatione nos eripe et in electorum tuorum jubeas grege numerari." Then the rubric, "Jungit manus;" then "Per Christum Dominum nostrum Amen. Quam oblationem, tu Deus in omnibus quæsumus."

Then the rubric, "Signat ter super oblata" bene + dictam adscri + ptam ra + tam" (he is to make the sign of the cross at each of these words) "rationabilem acceptabilemque facere, digneris signat semel super hostiam et semel super calicem ut nobis cor + pus et san + guis." The sign of the cross is made at corpus and sanguis. Then come the words of institution, "Qui pridie quam pateretur accepit hostiam accepit panem in sanctas et venerabiles manus suas." The rubric is, "Elevat oculos ad cœlum." So that even the minutest gestures of the priest are distinctly laid down in the old service books. Then, "et elevatis oculis in cœlum ad te Deum Patrem suum omnipotentem tibi gratias agens." (Then comes the rubric, "Signat super hostiam) bene + dixit fregit deditque discipulis suis dicens, Accipite et manducate ex hoc, omnes." Then, "Tenens ambabus manibus hostiam inter indices et pollices profert verba consecrationis, secretè, distinctè et attentè super hostiam et simul super omnes, si plures sunt consecrandæ, Hoc est enim corpus meum. Prolatis verbis consecrationis statim hostiam consecratam genuflexus adorat." Your Lordship may remember Mr. Malin's evidence on this. "Prolatis verbis consecrationis statim hostiam consecratam genuflexus adorat: surgit, ostendit populo, reponit super corporale, iterum adorat: et non disjungit pollices et indices, nisi quando hostia

"tractanda est usque ad ablutionem digitorum." Now, my Lord, Roman Catholics are fond of saying—and I do not pretend to say with what truth, for I am not antiquarian enough to say—that there is no date which can be given for certain to the antiquity of the canon of the mass; and it is at any rate as old, I believe, certainly as the time of Gregory the Great. The compilers had this regular service before them with which they are dealing, and here is the very distinct order that after the words of consecration, "Hoc est corpus meum," which your Lordship, I know, is quite aware have been held over and over again to be the emphatic words which create the change, whatever that change may be—as soon as those words are uttered, "Prolatis verbis consecrationis statim hostiam consecratam genuflexus adorat. Tunc detecto calice dicit: Simili modo, postquam canatum est, ambabus manibus accipit calicem accipiens et hunc præclarum calicem in sanctas ac venerabiles manus suas: item tibi gratias agens, sinistrâ tenens calicem, dextera signat super eam Bene + dixit, deditque discipulis suis, dicens, 'Accipite et bibite ex eo, omnes.' Profert verba consecrationis secretè super calicem attentè, continuatè et secretè tenens illum panem elevatum; 'Hic est enim calix sanguinis mei novi et æterni testamenti: mysterium fidei, qui pro vobis et pro multis effundetur in remissionem peccatorum.' Prolatis verbis consecrationis deponit calicem super corporale et dicens secretè, 'Hæc quotiescumque feceritis in mei memoriam facietis.' Genuflexus adorat surgit, ostendit populo, deponit, coöperit et iterum adorat. Deinde disjungit manus dicit."—Now, my Lord, I do not know that it is material to pursue the canon of the mass further, but there are the most particular and exact directions as to what is to be done with the blessed elements in the canon of the mass. Again I call your Lordship's attention very distinctly to the evidence of Mr. Malin, and I ask your Lordship—

(Mr. Coleridge.) I do not desire in the least degree to press anything in this case, or, indeed, in any other case unfairly, but I ask your Lordship this question, If Mr. Mackonochie had before him the Roman ordinal instead of the English, the Roman ordinal, translated into English, could he have more exactly followed the order which is part of the Roman missal, and which, the Roman missal being before them, was expressly left out by those who compiled our Prayer Book. And now, my Lord, see the effect. He says, "After the consecration of the bread there was a pause, and the paten was elevated above the head of the consecrating clergyman, and then a special prostration on the part of the clergy took place." Now then, "Prolatis verbis consecrationis deponit calicem super corporale et dicens secretè, Hæc quotiescumque feceritis in mei memoriam facietis. Genuflexus adorat." I respectfully ask your Lordship, if these words had been put into our Prayer Book, "as soon as he has consecrated the elements, he will kneel down and adore them," what could a clergyman do but what Mr. Malin says the consecrating priest did on this occasion?

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you contend that both the kneeling and adoring are both offensive? The adoring is not charged.

(Mr. Coleridge.) I shall have to deal with that by-and-by, but I am much obliged by your Lordship's reminding me of it. I hoped that I had not said anything which should seem to imply that I thought they were the same. I use it in this way; passing quite away from adoring, if your Lordship pleases. I say he kneels to it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And you say the kneeling is not allowed.

(Mr. Coleridge.) I do.

Allow me exactly to convey my meaning to your Lordship. The prayer of consecration is by the service book to be made standing. There is no direction in the English service book that any posture except standing is to be assumed by the consecrating priest from the beginning to the end of the prayer of consecration. I say that any interruption of the prayer of consecration, for the purpose of kneeling down, I will not say to, but in front of the elements which have been consecrated, is unlawful.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Any attitude but that of standing?

(Mr. Coleridge.) That I should say is another way of putting it; but I prefer to put it, if your Lordship will allow me, in my own way. I say, any interruption of the prayer of consecration by assuming any posture than that of standing, and especially kneeling during the prayer of consecration and rising again, thus interrupting the prayer of consecration for the purpose of kneeling and rising again, and doing that after one and the other element has been consecrated, immediately after and in front of it—I avoid my friend's objection with regard to saying "to it,"—I say that is an unlawful act. I say two very good reasons for showing it to be unlawful are these: When anything of the sort is intended in subsequent books to the English Prayer Book it is put in, and when anything of the sort is intended in a book prior to the English Prayer Book it is put in also in the plainest terms. The English book is written with the Romish missal before it, and with a natural desire, and if I may be permitted to say so, the commendable desire to differ from the established rule that had gone on for 1500 years, as little as conscience will allow the writers of it to differ. Having the Romish missal before them, and having this order before them, the omission of so very special an order as that which does in the Romish missal interrupt the prayer of consecration is, on the part of those who substitute for it another prayer which is to be said standing, an order that such an interruption shall not take place. I venture to put it to your Lordship, and I apprehend that that is the fair mode of putting it;—I do not in the least desire to deal rhetorically or otherwise than as a lawyer in this case;—but I do put it deliberately as a legal argument; supposing this portion of the canon of the mass had been incorporated in verba in the English service book, what could Mr. Maekonochie have done to comply with the English service book, having that in it, that he has not done now? It is, of course, for your Lordship to determine this case, and not for me; but I respectfully submit that this is a strong and cogent argument to anybody who has to consider it judicially, to bring them to the conclusion that what is omitted is omitted on purpose, and having been omitted on purpose, it is in order that it shall not be done, and if it is done it is a transgression of the order and a violation of the rubric.

There is another observation which, I hope, is well worthy of your Lordship's attention, and which derives its importance from the consideration not of any foreign material at all, but of the ipsissima verba of the service books of our own church. Just compare, for a moment, the English service books, the consecration in the first Prayer Book, the consecration in the second Prayer Book, and then the condition in which the consecration prayer stands after the final settlement of it in 1662. Now in Dr. Cardwell's two liturgies you will find those matters stand side by side, so that they can be easily compared.

(Mr. Coleridge.) Yes. Perhaps it may be convenient to tell your Lordship the conclusion I propose to arrive at, and then you will be able to apply more clearly the passages as I read them. What I say is this, that doing anything whatever to the elements is never ordered after the first Prayer Book, in which Prayer Book there is an express order that there is to be no elevation; until 1637.

In 1637 the acts of consecration, the manual acts of consecration of the elements, are first replaced in the Prayer Book; that is in the Scotch Prayer Book, in Laud's Prayer Book; and in Laud's Prayer Book there is a provision for oblation, and that had no effect in England, as your Lordship knows. The first Prayer Book in which the acts of consecration appear after the first book of Edward, applying to the Church of England, is the Prayer Book of 1661, and in the Prayer Book of 1661, although compiled subsequently to Laud's Prayer Book in 1637, in which there was an oblation, the oblation is left out. That is what I think you will find to be the result of the passages I am about to read to you.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Just mention the Prayer Books as you read the passages, as I have not got them together.

(Mr. Coleridge.) I will read them, if your Lordship pleases, in order. The first Prayer Book of Edward.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is in 1549.

(Mr. Coleridge.) I need only read the operative words: "And did institute, and in his holy gospel command us to celebrate a perpetual memory of that his precious death until his coming again. O merciful Father, we beseech thee, and with thy Holy Spirit and Word, vouchsafe to bless and sanctify [Then at each of these words the sign of the cross is to be made] these thy gifts and creatures of bread and wine, that they may be to us the body and blood of thy most dearly beloved son Jesus Christ, who, in the same night that he was betrayed, took bread [here the priest must take the bread into his hands], and when he had blessed and given thanks he brake it and gave it to his disciples, saying, Take, eat; this is my body, which is given for you. Do this in remembrance of me. Likewise after supper, he took the cup [here the priest shall take the cup into his hands], and when he had given thanks he gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of this, for this is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for you, and for many, for remission of sins. Do this as oft as you shall drink it, in remembrance of me." Then follows: "These words before rehearsed are to be said, turning still to the altar, without any elevation or showing the sacrament to the people."

Then, my Lord, comes a distinct oblation, which I need not read to your Lordship. It is very much, though they do not appear to have followed it word by word, the same as Laud afterwards adopted in the Prayer Book of 1637. There is a rubric or two at the end of the communion service of that Prayer Book which is worthy of observation, as it shows that at least very high sacramental doctrine was entertained by the persons who compiled that book. Your Lordship will find it in page 314 of Cardwell.

(Mr. Coleridge.) At the end of the fourth rubric you will find: "Men must not think less to be received in part than in the whole, but in each of them the whole body of Jesus Christ." And then at the end: "And although it be read in ancient writers that the people received at the priest's hands the sacrament of the body of Christ in their own hands, and no commandment of Christ to the contrary, yet forasmuch as they many times conveyed the same secretly away, kept it with them, and diversely abused it to superstition and wickedness, lest anything hereafter should be attempted, and that a uniformity might be used throughout the whole realm, it is thought convenient the people commonly receive the sacrament of Christ's body in their mouths at the priest's hand." Therefore, my Lord, certainly it was not for want of their very strong views that they forbade the priest to offer the sacrament or to elevate it, or to show it in any way to the people, because anything stronger or more decisive upon the question as to the high sacramentalism of their views cannot be well conceived than this passage from the rubric which I have just read to your Lordship. And I say the fair effect of all this is that in the present service book of the Church of England it was never intended that there should be any elevation of the blessed sacrament or prostration before it, at the time of its consecration, by the consecrating priest.

Further, my Lord, I cannot help submitting that it is excessively important to understand exactly, if one could, what is the contention which my learned friend is going to make on this subject. Here we have, either proved or admitted, that there has been elevation, and that there has been what I call prostration. I do not want to quarrel with my learned friend,—of course I shall not quarrel with him—but I do not want to dispute about a word. There has been this kneeling down in front of the altar immediately after the consecration of the elements: that is either proved or admitted. I want to understand upon what ground, if I can, my learned friend is going to put the doing of these acts which, as I say, are conclusively proved or admitted. He must, I apprehend, take one of two courses. He must either say it is prescribed, or if he does not say it is prescribed he must say it is permitted. Now, I will deal with these propositions separately. Prescribed it undoubtedly is not in terms, because there stands the prayer of consecration before your Lordship, and no such direction is to be found in it, but it is to be found in plain and unambiguous terms in the canon of the mass; therefore it cannot be said that it is in terms prescribed. Is it then prescribed by implication? Is any other service fairly to be taken into account, and to be considered as an authority, and as it were according to the precedents of Acts of Parliament, to be read with this service book? If so, what service book, or what compilation, or what liturgy is to be taken; that is to say—I am merely assuming for the purpose of argument that such a contention is put forth—what service book is it that is to be incorporated and read with the communion office of the Church of England? If we are to go back to very primitive antiquity, if we are to go back to the liturgy of St. Clement or St. Basil (my learned friend Mr. Prideaux is much more learned, and a much better scholar than I am), but I confess I cannot find, with my small amount of Greek, that they contain any orders on the subject. They appear to be perfectly silent. It stands with regard to them, as far as I know, entirely on usage, whatever the usage may be in oriental churches.

Is it to stand upon the canon of the mass? That would be a strange proposition; that having the canon of the mass before them, with these very distinct, plain, unambiguous, excessively definite directions before them, which they had nothing to do but translate, to put the matter beyond all dispute, they left it in this utter doubt. If it is not to stand upon the canon of the mass; that is to say, upon that traditional order of celebration which, as I said just now, is at least as old as the time of Gregory the Great, is it to stand upon any variations of it which were current in England at the time at which these service books were compiled? Your Lordship has been referred to the Sarum Missal, to the Bangor, to the York, and to the Hereford Uses. Is that which was not abolished by inference in those, to be incorporated into the service book of the Church of England, and because it is not abolished is it to be considered that their rubrical orders are embodied in the orders of the Church of England, and therefore may be had recourse to? Two objections seem to me to arise with respect to any such view. I have dealt with the question of the canon of the mass itself, and you will find, if you look at Mr. Maskell's collection of the Uses, as you may expect, that in the canon of the mass, in the actual part which relates to the consecration of the elements, there is extremely little difference between any of the service books. But supposing there were, the difficulty would be to know to which of those four different Uses you are to have recourse, and you come in that case, as it seems to me, distinctly within the very terms of the preface to our own Prayer Book, and are doing the very thing that the preface to the Prayer Book says shall not be done. Because the preface to the Prayer Book makes reference to these very Uses, and points out that an inconvenience having been experienced from the use of various services and various orders of celebration in the Church—those very services being mentioned by name by the writers of the preface—it is said for the future the order of the Church of England embodied in the Prayer Book and that order only shall be used. “And whereas heretofore there has been great diversity in saying and singing in churches within this realm; some follow the Salisbury use, some the Hereford use, and some the use of Bangor, some of York, and some of Lincoln; now from henceforth all the whole realm shall have but one Use.” Therefore it seems to me that it is exceedingly difficult for my friends to suggest what is to be incorporated if you once allow yourself to be taken out of the four corners of the service book itself, and to say that anything is of authority which is not laid down in that service book, and which does not follow by necessary intendment from the words of that service book itself.

But further, I think you will find that what was aimed at throughout the various alterations of the Prayer Book, and what was pointed out in the Acts of Uniformity, to which I shall have to call your Lordship's attention shortly in a moment, was, at all events, an outward uniformity of service. It was intended to curtail and restrain the outward liberty of both minister and people, and to bind down the outward celebration of divine service within the rules which were laid down in the books which were published from time to time by the authority of Parliament. Your Lordship will forgive me for saying by way of parenthesis, that this is not, as your Lordship has more than once pointed out, a question of opinion; and principles which may be very sound and just when we are dealing with questions of liberty of opinion have nothing whatever to do with the question which we are now discussing before your Lordship. It may well be that when you are dealing with a code such as the Thirty-nine Articles, which are expressed to be made for the present time and as articles of peace, that it is a legitimate principle to allow much latitude and variety of interpretation. I express no opinion whether it be so or not; I only say it is not an analogous case to the present. It may be perfectly legitimate to say, “Here are a certain set of definite propositions which we will not have impugned. We do not mean to put this forward as an entire abstract of a Christian man's belief; we do not mean to say that everybody who holds all this cannot hold anything at all that is not set down here. All we wish to say is, these things are to be accepted and not to be disputed against. If you choose to accept these, what you may choose to think about this, that, or the other matter of religion with which we do not deal, we have nothing to do with. That is a matter for your conscience; that is a matter to be decided between you and God, and we do not meddle with it at all; but we will not have these particular definite propositions disputed, and you shall not impugn these Articles without coming under the terrors of the ecclesiastical law.” But when you are considering what a man may hold in private, and even what he may practise in private, as a matter of pious opinion or conscientious obligation, as far as he himself is concerned, and when you are considering what alterations a minister of the National Church may make in the national services which are ordered by Parliament, I apprehend very different considerations arise. No harm is done; no offence is given if a man keeps his conscientious opinions to himself. I may differ with your Lordship upon some matter not in the least treated of in the Thirty-nine Articles. I may instance such an opinion as prayers for the dead, a matter which I apprehend is left open to the Christian liberty of English Churchmen to believe or not to believe as their conscience may prompt them. If I say nothing about it, if I do not preach it, if I simply as a matter of pious opinion think that they are right and proper forms of devotion to employ—

(The Dean of the Arches.) Even if you put it on a tombstone?

(Mr. Coleridge.) Even if I put it on a tombstone. However, my Lord, I will rather not choose prayers for the dead; I will take something that could not be put on a tombstone; or it is quite enough for my purpose to suggest that there are many matters of that sort which, if I keep to myself, I have a perfect right to believe and practise, and nobody can gainsay them. But it is a totally different matter with regard to the public services of the Church, which being once settled, and every member of the English Church having what I may call a vested interest in the maintenance of its public services as Parliament has determined them,—it is a very different question then as to the principles which are to guide your Lordship's determination of the stringency or the laxity of the formularies or the documents which prescribe such public ministrations. Because, supposing a man to hold, what I apprehend a member of the Church of England may hold with perfect liberty if he likes it, that prayers for the dead are objectionable, and are, if men please to say so, Roman; and I apprehend no English clergyman could introduce them into the services of the Church.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are perfectly aware, Mr. Coleridge, that there is a decision, which would be binding upon me, by my learned predecessor that such an inscription is lawful. It is not a matter of private opinion, it is a decision enunciated by my learned predecessor, and by which I am bound. I wish that there be no mistake upon that matter.

(Mr. Coleridge.) Precisely, my Lord. I will not deal further with prayers for the dead; but what I mean to say is, that any strong expression in the writings of Bishop Andrewes or Archbishop Laud—I apprehend whatever a person may choose to say in a book of devotion, or use privately, if he did the same thing in a church, if the gesture, or the act of worship, or the ornament, or whatever it might be that he chose to use in private, were used by him in a church, every English churchman who had a conscientious objection to it would have a perfect right to say, “I have nothing to do with your private opinions; if you choose to take your crucifix home, and put it up in your private bedroom, and say your prayers before it, I have nothing to say about that. I do not approve of it. I do not do it myself. But Christian liberty is Christian liberty, and you have a perfect right to do it. But if you put it in the Church I object to it, and I will bring you before an Ecclesiastical Court, and have it abated.” Because Parliament has said, not that the crucifix is unlawful, but that you shall not use it in church. It has expressed no opinion upon this or that matter being held as matter of private belief; but it has said, “These are churches of the nation, in which the people of the nation have a right to worship, and we put certain limits to the practices tolerable within those churches. You shall have so much ceremonial, because there are a certain number of English people who desire it; you shall not have more than a certain amount of ceremonial, because there are a certain number of English people who disapprove of it. You must go elsewhere if you want more, or if you want less. This is what we think a reasonable compromise upon the whole for the wants of the nation. We have ascertained it once for all; and by that, as far as public ministrations are concerned, you must be bound.”

Now, let us test this matter in another way. I presume that the ground upon which the Defendant must put the stopping in the middle of the prayer of consecration to kneel down after he has raised the element, and put it on the table,—to kneel down in front of the table which has the elements upon it—I do not say to them,—I suppose the ground upon which he must put it is that although he can hardly deny it was an addition, it was such an addition as was so indifferent, so little contrary to the general spirit of the prayer in which it is interposed, that it is no offence; that de minimis non curat lex; and that just as turning to the east at the Belief, or one or two other things (for they are very few) are to be found sanctioned by very general practice, although not prescribed in the Prayer Book—that this is a matter of decent observance which would not interfere with the general spirit of the consecration prayer which you are bound to use, and that upon that ground it was an unimportant addition, if it be considered an addition at all. But who is to be the judge of the importance or the unimportance of an addition? And my Lord, if the addition is to be made because—I will concede—it is his conscientious belief that it is unimportant, who is to be the judge whether the additions which he chooses to make be important or unimportant? He does not do something or other which is ordered, and it is something very slight, and he says, “Oh, it is substantially the same as if I did it. I would rather not do it.” Could that stand? I apprehend clearly not. Upon what ground then is an addition, however small, to stand. It cannot stand upon a man's conscientious conviction, which I am willing to grant for this purpose, or indeed for any purpose. He cannot be the judge of it. Who then is to be the judge? Why, the law has prescribed once for all what is to be done. Those who are bound to obey the law must obey it, and if they do not like it, they must go where the law will cease to have authority over them. That is the answer. Your Lordship knows the common story which, whether true or not, is perfectly good as an illustration, which is told of Wesley. Wesley heard one of his ministers reading the Litany, and changing the word “sudden” into “unprepared,” and instead of “sudden death” saying “unprepared death.” Wesley objected. Said the minister, “I think ‘unprepared’ better expresses the idea, because there is no reason to pray against sudden death if you are ready for it. The thing you pray against is being taken when you are not ready. ‘Unprepared’ is the better word.” Wesley is reported to have said, “That is not the question. It may or may not be a better word; but if you take to altering ‘sudden’ into ‘unprepared,’ somebody else will be altering something else into something else, and we shall have all the beauty and order of the service destroyed.” It may be in that particular case the alteration might be correct. I have heard persons again, who, because they did not like to pray for the Roman Catholics, turned the words “Catholic Church” into “Universal Church.” I confess I never heard that alteration made without a certain shudder, because I do not see why one should not pray for everybody. But, independently of that, I think no one has a right to change the words of our liturgy. There are the words set down for us, and those words the clergy are bound to use. We, the laity, have a right to require that the clergy shall use them, and no others, and any clergyman can be brought to book if he does alter or add in any way to them.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you put the use of a gesture not prescribed by the Prayer Book on the same footing as the alteration of the language of the Prayer Book?

(Mr. Coleridge.) Well, my Lord, it would depend a good deal upon the gesture. If your Lordship asks me whether a man raising his hand in reading scripture, as I have seen men dramatise the scene between St. Paul and Festus, commits an offence, I should say no. As a matter of taste I think they had better leave it alone, but I do not think it would be very sperate to bring such a gentleman before your Lordship to have him admonished. Therefore in the abstract I would rather not answer the question. But if your Lordship asks me if I do gravely contend whether such a gesture or such an interruption as is charged in this case would stand in that position, then I say I do.

(Mr. Coleridge.) Your Lordship knows that in practical matters it is extremely difficult to lay down a proposition which shall be universally true; because, in the case I have put, it would be absurd to say that such a gesture, or every gesture which is not authorized by the Prayer Book, is an offence. But at the same time I think you would equally admit that it is perfectly clear there are some gestures which would be distinct offences. Therefore the only answer I can make to your Lordship's question would be that it must depend upon the circumstances of the case, and that in some cases undoubtedly it would be so.

(The Dean of the Arches.) This particular gesture you put upon that footing.

(Mr. Coleridge.) I do distinctly.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is only what I wanted to arrive at.

(Mr. Coleridge.) Now very shortly allow me to draw your Lordship's attention to two or three passages of the Acts of Uniformity themselves, because the proposition I am now upon is this:—that it was the distinct intention of the Legislature to limit the public ministrations within certain strict and definite rules; and that the words of the Acts of Parliament themselves will show that the principles, which I admit may be fair and legitimate principles to apply to matters of opinion, do not apply to external matters of practice.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I understand you to say that any addition or omission not warranted by Act of Parliament in the words of the Act of Uniformity and the Prayer Book, is illegal.

(Mr. Coleridge.) I do. First of all, let me draw your Lordship's attention to the Act of Uniformity of Elizabeth,—the 1st Elizabeth, cap. 2, section 3: “Be it enacted by the Queen's Highness, with the assent of the Lords and Commons,”—because it seems all the bishops dissented, “in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that all and singular ministers in any cathedral or parish church or other place within this realm of England, Wales, and the marches of the same, or other the Queen's Dominions, shall from and after the feast of the Nativity of St. John Baptist next coming be bound to say and use the mattens, evensong, celebration of the Lord's supper, and administration of each of the Sacraments, and all the common and open prayer, in such order and form as is mentioned in the said book so authorized by Parliament in the said fifth and sixth years of the reign of King Edward the 6th, with one alteration of certain lessons, to be used on every Sunday of the year, and the form of the Litany altered or corrected, and two sentences only added in the delivery of the Sacraments to the communicants, and none other or otherwise.” What words can be more definite and express to show that uniformity was aimed at, and that the public celebration of the Sacrament was to be distinctly according to that form, and according to that form alone?

In the Prayer Book of Elizabeth the only addition, as far as the Holy Communion is concerned, to the second Prayer Book of Edward, was, as your Lordship well knows, an addition of the first half of the words of administration to the whole of the communicants, making the administration of each of the elements consist of two sentences instead of one. If your Lordship looks at that book of Elizabeth's you will find that no act of consecration was to take place at all. Could Mr. Mackonochie, if he had lived in the time of Elizabeth, have consecrated by laying his hand on the bread, the paten, or the wine? It was not forbidden. It had stood in the first Prayer Book of Edward; it was distinctly omitted in the second Prayer Book of Edward; and under the statute of Elizabeth the second Prayer Book of Edward, with the addition of those two sentences, was to be used, and none other or otherwise. Could it have been gravely contended by any priest of the Church of England in the time of Elizabeth that he could have consecrated as under the first Prayer Book of Edward? I apprehend most clearly not; and yet that is idem per idem, as it seems to me. If he could not have used the manual acts of consecration prescribed in the first Prayer Book because they were distinctly omitted upon consideration and for a reason in the second, why, upon what ground, can Mr. Mackonochie put any devout gesture, any act of devotion at all, any outward act of devotion, not prescribed, in the course of the service? It is apart entirely from matters of private devotion,—upon what grounds can he put it that would not have been available to him, under this Act of Elizabeth, to justify him in going through the act of consecration sanctioned by the first Prayer Book of Edward? I apprehend that is one way of testing the validity of the contention which my learned friends will be driven to in this case.

Now I pass from this Act of Uniformity to, I think, the next—at all events to our present Act, the 14th of Charles II.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, that is the next.

(Mr. Coleridge.) I believe there was none between the one to which I have drawn attention and the 4th Chapter of the 14th of Charles II. The second section is this: “Now in regard that nothing conduced more to the settling of the peace of this nation (which is desired of all good men), nor to the honour of our religion and the propagation thereof, that an universal agreement in the public worship of Almighty God; and to the intent that every person within this realm may certainly know the rule to which he is to conform in public worship and administration of sacraments and other rites and ceremonies of the Church of England, and the manner how and by whom bishops, priests, and deacons are and ought to be made, ordained, and consecrated; be it enacted by the King's most Excellent Majesty, by the advice and with the consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and of the Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that all and singular ministers in any cathedral, collegiate or parish church or chapel, or other place of public worship within this realm of England, dominion of Wales, town of Berwick-on-Tweed, shall be bound to say and use the morning prayer, evening prayer, celebration and administration of both of the sacraments, and all other the public and common prayer, in such order and form as is mentioned in the said book annexed and joined to the present Act, and intituled ‘The Book of Common Prayer and administration of the sacrament and other rites and ceremonies of the Church, according to the use of the Church of England, together with the Psalter or Psalms of David pointed as they are to be sung or said in churches, and the form or manner of making, ordaining, and consecrating of bishops, priests, and deacons;’ and that the morning and evening prayers therein contained shall upon every Lord's day, and upon all other days and occasions, and at the times therein appointed, be openly and solemnly read by all and every minister or curate, in every church, chapel, or other place of public worship within this realm of England and places aforesaid.” Now the object is, that there shall be a uniformity of public worship, that those who have to perform it may certainly know the rule by which they are to be governed. Then it is indicated, (discharging ourselves at present of all that does not apply to the present case,) that the holy communion shall be administered in every church and chapel in such form and order as is set down in this prayer book. Now, my Lord, I say, as to the services which we have had described,—either described in the Articles, or described by the evidence,—can it be said that that is in such form and order as is set down in the prayer book? What is set down in the prayer book, no doubt, is done; but a good deal that is not set down in the prayer book is also done; and can anybody say that if he do more than what is set down in the rule to which he is to conform, that is keeping the rule? The rule is a rule of length and breadth; a canon,—and a canon is equally broken by adding to it, as by diminishing from it, and if you add a solemn observance, of whatever character it may be, which is not prescribed in the book, you break the rule, and you violate the uniformity of public worship.

Now, my Lord, the 17th section, I think, will throw more light upon what was intended. They thought it necessary to have a special section,—which at the moment I cannot put my finger upon, but no doubt your Lordship knows it perfectly well,—to authorize the use of Latin prayers in the chapels of universities.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the 17th section, I think. They might use the Latin prayers in the colleges of Westminster, Winchester, or Eton, or any of them.

(Mr. James.) The 17th section applies entirely to the universities.

(Mr. Coleridge.) “Provided always, that it shall and may be lawful to use the morning and evening prayers, and all other prayers and services prescribed in and by the said book in the chapels or other public places of the respective colleges and shall, in both the universities, in the colleges of Westminster, Winchester, and Eton, and in the vocation of the clergy of either province, in Latin, anything in this Act contained to the contrary notwithstanding.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the 18th section.

(Mr. Coleridge.) Yes, my Lord, the 18th. They thought it necessary to make a special provision for places where, as I remember a friend of mine, and I daresay a friend of your Lordship's, said, with a certain amount of satire, he presumed they were permitted to be read in Latin because that was a tongue understood of the people. Still they thought it necessary to put a special clause in the Act of Parliament to justify the reading of the Book of Common Prayer in Latin. One would have thought that certainly if the people understood Latin they might have read it in Latin; but, however, they thought that a special clause in the Act was necessary.

The 17th section, I think, is important for this purpose. My learned friend, if he is very astute,—and he is very astute in following language,—may say that the words of the Act of Charles II. are not identical with those of the Act of Elizabeth. Nor are they, because whereas in the section of the statute of Elizabeth to which I have drawn attention, the words “none other or otherwise” occur, no such words occur in the first or second section of the statute of Charles, and it might be said that it made a difference between the two. Now the 17th section corrects that, because the 17th section clearly shows that it was not intended to impose upon the Universities or upon the scholars of Westminster or Winchester or Eton any heavier burden with respect to uniformity than was imposed upon all the rest of the world. So far as anything was intended, it was that greater liberty was intended to be enjoyed by them; and, I say, that in that section which follows that of the Universities and deals with the schools, the words are substantially identical with the words of Elizabeth. There the words are not only that the order of the Book of Common Prayer shall be used, but that none other shall be; and, therefore, putting the 17th section together with the second section of the statute of Charles, it really brings the enactment of Charles substantially to exactly the same force and strength as exists in the words of the statute of Elizabeth.

In truth, my Lord, I cannot help thinking that they meant and aimed at an agreement, a rigid agreement, in public acts of worship. They left other matters to Christian liberty; but there was to be a rigid uniformity in the acts of public worship. And if it were not so, my Lord, it is difficult to see where this notion of insertion is to stop. Mr. Mackonochie kneels down and says a prayer, keeping the whole congregation waiting, the rubric being that he is to say the prayer of consecration standing. He stops in the middle, and kneels down in front of the table on which the elements are, for a perceptible and appreciable time. He takes the paten and cup, and elevates them above his head for the purpose of making an offering of them to Almighty God. I do not say that is charged, but I presume the only use of elevating them is to offer them to Almighty God. Well, it is defended, I suppose, on the ground that it is not forbidden. But see how many things might be defended on the same ground, and how entirely the whole feeling and aspect of the service of the church might be changed. Hymns are not forbidden. As a matter of taste, if I might be permitted to express myself on the subject, I might say that there are some very beautiful hymns and short anthems which are to be found in the old service books, and they are not forbidden. Many of them, no doubt, were put in for distinctly ritual objects,—put in at particular periods in the old services with distinctly symbolical and mystical intention. They are not forbidden. Might they be put in?

(Mr. Coleridge.) None that I know of.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you say that all hymns are illegal?

(Mr. Coleridge.) In the sense that they are not authorized; but your Lordship knows the rubric, “In quires and places where they sing, here followeth the anthem.” I suppose that may be a hymn if they like.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Of course my object is to see the extent of the argument; whether the argument would or would not be against the introduction of all hymns.

(Mr. Coleridge.) I suppose the ground upon which hymns as generally sung are defended and are defensible, is that they are sung between one service and another, and are no parts of the service at all. It would be a strong thing to say that a number of persons meeting together in church might not praise God by singing.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Might not the object of the Act of Uniformity be entirely defeated by their singing hymns entirely in contradiction to the doctrine of the Church.

(Mr. Coleridge.) One would hardly like to suppose that people would go in crowds into church to sing such doctrines.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I only mean that it is possible to introduce by hymns matter at variance with the structure of the Church Prayer Book.

(Mr. Coleridge.) Exactly; and, beautiful as many of these hymns are, they are inconsistent with the doctrines of the Church.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You will excuse me for interrupting you. I am listening with a great deal of attention to your argument, and I am attending with real anxiety to every part of this case. I understand your argument as almost going to the extent of saying that the introduction of any hymns, except between the services, as you say, would be illegal.

(Mr. Coleridge.) I am not aware that there are any introduced except between the services, with the exception of the anthem. Where the choir is not of sufficient strength to sing an elaborate counterpoint anthem, they sing a hymn.

(The Dean of the Arches.) If hymns may be introduced because they are between the services, might not prayers be introduced between the services also?

(Mr. Coleridge.) That is not what we are now considering.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No; I only draw it from your argument.

(Mr. Coleridge.) If I am pressed with it, I should say myself certainly, that hymns were not admitted, and that probably for a length of time hymns were not sung, but that gradually they crept in. If you ask me for a sensible answer, I should think that services without singing were found to be so cold and dead, that the whole devotional feelings of mankind rose against it, and consequently hymns were introduced, and nobody thought it worth while to interfere about the matter. If I were asked to advise as a lawyer whether you could as a matter of law sing a hymn, I have not been paid to give an opinion, and therefore it would be a very bad one if I gave it now. I should think there would be a good deal to be said for the affirmative,—that it was illegal; but the substantial answer, I apprehend, is that it has gone on by general consent, that it is found to be a good and pious thing to do, and that persons having accepted it nobody thinks it worth while now to dispute it. But if you ask me as to the strict law, I apprehend it would not be lawful.

But allow me to draw attention to this, that it is not the same question, as I apprehend. In point of law the holy communion and the morning service are two separate services, and at the end of the evening prayer the sermon is a thing that has been engrafted rather by the implied effect of Acts of Parliament, which have spoken about two full services with sermons, and as there was no other time to preach the sermons they were preached then,—but really the services are distinct. And I think your Lordship will find,—at least it is so, as far as my experience goes,—there is not in fact any singing of hymns, so far as I know, at all events as a general rule or practice, so as to give it the semblance of a general practice, except between the services,—between what are two distinct services in the Prayer Book. They take place at the same time, or rather one after the other, and hymns are interposed between the two. By common consent a hymn has been sung, and there is a hymn sung now very often, after the third collect in the evening prayer, where some singing is provided for in the Prayer Book, and where, if they cannot sing an anthem, they sing what is most like an anthem, that is a hymn. But that is not the case here. I am supposing that any of the old Catholic hymns, fine and impressive as they are, which are to be found in the old service book had been interposed during the administration of the Holy Communion. That, I apprehend, would stand on a very different footing; and whether I am right or wrong in the answer which I have given your Lordship about hymns, that does not appear to me to touch this question, because they would stand on a totally different ground. They would alter the character of the services; they would be a distinct alteration of what is distinctly prescribed in the service book itself. Therefore whatever may be said about the singing I apprehend it does not apply to them.

Now, my Lord, I take again (I shall have to deal with it separately presently, but not at any great length) “incensing.” Censers are not forbidden, that I know of, in terms. Then take the case of ringing a bell at the elevation of the Blessed Sacrament. That, we are all familiar with,—at least those of us who have ever been present at a Roman Catholic ceremony. To my own mind, it is particularly impressive at particular periods to hear a bell ring, followed by an intense silence. Everybody knows what that means; and that is not forbidden. Is it to be contended that an English priest could elevate what he might call possibly the Host, and that there should be a ringing of the bell, and an universal prostration of the congregation in a marked and distinct manner, because it is not forbidden? So, my Lord, the holding forth of the Blessed Sacrament to the people, that is not forbidden. It is plain that if all these various things which are not forbidden, and which may, for aught I know, have, to those who are brought up under different forms of religion, a devout and elevating effect—I am not here to dispute about these matters at all,—but if all this is to be introduced into the celebration and services of the Church of England because it is not forbidden, all I can say about it is, that the whole character of the services may be entirely and absolutely altered, and that that which was distinctly written and has been adopted for 300 years, in one sense may by these unforbidden ceremonies,—if by unforbidden is meant not expressly forbidden,—by the introduction of all these not expressly forbidden ceremonies, be turned into a totally different service; and into a service, which although some persons may like it, a great number of persons would find excessively offensive to them, a service which they have just as much a right as members of the National Church to say is offensive to them, as any person who is interested in it in a foreign church has a right to say that as a matter of devotional feeling he is pleased and interested with it. The Reformers in the Parliament of England have drawn a line of compromise between these two classes of persons. They have laid down a certain ceremonial, and no more, and they say that is a sufficient ceremonial. It is not a question whether this, that, or the other ceremony is of itself impressive or striking, but whether it can be added without an entire alteration. Because what is good for one is good for twenty, and it is quite plain that by the addition of twenty you may have the whole character of the service entirely changed. That cannot be; one’s common sense revolts from it, and is offended by the conclusion to which one would be brought by acceding to such a proposition. After all, we are to use our common sense to construe these things, and I am quite satisfied that your Lordship is the very last person in whose hands it is at all likely to be proved that common law is not common sense. The law is the perfection of common sense; at all events we lawyers are anxious to maintain that it is so.

I said I would carefully attend to what your Lordship threw out upon the subject of doctrine; and in what I am about to say, I beg your Lordship to believe that I am not going to offend against your Lordship’s canon. I not only accept it, but I am heartily glad that it is so, and that we are not here upon matters of doctrine, but upon matters of fact and practice. We have nothing to do with these solemn questions in this case. But, my Lord, I have a right to use the argument upon doctrine to this extent. I do not say that Mr. Mackonochie does these various things as intending to convey or to symbolize by them a particular doctrine. I do not assert it; but I have a right to assert this, that at all events they may do so, and that persons who go to Mr. Mackonochie’s church, or to any church where these things are practised, and see a ceremonial of this kind forced upon their attention, may legitimately and honestly believe that they are having forced upon them a view of the sacrament, and a view of doctrines connected with the sacrament, which they utterly repudiate. I do not at all say that the view which these rites and ceremonies may symbolise (I put it no further),—as a matter of private opinion is untenable in the Church of England,—I neither affirm nor deny it,—it may be so,—but I say it is not the only doctrine which is tenable in it; and I say that a minister of the Church of England has no right in the public ministrations of the Church of England to force a congregation to join in a ceremony, or by any putting in of any gesture or addition of his own, he has no right to give a tone to the public ministration of the church, which is inconsistent with the universal belief and universal acceptance of the Church in which he ministers. There are two lines of belief, I say not which is right or which is wrong, but as a matter of fact there are two lines of belief with respect to an important ceremony, co-existing in the Church, and which have co-existed for more than 200 years; and I hold strongly that the minister of the Church of England who holds either view has no right so to conduct the public ministrations of the Church of England as to make it impossible for any bona fide member of the Church of England to join in them. I say that if Mr. Mackonochie unintentionally,—for I do not go into the question of intention at all,—if Mr. Mackonochie unintentionally conducts the service of the holy communion so that a large body of the members of the Church of England believe that, if they join in it, they join in an adoration of the elements, or in something that cannot be distinguished from the Roman doctrine of transubstantiation, that is a good reason for saying that Mr. Mackonochie should be prevented from doing those things if they are not set down in the Book of Common Prayer. If they are set down in the Book of Common Prayer, then the man who does not like them must go somewhere else; but if they are not set down in the book, the individual opinion of a minister of the Church of England is not to narrow the Christian liberty which for the wisest purposes the Parliament of England and the Church of England have hitherto maintained on these matters.

Thus far, my Lord, and only thus far (I hope keeping within your Lordship's canon) do I touch upon the question of doctrine. Now, I say it is quite plain from the words of Parliament itself that this view of accommodating to the general assent of the people of England the services in which they were to join was present to the mind of Parliament, and actuated the Parliament of England in what it did. I say it is clear from the words of one of the Acts themselves, the Act of the 5th and 6th of Edward VI., Chap. I. Sections 1 to 5. The first section is this. This is the Act of Parliament, as your Lordship knows, that enforced the second Prayer Book. "Where there hath been a very godly order set forth by the authority of Parliament for common prayer and administration of the sacraments to be used in the mother tongue in the Church of England agreeable to the Word of God and the primitive Church, very comfortable to all good people desiring to live in Christian conversation, and most profitable to the estate of this realm, upon which the mercy, favour, and blessing of Almighty God is in nowise so readily and plentifully poured as by common prayers, due using of the sacraments, and often preaching of the Gospel, with the devotion of the hearers; and yet this notwithstanding a great number of people in divers parts of this realm, following their own sensuality, and living either without due knowledge or due fear of God, do wilfully and damnably before Almighty God abstain and refuse to come to their parish churches and other places where common prayer, administration of the sacraments, and preaching of the Word of God, is used upon Sundays and other days ordained to be holy days." I pause there for a moment. Parliament says the first Prayer Book of Edward was a most godly order, set forth by the authority of Parliament, agreeable to the Word of God and the primitive church, very comfortable to all good people, and most profitable to this realm. That is the opinion that Parliament expresses on the first Prayer Book. Then again in the 5th section: "And because there hath arisen in the use and exercise of the aforesaid common service in the Church heretofore set forth, divers doubts for the fashion and manner of the ministrations of the same, rather by the curiosity of the ministers and mistakers than of any worthy cause, therefore as well for the more plain and manifest explanation thereof, as for the more perfection of the said order of common service in some places where it is necessary to make the same prayers and fashion of service more earnest and fit to stir Christian people to the true honouring of Almighty God," then the second Prayer Book shall have authority. My Lord, that is the recital; that is the statement of Parliament itself as to the motives which guided it in setting forth the second Prayer Book.

Your Lordship perfectly well knows that the great difference in spirit between the first and second Prayer Book, the difference in spirit with respect to the Communion Service, with which we are now particularly concerned, can hardly be overstated. What says Parliament? We do this, not that we think the other wrong,—the other is a very godly order, exceedingly useful to all good Christian people, and most profitable to this realm, but people do not like it, and therefore we are going to alter it. People would not use it, it was found to give offence, and therefore, for the general benefit of the realm, Parliament authorized the second Prayer Book. Now I am not saying whether they were right or wrong, whether that was a good or bad principle at all; I only say that was the principle on which they acted, as appears from their own words. Not that these things were at all in themselves to be objected to, but the people did object to them; and Parliament says, In order that there may be uniformity, and that persons may all be compelled to use the same prayers, and that there may be no diversity, therefore we have altered the book into the shape in which it now is.

Therefore, my Lord, I think I am justified in saying that the principle for which I am now contending has not an indirect, but has the direct and explicit sanction of the Parliament of England itself. And indeed, apart from the particular phraseology of this statute, can anyone doubt who reads the history of the times, that, directly or indirectly, more or less substantially a spirit of compromise in the good sense of that word, and a spirit of reasonably attending to the honest scruples and doubts of the people of England, did actuate, as it ought to have actuated, those who from time to time revised our service books? Can any man doubt who considers it at all as a man of the world,—I mean in the good sense of that phrase,—with a recollection of what the facts were, and what men are,—can any man bond fide doubt that there always has been, and probably always will be, very broad differences in the minds of men; and that as long as there is a National Church that professes to deal with the whole of the nation, there must be what I must call for plainness the Catholic element and the Protestant element in it too; that if the Church is to remain the National Church there must be room in it for both? Can anybody seriously doubt that? Can anybody doubt either that that was directly or indirectly the object of a great deal of the compromise which is to be found, no doubt, from one end to the other of the service books that I have been reading from.

So much upon the point of its being prescribed. There is another mode, and I will take it very shortly. Is it permitted? I hope I have said sufficient, and I can say no more, to show that it is monstrous to say that it is prescribed; but are these things permitted? Surely that is even more difficult to contend, because if that which was not forbidden was permitted (it can only be on that ground) where is that to be stopped? Where is to be the end of the uncertainty that will arise upon the construction of an Act for the uniformity of public worship? If an Act for the uniformity of public worship is to be construed upon the principle that everything that is not forbidden in it may by reasonable people be practised, there is no end to the diversity that may arise, and to the uncertainty that may be introduced into the administration of the law.

I once heard it gravely contended by no inconsiderable man that because all the old penitential discipline of the Church of England,—the penitentials of Theodore, the excerpta of Egbert, have never been repealed, and because Confession is, under some very limited and strict limitations, allowed in the Church of England, and as these things have never been abolished, therefore all these old things are of authority upon members of the Church of England now. It may be all very well to pass time in society in discussing these interesting questions, but to think of arguing such a thing before a judge is quite monstrous; yet, my Lord, what intelligible and substantial line is to be drawn if these things are to be defended upon the legal ground that they are not forbidden, and therefore they are permitted?

I am happy to say that I have done with what I have to say with regard to the elevation and prostration.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Are you about to leave that subject, Mr. Coleridge?

(Mr. Coleridge.) Yes, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Before you do so, let me call your attention to the pleadings "that such elevation was discontinued long prior to the institution of the suit." If you wish to say anything upon that point, do so.

(Mr. Coleridge.) I am very much obliged to your Lordship. I think I should make the same answer in substance, though probably not as well, as my learned friend has already made.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I only wanted to know if you had forgotten it.

(Mr. Coleridge.) As I understood him, I entirely concur with what he said. We do not seek in this case, at all events not upon this matter, for anything more than a declaration at your Lordship's hands that these things are improper. Mr. Mackonochie has only withdrawn from them, as your Lordship knows, in a way which gives us only more reason to desire to have that declaration, if we can get it. Because, says Mr. Mackonochie, the bishop, and the Act of convocation, and the opinion of counsel,—I suppose that of my learned friend,—tells him; he had better not do it, therefore, says he, under protest, I will not do it; but I must be forgiven for saying, the moment I think it right I shall do it again, and I therefore cannot regard that as more than temporary.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I only wanted to know if you had any particular view upon that point, or whether you held exactly the same view as your leader.

(Mr. Coleridge.) I do not desire to add anything to what my learned friend has said on that point.

(The Dean of the Arches.) If you have finished that part of your argument it will be a convenient time to adjourn.

(Adjourned for a quarter of an hour.)

(Mr. Coleridge.) My Lord, I am now coming to the second charge which we make against Mr. Mackonochie, with respect to the two lights on the altar, and I had better read to your Lordship the charge and the answer. We say that on the days pleaded he “used lighted candles on the Communion table during the celebration of the Holy Communion at times when such lighted candles were not wanted for the purpose of giving light, and permitted and sanctioned such use of lighted candles.” Mr. Mackonochie’s answer to that is somewhat peculiar. He says that it is “in part untruly pleaded,” but he says “that on the said three Sundays and Christmas Day in the said fifth article mentioned, the lighted candles were not placed on the Communion table, but on a narrow moveable ledge of wood resting on the said table, and that the said candles were so placed and kept lighted, not during the celebration of the Holy Communion only, as falsely alleged in the 5th article,”—which it is not by the way,—“but also during the whole of the reading of the Communion service, including the Epistle and Gospel, and during the singing after the reading of the Nicene Creed, and during the delivery of the sermon.” Now, I really do not know what he means by that. I suppose that the Holy Communion is, in the ordinary sense of the word, being celebrated during the whole time that the service appointed for the Holy Communion is being read. I do not apprehend you can distinguish between one part of the service and the other. Baptism is being performed while the service is being read. Marriage is being performed while the service is being read. Therefore I do not understand what Mr. Mackonochie means by saying, that when we state the candles were lighted during the celebration of the Holy Communion, we state it untruly, because they were lighted during the whole the service. I suppose that is what he intended to say; and, however that may be, let him have the benefit of it. But let me draw your Lordship’s notice to the curious, astute, and special pleading sort of distinction he draws with respect to their being placed on the communion table. He says they “were not placed on the communion table, but on a narrow moveable ledge of wood resting on the table.” I do not know that that makes any difference; but I cannot help observing upon the singular distinction. If you put a candlestick on a plateau on your dining table, is it less upon your dining table? If you put a book on a reading stand on your table, is the book less on the table? It appears to me to be special pleading, and for no practical purpose. The candles were clearly on the communion table, and were put there for the purpose of doing honour to what was going on; and it is not denied that they were not needed for the purpose of giving light. The charge, I apprehend, is clearly admitted, because I believe we only meant to state exactly what he says is the truth and what we meant to be the truth, that the candles were lighted during the communion service, and that it is plain they were standing on the table. Now, what I say to that is, that these candles are absolutely unauthorized. They are certainly not authorized by the words of the Prayer Book as it stands. They are certainly not authorized by the words of the first Prayer Book. They are certainly not authorized, as far as my reading and research has enabled me to judge, by any of the old liturgies, because, as far as I know, the old liturgies are, generally speaking, silent. Whenever they are spoken of, and so far as the practice enables us to judge of them, a great many more than two are spoken of; and your Lordship knows that in the service of the Tenebrae, and many of the other services we are familiar with in the Romish books, a great many more than two candles are necessary for such services in such books. Everybody who has been in a Roman Catholic Church knows there are six or eight or more candles always burning, and at all events more than two. And so far as the words are concerned, and any direct authority goes, if it is to depend upon the words of any service book that I know of, the argument entirely fails, because they will not be found to be authorized, as far as my experience enables me to go, by the words of any service book whatever. The only service books that authorized any, authorized more. But, my Lord, they are said to be authorized by the Injunctions of 1547. In dealing with this question, I considered my learned friend had exhausted the matter of these Injunctions; and independently of that I preferred as far as I could to keep myself strictly to the matter of the service books, and the Acts of Parliament. I have not troubled your Lordship with any observation upon a single Injunction, and I only trouble you with observations upon this particular Injunction because, as I understand from something that passed elsewhere, it is upon this Injunction mainly that this practice is supposed to stand. Therefore it becomes material to look at this single Injunction, and it is to be found in the 1st volume of Cardwell’s Documentary Annals, page 7.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I should have been very glad, if it had been convenient to you at any period of your argument, to have heard your opinion upon the legal effect of any of these Injunctions.

(Mr. Coleridge.) In the course of what I am going to say on this particular Injunction I will say what I have to say, as applying to all the rest: ex uno disce omnes. If we see what the authority of this is, we shall see what the authority of all the rest is. These are “Injunctions given by the Most Excellent Prince Edward the VI., by the grace of God, King of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the Faith, and in earth, under Christ, of the Church of England and of Ireland the supreme head. To all and singular his loving subjects, as well of the clergy as of the laity.”—“Item, That such images as they know in any of their cures to be or have been so abused with pilgrimage or offerings of anything made thereunto, or shall be hereafter censured unto, they (and none other private persons) shall, for the avoiding of that most detestable offence of idolatry, forthwith take down, or cause to be taken down, and destroy the same, and shall suffer from henceforth no torches, nor candles, tapers, or images of wax to be set afore any image or picture, but only two lights upon the high altar before the Sacrament, which, for the signification that Christ is the very true light of the world, they shall suffer to remain, still admonishing their parishioners that images serve for no other purpose but to be a remembrance whereby men may be admonished of the holy lives and conversation of them that the said images do represent, which images, if they do abuse for any other intent,

"they commit idolatry in the same, to the great danger of their souls." Now, my Lord, what are these two lights? They are "two lights upon the high altar before the Sacrament, which, for the signification that Christ is the very true light of the world, they shall suffer to remain still?"

I will not attempt to repeat (because I should only weary you by doing so) the argument my learned friend has addressed to you upon that Injunction. The statute of the Six Articles was at that time in force, and there is no doubt that the view of the sacrament which included the practice of reserving the sacrament upon the high altar was at that time in full operation. That, I think, my friend made out to demonstration; and I do not propose to trouble your Lordship further with it. But, my Lord, as a supplement to the argument of my learned friend, I venture to submit this, upon the very words of the Injunction itself; that the word "sacrament" expresses it without any further historical argument at all. The historical argument appears to be in this case irrefragable; but, to my mind, a great deal better than the historical argument stands the language itself. It appears that these Injunctions were issued by the Council of the King, which was a body of 28 persons, 16 left as a council and guardians of his son by the will of King Henry VIII., and 12 added to it, apparently by Parliament, I think. There were 28 in all, and amongst those in the Council were Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury, Tunstall, Bishop of Durham, and Wootton, Dean of Canterbury. Those distinguished persons understood the meaning of language; they did not use language loosely or idly; and in their mouths "sacrament" meant "consecrated element;" it meant that which had become the sacrament of the body of Christ; and, therefore, when the Injunction speaks of two candles on the high altar before the sacrament, it means, ex vi terminorum, the consecrated host reserved upon the high altar; and in the language of Cranmer, Tunstall, and Wootton, could mean nothing else. How does the Injunction, whatever the force of it may be, to keep two lights upon the high altar before the consecrated host, justify the lighting of two candles upon the altar which has ceased to be a high altar, and not before the consecrated host? Therefore, I say the words of the Injunctions, whatever may be the power of the Injunctions themselves, do not justify the usage which the language is brought forward to support.

Further, my friend has proved, I think to demonstration, that very shortly after this there was a general destruction of candlesticks; there has certainly never since been any restoration of them by law. There has certainly never since been any authority that I am aware of to compel the restoration of candlesticks as part of the furniture of the Church. If this Injunction was supposed to retain by force of law two candlesticks upon the high altar to be lighted, as part of the law of the land, just as much as a basin for the alms, or a surplice for the clergyman, or bread and wine for the administration of the Holy Communion to be provided at the charges of the parish, how upon earth does it happen that from 1547 to the present hour there never has been the slightest attempt on the part of any clergyman whatever to compel any parish, however willing, to put candlesticks upon the altar at their expense as part of the furniture of the Church?

(Mr. Coleridge.) A credence table has been sanctioned as accessory to and subsidiary to the use of the elements, and the ground, as I have always understood,—your Lordship knows it better than I do,—the legal ground upon which, as I have understood, the Privy Council decided that question was this: the rubric, which is an Act of Parliament, prescribes that at a certain time, and not before a certain time, the bread and wine shall be placed upon the altar or communion table. It does not describe where they are to be before, but they must be somewhere before, and it is only decent that there should be a table or some shelf or something or other for them to be upon. I think the Privy Council rather carefully avoided the expression "credence table," they say it is a shelf.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think the expression is used by them.

(Mr. Coleridge.) I mean in legalizing it they avoided the expression "credence table"; they say it is to be a shelf or side table.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The term does not signify. It is simply a side table.

(Mr. Coleridge.) In the report of the judgment I find this: "Now what is a credence table? It is simply a small shelf on which the bread and wine are placed before the consecration, having no connexion with any superstitious usage of the Church of Rome. Their removal has been ordered on the ground that they are adjuncts to an altar; their Lordships cannot but think that they are more properly to be regarded as adjuncts to a Communion Table."

(The Dean of the Arches.) All I mean is this: there has been no instance perhaps of churchwardens having been compelled to furnish a table of that kind; it is a question of trying the validity of the argument that because churchwardens have not been compelled, or cannot be compelled to make or provide a certain thing, therefore the restoration of it would be illegal. I put it for your consideration, and for my own advantage, may there not be ornaments in churches lawful, and yet which the parishioners are not bound to supply?

(Mr. Coleridge.) No doubt, my Lord, as a proposition of law I should say that might be so. But your Lordship will observe that if this injunction is good for anything, it is good for this, that these candlesticks shall be preserved as part of the regular furniture and public worship of the church, for a particular object, namely, to set before the people a most important and religious truth, and your Lordship knows that in hundreds of churches without credence tables there is some niche or shelf, or something or other for the purpose of putting the bread and wine upon. It was not a very seemly thing, but some people used to put it under the table, and occasionally got over the difficulty by putting it on the table at first, and covering it with a cloth, and letting it be there during the whole of the service. Various ways were adopted for the purpose of getting over the difficulty. The question then was whether the particular mode in which this credence table had been put up was illegal, and whether it ought to be removed. Where there are a great many ways of doing a subsidiary office it may well be that one particular mode could not be enforced upon a parish by mandamus or by writ; and as my learned friend suggests, it might be a matter for the discretion of the bishop. But your Lordship sees that if this injunction is good for anything it is a universal injunction, that throughout the realm, for the purposes of the subjects of the realm having a solemn religious truth preached to their eyes, as well as their understandings, two candlesticks should remain upon every high altar. It is certainly an astonishing thing, if that is considered to have the force of law, that there has been no single instance that can be adduced in which a parish has ever been even asked to provide candlesticks for the purpose of that which by hypothesis is a necessary portion of divine service, as necessary as the altar itself, as necessary as the blessed elements themselves, as necessary as any portion of the ornaments or furniture which goes to the administration of the Holy Communion. I do not put it as conclusive; I only say it is a difficulty in the way of anybody who attempts to maintain that it has the force of law. Then I say there has been no user; no historical evidence can be laid before your Lordship, I will venture to say, that can come within the definition of a general user, so as to show that there has been such an interpretation of the statute as might possibly result from it. But really, and in truth, the whole of the service and the whole of the order of administration in the Church, and the character of the service, was changed after 1547, and the altar being gone, and the reservation of the sacrament being gone, and the view of the sacrament which was enforced by the Six Articles being gone, all that which formed part of the same view, and which was intelligible and indeed defensible only as forming part of that view, disappeared of course when that view itself was abolished by Act of Parliament; namely, when the Six Articles ceased to be law, when the altar ceased to be a high altar, when the sacrament ceased to be reserved. Whatever, therefore, may have been the force of this Injunction prior to such a change in the law, the accessory fell with that which it was accessory to; and the light being only a portion of the worship and outward observance due to the altar and the sacrament upon the altar, when the altar went and the sacrament went, the light went too.

And, my Lord, that is really the common sense and broad answer to any argument which may be founded upon these Injunctions.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not want to interrupt you, but you may like to deal with it. The Judge of the Consistory Court, Dr. Lushington, allowed the legality of candlesticks.

(Mr. Coleridge.) Yes, my Lord, as a matter of ornament no doubt. I apprehend nobody can dispute for a moment that you have a right to light candles in the church for the purpose of giving light, and as the altar is a very seemly and proper place for the purpose of having light upon it, when you want to get light, as it would be most unseemly to stick candles on the altar without something to stick them into, it is no doubt perfectly proper that there should be candlesticks if people choose to give them, to stand on the altar, to be part of the church furniture, but it makes the whole difference quo intuitu those things are done. It is one thing to say you have a right to have candles for giving light, and it is another thing to say you have a right to have candles not to give light, but to stand before the blessed sacrament as part of religious worship to teach the people, in the language of the Injunction, that Christ is the true light of the world. It does not at all follow that because the former proposition is true the latter proposition is true, and all that has been decided by Dr. Lushington is that the former is true.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Certainly.

(Mr. Coleridge.) I apprehend they are quite distinguishable propositions, and I think the answer to the second proposition is a complete answer; they were accessories to the sacrament when it was very differently regarded; they were parts of an altar when the altar was very differently regarded; and when the altar and sacrifice ceased the light ceased also. What I was going to say is that these Injunctions, as far as I am able to understand them, stand simply upon the Act of Parliament which gave authority to the Injunctions of Henry VIII., and afterwards continued that authority to the son of Henry VIII., and made his Injunctions issued in a particular way, and the Injunctions of the Council, to have the same authority which the king's proclamation had.

(Mr. Coleridge.) The same force of law as a king's proclamation. Now, could a king's proclamation at any time have enforced, with the force of law, such observances as these? I apprehend clearly, not; and if they could not, then the Injunction which had no more force than the king's proclamation, could not. —It is difficult to say, in point of fact, what was the force of an intimation of the will of the Sovereign in those times.

(Mr. Coleridge.) But that is a very different thing from having force of law. Whether, in point of fact, an intimation of Henry VIII., however made, might have had, if not the force of law, the effect of law is another matter; but I say, looking at the matter as a lawyer, and having to construe it in this year of our Lord 1868, I apprehend that the king's proclamation could not alter or add to, or in any way affect, the provisions of an Act of Parliament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The stone altars appear to have been removed by virtue of an injunction, independently of any Act of Parliament.

(Mr. Coleridge.) No doubt, my Lord, a great many things were done—people were put in the Tower in those days.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Ay, but then that has been held to be legal by the Privy Council—the removal of the stone altars.

(Mr. Coleridge.) Does it go further than this—your Lordship knows more about these things than I do—that Sir Herbert Jenner Fust refused to grant a faculty for a stone altar?

(The Dean of the Arches.) It goes further than that. Perhaps it may not be worth your attention; but if it should be necessary for the Court hereafter to consider whether any of those injunctions at all are legal, I should be glad of the assistance of counsel in arguing that question. It may be necessary to distinguish this injunction that you are quoting from the other injunctions, unless it is assumed that all are illegal. You are perfectly aware that the ecclesiastical injunctions issued by the sovereigns were acted upon, whether they were legal or not. The injunctions and advertisements of Elizabeth correspond with the injunctions of other times.

(Mr. Coleridge.) No doubt, my Lord, all I should submit to your Lordship as a clear proposition is, that at no time could a proclamation of the king interfere with the effect of an Act of Parliament. If I am correct in saying, as I do say, that by the effect of the Acts of Uniformity and the service books issued in compliance with them, the altar and the reserved sacrament were abolished, I say that the lights were abolished, because they are not mentioned. But if the whole subject matter with which the Injunction dealt is afterwards changed by Act of Parliament, although the Act of Parliament does not mention the Injunction, yet as being inconsistent with it, it must override it, and the Injunction would have no force at all against it. Therefore my answer is twofold; first of all, looking at the words of the Injunction, the words of the Injunction do not justify the practice which they are supposed to support; and secondly, I say, even if they did, they are contradicted by an Act of Parliament, and cannot support therefore that which an Act of Parliament has destroyed.

My friend has drawn my attention, and I wish to draw your Lordship's attention to what Dr. Lushington says with regard to candles upon candlesticks. I held that all lighted candles on the Communion table are, from the premises I have already stated, contrary to law, except when they are lighted for the purpose of giving necessary light, and I think that this exception must necessarily be engrafted upon the positive prohibition to set lights on the Lord's board at any time; but the exception must be confined to the necessity, and the use of lighted candles on the Communion table limited to that necessity, when it arises from the deficiency of the requisite light from natural causes, and it may be, the peculiar structure of the edifice. Secondly, as to the candlesticks and candles unlighted on or near the Communion table, I acknowledge I have got much more doubt; I have none indeed that the use of costly massive candlesticks, with enormous candles, connected originally with Popish associations, but on such merely my own opinion I do not feel at liberty to act. If they are to be considered as ornaments merely, I should hold their use to be not reconcilable with law. But I cannot deny that it is lawful to have such articles on the Communion table, or near it, for necessary purposes, and, therefore, I cannot say, though I believe that such necessity arises very seldom indeed, that it is (The Dean of the Arches.) He goes on to specify the King's chapels and college chapels where they have been used for time immemorial, and said he should have great difficulty in making his decision without cutting at these at the same time.

(Mr. Coleridge.) Those are more in the nature of private chapels.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No doubt.

(Mr. Coleridge.) Therefore I do not wish to be driven beyond what is necessary to my argument. If, unfortunately, it should ever be my lot to argue about candlesticks, then I should have to address myself to that question and say what I have to say about candlesticks. For the present I am on the subject of lighted candles, and candles not for the purpose of giving light as admitted, but for the purpose of doing honour to the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. It is these lighted candles so lighted and for such a purpose that I say are first of all contrary to the Act of Parliament, because they are nowhere mentioned, and, secondly, they are not justified by the Injunction, because the words of the Injunction do not justify them if they are looked at properly; and even if they did, the Injunction has no force of law at the present time.

The supposed practice of Queen Elizabeth has been mentioned. I have no wish either here or elsewhere to indulge in any scandal against Queen Elizabeth or against anything that Queen Elizabeth did any more than the man in the Critic; at the same time I cannot help observing that what Queen Elizabeth did in her private chapel cannot have anything to say to the legality of a usage of this kind in a common parochial church to which all persons of whatever opinions within a certain ambit have an equal right to go, and are therefore equally interested in having the strict letter of the law adhered to with regard to any practices carried on there. As far as Queen Elizabeth's chapel is concerned, I do not know any reason why, if she thought it right, she should not put up a crucifix or a dozen crucifixes, or a dozen candles; people might observe upon it and might object to it, but I do not know of any form of law to put it down in this country, and Queen Elizabeth, if she had chosen, probably would have done it without the smallest consideration of whether it gave offence or not. But how can that be brought to bear upon a question of this sort, where it is not what a particular person who has a right to do what she pleases in her own private room may do,—what, I ask, has that to do with the question before your Lordship? It may show, no doubt, that Queen Elizabeth was a person who liked a good deal of these usages, and a person who at a period of her reign was not so well inclined towards Protestant usages as she became afterwards under the presence of political and other causes. But it cannot be drawn beyond its fair and legitimate bearing any more than the use of this, that, or the other particular act of worship by some great Bishop it may be, who may have liked this or that form and may have used it in his own private chapel and his own private devotions; an authority, no doubt, in a certain sense, to persons who respect him, and a very good reason why people who agree with him should practise the same devotion, and an excellent good reason why there should be private liberty for them to do so, but having nothing to do with the question now before your Lordship.

I have said all that I propose to say about the question of lights; and now I come to the charge of using incense. I will cite again the charge and the answer with respect to that matter: We say that he has used incense for censuring persons and things in and during the celebration of the Holy Communion, and permitted and sanctioned such using of incense. His answer to that is, that he did on those days that are here mentioned use incense for censuring persons and things in and during the celebration of the Holy Communion. But he alleges that since the 30th day of December 1866, the said A. H. Mackonochie, as was well known to the promoter of this suit prior to the institution thereof, desisted from doing so, and has ever since discontinued the ceremony, on being apprized by the opinion of counsel that such usage was of doubtful legality, and that he has never since re-introduced the ceremony, as appears in the published address of A. H. Mackonochie to his parishioners dated January 7th, 1867, and exhibited and appended to the articles brought in in this cause. That the said A. H. Mackonochie has in his church on Sunday the 13th January 1867 caused and allowed incense to be burnt during the reading of the Prayer of Consecration and afterwards, until the time for the administration of the Communion, and permitted and sanctioned such use of incense, but denies that he used it unlawfully, or that such use is unlawful. And he denies that such use of incense as in the 7th and 8th articles alleged are an unlawful addition to, and variation from the form and order prescribed and appointed by the said statute and Book of Common Prayer, and administration of the Sacraments, and other rites and ceremonies of the Church, and are contrary to the statutes and to the 13th, 36th, and 38th canons, as in the 9th article alleged. If your Lordship looks at this statement, you will see he says that he has ceased to cense the Gospel and those different things, but that the thuribles (I believe that is the correct word) have been brought in at a particular time, and that incense has been put in them, and that that will continue to be done. We say that what Mr. Mackonochie did up to a certain time which is charged in the articles is admitted by that answer to have been done; and the case is undefended upon that. With regard to that particular use of incense, I suppose my friend cannot deny that judgment must go against his client for that, and that he must be admonished in due form of law to abstain for the future from repeating that offence against the Ecclesiastical law. But he does it in the same way as in some of the former cases. He says that he has doubts—well, we wish that those doubts should be cleared up and dissipated from his mind, and that if he has any doubts they should be removed by the judgment of your Lordship. But further, we say that if what he proposes to do, indeed what he admits that he does, is unauthorized, it is matter which calls for the interference of this Court.

I can only repeat what I said just now that with regard to the examples of Laud and of Andrewes which have been brought forward to show that those great and distinguished men occasionally used incense, or approved of the use of incense, no doubt to those to whom Laud and Andrewes are authorities, and I do not shrink from saying that Laud as well as Andrewes to me is an authority upon many matters, I cannot see that that has any bearing or authority upon the question we are now discussing. Laud and Andrewes, even if they had ever decided the question in any way which could be equal to a judicial decision that these things were as a matter of law tolerable in all the churches of their dioceses, still I say, would be subject to the revision of this Court. But what does it all come to? Here is a mode of administering the Holy Communion which is put forward by Mr. Mackonochie as part of the legitimate ceremonial of the Church of England, and it is justified, as far as I can make out, or intended to be justified, on the ground that these men are found, doubtfully, and upon one or two occasions, either to have consecrated a censer, or to have used a censer, or to have intimated some opinion in favour of the use of censers. And I think I can show your Lordship in a moment from one authority which escaped my friend, if it did escape him—that there was an excellent reason why a private individual might have had his censer pot, or a bishop might have had his censer pot, without having anything whatever to do with putting two thuribles down in front of the altar, and letting them send up fumes of incense during the celebration of the Holy Communion.

(The Dean of the Arches.) As I understand, they are placed there at a particular time and removed at a particular time.

(Mr. Coleridge.) Placed there at a particular time and removed at a particular time, as part of the regular celebration of the Holy Communion.

Now, my Lord, in the first place, I say there is no direction,—though certain things are distinctly ordered to be provided in the rubric,—for the provision of censers. There is no direction at all that what is now put forward as a part of the ordinary and recognized ceremonial of the Church of England, in the administration of the highest act of christian worship, is to be provided,—not a word. There is no direction to be found in any service book of the Church of England for the use of censers. In the Roman Missal where censers form part of the recognized ceremonial, there is the most distinct provision for their use. There is rubric after rubric, pointing out at what period they are to be brought in, when the incense is to be put in them, who is to put it, what persons and things are to be censed with it, how many times the incense pot is to be thrown up, and all the rest of it, with the most particular, minute, and definite directions. Of course a Roman priest celebrating his mass, according to the order of his Church, not only legitimately uses his censer, but he knows exactly what to do with it, and he has the most definite distinct directions, just as the particular directions in the Marriage and other services of the Church of England point out to an English priest what he is to do in performing the ceremonies of our Church. But the English Prayer book is entirely without such directions with regard to the use of incense.

I have heard it suggested that they are authorized by the rubric at the beginning of our Prayer Book. It is said that 'the ornaments of the Church and of the ministers thereof at all times of their ministration shall remain and be in use as were in this Church of England in the 2nd year of King Edward the Sixth,' and it is argued, the rubric says, that all ornaments shall remain which were in use by authority of Parliament at that time; censers were in use by authority of Parliament at that time; censers must be retained. I do not know whether my friend will put it in that way, but I have heard it so put, and therefore I must deal with it. Now, your Lordship knows that, after some argument it has been held (and it seems to me to be only common sense) that "by authority of Parliament" means what it expresses—by the enactment of Parliament—it does not mean what may have been in existence and not interfered with by Parliament, but it means what is to be found enacted in an Act which is referred to. And the Privy Council go on to say the Act which is referred to is the Act authorizing the First Prayer Book of Edward VI. which, although it came out after Parliament had been adjourned or prorogued, yet, inasmuch as Parliament authorized it, is to be taken like our own Prayer Book now attached to the Act of Uniformity to have the force of law because it is authorized by the statute of Edward. That is what the Privy Council decided. We look therefore to the First Prayer Book of Edward, to see whether, within the canon laid down by the Privy Council for the construction of this expression, censers were in use by the authority of Parliament, and we find they were not. We find there is no mention from one end of the service book to the other of censers. That, therefore, will not do. Well, is there any other ground which will do? My friend has shown, by an elaborate examination of authorities, that there is no ground for saying, that at any time censers were permitted or tolerated. On the other hand, he has read authority after authority to show that the great men of the Church of England always, whenever the question came up, decided against censers; and even with regard to one of them who was accused of being a Papist because he used some incense to perfume his church when it was extremely dirty, he thought it necessary to defend himself from that charge.

There is one curious piece of information which I do not suppose escaped my friend, but, possibly, he thought it unnecessary to mention it, and which I will afford to your Lordship as bearing on this point. George Herbert wrote a book about the Church, and the ornaments of the Church, and so forth. He wrote his book about 1638, and it was first published by Izaak Walton, in 1652. In that book there is a chapter "The Parson's Church," and we see what George Herbert says about incense in the "Parson's Church," we will see whether that does not account for any doubtful expressions about the use of incense. He says, "The Country Parson hath a special care of his church that all things there be decent and befitting His name by which it is called. Therefore, first, he takes order that all things be in good repair; as walls plastered, windows glazed, floor paved, seats whole, firm, and uniform, especially that the pulpit and desk, and Communion table and font be as they ought for those great duties that are performed in them. Secondly, that the church be swept and kept clean without dust or cobwebs, and, at great festivals, strewed and stuck with boughs, and perfumed with incense. Thirdly, that there be fit and proper texts of Scripture everywhere painted, and that all the painting be grave and reverend, not with light colours or foolish antics. Fourthly, that all the books appointed by authority be there, and those not torn or fouled, but whole and clean, and well bound; and that there be a fitting and sightly Communion cloth of fine linen, with a handsome and seemly carpet of good and costly stuff, or cloth; and all kept sweet and clean in a strong and decent chest, with a chalice and cover, and a stoop or flagon, and a basin for alms and offerings; besides which he hath a poor man's box conveniently seated to receive the charity of well-minded people, and to lay up treasure for the sick and needy. And all this he doth, not as out of necessity or as putting a holiness in the things, but as desiring to keep the middle way between superstition and slovenliness, and as following the Apostle's two great and admirable rules in things of this nature; the first whereof is: 'Let all things be done decently and in order;' the second: 'Let all things be done to edification,' 1 Cor. xiv. For these two rules comprise and include the double object of our duty, God and our neighbour. The first being for the honour of God; the second for the benefit of our neighbour. So that they excellently score out the way and fully and exactly contain even in external and indifferent things what course is to be taken; and put them to great shame who deny the Scripture to be perfect."

Your Lordship sees the church is to be perfumed with incense on great festival days; but when he is to provide things decent to be done decently and in order, not a word is said about a censer; there are stoups, and flagons, and a chalice, and a cover, a basin for alms and offerings, a small carpet, and so on, but not a word about a censer.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There are various instances in churchwardens' accounts in which incense was used for fumigating purposes; it was used for such purposes extensively, particularly after the Plague.

(Mr. Coleridge.) No doubt, my Lord; and I have no doubt George Herbert on high days and holy days perfumed his church, and made it sweet. He may or may not have done so. Your Lordship says you do not know; neither do I. But supposing it to be so, I say it is plain that his account of the matter gives a key to a great deal that you may find about incense, namely, that it was a seemly thing used by a great number of persons ; it made a pleasant smell. There was no objection to the House of God smelling with a pleasant smell, and people did it without the slightest mystical intention, and without any view whatever to using it as a ceremonial.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It was used for sweetening and purifying the church according to that account.

(Mr. Coleridge.) Just so ; and I draw your Lordship's attention to this statement of it in George Herbert's book because it seems to me to throw light on a great deal that is said about it. He seems to treat it as a matter that a decent man would do on high days and holy days ; and in speaking as he does speak of the decency and reverence with which Holy Communion should be celebrated, he being, as your Lordship knows, a man of high sacramental views, as his poems show, there is not one single word about incense for the Holy Communion in the very passage in his book where, if any such practice existed, or had been supposed to be a seemly or proper practice, you would certainly have found it.

Now, before I go to the last point, perhaps it may be convenient to say just a single word upon a question which your Lordship put to my friend, and which, unless I have unfortunately missed it, I do not perceive that he dealt with.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Allow me to say I hope that counsel will understand, that in putting these questions I express no opinion of any sort or kind, it is only for the purpose of following the argument.

(Mr. Coleridge.) If I may say so, my Lord, it is a very pertinent question, and one which must be dealt with sooner or later. It is in that part of my friend's address where he was dealing with this part of the rubric of the Book of Common Prayer, and what draws it to my mind is that I have just been reading that rubric. I allude to the fact that that rubric on ornaments does not appear in the Irish Prayer Book. It would be great presumption for me to interfere in the matter at all, or to express any opinion how that omission arose.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is merely a fact ; how it happened we none of us know.

(Mr. Coleridge.) Precisely ; and that led your Lordship to this pertinent observation, if I may say so, how would it have been if the matter had been left out of the English Prayer Book as well ?

Now I respectfully contend, after some consideration, that it would have been exactly as it is now, and would have made no difference whatever, because what the rubric says is this, that what is now legal shall remain so. There has been no order as to any of these matters since the first Prayer Book of Edward. Vestments and ornaments, and all those things have never been mentioned since ; various practices may have grown up. What the framers mean to say is this, If we say nothing the law remains as it was before ; but the law has in many cases been violated, and there may be differences and doubts about it, we will say once for all, we will consider the law to have been established then.

(Mr. Coleridge.) Yes ; and I say it is merely a declaration on their part, a declaratory enactment, so to speak, of what would have been the law, even if that declaratory enactment had not existed. I think your Lordship will find that is the case. I do not mean to say it does not clear the matter, because it does.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Your argument is, that the absence or presence of this rubric as to ornaments, makes no difference ?

(Mr. Coleridge.) Yes ; that is so, my Lord, that it does no more than ascertain distinctly what, even if it had not spoken, would have been the law to be ascertained less distinctly, and with more difficulty.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then it declares the common law ?

(Mr. Coleridge.) It does, my Lord. I apprehend it introduces nothing new.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is your view of it.

(Mr. Coleridge.) Yes, my Lord ; I venture to say this, because it is in answer to a question which your Lordship put ; but of course it is only my own opinion.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It was a matter which suggested itself to my mind in the course of the argument. I forget now how. Dr. Stephens suggested that this rubric was not to be found in the Irish Prayer Book, and you will remember that we had the question discussed before the Ritual Commission, and then it occurred to me to put that proposition to Dr. Stephens.

(Dr. Stephens.) Your Lordship will remember that I respectfully declined to express any opinion on the subject of the Church in Ireland.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, and you were perfectly justified. I once heard an eminent Lord Chancellor say : " It is for us to put the question and for the bar to answer it if they think proper."

(Mr. Coleridge.) A learned judge now on the bench used to say, " He had not been instructed to argue that point," when he did not quite see his way. However, my Lord, I apprehend you will find what I have stated really to be the legal effect of this rubric. But do not let me forget to remind your Lordship that we are not now upon the question of the use of ornaments but of ceremonies, which is a very different thing.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, that is Dr. Stephens' argument throughout, that this is not a matter of ornament but a matter of an additional rite or ceremony.

(Mr. Coleridge.) Precisely. Now I come to the last question—the question of the mixed chalice.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I believe it is admitted that wine is mixed with the water ; there is no dispute about it.

(Mr. Coleridge.) I believe not. Upon that subject the first thing that occurs to one to observe is that it could hardly have failed to have been part of the requirements for Holy Communion if it had been intended to be permitted or authorized by the Church of England ; I mean that there would have been the existence of a rubric authorizing or requiring cruets or something or other, I care not what. There is a decent basin for alms, a stoup or flagon for wine, and a chalice and paten for the sacred elements. The various requirements for the administration of the Holy Communion are set out in great detail in the rubric, and are to be provided by the parish.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is that so in the First Prayer Book of Edward VI., in which you know wine is ordered to be mixed with water ; is there any provision there for a cruet ?

(Mr. Coleridge.) I am not aware of it. I am only saying, with regard to the present Prayer Book. Of course where it is plain from any usage or words of the service book that water is to be used, as water must needs be kept in something, the existence of something to keep it in would be by necessary intendment part of the lawful and necessary ornaments of the Church.

(Mr. Coleridge.) Like the credence table ; something to hold water must needs have been provided. Of course a book which distinctly ordered the use of water, it would as a matter of necessity imply that something to keep the water in must be in existence—that would be a matter of necessary intendment. But it would equally follow, I apprehend, that where in a subsequent book the various materials and the various instruments or ornaments, or whatever you please to call them, for the administration of the rite, are set out in great detail, and are to be provided by the parish, and everything but this is set out,—I say it is the strongest possible legislative declaration on the part of those who with the earlier service-books before them, which justified the employment of water, omitted anything which would show that water was to be employed; it was the strongest possible declaration on their part that it was not to be used.

On what ground then is it put? Can it be said that this is tolerated in the Church of England, in the face of the rubric at the end of the present Communion Service, where everything except water is provided for. What argument of common sense is to be addressed to your Lordship's mind, as a man of common sense, to explain how it came about that if water, as a habitual and usual ingredient in the administration of the Holy Communion, was intended to be allowed,—how in the name of common sense came it that when they were dealing with everything else necessary they left out that? Well, upon this subject my friend Mr. Stephens has collected a mass of authorities which I have gone through, and to which I feel myself unable to add. The only thing I will mention to your Lordship is that the whole of the English learning upon the subject is to be found in Maskell's book at page 128 and some following pages of his preface to the Liturgies of the Church of England.

(Dr. Stephens.) I read it to his Lordship.

(Mr. Coleridge.) You read some part, but not the whole, I think.

Now, my Lord, ~~some deal has been said, and a~~ good deal will be said hereafter, I daresay, about the usage of the Primitive Church and about exactly imitating the solemn occasion upon which the Holy Communion was first instituted; and I observe that Basnage in his history of the Jews seems to assume that at the passover water was used, and indeed there seems to have been warm water used. The Bible Dictionary says the same thing; and, my Lord, there might be something to be said if we were set free from the direct authority of these Acts of Parliament, and these service books, upon a great many questions which the Church of England has decided. Your Lordship will find, if it is at all a matter which interests you, you will find it discussed extremely well on both sides by Mr. Maskell. He gives the authorities which there are for saying that it probably was mixed in early times, and what authorities there are for saying that it is extremely doubtful whether it was mixed and so forth; all this will be found collected with great care in an extremely brief compass and very ably by Mr. Maskell. But that matter is not open to us. The Church of England has spoken upon it. It is like many questions which your Lordship had to argue once in a case when I had the honour to be your junior in this court. There are many things which are capable of discussion, no doubt, and about which you may raise argument, but they are not open to the Church of England. The Church of England, for good or evil, has settled them; she has left certain questions definitely open, she has closed as distinctly certain other questions, and I submit she has distinctly closed this question of the mixed chalice. There is a curious instance which possibly may be in your Lordship's recollection of the truth of what I am contending in the history of a person whom neither here or elsewhere will I permit myself to name except in terms of gratitude and reverence, I mean Dr. Newman. When he was a priest of the Church of England he was the vicar of St. Mary's, Oxford, and one of the charges against him was that he had made use of the mixed chalice. In his letter to the Bishop of Oxford, Bishop Bagot of that day, there is a very famous passage in which he deals with the question. Now Dr. Newman was a person who was not in the habit, certainly not in his former Church, or I may say in his present Church, of disguising what his opinions were, of shrinking from the proclamation of anything if he thought it right, however unpopular it might be; and if he had thought that he could have defended the use of the mixed chalice upon any ground which would have been ecclesiastically tenable, there is no question that Dr.

Newman would have been the man to defend it. This is what he says,—

(The Dean of the Arches.) Are you reading from his "Apologia"?

(Mr. Coleridge.) No; it is from his letter to the Bishop of Oxford; it was published when I was at Oxford, and I have it bound up among a number of pamphlets relating to Tract XC. He says: "And here, with your Lordship's leave, I will make allusion to one mistake concerning me which, I believe, has reached your Lordship's ears, and which I only care to explain to my bishop. The explanation, I trust, will be an additional proof of my adherence to the principle of acquiescing in the state of things in which I find myself. It has been said, I believe, that in the Communion service I am in the practice of mixing water with the wine, and that, of course, on a religious or ecclesiastical ground. This is not the case. We are in the custom at St. Mary's of celebrating the Holy Communion every Sunday, and most weeks early in the morning. When I began the early celebration, communicants represented to me that the wine was so strong as to distress them at that early hour. Accordingly I mixed it with water in the bottle. However, it became corrupt. On this, I mixed it at the time. I speak honestly when I say that this has been my only motive. I have not mixed it when the service has been in the middle of the day."

That is the whole of the passage, and it is strong argument to show that a great and learned man did not venture to put it upon any ground which would have been tenable in the Church of England, because he put it upon what his people told him, true or untrue, of the effect of mixed wine upon them at an early period of the morning. Archbishop Whately permitted himself to make use of expressions with reference to that passage which I do not think he had a right to make, but whether they were right or whether they were wrong Dr. Newman does not need any defence from me, and I merely put it as a statement of a man who certainly would have based his defence upon other grounds if he could. There is another observation which is suggested by Mr. Maskell. It is his argument, not mine; he decides upon the whole, as your Lordship knows, against the practice; he says he does not think it can be maintained consistently with the rubric, and he puts it upon this exceedingly good ground, as it seems to me; says he, "The practice is defended upon mystical grounds, that is to say, it is supposed to symbolise certain other things, either the two Sacraments or the issue of the blood and water from the side of our Lord on the cross, or because our Lord mixed it at the Last Supper." It is done for a religious reason.

(Mr. Coleridge.) There are a great variety of reasons, but all of them are religious reasons, and suggest some fact, to celebrate or to commemorate which it is done. Now, says Dr. Maskell: "The true essence of it therefore is that it should be done as a ceremony, that it should be done openly that the people's attention should be drawn to the fact, and that the fact which it symbolises or represents should, by means of the outward ceremony, be suggested to the minds of the people to whom it is represented by the person who uses it;" and, says he, "If you cannot do it openly (and nobody says you can do it), if you are obliged to mix it before you come in, or mix it at the time without any ceremony, the whole object of the mixing ceases, because it is not for the purpose of making the wine weaker, but for a mental and religious reason, and if you cannot draw the attention to those reasons, the whole object of the ceremony, be it right or wrong, ceases." Now, nobody says that can be done. In the Roman ordinal we have distinct orders given for it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You see in the First Prayer Book of Edward VI. "And putting the wine into the chalice, or else in some fair and convenient cup prepared for that use, putting thereto a little pure and clean water." It seems to have been openly done in the church according to the rubric of Edward VI., whatever be the force of it.

(Mr. Coleridge.) Certainly, and I daresay at that time the old practice, founded upon whatsoever ground it may be founded, existed, and the old Communion, be it right or wrong, existed at that time.

That, therefore, is what I have to say to you upon the subject of the mixed chalice; and now I have only a few words to add, and I hope to prove to your Lordship the fourth proposition with which I set out. You will observe that I have tried to keep steadily in view with regard to all the articles with which I have dealt, the three first propositions with which I set out. The facts took place as we say they took place. The acts are directly forbidden, and they are unlawful because they are directly forbidden, or at all events unauthorized by the words of the service books with which we have to deal. My fourth proposition was that in matters of this description the absence of authority is in truth the presence of prohibition. Now I will not do more upon this subject than remind your Lordship of the words to which I have already drawn your attention in the Statutes of Uniformity, I say that the Statutes of Uniformity plainly contemplated that what they laid down should be exclusive, and should be imperative and not merely directory. The whole object is uniformity, the whole object is, whereas there had been divers uses, to establish one use. But if one man may introduce one ceremony and one rite, another man may introduce another, and the whole object of the statute is defeated. But further you must consider the state of things upon which these statutes are framed. Your Lordship must recollect that when these Acts of Uniformity, beginning with the Act of Edward VI., first came into operation, the mass was the great devotion of the Church, and transubstantiation was its leading and distinctive tenet; indeed a man can hardly overrate the importance of the mass, or the importance of the doctrine of transubstantiation, which was in existence when these service books were first put forth. In much better language than any I could use, I will read you two short passages from two very different persons upon this subject. This is what Dr. Milman, the Dean of St. Paul's, says upon the subject of the mass in his "Latin Christianity," vol. 3, page 20: "This Sacrament, the Eucharist, from the earliest times had been withdrawn into the most profound mystery, it had been guarded with the most solemn reverence, shrouded in the most impressive ceremonial. It had become, as it were, the Holy of Holies of the religion, in which the presence of the Godhead was only the more solemn from the surrounding darkness. That presence had, as yet, been unapproached by profane and searching controversy, had been undefined by canon, neither agitated before council, nor determined by Pope. During all these centuries no language had been thought too strong to express the overpowering awe and reverence of the worshippers. The oratory of the pulpit and the hortatory treatise had indulged freely in the boldest images; the innate poetry of the faith had worked those images into realities: Christ's real presence was in some indescribable manner in the Eucharist." Dr. Lingard, in his "Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church," vol. 1, page 288, states it another way:—"In every Christian society which dates its origin from the more early ages, the Eucharistic sacrifice, commonly called the sacrifice of the mass, has been considered the most solemn and sacred form of religious worship. Under other forms of devotion the Christian might offer to God the feelings and aspirations of his own heart; but under this he was believed to offer the very body and blood of the Lamb, that took away the sins of the world; of Him who had promised, that whatever was asked in His name should be granted by his heavenly Father. Hence, everywhere, both in the east and the west, we meet with the priest who officiates at the sacrifice, the altar on which the victim is offered, and the liturgy, or form of prayer, with which that offering is accompanied. The Britons, before the arrival of the Saxons, had their altars, the seats of the heavenly sacrifice, and their priests, who stretched out their hands over the most holy sacrifices of Christ; and the Scots, in the remote isle of Icolmkill, celebrated the sacred mysteries of the Holy Sacrifice, and consecrated according to custom the body of Christ. It is, indeed, true that in the arrangement of the ceremonies and the composition of the prayers, distant churches, as was to be expected, frequently followed different models; but the variations were accidental and unimportant, and the form of the service was substantially the same, both in the anaphora of the Greeks and the canon of the Latins, each carefully preserving the trisagion or ter sanctus, the invocation, the consecration of the elements, the commemorations of the living and the dead, the fraction of the Host, and the communion of the faithful."

Then he goes on, and he says, "Whenever they speak of it they appear to want language to express their notions and feelings. It is 'the celebration of the most sacred mysteries,' the 'celestial and mysterious sacrifice,' the 'offering of the victim of salvation,' 'the sacrifice of the mediator,' 'the sacrifice of the body and blood of Christ,' 'the memorial of Christ's great passion,' and 'the renewal of the passion and death of the Lamb.' Thus it is termed when they speak of it in general, but when they refer to that part of the canon called the consecration they tell us that 'the elements of bread and wine are through the ineffable hal- lowing of the spirit made to pass into the mystery of Christ's flesh and blood'; that 'the bread and wine are then consecrated into the substance of his body and blood; that 'the angels hover around in respectful silence;' and that 'the holy body and the precious blood of the Lamb, by whom we have been redeemed, are again immolated to God for the benefit of our salvation.' From this belief in the supernatural excellence of the sacrifice proceeded the numerous canons and rubrics concerning the manner of its celebration."

No one, I think, can read these passages, and the passages may be multiplied wholesale, without feeling that the mass and the doctrine concerning the mass was the great centre of devotion for hundreds of years to the Western Church of Christ. So the view or opinion upon the subject of that great sacrifice was the turning-point of the Reformation, and of the religious revolution which took place at that time. With some hesitation, and of course not always following the same steps without defecting to the right hand or to the left, but going sometimes on one side and sometimes on the other, according as the influence of this or that religious party prevailed for the time; still upon the whole, the Church of England and the Parliament of England spoke upon the Protestant side in that matter, and your Lordship will find that very distinctly expressed in the 28th Article of the Church of England: "Transubstantiation (or the change of the substance of bread and wine) in the supper of the Lord cannot be proved by holy writ, but is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, overthroweth the nature of a sacrament, and hath given occasion to many superstitions. The body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten, in the supper, only after an heavenly and spiritual manner. And the means whereby the body of Christ is received and eaten in the supper is faith. The sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped."

Now, that being the state of the case, a considerable advance in the Protestant direction is to be found even in the first Prayer Book of Edward. But, when your Lordship looks at the second Prayer Book of Edward, the complete Protestantism, so to speak, of that service book cannot possibly be disputed. The idea of the sacrifice, the oblation, the manual consecration, the words of administration, all disappear from the second service book of Edward. And although it is true that, as the Parliament expresses itself in the passage which I read to your Lordship just now, the first Prayer Book was a "godly book, and very useful," the immense change in substance that was made, at all events so far as the Holy Communion was concerned, between the first and the second Prayer Book there can be no dispute about.

By the joint effect therefore of the first Prayer Book and the second Prayer Book, the whole of the ancient view of the importance of the sacrifice, and all that appertained to the mass was, as far as regards the outward celebration of it, entirely swept away; and so the matter remained from the time of the second Prayer Book of Edward to the first Prayer Book of Elizabeth.

In the first Prayer Book of Elizabeth, as your Lordship knows, a certain compromise took place, but a compromise which left the essential Protestant character of the service book of that day entirely beyond dispute, because the only change of substance which took place in the administration of the Holy Communion was the addition of the first sentence out of the two which now compose the words of administration to the communicants when they receive it. The whole of the view of the priesthood had undergone, as your Lordship cannot help seeing, a great modification. It is true, as we have it now in the service book of Charles II., that here and there, and very often in places where you would least expect it, you find that the minister is called a "priest;" but, on the other hand, you find that in places where if the sacerdotal theory were intended to be countenanced you would most expect it, you find the priest is called the "minister." Whether "priest" and "minister" were intended to be synonymous I know not. This is certain, that in some of the most solemn parts of the administration of the Holy Sacrament where, as I say, if the sacerdotal theory was to be maintained, you would most have expected to see the word "priest" used, you most commonly find the word "minister" used. Whereas auricular confession, and all that part of the priestly office, had been maintained in full vigour in the early time of the Reformation, you find confession preserved only under very special circumstances and maintained under limitations remarkable for their extent and precision in the latter service books, and in the latter authorities of the Church of England; and I cannot help thinking your Lordship will see that the general effect of these service books from the first Prayer Book of Edward to the second Prayer Book, from the second Prayer Book of Edward to the first of Elizabeth, and afterwards to the final reconstruction of it in the time of Charles II., the great effect is entirely to destroy the ancient church idea of the mass, the sacrifice, and of the priest, and to substitute for it something with the truth or falsehood of which we are not now concerned happily, but the difference of which I think no one who reads a Romish service book, and no one who reads an English service book, can, if he has common sense, for a single instant deny.

Now, my Lord, at all events this is clear, that outwardly the whole form of administration was changed. I again draw your Lordship's attention to the specific directions given in the Roman book. The Roman book, or a book like the Roman, was throughout England the guide to the devotions of the people when the Reformation began; and again I say, that no man in his senses looking at the Roman book and looking at ours can doubt that the object of those, who, with the Roman book before them, settled our book, was, to make an alteration, if not in doctrine,—at all events in the means of the outward celebration of the mystery of the Lord's Supper. And it certainly would be a strange proceeding if we, who have gone through the Reformation, should have cut ourselves off from the communion of the rest of Europe; if we, who have undergone the necessary evils, counterbalanced, I admit, by great good, but the necessary and positive evils of isolation, should only have obtained—what? A worship which is hardly to be distinguished from the Roman worship; a doctrine which is difficult by the utmost ingenuity of man to be distinguished from the Roman doctrine as laid down in the Tridentine decrees, and a priesthood, which I, for my part, consider very much worse than its enemies describe the Roman priesthood as being. For, if all these things are to exist, if the authority and the view of the priesthood is to be maintained, which these matters symbolise, far, rather, let it be a priesthood which is recognized, which is understood, which comes down with some historical authority, and the limits and the principles of which you can find in books, and which you can deal with, than a priesthood which is limited, as far as I can make out, by nothing, and the claims and privileges of which are to be found in no book and in no code that I have ever heard of to this day. Now, my Lord, what we contend is this, that there has been on the part of the Church and Parliament a careful moderating of the opinion and a careful moderating of the practice of outward worship; and that in the Prayer Book, and in the Prayer Book only, is to be found what the Church of England sanctions, and if it is not found in the Prayer Book it is ipso facto prohibited. Now, I do not deny that in such a matter as turning to the East, in the Bellef, in such a matter as the ascription of glory to God when the Gospel is given out, I really do not know if there be any third matter generally practised which is not to be found prescribed in the Prayer Book; but as regards those two small matters, the answer as to them, I presume, is the same kind of answer which is given with regard to hymns. If you come to the legality of hymns, possibly they are not authorized by the Prayer Book, and they are so small, and so little interfere with the feelings of any human being, that no one has ever thought it worth his while to question or to interfere with, or agitate the matter in any way whatsoever.

Now just let me take the description given by Hooker of the celebration of the Holy Communion, and let us see in what language he speaks. It is to be found in the 5th book, which is a sort of perpetual commentary on the Prayer Book; in the 68th chapter: "In administering the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ, the supposed faults of the Church of England are not greatly material, and therefore it shall suffice to touch them in few words. The first is that we do not use in a generality once for all to say to communicants 'take, eat and drink,' but unto every particular person, 'eat thou, drink thou,' which is according to the popish manner, and not the form that our Saviour did use. Our second oversight is by gesture. For in kneeling there hath been superstition; sitting agreeth better to the action of a supper; and our Saviour, using that which was most fit, did himself not kneel. A third accusation is for not examining all communicants, whose knowledge in the mystery of the Gospel should that way be made manifest, a thing everywhere, they say, used in the Apostles' times, because all things necessary were used, and this in their opinion is necessary, yea, it is commanded, inasmuch as the Levites are commanded to prepare the people for the Passover, and examination is a part of their preparation, our Lord's Supper in place of the Passover. The fourth thing misliked is that against the Apostles' prohibition to have any familiarity at all with notorious offenders, papists being not of the Church are admitted to our very communion before they have by their religious and gospel-like behaviour purged themselves of that suspicion of popery which their former life hath caused. They are dogs, swine, unclean beasts, foreigners and strangers from the Church of God, and therefore ought not to be admitted though they offer themselves. We are fifthly condemned inasmuch as when there have been store of people to hear sermon and service in the Church we suffer the communion to be ministered to a few. It is not enough that our book of Common Prayer hath godly exhortations to move all thereunto which are present. For it should not suffer a few to communicate; it should by ecclesiastical discipline and civil punishment provide that such as would withdraw themselves might be brought to communicate according to the law of God and the ancient church canons. In the sixth and last place, come the enormity of imparting this sacrament privately unto the sick.

“ Thus far accused, we answer briefly to the first, that, seeing God by sacraments doth apply in particular unto every man’s person the grace which himself hath provided for the benefit of all mankind, there is no cause why administering the sacraments we should forbear to express that in our forms of speech which he by his word and gospel teacheth all to believe. In the true sacrament ‘I baptize thee’ displeaseth them not; if ‘eat thou’ in the other offend them their fancies are no rules for churches to follow.

“ Whether Christ at his last supper did speak generally once to all, or to every one in particular, is a thing uncertain. His words are recorded in that form which serveth best for the setting down with historical brevity what was spoken; they are no manifest proof that he spoke but once unto all which did then communicate, much less that we in speaking unto every communicant severally do amiss, although it were clear that we herein do otherwise than Christ did. Our imitation of him consisteth not in tying scrupulously ourselves unto his syllables, but rather in speaking by the heavenly direction of that inspired divine wisdom which teacheth divers ways to one end, and doth therein control their boldness by whom any profitable way is censured as reprobable only under colour of some small difference from great examples going before. To do throughout every the like circumstances, the same which Christ did in this action, were by following his footsteps in that sort to err more from the purpose he aimed at, than we now do by not following them with so nice and severe strictness.

“ They little weigh with themselves how dull, how heavy, and almost how without sense the greatest part of the common multitude every where is, who think it either needful or unnecessary to put them even man by man especially at that time in mind whereabout they are. It is true that in sermons we do not use to repeat our sentences severally to every particular hearer; a strange madness it were if we should. The softness of wax may induce a wise man to set his stamp or image therein; it persuadeth no man that because wool hath the like quality it may therefore receive the like impression. So the reason taken from the use of sacraments in that they are instruments of grace unto every particular man may with good congruity lead the Church to frame accordingly her words in administration of sacraments, because they easily admit this form, which being in sermons a thing impossible without apparent ridiculous absurdity, agreement of sacraments with sermons in that which is alleged as a reasonable proof of conveniency for the one proveth not the same allegation impertinent because it doth not enforce the other to be administered in like sort. For equal principles do then avail unto equal conclusions when the matter whereunto we apply them is equal, and not else.

“ Our kneeling at Communions is the gesture of piety. If we did there present ourselves but to make some show or dumb resemblance of a spiritual feast it may be that sitting were the fitter ceremony;

“ but coming as receivers of inestimable grace at the hands of God; what doth better beseech our bodies at that hour than to be sensible witnesses of minds unfeignedly humbled? Our Lord himself did that which custom and long usage had made fit; we that which fitness and great decency hath made usual.”

My Lord, consider the description which has been given of the service of the Holy Communion as performed at St. Alban’s, and then consider, after reading that passage of Hooker in which he vindicates the kneeling of persons at Holy Communions, and thinks it necessary to vindicate it,—compare it with the description of Mr. Mackonochie’s ceremonial, and then read the administration of the Holy Communion in the Prayer Book, and then let anybody say whether the service which is described as taking place at St. Alban’s agrees more with that reasonable service which Hooker vindicates, and which is to be found set forth in the Prayer Book, or whether it is not much more like that service which is to be found rather hinted at than described by the mediæval bishop in the well known poem of a great living writer where he says he is—

“ To lie upon his tomb for centuries,
And hear the blessed mutter of the Mass,
And see God made and eaten all day long,
And feel the steady candle flame, and taste
Good, thick, strong, stupefying incense smoke.”

Now with which sort of ceremonial does that which is described as taking place at St. Alban’s most properly agree?

I do not know that I should usefully occupy your Lordship’s attention at any greater length upon this subject. I have endeavoured to put before you, shortly and clearly, the various points upon which I have to invoke your Lordship’s judgment. This is not a matter, as I said once before, of feeling or of taste; it is not a question of whether we can or cannot yield to individual wishes; but even if it were, I cannot help thinking that whatever love a cultivated mind may have for beauty of ornament and splendour of service, the same mind, if it was only moderately manly, would feel that there is a certain want of manliness in all these questions of acolytes and thurifers; in all this millinery and posture making; in all these solemn discussions upon points of Ecclesiastical dandyism which we have had in “The Ritual Reason Why,” and other books which my friend has brought under the attention of your Lordship. I believe these things do an incalculable amount of mischief; they raise a wall between the Church and the people, they give rise to a feeling of hostility wide in extent, and intensely deep in its character; and if it should turn out that practices such as these are really within the law and sanction of the Church, I seriously apprehend that the Establishment itself may be in danger of revolution and overthrow.

I do not dispute for a moment about the character of the defendant in this case. He may be as self-devoted as he says he is in these pleadings, although as matter of taste I wonder he deals so largely in self-praise. I have lived long enough in the world to know that there are no limits, absolutely none, to honest self-deception; but I cannot help saying that all this earnestness about maniples, and acolytes, and thurifers, and what not, does savour to my mind of a certain foppery and personality that is excessively unlike St. Paul.

My learned friend concluded his address by reading two passages to you from modern and I believe living writers; and I will venture to read to your Lordship a passage from a very ancient writer, the last of the Fathers, a priest, a monk, an abbot, a Catholic of the Catholics, but a true Christian if ever there was one on this earth; I mean St. Bernard. There were ecclesiastical dandies in St. Bernard’s time as well as now; men who were extremely fond of splendid ritual, of magnificent altars, and blazing churches; and this is what St. Bernard said of them: “Ostenditur “pulcherrima forma sancti vel sanctæ alicujus et “eo creditur sanctorum quo coloratio. Current homines “ad osculandum; iritantur ad donandum et magis “mereatur pulchra, quam venerantur sacra. Ponuntur “dehinc in ecclesia gemmata, non coronæ sed rotæ “circumseptæ lampadibus, sed non minus fulgenter

 “insertis lapidibus. Cernimus et pro candelabris “artifices operæ fabricatas, nec magis coruscantes “superpositas lucernis, quam suis gemmis. Quid, “putas, in his omnibus queritur, penitentium com-“punctio, aut intuentium admiratio? O vanitas “vanitatum sed non vanior quam insanior! Fulget “Ecclesiæ in parietibus et in pauperibus eget. Suos “lapides induit auro et suos filios nudos deserit. De “sumptibus egenorum servitur oculis divitum. In“veniunt curiosi quo delectentur et non inveniunt
 “miseri quo sustententur. Quid hæc ad pauperes,
 “ad monachos, ad viros spirituales?”

But, my Lord, after all it is not a question of fancy or of yielding to opinion; it is a question of law. Are we, as matter of law, to have imposed upon us a service such as these articles and this evidence describe; a service not Roman, which is historical and impressive in its way; not Greek, which is historical and impressive too; not English, which is simpler but has its own noble and even majestic severity; but something made up out of all three and yet different from each; something which is all made out of the carver's brain; something which displays more the ingenuity of man than sets forth, as all public worship ought to set forth, the honour and glory of Almighty God? My Lord, that is the short and simple question which is before you, and I hope your Lordship by your judgment will answer No.

(Dr. Swabey.) I fear your Lordship will think me very whimsical after what has passed, if I ask your Lordship's leave to trouble you for a few minutes on one of these points. When I intimated that I should not say anything on this case, it certainly was not because I thought it a trivial matter, but because (and I drew attention to the fact at the time) it seemed to me that the same points were involved in the next case in which I am also counsel, and whatever weight my few words might have, and whatever effect they might have, would be just as great if I reserved my arguments until the second case, in which I shall have the honour to occupy a more exalted position than I do in the present one, and at the same time saving unnecessary repetition. But it has occurred to me to-day, after coming into court, that the question of incense does not arise in the second case, and I think it would be more respectful to your Lordship, and more in accordance with my duty to my client, if, confining myself to that one point only, I made a few observations upon it.

Now, I will not trouble your Lordship by reading the charge over again; my learned friend who has preceded me has gone through it, but it will not escape your Lordship's attention that the use of incense is laid and admitted to be during the celebration of the Holy Communion, and not at any other part of the service.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is what I understand.

(Dr. Swabey.) And your Lordship will also see that all the other points brought before the notice of the Court have reference to one part of the divine service, namely, the celebration of the Holy Communion. And what I should put to your Lordship with respect to the use of incense is this, that it is the use of an ornament (in the sense in which the Privy Council have determined the word “ornament” ought to be used) in and as part of the Communion service, which is unauthorized by the present Book of Common Prayer, or by any other law which is known to the Church in this country.

Now, is there any rule of law applicable? If there is any rule of law applicable, and if it has been laid down by a Court superior in authority to this, it must, as I humbly submit, be the duty of this Court to follow that rule of law; and no discussion here can be allowed if the rule of law is clearly laid down. We know, that before the case of Westerton v. Liddell, there would probably have been a great discussion as to the meaning of the rubric at the beginning of the Prayer Book of 1662. But that is by the judgment of the Privy Council settled in that case of Westerton v. Liddell; and, with all submission, it appears to me to be pretty clearly laid down, and it is a matter on which your Lordship can have little doubt, that that rubric refers to all ornaments which were in use in this Church under the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. We will come to the meaning of the word “ornaments.” I will not go into the question which my friend has generally gone into, that where there are certain things laid down, the other matters are by that rule excluded, because, in point of fact, that is rather the second part of the rule of law laid down in Westerton v. Liddell; and I find in page 134 in the copy of the judgment in that case by Dr. Bayford under the head of “Credence table” this; their Lordships say: “Here the rubrics of the Prayer Book become important. Their Lordships entirely agree with the opinions expressed by the learned Judges in these cases, and in Faulkner v. Lichfield, that in performance of the services, rites, and ceremonies ordered by the Prayer Book, the directions contained in it must be strictly observed.” Of course, I might say, so far as this rubric of the Prayer Book of 1662 goes, it makes good the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., except in any cases where there are special rubrics in the Prayer Book of 1662 which affected particular matters, although those matters may appear in the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. For instance, I might liken that to the case of a will and codicil; the codicil confirms the will, and makes the will speak from its date. But if the codicil varies any of the particular provisions of the will, although the will is confirmed and made to speak from that date by the codicil, of course the codicil overrules the original will, and the two are made to read as one instrument. And so with regard to the rubrics of the two books, if there should turn out to be any variance between them. And as to omissions or additions in the performance of the service, their Lordships go on to say, “That in the performance of the services, rites, and ceremonies ordered by the Prayer Book, the directions contained in it must be strictly observed; that no omission and no addition can be permitted.” Then, of course, as your Lordship has already pointed out to-day, they go on, having laid down that general proposition, to justify, in that particular instance, the use of a credence table as a necessary or proper adjunct to the Communion table.

(Dr. Swabey.) Yes. The way in which they limit their first general proposition which I have already read, is this, that they are not prepared to hold the use of all articles not expressly mentioned in the Rubric, although quite consistent with, and even subsidiary to the service, is forbidden; and then they introduce the organs, the seats, the pulpit, the pulpit cloths, and so on, and then they go on to the credence table; so I take it as a binding rule upon your Lordship, that nothing can be used in the Church in addition to the present book, the Prayer Book of Edward VI., as far as that is applicable, unless they are subsidiary matters consistent with and belonging to the articles which are expressly mentioned and directed to be used.

Now, I certainly wish to avoid any discussion on the intention of the use of these things; but I do want to show as clearly as possible that they are used in this case as laid in the articles, and as admitted and come within the word “ornament” as defined by the Privy Council, and as opposed by them to mere decoration. It is not a mere decoration, but something used as part of the service; and that I understand to be the distinction which they intended to be laid down between the legal meaning which they give to the word "ornament" in the rubric of the present Prayer Book, and the word "decoration." Your Lordship is aware of the meaning they give to the word "ornament."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Perfectly; they took the Latin word "ornamentum" in the Forcellini Dictionary, and that was the argument of counsel.

(Dr. Swabey.) Yes; ornament used in any part of the service; and they distinguish that from any mere decoration; and that is the way I think they apply it. They distinguish, for instance, between the use of certain crosses. They said, "If a cross were to be carried about and used as part of the service, we should hold it would be illegal. But a cross used as a decoration on the wall would be perfectly legal; in other words, it does not come under the words in the rubric 'on ornaments.'" I think they instance that particularly.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I remember that part of the judgment very well; in fact, I remember the whole judgment.

(Dr. Swabey.) Now bearing in mind that distinction between the ornament and the decoration, I turn to Mr. Mackonochie's pamphlet, which is part of these articles, or annexed to these articles, and which is referred to in his answer by himself at the top of the third page, "The use of incense will now be discontinued at the introit, gospel, and offertory." So that fully bears out what I said, that the meaning of the articles was that it was used as part of the Communion service, and that is what Mr. Mackonochie says is still legal. "The use of incense will now be discontinued at the introit, gospel, and offertory. Before the consecration prayer the censer will be brought in. At the consecration, incense will be put into it by the thurifer, but it will not be used, as at present, for censuring persons and things." This is "a mode of using incense allowed by the ecclesiastical opinion, and not disallowed by the legal one." Before leaving this part of the case I must say one word more about the meaning of "incense." Then, at page 4 in my copy, he goes at considerable length into the meaning which he ascribes to incense. I am not going to say whether that is right or wrong, but I say that incense, in the way it appears to be used in St. Alban's, is used as a part of the Communion service; and that being so used, if I am right in that, there is no warrant of any sort for its being so used in any of the rubrics of the present Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say it is not brought in merely for the purpose of fumigation, but for the purpose of being an additional rite or ceremony?

(Dr. Swabey.) Just so; and that as such it is not warranted by the rubrics of the present Prayer Book, or by those parts of the rubrics as to ornaments in the Prayer Book of Edward VI. which form part of the present Prayer Book by implication.

Now a great deal has been said about the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., and how that first Prayer Book was changed to a certain extent from the previous service books which had been in use in the Church of England.

Now I hold in my hand a translation of the Liturgy of the Church of Sarum; it is apparently quite a recent translation. There is an introduction to it by a well-known author, bearing date 1866. It is translated from the Latin, with explanatory notes, by Charles Walker. It is printed by Hayes, of Lyall Place, Eaton Square, and bears date 1866. It is in one volume, and at page 46 the Court will find elaborate directions about incense. "At the end of the Alleluja Sequence or Tract, the deacon, before he goes to the lectern to read the gospel, incenses the altar in the midst only, for he shall never incense the lectern either at mass or matins before he reads the gospel."

(The Dean of the Arches.) They are not very different from the Roman missal, are they?

(Dr. Swabey.) I presume not; I have not read them.

(Mr. Coleridge.) In the canon there is, I believe, hardly any difference.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I believe not.

(Dr. Swabey.) "Then the deacon passes through the midst of the choir, solemnly holding the text in his left hand, the taper bearers and thurifer going before; and if it be a double feast the cross also goes before, which will be held opposite to the deacon." Then at page 51. "Having done which he receives the censer from the deacon, and incenses the sacrifice thrice in the form of a cross, and round the chalice and sacrifice; and then he incenses the place between himself and the altar." And there are various other directions in the course of the canon with regard to incense which, although I have not compared it with the Roman canon now in use, I have no doubt are very much the same.

Now, that being so, and there being no particular directions as to the use of incense in the Liturgy of the Church of Sarum, which is one of the very liturgies mentioned in the preface to the first Prayer Book of Edward the VI., as one intended to be departed from to a certain extent, when we find, even in that first Prayer book of Edward VI., much less in the later ones, there is no direction whatever as to the use of incense in any part of the Communion service, it appears to me to be an irresistible conclusion that it is an addition to our present authorized Communion service which their Lordships of the Privy Council say is unlawful, unless it could be shown that it is merely subsidiary to something which the Prayer Book directs to be used.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The question is, whether it was not an ornament in use in the second year of Edward VI.

(Dr. Swabey.) Yes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the whole question.

(Dr. Swabey.) Now I really do not know that I can add anything more to that. I will only just make this remark that, although I am trying to avoid as much as possible the casting of any imputation upon anyone, yet I cannot help asking myself, how comes it, that in this year 1868, I hold in my hand this very recent translation of the Liturgy of the Church of Sarum? Of course, it is a matter of curiosity, as an historical inquiry, and it is a matter deeper than that, as showing the real vein of identity of feeling and so on which exists between ancient liturgies and our own. That may be all very well, but if such a suggestion as this may be made: "The study of ancient liturgies re-awakened amongst us of late years, has been one of the truest and most valuable results of the profounder view and more vivid apprehension of eucharistic doctrine; as in return they form the most important aids in elucidating and maintaining the doctrine, which is the most blessed among the many signs of God's good hand upon us," and many remarks in that strain. If that is the object, then I ask, is there any difference in that respect between the Liturgies of the Church of Sarum and our own present Prayer Book? If there is not, our own present Prayer Book gives us all we need; but if there is a difference, I submit it is the bounden duty of this present Court to adhere to our present Prayer Book, and to reject whatever may be endeavoured to be interpolated into that, whether it is on the authority of the usage of the Liturgy of the Church of Sarum, or any other authority whatsoever, not within the four corners of the Acts of Uniformity. I do not know that I can add anything more, according to my humble views of the matter, on the question of incense; but one remark fell from the Court to-day, upon which, perhaps, I might be pardoned for adding a word, and that is on the question of the Injunctions in the reign of Edward and of Elizabeth. I had not the advantage of hearing what my learned friend said upon that.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The question I put is one which the Court thinks is an important question, and it is, What legal authority have the Injunctions not only of Edward VI. but also Queen Elizabeth, if any?

give to that would be this, that it is immaterial to inquire now, at this time of day, whether at the time they were put forth they had statutable authority, or had not. Because, it seems to me, whatever authority they had at the time they were put forth, they have been swept away by the Act of 1662, which speaks of course from its own date; and whatever authority the Injunctions had during the intermediate time, assuming, for the sake of my present position, that the Injunctions when they came out did really vary, and had authority to vary the provisions of the Prayer Book, the plain legal effect of the Act of Uniformity of 1662, and the Prayer Books and rubrics, which form a part of that Statute and Act, is entirely to do away with these Injunctions of Edward and Elizabeth, as regards any legal and statutable effect.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Where the Prayer Book is at variance with them, no doubt. But where the Prayer Book is not at variance with them—that is the question.

(Dr. Swabey.) It is. If we take the interpretation of the Privy Council as to the rubric, it seems to me, with submission, it is hardly a question of variance, because the Act of 1662 says, “we will henceforward use such things as were in use by authority of Parliament in the 2nd year of the reign of Edward VI.”

We now know that that means the first Prayer Book of Edward VI; so that the effect of our present Prayer Book is therefore to reinstate the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. quite independently of any Injunctions of Edward and Elizabeth. That is the view I would venture to take of that matter. I do not wish to take up your Lordship's time further, because I understand your Lordship does not intend to give judgment in this case before hearing the argument in the next case, in which I shall have another opportunity of addressing your Lordship.

(Mr. James.) I may be permitted to say, now that my friends have done, that it seems to me there is already a most conclusive answer to the case against Mr. Mackonochie, in the fact that it has taken five days to prove that he has violated one clause of an Act of Parliament of five or six lines.

(Mr. Coleridge.) Your Lordship knows the true answer to that is, that it is easier to commit an error than to refute one.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I remember hearing that when Lord Eldon was Attorney General, and had to conduct a proceeding against Horne Tooke, it was said that if it took twenty-four hours to bring home a charge of high treason against a man, he could not be very guilty.

(Adjourned till 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.)

SIXTH DAY.

Friday, January 10th, 1868.

(Mr. James.) My Lord, it is now my turn to make some observations in this case on the part of the Defendant. I shall not occupy your time very long, for I do not think it is necessary that one should travel into all that mass of archaeological learning which has been thought necessary by my friends to be brought forward for the purpose of proving that a minister of the Church of England—who probably has had no opportunity of ever seeing, or even hearing, in a remote way, by hearsay, a hundredth part of it—has been guilty of an offence against the laws ecclesiastical, and against the statute law of this realm, by reason of conclusions to be drawn from that mass of documentary evidence.

My Lord, I cannot help feeling that there is a very painful view of this case: that, having regard to the state of this metropolis, to the great amount of practical heathenism which prevails here, and which would require to be dealt with by the united force and strength of all parties in the Church of England, that a minister should be brought before you as a Defendant to answer a quasi criminal charge, if not a criminal charge, because he has felt with many persons that in a luxurious and wealthy metropolis like this, it is fitting and right that some of the luxury, some of the wealth, some, it may be, of the ostentation of the city itself, should be expended in offerings for the purpose of making the service of Almighty God more ornate and more magnificent,—because he has felt, in common with many persons in the Church of England, that these things, however indifferent they may seem to some, and however little weight they may have with persons of strong intellect and sternly disciplined minds, that they have a very powerful effect upon a large mass of the people of this city and of this country; that they do bring within the temples of our Lord many who would never otherwise be attracted there, and that persons who come there to gaze, perhaps to scoff, remain to pray, their stony hearts being softened by the religious atmosphere in which they find themselves, perchance for the first time. My Lord, he does belong to a party in the Church, if it may be called a party, he does in common with many persons entertain a hope, the hope that was expressed in the encyclical of that synod which was called the Pan Anglican Synod, the other day,—that was expressed in the singularly able letter that was written to the Greek Church, particularly on behalf of that synod, that the time may come when all the severed branches of the Church Catholic may be united,—united upon the basis of the primeval doctrine, the primeval discipline, and the primeval services of the Church Apostolic.

My Lord, while that is a painful view of it, it is at all events very satisfactory to the Counsel who have to address your Lordship on behalf of Mr. Mackonochie to know this, that there is no charge against him apparently, closely as he has been watched by that odium theologium which knows no charity, and which is always suspicious,—that, watched and dogged as he has been for years by that evil spirit, it is not imputed to him that he has ever in teaching or preaching uttered one word, one single word, of false doctrine, or one word that is inconsistent with his duty as a faithful son of the Church of England; that all the charges against him are reduced to this,—I think it will be found, if your Lordship looks at them,—that he used a gesture or a posture of too much reverence, or of reverence in a wrong place, to an unnecessary light, to an unnecessary ornament, to the use of a sweet scented drug or mixture of drugs, and to adding to the sacramental wine a few drops of pure water, to which, as it seems to me, it is utterly impossible to attach any objectionable doctrine or view of any kind whatever.

My Lord, I did not intend to have read to your Lordship the first plea which has been put in in explanation of Mr. Mackonochie's conduct; but after the invidious reference that was made by my friend Mr. Coleridge in his concluding observations to the works of St. Bernard, and after the quotation that he made from that author, (the last of the fathers, I think, he was described as being,) I think I ought, on behalf of Mr. Mackonochie, to read to you Mr. Mackonochie's own account of what he has done in his district, and then see whether that which is there done is what St. Bernard would have described in the terms which he applied to the greedy clergymen and the greedy churches which were the subject of his vituperation. My Lord, Mr. Mackonochie says, that "to supply the spiritual wants of the inhabitants of the said parish or ecclesiastical district the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie has, since he became incumbent thereof, and with a stipend of only 150*l.* per annum, provided for his parishioners on every Sunday three separate services in the said church, two sermons and a catechising of the children, also two celebrations of the Holy Communion, and since the 15th November 1863 three such celebrations, and since Advent Sunday last past four such celebrations, and since the said Advent Sunday, an address to the children in addition to the catechising above mentioned. That on every festival of the Church he has provided since he became incumbent thereof for his parishioners two daily services, namely, the morning and evening prayer in the said church, with one sermon, and usually two sermons, and two celebrations of the Holy Communion, and since the 25th day of January 1867 three such celebrations. That on other week days he has provided throughout the year, as directed by the Book of Common Prayer, two daily services, namely, the morning and evening prayers, and one celebration of the Holy Communion; and that on every Wednesday and Friday, besides morning and evening prayers, he has provided the litany and two celebrations of the Holy Communion. That the services so had and celebrated in the said church on Sundays are attended by a crowded and devout congregation, amongst the numbers of which there are a large and increasing number of poor persons, the greater portion of them being inhabitants of the said parish, and very few of whom, before the nomination of the said A. H. Mackonochie to be incumbent of the said parish, ever attended any church or other place of religious worship. That the said services so had and celebrated on the festivals of the Church, and on the other week days, are also attended by a numerous and devout congregation, consisting principally (more especially the early and late services) of poor persons resident in and about the said parish. That on Easter Sunday 1867 the Holy Communion was administered to 515 persons in the said church, and that during the year last past there have been no less than 17,392 communicants. That the collection made at the offertory amounted to 2,000*l.*" Then he goes on to state what is done besides. That I need not read. That from the time he became incumbent of the said parish up to the present time neither of the two churchwardens of the said parish, one of whom is appointed by the said A. H. Mackonochie, and the other by the inhabitants of the said parish in vestry assembled, has presented or made any complaint against the said A. H. Mackonochie to the Lord Bishop of the diocese at his visitation, nor have they presented or made any complaint against him to the archdeacon of the archdeaconry wherein the said parish or ecclesiastical district is situated, for having in any degree violated or infringed, or for neglecting to conform to any of the laws, canons, and constitutions of the Church of England."

Now, my Lord, that is a picture of the services that have been rendered in this church; rendered to the satisfaction of a crowded and devout congregation of members of the Church of England; and this is the gentleman, and these are the services, in respect of which my learned friend Mr. Coleridge thought it becoming to talk of the miserable man-millinery, or whatever it was, of his proceedings. I really forget the exact term he used, but it was a term of considerable disparagement of the manner and mode in which Mr. Mackonochie was performing his duties. My Lord, I venture to say that if this story had been told to St. Bernard, St. Bernard would not have addressed to Mr. Mackonochie that reproach which he did address to so many of his fellows at that time, but he would have said, "Go on, thou faithful servant." I thought it right to say this, which I should not have attempted to say if it had not been for what I conceive to be the uncalled-for attacks upon Mr. Mackonochie with which my learned friend Mr. Coleridge thought it right to conclude his address to your Lordship. Having said this, I will also say, that I think it appears in the pleadings,—Mr. Mackonochie pleaded it, and Mr. Martin has not denied it,—that Mr. Martin is, in truth, practically an entire stranger. He seems to have no connection with the district, except that he is the secretary to some schools there; I think that is the only connexion which he has with the district. He does not in any way appear to have frequented the services of this church, or to have had any occasion to do so. He is a mere stranger who has put himself forward for the purpose of raising this question. I think therefore, my Lord, the matter does not come before your Lordship (I do not put it higher than that) in any favourable view for a prosecution of this kind; a prosecution brought without the sanction of any of the persons who really are interested in the services of that church, and brought simply upon the technical theory, which was relied upon by my learned friend, that every member of the Church of England has a vested right in securing observance of the laws ecclesiastical in every church in the kingdom. It would seem to be a strong proposition, probably it may be right in point of law, that the whole thing belongs to the whole body of the Church, and that every churchman has a right to say everywhere, I will interfere, if necessary, for the purpose of setting right what I think wrong in the details of the ministrations of any clergyman whatever.

My Lord, having said this, I will ask your Lordship to consider what is exactly your jurisdiction in this matter. Now, your jurisdiction, as far as this case is concerned, is a statutory jurisdiction. You are here, I think, sitting entirely under "The Church Discipline Act." The Church Discipline Act authorizes the bishop to send a charge by letters of request, to the Judge of this Court, who is then to proceed with it according to the practice of this Court.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That might have been done without the statute.

(Mr. James.) Yes; but "The Church Discipline Act" has provided now, that no charge in effect can be brought except with the preliminary sanction of the Bishop.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The great difference, as you are aware, is, that before the Chancellor of the diocese signed the letters of request, and in cases of this description the Bishop himself sent the letters of request. As far as I am aware, this is the very first instance of the Bishop sending letters of request to the Dean of the Arches. He has always, hitherto, tried it in his own court.

(Mr. James.) I think I am warranted in saying this, that your jurisdiction is really a statutory jurisdiction; that is to say, that the Church Discipline Act has given the Bishop certain powers and certain rights to make a preliminary investigation—has given him clearly, as I understand, a discretion.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Certainly.

(Mr. James.) As to whether he will or will not sanction any charge being brought against a clergyman, for the purpose of preventing the clergyman from being harassed by a vexatious and malicious prosecution. It seems to me that that is a very salutary proceeding indeed. That is to say, according to the Church Discipline Act, it must be brought within two years of the time of the alleged offence, and no clergyman is to be brought to the bar of any court unless the Bishop should think fit to authorize his being so brought, and thereupon the Bishop sends letters of request with the charge,—sends the charge to this court to be tried instead of trying it himself. And the charge which your Lordship alone, as it seems to me, can try at all is the very charge—the ipsissima verba—which the Bishop has so sent to be tried, and as to which the defendant has been cited to appear and to answer,—and you cannot in any way alter, or add to, or aggravate that charge. It is upon that charge alone that any ecclesiastical censure or admonition can be passed or founded, and that you cannot alter in any way by the articles that are afterwards given in.

(Mr. James.) What I understand is the legal effect of the articles is this. My analogy, of course, will be drawn from the courts with which I am more acquainted, from the courts of common law and the Courts of Chancery. The articles, in fact, answer exactly the position of the particulars of demand given in an action at law, to the particulars of breaches in an action of covenant; and perhaps they are still more strictly analogous to the overt acts in an indictment for treason, or an indictment for conspiracy; that is to say, all overt acts by which the prosecutor pledges himself to prove the charge which is to be brought. But still, whatever the acts may be, whatever they may say, whatever the articles say, you must always fall back upon the original charges, and the original charges must be sustained here. That is to say, the defendant must be made out to be guilty of the offence secundum allegata, that is to say, allegata, in the original charge, secundum probata, the probata being what the articles allege; the mode of proving them.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Probably those analogies may be a little misleading. The state of the case is this. The jurisdiction of this Court in this matter is founded upon the letters of request sent to me from the Bishop of London. The charges are cited in these letters of request, and they are there in the form of a decree, which is the same as a citation served upon the party accused, who comes here to answer these charges specified in that decree of citation and no other. The articles are an expansion of the circumstances stated in the charge cited in the decree.

(Mr. James.) There is a case which is very strong upon that point, with which, no doubt, your Lordship is perfectly familiar. I only mention it to your Lordship because it is so very familiar to all persons who are acquainted with these cases. It is the case of Brecks v. Woolfry—the Prayers for the Dead case—in which Sir Herbert Jenner Fust positively refused to accept a consent by Dr. Adams, and to allow the articles to be proceeded with, which alleged a fact which was not in the citation.

(Mr. James.) There was an article that the prayer there had been put upon the tombstone without the consent—

(The Dean of the Arches.) Just so; and Sir Herbert Jenner Fust said he had no power to try that question, but simply to try whether the inscription was or was not contrary to the law of the Church of England. He decided that it was not, and he did not consider what the decision might have been if the letters of request had enabled him to try the legality of putting up an inscription on the tombstone without the consent of the incumbent. He stated that that was another thing which he had no power to enter into.

(Mr. James.) That being so, I think, if you look at the charges, it is very difficult indeed to make out, according to the rules of law, that there is any change at all alleged in the manner in which a charge ought to be alleged in a case of a criminal offence in the original charges.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is rather late, is it not, Mr. James, to take an objection of that kind?

(Mr. James.) I think not.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You see, if the articles did not contain the averment of the offence against the ecclesiastical law, they ought to have been opposed upon that ground. I do not mean to say this, that if it should turn out at the hearing that the articles do not contain the offence against the ecclesiastical law the court will be barred from considering it, but strictly speaking they ought to have been objected to. If the articles alleged matters over which this Court has no jurisdiction, at any time the Court might hold its hand.

(Mr. James.) Precisely.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is that your contention now?

(Mr. James.) My contention is that the matter is a matter which is not alleged as required by the law; that is to say, at common law it would be the subject of a writ of error after verdict.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I will listen with the greatest attention to any argument on this point, but at the present I am quite at a loss to understand how it is to be maintained that these matters which are charged are not ecclesiastical offences.

(Mr. James.) I am going to tell your Lordship why I say that. Of course the offences must either be offences against the common ecclesiastical law, or against the statute law. I shall not be long in making your Lordship understand what I mean.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I will attend to everything you say.

(Mr. James.) The offence must be either against the common law of the Church, or against the positive statute law. Now, against the common law of the Church none of these things can be offences, because it is quite clear that the common law dates from pre-Reformation times. Of course the common law of the Church also renders it the duty of every minister to comply with every lawful statute that is passed subsequently; but that is like a misdemeanor; the common law of the land makes it always a misdemeanor for any person to disobey or not to obey a statute. Now, as one of the fixed rules of law is, that whenever a statute has created an offence, the offence must be charged in words or in substance—

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do I not understand your argument to be, that if these are offences at all they are offences against the statute law?

(Mr. James.) Against the statute of Uniformity. I do not understand how it can be put in any other way. They are offences against the Act of Uniformity. I will refer to a case upon this particular statute, the existing Act of Uniformity. The existing Act of Uniformity provides this, and this only: "That all and singular ministers in any cathedral, collegiate, or parish church, or chapel or other place of public worship, within this realm of England, dominion of Wales, and town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, shall be bound to say and use the morning prayer, evening prayer, celebration and administration of both the sacraments, and all other the public and common prayer in such order and form as is mentioned in the said book annexed, and joined to this present Act, and intitled 'The Book of Common Prayer and administration of the sacraments and other rites and ceremonies of the Church, according to the use of the Church of England,' and so on. All that the Act says is, that he shall be bound to say and use the morning prayer, evening prayer, and so on; that is to say, he shall be bound to say and use the book in the order and form therein prescribed. Now, my Lord, upon that there is a very early case.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the case about alias preces. Is that the case?

(Mr. James.) That is the case,—Sparkes' case.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Give me the reference to it?

(Mr. James.) It is in the second Shower's Reports, The King v. Sparkes; and the order was on indictment, for using other prayers than in the liturgy; and the words were alias preces, alio modo. The "error" was to reverse a judgment given at the quarter sessions of the peace held for the county of Devon, for the payment of one hundred marks fine against the defendant, he being there convicted by verdict

“ on an indictment, for that, being minister or curate of such a place, he did on the Lord’s day use other prayers than according to the Book of Common Prayer, &c. Several errors were assigned upon record, as that the justices of the peace had no cognizance of the offence, &c. But the errors insisted on by Mr. Pöllxfen and myself—[that is the reporter]—were these:—(1) that the justices of the peace had no jurisdiction of this crime, it being a new offence created by statute, and none but justices of oyer and terminer or judges of assize could examine and punish these offences.” That was overruled. Another was “that if on the statute of 6 Edward 2 and 3, c. 1. the first offence is forfeiture of the net benefice, and imprisonment for six months; and on 1 Elizabeth, c. 2. it is like, but in no sort fineable; which was agreed. But Mr. Coryton, for the prosecutor, urged, that this was an offence against the 14 Car. 2. c. 4. where there is a general prohibition not to use any other form, and then a fine may be set. To that we answered, that this indictment could not be made good upon that law, because it does not set forth what the prayers were that we did use, so that non constat to the Court, though it might to the jury, that they were different from the Book of Common Prayer. Which objection Herbert Chief Justice and Holloway took, saying that it might be a prayer before sermon, and yet he might use the common prayer (and so in truth the fact was); and therefore they held it no offence, unless it had been alleged that he did not read the common prayer. But Wythens Justice hesitavit. Then I urge that in truth they could bring this indictment within none of the statutes concerning these matters; but if they insisted on this of the 14 Car. 2. c. 4., then the statute 23 Elizabeth, c. 1., which gave the justices a jurisdiction, could not reach this; which, as they themselves contend, is an offence made by a subsequent law, viz. 14 Car. 2. Coryton not being ready to answer this, Wythens Justice said, let it be reversed for that, and says Lord Herbert for the other too. And so we had judgment reversed. Note.—This was a malicious prosecution, for it was only a prayer in the pulpit, and the common prayer was constantly read, and it had a fate accordingly; for, no doubt, if it had been an offence within this Act of Uniformity, the justices would have had some cognizance of it; for by the twenty-fourth section all statutes concerning the former book of Queen Elizabeth are quoted to be in force as to this book now used. This prosecution alarmed most of the clergy, but the Lord Chief Justices’ opinion gave them satisfaction, which in truth was founded on a great deal of reason.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) How do you use that case?

(Mr. James.) It appears to me that your Lordship will find that the offence under the statute is not using the Book of Common Prayer in the order and form, as to which there is no allegation and no charge whatever that every word of the common prayer was not used, that every prescription of the common prayer was not complied with. Let us see what the charges are: “Elevated the paten above his head, and permitted and sanctioned such elevation, and took into his hands the cup and elevated it above his head during the prayer of consecration.” Now, my Lord, there is no charge there of any kind whatever. And the same thing applies to all the others, that is to say, the use of candles, the use of incense, the mixing of water with the wine. There is no allegation that he did not use the Common Prayer in order and form,—the order and form being simply, you are to do that. I will show you presently how it ought to be dealt with, if a person does something more than is prescribed by that book; but all that the statute of Charles in that section requires is that every minister, every priest, shall use and say that book in order and form. But that being the provision of the statute of Charles, it goes on in the 24th section to refer to the statute of Elizabeth: “And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the several good laws and statutes of this realm which have been formerly made and are now in force for the uniformity of prayer and administration of the sacraments within this realm of England and places aforesaid shall stand in full force and strength, to all intents and purposes whatsoever, for the establishing and confirming of the said book, intituled ‘The Book of Common Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church according to the use of the Church of England; together with the Psalter or Psalms of David, pointed as they are to be said or sung in churches; and the form or manner of making, ordaining, and consecrating of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons,’ herein-before mentioned to be joined and annexed to this Act,—that is to say, the new book which they refer to,—and shall be applied, practised, and put in ure for the punishing of all offences contrary to the said laws, with relation to the book aforesaid, and no other.” They shall use that form. That is all that is said in the enacting part; and then they say that all existing good laws and statutes of the realm which are in use for the existing book shall be applied to this new book which they have now established. Then we refer to the statute of Elizabeth, which is incorporated by this section with the statute of Charles. The statute of Elizabeth, following in that respect the former statutes of Edward, says, “use the same things.” The enacting part of the third section of that Act is the same as the one of Charles, with the exception that the one of Charles left out the words “none other or otherwise,” which were contained in all the previous Acts of Uniformity. The statute of Charles does not use the words “none other or otherwise;” and, I think your Lordship will find, for a very sufficient reason. Then it says: “And that if any manner of parson, vicar, or other whatsoever minister that ought or should sing and say common prayer mentioned in the said book, or minister the sacraments, from and after the feast of St. John the Baptist aforesaid, refuse to use the said common prayer, or to minister the sacraments in such cathedral or parish church, or other places as he should use to minister the same, in such order and form as they be mentioned and set forth in the said book,—if he refuse to use it, that is a statutory offence,—or shall wilfully or obstinately (standing in the same) use any other rite, ceremony, order, form, or manner of celebrating of the Lord’s Supper openly or privily, or mattens, evensong, administration of the sacraments, or other open prayers as mentioned and set forth in the said book”——

(The Dean of the Arches.) What section is that of Elizabeth?

(Mr. James.) That is in the second section of Elizabeth. All the Acts of Uniformity were dealing with two classes of persons and two classes of things. One was persons who would not use that which was prescribed for them there, that is to say, who would do less than that; and as to them, they say you shall use that; and of course it is an ecclesiastical offence at Common Law if a person refuses to use it in order and form as therein directed. Then there is another class of persons, who might be innovating or introducing other rites or ceremonies, or using any other order, form, or manner; and with regard to those there are the two special provisions, the statutory provisions, one of which says if you refuse to use that which is prescribed for you, or if you use anything else, then you are liable to penalties. But then of course these are the offences; and it really is of the essence, as it seems to me, not only the form but the essence of justice, that you should do what is always laid down in common law cases; and in this particular case exactly the same rule ought more strictly to apply to offences under the Act of Uniformity, because your Lordship will recollect that in the Act this is provided also, that the party may be prosecuted either in this Court or in a Common Law Court; that is to say, the prosecutor has the option of prosecuting him either in the Common Law Court or in the Ecclesiastical Court; but then the proceeding in one is to be a bar to the proceeding in the other. Of course, therefore, it is absolutely essential that the offence should be charged in exactly the same way in both courts; for otherwise there would be a manifest defect of justice. If a person be prosecuted here without it being said that he has violated the statute, and then is prosecuted there for violating the statute, there would be no means of saying, this is the very offence for which I was charged and dealt with in the Ecclesiastical Court. Therefore, my Lord, I say that in this case the rule that is laid down in books of Criminal Law ought to be applied in exactly the same manner as it is applied there. If your Lordship will permit me, I will refer to a book in which it is very nicely summed up, Archbold's book on Criminal Pleading. I am reading from the eighth edition, the edition by a late Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas.

(Mr. James.) Jervis's edition, page 48. "Lastly, as to indictments for offences created by statute, the statute contains a definition of the offence; and the offence consists of the commission or omission of certain acts under certain circumstances, and in some cases with a particular intent. An indictment therefore for an offence against the statute must with certainty and precision charge the defendant to have committed or omitted the acts under the circumstances and with the intent mentioned in the statute; and if any one of these ingredients in the offence be omitted, the defendant may demur, move in arrest of judgment, or bring a writ of error. The defect will not be aided by verdict, nor will the conclusion 'contra formam statuti,' cure it." Then he gives several instances. Then "In an indictment upon the repealed statute of Elizabeth (which makes it high treason to elip round or file any of the coin of the realm 'for wicked lucre or gain's sake,') it was necessary to charge the offence to have been committed for the sake of wicked lucre or gain, otherwise it would be bad, 1 Hale, 220. So an indictment on that part of the Black Act (now repealed) which made it felony 'wilfully and maliciously' to shoot at any person in a dwelling house or other place, was holden bad, because it charged the offence to have been done 'unlawfully and maliciously,' and so on. Then there are a number of other instances given, showing this, and bearing out the proposition he has stated in the first instance,—that where the offence is created by statute the indictment for an offence against the statute must with certainty and precision charge the defendant to have committed or omitted the act under the circumstances and with the intent mentioned in the statute; and if any one of these ingredients be omitted, the defendant may demur, move in arrest of judgment, or bring a writ of error. And then, in conclusion, as to the whole law, which it may be material perhaps to read also, he says, "In conclusion, if all the ingredients of the offence, whether it be an offence at common law or one created by statute, be not set forth in the indictment, or if any of them be not stated with sufficient certainty, the defendant may in like manner demur, move in arrest of judgment, or bring a writ of error." My lord, there is a case which illustrates this, a case of prohibition from this Court, as to that latter proposition, — Francis v. Steward—in the 5th Adolphus & Ellis, New Series, page 984. "A citation stating only, as the matter of charge, that the party cited (a parishioner of G), wilfully and contumaciously obstructed, or at least refused to make or join or concur in the making of a sufficient rate for providing funds to defray the expense of the necessary repairs of the parish church, does not show an offence cognisable by the Ecclesiastical Court. To a citation as framed above, the parishioner appeared under protest. The Judge of "the Ecclesiastical Court overruled the protest, and ordered the party to appear absolutely. He thereupon declared in prohibition, setting forth the citation and the other proceedings. On demurrer to the declaration, held, that the declaration was good, the citation being insufficient to give jurisdiction. "And that the suit in prohibition was not premature." (The Dean of the Arches.) That had nothing to do with the statute.

(Mr. James.) No; that was as to the last part.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The case of Francis v. Steward is not a case of statutory offence, if I remember rightly, because it proceeded against the churchwardens for obstructing the making of a church rate.

(Mr. James.) For wilfully and contumaciously obstructing and—

(The Dean of the Arches.) There was a discrepancy, was there not, between the citation and the articles in that case?

(Mr. James.) No, I think not. I think I am quite right in giving it merely upon the citation. One of the points that was decided there was exactly that which your Lordship relieved me from pursuing. Your Lordship referred there to what had been determined in that case of Brecks v. Woolfry. It was said the right time would be before the articles were framed, because in fact if the citation does not mention the offence, it never can be cured by any subsequent proceedings.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What was the ground of prohibition in that case?

(Mr. James.) That the words "wilfully and maliciously obstructing" do not amount to a sufficient statement; that is to say, that all the facts ought to have been alleged, showing that the legal offence was constituted. I think it is very important, and perhaps I had better read it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I have another copy of the book, which I will hand to your Lordship, if you will look at it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Was it a declaration of prohibition?

(Mr. James.) A declaration of prohibition, my Lord. It is in page 995. Lord Denman gives the judgment of the Court:—"No question was made whether a citation must not contain the charge of an ecclesiastical offence. In the ancient constitutions a remedy is applied to many abuses of process by citing persons out of the jurisdiction wherein they reside, and finally the Act of Henry VIII. (commonly called the Bill of Citations) was passed to prevent this great and frequent oppression, whereby persons often found themselves excommunicated and ruined without notice of the proceedings against them. But it is constantly assumed that they set forth on the face of them a spiritual offence. Many such offences were well known by their proper descriptions; heresy, incontinence, brawling, subtraction of the various kinds of ecclesiastical dues, &c. It was not urged that there can be no offence where the acts charged are incapable of technical designation, but that, if the offence consist of special circumstances, these should appear on the citation; not unlike the proceedings of our own courts, where writs were provided in common form for known causes of action, but an action on the case might be founded on special facts, converting what might have been innocent in itself into an injury to the party complaining, and a writ was framed for the occasion. The Solicitor General maintained that the words of charge which I have just read from the citation impute a spiritual offence. Not denying the right of every parishioner to refuse to make or join or concur in making a church rate, nor even the right to vote against the imposition of a rate, he still urged that to do either 'wilfully or contumaciously,' is a spiritual offence, and that the wilfulness and mode of refusing, and the accompanying acts, inferring that contumacy which thus became the essence of it, need not be farther particularised in the citation, but may be “introduced for the first time to the knowledge of the accused as evidence in support of the charge. In the proceedings of any court, where an accusation is preferred, the minimum of allegation is the maximum required in proof.” I shall ask your Lordship’s attention to that, “The minimum of allegation is the maximum required in proof: the prosecutor in several counts (as the charges in the præsertim are called by learned ecclesiastical Judges) must be entitled to succeed if he establish any one of them, and, consequently, if this citation is good, the present plaintiff will incur spiritual censures, though convicted of no other fact than that of a refusal to join in making a church rate. We are by no means satisfied that the refusal to join in making a church rate can be an offence in a parishioner,” and so on. Then it goes on in the next page:—“But, farther, the sufficiency of this charge in its more cogent terms, that the plaintiff wilfully obstructed the making of a church rate, may well be questioned. It might be the duty of a parishioner wilfully to obstruct it. A parish meeting being convened to consider of granting such a rate, (though even that is not stated in the present citation), the parishioners go to the meeting to take part in its deliberations and exercise their judgment on the question raised. Must they not exercise it with freedom?” Then he deals with that. “There is an answer indeed to this and every other objection, which sweeps them all away. The acts of the plaintiff denounced in the citation are therein alleged to have been both wilfully and contumaciously done. Now the first of these two words adds nothing to the charge of refusing; all refusal is wilful. It may be doubtless a word of great force when connected with acts of obstruction, for these may be unconsciously done by a person ignorant of their tendency, and can never be criminal without the knowledge of it. Can then a wilful refusal, possibly an act of duty and perfectly innocent, be transmuted, by the mere addition of a reproachful term, into a crime? It conveys no idea to the hearer’s mind but that the speaker disapproves or resents the conduct to which he applies it; he may perhaps deem that conduct in itself contumacious, or may consider it as deserving the epithet from other facts antecedent or contemporaneous. Can anything be more easy than to describe these facts, or more dangerous than to treat another as a criminal, without informing him how he is supposed to have become so? Our own forms of indictment and declaration have been constantly held defective, where, the facts averred falling short of the legal definition, an attempt has been made to eke it out by adverbs, either vituperative or commendatory. The courts refuse to infer guilt from them on the one hand, or a due course of legal proceeding within lawful jurisdiction on the other. Nor is this strictness imposed by technical rules, it grows out of the first principles of justice.” Now, my Lord, I ask you how is it in this case that the charge is alleged in the original citation? How is it in any way alleged? Where is the allegation, which I say is necessary to constitute the offence? Where is the allegation that Mr. Mackonochie has not said and used (those are the words) the Prayer Book in order and form?

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is your objection, that it is not stated in the decree. We will say it is the citation, because the citation takes the form of a decree.

(Mr. James.) It is the same thing.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is not stated in the decree that Mr. Mackonochie omitted—what are your words?

(Mr. James.) That Mr. Mackonochie did not use and say the Book of Common Prayer in order and form. That is the first provision. That is what I say is the substance of the statute. Then that it does not, following the statute of Elizabeth, which is the only other statute, say that he being the minister there refused to use that form. The words there are “refused to use the common prayer, or minister the sacraments.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not know that I catch your objection rightly. As I understand it, it is not that there is a discrepancy between the decree and the articles, but that the decree does not found the jurisdiction of the Court.

(Mr. James.) That is what I mean. I am not come to the articles yet; I am now upon the original charge.

(The Dean of the Arches.) At present your argument is that the decree or citation does not contain in it a sufficient statement of an ecclesiastical offence.

(Mr. James.) Of a statutory offence, which, as I say, is the only offence that can be charged here. That it does not, either in words or substance, follow any sections either of the statute of Charles or of the statute of Elizabeth, which alone constitute the statutory offences. I think your Lordship has caught the proposition which I mean to bring forward.

(The Dean of the Arches.) As I understand you, you are not at present on the question whether the articles are bad, because there are material discrepancies between them and the decree; but you are upon the proposition that the decree does not set out, with due particularity, the ecclesiastical offence.

(Mr. James.) What I say is this, that if this had been an indictment at Common Law, it would be clearly bad, under this very statute, for this very offence; that there is no distinction between this Court and a Common Law Court in that respect in the certainty with which the statutory offences ought to be alleged; that there is not that certainty that there ought to be.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Mr. James, you have applied for a prohibition in this case, have you not?

(Mr. James.) Yes, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Was this matter urged?

(Mr. James.) I will tell your Lordship what occurred. Very few words indeed were said upon any part of it; and my Lord Chief Justice Cockburn and Mr. Justice Lush, who were there, said they thought the matter was an ecclesiastical matter, and did not hear those objections which I suggested I was going to take; for they were not argued at all, because their Lordships’ opinion was that this Court would be competent to deal with, and would deal with, every objection of the kind.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Have you got a bonâ fide report that I can look at to see what passed? Have you got the shorthand writers’ notes, upon which you can both agree?

(Mr. Stephens.) Here is a copy, my Lord, of the short-hand writers’ notes (handing it up).

(Mr. James.) It came to this, that the judge said that it would be for this Court to determine whether it was an ecclesiastical offence or not.

(Mr. Pridcaux.) That was all.

(Mr. James.) Really the matter dropped with that. They thought, of course, that every objection being open, as I submit it is, because I am now contending that your Lordship will deal with it exactly in the same way as a Court of Common Law would deal with it?—

(Mr. Pridcaux.) That certainly, my Lord, was all that was said. They thought it was for the Court to determine whether it was an ecclesiastical offence or not. The case was not argued, because my friend had such a strong point upon the other ground, and therefore he did not argue it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The case was not argued on the other side at all.

(Mr. Pridcaux.) Nor was it argued by Mr. James, because he felt so strong on the other ground.

(The Dean of the Arches.) All I meant to say was, that the prohibition was granted ex parte.

(Mr. James.) It was granted ex parte. I think the ground probably upon which the prohibition was not resisted, or at all events the ground upon which Mr. Stephens ultimately agreed, was, that if it were a decision by your Lordship’s Delegate, that would be a decision which would not be binding upon your Lordship, and there would still be an appeal to your Lordship, ex delicto judicis, upon that point.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I shall have a word, perhaps, to say upon that point in giving judgment. I will look at what Lord Chief Justice Cockburn says. You say:—"Every word of this charge would in point of law be made out by showing that he took it in order to give it to the communicants." Lord Chief Justice Cockburn.—No; because raising the cup would be necessary to the handing of it to the persons who are to partake of the wine it contains; but that is not what I understand is meant, or indeed what I think is the plain meaning of the charge. It is not that he elevated it to a sufficient degree to enable him to hand it to persons to partake of it, but that he elevated it in a manner not consistent with the old-established form of the Church of England. Really in substance we know what it means, that it is a departure from the established form in which the rites of the Church of England in that respect are administered."

(Mr. James.) I think it is due to myself to say that what took place is not to be considered as a decision of any kind, because I did not press the matter. I was going for a prohibition upon the other ground.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I agree that it cannot be considered as an argued case; a case decided ex parte cannot be considered as a decision. I do not understand, however, why the application was not made for the prohibition on the ground that the letter of request did not contain an ecclesiastical offence.

(Mr. James.) Well, my Lord, the fact is there is not the same jealousy now-a-days that there used to be of this Court, because, if there should be any miscarriage in this Court, or in any other Court, there is an appeal to probably the highest Court in the world. There is not the same jealousy with respect to the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court as there formerly was.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You seem to have taken an objection:—"Our case is this, that it ought to aver a departure from these things in terms." Lord Chief Justice Cockburn.—Surely that depends upon the procedure of that particular court, and is not for us. It depends upon what are the forms in which the charges are made in that court. Suppose that in doing what this reverend gentleman has done in elevating the cup to a greater degree, far beyond that which has been practised for many years in the ministry of the Church of England,—suppose that in using certain forms of prostration unknown to the simpler worship of the Church of England, but which he thinks proper to introduce, he is in point of fact departing from the directions of the Book of Common Prayer, and it is an offence according to the statute and cognisable by that particular court,—it may be that the form in which the offence is charged is not regular, such as could be fairly made the ground of exception; but that is something to be urged and heard before the court itself which has jurisdiction, and I think we ought not to interfere, at all events in the present state of the case."

(Mr. James.) I have not got the short-hand writer's notes here, but my memory is quite sufficient on that point. Their Lordships' opinion was this: "We shall not go into those objections; you had better argue them in the Court which has naturally jurisdiction over the case;" because, of course I take it any offence alleged against a clergyman in the performance of his clerical duty is a matter for this Court; that is to say, if a person used language in the pulpit, or in the ministration of the Church, which is improper; that is a matter for the jurisdiction of this Court; and then what the particular circumstances of the offence are, and what constitutes the offence, is a matter to be dealt with in this Court. And then this Court will consider whether the charge is stated in a manner that it ought to be.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say they did not consider it as being placed on the same footing as an indictment, or otherwise they would have taken cognizance of it.

(Mr. James.) They can hardly be said to have considered at all about it; but what they said was in substance this:—"You had better make the objections to the Court which has cognizance, which has seisin of the jurisdiction over the case; then you will see there what the thing is, and will know more about the procedure." I do not think it would be fair, even to the judges, or to the case at all, to suppose there was anything said which in the slightest degree amounted to deliberate and considered opinion. It was simply a conversation for a few minutes on the first day of term after we had all met at the Lord Chancellor's.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am quite ready to hear all that you have to urge upon this point.

(Mr. James.) I say it does not contain any description of the statutory offence. But let us see what it is that the Promoter does say. That he "elevated the paten during or after the prayer of consecration to a greater degree or otherwise than by merely taking the same into his hands as prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer, and to a greater degree than is necessary in order to conform to the requirements of such book, and by permitting and sanctioning such elevation, and by taking into his hands and elevating the cup during and after the prayer of consecration aforesaid, contrary to the said book, and by permitting and sanctioning such taking and elevating; and by bowing, kneeling, or prostrating"—or, in the disjunctive—"before the sacred elements"—mark the next words—"during or after the prayer of consecration." Of course as against the pleader one is entitled to take any one of these alternatives.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then you are reading the citation now?

(Mr. James.) Yes. "Kneeling or prostrating himself before the sacred elements during or after the prayer of consecration." Now it is quite consistent with that that he knelt after the prayer of consecration in the act of communicating himself. Of course, the minimum of allegation is the maximum of proof, according to the decision of this case, Grant v. Francis. Therefore, to sustain this charge as made here, all the evidence that would be required in regard to that part of it, is that he knelt in communicating after the prayer of consecration. Then, my Lord, going back now, "By elevating the cup during or after the prayer of consecration aforesaid, contrary to the Book of Common Prayer." Where is there anything in the Common Prayer about elevating the cup—elevating it contrary to the Book; the Book has said nothing about elevating. The allegation is, elevating the cup contrary to the Book of Common Prayer, and permitting and sanctioning such taking and elevating. Now, my Lord, is it possible to say that any offence whatever in any Court is created by permitting and sanctioning? What is meant by permitting and sanctioning? There is no statutory offence in that, it ought to say that it was done by his direction. A person may be doing it by himself, or he may be doing it by another, but how is permitting and sanctioning ever to be made an offence? You must show how he could have prevented it. What idea does the law apply to permitting and sanctioning? Is it any offence to permit and sanction?

(The Dean of the Arches.) Suppose an incumbent of a church, being present, allows another minister to do something which is contrary to the laws and ceremonies of the Church of England, is not that an ecclesiastical offence?

(Mr. James.) It is, "by permitting and sanctioning such elevation." "By taking into his hands and elevating the cup, and by permitting and sanctioning such taking and elevating." Of course there is always the remedy. If another minister does it, he himself would be liable.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No doubt; but is not the incumbent himself who permits directly or indirectly a violation of the Ecclesiastical Law to take place in his own church liable?

(Mr. James.) I find nothing about that. Of course it would be the two together. It ought to be charged in a manner to show that he was an abettor or party to it. But where is the offence? "It is elevating the cup contrary to the Book of Common Prayer." What is meant by that? The Book of Common Prayer does not say you are not to elevate it. I shall come to that presently when I come more into details as to facts; but the Book of Common Prayer does not say you are not to elevate it. What is said in the first one is that he has elevated the paten in the greater degree than otherwise, than by merely taking the same into his hands as prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is a general charge of offending against the laws ecclesiastical; not merely against the Act of Uniformity, but all the laws ecclesiastical.

(Mr. James.) But I say, my Lord, that there is no law ecclesiastical which touches it, except the statute law.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Well, but are you clear of that?

(Mr. James.) I venture to make the proposition that none of these things are offences at common law; that is to say, they are offences only created by the statute; and this Act of Uniformity is, as I understand, it put by my friend—

(The Dean of the Arches.) The Twenty-eighth Article says, "The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped."

(Mr. James.) I will come to that, my Lord, later. I am now dealing with the charge.

Then, my Lord, the next is, by "using lighted candles on the Communion table during the celebration of the Holy Communion, at the time when such lighted candles were not wanted for the purpose of giving light, and permitting and sanctioning such use of lighted candles." Now, assume for this purpose, that some use of lighted candles might be illegal, but where is there anything here which makes out any offence at all by "using lighted candles at times when lighted candles were not wanted for the purpose of giving light."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Assume, for the sake of argument, that it is the law of the Church of England, that it is unlawful to use candles on the altar or altar table, except when they are wanted for the purpose of giving light; would it not be an offence if they had been used thereupon?

(Mr. James.) Just consider what would be the proof required to make out this charge. The proof required to make out this charge might be this:—The candles might have been lighted entirely with another object. It might be a mere question of fact as to the greater or less degree of fog, or a greater or less degree of daylight, at the time when such lighted candles were used. You say that lighted candles were not wanted; that is to say, they might have been lighted not for the purpose of giving light. It is not alleged here that there was any intuitus or object for which they were lighted; that they were lighted for a ceremonial purpose, or for any symbolical purpose, or that they were lighted for anything whatever. It is the mere fact, which might be the most innocent thing in the world, that there were lighted candles de facto on the Communion table at the time when there was sufficient light to do without them.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You have pleaded that the candles were so lighted, not during the celebration of the Communion Service only, but also during the whole of the Pre-Communion Service.

(Mr. James.) I am coming to that, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is no dispute as to the facts.

(Mr. James.) No, my Lord, there is no dispute as to the facts. I am speaking as to the sufficiency of the charges. Supposing we demurred to this before putting in any plea at all, and say there is no sufficient charge there at all. And the same thing is true with regard to the incense, and to permitting and sanctioning such usage, and mixing the water with the wine used in the celebration of the Holy Communion.

(Mr. James.) I do not know about that; that might be sufficient, perhaps, but I say the others are not sufficiently alleged.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Because that is the whole question.

(Mr. James.) The others, I say, are not sufficiently alleged. Now, my Lord, I will proceed to deal with the mode in which these charges have been dealt with in the articles.

(The Dean of the Arches.) As I understand, your argument compressed into a sentence would be this, that none of the charges are sufficiently alleged except that which relates to the wine and water.

(Mr. James.) Precisely, except the wine and water. Now, my Lord, I will take the charge with respect to gestures and postures.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What article are you reading it from?

(Mr. James.) The third article, my Lord. I have to draw your Lordship's attention to this: that the third article is an entire departure, as it seems to me, from the original charge to the same effect; that is to say, that in the sense in which I put it, they have entirely altered the character and nature of the offence which was charged in the original charge.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say that it alters the offence contained in the decree?

(Mr. James.) Yes, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Now, Mr. James, show me how this is so? This was discussed, I know, before my predecessor.

(Mr. James.) Yes; the amendment was made afterwards, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I observe that the objection was taken before my predecessor in office, and it was overruled by him. Afterwards amendment took place, and the amendments of the articles were admitted without opposition.

(Mr. James.) I will tell your Lordship how it was.

(Mr. Stephens.) They were, my Lord, admitted without opposition.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have the greatest difficulty in seeing how I am to deal with this part of the case. I know that I myself took some of these objections, which you are now taking, before my predecessor, who overruled them; and there was no appeal from that; subsequently the articles were amended, and they were admitted as amended. It really would be quite contrary to the practice of this Court to enter into this now. If you press it I must hold that if that decision of my predecessor was wrong, it should have been appealed against.

(Mr. James.) I will not press anything, my Lord; but I asked leave to appeal, and it was refused.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then I beg your pardon, I remember it was refused. But under the Church Discipline Act, without the consent of the Judge there can be no appeal, and therefore it is evident that my predecessor thought it so clear that he would not allow the appeal to take place on that point. I really must tell you fairly, I think that question is closed against me. I do not think it is now competent to me to make any decision upon the question which you are now pressing upon me, namely, that the articles are at variance with the decree, after the history of the proceedings before me which I have in this case, and with the knowledge that the objection has already been taken and overruled.

(Mr. James.) My Lord, of course I submit at once to your Lordship's ruling upon that point.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I may be wrong, but you have a remedy upon that as upon any other wrong ruling. If you like to have a minute to that effect you may.

(Mr. James.) If your Lordship pleases.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That I refuse to hear the argument on this point, considering myself precluded by the decision of my predecessor, unless counsel on the other side wish to have it argued.

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly not. I only think it right to say that after the hearing before your Lordship's predecessor some amendments were made, but they were made by the consent of both parties, and therefore the articles were consented to.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That appears on the minutes.

(Mr. Stephens.) It does, my Lord; therefore the articles were consented to, as they now stand, by both parties.

(The Dean of the Arches.) So I consider it, Mr. Stephens. If I am wrong, I must take the effect of being wrong.

(Mr. James.) I only ask your Lordship for that minute. Of course the shorthand writer will take the minute if necessary.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I will have it properly drawn up, and you can both of you see it.

(Mr. James.) That your Lordship declines to go into any question of that sort. Of course that leaves open the question of the sufficiency of the articles themselves, because of course no question was argued, and there was no decision as to whether the thing itself constituted an offence within the law. I proceed, therefore, to take that part of my argument. I am dealing with what is called the elevation, and the prostration or kneeling. My Lord, upon that it seems to me that the whole of this charge with the intent must be taken together; it is all one charge, and I think it must have been intended to insinuate there was something in the nature of an adoration of consecrated elements.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Well now, Mr. James, I must say that I do not consider, as I told Mr. Stephens, that there is any charge of adoration of the elements, and I am not going to try that question on these articles. I think, if it was intended, it should have been a specific charge. I told Mr. Stephens so in the course of his argument.

(Mr. James.) That is precisely what I was going to say. Then there being no charge now of adoration, the question is where is there any offence in the mere elevating the cup, or the mere elevating the paten, there being no intuitus, no intention charged, nothing said about it in this way. It is not said, of course it could not have been said, this was elevated for the purpose of being worshipped by the crowd of worshippers, or that this was elevated in the sense in which the elevation of the host now takes place in a Roman Catholic church, where the elevation of the host is expressly done for the purpose of being adored by the priest, because it is in the Roman missal so commanded. The priest shall adore the elements, and then they are exhibited for the purpose of adoration by the surrounding crowd of worshippers. Now, apart from that, if there be no adoration, and no charge of their being intended to be adored, where is there anything whatever which makes this an offence? Because you must take it into your hand; there is no degree mentioned; you are to take the paten into your hand, you are to take the cup into your hand. In doing that, is this Court to say, "Well, now, you did it an inch too much, or a foot too much?" The way to test it is, what would be the language of the monition which the Court would hold.

(Mr. James.) The charge in the amended article is, elevating it above his head. I have a word to say upon that on another part of the case. But why above the head? Where is there any offence in that, unless it is said to be for the purpose of adoration, or unless it is put with some object, or some motive, or something which could be alleged to be done in violation of the laws of the Church? May it not be done quite innocently? Is there anything which says there is to be nothing in the nature of an oblation which is expressed in the Scotch book? There is nothing whatever which says that. And now, my Lord, this appears to me to be most conclusive with regard to the elevation. In the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., in the communion service, there are the words, "Without any elevation or showing the same." I think those are the words. I do not know whether your Lordship has found them.

(The Dean of the Arches.) "Then the priest, turning him to the altar, shall say or sing plainly the following prayers." "These words before rehearsed are to be said, turning still to the altar, without any elevation or showing of the sacrament to the people."

(Mr. James.) There being in the first Prayer Book a positive direction on this subject, it has been removed. In the second Prayer Book there were no manual acts at all.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say that this prohibition is omitted?

(Mr. James.) It is omitted. Of course the framers of the existing book of Common Prayer must have had the existing liturgies before them. There was the one of Elizabeth, and the two of Edward VI. They preferred in substance the first of Edward VI., containing the manual acts. I may say, indeed, that they preferred the sacramental character of the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., which is preserved in our Common Prayer Book; but these words, "without any elevation or showing of the sacrament to the people" are left out. And I think it has always been considered in these cases,—certainly in matters of doctrine it has been considered in very important cases indeed,—that the omission of something which was contained in a former book or a former liturgy does intimate the opinion of the framers of the subsequent book that that matter is left open.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It has been very much argued that the omission of the order for mixing the water with the wine being left out has the effect—

(Mr. James.) One is the omission of a prohibition, the other is the omission of a direction.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What I was saying, as far as it went, was rather in support of your argument.

(Mr. James.) Of course your Lordship is well aware of the very important cases in which the omission of an article has been considered. There was the case of the Essays and Reviews, in which the omission of an article upon a very important doctrine indeed was considered by the Privy Council to indicate the view of the framers of that article, that that question was left open. I say that what was done here has the same effect. It could not have been left out unintentionally. It was left out, I should say, for a good reason; for it was utterly impossible to comply with the requirements of the existing Prayer Book without some elevation, or some showing to the people. In fact, the very character of the communion in our Reformed Church requires that everything shall be done publicly and openly before the people, as distinguished from the secrecy with which the sacrifice was done according to the Roman Catholic missal. I refer, in proof of that, to the direction that the priest is to take the paten into his hand and to break the bread, and he is before directed to place it in such a way that he may break it before the people. Now, how is it possible that he could break it before the people unless he took it in his hands in such a way as to show it to the people. The people must see and hear everything that he does, because, according to the character of our services, the people are participants in everything that is done. The priest himself, beside filling his priestly office, is only a co-communicant with the others who are there; that being, in truth, one of the main distinctions between our service and the Roman service; that is, in the Roman service the priest may himself alone perform all the acts, and alone avail himself of the—I can hardly use the word “communion,” although it certainly would be communion between himself and the Body and Blood of our Blessed Saviour. But what the priest does alone for the people in the Roman service, here the priest is to do for and with the people, that is, to say, they are to be co-communicants; and in order that that may be done, everything is to be done openly in such a way that the bread may be broken, and that the cup may be elevated, and that everything may be done, in the sight of the people. Therefore, I say it is not merely an accidental and casual omission, but an omission based upon very good reason, having regard to the nature of the directions given in the existing Communion service. But, my Lord, I am aware that the 28th article, I think it is, is expressed and referred to as in some way affecting this question. Now, my Lord, my first answer to that is, that we really are not here upon any question of doctrine at all; we are upon a question of formal ritual; that the Articles are Articles of Religion; and if it was meant and intended to charge any heresy or any violation of that article upon the defendant, the same rule ought to be applied as was applied with regard to adoration, that is, it ought to be expressly charged. But, my Lord, what is the real meaning of that article?

(Mr. James.) In the last sentence all that it says, “The sacrament of the Lord’s Supper was not by Christ’s ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped.” That is, “By Christ’s ordinance it was not reserved,” &c. Nobody pretends or suggests that there was in the institution of the Lord’s Supper any ordinance on that subject, any more than any ordinance touching kneeling or other matters. It is said, it is not commanded by our Lord that it should be reserved, carried about, lifted up or worshipped, and therefore that that is not obligatory, because, if it were by Christ’s ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped, then, of course, it would not be free to anybody not so to deal with the sacrament. But this does not touch the manual act of elevation or showing to the people. But, in truth, I think, my Lord, if your Lordship looks at the whole, that, putting the same construction upon that section that you would put upon the commandment against idolatry, the substance of it all is, that it is not to be worshipped. It is not to be reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped; that is to say, it is not to be carried about or lifted up for the purpose of worship; using the same language that is used in the commandment, “Thou shalt not make any graven image,” which is not supposed to prevent the making of works of sculpture, but to mean, thou shalt not make any graven image to bow down to it or worship it. So here the intention was to prevent the Roman Catholic practice of reserving, carrying about, lifting up, and worshipping.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is not “lifted up and worshipped;” it is “lifted up or worshipped;” it is disjunctive.

(Mr. James.) There is the same disjunctive form in the commandment. You must construe it, I say, according to the intent of the whole. The previous part is, “Transubstantiation (or the change of the substance of bread and wine) in the Supper of the Lord cannot be proved by Holy Writ, but is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, overthroweth the nature of a sacrament, and hath given occasion to many superstitions. The body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten in the supper only after an heavenly and spiritual manner.” Then it avers, as a matter of doctrine, which Mr. Mackonochie is not charged in any way with having impugned, that the sacrament of the Lord’s Supper was not by the ordinance of our Lord, as we all know it was not, “reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped.”

My Lord, I pass now to the other part of the same charge, the kneeling or prostrating.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Before you pass away to that, have you anything to say upon your own plea, that it has been discontinued?

(Mr. James.) I beg your Lordship’s pardon, and am very much obliged to your Lordship for reminding me of what I had overlooked. I promised your Lordship to come to that. That appears to me a very material thing indeed. What we say in respect of that is this,—that we discontinued that before the suit.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Ever since the 30th of December is your plea; what you add is, “and long prior to the institution of the suit.”

(Mr. James.) Quite so, and we state the reasons. We were advised that that excessive lifting up, if I may use the term, above the head, was not right, and that we discontinued it to the knowledge of the promoter of this suit before the suit was commenced.

(The Dean of the Arches.) “Such elevation of the paten and cup has been wholly discontinued by the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie during the administration of the Holy Communion, ever since the said 30th day of December 1866, and long prior to the institution of this suit. That such practice was discontinued in consequence of legal advice, and in compliance with the expressed wish of the Lord Bishop of the diocese of London, and with a resolution of Convocation, as was well known to the promoter of this suit.”

(Mr. James.) That is our plea. And is this, my Lord, a thing which ought to have been the subject of a suit? Of course, the article is admitted; that was before this plea was put in. But now, I think, I may fairly draw your Lordship’s attention to this: that now there is a difference between the article and the original charge, which raises a very grave question of this kind. You see, a thing was discontinued, a particular mode of doing it was discontinued, in obedience to the wish of the Lord Bishop, and the Lord Bishop has not thought it right to make that any part of the charge which he has sent to this Court to be tried. Yet is a person to be admonished for that which he had discontinued before the suit was instituted, to the knowledge of the prosecutor, that being a mode which the Bishop was satisfied with, because it was discontinued in obedience to his wish?

(The Dean of the Arches.) The prosecution say it is discontinued under protest, which intimates the possibility of its being resumed.

(Mr. James.) There is nothing of that kind here. He says he discontinued it in obedience to that wish. It might be resumed if there were any change in the law. He says, I did not suppose it was wrong, and I do not suppose it is wrong now, but there being this opinion expressed by Convocation, I think it was.

(Mr. James.) He says: “There being all these opinions given against me I have at once submitted, and I announced to my congregation, in a paper which the prosecutor himself has thought fit to annex to the articles, I announced to all the world, and to my congregation particularly, that I have discontinued it,”—using this expression which Mr. Coleridge founded himself upon, that the oblation prescribed by the present Prayer Book is sufficient. Mr. Coleridge suggested that the use of that word “oblation” in that passage, itself indicates an intention to violate the law. I say it is not so. Mr. Mackonochie says, I am doing exactly what the Prayer Book prescribes, because in my judgment that is an oblation which ought to be made. Surely that is a matter upon which every minister of the Church is at liberty to form his own private judgment, as to whether the manual acts prescribed in the Prayer Book do or do not amount to an oblation. This is really what it comes to. He says: “All I meant before was to make a significant oblation, in the presence of the people, of the creatures of bread and wine that were now in some sense or other—I will not stop to consider in what sense—to be "the Body and Blood of our Lord; and that these were oblata, presented, offered up to the heavenly presence in the sacrament." He says, I consider that that is what is meant by what is described and prescribed in and by the Communion service; that will be sufficient for all purposes; it will satisfy my devotional feelings; it ought to satisfy the devotional feelings of you, my congregation. Can there be anything more innocent or more proper than that? Where is there any offence in a clergyman saying, I do that by way of oblation? Surely it would be a very strong thing to say that a clergyman may not entertain that opinion, may not entertain that idea, may not tell his parishioners that it is right and proper that the bread and wine should be considered as offered to our Lord or offered to the Divine Being Triune, in the administration of the sacrament. I cannot think it possible that any offence could be conceived to be created by such an oblation. He says, "That is all I mean to do; that is sufficient to explain it. As I understand it, the objection has been taken to the excessive elevating or the excessive lifting up as being likely to be confounded with purposes of adoration;—which it never was; I therefore discontinued it, in order to prevent that misconception, the other being sufficient to do, and all that I ever meant to do." My Lord, if that is so, where is the offence? Where is there any offence whatever? "I really have not meant any more than I believe to be signified by the words of the Prayer Book itself." I think, my Lord, that is all I have to say upon that point, which your Lordship was kind enough to remind me of.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I drew the attention of counsel on the other side to it, and therefore I thought it right to draw your attention to it also.

Now, my Lord, the next thing is as to the kneeling, or prostrating as it is called. Some observations were made upon the mode in which this responsive plea, as it is called, was filed. My friend says, "I do not know what is meant by saying, you did not kneel before the elements." There is no evidence that he did. Of course it was difficult to deal with a charge which appeared to insinuate, but did not directly allege the adoration; and therefore Mr. Mackonochie in his plea says, "I did not kneel or prostrate myself before the consecrated elements;" of course drawing the distinction, for the purpose of excluding the possible conclusion that, under the terms "kneeling before," was meant "kneeling to," which in truth I was obliged to correct one of my learned friends in, when he slipped it out in the course of his argument; "kneeling to" being obviously an act of adoration, and "kneeling before," strictly speaking only indicating the relative position of the person and the object. You may kneel before a chair, or a prie Dieu, or anything of that sort. Then what is it said that he did? It is said that he knelt. I do not think that your Lordship will think that is carried further by the evidence of Mr. Malin, because he, in answer to your Lordship's question what he meant by prostrating—for that is a strong term, and would really mean that he threw himself flat on the ground—says this. You ask him "When you use the term 'prostrate,' do you mean 'kneel'?" You used the expression 'kneel'; is that what you mean?—Yes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) As I understood his evidence, he was behind all the time, and could not exactly see the position of the body, but he thought there was an unusual bending of the body.

(Mr. James.) It comes to this: he was already kneeling, and he bowed his head. I do not know where you are to draw the line.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The argument is that he ought not to be kneeling at all at that time.

(Mr. James.) Now, my Lord, with regard to that, I want to draw your Lordship's attention to this: why is it illegal for the priest to express by kneeling the same reverence which every communicant expresses by kneeling? The law is precise upon that point. I remind your Lordship of the Declaration upon the kneeling: "Whereas it is ordained in this office for the administration of the Lord's Supper that the communicants shall receive the same kneeling (which order is well meant for a signification of our humble and grateful acknowledgments of the benefits of Christ therein given to all worthy receivers, and for the avoiding of such profanation and disorder in the Holy Communion as might otherwise ensue), yet, lest the same kneeling should by any persons, either out of ignorance and infirmity, or out of malice and obstinacy, be misconstrued and depraved, it is hereby declared, that hereby no adoration is intended or ought to be done either unto the sacramental bread or wine there bodily received, or unto any corporal presence of Christ's natural flesh and blood."

(The Dean of the Arches.) The word "corporal" there being substituted for the word "real" in the old Prayer Book.

(Mr. James.) Yes, a very striking alteration; that substitution being again very significant. And, following the same train of reasoning which I applied before, the substituting for the word "real" the word "corporal," I say it was for the purpose of making it clear that you may recognize there the real presence of Christ's Flesh and Blood. Then why is not the clergyman, the minister, the priest, why is he not to signify by kneeling the same humble and grateful acknowledgment of the benefits of Christ therein given to all worthy receivers as any other person? In truth, my Lord, I cannot understand what is the objection, setting apart altogether any insinuating of a charge of the adoration of the elements. Why is it that the priest is not to kneel? because you know one might consider it objectionable, in the view that my friends have taken of the matter, that the priest should hold himself out in his priestly character as something totally distinct from and superior to the people; I could understand their saying that it is a priestly act, and it is an assumption on your part that you do not kneel when the rest do kneel, that you stand because you are the sacrificing priest when all the rest are kneeling around you. That one could understand to be an objection taken by those who object to the peculiar sacerdotal character which is supposed to be claimed by some of the persons who take the same view as Mr. Mackonochie. Then I say that surely he may without offence kneel when the rest kneel.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Of course you do not dispute that the exact words of the rubric are, "when the priest standing before the table" hath so ordered the bread and wine, and so on, "he shall say the prayer of consecration as followeth."

(Mr. James.) Standing there means, I think, while he is arranging the bread and wine.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I want to hear your argument about that. In the rubric before, about pronouncing absolution it is, "Then shall the priest (or the bishop being present) stand up, and turning himself to the people, pronounce this absolution." There he is directly ordered to stand up, although in the next rubric, with relation to the standing, it only is "when the priest, standing before the table;" whilst before that, in the prayer before that, it is, "Then shall the priest, kneeling down at the Lord's table, say, in the name of all them that shall receive the communion, this prayer following." The next rubric to that is, "When the priest standing before the table," which of course implies that he has risen from his knees at that time, and is then standing before the table.

(Mr. James.) He must have done that, although there is no direction for it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Of course it is open to the argument that the word "standing" there is merely descriptive of his attitude in arranging the bread and wine.

(Mr. James.) I was coming to that. "When the "priest, standing before the table, hath so ordered the bread and wine,"—or "whon the priest hath, standing before the table, so ordered the bread and wine," if I may read it in that way,—that he may with the more readiness and decency break the bread before the people, and take the cup into his hands, he shall say the prayer of consecration." Now, of course the Court would not be astute to say that there was a violation of the rubric in a matter in which it did not find any ground whatever for imputing any offence that can be conceived—and I submit that it is impossible to conceive any offence occasioned—by kneeling during the prayer.

(The Dean of the Arches.) One thing is quite clear, that he must kneel before he receives the Holy Communion, and there is no instruction for his rising.

(Mr. James.) Was he to do that standing? There is no direction what he is to do afterwards.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then you know there is the rubric which would seem to imply that he was standing. He is to lay his hand upon all the bread, and upon every vessel containing the wine, and so on.

(Mr. James.) Just consider this, my Lord. Supposing you consider this as the same thing as bending the knee at the name of our Lord. At the name of our Lord, by the canon, everybody is ordered to bend the knee. Is there anything objectionable in bending the knee, or in doing due reverence when the consecration has made the elements in some sense (I will not discuss the theological question as to what sense)—but when the consecration has, beyond all question, in the view of every member of the Anglo-Catholic Church, made the consecrated elements something very different from the natural bread and wine which they were before. Therefore, he says, I now kneel to pay that reverence to that Real Presence,—I will not say subjective or objective, or in what sense, or how it is the Real Presence, but that it is the Real Presence is the belief of all of us; and then he says, I kneel in devout acknowledgment of that, and of the benefits which I have received through this great mystery. Surely, my Lord, it would be a sad thing for the Church of England, or for any Christian church, if it were to pronounce that such an act as that is a violation of a Christian minister's duty.

(Mr. James.) The congregation are kneeling at the time, and I would just ask your Lordship to say is it wrong for him to express the same reverence?

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think the argument is not that it is wrong in the abstract, but that there is a rubrical direction the other way.

(Mr. James.) I say the rubrical direction is not there, and that a thing which is so clearly not wrong in itself is not to be made, by a strained or exaggerated interpretation of a rubrical direction, wrong formally. Therefore I say that it is open to him to say by his attitude that which is said in the hymns, which are I believe more universally circulated than any hymns in the Christian church, at least in the Anglo-Catholic church,—“Hymns Ancient and Modern,”—in which every one of us is allowed to say, “Therefore we, before Him bending,

This great sacrament revere.”

And then in another we are allowed to say,

“Thee we adore, O hidden Saviour, Thee,
Who in thy sacrament dost deign to be.
Both flesh and spirit at thy presence fail,
Yet here thy presence we devoutly hail.”

That, I believe, is sung in every church or may be sung in every church in the kingdom, with the entire approbation, I should think, of every Bishop in the Church; and it is certainly sold and circulated under the authority of the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, without there being the slightest notion that there is anything wrong.

But, my Lord, it does not even stand there. With regard to that, I think I have shown you many reasons why this kneeling is not bad. But it is very curious that there should be in the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. this note, which seems to me to go to the root not only of that but of every part of the case: “There are certain notes” at page 397—

(The Dean of the Arches.) At the end of the first Prayer Book, is it?

The third of these notes is, “As touching kneeling, crossing, holding up of hands, knocking upon the breast, and other gestures, they may be used or left as every man's devotion serveth, without blame.” Now, my Lord, that is not a rubrical direction; it is “A note for the more plain explication and decent ministration of things contained in this book.” Now, this book was sanctioned by an Act of Uniformity of exactly the same kind as the present, and is open to all the criticism which my friend uses, that nothing is to be done except what is set out there, and that everything not expressly permitted is absolutely forbidden. But now, by way of comment upon that, by way of explication of what the meaning is, they say, “We have prescribed for you a form and order of prayer; we have prescribed for you a form and order of the administration of the sacraments; we have prescribed for you a form and order for the celebration of other rites and ceremonies; but in order that there may be no misunderstanding upon it, we do not by that mean that that has anything to do with gestures. As to kneeling, as to crossing, as to holding up of the hands, as to knocking upon the breast, and other gestures, they may be used or left as every man's devotion serveth, without blame.” Now, I say that that note continues applicable to every one of the subsequent Prayer Books, which are in pari materia; because it is not an exception from that Prayer Book; it is not in the nature of a rubrical provision; it is an authoritative comment by the framers of that book itself to this effect; that form, and order, and manner (the words were used as to that Prayer Book), had nothing whatever to do with postures and gestures. And if it had nothing to do with them, if postures and gestures were not hit at, and not affected by the first Prayer Book, how and in what way are they affected by the subsequent ones? And does not that throw great light upon the proposition of my friends, that everything not expressly permitted is prohibited?

(The Dean of the Arches.) The argument, as I understand it, was, everything not expressly permitted, or not necessarily subsidiary to something which is permitted. That, I think, is Mr. Stephens's argument.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord.

(Mr. James.) Necessarily subsidiary! I venture to say, these postures and gestures are not permitted by the book. This is a note. They are not necessarily subsidiary to anything; and the comment is this, “We do not touch them, we leave them to every man's devotion.”

Now, upon that, let me ask your Lordship's attention for a little to the construction of the Act of Uniformity.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Perhaps you would like to retire now for a short time.

(Mr. James.) My Lord, I was proceeding to ask your Lordship's attention to what I think material to consider, namely, what is the meaning of the words “rite” and “ceremony,” as used in the Acts of Uniformity. Now, I apprehend, if you look carefully through the whole of the Acts, it will be quite clear that the word “ceremony” in those Acts does not mean a ceremonial act, but that it is a rite or ceremony —something in the nature of but less solemn than the sacrament; and the title of the book itself strongly shows that. It is the “Book of Common Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church.” That is to say, a rite being, as I understand it, a thing such as the marriage rite, funeral rites; or a ceremony, such as confirmation, visitation of the sick, and various other things which are found in the book of Common Prayer, and that which really forms what is meant by “other rites and ceremonies.” Therefore I say where the statute says that you are to sing or say the Common Prayer, and to minister the sacrament and other services in such order and form, and when it goes on to say that you shall not use any other rite, ceremony, order, or form, it means really any other service.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Your contention is, then, that ceremony means a service, and a rite means the same thing.

(Mr. James.) I say, a ceremony means a service, and a rite means the same thing; and therefore, my Lord, I say, that gestures and postures, and things of that kind, do not mean or come within the term of “rite or ceremony,” nor does anything in the nature of an ornament, nor the other things to which I shall have to refer your Lordship.

I have had a note given to me (I am not quite sure whether I can put my hand upon it, but I dare say somebody will help me if I cannot) of an expression in the Proclamation Act of Edward VI., on 6th February 1548. It was in consequence of some rebellion.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the year before the Prayer Book?

(Mr. James.) Yes. The expression I wanted to refer you to was, “Ceremonies commonly used and frequented in the Church of England.” I see it was cited by my friend Mr. Stephens. “That no manner of person, of what estate, order, or degree soever he be, should, of his private mind, will, or fantasy, do, omit, leave done, change, alter or innovate any order, rite, or ceremony commonly used and frequented in the Church of England.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) How do you understand the word “frequented” there?

(Mr. James.) By “frequented” I understand to be implied a service, and I say that all those words necessarily imply a service to which persons resort. It bears out what I said before, that ceremony is a thing in the nature of the sacramental service, but of course very much less high, if I may so speak, in its character; and I say that that also is what is meant in the whole of this Act of Parliament with regard to using or not using any rite or ceremony.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And that was the year before the Prayer Book?

(Mr. James.) The year before the Prayer Book. Perhaps it is not inconvenient that I should make an observation here, which I must make sooner or later, namely, that really all these Injunctions, the Proclamation, the first Prayer Book, and all these matters, must be considered as contemporary. They were all done during the minority of Edward, and under the rule of the same ecclesiastical persons. I believe Cranmer must be considered as the author of them all; they were all in course of doing at the same time. The Prayer Book must have been prepared long before it was annexed to the Act of Parliament, and the Prayer Book, the Injunctions, and this Proclamation, are all of them. I should say, the product of the same workshop, coming out, as they may have come out, one a day or two later than the other, but all of them made at the same time, by the same artificers, with the same object, and with the same state of opinion as to the Reformation and as to the Catholic Church. But, passing from that,—I merely put it in as a parenthesis,—I say, these Acts do not touch gestures or postures, any more than they touch tones of voice. As I understand the exact meaning of it, it is this: all that is prescribed is, that you should use the very words in the very order and form, and that you should do all the acts prescribed in the form prescribed; that collateral incidents, collateral acts, gestures, postures, and things of that kind, do not come within any of those descriptions; if they are to be complained of, they must be complained of under the second part of the Act, that is, the introducing of a new rite or a new order. If it is not so considered, if my friends are right in their contention that everything which is not expressly authorized is forbidden in the Church, now I ask your Lordship to consider to what an extent the Sovereign and all the Church have been guilty of illegal acts from the time of Elizabeth’s Prayer Book to the present time. I mean in respect of these very services. It is a very strong thing to suppose, but just let us look at it in this way—just consider this—where is their authority for the canon of 1604, which directs the Bidding Prayer to be used? You know if the Act of Elizabeth was then in force, and if the Act of Elizabeth was such that nothing whatever could be introduced in any way beyond the limit laid down by my friend, where on earth did the Convocation get its authority to direct the Bidding Prayer; where did it get its authority to direct bending the knee at the name of Jesus; where did the Sovereign ever get authority to direct all the occasional services to be used?

(Mr. James.) I think not, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not say it is, but it is worth your while to consider that question. I allude to the rubric, which says that nothing is to be done except as commanded by the King or the Ordinary of the place.

(Mr. James.) No notice, or brief, or citation is to be given out; I think that is it; I do not think it relates to services.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I only mean to say it is worth your while to consider it. I think it is after the Nicene Creed in the communion service. “Then the curate shall declare unto the people what holy days or fasting days are in the week following to be observed. And then also (if occasion be) shall notice be given of the communion; and briefs, citations, and excommunications read. And nothing shall be proclaimed or published in the church, during the time of divine service, but by the minister, nor by him anything but what is prescribed by the rules of this Book, or enjoined by the Queen or by the ordinary of the place.” Now what does that point to? It certainly points to this, that something may be prescribed by the Crown and the Ordinary of the place, which is not in the Prayer Book.

(Mr. James.) Yes, but it is not a service. It is quite clear it refers to notices, briefs, and citations.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think that which I have referred to has nothing to do with briefs and citations. It is the latter part. You know that difficulty has been removed by Act of Parliament, but what I am referring to is this. “Nothing shall be proclaimed or published in the church, during the time of divine service, but by the minister, nor by him anything but what is prescribed in the rules of this Book, or enjoined by the Queen, or by the ordinary of the place.”

(Mr. James.) My observation on that, I think is conclusive and satisfactory, that “proclaiming” and “publishing,” are words utterly inapplicable to the performance of divine service. I am very glad your Lordship has drawn my attention to it, because I think it shows at once how utterly inapplicable those terms are to such a subject matter.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Again, what do you say to the prayers for fasting?

(Mr. James.) I say they stand in exactly the same position, they are open to exactly the same objection. And the most striking case of all is this: considering this Act of Parliament was passed in the reign of Charles II., if my friend’s contention is right, the service for Charles the Martyr was wholly illegal, and has been illegally used from that time down to its abolition. I hear my friend say, "No doubt." I think I caught that exclamation; and of course it must be so, if his argument is good for anything; everything of this kind must be illegal.

(Mr. Stephens.) I was only speaking to my learned friend who is with me.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Are you satisfied that the service for Charles the Martyr was not in the book which was appended to the Act of Uniformity?

(Mr. James.) I think not, my Lord. It is one of those services which have been lately omitted by order of the Queen.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I was only thinking whether it was not appended to the Act of Uniformity.

(Mr. Stephens.) As a matter of fact it was not. It is not in the sealed book.

(Mr. James.) Nor were any of the occasional services.

(Mr. Stephens.) No, my Lord; and I think you will find a note in my edition of the English Book of Common Prayer on the subject.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then your observation, Mr. James, would apply to gunpowder treason?

(Mr. James.) To gunpowder treason and plot, and every service of that kind. Of course you will recollect that all these have been lately discontinued, except the service for the Queen's Accession.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes; these occasional services must have been introduced either under the notion of the general authority of the Crown as Ordinary; or under the authority of the rubric to which I have called your attention.

(Mr. James.) Well, I do not know, but I think it explains Sparke's case entirely; it is entirely consistent with that, and I think Parliament has so understood it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You mean the alias preces case.

(Mr. James.) Yes, I think it clear that the alias preces were never illegal unless you bring them within that clause "obstinately standing in the same."

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am not expressing any opinion. But just see what the consequence of that would be. Would it not be rather serious? You might have another service read in the church besides the services for morning and evening prayer, provided those services were read. You might have a service inserted between the two.

(Mr. James.) Provided that service did not come within the description I have named, namely, "wilfully and obstinately standing in the same, shall use any order, rite, or ceremony."

(The Dean of the Arches.) How would you interpret that?

(Mr. James.) In this way: it must be done perversely, and with the intention to defeat the purpose of the Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Suppose the clergyman between the two services reads a Socinian or a Roman service?

(Mr. James.) In that case you would produce the service, and say, it is inconsistent with the doctrines of the Church. Of course anything of that sort would be by necessary implication forbidden.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Suppose he used a service composed out of his own Prayer Book, or from the writings of the divines of the Church of England?

(Mr. James.) I think if you could make out that he was wilfully and obstinately standing in the same, you could bring him within the clause.

(The Dean of the Arches.) All I meant to point out is this, that it would very much destroy the effect of the Acts of Uniformity; would it not?

(Mr. James.) Well, but I want to know where the authority is for saying that nothing can be done but what is specified in the Prayer Book. I am merely dealing with that proposition of my friends.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And you say, that all those matters which you have mentioned, the bidding prayer, the fasting prayer, and the occasional services, would, in that view of the case, be illegal.

(Mr. James.) Yes; and I say the Prayer Book has not laid down a rule so absolutely strict as my friend has endeavoured to make it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then there are the hymns, which are a much more striking instance.

(Mr. James.) As your Lordship observed, there are the hymns, which form a much more striking illustration of my argument, and which are used in every church in the country.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The argument, according to your version of it, would stand the same; the consequence of your opponent's argument would be, that all these things are illegal.

(Mr. James.) Precisely; that all things of this kind are and have been illegal. Then I ask your Lordship just to see the sort of charges that could be brought against every clergyman of the Church of England in exactly the same way as this charge is made here. It might be said, you used a hymn, you used a prayer before the sermon, you used a prayer after the sermon, you dismissed the congregation with a voluntary on the organ. The argument would be equally good against every clergyman whose practices we are familiar with.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The lawfulness of the bidding prayer would seem to me to be recognized in that case you read to me about the alias preces.

(Mr. James.) Yes, because "other prayers" were allowed. But I say it bears out my argument that you must have a direct charge that the person has not used the Common Prayer Book, in order to bring home the case against him.

Now, my Lord, my proposition is the very converse of that which my friend contends for. My friend says that everything not expressly permitted, or by necessary implication permitted (for I suppose it would come to that), is prohibited. My proposition is that everything not expressly or by necessary implication prohibited, and which was ever lawful in the Church of England, has continued to be and is lawful at this day.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is a very important proposition; I must write it down.

(Mr. James.) No doubt, my Lord, it is an important proposition.

(Mr. Stephens.) May I ask your Lordship just to give me a copy of your Lordship's note on that proposition?

(The Dean of the Arches.) I will read it to you. "Everything not expressly or by implication prohibited, that was ever lawful in the Church of England, has continued to be, and is, lawful at this day."

(Mr. James.) Of course, if a service is altered, everything must be altered in accordance with it. If a service is abolished or excluded, of course everything connected with that service must be excluded too; everything of that kind would follow. But it seems to me that proposition of mine flows at once from the fact, which I take it nobody will deny, that the Church of England is not Protestant in the sense used by some persons; it is not a church founded either by Luther or Calvin, or by Tudor or Stuart; but is, as we believe, a branch of the Catholic Apostolic Church, which, at the time of the Reformation, was reformed only to the extent of being relieved from the stains and impurities which it had contracted during its passage through Mediæval times. Therefore it was then, is still now, the Catholic Church, or at least a branch of the Catholic Church; and as such, whatsoever was lawful in the Catholic Church is, as I submit, lawful still, except so far as (as I before said) it is abolished expressly or by necessary implication.

(The Dean of the Arches.) In the preface to the Prayer Book you will find this: "and therefore of the sundry alterations proposed unto us, we have rejected all such as were either of dangerous consequence as secretly striking at some established doctrine or laudable practice of the Church of England, "or indeed of the whole Catholic Church of Christ, or else of no consequence at all."

(Mr. James.) Just so. It is that which they have rejected. Of course any ceremony that was left out is illegal, and everything connected with that ceremony, such as creeping to the cross, ashes on Ash Wednesday, palms on Palm Sunday, and various matters of that kind, which are services left out, are, by necessary implication, forbidden. But I say gestures, postures, decorations, and things of that kind, remain exactly as they were, because they are not forbidden. They are not by implication forbidden, unless you can show they are inconsistent either with the doctrine or ritual in some way or the other.

(Mr. James.) Unless they are inconsistent with the doctrine or the ritual. Of course, if there is anything inconsistent with the doctrine or the ritual, it is by necessary implication forbidden. But if the ritual can stand, those other matters will stand with it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And the formularies of the Church of England.

(Mr. James.) Of course, my Lord. I use the word "ritual" as a generic term, including the formularies and ritual of the Church of England. I say, if it can stand with it, then it is not forbidden, either expressly or by implication. That is my answer to the general proposition of my learned friend, with which I am dealing now.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Upon that very important proposition, could you, in the course of your argument, make it convenient,—or those who are with you—to consider what bearing that rubric would have, which Mr. Stephens referred to, namely, that if any person "doubt, or take anything diversely, he shall always resort to the bishop of the diocese."

(Mr. James.) I will refer to that presently.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Perhaps it will be more convenient for Mr. Prideaux to deal with that. I do not wish to interrupt your argument. It seemed to me to grow out of your argument to a certain extent. Has that rubric really any definite sphere of action (if I may use the expression) now at all, or does it merely mean that there must be proceedings in a Consistorial Court; or does it mean there are certain things, which in themselves are neither lawful or unlawful, but with respect to which the discretion of the ordinary may be exercised?

(Mr. James.) I was going to suggest the latter view as the true view. And it seems to me that that clause which Mr. Stephens dwelt upon at some length really militated against his argument,—I noted it at the time,—and makes very much for the view I venture to present to your Lordship; because if you can sustain the view of my friend, you have got there a strict rule from which you cannot deviate a hair's breadth, either in words, or postures, or gestures. Why then was it that any provision was made in the first preface that in case any doubt should arise, the Ordinary should be consulted; and more than that, that if the Ordinary doubted, you should appeal to the archbishop?

(The Dean of the Arches.) The rubric is certainly very remarkable in its language: very remarkable.

(Mr. James.) If the Ordinary doubted, then you shall apply to the Archbishop. That, of course, indicates that you are not introducing a new system,—at least that is the conclusion I am drawing from it,—your Lordship will judge whether that is the logical conclusion or not,—that it was not an entirely new system from beginning to end which was introduced by the Act of Uniformity, but the Act of Uniformity was made to produce a uniformity in essentials, in rites and ceremonies, amongst a class of persons who already had established practices and usages.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are aware that there is a habit of applying to the Court for a faculty in certain cases. Now that is neither more nor less than an application to the Ordinary for his licence to have some ornament not authorized by the rubric. Take the case of an organ, painted windows, and so on. I am only throwing out this for your consideration. Perhaps it may be, that the rubric is satisfied by that construction of it.

(Mr. James.) I doubt whether that could be. If he doubts, he is to go—

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think you will find no satisfactory construction has been ever put upon that rubric yet.

(Mr. James.) It is very difficult, unless you had got a judicial exposition of it, of course, to understand that; and for the understanding of the whole question, it is very important that you should, if possible, put yourself in the place of a priest in the time of Edward VI. Now just conceive yourself, then, accustomed to certain usages and certain practices, and the congregation all accustomed to them, and you receive this order; would you not say, "I see certain things are abolished; I will use the form; but there are other things which are not touched, and I do not see any reason why I should not go on exactly as I have done before as to gestures and postures, and things of that kind."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then you would say, if that rubric is to hold good that it would be competent for the Ordinary to forbid or allow them.

(Mr. James.) Well, I think it was rather to satisfy the conscience of a doubting clergyman; because I doubt whether the Ordinary would have any authority except in his own Court.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is extremely important, and that is the point I wish to draw your attention to. There are two views of that. One is, that the authority there spoken of is one which must be exercised through his Court, as the Queen's authority is exercised through her Courts of Justice at Westminster Hall. That is one view of it. Another view of it is, that it relates to the personal authority of the Ordinary in matters in themselves not prescribed by statute or custom, and it would be to me a very great satisfaction to have that discussed in any part of this case.

(Mr. James.) I have the words before me: "And forasmuch as nothing can be so plainly set forth, but doubts may arise in the use and practice of the same; to appease all such diversity (if any arise), and for the resolution of all doubts concerning the manner how to understand, do, and execute the things contained in this book, the parties that so doubt or diversely take anything shall always resort to the bishop of the diocese, who by his discretion—not by his judicial authority—who by his discretion shall take order for the quieting and appeasing of the same, so that the same order be not contrary to anything contained in this Book. And if the bishop of the diocese be in doubt, then he may send for the resolution thereof to the archbishop."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Take the case of the stone altar. Supposing, instead of proceeding in the Consistorial Court of Ely, and afterwards to the Arches Court, and then to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, they had gone to the bishop, and said, "We have doubts whether this is right or not," could the bishop have decided that?

(Mr. James.) I think so, my Lord; because it is "so that the same be not contrary to the order contained in this book." And I think the ground of the decision there (if I recollect rightly) was, that it was inconsistent with the fact that it ought to be a moveable table,—that a stone altar was inconsistent with the fact that it should be a moveable table.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That was one of the grounds, no doubt; but another ground was with respect to the Injunctions to which I have before referred. However, I do not wish to interrupt your argument.

(Mr. James.) Now, my Lord, I pass on to the question of the lighted candles. I understand that what we are charged with here as a violation of the ritual is that we are using some rite, or some ceremony that is unauthorized. That is the only thing charged.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes; that is what I understand the charge to be: that the lighting the candles at the time of the Communion service is an additional rite.

(Mr. James.) Yes. But it is not charged here that we light them as a part of the service; it is a light on the table. Now, it appears to me, with all respect to your Lordship, you might as well call it murder, or manslaughter, or treason, as to say that it is unlawful ritual. It may be an unauthorized decoration, but that would be the subject of another proceeding, as it was in the St. Barnabas case; but how does it affect the order, or manner, or form of my addressing your Lordship, whether the two lights now before you are present there or absent?

(The Dean of the Arches.) But surely you must take into consideration the practice with regard to the Holy Communion which it was intended should be discontinued. You must look at the previous history of how the Holy Communion was celebrated.

(Mr. James.) Yes, my Lord, I am coming to that; but there is no charge of that sort here.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The charge is that it is unlawful to have lighted candles on the altar.

(Mr. James.) The charge is that there are lighted candles there.

(The Dean of the Arches.) We had better look at the exact words of the charge.

(Mr. James.) The charge is that we used lighted candles when they were not wanted.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That you used "lighted candles on the communion table during the celebration of the Holy Communion at times when such lighted candles were not wanted for the purpose of giving light." You must take it altogether. It is not merely the using lighted candles, but it is using them on the communion table during the service.

(Mr. James.) During the celebration of the Holy Communion.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The argument is that all lighted candles are forbidden. As I understood the argument of Mr. Stephens, it was this: This lighting of candles belongs to a superstitious ceremony which it was the object of the Prayer Book to do away with; and that, having regard to the time when the candles are lighted, and the place where they are put, it is an additional rite or ceremony not authorized by the Prayer Book.

(Mr. James.) I venture to say it is not an additional rite. It may be an unauthorized decoration; it may be an unauthorized ornament; but it is not an unauthorized rite unless it is expressly charged to be introduced for that purpose. Here it is essential that the inventus should be charged in order to make the offence. It should be charged that the candles were lighted with intent that the same should be an additional ceremony, or an addition to the ceremonial, sanctioned by the Prayer Book. But upon that I say it is not within the terms of the Act of Parliament; that the administration of the sacrament is exactly the same in all respects, whether it is by candle light, whether the candles are there lighted early in the morning before it is light, or whether the candles happen to be there when there is sufficient light to see,—in fact, when they are not wanted. There may be other grounds, but those grounds are not the subject of the charges or allegations in this case. That is the way the candles were in question in the St. Barnabas case.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You know the learned Judge sitting in the Consistory Court decided they were not lawful.

(Mr. James.) Of course I am not going to leave that part of the case upon this meagre argument.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I thought you were going to another point.

(Mr. James.) Let us see exactly what is done with regard to these lighted candles. Your Lordship has got this, that they are not lighted during the consecration prayer only. They are already on the table before any part of the Communion Service begins. The minister does nothing whatever; the candles are on the table just as they might be anywhere else; just as they might be on the credence table or any other place you like to suppose. They are on the table before the service begins; and therefore it cannot be pretended or suggested that it is the introduction of an additional ceremonial act during the currency, if I may use the term, of the consecration prayer or of the Communion service. Dividing what is ordinarily called "the Communion service," into three parts, you have the Pre-Communion service, the sermon, and that part which is actually used for the Communion, which I take to be the only part which can strictly be called the Communion, that is to say, when the communicants alone are in the church, and the consecration takes place, and the distribution of the elements is made. But your Lordship sees the candles are lighted before the beginning of the service, and during the whole of the first part,—during the whole of the Commandments and the prayer for the Queen; and so they are lighted during the sermon, and they simply remain lighted during the consecration and the administration of the sacrament as they were lighted at and from the beginning of the service. Therefore it is plain they are not lighted for the purpose of any additional symbolical object at the time of the consecration, or for the purpose of consecration, but remain there innocently, as we say, and in obedience—

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you say they are not lighted for any symbolical purpose?

(Mr. James.) I say they are not lighted for any symbolical purpose connected with the act of consecration, nor done at that moment. The symbol I shall have to refer to when I refer to the Injunction of Edward VI. But what I say is this, that there is no interruption of the service, there is no break, there is no act by which it is connected with what might be called any Romish doctrine of the mass, or with any adoration of the sacrament, or anything of that kind.

Then let us see how it came to arise. Now, my Lord, beyond all question there was at one time lawful authority in the Church of England for the use of these lighted candles; that is to say, there were two lighted candles directed to be used, not by Edward the Sixth's Injunctions for the first time, but directed to be used by earlier Constitutions, and, amongst others, by Archbishop Reynold's Constitutions; and if you refer to Archbishop Reynold's Constitutions, which of course you must do to get at the foundation of it, it is quite manifest that these were not lighted or kept alight for the purpose suggested by my friend Mr. Coleridge, that is to say, for the purpose of being kept before the reserved sacrament.

(Mr. James.) It is all referred to in the report of Liddell v. Westerton.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I wanted to see it in Lynwode. I know exactly where it is, and can lay my hand upon it directly.

(Mr. James.) The words of the Constitution of Archbishop Reynolds are these: The candles are to be lighted "tempore quo missarum sollemnia peraguntur accendantur duæ candela vel ad minus una." That is to say, they were to be lighted during the ceremony of the mass, and not to be used as a light before the pyx in which the reserved sacrament was kept; but there were two candles which were to be lighted, not one light, which I believe is the universal practice with regard to the light before the reserved sacrament of the Roman Church. It was two lights, to be lighted during the performance of the mass. Now that is the way in which it stood before the Injunctions; and let us see what were those Injunctions of Edward VI.,—Injunctions which, I think, you will find—of course there may be a question as to the extent of their validity—but Injunctions which I think you will find are as full of Protestantism, are as full of the reforming spirit, as it was possible for anything to be. You read through the whole of them the strongest vituperation of Rome and Romish practices, of superstitious uses, and superstitious things that were done; and all those things were put down with a strong hand, in which I think one might trace the strong hand of Cramer. But, at the same time putting down all those Romish practices, the Injunctions say you shall keep two lights on the high altar before the sacrament. Why? Is it for any popish purpose; is it for anything which is connected with the Romish doctrine of transubstantiation; is it for anything connected with any superstitious practices? No, my Lord; they are to be kept there for that which I presume every Christian acknowledges; that is to say, a symbol that our Saviour is the very light of the world; and simply as a symbol that our Saviour is the light of the world, they were directed to be kept on the high altar.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The passage I was looking for is this. It is under the head “De celebratione missarum.” “Nullus clericus permittatur ministrare in officio altaris nisi indutus sit superpellicio et tempore quo missarum solennia peraguntur accendantur duæ candela vel ad minus una.” It is worth your while to look at that. Then the gloss of Lynwode upon that is this: “duæ candela; est enim à parte juris ordinatum quod sacerdos sine lumine ignis non celebret missam.”

(Mr. James.) The question is, what was the view taken by the Reformers at the time of Edward VI., because I take all this as contemporary with the Prayer Book, done at the same time, done under the same hands. Of course I do not omit to notice that there was a decision, or at least a dictum (for whether it amounts to a decision or a dictum is a matter of considerable doubt) in the case of Westerton v. Liddell.

(Mr. James.) I think so. Of course I am coming to that question later. But what I am going to refer to is this, the summing up of the ground upon which the learned Judge expressed his opinion, with regard to lighted candles, in candlesticks of any size, and of any dimensions, being on the table. He says they cannot be lighted;—relying, I think, greatly or partly upon subsequent Injunctions, which were supposed to have been issued in the reign of Edward VI., and which I take to be strikingly different from the first Injunctions. Your Lordship will find the passage at page 68 of Moore. The learned Judge says: “Then as to the Injunction of 1547, ‘Two lights upon the high altar,’ says the Injunction. Where is the high altar now? Abolished, if Sir Herbert Jenner must be right, and with all the attributes to it not expressly recognized by our Church in her Articles and Prayer Book; abolished, and a Communion table established in its stead; and of what kind? In its material, in its shape, and in its movability directly opposed to the high altar of Roman Catholic times. How can lights upon the high altar apply to the present Communion table? But does the train of reasoning stop here? That Injunction is limited to the placing them before the sacrament. First, then, it is no authority for placing the lights at any other time; secondly, ‘before the sacrament,’ there by meaning the mass and not the administration of the Holy Communion. I hold the ordinance of Archbishop Reynolds and the Injunction of Edward the Sixth to be utterly incompatible with the doctrines and ritual of the Church of England. Not that the candles and candlesticks have anything to do with the doctrines and ritual of the Church, but that the use of them was proscribed in conjunction

“with other Popish observances utterly inconsistent with the doctrine and formularies of our Church, and are altogether abolished by what our Church has substituted.” Now I venture very humbly to submit that that is not strictly accurate, and your Lordship will recollect there was no decree following that expression of opinion.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am perfectly aware of that. The fact was, there were no lighted candles at Saint Barnabas; that was proved.

(Mr. James.) It is very odd that the case as here reported says they were lighted.

(Mr. Stephens.) Your Lordship remembers there was an affidavit stating that they were not.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Decidedly.

(Mr. James.) I will read the description, he says, “The description given of them is as follows.”—Your Lordship will find the passage early in the book, “Two massive gilded candlesticks, one thereof placed one either side of the said cross, and holding candles, when new, of at least one yard in height and eight inches in circumference, and which said candles are on many occasions kept burning during the celebration of the Holy Communion, at times when the same are not needed to afford light for the due performance of divine worship.”

In the answer the use of these candles is defended, and also the lighting of them, ‘whether necessary or unnecessary for the purpose of giving light.’”

(The Dean of the Arches.) That was in the argument, but as a matter of fact, they never were used or lighted. However, you were upon the question at page 69, where you say there was some miscarriage of fact.

(Mr. James.) I think there is some miscarriage with regard to the historical fact in reference to the mass and the altar.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is the date of the Injunctions of Edward the Sixth?

(The Dean of the Arches.) The Prayer Book was in 1549.

(Mr. James.) The Prayer Book was in the second year of Edward. I do not know what the date would be. Now of course I cannot have any higher authority than this. With regard to the Popish mass—

(The Dean of the Arches.) According to the learned Judge’s opinion lighted candles were prohibited by the first book of Edward VI.

(Mr. James.) Yes. I do not know where; I cannot find that.

Now this is the ground of the reasoning: What has become of the high altar? It is abolished. What has become of the mass? It is abolished. The language is, “placed before the sacrament.” I do not know that the Sacrament is abolished; at least nobody has gone so far yet as to suggest that it is. But I will ask your Lordship to put yourself back again to those times, and you will find you have got a dictionary in the first Prayer Book itself, which says this, “The Communion Service, commonly called the mass,” that is to say, although I do not know what the origin of the term “mass” is—

(Mr. James.) The word “mass” originally signified service; and the service was always considered by our English reformers at the time of Edward VI., as continued, only relieved from the corruptions which had crept into it, but the service of the mass was continued. Then, my Lord, in the very same Prayer Book, the word “altar” and the words “Lord’s table” and “God’s board” are used synonymously and interchangeably; and I find in Cardwell’s Documentary Annals, which has been put into my hands, at page 76 of the first volume, a letter of the Council to Bishop Bonner, for the reformation of certain masses at Saint Paul’s.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is the date of that?

(Mr. James.) The date given is 1549, after the Prayer Book, “After hearty commendation, having very credible notice that within that your cathedral “ church there be as yet the Apostles’ mass, and our “ Lady’s mass, and other masses of such peculiar “ name under the defence and nomination of our “ Lady’s Communion, and the Apostles’ Communion, “ used in private chapels and other remote places of “ the same, and not in the chancel; contrary to the “ King’s Majesty’s proceedings, the same being for

 “ the misuse displeasing to God; for the place, Paul’s, “ in example not tolerable, for the fondness of the “ name a scorn to the reverence of the Communion
 “ of the Lord’s body and blood; we, for the augmen“ tation of God’s honour and glory, and the consonance
 “ of His Majesty’s laws, and the avoiding of murmur, “ have thought good to will and command you, that “ from henceforth no such masses in this manner be “ in your church any longer used, but that the holy “ blessed Communion according to the Act of Parlia“ ment, be ministered at the high altar of the church, “ and in no other places of the same, and only at “ such time as your high masses were wont to be used; “ except some number of people desire (for their ne“ cessary business) to have a Communion in the “ morning, and yet the same to be executed in the “ chancel at the high altar, as it is appointed in the “ book of the public service, without cautele or di“ gression from the common order; and herein you “ shall not only satisfy our expectation of your con“ formity in all lawful things, but also avoid the mur“ mur of sundry that be therewith justly offended.
 “ And so we bid your Lordship heartily farewell.
 “ From Richmond, the 24th June 1549. Your loving “ friends, E. Somerset, W. Saint John, E. Montague, “ R. Rich, Chanc., Fr. Shrewsbury, W. Cecil.” I do not see Cranmer’s name to it.

(Mr. Stephens.) It is sent by Cranmer.

(Mr. James.) It is dated from Richmond, the 24th
 June 1549, sent by Cranmer.

Now, here you have a contemporanea expositio.
 You have the Council of the King sending to the Bishop with respect to the services at Saint Paul’s, for the reformation of certain masses at Saint Paul’s, and with directions that the mass, that is the new mass, shall be said at the high altar, as the old high masses used to be said. Well, can it be contended after that, that the mass was gone, root and branch, and that there was nothing before which the lights could be burnt? I ask your Lordship, taking this thing as you are bound to do, of course, sitting in a superior court to what that learned Judge then presided in, and assuming that you are sitting in appeal from that decision, could you say, considering the very case that occurred, Bonner’s case in 1549, that the Prayer Book at that time had abolished the mass, had abolished the altar, so that on the communion table which had been substituted for the altar it would be improper and inconsistent with the Prayer Book to have the two lighted candles to symbolize that which was simply a doctrine at least common to the two churches, that our Lord was the Light of the World?
 Well, my Lord, if it was legal then (and I say it was legal), it must be legal now. Adopting the very words of Doctor Lushington, that the lighting of candles has nothing whatever to do with the doctrine and ritual of the Church.—I say it is an ornament, a decoration, as innocent of all offence as the holly with which you decorate your church at Christmas, as the palm with which you decorate your church upon Palm Sunday, and as the flowers with which you decorate it at different seasons; and more particularly as having a nearer analogy to this case, I say exactly of the same kind are the different altar-cloths and coverings which, by the same train of reasoning, that learned Judge arrived at the conclusion were illegal, but upon which conclusion he was set right by the ultimate Court of Appeal. And in two subsequent stages of the cause before the Arches Court, in this Court, and before the Privy Council, I cannot find a single word in either judgment which looks like an adoption of that view which was taken by Dr. Lushington as to the moral and legal effect of the change which took place from Popery to Protestantism.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is no doubt that Sir John Dodson arrived at the same conclusion, on different principles, and the Privy Council reversed his decision upon some points.

(Mr. James.) Yes; and I think that authority is at an end.

(The Dean of the Arches.) This particular point was not reversed, because it never was there.

(Mr. James.) It never was there, and it never resulted from the judgment; but the judgment which was arrived at by the same ratio decidendi, if I am well founded in my view of the case, was reversed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then, before you leave the question, you will perhaps tell me upon what grounds you put the Injunctions of Edward VI.

(Mr. James.) I do not remember any passages, and do not know that I can refer your Lordship to anything except the passages I have marked down in that Judgment.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you understand Dr.
 Lushington to have considered the Injunctions of 1547 to have been law at the time?

(Mr. James.) No; he said there was no evidence of that. I do not know that I could do anything that could better describe the great force and validity of these Injunctions at the time than by reading the passages in Sir John Dodson’s judgment, beginning at page 96.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It certainly seemed to me that the Privy Council were inclined to give force to the Injunctions of Queen Elizabeth, because it is very difficult to say upon what authority the stone altars were removed, if you take away the authority of these Injunctions; but I do not know that it is so.

(Mr. James.) The Privy Council seem to have proceeded upon the Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And the Injunctions.

(Mr. James.) And the Injunctions. They came to the conclusion that the table must be a table of wood.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And must be moveable.

(Mr. James.) And must be moveable. Then, of course, there is this observation to be borne in mind, that this was a case more or less of judicial discretion.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, no doubt it was;
 it was an application for a faculty.

(Mr. James.) It was an application for a faculty, and between two persons who were co-owners of a church; that is to say, it was a question between the Incumbent and one of the churchwardens, acting on behalf of the congregation. The churchwarden said, I have an equitable right in this building, and I complain that the Incumbent, who has the legal right to the estate, is putting things into the church that are illegal.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes; but the judgment did not turn upon that.

(Mr. James.) No, my Lord; but it is referred to in the judgment in one or two places as being a matter of judicial discretion, and their Lordships came to the conclusion, dealing on the whole with an ornament over which they had that judicial discretion, that it ought to be a table, and not an altar, and that it ought to be of wood.

(The Dean of the Arches.) All I mean to say is this, that they were inclined to give authority to the royal Injunctions of Queen Elizabeth. It may or may not be a question of considerable importance by-and-by, to decide if those Injunctions had any authority. They may have had de facto authority, and yet have had no authority de jure.

(Mr. James.) The objection now is against the lights; and the Injunctions of Elizabeth do not touch us, because they do not mention lights.

(The Dean of the Arches.) True, but the same argument might apply to the legality of the Injunctions of Edward VI.

(Mr. James.) I think not, if the view which Sir

that they took effect, under the authority of the Proclamation Acts of King Henry VIII.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes; but the Privy Council were not inclined to uphold that at all.

(Mr. James.) All they said was, after passing a very complimentary observation on the learned argument of my friend Mr. Stephens, that, if it were necessary to consider it, they should be disposed to think there was a good deal in it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That was as to another point,—the Act which, so to speak, suspended any decision as to the lawfulness of existing Canons until the Commissioners had reported. But I remember that Sir William Maule was not at all disposed to agree with that. I do not think the Privy Council were inclined to support the view that these Injunctions derived their authority from the Proclamation statute.

(Mr. James.) I do not know whether that is so or not; but with regard to the validity of the Injunctions, I have not prepared myself with any argument, other than the argument which is so well put together in Sir John Dodson's judgment,—which I take it, unreversed, is binding on your Lordship.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It received no sanction from the Judicial Committee. It may be perfectly good, but it did not receive any sanction.

(Mr. James.) At all events it is a deliberate judgment from a predecessor who occupied the chair in which your Lordship is now sitting.

(The Dean of the Arches.) How does it affect the Injunctions? What is it you are referring to in Sir John Dodson's judgment which ascribes authority to them?

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the Proclamation statute?

(Mr. James.) Yes. His Lordship says, "By the statute of Henry VIII., entitled 'An Act of Proclamation,' &c." Then he goes on to show that the Injunctions issued in the reign of Edward VI. did answer the description of those Injunctions which were issued in the time of Henry VIII. Then he goes on with a train of reasoning showing how he differs. He says, "The learned Judge of the Consistory Court, relying, it would seem, in part at least, on a passage to be found in 'Collier's Ecclesiastical History,' was of opinion that the Injunctions of Edward the Sixth had no parliamentary authority. Reference is made in the report of his judgment to the marginal note in the fifth volume of Collier's work, page 228, but on examination of the text it will appear that Collier was not stating his own view of the question, but merely setting forth the reasons assigned by Bishop Gardiner in his letter and elsewhere for opposing the Injunctions issued by the King. Gardiner seems to have been almost the only person who disputed the validity of these Injunctions at the time, and he was thrown into prison in consequence."

Then he goes on to speak of the objections that were taken by Gardiner; that the objections were overruled, and the Injunctions were held valid; and it was upon the validity of those Injunctions that Sir John Dodson, I think, principally based his judgment that the cross was illegal. He came to the conclusion that the cross was one of the images that came within the Injunctions, and I think his decision was based entirely upon the validity of those Injunctions.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, it was so. Dr. Lushington disputed the validity of the Injunctions.

(Mr. James.) Yes. Upon other general grounds he came to the conclusion that the cross was illegal.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Precisely.

(Mr. James.) Sir John Dodson came to the conclusion that the Injunctions were valid, and that they covered the case of the cross. The Privy Council came to the conclusion that they did not cover the cross, because the cross did not come within the description of being an image or monument of superstition.

(The Dean of the Arches.) At all events you are willing to take your stand upon that.

(Mr. James.) Yes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) As I understand your argument, it is that the Injunctions were lawful, and that the candles were properly placed. You say that the candles were then lawful, and that they have not been made unlawful since.

(Mr. James.) Yes. Then my friend Mr. Stephens says that the Injunctions fell with the repeal of the Act under the authority of which they were issued.

My Lord, I think there is no foundation whatever for that argument. The repealing of a legislative authority giving any body or any person any jurisdiction does not repeal the ordinances or orders which were made during the continuance of the legislative authority of that body; it only repeals it for the future. Supposing you alter the constitution of the Island of Jamaica, does anybody suppose that all the Acts of the old Jamaica legislature are not still valid?

(The Dean of the Arches.) Or supposing you took away the authority of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who have authority by Parliament to make schemes and so on, I apprehend all those remain.

(Mr. James.) Or supposing the case of a common deed, in which there is authority to revoke the uses altogether. In the interval while the uses remain, under the uses a lease is granted; well, of course, it is not affected by the general revocation of the uses. Supposing a corporation was dissolved by Act of Parliament, all its acts would be valid. To repeal the Act no doubt was perfectly right, for it was one of the most monstrous Acts that even Henry VIII. was able to obtain from his Parliament.

(Mr. James.) It is an illustration of a thing that I have been very much struck with in the reigns of Henry, Edward, and of Mary, and even in the time of Elizabeth, that, however monstrous and tyrannical an act was, as far as I have been able to make out, it was always done with due form of law. It is singular how very precise everything was done, particularly with regard to the proceedings against the bishops; the whole thing was done in that formal way. The same remark applies to the proceedings against the King's wives, which seem to have been carried on with the most careful observance of all the forms, however they may have violated the substance of justice. Therefore, it really is not likely, that having been a characteristic of the time, that there was anything in form that was a violation of the law. I have forgotten to draw your Lordship's attention to this, that in the Prayer Book itself, in the very first Prayer Book, there is a reference to the Injunctions.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Will you show me that?

(Mr. James.) It is a rubric in the Communion. It is, "Upon Wednesdaies and Fridaies the English letany shal be saied or songe in all places, after suche forme as is appoynted by the Kynges Majesties Injuncions, or as is or shall be otherwise appoynted by his Highnes. And though there be none to communicate wyth the prieste, yet these dayes (after the letany ended) the prieste shall put upon him a playn albe or surplesse, with a cope, and saye all thinges at the altare (appoynted to be sayde at the celebracion of the Lordes Supper) until after the offertory. And then shall adde one or two of the collectes afore written as occasion shall serve by hys discrecion."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Well, they certainly were considered to be lawful at that time.

(Mr. James.) Yes; and even in the Prayer Book your Lordship sees they are referred to. Then, my Lord, I say this: if that be so, if these lights were lawful, and lawful not as things forming part of the ritual, but as things standing as it seems to me in exactly the same category as the cross, in exactly the same category as painted windows, in exactly the same category as any other symbolical ornament. Just as in the ordinary form in which the Holy Spirit is shadowed as a dove, or anything of that sort which may find its way into our churches.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you put these candlesticks on the footing of ornaments?

(Mr. James.) I put these candlesticks on the footing of ornaments, the use of which is nowhere forbidden. Of course, that brings us to a reference to that celebrated rubric of which so much has here been said, and under which I apprehend the eucharistic vestments are now used, apparently without question, particularly in this Church; that rubric which says, that the ornaments of the Church which were in use by the authority of Parliament at the time of that year of King Edward VI. shall be retained and had in use.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The Privy Council were very strong upon that point. "They all obviously mean the same thing. The same dresses, the same utensils or articles, which were used under the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. may still be used." That is their decision.

(Mr. James.) Well, it seems to me they were in use under that. There is no trace of their being abolished, and it is not likely, I should think, when you see exactly what the change was, and what the change is represented to be. Why should those lights have been abolished? I must say it would require an amount of evidence which would be something very strong indeed to induce the Court to come to the conclusion that every priest throughout England immediately was obliged to put down the two lights which he had always been accustomed to have throughout all his lifetime, and which it is utterly impossible to connect with any superstitious use whatever.

(The Dean of the Arches.) In the first volume of the Liturgical Services of Elizabeth there is a great list of occasional forms of prayer or services which were used in church in her reign. It struck me to have some bearing upon what you were saying just now.

(Mr. James.) What is the reference to that passage which your Lordship gave me just now?

(The Dean of the Arches.) Page 159; and if you compare that with page 156 you will see the two points—the references which they make. "The rubric to the Prayer Book of January 1st 1604 adopts the language of the rubric of Elizabeth. The rubric to the present Prayer Book adopts the language of the statute of Elizabeth; but they all obviously mean the same thing, that the same dresses and the same utensils, or articles, which were used under the first Prayer Book of Edward the Sixth, may still be used. None of them, therefore, can have any reference to articles not used in the services, but set up in churches as ornaments, in the sense of decorations."

(Mr. James.) They were then dealing with what ornaments were.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then a little beyond that there is this: "Here the term 'ornaments' is used, as covering both the vestments of the minister and the several articles used in the services; it is confined to such things as, in the performance of the services, the minister was to use."

(Mr. James.) Here is a passage at the end of the judgment, at page 187, which I wish to read to your Lordship: "Here the rubrics of the Prayer Book become important. Their Lordships entirely agree with the opinions expressed by the learned Judges in these cases, and in Faulkner v. Litchfield, that in the performance of the services, rites, and ceremonies ordered by the Prayer Book, the directions contained in it must be strictly observed; that no omission and no addition can be permitted; but they are not prepared to hold that the use of all articles not expressly mentioned in the Rubric, although quite consistent with, and even subsidiary to, the service, is forbidden."

(Mr. James.) I say that the two lights are quite consistent, and that there is nothing whatever in the presence of the two lights upon the table which is in any way inconsistent with anything contained in the directions of the services, any more than it is inconsistent with the almost identical form in the time of Edward VI., because I take it our present Prayer Book is really brought back almost to the position in which it stood in the time of Edward VI., which, as your Lordship knows, was always said to be, even by the most violent changers afterwards, and at the time, to be entirely in accordance with God's Word, and very godly and comfortable, and so on.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The Act of Parliament says it was dictated by the Holy Spirit.

(Mr. James.) I shall leave my friend to fill up any omission of mine upon this part of the argument as to lights; and I feel I can do that without any injustice to my client, because I know I shall be followed by my learned friend in this case, and also because I know that there will be other learned counsel who will have to address your Lordship upon similar points in another case.

My Lord, I come now to the question of incense. With regard to incense in itself, unless it can be made out to be a ceremony or a rite, or a substantial alteration or addition to a ceremony or rite, which I submit it is not, what is there in the burning of odoriferous drugs which is in itself in the slightest degree an offence, or what is there in the burning of it symbolically which can savour of any offensive doctrine? That is what I want to know. What is there, what doctrine is it, that is supposed to be symbolised by incense which the Church of England does not adopt? Incense may be used for purifying the church. I forget what the language of George Herbert is upon that, but I have no doubt it will be familiar to your Lordship.

(Mr. James.) To be strictly accurate I believe the word was "perfuming."

(The Dean of the Arches.) You see the objection here is not to the use of incense, but to the use of incense at a particular time, and in a particular manner.

(Mr. James.) But I really am not able to see that using it at a particular time not coupled with any intent can make it illegal. There really is nothing in it. The priest himself does not pause in the consecration. The only description which I know is given of it, is that which is contained in the little pamphlet which is annexed to the articles. And there again, my Lord, there is this, which appears to be an objection to the articles as they now stand: the only thing that is pleaded in support of the charge about incense is the use of incense on these particular days when it was used for censuring persons and things. Your Lordship knows the use of incense for incensing persons and things was given up before the institution of the suit, as was well known to the prosecutor. We plead that; and upon that I crave leave to repeat the same observations, which I made upon that part of the case in which the other points occur, that is to say, with regard to the use of what was called excessive elevation and prostration; but in itself, as there is nothing that I can conceive symbolical of any doctrine, I do not know why incense may not be burned at the time of the celebration of the holy communion as well as during any other service.

(Mr. James.) My Lord, I venture to say it is not any rite at all; that is to say, the mere burning of incense is no rite and no ceremony. Of course, it may be said it was done in a ceremonial way; but I apprehend that ought to be alleged and proved; and all we know is that at a particular time of the service a particular vessel is brought in by an attendant, and incense is burned in it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think the article is,

A R

"That he used incense for incensing persons and things." I do not think they raise any other charge.

(Mr. James.) No.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And it may be important to observe that.

(Mr. James.) That is the only charge in the articles upon that point.

(Mr. Stephens.) In the 8th article we state, "That he unlawfully used incense in and during the celebration of the Holy Communion, and permitted and sanctioned the same."

(Mr. James.) I think the only evidence upon that is—

(The Dean of the Arches.) You admit it; you admit that you used incense, "to wit, on Sunday," and so on, "during the reading of the Prayer of Consecration and afterwards until the time for the administration of the Communion to the people, and permitted and sanctioned such use of incense. We deny that the same is unlawful."

(Mr. James.) Upon that I see I was wrong. The observation I meant to make was to point out the discrepancy between the amended article and the original charge; but that is governed by what your Lordship has said with regard to the other matter.

Well now, it is lawful to use every architectural ornament; it is lawful to use music; it is lawful to use decorations. Then why should it not be lawful to make the atmosphere of the church a different atmosphere from that of the wretched dwellings of people living in the dark alleys and streets of London? Why should it not be lawful to make worshippers feel that they are not only in a house adorned, it may be magnificently, for the service of God, but that they are in an atmosphere different from the wretched atmosphere in which they live in their ordinary everyday life. Why not resort to that as well as music; music which Milton describes in those glowing words, (which I know are fresh in your Lordship's recollection,) in the Il Penseroso :

"Let my due feet never fail
To tread the studious cloister's pale,
And love the high embowed roof
With antique pillars, massy proof,
And storied windows richly dight,
Casting a dim religious light;
There let the pealing organ blow
To the full-toned choir below,
In service high and anthems clear,
As may with sweetness through mine ear
Dissolve me into ecstasies,
And bring all Heaven before my eyes."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Well, it was a strong thing for a puritan to write.

(Mr. James.) Just so, my Lord; a puritan poet said that; and my client feels that what he is doing in his church is calculated to produce the same effect, is calculated to soften the stony heart of many a person who comes there, and that it is desirable that the people should, in a different scene and a different atmosphere, be taught to receive the religious impressions which everything about them is calculated to produce. And I venture to think, especially when you hear the evidence that will be given of the use of censers at different times, not limited to any particular time, in churches at the time of the first Prayer Book, and subsequently in the time of Elizabeth, that your Lordship will not see any ground for saying that merely because the incense is brought in at the time of the consecration prayer (I believe it is so stated in the pamphlet) there is anything illegal in that act.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is, as I understand it, the gist of the objection; because I understood Mr. Stephens to say, that for the purposes of fumigation he had no objection to the use of incense.

(Mr. Stephens.) Not the slightest, my Lord, for the purpose of fumigation; but for the purpose of using it as a rite or ceremony.

(Mr. James.) Then, adopting that view, I do not see how my friend is to escape from this as a matter of right pleading, that he ought to have charged that it was done as a rite and ceremony. He says it is done during the prayer of consecration. Of course that may be so. He says that it is done during the celebration. But it ought to have been charged that it is done as a rite or ceremony; but I venture to think, on the due interpretation of the words "rite or ceremony," that it is not a rite or ceremony.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is charged is this: "That such use of incense as in the two preceding paragraphs alleged are severally an unlawful addition to and variation from the form and order prescribed and appointed by the statute law and by the said Book of Common Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments and other rites and ceremonies of the Church, and are contrary to the statute law and to the said constitutions and canons."

(Mr. James.) I apprehend the charge that it is against the law does not supply the want of intent in the original charge—merely to say that what we are doing is against the law. If it is necessary, as I submit it is, to show the intent of the use of incense, to show that the intent is to add an additional rite or ceremony; without that, it is perfectly harmless. And even if it is to add an additional rite or ceremony, it still falls within what I have pressed upon your Lordship as a thing which was in use, censers being ornaments in use at the time of the first Prayer Book of Edward VI.

My Lord, a few words more will be all that I think I shall be able to add to what I have pressed upon your Lordship, and they will be with regard to the mixed chalice. Now, I cannot conceive why anybody on earth should object to the adding a few drops of pure water to the wine. Why should this, which is the universal practice of the Church, be objected to? I believe there is no church, Eastern or Western, in which it does not prevail. It certainly has prevailed from all time, and I believe we have evidence as far back as the time of Justin Martyr of the mode in which it was celebrated; and we know that our Church expressly said at the time of the Reformation that it only departed from the existing usage of the churches of Spain and France and Italy in those matters which led to superstition or had been abused.

(Mr. James.) I am coming to that, my Lord. I think it is an argument in my favour when you consider this: Your Lordship sees we start with this primâ facie; the reformers of our Liturgy, according to their own statement, had no ground for differing from the uses of the rest of Christendom in that matter; because I do not think it is capable of being suggested that it had either been abused, or that it was a novelty, or that it led to any superstition whatever, or that it was anything more than a more accurate representation, as was believed in the churches, of what actually took place at the supper of our Lord. I believe the opinion is universal that wine and water must have been that which was drunk at the Paschal Feast. It is supposed also to be a symbolical representation, not of anything connected with any orthodox doctrine of any kind, but of the fact that blood and water flowed from the side of our Saviour. Well, that being so, you start with this, that the probability is, no alteration would be made in that practice.

Then you come to the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., and you find that the thing is called wine; it is always talked of as wine. The priest is to put the bread and wine upon the table, adding to the wine a few drops of pure water.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The words are "a little pure and clean water," I think.

(Mr. James.) "Adding thereto a little pure and clean water." That was the mode in which it was done then. Nothing was said in the second Prayer Book of Edward VI., because there seems to have been a total omission of all the manual acts from that book, which I may, by way of parenthesis, remind your Lordship is a very strong argument in our favour. Because it would be a very strong view to suppose that during all that time, between the time of the second Prayer Book and the time of Charles, there were no manual acts done with regard to the celebration of the sacrament; and your Lordship sees there are no manual acts prescribed in the second Prayer Book, nor in Queen Elizabeth's.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say the fact of there being no manual acts prescribed in the second Prayer Book or in Queen Elizabeth's is an argument in your favour.

(Mr. James.) There are none in the second Prayer Book. Therefore you start with this: that the wine, with "a little pure and clean water" added to it, was the thing which was placed on the table, and called wine. Indeed it is called wine, I believe, in every church in the world.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It goes on to say, certainly, "and setting both the bread and wine upon the altar," having said above in the rubric, "and putting the wine into the chalice, or else into some fair and convenient cup prepared for that use if the chalice will not serve, putting thereto a little clean and pure water."

(Mr. James.) Of course it is still called wine; the term is not altered, although the water has been added to it. That being so, I was calling your Lordship's attention to the fact that that direction was not repeated in the second Prayer Book; there was no direction there whatever. Then you come to this consideration: Of course there must have been a cruet used, because, according to that very Prayer Book itself, there was water used, and it is utterly impossible that they could have done without it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Of course there must have been a vessel for holding water.

(Mr. James.) There must have been a vessel for holding water; and a vessel which held the water must have been an ornament of the church in use under that Prayer Book, within the very meaning and the very words of the decision of the Privy Council. Well then, these things were ordered to be used afterwards, or, if not ordered, there was a wish that they should be retained. Can it then be said now, that when you say "putting the bread and wine on the table," there is anything inconsistent in the fact of adding a little clean water before it is put upon the table? Because I take it that it must be done before it is put upon the table.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not think it specifies there when it is to be done.

(Mr. James.) I do not think it is stated there, but I have no doubt it is so when the liturgy of Edward VI. is strictly followed.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is not in the articles. It says, that during the celebration he mixed water with the wine. That is the way it is stated.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Not in the letters of request.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Just let us see what your answer is.

(Mr. Stephens.) It is admitted to be true in the Tenth Article of the Responsive Allegations.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes; you admit it to be true. I am not giving any opinion, but I am only saying that it is not charged that the wine and water is brought in and put upon the Communion table.

(Mr. James.) My view is that it is an inchoate act, the act of celebration, that, following the words of the book of Edward VI., he puts the wine on the table, adding thereto "a little clean and pure water." I take it to be in the act of putting, or just at the time of putting it on the table.

(The Dean of the Arches.) "Adding thereto a little pure and clean water." It must be at the time, because it says what he has to do; it says, "putting the wine into the chalice, and adding thereto a little clean and pure water."

(Mr. James.) That is what we contend is the right thing to do, and that is the thing in substance charged. What is admitted is this, that, putting wine into the chalice, we put to it a little clean water. Well, that being so, there is nothing so inconsistent in it as to make your Lordship say this is a thing which cannot be permitted. It is not only innocent, but it is laudable. It may be said on the other side, "If one person begins to make an innovation, you may have a whole heap of innovations." That, no doubt, will be the argument of my learned friend. Well, of course there is always a line to be drawn in these cases. If you could show anything else in the same category, if you could show anything else which is adopted in all the churches in the world except ours, which has been adopted by Christendom from apostolic times—

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not think it has ever been held necessary for the sacrament.

(Mr. James.) Oh, no; but I believe all the missals contain directions for it. It cannot be held necessary, because the words are "bread and wine." Of course one knows by chemical knowledge that wine is to a great extent made up of water. But what I say is this: If that was done under the first Prayer Book, and the ornament was there for the purpose, is there anything in the second Prayer Book, is there anything in the existing rubric, with regard to putting wine on the table, which would make you say that that thing which was practised under the Prayer Book, and spoken of so highly as the first Book of Edward VI. is,—is there anything to make it not only not obligatory upon those who do not approve of it, but which makes it unlawful for any priest to use who takes a view favourable to it? How can such a thing as that offend in any honest way either the prejudices or the feelings of any persons whatever? I cannot conceive why anybody ever thought it right to raise a litigation upon a proceeding so harmless, as far as they are concerned, and having at the same time, no doubt, a very high meaning to those who attach the meaning which my client attaches to it, but which cannot be said by any possibility to be Popish or Greek, or to be anything but the religion of pure and primitive times.

Well, my Lord, I think I have now exhausted my strength and my argument; and perhaps you will allow me to hand over the case to my learned friends who are with me, expressing my hope that your Lordship will see your way to return Mr. Mackonochie discharged from all further disturbance, from further proceedings in this Court, to his parish, that he may pursue again in peace that zealous career which your Lordship has heard that he has for so many years pursued with so much advantage to, I trust, thousands of his parishioners.

MR. PRIDEAUX.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Before I enter on the detailed consideration of this case, I will venture to submit to the consideration of the Court an argument which I believe to be very well worthy of attention, and which, if it be a valid one, will be fatal to the whole of this prosecution. I believe my friend, although he has not himself presented this point to your Lordship, quite feels that it is a point worthy of your Lordship's consideration. My Lord, the charge against Mr. Mackonochie, if it can be sustained at all, must clearly be sustained, as I submit, under the second division of the penal clause in the Acts of Uniformity. Now the Acts of Uniformity are substantially the same for this purpose, [and therefore in reading one, at any rate so far as this part of the argument is concerned, I shall have laid before the Court the whole of my view, because the Acts of Uniformity do not substantially differ. I will call your Lordship's attention to the second part of the clause in the first Act of Uniformity, 2d & 3d Edward VI., cap. 1., sec. 2. It is a long section, and contains a penal clause substantially to this effect. The object of the first part of the penal clause is to require the use of the Prayer Book. The object of the second part is to prohibit the use of any other service.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Why do you select 2d & 3d Edward VI.?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Because I quite concede what my friend has said, that all the previous Acts of Uniformity are set up and are in force for the purpose of enforcing obedience to the present Prayer Book. But I will refer to both Acts, because there is one slight difference, and a very slight difference, between the two sections. It is perfectly clear to my mind (and I do not think your Lordship will entertain any doubt about it) that this is not a charge against Mr. Mackonochie for having refused to use the Prayer Book. Therefore, if Mr. Mackonochie has committed any offence at all, he has offended against the second penal provision of that clause, which is to this effect: "And, albeit, that the same be soe godlie and good that they give occasion to every honeste and conformable man moste willinglie to embrace them, yet lest anye obstinate person, who willinglie woulde disturbe so godlie order." Now, that is important, and I am glad your Lordship directed me to the commencement, because clearly this portion of the penal clause is directed against "obstinate persons, who willinglie woulde disturbe soe godlie order and quiett in this realme." Well, my Lord, it will be going a great way to say that Mr. Mackonochie is an "obstinate persone, who willinglie woulde disturbe soe godlie order and quiett in this realme." The clause proceeds, "Shold not go unpunyshe, that it maye also be ordeyned and enacted by the auctoritie aforesaide, that if any manner of person, vicar, or other whatsoever minister that ought or should synge or saye Common Prayer mencioned in the saide booke."

(The Dean of the Arches.) The offence is refusing to use them "in such form and order as they be mentioned in the said booke," "or shall use, wilfully and obstinatlie standinge in the same, any other ryte, ceremonye, order, fourme, or manner of masse."

(Mr. Prideaux.) Precisely. Now, I say it is quite clear Mr. Mackonochie is not charged with that. He is not charged with refusing "to use the saide Common Prayers, or to mynister the sacramentes, in such cathedrall or parishe churche or other places as he shoulde use or mynister the same, in suche order and fourme as they be mencioned and sett forthe in the saide booke." This is not the clause under which Mr. Mackonochie has erred if he has erred at all.

(The Dean of the Arches.) "Or shall use, wilfully and obstinatlie standinge in the same." How do you construe that?

(Mr. Prideaux.) My Lord, those are the very words to which I wish to draw your attention. That is what I say; and the preamble, the earlier part of the section which I read at the suggestion of your Lordship, aids me in that; because it shows that the object is to punish obstinate persons "who willinglie woulde disturbe the godlie order and quiett in this realme;" and in order to punish obstinate persons "who willinglie woulde disturbe the godlie order and quiett in this realme," it is provided that if they shall use, wilfully and obstinatlie standinge in the same, any other ryte, ceremonye, order, fourme, or manner of masse openly or privilye, or mattens, evensong, admynistration of the sacramentes, or other open prayer then ys mencioned and sett forthe in the saide booke—then the statute goes on to provide that they shall incur certain penalties in the temporal courts; and then it contains a provision that in virtue of this Act he may be prosecuted for any offence against this Act before the bishop in his Ecclesiastical Court, according to the course of ecclesiastical law.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Where is that?

(Mr. Prideaux.) That is lower down. I will read it in a moment. The provision that the proceeding may be taken in the Ecclesiastical Court is the 12th section.

(The Dean of the Arches.) This was a good deal discussed in Mr. Head's case before the Privy Council, was it not?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord; there the question was very different. It turned on the meaning of the word "advisedly." Mr. Head was accused of having maintained doctrines contrary to the Articles.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I only meant that the statute was discussed.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I daresay the statute was considered; but the use and meaning of the word "advisedly" (which was the question in dispute there) is very different, I apprehend, from the words which I am now relying upon. I am now calling your Lordship's attention to this: "Provided alwaies, and be it ordeyned and enacted by thauroritie aforesaide, that all and singular archebissoppes and bissoppes, and everie of their chancelors, commissaries, archdeacons, and other ordinaries havinge anye peculiar ecclesiasticall jurisdiction shall have full power and auctoritie by vertue of this Acte,"—showing that the jurisdiction conferred upon the Ecclesiastical Court is a jurisdiction conferred by the Acte, and limited by the Acte; is exactly co-extensive and only co-extensive with the jurisdiction which the temporal courts have under the previous section,—"as well to enquire in their vysitacions and synodes, and els where within their jurisdiction at any other tyme or place to take accusacions and informacions of all and entire the thinges above mencioned, done, commytted, or perpetrate within the lymittes of their jurisdictiones and auctoritie, and to punyshe the same by admonycion, excommunication, sequestracion, or deprivation, and other censures and process in like fourme as heretofore hath bene used in like cases by the Kinge's ecclesiasticall lawes." And your Lordship will remember that in another and previous section which my friend cited and dwelt greatly upon—I do not see how it helps him—a third course is given to the bishop. The bishop may, if he pleases, sit jointly with the temporal judge of assize. I do not feel it necessary, unless your Lordship desires it, to refer to that section.

(The Dean of the Arches.) When you say "may," you mean "might?"

(Mr. Prideaux.) He might and may.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No, he could not do it after the 13 & 14 Vict.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My Lord, I apprehend that only applies to proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court. Probably he could not do it after the 13 & 14 Vict.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That applies only to proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court.

(Mr. Prideaux.) The power given to the bishop is to act jointly with the temporal judge in the Civil Court. Therefore, I apprehend, it does not touch the question. All I wish to add is that the offence is limited by the statute. It may be prosecuted either in the Temporal Court or in the Ecclesiastical Court; but in order to constitute an offence it must be the offence pointed out by this Act; and the offence pointed out by this Act is to "use, wilfully and obstinatlie standinge in the same, any other ryte, ceremonye, order, fourme, or manner of masse openly or privilye, or mattens, evensong, admynistration of the sacramentes, or other open prayer then ys mencioned and sett forthe" by the Book of Common Prayer. And if it were at all important to make assurance doubly sure, that assurance is furnished by the last section of this Act of Uniformity. "Provided always, and be it enacted, that whatsoever person offending in the premises shall for the first offence receive punishment of the ordinary, having a testimonial thereof under the said ordinary's seal; and shall not for the same offence eftsoons be convented before the justices; and likewise receiving for the said first offence by the justices, he shall not for the same offence eftsoons receive punishment of the "ordinary; anything contained in this Act to the contrary notwithstanding."

Now, I say, my Lord, that the effect of those clauses is to limit the offence. It is no offence by the language of the Act unless the offence be committed in the terms provided against by the penal clause; and your Lordship can well understand that when the object is to prevent obstinate and ill-disposed persons from disturbing the peace and order of the Church (for that is the substance of it), such a clause would naturally be introduced. Therefore, in order to justify this prosecution, I respectfully submit that the case must be brought within the terms of the Act of Parliament; and it is not brought within the terms of the Act of Parliament unless it be alleged and proved that Mr. Mackonochie used the services complained of "wilfully and obstinately standing in the same." The words upon which I am relying now, as constituting an essential part of the offence, or rather essentially a part of the offence (and I say that no offence is committed under the statute unless those words have been complied with), are the words "wilfully and obstinately standing in the same." The only difference, my Lord, so far as this question is concerned, between the first Act of Uniformity and the other Acts of Uniformity with regard to the penal clause is that the words in Queen Elizabeth's statute are "wilfully or obstinately standing in the same." But I submit these Acts are used in pari materia.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is nothing in Charles the II.'s Act?

(Mr. Prideaux.) There is nothing in Charles the II.'s Act; it is all done by reference. The only thing that is done is to say that the several good laws in force are and shall be in force and valid for the purpose of enforcing the new Prayer Book. But I say as they are in pari materia to be read together, as we know by various statutes "or" may be read "and," and "and" "or." I submit with confidence that there is a failure to show either. But I say that in order to render Mr. Mackonochie liable to this prosecution it must be alleged either in terms or at any rate in substance—I should submit in terms—certainly in substance, in the letters of request, which are alone the foundation which this Court can act upon; because all this Court has jurisdiction to do, is to try the charge sent by the ecclesiastical judge—

(The Dean of the Arches.) By the bishop now; it was under the ecclesiastical judge.

(Mr. Prideaux.) By the bishop now,—I beg your Lordship's pardon. I submit therefore, that in order to justify this prosecution, it must appear, at least by reasonable intendment (I doubt if that is enough), both in the letters of request, and in the citation and in the Articles, that Mr. Mackonochie committed these alleged offences "wilfully and obstinately standing in the same."

And, my Lord, I ask with some degree of confidence, where is the allegation—I challenge my friend to show the allegation in any of these documents—and he must show it in all—which, especially in considering a highly penal statute of this kind, can be said to be tantamount to a charge that what Mr. Mackonochie has done, he has done "wilfully and obstinately standing in the same?" On the contrary, my Lord, the facts of this case show that Mr. Mackonochie has not had the object contemplated in the preamble of this Act; they show affirmatively that Mr. Mackonochie is not an "obstinate person, who willingly would disturb the godly order and quiett in this realme;" because, what does Mr. Mackonochie do? Mr. Mackonochie believed, and no doubt in his heart now believes, that it is perfectly lawful to elevate the blessed Sacrament over his head; Mr. Mackonochie believed, and no doubt at this moment believes—and I will venture to say to the day of his death will believe—that it is perfectly lawful at this moment to incense persons and things during the celebration of the Holy Communion; but has he "wilfully and obstinately" persisted in doing these things as an "obstinate person, who willingly would disturb the godly order of this realme?" On the contrary, no sooner is Mr. Mackonochie advised that the question is doubtful; no sooner does Mr. Mackonochie learn that it has not met with the approval of his bishop; no sooner has Mr. Mackonochie ascertained that it is not in accordance with the wishes and the views of Convocation, than Mr. Mackonochie, far from being an "obstinate person" wilfully desiring to disturb the godly order and peace of this realm, immediately desists; therefore, my Lord, so far as any inference is to be drawn from the facts—not that they can help this case, because if it had been proved in the most conclusive and unanswerable way as matter of evidence that he had "wilfully and obstinately standing in the same" persisted in these practices, that would not aid the defects, and, as I submit, the incurable defects, alike in the letters of request, and in the citation and in the Articles—that inference would be in favour of my client.

Now, my Lord, are there any authorities to support me in this view? There is one, no doubt not a binding authority, but it is useful for this purpose, upon which my friend relied a great deal, and that is the Injunctions of Bishop Ridley in 1550. Your Lordship will remember that my friend referred to the Injunctions given in the visitation of the Reverend Father in God, Nicholas, Bishop of London, for uniformity in his diocese of London, in the fourth year of our Sovereign Lord King Edward VI., by the grace of God, King of England; and my friend said, "I cite these authorities to show that Bishop Ridley at any rate supposed he was carrying out that authority which enabled him to enquire in his Ecclesiastical Court as to offences committed against the Act of Uniformity." But what does he say?

(The Dean of the Arches.) What are you citing from?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am citing from page 92 of the 1st Cardwell's Documentary Annals. My friend read out the words very triumphantly "or whether a minister wilfully and obstinately do" so and so. The exact words are "whether any minister use wilfully and obstinately any other rite, ceremony, order, form, or manner of communion, matins or evensong, ministracion of sacraments, or open prayer, than is set forth in the Book of Common Prayer." Now, my Lord, my friend says that when Bishop Ridley issued these visitation articles his object was to carry out, so far as the power is given to the bishop by inquiry, and I suppose, if necessary, by prosecution in his Ecclesiastical Court,—of which by the way my friend has not brought a trace from the beginning to the end—all the objects of the Act. And yet Ridley inquires whether any minister useth wilfully and obstinately any other rite. Therefore, so far as any inference whatever is to be drawn from these articles, they support, as I respectfully submit, my contention—namely, that to bring a clerk within the provision of this penal clause there must have been persistence; he must have acted "wilfully and obstinately."

Then, there is a case in the Common Law Court, which is very obscurely reported, but I think upon the true construction of it it is a direct authority as regards the Temporal Courts; and I have already ventured to submit to your Lordship that the prosecutions in the Temporal Courts and in the Ecclesiastical Court must have proceeded under the same clause. Of course your Lordship will remember that the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court is given by reference. It is a jurisdiction to inquire by virtue of this Act into "all and everie the things above mencioned, done, commytted, or perpetrated within the lymittes of their jurisdictiones and auctoritie, and to punyshe the same by admonicion, excommunication, sequestracion, or deprivation, and other censures and processe in like fourme as heretofore hath bene used in like cases by the Kinge's ecclesiasticall lawes."

(Mr. Prideaux.) I respectfully submit not. That is one of the points I am contending for. This is a violation against an Act of Parliament; there is no offence, unless it be an offence against an Act of Parliament. My friend says the argument is the same. It has been suggested that disobedience to an Act of Parliament is indictable in itself; and I suppose your Lordship will hold that in the same way any disobedience to an Act of Parliament of an ecclesiastical character would be cognizable in the Ecclesiastical Courts. But I submit that where the limits of the offence are pointed out by the Act of Parliament itself as they are here, then that shows the will of the Legislature that no offence is to be deemed to have been committed unless you can bring the alleged offender within those limits.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You will remember when the old statute of brawling existed, it was competent for a person to proceed either under the statute or under the general law, although there was a statute defining the offence.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That may be so; but where the character of the offence is expressly defined in the statute, I say that the fair inference of the intention of the Legislature is, that it can not be supposed that the Legislature would have provided these penalties for this purpose, and would have specified the circumstances under which the party should be deemed liable to those penalties, and that they at the same time intended that the provisions limiting the penalties should go for nothing.

My Lord, there is a case which I have already referred to in Godbolt's Report, which, I submit, when fairly and properly looked at, is a direct authority on this point. It is No. 137, page 118. I think there is only one edition of the book. It is an anonymous case in the 29th of Elizabeth in the Queen's Bench. It is not very long, and with your permission I will read it. "Exceptions were taken by Fuller to an indictment upon the statute of 1 Elizabeth, cap. 2." (that is, Elizabeth's Act of Uniformity), "for omitting of the crossing of a child in baptizing it. The case was that a minister out of his cure at another church, namely, at Chelmsford in Essex, did baptize a child without the sign of the cross, for which he was indicted. The first exception was that the statute speaks of ministers which do not use the administering of the sacrament in such cathedral churches or parish churches as he should use to administer the same; that this was not the parish church in which he should use the same. Suit, Justice, was of opinion that it was good notwithstanding that; if otherwise the statute might be greatly defrauded. The words of the statute are, further, 'or shall wilfully or obstinately standing in the same, use any other rite, ceremony, order form, &c. Secondly, he took another exception upon those words, for the omitting of the crossing only is put, and it is not shown that the use of any other rite or ceremony, for there ought to be some positive thing. Direct disobedience would, no doubt, be sufficient. Then it was argued, he doth not show the place or parish where he persisted in it, and that is material and issuable." My Lord, I am at present reading the argument. The fourth I need not trouble you with, nor with the fifth. The sixth was that it was at another church, and Raye, Chief Justice, "if this evasion should be allowed, the statute were to no purpose." The seventh was: "That it doth not show where the persisting was. For that is a special thing, and material and traversable. Raye, Chief Justice, conceived that that only was a material exception." So that it is clear that, according to the opinion of Raye, Chief Justice, the persistency—the "wilfully and obstinately standing in the same"—was an essential element in the offence, and that the offence could not have been committed unless there was such a persistence—that that only was a material exception, and that the other exceptions were but frivolous and were not good.

Now, my Lord, there is no record here of what was done; but I think the fair inference to draw (although, unfortunately, Godbolt is not very particular in stating in terms the result of the cases which he reports)—but I think it is impossible to come to any other conclusion upon this, than that the Court, in this case, was of opinion that the persistency—the "wilfully and obstinately standing in the same"—was an essential element in the offence, and that no offence against the statute was committed unless the persistence was shown and pleaded in order that it might be traversed; because it is impossible to put any other meaning upon the words than that. "The seventh was that it doth not show where." Your Lordship is aware that at that time it was necessary to allege venue of every material fact. Unless the fact were immaterial, it was necessary to allege venue; and the report says: "The seventh was that it doth not show where the persisting was, for that is a special thing and material and issuable," and only material and issuable because it was of the essence of the offence. "Raye, Chief Justice, conceived that that only was a material exception."

Now, my Lord, there is one other case which I will just refer to. It has been before your Lordship already, and I merely refer to it to support my position,—that although the general rule of law is that if you disobey a public statute you are liable to indictment, yet that does not apply to those cases where the statute specifically and in terms points out the offence which is intended to be charged. The case which I wish to refer your Lordship to is a case which I do not wonder my friend Mr. Stephens did not call attention to at all—the case of The King v. Sparkes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the case Mr. James cited.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That is the case my friend Mr. James cited. There can be no doubt that in The King v. Sparkes prayers were said which were no part of the Prayer Book; and one of the reasons given by the Court in reversing the judgment was that it might have been the prayer before sermon, and so no offence; and when your Lordship remembers that the sermon is a part of the office of the administration of the Lord's Supper, I apprehend it cannot be argued that this was a prayer interposed between the services. Because the Prayer Book directs the saying or the singing of the Nicene Creed, it then says, "Here shall follow the sermon," or one of the homilies set out by authority," and then gives directions what the priest is to do. And how my friend's clients (for I have no doubt they do it) justify the going into the vestry in the meantime to put on their black gowns, in order to come back and preach the sermon in it, I confess I cannot understand. All that I desire to show your Lordship now is this, that prayer before sermon is not a prayer intermediate between the different services prescribed by the Prayer Book; it is a prayer introduced in the very midst of the office for the celebration of the Holy Communion, and yet the judgment there was reversed because the terms of the penal clause had not been complied with. If the principle which is sometimes held, that disobedience to a public Act of Parliament is a subject for indictment, had applied, there had been in one sense a violation of the letter of the Act of Parliament; but there had been no violation of the penal clause, and inasmuch as the liability to prosecution, as I submit, either in the Temporal Court or in the Spiritual Court is limited to the penal offences pointed out by the Act of Parliament, the judgment was reversed, and I apprehend that in considering these Acts of Parliament you must apply the same rule of interpretation; and excepting that the punishments may be different, you must be guided by the same rules and limits in the Spiritual Courts as you are in the Temporal Courts.

Now, my Lord, there is one other case, which is a very celebrated one, and a case with which I have no doubt your Lordship will be well acquainted, and which will probably be cited against me by my friend in reply. But when that case is carefully looked at, it does not in the slightest degree militate, as I submit, against the position which I have been venturing to lay down before your Lordship. I allude to the celebrated case on the King's Ecclesiastical Laws in 5 Coke.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Cawdray's case?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Cawdray's case. I take it for granted that my friend will urge this case against the contention which I am now humbly maintaining, but I submit with some confidence.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You know the case of Burgoyne v. Free bears upon your argument?

(Mr. Prideaux.) That was a case of prohibition.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes; but it was a case where there was a statute which pointed out the mode of proceeding.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I have only a general recollection of the case, but if my memory serves me rightly, Mr. Free was a gentleman rather free in his moral, or rather immoral, conduct. They attempted to obtain a prohibition against him, but could not, and I recollect there was a gentleman who, at the cost of all he was worth in the world, obtained deprivation against him.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I thought that case would have some bearing on your argument. It was cited by Lord Lyndhurst if I remember rightly.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am much obliged to your Lordship. The only case that I am aware of, which apparently militates against the proposition that I am laying down, is Cawdray's case. He had been proceeded against in the High Commission Court, and one great question was whether the High Commission Court had jurisdiction in the matter. But that is beside the purpose for which I cite it. The authorities no doubt say that whatever the King could do in his Ecclesiastical Court, could be done in the High Commission Court, so far as the subject-matter of that case is concerned; but that is a matter beside the purpose for which I cite this case before your Lordship. You will remember that by the High Commission Court, which for this purpose is to be regarded as an Ecclesiastical Court, Cawdray had been deprived of his living for an offence against the Act of Uniformity, and he had been deprived for a first offence. The statute law is more considerate than the ecclesiastical law is bound to be upon that question. The statute law imposes a penalty—I forget exactly what it is, but it is immaterial for this argument—for the first offence, but it is far short of deprivation. The offence which Cawdray had committed was a first offence. He had been deprived by the Court of High Commission for that first offence, and he contended that that was in violation of the statute; because the statute only imposes the penalty of deprivation upon a second offence, and it was held that by virtue of the clause which reserved to the Ecclesiastical Court the power of punishing offences against that Act, according to the course of ecclesiastical law, that deprivation was warranted. But what I wish particularly to call your Lordship's attention to is this, that the offence for which Cawdray was punished was an offence designated and pointed out under the penal sections of the Act of Parliament.

I will now call your Lordship's attention to the resolution upon which my friend will no doubt rely.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I know it was a very famous case on many grounds. Amongst others, if I remember rightly, it decided that the Crown had not got any new jurisdiction at the Restoration, but merely regained the old jurisdiction which it had formerly.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No doubt; in that view of the case I am as Protestant as my friend Mr. Stephens. I rejoice that the ancient jurisdiction of the King and Queen in matters ecclesiastical has been secured to this country. I am quite sure that my friend and I shall not differ there. It is a very long case, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I remember the immense accumulation of precedents in it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes. I am going to quote at page 5 of the edition which I have:—"As to the first and second objections, both being grounded upon the said Act of Parliament, it was resolved by the whole Court, that, notwithstanding these two objections, the sentence was not to be impeached for either of them; and that for three causes: first, for that the said Act concerning the uniformity of common prayer being in the affirmative doth not derogate or take away the jurisdiction ecclesiastical, unless words in the negative have been added—as, and not otherwise, or in no other manner or form, or to the like effect. And this appeareth by the general rule of all our books, as appeareth;" and then several cases are referred to. I suppose that is the resolution upon which my friend will rely; but all that that resolution decides, supposing it to be strict law, is this: that, inasmuch as it was not provided expressly in the statute that the Ecclesiastical Courts should not have jurisdiction, that the Ecclesiastical Courts might even, without the provision which follows in the Act, have jurisdiction to try an offence under the statute. But I submit that it does not carry it further. Mr. Thomas, in his edition, has a query to that effect.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is much the same as what I ventured to remark just now; that even if there had been no authority given under the statute, the Ecclesiastical Court would have had jurisdiction.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I should very much doubt it. At any rate it is clear that in express terms in this case jurisdiction is given to the Ecclesiastical Court by virtue of this Act.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But my question is, if it had not been given would not the Ecclesiastical Court still have had it? That case goes a long way in support of that idea.

(Mr. Prideaux.) It may or may not be, that if there had been no express clause giving jurisdiction to the Ecclesiastical Court, an argument might have been founded, that inasmuch as the matter concerned matters ecclesiastical, the Ecclesiastical Court had jurisdiction. But I say that the nature and the extent of the jurisdiction are pointed out by that clause which gives the Ecclesiastical Court jurisdiction by virtue of this Act, and that the fair construction to be put on that section is to hold that the Ecclesiastical Courts having this express jurisdiction given them, which they did not want, supposing the other view is correct, by virtue of this Act, is to hold that the only matters over which the Ecclesiastical Courts were to have jurisdiction were those in respect to which offences were declared to be committable under this Act. And the Court will remember that there is a fifth resolution, which is,—“To make assurance doubly sure, express jurisdiction is given to the Ecclesiastical Court by the statute.” And then they go on to discuss the further question, and they say that on the question then under consideration there is no distinction to be taken between an ordinary Ecclesiastical Court and that special, high, prerogative Court whose functions were then under consideration.

Adjourned to the next day at 11 o'clock.

SEVENTH DAY.

Saturday, January 11, 1868.

(Mr. Prideaux.) You have been pleased, my Lord, to call particular attention to a clause in the preface of the first Book, and which we find in the second Book of Common Prayer, under the title, "Concerning the Service of the Church," and have expressed a great desire that the counsel should render you such assistance as our humble efforts will enable us to do, bearing upon its construction. Therefore, in the first instance, with your Lordship's permission, I will refer to that clause.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am much obliged to you.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I shall have to deal with it again, but I am referring to it now as it appears to me to bear upon the question which I have already ventured to submit to your Lordship, namely, the necessity, in order to bring a clerk under the penal clauses of the Act of Parliament, of showing (and, of course, alleging in the pleadings) that what he did he did "wilfully and obstinately standing in the same." Now, my Lord, the clause is this, "And forasmuch as nothing can be so plainly set forth but doubts may arise in the use and practice of the same, to appease all such diversity (if any arise), and for the resolution of all doubts concerning the manner how to understand, do, and execute the things contained in this book, the parties that so doubt or diversely take anything, shall always resort to the bishop of the diocese, who, by his discretion, shall take order for the quieting and appeasing of the same, so that the same order be not contrary to anything contained in this book." Now it does appear to me that that clause has a very material bearing on the point which I ventured to submit to your Lordship yesterday, because the penal clauses of the statute show the method which is to be adopted where the clerk wilfully, and, with a view of disturbing the peace of the realm, steadfastly and obstinately persists in a course which he knows, or ought to know, to be wrong. It appears to me not to signify at all, as far as this case is concerned, whether the action of the bishop is to be in his ecclesiastical court or not, because your Lordship cannot doubt that in whatever manner the bishop is to act under this section, the proceeding must be a civil proceeding, and not a criminal one, and therefore, so far as the consideration of this case is concerned—

(The Dean of the Arches.) Why do you say it must be a civil and not a criminal proceeding?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say it for these two reasons, my Lord, first because it is not to be presumed that any penal proceeding is contemplated, unless it be expressly provided, or provided by necessary implication, which is the same thing, that the proceeding shall be criminal; and secondly, because it evidently points at that which would be most inequitable and unjust, to punish by criminal proceeding because it points not at any wilful impropriety, it points not at any misconduct, it simply points out a method for providing so that nothing be ordered contrary to anything that is contained in the book; it points out a method for adjusting bonâ fide doubts which the statute says in fact must arise, "inasmuch as nothing can be so plainly set forth but doubts may arise in the use and practice of the same;" and it goes farther, because it provides that the parties that so doubt, evidently giving the power of movement, I should say, to either party, and evidently contemplating a proceeding inter partes and not a criminal proceeding.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do not all your observations rather point to this, that the true interpretation of that clause is that the personal authority of the bishop is there invoked and not his legal authority?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I think it probably does; but I am addressing myself to the court at this moment for a particular object, and I am now making these remarks upon this section for two reasons. First, because your Lordship was pleased to express a desire that the counsel engaged in this case should direct their particular attention to the section; and secondly, because I say that it points out distinctly upon the face of the Act of Parliament, and the Prayer Book that is read with it, the class of cases in which the proceedings are to be taken.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Before the bishop?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, and so far as this argument is concerned it does not signify to me whether they are so to be taken before the bishop personally or in his ecclesiastical court. The important matter is that the statute acknowledges that nothing can be so clearly set forth but that doubts may honestly arise; and the statute provides, having already provided for those who "wilfully and obstinately" act contrary to the Prayer Book, very properly a criminal proceeding, the statute provides for those who conscientiously and honestly entertain doubts as to the use and practice of this book a civil method of ascertaining what practice ought to be adopted, namely, an appeal to the bishop by civil proceeding.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Let me ask you, would your argument go in this direction, that previous to the institution of criminal proceedings for violation of the Act of Uniformity there ought to have been an application to the bishop, under this rubric?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not think, assuming for the sake of argument that Mr. Mackonochie has been guilty of any offence under the first Act, that it is absolutely necessary; I shall not go the length of saying that there should have been a proceeding before the bishop in the first instance; but I say this, that unless the Court can see upon the face of these proceedings (and the Court will understand that when I say that, of course I insist that it must appear both on the pleadings and on the evidence) that what Mr. Mackonochie has done he did otherwise than in an honest doubt as to whether he had a right to do so; then assuming that view of the case, I say there ought. I say that no criminal proceedings would lie against him at all.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Until there had been an admonition from the bishop.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Certainly not until there had been an admonition from the bishop. Supposing that Mr. Mackonochie, acting upon this principle, "forasmuch as nothing can be so plainly set forth but doubts will arise;" supposing Mr. Mackonochie honestly doubts as to the uses and practices of which he is accused, then I say that no criminal proceedings will lie against him, not merely until after admonition (although it may be that after admonition Mr. Mackonochie might be liable to a proceeding for the breach of his canonical obedience, but that is not this case), I say that if Mr. Mackonochie honestly doubts as to whether he has not a right, or rather I should say, honestly believes that he has (because the doubts arise from the opposite side thinking differently) a right to do these things, then I say he does not do them "wilfully and obstinately standing in the same," and that the appeal ought to have been to the bishop under this provision. Then I admit that, supposing Mr. Mackonochie not honestly believing, but having the corrupt object which is imputed in the preamble to the penal clauses (and I am quite sure your Lordship will not hold for one instant that he has any such corrupt motive), but I say, supposing him to have such corrupt motive, still these proceedings ought to have been taken first, and then if Mr. Mackonochie persists in those practices after admonition, I admit that it would be very difficult to say that he had not used those practices "wilfully and obstinately standing in the same;" but I say, in the absence of an admonition, which is the proper ecclesiastical means of bringing a man into contumacy, and showing that he is acting "wilfully and obstinately," it is not to be inferred from the fact that Mr. Mackonochie is proved to have done or sanctioned these things on three occasions, that he did not do them in the honest belief that he was rightly carrying out the provisions of the Act of Parliament; and I say that in the absence of pleading and showing a monition forbidding him from doing it, the pleadings ought to show clearly and conclusively and unanswerably a state of facts which are inconsistent with innocence on his part, that is to say, either by express language or by language involving necessary implication, it ought to show a state of facts that what he has done he has done not in an honest doubt, but "wilfully and obstinately," and with an intention to "disturb the quiet and peace of the realm."

Now, my Lord, that is the additional suggestion which I venture to make upon this point. It is not to be presumed that Mr. Mackonochie has acted otherwise than honestly. If he has only acted honestly proceedings ought to have been taken under this provision; if he has acted dishonestly there is no evidence of it and no allegation of it; and the pleadings and the evidence ought either to show a monition or something from which you can in common fairness (because Mr. Mackonochie is entitled to every reasonable doubt) infer that he acted "wilfully and obstinately."

But, my Lord, this section has an important bearing, as I submit (it results from what I have already said—it is a corollary), but still in the multiplicity of matters that we have to consider, although it is to my mind a necessary corollary, I am quite sure your Lordship will feel I am not improperly taking up your time in calling your attention to it, and that is this: we had some discussion yesterday about the original common law jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court; and your Lordship will remember that I cited a famous case from Coke, for the purpose of endeavouring to show, and I hope conclusively showing, that the case was no authority against my contention. It certainly is not as regards the decision, and I do not think, when the reasons and results are looked at, that it is as regards the principle; but if I am right in the view which I take of this clause, it clearly confirms and supplements my argument, that in order to constitute a criminal offence there must have been a "wilfully and obstinately standing in the practice."

I shall have to trouble your Lordship by referring to that clause in the article upon ceremonies again; but those are the observations which I have to make upon it so far as it bears upon the point of law which I ventured to submit to your Lordship's consideration yesterday.

I will now make, with your Lordship's permission, a few remarks supplementary to what my friend Mr. James has said upon the necessary elements of the letters of request and of the citation. I shall be very short upon that point, and then when I have dealt with it I propose in the next instance to go, following so far the plan adopted by my learned friend, into the consideration of the general question, that is to say, the exact meaning of the words contained in the penal clauses of the Acts of Uniformity.

Now, my friend, Mr. James, referred your Lordship

to the case of Francis v. Stuart; and that I think I may fairly say may be called the leading case upon the question of the requirements of a citation. I say it with great respect, but it appears to me that that very case shows that in the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench the ecclesiastical courts had not been so particular as to the necessary requirements of the citation as in the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench they ought to have been. And every word, I think, of the judgment of Lord Denman in this well-considered case is deserving of very great consideration. Your Lordship will do me the favour to remember that this application was not made to the Court of Queen's Bench until after the matter had been carefully considered by the learned judge who then so ably filled the office which your Lordship is now filling, Sir Herbert Jenner Fust. The case is reported, I think, in 3 Curteis. I do not know that I need trouble your Lordship by any quotations from the report in the Ecclesiastical Court, but it will be sufficient for me to say that the sufficiency of the citation was elaborately argued in the Court of Arches, that an elaborate judgment was given by Sir Herbert Jenner Fust upon the question; that he reviewed the principles which regulated the requirements of citations, stating (and that is a somewhat remarkable thing) that he would rather be guided by what was then the practice of the Court than by the authority of the ancient writers upon ecclesiastical law—citing two of them—Oughton, I think, was one, and I forget the other at this moment, and coming to the conclusion that according to the then practice (and when I say "then," I do not mean to say that his judgment was that the practice had altered) according to the practice as it had been collected from what was then de facto done, the same strictness was not requisite in a citation as seemed to be requisite according to the authorities of those ancient writers; and after a most elaborate consideration of the subject he resolved that the citation was sufficient, and determined to proceed with the cause. It is true that he seemed to take a somewhat different view (but that is rather in my favour) of what in fact constituted the offence of wilfully and contumaciously obstructing the making of a church rate to that which the Court of Queen's Bench held. But still the broad question of the sufficiency of the citation as well as the question as to what constituted a criminal opposition to the making of a church rate, were elaborately argued, and there was an elaborate judgment delivered. That view of your Lordship's learned predecessor was not acquiesced in by the Court of Queen's Bench. The Court of Queen's Bench ruled that stricter principles must be applied to the requirements of a citation than Sir Herbert Jenner Fust had seemed to consider necessary, and granted their prohibition; and there is one portion of the judgment which my learned friend Mr. James did not read, to which I wish to call your Lordship's attention.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is in 5th Queen's Bench, Adolphus and Ellis, new series, is it not?

(Mr. Priday.) Yes; I am reading from page 995. The words were "particularly in respect to his having wilfully and contumaciously." This will be very important when your Lordship comes to consider some of the points, because if any words would cure a defective allegation of facts it would be such a word as "wilfully and contumaciously," which certainly are much stronger than the words "contrary to the statute," contra formam statuti, which mean nothing, and they are much stronger than the word "unlawfully," which means nothing. When I say contra formam statuti means nothing, under the old law it was necessary to allege it as a formal termination. But I mean to say that all decisions upon criminal pleadings show that there must be upon the face of the record allegation of facts from which the Court can see that the offence complained of has been committed, and that no omission, of whatever kind, can be cured by a mere general allegation that the matter was done "wilfully and contumaciously" or "against the form of the statute," or "unlawfully."

The words are "particularly in respect of his having wilfully and contumaciously obstructed or at least refused to make or join or concur in the making of a sufficient levy, rate, or assessment for providing funds in order to defray the expense of the necessary repairs of the parish church. The declaration alleged that by the said citation the plaintiff was not charged with any ecclesiastical offence cognizable by any Ecclesiastical Court. A general demurrer to this declaration has been argued before us. No question was made whether a citation must not contain the charge of an ecclesiastical offence. In the ancient constitutions a remedy is applied to many abuses of process by citing persons out of the jurisdiction wherein they reside, and finally the Act of Henry VIII. (commonly called the Bill of Citations) was passed to prevent this great and frequent oppression whereby persons often found themselves excommunicated and ruined without notice of the proceedings against them. But it is constantly assumed that they set forth on the face of them a spiritual offence." I pray your Lordship's especial attention to these words: "It is constantly assumed that they set forth on the face of them a spiritual offence. Many such offences were well known by their proper descriptions." Now we come to the important part of the case, showing that where the proceeding is for heresy or subtraction of a church rate, or any other matter where there is a technical term of art in the ecclesiastical jurisdiction to express it, it is sufficient that heresy, that brawling, that subtraction of the various kinds of ecclesiastical dues should be alleged. "It was not urged that there can be no offence where the acts charged are incapable of technical designation, but that, if the offence consists of special circumstances, these should appear on the citation." Now, my Lord, there is clearly no technical method of describing this; and the nearest approach to a technical view, if any, would have been the use of the words of the penal clause in the Act of Parliament, and to have said "for using (wilfully and obstinately standing in the same) another rite, ceremony, order, form, &c." Now, this is what I beg to call your Lordship's attention to especially, because it was argued that the citation was rather in the nature of process to bring a party into Court than in the nature of a criminal proceeding; to show him what was the exact nature of the offence charged against him. Your Lordship will observe, they are speaking here of the ancient writs, not of the simple mode which has been adopted in the courts in modern times: "not unlike the proceedings of our own Courts, where writs were provided in common form for known causes of action, but an action on the case might be founded on special facts converting what might have been innocent in itself into an injury to the party complaining; and a writ was framed for the occasion." Now, here I say, this part of the judgment is exactly applicable to this case. Apart from there being no technical method of describing the offence complained of against Mr. Mackonochie, it is quite clear, if I am right in the view I have taken before, that Mr. Mackonochie has committed what may be called an innocent offence. By "innocent" I mean an offence for which he is not liable to any criminal punishment, if he has merely done the thing in the honest belief that he was doing that which he had a right to do. "Converting what might have been innocent in itself into an injury to the party complaining, and a writ was framed for the occasion."

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord, at present I am not dealing with the articles.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But is not that the necessary inference of your argument, that they were inadmissible?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, I think not; I am at present laying down the broad principle; I shall only apply it to two out of the four charges.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I quite understand that.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am not now discussing the sufficiency of the articles.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But you are discussing the insufficiency of the decree by letters of request which is called the citation—it is the same thing; you are discussing the insufficiency of that instrument to bring the parties before the Court.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Quite so.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But has not that been already discussed?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord. I submit not, except upon one point. It is quite clear after what your Lordship has stated, I cannot say one word about the incensing, because your Lordship says (I regret it very much, because I really feel that it may lead to the necessity possibly of discussing that point elsewhere, when I should be glad that the matter should be dealt with by your Lordship,) but I understand your Lordship to say this, and I do not understand you to go further, that inasmuch as we specifically took the objection before your Lordship's learned predecessor, that the citation relating to using incense let in an article charging the censuring of persons and things, that whatever your Lordship's private view may be upon that question, you consider yourself bound by the decision of your predecessor and will not open it. That is what I understand your Lordship to have decided, but I beg to call your attention to this—

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not think I have said anything about incensing.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My Lord, that was the only question which was discussed.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I said that I considered myself bound by the judgment of my predecessor that these articles were admissible, and I called the learned counsel's attention to the history of the case, namely, that the admissibility of these articles was opposed, that that opposition was overruled, that subsequently amended articles were given in, and by consent of all parties admitted, as the minutes of the Court show, and I said that having regard to these circumstances, I did not think, and I do not think that it is competent to me to make any decision now as to the articles being inconsistent with the citation. That is what I stated as nearly as possible. I do not know the exact words I used, but in substance I think that was it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) With submission I would ask your Lordship to direct your attention to what really was done before your predecessor, and I submit that it will then be abundantly clear that according to every fair principle, the decision that your Lordship has come to can only apply to that part of the case relating to the censuring of persons and things.

My Lord, I am sorry to say that my friend, Dr. Tristram, is not here, because of course upon this part of the case he would be better able to address your Lordship than myself.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do not misunderstand me. Of course, Mr. Prideaux, I am quite ready to hear any argument you offer to me, and I think it competent for you to show, even at this time, that there is no ecclesiastical offence of which this Court has cognizance. Even now it is competent for you to show that. But the question as to the admissibility of the articles I consider concluded. I cannot open that question again.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Do I understand your Lordship to hold or not, because if not, I am sure you will pardon my addressing a few more words upon the subject—

(The Dean of the Arches.) I will hear you at any length you like, Mr. Prideaux. I have nothing to complain of at all in your mode of conducting the argument. Perhaps you had better take your own course. I would much rather hear you.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Then under those circumstances when I come to deal with the sufficiency of the citation, which will be my duty when I have finished my comments upon this case of Francis v. Steward, I shall deal then with what I understand to be the extent to which your Lordship is excluded from discussing this question.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I would rather you dealt with the whole question in your own way. A few minutes more or less in a case of this magnitude does not signify at all.

(Mr. Prideaux.) If your Lordship pleases. Then, my Lord, I say that the first part of this judgment shows clearly that the citation is not mere process to bring a party into court, but far from that, it must definitely point out the offence that is alleged to have been committed. Then the other part of the judgment to which I have ventured to draw your Lordship's attention is that dealing with the words "wilfully and contumaciously." "The Solicitor-General maintained that the words of charge which I have just read from the citation impute a spiritual offence. Not denying the right of every parishioner to refuse to make, or join or concur in making a church rate, nor even the right to vote against the imposition of a rate, he still urged that to do either 'wilfully and contumaciously' is a spiritual offence, and that the wilfulness and mode of refusing, and the accompanying acts inferring that contumacy which thus became the essence of it, need not be farther particularized in the citation, but may be introduced for the first time to the knowledge of the accused as evidence in support of the charge. In the proceedings of any court where an accusation is preferred, the minimum of allegation is the maximum required in proof; the prosecutor in several counts (as the charges in the præsertim are called by learned ecclesiastical judges) must be entitled to succeed if he establish any one of them, and, consequently, if this citation is good, the present plaintiff will incur spiritual censures though convicted of no other fact than that of a refusal to join in making a church rate." Then comes the discussion of the law on the making of a church rate. Then a subsequent part which I wish to read is at page 1005, because it contains observations which my friend did not bring under your Lordship's notice, important as showing that you cannot cure a citation any more than you can an indictment at common law, or than you could the original writ at common law by simply drawing an inference of law, but that goes for nothing. "But here attention must be drawn to the citation as it appears in these pleadings. (His Lordship here read from the citation the words describing the alleged offence.) According to the strict rules of criticism, at least of legal criticism, as applied to instruments which ought to show criminal jurisdiction, the words 'wilfully and contumaciously,' would appear to be confined to the obstruction, and by no means necessarily connected with the refusal. But if they were we must examine the force of the word 'contumaciously.' To an argument at the bar that there can be no contumacy without a monition, a previous monition—'monitione præmissa,' this was the reasoning of the judge in the Court of Arches." "It is said that a person cannot be contumacious unless there has been a monition issued against him, which has been disobeyed; and perhaps that is correctly argued.—What then? The words 'contumaciously obstructing' import 'that there has been a monition,' for if contumacy consists in disobeying a legal order, it follows from the use of the word 'contumacy' that there has been such an order."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Had there been a legal order in that case?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not know whether there had been. I rather think not; but it certainly did not appear. I cannot say whether there had been an order, but there was no allusion to it in the citation. "If the whole train of circumstances necessary to make out an offence must be inferred from the "use of a word which would be inapplicable unless those circumstances existed, the art of criminal pleading in all our courts will be reduced within very narrow limits indeed." And indeed, my Lord, that is a matter almost self-evident. All the common law authorities show (and there are hundreds of them which show) that stating an inference of law does not add any pleading at all; and therefore the words "contrary to the Prayer Book," which occur in one of the charges, and the word "unlawfully," which occurs in one or two of them, absolutely mean nothing so far as regards the consideration of the sufficiency of the citation.

I will be very brief in my remarks upon the special clauses upon the various legal proceedings:

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then do I understand your argument at present to be that this citation is insufficient?

(Mr. Prideaux.) My argument is that the citation—

(The Dean of the Arches.) The decree, rather.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That the decree is insufficient in some of the articles.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am speaking of the decree now—the instrument you call the citation. It is a decree in this case—it is the same thing. Do you say it is insufficient? That is what I want to know.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, certainly, with respect to two of the articles. I take it to be quite clear that the foundation of your Lordship's jurisdiction (and I shall submit that a question of jurisdiction may be discussed at any time, because no consent can cure jurisdiction, and as no consent can cure jurisdiction (and no principle of law is better established than that), I shall submit that it is open to your Lordship to consider all these matters, and I do submit it with great confidence. I am glad Dr. Tristram has returned, because he is so conversant with the practice of the ecclesiastical courts (as, of course, your Lordship is) that he will at once correct me if I am wrong. I say that it is quite clear your Lordship's jurisdiction is limited entirely by the Church Discipline Act. By the Church Discipline Act it is limited to those matters which you are asked to try by the letters of request, and I say that it is not sufficient that the decree and the articles should agree, but that they must also agree with the letters of request.

Now, my Lord, in one point (I will call attention to it presently) there is, as I submit, a fatal variance between the letters of request and the decree; and I submit that you are not at any rate precluded from inquiring into that. I further submit that you are not precluded by any decision of your learned predecessor from inquiring into the sufficiency of the decree, although you may be precluded from inquiring as to whether the words "used incense" admit the article charging the censuring of persons and things. Because if I recollect right, and I believe I am right (but it will be in your Lordship's recollection and my friend Dr. Tristram's) the only article which was formally opposed was the article relating to the censuring of persons and things. We took an objection to the sufficiency of the article relating to elevation. That I concede, but that is a different thing. We did not object that that article was not warranted by the decree, or that the decree was insufficient. Indeed, as far as I recollect, we did not object to the sufficiency of the decree at all, and we only objected to the sufficiency of one article seriously, the article relating to the elevation. But we did object in terms, if I recollect right, that the citation relating to the use of incense during the celebration of the Holy Communion did not admit a charge that Mr. Mackonochie had censured persons and things during the celebration of the Holy Communion. Your Lordship's learned predecessor ruled that the words "unlawfully using incense during the Communion Service" were sufficient to let in an article charging the censuring of persons and things.

(The Dean of the Arches.) He did so?

(Mr. Prideaux.) He did so. I can well understand (and I regret it for the same reason, but I understand your Lordship to have made up your mind upon that point, and it would be disrespectful in me to urge anything against it), that your Lordship may say, "I will not consider here whether that allegation in the decree relating to incense is sufficient to let in a charge of censuring persons and things, because my learned predecessor and myself must be considered on this point as one man, and he has ruled that the thing is sufficient."

(The Dean of the Arches.) And you did not appeal from it, but subsequently admitted the same thing, I think, in Acts of Court?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I must remind your Lordship we could not appeal from it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think you are hardly aware of the Minute?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I have not read the Minute, but I was in Court and paid great attention.

(The Dean of the Arches.) "The judge admitted the articles as amended. Moore brought in Court third and fourth articles as further amended by him, and prayed that they might be substituted for the third and fourth as amended by him. On the 29th May, Brooks (that is the proctor of Mr. Mackonochie) declared that he did not oppose the admission of articles with the third and fourth articles so amended, whereupon the judge admitted the articles." Now, surely, Mr. Prideaux (I will hear you at any length you like) it is in vain to contend that you have not yourself sanctioned the admission of these articles. You have declared that you did not oppose it, and it must be taken that you admitted them according to the minutes of the Court.

(Mr. Prideaux.) What I am desirous of calling your Lordship's attention to is the distinction; I am sure I will not keep up this part of the case one moment longer than your Lordship may think I am justified in doing—

(The Dean of the Arches.) I will hear you at any length, Mr. Prideaux.

(Mr. Prideaux.) What I respectfully am begging your Lordship to consider now, is the difference between the formal admission of articles and the decision that an article relating to a particular matter—the solemn decision after argument—is admissible upon the true terms of the decree. I apprehend, my Lord, that a defendant in these proceedings is never bound to contest the point upon the admissibility of the articles. It is open to him to allow the articles to be filed, and to discuss the sufficiency of them afterwards.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But they were opposed in this case, and they were subsequently admitted with your consent.

(Mr. Prideaux.) We could not oppose them again. They were opposed as articles.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Why not? They were ordered to be amended, and they were brought in as amended, and you assented to them as being sufficiently amended, whereby the Court must be bound.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I must remind your Lordship that we asked leave to appeal, and the judge refused to allow us. What I mean is this, we only insisted in one single case that the articles were not warranted by the citation; the discussion with reference to the other articles, was upon the form of the articles themselves, and therefore with regard to these other articles, I say the cases stand in the same position as if we had formally admitted them without argument at all. And do I understand your Lordship to go the length of saying that if Mr. Mackonochie had been advised to take the whole question when it came to be argued in Court here instead of objecting to the admissibility of the articles in the first instance, it would have not been open to him to do so?

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have said no such thing.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Then I respectfully submit that this is the same point. I am sure if I put this question, your Lordship will feel that I put it respectfully, I intend to do so certainly. Suppose for the sake of argument (I am not now dealing with the question of censuring persons and things, because I admit that it probably may not be open to us to insist that the censuring of persons and things is not admissible under the form of the citation after a solemn decision from your Lordship's predecessor that it is admissible, but I am now considering the question, first of the sufficiency of the decree, and secondly, the question of the agreement of the articles with the decree)—I wish to ask your Lordship this question, whether if the articles had been admitted pro forma, without argument at all, it would or not have been open to Mr. Mackonochie in this Court to take upon argument the objection, both that the decree showed no ecclesiastical offence, and also that the articles showed no ecclesiastical offence, and were not warranted by the decree.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You must be perfectly aware in your own experience at the bar, that no judge is in the habit of answering hypothetical questions. It is sufficient for me to say, that was not the question proposed in this case. You did oppose the articles, they were amended, and you admitted them to be entered upon the minutes of this Court. I will hear you at any length you please upon this point.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am much obliged to your Lordship, but after that intimation I shall content myself with calling your attention simply to a single defect, a fatal defect as I submit (my learned friend has argued the others, and if I say anything about them, I will not do it until I come to deal specifically with the question) as regards the inconsistency between the letters of request and the decree, and the articles with reference to the mixed chalice. I merely mention it and call attention to it without arguing the point at all. The letter of request upon this point says, "by mixing water with the wine used in the administration of the Holy Communion," the citation says, "by mixing water with the wine in the administration of the Holy Communion."

(Mr. Prideaux.) That is the same thing, but I think it is not so in the citation.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have got them both before me, and they are precisely the same.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Then even if that be so, that does not affect my argument, because there is still a fatal variance.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I will read them to you. The letters of request say: "by mixing water with the wine in the administration of the Holy Communion in the said parish church, and by permitting and sanctioning such mixture." Then it winds up according to the forms of the Court. Then the decree says, "by mixing water with the wine in the administration of the Holy Communion."

(Mr. Prideaux.) Then if so, I say there is a fatal variance between the decree and the articles.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then you say there is no fatal variance between the decree and the letters of request.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Apparently, from what your Lordship has read they are the same words.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Just the same.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My copy is different certainly.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Quite so, my Lord, I do not dispute that for one moment; and it merely shifts my argument from the letters of request to the articles. I merely call your Lordship's attention to that—I say that the citation does not at all point to water having been mixed during the administration of the Holy Communion. It simply says "by mixing water with the wine used in the Holy Communion."

(The Dean of the Arches.) The discrepancy between the articles and the citation, as I understand, is that in the citation the offence alleged is using water with the wine in the Holy Communion, and in the articles it says mixing it at the time.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Quite so, and I say that is an essential difference, I say the citation simply charges that the defendant mixed water with the wine that was used. The articles says that he did it during the administration of the Holy Communion.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I will take a note of your objection.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I respectfully submit that as regards the mixed chalice that is a fatal objection. And now, my Lord, I will deal with perhaps the most important question which I have to consider, namely, what is the exact meaning of the words in the penal clause.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are now going to the statute of Elizabeth and the statute of Edward.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I read from the statute of Edward simply because it is more convenient with my books that I should do so, but there is no difference, or at least I will call attention to the only difference between the two statutes. What I have now to consider,—not that in our view of the case it applies to all the charges necessarily, although in one sense it must apply to all; what I have now to consider is what is the meaning of the words “shall use,” (I leave out for this purpose the words “wilfully and obstinately standing in the same,” because I have discussed them already,) “any other rite or ceremony, order, form, or manner of mass.” I believe the only difference is, that the word “mass” has been dropped, and “celebrating the Lord’s Supper,” has been substituted.

(Mr. Prideaux.) There is no substantial difference between them, and this book is much more convenient for me. I believe the words stand totidem verbis except that the word “mass” is dropped, and “celebrating the Lord’s Supper” is substituted, which evidently means the same thing, or shall use “any other rite, ceremony, order, form, or manner of mass openly or privily, or matins, evensong, administration of the sacraments, or other open prayer than is mentioned and set forth in the said book.” Here the question is (because all these charges relate to the celebration of the Holy Communion); whether Mr. Mackonochie in all or any of these charges has used “any other rite, ceremony, order, form, or manner of celebrating the Lord’s Supper than is mentioned and set forth in the said Prayer Book;” that is the question, and, therefore, it is very important that we should ascertain if we can the meaning of that passage. Now, my Lord, it is a remarkable fact that this matter has been discussed for six days before your Lordship, and the full definition and title of the Prayer Book has not yet been brought under your Lordship’s notice, and upon the definition of the Prayer Book a great deal will turn. It occurs (I am again reading from the Act of Edward, but it is exactly the same as the Act of Charles) in the first section of the first Act of Uniformity; my learned friend read it down to “entitled the Book of Common Prayer,” and there my friend stopped. After reading the preamble and triumphing very much upon the use of the words “extern ceremonies,” my friend came down to the title of the book, and he said, “entitled the Book of Common Prayer,” and there he stopped. But, my Lord, the full title of the book is “The Book of Common Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church after the Use of the Church of England.” Now, my Lord, my friend Mr. Coleridge made some reference to our having to a certain extent cut ourselves off from communion with the churches of the Continent, and suggested that as we had done that, it was very desirable, having made such a sacrifice, for that was what I understood his argument to be, that we should carry it out for the peace of the country. But, my Lord, what say the bishops in their answer to the exceptions of the ministers in the Savoy conference? I am going to cite from Cardwell’s Conferences, page 339, proposition 5. “It is desired that nothing should be in the liturgy which so much as seems to countenance the observation of Lent as a religious fast;” and this as an expedient to peace, which is in fact to desire that this our church may be contentious for peace’s sake, and to divide from the church catholic that we may live in unity among ourselves. For St. Paul reckons them amongst the lovers of contention who shall oppose themselves to the customs of the Church of God. Your Lordship will remember the passage “We have no such custom, neither the churches of God.” And I do submit that this is to strike secretly at some established doctrine or some laudable practice of the Church of England, or it may be of the whole Church of Christ.” Your Lordship will remember that in the introduction to our present Prayer Book (when I say introduction I mean the preface justifying the alterations made) it is expressly declared that in the alterations that were made there was an extreme desire on the part of Parliament and the Convocation at that time to avoid sanctioning anything which might strike secretly at an established doctrine or any laudable practice of the Church of England or, indeed, of the whole Church of Christ. Now, my Lord, the whole of the argument of my learned friend practically has been to contend that we are not a branch of the Catholic Church. I very much regret that my friend should have adopted such a course, and God forbid that it should lead to any result which may carry out such an assumption; but my friend’s broad argument has been “The Church of England is not a branch of the one Catholic Church of Christ, but it is a church established by Act of Parliament.” My Lord, that is the very argument which those who continue in communion with the Church of Rome urge against us, and if it be true, the sooner the Church of England crumbles to pieces the better. But what says the Act, “The Book of Common Prayer and administration of the sacraments and other rites and ceremonies of the church, according to the use of the Church of England.” Therefore, my Lord, the object of the statute is not to establish Act of Parliament rites, is not to introduce any rite which is foreign to the one Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church, but to provide a special and general use for celebrating in the Church of England the rites and ceremonies of the Church. Because that the words “the church” there mean the Catholic Church and not the Church of England alone is perfectly clear, for the title is not “the administration of the sacraments and the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England,” but the language is, “the administration of the sacraments and other rites and ceremonies of the Church according to the use of the Church of England.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) What are you referring to? Because the Act of Elizabeth is this: “A Book intituled the Book of Common Prayer and Administration of Sacraments and other Rites and Ceremonies in the Church of England.”

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord, but the statute of Edward, and what is much more important, the statute of Charles, is what I have read to your Lordship, and if your Lordship will look at any Prayer Book of the present day you will find it so.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I will read it to you from the statute of Charles. It begins by reciting the statute of Elizabeth, and using the language used there: “Whereas in the first year of the late Queen Elizabeth there was one uniform order of Common Service and Prayer, and of the administration of the sacraments and rites and ceremonies of the Church of England.”

(Mr. Prideaux.) With all due submission, my Lord, it is not "of the Church of England," but "in the Church of England," and that makes a great difference. No doubt that section refers to the special form of celebrating the rite which had been adopted in the Church of England; but it is very important to observe that the words are not "of the Church of England," but "in the Church of England," evidently meaning exactly the same thing as according to the use of the Church of England.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, "in the Church of England;" I thought I said so.

(Mr. Prideaux.) "Agreeable to the Word of God and the usages of the Primitive Church." Really the references which show that the extreme desire of our reformers was to reform the Church and not to make an Act of Parliament Church, to render themselves consonant with the practices and doctrines of the Primitive Church, are so numerous and so well known that considering the fact that I am addressing a judge whose special duty and interest it has been to attend to these matters, I really feel it is hardly necessary for me to press that argument upon you. "Com-piled by the Reverend Bishops and Clergy set forth in one book intitled the Book of Common Prayer and Administration of Sacraments, and other Rites and Ceremonies in the Church of England, and enjoined to be used by Act of Parliament, holden in the said first year of the said late Queen, intitled An Act for the uniformity of Common Prayer and Service in the Church, and administration of the Sacraments, very comfortable to all good people desirous to live in Christian conversation, and most profitable to the estate of this realm, upon the which the mercy, favour, and blessing of Almighty God is in no wise so readily and plentifully poured as by common prayer, due using of the sacraments, and often preaching of the gospel, with devotion of the hearers. And yet this, notwithstanding a great number of people in divers parts of this realm, following their own sensuality, and living without knowledge and due fear of God, do wilfully and schismatically abstain and refuse to come to their parish churches, and other public places where common prayer, administration of the sacraments, and preaching of the Word of God is used upon the Sundays and other days ordained and appointed to be kept and observed as holy days. And whereas by the great and scandalous neglect of ministers in using the said order of liturgy so set forth and enjoined as aforesaid, great mischief and inconveniences during the times of the late unhappy troubles have arisen and grown, and many people have been led into factions and schisms to the great decay and scandal of the reformed religion of the Church of England, and to the hazard of many souls. For prevention whereof in time to come for settling the peace of the Church and for allaying the present distempers which the indisposition of the time hath contracted: The King's Majesty (according to his declaration of the five and twentieth of October 1660) granted his commission under the Great Seal of England to several bishops and other divines, to review the Book of Common Prayer, and to prepare such alterations and additions as they thought fit to offer; and afterwards the convocations of both the provinces of Canterbury and York, being by His Majesty called and assembled (and now sitting), His Majesty hath been pleased to authorize and require the presidents of the said convocations, and other the bishops and clergy of the same, to review the said book of Common Prayer, and the book of the form and manner of the making and consecrating of bishops, priests, and deacons."

Now I do very respectfully and earnestly press upon you the consideration that the Prayer Book is not a Prayer Book containing the rites and ceremonies of a state-made church; that the Prayer Book did not intend to deal, nor does it deal, with any other rites and ceremonies whatever than are those of the Holy Catholic Church; that the rites and ceremonies contained in the Prayer Book are the rites and ceremonies of the Church of Christ, but no doubt they are to be celebrated according to the use of the Church of England; and the question which we have to consider (or one of them) here is whether Mr. Mackonochie, who has adhered in every respect to the practice of the Universal Catholic Church, can be said not to have celebrated a rite or ceremony of the church according to the use of the Church of England, because he has introduced one or two actions, not words. There may be a great distinction between introducing additional words and introducing additional actions, but I apprehend, even if he had used additional words, the argument would still be valid and would scarcely be different according to the authority of the case of The King v. Sparkes. But one important question here is, has Mr. Mackonochie, by introducing these matters according to the practice of the whole Church of Christ, essentially parts of the rites though not perhaps essential parts—because there is a distinction between those two terms—whether by introducing usages which existed in the Church of England at the time of the Reformation and which existed throughout the whole Catholic Church of Christ, and which are not extern ceremonies, that is to say, ceremonies unconnected with the celebration under consideration, but essentially parts even if they be not essential parts of the rite in question; whether he can be said to have celebrated that rite, (because the words rite and ceremony evidently ride over the sacrament as well as everything else) the words being "and other rites and ceremonies of the Church of England;" whether he can be said to have celebrated a rite which, whatever may be the differences, and whatever my friend may say upon that point, is one in the Church of England, and in the Church of Rome, and in the Greek Church, and which is called in the Church of England no doubt the administration of the Holy Communion; called in the Church of Rome the Mass; called in the Greek Church the Divine Liturgy, varying of course in the form and ceremonial, which shows that the words "rite and ceremony" there can have no reference to the mere form and ceremonial; the question is whether Mr. Mackonochie, in celebrating this one rite, the great feast upon the Eucharistic Sacrifice common to all the branches of the Catholic Church, each celebrating the same rite; but celebrating it according to the use or the particular Missal or Prayer Book of each particular church, can be said to have used a rite, ceremony, order, form, or manner of celebrating the Holy Communion other than, and not according to the use of the Church of England? Because what the Church of England deals with is not the rite but the special national use by which that rite universal has to be celebrated. Now, bearing in mind that the object of the Prayer Book is to prevent one using the Salisbury use, another using the Hereford use, another using the Bangor use, and another the use of York, and that the object of the Prayer Book is to secure one uniform use, how should we expect that that object would be carried out? Why, we should expect that it would be carried out in two ways, first by affirmatively directing the clerk to celebrate that rite which is a rite of the Holy Catholic Church according to the use of the Church of England, and secondly, by directing that he should not celebrate that rite according to any use which could fairly and honestly be said not to be the use of the Church of England. That is what we should expect, and that is what we find. And here we are referred simply for this purpose to the first Act of Uniformity, the 2nd and 3rd Edward VI., cap. 1., and to the third Act of Uniformity, the 1st of Elizabeth, cap. 2, for the purpose of seeing in what manner the Legislature and the Convocation have taken care, first, to secure affirmatively the use of the Church of England in the celebration of these rites of the Catholic Church, and secondly, to prevent the celebration of these rites according to any other use. That brings us to these words, "shall use any other rite, cere"mony, order, form, or manner of mass, or celebrating the Lord's Supper openly or privately." Now I should like to know under which of these words my learned friend says that Mr. Mackonochie has offended by introducing that which is consonant with the Prayer Book, and essentially part of the rite celebrated, without introducing a single foreign word, or departing in one single instance from any prescription whatever contained in the Prayer Book? It cannot be the words "rites and ceremonies." It is quite clear that in the first part of the section the words "rite, ceremony," referred essentially to the nature of the services and nothing else. Because you cannot have the same rite celebrated according to the use of the Greek Church, and according to the use of the Roman Church, and according to the use of the English Church, and according to the use of any other church; you cannot have the same rite celebrated in the same words and with the same ceremonies exactly, and therefore it is perfectly clear that in that section by the terms rites and ceremonies is meant nothing more than the essential office which is celebrated; that is to say, in this particular case, the eucharistic service, called as I have already said in the Roman Church the Mass, in the Greek Church the Divine Liturgy, in the English Church the office for the Holy Communion; but the same rite or ceremony of the one Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church, and necessarily as regards order and form so to be celebrated. But do the words rite or ceremony in the penal clause mean anything different?

My learned friend, as I understand him, would submit to your Lordship that by the words "rite, ceremony," there are meant the individual pieces of ceremonial. My Lord, the argument will not hold water for one moment. Whether these words "rite, ceremony," are intended to be governed by the words "celebrating the Lord's Supper, Matins, Even Song," and so forth, or not, there may be some doubt. Possibly they are not; because unless these words "rite, ceremony," are held to apply to other rites and ceremonies of the Church, the prohibitory clause would apply only to the celebration of the sacrament, and such rites as may fairly be called "open prayer," "open prayer" being defined in and throughout this Act as meaning—

(The Dean of the Arches.) What are you now reading from?

(Mr. Prideaux.) From the first Act of Uniformity. Your Lordship will find it exactly the same in the Act of Elizabeth, the second section. By "open prayer" I say in and throughout this Act is meant that prayer which is for others to come and hear either in open Churches, or in private chapels or oratories, commonly called the Service of the Church. Now I think in a penal clause your Lordship would have some difficulty in applying those words to the ceremony of marriage or the ceremony of burial, and therefore unless the words "rite, ceremony," are intended to apply to such rites, it would seem that there is no penal clause at all bearing upon the celebration of the occasional services of the Church, for it certainly (and especially in a penal statute) would be going a great way to hold that open prayer, which is for others to come unto and hear, comprises such services or ceremonies as marriage and burial. But supposing the words "rite, ceremony," rode over the words "manner of celebrating the Lord's Supper," it is quite clear that the words "rite, ceremony," are there used not to indicate any special individual act of ceremonial, but are used in the same sense as they are used in the title to the Prayer Book, namely, to indicate the whole of the particular services according to the use of the Church of England. When they speak of the rites of the Church, they mean essentially particular services in whatever form, or whatever church celebrated, when they speak of the rite of administering the Holy Communion, &c., &c., in this clause, they mean the rite of the church according to the Church of England. Therefore, I say it is quite clear that those words "rite, ceremony," whether they be held to apply to occasional services, or whether they be held to have been introduced with a view to ride over the subsequent part of the clause, and mean any rite, ceremony, order, form, or manner of celebrating the Holy Communion, I say it is unquestionably clear that those words point to the service as a whole, and not to any individual act of ceremonial. Therefore it is not upon the letter of the statute that my learned friend can maintain this prosecution.

Now, there are abundant proofs to show the meaning of the word "ceremony" in the Church of England.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do I catch your argument rightly that "rite" and "ceremony" when used in the Prayer Book apply to the whole service, and not to any particular part of it?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Quite so, at any rate it is enough for me upon this part of the case to say that they do. It may be that on other occasions, speaking of other matters alio intuitu, for instance, in the preface of the Prayer Book, where the object was to speak of the alterations which had been made, and to deal with the complaints which had been made by the Puritans at that time, it may or may not be that the word "rite" in the preface has a different meaning. But that is when they are writing alio intuitu, writing with the object of justifying individual alterations and additions; and of course where a document is written for the purpose of justifying individual alterations and additions (and they relate to words mainly if not entirely), of course language would be used with the object of designating such individual additions and alterations. But my contention is that beyond a shadow of a doubt "rite and ceremony" in the title in the Prayer Book, and the words "rite, ceremony," in the penal clauses of the Acts of Parliament, mean, not individual acts of ritual, but services as a whole, and the evidence, my Lord, that is the meaning of them is overwhelming. I do not think it is possible to put any other construction upon them reasonably, and at all events the evidence that that is what is meant is, as I have before said, overwhelming.

Now let us take the Prayer Book itself, and allow me to call your Lordship's attention to the last Rubric but one—at the end of the Communion in the first Prayer Book. Your Lordship will find it in the book which my learned friends call the Liturgies of Edward the Sixth, at page 98, and I may tell you it is the last Rubric but one, in case you should have another edition, and have any difficulty in finding it. It is Edward's first Prayer Book. "Furthermore, every man and woman to be bound to hear and be at the divine service in the parish church where they be resident, and there with devout prayer or Godly silence and meditation to occupy themselves. There to pay their duties, to communicate once in the year at the least, and there to take all other sacraments and rites in this book appointed."

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say it is manifest there that the word "rites" is applied to the entire service; because it would be absurd to say that a man was to come to church "to receive and take" the mixing of the chalice for instance. I am now showing your Lordship, although I feel it is scarcely necessary, because it is so clear on the language of the statute itself; but I am now venturing to call your Lordship's attention to a few passages in the Prayer Book for the purpose of showing that it is impossible to hold that the words "rite and ceremony" in the book mean individual acts of ritual or ceremonial. It does not follow from that, I admit, that I am right in my contention, but I will deal with that part of the case afterwards.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Supposing that were so, how would you be advantaged by that construction, I do not at present see.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I submit I have two advantages.

The great advantage is that it is quite clear that in terms the penal clauses did not prohibit individual acts of ceremonial. I say in terms, I feel it my duty to endeavour to show two things—first, that there is no express prohibition relating in terms to any particular individual act of ceremonial.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Other than those in the Prayer Book?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Of course I mean other than those expressly mentioned. I say there is no word which upon the face of it means that.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No express prohibition of any particular act of ceremonial other than those expressed in the Prayer Book?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I think I may put the proposition in a broader form?

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is for you to say. I only want to get your proposition down.

(Mr. Prideaux.) If my friend could establish the fact that "rite, ceremony," in the penal clause meant individual acts of ceremonial, of course he would have gone a great way to prove his case. What I am now respectfully contending is this, that he cannot shelter himself under the direct meaning of these words. Whether the passage as a whole is sufficient for his purpose I will consider presently. But I am now venturing to submit to the Court this simple argument, that nowhere can my friend show any penal clause or any prohibition at all in terms prohibiting any special individual act of ceremonial.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then the consequence of that proposition would be that it would be competent for a clergyman to introduce other ceremonial acts than those mentioned in the Prayer Book.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Other ceremonial acts, provided they be not repugnant to that which is mentioned, and provided they be essentially a part, though not, as I said before, an essential part of the rite celebrated.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It would be a service not mentioned in the Prayer Book, would it not?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say it would be the same service; that is the question.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Take other words for instance.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Well, according to the authorities (for my learned friend has not cited any the other way) you might introduce other words. But, my Lord, I have nothing to do with words in this case; there is no such charge against Mr. Mackonochie.

(The Dean of the Arches.) As I understand you, you say no express prohibition of any particular act of ceremonial other than those expressed in the Prayer Book and in the penal clause in terms prohibiting any such act of ceremonial, although that act of ceremonial is not to be found in the Prayer Book.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Well, my Lord, I think what is called in this statute "extern" ceremonial may be forbidden by the whole of the sentence, but what I am respectfully contending for now is that the word "rite" and the word "ceremony" are used in this section to mean an entire office.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I fully understand that argument.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes; and therefore I say that my friend cannot triumphantly point to these words and say, "You must be convicted, for you have used water." My learned friend has said throughout that the burning of the candles is a ceremony, the mixing of the water with the wine is a ceremony, the burning of incense is a ceremony; my contention is, that as far as this case is concerned they are not ceremonies, and they are not rites within the meaning of these words in the penal clause. That, my Lord, is my contention, and I am not going further than that now. Therefore, I say, my learned friend cannot shelter himself under the mere use of the words "rite, ceremony."

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say these are not rites and ceremonies?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say they are not rites and ceremonies within the meaning of the penal clause; that is all I say, because I contend that a rite or ceremony—

(The Dean of the Arches.) I understand. I need not take down the formal proposition.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No; your Lordship has at length extracted my meaning in a very much clearer and better way than I put it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not say that at all, Mr. Prideaux. You have a very elaborate argument to conduct, and the Court is anxious to follow it. As I understand, you say all these acts charged—the burning of the candles, the mixing of the water with the wine, and so on, are not rites and ceremonies within the meaning of the statute.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Precisely. If the charge had been, "You have been celebrating the rite of the Lord's Supper in other manner than is mentioned and set forth in the Book of Common Prayer"—that would be another question. It is entirely another matter whether these things which my learned friend relies upon might be evidence to prove it; but I say these things are not in themselves ceremonies within the meaning of that penal clause.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Just let me ask you, only for the sake of understanding your argument, supposing they were not rites and ceremonies—I put it for the sake of clearness—assume for the purpose of the present investigation that they were not rites and ceremonies under the meaning of the Act, would your client be much advantaged even by that?

(Mr. Prideaux.) The decree charges him with doing all these things contrary to the general ecclesiastical law, as well as contrary to the particular statute. Well, then, my Lord, I say it is not contrary to the general ecclesiastical law, but I have argued that case already, that no offence has been committed unless there has been a violation of the penal clauses of the Acts of Uniformity.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Your contention is that unless the case be brought within a violation of the penal clauses of the Acts of Uniformity, there is no case against Mr. Mackonochie.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That is the point upon which I am now.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say it must stand or fall by that.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say it must stand or fall by that, and so said my learned friend in fact in his argument; my learned friend's whole argument was "the penal clause prohibits your using any other rite or ceremony in the celebration of the service," and those are "other rites and ceremonies in the celebration of the service," that is the whole of my learned friend's argument.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are now engaged in showing that these are not rites and ceremonies in the sense that the Prayer Book understood it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Exactly, in the sense in which those words are used in the penal clauses of the Act of Parliament, but whether they are evidence to show that looking at the office as a whole, a different rite and ceremony than that mentioned and set forth in the Act of Parliament has been used is another question which I shall deal with afterwards. But I say that in terms it is quite clear that the words "rite, ceremony," whether they be regarded as applying to the occasional services of the Church, in which case they have no bearing upon this question, because this is not a question relating to occasional services of the Church, but a question relating to the celebration of the Lord's Supper, or whether the statute is to be read "rite, ceremony, order, form, or manner of celebrating the Lord's Supper." I say that in either case it is perfectly clear the word "rite" and the word "ceremony" are used there to indicate entire offices of the Catholic Church according to the use of the Church of England; that it is impossible therefore to bring Mr. Mackonochie under the strict letter of those two words, and that the question therefore really to be considered is whether, regarding this rite as the rite of the administration of the Lord's Supper, it can be said that Mr. Mac-konoehie has used a "rite or ceremony, order, form, " or manner of celebrating the Lord's Supper " other than is mentioned and set forth in this book? " If he has, no doubt, supposing your Lordship should be of opinion that the objection which I insisted upon in the first instance is not tenable, he would be responsible. Therefore it is very important for me to show your Lordship the use which is made of the words "rite, ceremony," in the Prayer Book, and it is in that view that I have called your Lordship's attention to the Rubric at the end of the Communion in the first Prayer Book which I have ventured to read to you, and I will take the liberty, as it is short, of just reading it again, because it so clearly shows the use of the word "rite," "there to pay their duties, communicate once in the year at least, and there to receive and take all other Sacraments and rites in " this book appointed." Well then, if your Lordship looks at the second Prayer Book, the sixth Rubric at the end of the Communion, you find substantially the same words, "and note that every parishioner " shall communicate at the least three times in the " year, of which Easter shall be one, and shall also receive the Sacrament and other rites according to the " order in this book appointed."

In support of the argument, I will just mention incidentally what is the meaning of the words Rituale Romanum. What is the Rituale Romanum? It is the book containing the rites and services as a whole of the holy Roman Catholic Church, excepting those daily prayers which are contained in the Breviary, and the celebration of the mass, which is contained in the Mass Book, and I have a book here (and it certainly is not a book of any extreme views), which is important, as showing the meaning which has been attributed to those words "rites and ceremonies," and the probable object of them, long before this controversy arose. This book was published in 1840, and I daresay it is known to your Lordship. It is a history of the Prayer Book of the Church of England by the venerable Edward Behrens, M.A., Archdeacon of Berks. It is one of the books published for the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, and a very useful book it was at the time it was written, and is now.

I will just take the liberty of reading a passage from the bottom of page 11: "One of the first objects of Cranmer and his fellow-labourers was to enable the " people of this land to join the public worship of the " Church both with the spirit and the understanding, " by having that worship celebrated in their own " language. They justly argued that it was a thing " plainly repugnant to the Word of God and the custom of the Primitive Church;" (it is remarkable how that creeps in everywhere, "the custom of the Primitive Church," if it were a mere Act of Parliament Church cut off from communion with the one holy Catholic and Apostolic Church, I confess I do not see the use of the phrase at all), "to have public prayers " in the church or to minister the sacraments in a " tongue not understood of the people. The " several separate books, however, for the public " offices of the church, the Missal or Mass Book, the " Breviary, and the Rituale, were at that time written " in Latin." Your Lordship will observe, he points out the three great books which together constitute the entire services of the church according to the use of the Church of Rome, the Missal or Mass book, the Breviary, and the Rituale; and then he has this note: "These books were in separate volumes. The Missal " or Mass Book was for the most part very ancient, " and furnished the groundwork of our present office " of the Holy Communion" (I suppose my friend hardly admits that); "The Breviary, which in some " degree answers to our Morning and Evening " Prayer, seems to have had its name from its being " formed out of the several service books, the Antiphonium, the Hymnarium, the Collectorium, &c., " in the Latin Church. For the Latin ritual were substituted our offices for baptism, confirmation, matrimony, visitation of the sick, and burial of the dead." Now, my Lord, I think it is scarcely possible to put the historical consideration of the constitution of the Prayer Book, and to illustrate historically the meaning of the words "Book of Common Prayer and " administration of the Sacraments and other Rites " and Ceremonies of the Church, according to the use " of the Church of England," in simpler and plainer and more convincing language than is used in this book. The Prayer Book, which was intended to continue the services of the Church Universal, and the services only of the Church Universal, is composed and made out from three separate books used in the Roman Church: the Breviary, which gives the Morning and Evening Prayer, the Missal, or Mass Book, which gives the office for the Holy Communion, and the Rituale, which gave the other divine offices of the Church before the Reformation, and still does give the other divine offices according to the Church of Rome at this day, giving the other occasional services, which are called in the Prayer Book "other rites and ceremonies" of the Church according to the Church of England," and showing that the words "rites and ceremonies" override the whole: because the title of the Prayer Book is not "The Book of the Common Prayer, and Administration " of the Sacraments and all the rites and ceremonies," but it is, "The Book of Common Prayer, and Administration of the Sacraments and other Rites and " Ceremonies of the Church, according to the use " of the Church of England;" and I am quite convinced that the more your Lordship considers this question, although I do not say it is conclusive in my favour, because it may still be, that although the prosecution cannot be sustained under the use of the words "rites and ceremonies," it may be sustained upon the true construction to be given to the whole passage.—I feel perfectly confident that the more your Lordship considers this question the more confident you will feel that by the use of the words "rite, ceremony," in the penal sections of the Act of Uniformity are meant the services of the Church Catholic as a whole, according to the Church of England. I do not know that I need labour that point more, but there are one or two authorities to show how universal the thing is. Here is a little book which I bought, on the 27th July 1850, to amuse me as I was rambling about and smoking a cigar at Dawlish, (a very beautiful little place,) and it is called "The Companion to the Prayer Book, compiled from the best Sources."

(Mr. Prideaux.) I refer to this book for the purpose of drawing your Lordship's attention to the Table of Contents: I will not go any farther. First comes "Introductory, concerning Public Worship."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Who is the book by?

(Mr. Prideaux.) It is not stated who it is by, but it is published by Parker, and I can assure your Lordship there is a great deal of very valuable and interesting matter in it. But I refer to this for the purpose of showing that all persons treat the meaning of the word in the same sense.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The book is cited to show the meaning of the word "rite," I presume.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes; after the passage I have read, "Introductory, concerning Public Worship," comes "Title—Common Prayer," "Administration of the Sacraments," and then "Rites and Ceremonies of the Church," and under the last title we have "Catechism, Confirmation, Holy Matrimony, Visitation and Communion of the Sick, Burial of the Dead, " Churching of Women, Commination." Then comes the Ordinal, because your Lordship is aware that the Ordinal is no part of the Book according to the language of the Act of Parliament, the Ordinal containing the form and manner of making Deacons, ordaining Priests, and consecrating an Archbishop or Bishop, is referred to in the title to the book separately; my whole object in referring to this book was to show your Lordship that the terms "rites and ceremonies" are treated as meaning entire services.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I quite understand that.
 (Mr. Prideaux.) There is only one other modern book that I will refer to, and that is a book as to which my friend seemed very much to doubt who the learned author was at first. It is a book written by the Rev. W. J. E. Bennett, the present highly respected Vicar of Frome, and it is a book which probably your Lordship is aware of; it is called "The Eucharist, its history, doctrine, and practice." It is a series of sermons or lectures originally delivered by Mr. Bennett, and which he afterwards published, and I merely refer to it for the purpose of reading one passage bearing upon the same point. "Whether, therefore, the Christian be a Romanist or a Catholic of the Church of England" (the author points out what the various services of the Church of England are before) "there can be no pretext or evasion by which he can escape the duty of performing those outward rites which his Church has ordained. The obligation of performing those ordinances which the Church appoints being once established, let us go on to see what those ordinances are." He begins by saying that he must perform those particular rites which his Church has ordained. Now, I ask your Lordship's attention to this. "Now, we find they consist of seven distinct ceremonies, (showing that he uses the word 'ceremony' there as applying to the entire service). In the Anglo-Catholic Church we shall find they consist of six distinct ceremonies. The seven of the Roman Catholic Church are Confirmation, Marriage, Holy Orders, Penance, Extreme Unction, Baptism, and the Lord's Supper," treating the sacraments as ceremonies, which I say they are according to the meaning of the title of the Prayer Book, because they are comprised within the words, "other rites and ceremonies." "Of these the Church of England considers four as holy ceremonies or sacramental rites, having services in our Prayer Book for each, namely, Confirmation, Marriage, and the Communion, used on the first day of Lent. Marriage, she allows, in the Book of Homilies, to be a sacrament in an inferior sense. Extreme Unction she entirely rejects." I merely mentioned that further to show that universally the words "rites and ceremonies" are understood to apply to the services as a whole. There is one expression which I will particularly call your Lordship's attention to, and with which I shall have to deal further presently, namely, that Mr. Bennett, in this book, insists upon the necessity of the members of the Church performing those outward rites which his Church has ordained. I have another word to say upon that presently, but your Lordship will remember, that my friend relied upon the use of the word "extern" relating to "extern ceremonies" in the Introduction to the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. How a ceremony can be otherwise than "outward" I cannot understand; but it is perfectly clear that Mr. Bennett in this passage is speaking of the rites and ceremonies as well, and yet he calls them "outward ceremonies." I shall have another explanation to give of that word "extern" presently, because I contend that that word, far from being against us, is one of the strongest words in the whole Act of Uniformity to support our case. Again, I will simply call your Lordship's attention to the forms of certificate of marriage, burial, and baptism. I have a copy here, and I find at the head of the first column of the certificate of baptism the words "by whom the ceremony was performed;" and I believe your Lordship will find that substantially the same thing is used in the registries with reference to marriage and burial, but I have not personally attested them, and I merely call your Lordship's attention to the matter as showing the meaning of the word "ceremony." Now there is one passage from one of the Homilies and then I shall have done with this point. I take the liberty of calling your Lordship's attention to that passage from the Homily on Common Prayer and Sacraments. In the edition which I have here (which is the edition published by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge) at page 377 the passage is thus: "And, although there are retained by the order of the Church of England besides these two (that is the great sacraments of the Lord's Supper and Baptism which are generally necessary to salvation) certain rites and ceremonies about the institution of ministers in the Church, Matrimony, Confirmation of children by examining them of their knowledge of the articles of the faith, and joining thereto the prayers of the Church for them, and likewise for the Visitation of the Sick, yet no man ought to take these for Sacraments in such signification and meaning as the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper are, but either for godly states of life necessary in Christ's Church, and therefore worthy to be set forth by public action and solemnity by the minister of the Church, or else judged to be such ordinances as may make for the instruction, comfort, and edification of Christ's Church." Now this may be said to be an almost contemporaneous authority, and it is perfectly clear that the words "rites and ceremonies" are there used as applying not to any individual act of ceremonial, but to the services as a whole. One other reference on this point and then I think that with this immediate branch of the subject I shall have done. It is the authority of no less a man (I should think a great and a very holy man in the estimation of my friend Mr. Stephens) than Martin Bucer, to be found in page 535 of the Original Letters, published by the Parker Society, and is also partly set out in the 44th page of the case on behalf of the English Church Union. It is a letter written on "April 26th 1549, from Martin Bucer and Paul Fagius. To the eminent servants of Christ, our very dear masters and fellow ministers . . . of the Church of Strassburgh. May our Lord Jesus Christ preserve you to himself, together with your whole Church, and again bestow upon you when delivered from your present affliction, the desired peace! Amen."

"The cause of religion, as far as appertains to the establishment of doctrines and the definition of rites, is pretty near what could be wished. Efforts must now be made to obtain suitable ministers, who will carry these wholesome doctrines into practice, and deliver them to the people. For, as is the case in France or Italy, so it is also in this country, that the pastors of the churches have hitherto confined their duties chiefly to ceremonies, and have very rarely preached and never catechised. Hence the people are labouring under a very great scarcity of teachers. But if the Lord be pleased to continue, as he has begun, the manifestations of his mercy in that kingdom, this lack of persons to instruct the Lord's flock will shortly be supplied. For there are numerous and liberal stipends assigned to students in theology, for which reason very many young men apply themselves to sacred learning. As soon as the description of the ceremonies now in use shall have been translated into Latin, we will send it to you." That means as soon as the Prayer Book was translated into Latin; clearly showing that they refer there to the various rites and ceremonies as given in the Prayer Book.

Now, my Lord, the matter appears to me upon this point to be clear on the face of the Act of Parliament; but I have felt it my duty in a case of this sort to call your Lordship's attention to these collateral matters for the purpose of showing what the meaning of those words in the penal clauses is, and I am happy to say that I have now done with that immediate branch of the matter.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My Lord, I venture to submit that it has been shown that the occurrence of the words "rites and ceremonies" in the penal clauses of the Act of Uniformity does not in itself affect us, and I shall now address myself to the consideration whether upon the meaning of the whole passage "or shall use any other rite, ceremony, order, form, or manner

“ of celebration of the Communion or Matins, Evening-song, Administration of the Sacraments, or other open prayer than is mentioned and set forth in this book;” whether upon the true meaning of those words (and this is a penal statute, and it is for my friend to make it out, it may fairly be inferred, necessarily inferred I think I may say, because nothing short of clear construction could justify the Court in putting into force a penal statute;) the question is, it having been established, as I submit, that there is no direct prohibition against using any other ceremonial than that which is contained in the Act—whether upon the fair and true construction—

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you contend that it is lawful to use another ceremonial than that which is contained in the Act?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I contend that the Rubric is not exhaustive as to mere ceremonial, and that the rubric does allow the introduction of such mere ceremonial acts into the rite as are essentially part of the rite according to the former usage and according to the use of the Catholic Church, although they may not be an essential part of the rite.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are not dealing now with the question of additional words but of additional acts?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I only have to deal with words incidentally, because it is observable that there is no charge of using additional words.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is none; you are dealing with the question of the introduction of ceremonial acts as distinct from ceremonies.

(Mr. Prideaux.) As distinct from ceremonies. I say that a ceremonial act is a totally distinct thing from a ceremony, and I say that what Mr. Mackonochie has done (I do not admit that they are all ceremonial acts, but I shall have to deal with all that afterwards), so far as he has done anything upon this point, is to use certain ceremonials. But I say confidently that he has not used any other ceremony than that which is mentioned.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say, do you not, that a ceremony is a complete service?

(Mr. Prideaux.) A complete service.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And that a ceremonial act is a different thing.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, and I say that in order to bring him within the meaning of that section, you must show that substantially he has used a different and distinct service from that which is set forth and mentioned in the book.

(Dr. Swabey.) Perhaps your Lordship will read a note of my friend's proposition, because it seems to me to be a very important one—“ That the Rubric is not exhaustive as to mere ceremonial, and does allow the introduction of ceremonial into the rite.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) No; of such ceremonial acts into the rite as are essentially part of the rite coupled, I suppose with what Mr. Prideaux has said before, that they be not at variance with the ceremony which he is bound to perform.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes; and I go further, my Lord, and say first, probably I might concede that they must have been practised in the Church of England, the same church although reformed, before the Reformation.

(Dr. Swabey.) It is important to get that proposition clearly on your Lordship's note.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is no occasion to interrupt.

(Dr. Swabey.) I was only anxious to get the proposition clearly stated.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My Lord, my contention is this, that the Rubric is not and never was intended to be exhaustive as regards mere ceremonial—that it was passed at a time when the usages and practices of the church were well known, that it was passed with reference to the then state of the common ecclesiastical law, that it only alters the common ecclesiastical law so far as it alters it at all either by express terms or by necessary implication—that it does not therefore preclude such ceremonial acts as were in use in the Church of England at the time when the Act of Uniformity was passed and such as are consistent with the various enactments contained in the statute.

(The Dean of the Arches.) As I understand you, you say that the Rubric is not exhaustive, that it does not exclude usages which were in force at the time when the Rubric was passed, provided that they are consistent with the various enactments of the statute?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There must be two conditions—they must have been in existence in the church at the time when the rubric was passed, and they must be consistent with the enactments of the statute.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I think I might concede the first condition, and the second is evident.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not want you to concede anything, I only want to know what is your position.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That is my argument now, and I say that they are consistent with the statute, if they are not expressly or by necessary implication forbidden, and if (to use the language which I have ventured to use before) they be essentially a part of the rite common to the whole Catholic Church though not necessarily an essential part. We are not here to argue that any of these matters which are not expressly commanded are essential, it is not necessary for us to do that; probably the very object with which in a great measure the various Acts of Parliament were framed, and the various Prayer Books which I treat for this purpose as parts of Acts of Parliament, was, so far as requirement is concerned, to yield as far as possible to the scruples of the Puritan party, and I think it very probable, my Lord, that if the question were whether a clergyman who objected to these practices was compelled to adopt them, he might be enabled successfully to say, “ These things are not ordered by the rubric, and, therefore, I will not do them,” because I quite concede that the Prayer Books, as suggested by my learned friend, were framed with a view as far as possible to consult the wishes and prejudices of the Puritan party, and, therefore, the Prayer Book said in fact, You shall do this much—we will compel you to do this much—you shall comply with the necessary and express requirements of the Prayer Book; out of deference to your scruples we will not render it compulsory upon you to comply with anything that is not expressly ordered by the Prayer Book. I think that very probably may have been the spirit in which the various rubrics of the Prayer Book were prepared; but that is not the question which we are considering here. The question which we are considering here is whether upon matters of ritual (because as I have said before, we have nothing to do with words in this case) the Prayer Books having been passed when a known and recognised practice according to the ecclesiastical law existed; the Acts of Parliament having been passed to operate upon the then existing state of things, and not to make a new Act of Parliament Church cut off from communion with the Holy Catholic Church as my learned friend argues; the question is whether, bearing that in mind, it can be said that everything which is not expressly commanded by the Prayer Book is forbidden. Now, I think, it is very doubtful whether the Prayer Book intended to deal primarily with ritual at all. No doubt those injunctions on ritual action which are to be found in the Prayer Book must be obeyed. But what the Prayer Book, as I submit, intended to deal with was not ritual at all, but the form and order of the services; that is to say, the language to be used, and the order of succession of the different parts.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say that the Prayer Book did not mean to deal with the ritual generally, but that where it contains ritual injunctions of course they must be obeyed.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, precisely; but the primary object of the Prayer Book was to furnish a form and order to be used, according to the use of the Church of England.

Now I will call your Lordship's attention again to the language of the penal section of the Act; the words are "or shall use wilfully and obstinately standing in the same, any other rite, ceremony, order, or form;" and if my learned friend's argument can be sustained at all, it must be sustained upon the supposition that the word "use" in the sentence "use any other rite, ceremony, order, form, &c.," was intended to apply to ceremonial. One thing is quite certain, that unless he can show that the word "use" was intended to apply to ceremonial, his case is gone.

Now, upon that point I would beg respectfully to call your Lordship's attention to the fifth paragraph of the preface to the first book. It is the article "concerning the services of the Church" in the present book. I am reading it from the present book. We have discussed this article "concerning the services of the Church" a good deal, and your Lordship is aware that that which was called the "Preface" in the first book is now headed "concerning the services of the Church," and a preface specially applicable to the present book written by Bishop Sanderson, as I believe the general opinion is, for the purpose of justifying the actual alterations and additions which were made in the present book, is now introduced in our present book under the title of the "Preface," that which in the first book was called the "Preface" being now added under the title "Concerning the services of the Church." Now, I beg to call your Lordship's attention to the fifth paragraph, which is the one immediately preceding the paragraph to which you have so kindly directed our special attention, and upon which I took the liberty of addressing your Lordship when I commenced my observations to-day. The words are, "And whereas heretofore there hath been a great diversity in saying and singing in churches within this realm." Now, the two words to which I wish to call your Lordship's special attention are the words "saying and singing," in support of my position, that the primary object of the Prayer Book was the order and form of words, and that the penal section does not deal at all with any ritual except such as is prescribed in that book; "and whereas heretofore there hath been a great diversity in saying and singing in churches within this realm—some following the Salisbury use, some the Hereford use, and some the use of Bangor, some of York, and some of Lincoln—now from henceforth all the whole realm shall have but one use," that is to say, they shall have but one use of "saying and singing" "in churches within this realm." Now, it is perfectly clear from that preface, which was the preface of the first Prayer Book, that it treats the first Prayer Book as a method of providing that there should be one use of saying and singing. Why is it limited to that? I respectfully submit to your Lordship that that is a paragraph deserving of the very greatest attention, because if my learned friend is to bring Mr. Mackonochie under this penal section at all, it must be by showing that the words "use, wilfully and obstinately standing in the same, any other form, manner," &c., have reference not only to the words of the service, but also to ceremonial. But this very paragraph to which I have called your attention shows that the alteration that was intended to be effected was an alteration of the great diversity in saying and singing according to the various uses that were then in vogue in the Church of England.

My Lord, I am reminded (and if your Lordship will allow me I will read it at once) of a note of the present Bishop of Ely to a book, which I have no doubt is well known to your Lordship, and a very valuable and useful work it is. It is called, in short, the Interleaved Book of Common Prayer. The title is, "The Prayer Book interleaved with historical illustrations and explanatory notes parallel to the text, by the Rev. William Campion, B.D., fellow and tutor of Queen's College, and rector of St. Botolph, and the Rev. W. J. Beaumont, B.D. With a preface by the Lord Bishop of Ely." The note is in page 10. "The early British church appears to have adopted the Gallican liturgy, a form derived from the East, and after the conversion of the Saxons, Pope Gregory gave permission to Augustine to choose either the Gallican or the Roman services, or selections from the various forms, as he might find most suitable for the benefit of the Church of England." Then he refers to Bede as his authority for that. "St. Augustine's bias was in favour of the Roman, whilst the bishops of the British Church still retained their predilection for the Gallican liturgy, the result being that the different dioceses had different modifications of the forms of public worship, the various modes of chanting the services in each being distinguished as the different 'uses' of the various dioceses. Of all these the most esteemed was the use of Sarum, drawn up in the latter part of the eleventh century by Osmond, Bishop of Salisbury, and which was in a great measure adopted by the dioceses of Great Britain."

Now I submit that that is a passage well deserving of your Lordship's careful attention. "The different dioceses had different modifications of the forms of public worship; and the various modes of what? Of chanting the services in each being distinguished as the special uses of the various dioceses," showing that that which is the special essence of the use, is not the ceremonial, which is a mere accident, but the form and order of singing or saying the service.

Now, my Lord, bearing that in mind, I would ask you again to look at the language of this penal section, and to ask yourself whether if I am right, as I respectfully submit I am, in the construction which I have contended ought to be put upon the words "rite, ceremony," in the penal clause, whether that clause is not in all respects consistent with that definition of the word "use," and whether bearing in mind what was the understood meaning of the word "use," you would not have expected express words pointing to individual acts of ceremonial, if individual acts of ceremonial were to have been held as included within the clause, "any other rite, ceremony, [I contend that means 'service'] order, form, or manner of mass openly or privily, or Matins, Evensong, Administration of the Sacraments, or other open prayer than is mentioned and set forth in the said Book." In other words, you shall celebrate the office of the Communion according to the use of the Church of England, and according to the use of the Church of England only. But these authorities, to which I have ventured to direct your Lordship's attention, go at least very far towards showing that when we speak of the use of the Church of England we mean the special celebration of the particular rite, the singing or saying of that particular rite, according to the present Prayer Book, instead of singing or saying that particular rite according to the several uses which were prevalent before the Reformation.

(The Dean of the Arches.) In this particular division of the preface of the Prayer Book "of ceremonies, why some be abolished and some retained," do you consider the word "ceremonies" there to mean full service throughout?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I feel some difficulty about that, but I think in great measure even that can be explained when your Lordship bears in mind the distinction between an extern ceremony and an ordinary ceremony. Your Lordship will remember that I am considering the language of the penal clause.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are no doubt; but you see there is a division of the Preface to the Prayer Book, headed "Of Ceremonies; why some be abolished and some retained?" Would you say that the word "ceremonies" there has a different meaning to the meaning which it has in the Act of Parliament?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am not prepared to say. I think it is very doubtful; because I think you will find that these ceremonies relate especially to what are called in the introduction to the first Prayer Book extern ceremonies—that is to say, ceremonies which had crept into the services not being essentially a part of them.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then those ceremonies would not be full services—those which are mentioned under the head of “Ceremonies, why some be abolished and some retained,” would not be complete services.

(Mr. Prideaux.) They would not be full services, but they would be incidental services having forms of their own.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Would they be complete services?

(Mr. Prideaux.) In one sense they would be—in a certain sense.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You know the passage I am alluding to: “Of ceremonies, why some be abolished and some retained.” Do you mean to say that each ceremony would be complete in itself?

(Mr. Prideaux.) A sort of incidental service which might be complete in itself, and possibly would be.

(The Dean of the Arches.) How do you construe this about “dark and dumb ceremonies”?

(Mr. Prideaux.) That is another point.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I mean to say they cannot be held to be complete services.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Your Lordship will observe that that provision which you are now referring to complains of the burden of them; that there were such a number of them.

(The Dean of the Arches.) “Some are put away because the great excess and multitude of them have so increased in these latter days that the burden of them was intolerable.” Then the writer goes on to say, “Whereof St. Augustine in his time complained that they were grown to such a number that the estate of Christian people was in worse case concerning that matter than were the Jews. And he counselled that such yoke and burden should be taken away, as time would serve quietly to do it. But what would St. Augustine have said if he had seen the ceremonies of late days used among us; whereunto the multitude used in his time was not to be compared. This our excessive multitude of ceremonies was so great and many of them so dark, that they did more confound and darken, than declare and set forth Christ’s benefits unto us.” Then he goes on to mention those that are retained, and then he says, “Furthermore, the most weighty cause of the abolishment of certain ceremonies was that they were so far abused, partly by the superstitious blunders of the rude and unlearned, and partly by the unsatiable avarice of such as sought more their own lucre, than the glory of God, that the abuses could not well be taken away, the thing remaining still.” What I want to ask you, and it is merely to be quite sure that I fully understand your argument, is, do you say that the use of the word “ceremonies” in this portion of the Prayer Book which I have read has a different signification from the word “ceremony” in the Statute of Uniformity?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say that they mean lesser ceremonies; and in that sense of the word it has not a different meaning. If your Lordship will allow me, I will instance what I mean. For instance, the Asperges. Your Lordship is aware that in the Roman Catholic Church the Mass always begins with the ceremony of the Asperges; that is to say, the priest comes in with the holy water, he performs certain ceremonials, he walks down the church, and he sprinkles the congregation.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, I say that is an extern ceremony.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is not a service?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord, it is a service. Your Lordship will find it laid down in all the books.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It does not fall within your definition of a ceremony, a service complete in itself?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord. In one sense it is a service complete in itself, although it is ordinarily annexed to the service of the Mass in the Roman books. Still it is a service complete in itself; and I have a book by an old tutor of mine for whom I have great respect—

(The Dean of the Arches.) I merely want your argument with regard to ceremonies. I gather it to be that you adhere to the position with which you started at the outset.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes; but I add to that this consideration, that we are considering the word “ceremony” in the penal clause, and not here in this part of the Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You do not think the use of it here throws any light upon the word “ceremony” in the penal clause.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not think it aids my friends at all.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I did not say it aided your friends, but I say, do you think it throws any light upon the proper construction of the word ceremony in the penal clause?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say it throws light on the use of the word in the introductory part of the first section of the Act of Uniformity. I say it throws light upon the use of the words “extern ceremony,” and there is one passage which is conclusive to my mind, in this passage on ceremonial, showing that mere simple acts of ceremonial are not meant by those words “of ceremonies,” and that is the fact of “the burden of them having become intolerable.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not wish to know anything more than what you consider to be the bearing of it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I instance that ceremony of the well-known practice of creeping to the cross, and there are many others.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There may be a great many, I daresay; but the object of my question was this, does the word “ceremony” as used in the preface to the existing Prayer Book, “of Ceremonies, why some be abolished and some retained,” bear a different meaning from the word “ceremony” in the Statute of Uniformity?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say it means what in the introduction of the Act is called an “extern ceremony.” It means ceremonies which in a certain sense are complete in themselves, but which were ordinarily annexed to the services of the church, but were not an essential part of them, but foreign and extern to them.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Very well, that is an answer to my question. You say that “ceremonies” does not mean acts of ceremonial.

(Mr. Prideaux.) In one sense it does not mean ceremonial, it means something more than ceremonial.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It means a service complete in itself, however small.

(Mr. Prideaux.) A service complete in itself, however small. We all know there is the Asperges, there is the creeping to the cross, there is the Benediction, there is the Exposition of the Blessed Sacrament, there were numerous little by-ceremonies, if I may so say, in practice in the Church, which became so numerous that the burden of them was intolerable. Many of them were incomprehensible, and the Church of England has very wisely excluded them. But I say that the word “ceremony” there has no bearing whatever on the use of the word “ceremony” in the penal clause, except that I say that equally (not that that is material) with the penal clause it does not mean the mere ceremonial.

Now, my Lord, I am submitting, especially after having shown your Lordship the meaning attributed to the word "use," first by citing the Prayer Book itself, and then by citing a passage from a very learned ecclesiastical writer of the present day, I am submitting to your Lordship that the distinction which was recognized in the various uses before the Reformation was not a distinction of ceremonial, but a distinction of service, and I am showing you by these passages which I have cited that the apparent object of introducing "the use according to the Church of England," was to secure one uniform method or manner of singing or saying the service. Bearing all that in mind I am submitting to your Lordship, that the fair construction to put upon this penal clause is to hold that it primarily and substantially has reference to securing that which the Statute requires, namely, service according to the use of the Church of England, and that, so far as it enforces ceremonial, it is limited to such ceremonial as is directly expressed or as is not repugnant to and inconsistent with the services given. I am directed to a passage in Mr. Perry's book, "Lawful Church Ornaments," and I must say (and I am sure my learned friend will agree with me) that there is no man whose learning and views upon this subject are entitled to greater respect than my friend Mr. Perry. It is really marvellous the attention he has paid to the subject.

(Mr. Stephens.) I entirely agree in that opinion except where the reverend gentleman differs from me.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am quite sure you do, and he will bring you round probably to agree with him in time. I may remark incidentally here (for it is really a marvellous thing) that my learned friend has not produced a single conviction in either court supporting him. He cited one case from Dyer, or some old reporter, but when we come to look at it we find first that it was an indictment for saying a private mass, and secondly, that the judgment was reversed in error, so that really my learned friend has not cited a single case to support the view which he has maintained. I am now reading from Mr. Perry's book, but it will be found in Strype's Cranmer, book 1, page 85.

"Kemp, Vicar of Northgate, was charged that he had not read the Bible since Pentecost as he was commanded by the Ordinary. He doth not declare to his parishioners the right use of holy water"—(I am citing this to show what was the meaning of the words "extern ceremonies")—"holy water, holy bread, bearing of candles, creeping to the cross." For lack whereof the most of the said parish be ignorant in such thing as ever they were. He hath read to them the King's injunctions as he ought by reason whereof his parish be blind and ignorant in them."

(The Dean of the Arches.) This was in 1543?

(Mr. Prideaux.) In 1543. Then there is another case in 1544. "John Bale, afterwards, in 1552, Bishop of Ossory, wrote a commentary on the Apocalypse called the 'Image of both Churches.' It bears no date, but Strype quotes from it, under the date of 1544, as expressing the view of Bale then. His words probably refer to the now expired Act, 32 Henry VIII, c. 26, 1540, and also to the Rationale, 1541-2, when he complains, 'I think it is now much worse, for now they are become laudable ceremonies; whereas before time they were but ceremonies alone, now are they become necessary rites, godly constitutions, seemly usages, and civil ordinances; whereas afore they had no such names.'" But I understand your Lordship to intimate that at any rate, at this time, all that you desire is to ascertain whether in my judgment that Preface upon ceremonies had any substantial bearing upon the question under consideration.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Whether it would form any key to the use of the word "ceremony" in the statute.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I apprehend that it does not, but clearly it is not against us.

Well now, my Lord, it is clear that all these usages complained of were in force at the time of the Reformation by the common ecclesiastical law of England. That appears sufficiently with regard to the whole of them, except the lights upon the communion table from the Sarum use. The Sarum use directs the mixed chalice, it directs the burning of incense, it directs the elevation of the blessed sacrament, but it does not direct, and my learned friend seems to rejoice at it, but I say it is an argument in my favour, as I shall show you when I come to deal specifically with the use of lights, it does not direct the use of lights upon the altar, and for reasons I may as well mention at once—that they apparently were not considered part of the ceremony of the Lord's Supper, and if so, then my learned friend's case is gone.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say in the Sarum missal there is no direction for the use of lights upon the altar?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No direction for the use of lights upon the altar. But I do not wish to discuss the use of lights now, because the first Injunctions of Edward VI., the Injunctions of 1547, (to say nothing of the earlier Canons and Constitutions, to which I will not refer at present,) clearly show that these candles were burnt upon the altar, because the instructions are not to burn for the first time candles upon the high altar; but whilst the Injunction is abolishing all candles which have been burned to superstitious uses, it directs that the two candles upon the altar before the sacrament shall still be retained. And therefore I say, it is clear that all these usages were in use as part and parcel of the common ecclesiastical law of England at the time of the Reformation, and being once the common ecclesiastical law, the question is, have the Statutes of Uniformity deprived, taken away that right of following the common ecclesiastical law of England? I say the presumption is against it. I have taken down the general principle from Darris on Statutes, page 518. It is in two volumes, but I am ashamed to say I cannot tell your Lordship which, I think it is the first: "Further, as a rule, of exposition, Statutes are to be construed in reference to the principles of the common law; for it is not to be presumed that the Legislature would make any innovations upon the common law, further than the case absolutely required. The law rather infers that the Act did not intend to make any alteration other than what is specified, and besides what has been plainly pronounced for if Parliament had had that design, it is naturally said they would have expressed it." Now I refer to that principally for the purpose of showing that the general rule of law is that an Act of Parliament is to be construed with reference to the common law, and that it only operates upon the common law so far as the common law is repugnant to and inconsistent with the provisions of the Act of Parliament.

There is another rule of interpretation—in its common sense it is very analogous to it—and that is, what is called the incorporation into contracts of the custom of the country and the usages of trade. Your Lordship is aware that if a contract be entered into with reference to no known usages, something new and distinct for the time—an Act of Parliament for instance—for example making an Act of Parliament Church in the 16th century, not desirous of tracing itself back to the Primitive Catholic origin. I can understand that there, where a contract is entered into for the first time with reference to a new matter, you have nothing that you can fall back upon except the Act of Parliament, or the contract itself. But the principle acted upon with reference to contracts is the same as that which I have ventured (and this is really nothing more than a contract between the church and the country) to point out as the principle of construction of the Acts of Parliament. I am referring to this as a somewhat analogous case, namely, that where a contract is entered into, not with reference to some new matter which has had no existence before, but with reference to a state of circumstances where a known usage exists, such elements of that known usage as are consistent with the contract, shall be deemed to be incorporated into it. I need scarcely refer your Lordship to any authority for that; the authorities are all collected together in the first volume of Smith's Leading Cases, in the case of Wriggleson v. Dallison, and there is another authority to which I should wish to refer you, which you will find mentioned in the notes to that case; the case of Hutton against Warren, in 1 Meeson and Welsby, page 466. It contains a very elaborate judgment by the present Lord Wensleydale, in which he goes very fully into the consideration of this question.

(Mr. Prideaux.) A question of contract. There was question in this particular case whether some provision was incorporated into a lease; but his Lordship goes very elaborately into the law upon the subject, and he says that there are three cases to which this doctrine is applied—First, when a contract is made with reference to some matter where there is a custom of the country covering that class of cases in which the custom of the country has been held to be incorporated into leases, wherever that custom is not excluded by the language of the lease; secondly, he refers to cases where a contract is entered into in respect of some trade where there is some general usage or custom of trade; and then he says, lastly, that it applies also to other contracts entered into with respect to any subject matter in reference to which there is a well-known and recognized usage. Now I am not going too strongly to press this analogous illustration, because I fall back rather upon that which is clear common sense; that no statute can be held to preclude and shut out any portion of the common and of the general law of the country existing as the use of the whole country, unless the portion sought to be shut out be either expressly or by necessary implication repealed by the Act of Parliament. Then I say that the principle is exactly the same. The principle is that the parties are assumed to contract with reference to the known state of circumstances amounting to usage, in other words, where it is part of the common law; regards a statute, or part of a special custom as regards a contract, there, although not expressly stated, the usage is held to be incorporated into the contract; and in principle as well as in essence, these Acts of Parliament are nothing more than a contract entered into between the church and the country for the good of the country.

Then, my Lord, is either of these practices forbidden expressly? Clearly not expressly—my learned friend does not even pretend that. He does indeed say (and with that I shall deal hereafter) that the elevation is forbidden; and he does say that the elevation is impliedly forbidden by the 28th Article, which (as I shall submit to your Lordship presently) has nothing whatever to do with the matter. But my learned friend does not pretend to say that the elevation is now forbidden by the Rubric that did exist in the first Prayer Book of Edward. My learned friend admits that it is repealed and was obliged to fall back upon the argument that it was not necessary to have a prohibitory Rubric in order to forbid it; therefore the whole question is, are these usages or any of them impliedly forbidden by necessary implication of the Acts of Parliament, because as surely as according to the old saying, "Nature abhors a vacuum," and as surely as the air will creep into every crevice if it is not kept at, so surely, unless by express provision it be kept at, the common law will creep into every crevice, except where the Act of Parliament says you shall not creep in. Now I will deal with that because I think it is a very strong point. I really was astonished at the boldness of my learned friend Mr. Coleridge. He generally argues conclusively and well, but if ever a man did argue in a circle it is my learned friend Mr. Coleridge in this case, for he gravely put it to your Lordship, as an assumed fact, that because no manual acts are prescribed by the second Prayer Book of King Edward VI., therefore a clergyman could not lawfully perform the manual acts under that statute, and therefore he says you cannot perform these things. I think that is very likely, if my learned friend is right so far as these acts of Mr. Mackonochie are part and parcel of the ceremonial of the services; I think it is very likely that if my learned friend is right in saying that a clergyman could not perform the manual acts under the second Prayer Book, which for this purpose you will please remember prevailed from 1552 to 1661, I think it very probable that if my learned friend is right there he is right upon the other point. But is not he begging the question? What single argument has he produced to your Lordship for the purpose of showing that under that Prayer Book a clergyman could not perform the manual acts? I have ventured at any rate to suggest one in another direction, namely, that the object of the framers of the statute was to humour the prejudices of the Puritan party, and not to render these matters compulsory. Your Lordship will remember (and it is very important) that the second Act of Uniformity says that the second book has been made "fully perfect," "made fully perfect." If my construction of the meaning of the word "use" is right, if the word "use" mean "saying and singing" then I can understand the use of the phrase in the second Act of Uniformity that the second book has been made "fully perfect." But when I bear in mind that the second Act declares (as your Lordship has twice called our attention to the fact) that the first book was written under the direct guidance and inspiration of the Holy Ghost, and that the alterations are made in the second book, not because there was anything to object to in the first, but by reason of the scruples and dissatisfaction which existed among the Puritan party; when I call to mind the approval which the second Act passes upon the first Book, and when I look at the important ceremonial comprised in the first Book which is not to be found in the second; I say that especially in construing a penal clause, it is going a great way to ask your Lordship to conclude that when the Act of Parliament says that the second Prayer Book was made "fully perfect" it meant that the manual acts ought not to be performed.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am speaking of acts connected with the consecration of the holy elements in the celebration of the Holy Communion. There is no direction to put the bread and wine upon the altar; no direction for the priest to take the cup in his hand, and no direction to put his hand over the paten; there is no direction to break the bread. Now if the construction I have put upon the word "use" be the correct one, if "use" has reference not to ceremonial, but to order and form of words, then I can understand the Act of Parliament stating that the second book was made fully perfect; but if it is intended to include ceremonial, of which there is a remarkable scarcity in that book as well as the use and form of words, then, bearing in mind the high approval which is passed upon the first book by the second Act, and the fact that an Act of Parliament now in force declares the first book to have been written under the guidance of the Holy Ghost—I say that if that Act of Parliament intended to enforce as the maximum only such ceremonial as is prescribed in the second book, then with great respect and with great confidence I say I cannot understand how the Legislature could have said that the second book had been made "fully perfect."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Your argument, I suppose, is that the acts of consecration, while the second book was in force, must have been borrowed from the first book?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Quite so; I say it is a tradition of the Church.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Your argument is that otherwise, from 1552 to 1661, no manual acts could have been performed?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Exactly. We know, in point of fact, the usage is against my learned friend. I cannot refer to the passages at this moment, but we know in point of fact that in no less a place than in Cosins' works, Cosins states that in point of fact the manual acts of consecration were performed. In one place, he is urging a direction for the consecration acts, no doubt for the purpose of making them compulsory; because there was a great reaction towards Puritan practices in the time of the second Prayer Book. Providence overruled matters in favour of the Church Catholic, and Edward VI. was no doubt at that time by a superintending Providence removed, and the downward tendency towards Protestantism (I do not like to use an offensive word), towards those peculiar views which my learned friend has been advocating was such, that Cosins was desirous ("for his better warrant" were his words) that the consecration acts should be made compulsory. But the important matter upon which I rely is this.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say there must have been consecration acts performed during the time between 1552 and 1661.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Precisely, and there is none directed during all that time. If my contention is right that that which is essentially a part of the Sacrament, and which has been always used in the Catholic Church, of which our use is only an adaptation for the English nation, may still be used, provided it be essentially a part of the rite performed, then I can understand it; but I say it is utterly impossible for your Lordship to conceive for one moment, apart from the testimony borne by Bishop Cosins to the fact—I say it is absolutely impossible for your Lordship to conceive for one single moment that the Consecration Acts were not performed under the second Prayer Book of Edward, and the Prayer Book of Elizabeth, and if they were (for I am willing to take it as a crucial test—one test is as good as a hundred) my learned friend's argument that what is not expressly prescribed by the Prayer Book in matters of ritual is gone, cannot be for one moment sustained.

My learned friend, Mr. Coleridge, who understands the skill and subtlety of argument as well as any man living, felt the force of that difficulty, and, therefore, he thought fit to be guilty of a petitio principii, and in order to maintain his argument, he chose to assume that the consecration acts could not have been lawfully performed under the second Prayer Book of Edward VI. And, my Lord, my learned friend, Mr. Stephens, felt the force of the existence of a prohibitory Rubric in the first Prayer Book with reference to the elevation of the blessed Sacrament, he said that was the main point around which the affections of the people were bound, and, therefore, it was necessary to prohibit it as a matter of precaution (I suppose he means by direct prohibition). My Lord, no doubt the people were attached, as a very large portion of the members of the Church of England now are attached, to the great Catholic doctrine of a sacrament upon a sacrifice; and no doubt, unless it were forbidden, elevation would have been practised. But my learned friend did not seem to see that the same argument exactly or perhaps even more importantly applies to the acts of consecration. Can it be argued that you would have had elevation if it had not been prohibited, and yet that you would not have the act of consecration if it is not forbidden. I will pray you, my Lord, to put yourself into the position of the Catholic Church in England, before she had separated herself in one sense from Rome. I pray you to imagine that you have been taught that which is an undoubted fact, that the one great Christian service ordered to be celebrated by Christ's ordinance is the blessed Eucharist. I pray you to bear in mind the practices which were at that time considered as essentially parts at any rate (I will not put it further) of that celebration. I pray you to bear in mind that every priest at that time, when the first Act of Parliament came into operation, had been accustomed to perform the Divine liturgy according to the use of the Church of Sarum; and I ask you if it is possible to suppose that all the clergy, or even a large portion of the clergy, immediately upon the passing of Edward's second Prayer Book, would have ceased to use the acts of consecration, which they had also used under the first Prayer Book, when they were not forbidden. Nay, I go further, and I ask where can my learned friend show, even from any Puritan bishop, any prohibition of performing the acts of consecration. Minor acts are forbidden by some of them; rubbing the hands, touching the forehead, and certain other matters are forbidden, but where throughout the length and breadth of Puritan libraries, which my learned friends' clients have been searching up in order to follow out this prosecution, is there a single, even unauthorized, act of any Puritan bishop forbidding during all this time the acts of consecration? Where for the year 1554 is the great case of Martin and Mackonochie; where is the conviction either in the spiritual court or in the temporal court for the performance of any single act of consecration which your Lordship may be quite assured was as dear to the priests of that day as their lives? I say it is conclusive, looking at the fact that the consecration is essentially the most solemn part of the one great act of Catholic worship, celebrated alike in the Roman Church, in the Greek Church, and in the Church of England, but by each according to their own use—I say that if the construction which my learned friends are attempting to put upon this section be the correct one, there must have been innumerable convictions of the faithful Mackonochies of that day for performing the rites of the blessed Eucharist according to the institution of Christ. Where are they? My learned friend cannot get out of the difficulty. I accept my learned friend Mr. Coleridge's test; I only deny his major premise, and I do deny his assertion that it was not lawful for the clergymen of that day to perform the manual acts of consecration. My Lord, I say with confidence, that it is impossible upon any other supposition—it is contrary to human nature—to understand the absence even of an injunction from a bishop, to say nothing of a conviction in the courts during the whole of this period in any single instance against a clergyman for performing acts of consecration. Well, then, if that be so, what becomes of my friend's argument, that whatever is not expressly commanded by the Rubric is gone. As I said, I am willing to accept that as a crucial test. I admit that if my friend Mr. Coleridge is right in his assumption that a clergyman under the second Prayer Book of Edward VI. and under the Prayer Book of Elizabeth, could not lawfully perform the acts of consecration, I admit that so far as these practices of Mr. Mackonochie are in the estimation of your Lordship, parts of the ceremonial of the blessed Eucharist, he is liable to conviction. But then I claim the contrary position; I say that if I am right in the view which I am venturing to put to your Lordship (and it appears to me that it is impossible to explain the silence of the courts and the injunctions and the visitation articles upon this point in any other way) if I am right in saying that these manual acts of consecration could lawfully be practised under the second Prayer Book of Edward VI., then the whole of my friend's argument, the whole of it, I think I may leave it upon this one point so far,—the whole of my friend's argument, so far as it is based on the fact that what is not expressly enjoined is forbidden, necessarily falls to the ground.

Now, my Lord, hitherto I have only considered the penal clauses relating to the officiating priest; but there are other penal clauses in the Acts of Parliament which it will be important to consider—clauses for the purpose of precluding the laity from attending any other service than that which is according to the use of the Church of England, and from maintaining or encouraging any clergyman to use any such services. And with a view of seeing what it was these statutes were really intended to operate upon, I think it would be well that I should briefly call your Lordship's attention to these penal clauses. The most important clause (there are others which I will only just mention) the best clause to use as a test is the 5th section of the second Act of Uniformity; and I pray your Lordship to bear in mind that that section is in force now for enforcing the present Prayer Book; that the Toleration Acts did not deal at all with members of the Church of England, but merely tolerated the performance by persons who differ from the Church of England of services; that even now, and à fortiori before the passing of the first Toleration Act, we are every one of us, ay and your Lordship on the bench, subject to the penalties of this section; and I will undertake to say that if my friend's construction is correct, every person who knowingly goes to church where any man there, and especially the clergyman, bows at the sacred name of the Redeemer, he is liable to be committed to prison without bail or mainprize. I will take the liberty of reading the section because I think it is a crucial test. It is the 5th section of the second Act, "And by the authority aforesaid it is now further enacted, that if any man-ner of person or persons, inhabiting and being within this realm, or any other the King's Majesty's dominions, shall after the said Feast of All Saints, willingly and wittingly hear and be present at any other manner or form of Common Prayer, or administration of the sacraments, of making of ministers in the churches, or of any other rites contained in the book annexed to this Act, than is mentioned and set forth in the said book, or that is contrary to the form of sundry provisions and exceptions contained in the aforesaid former statute." Your Lordship will remember that in the former statute there is a power to use certain prayers and hymns, provided they be taken from the Bible, "and shall be thereof convicted according to the laws of this realm before the justices of assize, justices of oyer and determiner, justices of peace in their session, or any of them, by the verdict of twelve men or by his or their own confession or otherwise, shall for the first offence suffer imprisonment for six months, without bail or mainprize." My Lord, I believe everybody who goes to Mr. Mackonochie's church, if my friend is right in his construction, is liable to that punishment at this moment. "And for the second offence being likewise convicted (as is above said) imprisonment for one whole year; and for the third offence, in like manner imprisonment during his or their lives."

My Lord, if my friend's contention is right, although we know from Bishop Cosins, and although we know from our ordinary knowledge of human nature that it must have been so, that a very large number, to say the least, of the clergy during the time of Edward and Queen Elizabeth did use the consecrating acts, although we know that in compliance with the ancient custom of the Church from the complaints that were made to Charles II. that in point of fact the canon was complied with which required bowing at the sacred name of the Redeemer, and therefore we must know that hundreds and thousands of persons attended the churches under the second Act (and the Court will remember that this is the second Act, the very Act which dropped the manual acts), although we know that hundreds and thousands attended there, there is not a single hint or suggestion of any proceeding in any court for the purpose of enforcing this very severe penalty against such people. I submit with confidence, it is monstrous to suppose that the statute could have meant anything of the kind; and yet I do not see how my learned friend can escape from that difficulty. Of course I am now dealing with the general question. It may be that these particular acts complained of here are or are not forbidden upon other grounds; but I am only now dealing with the general position of my learned friend; that what is not expressly commanded by the Prayer Book is forbidden.

And, my Lord, with regard to one of the practices complained of, I think it is abundantly clear that it must have been practised, and that is the mixed chalice. When I come to deal with that question I shall scarcely address a single argument to your Lordship upon it; because I am addressing a man conversant with the ancient ecclesiastical law and with the Primitive Church. I am not appealing to the prejudices and the ignorance and the narrow-mindedness of an Exeter Hall meeting, and I shall scarcely address a single argument to your Lordship for the purpose of proving that the mixed chalice was almost the universal practice of the whole Catholic Church of Christ in the primitive age. But now, bearing in mind that the mixed chalice—and I assume it now, and indeed I should be trifling with your Lordship if I attempted to argue that which is as manifest as the sun at noonday—bearing in mind that the mixed chalice was, with the single exception of the Armenians, whom I will deal with presently, the universal practice of the Church—

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do I understand that you are upon the mixed chalice now?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord, I am arguing that the consecration acts were not complained of. I am upon the question of the mixed chalice to this extent only, that I say, bearing in mind that the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. directed the mixed chalice, bearing in mind that the mixed chalice is (I may say it because the exception proves the rule) the universal practice of Christ's Holy Catholic Church, bearing in mind that the struggle was going on between the reformers and the anti-reformers at the time when the second Prayer Book of Edward VI. passed, I say that it is impossible to suppose that the use of the mixed chalice was not continued in a very large number of the churches of this country without the sanction of the Prayer Book of Edward VI. It is not forbidden; it is called wine in the old Rituals, and in the Order of the Communion, and in the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., after mixture; and therefore I say it is impossible to suppose that suddenly when an Act of Parliament passed for the sake of yielding to the prejudice of the Puritans, rendering it not absolutely necessary that certain things should be done, the use of the mixed chalice was not continued under that statute of Edward VI. And I say that if my friend's construction is correct then every man who willingly and wittingly attended at a church where in the administration of the Lord's Supper the mixed chalice was used, was liable by so doing for the first offence to be sent to prison for six months without bail or mainprize, on the second offence for one whole year, and for the third offence in like manner to be imprisoned during his life. Now I ask your Lordship, especially when you bear in mind the fact that all the documents of the Church of England show the great desire of the Church of England to adhere to primitive Christianity, "to Scripture and the Primitive Church," I ask you whether you are prepared to put a construction upon these statutes which will lead to that conclusion? Because if you are prepared to adopt the broad position upon which my friend Dr. Stephens has placed his case, then I say you cannot avoid arriving at the conclusion that any man who, during the latter part of the reign of Edward VI. and during the reigns of Elizabeth and her successors down to Charles II., attended knowingly any service where the mixed chalice was used, was liable to these penalties which I have pointed out. Now I do venture to submit, with feelings of very great confidence, that is a reductio ad absurdum, and that it is quite impossible that the Court can put a construction upon the Act of Parliament which would lead to such consequences as that. If the object of the Act of Parliament was to secure the use of the English Prayer Book, and so prevent Divine Service being celebrated according to any other Use, if nothing was to be said or sung but according to that Use, if the services of the Church Universal were only to be said or sung according to the Use of the Church of England, then, looking at the special object which was intended by the Acts of Parliament, I can understand the introduction of such a penal clause as this. But if a man was to be liable to these penalties, simply because he knowingly and wittingly attended at a church where a practice continued to be adopted, which up to that time had been universal in the Church of England, and which has ever been universal throughout the whole Catholic Church of Christ, then I say, if that was intended, it is impossible to my mind to conceive that such a section as this would have been introduced.

Now, my Lord, there are two other sections affecting third parties—the laity, which bear out this same view. I will not do much more than refer to them, because the argument to be addressed to them would be substantially the same, perhaps if anything not quite so strong, but still they all point in the same direction, and they all show that what the object of the Statute of Uniformity really was, was to get rid of all the old Uses, as Uses, and to compel the performance of the services of the Church according to the Use of the Church of England. The section to which I now beg to call your Lordship's attention is the third section of the first Act. There is a similar provision in, I think, the third section of Elizabeth's Act; it is this:—"And it is ordained and enacted by the authority above said, that if any person or persons whatsoever, after the said Feast of Pentecost next coming, shall in any interludes, plays, songs, rhymes, or by other open words, declare or speak anything in the derogation, depraving, or despising of the same Book, or of anything therein contained, or any part thereof, or shall by open fact, deed, or by open threatenings, compel or cause or otherwise procure or maintain any parson, vicar, or other minister, in any cathedral or parish church, or in any chapel or other place, to sing or say" (further showing what is understood by the word "use") "any common and open prayer." Now these words "sing and say," are evidently used synonymously with "use." They do not occur in the section which I have read previously in the second Act, and therefore my friend cannot make any distinction, "to sing or say any common or open prayer, or to minister any sacrament otherwise or in any other manner or form than is mentioned in the said book, or that by any of the said means shall unlawfully interrupt or let any parson, vicar, or other minister in any cathedral or parish church, chapel, or any other place to sing or say any common prayer, or to minister the sacraments or any of them in any such manner and form as is mentioned in the said book. That then every person being thereof lawfully convicted in form above said, shall forfeit to the King, our Sovereign Lord, his heirs and successors, for the first offence, ten pounds; and if any person or persons, being once convicted of any such offence, afterwards offend against any of the premises and shall in form aforesaid be thereof lawfully convicted, that then the same person so offending and convict shall for the second offence forfeit to the King, our Sovereign Lord, his heirs and successors, twenty pounds; and if any persons after be in form aforesaid shall have been twice convicted of any offence concerning any of the premises, shall offend the third time and be thereof in form aforesaid lawfully convicted, that then every person so offending and convicted shall for his third offence forfeit to our Sovereign Lord, the King, all his goods and chattels, and shall suffer imprisonment during his life, and if any person or persons that for his first offence concerning the premises, shall be convicted in form aforesaid, do not pay the sum to be paid by virtue of his conviction in such manner and form as the same ought to be paid within six weeks next after his conviction, that then every person so convicted and so not paying the same shall for the "same first offence, instead of the said ten pounds suffer imprisonment by the space of three months, without bail or maynprise; and if any person or persons that for his second offence concerning the premises shall be convicted in form aforesaid do not pay the sum to be paid by virtue of his conviction in such manner and form as the same ought to be paid within six weeks next after his said second conviction, that then every person so convicted and so not paying the same, shall for the same second offence of the said twenty pounds, suffer imprisonment during six months without bail or maynprise."

I need not trouble your Lordship with reading the section in the statute of Elizabeth which I think you will find completely analogous; and I quite admit that all these statutes are to be considered in pari materia; I quite admit that all these statutes are in force for the purpose of compelling obedience to the Book of Common Prayer, but I desire specifically to call your Lordship's attention to the highly penal character of these Acts, because the more highly penal they are the more careful should the Court be not to extend their meaning beyond that which it is clear they are intended to apply to, and I say that under these sections it is perfectly clear that not only a clerk in holy orders but any other person who takes any part whatever, even by his presence, or by encouraging others in performing any service, however honestly he may believe that it was done in compliance with the Prayer Book, if my friend's contention is correct, he would be liable to these very heavy penalties and punishments, if in one single tittle anything was done which was not expressly required by the Act, although it might have been a practice hallowed not only from time immemorial in the Church of England, but also throughout the whole of Christ's Holy Catholic Church.

Now, if my friend's construction is correct, how do you account for the existence of certain canons regulating certain matters in the performance of divine service? Doctor Lushington lays it down, and there can be no doubt about it, I need not trouble you with the exact page of the judgment, because the case is so familiar to your Lordship. Dr. Lushington in his judgment in the Westerton v. Liddell case admits that no canon—

(The Dean of the Arches.) He says the doctrine of desuetude is unknown to the Church of England.

(Mr. Prideaux.) And that no canon can be of any effect against the statute, that is a very important matter.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No doubt.

(Mr. Prideaux.) None of the statutes direct that act of reverence which I rejoice to say is becoming more common every day in this land—the bowing at the sacred name of the Redeemer. It is ordered by the 18th canon; it is ordered by the injunction of Queen Elizabeth; it is recognized by the declaration of King Charles, from Breda, and in all these documents it is spoken of as an ancient custom of the church. But my friend's argument is that an ancient custom of the church goes for nothing if it is not expressly re-enacted in the Act of Uniformity. My Lord, I say with confidence that if my learned friend is right, he might have included among the charges in this prosecution the fact that the reverend defendant in this case made deep and lowly reverence whenever that special name of the Redeemer, which is so mystically connected with the Incarnation, is mentioned in his church. Is your Lordship prepared to take a view of this case which will bear out that position? Is your Lordship prepared to hold that every member of the Church of England throughout the length and breadth of this land, who willingly and knowingly bows his head, or goes to a church where at any rate the minister bows his head, at the mention of that sacred name, is liable to be sent to prison on his first offence for six months without bail or mainprise? I do not see how my friend is to get out of the argument. "I care not," my friend would say,

“ for its being the practice of the Holy Catholic Church ; I care not for its being prescribed by the ancient canons ; I care not for its being prescribed by Injunctions of Elizabeth and the canons of 1604 ; what are they to me ? Ours is a glorious Protestant Act of Parliament Church, and I stand upon the Act of Parliament and the Act of Parliament only, and say that whatever is not in the Act of Parliament is forbidden ; and looking at the spirit with which the Reformers acted must be deemed to be a Popish superstition. What do I care for that ancient custom. I know that a very large number, if not all the practices now practised throughout the Western Church are primitive and ancient ; but what do I care for that ? We are a glorious Act of Parliament Church established in the 16th century, and we care nothing for the usages of the Primitive Church ; we care nothing for the canons, because the canons are only made by an ecclesiastical authority, and we do not care one straw for an ecclesiastical authority ; my argument is this, what says the Act of Parliament ? Whatever the Act of Parliament directs you shall do, that you must do, and you shall not do anything beyond that which it directs ; for it must be assumed that all these ancient practices which are not expressly ordered by the Act of Parliament are Popish superstitions.” I really understand my friend’s argument to go that length. I have referred especially to the bowing at the sacred name of the Redeemer, because it is recognized by a canon which, if my view of the case is correct, is perfectly good, but if my friend’s view of the case is correct, I assert, to use language of his own, and which he was very fond of employing in his address—“ I assert as a proposition of law cannot be a binding canon. It is consistent with my view because I say the Acts of Parliament only incidentally deal with ceremonial, and therefore I say that the Convocation had power to deal with ceremonial so long as they did not direct anything contra the Act of Parliament. And I say that whether the Convocation deal with the ceremonial or not, the people have a right to, use ceremonial in the church if it be not directly contradictory to the Act of Parliament. In my view of the construction of these statutes, which I am respectfully submitting to the Court, I can understand the existence of a canon directing that deep and lowly reverence should be made at the mention of the name of the Redeemer ; I can understand the existence of a canon directing that the Lord’s Table shall be covered with a decent cloth ; but if my friend’s construction is correct, if nothing is to be done, if nothing is to be sanctioned, if everything is to be denounced as Popish superstition which is not expressly directed in the Act of Parliament, I cannot for the life of me understand how there can be such canons as we have, or how they can be of any binding authority whatever ; because if any proposition is clear (and so far I am agreed with my friend) it is this : that the canon, whether passed before the Act of Parliament or after the Act of Parliament, is absolutely null and void so far as it is inconsistent with the Act of Parliament ; and according to my friend it is inconsistent with the Act of Parliament altogether if it provides for any single matter which is not provided for in that Act, so that to say the least, according to my learned friend, the canon would be inoperative, and you cannot go beyond the Act of Parliament because you are tied within (to use his own language) the four corners of the Act of Parliament. But according to the humble view which I am submitting, I can understand how it is that matters of ceremonial and ornament have been more or less dealt with by the canons.

Now, my Lord, as I stated, I instanced specially the bowing at the name of the Redeemer, because no question has ever been made as to the validity of the canons of 1604. But I will direct your Lordship’s attention to this—that the canons of 1640 direct the bowing to the altar. It may be that those canons are not of binding effect, and that you could not compel a clergyman to bow to the altar. It is better for me if they are not of binding effect, because then if the clergyman were charged with doing that which he had no right to do under the Act of Parliament, he could not shelter himself under the canons, and where is the prosecution for bowing to the altar ? Are there, my Lord, or are there not cathedrals in this land where the uniform practice is to bow to the altar, not for the purpose of carrying out an act of Popish superstition—I use the word, assuming for one moment the views which my friend takes of the Romish Church to be correct, although I do not agree with him at all—not for the purpose of carrying out a Popish superstition, but for the purpose of doing due reverence to that upon which symbolically and typically at any rate, the great Christian sacrifice is celebrated in our church at the present day. My Lord, is a man guilty, am I guilty myself—I ought not to talk about myself ; but whenever I see a bust of the immortal Shakespeare I always take my hat off to it—I ask my friend is that an act of idolatry ?

(Mr. Stephens.) Very like it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My friend says “ very like it,” I say it is not. If my friend meets a lady—I know his gallantry, and I have the pleasure of enjoying his private friendship, and nothing would grieve me more than that anything should interfere with that cordial friendship, which for so many years has existed between us, and I refer to it now because I know my friend well, and I know that if he meets a lady in the street he takes his hat off ; and he is right. It is true it is not ordered either in the Prayer Book or in the Canons, and I daresay that some extreme members of the Protestant Association may possibly fancy that it is an act of Popish idolatry. But, my Lord, it is perfectly clear that it is idle, it is foolish, to take such a view of an act of reverence ; and yet I say there is no distinction between bowing to the sovereign ; there is no distinction between bowing to the throne of the Sovereign, which is frequently done ; there is no distinction between taking your hat off to a lady and the act of reverence which is intended by bowing to the altar. None of these acts can be said in any sense to be matters of popish superstition. Bowing to the altar has been practised under that canon. There have been Martins, and there have been Lieut.-Col. Brockmans—the gallant gentleman who wrote a book or a preface to a book which I shall have to refer to presently—and there have been other persons in the olden time as well as now who would have been ready enough to take proceedings if they could. Where is the single prosecution against any Maçonochie of a bygone age for practising that which is a usage practised down to the present time in many cathedrals.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I know it was done all the time I was at Christchurch.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Precisely, my Lord. I was going to cite that instance. I recollect a friend of mine once called St. John’s College, Cambridge, the great nursery of senior wranglers ; and I think I may say that Christchurch, Oxford, is the great nursery of English statesmen. At any rate, if there is any place where it is necessary to guard against Popish superstition—if there is any place where it is desirable that anything which can be corrupted into Popish superstition should be checked, it is our universities, where the youths who are afterwards to bear part in the management and the legislation of this country are educated. And I say that if my friend is right—I do not know, I daresay your Lordship can tell me, who may happen to be the visitor of Christchurch, Oxford—

(Mr. Stephens.) The Queen.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Then, I want to know why the Queen, who is the keeper of our consciences, and who makes an oath that she will maintain in all its integrity the Church of England as by law established, I want to know why the Queen does not exercise her visitorial powers, and why she has permitted time out of mind this Popish superstition of bowing to the altar to be practised in that church.

There is one other remark upon this point which I have to make. I wish to call your Lordship's attention to a very remarkable historical fact, showing what the opinion of the Legislature who actually passed the present Act of Uniformity was. If your Lordship will refer to Kennett's Register and Chronicle, Ecclesiastical and Civil, you will find the following entry under the date "Die Luna, 28th Aprilis 1662," at page 671:—"The House of Commons" (this is a very remarkable fact, because it actually shows what the opinions were of the very men who passed this Act of Parliament) "resumed the debate upon the amendments to the Bill of Uniformity. The proviso for being uncovered and for using reverend gestures at the time of divine service was twice read; but the matter being held proper for Convocation, ordered that such persons as shall be employed to manage the conference with the Lords do intimate the desire of the House that it be recommended to the Convocation to take order for reverend and uniform gestures and demeanours to be enforced at the time of divine service and preaching."

(Mr. Stephens.) "And preaching."

(Mr. Prideaux.) "And preaching." That does not affect the thing at all. The only preaching that I know of that was recognised at that time was the sermon, which is part of the Communion Service, but I cite it for the purpose of showing that, at any rate in the opinion of the House of Commons, the Act of Parliament would not preclude the Convocation from dealing with those matters of reverential conduct, and that on the contrary the Convocation and not the temporal Legislature were the proper persons to deal with it. Then I find a second entry of the 8th May 1662, page 660, House of Lords, "Whereas it was intimated by the conference yesterday at the desire of the House of Commons that it be recommended to the Convocation to take order that reverend and uniform gestures and demeanours be enjoined at the time of divine service and preaching, it is ordered by this House and hereby recommended to the Lords, the Bishops, and the rest of the Convocation and clergy, to prepare some canon or rule for that purpose to be humbly presented to His Majesty for his assent." And then in the same book, under the title May 12th, is a record in Latin (I have not taken the trouble to copy it out) that the 18th canon was amended and improved for the purpose of carrying out that object.

I think that is matter worthy of consideration because it shows what was the opinion of the very Legislature which passed the present Act of Uniformity as to whether it was possible or not in these matters to travel at all beyond the four corners of the Act of Parliament. It is quite clear that they thought it was competent to the Convocation to do this, and that they went further and said that in respect to such matters it was fitter that they should be enjoined by the Convocation than that they should be enjoined by the Legislature, and it follows that if the Convocation could direct it, and it is not contrary to the Act of Parliament, then, whether the Convocation had directed it or not, it cannot be said to be contrary to the Act of Parliament that, that is done which it is admitted the Convocation (which could have no power or effect against the Act of Parliament) might direct.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is now time to adjourn until 11 o'clock on Monday. Mr. Stephens, I believe you have a general reply upon the whole case?

(Mr. Stephens.) A general reply? I do not exactly understand your Lordship. Do you mean that you will take the case of Flamank v. Simpson before I reply in this case?

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes.

(Mr. Stephens.) I must respectfully object to that course, because there are different counsel in that case.

(The Dean of the Arches.) They are the same points, are they not? There is very little difference between the two cases?

(Mr. Stephens.) I do not exactly know whether they are precisely the same points.

(The Dean of the Arches.) As I understand, then, you would wish to be heard in reply upon this case?

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly, my Lord. I cannot at the present moment tell what line of argument the other side are going to take, and I feel that it would not be satisfactory to my clients nor to myself to be deprived of the benefit of a reply upon this case.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You desire to be heard in reply upon this case and in reply upon the other too?

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The only objection to that course would be that it would tend to prolong the proceedings a great deal.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am very sorry that that should be the result, but still I feel that I should not be doing justice to my clients in this case if I were to postpone the reply till after the argument in Flamank v. Simpson had been heard, and then were to reply on the two cases.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then all I can say is, I must trust to you (and, indeed, I am quite sure I may do so) not to repeat in Flamank v. Simpson what you may say in this case.

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have a recollection that there is some charge in Flamank v. Simpson which is not part of this case.

(Mr. Stephens.) It is so. There are two charges which are not contained in this case, but one of them, I believe, will not be proceeded with.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Who are the counsel in Flamank v. Simpson; can you tell me?

(Mr. Stephens.) Dr. Deane and Mr. Hannen are for the defendants, and Dr. Swabey and Mr. Droop are with me for the prosecution.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I rather thought it had been originally understood that there should be one reply in both cases.

(Mr. Stephens.) My Lord, I never so understood it. It may perhaps have been a misunderstanding on my part, but I am not aware of any such arrangement having been made.

Adjourned to 11 o'clock on Monday.

EIGHTH DAY.

Monday, January 13th, 1868.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Mr. Prideaux, before you begin your argument I wish to make an observation. You have dwelt very strongly before me upon this point, that these matters which are charged against Mr. Mackonochie are not rites and ceremonies. You say they may be ceremonial acts, but not rites and ceremonies; and a great part of your argument was directed to that object, to convince the Court that the proper construction of "rites and ceremonies" in the Prayer Book was what you contended for. Now I have found an authority which appears to me to be very much in conflict with your position, and to which I will draw your attention, in order that either you or the learned gentleman who is with you may, if you think proper, deal with it before you close your argument. The words "rites and ceremonies" are of course translations of the Latin words "ritus" and "ceremoniæ," and they are also words of ecclesiastical art, if I may so speak, or of ecclesiastical nomenclature. Now in the Council of Trent, in the 22nd session, the 5th chapter, "De Missæ Ceremoniis et ritibus," is as follows: "Quumque natura hominum ea sit, ut non facile queat sine adminiculis exterioribus ad rerum divinarum meditationem sustolli, propterea pia mater ecclesia ritus quosdam, ut scilicet quædam submissa voce, alia vero elatiore in missâ pronuntiarentur instituit ceremonias item adhibuit; ut" (these are the instances of ceremonies) "mysticas benedictiones, lumina, thymiamata, vestes, aliaque id genus multa ex apostolica disciplina et traditione, quo et majestas tanti sacrificii commendaretur, et mentes fidelium per hæc visibilia religionis et pietatis signa ad rerum altissimarum, quæ in hoc sacrificio latent, contemplationem excitarentur." Now whatever authority this may have, and I am not pronouncing as to the extent of its authority as to the construction of those words "rites and ceremonies," it would appear to include under the title ceremoniæ, among other things, the use of lights, the use of incense, and the use of vestments. It would not be therefore in accordance with your construction that "rites and ceremonies" mean perfect services in themselves, but rather that they are ingredients, elements, individual acts of a rite and ceremony in your sense of the word. Now of course the Court is seeking for information from counsel, and is most desirous of obtaining it, and I am drawing your attention to this passage, which it appears to me has an important bearing upon that point of your argument, in order that you may deal with it if you think proper in the course of your argument.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am much obliged to your Lordship. At present I will rest upon it, and as it has been kindly brought to my notice by your Lordship, either I or my friend who is with me will take an opportunity of addressing your Lordship upon it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I see, looking at the case of Flamank v. Simpson, that they do charge the use of lighted candles, and of mixing the wine with the water; and I understand, Mr. Stephens, you wish to have a separate reply in both cases.

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I must say I am of opinion that you are entitled to it if you choose to demand it; but of course you are aware that to repeat the same argument over again upon two cases consecutively of the same nature would be hardly consistent with your duty as an advocate. You are certainly entitled, as they are separate cases, to have two replies.

(Mr. Stephens.) They are separate cases, my Lord, and what is important, they appear by different counsel; if the counsel were the same I should not feel the slightest difficulty in making one reply on both cases.

(The Dean of the Arches.) If any new argument were introduced, you would have the opportunity of answering that of course.

(Mr. Stephens.) My Lord, I feel that the interests of my clients demand that I should reply upon this case.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do as you think fit; I cannot control you; it is your right.

(Mr. Stephens.) I hope you will not think me disrespectful to the Court when I say that I prefer having a separate reply upon this case.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are certainly entitled to it.

(Mr. Stephens.) Your Lordship may rely that the observations which you made on Saturday, and likewise to-day, shall receive my most respectful attention, namely, that I will compress my argument into the smallest possible compass in both cases.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Of course you are aware my only object is this, my time is the time of the public and not my own.

(Mr. Stephens.) Exactly, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Mr. Hannen, I believe you are with Dr. Deane in the other case. I mean to hear Flamank v. Simpson with this case if I possibly can.

(Mr. Hannen.) I have already been requested to ask your Lordship if it was your intention to proceed with Flamank v. Simpson immediately upon the conclusion of this case.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, it is, if I possibly can; because you know I cannot give judgment in one case without giving it in the other.

(Mr. Hannen.) I was asked to make the application to your Lordship for the convenience of my client; because there is another case in which he is engaged, the Bishop of Winchester v. Rugg, for which a day had been fixed.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, there is that case; but I will hear Flamank v. Simpson before that. Mr. Stephens, you have got that reference to the Council of Trent which I have just mentioned?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord, I have.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My Lord, before I proceed, I wish to say one word upon an argument which I used on Saturday, and it is rather to save my friend the trouble of going off upon a collateral point than for any other reason. Your Lordship will remember that I dwelt at some length upon the penal clauses relating to third parties, and I mentioned that the effect of these penal clauses would be even now to render churchmen liable to be indicted, if my friend's construction is right, if they attended a church where the clergyman bowed at the sacred name of the Redeemer specially indicating the mystery of the Incarnation. I am not at all prepared to say that I am not right in that, but at all events, it does not affect my argument in the least, because, even supposing my friend should show that by the operation of the Toleration Acts the penalty would not now be incurred, it would not affect my argument as to the time before the Acts of Parliament came into operation.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you wish to withdraw that part of the argument?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Certainly not to withdraw that part of the argument; I merely wish to show that it is extern to the argument and rather supports me if it was necessary, that in the reign of William the III. an Act of Parliament should be passed to protect third parties.

(The Dean of the Arches.) This is upon the question of ceremonies?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I merely wish to say that I have not considered what effect the various Toleration Acts might have, but I am prepared to take my stand on the state of the law before the first Toleration Act was passed.

Now your Lordship has been pleased to lay great stress upon the first preface to the Book of Common Prayer; and I will in the next place resort to the consideration of that first preface again "concerning the service of the church." "And forasmuch as nothing can be so plainly set forth, but doubts may arise in the use and practice of the same; to appease all such diversity (if any arise) and for the resolution of all doubts concerning the manner how to understand, do, and execute the things contained in this book; the parties that so doubt or diversly take anything, shall alway resort to the bishop of the diocese, who by his discretion shall take order for the quieting and appeasing of the same; so that the same order be not contrary to anything contained in this book." Now, my Lord, I referred to that clause specially under the suggestion of your Lordship yesterday for the purpose of showing that the proper course would have been that the parties should apply to the bishop. I now refer to it for the purpose of showing that the bishop has a discretion with regard to ceremonial. But the bishop could have no discretion with regard to ceremonial if he were merely to construe the strict letter of the Act, and the introduction of a discretion to the bishop here, which could not be at all needed with reference to the form and order of the words, shows that whilst the Act of Parliament deals specifically with the form and order of the words, it only deals incidentally with the ceremonial attending the service. To give the bishop a discretion with reference to the words would be idle; to give him a discretion at all if he was merely judicially to interpret the Act would be idle; and therefore these words "in his discretion," qualified as they are by the words which subsequently follow, "so that the same order be not contrary to anything contained in this book," is, as I submit, a clear proof that the statute admits that there may be matters of ceremonial appurtenant to the offices, but not necessarily essential parts of them, which are to be regulated by the discretion of the bishop. And I submit, with great confidence, that this is a view worthy of your Lordship's consideration. If my friend's construction is right that the officiating clergyman is to be bound by the iron letter of the book and by that only, and is not to go out of it, where can there be the ground for an appeal in a matter which is "taken diversly" in order that it may be regulated by "the discretion of the bishop;" the only limit to that discretion being not against his prescribing that which is not ordered in the book, but against his prescribing that which is contrary to the book?

(The Dean of the Arches.) Unless the appeal be to the bishop in his court, I am not expressing any opinion hostile to the view which you are now expressing, but of course it is capable of that construction.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My Lord, my answer to that is, that whether it be to the bishop in his court or to the bishop in his individual capacity, it does not alter the fact that it is a matter in which the bishop is not to be bound by the strict letter of the book, but in which he is to act according to his discretion.

(The Dean of the Arches.) As, for instance, in the matter of granting a faculty.

(Mr. Prideaux.) As in the matter of granting a faculty. And there is a passage in the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which your Lordship remembers, no doubt, bearing upon this.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I remember the passage. It is a passage in which they say "Informed as we are by those conversant with ecclesiastical law that the bishop has a discretion"—is not that the passage?

(Mr. Prideaux.) In another passage in which they are speaking of the fair linen cloth they say, "This is a matter."

(The Dean of the Arches.) You had better refer me to the passage. The passage that I was referring to is at the close of that paragraph relating to stone altars.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My Lord, it is not that; it is the one that relates to the "fair linen cloth."

(Dr. Swabey.) It is the "embroidered cloths."

(Mr. Prideaux.) My Lord, I am sorry to say I labour under one very great disadvantage, I am very unmethodical. The passage in Moore is as follows: "Whether the cloths so used are suitable or not, is a matter to be left to the discretion of the Ordinary. In this case their Lordships do not see any sufficient reason for interference, and they must, therefore, advise the reversal of the sentence as to the cloths used for the covering of the Lord's table during the time of divine service." There is another passage besides that.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes. That passage Dr. Lushington referred to the other day in a case in which proceedings were taken before him in a civil form, I think, for the removal of certain cloths, and he said he considered that binding upon him. The altar cloths were shown to be the same as those used at St. Barnabas' Church in that case, and he said that he considered that decision binding upon him, namely that the Judicial Committee had expressed an opinion that the discretion of the Ordinary might be used in such matters. But there is another passage which I think is with regard to the communion table.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord; this was the special passage.

(The Dean of the Arches.) After entering into the question of the embroidered linen and the lights and the Rubric, and the canon prescribing a "fair white linen cloth," they say:—"Although their Lordships are not disposed in any case to restrict within narrower limits than the law has imposed the discretion which within those limits is justly allowed to congregations by the rules both of the ecclesiastical and the common law courts, the directions of the Rubric must be complied with."

(Mr. Prideaux.) I will point out the passage to your Lordship afterwards if I find it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is another passage in which it is certainly suggested that the discretion of the Ordinary may be exercised with regard to various matters which are in their own nature indifferent; that is to say, which are neither legal nor illegal. I have found the passage which I was looking for, it is at the bottom of page 175. Having come to the conclusion that the use of crosses as distinguished from crucifixes is lawful as architectural ornaments, there is this passage:—"Their Lordships hope and believe that the laws in force respecting the consecration of any building for a church, and which forbid any subsequent alteration without a faculty from the Ordinary, will be sufficient to prevent any abuse in this respect." That is the point I was looking for.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am almost sure there is another passage to which I wish to refer, and perhaps your Lordship will allow me to point it out to you at any time when I can find it. The passage I mean is one in which the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (it may be that I am mistaking between them and the Dean of the Arches) in which the Court, in giving judgment, says:—"This is a matter within the discretion of the Ordinary. The Ordinary has already exercised his discretion, and we see no sufficient reason for interfering with it." It is a passage, I think, to that effect.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You need hardly trouble upon that point, because there really is no doubt at all that there are certain matters as to which the Ordinary has a certain discretion to exercise, whether with regard to certain ornaments or certain other matters as to which the Rubric has been silent, and as to which no doubt the Ordinary has a discretion. The only point which you have to establish as to those ceremonies and rites, or whatever they are to be called, is this—does this ceremonial, this ritual, fall within the category of those things over which the Ordinary has a discretion?

(Mr. Prideaux.) That, no doubt, my Lord, is one of my points. Dr. Stephens has kindly referred me to the passage which I want. It is in the judgment of Sir John Dodson where he deals with the coverings of the communion table, and your Lordship will find it at page 131 of Moore's Report.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is a case now pending before the Privy Council which will be decided in the course of this month (it has been argued) as to this very question of the discretion of the Ordinary, granting faculties. That is a case with regard to interment, but probably the whole matter may be somewhat touched upon in it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My contention, as I have humbly submitted it to your Lordship, is that the statute regulates the ceremony as a whole, and renders compliance with the ceremonial necessary, so far as is expressly required, but is not exhaustive of ceremonial, and leaves the question what ceremonial shall be used

(provided it be consistent with the provision of the statute) an open question, to be regulated, if regulated at all, by the discretion of the Ordinary. It is something like what we find in the account given by Norfolk in his reference to perhaps the most gorgeous ceremony that we read of in the annals of English history—showing the distinction between the ceremonial and the ceremonies—

“All this was ordered by the good discretion

Your Lordship will remember probably that passage in the first scene of the first Act of King Henry the VIII. where Norfolk is giving an account of the “Field of the Cloth of Gold.”

Now your Lordship asked me, and no doubt prima facie it presses apparently against me more than any other part of this branch of the argument, some questions concerning the use of the word “ceremonies” in the preface “Of ceremonies: Why some be abolished and some retained.” I have already ventured (and your Lordship will understand me as insisting upon that) to say that it is very incidentally indeed, if at all, that we have to deal with this preface on ceremonies, because what I have to interpret is not the meaning of the words “rites and ceremonies” in this particular preface to the Prayer Book, but the meaning of the words “rite, ceremony,” or indeed the whole of the passage in the penal clause; but, my Lord, I venture to suggest, that when carefully looked at, that preface does not point at ceremonial, that it points to what I called “lesser ceremonies.” What is meant by the words upon which my friend so much relies, “extern ceremonies?” I answer ceremonies—ceremonial, that is to say, with accompanying words being in a certain sense ceremonies in themselves, but which had crept in de facto as part of the services of particular rites and ceremonies, being extern to them, and therefore being very much distinguished from those ceremonial rites, which I insist are not extern ceremonies, but intern ceremonies; that is to say, ceremonies actually and essentially part of the entire service, though, as I ventured to say before, not perhaps necessarily essential parts. One clause of the section I ventured to call your Lordship’s attention to: “Some are put away because the great excess and multitude of them hath so increased in these latter days that the burden of them was intolerable; whereof St. Augustine in his time complained that they were grown to such a number that the estate of Christian people was in worse case concerning that matter than were the Jews.”

Now, my Lord, I will venture to submit that these incidental ceremonial rites could not be ceremonies in that sense; that is to say, ceremonies which had grown up to such an extent “that the burden of them was intolerable.” It is impossible to say that there is any intolerable burden in the mere introduction of the burning of lights, or in the burning of incense, or in the mixed chalice, or in elevating the sacred elements somewhat higher than is absolutely necessary. I say that upon the face of that recital it is clear the passage points to separate and independent lesser ceremonies such as some of those which I ventured to mention, “creeping to the cross;” the “Asperges;” the “giving of holy bread;” the “sprinkling of houses with holy water;” the “blessing of crosses and beads;” the “giving of ashes on Ash Wednesday;” the “carrying of palms on Palm Sunday,” and such like, all of which your Lordship will remember were accompanied by words, and constituted in themselves not mere ceremonial acts, but ceremonial acts pertinent to and accompanying words evidently upon the face of them no part of the various rites of the Church, but additional ceremonies which had been introduced some for good purposes, all probably for good purposes at first, in the course of the history of the Church, and which had become ultimately so numerous that the burden of them was intolerable. There is another passage in this preface on ceremonies which further illustrates that view, and it is the latter part of the fourth paragraph: “Furthermore the most weighty cause of the abolishment of certain ceremonies was”—now, I am quite sure that your Lordship will at once, if you look at this passage, see that it is impossible it can be held to refer in any sense to such simple ceremonial acts, which are merely ceremonial parts of a great rite, as are under consideration here; it is impossible that you can believe—that they were so far abused, partly by the superstitious blindness of “the rude and unlearned, and partly by the insatiable avarice of such as sought more their own lucre than the glory of God, that the abuses could not well be taken away, the thing remaining still.” That shows that some might be and some are retained. Now, I submit that it is impossible that can apply to these mere ceremonial acts, part of the great Eucharistic service, which could not have been “abused for filthy lucre’s sake by those who care more for their own lucre than the glory of God.” I say it is impossible that section can apply to a mere ceremonial act which is part and parcel of a great Christian rite; but it may well apply to such rites as I have ventured to suggest to you—the giving of the holy bread, which was always accompanied by words; “the giving of ashes on Ash Wednesday;” “the carrying of palms on Palm Sunday;” “the sprinkling of houses,” and “the blessing of crosses”—because we know, as matter of history, that on such occasions payments were made; these have been abolished, whilst “the betrothal” and “the ring in marriage” have been retained. But the instances which I have cited are abolished because the burden of them had become intolerable, and because it was the practice to extort money for filthy lucre’s sake when those extern ceremonies were performed; and I feel satisfied that the more your Lordship considers this case the more you will feel that the introduction of the word “extern” (and it is remarkable that it only occurs in the first Act when those ceremonies had been existing) is a fact which strongly supports the view of the reverend defendant in this case rather than that of the prosecution. It marks the limit. If within the meaning of the section these are extern ceremonies my friend might have some colour of a case, but if they are not extern ceremonies, but are what I have ventured to call intern ceremonies, as contradistinguished from extern ceremonies, then the introduction of the word “extern” in that section furnishes a strong argument in support of the legality of the acts complained of in this prosecution.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It has not escaped you, of course, that the division of the preface immediately before that just read is headed “Concerning the services of the Church.” Then it is added, “Of ceremonies; why some be abolished and some retained.” According to your argument, would it not be more proper to have said, “Of services, why some be abolished and some retained?”

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord, I apprehend not; and for this reason: because, although in a certain sense they are ceremonies in themselves, they are not services in themselves.

(The Dean of the Arches.) “Each ceremony a perfect service” was what I understood your argument to be?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say so in a certain sense; but here they speak of the services of the Church which are continued, besides which it is not “concerning the services of the Church,” as your Lordship read it, but “concerning the service of the Church.” Here they are speaking of the great Christian services which are retained in the Church, and I apprehend that the word “service” there is evidently used in a somewhat different sense from the word “ceremonies” in the preface which we are now considering.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No doubt it is used in a different sense from “ceremonies,” but that would be rather against your argument, would it not?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Your Lordship will remember we are not discussing a preface which appears in the present Prayer Book for the first time, we are discussing a preface which appears also in the first Prayer Book, and I think (I will not be quite sure) that the order is different in the first Prayer Book. I think it is impossible, looking at the language used in this Preface, "Of ceremonies; why some be abolished and some retained," upon a fair and reasonable construction of that passage, to hold that it refers to mere simple acts of ceremonial which have no separate action of their own, but are merely part and parcel of the celebration of the great Christian mystery.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You see this is omitted in the first Prayer Book altogether.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am not aware of that, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) In the first Prayer Book that part of the preface which begins "There was never anything by the wit of man so well devised," is there; but this part of the Preface "Of ceremonies; why some be abolished and some retained," is not.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Oh yes, my Lord, it is called the preface in the first Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is it? I cannot find it here.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I think your Lordship will find it in the first book.

(Dr. Swabey.) In the Prayer Book of 1549 it is placed immediately after the service for the first day of Lent. It is brought in in Keeling in this place merely for the sake of comparison.

(Mr. Prideaux.) It is after the Communion Service.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Whether it is out of its place or not, it is in the book. As I understand, it is merely in a different place. Then there is another argument which I will venture to submit upon that point with regard to the services of the Church which supports my view; that what the Prayer Book formally intended to enforce was the singing or saying of the service according to the particular use, that is, according to the particular form and order of words, and I think if your Lordship looks carefully into the preface concerning the service of the Church, you will see that that preface deals not with ceremonial at all, but with the order and form of the words.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Oh yes, it does certainly, because I remember my attention was drawn by you or Mr. James to that note which is appended, "As touching kneeling, crossing, holding up of hands, knocking upon the breast, and other gestures they may be used or left, as every man's devotion serveth without blame." That is the note attached to the chapter of "Ceremonies; why some be abolished and some retained," in Edward VI.'s first book.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My friend, Mr. James, called attention to that, but I was going to call your Lordship's attention now to some passages in the body of the preface "concerning the service of the Church."

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not believe there is any difference between this and the other.

(Mr. Prideaux.) None, my Lord, except that note which is appended in Edward's first book, there is no other difference except that note. I am now going to cite the second paragraph, "But these many years passed, this godly and decent order of the ancient fathers hath been so altered, broken, and neglected by planting in uncertain stories and legends, with multitudes of responds verses, vain repetitions, commemorations, and synodals, that commonly when any book of the Bible was begun, after three or four chapters were read out, all the rest were unread, and in this sort the book of Isaiah was begun in Advent, and the book of Genesis in Septuagesima, but they were only begun and never read through. After like sort were other books of Holy Scripture used," (further showing the technical sense in which the word 'use' is introduced,) "and moreover whereas St. Paul would have such language spoken to the people in the church as they might understand, and have profit by hearing the same, the service in this Church of England these many years hath been read

"in Latin to the people, which they understand not, so that they have heard with their ears only, and their heart, spirit, and mind have not been edified thereby. They could not say 'Amen,' when they did say 'God bless us!'" and furthermore, notwithstanding "that the ancient fathers have divided the Psalms into seven portions, whereof every one was called a nocturn, now of late time a few of them have been daily said, and the rest utterly omitted; moreover, the number and hardness of the rules called the Pie, and the manifold changings of the service, was the cause that to turn the book only was so hard and intricate a matter that many times there was more business to find out what should be read than to read it when it was found out. These inconveniences therefore considered, here is set forth such an order"—(that is important as clearly pointing to the words and the succession of the words)—"whereby the same shall be redressed. And for a readiness in this matter, here is drawn out a calendar for that purpose, which is plain and easy to be understood, wherein (so much as may be) the reading of Holy Scripture is so set forth, that all things shall be done in order, without breaking one piece from another."

My Lord, I do not think that I need trouble the Court by reading any more of that preface. I think that the Court will see from the passages which I have read that that preface "concerning the service of the Church" has nothing whatever to do with the incidental ceremonial appurtenant to the service, and if so, it strengthens instead of weakens the argument which I have ventured to address to your Lordship.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say it has nothing to do with ceremonial.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And nothing to do with ceremony.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Nothing to do with ceremony, not as individual acts of ceremony, I mean.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Because the next division is "Of ceremonies." Thus there is a distinction between the service and the ceremonies. I thought I understood you to say that each ceremony is a perfect service in itself.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Each ceremony is a complete service in itself, but it deals here with parts of the service.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But I thought your distinction of a ceremony was—I do not mean to pin you down to the exact words, but your general distinction was—that each ceremony was a service, small it might be, but still complete in itself. And if that be so, if a ceremony be a service of whatever degree complete in itself, if it means that and that only, it is not the same thing as the ordinary use of the word "ceremony" would imply such as I have referred to in the Council of Trent, namely, the use of incense, the lighting of candles, and so on.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My Lord, I submit that it is perfectly clear the object of that preface is to deal with the order of the words.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Of which preface do you mean? "Of ceremonies," or "Of the service of the Church"?

(Mr. Prideaux.) "Of the service of the Church."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Certainly, there is no doubt.

(Mr. Prideaux.) It is a sort of explanation and justification of the alterations which have been made in the form and order of the words.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But it is a distinct thing from the one about ceremonies?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Although ceremonies were the lesser services, as you say.

(Mr. Prideaux.) The one says, "We will explain why we have altered this form and order of the words," the other says, "We will give a reason why in the services we have cut off extern ceremonies."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then it comes back to what is meant by "extern ceremonies."

(Mr. Prideaux.) Still I do not admit that even if my friend could carry his construction of the words "extern ceremonies" it would be injurious to my argument. But I do think it is very important to ascertain the meaning of the words "extern ceremonies."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Certainly, it might be very important if you could establish this proposition for which you are contending, namely, that to bring in and use incense during the service, or to light candles at a particular time, is not a ceremony within the meaning of this Act of Parliament and this Prayer Book, because your opponent, Mr. Stephens, has contended that it is so. But what I am asking is this: Do you displace his argument that it is a ceremony by showing me that there are two rubrics, one referring to the service of the church, and another concerning ceremonies.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Well, I think, looking at these prefaces fairly as a whole, they support my view; because it is clear that the preface concerning ceremonies was retained with a special object, and the word "ceremonies" there is to be read as if it were written "extern ceremonies."

(The Dean of the Arches.) And what are "extern ceremonies"?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say they are what I have ventured to submit—"the lesser offices of the Church," which had sprung up in the course of time, and many of which had been introduced. They are lesser services which are extern to the services which are alone prescribed.

Now I will just call your Lordship's attention to the meaning of "ceremony," according to Johnson—"an extern rite."

(The Dean of the Arches.) No doubt.

(Mr. Prideaux.) The explanation of the word "extern" in Todd's Johnson is, "Without itself, not inherent, not intrinsic, not depending upon itself."

(The Dean of the Arches.) No doubt that is the general meaning of the word. "Ceremony" is a word of ecclesiastical art, and must receive its interpretation according to that application.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Whether the word "ceremony" is intended to mean a mere piece of ritual or not is not material; the important thing is in what sense it is used in these penal clauses.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Certainly.

(Mr. Prideaux.) With your Lordship's permission, I will deal with that passage from the Council of Trent at a future time, because I have not at present specifically directed my attention to that.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Certainly; you will understand I only called your attention to it as contributing to throw some light on the use of these ecclesiastical words "rites and ceremonies." Understand my object. I think it appears to throw a light on the meaning of those two words.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am extremely obliged to your Lordship, not only as regards myself and the reverend defendant in this case, but I feel as strongly as any person can feel the extreme importance of this case being thoroughly sifted; and of course I would desire that everything that can be used or that can be suggested against the view I am contending for should be brought under my notice, in order that I may deal with it.

Now I will just call attention to one or two cases. I wrote to my clerk to bring down the books, but they have not arrived.

(The Dean of the Arches.) They are very likely here in the library.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not think it will be necessary to refer to them beyond giving your Lordship the notes. My letter miscarried and the books are not here. The first is Escot v. Mastin, the only report of which that I have is in a book—a very useful and valuable book—"Notes of Ecclesiastical and Maritime Cases,"

(The Dean of the Arches.) They are by Thornton. There are no notes more reliable than those which are to be found in that book. They are extremely valuable, all of them.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am very glad that your Lordship's view corresponds with that which I have humbly ventured to entertain of them. The only reason for referring to that case was that in the course of the judgment (your Lordship will find the case commences at page 532)—

(The Dean of the Arches.) What are you citing this for?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am citing it with regard to what I ventured to contend on Saturday, that if my friend's construction is right, then a canon which in the slightest degree interfered with the provisions of the Act of Parliament is absolutely inoperative. Dr. Lushington deals with this maxim (and it is scarcely necessary that I should cite any authority upon it), but one of the canons of 1640, I think, is very carefully considered in that case.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Not of 1640. It is the canon of James of 1603.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I think it is the canon of Charles I.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is a question of the burial of a child baptized by a Dissenter, and the Court ruled that where there had been the use of water and the invocation of the Holy Trinity, that was a baptism; and inasmuch as by the Rubric a clergyman is bound to bury all baptized children, he was held to be bound to bury a person who was baptized, though the baptism were performed by a Dissenter, if there had been the use of water and the invocation of the Holy Trinity.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, I remember that all that was held to be of the essence of the sacrament was water and the use of the proper form, "In the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost." But, my Lord, in the course of the argument the Court says, "This canon can have no effect so far as it provides anything contrary to the Act of Parliament; nor even can it have the effect of a declaration as to the meaning of the Act of Parliament, because nothing but a declaratory Act can in any the slightest degree modify the binding operation of an Act of Parliament."

(The Dean of the Arches.) You cite it for that purpose to show that a canon cannot affect an Act of Parliament.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I cite it to show that a canon cannot affect an Act of Parliament, because I will not say one of my great points, because I have some stronger points than this, but one of my points is, that there are several canons (the canon relating to the altar cloth is one of them) which have always been acted upon, and always been regarded as binding, but which absolutely can have no effect at all if the construction which my learned friend is contending for is the true one.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Why? I do not quite follow you.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Because no altar cloth is directed in either of the Prayer Books.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But is not it subsidiary to the use of the table?

(Mr. Prideaux.) That is another point, my Lord. So, as I shall contend, are these other matters subsidiary.

(The Dean of the Arches.) As I understood Mr. Stephens's argument, it was not that you might not have something which was not expressly prohibited, but if it was not expressly provided for then it must fall under the expression "necessary or subsidiary to what is allowed."

(Mr. Prideaux.) Certainly, as I understand my friend's contention; but I cannot understand any legal application of that word "subsidiary" according to my friend's view, unless it means "necessarily involved;" and if by "subsidiary" you mean nothing more than "reasonably accessory," I cannot conceive anything being more clearly and essentially subsidiary than these acts of ritual which are essentially parts of this particular service and are in no sense extern to it. If by the word "subsidiary" is meant "necessary," then properly neither an altar cloth nor an organ is subsidiary, but if by the word "subsidiary" is meant "reasonably consonant to the service," then I say that all these acts of ritual which are complained of are as subsidiary as the altar cloth and the organ.

But there is another case to which I wish to call your Lordship's attention.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The passage to which you have referred me is in the decision of the Privy Council in Escott v. Mastin.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I will refer your Lordship to the passage by-and-by.

But there is another case which is also reported in the "Notes of Ecclesiastical and Maritime Cases," to which I wish to call your attention, because no question of subsidiariness can arise there. I ventured to submit to your Lordship on Saturday that inasmuch as there is no direction in the Act of Parliament that the knee be bent at the mention of the sacred name, a clergyman might, as I regret to say many do, refuse (under the impression, I suppose, that bowing at the sacred name of the Redeemer is a Popish superstition) to bend his knee. But there is an express decision that a clergyman is bound by that canon. It is the case of Burder v. Hale, and which is reported in the sixth volume of "Notes of Cases," page 111. That was a proceeding against a clergyman for divers unseemly matters in the pulpit; and among other things I regret that any man who calls himself a clergyman of the Church of England should have yielded so far to the downward tendency towards irreverence, that characterises the spirit of Protestantism, as to have been guilty of such a matter; but it appears that this reverend gentleman had thought that it was within his Christian duty, had thought it was within the obligation which he owes to his incarnate Saviour, that he should denounce from the pulpit the bowing at that sacred name, and proceedings were taken against him for having done so.

(The Dean of the Arches.) In the Court of York, I think.

(Mr. Prideaux.) In the Court of York, I think it came up.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I argued the case, I remember I went down to argue it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) There was a very beautiful passage in the judgment referring to the beautiful manner in which that ancient custom in the church is described and referred to in the 18th canon, with a statement that he at least as a clergyman was bound by it. Now I ask if my friend's construction is correct, how was this reverend gentleman bound by it as a clergyman? If my friend's construction is correct he might at this moment have introduced an additional Article against Mr. Maconochie, charging him with bowing at that sacred name during the celebration of the service, because from the beginning to the end of the Prayer Book there is no direction that that reverential act shall be performed. And therefore, my Lord, I do refer with some confidence to this case, and I do respectfully point out to your Lordship the fearful irreverence which is the natural tendency of the spirit that is regulating this prosecution.

Now, my Lord, I do not propose to enter at any length into the other instances of practices in the Church not prescribed by the Prayer Book, because they are all included, and more than included, in the great fact that neither the placing of the elements upon the Lord's table nor the performance of any of the manual acts of consecration is directed by the second Prayer Book of Edward VI. If that cannot be made a test upon the question whether everything which is not expressly provided is forbidden it would be almost idle in me to take up the time of the Court by pointing to minor instances, and therefore I shall only deal specifically with one, but I will call your Lordship's attention to the general fact that, so far as one can judge by usage from the commencement of the Reformation to the present time, practices have existed, and existed without objection, which are not directed and prescribed by the Prayer Book. I see your Lordship makes a gesture of dissent; but I say, as far as the evidence goes, it shows it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Oh! I am not expressing any opinion at all. Do not misinterpret me.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I inferred from a certain gesture of your Lordship that you did not assent to my proposition.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Oh! no.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I shall refer you to two matters; but the one which I wish particularly to refer to is the fair linen cloth. By the canons of the Church a fair linen cloth is directed to be placed on the altar at the time of the celebration of the Mass. The first Prayer Book says nothing about it; the second Prayer Book, which, whilst it yielded to the prejudices of the Puritans as far as it could with propriety, was determined to enforce everything which was absolutely necessary to prevent unmitigated irreverence, ordered it. I ask, can there be a doubt that it was used in the meantime; can there be a doubt that it was lawful to use it in the meantime? I submit that, placing yourself in the position of the priests of that period, looking at the fact that time out of mind the fair linen cloth had been used, there can be no doubt whatever that it was lawful to use it although it was not prescribed. That the irreverent spirit of Protestantism was omitting it I think very probable; that the Reformers who prepared the second book therefore resolved at least to check this irreverence I think very probable; but the question is whether, when even in this scanty book as regards ritual, in order that at least that should be obeyed, it is felt necessary to introduce a direction—the question is whether your Lordship can infer from that that it was not lawful to use the fair linen cloth under the first book, and I do press this consideration upon your Lordship, because great light will be thrown upon the history of this case by bearing in mind that there were certain persons going ahead of the legal steps which were carried out by the Reformation in the downward course of Protestantism. My Lord, I doubt not (I shall have to deal with that presently) that that was the reason why kneeling was expressly enjoined in the receiving of the Holy Communion under the second Prayer Book. There is no direction to kneel in receiving the Holy Communion in the first Prayer Book. There were indeed the ancient canons, forming part and parcel of the common ecclesiastical law of England, directing kneeling, but my friend says you cannot look at the canons, that you are to be guided only by the words of the Act of Parliament. There is no direction to kneel in acknowledgment of those great and ineffable blessings that we receive when we communicate with the body and blood of our Redeemer, under the form of bread and wine; and I ask your Lordship if you can doubt that if in the intermediate time those people who recognised in this great mystery the ineffable presence of the Redeemer under the form of bread and wine (and that there were hundreds and thousands, thank God! who did so, I think it is impossible your Lordship can doubt) I ask you if you can doubt that those people under that deep impression recognising that Holy mystery "rightly discerning the Lord's body" knelt when they received the Blessed Sacrament of the body and blood of their Redeemer? And yet, if my friend is right, they were liable to be indicted for doing so. Can such a construction of this Act of Parliament be sustained? Can such a violation of every holy practice and belief in the one Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church be swept away from the Church of England, simply because there is an Act of Parliament which directs that you shall sing and say the divine office of the Communion of the Lord's Supper according to the Use of the Church of England instead of saying it according to the Use of Sarum, of York, or of Bangor, or of Hereford; because that is what my friends are contending for—my learned friend, who says that this is an Act of Parliament Church established by the Protestants in the 16th century—that is what he is contending for. My Lord, thank God, it is not an Act of Parliament Church, but a branch of the one Holy and Apostolic Church, the celebration of the divine offices of which is to be carried on according to the Use of the Church of England; nor, my Lord, is it even an Act of Parliament Use. I will not even concede that to my friend; it is a Use prepared by the only authority which has power to deal with the rites and ceremonies of the Church of God; and we know that from the Articles, because the Articles tell us that it is “the Church that hath power to decree rites and ceremonies;” so that it is not even an Act of Parliament Use. It is a Use declared by the particular Church which “hath power to decree” a form of the rites and ceremonies ratified and upheld, thank God, by the temporal power. But the use is the use of the National Church of England; the obligation to use it, the civil liability for refusing to use it, the civil liability for using any other use, is the act of the Legislature; and to that extent and to that extent only has the Church of England an Act of Parliament use. My friend would make it an Act of Parliament use. My friend feeling galled at the fact that the lawful sacrificial vestments appointed by the Church (because if your Lordship looks at the Rubric of the First Prayer Book you will find that it evidently refers to vestments already appointed)—I say those who instruct my friend, feeling that, would try to make it an Act of Parliament Church, and by the iron power of the temporal Parliament alone, they would interfere with the privileges and the rights, and the Catholic practices of the church upon that point. But, thank God! my Lord, they have failed, and under Divine Providence they will continue to fail. They have not ventured, although they know, and everybody knows that the reverend defendant, who is made the victim of this prosecution, uses according to law the vestments appointed by the ecclesiastical law; they have not ventured to charge that in this prosecution. But Parliament, thank God! knows its position too well, remembers the great recognition of the rites of the Church which are found in the preface to our present Prayer Book, and the Parliament, the peers, at least, refused to listen to that attempt which has been made, if possible, to convert a branch of the Holy Catholic Church into a state-made Church, and to cut her off from communion with the whole Church of Christ. Therefore, my Lord, I ask if it is possible that your Lordship can doubt for one moment that those who recognised in its ineffable mystery this great eucharistic service, knelt when they received the body and blood of their Redeemer under the form of bread and wine under the first Prayer Book; and I ask if your Lordship is prepared to hold that they were not legally entitled to do so? If they were, I ask again what becomes of my friend's argument?

Now, my Lord, at any rate there is one practice (and one good proof is as good as a hundred, especially in the absence of all evidence the other way) which is almost universal, and that is the singing of the Gloria at the time of the Gospel. That is almost universal. It is prescribed in the first Prayer Book; it is not prescribed in the second; it is not prescribed in Elizabeth's Book; it is not prescribed in the present Prayer Book; and yet it is continued to be used.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is in the first Prayer Book?

(Mr. Prideaux.) It is in the first Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And in no subsequent book?

(Mr. Prideaux.) In no subsequent book. It is not necessary; if it had been it would have been ordered probably; it is not subsidiary in the sense of being anything approaching to a necessary adjunct; but it is an ancient Catholic practice of the Church, such a practice as the Church declares it is not her intention to depart from in her 30th canon. It is one that has ever been practised in the Anglican branch of the one great Catholic Church, and it has continued to this day, I will not trouble your Lordship by referring to any other instances, because I really feel that one instance is as good as a hundred. I will simply say that in a very elaborate pamphlet on the mixed chalice, written by the Rev. Mr. Grueber (a pamphlet to which I shall have to call your Lordship's attention when I come to deal with the mixed chalice), you will find an appendix setting out several of those instances in which practices are more or less universal which are not prescribed by the present Prayer Book, or indeed by any; and you will also find some of them referred to in the body of the pamphlet.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is there any authority that you can refer me to for the introduction of hymns into the church?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord, no authority; but I am told that complaints have been made from time to time of their being used. However, they seem to have been acquiesced in. There has been no bishop, no parishioner, no Mr. Martin, who has proceeded in the matter.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I mean have you any authority you can point me to.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord.

Now, the next question to which I desire to call your Lordship's attention is the question of prohibitory rubrics. My friend felt the force of that, because he argued that the mystery and the divine action of the ceremony of the Mass were so dear to the priests that it was necessary to prohibit elevation—that was perhaps the best explanation that he could give; but I will show your Lordship in a moment that it will not hold water. Can your Lordship believe that the clergy, or a very large portion of them, of the Church of England, were so much less attached to the great ceremonials of the Mass in the latter part of the reign of Edward VI. and in the reign of Elizabeth, especially the earlier part of it immediately following the death of Queen Mary; than they were at the commencement of King Edward's reign, that it had become unnecessary to prohibit the elevation by express prohibition? If that was the reason—if it was necessary to prohibit the elevation by an express prohibition in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI.,—why was it not continued in the sixth—why was its continuance not carried out by Queen Elizabeth? Because in Queen Elizabeth's Prayer Book, though the alterations were few, I do not agree with my friend they were all unimportant; they were well considered, and a step was taken showing the determination of those who prepared that Prayer Book still to uphold, without doubt or hesitation, the great mystery of the real objective presence of the Redeemer in the Eucharist, and that was the restoration of the words in communicating to the faithful “the body of our Lord Jesus Christ.” Therefore, so far as the alteration of the words of the Prayer Book goes, it would rather give a lift, if I may use the phrase, to those who hold the high sacramental doctrine. If the prohibition was only introduced, not because silence did not amount to prohibition, but because it was necessary emphatically to forbid this particular practice, why was it not continued in the second Prayer Book of King Edward VI.? why was it not reinserted in that Prayer Book, amended as it was in the first year of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth? I challenge my learned friend to say. I say that it is conclusive, upon this argument alone, that my friend's suggested reason is a very lame one. I do not wonder at his putting it forward, because unless my friend can account for the supposition of a prohibitory Rubric consistently with his position, that whatever is not enjoined is expressly forbidden, why there is an end of that part of his case. Again, I say, my friend cannot. And I say with some confidence, (and I am persuaded the more your Lordship considers this question the more you will see the fair force of the observation which I make,) that if the reason was that it was necessary to have a positive affirmative declaration or prohibition in aid of that great principle of law, for which my friend contends, that whatever is not enjoined is forbidden, your Lordship cannot doubt that you would have had that prohibition continued both in the second Prayer Book of King Edward VI. and in the Prayer Book of Queen Elizabeth.

Now let us look to the second Prayer Book. Your Lordship is aware that there is a very important prohibitory Rubric, in the second Prayer Book, at the commencement where Morning and Evening Prayer was to be said: "And here it is to be noted that the minister at the time of Communion, and at all other times of administration, shall use neither alb, vestment, nor cope, but, being archbishop or bishop, he shall have and wear a rochet, and, being a priest or deacon, he shall have and wear a surplice only." Why was that prohibitory Rubric introduced, if indeed it be prohibitory? But there are very learned men who hold that the true meaning of that Rubric is, that clergymen shall not be compelled to wear anything more. There are, no doubt, some very learned ritualists who contend that this Rubric is not prohibitory, but is merely carrying out the whole spirit in which this second Prayer Book seems to have been compiled, as regards ritual, namely, prescribing that which was lawful to be a minimum; but I do not ask your Lordship to take that view, and I cannot say that I am personally looking at the thing as a lawyer, prepared myself to insist upon it, but I say why was that prohibitory Rubric introduced? According to my friend, it was not necessary. But the Legislature knew better. They knew not only that the provisions of the first Prayer Book would be operative, but that the ancient canon law, appointing the proper sacrificial vestments, would also be operative; and that unless they were expressly forbidden they would be used.

There is also a prohibitory Rubric which I will only just refer to, because it is not so strong, and does not perhaps furnish so good an argument as the other two which I will cite for the purpose of showing your Lordship that there are prohibitory Rubrics in all the Prayer Books, and that is the sixth Rubric at the end of the Communion Office at the end of the present Prayer Book. "And if any of the bread and wine remain unconsecrated the curate shall have it to his own use, but if any remain of that which was consecrated, it shall not be carried out of the church, but the priest and such other of the communicants as he shall call unto him shall immediately after the blessing reverently eat and drink the same." My Lord, that is the first Rubric which prohibits the reservation of the Blessed Sacrament for the use of the sick. The first Prayer Book of Edward VI. enjoins it. The second Prayer Book of Edward VI. is silent on it. Does my learned friend mean to say that if this Rubric had not been introduced the blessed sacrament might not have been reserved and carried out of the church for the communion of the sick? Therefore, your Lordship sees there are three prohibitory Rubrics, each of which is out of place, as I submit (because I have endeavoured to show, and I hope with some success, that the reason which my friend has attempted to give for the introduction of the prohibitory Rubric against elevation cannot be sustained),—I say there are three prohibitory Rubrics, one in each Prayer Book, which unnecessarily burden the Prayer Book without the slightest use in the world, if my friend's position is correct, that whatever is not expressly enjoined is forbidden.

I have referred your Lordship to the very valuable pamphlet on the Mixed Chalice by the Rev. Mr. Grueber. With permission I will read one passage from that work bearing upon this question. You will find it in page 15, and it is this: "Again, if the position be true that that which is not ordered is forbidden, what place would be left for such a thing as a prohibitory Rubric? Surely, there could be no need of one." Now, there was in the first book of Edward a Rubric prohibiting the elevation, as has been noticed, and in our present Prayer Book there are Rubrics prohibiting a celebration if there be not three persons to communicate with the priest (that is another instance which I did not give your Lordship), and the reservation. There is the Black Rubric. I shall have something to say of the Black Rubric presently. "The very existence of such Rubrics is fatal to the position in question." But my friend attempts to get out of that difficulty by referring to the Morning Prayer of the first book very triumphantly—the Matins. Your Lordship will find it in the commencement of the Order for Matins daily throughout the Year. I say my friend referred to it very triumphantly, conceiving that it completely met the argument which with confidence I am submitting to your Lordship upon the effect of prohibitory Rubrics.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What are you going to read from now?

(Mr. Prideaux.) From the very first page of the Order for Matins Daily throughout the Year, in the first book, about half-way down, "Then shall be said or sung without any invitatory, this Psalm, Venite exultemus, &c., in English, as follows"—Now, my friend, in fact, suggests that that is an answer to the argument which I am urging upon the Court with reference to the effect of the prohibitory Rubrics. I respectfully submit that it does not touch the case.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I forget how that is used as an argument.

(Mr. Prideaux.) It was used in this way. My friend says that the prohibitory Rubric is necessary to forbid a thing, why say "without any invitatory." That is my friend's argument. It strikes me that the answer is in the following, that that is rather a directory than a prohibitory Rubric. The practice of the church was so universal to couple the invitatory with the hymn, the Venite, that if the instruction had simply been, Then shall follow this hymn, the Venite exultemus, you naturally would have had the invitatory also. In a certain sense, speaking in a Catholic sense, referring to the hymn with reference to the services of the Holy Catholic Church, the invitatory might be regarded in a certain sense as part and parcel of the hymn itself; therefore it is necessary there to say, "Here shall follow the hymn:" and in my mind when we say "the hymn," we do not mean the hymn in the popular sense in which you would always understand it—the hymn in connection with the invitatory—but we mean the hymn alone. Then, perhaps, my friend will carry out the argument and say "why is that discontinued?" but that will not help him because the matter having been once stopped, and the preface "concerning the service of the Church" declaring, as it does, that they have done away with all invitatories, one can well understand that after the Legislature had once affirmatively expressed their opinion that there was to be no invitatory, it might safely be left out. Now, I respectfully submit that that is a fair and satisfactory answer to that very weak argument of my learned friend. I do not think, if I recollect right, that he was enabled to instance any other rubric upon this question. And your Lordship will do me the favour throughout, to bear in mind the great distinction which I am insisting upon between words, or ceremonial accompanied by words, and mere acts of ceremonial in themselves.

Now, there is another difficulty which my friend has felt. He says that you cannot go out of the four corners of the existing Prayer Book; you must not go to the Prayer Book of Edward VI., because if you went to the Prayer Book of Edward VI. you would let in the mixed chalice. Whatever you do, whether it be the use of words, or whether it be ritual connected with ceremonial or not, you cannot go outside what he calls "the four corners of the Act of Parliament." He knows that he rests entirely upon the Act of Parliament. No ornament, no implement, no furniture, unless it be expressly required or required by necessary implication, in the present book. Then I ask—my friend was pressed with this; he tried to give an explanation of it, but failed—I ask, in the name of Goodness, what is the use of the Ornaments Rubric? And I confidently and unhesitatingly say that if my friend is right in his contention that you can use no implement and no ornament which is not either expressed or necessarily or reasonably required by the present Prayer Book, the Ornaments Rubric is a dead letter.

Now, we all know that at the time of the Restoration there was a great discussion about the continuance of the Ornaments Rubric. Does your Lordship believe that those great bishops, who in their answer to the Puritan divines insisted upon their determination to adhere to the customs of the Church, declining, even for the sake of peace, to break the customs of the Church—"we have no such custom, neither the Churches of God"—does your Lordship believe that when those great bishops, those catholic-minded men, those men who desired as far as the spirit of the time would permit, to bring back in every respect our Anglican branch of the one Holy Catholic Church to the model of the Primitive Church—that in introducing a Rubric regulating the ornaments and vestments appointed by the Church and used universally throughout the whole of Christ's Church they intended to introduce a dead letter? And yet, if my friend is right in saying that nothing can be used or done which is not to be found within the four corners of the present Prayer Book, I unhesitatingly and fearlessly say, that that Rubric is a dead letter.

My friend says, "Oh! no; it was declaratory." Declaratory! Of what? Of that which you did not want a declaration for, that you might use such instruments as are expressly or by necessary implication prescribed by the present Prayer Book? "Oh! but," says my friend, "there are certain things, some few things, which are mentioned by name in the first Prayer Book." What does that signify? The Rubric has been applied to things which are not mentioned by name in the first Prayer Book. The Rubric has been applied to organs. Where are organs mentioned in the first Prayer Book? The Rubric has been applied to altar cloths. Where are altar cloths mentioned in the first Prayer Book? The Rubric has been applied to credence tables. Where are credence tables mentioned in the first Prayer Book? Therefore, my Lord, if the construction could be borne out, and had been borne out by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, that nothing which was not expressly named in the first Prayer Book could be lawfully used, there might be something in the argument of my friend, but when we find that the principle of implication is applied to the determination of what was lawful under the first Prayer Book equally with the question as to what is lawful under the second, what is my friend's argument upon that point worth? Nothing. I assert with great respect and great reverence to the Court, it is worth nothing; and if my learned friend is right in his contention, that most invaluable and glorious Rubric which the bishops had their special attention called to, and were determined to maintain and keep in force, is absolutely a dead letter and worth nothing.

Now, my Lord, I have another argument to place before you. I have had put into my hand (and it really is a very valuable passage) a passage from a work which I daresay your Lordship well knows, "The Law of Ritualism explained in its relation to the Word of God, to the Primitive Church, to the Church of England, and to the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, by the Right Reverend John Henry Hopkins, D.D., LL.D., Bishop of Vermont."

(The Dean of the Arches.) What edition?

(Mr. Prideaux.) It is the cheap shilling edition of this year, published by Masters. The passage is at page 66: To maintain "that these terms" (omission and prohibition) "are synonymous, and that omissions and prohibitions are precisely equivalent, is an absurdity so great that I cannot suppose any reasonably literate man would adopt so preposterous a proposition. But there are many in our Church whose attention has never been directed to the subject, hence their notions are unavoidably confused and indistinct, needing a plain explanation.

"In the hope of aiding them to form a clear and just conclusion upon this important point, I ask their consideration to the following statement: It is a well-settled rule in all our courts of justice that every part of the common statute laws of England which were in force throughout the colonies adapted to their circumstances before the War of Independence, with the single exception of the rights of the Crown, continue to be the law of the land, notwithstanding the Revolution, and are still obligatory, unless changed and done away with by subsequent Acts of our own Legislature. Of that position there is and can be no doubt whatever."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is as to the English law being binding in America?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord; it illustrates the broad principle with which I ventured almost to open this case, namely, that the common law is operative, excepting so far as by express prohibition it is done away with.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That passage which you read I understood to be to the effect that the English law was binding in America?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes; but it is quite the same argument which I ventured to submit to your Lordship, I think, on the second day on which I had the honour of addressing you. Now, there is another class of cases in the Prayer Book which has nothing to do with the matter, and that is the discretionary power which is given to the officiating minister in certain cases. Your Lordship is aware (I need not enter into particulars) that there are several instances of this. Take the Prayer for the Queen, for example, "Here shall follow this Prayer or this." Therefore, my learned friend infers because in certain cases where the Legislature thought fit that one act at least should be done, that one thing should be read, to give a discretion as to whether it should be A or B, therefore says my learned friend that is an argument for saying that if you were to have had the option for instance of mixing water with the wine that would have been expressly provided. Now, my Lord, I say in the first place, that deals entirely with prayers; and secondly, that it deals with the alternative position. It is this, "We will have it, you must say one or the other." If it had been a mere question of alternity and of reading of prayers, it might have been somewhat in point. But I submit that my learned friend must be very hard up for an argument indeed if he is to insist that these incidental pieces of ritual, which I say are essentially parts of the service in question, are forbidden; because in respect of certain prayers the minister has a discretion as to whether he will read one or the other, and as to how many he will read. As for instance in the case of the collects after the Communion Service, where there is a Communion the collects may be omitted; but if there be no Communion the minister is to use one or two or more in his discretion. I think I should be trifling with your Lordship if I were to occupy more time upon that part of the case.

Now, my Lord, my learned friend has exulted very much because an Act of Parliament was passed, I think in the third and fourth years of Edward VI., directing the destruction of Mass Books. What has that to do with the case? Have we ever denied that we are bound now to sing or say the divine offices of the Church according to the use of the Church of England, and that we are not at liberty to say them according to the use of the Church of Rome, or according to the use of Bangor, or of Hereford, or of York, or according to any other use? I have already pointed out to your Lordship from the preface to the Book of Common Prayer that the object of the old uses was not to regulate the ceremonial; the ceremonial was substantially one and the same, according to all the uses; and even the old uses, some being fuller, and some less full, and all being fuller probably than the present English use; but even the old uses are not complete as regards ceremonial, nor were they intended to be so, because the object of the use was to show the order and form in which the services were to be said or sung. Mr. Mackonochie does not deny for one moment that he is bound to sing or say the Holy Service of the Communion according to the use of the Church of England; and he does not deny for one moment that after those Acts of Parliament passed, it was illegal to sing or say the offices of the Church according to any other use. Then what argument can my learned friend possibly base upon the destruction of these old Latin Missals to support him in his position that Mr. Mackonochie is not at liberty to introduce such subsidiary ceremonial, essentially part of the service as has ever been practised in the Church Catholic, and in the Church of England, and has never been prohibited? I confess I cannot see the weight of my learned friend's argument, and I must leave him in his reply to patch it up if he can.

But then he exults in the fact that there was an order that the service should be said without cauteles. I have not got the injunction here that was referred to, but what has that to do with it? My learned friend referred to a very elaborate and learned book of the Reverend Dr. Lee, the Directorium Anglicanum.

Now, my Lord, we are not bound by any opinion or any view which Dr. Lee may entertain; and therefore, so far as the book expresses any opinion, it is quite irrelevant and quite immaterial whether Dr. Lee has taken exactly correct views of this matter or not, but my learned friend referred to it also for the purpose of showing what cauteles are, and therefore I beg to call your Lordship's attention to what they really are. They have nothing to do with the great and essential rite, or with ceremonial—they deal entirely with collateral matters. No doubt they arose out of the deep and holy reverence with which members of the Roman Church, and I think I may say of the Church Catholic, dealt with the consecrated elements. They are "cautions," directing you to be careful that in the performance of that sacred rite you do not in any way desecrate the blessed Sacrament. These cautions may be necessary or they may not; they may be desirable or they may not. The English clergy have the liberty not to use them, perhaps even they were enjoined not to use them, (though that injunction may not perhaps be legal,) because they were told to use the service without cauteles. But the position I lay down before your Lordship is this, and I pray you to look at that very learned book of Dr. Lee, and see whether it does not bear me out, that the cauteles have nothing whatever to do with the essential ceremony of the action of the mass, they deal entirely with incidental matters. At that time, and by many in the Church of England now, the consecrated elements were looked upon with deep and great reverence. Whether they are right or whether they are wrong, a very large proportion of those who are in communion with the Holy Catholic Church, whether they belong to the Roman Church or to the English Church, or to the Greek Church, believe that in some mysterious and ineffable way, there is veiled under the forms of bread and wine the blessed body and blood of the Redeemer. And that belief naturally, in a man whose mind and feelings are not utterly gone as regards the instinct of reverence, generates a desire that the sacred elements should be handled with reverence, and that nothing should be done, which even in the mind of the most sensitive man would amount to that which looks like disrespect and irreverence, to what is at least, according to the very language of the Church of England, the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of the Redeemer. And the cauteles not dealing with the essential ceremonies of the divine mystery, but dealing with incidental matters, guiding and assisting the officiating priest as to the course which he is to adopt if by any accident anything should occur which would look like a desecration of these sacred elements, desirous of securing his so celebrating that sacred rite, that no such accident should occur, give him exact and minute directions, very valuable at any rate in the estimation of those who take a high view of the character of this blessed Sacrament, but not relating to essential parts of the ceremony itself. Therefore what is the use of my learned friend's argument, when we are not now considering whether Mr. Mackonochie would be justified out of his abundant reverence and veneration for that blessed Sacrament in carrying out all these directions, we are not considering that, we are now considering whether what is done, being according to the testimony and practice of the whole Catholic Church of Christ essentially parts of the action of the divine mystery, having been practised as essentially parts of the action of the divine mystery—we are now considering whether Mr. Mackonochie is prohibited from complying with those parts or essential parts of the divine mystery. And what has the question whether Mr. Mackonochie is dealing or is not dealing under the instructions and directions of these precautions which are pointed out in the cauteles, to do with this matter? If there had been any direct prohibition against any of these, which as I say are essentially parts of the action of divine mystery, then, indeed, there might have been something in the argument. But I defy my learned friend, whatever be the effect of these injunctions in point of law, with the single exception of one or two prohibitions against elevation, and I shall hope to show your Lordship presently that those prohibitions do not point to elevation to God as part of the celebration of the sacred rite, but to the separate elevation or showing to the people; but assuming for the present that there are prohibitions against the elevation I ask my learned friend whether he has shown, either having legal effect or not having legal effect, any prohibition whatever directing that the chalice shall not be mixed, any prohibition whatever directing that incense shall not be burnt, any prohibition whatever (except just at the commencement, on one or two occasions shortly after the first Prayer Book passed) even pointing to a prohibition of candles.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say no prohibition of incense?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say my learned friend cannot show a single prohibition of incense. Of course I shall deal with that more fully when I come to deal with the charge of using incense, but I say my learned friend cannot produce a single prohibition against incense.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Or against any of those three things?

(Mr. Prideaux.) He has cited from Bishop Pilkington, who accuses Moses of idolatry because he burnt incense; but he has not, and he cannot produce a single prohibition against the burning of incense; he has not, and I will undertake to say he cannot produce a single prohibition against the mixed chalice. The apparent prohibitions which he has produced against the burning of candles upon the altar I shall deal with presently, but he has not, and he cannot produce a single prohibition against worshipping the Redeemer mystically and ineffably present under the forms of bread and wine; and I shall also respectfully submit to your Lordship, when I come to deal with the question of elevation, that he has not produced and he cannot produce a single prohibition forbidding the elevation of the blessed Sacrament as an offering to God, distinct from the separate object of elevating and showing it to the people. One thing is quite clear, and this is what I am dealing with now, that these particular ceremonial acts which are the subject of this discussion are beside the object with which the cauteles were prepared. It was not supposed to be necessary to give the priests cautionary directions with reference to these essential parts of the service; but we can well understand that it may have been considered well (and, for aught I know, it might be well now, and I am sure it would with regard to some celebrants), that some cautionary direction should be given for the purpose of securing the reverend handling of and dealing with these blessed consecrated elements. Therefore, my Lord, I respectfully submit that the existence of the cauteles proves nothing against us. The prohibition is of the cauteles and of the cauteles only; and the fact that they did not go on to prohibit those rites which are essentially part of the great sacrificial rite, furnishes rather a proof that there was no intention to prohibit the latter, although there might have been an intention to prohibit those cautionary and reverential precautions which the old Catholic clergy of the Church of England were directed to follow when they were celebrating the divine mystery.

Now, my Lord, has it not appeared very strange to your Lordship that my learned friend has not cited a single case in either of the courts in point to support his view. The only direct cases which can be cited I think I may venture to say are, first the case of the King v. Sparks, which is a direct authority against my learned friend, and furnishes an à fortiori argument, because it deals with the order and form of words. The King v. Sparks decided that if you did not interfere with the order of the service, or even if you did, because in that case there was an interference with it—that if you say the service, if you say Morning Prayer, or if you celebrate the blessed Eucharist according to the use of the Church of England, you do not offend against the statute by introducing additional prayers even in the middle of the service.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you think it goes that length?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Well, my Lord, I will call your attention to what the decision was. The plaintiff was indicted for saying "other prayers." The decision was the indictment ought to have charged that he said "other prayers instead."

(The Dean of the Arches.) It might have been the prayer before the sermon, they said.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Well, that is part of the service. "It might have been the prayer before the sermon, and so no offence."

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is ordered by the canon.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I ask your Lordship whether the sermon, according to the Church of England, is or is not part of the office of the celebration of the Holy Communion? Is the sermon anything distinct? Undoubtedly not. The sermon is part of the office of the Holy Communion. Following immediately after the saying or singing of the Nicene Creed comes the Rubric: "Here shall follow the sermon, or one of the homilies set forth by authority, or hereafter to be set forth by authority."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Perhaps I do not understand your proposition rightly, but I understood you to say that it was lawful for the clergyman to read any other prayers than those provided?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, I do not say "any other," because I think it may depend upon the character of the prayer itself. All I say is that The King v. Sparks is an express authority that if you say and sing the service according to the use of the Church of England, you may say another prayer. I confess if it does not decide that, I do not understand what it does decide. The indictment was for using "other prayers." The judgment was reversed. Why?

(The Dean of the Arches.) The consequences of such a doctrine as that are rather serious, are they not?

(Mr. Prideaux.) That may be. Whether your Lordship is sitting in judgment upon the case is another point. But I say that the case is a direct authority in justification of the practice which is universal almost of having a prayer before the sermon and a prayer after; I think.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have taken down a note of your argument.

(Mr. Prideaux.) If your Lordship pleases. Then I will not carry it further.

Now, my learned friend also cites as one authority against me (and it is the only authority he can find), the case of Newbery v. Goodwin, which is reported in 1 Phillimore, 282.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is a case of brawling, is not it?

(Mr. Prideaux.) In one sense it was a case of brawling, but it was really and substantially a case of making alterations and omissions in the service. It was under the form of brawling, and there was a charge of brawling also. It is important that I should call your Lordship's attention to what was really decided, because in one sense there certainly is an extrajudicial statement by the learned judge there, Sir John Nicoll, and I think his statement is, for two reasons at least, quite compatible with the view for which I am contending. My learned friend cited the case for these words in it, which your Lordship will recollect. "The law directs that a clergyman is not to diminish in any respect or to add to the prescribed form of worship. Uniformity in this respect is one of the leading and distinguishing principles of the Church of England; nothing is left to the fancy and discretion of the individual."

(The Dean of the Arches.) No alia præces?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No alia præces. "According to this view, if every minister were to alter and omit, or add, according to his own taste, this uniformity would soon be destroyed, and though alteration might begin with little things, yet it would soon extend itself to more important changes in the public worship of the Established Church; and even in the Scriptures themselves, most important passages might be materially altered under the notion of giving a more accurate version, or omitted altogether as unauthorized interpolations." Now, my Lord, that is the nearest authority that my learned friend can find, and what I wish particularly to direct your Lordship's attention to is this, that the statement that the clergyman was to add nothing is extrajudicial. The charge against the Defendant in that case was for omitting and altering.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That was not a case of brawling, I see.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, but there was a charge of brawling also.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That was a criminal suit by letters of request brought from the Consistory Court of Chichester?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes; the marginal note of the very learned editor of these Reports is quite correct; it bears out my view of what is really in issue, and does not go further—"A clergyman in performance of divine worship not at liberty to alter or omit any part of the service."

(The Dean of the Arches.) It was partly for brawling in church, and partly for irregularities in reading the Holy Scriptures, but it was not under the Act against brawling; it was under the general law.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes; but I am not dealing with the brawling question, because that is not material. My learned friend has tried to make as much capital as he can out of the words, "The law directs that the clergyman is not to diminish in any respect, or to add to the prescribed form of worship." My learned friend relies upon those words in the judgment. Now, what I say is, that there is no decision upon that point.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is there no decision?

(Mr. Prideaux.) There is no decision upon that point. The charge is "omitting and altering."

(The Dean of the Arches.) I see that at the end of the judgment it is said, "These Articles are certainly proper to be admitted; whether they can or cannot be proved I am not to anticipate; but if they can, I am of opinion that the conduct of the minister is illegal, and will subject him to censure, and to the costs of the proceeding. He therefore will consider well whether he will act discreetly and advisedly in defending the suit." I see at the end that the Defendant gave an affirmative issue, and was suspended for a fortnight.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not dispute that, but I say that if your Lordship looks at the articles, you will find there is no charge of adding.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No, there is no charge of adding.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That is what I am insisting upon, the marginal note is strictly correct.

(The Dean of the Arches.) We will look at the articles, I will send for them.

(Mr. Prideaux.) The marginal note is correct, "a clergyman in performance of divine worship is not at liberty to alter or omit any part of the service." This reverend gentleman had some strange Protestant notions of his own, and he altered, I think, the words of the Scripture somewhat.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, he admitted that he had done so. He said, I have been accused by some ill-natured neighbour of making alterations in the service; I have done so before and I shall do so again.

(Mr. Prideaux.) But what he did was to omit and substitute.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Not add.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, not add. Of course, I have not seen the articles, and my friend will make such use of the language which is put into the mouth of the learned judge as he can make of it. I am simply calling your Lordship's attention to the fact that it is no decision against Mr. Mackenzie. It is no decision that as regards words addition may not be made which is consistent with the Prayer Book, and does not interfere with the full performance of the service, in fact, I submit, as I have said before, it is expressly decided that that may be done in the other case.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say it is no decision that words may not be added to the service.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Your Lordship will do me the favour to bear in mind the great distinction I make throughout between words and gestures.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say it is no decision even that words may not be added.

I will now call your Lordship's attention, because there is a reference to other cases, to a passage in the judgment of the Judicial Committee in the Westerton case on this point, in which they refer to Newbury v. Goodwin. The passage is at 186 of Moore, and it is that part of the judgment relating to the credence table. "The next question is as to the credence tables. Here the Rubrics of the Prayer Book become important. Their Lordships entirely agree with the opinions expressed by the learned judges in these cases, and in Faulkner v. Lichfield, that in the performance of the services, rites, and ceremonies ordered by the Prayer Book, the directions contained in it must be strictly observed, that no omission and no addition can be permitted; but they are not prepared to hold that the use of all articles not expressly mentioned in the Rubric, although quite consistent with, and even subsidiary to the service, is forbidden." Now, my Lord, no doubt the Privy Council there in terms apparently adopt the language of the learned judge in Newbury v. Goodwin, and it is necessary to bear in mind the particular object with which they were giving their judgment at that time. Their object was to let in the credence table; they saw that they could let in the credence table by adopting that view without explaining it or inquiring into it, and therefore they adopt that view, and they say that even in accordance with that view the credence table may be let in.

(The Dean of the Arches.) They do not refer to Newbury v. Goodwin, I believe?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, I beg your Lordship's pardon, they do not; they refer to Faulkner v. Lichfield. And with regard to Faulkner v. Lichfield in reference to the judgment of the learned judges in the Court, I would respectfully submit to your Lordship—I am not going fully into it because Dr. Tristram is kind enough to say he will call your Lordship's attention to such passages in that as are important—I content myself with laying down the broad proposition that this broad inference is not warranted by that judgment.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you mean to say their Lordships of the Privy Council miscarried on that point?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not say that they miscarried, because I do not complain of their judgment. I say that they did not minutely and carefully consider the question with reference to all additions, because they saw a sufficient means of holding the legality of the credence table without doing so.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But you hold that the expression is incorrect.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I hold that it is too wide. If it is to be taken in its broad sense it would shut out the "Glory be to Thee, O God," at the Gospel; it would shut out hymns before and after sermon; it would shut out the prayer before sermon; it would shut out the bishop's charge at confirmation; it would shut out innumerable things which are invariably practised; and it is impossible that their Lordships could intend to apply it in its broadest sense. Well, then, if they did not intend to apply it in its broadest sense I may fairly submit to the Court, and in submitting that I am not asking your Lordship really to review the decision of the Privy Council, because I would not ask you to do that for a moment, that they looked at this altogether with special reference to the matter they were dealing with, and finding that the judgment which they had to give did not interfere with that language, they adopted it so far only. In effect, even supposing it in its strict letter to be true, that does not interfere with the question of the admissibility of the credence table, because the credence table though not prescribed by any Rubric, and though not necessary to the communion table, is a reasonable adjunct to it. Now, I will just read to your Lordship part of the judgment of Dr. Lushington in this case, because he refers to Faulkner v. Lichfield. The same argument was urged before him, and it will show that really the Privy Council could not have meant to extend the principle so far as the mere words they seem to have used would appear to warrant. Dr. Lushington says, "With regard to the church furniture, ornaments, decorations, or by whatever other name we can comprehend the fittings of the interior of a parish church, the primary authority being the Rubric, it is perfectly clear that whatever is therein prescribed ought to be done"—that I do not dispute—"and that whatsoever is in any degree inconsistent with what is therein prescribed ought not to be done." There we are agreed. "There are not wanting passages" (your Lordship will recollect this is Dr. Lushington's commentary on the judgment of the learned judge in Faulkner v. Lichfield) "in the judgment of Sir Herbert Jenner Just which tend to show that, in his opinion, the silence of the Rubrics or of the canons is, primâ facie, at least presumptive proof against what is not mentioned; and for the truth of this remark I refer more particularly to his observations as to credence tables." That, my Lord, is in page 30, and is Dr. Lushington's comment upon the very same judgment in respect of which the Privy Council say, "Their Lordships entirely agree with the opinions expressed by the learned judges in these cases, and in Faulkner v. Lichfield, that in the performance of the services, rites, and ceremonies, ordered by the Prayer Book, the directions contained in it must be strictly observed; that no omission and no addition can be permitted." Now, my Lord, I admit that the "silence of the Rubrics or of the canons is, primâ facie at least, presumptive proof against what is not mentioned;" but I submit that I have abundantly removed that primâ facie presumption. And I submit with confidence that if effect is to be given at all to the use of that word "addition" in the judgment of the Privy Council it must be held to apply not to matters which are merely incidental, and essentially parts of the services, but to substantial and independent additions, at least so far as regards the ornaments and the mere ceremonial. My Lord, I do not trouble your Lordship with reading the judgment of the Dean of Arches in this Westerton case; but I say if it is examined it will be found also that when looked at it hardly as a whole warrants the very general language in which the Privy Council appear to have handled the question.

Now, my Lord, I have already called your attention to the fact that organs are held to be lawful although they are neither prescribed or necessary. We know that they are not prescribed; it is equally clear that they are not necessary. Because I believe I am right in saying—but if I am wrong there is a reverend gentleman here whose knowledge of the practice of the Greek Church is as great, I believe, as his knowledge of the practice of his own, who will set me right if I am wrong.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Not here in this Court.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I mean, my Lord, privately, because I should be sorry to make a statement in this Court which is not correct. I believe I am right in saying that instrumental music is never used in the Greek Church; and yet we know that the musical services of the Greek Church are overpoweringly grand. I recollect hearing that the first time Madame Catalani attended divine service in a Greek Church she was so overpowered with the solemnity and beauty of the music that she was melted to tears. Therefore, my Lord, it is perfectly clear that organs are not necessary and are not necessarily involved in the Rubric.

(The Dean of the Arches.) They are certainly not necessary ornaments of the English Church. There are several decisions upon that point. But the question is whether they are not subsidiary to the singing of anthems.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No doubt they are subsidiary but not necessary. I am just reminded that in the Pope's Chapel—I am going to give my learned friend a little Popery, and it is very plain and very simple—

(Mr. Stephens.) You have given me nothing else, Mr. Prideaux.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am told that in the Pope's Chapel there is no instrumental music. I admit organs are reasonably subsidiary.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the point.

(Mr. Prideaux.) But, my Lord, I say, if it is a question of what is reasonably subsidiary, then you come to the discretion of the bishop. I can understand as a proposition of law its being laid down that that which is required by necessary implication shall be decided by the construction of the statute; but if you once let in any ornament of any kind which is not necessary by the construction of the statute, then, I say, a question immediately arises in which doubts may honestly be entertained as to how to construe the statute, and the appeal should be to the bishop.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say that wherever there are doubts that Rubric applies.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Quite so, and I say that there must be doubts, and there must be discretion if the question is one not of necessary adjunct, but of an article being reasonably subsidiary. The same argument applies to altar cloths, how are they necessary? Clearly they are not. They may be reasonably proper, and it may be well that it should be a matter for discretion; but I am told, my Lord, in point of fact, that in the Roman Church there are plenty of altars upon which there is no altar cloth. However, I need not labour that point. It is perfectly clear that they are not necessary.

My Lord, I have only one general remark to make further upon this part of the case, and that is to call your attention—my friend must pardon me for using the language—to the worthless character of a large number of his authorities—citing such a person as Mr. Hickerling, and such a person as Pilkington, and then that absurd story that Mr. Goode gives us.

(Mr. Stephens.) Dean Goode you mean.

(Mr. Prideaux.) About some person having been told by some Dr. Achilli of that age of some conspiracy that they had at the Council of Trent against the Church of England, by endeavouring to set that church at loggerheads by preaching different doctrines.

My Lord, I am not going into particulars, but I really am astonished that my friend should cite such books. What this absurd story—about some pervert from the Roman Church having been said to have communicated to some third person a conspiracy which the cardinals and other dignitaries of Trent had against the English Church—has to do with the question, I cannot conceive. Perhaps I may be allowed—I will furnish my friend with a case, if I shall not be thought out of order, which occurred to myself, for it is quite analogous, and it is very short. It was simply this: Many years ago—

(The Dean of the Arches.) If you set a precedent I am afraid it will be followed, and Mr. Stephens will tell us something that happened to himself.

(Mr. Stephens.) I have not the slightest objection to my friend telling his story.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I was merely going to say that some years ago an old lady, who was a constant reader of the "Record," tried to prevent me from going up upon the battlements of Lulworth Castle by telling me that some months ago they had thrown a Protestant from the battlements and broken his neck. Upon inquiry I found that there had been some time before a struggle between the Revenue officers and a smuggler, and the officer had been thrown down.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Did you ascertain whether the smuggler was a Papist or not?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord; but I will undertake to say he was a good Protestant. At any rate, one thing is quite sure, he had very little reverence for the laws of God.

(Mr. Stephens.) I hope the old lady will be called, in order that I may have an opportunity of cross-examining her.

Adjourned for a short time.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My Lord, in support of the proposition that I have been laying down (I have very nearly done with it) that the Rubrics are not exhaustive, I will, with your Lordship's permission, read two short extracts from a book which has several times been referred to, "The Annotated Book of Common Prayer," and then one passage from a Pastoral Letter of the Bishop of Exeter. Then, I am happy to say (and I really regret that I have taken up the time of the Court so long), I shall have done with this general question. I am about to refer to page 21 of the historical preface of the Annotated Book of Common Prayer; and I cite it not only as showing the view of learned living men who have carefully considered this question, but as referring to a passage from Bishop Cosin's works. Because we all feel—my friend admits it—that in a question of the construction of the Rubrics the opinion of Bishop Cosin, who took such an active part in them, is of course entitled to very great weight. "The reconstructors of our devotional offices acted wisely in reducing the number of Rubrics, and generally moderating the ceremonial system of the Church of England. They said that, 'the great excess and multitude of them hath so increased in these latter days, that the burthen of them was intolerable,' and they spoke with the experience of practical men, who were familiarly acquainted all their lives with that about which they wrote. But one inconvenience has arisen out of the manner in which they did their work, from which later generations have suffered more than they could foresee. They went upon the principle of expressing only the most essential things in the Rubric, and left many others to tradition." Now, incidentally, I call attention to that word "tradition," because really to interpret these Rubrics we must go back to the time when the Acts of Parliament passed; because one can well understand, if we put ourselves in the position of those who lived in that time, that Rubrics might practically be quite sufficient then, although they are very insufficient for full guidance of persons at a subsequent period; and one can well understand that the Rubrics may have been drawn up, as I insist they were, with reference to tradition, and only required such ritual acts as were considered absolutely necessary and were never to be dispensed with. As Bishop Cosin states it, "The book does not everywhere enjoin and prescribe every little order, what should be said or done, but takes it for granted that people are acquainted with such common things always used and done already." That is from Bishop Cosin's works, vol. v., p. 65. "Many of these usages are referred to in the subsequent pages of this volume, and need not be mentioned now. It is sufficient to say, that some of them dropped out of memory altogether during the persecution of the Church and the suppression of the Establishment under the rule of the Commonwealth, that others, from want of written authority, have become the subject of controversy; and that the ritual tradition to which the Reformers trusted so much when they put forth their condensed form of Rubric, has only been partially recovered even in our own time."

My Lord, only one remark upon that—it is human nature, unless the heart and the affections are deeply interested, not to do more than you are compelled to do. I merely mention that for the purpose of showing how natural it is, having regard to the constitution of the human mind, that these practices should gradually have been dropped, such of them as are not expressly required. It is the ordinary course of things which would necessarily occur; even the practices that are ordered are discontinued in many respects; how few clergymen, comparatively speaking, read the offertory prayer after the sermon where there is no Communion; and yet it is perfectly clear, even on the face of the Rubric, that they ought to do so. I merely mention that incidentally, because to a certain extent it meets an argument which may be urged against me from there being not so much evidence of the usage as perhaps would be expected. I respectfully submit that it is human nature that such usages and such ceremonial as are not required by the Rubric should gradually fall off, until at last we have got into the comparatively bare Rubrical system which it is the praiseworthy object of certain parties in the Church to remedy with regard to the present and the future time. Now, my Lord, the other passage which I propose to read is to the same effect, and it is shorter than the one I have already read. It is the conclusion of the very valuable Ritual Introduction. Of course I do not trouble you with the previous parts, as your Lordship has the book; but the conclusion which the writer draws is this: "These then are the principles of ceremonial worship which pervade the Book of Common Prayer, and for the practical expression of which provision is made in the Rubrics and in the ritual tradition to which the Rubrics directly or indirectly point."

Only one other passage upon this general part of the case; and I do not know that I should trouble your Lordship with that if I had not thought that it was scarcely fair of my friend (I am only saying behind his back what I would have said if he were here, (referring as he did to the address signed by the twenty-four archbishops and bishops, and which is published in the Appendix to the Ritual Commissioners' Report (of which your Lordship is a member), without referring to the extracts, which you also published, from a pastoral letter to his clergy by, I think I may say without any reflection upon any other bishop, most undoubtedly the greatest English prelate of the day—the Lord Bishop of Exeter.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is the date of that? (Mr. Prideaux.) 1851. It is in the 121st page of the Report of the Ritual Commissioners. "Extract from the Pastoral Letter to the Clergy of the Diocese of Exeter, on the present State of the Church. By Henry, Lord Bishop of Exeter. Published by John Murray, Albemarle Street, 1851." "Neither could I join in entering a clear and unhesitating protest against the principle, that as "the Church of England is the ancient Catholic Church settled in this land before the Reformation, and was then reformed only by the casting away of certain strictly defined corruptions, therefore, whatever form or usage existed in the Church before its reformation may now be freely introduced and observed, unless there can be alleged against it the distinct letter of some formal prohibition. To this principle (making reasonable allowance for the terms in which it is expressed, not by those who profess, but by those who condemn it,) I am disposed to ascribe much of weight and justice. Where any office in the prescribed ritual, though not in express words, yet in its plain spirit," (pointing out the difference between what I have ventured to call intern and extern ceremonial) "yet in its plain spirit, or according to the analogy of the service-book in general, rejects an ancient usage or practice, which it may be attempted to engraft upon it anew, there I should think the attempt unreasonable or culpable. But where no prohibition, expressed or implied, and no reason drawn from the particular office, or from the general tone and nature of our Liturgy, is opposed to the introduction of a Catholic usage practised before Edward VI.'s reign, I am not prepared to say that such a thing is always improper, much less merits the reprobation of the whole episcopal body."

Now, my Lord, I come to deal—and I am happy to say I shall not have to deal with the detailed subjects at the same length in which in this very important case I have felt it my duty to handle the broad question—I come to deal now specifically with the four individual charges against the reverend defendant. With your Lordship's permission, I will leave the question of elevation until last. I will deal with the other three charges in their order. They all involve the consideration of a question which is not involved in the question of elevation, namely, the use of some instrument, whether an ornament in the sense of the word used by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (and your Lordship will do me the favour to bear in mind that whenever I use the word "ornament" in this argument, I shall apply it exclusively in the meaning of the word as used in that judgment), or whether an implement or embellishment, which may be one of the questions which your Lordship will have to consider. And now as to lights. Let us deal first with their symbolical meaning—supposing them to be symbolical. My friend says that they symbolise Popish superstition. Of course, if they simply symbolise Popish superstition they are not to be allowed, but I certainly was very much astonished to hear my learned friend asserting that they symbolise Popish superstition, because Lynwode says that the burning of lights symbolises Christ.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Well, I do not know (and I believe I may say that I am a sincere member of the Church of England), but I think I have a somewhat different notion about what constitutes Popery from that of my friend Dr. Stephens. And at the same time I am at an utter loss to see how that is a Popish superstition. Well, then, what is it declared to signify by the Injunctions of King Edward? My friend says, "What does it signify?" I said, The Injunctions will tell you; and he was quite angry, and said, "I don't want to know anything about the Injunctions." The Injunctions tell you that it is for the signification that Christ "is the true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world."

Now, my Lord, I do not know—we may learn something probably about the Mystery of Babylon in this argument—but I confess I am afraid I am a Papist, if it be Popery to believe that Christ is the true light that cometh into the world. My Lord, I have got here the definition of the Greek Church, the definition of the Roman Church, and the definition of the English Church.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You have not given those yet.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I will do so now. Let us see what definition the Greek Church gives of the two lights. I am about to read from the work of a man whom it is impossible to name without the deepest feeling of reverence and admiration. I speak of that great and good and holy man, the late Dr. Neale. In his "Introduction to the Liturgies of St. Mark, St. James, St. Clement, St. Chrysostom, and the Church at Malabar," which I shall have to refer to somewhat fully—(it is an English translation published by Hayes in 1859)—he gives you a most interesting introduction from a celebrated work by a Greek ritualist, Symeon on the Liturgy. No doubt the lights are used at a different time, but still these passages emphatically show the symbolical signification of the two lights. At page 20 of the introduction is this:—"But when the celebrant has entered and has censed the holy table around, the advent of the Holy Ghost is signified by him. For the Spirit came to us from heaven, when Christ went up into heaven. Furthermore, the bishop, signing the Gospel crosswise by a certain double taper, dikhron, typifies the illumination brought to pass both in heaven and earth by the Incarnation of Jesus in His two natures. For by the Incarnation of the Word of God, He not only gave light to men, but also to the angels."

I do not know whether my friend's contention is that to believe that by the mysterious Incarnation of the Word of God he not only gave light to men but also to angels is a Popish superstition. I am sure if it is, the Roman Catholic Church must be extremely obliged to my friend for showing how completely side by side go the superstitions of the Church of Rome and the Catholic belief of the whole Church universal. But, my Lord, it is idle to dwell upon this—it only shows the spirit in which this prosecution is carried on. My friend might as well say that the celebration of the Holy Communion is a Popish superstition, because you have the same rite celebrated in the Church of Rome. I say it is idle, and I really wonder at my friend; he must really have thought when he made that remark that he was in Exeter Hall; he could not have believed that he was addressing a learned ecclesiastical lawyer skilled in the history of the Early Church, and in scripture, and in primitive antiquity, and in the fathers. It really is painful to find partisanship allowed to go so far as to lead my friend gravely to argue before your Lordship that that which according to the Anglican branch of the Catholic Church typifies that Christ is the true light that cometh into the world, that that which according to the Roman branch typifies substantially the same thing, and which according to the teaching of the Holy Orthodox Eastern Church goes further, and typifies the Incarnation of the Word of God by which He not only gives light to men but also to angels, is a Popish superstition. I think therefore it is abundantly clear that whether these lights are lawful or not they are not Popish superstitions. I do not know whether my friend was, but I think he was, in the Westerton case, in which it was argued that the cross—the great symbol of that instrument through which in one sense the redemption of man was wrought—was a Popish superstition. Dr. Lushington, who seems to have forgotten that the Eucharistic service is a service common to the Greek Church, and the Roman Church, and the Anglican Church, said that the Mass was gone; and Dr. Lushington and your Lordship's learned predecessor both pronounced the cross—one upon one ground, and one upon another—to be a monument of idolatry and superstition. I am thankful to say, my Lord, for the comfort of all true members of the Church of England, and of all true members of the Holy Catholic Church, that the decision of the Privy Council has dispensed with the necessity of those who remain in the communion of the Church of England holding that the cross is to be denounced as a monument of idolatry and superstition.

But, my Lord, it would be idle and improper for me to occupy your time any longer upon this part of the case. It is abundantly clear, whatever Exeter Hall may think, that to symbolise the fact that Christ is the true light of the world, and that in His mysterious Incarnation He enlivened both men and angels, is not a Popish superstition, and therefore I shall proceed at once, having arrived at the conclusion to which I am sure your Lordship must come, that treating candles as symbolical, if they are to be so treated, at any rate that which they symbolise is Catholic truth and not superstition (I am aware that the two terms very frequently mean the same thing in the minds of gentlemen on the other side), I shall respectfully submit upon two grounds that the use of these candles is perfectly lawful.

Now, my Lord, my friend (I suppose he had some reason for it), said "I do not put it as ornaments." I was very glad to hear him say so, because it looks very much as if he felt pretty sure that if I could prove they were ornaments, the decision would be against him. He says, "I put them as ceremonies." Now, I say that these candles, having regard to the judgment of the Judicial Committee, and the interpretation which they have given of the meaning of the word "ornaments," are necessarily either embellishments or ornaments; it is impossible to put a third construction upon them. If they are embellishments, that is to say, if they are not used in any part of the ceremony of the Lord's Supper, how can the use of them be a violation of that penal clause? Because, even if that penal clause be held to apply to ceremonial, it can at any rate only apply to such ceremonial as is part and parcel of the service in question. If, therefore, the use of lights is not part and parcel of the service in question, then they are mere embellishments, furniture, amounting, if you please, to symbolical embellishments. If they are embellishments, then I say, from the very definition of the word "ornaments" by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, they are not used in the service, and if not, this using of them is no violation of the Acts of Uniformity, even though it may be the introduction of an unlawful ornament; and the objection to them cannot be sustained under this prosecution.

Now, I respectfully submit that my friend was right in saying they were not ornaments. I shall deal with the question of course in its double aspect, and I shall insist that, whether these lights are to be regarded as embellishments or ornaments, they are perfectly lawful.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is your distinction between embellishment and ornament?

(Mr. Prideaux.) The distinction between embellishment and ornament is this, my Lord. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council say that whatever implement is used in the service is an ornament. If, therefore, the candles are used in the service, that is, as part of the ceremony which is being celebrated, then they are ornaments; but if the candles are not used in the service, your Lordship is aware that it was on that ground that the use of the cross was justified in that case by the Judicial Committee; they said this cross is not used in the service, it is a mere embellishment, and, therefore, the Ornaments Rubric does not touch it. This is a charge against Mr. Mackonochie for performing the divine office of the Holy Communion service otherwise than as sanctioned by the Prayer Book. Of course if these candles are not instruments used in the celebration of the service, then, whether they are legally put into the church or not, they have nothing to do with the question whether Mr. Mackonochie has violated the statute in the performance of the divine office.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You see, Mr. Prideaux, you must distinguish between the candlesticks, which are, I presume, admitted to be lawful ornaments or embellishments, whichever you like to call them, and lighted candles.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I will deal with that, my Lord, by-and-by.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Are you now speaking of the lighted or of the unlighted candles?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am not speaking of the unlighted candles; I am speaking of them lighted. I do not say which they are now, but I say there is no third alternative—they are either embellishments or ornaments. I am dealing with lighted candles, and I think a great deal of ingenuity has been exercised needlessly upon this, because I take it in nine cases out of ten where candles are spoken of it is quite clear from the context that lighted candles are meant. I say that what is not an ornament, that is to say, an implement used in the service, is an embellishment; and I say these candles are necessarily either ornaments or embellishments. I am now submitting to your Lordship that my friend, Mr. James, was correct in contending that they were embellishments and not ornaments, just as the Privy Council held that the cross was an embellishment.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say that they are in the same category as the cross?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, and I say that if they are in the same category as the cross, then, whatever they may symbolise, they are no implements used in the performance of the service; and if they are no implements used in the performance of the service, then, whether it be lawful to have these candles on the altar or not, this criminal prosecution cannot be sustained against Mr. Mackonochie. Now, grant that they are lighted; what does that prove? It is not alleged, but assume, for the purpose of argument, that being lighted it may be urged against Mr. Mackonochie they are symbolical. That does not make them not an embellishment. The cross is symbolical. The cross symbolises the virtues which we derive from the dying Saviour.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You do not mean to say that it is not charged that they are lighted?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, I do not mean to say that.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I misunderstood what you said. I thought you said that there was no charge of their being lighted.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am afraid I may not have expressed myself correctly. What I venture to contend for is this, that what my friend Mr. James argued before you is correct.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say they are embellishments and not ornaments; that they are in the same category as the cross; and if so, they are not implements used in the service.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say they are not implements used in the service; and if so, whether upon a civil proceeding they might be removed or not, Mr. Mackonochie cannot be prosecuted in this way concerning them. Now, I say the fact of their being lighted does not alter the fact of their being embellishments. And then I say, grant that the fact of their being lighted shows that they are symbolical, so is the cross, so are the varied altar cloths; and yet the cross has been held to be a lawful embellishment, and so have the varied altar cloths; because I apprehend that the decision upon the altar cloths turns upon their being embellishments and not ornaments.

(The Dean of the Arches.) In one sense the hanging of a church with black, which was admitted by the Privy Council to be lawful, is symbolical of mourning.

(Mr. Prideaux.) But none the less an embellishment. I am only submitting that the fact that the candles being lighted proves that they are symbolical does not go one step towards showing that they are ornaments.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I quite understand you upon that.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Because I say—and your Lordship has very kindly reminded me of the hanging of a church with black—an embellishment is not the less an embellishment because it is symbolical. The onus probandi is upon my friend, and I call upon him to show in any sense that these candles are used by Mr. Mackonochie as part of the service; that the candles are “implements used in the performance of divine service.” I think those are the words of the Privy Council if I recollect right. He cannot do it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say they are not implements used in the performance of divine worship.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Precisely, they are implements used during divine service as varied altar cloths are, but they are implements so used as symbolical embellishments, not as part and parcel of the ceremonial performance of the divine mysteries. That is my first position, and, my Lord, there is one argument which my friend cited triumphantly for another purpose, which strongly bears out that, and that is the fact that there is no direction to put lighted candles upon the altar in the Sarum Missal. I do not mean to say that the Missals were exhaustive of ceremonial, but the Sarum Missal does direct what things were to be done in the course of the divine office; the Sarum Missal does direct that the taper bearers shall come in in procession, and shall place their burning tapers at the foot of the altar—and why? Because the use of burning tapers in procession, and the placing of burning tapers during the celebration of the divine office at the foot of the altar, is a ceremonial act in the progress of the service. But here the candles are lighted before the service begins. They are allowed to burn without interfering with the service in any way during the whole performance of the service until the end, and they are not touched until the service is over. This, my Lord, is a penal Statute. It is not a civil appeal to the bishop to know whether these candles are lawfully lighted or not, as was done in the Westerton v. Liddell case; it is a criminal proceeding against Mr. Mackonochie, charging him with having used in the divine office of the celebration of the Lord's Supper illegal ornaments, or rather, as my friend says, illegal ceremony. What ceremony, I ask, has Mr. Mackonochie performed with reference to these candles during the celebration of the Lord's Supper, simply because before he comes into the church he finds burning lights there, and because he leaves them there when he goes away? My Lord, I confess that when my friend, Mr. James, first suggested this view, it struck me that it was one not at all tenable; but upon mature reflection and consideration it does appear to me to be the correct view to take of this matter. And I say, that fortunately for us the introduction of the taper bearers during the progress of divine service in the Sarum use, and the fact that the taper bearers are directed during the progress of the divine office to place the lights at the foot of the altar, coupled with the fact that the lights upon the altar (and there can be no doubt that they were there—that is clear) which were lighted, according to the Sarum use, as well as now, before the commencement of the service, are not even glanced at in the Sarum Missal, strongly and clearly mark out the distinction between the symbolical embellishment which may be used or may not be used at certain times in the Church, and a symbolical implement which is used as part and parcel of the service, and thereby becomes a ceremonial act in the service which makes the article an ornament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You see, you must bear in mind, Mr. Prideaux, that the fifth of these articles charges Mr. Mackonochie with having used lighted candles on the communion table during the ceremony of the Holy Communion, to which Mr. Mackonochie replies that he denies that the use of such lighted candles (not denying that he used them) is an unlawful addition to and variation from the form and order prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Precisely, my Lord; and if my view is right Mr. Mackonochie is right, because it is no addition at all to the form and order.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The reason I referred to this was that you said he was not charged with using them during the Communion Service.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not say he is not charged.

(The Dean of the Arches.) He is distinctly charged with using them during the celebration of the Holy Communion, and that is not for the purpose of giving light; and his answer is a confession that he uses them, but he denies that it is unlawful.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That is not the whole of his answer, my Lord, because he says that they are lighted before the commencement of the service.

(The Dean of the Arches.) He denies that "the use of such lighted candles is an unlawful addition to and variation from the form and order prescribed and appointed by the said Statutes and by the Book of Common Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, and is contrary to the said Statutes," and so on, "as in the said, sixth article alleged."

(Mr. Stephens.) He says they are not placed on the altar, but on a moveable ledge.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is that so, Mr. Stephens? Where is that?

(Mr. Prideaux.) But he also in his answer says, and that is important, that the lights were lighted before the commencement of the service, and I am relying upon the other part of the answer.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have got your plea; it is in the answer to the amended articles, I suppose the 5th and 6th articles.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Mr. Mackonochie's answer is a qualified one. The 5th article of the answer is, "And whereas it is pleaded in the 5th article that the said A. H. Mackonochie has in his said church . . . used lighted candles on the communion table during the celebration of the Holy Communion . . . not for the purpose of giving light . . . Now, the same is in part untruly pleaded, for . . . the said lighted candles were not placed on the said communion table, but on a narrow moveable ledge of wood resting on the said table."

(The Dean of the Arches.) I see you are quite right. He says they were not placed on the communion table, but on a narrow moveable ledge.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not rely upon that, my Lord, because I do not think there is any real distinction between that and putting them on the altar.

(The Dean of the Arches.) He goes on to say, "And that the said candles were so placed and kept lighted, not during the celebration of the Holy Communion only, as falsely suggested in the said 5th article, but also during the whole reading of the Communion Service." But do you hold, Mr. Prideaux, that to amount to a denial that they were used during the Communion Service?

(Mr. Prideaux.) He says it is partly untruly pleaded, because they are on a ledge.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes; which I agree with you does not amount to much; and then he says "that the said candles were kept lighted, not during the celebration of the Holy Communion only . . . but also during the whole reading of the Communion Service." Surely there is no denial in that, that they were used during the Communion Service.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I mean to say we must look at the common sense of the answer; he means that they were burning before, and they were left burning.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But when were they lighted?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Before the service commenced, and so it appears upon the answer, if I recollect right.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No; he says, "The said lighted candles were so placed and kept lighted, not during the celebration of the Holy Communion only, as falsely suggested in the 5th article, but also during the whole reading of the Communion Service." The charge is, that he used lighted candles on the communion table during the celebration of the Holy Communion.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My Lord, I apprehend it is perfectly clear by the answer that all he means is that he had them there lighted before the service commenced, and that he did not make any other use of them.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What use, do you suggest, could be made of them but lighting them?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say they were used, no doubt, as lighted candles, but not as a part of the service.

(The Dean of the Arches.) They were used during that service only?

(Dr. Tristram.) They were used also during the sermon and the singing.

(Mr. Prideaux.) The answer is that they were placed "upon a narrow moveable ledge of wood resting on the said table, and that the said candles were so placed and kept lighted, not during the celebration of the Holy Communion only, as falsely suggested in the said 5th article, but also during the whole reading of the Communion Service, including the Epistle and Gospel, and during the singing after the reading of the Nicene Creed, and during the delivery of the sermon."

(The Dean of the Arches.) But I think you have argued before me to-day that the whole Communion Service includes the sermon.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No doubt, my Lord. I cannot say that it does not. All that I mean is this, it shows that no separate or ceremonial use was made of the candles during the administration of the rite.

(The Dean of the Arches.) By that do you mean during the actual giving of the holy elements?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord. I mean during the whole time.

(The Dean of the Arches.) During the whole time they were lighted and they were there?

(Mr. Prideaux.) During the whole time they were lighted; but how can it be said that because they were there they were used as part and parcel of the service?

(The Dean of the Arches.) Whatever the inference may be, the answer must be taken to be this,—they were lighted during the whole of the Communion Service, and during that service only. That must be the answer, whatever the inference may be; they were lighted during the whole of the Communion Service, and the sermon, and the singing, and during that service only; that is the fact that we have to deal with.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Your Lordship asks me how they might have been used during the service. I will suggest how. Supposing after the time of consecration the candles had been removed from the usual place and had been placed immediately before the elements, that, I apprehend, would have been a separate ceremonial use.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Of course they might have been used, but all I mean to show is, do not you put it too far when you say there is no proof in this case that they were not used during the celebration of the Holy Communion?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not say that they were not used, but I say in the use during the celebration, the use is something quite extern and distinct from the ceremonial part of the celebration.

(The Dean of the Arches.) They were used, not only during the celebration of the Holy Communion, but during that celebration only.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I will admit that.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I must get the fact before me; I do not mean the legal inference, of which I say nothing; but the fact—that the candles were lighted upon the altar or communion table during the service of the Communion, and during no other time.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I would rather say they continued lighted, because they were lighted before the commencement of the service.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Not during the other service?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No; I do not mean for one moment to deny what your Lordship has stated, but what I do mean to say is that that fact does not make the lighted candles any part of the ceremonial of the celebration of the Lord's Supper. It may be that it is wrong of Mr. Mackonochie to have them there; it may be that they are unlawful embellishments which ought not to be sanctioned, but your Lordship must recollect that in order to sustain this prosecution it must be alleged and proved that the candles were brought in as if were into the ceremonial of the celebration, and I say that the mere fact of their being lighted does not amount to that.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say that their being lighted during the celebration of the Holy Communion, and during that celebration only, is not using them for that celebration.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say it is not using them in that celebration. Your Lordship says "during." But I say, bearing in mind that they are lighted before the ceremony begins, and that they are not only kept lighted during the ceremony but are lighted before it begins—

(The Dean of the Arches.) How can that affect it? They are lighted in no other part of the service.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Well, I think it might affect the thing if they were lighted afterwards. It might be said: here is an act affecting the celebration.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you think it would make any difference if they were lighted during the celebration or just after it had begun?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am told, my Lord, that at Milan, at High Mass, the acolytes suddenly lift up lighted torches in one part of the service.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No doubt there are various ways of using the lights; but what I want to know is this, and I put it to you merely for the purpose of extracting an answer from you: Can you reasonably contend that if you have admitted that the candles are lighted during the Communion Service only, that they are not used for the Communion Service?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I think I may contend that they are no part of the rite, ceremony, order, form, and manner of celebrating the Communion Service. If they were handled at all it would be a different thing.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What are they lighted for?

(Mr. Prideaux.) My answer to that is, what is the cross put up in the church for?

(The Dean of the Arches.) I mean are they not lighted for the Holy Communion?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Well, my Lord, the Holy Communion is the most solemn office of the Church; but I apprehend they might be lighted at other times.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Well, Mr. Prideaux, if you think you can maintain that argument that although they are lighted during the Communion Service, and during that service only, they are not used in the Communion Service, I will take that as your position; only let me know what your position is, so that I may understand it clearly. Do I understand your position to be that, though you admit they were lighted during the Communion Service and during the Communion Service only, they were not used in the Communion Service in the sense of a ceremonial act?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Quite so, that is my contention, and I do not think I am bound to admit that they are lighted for the Communion Service only. All that Mr. Mackonochie admits in his answer is that they are used during the Communion Service. He does not say they are used at no other time.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But you are charged with that.

(Mr. Prideaux.) However, I am not going at any length to labour this part of the case.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But it is a pity there should be any doubts as to the facts.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My Lord, I do not know that there are any doubts as to the facts. I am relying upon this: there the candles are, they are burning, and they are kept burning no doubt upon the altar during the whole of the celebration of the office.

(The Dean of the Arches.) They are kept burning upon the altar during the whole of the celebration of the office, not having been used in any other office of the Church, and not being used after that office is over.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not think that appears, my Lord. In fact it certainly does not. All that Mr.

Mackonochie says is this: "I admit that I have had candles on the altar when not required for giving light; but I say they have been there during the whole of the service."

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are quite aware that that part of the charge which he does not deny, by implication he admits.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Quite so. But there is no word in the charge alleging that he did not use them elsewhere or at other times, nor is there an admission in the answer, as far as I recollect, that he did not use them at other times. The charge says you had lighted candles during the celebration of the Holy Communion; Mr. Mackonochie says it is true.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But surely this answer excludes the possibility of their being lighted at any other time. Do look at your answer. You say, "The said candles were not placed on the said communion table, but on a narrow moveable ledge of wood resting on the said table, and that the said candles were so placed and kept lighted, not during the celebration of the Holy Communion only, as falsely suggested in the said 5th article, but also during the whole reading of the Communion Service, including the Epistle and Gospel, and during the singing after the reading of the Nicene Creed, and during the delivery of the sermon." You very properly admit that the sermon and all those things are part of the Communion Service, and Mr. Mackonochie says they were lighted during all that time. Surely, it cannot mean that they were lighted at any other time. Is not that the natural inference?

(Mr. Prideaux.) However, my Lord, I do not think that question affects my argument.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not say it does; but the Court is naturally anxious to know what facts it has before it—what facts it has to apply the law to.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Well, my Lord, if you think that is the true construction—

(The Dean of the Arches.) If you think it is not I wish you would tell me so.

(Mr. Prideaux.) It does not, as I submit, affect my argument. I say that the mere lighting of candles, and having them lighted during the celebration of the service (because it can make no difference as far as this question is concerned whether it be morning or evening, or marriage or baptism, whatever it is, provided that lights are not necessary for the purpose of giving light), I say that the mere fact of lights being used at any service of the Church does not mean that they are part of the service that is being performed.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is quite a clear argument.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That is my contention, and that is the view that Mr. James submitted to your Lordship: I say the case is just the same as if Mr. Mackonochie had the candles always lighted on the altar. Mr. Mackonochie's answer is, it is not unlawful to have them lighted on the altar, because they are kept lighted during the whole of the service.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What you have to make out is, that being lighted during the service they are not used for the purpose of the service; that is your position.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That is my position, which I am now maintaining. It does not follow at all that because they are lighted during the service they are used for the purpose of the service. It might as well be argued that if there be flowers on the altar during our festive seasons those flowers are used in the administration of the services which are being carried on; because it is not the practice in England to have churches always open, and we cannot suppose that the holly, for instance, is put up at Christmas except on the supposition that it should be there while Divine Service is going on. And I say that in principle there is no distinction between the holly upon the altar at Christmas during the several Christmas services, and this matter which is now under consideration. The one is as much used in the celebration of the offices as the other, and it cannot signify upon this broad principle whether it be used during the celebration of one office, or of two offices, or of 20 offices. I say that the mere fact that the things are there during the celebration of the office does not necessarily or reasonably lead to the inference that they are used in any sense as part and parcel of the office. I cannot upon principle see any distinction in that respect between an ornament being placed upon the altar during a single service, and being placed upon the altar during any number of services. The principle is the same if it be a mere embellishment or a mere symbolical embellishment; whether it is used for one service, or whether it is used during all the year, or whether it is used during a particular season, appears to me to be in principle the same. If it is not made use of in the celebration of the service it is a mere embellishment and not an ornament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then it turns very much upon what "made use of" means, does not it? Your argument would very much depend upon that?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Of course it is not pretended that anything more is done than the fact of their being there lighted; and I confess I do not see how a candle is "made use of" any more than a holly branch which may be placed on the altar.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Well, but if the holly branch were put there just before the service commenced and taken away just after, would there not be a distinction?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord, I say there is no distinction. If an ornament is there during all the services it is clearly no essential part of the particular service; and it can make no difference in principle that it happens to be there during the one service only; and, my Lord, you will recollect there is no charge that these candles are symbolical. I say there is no difference; it is immaterial to the question we are now considering, and that in order to make a light, a light "used in the service," it must be incorporated into the ceremonial of the service; and I say that lights which are there before the service begins and remain there until after the service is over are no more incorporated into the ceremonial of the service than is the holly branch which rests upon the altar at Christmas. I may remind your Lordship in point of fact, that at the Royal Chapel candles are always lighted during the Evening Service; are they used in the service? I will take the liberty of reading a passage from the Westerton case, which I think throws some light upon this. It is where the Privy Council are dealing with the question of crosses (Moore, page 171). But although "their Lordships are of opinion that the law did not require the removal from churches of crosses, merely as such, both books of Common Prayer had excluded them from use in the services. They were no longer to be employed, and nothing is more probable, therefore, than that if they could be turned to any profit they would be made the subject either of sale or robbery, and that in the popular disturbances which accompanied the great change in the religion of the nation, and in many cases anticipated and outran the acts of the Government, crosses would share the fate of images." Now, can it be said, simply because these candles are upon the altar that they are used in the service? I respectfully submit that it cannot, and that in principle, as I have already suggested, no distinction can be taken between the candles and the holly branch.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say the time of lighting the candles has nothing to do with it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say the time of lighting the candles has nothing to do with it. There might be a slightly different question probably, if the candles were lighted during the ceremonial; that might possibly make some difference. But as they are not lighted during the ceremonial, they are simply symbolical embellishments.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Are they not lighted for the ceremonial?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say they are no part of the ceremonial, and, therefore, I cannot of course admit that they are lighted for the ceremonial.

They are no part of the ~~rite~~ ceremony, order, form, and manner of celebrating the Lord's Supper. If they were used during the service, if they were moved about, placed before the sacrament, or carried about in any way so as to symbolise any of the divine actions as they were going on, if they were brought in there to symbolise any of the divine actions of the service, as in the Greek Church, in the very case I instanced to your Lordship, and were not used generally as symbols that Christ is the true light of the world, then perhaps it might be said they were used in the service. In the Greek Church the δυκεριον, or two-forked candle, by which the priest performs that ceremony to which I have referred, is used in the service, because it is used for the purpose not of symbolising a great catholic truth, which is equally a truth, and the same whether that particular service is going on or not, but it is used for the purpose of symbolising a truth in connexion with the mystery which is then going on; I submit the distinction is a very manifest one. Now, there is one remarkable fact which I will just mention to you. Your Lordship is aware that in the book for which the public are indebted to yourself, I think, is a collection of church ornaments taken from Lyndwode. Among those ornaments you do not find the lights upon the altar. How is that? Because although there can be no doubt lights were burned upon the altar during the celebration of the divine mystery in Lyndwode's time, inasmuch as no use is made of them for any symbolical purpose during the action of the divine mystery, they are mere embellishments and not ornaments.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say in the catalogue of ornaments, mentioned in Burns' book from Lyndwode, candles are not mentioned?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Candles upon the altar are not mentioned; in fact I am told that candles are not mentioned at all.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That passage which you cited to me just now from Lyndwode would imply that they are symbolically used.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord, that they were symbolically used. I do not deny that, but I say they are not ceremonially used; they are not used as part of the ceremonial of the Mass. The cross is symbolically used, but it is not part of the ceremony; that is my contention. It is perfectly lawful to have a symbolical ornament; the very holly with which we decorate our churches at Christmas time is a symbolical ornament; the various flowers which we use at the different seasons of the year are symbolical ornaments; the different coloured altar cloths which we put on our altars at different periods of the year are symbolical; but that does not make them ornaments used in the celebration of the service. Let us take this case, for instance—we know it is frequently done—when some fair lady is about to be married. The church is adorned from one end to the other, and only for the one particular service; flowers of the choicest and most beautiful description are placed upon the altar, and they are placed there only for the one single ceremony of marriage. Does the officiating clergyman who marries the happy couple use those flowers in the service or ceremony of matrimony? I confess I do not see what distinction is to be taken between the two cases; and I put that argument before your Lordship with some confidence. Here we have a case in which the church is embellished for a special occasion, for a special single service, and so far as the question now under consideration is concerned, I have already submitted to your Lordship that it is perfectly immaterial what the service is. The doubt which seemed to exist in your Lordship's mind was whether it could be said that the particular implement was not an ornament if it was used for a single service.

I have ventured respectfully to call your Lordship's attention to the use of flowers, even of the choicest description, during the ceremony of marriage. There is another case which I will instance. Take the dedication festival of a church, or take any special joyous occasion in which there is some special ground for offering up special thanks to Almighty God for benefits and blessings received. Is it not a very common thing, under those circumstances, to adorn the church—ay, the altar—with flowers and other things, and only for the single service? Flowers and embellishments are placed upon the altar before the service begins. They are allowed to remain there during the whole of the service, and then, having done their duty, they are removed. Has the officiating clergyman used them during the celebration of the service which it has been his duty to perform?

(The Dean of the Arches.) You see, of course, with regard to candlesticks, they are always there. They are not put there for the occasion; but they are lighted only at that service.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That, I may say, certainly does not appear within the four corners of the legal proceedings. I do not know that it is very material, nor do I think it makes the slightest difference. I submit that, even if you were to take judicial notice of that, it would not make the slightest difference. It does not at all affect the question we are now considering, namely, what is the nature of the use which is made of these candles? And I say that they are candles burnt to symbolise the general Christian joy and thankfulness to Almighty God; just as flowers are put upon an altar at a marriage to symbolise the joy and thankfulness that exist upon that happy occasion. I do not know that I can argue this view further.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think I quite understand your argument.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do respectfully submit to your Lordship that it is an argument well worthy of consideration.

Now, I believe that in the Greek Church, during the process of the Divine Liturgy, the priest takes up the cross and kisses it. Then, it becomes an ornament used in the performance of divine service. But, my Lord, it has been held that a cross even upon the altar, if it be not affixed to the altar so as to make a communion table not a communion table, is lawful. If, for instance, the cross was a very valuable thing, and the clergyman was unwilling to have it left in the church, but still admired it as a handsome symbolical embellishment, could your Lordship hold that if the cross was always left upon the altar it would be an embellishment only and not an ornament, but if the clergyman every time he went to the church to perform the divine office took it with him and placed it on the communion table that would make it an ornament? The question as to the nature and the manner of the use must depend essentially upon what is done with the instrument, and not upon whether for a longer or a shorter time it remains there. My Lord, I do venture strongly to press this consideration upon you; and I am the more emboldened to do so because I took the liberty to state when I commenced this part of my argument; and I certainly felt as strongly against the possibility of maintaining the view when my friend first brought it under my notice, as at any rate I am afraid your Lordship did when I first broached it here.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The question then will be, which of the two opinions of Mr. Prideaux I must set most store by,—the first or the last?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord. I do not desire that your Lordship should set any store upon either of my opinions. I merely venture to mention that—perhaps I ought not to have done so—for the purpose of bearing my humble testimony to the fact that a view which at any rate to my mind at first sight did not appear to be tenable, upon careful consideration of the subject, does appear to me, to say the least, to be worthy of great consideration. Now, assuming for the sake of argument that I am right in the view that these candles are not ornaments,—that they are but embellishments,—then, I take it, that the case of the reverend defendant, so far as regards the candles, is clearly established, and upon two grounds: first, because if they are not ornaments used in the celebration of the divine office, there clearly has been no violation of the Act of Parliament; and secondly, because if they are merely illegal embellishments, the matter is to be determined civilly and not criminally. If they be embellishments (and that would seem to be the case here) which might be lawful or might not be lawful, then I say they are matters for the discretion of the bishop.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Are you clear upon that point, that if they were merely illegal embellishments they could not be removed by proceedings under articles?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not think they could. At any rate the charge here is not a charge to remove them. It is a criminal proceeding against Mr. Mackonochie for his personal punishment.

(The Dean of the Arches.) An admonition it may be to remove them.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My Lord, they seek more than that. They do not pray that.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I merely put it to you whether the form of procedure adopted in this case would not enable the Court, if it thought right, to admonish Mr. Mackonochie to remove these things complained of.

(Mr. Prideaux.) If your Lordship would allow me, I would rather leave that to Dr. Tristram, because he is more conversant with the machinery of this Court.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is a question of ecclesiastical law certainly.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My friend is more conversant with these matters; and although I have paid some attention to the broad questions of ecclesiastical law, I do not pretend to be conversant with the machinery and practice of these particular courts. Now I have to submit, that if these candles are embellishments, it is impossible to distinguish them in principle from the case of the crosses; because the Court will do me the favour to remember that the decision with regard to the crosses went to this: they are mere embellishments; they are not used in the service; they have always been used in the Church of England, and in the other branches of the Catholic Church, as embellishments; and, therefore, there is no reason why, at any rate, in the discretion of the Ordinary, they should not be allowed. Now, assuming for the sake of the argument for the moment, if your Lordship will kindly assume it for the moment, that I have established the proposition for which I have now been contending; namely, that these candles are not ornaments but embellishments, I respectfully ask wherein does the case differ from that of the crosses. Candles have always been used in the Church, candles are symbolical, and so are crosses. Wherein do the cases differ? I apprehend even if this were a question whether the candles should be allowed—and we must bear in mind that it is not but that it is a proceeding against a clerk for a violation of the Act of Uniformity—but even if it were a question whether the candles were to be allowed, every single element which enters into the consideration of the question of the crosses enters equally into the consideration of the question of lights as mere embellishments. I am not going to labour that, but I am going to call attention to a document which my friend did not refer to, and which I think as he referred to what was done in the Upper House of Convocation he ought to have referred to. But as he has not I will; and it is the "Report of the Committee of the Lower House of Convocation on Ritual." Your Lordship will find it in the Ritual Commission Report, page 160, headed "Altar Lights." "The Committee observe concerning lights, First, "that from very early times they have been recognized by Christians as significant of many holy "things;"—(I may perhaps be allowed to say, incidentally, that there is no suggestion on the part of this Committee of the Lower House of Convocation that these altar-lights symbolise "popish superstition")

—“ as, for example, of religious joy; and pre-eminently as symbolical of the Divine Nature and of Christ our Lord, the Light of the World. Secondly, that time out of mind in the East, and subsequently to the time of St. Jerome in the West also, lights have been symbolically used both by day and night on various occasions of divine service, as at baptisms,” (they do not say in the service,) “ burials, the reading of the Gospel, and the celebration of the Holy Communion. With regard to the precedents of the Church of England since the Reformation, the Committee remark that by the Injunctions of King Edward VI. in 1547, two lights were enjoined to be left upon the high altar ‘for the signification that Christ is the very true light of the world;’ when other lights, burnt before images and pictures, were ordered to be removed. The subsequent history of altar lights is involved in much obscurity; but candles and candlesticks have remained to the present day in cathedrals, collegiate churches, royal chapels, and in many parish churches. In some instances the candles appear to have been lighted during the celebration of the Holy Communion, but the instances which can be quoted are few and the evidence not beyond question.” Then they go on (and I do not think I need trouble you with more) and they observe that it “ is not without precedent in the Church of England since the Reformation; although it is a use which has not been generally adopted at any period since the Reformation.” I simply refer to that in order to show a recognition generally that lights have been used in the Church from time to time, bringing the case, as I submit, exactly within the case of the crosses; and I must say that I think the case, if possible, may be carried even further than the case of the crosses, because I cannot in the exercise of my common sense (although I know the answer which is given, that it was at night) understand why, when we bear in mind that Holy Scripture is given by the inspiration of God for instruction, and so forth, I cannot for the life of me understand why in the account given in the Acts of the Apostles, where we read of Eutychus falling out of the window, it is mentioned, “ and there were many lights burning in the chamber.” No doubt Protestants say, “ Why, of course it was night.” But what have we to do with that? I say it is a short glimpse of the then ceremonial of the Holy Communion; and if Scripture be given for instruction and improvement it might well be that that glimpse of the Holy Communion referred to the burning of lights as a testimony in proof of the early period at which lights were used in that sacred service. I cannot understand why a matter which is utterly irrelevant, which has no bearing whatever upon the matter which is being narrated, which would be self-evident if it merely had reference to giving light—I cannot conceive why in the Holy Scripture which is given for our improvement and instruction a special reference should be made in that allusion to that early celebration of the Holy Communion to the burning of lights except as a testimony to the fact that the burning of those lights was a primitive and apostolic practice. If not, I say it is calculated to mislead, just as the conduct of our blessed Saviour himself in allowing the first Protestants to go from him “ and follow him no longer,” when they asked “ How can this man give us his flesh to eat?” Now, my Lord, I do submit very seriously that it is not fair to twist and pervert the language of Scripture to irrelevant meaningless purposes when the natural inference to be drawn is that every portion of it is full of instruction and doctrine. Let me put this hypothesis: suppose it were the practice even of the apostles themselves to celebrate the blessed Eucharist with lights, and suppose the Holy Spirit of God had foreseen that hereafter the Puritan spirit would insist that the burning of lights was a Popish superstition; then I can understand why the Apostle, writing as he was instructed by the Holy Ghost, should throw in, as it were incidentally, this remarkable fact that there were “ many lights” burning in that upper chamber. But if the contention of my friend is right, and it was the mere accident of its being night at the time, then I am at a loss to conceive why the statement should have been made; and I respectfully submit that if that is the true construction to be put upon that statement, it is a passage calculated to mislead and deceive Christians into error and Popish superstition.

My Lord, I do not mean to press that argument with any undue weight, but I do pray it in aid as some additional proof at least of the lawfulness of the burning of lights on such an occasion; and I should expect at least, inasmuch as there is no relevant reason why the truism that they had lights there when they were assembled at night, should be mentioned for the purpose of showing simply that they wanted material light. I do respectfully submit (and it is with great reverence that I would venture even to make a suggestion of the kind) that if these lights were not intended to indicate and point out the burning of lights during this great celebration, even in those early times, you would have expected that for the improvement and the instruction and the safe guidance of the Church of Christ there would have been some additional intimation that they were there that St. Paul might see to read his sermon or something of that sort, although I have no doubt that St. Paul did not read his sermon at all, but spoke fluently and eloquently as he was instructed by the Holy Spirit.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Would you say that those lights (if your construction be right) were not used in the service?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Certainly; they were not used in the service. I say that they were used as Christian symbols of joy. I do not say that they were not used as Christian symbols. Your Lordship will bear in mind that. I say the argument applies equally to any other event. However, it is for your Lordship to determine. I shall of course argue presently, that we have a right to use them lawfully in the service; but I only refer to this circumstance, because I say that if a man would only lay aside his Protestant prejudices, he would necessarily come to the conclusion that the fair presumption is, that these remarkable words were introduced by the Holy Spirit for the very purpose of bearing testimony to some symbolical matter connected with the mysteries of the Christian religion.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are not going to leave the subject of lights?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Certainly not.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I want to hear what you have got to say about “lights before the sacrament” before you leave it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I shall not leave it until I have dealt with that point.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I thought you were going to leave the subject.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord. I have several remarks to make upon the other supposition. There is one other passage upon this first question which may probably have a bearing upon both branches of the subject,—a passage to which I would wish to call your Lordship’s attention, in the work of Archdeacon Freeman—“Rites and Ritual, a Plea for Apostolic Doctrine and Worship.” It is the edition published by Murray in 1866. I propose to read a passage from page 175, bearing strongly upon the primitive usage of lights: “The question of the legal position of the two lights upon the altar is a somewhat complicated one, but in its general aspect the usage derives a sanction and an interest from the fact that oil for the light is among the things recognized in the 3rd Apostolic canon; and further, that the two lights are used in the Syriac Liturgy of St. James, from which we may have derived them through Theodore of Tarsus; whereas all the west, except ourselves, have seven lights. In point of fact not much can be said for them, but the symbolism is beautiful and interesting. The Eastern Church in particular has always associated artificial light—viewed as dispelling natural darkness—with our Lord’s coming to the world, as its supernatural and heavenly light. It is well to remember too, that the only accompaniment of the “shew-bread, of which so much has been said above, “was, together with incense, artificial light, and even “in the blaze of heavenly ritual there were seven “lamps burning (Revelations, 4 & 5). These considerations, joined to the well-known injunction of “Edward VI., for the retention of two lights, certainly give the usage a good position, when we are “considering what is the mind, fairly and liberally “estimated, of the English Church.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) Let me look at that last authority, if you have done with it. (The book was handed to the Court.)

(Mr. Prideaux.) Now, I respectfully submit, as I did at the commencement of my observations upon this subject, that there is no alternative between treating these lights as symbolical embellishments, and treating them as lights used in the ceremonial of the service; and I now respectfully submit, that Mr. Mackonochie will not have violated the laws of the Church, even if your Lordship should be of opinion that he is to be held as having used these lights in the service of the celebration of the Holy Communion. That they were so used before the Reformation (as I ventured to submit to your Lordship either on the first or the second day that I had the honour of addressing you) is abundantly clear from the injunctions of Edward VI.; and so far as this question is concerned, it is immaterial whether the injunctions have strict legal binding effect or not. They bear direct testimony to the fact that lights at that time were used upon the altar; because the language of the injunction is, that they are “to be retained.” I admit that they are to be “two lights upon the high altar before the sacrament.”

Now, your Lordship asked whether those injunctions had binding legal effect. I think the answer that my learned friend, Mr. James, gave to that question is quite enough for us, at any rate in this Court. My learned friend directed your Lordship's attention to an elaborate judgment of Sir John Dodson upon that point, in which Sir John Dodson goes at great length into the arguments for and against the question of the validity of those injunctions. He decides that those injunctions were of binding legal effect, and he gives his judgment against the cross upon the very ground that the cross, if not an image, is at any rate, “a monument of idolatry and superstition,” under the words of that injunction. Then the matter goes up before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and their Lordships decided the case the other way upon very different grounds; but, throughout the whole of their judgment, if I recollect right, there is not a single doubt thrown out as to the legal binding effect of those injunctions. On the contrary, their judgment rather seems to assume that the injunctions are still in force; and I am thankful to say for the Church of England, and her faithful members who desire to cling to catholic truth and to catholic practices, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council relieved us from the painful impression that we are to regard the cross—the great symbol of our redemption—as “a monument of idolatry and superstition.” I assume, then, that these injunctions were originally legal. My friend has said something about some intermediate Act of Parliament, which he suggests has, by general terms, swept away these injunctions. I think that matter was sufficiently dealt with by your Lordship and my learned friend Mr. James, and therefore I shall not touch upon that particular point.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not think I have expressed any opinion; I certainly never intended to do so.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No.

(Mr. Stephens.) Your Lordship asked this question, whether I considered these injunctions of 1547 to be of statutable authority. I expressed a very strong opinion that they never were of statutable authority; but I also said, that they were merged in the Prayer Book of Edward VI., so far as regards the lights.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not remember to have expressed any opinion.

(Mr. Stephens.) I certainly did not hear your Lordship express any.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My friend, Mr. James, said, that even if the Act of Parliament had been repealed that would not affect the injunctions which had been issued previously under it; and I understood your Lordship to adopt that view.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That it would not retrospectively invalidate what was valid before.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Exactly; but I understood my learned friend Mr. Stephens' contention to be, that they were swallowed up in the Prayer Book.

(Mr. Stephens.) I think “merged or incorporated” was what I said.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My learned friend says, “merged or incorporated.” I do not object to that latter word.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Part of his argument is, that they were never legally binding. Secondly, that they were invalidated. And thirdly, he says, they cannot be legally binding, because they are inconsistent with the present service in that they provide, as he says, that the lights are to be burnt before the reserved sacrament.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I will deal with that directly. But my friend to-day has used language that I do not object to. He says they are “merged or incorporated” in the Prayer Book. I do not object to that expression.

(Mr. Stephens.) My Lord, I have been misunderstood. I meant to say, so far as regards the lighted candles before the sacrament, they were abolished by the first book of Edward VI.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Am I to understand (because that will relieve me a great deal) that my friend puts the argument entirely upon the question as to whether “before the sacrament” means “before the reserved sacrament”?

(The Dean of the Arches.) You had better not understand anything at all, Mr. Prideaux.

(Mr. Prideaux.) So I think, my Lord. Before I go to the Liturgies of Edward VI., let me say, that upon the true construction of the judgment of the judicial committee of the Privy Council upon the “Ornaments Rubric,” whatever ornament was lawfully used under the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. is lawful now.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you find that proposition in all its breadth in the judgment of the Privy Council?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Your Lordship read the passage, “They all evidently mean the same thing, that whatever”——

(The Dean of the Arches.) “That whatever is mentioned in the Prayer Book.”

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord, “Whatever was used under the Prayer Book.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are aware that the construction which some persons have put upon the Judicial Committee's judgment is not that they must have been de facto in existence, but that they must have been actually mentioned in the Prayer Book.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That is one view; and that will depend (if I am driven to that) upon whether the injunction is sufficiently recognized by the Prayer Book to bring me under that rule. At present, however, I am arguing that inasmuch as they were de facto in lawful existence, inasmuch as they could lawfully be used under the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., in this view, I may ask your Lordship to uphold the legality of these lights without bringing you into conflict with the judgment of the Judicial Committee.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That judgment, I need not say, is binding upon me.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Of course I would not for one moment ask your Lordship even to review that which is said by the Judicial Committee. But when the Judicial Committee use language different in the one place from the language they use in another, I may fairly ask your Lordship to look at the judgment of the Judicial Committee as a whole,—not in any sense to review or overrule their decision, but to inquire what they really meant. Now, my contention is this: There is one passage, as your Lordship knows, as clear as clear can be, in which the Judicial Committee say—

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is at page 159. "They all obviously mean the same thing; the same dresses and the same utensils or articles which were used under the First Prayer Book of Edward VI. may still be used. None of them, therefore, can have any reference to articles not used in the services, but set up in churches as ornaments, in the sense of decorations." And I think the other passage is at page 156.

(Mr. Prideaux.) The other passage no doubt uses the word "prescribed."

(The Dean of the Arches.) At page 156 there is this:—"Their Lordships, after much consideration, are satisfied that the construction of this Rubric, which they suggested at the hearing of the case, is its true meaning, and that the word 'ornaments' applies, and in this Rubric is confined to those articles, the use of which in the services and ministrations of the Church is prescribed by the Prayer Book of Edward VI."

(Mr. Prideaux.) Now, my Lord, those two passages in the judgment in terms—in mere letter—are not quite consistent, because the one would seem to admit as legal whatever ornaments were used under the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., and the other no doubt would seem to limit the legality of the ornaments to those that are prescribed by that book. The narrower view taken by the Judicial Committee was not necessary to sustain their judgment; and I respectfully submit that, without treating with any disrespect or in any way overruling the judgment, or even the language as a whole of the Judicial Committee, it is open to this Court to inquire whether they really meant to say that every lawful ornament must be prescribed by the book, or whether they merely meant to say that whatever was lawfully used under the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. may lawfully be used now, because their language in the first passage is as dogmatical, as clear, and as precise as their language in the other. And why should your Lordship be compelled to take the last?

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is the first.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Then that is better for me, because it is a universal principle of construction that if there be two passages in one document, and the one is inconsistent with the other, you are to give effect to the last, because the last passage is supposed to express the last and ultimate opinion of the writer. I am quite sure your Lordship is aware, from the experience you have had in considering wills and other legal documents, that as "a principle of law," as my learned friend says, in legal interpretation, where you have nothing else to guide you, that is the rule you are to go by. I do not mean to say it is a conclusive rule, and that you are not to look at the whole document for the purpose of seeing what is meant; but I do mean to say, that if you have no other satisfactory means of ascertaining what is meant, then the invariable rule of legal interpretation is, that you are to give effect to that which is last said; and, if you find that which is last said thoroughly and entirely consistent with the document as a whole, in this case with the judgment that is given, why should your Lordship depart from that legal principle of interpretation? You cannot give full effect, viewed by themselves, to either of those passages. In either event, you take a view contrary, in a certain sense, to the mere expressed letter of a portion of the judgment. But why should you be compelled to take that view, which is not, as I submit, consistent with the real status of the case, when it is equally open to you to take the other? Upon the construction, you must choose between the two, and I should say upon another ground, if you must choose between the two, let your own judgment turn the scale. I think I may fairly ask your Lordship to do that. Suppose there were two decisions separate and independent of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and supposing one view had been ruled in one case, and the other in the other, I will venture to say, you would adopt either one of two courses. You would either say "I must be bound by the last," (and that will be quite satisfactory to me) or you would say "Well, here are two decisions; I cannot tell which is the right one. I will collect as much information and guidance as I can from the two cases; but after all, as there is a conflict I must determine for myself." Therefore, my Lord, whether the legal principle ordinarily applied to the interpretation of legal documents, that the language last used is to prevail, guide your Lordship, or whether you feel that you cannot see any certain guide at all owing to the conflict of the statements, I say in the one case, your decision must be affirmatively in my favour upon the point—that is, if you feel yourself bound by the last statement; and in the other I submit, that without any disrespect whatever to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, it will be open for your Lordship to consider which is the more correct view, and when you have no certain decision to guide you upon which you can act, to determine for yourself.

Now, my Lord, which is the more correct view? What was intended? Can your Lordship entertain a doubt that the intention was, so far as ornaments were concerned, to revert to the state of law when the first Prayer Book of Edward the Sixth was in use by authority of Parliament? I submit to your Lordship that that is the true construction to be put upon the clause—the construction that legitimate legal reasoning warrants—and I cannot help thinking that some confusion arises in the consideration of this question from people losing sight a great deal of the Acts of Parliament, and regarding the books as the Acts themselves. My Lord, the provision is not "that such ornaments shall be used as are prescribed by the first book," but the provision is, "that such ornaments shall be retained and be in use as were in this Church of England by authority of Parliament in the second and third year of King Edward VI."

(The Dean of the Arches.) No, it is this: "And here it is to be noted that such ornaments of the Church, and of the ministers thereof at all times of their ministrations, shall be retained and be in use as were in this Church of England by authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI."

(Mr. Prideaux.) Quite so. What the Judicial Committee have clearly determined, and the only clear point in this matter which they have determined, because the rest is left doubtful from their double language, is, that what is referred to by authority of Parliament is the first Act of Uniformity; and although, if necessary, we shall reserve to ourselves the right elsewhere of arguing that "authority of Parliament" has a wider interpretation, I should not be acting consistently with my duty if I were for one moment to ask your Lordship to hold—guided as you must be in this respect by the decision of the Judicial Committee, for there they have spoken with no uncertain sound—that by the words, "by authority of Parliament" is meant by "the first Act of Uniformity." But I say the object was, to return with regard to ornaments, to the same status in the Church of England as was the status in reference to ornaments under the first Prayer Book. And I say that the words of that Rubric are satisfied by holding them to mean, "That such ornaments shall be retained and be in use as were in use in the Church of England when the singing and saying of divine service were regulated by authority of Parliament in the second year of King Edward the VI." I do respectfully submit to your Lordship, that it is the only reasonable and consistent construction that can be put upon the Rubric; because what other view (consistently I mean with the real circumstances of the case) can be taken.

The Rubric, and the provisions of the Act of Parliament in Queen Elizabeth's statute, and in Queen Elizabeth's Prayer Book, throw further light upon this point; because the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council say that all these provisions evidently mean the same thing, namely, that whatever was used under the first Prayer Book may be used now; therefore, my Lord, in endeavouring to arrive at a conclusion between the conflicting views to a certain extent, which are presented by these different statements in the judgment of the Judicial Committee, I pray you to revert to the time of the first year of Elizabeth. We know that Elizabeth (whose views were in favour of high ceremonial and high doctrine) was desirous of returning altogether to the status which existed under the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. She was overruled by those wise political councillors, to whom she was bound to bow, and she was bound, therefore, to submit and did submit so far as regarded the use as to the saying and the singing of the service. She submitted to the order and form of the second Prayer Book, subject to certain alterations which were made. But upon the other questions she carried her point, and whilst she was obliged to accept as a book "made fully perfect" the language and the order of the second Prayer Book, excepting in the few particulars (one a very important one) in which alterations were made, she took care to provide that, so far as regarded the ornaments of the Church, she should return to the state of circumstances which existed under the first book of her predecessor, King Edward VI. And there is a further part of this Rubric which bears out, I think, this view, and that is, the provision with regard to chancels. We must not lose sight of that, because to a certain extent it illustrates and explains the desire and determination that there was at that time, so far as regarded the furniture and the ornaments of the Church, to revert to the old state of things so far as was consistent.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You mean that Rubric, which states "the chancels shall remain as in times past," but that did not prevent the communion table being removed.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No doubt the communion table has been removed, but I am not aware that there is a decision that it might lawfully be so, and I should very much doubt it, although I say that with great respect. You know there was a great spirit of reformation going ahead of the Legislature, and doing a great many things which left the Legislature very far behind. There is one very remarkable proof of that, and I will call your Lordship's attention to it at once, because being a semi-binding document it is entitled to great weight, and it shows what a disposition there was in certain persons in England, edged on, no doubt, by the foreign Protestants, to go ahead of that which the Convocation and the Parliament were willing to adopt,—I allude to the Black Rubric.

Now, the view of the Black Rubric is this: we all know that a very learned book has been written, I have no doubt that your Lordship is familiar with it, intitled "The Declaration on Kneeling," by Mr. Perry, the object of which is to show that the Black Rubric, as it existed under the second Prayer Book of Edward VI., meant exactly the same thing as the declaration which is now affixed to the end of our Communion Service, namely, that it meant to negative the carnal view of the presence of the Redeemer in the sacrament, but not the real and ineffable presence of his sacramental body and blood. But, my Lord, I am not here at present at any rate to maintain that view, and I candidly confess that it may perhaps be very questionable whether that view can be maintained. What I wish to call attention to is this: almost contemporaneously with the publication of the second Prayer Book were published the Edwardian articles; and in the article corresponding to our 28th article was a provision relating to the corporal presence of Christ, quite analogous to the present declaration in support of kneeling. Contemporaneously with that, by Order of Council, but without sanction of Convocation, without sanction of Parliament, by the mere voluntary act of the Order of Council, is annexed to the Prayer Book after it had been published this declaration on kneeling, which introduces the words "real and essential" instead of "real and corporal," I think. I forget the exact words. Now, if they do mean anything different, what does it show? It shows that there was a party in England who were striving per fas et nefas, legally and illegally to go ahead of the country in carrying out the Reformation. That is important, because it will throw a great deal of light upon several remarks and several authorities which my learned friend cited; because when your Lordship bears in mind that the downward tendency of Protestantism was urging on a certain party in the country to run ahead of the Reformation as it was carried out by the consent of the country, and carry it out to a further extent, I say it furnishes an additional reason why your Lordship should look with the greatest care and jealousy upon any document being a document not of legally binding effect, which appears to have been issued at that time, and which has been cited by my friend.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That which you call the "Black Rubric" of Edward VI., is, "It is not intended that any adoration is done, or ought to be done, either under the sacramental bread or wine there bodily received, or unto any real or essential presence there being of Christ's natural flesh and blood." And, as you know, that in our present Prayer Book is altered into "corporal presence" leaving the real presence untouched. But I do not think it was substituted for anything in the first book. I do not think there was any such Rubric in the first Prayer Book.

(Mr. Prideaux.) There was no Rubric, but there was the article.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There was a direction that the sacrament of Christ's body should be received in the mouth. I thought you said that the words "real and essential presence" are a substitution of something in the first book.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say they are an attempt to go ahead of the Article. If I said the other I expressed myself incorrectly. What I meant to say is this, that in the first set of articles (King Edward's articles), which came out almost contemporaneously with King Edward's Prayer Book, there is a provision in the article upon the Lord's Supper, entirely analogous to our present Black Rubric.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, I have a note of that.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Then I say, that although that shows the mind of the Convocation certainly at that time, and although no mind contrary to that was ever expressed by the Legislature, some of those advanced go-ahead Protestants, who wanted to deprive the Church as far as they could of Catholic truth and Catholic discipline went ahead of that by illegally tacking on that declaration, and attempted to carry the reformed views with reference to the blessed Sacrament further than they are by the Article.

(The Dean of the Arches.) As at present advised, I hardly see how this Rubric bears on the question of lights?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Only in this way, my Lord. I cite it for the purpose of showing that there was a very advanced party in the country at that time, who were trying to carry out the Reformation to a further extent than Convocation, and the country were willing to carry it; and therefore, that your Lordship must regard with great caution any independent documents not being documents of a legal character, which are cited for the purpose of showing an advance in the Reformation. And further than that I say that the fair inference is that the country as a whole—the country who spoke by the Prayer Book, and the country as regards the clergy who spoke by their Convocation, hung back and were desirous, if possible, to retain such of the old doctrine and discipline as they found, saw, and believed to be consistent with the one Catholic faith. Therefore that raises an additional presumption that Parliament, acting under the control in this matter of Queen Elizabeth, would have intended to carry out to the fullest extent the provision that whatever was lawful under the first book of King Edward VI. should be lawful still. I do not know that it has any other direct bearing on the case; and I think that the real secret of my discussion upon this particular point is, that having referred to that for some special purpose, and seeing that it had a bearing on the further part of the case, probably I may have shot off at a tangent, to a certain extent, to another part of the case. Again, there is the case of the linen cloth, for example, to which I have already called your Lordship's attention. But the main point which I am now really discussing is this: I say that any ornaments which were used under the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. (and the first Prayer Book derived its authority from the Act of Parliament so far as it was binding on the country) may fairly be said within the meaning of that Rubric to have been ornaments used by authority of Parliament in the second year of King Edward VI., that is to say, to have been used in the performance of divine service when the performance of divine service was regulated according to the provisions of the first Act of Uniformity, and when it would be unlawful to perform divine service excepting according to the provisions of that book. My Lord, you have a double view presented to you by the Privy Council. The question is, which are you to adopt. I am respectfully insisting that the language of the Rubric is satisfied by adopting the wider interpretation. I am respectfully insisting that every probability of the case, as well as the fair and natural interpretation of language, is that the intention of Queen Elizabeth's Parliament in the first instance, and of the Parliament at the time when the present Prayer Book was drawn up in the second, was, so far as the use of ornaments is concerned, to resort to the status which existed under the first Prayer Book of King Edward VI., of course as far as that status is consistent with the expressed terms and language of the subsequent Prayer Books. I submit that is a view which is well worthy of consideration, and I venture to hope that it is a view which your Lordship will adopt; because if you do adopt it I think one thing is quite clear and certain—that there cannot be a doubt candles were used de facto and that they could lawfully be used (for that is the real meaning of the passage I apprehend) de jure under the first Prayer Book of Edward VI.

Now I beg to call your Lordship's attention to a letter written by Martin Bucer and Paul Fagius to the Ministers at Strasburg. You will find it in the 44th page of the English Church Union Case.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I suppose they refer to an authority for that letter.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord. I was going to give your Lordship the original reference. It is from the "Original Letters," published by the Parker Society, p. 535, and it is dated April 26, 1549, that is just before the first Prayer Book. It is important because I shall cite you another letter afterwards, and those two letters will show your Lordship, de facto, that those candles were used, and I will ask your Lordship to bear in mind that we have nothing to do with anything beyond the moment after this Act of Parliament was passed; if the moment this Act was passed these candles could lawfully be used, we have nothing in the world to do with anything else. "We yesterday waited upon the Archbishop of Canterbury, that most benevolent and kind father of the Churches, who receives and entertains us as brethren. The cause of religion as far as appertains to the establishment of doctrines and the definition of rites" (evidently showing there that the word "rites" is used in the sense in which I contend it ought to be used in the penal clause, namely, having reference to the form and order of the service) "is pretty near what could be wished." [Here they enlarge upon the need of a suitable ministry.] "As soon as the description of the ceremonies now in use shall have been translated into Latin we will send it to you. We hear that some concessions have been made both to a respect for antiquity and to the infirmity of the present age,

"such, for instance, as the vestments commonly used in the Sacrament of the Eucharist and the use of candles, so also in regard to the commemoration of the dead and the use of chrism, for we know to what extent or in what sort it prevails. They affirm that there is no superstition in these things." Now this is important, as showing that at the time when the Act of Parliament passed, those who framed the Act did not regard the burning of candles on the altar as symbolising Popish superstition. "They affirm there is no superstition in these things, and that they are only to be retained for a time, lest the people, not having yet learned Christ, should be deterred by too extensive innovations from embracing His religion, and that rather they may be won over."

Now I do not care for how short a time they might have been retained so far as this question is concerned. The question here is eo instanti. If these candles are ornaments, the question is eo instanti that Act of Parliament passed, was it lawful to use them and were they used de facto at first? I do not believe that is necessary, but I believe there is no doubt they were. These gentlemen, who were Puritan-minded men, as your Lordship knows, of some eminence, would have been very glad to get rid of these matters, and they make inquiry, and they say they are to be retained. They affirm that "there is no superstition in these things, and that they are only to be retained for a time, lest the people, not having yet learned Christ, should be deterred by too extensive innovations from embracing His religion, and that rather they may be won over," and then they hope they will be got rid of hereafter. We have nothing to do with the getting rid of hereafter; but I say the strong reason given here of the intention strengthens and supports my argument, when I say that the fair construction to be put upon this matter is that candles did continue lawfully in use under the first Prayer Book. Slight attempts were made to get rid of these candles afterwards, but that does not affect the question at all, and is quite against the inference, which he is not warranted in drawing as I submit, of Dr. Cardwell that those injunctions afterwards (the date is not at all ascertained, although he professes to give it) indicated the mind of the reformers upon the construction of the Prayer Book. I say as far as they are of any weight at all they carry out the suggestion which is found here. They affirm "that there is no superstition in these things, and that they are only to be retained for a time, lest the people not having yet learned Christ should be deterred by too extensive innovations from embracing His religion and that rather they may be won over."

Now, my Lord, that may interpret those one or two injunctions which my learned friend relies on, issued at some period after the Prayer Book was passed when some of the more go-a-head members of the Reformation party may possibly have fancied that the time had come when these things were no longer to be retained; but the question we have to consider is whether upon the true construction of the statute (looking at the contemporary history of the times if we cannot construe the statute otherwise, but if we can we have no right to look at the contemporary history of the times) it was not intended that at the time that the first Prayer Book came into use candles should be used upon the altar, because if it was then Dr. Lushington himself admits that we have nothing to do with any alteration in the law which was made afterwards. If it be conceded that these candles are ornaments then the simple question as apart from the question, whether you are to take the words "used under" or the word "prescribed," assuming that I am right in my first position, the simple question is were those candles used, and were they lawfully used under the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., on the very day the Prayer Book came into operation? that is enough for my purpose. If they were, it does not signify one straw, as far as this question is concerned, even if they had been rendered absolutely illegal on the second day.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say that is dated April 26th 1549.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I see one of these editions of the Prayer Book is dated May 1549.

(Mr. Prideaux.) It came out very shortly afterwards. It is a contemporaneous document, in fact.

(The Dean of the Arches.) According to the liturgical services I see it says, "A.D. 1549, Mense Maii." It is the edition of Whitchurch, and is taken from the British Museum. April and May are very close together.

(Mr. Prideaux.) It is substantially a contemporaneous document bearing testimony to that which I submit is the only inference which can fairly be drawn from the language of the Act of Parliament, namely, that it was intended that the use of candles should be continued as lawful ornaments in the service under the first Prayer Book of King Edward VI. Then if they were not legally forbidden, I may urge the argument upon your Lordship which I have already urged upon you, and which applies to every matter in this case, you may be quite sure they were used; because men do not give up their old practices and usages unless under some power of law or other power they are compelled to do so. Therefore, I say if de jure these candles were lawful under the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. (and I believe I have shown that they were lawful), then we may take it they were in use in the Church of England within the true meaning of that word; and there can be no doubt they were de facto used. But very fortunately for this question we have a letter written very shortly after the first Prayer Book which sets that matter at rest, and which clearly shows that they were used at that time.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Give me the date of that second letter?

(Mr. Prideaux.) It is from John Hooper to Henry Bullinger, 7th December 1549, Original Letters, Parker Society, page 71. In the Church Union case it is in page 46, and the object of it is to show a de facto use.

(The Dean of the Arches.) If there is any particular passage you had better read it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) "The altars are here in many churches changed into tables. The public celebration of the Lord's Supper is celebrated three times a-day. Where they used heretofore to celebrate in the morning the Mass of the Apostles, they have now the Communion of the Apostles; where they had the Mass of the Blessed Virgin, they have now the Communion which they call the Communion of the Virgin; where they had the principal or High Mass, they now have, as they call it, the High Communion. They still retain their vestments and the candles before the altars."

Adjourned to Wednesday at 11 o'clock.

NINTH DAY.

Wednesday, January 15th, 1868.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My Lord, I am desirous of carrying out a suggestion which I can quite feel on public grounds your Lordship has deemed it necessary to be followed, and I have therefore endeavoured to compress my argument as much as I can, feeling that in addressing the tribunal which I have the honour to address I need do little more than just refer to the authorities which I shall have to cite in support of my case. At the same time there are several that it will be my duty to refer to, and I will do so as briefly as I can, simply reading those parts which appear to me to be very material and essential.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Pray do not curtail the legitimate extent of your argument, Mr. Prideaux. I only wish to impress upon counsel that the time of the Court is the time of the public. I have nothing to complain of whatever; on the contrary.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am quite sure your Lordship did not say it in the spirit of complaint, and I am desirous of meeting your Lordship's views as far as I can consistently with what I owe to my client in this very serious and important case.

Before I go on with the thread of my argument I will take the liberty of reading a short passage from a book which my friend, Mr. Coleridge, has cited as of great authority, and which tends to illustrate strongly two of the positions which I have ventured to lay down in addressing your Lordship, namely, the real object of directing that the services should be performed according to the Use of the Church of England, and the true meaning of the words "by authority of Parliament" in the Ornaments Rubric. My Lord, I enjoy one great advantage which my friend, Mr. Stephens, does not enjoy, and that is, I know that what I am seeking to maintain is the truth, and therefore I refer to any authority however ancient with perfect confidence that if I do not find anything to assist me I shall not find anything prejudicial to my case; whereas I am quite sure that unless my friend is referring to known and acknowledged Puritan books he must look into every book and every authority that he searches for with fear and trembling lest something should turn up against him. Now, the book to which I refer is Maskell's Ancient Liturgies; and the passage is in the very first page of the preface. The book was published as long ago as the year 1846, and, therefore, it is quite clear that no suggestion in the nature of post litem motam can be urged against the fair weight to be given to this passage. It is this—I will begin at the beginning for it is very short:—

"In the division entitled 'Concerning the service of the Church,' which succeeds, if indeed it does not rather form a part of the preface to our present Book of Common Prayer, we find the following:—
"And whereas heretofore there hath been great diversity in saying and singing in churches within this realm; some following Salisbury Use, some Hereford Use, some the Use of Bangor, some the Use of York, and some of Lincoln, now from henceforth all the whole realm shall have but one Use."
In this passage the word 'heretofore' does not relate to the time immediately preceding the last review of the Common Prayer in 1662; for during more than 100 years, with the exception of the period of rebellion and heretical ascendancy, there had been only one use—of what? "of saying and singing in churches. We must go back to the beginning of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and beyond that again to the year 1549, when the first book of King Edward VI., having been approved by Convocation, was put forth and enjoined by authority of the Parliament and the Crown." Now, that shows, at any rate in the estimation of Mr. Maskell (writing ante litem motam), that the object of the present Prayer Book was to secure the singing and saying of the services of the Church according to the Use of the Church of England, and shows consequently (I apprehend that that construction is one warranted by the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—indeed it is the one which I was venturing to submit even upon strict legal grounds ought to be adopted by your Lordship) that by "authority of Parliament in the second year of King Edward VI.," is meant that the services are to be said and sung according to the use enjoined at a time when the first book having been appointed by Convocation was put forth and enjoined by authority of the Parliament and the Crown. That is to say, the true meaning of the words "by authority of Parliament" in that Prayer Book is that you are to perform the services (and of course, all those incidental matters which spring out of and are part and parcel of the services) according to the Use of the Church of England; and that you are entitled in carrying out that use to avail yourselves of all the ornaments which were lawfully in use in the Church of England when the divine service was regulated by authority of Parliament under that Act.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What do you say is your construction of "by authority of Parliament"?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say that the real object of the words "by authority of Parliament," is to point to the first book, that is my contention; and that "by authority of Parliament" does not mean according to the words of the first book that everything which is not actually and specifically prescribed is excluded; but I say the object is to say that the services are to be said and sung, and in all respects conducted in such a manner as they were authorized to be said and sung, when the saying and singing was regulated by authority of Parliament in the second year of King Edward VI.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is to say by the first Prayer Book.

(Mr. Prideaux.) By the first Prayer Book, and I say that construction of that passage bears out the construction which I say upon true legal principles your Lordship ought to put on the language of the Rubric as interpreted by the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; because of course as I have already said, I should be going beyond my duty and I should not be behaving with that due propriety which I hope will always guide me, if I were to ask the Court to put any construction on these words which is not fairly warranted by the Judgment of the Judicial Committee. Therefore, I do not ask your Lordship to inquire into the question whether or not the term "authority of Parliament" may include any Injunction or any other matter not covered by the usage of the first book.

Now there are two other collateral matters—three in fact—which I will just refer to. One of them is an authority with which I have been furnished today, which appears to me, if my friend's construction be correct, to be utterly inconsistent and inconceivable. I am reading at the present moment from "The History of the Prayer Book and other Books of Authority, by the Rev. Thomas Lathbury." This book I have no doubt is well known to your Lordship. The author is a gentleman who has written the history of Convocation and the history of the Prayer Book, and of whom I am sorry to say, by that fate which must come sooner or later to all of us, we have been deprived.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is he dead then?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord, he died about a half a year ago, at Clifton, where he resided. I am reading from page 150 of the book I referred to, under the title "Rubrics and Canons." I am sorry my friend Mr. Stephens is not here to hear what I am going to read because I should like to see his start of surprise. "Some of the customs of this period (the 20th of James) are now quite forgotten. An order was made by the Chancellor of Norwich that 'women coming to be churched should wear a white veil. An individual refused'—now when I cite authorities I show that they are acted upon judicially; my friend only refers to a few Visitation Articles which at most can only show that the bishop thought he was carrying out that discretion which he supposed or thought he had. "An individual refused and she was excommunicated. She prayed for a prohibition of the sentence, alleging that no canon enjoined the practice, and that custom was not sufficient. The Judges consulted the Archbishop, who convened his suffragans on the occasion. The prelates certified that it was an ancient practice, and the judges "confirmed the decision of the Ecclesiastical Court, 'refusing the prohibition.'"

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is the date of that?

(Mr. Prideaux.) 20th James I. I have the case here, my Lord; it is Eliza Shipton's case against Dr. Redman, the Chancellor of Norwich. It is a very remarkable case reported in Palmer's Reports, page 296. I do not trouble your Lordship with reading the report, but it bears out the same thing. It is alleged that it is not allowed by any canon or other law of the English Church. However I do not think I need trouble your Lordship with it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Allow me to look at that for a moment. (The book was handed to the Court.)

(Mr. Prideaux.) It is a case which to my mind is almost conclusive against my friend's argument. This lady does not pretend simply to put her defence on the ground that it is not mentioned in the Prayer Book—she does not go that length, but she says there is no such direction in any canon; and the judges, upon prohibition being moved, feeling that that is specially a matter for ecclesiastical cognizance, consult the bishops, and they call a meeting that the matter may be most seriously and solemnly considered. The bishops report that it is an ancient practice of the English Church, and the prohibition is refused.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is speaking of the old time I should think, because it says, "Sur que content excommunicato et un certificate fait de ceo al chancery: sur q̄ un bre de excommunicato capiendo fuit d'estre agard vers luy et p̄ ceo preventer et d'etre assayed et pryva un prohibition p̄ motion de Sergt. Otto in Banco Regina alledging q'est un novel ley nient allowed pour aucun custoume ou canon ou auter ley de Eglise de Angleterre; et dit q'est prerogative de cest Court mayntainer freedom de subjects del foreigne innovations et concluder chacun Court deins leur bounds: Mes il offre al Court q̄ so foet aucun custoume ou ley d'Eglise de Angleterre q̄ ces command q̄ la clyent ces voil obey: Mes quia fuit novel case q̄ ferra un president"—that is that it would make a precedent,—"les judges desire de aver la resolution de Archeveque de Canterbury et il convene tout les eveques que fueront al Londres. Et il m̄ et le autre eveques resolve et certify q̄ fuit le ancient custome de Eglise d'Angleterre,"—they prove it was ancient custom.

(Mr. Prideaux.) They prove it was an ancient custom and the Court refused the prohibition.

(The Dean of the Arches.) "Et cest resolution fuit declared pour Leu C. J. in Court. Et sur ces le prohibition denyed d'estre granted."

(Mr. Prideaux.) Therefore I say that is a case entirely in my favour. I will just show my friend the passage, because he has been very kind to me lately.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am very much obliged to you. All that you have shown to me has been of service hitherto.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I shall be very much obliged to you if you can show me how that can be of use to you.

(The Dean of the Arches.) "O qui complexus et gaudia quanta fuerunt!"

(Mr. Prideaux.) I will just direct your Lordship's attention to a letter published in the Domestic State Papers, which I have no doubt your Lordship is well acquainted with, and which is set out in the 45th page of the English Church Union case. It is a letter from the Duke of Somerset to Cardinal Pole, dated June 4, 1549, and replying to the Cardinal's letters 'of the Sixth of Mai.' In it the duke (after discussing some questions as to the relative claims and positions of England and the Roman See) informs the cardinal, who was then at Rome, of the completion of the new Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) This is the Duke of Somerset's letter.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord, to Cardinal Pole, speaking of the completion of the new Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What Prayer Book is he speaking of then?

(Mr. Prideaux.) The first Prayer Book of Edward VI.; it is dated, "June 4th, 1549," and he informs the Cardinal, who was then at Rome, of the completion of the new Prayer Book, "and tells him, 'We have delivered to those which brought your letters the Booke of Common Service, the same whereof heir before we have spoken, agreed on in the Parliament.' He further invites his judgment upon it, 'expressing his belief that the Cardinal 'shall be satisfied' if he should point out 'eny faulte' in it, 'and concludes by inviting him to return to England, 'adding, 'we are not in much feare but that it may 'well be if ye did se thinges here with your eyes, and 'conferred with learned men the reasons and causes 'of our doinges, the which now ye do not learn, 'but by report, which in tyme and distance encrease, and made them which favoereth not the 'thing ys exaggerated to the worse; ye wold peradventure condiscend yourself, and be in all poyntes 'satisfied, as at this present many both of busshops 'and other learned men be, which at the first did 'miche repyne. Fare you well.'" My Lord, I only cite that for this simple purpose, to show that if the construction which I venture to put upon the Prayer Books, and upon that Prayer Book among the rest, be correct, and if all the essential elements of the great Eucharistic sacrifice are retained in it, and all the essential ceremonial which has ever been so dear to the Catholic Church are lawful under it, it is quite consistent.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The letter is not printed yet?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I mean it is a manuscript letter in the Record Office?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Precisely; but there is no doubt about its being there.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I did not mean that; I only meant I do not remember it among the Parker Society's letters.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord. It is a very important letter, because if my friend's construction be true, it would be perfectly idle to write to a cardinal of the Roman branch of the Holy Catholic Church in this strain.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is a very remarkable letter certainly.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Telling him that if he would carefully consider the matter there would be every reason to believe that he would be fully satisfied. But if my contention be true that all the essentials of the great Eucharistic sacrifice were retained in that book, and that all that is at all essentially material in the celebration of that great Eucharistic rite according to the views of the Church of Rome may lawfully be practised in the Church of England, then, and in that view only, I can well understand that a man might gravely and seriously write to the Cardinal and tell him, "We have only altered the use; it is as much a use of the Catholic Church as the Hereford and the Sarum, and the Bangor, and the York Use; you have never objected to celebrate divine service according to those Uses; if you will only look fairly and honestly at the present Use you will find that in all essentials it adheres to the views, and the doctrines, and the practices, and the ceremonial of the Catholic Church. Every national Church—this cannot be denied—before the Act of Parliament and every province and every bishopric to a certain extent, had the right of regulating its own Use. We feel that for certain political purposes it is desirable that there should be a single Use; but it is a Use of the same great service; it is a Use sanctioning all the essential parts of the same great ceremony; and if you will only carefully and impartially, and without prejudiced eyes, look at it, you will be fully satisfied." And your Lordship is aware—I forget when, but I think it was in the time of Elizabeth, when a still less stringent book in its terms, as regards ritual, was in force,—his Holiness the Pope was very much disposed to sanction the book. I have no doubt the reference can be given to your Lordship for that; but I am sure your Lordship is aware that upon certain very moderate conditions which his Holiness required, he expressed a willingness to sanction the book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is no doubt that Roman Catholics for many years attended our churches in Elizabeth's reign?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes; and what was required was nothing but what was essential.

(The Dean of the Arches.) In fact that practice went on until the Bull of excommunication.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Precisely; and the real truth is, although I desire to speak with respect of that great Queen, Elizabeth, that I very much suspect that Mary, Queen of Scots, stood in the way of the arrangement at that time.

Now, one other reference which is very remarkable for the purpose of showing that as regards ceremonial the Prayer Book was not intended to be exhaustive of the method of carrying out the ceremonies of the Lord's Supper.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say "as regards ceremonial," you have drawn a distinction, have you not, between ceremony and ceremonial all through?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord, I have, and I do. I am speaking now with regard to the method of carrying on the ceremonies. This is a very remarkable passage in my humble judgment—it is a direction for saying the General Confession in the office for the celebration of the Holy Communion; and perhaps I may mention that probably there never was a more extraordinary mistake than that which my friend Mr. Coleridge made in his reference to the present Prayer Book. He says, it is true the word "priest" was introduced; but if you come to look at the Prayer Book you find that exactly in those places where you would expect to find the word "priest," if the intention was to recognize the sacrificial office, it is omitted. That was the argument of my friend Mr. Coleridge. Now the fact is just the reverse. If you will look at the Morning Prayer you find the first part is directed to be performed by the minister; but by whom is the absolution to be pronounced? "By the priest alone." If your Lordship looks at the directions for the absolution in the Communion Service, by whom is it to be pronounced? By the priest. If your Lordship looks at the ritual directions with reference to the consecration, by whom is the bread and the cup to be taken and to be consecrated? By the priest. And the word "minister" appears to be used in some cases specially for the purpose of drawing a distinction and showing where there may be a mere ministerial act, and where, according to the view of the compilers of the present Prayer Book who introduced the word "priest" into the Act against the protest of the Puritans, the priestly act is clearly to be recognised. Now what I wish to call your Lordship's attention to is this:—

(The Dean of the Arches.) How do you say the word "minister" is introduced? What is your argument upon that? I understand your argument with regard to the word "priest," but that with regard to the word "minister" I do not quite catch.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I think that is comparatively an indifferent part of my argument; but what I mean to say is this: in places where, for instance, a deacon might act, where the act is not one which according to the universal doctrine of the Catholic Church belongs to the priestly office, you frequently find the word "minister;" but I will undertake to say that throughout the Prayer Book, wherever the act is a priestly act, that which the priest alone can perform, there you find the word "priest."

Now, my Lord, the Rubric to which I desire to call your attention is this. My friend talked a great deal about acolytes, and servers, and ministers, and so forth, and "all that kind of foppery," I think he said.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have nothing to do with that in this case; there is no charge about acolytes.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am quite aware of that, and I merely mention it incidentally. My object is to show that these Rubrics show that the Prayer Book did not intend to be exhaustive in these matters; because in this single place, for there is nothing else that can be cited unless it be in general terms referring to the administration of the elements, there is an expression which shows that the Church of England adopts and recognizes the full service with assistant ministers, and, as I submit, with acolytes. That is why I cite it. "Then shall the General Confession be made in the name of all those who are minded to receive the Holy Communion," (by whom?) "by one of the ministers; both he and all the people kneeling humbly upon their knees." Now, where are there any other directions as to what is to be done by the "ministers" as distinguished from the officiating priest? It clearly means a difference, because in the first Prayer Book the Rubric is "by one of the ministers or by the priest himself."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the Rubric before the celebration of the Eucharist.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord; recognizing by a single glance the assistance of the ministers who take their part and did take their part, as your Lordship knows, under the old offices, assisting the priest, and called, in one of Queen Elizabeth's Injunctions, epistollers and gospellers.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You do not mean that under the term "ministers" acolytes are included?

(Mr. Prideaux.) They may be. I do not mean to say that under that term "ministers" acolytes are included; but I say that passage recognizes the existence of other persons than the officiating minister, taking essential parts in the celebration of the service.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Other clergymen?

(Mr. Prideaux.) It does not necessarily recognize more than that; but it certainly recognizes other clergymen, and as fulfilling some official duty in the performance of the service; we get it in the Roman mass "ministri respondeant," and so on.

I do not press this argument as one of very great weight, but I do say that it was the old practice at the high celebration.

(The Dean of the Arches.) In the passage that you have just read from the Roman Missal, what interpretation do you put upon "ministri respondeant;" surely persons in holy orders, are they not?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No doubt it means they are persons in holy orders.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It must be so, of course.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes. All that I mean to say is, that in the Roman Missal you have for the most part direct instructions when the "ministri" are to act and when the celebrating priest is to act.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You mean there is distinction drawn between the presbyter and the ministri?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord, and I say it is only a glimpse in the passage that I have cited; because this is the only passage except that relating to the administration of the holy elements in which it is glimpsed at.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But what inference do you draw?

(Mr. Prideaux.) The inference is that on the direction contained in the Prayer Book you cannot suppose that the "ministers" are to be introduced simply that one of them in the name of the people may repeat the Confession—you cannot suppose that; and therefore I say that it is an incidental recognition of certain forms and ceremonials in the performance of the divine office which are not expressly regulated by the Prayer Book, and must therefore be left to the tradition of the Church. I am reminded that the technical Roman names for what Elizabeth's Injunctions the epistollers (and those very Injunctions recognize these assistant ministers) is sacri ministri.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not at all see how that helps your argument.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not place any great weight upon it, but it helps my argument in this way, it shows that certain actions and things to be done by certain persons were contemplated in the Prayer Book without being directed; because the only direction given is one single direction that "one of the ministers" is to say the General Confession in the name of the people. I merely throw this in as an incidental argument.

And now, my Lord, I come to the question of lights, and I am happy to say that I shall not feel it necessary to occupy your Lordship upon that subject at any very great length. I have already stated that so far as the original validity—

(The Dean of the Arches.) You left off after having read that last letter to me, written in 1549, from Hooper I think it was.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Stating that they had retained their vestments and candles.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But it was after the first Prayer Book, I think, that Hooper wrote to Bullinger to say that they had retained the vestments and the candles.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord. Therefore, I contend that the lights were de jure and de facto in use. I have already submitted that it is enough if they were de jure in use—that is, if they might have been used. I say they were de jure and de facto in use at the time when the first Prayer Book came into use. If that be so, then as this question is to be decided by the exact state of the law at that time, and as we have nothing to do with what alterations may have been made in the law afterwards, I submit that if I am right in the view which I venture to say your Lordship will be justified in taking of the language of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council upon the meaning of that Ornaments Rubric, even supposing the lights to be used in the service within the meaning of that judgment, so as to be ornaments,—I say the case is proved against my friend without any further evidence.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Are you aware that in Lyndwode a distinction is taken between "ornamenta" and "utensilia."

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord, I am not. I merely throw that observation in incidentally, I do not specially rely upon it. But I do rely a great deal upon there being no direction to put lights on the altar in the Sarum Use; and I do throw that catalogue of lights and ornaments into the argument.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You will find it if it is necessary to look at it in the De officio Archidiaconi, Lib. 1. Tit. X. It is rather a remarkable passage, stating what it is the duty of an archdeacon to do. "Archidiaconi est prospicere ut Sacramenta rite conserventur et administrantur, atque potissimum Eucharistia et sanctum oleum sub clavibus custodiantur. Ornamenta quoque ecclesiarum ab eodem visitentur et possessiones recenseantur."

Then there is the gloss of the learned editor of Lyndwode, which we know contains the most valuable information on the meaning of the words "utensilia" and "ornamenta," and a distinction is drawn between the two.

(Mr. Prideaux.) If your Lordship would spare that and would allow my friend Dr. Littledale to look at it I should be obliged.

(The Dean of the Arches.) As you are on the subject it is well to have every part of it discussed. It says, "Ornamenta: Quæ sic dicta sunt, quia eorum cultu Ecclesiæ ornantur et decorantur. Sunt namque secundum Januen decus, gloria, laus, dignitas, sive preciosa vestimenta seu jocalia quorum cultu Ecclesiæ decorantur." Then as to "utensilia," he ad utendum apta sive necessaria, vocantur Cimelia." Then he says, "utensilia intelliguntur vasa Ecclesie sacrata vel non sacrata." He takes a narrow view of the words. Assuming that what is found in Lyndalton would throw light on the language of the Rubric, it would appear to be a distinction taken according to this ancient order, which I think is the order of Archbishop Chicheley, between "ornamenta" and "utensilia." I do not know whether anything will turn upon that.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am very much obliged to your Lordship for calling my attention to it. Perhaps you will lend it to my friend, Dr. Littledale, while I go on with the argument.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I was not aware till lately that there was that distinction taken between "utensilia" and "ornamenta."

(Mr. Prideaux.) As I have stated upon this point, I quite follow the view of my learned friend, Mr. James; and I say I may rest upon the decision of the Dean of the Arches in the Westerton case as of sufficient authority in this Court to establish the legality of these Injunctions as having the authority of an Act of Parliament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then you contend that they were valid injunctions clothed with the authority of an Act of Parliament, and that the subsequent repeal of them cannot affect any acts which were done while they were in legal existence. That is your position?

(Mr. Prideaux.) That is my position; and moreover I say they were not repealed.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say that also?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then you infer their validity—it is important to understand your theory upon this—you deduce their validity from the Proclamation Act?

(Mr. Prideaux.) From the Proclamation Act.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Not from any power inherent in the Crown after the authority of the Pope was taken away in this country by Act of Parliament? You do not refer their validity to any authority inherent in the Crown as governor of the ecclesiastical status.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, I do not admit that that would not be enough to give the authority, but I specially refer it to the Proclamation Act.

(The Dean of the Arches.) As Sir John Dodson does.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes; of course I am content, at any rate in this Court, to rest upon the view taken by Sir John Dodson, which certainly was rather upheld than questioned by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. But I do not refer only to that; I say that there are certain incidental matters which clearly show that they were of binding authority.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is a very important part of your case.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord, I feel it to be so. First of all I will just refer, without stopping to point out particular articles to those Injunctions and Visitation Articles subsequently issued which treat them as valid.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You refer to subsequent Injunctions; those Injunctions, if I remember rightly, are referred to in the first Prayer Book?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord, I am coming to that. I say that even if they are repealed they are set up in the first Prayer Book; they are referred to in the plural number. It is an important passage, and I will just read it to your Lordship once more. It is the first Rubric after "the office of the Communion commonly called the Mass," in the first Prayer Book relating to the saying or singing of the Liturgy, which your Lordship will remember is directed to be said or sung by one of those very Injunctions, I forget which at this moment: "upon Wednesdays and Fridays the English Litany shall be said or sung in all places after such form as is appointed."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Where is this?

(Mr. Prideaux.) It is page 97 of the Liturgies of Edward VI. It is the very first Rubric after the Communion Office in the first Prayer Book. "The English Litany shall be said or sung in all places after such form as is appointed by the King's Majesty's Injunctions." Now I say that that is a statutable recognition of these Injunctions; and what is much more it is an incorporation of these Injunctions into the present Prayer Book. So that even if your Lordship is bound to adopt the narrower construction put by the Judicial Committee upon the Ornaments Rubric, I say that by virtue of these words "after such form as is appointed by the King's Majesty's Injunctions,"—the retaining of these two lights is prescribed by the Prayer Book established by authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of Edward VI.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There were no other Injunctions which could be referred to at that time—those were the only Injunctions extant at that time?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Those were the only Injunctions extant at that time, and certainly the only injunctions relating—

(Mr. James.) Your Lordship sees it is called the King's Majesty's Injunctions.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The King's Majesty's Injunctions—that is what I mean—referring evidently to the King upon the throne at that time.

(Mr. James.) Precisely.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That passage is very material; first because it is a recognition of the legality of the Injunctions; and secondly because it is an incorporation of the Injunctions into the first Prayer Book. Therefore, whatever is prescribed by the Injunctions is prescribed by the first Prayer Book into which they are incorporated, and therefore even according to the stricter interpretation of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, candles on the high altar are ornaments not merely in use under, but are ornaments prescribed by "the authority of Parliament."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is to say lighted candles.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Lighted candles of course, my Lord. I think a great deal has been said upon that which really has no bearing upon this case. I take it whenever candles are mentioned lighted candles are meant.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you remember that passage about "lumina."

(Mr. Prideaux.) Oh yes, my Lord; but I never will believe that it was the intention of the Reformers to introduce an ornament into the Church which was to symbolize a Church deprived of sacramental grace.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not know who it was that was sent to the Tower.

(Mr. Stephens.) Andrew Marvel. There is a reference to it in Robertson.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is referred to in Fuller's Church History.

(Mr. Prideaux.) At any rate the Injunction directs that they shall be lighted.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, but that is another thing. I thought you were referring to the practice. You say that where candles are mentioned lighted candles are meant.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Lighted candles are meant; but I say that it is not material for me to consider that point there, because I say it is quite clear that what the Injunction meant was lighted candles.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Let me ask you, did the Injunction mean that they should be lighted during the whole service, or lighted at a particular time—supposing you are correct in your argument?

(Mr. Prideaux.) My Lord, I apprehend that the Injunction means exactly the same thing as the canon of Archbishop Reynolds.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is in Lyndwode, the passage I referred to the other day.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Precisely, and the canon says "Tempore quo solennia missarum peraguntur." It says in Lyndwode "Dux candle vel ad minus una."
(The Dean of the Arches.) Representing Splendorem Christi.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes. I say the Injunction is carrying out the same order which Archbishop Reynolds made.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Why would any Injunction according to your argument be necessary if the old law remained in force where it was not expressly forbidden.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not think it was necessary; and if the Injunctions are not in force you may have candles all over the church. One of my arguments is the fact that candles had been discontinued everywhere else, and that you find them on the altar only; and that those candlesticks are of a peculiar description, showing that they have come down from an earlier period, is a standing and unanswerable proof of the effect of the Injunctions. I put my friend in this dilemma; if these Injunctions are not in force, I say that, according to the constant practice of the Catholic Church, you may have a hundred thousand candles burning during the celebration of the service; you may have "many lights burning in your upper chambers," and that they must have been lit then is quite clear.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then, in fact, the Injunction was to operate as a prohibition, except as to what it enjoins—that is your theory?

(Mr. Prideaux.) The Injunction was to act as a prohibition, except as to what it enjoined. That is one of the difficulties my friend has to contend with. If the Injunctions were not in force we have a right to any amount of candles, and we have a right to place them anywhere we like; and the fact that a large number of these candlesticks with candles in them remain to the present day in so many churches of a peculiar construction, and all placed upon the altar, and nowhere else, is a proof, if the matter be looked at according to the fair principles of reasoning and induction, which clearly establishes the validity of these Injunctions, and explains how it is that the lights are to be found there and nowhere else.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then part of your argument presently will be that they were never repealed?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Exactly, my Lord, never; I say that they were never repealed.

Now, my Lord, here is a photograph of an old picture of the coronation of William and Mary, which is in the British Museum, and here you have lighted candles. My friend has referred to pictures, and I do not see why I should not take advantage of them too.

(Mr. Stephens.) I have no objection to your Lordship seeing these pictures, but there is no evidence of their accuracy. However, I have not the slightest objection to their being exhibited.

(Mr. James.) I do not think such an objection would lie in the mouth of my friend Mr. Stephens after what he has produced.

(Mr. Prideaux.) All I can say is, that if I were to stand upon strictness of objection, I should have shut out nine-tenths of my friend's argument.

(The Dean of the Arches.) He does not take the objection, and therefore you need not trouble yourself to answer it.

(Mr. Stephens.) I do not take the objection; I only make the remark that these pictures are not proved.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Of course they are not.

(Mr. Stephens.) Show them by all manner of means. It must be a bad case that depends upon pictures.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Those, my Lord, are the observations that I have to make with reference to lighted candles. There is one passage from the historical introduction of the Prayer Book, page 34, which is worth notice, however. Your Lordship has already glanced at this argument, and it is one of great weight: "It is worth notice, however, that the Book of Common Prayer, as thus revised in 1559, was quietly accepted by the great body of Romanist laity." I think that is very important.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is no doubt about it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) "And also that the Pope himself saw so little to object to in it that he offered to give the book his full sanction if his authority were recognized by the Queen and Kingdom."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is a more doubtful historical fact; I do not know whether it is supported by any reference. The other is an unquestionable fact that for three or four years the Roman Catholics came to our churches.

(Mr. Prideaux.) For 10 years.

(The Dean of the Arches.) For some years at all events; I believe until the Bull of excommunication.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Until the Bull of excommunication. Then comes a passage from a very great authority, Sir Edward Coke: "As well these restrained as generally all the Papists in this kingdom not any of them did refuse to come to our Church and yield their formal obedience to the laws established. And those have all continued, not any one refusing to come to our churches during the first 10 years of Her Majesty's Government."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is a citation from Coke, is it?

(Mr. Prideaux.) From Coke: "His Speech and Charge; London, 1607."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Where is that to be found?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am reading from Mr. Blunt's book. "See also Camden's Annals of Elizabeth, 1609, edition 1615, page 59."

(Mr. Stephens.) I do not know whether your Lordship has got the word "also"—"see also," it is not "see"—in support of the passage.

(The Dean of the Arches.) If necessary we must look at Camden himself.

(Mr. James.) It may not be material, but the first Act with regard to the Popish recusants was not till the 33 Elizabeth.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That was after the Bull of excommunication.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Your Lordship will find all here; and among them there is a reference to my learned namesake, Dr. Humphrey Prideaux, in 1638.

(The Dean of the Arches.) A very illustrious person.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Then I think I have mentioned already—I do not cite them—that with regard to the earlier Injunctions in the Visitation Articles that my friend has cited, they are treated as binding. Your Lordship will remember my friend relied for instance upon Ridley's, in which the instructions are that they are to omit certain things.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But that is before the second Prayer Book, is not it?

(Mr. Prideaux.) 1550.

(The Dean of the Arches.) They are referred to in Ridley's Visitation Articles before the second Prayer Book. I do not know that there is any reference to them in the second Prayer Book.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am not aware whether there is at this moment or not; but at any rate as further proof that they were treated as valid I mention the fact that with regard to these Injunctions certain portions of them which speak of the "Popish Mass" as it is called, are to be omitted from the reading.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think whatever argument you may found upon that, that refers as a matter of fact to a period between the two Prayer Books.

(Mr. Droop.) It is in 1550.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That would be between the two Prayer Books?

(Mr. Prideaux.) It would be ; certainly the second Prayer Book has not altered the thing, and I should say that silence upon that matter—

(The Dean of the Arches.) I mean are you prepared to give me any authority showing a reference to this later than 1550 ?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Not of a later reference, but there is a remarkable fact that in Grindal's articles, which in many respects follow these Injunctions, enjoining the removal of all candles, tables, and so forth, my friend relied upon the silence about lights on the Lord's board as an argument that they were no longer continued. Now, I think it is pretty clear that if lights were continued in other parts of the church and at other places in connexion with the superstition of images, and so forth, I think it is pretty clear that the lights on the Lord's board would have been continued also. And yet the Injunctions of Grindal forbid only the use of any candles, tables, and so forth. It is quite clear "tables" cannot mean the communion table ; and it is equally clear that the Injunction there, which is in fact the same as the 7th injunction of Edward VI., contains no reference whatever to lights on the Lord's table. I say that the silence of these Injunctions is a decisive proof that whatever desire certain prelates may have had to carry out the principle of discretion which they supposed they had at that time, and whatever they may have thought fit to do, I say that the silence of the Injunctions of Grindal with regard to the lights on the Lord's board, whilst he forbids the having lights on tables in any other place, is a strong proof that in the exercise of his judgment, Puritan as he was, he did not desire to put a stop to these lights. And Elizabeth's Injunctions again issued in the first year of her reign, have no reference whatever to these lights ; and, my Lord, we know that at any rate in her own chapel those lights were used. Mary, in the meantime, having of course restored them, supposing them to have been taken away. That is a remarkable fact, very strong no doubt, that after they had once been restored by Mary there is no subsequent prohibition of them, although there is a prohibition in general terms of other lights and tables. Unless my friend can go the length of saying that that prohibition takes away the communion table, he certainly cannot say that it takes away lights upon the altar. I do not feel it necessary, unless your Lordship wishes me to answer any question, to detain you further upon that point.

Now I will address myself to the question which your Lordship directed my attention to, of the reserved Sacrament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Just read the words of the Injunction which mentioned the reserved Sacrament, if you have got them there. It makes the argument so much clearer.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord. It is a very important Injunction and throws a great deal of light upon this question. It is the third : "Item. All such images as they know in any of their cures to be or have been so abused with pilgrimages or offerings of anything made thereunto, or shall be hereafter censured unto, they and none other private persons shall for the avoiding of that most detestable offence of idolatry forthwith take or cause to be taken down or destroy the same ; and shall suffer from henceforth no torches or candles, tapers or images of wax, to be set afore any image or picture ; but only two lights on the High Altar before the Sacrament, which for the signification that Christ is the very true light of the world they shall suffer to remain still."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Now you are going to explain the meaning of those words "before the Sacrament."

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, and before I enter into the detail of that question I will just mention one or two reasons in order that I may show your Lordship the exact tenor of the argument which I venture to address in support of my reason for saying that these words could not mean "before the reserved Sacrament." My first is that they are clearly carrying out the Injunction formerly given by Archbishop Reynolds. My second is that it was never the practice of the Church to have lights before the blessed Sacrament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you say it never was the practice of the Church to have lights before the reserved Sacrament.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Not as a rule. It was the practice only to have one light, as I shall show your Lordship, before the blessed Sacrament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You mean before the reserved Sacrament. As I understand it, the custom of the Roman Church at that time was that such portions of the consecrated bread as were not consumed were placed in a pyx which was placed in a tabernacle before which they burnt a perpetual light.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That is my point.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And that was renewed, according to the provisions of one of our bishops, recorded in Lyndwode, every Sunday. It was never allowed to go beyond from Sunday to Sunday. The reserved Sacrament as it was called was renewed every Sunday. Before that, you say, there was only one light burnt.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say that the practice of the Church was to have only one light.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And therefore you say that these lights mentioned in the Injunction do not refer to the reserved Sacrament ?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Do not refer to the reserved Sacrament ; and the light before the rood loft which my friend cited as being the foundation of this Injunction cannot have anything to do with it. First, because it speaks of "lights ;" and, secondly, because it speaks of lights other than those on the communion table.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say the practice of the Church was only to have one light before the reserved Sacrament ?

(Mr. Prideaux.) The practice of the Church was only to have one light before the reserved Sacrament. On certain occasions, for instance on Candlemas Day, they had more. There is an Injunction which my friend referred to of Henry VIII., and Cromwell's Injunction, with reference to lights, but that is evidently exceptive for the day ; and your Lordship observes the words are "lights before the Sacrament," not "lights on the altar before the Sacrament."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Have you any authority to give me for that proposition, that there was only one light burnt before the reserved Sacrament, or is it merely a statement ?

(Mr. Prideaux.) You will find the statement and the authorities given (some of them at least) in a note to a work which I think I have already referred you to—Mr. Chambers's work upon lights. But I am coming to that presently.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not want to interrupt you ; I only mean that if you have authorities upon that point, it is as well to mention them now.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I have authorities, but what I am desirous of doing before I refer your Lordship to the authorities is to state the three or four main grounds upon which I insist that it is impossible that these words in the Injunction can refer to the light before the reserved Sacrament. I will refer your Lordship to the authorities presently. My first position is that the usage of the Church was that there should be one light ; my second position is that that was to be a light always burning ; whereas it is clear to my mind that, inasmuch as the Injunctions speak of lights previously existing on the communion table, and which are to be "retained," the Injunction does speak of lights kept upon the communion table during the celebration of the mysteries of the Mass, and it is clear that Dr. Lushington so thought.

(The Dean of the Arches.) During the celebration?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes. That is my second point; that the light before the reserved Sacrament was continuously burnt. Without troubling you (because your Lordship is so well acquainted with the judgment) Dr. Lushington throughout in his judgment in the Westerton case, treats these lights as lights to be used during the celebration of the Holy Communion; because he says that they are gone because the Mass is gone, root and branch. Unless your Lordship desires it, this case has been so long before the Court that I won't trouble you by reading what Dr. Lushington says upon this point, but will merely state the result. He says that neither the canon of Archbishop Reynolds nor the Injunction coupling them together are consistent with the present Prayer Book; because the lights were to be burnt during the celebration of the Mass; and although (I say it with great respect for that learned judge) the first Prayer Book upon the face of it says it is the same office, "the office of the Holy Communion commonly called the Mass," he says, these lights are gone because the Mass is gone root and branch. But, my Lord, the strongest argument, perhaps, which can be used upon this point is the fact that it was by no means even in England, although it may have prevailed at one time in England more than in other places, the invariable or anything like the invariable practice to keep the reserved Sacrament upon the altar. I believe it was never kept upon the altar or even hanging over the altar.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What, do you say the reserved Sacrament was never kept on the altar?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I believe it was never kept on the altar; it was sometimes suspended over the altar. But your Lordship has read a passage in which the direction is, that it shall be kept in a pix and the pix kept in a tabernacle.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Then I say that the words "on the high altar" are utterly inconsistent with that view.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is at page 248 of Lyndwood. "Dignissimum Eucharistiæ Sacramentum Præcipimus de cætero taliter custodiri ut in qualibet Ecclesia Parochiali fiat Tabernaculum cum clausura decens et honestum secundum curæ magnitudinem, et Ecclesiæ facultates in quo ipsum dominicum." (It is to be restored every Sunday.) It goes on:—"Quod quidem venerabile Sacramentum omni die Dominica præcipimus innovari." Then there is an important note upon the question, and a discussion whether the parishioners were bound to provide the tabernaculum or not, and Lyndwood says they were not bound to do so although it was necessary; and there is an account of the pyxes. He does not, I think, state where the tabernaculum was to be. He gives this account of it:—"Tabernaculum. Sic dictum quia de tabulis sit factum vel quia tabulis vel lignis sit appensum," and so on; and he says the use of England is peculiar upon this matter:—"Et ex hoc videtur, quod usus observatus in Anglia, ut scilicet in conopeo pendeat super Altare, non est commendabilis."

He says this Use of England in hanging it over the altar under a canopy is not commendable.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not think he says the high altar.

(The Dean of the Arches.) He goes on "Quia contra mentem dicti c. sane. ubi statuitur quod non custodiatur in loco patenti sed singulari. Licet enim consuetudo Anglicana commendabilissimè illa consideratione, qua citius representatur nostris aspectibus adoranda; non tamen est commendabilis eo respectu quo ponitur in loco publico, sic quod ad eam manus temerariæ de facili valeant extendi." He says the custom of England (as we all know it was in many of these things)—"consuetudine Anglicani"—was peculiar in this matter.

(Mr. Prideaux.) It was the custom of putting it in a pyx and the pyx in a tabernacle.

(Mr. James.) I may mention as a fact which may or may not bear upon this question that the tabernacle in Salisbury Cathedral as we know in point of fact was not on the high altar but on the north side.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Lyndwood says it was the Anglicani consuetudo, and in one respect commendable, but not in another.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I was going to say that at that time the practice was as we know from Lyndwood, in England to suspend the reserved Sacrament over the altar; and no doubt to a considerable extent that practice had continued in England, even after Lyndwood's time. He complained of the practice, and says that he prefers the practice in vogue in certain other places, he says Spain and Portugal, I think.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes. But surely it is strong evidence that according to the English custom it was suspended over the altar, because he reasons upon it.

(Mr. James.) But not placed on the altar.

(The Dean of the Arches.) He reasons upon it. His argument is this: the "Anglicana consuetudo" is defended on this ground, that the blessed Sacrament is placed where everybody can see it; it is hung over the altar; and he says that is a commendable thing in one point of view. But he says it is not in another, because it is more likely to be injured and more open to possible desecration.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord, there is no doubt it was a practice in Lyndwood's day to suspend the blessed Sacrament over the altar; and to suspend the light also. I do not deny it for one moment.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I see he goes on to say that the custom in Holland and Portugal is more commendable: "In quibus ordinatur unus locus singularis honestus prope Altare in quo reponitur Eucharistia sub clavibus." Therefore, it is clear that here he is dwelling upon the discrepancy of the English custom in that respect with that in use in the foreign churches, who did not put it upon the altar, but somewhere near the altar; whereas it was the invariable custom in Lyndwood's time to suspend it over the altar in England from reasons which he gives. Whatever may be the consequence of that, I think it is very strong evidence as to the fact that the reserved Sacrament in England was suspended over the altar.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No doubt it was so in Lyndwood's time, and probably to a great extent at the time of the Reformation. But even there it does not say "over the high altar;" and I apprehend that even in Lyndwood's time it was not necessary to suspend it over the high altar. However, one thing is quite certain—

(The Dean of the Arches.) When "altara" is used alone without any other word with it does it not always mean the high altar?

(Mr. Prideaux.) It may or may not. I merely throw out that suggestion, and will not keep up the argument upon that point any longer; because as I say one thing is quite certain—I challenge my friend to find any authority in Lyndwood or anywhere else for burning more than one light before the reserved Sacrament, whether it be suspended over the high altar or not, and I challenge him to find any authority for burning that light upon the altar—therefore, if I am right in my suggestion your Lordship will see the importance of it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Where do you say the light would be?

(Mr. Prideaux.) The practice was to suspend the light before the Sacrament. In that very passage the thing occurs; my friend spoke of an Injunction directing a light to be suspended over the rood loft. In the Injunctions of 1538 (Cromwell's, I think) there occur in one place the words, "light before the rood loft," and in another case "light before the Sacrament of the altar;" but not "light upon the altar before the Sacrament." I challenge my learned friends to produce anywhere any glimpse or trace of the placing of a light upon the altar before the reserved Sacrament,

When honour to the blessed Sacrament is intended we find no reference to the high altar; and I submit that may be for a very good reason that the blessed Sacrament was not always kept there. We find a direction that there shall be a light before the rood loft; we find a direction that there shall be a light before the Sacrament of the altar. In 3. Wilkins, page 842, he sets out the Injunctions of King Henry of 1538; and we find that there they enjoin on a special occasion the burning of lights, but where? Before the Corpus Christi on Easter-day; he does not say upon the altar.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think you will find that my position about the word "altara" meaning the chief altar is correct. I see the plural is almost always used when the others are meant.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That may be. I think your Lordship now has my view upon the point, and I do not desire to keep up the discussion. But I do rely, first, upon the fact that all the evidence shows that it was a light that was burnt before the blessed Sacrament; and secondly, that in all the Injunctions requiring a light, or upon any one or two occasions where upon special feasts, as, for instance, Candlemas Day, more than one light is used, the Injunctions are that they shall be burnt before the Sacrament or before the Sacrament of the altar.

(The Dean of the Arches.) This gloss of Lyndwood's upon the "duæ candelæ" would appear rather at first sight to support your argument about there not being lights before the reserved Sacrament, because he says, "Duæ candelæ: est enim à parte juris ordinatum quod sacerdos sine lumine ignis non celebret missam. Si tamen faciat nihilominus consisit licet graviter peccet." That, you see, would go some way to support your argument as to the historical fact, because I do not know whether you have looked at the passage; but it is rather remarkable, because he gives the mystical reason why wax candles should be used on the altar during the celebration of the Mass. Now, the light that was burnt before the reserved Sacrament was a lamp, I take it, generally.

(Mr. James.) We know it was.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It could hardly have been a wax candle hanging before the reserved Sacrament, because the reserved Sacrament was renewed every week. It was kept for the event of persons being sick, and of its being necessary to take the Holy Eucharist to them when there would not be an opportunity of consecration; that was the object of it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) And your Lordship won't lose sight of the fact that Lyndwood gives substantially the same symbolic reason for these lights that the Injunctions did.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It so far bears upon your argument that wax for the candles was the only material to be used during the celebration of the mass, which would not apply to the reserved Sacrament. Have you any authority as to what the light was that was to be kept before the reserved Sacrament?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I believe it was ordinarily a lamp.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is my belief now from modern custom, but I do not know whether you have any authority upon that?

(Mr. James.) It is in every respect probable.

(Mr. Prideaux.) A lamp is spoken of as more frequent before the pyx than a taper in the chancery certificate rolls. There is a very curious and interesting little book which I am going to refer to presently at no great length. It is a French work. "A treatise on the exposition of the blessed Sacrament of the altar," and it gives a great deal of very interesting information with reference to the progress of the various practices connected with the different honours paid to the blessed Sacrament; and, if I recollect right, in one of those parts the author does speak of churches which were too poor to keep up their light—I think he uses the word lamp—before the Sacrament. I will look for the passage and read it to your Lordship. But that was another argument which I was going to use. I say the fact that a symbolical meaning is given to these lights is conclusive against my friend's argument. I do not think my friend can show a trace of any symbolical meaning in the burning of the light before the Sacrament. That light was used not for symbolical purposes but for direct honour to the blessed Sacrament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The light before the reserved Sacrament?

(Mr. Prideaux.) The light before the reserved Sacrament I say was not used for a symbolical purpose but for honour; and I think I am right in saying that my friend cannot point out any authority to show that the light used before the reserved Sacrament was intended to have any symbolical meaning. It was burnt for the express purpose of paying direct honour to the blessed Sacrament; and probably also in the church for the purpose of indicating—

(The Dean of the Arches.) Certainly; according to Lyndwood, it was burnt for the purpose of indicating where the Sacrament was.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I was just going to say it was burnt for the purpose of indicating where the Sacrament was, and I think Lyndwood makes a distinction. He says there are to be two candles burning during the celebration of Mass, to symbolise that Christ is the true Light of the World, and there shall be one light burning before the reserved Sacrament, to point out to the faithful the exact locality where the reserved Sacrament is to be placed, and no doubt also for the purpose of honouring the reserved Sacrament.

(Mr. James.) It may not be immaterial for your Lordship to know that there are two wax candles in the Eastern Church, and that there are not only two wax candles used in the Eastern Church, but the Lutherans also use them.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I expected I should hear something upon that point.

(Mr. James.) The Lutherans have them who have no reserved Sacrament whatever, and, as I mentioned to your Lordship, the Eastern Church have the same rule with regard to the two wax candles.

(The Dean of the Arches.) My recollection of the Lutheran Church is that they always have the lights and the crucifix.

(Mr. James.) Always.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is so in the north of Germany, I know, whatever it may be in other parts.

(Mr. James.) Yes, my Lord, but the Eastern Church has the two lights on the altar and a lamp before the reserved Sacrament. And the Lutheran Church, which does not have a reserved Sacrament at all, has always maintained two lights on the altar.

(Mr. Prideaux.) And the crucifix.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think that is so. Very few of us have been into a Lutheran church without seeing them.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I beg to call your Lordship's attention to page 70 of the English Church Union case, which sets out the will of Giles de Kelsey, dated Feb. 18th 1377: "An old bequest to the parish of St. Dionis, Backchurch, London, which now produces an annual income of about 500*l.*, helps to shew the distinction between the two altar lights for the celebration of the Eucharist, and the light before the reserved Sacrament, the latter being a perpetual light. The bequest is derived from the will of Giles de Kelsey, dated Feb. 18th 1377, in which he devises as follows: 'Also I devise to my executors all my tenement with the appurtenances situate in Lime Street, in London, between the tenement of Richard Preston on the one part, and the tenement of late of John de Stodey on the other part, and the said street of Lime Street on the east part, and the place called Leadenhall on the west part, to have and to hold to my said executors, from the time of my decease unto the end of 10 years then next following, fully to be complete, to find thereout and sustain a lamp burning every day and night, before the high altar in the aforesaid church of St. Dionis, which said tenement, with the appur“ tenances after the said 10 years fully completed, I “ devise to remain to the rector and parishioners of “ the aforesaid church of St. Dionis and their suc“ cessors, rectors, and parishioners for the time being,

 “ to find thereout and sustain the lamp aforesaid “ burning every day and night before the aforesaid “ high altar for ever. And the whole of the profits “ arising from the aforesaid tenement, beyond the “ sustentation of the lamp aforesaid, and the repara“ tion and sustentation of the tenement aforesaid, I “ leave for the amending and sustentation of the “ books, vestments, and ornaments of the aforesaid “ church.” That shows clearly that as far back as the year 1377, what was burnt before the reserved Sacrament was a lamp, and that it was burnt perpetually every day and every night.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You see you must give some construction to the word “the Sacrament” in this Injunction; and if it was not the reserved Sacrament, what was it?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say it means exactly the same thing as the “Tempore quo solennia missarum peraguntur.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) The words are “before the Sacrament.” I should be very glad to know what your interpretation of those words is. You do not mean to say that by that is meant before the service begins. I should like to hear your interpretation of those words “before the Sacrament.”

(Mr. Prideaux.) My position is this: in the first place, the Injunction is speaking of something which is to be retained; it is not introducing anything new into the Church. You must therefore put an interpretation upon it which is consistent with what was practised in the Church before and at the time these Injunctions were issued; and I say that at that time the only practice which prevailed in the Church with regard to lights upon the altar was that of having at least two lights burning upon the altar, for a symbolical purpose, at the time when the divine mystery of the Eucharist was being celebrated; and I rely very much here upon the fact that it is quite impossible to read Dr. Lushington’s judgment upon this point in the Westerton case without seeing that Dr. Lushington himself treats that Injunction as being an Injunction preserving lights, which were already prescribed during the solemnities of the Mass, by the constitution of Archbishop Reynolds.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I see your argument; you say they mean the same as this constitution, “Tempore quo solennia missarum peraguntur.”

(Mr. Prideaux.) Quite so, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But what I want to know is, what interpretation you give to this English word “before?”

(Mr. Prideaux.) “Coram;” that is to say, “In the presence of the celebration.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) But this argument is worthy of attention, namely, that the blessed Sacrament is not properly so called until after the consecration.

(Mr. James.) The reserved Sacrament is always called “Corpus Christi.” It is never called the Sacrament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Still I must endeavour to interpret these words correctly, “before the Sacrament.” Your contention is, that it is not the reserved Sacrament. As I understand, you say that “before the Sacrament” is a sort of translation of “Tempore quo solennia missarum peraguntur.”

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then I want you to make that out to me.

(Mr. Prideaux.) What I say is this: that looking at the matter historically it can mean nothing else, because the only practice then existing which could be retained in respect of the two lights on the altar is that which was retained, “Tempore quo solennia missarum peraguntur.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) You must give me some interpretation of the words “before the Sacrament.”

(Mr. Prideaux.) The Injunctions do not introduce anything new, that is my argument.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I understand your argument there.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Very well then, if your Lordship will allow me, I will refer to the 20th page of “Perry on Kneeling.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) The words in Archbishop Reynolds’ constitution are not “coram sacramentum.”

(Mr. Prideaux.) I admit that the words are very peculiar, and prima facie no doubt they would bear the interpretation my friend has contended for. But I say you must go back to the time that these Injunctions were issued, and must ask what was it that was to be retained. I will read your Lordship a passage from Vol. I. Cranmer’s works, Parker Society’s edition, page 3, which is set out in Mr. Perry’s book on Kneeling, page 20. ‘This word ‘sacrament’ I do sometimes use.’ Now, it is quite clear that Cranmer must have known the meaning of the words of this Injunction, “(as it is many times taken among writers “and holy doctors) for the sacramental bread, water, “or wine; as when they say that sacramentum est “sacræ rei signum; ‘a sacrament is the sign of a holy “thing.’ But where I use to speak sometimes (as the “old authors do) that Christ is in the sacraments, I “mean the same as they did understand the matter; “that is to say, not of Christ’s carnal presence in the “outward sacrament, but sometimes of his sacra- “mental presence. And sometimes by this word “‘sacrament’ I mean the whole ministration and “receiving of the Sacraments either of baptism or “of the Lord’s Supper.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) Supposing that were so, what light would that throw upon the words “before the Sacrament”?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I use it in this way. It shows that “before the Sacrament” means—

(The Dean of the Arches.) Not coram—it would not be that?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say that it means during the whole administration and receiving of the Sacrament. It is almost a translation of the words of Archbishop Reynolds:—“Tempore quo solennia missarum peraguntur.” That is to say, “Let there be lights during the celebration.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not quite understand what meaning you intend to affix upon these words; do you mean to say that this Injunction referred to the whole celebration?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord, certainly; I say it means exactly the same thing as Cranmer’s exposition of the word.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What do you mean by “before,” in point of time or in point of place? coram or ante?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I should say it means rather before the place; but I say that the whole passage taken together means during the whole of the ministration and receiving of the Sacrament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The exact words are, “before the Sacrament.”

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say it is quite equivalent to the expression “At the time of High Mass,” or, to use the language in Lyndwood, “Tempore quo solennia missarum peraguntur.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not understand your argument quite. You say “before the Sacrament” means “during the celebration,” as I understand now.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say that “before the Sacrament” and “during the celebration” are the same thing?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, and I say it must mean it there, because there was no other practice of the Church then existing to which it could refer, and that it is clear from the language of Cranmer in the passage which I have read that that meaning at that time was given to those words.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is there no authority to be found which would throw more light on the meaning of the Injunctions than that; is there nothing you can refer me to? Primâ facie, of course it would imply that the consecrated elements were there, because it is an improper expression to use the word "Sacrament" till the elements have been consecrated.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I admit it is a remarkable expression; but I say it is quite clear it refers to something which was practised in the Church at the time, and it can refer to nothing but the time of the celebration of the High Mass or the Holy Communion.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You rely upon the words "shall be retained?"

(Mr. Prideaux.) "Retained"—I rely a great deal upon that—"but only two lights upon the high altar, which for the signification that Christ is the true Light of the World shall be retained." Now I venture to call your Lordship's attention to this, that in no direction with reference to the lamp before the reserved Sacrament is it directed to be put upon the altar, nor do I believe there is a single instance to be found in which the light before the reserved Sacrament is put upon the altar.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is the modern practice?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Always to have a lamp suspended burning continuously before the blessed Sacrament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Not upon the altar?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Not upon the altar. I believe it is universal. Go into any Roman Catholic church or chapel, and you will find the lamp is suspended before the blessed Sacrament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is there any direction in the Missale Romanum as to that?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not know. I rely very much upon the words of the Injunction, "which for the signification that Christ is the true Light of the World they shall suffer to remain there still." So that it is perfectly clear the Injunction is speaking of a practice established, and the practice can clearly be shown even in England to have been considerably earlier than Archbishop Reynolds' Constitution, because we find in Johnson's Book among the canons of Edgar the following canon, anno 960.

(Mr. Prideaux.) There are no pages in the edition that I have; they give the reference with regard to the year—and there is no other arrangement. "Let a light be always burning in the church when Mass is said."

(The Dean of the Arches.) What canon is that?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Canon 42.

(The Dean of the Arches.) "And that all things near the altar or belonging to the church be very cleanly and decently ordered, and let what is holy be laid up with reverence." What is the meaning of this—"And let what is holy be laid up with reverence, and let nothing come near it"? That is, I presume, the reserved Sacrament.

(Mr. Prideaux.) It may refer to that, and probably does, but not exclusively to that.

(The Dean of the Arches.) "Let a light be always burning in the church when Mass is sung." I see here is a Saxon word "haligdom."

(Mr. Prideaux.) It refers to the relics of saints, and so on.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is like the German word, "heiligthum." Now you are on the words it would be important to observe upon this, "and let what is holy be laid up with reverence, and let nothing come near it." Does not that mean the reserved Sacrament?

(Mr. James.) I should think it does. Then your Lordship sees there is a separate clause, "and let a light be always burning in the church when Mass is sung." I have got the Anglo-Catholic edition here, page 220, from which I am citing. This note upon the Anglo-Saxon word is in the book, it is not a comment of the Editor.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I know. "The Sacrament or relics of saints, or both." That I think is the comment of the editor. But what do you say is meant by these words, "And let what is holy be laid up with reverence, and let nothing come near it." In the original Saxon it is "haligdom."

(Mr. James.) "What is holy" means I think the Sacrament.

(Mr. Prideaux.) If it does so I think it helps me.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I daresay it does, but I want to know what interpretation do you put upon it?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Well, my Lord; I am not learned in Anglo-Saxon, and I am content to rely upon that which Johnson gives when he says it means "Sacrament," or "relics of saints," or both.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But you say that by the Sacrament is meant the reserved Sacrament?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No doubt, my Lord; that I say is in my favour.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Otherwise there would be no meaning in the words "Let nothing come near it."

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not know that; it might refer to the relics of saints.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I mean as between the Sacrament celebrated at the time and the reserved Sacrament.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I have no doubt the Sacrament referred to in Johnson's note is the reserved Sacrament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That was what I was asking you.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I have no doubt, my Lord, of that; but I say that helps me, because this canon directs, first, that the reserved Sacrament is to be laid up with reverence and that nothing is to come near it; because what the canon says is this: "Let the reserved Sacrament"—I will put that word in if you please instead of "what is holy." I think it strengthens and confirms my argument—"be laid up with reverence and let nothing come near it." Now if the intention was here to provide for the light before the reserved Sacrament the canon would have gone on and said, "Let a lamp be always kept burning before it."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Read what follows it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) "Let a light be always burning in the church," not before the Sacrament, but "when Mass is sung." Therefore I say not only am I willing to accept the interpretation that what is meant by "what is holy" is "the reserved Sacrament," but I gladly accept it because it strengthens my argument.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That would be very much in accordance with Lyndwood's provision, "vel ad minus una"?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Quite so, my Lord. But the important matter is that the reference with regard to the light in the canon of Edgar does not relate to the reserved Sacrament, but relates to the singing of Mass. The canon does not say, "Let a light be always burning before the reserved Sacrament," though probably that may have been done at that time, but it says, "Let a light be always burnt in church when Mass is sung." So that, my Lord, this canon completely bears out the constitution of Archbishop Reynolds, and shows, as I submit, that in the canon of Edgar, and in the constitution of Archbishop Reynolds, and in the Injunction, what is being dealt with is a certain symbolical representation which is to be carried out to represent our joy and the glory of the Redeemer during the celebration of Mass; and that it has nothing whatever to do with the reserved Sacrament.

There is one other matter which I wish particularly to call your Lordship's attention to upon this point, and that is an Injunction of Cardinal Pole. Cardinal Pole orders in his Legatine Constitution (Cardwell's Documentary Annals, vol. 1, page 179): "ut in qualibet ecclesia parochiali fiat tabernaculum decens et honestum cum sera et clavi, quod in altum elevatum in medio summi altaris affigatur, si commode fieri potest, alias in commodiori et honorabiliori et magis summo altari vicino loco, qui haberi posset; in quo tabernaculo sanctissimum Eucharistiæ Sacramentum custodiatur;" and, where it can be afforded,

" ut perpetuo lampas vel cærus coram sanctissimo hoc sacramento ardeat."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is not very different from the rule I have mentioned. There is one point I want to put to you, Mr. Prideaux, and I shall be glad to have your answer. Of course I must put what I conceive to be the right judicial construction, if it should be necessary, upon these words, "before the Sacrament." Now, according to this provincial constitution peculiar to the Anglican Church, it appears that the blessed Sacrament was reserved, as I have said, in a tabernaculum suspended over the altar. You say that the candles were not burnt before that, but that it was a lamp?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Precisely.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Well, but observe, might not the Injunction mean this: that the reserved Sacrament being there (because the order goes on to say that it shall be there until it is renewed every Sunday) the candles shall be lighted in honour of the reserved Sacrament; because, although it was to be renovated on the Sunday it still was there until it was renovated? Can you tell me whether any reservation of the Sacrament was permitted at the time of the first Prayer Book, because that is important?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I apprehend that at the time of the first Prayer Book it was lawful. The first Prayer Book directs, in fact, that it shall be reserved.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Just so. If it was lawful to have a reserved Sacrament at the time the first Prayer Book was passed (I am not expressing any opinion, you know, but I merely put this to test your argument) would not the construction to be put upon these words be this: that these two candles to be burnt before the Sacrament meant "before the reserved Sacrament?" Would not that be the natural construction, although it may be when the Eucharist was not going to be celebrated there was only a lamp before it; still at the time the Eucharist was going to be celebrated that lights should be burnt before the Sacrament, this passage which I drew attention to being that it was to be there perpetually in the church, but to be renewed every Sunday. Then, you see, two lights would be burnt before the Sacrament without straining the construction of the word.

(Mr. James.) That would imply that the two lights should be burnt from week's end to week's end.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Why?

(Mr. James.) Because it says there shall be two lights burnt before the Sacrament. In that view it would be so.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Why?

(Mr. James.) If so they must be always kept burning before the Sacrament. It does not say during the celebration of the Sacrament, and your Lordship will recollect the candles were to be of wax, and taking into consideration the price of wax at that time—

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is certainly an important observation.

(Mr. James.) I take it, it must mean that the question is, Are they put before that which is to become the Sacrament during the celebration of the Mass? You light them at the beginning, and of course if they remain lighted until the consecration they will then be before the Sacrament at that moment. Those would be the two candles, which would be literally "before the Sacrament," because they are lighted for the purpose of being before the Sacrament, although it is true they are lighted at the beginning of the service for the administration of the Sacrament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Your argument is that the word "Sacrament" is used, not strictly but to mean "what will become the Sacrament."

(Mr. James.) It is strictly used because they would be lighted before the Sacrament at the time of the celebration before and after consecration.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That would be using the word "before" in the sense of coram.

(Mr. James.) I think if your Lordship considers the price of wax at that time you will see that it could not mean they were to be lit from week's end to week's end.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think there is a great deal to be said for that view certainly. I think it is very improbable that "before the Sacrament" meant that there were to be two wax candles always burning. I do not think that is borne out by the law or the practice of that time.

(Mr. James.) There is not a tittle of evidence of it, on the contrary.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Still my view is this, the words must have a natural construction put upon them if they are capable of it?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say they are capable of it, because it is not an unnatural view to take of the words. They are to be burnt there during the celebration of the Sacrament of the body and blood of our Lord, and after a due time the elements do become strictly and literally the Sacrament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You see, Mr. Prideaux, if this reserved Sacrament was allowed under this first Prayer Book of Edward VI., is there any direction with regard to the light burning before it?

(Mr. James.) It is not mentioned.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are certain on that point?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I will read it to your Lordship in the Communion of the Sick, in order to show you the extent to which the reserved Sacrament was allowed under the first Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is what I want to see, if you please.

(Mr. Prideaux.) It is the first Rubric to the office for the Communion of the Sick.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The Visitation of the Sick?

(Mr. Prideaux.) The Communion follows immediately after the Visitation; it is the next ceremony.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes; I have it now.

(Mr. Prideaux.) "Forasmuch as all mortal men are subject to many sudden perils, diseases, and sicknesses, and ever uncertain what time they shall depart out of this life; therefore, to the intent they may be always in a readiness to die, whensoever it shall please Almighty God to call them, the curates shall diligently, from time to time, but specially in the plague time, exhort their parishioners to the oft receiving (in the church) of the holy Communion of the body and blood of our Saviour Christ; which if they do, they shall have no cause in their sudden visitation, to be unquieted for lack of the same. But if the sick person be not able to come to the church, and yet is desirous to receive the Communion in his house, then he must give knowledge over night, or else early in the morning, to the curate, signifying also how many be appointed to communicate with him, and if the same day." Now I pray your Lordship's attention particularly to the introduction of these words, "the same day," because it shows that in the sense in which the blessed Sacrament is reserved in the Roman Church it was not continued.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the very question I put to you; I thought you answered it affirmatively.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I misunderstood your Lordship's question. I thought you were speaking of the law previous to this book. "And if the same day there be a celebration of the Holy Communion in the Church, then shall the Priest reserve (at the open Communion) so much of the Sacrament of the Body and Blood as shall serve the sick person, and so many as shall communicate with him."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then the reservation of the Sacrament was not allowed in the Roman sense in the first Prayer Book? That was a little hastily answered on your part, Mr. Prideaux.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord, I misunderstood you.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I thought myself it was not so, but I was not quite sure. Under the first Prayer Book that reservation which existed before, namely, of keeping it from week to week, was discontinued, and there was substituted for it this modified practice, that at the open Communion it was competent for the Priest to set apart, if he knew of any sick person, a certain portion of the consecrated elements, and to take them out of the church and administer them without reconsecration to the sick person.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I misunderstood your Lordship's question. I thought you were asking me with regard to the state of the law before the first Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) We have got it clear now.

(Mr. Prideaux.) We have got it clear now, and therefore inasmuch as the validity of these injunctions was recognized—

(The Dean of the Arches.) The bearing of it is this, that if these candles are burnt at all (if this position be correct) they could not have been burning before the reserved Sacrament, because there was no reserved Sacrament allowed.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Quite so, my Lord. That is what I say; and so it is laid down in a note, to which I shall have to call your Lordship's attention, in Mr. Chambers's work upon this subject, namely, that at that time in the sense in which lights are kept burning before the reserved Sacrament, there was no reserved Sacrament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the point, and it is important to ascertain it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am much obliged to your Lordship. I am sorry I was rather slower in ascertaining your Lordship's view than I ought to have been. I thought you were referring to the period before the first Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I was looking at that, and asking whether it continued to be the practice.

(Mr. Prideaux.) It is clear that in the sense of the reserved Sacrament remaining in the church before which lights could be burnt in honour of that reserved Sacrament it did not remain.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That was the question I put to you.

(Mr. Prideaux.) But it is equally clear that it was the intention that the candles should be continued, and that the candles were continued under the operation of the first Prayer Book is quite clear from the letters I have read to your Lordship. Why, therefore, I ask, should the Court be astute to put a construction upon this Injunction which is inconsistent with the lawful continuance of those candles when not a tittle of evidence from beginning to end can be given of more than one candle being burnt before the reserved Sacrament; when a symbolical meaning is given to the burning of the lights, as in this case, the same which is given in Archbishop Reynolds' constitution; and when the learned judge of the Consistory Court, in that elaborate part of his judgment which deals with this subject, assumes throughout that the constitution of Archbishop Reynolds and the Injunctions of King Edward VI., so far as regards this point, mean one and the same thing, — and says that those lights are gone, not because the reserved Sacrament is gone, but because the Mass has been abolished "root and branch."

(The Dean of the Arches.) As far as I remember there has been no complaint made in the letters of the Reformers in England to their friends on the Continent of the retention of the reserved Sacrament; and I suppose it is probable, if the Sacrament had been reserved, it would have been the subject of complaint with them.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No doubt, my Lord. There can be no doubt of it, although there is no express Rubric on the subject; and that is an argument in support of my proposition that the rubrics were not intended to be exhaustive. Your Lordship will not find any express Rubric on the subject until the present Prayer Book, nor even in the present Prayer Book, except so far as it necessarily follows from the directions that the Sacrament is not to be taken out of the church and that it is to be consumed at once. There can be no doubt whatever that, in point of fact, so much of the blessed Sacrament under the first Prayer Book as was not required for the administration of the Holy Communion to the sick man was consumed then and there. The following Rubric of the Communion of the Sick to that which I have just read goes further to support this view:—"But if the day be not appointed for the open Communion in the church, then (upon convenient warning given) the curate shall come and visit the sick person afore noon. And having a convenient place in the sick man's house (where he may reverently celebrate),"—I do not know whether your Lordship remembers the answer of the Rev. Mr. Faithful which was published in the "Church News" as part of the evidence taken before your Lordships, but which your Lordships on the Ritual Commission did not publish, "I celebrate the Eucharist,—I administer the Communion"—

(The Dean of the Arches.) No, I do not.

(Mr. Prideaux.) The Rubric proceeds "with all things necessary for the same, and not being otherwise letted with the public service or any other just impediment, he shall there celebrate the Holy Communion after such form and sort as hereafter is appointed." Your Lordship will find in the Prayer Book that in the one case if the Holy Communion is administered to the sick man on the same day on which the Eucharistic service is celebrated in the church, the directions are that he is to administer the Holy Communion; but if the sick man is not visited for the purpose of communion—

(The Dean of the Arches.) What are you reading from now?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I have been reading the second Rubric for the office of the Communion of the Sick in the first Prayer Book. I am now drawing my inference, and I say the direction is, if you administer the Holy Communion to the sick man on the same day that the celebration takes place in the Church, you shall reserve so much of the blessed Sacrament as is necessary for that purpose; you shall take that blessed Sacrament already consecrated to the house of the sick man; you shall not celebrate the Eucharistic service in that event, but all that you shall do is this—you shall administer the blessed Sacrament of the body and blood of the Redeemer already consecrated to the sick man. But if you do not administer on the very day in which the Eucharistic service is celebrated in the church, then, inasmuch as the former Rubric only directs the reservation of the Sacrament for the purpose of administering to the sick man on the same day, you must not only administer the communion but, having a convenient place in the sick man's house (where he (the priest) may reverently celebrate) "with all things necessary for the same, and not being otherwise letted with the public service or any other just impediment, he shall there celebrate the Holy Communion after such form and sort as hereafter is appointed." Then comes the title "The celebration of the Holy Communion for the Sick." So that in the one case the Eucharistic service is to be celebrated as well as the Communion administered; in the other case the Eucharistic service is not to be celebrated, because that has already been done, and the blessed Sacrament has been reserved for that purpose; and all that the priest in visiting the sick has to do is to distribute the elements at the time of the distribution of the Holy Sacrament which have been already consecrated. But if he has to visit the sick man upon another day, then, inasmuch as there is no reserved Sacrament which he can administer, he is not only to distribute the Sacrament, to administer the Holy Communion in that confined sense of the word, but, having everything reverent and decent in order to enable him to celebrate, he is to celebrate according to the form given in that book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You cite that as a proof that the reservation of the Sacrament was no longer allowed.

(Mr. Prideaux.) As a conclusive proof that there was no reserved Sacrament kept in the Church.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But you do not point to any special order abrogating the practice of reserving the Sacrament.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, but I rather believe there was some ancient canon about it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I mean you cannot show me that previous to the enacting of the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. there was any order or Injunction issued forbidding the reservation of the Sacrament.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord, I do not know of any.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Go on with your argument, Mr. Prideaux. I understand perfectly the force of your present proposition. You say that these directions with respect to administering the Holy Communion for the sick prove that the only reservation then allowed was a reservation of the Communion consecrated on that particular day.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Simply, and to be taken forthwith to the sick man's house in order that he might communicate.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I quite understand that; but of course if there was any document of a legal character showing that a reservation of the Sacrament was among those things which were intended to be forbidden by the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. it would help your argument?

(Mr. Prideaux.) It would, no doubt, but I say that it necessarily follows. I cannot conceive for one moment that the priest would be directed in the one case only to administer, and in the other case to celebrate before administering; and that he would, moreover, be directed by the first Rubric only to reserve so much of the blessed Sacrament as shall serve the sick person.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I quite understand your inferential argument.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Very well, my Lord; if I can find any direct authority, your Lordship will allow me to hand it up at any time during the case?

(The Dean of the Arches.) Quite so.

(Mr. James.) I see from a book that I have upon the Roman Liturgies, "Formicæ Institutionis Liturgicæ," the expression used is: "Nunquam mussam absque lumine celebramus non utique ad depellendas tenebras, cum sit clara dies sed potius in typum illius luminis, cuius sacramentum ibi confisimus. Sine quo et in meridie palpannus sicut in nocte." Taking it as a whole, the lights are to be there, "Cum sit clara dies," &c.; giving the same sort of meaning that I have given, viz., while the whole Sacrament is in fact being made.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Your argument is, that it may be called "the Sacrament" before the consecration takes place.

(Mr. James.) Yes, that is to say, that from the beginning of that service to the end it is called "the Sacrament."

(Mr. Prideaux.) If your Lordship will allow me, I will read to you a note which is appended to the paper, "On the reasonable Limits of lawful Ritualism," which will be found in the first volume of "The Church and the World," by the Rev. Mr. Perry. The essay is by the Rev. Mr. Perry, the book is "The Church and the World," first series, page 499: "It has been contended (e.g. Guardian, Sept. 1865), in reference to the two altar lights, that the words 'before the Sacrament,' in the Injunctions of 1547, mean that they were to burn before the reserved Sacrament, and that, therefore, they are not to be used at the celebration of the Holy Communion. But Cranmer's Visitation Articles of 1548 (a date which shows that the Injunctions of 1547 were still in force)——"

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is between the Prayer Book and the Injunction.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord;—"merely say "two lights upon the high altar." For that the reference is to Wilkin's Concilia, vol. 4, page 23: "Moreover, that these did not pertain to the reserved Sacrament, is shown by Cardinal Pole's Inquiry in 1557, 'whether there do burn a lamp or a candle before the Sacrament'——"

(The Dean of the Arches.) You referred me to both those authorities before.

(Mr. Prideaux.) And it certainly is very remarkable that you do not find any reference to the locality—you do not find the words "upon the altar" or "upon the high altar" in any single Injunction, canon, or direction which we have been able to find clearly referring to the reserved Sacrament—"i.e., as his Injunctions of 1556 show, before 'the tabernacle still in the midst of the high altar.'"

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the explanation given by Mr. Perry. It is not referred to in the Injunction?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I understand that it is one of his Injunctions no doubt that he directs the tabernacle to be set in the midst of the high altar.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That appears to have been the ancient practice of the Church of England.

(Mr. Prideaux.) "There can be no question that the Eucharist would not then have been celebrated without the 'two candles or one at least' (see p. 462) which the canon law absolutely required. The illuminated books and MSS. of the period abundantly prove the practice." Then in Mr. Chambers's book upon "Lights before the Sacrament," which of course I beg respectfully to direct your Lordship's attention to as a whole——

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is a pamphlet, is not it?

(Mr. Prideaux.) It is a pamphlet in which great learning has been exhibited.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And if I recollect right, not much respect shown to the decision of the Privy Council.

(Mr. Prideaux.) There is no quarrel with the decision of the Privy Council at any rate upon this point. I understand it was written before the judgment of the Privy Council.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I recollect some free handling of their Lordships' judgment.

(Mr. Hannen.) My Lord, it is referred to in the judgment in the Arches Court, and therefore it must have existed before that time.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, but there is a second edition in which I have a distinct recollection of the author saying something to this effect, that what one Judicial Committee of the Privy Council pronounced for, another might reverse.

(Mr. Hannen.) I had the advantage of seeing the first edition, my Lord.

(Mr. Prideaux.) This is a pamphlet published in 1866. Mr. Chambers published another work, I suppose.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It was one of many works placed before the Ritual Commission when we were sitting the other day, and I happened to take it up.

(Mr. Prideaux.) But your Lordship is aware that the Privy Council did not deal at all with the question of lights?

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am aware of that.

(Mr. Prideaux.) There are two notes, and I will read both while I am about it, contained in the edition of 1866. The name of the pamphlet is "Lights before the Sacrament; an Argument, Scriptural, Historical, and Legal, by John Chambers, Recorder of New Sarum." At page 36 the first note is "The Rule of the Church of Sarum." It merely supports my view with reference to the previous part of my argument based upon the fact that in the Church of Sarum, according to the Use of Sarum, although it is not mentioned in the Sarum Missal, there were two lights on the altar. "The Rule of the Church of Sarum, which really governed that of the rest of England, was for Sundays in Advent, and the rest of the year (except in greater feasts), 'Four wax lights, two at the altar, two on the step of the choir.'" Your Lordship will remember I referred to the fact, that, with regard to the last two, the tapers were brought in by the taper bearers, and were no doubt put upon the steps of the altar during the celebration of the office as ceremonial acts; and I ventured to mark the distinction between the fact of those tapers being so used in the Sarum Mass—those tapers that were carried by the taper bearers and put upon the steps of the altar, and the two lights which simply remain upon the altar during the celebration of the mysteries of the Mass. Then he refers to an authority, "St. Osmund de officii Thesaurarii Brit. Magazine, Nov. 1846, p. 515." Then comes this note, "As some uninformed persons may still suppose that these two lights were placed before the pyx or reserved Sacrament, it may be observed that the reservation of the Sacrament was then abolished."

I confess that was a passage which rather puzzled me at first, but now I do not feel any difficulty with regard to it, because he means such reservation as would lead to the burning of lights before the Sacrament. "That there never was more than one light before the pyx, and that only in churches possessed of considerable means.—(Constitutions of William de Cantilupe, Wilk. i. 557: Cardinal Pole's Constitution, 1555.)"

(The Dean of the Arches.) You have referred me to all these?

(Mr. Prideaux.) "Cromwell's Injunctions, 1536, forbid all but one light before the Sacrament of the altar, meaning the pyx or tabernacle"—not from being on the altar before the Sacrament, but before the Sacrament of the altar, which is a very different thing. "The Proclamation of Henry VIII, in 1538, and the Injunction of 1539 (Wilkins iii., 842, 847), allow more lights on Easter Day before the Corpus Christi," a very ordinary term in the Roman Church, in fact the ordinary term, I think, when they speak of the reserved Sacrament "before the Corpus Christi," showing they were not there before. The reason given, (and this is the argument I have already ventured to urge), "in Reynolds' Const. and Lyndwood, which refer to the Mass by name, is identical with that in Edward's Injunctions, and must refer to the same thing."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is what you have been arguing, you know.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord. "Cranmer in his Injunctions of the second year refers the lights to the altar, not to the pyx, and, finally, the authority of Heylin, Cosin, Burnet, &c., must be considered decisive, who speak of them as two lights on the communion table."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Let me look at that pamphlet for a moment, will you? (It was handed to the Court.) I see, Mr. Hannen, this is the passage to which I was alluding: "It is with the utmost astonishment that we read in the judgment of the Privy Council, in the Westerton case, their opinion that the Rubric in the last Act of Uniformity is confined to those Articles, the use of which, in the services and ministrations of the Church, is prescribed by the Prayer Book of Edward VI. Now with all deference to this august tribunal, true as their dictum may be in one sense, this is making the law, not executing it."

(Mr. Prideaux.) At any rate it has nothing to do with this question. There are many learned men well competent to form an opinion who have ventured to think that the view taken by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, supposing they took the narrower view, which I do not think they did, with respect to that Ornament Rubric, may be modified hereafter.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I need not say whatever view they took is binding upon me.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Of course, my Lord, and I feel I should be departing from my duty as counsel if I were to ask you for a moment to overrule what they have decided; but I respectfully ask you to consider from the whole of their judgment what they meant.

There is one other passage which I must trouble you with, and it comes from the enemy's camp. I use it in this way, "our enemies themselves being the judges." The work is, "How shall we conform to the Church of England?"

(The Dean of the Arches.) You mean Mr. Robertson's book?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Mr. Robertson's book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is that a book from the enemy's camp?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Well, I do not wish to use the word offensively, but I am told his sympathies are not Ritualistic at any rate. The passage I am about to read is at page 84, and I cite the book to show in the Roman Church the distinction between the lights upon the altar during the celebration of the Mass and the light burnt before the Sacrament of the altar in honour of the blessed Sacrament. He is giving extracts from Strype, and at page 84 your Lordship will find this extract: "1553, August 12, Mass began," then there is put in parenthesis "(after Edward's death)," whether that is the explanation of the writer or not I do not know, probably it is from its being put in parenthesis "Mass began (after Edward's death) at St. Nicholas, Colé Abbey, sung in Latin, and tapers set on the altar and a cross." The only reason why I cite that is to show not that I think any further evidence is wanted to prove it, the continuing usage in the Church of Rome; and the practice that there should be tapers on the altar during the celebration of Mass as distinct from burning a single light before the reserved Sacrament. The passage from Strype is from the Ecclesiastical Memoirs, vol. 3, page 22. My Lord, I have now done with the subject of lights, with the exception of one slight point, and if your Lordship would allow me to deal with that after the adjournment probably I shall occupy less time than if I were to enter upon it now.

(Adjourned for a short time.)

(Mr. Prideaux.) I now wish to mention to your Lordship, and I shall only just present my view to you, that either of the definitions of "the Sacrament," which Cranmer gives in the passage which I took the liberty of citing to your Lordship, is consistent with those words, "before the Sacrament," especially when you bear in mind the historical light which is to be thrown upon the subject. He says that he uses the word "Sacrament" in three meanings: first, in fact that it means the sacramental bread and wine; secondly, that it means the sacramental presence; and thirdly, that it means the celebration of the Communion. Now what I submit to your Lordship is, that in either of these senses the Injunction makes for the view which I have humbly to contend for. First, the words are, "before the Sacrament," which may mean, "before the bread and wine which are to be used in the celebration of the Sacrament."

(The Dean of the Arches.) They would not be on the altar then, they would be on the credence table, would they not?

(Mr. Prideaux.) They would be on the credence table, but still they would be "coram"—"in the presence" as it were—they would be there in the church on the credence table by the side of the altar, ready to be placed upon the altar for the celebration of the divine mysteries, with, as I shall submit presently, the little mixture of water, which, according to the universal practice of the Catholic Church, has been added to the wine. Secondly, in his second definition, "the sacramental presence," it may mean before the sacramental presence which is to be created and introduced in the prayer of consecration; and thirdly, which appears to me to be a stronger view, as I have already submitted, the words "before the Sacrament" may well mean, according to that passage of Cranmer, "in the presence of the celebration of the Communion," i. e. "during the celebration of the Communion." That point I have already submitted to your Lordship.

Now, I have only one other observation which, in fact, springs out of these last, to make upon the question of lights. My friend referred to a book which had been published by Archbishop Cranmer, and exulted in the fact that Archbishop Cranmer had suppressed a picture, and he said that the picture was suppressed because there were two lights upon the altar as undoubtedly there were. My Lord, I have the picture here, and I confess, at first sight, it struck one as being a most remarkable reason to give, when we bear in mind that this was in the year 1548, the very year in which Cranmer in his Visitation Articles inquires whether there are two lights upon the altar. But, my Lord, there is another remarkable feature in that picture, and, as I have it here, perhaps you will like to look at it. The book in which it occurs is, "A Short Instruction in the Christian Religion, being a Catechism set forth by Archbishop Cranmer, in 1548;" the date is very important, it is, before the Prayer Book, "together with the same in Latin; translated from the German, by Justus Jonas, in 1549."

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is the edition of the work you are citing?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Dr. Burton's edition, Oxford, 1829. Now the first remark I have to make upon that is this—in fact I have already suggested it,—that it is published in the very year when Cranmer at any rate treats the first Injunctions of Edward VI, as being in force, and when he inquires by his own Visitation Articles whether all lights have been removed except the two lights upon the altar.

(The Dean of the Arches.) His Visitation Articles are 1548?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, 1548—the very same year; and yet my friend relies upon the picture.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say his Visitation Articles inquired whether there were two lights before the altar?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Upon the altar, my Lord, not before. Your Lordship has been referred to them before.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is the term "upon"?

(Mr. Prideaux.) "Upon the altar," I believe. The date given in "Cardwell's Documentary Annals," vol. i., page 51, is 1547, I see, but it really does not affect the argument—it is close upon the same date. His inquiry, after having made general inquiries about lights, is "whether ye suffer any torches, candles, tapers, or any other lights to be in your churches, but only two lights upon the high altar."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That would rather perhaps throw some light upon the question, whether the reserved Sacrament was then allowed. There is no reference to any light before the reserved Sacrament, I think.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord, not in these Injunctions, I think. It seems to be doubtful, but I find in this edition of miscellaneous works and letters of Thomas Cranmer, they speak of the date of these Articles as being 1548. However, I do not think it is very important whether the date is 1547 or 1548.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is that the Parker edition of Cranmer's works?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, page 154. Then there is another circumstance to which I will call your Lordship's attention, which is that this picture represents the priest delivering the blessed Sacrament into the mouth of the communicant; and my friend may just as well argue that Archbishop Cranmer suppressed that picture because it represents the priest delivering the blessed Sacrament into the mouths of the communicants.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Well, but that is ordered by the first Prayer Book?

(Mr. Prideaux.) It is ordered by the first Prayer Book. I was going to read to your Lordship the reference. It only shows the weight of my friend's argument.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is the last Rubric of the Prayer Book of 1549, which orders it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) And it is a very important Rubric; when we come to consider the effect of the 28th Article I take it this Rubric will throw considerable light upon it: "Although it be read in ancient writers that the people many years past received at the priest's hand the Sacrament of the Body of Christ in their own hands, and no commandment of Christ to the contrary; yet, foras-

"much as they many times conveyed the same secretly away, kept it with them, and diversely abused it to superstition and wickedness, lest any such thing should hereafter be attempted, and that an uniformity might be used throughout the whole realm, it is thought convenient that people commonly receive the Sacrament of Christ's Body in their mouths at the priest's hand." So that the two distinctive features which this picture represents are the two candles on the altar, which Cranmer by his Visitation Articles inquires for about the very time when he publishes this book; and the receiving of the blessed Sacrament into the mouth, which is ordered by this book, in which Cranmer took part in the very year after the picture which my friend relies upon came out, namely, in 1549. How then can it be reasonably argued for one moment that Cranmer suppressed that picture for the purpose of condemning that which he himself inquired after in his own articles, and for the purpose of condemning that which is ordered in the next year by the first Prayer Book of King Edward VI.?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not think anything turns upon it, my Lord, but my friend's argument was, that Cranmer suppressed that picture because there were two candles in it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I will hand it up to your Lordship, and I will say, referring to my friend's view and my own, "Look here upon this picture and on this." I should not have referred to the picture at all if my friend had not so triumphantly paraded it. But my friend really must have fancied he was addressing an Exeter Hall meeting.

(Mr. Stephens.) I would rather do that than address His Holiness the Pope.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Then I would not, that is all I can say.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Gentlemen, consider how valuable our time is.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am much obliged to your Lordship. I am afraid my friend will be incensed if I am not careful, but I merely wish to make this remark: I say it shows the frivolity of this prosecution and the reckless way in which those who are advocating a system which cannot be borne out by the real truth of the facts attempt to discolour historical evidence.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Are there two candles in this picture? I cannot see them.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not know whether there are or not, but I am simply defending this case against my friend, and as against my friend I have a right to assume it. Your Lordship will remember my friend said Cranmer published a translation of this book, but he suppressed the picture; and why? says my friend, reasoning with that logical precision which Puritan reasoning generally leads up to; and why did he suppress it? Because he disapproved of the Popish superstition of burning two candles. Well, if he did why did he inquire after them in his Visitation Articles which he issued at that time? My friend might just as well, and with far more reason, having regard to the fact that the Church of England holds, as I trust she ever will hold, that the proper way to administer the Holy Communion is, that the laity shall receive it in both kinds; my friend, with far more reason and with greater weight, might have referred to the same picture if Mr. Mackonochie had been administering bread only, and have said, "Why did Cranmer suppress that? Clearly because it recognizes the abominable Popish practice of administering the blessed body and blood of the Redeemer in one kind only." The very same argument might have been used to show that Cranmer disapproved of administering the Sacrament into the mouth of the laity instead of into their hands. But the answer to that would of course have been, How comes it then that a Prayer Book which met with the full approval of Cranmer enjoins the practice, and gives as a reason a fear that if it be not enforced the blessed Sacrament may be desecrated, a reason which in common fairness one may say, whether right or wrong, at any rate is a motive of reverence and not a motive of irreverence, and which is akin to the motive which influences the Roman Church in providing that the Sacrament shall be administered under one kind only.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you think that is the only motive? However, we won't go into that.

(Mr. Prideaux.) There may be others, but we are not discussing them now. Mr. Mackonchie and certain other reverend gentlemen—not that that has anything to do with the point, because there is no fear of Mr. Mackonchie, or those who think with him, not being able to meet any charge of false doctrine whenever my friend's clients will have the boldness to bring it against them.

I have only one other remark to make with reference to this question of lights, and that is, the use of the words "high altar." My friend says that the high altar is gone; I say it is not gone. It is perfectly clear that the term "high altar" is used in opposition to the side altars that at that time existed in the church. "High altar" means nothing more than principal altar. We have only one now, we call it the "high altar," and I may say there is only one in the Greek Church. In fact, a multiplicity of altars is peculiar to the Roman branch of the Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church; and it is perfectly clear, if you look at that Injunction, it is, "You shall not burn lights before an altar dedicated to the blessed Virgin; you shall not burn lights before a side altar dedicated to any of the saints; you shall not burn lights before any of the side altars of the church, for we fear that if you do they may be abused to idolatrous purposes. You shall burn them only at that principal place where, upon high occasions, the celebration of the Eucharist is performed, and you shall limit your lights to that principal altar. You shall not burn them upon the side altars, even though (as I have no doubt was frequently the case) the blessed Sacrament may be there, or hanging over it." However, I won't labour that point, because I really feel it is quite unnecessary to do so. I would merely refer your Lordship to an Injunction which was issued, and which my friend cited, directing that the Lord's Supper should be celebrated only at the high altar. If your Lordship wishes the reference I can give it you.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have got it; Mr. James cited it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say that bears out my suggestion. It was an Injunction issued in the reign of Edward VI., in which the instructions were, "You shall not any longer celebrate the Mass at any of the side altars, but you shall celebrate it only at the high altar:"—the key note to interpret the matter into which we are now inquiring evidently being not the word "altar" but the word "high." "You shall celebrate it at the principal place where the divine offices are performed; and you shall not be allowed for the future to do what you have hitherto done, namely, to celebrate at the side altars, which are dedicated to the blessed Virgin and the other saints to whom they have been set up."

Only one other word; we read that the two lights are to be lighted and kept lighted during the celebration of the Mass. "Tempore quo solennia missarum peraguntur." My Lord, it is the invariable practice, and always has been, of the Church of Rome and of the Western Church, to remove the blessed Sacrament if there be any on the altar before the commencement of the divine mystery. The very object of that divine mystery is by the performance of the divine action, and the repetition of the divine words, and by the operation of the Holy Ghost to bring there present upon the altar the blessed body and blood of the Redeemer under the sacramental veils of bread and wine. The object is to effect that; and although the practice of the Church of Rome is to have somewhere in her churches the blessed Sacrament reserved, I think

I am right in saying that never is the blessed Sacrament upon the altar when they are about to perform the divine mysteries.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Nor suspended above the altar; and one can readily understand why. It is the great Eucharistic mystery of the Christian Church, the very object of which is by that mysterious rite to bring down, by the blessing of God, the presence of the Redeemer upon the altar; and it would scarcely be consistent with the spirit and the object of the rite that that blessed Sacrament should be upon the altar at the moment. At any rate, as a fact (and my friend may easily contradict it if he can), it is I believe one of the rules and canons of the Roman branch of the Catholic Church, that whenever it is intended at any particular altar to celebrate the divine mysteries, you shall take care that before the celebration commences the blessed Sacrament, if it has been there, shall be removed.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say the reserved Sacrament would be always removed before the celebration?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say if the reserved Sacrament is there it would be removed.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And you say it is always removed, and that it never could be there at that time.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not say it is always removed because I do not say it is there—ordinarily, I apprehend, in England at any rate, it is not on the high altar. But I say the rule is that the reserved Sacrament shall not be upon or over the altar at which the divine mystery is about to be celebrated.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And then you say if it is there they remove it; therefore, of course it must be there sometimes.

(Mr. Prideaux.) It may be sometimes; but I say if it is there they remove it. The gist of my argument is this: it is clear those directions that the lights are to be burnt during the celebration of the Mass have no reference to the reserved Sacrament; that is the purpose for which I cite it.

I am quite sure if anything should occur to my friends who are instructing me, your Lordship will allow me to mention it at any time before I have done; and having said that, I believe I have said all that it is necessary for me to say upon the question of the reserved Sacrament, as bearing upon the question of lights.

There is, however, as I am reminded, one document which my friend referred to very triumphantly, and that was the complaint of the Devonshire rebels. Your Lordship will remember my friend cited it for the purpose of proving, and no doubt it at any rate went so far as to show that it was frequently the case, that the reserved Sacrament was suspended over the high altar. The words were, "We will have the Sacrament hang over the high altar, and there to be worshipped as it was wont to be; and they which will not thereto consent, we will have them die like heretics against the Holy Catholic faith."

(The Dean of the Arches.) I forget the date of that.

(Mr. Prideaux.) 1549. What I desire to read to you is Cranmer's answer to them. I am reading it from the English Church Union case, p. 69; but it is taken from Strype's Cranmer, App. 97. "We will have the Sacrament hang over the high altar;" and this, my Lord, is further important as showing that, under the first Prayer Book—bearing out the suggestion which first came from your Lordship, I think—there was no reserving of the Sacrament. Cranmer's answer is, "Is this the Holy Catholic faith that the Sacrament should be hanged over the altar and worshipped?" I beg to remind my friend here that what Cranmer inquires is whether it is the "Holy Catholic faith." It is not whether it is the Protestant faith which my friend talked so much about. I confess I do not know what the Protestant faith is. If my friend says it means the faith of the Church of England, then let me tell him it means the Catholic faith, as appears from the creeds, "I believe in one Holy Catholic Church." "This is the Catholic faith," &c. Cranmer says, "Is this the Holy Catholic faith that the Sacrament should be hanged over the altar and worshipped? And they be heretics that will not consent thereto?" " . . . Innocent III., about 1,215 years after Christ, did ordain that the Sacrament and Chrism should be kept under lock and key. But yet no mention be made of hanging the Sacrament over the high altar, nor of the worshipping of it. After him came Honorius III., and he added further, commanding that the Sacrament should be devoutly kept in a clean place, and sealed; and that the priest should often teach the people reverently to bow down to the Host, when it is lifted up in the Mass time, and when the priest should carry it to the sick folk. And although this Honorius added the worshipping of the Sacrament, yet he made no mention of the hanging thereof over the high altar, as your article proposeth. Nor, how long after, or by what means, that came first up into this realm, I think no man can tell. And in Italy it is not yet used until this day."

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am at a loss to see how that displaces the argument, that as a matter of fact it was used at the time of the Devonshire rebels.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not say that it displaces the argument, but I say this: it shows that it was contrary to the decree of Pope Honorius, and raises a strong presumption that the practice in England was not universal.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The complaint of the Devonshire rebels was cited to show that there had been about that time an existing custom of hanging the reserved Sacrament over the altar; and I do not find any denial in that passage of Cranmer.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Oh no, it does not deny it, but it only shows that it was a corruption that had crept in.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But the question is not whether it was a corruption or not, but whether as a matter of fact it had crept in at that time. I mean in so far as regards this question.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Except that to make anything of it, the inference must be drawn that the practice was universal. I say, my Lord, that it rebuts the probability that the practice was universal.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is a mistake in the Church Union case, which states that "the tabernacle appears to have been a later introduction, and was perhaps due to Cardinal Pole himself." It was mentioned in Lyndwood.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I rely especially upon the distinction between the one light and the two. The light was in use when the reservation of the Sacrament was customary, there being no direction as to the light being put upon the altar, in connexion with the reserved Sacrament; and although I think it raises a presumption that the practice was not universal at that time, it was not for that purpose I cited it, but I cited it for the further proof of the suggestion laid down by your Lordship, that at that time the practice of reserving the Sacrament was gone. That is its important bearing upon this case.

And now I come to the consideration of the question of incense. I understand my friend to say that the burning of incense is a Popish superstition. He certainly has the misfortune in that respect to differ from the views entertained by the Royal Psalmist, because the Royal Psalmist says in the second verse of the 141st Psalm, "Let my prayer be set forth in thy sight as the incense, and let the lifting up of my hands"—showing how natural elevation is in an act of worship,—"be as an evening sacrifice." But let us see whether the Roman Church has prostituted incense to idolatrous purposes. I hold in my hand perhaps one of the most popular books of devotion in the Roman Catholic Church now in existence. I daresay the very title will frighten my learned friend, but, my Lord, if there are some weeds and thorns in it there are many flowers.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I daresay Mr. Stephens will survive it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I should be very sorry, as I said, to incense him.

(Mr. Stephens.) There is not the slightest fear of it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) The book that I am citing from is "The Garden of the Soul: a Manual of Spiritual Exercises and Instructions for Christians who, living in the World, aspire to Devotion; revised and corrected by the Rev. Edward Price." It is the edition published by the Catholic Publishing and Bookselling Company (Limited), 61, New Bond Street, and amongst other things there is an article called "Instruction for the Mass." If my friend thinks he can find any Popery in it which he may fasten upon these words, I shall be happy to lend it to him. Among other things it explains the use of incense, and the explanation is: "Incense which is used in solemn or high masses is symbolical of prayer, according to that of holy David, 'Let my prayer; O Lord, be directed as incense in thy sight.'" Now I admit this is a book sanctioned by Cardinal Wiseman and all the great authorities of the Roman Church, and I admit that if the sight of a Roman Catholic book is to establish Popery my friend is right; but I do not think this Court will hold that when we learn that the explanation which the Church of Rome gives of incense is that it is symbolical of prayer, according to that of holy David, "Let my prayer, O Lord, be directed as incense in thy sight,"—I do not think, whatever Exeter Hall may say, this Court will be of opinion that to burn incense as symbolical of prayer is a Popish superstition. Then if it be not why is not it lawful if I am right in the various arguments which I have ventured hitherto to submit to the Court?—I understand your Lordship to have decided that I am not to go into the question as to whether it is competent to you to inquire into the question of incensing persons and things?

(The Dean of the Arches.) That has been ruled by my predecessor, and, whether rightly or wrongly, I must abide by it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Therefore, I will deal with the question of incense generally. And my first argument is that it was undoubtedly used by the common ecclesiastical law at the time of the Reformation. We find from the Sarum book that incense was used for the censuring of persons and things to a greater extent, I believe, but certainly to the extent that Mr. Mackonochie goes, and exactly at the time when he uses incense. Therefore, I say it is for my friend to show why the use of this incense is illegal; and, without specifying the analogy, I will venture in general terms to submit to your Lordship that a great portion of the argument which I have ventured to urge upon your Lordship in support of lights, is equally applicable in support of incense; and in one respect, at any rate, I have a much stronger case than I have even upon the question of lights; for although your Lordship cannot doubt that de facto incense was used under the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., from the time of Edward VI. to the present time there is not a single prohibition against the use of incense. Now, my Lord, I say that that is a fact that comes with overwhelming weight. I shall not trouble your Lordship with that part of the case, because your Lordship is acquainted with the historical facts, and we know that incense de facto has been used from time to time, and that at any rate certain "censers" are assigned by the commissioners of church goods for the use of the churchwardens.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say it has never been prohibited?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say there is no prohibition—not one. My friend cited from Bishop Pilkington. I shall have a word or two to say about him presently—but I say there is no Visitation Article, no Act of Parliament; there are no canons, no Injunctions; there is no friendly letter even from any single bishop that can be produced, or at any rate that has been produced, showing that from the time of King Edward VI. to the present time incense has ever been forbidden, and why has not it been forbidden? Some of these Visitation Articles that my friend has cited are very exact; they go into details on many matters, they leave the more important matters untouched; and in these Injunctions of Ridley, in these Injunctions of Grindal in which you find the spirit exhibited of forbidding in effect those things which were enjoined by the cauteles—I ask your Lordship why the use of incense is not forbidden if it was intended that it should not be used? I understand Grindal did order censers to be destroyed; but I beg to remind your Lordship that he also ordered stoles to be destroyed at the same time. But at any rate down to the time of Grindal my friend cannot show a single instance of any kind whatever in which incense has been forbidden.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You qualify your proposition by saying it never was prohibited before Grindal's time?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Exactly, and I say if you look at his Visitation Articles you will find he forbids all sorts of things which are undoubtedly lawful. I am told that he does in one of his Visitation Articles direct censers to be destroyed. But what does that prove? Why, that they had been used up to that time; because you may be quite sure that Grindal would not have directed them to be destroyed if they had not been in use before; all these Injunctions (and I make this statement as a general rule, and, to a certain extent, to guide your Lordship) forbidding the things which are mentioned, prove clearly that they were still practised. If censers were used when Grindal issued these Visitation Articles, and if they were illegal, why were they not forbidden before? It is not likely that men acting in a catholic spirit—that men believing that the Church of God in her practices is full of the most beautiful symbol indicating the great Christian duties and the great mysteries of religion—that men who have at any rate the authority which they have always contended for of that passage in Malachi which your Lordship says will have no weight with you, and, therefore, I do not cite it; that men who were constantly repeating that Psalm of David to which I have referred, “Let my prayer, O Lord, be set forth in thy sight as the incense”——

(The Dean of the Arches.) I did not say the passage in Malachi would have no weight with me. What I said was I should not decide whether incense was lawful under the Prayer Book of Edward VI. by a reference to the Book of Malachi.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I merely referred to it for the purpose of showing that it is absolutely impossible to believe that censuring was not continued, and also that it is utterly impossible to believe that it was not continued according to the manner in which the censuring was carried on by the direction of the Sarum Use. Well, then, if so, if I am right in the construction which I venture to ask your Lordship to put upon the language of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the Westerton case, you have incense used de facto, and lawfully used under the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. I have already ventured to say that if the Ornaments Rubric was not intended to set up and establish a use (for the words are “shall be retained and be in use”) of ornaments which are not mentioned by terms or by necessary implication in either of the Prayer Books, then is the Ornaments Rubric useless and valueless; and therefore I say that as a matter of fact your Lordship cannot doubt that incense, and by consequence the implement used for the burning of incense—the censer—was used and lawfully used in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI.; that is to say, used and lawfully used under the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., if therefore I am right; as I submit that I am, in asking your Lordship to put the wider construction upon the language of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council with reference to the Ornaments Rubric, then I say that our case is proved. It is almost proved by the silence of prohibition; but when you find that these very Injunctions show that the use of incense continued; when your Lordship comes to the conclusion which as a man knowing human nature you must arrive at, that the practice would be continued if no steps were taken to stop it; when there is not even an Injunction or a direction of any kind to stop it—to say nothing of any prosecution in any of the courts—I say it is impossible that your Lordship can come to any other conclusion than that the practice continued. I lay that down as a matter of fair common sense inference of facts. If your Lordship can come to no other conclusion than that incense was used under this first Prayer Book of Edward VI. (and there can be no doubt that it was used in the same way as that in which it was used under the Sarum Use), then, if so, if I am right in this view of the construction of the language of the Privy Council, our case is proved. If I am wrong, then I shelter myself under the same Injunction which I referred to with reference to lights. Now I will take the liberty of reading that Injunction to your Lordship with reference to what it says about incense, because really it seems to me that if candles are established, incense follows in their wake. I will read your Lordship the Injunction. “Item, that such images as they know in any of their cures to be or have been so abused with pilgrimages or offering of anything made thereunto, or shall be hereafter censured unto, they and none other private persons shall, for the avoiding of that most detestable offence of idolatry, forthwith take, or cause to be taken down or destroy the same.”

I need not read the rest of the article. The words upon which I rely are, “such images as they know in any of their cures to be, or have been, so abused with pilgrimages or offerings of anything made thereunto, or shall be hereafter censured unto.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the Injunction about the lights?

(Mr. Prideaux.) The same Injunction, evidently, as I submit, recognizing the use of incense and treating the use of incense as a lawful use, not forbidding it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But how do you make out that?

(Mr. Prideaux.) In this way, my Lord——

(The Dean of the Arches.) Just read that passage about being censured unto.

(Mr. Prideaux.) “Item: that such images as they know in any of their cures to be or have been so abused with pilgrimages or offerings of anything made thereunto or shall be hereafter censured unto.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) Those are the only words relating to incense.

(Mr. Prideaux.) These are the only words relating to incense, and I say those words, inasmuch as they are directed against the images abused, and not against the censuring, necessarily involve the recognition of the use of incense as lawful in the Church. And that incense must have been continued in the Church of England up to the very time when the first Prayer Book came into use is quite clear, because it is provided that the Mass is to be used without alteration as ordered in the “Order of Communion,” that is the Order of Communion of 1548. My Lord, I admit that this is an incidental reference to the use of incense, but it is a reference I say which clearly recognizes the use of incense. It says, “we do not forbid you to use incense, you may continue to do that, but any image which shall be hereafter censured unto must be taken down and destroyed.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) You have made a considerable interpolation, have not you?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Well, my Lord, I think that is a fair inference to be drawn from the language of the Injunction. If the intention had been to forbid incense altogether why was not it forbidden? Even with regard to lights, they are forbidden with the single exception of the two lights upon the altar, which are to be retained; but incense is not forbidden at all. The future use of incense is in point of fact assumed in the Injunction, but it says the images that are hereafter censured unto are to be removed. My Lord, I say if the object had been to remove the incense the Injunction would have said so, just as the Injunction does say that the lights are to be removed with the single exception; and I say that the fact that in terms that Injunction is limited to the images which are abused by being censured unto, shows conclusively, according to every fair principle of interpretation and inference, that the use of incense, except for the purpose of censuring images that were abused, was to be continued. Therefore, I say, upon the true construction of this Injunction there is a sufficient recognition of incensing, except in the incensing of images, incorporated into the Prayer Book, by recognition of that Injunction in the Prayer Book to justify your Lordship in saying, even if you take the narrower view of the interpretation put by the Judicial Committee upon the Ornaments Rubric, that the incense is lawful, and therefore that these censures are ornaments which were prescribed by authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI.

I now just call your Lordship's attention to the report of the Lower House of Convocation upon incense.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think Mr. James referred to it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not remember whether he did or not—one gets so many things referred to at different times and on different occasions that it is difficult to remember. This report appears to me to be entitled to great weight. It is very short; “The Committee observe that there is no proof of the use of incense in the apostolical age. The burning of incense, however, in a standing vessel, for the twofold purpose of sweet fumigation, and of serving as an expressive symbol, has undoubtedly been used from ancient times. The practice of censuring ministers and ornaments, and of swinging censers, is of much more recent origin”—(Whatever my friend Mr. Coleridge by his ingenuity may say, it is quite clear that in the passage which he cited from George Herbert's works, George Herbert was teaching incense as being symbolical, and not merely for the purpose of fumigation)—“The Committee next observe that the use of incense is not prescribed by the rubrical law of the Church of England.” There I venture to differ from them, because I venture to say that by the incorporation of these Injunctions of King Edward VI. into the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. it is prescribed: “And that the censuring of ministers or ornaments has no authority, either in the laws or the practice of that Church since the Reformation.” That is the view of the Committee. Of course if your Lordship takes the same view upon that point you will decide against us so far; but I hope and believe you will not. “The burning of incense, however, in a standing vessel has been practised since the Reformation in some churches and chapels, cathedral, collegiate, royal, episcopal, and parochial. Instances may be found down to the middle of the last century. Under these circumstances the Committee are of opinion that the censuring of ministers or ornaments is inadmissible. With regard to the simpler use of incense above described, the Committee think it sufficient to remark that it should not be introduced without the sanction of competent ecclesiastical authority,” showing that the opinion of the Committee was that the use of incense in the simpler form was lawful; because, of course, if the use of incense in the simpler form was not lawful it could not be sanctioned by competent ecclesiastical authority. Now I believe that very nearly, if not quite, all that can be said upon the question of incense is contained in a very learned pamphlet on the subject by Dr. Littledale. There he shows the extent to which it was used in the ancient liturgies, and among them in the earliest liturgy we have—the liturgy of St. James. Under the pre-Reformation system of Sarum he shows what at any rate he conceives is the authority for it, under the English post-Reformation system, and the various persons who have used it. But I do not propose to trouble your Lordship, unless you desire it, by going into quotations upon that point. I think it is sufficient I should refer to the publication.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I will look at the pamphlet.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Now, my Lord, here is a very remarkable document, which I will hand up to you with your permission. It professes to be an account of certain expenses due from Bishop Cosins for candles and censers. Here is the account and the receipt; and if your Lordship pleases I will just hand it up. It shows that Bishop Cosins not only used such things—

(Mr. Stephens.) I have not the slightest objection to your Lordship receiving that document, but I really should like to know what its authenticity is. Perhaps my friend will allow me to look at it?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Certainly; it purports to be taken from the Mickleton manuscripts, and we can verify the fact that it contains Bishop Cosins' handwriting.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Were those censers used in Bishop Cosins' own private oratory?

(Mr. Prideaux.) In the College Chapel, my Lord; and as I ventured to submit to your Lordship before, if there is any place in the world where the pure Protestant principles of the glorious Reformation ought to be carried out, it is the chapels of our colleges.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But you are aware that there are several immunities which they have, which churches have not.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That may be, but they cannot go contrary, as my friend says, to the Act of Parliament, according to his contention.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Except that a censor is bought and sold here, I do not exactly see what this proves.

(Mr. Prideaux.) It shows that it is bought and sold and paid for by Bishop Cosins.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It says “the chapel,” but I see it refers to the Peterhouse College. “For the sencer 36 oz. 4 dwts. at 8s. the oz. is, 14l. 9s. 6d. For altring and mendinge the cases and making a newe case to the sencer, and portredge to and frowe from Cambridge, 16s.”

(Mr. Prideaux.) I understand, my Lord, the signature can be verified.

(Mr. Stephens.) I do not want it verified; make what use of it you can.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I suppose that my friend sees that it is impossible to struggle against such evidence?

(Mr. Stephens.) I will admit it for what it is worth; it is just worth the piece of paper on which it is written.

(Mr. Prideaux.) At any rate it is worth as much as an authority which you cited, and which I am going to refer to immediately.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What are the Mickleton MSS.?

(Mr. Prideaux.) The original manuscript is, I understand, in Bishop Cosins' library at Durham.

(Mr. Stephens.) I will admit it for what it is worth.

(The following document was put in.)

(Mr. Prideaux.) Now I am going to refer to a passage which my friend cited from Bishop Pilkington's works, Parker's Society's edition, page 129. And how my friend should cite such a thing, and how Bishop Pilkington should have had the face to write it, is what perfectly astonishes me.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then, Mr. Stephens, you do not take any formal objection to this document?

(Mr. Stephens.) Not the slightest; I take no formal objection. Formal objections belong to the opposite side, my Lord.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My learned friend says in his opening speech: "I allude to the Ten Commandments, which, according to that writer whose book
I cited, are to be placed so as not to be seen or read by the people, and my gloss upon that was because

" the Second Commandment says, 'Thou shalt not " 'fall down and worship a graven image.'" That is what my friend says. Now, what the worshipping of a graven image has to do, at any rate, with worshipping the blessed Redeemer under the form of bread and wine, I cannot understand. I suppose my friend would not even be so profane as to say that the blessed Sacrament was a graven image?

(Mr. Stephens.) What right has Mr. Prideaux to say that I am guilty of profanity?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I did not say you were guilty of profanity.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Mr. Prideaux, I must tell you that you said, "I do not think even my friend, Mr. Stephens, could be so profane."

(Mr. Prideaux.) I mean of course in his official character, as representative of the Church Association.

(Mr. Stephens.) My Lord, neither in my private nor my official character have I ever been guilty of profanity.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I must request you,
Mr. Prideaux, to withdraw that expression.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My Lord, I willingly withdraw it.
As I have said before, I am particularly desirous not to incense my friend. Then my friend continues the quotation from Bishop Pilkington: "Having God's

" eternal words sounding always amongst them in " their sight and ears; and last of all they should " have good discipline, correct faults, and keep good " order in all their meetings. But as they wept to see " this second house no more costly or pleasant to the " eye, so our poor Papists weep to see our churches
" so bare, saying they be like barns, there is nothing
" in them to make curtesy unto, neither saints nor " yet their old little god." At any rate I may use the word "profane" with regard to the passage which was cited. "But hereafter it appears whether of " these churches God is more delighted withal. For " although these ceremonies" (my friend added
" here you see we have incense or frankincense " enumerated and dealt with as a ceremony") "in " the Old Law were given by Moses for the hardness
" of the people, to keep them exercised that they " fall not to idolatry of the Gentiles, yet is there no " mention of either of these" (and my friend says
" these are the important words") "in the New " Testament, nor yet commandment now, neither to " us nor them, but forbidden to be used of all, both of " us and them. We be no longer under shadows, but " under the truth. Christ hath fulfilled all, and taken " away all such dark kind of ceremonies, and hath " placed the clear light of His Gospel in His Church,
" to continue to the end. But the Pope hath thrust
" the Church full of more blind and wicked cere" monies than ever Moses did." I think that last clause is rather a strong one, seeing that the ceremonies Moses introduced he introduced by the direct command of Almighty God. Therefore, I think it is rather a strong measure to talk about Moses introducing "blind and wicked ceremonies." But, my Lord, the passage for which I cited this is "yet is there no mention " of either of these in the New Testament, nor yet " commandment now, neither to us nor them, but " forbidden to be used of all, both of us and them."
Now I shall be very content to put the case of incense upon that. I ask my friend confidently where—and it shows the looseness of the citations which he brings —where is the use of incense forbidden in Holy Scripture? because that is the passage which my friend literally thinks to blind this Court by bringing forward—a mere assertion that the use of frankincense is forbidden in the New Testament. Where, where?
I think I can point out a place, where, if it was intended that it should be forbidden, it probably would have been forbidden; but will my friend accept the issue? I am willing to put it upon that.
At any rate on this occasion I will be as thorough a Bible Christian as even the "Record" newspaper could desire. I repeat I am willing to put it upon that issue—where is the use of incense forbidden in Holy Scripture? My Lord, it was at the time when Zacharias was gone up to burn incense in the temple that the angel of God, the same who was honoured to announce to the ever blessed Virgin, Mother of God, the great mystery of the Incarnation, stood by his side at the altar of incense and announced to him that he was to become the father of the greatest of those that should be born among women. An improbability, no doubt, but much less of a mystery than that which was afterwards by the same angel announced to the blessed Virgin. And what did Zacharias do? He disbelieved the word which was spoken to him; typical of that spirit of scepticism and infidelity to which the advanced forms of Protestantism are so likely to lead; and he was then and there struck dumb; not for carrying out the directions of Almighty God, and under His directions being guilty of the "divinely appointed Popish ceremony" of burning incense, but because he thought fit in a true spirit of Protestant scepticism to disbelieve in the possibility of that Word of God which had been announced to him by the angel, whilst the ever-blessed Virgin, to whom a mystery so great and ineffable was announced, received it in faith—

(The Dean of the Arches.) Mr. Prideaux, I do not wish to interrupt you if you think this bears upon the legal argument, but I am sure you will see at once how very undesirable it is to introduce topics of this great solemnity into questions of this kind. I have merely to decide according to law whether incense is or is not permitted by the Church of England.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My Lord, I bow to your Lordship's suggestion immediately, and therefore the additional remark which I was about to make I will not make, but I do respectfully submit that the fact that this great and important connecting-link between the Jewish dispensation and the Christian dispensation was made to Zacharias at the altar of incense by the archangel of God at the very time when he was burning incense is, at least, in the absence of any affirmative evidence that the use of incense is forbidden in the Scriptures, a pretty tolerable answer to this passage which my friend has cited in which Pilkington had the presumption, or the ignorance, or the bigotry, or whatever it may be, to assert that it is forbidden in Holy Scripture.

And now, my Lord, I have done with the subject of incense, and I very much regret that I should have allowed my sense of indignation at the assertion that incense is forbidden in Scripture to have led me to make observations which I quite feel are better omitted in this Court, and which I extremely regret that I was led to make.

I now come to the consideration of the mixed chalice, and here also in the first instance I must inquire what it symbolises, because my friend says that the mixed chalice also symbolises Popery. My friend has cited a canon of the Holy Council of Trent.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I did not understand Mr. Stephens to say that it symbolises Popery: I understood him to say that it was a custom first introduced by the Pope.

(Mr. Stephens.) That was all, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) However, Mr. Prideaux, deal with it as you were going to deal with it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I certainly understood my friend to say that they were Popish symbols.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That it owed its origin to a Papal measure.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Of course, if my friend concedes that the mixed chalice does not in any sense symbolise Popish superstition, then I am very glad to find that I misunderstood him; because I really thought that that was his notion, and I was prepared to show that it was not so.

(Mr. Stephens.) Let there be no misunderstanding on this point. I neither admit or deny anything in this case.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am much obliged to your Lordship for the suggestion, and I was in hopes my friend would have admitted it. However, my friend does not admit that the mixed chalice does not symbolise Popish superstition, and I must deal with that accordingly. My friend referred to one of the canons of the Holy Council of Trent, assigning the reasons (I think it was the one to which your Lordship was pleased to direct my attention), the 23rd Session, canon 7,— "De aquæ miscenda vino in calice offerendo. Monet deinde Sancta Synodus, proceptum esse ab ecclesia sacerdotibus, ut aquam vino in calice miscerent, tum quod Christum Dominum ita fecisse credatur." That is the first reason, because our blessed Saviour was believed to have done it. I will ask my friend whether he neither admits or denies—

(The Dean of the Arches.) You had better not ask him anything.

(Mr. Prideaux.) "Tum etiam quia e latere ejus aqua simul cum sanguine exieret." Is that "a Popish superstition," to believe that water and blood issued out of the side of our Saviour?

(The Dean of the Arches.) And they say, because it is mentioned in the Apocalypse.

(Mr. Prideaux.) "Quod sacramentum hac mixtione recolitur et, quum aqua in Apocalypsi beati Joannis populi dicantur ipsius populi fidelis cum capite Christo unio representatur." The third reason is, that it signifies the union of our Saviour with the Church.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is all dealt with in a chapter by Aquinas, and there are other reasons given.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I was going to give your Lordship one other reason. I like to go to Roman Catholic writers for this, because it shows what they themselves say it symbolises.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Very well; do so, if you like.

(Mr. Prideaux.) There is a little book, written by a gentleman for whom I have very great respect, and by whom, many years ago, I had the benefit of being instructed—the Rev. Canon Oakeley. He says that it symbolises the human and the divine nature in the Redeemer. I suppose my friend does not either admit or deny that it is a Popish superstition to believe in the union of the divine and human nature of the Redeemer. Now I stated, and I will act upon it, that I would not trouble your Lordship by arguing that the mixture of the wine and water was practised in the early Church. My friend cited a passage from Wheatley, where Wheatley admits it, and says that the only exception was the Armenians—a most unfortunate exception for my friend, because the Armenians happened to be Monophysites—Eutychian heretics, who denied the abiding reality of the Lord's human nature; and therefore one can well understand (not that it is very material whether it be so or not) that they would reject that particular ceremonial, or ceremony which it had always been held in the Church symbolises that Christ was very God and very man.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You do not contend that the mixed chalice is at all necessary for the Sacrament?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is one of the points which Aquinas deals with and decides that it is not.

(Mr. Prideaux.) The Church of England has never, of course, decided that; and I believe the view of the Church of Rome is this, that it is not necessary, but that the priest who wilfully omits it is guilty of mortal sin; that, I believe, is the view entertained by the Roman Church. But I do not for one moment contend that it is necessary.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is a question of usage very much, is not it?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes.

My Lord, the evidence upon which the use of the mixed chalice in the early Church rests, is so very strong.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you think you need go further back than the Prayer Book of Edward VI., which recommends it to be done?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not know that I need. I only purpose to cite a single authority upon that point, and that is one of the Homilies, because it takes back the "Popery," which my friend neither admits nor denies, to a very early date. I do not know at what time my friend fixes the commencement of Popish superstition. The homily from which I am going to cite is that upon the Book of Common Prayer and the Sacraments; in the edition which I have, the Oxford edition, page 319, "Justin Martyr, who lived about 160 years after Christ"—(early times for Popery, my Lord, and there are plenty of passages in the Homilies which state that the first 300 years were the golden age of the Christian Church)—"saith thus of the administration of the Lord's Supper in his time:—'Upon the "Sunday assemblies are made both of them that dwell in cities and of them that dwell in the country "also, among whom as much as may be the writings "of the apostles and prophets are read; and afterwards when the reader doth cease, the chief minister "maketh exhortation, exhorting them to follow "honest things. After this we rise altogether.'" Now here Justin Martyr is speaking of the usage of the Church established at that time "and offer prayers, "which being ended as I have said, bread and wine "and water are brought forth. Then the head "minister offereth prayers and thanksgiving with all "his power, and the people answer Amen." The importance of this quotation is that it comes from the Homilies, and therefore it operates in a certain sense as an estoppel upon the members of the Church of England. But really your Lordship is so well acquainted with the fact that the evidence that the mixed chalice was a universal practice in the very earliest ages of the Church is so conclusive, and is so well known to every person who is at all conversant with ancient ecclesiastical history, and the ancient fathers, that I do not propose to trouble your Lordship with any further observation upon the mere fact of the mixed chalice being early used in the Church, except to say that I have here, so far as regards the consecration office, the special part of the divine liturgy which relates to consecration—I hold in my hand a book by the late Dr. Neal, entitled "The Liturgies of St. Mark, St. James, St. Clement, St. Chrysostom, "and the Church of Malabar translated,"—and at the end there are the consecration words, I believe, of every known liturgy, and in almost all of them (for the exceptions are rare indeed) it appears that the mixed chalice was used. But, my Lord, these liturgies are very important for another reason, because they bear out the first reason given by the Council of Trent for the adoption of the mixed chalice; they show, several of them, that the tradition in the Church was that our blessed Saviour had used a mixed chalice. I will just call your Lordship's attention to the earliest liturgy that we have, which I believe is now proved to have been written about the year 50, of our Lord—the divine liturgy of St. James. And here we have the words "Likewise also the cup after supper having "taken, and mixed it with wine and water, and having "looked up to heaven and displayed it to Thee"—that is the part which will bear upon the question of elevation when we come to consider it—"His God and "Father, He gave thanks and hallowed, and blessed, "and, filled with the Holy Ghost, and gave it to us, "his disciples, saying," &c. I do not propose to trouble your Lordship with reading any more out of this book, but I have the book here, and, if you please, I will ultimately hand it up to you. I propose to do so for this reason: that you will find throughout the book a single pencil mark against the consecration of the wine in every liturgy where the reference is made to the traditional fact that our blessed Saviour mixed the water with the wine. Therefore, with that view, I will presume to hand it up to your Lordship ultimately, and you will find that in a very large majority, indeed (in almost all of them there is the mixed chalice,) there is the express statement in the words of institution that our blessed Saviour at the time of the institution mixed the water with the wine. And, my Lord, we have a very early statement of that. I am now going to cite, and it is the only ancient father

I am going to trouble you with, a passage from St. Cyprian, which is set out in page 51 of Mr. Bennett's History of the Eucharist, to which I have already directed your attention. It fully bears out and supports the statement of the Holy Council of Trent, and the inference to be drawn from the ancient liturgies, that our blessed Saviour himself used the mingled cup in the institution of the Lord's Supper.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is the reference to St. Cyprian?

(The Dean of the Arches.) There are a very small number of Epistles there altogether I recollect.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I will read the passage. The edition is not given nor is the page given. "In another Epistle the same father says, 'when the Lord calls His body bread'—"

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are now reading an English translation?

(Mr. Prideaux.) My friend did that in several instances, and I understood that for the sake of convenience we might do it. It was done by my friend throughout. I shall be most happy to refer your Lordship to the passage if you desire it, but I have not got the original here. "In another Epistle he says " 'when the Lord calls His body bread, which is " 'made up of the union of many seeds, He indicates " 'that the people are in union; and when He calls " 'His blood wine extracted from many bunches of " 'grapes, and pressed into one, He signifies the " 'flock joined together by the mixture of a multitude " 'in union.' In the same Epistle he again refers to it: " 'Likewise it appears that the blood of Christ is not " 'offered if there is no wine in the cup'—(He was arguing against the heretics in those days who insisted that the celebration should be in water only)—"nor is "the Lord's Sacrifice celebrated with legitimate consecration, unless our offering, and sacrifice answer "to His passion; but how shall we drink the new "wine of the creation of the vine with Christ, in the "Kingdom of His Father, if in the sacrifice of God "the Father, and of Christ, we do not offer the wine, "nor mix the cup of the Lord according to the Lord's "tradition." My Lord—I find I have now the reference here. St. Cyprian's Epistle, 63. I am going to direct your Lordship's attention to two pamphlets, one by Dr. Littledale and the other by Mr. Greuber. I have already referred you to the latter.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, I know Mr. Greuber's pamphlet.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I will ask you to take them as part of my speech.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I will look at them both.

(Mr. Prideaux.) If your Lordship will do me that favour, because I am desirous of curtailing my observations as much as possible.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Mr. Prideaux, what you have to show, as it appears to me, is not so much that it was a usage very general and primitive (which I think you have abundantly established) but that it was a usage which is allowed under the Prayer Book.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No doubt, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You have it ordered in Edward VI.'s first Prayer Book, and omitted afterwards—is not that the whole case?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, I do not think it is the whole case, and that is the reason I call your Lordship's attention to this fact, because if it appear that there is every probability to believe that it is according to our Lord's institution that it should be a mixed chalice it strengthens the argument in support of my position.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I perfectly understand that.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am coming, after one more reference, to deal specifically with the Prayer Books of the Church of England. The other passage to which I desire to call your Lordship's attention is a passage from the Homilies, the first part of the sermon: "Of the worthy receiving and the reverent esteeming

"of the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ." I am reading now from a different edition which has been put into my hand. It is from the first part, and the passage is this: "But before all other things, this we must be sure of especially, that this Supper be in such wise done and ministered as our Lord and Saviour did and commanded to be done;" so that how our Lord and Saviour did it would be important in the view of the homilist, "as His holy apostles used it, and the good fathers in the Primitive Church frequented it." So that, my Lord, really the practice and manner in which it was instituted by our Saviour, and the practice in the Primitive Church, may become a material element to consider. I do not think we want it, but in connection with this subject I will, without reading it, beg once more to call your Lordship's attention to the 30th canon.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I will look at it, Mr. Prideaux.

(Mr. Prideaux.) If your Lordship pleases.

And now, my Lord, I come to deal with the Prayer Books themselves. I think this question of the mixed chalice disposes of my friend's notion about "dark and dumb ceremonies," because my friend's contention is, that wherever there is a "dark and dumb ceremony" it is interpreted. Now there is no interpretation given in the first Prayer Book of the mixed chalice, and yet the mixed chalice was certainly to be used under the first Prayer Book. Therefore, it is quite clear that the mixed chalice and ceremonies of that kind are not ceremonies which are necessary to be explained, and which are to be pronounced dark and dumb if they are not explained.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You will observe that what your client is charged with is not so much using the mixture of water and wine as mixing them during the celebration of the Holy Communion. He is charged with both, no doubt.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That is the charge in the Article; I have already pointed out to your Lordship the variance.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I mean there may be, I do not say that there is, a distinction between the use of wine and water, and mixing them at the time of the Communion. I merely draw your attention to it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My answer to that is that the mixture during the Holy Communion is ordered by the first book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No doubt.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Therefore, it is perfectly clear that with regard to the application of the principle of "dark and dumb ceremonies" and the necessity of explanation, my remarks equally apply.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not mean touching that point of "dark and dumb ceremonies;" that is quite another matter.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Now the first document which I will call your Lordship's attention to is "The Order of the Communion" of the year 1548. I am citing from the Liturgies of King Edward VI. I need not say that in the "Order of the Communion" the chalice was mixed; and, what is much more important, it was ordered to be mixed. Your Lordship is aware that the "Order of the Communion" was the service by which the administration of the cup to the laity was first enjoined; and we get this Rubric:—"The time of the Communion shall be immediately after that the priest himself hath received the Sacrament, without the varying of any other rite or ceremony in the Mass (until other order shall be provided), but as heretofore usually the priest hath done with the Sacrament of the body, to prepare, bless, and consecrate so much as will serve the people; so it shall continue still after the same manner and form, save that he shall bless and consecrate the biggest chalice, or some fair and convenient cup or cups, full of wine, with some water put into it; and that day, not drink it up all himself, but taking only one sup or draught, leave the rest upon the altar covered, and turn to them that are disposed to be partakers of the Communion, and shall thus exhort them as

"followeth." So that one could not doubt it, otherwise one finds that in this "Order for the Communion" the mingling the water with the wine before the consecration is expressly directed; and yet we find the same thing in this "Order for the Communion," to which your Lordship directed my friend Dr. Stephens' attention, with reference to the first Prayer Book; that is to say, we find that which is placed upon the altar and consecrated, though it contain a little water with it, is still called "wine" near the end of the service; and at the end of the service we get—"If there be a deacon or other priest, then shall he follow with the chalice; and as the priest ministereth the bread, so shall he, for more expedition, minister the wine, in form before written." Then the note directing the prayer of consecration, if there be not sufficient wine for the communicants present, says: "Note, that if it doth so chance, that the wine hallowed and consecrate doth not suffice or be enough for them that do take the Communion, the priest, after the first cup or chalice be emptied, may go again to the altar, and reverently and devoutly prepare and consecrate another, and so the third or more, likewise beginning at these words—'Simili modo postquam cœnatum est,' and ending at these words—'Qui pro vobis et pro multis effuditur in remissionem peccatorum,' and without any levation or lifting up." So that we find in the Order of Communion of 1548, twice in the service, after the mixture, the contents of the cup are called "wine." Your Lordship called the attention of my friend Mr. Stephens to the fact, and therefore I need not dwell upon it, that in like manner the mixture is called "wine" in the first Prayer Book of Edward VI.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is in the Rubric at the end of the Communion, you know.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord, and in the Rubric at the end of the Communion in the same way it is called "wine" twice.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is the same thing; it is called "wine" after the water is added to it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Water is to be added to it, then he is to put the bread and the wine on the communion table. That is the state of things under the first Prayer Book in the reign of King Edward VI.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Just so. Then we come to deal with the real question—namely, that it is not mentioned again.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord; and then we come to this remarkable fact, which is well worthy of bearing in mind, that in the second Prayer Book the wine is not mentioned, and in Elizabeth's Prayer Book wine is not mentioned at all, except incidentally in the prayer.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say, no Rubrical directions, and no mention as to wine.

(Mr. Prideaux.) What was to be done, then? It is called, I think, "wine" once in one of the Rubrics at the end of the Communion—"The curate is to have it to his own use;" and the word "wine" occurs in one of the prayers, I think, during the service; but there is not a word said about wine or water—there is not a direction to put either the bread, or the wine, or the water upon the communion table; it is all inferred. What was it lawful to use then? And how can it be said that the silence of the second Prayer Book of Edward VI. alters the nature of the elements which were to be consecrated? Under the Sarum Use, under the Order for the Communion, under the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. wine, with a little pure water, is to be put upon the altar and consecrated; and the contents of the cup are afterwards called "wine." I say, my Lord, under those circumstances, in the absence of any Rubric or explanation to the contrary, the fair inference to be drawn is that when they speak of consecrating the wine they are speaking of the same thing which was to be consecrated under the former books; why should it not be so?

(The Dean of the Arches.) At the end of the 4th Rubric, in the second book, we have this: "To take away superstition which any person might have in the bread and wine;" you see it is called "wine" there. And again, "If any of the bread or wine remain the curate shall have it to his own use. The bread and wine for the Communion shall be provided by the curate and the churchwardens at the charges of the parish." Therefore we were both of us a little in error in thinking that wine was not mentioned in the second Prayer Book.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My Lord, I say it is mentioned in the Rubric at the end of the service, but it is only mentioned in a Rubric talking about what is to be done after the service is over.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is one Rubric which says that it shall be administered in both kinds before that. But you are quite correct, I think, in saying that till you come to this post Communion Rubric there is nothing said about wine in the second Prayer Book. I believe that is quite correct.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Nothing whatever, and why should it mean anything different now? Why, when the intention and the avowed object of the Church of England is to act in accordance with the customs of the Primitive Catholic Church? Why, when the very Act of Parliament which established the second Prayer Book says that the alterations were made in deference to the crochets and the scruples of certain persons who refused to go to Church and follow the previous Prayer Book? Why, when the first Prayer Book is declared to have been written by holy men, moved by the Holy Ghost? Why, when all the authorities show that it was the practice of the early Church to use the mixed chalice, and when the testimony of the early Liturgies show, and the writings of the Fathers show, that it was a tradition of the Church that our Saviour himself used the mixed chalice? Why should the state of things be altered and wine be taken in Edward's second book to mean what it did not mean in the first book and in the "Order for the Communion?" I submit that if you were precluded from looking into the early Catholic history of the Church, that if this Church really were an Act of Parliament Church and your Lordship were precluded from looking into the surrounding circumstances and into the practices of the early Catholic Church, upon the legal principles of interpretation the word "wine" means the mixed chalice; because if there is any principle of law which is well recognised, it is this—that the legal presumption is in favour of the old state of things. I have in my memory one strong case recognising that, and I know it is in East's Reports, I do not remember the name of it at this moment, I will find it if your Lordship wishes to see it. The old state of things with regard to that which was used in the Consecration Service, was the mixed chalice. I am now dealing simply with the Prayer Books and the "Order of Communion," and am assuming that your Lordship is not at liberty to pray in aid the practice and the custom of the early Church, in order to support my view. I say that the old practice was that that which was consecrated and used in Communion should be the mixed chalice. It is so directed by the "Order of Communion;" it is so directed by the first Prayer Book of Edward VI.; and after the mixture it is called, both in the "Order of Communion" and in the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., "wine." There cannot be a doubt, as I have ventured to submit before, that de facto it was used, and the fact that there is no conviction on the point strongly supports my view. But I say I press that strong legal principle of interpretation, that the presumption is that the old state of things was to remain, and that at least it was lawful to use wine in the same sense as that in which it was used under the previous Rubrics of the previous Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You see, Mr. Prideaux, that may be so (I am not expressing any opinion), and yet it might not be lawful to mix water with the wine during the time of the administration of the Communion.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My Lord, I think that is "to inquire too curiously"—I say it with great respect—because you must look at the thing as a whole. That which, according to the old practice of the English books (I am not now relying upon anything else), was placed on the table and consecrated was a mixed chalice prepared at the time of the service; and by the word "wine" there is meant what the priest is directed by the first book to place upon the table.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The argument would be this:—You will see at once the effect of it.—In the first Prayer Book it was directed not only to put wine on the table, but to mix it with water. The same directions are given in the Prayer Book that we now possess of Charles II., with the exception of the water; it therefore may be reasonably contended perhaps that whether it was lawful or not to have a little water mixed with the wine, inasmuch as the present Prayer Book carefully omitted what the former one had prescribed it cannot be lawful to use it in the administration of the Holy Communion.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I understand your Lordship's view, but I must protest against your Lordship's phrase. I do not believe that the last Rubric "carefully omitted" that; I believe it was anything but a careful omission.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I will leave out the word "carefully" and say "omitted." All I meant to say was this, that your argument might be quite good as far as it has gone, and yet be subject to that criticism.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Then it is a step gained if I can prove by a strict legal argument that it is right and proper to use the mixed chalice. That is a step gained, no doubt we have to go further. It is a step gained because it gets rid of my friend's extremely weak argument about the Catechism, which I shall have to deal with presently, and therefore I venture to submit at any rate that this argument is a strong one, to show that, upon the strict technical legal principles of criticism and interpretation, the word "wine" means wine with a little clean water mixed with it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, I have got down that argument.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Then I submit that this same principle of interpretation carries it further. Your Lordship will remember that there are no directions in the second Prayer Book of Edward VI. as to placing the elements which are to be consecrated upon the Lord's table,—none; I have ventured to urge that argument upon your Lordship already, that in point of fact the matter must have been done in innumerable instances—in the majority of instances; and that the absence of any prohibition and of any attempt to convict, is alone sufficient to prove that. But apart from that I ask your Lordship first, was it lawful, in the second Prayer Book of King Edward VI., to place the elements which were to be consecrated upon the altar? There is no direction given, and if it was lawful, then the same principle which I have been venturing to urge before your Lordship, applies, upon every legal principle—namely, that it was to be done in the same way as before. Why, if the old status is to exist—according to that principle of law that it does exist where it has not been legally and effectually altered,—why, if the elements are to be placed upon the communion table at all should they not be elements consisting of the same mixture as was used under the first Prayer Book—why should not that mixture be prepared in the same way and under the same circumstances? I am now arguing the case upon pure principles of legal interpretation without praying in aid the usage of the Church Universal, or the certainty that in point of fact the mixed chalice (and when I use the term "mixed chalice" I include the fact of mixing during the service—I should not call it a mixed chalice otherwise) was used and no prohibition against it, no injunction against it, no advice even of any bishop against it; on the contrary, all that has ever been said about it by persons having any real authority, and, among them, by Bishop Cosins, is that it may lawfully be done although it is not required. My Lord, I submit upon the strict legal question, that that principle which I have ventured to suggest to your Lordship, that the old status is to be held to exist except in so far as it is lawfully altered, goes farther than calling upon your Lordship to hold that "wine" still means the mixed chalice prepared according to the directions of the earlier Communion offices to which I have referred. And I say if the old system of placing the elements to be consecrated upon the altar was to remain under the second Prayer Book (and if it did remain it must have been upon that principle, for there is no direction expressed or necessarily implied about it) why should not that old principle equally apply to show that that which is to be placed upon the Lord's table is a mixed chalice prepared in the manner and at the time directed by the earlier Prayer Books, and which had been practised up to that time? I call your Lordship's attention again to this. Our real position is this: no direction to place the consecrated elements on the communion table; where then are you to learn, according to the ecclesiastical laws of England, what you are to do and in what manner you are to place these elements upon the table—and most undoubtedly it is lawful even if it is not required that you should place them? Why, as I said, you must ascertain the old status, you must refer to the old Rubrics both in the "Order of the Communion" and in the first Prayer Book; and when you find the entire direction comprised in one and the same single Rubric, why separate the parts of that Rubric? You must go somewhere to know what you are to do.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That would apply to what you would do at the time of the second Prayer Book of Edward VI., but does it apply to the Prayer Book of Charles II.?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I submit so, equally.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Certainly there is great force in your argument with regard to the second Prayer Book of Edward VI., but you see you have now to deal with a different state of things. You say with considerable force, as it appears to me, that if you were living under the second Prayer Book of Edward VI., you would be obliged to supply the deficiencies from the first Prayer Book. But you see you are living under the Prayer Book of Charles II., which has an express Rubric. Why are you to suppose that there is a deficiency in that Rubric which needs to be supplied from the same place?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I was desirous at first (but I understand your Lordship sees what I mean, and feels that it is an argument of some weight) of going step by step.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I quite follow your argument with regard to the necessity of supplying the manifest deficiencies of the Rubrical directions of the second Prayer Book from the first.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That is a great step gained.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But the difficulty to my mind is this: You have got, so to speak, a complete Rubric upon this subject in the present Prayer Book; and thus the necessity which arises under the second Prayer Book of Edward VI., of supplying the deficiencies abunde does not appear (I am not expressing any opinion upon the subject) to exist in the present state of things.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I submit that we have not a complete Rubric.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That must be your contention, I think, that the present Rubric is incomplete.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord, I do not think that need be my contention. My contention is this, that the present Rubric probably orders all that is absolutely and legally necessary; but I have already called your Lordship's attention to the fact—

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say that the present Rubric orders all that is absolutely necessary.

(Mr. Prideaux.) It may be that it does so. I am merely answering your Lordship's suggestion.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But you would say if it did it would still be lawful to add water to the wine.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say that the Rubric is not exhaustive, and that the practice is not prohibited; therefore the Rubric does not preclude the celebrant—

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is to say that though it may be lawful to celebrate the Holy Communion with wine and bread alone, it would not be unlawful to do it with a little water added to it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That is my contention.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You do not go so far as to say that it is unlawful to celebrate the Holy Communion with pure wine and bread.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, it is unnecessary for me to go that length.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You do not go that length?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But you say, granting that it is lawful to do it in that way, it is equally lawful to do it the other way.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That is my contention; and a great number of the observations which I have ventured to address to your Lordship upon the general question apply, of course, to this question of the mixed chalice.

But now, my Lord, I submit that the present Rubric as it were takes up the last part of the Rubric in the first Prayer Book. The words are, "and when there is a Communion the priest shall then place upon the table so much bread and wine as he shall think sufficient." The first Rubric after giving directions as to the taking of the bread and mixing of the cup, says, "and set both the bread and wine upon the altar," and what appears to me to be the object of the present Rubric is this,—to enforce the placing of the elements on the altar; but it does not deal with the previous part of the Rubric at all. Under the second Prayer Book of Edward VI., it was left open altogether. It is impossible to know to what crochets the minds of certain persons who think fit to interpret Scripture for themselves may go; and the main object of this special provision as I submit was to render it compulsory that at the proper time the elements which were about to be consecrated and to form the subject of the blessed Communion should be placed upon the table. But, my Lord, it does not deal with the former part of the Rubric at all. It is necessarily as I have said not exhaustive even of that which it directs; because it simply says that he is to place so much bread and wine upon the table as he shall think sufficient. It does not say he is to lay the bread upon the corporal or that he is to put it in the paten; it does not say (and yet he invariably does it) that he is to pour the wine into any chalice. It leaves all that to be supplied according to the former practice and the former Rubrics, and it simply says this: "Having collected together the quantity which you think will be wanted, and having done all that which is previously necessary in order that you may be ready to place upon the table so much bread and wine as you shall think sufficient, then you shall place it upon the communion table. You shall not have it at a side table; you shall not have it elsewhere; you shall not adopt a careless and reckless and irreverent method of celebrating this great rite, but having collected together, according to the old practice and the old usage, so much wine and water as is necessary for the whole Communion which you are about to administer, you shall place it upon the communion table. Neither shall you do it before, you shall not have it on the Lord's table before the time of celebration; you shall place at that time upon the communion table so much bread and wine as you shall think sufficient." Why then should not the celebrant priest refer to the Rubric of the first Prayer Book to see what he is to do in order that he may get upon the proper paten the bread and into the proper chalice that contents of the cup which he has to place upon the communion table? I say that there is necessarily something to be supplied. He must necessarily inquire, "How am I to place this bread upon the communion table? In what am I to place the contents of the cup which are to be consecrated? Where am I to find what I am to do in this respect? I must of course look to the earlier Rubrics. I dare not adopt a course contrary to the practice of the whole Church of Christ which is not expressly ordered me, because in the absence of any direction of that kind, my duty will be to follow out the practice of the Catholic Church universal, as we find it laid down in the binding documents of the Church of England." And therefore what is the very thing which the priest would naturally do in order that he may find what it is that he is to lay upon the communion table, and what are the sacred implements which he is to use to enable him to do it? Of course he looks to the Rubric of the earlier book, and he finds himself supported in that view by the Ornaments Rubric, which says, "The same ornaments shall be retained and be in use as were in use in the Church of England by authority of Parliament in the second year of King Edward VI." If the same ornaments are to be in use (and without some ornaments he cannot place either the bread or the wine upon the table), if those same ornaments are to be retained and be in use, why should he not use them in the same sense in which they were used under the first Prayer Book? My Lord, I respectfully submit that we get out of any difficulty in this case by bearing in mind that Rubric which my friend says is a dead letter, the Ornaments Rubric. It is impossible, without supplementing the instructions given in the Rubric of the present Prayer Book, to comply with the requirements of the present book, and to place upon the table so much bread and wine as the celebrant shall think sufficient. Well then surely he is not bound to adopt a new practice; he is not bound to invent a Rubric for himself, and if he is obliged to look somewhere to find what he is to do in order that he may comply with the requirements of this statute, why should he not refer to the most recent Rubric which existed upon the subject; and when he finds that all the ornaments which were used in the first Prayer Book are to be used now, and when he finds that water was mixed with wine in the celebration of the rite under the first Prayer Book, and that therefore there must have been a ewer as well as a chalice, why should he not, as he must look somewhere to know how he is to give full effect to this particular Rubric, refer to the old Rubric and be guided by the directions contained in it?

Your Lordship asked me if I argued that it is necessary that he should mix the chalice. I am, not quite sure that a very fair argument might not be made upon strict legal principles to show that it was necessary; but I do not desire to go that length; it is no part of my duty to go that length. I have shown that wine in previous Rubrics means the mixed chalice. I have shown, and I understand your Lordship to admit, that there is great weight in that position, that inasmuch as there are no directions with reference to placing the elements which are to be consecrated upon the Lord's table in the second Prayer Book, you have no alternative but to go to the first for directions. If I am right in saying that you must go somewhere for directions in order to supplement the imperfect and scanty Rubric which you have in the present book, why, for the same reason, should you not go to the Rubric of the first Prayer Book to supplement it, especially when you are told that in the administration of the rite you ought to use such ornaments as were in use under the first Prayer Book?

My Lord, I have had put into my hand a passage from the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. To save time I will read it from this little book, for I cannot at this moment give your Lordship the reference. "The Rubric to the Prayer Book of January 1, 1604, adopts the language of the Rubric of Elizabeth. The Rubric to the present Prayer Book adopts the language of the statute of Elizabeth; but they all obviously mean the same thing; that the same dresses and the same utensils or articles which were used under the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. may still be used." I put it in now.

(The Dean of the Arches.) We have had that read a dozen times.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That of course, I need not say, lets in the water cruet.

Now I will just read a passage from Bishop Cosins upon this point which is set out in Perry's Lawful Church Ornaments, page 457. "Moreover he did not consider [that is Cosins] the mixed chalice to be contrary to the law of the Church of England, for after quoting some of the fathers on the necessity of using wine he says, 'This were enough to free our Church from any heinous offence though it uses not commonly to mix water with wine as the Church of Rome doth; yet we must confess the custom is very ancient, consonant to the figures of the Old Testament which St. Cyprian, Epistle 2, 3, liber 2, reckons up, and of the New where water and blood issued out of Christ's side; and agreeably, as there is great probability to suppose, to Christ's own practice when he did first introduce this Holy Sacrament. Our Church forbids it not; for aught I know, and they that think fit may use it as some most eminent among us do at this day; yet for the approbation of our most common practice, which is to consecrate wine alone, we have all this on our side.'" Then he refers to certain authorities which are not in fact cited here. Now I say that every presumption is that it is according to the institution of Christ that a mixed chalice should be used. If it could be shown clearly that it was according to the institution of the Saviour that a mixed chalice should be used, then I apprehend the use of the mixed chalice would not only be lawful but it would be necessary. However, it is sufficient for me to show the strong probabilities there are that in point of fact our blessed Saviour did institute the blessed Eucharist with a mixed chalice; because I am quite sure that unless the Court feels satisfied that he did not, I am not going too far when I say that it would hesitate long before it would pronounce a judgment which should have the effect of declaring, although there is no prohibition against it in the Church of England, and although there cannot be a doubt the matter was de facto practised, and no prohibition or prosecution ever directed against it—yet that it would hold that because the mixed chalice is not by the present Prayer Book enforced in express terms (notwithstanding the fact that it requires reference in order that it may be fully carried out), it shall not be lawful to use the mixed chalice in the Church of England. Now I am going to read from the Sacra Privata of the Right Rev. Thomas Wilson, D.D., the last edition, page 53.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is very different, you know, from the early ones. There is much more in it; it is a much more perfect edition than the earlier ones.

(Mr. Prideaux.) This is a perfect edition, as I understand. It is the Oxford edition of 1853. The passage to which I wish to refer is at page 105. It is a prayer which he gives, "upon blessing the bread and wine and water upon the altar." Of course I do not propose to read the prayer, it would be very much out of place here for me to do so; but when we find that this most honoured and revered bishop, in his own "Sacra Privata," has prepared a prayer upon placing the bread and wine and water upon the altar, we cannot, I think, doubt what his practice was, or that he considered the practice to be legal. My Lord, with regard to the practice of Bishop Andrewes, I need not trouble you, I think, with that. My friend has very triumphantly referred to him—

(The Dean of the Arches.) I shall read those pamphlets to which you have referred me.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I think this is important in one way. It is the proclamation which King James issued. You will find at page 433 of Jeremy Collier's Ecclesiastical History, vol. 7, among the Injunctions issued by James was this:—"That the Communion be celebrated in due form with an oblation of every communicant, and admixing the water with the wine; the Communion to be as often used as it shall please the prince to set down." These are the Injunctions with reference to the service for the prince and his family at Madrid; and there is a previous part which I ought to have read which is very important, because it shows what King James and those who were advising him (among them Bishop Andrewes) considered at the time before the Injunctions which are numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, &c., was the practice of the Church of England. It says, "And that the face of the Church of England may appear and the worship be kept up in the prince's apartment at Madrid (that evidently means according to the Church of England) the King gave the chaplains above mentioned the following instructions." Your Lordship observes the use of the words "due form,"—evidently showing that the Injunction at any rate intended to refer to that which was the lawful legal practice of the Church of England, and not to introduce any special form for the special practice of the prince at Madrid, "that the Communion be celebrated in due form with an oblation of every communicant and admixing of the water with the wine." Then, on the following page, 434, after the various Injunctions or Articles, or whatever they are called, we find this:—"By these instructions the reader may perceive how careful the King was to guard on the side of religion, and that he was far from any intention of deserting the English Communion or laying a train to make his son a proselyte to the Church of Rome; and yet the ignorance or malice of some people did not stick to misinterpret the prince's voyage to such a desire." James also issued, as you are aware, a proclamation for uniformity. My friend says (and he seemed to regard it very triumphantly) that it is quite clear it is contrary to the Church of England to hold that the mixed chalice shall be used, and this argument applies to the mixture without reference to whether the water is to be placed in the wine during the ceremony or not, because the Catechism says that the outward and visible sign of the Lord's Supper is "bread and wine, which the Lord hath commanded to be received." Now I do not see that that helps my friend at all. In the first place it is clear that the Catechism did not intend to deal with anything but what the Lord had commanded to be received, and if it really be the fact that according to Christ's institution the Lord had commanded the mixed chalice to be received, it is perfectly clear my friend's argument could not be sustained. But I take it to be equally clear the word "wine" there could not have that meaning under circumstances in which there was great probability, to say the least, for believing that the Lord had instituted the Sacrament in bread and wine and water. Besides which, my Lord, we must remember that this part of the Catechism was written whilst the second Prayer Book was in force, and shortly after the Hampton Court conference—just about the time King James himself acting no doubt under the advice of his council and of his bishops, was issuing instructions to the ministers at Madrid to celebrate the Holy Communion with the mixed chalice. Can it, therefore, be supposed that when Bishop Overall wrote that part of the Catechism which, as I have said, was annexed to the Prayer Book shortly after the Hampton Court conference, he intended to put upon the word "wine" a different construction from that which was put upon the word by public documents of the State issued at that time and which was in accordance with the meaning of the word in the Prayer Books. Because your Lordship will do me the favour to bear this in mind, and it is an important point to bear in mind, especially having regard to the manner in which this case appears to have struck your Lordship, that the Catechism was written when the second Prayer Book was in force, and when therefore there was no difficulty involved in the matter by reason of the instruction which is contained in the Rubric of the present Prayer Book to put the bread and wine upon the communion table. Now I understand your Lordship to have said that having regard to the clear meaning of the word "wine" in the previous services, and having regard to the fact that there is no Rubric and nothing contained in the second Prayer Book to alter the meaning of that word, if I were arguing with reference to the second Prayer Book, there would be great weight and force in my observations. Then if so I may at any rate pray in aid the second Prayer Book for the purpose of interpreting what was meant by Bishop Overall when he wrote that part of the Catechism. If at that time the proper practice was that the mixed chalice should be used in the celebration of the blessed Communion at that time, at any rate the wine which was intended to be used was the wine of the mixed chalice. Then, according to every principle of interpretation, and according to every principle of common sense, placing yourself in the position in which Bishop Overall was, living among the circumstances and worshipping by the aid of the Prayer Book to which he was accustomed, of course the word "wine" must be taken to have been used in the same sense in the Catechism as your Lordship seems to think I have tolerably fairly established, it is to be taken that it was used so far as it is used at all under the second Prayer Book.

My Lord, there is another argument which my friend has used. He says, far from admitting (he is a bold man, and indeed the spirit of Protestantism must be bold in these matters) that there is any reason for supposing that our blessed Saviour consecrated the mixed chalice, he says that the mixed chalice is clearly contrary to the words of Scripture; one of the weakest and most extraordinary arguments that I ever heard.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is it necessary to go into this after the first Prayer Book of Edward VI.? Is it necessary to go into any scriptural argument? if you think it is, go on with it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) After that suggestion from your Lordship—

(The Dean of the Arches.) I make no suggestion; I only ask you whether you think it will help the question in any way?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I will just very briefly call your Lordship's attention to what I was going to say, and my observations will be extremely brief upon that after what has come from your Lordship. My friend referred to Matthew 26, v. 26-30; Mark 14, v. 22-26; Luke 22, v. 19-20; and I will refer you in addition to 1 Corinthians 11, v. 23-26. Those are the four places in which an account of the institution of the Lord's Supper is given. In every place the word used is in the Greek ποτήριον, in Latin "poculum," and in English "cup." It is very remarkable that you have not the contents of the cup called "wine" anywhere in scripture. Then the other reference is in 1 Corinthians 10, v. 16-21; and your Lordship is aware the verse 16 is "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the Communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not the Communion of the body of Christ?" And the 21st verse is "Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of devils: ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table and of the table of devils." And it is extremely remarkable that in every case where the institution of the blessed Eucharist is mentioned the word used is "cup:" as I have said "ποτήριον" in the Greek, "poculum" in the Latin, "cup" in the English. But then, says my friend, our blessed Saviour says, "I will drink no more of the fruit of the vine until that day that I drink it new in the kingdom of God." Now, my Lord, at Matt. 26-29, the words are not "fruit of the vine," they are "this fruit." τούτου τοῦ γεννήματος τῆς ἀμπέλου. It is τοῦ γεννήματος in Mark 14-26 where you have the same passage. There I admit the words are "the fruit of the vine;" but you must interpret the passages together, and the words which St. Matthew uses are, τούτου τοῦ γεννήματος τῆς ἀμπέλου "I will not drink again of this fruit." So that it becomes simply a question what was the contents of the cup to which our Lord referred, and which He there calls "This fruit of the vine." Now I think I need scarcely occupy your Lordship's time for the purpose of showing that according to all the most learned writers the cup of Benediction which the Jews used was a mixed cup. I have a book down here which gives the matter very shortly.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I daresay it will not be disputed. I do not know, I am sure, but I mean very likely it will not be disputed.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My friend says he admits nothing and disputes nothing. However, your Lordship is aware of this matter, and I will not trouble you further with it, because it is too clear to admit of argument. I was going to cite from "Ellsley's Annotations on the Gospels," where it is all inquired into, vol. i., page 416. The note upon the words "fruit of the vine," in Ellsley, same vol., page 420, is very short, and therefore I will read it. It is this: "The fruit of the vine. When the Jews blessed the cup" [that means the mixed cup to which I have already referred], "the form was 'Blessed be He that created the fruit of the vine;'" and so in the Roman Hymn, "Ave, ave, dulce merum," the same idea is expressed.

When we know how completely our blessed Saviour adhered to the old practices of the Jewish body at that time—when we find that our blessed Saviour was converting an old Jewish rite into the blessed Sacrament of the Body and Blood of the Redeemer—when we find that of which there really cannot be a doubt, that the very cup which our blessed Saviour used, unless he departed from the ordinary practice of the Jews (and no man was more scrupulous in obeying the law in all respects than our blessed Saviour was) must have been a mixed cup—when we find what our Saviour says is, "I will no more drink of this fruit of the vine," evidently pointing to the special contents of that cup; and when we find that, as part of the ceremony of the Jewish rite, at the very time when the cup of blessing was there, with the mixed contents in it, the language used was "Blessed be He that created the fruit of the vine," I must say I think it rather a bold thing for my friend to set himself against the testimony of the whole of Catholic antiquity, and against almost all the learning of ritual and ecclesiastical writers; and when that almost universal opinion amounts to a matter of certainty that the Church has always used the mixed chalice, and when it is almost matter of certainty that our blessed Saviour must have used the mixed chalice, I say it is rather a bold thing for my friend to suggest, as a matter upon which your Lordship is to decide this question, that the mixed chalice is contrary to the institution of Christ.

Now I propose to merely refer your Lordship to two very exhaustive and admirable pamphlets upon this question of the mixed chalice, namely, Greuber's and Littledale's.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have got a note of them both.

(Mr. Prideaux.) If your Lordship pleases. The only thing I propose to add besides is this—if I cannot find it now, no doubt you will allow me to hand up a copy some time before the case closes. It is a single sheet of paper which was furnished to me by some clergyman. I do not know who is the author, but it is a summary of the argument in defence of the mixed chalice, as applicable to the Church of England. It is a single page. I thought I had it here, but I do not find it at this present moment. I had proposed to hand it up to the Court. The very last statement in it probably goes a little further than is necessary for me to go, because it goes the length of insisting that the mixed chalice is necessary. I do not go that length, but with that exception I am prepared to endorse every statement which is made in that paper. I believe it to contain a very admirable summary of the arguments which may be fairly used in support of the mixed chalice in the Church of England. I had intended, as it is not long, to read it to your Lordship, but I have brought down another document instead. I cannot find it now, and therefore if your Lordship will allow me to hand it up on a future occasion, I will do so.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Certainly.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Therefore, my Lord, supplementing the observations I have made with the two pamphlets of Dr. Littledale and Mr Greuber, and this paper which I shall hope to have the honour of handing up to your Lordship, I am happy to say I have done with the mixed chalice.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Well, but you have done with all the subjects, have not you?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord; there is the question of Elevation which I left until last. I shall not be very long upon it. I suppose you will hardly go further to-night?

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not wish to curtail the arguments, but you must consider the enormous length to which this case has extended; your leader's argument was one day, yours has been two days and a half, I think.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My Lord, the other side occupied five days. It is impossible I can finish the subject of Elevation to night, and I daresay about a couple of hours to-morrow will be sufficient.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am sure, Mr. Prideaux, you won't think it necessary to go over again the arguments which your leader has used upon the subject of Elevation.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Certainly not, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you think that two hours argument in addition will be sufficient?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I think so. And, my Lord, with regard to the length of my observations I may make this apology, I rejoice that it is so, but probably if I were to make my remarks continuously without the benefit of suggestions from the Court I might not be so long. But then the inquiry would be less satisfactory to my clients.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then in that case I am particeps criminis.

(Mr. Prideaux.) In one sense perhaps, but I rejoice your Lordship has been so, because it has been the means of bringing out several points much more satisfactorily than would otherwise have been the case.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then I may take it that you and Dr. Tristram will finish to-morrow.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I think so, certainly.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I really must sit until 10 o'clock at night if you do not.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I will endeavour to relieve your Lordship from that unpleasant necessity.

Adjourned till to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

TENTH DAY.

Thursday, January 16th, 1868.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Your Lordship asked if I could refer you to any authority which showed or implied that the practice was to keep one lamp burning before the reserved Sacrament, and I stated that there was a passage in a very curious and learned and interesting work, published in the year 1673 in Paris, a Treatise on the Exposition of the Sacrament of the Altar; "Traité de l'Exposition du Saint Sacrement de l'Autel." It is a very interesting work, and I shall have occasion to refer to one or two passages of a very learned character; it is published at Paris by—

(The Dean of the Arches.) That book, perhaps, when you have done with it, may be lent to the Court.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord; it is a very curious and valuable work, it is not my own, but the reverend gentleman who lent it to me, will, I am sure, be very glad that it should be handed up to the Court.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Any book that is handed up to me, I wish to have a careful note taken of:

(Mr. Prideaux.) I shall have occasion to refer to the book once or twice, but considering the value of time, I shall not do so at any great length. It is a very interesting work, it gives a full account of the growth and progress of the procession of the Blessed Sacrament, and of the exposition of the Blessed Sacrament, and it is a most eloquent and enthusiastic protest against the abuse of those practices. But I refer now to a single passage in which he is speaking of the great mischief that resulted from the lavish and expensive processions. He says, in effect, "You expend all your means and resources upon these gorgeous processions, and leave your church in a state of dilapidation. You are deprived of your lights and various other ornaments which you ought to have." And then he goes on to say, "En fin leurs fabriques n'ont point de revenu pour entretenir une lampe tous jours ardente devant le sanctuaire ou repose l'Eucharistie." Your Lordship will find that at page 179 of the work, and the very protest is: "The consequence of those gorgeous, expensive, and constant processions is such, that you have not even your one lamp constantly burning before the Eucharist."

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are going to refer to that book again? I will not ask for it now, but should like to have it when you have done with it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I shall refer to it very shortly again, and then I will hand it up. I have put papers in the places immediately bearing upon the question which I am now discussing.

Your Lordship called attention to it, and I will say one word upon it. I do not think it is necessary to say more; probably my learned friend Dr. Tristram may say a word or two upon it also. Your Lordship very kindly called attention to the 5th chapter of the 22nd Session of the Council of Trent, and directed my attention to the fact that there was an article of the chapter "De missæ ceremoniis et ritibus," which clearly referred to the individual acts in the celebration of the Mass, and indeed it goes further, because it refers not only to lights and incense, but also to vestments. My answer to that is, that it is clear upon the context that the chapter in question is treating of the individual acts of ritual, and something more, because it is treating of all the ornaments and various things that are used in the celebration of the Mass. But I think your Lordship will find, I am so informed, at least, that where Roman Catholic writers speak generally "de ritibus," the words always mean "offices and services of the Church."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That may very well be so, but what do you say as to the words "ceremonias," because the words here are "institut ceremonias item adhibuit ut mysticas benedictiones lumina thymimata, vestes, aliaque id genus multa." My observation upon that would be this, that under the title "ceremoniæ" are included each of these individual elements?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Probably they are here.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I mean it is used in that sense there?

(Mr. Prideaux.) It would seem to be so here, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) My observation was, whether rites and ceremonies, being a translation of the Latin in our Prayer Book, must not be construed according to the known ecclesiastical meaning of the word ceremony.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not concede that that is the general known ecclesiastical meaning of the word. It is manifestly the meaning attributed here, in a canon passed by the Council of Trent at a subsequent date to the first Prayer Book, and just as the context shows here, that this particular chapter does speak of the ceremonial, I submit, that the context in the Prayer Book clearly shows that what is spoken of is an entire service.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Your answer in fact is, that "ceremonies" in the Prayer Book is used in a different sense from the word "ceremonie" in the Council of Trent?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, in the Prayer Book, and especially (which is what we have to do with here) in the penal clauses of the Acts of Uniformity.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It remains, however, still unanswered that "ceremoniæ" may properly be applied to individual constituents of a ceremony.

(Mr. Prideaux.) It is, and no doubt in this passage—your Lordship, however, may remember the words—"other rites and ceremonies" (I rely a good deal upon that) clearly showing that even the whole of the office of the Sacrament was covered by the words "rite or ceremony."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then I suppose you think the observation of the Court not inaccurate, as to the meaning of the word "ceremoniæ," used here in the Council of Trent?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Probably it would be that they mean something more, because they include even the ornaments. It deals with the details of the ceremony of the Mass.

My Lord, there is one other remark which I have to make here, namely, "The lamp to burn before the reserved Sacrament," occurs about 80 times in the Edwardian Inventories, between 1547 and 1548, as distinct from the two lights.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say there is mention of a lamp to be burnt before the reserved Sacrament in the Edwardian Inventories?

(Mr. Prideaux.) There is a mention of the lamp to be burnt before the reserved Sacrament in those Inventories.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Where shall I find that? I do not want you to go into them now, but perhaps by-and-by you will give me a reference to it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) By-and-by we will direct your Lordship's attention to it, but this information goes further in the Inventories of the diocese of London, and the Chancery Certificate Rolls of 1548-9. In the subsequent Inventories up to 1553 the lamp disappears, but the two lights continue.

(Mr. Stephens.) I think your Lordship will find the information given in the Church Review of 1865-6. It is a book I referred to, as your Lordship will remember.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Perhaps you would not object to handing me up that memorandum?

(Mr. Prideaux.) With great pleasure.

And now, with your Lordship's permission, I will deal with the question of Elevation, and I can assure you I will deal with it very briefly, because I am extremely desirous the defendant should have the full benefit of the observations of my friend, Dr. Tristram, who, I know, has directed his attention to certain points of importance bearing upon the case. I apprehend it is open at any rate for me to argue this, that you must put a construction upon the Article consistent with the citation; you must not carry the effect of the Article beyond what is fairly involved in the citation. Now the only charge in the citation is that of elevating the paten too high, and therefore no element of showing to the people, or of an intent that it shall be gazed upon, or of an intent that there shall be worship, must be incorporated into the Article.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Let us see what the exact words are, "By the elevation of the paten during, or after the prayer of consecration in the administration of the Holy Communion in his said church, in a greater degree and otherwise than by merely taking the same into his hands, as prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer, and in a greater degree than is necessary, in order to conform with the requirements of such book, and by permitting and sanctioning such elevation." Then the reformed Articles added—

(Mr. Prideaux.) The reformed Article says that he elevated it over his head.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Let me get the exact words, it will help me to understand the discussion. The reformed Article is, "Elevated the paten above his head, and permitted and sanctioned such elevation, and took into his hands the cup, and elevated it above his head during the prayer of consecration aforesaid, and permitted and sanctioned the cup to be so taken and elevated."

(Mr. Stephens.) I will admit there is that alteration and difference, but I will remind your Lordship that alteration was made in consequence of an express application from the opposite side.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It was. I very well recollect that I myself objected to the Article on the ground that it did not specify sufficiently, and it was altered in consequence.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That, my Lord, I accede to.

(The Dean of the Arches.) As I understand your argument, you do not dispute that it is competent to them to prove that the cup and paten were elevated above the head, but you say it is not competent for them to prove that it was done with the intention of worship.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say that the only charge is excess of action.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have already said that I cannot see that Mr. Mackenochie is charged with adoration; nor do I see that he is charged with lifting the paten with the intent that it should be worshipped?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Nor gazed upon?

(The Dean of the Arches.) Nor gazed upon. But I do see that it is charged that he elevated the paten above his head contrary to the Rubric.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That is to say, he is charged with excess of action?

(The Dean of the Arches.) With that peculiar excess of action?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes. The Decree says, "You elevated the cup and paten higher than was necessary to comply with the Prayer Book, and beyond merely taking it into your hand." There is nothing about "merely" in the Rubric. There is no direction except that the celebrant shall take it into his hand. Now I will not argue the point that an elevation is clearly contemplated by the Rubric in this part of the Prayer Book, because it is impossible the priest can take the paten into his hands, and having taken the paten into his hands, perform the Divine rite of consecration without lifting it and elevating it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Of course; everybody who takes something from a flat surface into his hand, unless he puts it back again, elevates it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) It is quite clear that is what Mr. Mackenochie means, when he says, "I shall give up that which the bishop and Convocation have thought it desirable I should not practise, because I feel that all I desire to do, namely, to perform that part of the Divine office which constitutes the elevation of the Sacrament God," is sufficiently indicated by the elevation which is directed in the Prayer Book, and the very citation recognises that elevation, but says: "You have elevated it to excess." Well, my Lord, can that be a criminal charge, bearing in mind (because that is specially what I want to ask your Lordship's attention to) that that is the only element of alleged offence in the Decree, I am clearly entitled to ask your Lordship to construe the Article so that it shall be consistent with the Decree.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think they are quite consistent—the Article and the Decree.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I think in that view of the case, having eliminated the intention of showing to the people, for the purpose of being gazed upon and worshipped, which ought to have been charged if it were intended, I may venture to say I have also myself come to the conclusion that they are consistent.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You see, Mr. Prideaux, it is competent for them to argue that they have not charged any intent of its being elevated for the purpose of being gazed upon or worshipped by the people, but still, that the necessary consequence of so raising it must be to produce an effect which the Prayer Book intended to prevent?

(Mr. Prideaux.) It may be competent to argue that as matter of evidence.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I mean to put it to you in this way: It appears to me, it is competent for them to say this: "We do not charge you with lifting the elements for the purpose of being gazed at or worshipped, but we do charge you with doing that act which is usually accompanied, where it is done, by the worshipping of the people." That may be a fair inference to draw from the fact, but if anything further than excess of action is intended at law, it ought to appear in the Decree.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That may be an inference drawn as matter of fact, but it cannot be drawn as matter of law.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is to say, "You are doing an action from which certain consequences have hitherto flown, whatever you have intended to do." That is an argument that may lie in their mouth.

(Mr. Prideaux.) This is the view I venture to submit to your Lordship. You know there is a difference (and I call your attention to this) between evidence and pleading. Facts may justify inferences as regards evidence, but if you seek to draw any inference beyond that, that is quite another matter.

(The Dean of the Arches.) They cannot charge the intent, I agree with you there. They cannot say, we have charged you here in this case with an intention which is not specified.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I think that is quite sufficient at present for my purpose.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But I think as at present advised, they may say, we say nothing about your intent, but you have done an act from which consequences flow which it was the object of the Prayer Book to prevent.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That may be; but still arises the question, whether that can be a criminal act. It is a mere question of excess of action.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Exactly, it is quite competent for you to argue that.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Could a priest be proceeded against for elevating his hands higher than is necessary when he is giving the blessing; could any proceedings be taken in the Archbishop's Court against a bishop, because he elevated his hands higher than was necessary, when about to confer the sacred rite of confirmation? Could any criminal proceedings be taken against the assistant priests at an ordination because they elevated their hands higher than necessary, in order to co-operate with the bishop in the imposition of hands at an ordination? It might be said, there, that the raising up of the hands very high intimated a sort of symbolical indication of bringing down from heaven some special sacramental grace.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You must bear in mind in your argument, what Dr. Tristram will be quite aware of, that in these criminal suits in the Ecclesiastical Courts irregularities as well as graver offences are corrected. The proceedings by Articles is the mode by which they are corrected. I mean you must be quite aware you cannot quite apply the analogies of the criminal law to these proceedings, because there are many instances of civil rights being established through the medium of criminal proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Courts, and all irregularities, except where the statute authorizes a different mode of procedure (1st and 2nd Victoria does, I think), would be corrected through this mode of proceeding. You must bear that in mind as you go on.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am much obliged to your Lordship; I leave my friend Dr. Tristram to deal with that.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I did not mean to interfere with your argument.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I will leave my friend Dr. Tristram, so far as he thinks it desirable, to deal specifically with that point.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There are a great many authorities which it is not necessary to cite for that position.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I desire to be as brief as I can, and will therefore leave that matter to Dr. Tristram, but I will remind your Lordship of one passage, which I daresay is familiar to you, in the judgment of Dr. Lushington, in the Knightsbridge case, as to the size of the candles. He says that is a matter which the Ecclesiastical Court cannot inquire into.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, that was a civil case.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, that was a civil case, but surely, a fortiori, the principle would apply to this case.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not say you cannot, but in this case it is not a question of the height and size of the candles.

(Mr. Prideaux.) It is a question of excess of action.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you mean to say that, because an excess of ornament cannot be inquired into, that therefore an excess of action cannot?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I mean to say there is an analogy between the two cases. I will now drop this part of the case, but I cannot conceive any state of things more applicable for the order to which your Lordship has referred, namely, the exercise of the discretion of the bishop, than this case. It is a mere excess of action.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you mean to say that this is a case which comes under what I may call the discretionary Rubric?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say, if it is to be interfered with at all, it is like deciding the colour of the altar cloths. If it is a matter to be interfered with at all, a mere excess of action is clearly a matter which comes within the discretion of the bishop, and the bishop has, perhaps not in the manner contemplated by the statute, de facto exercised his discretion, and Mr. Mackonochie has submitted to it, raising a very strong presumption that the bishop could not have intended to have this question considered in a criminal light.

Now, my Lord, I shall submit briefly that the elevation over the head is lawful according to the Church of England. No doubt some elevation (I will briefly submit that it does not refer to this) was forbidden by the first Prayer Book. Your Lordship will remember that the words are, "These words before rehearsed are to be said, still turning to the altar, without any elevation or showing the Sacrament to the people." Now, I will assume, for the sake of argument, that that elevation prohibited the elevation over the head as part of the action of the Divine mystery. I shall contend presently that it did not. I say that prohibition was withdrawn. It was withdrawn at the same time that divers other important alterations were made in the Prayer Book, in deference to the Puritan party, and may have been a sort of compromise, and withdrawn in deference to what I shall venture to call the Catholic party. Again, it was withdrawn at the same time that in some respects the Prayer Book was made more stringent, at the very time when kneeling was required, and the use of the fair linen cloth was required; and it may have been that these two things were enforced, and the prohibition against elevation was withdrawn, to check a spirit of irreverence with reference to the Sacrament which was springing up at that time. I do not say that it was so, but I suggest those two reasons as worthy of consideration—the one that the Prayer Book was prepared in a spirit of compromise, and that the omission of the prohibition was a concession to the Catholic party as a set-off against the great concessions that were made to the Puritan party; and the other, that the withdrawal of the prohibition, the enforcing of kneeling, and the enforcing the use of the fair linen cloth, were all with reference to checking a spirit of irreverence that was growing up at that time. But, my Lord, I will submit (and I shall be very short upon the point) that the elevation to God as part of the action of the Divine mystery was not forbidden by that Rubric. Your Lordship will observe that the words are very peculiar. They are, "These words, before rehearsed, are to be said, turning still to the altar, without any elevation or showing the Sacrament to the people." Now, it is quite clear that that Rubric was not intended to be taken in its strict letter, because the directions in that book, as in the present, that the priest was to take the bread and the wine into his hands, show that there must have been some elevation. The Rubric is, "Here the priest must take the bread into his hands." The only difference is that in the present book it is the paten; and, with reference to the wine, it is, "Here the priest shall take the cup into his hands." Therefore it is quite clear that all elevation was not forbidden.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The words are, "without any elevation," and you carry it on "to the people." I understand you to say that it should be read in this way—"turning still to the altar, without any elevation to the people."

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, I say the words "to the people" ride over the whole of the words "elevation or showing the Sacrament."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Your argument is that with "the priest standing with his back to the people" it might be elevated.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Quite so. I say it might be elevated as part of the Divine mystery, but not as an individual act.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The act that was prohibited, according to your theory, was the elevating to the people.

(Mr. Prideaux.) The elevating to the people, and I shall be able to show your Lordship that. Your Lordship will observe the words are very remarkable—"turning still to the altar." It is clear some elevation is allowed. The words are, "turning still to the altar, without any elevation or showing the Sacrament to the people." I need not remind your Lordship that a practice had sprung up, and is very general in the Greek Church, and is practised in the Roman Church, of showing the Sacrament to the people. In the Greek the words are, "Τὴ ἀγία τῶν ἀγίων;" and the Latin words are, "Ecce Agnus Dei, ecce qui tollit peccata mundi."

(The Dean of the Arches.) How is the evidence in this case with respect to that? Was it not that Mr. Mackonochie turned to the people with the Sacrament elevated?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Oh, nothing of the sort. I believe Mr. Mackonochie has never turned to the people. Mr. Mackonochie has done it as part of the Divine action.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is to be lamented that there was no question put to the witness on that point. There was not, was there?

(Mr. Stephens.) No, there was not.

(Mr. Prideaux.) At any rate it is not proved that he did.

(Mr. Stephens.) But, on the other hand, it is not to be taken that I admit anything that is not proved.

(Mr. Prideaux.) It is the fact that he never does. If it will be any satisfaction to your Lordship I will prove it. What he does is this:—Contemporaneously with the words "This is my body," he elevates to God the consecrated elements.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is to be lamented that no question was put to the witness by those who intended to argue this part of the case.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I will cure that defect if your Lordship wishes it.

(Mr. Stephens.) My Lord, I shall be perfectly content, if Mr. Mackonochie would just rise in court and say what he did, to take that as evidence.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Will you consent to that, Mr. Prideaux? I must take it by consent of both sides.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am quite content. I know perfectly well the practice of that Church.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I must have it by consent.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I consent that Mr. Mackonochie should state whether he does or does not turn round to the people. Perhaps you will have the kindness just to state that, Mr. Mackonochie?

(The Dean of the Arches.) If both counsel consent that Mr. Mackonochie should make a statement as to his practice in this matter of elevation, there being no evidence before me as to the exact character of the elevation, I am quite content to take the statement.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am quite content.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am content to do so. Let your Lordship put any question to Mr. Mackonochie that you wish, and I will take his answer.

(Mr. Prideaux.) It is not charged, but if it will be any satisfaction to anybody, Mr. Mackonochie will stand up and say what the practice is. Will you have the kindness, Mr. Mackonochie, just to stand up and tell my Lord, whether when you elevate the elements, you turn round to the people?

(Mr. Mackonochie.) No, my Lord, I do not turn round to the people, and never have done so.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I will tell you the note I have made. Mr. Mackonochie says, "I do not turn round to the people, and never have done so." I take down this evidence, counsel on both sides agreeing to my doing so.

(Mr. Stephens.) At any time during the consecration prayer?

(Mr. Mackonochie.) No.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Very well, I will add that, "I do not turn round to the people, and I have never done so at any time during the consecration prayer." And I have made a note of my own, "I take down this evidence, counsel on both sides agreeing to my doing so." That will appear upon the minutes.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Now it appears from this Rubric, that a practice had sprung up of turning from the altar and elevating and showing the Sacrament to the people. Something very analogous to it is done now in the Greek Church, and also in the Roman Church; but your Lordship is aware that the ceremonies of the Mass were reviewed and reformed in the Council of Trent, and that may explain why the exact thing is not done now in the Church of Rome. But I understand the Holy Father, even now, when he consecrates in person, immediately after pronouncing the words of the consecration, turns round with the blessed Sacrament in his hands, and exhibits it to the people. Your Lordship will find that stated in a very interesting paper, in the October number of the Dublin Review. So that whilst the exact practice which is apparently pointed to here may not perhaps exist now, because it is subsequent to the time we are speaking of that the priest turns round and holds up the Sacrament in the Roman Church, namely, at the "Ecce agnus Dei," when the Communion is about to be taken, still that is an index to explain the exact prohibition contained in those words.

Now I will call your Lordship's attention (because it is very important to contrast the two) to the language of the prohibition issued only a year before.

(The Dean of the Arches.) This authority you refer me to is a proof that the Pope, when he celebrates himself, does turn round.

(Mr. Prideaux.) He does turn round immediately upon consecrating the elements. He turns and elevates them.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do I understand that is a peculiarity of the Pope?

(Mr. Prideaux.) That now is the peculiarity of the Pope; it is only done when the Pope consecrates himself. The practices of the ceremonies of the Mass were reformed at the Council of Trent, and probably at that time the practice which was springing up was made not general. Now I desire to call your Lordship's attention to the language of the Prohibitory Rubric in the "Order of Communion," which was issued, as your Lordship is aware, a little more than a year before the first Prayer Book. You are aware, for the purpose of securing the old Catholic practice of administering in both kinds to the laity, a sort of supplemental direction, called the "Order of Communion," was issued, and in that order it was directed that the wine should be delivered to the people; and there is a Rubric providing for the consecration of more wine if that which has already been consecrated is not sufficient. That Rubric is in these terms: "Note, that if it doth so chance, that the wine hallowed and consecrate doth not suffice or be enough for them that do take the Communion, the priest, after the first cup or chalice be emptied, may go again to the altar, and reverently and devoutly prepare and consecrate another, and so the third or more likewise, beginning at these words, Simili modo postquam cœnatum est, and ending at these words, qui pro vobis et pro multis effundetur in remissionem peccatorum, and without any levation or lifting up."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Here it is "levation."

(Mr. Prideaux.) It is "levation." It means the same thing evidently as "elevation." Your Lordship will see there is nothing about "without turning round to the people." There is no direction of this sort, "without elevating and showing to the people there," but there is a positive prohibition, "without any elevation or lifting up." Now it is difficult to understand that within little more than a year, such different language should be used in two prohibitory Rubrics, if the same thing were meant, and I venture to submit to your Lordship, the real explanation of the words in the "Order of Communion" is simply this,—that the Divine mystery had already been performed; the Divine action had been completed; the lifting up to God had already taken place. The subsequent consecration was simply for the purpose of Communion, and the subsequent consecration being simply for the purpose of Communion, and the Divine mystery having been already celebrated, that which was essentially a part of the Divine mystery, but which was perhaps not essentially a part for the mere purpose of Communion—

(The Dean of the Arches.) Both of these Rubrics forbid the lifting up.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes. But the one forbids the lifting up in general terms; the other forbids the lifting up and showing to the people; and I say they point to different things, and they show that the lifting up and elevating is recognized as part of the Divine action. In the order of Communion, where the Divine action has been already completed, where the symbolical lifting up to God has been already effected, where the object is Communion, not celebration, the elevation is forbidden in general terms; whereas, in this second prohibition, the elevation is not forbidden in general terms, but what is forbidden is the turning towards the people, and elevating and showing the Sacrament to the people. And, my Lord, the very Injunctions and Visitation Articles which my friend referred to bear out this view. For example, let us take the articles to be followed and observed according to the King's Majesty's Injunctions, upon which my friend relied. I believe there is no satisfactory proof of the date of them; the only evidence is, that they were clearly issued after the Prayer Book, or that they were based upon any Royal Injunctions legally constituted.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What Injunctions are those?

(Mr. Prideaux.) They are at page 75 of Cardwell's Documentary Annals, No. 17. Now I say the object here was, to forbid such ceremonial acts in the celebration of the Lord's Supper, as it was thought expedient, (they were going ahead of the Prayer Book,) in the exercise of the power of the Crown and the Bishops to forbid.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I put the question to counsel during the course of this discussion as to the authority of these Injunctions. It may be worth while to observe, that in that letter of Archbishop Parker in Queen Elizabeth's time to Cecil, I think, he says that the Injunctions derive their validity from the Statute,

I observe he says so. He thinks it very improper that any question should be raised as to whether the Injunctions per se have any legal authority or not. But the Injunctions of Queen Elizabeth have authority by the Statute.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not see that, because the formalities to give them effect under the Statute were evidently not complied with.

(The Dean of the Arches.) If anything is to turn upon it, you will find the letter of Archbishop Parker to Sir William Cecil, dated January 8th, 1571, set out at page 81 of the English Church Union case, "They that like not the Injunction force much the Statute in the Book. I tell them that they do evil to make odious comparisons between Statutes and Injunction, and yet I say and hold that the Injunction hath authority by proviso of the Statute."

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am much obliged to your Lordship for calling my attention to it. I do not accede to it, because supposing the Statute to have been still in existence at that time, the necessary formalities were not complied with. I will read the second of these articles if your Lordship pleases. "Item, for an uniformity, that no minister do counterfeit the Popish Mass." I pray your Lordship to observe the things that really are forbidden in terms, "as to kiss the Lord's table; washing his fingers at every time in the Communion; blessing his eyes with the paten or sudary; shifting of the book from one place to another; laying down and licking the chalice of the Communion; holding up his fingers, hands, or thumbs, joined towards his temples; breathing upon the bread or chalice; showing the Sacrament openly before the distribution of the Communion."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is the date of those Injunctions given?

(Mr. Prideaux.) The alleged date here is 1549; but the matter has been very carefully considered, and your Lordship will observe (I have no doubt you did notice it) that the only elevation forbidden in the "Order of the Communion" is the elevation upon the second consecration of the cup.

(The Dean of the Arches.) In what order of Communion?

(Mr. Prideaux.) In the first order of the Communion. I will just call attention to that. That very order of the Communion says that all the previous part of the Mass is to be celebrated as it was before. Therefore it is quite clear that there was no intention there to prohibit the elevation during the performance of the Divine Service.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Let me understand what you say about this. You are now speaking of the "Order of the Communion" preceding the first Prayer Book? Let me understand your argument.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My argument is simply this—I was venturing to suggest to your Lordship why the elevation of the cup upon the second consecration was forbidden, and I say that although there is a positive forbidding of any "elevation" of the cup upon the second consecration, it is perfectly clear, inasmuch as it is provided in that very order, that the ceremony of the Mass was in all respects to be performed as it was before, that the previous elevation was not intended to be forbidden, and that the only elevation forbidden was the elevation upon the second consecration of the cup, and that is forbidden in general terms, and not with reference only to turning to the people. I ventured to suggest to your Lordship why that was.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have got a note of your argument.

(Mr. Prideaux.) In these Injunctions, bearing out my contention as to the true construction of the Rubric in the first Prayer Book, among other things that are forbidden is, "showing the Sacrament openly before the distribution of the Communion."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Does that exhaust the catalogue of the actions "whereby the popish Mass may be counterfeited?"

(Mr. Prideaux.) I will finish the Injunctions: "Ringing of sacring bells, or setting any light upon the Lord's board at any time." That is a point I mean to deal with. This is taken from Burnet, and Burnet gives no date.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Incorporated by Cardwell, and with no authority but Burnet.

(Mr. Prideaux.) It says, "Ex M.S. Johnson apud Burnet, Hist. Reform., vol. ii., app. p. 165."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is your argument with regard to this enumeration of things counterfeiting the popish Mass that all things therein specified counterfeited the popish Mass?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, I do not inquire into that.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What am I to do with the authority you cite?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I cite it simply for the purpose of showing, that so far as the question of elevation is concerned, the only elevation that is forbidden is, "the showing of the Sacrament openly before the distribution of the Communion." I dare say these things were practised in the popish Mass, but we are not dealing with them now. There is no charge about them.

(The Dean of the Arches.) If you quote it for one purpose must not it have its bearing upon the question of lights also?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am quite willing that it should have. One of my positions is, that these Injunctions and other matters show that there was an intention shortly after the Prayer Book to get rid of the lights. There may have been or not. But what I say is that these are of no binding authority. But even prohibiting what was intended to be prohibited here, so far throws a light on the Rubric of the Prayer Book. "Showing the Sacrament openly before the distribution of the Communion, ringing of sacring bells, or setting any light upon the Lord's board at any time." That is at any rate too wide, because Dr. Lushington concedes that the lights may be set there if it is dark. "And finally, to use no other ceremonies than are appointed in the King's Book of Common Prayers, or kneeling otherwise than is in the said book." Another set of Injunctions upon this point puts the thing more clearly still, and those are Ridley's Injunctions, dated 1550. I take it they are of no legal effect, and they certainly cannot go further than this, that they show that Ridley was presuming to exercise his discretion in these matters. And, my Lord, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in giving their judgment in the Westerton case, said that Ridley's Injunctions were of no force probably even in his own diocese. Not that I think that is very material for the argument that I am using.

I call your Lordship's attention now to the prohibition. It is very similar, but it states the thing more clearly, and shows that what is meant is not the elevation to God in the celebration of the mystery, but some subsequent showing of the Sacrament to the people. That is the second item. "Item. That no minister do counterfeit the popish Mass," &c. As I am desirous of saving time, I will not repeat those same things which it goes through. "Breathing upon the bread or chalice, saying the 'Agnus' before the Communion, showing the Sacrament openly before the distribution, or making any elevation thereof."

Now, inasmuch as we all know that before the priest communicates in the Roman Church, (and it was the same under the Salisbury Missal,) he does say secretly the "Agnus Dei," and that before he communicates the people, he holds up the blessed Sacrament to their view, and says, "Ecce Agnus Dei, ecce qui tollit peccata mundi," I say it is perfectly clear upon this second Injunction, that the only thing which was prohibited there was that "showing to the people." But there is one other Injunction which interprets the thing entirely, and it is an Injunction by a man who would have been as likely as any man to go as far as he possibly could; I allude to Grindal, Archbishop of York.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have got that passage from the judgment of the Privy Council. It is in page 182. "This Injunction extended only to Ridley's own diocese, and probably had no binding force even there."

(Mr. Prideaux.) Your Lordship, I believe, followed me in the observations that I made about Ridley's Injunctions of 1550?

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes. As I understood you, they did not carry the matter much further than these.

(Mr. Prideaux.) On the contrary. I say it shows more clearly that what was sought to be prohibited was the showing the Sacrament to the people, and that is put beyond the shadow of a doubt by the Articles under date of 1571 of Grindal, Archbishop of York, because there he interprets the words, and shows that I am right in the construction that I venture to put upon them. I refer your Lordship to Grindal's Injunctions, Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 369: "That for the ministration of the Communion bread they should not deliver it unto the people into their mouths,"—that is important, because it shows how the old practices clung to the clergy, and therefore you may be sure that all these old practices which were not forbidden were allowed,—"but into their hands, nor should use at the ministration of the Communion any gestures, rites, or ceremonies not appointed by the Book of Common Prayer, as crossing or breathing over the sacramental bread or wine, nor any showing or lifting up of the same to the people to be by them worshipped or adored." Now that I think must be said to be almost conclusive as to the construction of the Rubric, because there in terms unmistakable the "lifting up" is applied to the people as well as the "showing."

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say it is conclusive as to the meaning of "elevation" being confined to elevation to the people?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Conclusive as to its being confined to elevation to the people, which was forbidden in the first book, and which was sought to be forbidden from time to time afterwards.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say it is conclusive as to the meaning of the elevation being confined to that which was prohibited in the first book?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, I say so. The construction of the words is such that it is impossible to mistake it. "Nor any showing or lifting up of the same to the people to be by them worshipped or adored, nor any such like." Now, my Lord, that elevation was an early practice in the Church, I think there cannot be much doubt.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Which elevation are you speaking of?

(Mr. Prideaux.) The elevation to God.

(The Dean of the Arches.) When you say that elevation was the practice of the early Church, you are speaking of the limited elevation, and not of the other elevation?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am speaking of the elevation to God, as distinguished from the "elevating and showing to the people." I think the question of oblation, in other words, that which we find recognized in every Liturgy, from the earliest to the present time, in the prayer of oblation—

(The Dean of the Arches.) I only wanted to understand you. The authorities which you are about to cite as to the primitive practice, are to show that the elevation, not to the people but to God was a primitive practice?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say that the elevation to God, as distinct from the elevation to the people, was a very early practice, if not a primitive practice. Burnet, in his very last exposition of the 28th Article, says that it began to be practised in the sixth century; and, what is further important, he says that the object of it at first was not worship, but to symbolise the lifting up of Christ on the Cross. You will find it in the very last paragraph on Article 28. In Dr. Littledale's "Essay upon the Elevation of the Host," to which I shall venture to refer as part of my argument, page 10, he gives a passage from St. Cyprian, and it is a passage of great weight.

(The Dean of the Arches.) St. Cyprian's letters?

(Mr. Prideaux.) His letter to Cæciliamus on the mixed chalice; and the great value of it is, that he is dealing with the mixed chalice; and, therefore, his recognition of the oblation to God, incidentally, is entitled to the greater weight. The passage is this—"If Jesus Christ our Lord and God is himself the High Priest of God the Father, and first offered himself as a sacrifice to the Father, and commanded this to be done in remembrance of him; then, doubtless, that priest who imitates what Christ did truly acts in his stead, and offers a true and full sacrifice in the Church to God the Father, if he begin to make the oblation exactly as he sees that Christ did." Then, after explaining why the first Eucharist, contrary to the later wont, took place in the evening, he adds, speaking of Christ, "Let the lifting up of my hands be as the evening sacrifice; and since we commemorate His passion in all our sacrifices (for the Lord's passion is the sacrifice we offer), we ought to do nothing except what He did." St. Cyprian is arguing only for the mixed chalice, but the context shows that he believed the gesture of lifting the hands to have formed part of the primeval institution of the Holy Eucharist."

(The Dean of the Arches.) But that passage does not show what part of the lifting up of the hands it was, whether it was to the people, or whether it was, as you say, to God?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord; but I shall show you that by referring (and it is the only one I mean to read) to the consecration prayer in the very earliest of the Greek Liturgies. "He is arguing only for the mixed chalice, but the context shows that he believed the gesture of lifting the hands to have formed part of the primeval institution of the Holy Eucharist" (and your Lordship will see, when you read this pamphlet, that the pamphlet is dealing with the action of the celebrant) "as indeed must have been the case, unless the Jewish ritual had been deviated from on that occasion." That is important. "These testimonies bring the inquiry down near to the beginning of the fourth century, the very latest date that can be ascribed to the final settlement of the liturgical forms of the early Church, and as they exhibit an unbroken tradition they are conclusive against any theory of interpolation which may attempt to do away with the witness of the Liturgies." The weight and value of that argument is, that St. Cyprian, arguing for another purpose, says "that we ought to celebrate the divine office as Christ did it." I believe all persons who have attended to the subject are satisfied with the proofs which the late Dr. Neale gave that the Liturgy of St. James must have been written about the year 50 of our Lord. Whether that be so or not, one thing is quite clear, that the Liturgy of St. James is a very early Liturgy; and if your Lordship pleases, with your permission, I will show what the tradition of the Church upon this point was by a short quotation from that liturgy: "λαβὼν τὸν ἄρτον ἐπὶ τῶν ἁγίων καὶ ἀχράντων καὶ ἀμόμων καὶ ἀθανάτων αὐτοῦ χειρῶν, ἀναβλέψας εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν, καὶ ἀναδείξας σοὶ τῷ Θεῷ καὶ Πατρὶ, εὐχαριστήσας, ἀγιάσας, κλάσας ἔδωκε ἡμῖν τοῖς αὐτοῦ μαθηταῖς καὶ ἀποστόλοις, εἰπὼν, Λάβετε, φάγετε· τοῦτό μου ἐστὶ τὸ σῶμα, τὸ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν κλωμένον καὶ δίδόμενον εἰς ἄφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶν."

Your Lordship will observe the word, "ἀναδείξας." That would be having lifting up.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That would be the act equivalent to "showing it to the people?"

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, my Lord, the words are, "ἀναδείξας σοὶ τῷ Θεῷ καὶ Πατρὶ."

(The Dean of the Arches.) You must remember the circumstances.

(Mr. Prideaux.) The people might have been able to see it; but the question is, whether it was "showing to the people." I quote that as a proof, because St.

Cyprian says, "We ought to celebrate this divine rite as our Lord did."

(The Dean of the Arches.) But St. Cyprian does not say whether this is "showing to the people," or not?

(Mr. Prideaux.) He does not suggest that it is. He is evidently speaking of the offering to God.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It might be both?

(Mr. Prideaux.) It might incidentally be both; but the question is, what was the object of the Divine rite? It cannot be supposed for a moment that the Saviour did it for the purpose of showing it to his disciples. He was making the offering to God. "Ἀναδείξας σοὶ τῷ Θεῷ καὶ Πατρὶ." Not a word about "showing to the people." In the Greek Church the exposition to the people is afterwards. It is quite clear what the object of it was there. This is a narrative of what our Saviour did, and the mere fact that the people saw it cannot make it a "showing to the people." I believe in the Basilican Church, the priest faced the people; and a characteristic of the Greek Church was, that at a subsequent time where the words are "Τὰ ἅγια τοῖς ἀγίοις."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do I understand you to say, Mr. Prideaux, that in the Greek Church the elevation is to the people?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say that is a distinct thing. It is what follows afterwards. There are two elevations, which are called the "lesser elevation" and the "greater elevation," in modern times.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is this particular elevation to the people, according to the Greek Church, at the time of the consecration?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, not to the people. That is an elevation to God.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you mean in the Greek Church that the priest's back is turned to the people?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Your Lordship is aware that in the Greek Church there are the holy doors. It is before he comes to the holy doors that this is done, and afterwards he comes out with the Sacrament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The doors are closed in the Greek Church?

(Mr. Prideaux.) The doors are closed in the Greek Church at this time, so that it could not be an elevation to the people.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Unless you are quite aware of the mode of procedure in the Greek Church you had better not found an argument upon it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I understand from Dr. Littledale, who knows the practices of the Greek Church, I believe, as well as he does those of the English Church, that the doors are closed, and that a curtain is drawn at this time. Afterwards there is an elevation to the people.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not see how that supports you. The only elevation that is seen is the elevation to the people in the Greek Church. It is quite true the doors are closed and the curtain is drawn. Everybody knows that who has seen the Greek Church, but the only elevation that is seen, as it appears to me, is the elevation to the people.

(Mr. Prideaux.) But can it affect the question of the character of what our Saviour did, or of the particular character of the elevation that takes place, whether it is seen by the people or not?

(The Dean of the Arches.) That may be, but I thought you were citing an authority to show that the primitive elevation was not an "elevation to the people." That authority you cite, I say, appears to prove the contrary.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am citing these authorities to show that there was an elevation which was in its essence and in its character an elevation to God, and not to the people; and that it was so done, carrying out the principle laid down by St. Cyprian, namely, that we ought to do that which Christ did in instituting the Ordinance. Then, my Lord, you have the same words with regard to the cup: "Ὡσαύτως μετὰ τὸ πίνειν, λαβὼν τὸ ποτήριον, καὶ κέρασας ἐξ οἴνου καὶ ὕδατος, καὶ ἀναβλέψας εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν, καὶ ἀναδείξας σοὶ τῷ Θεῷ καὶ Πατρὶ."

(The Dean of the Arches.) During that time the doors are closed and the curtain is closed.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Those are instructions as to what the priest is to do when the people are, so to speak, shut out.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No doubt, my Lord, that is so.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then the doors are opened.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Then the doors are opened, and then, as a separate act, which I say is what was forbidden in our Church, there is an intentional exhibition to the people, and not to God.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then the practice of the Greek Church which you are citing is exactly the practice which you say is forbidden in the English Church.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No doubt the subsequent exhibition of the Sacrament in the Greek Church was forbidden in that Rubric. I don't deny that, but I don't admit that it is forbidden now, and I say, moreover, that is not what is charged against Mr. Mackonochie. What Mr. Mackonochie is charged with is the elevation to God, and my friend Mr. Coleridge admitted it in his address to your Lordship. "I do not deny," he said, "that it is an elevation to God."

Then, my Lord, you will find the same thing (I will not trouble you by reading it) in page 160 in the Liturgy of St. Basil. Besides which, I ought, in fairness, to make this suggestion, that although they have the curtains to the doors in the Greek Church now, it does not follow that they had it in the early period to which I am referring.

(The Dean of the Arches.) They certainly have now.

(Mr. Prideaux.) No doubt. But according to my view of the case it is not material. My contention is, that we read in the history of the Church of two elevations; one an elevation which is part of the Divine action of the mystery, and which is called the "oblation," and which is recognized in all the prayers of oblation; the other, which is something separate and distinct, and which is a "showing to the people." And therefore I say that there is evidence that there was an elevation to God, an oblation. I call the oblation the elevation to God and I say it is evident there was an oblation and an elevation to God at a very early period. That, I say, has never been forbidden, and if it ever was forbidden the prohibition is withdrawn. It was undoubtedly the practice according to the ancient common ecclesiastical law of England at the time of the Reformation; and therefore, unless it be forbidden, it is lawful now.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you say there were two elevations in the Church of England before the Reformation? The two you have been speaking of, the elevation, and the showing to the people.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord, and I say that there are now in the Church of Rome, because there is the exhibition to the people before Communion.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I want to understand your argument. You say the practice of the Church of England before the Reformation was to have two elevations, one which you call the "oblation to God," and the other which you call the "showing to the people."

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, there were two, one at the time of consecration, and the other the elevation before Communion. No doubt the Rubric in the first book points to a practice which was springing up of turning round and elevating to the people immediately after the consecration.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Springing up! Was not it practised before?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Not exactly. What I mean is, the turning round and showing to the people does not follow immediately after the words of consecration, but it follows after the priest has communicated, in the Roman Church. My contention is, and especially when you contrast the words with the prohibition in the "Order of the Communion," that prohibition in the first Prayer Book clearly does not point to the elevation in the progress of the celebration of the Divine mystery, but to something separate and distinct which took place when the priest turned round (it is not material to my argument exactly when) after the consecration.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then the oblation was before consecration?

(Mr. Prideaux.) The oblation is contemporaneous with the consecration in fact. The oblation is the very thing, evidently, which is complained of here, because they say it was when he took the paten into his hands.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you say it is during the progress of consecration?

(Mr. Prideaux.) During the progress of consecration, as the witness said, "substantially contemporaneous with the words 'This is my body.'"

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then the oblation is in the progress of consecration?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, it is part of the act. It is all one act.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The oblation is in the progress of and is part of the act of consecration.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord. I say the oblation is part of the act of consecration.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And that you say is distinct from the showing to the people, which was subsequent to consecration?

(Mr. Prideaux.) It was subsequent to consecration, and it would seem to have followed immediately after at that time, as is clearly indicated by the Rubric, directing, in fact, that there shall be no such elevation.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then you say it is the second elevation that the Rubric prohibited?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes. I say it prohibited all elevation, except that which is part of the prayer of consecration; and, moreover, that such prohibition as there was is withdrawn.

Then my friend says it is contrary to the 28th Article. Now my friend has addressed your Lordship upon that, and I shall have very little to say in addition; but one thing is quite clear, that the Articles speak in no uncertain language, and where they mean to pronounce against a thing they do it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You had better read the end of that Article.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes. The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance "reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then your contention is, that the Article does not actually contain a prohibition, but that it does contain a statement?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But supposing it to be a prohibition by implication, it would prohibit all those four things, "reserving, carrying about, lifting up, and worshipping?"

(Mr. Prideaux.) It would not prohibit all reservation, because your Lordship will recollect that under Elizabeth's Latin Prayer Book reservation was permitted. It would not prohibit all elevation, because your Lordship will remember that by the present Prayer Book an elevation is directed. I shall insist upon this view before your Lordship, that what is not prohibited there, but what is declared not to be required by the Ordinance of Christ, is that system of reservation and honour of the blessed Sacrament which arose out of the Feast of "Corpus Christi," and the Institution of "the Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That Article should be compared with that of the Council of Trent, should it not?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord. I am about to call your Lordship's attention to a clause in the Council of Trent which will throw a great deal of light upon it. Your Lordship asked whether the words were "or" or "and." I do not know whether that is very material, but in the ordinary editions it is "or;" but it is very remarkable that in Sparrow's edition, and in Burnet, who took some pains to be accurate, it is "and." I have them both here, and will refer your Lordship to them.

(The Dean of the Arches.) My own impression is that it was "or." It is "or" in my edition.

(Mr. Prideaux.) It is not so in Burnet. I am now reading from the Oxford edition of Burnet, Clarendon Press, 1819, page 415. Your Lordship is aware that Burnet has a very elaborate preface, showing the pains that he had taken to have the correct wording. "The Sacrament was not, by Christ's ordinance, reserved, carried about, lifted up, and worshipped." I have a copy of Sparrow's collection here. I am reading from the second edition, enlarged, 1671, page 102. "The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not, by Christ's ordinance, reserved, carried about, lifted up, and worshipped." The Latin is, "Sacramentum Eucharistiæ, ex institutione Christi, non servabatur, circumferabatur, elevabatur nec adorabatur." It does not strike me that the distinction is very material. It is very curious that the Latin is the same in Edward's Articles as in these, but the translation is different, because in Edward's Articles the translation is, "The Sacrament was not commanded by Christ's ordinance—"

(The Dean of the Arches.) In the Latin version that you have read it would be "or?"

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes; and the "or" does occur in the Edwardian copy. I do not think it is very material, but I suggest two things—first, that probably that Rubric was to a certain extent apologetic, it came out almost contemporaneously with the second Prayer Book, and your Lordship will observe that the prohibition against elevation, as I submit, for one reason, in deference to the Catholic party in the Church, had been withdrawn, and the Article explains that, and says, "Although we withdraw it, we do not mean to say that the practice is ordered. You (the Puritan party) must not be angry with us for withdrawing it, for we do not mean to say that the practice is ordered." But, my Lord, it is clear that when the Articles intend to assert a thing they do not speak with any uncertain sound. They speak clearly, and I might refer almost to all the Articles in support of that assertion; but I would only ask your Lordship to compare the language of this Article with that of the 24th, where a thing is intended to be declared as contrary to the Word of God: "It is a thing plainly repugnant to the Word of God and the custom of the primitive church to have public prayer in the church, or to minister the Sacraments, in a tongue not understood by the people." I pray your Lordship to contrast the positive language of that Article with the language of the present Article. It is no doubt unfortunate that these Articles have been by man's ingenuity twisted and perverted into pegs to hang all sorts of heresies upon; but if you look carefully at them, you will find that it is a slander upon them to say that they do not assert clearly what they mean.

(The Dean of the Arches.) King James congratulated himself upon the Articles, because he says that everybody can make them mean what they wish?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes; and it is not part of my case to object to that construction of them. But I say a wrong conclusion has been drawn, and whereas it is said, "Christ did not command so-and-so," people have jumped to the conclusion that he forbade it. I say where the Articles intended to denounce anything they do it in express terms. Let us test it by one or two illustrations. Suppose the Article had said, "The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not, by Christ's ordinance, administered in the morning," would that have been tantamount to saying that it should not be administered in the morning? If so, the Church of England is continuously guilty of Popish superstition. I will only give your Lordship one more instance, and one is as good as a hundred. Suppose the Article had said, "The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance received kneeling," (there is an express injunction that it shall be received kneeling,) could it be said that an Article which left the matter open for parties to receive kneeling or not amounted to a prohibition against kneeling? Now, my Lord, upon that point I cannot resist the pleasure of reading to your Lordship one passage from Cranmer's letter upon kneeling.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is this to prove? What proposition do you cite it in support of?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Simply to show that Cranmer's opinion was that a large number of the heresies of the day arose out of the notion that whatever was not commanded by Scripture was necessarily forbidden.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Does that bear upon your present point?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I will not take up your Lordship's time with it, but it is a letter which you will find at the 58th page of Mr. Perry's book on Kneeling.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is the great argument through that runs Hooker's book?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes. Then I say it is impossible to argue fairly, that because they thought fit in the Articles to declare that it was not commanded by Christ, that the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper should "be reserved, carried about, lifted up, and worshipped," which I say cannot mean "elevation," because "elevation" was ordered by Elizabeth's Prayer Book, and had been ordered before.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say it does not amount to a prohibition?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I say it does not amount to a prohibition; but I say also that it has no bearing at all upon the elevation as part of the Divine office. If your Lordship will allow me I will just call your attention to a few dates which are important. I contend that that article is pointed against the abuse of the Sacrament, which was at that time very general, so much so that it is complained of in that French book—the "Treatise on the Exposition of the Sacrament," to which I have had the honour of directing your Lordship's attention. It arose out of the comparatively recent institution of the Feast of Corpus Christi, and out of the institution of the Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament. Those were practices entirely confined to the Western Church, and I shall have little more to do than to direct your Lordship's attention to a few dates, and then to refer to the book which I have already mentioned for the purpose of maintaining that position. It appears from this book that the Feast of Corpus Christi was instituted by Pope Urban the 4th in the year 1264. The original office, as your Lordship is aware, for the celebration of the feast, was prepared by St. Thomas Aquinas. There is no trace, either in the institution of the feast, or in the office used, of procession or exposition; but it appears that the institution of the feast led first to procession in the Church, and then to procession generally, the blessed Sacrament being all the time veiled. Subsequently to this we find they used transparent monstrants, so that the Holy Sacrament might be seen and gazed upon by the people, which practice of carrying the blessed Sacrament in transparent monstrants in the ceremonies on that day led subsequently to the exposition of the Sacrament, now called "the Exposition of the Blessed Sacrament," on the altar on the day in question, and subsequently to the exposition of the blessed Sacrament on the altar on other days. In other words, it led to the whole practice of "reserving, carrying about, lifting up, and worshipping the blessed Eucharist," which is the matter so dealt with by that Article, and against which that Article is directed. You will find the whole history of this matter (it is quite peculiar to the Western Church, there is nothing analogous to it in the Eastern Church) in the 6th chapter of the 1st book of this "Treatise on the Exposition of the Sacrament," the French book to which I have referred your Lordship. In the early part of it you will find a very remarkable statement. I will only read two or three words. The title is, "Traité de l'Exposition du Saint Sacrament de l'autel." Your Lordship will find in the early part of chapter 4 a statement, that of all ecclesiastical ceremonies this is the one which the heretics of the last century regarded with the greatest aversion. Then he refers to several writers, who had condemned this exposition of the blessed Sacrament, and the procession connected with it, and among them he refers to the work of a very advanced German Lutheran, Chemnitz, "De Nouveauté, et Idolatrie, &c.," in which that writer says, "Qu'elle est contraire aux paroles de l'Institution de l'Euchariste." So that the German writer chose to go further than the Article goes, and he goes the length of saying that this reservation, and carrying about, and lifting up, and worshipping of the Eucharist, is contrary to the institution of Christ. The Article has not ventured to go so far as that. All that the Article says is, that it is not commanded by Christ that these practices should be adopted. At a still more subsequent date, as your Lordship will find in the 3rd chapter of the 2nd book, the confraternity of the blessed Sacrament was established. The passage which I had the honour of reading to you about the single lamp has reference to that. You will there find an account of the institution of the confraternity of the blessed Sacrament, which, as your Lordship knows, was instituted for the express purpose of paying outward honour to the blessed Sacrament, and especially when it was carried in procession to the sick; and that was a practice also prevalent to such an extent, and led to practices involving expenditure and pomposity, and various other matters connected with the blessed Sacrament which were censured not only by Protestants but by Roman Catholic writers.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And you say our Article was pointed against those circumstances of abuse connected with this festival?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord. I am reminded, also, that the benediction of the blessed Sacrament was of a later date. The benediction of the blessed Sacrament, and the 40 hours adoration, both were brought in by St. Carlo Borromeo, who drew up the catechism of the Council of Trent. My contention is, that that Article is not pointed at any part at all of the Divine office; that it does not point at any use that was made of the sacred elements or of the Sacrament till after the consecration was complete; and that it is pointed entirely at those abuses which resulted gradually from the institution of the Feast of Corpus Christi, and from the institution of the confraternity of the blessed Sacrament.

Now your Lordship has referred to the canon of the Council of Trent, and it is very remarkable that close upon the time that the 28th Article was prepared, the following canons were passed in the 13th session of the Council of Trent. I beg to refer your Lordship to canon 6 and 7, and especially the 6th I pray your particular attention to.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The 6th is, "De assertione vando sacræ Eucharistiæ Sacramento, et ad infirmos deferendo."

(Mr. Prideaux.) What I wish to read is the 6th Canon under the head "De sanctissimo Eucharistiæ Sacramento." "Si quis dixerit, in sancto Eucharistiæ Sacramento Christum unigenitum Dei Filium non esse cultu latriæ, etiam externo, adorandum, atque ideo nec festiva peculiari celebritate venerandum," [involving of course reservation,] "neque in processionibus secundum laudabilem et universalem ecclesiæ sanctæ ritum et consuetudinem solemniter circumgestandum, vel non publice, ut adoretur, populo proponendum, et ejus adoratores esse idololatrias, anathema sit."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, I see they are directly at variance—the 28th Article and this Canon of the Council of Trent.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Quite so, my Lord; not perhaps exactly, but they are substantially.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Pretty nearly. The Article directs that it is not to be "reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped."

(Mr. Prideaux.) It is the doctrine of the Church of England, that nothing is to be received and required as necessary to salvation but what can be proved by the Word of God. Cranmer, as I shall prove to your Lordship by a letter which I am about to refer to, was aware that the denial of these views was about to be enforced under an anathema, and so Cranmer says, "We must provide against that."

(The Dean of the Arches.) The very next Canon also deals with the same subject.

(Mr. Prideaux.) The very next Canon carries out my view. "Si quis dixerit, non licere Sacram Eucharistiam in sacrario reservari, sed statim post consecrationem adstantibus necessario distribuendam; aut non licere, ut illa ad infirmos honorifice deferatur," [pointing to the special functions of the confraternity of the blessed Sacrament,] "anathema sit." Your Lordship sees there are these things enforced under an anathema. The Church of England says "that nothing is to be required as necessary and requisite to salvation, or to be believed as an article of faith, but that which can be proved from Holy Scripture." And therefore Cranmer, who was aware that some such Canon was about to be passed—

(The Dean of the Arches.) I doubt that, I question it very much.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I will read to your Lordship a letter in proof of it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you know the date of this session with reference to the date of the Articles?

(Mr. Prideaux.) It seems to have commenced on the 1st of December 1551.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And what is the date of the Article?

(Mr. Prideaux.) They are practically contemporaneous.

(The Dean of the Arches.) 1562, I think.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Your Lordship is aware that the session of the Council of Trent continued a considerable time.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am speaking of the date of the Articles, 1562. I suppose this is a copy from the Edwardian Articles.

(Mr. Prideaux.) The date of the original Articles, which contain the same language, is 1552.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Give me that date, it is rather important.

(Mr. Prideaux.) The Edwardian Articles are 1552, and in the Latin you have word for word the same.

(The Dean of the Arches.) When was this 13th session of the Council of Trent?

(Mr. Prideaux.) It began on the 1st September, 1551.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The decree went out on the 11th October, and the session was held on the 11th October 1551. It would appear, therefore, that this Edwardian Article was almost, as it were, directed against that session of the Council of Trent. I mean the Edwardian Article had that Canon before it at that time.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am going to show your Lordship that they had it substantially before them. Fortunately we have got a letter written by Cranmer which proves that, and it is perfectly clear that they said something of this sort, "We are not going to stand this. We are not going to be put under anathema for believing that this is not ordained by Christ."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Quite so. I see your argument.

(Mr. Prideaux.) My Lord, the letter is a very remarkable one (and it is astonishing how every research aids our cause), it will be found in page 90 in Mr. Perry's book, upon the Declaration on Kneeling. I will just read a word or two of the introduction, and then I will read Cranmer's letter. "It was barely seven months before (namely, March 20th, 1552) that he had written to Bullinger, Calvin, and Melancthon, expressing his concern at the proceedings of the Council of Trent. Addressing Calvin, he thus writes, 'Our adversaries are now holding their councils at Trent for the establishing of their

"errors, and shall we neglect to call together a godly synod for the refutation of error, and for restoring and propagating the truth. They are, as I am informed, making decrees respecting the worship of the host; wherefore we ought to leave no stone unturned, not only that we may guard others against this idolatry, but also that we may ourselves come to an agreement upon the doctrine of this Sacrament. It cannot escape your prudence how exceedingly the Church of God has been injured by dissensions and varieties of opinion respecting this Sacrament of unity, and though they are now in some measure removed, yet I could wish for an agreement in this doctrine, not only as regards the subject itself, but also with respect to the words and forms of expression.'"

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is the date of Cranmer's letter?

Now, my Lord, I say, looking at the abuses that had sprung up at this time in connexion with and flowing out of the feast of "Corpus Christi," and the institution of the "Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament," looking at this letter of Cranmer, looking at the decree of the Council of Trent, and then looking at this 28th Article—looking at the fact that in the French book that I referred you to it is expressly pointed out that the great subject of the abuse and horror with the "heretics" of the previous century (and that was written about a hundred years afterwards) were these very things resulting out of these matters. I think you can have very little doubt that the object of the Article was merely to protest against those two decrees under anathema which the Council of Trent were about to pass, and which I have had the honour of reading to your Lordship. Your Lordship will see that all this had to do with the reserved Sacrament, and in the sense in which the Article might speak against the reserved Sacrament—

(The Dean of the Arches.) What had that to do with the reserved Sacrament?

(Mr. Prideaux.) All these matters decreed by the Council of Trent—

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are not speaking of the Article now.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am speaking of the Council of Trent.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Not all of them, because there is a separate canon.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not mean to say, my Lord, that there are not other Articles relating to the Sacrament, but I say the foundation of all these abuses of the Sacrament is the reservation of the Sacrament, and the English Article in the same manner was dealing with the reserved Sacrament, reserved for other purposes, no doubt, but which had fallen into abuse. Your Lordship will look at the consecutive words, "the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped." My friend is in this dilemma:—If it is not prohibitory it does not signify, and if it is prohibitory it could not refer to reservation for the Communion of the sick. It must refer to reservation for the purpose of subsequent abuse of the Sacrament. The words are, "was not by Christ's ordinance reserved," [the necessary foundation of the abuses complained of,] "carried about, lifted up, or worshipped." I do submit, upon every fair historical principle, and every principle of interpretation, it is impossible to carry that Article further than what I am ready to admit is its proper interpretation, namely, that in one respect it is apologetic, explaining why the prohibition had been withdrawn; and, secondly, that it was proposed for the purpose of protecting the Church of England against the anathemas which Cranmer and his friends knew were about to be issued by one of the sessions of the Council of Trent.

I believe I have made the view which I have ventured to take upon this point clear to your Lordship, and I do not feel it necessary to say anything further upon it. As far as I am concerned, I am only going to refer to one other authority, and then to make a very few concluding observations. That further authority which I propose to refer to in order that you may see the exact language, is the Visitation Articles of Cardinal Pole.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Upon that same subject?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No. It is the Article that I ventured to refer to in support of the proposition that the lamp used before the reserved Sacrament, as distinguished from the lights before the high altar, was a single lamp. I think it is well to show the exact position of that. I refer your Lordship to Cardinal Pole's Visitation Articles, 1 Cardwell's "Documentary Annals," page 207. The Articles commence at page 203, and they were issued in the year 1557. "Articles set forth by Cardinal Pole to be inquired in his ordinary visitation, within his diocese of Canterbury." The 23rd item is, "Whether they do burn a lamp or a candle before the Sacrament, and if they do not, that then it may be provided for with expedition." I have had a note handed to me upon the last subject, touching the abuses of the reserved Sacrament. It is put certainly in very clear language, and is so short that perhaps you will allow me to read it. I am now going back to the question of the Decrees of the Council of Trent, and the 28th Article. Trent says "anathema" to those who deny certain things about the reserved Sacrament. The Article says, "You have no right to anathematise those men, because such things are not commanded by Christ's ordinance." That certainly is putting the matter in a very clear light.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is the authority of that?

(Mr. Prideaux.) It is a mere suggestion, putting my argument in a clear way, and showing how they are dealing with certain abuses of the reserved Sacrament in the 28th Article.

I think, with regard to the subject of kneeling and prostration, I need scarcely trouble your Lordship, excepting to call attention to one single matter, which is this—that I venture to say, upon the true construction of the Rubric, there is no more direction for the celebrant to kneel when he receives the Blessed Communion than at any other time during the celebration of that rite. It is quite clear, if the Rubric be carefully looked at, that the direction to kneel is limited to the people.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you say there is no direction for the celebrant to kneel anywhere?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Certainly not when he communicates, and as your Lordship is aware, I referred to a very remarkable state of facts from Kennett's Register to show that those were matters which the Legislature thought they were not intended to deal with, and which therefore were left open to the people, as my friend Mr. James showed, by that reference to the note in the first Prayer Book, unless there be any Canon to regulate the matter. I will now refer to the present Rubric. "Then shall the minister first receive the communion in both kinds himself, and then proceed to deliver the same to the bishops, priests, and deacons in like manner (if any be present), after that to the people, also into their hands, all meekly kneeling."

(Mr. Stephens.) "All."

(Mr. Prideaux.) I submit, my Lord, that it is clear upon the very language of that section, that "all meekly kneeling" applies only to the people, and it is impossible to say that it applies to the celebrating priest also, because, if so, the priest would have to administer kneeling. But, if it were possible to entertain any doubt upon this Rubric, on the face of it, it is set clear beyond a doubt by the Black Rubric; because the Black Rubric says, "Whereas it is ordained in this office for the administration of the Lord's Supper that the communicants should receive the "same kneeling." And then it goes on to show why, in this solemn and deep rite, communicants may receive kneeling without being guilty of idolatry, for that is what it means. Now it is perfectly clear that the words "meekly kneeling" do not include the officiating priest, and, if there were any doubt about that, that doubt would be solved by an earlier part of the office; for your Lordship will find this, "At the time of the celebration of the communion, the communicants being conveniently placed for receiving the Holy Sacrament, the priest shall say this exhortation."

(The Dean of the Arches.) You do not mean that there is no direction for the priest to kneel in the Communion Service?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I mean there is no more direction for the priest to kneel when he communicates, than there is for him to kneel, if he thinks right, after the consecration, in humble acknowledgment of the great benefits commemorated by the celebration of the sacrificial rite. Then there is "the priest kneeling down at the Lord's table," and then there is a direction to stand up; but after that I do not see that there is any direction for the priest to kneel.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The next Rubric to that is, "then the priest standing before the Lord's table." Your observation seems to be founded upon that, and that there is no direction for him to kneel when he receives the Holy Communion.

(Mr. Coleridge.) My Lord, the word "all" was introduced in 1662.

(Mr. Prideaux.) That was to meet the case of the communicating clergy. My Lord, what I say is this: my friend objects because in deep acknowledgment of those blessings which are so great that the communicants when they receive are commanded to kneel, Mr. Mackonochie has thought fit in the fervour of his grateful heart to kneel. I say that if Mr. Mackonochie infringes the Rubric by kneeling, in acknowledgment of that great and ineffable blessing, so does the officiating clergyman who kneels when he communicates. That is the view which I am venturing to submit, and if, therefore, Mr. Mackonochie is liable to be proceeded against for this, so is the reverend gentleman who gave evidence in this case liable to be proceeded against in the same way, and so are a large majority of the priests throughout the length and breadth of this land liable to be proceeded against in this criminal way for kneeling themselves when they receive the Blessed Communion of the body and blood of the Redeemer. I understand your Lordship to say that there is no charge of adoration?

(The Dean of the Arches.) None.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Then I need not enter into that question; but I may say that the whole catena patrum shows that the doctrine of the real presence is held by a large number of the clergy of the Church of England, and I may refer your Lordship—without troubling you to read it, because I am sure that every circumstance connected with it is present in your memory, and I believe you have been partly instrumental in its being found—to the famous letter of Geeste, the author of that part of the 28th Article in which he declares that he did not mean—

(The Dean of the Arches.) You mean the letter to Lord Burleigh?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord, I do not propose to read it, but you will find it set out in page 192 of Perry on Kneeling.

My Lord, I will read one passage from Ridley, and only one, (it is set out in Mr. Perry's book,) and it occurs in his disputation with Glyn, in which Ridley says, "We adore and worship Christ in the Eucharist; and if you mean the external sacrament, I say that 'also is to be worshipped as a sacrament.'"

My Lord, it is not necessary for me to defend on this occasion the great doctrine of the real presence of the Redeemer in the Eucharist, because there is no charge of adoration, and the Rubric itself upon kneeling shows how seemly and proper it is that the truly grateful worshippers at the very time of the celebration of these mysteries should pour out their thanks to God "meekly kneeling upon their knees," because all, excepting the officiating celebrant, are in fact commanded to do so, and they all kneel during the time of celebration. Unless, therefore, there be a strict and positive prohibition with regard to kneeling in the Prayer Book, it is quite clear, that without attempting or desiring to attempt to contend for the doctrine of the real presence, kneeling is a seemly act within the spirit of the Prayer Book, and especially within the spirit of the Black Rubric, and very strong evidence ought to be brought before your Lordship, and very strong arguments, before you can arrive at the conclusion that Mr. Mackonochie by kneeling at this time has been guilty of a violation of the Act of Uniformity. When we bear in mind in addition that the great doctrine of the real presence of the Redeemer in the Eucharist is at least a permissible doctrine to be entertained in the Church of England, and when we bear in mind that—as Mr. Keble puts it in his admirable work on Eucharistic adoration—"kneeling in the presence of the Incarnate Deity is the necessary offspring of the faithful heart, unless it be forbidden," and certainly in no express terms is it forbidden, this is an additional reason, though it is one I do not want, because I say it is perfectly consistent with the lower view of this rite; but this is an additional reason why your Lordship should not condemn Mr. Mackonochie for so kneeling, because, my Lord, such a condemnation could only be based upon the affirmative assumption that there is no real presence of the Redeemer in the Sacrament under the form of bread and wine.

Now my learned friend Mr. Coleridge tried to cut off as it were the Church of England from the Catholic Church. I have dealt with his reference to the word "priest," and shown how completely he was mistaken, and the only other references with which I am going to trouble your Lordship are references for the purpose of showing how substantially and essentially the present service of the Church of England in all its essential particulars agrees with the Sarum Use. In this little book which I have in my hand, at page 9 (it is a report of the proceedings of the Ecclesiastical Art Exhibition, held at York on the 9th, 10th, and 11th October 1866) is a paper of the Rev. Dr. Littledale's upon this very subject, and he tabulates the various parts of the service according to the Sarum Missal, and according to the present Prayer Book. If your Lordship will allow me, I will just hand it up to you, and you will find a similar comparison set out as an appendix to Mr. Walker's translation of the Sarum Use. You will also find a general history of the various Liturgies, and the analogous parts of them as a whole, set out very elaborately, and in a very interesting manner, in the historical introduction to the Annotated Book of Common Prayer.

Now, my Lord, I am going to waive anything like a peroration, but I must be allowed to say one word in conclusion. I may perhaps on some few occasions have expressed myself strongly. Personally I do feel strongly in the matter, but it is my duty to submit to your Lordship this, that in order to sustain as lawful and proper the various practices complained of against Mr. Mackonochie, no assumption of the Romish doctrine of Transubstantiation, or even of the Catholic doctrine of the sacramental and ineffable presence of the body and blood of the Redeemer in the Eucharist, is necessary. Only grant that, which every Christian man must admit, without reference to the special nature of the presence of the Redeemer, or whether he is there at all, except by faith—only grant that the Eucharistic service is a great commemorative representation of the one sacrifice suffered upon the Cross, that it is the one great act of Christian worship (which all Christians must admit), and then I say, that whether the Romish doctrine of Transubstantiation or the Catholic doctrine of the Real Presence, or the Sacramentarian doctrine which makes the elements mere types and symbols be the correct one, that in one and all of these views every one of the practices charged against Mr. Mackonochie may fairly and legitimately be carried on, and that there is no necessary connexion whatever between any one of these practices, or any of the matters which they symbolize, and any Romish or supposed Romish doctrine which Mr. Mackonochie may be supposed to entertain. It is one thing to say that the Catholic spirit is, as a whole, towards reverence, and if you please, towards excess of ceremonial, and the Protestant tendency is towards irreverence, and towards the neglect of ceremonial (and that is quite sufficient to show why it is, that, as a body, those who hold high doctrine are those who are most desirous of carrying out the old practices and ceremonial of the Catholic Church to its fullest extent), it is another and a very different thing to say, and it is, as I submit, impossible to say that any one of these practices is inconsistent with the duty of a clergyman of the Church of England, even if it be conceded, for the sake of argument, that the very lowest view of the Eucharistic service that has ever been entertained is the correct one.

But, my Lord, although I contend that these matters are not necessarily connected with any question of doctrine, I cannot disguise from myself the fact that this is an attempt "to strike secretly at a great doctrine as well as at laudable practices of the Church of England, and indeed of the whole Catholic Church of Christ;" and as the example set before me has been to read in the conclusion of the speech a passage from some author who is supposed to favour the views of the party addressing the Court, I will, with your Lordship's permission, conclude my observations by reading a short extract from the recent charge of the Lord Bishop of Salisbury, which you will find at page 62: "Should you require more aid in this ministration, I can at once supply you with it. Model your own address to them on the words of one of our greatest divines, whom God some years ago called to the very front of the great struggles for his truth, and has still spared to his Church, or rather, borrow the very words, without the minutest alteration, of that great bishop (the Bishop of Exeter), and let him in his old age still teach your flock the truth as it is in Jesus Christ. Say to them, in his words of glowing faith in the Eucharist as a Sacrament, 'We eat our ransome;' as St. Augustine says, 'We receive spiritually the body of our Lord Jesus Christ which was given for us, his blood which was shed for us.' In the same Eucharist, as a sacrifice, we in representation plead the one great sacrifice which our great High Priest continually presenteth for us in heaven. In heaven he presenteth ever before the Father in person, himself mediating with the Father as our intercessor. On earth he invisibly sanctifies what is offered, and makes the earthly elements which we offer to be sacramentally and ineffably—but not in a carnal way—his body and blood. For although once for all offered, that sacrifice, be it remembered, is ever living and continuous—made to be continuous by the resurrection of our Lord. Accordingly, St. John tells us in Revelations, 5th chapter, verse 6 and 12, that 'He beheld, and lo, in the midst of the throne sat a Lamb, as it had been slain, to whom is continually addressed the triumphant song of the heavenly host, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing." To him his Church on earth in the Eucharistic service in like manner continually cries, 'O! Lord God, Lamb of God, Son of the Father, that takest away the sins of the world;' not that 'tookest away,' but that still takes—'Agnus Dei, qui tollit peccata mundi.' As then the sacrifice is continuous, its propitiatory virtue is continuous, and the fulness of the propitiation is pleaded for the whole Church, wheresoever the commemoration of it is exhibited in the Holy Eucharist."

(Mr. Coleridge.) With your Lordship's permission, before this case is adjourned I wish to make a statement. Something I said the other day seems to have been misunderstood. I am told I am reported to have said that the gentleman who is the defendant in this case is a "greedy clergyman." Now, my Lord, I am not in the habit of reading reports of my own speeches, and I have not read them in this case; but I am told there is a letter to the paper upon this subject. I am now speaking in the hearing of your Lordship, and I am sure you will bear me out when I say that I certainly made use of no such expression, and not only that, but I think I carefully guarded myself from making any such imputation. No such idea ever crossed my mind. It was foreign to the whole course of my argument, and nothing that I said could possibly have borne such a construction. If by chance anything could impossibly bear such a construction, I am at once anxious to disavow it.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am quite satisfied that my learned friend Mr. Coleridge never said any such thing.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am quite sure Mr. Coleridge has never used those words in my hearing.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I am quite sure Mr. Coleridge would not have used any words so disrespectful of the reverend defendant in this case.

The Court adjourned for a short time.

(Dr. Tristram.) May it please your Lordship, I can fully appreciate the desire of the Court to bring the case on behalf of the defendant to a close after the very long, able, and exhaustive arguments which have been submitted to the Court by my learned leaders, and I will endeavour, as far as in me lies, to comply with the wishes of the Court, and to present the matter which I have to lay before it in as concise a form as possible, and to compress the arguments and observations which I shall feel it my duty to submit to your Lordship in as few words as I can in justice to the reverend defendant, for whom I have the honour to appear.

My Lord, I have nothing to add to the arguments which have been submitted to your Lordship in reference to the jurisdiction of the Court. It appears to me that my learned leaders have exhausted that subject. But as to the competency of the defendant to except to the jurisdiction of the Court at this time, after the unopposed admission of the reformed Articles, I beg to offer this one observation that is laid down or intimated in the case of Saunders v. Head (3rd Curteis' Reports, 577), that it is competent to a defendant, after articles have been admitted against him, unopposed, to except to the jurisdiction of the Court, and I shall humbly submit to your Lordship that the advisers of the defendant have done nothing to waive this right.

(The Dean of the Arches.) After articles unopposed, do you say?

(Dr. Tristram.) Unopposed.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But that is not the present case.

(Dr. Tristram.) If your Lordship will allow me, I will proceed to show you what I mean by reminding you that, in this case, the Articles being opposed, they were, by your Lordship's predecessor, Dr. Lushington, directed to be reformed in a particular manner; that they were reformed in the manner directed by him; and it appeared to me that it was contrary to the practice of the Court, and would not be treating the Court with due respect, if I were to advise my client to oppose Articles which had been reformed in the manner directed. Of course your Lordship may say that, in accordance with the practice of the Court, it would not be open to you to review a decision given by Dr. Lushington on the admission of these Articles; but I shall submit to your Lordship, of course, that we are not thereby precluded from raising that objection here, or hereafter, in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, if so advised.

I will pass now at once to the consideration of the merits of the case. There are two matters on which the parties are agreed. The first is that the offence charged against Mr. Mackonochie is for having violated the Acts of Uniformity, and not for having violated the general ecclesiastical law.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But do you say that is admitted by the other side?

(Dr. Tristram.) I shall submit to your Lordship that it is patent upon the Articles, and that it is also conceded in argument at the bar.

(Mr. Droop.) I know my friend Mr. Stephens does not intend to admit that.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Whether he admits it or not, there is no case except under the statute.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The decree says, "Thereby contravening the Statutes, Canons, and Constitutions of this Realm."

(Dr. Tristram.) Yes; but if you turn to the Articles you will find in the 1st Article, as reformed, it is stated that, "By the Act of Uniformity of Queen Elizabeth's reign, and by the Act of Uniformity of King Charles the Second's reign, by the Clerical Subscription Act, and by the 14th, 16th, and 30th Canons," such and such propositions are laid down. Then when you descend to particulars, at the end of each Article, Mr. Mackonochie is charged with having violated those statutes and those canons, where applicable, except in one Article, in which he is charged with having violated the XXVIII. Article.

(The Dean of the Arches.) In every single instance he is charged with having violated certain constitutions and canons, as well as the statutes, and in one instance it says particular canons. The acts and canons upon which they lay this charge are contained in the 1st Article, and throughout the Articles they never depart from the law as laid down in the 1st Article.

(Dr. Tristram.) Well, my Lord, I shall submit respectfully to your Lordship that in the Articles it is clear that the only offences charged against Mr. Mackonochie are offences against the Act of Uniformity, and I shall also add to that this observation, that my friends on the other side, Mr. Stephens and Mr. Coleridge, rested exclusively on the Acts of Uniformity.

My Lord, there is another matter upon which both parties appear to be agreed, and that is this, that the practices charged against Mr. Mackonochie are not directly prohibited by the Acts of Uniformity, or by the Rubrics which are incorporated in those Acts of Uniformity. But it is said by my friends on the other side, that these acts are indirectly prohibited by the Acts of Uniformity and by the Rubrics. Therefore they ask your Lordship to come to the conclusion that the Defendant has committed certain unlawful acts.

But, my Lord, to entitle you to come to this conclusion, my friends must establish two propositions; the first is shortly this, that any rite or ceremony not prescribed by the Acts of Uniformity is unlawful; the second proposition is, that the acts done or acquiesced in by Mr. Mackonochie are rites and ceremonies within the meaning of the Acts of Uniformity. It is from these two propositions that your Lordship is asked to draw the conclusion of guilt.

Now, I will take the second of these two propositions first, and deal with that, and I shall humbly submit to your Lordship that the acts done or acquiesced in by Mr. Mackonochie are not rites and ceremonies within the meaning of the acts of Uniformity. In popular language and in loose language you may possibly designate some of those acts as rites and ceremonies, but I submit to your Lordship that you cannot do so in the meaning in which those terms are used in ecclesiastical law. My Lord, I shall not weary your Lordship by reading to you the words used in the two Acts of Uniformity of King Edward VI.; but when your Lordship comes to refer to them, I think you will see clearly that the words relied on for the prosecution do not refer to ceremonial acts, but to the offices of the Church. As a good deal has been said as to what is the true definition of a rite or ceremony in the Church of England, I do not know that I can refer to a work of better authority, or to a definition coming from persons better able to give a definition, than the definition which was given by the Protestant Divines in the Great Westminster Conference. Your Lordship will recollect, too, that that conference took place very shortly before the Act of Uniformity of Elizabeth was passed, and it appears in Cardwell's Conferences, at page 25, that the Protestant Divines who sat in that conference were "Scory, late Bishop of Chichester, Whitehead, Jewel, Almer, Cox, Grindal, Horne, and Guest." At page 73 the following is the definition of rites and ceremonies: "By ceremonies and rites of the Church we understand those ceremonies and rites which neither expressly neither by necessary deduction or consequence, are commanded or forbidden in the Scriptures, but are things of their own nature indifferent, as, for example, the form and manner of prayer before and after the baptism, and the administration of the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ, the appointing of times and places for the reading of God's Word, the administration of Sacraments, public prayers, number of holydays, times of fasting, and such like," all of which may by God's Word, not only by general councils, but also by particular provinces, regions, and societies of Christians, according to the state of the times, be instituted and ordained, changed and removed, upon such just grounds, causes, and considerations, as the state of the times, people, and other circumstances require so to be done to edify God's people.

Now, my Lord, that is the definition which the leading reformers in the reign of Queen Elizabeth prepared to hand over to the leading Roman Catholic divines in this country immediately before the passing of the Act of Uniformity of Elizabeth. I shall submit to your Lordship that such a definition coming from such authority is far better than any definition which may be contained in any other work, whether from Roman Catholic or Protestant sources.

(The Dean of the Arches.) This is a discourse on this subject: "Any Church has authority to institute, change, ordain, or remove upon such just grounds, causes, and considerations, as the state of the times, people, and other circumstances require so to be done to edify good people." You say all the ceremonies mentioned in this discourse are perfect services?

(Dr. Tristram.) No, my Lord; but it states in this discourse what these divines understood by "services" and "rites of the Church."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, they go on to specify, do they not, the number of individual things, "the form and manner of prayer before baptism," and so on?

(Dr. Tristram.) And many more things than that.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And many more things besides that?

(Dr. Tristram.) Yes, my Lord; but our contention is that a manual act is not a rite or ceremony, unless it be accompanied by words.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You must bear in mind that there may be a distinction between rites and ceremonies. Do you say this discourse will bear you out in the position that the use of incense is not a ceremony?

(Dr. Tristram.) I shall submit to your Lordship that it does.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Look at page 89, and you will see this: "Moreover the late experience within this our country doth declare that the abrogation of many ceremonies established by general authority is lawful and profitable. For in the time of King Henry VIII., of famous memory, many superstitious observations and idolatrous rites were abolished." Then they go on to specify them, "Pilgrimage, stations, pardons, many superstitious opinions of purgatory, holy water, of masses for cattle, and scala cæli, innumerable lies out of the Church, legends of feigned miracles and saints' lives."

(Dr. Tristram.) Masses for cattle, for instance, would be accompanied by words.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is your position.

(Dr. Tristram.) That is our position. There is a passage I wish to refer your Lordship to in Gavanti's Thesaurus Sacrorum Rituum, page 2, in which the words occur "Quid veniat nomine ritus, prout dicitur à cerimonia, non conveniunt doctores."

(The Dean of the Arches.) How do you cite that?

(Dr. Tristram.) There seems to have been considerable discussion.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is a statement that it is very difficult to distinguish rites from ceremonies.

(Dr. Tristram.) There seems to have been considerable discussion in those days between learned men as to what exactly constituted a rite. I am also requested to refer your Lordship to a passage in the Rubricæ Missalis Romani, by Quartus, page 1. The passage is this: "Dico secundò. Ritus Missæ dividuntur communiter in essentielles, qui sunt de necessitate sacrificii: et Sacramenti: et accidentales, qui pertinent ad ornatum ejusdem Sacrificii, et possunt esse de necessitate præcepti."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Surely that is against you, is it not—two kinds of rites, essentials and accidentals, the accidental relating to ornaments?

(Dr. Tristram.) If your Lordship will allow me to read the whole of the passage, you will see the bearing of it "Ritus essentialis consistit in consecratione, vel etiam communionem, ut fusiùs explicabimus in appendice hujus operis dum de Sacrificio Missæ: Ritus verò accidentalis consistit in actionibus et precibus."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is accidental, is it?

(Dr. Tristram.) Yes my Lord, "Aliisque circumstantiis ab ecclesia adjunctis, quæ dicuntur sacramentalia, et cæremoniæ sacræ," &c.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Would the burning of incense be an actio?

(Dr. Tristram.) His definition is, that it consisted "in actionibus et precibus."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is your authority for that averment?

(Dr. Tristram.) That is my authority. Then there is another: "Dico quartò. Dividi possunt cæremoniæ primo in eas quæ sunt intrinsicæ ipsi missæ."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is that writer you are citing from before or after the Council of Trent? It is hardly in harmony with that passage in the Council of Trent.

(Dr. Tristram.) "Et consistunt tum in verbis, tum in gestibus, celebrantibus."

(The Dean of the Arches.) And consists as much in the words as in the gestures of ceremonies.

(Dr. Tristram.) Yes, our contention is, that a simple manual act is not a rite or ceremony. Upon that I will also refer your Lordship to the Articles of 1556, "Of Rites and Ceremonies." I am citing from the Prayer Book Interleaved; at page 391 it mentions the "use of certain customary vestments, the sprinkling of holy water; the giving of holy bread, the burning of candles on Candlemas Day, the giving of ashes on Ash Wednesday, the bearing of palms on Palm Sunday, the creeping to the Cross and kissing it on Good Friday, the erecting of the Cross on Good Friday, exorcisms and benedictions," as laudable customs, worthy of continuance, but not as having power to remit sin. Then I shall also refer you to the 11th of Cranmer's thirteen Articles, which says, "Ritus, cæremoniæ, et ordinationes ecclesiasticæ humanitus institutæ, quæcunque prosunt ad eruditionem disciplinam, tranquillitatem, bonum ordinem aut decorem in ecclesia, servandæ sunt et amplectendæ, ut stata festa, jejunia, preces, et his similia." Then Article 15 of the Augsburg Confession, De Ritibus Ecclesiasticis, "Qui sunt humana autoritate instituti, docent, ritus illos servandos esse, qui sine peccato servari possunt et ad tranquillitatem et bonum ordinem in Ecclesia conducunt, ut certæ feriæ, certæ orationes piæ et alii similes ritus." Then I refer to the 30th Article of the Wurttemberg Confession, "Fatetur et hoc, quod Episcopis liceat cum ecclesiæ suæ consensu ordinationes dierum festorum et lectionem seu concionem, ad ædificationem et erudi-

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON RITUAL.

"tionem veræ fidei in Christum, instituere. Sed non licet obtendere ecclesiæ ritus veteris legis pro sacro divino, quo Deus singulariter per se colatur." In that case, my Lord, "Ceremoniæ" and "Rites" are used interchangeably.

Now, my Lord, I shall also submit to your Lordship, having regard to the title of the Prayer Book (the Book of Common Prayer), these acts charged against Mr. Macknochie do not fall within the terms rites and ceremonies. The title of the Book of Common Prayer of 1549 is, "The Book of Common Prayer, and Administration of the Sacraments, and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church." The book contains three parts, first, the Book of Common Prayer; secondly, the administration of the Sacraments; and, thirdly, other rites and ceremonies of the Church; that is, other than the Common Prayer and the administration of the Sacraments. I shall submit, therefore, to your Lordship that it is clear, whatever the rites and ceremonies may be, they are other than, and distinct from, the Common Prayer and the administration of the Sacraments. If the book be examined, as one would expect from the title page, you will find it is divided into three parts; first, the Common Prayer; secondly, the administration of the Sacraments, namely, the Holy Eucharist and Holy Baptism; and, thirdly, the other rites, namely, Confirmation, Matrimony, Visitation of the Sick, Order for the Burial of the Dead, for the Purification of Women, and the Communion Service. Immediately following the title is the table of contents; then you have the preface, which is the same as in the present Prayer Book, "Concerning the Services of the Church," &c. I shall submit to your Lordship that the preface to the Prayer Book refers only to the morning and evening services. If your Lordship refers to the preface you will see from the words used that it can refer to no other parts of our Prayer Book. It proclaims itself to be so, calling the Common Prayers the Divine Service, and it is laid down in several books of authority that the expression "Divine Services" is taken from the Rubric to the Matins of the Sarum Breviary. This at once suggests that the Common Prayers are an arrangement of the ancient office of Matins, the Primæ, &c., for use in the vernacular. The preface continues to explain that in these offices the reading of the Scripture was omitted, and that many of the Psalms in practice were omitted, and that a troublesome rule called the Pie was introduced. Therefore, in the new office which is to take the place of this, Anthems, Responds, Invitatories, &c., are cut off, and a Calendar for Psalms and Lessons is drawn up. The things objected to were of old only in the Breviary and not in the Missal or Pontifical, and the preface, therefore, concerns only the offices drawn from the Breviary, and not the common services or any other rite or ceremony. This, I take it, is certain, because it concludes with an order that when matins are said in church they are to be said in English, but when in private, in any language the persons may understand in private.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Just wait one moment. In this book you refer me to, the mixture of wine with water is expressly laid down as a ceremony. I think you will find this is not an authority which supports your position, when you come to look at it.

(Dr. Tristram.) I am told by my friend Mr. Prideaux that the mixture of wine with the water is accompanied by words. I have not had an opportunity of looking at that book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) If you were to look at it you will find it is not an authority in your favour. I think if you had had an opportunity of consulting it, you would not have quoted it as an authority for showing that ceremonies consist of individual acts. I know, by experience, what it is for counsel to have these things put into their hands without having had an opportunity of looking at them.

(Dr. Tristram.) Our contention is, after all, that, as in the case your Lordship has just referred to in the Roman Church, the mixture of the wine with the water is accompanied with a prayer, the writer of that book of course assumes this when he makes that statement to which your Lordship has just referred.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There are a number of ceremonies mentioned. A rite may be a different thing, but ceremonies are individual acts, according to that writer.

(Dr. Tristram.) At any rate that book was written after the Act of Uniformity, and therefore can have very little bearing as to the interpretation which the Court will put on the words rites and ceremonies, as used in the Act of Uniformity or in the Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That was only because you cited it; I did not cite it.

(Dr. Tristram.) However, my Lord, it was put into my hands, and I had not an opportunity of looking at it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It always happens, when authorities are put into the hands of counsel in that way, that these mistakes arise.

(Dr. Tristram.) What we shall contend is, that that part of the preface, concerning the Services of the Church, relates only to the Morning and Evening Prayer. Therefore no words can be cited out of that part of the preface bearing upon the interpretation to be put on the words "rites and ceremonies."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you mean upon that part of the preface which is headed, "Of Ceremonies, why some be abolished and some retained?"

(Dr. Tristram.) No; "Concerning the Services of the Church." Then my next position is, that the annexed heading "Of Ceremonies" does not refer nor can it refer to manual acts, it refers really to offices of the Church.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Lesser offices?

(Dr. Tristram.) Yes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, I understand that to be the argument, but it seems to be rather difficult to maintain it, I think.

(Dr. Tristram.) Your Lordship will remember our Prayer Book was drawn up after the Sarum Missal.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I only meant from the internal evidence of the writing.

(Dr. Tristram.) There are a great many ceremonies to be found in the Rituale.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not want to stop you, but I have had an elaborate argument on this point; if you can add anything to them, do so.

(Dr. Tristram.) I merely wanted to call your Lordship's attention to this fact, that these offices of the Church were taken from the Rituale. The Rituale contained a great many other offices, such as "Prayers for Houses, Benedictions of Houses, the Benediction of a New House, the Benediction of a Boat, the Benediction of a Ship, the Benediction of Fields, to drive away Locusts and other insects, the Benediction of Brackish Waters," and so on. When you turn to this preface it states very clearly, and gives a clear reason, why all these things are discontinued.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say those are the ceremonies of which it says, "why some be abolished and some retained?"

(Dr. Tristram.) Yes, and that it does not refer to mere manual acts.

I shall now proceed to deal with the second of the two propositions of my learned friend, Mr. Stephens, and that is that all rites and ceremonies not prescribed by the Acts of Uniformity are unlawful.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Negata.

(Dr. Tristram.) Yes. My Lord, in this part of the case I wish to call your attention to the case of Escott v. Mastin. Your Lordship is very familiar with it, you were one of the counsel in the case.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I know all about it. It is the case of a dissenter's baptism, is it not?

(Dr. Tristram.) Yes. I wish to call your Lordship's attention to some very important propositions laid down by Lord Brougham in the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. It is reported in 4th Moore's P.C. Reports. The page I shall first refer to is page 123. It is on the interpretation of statutes. "The 68th Canon being that upon which this proceeding is grounded, it is necessary to consider what the law was at the date of the Canon, the year 1603. Without distinctly ascertaining this, we cannot satisfactorily determine what change the Rubric of 1661, adopted into the 13th and 14th Charles II., cap. 4, made, and in what state it left the law on this head; because it is very possible that the same enactment of a statute, or the same direction in a Rubric, bearing one meaning, may receive one construction when it deals for the first time with a given subject matter, and have another meaning and construction when it deals with a matter that has already been made the subject of enactment or direction; and this is most specially the case where the posterior enactment or direction deals with the matter without making any reference whatever to the prior enactment or direction. Still more is it necessary to note the original state of the law when it is the common law that comes in question, as well as the statute."

Then I shall also refer your Lordship to page 128 of the same Report, which contains a passage which does not accord with the contention of my learned friend, Dr. Stephens, that we have no common law of the Church, and that your Lordship sitting here as Dean of the Arches, is to pay no attention to the old canon law. The same judgment, referring to lay baptism, says, "It prevailed from the beginning of the third century, and though it formed the subject of controversy between the Eastern and Western Churches, during the succeeding period it had become universally admitted by both, in the time of St. Austin, who flourished in the latter part of the fourth century. In England, as elsewhere, it was held valid. The Constitutions of Archbishop Pecham, in Lyndwood's Collection, bearing date A.D. 1281, though severely denouncing a layman who shall intrude himself into the office without necessity, yet declare the baptism valid which is celebrated by laymen, and state that it is not to be repeated," and then he goes on at the bottom of that page as follows: "The position being therefore undeniable, that previous to the year 1603, and at the time the 68th Canon was made, lay baptism, though discountenanced and even forbidden, unless in case of necessity, was yet valid if performed, and this being the common law—not the law made by Statute and Rubric, but by Statute and Rubric plainly recognized and adopted—we are to see if any change was made in that law as it thus stood." Now, I next proceed to show in what manner, as I shall contend, these passages bear on the present case. I will merely remind your Lordship that, by the old common law of the Church, as appears in Lyndwood, lay baptism was lawful. In the Rubrics of the Prayer Book of Edward there was no direction by whom private baptism was to be performed, the words were general; it was merely stated that some one of those present was to say the Lord's Prayer, and use the essential words, &c. Then we come to the canon of 1603, which prohibited the burial of unbaptized children. Up to that time there had been no Canon or Rubric in the Church prohibiting the burial of unbaptized children. Then we come to the Prayer Book of Charles the Second, in which there was inserted a Rubric according to the canon, prohibiting the burial of unbaptized persons. In this case, as your Lordship recollects, the infant had been baptized by a layman, or rather by a dissenting minister, and it was contended that inasmuch as the baptism had not been performed by a clergyman of the Church of England, the child must be treated as an unbaptized person. It was contended that whether the child was baptized in public or in private, to entitle that child itself to Christian burial in England that child must have been baptized by a lawful minister of the Church of England. Lord Brougham, in his judgment, interpreted the Prayer Book of King Charles the Second, by a reference first to the old canon law as found in Lyndwood, and, secondly, to the state of the Rubrics of the previous Prayer Books; and he goes on, in page 130, when he comes to treat of the Rubric of the present Prayer Book, "Now it does not appear that any such change was effected as the case of the present appellant must assume, in order to prevail. The words are plainly directory, and do not amount to an imperative alteration of the rule then subsisting. If lay baptism was valid before the new Rubric of 1661, there is nothing in that Rubric to invalidate it. Generally speaking, where anything is established by statutory provisions, the enactment of a new provision must clearly indicate an intention to abrogate the old, else both will be understood to stand together, if they may. But more especially where the common law is to be changed, and most especially the common law which a statutory provision has recognized and enforced, the intention of any new enactment to abrogate it must be plain to exclude a construction by which both may stand together." Apply those words, my Lord, to the case of the mixed chalice. Prior to the Reformation the use of the mixed chalice was universal. It was part of the common law of the Church. In the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. it is enjoined; in the second Prayer Book of Edward VI. there are no directions whatever contained in reference to it; in the present Prayer Book the Rubric is merely directory, and that remains up to the present time.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The Rubric of the present time is not the same, surely?

(Dr. Tristram.) No, it is not; but as far as the mixed chalice is concerned it is the same—it is just as directory as the other.

(The Dean of the Arches.) How can you say that as far as the mixed chalice is concerned the Rubric of the present time is the same and it is just as directory as the other?

(Dr. Tristram.) The same as in the second Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But there is an order in the present Prayer Book, whereas there is no order at all in the second Prayer Book; it stands in this way. In the first Prayer Book there had been a direct order to mix a little pure water with the wine. In the second there is silence upon that subject, though there is wine mentioned in the Post Communion Rubric, but there is no direction as to the consecration at all. Then in the existing Prayer Book there is a direction as to putting the wine and bread upon the table, omitting what is contained in the first Prayer Book, namely the mention of the mixture of a little water. But you cannot put it in this way that it is the same, because it is not.

(Dr. Tristram.) Take the present Prayer Book for the Office of the Administration of Private Baptism, there the Rubric says it is to be done by the lawful minister. By the old law of the Church, by the former Prayer Books, there were no special directions at all as to by whom it was necessary that this Sacrament should be administered; and it is held that it may still be administered by a layman. I submit, that if you are entitled in the case of private baptism of children to revert to the old state of the law, and incorporate this law into the Rubric, you clearly are in the case of the mixed chalice entitled to revert to the old law and incorporate that law in the present Rubric. In both cases both Rubrics are directory, and there is no prohibition contained in either, and I am at a loss to see how it can be contended upon this decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council that the use of the mixed chalice is unlawful.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I can very well understand the bearing of your general argument upon this case, and it may be very important; but what is there in that case of Escott v. Mastin, similar to the two Rubrics, one containing an express mention of the water, and one mentioning wine and omitting the water? Just tell me what you conceive to be the analogy. There were not two canons, one of which said that the baptism should be performed in a certain way, and another which said it should be performed in another way.

(Dr. Tristram.) In the Rubric of the present Prayer Book the baptism is to be performed by the "lawful minister."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Very well, and in order to understand what a lawful minister was you went back to the old law?

(Dr. Tristram.) No, my Lord; according to the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council they would not consider a layman a lawful minister. The whole of the judgment was founded upon the assumption that the person who performed that baptism was not a lawful minister; that although by the Rubric of the present Prayer Book it is expressly enjoined that the private baptism of infants shall be performed by a lawful minister, yet still a baptism performed by a person who is not a minister at all, or who may be an unlawful minister, is a valid baptism.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, but it did not exactly amount to that. They said that the lawful thing was that it should be done by a proper minister, but the other irregular mode still made it a lawful baptism. They looked into the old law to see if baptism was valid or not under those circumstances.

(Dr. Tristram.) Yes, but it was on the ground that there was no prohibition first of all; and, secondly, on the ground that by the old common law of the Church baptism was valid, though performed by a lay person.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That applies to your argument here no doubt, upon the point that there is no direct prohibition; but there is this difference, no doubt there is no prohibition, but there is specification and omission. The question is whether the maxim of the law is not that the omission was intentional. There is no omission of the direction which was contained in the other Prayer Book. I think that seems to be a different principle to that which was employed in Escott v. Mastin. Your citation of the case is very good for many purposes, no doubt, but it is another principle. It may be a valuable help towards the right adjudication, perhaps, of this case; but as far as the particular question of the mixture of wine and water is concerned, the difficulty you have to contend with is a difficulty of another kind, as it appears to me. If there had been no statement of the water in the 1st Book of Edward VI., then your argument would apply very well, but there is a statement with regard to water in the 1st Book of Edward VI. Then the question is, what is the principle of law, when there are two statutes, one specifying a particular thing, and the other omitting it. The question would be, whether the principle of law would not be that the thing which was omitted was omitted intentionally.

(Dr. Tristram.) Well, my Lord, in this case, according to the old Rubrics the system was that anyone might baptize.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am confining my observations to the Prayer Book of Edward VI. and the Prayer Book of the present day. As it appears to me your difficulty is the previous specification. If there had been no previous specification about the water your argument would apply very well, but it does not quite remove the difficulty (although it applies, no doubt) which arises from the fact that wine and water were specified in the 1st Book of Edward VI., and that wine alone is specified in the present Prayer Book. The Court must ask it itself, must it not, why the omission? and the question is what is the answer to that difficulty.

(Dr. Tristram.) My first answer would be, that if it was intended to make it unlawful there would have been a direct prohibition.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I understand that, and you say there is none.

(Dr. Tristram.) There is none. My second answer is, that it was the intention of the reformers of the Second Prayer Book to leave the question open.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But did it leave it open? because then it would not have specified wine at all, that is the whole question; by omitting one thing and specifying another has it left it open?

(Dr. Tristram.) Well, my Lord, I think you must take the two Prayer Books together; there is nothing prohibitory in the second Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That I agree with.

(Dr. Tristram.) As I said before, by way of illustration, just look at the first Prayer Book, which orders baptism by immersion, and the exact mode of it.

The present Prayer Book provides for immersion simply, and does not direct the mode in which it is done.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But that is a different thing, there you are introducing a new element. There were two elements specified, and you are introducing another. That is not so in the case you put.

(Dr. Tristram.) Take the case of private baptism; I am introducing another element into the administration of private baptism in the present Rubric, because in the present Rubric it says it must be done by a lawful minister.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is not a new element, is it?

(Dr. Tristram.) It is, I think. I mean if the argument holds good in one case it does in the other. Lord Brougham lays it down in this way, he goes on to say, "Generally speaking, where anything is established by statutory provisions, the enactment of a new provision must clearly indicate an intention to abrogate the old." Now where is there this indication?

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, that is the question, does not the specification of the wine, and the omission of the water, declare the intention to abrogate the old Rubric which specified both. That is the whole question, as it appears to me.

(Dr. Tristram.) I shall submit to your Lordship that if the two can be read together, as I submit they can, it does not.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I can understand your argument, and I go along with you as far as the argument of there being nothing directly prohibitory is concerned. But the question is, whether there is not something inferentially prohibited, that is the question.

(Dr. Tristram.) I fall back on my old argument, namely, that if it had been intended to prohibit this practice it would have been done in express words. Lord Brougham goes on, "But more especially where the common law is to be changed, and most especially the common law which a statutory provision had recognized and enforced, the intention of any new enactment to abrogate it must be plain, to exclude a construction by which both may stand together. This principle, which is plainly founded in reason and common sense, has been largely sanctioned by authority. The distinction which Lord Coke takes in one place, between affirmative and negative words, giving more effect to the latter (Coke, Littleton 115a), has sometimes been denied, at least doubted. (W. Jones, 270, Lovelace's case, before the Windsor Forest Court in 1632, in which there is a dictum of Lord Chief Justice Richardson) Mr. Hargrave thinks upon a misapprehension (Note 154). But the rule which is laid down in 2nd Inst. 200, has been adopted by all the authorities, that 'a statute made in the affirmative, without any negative expressed or implied, doth not take away the common law.'"

I rely upon that position. Here is the Rubric without any negative expressed or implied, and therefore I say it does not take away the operation of the common law. Then he goes on to refer to a case in Comyn's Digest, and he says, "That case decides that the penalty attached by the Uniformity Act of Elizabeth for not reading the Common Prayer, on the second offence, does not take away the same common law penalty on the first offence. Now here, the former law being this—'Let lay baptism be valid, but let ministers only perform the rite, unless in case of great necessity;' and the new law being—

" 'Let lawful ministers baptize,' it must be taken as an addition to and not a substitution for the former, unless the intention plainly appear to make it substitutionary and not accumulative. The proof is on those who would make it substitutionary and abrogatory."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Exactly; and what you have to make out is that the order for wine alone in the present Prayer Book, wine and water having been ordered in the former Prayer Book, is not a substitution—that you have to make out.

(Dr. Tristram.) My learned friend Mr. Prideaux went very clearly into the case, and called your Lordship's attention to the fact that the word "wine" was used in the ritual of that day for wine and water. "There is another striking instance, namely, in the delivery of the Sacrament to the people. It is said in the first Book 'When he delivereth the Sacrament of the Body of Christ, he shall say to every one these words.' But in the second Book it is simply, 'when he delivereth the bread he shall say.' The words 'every one' were omitted. That this omission was made in deference to the Puritans is clear. The Catholics desired to say the words to each communicant, as more expressive of their doctrine, that God wills that each and all shall be saved."

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say that the maxim, expressio unius est exclusio alterius does not apply.

(Dr. Tristram.) That is what I say. "Surely it could not be for one moment inferred, that in so far as the omission of the words 'every one' gave the liberty to one party of administering to a table, as it is expressed, at once, it at the same time took away the liberty from the other party of administering to each communicant separately." That is a passage from Mr. Grueber's pamphlet on the mixed chalice. There are one or two other passages all of which I will not read at length, but which I wish to refer your Lordship, to the case of Kemp v. Wickes (3 Phillimore, page 264), page 276; the passage is: "The law of the Church of England and its history are to be deduced from the ancient general canon law; from the particular constitutions made in this country to regulate the English Church, from our own canons; from the Rubric and from any Acts of Parliament that may have passed upon the subject; and the whole may be illustrated, also, by the writings of eminent persons." Then there is also a passage at page 281. After citing from several ecclesiastical lawyers, and also from Lyndwood, he says: "Now these passages show not only that those baptisms were held to be valid, but they show how extremely cautious the Church was that baptism should not be repeated. These references to the ancient law will also serve to explain and illustrate any matter which could be considered as doubtful in the construction of the more modern law of the Rubric. It therefore seems to admit of no doubt that by the law of the English Church, as well deduced from the general canon law as from its own particular constitutions down to the time of the Reformation, lay baptism was allowed and practised." So the matter stood at the time of the Reformation. Then Sir John Nicholl lays down the same principle that Lord Brougham does with reference to the authority of the canon law. At page 286 he says: "In construing all laws, it is proper to inquire how the law previously stood, for it will require more express and distinct terms to abrogate and to change an old established law, than to provide for a new case upon which the former law has been wholly silent."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, that is very pertinent.

(Dr. Tristram.) "Private baptism by laymen had always been held valid, and almost enjoined as regular. The Rubric having now introduced the order that it shall be administered by the lawful minister, what would be the obvious construction of this alteration?"

(The Dean of the Arches.) And what does he say would be the consequence—read the passage.

(Dr. Tristram.) "That in the regular and ordinary and decent administration of private baptism it became the duty of the lawful minister to perform the office. But if the old law was meant to be completely changed, if it had been intended to invalidate the old law in this respect, and that all other baptism except that by a lawful minister should be considered as absolutely null and void, the new law would most expressly and distinctly have declared it." Those are the passages to which I wish to refer your Lordship upon this part of the case. The counter proposition that I should lay down in opposition to my learned friends upon this point is, that in ceremonial acts as in matters of doctrine certain questions were advisedly left open, and the passages to which I shall refer your Lordship in support of that proposition are some well-known passages in the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of Gorham v. Bishop of Exeter. I am quoting from the Report of Mr. Brodrick and Mr. Freemantle, page 96.

"If the Articles which constitute the code of faith, and from which any differences are prohibited, nevertheless contain expressions which unavoidably admit of different constructions,—and members of the Church are less at liberty to draw from the Articles different inferences in matters of faith not expressly decided, and upon such points to exercise their private judgments,—we may reasonably expect to find such differences of opinion allowable in the interpretation of the devotional services, which were framed not for the purpose of determining points of faith, but of establishing (to use the expression of the statute of Elizabeth) an uniform order of Common Prayer, and of the administration of sacraments, rites, and ceremonies of the Church of England."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That passage rather points the other way, does it not; it points rather to there being a distinction that in matters in which they are to be uniform there is nothing left. I think it rather points against your argument, does not it?

(Dr. Tristram.) I shall submit, not, my Lord, if the construction which we put upon rites and ceremonies is correct, because we do not for one moment contend that a clergyman is entitled to omit any prayer, or add any prayer, accompanied by a manual act. All that we contend is, as your Lordship has heard over and over again, that a clergyman may do these acts without words, without being brought within the penal clauses of the Acts of Uniformity.

Then at page 102 of the same judgment is this: "Mr. Gorham's doctrine may be contrary to the opinion entertained by many learned and pious persons, contrary to the opinion which such persons have, by their own particular studies, deduced from Holy Scripture, contrary to the opinions which they have deduced from the usages and doctrines of the primitive Church, or contrary to the opinion which they have deduced from uncertain and ambiguous expressions in the formularies; still, if the doctrine of Mr. Gorham is not contrary or repugnant to the doctrine of the Church of England as by law established, it cannot afford a legal ground for refusing him institution to the living to which he has been lawfully presented." Then it goes on to say: "We agree with Sir William Scott in the opinion which he expressed in Stone's case, in the Consistory Court of London, 'That if any Article is really a subject of dubious interpretation, it would be highly improper that this court should fix on one meaning, and prosecute all those who hold a contrary opinion regarding its interpretation.'" Then there is another passage at page 104: "We express no opinion on the theological accuracy of these opinions; or any of them. The writers whom we have cited are not always consistent with themselves, nor are the reasons upon which they found their positions always valid; and other “writers of great eminence, and worthy of great respect, have expressed very different opinions. But the mere fact that such opinions have been propounded and maintained by persons so eminent and so much respected, as well as by very many others, appears to us sufficiently to prove that the liberty which was left by the Articles and formularies has been actually enjoyed and exercised by the members and ministers of the Church of England.” There is only one other authority on this part of the case to which I will refer your Lordship, and that is a passage in the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of Williams v. The Bishop of Salisbury (2 Moore’s Reports, New Series, page 425): “There may be very many matters of religious speculation and inquiry on which the Church may have refrained from pronouncing any opinion at all. On matters on which the Church has prescribed no rule, there is so far freedom of opinion that they may be discussed without penal consequences. Nor in a proceeding like the present are we at liberty to ascribe to the Church any rule or teaching which we do not find expressly and distinctly stated, or which is not plainly involved in or to be collected from that which is written.” My Lord, that of course refers to questions of doctrine; but I must press upon your Lordship that if there is to be that liberty allowed in questions of doctrine, why should there not be some slight liberty allowed in questions of practices such as those which are brought before the Court in this case?

Then my friend Dr. Stephens on the other side contended that upon the well-known doctrine of contemporanea expositio it was quite clear that the interpretation which he puts upon the Acts of Uniformity and the Rubrics was the interpretation intended to be put upon them by the framers. He referred first of all to the several Injunctions; he referred to the Royal Injunctions; he referred to the Injunctions of Bishops, and to the Visitation Articles of Bishops, and he also referred to the writings of several of the Reformers. His contention is that the Injunction of 1547, the first Injunction, was repealed by 1 Edward VI., cap. 12. My contention is that it is not repealed.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Why?

(Dr. Tristram.) Because I submit to your Lordship that this Injunction was not issued under the statute of the 32nd of Henry VIII., but that it was issued under the statute of the 26th of Henry VIII., cap. 1.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the statute which Sir John Dodson says it was made under.

(Dr. Tristram.) No, my Lord, he says under the statute of 1539.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then do you take a different view from Sir John Dodson?

(Dr. Tristram.) Yes, my Lord, with humble submission I do. There were three statutes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Because I rather understood your leader to refer me to Sir John Dodson’s view as the ground of his argument.

(Dr. Tristram.) Yes, my Lord, that matter had not been looked into at that time.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I certainly understood Mr. Prideaux to rely upon Sir John Dodson’s judgment. Was not that so, Mr. Prideaux?

(Mr. Prideaux.) I did so because I felt that any rate in this Court I was safe in doing so. But I say that is no reason why Dr. Tristram—

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is no reason why your junior should not take a different view, certainly.

(Mr. Prideaux.) It is quite true that myself and my friend Mr. James felt we might rest satisfied on this point with the judgment of Sir John Dodson.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Let me hear your argument, Dr. Tristram. You say these injunctions were not made under the statute of proclamations?

(Dr. Tristram.) I say they were not made under the statute of proclamations, but under the previous statute passed in 1534, the 26th of Henry VIII., cap. 1. The words of the statute are that the King shall be reputed the supreme head of the Church of England, &c.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You see, Dr. Tristram, this is a very important point.

(Dr. Tristram.) Yes, my Lord, I felt it to be so. The words are these: “That the King, our Sovereign Lord, his heirs and successors, kings of this realm, shall be taken, accepted, and reputed the only supreme head in earth of the Church of England called ‘Anglicana Ecclesia,’ and shall have and enjoy, annexed and united to the imperial crown of this realm, as well the title and style thereof, as all honours, dignities, pre-eminences, jurisdictions, privileges, authorities, immunities, profits, and commodities to the said dignity of supreme head of the same Church belonging and appertaining: and that our said Sovereign Lord, his heirs and successors, kings of this realm, shall have full power and authority from time to time to visit, repress, redress, reform, order, correct, restrain, and amend all such errors, heresies, abuses, offences, contempts, and enormities, whatsoever they be, which by any manner, spiritual authority, or jurisdiction ought or may lawfully be reformed, repressed, ordered, redressed, corrected, restrained, or amended, most to the pleasure of Almighty God, the increase of virtue in Christ’s religion, and for the conservation of the peace, security, and tranquillity of this realm.” Now, the reason why it appears to me that these Injunctions were issued under this statute, and not under the Statute of Proclamations, are twofold; first of all, prior to the passing of the Statute of Proclamations, we have three Injunctions which were issued by Henry VIII., and your Lordship will find them referred to in “Strype’s Memorials,” volume 1, part 2, page 495.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What do you say is the date of these Injunctions?

(Dr. Tristram.) Prior to the date of 1539, and therefore they must have been issued under some previous Act of Parliament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You mean the Injunctions issued before the proclamation statute.

(Dr. Tristram.) Yes, my Lord, that is my argument.

Then the second ground upon which I submit they were not issued under this statute is this—that these Injunctions do not appear to have been published in the way in which royal proclamations are directed to be published, and, if issued under this statute of 1534, I submit that they were not repealed by 1 Edward VI., cap. 12, because there are no pains or forfeitures contained in the Act of 1534; and it is only in a case where pains or forfeitures are expressly enjoined in case of non-compliance with such Injunctions that that statute can operate. I say the statute of Edward VI. does not operate upon Injunctions issued under a statute which does not contain clauses of pains and forfeitures.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You see, Dr. Tristram, you open a very new ground by this argument.

(Dr. Tristram.) Yes, my Lord, it is new ground, but I do not depart from the position—the cardinal position which has been taken by my learned leaders—because we both contend that the Injunctions of 1547 are still binding. All that my learned leaders said was this—they found that Sir John Dodson, who occupied the chair, which your Lordship now occupies, decided that they were binding as issued under a particular Act of Parliament, and therefore my friends submitted that your Lordship would be bound by his decision. But I submit that if your Lordship had any doubts upon that point, those doubts will be cleared away by referring the Injunctions to the previous statute.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You both contend, as I understand, that even if the Injunctions were issued under the Statute of Proclamations, and if the Statute of Proclamations was repealed, that would not carry with it the repeal of things lawfully ordered under the statute, and therefore that the Rubric in the Prayer Book of Charles II. replaced the state of things under the Prayer Book of Edward VI., and would replace some of these Injunctions.

(Dr. Tristram.) Yes, my Lord. Then my friend on the opposite side will have to overthrow two positions. If he succeeds in satisfying your Lordship either that they were not issued under the 32nd of Henry VIII., or that, if issued under the 32nd of Henry VIII., they are repealed by 1 Edward VI., cap. 12; then he will have to satisfy your Lordship, further, that they were not issued under the statute of 1534, because if issued under that they are clearly not repealed, because 1 Edward VI., cap. 12., does not profess to have repealed and cannot be held to have repealed the statute of 1534.

The next ground upon which my learned friend relied was that, according to the principle of contemporanea expositio, the construction which he put upon the Act of Parliament must be the true construction; and in support of this position he referred to certain Articles and Injunctions issued by the bishops. Now I am not going through all those Articles and Injunctions, but I will refer your Lordship very briefly to three of them, in order to show how very unsafe it is to rely upon anything, or at least upon everything, stated in those documents as an authority of what the law was at the time they were issued. I will take Bishop Ridley's Articles of 1550 (1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 93). Those Articles were read against Mr. Mackonochie, and no doubt they prohibited many acts which were illegal, but they prohibit one act which was certainly legal, namely, the saying of the Agnus Dei in use in 1550, before the Communion, which is enjoined in the first Prayer Book of Edward VI.

I will next refer your Lordship to the Articles set out in 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, pages 74 and 76. These articles were also cited against the defendant by my friend Dr. Stephens, because they prohibited the setting of any light upon the Lord's board at any time. My friend Mr. Prideaux has made several observations upon these Articles, and therefore I shall merely call your Lordship's attention to the fact that in these Articles, which purport to have been issued in 1549, the oil and chrism at baptism are prohibited, although they are directed by the first Prayer Book of Edward VI.

Lastly, I will refer your Lordship to the Articles of Archbishop Grindal, issued in the year 1576, when he was Archbishop of Canterbury. They also are to be found in 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 399, and amongst other things he asks: "And whether all vestments, albs, tunicles, stoles, phanons, pixes, paxes, handbells, sacring bells, censers, chrismatories, crosses, candlesticks, holy-water-stocks, images, and such other relics, and monuments of superstition and idolatry be utterly defaced, broken, and destroyed." Well, my Lord, at that time the use of the albs, stoles, and crosses were perfectly legal, and yet my friend Dr. Stephens cited this Article against the defendant, and contended that because candlesticks were prohibited by Archbishop Grindal, they are therefore illegal.

The Articles then go on to inquire, "Whether your parson, vicar, curate, or minister, do wear any cope in your parish church or chapel, or minister the Holy Communion in any chalice heretofore used at Mass." I must say I think that Archbishop Grindal was carrying his power as Ordinary to rather an extraordinary extent. He seems to consider that it was illegal (according to this Article) for a clergyman of the Church of England to administer the Holy Communion in any chalice which had been used at Mass in the Roman Church; therefore shall I humbly submit to your Lordship that you cannot place very much reliance on citations from these Articles.

Next, my Lord, we come to the third argument upon which my friends have relied, namely, that several of the advanced reformers of that time, from whom they quoted very copiously, held opinions at variance with those of Mr. Mackonochie, and therefore they wish you to deduce the conclusion that his practices are illegal. Now there is just one of these to whom I will refer, and from whose works my friend quoted, and that is Thomas Sampson. My friend Mr. Stephens quoted a letter of his, dated January the 6th, 1559. Your Lordship asked who he was. I find he was offered the bishopric of Norwich in 1560, or somewhere about then, but that he declined it; that he was afterwards Dean of Christchurch from 1561 to 1565; that then his opinions were so diametrically opposed to the orthodox opinions of the Church of England that he appears to have resigned the deanery of Christchurch. Your Lordship will find what the opinions of this Reformer whom my friend vouches against Mr. Mackonochie were. In Burnet's History of the Reformation, volume 3, part 1, page 455, "Mr. Sampson wrote from Zurich, he and his friend complaining of the music of organs, of making sponsors in baptism necessary, of the cross in baptism, of the Court of Faculties." Well really if a divine of that date actually complains of and objects to the use of music of organs, of sponsors in baptism, and of the cross in baptism, I do not think he is a very cogent authority to quote against Mr. Mackonochie, in support of the view taken by my friend. This letter of Thomas Sampson which was referred to by my friend Mr. Stephens is a very remarkable letter, and I merely call your Lordship's attention to these words at page 63 of the Zurich letters; he says: "Oh! my father, what can I hope for when the ministry of the word is banished from Court? while the crucifix is allowed, with lights burning before it. The altars indeed are removed and images also throughout the kingdom. The crucifix and candles are retained at the Court alone, and the wretched multitude are not only rejoicing at this, but will imitate it of their own accord. What can I hope, when three of our lately appointed bishops are to officiate at the table of the Lord, one as priest, another as deacon, and a third as subdeacon, before the image of the crucifix, or at least not far from it, with candles, and habited in the golden vestments of the papacy, and are thus to celebrate the Lord's Supper without any sermon?" Here, according to the statement of Dr. Sampson, it appears that within two years of the passing of the Act of Uniformity of Elizabeth three bishops are about to violate that Act in celebrating the Lord's Supper, by officiating at an altar on which there is a crucifix and two lighted candles, that is to say, according to the view of my learned friend, your Lordship is asked by my learned friends to conclude that these three bishops did that which was an illegal act, and that they as well as Mr. Mackonochie for so doing were liable to fine and imprisonment. Then in the 64th page there are these words: "I propose this single question for your resolution, for I wish my father to employ you as my medium of correspondence with Masters Bullinger and Bernardine. It is this, whether the image of the crucifix placed on the table of the Lord with lighted candles is to be regarded as a thing indifferent; and if it is not to be so considered, but as an unlawful and wicked practice, then I ask, suppose the Queen should enjoin all the bishops and clergy either to admit this image, together with the candles, in the other churches, or to retire from the ministry of the word, what should be our conduct in this case? Should we not rather quit the ministry of the word and sacraments than that these relics of the Amorites should be admitted? Certain of our friends, indeed, appear in some measure inclined to regard these things as matters of indifference. For my own part I am altogether of opinion that should this be enjoined, we ought rather suffer deprivation." There you have on the authority of Dr. Sampson a statement that in the opinion of certain of his own friends these matters, with some of which Mr. Mackonochie is charged, were indifferent, and there is no expression throughout all the quotations that have been cited by my learned friends on the other side indicating that in the opinion of any of the writers these acts were illegal; and I shall respectfully submit to your Lordship that to bring these citations within the doctrine of contemporanea expositio your Lordship must be satisfied that in the opinion of the writers which were quoted all the acts which they reprehend; more particularly of course those acts with which Mr. Mackonochie is charged, were then considered contrary to law.

There is a great deal of valuable information in Burnet's History of the Reformation upon this point, but I have not time to read it to your Lordship now. You will there see the whole account of the proceedings of Dr. Sampson. He subsequently appears to have resigned the deanery of Christchurch.

There is another letter in Burnet, to which I shall refer your Lordship without reading it at length; from Dr. Sampson, at page 153. I shall merely ask your Lordship to make a note of it. It is dated 1566, and certainly there are some very curious questions which he submits there; for instance, "Whether anything of a ceremonial nature may be prescribed to the Church by the Sovereign without the assent and free concurrence of churchmen?" "Whether it be lawful to revive the Jewish ceremonies respecting the habit of the priesthood, and which were abolished by Christ?" "Whether it be expedient to borrow rites from idolaters or heretics, and to transfer such as are specially dedicated to their sect and religion to the use of the Reformed Church?" "Whether conformity and general agreement must of necessity be required in ceremonies of this kind?" "Whether those ceremonies may be retained which occasion evident offence?" Then he says, "Here you have, most esteemed sir, our difficulties. Here many pious men are hesitating; for the sake of whom I again ask it as a favour from you, that having well considered the matter with Master Gualter and the rest of your colleagues, with your wonted piety, you will plainly state your opinion, and send a written answer to each of the above questions." There was a difference of opinion, and there has been at all times in the Church, as to whether it was expedient to do these things. Dr. Sampson thought it was not; the Queen thought it was. Her three bishops ministered at the Holy Communion before the altar in the chapel in a manner (according to my friend's contention) contrary to the Act of Uniformity.

I am reminded by my learned leader that I should press upon your Lordship this consideration, that our contention is, that though the words "rites and ceremonies" often mean ritual, they do not mean this in the title to the preface of the Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That has been argued a good deal, has it not?

(Dr. Tristram.) Yes, my Lord. Your Lordship will observe the book is called "The Book of Common Prayer, and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church." Your Lordship can hardly take the kneeling during the celebration of the Holy Communion to be a ceremony. But I will now ask your Lordship this question, Can the Court come to the conclusion that such great men as Cecil and Bacon, who at the time when the Act of Uniformity of 1558 passed swayed the councils of Queen Elizabeth, would have been parties to an Act of Parliament which would actually consign a clergyman of the Church of England to a felon's cell, and impose upon him a heavy pecuniary fine, if he should perform any one of those acts with which Mr. Mackonochie is charged? My Lord, it is incredible to suppose the statesmen of that day, such great men as Lord Keeper Bacon, who was Lord Keeper in the year 1558, and Cecil, who was the Queen's Principal Secretary, and whose province it was to moderate between the contending parties of that day, it is incredible to suppose that they would have been parties to such an Act.

It is incredible to suppose that such men would have been parties to the passing of an Act of Parliament which would have consigned a clerk in holy orders to a dungeon for simply kneeling down and offering up a private prayer after the consecration of the elements at the Holy Communion, or for officiating at an altar upon which lighted candles were placed, or for mixing a little pure and clean water with the wine previous to the consecration of the sacramental cup, a practice which was declared by the 5th and 6th of Edward the 6th "to be a godly custom," or for allowing and permitting a censer to be in his church, in which to burn incense during the service. It is impossible to suppose that these men would ever have been parties to such an Act of Parliament, and yet my friend asked your Lordship to come to this conclusion. I say it is incredible to suppose that all these things could have been then made illegal or contrary to the law, when we recollect that at this very time the majority of the clergy of the country were in favour of retaining and adhering to the old forms and ceremonies, and when the great mass of the people of the country were in favour also of retaining and adhering to the old forms and ceremonies, as has been pressed upon your Lordship by my friend Mr. Prideaux.

The natural conclusion from the state of things of that day is that very many of the clergy at that time performed many of these ceremonial acts which are not expressly prescribed by the Rubric; and not only would they do it, but we have authority for saying that some of the most eminent bishops of the Church have done so, Bishop Cosin, Bishop Andrews, and others. On this point I have a little book of Bishop Andrews in which it appears that according to the form of consecration of a church which he drew up, and which was published, I say, from the Rubric of that book it appears that he on that occasion mixed water with the wine prior to the celebration of the Holy Communion.

I further submit to your Lordship that the Legislature at that time adopted a much more reasonable and much wiser course than that contended for on the other side; they left some of these questions open, and they were left to be determined by the Ordinary, by the bishop; they were left purposely to the personal and discretionary jurisdiction of the bishop, and in case the bishop had any doubt he was directed by the paragraph in the preface to the Prayer Book, with which your Lordship is so familiar, to refer to the archbishop. It appears to me that it could not have been the intention of the framers of that preface to leave any question of doubt to be referred to the chancellor of the diocese; because the words "bishop" and "archbishop" are used; and there is no precedent in the ecclesiastical courts of these cases having been submitted to the chancellor in court; and it would be most inconvenient for a clergyman if he had any doubts, to have to go to the chancellor, who might hereafter be his judge in the very matter. The way in which difficulties of this nature arising in such cases would be met would be this—after the bishop had given his decision, if the clergyman did not obey it, the bishop might enforce his decision by after proceedings against the clerk in the ecclesiastical courts. If the ecclesiastical judge considered what the bishop ordered was just and reasonable, then he would enforce it by monition; and I submit to your Lordship that that is the way in which the framers of the Act of Uniformity contemplated meeting cases of this kind.

I will now make a very few observations on the particular charges which have been brought against Mr. Mackonochie. First, as to elevation. It is indicated or suggested by the very words of the Rubric in the consecration prayer. In respect to the first elevation, the form of the marginal Rubrics is much to be observed. Three distinct manual acts are named of the bread: (1.) Here the priest is to take the paten into his hands; (and 2.) Here to break the bread; (and 3.) Here to lay his hand, &c., &c. Again, of the cup: (1.) Here he is to take the cup into his hand; (2.) Here to lay his hand, &c., &c.

Observe, in the consecration of the bread it does not say in one and the same sentence, here he is to take the paten into his hand and to break the bread. There are two distinct acts. The directions certainly imply the taking of the paten up and the putting of it down again. Then are the hands of the priest free to break the bread. Observe, too, it does not say, "Take the paten into his hand," but "into his hands." It would seem he is to raise the paten with both hands, and afterwards to use both hands to break the bread, as is most convenient. Of the cup, too, the directions seem to point to a separate action by the wording of the second Rubric. Observe, "to lay his hand on every vessel, be it chalice or flagon," &c. It does not say he is to lay his one hand upon the cup while he holds it with the other, and afterwards to lay his hand upon other vessels. Moreover, it would be natural to raise the cup not with the left but with the right hand. In this case the hands must be released. Observe, too, there is a colon after each marginal direction, i.e. after the first as well as after the second in the consecration of the bread. They are three distinct acts. Moreover there is in either case a mark of reference, an asterisk, a cross, and a double cross, to the words opposite, marking them further as separate acts. Of the first elevation, then, we may say not only is it not forbidden, but rather suggested or indicated by the language of the Prayer Book of 1662.

(The learned counsel handed up the following additional observations to the Court.)

"Further, all that is here said agrees with the views well known of the principal divines who were Commissioners in 1662. Bishop Jolly, in his treatise on the Christian Sacrifice, has the following remark: "When we inspect the names of the Episcopalian Commissioners and find Sheldon, Cosin, and Sanderson amongst the bishops, with Heylin, Gunting, Pearson, and Thorndike amongst the priests, we may suppose that with regard to the Eucharistic Sacrifice in particular, they inclined to reduce it to the primitive standard, as nearly as the unhappy genius which then prevailed would admit." Now the primitive standard was undoubtedly to elevate as an act of oblation to Almighty God."

I do not know that I have any further observations to make upon the subject of the mixed chalice. There is one passage to which I wish to refer you upon Elevation before I conclude, and that is from Bishop Jewel. The contention of my friend Dr. Stephens was, that elevation necessarily implied the paten and cup were raised with a view to being worshipped. Now you find in Bishop Jewel's controversy with Harding, page 512, that the bishop did not consider elevation necessarily implied adoration, for he says, "But, that the holding up the Sacrament should import adoration to the same, as M. Harding surmiseth, neither is it thought true by all others of that side, nor hath it any good savour or shew of truth. Indeed great pardons and charters have been liberally given of late years for the better maintenance thereof. And Durandus saith, 'Therefore elevation is made, ut populus intelligat, Christum venisse super altare,' that the people may understand that Christ is come down upon the altar.' But the old learned fathers, both Greek and Latin, when they held up a little, or shewed the Sacrament, evermore they called the people to draw near, to receive, to be partakers of the holy mysteries, and to lift up their hearts; but in the time of the same ceremony they never spake one word of adoration."

I will pass away from the subject of lighted candles, by citing one passage from the work of Dr. Stephens on the Book of Common Prayer, published by the Ecclesiastical History Society, page 1102a.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is in three volumes, which volume are you citing from? I think they are paged on.

(Dr. Tristram.) It is page 1102a. Dr. Stephens, after referring to the fact that a great many dignitaries of the Church had used lighted candles, concludes in these words, "It is difficult to believe that had this" (that is, lighted candles at the communion table), been unlawful, the practice should have been so largely sanctioned by the heads of our Church, especially of those who "revised the Prayer Book." My Lord, with that passage my client, Mr. Mackenzie, cordially agrees.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is an opinion out of court, I am afraid.

(Dr. Tristram.) My friend Dr. Stephens has quoted his own book on the Prayer Book; and I merely wish to show your Lordship that all people do not take the same view as he does now, and that he himself did not when he was writing, as it were, calmly and judicially.

On the subject of incense I wish to call your Lordship's attention to a few points which were taken by Dr. Stephens, and to the answers which I have to give to them. I will hand up this paper to your Lordship afterwards, and will supply Dr. Stephens with a copy of it.

(The learned counsel then read the following paper and handed the same to the Court.)

INCENSE.—ANSWERS TO MR. STEPHENS'S ARGUMENTS.

(1.) Mr. Stephens says (4th day, p. 2) there is no warrant for it in "the canon law."

But see Archbishop Gray's Constitutions, A.D. 1250, which direct the parishioners to find "a cense pot."—(Johnson's Canons, Aug. Cath. Lib., vol II., p. 117. See also Archbishop Peckham's Constitutions, Lambeth, ib. page 302, and Archbishop Winchelsey's Constitutions, ib. page 318.

(2.) Then he says: "The first Prayer Book made not the slightest mention of incense pots or censers."—Ib. page 2.

Not did it of the linen cloth; nor did the Second Book name the "Glory be to Thee, O Lord," before the Gospel.

But this assumes that the use of incense is a ceremony in the sense of the Act and Book.

(4.) "If incense be used as an act of religious worship, or as a symbol of prayer, it is an unauthorized addition to the Book of Common Prayer."—Ib. page 2.

Is then every act so used illegal? e.g., St. Paul speaks of "lifting up holy hands"—is it illegal for the priest at the sursum corda, in the celebration, to lift up his hands as a symbol of prayer?

(5.) Mr. Stephens refers (p. 3) to Bishop Ridley's works, Parker Society, p. 90, for a passage against incense.

But the whole passage shows that Ridley was arguing against the honour done to images, and that it entirely supports the prohibition of the 3rd Injunction of 1547 against censuring images, but does not in the least touch any other kind of censuring or any other use of incense. The title is: "A Treatise addressed to King Edward VI. in the names of the whole clergy, concerning images, that they are not to be set up or worshipped in churches."

(6.) Pilkington (p. 129) says: "The Popish Church hath . . . for the ears, singing, ringing, and organs; for the nose, frankincense sweet."

Then Pilkington objects to both alike, and so any argument from him proves too much.

(7.) Mr. Stephens says (p. 5): "Certain false, erroneous, and unscriptural doctrines were laid down by the Court of Rome, so as to put men's consciences into trammels. And how do they carry it out? By every species of music, fine dresses, &c."

(8.) Mr. Stephens refers to Jewell, I. p. 110; II. pp. 710 and 713; Andrewes' Sermons, V. 324 and 355.

(9.) Mr. Stephens (p. 7) says: "The burning of incense at the first lesson (by Bishop Andrewes) may have been a memorial of the old dispensation, &c."

(10.) Mr. Stephens says, in reference to the form provided by Archbishop Sancroft for consecrating a censer, "There was no censer to consecrate."

(11.) Mr. Stephens says (p. 8): "No doubt, my Lord, incense may be used, it would be idle for me to say that incense may not be used for the purpose of fumigation."

(12.) Mr. Coleridge argued that when George Herbert used it, it was for the purpose of fumigation.

Are not "fine dresses" ordered by the Prayer Book? Are they not in use at St. Alban's? Are they not as symbolical of "false doctrine" as incense can be?

But Bishop Jewell is simply treating of sacrifice in connexion with Malachi, 1. 11.

And Bishop Andrewes is merely contending that incense, under the law, was a "type of prayer."

But it was just as much a "ceremony" in Mr. Stephens's sense, as the censuring charged against Mr. Mackonochie; and therefore the one was quite as illegal in Bishop Andrewes as the other is said to be in Mr. Mackonochie.

Suppose there was not, yet there might have been one; and it is for such an occurrence that he provided the direction: "When a censer is presented and received they say, 'While the king, &c.'" (E. C. Union Case, p. 73.)

He uses this remark in showing that Déan Sherlock was accused of being a papist in disguise, yet it is plain he was not so, and therefore this makes nothing against, but rather for, incense.

He is said to have used it "on great festivals;" this shows it was a religious act; if it was merely for fumigation, why did he not always use it?

ARGUMENTS FOR INCENSE.

I. The 3rd Injunction of 1547 only forbids in terms the censuring of images; it could not have been intended to forbid the use of incense in the celebration of the Mass, because that had nothing whatever to do with any censuring of images, therefore incense was required to be used in it at that very time and afterwards. There is no censuring of images over the altar at Mass in the Sarum Missal, though there is in the Roman Use.

II. The same service, i.e. "the Mass," as it was called in the book of 1549, was substantially continued by that book: if the lights were lawful under it, in virtue of the Injunctions therein referred to, so must also have been the incense.

III. Lights were forbidden before certain images; were all lights therefore forbidden? Clearly not. The censuring of images was forbidden; was the censuring of persons and things, e.g. the altar or the oblations, therefore forbidden? The logical answer also is, clearly not.

IV. Why were the lights and the incense in these cases, named in the Injunctions, forbidden? Because they were abused for the superstitious worship of images. This could not possibly be said of the candles and incense used in the Mass. Still less can it be said of the use of them complained of in Mr. Mackonochie's case.

INCENSE not only not forbidden but required.

I (a). The "Order of Communion" of 1548, which was issued one year after the Injunction of 1547, prescribes as follows:—"The time of Communion shall be immediately after that the priest himself hath received the Sacrament, without the varying of any other rite or ceremony in the Mass." Therefore the use of incense under the missal went on as before.

II (a). This use of incense under the missal necessarily went on till the very day on which the first Prayer Book came into use.

REASONS why it was likely to be continued.

I (b). There was no prohibition of incense (any more than of the two lights) in the first Prayer Book, nor in any subsequent book; and nothing in any of these books requiring its disuse, but rather the contrary.

II (b). No complaint appears to have been made of incense by the foreign or Puritan party; probably because, as they contended so much for what was scriptural, they had not the same dislike to this scriptural usage which they had to other usages not named in Scripture.

21795.

III (b). The constant reference of the Church of England, in her authorized documents, to her following Scripture and the primitive church is a justification of the use of incense, inasmuch as it is consonant to Scripture, and is "a laudable practice of the whole Catholic Church."

IV (b). It has already been shown to the Court that a censer, or any other utensil, if employed for incense under the first Prayer Book, is a lawful ornament now, and may still be used, according to the decision of the Judicial Committee.

V (b). That some utensil was or might have been employed under the first Prayer Book is sufficiently evident from the fact that the inventories of church goods in and about 1552 show the existence of censers in parish churches; and more especially that the assignment of church goods made at the same period by the Royal Commissioners, in virtue of the discretion reposed in them, left such censers for use in the services. The examples given in the English Church Union case, pp. 55-57, are enough for the purpose, inasmuch as they show an intention to allow them to be employed, and this could not have been suffered by the Commissioners if they had been unlawful ornaments.

VI (b). In addition to the historical evidence for post-Reformation use of incense by Bishop Andrewes, Archbishop Sancroft, and Bishop Cosin, already tendered to the Court, the following examples are now furnished: (1) at the consecration of an altar at Wolverhampton in 1635 incense was "burnt" in the chancel which perfumed the whole church (Hierurgia, p. 395); (2) Churchwardens' account books, Solihull, Birmingham: "1665. Paid to George Bird for mending the altar stone, 1s. 6d. Itt. payd for bread and wine and frankincense for the first Sacrament, 13s. 2d.;" (3) Churchwardens' account books, S. Nicholas, Durham: "1683. For frankincense at the bishop's coming, 2s. 4d.;" (4) Ely Cathedral, circa 1779: "It was the constant practice on the greater festivals at Ely to burn incense at the altar in the cathedral."—Cole's MSS., B. Museum, 5873, p. 82 d, quoted in English Church Union case, p. 73.

VII. The Judicial Committee in 1850, Gorham v. Bishop of Exeter: ". . . ; it appears that opinions which we cannot in any important particulars distinguish from those entertained by Mr. Gorham, have been propounded and maintained without censure or reproach, by many eminent and illustrious prelates and divines, who have adorned the Church from the time when the Articles were first established. . . . their conduct unblamed and unquestioned, as it was, proves at least the liberty

" which has been allowed of maintaining such doctrine." (Ecc. Judgts., p. 102.) The principle contained in these words may with equal fairness be applied to Mr. Mackonochie's use of incense (as well as to the other practices charged against him), seeing that Bishop Andrewes and others have employed it.

VIII (b). Mr. Mackonochie may also justly pray the Court not to condemn or forbid the use of incense, lest the Church of England be lowered in the eyes of Christendom as having rejected a practice so plainly agreeable to the Word of God and to the customs of the Catholic Church in the east and the west.

(The Dean of the Archb.) You, Dr. Tristram, have come in for a few gleanings only at the end of a very long harvest.

(Dr. Tristram.) Yes, my Lord, certainly that is so.

And now I think I have directed your Lordship's attention to all the matters which I have to submit for the consideration of the Court, and I will make a very few observations in conclusion. Your Lordship has directed the attention of counsel to the fact that two of the acts charged have been given up by Mr. Mackonochie in compliance with the wishes of the bishop. I submit to your Lordship that it is contrary, under those circumstances, to all precedent, to proceed criminally against a clerk in holy orders for having committed an ecclesiastical offence such as this (if it be one) after he has relinquished the practice complained of in compliance with the wishes of his diocesan. I submit to your Lordship that even if you were of opinion that these two practices were contrary to the Acts of Uniformity and were illegal, your Lordship would not pronounce any sentence against Mr. Mackonochie after having relinquished them in compliance with the wishes of his bishop.

There is another point upon which I will make an observation, and it is this: My friend Dr. Stephens stated that the second and last article of Mr. Mackonochie's pleas were irrelevant to the case. I submit to the Court that they were in perfect conformity with the practice and principles of ecclesiastical law as approved of by Sir John Nicholl in Bennett v. Bonaker, 3 Haggard's Reports, pp. 28, 43, in which case Sir John Nicholl was of opinion that where a charge was brought against a clergyman for having neglected his duty, and for having failed to comply with the Rubrics and the laws of the Church, his previous character, the esteem in which he was held by his parishioners, and also the grounds which induced the prosecutor to bring his suit, were matters which might properly be brought to the notice of the Court, and that those matters ought fairly to weigh with the Court in the form of the sentence which it might pronounce, and also on the question of costs.

My Lord, there is one point further which I must press strongly upon your Lordship, and it is this: If the construction put upon the Acts of Uniformity by my friends on the other side be correct, Mr. Mackonochie was liable, previous to the institution of these proceedings, to have been indicted at the Central Criminal Court, and on conviction or admission of any one of these offences charged he would, by the statute law of the land, have been subjected to imprisonment for six months, and, further, to lose the revenues of his benefice for twelve months. It has been only in the mercy of the promoter that those proceedings have not been taken, and that he has proceeded against him in the Ecclesiastical Court. If the law laid down by my learned friend is correct, he might have proceeded and obtained a conviction against him in a criminal court. Now, suppose that proceedings had been taken in a criminal court, and that Mr. Mackonochie had been called upon to answer before the common law judges of this land for having violated the Act of Parliament on any one of the charges laid in the Articles, do you think, my Lord, that the judges of the Queen's Bench, or any judge sitting in the Central Criminal Court, would have come to the conclusion after all that your Lordship has heard urged on behalf of the defendant, that he was amenable to the criminal law of this land? My Lord, it is inconceivable that any judge sitting in a criminal court would come to the conclusion that the Acts of Uniformity and Rubrics are so clear that Mr. Mackonochie, by doing any one of these acts, has been guilty of a criminal offence, and is liable to criminal punishment; and your Lordship, as I humbly submit, is bound to put the same interpretation on those acts as would be put upon them by the Court of Queen's Bench, or in the Central Criminal Court, or in the Court of Criminal Appeal. Before you come to the conclusion that Mr. Mackonochie is liable to the censure of the Court, you must come to the conclusion that with regard to each act of which you consider him guilty he would, according to the construction which is put upon statutes by judges in criminal cases, be liable to conviction and punishment under these statutes; and I shall humbly ask your Lordship, in conclusion, having considered all that has been said, and bearing in mind that Mr. Mackonochie, in adopting these ceremonial acts, is simply doing that which many of the most eminent divines of the Church have done before him, is merely doing that which Queen Elizabeth herself insisted upon being done in her own chapel within two years after the Act of Uniformity of 1558 was passed; that he is merely doing that which according to Dr. Sampson, my friend's own favourite witness, was done by three bishops in the Queen's chapel; that he is merely doing that which was done by Bishop Cosin, Bishop Andrewes, and many others—I shall humbly submit that your Lordship cannot come to the conclusion that he has been guilty of the offences with which he is charged upon the arguments submitted to you by my friends who appear for this prosecution; and that you will allow him to return uncensured to his parish where he has for so long, so zealously, and with so much good, been labouring among his people, none of whom have condescended to come into this Court to charge him with having committed any offence against the laws ecclesiastical of this realm.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I have one fact to mention, and it is very important, or I would not trouble your Lordship with it. It is to call your Lordship's attention to the position of the Article on "ceremonies" in the first Prayer Book. It is very important, and will occupy a very short time. First, you have in the Prayer Book the Morning and Evening Prayer; then you have the Sacraments; then you have the other rites and ceremonies of the Church, retained; and then you have the Article "Of ceremonies, why some be abolished and some retained." If your Lordship refers to the rituale of the Romish Church, or the Manuale, as it was called in England, of the pre-reformation church, you will find that a much larger number were omitted than were retained.

Adjourned to to-morrow, 11 o'clock.

ELEVENTH DAY.

Friday, January 17th, 1868.

(Mr. Stephens.) May it please your Lordship,—It has now become my duty, as counsel on behalf of the promoter of this suit, to make a few observations in reply to those that have been addressed to your Lordship by the learned counsel on behalf of the defendant. It would be a very unjustifiable encroachment on your Lordship's time if I were to trespass on your attention except it were for, comparatively speaking, a very limited period, because, if this question is to be decided upon the language of the Acts of Uniformity, this case, as it has been presented to you by the learned counsel on behalf of the defendant, is substantially undefended.

Having omitted in my opening address, to give your Lordship a summary of my argument, I will now, after having had the benefit of hearing the learned counsel on behalf of the defendant, proceed to supply that omission. I stated in my opening address that all the charges in the Articles fall under one class—that they are “other rites and ceremonies than those that are prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer,” and that they are offences against the Acts of Uniformity as a whole. I likewise then stated, and I now reiterate it, that the rites and ceremonies in question are symbolical of the errors, the corruptions, the superstitions, and the idolatries of the Church of Rome. The elevation of the elements is appropriate to the Romish doctrine of the sacrifice of the Mass, which makes them a subject of adoration, and the use of this rite or ceremony in Protestant churches must either openly or secretly strike at the established doctrine of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and, as such, is in direct contravention of the design of the Book of Common Prayer and the spirit and provisions of the Acts of Uniformity. This practice is symbolical of the doctrine against which our Reformers protested, and in protesting against which many of the noble army of martyrs “loved not their lives unto the death.”

One of the leading principles of the Prayer Books of our Church was to secure uniformity and to set aside all former uses, except such as were expressly retained. In the work of the Reformation the Church had not only to purify its doctrine, but to provide an authorized manual of common prayer for public worship, and to ordain a common order of ritual. By Article XXXIV., “Every particular or national Church hath authority to ordain, change, and abolish the ceremonies or rites of the Church ordained only by man's authority, so that all things be done to edifying.” The ritual of our Church is to be found in the common order which has been from time to time appointed, and in revising from time to time this order the Church, as it was bound to do, has put away, first, such things as were perceived to be most abused; secondly, such as were found to be superfluous; thirdly, such as were found to be subservient to error and to superstition.

The provisions of the Book of Common Prayer and the explanation drawn up to show “why some of the ceremonies were abolished and some retained,” plainly indicate that such as were “put away or clean rejected” were regarded as abolished. “I take it to be clear,” says Dr. Lushington, in Westerton and Liddell, “that our Church did not adopt by its silence every use and custom of the ancient Church which it did not expressly prohibit, and that it has set forth what it did adopt.” This passage your Lordship will find in Moore, page 50. That learned judge again says, in the same page, “What the Church has prescribed is a virtual prohibition of everything else ejusdem generis,” and the maxim “Expressio unius est exclusio alterius” does apply.

By the 2nd and 3rd of Edward VI., chap. 1, it is recited, to the intent that uniform quiet and godly order should be had, the Archbishop of Canterbury and others were appointed to “draw and make one convenient and meet order, rite, and fashion of common and open prayer and administration of the Sacraments to be used in His Majesty's realm of England and in Wales,” which was accordingly set forth in the book annexed. Therefore, it was the professed purpose, in compiling the Book of Common Prayer and establishing it by authority of Parliament, that the whole realm should have one authorized order and one appointed use. But these purposes must have been defeated, if it were open to any individual or individuals to alter the services which were so prescribed by introducing what he or they might have thought proper as having been used in the pre-reformation period. Because, if that licence had been allowed, clergymen would have had an opportunity of introducing those ceremonies, that had been set aside,—as not being appropriate, or as not being edifying, or as being superstitious, or as being superfluous.

The next statute was the 3rd and 4th of Edward VI., chapter 10. That statute was passed in order to prevent the introduction of those old rites and ceremonies which had been rejected, either because they were superstitious, or because they were not edifying, or because they were superfluous, or because they were inappropriate. And it recites “that they did not only give occasion to such perverse persons as do impugn the order and godly meaning of the King's said Book of Common Prayer to continue in their old superstitious service, but also minister great occasion to diversity of opinions, rites, ceremonies, and services.” The Act likewise provides for the abolition of all books or writings whatsoever theretofore used for the service of the Church, other than such as shall be set forth by the King's Majesty.

I have previously remarked that the old books that had been in use before the first Book of Edward VI. were abolished in the reign of Elizabeth, and the reason is obvious. They interfered with the spirit and the letter of the provisions of the Act of Uniformity of Edward VI. also shown, from the records published, the authorized destruction of many of the service books belonging to the different parishes at the end of Mary's reign. So likewise in Laud's Visitation Articles of 1628, when he was Bishop of London, the injunction is (your Lordship will find it in the 5th volume of Laud, part 2, page 514 of the Anglo-Catholic edition), “whether there be any in your parish who are known or suspected to conceal or keep hid in their houses any mass books, portasses, breviaries, or other books of popery or superstition?” That being so, from what source is it that the directions for those rites and ceremonies, which are the subject of the present contention, have been derived? Why, from those old Popish mass books and service books, those rags of superstition and of idolatry.

The 5th and 6th of Edward VI. substituted the second Prayer Book for the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. and made all the provisions of the 2nd and 3rd of Edward VI., chap. 1, applicable to it. This latter statute prohibited “any other rite, ceremony, order, form, or manner in the administration of the Sacraments, except such as were then mentioned and set forth.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) Are those the words, “any other rite, ceremony, or form?”

(Mr. Stephens.) “Any other rite, ceremony, order, form, or manner in the administration of the Sacraments except such as were then set forth.” The Acts of Uniformity of Elizabeth and Charles II. forbid any other rites, ceremonies, form, or manner in the celebration of the Eucharist than is prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer. By the 1st Elizabeth, chap. 2, section 4, "If any manner of parson, . . . that ought or should sing or say the common prayer mentioned in the said book . . . refuse to use the said common prayer or minister the Sacraments . . . in such order and form as they be mentioned and set forth in the said book; or shall wilfully or obstinately standing in the same"—that I interpret to mean "standing in the same church."

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is your interpretation of that?

(Mr. Stephens.) That wilfully standing in the same means standing in the church.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do the words "the same" refer to the word "church?"

(Mr. Stephens.) I will come to that presently. I have interpolated the word "church" for the word "same,"—"use any other rite, ceremony, order, form, or manner [the word 'manner' is important in the consideration of this case] of celebrating the Lord's Supper . . . than is mentioned or set forth in the said book" shall incur certain punishments.

By statute 13th and 14th Charles II., chap. 4, section 17, "No form or order of common prayer, administration of Sacraments, rites, or ceremonies shall be openly used in any church . . . other than what is prescribed and appointed to be used in and by the said book." And by the 24th section, "The several good laws and statutes . . . which have been formerly made and are now in force for the uniformity of prayer . . . shall stand in due force."

The intention to secure uniformity in the public service of the Church is strongly manifested by the provision made for the intervention of the bishop of the diocese to appease diversity and doubts as to the manner of performing divine service. There may be things not expressly mentioned in the Prayer Book, but that are intrinsically useful or subsidiary to the performance of that, which is expressly directed by the Prayer Book, and the use of such things as are useful or subsidiary is subject to episcopal control, which must be exercised and regulated according to the sense and the language of the Acts of Uniformity. The determination of doctrine naturally led to changes in the service, and these changes took place when the form of the Mass was changed into a new form for the Holy Communion. The change was observed in Faulkener and Litchfield, (Robertson, page 219.) continued to be performed during the time of Henry VIII.; and also for the first two years of the reign of Edward VI. We find by his Prayer Book set forth in 1549, the service thus described, "The supper of the Lord and the Holy Communion, commonly called the Mass."

The word "altar" was likewise used as descriptive of the structure upon which the celebration was to take place, and the service is so constructed in the first book of Edward VI. as to leave it open to the interpretation, that the priest at the celebration was offering a sacrifice at the altar. It is justly observed in Liddell and Westerton (Moore 179), "That at the date of the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. the doctrine of the English Church as to the real presence and the nature of the Holy Communion was undecided." That I deem to be a very important passage for your Lordship to consider in ultimately determining the question at issue in this case. It was that great subject which engaged the attention of Cranmer, until his views were subsequently incorporated in the Articles of 1552. Then, as Sir Herbert Jenner Fust says, "it was thought necessary to make a very material alteration in the Book of Common Prayer—that is in the second book of Edward—the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was no longer called the Mass—the form as well as the name of that which had been called an altar, upon which the sacrifice was supposed to "have been offered up, was changed." At page 225 he says, "The object in framing the second Prayer Book was the removal of old superstitions, and when one of the modes of carrying that object into effect was to be the abolition of altars and the substitution of tables for those altars, it must be that something more than a mere alteration of name was intended. It would not have satisfied the purpose for which the alteration was made merely to change the name of altar into table. The old superstitious notions would have adhered to the minds of the simple people, and would have continued so long as they saw the altar on which they had been used to consider a real sacrifice was offered."

Perhaps it may afford some illustration of the case that my friend Mr. Prideaux has to support, when I remind your Lordship that during the entire of his argument he never mentioned the "holy table." He never mentioned the "communion table." It was the "altar" from the commencement to the end of his address. The Mass was a sacrifice in a literal sense of the word, and it was accompanied by accessories indicative of adoration for worship of the thing offered or sacrificed. The principal of those accessories now necessary to be noticed was the elevation of the elements, and perhaps, though in a less degree, incense. So also there were lights and other ceremonies, not that all those were originally superstitious or wrong, but they had become so blended with the idolatrous portions of the Mass that they could not be suffered to remain. Others of those accessories were more nearly allied to the very origin of the idolatrous worship of the Mass. These, of course, it was indispensable to abolish by name.

When abuses of such magnitude undoubtedly existed in the most important of all the sacred offices and in the very doctrinal points, as it may be said, on which the Reformation hinged, it is incredible, it would be against common sense, to suppose that such practices as conduced to sustain the Romish idea of transubstantiation and a literal sacrifice were not amongst the principal practices and ceremonies intended to be abolished. Again, the Prayer Book contains no explanation of a symbolical meaning of the "lights" or "incense," or the "elevation;" they, therefore, come under the description of dark and dumb ceremonies, which have been abolished and clean rejected.

Dr. Lushington, in Westerton and Liddell (Moore, page 51), says, "If any doubt remain respecting what the Church has prescribed, the test is the usage of the Church." I will now proceed to try the questions in issue by such test. Since the time of Mary not the slightest trace can be produced that in the Injunctions and Visitation Articles any inquiries were made whether the parochial authorities procured or used candles or candlesticks, incense or incense pots, or a cruet for water; notwithstanding many of such inquiries went into the minutest particulars. At the same time the Injunctions and the Visitation Articles exhibit the anxiety, the very deep anxiety, of all the prelates to enforce, with the utmost strictness, conformity to the Book of Common Prayer, and that there should be only one order, rite, ceremony, form, or manner of celebrating the Lord's Supper.

No legal usage has been or can be produced, no statute has been or can be produced containing directions to use as a ceremony lighted candles in the performance of Divine service; or to use incense as a ceremony in the performance of Divine service; or to use the mixing of water with the sacramental wine as a ceremony during Divine service.

As I have previously remarked, the only directions that were received, and the only trace we have of all these rites and ceremonies which are now the subject of complaint, are to be found in those Popish mass books and service books which had been abolished by the several Acts of Parliament of Edward VI. and of Elizabeth, being a portion of those engines of priesthood and priestcraft for enslaving the minds of the people in spiritual darkness.

The construction given to the Act of Uniformity by the Ecclesiastical and Temporal Courts has invariably been, that any addition to or omission from the Book of Common Prayer is illegal; and on that point I shall shortly refer your Lordship to three cases. The first is Newbery v. Goodwin; I Phillimore, page 282. Sir John Nicholl, in giving judgment in that case, says, "The law directs that a clergyman is not to diminish in any respect or add to the prescribed form of worship."

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have had the Articles looked up in that case since it was last mentioned. They are very curious, and I do not quite understand what Sir John Nicholl meant by the omission. I will not mention it now; but it certainly was one which would have been as tolerable an omission as could have been conceived. Perhaps you may have the curiosity to look at the Articles.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am much obliged to your Lordship. I apprehend the learned judge is laying down a general proposition.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, my reference to the Articles is rather in favour of your remark; because the omission with which the defendant was charged was one which, perhaps, might have been looked at with more favour than most things.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am much obliged to your Lordship. Sir John Nicholl says: "The law directs that a clergyman is not to diminish in any respect or add to the prescribed form of worship. Uniformity in this respect is one of the leading distinguishing principles of the Church of England. Nothing is left to the discretion and fancy of the individual. If every minister were to alter, omit, or add according to his own taste, this uniformity would soon be destroyed, and though the alteration might begin with little things, it would soon extend itself to more important changes in the public worship of the Established Church, and even in the Scriptures themselves. The most important passages might be materially altered under the notion of giving a more correct version, or omitted altogether as unauthorized interpolations."

The next case is Westerton and Liddell (Moore, page 187). The Privy Council in that case said: "In the performance of the service rites and ceremonies ordered by the Prayer Book, the directions contained in it must be strictly observed, no omission and no addition can be permitted." Can anyone say, looking at the Prayer Book, that the rites and ceremonies in question are not additions to the Book of Common Prayer? If that be so they come precisely within the spirit of what their Lordships laid down in Liddell and Westerton.

There is only one other case, if it may be called a case, to which I shall have to refer. Your Lordship is aware my friends did not wish to have any discussion in this quiet region, where Christian charity and peace alone prevail, but went down to the stormy atmosphere of the Court of Queen's Bench for a prohibition. It was alleged that the Articles had not stated an ecclesiastical offence. But what did Lord Chief Justice Cockburn say as to the law regulating the performance of Divine Service?—"The question is whether when an Act of Parliament says that in the administration of the Sacrament or in the performance of any other rite of the Church, the minister shall conform strictly to the directions of the Prayer Book, if he does something not contained in those directions anybody can say that that is not a matter for spiritual cognizance, and whether that is not such a departure as to constitute an offence. You might introduce anything into the administration of the rites of the Church and then say, because it is something more than is enjoined, and is not in terms prohibited, therefore it is not an offence. I take it that what the Act of Parliament meant was that persons should not follow their own imaginations or judgments and wills in such matters, but should conform to the directions contained in the Book of Common Prayer."

I therefore was not surprised that my friend, Mr. James, never said one word about a prohibition until your Lordship asked the question, and drew his attention to one or two of the observations that were made by the judges. My friend, Mr. James, then said, "Really nothing was decided. It was nothing more than a mere conversation between Lord Chief Justice Cockburn and Mr. Justice Lush, after we had all been breakfasting together at the Lord Chancellor's." That was the answer your Lordship received to a question that you put.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I assure you my friend, Mr. James, said more than that.

(Mr. Stephens.) He said that. Well, my Lord, what a beautiful picture does my friend thus present to you of a truly happy and united family discussing these ecclesiastical matters on the first day of term in the Court of Queen's Bench!

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not think he said that.

(Mr. Stephens.) I do request there will be no interruptions from the other side. What was the result? Why, my Lord Chief Justice Cockburn and Mr. Justice Lush told my friend, "If you omit or add anything to the Book of Common Prayer you act illegally, because you do not conform to that book."

Such, my Lord, is the case that I present to your Lordship on behalf of the promoter, and if the questions are to be decided upon the Acts of Uniformity, I am fearless as to the result. But, notwithstanding this positive view of the case on my part, I consider it would be very unbecoming in me if I were to treat with disrespectful silence some of the arguments and some of the observations which have been adduced by my friends on the opposite side.

In the first place, Mr. James has commented upon the length and upon the character of the opening statement. My reply is—and I hope it will be very satisfactory to him—that having regard to the interests of the promoter, Mr. Coleridge and myself felt that our statements could not have been shorter, nor could the character of those statements have been different, because it had become our painful duty to deal with a system, which has not been unhappily described by the late Sydney Smith, as one of "posture and imposture."

My learned friend, Mr. Prideaux, has also thought proper by way of taunt to tax me with being identified with the "frequenters of Exeter Hall," the "members of the Church Association," and the readers of the "Record." My Lord, all I can say is, that so far as my clients fall within any of those categories, I am not in the slightest degree ashamed, but, on the contrary, I am proud of my associates; because I feel assured that they, as a body, hold the true Catholic faith, and let me say the true Catholic faith undefiled—a faith exclusively based upon Holy Scripture; for, to use the language of our sixth article, "Holy Scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation, so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man, that it should be believed, as an article of the faith." And, my Lord, so much error has of late been vented upon this head, that I shall continue to guard myself by the occasional use of that very significant expression, the "Protestant faith."

My friend, Mr. Prideaux, has on several occasions stated that I have described the Church of England as an Act of Parliament Church. I deny that I have said so. My opinions upon this subject were published 30 years ago, in my edition of De Lolme, which, with the permission of the Court, I will read as expressive of my then and present opinions. The passage I am referring to is in the first volume, at page 309, and at the end of the reign of Elizabeth.

"The statutes and Acts of Convocation by which the Reformation was accomplished have been cited, from whence it will be perceived that the identity of the English Catholic Church was not destroyed under the Tudors.

"The only difference in the Church, as it existed previous to the dynasty of the Tudors, and as it stood at the termination of the reign of Elizabeth, was, that certain ecclesiastical abuses had arisen, which were corrected by Parliament and the clerical synods in convocation under Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Elizabeth; but the identity of the Church was never destroyed.

"The best illustration of the mode in which the Reformation was effected is Statute 5 and 6 William IV., c. 76. It having been proved that positive abuses existed in Municipal Corporations, Parliament, in 1835, made enactments to correct such abuses, but in all other respects the rights of such corporations were left unimpaired, and no corporation lost its original identity.

"So with the English Catholic Church. It having been proved that positive abuses existed in the Church, its clerical synods in convocation, its lay synods in Parliament or the Crown by power placed in its hands by the joint authority of those synods, made, under the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Elizabeth, certain enactments to correct such abuses, but in all other respects the rights of the Church were essentially left unimpaired, and its original identity was never lost."

My friend, Mr. James, has complained of my having adduced a great deal of archaeological learning to prove the case against Mr. Mackonochie. He spoke of his client in these words, "As a clergyman who probably had had no opportunity of ever learning or seeing or hearing, even by remote hearsay, one-hundredth part of the mass of documentary evidence." My friend seems not to be aware that Mr. Mackonochie himself challenged this archaeological investigation in his address to his parishioners, in which he announced the giving up, under protest, of the elevation and the censuring of persons and things. He says, with respect to incense, "It is, I think, inconceivable that this should have been done anywhere at all if such use had then been illegal. I therefore look forward confidently to the time when further investigation shall have thrown more light on the practice of those days; and when English common sense shall have made a convert of that English caution which, though it may sometimes resemble prejudice, is in itself a most valuable quality."

(The Dean of the Arches.) What are you reading from?

(Mr. Stephens.) From Mr. Mackonochie's address, which is annexed to the Articles. He is speaking of censures being assigned by the Royal Commissioners, in Edward VI. reign, for use in the parish. Mr. Mackonochie apparently refers to the assertions on the subject in the Church Union case, assertions which I think I have shown to be altogether destitute of foundation. He says, "We find nothing about its rejection in the 16th century, and we do find censures left in some churches, though not many, by the Royal Commissioners in Edward VI. reign, assigned for use in the parish." The words "use in the parish" being printed in very large type.

In reliance, therefore, upon archaeological investigations, conducted either by himself or his friends, Mr. Mackonochie has thought fit to depart from what has been the accustomed use and practice of the Church during the last 300 years in the mode of performing the service in the Church in England. He and his friends have imagined, that they could see more clearly into the hidden meaning of Acts of Parliament and Rubrics than any other class of men, and have acted in defiance of episcopal remonstrances. It is now, however, rather too late for them to complain of those investigations having taken place, when the result of them has clearly established, that they have not a single shadow of ground for their position, and that they are altogether in the wrong.

Again, my friend, Mr. James, complained of Mr. Martin, the promoter. This is Mr. James's language. "He is practically a stranger, and seems to have no connexion with the district except that he is the secretary to some schools there. I think that is the only connexion he has with the district. He does not appear to have frequented the services of the church or to have had occasion to do so. He is a mere stranger who has put himself forward for the purpose of raising this question." Now, my Lord, what are the facts? Mr. Martin is much more interested in the performance of the services of the church of St. Albans than nine-tenths of those fashionable ladies and gentlemen who resort to it from the western part of the metropolis. It is true that Mr. Martin is not, technically speaking, a resident in the parish; but he has lived in it for 10 or 12 hours per week during the last 30 years. It is not true that his only connexion with the parish is as secretary of a school, inasmuch as he is lessee and occupier of premises in the parish, and the legal advisers of the Bishop of London considered he was a more suitable person to promote these proceedings than a resident parishioner whose name had been submitted to the bishop upon the sudden death of Mr. Bolton, who was the original promoter of this suit.

Mr. Martin felt it his duty in order to prevent the dissemination of popish rites and ceremonies, to allow his name to be used, though personally he would have preferred taking no part in this litigation. In reference to the original proceedings he had nothing to say to them; in fact he was, as I am instructed, ignorant of them. The promoter of this suit, so far from deserving censure for his conduct, is entitled to the deepest praise and thanks from the Protestant members of the Church in England. When we perceive, according to the representations of Mr. James, the numbers of the congregation who attend the services of the Church at St. Alban's, it proves the imperative necessity of Mr. Mackonochie being restrained from the further use of the rites and ceremonies in question, symbolising as they do the pernicious doctrines of the Church of Rome, and thus saturating the minds of the people with theological poison.

Mr. James triumphantly says, no complaint has been made by the churchwardens against Mr. Mackonochie, for the mode in which the services at St. Alban's have been conducted. It is, my Lord, however, a very remarkable fact, that if the services give such very great satisfaction to the inhabitants of the parish of St. Alban's, Mr. Mackonochie has not been enabled to get a single person who is an inhabitant of that parish to officiate as churchwarden, and that the churchwardens of the parish of St. Alban's are and have been for some years non-residents, and as such are incapable of legally performing any of the duties incident to the office of churchwarden.

Mr. Prideaux says, "Mr. Mackonochie is not an obstinate person who wilfully" (I am using Mr. Prideaux's language) "would disturb the godly and quiet order in this realm. Because what did Mr. Mackonochie do?"—(and here it is requisite to bear in mind the language that Mr. Prideaux uses, in order to appreciate the spirit of condonation)—"Mr. Mackonochie believed, and no doubt Mr. Mackonochie in his heart now believes, that it is perfectly lawful to elevate the blessed Sacrament above his head. Mr. Mackonochie believed, and no doubt Mr. Mackonochie at this moment believes, and, I venture to say, to the day of his death will believe, that it is lawful at this moment to incense persons and things during the celebration of the Holy Communion."

I respect this language of Mr. Prideaux, because it is manly and bold; and under such circumstances it seems to be rather surprising, that Mr. Mackonochie should not have evinced the greatest alacrity to have met the discussion of these questions as mere naked questions of principle. But from the commencement of these proceedings, down to the present moment, so far from Mr. Mackonochie being anxious to discuss this matter as a question of principle, he has endeavoured to have recourse to every dilatory proceeding, evidently and very wisely considering, that his safety consisted in his running away under a chaos of the most pitiable technicalities.

My friends on the opposite side have occupied no small portion of your Lordship's time in objecting to the form of the Articles. Except with respect to elevation, for an object which I will mention presently, I do not propose to take any notice of such objections; because the Articles were settled under the immediate directions of your Lordship's predecessor. It has been objected by Mr. James and Mr. Prideaux that the Articles are defective. Mr. James objects to the 3rd Article, because he says the letters of request and the citation do not contain a sufficiently precise signification of the charge of "elevation" and "prostration" or of "adoration." And that the 3rd Article, which is more precise on this point, cannot be considered to supply the deficiency, because the Articles cannot in law go beyond the letters of request and citation, or be held to amend the original defect.

The history of the amendment of this Article, which has occupied so much of your Lordship's valuable time, is illustrative of the very just fears which are entertained by the opposite side against meeting this question on its real merits. The 3rd Article, as first filed, agreed precisely with the letters of request. The form of the Article was objected to by the defendant, and Dr. Lushington, though holding the plea to be sufficient and proper, suggested that the words "or otherwise" should be omitted, which was, of course, done. The 3rd Article was accordingly amended. The defendant then intimated, through his proctor, that he should again object to the form of the pleadings unless the degree of elevation was specified. Accordingly, to meet the defendant's views, the words "above the head" were added, and the Article was then admitted to proof without further opposition on the point of form.

The case stands thus. Originally the letters of request and the Articles were identical. The defendant then insisted upon certain words being inserted in the Articles. His request was acceded to, and the Articles were amended. And he now comes forward at this stage of the cause and raises a technical objection in consequence of our having carried out what he himself had suggested. Well, all I can say with regard to the promoter is, that he would much rather be the subject of such conduct than its author.

A great deal of special pleading has been employed by my friends to prove that the Decree and Articles are defective, because they did not allege that Mr. Mackonochie did the acts complained of "wilfully and obstinately." I do not know whether your Lordship wishes me to address any observations to you upon that point.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You told me you were going to say something to me about "wilfully and obstinately standing in the same;" you mentioned that to me a little while ago. I do not know whether you intend to do so or not now.

(Mr. Stephens.) I do, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I mentioned that because you asked me whether I wished you to go into the question.

(Mr. Stephens.) Very well, my Lord, I will go on; but I thought the question so clear, that it was unnecessary. These words only occur in one of the sections of Elizabeth's Act of Uniformity, namely, the 4th section.

(The Dean of the Arches.) In one of the sections of each of the two statutes?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the section you are prosecuting under. There is no penalty mentioned in the other sections except by reference.

(Mr. Stephens.) It provides that the minister "who shall wilfully or obstinately, standing in the same, use any other rite, ceremony, order, form, or manner of celebrating of the Lord's Supper" . . . . . "than is mentioned or set forth in the said book," shall for the first offence forfeit one year's income and suffer imprisonment for the space of six months, and for the second offence be imprisoned for one year and be deprived of his spiritual promotions.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the same section?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, that is Elizabeth's statute, sec. 4. I have only read to your Lordship the important words so far as it applies to my argument. This section gives no discretion as to punishment; it is therefore reasonable to require that whenever an offence is charged it should be charged as having been wilfully and obstinately committed. But the jurisdiction of the Court of Arches does not rest (and there is the fallacy of the argument of my learned friends) on the 4th section of the Act of Elizabeth, but on the 23rd section of that Act, which is as follows: "All and singular archbishops and bishops, and every of their chancellors, commissaries, archdeacons, and other ordinaries, having any peculiar ecclesiastical jurisdiction, shall have full power and authority by virtue of this Act, as well to inquire in their visitation, synods, and elsewhere within their jurisdiction at any other time and place, to take accusations and informations of all and every the things above mentioned, done, committed, or perpetrated within the limits of their jurisdictions and authority and to punish the same by admonition, excommunication, sequestration, or deprivation, and other censures and process, in like form as heretofore hath been used in like cases by the Queen's ecclesiastical laws."

These provisions applied not only to the particular offences, enumerated in the 4th and other sections of the Act of Uniformity, but to all violations of the general enactments of the 3rd section:—"That all ministers shall be bounden to use the matters, even-song, celebration of the Lord's Supper, and administration of each of the sacraments, and all the open and common prayer, in such order and form as is mentioned in the Prayer Book;" and in like manner it applies to the general provisions of the Act of Uniformity of Charles II. The Ecclesiastical Court having the choice of a variety of punishments, namely, by "admonition, excommunication, sequestration, or deprivation," there was no reason for limiting its jurisdiction to acts done "wilfully and obstinately." There is an essential distinction between the two sections. Under the 4th section the punishment is positive; but under the 23rd section it is discretionary.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Let me understand your argument. It is not necessary, you say, for you to establish that these acts were done wilfully and obstinately.

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly not under the 23rd section, because there the punishment is discretionary; under the 4th section it is positive.

If the powers of the Ecclesiastical Court were limited to acts done "wilfully or obstinately" there would be no means of punishing a clergyman, even for acts of the grossest negligence in the performance of Divine service, so long as he did not act "wilfully or obstinately."

We rely not only upon the Acts of Uniformity of Elizabeth and Charles II., but upon the canons of 1603, and especially upon the 14th canon. We also claim the benefit of the general ecclesiastical law.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The canons are set out in the Articles, and were set out in consequence of the application of the defendant?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is so, because I remember very well that my predecessor said in substance this: "It has been more according to usage that the precise law should be specified; but whether it is specified or not, if I found the law had been broken I must visit the breaker of it with a penalty."

(Mr. Stephens.) Precisely. I was going to call your Lordship's attention to that passage in Dr. Lushington's judgment which is in the following language:

" You refer to the Prayer Book as a body. You need not refer to any particular part; but I think the statute should be referred to; that is, I think it advisable to do so in this case. I do not say it is a matter of absolute necessity required by any particular rule of law; but as it is a case of great importance I think it ought to be cited, and that it should be done. The Queen's Advocate: Will that apply to any particular canon? Dr. Lushington: Yes, if any particular canon is referred to it should be stated; but, with all due deference to you, whether stated or not stated, if in the course of the discussion I should find the law laid down in the Acts of Parliament I should be bound to obey them. It may be a very good objection to the admission of the Articles that the law is not stated sufficiently; but it would not have released me from my obligation to follow the law." And, my Lord, I believe that judgment is perfectly consistent with the practice of the Court.

(The Dean of the Arches.) According to the papers before me, I see these Articles were reformed in that way?

(Mr. Stephens.) Not only in that, but in every other particular, we followed the directions of your Lordship's learned predecessor.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I need hardly repeat that in my opinion all that is binding upon me; I am not sitting here on appeal in the case. All that Dr. Lushington ordered in that part of the case, rightly or wrongly, I must consider binding upon me. If it is wrong it must be set right elsewhere.

(Mr. Stephens.) My learned friends have said a great deal about this being a criminal proceeding and about the Acts of Uniformity being penal Acts, and have accordingly used the utmost licence in urging technical objections conceived, I must say, in the narrowest spirit of special pleading, and supported by Jervis's edition of Archbold's Criminal Law. We contend, on the contrary, that even if this be in form a criminal proceeding, it is not, in substance, a criminal proceeding. Instead of instituting proceedings in a common law court under the 4th section of the Act of Elizabeth, which would have subjected Mr. Mackonochie to heavy penalties, we have instituted our proceedings in this Court, which is not bound to inflict any particular punishment, and our Articles only ask that Mr. Mackonochie may be admonished.

In substance this is a dispute about a civil right—Mr. Mackonochie insisting that he is at liberty to conduct the service at St. Alban's according to his notions of the usages of the Catholic Church, while the promoter, on the other hand, insists that he is bound to conform to the Acts of Uniformity. We contend, moreover, that the Acts of Uniformity are remedial Acts, and entitled to a liberal construction. But, nevertheless, it seems desirable to call your Lordship's attention to one authority, showing the limitations that have been put on the directions that everything is to be construed strictly in criminal proceedings. I refer to The King v. Royce, 4 Burrows, page 2082. Lord Mansfield says in that case: "Tenderness ought always to prevail in criminal cases, so far at least as to take care, that a man may not suffer otherwise than by the course of law, nor have any hardship done him or severity exercised upon him where the construction may admit of a reasonable doubt and difficulty. But tenderness does not require such a construction of words (perhaps not absolutely and perfectly clear and express) as would tend to render the law nugatory and ineffectual, and destroy or evade the very end and intention of it. Nor does it require of us we should go into such nice strained critical objections as are contrary to the true meaning and spirit of it."

I will now discuss the case of The King and Sparkes. My learned friend, Mr. Prideaux, has expressed his surprise that I did not cite that case, but I can assure him it had not escaped my attention. I omitted citing it, because I thought it not improbable that my friends would do so. They have done so, and I admit that my anticipations have been more than fully realized. My friend, Mr. James, cited it, and I will tell your Lordship what he said. This is his language:—"The offence under the statute is not using the Book of Common Prayer in order and form; as to which there is no allegation, no charge whatever, that every word of the Common Prayer was not used, and that every prescription of the Common Prayer was not complied with;" and his conclusion was, that Sparke's case justified the use of additional prayers to those contained in the Book of Common Prayer. The effect of this construction would be, that any clergyman might add any prayers whatever to the services of the Church and not be punishable for such conduct.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I understood it to be not that he could interpolate prayers, but that when the service had been performed and over, then, and then only, he might have what prayers he chose. I do not know whether that was the argument he intended.

(Mr. Stephens.) Then, my Lord, it comes within the case of Westerton and Liddell; that you cannot alter or omit.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Perhaps I may be wrong, but I understood him to make that distinction, that you might not insert a prayer during the service, but that when the service provided by the Acts of Uniformity was over, then you might have what prayers you pleased.

(Mr. Prideaux.) We cited it in that way, or intended it at least to go that length; but we also cited it as an authority that you might insert a prayer even during the service, because your Lordship will remember that I insisted that the sermon—

(The Dean of the Arches.) I thought Mr. James guarded himself upon that point?

(Mr. Stephens.) At all events there is no doubt about Mr. Prideaux, I can prove my case against him.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then you are quite well founded in your argument, Mr. Stephens?

(Mr. Stephens.) I will take the argument upon what Mr. James says, and I then contend he would come within the Act of Uniformity, because it would be openly using in a church other prayers than those prescribed by that Act. Mr. Prideaux said this: "The case of The King and Sparkes is an express authority that if you say and sing the services according to the use of the Church of England, you may introduce another prayer. I do not understand what it decides if it does not decide that;" and then he adds, "I really cannot understand what it does decide."

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not recollect that. I may have said it. I do not recollect it in that way.

(Mr. Stephens.) I have before me the shorthand writer's notes. If you wish to withdraw the alleged statements you can do so.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I do not think I said it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Does not the note in that case say it was a prayer before sermon that had been used?

(Mr. Prideaux.) It says so; and adds, "This was a malicious prosecution."

(Mr. Stephens.) I agree with my friend, that he does not understand what the case of The King and Sparkes decides. I do not know whether your Lordship has a reference to 2 Showers, Rep. 448. That was the book from which the case was cited.

(Mr. Prideaux.) It is also in L. Modern.

(Mr. Stephens.) I have nothing to say to L. Modern.

(Mr. Prideaux.) As my friend seems afraid of L. Modern—

(Mr. Stephens.) I am not afraid of anything and never was; so I wish you would stop your inter-ruptions.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I was only going to say, my Lord, that as my friend seems afraid of the report as given in L. Modern, I particularly refer your Lordship to it.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am only dealing with 2 Showers, the only book quoted by the opposite side. This appears to have been an indictment against Richard Sparkes, the vicar of North Leigh, "for using in time of Divine service different prayers from the common prayer appointed by the Book of Common Prayer, and in a different manner than as thereby appointed."

"Upon error being brought to reverse a judgment given at the quarter sessions for the county of Devon, for the payment of 100 marks fine against the defendant, he being there convicted by verdict on an indictment, for that, being minister or curate of such a place, he did on the Lord's day use other prayers than according to the Book of Common Prayer."

Lord Chief Justice Herbert and Mr. Justice Holloway took this objection, "saying that it might be a prayer before sermon, and yet he might use the common prayer (and so in truth the fact was)." [those words are in parenthesis, and are the editor's] "and therefore they held it no offence, unless it had been alleged, that he did not read the common prayer."

That is no decision; it is nothing more than the reasoning of the judges; and I will prove it in a moment.

"Owing to the hesitation of the other judge (Wytheus), the defendant's counsel (Shower) took another objection to the indictment, and the case was decided in his favour upon such objection."

The only point decided by Chief Justice Herbert and Mr. Justice Holloway was, that the indictment as it stood was insufficient, as it did not appear what other prayers were used or during what part of the service. It is therefore clear that the only point decided in this case was a mere question of pleading.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is a note at the end: "The prosecution alarmed most of the clergy, but the Lord Chief Justice's opinion gave them satisfaction, which in truth was founded on a good deal of reason." Then, "But in truth the design of the Act of Uniformity in that prohibition was to make a deprivation, &c., and not a temporal offence, or subject the party to an indictment."

(Mr. Stephens.) The decision in the case was exactly what I have stated. It was upon a question of pleading, viz., that the indictment as it stood was insufficient, as it did not appear what other prayers were used, or during what part of the service. That was the only decision; a decision upon a miserable point of pleading.

This case of Martin and Macknochie is not a proceeding at common law, but in the ecclesiastical courts, and no argument can be drawn from the practice of one court applicable to the other. The Church Discipline Act, as its preamble shows, intended to uphold the principles of the ecclesiastical law, and was not intended to alter the procedure further than to restore to the bishops, the personal jurisdiction which they originally exercised, and which was afterwards delegated by them to their chancellors or officials. The jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court still remains, and is exercised according to its own practice and form of process; and the charges are stated with sufficient precision according to the rules of the Ecclesiastical Court.

Will your Lordship excuse me, if I read a note of Shower, because it will explain my argument.

(The Dean of the Arches.) By all means.

(Mr. Stephens.) The note is at page 439, and is as follows: "This was a malicious prosecution, for it was only a prayer in the pulpit, and the common prayer was constantly read, and it had a fate accordingly; for, no doubt, if it had been an offence within this Act of Uniformity, the justices would have had some cognizance of it; for by the 24th section all statutes concerning the former book of Queen Elizabeth are quoted to be in force as to this book now used."

This note clearly shows that this case was a prosecution for using a prayer before the sermon. The use of the bidding prayer before the sermon had been enjoined by the 55th canon of the canons of 1603. The use of this prayer was frequently insisted upon by the ecclesiastical authorities. In support of that, and in order to save time, as your Lordship is so familiar with this subject I need only refer to Wren's Visitation, Articles, A.D. 1636, which will be found in 2 Cardwell's Doc. Ann., 252; and likewise to Archbishop Tenison's letter in 1695, 2 Cardwell's Doc. Ann., 385.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The 16th section of this statute of Elizabeth also refers to the authority of the Ecclesiastical Court, as well as the 23rd.

(Mr. Stephens.) I did not think it necessary to go into details upon that question, it was such a clear proposition of law. It would only have been an idle waste of your Lordship's time to have gone further into the subject. In 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 21, you will find the form of the bidding prayer had been previously given in the Injunctions of Edward VI. of 1547. Consequently, at the date of the different Acts of Uniformity, the bidding prayer might well be considered as an appendix to the sermon, and would therefore be authorized by the general reference to the sermon in the several Prayer Books as forming part of the sermon and an appendix to the sermon.

In 2 Hickeringill's Works, page 87, "The Black Nonconformist," a treatise well worthy the attention of my learned friends, the following passage occurs:—"So that all are nonconformists, and liable to indictment and loss of their liberty, as well as loss of their livings, that pray before or after sermon in other form or order than is set down in the Common Prayer Book."

From the language here used by Hickeringill, it appears the dissatisfied Puritans had a theory that the use of a prayer before the sermon, such as the bidding prayer, was unlawful. And it is a curious coincidence, that the passage in Hickeringill is dated in 1681, as your Lordship will find by a reference to the 58th page of the second volume; while the case of The King and Sparkes was decided in the 1st James II., namely, in the year 1685.

I will now proceed to "rites and ceremonies." My friend, Mr. James, has contended that "ceremony," "service," and "rite" mean the same thing; therefore that gestures and postures and things of that kind, do not come within the term "rite or ceremony, nor anything which is an ornament." I do not know whether your Lordship wishes me to address you upon this point; I should be perfectly content to leave the case as it stands.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You must exercise your own judgment.

(Mr. Stephens.) Very well, my Lord, it is better perhaps for me to make a few comments upon the subject; but it appeared so clear that I almost thought it unnecessary.

The theory of my friends is at variance with the mode in which the words "rites and ceremonies" are used in the Acts of Uniformity, and in all the Visitation Articles and Injunctions. The 2nd and 3rd Edward VI., c. 1, in the preamble states: "Where of long time there hath been had in this realm of England and in Wales divers forms of common prayer, commonly called the service of the Church; that is to say, the use of Sarum, of York, of Bangor, and of Lincoln."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you mean to allude to these words, "the doers and executors of the said rites and ceremonies?"

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes; "and besides the same now of late much more divers and sundry forms and fashions have been used in the cathedral and parish churches of England and Wales, as well concerning the matters or morning prayer and the evensong, as also concerning the Holy Communion, commonly called the Mass, with divers and sundry rites and ceremonies concerning the same, and in the administration of the Sacraments of the Church." Here "rites and ceremonies" are not distinct services, as spoken of in this Act of Parliament, but parts or adjuncts of the Holy Communion, and the mattens and evensong.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you apply that observation to both the words "rites and ceremonies?"

(Mr. Stephens.) "Ceremonies," my Lord; but I will take the argument as applying to both at the same time.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You will take the argument as you like best, but it occurs to me there might be a distinction between the word "rite" and the word "ceremony."

(Mr. Stephens.) Of course if your Lordship thinks the argument does not apply to "rites" it will be more convenient to take them separately. I will first take "ceremonies." By the second article of Bishop Ridley's Injunctions, issued in the year 1550 (1. Cardwell's Doc. Ann., page 93), it is directed, "finally, that the minister, in time of the Holy Communion, do use only the ceremonies and gestures appointed by the Book of Common Prayer, and none other, so that there do not appear in them any counterfeiting of the popish Mass." Therefore he deals with it independently of rites. He deals with it as mere ceremony.

In Grindal's Remains, page 124, the fourth article forbids any person to "use at the ministration of the communion any gestures, rites, or ceremonies not appointed by the Book of Common Prayer, as crossing or breathing over the sacramental bread and wine, nor any shewing or lifting up of the same to the people, to be by them worshipped and adored, nor any such like; nor shall use any oil or chrism, tapers, spattle, or any other popish ceremony in the ministration of the sacrament of baptism."

The next authority that I shall cite for this object is the 14th canon of the canons of 1603: "All ministers likewise shall observe the orders, rites, and ceremonies prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, as well in reading Holy Scriptures and saying of prayers as in administration of the Sacraments, without either diminishing in regard to preaching or in any other respect, or adding anything in the matter or form thereof." Like language is used in Archbishop Bancroft's Visitation Articles, which will be found in 2 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 104; and in Archbishop Abbot's Visitation Articles, 2 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 170. Likewise, in the Visitation Articles of 1619 and 1625, which appear in Andrewes's minor works, pages 115 and 130; and likewise, in the Visitation Articles of Laud, both when he was at London and at Canterbury, 5 Laud's Works, pages 319 and 423.

I will, however, read to your Lordship an extract from Laud, part 2, page 399. It is the fifth article of Laud's Visitation Articles, when he was Bishop of London: "Whether doth your minister use the administration of the Lord's Supper, Baptism, Instruction of Children, Solemnization of Matrimony, Visitation of the Sick, Burial of the Dead, the Communion, and Churching of Women, under such words, rites, and ceremonies as are set forth and presented by the said Book of Common Prayer and no other."

In Archbishop Sheldon's directions to the clergy, (which will be found in 2 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 329,) they are directed "That in their own persons in their churches they do decently and solemnly perform the Divine Service by reading the prayers of the Church, as they are appointed and ordered in and by the Book of Common Prayer, without addition to or diminishing from same, or varying, either in substance or ceremony, from the order and method which by the said book is set down, wherein I hear and am afraid too many do offend."

It therefore appears that, instead of ceremonies being distinct services, each service consists partly of substance and partly of ceremony.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That note to the title

"of ceremonies, why some be abolished and some retained," is rather in support of your view, I think; I mean "certain notes for the more plain explication and decent ministration of things contained in this book;" the third note is, "As touching, kneeling, crossing, holding up of hands, knocking upon the breast, and other gestures, they may be used or left, as every man's devotion serveth without blame."

(Mr. Stephens.) I understand the writer there to mean that those are ceremonies.

(The Dean of the Arches.) So it would appear to me at present. "As touching, kneeling;" that is under the head "of ceremonies, why some be abolished and some retained," in the first book of Edward VI.; and the note says, "As to these things every man is at liberty to do as he thinks fit." Therefore I suppose kneeling, crossing, and so on, must be ceremonies otherwise they would not naturally have come under that head.

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly, my Lord; that is in support of my argument. In 2 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 297, line 32, your Lordship will find the following language: "Lastly, concerning ceremonies." It is King Charles's declaration concerning ecclesiastical affairs: "therefore our present consideration and work is to gratify the private consciences of those who are grieved with the use of some ceremonies, by indulging to and dispensing with their omitting those ceremonies."

(The Dean of the Arches.) What ceremonies was King Charles referring to there?

(Mr. Stephens.) At page 299, line 10, it is receiving the Sacrament "kneeling;" then at the same page, line 15, there is "the cross in baptism."

(The Dean of the Arches.) You mean that all these are ingredients, elements, constituent parts of a rite?

(Mr. Stephens.) Precisely, my Lord, "bowing at the name of Jesus," (ibid., line 26,) "the use of a surplice" (ibid., line 30).

(The Dean of the Arches.) It strikes me so at present, I confess.

(Mr. Stephens.) I have no further observations to make to your Lordship upon that point.

I will now deal with the question of the manual acts. The rubrics as to the manual acts during the prayer of consecration were omitted in Edward's second book; and therefore, according to the construction that my friend, Mr. Coleridge, and myself have placed upon the Acts of Uniformity, they thenceforth became unlawful.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Stop a moment; that is an important position; I must take it down. You say that while the second book of Edward VI. was in force all manual acts were unlawful.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Let me take that down.

Mr. Stephens.) Upon the principle that I have laid down.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, I quite understand the principle; at least, I presume it is that all that is not enjoined is forbidden.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And you say that extended up to the time of Charles II.'s Prayer Book.

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly, my Lord. There is no doubt some evidence exists that Cosin and others used these manual acts in Charles I.'s reign; and upon this my friend, Mr. Prideaux, has raised a theory; that not only these manual acts, but everything else which had been omitted from any of the Prayer Books, continued lawful notwithstanding the omission. If we examine what Cosin says upon the subject, we shall find, he recommends, that the rubric in reference to these manual acts should be restored "for the better warrant of the minister." The passage in question is to be found in 5 Cosin's Works, page

516, "Again, at the words there 'He took bread and he brake it, and He took the cup,' no direction is given to the priest (as in King Edward's service book there was, and as in most places it is still in use) to 'take the bread and cup into his hands,' nor to break the bread before the people, which is a needful circumstance belonging to this Sacrament; and therefore for his better warrant therein such a direction ought here to be set in the margin of the book."

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is the expression there—"in the margin of the book," and not "in the rubric"—according to the passage you have read? Do you consider he is referring to the rubric or to what is said in the margin of the book?

(Mr. Stephens.) No, my Lord, he is suggesting alterations to be made in the Book of Common Prayer, and that directions for these manual acts shall be placed in the margin. Your Lordship will hear in mind they are placed in the margin of the present Prayer Book as a rubric. The mode in which Bishop Cosin, in a passage which I am about to read, speaks of Bucer's recommendation, that these manual acts should be left out of Edward's second book, shows, that in his opinion the intention was to leave them out.

I now propose to refer to 5 Cosin's Works, page 478; "Notes on the Book of Common Prayer." "Therefore he [Bucer] mislikes also the making of any crosses (as the book appointed) over the bread and wine, or that the minister should take the bread and wine into his hands when he reads the words of institution; because by this practice men would think that he said these words to the bread and wine and not to the communicants; and it should seem that thereupon those directions in the margin for the priest taking the bread and wine into his hands, (when he says, 'took bread' and 'took the cup') were afterwards left out, and yet the use could not for all that be left off, it being a general custom among us to do so still."

What Cosin apparently means is, that although leaving out was intended to prohibit a practice, and generally had the effect of stopping a practice, yet this particular practice had not been stopped. I do not dispute that the practice might have existed, but I contend that it was a practice not warranted by the Acts of Uniformity, and therefore it was illegal. Moreover, whatever reliance may be placed upon Cosin's statement, as to the usage of his own time, he was writing from 80 to 90 years after Edward's second book, for the purpose of proving that the revisers of Edward's second book did not intend the manual acts to be discontinued, or that in fact they were not discontinued, and therefore his evidence on these latter points is not of much value.

The Savoy conference sat in 1661. The Puritan ministers requested that some rubric on the subject of these manual acts might be inserted: they said, "We concede that the manner of consecrating the elements is not here explicit and distinct enough, and the minister's breaking of the bread is not so much as mentioned." (Cardwell's Conferences on the Book of Common Prayer, page 321.) In pursuance of this request of the Puritan ministers and of Cosin's suggestion, the present rubrics as to the manual acts were inserted in the Prayer Book of 1662.

The case of the manual acts is in fact an exception that proves the rule. A practice edifying in itself, but not mentioned in the Prayer Book, had come partially into use, and by general consent rubrics are inserted prescribing exactly what is to be done, in order that there might be uniformity.

(The Dean of the Arches.) They say on the other side that there is no authority to be found for any prohibition of the continuance of these manual acts after Edward VI., and before the date of Charles II.'s Prayer Book; that is what they allege.

(Mr. Stephens.) That is the theory no doubt. No authority is to be found prohibiting these manual acts, but if the principle be conceded that every single thing that is not prohibited may be allowed, what becomes of uniformity? What becomes of the one rite, ceremony, order, form, and manner of performing the services of the Church?

(The Dean of the Arches.) I only meant with regard to this particular matter.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord, but that would have the effect of admitting the principle.

A definition has been given to your Lordship of the word "use." My friends have asserted it to mean the mode of chanting the service. It will be sufficient for me to refer to the IXth and XIIIth pages of the Preface to Maskell's Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England, where it is said, "I propose to discuss what is the meaning of the term 'use.' Upon this question the chief difficulty seems to be, how far, or if at all, we are to include the varieties also which unquestionably existed of music and chanting? How much of ceremonies and rites, besides the bare words and order of the prayers, ought to be included is another question, and rests upon very different grounds; but when we speak of the use of the church of Salisbury, or of the church of York or Hereford, not only need we not include the chants and music, but rather, if we wish to be precise, altogether exclude the consideration of them." At page XIII.: "One word also before I pass on upon the expression in the passage in the Preface to the Common Prayer Book, 'the great diversity in saying and singing,' and 'now from henceforth all the whole realm shall have but one 'use.' It is possible that the reformers, among their multiplicity of plans, did intend to enforce an uniformity in singing also throughout the realm; but whatever they may have meant by the words just quoted, I think that it is quite clear that the first Common Prayer Book of King Edward and all succeeding ones were not in fact aimed at the abolition of varieties of music, but of a variety of prayers and rites and ceremonies. This object was effected."

I will now proceed to the subject of elevation and kneeling. The Rev. Mr. Malin in his evidence says, that after the consecration of each element the consecrating clergyman elevates it above his head and then kneels down before the communion table. Whatever the motives of Mr. Mackonochie may be for such elevating and kneeling, persons who see him do so, may not unreasonably attribute to him the like motives as are avowed by another parochial clergyman who practices the like elevation and kneeling; and upon that point I will refer your Lordship to the Report of the Ritual Commissioners, and solicit the attention of the Court to the evidence of Mr. Bennett, when he was under the examination of Mr. Hubbard, one of the non-resident churchwardens of the parish of St. Alban's, and as such incapable of performing any legal act in connexion with that parish.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Are you satisfied of that? Are you satisfied that Mr. Hubbard's house of business is not in St. Alban's? If it is you know he would be capable. However, it is quite irrelevant to the present question.

(Mr. Stephens.) I understand Mr. Hubbard has no house of business in the parish, and I made my observations upon that supposition.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But if he had a house of business in the parish of course he would be properly churchwarden.

(Mr. Stephens.) Of course he would.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It does not matter, Mr. Stephens; it has no bearing upon this question.

(Mr. Stephens.) Mr. Hubbard is, however, churchwarden of St. Alban's by courtesy, and he examined Mr. Bennett. The following questions by Mr. Hubbard to Mr. Bennett, and the answers, are at page 75 of the first report of the Ritual Commissioners: "You stated that you lifted up the elements after “ consecration ; to what extent do you lift them up ?

 “ It may not be to the same extent every time ; nor “ can each celebrating priest elevate them to the same “ height ; there is no rule about it ; it is simply a “ gentle elevation. Some elevation is inevitable ?—
 “ Yes. You must raise the cup and the paten from “ the communion table in order to perform the act
 “ of consecration ?—Yes, one elevation takes place
 “ before the consecration, and there is another ele“ vation after the consecration. There are two “ elevations. The priest cannot take up the cup “ without an elevation. That is not for the purpose “ of adoration. In either case do you elevate the “ paten or the cup with the view of presenting “ them to the adoration of the people ?—Yes, distin“ ctly, in the latter case. It signifies to the people “ that the act of consecration has taken place. That,
 “ in truth, is the fact which you wish to express “ to them by raising it up and presenting it to their “ notice ?—Yes. In the case of the consecration “ prayer, do you pronounce it as a whole or do you “ make a pause after the consecration of the bread in “ order to make any prostration ?—We never use any “ prostration ; only kneeling. Do you, after the “ consecration of the bread, make a pause in the “ consecration prayer for the purpose of making a “ kneeling ?—There is no pause, it is a simultaneous “ act. It is not an absolute kneeling, but an incli“ nation only ?—Yes, what is called a genuflexion.
 “ Does a genuflexion mean touching the ground ?—
 “ Touching the ground with one knee.” At page 76, (question 2766,) the Dean of Ely puts the following questions to Mr. Bennett : “ Did I understand you to “ use this phrase, that the elevation of the elements “ took place for the purpose of adoration ?—Yes ; I “ consider the first elevation for the purpose of “ consecration to be totally distinct. After the con“ secration both the elements are elevated for the “ purpose of people knowing that the consecration “ has taken place and that they may have the oppor“ tunity of adoring and praying. Would you hold “ that the phrase ‘ the adoration of the elements ’
 “ was a proper orthodox phrase ?—It is the adora“ tion not of the elements, but of that which is hidden “ under them.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) You know I am not trying Mr. Bennett.

(Mr. Stephens.) My Lord, I have made no comment upon his evidence.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am not trying Mr. Bennett.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am aware of that, my Lord.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I did not like to interrupt, my Lord, but I felt that we were not responsible for any reason that Mr. Bennett might give.

(Mr. Stephens.) I do not propose to use the evidence in that way. I did not lay down that proposition. But I contend when the like acts are done at St. Alban's as are done in Mr. Bennett's parish church, that persons—innocent persons—persons, for instance, like myself—going into that church would have a right to assume that what was done in Mr. Bennett's church was done at St. Alban's, and for the like objects. I am only using this evidence and the book that I am now about to cite for the purpose of showing the construction that may be legitimately placed upon the ceremonies of which we now complain as taking place at St. Alban's during the performance of Divine service.

I will refer your Lordship to “ The Ritual Reason why,” page 126. Here we find the like reason given for the elevation after the consecration. “ Why does he elevate the Blessed Sacrament after either consecration ?” This is the answer : “ For two reasons ; first, as presenting the sacrifice to the Father, under the separate forms which represent His soul and body parted in death, and as showing the Lord's death before the people by this act ; and, again, as exhibiting to them Christ really though invisibly present to receive their homage. In this the priest imitates St. John the Baptist, who was not content “ to worship his Lord, but pointed him out to the people, saying, ‘ Behold the Lamb of God ! ’ ”

It is impossible, my Lord, that practices which are susceptible of such an interpretation, can be recognized as lawful in the parish churches of this country.

My friends have contended that Mr. Mackonochie is at liberty to use any ceremonial acts and gestures he pleases, provided he does not impugn the doctrines which the Church of England requires to be held and taught. I think that is a correct statement of their position. But the practices I am now dealing with, “ elevation ” and “ kneeling,” show the utter insufficiency of any such rule as that, as a safeguard for the faith of the Church. It has been shown that this elevation and kneeling, practised by Mr. Mackonochie, are identical with those used in the Church of Rome to express adoration towards the transubstantiated elements. I have also shown that the like ceremonies of elevation and kneeling are recommended in the “ Directorium Anglicanum,” and “ The Ritual Reason why,” (both books are written by clergymen of the United Church of England and Ireland,) for the purpose of expressing adoration towards the elements, or towards something in or under them ; and I assert that they are practised by Mr. Bennett, a parochial minister, avowedly for that purpose.

Mr. James, however, suggests that these things might be done quite innocently. My friend said, “ Where,” says my friend, “ is there any offence in the lifting above the head, unless it is said to be for the purpose of adoration, or unless it is said to be with some object, or some motive,—something that can be alleged to be done in violation of the laws of the Church ?” And again he says, with reference to kneeling, “ Why is it illegal for the priest to express by kneeling the same reverence which every communicant expresses by kneeling ?”

So long as a clergyman's opportunities for teaching his own individual opinions are limited to what he says in the pulpit, he is obliged to express the doctrines he teaches in clear intelligible English, and if he teaches anything contrary to the doctrines of the Church, he can be punished by the laws ecclesiastical. But if a clergyman is at liberty to add to or to alter the prescribed service, if he may lawfully introduce symbolical acts for the purpose of teaching his own peculiar notions, it is impossible that any efficient control can be exercised over the doctrine he teaches. And what would be the result ? That a clergyman might symbolize doctrines which he cannot preach. But I submit that as a clergyman cannot teach false doctrine, he cannot symbolize false doctrine by rites or ceremonies.

This practice of elevating the elements after the consecration is no part of the usage of the Church. I will refer your Lordship to the Chronicle of the Convocation of Canterbury in 1866, which contains a report of the Ritual Committee of Convocation ; that committee was composed of one dean, six archdeacons, and eight proctors. I think it has been published by the Ritual Commissioners.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is upon the subject of ritual, is it ?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes ; the passage is at page 9 of the Chronicle of Convocation, and touches upon the subject of the elevation of the elements after consecration. It says that “ this practice having been expressly forbidden by the first book of Edward VI., and “ discountenanced by the usage of the English Church ever since is, in the opinion of the committee, inadmissible.” Your Lordship will likewise find this passage at page 160 of the Ritual Commissioners' Report.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Before you conclude your argument upon this, Mr. Stephens, do I understand your contention is that the expression “ standing in the same ” means standing in the church ?

Adjourned for a short time.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are going now to a different subject, Mr. Stephens?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord, I am.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Are you going to give me any authority for "standing in the same," meaning standing in the church? That is all I want to know.

(Mr. Stephens.) I have no authority upon the subject, except a very humble one, namely, my own.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is a puzzling expression, no doubt, but "standing in the same church," the word "church" has not been mentioned before, has it?

(Mr. Stephens.) But it does not follow that because it has not been mentioned before—

(The Dean of the Arches.) What I want to know is, what the word "same" refers to, "same" is a word of reference. In the 4th section of the Act of Elizabeth, it is this:—"If any manner of parson, vicar, or other whatsoever minister, that ought or should say or sing Common Prayer mentioned in the said book, or minister the Sacraments, from and after the feast of the Nativity of Saint John Baptist next coming, refuse to use the said Common Prayers or administer the Sacraments in such cathedral or parish church, or other places as he should use to minister the same, in such order and form as they be mentioned and set forth in the same book, or shall wilfully and obstinately standing in the same, use any other rite." It is page 365 of your own book, a few lines from the top.

(Mr. Stephens.) Your Lordship will find "parish church" is mentioned, "In such cathedral or parish church or other places as he should use to administer the same, in such order and form as they be mentioned and set forth in the same book or language, shall wilfully or obstinately standing in the same," that, as it seems to me, can only apply to the cathedral or parish church.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But why "standing in the same?"

(Mr. Stephens.) "Standing in the same" is, no doubt, a very strange expression, but, my Lord, strange expressions are not confined to the Acts of Uniformity, and I submit that the expression in question could apply to no other antecedent except the cathedral or the church.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I only wanted to know your argument upon that, I do not wish to interrupt you.

(Mr. Stephens.) Your Lordship's interruptions have been of considerable use to me in the course of the argument. No one more appreciates them than myself.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I hope I have made no interruption except for the purpose of assisting counsel and myself.

Now, my Lord, I am going to a very dry subject, namely, the Proclamation Act.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am very glad of it.

(Mr. Stephens.) It has been argued by my friends Mr. James and Mr. Prideaux that the Injunctions of Edward the VI. are of statutable authority by reason of their being issued under the Proclamation Act of 31st Henry VIII., cap. 8., but my Lord this fanciful theory will upon a careful examination of the statute be found to be utterly destitute of foundation.

I will deal separately with my learned friend Dr. Tristram's argument upon that subject.

It is rather significant that my learned friends Mr. James and Mr. Prideaux have omitted to discuss the question, and have exclusively relied upon the judgment of Sir John Dodson in Westerton and Liddell without offering, perhaps very wisely, any argument in support of that learned judge's opinion. I do not think that the 31st of Henry VIII., cap. 8., is to be found in extenso in the ordinary editions of the statutes of the realm, it is to be found only in the folio edition; I do not know whether your Lordship has a copy.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No, I have not. I must get one for this case.

(Mr. Stephens.) Perhaps there may be one in the Library—I think it would be of very great assistance to your Lordship if you had it before you.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have got Sir John Dodson's recital of it.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am not going to rely upon that recital, and I am going through the entire statute. I have made a very careful abstract of it, and I will hand up to your Lordship that abstract, if you think proper to receive it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I will certainly receive it, but shall be very glad to hear you, of course. Dr. Tristram told me he would hand up a paper which he was to show you first.

(Mr. Stephens.) My Lord, the paper was sent to me, but I did not receive it until a late hour last night, and I have not had an opportunity of reading it. I do not presume to hand up to your Lordship any abstract of an argument, but a mere abstract of the Act of Parliament, that is all I presume to do.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I shall be very glad to have it.

(Mr. Stephens.) Your Lordship is fully aware that the question which Sir John Dodson had to decide was, whether the cross was illegal, as being among the images directed to be destroyed by the Injunctions of 1547. Sir John Dodson held that crosses were among the images directed to be destroyed, but his decision upon this point was overruled by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Therefore, his opinion upon the collateral question of the authority of the Injunctions, though entitled to the most respectful attention, is not a binding decision upon your Lordship.

I propose, in the first instance, to call the attention of the Court to the provisions of the 31st Henry VIII., cap. 8., from which, in Sir John Dodson's opinion, the Injunctions of 1547 derived a statutable authority. It is commonly called "The Proclamation Act." It is an Act "That proclamations made by the King should be obeyed and kept as though they were made by Act of Parliament." This statute did not give the King any additional power for issuing a proclamation. Its only object was to provide by statute for the punishment of disobedience to Royal proclamations, which it assumed the King already had power to issue, especially in cases of emergency. The first section commences with a recital—perhaps as I have a full note of the parts of the statute I intend to rely upon, I will hand up the folio volume containing the statute to your Lordship.

(The Dean of the Arches.) If that is equally convenient to you I should like to see it.

(Mr. Stephens.) The first section, as your Lordship perceives, commences with a recital, that the King had issued proclamations which had been disobeyed, and that it was necessary the King should set forth proclamations, as cases of necessity should require; and that there should be a power for punishing disobedience to such proclamations. It then enacts, "That the King, with the concurrence of certain members of his council, may set forth the proclamations, and that they shall be obeyed as though they were issued by Parliament for the time in them limited,"—reserving to the King a dispensing power.

Respecting the words "for the time in them limited," they are susceptible of two observations,—first, that those proclamations are not to be of a permanent character, but merely temporary provisions for cases of emergency. Secondly, that it was essential for the validity of every proclamation, that the time during which the proclamation was to be in force, should be specified in the proclamation itself.

My first proposition is, that these proclamations were not of a permanent character, but merely temporary provisions for cases of emergency. My second proposition is, that it was essential for the validity of every proclamation that the time during which the proclamation was to be in force should be specified in the proclamation itself.

The second section provides, "That no proclamation shall interfere with any Acts, Common Laws, standing at this present time in strength and force, nor yet with any lawful or laudable customs of this realm." Such language shows the retrospective character of this Act of Parliament, and perhaps that point may possibly have been overlooked by Sir John Dodson in the judgment, upon which my learned friends have relied.

The third section provides, that the sheriffs to whom the proclamations are sent under the great seal, shall proclaim them in a certain number of places within their district. Therefore, until these proclamations have been sent under the great seal, and proclaimed in a certain number of places within their districts, they are of no validity. And it may perhaps save your Lordship's time if, in the construction of these statutes, you will bear in remembrance all the learned arguments, and all the technical objections which my friends have had recourse to on the opposite side, as to the supposed construction of the penal character of Elizabeth's Act of Uniformity.

The fourth section provides, that "The offenders against any such proclamation being tried and convicted, before certain specified members of the council, shall suffer the penalties, whether of fine or imprisonment, specified in the proclamation." Therefore every proclamation, in order to satisfy the requirements of this statute, must specify the penalties to be inflicted on the offenders. And perhaps your Lordship will take a note of that point, because I shall raise an argument upon it with reference to the Injunctions.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have already got a note of the former part.

(Mr. Stephens.) What I want your Lordship to take a note upon, is this fourth section. Every proclamation, in order to satisfy the requirements of this statute, must specify the penalties to be inflicted upon the offenders, instead of the punishments by fine and imprisonment, which the Council, under sec. 4 of 31st Henry VIII. cap. 8, were empowered to inflict. The Injunctions of 1547 only impose ecclesiastical punishments, which the Council had no power to inflict under the Proclamation Act; and those ecclesiastical punishments are to be inflicted by whom? Why, by the Ordinary; and not by the thirteen members of the King's Council.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is not a word in this statute that I can discover about ecclesiastical punishment. There is not a word about ecclesiastical laws, or about Ordinaries.

(Mr. Stephens.) Nothing about ecclesiastical punishments. This is a penal statute. All the observations which my friends have made about the penal character of Elizabeth's Act of Uniformity apply to this statute.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It does not seem to me to have any bearing upon ecclesiastical matters?

(Mr. Stephens.) Quite so; and if so, the Injunctions of 1547 are gone.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am only speaking of them as they strike me at first sight.

(Mr. Stephens.) Quite so. When all the provisions of the Proclamation Act are considered, it will appear clear that they do not apply to ecclesiastical punishments. I am inclined to think Sir John Dodson did not read this statute.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think he did.

(Mr. Stephens.) Then it is very astonishing he should have arrived at the conclusion he did.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You must not take me as expressing any opinion that is binding.

(Mr. Stephens.) Clearly not, my Lord. The only unfortunate person who says anything that is binding just now is myself. I will now refer your Lordship to 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 22. The Injunctions of 1547 (Edward VI.) conclude with the following passage:— "All which and singular

"Injunctions the King's Majesty ministereth unto his clergy and their successors, and to all other his loving subjects: straightly charging and commanding them to observe and keep the same upon pain of deprivation, sequestration of fruits, of benefices, suspension, excommunication, and such other coercion, as to Ordinaries or other having ecclesiastical jurisdiction, whom His Majesty hath appointed for the due execution of the same."

How is it possible for any lawyer to contend, that with that clause these Injunctions were issued under this Proclamation Act?

(The Dean of the Arches.) You see, looking at Sir John Dodson's judgment now—

(Mr. Stephens.) I am going to read that judgment in extenso.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then you will deal with how Bishop Gardiner dealt with them.

(Mr. Stephens.) I will deal with that, and I think I shall be able to show that his Lordship's views ought not to be relied upon.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It seems to have been argued that the Injunctions were dealt with at that time by Bonner, and that seems to argue that they did come under that statute.

(Mr. Stephens.) If your Lordship will allow me I will deal with that question at once. I will refer you to 5 Foxe's "Actes and Monuments," page 171. In the Injunctions issued by Cromwell, in 1538, the punishments for their infraction are substantially the same as those of 1547—namely, "upon pain of deprivation, sequestration of your fruits, or such other coercion as to the King or his Vice-gerent for the time being shall be seen convenient."

Cromwell at this time was Vice-gerent to the King, for all his jurisdiction ecclesiastical, and styles himself as such at the commencement of these Injunctions of 1538. The session in which the Proclamation Act was passed commenced on the 28th April 1539. Therefore these Injunctions of Cromwell were not issued under the Proclamation Act, although they are substantially like the Injunctions of 1547, and inflict the like penalties for their violation:

(The Dean of the Arches.) The Injunctions of Cromwell could not have had any force by this statute?

(Mr. Stephens.) Clearly not. But the reason I use the argument is this, and it is a very remarkable fact, that there are the like penalties for the infraction of the Injunctions of 1538 as there are for the Injunctions of 1547. That is rather an important element in discussing the question as to whether these Injunctions were issued under this statute or not. I am now dealing with the fourth section. The accusation was to be within six months after the offence committed, and the conviction was to be within 18 months. That section also contains a proviso protecting every offender who does not live in a county in which such proclamation shall have been proclaimed within one year before. This proviso, coupled with the words, "for the time in them limited" in the first section, proves that the proclamations to which this Act was intended to apply were merely temporary. Again, it appears from the preamble that the Legislature desired to provide for emergencies which required "a speedy remedy" . . . "without abiding for Parliament."

(The Dean of the Arches.) What section are you upon now?

(Mr. Stephens.) I am now arguing as to the effect of the fourth section, and I wish to ask your Lordship whether you attended to the words "for the time in them limited?"

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes.

(Mr. Stephens.) The fifth section merely describes the process against the offenders.

The sixth section relates to offenders leaving the country.

The seventh section applies to offenders concealing themselves.

The eighth section provides, "That during the minority of King Henry's successor, all proclamations that should be made and set forth in this “ realm should be set forth in the King’s name, and “ should bear underwritten the full names of those of “ the Council who authorized the Proclamation.” This section requires these Proclamations to be set forth with the “ names of the Council underwritten.” That is, copies which are to be sent to the sheriffs to be proclaimed, and which are, under section 3, to be set up in certain places within their districts, are to have underwritten the full names of such of the Council as authorized the proclamations. It would not be sufficient that a single copy of such a proclamation should be signed by the King and his councillors. The copies to be set forth must be so signed,—a fact which seems to have escaped the attention of Sir John Dodson.

Section 9 contains directions to the justices to whom any proclamations may be sent under this Act. The 10th section empowers the Councillors who adjudicate on offences under this proclamation to diminish the pecuniary penalties contained therein.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Perhaps that observation of mine with regard to there being no reference to anything ecclesiastical, was rather too broad, because I see the beginning of that statute is this: “ Whereas “ the King’s most royall Majestie for diverse considerations, by the advice of his counsell, hath here- “ tofore sett forth diverse and sondrie his Grace’s “ proclamacions, as well for and concerning diverse “ and sondrie articles of Christ’s religion.” It seems to refer to the Articles upon that subject.

(Mr. Stephens.) Suppose it did, my Lord, this is a penal statute, and the directions of a penal statute must be strictly followed.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It does not affect that part of your argument?

(Mr. Stephens.) There is no power under that section to inflict ecclesiastical punishment, and in order to give effect to the Injunctions of 1547 the whole case falls to the ground, so far as regards the Proclamation Act of Henry VIII., unless it can be shown that there was a power to inflict ecclesiastical punishments.

I must now direct your Lordship’s attention to the 34th and 35th Henry VIII., chapter 23. I do not think this statute will be found in the ordinary editions of the Statutes at Large.

After reciting the former Act of the 31st Henry VIII. that divers proclamations had been made under its provisions, and that proceedings against offenders had been taken: but that such proceedings had not been completed within the time limited by the Act, namely, 18 months from the commission of the offence, because there were not a sufficient number of members to constitute a court—Sir John Dodson, when commenting upon the proclamation stated erroneously (I say it with the deepest respect) that it does not appear that Henry VIII. issued any proclamations under this statute. And yet, my Lord, it is stated in the recital: “ Since the “ making of the said Act, the King’s Highness, with “ the advice of his Council, hath for the profit of this “ realm caused divers goodly and proper proclamations “ to be made, which divers wilfully disposed persons “ have diversely broken.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the recital?

(Mr. Stephens.) The use I intend to make of the recital is to show that divers proclamations have been issued under that Act. Sir John Dodson says the contrary.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Certainly it recites them.

(Mr. Stephens.) The first statute then enacts that during the life of Henry VIII. the quorum for trying offences under the 31st Henry VIII., cap. 8., should be reduced from 13 to nine members.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is all one section here. It is all put together, and then it concludes: “ This “ Act to endure during the King’s Majesty’s life, “ which our Lord long preserve.”

(Mr. Stephens.) Exactly so, my Lord, and therefore so far as that statute is concerned, when Henry VIII. died the Act was gone.

I will now direct your Lordship’s attention to the observations of Dr. Lushington in Westerton and Liddell (Moore, page 34), upon the statute of 31 Henry VIII., cap. 8., and 35 Henry VIII., cap. 23. What does that learned judge say: “ Statutes 31 Henry VIII., “ cap. 8, and 35 Henry VIII., cap. 23, prescribe particular formalities according to which the powers “ given by the Acts must be exercised. Certain In- “ junctions were indeed issued by Edward VI., A.D. “ 1547, but they are not found to have been issued in “ pursuance of these statutes, or in virtue of them, “ nor with the requisite formalities. Whoever should “ affirm that these Injunctions ought to be received as “ law must prove the affirmative—must establish their “ titles so to be considered.” How have the learned counsel on the opposite side established their case? Why by merely reading the judgment of Sir John Dodson, and not attempting to support that judgment by any argument or by reference to any statute or any case. And they had very good reasons for the course which they took; they knew that their case was utterly destitute of any foundation, and that they could not prove that the Injunctions of 1547 had any statutable authority.

I will now redeem the promise which I made to your Lordship of referring to the judgment of Sir John Dodson in extenso, which you will find reported in Moore, pages 96 to 102. The learned judge says, “ By the statute 31 Henry VIII., c. 8, entitled “ ‘ An Act that Proclamations made by the King “ ‘ shall be obeyed and kept as though they were made “ ‘ by Act of Parliament, it is enacted in section 1, “ ‘ that ‘ always the King for the time being with the “ ‘ advice of his Honourable Council, whose names “ ‘ hereafter follow, or with the advice of the more “ ‘ part of them, may set forth at all times by the “ ‘ authority of this Act his proclamations under such “ ‘ penalties and pains and of such sort as his High- “ ‘ ness and his said Honourable Council, or the “ ‘ more part of them, shall deem necessary and “ ‘ requisite; and that these same shall be observed “ ‘ and kept as though they were made by Act of “ ‘ Parliament, for the times in them limited, unless “ ‘ the King’s Highness dispense with them, or any “ ‘ of them under his Great Seal.’ The fourth section “ ‘ of the same statute, setting forth before whom “ ‘ offenders were to be convicted, contains the list of “ ‘ officers referred to in the first section.

“ These officers, at the head of whom stood the “ Archbishop of Canterbury, consisted of twenty-five “ persons, holding twenty-six offices among them; “ and offenders were to be convicted before these, “ or at least before one half their number. Another “ section directed that such proclamations should be “ posted up in market places. A further section “ directed that these proclamations should not infringe “ any existing law. This was a very curious provision, respecting which Bishop Burnet and other “ writers observed that it contained very wide words, “ and ended in giving large power to make interpretations of the law. Section eight directs, that in “ the event of the King’s successor being a minor, “ then ‘ all and singular proclamations which shall be “ ‘ in anywise made and set forth into any part of “ ‘ the realm or other the King’s dominions, by virtue “ ‘ of this Act within the aforesaid years of the said “ ‘ next heir or successor, shall be set forth in the “ ‘ successor’s name then being King, and shall import “ ‘ or bear underwritten the full name of such of the “ ‘ King’s Honourable Council then being as shall be “ ‘ the devisors or setters forth of the same, which “ ‘ shall be in this case the whole number afore re- “ ‘ hearsed, or at least the more part of them, or else “ ‘ the proclamation to be void and of none effect.’ “ By the 34th and 35th Henry VIII., c. 23, it was “ enacted, that offenders against proclamations made “ under the foregoing Act might be convicted before “ nine of the King’s Council. These Acts continued “ in force until towards the end of 1547, when they “ were repealed by the Parliament which met in “ November of that year. It does not appear that “ Henry VIII. issued any proclamations under the “ above-mentioned Acts.” [I have already shown to your Lordship, in the language of the statutes, that that position cannot be supported, because the statute in question actually recites that proclamations were issued], "The Injunctions issued by him in 1536 and in 1538, as well as 'The Institutions of a Christian Man,' having been published before, apparently under the authority given to the King by the Act of Supremacy; 'The Erudition of a Christian Man,' published in 1542, subsequently to the first of these, does not assist in throwing any light upon the question. Henry VIII. by his will appointed sixteen guardians of his son, and twelve Councillors, who held among them most if not all the offices enumerated in the fourth section of the 31st Henry VIII., c. 8.

"The learned Judge of the Consistory Court, relying, it would seem, in part at least, on a passage to be found in 'Collier's Ecclesiastical History,' was of opinion that the Injunctions of Edward VI. had no parliamentary authority. Reference is made in the report of his judgment to the marginal note in the 5th volume of Collier's work, p. 228; but on examination of the text it will appear that Collier was not stating his own view of the question, but merely setting forth the reasons assigned by Bishop Gardiner in his letter and elsewhere, for opposing the Injunctions issued by the King. Gardiner seems to have been almost the only person who disputed the validity of these Injunctions at the time, and he was thrown into prison in consequence. He afterwards, indeed, thought proper to retract, and wrote a letter to the Protector in order to get released from his confinement. The Protector, however, for reasons best known to himself, thought it better to keep him there until the session of Parliament was over, as otherwise the bishop might have given him some trouble. Nevertheless, Gardiner had expressed his wish to retract his objection to the Injunctions, and it was remarkable that Bishop Bonner also never refused to acknowledge their validity. In his letter to the Protector, Bishop Gardiner alleged that the religion professed in the late reign was established by law, and that although the King's proclamation was to have the same force as an Act of Parliament, yet that it was not to overrule any Act then in being; and that, moreover, the Injunctions of King Edward had not been proclaimed and published at the market places with the requisite formalities.

"The learned Judge of the Consistory Court, having mentioned the Acts 31st Henry VIII., c. 8, and 35th Henry VIII., c. 23, and stated that they prescribed particular formalities according to which the powers given by them were to be exercised, then observed that certain Injunctions were indeed issued by Edward VI. in 1547, but they are not found to have been issued in pursuance of those statutes, or in virtue of them, nor with the requisite formalities. Whosoever should affirm that these Injunctions ought to be received as law must, he says, prove the affirmative. This has not been done, and the Court therefore has not the advantage of any explanation from that source. Since the decision of this case in the Consistory Court of London I have been furnished with a copy of a pamphlet published by a learned barrister, Mr. Chambers. Speaking of the Injunctions issued in May, 1547, in the first year of King Edward's reign, he states that the original of them exists in Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and that by the kindness of Dr. Pulling, the present master, he had obtained a fac-simile of the King's signature thereto. The same kindness has been extended to me by Dr. Pulling, and I find, as I had no doubt I should, that the representation of Mr. Chambers that the signature of King Edward VI. appears on the first page in a large bold character, and the other signatures (13 in number) at the end of the Injunctions, is perfectly correct. As to the preparation and issue of the Injunctions of Edward VI., I find from Burnet that by a patent, dated the 13th of March 1547, the King appointed Somerset Pro“ tector, and all the former counsellors and executors, with the exception of Southampton to form his Council.

“ They are all mentioned in the patent as follows:” [I will not trouble your Lordship with their names, for I do not think it is an important element. Then the judgment goes on] “ Thus we have 11 or rather 12, if both secretaries are to be counted, of officers required under the Proclamation Act. The other four signers may have held, and probably did hold, some of the other offices; one of them may have been Chancellor of the Duchy, or Under Treasurer of the Exchequer, or one of the General Surveyors.

“ It must be remembered that the constitution was at that time in a very unsettled state. The King had power under the Acts of Supremacy to reform abuses, but how far that power extended was not clearly ascertained. The Act giving to Proclamations the force of law seems to have been passed with the view of determining what he could do.”

[Your Lordship has read the preamble of that statute, and you have gone through the statute. How far this judgment of Sir John Dodson can be supported is a question of course in the absolute discretion of your Lordship.] “ But the Act itself, Gardiner said, caused large words at the passing of it, and was open to great doubts of construction;” (now mark what he says about Burnet). Burnet says that the Act gave great power to the judges, since there were such restrictions in some branches of it which seemed to lessen the great extent of the other parts of it, so that the exposition of the law had much referred to them. Upon that Act the great changes of religion in the nonage of Edward VI. were grounded” [by that Act which your Lordship has been reading.] “ Gardiner objected to the Injunctions that they were invalid, as contradictory to the Acts of Henry VIII., he also objected to them, that they had not been posted up in market places as required. His objections, however, were overruled and the Injunctions enforced.”

My Lord, I have now read the entire of the judgment. I have already stated to your Lordship what the question was that Sir John Dodson had to decide, namely, whether a cross was illegal as being among the images directed to be destroyed by the Injunction of 1547; and I wish to press upon the attention of your Lordship that in the ultimate decision of this question you will not be overruling any judgment of Sir John Dodson by adopting the views which I have submitted to the Court; because the decision upon the point as to crosses was overruled by the Privy Council. Therefore, the opinion of Sir John Dodson upon the collateral question of the authority of the Injunctions, as I have said before, though entitled to the deepest respect from the position that he held, is not binding upon your Lordship. In point of fact it is no decision at all; it is a mere expression of opinion. Now what has Sir John Dodson done? He has relied exclusively upon two authorities which I have read to your Lordship. First Burnet's statement; secondly, the fact that a manuscript of the Injunctions in Corpus Christi Library, Cambridge, bears the original signatures of Edward VI., and 13 of his Council. It is upon these premises that Sir John Dodson's judgment has been given, and it is upon a judgment so given that my friends come into Court and say the Injunctions of 1547 are of statutable authority.

What are Burnet's representations? They are as follow:—I refer your Lordship to 1 Burnet's History of the Reformation, by Nares, page 424: “ This Act” (alluding to the Proclamation Act) “ gave great power to the judges, since there were such restrictions in some branches of it, which seemed to lessen the great extent of the other parts of it, so that the expositors of the law had much referred to them. Upon this Act were the great changes of religion in the nonage of Edward VI. grounded.” I now refer your Lordship to 2 Burnet, pages 40 and 41 of the same edition. “ And in the Act of Parliament which he (that is, Henry VIII.) had procured

“ for giving force and authority to his Proclamations, “ a proviso was added that his son’s Councillors, while “ he should be under age, might set out proclamations “ of the same authority with those which were made “ by the King himself. This gave them a full power “ to proceed in that work, in which they resolved to “ follow the method begun by the late King of send- “ ing visitors over England with Injunctions and “ Articles.”

Those are the representations of Burnet. I have now read in extenso the two statements to which Sir John Dodson referred, and your Lordship will find such statements are not only opposed to statements in Collier, but also to the accounts given by Foxe, by Fuller, and by Heylin. I refer your Lordship to 5 Collier’s Ecclesiastical History (page 199 of the octavo edition, London), where it is said:—“ Now we “ do not find the Injunctions of Edward VI. were “ either proclaimed in the manner above mentioned “ or supported by any proclamation?”

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is that Collier’s own language, or is he reciting what Gardiner says?

(Mr. Stephens.) He is giving Gardiner’s reasons.

(The Dean of the Arches.) He is reciting what Gardiner said?

(Mr. Stephens.) That is so.

In 5 Foxe’s Actes and Monuments, page 706, it is said, “ Forasmuch as at his first entry (notwithstand- “ ing his father’s good beginning, in abolishing the “ usurped power of Antichrist), he yet found most of “ his laws greatly repugning against this his zealous “ enterprise; he therefore proposed, by the advice of “ his said wise and Honourable Council, and of his “ own regal power and authority, somewhat to pro- “ secute his godly purpose, until such time as by “ consent of the whole estate of Parliament, he “ might establish a more free, perfect, and uniform “ order therein.”

I now beg to refer your Lordship to 2 Fuller’s Church History, page 304, section 3. The title is “ Commissioners sent into severall counties with in- “ structions to reform,” &c. What is the form of words? “ By his own regal power and authority, and by the advice of his Council.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) That would be by the authority inherent, or supposed to be inherent, in the Crown.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, whatever that may be.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Whatever that may be.

(Mr. Stephens.) But the value of the Injunctions of 1547 depends upon their being of statutable authority.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Unless there was a power in the Crown at that time to issue them without statutable authority?

(Mr. Stephens.) That would not be a statutable authority?

(The Dean of the Arches.) I say, unless there was a power in the Crown at that time to issue them without statutable authority.

(Mr. Stephens.) My contention before your Lordship is, that unless it can be clearly established that the Injunctions of 1547 were issued by statutable authority, they are null and void.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, I understand you to say that.

(Mr. Stephens.) Suppose they were issued by the King by virtue of his prerogative, that would not be issuing them by statutable authority; it would be by constitutional authority, but not by statutable authority. To make use of a very forcible expression of Dr. Lushington, unless it can be clearly established that the Injunctions of 1547 are of statutable authority, they are gone “ root and branch.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) Of course that must depend very much upon what authority the Crown had at that time.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am now assuming there was no statute upon the subject. I do not believe it is pretended (at least the opposite side have not attempted to say so) that they have any authority except under the Proclamation Act; because they have relied upon the judgment of Sir John Dodson, and beyond that everything they have said or done has been “ a dark “ and dumb ceremony.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) With the exception of Dr. Tristram, you know, who took another line?

(Mr. Stephens.) I will come, my Lord, to my friend Dr. Tristram by-and-by—I am not forgetting him.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Before you leave this point you must deal with that.

(Mr. Stephens.) My Lord, I will do so presently; but what I want to impress first upon your Lordship is this: supposing these Injunctions were issued by virtue of the mere prerogative of the Crown, they would not be in force by authority of Parliament. Authority of Parliament means by statute.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Certainly; but the argument would then be that if the Crown had such authority at the time, they were valid at the time they were issued?

(Mr. Stephens.) If the Crown had such authority at the time, they would be valid at the time they were issued, no doubt; but it is not pretended, at least in Sir John Dodson’s judgment, that they had any authority except under this Proclamation Act. If your Lordship could refer me to any other statute under which these Injunctions of 1547 could possibly have been issued, I will deal with it immediately.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Suppose the Crown could have such a power without statute?

(Mr. Stephens.) That would not be sufficient—certainly not. The constitutional power of the Crown and the power of the Crown under statute are two distinct and different powers.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Unquestionably they are.

(Mr. Stephens.) Supposing these Injunctions did not receive validity—

(The Dean of the Arches.) At any rate they are powers derived from different sources.

(Mr. Stephens.) They are powers derived from different sources, the one being derived from a source other than that of an Act of Parliament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The power of the Royal prerogative at that time was very doubtful indeed you know?

(Mr. Stephens.) Very doubtful, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is very doubtful, I think, what exact authority the Crown had at that time in matters relating to the status and discipline of the Church.

(Mr. Stephens.) By virtue of the prerogative?

(The Dean of the Arches.) I mean by virtue of the prerogative.

(Mr. Stephens.) But there is no doubt that would not be sufficient.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Great writers have thought so.

(Mr. Stephens.) But that would not be sufficient, as my learned friend reminds me, with regard to the Rubric upon ornaments.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No, certainly not as to the Ornaments Rubric, because that says “ by authority of Parliament.”

(Mr. Stephens.) If so, what becomes of the Royal prerogative? What the opposite side has to establish is this, that the Injunctions of 1547 were in force by authority of Parliament—no matter what the power of the Crown may have been by virtue of the prerogative, still that would not be a power by authority of Parliament. Your Lordship will find it stated in 1 Heylin’s History of the Reformation, page 68, that the Injunctions were issued by the King’s authority.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That would be his prerogative authority.

(Mr. Stephens.) Precisely. I have now come to the second point which I have to discuss with regard to Burnet.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say that Burnet is inaccurate—is that your position?

(Mr. Stephens.) The passages in Burnet upon which Sir John Dodson relied, are inaccurate. First, the learned judge is inaccurate upon his construction of the statute, and secondly, upon the authorities that he cited.

The fact that a manuscript referred to bears the signature of Edward VI. and 13 of his Councillors is not satisfactory evidence of the Injunctions having been issued under the Proclamation Act. How does it prove that they were issued under the Proclamation Act? The 7th section of the Proclamation Act is not satisfied by a single copy of the Proclamation having been signed by the Councillors. What does that section mean? It means that the copies sent to the sheriff to be proclaimed are to be set up in certain places within their districts and are to have the names of the Councillors underwritten. The printed copies of the Injunctions which were circulated throughout the country had no signatures to them. My friends have not attempted to produce one that has. Therefore, supposing these Injunctions had been issued, unless they had complied with the provisions of the Act of Parliament in that particular, namely, with the names of the Councillors underwritten, they would have been invalid; and no punishment could have been inflicted upon offenders against them.

This case hangs upon this old manuscript at Cambridge; that is the whole case. There are no signatures to the Injunctions in Sparrow nor in Cardwell that I can find. My friend Mr. Droop has been to the British Museum; he has seen two copies there, and neither of them have signatures. If there had been one with signatures at the British Museum, at Oxford, or at Cambridge, it would have been produced.

The 3rd section of the Proclamation Act required that proclamations should be sent to the sheriffs under the Great Seal and proclaimed. The Injunctions in Corpus Christi library are not stated to have the Great Seal upon them; Sir John Dodson does not say so; there is no evidence that they were ever sent to the sheriffs or that they were proclaimed. On the contrary, Foxe, Fuller, and Heylin all state, that they were delivered to Commissioners appointed to visit the several dioceses. In 5 Foxe's Actes and Monuments, page 706, it is stated, dealing with the Ecclesiastical Injunctions of 1547, "There were, delivered unto them certain Injunctions and Ecclesiastical Orders drawn out by the learned King's Council which they should both inquire of and also command on His Majesty's behalf to be thenceforth observed of every person to whom they did severally appertain within their sundry circuits." Again, in 2 Fuller's Church History, page 304, "The King chose Commissioners and sent them with instructions into several parts of the kingdom." I assume the date to be 1546-47. In 1 Heylin's History of the Reformation, pages 68 to 84 of the Ecclesiastical Society's edition, "This was to be done by sending out Commissioners into all parts of the kingdom armed with instructions to inquire into all ecclesiastical concerns."

The account that Sir John Dodson gives of these manuscript Injunctions in Corpus Christi library is quite consistent with their having been merely draft Injunctions which the King and Council had agreed to issue; the signatures of the King and his Councillors being merely introduced to show that they were not opposed to the draft. Sir John Dodson again does not appear from his judgment to have seen the original manuscript or even a complete copy of it, but merely a fac simile copy of the signatures. Your Lordship will bear in mind that in his judgment it is the signatures which he deals with and not the body of the document.

If the Injunctions of 1547 had been issued under the Proclamation Act they would have lost their statutory authority upon the repeal of that Act. I must now ask your Lordship to turn to the 1st Edward VI., cap. 12, section 4, you will not find it except in the folio edition. The session began on the 4th November 1547, and ended upon the 24th December of the same year. That statute repealed the 31st Henry VIII., cap. 8, and the 34 & 35 Henry VIII., cap. 23.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I may take this as a fact that on the 5th November 1547 the statutes 31st Henry VIII., cap. 8, and 34 & 35 Henry VIII., cap. 23, were repealed.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord, it says so here.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Well, what was the effect of that?

(Mr. Stephens.) The effect was to take away from any Proclamation that had been issued under the repealed statutes any authority or effect that they might have derived from having been made under such statutes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) To invalidate them retrospectively?

(Mr. Stephens.) To invalidate them.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Retrospectively?

(Mr. Stephens.) Retrospectively. Has your Lordship got my proposition down?

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think I have, quite accurately.

(Mr. Stephens.) Before I refer to the decisions of the common law courts in support of that proposition, I will, with your Lordship's permission, direct your attention to an article which has been written upon "Ritualism and the Ecclesiastical Law," by Mr. Benjamin Shaw, a member of the profession and a gentleman of deep learning upon these subjects.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is it a pamphlet?

(Mr. Stephens.) It is published in the Contemporary Review, January 1866. The reason I read it, is, because I have not seen the point so well put by any writer as it has been put by Mr. Shaw. I refer your Lordship to page 23 of the pamphlet: "The Injunctions were put forth in the summer of 1547, and in the ensuing winter was passed the statute 1 Edw. VI., c. 12, which repealed the Acts in question, declaring that the Act 'made in the Parliament holden at Westminster in the thirty-first year of the late King Henry VIII., that proclamations made by the King's Highness, by the advice of his Honourable Council, should be obeyed and kept as though they were made by authority of Parliament; and also one other Act, made in the Parliament holden in the thirty-fourth year of the reign of the said late King Henry VIII., for the due execution of the said proclamations, and also all and every branch, articles, and matters in the same statutes, and in every of them, mentioned or declared, shall from henceforth be repealed and utterly made void and of no effect.'" That is the language of the statute. Then Mr. Shaw observes, "It is a well-settled principle of law that any obligation flowing from a statute either mediately or immediately (that is from some rule or order made in pursuance of powers granted in a statute) becomes null and void as soon as the statute is repealed." He then quotes, in support of that position, a number of authorities.

(The Dean of the Arches.) He does not mean to assert that the acts done while it is in force were invalid?

(Mr. Stephens.) No, my Lord, not while it was in force, certainly not.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Supposing these Injunctions of 1547 had been issued under the Proclamation Acts, and that the Proclamation Acts were repealed?

(Mr. Stephens.) Then I should respectfully contend that the Injunctions were gone; and I will presently prove it upon the authority of decisions by the common law courts.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Gone for the future?

(Mr. Stephens.) Gone for the future.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes.

(Mr. Stephens.) Anything that has been done under those Injunctions during the time that the statute was in force would be good.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Just so. Then comes in the consideration of the Rubric, which says that what was by the authority of Parliament in the second year of Edward VI. shall be retained and had in use.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, but it has not been established that they were in force by authority of Parliament in the second year of Edward VI.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I mean to say you are arguing on the assumption now that they were.

(Mr. Stephens.) Precisely.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Of course if the Injunctions derive their authority by statute, and the statute which gave them authority has been repealed, in future they cannot be issued.

(Mr. Stephens.) Clearly not. The article proceeds:—
 “To take a recent instance, the Acts in relation to friendly societies gave those bodies power to make rules for their own government, and declared that when duly made and certified by a barrister appointed for that purpose, they should be binding on the members of such societies. By 13 & 14 Vict. c. 115., the law concerning friendly societies was modified, and the previous Acts repealed. But in order to prevent rules already made under those Acts from becoming void, which would necessarily have ensued, and would have been inconvenient, the Act contained an express clause ‘that such repeal shall not invalidate or affect anything which has been done before the passing of this Act in pursuance of any of the said Acts.’ The Injunction, therefore, cannot be considered as having any Parliamentary authority in the second year of King Edward. Consequently, it cannot be referred to under these terms in the Rubric, and its bearing on the matter is thus disposed of.”

In Dwarria's Statutes, page 528, it is laid down that “no proceedings can be pursued under a repealed statute, though commenced before the repeal, unless by special exception.” In fact, my Lord, after the repeal of an Act nothing can continue to be done under its authority unless by virtue of some special saving clause to that effect.

In Kay v. Goodwin, 6 Bingham, page 582, Chief Justice Tindal says: “I take the effect of a repealing statute to be to obliterate it as completely from the records of Parliament as if it had never passed; and it must be considered as a law, that never existed, except for the purpose of those actions which were commenced, prosecuted, and concluded whilst it was an existing law.”

In Steavenson v. Oliver, 8th Meeson and Welsby, page 234, the Act of 6th George IV., cap. 103, declared that every surgeon in the navy should be entitled to practise as an apothecary without undergoing the ordinary examination for that purpose. This Act, however, was temporary only and the question was raised, whether a man who had been a navy surgeon while the Act was in force, continued to be entitled to the privilege after it had expired. Baron Parke says: “There is a difference between temporary statutes and statutes which are repealed. The latter, except as far as they relate to transactions already completed under them, become as if they had never existed; but, with reference to the former, the duration of the provisions is matter of construction.” Upon the ground of this distinction the right was held to remain. Had the Act been repealed, the right given by it would have ceased. So here, my Lord, the Proclamations issued under the Proclamation Acts ceased to have Parliamentary authority after the passing of the 1st Edward VI., cap. 12.

There are several other cases upon that point as to the construction of statutes to which I will give your Lordship a reference, viz., The Queen v. Inhabitants of Mawgan, 8 Adolphus and Ellis, page 496, and The Queen v. The Inhabitants of Denton, 18 Queen's Bench, page 761. I think your Lordship will find all the law applicable to this question in those cases.

I now come to the time of Queen Mary. The Injunctions of 1547 were not expressly repealed in Queen Mary's reign, as the Statutes of Uniformity and other Acts of Parliament relating to religion were; but they were altogether disregarded. The only apparent reason that can be assigned for such an omission is this—that the Injunctions of 1547 were not regarded as legislative enactments. Dr. Lushington in Westerton and Liddell, Moore, 65, says:—“The Injunction of 1547 is not entitled to the force of an Act of Parliament, nor proved to be issued under any such authority; but the Injunction is strong and undeniable proof of what in the early times of the Reformation was deemed right on this subject and sanctioned by royal authority. There can be no doubt also, that this Injunction was accepted and acted upon by Archbishop Cranmer. It is equally clear, however, that this use of candles is not expressly authorized by the 2nd and 3rd of Edward VI., nor by the first Book of Common Prayer. Subsequently, as the Reformation grew in strength, and approached its present proportions, the setting lights on the communion table was expressly prohibited, and no other ceremonies were to be used than those appointed in the King's Book of Common Prayer.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) What authority had those articles? “This appears,” he says, “from the Visitation Articles moved by Royal authority shortly after the first Book of Common Prayer.”

(Mr. Stephens.) The best answer I can make to your Lordship is what you stated to me just now—that the Royal authority was involved in a considerable amount of obscurity at that period of our history.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You see, Dr. Lushington there treated the royal authority of Edward VI. as nothing, and the royal authority of Elizabeth as everything.

(Mr. Stephens.) Well, my Lord, it is not for me to comment upon any observations which the learned judge made upon that subject.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Before you sit down will you give me a little assistance upon this point. The Prayer Book of Edward VI. refers to Injunctions. I want some assistance upon the question as to what effect that may have.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am going to deal with that subject, my Lord; it has not escaped my attention.

I will now conclude my observations upon this branch of the case, namely, the effect of this Proclamation Act, by laying down four propositions to your Lordship.

First, if these Injunctions were issued under the Proclamation Acts, nevertheless, upon the repeal of those Acts in November 1547, they were not in force by the authority of Parliament in the second year of Edward VI.

Secondly, if they were intended to be issued under the Proclamation Acts of Henry VIII., they were not issued in accordance with their provisions; (1) there is no time limited during which the Injunctions were to continue in force; (2) because the copies of those Injunctions which were printed and circulated were not signed by 13 members of the King's Council, as required by 31 Henry VIII., cap. 8., and there is no evidence of their having been proclaimed in accordance with the 3rd section of that statute.

Thirdly, that instead of the punishment by fine and imprisonment which the Council under section 4 of 31 Henry VIII., cap. 8., were empowered to inflict, the Injunctions of 1547 only threaten ecclesiastical punishments, which the Council had no power to inflict under the Proclamation Act; and those ecclesiastical punishments are to be inflicted by the ordinary, and not by the 13 members of the King's Council.

Fourthly, it appears from the earliest history of the Reformation, Foxe, Fuller, and Heylin, that the Injunctions were not issued under the Proclamation Act, but by virtue of the King's supremacy.

I am now going to another branch of the subject, and one to which your Lordship has directed my attention. My learned friends appear also to rely, with reference to the authority of the Injunctions, upon the following Rubric in Edward I.'s Prayer Book, which is to be found at the end of the Communion Service in that book: "Upon Wednesdays and Fridays the English Litany shall be said or sung in all places, after such form as is appointed by the King's Majesty's Injunctions, or as is or shall be otherwise appointed by His Highness."

It has been argued that this recognition of the Injunctions gave them Parliamentary authority, the Prayer Book being put forth under the Act of the 2nd and 3rd Edward VI., cap. 1.; consequently, it is said, that the altar lights sanctioned by another of the same set of Injunctions, must have been in the Church of England by authority of Parliament in the second year of King Edward VI. I believe that was the contention on the opposite side.

The question seems to be this: Does a reference to a particular Injunction legalize the whole set of Injunctions of which it is one? It becomes expedient to test this proposition by analogous cases. It is said in the Prayer Book of Charles II., in the Rubric at the commencement of the Communion Service, that in particular cases there specified "the Ordinary shall proceed against the offending person according to the canon." This reference is to the 26th, 27th, and 109th canons of the canons of 1603. Will it be contended that this sanction so given to one canon gives Parliamentary authority to the whole mass of those canons?

Such a proposition would be in direct opposition to the case of Middleton and Crofts (2 Atkins, 668), where it was held that the canons of 1603 do not bind the laity—for if they have the authority of Parliament, the whole realm must be bound by them. If the proposition contended for by my learned friends be correct, it is a little remarkable, that in Middleton and Crofts it never occurred to the court or to the counsel that there was a very short and conclusive ground of decision, inasmuch as the reference to one canon in the Prayer Book must have legalized all. That would be the result of upholding the contention of my learned friends.

Now let me direct your Lordship's attention to Articles XI. and XXXV. The Homily on Justification is referred to as "more largely expressing the true doctrine, and the homilies are also confirmed by Article XXXV. Either every part of every homily, according to the principle laid down by my learned friend, acquires statutable authority, and therefore inter alia, the one that alleges that it has always been held jolly to light a candle in the daytime; or, else it must be admitted, that citations of and references to particular clauses do not legalize every single thing in the same collection.

Article XXXVII. cites the Injunctions of Elizabeth. Does that render all those Injunctions of Elizabeth statutable and in force at the present moment? Let us see what would be the result of these Injunctions of Elizabeth having statutable authority. The 29th Injunction of Elizabeth, which will be found in 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 224, is in the following language:—"That no manner of priest or deacon shall hereafter take to his wife any manner of woman, without the advice and allowance first had upon good examination by the bishop of the same diocese and two justices of the peace of the same shire, dwelling next to the place where the same woman hath made her most abode before her marriage." Has this Injunction statutable authority?

The Rubric in question, so far from giving statutable authority to the King's Injunctions, furnishes, I respectfully submit to your Lordship, good evidence that they depended solely upon the King's authority, and might be varied or revoked at any time by the King. In Edward's first book (Liturgies, 197), the Litany is to be "said or sung in all places, after such form as is appointed by the King's Majesty's Injunctions, or, as is or shall be hereafter appointed by His Highness." What does that prove? That the provisions of these Injunctions as to the Litany, might be varied by the King whenever he thought proper, which is inconsistent with their having legislative authority.

The Injunctions of Edward VI. as regards matters of Divine service were intended to be temporary and to prevail only until otherwise ordered by the King's authority. The 19th Injunction says, "That no person shall from henceforth alter or change the order or manner of any fasting day that is commanded, nor of Common Prayer or divine service, otherwise than is specified in these Injunctions, until such time as the same shall be otherwise ordered and transposed by the King's authority."—1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 13. Again, at page 16, "The parsons shall instruct and teach in their cures that no man ought obstinately and maliciously to break and violate the laudable ceremonies of the Church by the King commanded to be observed, and as yet not abrogated."

I will now deal with my learned friend, Dr. Tristram. It is evident that the opposite side are not a "happy and united family," for he seems to have taken a view in direct opposition to that of his two learned leaders. Dr. Tristram has suggested, instead of the Injunctions of 1547 having been issued under the Proclamation Act, as his two learned leaders contended, that they were issued under the Supremacy Act, 26th Henry VIII., cap. 1. This Act declared the King to be the supreme head of the Church, and enacted that he and his successors should have "full power and authority from time to time to visit, repress, redress, reform, order, correct, restrain, and amend all such errors, heresies, abuses, offences, contempts, and enormities, whatsoever they be, which by any manner, spiritual authority, or jurisdiction ought or may lawfully be reformed, repressed, ordered, redressed, corrected, restrained, or amended." Thus far my learned friend Dr. Tristram's view of the origin of the Injunctions agrees with what I intended myself to submit to your Lordship.

(Dr. Tristram.) I will ask your Lordship to be kind enough to read No. 2.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is that?

(Dr. Tristram.) "Shall have and enjoy annexed and united to the Imperial Crown of this realm as well as the title and style thereof as all honours, dignities, pre-eminences, jurisdictions, privileges, authorities, immunities, profits, and commodities to the said dignity of supreme head of the same Church belonging and appertaining."

(Mr. Stephens.) Very well, my Lord, that has left the case just where it was.

(Dr. Tristram.) One of those privileges might have been the privilege of issuing Injunctions.

(Mr. Stephens.) But I do not admit that the Injunctions of 1547 ever had statutable authority. The statute 26 Henry VIII., cap. 1, was repealed at the end of Mary's reign by 1 & 2 Philip and Mary, cap. 8, and has not been revived.

(Dr. Tristram.) I differ from my learned friend, because I think your Lordship will find it was revived by 1st Elizabeth, cap. 1, and I shall also refer my learned friend to 5th Elizabeth, cap. 1.

(Mr. Stephens.) The 18th section, 1st Elizabeth, cap. 1, however, gave the Queen powers quite as extensive as were granted by the 26th of Henry VIII., cap. 1—"And that your Highness, your heirs and successors, Kings or Queens of this realm, shall have full power and authority, by virtue of this Act, by letters patents under the Great Seal, to assign, name, and authorize, when and as often as your Highness, your heirs or successors, shall think meet and convenient, and for such and so long time as shall please your Highness, your heirs or successors, such person or persons being natural born subjects to your Highness, your heirs or successors, as your Majesty, your heirs or successors “ shall think meet to exercise, use, occupy, and execute, under your Highness, your heirs and successors, all manner of jurisdictions, privileges and pre-eminences in any wise touching or concerning any spiritual or ecclesiastical jurisdiction within these your realms of England and Ireland, or any other your Highness's dominions and countries; and to visit, reform, redress, order, correct, and amend all such errors, heresies, schisms, abuses, offences, contempts, and enormities whatsoever, which by any manner of spiritual or ecclesiastical power, authority, or jurisdiction can or may lawfully be reformed, ordered, redressed, corrected, restrained, or amended.” Then there is the 17th section, which I should not have troubled your Lordship with, had it not been for the very kind interruption of my learned friend Dr. Tristram, for which I am indebted to him—“ And that also it may likewise please your Highness that it may be established and enacted by the authority aforesaid, that such jurisdictions, privileges, superiorities, and pre-eminences, spiritual and ecclesiastical, as by any spiritual or ecclesiastical power or authority hath heretofore been, or may lawfully be exercised or used for the visitation of the ecclesiastical state and persons, and for reformation, order, and correction of the same, and of all manner of errors, heresies, schisms, abuses, offences, contempts, and enormities, shall for ever, by authority of this present Parliament, be united and annexed to the Imperial Crown of this realm.”

If the Injunctions of 1547 were merely royal Injunctions, without any statutable authority except what they derived from the Supremacy Act, the Injunction as to lights is clearly not now in force. Elizabeth's Injunctions were also royal Injunctions, and at least have as much parliamentary authority as the Injunctions of 1547, and the 23rd of Elizabeth's Injunctions directed all candlesticks to be destroyed. Therefore, the Injunction of 1547, as to the two lights before the Sacrament, if not previously repealed and superseded, was repealed by this Injunction of Elizabeth. Moreover, if the two lights before the Sacrament were used at Mass, as has been contended by the learned counsel on the opposite side,—the Injunction of 1547 relating to those lights was a law relating to the service, and therefore this Injunction was repealed by the 27th section of the 1st of Elizabeth, cap. 2.

I will now pass on to another part of this argument.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I want to make one observation before you do so. As far as the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is concerned, they do not seem to have treated those Acts of Parliament which Sir John Dodson relied upon as not being in force. At page 161 they say: “ The next question is are crosses forbidden under the term ‘ images ’ in the Injunctions, and Act of Parliament relied on by Sir John Dodson.” Then they go into a long discussion; but there is no suggestion in their decision that the Act of Parliament did not authorize the Injunctions.

(Mr. Stephens.) Which Act of Parliament?

(The Dean of the Arches.) The Proclamation Act I am speaking of.

(Mr. Stephens.) I do not think it was discussed either by your Lordship or the other counsel.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No; it appears to me (and it is a curious thing), when speaking of the Injunctions in the Act of Parliament, they do not say the Act of Parliament could not have authorized those Injunctions; they rather treat it as if it had.

(Mr. Stephens.) That question, your Lordship is aware, was not discussed before them. They would not allow me to discuss it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Very well; you were going on to another point.

(Mr. Stephens.) Assuming the Injunctions of 1547 were in force by the authority of Parliament in the second year of Edward VI. (which they were not), the whole object of the Injunctions as to the two lights upon the high altar before the Sacrament failed, (1) when the Church ceased to reserve the consecrated elements; and (2) when the doctrine of transubstantiation ceased to be taught by the Church. The language of the Injunction is,—I am reading from the 7th page of 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals—Ecclesiastical persons “ shall suffer from henceforth no torches nor candles, tapers, or images of wax to be set afore any image or picture, but only two lights upon the high altar before the Sacrament, which, for the signification that Christ is the very true light of the world, they shall suffer to remain still.”

This language should be carefully considered. It is not “ two lights upon the altar,” it is “ two lights upon the high altar before the Sacrament;” it is two lights, with the condition “ before the Sacrament.” The lights depended upon the presence of the Sacrament, and the presence of the Sacrament depended upon reservation. So when reservation was abolished, (as it practically was by Edward's first book,) and the Sacrament in consequence was not present, the lights were ipso facto abolished.

This Injunction attaches to the two lights a signification that Christ is the very Light of the World—meaning that the Christ which was believed to be present in the reserved Sacrament was the true Light of the World. But it is only with the Sacrament upon the altar, and in front of the Sacrament there, that the lights have that signification assigned to them. It does not assign any signification to them in any other relation, or under any other circumstances. The Injunction connects the lights with the Sacrament; in that connection it appropriates a signification to them, and for that signification it allowed them. The signification depends upon the connection, and if the connection be wanting the signification is gone.

Therefore, I submit if this Injunction of 1547 was in force by statutable authority, which I shall respectfully contend it was not, still it would now cease, because the object for putting those two lights upon the altar before the Sacrament had ceased to exist, when the reserved Sacrament was done away with.

The lights were likewise accessories to the “ altar,” and when the “ altar ” was abolished, the accessories ceased to exist.

Adjourned till to-morrow.

TWELFTH DAY.

Saturday, January 18th, 1868.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Perhaps before my learned friend begins I may just call your Lordship's attention to one circumstance—I do not think my friend can know it—and that is, that the 1st Edward VI., cap 12, sections 1 and 3 to 11 (your Lordship will remember it is the fourth my friend has relied upon) are repealed by one of the Statute Law repealing statutes. I think it right to mention that; it is the 26th and 27th Victoria, c. 112. I merely mention the circumstance to avoid any misunderstanding upon that subject.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What sections do you say are repealed?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Certain sections of the 1st Edward VI., and, among them, the section which my friend relied upon.

(The Dean of the Arches.) He relied upon sec. 4?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And that you say is repealed?

(Mr. Prideaux.) Section 1 and then 3 to 11 inclusive. It is section 4 that my friend has relied upon.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It may be very important. Sections 1 and 3 to 11 repealed.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes, my Lord, and some subsequent sections which I do not think are material to this matter. It is enough to say that the section which my friend relies upon is repealed by the 26th and 27th Victoria.

(Mr. Stephens.) My Lord, I have not had an opportunity of referring to the statute to which my friend has called your attention, but the question is, what was the law at the time of the passing of the Act of 1662, and likewise at the enactment of the first Prayer Book of Edward VI. I have nothing to do with anything since. The argument of my friend of course has come upon me by surprise.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes; of course you will have an opportunity of considering it and discussing it in Flamank v. Simpson.

(Mr. Stephens.) If it be worth the trouble I will do so.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I mean you will have an opportunity of doing so. I understand your position to be that even assuming Mr. Prideaux is accurate, and I daresay he is—

(Mr. Stephens.) I have no doubt he is.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That it would not affect your argument, because your argument is, that when the Rubric of Charles II. was passed, at all events that section was not repealed.

(Mr. Stephens.) Precisely. It comes exactly within the principle laid down in the case which I cited yesterday. Have you, Mr. Prideaux, anything more to suggest?

(Mr. Prideaux.) No, I thought it due to you and to the Court to mention that.

(Mr. Stephens.) My Lord, before resuming my argument, will you allow me to return to you the articles in the office of the judge promoted by Newbery v. Goodwin, for the perusal of which I am deeply indebted to your Lordship. Your Lordship will also allow me to hand up a work which I cited yesterday. "Ritualism and the Ecclesiastical Law, by Benjamin Shaw." I did not fully discuss its valuable matter, because I was anxious, as far as possible, to save your Lordship's time. I have shown it to Mr. Prideaux.

(Mr. Prideaux.) Yes; Mr. Shaw was kind enough to send me copies of both numbers, and I am quite content that his Lordship should have it. Probably, if I think it worth while, your Lordship will allow me to hand up also the answers which have been published to those articles?

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes.

(Mr. Stephens.) My friend can, so far as I am concerned, hand in as many answers as he thinks proper.

I will now, with your Lordship's permission, make a few observations upon the subject of lights generally. With reference to lighted candles during the Communion Service, when not required for light, the case stands thus:—First, neither candlesticks nor candles are mentioned as ornaments or otherwise in the Prayer Books of Edward VI., Elizabeth, and Charles II.; secondly, there are no directions in any of such Prayer Books for the ceremony of lighting and burning candles during the Communion Service for a symbolical object; and thirdly, except for the purpose of giving light, candles are not required in the performance of the service prescribed by any such Prayer Book.

My learned friend, Mr. Prideaux, has laboured to show that neither lights at the Holy Communion nor incense are in any way connected with false or Popish doctrine. I might safely take my friend at his word. Let me, for the sake of argument, assume that both of these practices were not only originally free from objection but laudable—that "they were of Godly intent and purpose devised;" still the question is, whether the law allows them? I contend that it does not. They have been "cut away and clean rejected" for one or other of the reasons mentioned in the preface to our Book of Common Prayer "concerning ceremonies." Let my friends select which of these reasons suits them best—I am not concerned in making such selection; it is enough for me and it will be enough for the Court, that the law "clean rejects them."

Now let us see what the objects of these lighted candles are, according to the view of my learned friend, Mr. Prideaux. For that purpose I will refer your Lordship to a book that has been already submitted to your attention, and with reference to which I have no doubt the opinions of my friend and myself are unfortunately diametrically opposed. I regard this work as one of the most mischievous and dangerous works that has ever been issued against the Established Church; I refer to the book entitled "The Church and the World," at page 345—

(Mr. Prideaux.) Which volume?

(Mr. Stephens.) When I cite "The Church and the World," I do not mean "The Church and the World 1867."

(Mr. Prideaux.) Precisely; I did not understand that until you told me.

(Mr. Stephens.) This article is entitled "On the Eucharistic Sacrifice," and it is written, I am sorry to say, by the Rev. P. Goldsmith Medd, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of University College, and Curate of S. John the Baptist, Oxford. Now, what does this clergyman—a minister in our Church—say? "Certainly, it is not to suit any such view, which no man, at any rate within our own Church, holds, that the restoration of lights, vestments, and incense (things which, on the Bishop of Ely's theory, the Church, when she reformed herself, ought solemnly and expressly to have forbidden) is desired by those amongst us by whom it is desired. The doctrines involved in the pious endeavour to pay the full honour which the Church, when her own voice (distinct enough as regards the lights and the vestments at least) can be heard above the confused

"noise of the various claimants to represent her, expressly commands to be paid to the one great ordinance of worship which is of Christ's own institution are at bottom." "1. That of the Real Presence—the doctrine that the body and blood of Christ are 'verily and indeed taken and received,' are, 'after an heavenly and spiritual manner, given taken, and eaten,' in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and that where His Body and Blood are there is He—there, as wherever else He is, with profoundest homage to be adored."

I shall now refer the point to another publication, which I believe is out of print. It is a work upon the use of lights on the communion table in the daytime, by the Rev. A. P. Percival, of All Souls College, Oxford, late chaplain to the Queen. It is the second edition that I am reading from.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Who published it?

(Mr. Stephens.) Rivingtons, in 1851. I believe it is out of print, but your Lordship, of course, is welcome to my copy.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I can get it from Rivingtons, I dare say.

(Mr. Stephens.) Now what does this learned divine say,—for he was a very learned divine, as your Lordship knows?

(The Dean of the Arches.) Certainly; he was a divine of very great erudition.

(Mr. Stephens.) He was a private friend of my own, and I appreciated his erudition. Now what did he write upon this question of lighted candles?—"A Gentile custom, introduced into the Christian Church without ecclesiastical authority, by weak individual Gentile converts, who transferred to the tombs of the Martyrs this rite of idol worship—so it was regarded by its defender at the commencement of the fifth century, who rejected as a calumny the imputation of such a practice against the Church at large. By the tenth century, that which had been practised at the tombs of the Martyrs had been transferred to the holy table at the most sacred rites; no longer by permission but by Injunction, that is to say, no fixed lights upon the altar, but lights held in the hands of the acolytes during consecration. In the 15th century that which Jerome repudiated as a calumny had got to be esteemed so essential, that a priest who consecrated the Eucharist without it was considered to have incurred a grievous sin. By the 16th, as appears by Edward VI. Injunctions, it had got one step further, and, apart from service hours, this rite of idol worship was employed to honour the wafer reserved in the pyx, which was set forth as an object of the highest worship." A vast mass of information is then given upon the subject, and he sums up in these very emphatic words:—"Such is the fearful history of a custom sooner than part with which, men are to be found, in the middle of the 19th century, who deem it a light matter to resign the care of souls which Christ had entrusted to their keeping! Where is the flock which was given thee, thy beautiful flock? Answer, I resign them for that which I hold in my hand. What hast thou in thine hand? Answer, The ashes of a taper burnt upon Thine altar, which I deemed more precious in Thy sight."

I will now proceed to discuss the subject of incense. With regard to incense my friends have found themselves unable to make anything more than the semblance of a defence. The Sarum Missal contained minute directions as to incense, but these are altogether omitted in the successive Prayer Books of Edward VI., Elizabeth, and Charles II., which contain no reference whatever to the use of incense. There were no censers among the ornaments assigned for use in the Church in 1552, towards the end of Edward VI.'s reign; and "Peacock's Church furniture" proves, in the passages to which I have directed your Lordship's attention, that in Elizabeth's reign censers were systematically destroyed, and in many cases it is said "by authority."

My friend Mr. Prideaux has suggested that incense was sanctioned by the third Injunction of Edward VI., 1547, because, as he says, that Injunction contemplated the possibility of images being "hereafter censured unto."

I will upon that point read to your Lordship a passage from the Injunctions of 1547, which will be found in 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 7. It is the third article:—"That such images as they know in any of their cures to be or have been so abused with pilgrimages or offerings of anything made thereunto, or shall be hereafter censured unto, they (and none other private persons) shall, for the avoiding of that most detestable offence of idolatry, forthwith take down or cause to be taken down and destroy the same." But this Injunction admits of the very ample answer, that the Injunctions of 1547 did not interfere with the pre-Reformation services according to the Sarum Missal, and that therefore ministers must have had incense for the purpose of that service, and were not unlikely to have used it. I believe my friends on the opposite side handed up to your Lordship the English Church Union case. I do not want it from you, but I only want to ascertain the fact.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have got it here.

(Mr. Stephens.) That being so, my friends have now made that document part of their case. I will therefore conclude my argument upon Incense by quoting from the Church Union case the opinion of my friend Mr. James, and relying upon it. My friend says, "I find myself unable to arrive at the conclusion, that it is now lawful to use incense during any part of the service."

(The Dean of the Arches.) He does not stand alone in that opinion.

(Mr. Stephens.) I will now proceed to discuss the question of the mixed chalice. I am coming to that first part of the Prayer Book of Edward VI. to which your Lordship particularly and especially directed my attention. Notwithstanding the omission of any directions to mix water with the sacramental wine at the Holy Communion in the second Prayer Book of Edward VI., the Prayer Books of Elizabeth, and of Charles II., it has been suggested by your Lordship that the language of the Rubric in the first book of Edward VI. might indicate, that the word "wine" in the present Prayer Book, might mean wine and water as well as wine. I admit that your Lordship expressed no opinion upon it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) None at all.

(Mr. Stephens.) But merely threw it out in order to hear what observations I had to make upon it. Now I hope I shall not be irksome to your Lordship if I read the Rubric?

(The Dean of the Arches.) By all means.

(Mr. Stephens.) Then perhaps it may not be a liberty on my part if I ask your Lordship to have before you during my argument the Liturgies of Edward VI.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have them here.

(Mr. Stephens.) "Then shall the minister take so much bread and wine as shall suffice for the persons appointed to receive the Holy Communion, laying the bread upon the coporas, or else in the paten, or in some other comely thing prepared for that purpose. And putting the wine into the chalice or else in some fair convenient cup, prepared for that use if the chalice will not serve, putting thereto a little pure and clean water, and setting both the bread and wine upon the altar." It is true that after the mixture of the wine with a little water, it is still spoken of as wine; but it is so spoken of only for brevity's sake.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You see it is spoken of again in the Rubric at the end of the Communion Service as wine. "And finally the pastors and curates within this realm shall continually find at "their costs and charges in their cures sufficient bread and wine for the Holy Communion."

(Mr. Stephens.) I am indebted to your Lordship for that observation. In the Rubric, which I have just read, it is stated, that a little water has been mixed with the wine; and it was therefore unnecessary to speak of it with extreme precision as wine and water. But the word "wine," as your Lordship will observe by reference to that Rubric, is also used twice in the earlier part of the same Rubric in speaking of the liquid which is taken by the minister and mixed with water. Was that liquid wine properly so called, or was it wine and water?

(The Dean of the Arches.) What are you referring to at this moment?

(Mr. Stephens.) To the Rubric in Edward's First Book, that directs water to be mixed with the sacramental wine.

We have first to ascertain the meaning of the word "wine" in the two immediate cases where the word "wine" was used, and I reiterate my question, does the ceremony of the mixed chalice consist of adding water to wine, or does it consist of adding more water to what is already wine and water? It will not, I believe, be denied that it consists in adding water to pure wine; and therefore "wine" means pure wine when used without a special explanation, although it may be used for brevity, as meaning wine mixed with a little water where its real meaning appears from the Rubric. Consequently there is no reason to suppose that when the word "wine" is used in the subsequent Prayer Books and in the canons of 1603 without any explanation, it means wine and water, or anything else but pure wine.

I shall close this part of the case—because really as to the arguments of the opposite side it would only be waste of time to answer them—by two quotations, one from a lay judge whom we all know and whom we all respect in the public and private relations of life: the other from an episcopal judge whose wisdom and experience is above all commendation on my part. What does the learned lay judge say? "Adding to" is varying; and I do not find any evidence that at the time when the present Prayer Book was compiled the word "wine" was understood to mean "wine mixed with water." That, my Lord, is the language of the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster.

(Mr. Prideaux.) In an opinion upon premises of which not the slightest doubt exists.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is in this English Church Union case I have got here?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, the case which has been handed up by my friends as part of their case, and which is now before your Lordship.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I merely wanted to know what my friend was citing?

(Mr. Stephens.) I am perfectly assured from the friendship which has for so many years existed between Mr. Prideaux and myself, that the second authority I am about to quote, will be by him received with the deepest respect, viz., the Bishop of Exeter; and I am certain that he is likewise too good a "Catholic" ever to dispute the dictum of an episcopal judge, be that episcopal dictum what it may.

(Mr. Prideaux.) You must not take that for the truth.

(Mr. Stephens.) I will give your Lordship the language.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do not provoke interpellations, Mr. Prideaux.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I humbly conceive the Bishop of Exeter was mistaken upon that one point.

(Mr. Stephens.) The Bishop of Exeter and the Bishop of Salisbury (I have not been supplied as I ought to have been with the shorthand writer's notes on the subject, and unfortunately I was not present) have been upon some other point introduced to your Lordship in terms of the most laudatory character by my friend, Mr. Prideaux. Let us see what the Bishop of Exeter says in reference to the mixed chalice, and I know that it would be a waste of your Lordship's time if I were to say anything in terms of commendation respecting the acuteness and the learning of the Bishop of Exeter, a prelate for whom I believe your Lordship and myself were counsel for many years. Now what is it that the Bishop of Exeter says in a charge delivered during his recent visitation at Truro in 1866?

I do not intend to cite its language from anything which may or may not have been published by the Bishop of Exeter, but from a pamphlet published by a gentleman who has the absolute confidence of the opposite side, and who has benefited the public at large by the publication of this charge—I mean Dr. Littledale. I thought it would be more satisfactory to my friends to read it from a publication of Dr. Littledale's rather than from any other source. The pamphlet in question is entitled "The Mixed Chalice, in a Letter to Henry, Lord Bishop of Exeter, by Richard Frederick Littledale, M.A., LL.D., D.C.L., a Priest of the Church of England." This is the third edition, and it is published by J. Parker. The object of this publication on the part of Dr. Littledale is to correct the Bishop of Exeter upon matters of doctrine and upon matters of law. That is the object, I think, if it has any object at all. Whether it was wise for Dr. Littledale to publish it, entertaining the opinions that he does, is another question.

I will read your Lordship what the Bishop of Exeter says; and this will be my answer to the arguments of my learned friends; indeed, it would be idle for me to carry the discussion further. "In connexion with the blessed Sacrament we have just partaken of together, I have one word to say. It is not a word of censure although it is certainly a very painful remark to have to make. I have been told that there are among you those who in administering the blessed Sacrament depart from the custom and ordinances of the Church, and, by so doing, violate the solemn promise and vow they took at the time of their ordination. They do so by doing that which, while I freely and fully admit it may not be an actual sin has no high authority or example in its favour. I am told there are those who mix water in the wine which is given in this blessed Sacrament. Now, if it had pleased our Church to continue such an ordinance amongst us, we should, of course, have all gladly observed it; but what right have any of us to set up our own judgment, our own fancy or opinions, when they are adverse to the institutions of the early Church and in contradiction to those institutions of our own Church which are entitled to our reverence and thankful obedience. At the time of the Reformation it did not please the Church of England to continue the practice of mixing the water with the wine; and you are the ministers of that Church, and bound to obey the orders of that Church, and have promised to do so. Let me urge those, who are conscious of having disobeyed that Church, to be more regular in future, and to remember that they have promised to perform these ordinances in the way the Church of England has appointed. I do not wish to know who they are; I readily believe it was not done carelessly; but still I am bound to say it was not done without some presumptuous disregard to what they must have known to be their duty. Still we will not imagine it possible that they intend to offend God."

With the expression of that opinion by the Bishop of Exeter it would be, I consider, most presumptuous on my part if I were to waste the time of the Court by any additional observations upon the subject of the mixed chalice.

Your Lordship has expressed a wish to hear whatever opinions any of the counsel have to offer to you, upon the construction and effect of the clause in the preface "Concerning the Services of the Church," for enabling the bishop to take order for appeasing diversity. I therefore am about to make a few observations on that point. Your Lordship threw out that challenge to my learned friends on the opposite side. They did not attempt to grapple with it, and I trust the Court will therefore not consider me guilty of assumption in doing so?

(The Dean of the Arches.) I shall be glad to hear any argument on the subject.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am much obliged to your Lordship. One instance in which this power seems to have been exercised is found in 2 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 226. It is an order of Archbishop Abbot about the administration or serving of the Sacrament in the church of Crayford in Kent (this was in the 9th year of King Charles I., 1633). This letter commences by reciting "George, by the Providence of God, Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate and Metropolitan of all England, to our well-beloved in Christ, the Parson, Churchwardens, and other the Parishioners and Inhabitants of the parish of Crayford in the county of Kent and deanery of Shoreham, of the peculiar and immediate jurisdiction of us, and of our cathedral and metropolitical Church of Christ, Canterbury, and to all other Persons whatsoever unto whom these presents shall come, or may in any way concern, greeting in our Lord God everlasting. Whereas, upon some difference arising among you about the decent and reverend ministering and receiving of the Holy Communion in the chancel of the said church at Crayford, we, upon the petition of you, the parson, did refer the viewing of the said church, and examination of the said difference unto Sir Nathaniel Brent, Knight, our Vicar-General." Here it appears that doubts had arisen as to the mode of performing service, and the parties had referred it to the archbishop, "who, having viewed the said church in the presence of you the said parson, churchwardens, and some others of the said parish, hath certified us what seems to him upon the said view to be most decent and convenient for the most reverend and orderly receiving of the Holy Communion in the said chancel of the said church. Now know you, upon the relation of the said Sir Nathaniel, as also upon a mature and deliberate hearing of the parties interested in the said difference in our Manor House of Lambeth, in the county of Surrey, upon the 21st day of May Anno Domini MDCXXXIII., in the presence of our said Vicar-General—" Not of the Chancellor, your Lordship observes, but of the Vicar-General.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, but I am not quite sure what authority the vicar-general exercised at that time?

(Mr. Stephens.) The distinction between the chancellor and the vicar-general was this,—that the chancellor exercised in court the contentious jurisdiction and the vicar-general advised the bishop in private, and exercised his spiritual jurisdiction, such, for instance, as attending him upon his visitations.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No, every chancellor has the position of the official principal, and the vicar-general, with the single exception of the province of Canterbury—

(Mr. Stephens.) I am aware of that, so far as regards England.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I was only speaking of England. I believe the province of Canterbury is the single exception.

(Mr. Stephens.) There is no other instance in England at the present moment, but there is in Dublin.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think under the Church Discipline Act it is the vicar-general that is mentioned.

(Mr. Stephens.) In Ireland it is different. I have reason to know that in Dublin the duties of the chancellor are exercised by Dr. Battersby, and the spiritual duties of the vicar-general are exercised by the Dean of St. Patrick, who accompanies the Archbishop during his visitations. The two offices were made distinct by Archbishop Whately.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes. Gibson says that it is competent to a bishop to divide them now, if he requires.

(Mr. Stephens.) I know that the late Archbishop of Dublin, immediately before his death, had the law carefully considered on the subject, and there was no doubt the archbishop had the power to divide the two offices,—a power which I believe is at this moment possessed by every prelate in this country.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That has never been exercised since the Reformation?

(Mr. Stephens.) But I have given the Court a recent case in Ireland; and I need not tell your Lordship that the Church in Ireland is an integral part of the Church in this country, one and the same in doctrine, discipline, and government. I have a legitimate right to direct attention to the fact that this proceeding is not before the chancellor but the vicar-general; although the two offices in England have not since the Reformation been divided.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I quite see your point. Just in passing, I observe—I thought it was so—that under 3rd and 4th Victoria, cap. 86, mentioning the persons to whom the bishop is authorized to issue a commission, it is rather remarkable that it says, "One of whom shall be his vicar-general."

(Mr. Stephens.) That is under the Church Discipline Act, which your Lordship is very well aware—

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, I know the history of it.

(Mr. Stephens.) Your Lordship is perhaps aware that the language of that Act of Parliament is a pitiable satire upon law and common sense.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I cannot pronounce an opinion to that extent, but it is remarkable that the official principal is not included, but the vicar-general is mentioned.

(Mr. Stephens.) Your Lordship will remember that before the Reformation the two offices were distinct.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes.

(Mr. Stephens.) And then they were united?

(The Dean of the Arches.) In this Court they are distinct.

(Mr. Stephens.) I should respectfully submit to your Lordship that it would be open at the present moment for every bishop to appoint a vicar-general in spirituals, and a chancellor. He might divide the office if he thought proper. It was, as I have already stated, done by Archbishop Whately in Ireland immediately before he died.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The vicar-general must officiate under the Church Discipline Act, and not the official principal.

(Mr. Stephens.) That may or may not be an advantage to my position. I am now laying down an abstract proposition, that before the Reformation the offices were separate.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Your present argument is, that this proceeding of Archbishop Abbot was not a proceeding in court.

(Mr. Stephens.) Precisely, that is the point your Lordship pressed upon me upon two or three occasions. Here is a proceeding before the vicar-general "and divers others, and also in the presence of Thomas Pane, clerk, the now incumbent parson of the parish church of Crayford, and Thomas Andrewes, John Ludlowe, churchwardens, and Joseph Bingham, Thomas King, and John Kettle, parishioners of the said parish of Crayford and others then and there present, we have ordered and decreed, and by these presents do order and decree as follows; videlicet, the parishioners and inhabitants of the said parish of Crayford, and others intending hereafter to receive the Holy Communion there, &c." Directions are then given as to the mode of receiving the Holy Communion which are not in the slightest degree material to the question which your Lordship has put to me. At the end of page 218, line 15, the order then directs: "We do require you, the minister of Crayford aforesaid, that upon some Sundays or holy days, in the time of Divine service, you do publish and declare this our order and decree to the parishioners of the

“ said parish of Crayford, and we admonish you, the parishioners of Crayford, that upon notice of the premises, you be obedient and conformable thereto, as you will answer the contrary at your peril.”

This order purports to be not a mere piece of good advice, but a positive order, the disobedience of which will involve peril. If your Lordship has Cardwell's Documentary Annals before you—

(The Dean of the Arches.) I remember the passage.

(Mr. Stephens.) This is not a proceeding in Court. That is to say, a Court presided over by a chancellor for the exercise of contentious jurisdiction. The Court of Visitation is a Court of a purely spiritual character; where the bishop acts according to his discretion.

There is another order resembling that of Archbishop Abbot's in many respects which is to be found in a note to 6 Laud's Works, p. 61. It is an order of Davenant, Bishop of Salisbury. Archbishop Laud refers to this order in his speech on the censure of Bastwicke, Burton, and Prynne, in the following terms. Some difficulty had lately arisen about placing the communion table in a parish church of his diocese. The bishop, careful to prevent disorder, sends his Injunction under hand and seal to the curate and churchwardens to settle the business. I will now read the note: “The editor in examining the parish register of Alborne for another purpose most unexpectedly discovered a copy of this very document, which, by the kindness of the Rev. G. P. Cleather, M.A., vicar of the parish, he was permitted to transcribe. A copy of the order sent from the Right Rev. Father in God, the Bishop of Sarum, to the parish of Alborne for the placing of the holy table and the administration of the Holy Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. ‘John, by divine Providence ‘Bp. of Sarum, to the curate and churchwardens ‘with the parishioners of Auborne in the county of ‘Wilts, and our diocese of Sarum, greeting: Whereas ‘his Maj<sup>ty</sup> hath bn. lately informed, that some men, ‘factiously disposed, have taken upon themselves to ‘place and remove y<sup>e</sup> Communion Table in y<sup>e</sup> Ch. ‘of Auborne; and thereupon his Highness hath ‘commanded me to take present order therein. ‘These are to let you know that both, according to ‘y<sup>e</sup> Injunctions given out in y<sup>e</sup> raigne of Queen ‘Elizabeth for the placing of Communion Tables in ‘churches, and by the 82nd Canon agreed upon in ‘y<sup>e</sup> first yeare of y<sup>e</sup> raigne of King James of blessed ‘memory, it was intimated that those tables shd. ‘ordinarily be sett and stand with the side to the ‘east wall of the chancel. I therefore require you, ‘the churchwardens and all other persons not to ‘meddle with the bringing down or transposing of ‘the Communion Table, as you will answer it at y<sup>e</sup> ‘own peril.’ [This order is merely a prohibition. But it goes on to give directions respecting the performance of Divine service in the following terms]: ‘Now to the end that the minister may neither be ‘overtoyled, nor the people indecently and inconveniently thronged together, when they are to draw near and take the Holy Sacrament, and that the frequent celebration thereof may nevertheless be continued, I do further appoint that thrice in the year at the least there be public notice given in the Church for fower Communiones to be held, upon fower Sundaies together: and that there come not to the Communion in one day above 200 at the most. For the better observation whereof, and that every man may know his proper time, the Curate shall divide the parishioners into four parts, according to his discretion, and as shall most fittingly seeme to this purpose. And if any turbulent spirit shall disobey this our order, he shall be proceeded against according to the quality of his fault and misdemeanour. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal episcopal, this 17th day of May 1637.’ This order, as I have read it to your Lordship, purports to be an imperative order, disobedience to which would involve punishment.

There is another document which seems to me further to illustrate the same subject, it is an Order of Council of 1633, for placing the communion table in St. Gregory's Church, and your Lordship will find it in 2 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 237.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is that an order of the High Commission Court?

(Mr. Stephens.) It is an Order of Council for placing the communion table in St. Gregory's Church.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I remember; it is the famous case.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes; it is in the 9th of Charles I., and is dated from Whitehall, November 3, 1633.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It was Laud's doing; it was one of the subjects made a matter of charge against him?

(Mr. Stephens.) It was. “This day was debated before His Majesty, sitting in Council, the question and difference which grew about the removing the communion table in St. Gregory's Church, near the cathedral church of St. Paul, from the middle of the chancel to the upper end, and there placed altarwise, in such manner as it standeth in the said cathedral and mother church, as also in all other cathedrals, and in His Majesty's own chapel and as is consonant to the practice of approved antiquity which removing and placing of it in that sort was done by order of the Dean.” [There is a distinction to which I am desirous of directing your Lordship's attention] “and Chapter of St. Paul's, who are ordinaries thereof, as was avowed before His Majesty by Dr. King and Dr. Montford, two of the prebends there; yet some few of the parishioners, being but five in number, did complain of this act, by appeal to the Court of Arches, pretending that the Book of Common Prayer and the 82nd Canon do give permission to place the communion table where it may stand with most fitness and convenience.” This order, after some intermediate observations to which I need not direct your Lordship's attention, goes on at line 5, page 239, in the following language:—“And likewise for so much as concerns the liberty of the said Common Prayer Book or canon, for placing the communion table in any church or chapel with most conveniency; that liberty is not so to be understood, as if it were even left to the discretion of the parish, much less to the particular fancy of any humorous person” [the very case under consideration, my Lord] “but to the judgment of the ordinary, to whose place and function it doth properly belong, to give direction in that point, both for the thing itself, and the time when, and how long, as he may find cause. Upon which consideration His Majesty declared himself, that he well approved and confirmed the act of the said ordinary, and so gave commandment, that if those few parishioners before mentioned do proceed in their said appeal, then the Dean of the Arches, who was then attending at the hearing of the cause, should confirm the said order of the aforesaid Dean and Chapter.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) That was a very odd proceeding altogether—how it got before the Council one does not exactly see, except as an appeal.

(Mr. Stephens.) It may be in this way (although it is a position which, perhaps, may not be admitted by the opposite side), that the Crown is the Supreme Ordinary of the Realm.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes?

(Mr. Stephens.) Now in this case the authority which is recognized is not the bishop, but it is the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, but then they do now to some extent exercise (except so far as the peculiar is abolished by Act of Parliament) a peculiar jurisdiction.

(Mr. Stephens.) As Ordinaries.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have the honour of filling at this moment an office in connection with that.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am aware of it, my Lord:—“Which removing and placing of it in that sort was “done by the order of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul’s, who are ordinaries thereof.” I submit that this apparently indicates, the power of regulating matters connected with the service belongs to the ordinary, whoever he may be.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, it points that way.

(Mr. Stephens.) And that the bishop was mentioned in the “Preface concerning the Service of the Church” only because he was usually the ordinary. This case also shows that an appeal lies from the decision of the ordinary to the Court of Appeal of the province; and even in matters of discretion before the bishop there would be an appeal. For instance, anything that occurs in the province of Canterbury would upon appeal be brought before your Lordship.

(The Dean of the Arches.) To the Court, do you think, or to the archbishop in person? The Rubric says, to the archbishop.

(Mr. Stephens.) That would involve another position, that your Lordship only sits as—

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is true.

(Mr. Stephens.) It is an appeal to the primary judge of the court of the province. Your lordship would sit there simply as representative of the archbishop.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There are cases as you know in which the archbishop (for instance, with regard to curates under the Residence Act) sits alone without any assistance.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am aware of that, and there are several cases where matters have been brought before the Dean of the Arches in which the archbishop has taken cognizance of them himself.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Very possibly. By way of illustration of your argument, supposing there had been no Rubrics at all regarding ritual in any of the Prayer Books, to whose authority would the question of ritual observances have been submitted? Surely to that of the ordinary of the diocese?

(Mr. Stephens.) No doubt.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I mean, according to the old canon law, the ritual of each diocese subject to an appeal to the archbishop was a matter within the cognizance of the bishop of the diocese, was it not?

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Therefore his authority still remains except in so far as it is taken away by the Acts of Parliament?

(Mr. Stephens.) No doubt whatever authority the bishop had anterior to the Reformation for the regulation of Divine service remains unimpaired, except so far as it is affected by the statute law.

I have already referred to the exhortation to take down altars in Bishop Ridley’s Visitation Articles in 1550. I will now refer your Lordship to 1 Cardwell’s Documentary Annals, p. 94, where it is said:—“That in divers places some use the Lord’s board after the form of a table, and some as an altar, whereby dissension is perceived to arise among the unlearned; therefore, wishing a godly unity to be observed in all our diocese, and for that the form of a table may more move and turn the simple from the old superstitious opinions of the Popish Mass, and to the right use of the Lord’s Supper, we exhort the curates, churchwardens, and questmen, to erect and set up the Lord’s board after the form of an honest table, decently covered in such place of the quire or chancel as shall be thought most meet by their discretion and agreement, so that the ministers with the communicants may have their place separated from the rest of the people; and to take down and abolish all other by-altars or tables.”

I have also referred to 6 Foxe’s Actes and Monuments, where there are six reasons given by Ridley for these exhortations, and the sixth and last reason is as follows:—“It is said in the Preface of the Book of Common Prayer, that if any doubt do arise concerning the matter, how to understand, do, and execute the things contained in this book, the party

“that so doubt . . . shall always resort to the bishop of the diocese.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then do you consider that the substitution of the wooden table for the stone altar was effected under the power of this Rubric?

(Mr. Stephens.) Under the power of this Rubric. I believe there has been a great deal of misconception as to the construction of this Rubric, and as to the power of the bishop.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have no doubt about that.

(Mr. Stephens.) Ridley there claims to exercise the very power of “taking order” mentioned in the Book of Common Prayer. Your Lordship, perhaps, will bear in mind that this visitation of Bishop Ridley was held in June 1550, as appears in a note to 1 Cardwell’s Documentary Annals, page 159. “In the November following (that is 1550) the King and his Council issued a letter to Bishop Ridley in the following terms,” which your Lordship will find in 6 Foxe’s Actes and Monuments, p. 5, and is entitled, “Reasons why the Lord’s board should rather be after the form of a table than of an altar.” “I am not ashamed of the Gospel, because it is ‘the power of God unto salvation’ to every one that ‘believeth.’ (Rom. i. 16.) Certain reasons why the Rev. Father Nicholas, Bishop of London, amongst other his Injunctions given in his late Visitation, did exhort those churches in his diocese where the altars, as then did remain, to conform themselves unto those other churches which had taken them down, and had set up in the stead of the multitude of their altars one decent table in every church; and that herein he did not only anything contrary to the Book of Common Prayer or to the King’s Majesty’s proceedings, but that he was induced to do the same thing, moved by his office and duty, wherewith he is charged in the same book and partly for the advancement and sincere setting forward of God’s Holy Word and the King’s Majesty’s most Godly proceedings.”

The considerations referred to in this letter, and which follow it in Foxe, comprise Ridley’s six reasons, with the following introduction, which your Lordship will find in 6 Foxe’s Actes and Monuments, page 5, and is entitled “The King’s Letters to Nicholas Ridley, Bishop of London”—“Right Reverend Father in God, right trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. And whereas it is come to our knowledge, that being the altars within the most part of the churches of this realm being already upon good and godly considerations taken down”—this seems to show that altars had been taken down in other dioceses besides Ridley’s—“there doth yet remain altars standing in divers other churches, by occasion whereof much contention and variance ariseth among sundry of our subjects, which, if good foresight were not had, might perchance engender great hurt and inconvenience; we let you wit, that minding to have all occasion of contention taken away, which many times groweth by those and such like diversities, and considering that among other things be- longing to our royal office and cure, we do account the greatest to be to maintain the common quiet of our realm; we have thought good, by the advice of our Council, to require you, and nevertheless specially to charge and command you, for the avoiding of all matters of further contention and strife about the standing or taking away of the said altars, to give” (and here is a very important word) “substantial order throughout all your diocese, that with all diligence all the altars in every church or chapel, as well in places exempted as not exempted, within your said diocese, to be taken down, and instead thereof a table be set up in some convenient part of the chancel, to serve for the administration of the blessed Communion. And to the intent the same may be done without the offence of such our loving subjects as be not yet so well persuaded in that "behalf as we would wish, we send unto you herewith certain considerations gathered and collected that make for the purpose, the which and such others as you shall think meet to be set forth to persuade the weak to embrace our proceedings in this part, we pray you cause to be declared to the people by some discreet preachers, in such places as you shall think meet, before the taking down of the said altars."

This is dated the 24th November (4th Edward VI., 1550,) and signed by amongst others Somersét, Cramer, Bedford, Wentworth, and Ely. Its introduction is a recognition by the King and Council of the supreme ecclesiastical authority, and likewise a proof that what Bishop Ridley did, was done by him under the power given to him in the preface to the Prayer Book, and that he had not exceeded his authority.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You know in the first preface of Edward VI.'s Book, it says, "The parties that so doubt or diversely take anything shall always resort to the bishop of the diocese, who by his discretion shall take order for the quieting and appeasing of the same, so that the same order be not contrary to anything contained in this Book." Then the preface to the second book is the same, with this addition—"And if the bishop of the diocese be in doubt, then he may send for the resolution there of to the archbishop."

(Mr. Stephens.) Like our present Prayer Book?

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes; I do not know whether any light is thrown upon it by that consideration, but at first it was to the bishop alone, and then afterwards it was to be sent to the archbishop.

(Mr. Stephens.) It shows that the subject had been reconsidered.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, those are the terms of the present Prayer Book.

(Mr. Stephens.) There is no doubt your Lordship's observation very much fortifies my argument.

Turning to the 2 & 3 Edward VI., c. 1., we find the 12th section to be as follows: "All and singular archbishops and bishops, and every of their chancellors, commissaries, archdeacons, and other ordinaries having any peculiar ecclesiastical jurisdiction, shall have full power and authority by virtue of this Act as well to inquire in their visitations, synods, and elsewhere within their jurisdiction at any other time and place to take accusations and informations of all and every the things above mentioned, done, committed, or perpetrated, within the limits of their jurisdiction and authority; and to punish the same by admonition, excommunication, sequestration, or deprivation, and other censures and process, in like form as heretofore hath been used in like cases by the King's ecclesiastical laws."

Your Lordship put to me a question about the powers of the vicar-general and the chancellor. I should respectfully submit that all the powers in the foregoing section may be exercised by the vicar-general and that they were so exercised anterior to the Reformation.

This section seems to give all ordinaries the same powers of visiting, taking accusations, and punishing, which they had enjoyed with reference to the previous service, thus fortifying the observations which your Lordship made as to the powers of the bishop, viz. that they are the same now as they were before the Reformation, except so far as they have been altered by the statute law.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The same as they were by the general law of the Church.

(Mr. Stephens.) No doubt, my Lord. This section (and it is an important fact) is repeated in precisely the same terms in the 23rd section of Elizabeth's Act of Uniformity.

Upon these authorities I respectfully submit to your Lordship that the following four propositions will be supported: First, that in the reign of Charles the First bishops exercised a power of making orders with reference to the service which they had power to enforce out of court.

(The Dean of the Arches.) All this relates to what they may do out of court.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes; out of court; excepting the exercise of the purest spiritual jurisdiction,—the Visitation Court. In Charles the First's reign, bishops exercised a jurisdiction with reference to the services, which they had power to enforce. Secondly, that this power was exercised by deans and chapters as well as by bishops.

(The Dean of the Arches.) How would they enforce it?

(Mr. Stephens.) They could enforce it by that most dreadful of all punishments, excommunication.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But how could that be except under the 52 Geo. III?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, they might do it by admonition.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But the ultima ratio of that, as you justly observed, would be excommunication, for which imprisonment is substituted by the Act of Geo. III. But then enters into the calculation the question whether the machinery of the Act of George III. could be put into force out of court.

(Mr. Stephens.) I have not had that under my consideration, but whatever powers the Ecclesiastical Court possesses for the enforcement of its process, would apply to the matters under consideration.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Very well, I will take it so.

(Mr. Stephens.) Thirdly, that the exercise of this power was subject to an appeal to the Court of Appeal of the province.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I would wish to understand this accurately. You say this power, so exercised out of court by the Bishop, would be subject to an appeal to the Archbishop.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, my Lord, to the final court—I will come to that presently.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then you will tell me?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, I will come presently to the final court.

Fourthly, that the like power was exercised by Bishop Ridley, by general Injunctions issued in his Visitation.

I need hardly remark to your Lordship that the whole of this question is one of considerable difficulty.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Very great difficulty.

(Mr. Stephens.) But I submit the most probable conclusion to be deduced from the documents I have referred to is, that the passage in the preface was only intended to be a description in popular language of the power of regulating the services which belonged to the ordinary before the Reformation and was not modified by the Acts of Uniformity, except to this extent, that the ordinary was precluded from doing anything contrary to the Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then there must be a class of things which are neither strictly prohibited nor specifically permitted?

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And would not that be the class of things to which this discretionary authority of the bishop would apply?

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly. Take, for instance, the credence table. The services could be performed without it; but still, if the bishop thought it would be useful in any particular church to have a credence table, he could order it, it being subsidiary to the performance of the service.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Now then, if I am not disturbing your argument, let me put this: "Would not that authority of the bishop extend to such questions as gestures used by the ministers?"

(Mr. Stephens.) No doubt it would.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then would not the right mode of procedure be under that Rubric, and not by Articles?

(Mr. Stephens.) I am aware of that view, and I quite expected a question of the kind from the Court. The construction I have ventured to place on that passage as to resorting to the bishop is supported by what the late Sir John Dodson, said on the subject in Liddell and Westerton (Moore, 131). It was, as your Lordship will remember, with reference to the question as to whether lace or other embroidery may be added to the "fair linen cloth" on the communion table, and he said, "I do not wish it to be understood that I consider this to be of very grave importance in this case; but supposing the law as cited to have left the matter unsettled, and that it is diversely taken by the parties, resort must be had to the ordinary, as directed in the instructions prefixed to the Prayer Book, and that is the course which has been pursued, for the decision of the judge sitting in the Consistorial Court of the ordinary has been obtained, and I see no reason for departing from that decision."

(The Dean of the Arches.) But then you see that is rather against your argument, because that was to the Court—

(Mr. Stephens.) If your Lordship will allow me, I will comment upon it. Sir John Dodson treats it as clear that the judge sitting in the Consistorial Court of the ordinary is the person to whom resort is to be had. He adds with reference to altar cloths in the same page. "A similar observation applies to the use of the various coloured cloths on the communion table, at the time of Divine service, and the result must be similar." On appeal to the Privy Council in Liddell and Westerton, the Judicial Committee said, "Whether the cloths so used are suitable or not is a matter to be left to the discretion of the ordinary. In this case their Lordships do not see sufficient reason for their interference, and they must therefore advise the reversal of the sentence as to the cloths used for covering of the Lord's table during the time of Divine service, both with respect to St. Paul's and to St. Barnabas." Now, here the Judicial Committee took it for granted that they were the persons to exercise the discretion of the Ordinary. That is what the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council assumed.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, but there had been a proceeding in court throughout?

(Mr. Stephens.) There had.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And I think I mentioned to you before, that I myself took the objection before Sir Herbert Jenner Fust, that he ought not to interfere with the decision of the Ordinary at Cambridge. The Ordinary at Cambridge had decided in favour of the stone altar. He said "This is a proceeding in the Court, and the case is here regularly on appeal," rather putting aside the Rubric, as much as to say that if this had been a proceeding before the Bishop under the Rubric, it would have been another thing, but he said, this is a regular proceeding in court, and it is here in regular course of appeal.

(Mr. Stephens.) Then, of course, they had no alternative?

(The Dean of the Arches.) No, that is the reason why I am putting it to you.

(Mr. Stephens.) The judge of the Consistorial Court sitting in appeal for the Bishop decided that these altar cloths should be removed, and the Dean of the Arches affirmed that decision. Consequently when the Judicial Committee reversed those decisions, they must have intended to exercise themselves the discretion of the Ordinary.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Certainly at that time. No doubt it had come before them by regular course of appeal; and it was for them to affirm or reverse what the inferior courts had done, it was a question in court.

(Mr. Stephens.) I have put the case before your Lordship.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am very much obliged to you for the light you have thrown upon it; but it still remains, as it appears to me, a very difficult question.

(Mr. Stephens.) My Lord, I have said so; it is one of those questions upon which a very good argument may be raised on both sides.

I am now coming to the conclusion of my reply. I submit that if the several Acts of Uniformity be considered in reference first to the state of our institutions and jurisprudence when they were made; to the cause and to the necessity of making them; to the nature of the subjects embraced by them; and to the universally recognized canons by which the interpretation of law is regulated;—it is impossible to arrive at any other conclusion than this, that all the practices complained of fall under one class, they are rites and ceremonies not prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, and are offences against the Acts of Uniformity as a whole.

Before I resume my seat I cannot refrain from thus publicly acknowledging the exemplary attention, patience, and courtesy which the counsel have received from your Lordship during this protracted argument.

(Mr. Prideaux.) I trust, not only on behalf of my learned friends who appear with me and myself, but also on behalf of the reverend defendant and those who instruct me, that I may be allowed to express our deep sense of gratitude for the very kind and patient attention which your Lordship has given to this case.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The Court is much obliged for those observations of counsel. Of course it has a very arduous duty to discharge, and in the execution of that duty it has been very much assisted by the very able arguments of counsel on both sides.

With regard to Flamank v. Simpson, I will appoint the earliest day that I can for the hearing.

In the Court of Arches, Wednesday, February 5, 1868.

Before the Right Hon. Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE, Dean of the Arches.

THE OFFICE OF JUDGE PROMOTED BY FLAMANK v. SIMPSON.

Counsel for Promoter.

Mr. A. J. Stephens, Q.C., LL.D.
Dr. Swabey.
Mr. Droop.

Counsel for Defendant.

Dr. Deane, Q.C.
Mr. Hannen.
Dr. Tristram.
Mr. Arthur Charles.

Proctors for the Promoter, Messrs. JEBBS and SON, instructed by Mr. W. FLAMANK.
Proctor for the Respondent, Mr. GEORGE H. BROOKS.

FIRST DAY.

(Mr. Stephens.) In this case, my Lord, I appear as counsel for the Promoter. This is a proceeding under the Church Discipline Act, promoted by Thomas Flamank, a parishioner and one of the churchwardens of the parish of East Teignmouth in the county of Devon and diocese of Exeter, against the Reverend Thomas Burne Simpson, perpetual curate or incumbent of the parish of East Teignmouth in the same county, for having offended against the laws ecclesiastical in respect of certain practices in the performance of divine service in the parish church.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Who is with you, Mr. Stephens?

(Mr. Stephens.) Dr. Swabey and Mr. Droop, my Lord.

The Articles state, first, that by the statute law and ecclesiastical constitutions and canons of 1603, all clerks and ministers in holy orders are bound to say and use the Book of Common Prayer and administration of the sacraments, and other rites and ceremonies of the Church, according to the use of the United Church of England and Ireland; secondly, that the Defendant was a clerk or minister in holy orders, and was in 1856 duly instituted and licensed in for to the perpetual curacy and incumbency of the parish church of East Teignmouth, and has ever since been and now is the lawful perpetual curate and incumbent of such parish church; thirdly, that the Defendant has, within two years last, placed or caused to be placed, candlesticks with candles in them upon the communion table in the said parish church of East Teignmouth, and has caused candles to be lighted during the performance of public divine service, and to continue lighted during the administration of the Lord's Supper or Holy Communion at times when such candles were not necessary to afford light for the due performance of the said service, and that the use of such lighted candles is an unlawful addition to and alteration of the sacraments, and other rites and ceremonies of the Church, and is contrary to the said statute law, constitutions, and canons; fourthly, that the said Thomas Burne Simpson has, within two years last past, at the public administration of the Lord's Supper or Holy Communion, in the said parish church of East Teignmouth, mixed water with the wine intended to be consecrated, immediately before the Prayer of Consecration, or at some other time during the celebration of the Holy Communion, and has afterwards delivered to the communicants the cup containing the wine so mixed with water, and that such mixing of water with the wine is an unlawful addition to and alteration of the form and order prescribed and appointed by the said Book of Common

Prayer and administration of the sacraments, and other rites and ceremonies of the Church, and is contrary to the said statute law, constitution, and canons; fifthly, that the said Thomas Burne Simpson has, within two years last past, in the parish church of East Teignmouth, in the public celebration of the Holy Communion, after the Prayer of Consecration, raised the paten with both hands over his head, and the cup in like manner, and that such elevations of the paten and cup are unlawful additions to and alterations of the form and order prescribed and appointed by the said Book of Common Prayer, and administration of the sacraments, and other rites and ceremonies of the Church, and are contrary to the said statute law, constitutions, and canons; sixthly, that the said Thomas Burne Simpson has, within two years last past, in the parish church of East Teignmouth, on receiving the alms collected at the offertory, placed the said alms (and the basin containing them) on a stool instead of on the holy communion table, and that such placing of the alms on a stool and not on the communion table itself is an unlawful alteration in and deviation from that form and order prescribed and appointed by the Book of Common Prayer, and administration of the sacraments, and other rites and ceremonies of the Church, and is contrary to such statute law, constitutions, and canons; seventhly, that the said Thomas Burne Simpson has, within two years last past, in the said parish church of East Teignmouth, wilfully omitted the word "all" in saying the last prayer in the Order of Morning and Evening Prayer.

In reference to the seventh charge the Defendant has denied it, and the Promoter does not intend to proceed with it, in consequence of the great expense that would necessarily be incurred by bringing witnesses from Devonshire to London in order to prove it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then I may look upon the seventh Article as abandoned?

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly, my Lord.

The 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th, and 13th Articles apply to the preliminary proceedings under the Church Discipline Act, and before this Court had cognizance of the case, therefore I do not think it right to trespass upon your Lordship's time by entering into any detail respecting them.

In the responsive allegation the Defendant admits the allegations contained in the first and second Articles of the charge. Secondly, he admits that, as alleged in the third Article, he has placed or caused to be placed, candlesticks with candles in them on the communion table of the parish church of East Teignmouth, and caused such candles to be lighted during the performance of divine service, and to continue lighted during the administration of the Lord's Supper, at such times when such candles were not necessary for giving light or for the due performance of the said service. Thirdly, he admits that he has, as alleged in the fourth of the said Articles, at the public administration of the Lord's Supper or the Holy Communion in the parish church aforesaid, mixed water with the wine intended to be consecrated during the celebration of the Holy Communion, immediately before the Prayer for the Church Militant, but not at any other time, and that he has afterwards delivered to the communicants the cup containing the wine so mixed with water, but he denies that such mixing of water with the wine is an unlawful addition to or alteration of the form and order prescribed by the said Book of Common Prayer and administration of the Sacraments and other rites and ceremonies of the Church, or that it is contrary to the Statute Law, Constitutions, and Canons.

In the fourth paragraph he denies that he has, as alleged in the fifth of the said Articles, in the public celebration of the Holy Communion, after the Prayer of Consecration, raised the paten with both hands over his head and the cup in like manner, but he admits that he has within the time aforesaid in the reading of the Prayer of Consecration so raised the paten on pronouncing the words "Do this in remembrance of me." And that he has so raised the cup on pronouncing the words "For this is my blood of the New Testament shed for you and for many for the remission of sins."

Fifthly, the Defendant admits that he has, as alleged in the sixth of the said Articles, in the parish church of East Teignmouth, on receiving the alms collected at the offertory, placed the same and the basin containing them on a stool used as a credence table, instead of on the Holy Communion Table, but he denies that he has so placed them otherwise than to obtain more room upon the Holy Communion Table; and he submits that such unintentional and inadvertent placing of the alms on a stool, if it has occurred, is not an unlawful alteration in or deviation from the form and order prescribed and appointed by the said Book of Common Prayer, &c., and is not contrary to the Statute Law, Constitutions, and Canons.

In reference to the sixth paragraph I have already stated to your Lordship that the article with which it deals is withdrawn.

The pleadings in this case put in issue whether the several acts charged against Mr. Simpson, namely; (1) the use of lighted candles on the communion table; (2) the mixing of water with the sacramental wine; (3) the elevation of the elements; and (4) the not placing the alms on the communion table,—are respectively unlawful additions to, alterations of, and omissions from the order and form prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer.

Before proceeding to discuss the authorities and arguments specially applicable to each charge, it will be expedient to consider in the first instance the general question, whether a clergyman is bound to adhere to the directions of the Prayer Book without any addition to, or omission therefrom; or whether he is at liberty to introduce any additional ceremonies or to alter any of the ceremonies prescribed therein.

I submit that the acts charged against Mr. Simpson in the Articles are offences against the Acts of Uniformity, more especially against the 2nd section of the 13th and 14th of Charles II., cap. 4, and the 4th section of the 1st of Elizabeth, cap. 2.

The 2nd section of the 13th and 14th of Charles II., cap. 4, enacts that all and singular ministers shall be bound to say and use the Morning prayer, Evening prayer, celebration and administration of both the sacraments, and all other the public and common prayer, in such order and form as is mentioned in the Prayer Book.

The 4th section of the 1st of Elizabeth, cap. 2, enacts, that if any minister "use any other rite, ceremony, order, form, or manner of celebrating of the Lord's Supper openly or privily at Mattens, Evensong, administration of the sacraments, or other open prayers than is mentioned and set forth" in the said book, he shall be punished. The 23rd section enacts that the archbishops and bishops and their chancellors shall have power to take accusations and informations of all the things previously mentioned in the Act, and to punish the same by admonition, excommunication, sequestration, deprivation, and other ecclesiastical punishments.

The 24th section of the Act of Uniformity of Charles II. makes the 4th and 23d sections of the statute of Elizabeth applicable to our present Prayer Book.

I submit that to have lighted candles on the communion table when not required for giving light, to mix water with the sacramental wine, and to elevate the elements above the head, are practices severally contrary to these enactments. They are all "other ceremonies not prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer;" they are respectively deviations from the order and form of celebrating the communion prescribed in the order of the Holy Communion.

The burning of candles during Divine Service, but not for the purpose of giving light, has a religious meaning. Having a light on the Lord's board at any time is enumerated amongst the ceremonies prohibited in the Articles of the King's Visitors, and likewise in Ridley's Injunctions. Thus, we find in 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals (page 75) that in 1549, there was a prohibition against "setting any light upon the Lord's board at any time; and, ministers were enjoined "finally, to use no other ceremonies than are appointed in the King's Book of Common Prayer, or kneeling, otherwise than is in the said book."

In Ridley's Injunctions, at page 93 of the same volume, it is enjoined "that no minister do counterfeit the Popish Mass in kissing the Lord's board; washing his hands or fingers after the Gospel or the receipt of the Holy Communion; shifting the book from one place to another, laying down and licking the chalice after the communion; blessing his eyes with the sudary thereof, or paten, or crossing his head with the same; holding his forefingers and thumbs joined together toward the temples of his head after the receiving of the Sacrament; breathing on the bread or chalice, saying the Agnus before the Communion; showing the Sacrament openly before the distribution, or making any elevation thereof; ringing of the sacring bell, or setting any light upon the Lord's board. And finally that the minister, in time of the Holy Communion, do use only the ceremonies and gestures appointed by the Book of Common Prayer and none other, so that there do not appear in them any counterfeiting of the Popish Mass."

Lighted candles upon the communion table during the Communion service are an addition to the order and form prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer, and make it a different order and form from that directed by the Act of Uniformity. The Prayer Book not only contains directions as to what the minister is to do, but as to all other things essential to the service as a religious service. Thus, it contains directions in the Order of Holy Communion, for the use of a communion table "having at the communion time a fair white linen cloth upon it," and for "the covering of the elements with a fair linen cloth."

The Prayer Book also contains a general provision that such ornaments of the church and the minister thereof, at all times of their ministrations, shall be retained and be in use, as were in this Church of "England by the authority of Parliament, in the second year of the reign of King Edward the Sixth."

When the Prayer Book thus provides for the use in divine service of certain particular articles, can it be legitimately denied, that the use in the service, with a religious signification, of lights and other articles neither themselves prescribed nor subsidiary to what is prescribed, is an addition to and an alteration of the order and form prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, and is therefore unlawful?

The credence table is not unlawful, and why? Because it is subsidiary to what is prescribed.

In Westerton and Liddell (Moore, 187) Their Lordships said, "We entirely agree with the opinions expressed by the learned Judges in these cases, and in Faulkner v. Lichfield, that in the performance of the services, rites, and ceremonies ordered by the Prayer Book the directions contained in it must be strictly observed, that no omission and no addition can be permitted."

Pews, cushions to kneel upon, pulpit cloths, hassocks, and seats by the communion table, referred to in Liddell and Westerton, are merely for convenience, and are devoid of any religious significance. That in effect is the distinction between the charges in the present articles, so far as they apply to lighted candles, elevation, and the mixed chalice. The Judicial Committee in Westerton and Liddell (Moore, p. 161), decided that "The rubric excluded all use of crosses in the services." Why? Because crosses were not prescribed in the services, nor were they subsidiary to anything that was so prescribed. The proposition I contend for, viz., that, subject to the exceptions I have mentioned, any addition to the order and form prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer is contrary to the Acts of Uniformity, derives a most material support from two other decisions of the Judicial Committee in Westerton and Liddell, with reference to certain embroidered linen and lace upon the linen cloth used for the communion table. The Committee said, "with respect to the embroidered linen and lace used on the communion table at the time of the ministrations of the Holy Communion; the Rubric and the canon prescribe the use of a fair white linen cloth, and both the learned Judges in the Court below have been of opinion that embroidery and lace are not consistent with the meaning of that expression, having regard to the nature of the table upon which the cloth is to be used. Although their Lordships are not disposed in any case to restrict within narrower limits than the law has imposed the discretion which, within those limits, is justly allowed to congregations by the rules both of the ecclesiastical and the common law courts, the directions of the Rubric must be complied with; and, upon the whole, their Lordships do not dissent from the construction of the Rubric adopted by the present decree upon this point, and they must therefore advise Her Majesty to affirm it." (Moore, p. 189).

In this case their Lordships were very willing to interfere; but, like Dr. Lushington, and Sir John Dodson, they felt that the addition of lace and embroidery to the fair white linen cloth was contrary to the Rubric, as being a material addition to the order and form prescribed.

After deciding that crosses are not unlawful as architectural ornaments, their Lordships say, "With respect to the wooden cross attached to the communion table at St. Paul's, their Lordships have already declared their opinion that the communion table intended by the canon was a table in the ordinary sense of the word, flat and moveable, capable of being covered with a cloth, at which or around which the communicants might be placed, in order to partake of the Lord's Supper, and the question is, whether the existence of a cross attached to the table is consistent either with the spirit or with the letter of those regulations. Their Lordships are clearly of opinion that it is not; and they "must recommend that upon this point also the decree complained of should be affirmed."

Here again the cross that was attached to the table was an addition to the prescribed order and form in the Book of Common Prayer. The Prayer Book directed that the Lord's Supper should be administered with a table having a fair linen cloth upon it. The addition of the cross attached to the table and the lace and embroidery upon the table-cloth were, like lighted candles, additions to the order and form prescribed in the Prayer Book, obscuring the pure and simple symbolism of the table and fair linen cloth, and suggesting doctrinal views with regard to the Communion not held by the Church in England.

The mixing of water with the wine is an additional rite or ceremony not prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer. It is an act done during divine service with a religious signification. The consecration and administration to the communicants, of "wine and water," instead of "wine" alone, constitute a different order and form of administering the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper from that prescribed.

The elevation of the consecrated elements above the head, is a ceremony, for it is an act done by the minister during the performance of divine service, with a religious signification. It does not matter for this purpose whether the object of the elevation be to invite adoration, or to signify the elevation of Christ upon the Cross, or the offering of a sacrifice. The elevation of the elements above the head is an addition to the order and form prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer.

The Prayer Book contains the most minute directions respecting the gestures of the minister during the service, and particularly minute directions as to what he is to do during the consecration. The Rubrics in the Consecration Prayer, presenting the mode in which the clergyman is to perform his different acts during the Consecration of the Elements, are placed in a different position from that of any other Rubric throughout the Prayer Book. The performance of those gestures constitutes a part of the order and form prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer, and the introduction of an additional gesture is an alteration of the order and form prescribed.

The not placing the alms upon the communion table is also an omission from the order and form prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer.

Having referred to the Acts of Uniformity of Elizabeth and Charles II., in order to establish the anxiety of the Legislature for a strict enforcement, or a rigid conformity with the requirements of the Book of Common Prayer,—I now propose to quote two short extracts from Visitation Articles of Archbishops Parker and Abbot, and it will appear from such extracts how very great was the solicitude evinced by the ecclesiastical authorities to enforce the strictest adherence to the spirit and language of the Book of Common Prayer. I have already referred your Lordship to Ridley's Injunctions in the reign of Edward VI., 1550; and therefore it is unnecessary for me to refer to them again. But I will direct your attention to Archbishop Parker's Visitation Articles, which are to be found in 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 355, in which he inquires, "Whether divine service be sayde or songe by your ministers in your severall churches duely and reverently, as it is set forth by the lawes of this realme, without any kinde of variation; and whether the holy sacraments be likewise ministered reverently in such manner as by the lawes of this realme, and by the Quene's Majestie's Injunctions, and by the advertisements "set forthe by publike authority, is appointed and prescribed."

In 1616 in Archbishop Abbot's Visitation Articles, which are to be found in 2 Cardwell's Documentary Annals (page 170) he inquires, "Doth your minister duly observe the orders, rites, and ceremonies prescribed in the said Book of Common Prayer, as well in reading public prayers and the Litany as also in administering the sacrament, solemnization of matrimony, visiting the sick, burying the dead, churching of women, and all other like rites and offices of the Church, in such manner and form as in the said Book of Common Prayer he is enjoined, without any omission or addition. And doth he read the Book of the last Canons once yearly, and wear a surplice according to the said canons."

I cannot of course for one moment contend before your Lordship that anything omitted from the Visitation Articles was unlawful; but what I respectfully submit to your Lordship is, that taking the Visitation Articles on the one hand and the Acts of Uniformity on the other, the Visitation Articles included everything that was necessary to be provided for the celebration of Divine Service, everything that the law required to be provided. Lighted candles or incense, for instance, are not subsidiary to any service prescribed by the Prayer Book, and their omission from the Visitation Articles shows that they were not required as necessary to be provided; and it seems to me that what your Lordship directed my attention to in another case, namely, that the Visitation Articles were not issued in one form, but in different forms, and settled by different chancellors in different dioceses, strongly supports my view of the case.

The 14th canon of 1603 directs that all ministers shall observe the orders, rites, and ceremonies prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer as well in reading the Holy Scriptures and saying the prayers as in the administration of the Sacraments, without variation either in regard of preaching, or in any other respect, or adding anything in the matter or form thereof. The 16th canon provides "In the whole divine service and administration of the Holy Communion, in all colleges and halls in both universities, the order, form, and ceremonies shall be duly observed as they are set down and prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer without any omission or alteration." And again, the 36th canon in the second paragraph provides "That the Book of Common Prayer, and of ordering of bishops, priests, and deacons, containeth in it nothing contrary to the Word of God, and that it may lawfully so be used, and that he himself will use the form in the said book prescribed in public prayer and administration of the sacraments and none other."

These provisions emanate from purely ecclesiastical authority, and were agreed to by the Queen as Supreme Ordinary of the Realm. And it does seem to me very surprising that any clergyman should come into this Court and endeavour to set up practices which the heads of the Church have expressly denounced.

In 1665 Archbishop Sheldon addressed a letter to the Bishop of London about Nonconformists, in which he wrote: "And next that you require of them as they will answer the contrary that in their own persons in their churches they do decently and solemnly perform the divine service by reading the prayers of the Church as they are appointed and ordered in and by the Book of Common Prayer, without addition to or diminishing from the same, or varying either in substance or ceremony from the order and method which by the said book is set down, wherein I hear, and am afraid too many do offend, and that in the time of such their officiating they ever make use of and wear their priestly habit, the surplice and hood, that so by their due and reverent performance of so holy a worship they may give honour to God, and by their own example instruct the people of their parishes what they ought to teach them in their doctrine." 2 Cardwell, Doc. Ann. 328.

21795.

And in Westerton and Liddell (Moore, p. 187,) their Lordships say: "In the performance of the services, rites, and ceremonies ordered by the Prayer Book, the directions contained in it must be strictly observed; no omission and no addition can be permitted."

It is therefore clear, that the most rigid conformity was required to the directions contained in the Books of Common Prayer of Edward VI., Elizabeth, and Charles II.

I will now, my Lord, proceed to deal with the charges in the Articles specifically. The first charge against Mr. Simpson is for "causing candles to be lighted, and to continue lighted during the administration of the Holy Communion when such lighted candles were not necessary to afford light."

The first Book of Common Prayer, was not agreed upon until January 1549. But when Edward VI. came to the throne on the 28th of January 1547, certain ecclesiastical Ordinances or Injunctions were issued. I will quote very shortly from these Injunctions (1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, pages 5 and 7), in which by the first Article, "All deans, archdeacons, parsons, vicars, and other ecclesiastical persons shall faithfully keep and observe," and (by the third Article) "shall suffer from henceforth no torches nor candles, tapers, or images of wax to be set afore any image or picture, but only two lights upon the high altar before the Sacrament, which for the signification that Christ is the very true light of the world they shall suffer to remain still." Consequently, there are two conditions for these lights. Firstly, the lights must be upon the high altar; and secondly, they must be before the Sacrament, that is, before the reserved Sacrament.

The first Prayer Book of Edward VI. practically prohibited reservation; thus in the Liturgies of Edward VI. (Parker Society's edition, page 85,) it is directed that, "The minister take so much bread and wine as shall suffice for the persons appointed to receive the Holy Communion, laying the bread upon the corporas, or else in the paten, or in some other comely thing prepared for that purpose." At page 141 there is a Rubric, which directs, if the same day there be a celebration of the Holy Communion in the Church, then shall the priest reserve (at the open communion) so much of the Sacrament of the body and blood as shall serve the sick person, and so many as shall communicate with him (if there be any); and so soon as he conveniently may after the open communion ended in the Church, shall go out and minister the same, first to those that are appointed to communicate with the sick (if there be any), and last of all to the sick person himself." These two Rubrics, as I submit to your Lordship, practically did away with and abolished the reservation of the Sacrament.

After the introduction of Edward's first book, the omission of the Injunction as to lights was enjoined in several Visitation Articles and Injunctions—Ridley's Injunctions, for instance, which I have already read to your Lordship (1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 93.) On the accession of Mary, the legislation of Edward VI. with reference to religion was abrogated, and all Divine Service and the administration of the sacraments was restored to what it had been in the last year of Henry VIII.

The second chapter of the second session of the 1st of Mary, after repealing all the principal Acts of Edward VI. relating to religion, including the Edward VI.'s Act of Uniformity, enacted, "That all suche Divine Service and Administration of Sacramentes as were most comonly used in the Realme of Englande, in the last yere of the reigne of our late Sovereine Lord King Henry theight, shall bee from and after the XXth daye of December in this pnte yere of our Lorde God one thousande five hundredth the fiftie and three, used and frequented throughe the hole Realme of Englande, and all other

“ the Queenes Majesties Dominions : And that no other kinde nor order of Divine Service nor administration of Sacramentes be after the said XXth daye of December used or ministredd, in any other maner, forme, or degree within the said Realme of Englande or other the Queenes dominions, then was most comonly used, ministred, and frequented in the said last yere of the Raigne of the said late King Henrye the Eight.”

This enactment was sufficient to repeal Edward's Injunctions of 1547 against lights before images, and likewise in respect of the two lights before the Sacrament, supposing that the Injunctions of 1547 were then in force. Burning lights before images, and before the reserved Sacrament, and burning lights during the Mass, or other service, are all practices connected with divine service. Elizabeth's Act of Uniformity restored a Protestant service, by enacting that Edward's second Book should be used, with certain specified alterations; but it did not repeal the statute of the 1st of Mary, chapter 2, session 2, except so far as it related to Edward's second Book, which had been scheduled to his second Act of Uniformity.

By the 2nd section of the 1st of Elizabeth it is enacted “ that the said statute of repeal, and every thing therein contained, only concerning the said book, and the service, administration of the sacraments, rites, and ceremonies contained or appointed in or by the said book, shall be void, and of none effect from and after the Feast of the Nativity of St. John Baptist next coming.”

Therefore, the other Acts of Parliament and ordinances of Edward's reign, repealed either expressly or by implication by the Act of Mary, remained repealed.

The principle I have referred to is laid down in the Bishop's case, (12 Coke, page 7,) where it was decided that another of the Acts repealed by the same Act of Mary, namely, the first Act of Edward VI., cap. 2, as to bishoprics being donative and not elective, was not revived by the repeal of that Act by 1 Jac. 1, c. 25. The judgment, after stating certain objections which had been taken to the validity of the elections of bishops which had taken place after the 1st James, cap. 25, had come into operation, states:—“ As to these objections, upon consideration had of them by command of the King, it was answered and resolved by Popham, Chief Justice of England, and Coke, attorney of the King and afterwards affirmed by the Chief Baron and the other Justices then attendant to the Parliament, upon good advice and consideration, that although the said Act 1 Mar. be repealed, that yet the said Act 1 Ed. 6, cap. 2, for other causes is not now in force, but remains repealed: Yet true it is that when an Act of Repeal is repealed, the first Act, as hath been said, stands in force, and is implicite revived. But it is to be observed, that the said Act 1 Ed. 6. was repealed, adnulled, and annihilated by three several Acts of Parliament: and as a man which is bound by three several bonds, although he break one or two of them, yet the third which remains whole will bind him: so when the words of three several Acts repeal or adnul a first Act, altho' that one or two of the Acts of Repeal or Adnullation are repealed, yet the one which remains in force, adnuls the first Act.”

A like state of things exists in the present case.

Queen Elizabeth, in the first year of her reign, issued Injunctions which will be found in 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals (page 210), and from a comparison of these Injunctions with those of Edward VI. in 1547, we find, that 23 are substantially repeated in Elizabeth's Injunctions, and of the 13 omitted, nine appear to be omitted because they were inconsistent with the existing law. This shows that the Injunctions of 1547 were not considered to be in force, and the two lights upon the high altar were omitted from Elizabeth's Injunctions. Therefore this clearly shows that that Injunction of 1547 respecting the lighted candles, was, so far as Elizabeth was concerned, not intended to be continued in force.

By the 23rd Article of the Injunctions of Elizabeth, in 1559, which all ecclesiastical persons are faithfully to keep and observe, it is ordered, “ that they shall take away, utterly extinct, and destroy all shrines, coverings of shrines, all tables, candlesticks, trindals, and rolls of wax, pictures, paintings, and all other monuments of feigned miracles, pilgrimages, idolatry, and superstition.”

If that language means anything, it means that all candles, without exception, were to be abolished.

I now propose to discuss the question as to the lighted candles in Queen Elizabeth's Chapel, respecting which a great deal has been said, and a great deal has been absurdly written. The fact, that Queen Elizabeth, in the early part of her reign, had lighted candles in her chapel, has been adduced as an argument to prove that the Injunctions of 1547, allowing two lights upon the high altar before the Sacrament, were in force, and that the 23rd Injunction of Elizabeth, commanding the destruction of, among other things, “ all candlesticks,” was, subject to some exception, in favour of these two lights upon the high altar. It appears, however, that instead of these lighted candles having been retained in Queen Elizabeth's Chapel, notwithstanding her Injunctions, they had been given up together with the other appendages or accessories of the Roman Catholic service, as soon as the Protestant service was re-established by her Act of Uniformity; and that these lighted candles were not re-introduced into her chapel until October 1559, several months after her Injunctions were issued.

I am going to read an extract—I have already read it to your Lordship on another occasion, but it is requisite I should do so now, in order to illustrate the argument I am about to bring before the court, from a despatch of De Quadra, the Spanish ambassador, and given by Mr. Froude, at page 145 of the 7th volume of his History, “ Nor was this all. The Queen seemed to accept the conditions which the marriage (with the Archduke Charles) would imply and oblige, and as if to separate herself distinctly from the Protestant party, she gave orders for the restoration of the crucifix in the Chapel Royal. Angry words were exchanged between the Council and the chaplain, Bedford spoke with bitter surprise to Cecil, and the order was suspended for a day or two. But on the Sunday following service was performed with the altar in full costume, and the priests in orthodox vestments.” Then there is a note at the same page, “ The Queen commanded that a crucifix and some candles should be placed on the altar. On this account a dispute arose between her chaplains and the members of the Council, who neglected to do what the Queen had commanded on that evening. On the Saturday, at Vespers, it was done, and on the Sunday there were vestments for the altar and clergy in such dresses as we use. Bedford at that time spoke insultingly to Cecil on the subject of the crucifix.”

There has been some doubt expressed as to the authority of these statements; but Mr. Froude, in the preface to the 7th volume of his History, the same in which these extracts occur, at page 6, says, with reference to the credit due to the despatches of these ambassadors, “ For these reasons I think it likely that the Spanish ambassadors possessed sources of information which the representatives of foreign states are usually without. I think that no deception could have been long practised upon them by either party in the Council which would not have been betrayed by the other. They write at all times with a certain mastery of the situation, and in no instance where their statements can be tested by other criteria, have I found them to have been seriously mistaken.”

We find further evidence that the lighted candles and the other things mentioned by the Spanish ambassador were re-introduced in October 1559, after having been laid aside for some time. In Skype's Parker

(vol. 1., page 92.) a letter is quoted from Sir Francis Knollys to Archbishop Parker, dated October 13th, 1559, "wishing him prosperity in all godliness, namely, "in his good enterprise against the enormities yet in "the Queen's closet retained, 'although', said he, "with the Queen's express commandment these toys "were laid aside till now a late." And the statement of Knollys respecting the removal and subsequent re-introduction of the lighted candles and other articles is confirmed by Strype himself in the more detailed account which he gives of the matter in his Annals of the Reformation (vol. 1, pt. 1, p. 259). "The Queen indeed being used to these things, that "is, the crosses and saints' images in Churches, for "she and her nobles that resorted thither used to give "honour to them, had them at first in her own chapel. "But she seems to have laid them aside, and that "upon the earnest addresses" (and your Lordship may remember that you asked me upon another occasion whether there had been any remonstrance made to Queen Elizabeth against these lighted candles in her chapel) made to her by "her bishops, that in her "Injunctions it might be enjoined that all images "might be removed out of churches, wherein they "did prevail. But it seems not long after the Queen "resumed the burning of lights, and the image of the "crucifix again upon the altar in her oratory." That the crucifix and lighted candles in Queen Elizabeth's chapel were remonstrated against by some of the bishops on religious grounds, appears from 1 Strype's Annals.

Bishop Cox, of Ely (1 Strype's Annals, vol. 1, pt. 2, page 501, No. XXII.) wrote to the Queen, excusing himself for refusing to minister in her chapel, because of the crucifix and lights there. He says—"In the "trembling fear of God, in the bond of duty toward "your Highness, in the zeal of God's truth, which "burdeneth and bindeth my conscience, I most humbly "sue unto your like Godly zeal, prostrate and with "wet eyes, that ye will vouchsafe to peruse the considerations which move that I dare not minister in "your Grace's chapel, the lights and cross remaining. "The scripture saith in the place where God gave his "commandments he suffered no similitude nor likeness "of anything to be seen. And in his second commandment he forbade both the making of images "and the worshipping them also, and that upon a "grievous plague. How durst man, dust and ashes, "for any respect set up an image in the temple of "God? Your Majesty's learned and godly clergy of "your realm do think this commandment of God "indispensable."

It appears from Bishop Cox's language that the Crucifix was the principal thing objected to, and confirms my argument in reference to this subject, that the lights in Queen Elizabeth's Chapel were never before the reserved Sacrament, but were before the crucifix.

In reply to your Lordship's question, I have not been able to find whether any one of the bishops remonstrated against the lights in Queen Elizabeth's Chapel as "unlawful." But this is not surprising, for the Queen had it practically in her power to establish a crucifix and lighted candles in every parish church in the country.

By the 25th and 26th sections of the 1st Elizabeth, chapter 2, it is enacted "That such ornaments of the "Church and of the ministers thereof shall be retained "and be in use, as was in this Church of England, by "authority of Parliament, in the second year of the "reign of King Edward VI., until other order shall "be therein taken by the authority of the Queen's "Majesty, with the advice of her Commissioners, "appointed and authorized under the Great Seal of "England, for causes ecclesiastical or of the Metropolitan of this realm. And also that if there shall "happen any contempt or irreverence to be used in "the ceremonies or rites of the Church by the misusing "of the orders appointed in this book, the Queen's "Majesty may, by the like advice of the said Commissioners or Metropolitan, ordain and publish such "further ceremonies or rites as may be most for the "advancement of God's glory, the edifying of his "Church, and the due reverence of Christ's holy "mysteries and sacraments."

The Commissioners for Causes Ecclesiastical, and by whose advice the Queen was to exercise these powers, under the 1st Elizabeth, chapter 4, held office only during the pleasure of the Queen. The warrant appointing the commissioners for Ecclesiastical Causes will be found in 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 255; it is entitled "The Queen's warrant for the "Court of High Commission in Causes Ecclesiastical," and at pages 257, line 20, they are appointed "during our pleasure," and again at page 258, at lines 5 and lines 22, "during our pleasure," being three of the most important parts of the Commission. Consequently the Queen had it practically in her power to make orders for other ornaments and additional rites and ceremonies, and could therefore have ordered that crucifixes or other images should be erected in parish churches of this country, and lighted candles burnt before them.

Again, my Lord, supposing lighted candles had existed in Queen Elizabeth's Chapel, that would have been no test of the law, because many things may be done in a private chapel, which could not be done in a parochial church or cathedral.

That some measure was contemplated by the Queen with reference to crucifixes and other images not long after the introduction of the crucifix and lighted candles, appears from the Zurich letters. In a letter from Thompson Sampson to Peter Martyr, dated 6th January 1560, Sampson says "I will propose this "single question for your resolution, for I wish my "father to implore you as my medium of correspondence with Masters Bullinger and Barnardine. "It is this,—whether the image of the crucifix, "placed on the table of the Lord, with lighted "candles, is to be regarded as a thing indifferent, "and if it is not to be so considered, but as an unlawful and wicked practice, then I ask, suppose the "Queen should enjoin all the bishops and clergy either "to admit this image into their churches, or to retire "from the Ministry of the Word, what should be our "conduct in this case?" (1 Zurich Letters, page 64.) This language is perfectly inconsistent with lighted candles being recognized as lawful.

In a letter from Bishop Sandys to Peter Martyr, also in the Zurich Letters, (1st volume, page 73,) the bishop says, "We had not long since a controversy "respecting images. The Queen's Majesty considered "it not contrary to the Word of God, nay, rather for "the advantage of the Church, that the image of "Christ crucified, together with (those of the Virgin) "Mary and (Saint) John, should be placed, as heretofore, in some conspicuous part of the church "where they might more readily be seen by all the "people. Some of us (bishops) thought far otherwise, "and more especially as all images of every kind were "at our last visitation not only taken down, but also "burnt, and that too by public authority; and because "the ignorant and superstitious multitude are in the "habit of paying adoration to this idol above all "others. As to myself, because I was rather vehement "in this matter, and could by no means consent that "an occasion of stumbling should be afforded to the "Church of Christ, I was very near being deposed "from my office and incurring the displeasure of the "Queen. But God, in whose hand are the hearts of "kings, gave us tranquillity instead of a tempest, and "delivered the Church of England from stumbling "blocks of this kind."

From these letters which I have read, it appears that, in the beginning of 1560, only a few months after October 1559, the date of the introduction of the crucifix and lights into the Queen's Chapel, the Queen entertained a plan of introducing crucifixes or some other images into the churches of this country. It appears, then, that the Queen had power to introduce crucifixes and lighted candles into churches, and that at one time she was inclined to exercise that power. Under these circumstances, it would have been madness on the part of the bishops or anybody else to insist that, according to the strict letter of the existing law, the crucifix and lighted candles in the Queen's Chapel were unlawful, as the only result would have been to provoke Queen Elizabeth into making an order for the general introduction of crucifixes and lighted candles. And that, my Lord, is the reason why we do not find, at least as far as my humble sphere of research extends, any trace of any person in authority making a complaint to Queen Elizabeth that the lights in her chapel were unlawful, because she had the power to make them lawful. But what we do find is this, that the bishops of the Church remonstrated upon religious grounds against their being lighted.

It appears from two letters of Parkhurst, Bishop of Norwich in 1562, that the crucifix and candles were removed from the Queen's Chapel; and that, although they were afterwards restored, the candles were not afterwards lighted in the day time.

The first was a letter dated the 20th of August 1562, and is to be found in the 1st volume of the Zurich letters, page 122, describing the taking away of candles and crucifixes. I shall only, however, trespass upon the time of the Court with the second letter, dated the 26th of April 1563, which states that the cross and candles had been restored, but that the candles were now never lighted. The first volume of Zurich letters, page 129, contains a letter from Bishop Parkhurst to Henry Bullinger: "I wrote you word that the cross, wax candles, and candlesticks had been removed from the Queen's Chapel, but they were shortly after brought back again, to the great grief of the godly. The candles heretofore were lighted every day, but now not at all."

If the candles were burnt before and in honor of the crucifix, as I submit they were, and not before the reserved Sacrament, no doubt there was a great point gained in the removal of the lighted candles.

I will now come, my Lord, to what I consider to be a very important part of my argument, in order to show the greatest improbability of lighted candles being used during daylight in the parish churches of this country, and I think I shall be able to establish such improbability from the Homilies. In 1563 the second Book of Homilies was published. The Homilies had been approved of by the Convocation which sat in 1563 (according to the Old Style 1562—63), and they were published with a preface in the Queen's name, to which I shall call your Lordship's attention in a few minutes. I am proposing to read that copy of the Homilies which was published by the Society for promoting Christian Knowledge in 1846.

In one of the Homilies of the second book, the third part of the Homily against "the peril of idolatry," there is a long denunciation of candle worship. This denunciation is principally directed against the burning of lighted candles before images, but a great part is equally applicable to the burning of candles during daylight. For instance, the homily says, at page 242, "For in the day it needeth not, but was ever a proverb of foolishness to light a candle at noon time." And again, lower down in the same page, "And by and by he (Lactantius) saith: 'Seemeth he therefore to be in his right mind, which offereth up to the Giver of all light, the light of a wax candle for a gift? He requireth another light of us, which is not smoky, but bright and clear, even the light of the mind and understanding.'"

In the preface prefixed to the Homilies in 1563, the following directions for their reading were prescribed; and your Lordship will find them at page 4 of the preface: "All which Homilies her Majesty commandeth and straightly chargeth all Parsons, Vicars, Curates, and all others having spiritual cure, every Sunday and Holy-day in the year, at the ministering Holy Communion, or if there be no Communion ministered that day, yet after the Gospel and Creed, in such order and place as is appointed in the Book of Common Prayer, to read and declare to their parishioners plainly and distinctly one of the said Homilies, in such order as they stand in the Book, except there be a Sermon, according as it is enjoined in the book of Her Highnesses Injunctions; and then for that cause only, and for none other, the reading of the said Homily to be deferred unto the next Sunday or Holy-day following. And when the aforesaid Book of Homilies is read over, her Majesty's pleasure is, that the same be repeated and read again in such like sort as was before prescribed." This shows, that all the homilies were to be read through consecutively, and that no clergyman was at liberty to choose which of the Homilies he would read, and which he would omit. There could consequently be no doubt that these homilies became very familiar to the people, as it was at that time by no means the rule that all clergymen were licensed to preach.

If this be so—if the denunciations against lighted candles in the daytime in the Homily "On the Peril of Idolatry" were familiar to the people, we should expect to find that any use of lighted candles in the daytime would be at once denounced as contrary to the Homilies, and would be spoken of in such terms as would clearly show, that it was contrary to the law of the Church to have lighted candles in the daytime.

Though the Puritans in Charles I.'s reign complained a great deal about candlesticks and candles, yet, except in two or three exceptional cases, such as the use of candles upon Candlemas-day, they never complained of lighted candles on the holy table during daylight. The Visitation Articles of the different bishops and archbishops show that the directions for reading the Homilies were not allowed to remain a dead letter. We find Archbishops Parker, Grindal, Bancroft and Laud, and Bishop Andrewes, all inquiring whether each church is provided with the Homilies; and similarly we find Archbishops Whitgift and Laud, and Bishop Andrewes, inquiring whether the Homilies are duly read.

In 1622, Laud, in his Visitation Articles as Bishop of St. David's, inquires, "Doth your minister (being licensed) preach usually according to the canons, either in his own cure, or in some other church or chapel near adjoining, where no preacher is, and how often he hath been negligent in that behalf, and doth he preach standing, and with his hat off? Or whether doth he or his curate upon every Sunday, when there is no sermon, read an Homily, or some part thereof, according as he ought to do: or in case he be not licensed to preach, doth he take upon him to preach or expound the Scripture in his own cure, or elsewhere. If so, then you are to present the same, the time and place, when, and where he did it." (5 Laud's Works, pt. 2, p. 384, No. 8.) This shows the anxiety of Laud that the Homilies should be read, and the words "As he ought to do," probably refer to the directions in Queen Elizabeth's preface as to reading the Homilies one after the other.

The terms of the inquiry also show, that clergymen who were "not licensed to preach," or, as it is termed, "no preachers," and who would have been obliged always to read the Homilies instead of preaching, were not uncommon.

Archbishop Laud, in 1637, in his Visitation Articles for the peculiars of Canterbury inquired, "Whether you have in your church or chapel . . . the Book of Homilies lately by authority printed."

Is it credible, that at this time Archbishop Laud and other prelates who were directing the Homilies to be read, were using themselves, or authorizing the use of lighted candles in their churches or chapels? 5 Laud's Works, p. 439.

There were a number of like inquiries made by the archbishops and bishops. And the following are references to Visitation Articles, where the Book of Homilies has been required to be in churches. In 1563, Archbishop Parker (1 Cardwell, Doc. Ann., p. 355.) In 1576, Archbishop Grindal (Ibid., p. 397.) In 1605, Archbishop Bancroft (2 Ibid., p. 110.) In 1619, Bishop Andrewes (Minor Works, p. 113, art 3.)

In 1628, Bishop Laud (5 Laud's Works, p. 405, No. 3.) Where enquiries have been made whether the Homilies have been read in churches. In 1588, Archbishop Whitgift (2 Cardwell, Doc. Ann. p. 33.) In 1625, Bishop Andrewes (Minor Works, p. 130, No. 4.) In 1635, Bishop Laud (5 Laud's Works, p. 425, No. 7.)

The second charge against Mr. Simpson is, that at the public administration of the Holy Communion he mixed water with the sacramental wine intended to be consecrated immediately before the Prayer of Consecration, or at some other time during the celebration of the Holy Communion, and afterwards delivered to the communicants the cup containing the wine so mixed with water.

The mixed chalice had been in use in England down to the time of the Reformation, being expressly prescribed in the Sarum Missal. In the First Prayer Book of Edward VI., a Rubric directs: "Putting the wine into the chalice, or else into some fair and convenient cup prepared for that purpose, if the chalice will not serve, putting thereto a little pure and clean water, and setting both the bread and wine upon the altar." This Rubric, as your Lordship is aware, was omitted in Edward's second Book, and only the word "wine" is used in that and in subsequent Prayer Books—there not being in any of them the slightest allusion to "water."

In 1662 the following Rubric, corresponding to that in Edward's first book, was inserted. "And when there is a communion the priest shall then place upon the table so much bread and wine as he shall think sufficient," leaving out the latter part of the Rubric of the first Prayer Book. Rubrics were likewise inserted in the margin of the Prayer of Consecration, as well as before a Rubric provided for the consecration of additional bread and wine; all these speak of wine as the substance to be consecrated.

The 20th and 21st of the canons of 1603 mention "wine" only, and the minister is directed to deliver both the bread and the "wine" to every communicant; and bread and "wine" to be provided against every communion. "The churchwardens of every parish against the time of every communion shall at the charge of the parish, with the advice and direction of the minister, provide a sufficient quantity of fine white bread, and of good and wholesome wine, for the number of communicants that shall from time to time receive these; which wine we require to be brought to the communion table in a clean and sweet standing pot, or stoop of pewter, if not of purer metal." Then, in the 21st canon, it says, "Furthermore no bread or wine newly brought shall be used; but first the words of institution shall be rehearsed, when the said bread and wine be present upon the communion table. Likewise the minister shall deliver both the bread and wine to every communicant severally."

It may perhaps be argued, that the word "wine" does not necessarily mean wine alone, but may include "wine and water." But it will be found very difficult to prove, that the word "wine" had in Edward VI. or Charles II.'s reign, or has now a different meaning in liturgies or other ecclesiastical writings from what it unquestionably had and has in the language of common life. On the contrary, the Sarum Missal and the present Roman Missal both use the word "wine" in the strict sense of pure wine.

In the Directorium Anglicanum, pages 83 to 92, which professes to contain the cautels and directions of the Mass, a translation of the cautels of the Sarum Missal will be found; and in these cautels the following directions: "Also the water must be poured in the smallest possible quantity so that it may be absorbed by the wine and receive the savour of the wine. For there is no danger, however small be the modicum of water that is mixed, but there is risk if it be much." Page 85.

Here two substances are treated of "wine" and "water." Again, at page 92. "Also care must be taken that only a modicum of water be put (into the "wine), because, if so much is put in as to take away the species of wine, it must not be used." These directions establish that before the Reformation the relative proportions of "wine and water" were considered a matter of great importance, and that it was unlawful to consecrate the mixture, if it contained too much water.

The reason for these directions appears from a Rubric in the present Roman Missal, which declares, that, if so much water be mixed with the wine, that the wine is corrupted, the mixture cannot be effectually consecrated.

In a book on the Romish Rites by Foy, page 188 (the title is "Of defects occurring in the celebration of the Mass), the fourth defect is, "If the wine has become quite sour or putrid, or has been pressed from unripe grapes, or so much water is mixed with it that the wine is corrupt, the Sacrament is null;" which means that the Sacrament is not made. How meaningless and absurd these directions and declarations would be if "wine," when used in liturgies, included "wine mixed with water."

The third charge against Mr. Simpson is, that after the Prayer of Consecration he raised the paten with both hands over his head and the cup in like manner. Mr. Simpson in his answer denies having done the acts charged after the Prayer of Consecration, but says, that he has in the reading of the Prayer of Consecration so raised the paten on pronouncing the words "Do this in remembrance of me," and has so raised the cup on pronouncing the words "This is my blood which is shed for you and for many for the remission of sins," and he submits himself to the judgment of the Court, if such elevation of the paten and cup are unlawful additions to and alterations of the form and order prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer.

The substance of this charge is, that there was an elevation—after the bread and wine had been consecrated. The Sarum Missal prescribes two elevations of each element, the one before, and the other after, pronouncing the words of consecration "For this is my body" or "For this is the chalice of my blood." Your Lordship will find that in Walker, Sarum Missal, pages 66 and 67, "These words of consecration are to be said in a single breath and without any pause between them." And after these words the priest inclines himself towards the Host, and elevates it above his head that the people may see and adore it, replacing the chalice after the manner of a cross. Then again, at the words "For this is the chalice of my blood of the New Testament, the mystery of the faith which was shed for you and for many for the remission of sins?" Here he elevates the chalice to his breast or above his head, saying, "This do as oft as ye shall do it, for a memorial of me." It will be observed that Mr. Simpson's elevation, according to his own admission, corresponded with the second kind of elevation mentioned in Walker, both in the amount of the elevation and in being after and not before the consecrating words.

The Rubric directs in the Consecration Prayer the priest to take the bread at the words "took bread." Mr. Simpson however admits, that he elevated the paten at the words "Do this in remembrance of me," which occur much later in the prayer, and after, instead of before, the words of consecration. Similarly the Rubric directs the cup to be taken at the words "This is my blood of the New Testament which is shed for you and for many for the remission of sins," words occurring much later in the prayer, and having another Rubric annexed to them with which Mr. Simpson could not have complied, namely, "And here to lay his hand upon every vessel be it chalice, or flagon, in which there is any wine to be consecrated." This Rubric which I have just read means that every vessel containing wine to be consecrated, is to be upon the table, and the priest is to lay his hand upon it there, not that he is to be holding it up over his head. This appears from Mr. Simpson's responsive allegation, paragraph 4, where he says, that he raised the paten on pronouncing the words "Do this in remembrance of me." And that he raised the cup in pronouncing the words "This is my blood which is shed for you and for many for the remission of sins."

It has been argued, and I have no doubt it will be argued again, that the elevation of the elements is authorized by the Rubrics in the margin of the Consecration Prayer in our present Prayer Book, which direct the priest to take the paten and the cup into his hand. But even if it were arguable, that elevating the paten or cup above the head was a proper mode of complying with a direction simply to take it into the hand, Mr. Simpson's statement as to the times of the elevations would exclude him from the benefit of this argument. I believe there never was in any case in this Court a more wilful departure from the language of the Rubric, than there has been in the present case, upon the admission of Mr. Simpson.

In the First Prayer Book (Liturgies of Edward VI., page 89,) your Lordship will find this Rubric:—"Here the priest shall take the cup into his hands. These words before rehearsed are to be said, bowing still to the altar without any elevation or shewing the Sacrament to the people." As the Acts of Uniformity forbid every ceremony not expressly prescribed by the Prayer Book,—this prohibition was strictly unnecessary, but the abolition of transubstantiation and its attendant abuses was such a vital part of the Reformation, that we have no reason to be surprised at finding in the first book an express prohibition against having recourse to such a practice.

In the second Prayer Book this prohibition was omitted, the reason possibly being, that as the true meaning of the Act of Uniformity was better understood, and as the clergy had been made aware that every ceremony not expressly prescribed was prohibited, it was unnecessary to preserve in our second Prayer Book a memorial of this Popish and objectionable practice.

In the same year that the second Prayer Book was passed, the 42 Articles of 1552 were agreed to, one of which, the XXIX, corresponded with our present XXVIII Article, namely:—"The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's Ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped." And it was observed in Liddell and Westerton (Moore, 180) that in the XXXIX Articles, "the distinction between the Supper of the Lord and the Sacrifice of the Mass is set forth with the utmost precision."

The fourth charge against Mr. Simpson is, that on receiving the alms collected at the Offertory, he has placed such alms, and the bason containing them, on a stool, instead of on the communion table. Mr. Simpson admits the charge, but he denies that he has so placed the said alms, otherwise than to obtain more room on the communion table, and he submits, that such an unintentional and inadvertent placing of the alms on a stool, if it has occurred, is not an unlawful alteration of and deviation from the form and order prescribed in the Prayer Book. The Rubric alleged to be violated was inserted in 1662, and is as follows:—"Whilst these sentences are in reading, the deacons, churchwardens, or other fit person appointed for that purpose, shall receive the alms for the poor, and other devotions of the people in a decent bason, to be provided of the parish for that purpose, and reverently bring it to the priest, who shall humbly present and place it on the holy table."

The excuse alleged by Mr. Simpson, namely, that it was to obtain more room on the communion table, is not very easy to understand. The only articles which in the performance of the services of the Church it could possibly be necessary to place on the communion table are (1), the paten; (2), the chalice; (3), the flagon; and (4) the Service Book, and the communion table must be particularly small if there is no room for the alms bason besides. That excuse is also inconsistent with the subsequent allegation, that the act charged was unintentional and inadvertent. There seems to be a superstitious scrupulousness among some clergymen, as to what is to be placed on the communion table; or, in other words, a disinclination to obey the directions of the Book of Common Prayer; the object being to endeavour to deal with the communion table as if it were a Popish altar.

In the "Directorium Anglicanum," (p. 78.) we find (and this work your Lordship will recollect is by Dr. Lee, a beneficed clergyman of our Church) in a note: "The chasuble is the only ornament of a priest which it is permitted to lay upon the altar. Caps, gloves, and the like, ought never to be tolerated on the altar, and if unconsciously placed there, ought instantly to be removed by one of the assistant ministers, sacristans, or other officer." And we get the same in the "Ritual Reason Why," p. 11: "There are other ornaments of the altar besides the hangings and cross. Will you explain them? There are two lights which burn at the time of the celebration to signify that Christ is the true light of the world; and to represent His two natures, the Human and the Divine, both which he bears at the right hand of the Father in heaven. Other lights are lit round and about the altar in festal seasons, as a sign of spiritual joy, as St. Jerome testifies. The altar is also decked with flowers for the same reason, and in honour of Him who is the Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the Valley. All these are not placed on the altar proper (which is reserved for the sacred vessels directly employed in the offering of the Eucharistic sacrifice), but on one or more shelves or steps, called the Re-table, and sometimes but improperly called the super altar." And then we find at question 25, "What is the Credence? It is a table at which the elements are prepared." Question 26, "Why is this done at the Credence? Partly for convenience, partly out of reverence, so that the altar may be entirely reserved for the actual offering of the holy sacrifice; and in order that the elements may not be placed upon the altar before the oblation." It is, my Lord, deeply to be deplored to find beneficed clergymen endeavouring, per fas aut nefas, to introduce the Popish altar and its accessories into our Protestant churches.

However, as I shall have an opportunity of replying upon the Defendant's case, it is not my intention at the present time to trespass further upon the attention of the Court.

(Adjourned for a short time.)

(Dr. Swabey.) I appear with my friend, Mr. Stephens, on behalf of the Promoter; and I hope I am not insensible either to the importance of the subject or the dignity of this Court, but at the same time I cannot forget—and I think I ought not to forget—that these very topics have been argued before the Court recently at very great length, and that the Court during many days has had poured into its ear a vast mass of information and very able arguments on the subject. I cannot help thinking that your Lordship will apply such part of that information and so much of those arguments as you may think applicable to the questions at issue in the present case, and that being so, the observations which I shall now proceed to make will be rather by way of allusion to what has been said, and possibly in some degree of anticipation of what may be said. Of course if any really new points are produced by my learned friends on the other side, it will be for my learned leader to deal with them in his reply. My remarks will not run to the same extent, as would have been necessary, having regard to the dignity of this Court, if the case had now come fresh before your Lordship for the first time.

It is possible that a sort of preliminary objection may be taken in this case which may form itself somewhat in this way: that this being a proceeding under a penal statute the decree by letters of request and the Articles are in such a shape as would be bad if it was an indictment at common law under a penal statute. The answer to that I think is that the jurisdiction of the Court in these matters depends certainly not upon that statute. It is a court of ancient jurisdiction, in existence before that statute. The statute may prescribe certain penalties for certain offences, but I think it in no way prescribes the form of procedure in this Court; at the same time, any questions that can be raised upon that point are answered by the remark that it is a question of the procedure of this Court, and that as a question of the procedure of this Court the proper course has been taken in the decree by letters of request and the form of the Articles; and further in this very case, unless it can be shown that there is something which absolutely deprives the Court of its jurisdiction, the decree and letters of request and the articles have undergone the ordeal of being carried up on the question of form to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; and they have the sanction both of this Court and of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as being proper in point of form; so that I trust your Lordship will not find any difficulty, if that preliminary question should arise, in dealing with it.

My Lord, after listening, as I had the advantage of doing for many of those days during which the Court has sat to hear the case which was recently before it, to the mass of information which was laid before your Lordship—and I am not in the least complaining or suggesting any complaint of that mass of information having been so laid before your Lordship; because if I did I should properly lay myself open to the proverb of sour grapes in the first place, and in the next place, because I apprehend it was necessary that such information should be laid before your Lordship—the question may well be asked whether there is any clue or guide through that mass of information; and I cannot help thinking something of that nature will be found expressed in this proposition, that your Lordship, after an impartial perusal of the Acts of Uniformity and of the present Prayer Book and Rubrics, must come to the conclusion that the object of those Acts and of that book was to substitute the form of prayer in them contained for those that had preceded them. For instance, the first Act of Uniformity of Edward substituted the book incorporated therewith, for the Use of Sarum, or any of the other forms of ritual which may have been in use in the Church of England before that period; and so on till we come down to the present book—the present book being now substituted for all others, not merely supplementary to them. I think that is the fair conclusion which your Lordship must arrive at from all those documents which you have been referred to at great length.

That view is also strongly supported by the 14th canon, which has been read this morning; and it is also fortified by what is laid down in effect by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Liddell v. Westerton. One is almost ashamed to refer your Lordship to passages which have been read so often, but I must do so very shortly. At page 134 of Bayford's edition of that judgment is this, "Their Lordships entirely agree with the opinions expressed by the learned judges in these cases, and in Faulkner v. Lichfield, that in the performance of the services, rites, and ceremonies" (I do not know that wider words could be used) ordered by the Prayer Book, the directions contained in it "must be strictly observed that no omission and no addition can be permitted."

Then, of course, there is the well-known exception mentioned, and various instances were given by their Lordships; there is another, an extremely good one, and which I think has been already referred to, namely, that if the Rubric of the first Prayer Book of Edward, with reference to the water and wine, was an existing Rubric, it would follow from that that some vessel to hold the water would be a proper accessory to the ornaments of that Rubric, although not specifically mentioned. Then again, at the bottom of the following page, your Lordship will find this—

"Although their Lordships are not disposed in any "case to restrict within narrower limits than the law has imposed, the discretion which within those limits is justly allowed to congregations by the rules both of the Ecclesiastical and the Common Law Courts, the directions of the Rubric must be complied with."

Then we go back to the authoritative interpretation placed upon the Rubric as to ornaments, p. 114, which I really will not read to your Lordship again, but I will ask you to bear in mind the meaning given to the word "ornament" there, the distinction between ornament and decoration, and the very clear explanation of that distinction in the case of the cross, by which their Lordships illustrated their meaning of the distinction beyond all doubt saying that if a cross were used in the service, as, for instance, by being carried up and down the church, it would be an ornament; but, if it is merely placed against a wall, and not used in any part of service, then it is a decoration. My Lord, it seems to me that their interpretation of the Rubric refers one in terms to the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., and that as regards ornaments, nothing that is not found in that Prayer Book (of course with the exception I have referred to) can be used in the services of the Church. It seems to me that this is a very strong part of our case, and in pressing it upon your Lordship's attention, I am not intending to press, and I do not think I am pressing, a view at all inconsistent with, or contradictory to, that of my learned leader, who laid very great stress on the words rites and ceremonies. It seems to me that at the very worst it is only like the two sides of the gold and silver shield; for the Privy Council has said, as soon as the thing is used it is an ornament, and we of course say the using it must be a rite or ceremony, so that wherever an ornament is used there is a ceremony. Of course there may be a ceremony without the use of an ornament, as in the case of elevation; that is, I do not think the term "ornament" would apply to the sacred elements; they stand upon their own special Rubrics; but still a ceremony may be introduced no doubt without any new ornament being used. On the other hand, wherever a new ornament is introduced, there, ex vi termini, there must be a new ceremony. Therefore I say, comparing my argument with that of my learned leader, it is only like the two sides of a shield, if there is any difference in the view I am submitting to your Lordship. Taking that ruling of the Privy Council as a principle, I will pass for a moment to consider what has been suggested as to the discretionary Rubric at the beginning of the Prayer Book, that is to say, whether a matter of this sort ought not to go to the bishop personally and be settled by him, for that is the way in which I understand the suggestion. In the first place it may be well worth noting what that Rubric followed, in the first Prayer Book of 1549. It ran, and does run now to some extent, in this way: "Whereas heretofore there hath been great diversity in saying and singing in churches within this realm some following Salisbury Use, some Hereford Use, and some the Use of Bangor, some of York, some of Lincoln; now from henceforth all the whole realm shall have but one use. And if any would judge this way more painful," (that must refer to the clergy) "because that all things must be read upon the book, where as before, by the reason of so often repetition they could say many things by heart; if those men" (namely clergy) "will weigh their labour with the profit in knowledge, which daily they shall obtain by reading upon the book, they will not refuse the pain, in consideration of the great profit that shall ensue thereof." (That last clause is omitted in the preface of the present Prayer Book, and then follows) "And forasmuch as nothing can be so plainly set forth, but doubts may arise in the use and practice of the same; to appease all such diversity (if any arise), and for the resolution of all doubts concerning the manner how to understand, do, and execute the things contained in this book, the parties that so doubt or diversely take anything, shall always resort to the bishop of the diocese, who by his discretion shall take order for the quieting and

"appeasing of the same; so that the same order be not contrary to anything contained in this book."

My Lord, I suggest that all those words point to the clergy. If a clergyman is in doubt, or confers with a neighbour clergyman and finds that himself and his neighbour take diverse views, then he is to go to the bishop; but I say it does not point at all to the case of a dispute between a parishioner and the clergyman of the church which he attends. But supposing that is not so, and supposing the parties who are disputing about points of law may go to the bishop for certain purposes—

(The Dean of the Arches.) What are you citing; the first book?

(Dr. Swabey.) I am citing Mr. Keeling's "Liturgicæ Britannicæ."

(The Dean of the Arches.) But I do not understand that those words which you are citing are not in the present book?

(Dr. Swabey.) The words which are not in the present book are these, my Lord, "And if any would judge this way more painful, because that all the things must be read upon the book, where, as before, by reason of so often repetition they could say many things by heart, if those men will weigh their labour, etc." I say clearly that should be restricted to the clergy, those who have to do and execute the matters contained in the book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have got the passage now.

(Dr. Swabey.) So that I submit that on the fair interpretation of the words as they now stand, they apply to the case of a clergyman being in doubt as to how he should execute and carry out matters contained in this book and do not refer to the case of a question of law raised between a parishioner and a clergyman. But supposing that to any extent they do so apply, or that the bishop has a discretion in such matters, then I say that Rubric does not at all go on to point out how he shall exercise this discretion. Your Lordship will remember in this case the matter was brought before the Bishop of Exeter; and if he had a discretion I submit he has exercised that discretion by issuing a Commission and by sending up the case to this Court by Letters of Request; and to illustrate the fact that there would be nothing inconsistent with the terms of this Rubric in this case I will refer to Stone's case, a proceeding under the 13th Elizabeth, cap 12, which required the person to be "convented before the bishop of the diocese, or the ordinary" (1 Haggard's Consistory Reports p. 426). "The protest objected that the citation was irregular and insufficient in calling on Mr. Stone to appear before the Judge instead of the Bishop in person; and secondly that the nature of the cause and the quality of the Promoter were not sufficiently explained." The Court overruled these objections, "holding that the citation was in the usual form, that it might have issued independently of the statute, and that the words of the statute 'before the Bishop of the Diocese or the ordinary' were to be interpreted according to the usual style and form of judicial proceeding in this Court." So that even if the Rubric does apply to the case of a dispute between a parishioner and clergyman, I submit there is nothing to prevent the bishop from exercising his discretion by issuing a commission of inquiry and by sending the case to this Court by letters of request.

I now come to the first matter charged in this case. It is as to lighted candles; and according to the view which I have ventured to submit to your Lordship, it seems to me to turn very much upon whether they can be said to be decorations. It is remarkable they are not said in the answer or responsive allegations to be decorations, and my friends who advised the Defendant in this case must have well known the importance of the distinction. In point of fact you cannot read the allegations without seeing that the candles are used in that part of the service which we say they are; namely, the Communion Service. It would be almost an insult to suppose that Mr. Simpson, in broad daylight, lights the candles by way of decoration; as such it would be most mean and pitiful, and we can only suppose that he has some meaning (I do not inquire what) when he uses the lighted candles in that particular part of the service, namely, the celebration of the Holy Communion. It has been said, on no mean authority, that these lighted candles were authorized or permitted by an authorized ritual in the second year of Edward VI., and that that authorized ritual has never been revoked.

Now as far as I understand that, I understand it to refer to certain Injunctions. I am not going now to inquire into the question of the legality or illegality of those Injunctions; that has been so fully dealt with by my learned leader; but I say, assuming for the sake of argument that before the first Act of Uniformity passed it could be properly said that lighted candles were in use in this Church of England by authority of Parliament, then we must consider what effect the Statute of Uniformity has upon that previous state of the law. It seems to me beyond all question. If you turn to the Act of Uniformity you find—

(The Dean of the Arches.) What Act?

(Dr. Swabey.) Edward's first Act, 2 & 3 Edward VI., cap. 1. Your Lordship recollects the section, "All ministers," and so on, "Are bounden to say and use Mattens, Evensong, celebration of the Lord's Supper, commonly called the Mass, and administration of each of the sacraments, and all and every common and open prayer, in such order and form as is mentioned in the same book, and none other or otherwise." Now, if you couple that with the present Act of Uniformity, and the interpretation which the Privy Council put upon the Ornament Rubric, I venture to say that it must turn upon the question, whether the lighted candles so used in a particular part of the service are prescribed by the first book of Edward VI., or whether they are necessary or consistent additions to what is prescribed by the first book of Edward VI., and I venture to put it that, used in the way in which Mr. Simpson says in his answer he does use them, they are unlawful additions and not necessary adjuncts in any sense of the word.

I will only refer to one text book with regard to this matter, and I do it with that great respect which I feel for the author of that text book. It is Mr. Frideaux's "Guide to Churchwardens," the edition of 1860, page 56: The Churchwardens "may also if they think fit furnish the Communion table with two candlesticks and candles, not indeed as ornaments but as necessaries, provided they be of a reasonable size, and that the candles are lighted only when necessary in consequence of darkness."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That was in accordance with Dr. Lushington's view?

(Dr. Swabey.) Yes; my learned friend seems to have been rather led away by the Recorder of Sarum since that time; but that was what I venture to call his more wholesome frame of mind in 1860.

Now, my Lord, as to the mixed chalice I do not think I ought to trouble your Lordship at any length. I will only point out that the mixed chalice was distinctly directed by the Use of Sarum. I need not refer you to the page. We know how the rubric, with respect to it varied in the later Prayer Books, and I cannot help thinking, when we consider that the undoubted object of the Church of England was to make a distinction between the administration of the Communion or the Lord's Supper and the Romish Mass, that it is impossible a matter of that sort could have been varied in the Prayer Book without an intention that the Rubrics should be exactly adhered to. And I am borne out in that by the opinion of another of my friends (Mr. James), who says: "I think it is not lawful to vary the prescribed form at all." Adding to it is varying. I do not find any evidence that at the time when the present Prayer Book was compiled the word 'wine' was understood to mean wine mixed with water." The Court is well aware also that the 20th of our canons of 1603 directs bread and wine to be provided.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That has been cited already this morning.

(Dr. Swabey.) Then, my Lord, the question of elevation stands very much in the same position. It is prescribed in the most formal and precise manner by the Use of Sarum.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is not quite in the same position. It is rather against your argument, is it not? because it is distinctly prohibited in one Prayer Book, and the prohibition is removed in the other.

(Dr. Swabey.) The prohibition is no doubt removed in the other Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is rather against your argument, is it not?

(Dr. Swabey.) Well, I should think there is a considerable difference in the removal of a prohibition, which, as my learned friend said this morning, for obvious reasons might have been necessary at the time it was made, and unnecessary afterwards, and the position that you are at liberty to use anything that is not forbidden. My contention is that you are only at liberty to use what is prescribed.

Then as regards the alms not being placed on the communion table, it is a point peculiar to this case; but I do not think it admits of an argument.

(The Dean of the Arches.) At present I do not understand how it is defended?

(Dr. Swabey.) I do not think it is necessary to go into that subject; I believe your Lordship referred to the use of hymns in church. I do not mean to say it has any direct bearing on this case; but as far as I can see the whole matter is illegal, and has sprung up probably in this way—

(The Dean of the Arches.) You think all hymns are illegal?

(Dr. Swabey.) I think all hymns are illegal except such as would come under the term of anthems, to be used where the Rubric directs an anthem to be sung. It is a curious consequence to arrive at, even if it should be indirectly arrived at in this case. But of course it is quite clear the strong feeling of congregations with reference to the use of hymns has overridden any directions against it, and I should think it has sprung up in this way, as far as I can make out: The seventh section of Edward's first Act of Uniformity provided as follows, "also it shall be lawful for all men, as well in churches, chapels, oratories, or other places, to use openly any psalms or prayers taken out of the Bible, at any due time, not letting or omitting thereby any part of the service commanded by the said book." Then, in a note upon that, my friend Mr. Stephens refers to it in this way: "This metrical version (Sternhold and Hopkins), first allowed in private devotion, was gradually introduced into the Church, having been probably admitted under the sanction of a clause in the first Act of Uniformity, which makes it lawful (citing as above). This conjecture is supported by the title of these psalms, 'set forth and allowed to be sung in all churches before and after morning and evening prayer, and also before and after sermons.' The general opinion, however, is that they were admitted rather by connivance than by legal authority. When in the next century the puritanical party gained strength and confidence, Te Deum, Benedictus, Magnificat, and Nunc dimittis were in most churches excluded, and these singing psalms introduced in their places."

(The Dean of the Arches.) How came Brady and Tate into existence?

(Dr. Swabey.) I am going to show your Lordship how Brady and Tate came in. As far as I can make out, the only authority on which they rest is an Order in Council of the 3rd December 1696, "Present the King's most Excellent Majesty in Council, upon the humble petition of Nicholas Brady and Nahum Tate." This is quoted from another of my friend's books—a large folio edition of the Book of Common Prayer. I am afraid I am poaching entirely upon his manors. "This day read at the Board setting forth that the Petitioners have with the utmost care and industry "completed a new version of the Psalms of David in English metre fitted for public use, and humbly praying his Majesty's Royal Highness that the version may be used in such congregations as think fit to receive it. His Majesty, taking the same into his Royal consideration, is pleased to order in Council that the same new version of the psalms in English metre be, and the same is hereby allowed and permitted to be, used in all churches, chapels, and congregations as think fit to receive the same."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is strongly overriding the Act of Uniformity according to your contention.

(Dr. Swabey.) Yes. It is signed W. Bridgeman. But I venture to say, in spite of that, according to my view they are illegal.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Oh, of course it is quite open to you to say that.

(Dr. Swabey.) In the case of Hutchins v. Denziloe there is an allusion made by Lord Stowell in this way; he cites from the Reformation Legum, and then he says, "The metrical version of the Psalms was then not existing—the first publication not taking place until 1562, and it was not regularly annexed to the Book of Common Prayer till 1576." I do not understand by "regularly annexed," he means "by authority." That case your Lordship will find in the first Consistory Reports, p. 179. "It was not regularly annexed to the Book of Common Prayer till 1576, after which these Psalms soon became great favourites with the common people." And your Lordship remembers in Wordsworth's "White Doe," the date of which is about the time of the great Northern rising, he speaks of the new zeal of congregations at that time for the singing of psalms. Lord Stowell goes on to say that the introduction of this version made the old hymns disrelished. I suppose by that he means the Magnificat, and so on.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No, I do not think he means the Magnificat.

(Dr. Swabey.) "But it cannot be meant that they were entirely superseded, for under the statutes of the Reformation and the usage explanatory of them, it is recommended that the ancient hymns should be used in the liturgy, or rather that they should be preferred to others." He refers to the Injunctions of 1559 with reference to the encouragement of the art of singing, and so on, and at the end of the 49th Injunction you will find "That there be a modest and distinct song so used in all parts of the common prayers in the church that the same may be as plainly understood as if it were read without singing; and yet nevertheless, for the comforting of such that delight in music, it may be permitted that in the beginning or in the end of common prayers, either at morning or evening, there may be sung an hymn, or such like song to the praise of Almighty God, in the best sort of melody and music that may be conveniently devised, having respect that the sentence of the hymn may be understood and perceived."—1 Card. Doc. Ann. p. 229.

Now I do not think I ought to trouble your Lordship with any further details in this case, for the reasons which I have stated in the outset. It may be said that all these matters complained of were very trifling—mere matters of ceremony and ceremonial. On the other hand I suppose there are very few of us who do not feel great pain at all this wrangling over even matters of ceremonial and ceremony connected with the pledge and means of the highest spiritual grace which both churches offer. But still I think we are entitled to urge, and your Lordship is bound to consider that all these matters occur in this particular service, namely, the celebration of the Holy Communion, or whatever title you please to give to that sacred rite, and I think nothing connected with that service can be unimportant considering the position which the Church of England takes upon it. I do not think I am trenching upon your Lordship's rule with regard to this case having nothing to do with ...that the Church of England spoken with no uncertain voice, affirmed several of the doctrines as regards what the Church the Sacrifice of the Mass," and so condemned found their excellent service books; and if you as regards England in the ancient Use of Sarum. All these, as we say, matters, however trifling, or however ceremonies may be, clearly tend to assimilate our book to that of the Use of Sarum. So much we are entitled to urge, and so much I think your Lordship is entitled to consider without in any way going into the question of doctrine; and I think may apply the observations of their Lordships in the Privy Council, which you will find at page 133 of Mr. Bayford's edition of Liddell v. Westerton, where they supposed a certain like objection to have been raised as to the trifling nature of the matters in question. "But this distinction between a table and an altar is in itself essential," and I venture to put it that the difference between our service and the Use of Sarum "is in itself essential," that the circumstances, therefore, which constitute that distinction however trifling in themselves, are for that reason important. I submit with great confidence your Lordship is entitled to go so far as that into the nature of these things; and it is not giving any ground to which doctrine is right and which is wrong. Their Lordships go on to say "And that when positive rules are established by law, courts of justice, when called into action by parties entitled to maintain the suit, are bound to enforce the law as they find it, leaving it to the Legislature, if they see fit, in any manner to alter it."

(Mr. Droop.) I have to ask your Lordship's permission to address some few additional observations in support of this case. Like my friend Dr. Swabey, I have borne in mind in preparing my argument, and I will also do so in addressing your Lordship, that these subjects have been discussed in a former case. And though I shall have to trouble you at somewhat greater length than my friend has done, still I propose to deal mainly with questions which have not been discussed in the present case by my learned leaders, and which have not been discussed or not much discussed, at any rate from our point of view in the former case.

The whole question which we are discussing is one of very great importance to the Church; and looking to the state of opinion which prevails among a considerable portion of the clergy with reference to these matters it seems to me very desirable that if our contention on these points succeed, we should give your Lordship the fullest opportunity of satisfying them that your decision in our favour—supposing your decision to be so—is not only in strict accordance with the letter of the law, but that it is in accordance with the mind of the Church of England throughout past generations since the Reformation.

The first point I wish to draw your attention to is this. I propose to explain to your Lordship how, as we believe, these Injunctions of 1547 as to lights were authorized. For this purpose I produce a copy of the commission which was issued to the visitors of certain dioceses in 1547. It is one of several commissions which were issued in the first year of Edward VI.'s reign.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is the printed commission in Cardwell; is it different from that?

(Mr. Droop.) The printed commission in Cardwell is a commission of Elizabeth's reign. This is remarkably similar to that. This has been extracted from the registers of Bishops Bonner, Thirlby, and Ridley, and it is for the dioceses of Westminster, Norwich, London, and Ely.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Where do you get it from?

(Mr. Droop.) It is out of the registry of the Bishop of London.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No, translation was filed, I suppose?

(Mr. Stephens.) No, it has not been filed.

(Mr. Droop.) This commission details the various duties which the registrars are to have, and among the different duties of the registrars are these: "Necnon Injunctiones præsentibus annexas personis in eisdem nominatis nomine nostro tradendum; aliasque Injunctiones congruas et competentes vice et auctoritate nostris eis indicendum et assignandum pænasque convenientes in earum violatores infligendum et irrogandum." The visitors are enjoined to deliver to the persons named in them the Injunctions annexed to these presents. And the view I wish to press upon your Lordship is that the Injunctions of 1547 were annexed to the copies of this commission.

(Dr. Deane.) Will you give me the date of that?

(The Dean of the Arches.) The copy handed up to the Court bears date 10th August 1547, and is "a Royal Commission for the visitation of certain dioceses." What is your next position with regard to that, Mr. Droop, supposing it to be as you contend?

(Mr. Droop.) I say this commission is merely under the seal of the King. The termination is "In ejus rei testimonium sigillum nostrum quo ad causas ecclesiasticas utimur, præsentibus apponi mandavimus. Data decimo die mensis Augusti anno Domini millesimo quingentesimo, quadragesimo septimo et regni nostri anno primo." Therefore there is no trace of any formality upon this except the King's seal.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is your argument that Injunctions were attached to the commission that the commission was invalid and therefore the Injunctions were invalid?

(Mr. Droop.) No; I wish to say the Injunctions were valid but were issued merely under the Royal supremacy, and in support of that I was going to read a passage from the first portion of this Commission to show that it merely refers to the King's supremacy: "Hinc est quod nos clerum et populum hujus regni nostri Angliæ auctoritate nostrâ in Ecclesiam Anglicanam post Christum in terris suprêmâ visitare intendentes," intending to visit the clergy and people of England by our authority supreme over the Church of England. It is for the purpose of showing that these Injunctions were not issued under the Proclamation Act but by virtue of the King's supremacy.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But lawfully issued?

(Mr. Droop.) Oh yes, my Lord, lawfully issued I think certainly. The commission which your Lordship referred to in Cardwell's Documentary Annals is to be found at page 249 of the first volume; and this commission also contains the same words which I have already quoted, namely, it refers to the "Injunctions annexed to these presents." At page 252, line 28, there are exactly the same words, referring to the "Injunctiones præsentibus annexas." Elizabeth also issued a set of printed Injunctions and those printed Injunctions were simply annexed to these Articles.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What do you say about Elizabeth's Injunctions? Were they lawful?

(Mr. Droop.) My opinion is that they were in the main lawful as Injunctions. Whether every particular thing which she ordered in those Injunctions was valid might be another thing, but my view is that in the main her Injunctions were valid as an exercise of the Royal supremacy. There may perhaps be one or two things in Elizabeth's Injunctions, as to which one might raise a question whether they were valid or not, but I submit in the main they were valid; and I submit that in the main Edward VI.'s Injunctions at any rate were more for the purpose of enforcing and explaining the existing law than for the purpose of making fresh orders; at least they might make fresh orders in matters of detail, but I submit that the orders which were made were consistent with the existing law at that time.

With reference to the mode in which King Edward's Injunctions were issued I may refer your Lordship to Foxe's Acts and Monuments, vol. 5, page 706, where there is an account of the visitation.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You know Foxe is not very accurate?

(Mr. Droop.) Well, I believe you will find in this particular he is, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Very likely, but I mean he is not a safe guide.

(Mr. Droop.) I may mention this, that I found this commission through some notes in an appendix to the edition of Foxe by Mr. Cattley. They are not in this copy, but I found them in a copy in the British Museum; they seem not to be printed in the ordinary copies. From these notes it would appear Mr. Cattley verified a great many of Foxe's authorities, and, among others, he gives the reference to that commission.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have got the reference.

(Mr. Droop.) At page 706 there is a general account of how the visitation took place, and how visitors were appointed for different dioceses. Then at page 713, after printing at length all these general Injunctions which are printed in Cardwell, Foxe goes on thus:—"Besides these general Injunctions and Laws Ecclesiastical set out by the godly prince King Edward with the consent of his uncle, there are also certain others, particularly appointed for the bishops only, which being delivered unto the commissioners, were likewise at their visitations committed unto the said bishops with charge to be inviolably observed and kept upon pain of the King's Majesty's displeasure the copies whereof have ensur in tenor and effect following:—Then first there are "Injunctions given by the most excellent prince Edward VI. to the Reverend Father in God, Thomas Bishop of Westminster, in his Highness's visitation." It then sets out some Injunctions given "in the King's Majesty's visitation by us, Sir Anthony Cook," and then follow the names of the other visitors, commissioners specially appointed by the King's Majesty to visit the churches "of Westminster, London, Norwich, and Ely, to the Right Reverend Father in God, Thomas Bishop of Westminster."

The first set seem to be Injunctions coming from the King to all the bishops; the second are Injunctions coming only from the King's visitors. The visitors were to deliver "Injunctiones his presentibus annexas;" also they were to issue "alias injunctiones congruas et competentes vice et auctoritate nostris;" (that is), they were also to issue Injunctions of their own. I think that is the last set. Then at page 742, the same volume of Foxe, there is an account of the visitation of the diocese of London. "This done after their oaths taken the said commissioners delivered unto the bishop aforesaid"—that is Bishop Bonner—"certain Injunctions as well in print as written, and homilies set forth by the King, all which things the said bishop received under the words of this protestation." That shows, according to Foxe, that the Injunctions delivered were partly printed and partly written.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I understand your argument with reference to these Injunctions to be that they were valid by reason of being issued under the Royal supremacy, but not valid by reason of being issued under the Proclamation Act.

(Mr. Droop.) Yes, my Lord. There is a long account of the issuing of the Injunctions in Elizabeth's reign given in 1st Strype's Annals, page 245, and the following pages of the Oxford edition. It describes how there were various commissions issued to different districts, and refers to this commission in Cardwell. My contention on the subject of the authority of Edward's Injunctions is that they had the same authority as other orders in ecclesiastical matters issued by the Crown in Edward VI.'s reign before the Act of Uniformity—such, for instance, as the order for the removal of images. That is contained in 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 47. Another is the order authorizing the use of the first Communion Service of Edward VI., issued in March 1548.

I wish now to pass from the interpretation of these Injunctions on to the question as to what evidence there is of the use of lights subsequent to the first Act of Uniformity of Edward VI. The only evidence which, so far as I am aware, has been brought forward consists of the two letters which are printed in the English Church Union case. The first is a letter dated April 26, 1549, from Martin Bucer and Paul Fagius to the ministers of Strasburg. It is at page 44. They say, "As soon as the description of the ceremonies now in use shall have been translated into Latin, we will send it to you. We hear that some concessions have been made both to a respect for antiquity and to the infirmity of the present age; and, for instance, as the vestments commonly used in the Sacrament of the Eucharist, and the use of candles; so also in regard to the commemoration of the dead and the use of chrism; for we know not to what extent or in what sort it prevails. They affirm that there is no superstition in these things, and that they are only to be retained for a time, lest the people, not having yet learned Christ, should be deterred by too extensive innovations from embracing His religion, and that rather they may be won over." From this letter it appears that Bucer and Fagius there specify four things as concessions to antiquity and to the infirmity of the present age. One is the vestments commonly used; the second is the use of candles; the third is the commemoration of the dead; and the fourth the use of the chrism. Now of these four things, three of them, the vestments, the commemoration of the dead, and the use of the chrism, were prescribed by the first book of Edward VI. The use of the candles is the only exception. But, my Lord, they do not profess to speak positively; they say, "We know not to what extent or in what sort it prevails." Also they promise to send a description of the ceremonies, which seems to me to be very strong evidence that the impression they had received at that time from the persons with whom they had communicated was that all the ceremonies would be prescribed in the book, so that when the Book of Ceremonies got out to Strasburg, the ministers at Strasburg would be able to know what they were. This argument, selected from our adversary's case, seems to me to prove our case—that at the time when the first book of Edward VI. was compiled the book was intended to be a complete description of the ceremonies to be used. But it is very curious indeed to see what the value of this evidence is. It appears that in fact these ministers, Bucer and Fagius, had only just arrived in England two or three days before. This appears in a letter from the first volume of the original letter of the Parker Society, page 332, from Paul Fagius to John Ulstetter, and dated April 26, 1549—precisely the same date as the epistle of Bucer and Fagius. It says, "Much health, my dearest son-in-law. I doubt not but that you are very anxious to learn how and when we arrived in England. You must know, therefore, that on the 18th. of April, under God's guidance, we happily reached Calais, the frontier seaport of England, where we were obliged to remain till the 23d of the same month owing to the roughness of the sea. On that day we crossed the Channel, and reached London on the 25th. We thence proceeded by water to Lambeth, the palace of the Archbishop of Canterbury, who received us with the greatest kindness." Therefore, they reach London on the 25th of April, and this letter I am quoting, as also the letter which is relied upon in the English Church Union case, was dated the very next day, the 26th of April. Surely that is not worth much as evidence of their knowledge?

The next letter to which I shall refer is a letter from John Hooper to Henry Bullinger, which is also set out in the English Church Union case, page 46. It is to be found at page 72 of the original letters, from which I will read it. "The altars are here in many churches changed into tables. The public celebration of the Lord's Supper is very far from the order and institution of our Lord. Although it is "administered in both kinds, yet in some places the supper is celebrated three times a day." It is important to notice here that the Church Union case leaves out about three lines of that, and asserts "that the public celebration of the Lord's Supper is celebrated three times a day"—leaving out the important fact that this was "in some places only" "where they used heretofore to celebrate in the morning the Mass of the Apostles, they now have the Communion of the Apostles; where they had the Mass of the blessed Virgin, they now have the Communion, which they call the Communion of the Virgin; where they had the principal and High Mass, they now have, as they call it, the High Communion. They still retain their vestments and the candles before the altars." I will call your Lordship's attention to this wording. It is "candles before the altars," and not candles upon the altars.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I suppose the original is in Latin, is it not?

(Mr. Droop.) I have not noticed which it was in the original.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It must be—of course the original is in Latin?

(Mr. Droop.) My Lord, I have forgotten to notice what it is in Latin. "In the churches they always chant the hours and other hymns relating to the Lord's Supper." I was going to notice that here the Latin is "quosdam hymnos," which would be "the other hymns;" because the hours are the Matins and Evensong, and "the other hymns" would be those which relate to the Lord's Supper. But that of course is not relative to our present matter of discussion.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Have you furnished the counsel on the other side with a copy of this commission, Mr. Droop?

(Mr. Droop.) I am informed that my learned friends have been furnished with a copy. Hooper goes on "And that Popery may not be lost the mass-priests, although they are compelled to discontinue the use of the Latin language, yet most carefully observe the same tone and manner of chanting to which they were heretofore accustomed in the Papacy. God knows to what perils and anxieties we are exposed by reason of men of this kind."

(The Dean of the Arches.) As far as I have been able to judge from rather a cursory inspection, it would hardly appear that this commission should have had these Injunctions attached to it. It is so very much wider and larger in its scope altogether. It is for the visitation of four dioceses in England giving the visitors full power to correct all bad morals, to remove all clergymen for certain offences, to prove all wills, and to do a great variety of things. Then it says "Injunctiones congruas." As far as I recollect the Injunctions of Edward VI. had nothing to do with that. That would mean congruous to the subject matter of the commission.

(Mr. Droop.) The words are "Injunctiones his presentibus annexas aliasque injunctiones congruas."

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not know whether you have looked at it, but it is very wide indeed. It is giving them absolute power all over England to deprive ministers and to remove them from their benefices; to correct all sins wherever found; and then there is that provision with regard to the administration of wills.

(Dr. Deane.) There is one passage which seemed to me to be sufficient to upset the whole theory, and that was with regard to the administration of wills.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It says "Testamenta insuper quæcumque infra loca prædicta decedentium probandum approbandum et insinuandum administrationes que bonorum eorundem personis idoneis conferendum et committendum"; that is, they are to provide for the proving of all wills, of all administrations throughout the whole of our dioceses.

(Mr. Droop.) There is the same clause in the other commission in Elizabeth's reign. I submit that these Injunctions of Edward VI. are not only issued with regard to lights on the altar but with regard to all possible questions relating to ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Your Lordship will find among other things an Injunction with regard to wills in a passage in Edward VI.'s Injunction at page 18 of Cardwell's Documentary Annals, vol. 1; "Also the money which riseth of fraternities, guilds, and other stocks of the church (except by the King's Majesty's authority be it otherwise appointed) shall be put into the said chest and converted to the said use. And also the rents of lands, the profits of cattle, and money given or bequeathed to the finding of torches, lights, tapers, and lamps, shall be converted to the said use, saving that it shall be lawful for them to bestow part of the said profits upon the reparation of the church if great need require." That part of Edward VI.'s Injunctions is an authority to convert to other uses things that had been left by will; and it seems to me that that shows the Injunctions related to a variety of subjects connected to a certain extent with wills. Your Lordship will remember that in Elizabeth's reign this commission was issued six months before any of her bishops were consecrated and during those six months the Queen's Commissioners must have exercised the whole ecclesiastical authority in the kingdom.

My Lord, I beg to call your attention to this letter of Hooper as complaining of several things, one of them being with regard to the three celebrations of the Communion. It is dated in December 1549. It is material to notice that there is a letter which I think has been already cited, from the Council to Bishop Bonner, the Bishop of London, dated June 1549, which is set out in 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 77, complaining of this very practice of having different communions. It begins "After hearty commendations having very credible notice that within your cathedral church there be as yet the Apostle's Mass, Our Lady's Mass, and other masses of such peculiar name under the defence and nomination of Our Lady's Communion and the Apostle's Communion, used in private chapels, and other remote places of the same, and not in the chancel contrary to the King's Majesty's proceedings." Then they go on to order "That from henceforth no such masses in this manner be in your church any longer used."

(The Dean of the Arches.) How does this bear upon the question of lights, Mr. Droop?

(Mr. Droop.) It shows that this complaint of Hooper's in 1549 applied amongst other things to a practice which the Council had censured as being contrary to the King's Majesty's proceedings, in the previous June. I can show further that Hooper was engaged in the diocese of London at this time, and that Hooper and Latimer were the principal accusers of Bonner; that Bonner was deprived in October 1549 upon accusation made against him by Hooper and Latimer.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes; well, what follows from that?

(Mr. Droop.) What I mean is this, that the whole of this is a description not of what was lawful but of what was unlawful. In 5 Foxe's Acts and Monuments, 762, is an account of the proceedings against Bishop Bonner.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Has that any bearing upon the question of lights?

(Mr. Droop.) It is to verify the statement of mine that Hooper and Latimer were Bonner's accusers, and also that this was one of the charges. "Item, that the rites in the common service of the Church, now set forth, be in some parts of your diocese diversely used; and you knowing or hearing of the same have not called any ministers of the service before you for a redress of such diversity, nor corrected the misusers thereof." It is intended to show that all these acts which Hooper complained of, including the lights, were unlawful acts which Bonner had allowed. Bonner was deprived in October 1549. He then appealed to the King's Council, and that appeal was not settled till the following February, and the new Bishop of London, Ridley, was not appointed till after that.

There is another letter of Bishop Hooper's which has not yet been quoted, and it bears out my contention. It is in the first volume of the original letters, page 79, dated 27th March 1550. He says first, "I have not yet visited my native place, being prevented partly by the danger of the rebellion and tumult in those quarters, and partly by the command of the King that I should advance the Kingdom of Christ here at London." Then he goes on afterwards, "But there has lately been appointed a new Bishop of London, a pious and learned man, if only his new dignity do not change his conduct. He will, I hope, destroy the altars of Baal, as he did heretofore in his Church when he was Bishop of Rochester." This seems to me to show that Hooper was speaking specially with reference to the diocese of London, and also that Bishop Ridley was not appointed till March 1550, which was several months after that letter of Hooper's.

Now, my Lord, in the next place I have to refer to the lights in Queen Elizabeth's chapel. First of all, I notice that these lights were lighted at all the services and not at the Communion only. This appears from the first volume of Strype's Annals, page 298. He is speaking with reference to the 24th of March 1560. "The same day in the afternoon Bishop Barlow (one of King Edward's bishops), now Bishop of Chichester, preached in his habit before the Queen. His sermon ended at 5 o'clock, and presently after her chapel went to Even song; the cross, as before, standing on the altar, and two candlesticks and two tapers burning in them, and service concluded, a good anthem was sung." This shows that the lights were burnt at all the services.

The next thing I propose to show is that the Lutherans at this time had lights in their churches, not only in the Communion Service but in all the services.

(The Dean of the Arches.) How will you make that apply, supposing it be granted that the Lutherans did?

(Mr. Droop.) All I conclude from that is this. We say these lights were burnt in honour of the crucifix, and that they were similar lights to the Lutheran lights, and were not lights connected with the Communion nor with Edward VI.'s Injunctions; and as one step in that argument I propose to show that as Elizabeth had lights not only at the Communion but at all the services, so we find the same practice prevailed in the Lutheran Church then, though not at the present time.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you say they are not used specially for the Holy Communion in the Lutheran Church?

(Mr. Droop.) My impression is that they are now used specially for the Communion.

(The Dean of the Arches.) In all the Lutheran churches in the north of Germany they are.

(Mr. Droop.) Well, my Lord, it is so difficult to lay down any rule, and I know so little about that part of the question—

(The Dean of the Arches.) Well, give me your Lutheran reference.

(Mr. Droop.) The book I was going to quote from was the second volume of Daniel's Codex Liturgicus. It is a collection of a variety of liturgies, and the passage I shall quote is from page 132. It is an order of service for the Marches of the Elector of Brandenburg, issued in 1540, and there is a note, p. 125, stating that very nearly the same service was issued in 1572. Between those two dates of course occurred the lights in Elizabeth's chapel. The words are in German: "Auch sollen die gewöhnlichen Liechter zu den Horis Messen und andern Emptern, auch sonst des Winters zur nottufr gebrandt werden." "Also the usual lights shall be burnt at the hours masses and other services, also otherwise in winter in case of need."

Reference was made in the other case to a passage of Luther's in which he says, "Nec candelas, nec thurificationem prohibemus sed nec exigimus, esto hoc liberum." That passage is taken from an order of Mass which was published by Luther in the year 1523, two years after the Diet of Worms, quite at the beginning of the Reformation; and the words in question are to be found at page 85 of this Codex Liturgicus, with reference to the Gospel, "Sexto sequitur Evangelii lectio ubi nec candelas neque thurificationem prohibemus sed nec exigimus, esto hoc liberum." It is there used with reference to the Gospel and not with reference to any other part of the Communion. And the whole of this, which is called Luther's Formula Missae, is a letter which was written by him to Nicholas Hausman, Bishop of Zwickau, giving him advice how he should conduct the services,—Luther being at this time not in the position of a sovereign prince to settle how the service was to be, but merely giving a recommendation to this bishop, and also I suppose, if it was published, to other bishops, as to how the service was to be conducted, which they might carry out or not as they pleased. I dwell upon this because these words "Ubi nec candelas neque thurificationem prohibemus sed nec exigimus" are supposed to sanction the principle that in the same church there should be a variety of practice according to the discretion of individual ministers. At page 87 of this Codex Liturgicus, it appears that Luther allowed the elevation to take place, "Finita benedictione, chorus cantet sanctus et sub benedictus elevatur panis et calix ritu hactenus servato, vel propter infirmos qui hac repentina hujus insignioris in Missa ritus forte offendentur, praesertim ubi per conciones vernaculas docti fuerint quid ea petitur elevatione." He allows this ceremony of elevation on account of the weak who might be offended.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think I was able to follow that without your translating it.

(Mr. Droop.) I beg your Lordship's pardon. I am afraid I do not speak plain enough, and that is the reason that I ventured to give your Lordship the English of it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I heard you quite plainly.

(Mr. Droop.) Then two or three years afterwards, in 1526, Luther gave another book of recommendations in German, called the Deutsche Messen und Ordnung Gottes Diensts,—your Lordship will find it at page 105 of this same Codex Liturgicus,—a description of the mass for the laity, "Des sonntags fur die Leyen." "Da lassen wyr die Messegewand, altar, liechter noch bleyben bis sie alle werden oeder uns gefellet zu endern, wer aber hie anders wil fuffen, lassen wyr geschehen. Aber ynn der rechten Messe unter eyttel Christen, muste der altar nicht so bleyben, und der priester siche ymer zum volck keren, wie on Zwayffel Christus my abendmal gethan hat. Nu das erharree seyner zeyt." "We allow the Mass dresses, altar, and lights to remain until they all become or it pleases us to alter them, but whoever will do otherwise herein we let him. But in the true Mass among real Christians the altar must not remain so, and the priest must always turn to the people as he doubt Christ did in his supper. Now let that wait its time." A certain amount of stress has been laid on the Lutheran practice as to lights, and I wish to show that Luther only contemplated the practice being continued for a time. As far as I know there is no reference to the lights as connected with the Communion.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I quite see your point.

(Mr. Droop.) It (this book I have been citing from) is a Roman Catholic book, I believe. It is a collection of all the different liturgies of different nations. I believe the author is a Roman Catholic, although I am not quite sure.

Then the next work to which I will call your Lordship's attention is a Discourse of Ceremonies, written by Bishop Andrewes. It is in the volume of Andrewes' works entitled "A pattern of Catechistical Doctrine." It is not numbered. The title is "A Discourse of Ceremonies retained and used in Christian Churches, written by the Right Reverend Father in God, Lancelot Andrewes, late Bishop of Winchester, a little before his death, printed by the original copy written with his own hand." I am going to quote from page 365. It says that this book is "printed from an edition bearing date 1653, with a preface by Edward Leigh, informing us concerning the treatise that upon speech between Bishop Andrewes and a gentleman his near neighbour, about the ceremonies, the bishop awhile after, and a quarter of a year before his death, delivered this to him as a collection of his own upon that subject, which he had not time, he said, to polish and lick over." It is entitled "A discourse showing that many pagan ceremonies were retained in England after christianity was received;" and at page 366 there is a sort of plan of the work, "Because I remember Tully's cognizance, namely, that it is a badge of a negligent and dissolute person not to regard what the most sort of the people may conceive of him, and that conceit is worthily the most heinous which may note any to plant by writing, or water by speaking the cursed roots or seeds of selfspringing paganism. I will first prove that this kind of birth of our ceremonies can be no disgrace to our ecclesiastical ceremonies. Secondly, I will insinuate three observations to be remembered out of the particular proposition proved. Thirdly, I will point at some of the superfluous and wicked popish ceremonies drawn from the heathens. Fourthly, and lastly, I will instance in many ecclesiastical ceremonies of the heathens which are or may be used in ours or in any other christian state." Well, now I come to page 370, and I find this, "The superfluous and wicked ceremonies of the Papists." He begins "But I am bound to point at some of the superfluous and wicked ceremonies of the Papists borrowed from the heathen." Then he instances several, for instance, the popish purgatory. Then he says, "The Papistical manner of consecrating churches and church-yards fully imitated the ceremonies of the pagans, when they consecrated their temples and temples, courts, or yards . . . at the beginning of the consecration of a church, they must make three crosses at the last part thereof." Then he mentions "the sprinkling of holy water." Then he goes on to say that the placing lights in churches at some times is not altogether a heathenish ceremony." Then he goes on "But their burning of tapers in their churches at noon day is altogether a pagan custom, as Rhenanus well observes in his comment upon Tertullian." I wish to point out that this burning of tapers at noon day is classed by Bishop Andrewes as among the superfluous and wicked ceremonies of the Papists borrowed from the heathen.

I do not think there is any doubt with regard to this book, but as all that is known of it is that it was published in 1653 as Bishop Andrewes'. I was going to notice one or two of the other ceremonies which he says are taken from the heathen, but may be lawfully used. For instance, at page 381 he enumerates these:—"To judge of marriages, of sanctuaries, to consecrate churches and places of burial." He distinguishes between the Papistical mode of consecrating churches and the mode which he approves.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Surely that is a little wide of the mark, is it not?

(Mr. Droop.) The only reason I wished to make this observation was to show that I had looked and considered whether it was Bishop Andrewes's work or not, and also of course in order that your Lordship might, if there was any question made about it, judge of its authenticity.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You cite it as Bishop Andrewes's authority, against burning candles at noon day.

(Mr. Droop.) Yes, and to show that he says it is a superstitious and Papistical thing. Amongst other things which are to be allowed, he mentions (p. 386) processions on the Rogation Day, and praying looking towards the east, and so on; and I cite this as showing that this book corresponds with Bishop Andrewes's known views.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Nobody says that it is not Bishop Andrewes'.

(Mr. Droop.) Of course if it is Bishop Andrewes and published by him, it seems to me to prove that he and his friends did not use these lighted candles.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, it is for that purpose you cite it, as I understand.

(Mr. Droop.) Yes, my Lord. The next passage I was going to refer to is a passage in 5 Cosin's works, page 440, upon the subject of lights. It is part of a third series of notes of which the date is not very certain. The manuscript is not extant but they seem to be contemporary with the second series. "Among other ornaments of the Church also then in use in the second year of Edward VI., there were two lights appointed by his Injunctions (which the Parliament had authorized him to make and whereof otherwhiles they made mention as acknowledging them to be binding,) to be set upon the high altar, as a significant ceremony of the light which Christ's Gospel brought into the world; and this at the same time, when all other lights and tapers, superstitiously set before images, were by the same Injunctions, with many other absurd ceremonies and superfluities, taken away. These lights were (by virtue of this present Rubric, referring to what was in use in the second of Edward VI.,) afterwards continued in all the Queen's chapels during her whole reign." Your Lordship will remember my learned friend Mr. Stephens has proved that in Queen Elizabeth's chapel the candles were not lighted after 1563. And so they are in the King's chapel and in many cathedral churches besides the chapels of divers noblemen, bishops, and colleges to this day. It was well known that the Lord Treasurer Burleigh (who was no friend to superstition or Popery) used them constantly in his chapel with other ornaments of fronts, palls, and books upon his altar. The like did Bishop Andrewes, who was a man who knew well what he did, and as free from Popish superstition as any in the Kingdom besides." This is written a few years before or a few years after this treatise of Bishop Andrewes which I have cited about lighted candles; and it appears to me that this isolated passage in favour of there being lighted candles generally used—

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think I have been referred to it. I have got a note of it and I have taken down your note, but I think I had a note of it before.

(Mr. Droop.) I think my friend cited it before. What I was going to say was this, that the lights were not lighted candles, but candles. The lights are here spoken of as ornaments. It is said "The Lord Treasurer Burleigh used them with other ornaments of fronts, palls, and books upon his altar." At page 440, which I am now quoting, it says "when all other lights and tapers superstitiously set before images." At page 231 there is another passage very similar where it is said "whereby all other wax lights and tapers, which in former terms of superstition men were wont to place before their shrines and images of saints"—which seems to show that the term "lights" was used for wax lights in both these cases. The phrase "lights" seems to come out of King Edward's Injunctions. There seems to have been a theory about this time amongst some high churchmen, amongst some of those who were bound to defend the introduction of candles into cathedrals (which of course were introduced by Laud) that the Injunctions of Edward VI. authorized not lighted candles but candles. I wish to call your Lordship's attention to a passage which seems to be directed against this theory in Fuller's Church History, page 308.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think I know the passage.

(Mr. Droop.) "On this account in the third Injunction they, the Reformers, reduced candles formerly sans number to two upon the high altar before the Sacrament, these being termed lights shows that they were not lumina cæca but burning." It seems from this passage that there was a theory that those words in the Injunction of Edward VI. could be used for unlighted candles.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No doubt there was that theory.

(Mr. Droop.) And it appears that Cosin in speaking of these Injunctions is speaking all the time of unlighted candles. There is another passage in Cosin's works, page 441, after the passage I have read. It goes on "In the latter end of King Edward's time they used them in Scotland itself as appears by Calvin's epistle to Knox and his fellow reformers there, anno 1554, epistle 206, where he takes exception against them for following the custom of England." With reference to that I propose to cite from Gorham's Reformation Gleanings, the translation of the letter which he refers to. It is printed in the early editions of Calvin.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What letter?

(Mr. Droop.) Cosin says that "in the latter end of Edward's time they used them in Scotland itself as appears from Calvin's epistle to Knox." I was only going to call your Lordship's attention to this, that the letter was in fact not written to Knox but to Dr. Richard Coxe and his associate at Frankfort, and for that purpose I was about to refer you to Gorham's Reformation Gleanings, page 345. I have not got the book here but your Lordship will remember this same letter from Calvin to Coxe has been cited by my learned friend Mr. Stephens from "The Troubles of Frankfort."

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think he also cited from Gorham's Reformation Gleanings.

(Mr. Droop.) He did cite one passage from Gorham's Reformation Gleanings, but not this passage. What I mean, my Lord, is this: if Cosin had been familiar with the early history of the Reformation, and with the Puritan writings of Elizabeth's reign, he would not have fallen into this mistake.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You think too much reliance has been placed upon Bishop Cosin, as I understand.

(Mr. Droop.) Yes, my Lord. The letter which my learned friend cited before from Gorham's Reformation Gleanings was a letter from Bishop Parkhurst in 1568, describing how the crucifix was destroyed in Elizabeth's chapel. Of course there were the candles and the crucifix there; there were the two candles which had been lighted in honour of the crucifix; then when the crucifix was destroyed the two candles alone remained; and it seems to me most probable that this is the origin of the candles in our other churches. They were retained also in James I.'s chapel, and your Lordship remembers also that they were unlighted tapers in Bishop Andrewes' chapel, and then Laud thought fit to introduce them into all cathedral churches.

My next reference to Bishop Cosin, to show that there can be no doubt of his views on this subject, will be to his Visitation Articles, 1662, 4 Cosin's Works, page 508, in which among other things he inquires, "Have you likewise a book of sermons or homilies that were set forth in the time of King Edward VI., and in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, together with the works of Bishop Jewel in defence of the Church of England, which King James commanded to be had in all churches." Before calling attention to what Bishop Jewel says upon this subject, or to what his works contain rather, I will refer your Lordship to the second volume of Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 160. It is a letter from Archbishop Bancroft, dated 1610, in which he says, "Twelfthly, I have been content that all Bishop Jewel's works should be printed "together in one volume, to the end that every parish in England might have one of them."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Does Bishop Jewel say anything about lights?

(Mr. Droop.) Yes, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Because you need not trouble yourself to show that he was much considered in the Church of England. Of course he was; we all know that.

(Mr. Droop.) I mean his works seem to have been considered as next thing to the Homilies. His works were the only books that were publicly kept in churches excepting the Homilies.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Erasmus's Dialogues were also, were they not?

(Mr. Droop.) Yes, Erasmus's Paraphrases were no doubt, but I imagine there are things in that which are not in accordance with our own present doctrines.

(The Dean of the Arches.) They were ordered in the Injunctions?

(Mr. Droop.) They were ordered in the Injunctions of Edward VI. before the Reformation.

(The Dean of the Arches.) They were ordered in the later Injunctions, were not they?

(Mr. Droop.) Yes, also I think in Elizabeth's Injunctions; but what I am going to quote from is Jewel's Apology and Defence. First, Harding says this concerning ceremonies, at page 176:—"If ye shew us not the use of chrism in your churches, if the sign of the cross be not borne before you in processions and other wheres used, if holy water be abolished, if lights at the Gospel and Communion be not had, if peculiar vestments for deacons, priests, bishops, be taken away, and many such other the like, judge ye whether ye have duly kept the old ceremonies of the Church."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is what Harding says to Jewel?

(Mr. Droop.) That is what Harding says to Jewel.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What does Jewel answer?

(Mr. Droop.) I have only got an extract from Jewel's answer, where he replies, "Verily, Mr. Harding, we hate not any of all these things. For we know they are the creatures of God. But you have so misused them, or rather so defiled and bewrayed them with your superstitions, and so have with the same mocked and deceived God's people, that we can no longer continue them without great conscience." Then there is another passage, which I have not got here, in the next page of Jewel, a long passage about lighted candles.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Can you show me any authority of Jewel or anybody else who says that they are illegal?

(Mr. Droop.) No, but that they are disused.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, I believe that is the result of the investigation.

(Mr. Droop.) And this, my Lord, was written by Jewel in 1567, four years after the Queen discontinued the use of them. I quoted this passage from the 1st volume of Keble's edition of Hooker, page 432.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You have given me the reference to Jewel's Apology, pages 176 and 178.

(Mr. Droop.) Yes, I wish to quote Keble's observation upon it. "This passage refers to the ceremonies omitted, and not to those retained in the English Church." I quote that as the opinion of Keble in 1841, at a time when he had been carefully editing Hooker, and must have studied all these Elizabethan writers, showing that the impression at that time on his mind was that these lights at the Gospel and Communion, and the other things enumerated, were not in use in our Church.

I have something to say, my Lord, with reference to the interpretation of the Injunctions of 1547, and those canons in Lyndwood, I mean with regard to the theory which has been put forward that the Injunctions referred to the lights authorized by the canon. But if your Lordship would allow me, it would be much more convenient to me to go on to the mixed chalice and return to this subject afterwards.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not want to interrupt you, but you must remember all these points have been argued at great length.

(Mr. Droop.) I hope I have not wasted your Lordship's time much as yet?

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is not my time, Mr. Droop.

(Mr. Droop.) Well, my Lord, the first thing I was going to refer your Lordship to, is a passage which has been cited to some extent. It is from Fulke's Defence of the Translation of the Bible. As your Lordship knows he was master of Pembroke, and it is the answer to a book by Gregory Martin. At page 522 Gregory Martin complains that certain words had been altered in the Bible and that certain words from Proverbs had been altered in our English translations; and he says, "But the Protestants accounting it an idle superstitious ceremony, here also frame their translation accordingly, suppressing altogether this mixture or mingling and instead thereof saying 'She hath drawn her wine' and 'drink the wine that I have drawn.'" He asserts that this passage in Proverbs was a prophecy of the mixture of the water with the wine. This is a comment upon the different translations of the Bible. He accuses the English Protestants of having left out this mention of the mixture; with reference to that Fulke says:—"It had been to be wished that St. Cyprian when he goeth about to prove the necessity of wine in the celebration of the Lord's Supper against the heretics called aquarii that contended for only water, had retained the precise institution of Christ, in wine only, which the Scripture mentioneth, and not allowed them a mixture of water." Then he goes on afterwards to refer to the passage in Scripture and says, "In the Scripture we find 'the fruit of the vine,' water we find not." There is a passage of the same kind in Becon's works, a book written at the beginning of Elizabeth's reign, "a comparison between the Lord's Supper and the Pope's Mass," in Becon's Prayers, page 359, where he quotes this passage about the fruit of the vine, "I will not drink hereafter, saith he, of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I shall drink it with you, new, in the kingdom of my Father." Then he says, "The Mass monger useth not pure wine in his sacrifice, but wine mingled with water, contrary to the institution of Christ."

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think that was cited to me by Mr. Stephens?

(Mr. Droop.) I cite it partly for the purpose of pointing out that this text, which both Fulke and Becon rely upon, had been constantly referred to in the argument against transubstantiation. For instance, in this same work of Becon's, at page 369, he says:—"Now as concerning the wine, the matter is more manifest, clear, evident, and open than any man need to doubt of it. For after the words of consecration (as I may speak after the manner of the Papists) Christ called the sanctified wine the fruit of the vine. He would not surely so have termed it if there had been such a transubstantiation as the monstrous Papists feign. 'I will not drink after this,' saith he, 'of this fruit of the vine,' &c. This same text about the 'fruit of the vine' occurs wherever our Reformers have to argue the question of transubstantiation. What I mean, your Lordship, is, I can give your Lordship a reference, for instance, to Cranmer's Lord's Supper, page 243, in his answer to Gardiner:—"By these words it is clear that it was very wine that the apostles drank at that godly supper. For the blood of Christ is not the fruit of the vine, nor the accidents of wine, nor none other thing is the fruit of the vine, but the very wine only." Then in Ridley's works, page 204, he has laid down that the wine is not transubstantiated into blood, and to prove that proposition he says this "is proved out of the authority of God's Word, in Matthew and Mark: 'I will not drink of the fruit of the vine,' &c. Now the fruit of the vine was wine, which Christ drank and gave

"to his disciples to drink." Then there is a similar passage in Jewel's controversy with Harding, 2 Jewel, page 795. And there is a similar passage again in Rogers on the 39 Articles, page 285. Then, on the same subject of the mixture of water with the wine, I will refer your Lordship to Rogers on the 39 Articles, page 294. It is a comment upon the 30th Article:—"The cup of the Lord is not to be denied to the lay people; for both the parts of the Lord's Sacrament, by Christ's ordinance and commandment, ought to be ministered to all Christian men." Rogers says, "What impudency, then, yea, what impiety do they show, which alter this ordinance of God." Then he specifies various ways of altering it:—"Some by adding thereunto; so added was . . . unto the wine warm water by the Muscovites." And again, "The Papists, though they use both kinds, yet they always deny the cup unto the people." And also, "The Papists make a mixture of wine and water." I also wish to refer your Lordship to the 19th Article:—"The visible Church of Christ is a congregation of faithful men, in which the pure Word of God is preached and the Sacraments be duly ministered, according to Christ's ordinance in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same." The passages I have cited from Fulke and Becon and Rogers show that there was a considerable party in the Church of England at this time who considered that the mixing of the water with the wine was contrary to the institution of Christ.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No doubt there was a considerable party.

(Mr. Droop.) My contention is this; that supposing they were to hold that these words, "The visible Church of Christ is a congregation of faithful men . . . in which the Sacraments be duly ministered according to Christ's ordinance in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same"—supposing they were to hold that it was essential to Christ's ordinance that there should be no mixture of water with the wine, they would consider that the Church of England was not a pure church if that practice were carried on within it, and would refuse to communicate with it. It seems to me that that explains to a certain extent the reason why there was this alteration in the second book, namely, the omission of the direction to mix a little water with the wine. Because, supposing they had insisted upon the use of wine with the water either in the Church of England generally or in any particular parish, then a certain number of the people would have refused to communicate, because they would say that this mixture of water with the wine was contrary to Christ's institution. Therefore, in order to have a service which all Protestants in the Church of England might acquiesce in, it was essential that the order should be for pure wine, and not wine and water. Besides, this also shows that it was considered at that time a matter of great importance whether there should be wine or wine and water; and that makes it highly improbable that it should ever have been left ambiguous or left at the option of each minister, as has been contended, whether he should use wine or wine and water. Then again, these works of Fulke and Rogers and Becon were all circulated in the Church of England, and well known. I believe, as regards Rogers' work, that till Burnet's book on the Articles, his was the only work on that subject. I am not aware of any other previous work. This work of Rogers's, which is dedicated to Archbishop Bancroft, must have had a very wide circulation; and supposing any clergyman in the Church of England had at that time practised the mixture of water with the wine openly, so as to have been discovered by his congregation, there would have been a great outcry. And yet we do not hear a word about this practice. There has been a great deal of pains taken to search up any irregularities that have been committed by clergymen of the Church of England, and to bring forward all the Puritan complaints about those irregularities; but I have not seen yet any complaint about this mixing of water with the wine.

It is material for this purpose to notice what no doubt your Lordship is well aware of, that at this time the attendance of each parishioner at his own parish church was practically enforced. For instance, in the visitations of Laud for the diocese of London—

(The Dean of the Arches.) You need not trouble yourself about that. There is no doubt it was enforced, and that every one who did not attend his own parish church was required to be presented.

(Mr. Droop.) Then, my Lord, in the next place I was going to call your attention to Bishop Andrews' answer to Cardinal Perron, contained in Andrews' minor works, for the purpose of showing that in his public writings Bishop Andrews treated the mixed chalice, the use of incense, and also the practice of washing hands at the time of Communion, as contrary to the use of the Church of England. It is clear—we have admitted it—that Andrews used the mixed chalice and incense in his private chapel; it does appear, also, that he used the washing of his hands before the Communion. But, at page 7 of this book, the chapter of Cardinal Perron is given, which Andrews answered. We find he gives a long list of doctrines and practices, which he alleges were held by the Church in the time of Augustine, and of the four councils. Bishop Andrews goes through all these points seriatim.

(The Dean of the Arches.) If you will give me a reference (and it won't interfere with your argument) I will look at it, unless you want to cite the passage?

(Mr. Droop.) I want to cite some passages. He specifies these practices, and also those in which the Church of England differs, and at page 9 you will find "Cardinal Perron says, 'Une Eglise qui tenoit le meslange de l'eau avec le vin au sacrifice de l'Eucharistie pour chose necessaire et de tradition divine et apostolique.'" The Church of the first four Councils holds that. Then Andrewes, at page 25, pooh poohs it as a matter of no importance. Pages 35 and 36 are those to which I wish to call your Lordship's attention, chiefly where he sums up. "Of the ten left wherein we vary," he classes among them "the mixture of water with the wine." As for "the washing of hands and the use of incense," those are included by Cardinal Perron among a long list of other ceremonies, which he says were used by the Church of the first four Councils. That will be found at page 11 of this book, marginal number 25. Then, at page 30, Bishop Andrews deals with all these ceremonies,—13 or 14 of them,—all classed under this No. 25; and of three of them he says: "1. Distinction of holidays, we hold it; 2. Distinction of habit between clergy and laymen, we hold it; 3. Distinction of vessels, our Church holds it." He then goes on to the others, and says: "(6.) Washing of the priest's hands before his going to the Eucharist. A very high point, which in civility might be used, but not made a tenet written in the forehead of the Church;" and, "(13.) For burning of incense. The place of Chrysostom is cited amiss. '&c.'" In each case he rather pooh-poohs the matter—both the washing of hands and incense. Then, at pages 35 and 36, where the list of ceremonies is given, he begins with this No. 25, and he says: "In some points of the other we agree," and specifies the three first points of No. 25; and then he goes on to "the ten left wherein we vary." No. 25 is "matters of ceremony at large;" so that this is a statement by Andrewes that the Church of England varies from the Church of Rome upon these points: first, the mixture of water with the wine; secondly, the washing of hands; thirdly, the use of incense. I need not quote Andrews' Visitation Articles to show that he held the same views on uniformity that Laud and others did. I believe they have been cited already.

If the mixed chalice, the washing of hands, and the use of incense had been exceptional usages which were allowed by the Acts of Uniformity, Andrewes would have said so. This cannot, as it seems to me, be explained away by saying that Bishop Andrews was speaking of the common use of the Church; for we find that wherever he was not fettered by the Act of Uniformity, he does not scruple to attribute to the Church the High Church views which he said some of his friends held and practised. He says (p. 35) "Of which eight we differ not in five of them. We hold it after a lawful vow unlawful to marry . . . . We hold succession not to be interrupted."

Then he says, "Of the 16 left, which are matters of outward practice, in six we differ not. . . . . (5.) We grant the Eucharist a sacrifice. (6.) We are not against altars, we have them. . . . . (11.) We fast Fridays and Saturdays, yet not Christmas Day if it fall on them."

Some of these doctrines which he adopts as "doctrines which we hold" are doctrines peculiar to himself and the extreme High Church party.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You see you can hardly blow hot and cold at the same time, Mr. Droop; you can hardly cite Bishop Andrews as your authority, and then cite him as not your authority for another purpose. You must make up your mind whether you will rely upon him or not.

(Mr. Droop.) All I wish to contend for is this, that in matters where he was bound by the Acts of Uniformity he says, "These practices forbidden by the Acts of Uniformity are not matters in use in the Church of England." On the other hand, on matters of doctrine where he considers himself at liberty to hold and express his own views, there he indulges in the utmost liberty, and the views that he expresses are High Church views.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Where you agree with him you cite him, where you disagree with him you do not cite him.

(Mr. Droop.) I beg your Lordship's pardon. I cite this book for the purpose of showing that it was not a publicly recognized practice to mix water with the wine in the Church of England, and that in a book which was openly written for publication by Bishop Andrews he treats it as not in use in the Church of England, and entirely ignores his own private practice, but where he was not bound by the Articles or the Acts of Uniformity he adopts doctrines allowed by the Church of England though they be not doctrines of the Church of England; I mean they are not doctrines which everybody must hold, but they are doctrines which are allowable; there I say Bishop Andrews uses his liberty of stating the doctrines according to his own views. But where he is bound by the Act of Uniformity he abstains from hinting even that there is any diversity of practice whatever.

(The Dean of the Arches.) This answer to Cardinal Perron was not published in Bishop Andrews' lifetime, but about three years after his death by Bishop Laud and another bishop.

(Mr. Droop.) I was going on to say that there is no evidence that Bishop Andrews's use of the mixed chalice was publicly known. His notes of the Prayer Book which describe what he did were not published then, they were published by Nichols in 1710. The list of the ornaments in his chapel was produced by Prynne, at Laud's trial, long after his death. Then there is the so-called Form of Consecration of a Church in Andrews' pattern of Catechistical doctrine. It is not drawn out for his own guidance, or for the guidance of other bishops, but it is merely an account of the way in which a particular church was consecrated. There is a relation in it about the founder, and a long account of the church, and this Form of Consecration was not published till 1659, Andrews having died in 1626.

Of course, I presume, Bishop Andrews himself had a form for consecrating churches; we know that he had, Archbishop Laud mentions it. But there is no evidence that we have that there was any mention of the mixing of water with the wine in the form which Bishop Andrews himself used. The information comes to us entirely from this other account.

I am now, my Lord, going to pass to another subject, the subject of elevation. It was denied, to my considerable surprise, in the other case that the elevation according to the Roman Service, or the Sarum Missal, during the Prayer of Consecration was for the purpose of adoration. I may say in the Roman Missal in the Ritus Celebrandi Missam, c. 8, sec. 5, there is a distinct direction after the saying of the words "Hoc est enim corpus meum." "Quibus prolati, celebrans tenens Hostiam inter pollices et indices prædictos super altare, reliquis manuum digitis extensis et simul junctis (et Hostiis, si plures sint consecratæ in loco, in quo a principio Missæ positæ sunt, super corporale vel in alio vase aut calice demissis) genuflexus eam adorât: tunc se erigens, quantum commode potest, elevat in altum Hostiam, et intentis in eam oculis (quod et in elevatione calicis facit) populo reverenter ostendit adorandum." So that according to the Roman Missal there is a distinct direction for adoration.

(Dr. Deane.) What Rubric are you reading?

(Mr. Droop.) It is the Ritus Celebrandi Missam, 8th cap., "De Canone Missæ usque ad Consecrationem," and it is the 5th section. With reference to the old Sarum Missal that was the same, and I will just cite two passages from the notes to Maskell's Ancient Liturgies. One at page 95 is "Sacerdos vero quilibet frequenter doceat plebem suam ut cum in celebratione missarum elevatur hostia salutaris se reverenter inclinet. Stat. Synod. Norwic. Episc. A.D. 1257." Then at page 98 there is another passage which is an extract from 2 Wilkins' Concilia, "The Synod of Exeter, A.D. 1287, has a canon upon this point: "Quia vero per hæc verba, Hoc est enim corpus meum, et non per alia, panis transubstantiatur in corpus Christi, prius hostiam non leveat sacerdos, donec ista plene protulerit verba, ne pro creatore creatura a populo veneretur." This is a canon providing that the consecrated wafer is not to be elevated till the consecration words have been pronounced, in order that the people may not worship by mistake. It seems to me to show not only that the elevation was for the purpose of adoration, but also that there was no other purpose in this elevation. On the same point, your Lordship will allow me to cite an extract, which I have made from the Manual of the Church of Sarum. It is a note upon these words, "Qui pridie quod pateretur." "Hic erigit sacerdos manus et conjungit et postea tergit digitos et elevat hostiam parumper ita quod non videatur a populo, et sic debet tenere quousque dixerit verba consecrationis; quia si ante consecrationem elevatus et populo ostendatur sacerdotes sicut fatui faciunt populum idolatrie adorandum panem purum tantum corpus Christi et in hoc peccat." The elevation is not to be above the head until after the words of consecration, because if it is, the people will at once begin to adore.

(The Dean of the Arches.) All this subject was really gone into at very great length?

(Mr. Droop.) Yes, but there are two or three passages quoted in the other case, on the other side, as to which I wish to show that my friends were wrong. The first passage was quoted from Ridley's works, 237, as is contained in Mr. Perry's "Declaration on Kneeling," page 58. The passage was, "We adore and worship Christ in the Eucharist, and if you mean the external Sacrament, I say that also is to be worshipped as a Sacrament." It was urged that the meaning of that was, that the Sacrament was to be worshipped. The previous context is this: Ridley says, "We do handle the signs reverently, but we worship the Sacrament as a Sacrament, not as a thing signified by the Sacrament. Glyn—What is the symbol of the Sacrament? Ridley—Bread. Glyn—Ergo, we worship bread? Ridley—There is a deceit in this word 'adoramus.' We worship the symbols when reverently we handle them. We worship Christ wheresoever we perceive his benefits, but we understand his benefits to be greatest in the Sacrament." Therefore worship to the Sacrament means reverently handling.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is no charge of adoration in this case, and I am not going into that question.

(Mr. Droop.) No, there is no charge of adoration, but at the same time if we can show, not adoration, but, as your Lordship said before, that practically the elevation above the head is an elevation for the purpose of adoration, that in the old Roman Catholic Church, and also in the present Roman Catholic Church, we have adoration associated with it, if we can prove that among those persons who recommend it, now a great many do it for the purpose of adoration, then, I think, it has a material bearing.

There is another passage which was cited on the other side, namely, the well-known letter of Bishop Guest to Cecil, and that letter is given in Perry's Declaration on Kneeling, page 193. He refers in a note to that letter to Guest's Treatise against Private Masses, published in 1548, and quotes a passage which contains rather ambiguous language. With reference to that, your Lordship is aware that Bishop Guest has been quoted as the person who holds certain views which it is contended are lawful in the Church of England. This Treatise on Private Masses, published by Bishop Guest in 1548, contains several passages very strong indeed in our favour. For instance, this passage at page 121 of Dugdale's Life of Guest: "But Augustyn meaneth by the worshipping of Christe's flesh no soch worshipp as honouring, praying, crouching, or kneeling thereunto, but only the worthy, reverent, and holisome receypte and eating of the said fleshe. For the honour due and requisite to the said fleshe or Sacrament therof, is to receyve them as Christ instituted them to be received, that is to wete with pure fyeth cleasid conscience, wyth unfayned repentaunce, charitie and thankesgeving, with full desyre and purpose to be fedde with Christe's flesh, to be thereby mortefyed too syn and sanctified to be embodied to Christe, and not to crouch before the bred, to his fleshe, or to worshipping, invoke, and sollicite him as present in or under the bred." Then there is this passage (page 119): "To this I answer, albeit Christ was worshypful and prayeable as beyng emonge us whyle he was sensiblye conversant with us; by reason he as God and men was then seable emong us and unassended to heaven; Hovbeit for so moch as he is now become both invisible emonge us and resydent in heaven on hys father's ryght hand, he is both honourable and prayable but in heaven alone, and not in ye erth and consecrate bred and wine; for whi to worship him in, under, or before ye sayd bred and wyne is to worshyp the same bred and wyne. As to worship God in, under, or before, an ymage is to reverence the ymage selve, which is an unsufferable ydolatre and also disalowed by ye Kynges Majestie's proceding."

The next subject I will deal with relates to certain exceptional cases which were alleged to be exceptions to our Acts of Uniformity. The first one is the case of the Manual Acts. Your Lordship will remember that in the first book of Edward VI., there were Rubrics directing certain manual acts to be done to the bread and wine which were omitted in the second book. In the first Book of Edward VI., there are two crosses at the words "bless" and "sanctify these thy gifts," two great crosses which seem to denote that the crosses were to be made, and then the words, "here the Priest is to take the bread into his hands," and "here to take the cup into his hands," but there is nothing about breaking the bread or pouring the wine out, or laying his hand upon the bread. It has been asked whether we could show anywhere that there was any prohibition of this practice. Now in Archbishop Grindal's Injunctions (1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, p. 369), crossing is mentioned among the ceremonies to be discontinued: "Nor should use at the administration of the Communion any gestures, rites, or ceremonies, not appointed by the Book of Common Prayer, as crossing, or breathing over the sacramental bread or wine, nor any showing or lifting up of the same to the people to be by them worshipped or adored, nor any such like." Then there is the same at page 399 in Grindal's Visitation Articles for Canterbury.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think Mr. Stephens cited both those passages to me?

(Mr. Droop.) Not with reference to this particular matter, my Lord. He cited this passage originally, but he did not cite it as a prohibition of the manual acts.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No, he did not, of course.

(Mr. Droop.) I cite it as a prohibition of crossing.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Your argument, as I understand it, with regard to these manual acts, is that they were absolutely unlawful till the Act of Charles II.

(Mr. Droop.) Yes, and that they were recognized as unlawful in Queen Elizabeth's reign. I do not say that they were recognized as unlawful at the time of Charles I.

(The Dean of the Arches.) "The acts which are now commanded to be done by the Rubric to the Holy Communion were, by reason of their omission in the second Prayer Book of Edward VI., illegal throughout the whole of that period." That is what I understand you to contend for?

(Mr. Droop.) Yes, my Lord. The next passage I have to cite is from Perry's Lawful Church Ornaments, page 225. It is a quotation of some injunctions of Bishop Parkhurst in 1561. "Item, that they neither suffer the Lord's table to be hanged and decked like an altar, neither use any gestures of the Popish Mass in the time of ministration of the Communion, as shifting of the book, washing, breathing, crossing, or such like."

(The Dean of the Arches.) What do you cite that for?

(Mr. Droop.) Also to prove that crossing was unlawful.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is no charge of crossing here?

(Mr. Droop.) What I wish to prove is that the manual acts are unlawful.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But do you prove it by that passage you have just cited?

(Mr. Droop.) I believe I shall be able to show it in time. I have got one or two other passages to quote which will illustrate it. In the first book of Edward VI. there are two great crosses, which are directions to cross, and then besides that there is the Rubric directing the priest to take into his hands the bread, and another Rubric with regard to the wine, and one essential point of my argument is this, that these directions in Edward's book are completely different from those in the present book. Crossing is contained in the first book and is left out now, and on the other hand the breaking of the bread was left out in Edward's first book, and was unlawful as I shall contend under that book, but that is lawful now. I cite this passage of Grindal's, and also this other passage to show that crossing was specified as a thing that was illegal to be done in the Communion. It is, "To use the gestures of the Popish Mass in the administration of the Communion, as shifting the book, washing, breathing, crossing, and such like." It seems to me that that is pointed against a continuance of this very practice of crossing which had been enjoined by Edward's first book and left out afterwards.

(The Dean of the Arches.) This is rather remote, is it not? What you are trying to prove is that there is some prohibition of the manual acts which are now rightly done under the Rubric of present Prayer Book. What you are trying to prove is that there is some prohibition of the manual acts in the interim, not of crossing, but of those particular manual acts which are now lawful. You are citing this, as I understand you, to prove to me that manual acts which are now ordered were prohibited as illegal between the first book and the book of Charles II.

(Mr. Droop.) Yes, crossing was one of those manual acts, and taking into the hands was another; breaking of bread was not at that time.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But do you prove that taking the bread into the hand was unlawful, by citing a passage which says that crossing was unlawful?

(Mr. Droop.) Well, I prove the unlawfulness of crossing by citing this passage. Whether the other was unlawful—

(The Dean of the Arches.) But that is the point, is not it?

(Mr. Droop.) It is the point, but if I find there are two things in Edward's first book with regard to the consecration of the bread, one crossing, and the other taking the bread—

(The Dean of the Arches.) And if you show one of them is forbidden, and the other not forbidden, would not the inference be that the other was allowed?

(Mr. Droop.) These are Injunctions referring to the principal things, and I think I shall be able to satisfy your Lordship that crossing was the principal thing.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Really I have no doubt crossing was a very important thing, but there is no question before me about crossing.

(Mr. Droop.) The suggestion is that these manual acts were lawful because they were practised by Bishop Cosin, and others of his time, and I wish to show that—

(The Dean of the Arches.) The suggestion was not quite that. As I understood it it was this,—that it was pushing the doctrine to the utmost extent to say that everything that was not permitted expressly was prohibited; and as an illustration of that it was said, according to that doctrine, the actual breaking of the bread, and pouring out of the wine, ordered in the Communion, was illegal during that 100 years between Edward's first book and the date of the present book. I do not see how your citation bears upon it?

(Mr. Droop.) These particular things of the breaking of the bread, and pouring out of the wine—

(The Dean of the Arches.) If you could show me that during that interval there were Visitation Articles which forbade these things to be done, which are now ordered by the Rubric, then you would be helping your argument; but showing me that something else was forbidden which is not permitted at the present time does not, as it appears to me, assist you.

(Mr. Droop.) My position is this, that crossing was used as a general term.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The Injunctions do not specify the things in the present Rubric?

(Mr. Droop.) They do not specify the things used at the present moment, certainly.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Well, but that is the whole question.

(Mr. Droop.) I was going to quote from Bishop Pilkington's works an answer to a Roman Catholic pamphlet, page 634 of Pilkington. The Roman Catholic says, "The Catholic Church, which we professed at our baptism to believe and obey, teacheth us to receive Christ's body consecrate at Mass, with prayers, invocations, and benediction, with the sign of the holy cross, and not bare bread and wine without consecration and benediction, as is used in this Communion, being against the decrees and ordinance of Christ's Catholic Church." To this Pilkington answers, "Ye lie in saying that the Catholic Church teaches to receive Christ's body consecrate at Mass with the sign of the holy cross, or that we give nothing but bare bread and wine now. Prove where the Church teaches so. I proved afore, how many diverse sorts of administering there was of old time, and all good, therefore this your one only Popish way is not decreed by the universal Church, nor never was generally received throughout all the world. With what face can they say we have no consecration, and give nothing but bare bread and wine? If they have any in their Mass, if the Evangelists have any consecration, or Paul, or if the Apostles, we have it also. For if consecration stand in words, we have all the words that their Mass, the Gospel, St. Paul, or the Apostles had." Then he goes on, "Where is one so mad, except priests, to say that consecration stands in crossing, or that "benedicite is to make a cross? Prove it, if ye can, "or else hold your tongue for shame." The next passage is a passage from a book of Fulke's, another volume of the Parker Society's books, called Fulke's Answer to Martiall. The passage I am going to quote is from page 167. Fulke is speaking of Martiall's attempt to prove that the sign of the cross was used to consecrate the body and blood of Christ. He says, "The long discourse that followeth of blessing, and giving of thanks is needless, for we know and confess that as they sometimes signify all one thing, so they differ sometimes; and we confess that the bread and wine in the Lord's Supper were blessed, that is to say, sanctified and consecrated, but not with any sign of hand, which is the matter in question, but with the Word of God and with prayer; not only as bodily meats, but as heavenly and spiritual mysteries to feed the soul."

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think it may well be conceded that, during this time, there were many prohibitions as to crossing. I should not think you need labour that.

(Mr. Droop.) What I wish to show is that the crossing and any other ceremonial acts during the Prayer of Consecration were forbidden.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You have shown that crossing and some other ceremonial acts were forbidden, but you have not shown that the things permitted by the present Rubric were forbidden. They may have been under the general title of crossing, but to show that other things were forbidden does not advance your argument. You must show that these things were forbidden, not other things.

(Mr. Droop.) I have another passage here from Mr. Perry's Declaration on Kneeling, page 203. There is another long letter besides that of Bishop Guest.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What does it prove?

(Mr. Droop.) It says this, "The Papist thinketh that we have no consecration because we speake not the wordes of consecration over ye breade by takynge it in our handes or by appoyntyng unto it." Your Lordship will remember the letter to Lord Burleigh.

(The Dean of the Arches.) An anonymous letter?

(Mr. Droop.) An anonymous letter. It may be the draft of a letter, but still it shows an intimate knowledge of the occurrences of that time, and I think there is no reason to suppose that it is a subsequent invention.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is not a very strong foundation?

(Mr. Droop.) I was going on to say that it would not seem to be extraordinary that gestures which explain the narrative of the institution of the Lord's Supper should have been introduced subsequently. It seems to me that when the first book of Edward VI. was written, for some reason or other, which I can hardly explain, there was no direction inserted for breaking the bread or for taking the cup into the hands, or for laying the hand upon all the wine; and I do not think that at that time, under the first book of Edward VI., it was intended that there should be any breaking of the bread. But it seems to me not very strange that it should have been introduced subsequently.

The next thing I wish to refer your Lordship to is an account drawn up by Bishop Cosin, of the mode of administering the Sacrament, which is to be found in 4 Cosin, 359. It will appear that he differs from the mode prescribed by our present Prayer Book. The title of the paper is "Regni Angliæ Religio Catholica." It was written in 1652, at Paris, as you will find at page 339, by the request of Hyde. "Deinde sese erigens, per preces solennes institutionem sacramenti et ipsa Christi instituentis verba continentes, panem in manus acceptum frangit vinumque in calicem effundens utrumque symbolum benedicit." There the direction is "vinumque in calicem effundens." Our present direction is that the whole of this is done before the Consecration Prayer begins, and that the priest merely takes the cup into his hands, and then lays his hand upon all the different vessels. It seems to me that this discrepancy between the directions in 1662 and Cosin's own practice, as described in 1652, shows that there was no one traditional practice which had been used ever since the Reformation.

Well, my Lord, I need not quote again (it has been already quoted) the reason Bishop Cosin gave for the insertion of the manual acts. Your Lordship will remember the words, "Therefore, for his better warrant therein, such a direction ought to be inserted,"—implying that he had a doubt at that time whether it was lawful to use those manual acts without a direction in the Act of Uniformity.

(The Dean of the Arches.) All that was argued?

(Mr. Droop.) Yes, my Lord. Then there are a series of other passages in which Bishop Cosin also shows a great desire that every usage which was at that time in use should be comprehended in the new Prayer Book of 1662. I am quoting again from the 5th volume of his works, page 513. In some suggestions for the correction of the Prayer Book, he says: "Nor is there any order, after the naming of the Gospel, for the people to say 'Glory be to thee, O Lord,' as hath been likewise accustomed, and was specially ordered in King Edward's time, together with 'Thanks be given to God,' at the end of the Gospel. For uniformity and advancement of our devotions herein, that order would be fitly here renewed." Accordingly, it appears in a note that Bishop Cosin had proposed to insert an alteration to this effect. But, on the other hand, it was determined not to make the alteration, and the Prayer Book was sanctioned without it; and therefore the practice continued illegal. Then at page 517 Bishop Cosin refers to the direction for consecrating a second time, "If there be any consecrated bread or wine wanting for the communicating of the people, here is no order (as there ought to be) for the consecrating of more, nor for the words which the priest shall use for that purpose, as in the first form of the Communion set out in King Edward's time, and in the canons of the Church, is enjoined. This therefore should be here added:" and it was added. Then, on the same page, there is a reference to the directions to the priest for kneeling when he takes the Sacrament. Bishop Cosin proposed a long Rubric upon that subject, but instead of that only a few alterations were made. In all these things Bishop Cosin seems to have shown an anxious desire that the Prayer Book should contain a full account of what the ceremonies of the Church should be. But there is a great contrast between this and what Bishop Cosin himself does with reference to the mixed chalice. In his first series of notes which were written in a Prayer Book of 1619, at any rate they were written early in his life, he says of the mixed chalice, p. 154, "Our Church forbids it not for aught I know, and they that think fit may use it, as some of the most eminent amongst us use it at this day," referring no doubt to Bishop Andrews' use of it. In the second and third series of notes there is no reference whatever to the mixed chalice, and instead of finding a similar recommendation for a direction authorizing it being inserted, we find from page 515 of the same volume that Cosin was the original author of that very Rubric, which certainly has placed a very great additional difficulty in the way of my friends' argument—I mean the contention that the mixing of the wine and water should be lawful; because he proposed a Rubric directing how the bread and wine should be placed on the table. This Rubric was afterwards a good deal altered, but he proposed that bread and wine should be specifically mentioned there, and then a similar Rubric was finally inserted.

I now wish to refer your Lordship for a moment to the second volume of Daniel's Codex Liturgicus, page 88, where you will find that in this Formula Missæ of Luther's, issued in 1523, Luther declared against all signs over and with the wafer, and against breaking the wafer and dropping part into the chalice. I have looked through several of the different Liturgies that are given there and I have not found anywhere any directions for any of the manual acts in the Lutheran service books, and I think that may to a certain extent explain why the manual acts were first curtailed in Edward's first book, and then left out in Edward's second book. There is no direction for breaking the bread in Edward's first book; the direction is simply for crossing and taking into the hand; then in Edward's second book these are altogether omitted; it was intended there should be nothing done at that time. Then in James I.'s time, probably when the ancient Liturgies came to be better known and the subject to be more discussed, they began to look upon the thing with different eyes. They had settled first that they would abolish the breaking, and then abolish all manual acts. Then it was suggested that this breaking was only symbolical, and that it was a proper thing to do. Next it appears it was restored, being gradually introduced, until at length in 1662 it was introduced with universal consent; and if it was restored at all it was restored from the Sarum Missal and not from Edward's first book.

The next subject to which I shall refer is a subject referred to before, namely, the canon of 1640 as to bowing. This, it was suggested, is an exception to the principle for which we contend, namely, that nothing is lawful that is not contained in the Acts of Uniformity. On the contrary it appears to me to be a very strong argument in our favour. In 1640 this practice of bowing had grown up, and it was desirable to make it not obligatory but allowable. In order to do that they had to make a canon. It is contained in 5 Laud's Works, p. 626.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I know the canon.

(Mr. Droop.) The conclusion is this, that in the practice or omission of this rite we desire that the rule of charity given by the apostle may be observed, namely, "that they who use it despise not them who use it not, and that they who use it not condemn not those that use it." And it appears to me an attempt to sanction, what would otherwise be unlawful, by means of a canon, because your Lordship knows in 1640 that they were not very particular about Acts of Parliament. That, therefore, I rather pray in aid of my argument.

The next thing to which I wish to refer your Lordship is the 18th canon, which contains directions as to persons kneeling at certain times, and then it goes on "and likewise when in time of divine service the Lord Jesus shall be mentioned, due and lowly reverence shall be done by all persons present, as it hath been accustomed." It has been argued that this "as it has been accustomed" shows that previously to that time there was a general usage, not sanctioned by any law, but a usage which had survived from the period before the Reformation. Now, as an answer to this, I will call your Lordship's attention to this, that the same practice of bowing is enjoined in the 52nd of Queen Elizabeth's Injunctions (1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, 231), in the same words:—"And that whensoever the name of Jesus shall be in any lesson, sermon, or otherwise in the church pronounced, that due reverence be made of all persons, young and old, with lowness of courtesy, and uncovering of heads of the menkind, as thereunto doth necessarily belong, and heretofore hath been accustomed." Those words "heretofore hath been accustomed," in Elizabeth's Injunctions, must refer to the custom in Queen Mary's reign, and therefore this particular custom was continued and revived by this Injunction of Queen Elizabeth. Whether these Injunctions were lawfully issued is of course a question. Your Lordship will remember Queen Elizabeth had, under her Act of Uniformity, power, with the consent of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, or of the Archbishops, to order other rites and ceremonies. Therefore, she could have made these Injunctions valid. Whether she did so or not is a question which I am not bound to go into now.

The next matter I have to call your Lordship's attention to is a passage from 4 Wilkins Concilia, page 530.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is it to prove?

(Mr. Droop.) It is for the purpose of showing how this bowing at the name of Jesus was dealt with in 1662, or rather was attempted to be dealt with.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is such a very outlying topic.

(Mr. Droop.) All I wish to say is there was a canon made and an Act of Parliament proposed, but not passed, requiring the people to bow at the Creed and Gospel; of course the present use of the Church of England is to bow at the Creed.

I suppose you will think the next subject I am going to deal with, namely the use of the churching veil, is another outlying topic.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes; they are simply used as illustrations. You cannot get rid of the fact that the bowing at the name of our Lord is not ordered in the Rubric, and yet that these things are done. I do not say how far that argument will go; but no amount of citation showing how these things arose will do away with the fact that they are not ordered in the Rubric, and yet that they are continually done.

(Mr. Droop.) If I show that these orders were sanctioned by Queen Elizabeth's Injunctions, your Lordship will remember there is a question whether these Injunctions of Elizabeth were not authorized by her Act of Uniformity; there is only a limited number of these instances, and we can explain away every one of them.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is, in other words, you can show how they all grow up, and give a rational account of them. But by that means you do not get rid of the weight of the argument (whatever that weight may be I do not say) that, not being mentioned in the Rubric, still they are universally practised. That is the whole argument. I do not say what weight is to be attached to it, but that is the argument. I do not see how your showing the way in which these things grew up affects that argument. That is the argument valeat quantum. You say the matters charged in this case are unlawful, because they are not mentioned. "Well, now," say the other side, "we will reduce that ad absurdum, and we will show you a great quantity of things in the same position which are used." Then, by showing how those things originated you do not get rid of the argument that they have been and are commonly used, and yet are not ordered. I do not say what the value of that argument is—that is quite another thing.

(Mr. Droop.) I use it in this way, my Lord. It is an answer to the contention that every clergyman may of his own free will introduce a ceremony. It is no answer to the contention that a thing done under royal and episcopal sanction, publicly given, may be introduced. If we were to come forward and ask your Lordship to declare such things illegal, then to cite these instances would be to some purpose.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The question is whether everything not ordered by the Rubric is unlawful. These things are alterations of a general use of things not specifically ordered in the Rubric?

(Mr. Droop.) I think it will be found—I do not know what illustrations of that kind my friends may produce in this case, but I think they are very few.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Well, those things you have been referring to?

(Mr. Droop.) Well, I say with regard to the manual acts it was a gradual encroachment.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say it was illegal?

(Mr. Droop.) I say it was an encroachment gradually. It was generally recognized as illegal in Elizabeth's reign. I try to answer that particular case in that way. Then there is the question of bowing at the name of Jesus. I say, with regard to that, it was authorized by Elizabeth's Injunctions, and she seems to have considered that she had power to make these Injunctions under her Act of Uniformity. Your Lordship knows that letter of Parker's.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, I have your argument.

(Mr. Droop.) Then with reference to this churching veil case, I have also a separate answer upon that.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You may run off for ever; the controversy will never have an end if you are to go off into the history of all these things.

(Mr. Droop.) This is the last that has been cited by the other side, and it is the last I intend to deal with. This case of the churching veil—Shipton's case—was cited from Palmer, showing that it was an ancient custom, and that upon that ground the prohibition was refused. That was in the 20th James I. I refer your Lordship to 2 Whitgift's works, 563-4, written in 1574, about 50 years before that period.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What does that citation show?

(Mr. Droop.) That citation shows how Whitgift, who was soon afterwards made Archbishop of Canterbury treats this subject.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But it does not show that it was lawful, does it?

(Mr. Droop.) No, but he says this: "This is rather a civil manner and custom of our country than a ceremony of the Church, and the wearing of new gloves, as many at that time and especially at the time of marriages do, is as much a ceremony as this." Whitgift, who was supreme over the Church of England for 20 years, treats this not as a ceremony of the Church but merely as a usage of the people.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is something done in the Church not ordered by the Rubric?

(Mr. Droop.) Yes, but he distinguishes between those things which are ceremonies and which the Prayer Book relates to, and those things which are merely civil customs.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And you say that displaces the argument from Palmer?

(Mr. Droop.) Yes, my Lord, I say it is merely a civil custom.

(The Dean of the Arches.) In Palmer's case, which was a case enforcing this churching veil, a prohibition was asked for, the judges consulted the bishops, and the bishops gave a certificate that this was an ancient custom upon which the prohibition was refused, and the wearing of the churching veil enforced.

(Mr. Droop.) Then, my Lord, Cartwright complains that it was left to everybody's option. He says, "A little true knowledge of divinity would have taught him that the bringing in or usurping without authority any ceremony in the congregation is both an earnest matter than may be jested at, and a weightier than should be permitted unto the discretion of every woman considering that the same hath been so horribly abused in the time of Popery."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Cartwright says it is illegal, and the judges said it was legal.

(Mr. Droop.) Cartwright complains that it was left to everybody's option, and takes up the position that it is a ceremony of the Church, and he says it is left to the discretion of every woman, so that it was not obligatory at that time. On the other hand Palmer's case is a case about enforcing it. What I wish to show is that this custom had been merely a civil usage which Archbishop Whitgift would not enforce at all.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say it was not a religious ceremony but a civil usage?

(Mr. Droop.) It was nothing more than a civil usage, and in 40 years it grows up to be a thing insisted upon.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That does not get rid of the fact that it was enforced by a court of law?

(Mr. Droop.) I say it was a question with regard to the dress of a lay person. It seems to me to be the same sort of thing as the cloth on the communion table. I do not mean the fair linen cloth, but the other cloths which are not for religious symbolism but for decency, and in some such way the churching veil was originated, a thing allowed as a matter indifferent, and then—

(The Dean of the Arches.) You seem to me to lose sight of the argument of the other side. The argument is this: "You say it is absolutely illegal to do anything not mentioned in the Rubric or in the Act of Uniformity," let it be what you like, a civil usage or a religious ceremony, it is a matter which the bishop insisted upon being done, and which a temporal court said he had a right to insist. Yet still it is not mentioned in the Rubric.

(Mr. Droop.) Yes, but it is not a religious ceremony, but simply a civil usage. Our view of the word "ceremony" is that it must have a religious significance. Cartwright took the view which our opponents take; he treats it as a ceremony. On the other hand, Whitgift held it to be merely a civil usage. Then there is a decision in another court on the same subject, which your Lordship will find in Hale's Precedents of Criminal Causes, page 169. The date is the 11th December 1577—about the same time as Whitgift's. There was a proceeding against Mary Madison and Dorothy Marshall. Fassi sunt, "that these came to the church to be churched or give thanckes for their safe delivery, having kerchifes over their hedes, according to the use; and for that they had the same kerchifes on their hedes the curate would not suffer them to give thanckes, and thereby went home without thanckes givinge, and theie being further examined whether theie did were them for any superstition [say they did not] but for warmth. Et tunc dominus monuit eos that upon Sondaie nexte theie shall come to the church to give thanckes, and then and there the curate shall cause and se[e] them give thanckes. And lykwise the same Mr. Dente, the curate, was monished that hereafter he shall not refuse any honest woman to give thanckes coming to the church as aforesaid, theie being examined that theie doe not were the same for any superstition."

(The Dean of the Arches.) It was a very sensible decision, but I cannot conceive what it has to do with this case?

(Mr. Droop.) It also tends to show that in 1577 this wearing of churching veils was not a religious ceremony. It might be applicable to my learned friend's argument that the candles are mere embellishments—it would support their case in that respect. But if we satisfy your Lordship that the lighted candles and the mixed chalice are done with a religious significance, it gets rid of the churching veil case by showing that in 1577 it was not considered a matter of religious significance.

I am now going back to the question of the Injunctions with reference to the two lights upon the high altar before the Sacrament, "which, for the signification that Christ is the very true light of the world, ye shall suffer to remain still." I shall not repeat my friend's argument to prove that the Sacrament there means the reserved Sacrament. The first point I wish to refer to is the signification. It was put to us in the other case that we could not explain that signification; that supposing our theory was correct, that those lights were on the high altar before the reserved Sacrament, we could not explain the signification. For this purpose I wish to refer your Lordship to the third book of Gregory's Decretals, 41st title, 10th chapter. It is a passage on carrying the Sacrament to the sick: "Sacerdos vero quilibet frequenter doceat plebem suam ut quum in celebratione Missarum elevatur hostia salutaris se reverenter inclinset, idem faciens quum eam defert presbyter ad infirmum. Quam in decenti habitu superposito mundo velamine ferat et referat manifeste ac honorifice ante pectus cum omni reverentia et timore, semper lumine procedente, quum sit candor lucis aterna." The light was always to be carried because the Sacrament is the brightness of eternal light. This same passage of Gregory's Decretals is referred to by Lynwood at page 249 on the same subject. The text merely orders that the Sacraments should be carried with a light, but then Lynwood's note to this is "Lumin prævio. Ratio est, quia est candor lucis æternæ, et non præcedit lumen ad fugandum tenebras sed ratione prædicta." Then there is a reference to this passage of Gregory's Decretals: "Extra. De celebratione Missarum c. sane, ubi etiam statuitur quod Sacerdos Eucharistiam reverenter gerat ante pectus suum, et quod tabernaculum, in quo portatur operiatur mundo velamine." The word "Extra" is the proper phrase, as it appears, for referring to Gregory's Decretals—

(The Dean of the Arches.) Of course it is. It is the Extragantes.

(Mr. Droop.) Well, my Lord, I mentioned it because it was a discovery as far as I am concerned.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is about the taking the Eucharist to the sick; it cannot be supposed that the Injunction is founded upon that, because it is clearly founded upon the other reservation.

(Mr. Droop.) What I wish to show is that Gregory attaches a meaning, "Quum sit candor lucis æternæ," to the Sacrament carried to the sick; and of course it is the same Sacrament which was reserved in the Church. Then, at page 236, comes the passage your Lordship refers to, and this is Lynwood's gloss upon it: "Et nota quod candelas in celebratione Missæ arsuras convenit esse de cera potius quam de alia materia. Candela namque sic ardens significat ipsum Christum, qui est splendor Lucis æternæ."

(The Dean of the Arches.) The Injunction, I think, is founded upon that.

(Mr. Droop.) Yes, my lord. The next words "Extra eo caput sane," show that it is a reference to the same passage in Gregory's Decretals.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Possibly.

(Mr. Droop.) In the other passage it was "Extra celebratione Missarum," and this passage in Lynwood is in the title, "De celebratione Missarum," Therefore, "Eo" is "de celebratione Missarum."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, that is the way in which they chose to have their canon law cited:

(Mr. Droop.) I say these passages refer to the same passage in Gregory's Decretals, and therefore, that the "Sacrament" means what is stated there. The next passage to which I have to refer to is the passage containing Reynolds' canon, requiring that there should be two lights, "Tempore quo solennia Missarum peraguntur accendantur duæ candelæ vel ad minus una." But there is nothing said as to where those lights are to be—whether on the altar or not. It is merely said there are to be two lights.

The directions of the Sarum Missal contains full directions as to there being two taper bearers at Mass.

(The Dean of the Arches.) My attention was drawn to that.

(Mr. Droop.) Our contention is that that is sufficient to satisfy Reynolds' canon. It is not improbable that where Mass was celebrated in a simple manner, for instance at low Mass, the candle or candles required by the canon were often placed on the altar, but still the regular direction was that there should be two candles, held by taper bearers. The next thing with which I shall trouble your Lordship is a book which gives an account both of the candles upon the altar and of the candles at Mass,—St. Osmund's Consuetudinary of the Church of Sarum. I am citing from Rock's Church of our Fathers, vol. 3, part 3. It is a treatise on the Use of the Church at Sarum, and at page 3 there is an account of what lights there should be. It is an account of the duties of the Treasurer. "Thesaurarii officium est ornamenta et thesauros ecclesiæ conservare, lumina subministrare scilicet: Dominica prima in Adventu quatuor cereso ad utrasque vespervas et ad matutinas et ad missam, scilicet, duos insuper altari et alios duos in gradum coram altari." There are four lights at each service, two on the altar and two before the altar; alike at Vespers, at Matins, and at Mass; no distinction at all; and in the same way there are several other descriptions of how many lights there should be; and in most cases there are the same number at Mass and Evensong; but mostly there are more at Matins. At the same time on ordinary Sundays there are to be two lights at Matins and Evensong, and four at Mass, for it proceeds:—"In aliis autem Dominicis omnibus per annum et quoadcunque chorus regitur et invitatorium a duobus dicitur tantum duos debet administrare. In Dominicis tamen omnibus ad Missam quatuor." Then on ordinary days the regulation is that there should be two lights at Mass, and one at Matins. Those are the regulations with respect to the lights about and upon the altar.

At page 59 there is an account of the lights at Mass. There is an account of the conferarii and their candelabra as in the Sarum Missal. It appears then, that the lights at Mass were the lights of the taper bearers. I have also to refer your Lordship to the Consuetudinary of the Church at Lichfield, I. Wilkins, page 496, which bears out my former position, that the lights were the same in all the services, I mean the lights upon the altar, the fixed lights in the Church. I need not repeat what your Lordship is aware Lyndwood says at page 248, about the custom in England being that the Sacrament should be hung in a canopy over the altar.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, that was referred to at great length.

(Mr. Droop.) It was referred to in the argument by the other side?

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think not, I introduced it myself.

(Mr. Droop.) I mean it was referred to during my friend's argument. We have not had an opportunity of dealing with it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Not in the former case. But you are now, in opening a new case, replying upon an old one.

(Mr. Droop.) Well, my Lord, I suppose we are.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is rather trying the Court hardly, is it not?

(Mr. Droop.) What I mean to say is, my friend intended to have dealt with this.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am not saying you are not "dans ont droit."

(Mr. Droop.) Then again, it is said there are no express directions for lights before the Sacrament. The only thing that I can find in Lyndwood that at all suggests there being lights before the reserved Sacrament is the following constitution of Reynolds in the appendix, p. 39. "Sint rectores ecclesiarum et presbyteri diligentes ut summa reverentia et honor maxime mus sacris altaribus exhibeatur, et maxime ubi sacrosanctum corpus reservatur et Missa celebratur." This would certainly sanction the burning of lights on the altar, especially as it goes on afterwards, "Eucharistia quoque tam luce quam lucernâ præcedente ad ægrotos per sacerdotem . . . . . deferatur."

It was laid down distinctly in the other case by my friend Mr. Prideaux that the blessed Sacrament is never upon the altar, nor suspended above the altar when the divine mysteries are celebrated. But in point of fact the Roman Missal contemplates the celebration of Mass at an altar where the Sacrament is reserved: "Ritus celebrandi Missam II., 2. Cum pervenerit ad altare, stans ante illius infimum gradum caput detegit, Biretum ministro porrigit et altari seu imagini crucifixi desuper positæ profunde inclinat, si autem in eo sit tabernaculum sanctissimi sacramenti genuflectens debitam facit reverentiam." It has been said that there is only one light before the reserved Sacrament, and that a hanging light; but I have not been able to find any authority in favour of that position. Of course I shall leave that in your Lordship's hands. There is a direction that there should be a light sometimes in I Wilkin's Concilia, page 667, the Constitutions of William of Cantilupe. "In Ecclesiis autem saltem quarum amplæ sunt facultates continuo lampas ardeat, die videlicet et nocte, coram redemptionis nostræ pignore supradicto." There is nothing here to show that this should be the only light. No such passage was cited in the other case, and I feel pretty certain no passage can be cited to show that it was the law of the Church that only one light should be burnt before the Sacrament.

Notwithstanding all the discussion upon that point, I do not yet understand how the words "before the Sacrament," can be turned into "during the celebration of the Mass." I do not go into that further, but I have to ask several other questions connected with the same subject. First, if the words "the Sacrament" refer to the celebration of a service, why should they be used with reference to the Mass rather than to any other of the Sacraments of the Church. At that time there were several other Sacraments, and according to my friend's construction of the meaning of the words "before the Sacrament," there is no reason to suppose that the lights were intended to be used before the Sacrament of the altar rather than before any of the other six Sacraments. Another question I have to ask is, how were the lights before the reserved Sacrament dealt with by those Injunctions of 1547? We have seen there were occasionally lights before the reserved Sacrament before that time, and the words, "two lights before the Sacrament" would naturally apply quite as much to the reserved Sacrament as to "during the celebration of the Mass;" and according to my friend's theory I think it must be said that these words were intended to have a double signification, they were first to include the lights before the reserved Sacrament, and secondly, the lights at the celebration of the Mass. A third question I would ask is, how were the two lights upon the

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is not right to reply in this way upon a cause that has been argued, and in which there has been a reply. It is not according to the ordinary usage of courts to do this, particularly when there have been two replies allowed in the case. Now you are replying on the case which has been argued and replied upon by your leader.

(Mr. Droop.) My Lord, if we had had to go into the subject in that case we should have taken a much longer time.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am quite ready to hear you if you wish to press it.

(Mr. Droop.) I have finished all my observations upon that point; and really this argument which I am answering now is an argument—

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is an argument which has not been addressed to this Court in this case?

(Mr. Droop.) No.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then it is contrary to usage to answer it.

(Mr. Droop.) But it is an argument which was put forth in the Church Union case.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Go on, I will hear you.

(Mr. Droop.) I will conclude with a few words by way of summary upon these "lights before the Sacrament." Our argument is that this direction in Reynolds's canon as to lights is satisfied by the taper bearers, and that those lights held by the taper bearers were not interfered with either by Cromwell's Injunctions, which forbid all lights except those before the Sacrament of the altar, or by the Injunctions of 1547; that besides those there were other lights on or about the altar. Those lights were sometimes before the Sacrament, and sometimes before images; but the Injunctions of Cromwell prohibited the lights before images, but left the light before the Sacrament, that is, the light before the reserved Sacrament, and that "light" included any number of lights throughout the Church. The Injunctions of 1547 went further still; instead of allowing the light before the Sacrament, which would have meant any number of lights anywhere in the Church, they only allowed two lights before the Sacrament upon the high altar. They did not enjoin that there should be perpetually two lights burning, or two lights burning during the Mass, but what they enjoined was, that under no circumstances should there be more than two lights. They would not interfere with one light or two lights burnt at the Mass, or they would not interfere with one light or two lights burnt at any other service; but in any case they allowed only two lights altogether in the Church, and those were to be upon the high altar and before the reserved Sacrament.

I have only a few words in conclusion, and these will be rather in anticipation, perhaps, of the argument of the other side. It has been said, and may be said, that these prosecutions of Mr. Simpson and Mr. Mackonochie are attempts to narrow the comprehensiveness of the Church of England; that there are two parties which have subsisted in the Church of England since the time of Charles I., and that one of those parties is attempting to drive the other out; in short, that they are prosecutions dictated by religious bigotry. But in fact Mr. Simpson, and those of whom he is the representative, are doing two things. In the first place, they are teaching doctrines which are generally considered contrary to the law of the Church of England—

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have many times said that I have nothing to do with the question of doctrine in these cases.

(Mr. Droop.) In the second place they are taking possession of parish churches and carrying on services in them in which many faithful members of the Church of England cannot conscientiously join. According to the law of the Church of England the church of each parish is intended to be the place of worship for the inhabitants of that parish. The old laws requiring every parishioner to attend his parish church have become no doubt obsolete, but this does not deprive the parishioner of the right to resort there, and to have such a service as all members of the Church of England can conscientiously join in. Everything, therefore, that is done in the service is done on behalf of the whole congregation; all prayers which the minister offers are offered in their name; the minister is in every case their representative. In order that a person may be able to join in a service it is essential that he should agree in all the doctrines expressed in such service, whether expressed in words in the prayers, or symbolised by the ceremonies. For instance, if a minister holds up the Sacrament over his head for the purpose of others adoring it, this is an offence against the opinions of those members of the Church who consider that such adoration is idolatry. If this were a case with reference to doctrine, this talk about the comprehensiveness of the Church of England would not be altogether out of place; but the question in the present case is whether Mr. Simpson may carry on a service in which faithful members of the Church of England cannot conscientiously join. As long as the Prayer Book is strictly conformed to, no member of the Church of England is forced to join in any prayer or ceremony to which he can reasonably object. The Prayer Book is one of the standards of doctrine. To quote the recent Subscription Act, one of the declarations of assent is, "I assent to the 39 Articles of Religion, and to the Book of Common Prayer; and of ordering Bishops, Priests, and Deacons. I believe the doctrine of the United Church of England and Ireland, as therein set forth, to be agreeable to the Word of God." This is an assent to the Book of Common Prayer which every clergyman is obliged to make; and if he preaches any doctrine contrary to the Book of Common Prayer, contrary to that which can be reasonably considered to be expressed in the Book of Common Prayer, he can be punished for it. But supposing a clergyman uses any of the ceremonies complained of in this suit, or any other ceremonies which may be introduced into the service of the Church of England, he may import into the service expressions of doctrines which are not universally held in the Church. It seems to me impossible that the law of the Church of England can have been left in such a state that the clergyman of any parish should be at liberty to make the services in a parish church such that faithful members of the Church of England cannot conscientiously join in them. Yet this appears to me to be the inevitable result of any other construction of the Acts of Uniformity than that which we have contended for. If a minister is to be at liberty to add to or to alter the services at all, he must be at liberty to alter them according to his own discretion; the only possible limitation that can be suggested is that he is not allowed to use any words or ceremony which are themselves contrary to the doctrine of the Church of England. But there are of course an infinite number of doctrines as to which the Church gives liberty, which she does not enforce and does not forbid, and which a clergyman may preach himself, but which he has no right to enforce in any way upon his congregation.

I will not detain your Lordship any longer, and I am sorry to have been obliged to occupy so much of your time.

Adjourned till to-morrow at a quarter past 10.

SECOND DAY.

Thursday, February 6th, 1868.

(Dr. Deane.) May it please your Lordship.—In addressing myself to this case, I feel I have a somewhat divided duty. I am aware that your Lordship has listened to this case and to that immediately preceding it now for some 12 days. Of course your Lordship's time is of value to yourself, and also to others in this Court and elsewhere; and therefore I shall be most anxious and it shall be my great endeavour to spare your Lordship's time and the time of the public, so far as it may be consistent with my other duty, namely, that of doing the very best I can for Mr. Simpson, the defendant.

My Lord, I have one favour to beg at your hands. It must be in your experience that in almost any case, and particularly in cases like the present, it is almost impossible, in following those who have led you on the same side, as I may say Mr. James and Mr. Prideaux have led me, it is almost I say impossible, unintentionally, but still frequently, to avoid falling into the same line of argument which they have used. I can assure your Lordship that if I should err—and I have no doubt I shall err—in that way, I shall take it as the greatest kindness if your Lordship will intimate to me that you have heard sufficient upon that subject.

My Lord, having said so much, and without the usual introductory remarks, I think I shall at once proceed to grapple with this case as I best may. And the line of argument which I intend to adopt generally will be this: first as to the question of the Lights, secondly the Mixed Chalice, and thirdly the Elevation.

My Lord, the first of these questions is the one which will occupy most time. I think there is more to be said, not more to be read, upon that point, than there is upon the others. Besides which, taking them in that order is the natural order from the Articles, and it is an order which enables one to deal with a question which must more or less run through the whole of the argument, namely, that of usage or antiquity, or whatever word one may employ to signify that which existed down to a certain time. And, my Lord, it also enables me to refer to a matter to which I most respectfully ask your attention. I observe that my friend Mr. James stated that the charge against Mr. Mackonochie was criminal, or quasi criminal. I cannot admit any qualifications of that kind. The charge against Mr. Simpson is a direct and not a quasi criminal charge. If that which Mr. Simpson has done be proved or admitted, and if so proved or admitted it be a crime, then Mr. Simpson must be punished for that crime; but if on the other hand the proof fail, and if the proof or the admission do not come up to the charge (and my learned friends are content to accept the admission), then of course the charge itself must fail, because it involves a crime; and, my Lord, I am not aware that as there is no constructive felony and no constructive treason, there can be such a thing as constructive heresy or constructive schism. Further, my Lord, my friends (I suppose having plenty of time at their command) have endeavoured to attach to the defendant in this case a kind of slur, as they think it, in consequence of other matters with which he has no connection whatever. For instance, they say, Observe what an odious book "The Ritual Reason why" is! My Lord, for aught I care it may be the most odious book that ever was published; but I am ignorant enough, and I am bold enough, to say that "The Ritual Reason why" I have never seen. My friend again referred to a book—I have no doubt it is a very pretty one, at all events it is extremely well bound in vellum—called the Directorium Anglicanum. But, my Lord, I am not here to defend the Directorium Anglicanum; I care no more for the Directorium Anglicanum than I do (as I reminded my friend Mr. Stephens yesterday when he handed me a book) for the memory of Queen Elizabeth. I am simply here to defend against three charges, or four or five, as the case may be, the Reverend Mr. Simpson.

What, then, is the line of argument, and what the defence, which, in my judgment, I think should be adopted? It is this: I stand upon the rubric of 1662; and on that rubric, so far as lights are concerned, I claim to be acquitted. Your Lordship knows from other sources how hard this rubric presses upon people who take a different view of some of these matters from Mr. Simpson. Your Lordship knows that, an ingenious attempt was made to get rid of that rubric of 1662, and to say outright that it was an interpolation—I won't use a harder term. My Lord that bubble has exploded, and we now know that that rubric exists in the sealed copy of the Book of Common Prayer, and that that rubric forms part of the Act of Uniformity of Charles II.

Again, it is a singular thing, but one cannot shut one's eyes to the fact, that a certain party in the Church (and, my Lord, in this case I wish to speak with the greatest respect of all parties within the Church, imputing no bad motives, and being willing to believe that every one is actuated by what they believe to be their duty) have taken great offence at certain vestments used by another party. Those vestments, as your Lordship knows, depend entirely upon that rubric; and it is a remarkable thing that in this part of the nineteenth century, when there is certainly no want of the spirit of trying these cases, nobody yet has been found bold enough to attack the vestments. Therefore I say, at all events, that rubric of 1662 (independent of course of the case of Westerton v. Liddell) remains in its entirety. I am not going to read the rubric, because I am sure your Lordship knows it entirely by heart.

(Mr. Stephens.) My learned friend seems to be under some misconception. Mr. Simpson never used vestments, and therefore we could not make them part of the charge.

(Dr. Deane.) I think it is in evidence that Mr. Mackonochie did.

(Mr. Stephens.) We are not trying Mr. Mackonochie now.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I wish that had been remembered yesterday.

(Mr. Stephens.) My Lord I think I guarded myself against trenching upon that forbidden ground.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I did not allude to you, Mr. Stephens.

(Dr. Deane.) My Lord, what is the consequence of having that rubric before you? That rubric throws you back at once to the year 1549. To the year 1549 then we go; and it is of course essential, it lies at the root of the whole case, to consider what was the state of things in 1549, when that, which was, ceased, if it ever did cease. It is a matter of great importance as an argument, because in the whole 12 or 13 days that this case has, down to the present moment, been before your Lordship; not one of my learned friends, with all their ability, with all their industry, with all their learning, with all their library brought into court and read book after book, has been able to put his finger upon a given time, and say, "This or that thing now charged against Mr. Simpson ceased then."

The argument which I shall put shortly upon the Rubric will of course be this: Certain ornaments are to be retained and be in use which were in this Church of England in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI. And here, my Lord, out of the great respect which I feel for the person who gave the reasons contained in this opinion, which appears in the blue book with which your Lordship is familiar (the Ritual Commissioners' report), I would for one moment pause and make some observations upon these words, "retained and be in use." The argument of Sir Roundell Palmer, or rather the reason for his opinion (and I know the danger of grappling with him), was this, that "retained and be in use" means no more than this, that such ornaments as have been retained shall be in use. Now, first of all, that argument seems extremely forced. Referring to Cardwell's Conferences, at page 32, and to a note at page 36, your Lordship will find an account of the different books, and also a reference to this Rubric as to the use of vestments only. At page 36 the note refers to an authority which I need not give your Lordship, because you will find it on referring to Cardwell, and then it says: "The last Book of Services (that is the last Service Book) is gone through, with a proviso to retain the ornaments which were used in the first and second year of King Edward, until it pleased the Queen to take other order for them. Our gloss upon this text is that we shall not be forced to use them; but that others in the mean time shall not convey them away, but that they may remain for the Queen."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is Bishop Sandys.

(Dr. Deane.) That is Bishop Sandys, my Lord. Then if I take Mr. Moore's report of the judgment of the Privy Council in Westerton v. Liddell, the thing comes out, of course, with all the authority of that tribunal, and sets the matter at rest, because at pages 158 and 159 of that judgment this question is exhausted. At page 158 your Lordship will find this: "If reference be now made to the alterations in these matters introduced by the Second Prayer Book of Edward VI., and the subsequent Rubric to the Prayer Book of Elizabeth, the meaning will be sufficiently clear." My Lord Kingsdown then goes through the several statutes, and at the bottom of page 159 he sums up in this way: "The Rubric to the Prayer Book of January 1st, 1604, adopts the language of the rubric of Elizabeth." Your Lordship knows perfectly well—and I am really ashamed to mention these things—that the Rubric and the Act of Uniformity differ; one says, "retained and be in "use," the other says, "shall use." The judgment proceeds: "The Rubric to the present Prayer Book adopts the language of the statute of Elizabeth, but they all obviously mean the same thing; that the same dresses and the same utensils or articles which were used under the First Prayer Book of Edward VI. may still be used." Well, there is but one other remark which I have to make upon this argument, namely, that it has not the merit of novelty, because in that same book of Cardwell's Conferences, page 314, we find (and it will be curious for another purpose to refer to the same passage), that it was one of the objections made when certain exceptions were taken to the Book of Common Prayer. This particular Rubric is put up in the left-hand column, and then the exception taken to it is this: "Forasmuch as this Rubric seemeth to bring back the cope, albe, &c., and other vestments forbidden by the Common Prayer Book, 5 & 6 Edw. VI., and so our reasons alleged against ceremonies under our eighteenth general exception, we desire it may be wholly left out."

Therefore the very Rubric now objected to upon this ground was objected to before, or at the time when the Prayer Book came into use. The objection was before the revisers, and it was overruled, because we find the Rubric still standing. Your Lordship will find the answer to it further on.

The next question is with regard to ornaments. I contend that lights are ornaments. Why? First of all, upon the judgment in Westerton v. Liddell, where your Lordship knows "ornaments" are defined. But we must bear in mind that the word ornaments is a term of art. You cannot go, for instance, and ask a painter or a sculptor, unless he have some ecclesiastical learning, what an ornament is when used in a Church book. They who drew up these Rubrics were not unlearned men—nay, more, they were men deeply skilled in all the knowledge, and all the technical learning consistent with that knowledge, requisite for so important a work. My Lords of the Privy Council in the case of Westerton v. Liddell were pleased to refer to Facioliati, or rather to Forcellini's edition of the work.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think I quoted it.

(Dr. Deane.) I believe your Lordship quoted it. But if my Lords had referred to a book which I hope won't shock my learned friend when I refer to it—the Missal of the Church of Rome—

(The Dean of the Arches.) Mr. Stephens himself has referred to it.

(Mr. Stephens.) Very often.

(Dr. Deane.) Yes, my Lord, but he has gradually faded away to such an extent that I fear he may disappear altogether.

(Mr. Stephens.) No fear of that.

(Dr. Deane.) The 20th Rubric of the Missal is, "De preparatione altaris et ornamentorum ejus." Your Lordship observes the use of the word "ornamentorum" there. The word "preparatione," I was going to observe, is a word of great force, because it tells against the argument that these lights were burnt before the Reserved Sacrament. It is, "De preparatione altaris et ornamentorum ejus," meaning the preparation of these ornaments before and not after (one is obliged to use these common words) the thing is in existence.

Now that brings me to the third point, which in reality is the whole matter in dispute; "as were in use in the Church of England by the authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of King Edward the Sixth." In order to get at the meaning of these words, it is of course necessary to see what the Act of Parliament of Edward the Sixth provided, and what the Rubric of the Book of Common Prayer of Edward the Sixth provided. First of all, looking to the Act of Edward the Sixth, one must see what the existing mischief to be remedied was—whether the mischief was directly expressed, or whether it was directly implied; and I cannot help thinking that my learned friends in a great part of their argument have begged the question here. They have assumed that certain things which are not expressed, that certain things which are not directly implied, are nevertheless within the statute.

Now I believe that the proper way of construing statutes is to look and see what the preamble is, and then to look and see what is enacted; and for that purpose, referring to the statute of Edward the Sixth, I think we shall have very little doubt.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are now upon the First Prayer Book?

(Dr. Deane.) Yes, my Lord. First, if I take the title of the Act, it is one "for uniformity of service" and administration of the Sacraments throughout the "realm;" and this is the preamble: "Where of long time there hath been had in this realm of England and in Wales divers forms of Common Prayer, commonly called the Service of the Church; that is to say, the Use of Sarum, of York, of Bangor, and of Lincoln; and besides the same now of late much more divers and sundry forms and fashions have been used in the cathedral and parish churches of England and Wales, as well concerning the mattens or morning prayer and the evensong, as also concerning the Holy Communion, commonly called the Mass, with divers and sundry rites and ceremonies concerning the same, and in the administration of other sacraments of the church, and as the doers and executors of the said rites and ceremonies, in other form than of late years they have been used, were pleased therewith, so other not using the same rites and ceremonies were thereby greatly offended; and albeit the King's Majesty, with the advice of his most entirely beloved uncle, the Lord Protector, and other of his Highness' council, hath heretofore divers times assayed to stay innovations or new rites concerning the premises, yet the same hath not had such good success as his Highness required in that behalf; whereupon his Highness, by the most prudent advice aforesaid, being pleased to bear with the frailty," and so on. Then it goes on to order that there shall be but one form, founded entirely upon the existence of many forms previously in use.

Had it been my good fortune to address your Lordship at an earlier time, I would have ventured to read more of this preamble, and I would have read the enacting clause which follows in the same section; but by this time your Lordship must be well aware of it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You will observe, Dr. Deane, the word is not "form," it is "uniform, quiet, and godly order."

(Dr. Deane.) It is, my Lord; and I think I have said sufficient to put your Lordship in possession of my argument upon the statute itself. That being the statute, now perhaps is the proper time for me to direct myself very shortly to that which was in existence—which we know as matter of history was in existence previous to that statute. There are an infinite number of authors who are all full of information upon this subject—Durand, Martene, Bona, Zacharias, Gavantus, and I know not who else—a whole bead-roll of them; and all, without one exception, state that as to the ornaments of the altar at that time the Rubric is correct—that there shall be "saltem duo candelabra." That then was the state of things in foreign countries, at all events I may say before the Reformation; it was the state of things throughout the Western Church. Was it the state of things in England? It would require pretty strong evidence to satisfy anybody that previous to the Reformation, without reason, the Church of England should have departed from the universal practice of the Western Church. But it is not so, one would not expect that variation to exist, and it did not exist. It is quite true that in the Sarum Use, which was chiefly in use throughout the southern part of England, there is no direction whatever, I believe, for these two candles, and it is a remarkable thing that there is no Rubric directing that in the Sarum Use. Well, my Lord, it might occur to some person to say that in this particular the English Church, according to the Sarum Use, has departed from the practice of the Western Church. But that is not so; for you have the constitution of Archbishop Reynolds, which constitution governed the whole southern part of this country, and in that constitution the two candles are ordered. So that the argument is thus,—finding throughout the whole of the Western Church an order for candles, finding the omission to which I have referred in the prevailing Use in the south of England, no order for candles, you do yet find the candles expressly provided for and ordered by the person who had the governing hand and direction in these matters over that part of the kingdom. Therefore there can be no doubt whatever that previous to the time when the Sarum Use was abolished—that is, previous to the Statute of Uniformity of Edward the Sixth—the candles were in use according to the Sarum Missal.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not know that I quite follow your argument. There are two propositions of fact or of law; one is, that there was no Rubric enjoining these candles in the Sarum Use; another is, that nevertheless the constitution of Archbishop Reynolds, which we have referred to in Lyndwood, rendered it necessary that those two candles should be used. Those are your two premises, what is your exact conclusion from those premises?

(Dr. Deane.) The exact conclusion is this—that candles were in use, though not mentioned in the Rubric of the Sarum Missal.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes. And from that you infer?—

(Dr. Deane.) From that I would say that you can derive nothing from the absence of an order to use candles in the present Prayer Book; that is to say, for the present purpose, in the Prayer Book of Edward VI.

(The Dean of the Arches.) "No inference from the silence of the present Rubric." That is to say, no more inference than could have been deduced from the silence of the Sarum Use.

(Dr. Deane.) Quite so, my Lord. Now if it be true (and I believe there is strong reason for saying that it is true), that the Sarum Use is derived from a learned Bishop of that diocese, St. Osmond, there is a book, the Consuetudo of St. Osmond, in which these candles are expressly ordered. That of course is an additional proof of the fact.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Where is that book, have you got it here, do you know what it is called?

(Dr. Deane.) Yes, my Lord, it is here. I did not know it was here when I cited it, I will give your Lordship the reference to it before I conclude.

We know this also as a fact, that irrespective of the lights, more or less in odd or uneven number (which is very material for a future part of the argument), upon the high altar—that is to say, upon that one dominant altar which was known as the high altar, there were candles and treads of wax for a variety of things, and burnt for other purposes and for superstitious uses, burnt before the images of the saints, burnt upon the side altars, burnt in chantries, to men, and for a variety of uses. And this brings me to the argument upon these injunctions. In a book called "The Church of our Fathers," by Dr. Rock, vol. 3—

(The Dean of the Arches.) Mr. Droop cited it yesterday.

(Dr. Deane.) It is after the index at page 3, and the heading is, De officiis ecclesiasticis tractatus, title 5. I will not cite the passage, but I will hand the book to your Lordship.

I now come to these injunctions, and taking them from where they have been so frequently cited (I Cardwell's Documentary Annals), your Lordship knows that a variety of things are enumerated in these injunctions as forbidden, but out of the things forbidden, and especially out of the lights forbidden, are excepted these two lights upon the altar before the Sacrament. Those things so excepted I find from a very common book were objected to, and taken out, in consequence of a variety of complaints which were made from the beginning of the reign of Edward VI., certainly down to the time of the injunctions, and even later. My Lord, I have here I should say 14 or 15 different passages marked out, in Burnet's History of the Reformation, Oxford edition, 1829; which, if your Lordship wishes, I will read to you; and which refer, some to one thing mentioned and objected to as unforbidden in the injunctions, some to another.

(The Dean of the Arches.) They all refer to these injunctions.

(Dr. Deane.) No, they refer to a variety of complaints; and the remarkable thing is this, that having as I hope established as a matter of historical fact the existence of these lights down to the time of the injunctions, and subsequent to the injunctions down to the year 1549, there is not to be found in the whole of these complaints made in the early part of Edward the Sixth's reign one single complaint against these lights. It is a most remarkable omission. All manner of things are objected to, but not one single complaint from any one quarter as to these lights.

Now with regard to these injunctions I do not know that I am concerned with the question whether they are good or bad. If the injunctions are good, then I avail myself of them; if the injunctions are bad, I care not; then I rely upon the usage and upon the custom proved to have existed, and the injunctions may pass away for aught I care. Let me say, however, by the way, that I think my friend Mr. Droop was somewhat hasty in supposing that these injunctions, or any which have to do with this particular matter, were annexed to that document which he produced out of the Registry Court of London. But I am not going to deal with that matter here. I say that these injunctions are good.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I shall be glad to hear you upon that point, Dr. Deane, if convenient.

(Dr. Deane.) It would not have been very safe, considering the supremacy of the Crown, and the way in which the supremacy of the Crown was enforced, for any person to have disputed those injunctions. My Lord, I have read somewhere—I won't trouble your Lordship with the reference, I am pretty sure I am right—that no less a person than Bishop Gardiner was imprisoned for disputing these injunctions. No doubt Bishop Gardiner had the best of advice to suggest to him the best defence; and what was the miserable subterfuge to which, under that advice, he had recourse, in order to evade the injunctions? Did he say, as he might have said, (according to my friend's theory,) "The injunctions are invalid, I am not bound to obey them?" No, his defence was this: "Because the sheriff did not read the injunctions in the market-place I am not bound by them."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is to say, he considered the injunctions to derive their validity from the Proclamation Act, and the Proclamation Act required that proclamation to be made.

(Dr. Deane.) That is to say, my Lord, good lawyers were not wanting in those days, and they never would have had recourse to such a subterfuge as that if they could have said at once, "Those injunctions are worth nothing."

(The Dean of the Arches.) If his objections were valid would not that go to the whole of the injunctions? Could it be said that they were lawfully issued, supposing he were right?

(Dr. Deane.) But I do not think his objection was a good one; I do not think it availed him. It is obvious if he could have said, "The injunctions are not valid," that would have been the answer, he would never have said as he did say, "They are wanting in form for lack of publication or proclamation."

(The Dean of the Arches.) His argument appears to have been something of this kind, "If they are valid at all they are valid under the Proclamation Act, and then they must comply with the requisitions of the Proclamation Act. They have not done so, and therefore they are not valid."

(Dr. Deane.) That was his argument, but it was an argument to which he was driven, and which he would not have adopted if the injunctions had been invalid.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you mean if the injunctions had followed the Act?

(Dr. Deane.) Yes; if the injunctions had been invalid he would at once have grappled with them, and not have resorted to this subterfuge.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You see this argument may arise, that there was a power to issue injunctions under that Act, but still if that power was wrongfully exercised what do you say as to the lawfulness of the injunctions?

(Dr. Deane.) It was only in his particular case that he objected to the informality. The argument is this; the injunctions were good. A was proceeded against for not obeying the injunctions. Instead of saying, "The injunctions are bad," A said, "A particular form has not been observed, and therefore I am relieved from obeying them."

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not think that was it. Gardiner said, "The injunctions are bad because they only could be good if they complied with the requirements of the statute; and they have not complied with the requirements of the statute." I think that was his argument. I do not know.

(Dr. Deane.) Again, my Lord, with regard to these injunctions, they have certainly always been considered to be good, because that was the observation made in answer to my friend's argument in the Privy Council in the case of Westerton v. Liddell, where Lord Kingsdown said that the contention that the injunctions were bad was against what everybody thought down to the present time.

Now there was another argument which my friend Mr. Stephens used in the recent case, which I will deal with very shortly, connected with the injunctions; and that was the effect of that statute of Edward VI., which according to my friend's contention started one entirely free from all the Acts of Henry VIII. I confess, my Lord, that was an argument which when I read it from the printed notes of my friend's speech somewhat surprised me. Because I am utterly at a loss to know, if the argument were sound, what became of the position of the Crown with respect to religious matters. But is there not another means of arriving at the true way of construing that Act than that which was pointed out by my learned friend? I refer your Lordship to the 12th chapter of Edward VI. The Act is intitled, "An Act for the repeal of certain statutes concerning treasons and felonies."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Just let me understand what you are combating at this moment. I do not quite follow I am afraid. What argument of Mr. Stephens are you combating now?

(Dr. Deane.) Mr. Stephens said that after Edward VI. cap. 12, no statutes concerning religion passed at the time of Henry VIII. were in existence.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes; that Act was said by Mr. Stephens to abolish all statutes relating to religion.

(Dr. Deane.) Precisely, my Lord; and that argument of his was founded upon the end of the 3rd section, which after repealing nominatim certain statutes of Henry VIII., goes on to say: "And all and every branch, article, sentence, and matter and forfeiture contained, mentioned, or in anywise declared in any of the same Acts of Parliament or statutes, shall from henceforth be repealed and utterly void and of none effect." My Lord, I contend that the repealed Acts must be those in pari materia with those to which certain pains and penalties were annexed; in fact that it meant as in the preamble of the Act is stated, "Statutes concerning Treasons and Felony;" statutes imposing the same penalties as the statutes concerning Treasons and Felonies. Well, that being so, I have endeavoured to establish, and I hope I have succeeded in establishing this proposition, that the injunctions were good by the power of the Crown in matters ecclesiastical; that the injunctions were good by the power reposed in the Crown, or (as in the case of Edward VI.) in the Crown with certain members of the Council, and therefore were good by Act of Parliament. But as I said before (I am afraid not with much success), whether the injunctions were good or bad does not materially affect my argument, though I confess I should prefer it if they were held to be good.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say they were good quacunqve via, either by the general supremacy of the Crown or by the statutes?

(Dr. Deane.) Either by the general supremacy of the Crown or by the statutes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And as I understand him, Mr. Droop agrees with you that they were good by the general supremacy of the Crown?

(Dr. Deane.) Yes, my Lord.

I have now got thus far that lights were in existence and were enjoined in 1547; and I have to pass over the period from 1547 to 1549. Again, during that time I refer to Burnet.

(The Dean of the Arches.) In the former instance you did not give me the references to Burnet?

(Dr. Deane.) They are in vol. 2. The first will be page 52, which refers to the general reformation of abuses. Again, at pp. 56, 82, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 130, 131, 148, and 151, there are other passages, but I think that will be sufficient for your Lordship's purpose. Page 151 contains a matter which I must refer to again presently; then, from 1547 to 1549, those same passages cover the period and prove that no objections were taken to the presence of these lights.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I may take it you are now in 1549.

(Dr. Deane.) I have now got to 1549. And perhaps this is the proper place for me to introduce what I have to submit to your Lordship upon the question of rites and ceremonies. I do not know whether this argument has been brought before your Lordship, but it certainly seems to me to present itself in a very curious and in a very forcible manner. I am bound to say that here, as throughout the whole of this case, I have had the greatest possible assistance from the ablest quarters, without which, certainly, I am not ashamed to say, it would have been impossible for me to have argued this case with any satisfaction to myself; and even now I feel that I may break down in putting this matter before your Lordship in the way in which I believe it ought to be put. However I must do my best.

My Lord, the argument which I have to offer to your Lordship upon this part of the case is one upon the book itself, apart from the statute. We have now come to this very Prayer Book of 1549. And I may perhaps tell your Lordship at once, in order to save repetition, that in every case where I shall have occasion to refer to the Prayer Books, I shall cite from Keeling, because the four books are all put together in that work.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I can follow you quite well—I have all the books here.

(Dr. Deane.) At page 356 is the end of the Communion Service, which was the last service in that book, and then followed the rubric, "Of Ceremonies, why some be abolished and some retained;" and the commencement of that is, "Of such Ceremonies as be used in the Church."

(The Dean of the Arches.) No, I think not.

(Dr. Deane.) Yes, my Lord. In the Prayer Book of 1549 the Rubric of ceremonies was at the end of the book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Wait one moment, I have got the book of 1549 before me. Yes, I beg your pardon, you are quite right; I was looking at the other one.

(Dr. Deane.) At the end of the service; at the end of the rites and ceremonies, I would rather say of the book of 1849, followed the preface, "Of Ceremonies." Now that preface was in precisely the same words as that we now have at the beginning of the Prayer Book. It has been transposed from one place to another; and, my Lord, there is not a word in it which is not most material to the consideration of the present case. Therefore your Lordship will bear with me if I go through some parts of it. The title is: "Of Ceremonies, why some be abolished and some retained." "Of such ceremonies as be used in the Church, and have had their beginning by the institution of man. Some at the first were of godly intent and purpose devised, and yet at length turned to vanity and superstition. Some entered into the Church by indiscretion, devotion, and such a zeal as was without knowledge; and for because they were winked at in the beginning, they grew daily to more and more abuses, which not only for their unprofitableness, but also because they have much blinded the people, and obscured the glory of God, are worthy to be cut away and clean rejected. Other there be, which although they have been devised by man, yet it is thought good to reserve them still, as well for a decent order in the Church (for the which they were first devised) as because they pertain to edification, whereunto all things done in the Church (as the Apostle teacheth) ought to be referred." [That is one principle.] "And although the keeping or omitting of a ceremony (in itself considered) is but a small thing; yet the wilful and contemptuous transgression, and breaking of a common order and discipline, is no small offence before God. Let all things be done among you (saith St. Paul) in a seemly and due order. The appointment of the which order pertaineth not to private men: Therefore no man ought to take in hand, nor presume to appoint or alter any public or common order in Christ's Church, except he be lawfully called and authorized thereunto. And whereas, in this our time, the minds of men be so diverse, that some think it a great matter of conscience to depart from a piece of the least of their ceremonies (they be so addicted to their old customs), and again, on the other side, some be so new-fangled that they would innovate all things," [your Lordship remembers the words of the preamble of the Statute of Uniformity of Edward VI. concerning innovations,] "and so do despise the old that nothing can like them but that is new. It was thought expedient not so much to have respect how to please and satisfy either of these parties, as how to please God, and profit them both. And yet lest any man should be offended (whom good reason might satisfy), here be certain causes rendered why some of the accustomed ceremonies be put away and some retained and kept still. Some are put away because the great excess and multitude of them hath so increased that the burden of them was intolerable; whereof St. Augustine in his time complained that they were grown to such a number that the state of Christian people was in worse case (concerning that matter) than the Jews. And he counselled that such yoke and burden should be taken away, as time would serve quietly to do it. But what would St. Augustine have said, if he had seen the ceremonies of late days used among us, whereunto the multitude used in his time was not to be compared?"

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you happen to know what part of St. Augustine that is taken from?

(Dr. Deane.) No, my Lord, I do not. "This our excessive multitude of ceremonies was so great, and many of them so dark, that they did more confound and darken, than declare and set forth Christ's benefits unto us. And besides this, Christ's gospel is not a ceremonial law (as much of Moses' law was), but it is a religion to serve God not in bondage of the figure or shadow, but in the freedom of spirit, being content only with those ceremonies which do serve to a decent order and godly discipline, and such as be apt to stir up the dull mind of man to the remembrance of his duty to God, by some notable and special signification, whereby he might be edified. Furthermore the most weighty cause of the abolishment of certain ceremonies was that they were so far abused, partly by the superstitious blindness of the rude and unlearned, and partly by the insatiable avarice of such as sought more their own lucre than the glory of God, that the abuses could not well be taken away, the thing remaining still. But now as concerning those persons, which peradventure will be offended for that some of the old ceremonies are retained still, if they consider that without some ceremonies it is not possible to keep any order or quiet discipline in the church, they shall easily perceive just cause to reform their judgments. And if they think much that any of the old do remain, and would rather have all devised anew, then such men (granting some ceremonies convenient to be had) surely where the old may be well used, there they cannot reasonably reprove the old (only for their age), without bewraying of their own folly. For in such a case they ought rather to have reverence unto them for their antiquity, if they will declare themselves to be more studious of unity and concord than of innovations and new-fangleness, which (as much as may be with the true setting forth of Christ's religion) is always to be eschewed. Then it goes on to deal with those ceremonies which are reserved. Therefore, your Lordship sees, taking the whole of this comment upon ceremonies, it is directed exactly as the preamble of the Act of Parliament was—as much to restrain or repress innovations or new-fangleness, as much to observe old ceremonies, as to do away with certain ceremonies which had attached to them peculiar mischiefs.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I may just mention in passing that the question I asked you with reference to St. Augustine, I find solved by looking at the Annotated Book of Common Prayer.*

(Dr. Deane.) Then my shame is the greater, for I had the book and I did not see it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What made me ask the question was, that thereby I thought possibly some light might be thrown upon the construction of the word "ceremony." I do not know how that will be.

(Dr. Deane.) This argument I think may be carried out in the following manner:—They who drew up that Prayer Book, and who acted upon the principles stated in what I have just troubled your Lordship by reading, had, of course, before them the old offices. Whatever we may know now, there is no doubt they did know what they meant by the word "ceremonies." And the history of this matter is curious; previous to the Reformation, I may say since the Reformation, for we have them all in this book (the Roman Breviary), there were a vast number of offices or ceremonies; but when we look to the title-page of the Prayer Book we find that it is, "The Book of Common Prayer," answering in the Breviary exactly to the corresponding services, that is to say, the daily services.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What were the daily services?

(Dr. Deane.) This Book of Common Prayer—that is, the morning and evening service in our Prayer Book. Next, we come in our title-page to "Administration of the Sacraments," following the order in the old service books, then taking the title-page of our Prayer Book we have "other rites and ceremonies of the Church," corresponding with what is found in the old service books in that which is called the Manuale and the Pontificale.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What do you say corresponds to the Manuale and the Pontificale?

(Dr. Deane.) The "other rites and ceremonies of the Church." Therefore, morning and evening prayer remain, administration of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper remains (of course with our alterations), and certain other rites and ceremonies remain. Some of the rites and ceremonies were abolished, and the reason is given in that passage which I have read to your Lordship, and which, singularly enough, was introduced in the First Prayer Book, exactly where the break is. I am not going to take your Lordship through all these, if you have any curiosity you will find it in a book of extreme learning, Maskell's Monumenta Rituali, vol. 1, and page (in Roman numerals) lxxvii. You will find that the table of contents of the Manuale alone contains no less than fifty ceremonies. Out of those fifty ceremonies, I believe the First Prayer Book retained but eight, the present Prayer Book retains but six; the retention of those being probably the reason why the same order as to ceremonies is repeated in our present Prayer Book as was in the First Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Wait one moment. You say the present Prayer Book retains six out of fifty, and that the First Prayer Book retained eight?

(Dr. Deane.) Yes, my Lord. I will give your Lordship those which are retained: De Baptismo, De Purificatione, Ordo Sponsalium, Ordo ad Visitandum, Infirmorum, Inhumatio Defuncti, Confirmatio Puerorum.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Where do you say those fifty ceremonies are to be found?

(Dr. Deane.) They are to be found in the Manuale. But besides the Manuale there was also an old Service Book which was called the Processionale, and that also contained others. Then there was the Pontificale containing the Sacrament and other rites, of which some could only be performed, as the title shows, by the bishop, and in that Pontificale there were other rites and ceremonies which we have not got now.

The reasons for putting away those ceremonies which I have read to your Lordship are very curious. You will remember that some were said to be put away "because the great excess and multitude of them hath so increased in these latter days that the burden of them was intolerable." What were they? My Lord, they were such services as these—various benedictions for food, for fruits, and for a variety of things of that sort; all of which your Lordship will find in the catalogue given in Maskell, corresponding—and therefore I say this argument is irresistible—exactly with Jewish ceremonies of the same kind, Jewish ceremonies being referred to in that passage of the Preface on Ceremonies annexed to the Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say those were the "dark and dumb ceremonies," then?

(Dr. Deane.) No; that is not what I am saying now.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then you say they were these: "The excessive multitude of them hath so increased in these latter days that the burden of them was intolerable; whereof Saint Augustine in his time complained, that they were grown to such a number that the estate of Christian people was in worse case concerning that matter than were the Jews. And he counselled that such yoke and burden should be taken away as time would serve quietly to do it. But what would Saint Augustine have said if he had seen the ceremonies of late days used among us, whereunto the multitude used in his time was not to be compared?" "This our excessive multitude of ceremonies was so great, and many of them so dark, that they did more confound and darken than declare and set forth Christ's benefits unto us. And besides this, Christ's gospel is not a ceremonial law (as much of Moses' law)."

(Dr. Deane.) Yes, my Lord. But your Lordship alluded to their being the "dark ceremonies." I quite admit that; I can hardly conceive any term more appropriate than that to some of these ceremonies, because I would ask what possible benefit could they confer—what would such benedictions teach? The thing occurs to me at this moment that one of the complaints of the Devonshire rebels was that they had no blessing of bread left; and throughout, if I remember right, the complaints of those Devonshire rebels were the omission of many of these ceremonies. Your Lordship will also bear in mind that the same passage in the Prayer Book alludes to the "intolerable burden" of these ceremonies. The truth is, they were introduced into daily life, by the intervention of the celebrant, the priest, and so became an intolerable burden upon men's daily life. It is impossible to say that it was the manual acts which that part of the Prayer Book was complaining of. The manual acts might be burdensome to the priest, but they could not be burdensome to the laity. The burden to the laity was the daily inconvenience and interruption of their daily life by the use of these ceremonies to which I have referred. But there is another strong argument to be drawn from the very words which follow: "The insatiable avarice of such as sought more their own lucre than the glory of God." That must have referred to persons who were paid for these things. It was they (to use the words of my learned friend Mr. Coleridge) who were greedy; it was not the people who had to pay who were greedy. These were the ceremonies for which payment was exacted, and that was the cause of the greed, and the reason why the thing was abolished.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Your argument would have a double aspect rather, as it appears to me. It would be good for showing what ceremonies were abolished, and also it might bear upon that question which was discussed in Mr. Mackonochie's case very much, whether the word "ceremony" did or did not mean an office complete in itself; whether it meant a single act, an element of an office, or whether it was in itself a perfect and complete service of the Church.

(Dr. Deane.) Precisely.

(The Dean of the Arches.) These which you have cited, the fifty or sixty ceremonies, were all perfect and complete services.

(Dr. Deane.) Yes, my Lord; your Lordship knows that there were two kinds of ceremonies; there was the ceremony of the Church and there was also the ceremony of performance. I do not know whether you had given to you a definition of "rites and ceremonies;" if not, perhaps it would be a convenient time for me to give it to you now.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I thought the observation I made rather fell in with your argument, and that was the reason why I interrupted you.

(Dr. Deane.) I am much obliged to your Lordship for that, and other favours. In Perrone's Praelectiones Theologicae, vol. 6, page 54, there is a note on the difference between a rite and ceremony:—"Ceterum accuratè Domin. Macri observat in opere Notizia de' vocaboli ecclesiastici, illud intercedere discrimen inter Ritum et Ceremonia quod habetur inter aquam et lotionem; et enim ceremonia juxta mentem conc. Trid. est ipsa actio ritus est modus præscriptus."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the very point. That passage in the Council of Trent went very strongly to show that the word "ceremony" did not mean that. What does he say it means?

(Dr. Deane.) "Ceremonia est ipsa actio; ritus est modus præscriptus quo fit ipsa actio. Promiscue (this I am afraid confuses the whole matter after all) tamen usurpari hæc voces consueverunt."

The words are used constantly in that confused way.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I daresay I might have that book which you have quoted to look at.

(Dr. Deane.) By all means, my Lord (handing the same to the court.)

(The Dean of the Arches.) I see it says "promiscue."

(Dr. Deane.) If your Lordship will look through that part of the Council of Trent, you will find it is used in this way—there is first "Ceremonia Ecclesiæ," and then we come to the "Ceremonia Missæ."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, it is so. The discussion is of importance in this case, inasmuch as it may or may not throw light on the meaning in which the word "ceremonies" is used in the Prayer Book.

(Dr. Deane.) Exactly. My learned friend has a passage on the subject which I would rather leave to him.

That, I think, is all I have to trouble you with upon that particular part of the Prayer Book; but I must not let the matter rest there, because it is carried still further by a book which I have here, and the same order actually follows. This matter I know has not hitherto been brought to your Lordship's notice. I allude to the present Canons, and your Lordship knows they are very important on this point. These Canons all go in the same direction. Canon IV. is this: "Impugners of the public worship of God established in the Church of England censured—Whosoever shall hereafter affirm that the form of God's Worship in the Church of England established by law and contrived in the Book of Common Prayer and administration of the Sacraments, is a corrupt, superstitious, or unlawful worship of God, or containeth anything in it repugnant to the Scriptures; let him be excommunicated ipso facto, and not restored but by the Bishop of the place or Archbishop, after his repentance and public revocation of such his wicked errors." This Canon IV., as your Lordship knows, refers to the Book of Common Prayer and the administration of the Sacraments. Then if you take Canon VI., it is, "Impugners of rites and ceremonies (drawing the same distinction throughout), established in the Church of England censured—Whosoever shall hereafter affirm that the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England by law established are wicked, anti-christian, or superstitious, or such as being commanded by lawful authority men may not with any good conscience approve them or use them, or as occasion requireth subscribe unto them, let him be excommunicated ipso facto, and not restored until he repent and publicly revoke such his wicked errors." Now, my Lord, how can a man subscribe to manual acts? How can a man subscribe to crossings or to bowings, or to churching-veils, things to which I listened with great pleasure yesterday in my learned friend's speech? I can understand a man subscribing as he is bound to do to a book and the things in the book. He can subscribe to the rites and ceremonies as they are in the Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Does the word "subscribe" mean anything more than "consent," do you think?

(Dr. Deane.) I think it does, my Lord, a little. I have not got the Latin by me.

(The Dean of the Arches.) We ought to look at the Latin.

(Dr. Deane.) I think it must mean more than that, because it says, "In his conscience approve them." One knows the logical precision with which the things were drawn up. In his conscience he is to approve them, in his acts he is to use them, or as occasion requireth he is to subscribe to them.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I see that scribere is the word. "Non possint ejusdem scribere." (Dr. Deane.) It seems to be a very literal translation, whichever is the original.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Other things are mentioned. It is "approve," "use," or "subscribe."

(Dr. Deane.) I wish to finish this argument by reading from the Canons to show how completely they exhaust the Prayer Book, because the 8th Canon goes on to the other matters, and says, "Impugners of the form of consecrating and ordaining Archbishops, Bishops, &c., in the Church of England, censured."

(The Dean of the Arches.) The three clauses in the Prayer Book?

(Dr. Deane.) The three clauses in the Prayer Book.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is one more, the 14th, which also speaks about this matter: "All ministers shall observe the order, rites, and ceremonies prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer."

(Dr. Deane.) In the part about the mixed chalice.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes.

(Dr. Deane.) If I rightly understood my friend I will direct my attention to it by-and-by.

That I believe is the whole rubric, and your Lordship sees how strong the argument is with reference to the state and condition of the table. Of course there was to be the paten, and of course there was to be the vessel which was to hold the other elements.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is perhaps in aid of your argument that it is unquestionable that water was used under this Prayer Book, and there is no mention whatever of the vessel in which the water was to be holden.

(Dr. Deane.) Quite so, my Lord; none whatever. That is part of my second argument upon the chalice. I dislike particularly making very small points, but there is a very curious matter which arises upon the rubric which affects the present Prayer Book. All rubrics down to the rubric of 1662 had this: "Then shall the priest first receive the Communion in both kinds himself, and next deliver it to other ministers, if any be there present (that they may be ready to help the chief minister), and after to the people." That is altered in the Prayer Book of 1552 and 1559 to this: "Then shall the minister first receive the Communion in both kinds himself, and next deliver it to other ministers, if any be there present (that they may help the chief minister), and after to the people in their hands, kneeling."

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say that is in the Second Prayer Book?

(Dr. Deane.) In the Prayer Books of 1552 and 1559. Then there is this omission in the present Prayer Book: it is, "Then shall the minister first receive the Communion in both kinds himself, and then proceed to deliver the same to the bishops, priests, and deacons, in like manner (if any be present), and after that to the people, also in order, into their hands, all meekly kneeling." And so far as I know there is no subsequent rubric which directs that any of those priests, bishops, and deacons shall assist the chief minister. It is an argument ab omisso. If it is good in one way it is good in another. Therefore almost every person who administers the Sacrament, if he has anyone else helping him, is breaking the law of the present rubric, if all is to be forbidden which is not prescribed. I say they must follow the usage they are accustomed to, as they would have administered it to other persons that they may be ready to help, so they would administer to other ministers, in order that they should be ready to help, and should help. That, I say, is a strong argument to prove that in dealing with these matters you must have regard to custom; you must not throw aside all previous and antecedent usage.

My Lord, the argument that expressio unius est exclusio alterius is very strong upon this point. I have not a word to say upon it. Your Lordship was good enough to notice it in reference to my friend Mr. Droop's argument. It is very curious that the only thing forbidden expressly is the elevation, in the First Prayer Book. Of course, looking at these matters rather with a lawyer's mind than with the mind of an ecclesiastic, one looked for negative words; and the moment one found a thing forbidden one said, "Inasmuch as here is a thing forbidden and other things are not noticed, things which existed and which are not forbidden are at least allowable."

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say the only direct prohibition in the rubrics of the First Prayer Book is the elevation of the Holy Sacrament?

(Dr. Deane.) I think so. I am responsible for that assertion at all events. There are many things there which are directed to be done in consequence of previous orders. For instance, the administration of the Holy Communion in both kinds, the service in English and not in Latin, and a variety of things of that sort; but the only prohibition in negative words is that which I have mentioned to your Lordship.

My learned friend Mr. Coleridge, in his argument, 21795.

and my learned friend Mr. Stephens, certainly yesterday, and probably in his first argument, said that the lights prescribed by the injunctions were lights before the reserved Sacrament. The arguments against that seem to me, with all deference to my learned friends, conclusive. First of all, whenever the lights are ordered in Latin it is in these words: "Dum sollemnia peraguntur." Now it is impossible to take those words and apply them to a light set on fire, illuminated and burning after these sollemnia had been performed. It is during the actio, or ceremonia, according to Perrone. My Lord, the word "Sacrament" is, I think I may venture to say, with one exception only, and that in a hymn, and therefore rhetorically used, never applied except by our own Church, now to the reserved Sacrament. There is always another word used. The light before the reserved Sacrament (using that word "Sacrament" not because it is correct, but for convenience sake) is not placed upon the altar, but is always suspended, and the light or lights before the reserved Sacrament are invariably odd and not even. It may be one, or three, or thirteen, or seventeen, but it is never two or four or six, or anything of that kind; that I will prove to your Lordship in a moment. But the argument is this—if what I have stated to your Lordship as the heads of these four propositions be correct, then my learned friends are entirely wrong when they say that the "lights before the Sacrament" mean a light before the reserved Sacrament. I heard no authority, and I read of none in my learned friend Mr. Coleridge's speech, except his own ipse dixit for the suggestion: it suited, I was going to say their argument, it suited their purpose to say it was before the reserved Sacrament; but beyond the bare statement there was nothing in the shape of argument to support that bare statement.

Now, my Lord, after these remarks upon this branch of the argument, I have here a book which with your Lordship's more perfect knowledge of these matters I am always unwilling to refer to, and it certainly has this particularity about it in excess, that whereas many books are difficult of reference, I think the palm of difficulty is borne by Lynwood in his Provinciale; for if there be a book in which it is difficult to find a thing, it is Lynwood. I do not know whether there are more editions than one.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, there are, but I think you have probably got the Oxford edition of 1679.

(Dr. Deane.) It is the edition of 1679, so I can refer your Lordship in the vulgar way to page 236, book 3, title 23: "Tempore quo missarum sollemnia peraguntur, accendantur due candelæ, vel adminus una." Therefore that shows that these two candles running through the whole of the English service were lighted before the host was consecrated; and therefore of course before the host was reserved.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You see the gloss upon that, Dr. Deane. Just at the side, "Est enim a parte juris ordinatum, quod sacerdos sine lumine ignis non celebrat missam."

(Dr. Deane.) That strengthens my argument, and I am much obliged to your Lordship. "Peraguntur" was a strong word, but of course the other strengthens my view.

Now, a few authorities upon the first point, that is, that the two lights were placed on the altar during the celebration of the Holy Communion; of course Lynwood is the first proof of that. Then in Thorpe's "Ancient Laws," vol. 2, page 252, 253, "Let them put the sanctuary into the best order, and let there be always lights burning in the church when Mass is singing."

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is that, an Anglo-Saxon order?

(Dr. Deane.) It is the "Ancient Laws," by Thorpe. It will be Anglo-Saxon, I suppose. Then in Bede's Homilies, 42, p. 315: "Ornatis studiosius templi parietibus, et pluribus accensis luminaribus." Durandus in his Rationale says, "At the horns of the altar two candlesticks are placed to signify the joy

"of Jews and Gentiles at the nativity of Christ." I read that passage, not so much for the authority of Durandus, but for this purpose. My friend Mr. Stephens said in the course of his argument yesterday, that all things are gone to which a superstitious or an abused meaning can be attached. My Lord, there is not, I believe, one single thing which can be named to which a superstitious usage or some symbolism has not been attached. With respect to these two lights, we know that the Church of England has attached this meaning, "in the signification that Christ is the light of the world." That is our meaning; it is a meaning (again referring to the passage on ceremonies) which cannot come within any of the reasons for abolishing, if that be a ceremony, the lights. But I am not concerned with the various symbols which may have been attached to this or to that ceremony, because, if I am to argue that, my Lord, there is a word which is not of classical Latinity, and therefore I am not responsible for the quantity of it; and I cannot find the quantity marked anywhere; but there is a word in the missal with respect to the ornaments of the altar, which says that there shall be "cusinus" on the table, which is a cushion, of course. Well, following out this matter as far as I could, as I was bound to follow it out, I actually found this cusinus was to be put under the epistle when it was being read, and that even that innocent cushion, by the ingenuity of certain imaginative persons, was made to symbolise the tenderness of heart with which the reader should read the epistle. Why, my Lord, one knows of course the armoury from which my friend has drawn that; he has drawn it from Puritan sources. But the Puritans objected to a surplice. Why? Because it was "the last rag of Popery." They objected to a square cap. Why? Because they said, "It is against the law of nature and the law of God, who has given men round heads." All this your Lordship will find, and, as I said before, I am not responsible for the absurdities or the imaginations of men; I have only got to deal with that which I find retained, or with that which I find not forbidden and sanctioned by usage.

(The Dean of the Arches.) In this passage you referred me to in Lynwood the same reason is given for candles: "Candela namque sic ardens significat ipsum Christum qui est splendor lucis aeternae."

(Dr. Deane.) I am much obliged to your Lordship. I was going to say, and I may say it now, that in and throughout every book I have looked at with reference to the Church of England that one reason is given, showing the consistency with which our Church—this Church of England—has adopted that symbol, and has excluded all others. In Wilkins' Concilia, vol. 2, page 132: "In quarum (missarum) celebratione duo saltem luminaria habentur, tum ob reverentiam Sacramenti, quum extinctionis casum fortuitum quorum, semper alterum fit de cera." Then there is a passage from a person whose works I have not brought here, but which are full of interest and information, Le Brun. There is a French edition in four volumes, and there is also an edition published at Venice in two volumes. The Venice edition is in Latin. Le Brun, in tracing the history of lights—

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is the title of the work?

(Dr. Deane.) I am quoting from vol. 1, page 69, of the French edition. He gives another reason for it: "Les juifs ont fait et font encore brûler continuellement une lampe devant le livre de la loi de Moïse; et il convenoit bien mieux que l'Évangile annoncé solennellement fut précédé par des lumières qui marquassent le respect du saint livre, qui porte la lumière dans les obscurités de l'ancienne loi." And I remember in some of these old books which one has had to refer to there is another reason given, that these lights are as necessary by day as by night, since without Christ the light one would blunder and stumble at much by day as by night. The next passage from Le Brun is more important for my purpose. It is from vol. i. page 70. He says, speaking of a very ancient time: "Enfin depuis ce tems-là on a allumé dès la commencement de la messe, et pendant quelques offices divins, par les mêmes raisons mystérieuses, c'est à dire, pour faire paraître un signe de joie dans les offices, qu'on a voulu faire plus solennels, et pour faire plus sensiblement connu au peuple assemblé, qu'il devoit penser à Jesus Christ, qui est la vraie lumière." Now, in that passage your Lordship sees the singular and remarkable coincidence with the ceremonial part of the Prayer Book: "qu'on a voulu faire plus solennels, et pour faire plus sensiblement connu au peuple assemblé." The whole of the reason for preserving certain ceremonies (if lights be a ceremony, which I do not admit) is that they may edify the people and may excite in them a feeling of reverence at the time. So much for that first branch of the argument.

The next is, that there is no evidence whatever to prove that two lights were ever placed before the reserved Sacrament, or let me use, because they are more convenient, the words "before the Eucharist." In Martene (De Antiquis Eccles. Ritibus, Lib. i., c. v.; Art. iii., vol. i., p. 252,) he speaks of the vessels in which the Eucharist is to be reserved in these terms: "Antiqui dupleis generis vasa hunc ad usum adhibebant, turres scilicet aut columbas;" and, referring to a book of very considerable interest, namely, Dr. Rock's Hierurgia, page 506, you have an authority given in a note for saying that both these, whether the turres or the columbae, were suspended and not placed upon the altar. Both were suspended by chains. "The blessed Eucharist," says Dr. Rock, "was reserved under the form of bread, for the communion of the dying, in a hanging vessel of gold or silver, made sometimes in the form of a turret, but more generally like a dove, which was suspended by a cord from the interior of the altar canopy, or ciborium. In process of time this custom was changed, and the blessed Sacrament contained in a pyxis, a cup resembling a chalice with a cover, was deposited within a species of little temple erected on the altar." In "The Church of our Fathers," vol. iii., part ii., p. 208, Dr. Rock states, "The first wooden or stone tabernacle" (such as the little temple) "resting on the altar seen in this land was put up in Queen Mary's reign." Now observe the force of that. The first time it was placed on the altar was in Queen Mary's reign.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The first time what was placed on the altar, the reserved Eucharist?

(Dr. Deane.) The wooden or stone tabernacle; in other words, turres and the columbae were suspended.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The stone or wooden tabernacle would be of course placed on the altar itself, not suspended, but the turres and the columbae you say were suspended.

(Dr. Deane.) Yes, my Lord, and that is borne out as to the suspension in Lynwood. It is in Gloss. E, page 248 of the edition your Lordship has: "Cum clausura," "usus observatus," showing the use of the Church of England. That being the use of the Church of England, it is quite evident that the lights, if they were to be placed before the reserved Sacrament, would not be directed to be placed before it but under it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Have you done with the passage in Lynwood?

(Dr. Deane.) I have done with it because I feel the greatest pain in occupying your Lordship's time upon it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then look at the gloss at Questio, beginning "Sed quæro." About the middle of that you will see "Unde cum ibi non fiat mentio de tabernaculo, et parochiani teneantur solummodo ad ibi expressa ut ibi patet in sec. alto apparet quod onus talis tabernaculi pertinere debeat ad curatum et non ad parochianos." That is to say, there was a question whether the incumbent or the parishioners were bound to find the tabernaculum.

(Dr. Deane.) Yes, my Lord, that was the tabernacle in which this was placed.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But it was long before Queen Mary's reign, "et hoc verum puto nisi consuetudo aliud operetur."

(Dr. Deane.) I remember now, my Lord. In Rock's Hierurgia there is a learned discussion, ciborium and tabernaculum, and the coroni and the pyxes, and there you will find an account of the several vessels in which the Eucharist was reserved. Down to the word "pyxis" being introduced, the general term was "tabernaculum." There was also the ciborium under which it hung, and which from its shape derived its name, being cup-shaped, inverted, as your Lordship sees in almost every Roman Catholic church into which you go. Whether it was that receptacle in which it was to be hung, or that receptacle in which it was to be placed, still the question arose who was to pay for it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The whole of that is very curious, because if you look at the provincial order itself it orders the Eucharist to be placed in "pyxide pulcherrima." Then upon the word "pyxide" the gloss by way of explanation is this: "Sic ergo tabernaculum et pyxis non supponunt pro eodem quia pyxis poni debet in tabernaculo." That is to say, the pyxis was put inside the tabernaculum and the tabernaculum was put on the altar, I suppose. The question to me rather is whether Dr. Rock knew Lynwood?

(Dr. Deane.) The passage in Rock is this: "The first wooden or stone tabernacle resting on the altar seen in this land was in Queen Mary's reign."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Had Dr. Rock looked at Lynwood? Roman liturgists are so apt not to look at the use of England, which was so different from the use of Rome. However, I do not know that I need detain you with it, Dr. Deane, it is only that it followed upon the passage that you were reading.

(Dr. Deane.) Your Lordship sees that Lynwood, after speaking of that English custom, states his preference for the other customs.

(The Dean of the Arches.) He does so; he states what is very remarkable, that the English never would give up their custom.

(Dr. Deane.) Yes; and it explains the first introduction in Mary's time, when the English had to give up a great many things, including their lives, upon matters with which both Holland and Portugal were apt to deal rather sharply.

Well, I think that will be sufficient to deal with the second point, namely, the question of those lights; and now I come to the third. In Wilkin's Concilia, vol. 1. p. 667, you have the constitution of William of Cantilupe, A.D. 1240: "In Ecclesiis autem saltem quarum amplæ sunt facultates, continue lampas ardeat, die videlicet et nocte, coram redemptionis nostræ pignore supradicto." That is the continuing of whatever force may be attributed to the word "suspended" upon the previous point.

Now, my Lord, this next matter is a singular one; but knowing the extreme care with which these things were worded, that they were not words scattered abroad without consideration, it is remarkable, I think, how many words are used to avoid the use of the word "sacrament" respecting the reserved Eucharist.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But before passing from the subject I must tell you that on looking more attentively into the whole of this I am not sure that Rock's argument is displaced by this gloss. I think it was "hung." I thought it was "placed." But looking through all these glosses upon the Provincial of John of Peckham I think it does show that the Eucharist was fixed in a pyx, that pyx being in tabernaculum, and that that tabernaculum was hung up, and not stationary.

(Dr. Deane.) According to the English custom?

(The Dean of the Arches.) According to the English custom.

(Dr. Deane.) Now, my Lord, the word "sacrament" per se is scarcely ever used with respect to the reserved Sacrament. If it is used it is used with an epithet conferring dignity upon it, or expressing something beyond what the word would otherwise express. In the following page of Lynwood's to the one I have been upon, namely, at page 249, "Eucharistia" is the term used. You will find in that page the term "Eucharistia" and "Eucharistia sacramentum."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, that is the beginning of the order.

(Dr. Deane.) Yes; "Dignissimum statuimus ut Sacramentum Eucharistia." You will find a still more sacred term, "Ipsum dominicum corpus."

(The Dean of the Arches.) But do you hold those words to be confined to the reserved Sacrament?

(Dr. Deane.) I think they are entirely of different meaning from the word "sacrament" in the injunction—of an entirely different meaning.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the argument upon that point.

(Dr. Deane.) That is the argument of course; such words as "Ipsum dominicum corpus" would not apply to the lights burnt "dum solennia peraguntur." Because the most warm upholder of the doctrine of transubstantiation never supposed that before the words of consecration were uttered that change had taken place which—

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have got your argument at all events upon that.

(Mr. Deane.) That is the argument, so that I think upon these four propositions the assertion of my learned friends that this must mean before the reserved Sacrament wholly fails.

Now it is singular enough, there having been no objections taken to these lights antecedent to 1549, that almost immediately after 1549 we find objections begin to be taken to them. The objections present themselves in a somewhat singular form, and the history of them is not very easily got at; but we may take it perhaps the strongest exponent of the theory is Cardwell, in a note which he gives in his first volume of the Documentary Annals, page 74, "Articles to be followed and observed according to the King's Majesty's Injunctions, that all parsons, vicars, and curates omit in the reading of the injunctions all such as make mention of the Popish Mass, of chant-riës, of candles upon the altar, or any other such like thing." Now it is curious certainly that one should have to deal with the validity of injunctions and yet have to meet a document which is but an injunction itself, if it be that, which points to the previous injunctions. These are articles to be followed according to the King's Majesty's Injunctions and proceedings, and it refers to those injunctions, which are the injunctions of 1547. There can be no doubt about that; and I say it is curious that one should have to deal with a document as of some effect which recognizes the very validity of the injunctions which are impugned in this case. That is the first, the second is this: "For an uniformity that no minister do counterfeit the Popish Mass, washing his fingers," and so on. Then, towards the end, "ringing of sacring bells, or setting any light upon the Lord's board at any time."

Now, the observation upon these injunctions made by Cardwell in the note is this:—"Instructions given in charge to the visitors on a new Royal visitation, and differing in some respects from the former injunctions—for instance, in the injunctions (No. II.), and in Cranmer's Articles founded upon them (No. X.), two lights were allowed upon the high altar. In these articles it is forbidden that there should be any 'candles upon the altar,' or 'any light upon the Lord's board at any time.'" Then he refers to Ridley's injunctions, which your Lordship has had before you several times, and then he says, "It is clear that these Articles were drawn up after the Act of Uniformity had passed (Jan. 21, 1549), which enjoined that the new (the first) Book of Common Prayer should be used from the following Whit Sunday, as may be shown not only from the second, but also from the eighth Article, which was taken from the following rubric of that book," and so on. Then passing from that, he says upon that subject, at page 75, "But though issued after the publication of the Prayer Book, these Articles are of the same year, and afford evidence of the contemporary practice in matters of rites and ceremonies. They prove accordingly that candles upon the Lord's Table being especially mentioned (see Article 2) as not included among those ceremonies which were appointed in the Book of Common Prayer, are not among those ornaments 'which were in this Church of England by authority of Parliament in the second year of King Edward VI.'" My Lord, I differ altogether from that reasoning. It seems to me to be impossible to adopt it. The learned author, whom it was my privilege to have known, I think has confused two things. I venture to think, and according to my argument upon that point I am well founded in so thinking, they are quite distinct altogether, I think they were mere ornaments. "They prove accordingly that candles upon the Lord's Table, being especially mentioned as not included among those ceremonies which were appointed in the Book of Common Prayer, are not among those ornaments." I do not think that the ceremonies were kissing the Lord's Table, or blessing his eyes with the paten or sudary. I think that ceremonies were such as I have endeavoured to point out to your Lordship, and which the Prayer Book points at. But then, when I am told that this is evidence of contemporary usage, I ask for the authority of that Injunction—the Injunction which forbids them. It is unsigned; there is no trace by whose authority it was issued. It might have been a draft, and never acted upon. I care not for Ridley's injunctions referred to in the note, because I know how the Privy Council dealt with Ridley's injunctions in Westerton v. Liddell, where, says my Lord Kingsdown, "This injunction extended only to Ridley's own diocese, and probably had no binding force, even there." Therefore Ridley's injunctions do not help out the matter, and these injunctions, which are the only things assuming even the shape of an authority against the lights at this time, fail in that which is most necessary to give them effect—namely, the date, the name or names, and, in fact, in everything that is essential to give validity to a document used to displace the whole custom of the Church of England; nay, more, my Lord, to do more than that, to displace that which, if my argument has any foundation at all, was left untouched by the Act of Parliament and by the Prayer Book, and issued subsequent to them, even according to the learned annotator's own observation.

I am still upon the question of whether the rubrics are exhaustive or not. For a moment let me turn to Westerton v. Liddell, at page 187 of Moore's Report. The passage which I shall refer to is this: "Here the rubrics of the Prayer Book become important. Their Lordships entirely agree with the opinions expressed by the learned judges in these cases [that is the cases appealed from] and in Faulkner v. Lichfield, that in the performance of the services, rites, and ceremonies ordered by the Prayer Book, the directions contained in it must be strictly observed; that no omission and no addition can be permitted; but they are not prepared to hold that the use of all articles not expressly mentioned in the Rubric, although quite consistent with, and even subsidiary to the service, is forbidden. Organs are not mentioned, yet because they are auxiliary to the singing they are allowed. Pews, cushions to kneel upon, pulpit-cloths, hassocks, seats by the Communion Table, are in constant use, yet they are not mentioned in the Rubric." Of course the use of that passage for my purpose is to show that the Rubric, according to the holding of the Privy Council, is not to be taken as exhaustive, and that the argument that all that which is not prescribed is forbidden fails.

Many things we know have of late, I mean have since the Reformation, been constantly objected to as being more or less tending to Romanism. Scarcely a thing that I know of has not been objected to, from the Prayer Book itself to the very smallest ceremony or manual act. What is the construction put by the Privy Council upon these several injunctions, upon the several Prayer Books, and upon the Acts of Uniformity? That all that tended to superstition, all that was burdensome to the people, all that was a dark and dumb ceremony, all that was a matter of greed or of lucre to the priest, all that had been an object of superstition, was abolished, but that in other words, that which had not been so abused, which was not likely save by the general infirmity of all human beings to be abused, was reserved and kept. Nobody is bound to speak with greater respect than myself of the learned judge who first gave judgment in Westerton v. Liddell, but, my Lord, it is my duty to impugn that judgment, and I must do it whether I like it or not. I say that it is a great mistake when a judge, however eminent he may be, allows his feelings to carry him away from the point which he has to decide, and when, instead of reasoning, he falls into declamation. The learned judge seemed to think in that case, for instance, with respect to the coloured cloths and matters of that sort, that they had to do and were necessarily connected with the Mass, and says he, "We have done away with the Mass, and with all those things connected with the Mass," and for a page or a page and a half of his judgment that is the strain of eloquence, if you please, but certainly not of judicial reasoning, into which that learned person was betrayed by his feelings, my Lord, upon that point; and upon the whole of the reasoning, which is more to my purpose, my Lords of the Privy Council differ from him. But, says my friend, though they differ from him on such a point as this, "at all events they do not differ from him with respect to the lights and the lace cloths." For the best of reasons a lace cloth is not a fair linen cloth, so that if not expressly it was by direct implication contrary to what is prescribed by the present Prayer Book, not contrary to what is prescribed in Edward VI's Prayer Book, because in Edward VI's First Prayer Book there is no mention of a cloth at all. My argument upon that is this: in Edward VI's book that cloth was used which had been in use previously, although there was no direction for it, for we cannot suppose that Holy Communion was celebrated upon a bare board.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Still, failing that, the argument might be this: the Rubric expressly orders that the elements shall be placed upon the corporas.

(Dr. Deane.) No; upon the corporas or else upon the paten.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is a direction for laying it upon the corporas; would not that imply that there was no linen cloth?

(Dr. Deane.) I think not, because we have the paten and the linen cloth now.

(The Dean of the Arches.) How could it be laid upon the corporas otherwise? It tells you to lay it upon the corporas. In order to do that you would have to remove the fair linen cloth.

(Dr. Deane.) No, pardon me, my Lord; the corporas would be on the linen cloth. The linen cloth would be on the table, and the corporas upon the linen cloth.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Oh, do you hold that the corporas covered the linen cloth?

(Dr. Deane.) No, not covered it, but was placed upon it, just as a linen cloth is now used to cover the elements during the service. I imagine that what that refers to is this: there might have been a state of things in the parish which did not allow them to have a paten; perhaps they could not afford it; but they would have a corporas, and the bread, in order to be decently preserved, and not scattered all over the table, was to be placed upon this small linen cloth, which linen cloth itself was upon another linen cloth. There is nothing I dislike so much as using commonplace illustrations; but in relation to this I would say, just as in our own houses we have a tablecloth on the table, and we have a napkin upon the tablecloth for use for special purposes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, it may be so.

(Dr. Deane.) When your Lordship was good enough to direct my attention to that I was upon the question of the lace and the linen cloth, and your Lordship will see, I think—at least I do—how very curious the Rubric is. My argument is, the cloth remained—not the corporas, but the cloth remained in the Rubric of 1549 exactly as it had been antecedent to that, ornamented. Then I find the Rubric of 1552 and 1557 disposes of that as it does of other matters connected with the table, for it says: “The table, having at the Communion time a fair white linen cloth upon it, shall stand,” and so on; and that Rubric is followed out as to the fair linen cloth, I think, totidem verbis, in the two other Rubrics of 1604 and 1662. So that my argument is, here you have it necessary to alter something, namely, the plain linen cloth for the lace, and there is an express Rubric for that in the subsequent Prayer Books.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say that the lace was forbidden by this later Rubric?

(Dr. Deane.) It was expressly forbidden by these two Rubrics requiring a fair linen cloth, and that was the construction put upon it by the Privy Council when the case was before them.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am not quite satisfied about that corporas.

(Dr. Deane.) My Lord, amongst the multitude of authorities or illustrations cited to your Lordship was the Chantry Act. Out of respect to my friends I refer to that, but the lights forbidden in the Chantry Act were lights which were burnt before images. They had nothing to do with these two lights before the altars. It is impossible to look at the Chantry Act without at once seeing that that was the object of that Act, and that it is impossible to introduce that into the present discussion with any effect.

So much then for the year 1549. It must always be borne in mind of course that the chief person concerned in these alterations was Archbishop Cranmer. You must look upon him as really the director of that book; there being two persons who had the chief management of matters at that time. I do not think I am wrong in saying that as between the Protector Somerset (except as to his tendency, which I shall have to say a few words upon presently), and Archbishop Cranmer, I do not think there will be much doubt that it will be the latter who would be the ruling spirit, and who would have the guiding hand in them.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Are you going to found any argument upon that?

(Dr. Deane.) Yes; I am going to found this argument, that subsequent to the death of the Protector, as we find mentioned in Burnet, there was a general idea that matters would be restored to the state in which they were before the First Prayer Book; so that the whole thing was in a check, as it were. There was on the one side the old influence—that is the old Roman Catholic influence. There was growing up (and this is the point I want to draw your attention to) strongly a Calvinistic element; and between these two, running alongside with them, was a middle influence, whether it be the Lutheran influence or an influence apart from the Lutheran influence, still an influence more nearly approaching the Lutheran than anything else. Now we know as a matter of history that down to 1552 the growing party was the Calvinistic party. Therefore the changes introduced between 1549 and 1552 are changes such as one would expect, namely, changes towards the Calvinistic side. But the Calvinistic side was not the side of Archbishop Cranmer, nor on the other hand certainly was it the side which the Protector was inclined to go with. I am not concerned with the change that took place in the Prayer Book of 1552, for the reason I stated to your Lordship, namely, that I go back by the express words of the rubric of 1662 to the book of 1549. It was merely therefore an illustration of the argument which I venture to submit to you. Well, of course, Queen Mary's reign put an end to all this. Queen Mary's reign sent a number of people abroad who, at her death, in fact during her reign, had more or less influence in this country. The great influence in one direction was the influence of the Geneva school,—that is the Calvin school, modified somewhat by the other reformers; but still no doubt the tendency of the Calvin school, which developed itself into Puritanism afterwards, and Puritanism in its strongest form, prevailed. Of course we know what took place in James 1st's time, and Charles 1st's time, and when they were the dominant party in Cromwell's time. When we come to Charles 2nd's time, I have here an account of the proceedings of a committee appointed by the House of Lords in the year 1641 (somewhat before Charles 2nd's time), which is set out in Cardwell's Conferences, page 272.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Are you going to leave Cranmer?

(Dr. Deane.) For the present.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Are you going back to him?

(Dr. Deane.) No, I do not think so.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Because you have not told me how you will deal with that fact of his being the ruling spirit, whether it will go in favour of lights or against it.

(Dr. Deane.) In favour of lights certainly up to 1549, but the growing spirit of Calvinism was too strong for him at last.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Your argument is that Cranmer was the leading person in the construction of the Prayer Book, and would have been desirous to retain the lights.

(Dr. Deane.) That is the argument.

Then referring to this it is entitled, “Innovation of Discipline.” They object to this: “Turning of the Holy Table altarwise and most commonly calling it an altar; bowing towards it or towards the east many times, with three congees, but usually in every motion, access or recess in the church. Advancing candlesticks in many churches upon the altar, so called.” I am reminded here, though perhaps it is a circumstance I ought not to mention, it was my fate to have been at school at Winchester when the Bishop of Hereford was warden of the college, and I remember distinctly as a fact, strange as it may sound now (and he was no very high churchman), that he never left that chapel without turning round and bowing to the altar. I was mentioning that circumstance the other day to a dean of our church, and he told me that the Dean of Christchurch in his time did the same thing.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Oh, but much later; in my time, the dean and canons invariably bowed to the altar the whole time I was a student of Christchurch, invariably.

(Dr. Deane.) I am much obliged to your Lordship for bearing me out in that. It only shows how lax we are when we refer to a usage or custom. This was one of the things objected to in 1641: “advancing candlesticks on the altar, so called,” and then, “in making canopies over the altar, so called, with traverses and curtains on each side and before it. In compelling all communicants to come up before the rails, and there to receive. In advancing crucifixes and images upon the parafront, or altar-cloth, so called. In reading some part of the Morning Prayer at the Holy Table, when there is no Communion celebrated. By the minister turning his back to the west and his face to the east when he pronounceth the Creed or reads prayers. By reading the Litany in the midst of the body of the church in many of the parochial churches. By pretending for their innovations the injunctions and advertisements of Queen Elizabeth, which are not in force, but by way of commentary and imposition; and by putting in the liturgy printed ‘secundo tertio Edwardi Sexti,’ which the Parliament hath reformed and laid aside.” That was quite true because the Parliament had taken the other book. Then they also objected to the credence or side table. These were the objections which they took, and the purpose I use this for is to show the strong objections which were taken by the growing party to the very same things which are objected to now—the Calvinistic party objecting to the High Church party.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is a very curious paper you have referred to; do you know anything about it? I see it is taken from a manuscript in the Bodleian, but I do not remember anything about a history of how the committee came to be appointed. I see there is a reference to Baxter's Life of Sylvester.

(Dr. Deane.) When we come to the later conference, the Savoy Conference, there was, as I pointed out to your Lordship this morning, the same objection taken which was taken to that Rubric of Edward VI., specifying the ornaments, &c. I am very glad now to be able to borrow the words of an extremely learned person, who has, so far as I know, in this book at least shown no bias one way or the other. I allude to an argument upon the use of lights in "Hook's Ecclesiastical Dictionary."

(The Dean of the Arches.) The Dean of Chichester I suppose?

(Dr. Deane.) Yes. The title is, "Lights on the Altar." I will not read it at length to your Lordship, but he speaks thus: "Among the ornaments of the Church enjoined by the laws and sanctioned by the usage of the Church of England are two lights upon the altar, to be a symbol to the people that Christ, in his twofold nature, is the very true light of the world." Then he refers to the Rubric, and he refers next to the Injunctions, and argues thus (I presume upon a part of the judgment of Dr. Lushington), "Some persons object that those Injunctions [that is the Injunctions of 1547] are not to the purpose, because we have no high altar; but the truth is, that it is the high altar alone which is left in our churches, all the rest being removed by authority on account of the idolatrous and corrupt practices which were connected with them." That is to say, all the side altars; the altar of the sepulchre on the one side, and the other altar on the other side, all these are removed, and the altars of the chancels are to remain as they have been previously. "It is also objected to by some who would be above falling into so great and unhappy a mistake as to suppose that the High Altar is removed from our churches, that 'the Sacrament,' before which on the altar the lights were to be burnt has been taken away: for, say they, by this term was meant the consecrated wafer suspended on a pyx on the altar. If, then, this is taken away, so also must the lights be taken away which were burnt before it. But even allowing that 'the Sacrament' in this sense is removed, the Injunction gives another reason for lights, and may surely be allowed to speak its meaning better than those who must, to serve their turn, give to it an idolatrous meaning. The Injunction does not say that the lights were to remain before the Sacrament as an additional kind of adoration of the Host, but for the signification that Christ is the very true light of the world." He then goes on to speak of these Injunctions, and of the practices in collegiate churches, in chapels, and in some cathedrals.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You see Dr. Lushington seems to admit the legality of the candlesticks throughout his judgment.

(Dr. Deane.) Yes, my Lord.

(Mr. Stephens.) That matter was not before him, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There were no candles used in that church.

(Mr. Stephens.) Your Lordship will recollect the candles were not lighted—there was an affidavit put in to that effect.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I meant to put it to Dr. Deane, whether anything would follow from the admitted legality of candlesticks? Perhaps Mr. Hannen will deal with that subject.

(Dr. Deane.) I have never been able to look at that question without remembering that charge of the Lord Bishop of London (for whom I entertain the greatest respect), which always caused a smile to come over me almost irresistibly; for it was, I think, the most singular way of getting over a difficulty that one can conceive. Dean Hook proceeds, "In how many parochial churches and chapels of ancient chapelries, or private chapels in this kingdom, candles on the altar have been retained since the time of Puritans, we know not; in some they certainly have been, but surely the rule of the Church being express for their use, the custom of those whose ritual and furniture is most carefully maintained under the eye of persons best qualified to judge in such matters, and the guardians of the Church's constitution, is sufficient at the very least to serve as a witness to the rule, and to make it clear that it is still the rule, the acknowledged rule, of the Church of England." He then goes on to refer to what I have glanced at, namely, the neglect of them in consequence of the troubles of Queen Mary's time, and he then gives authority at some length for them, referring to ancient and modern writers; but I will only read this passage: "After all, are candlesticks and lights mere ornaments? They are something more, though ornamental in themselves and in the position they occupy. They are for use, and are properly church furniture, and therefore no more within the contemplation of the Rubric respecting ornaments than the stalls, desks, eagle, communion rails, organ, or any other part of the permanent or moveable furniture of the church. There appears no sound reason why, when the church must be lit, the ancient custom of lighting the chancel by means of two candlesticks on the holy table should not be kept up according to ancient and unbroken usage."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That rather applies to lighting them in the dark.

(Dr. Deane.) That applies to lighting them in the dark. "But if no part of the ecclesiastical furniture is to stand in the church except when actually in use, the rule would lead to moveable pulpits, organs, &c., and indeed would be in a great measure impracticable." And for this he cites Stephens' Common Prayer Book. I have great respect for my friend Mr. Stephens; I prefer his opinion in chambers to his argument in court; but even his opinion in chambers I do not altogether like to accept, because my friend now, in this case, relying upon the injunction which I have read to your Lordship with respect to candlesticks not being put on the Lord's Table at any time, gives the go-by to that injunction, and says, "I think, after all, they may as well stay there."

(The Dean of the Arches.) It seems to me people are very shy about pronouncing an opinion about the lawfulness of this injunction. I have in vain endeavoured to elicit the opinion of counsel on that point.

(Dr. Deane.) Upon this question of disuse, no doubt in many places they have been disused, but there are a great many observations which occur to me upon that subject. What has been, until of late years, the tendency of things within and without, at all events, the fabric and the walls of the churches of England? How all these articles disappeared there is no great difficulty in imagining. The soldiers took some by force, the covetous took others by stealth, and the carelessness and neglect of the proper guardians of those ornaments allowed others to disappear. My Lord, my learned friend has spoken of the gorgeous ceremonies of the Church of Rome and the simple rites of the Church of England; and he said that this is a question between those two systems. I think my learned friend in so doing has begged the question. I do not think that using the words "gorgeous ceremony" necessarily implies something contrary to the Church of England. I quite admit that when he makes use of the word "simplicity," he is in some sense using a word which applies to a church which, as it is my misfortune, it may be your Lordship's misfortune, to remember, showed a simplicity of which we may say it was not simplex munditiis. Many persons who hear me now—all who are above 40 years old, I should say, remember that certainly the walls of the church were not much cared for. In the place of the care and possibly of the paint and colouring which you now have on many of our church walls, there were various stains and various colours from damp and from rain which had been allowed to come through the roof—from negligence of every kind. If one looked at the state of the pews certainly it was not very creditable. Altar cloths, or cloths for the Communion Table, were there, it is true, but in what state? Torn, dirty—a disgrace to any house, to say nothing of the house of God. My Lord, we are told by a great authority—no less than that of my learned friend Mr. Coleridge—that so long ago as the time of St. Bernard there were dandy priests and greedy clergymen. Dandy priests is an expression that catches the ear; but what does it mean? Does it mean a person who you can say, in doing a thing apart from his own daily life, when he is discharging that which he considers his duty, does it in the most careful, elaborate, dignified, and rich manner in which he can? Can you say fairly that a priest is a dandy priest who, careless and indifferent of himself, is only careful for matters which concern his duty in the church of God? My Lord, comparisons are proverbially disagreeable, and I would not have entered upon the subject if I had not been provoked to it by my learned friends. My learned friend Mr. Coleridge speaks of a greedy priesthood. I have referred to the state of the churches such as we remember them. What was the state of the clergy? We have all of us read Lord Macaulay's description. Is there such a statute on the books as 1 & 2 Victoria, cap. 106? Was such a thing unknown to the Church of England as clergymen holding livings to the extent of three, four, five, ay, and seven thousand a year, in plurality—living perhaps upon one of them, and leaving the rest to be cared for by a curate at a salary fixed so low that the Legislature was obliged to step in and fix a tariff for them? If he was young, he was the best shot or the best rider in the county; if he was old, his gardens were the best, his wine was the choicest, and his cook the most skilful in the parish. He vied with, and beat the squire. That, my Lord, is a state of things which has passed away. Where was the dandy priesthood, where was the greedy clergy, then or now? Now, dandy priests may be, greedy clergy may be; but the dandyism is shown in the worship of God, and in the care taken of their churches, and the greed is shown in self-denial, that they may have more to spend in the discharge of their duties.

My Lord, I am unwilling to leave this branch of the case without referring to a passage perfectly well known to you, but which seems to me (particularly looking to the quarter of the country from whence this case comes) not altogether inapplicable: I am going to read (from Appendix A to the Report of the Ritual Commission, page 122) the words of the Bishop of Exeter, in the year 1851: "But without alluding to particular cases, let me make one general remark. "Where the congregation consists mainly of the poorest orders, there we commonly observe a great love of a majestic and even elaborate service. The ornaments of their church; the storied glass; the painted, and it may be gilded, walls; the Table of the Lord elevated above the rest, and decked with sober yet costly furniture; the pealing organ; the chanted psalms; the surpliced choristers; the solemnity of the whole ritual—gladdens, while it elevates their minds: they recognize in it their own high privilege as Christians, and rejoice to find themselves equal participants with their richest neighbours in the homage thus paid to the common Lord and Father of all. In truth, when we consider the little which the poor man has to delight his heart and touch his imagination in his own squalid home, we ought to rejoice that he can find enjoyment in the house of prayer, his Father's house. For this reason few occurrences have affected me more than the lamentations of the poor worshippers, in one of the districts of the metropolis, when they saw, or thought they saw, at the dictation of a riotous and lawless mob of strangers, the approaching surrender of the ritual which they loved, and which was their weekly, to "many among them the daily, solace of that poverty to which the providence of God had consigned them." I do not know that one could find a more apposite, certainly a more eloquent, commentary upon that part of the Prayer Book with respect to ceremonies than there is in this passage of the charge of my Lord Bishop of Exeter.

My Lord, I come now to the question of the mixed chalice, and before I go into that, there was an argument of my learned friend Dr. Stephens, which was used yesterday, and which out of respect to him I would fain answer. Mr. Stephens was pleased to say yesterday, that in answering this charge of the mixed chalice in the articles, we had omitted the words, "This is my blood of the New Testament." Well, my Lord, as a fact it is so. I wish my learned friend were here. I say it with the greatest respect, I am sure, towards him, but I must say I think it was an unworthy objection to take, and for this reason, that referring to the fourth article, and seeing the way in which we have admitted the facts, I do not think that in a case of this importance it was worth while noticing such an omission as that in the answer. Now the charge is this, that he mixed water with the wine intended to be consecrated immediately before the prayer of consecration, or at some time during the celebration of the Holy Communion. It is extremely vague. Of course if it meant immediately before the prayer of consecration, the simple answer was a denial, and we must have been acquitted; because, being a criminal charge, it could not have been proved. However, the admission is in these terms upon this point, he admits that he mixed water with the wine intended to be consecrated during the celebration of the Holy Communion immediately before the prayer for the church militant, but not at any other time.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Just see what is admitted. He admits that he has mixed water with the wine intended to be consecrated during the celebration of the Holy Communion. It is rather ambiguous.

(Dr. Deane.) "The said proctor admits that the said Thomas Simpson has, as is alleged in the fourth of said articles, within two years last past, at the public administration of the Lord's Supper or Holy Communion in the said parish church of East Teignmouth, mixed water with the wine intended to be consecrated during the celebration of the Holy Communion."

(The Dean of the Arches.) I suppose that means he mixed water with the wine during the celebration?

(Dr. Deane.) Yes, my Lord, because it goes on to say, "immediately before the prayer for the church militant, but not at any other time, and has afterwards delivered," and so on.

The other matter was the elevation. I was mistaken. I beg your Lordship's pardon.

Now the arguments in defence of Mr. Simpson's practice are five. The first is the affirmative argument from the words of the book, the second is the argument I have pressed upon your Lordship before, namely, the answer to this, that what is not ordered is forbidden. The third argument is a poor one, but poor by comparison, and to a miserable argument I know no better answer than an equally miserable one, and this is the grave argument, there is no direction to the churchwardens to find the water. My Lord, the fourth argument, which is an affirmative one, is ancient and modern usage. The fifth argument is one which has not been addressed to your Lordship at all, and is one upon which I place (whatever its value may ultimately be) the very greatest reliance. My Lord, it is an argument (to say no more of it at present) founded upon the words of Saint Paul in speaking of the institution founded on the universal consent of every translation that I am acquainted with of the Holy Scriptures, not therefore an argument from Scripture itself, but an argument entirely of doctrine.

I will address myself, if you please, to the first of those arguments, namely, the words of the book, and still using Keeling, in the Rubric immediately after the offertory, at page 185, there is this direction:

"Then shall the minister take so much bread and wine as shall suffice for those persons appointed to receive the Holy Communion, laying the bread upon the corporas, or else in the paten, or in some other comely thing prepared for that purpose, and putting the wine into the chalice, or else in some fair or convenient cup prepared for that use (if the chalice will not serve), putting thereto a little pure and clean water, and setting both the bread and the wine upon the altar." So, there, in juxtaposition in the same sentence, though in a different branch of it, the directions having been to mix water with the wine, the word "wine" is used, and at page 210 of this same book we have the form of prayer which was then in use, and which is in these words: "O God, Heavenly Father, who of Thy tender mercy didst give Thine only Son, Jesus Christ, to suffer death upon the cross for our redemption; who made there (by his one oblation once offered) a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world, and did institute and in His holy Gospel command us to celebrate a perpetual memory of that His precious death until His coming again: Hear us (O merciful Father), we beseech thee, and with thy Holy Spirit and Word vouchsave to bless and sanctify [with direction for the use of the sign of the cross at each of those words] these thy gifts and creatures of bread and wine." Of course, according to my learned friend's construction, the word "water" should have been inserted. It is afterwards called "the Sacrament of the Blood." That is an expression worth remembering for the sake of the fifth argument which I shall have to lay before your Lordship. "The minister delivering the Sacrament of the Blood, and giving everyone to drink once, and no more, shall say," &c.

Now that order is as clear as possible, and perfectly direct, and the use of the word "wine," as including both wine and water, cannot of course be attacked. It is in vain for my learned friend to say, as he attempts to say, that within his knowledge wine and water is never called "wine," because of course the immediate answer to that is that they who wrote the Prayer Book do so call it. Therefore it seems to me, with all submission to my learned friend, to be quite conclusive as to the effect of the use of the word "wine," and therefore I need not detain your Lordship upon the argument that what is not prescribed in the Prayer Book is forbidden, because that I think I have sufficiently dwelt upon before.

We are told next that you cannot suppose from the new Prayer Book that water is to be used, because there are no directions to the churchwardens to find water. My Lord, the answer to that is a very simple one. Water is necessary for the Sacrament of Baptism, but I am not aware that there are any directions as to who is to provide the water.

Now, my Lord, the ancient and modern usages upon this are unbroken. It cannot be said to have been introduced with the Mass, because it was in existence long anterior to the mass. If I take Wheatley's Prayer Book I find him saying, "It must be confessed that the mixture has in all ages been the general practice." If I take Johnson in his "Unbloody Sacrifice" I find, "It is certain that the primitive Christians did offer water mingled with wine in the Eucharist," and so Palmer, in his "Antiquities of the English Ritual," says, "The custom of mingling water with the wine of the Eucharist is one which prevailed universally in the English Church from the earliest period." My Lord, I believe if one takes the liturgies, it will be found in the liturgy of St. James, which is Anno Domini 50; that called of St. Mark, Anno Domini 70; that of St. Clement, Anno Domini 150; that of St. Basil, Anno Domini 370; that of the Ambrosian of the same date, 370; and St. Chrysostom's, Anno Domini 390. If I refer to councils, we get it in that of Carthage, A.D. 397; Orleans, A.D. 540; Auxerre, A.D. 546; Argu, A.D. 676; and Truro, A.D. 691. And referring to another class of ecclesiastical authority, viz., to the fathers, we find Justin Martyr in the year 149, Iræneus in the year 178, Clement in 200, Cyprian 258, and Ambrose 397, and I believe St. Augustine adopts the words used by Cyprian.

My Lord, with regard to modern usage, it is not for me, knowing that your Lordship sat upon the Ritual Commission, to say how clear the evidence was before that Commission that clergymen had been in the constant habit of using this mixed chalice in different parts of the country. Therefore upon that I am content to take my stand, remembering always that the 30th canon says, "So far was it from the purpose of the Church of England to forsake and reject the churches of Italy and France, Spain, Germany, or any such like churches, in all things which they held or practised, that it doth with reverence retain those ceremonies which do neither endamage the Church of God nor offend the minds of sober men, and only departed from them in those particular points wherein they were fallen, both from themselves in their ancient integrity and from the apostolic churches which were their first founders." My Lord, if these authorities which I have cited to your Lordship exist, if they be genuine and authentic, certainly it is impossible to find more strong evidence of what was the practice of those churches from which the Church of England has not departed, or a practice more in conformity with their ancient integrity and with the apostolical churches.

Now, my Lord, I approach the argument which to me, I confess, carries the greatest weight, and I approach it not without great diffidence in my own power of handling it, but with entire confidence in the soundness of the argument if it were urged by a person who could better lay it before your Lordship. My Lord, in the 9th chapter of the Hebrews this is the argument of St. Paul: he describes the rites of the bloody sacrifices of the law, shows how inferior they are to the dignity and perfection of the sacrifice on the Cross, and at verse 19 are these words: "For when Moses had spoken every precept to all the people according to the law, he took the blood of calves and of goats, with water, and scarlet wool and hyssop, and sprinkled both the book and all the people, saying" (these are the words which are so remarkable), "This is the blood of the testament which God hath enjoined." That is to say, Moses took the blood with water, and he used these words, "This is the blood of the testament which God hath enjoined." So in the institution of the Sacrament as given in our prayer of consecration, and taken from the three gospels which give an account of it, your Lordship sees how the analogy runs. For the words in the Hebrews being, "This is the blood of the testament which God hath enjoined unto you," the prayer of consecration is, "This is the blood of the new testament which is shed for you and for many for the remission of sins," the terms being identical comparing the Old Testament with the New Testament, which is the general purview of the argument of St. Paul in that chapter. I will assume for the present that the English translation which I have read is correct. It seems to me, taking the words as they are, it is difficult to conceive that in the mind of the person who instituted this second sacred rite by these words the first rite was not present. If the second sacrifice was to represent, as St. Paul says it was, the first sacrifice, it is difficult to conceive that there should not have been in the second sacrifice something analogous to that which evidently did occur in the first sacrifice, namely, the mixture of these two things—in one case the blood and the water, in the other the wine and the water. The argument from words of course is conclusive, because you not only have "blood" expressing blood and water, but you have that on the same analogous subject which in the Prayer Book is expressed by the term "wine," wine and water.

Now, my Lord, this seemed to me so strong that the first thing I did upon making the discovery was to refer to the Greek Testament, the original, and see if the original enabled you to carry out the argument. On referring to that I find that it is precisely the same expression, with scarcely a variation, no variation in fact.

“Λαληθείσης γὰρ πάσης ἐντολῆς κατὰ νόμον ὑπὸ Μωϋσέως παντὶ τῷ λαῷ, λαβὼν τὸ αἶμα τῶν μόσχων καὶ τράγων μετὰ ὕδατος καὶ ἐρίου κοκκίνου καὶ ὑσσώπου, αὐτὸ τε τὸ βιβλίον καὶ πάντα τὸν λαὸν ἐβρόντισε, λέγων· ‘Τοῦτο τὸ αἶμα τῆς διαθήκης, ἧς ἐνετείλατο πρὸς ὑμᾶς ὁ Θεός.’”

Referring to St. Matthew, St. Mark, and St. Luke, I find that there are the same expressions :

“Καὶ λαβὼν τὸ ποτήριον καὶ εὐχαριστήσας ἔδωκεν αὐτοῖς, λέγων· ‘Πίετε ἐξ αὐτοῦ πάντες· τοῦτο γὰρ ἔστι τὸ αἶμα μου τὸ τῆς καινῆς διαθήκης.’”

Well, that might be, though I looked at various Greek Testaments, a misprint; but I found it in all the Greek Testaments which I referred to. The next thing to do, therefore, was to refer to other bibles, and accordingly I referred to those in the languages with which I am acquainted. I will not cite them all to your Lordship, but if your Lordship pleases I will hand them up to you. I find there is precisely the same expression in the Spanish Bible, I find there is precisely the same expression in the Latin Bible, and I find that there is precisely the same form of words in the Vulgate which I have here.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Will you let me look at your edition of the Vulgate for a moment?

(Dr. Deane.) Yes, my Lord. Knowing the industry, acuteness, and watchfulness of my learned friends, I thought they might say to me, “True, you have referred to the English Bible, you have referred to the Greek Testament, you have referred to the Vulgate, and to the Spanish and Latin bibles, but all those may be tainted with the same spirit.” In my endeavour to fortify myself against that, I thought I could not do better than get Martin Luther’s translation of the Bible, and see what Luther thought about it. Your Lordship is aware that in Martin Luther’s translation of the Bible, at all events in those copies which I have seen, the position of the Epistle of St. Paul is not the same as in our bibles. However, here I have exactly the same expression.

“Denn als Moses ausgeredet hatte von allen Geboten, nach dem Gesetz, zu allem Volk; nahm er Kälber- und Bocksblut, mit Wasser und Purpurwolle und Ysop, und besprengete das Buch und alles Volk. “ Und sprach: Das ist das Blut des Testaments, das Gott, euch geboten hat.”

My learned friend will say that is all very well, that is what Luther said. Not to leave anything untouched, I thought I would see what Calvin said, and accordingly I got,—that my learned friend may not say this is not the true edition, this is printed at Basle, at Berlin, or at Leipsic—I thought I would go at once to head-quarters, and accordingly I got the Geneva edition of the year 1587.

(Mr. Stephens.) I deny that that is head-quarters, the Act of Parliament is head-quarters.

(Dr. Deane.) Having got that, on referring to the same chapter of Hebrews there I find exactly the corresponding expression at verses 19 and 20: “Car après que Moïse eut recité à tout le peuple tous les commandements selon la loi, ayant pris le sang des veaux et des boucs, avec de l’eau et de la laine teinte en pourpre et de l’hyssope, il en fit aspersion sur le livre et sur tout le peuple, disant, ‘C’est ici le sang du Testament lequel Dieu vous a ordonné.’”

Now I say that looking at the argument of St. Paul, and looking at the words of institution, and looking at the comment of St. Paul upon the words of institution (for you cannot separate the one from the other), the verbal argument is complete, if it wanted completing, I think the historical argument is complete, and I think the argument from the institution is complete. At all events this I want to know. Having all that in his favor, having all this ancient and modern usage in his favor, can you say that from the omission of the rubric a man is to be punished because he follows this ancient usage, sanctioned, at all events, by verbal argument drawn from the Bible itself, referring to the institution of the rite of the Sacrament?

Well, what other argument is there upon this subject?

I have already referred to it. In the edition of 1662 the rubric directs he shall then place the bread and the wine. That rubric I take to be in no sense antagonistic to me from the use of the word “wine” there, and for the reasons I have given with regard to the old rubric, and I say, “shall then place the bread and wine” was a necessary rubric, as directing the time when that particular action was to be done. My Lord, some time since (I do not know whether the case has been cited to your Lordship) the Bishop of Exeter had occasion to censure a clergyman. I do not know in what form the matter came before him, probably merely on information, where this mixed chalice—

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think it was under commission?

(Dr. Deane.) I hardly think it went so far.

(Mr. Stephens.) It was not under commission, it was a charge his Lordship delivered at Truro.

(Dr. Deane.) It was an expression of weight of that learned prelate’s, no doubt. No doubt it was well considered, but no doubt, like the opinion of every living man, there is a locus penitentiae even for the Bishop of Exeter. My Lord, my learned friend Mr. Coleridge referred to the practice of another person never to be spoken of by anybody without respect, I mean Mr. Newman, at Oxford. I do not know that I need trouble myself with what was done by him when he was at St. Mary’s. All that one need say in answer to that is, being charged with administering the mixed chalice, he said, “It is a great mistake, I never administered the mixed chalice in the technical sense of the mixed chalice, but having an early Communion I weakened the wine, that was all.” He neither admitted the right nor the wrong of the thing, he merely explained how he had come to do it. He said, “At the 12 o’clock service I give the wine as it is.”

Now, my Lord, that is the argument upon the mixed chalice, and upon that I submit to your Lordship that it is at the very least allowable. It certainly is not to be imputed to a clergyman as a crime which, if proved, is to be visited with I know not what pains and penalties.

My Lord, the next charge is the one of elevation. Elevation stands with respect to the mixed chalice, as your Lordship knows, in this singular position, that the order to mix is dropped out of the Prayer Book, and the order to cease from elevating is also dropped out of the Prayer Book. I would submit to your Lordship that there is a reason for those two things being contradictory the one to the other—my learned friend may reconcile them as he best can—but I submit that the real truth is this, that they were dropped out for the reason that Bishop Sandys gives in that note to Cardwell’s Documentary Annals which we have read, namely, that both were left open. As Bishop Sandys then said of the vestments and certain ornaments, “My gloss is that we may use them, though others are not to be punished for not using them.” Certainly I shall be well founded in this (I know how it tells against me), elevation is forbidden; when that order disappeared I shall contend that elevation became permissible. Then my learned friends say, “You are ordered to mix wine, how do you account for that being left out?” I do not agree with my learned friend Dr. Swabey that there is a difference as against Mr. Simpson between the withdrawal of a prohibition and the withdrawal of an order to do a thing. The withdrawal of a prohibition restores things to what they were before; the withdrawal of a direction does not imply that a thing is forbidden, unless it be necessarily inconsistent, which I contend in this case the chalice is not. Now this matter of elevation stands thus: These words before rehearsed are to be said turning to the altar, without any elevation, or showing of the Sacrament to the people," and the words which are to be rehearsed are those which I read to your Lordship just now, "Sanctify unto us these creatures," and so forth, and "likewise after supper he took the cup, and when he had given thanks," and so on, in the prayer of consecration. At page 217 of this rubric, my Lord, I think you will find a very good reason for the rubric being altered there, and perhaps not an unreasonable account of this particular non-elevation rubric being left out.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You are now upon the rubric of the First Prayer Book?

(Dr. Deane.) The Rubric of 1549. When the priest was to rehearse these words, he was still to turn to the altar, but there was to be no oblation and no showing of the sacrament to the people. Formerly those words were pronounced secrete.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What words?

(Dr. Deane.) The words of consecration: supposing that the priest pronounced them more or less inaudibly, the people would not know at what time the sacred elements were consecrated. There might be some confusion, and that which we do not find in the Church of England, but which does exist in other churches, might become necessary. There might be some need for the sacring bell at the time when the rite was completed. But there are no directions for kneeling in that Prayer Book, and it is not till we come to the Prayer Books of 1552, 1559, and the following ones that we find a direction for kneeling. Then it may be said, it has been said in fact, that elevation was necessarily connected with and that you could not dis sever it from adoration. It has been, I believe, the invariable practice of the Church of England (it is so in the Sarum Use) not to connect adoration with elevation. There is not the slightest ground for supposing any connexion between them according to any use of England; on the contrary, they are disconnected if I am to take the 28th Article.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Allow me to ask you, is your position that the use in England before the Reformation was different from the other churches?

(Dr. Deane.) Taking the Sarum Missal as the foundation.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That, according to the Use of the Sarum Missal, elevation was disconnected from adoration.

(Dr. Deane.) Yes, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) And is your position that in that respect the Church of England differs from the usage of the Western Churches?

(Dr. Deane.) I will give your Lordship the passage.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Do you put it on the ground of the peculiarity of the English Church at that time?

(Dr. Deane.) My argument is this: they who framed this rubric had the Sarum Use before them. They cannot be said to have been intended to mean more than the Sarum Use. The Sarum Use did not allude to or imply adoration, and therefore they did not intend to imply adoration in elevation themselves.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You do not go so far, do you, as to say that elevation and adoration are not connected generally?

(Dr. Deane.) They may be connected, and in the Church of Rome they are.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is what I want to know. Your position, therefore, is that there is a distinction in the Church of England?

(Dr. Deane.) I do not know that in the Church of Rome they are necessarily connected, they are usually. Now taking it from the Sarum Canon, this is the passage: "Et debent ista verba proferri cum uno spiritu et sub una prolatione [the words are, 'accipite, et manducate ex hoc omnes. Hoc est enim corpus meum'] nulla pausatione interposita [without any pause]. Post hæc verba elevet eam supra frontem ut possit a populo videri, et reverenter illud, reponat

"ante calicem in modum crucis per eandem factæ. Et tunc discooperiat calicem et teneat inter manus suas non disjungendo pollicem ab indice; nisi dum facit benedictiones tantum ita dicens."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Does that appear to you to establish the proposition that elevation and adoration were severed?

(Dr. Deane.) No, I think I can satisfy your Lordship of that by reference to this book [the Roman Missal], and you will see how different that is from this. In the canon of the Roman Missal, after the words, "Accipite, et manducate ex hoc omnes," comes this rubric, Tenens ambabus manibus Hostiam inter indices et pollices profert verba consecrationis, secrete, distincte, et attente "HOC EST ENIM CORPUS MEUM" Prolatis verbis consecrationis, statim Hostiam consecratam genuflexus adorat. It is the omission of that word adorat upon which I found the argument that in the Sarum Use there is no connexion between elevation and adoration.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Let me look at the Sarum Use when you have done with it. (It was handed to the Court.)

(Dr. Deane.) Now upon this same point there is a passage worthy of great consideration from its reasoning, and from the author from whom it comes. It is from the first volume of the "Treatise on the Church of Christ," by Palmer, and at page 240 this is his reasoning upon the matter: "The elevation is, comparatively speaking, not an ancient rite. The Roman Ritualists Bona, Merati, Benedict IV., Le Brun, &c., acknowledge that there is no trace of its existence before the 11th or 12th centuries." Then he gives a history of its gradual introduction, and he says, "Wm. Bp. of Paris, about 1220, ordered a bell to be rung at the elevation, that the people might be excited to pray, not to worship the host, 'Præcipitur quod in celebratione missarum quando Corpus Christi elevatur, in ipsa elevatione vel paulo ante, campana pulsetur, sicut alias fuit statutum, ut sic mentes fidelium ad orationem excitentur.'" And so it goes on reasoning out that, distinguishing clearly in the early ages of the Church the difference between elevation and adoration, and showing that there is no necessary connexion between them.

Now, my Lord, I come to the 28th Article. The history of the 28th Article—at all events its date—is curious. The Council of Trent—I forget in what session—had anathematised all those who held that the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not to be reserved, or carried about, or lifted up, or worshipped, and this Article came afterwards, and was evidently intended to meet that position of the Council of Trent, and it introduces the words, "was not by Christ's ordinance." Do not let me mislead your Lordship; I am not going to argue as against the meaning of this. The words in the Council of Trent follow precisely the same order that they do here, "reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped." It is perfectly true that both in this article and in the earlier article the words are disjunctive and not conjunctive; that is perfectly true; but does not the Council of Trent mean to refer in and throughout its own order to that which is reserved, and carried about, and lifted up, and then worshipped, reserved, and carried about to the sick, and lifted up and worshipped. And is there any reason to suppose that this latter part of the 28th Article, coming in where it does in that form and order, and in evident reference to the Council of Trent, does not mean the same thing, and is not intended for, and pointed at, reservation, and a carrying about, and a lifting up, and an elevation of that which is reserved?

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say the Council of Trent in those four passages refers to the reserved Sacrament?

(Dr. Deane.) I think so, my Lord. However, that is my contention. Now are we to be frightened by what Mr. Simpson admits that he did. Is it to be an imitation of the Popish Mass? Why, my Lord, when I refer to the Roman Missal I have got here, I can hardly conceive two things being more distinct and different the one from the other. I take the general rubric, which is the one I think which was read yesterday by my learned friend Mr. Droop. It is Rubric 7, paragraph 5. The priest stands "ante medium altaris" "ipsam ambabus manibus elevatum tenens." Then there is in the 8th Rubric, paragraph 5: "Tunc se erigens, quantum commode potest, elevat in altum Hostiam, et intentis in eam oculis (quod et in elevatione calicis facit) populo reverentur ostendit adorandam." In fact the elevation itself, such elevation as Mr. Simpson admits, apart from the meaning which they would attach to it, and which is not evidently necessarily connected with it, is an act it seems to me of so doubtful, I will not say of so innocent a nature, that it is impossible to say that it is a crime, for this is his account of the matter—that he has in reading the prayer of consecration so raised the paten on pronouncing the words, "Do this in remembrance of me," and he has so raised the cup in pronouncing the words, "This is my blood (of the 'new testament' being left out) which is shed 'for you and for many for the remission of sins.'" What is the meaning of the word "so" there? We get it from the Article. The Article is this: that he raised the paten with both hands over his head, and the cup in like manner. I should say, my Lord, upon that omission of the new testament, if anybody is to blame for it I am afraid I am the responsible person, for yesterday the responsive allegation was shown to me. I see I made some alterations in it, and I certainly did not insert these words. It was my fault. I cannot imagine for a moment it was the fault of Mr. Simpson. I have no instructions upon the matter, and I have no doubt it was a clerical error, and certainly one which would be inconsistent altogether with the meaning.

(Mr. Stephens.) As my learned friend says, it is a mere clerical error; I have not the slightest objection to allow these words to be inserted. If he had not said so I intended to have made some observations upon it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It occurred to me that it was so; but if you think so it had better be put in.

(Dr. Deane.) I was so told yesterday.

(The Dean of the Arches.) If you both agree to have it put in I will give directions to the registrar to insert it.

(Mr. Stephens.) If my learned friend says that it was a clerical error I am perfectly ready to have it amended. I should scorn to avail myself of a mere error.

(Mr. Hannen.) I must confess it was a clerical error of my own, and not of my learned friend's; but it did not catch his attention.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It would be better to have the words put in.

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly, my Lord, I have not the slightest objection.

(Dr. Deane.) My Lord, that is the argument upon that point which I have to offer to your Lordship. Summing it up shortly it is this—that without adoration, elevation is in itself an innocent and a very seemly act, limited in point of fact almost to more or less of gesture at the time; I do not mean an unintentional gesture. Next that elevation is not necessarily connected with adoration, which is the obnoxious part of elevation; and thirdly, that this elevation cannot, when that which Mr. Simpson has done is compared with the Roman Missal, be any approach to or have any similarity to that which the Church of England has so constantly contended against.

Now, my Lord, there is one other charge upon which I have not one word to say. It is utterly impossible to find an argument which would show that the alms are not to be put upon the table.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I was sure you would say so, Dr. Deane.

(Dr. Deane.) It is a piece of carelessness for which Mr. Simpson very properly submits himself to your Lordship's judgment. The charge for the omission of the word "all" is abandoned.

(Mr. Stephens.) That is abandoned on account of the expense of providing it.

(Dr. Deane.) Now, my Lord, I have reserved till now the consideration of the book, which I am ashamed to say I did not know the existence of till last night; but it seems to me, so far as I have been able to look into it, to be extremely full of learning upon the matter, and one which I was extremely glad to have put into my hands; because it bears out the short sketch of the tendency of parties which I had intended to allude to, and which I have shortly glanced at. It is Lathbury's History of the Book of Common Prayer; this is quite a recent edition, the edition of 1859. Speaking of the march of things, at page 17, we have a reference to what we know independently of the Prayer Book was first done, and the first thing, I believe, was an issuing of the Order of the Communion. That came very early. The Sacrament then became administered in both kinds, and the service after the priest had communicated was to be continued in English according to that order. There were then other changes by degrees, but the bearing of that which I wish to bring without wearying your Lordship is to the great opposition which the Puritans showed in and throughout to the Book of Common Prayer, and the way in which they broke through, as far as they could, the other rites and ceremonies. At page 110 Mr. Lathbury says, "The Puritans generally admitted that by the Act of Uniformity they were bound to use a Book of Common Prayer, but they contended that the book contemplated by and described in the statute, was not provided by the parishes. The particulars in which the book differed from the description in the act have been given. But though some things in the book were not mentioned in the Act, yet the Queen, by the power given to her by the Act itself, was at liberty to make the changes which were introduced, and the plea of the Puritans was groundless. Others admitted the force of the Act, but yet contended that the law was not violated by omissions. 'I have not refused, says Paget, to use the Common Prayer or to minister the Sacraments in such order as the book appoints, though I have not used all the rites and ceremonies set forth in the book,' and at page 142 there is an amount of subtlety which is remarkable: The Puritans "Admitted that the rubric adopted the 'ornaments of Edward's First book, but they pretended that, as a cope was enjoined in some portions of the service the surplice could not be used alone. 'No minister at or in any of the times and services aforesaid, is bound to put upon him a surplice unless therewithall he weare a cope. For the use of ornaments ought to be according to the Act of Parliament. And therefore, where no cope, there by the Act no surplice.' Their object was to get rid of the surplice; and their argument was, that if all the ornaments were not used, none need be used. Edward's first book enjoined 'an albe or surplice with a cope,' in which the priest was to 'say all things at the altar.' Upon this they argue 'Where no altar to goe unto after the Letany ended, there 'no surplice to be put on.'"

(The Dean of the Arches.) What year is that, does it tell you the dates?

(Dr. Deane.) This is the year 1562. There are other passages of the same kind, and I think in this book there is also the instance (I am not sure whether it is in this book, but the anecdote is well known), where Cartwright refused to bury his wife because he did not like that ceremony in the church. Perhaps also from this book my learned friend Mr. Droop got what he entertained us with so much last night, the history of churching veils, and bowing, and so forth, which is all detailed here; in fact the book itself, so far as I have been able to look into it, is really a mine of the most curious information as to the various evasions practised from time to time by the Calvinists in order to escape from the Book of Common Prayer. Now, my Lord, how was all that dealt with by the present Prayer Book. Why one looks at the Conference, and they are dealt with certainly in a way which must have been extremely unsatisfactory to them, for, objecting as they did especially to the use of that rubric, inasmuch as it would bring them back to the First Prayer Book of Edward the 6th—there stands the Rubric—that was the effort which they made then—that was the effort which was then defeated; they have struggled against it ever since up to the present time, and certainly they have not been successful in getting rid of it.

My Lord, I have brought my arguments to a conclusion. There are very many things which I should have liked to have brought before your Lordship, but I do not know that they are of so much importance that I should be justified in detaining your Lordship longer. I have already been longer than I originally intended to be, but I shall be followed by my learned friends or some of them, if not by all, who know at least as much upon these points as I do, and I am perfectly certain that the interests of Mr. Simpson will not in the least be jeopardised by my ceasing to address your Lordship.

(Mr. Hannen.) My Lord, it is with great regret that I have to trouble your Lordship with any observations upon this case, because I feel painfully for me that it has really been exhausted; but with your Lordship's permission I would trouble you with a few observations upon one part of the case only—and indeed a portion only of that part—I mean the subject of the lights, and particularly the part of the case which relates to the force and effect of the Injunctions. My Lord, before I proceed to discuss these points in detail, I wish to say that I am very glad that we have not had upon this occasion those strong expressions which were used upon the former occasion with reference to the supposed object and drift of the ornaments and practices which have been objected to. I conceive that we can render no assistance to your Lordship if we approach the subject in that spirit. We have nothing to do with what may be supposed to be the tendency of one side or the other; we have to consider this question as we should consider any other question of dry law. We have to ascertain as best we can what is the meaning of certain Acts of Parliament and other documents written two or three hundred years ago; and as to which, therefore, there may well be some difficulty of exposition. But we must use the same means for ascertaining the effect of these documents in this case as we should in any other.

Of course the first thing we have to do is to ascertain as nearly as we can what was the state of facts to which the legislation had reference. That, of course, is the first golden rule in ascertaining the meaning of Acts of Parliament, or indeed any other documents. We must know, of course, the circumstances to which they related, and to which they owed their origin. Now, it is quite certain that in this particular case, at the time when the legislation began which has been so much dwelt upon, the Reformation had only made comparatively inconsiderable progress. The state of things which existed at the death of Henry the Eighth was this—of course in a very few sentences I can state what I wish to say on so introductory and elementary a proposition as this, viz., to point out that at that time the legislation of Henry the Eighth's reign had had this effect—it had freed this country from the dominion of the Pope in matters of government. This country had been relieved from a direct dependence upon the Pope in the government of the Church; but as to the main mass of doctrine, there had not been a very great change effected in the reign of Henry the Eighth, and the legislation upon the subject had divided itself into two parts—those Acts which, as I say, dealt with the constitution of the Church, and its dependence upon and relation to Rome, and another class of statutes which related to matters of opinion and religion in a more general sense. Now the principal statutes on the first branch of the case, that is to say, the principal statutes with reference to the previous dependence of this country upon Rome, the principal statutes which freed us from that, were in the first instance the Act against the payment of annates [23d of Henry the Eighth, chapter 20], then the restraint of appeals [24th Henry the Eighth chapter 12], then the Act of Supremacy [25th of Henry the Eighth, chapter 19], and then, I need not enumerate them all, but there is another class of Acts bringing us down to 1533. Then there is the Act against the payment of Peter's pence [25th Henry the Eighth, chapter 1] following shortly after that.

Now, at the same time that those statutes, as I say, effected the liberation of the country from the rule of the Pope, there was another large class of statutes by which enormous powers were given, and severe remedies put into the hands of the authorities for the purpose of putting down heresy, and that set of statutes are those which have been referred to, and which I shall have to refer to again presently, with reference to an argument of my learned friend Mr. Stephens. Those are the 25th of Henry the Eighth, chapter 14, the effect of which is that heretics refusing to abjure are to be burnt—the 31st of Henry the Eighth, chapter 14, which under the mild title "For abolishing diversity of opinion," contains as strong punishments as any of them; the 34th and 35th of Henry the Eighth, chapter 1. Then the 35th of Henry the Eighth, chapter 5, which is an Act qualifying the Six Articles Act, but which gives great powers of repression of what is called heresy. Now, my Lord, those statutes had been severely enforced, as we know, and shortly before the death of Henry the Eighth in the same year, the tragedy of Anne Askew had shocked many, no doubt, and immediately upon the death of the king, a complete change appears to have occurred in the spirit of the legislation of the country; for the very first Act of Edward the Sixth, while it deals with matters of opinion, yet contains only the mild punishment of imprisonment and fine and ransom at the King's will and pleasure. That is 1st Edward 6th, chapter 1, "An Act against such as shall irreverently speak against the Sacrament of the altar, and of the receiving thereof under both kinds." There was a change I say in the spirit of legislation, and instead of the severe penalties of the older Acts these milder penalties were enforced, and in that spirit the Act was passed to which reference has been made, and upon which so much stress was laid by my learned friend Mr. Stephens, namely, the statute of 1st Edward 6th, chapter 12. My learned friend feeling that the broad distinction between the arguments on the one side and on the other is, that where the language of the legislature is not explicit, you may have recourse to the interpretation of usage, while on the other hand it is contended that you must look at the bare words of the document before you, and that you are not to look for any light in the interpretation of it beyond the four corners of the document; feeling, I say, that that is really the main distinction between the arguments on the one side and the other, my learned friend endeavoured to lay the foundation of his argument by contending that this statute of 1st Edward the Sixth, chapter 12, had made, to use his own expression, a complete tabula rasa of the previous legislation. Now that, my Lord, I say is a fundamental mistake. This statute of 1st Edward the Sixth, chapter 12, was merely a statute for the purpose of putting an end to those severe laws which I have enumerated to your Lordship. Everything tends to confirm that view. Its title is, "An Act for the repeal of certain statutes concerning treasons and felonies." Then comes the recital "Nothing being more godly, more to be wished and desired betwixte a prynce: the supreamed and ruler, and the subjects whose gouvernor and hed he is, then on the prynces pte great clemencye and indulgencye, and rather to muche forgiveness and remission of his royall power and just punishment, then exacte severitie and justice to be showed, and "on the subjects behalfe that theye shoulde obeye rather for love and for the necessitie and love of a kinge and prynce, then for feare of his streight and severe lawes; yet suche tymes at some tyme comethe in the comonwealthe that it is necessarie and expedient for the repressinge of the insolencye and unrulyness of men, and for the foreseeing & provyding of remedies against rebellyon, insurrection, or suche mischiefs as God sometyme with us displeased for or our punishment dothe inflictē & laye upon us, or the devill at Godds permission to assaye the good and God's electe dothe sow and sett amongst us." However, I will not take up your Lordship's time with that which, though I do not remember it at the moment, has probably been read before. It is scarcely necessary that I should read it further.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have looked at it very carefully.

(Mr. Hannen.) What I say is (and I think I shall be borne out by your Lordship in my reading of it), that it is pointing to and dealing with crime, making an alteration also in the severity of the laws against crime, and it is obvious that the person penning that statute did it altogether also intuitu from that which my learned friend suggests, namely, that he was setting about to make a fresh starting point as to the religion of the country and the government of the Church of the country. There was nothing of the kind present to his mind.

(Mr. Stephens.) Would your Lordship wish to have the folio edition? It is different in the folio edition. The title has been printed inaccurately in the quarto edition of the statutes of the realm. The word "etcætera" is left out in that edition.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What do you say lurks under that "etcætera"?

(Mr. Hannen.) It is said, my Lord, that there is much virtue in an "if," but really, if there is to be virtue in an etcætera, there are many other things in this statute to which the "etcætera" may refer.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think there must be an edition which has not got an "etcætera" in?

(Mr. Hannen.) It is so.

(Dr. Deane.) I have no "etcætera" in mine. I have got the quarto edition.

(Mr. Stephens.) The edition I have handed up is published by the Record Commissioners.

(The Dean of the Arches.) If anything is to turn upon it, it would be as well to see what the original Act is. It is enrolled, I suppose, and would be in the Rolls. You had better search and find the right title.

(Mr. Hannen.) I will leave to my learned friend the pleasing labour of that search, if he attaches importance to an etcætera.

(The Dean of the Arches.) If anything is to be made out of the argument of the "etcætera," and if "and further to deal with all matters of religion" is in the "etcætera," one would like to see it; but your argument rests very much more upon the contents of the statute than upon the other.

(Mr. Hannen.) Yes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Among the things dealt with by the statute are, killing by poison shall be deemed murder, peers shall be tried by their peers for all offences, and so on, and I observe, among other things, the French king may be called the King of France without offence against this Act.

(Mr. Hannen.) Look at the first enacting clause: "Be it therefore ordeigned and enacted by the King or Sovereigne Lord, with thassent of the Lordes spiritual and temporall, and of the Comons in this present Parliament assembled, and by authoritie of the same, That from hensfurthe none acte, deed, or offence being by Act of Parliament or statute made treasone or petit treasone by words, writing, cipring, dedes, or otherwise what so ever, shalbe taken, had, demed, or adjudged to be highe treasone or petit treasone, but onelie suche as be treasone or petit treasone in or by the Acte of Parliament or statute "made in the xxxth yere of the reigne of the most noble Kinge of famous memory Kinge Edwarde the Third."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Which section is that?

(Mr. Hannen.) This is the enacting part of the first section.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The second is something about heretics.

(Mr. Hannen.) Following upon that which has dealt with the subject of treasons is this: "Be it enacted by thauetoritie aforesaide, that all Actes of Parliament and Estatutes towching mencyoninge or in anny wise concerninge religion or epinyons, That is to saie, as well the Statute made in the [first] yere of the Reigne of the Kings noble progenito Kinge Richarde the Second," and then it goes on with all those statutes I have referred to, and if it rested there, it would be obvious that there would be no pretence whatever for the suggestion of my learned friend, because it would only be these statutes enumerated; but it goes on at the end, and says something more: "All and everie other Acte or Acts of Parliament concerning doctrine [and] matters of Religion and all and everie braunche artycle, sentence matter, paynes and forfaitures conteyned, mentioned, or in anny wise declared in anny of the same Acts of Parliament or Estatutes shall fromhensfurthe be repealed and utterlie voyde and of none effecte." But there is no better rule of construction than that you are to interpret general words by the light of particular words or things that have gone before, and therefore when you see that these statutes are in the beginning of the clause spoken of as statutes concerning religion or opinions, why then the infallible means of interpreting what is meant when it says, "other Acts relating to" and concerning doctrine and matters of religion," is to say it clearly means statutes of a similar character to those which have been enumerated, and it does not mean statutes which concern doctrine and matters of religion in that wide and general sense which my learned friend would suggest that it does. Because just consider for a moment, my Lord, how extraordinary the effect would be of such an interpretation as that for which my learned friend contends. In a phrase, you may say it would really be to repeal the preceding history of England.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I remember an argument similar to this being raised in the case of Westerton v. Liddell, and I remember Mr. Justice Maule saying, "If so, anything contained in Magna Charta about religion would be repealed by this Act."

(Mr. Hannen.) In matters of religion the Church was so intimately and inseparably bound up with the state at that time that you could not deal with the subject in that way. My learned friend seems to treat this as though it were some chemical solvent which should dissolve all previous legislation—everything that related to religion in its widest and most common sense in the previous history of the country. It would leave the fabric of the law like those objects of ivory that are found in the ancient tombs—

(The Dean of the Arches.) It would rather support your argument that in the present Clergy Discipline Act (the 3rd and 4th of Victoria), the first Act which is repealed is the Act of Henry VII. about independent clerks, which would have been swept away altogether by this Act if Mr. Stephens is right.

(Mr. Hannen.) Precisely, my Lord. It would leave only the dry bones of the law, which would crumble away at the slightest touch, and have no cohesion in them, if everything relating to doctrine and matters of religion in so wide a sense could be swept away; and, among other things, I suppose in the general sense in which my learned friend seeks to apply this word, the constitution of this court in this case would be a matter manifestly swept away.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Entirely; all the right of appeal to the Privy Council would be gone.

(Mr. Hannen.) And I observe in my friend's collection of the statutes one which would peculiarly affect this court, for it is that married men being doctors of the law may sit in judgment here.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That might be a recusatio judicis.

(Mr. Stephens.) That was not the way in which I put it. I put it before your Lordship thus—I said the effect was to repeal all laws with reference to doctrine and matters of religion, not as to discipline.

(Mr. Hannen.) I say the distinction is this, that it relates only to that class of statutes, and statutes of a similar character to those which are enumerated.

(Mr. Stephens.) Your Lordship will observe the words “all and every other Act or Acts of Parliament concerning doctrine or matters of religion.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is here “and matters of religion.” I do not know which is right.

(Mr. Stephens.) I believe that to be the most correct copy.

(The Dean of the Arches.) “Matters of religion” is a very large word.

(Mr. Stephens.) Certainly, my Lord; but I should respectfully submit to your Lordship that it would not apply to discipline, not for instance in the case your Lordship just put, in reference to the Church Discipline Act.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There are a great many more that I could mention; but that is one which occurred to me at that moment. There are all the Acts establishing the Arches Court, and the Court of Appeal.

(Mr. Stephens.) I should respectfully submit that under those words the Arches Court would not be affected in the slightest degree, or any other Court.

(Mr. Hannen.) I put this construction upon it, that it relates only to those statutes which deal with matters of doctrine and religion as a subject of punishment; but that it does not deal with those laws which relate to the constitution of the Church in its relation to the state. That is all that is necessary for our purpose, that it left all those laws which related to the government of the Church in its relation to the state untouched, but that it was intended to introduce a mild code of law, and as part of that it repeals these statutes by which powers are given to punish in a severe way.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Have you got the marginal note in yours, because in this folio edition I find these are specified as the Acts which are repealed: 5th Richard II. section 2, chapter 5; 2nd Henry V. section 1, chapter 7; 25th Henry VIII. chapter 14; 31st Henry VIII. chapter 14. Is it not that one of Richard, the Lollards Act?

(Mr. Stephens.) It is, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then there is 34th and 35th Henry VIII. chapter 1, and the 35th Henry VIII. cap. 5.

(Mr. Stephens.) In the quarto edition it says, 5th of Richard the Second, section 2, chapter 6; the next is 25th Henry the Eighth, chapter 7.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No; 2nd Henry the Fifth, section 1, cap. 7.

(Mr. Stephens.) The Queen’s printers are not always to be depended upon, for I know not how many inaccuracies there are in the Book of Common Prayer; there are no two editions alike.

(The Dean of the Arches.) By whose authority are these statutes drawn up?

(Mr. Stephens.) There was a Royal Commission issued; Mr. Furton Cooper was the secretary to it.

(The Dean of the Arches.) “Published by command of His Majesty George the Third, from original records and authentic manuscripts.”

(Dr. Deane.) Those are the statutes referred to in Sir John Dodson’s judgment in Westerton v. Liddell.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes; but that was the Proclamation Act.

(Mr. Stephens.) It was the Proclamation Act. In the first volume your Lordship will find a full account of the mode in which this edition was prepared.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What I have got is 25th Henry the Eighth, chapter 14; 31st of Henry the Eighth, cap. 14; the 34th and 35th Henry the Eighth, cap. 1; and 35th Henry the Eighth, cap. 5.

(Mr. Hannen.) With regard to the 34th and 35th Henry the Eighth, chapter 1, your Lordship will see it comes within the same description of enactments; because by the 17th section it is enacted that clergy preaching contrary to the king’s doctrines shall on first offence be permitted to recant; on refusal to recant, or on second offence, shall abjure and bear a faggot; on refusal to abjure, or on third offence, shall be deemed a heretic, and be burned and lose all his goods.

(The Dean of the Arches.) As far as any weight may attach to the mention of these Acts in the margin, there is not one which does not refer to a case in which there is some punishment.

(Mr. Hannen.) They are all Acts under which persons may be put to death for matters of opinion; that is the peculiarity. As I say, there was a change at once instituted upon Edward the Sixth coming to the throne; that seems to have been among the first Acts.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think it is mentioned by all the historians at that time, that one of the first acts of Edward the Sixth’s councillors was to obtain a reasonable kind of popularity by abolishing these severe Acts.

(Mr. Hannen.) Precisely; and I say, putting that which as I submit is the only reasonable construction which can be put upon that Act, it left standing two very important statutes. I say it left standing the Act of Supremacy (although I should hardly think my friend would push his arguments so far as to say it did not).

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is very important you know as limiting the effect of that repealing Act of Edward VI.

(Mr. Hannen.) It cannot be doubted that it left that standing.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I always conceived that was in force.

(Mr. Hannen.) Can it be doubted that it left the 25th Henry VIII., chapter 19, the importance of which of course is that it contains that most pregnant enactment—

(The Dean of the Arches.) For instance, all restraint upon convocations would be gone by your construction, Mr. Stephens.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am not aware of that, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Perhaps you will consider that when you come to reply.

(Mr. Hannen.) It would leave, as I say, untouched the 7th section of 25 Henry VIII., chapter 19: “Such canons, constitutions, ordynances, and synodals provynciall being already made, which be not contraryant nor repugnant to the lawes, statutes, and customes of this realme, nor to the damage or hurte of the Kynges prerogative royall, shall mourstyll be used and executed as they were afore the making of this Acte, tyll suche tyme as they be vyewed, serched, or otherwyse ordered and determined by the said xxxij persons or the more part of theym, accordyng to the tenour, fourme, and effect of this present Acte.” Now, as far as I could collect from the few observations made by my learned friend in the former case upon this section, he seemed to contend that because it says they are to remain in use till such time as they may be viewed, searched, or otherwise ordered and determined by the said 32 persons, and that as that was not done, they ceased to have effect upon the death of the King. If I do not misinterpret my learned friend that was his argument. That construction sins against the canon of interpretation, that if a condition is possible at the time it is created, and afterwards becomes impossible by the act of God, then the thing upon which it was a condition becomes absolute, and cannot be altered. I refer your Lordship to where that will be found, though at the moment I cannot give you the reference. In Sheppard’s Touchstone, where the authorities are all collected, that will be found to be the principle laid down, and of course it follows from that that as at the time this enactment was passed the canons might have been viewed, searched, and otherwise ordered by the 32 persons, the fact of that not having been done in the way contemplated by the Act leaves them in force until they are acted upon by direct legislation. Therefore, my Lord, as far as that is concerned, our position is this:—What was the condition of a minister upon the death of Henry VIII., and up to the time of the first Act of Uniformity? Why after the passing of 1st Edward VI. cap. 12, he would not be left in that state of utter helplessness which my learned friend's construction would leave him in, without a guide, utterly ignorant of what law he was appeal to, and unable therefore to celebrate Divine service by any rule whatever. I do not know what strange condition my learned friend would represent the clergy to have been reduced to during the period between the 1st Edward VI., chapter 12, and the passing of the Act of Uniformity in the second year. They must have been, according to his view, entirely without a guide.

But, my Lord, there is another enactment which seems to me to be important, and which I think was left entirely untouched by the repealing statute of the 1st of Edward VI.—that is one of the statutes I have referred to—the 24th Henry VIII., chapter 12, the statute for the restraint of appeals.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What Mr. Stephens says is that that is not “matters of religion”—that is his argument.

(Mr. Hannen.) I must deal with my learned friend's argument as well as I am able to grapple with it; but it would be difficult to see how this could not be said to come within such general words as my learned friend relies upon, unless by putting upon them the meaning which I have ventured to say is the right one. Towards the end of the first section I find these words—“All the spiritual prelates, pastors, ministers, and curates within this realm and dominions of the same, may use, minister, execute, do, or cause to be used, executed, ministered, and done, all sacraments, sacramentals, divine services, and all other things within the said realm and dominions, unto all the subjects of the same, as Catholic and Christian men owe to do; any former citations processes, inhibitions, suspensions, interdictions, excommunications, or appeals, for or touching the causes aforesaid, from or to the see of Rome, or any other foreign prince, or foreign courts, to the let or contrary thereof, in anywise notwithstanding.”

(The Dean of the Arches.) I certainly should have thought that was a matter of religion.

(Mr. Hannen.) Well, if it be not matter of religion, if my learned friend is obliged to concede that that enactment stood unaffected by the statute 1st Edward VI., I want to know in what other way was the minister to celebrate the service than according to those forms and rites which alone he could be familiar with. He was to celebrate, he was to execute, minister, and do, all sacraments, sacramentals, divine services, and all other things within the said realm and dominions unto all the subjects of the same, as Catholic and Christian men ought to do; that is to say, he could do it in no other way, he must continue (until some Act of Parliament interferes with the mode of doing it) to do it in all respects as he had done it hitherto—and I say, therefore, that does give a legislative sanction until altered by some Act for the performance of divine service in the then ordinary and accustomed way.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It was repealed, as you know, by the 1st and 2nd Philip and Mary.

(Mr. Hannen.) That I know.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It must have been in existence then.

(Mr. Hannen.) Of course, my Lord. It is evident now upon that, as upon many other matters in connection with this subject, all the great lawyers and authorities must have been in the dark, and that they did not know what was the meaning of their Acts. I say, that unless my learned friend contends really that that has been repealed, it is indifferent to me by what means he leaves it unrepealed. If he says it is repealed, I think he condemns his own construction of the statute of Edward VI. If he says it was not repealed, then it serves as an authoritative and legislative guide for ministers of the Church to continue, till some alteration of the law takes place, to celebrate as they had been up to that time accustomed.

My Lord, I say, therefore, that that disposes of my learned friend's contention that in the 1st of Edward VI. there was a tabula rasa of the previous laws with regard to the celebration of the services of the Church. I say, on the contrary, it is proved by these two sections in particular that I have referred to that it was absolutely necessary—there was a legislative direction and authority for the continuance of the ministration of divine services in the same way as they had been accustomed before, and legislative authority for the observance of all canons, constitutions, and ordinances as they were then used and executed. Well, my Lord, that being so—

(The Dean of the Arches.) In answering this, Mr. Stephens, it will be worth your while to consider the fourth section of the statute 23rd Henry the Eighth, chapter 9. I say so because it relates particularly to citing in cases of heresy, and so on; and it will be for you to consider whether your argument would not extend to the repealing of that statute also.

(Mr. Stephens.) The 25th of Henry the Eighth, chapter 19.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What it struck me at that moment was worth considering, was the 23rd of Henry the Eighth, chapter 9, section 4; you see that relates to causes of heresy.

(Mr. Stephens.) Is there any other statute your Lordship wishes me to direct my attention to?

(The Dean of the Arches.) The 25th of Henry the Eighth, chapter 19, the submission of clergy, and the restraint of appeals. That is what made me say that it would be worth considering whether your argument would not go to remove all restraint from convocation at that time.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, and in point of fact, whether the canons were in force.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I merely want to see the extent of your argument.

(Mr. Hannen.) Now I say that being the state of things upon the accession of Edward VI, let us see what the progress of change was. It was rather in the direction of restraining the introduction of innovations; and no doubt there was anxiety on the part of many to hurry on in the direction which they thought was the right one; but we see that the tone of the early acts of those in authority was rather to restrain than encourage speed in such matters. Take for instance the proclamation against innovations which has been referred to of 1547, set out in page 42 of Cardwell's Documentary Annals, the first volume: “The Kings Highness by the advice of his most entirely beloved uncle the Duke of Somerset, governor of his most royal person, and protector of all his realms, dominions, and subjects, and others of his council, considering nothing so much to tend to the disquieting of his realm as diversity of opinions and variety of rites and ceremonies concerning religion, and worshipping of Almighty God; and therefore studying all the ways and means which can be, to direct this Church and the cure committed to his highness in one and most true doctrine, rite, and usage; yet it is advertised that certain private curates, preachers, and other laymen, contrary to their bounden duties of obedience, do rashly attempt of their own and singular wit and mind in some parish churches, and otherwise, not only to persuade the people from the old and accustomed rites and ceremonies, but also themselves bringing new and strange orders, everyone in their Church according to their phantasies; the which as it is an evident token of “pride and arrogance, so it tendeth both to confusion and disorder, and also to the high displeasure of Almighty God, who loveth nothing so much as order and obedience. Wherefore His Majesty straitly chargeth and commandeth that no manner person, of what estate, order, or degree soever he be, of his private mind, will, or phantasy, do, omit, leave, done, change, alter, or innovate any order, rite, or ceremony, commonly used and frequented in the Church of England, and not commanded to be left done at any time in the reign of our late Sovereign Lord, His Highness's father, other than such as his highness by the advice aforesaid, by His Majesty's visitors injunctions, statutes, or proclamations, hath already or hereafter shall command to be omitted,” and so on. In the same spirit (though it comes at a later period, the point of my observation upon this is, that it is after the statute of Edward VI., chapter 12), is a letter sent to the preachers licensed by the King, and which is set out at page 63 of Cardwell's Documentary Annals. In it there are some strong words of reprobation of those who are inclined to hurry on; it complains that any man should run before their heads have appointed them what to do, and that every man should choose his own way in religion; it condemns that, and then enjoins them “that you do in all your sermons exhort men to that which is at this time more necessary, that is, to the emendation of their own lives, to the observance of the commandments of God, to humility, patience, and obedience to their heads and rulers, comforting the weak and teaching them the right way, and to flee all old erroneous superstitions, as the confidence in pardons, pilgrimages, beads, religious images, and other such of the Bishop of Rome's traditions and superstitions, with his usurped power, the which things be here in this realm most justly abolished; and straitly rebuking those who of an arrogance and proud hastiness will take upon them to run before they be sent, to go before the rulers, to alter and change things in religion without authority, teaching them to expect and tarry the time which God hath ordained to the revealing of all truth.” Therefore it must not be for a moment assumed, as it has been very much on the other side, that the spirit of the acts of those in authority was to alter the old-established practice. On the contrary, we see that with a spirit of compromise there was still a strong desire to prevent undue innovations, and to prevent there being a general subversion of the forms to which men had up to that time been accustomed.

Now, my Lord, I come to the question of the Injunctions themselves. With regard to those Injunctions, there no doubt has been a difference in, I will not say opinion, (because it seems to have been conceded everywhere, except indeed with regard to some of the observations of Dr. Lushington,) that the Injunctions are in force.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I understand Dr. Lushington's judgment to deny the authority of the Injunctions of Edward VI., but rather to admit the authority of the Injunctions of Elizabeth, without showing that one had greater legal sanction than the other, as far as I can make out from his judgment. I do not know whether you think it worth adverting to. It appears to me that Dr. Lushington certainly says that the burden of showing that these Injunctions have a legal validity lies upon you who say so.

(Mr. Hannen.) He does say so, my Lord, and I say that clearly was not the view taken by the Privy Council or in the intermediate court, the Arches Court, nor was it the view of counsel. Indeed we have heard it conceded here in the course of this cause that the Injunctions were in some way or other in force. It has been said that that was by virtue of the King's supremacy, but was not the King's supremacy established upon law? Was not that as completely based upon legislative action as anything else relating to such matters? I have read the enactment. The King's supremacy was not a thing which he possessed by virtue of his royal prerogative alone, but it was based also upon the statute which recognizes his authority in matters spiritual.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It restored the old common law, that is the argument on that statute.

(Mr. Hannen.) I say it is recognized and confirmed by statute, and being so, those things which are done by virtue of a power which is so recognized and confirmed by statute have the authority of Parliament.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, but then that is the question to be proved, that these Injunctions were issued by virtue of that supremacy; that is the thing to be proved.

(Mr. Hannen.) Yes, my Lord. I was assuming that for the sake of my present argument. I was making use of the concession made by my learned friend.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What I mean is, have not you to show that the supremacy of the Crown included in it the power of making Injunctions without the authority of Parliament? Is not that rather the pinch of your case?

(Mr. Hannen.) Yes, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It may very well be admitted that the Crown had that power of supremacy, and that the Injunctions were issued at that time; and yet it may be denied that the Injunctions were the deliberate consequence of that supremacy.

(Mr. Hannen.) I was going to deal with that, my Lord.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I should be very much obliged by any observations you have to make upon that point to-morrow. It is now almost time to adjourn. If Mr. Stephens has not time to finish his reply to-morrow he must have another day.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am very much obliged to your Lordship. I am very anxious to give you every information upon these statutes, and your Lordship is aware you have cast upon me a certain amount of labor with reference to the canon law.

(The Dean of the Arches.) My object is that you should consider the full extent of your proposition, that the first of Edward VI. swept away all matters of religion. I mean whether it would not sweep away a great deal more than would suit your purpose.

(Mr. Stephens.) I am perfectly aware of your Lordship's views; I am anxious to give your Lordship every information.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is quite consistent with what you have done throughout this case, Mr. Stephens.

Adjourned till to-morrow.

THIRD DAY.

Friday, February 7th, 1868.

(Mr. Hannen.) I endeavoured yesterday, my Lord, to realize the position of a priest at the end of the reign of Henry VIII., to ascertain, if possible, what would be his position and what his duties, so far as he could ascertain them from the laws then existing; supposing him to be a person anxious to abide by the law only, and not one of those "desiring to run ahead of others," as the expression is in one of the Injunctions; endeavouring to conform himself to the rule and control of the law as it existed, except so far as he might find an alteration made in his time. And I pointed out those statutes upon which I rely as showing that he would be under the direct injunction of a statute, first of all to perform the service "in the ordinary and accustomed way as Christian men ought to do," and secondly, that he would be bound to obey the canons, excepting so far as they were altered. I referred also to an argument of Mr. Stephens upon the subject of the canons being only in force until they should be altered; but I did not give your Lordship a reference to the passage.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That was an argument not used on this occasion, but used before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

(Mr. Hannen.) Our arguments have all been conducted on this occasion on the assumption that that was all present to your Lordship's mind.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I did not make that observation in the way of finding fault with you, but rather for the purpose of clearing my own mind, and of ascertaining that it was not used in this case, but before the Privy Council.

(Mr. Hannen.) Yes, and I think it was used in the last case before your Lordship.

My friend's contention is, that because there was no change made, in the manner contemplated by the statute, which gave continuing force to the canons, therefore they ceased to have operation at the death of the King, and I referred your Lordship to a principle well known in law, namely, that when a thing is given upon a condition, possible at the time, but which is impossible afterwards by the act of God, the effect of that is to discharge the condition, and the thing remains positive.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I remember you cited Touchstone for that.

(Mr. Hannen.) Yes, and I am anxious now to give your Lordship the reference to the passage.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I will find that part of your argument in my notes and insert the reference.

(Mr. Hannen.) It is at page 133 of Shepherd's Touchstone. "And if the thing be done by the condition be possible at the time of the making of the condition, and do afterwards by the act of God become impossible, the condition has become void and the estate absolute." Then it gives a variety of instances: "As if a feoffment to be made, on condition that the feoffee shall before Easter following infeoff the feoffor, and the feoffee die before the day," [which is the case supposed here, i.e., the death of the King] "or on condition that the feoffee shall appear in such a court before or at Easter, and he die before the time, in these cases the condition is gone and the estate is absolute." Of course that principle of law is entirely consonant with good sense; for if a thing is to remain until such a thing is done, and it afterwards becomes impossible that that thing should be done, then the thing remains freed from the condition imposed upon it, although of course it can be altered by subsequent law. These canons, then, were to remain in force as the law of England until something was done which was not done, and could not be done, and therefore they remained in force absolutely.

Now that being the position of a priest at the beginning of the reign of Edward VI., he would necessarily have continued to use the services with all the accustomed ornaments of the altar just as they had been; he would have known no other mode of celebrating the service than that which was in existence then.

The next thing that occurred in the first year of Edward VI. was the issue of the Injunctions. By those Injunctions undoubtedly alterations were made. With regard to the one specific Injunction with which we have now to deal, while he would have removed the candles from before the shrines, and while he would have removed the other things that are condemned by that Injunction, he would have found himself enjoined to retain, as they had been up to that time always, as a matter of course, the two candles upon the high altar.

Now, with regard to the character of these Injunctions and what their force is (which is the point upon which I was addressing your Lordship when we broke off yesterday), I venture to submit that the true character of those Injunctions is this: that it must be plain there was a perfect understanding and belief on the part of those who advised the Crown upon such subjects at that time, that the King had power to issue Injunctions by virtue of his supremacy. And I say I think that clearly must be the case because we find—

(The Dean of the Arches.) Wait one moment; that would be by virtue of his general supremacy you say?

(Mr. Hannen.) Yes, certainly; I was going to show in what way. But that there was that belief seems to be clear, because the Injunctions of Henry VIII. were issued before the Act giving the force of Acts of Parliament to proclamations. Henry VIII.'s Injunctions were issued in 1536, and the Statute of Proclamations, being the 31st Henry VIII., would be 1539. But it did not rest, as we know, on the supremacy of the King alone. Whatever might be the powers which the King possessed by virtue of his supremacy, Parliament had legislated upon the subject, and it had not been left to a mere vague surmise what might be the extent of the power of the King by virtue of his royal supremacy; but these Injunctions of his were issued, as your Lordship observes, after Parliament had legislated upon the subject; by which it is perfectly plain it was intended by Parliament to give to the King some large powers, expressed indeed in general language; but it is obvious it was the intention of the Legislature to give to the King some jurisdiction and power which it was desired to clothe in as large words as possible.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What statute are you now referring to specifically as giving those large powers?

(Mr. Hannen.) To the 26th Henry VIII. cap. 1, which has already been referred to by your Lordship, and which I only mention as part of the general argument I am addressing to you. It is very short, and therefore I do not think I should be unduly taking up your Lordship's time if I read it to your Lordship again. It is in the folio edition—"An Acte concerninge the Kynges Highness to be supreme heed of the Church of England, and to have authoritye to reforme & redresse all errors, heresy, and abuses yn the same. Albeit the Kynges Majestie justely and rightfully is and oweth to be the supreme [heed] of the Church of England, and so is recognysed by the Clergy of this Realme in theyr convocacions; yet nevertheless for corroboracion & confirmacion thereof, and for increase of vertue in Christi's Religion within the Realme of England, and to repress and extirpe all errors, heresies, and other enormities & abuses heretofore used in the same: Be it enacted by

" auctorite of this present Parliament, that the Kyng, our Sovaign Lorde, his heires and successours, Kynges of this Realme, shalbe takyn, acceptyd, and reputed the onely supreme [heed] in erthe of the Church of England callyd Anglicana Ecclesia, and shall have & enjoye annexed and unyted to the Ymperyall Crowne of this Realme, as well the title and style and successours, Kynges of this Realme, shall have full power and auctorite frome tyme to tyme to visite, repressse, redresse, reforme, ordre, correct, restrayne, and amend all such errours, heresies, abuses, offences, contemptes, and enormities what so ever they be, whiche by any maner spirituall auctoryte or jurisdiction ought or maie lawfullye be encrease of vertue yn Chrystis Religion, and for the [conservacy] of the peace, unyite, and tranqulyte of this Realme, any usage, custome, foreyne lawes, foreyne auctoryte, prescripcion, or anye other thinge or thinges to the contrarie hereof notwithstandinge."

(The Dean of the Arches.) This was in 1534.

(Mr. Hannen.) In 1534. Your Lordship observes it not merely recites that the King is rightfully supreme head of the Church, but it goes on to give him these large powers in connexion with that position; it gives him power to visit, reform, and order from time to time.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Will you tell me what the date of the first Injunctions of Henry VIII. was?

(Mr. Hannen.) 1536.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then that would be two years after that?

(Mr. Hannen.) Yes, two years after that. The King assumes, your Lordship observes, a power which had never before been exercised. Now, when we are dealing with the question of the validity of the acts done by the royal authority 300 years ago, which I shall show has been recognized as valid not merely by individuals but by Parliament itself; if you find that there is a general power conferred by the Legislature upon the Crown in large terms, and after that you find an act done by the Crown which is in harmony with those large powers which have shortly before been so conferred, is it reasonable to doubt that that power had been given with the understanding of those who had to draw up such an Act as this, and who had to advise the Crown upon the subject—is it reasonable to doubt that under the powers so conferred by the Legislature the Crown was purporting to act? I say it would be unreasonable, therefore, to seek for or to require that any more specific authority should be found for the exercise of such a power as this.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I suppose your Injunctions would come under the term "order."

(Mr. Hannen.) Yes, my Lord, always bearing in mind what is the theory upon which the English Church is established—not that it has introduced new forms or new doctrines, but that in all it has done it has only sought to go back to that which was the original and primitive Church. Therefore, when it is recited that the King is the supreme head of the Church, and has power to reform and order, it means according to his lights he has power to make such order as shall restore to the Church the primitive form and order which are always supposed to underlie anything that has grown up, or that is to be corrected afterwards. It is the very theory upon which the Act is drawn that the King is the head of the Church, which has always been one, although in the growth of years the original truths, and the forms of the early Church, may have been overgrown by excrescences and things which it is desired to pare away.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That was very much the doctrine laid down in Cawdray's case, was not it?

(Mr. Hannen.) Yes, my Lord. I say, therefore, here you have a statutable power sufficient for the purpose, and why is that to be rejected?

But while I rely with confidence on this as being sufficient for the purpose, yet one can easily see why in the generality of the language used there might be thought to lie a necessity for further defining the powers of the King, or giving additional powers for the purpose of enforcing any orders which he might make; because this is in general language, and only says that he shall have power to order. I say, under that he would have power to make all these Injunctions; but then, it being desirable that the Crown should be armed with additional powers for the purpose of enforcing any Injunctions which might be made under that general power, the Act giving the proclamations of the King the force of Acts of Parliament was passed. That is, the 31st Henry VIII. c. 8; and it recites that the King had acted in his character as head of the Church by issuing various proclamations:—"Forasmuche as the Kinges most royall Majestie or diverse consideracons by thadvise of his Counsell, hath heretofore sett forthe diverse and sondrie his Graces proclamacons, as well for and concerning diverse and sondry articles of Christ's Religion, as for an unyite and concorde."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is not given in this ordinary edition of the statutes. It is the record statutes that you are reading from?

(Mr. Hannen.) Yes, my Lord.

(Mr. Stephens.) I will hand up to your Lordship my copy of the folio edition.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I shall be much obliged. In the ordinary editions it is just mentioned, and that is all. The Act that immediately follows is a very singular one, "An Acte for the Kinge to make "Bishops."

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is a very curious Act, because by it all the new bishoprics were made. It gave power to the Crown to issue letters patent, and under those powers Oxford, Chester, Bristol, and all the new bishoprics were made. It was very much referred to in the Colenso case.

(Mr. Hannen.) My Lord, that Act recites what the difficulty was, that whereas the King had these powers, yet it was necessary to give additional powers for the purpose of enforcing them. "Forasmuche as the Kinges most royall majestie for diverse considerations by thadvise of his Counsell, hath heretofore sett forthe diverse and sondrie his Graces proclamacons, as well as for concerning diverse and sondry articles of Christs Religion, as for an unyite and concord to be had amongst the lovinge and obedient subjects of this his Realme and other his Dominions. And also concerning thadvancement of his comonwealth and good quiett of his people, whiche nevertheless diverse and many forward, willfull, and obstinatt persons have wilfully contempned and broken, not consideringe what a Kinge by his royall power may doe, and for lack of a directe statute and lawe to cohart offenders to obey the saide proclamacons, wch being still suffred shuld not onlie encourage offenders to the disobedience of the precepts and lawes of Almightye God, but also synn to muche the great dishonor of the Kinges most royall Majestie, who may full ill beare hitt, and also give to great hert and boldness to all malefactors & offenders, considering also that soden causes and occasions fortune many tymes whiche do require speedy remedies, and that by abidinge for a Parliament in the mean tyme myght happen great prejudice to ensue to the Realme; and weying also that his Majestie (whiche by the kingly & regal power geven hym by God may doe many thinges in such cases) shuld not be driven to extend the libtye and supremacy of his regall power and dignytye by wilfulness of his forward subjects; it is therefore thought in manner more then necessarie that the Kinges Highness of this Realme for the tyme beinge, with thadvise of his honorable Counsell, shulde make and set forthe proclamacions for the good and politique order and governance of this his Realme of Englande, Wales, and other his Dominions, from tyme to tyme, for the regall dignytye and thadvancement of his

‘comon wealthe and good quyett of his people, as ‘the cases of necessitie shall require, and that an ‘ordynarie lawe shulde be provided by thassent of ‘his Majestie and Parliament, for the due punyssh-‘ment, correcçon and reformaçon of such offences
‘and dysobedyences: Be it therefore enacted by ‘auctoritie of Parliament,” &c. Therefore I say, it plainly sets forth what its object was, namely, to give additional power for the purpose of enforcing those things which the King already was assumed to have the power of ordering. Then it sets forth certain formalities which must be gone through for the purpose of inflicting the punishments which are prescribed by the Act.

I say, therefore, that while the King had the power of issuing the Injunctions by virtue of 26th Hen. VIII., if it was desired to punish those who disobeyed them under this Act, then it would be necessary that the formalities of this Act should be complied with; and I say that when one sees how it was treated at the time, there can be little question as a matter of history that the Injunctions were issued, as I say they were, the original power to issue them being in the King by virtue of the royal supremacy, extended and armed by the 26th of the King for the purpose of speedy remedy against any who might disobey.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Your argument would take this shape, then, would it not, rather—that this Act you have now referred to was passed for the purpose of enabling the specific punishments to follow upon violation of the King’s order.

(Mr. Hannen.) Just so, that is the view I venture to present to your Lordship; and I think when you look at it by the light of history, it is perfectly obvious that those who had the best means of knowing took that view of it. That explains what we find in Collyer with regard to Bishop Gardiner. He never says that the King has not power to issue the Injunctions; nothing of the kind; all that he says is directed simply to this question: he was smarting under the exercise of the royal authority, having been sent to prison; smarting under that he tries to find a reason why he ought not to be sent to prison, he having been sent to prison, I suppose, under this Act. Collyer comments upon his letter, summing up the objections.
(I do not read his letter; it is in 5 Collyer’s Ecclesiastical History, page 199, of the small edition.)
“The reason of Gardiner’s insisting so much upon the “constitution both in this letter and some others
“to the Protector was because the religion professed
“in the late reign was established by law. It is true
“the King’s proclamation was in some cases made of “the same force with an Act of Parliament; but “then such proclamations were to be proclaimed and “posted up by the sheriff or some other officer in “market towns.” Now I venture to repeat—I believe it has been said by my learned friend—I venture to repeat there is no foundation for that objection which is set up by Gardiner. I will read the section directly, and your Lordship will see there is no warrant for it whatever. The validity of the proclamations is not made to depend upon whether they shall have been set up in the market-place by the sheriffs; but it is an Injunction upon the sheriffs, disobedience to which subjects them to punishments; and it was done for a very obvious reason, namely, that by putting up the proclamations in the market-place people should better know them. Of course it was necessary to take some steps for the purpose of making them known to the community at large; and therefore the sheriffs are ordered (but in no way is the validity of the proclamations made to depend upon that) to place them up in the market-places. The third section is the one which orders it: “Furthermore be it enacted by the “auctoritie of the present parliament, that to the “extent the King’s subjects shulde not be ignorant
“of his proclamaçons, every Sherief or other officer
“and mynister to whom any suche proclamaçon shal
“be directed by the Kinges, directed by the Kinges “writt under his great seal, shall proclayme or cause

“the same to be proclaymed within fourtene days “after the receipt thereof, in four severall markett “townes yf there be so manye, or els in sixe other “townes or villages within the lemytts of their “auctoritie; and they to cause the said proclamaçons “to be fixed and sett upp openly upon places conve“nient in every suche towne, place, or village, upon “payne and penaltie of suche some & somes of money “or imprisonment of bodye as shalbe conteyned in “the saide proclamaçon or proclamaçons.” Therefore that, as I say, is only an injunction upon the sheriff.
It does not say that the proclamation is not to have force unless that is done. Of course if the proclamation is brought to the knowledge of anybody in any other means than by its being set up in the marketplace by the sheriff, it would be binding upon those persons to whose knowledge it is brought home. The whole force of this clause is exhausted by treating it as a direction to the sheriffs as to what they are to do.

(The Dean of the Arches.) There is one difficulty
I feel about this Act, and that is making it apply to injunctions in spiritual matters. I mean there is no reference in the preamble to such a thing.

(Mr. Hannen.) The only thing I can direct your Lordship’s attention to upon that is—

(The Dean of the Arches.) The words “sundry “articles of Christ’s religion,” I suppose you mean?

(Mr. Hannen.) Yes, and the King’s supremacy.

(Mr. Stephens.) I believe I stated to your Lordship that the penalties in the Proclamations Act were fine and imprisonment, but in the Injunctions they were of a spiritual character.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You did so.

(Mr. Hannen.) Yes, that is what I say. It was for the purpose of giving additional power to the Crown to punish.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You see, Mr. Stephens, that would rather hold with Mr. Hannen’s argument. His argument is, Gardiner was imprisoned under the provisions of this Act. Gardiner remonstrated, saying that the formalities required by the Act under which he had been put in prison had not been complied with. He did not say the Injunctions were per se invalid, but that the punishment inflicted for contravention of the Injunctions was invalid. You will deal with that by-and-by; but that is what I understand to be Mr. Hannen’s argument.

(Mr. Hannen.) That is the summary of my argument. This was intended to give an additional power to the Crown, for the purpose of enforcing the Injunctions which it had power to issue under the Supremacy Act.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You were going to show me something else, showing that it might have regard to spiritual matters. I think you were alluding to this, that it refers to “proclamations set out as “well for and concerning Christ’s religion,” &c.

(Mr. Hannen.) Yes; I thought there was a stronger provision in it than that; but that no doubt was in my mind. Your Lordship observes it is dealing plainly with such things as the King had done as supreme head of the Church. It says, “Divers “and sundry articles of Christ’s religion.” I say that those words are large enough to include, and were intended to include, the Injunctions he had issued in the year 1536.

Now it is right I should not pass over another observation which has been founded upon this statute.
My friend has said that they were to be issued under the Great Seal. Undoubtedly it may be said that Proclamations are (and there is no doubt they are) usually under the Great Seal. No doubt that is the ordinary and accustomed way of evidencing the Royal will; it is the ordinary and accustomed way of showing that the King has exercised the power which is in him. But if it be conceded (as for the purpose of this part of my argument I shall assume it must be) that the King had power to do it, then it becomes a question of fact whether he has made proclamation of such exercise of his will. There is no absolute rule of law which says that the King cannot make his will known in any other way than under the Great Seal. Undoubtedly under this section which I have read, in order to take proceedings against the sheriff, it might be necessary to show (in order to make out that he had subjected himself to any punishment for an offence) that the proclamation had been directed to him by the King's writ under the Great Seal, which no doubt would command him to do that which he is required to do under this section, namely, to place up these proclamations in the market-place. But, my Lord, the proclamation was something different from the writ by which the sheriff was commanded to set it up. And in the nature of things, if the King had power to issue Proclamations and make known his will to his subjects, it becomes a matter of evidence whether he really has declared his will in a formal manner, and if he has so declared his will then that will fulfil all the conditions required by this section.

Now I won't trouble your Lordship by going through an examination whether or not the formalities which are required by this statute in the case of the King being a minor were fulfilled. That subject has been treated by Sir John Dodson in his judgment in Westerton v. Liddell, and I do not know that anything more can be done upon that subject, unless it be to make such search as would satisfy the inquiry as to what were the particular offices which all the persons held who signed those Injunctions. I believe that never has been done yet; but when you find—

(The Dean of the Arches.) His argument was that the formalities had been complied with, (Mr. Hannen.) Undoubtedly.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Your argument would hardly require that, would it?

(Mr. Hannen.) Yes, my Lord, in this part of the case I admit it would, because in the case of a minor, in order to have the benefit of the Act of Proclamations, it requires that certain formalities should be gone through. Therefore I cannot shrink from admitting that it would be necessary, in order to shew that a minor king had the power to issue, or lawfully did issue, proclamations, it would be necessary to show that he had complied with the conditions mentioned in the 8th section, which is this: "Be it enacted that if the King deceasse (whose lyfe God longe preserve) before such time as that person wh<sup>ch</sup> shal be his next heire or successor to the Imperiall Crowne of this Realme, shall accomplish and come to the age of eightene yeres, that then all and singular proclamacions which shalbe in anywise made and set forthe into any parte of this Realme or other the Kinges Domyions by vertue of this Acte, with the foresaide yeres of the saide next heire or successor, shalbe set forthe in the successors name then being Kinge, and shall emport or bear underwritten the full names of such of the Kings honorable Councell then beinge as shalbe the dehisors or settors forthe of the same wh<sup>ch</sup> shalbe in this case the whole nombre afore rehersed, or at the lest the more parte of them, or els the proclamacions to be voide and of none effect." Therefore I admit that in this case of a minor king, it is necessary—that is to say, for the purpose of inflicting the punishments mentioned in the Act, for example the imprisonment which Gardiner suffered—that the King's Council or the more part of it should sign.

(The Dean of the Arches.) As far as that is concerned you say that the sheriffs cannot be punished without it. The proclamation is valid; but the sheriff could not be punished if it had not had the proper formalities performed.

(Mr. Hannen.) Precisely. Let us suppose a proclamation sent to the sheriff by King Edward, not signed by the proper number of the council. The sheriff would be entitled to say, "First of all you must show that the proclamation is valid, and secondly, you must show that it is brought to my knowledge in the proper way required by the Act." But I do not think that it could be disputed in this case; because when you find that out of 25 persons, 13

(therefore the more part of them) signed with the King, of whom it is known for certain that nine or ten of them were members of the Council, it seems unreasonable that it should be suggested that the act of the King had not proper authority because it is not exactly known what offices the other persons filled. And I say that with more confidence when one observes the very fine objection—

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is eleven according to Sir John Dodson's judgment. "Thus we have eleven or rather twelve if both secretaries are to be counted, of the officers required under the Proclamation Act."

(Mr. Hannen.) Yes, because your Lordship sees they did not sign their names with their office, but they merely signed their names. But what I say is this, that when one sees that Gardiner, who was so much interested in disputing the validity of these Injunctions, having been sent to prison because he would not accede to them, took such a futile objection as that they had not been published in the market-place, but does not take the other objection—the thing which would be so peculiarly within his own knowledge—for of course he would know who these people were, and might have said, "Why, the proper number of the Privy Council have not signed these Injunctions with the King, and therefore you are not entitled to exercise the powers which that statute is supposed to give."

(The Dean of the Arches.) The argument is this, that Gardiner himself did not take this objection which in point of fact Mr. Stephens took, founded upon the 8th section, namely, that the proper number of councillors had not subscribed.

(Mr. Hannen.) He did not take it, and I was saying that that would be a thing so peculiarly within his own knowledge if it were the fact. And, notwithstanding the industry which my friend has exhibited in this case, it is a fact which is so peculiarly beyond his knowledge what the particular offices these persons held at the time were, that I think when we are dealing with a subject now some 300 years old, it would be more reasonable to apply the maxim, all things are presumed to have been rightly done, than to presume the contrary, and assume the invalidity of these Injunctions.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It certainly would appear the Privy Council treated these Injunctions as valid.

(Mr. Hannen.) Yes, and I think when we are dealing with such small matters as these, there is an all-sufficient reason that we should so treat them, and it is this—that soon after these Injunctions were issued they were believed to confer powers under which a great dignitary of the Church was sent to prison; and when we see that these Injunctions are expressly referred to in the Prayer Book as valid (that Prayer Book being incorporated with and forming part of the Act of Uniformity), I think really if there ever was a case in which one might say that it was unreasonable to advance such objections as have been brought against these Injunctions, this is the case. Because my friend is not entitled to treat that mention of the Injunctions in the Prayer Book as he has done, as being merely a sanction of a particular Injunction. We did not use it for that purpose, we use it for the purpose not of setting up particular things, but of showing that the Injunctions, as the King's Majesty's Injunctions, having some force, were recognized by the Legislature; and any form of expression by which the Legislature recognized the existence of enactments supposes those enactments as a binding law. Because the Legislature has the power to make it, and by saying that it is so, is like a declaratory Act—it estops anyone from denying that that which the Legislature has treated as valid, is so.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then if so, when did the power to issue such Injunctions on the part of the Crown cease? After the Statute of Uniformity was passed?

(Mr. Hannen.) My Lord, I have not considered that; I cannot answer the question what has put an end to it. But the reason why I excuse myself for not having considered that more fully is this. I say that if it has been put an end to, it has been by some legislation subsequent to the time to which we are compelled, by the necessities of this case, to direct our attention.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, if it has been. It opens up a very large question, because the authority of the Crown to order certain forms of prayer for fasting, and so on, to be read, and in regard to questions of that kind, is said to depend upon that rubric—"Nothing shall be published in the Church except it be ordered by the Crown or the Ordinary."

(Mr. Hannen.) That would be in perfect harmony with the argument I have addressed to your Lordship.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It would. I am only following out your argument; it has some bearing upon the question.

(Mr. Hannen.) It has, and I am much obliged to your Lordship for reminding me of that, which I think I can make use of much in my favour. I cannot say why that power of the Crown has been put an end to, or how it has been put an end to; but that rubric would recognize the power of the Crown to issue and make such Injunctions, and what did the Crown derive that power from? Why, I say, from the Supremacy Act.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Of course nobody would contend that the Crown could have any power to issue Injunctions at variance with the Act of Uniformity.

(Mr. Hannen.) Of course not, my Lord. The Crown could not have any authority to issue enactments at variance with the Legislature.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The power to issue a prayer of fasting or thanksgiving, as far as I know, rests upon that authority which I have referred to.

(Mr. Hannen.) Your Lordship remembers the recent alteration—

(The Dean of the Arches.) No, that was made by the authority of Convocation. It is res ecclesiastica, and the Crown gave Convocation liberty to discuss that question, and they discussed and passed a canon.

(Mr. Hannen.) Yes, and I believe the Crown confirmed it by Order in Council.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not think that was the form; it may be so. However, if it was, it would not apply to this case, because there is no question, according to the law of this land, Convocation can, with the consent and assent of the Crown, make a canon binding on the clergy alone without the consent of Parliament, provided that canon is not at variance with the common law of England and the statute law.

(Mr. Hannen.) Quite so, my Lord. I was only considering the matter with reference to the power which the Crown exercised, and it did, I think, exercise that power in that case by an Order in Council. I did not apply my mind to that, because it did not occur to me the way in which it could be made use of until your Lordship made the suggestion. I had confined myself perhaps too exclusively to the question whether or not there was anything to make these Injunctions of binding force at the time at which they were issued.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Is not the truth this, that the prerogative of the Crown was very undefined in those days, and that the gradual moulding of the constitution has brought it to the limits in which it now is.

(Mr. Hannen.) No doubt that is so, and that is the view Sir John Dodson takes. No doubt the powers of the Crown were undefined, and no doubt those two statutes were statutes which were intended to give—

(The Dean of the Arches.) I forget at this moment whether there is an Act of Philip and Mary which repeals these Injunctions, and that Act a repealing Act unrepealed? Perhaps your junior will just look to that point. It may be that they were repealed by an Act of Philip and Mary, and that the repealing Act is unrepealed.

(Mr. Hannen.) No, my Lord; the Injunctions were never repealed; they were never touched; nothing was said about them. But my friend has stated the reason why. I am not so conversant with these things as some of those who are with me; but the reason why I venture to submit that that was the reason why is this, that the repealed statute of Mary, which entirely set up again the Church as it existed in the last year of the reign of Henry VIII., of course superseded all Injunctions which were inconsistent with that, as well as it superseded all Acts of Parliament which had been passed upon the subject. That indeed made a tabula rasa of all that had been done since the last year of Henry VIII. I am reminded that Elizabeth also issued her Injunctions, which must have been under the Supremacy.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes, that is a very good answer no doubt if those Injunctions were valid; and that she issued Injunctions there is no doubt as a matter of fact.

(Mr. Hannen.) That is the argument I present to you upon the authority of the Injunctions. I say it results from this consideration of the subject that these Injunctions had doubly the authority of Parliament; they had the authority originally derived from the Act of Supremacy, and they had the authority which they derived also from the Statute of Proclamations, which was passed for the purpose of enforcing their observance by means of the punishment, if necessary, of imprisonment of those who disobeyed them.

Well, my Lord, if that be so, it brings us to this point, that these Injunctions being the first act of the sovereign during his reign by which any change was made in the observances which had the force of law, up to the time of his coming to the throne, I ask your Lordship to put yourself in the position of a priest of that time having to celebrate Divine service and the Sacrament. He finds a distinct order that he is to retain upon the altar the two candles, to signify that Christ is the light of the world. Then what is the next act? I pause here, my Lord, merely to mention by the way, that we find the next act of authority to be that of Cranmer's Injunctions, in which he makes a distinct inquiry whether or not these Injunctions of the King had been complied with, and whether the two lights had been left upon the altar. Then we come to the Statute of Uniformity.

Now putting ourselves in the position of a priest of that time, who has up to that time undoubtedly always had the lights upon the altar, who has been enjoined by the King to have the lights upon the altar, who has been enjoined by the bishop to have the lights upon the altar, he then finds a statute and a Prayer Book come into operation which make no mention whatever of lights upon the altar. It has been said, notwithstanding, that he was to find in that statute and in that Prayer Book an order (having the force of law and making it an offence for which he is liable to be indicted and punished if he take them away) to take those lights away.

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say the contention of the other side is, that he is to find in the silence of the Act an order to take them away, although that Act refers to the Injunctions.

(Mr. Hannen.) Precisely, my Lord, although that Act refers to the very instrument which compelled him, whatever might be his desires, and although he might be one of those who desired to "run ahead" and introduce novelties into the service, to retain these candles—for up to that time he would have to obey those Injunctions. And yet it is said that he is to find in the silence of the Act of Parliaments and the Prayer Book (as your Lordship has put it) a punishable offence if he should leave those candles still burning. My Lord, I say there never was anything more unreasonable than such a construction of these statutes. And it is to be remembered that the only argument that is set up is that they were impliedly taken away; that because the reservation of the Sacrament was done away with, they were by implication abolished. My Lord, I won't travel over that ground because the authorities have been collected with great industry by others, and of course it is a subject which can only be dealt with by those who can devote great knowledge of the special subject to the matter. That knowledge has been applied to it, and I think that the result will be your Lordship will come to the conclusion that there is no foundation whatever for the bare assertion that those lights had anything whatever to do with the reserved Sacrament.

My Lord, on this occasion I ought not to pass over one other rubric in the First Prayer Book. Of course I shall not go through the different rubrics which have been referred to, but there is just one which is so striking that I cannot forbear calling your Lordship's attention to it once again, when we are dealing with the question whether or not it was made by that Act of Parliament incorporating the Prayer Book an offence to leave the two lights burning because they are not mentioned. Is it not a most striking thing that there should be no mention made of the fair linen cloth—no rubric in the First Prayer Book directing any covering for the altar? And, my Lord, the arguments of my friends on the other side must go the length of saying that it was an offence to have the fair linen cloth.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Just look at the rubric, if you have got it under your eye.

(Mr. Hannen.) The rubric is, "Upon the day and at the time appointed for the ministration of the Holy Communion, the priest that shall execute the holy ministry shall put upon him the vesture appointed for that ministration, that is to say, a white albe plain, with a vestment or cope. And where there be many priests or deacons, there so many shall be ready to help the priest in the ministration as shall be requisite; And shall have upon them likewise the vestures appointed for their ministry, that is to say, albes with tunicles. Then shall the clerks sing in English for the office, or introit (as they call it) a psalm appointed for that day. The priest standing humbly afore the midst of the altar, shall say the Lord's Prayer with this collect."

My Lord, I hope I am not making a mistake (my friend will correct if I am making a mistake), but I know nothing in the First Prayer Book which makes any allusion whatever to the fair linen cloth.

(The Dean of the Arches.) No. The rubric I wished to call your attention to in the first Prayer Book is this: "Then shall the minister take so much bread and wine as shall suffice for the persons appointed to receive the Holy Communion, laying the bread upon the corporas, or else in the paten." That may help your argument, or it may not; but at present it appears there is a specification of a particular cloth—the corporas.

(Mr. Hannen.) I think that helps my argument; because I do not think it has been contended for a moment that the corporas is the cloth which covered the altar.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is, as I believe, a cloth which covers the holy elements, its name rather indicating that.

(Mr. Hannen.) Quite so. Not the fair linen cloth.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then why was the bread to be placed upon it? You say that the natural order of things would be that the corporas should be placed over the bread would not it?

(Mr. Hannen.) I am informed, my Lord, that the bread is and always has been put upon the corporas, under the Roman form.

(Mr. Droop.) Perhaps your Lordship will allow me to mention that, according to the Roman Missal, there are three cloths at present, and not one cloth only. I am not quite sure, but I think there is more than one according to the Sarum Use.

(The Dean of the Arches.) This particular corporas I suppose we shall be agreed is generally the cloth which covers the elements.

(Dr. Deane.) There is a perfectly clear distinction ecclesiastically between the corporas and the cloth which covers the table, things which it is perfectly impossible to confound, I should have thought. And the three cloths my friend has spoken of are not the corporas or the linen cloth, but the three cloths so much discussed in Westerton v. Liddell.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I suppose the fair linen cloth is one thing and the corporas another. I want to see whether the rubric tells for or against you. As a matter of fact it does mention the linen cloth in the rubric.

(Mr. Hannen.) Then, my Lord, I say that tells in my favour; because if one thing is mentioned and the other thing is not mentioned, the argument ought to be, according to my friend's contention, that the other thing is forbidden, and therefore the fair white linen cloth would have been forbidden during those years.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Of course, if it is once admitted that those two things are distinct, and that the fair linen cloth was necessary for the service, then your argument has force.

(Mr. Hannen.) Yes, my Lord. And can it be for one moment contended (bearing in mind the progress of events as I have ventured to depict them), that whereas the priest had all his life celebrated divine service with all the accessories of the altar, he was to find in the silence of the rubric of the Prayer Book and the statute, that everything he had known of the accessories of the altar was swept away, and that he was liable to be punished if he retained them. It is obvious now, construing the Rubrics of the present Prayer Book by the light of the judgment of the Privy Council (as of course we are bound to do), that the requirement of the fair white linen cloth upon the altar was intended to limit and be restrictive. All that had existed before, of course, was authorized under the previous Prayer Book. Then the Privy Council read it in this way,—as a prescription that it is to be a fair white linen cloth, by which it is meant that it is not to be other than a fair white linen cloth. It is not to be ornamented with lace, for instance.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is to be without fringe and so on.

(Mr. Hannen.) Yes, my Lord. Therefore I say these rubrics of the subsequent Prayer Book, construed in the light of that judgment, are in restraint of what was ordered before. But the fair white linen cloth was always to be there, although at the time of the First Prayer Book it would have been probably a somewhat ornamented cloth, such as would have been in use under the Roman ritual.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I should presume this to be the corporas which is mentioned in the existing Prayer Book in the following Rubric:—"When all have communicated the minister shall return to the Lord's table, and reverently place upon it what remaineth of the consecrated elements, covering the same with a fair linen cloth." That would be what the corporas was for.

(Mr. Hannen.) That is the corporas, no doubt; that defines its office. Therefore, my Lord, throughout, the distinction between the two is clear, and that lends strength to my argument. There are other things in a similar position, other things that are not mentioned in the First Prayer Book, and which, it must be supposed, were abolished by implication, if my friend's contention be the true one. I only single out that instance, because if there be one it is as good as many, and that seems to be a most striking one. It seems to be one upon which I scarcely think my friends will venture to say that there had been interference by Legislature under the first Act of Uniformity. With regard to the subsequent practice, I won't travel through that ground. I have only to add this one note in passing, that I observe my friend Mr. Coleridge, in the last case, seemed to think that what was done in the college chapels could not be drawn into a precedent, because he said they were in the nature of private chapels, and therefore need not come within the purview of that Act. But your Lordship will see that was not so; they were regarded as public places of worship by the 2nd and 3rd Edward VI. I refer to that as showing that it cannot be said that the college chapels are private places of worship, because it says, "And for the further encouraging of learning in the tongues in the universities of Cambridge & Oxford, to use and exercise in their Common & open prayer in their chapels, (being no parish churches), or other places of prayer, the matins, evensong, litany, and all other prayers, (the Holy Communion, commonly called the Mass, excepted,) prescribed in the said book in Greek, Latin, or Hebrew; anything in this present Act to the contrary notwithstanding." That recognizes them as places over which the Legislature intended to have control.

(Mr. Hannen.) It makes an exception in their favour. Therefore what was done there must be taken as much as evidence of what was intended to be the law as what was done in parish churches. My Lord, I should have finished all that I had to say upon the specific charges in this case, if it were not that I wish to add one thing which I have an opportunity of adding, which did not occur to Dr. Deane at the moment, although he had mentioned it before. It is a single enforcement of the remarkable argument which he addressed to your Lordship yesterday upon the question of blood and water being referred to as blood only in the Scriptures. It is a very remarkable thing. I have ventured to say that the broad distinction between the argument on the one side and the other is whether or not you may refer to usage to explain that which in itself is not explicit. My friend has referred to these very remarkable passages; but now let us see how we may collect from them an argument in favour of the value of usage. St. Paul states that Moses sprinkled the people with blood and water. He says that Moses did so; and he afterwards speaks of it as "blood." Now when you refer to the passage to which St. Paul is referring, you find it stated (24th Exodus, 6th chap., 8th verse), "And Moses took the blood, and sprinkled it on the people, and said, 'Behold the blood of the covenant which the Lord hath made with you concerning all these words.'" So that that which Moses speaks of as blood alone St. Paul says was blood and water, by which he manifestly shows that these words of Moses were always interpreted by the light of usage, because it was known by St. Paul and those whom he addressed that, whereas Moses spoke of blood alone, yet the usage and practice always had been to mix water with it. I say that the most valuable commentary we can have upon the value of usage is that which I find here in an exactly similar case, where you have to put your interpretation upon the meaning of the word "wine," considered by the light of that usage which we know prevailed; and it must be taken as in this case it was taken to mean, a mixture with water.

Those are the observations I desire to make upon the particular charges. I have only a very few words to say upon the general question. It is to be remembered that this inquiry might have been made in a criminal court. If my learned friends are right, this is an act for which the Defendant in this case might have been indicted, and therefore it is to be remembered throughout that the onus of proof lies entirely upon my friends. I mean not only the onus of proof, but the burden lies on them of establishing that an offence against the law has been committed. Wherever there is anything doubtful the doubt must of necessity be given in favour of the Defendant in this case; wherever there is obscurity, it is my friend who has to make that clear, and establish that words in themselves ambiguous, and which on the face of them are at first sight ambiguous, can on being examined have no other reasonable meaning than that which he puts upon them. For unless he establishes that, then he is not entitled to say that an offence has been committed against the law.

Then, when you look at the nature of these charges, remembering also that we are entirely free from any question of doctrine, and that we are entirely free from any question of significance—not that the significance of the particular act that I have dwelt upon, namely, the lighted candles, need be shrunk from; but what I mean is, remembering that the particular question in this case is not the meaning of the candles, but whether the fact of having them there be an offence against the law—it seems to me, from the way in which the criminal law is always administered in this country, it is impossible for my friend to establish that there has been anything done which has brought the Defendant within the meshes of the law. The statement that he has committed an offence by having candles there when there was no need to give light has no more weight, apart from any intention (which is not alleged), than if it had been alleged that he had fires lit in the stoves of the church when the day was not cold. It is precisely as though a charge had been framed that at Christmas he had the church decorated with holly. It must go that length. If these ornaments of the church are illegal, it must follow that if nothing but what is mentioned is authorized by law, then also decorations—anything that is not, according to the judgment of the Privy Council, actually fixed in the architecture of the church itself so as to come within the description of an architectural ornament—every other decoration if left there constitutes an offence on the part of the clergyman sanctioning it. My Lord, I venture to submit that that cannot be. I have said that I do not shrink from the question of the effect or the particular signification that candles have, it cannot be for one moment contended that they are emblematical of any doctrine which has ever been characterised by the English Church as superstitious; they are only an emblem of the faith of Christendom, upon which all (differing as they may upon other questions of much or little importance) are agreed, and that which these candles are said to signify is indeed the truth—that Christ is the light of the world. So that it really is as though they would quarrel with a figure of speech, and that you are to find a crime in a phrase which may give some assistance to the minds of those who worship, when the thought passes across them, and a sin in an emblem which may lead into a higher train of thought; it is as though, I say, you were to quarrel with a figure of speech, and to find something superstitious in the simile in the passage—

"How far this little candle throws its beams,— and as though we are to abstain from anything which conveys to our mind a spiritual meaning because there have been some things which have a spiritual meaning which has been denied by the Church, and which are particularly obnoxious to a particular party in the Church. I trust, indeed, there is room for both parties in the Church. Both of those parties are much to be respected; they are each of them furthering ends which each thinks to be the highest; but I do trust indeed that the arms of Mother Church are wide enough to hold them both in her embrace.
So shines a good deed in this naughty world;"

(Mr. Charles.) I appear with my learned friends, Dr. Deane and Mr. Hannen, in this case, and also with Dr. Tristram, and Dr. Tristram has intimated to me that it is not his intention, having addressed your Lordship in a previous case, to trouble you with any remarks in the present instance. Indeed, I place myself entirely in your hands whether I shall trouble you or not; because I feel the extraordinary length of detail into which those who have preceded me have unavoidably been led. If, therefore, your Lordship should intimate to me that you think no more public time can be usefully expended on the Defendant's case, I am ready to sit down at once.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have no doubt the Court will hear you with great pleasure, Mr. Charles; if you can tell me that you have any remark additional to those which have been already pressed upon the Court, if you in any way think by a new reference, or by a new view of an argument already presented, you can assist the case of the defendants, I will hear you.

But if you really think after the very full argument, extending over, I think, 14 days, which this case has undergone, and to which, no doubt, you must be considered as having contributed (because it is not to be forgotten that those who do not always address the Court are well known as having assisted their leaders in the arguments which have been addressed to it), if you think that on the whole you could not make any contribution of serious value to the argument, I think you would do well not to address the Court. But I must leave it entirely to your judgment.

(Mr. Charles.) I am much obliged to your Lordship, and I will therefore in any remarks I have to make confine myself (and if I do not perhaps your Lordship will kindly stop me), to saying something which to the best of my belief has not been hitherto said.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Certainly, Mr. Charles, I shall be very glad to hear you.

(Mr. Charles.) The observations which I shall make will really be divided into two parts. I shall make nothing more than a few isolated observations upon the particular charges in this case, and they will be observations strictly supplemental to what has been already said. But before I sit down I want to address something more in the shape of an argument to your Lordship as to the meaning of the words "rites and ceremonies" in the Acts of Uniformity themselves. My friend Dr. Deane yesterday informed your Lordship that he would deal with the meaning of those words in the Prayer Book, Canons, and Acts of Uniformity. He did to some extent deal with the meaning of those words in the Prayer Book and the Canons, but for some reason or other he did not say anything about the Acts of Uniformity. Therefore, before I sit down, I desire to have an opportunity of addressing a very short argument to your Lordship upon that point.

But before I do that, I will make the isolated remarks which I have referred to. With regard to lights, my friend Dr. Deane has used an argument to the effect that in the injunctions of Edward VI. the words "before the Sacrament" cannot mean before the reserved Sacrament, and one of the reasons which he gave to your Lordship for that contention was this, that the word "Sacramentum" is never applied except in a rhetorical manner, as in the well-known Roman Catholic hymn "Tantum ergo" to the reserved Sacrament, and I want to add two references upon that point. The one is to Lingard's History of the Anglo-Saxon Church, vol. 1, page 324, and the passage is this: "From the arrival of Augustine till the Reformation the English name for the Eucharist was 'the housel;' to administer the Eucharist was 'to housel;' to receive it was 'to go to the housel,' or 'to be houseled.'"

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is like the expression in Hamlet,

"Unhouseled, disappointed, unannealed."

(Mr. Charles.) Just so; meaning a person who had not received the last rites of the Church. "Since the Reformation the word Sacrament has generally been substituted, but Sacrament does not adequately supply its place." The other reference which I wish to give to your Lordship on this point is from Ducange's Glossary, which explains it thus: "Sacramentum, sacrum missarum liturgia." Then follow some authorities which he gives in support of that definition of "Sacramentum." These two references I venture to add upon the question whether "Sacrament" can possibly mean the "reserved Sacrament."

Now I wish to say one or two words upon the injunctions. My friend Mr. Hannen has dealt with them, but he has not dealt with one portion of Mr. Stephens' reply. Mr. Stephens said, "For the purpose of this part of my argument I may assume that the injunctions were issued under the Proclamation Acts, and my friend said that the Act of Edward I. c. 12, having repealed those statutes, the injunctions fell along with the statutes. That is to say, his contention was that everything done under the statutes of Henry VIII., in accordance with which, for the present purpose, I say the proclamations were issued, fell, when the statutes themselves were repealed, and in support of that proposition he cited several cases. My Lord, I am not going through all the cases, I will only give you a reference to them. The cases seem to me to make out precisely the contrary position, and to establish that which I should have thought as a proposition of law too clear to need argument, namely, that as to transactions which are over, as to things which are past and done, the repeal of a statute can have no possible effect.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The contrary doctrine would lead to very awkward results.

(Mr. Charles.) Well perhaps it is hardly necessary to go into the authorities which he stated supported his contention.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Give me the references.

(Mr. Charles.) Steavenson v. Oliver (8 Meeson and Welsby) is the only authority I will refer to at all. The facts there were very curious. After the great war a number of persons were thrown upon the medical profession, who had no certificates from Apothecaries' Hall, but it was enacted by the 4th sec. of 6th George IV. c. 23., that every person who had exercised the office of a surgeon on board of Her Majesty's ships should be entitled to practise without a certificate from Apothecaries' Hall. That Act was to continue until the 1st of August 1826; and in Steavenson v. Oliver it was held that persons who held warrants prior to the 1st August 1826 were entitled to go on practising, although the Act which gave them the power to practise was repealed, or rather had expired. Baron Parke says in his judgment, at page 241: "Then comes the question whether the privilege of practising given by the stat. 6 Geo. 4. referred to in the replication, is one which continues notwithstanding the expiration of that statute. That depends on the construction of the temporary enactment. There is a difference between temporary statutes and statutes which are repealed; the latter,"—that is, the statutes which are repealed—"except so far as they relate to transactions already completed under them" become as if they had never existed." My Lord, the rest of the judgments are to the same effect entirely, and I could cite half a dozen authorities to the same effect.

Another point Mr. Stephens made was this: we said these Injunctions are mentioned in the First Prayer Book, and therefore they obtained an authority which they otherwise would not have. If that is so, my friend said, the mention of the canon at the close of the baptismal service lets in the whole body of canons; but he added, in the case of Middleton v. Croft (2 Atkyns) it was decided that the body of the canons are not binding.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It was decided that they were not binding upon the laity.

(Mr. Charles.) That they were not binding on the laity. Indeed when I come to look at the case of Middleton v. Croft, it really does not bear upon this at all; it decides that the canons relating to clandestine marriages are not binding upon the laity. Well, but no canon relating to clandestine marriages is mentioned in the Prayer Book, and therefore it does not touch the argument at all to say that Middleton v. Croft decides that these canons are not binding on the laity. A better argument might be made respecting the 30th canon. It is mentioned in the Prayer Book, and therefore according to my contention has a vigour and authority over and above the rest of the canons. My answer, therefore, to my friend on that point is this: first of all, the mention of the canon is specific, and if it legalize anything, it is No. 30, and nothing else; whereas the mention of the Injunctions is perfectly general and legalizes the whole of them.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Recognizes, you mean?

(Mr. Charles.) Recognizes. Canon 30 is specifically recognized; the Injunctions of Edward VI. are generally recognized. I do not say they are all of them recognized, but so many of them as are pertinent to the Communion Service.

These are the remarks I have to make on the question of lights.

On the question of elevation I have very little to say, but I wish to direct your Lordship's attention to a single circumstance which accompanies the omission of the prohibition against elevation. In Mr. Stephens' opening in this case, he said that the reason the prohibition against elevation was dropped out was that between the issue of the two Prayer Books the Act of Uniformity and I suppose Protestantism generally, was becoming better understood, but he gave us no proof at all of that. My contention is rather this, that it was dropped out of the book because of the irreverence which its insertion had occasioned; and in support of that view I will refer to this singular circumstance—at the same time that it was dropped out of the Prayer Book the reverential rubric, insisting upon the laity kneeling was introduced. Therefore I say both these two things had the same object—the elevation being prohibited people used to come to church and really not know when the act of consecration was going on; and in order to check the involuntary irreverence which arose from such ignorance—

(The Dean of the Arches.) You mean the first order as to kneeling, in the Second Prayer Book.

(Mr. Charles.) Yes, my Lord. It is a very remarkable thing. In order, I say, to check the irreverence, which was probably involuntary—

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say that the order was to check the irreverence which ensued on the prohibition of elevation?

(Mr. Charles.) That is my argument.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is capable of quite another light,—that after the elevation had been once forbidden it had been wholly unpractised, and there was no necessity to repeat the prohibition.

(Mr. Charles.) It is capable of that construction no doubt; but it is a remarkable circumstance that the prohibition against elevation should be omitted at the very time that it was found necessary, as I submit, for the decency of public service, to introduce a reverential rubric as to kneeling.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I see your argument.

(Mr. Charles.) Now I come to say one word upon the circumstance that the Lutheran church elevated, and continued up to the year 1797, I believe, to elevate the Host. I cannot carry it as far as 1797, but I can carry it far beyond anything like the Reformation period.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Well, give me some date. Say the beginning of the 18th century.

(Mr. Charles.) I can carry it to that extent. Now I need hardly remind your Lordship that a great many of our articles come from Lutheran sources; and if you want authority for that, I will refer your Lordship to Lawrence's Bampton Lectures, 4th edition, pp. 234, 235, and 236. Therefore the practice of the Lutheran church is perhaps more important than the practice of any other foreign church; remembering, too, that according to the 30th canon it is not the intention of the Church of England to forsake or reject foreign churches; and of course the Church of Germany among others.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What is your authority for saying that the Lutheran Church continued elevation up to that date?

(Mr. Charles.) I beg to refer your Lordship to the Cedex Liturgicus, vol. 2, pp. 87, 110, 121, 123, 125, 155 and footnote, and 170 and footnote.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is the book Mr. Droop referred me to.

(Mr. Charles.) I do not propose to read the passages. The general effect of them is this, that the practice of elevation was unquestionable and universal for some years. Then it became partial, and by this time it has disappeared. I have the extracts written out here, but it would take me some time to read them.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I will refer to them.

(Mr. Charles.) I wish to notice another very curious point with reference to the Lutheran service. The Lutheran liturgy, I am informed, contains no directions for manual acts, and yet they elevate the Host. Our Second Prayer Book contains no directions for manual acts; in our Second Prayer Book the prohibition against elevation has disappeared. Why should not I be able to say that the condition of the English Church under the Second Prayer Book, with the liturgy but without manual acts, and with the prohibition against the Lutheran practice removed, is the same as that of the Lutheran Church with the liturgy but without manual acts, and in which the Host was habitually elevated.

I have only one observation to make on the 28th Article, if I may be allowed to make it. The 28th Article has been fully dealt with, and the result of the dealing with it has been, I trust, to convince your Lordship that it does not apply to what happens at consecration at all.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The wording of that Article is certainly remarkable. It is not an injunction or prohibition, it is a statement of fact; it is a proposition of fact, "that by Christ's ordinance the Holy Sacrament was not reserved, carried about, "lifted up, or worshipped."

(Mr. Charles.) Precisely. Assuming, however, for the moment that it is more than a statement of fact; assuming, secondly, that it applies to the time of consecration, although I would still say it refers to the reservation only and not to the time of consecration, and that it is a mere statement of fact—

(The Dean of the Arches.) You see the Council of Trent had said the opposite. They had said, "Every one who does not say that these things are done by Christ's institution, is anathema."

(Mr. Charles.) Yes. And the article is a sort of rejoinder, a counterblast. But I say, assuming my friend's contention to be true, still that the lifting up which is prohibited here is a lifting up for the purpose of adoration. My friend Dr. Deane went so fully into the matter, that I need say nothing to prove that elevation does not necessarily mean adoration.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have a full note of his argument. His argument was that by the ancient usage of the Church elevation was not accompanied by adoration in England.

(Mr. Charles.) I suspect the time when it was accompanied by adoration was after the time of the publication of the dogma of the corporal presence.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The date of that is a long time ago, you know.

(Mr. Charles.) I say at all events the lifting up which is prohibited is a lifting up for a purpose not charged to the present case. In support of that I may remind your Lordship that the article is a mere statement of fact, and is not a mandate. The article says that the Sacrament is not carried about.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It does not say it is not to be carried about; it says that by Christ's ordinance it was not carried about.

(Mr. Charles.) It is quite plain that the framers of the article thought it was a statement of fact, and not a prohibition; when we come to look at the rubric of the Communion Service in 1552 which says, "And if any of the bread or wine remain, the curate shall have it to his own use," and then compare it with the further rubrics in the Scotch Prayer Book of 1604. My argument is this, that these rubrics mean the same thing as that in the Prayer Book of 1662, "If any of the bread and wine remain unconsecrated, the curate shall have it to his own use; but if any remain of that which was consecrated, it shall not be carried out of the church, but the priest and such other of the communicants as he shall then call unto him shall, immediately after the blessing, reverently eat and drink the same." Now if the article had forbidden the carrying out of church, what was the necessity of inserting that rubric? or, assuming it to have been in the old Prayer Books, what was the necessity of continuing its insertion? I will not venture to say whether the Rubric was repeated or original, but it is not a matter of importance for my argument.

I have no more to trouble your Lordship with upon either the lights or the elevation, but now I will very shortly say what I have to say about the meaning of the words "rites and ceremonies." The reason I wish to address your Lordship upon the question of rites and ceremonies is partly because I think some misapprehension has arisen as to the contention of Mr. Prideaux, and partly because it is a really important part of the case, although I am far from thinking that it is a critical part of it. Still, my Lord, if I can establish that ceremonial acts, such as those which are charged against us in this case, are not within the purview of the Acts of Uniformity, I shall have gone a great way to establish our innocence of the offences with which we are charged. Now there can be no doubt that the words "rite" and "ceremony" are used both in a wide and in a narrow sense, and on the part of the defendant I do not wish for a moment to contend that sometimes, and in some circumstances, a ceremony does mean what I may call, for the purpose of the distinction, a "ceremonial act." But the question which I wish to ask, and which I hope to answer satisfactorily, is this: what did rites and ceremonies mean in the minds of the framers of the Prayer Book and Acts of Uniformity? Because, that rites and ceremonies do mean "services" as well as "acts" there cannot be a doubt. My friend Dr. Deane proved that conclusively. The Mass is a rite which contains other rites within itself. It is a rite as something done by the officiating minister. The Mass is a ceremony if you look at it from the point of view of the people who receive the Holy Communion.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The question is, what is the meaning of "rites and ceremonies" in the Acts of Uniformity and in the Prayer Book?

(Mr. Charles.) That is the real question, my Lord, it being I suppose unquestionable that a rite and ceremony may mean a service, and it being also unquestionable that the word "ceremony" is sometimes applied to a mere ceremonial act.

Now in order to see what the framers of the Prayer Book and the Act of Uniformity meant by using those words, I wish to refer to some contemporary documents, and I say the effect of these contemporary documents is to show that they meant the lesser and subsidiary offices of the Church, and that they did not mean the external acts, as Hooker says, "incidental or annexed to the Church actions." The first thing I wish to call your Lordship's attention to is the Proclamation of February 6th, 1547; and I will limit myself (although there are a great many documents) to matters strictly contemporaneous. Your Lordship will find it in 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, pp. 43, 44: "A Proclamation against those that do innovate, alter, or leave done any rite or ceremony in the church of their private authority."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That I have been referred to.

(Mr. Charles.) I am going to found an argument upon it which I do not think has been brought to your Lordship's attention. After the substantial part of the proclamation against those that do innovate and alter comes this: "Provided always that for not bearing a candle on Candlemas Day, not taking ashes upon Ash Wednesday, not bearing palm upon Palm Sunday, not creeping to the cross, not taking holy bread or holy water, or for omitting other such rites and ceremonies concerning religion and the use of the Church which the most reverend father in God, the Archbishop of Canterbury, by His Majesty's will and commandment, with the advice aforesaid hath declared, or hereafter shall declare to the other Bishops, by his writing under seal, as heretofore hath been accustomed to be omitted or changed, no man hereafter be imprisoned nor otherwise punished." Now these things—bearing candles on Candlemas Day, taking ashes upon Ash Wednesday, bearing palm upon Palm Sunday, and so on, I contend throw a considerable light upon what the framers of this proclamation meant by "rites and ceremonies." For it is a very singular circumstance that every one of the specified rites and ceremonies is a service, without an exception, and they are all services which are included in one edition or other of the Sarum Missal. The Sarum Missal contains a service connected with the sprinkling of ashes; it contains a service connected with bearing of palms; it contains a service connected with creeping to the cross; it also contains special services at the benediction of holy bread and holy water. Therefore in that Proclamation I venture to say that the words "rites and ceremonies" were used to express services similar to those which are enumerated, and all of which are to be found in a separate form in the Sarum Missal.

The next document which I have to refer to is the Injunction of the King's visitors, 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 67. Those Injunctions were issued in 1548, still nearer to the time of the Prayer Book and the Acts of Uniformity. And in those Injunctions occurs this paragraph: "You shall every Sunday, at the time of your going about the church with holy water, into three or four places, where most audience and assembly of people is for the declaration of the ceremonies, say distinctly and plainly, that your parishioners may well hear and perceive the same, these words," and then follow the words. My Lord, I contend that that is a further illustration of the stricter sense of the word "ceremonies," namely, that they are ceremonies with an explanatory religious formula which converts them into religious offices.

The next document that I have to refer to is contained in 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 63. It is material to notice that what I am now referring to is dated very shortly after the issuing of the Proclamation which I referred to first. It is a letter to the "preachers which the King's Majesty hath licensed to preach." The letter forbids the preachers to "stir and provoke the people to any alteration or innovation, other than is already set forth by the King's Majesty's Injunctions, Homilies, and Proclamations." It goes on: "It is not a private man's duty to alter ceremonies, to innovate orders in the Church; nor yet it is not a preacher's part to bring that into contempt and hatred which the prince doth either allow or is content to suffer. The King's highness, by our advice, as a prince most earnestly given to the true knowledge of God, and to bring up his people therein, doth not cease to labour and travail by all godly means, that his realm might be brought and kept in a most godly and christian order, who only may and ought to do it; why should a private man or a preacher take this royal and kingly office upon him, and not rather, as his duty is, obediently follow himself, and teach likewise others to follow and observe that which is commanded? What is abolished, taken away, reformed, and commanded, it is easy to see by the Acts of Parliament, the Injunctions, Proclamations, and Homilies." Now if we refer to the Proclamation I have just read, we find that the ceremonies there abolished, if my argument upon that Proclamation holds water, are ceremonies similar to those which are allowed to be retained without punishment, namely, bearing ashes on Ash Wednesday, and so on, and therefore I contend, within the minds of the framers of that Injunction and Proclamation, "rites and ceremonies" really meant the lesser services of the Church.

I now come to the Prayer Book, the canons, and the Acts. On the canons I have not a word to add to what Dr. Deane has said. But on the Prayer Book I do wish to add just one word. The title of the Prayer Book has already been pressed upon your Lordship at length, but I wish to notice the following circumstances. First of all, with regard to the place of the chapter on ceremonies in the First Prayer Book, to which your attention was drawn in detail yesterday, I wish to add this one observation. It certainly is a most remarkable circumstance that the framers of the First Prayer Book should have placed that chapter where they did, and as Dr. Deane pressed upon your Lordship yesterday, it really does seem almost conclusive that the stricter meaning of the word "ceremony" for which we contend was the one intended to be used in that chapter. I do not wish to add anything upon that point, nor to what my learned leader said upon the internal evidence of that chapter itself, such as that ceremonies have been abused for greed, and so on; but I wish to call your Lordship's attention to this point, that immediately following the chapter on ceremonies—not a part of it, but immediately following—comes that remarkable note to which Mr. James referred your Lordship, and my contention is this, that the framers of the Prayer Book having dealt with the order of Common Prayer, having dealt with the administration of sacraments, having dealt with the other rites and ceremonies, retaining some and abolishing others, then put in this chapter to state why they had abolished some and why they had retained the others. But they had not in the least forgotten that there were acts done by devout people which might or might not be included in the chapter, according as the wider or the stricter sense of the word "ceremony" was understood to be used, and they added this note to that chapter: "As touching kneeling, crossing, holding up of hands, knocking upon the breast, and other gestures, they may be used or left, as every man's devotion serveth, without blame." And my argument is this, that they were at that very time dealing with "rites and ceremonies" in the strict sense, and while they were so dealing with that they insert the note, giving liberty as to the merely ceremonial acts. I venture to say it strengthens our contention that the chapter refers to something substantial, while the note which immediately follows that chapter refers to something incidental which is left to "every man's devotion."

Secondly, my Lord, I draw attention to the fact that this chapter on ceremonies appears in the Second Prayer Book: "Of Ceremonies, why some be abolished and some retained." Now in the Second Prayer Book there were no manual acts, and it is difficult to see what construction can be placed upon the "some which are retained," if the word "ceremonies" is to mean the ceremonial acts.

Thirdly, I would refer to the fact that in the Homily on Prayer we have this sentence: "Although there are retained sometimes certain other rites and ceremonies," in which the word "other" is capable of the same meaning which it bears in the title-page of the Prayer Book.

To pass from the First Prayer Book, there is a rubric at the end of the Communion service of the Second Prayer Book to which your Lordship's attention has been drawn, and to which I will very shortly refer once more. The rubric is at the end of the Communion service, and it enacts that "Every parishioner shall communicate at least three times a year, of which Easter to be one, and shall also receive the Sacraments and other rites." My friend Mr. Prideaux did just mention this, and it is a singularly phrased sentence, "Receive the Sacraments and other rites." But although not capable of a very grammatical construction, I do venture to submit to your Lordship that the reception of a rite is really nonsense, unless the rite referred to is some substantial duty of religion, and not a mere external act annexed to a church action. Therefore I say that rubric bears out the construction for which I am contending.

So, my Lord, does the title-page of the Scotch Prayer Book incidentally. I know this looks like reasoning from res inter alios acta at first, but the reason I use it is this: when Charles II.'s Book was published there can be no doubt the persons who had the preparation of it must have been perfectly aware of the contents of the Scotch Prayer Book; and it is a singular fact that the title of the Scotch Prayer Book is this, "the Book of Common Prayer and administration of Divine Service and other parts of Divine Service;" the "other parts," &c., occupying the same place as the "rites and ceremonies" does in our Prayer Book.

I now come to the meaning of the word "ceremony" in the Acts of Uniformity; and the first observation I shall make upon that is this—What is an Act of Uniformity for? I can only suppose that the first object would be to create uniformity where there was diversity. But, my Lord, there was already uniformity without any legislation whatever with regard to these manual acts with which we are now charged—I do not care what the use was, or when it was used; or in what part of England, but will my learned friends venture to tell me that whatever was the use, the priests of the Church of England did not, from Land's End to the north, elevate the Host, obey Archbishop Reynolds' constitution about lights, mix the chalice? Why, my Lord, it is plain that all these were matters upon which no legislation was required because there was uniformity already, and what is the use of legislating men into uniformity if they are uniform already? Therefore one would suppose previous to looking at the actual language of the statute, that it would include rites and ceremonies, but not in the sense of ceremonial acts.

I will now deal with the language of the Acts very shortly; the 2nd and 3rd Edward VI. c. 1. is the first Act.

(The Dean of the Arches.) This has very largely been gone into. If you think you can add anything I am quite ready to hear you, but I think they have been almost read verbatim.

(Mr. Charles.) I am painfully conscious of the length with which they have been gone into.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am quite ready to hear you, and no doubt shall derive great benefit from your argument.

(Mr. Charles.) After the recitals and statements of the titles of the Book of Common Prayer, the Act goes on, as your Lordship will well remember: "Wherefore the Lords spiritual and temporal, and the Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, considering as well the most godly travail of the King's Highness, of the Lord Protector, and other of his Highness's Council, in gathering and collecting the said archbishop, bishops, and learned men together, as the godly prayers, orders, rites, and ceremonies in the said book mentioned, and the considerations of altering those things which be altered, and retaining those things which be retained in the said book." That is the first clause. Now it is very singular that the last sentence which I read contains almost verbatim the title of the chapter on ceremonies in the Prayer Book itself. Therefore, I say the framers of those Acts were dealing with the title of the Prayer Book; they mention the orders, the rites, the ceremonies, and then they go to the consideration of the alteration of those things which be altered, and the retaining of those things which be retained. Then follows this sentence, "considering the honour of God and great quietness, which by the grace of God shall ensue," upon what? "Upon the one and uniform rite and order in such Common Prayer, and rites, and extern ceremonies." It is that phrase "extern ceremonies" upon which I wish to make one remark. It certainly is a phrase not very easy to explain, but my contention is that it means external to the main and principal services of the Church. The word "external" does not necessarily mean outward. It is capable of a double signification, and I say that when you look at the effect of the recital of the three portions of the title of the Prayer Book, and the corresponding sentences relating to altering those things which be altered, and retaining those things which be retained, and when we find the word "external" used, it must mean the same sort of ceremonies as are dealt with in the chapter on "Ceremonies."

(The Dean of the Arches.) You say "external" means external to the other services of the Church?

(Mr. Charles.) Yes, my Lord; when we find the words "external ceremonies" exactly corresponding in the Act with the paragraph altering those things which he altered, and retaining those which he retained, I say that these external ceremonies must mean the ceremonies of which that chapter, "of Ceremonies, why some be abolished and some retained," was written; and I hope my learned leaders have satisfied you that that does refer to the lesser services of the Church.

I now go on to the words, "in such order and form," and the only remark I have to make upon them is this—that the word "form" must, I submit, be taken with reference to the preamble of the Act where it is used as equivalent to an use; and that the true theory is that the object of the statute was to secure uniformity in form and substance.

With regard to the second Act of Uniformity, 5 & 6 Edward VI., c. 1., I think I can make one remark that has not been made before. The recital there, or rather the purpose of the Act is, that the Book of Common Prayer shall be made fully perfect. I say that those words throw a great deal of light upon what the object of the framers was. If they meant to apply the Act to ceremonial acts, how could they in confirming their Second Book, which did not contain any, say that the very purpose of the statute was to make the book fully perfect? I contend therefore that this Act of Uniformity had nothing to do with the manual acts with which we are charged. It was framed with another intention altogether, and it is quite possible that the Second Book may be made fully perfect in substance, and in that view that those words in the Act of Uniformity are not insensible but peculiarly sensible. In point of fact the Second Prayer Book was more perfect in substance than the first, because it contained what the first did not contain, namely, the form of consecration of bishops, priests, and deacons. That was not in the First Book but made its appearance in the second—it was the complement of the first and made the First Book fully perfect. But the use of the words "fully perfect" in this Act of Uniformity, (if it applied to external acts,) is, to say the least of it, very singular.

I now come to the later Acts of Uniformity, and I wish to draw your Lordship's attention to a circumstance which I looked last night to see whether Mr. Prideaux had drawn your Lordship's to, and I do not think he did, at all events not directly: I allude to the Act of Elizabeth, which recites this Book of Common Prayer, repeating the title-page, and then enacts as follows—that every minister shall be bound "to say and use the matins, even song, celebration of the Lord's Supper, and administration of each of the Sacraments, and all their Common and open prayer." Now if you look at the preamble of the Act, what can "Common and open prayer" be but the "other rites and ceremonies" mentioned last in the title of the Prayer Book? and you find that that runs right through the Act: the words, "rite, ceremony, order, and form" are always crowded together previous to the mention of the substantial part of the Prayer Book. The object of these Acts of Uniformity was to remove the old mass, and therefore they crowded these epithets upon the mass. They were all applicable to the mass: the mass is an order, the mass is a form, the mass is a rite, the mass is a ceremony; and therefore they crowded all these epithets upon the mass. But they supply the place of "other rites and ceremonies" with the words "Common and open prayer."

(The Dean of the Arches.) Your contention is, in fact, that they use the words "common and open prayer" for "ceremonies."

(Mr. Charles.) For "ceremonies," and I do not think that argument was presented to your Lordship before.

I have now one reference to make to the statute of Charles, and that is to the 7th section, which enacts, "That in all places where the proper incumbent of any parsonage or vicarage, or benefice with cure, doth reside on his living, and keep a curate, the incumbent himself in person (not having some lawful impediment, to be allowed by the Ordinary of the place) shall once (at the least) in every month openly and publicly read the Common Prayer and Service"—I may remind your Lordship that that was defined to mean what is commonly called the Services of the Church—"by the said book prescribed, and (if there be occasion) administer each of the Sacraments, and other rites of the Church;"—again using the word "rites" as in pari materia with the word "Sacraments." Therefore I say, and I am much obliged to your Lordship for having allowed me to say these few words—

(The Dean of the Arches.) You have not at all trespassed upon the indulgence of the Court, Mr. Charles.

(Mr. Charles.) Therefore I say that the proper deduction is, that the Acts of Uniformity were intended to secure uniformity where there was a necessity for it; but that the words "rites and ceremonies" mean in them what it has been contended they mean in the Prayer Book, namely, the lesser ceremonies of the Church, and that they do not touch these outward actions at all.

(Mr. Stephens.) It has now become my duty to make a few concluding observations upon this case. It has been argued, or at least suggested, that some of the practices charged against Mr. Simpson, particularly the use of lights and the mixed chalice, are authorized by the pre-Reformation canon law, and by various Acts of Parliament passed in the reign of Henry VIII.; and, in fact, Mr. Hannen has taken exception to the statement I made in my opening speech in the St. Alban's case, that the effect of 1st Edw. VI. c. 12. was that every existing Act of Parliament in 1547 relating to doctrine and matters of religion was repealed. And that every document which was issued or derived its authority from any such Act, lost its statutory authority. In fact, there was at that time a tabula rasa of all Acts of Parliament relating to doctrine and matters of religion, and all documents emanating from such Acts of Parliament.

Your Lordship has asked me to consider what effect this repealing statute of 1 Edw. VI. c. 12 had upon three particular statutes, namely, 22 Henry VIII. c. 9, s. 4; 24 Henry VIII. c. 12; and the 25th Henry VIII. c. 19. For the purpose of giving a complete answer to my learned friend's contention, and answering satisfactorily your Lordship's question, it is necessary that I should explain clearly what I conceive to have been the state of the canon law after the passing of 1st Edw. VI. c. 12. And this involves a previous discussion of the effect produced on the canon law by the 25th Henry VIII. c. 19, one of the statutes your Lordship referred me to, and by the other statutes passed in Henry VIII.'s reign for the revision of the canon law.

It has never been alleged that this canon law had any parliamentary authority prior to the 25th Henry VIII. c. 19. But it is said, that through that Act and the 35th Henry VIII. c. 16, the canon law acquired the authority of statute law. To this hypothesis there are three answers: (1) that the 25th Henry VIII. c. 17, and the 35th Henry VIII. c. 16, did not give the canon law any greater authority than it had before; (2) that if any statutory authority was given to the canon law by these Acts it was only temporary, and ceased altogether upon the death of Henry VIII.; (3) and that any statutory authority given to the canon law by these Acts was taken away by the 1st Edw. VI. c. 12.

Before the Reformation the Church was governed by two principal Codes: first, the Roman canon law, so far as it was accepted and adopted in this country; secondly, the legatine and provincial constitutions and canons made in England from time to time by legates or archbishops in synods over which they presided.

The statutes applicable to the question immediately under consideration are the 25th Henry VIII., c. 19;

the 27th Henry VIII. c. 15; and the 35th Henry VIII., c. 16.

The statute of the 25th Henry VIII. c. 19, intituled "The Submission of the Clergy, and Restraint of Appeals," commences inter alia with reciting—"that divers constitutions, ordinances, and canons provincial or synodal, which heretofore have been enacted, and be thought not only to be much prejudicial to the King's prerogative royal, and repugnant to the laws and statutes of this realm; but also overmuch onerous to his Highness and his subjects, the said clergy hath most humbly besought the King's Highness that the said constitutions and canons may be committed to the examination and judgment of his Highness and of two and thirty persons of the King's subjects, whereof, 16 to be of the upper and nether House of the Parliament of the temporality, and the other 16 to be of the clergy of this realm, and all the said two and thirty persons to be chosen and appointed by the King's Majesty. And that such of the said constitutions and canons as shall be thought and determined by the said two and thirty persons or the more part of them worthy to be abrogated and annulled shall be abolite and made of no value accordingly, and such other of the same constitutions and canons as by the said two and thirty or more part of them shall be approved to stand with the laws of God and consonant to the laws of this realm, shall stand in their full strength and power, the King's most royal assent first had and obtained to the same."

By the second section power is given to the King to name the 32 commissioners to examine the canons, &c.; but with this proviso, "that no canons, constitutions, or ordinances shall be made or put in execution within this realm by authority of the Convocation of the Clergy, which shall be contrariant or repugnant to the King's prerogative royal, or the customs, laws, or statutes of this realm; anything contained in this Act to the contrary hereof notwithstanding."

The seventh section also provided, "that such canons, constitutions, ordinances, and synodals provincial, being already made, which be not contrariant or repugnant to the laws, statutes, and customs of this realm, nor to the damage or hurt of the King's prerogative royal, shall now still be used and executed as they were afore the making of this Act, till such time, as they be viewed, searched, or otherwise ordered and determined by the said two and thirty persons or the more part of them according to the tenor, form, and effect of this present Act."

The 25th Henry VIII. c. 19, sec. 7, merely enacts, that the canons shall still be used and executed as they were afore the making of this Act, and does not purport to give them any greater efficacy than they had before. It was, in fact, only a proviso maintaining the status quo until the commissioners had reported. But for this proviso, it would have been arguable, that canons which had been condemned by Parliament, as being many of them prejudicial to the King's prerogative and repugnant to the laws of the Realm, were thus made altogether void, and the result would have been a state of anarchy in ecclesiastical affairs.

The statutes 25 Henry VIII. c. 19, s. 7, and 27 Henry VIII. c. 15, to which I shall presently refer, are by way of proviso, and the legitimate use of a proviso is merely to limit or to explain the previous enactment. In Dwaris on Statutes, page 667, it is laid down, that "where a section is by way of proviso, it can only be construed as a clause dependent on a former clause, unless the manifest intention of the Legislature require a different construction." Statutes 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86., sec. 25, and 9 & 10 Vict. c. 59, are instances of provisos merely keeping the old law as it was before.

I will shortly refer your Lordship to the cases in which the meaning of a proviso, even when couched in general terms, has been held to be restricted to the mere qualification of the substantive clause to which it relates. Ex parte Partington, 6 Q. B., page 653; The Queen v. S. Ebbs, 12 Q. B., page 137; and The Queen v. Salford, 12 Q. B., page 106.

Before the statute 25th Henry VIII. c. 19, the canons had no parliamentary authority. By this statute divers of them are declared to be "not only repugnant to the laws and statutes of the realm, but also very much onerous to His Highness and his subjects;" and provision is made for an immediate revision of the canons by commissioners, consisting partly of members of the then Parliament. Now is it likely, that the Legislature intended to give these canons and constitutions a greater authority than they had—much more a continuing parliamentary authority—canons, which had been declared to be repugnant to the laws and statutes of the realm, and onerous to the Crown and the laity? It is not contemplated by this statute that Parliament itself should interpose in the making of canons. The King had power to deal with the canons in different ways. (1.) He could, by virtue of his prerogative, make canons in conjunction with the Convocation of the clergy, as he had done before the enactment of this statute. (2.) By this statute the King in conjunction with the 32 commissioners, and without the co-operation of Convocation, was empowered to view, search, and examine the then existing canons, and continue such as they should deem worthy to be kept and executed, and abrogate such as they should not approve.

The canons mentioned in this statute of 25 Henry VIII. c. 19, as then existing, had been made either by the King and the clergy, or by the clergy exclusively, but not by Parliament. These canons and the canons proposed to be made by the King and the commissioners were to be of equal authority, they were to be subordinate to the customs, laws, and statutes of the realm, thus establishing that the powers of the King and the clergy and the King and the commissioners in the making of canons, were not co-equal with those of Parliament, but were essentially subordinate. What the Act allows is this—that the King and the clergy or the King and the commissioners, independently of each other, may make any canons they liked, provided they do not interfere with any existing royal prerogative, custom, law, or statute. Such was the state of the canon law under this statute.

I will now refer your Lordship to stat. 27 Henry VIII. c. 15, at page 548 of the folio edition. It is entitled, "An Act whereby the King's Majesty shall have power to nominate 32 persons of his clergy, and lay fee for making of ecclesiastical laws." After reciting sections 1, 2, 3, and 7 of stat. 25 Henry VIII. c. 19, but omitting the provisions respecting appeals to Rome, it proceeds: "And forasmuch as the King's Highness hath not named and assigned the said 32 persons sithen the making of the said Act: be it therefore enacted that the King's Majesty shall have full power and authority, as well afore as after the dissolution of this present Parliament, at his liberty and pleasure to name and assign 16 persons of the clergy and 16 lay persons of the temporality. And if after such nomination any of these said persons happen to decease, that then the King's Highness shall have power and authority to nominate and assign from time to time other in their places to supply the number of the said 32. And that the said 32 persons so to be nominated by His Majesty, at all times from henceforth, for the term of three years next after the dissolution of this Parliament, shall have power and authority to assemble themselves together from time to time by the King's commandment for the due and perfect execution of the said Act according to the intent and true meaning of the same."

The 16 lay commissioners to be appointed under the 25th Henry VIII. c. 19, were to be members of the upper and nether House of Parliament of the temporality. Consequently, if any commissioners had been chosen from the lower house of Parliament, and that Parliament had been subsequently dissolved, the commoners would have lost their qualification and ceased to be commissioners. Henry VIII. did not exercise his powers to appoint commissioners under the 25th Henry VIII. c. 19, but shortly before the dissolution of that Parliament this statute of the 27th Henry VIII. c. 15 was passed. Powers were then given by this statute to appoint commissioners, independent of the qualification of being members of Parliament.

The 35th Henry VIII. c. 16 (page 976 of the folio edition) is a "bill for the examination of canon laws by 32 persons to be named by the King's Majesty." After reciting that the review under stat. 27 Henry VIII. c. 15, had not taken place, it gives the King power to appoint commissioners from time to time during his life, "to nominate and assign 16 persons of the clergy and 16 lay persons of the temporality, to peruse, oversee, and examine all manner of canons, constitutions, ordinances, provincial and synodal, and further to set in order and establish all such laws ecclesiastical as shall be thought by the King's Majesty and them convenient to be used, and set forth within his realm and dominions in all spiritual courts and conventions."

This statute gave the commissioners more extensive powers of revision, these being the additional words, "and further to set in order and establish all such laws ecclesiastical." They had very general—almost absolute—powers; and these commissioners could only be appointed and hold office during the life of the King.

The 25th Henry VIII. c. 19, was limited to the written ecclesiastical law, "the canons, constitutions, ordinances, provincial and synodal," and only gave the commissioners power of selection. Such of them as the King and commissioners should deem worthy to be continued, kept, and obeyed, should be kept and obeyed; and the residue of the said canons, constitutions or ordinances provincial, which they should not approve, should be void and of none effect.

The 35th Henry VIII. c. 16, gives a general power to set in order, and establish all such laws ecclesiastical as should be thought convenient, thus authorizing them to frame a new code of ecclesiastical law, and to supersede not only the written canons, but also the unwritten ecclesiastical law, and perhaps the Reformatio legum will show what was intended as to the reform of the law under this statute.

The second section enacts, "That till such time as the King's Majesty and the said 32 persons have accomplished and executed the effects and contents afore rehearsed and mentioned, that such canons, constitutions, ordinances, synodal or provincial, or other ecclesiastical laws or jurisdiction spiritual, as be yet accustomed and used here in the Church of England, which necessarily and conveniently are requisite to be put in ure and execution for the time, not being repugnant, contrariant, or derogatory to the laws or statutes of the realm, nor to the prerogatives of the Regal Crown of the same, or any of them, shall be occupied, exercised, and put in ure for the time within this or any other the King's Majesty's dominions; and that the ministers and due executors of them shall not incur any damage or danger for the due exercising of the foresaid laws, so that by no colour or pretence of them, or any of them, the ministry put in ure anything prejudicial or in contrary of the regal power or laws of the realm."

This section not only provides for the continuance of the provincial and synodal canons; but also for other ecclesiastical laws or jurisdiction spiritual, as be yet accustomed and used here in the Church of England." On the other hand "this statute limits the continuing enactment to such canons, &c., as necessarily and conveniently are requisite to be put in ure and execution for the time. This language is different from that which had been used in the 25th Henry VIII. c. 19, sec. 17, which was "that the canons were to be still used and executed, as they were afore the making of that Act."

This statute extends to the unwritten usages of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and to the Roman canon law so far as it had been received and adopted in England. The provision that the ministers and due executors of the canons, &c., shall not incur any damage or danger, shows an apprehension that but for this clause, the canon law would be treated as altogether void, and the Ecclesiastical Judges held liable to be proceeded against for enforcing it. Consequently, the object of this part of the clause was to preserve to the canon law its existing authority, and this is altogether inconsistent with the previous part of the clause giving them parliamentary authority.

The second section of the 25th Henry VIII. c. 19, is not in terms a proviso, but it is evidently inserted merely because the powers of the Commissioners had been extended to the unwritten law as well as to the written canons and constitutions, &c. From the 25th Henry VIII. the unwritten canon law had been in use without any parliamentary enactment authorizing it. By the 35th Henry VIII. c. 16, sect. 3, "it is enacted that such laws and ordinances ecclesiastical, as shall be devised and made by the King's Majesty and 32 persons afore mentioned by virtue of this present Act, shall after they be made, established, and declared by the King's Majesty's proclamations under His Highness's great seal, be only taken, reputed, and used for the King's laws ecclesiastical of this realm." The ecclesiastical law received no additional authority from this statute. Its objects were (1) to give the King power to appoint and re-appoint commissioners during his life, and (2) to give the commissioners more ample powers than had been given to them by previous statutes. This statute was not repealed by Queen Mary, which shows that it was then considered to have expired.

The conduct of Henry VIII. and his minister Cromwell in 1536, within three years after the passing of the 25th Henry VIII. shows that they had no idea that the canons had any parliamentary authority. I refer your Lordship to 2 Johnson's Canons, page 468, where it will be found that in Archbishop Reynolds' Constitution, section 8, the following provision is contained: "Let no one presume to dispute of things determined by the Church as they are contained in the decrees, decretals, or provincial constitutions, and the synodal [constitutions of places], either publicly or privately; unless it be in order to get the true meaning of them; nor call in question the authority of the said decrees, decretals, or constitutions, or the authority of him that made them; or preach contrary to their determination, especially concerning the adoration of the glorious cross, the veneration of the images of saints, or pilgrimages to their places and relics; or against making oaths in the usual cases and manner in both courts, viz., ecclesiastical and temporal. But let all henceforth preach up the veneration of the cross and of the image of the crucifix, and other images of saints, in memory and honour of them whom they resemble, and their places and relics, with processions, genuflexions, bowings, incensings, kissings, oblations, pilgrimages, illuminations, and all other modes and forms whatsoever used in the times of us and our predecessors; and the making of oaths in a lawful manner, by touching God's holy gospels, and upon the same in cases expressed in the law, and used in both courts by all who are concerned." Then there is this note: "This constitution here fairly owns that all constitutions, decretals, or decrees, are made by the authority of one man, viz., diocesan constitutions by the bishop, provincial constitutions by the archbishop, decretals and decrees by the Pope; so that the priests in the diocese, the suffragan bishop in the province, the cardinals in the conclave, were only applauders." In 1536 the Convocation, at the King's suggestion, and without the concurrence of Parliament, agreed upon certain articles, of which one relating to images contained the following passage, which your Lordship will find in the book entitled "Formularies of Faith during the reign of Henry the 8th," page 14. It was published at Oxford in 1825. The book contains "The articles about religion, 1536," "The institution of a Christian man, 1537," "A necessary doctrine and erudition for any Christian man, 1543." "And as for censuring of them, and kneeling and offering unto them, and other like worshippings, although the same hath entered by devotion, and fallen to custom, yet the people ought to be diligently taught that they in no ways do it, nor think it meet to be done to the same images, but only to be done to God, and in his honour, although it be done before the images, whether it be of Christ, of the Cross, or of our Lady, or of any other Saint beside."

Cromwell, in his Injunctions, issued 1536, which are in Foxe's Actes and Monuments, page 166, directs, "To the intent that all superstition, hypocrisy, crept into divers men's hearts may vanish away, they shall not set forth or extol any images, relies, or miracles for any superstition or lucre, nor allure the people by any entreatments to the pilgrimages of any saints otherwise than is permitted in the Articles lately put forth by the authority of the King's Majesty, and condescended upon by the prelates and clergy of this Realm in convocation." Then at page 169 of the same book will be found the Injunctions of 1538, by which Cromwell ordered that "such feigned images as ye know to be abused with pilgrimages or offerings of any kind made thereunto, ye shall, for avoiding of that most detestable offence of idolatry, forwith take down without delay; and shall suffer from henceforth no candles, tapers, or images of wax to be set before any images or pictures," &c. It is absurd to imagine that the King and Cromwell would have acted in this way, without any sanction from Parliament, if Arundel's Constitutions had been in force by authority of Parliament.

If the 25th Henry VIII., c. 19, and the 35th Henry VIII., c. 16, gave any statutory authority to the canon law, it was only temporary, and altogether ceased upon the death of Henry VIII. Under the 25th Henry VIII., c. 19, the commission to revise the canons could not last beyond the then Parliament; but under the 27th Henry VIII., c. 15, the commission was limited to three years. Under the 35th Henry VIII., c. 16, the commission was to terminate with the King's life.

The authority to revise and to abrogate the canons under the statutes 25th Henry VIII., c. 19, and 35th Henry VIII., c. 16, ceased to exist on the accession of Edward VI., and the subordinate and independent enactments as to the state of things for the time, until the review had been finished, ceased to have effect, being no longer required.

It is not intended to be contended, that the canons were repealed. They continued to have the same authority, whatever that might be, as they possessed anterior to the Act of Submission. Neither the statute 25th Henry VIII., cap. 19, nor 35th Henry VIII., cap. 16, repealed any of the canons—they only made provisions for their future repeal if such repeal became expedient.

In Westerton and Liddell (Moore, page 160,) this question was brought under the consideration of the Privy Council. They did not decide this point, but what they substantially said was this, that it was a subject which, if brought before them, and they were compelled to decide upon it judicially, would be a point worthy of very grave and serious consideration.

The paramount object of these statutes was to give extensive powers of review to certain commissioners. Any other object was purely dependent and subordinate.

Although the provisions of the 35th Henry VIII., cap. 16, section 2, are enactments and not by way of proviso, yet the sanction given to ecclesiastical usages in the 25th Henry VIII., cap. 19, and 35th Henry VIII., cap. 16, is "only until" the commissioners should perform the duties assigned to them.

The confirmation in statute 35th Henry VIII., cap. 16, section 2, is not general, but is strictly limited to those constitutions which are "necessarily and conveniently requisite to be put in ure and execution for the time"—that is, until the review could be completed—but not beyond the life of Henry VIII.

The authority given to the Crown to appoint commissioners under this statute was personal to Henry VIII.; it did not extend to his successors. Therefore, when Henry VIII. died, it was impossible that the provisions of these statutes in respect of the review could be carried out.

The event contemplated by these statutes, having become impossible by the act of God, the clauses which were limited, to operate only until that event became inoperative.

Any statutory authority given to the canon law by the 25th Henry VIII., cap. 19, and 35th Henry VIII., cap. 16, was taken away by the 1st Edward VI., cap. 12, sec. 2.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Any authority given by those statutes to which you have referred?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes. The statute 1st Edward I., cap. 12, sec. 2, to which I have referred, shows that the Legislature at that time did not consider that the canons had the same or the like authority as Acts of Parliament. It "repeals all Acts of Parliament concerning religion and opinions, enumerating among other Acts for the punishment of heresy 31st Henry VIII., cap. 14 (the Six Articles Act) and the 34th and 35th Henry VIII., cap. 1, (under which 'The necessary doctrine and erudition of a christian man,' was issued,) and all other Acts relating to doctrine and matters of religion."

Some of the canons, for example, the canons of Arundel, 1408 (2 Johnson's canons, page 463) are quite as stringent against heresy as any of the Acts here enumerated; and a very considerable portion of the canons supposed to derive parliamentary authority from the 25th Henry VIII., cap. 19, and the 35th Henry VIII., cap. 16, come within the description, "Concerning doctrine and matters of religion." If the Legislature had regarded these canons as having parliamentary authority, they would have repealed them, in order to carry out effectually the objects of the Reformation. But assuming that they were mistaken upon the construction of these statutes, passed only a few years before, the words actually used in 1 Edward VI., cap. 12, section 2, are sufficient to take away all parliamentary authority from such of the canons as relate to doctrine and matters of religion.

The object of the Legislature in passing that Act was manifest; it was, to repeal every parliamentary enactment relating to doctrine and other matters of religion; and though that Act would have been differently worded, if it had been considered that the canons had the authority of Parliament, yet the words used can be so interpreted as to give effect to the intention.

When the Council shortly afterwards ordered all images out of churches, and prohibited creeping to the cross; it does not appear that anyone suggested that the orders were violations of the statute 25th Henry VIII., cap. 19. A reference will be found on this point in 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, pp. 45 and 47, in the orders of Archbishop Cranmer, which recite and refer to the orders of the Council. See 1 Cardwell's Doc. Ann. pp. 45, 47.

I submit to your Lordship the three following deductions: (1), if the canons were left by the 25th Henry VIII., cap. 19, in the same state as they were before the enactment of that statute, namely, having the mere authority of canons, then they were not in force by authority of Parliament in the second year of Edward the VI.; (2), if the statutes under consideration gave the canons statutable authority for a limited time, it ceased upon the death of Henry VIII.; (3) if the statute 25th Henry VIII., cap. 19, gave the canons a statutable authority, then such statutable authority was taken away from such of the canons as related to doctrine and matters of religion under the statute of the first Edward VI., cap. 12, and they were not in force by authority of Parliament in the second year of Edward VI.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Does that conclude your argument upon the statutes?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes; upon the statutes. I am now going to discuss the question which was raised yesterday upon matters of religion.

[Adjourned for a short time.]

(Mr. Stephens.) It has been said, my Lord, that the words "doctrine and matters of religion" are to be restricted to matters of religion of the same kind as are dealt with in the statutes repealed; but even if this proposition be admitted, the words "doctrine and matters of religion" would still include "the ritual of the Church." One of the Acts repealed is the 34th and 35th Henry VIII., cap. 1. The summary of that Act is in the ordinary edition of the statutes as follows: (1 Stephens' Ecclesiastical Statutes, 282.) "Recourse must be had to the Catholic and Apostolic Church for the decision of controversies, and therefore all books of the Old and New Testament in English, being of Tindal's false translation, or comprising any matter of Christian Religion, Articles of the Faith, or Holy Scripture, contrary to the doctrine set forth sithence A.D. 1540, or to be set forth by the King, shall be abolished. No printer or bookseller shall utter any of the aforesaid books. No person shall play in enterlude, sing, or rhyme, contrary to the said doctrine. No person shall retain any English books or writings concerning matter against the holy and blessed Sacrament of the altar, or for the maintenance of Anabaptists, or other books abolished by the King's Proclamation. There shall be no annotations or preambles in Bibles or New Testaments in English. The Bible shall not be read in English in any church. No women or artificers, prentices, journeymen, servingmen of the degree of yeomen or under husbandmen, nor labourers, shall read the New Testament in English. Nothing shall be taught or maintained contrary to the King's instructions. And if any spiritual person preach, teach, or maintain anything contrary to the King's instructions or determinations, made or to be made, and shall be thereof convict, he shall for the first offence recant, for his second offence abjure and bear a faggot, and for his third shall be adjudged an heretick, and be burned, and lose all his goods and chattels."

Under the powers of this Act, Henry VIII. had issued "The Necessary Doctrine and Erudition of a Christian Man," which certainly deals with ritual as well as doctrine. At page 310 of "The Formularies of the Faith," will be found the following passage: "Therefore concerning such ceremonies of the Church as have been institute by our forefathers, and be allowed by the princes or kings of the dominions, which, next to God, be the chief heads of the Churches, although men ought not to have so fond opinion of the said ceremonies to think that they have power to remit sin, yet they be very expedient things, either to excite or stir up men's devotion and to cause them to have the more reverence towards the Sacrament; as the hallowing of the font, of the chalice, of the corporas, of the altar, and other like exorcisms and benedictions done by the ministers of Christ's Church, or else to put us in continual remembrance of those spiritual things which be signified by them. As sprinkling of holy water doth put us in remembrance of our baptism, and of the blood of Christ sprinkled for our redemption upon the Cross, giving of holy bread doth put us in remembrance of the Sacrament of the Altar which we ought to receive in right charity; and also that all Christian men be one body mystical of Christ, as the bread is made of many grains, and yet but one loaf. Bearing the candles on Candlemas Day doth put us in remembrance of Christ, the spiritual light of whom Simeon did prophesy, as is read in the church that day. Giving ashes on Ash Wednesday doth put us in remembrance that every Christian man should consider that he is but ashes and earth, and thereunto he shall return. Bearing of palms on Palm Sunday doth put us in remembrance of the "receiving of Christ into Jerusalem a little before his death, and that we must have the same desire to receive him in our hearts. Creeping to the Cross on Good Friday, and there offering unto Christ before the same, and blessing of it, declareth our humble submission and thanksgiving to Christ for our redemption, which he hath wrought for us upon the Cross. And so, finally, the setting up of the sepulchre of Christ, whose body after his death was buried, and all other like laudable customs, rites, and ceremonies do put us in remembrance of some spiritual thing. And therefore they be not to be contemned and cast away, but obediently to be used and continued, as things good and laudable for the purposes aforesaid."

These practices were so strongly sanctioned, that Edward VI.'s Council did not venture to abolish them until the 34th and 35th Henry VIII., c. 1., had been repealed. I have never contended that the words "doctrine and matters of religion" included the Royal Supremacy; the mode in which appeals were to be heard; or the procedure of the Ecclesiastical Courts; nor the restraints imposed upon convocation by the Act of Submission (25th Henry VIII., cap. 19). These are matters only indirectly or in a secondary manner connected with matters of religion.

The substantial question in the present case is, whether the words "doctrine and matters of religion" include ritual as well as doctrine? If they do not, I cannot conceive what effect can be given to the words "matters of religion." "Doctrine" and "matters of religion" must mean something more than doctrine, and ritual is so closely connected with doctrine, that I do not understand what else can be included if ritual is not.

It has been argued by Mr. Hannen, that all the statutes specifically repealed are penal statutes, and that therefore the repeal is limited to penal statutes relating to religion; but there is nothing in the repealing Act to limit it in that way. I submit to your Lordship with the most perfect confidence, that the true construction of 1 and 2 Edward VI., cap. 12, sec. 6, is, that it repealed all Acts of Parliament relating to doctrine, ritual, or any other matters directly connected with religion, and took away all statutable authority, which any canons, or other documents relating to any such subjects might have previously had.

Mr. Hannen asked me in a very emphatic manner what was the state of the Church between the passing of 1 Edward VI., cap. 12, and the passing of the first Act of Uniformity. Substantially he said this—Was not the Church in a state of chaos according to your argument? My answer is, The church was governed by the common law of the Church,—it was governed by the canon law,—it was governed by the Royal prerogative. That was the state of chaos in which the Church was in the intermediate period between the passing of the 1st Edward VI., cap. 12, and the enactment of the first book of Edward VI.

Previously to the passing of the repealing statute, the King had in the 19th Injunction of the Injunctions of 1547, (1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 13) ordered, "That no person shall from henceforth alter or change the order and manner of any fasting-day that is commanded, nor of common prayer or divine service, otherwise than is specified in these Injunctions, until such time as the same shall be otherwise ordered and transposed by the King's authority."

During the interval between the 1st Edward VI., cap. 12, and the 2d and 3d Edward VI., cap. 1, the King and his Council by virtue of the Royal supremacy, issued several proclamations and orders relating to matters of doctrine and ritual. For instance, on the 6th February 1547-8, a proclamation was issued with the following title: "A proclamation against those that do innovate, alter, or have done any rite or ceremony in the church of their private authority, and against them which preach without licenses, set forth the 6th day of February in the second year of the King's Majesty's most gracious reign."

(The Dean of the Arches.) That would be before the first Prayer Book.

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, a few days previously. The extract from the proclamation which I now propose to read to your Lordship will be found in 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 44: "Provided always, that for not bearing a candle upon Candlemas Day, not taking ashes upon Ash Wednesday, not bearing palm upon Palm Sunday, not creeping to the cross, not taking holy bread or holy water, or for omitting other such rites and ceremonies concerning religion, and the Use of the Church, which the most reverend father in God, the Archbishop of Canterbury, by His Majesty's will and commandment, with the advice aforesaid, hath declared or hereafter shall declare to the other bishops by his writing under seal, as heretofore hath been accustomed to be admitted or changed, no man hereafter be imprisoned nor otherwise punished."

The Council had likewise authorized, between the same period of time, Archbishop Cranmer to write the following letter, dated January 27, 1547-8, to Bishop Bonner, which will be found in 1 Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 45. It is entitled "The Archbishop's letter to the Bishop of London against candles, and ashes, and palms in churches. This is to advertise your Lordship, that my Lord Protector's grace, with advice of others, the King's Majesty's Council, for certain considerations them thereunto moving, hath fully resolved that no candles should be borne upon Candlemas Day, nor also from henceforth ashes or palms used any longer. Wherefore I beseech your Lordship to cause admonition thereof to be given in all parish churches throughout your diocese with all celerity, and likewise unto all other bishops that be hereabouts, that they may do the semblable in their dioceses before Candlemas Day. And as for other bishops that cannot have knowledge so soon, you may give them knowledge hereof at more leisure, so that it be done before Ash Wednesday. Thus fare your Lordship well, your loving friend, T. Cantuar." That, my Lord, is illustrative of the way in which the Church was governed between the enactment of the 1st Edward VI., cap. 12, and the passing of the first Book of Edward VI.]

Mr. Hannen has also cited a passage from the 24th Henry VIII., cap. 12, for the restraint of appeals, which might possibly be supposed to give a parliamentary sanction to the ritual at that time in use in the Church in England: "Also that all spiritual prelates, pastors, ministers, and curates within this realm, and the dominions of the same, shall and may use, minister, execute, and do, or cause to be used, executed, ministered, and done, all sacraments, sacramentals, divine services, and all other things within the said realm and His dominions, unto all the subjects of the same, as Catholick and Christian men owen to do, any former citations, processes, inhibitions, suspensions, interdictions, excommunications, and appeals, for or touching the causes aforesaid, from or to the See of Rome, or any other foreign prince or foreign courts, to the let or contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding." [1 Stephens' Ecclesiastical Statutes, p. 144.]

This passage only means that no citations, processes, and so forth, from the See of Rome, or from any other court, are to interfere with the administration of the sacraments, sacramentals, and divine services in England. And if that be the only meaning of the statute it was not interfered with by the statute of Edward VI., cap. 12, repealing all laws relating to "doctrine and matters of religion." This passage, as I respectfully submit, does not and cannot mean that the like sacraments, sacramentals, and divine services are to be administered in the Church in England, as were in use when this statute passed. Such a construction would make some parts of the Injunctions of 1547, such for instance as the orders of the 21st Injunction for reading the Epistle and Gospel in English, a direct violation of the Act of Parliament. Your Lordship will find in (1) Cardwell's Documentary Annals, page 13, the following Injunction: "Also that no person shall from henceforth alter or change the order and manner of any fasting day that is commanded, nor of common prayer or divine service, otherwise than is specified in these Injunctions, until at such time as the same shall be otherwise ordered and transposed by the King's authority."

But if such a construction be put upon the passage in question as is contended for, then so far as it has had that effect, it is repealed by 1st Edward VI., cap. 12, as being an Act of Parliament relating to ritual.

But even if previous regulations had the authority of Parliament, the Acts of Uniformity were made to sweep them away, and to introduce a new order of service complete in itself.

(The Dean of the Arches.) What do you say they were intended to sweep away?

(Mr. Stephens.) If the previous regulations had the authority of Parliament, then the Act of Uniformity was made to sweep them away.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Regulations including the Injunctions do you mean?

(Mr. Stephens.) Anything; everything that would interfere with the introduction of a new order of service complete in itself. I think your Lordship remembers the argument I ventured to address to you upon that subject?

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have got a very long and careful note of it, besides the advantage of having it all printed, which is a very great advantage.

(Mr. Stephens.) In Westerton and Liddell [Moore, page 67], Dr. Lushington says: "I am of opinion that this statute of Henry VIII., [he is speaking of the 25th Henry VIII. c. 19.] and all that it purports to confirm and carry into effect, is modified and repealed, pro tanto, by what is to be found in the Acts of Uniformity and in other statutes relating to the Established Church of this realm,—and by the Book of Common Prayer, by all therein to be found inconsistent with those canons, constitutions, and so forth. And that, by necessary implication, all laws previously existing opposed to the Church, by present law established, are repealed. I will not dwell on this argument, or the gross absurdities and contradictions which would follow, unless it were admitted that the establishment of our Church did repeal all that was repugnant to it."

An affirmative Act may repeal a previous one if it manifest an intention incompatible with it. I will not go into the case which I cite in support of that proposition, but I will give your Lordship the reference. It is O'Flaherty v. McDowell, 6 House of Lords, page 142.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is to say, an affirmative Act without words of repeal, being subsequent in date, may by implication have that effect?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes; 1 Elizabeth, cap. 2, sec. 27, says: "All laws, statutes, and ordinances wherein or whereby any other service, administration of sacraments, or common prayer, is limited, established, or set forth to be used within this realm, or any other the Queen's dominions or countries, shall from henceforth be utterly void and of none effect." That is perhaps one of the most important provisions of the statute of Elizabeth in reference to the questions, which your Lordship will have ultimately to decide in this case.

The administration of the Holy Communion with lights when not necessary for giving light, or the use of the mixed chalice, is a different administration from that which is prescribed in Elizabeth's Act of Uniformity; consequently all canons or other laws prescribing any such administration were repealed by 1 Elizabeth, cap. 2, sec. 27, and are therefore not now in force.

The only way in which it could be contended, that the pre-Reformation canons or any other Acts of Henry VIII., relating to the ritual of the Church, are now in force, is under the words, "Authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI." in the Rubric as to ornaments. But even if it could be established, that any of the canons relating to ritual had statutable authority in the second year of Edward VI., or that any Acts of Parliament relating to ritual were in force in that year, I need hardly observe that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Westerton and Liddell have decided that the word "ornaments" "is confined to those articles, the use of which in the services and ministration of the Church is prescribed by the first Prayer Book of Edward VI." As I have before shown, in the St. Alban's case, the Ornament Rubric is only applied to the ornaments expressly mentioned in the first book of Edward VI.; and that even if this were not the case—if the Ornament Rubric extended to ornaments only authorized by implication in Edward's first book, such as the water cruet, or the chrismatory, that rubric would not justify a clergyman in introducing a new ceremony or altering the prescribed form, for the purpose of using such an ornament.

I have now finished that part of the argument which your Lordship requested me to get up yesterday evening; and I will proceed to another subject upon which also I believe your Lordship wished for information; it is as to the use of metrical psalms and hymns during divine service.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I shall be happy to hear what you have to say upon that. It is a curious point.

(Mr. Stephens.) Your Lordship invited the discussion upon the point.

(The Dean of the Arches.) So I did.

(Mr. Stephens.) It may be suggested that the use of metrical psalms and hymns in divine service is inconsistent with the construction which I have ventured to place upon the Act of Uniformity; it therefore seems desirable that I should quote a few authorities as to the extent to which metrical psalms and hymns have been used, and how far such use was considered to be authorized. My proposed observations (and I wish to guard myself very carefully upon the point) may not clear up all the obscurity in which this subject is involved, but they will, at any rate, show that this is an isolated exception to the rule I have deduced from the Acts of Uniformity. It does not in the slightest degree justify the introduction of such practices as the elevation of the Elements; the use of lighted candles on the holy table when not required for giving light; or the mixing of water with the sacramental wine.

Lathbury, in his History of the Prayer Book, p. 89, says—"Not unfrequently the metrical psalms and hymns are mentioned in the Visitation Articles. In 1547 by the Bishop of London, in 1584 by the Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, and in 1599 by the Archdeacon of Nottingham, an enquiry is made respecting two psalters among the Church books. One of these must have been the metrical version. In King's Articles, in 1559, it is specified. He asks whether they have 'two psalters, in prose and metre?' It has frequently been asserted that the version of Sternhold and Hopkins never possessed any ecclesiastical authority. Synodical authority cannot be pleaded for it; but the various Visitation Articles prove that its use was recognized in this reign. It must have been regarded at this time as possessing sufficient authority."

These inquiries whether each church was provided with a metrical psalter imply a previous order, that such a psalter should be provided and used. A like inquiry as to the two psalters is in Bishop Andrewe's Visitation Articles in 1619, which are published in Andrewe's Minor Works, page 113; and in Cosin's Visitation Articles, as Archdeacon, in 1627, which will be found in 2 Cosin's Works, page 4.

In the Liturgical services of Queen Elizabeth (Parker Society's edition, page 478) the following form of prayer is given, "A Form to be used in Common Prayer twice a week, and also an order of public fasts to be used every Wednesday in the week during this time of mortality, and other afflictions, wherewith the Realm at this present is visited. Set forth by the Queen's Majesty's special commandment, expressed in her letters hereafter following in the next page, xxx. July 1563." And at page 489, which is a continuation, we find "Psalms which may be sung or said before the beginning or after the end of public prayer." At page 527, "A Form to be used in Common Prayer every Sunday, Wednesday, and Friday, through the whole Realm. To excite and stir all godly people to pray unto God for the preservation of those christians and their countries that are now invaded by the Turk in Hungary, or elsewhere, set forth by the most reverend father in God, Matthew, Archbishop of Canterbury, by the authority of the Queen's Majesty's." At page 535 "Psalms which may be sung or said before the beginning or after the ending of public prayer or before and after sermons." Again, at page 558, this direction will be found, "The 21st Psalm in metre before the sermon unto the end of the seventh verse, and the 100th Psalm after the sermon." This form is found in an edition published in 1578, with the following title (page 463), "A Fourme of Prayer with Thankesgiving to be used of all the Queene's Maiestie's louing subjects every yeere, the 17 of Nouember, being the day of Her Highnesse entry to Her kingdome. Set forth by authoritie."

Heylin, in his History of the Reformation (p. 271), speaking of Sternhold and Hopkins' version of the Psalms, says, "Notwithstanding being first allowed for private devotion they were by little and little brought into the use of the Church to be sung before and after sermons; afterwards printed and bound up with the Common Prayer Book, and at last added by the stationers at the end of the Bible. For though it be expressed in the title of those singing psalms that they were 'set forth and allowed to be sung in all churches before and after morning and evening prayer, and also before and after sermons,' yet this allowance seems rather to have been a connivance than an approbation; no such allowance being anywhere found by such as have been most industrious and concerned in the search thereof. At first it was pretended only that the said psalms should be sung 'before and after morning and evening prayer, and also before and after sermons;' which shews that they were not to be intermingled in the public Liturgy. But in some tract of time, as the Puritan faction grew in strength and confidence, they prevailed so far in most places [as] to thrust the Te Deum, the Benedictus, the Magnificat, and the Nunc Dimittis, quite out of the Church."

As Sternhold and Hopkins' version of the Psalms contained metrical versions of the Te Deum and other canticles, the conduct of the Puritan faction, of which Heylin complains, probably consisted in substituting the metrical version of a canticle for the prose version, and not in substituting a psalm for the canticle.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I do not know that I need weary you with all these things, Mr. Stephens; perhaps it is rather hard upon you. All that I wanted to know was whether there was any authority for them?

(Mr. Stephens.) Yes, there is. I was proceeding to show your Lordship that they stand in a very different position from the questions now before the Court.

(The Dean of the Arches.) That is all that is applicable?

(Mr. Stephens.) That is the only way in which this argument is applicable. I want to show that hymns and psalms stand upon a different basis.

(The Dean of the Arches.) They are not ejusdem generis?

(Mr. Stephens.) Precisely.

(The Dean of the Arches.) But it is throwing too much burden upon you to make you argue a thing which is not before the Court?

(Mr. Stephens.) The question as to the introduction of hymns and psalms was pressed upon your Lordship, and I want to show that they stand upon quite a different basis.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Then proceed with that, if you please.

(Mr. Stephens.) I now hand up to your Lordship two volumes, one of which was printed in 1624, by the Company of Stationers, and the other in 1641, with the privilege of the Crown; and the titles are as follow: "The whole Book of Psalms collected into English meter by Thomas Sternhold, John Hopkins, and others, compared with the Hebrew, with notes to sing them withal, set forth and allowed to be sung by all people together before and after morning and evening prayer" (not in the service your Lordship sees) "and also before and after sermons; and moreover in private houses for their godly solace and comfort, and the laying aside of ungodly songs and ballads, which tend only to the encouragement of vice and corruption of youth." Your Lordship will see that both volumes correspond in their title.

I have no wish to go on if your Lordship will concede this proposition to me,—that the use of psalms and hymns in the Church stand upon quite a different basis to the questions submitted for the judgment of this Court.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I am afraid I must not express any opinion upon that yet awhile.

(Mr. Stephens.) Then, if your Lordship will excuse me, I will proceed with my argument, because it is very important I should establish that proposition.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Very; however, I am quite ready to hear you upon that. I shall be glad to hear any argument upon the point that they stand upon a different footing to the questions in this case.

(Mr. Stephens.) My Lord, that is the only point they have seemingly made on the opposite side, and a very poor one it is.

Strype, in his Ecclesiastical Memorials (vol. 2, part 1, page 135, Oxford edition, 1822), when discussing Edward's first Act of Uniformity, says, "Let me, moreover, take notice of a proviso in this Act concerning the singing of psalms in public use then customarily and probably sung a good while before this by the gospellers, according as the reformed in other countries used to do; yet without any authority. This practice was now authorized by virtue of the said proviso which run in this tenor: 'Provided also that it shall be lawful for all men, as well in churches, chapels, oratories, or other places, to use openly any psalm or prayer taken out of the Bible, at any due time; not letting or omitting thereby the service, or any part thereof, mentioned in the said book.'" From hence it is that the title page of our present books, the Hymns and Psalms in Meter carry these words: "Set forth and allowed to be sung in all churches of all the people together, before and after morning and evening prayer; and also before and after sermons, and, moreover, in private houses for their godly solace and comfort." (I believe the very words of the titles of the two books I have handed up to your Lordship.) "Which may serve to explain to us what the ordinary times of their singing together these psalms were, namely, before they began the morning service, and after it was done. Likewise, when there was a sermon, before it began, and after it was finished. As for the psalms or hymns thus allowed, they seem to be those that are yet set before and after our present singing psalms, done by Dr. Cox, W. Whittingham, Robert Wisdom, eminent divines in those times, and others; and some of David's psalms, done by Sternhold, Hopkins, and others. It is certain that Sternhold composed several at first for his own solace. For he set and sung them to his organ. Which music King Edward VI. some time hearing (for he was a gentleman of the Privy Chamber) was much delighted with them. Which occasioned his publication and dedication of them to the said King. After, when the whole Book of Psalms (with some other hymns,) were completely finished in verse, (done as it seems by Hopkins and certain other exiles in Queen Mary's reign), this clause in the aforesaid Act gave them their authority for their public use in the Church hitherto."

The proviso which Strype refers to was not inserted in Elizabeth's Act of Uniformity or in Charles the Second's, and they are the only Acts now in force, and were the only Acts in force when Strype wrote. He must therefore be wrong in resting the usage of singing psalms upon that proviso. It is likewise observable that Strype, like Heylin, speaks as if there were only one set of hymns and psalms in metre in use when he was writing, shortly before 1721, although besides the old version of Sternhold and Hopkins a new version by Tate and Brady had been allowed to be used in churches in 1696. The use of this latter version was sanctioned by an Order in Council of William III., dated December 3d, 1696. I think this Order has been read to your Lordship; it is dated at the Court at Kensington in 1696.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I have got a reference to it somewhere.

(Dr. Swabey.) The copy I read was taken from Mr. Stephens' book.

(Mr. Stephens.) It will likewise be found in the folio edition of the Book of Common Prayer, printed at Cambridge in 1844.

Bishop Beveridge wrote a public defence of Sternhold and Hopkins' version (8 Beveridge's Works, p. 23). In that defence he quotes the title always prefixed to Sternhold and Hopkins' version, "The whole Book of Psalms, collected into English Metre, by Thomas Sternhold, John Hopkins, and others." This title is precisely the same as in the books which I handed up to your Lordship. I therefore need not read it in extenso.

Upon this title Bishop Beveridge makes the following comments, which will be found at page 614: "These psalms were set forth and allowed to be sung in all churches, which could not be without royal authority, none having power over all the churches in the kingdom but the King himself; and therefore, although his letters patent or his sign manual cannot be now produced, yet they who first printed or set forth this book had his order or licence under his hand cannot be doubted. For otherwise they durst never have presumed to have said that it was set forth and allowed to be sung in all churches. And if they had done it at first they would soon have been questioned for it, and those words ordered to be left out in all future additions; but we see they have been kept in all the reigns ever since. From whence we may certainly conclude that this translation of the Psalms stands upon the same bottom with the last, and all other translations of the Bible; that is, upon the royal prerogative and authority."

Bishop Beveridge afterwards quotes (page 652) an order of Charles I., authorizing the singing in churches of another version of the Psalms translated by his father, James I.: "Charles Rex, having caused this translation of the Psalms (whereof our late dear father was author) to be perused, and it being found to be exactly and truly done, we do hereby authorize the same to be imprinted according to the patent granted thereupon, and do allow them to be sung in all the churches of our dominions, recommending them to all our good subjects for that effect."

With reference to the King's giving permission for a particular version being sung, such as Charles I. gave in this case and as William III. had given with reference to Tate and Brady's version, Bishop Beveridge (page 650) says:—"What then is the effect of the royal permission and allowance? It has this great effect, that by virtue thereof this new version of the Psalms may now be used in all [such]

“ churches, chapels, and congregations as shall think fit to receive the same, without their being liable to be called in question for it in any of His Majesty’s courts, as otherwise they might be, which makes me sometimes wonder to hear that in some ‘places they publicly use’ neither the new version of the Psalms nor the old, but some other which were never allowed by any prince, who alone could do it. What they can answer if called to account for it I know not; it is well if they themselves do. But the new version, be sure, may be lawfully used wheresoever it is thought fit to be received now that His Majesty hath been pleased to permit and allow it.”

It is observable, that throughout the passages I have quoted, there is no reference to anything like the practice of the present day, according to which, each clergyman selects any collection of hymns he chooses for use in his church. On the contrary, in Elizabeth’s reign, and down to Heylin’s time, there appears to have been only one Metrical Psalter in general use; and when other versions are introduced, it is considered necessary that their use should be expressly sanctioned by the Crown. Such a use of metrical psalms, with the sanction of the King, and in pursuance of a usage, which has subsisted since the beginning of Elizabeth’s reign, is essentially different from such practices as are the subject of the present suit—practices introduced by an individual clergyman without any warrant of authority or permission from the Crown, from the Archbishop of the province, from the Bishop of the diocese, or from any constituted authority.

There is a passage in Bishop Bull’s works; (vol. 2.) I am quoting from Burton’s edition, pages 18 & 19—it will not be found in the Anglo-Catholic Library edition—where Bishop Bull in his charge to the clergy of St. David’s speaks thus, “Whereas upon Sundays and holy days the Church hath appointed a first and second service to be read one after another, it is convenient that there be a decent interval between them. For judge, I pray you, how absurd it may seem, to conclude the first service with St. Chrysostom’s Prayer and ‘The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ,’ and immediately, without any intermission, to enter upon the second service.

“I verily believe the first intention of the Church was, that these two services should be read at two several times in the morning; but new custom and the Rubric directs us to use them both at the same time. Yet in cathedral or mother churches, there is still a decent distinction between the two services; for before the priest goes to the altar to read the second service, there is a short but excellent anthem sung, in imitation whereof in the churches of London, and in other great churches of the country, instead of that anthem there is part of a psalm sung.”

It is likewise observable that the old title page of Sternhold and Hopkins, as well as the Rubrics in the occasional services in Elizabeth’s reign, only contemplate the use of Psalms at the beginning or end of a service, or at the beginning or end of the sermon. But never in the service, except so far as perhaps the sermon may be considered part of the service; and whether that is so or not, I will not now stop to consider.

Down to the revision of 1662 the order of Morning Prayer ended where the Rubric is now inserted “In choirs and places where they sing, here followeth the Anthem.” That Rubric was introduced, as your Lordship is aware, in 1662, and was probably intended to sanction not only anthems in prose, but also metrical psalms. In Elizabeth’s Liturgical Services, page 560, we find a hymn in metre spoken of as an anthem.

But such a practice as this would give no sanction to interpolating hymns into the middle of a service, much less to interpolating other practices, such as those which are the subject of the present proceedings.

Mr. Hannen has put the authority of the Injunctions of 1547 upon two grounds: first, the Royal Supremacy, and secondly, the Proclamation Act. That the Injunctions were issued under the Royal Supremacy neither Mr. Droop or myself in our respective arguments disputed. But what I denied, and still deny is, that they were issued under statutable authority. I have shown in my former reply in the St. Alban’s case, that if the Injunctions of 1547 derived their authority only from the Royal Supremacy, besides being abrogated in Mary’s reign and repealed in general words, they were expressly repealed by the last section of Elizabeth’s Act of Uniformity.

The 23rd of Elizabeth’s Injunctions, which your Lordship will find in 1 Cardwell’s Documentary Annals, p. 221, says, “That they shall take away, utterly extinct, and destroy all shrines, coverings of shrines, all tables, candlesticks, trindals, and rolls of wax, pictures, paintings, and all other monuments of feigned miracles, pilgrimages, idolatry, and superstition, so that there remain no memory of the same in walls, glass windows, or elsewhere within their churches and houses.” It would be an unjustifiable encroachment upon your Lordship’s time if I were to go again into the general question whether the Injunctions of 1547 were issued in conformity with the Proclamation Act in such a manner, as to give them statutory authority.

(The Dean of the Arches.) Quite so. You have given me your argument in extenso upon that point.

(Mr. Stephens.) And therefore, my Lord, I do not wish to repeat it; all I assert is, that notwithstanding I have had the benefit of hearing my friend Mr. Hannen’s argument (and there is no man at the bar for whose learning and research I have a greater respect), my opinion upon the subject, so far from being in the slightest degree altered has been rather confirmed. Mr. Hannen during his argument assumed that Bishop Gardiner was imprisoned under the Proclamation Act by reason of the Injunctions of 1547 having been issued under that Act. If I understood my friend aright that was his argument?

(The Dean of the Arches.) Yes.

(Mr. Stephens.) He referred on that subject to the 5th vol. of Collier’s Ecclesiastical History; but Collier’s observations on this question, which are to be found at pages 198 to 200, do not favour the view that the Injunctions were issued under the Proclamation Act; on the contrary, Collier says, (vol. 5, page 199,) “We do not find that the Injunctions of Edward VI. were either proclaimed in the manner above mentioned or supported by any proclamation.”

There is a very full account of everything connected with Bishop Gardiner’s imprisonment in 6 Foxe’s Actes and Monuments (pages 42–56), which contains several letters written by Gardiner on the subject, and the account of various proceedings against him before the Privy Council. (Ibid, page 65 et seq.) If Bishop Gardiner’s imprisonment, as Mr. Hannen has contended, had been founded upon the Proclamation Act, this could not fail to appear from those letters upon the proceedings; but I believe the only reference to the Proclamation Act is an extract I am going to read from a letter from Gardiner, or, as Foxe calls him, Winchester, to the Lord Protector Somerset: “Now, whether the King may command against an Act of Parliament and what danger they may fall in that break a law with the King’s consent, I daresay no man alive at this day hath had more experience of what judges and lawyers have said than I. First I had experience in mine old master the lord cardinal, who obtained his legacy by our late sovereign lord’s request at Rome; and in his sight and knowledge occupied the same, with his two crosses and maes borne before him many years. Yet because it was against the laws of the realm the judges concluded the offence of the pre-munire, which conclusion I bear away, and take it for a law of the realm, because the lawyers so said; but my reason digested it not. The lawyers for confirmation of their doings, brought in a case “ of the Lord Tiptoft, as I remember, a jolly curlian (he was chancellor to the King), who, because in execution of the King’s commission he had offended the laws of the realm, suffered on Tower Hill. They brought in examples of many judges that had fines set upon their heads in like case, for doing against the law of the realm by the King’s commandment. And then was brought in the judge’s oath, not to stay any process or judgment for any commandment from the King’s Majesty. And one article against my lord cardinal was that he had granted injunctions to stay the common laws. And upon that occasion Magna Charta was spoken of, and it was made a great matter—the stay of the common law. And this I learned of that case (since that time being of the council) when many proclamations were devised against the carriers out of corn, at such time as the transgressors should be punished, the judges would answer it might not be by the laws; whereupon ensued the Act of Proclamations, in the passing of which Act many liberal words were spoken, and a plain promise, that by the authority of the Act for proclamations nothing should be made contrary to an Act of Parliament or common law. When the Bishop of Exeter and his chancellor were by one body brought in a præmunire (which matter my lord privy seal cannot forget), I reasoned with the Lord Audley, then chancellor, so far as he bade me hold my peace for fear of entering into a præmunire myself. Whereupon I stayed; but concluded it seemed to me strange that a man authorized by the King (as, since the King’s Majesty hath taken upon him the supremacy, every bishop is such a one), could fall in a præmunire. After I had reasoned the matter once in the Parliament House, where was free speech without danger; and there the Lord Audley, then chancellor, to satisfy me familiarly, because I was in some secret estimation as he then knew,—‘Thou art a good fellow, bishop,’ quoth he (which was the manner of his familiar speech), ‘look at the Act of Supremacy, and there the King’s doings be ‘restrained to spiritual jurisdiction; and in another ‘Act it is provided, that no spiritual law shall have place contrary to a common law or Act of Parliament. And if this were not,’ quoth he, ‘you bishops would enter in with the King, and, by means of his supremacy, order the laity as ye listed. But we will provide,’ quoth he, ‘that the præmunire shall ever hang over your heads; and so we laymen shall be sure to enjoy our inheritance by the common laws and Acts of Parliament.’”

In this letter, which is dated 14th October 1547, Gardiner is arguing that the Injunctions cannot order anything contrary to the doctrine of Parliament, that is, “the necessary doctrine and erudition for any christian man,” which was authorized by the 34 & 35 Henry VIII., c. 1.

This case has been throughout argued on the other side as if Edward’s Injunction of 1547 expressly enjoined that there should be two lights upon the high altar; but in fact the words of the Injunction are, “Ye shall suffer from henceforth no torches nor candles, tapers, or images of wax to be set afore any image or picture, but only two lights upon the high altar, before the Sacrament”—this is merely a prohibition of any lights except the two, and not a positive order for two lights—(1 Cardwell’s Documentary Annals, page 7).

Cranmer’s Visitation Articles in the next year, used the like language (1 Cardwell’s Documentary Annals, page 51). This, again, is in terms an inquiry whether there were more than two lights, not an Injunction that there shall be always two lights.

Dr. Deane, in support of his contention, that ceremonies mean whole services, quoted the 6th canon of 1603, against affirming that the rites and ceremonies of the Church in England were such, that men may not with good conscience approve them, use them, or as occasion requireth subscribe them; and then my friend inquired how men could be asked to subscribe to such things as the manual acts?

Well, it is a pity! when my friend was upon the 6th canon, that he did not read the 36th canon as to subscription, which does not require any separate subscription to rites and ceremonies but merely a promise “to use the form in the said book prescribed of public prayer and administration of the sacraments, and none other.” I will read the second section to your Lordship, “That the Book of Common Prayer and ordering of bishops, priests, and deacons containeth in it nothing contrary to the Word of God, that it may lawfully be so used, and that he himself will Use the form in the said book prescribed, in public prayer and administration of the sacraments, and none other.” This canon likewise shows that the rites and ceremonies to be subscribed were parts of the public prayer and administration of the sacraments, and not distinct services.

Comments have been made respecting the omission of the prohibition of elevation, inserted in Edward’s first book, and also upon the absence of any prohibition of the practice of mixing water with the sacramental wine. But all this criticism seems to be based upon a misconception of what is meant by the words, or by the expression, “order or form of service.” It is in the very nature of a “form or order of service” that it should consist of a series of positive directions, which are to be carried out in succession one after the other, without any omission, alteration, or addition. In such “order or form,” as a general rule, prohibitions are out of place; and accordingly we find that in the first book of Edward VI. there are, I believe, only one or two prohibitions.

(The Dean of the Arches.) I think only one.

(Mr. Stephens.) Only one I believe. With reference to our present Prayer Book I do not remember at the present moment that it contains one prohibition, and why? Because the “order and form” consists of a series of positive directions. The 27th section of Elizabeth’s Act of Uniformity repealed all laws as to Divine service except the Act of Uniformity; and if the words of the Acts of Uniformity are not sufficient to enforce the use of the prescribed order or form of service without any addition, the only alternative is, that any clergyman is at liberty to make any additions he may think fit.

Our contention in this case is that the First Prayer Book of Edward VI. was intended to be a complete Directory of public worship. This view is strongly confirmed by the passage in the preface of Edward’s first Book [Liturgies of Edward VI., page 19, Parker Society’s edition]. “Furthermore, by this order, the curates shall need none other books for their public service, but this book and the Bible.” If it had been still intended that the candles should have been lighted upon the altar—I will make use of the word “altar” now because we have never heard the word communion table or holy table used throughout the entire of this argument by the other side—

(The Dean of the Arches.) But, Mr. Stephens, you know the word “altar” is used in many of the Church Building Acts?

(Mr. Stephens.) I am speaking of the Prayer Book; and as to the Church Building Acts, they are the most incongruous and discreditable mass of legislation I have ever met with. At any rate in discussing the Book of Common Prayer the word “altar” is not to be found.

(The Dean of the Arches.) It is not to be found in the Book of Common Prayer, no doubt; and the proper expression is holy communion table.

(Mr. Stephens.) I think I have kept as much as possible to the language of the statutes in this case, while the opposite side have evaded the statutes as much as possible.

If it was the intention of the Legislature that there should be lighted candles upon the holy communion table, or if your Lordship pleases, upon the “altar,” positive directions would have been given upon the subject. The candles require to be lighted before each service at which they were to be used, and they must be removed from time to time. There are no such directions, and what is more extraordinary, the word candlestick is not to be found in either of the Prayer Books of Edward VI., of Elizabeth, or of Charles II.

Our contention is further confirmed by the destruction of all the old service-books in the following year. Under the authority of 3 and 4 Edward VI., cap. 10, "the recitals of which Act state, that these old service books being permitted to remain undefaced, do not only give occasion to such perverse persons as do impugn the order and godly meaning of the king's said Book of Common Prayer to continue in their old-accustomed superstitious service, but also minister great occasion to diversity of opinions, rites, and ceremonies and services. The destruction of the old service books must have included the Consuetudinary of the Church of Sarum, and the other books, whatever they were, which contained directions for the lights on the altar. They were all destroyed, and it became illegal for any person to have them in his possession.

At the beginning of Elizabeth's reign the like policy was resorted to, as regards the destruction of the service-books, which had been re-introduced in Mary's reign. The result was, that the knowledge of the old services was altogether lost. As one proof of this (your Lordship will correct me if I am wrong), that with one exception, no author of eminence since the Reformation, until within the last 30 years, has written any work illustrating the pre-Reformation ritual—I mean, of course, in our own Church. The exception to which I have alluded is Johnson's Edition of the Canons, which contains a certain amount of information upon the pre-Reformation ritual.

The intention of Edward VI. and his legislature is clear. It was to start altogether afresh and to have a new service book, complete in itself, and to be interpreted, where ambiguous, by the ordinary.

It has been erroneously supposed our contention is, that the clergy cannot go back, as regards ritual, to the pre-Reformation law, and that we are a mere Act of Parliament Church, a creature of the 16th century. But that is not so. When the Church of England reformed herself from the many corruptions in doctrine and practice which had grown up during the dark ages, one part of the Reformation was, the making of a complete and self-contained code of ritual, to be construed by itself, independently of all previous law or custom. The Church in England remained the same Church in all respects, except ritual, after the first Act of Uniformity as she was before. Edward VI. continued to be supreme head of the Church with the like authority that he had before, except that of course he could not order any rite or ceremony or do anything inconsistent with the Act of Uniformity. So Bishop Ridley, when he succeeded Bonner as Bishop of London, succeeded to all the powers which Bonner had possessed previously to the Act of Uniformity, and proceeded to issue Visitation Articles and Injunctions in like manner as previous bishops had done. The only change made by the first Act of Uniformity of Edward VI. was, that thenceforth the first Prayer Book was to be the sole code of ritual, and nothing was to be done in the service, with a religious signification, that was not expressly or by implication directed in that book.

The substantial question in this case is, whether rites and ceremonies can be used in the performance of divine worship that are not expressly prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer. According to the decision of Westerton and Liddell, there must be either express direction or implied permission; as, for example, in cases in which something is expressly prescribed, but the way in which it is to be performed is left open. And in dealing with implied permission, there must be no inconsistency with any part of what is prescribed. I submit to your Lordship no other addition is suggested in that decision.

There is no express direction, nor implied permission, in the Acts of Uniformity by which the Defendant can defend the practices charged in the Articles. Assuming, which I am not called upon to admit, that the rites and ceremonies in question might be defended or excused, as customs continued after the Reformation, no evidence of the slightest value has been adduced of any continuing custom in favor of any of the rites and ceremonies which are the subject of the present contention. All the Prayer Books have been established by statutes, and each statute has prohibited any addition or omission. Consequently, the 26th section of 1 Elizabeth, cap. 2, was necessary to give the Queen and the Commissioners together, or the Queen and the Archbishop of Canterbury together, the power to add any rites and ceremonies to those that were prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer. If the Queen and the Primate; or if the Queen and the Commissioners; required the enactment of a statute for the purpose of adding any rite or ceremony to the rites or ceremonies prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer,—how can any parochial clergyman, ex mero motu, be allowed to add anything either in matter or form to the statutable ritual of our Church?

In conclusion, my Lord, I wish to make a few observations upon the question of religious persecution,—especially as a very amusing amount of misconception has arisen upon the subject. The question in this case is not one of religious persecution. What is persecution? According to my definition, persecution in religious matters is an unjust punishment inflicted upon a person for adhering to a creed or mode of worship, either by way of penalty or by compelling him to renounce his principles. But what does that proposition necessarily import? Why, freedom of action. Such freedom has no place here, because a clergyman upon institution promises in the most solemn manner that he will obey the laws of the Church, and upon the faith of that promise he receives preferment; upon the faith of that promise he receives emolument; upon the faith of that promise he receives social status, and acquires legal rights and powers. To profess, then, or even entertain principles at variance with such promise, violates every definition, every idea of fair dealing, of honesty, and of truth:—And the man who, under these circumstances, attempts to carry such inconsistent principles into action, and in so doing violates his pledge and is punished for so doing, is not persecuted. He is justly visited with those consequences of his guilt which are dependent, not upon this or that custom, not upon this or that religious system, but upon the universally received distinction between truth and falsehood: and he is justly punished for obtaining and holding preferment under false pretences.

(The Dean of the Arches.) The Court must take time to consider its judgment in this case, and it would be only due to the very elaborate and able arguments which have been addressed to it by counsel on both sides, that it should take a reasonable time to do so; but the Court will be anxious, upon all grounds, that the judgment should not be delayed beyond that period which is requisite for doing justice to those arguments.

JUDGMENT delivered by the Right Hon. Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE, D.C.L., Official Principal of the Court of Arches, on the 28th day of March 1868, in the Cases of —the Office of the Judge promoted by—Martin v. Mackonochie and Flamank v. Simpson.

Preliminary Observations.

This case of Martin v. Mackonochie was brought before my predecessor in this chair, by Letters of Request from the Bishop of London, under the provisions of the 3rd and 4th Victoria, c. 86. That Statute, passed in the year 1840, enables any bishop within the Province of Canterbury either to try the case of a clerk for a criminal offence before himself with certain assessors, or to send it to the Court of the Archbishop for trial in the first instance. Since the passing of this Statute, bishops have very generally availed themselves of the latter provision, and this Court has now before it several cases so sent from several suffragan dioceses of the Province of Canterbury.

Under the old law, when these cases were triable in the Consistorial Court of each bishop, if they were sent by Letters of Request to the Court of Arches, these letters contained an averment that the lack of counsel, and difficulty of obtaining proper legal assistance, rendered it expedient, for the ends of justice, that the case should be tried in the first instance in the Court of Appeal, that is, in this Court. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that this is, I believe, the only case but one which has been sent by Letters of Request from the great Diocese of London, amply furnished as it is with all means and appliances requisite for the administration of justice, to the Court of Appeal; and I much regret that I am deprived of the great assistance which I should have derived from the judgment of the Bishop of London upon the important matters now before me, if the case had been brought to this Court in the regular course of appeal.

The Letters of Request were accepted by Dr. Lushington my learned predecessor in this chair, and in an early stage, of these proceedings, before evidence had been taken, or argument heard upon the merits of the case, I was counsel for the accused clerk, and took objections to the manner in which the offence was charged in the criminal articles. When the Archbishop of Canterbury was pleased to confer upon me the Judgeship of his Grace's Court, I proposed to hear the case, with the assistance of two learned persons well skilled in ecclesiastical law, the Vicar-General of the Archbishop, and the Chancellor of Rochester (to whom I take this opportunity of publicly expressing my thanks), but this arrangement was demurred to on behalf of the promoter of the Bishop of London's office, that is the accuser; and I then appointed, as my patent gave me full power to do, those two learned persons to be my surrogates for the hearing of this cause. They held one Court, and in consequence of arguments addressed to them touching the validity of their appointment, they adjourned the hearing of the cause until an opportunity had been afforded for an application to the Temporal Court for a prohibition. The counsel for Mr. Mackonochie applied to the Court of Queen's Bench for a rule nisi to show cause why the prohibition should not go to these surrogates, upon the ground that I had exceeded my power in appointing them.

The promoter or accuser did not appear to show cause against the prohibition, and the rule, upon an ex parte statement, was perhaps almost necessarily made absolute.

But I think if the rule had been opposed, and the powers given by my patent, and also the fact of the invariable usage of this Court, as proved by its earliest records, to appoint surrogates, been duly brought to the attention of the Court of Queen's Bench, it would have refused the rule. I mention this circumstance, in order to prevent any inconvenience which might ensue from it being supposed that this Court had no power to appoint surrogates. After these proceedings in the Court of Queen's Bench, the surrogates whom I had appointed, by a formal instrument entered upon the records of this Court, resigned the powers which I had conferred upon them.

I then proceeded to hear this cause, and the other, that of Flamank v. Simpson, brought before this Court by Letters of Request from the Bishop of Exeter, in which almost the same questions were raised. The arguments in both cases have occupied the attention of the Court for 16 days. The learning, ability, and industry of the counsel have greatly assisted the Court in the execution of the difficult task which it has to perform, namely, to give judgement upon the charges preferred against Mr. Mackonochie and Mr. Simpson.

A good deal has been said by the counsel on both sides respecting the motives of the accuser and the accused in this suit, but upon this subject the Court need say but very little.

Mr. Martin has been allowed by the Bishop of London to promote his Lordship's office in this case, and I must, of course, presume that his Lordship was satisfied upon good grounds, both that it was proper that his office should be promoted, and that Mr. Martin was a proper promoter; because his Lordship, who has the advantage of having a very learned legal adviser, was, no doubt, aware, from the decision of the Queen's Bench in "Regina v. Bishop of Chichester," (2 El. & El., 209,) as well as from the decision of the Privy Council in "Ray v. Sherwood," (1 Moore P.C. Reports, 397,) that it was competent to him to exercise his discretion as to whether his office should be promoted or not. I must, therefore, consider Mr. Martin as having obtained full sanction for the course which he has adopted and wholly decline to impute to him any unworthy motive whatever for the part which he has taken in this suit. It is, however, a matter of fact, admitted or proved before me that Mr. Martin is not, legally speaking, a parishioner of St. Alban's, nor, of course, a churchwarden, a part of whose office it is to represent to the Ordinary any misconduct on the part of the incumbent.

This fact, however, if it should prove to be of any importance at all in this case, can only relate to the subordinate question of costs, and in no way affects my judgement upon the principal questions before me. Upon the other hand, it is only fair to Mr. Mackonochie to state, that it appears from the documents in the cause, that having the cure of souls in one of the worst and most neglected districts of London, and receiving moderate temporal emolument, he has devoted himself to the discharge of his holy office, and evangelizing an almost heathen population.

It is hardly necessary to say that he is not on this account entitled to conduct the services of the Church (if he has done so) in a manner not authorized by the law.

There are two modes of procedure in the Ecclesiastical Courts, one of a civil, and the other of a criminal, character. There have been, in recent times, two leading judgments delivered upon the lawfulness of certain ornaments (to which word a precise legal meaning has been attached) used during the celebration of Divine worship and certain decorations of churches.

In both these judgements the questions for judicial decision were raised in the civil form of procedure.

The "Stone Altar Case" (as it has been commonly called) arose on an application for a faculty in the Consistory of Ely, and was brought on appeal to this Court.

The causes relating to the Knightsbridge Churches* were instituted in a similar way in the Consistory of London, from the decision of which Court an appeal was prosecuted, first to the Court of Arches, and ultimately to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which last tribunal recommended Her Majesty to reverse, upon many points, the decision of the Courts below. As the Archbishops and the Bishops, who are Privy Councillors, are only members of the Judicial Committee in cases of criminal proceedings against clerks in holy orders, the prelates who did sit on this last occasion sat only as assessors and not as members of the Court.

The proceedings taken in this case are of a criminal character, and the sound of them, so to speak, is harsher than that of those in the cases to which I have referred, but substantially the same end is sought, and the same remedy pursued; and, with an exception to be hereafter stated, I am not prepared to say,—inasmuch as not only certain ornaments, but also the use of them in the services of the Church, are complained of,—that it would have been competent to the promoters to have brought before me in a civil form all the matters contained in these criminal articles.

They are comprised under the following heads:—

- (1.) The elevation of the Blessed Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, accompanied in Mr. Mackonochie's case by kneeling "or excessive kneeling" at times not prescribed by the Rubrics.
- (2.) The use of incense during the celebration of the Eucharist.
- (3.) The mixing of water with wine at the time of the administration of the Lord's Supper.
- (4.) The use of lighted candles upon the Holy Table.

It will be necessary presently to enter into a fuller and more detailed statement of each of these charges, and of the answers to them. I will only observe that, with one exception to be noticed hereafter, there is no dispute in the case as to the facts to which the law is to be applied.

Statutes of Uniformity.

The law principally, though not exclusively, relied upon by the counsel for the promoter is contained in the Statutes of Uniformity. I must refer to these statutes.

The first Statute is that of 2nd and 3rd Edward VI., c. 1., which accompanied the first Prayer Book. The second is that of 5th Edward VI., c. 4., which accompanied the second Prayer Book, and has been repealed. The third is that of 1st Eliz., c. 2., the penal sections of which are in force.

The additions made to the Prayer Book by James I. were not accompanied by a separate Statute, but were made under the powers conferred upon the Crown acting with the Metropolitan, under a clause of the Statute of Elizabeth.

Fourthly, the present Statute of Uniformity, the 13th and 14th of Car. II., c. 4., which embodies so much of the Statute of 2nd and 3rd Edward VI., c. 1., and of 1st Eliz., c. 2., as were necessary for "the establishing and confirming" of the new Prayer Book.

It is necessary to refer somewhat at length to the Statutes now in force.

The 2nd and 3rd Edward VI., cap. 1., which is the first Act of Uniformity of Edward VI., begins by reciting that there had been in England "different forms of prayer; that is to say, the use of Sarum, of York, of Bangor, of Lincoln, and besides the same now of late, much more divers and sundry forms and fashions have been used in the cathedral and parish churches of England and Wales, as well concerning matins or morning prayer and evensong, as also concerning the Holy Communion, commonly called the Mass, with divers and sundry rites and ceremonies concerning the same, and in the administration of the other sacraments of the Church; and as the doers and executors of the said rites and ceremonies in other form than of late years they have been used were pleased therewith, so others not using the same rites and ceremonies were thereby greatly offended; and, albeit, the King's Majesty, with the advice of His most entirely beloved uncle, the Lord Protector, with others of the council, hath heretofore divers times assayed to stay innovations or new rites, yet the same have not had such good success as His Highness required in that behalf; whereupon His Highness, by the most prudent advice, being pleased to bear with the frailty and weakness of His subjects in that behalf, of His great clemency hath not been only content to abstain from punishment of those that have offended in that behalf, (for that His Highness taketh that they did it of a good zeal,) but also to the intent that uniform quiet and godly order shall be had concerning the premises, appointed the Archbishop of Canterbury and certain distinguished

“ men to consider and ponder the premises, and thereupon having as well eye and respect to the most sincere and pure Christian religion taught by the Scriptures as to usages in the Primitive Church, should draw and make one convenient, meet, and definite order, rite, and fashion of common and open prayer, and administration of the sacraments, to be had and used in His Majesty's realm of England and Wales, the which at this time, by the aid of the Holy Ghost, with one uniform agreement is thus concluded, set forth, and delivered to His Highness, to His great comfort and quietness of mind, in a book entitled ‘The Book of Common Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments, and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, after the use of the Church of England.’ Wherefore the Lords spiritual and temporal, and the Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, considering as well the most godly travel of the King's Highness, of the Lord Protector, and of other His Highness' council, in gathering and collecting the said Archbishop, Bishops, and learned men together, as the godly prayers, orders, rites, and ceremonies in the said book mentioned, and the considerations of altering those things which he altered, and retaining those things which he retained in the said book, but also to the honour of God, and the great quietness which by the grace of God shall ensue upon the one and uniform rite and order in such common prayer, and rites and external ceremonies, to be used throughout England and in Wales, at Calice, and the marches of the same, do give to His Highness most hearty and lowly thanks for the same.” Then it goes on and says, “That all and singular the ministers in any cathedral or parish church shall be bounden to say and use matins, evensong, celebration of the Lord's Supper, commonly called the Mass, and administration of each of the sacraments and all their common and open prayer, in such order and form as is mentioned in this book, and none other or otherwise.”

It then enacts, “That if any manner of parson, vicar, other whatsoever minister that ought or should sing or say the common prayer mentioned in the said book, or minister the sacraments, shall refuse to use the said common prayer or to minister the sacraments in such cathedral or parish church, in such order and form as they be mentioned and set forth in the said book, or shall use, wilfully and obstinately standing in the same, any other rite, ceremony, order, form, or manner of mass openly or privately, or matins, evensong, or other open prayer, than as mentioned and set forth in the said book,” he then becomes liable to certain penalties.

The seventh section of this Act states, “That it shall be lawful for all men, as well in churches, chapels, oratories, or other places, to use openly any psalm or prayer taken out of the Bible at any time, not letting or omitting thereby the service or any part thereof mentioned in the said book.”

The eighth section of this Act provides, “That the books concerning the said services shall, at the costs and charges of the parishioners of every parish and cathedral church, be attained and gotten before the Feast of Pentecost next following, or before; and that all such parishes and cathedral churches, or other places where the said books shall be attained and gotten before the said Feast of Pentecost, shall, within three weeks next after the said books so attained and gotten, use the said service, and put the same in use according to this Act.”

The present Act of Uniformity, passed in the year 1662, the 13th & 14th Car. II., c. 4., is entitled “An Act for the Uniformity of public Prayers, and Administration of Sacraments, and other Rites and Ceremonies; and for establishing the Form of making, ordaining, and consecrating Bishops, Priests, and Deacons in the Church of England.”

The first section gives the following title to our present Prayer Book:—“The Book of Common Prayer and administration of the Sacraments, and other rites and ceremonies of the Church, according to the use of the Church of England; together with the psalter or psalms of David, pointed as they are to be sung or said in Churches; and the form and manner of making, ordaining, and consecrating of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons.”

The second section, after reciting “that nothing can conduce more to the settling of the peace of the nation, nor to the honour of our religion and the propagation thereof, than a universal agreement in the worship of Almighty God, and to the intent that every person in this realm may certainly know the rule to which he is to conform in public worship and administration of sacraments, and other rites and ceremonies of the Church of England,” enacts, “That all ministers shall be bound to say and use the morning prayer, evening prayer, and celebration and administration of both sacraments, and all other the public and common prayer, in such order and form as is mentioned in the book annexed and joined to the present Act, intituled the Book of Common Prayer, and administration of the Sacraments, and other rites and ceremonies of the Church, according to the use of the Church of England.”

And by the 24th section it is further enacted, “by the authority aforesaid, that the several good laws and statutes of the realm, which have been formerly made, and are now in force, for the uniformity of prayer and administration of the sacraments within this realm of England and places aforesaid, shall stand in full force and strength, to all intents and purposes whatsoever, for the establishing and confirming of the said book,” (intituled as aforesaid) “herein-before mentioned to be joined and annexed to this Act, and shall be applied, practised, and put in use for the punishing of all offences contrary to the said laws, with relation to the book aforesaid, and no other.”

By the 17th section it is further enacted, “by the authority aforesaid, that no form or order of common prayers, administration of sacraments, rites, or ceremonies, shall be openly used in any church, chapel, or other public place, or in any college or hall in either of the Universities, the colleges of Westminster, Winchester, or Eton, or any of them, other than what is prescribed and appointed to be used in and by the said book.”

By the Statute 1st Elizabeth, cap. 2., sec. 27., it is enacted, that all laws, statutes, and ordinances wherein or whereby any other service, administration of sacraments, or common prayer is limited, established, or set forth to be used within this realm, or any other the Queen's dominions or countries, shall from henceforth be utterly void and of none effect.”

The main proposition upon which the alleged unlawfulness of all the matters contained in the criminal articles has been rested by the counsel for the promotor is, that they are all, in effect, rites and ceremonies other than and additional to those which are prescribed in the Prayer Book and the Act of Uniformity.
