SCENES FROM THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

I.

PARIS AFTER THE FALL OF THE BASTILLE—THE VETO.

THE Bastille has fallen; two of the worst tyrants, Foulon and Berthier, are dead; other oppressors have taken to flight before the storm of popular rage. But what avails it? The Parisian workman has only shed his blood that Bailly may be mayor of Paris and enjoy the spoils of office; that Lafayette—a liberal aristocrat, a soldier who gained his laurels and his liberalism in the war for the liberation of the American colonies from the dominion of England—may caracole through the streets on his white horse and act the part of a Warren to the Paris workmen. The people have new tyrants in the place of the old ones; the middle classes have climbed into the places of the aristocrats, and that is all that has been gained by the popular victory.

Meanwhile, the middle classes are quite contented, and cannot understand why the people are not also satisfied. But there is little cause for satisfaction. Distress has heightened; bread is scarce; many of the rich aristocrats, as well as the more timid of the middle class, have fled from Paris; workshops are closed, and the workers are left to starve. But though the rich have fled, the poor and destitute have thronged into the capital, attracted by the roar of the revolution, and hoping that in the centre of the movement life would be easier and pleasanter. You may see now, throughout these months of August and September, crowds of the people assemble round every baker's shop waiting in queue, or waiting in tail, as people wait to get their tickets at a station, one by one, so that the first come may be the first served. This waiting calmly and quietly distinguishes the French people from the English, for to-day at theatre doors you will see them waiting in the same fashion, without any of that rough struggling and pushing in which the weakest goes to the wall, which distinguishes our own polite and refined race. But what causes this scarcity of bread? Partly the bad harvest of the year before; also the fact that the peasants and farmers, having got rid of their landlords by burning their chateaux and hunting them away, had no need to sell their grain for rent, but kept it for themselves; and last but not least, the action of corn monopolists and royalist intriguers, who, partly moved by greed, and also by the desire to punish the inhabitants of the revolutionary city, kept back the corn to starve them into submission.

It was no wonder, under these circumstances, that the middle-class people grew very nervous. The revolutionary spirit was abroad; the very street children conquered imaginary bastilles and waged war among themselves. So general had the street warfare become that the Town Council—so the 'Histoire Parlémentaire' of Buchez and Roux informs us—found it necessary to pass a solemn decree against this dangerous and seditious practice on the part of these little scamps.

Revolution was in the air. Every day there were the most terrible rumours afloat as to the possibility of another rising. On Montmartre—at that time a green hill, crowned with windmills, outside the city walls—some seventeen thousand of starving men are employed at digging holes and filling them up again—at the magnificent wage of tenpence a-day—by the patriot municipality, that rides in its gilded coaches and "preserves its places and its pensions." Writers of the time declare that these poor wretches looked more like skeletons than human beings after a course of this magnificent pay and the splendid diet—two pounds of very bad black-bread—procured by it. It is suspected that plaster-of-Paris enters largely into the composition of this bread. The people who eat it complain that "it produces an effect upon the bowels, and causes the throat and palate to smart." But they are warned by a Town Hall proclamation to regard these trifling matters as nothing, or even as actually beneficial from a medicinal point of view.

But to return to the Paris unemployed. These starving men are a constant source of terror to the well-fed Municipals. Lafayette in his capacity of general of the middle-class National Guard has been to harangue them, and doubtless to congratulate them upon living in an age of liberty, upon tenpence a-day. He does not like their looks, however; and a few days afterwards, hearing that they are coming to sack Paris, he plants cannon loaded with grapeshot at the barriers to mow them down, and thus prepares to vindicate his character as a defender of French liberty. However, the rumour turned out to be false, and they did not come. The Municipal Council at last gets rid of "the utterly necessitous, digging on Montmatre." They are presented with passes, and are "dismissed into space" with the small fortune of four shillings. Under the old government they would probably have been whipped or hung as rebellious vagabonds; so it is possible that they have gained something by the revolution. But poor Lafayette has his hands full. There are strikes on all hands of famished operatives, excited by the advent of the reign of liberty, which should surely mean higher wages. The tailors, shoemakers, apothecaries, wig-makers and hairdressers, are all out; domestic servants, out of place through the flight of the aristocrats and the rich middle class, also form a union and hold open-air meetings with the other strikers, Lafayette and his patrols keeping a wary eye upon them.

But though it is an age of liberty, middle-class benevolence had not reached its present high pitch. The middle class did not like strikes; in which they resemble their brothers nowadays; but then they took no pains to disguise their dislike to such dangerous proceedings. Several of the meetings are dispersed by main force, and with great brutality by middle-class National Guards, who even wounded some honest citizens with their bayonets.

While Paris thus hovered on the brink of revolution, Versailles is busy making the constitution, occasionally making it very quickly, as on the 4th of August, when they abolished the feudal dues and tithes, being aided in their work by the light of burning chateaux and the roar of popular insurrection. They have just reached a critical stage in its manufacture; a large section of the Assembly, containing in its ranks many ex-middle class revolutionists, desire to imitate as nearly as possible the constitution of England. They want a House of Lords, as a paper barrier against a revolted democracy; they also want the king to have a veto upon any laws passed by future Assemblies; that is, the king shall have the power of saying "No" to anything the Assembly may pass. That this section was a majority there can be little doubt, for Mirabeau, whose influence was overwhelming, was quite in favour of the king having the veto, and, in fact, from this period he practically begins his reactionary courses; but the people were not. They had overthrown the Bastille to get a better and happier life for the poor, and they knew very well there was a very small chance of getting anything of the kind when a king could lawfully say "No" to it. Therefore a fierce agitation grew up in Paris against this veto.

In Paris at that time the revolutionists were in the habit of meeting in the Gardens of the Palais Royal. It was there we saw the revolution break out, when Camille Desmoulins sprang on a table outside the Café de Foy and raised the cry "To arms!" Here, according to Camille, who was a constant attendant at these excited gatherings, the business of the night was carried on in the most free and easy fashion. Any citizen with his soul burning for the good of his country could rush there, with a speech or motion that was absolutely necessary for its salvation, mount his chair and begin. If he is applauded he keeps on and carries his resolution, if he is hissed he departs. Thus the people conducted their business in the year 1789.

But though this may seem amusing to us, it was serious enough then; the Palais Royal was proud of its achievements. It had given the signal for the revolution, and might perchance light up the flames of the next. Therefore, its opinion upon current questions was important. Even Lafayette and Bailly dared not suppress these meetings; first, because they dreaded the consequences, and secondly, the grounds of the Palais Royal were private property. They belonged to the Duke of Orleans, a prince of the blood, who had his eye upon the throne and therefore favoured the popular cause.

But now the veto is likely to be carried through a traitorous Assembly; the Palais Royal becomes highly excited; orators declaim with furious vehemence amid shouting crowds. Strong resolutions are passed; strong speeches are made. Traitorous deputies are written to and informed that if they vote for the Veto, there are fifteen thousand men in Paris ready to march and "light up their chateaux." Fifteen hundred men do get ready to march, and to "remonstrate" with these traitors, the Marquis St. Huruge, an aristocratic popular orator, at their head. But Lafayette calls out his National Guard, the procession is stopped by fixed bayonets at barriers, and the processionists are forced to return. Indignation meetings are held; matters look so serious that insurrection seems imminent. But the Assembly grew alarmed; the House of Lords or Senate idea is rejected, and the veto is altered into suspensive veto, that is, the king could only postpone his sanction to any measure beyond two sessions. At the same time Lafayette falls heavily upon the Palais Royal, and St. Huruge is thrown into prison. A slight disturbance one evening, not at all unlikely to occur in an excited time, is taken advantage of to close the meetings altogether. Other men likely to be dangerous, are also arrested; Marat is ordered to appear at the Town Hall to answer for his "incendiary" articles. The hawkers are not allowed to cry without they get a license and a leaden badge; all meetings are suppressed. National Guard patrols parade the streets with levelled bayonets, dispersing chance groups. Camille Desmoulins, once a starving advocate, now a brilliant journalist, has cleverly satirised the proceedings of these gentry. He relates how, walking at night through the narrow streets of Paris, he met a sentinel. "Take the footway to the left," cries the sentinel to me; further on another shouts "Walk to your left," and in the Rue St. Marguerite two patrols cry together, "To the right," "To the left." I have been obliged by the district to take to the gutter." Camille also complains, with a certain amount of jocularly, of the arbitrary arrests by the National Guards. He says one man has been arrested at the Café de Foy because he distributed several copies of a pamphlet he had written (one sympathises with the National Guards in this case); another because he read a journal aloud; another because he walked about in the Palais Royal, and so on.

Such was Paris in the latter part of August and throughout September. The "glorious revolution is evaporating in tri-color ceremonies and complimentary harangues." Of which, as Loustolat, another patriot journalist, calculates "upwards of two thousand have been delivered within the last month at the Town Hall alone. Paris groans under what the same writer calls with truth "a bourgeois despotism, having for its aim the substitution of an aristocracy of rich men for that of the nobles."

The middle-classes imagine the revolution is crushed, and shower praises on Lafayette for his courage and promptitude. Complimentary harangues are the order of the day, with the mutual admiration society at the Town Hall; but the people stand in queue, starving and moaning for bread. On the whole, the situation is admirably summed up by Carlyle, "Ruthless patrols; long superfine harangues; and scanty ill-baked loaves which produce effects upon the intestines. Where will this end? In consolidation?" We shall soon see.

D. J. NICOLL.

THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC AND ENGLISH RADICAL REFORMERS.

THE writer of the following pages, having lived for many years in the Argentine Republic, where, almost from the establishment of its independence, the whole so-called Radical programme of this country has been in practice, wishes to point out how utterly useless all political reforms are while economic conditions are opposed to freedom. This they will see by a plain statement of facts as to what has fallen under the writer's own notice in the Republic.

But first I must show how thoroughly "free" the country is in a political sense. You have, in the first place, a republic modelled after the United States, with a fine free Constitution (on paper), which declares all men free and equal, and the rest of it. Then you have universal suffrage for all native-born citizens, or foreigners who choose to be naturalised, which these latter very seldom do, there being a very great advantage in not possessing a vote, as I shall prove further on. Then you have vote by ballot, and an arrangement by which minorities shall be secured representation. You have free education in public schools. Land is free, and is sold freely in the market like any other commodity. There is no law of primogeniture, a man's property being divided equally among all his children if he die without making a will, and if he make one the law only allows him to dispose of a small percentage away from them.

Again, every Province—which corresponds to "State" in the United States—has its own executive, ministers, Senate, and House of Representatives, but no house of hereditary legislators as in England. There is no Ireland there to lift a Parnell into popularity or power for his noble efforts in her cause, or a Grand Old Man verging on eighty years of age who has suddenly found out the justice of it. The members of these legislative bodies are all paid, and paid well; and every five years there is a fresh election (more's the pity).

All this we have, and more also; and yet in that favoured land the rights and feelings of the poor are trampled on by the rich and powerful in a way which would be incredible except to one who, like myself, has seen it with his own eyes. The right of suffrage, also, far from being an advantage, has been and is a dreadful disadvantage to the poor man possessing it.

In the year 1871 I landed in Buenos Ayres, in the month of July, and in the month of October I started with an expedition of English engineers to cross the Pampa to Chile and survey a line of railway then projected. Mr. Robert Crawford, a well-known civil engineer, was chief of the expedition, and it was considered to be a difficult and dangerous work, owing to the line running through country continually traversed by the Indians, the personal was numerous, and a medical officer was required, which appointment I received.

The starting-point was Chivilcoy, the then most westerly point of the Western Railway of Buenos Ayres, and there we were informed we should find carts, cattle, and peons (native labourers) waiting for us. And sure enough there they were, particularly the peons, who had been carefully lodged in jail pending our arrival! On enquiry, Mr. Crawford was informed that it was the usual thing to do in such cases, as otherwise these free citizen-voters might repent and give up their engagement.

Does this seem incredible? No doubt it does; and it was very surprising to us, who had just come from a benighted country where universal suffrage and republicanism were unknown; but you will find by the sequel that such treatment of our peons is merely typical of what the class receives in all respects and on all occasions. Mr. Robert Crawford, after his return to England, published a book, 'Across the Pampa and the Andes,' in which he relates the history of the expedition, and in which will be found mention of the circumstance I have just stated. I found it particularly strange myself, as I had a short time before terminated a three years' residence in the United States, and believed at the time that republicanism and universal suffrage were not vain words. I thought that the vote was a protection to a man against such treatment, and I found myself at a horrible disadvantage when arguing afterwards with members of the staff who upheld rival institutions.

Well, before I recovered from the shock of this disposal of our free voters, I was called by the commissary officer of the expedition, Mr. Bookey, son of an Irishman born in the country, and who acted as our interpreter, to introduce me to a fine old Quixote-looking officer in uniform kepi and cavalry sword. This I was told was Captain Cabrera, commanding officer of—the peons of the expedition! that is to say, the Argentine peons or workers, the free men brought up in the enjoyment of universal suffrage and republicanism; the foreign workers, of whom we had about twenty, English and Germans, were not expected to submit to the orders of the captain. Cabrera was an officer of National Guards only, but it was quite sufficient that he wore a uniform and a sword, for the peons, accustomed to the most slavish submission to authority, to obey him unquestioningly, and as we have seen, to submit to be thrust into jail by him, for fear they might break their contract.

Well, we started after much delay, owing to the villainy of the Government contractors, who supplied us with almost useless animals at the price of good ones. But we did not cross the Pampa as at first intended, for, when arrived about seventy leagues from Chivilcoy, the danger of being attacked by Indians was so great that the officers of the frontier declared we would require a very large escort of soldiers, and this the Government refused to give us. Consequently it was resolved to pass on from fort to fort of the frontier and get to the Andes as quickly as possible, there to join the engineers who set out from the Chilian side, and do the really difficult part of the survey first. We thus had the opportunity given us of seeing what the life of the Argentine citizen-soldier on the frontier was.

And what did we find? We found the soldiers delivered into the worst kind of slavery to their officers, and no regard whatever paid to anything they had a legal claim to as "rights." They were never paid, and were abominably fed and clothed. We were told by the officer at one fort that for ten months they had not had supplies of any kind, and subsisted entirely by hunting. They were retained in service as long as their officers chose, without any regard to the term of their conscription or the time they were condemned to serve as punishment—service in the army being one method of chastising malefactors. In some places the soldiers were kept at hard labour cultivating the ground for the benefit of the commanding officer.

Is it not a wonder that the power of the vote, and the benefit of a free republican constitution, did not save these men from such injustice? Be it remembered that they were, with the exception of the criminals, free citizens, who were sent to serve their country on the frontier for three years, in obedience to the law! All will, however, be understood when you learn what the law was and the life these men lead in their homes.

Finally the expedition came to an end after nine months, and a useless expenditure of seventy odd thousand pounds, for the line was never constructed. We returned to Buenos Ayres, and I settled down in a country town (Navarro). Here I was not long settled, when, one day observing unusual bustle about the Juzgado, which in every town is a building which includes town hall, court of justice, jail, and police barrack, I was told that the contingent for frontier service had been brought in, and was as usual lodged in jail. Presently I met one of the members of the municipality, a kind, good-hearted man, who told me that in the contingent was one man that he knew, who had a wife and eight children, and that he had been dragged away from his home, and unless great efforts were made on his behalf with the authorities, he would be sent to the frontier and his family left to shift for themselves!

On enquiry then, and on frequent occasions afterwards, I found that this was a common case. There was no regulation as to age, or family, or anything else. When the contingent was required parties of mounted police were sent out, and men were dragged from their homes with as little consideration as they would be in a slave hunt in Africa. The whole thing was under the control and will of one man in the Partido, the so-called justice of the peace (Jefe de Paz), and of course the first taken were those he had a grudge against. Glorious things, Universal Suffrage, Republicanism, and "free" institutions! I suppose part of their "freedom" consists in their gentle toleration of such little matters as this frontier service. What a vile slavery it produced, and how dreadful were its effects on the social condition and even the very character of the poor peasants! It had up to this been a source of great astonishment to me to see the slavish attitude of the poor Gauchos (another name for peasant or peon) in the presence of rich men or those in authority, but now began to understand it.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

The Federation des Peuples, which owes its existence to Amilcare Cipriani, has launched an appeal to all the Socialists of France and Italy, inviting them to take part in a Franco-Italian Socialist Congress to be held at Cannes on the 11th and 12th inst. This "Fédération" has now established branches at Livorno, Genua, Palermo, Spezia, Turino, Rome, Paris, Lyon, Marseilles, Nice, Cannes, Grasse, Vallauris, Le Cannet, etc., and intends at this proposed Congress to create a new League of Peace in order to "counteract the infernal diplomatic manoeuvres of the so-called Triple Alliance." All communications to be sent to Joanés Sagnol, chairman of Provisional Committee, at Le Cannet, near Cannes (Alpes-Maritimes, France).

The Chamber of Deputies have validated the election of the "Socialist" Joffrin, whom the electors of Clignancourt had contemptuously refused to elect as their deputy, giving over 3,000 votes more to the other candidate, General Boulanger; and the "Socialist" Joffrin, being a Possibilist, i.e., a man who thinks that the most shameful things are feasible when they result in a "possible" advantage for himself, has accepted the validation of his pseudo-mandate at the hands of Constans, the Minister of the Interior, who prostitutes universal suffrage as he has prostituted everything else. Matters are swiftly ripening in France now. We shan't have to wait long for a general uprising, and let us hope that once broken out there, it may spread all over Europe.

GERMANY.

The monster trial at Elberfeld lingers on, and there seems to be no end of it. Christmas is over and New Year has passed away, and in all probability the judicial farce will continue for another month or so. It seems, however, as if the Nupkinses began to be ashamed of the performance; for, now and again, they order a "gentleman" who has been too good and plain a witness to be arrested on account of an "alleged falsehood." The man who gives the most trouble to the tribunal is a certain Kamhoff, commissioner of police by profession and "gentleman-breeder" by trade. Quite a dozen of that Kamhoff's "gentlemen" have already been "discovered," and the Sozialdemokrat has it that others will come to the fore. There will be quite a leakage in the system after this trial.

Whilst we were writing the preceding lines a Mr. Pinoff, public prosecutor by profession, was howling down our comrades in his speech for the prosecution, and everybody can find out, by the perusal of his indigestive prose, that he has been speaking "by command of his master," the brutal iron Chancellor. He proposes to send Bebel to prison for 15 months, because he is supposed to be the leader of a secret society that has never existed; Grillenberger, 12 months, for having been Bebel's lieutenant in the same conspiracy; and Harm, 12 months, too, for the same imaginary offence, but in reality because all three are members of the Reichstag and in the way of Bismarck. They must go out of the way—that's all. For thirty-two other accused Pinoff demands from 6 to 9 months; for twenty-five others, 3 months' jail, and so on. Five are to be discharged, in order that the judicial farce may appear to have been a fair one. Pinoff has stated in his speech that Commissioner Kamhoff, the liar, is a model of an official, and that all those "gentlemen," who have been found out during the trial to be in the pay of the secret police, are the fine fleur of society, and deserve well of "their dear Fatherland." One would not believe it if it was not in Germany that such things happen. But in Germany!

Just as we are going to press the news comes that the trial is over, and that Mr. Pinoff has by no means got all that he asked for, and that Bebel, Grillenberger, and Schumacher had to be let go.

During last year Germany's prisons have been filled by 350,666 delinquents. Out of that number 552 were convicted of offences against his "Majesty," and sixty-one thousand eight hundred and six for offences against religion, state, or public order. And Germany is the most civilized land on earth, you know. A "blessed" civilization it is, indeed!

BELGIUM.

The miner's strike for an increase of wages from 15 to 20 per cent. continues to spread throughout the basin of Charleroi. The movement is rapidly extending to pits in other basins, and the number of men out has now reached a total of over 10,000. At the Mambourg, Sacré-Madame, Pays de Liège, and Houillères-Unies mines, the strike has assumed large proportions, very few men remaining at work; the Monceau-Fontaine, Amercoeur, and Rochelle colliery men are likely to be out on strike by this time. At the Ormont mines the men struck, then resumed work, and finally went out again. Here are some figures showing the extent and distribution of the strike: Charleroi, 2,500 men out; Dampremy, 270; Montigny, 1,200; Gilly, 500; Lodolinsart, 650; Jumet, 1,300; Roux, 450; Chatelineau, 900; Fleurus, 800; Lodolinsart, 500; Marchiennes, 1,000. The strike movement is spreading from one basin to the other, and it is very probable that a general strike throughout the Belgian coal districts is near at hand. The employers refuse to give way to the miner's claims. The colliers say, and with full reason, that last year the mines realised a profit of more than twelve millions and a-half of francs, and that now the profit is still greater. The miners are going to hold a mass meeting at Brussels, in order to lay their case before the general public. It is also probable that in a very few days the metallurgical workers will have to leave work, their industry being nearly at a standstill for want of coal.

HOLLAND.

It is quite possible that ere long a lot more of those "blasted foreigners," as the London philanthropist calls our Continental friends, will come over to this metropolis. Seven thousand diamond cutters and polishers are out of work in Amsterdam, not through any labour dispute or competition, but because they can no longer get diamonds to cut. At a meeting which they have held to consider their position, a resolution was proposed to transfer the industry to London. A final decision has not yet been arrived at, but it is stated that negotiations have been opened by their representatives for this purpose with several of the leading merchants here. The control of the great diamond-fields are now practically in the hands of companies or firms whose headquarters are in London, and it is said that hither also the best rough diamonds find their way for manipulation. Where the diamonds are, as long as the bourgeois attach any value to these coals, there the cutters must be also. If jewels do not go to Amsterdam to be cut, the Dutchmen think they must come to London to cut them. Hence the proposed exodus; but perhaps a good many cutters will also stop at Antwerp, where there are some leading firms too dealing in that useless stuff. We hope that if these "blasted foreigners" come over here they will soon join the ranks of the Socialist organisations, or form a new Dutch Socialist Society in London, thus reviving the old one which some ten years ago did good service for the Cause.

DENMARK.

I am very pleased to announce that another church has become the property of the Socialists. Our Danish comrades at Helsingör have bought a church of that locality for the sum of 40,000 kroner, and are about to transform it into a revolutionary meeting-hall. Bravo, comrades! This is the third church, as far as we know, which has undergone a similar transformation. The Belgian Parti ouvrier meet in a vast building called La Maison du Peuple (The People's House), which was formerly a Jewish temple of worship or synagogue. Our Dutch comrades at the Hague have bought the Walhalla building, which formerly was a Lutheran church. If only we could buy all the churches, nay, confiscate them, what splendid meeting-places we would have! And no more "cant" howled down from the "sacred" pulpits!

RUSSIA.

A few days ago died at Kieff an individual who has richly deserved to be cursed by all lovers of justice, Theodor Treppoff, formerly prefect of police at St. Petersburg. He began his career as a fiendish bloodhound at Varsovia, where, at the time of the Polish insurrection, he prosecuted his victims in such a barbarous way that he was actually compelled to leave his post as chief of the police there. But he remained in favour with the Czar, and was put at the head of the police department at St. Petersburg. There he became the real torturer of the Nihilists; but there also it was that, at the summit of his power, he was reached by the bold arm of a courageous woman, the heroic Vera Zassulitch, who lodged a bullet in his body because he had ill-treated one of her political friends in a prison cell. After the acquittal of Vera Zassulitch, he had to leave public life altogether under the pressure of public opinion. He died with the Nihilist bullet still in his body. May his fate be a warning for other scoundrels of the same stamp!

VICTOR DAVE.

THE FUNERAL OF A MURDERED WORKMAN.—Last Sunday the East London Socialists, with bands and banners, attended the funeral of a journeyman baker, who was killed by his master's son. He was a member of the Bakers' Union, and a fortnight ago claimed 2s. on account of overtime, which his master refused to pay. He therefore gave a week's notice to leave, and at its expiration was refused payment of his wages altogether, but instead received a blow on the back of the neck from the master's son which stretched him insensible on the pavement. He was taken to the London Hospital, and a little later the police called at the hospital and took him in custody on a charge of drunkenness; and as that was found to be false, he was taken back to the hospital and refused admission. The next day he died of his injuries about four hours after his admission to the German Hospital. At the last moment we were informed that the Bakers' Union had decided to have no speeches over the grave, but simply a burial service; so we held a meeting outside the cemetery gates—the speakers being Cantwell, Kahn, and another English comrade—to explain the circumstances and protest against the leniency of the treatment which the murderer has received (allowed out on trifling bail). The capitalist press, as usual, although eager to dilate on the hardships of an Irish landlord or grinding capitalist, pass over the murder of a workman in silence.

DO YOU AGREE?

Do you agree with us that the social awakening of the workers is a desirable end? Do you agree with us that we are working in the right way to achieve that end?

You do not? Then oppose us and prove us wrong on every platform and in every paper to which you can gain access!

You do agree? Then work with us and for us; help us to extend our circle of influence; let no day pass in which you have not interested some one in our propaganda!

There is no middle course for an honest man!

NOTES.

"At the convention of tramps of the United States, held in Wilkes-barre, Pa., the other day, after a full and free discussion as to the causes which contributed to the lengthening of the list of tramps in this country, the following resolutions were adopted," according to the Boston Herald, by a majority vote:

"Resolved, that the American tramp is the fruit of the policy formed by our millionaires and grasping monopolies, who, with the aid of improved machinery, are driving honest workmen from the factories and mills of the country.

"Resolved, that we tramps stand together for our own protection."

"The minority were in favour of placing a small share of the blame for the tramp's misery on the tramp himself, but it is needless to say that the proposition was frowned upon." This is what the Herald thinks is a joke; but, when it has done laughing, I should like it to explain where the joke comes in.

In the Rosario (Argentine) Reporter of Nov. 12 there was a paragraph which seems to illustrate comrade Creagh's article, and from which, as "gladly reproduced" by the Buenos Ayres Southern Cross, I take the following:

"The Englishman . . . who was . . . some four months ago charged on his own confession with having killed a man in self defence, was set at liberty on the 31st ult. Mr. Deehan . . . has kept his word, and if we mistake not this is fifty odd English speaking persons whom Mr. Deehan has set at liberty within the last twelve months. It is with great pleasure that we give this item, and more so when we see that it is done in a most disinterested manner, merely out of the generous disposition of Don Jorge."

On the face of it this looks as though the man had been detained without enquiry, and released, equally without trial, through what the Southern Cross calls the "philanthropic endeavours" of Mr. Deehan, and what the Reporter admiringly styles the "generous disposition of Don Jorge," whoever that dignitary may be.

Don Jorge might also enlighten us as to what became of the items in this little list, from the Southern Cross of Nov. 15:

"During September the police arrested 2,690 persons for crimes and offences: 108 for fighting, 169 for wounding, 149 for using arms, 116 for robbery and swindling, 6 for infanticide, 3 for highway robbery, 15 for homicide, 5 for rape, 6 for incendiarism, etc. 20 criminals avoided arrest."

They have got the machinery of law'n-order to a high pitch of development if only twenty "criminals" in all that vast country "avoided arrest"! And all the unfortunates who didn't "avoid arrest," were they detained without trial, or set free by the "generous disposition" of somebody or another?

The Staats Courant of the South African Republic contains an extraordinary list of unclaimed letters, all addressed to persons of English names. What a tale such a list tells of the influx of adventurers to the gold-fields, all of them evidently not knowing of any settled address to which their letters may be addressed.

IN LANCASHIRE.

A VALUABLE lesson in labour organisation may be learnt from the disastrous result to the workers of the Manchester gas strike. The new labour movement had made great progress among the various classes of unorganised workers in Lancashire.

Within three months it had won for the gas workers of Manchester, Salford, and the smaller Lancashire towns, a reduction of hours from eight to twelve daily, with an increase of wages in many cases, besides other concessions. The men of the health department of the Manchester Corporation, over 1,000 in number, also obtained a considerable advance of wages, all of which was achieved without having to resort to a strike.

All this was accomplished by the sheer force of determined action on the part of the workers themselves, and was not by any means the outcome of the generalship of brilliant "leaders."

Yet the union was not without its leaders whose threats of bringing "their" men out on strike were not infrequent, even when the men were winning hands down. Indeed, an overbearing vanity seemed their chief qualification for wielding the authority which attached to their position.

in the hands of one or two officials and a committee selected by the latter.

No doubt the rank and file knew pretty well what they wanted, though they certainly did not understand the action of their leaders, who, intoxicated with the authority they exercised over their fellow-workers, were doing, or were about to do, so much for the men without consulting them as to their wants, and assuming the glory beforehand. The result of this passiveness, want of initiative, and readiness to be "led" on the men's part was, that they never quite comprehended what was going forward in the agitation, and allowed themselves to be hurried into an ill-planned line of action which ended, as it was doomed to end, in ignominious failure.

Thus was the union demoralised internally, at the same time that it lost the public confidence which it had created. But what chiefly explains how the men were duped—I cannot use a milder term—was the promise made them that they would receive financial aid from the executive of the General Labourers' and Gas Workers' Union in London in case of a strike. It does not appear, however, that the latter body was in any way to blame. The Manchester gas men came out after working a fortnight's notice, the reason being blacklegism—four "blacklegs" were in the works, three of whom had asked to be admitted to the union, and one resigned and went away—they were joined by their Salford brethren, whose only reason was to do the same as the Manchester men.

Had they been allowed to remain in when their notices were up, they would gladly have done so. Much irritation was felt, and not unjustly so, against the leaders when it was found that the promised supplies were not forthcoming. Certain it is, that the strike would not then have taken place had this been clearly known from the first. Of course the strike was then virtually over, the men showing a complete absence of spirit or determination. So much as to how one of Labour's battles was fought and—lost before it began.

It is surprising how soon men forget benefits when they encounter a reverse; and reverses are inevitable under the existing conditions of the struggle between Labour and Capitalism.

The old trade unions have ceased to be a power, for the struggle to-day is keener, more general though less hopeless; and the new unions in their endeavours to organise unskilled labour, if showing some advance on the old in their methods, display very little in their aims.

For this reason Socialists will be wise not to expect much from the attempts of the trade unions, old or new, to permanently improve the position of the toilers as a whole through strikes, and the policy of passive submission to law and authority, which they almost invariably adopt. Starvation is a poor resource to fall back upon, yet that is what the ordinary strike supplies the workless worker with in greatest abundance. A strike will in future be of very little effect unless some positive policy is adopted, in place of the merely negative one of seeing how long suffering can be endured, in order only to gain some small immediate want.

There are some curious things in the way of labour unions in Manchester. The Tramway Employés' Association is one of these absurdities. Founded about six months ago, during an attempt on the part of a few guards to strike, it has now got nearly all the tram and bus men in its ranks. We have watched it of late going a-begging round all the "nobility and gentry," J.P.'s, M.P.'s, baronets, and other "gentlemen," to obtain patrons. It appears to have succeeded fairly well. For a treasurer it has been honoured by a Tory brewer, the proprietor of some of the vilest slums in the city.

The secretary, one of the tram guards, explained the other day that their association was in no way antagonistic to the tramway directors, nor to any employers' interests; that the men were very well satisfied (as well they may be, working only seventeen hours a-day for wages ranging from 2s. 6d. to 5s.!), for the directors had kindly allowed them a half-day off once a fortnight. He also disclaimed any sympathy whatever on the part of his union for the unfortunate gas-men, believing that if the tram-men had obtained half as much they would have been more than satisfied. Whoever reads this will hardly be very much surprised to learn that the list of patrons is "swelling wisely."

At a mass meeting of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants in St. James's Hall, Manchester, a large number of "gentlemen," capitalists, and others with handles to their names, have been admonishing the men, extolling the wealth of the society, and the noble work it did in maintaining orphans of railway servants and other charitable projects. Small wonder that a new union has been formed for the slaves of the line!

The State Church can boast—or rather lament, perhaps—that one at least of its great ones in this district is on the side of the masses. The Dean of Manchester, Dr. Oakley, has manfully taken the part of the gas-stokers by defending them in the press and among his brother parsons, by doing which he has obtained the heartiest hatred from the privileged classes. All honour to him and to any who dare to incur the ill-will of society by stepping out of high places to champion the cause of the poor and the helpless.

OGRE MONOPOLY.

Ogre Monopoly walks the land,
Blasted his path and gory;
Sycophants ready on every hand,
Shout forth his praise and glory.

Ogre Monopoly's eye is cold,
Sharp are his fangs and streaming
With the blood of the lambs from the people's fold,
He laughs at his victim's screaming.

Ogre Monopoly laughs, I say—
Laughs at the cry of sorrow;
He tears and rends his fill to-day,
He will hunger for more to-morrow.

Ogre Monopoly groweth strong,
Aye, daily he groweth stronger;
Ever and ever his thought is Wrong—
Shall Monopoly reign much longer?

Shall blasted homes and bitter lives
Form sauce for the Ogre's dinner?
Shall freemen groan in his cruel gyves,
And the saint be spurned by sinner?

Shall Ogre Monopoly rend and rack
Our women, our young, forever?
Look back, men! Look at his ghastly track!
Shut your teeth: By God, No! Never!

Shall Ogre Monopoly own the earth?
Shall the one be as the seven?
Shall he claim our babes at their very birth,
And take toll at the gates of Heaven?

Shall Ogre Monopoly drink our tears?
Shall he nourish his spawn on toil?
Shall he find his sport in the people's fears?
And see in their woes but spoil?

No! Ogre Monopoly, down you go!
Down 'neath the stroke of sorrow;
The harvest is as the seed you sow:
Destruction is ripe to-morrow.

Ogre Monopoly, reap your field,
Haggard and bent and hoary,
But curse yourself as you curse the yield—
The seed was yours—and gory!

GEORGE H. CANDLER.

IN SOUTHERN AFRICA.

THE Johannesburg famine scare is pretty well over, the drought having broken up. Wagons laden with food-stuffs came in freely, and prices came down a little. However, things are bad for the workers every way, and many mechanics and other tradesmen are idle. When I said, in my letter of October 4th, that "The curse of enforced idleness was not so much to be dreaded here as in Britain," I meant it to refer to tradesmen and this part of South Africa only. Of unskilled labourers there are many out of employment, and the condition of the greater part of those in work is as bad as that of their fellows in Britain—nay, in some ways it is slightly worse, if that be possible—for in some cases you may find men working alongside of natives suffering from leprosy, and on the Government railways. They are simply boycotted, except about the stations. Caffre labourers are easily got at from 2s. to 3s. per day, and are employed for two reasons:—First, cheapness; second, because they can be driven about like cattle without question. Should they absent themselves from work for a single day, they are lodged in gaol for fourteen days, with the option of a £1 fine, which, for their ability to pay, might as well be £500.

Many of the natives sleep in the "bush" and in "kloofs" of Table Mountain, whilst their main food is "snock and rice." Snock is a large, coarse kind of fish, very plentiful and cheap, which, when sun-dried, stinks like the very devil, but is thought good enough for Caffres. I am inclined to believe that leprosy is induced more by the conditions of life among the natives and the general rottenness of the garbage they are forced to feed upon than from any "germ" theory yet thought of. Cheap and nasty has a horrible meaning here, the fruit and vegetable trade, being mostly in the hands of natives, who are patronised by many of the rich and middle class on account of their cheapness in selling; but when one sees, as can be seen in Cape Town often enough, fruits and vegetables being vended by natives whose hands bear the loathsome marks of leprosy, then one can understand the high price paid for cheapness after all! And yet many of the lepers refuse to go to the Leper Settlement at Robben Island, for much the same reason as many people in Britain refuse to go to the poorhouse.

In Kimberly—diamond-fields—just now, there are dozens of men of all trades and no trade going idle, whilst in Johannesburg they have been forced to erect a night shelter for the unemployed. Henry George says with the locomotive comes the tramp. In this case the tramp has come before the locomotive. Much nearer the mark would it have been, had he said that with capitalism comes tramp and paupers, scamps, sharebrokers, shareholders and scoundrels of all kinds.

The South African Chartered Company have despatched thirty men to join the colonial police force under Colonel Carrington on the borders of Matabeleland, which force they have subsidised in their own interest, and not in the interest of Britain will this force be used.

Britain's bribe to the Transvaal Government for leave to run a railway to Johannesburg is likely to give the Special Commissioner, Sir Francis De Winton, some trouble. Five hundred of the Swazi warriors waited upon the Commission and told them in pretty plain speech that they were an independent nation, and recognised no right of Britain to hand them over to the Dutch Boers or the British either. However, the British capitalists want a railway to the gold-fields, and Swaziland is the price demanded by the Transvaal Republic; and as the payment comes not out of the pockets of the capitalists there—it will be paid.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Gas-stokers' Strike.

Already the men are beginning to taste the tender mercies of the law, which we are so often told exists as much for the benefit of the poor as the rich. It appears that on Saturday December 21st a body of police who were escorting a number of blacklegs from the railway station to the East Greenwich Gas-works, were attacked by a crowd of strikers and their sympathisers in Marsh Lane, Greenwich. A lively scrimmage followed, police and blacklegs faring very badly, several being severely injured; one sergeant is now suffering from concussion of the brain. Although the police made no arrests, yet they determined to have someone; so warrants were issued, and four men—Parker, Minter, Jarvis, and Brown—were charged at Greenwich Police-court on Thursday Dec. 26 with assaulting the police. Of course the worthy officers found no difficulty in swearing that the prisoners were in the crowd and were active in assaulting them. Three of the men—Parker, Minter, and Jarvis—were sentenced to one month's hard labour, while the fourth, Brown, received two months. In one case, at least, that of Parker, it is very uncertain if the police have got hold of the right man; for after the trial a clergyman appeared who stated that he was "a most respectable young man," and a member of his congregation. It was no use, however; the magistrate had passed his sentence, which could not be altered. It is quite evident that the officials of middle-class law and order are determined to back up Mr. Livesey to the full extent of their power. Throughout all the recent labour revolts the magistrates have seized every opportunity for passing brutal sentences upon the strikers. In this instance the dullest can see that the magistrate cared very little whether the men before him had assaulted the police or not. They were "on strike," and that was quite enough.

The same spirit was shown by Mr. Bridge at Bow Street on Saturday Dec. 28 in dealing with the case of Henry Weir. It appears the prisoner had, according to the evidence of some veracious police-constables, recommended the people, at a meeting in Hyde Park, to slaughter Mr. Livesey. Now at present there is nothing but the word of these truthful gentlemen to prove that Weir actually used the words, yet the magistrate refused all bail, and thus passed a sentence of five days' imprisonment upon a man who had possibly not even committed the "offence" with which he was charged. Though if he had, it was surely no great crime for anyone to be stung into strong language at the sight of the misery caused by the craft and greed of a wily hypocrite. I would like to know, if people are to be sentenced to months of hard labour for intimidation and strong language, what punishment has the law for a man like Mr. Livesey, who is ready to inflict cruel suffering upon thousands in order to reign as an irresponsible tyrant over miserable slaves. No, there is no legal punishment for Mr. Livesey. He is a worthy and respectable citizen, who is quite free to inflict a sentence of wholesale starvation upon thousands of the common herd, while the law will protect him from even a threat from the sufferers by his cunning and cruelty.

There has been a prolonged controversy between Mr. Livesey and the Strike Committee in the press. The good gentleman is very much annoyed because the committee has published his scheme in its original form. It is such barefaced imposition that even he is ashamed of it. He says that he has made alterations, but as the men who had signed, had signed the original agreement, the alterations would have made little difference to them, and Mr. Livesey would have completely succeeded in his darling object of crushing the union. Even under the boasted alterations, the men would lose their liberty of striking through signing the agreement on different dates, and thus their union would become useless.

The Dockyard Labourers' Wages.

At the present time the oppressed are everywhere making their voices heard. They are no longer content to suffer dumbly as in the past. Among others, the dockyard labourers have joined in the general cry. One of them, writing to the Daily News, points out that in Chatham dockyard these wretched people are expected to live upon a wage of 16s. 6d. No wonder we also hear that they "are compelled to live in courts, alleys, and slums, where the sun never shines to cheer their wretched lot." But what does the dockyard labourer do with all this wealth? Our friend, for the information of Giffen and Levi and the public generally, gives an account of his own expenditure, which I will quote, as it may interest philanthropic middle-class people who have made themselves ill by general overfeeding during this season of "peace and goodwill." 4s. 6d. goes for rent, and that leaves 12s. to purchase food during the week. Here is the list of articles purchased: Bread, 2s.; flour, 4d.; meat, 2s.; butter and dripping, 1s. 2d.; milk, 3d.; vegetables, 1s. 3d.; tea and sugar, 1s.; coal and wood, 1s. 6d.; lights, 6d.; washing material, 6d.; sundries, 3d.; schooling, 3d.; benefit society and insurance, 1s.—total, 12s. There is not much margin for riotous dissipation on the part of these "thriftless poor." Indeed, as the writer points out, even with this careful expenditure, "nothing is left to buy furniture, clothing, shoes, or to lay aside for time of sickness." No wonder these men live in a state of "chronic starvation," and this it must be remembered is practically the condition not only of the dock labourers, but of the great mass of unskilled workers throughout England, whose wages never reach a higher average than that paid in Government dockyards. Surely it cannot be a comforting reflection to any rich man that "chronic starvation" is the condition of the immense majority of the workers. For let him remember that "patient" as they have been, they may tire of this some day, and already there are signs of their speedy awakening. D. N.

Amalgamation of East London Hebrew Workers' Unions.

The desirability having for some time past been felt amongst the organised Jewish workers of the East-end to federate under one head, a course of meetings were weekly held at the International Workmen's Educational Club, Berner Street, E., by delegates from the under-mentioned Hebrew workers' unions, with the result that about 4,000 Jewish workers attended a mass meeting on Saturday 28th, at 3 p.m., at the Great Assembly Hall, Mile-end, E., under the auspices of the Hebrew Cabinet-makers' Society, Stick and Cane Dressers' Union, International Furriers' Society, Tailor-Machinists' Union, Tailors and Pressers' Union, Amalgamated Lasters' Society, United Cap-makers' Society, and International Journeymen Boot-finishers' Society, with the object to get the agreement of the members of these unions to the proposed amalgamation. C. V. Adams (of the Alliance Cabinet-makers' Union, and secretary of the Hebrew Cabinet-makers' Society) presided.

The following resolution was put by comrade W. Wess (secretary pro tem. of the newly-formed federation: "That this mass meeting of East London workers, recognising the great benefits that can be derived from a combination of all existing unions, hereby inaugurates the 'Federation of East London Labour Unions,' and pledges itself to do its utmost to support and strengthen it." In proposing this resolution, comrade Wess spoke in English and Hebrew-German, pointing out to the workers the necessity for not ceasing to work in their organisations until they had achieved their emancipation, so that there would be no more necessity to organise for strikes and other small attempts of labour against capitalism, but then they would organise for their own common good, and reap the full produce of their labour. This resolution was seconded by L. Goldstein, who spoke in Hebrew-German, and supported by comrades J. Macdonald, T. Walker (S.D.F.), comrades B. Feigenbaum, H. H. Sparling and C. W. Mowbray (S.L.), and Tom Mann. The condemnation by our comrades of interferences in labour matters by Chief Rabbis, Lord Mayors, Cardinals, Boards of Conciliation, and M.P.'s, and the necessity of direct action by workmen themselves and through their organisations, was received amid great applause. A vote of thanks was then carried to Mr. Charrington for the loan of the hall, and also to the chairman. S. P.

CONVENTION OF THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOUR.

THE fourth annual convention of the American Federation of Labour was called to order in Boston on the morning of Tuesday December 10 by president Samuel Gompers. About 600,000 members of the organisation were represented by delegates. As upon this convention devolved the duty to decide ways and means for a plan of action as regards the introduction of an eight-hour labour day on May 1st, 1890, an account of its proceedings was looked for in labour circles with a considerable amount of interest. Of late it has become quite a fashion for people in so-called high office to patronise conservative labour organisations, and in this instance the delegates were "honoured" with hearty speeches of welcome from Mayor Hart of the city of Boston, a large buyer of the commodity labour, and from Governor Ames of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, a man possessing a fortune in the near neighbourhood of eight million pounds.

President Gompers read his annual address, a document which is too lengthy to be reproduced here. The address showed that 3,800 local labour unions had been organised during the past year; that relations with other labour organisations had been fairly harmonious; that an effort had been made to secure co-operation of the Knights of Labour on the eight-hour issue; that propositions had been received from the several farmers' organisations for co-operation; that the declaration to establish the eight-hour day on May 1, 1890, had revived the labour movement (?); that on Sept. 2nd, 1889 (Labour Day), 420 mass meetings (?) were held in cities and towns of the United States; that 300 general organisers have held meetings in their respective localities; that the following pamphlets were written:—'The Eight Hour Primer,' by George E. McNeill; 'The Economic and Social Importance of the Eight Hour Movement,' by George Gunton; 'The History and Philosophy of the Eight Hour Movement,' by Lemuel Danryid; and that about 50,000 of these pamphlets were distributed in the country.

Most of the delegates made encouraging reports as regards the bodies they represented.

The following resolutions, amongst others, were adopted:

"Resolved, that the American Federation recognises the power of printers' ink, and earnestly urges that the labour press be liberally supported by trade-unionists, and that they in turn push the circulation of labour papers among the people not connected with organised labour.

"Resolved, that the principles of the Employers' Liability Bill of Massachusetts ought to be adopted in every State, and every employer ought to be liable for personal injuries received by an employé in the usual discharge of his duties while obeying the orders of the superintendent over him.

"Resolved, that the American Federation of Labour requests the bureaus of labour statistics of all States, where established, to conduct similar investigations, and publish the results of their reports. Resolved further, that we urge the labour unions and societies of the several States to adopt resolutions favouring such investigations, and appoint committees to wait upon the commissioners and show the propriety of carrying out the purpose of these resolutions.

"Resolved, that the president of this Federation request the officers of the various national and international unions connected with this body to urge their respective local unions to take a more general interest in their respective city and town central labour organisations, and affiliate with them by sending delegates from their respective unions. Also that the president cause circulars to be printed urging the necessity of unions not having a national organisation, but still working under charters from the American Federation of Labour, to be represented in their various local central labour bodies.

"Resolved, that the delegates to the convention of the American Federation of Labour, in meeting assembled, urge upon the delegates to the international marine conference the adoption of an international load-line, an Act relating to the seaworthiness of vessels, the manning of vessels, and the competition of crews. Resolved, that the convention urge the maritime conference to use their influence to get the sailors and firemen represented in all future conventions.

"Resolved, that we earnestly urge the abolition of the labour of children wherever such labour shall be injurious to the healthy and proper development of the children."

Under the report of the eight-hour committee, George E. McNeill, for the committee, read a long and eloquent address on the eight hours question, and recommended that it be adopted and sent out to the workers.

The address was adopted amid cheers, and by a rising vote. It was decided to send a copy of the address to the trade unions and labour organisations of England. The plan of campaign as regards the eight hours day adopted by the convention is explained in the sentence, "We, therefore, recommend that the executive council shall have power," etc.

This, it must be confessed, is a considerable break-down when compared to the original demand.

The following resolutions were also adopted:

"The executive council shall have the power, and are directed, to levy a strike assessment of 2 cents. per member, on the 1st of January, 1890, on all national and international bodies under the jurisdiction of the federation for the purpose of starting a strike fund."

"In case any national or international body affiliated with this federation orders a strike or is locked out, and by reason of financial distress it shall become necessary for it to call upon the federation for assistance, the executive council, if they deem that such organisation is entitled to receive such assistance, shall make an assessment of 2 cents. per member per week upon every other national or international body so affiliated with the federation; such assessment shall remain in force at the discretion of the executive council."

The following rider was added to the last resolution:

"Unless otherwise ordered by a general assembly of all national or international bodies."

The delegates decided to invite John Burns to come to America and address mass meetings on the eight hour question.

It was voted to increase the president's salary to 1,500 dols., and to engage a secretary at 1,200 dols. a-year.

President Gompers was re-elected by a unanimous vote. The other officers are:—1st Vice-President: William Martin, of the iron and steel-workers; 2nd Vice-President: P. J. Macguire, of the carpenters; Secretary: Christopher Evans, of the coal miners; Treasurer: Henry Emride, of the furniture workers.

A resolution to hold an international working men's congress in 1892 in the city where the international exhibition commemorating the fourth centennial of the discovery of America in the United States will be held, was adopted.

A most interesting proposition was that of assisting an international labour paper to be published in Switzerland in the French, English, and German languages, which should contain reports of the eight hour movement, and which should be distributed through the Federation in America. The committee to which this was referred reported adversely, as it was thought that there were labour papers in America which needed support, if any assistance was to be given to labour papers. The report of the committee against the proposition was only carried by a vote of 27 to 25.

A strong address to the working-people of America denouncing the back-handed policy of T. V. Powderly, was adopted amid great enthusiasm.

The convention adjourned on Saturday to meet in Detroit, Mich., the second Monday in December, 1890.

I should like to make many comments on the proceedings of the convention, but the space of the Weal does not permit of it, so the readers must take the will for the deed.

REPORTS.

MANCHESTER.—We have resumed the meetings of the League in Stevenson Square on Sundays. At the last Barton, Baillie and Stockton spoke to a fair audience. The general meeting of the branch was held at the Club on Sunday night. The corresponding and financial secretaries were re-elected for the next quarter, and it was decided to find a suitable place for a club-room, as the tenancy of the premises we occupy has expired. In the meantime our weekly meetings will be held on Sundays, at 8 p.m., at the secretary's address, 52 Miller Street, Manchester.

YARMOUTH.—On Christmas Day Comrades Headley and Ruffold distributed a quantity of back numbers of the Commonweal and leaflets, and afterwards held a meeting on the Priory Plain.—On Sunday we held our usual meeting in the morning on Priory Plain, Comrade Ruffold addressing the audience. Fair sale of the Commonweal.

DUBLIN.—At Progressist Club, 87 Marlboro' Street, Dec. 28th, T. Hamilton delivered an address on "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity," in which he gave an eloquent exposition of the ideals of Socialism. Good discussion. Wilson, King, Kavanagh, O'Gorman and Fitzpatrick took part.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—On Sunday a capital audience assembled in our hall, and Comrade H. Snell (Fabian) gave us an eloquent address on "Socialism: its Laws and Course. Some questions satisfactorily answered; 1s. 2d. collected for lecture fund.—On Dec. 31st we saw the old year out with a tea party, and sang Socialist songs the while.

EDINBURGH (SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION).—Comrade Donald Mackenzie delivered a short lecture to a fair audience on Sunday, in the Moulders' Hall, his subject being "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity." Though short was the lecture, long, lively, and not uninteresting was the discussion which followed. Two new members joined.

LIVERPOOL SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—Delegates and friends from societies in Lancashire and adjoining counties are invited to meet the members of the above Society on Saturday January 11th, 1890, at 1 Stanley Street, Dale Street. At 4 p.m. a conference will be held on the desirability of united action; and at 7.30 p.m. a Social Gathering, when a programme consisting of vocal and instrumental music, etc., will be gone through. Any assistance in this will be cordially accepted from delegates. On Sunday January 12th, a public meeting will take place. Those who intend to be present are requested to send word to the Secretary, E. C. Chapman, 1 Stanley Street, Dale Street, two days beforehand.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto:

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR, AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. I.—DISCUSSION AND BED.

UP at the League, says a friend, there had been one night a brisk conversational discussion, as to what would happen on the Morrow of the Revolution, finally shading off into a vigorous statement by various friends of their views on the future of the fully-developed new society.

Says our friend: Considering the subject, the discussion was good-tempered; for those present being used to public meetings and after-lecture debates, if they did not listen to each others' opinions (which could scarcely be expected of them), at all events did not always attempt to speak altogether, as is the custom of people in ordinary polite society when conversing on a subject which interests them. For the rest, there were six persons present, and consequently six sections of the party were represented, four of which had strong but divergent Anarchist opinions. One of the sections, says our friend, a man whom he knows very well indeed, sat almost silent at the beginning of the discussion, but at last got drawn into it, and finished by roaring out very loud, and damning all the rest for fools; after which befel a period of noise and then a lull, during which the aforesaid section, having said good-night very amicably, took his way home by himself to a western suburb, using the means of travelling which civilisation has forced upon us like a habit. As he sat in that vapour-bath of hurried and discontented humanity, a carriage of the underground railway, he, like others, stewed discontentedly, while in self-reproachful mood he turned over the many excellent and conclusive arguments which, though they lay in his fingers' end, he had forgotten in the just past discussion. But this frame of mind he was so used to, that it didn't last him long, and after a brief discomfort, caused by disgust with himself for having lost his temper (which he was also well used to), he found himself musing on the subject-matter of discussion, but still discontentedly and unhappily. "If I could but see a day of it," he said to himself; "if I could but see it!"

As he formed the words, the train stopped at his station, five minutes' walk from his own house, which stood on the banks of the Thames, a little way above an ugly suspension bridge. He went out of the station, still discontented and unhappy, muttering "If I could but see it! if I could but see it!" but had not gone many steps towards the river before (says our friend who tells the story) all that discontent and trouble seemed to slip off him.

It was a beautiful night of early winter, the air just sharp enough to be refreshing after the hot room and the stinking railway carriage. The wind, which had lately turned a point or two north of west, had blown the sky clear of all cloud save a light fleck or two which went swiftly down the heavens. There was a young moon halfway up the sky, and as the homeward caught sight of it, tangled in the branches of a tall old elm, he could scarce bring to his mind the shabby London suburb where he was, and he felt as if he were in a pleasant country place—pleasanter, indeed, than the deep country was as he had known it.

He came right down to the river-side, and lingered a little looking over the low wall to note the moonlit river, near upon high water; go swirling and glittering up to Chiswick Eyott: as for the ugly bridge below, he did not notice it or think of it, except when for a moment (says our friend) it struck him that he missed the row of lights downstream. Then he turned to his house door and let himself in; and even as he shut the door to, disappeared all remembrance of that brilliant logic and foresight which had so illuminated the recent discussion; and of the discussion itself there remained no trace, save a vague hope, that was now become a pleasure, for days of peace and rest, and cleanliness and smiling goodwill.

In this mood he tumbled into bed, and fell asleep after his wont, in two minutes' time; but (contrary to his wont) woke up again not long after in that curiously wide-awake condition which sometimes surprises even good sleepers; a condition under which we feel all our wits preternaturally sharpened, while all the miserable muddles we have ever got into, all the disgraces and losses of our lives, will insist on thrusting themselves forward for the consideration of those sharpened wits.

In this state he lay (says our friend) till he had almost begun to enjoy it: till the tale of his stupidities amused him, and the entanglements before him, which he saw so clearly, began to shape themselves into an amusing story for him.

He heard one o'clock strike, then two and then three; after which he fell asleep again. Our friend says that from that sleep he awoke once more, and afterwards went through such surprising adventures that he thinks that they should be told to our comrades of the League, and therefore proposes to tell them now. But, says he, I think it would be better if I told them in the first person, as if it were myself who had gone through them; which, indeed, will be the easier and more natural to me, since I understand the feelings and desires of the comrade I am telling of better than anyone else in the world does.

CHAP. II.—A MORNING BATH.

WELL, I awoke, and found that I had kicked my bedclothes off; and no wonder, for it was hot and the sun shining brightly. I jumped up and washed and hurried on my clothes, but in a hazy and half-awake condition, as if I had slept for a long, long while, and could not shake off the weight of slumber. In fact, I rather took it for granted that I was at home in my own room than saw that it was so.

When I was dressed, I felt the place so hot that I made haste to get out of the room and out of the house; and my first feeling was a delicious relief caused by the fresh air and pleasant breeze; my second, as I began to gather my wits together, mere measureless wonder: for it was winter when I went to bed the last night, and now, by witness of the river-side trees, it was summer, a beautiful bright morning seemingly of early June. However, there was still the Thames sparkling under the sun, and near high water, as last night I had seen it gleaming under the moon.

I had by no means shaken off the feeling of oppression, and wherever I might have been should scarce have been quite conscious of the place; so it was no wonder that I felt rather puzzled in despite of the familiar face of the Thames. Withal I felt dizzy and queer; and remembering that people often got a boat and had a swim in mid stream, I thought I would do no less. It seems very early, quoth I to myself, but I dare say I shall find someone at Biffen's to take me. However, I didn't get as far as Biffen's, or even turn to my left thitherward, because just then I began to see that there was a landing-stage right before me in front of my house: in fact, on the place where my next-door neighbour had rigged one up, though somehow it didn't look like it either. Down I went on to it, and sure enough among the empty boats moored to it lay a man on his sculls in a solid-looking tub of a boat clearly meant for bathers. He nodded to me, and bade me good-morning as if he expected me, so I jumped in without any words, and he paddled away quietly as I peeled for my swim. As we went, I looked down on the water, and couldn't help saying—

"How clear the water is this morning!"

"Is it?" said he; "I didn't notice it. You know the flood-tide always thickens it a bit."

"H'm," said I, "I have seen it pretty muddy even at half-ebb."

He said nothing in answer, but seemed rather astonished; and as he now lay just stemming the tide, and I had my clothes off, I jumped in without more ado. Of course when I had my head above water again I turned towards the tide, and my eyes naturally sought for the bridge, and so utterly astonished was I by what I saw, that I forgot to strike out, and went spluttering under water again, and when I came up made straight for the boat; for I felt that I must ask some questions of my waterman, so bewildering had been the half-sight I had seen from the face of the river with the water hardly out of my eyes; though by this time I was quit of the slumbrous and dizzy feeling, and was wide-awake and clear-headed.

As I got in up the steps which he had lowered, and he held out his hand to help me, we went drifting speedily up towards Chiswick; but now he caught up the sculls and brought her head round again, and said—

"A short swim, neighbour; but perhaps you find the water cold this morning, after your journey. Shall I put you ashore at once, or would you like to go down to Putney before breakfast?"

He spoke in a way so unlike what I should have expected from a Hammersmith waterman, that I stared at him, as I answered, "Please to hold her a little; I want to look about me a bit."

"All right," he said; "it's no less pretty in its way here than it is off Barn Elms; it's jolly everywhere this time in the morning. I'm glad you got up early; it's barely five o'clock yet."

If I was astonished with my sight of the river banks, I was no less astonished at my waterman, now that I had time to look at him and see him with my head and eyes clear.

He was a handsome young fellow, with a peculiarly pleasant and friendly look about his eyes,—an expression which was quite new to me then, though I soon became familiar with it. For the rest, he was dark-haired and berry-brown of skin, well-knit and strong, and obviously used to exercising his muscles, but with nothing rough or coarse about him, and clean as might be. His dress was not like any modern work-a-day clothes I had seen, but would have served very well as a costume for a picture of fourteenth century life: it was of dark blue cloth, simple enough, but of fine web, and without a stain on it. He had a brown leather belt round his waist, and I noticed that its clasp was of damascened steel beautifully wrought. In short, he seemed to me like some specially manly and refined young gentleman, playing waterman for a spree, and I concluded that this was the case.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

TIME rolled on, and the year 1874 brought with it a presidential election, and great was the excitement during the latter part of the preceding year, as the parties in favour of the two candidates, General Mitre and Doctor Alsina, were both very strong, and lively times were expected. Alsina, however, had the advantage of being supported by the Government of the Province of Buenos Ayres, if he was not actually governor at the time. I think he had lately retired in favour of one of his political friends.

I cannot help recalling to mind the graceful satire of Goldsmith in his "Letters from a Citizen of the World," as I begin my task of describing a contested election in the free Argentine Republic in the year of grace 1874. I cannot but imagine the candid Chinaman, or some equally candid believer in Republicanism and Universal Suffrage, just arrived in the town of Navarro, and preparing himself to enjoy the sight of a "free" people exercising its right of suffrage, in order to choose the chief magistrate who should "preside over its destinies" for the next six years!

Free! oh yes, the ballot box was there, guarded by the agents of law-and-order, the gallant policemen of the Partido (district), every man armed with a carbine that would not go off and a big cavalry sword that would, and that on the slightest occasion. An awkward squad, they were paraded in front of the church, and in the porch of that temple was placed the table on which rested the aforesaid box, and behind which sat the scrutineers with their president. You see how even the influence of religion was invoked, to give solemnity and safety to this solemn civic ceremony. And yet, O shade of Whang Hoam! it was observed that none came to deposit their votes in that sacred urn but those who were of one and the same political colour, and that the colour of the Mayor or Juez, and other authorities of the district!

Why was this? Were they not free to come? Certainly they were, but certain little previous incidents had shown them clearly that they were sure to have their throats cut if they voted the wrong way. They were much in the predicament of the free worker in certain other countries, who is "free" to accept the employer's terms or reject them and starve!

A few days before the election, there had arrived in the town a man well known in the district and in all the country round for the number of murders he had committed. He was one of those unfortunate victims of the hateful frontier system I have just mentioned, and of the many other injustices inflicted on the poor Gaucho. One of those, of whom I am only surprised there were not more, who, tired of injustice, and being daring and powerful, and skilful in the use of the long facon or dagger they use, turned out at war with society in every district. The rural police of that time were not able to cope with them, one of the favourite feats of such men as this Juan Moreira being to engage in battle with the whole police force of a district, six or seven men, and rout them after killing one or two. The feat was not so difficult as may be imagined, for the Gaucho was always well armed, and well mounted, which was of more importance still, while the police were always badly mounted and armed, and with very little desire to risk their lives in an attempt to capture a man with whom they were strongly in sympathy. They were at that time also quite unused to fire-arms, so the well-mounted Gaucho cut them up in detail, charging them when he chose on the open Pampa, or prairie, for it must be remembered that the Province of Buenos Ayres is one great flat open plain.

This Juan Moreira was known to have killed several men and one officer of police in the very same district, or Partido of Navarro, and yet here we find him coming openly to the town and taking up his quarters—in the house of the Mayor! So it was; but then these were election times, and it had been the custom at all elections to make use of good fighting men, no matter what their antecedents. The fact was, that Moreira had been sent for by the chief of the government party, but, being under some obligations to the Mayor, who was in opposition, he had placed his sword or facon at his service, and it was joyfully accepted. He brought with him a number of men more or less of the same stamp as himself, and they began operations by killing three men of the opposite party in the suburbs of the town, and one old man in the public square, quite near to the Juzgado or Town Hall. This man, though left for dead, was not so, but died a few days after under my care. When Moreira and one of his men who accompanied him on this occasion, had retired, the police came and carried in the body to the Juzgado, and one of the policemen finding the sheath of Moreira's facon on the side walk, ran after him and restored it to him!

After this the opposite party hid themselves in terror, and the Mayor's party had it all their own way. Three cheers for Universal Suffrage and "free" institutions generally! A few days after this I saw Moreira and some of his companions galloping at full speed round the Plaza, or principal square, and shouting with all the force of their lungs, "Death to the Alsinistas!" I had occasion to see him more closely a little later on.

The government of the province, being a supporter of the opposite party, the Alsinistas, sent down a squad of city police (25 men) to take Moreira, and they arrived one night quite unexpectedly. They were joined on their arrival by a large number of the Alsina party, and learning that Moreira was quietly taking his glass at a small inn in company with two policemen of the town, they altogether marched up there at about eleven o'clock at night, and surprised him. They did not succeed in taking him, however, for Moreira as soon as he saw the crowd rushing into the house whipped off his poncho, and in a twinkling put out all the lights, and in the darkness and confusion managed to slip out through them all! Not content with this he turned and fired on them as soon as he reached a vacant space where he felt sure of escape. He grievously wounded one of the party with a bullet that smashed his lower jaw, but he himself was hit by a split bullet from a blunderbuss, which lodged in his face. He escaped, however, and two days afterwards I was requested by a member of the municipality to go and visit him at the house of the commander of National Guards. I there removed from under the skin of the lower jaw half of a pistol bullet. He was a handsome, powerfully-built man, and bore the necessary operation without a grimace. After all was over he thanked me with all the grace and politeness which distinguish the Argentine Gaucho or peasant.

It would be impossible for me to describe the confusion of mind which possessed me during all these events, and on this occasion in particular. I looked upon this man at the time as a vulgar assassin, and deserving as such to be attended only in the jail, as I told the man who came to call me; but he was actually in the hands of the authorities of the town, who supported him, and in any case he was entitled to have his wounds attended to. I therefore came to the conclusion that it was my duty to attend him, as my refusal to do so could do no good in any way.

Such cases as these show plainly what law and authority really are, and how false is the pretence that they are intended to protect the weak, or serve the general good of the community. While the opposition party made use of Moreira and others, the government party released from the jails all such men as they thought they could rely on to serve them in the same way during the elections,—and they do so still.

The upshot of the matter was that the opposition party took up arms, headed by their candidate General Mitre, declaring that they had been defrauded of their rights because the government party had done what the opposition had shown they were ready to do, where they had the power, as in Navarro. Then the government called out the National Guards, and the Mitre party did the same where they could. Then was seen the spectacle of the poor Gauchos dragged from their homes to fight, either for or against the government, according to the political leanings of their masters.

It was a strange and curious sight to see them mustering in Navarro. Every man came with his horse and equipments, and he was furnished with a long cane with one blade of shears fastened to the end of it by way of a lance—that was all.

William Lloyd Garrison, the great Abolitionist, has declared himself on the side of the Single-tax and Socialism.

METROPOLITAN PAUPERISM.—Census of metropolitan paupers, exclusive of lunatics in asylums and vagrants, taken on the last day of the weeks named hereunder (enumerated inhabitants in 1881, 3,815,000):—Third week of December, 1889—indoor, 60,228; outdoor, 38,186; total, 98,414. Third week of December, 1888—indoor, 59,939; outdoor, 41,345; total, 101,284. Third week of December, 1887—indoor, 59,612; outdoor, 44,356; total, 103,968. Third week of December, 1886—indoor, 57,578; outdoor, 40,814; total, 98,392. These figures do not include patients in the fever and smallpox hospitals of the Metropolitan Asylum district. The number of these patients on the last day of the week was returned as 1,774 in 1889, 873 in 1888, 2,593 in 1887, and 666 in 1886. Vagrants relieved in the metropolis on the last day of the third week in December, 1889:—Men, 722; women, 115; children under 16, 15; total, 852.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

GERMANY.

The German Emperor has again shown what kind of a man he is. Paul Singer, a Socialist member of the Reichstag, having brought an accusation of libel against an individual named Bachtler, the Berlin tribunal, fully convinced of the gross insult which Bachtler had thrown at Singer, ordered the libeller to pay a fine of 400 marcs. Bachtler declared himself satisfied, did nothing to have the sentence altered, and actually paid the fine. The German Kaiser, hearing of this hitherto unheard of thing, viz., a Socialist gaining in a law suit, at once granted a full and unsolicited pardon to Bachtler, and directed the fine of 400 marcs to be returned to him. Singer is a Socialist, hence, according to the views of that abominable ruler, he has no right whatever to have his honour protected—in fact, he has no honour at all. A good slandering of his character is all he deserves, and he has got it.

The editor of a Saxon weekly, Wittner, having recapitulated in his paper the fabulous number of banquets which the crazy young German Emperor had ordered to be given in his honour since his accession to the "throne of his fathers," has got eight months jail for it. The Dresden magistrates thought it very unbecoming indeed for any of his Majesty's subjects to take measure of the capacity of his Majesty's belly. For speaking of his belly eight months, for sounding his "left ear" sixteen months! O William! O Charlemagne!

Comrades Wilhelm Ganshow, Hermann Tappart, and Rudolf Richter have been sentenced at Berlin to six months' confinement for "secret conspiracy"; comrade F. Noack got only four months for the same abominable offence. In this case the conspiracy was such a terribly "secret" one that the conspirators did not even know each other! How wicked these malefactors must have been, and how happy "law-'n'-order" must be now that this awful conspiracy is over!

The Berlin police have interdicted the circulation throughout the blessed land of a book entitled "Etude sur les doctrines sociales du Christianisme" (Study on the Social Doctrines of Christianity), by Ives-Guyot, the actual Minister of Public Works in France, and Sigismund Lacroix, another Opportunist Republican. I wonder if they have read the book? True, that is not necessary. On the other hand, the Imperial Commission appointed to decide appeals against the enforcement of the Socialist law in particular cases, has rescinded six sentences passed upon newspapers and one upon an association. By so doing they appear to act fairly, you see, and can all the better throw dust in the eyes of the public.

BELGIUM.

We regret to announce the death of a staunch Revolutionary Socialist who has struggled in our ranks for more than a quarter of a century, Léopold Chainaye, who died in the last days of December at Liège, his birth-place. He was a wealthy manufacturer, and took a prominent part twenty-five years ago in the foundation of the International Working-men's Association. He has always spent largely his time and money in the service of the Socialist and Freethought movements. A few years ago he founded at Liège the Union Socialiste, and did a good deal of propagandist work amongst the miners of the various coal districts of the province of Liège. A clever and learned writer, he contributed largely to the columns of Le Devoir (Duty), (Liège, 1864 and 1869), Le Journal des Etudiants (The Student's Journal), (Liège, 1886, etc.), L'Avenir (The Future), a daily paper (Liège, 1865-75), etc. The Belgian Socialists will always keenly remember good old Chainaye, one of their forerunners in the Cause.

Our Belgian comrades are going to issue two new Socialist organs. One of them is to be published at Huy, and the other at Verviers, both in the province of Liège. The first is to be called L'Echo de Huy and the other L'Echo de Verviers.

HOLLAND.

The Dutch diamond cutters have resolved to run a special organ of their own in opposition to the former trade paper, which was conducted by M. Rose, and which wrote more and more in the interests of the masters. The new venture is entitled, De Diamantbewerker (The Diamond Cutter), and will be the official organ of the Dutch Diamond Cutters' Union. E. van Praag, A. Peyra, H. Haye, and H. A. Monfrooy will act as joint editors. The first issue appeared last week at Amsterdam.

The annual Conference of the Dutch Socialists has been held at the Hague on the 25th and 26th of last December. Besides mentioning the fact that all the delegates were unanimous in their hopes towards the bright future prospects of Socialism, and that two mass meetings were held after the Congress, Recht voor Allen does not say one word about the proceedings. Why?

RUSSIA.

Several telegraphic agencies state that the police of St. Petersburg have got positive proof that a new Nihilist society has been formed, which intends giving up open terrorism, and will carry out its objects secretly—whatever that means! Several artillery and naval officers have lately been arrested in connection with the new society. The discoveries made by the police are so extensive that the new formation will scarcely be able to develop much activity. (Really they are so extensive?) But this is perhaps more serious; rigorous precautions still continue to be taken all round the Imperial Palace. The Imperial Guard has been confined to barracks for several days past, and all the functionaries ordered to remain at their posts. The illness of the Czar is attributed to poisoning by the Nihilists, and his real state of health, which is very bad, is kept secret for political reasons. What a strange malady he must be suffering from, that "confining soldiers to barracks and surrounding the Palace with guards" should be the remedy for that illness! So strange indeed, that we won't say what we think of it. VICTOR DAVE.

To Help the Paper.—There are several ways in which you can help to spread the Weal. Ask your newsagent to try and sell it. Get those who don't care to buy it week by week to subscribe direct. Arrange for the posting of contents bills anywhere you can. Any number of other plans will suggest themselves if you think about it.

Postal Propaganda.—Some who would like to do propaganda but dare not openly, or who cannot spare the time to do it personally, can find many ways in which it can be done quietly. Not the least useful among possible plans would be to order and pay for a number of copies to be sent to persons in whose hands they might do good. We will send six copies to six different addresses for 7d. Write the names and addresses legibly.

THE MEETING OF THE POPES.

POPE LEO, that most holy man,
Was sitting in the Vatican
One afternoon, from callers free,
Sipping his sacerdotal tea;

When, lo! he hears with sudden dread
The name announced of W—ll—m St—d,
That journalistic pope, who's rather
More holy than the Holy Father!

Men say that he was framed from birth
To be God's vicegerent on earth;
And his oracular Pall Mall
Has long been proved infallible.

Old Leo felt his doom draw near
When this new lion did appear,
Who to remotest realms afar
Is known as patron of the Czar.

So quickly from his throne he rose,
And waived the point of kissing toes;
And thus the patron of the Czar
Outspoke with voice oracular:

"Friend Leo, though you deem it odd,
I've come to save the Church of God;
Take my advice, and all is well—
I'll puff you in the great Pall Mall."

"Across the wide Atlantic foam
Go, found a newer, mightier Rome;
When there your banner is unfurled
You'll rule the federated world."

Pope Leo answered, smiling sly,
And winking with paternal eye,
"Friend W—ll—m, what you hint is true—
This world's too small for me and you."

"But why must I, with age opprest,
Thus journey to the utmost West,
To dwell in some inclement spot,
'Mid prairie-dogs and God knows what?"

"There's this alternative at least,
That you, good friend, should journey East;
Let me advise that you should go,
Pall Mall and all, to Jericho!"

ANON.

CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM THE SICK CHAMBER OF THE OLDEST ENGLISH SOCIALIST.

For ten out of twelve years I have for five months of every winter been confined to my solitary hospital-prison house, musing on the needless sufferings of humanity. At an early hour of the morning of Christmas Day I was mystified by the carolling of two choirs at my door and window. One of them was the "Whiteboys" or choristers of "Holy Innocents," singing of the birth of the Carpenter's Son. They sang sweetly the usual melody. When they finished, I was mystified by another choir, of more natural and harmonised voices, continuing the air but with different words, although I could not make out the burden of their song. The Salvationists seemed to me the cause of the mystery. But wonder and surprise was intensified when the choir burst out in the glorious and thrilling anthem of the revolutionary movement, that arose out of the volunteers of Marseilles singing this song with electric enthusiasm as they marched into Paris, chanting "Ye sons of Freedom, awake to glory! Hark, what myriads bid you rise!" The band of the Blue Bonnets, their tambourines, and the War Cry have adapted this fine tune to some doggerl verses. But the distinctness of the words led to the supposition that some other choir was at hand. A severe attack of emphysema of the lungs makes the slightest exposure to cold air dangerous, so I awoke Mrs. Craig, who was selected as a chorister to sing on the anniversary of the Peterloo Massacre. Her rich and musical voice was requisitioned at all Socialist assemblies until 1840. As she reached the window, the choir was singing the last line. On describing the singers, there were no blue bonnets, and the men were not dressed in white overalls. It was not a choir from St. John's. It now revealed itself as a vision, and I exclaimed, It is the choir of the Holy League!

It was a source of gratification that the League had progressed so as to sing the Songs of Labour as a propaganda. I regretted I had not any intimation of the visit so as to improve the occasion; and recommend an increase of young members to open all lectures with chorusses, which sixty years ago had a marvellous charm among the Lancashire lads and lasses of those early Socialistic days of struggle.

There was, however, a touch of social sympathy which reached the heart of the wounded and weary soldier, who, from sheer exhaustion was compelled to retire with his wounds to the rear of the battle and leave the fight of the future to younger and stronger hands. The knowledge that some sympathy is felt for an earnest but disabled social reformer moved the heart-strings of emotion.

We have received "Fabian's Essays in Socialism," but too late for notice in present number.

THE GREAT LOCK-OUT AT BRISTOL.—This strike still continues, and fifty of the principal factories have now been closed for over a week, some ten thousand hands being idle.

THREATENED STRIKE OF ROAD-CAR MEN.—The directors have broken their agreement, and concluded with the men during the recent dispute. The men are about to send them a deputation, and are determined to strike if they do not receive a satisfactory reply.

OFFICES: 24 GREAT QUEEN STREET, LONDON, W.C.

HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON!

THE COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. For Australia, New Zealand, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Transvaal, and the Argentine Republic, a year, 8s.; six months, 4s.; three months, 2s. For India, Ceylon, China, Hong Kong, and the Straits Settlements, a year, 10s.; six months, 5s.; three months, 2s. 6d.

SPECIAL RECRUIT SUBSCRIPTIONS.—To aid in spreading our principles, the following largely reduced terms are offered to those who obtain new subscribers: Two new yearly subscriptions for British Islands, etc., 10s. 6d.; for Australia, etc., 15s.; for India, etc., 19s. Five new subscriptions: For British Islands, etc., 25s.; for Australia, etc., 37s. 6d.; for India, etc., 47s. 6d. Specimen copies will be sent on receipt of postage.

Remittances from abroad must be made by International Money Order.

DO YOU AGREE?

Do you agree with us that the social awakening of the workers is a desirable end? Do you agree with us that we are working in the right way to achieve that end?

You do not? Then oppose us and prove us wrong on every platform and in every paper to which you can gain access!

You do agree? Then work with us and for us; help us to extend our circle of influence; let no day pass in which you have not interested some one in our propaganda!

There is no middle course for an honest man!

NOTES ON NEWS.

In this editor-driven age, I suppose that the starting of two "important and influential" papers in one week is something to be noted. The Speaker is added to the list of weeklies, and the Daily Graphic to that of the dailies; but neither of them is likely to interest democratic readers very much. The Graphic is frankly reactionary, and goes in for an amount of sloppy loyalty and sickly gush that is rather astonishing at this time of day. Scarcely less reactionary, but far more hypocritical, is the Speaker;—and oh, so ponderously respectably dull! Those who have been dilating on the democratic advance of the Liberal party, and its adequacy to the achievement of any required reform, had better not read the Speaker, unless they would carry a leaden weight upon their consciences for many a long day.

No! the new sixpenny promises to be a weekly wonder in the way of ditchwater deadliness and respectable un-originality. And that while the penny weeklies are being compelled to creep on continually further and further along the road that leads to Socialism. Does not this point in a sufficiently clear manner to the ever-growing divergence between the two publics—the sixpenny respectable and the penny democratic? Some day, and that not far in the future, the divergence will become so marked as to force itself upon the notice of everyone—the divergence will have become a great rent in the fabric of society as it is, never to be closed again but in society as it is to be.

Some time ago the Standard published a long letter from a Mrs. Todd, of New South Wales, bewailing the woes of Australian mistresses, and appealing to the ladies of England to form themselves into committees to select and despatch suitable servants to the colonies. The Standard also improved on Mrs. Todd's bitter cry in a leading article. But the other side of the question is put in an advertisement from a Sydney journal:

"AN AUSTRALIAN SLAVEY.—This is to remind Mr. and Mrs. Todd to advocate the formation of a society in England to undertake the supply of a superior class of masters and mistresses to Australia, as there is already enough atrocious nigger-drivers and good servant-spoilers.—MISS CLARK."

Thus says the Pall Mall Gazette:

"It is 'the duty of Conservative clubs,' said Sir Michael Hicks-Beach at Leamington yesterday, to show 'the Socialists and Secularists' that 'in hereditary rank or hereditary legislation there is a kind of necessity for noble thoughts and noble deeds.' It is a very queer 'kind,' we are afraid. Hereditary rank ought to ensure noble deeds, of course: noblesse oblige. But does it? Sir Michael Hicks-Beach should be thankful that he was not greeted with cries of 'Cleveland Street.'"

So far, so good! But what of many other kinds of rank to which the Pall Mall bows the supple back? The rank, for instance, of Pioneer of Civilisation?—unrewarded by royalty, to the Pall Mall's great sorrow, with titles and what-not. The rank, for instance, of Self-appointed Paul Pry and Music-hall Moderator?—treated with scoffing contempt by all but prigs and hypocrites, to the Pall Mall's direful anger. Or, again, what of the Administrator of Stolen Millions and Preacher of the Gospel of Wealth?

We Socialists are less likely than even the Pall Mall to lie under suspicion of admiring hereditary rank. We go further than the Pall Mall is ever likely to go, or than even the Star is free to go, in our unbelief in every kind of rank or power, hereditary or acquired, which gives the power of compulsion into the hands of any man. And we deny that any lord or earl, or anything else upon the list of titles, can compare with a Norwood, a Stanley, a Livesey, or a Carnegie, for harmfulness and power for evil. Nor can we see that even the foul offences of which the Pall Mall speaks, or those which it made public a few years ago, are anything else than the necessary results of wealth and poverty, privilege and oppression. And it is to be doubted whether any single exploiting capitalist or exploring carpet-bagger has not wrought more real and widespread harm to humanity than even the foulest and most obvious brute may have done.

Here is what Saturday's Star had to say on the case of a woman who had starved to death during the week:

She and her daughter had 9s. a week to live on; 3s. 3d. went for rent, leaving 5s. 9d. a week for two civilised beings to feed and clothe themselves withal. One human being failed, and we have the impudence to label her death—which is practically a murder by society—as from 'natural causes.' So they were—immediately natural. If you withhold the means of renewing exhausted tissue from men and women they will die. But anything more 'unnatural' than the state of society under which abundance—nay, surfeit—is poured into one lap while another lap gets nothing at all—could not well be imagined.

In such an unnatural state of society, what is to be looked for but what is always happening, the perpetration of foul crime and the indulgence in filthy and repulsive vice? The dull dreariness of ordinary "respectable" life; the conventional decorum and restraint upon all natural impulse which it imposes; the magnitude of the temptations that follow the command of wealth and power—all these on the one hand. On the other all these but the wealth and what follows it; instead of that the pains and penalties of "respectable poverty." With such a life and death as that of the poor needle-woman to be the "reward of virtue"; with the workhouse and the pauper's grave as the final goal of the vast majority of the working-classes, even if they obediently and most faithfully carry out the advice and commands of their masters—who can measure the temptations that beset their path?

The weariness of leisured repletion, and the weariness of hungry toil; the unbridled power of wealth, and the miserable helplessness of poverty—when these things come together who can wonder at whatever follows? The hired ruffians of the ring, and their no less degraded employers; the minotaur and his victim; and every other kind of monster and malefactor, with those who suffer by them, are the natural and necessary outcome of the reign of the capitalist, of the power of the money-bag.

Until monopoly in the means of life be destroyed these things must go on; it is but lopping small branches and fiddling with results to attack any of the crimes and horrors of civilisation without striking at the root—and there is no axe that can reach that root but the Social Revolution.

S.

IN FRANCE.

It is something worth remembering to assist at a "Punch" offered to those Socialist Deputies who have been elected as such, without compromise with bourgeois parties. It is most enthusiastic! From these conferences are excluded: First, the two Possibilist Deputies, Joffrin and Dumay, who have made a compromise with the Opportunists in power; second, the two ci-devant Blanquists, Granger and Roche, who have bribed Boulanger's electors; and lastly, the "Christian" Socialist, De Mun.

This last-named rogue preaches humility on the part of the workers, and the supremacy of property. He preaches that our physical misery and discomfort is most healthful for our spiritual life hereafter; and all the rest of that stinking rubbish that stunts old maids so well.

At the conferences which I attended, there were present Baudin, Boyer, Chassaing, Cluseret, Ferroul, Hovelacque, Lachize, Millerant, and Thivrier, Deputies. These Deputies form the Socialist vanguard in France. They, for the first time in the annals of French Socialism, have formed a distinct Socialist party in the House of Commons.

This does not mean, however, that they are the leaders of the great revolutionary party; in all the meetings the first name which is called out as that of chairman is Vaillant, town councillor; the second name is always that of Jules Guesde; Chauvière and Daumas come after. At one meeting, the hall was so crowded that it was impossible to count the difference in the number of hands lifted for Vaillant and Guesde respectively; so they took the chair or chairs, jointly!

Let us remember, in passing, that when, at the last election for the Presidency of the Republic, Ferry scored the highest vote on first trial, on that same day General Eudes, now dead, Vaillant, and Chauvière were at the Hotel-de-Ville watching the ballot. A hundred thousand revolutionaries had received the mot d'ordre to come down at once in case Ferry were elected. The barracks were surrounded and preparations made; on hearing which, the congress meeting at Versailles, in the twinkling of an eye, cast their vote for Carnot. The capitalists got frightened, and Ferry was sacrificed!

Most of these Deputies represent country towns; they are not broken in to politics; their rhetoric is without flourish, simple and honest; they speak from the heart, as working-men do. One among them, Lachize, was working as a weaver until a few months ago, and then left his loom for a strike, when his fellows were so pleased with his conduct that they sent him to parliament. Baudin is a jolly good fellow, who spent eight years in England, and speaks English like a native. He was lucky enough to make his escape after the Commune, and to save his head on English soil while 35,000 of his brethren were butchered by Boulanger and his sacrificants. Cluseret, the Minister for War during the Commune, a soldier-like old fellow, looks none the worse for having twice been sentenced to death. Thivrier is a sturdy countryman, who makes one laugh when he says candidly that he has pledged his honour to his electors always to wear his blue blouse in the House, exactly as he did when in their midst. He is honesty itself, and quite the most beloved of any of them: blistered hands like to shake hands with such a man.

These men can do little or nothing in Parliament itself; they know that very well; but they can do a tremendous lot of good in the country by means of their free railway ticket. At twenty-four hours' notice they go to any part of the country to speak or preside over meetings, and try to arouse the indifferent, who would rather let their wives and children die in a ditch or poor-house than take the wealth they have produced wherever they can lay their hands upon it. The pay of a Deputy and his free railway pass are taken by many a bourgeois to further schemes against the workers; why shouldn't the same weapons be turned against them? And these men whom I have mentioned do this with absolute honesty and to great effect.

In spite of the intense cold on Friday, a great crowd of revolutionaries met on the heights of Pere Lachaise to pay a tribute of respect to the cherished memory of Blanqui. Long before two o'clock, which was the time appointed, men, women, and children were seen coming from all parts of the cemetery, some towards the grave of General Eudes, others towards that of Blanqui, which is not more than ten yards away. All were engaged in animated conversation; most of them having seen active service during the Commune. I heard a sturdy young fellow of about eighteen, say, laying his hand on General Eudes' tomb, "I swear here, on this our great friend's tomb, that if the tyrants of my country want me to become a soldier, I will accept their gun, not to protect them, but to destroy them!" Everyone present was carried away with his splendid enthusiasm, and rushed to shake hands with him.

Soon we saw Vaillant, then Chauvière, and everyone moved along towards Blanqui's grave. A letter was read from Blanqui's sister, saying that sickness prevented her from being there. After stirring speeches from Vaillant, Chauvière, Deputy Baudin, Féline, and Landrin, we all went to the Mur des fédérés—that wall against which so many thousands of proletarians paid with their lives their fidelity to our cause. Upon that sacred ground no capitalist dares to set his cursed foot. On that same ground no proletarian can tread without feeling inflamed with hatred and resolve, and being ready to sacrifice his life in a renewed attempt at revolution. The Mur des fédérés is for the proletariat a holy place, a place where inspiration and hope are to be sought. The moral strength such a visit gives is not to be described. We left a little after 3 o'clock, to refresh ourselves and to carry on a lively conversation about the next Commune, and how that all of us would be there and do our duty, not leaving one stone unturned till victory is ours, and ours for ever!

Paris, Jan. 5, 1890.

A. COULON.

IN CHICAGO.

THE readers of the Commonweal have undoubtedly heard of the murder of Dr. Cronin, the Irish Nationalist, who was beaten to death in this city on the 4th of May last. The trial of the murderers, which has been in progress for three months and is just completed, has had more than a passing interest for us Radicals, many of us hoping that disclosures of great value would be made, and a way opened for us to present the Anarchist case to the people in a new light. Our interest in this case arose from the fact that one of the murderers of Dr. Cronin, a city detective named Coughlin, was chief assistant to the notorious police-captain Schaack, who boasted that he had done more than any other man to secure the conviction of our martyrs during their infamous trial; and also because this same Captain Schaack, for seeking to hide the villainy of the fellow Coughlin, has again been dismissed from the police force, this time permanently. Schaack was in command of the district where the murder was committed, and although ordered to investigate the conduct of his man Coughlin, pretended that the fellow was above suspicion, and for this act of insubordination was dismissed from the service. The fellow Coughlin is no doubt in possession of secrets concerning the villainy of his chief, especially in connection with the conviction of our eight men, which have much to do with the solicitous feeling of the latter toward the murderer, and it was the hope that in some way these secrets might be made public which caused us to take such a deep interest in the proceedings.

The jury, after deliberating seventy hours, returned a verdict of guilty against four of the accused, fixed the punishment of three of them at life imprisonment, and one at three years in the penitentiary. This was a surprise to everybody, as the general belief was that death would be meted out to the assassins. Many people are also comparing this verdict with that against the Anarchists, and mention the significant fact that in that case the jury was only out about one hour.

The mills of the gods are at work, and retribution stares the black-hearted assassins of our comrades in the face. Schaack and Bonfield have been dismissed in disgrace, though still free; Grinnell, the arch fiend of them all, is apparently at the very pinnacle of popular favour and power, but the evidence is slowly accumulating which will show him to the world in his true light. Gary also, the modern Jeffries, and others who perjured their souls on that occasion—their time will surely come. Our opportunity will be their downfall.

A significant meeting was recently held in one of the largest halls in this city. More than 3,000 people—largely conservative in opinion—assembled to protest against the interference by detectives in a Socialist meeting. The meeting was called under the auspices of the Personal Rights League, a powerful young organisation having for its object the securing to every member of the community his individual lawful rights. The president of the League presided at the meeting. The vice-president of the meeting was one of our best known Radical German Socialists. Two of the speakers were well-known Socialists, and others were prominent business and professional men. The Radical sentiments of the speakers were received with enthusiasm, and loud applause greeted the stinging rebukes meted out to the police authorities. Two of the Socialists at the meeting had been very roughly handled by the detectives, and the recital of their wrongs caused intense feeling. As the particulars of the dastardly outrage were recited by the speakers, I watched the press reporters; not a pencil stirred, not a line was written, and the next morning one of the papers referred to the meeting in a general way as a criticism of police administration, but not one of them referred to the specific object of the meeting, or narrated a word of the outrage committed upon unoffending citizens.

Surely the several incidents connected with this great public gathering ought to prove to the law-fearing people who were in attendance that the press, the church, and the state are leagued together to stifle every manifestation of growing discontent. Not the least significant feature of this affair is the fact that the Personal Rights League are prosecuting, in the courts, the detectives who were guilty of the outrage. Surely our day is near at hand when we can find able and willing champions among the bourgeoisie.

WM. HOLMES.

Chicago, Ills.

'Repairing the Idols,' by Col. Ingersoll, is the substance of an interview by the reporter of an American journal as to the colonel's views upon 'Robert Elsmere,' which has been reprinted here as a penny pamphlet. It is well worth close reading by everybody, Socialists as well as others; for though "Pagan Bob" does not quite see eye to eye with us, he is a radical thinker and brave speaker. (Progressive Publishing Co., or this office.)

'Anarchy,' by C. L. James (author, Eau Claire, Wis., U.S.A., 25 c.), is one of the best and most interesting statements of the Anarchist position that I can remember reading. It has commanded a wide sale in America, and but for the prohibitive price, would do the same here. Like all books and pamphlets published in the States, the price is so high when compared with that of similar articles of home production, that would-be buyers here are frightened off.

YANKEE CHRISTMAS.—The following is a list of the prices paid in Boston on Christmas Eve for the materials for next day's dinners. It will afford a pretty fair basis for a calculation of the comparative purchasing power of wages there and here:—Fruit and Vegetables.—Lettuce, 5 to 10 cents; celery, 15 to 25 cents a bunch; radishes, 10 cents a bunch; fresh mushrooms, 1 dol. 25 cents a pound; Bermuda potatoes, 1 dol. 50 cents a peck; spinach, 25 cents a peck; watercress, 5 cents a bunch; string beans, 25 cents a quart; cauliflower, 15 to 35 cents each; egg plant, 30 to 65 cents each; green peas, 25 cents a quart; cranberries, 10 to 15 cents a quart; persimmons, 1 dol. a dozen; Jamaica oranges, 25 cents a dozen; Havana oranges, 30 cents a dozen; Mandarin oranges, 40 cents a dozen; Florida oranges, 30 to 50 cents a dozen; bananas, 30 cents a dozen; Malaga grapes, 20 to 30 cents a pound; and Lisbon grapes, 1 dol. a pound. Meat.—Leg of lamb, 20 cents a pound; lamb chops, 25 cents a pound; leg of mutton, 17 cents a pound; extra sirloin roast, 25 cents a pound; sirloin steak, 25 cents a pound; ox tails, 20 cents each; and double sweetbreads, 50 cents. Poultry.—Green ducks, 25 cents a pound; green geese, 25 cents a pound; chickens, 25 cents a pound; turkeys, 17 to 25 cents a pound; squab, 35 cents a pound; canvas-back ducks, 7 dols. a pair; black ducks, 1 dol. 75 cents a pair; mallard ducks, 1 dol. 50 cents a pair; and teal ducks, 1 dol. 25 cents a pair. Evergreens.—Princess pine festooning, 4 and 5 cents a yard; evergreen festooning, 3 and 4 cents a yard; laurel festooning, 6 and 12½ cents a yard; laurel wreaths, 25 to 40 cents each; princess pine wreaths, 10 to 20 cents each; fancy wreaths, 15 to 50 cents each; and crosses, anchors, etc., 25 cents to 1 dol. each.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Gas-stokers' Strike.

Henry Weir was committed for trial on Thursday at Bow Steet on the evidence of the veracious policemen and the reporter of a Tory paper. Thomas MacCarthy, the chairman at the platform where Weir spoke, states that Weir said that "if Mr. Livesey was in Brazil he would have been got rid of, and the man who did it would have been looked upon as a hero." This certainly seems the most probable account we have yet heard. It is certainly rather funny that the Government should go in for all the parade of an Old Bailey prosecution because a man endeavoured to explain to the audience what he believed to be the manners and customs of the Brazilians. According to McCarthy, Weir stated that he had introduced these observations upon the "tricks and manners" of the people of that far distant country as a kind of padding in his speech, or as he himself expressed it, as "something to fill up." Under these circumstances, the Government prosecution is simply ridiculous.

Probably, however, even the members of a Tory Government would not have made such fools of themselves if it had not been for the advice and encouragement of the Star. That paper shrieked itself virtuously hoarse over Weir's speech. It was "horrible," "wicked," he ought to be kicked out of his trade society, etc. Still one fails to see that if even Weir had recommended the removal of Mr. Livesey, whether his advice would have had such serious effects among phlegmatic Englishmen as, say, a recommendation to "shun a man like a leper" among excitable Irishmen. As the latter advice has frequently been given by friends of Mr. T. P. O'Connor, and "over-zealous" persons have not alone been contented with shunning the denounced person as a leper, but have occasionally shot him like a dog, one fails to see where the Star's virtuous indignation concerning Weir's speech comes in. It seems that some people want to make up for occasional lapses into unconstitutionality in Ireland by an extra assumption of Pecksniffian respectability in England. In this, however, they only succeed in arousing general laughter at their contemptible hypocrisy. But there is something even worse than this, and that is a "democratic" newspaper acting as jackal to the Public Prosecutor. That is just what the Star has done, whether willingly or unwillingly.

The strike seems to have taken a turn favourable to the men. Although it has now reached its fourth week, Mr. Livesey is as far off victory as ever. The coal boycott is beginning to take effect; two vessels bringing coal for the works have been totally abandoned by their crews, while others have been partially abandoned, the men being drawn off by the pickets of the Seamen's and Firemen's Union, despite the efforts of the Thames police to hinder them in their work. The blacklegs are also finding that their position is not too comfortable. At the beginning of the strike, Mr. Livesey paid them £1 weekly in addition to their usual wages, but on Friday Jan. 3 this was stopped, and the blacklegs were ordered to get lodgings outside. They found this to be impossible, as owing to bills issued by the Strike Committee, they were refused admittance by every lodging-house keeper, even the common lodging-houses refusing to take them in. So they were forced to go back to their piggery inside the works. As five of the blacklegs are in Guy's Hospital with Russian influenza, it is possible that Livesey was afraid of an epidemic breaking out in his crowded dens. Indeed, this is pretty certain to happen soon, as the blacklegs are living under frightfully insanitary conditions. They still work twelve hours a-day; in fact, according to Mr. Livesey, at one of the works they have "unanimously elected" to continue the system. But the loss of their extra money has made them rather mutinous, fifty men leaving Rotherhithe on Saturday. At East Greenwich also they refused to go on with their work, and with difficulty were persuaded to take up their tools again. There are still continuous complaints on the part of the public as to the bad supply of gas; even the Echo, which is on the side of Livesey, admits that in South London, thanks to the blacklegs, gas-stoves won't work, streets and railway stations are left in semi-darkness, and tradesmen are forced to buy paraffin lamps. So, unfortunately for Livesey, facts give the lie to his repeated declarations that "the supply of gas is satisfactory, and the work of manufacturing proceeds without a hitch." For a pious person, Mr. Livesey shows a remarkable capacity for telling lies.

An agent of the company has been visiting Yarmouth after scabs, but several local comrades watched his movements all the day and managed to hamper him considerably. In the morning he took down forty or fifty names, and promised to meet the scabs again at 4.30 p.m. on the Hall Plain. This is the place where several of our comrades suffered imprisonment for meeting, and have not since been allowed to meet there; only very recently they were moved by the police whilst holding a meeting there. However, directly this scab-monger appeared on the ground, the police, instead of moving him on, protected him, and allowed him to stand in the middle of the road (a main thoroughfare) under a large lamp-post for over twenty minutes with a crowd of 600 or 700 people round him. The scabs left Yarmouth at 8.15 a.m. on Tuesday morning, but shorn of their fair proportions, for a lot had disappeared in the night. They were given a warm farewell groan by our comrades and others who had assembled at the station to see them off.

Firewood Cutters.

On Monday, December 29th, five thousand firewood cutters struck work in London. They demanded an advance of 2½ per cent., which was three-pence an hundred bundles more on their wages. In a very few days most of the masters yielded, and nearly all the men have obtained the advance.

Strike of Irish Railway Men.

Since the strike of the porters of Cork, which resulted in a victory for the men, there has been considerable ferment amongst all the workers employed upon the railways in Ireland. In consequence of this agitation, a strike of guards, porters, and signalmen broke out on Friday at noon, on the Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway. It did not last long, for at seven on Friday night the directors gave in, and the men gained an advance of wages.

Shop Assistants, Warehousemen, and Porter's Union.

We have received the manifesto of this union which is an attempt to unite of all sections of workers employed in all stores of the Whiteley pattern. This is an effort which we should like to be successful, although the obstacles are great. The worst being that excessive snobbery, which often even flourishes among aristocratic trade unionists, has unfortunately, a far greater hold upon the ordinary shop assistant. It is precisely this snobbery which had made the shop assistants cause such a hopeless one. The objects of the above-named union are to obtain less hours of labour, proper meal times, better wages, to prevent sweating, and to organise action at Municipal and Parliamentary election in the interests of labour. Speaking of the wages and conditions of labour of these oppressed workers, the manifesto says:—"The correspondence that has reached us from all parts of London, confirms the existence of a hideous mass of real grievances. Wages As low for porters as 14s. a week, and ranging for all these classes from 18s. to 24s. a week. Hours—from seventy-six to ninety-six, pulling down these wages—less fines—to 4½d., or even 2½d. per hour. The effect of the cruel conditions, especially upon young women, and in regard to future generations deleterious to the highest degree, as acknowledged unanimously by medical science. Legal protection is only provided up to the age of 18, but it is never enforced. We must therefore procure ourselves the necessaries of healthy enjoyment and rational living." The clause about legal protection might teach those who clamour for eight hours' legislation, how very valuable are any measures of that kind. We think also it might teach the trade union to drop their clause concerning Parliamentary and Municipal action. All communications regarding membership are to be addressed to George Edwards, Secretary of the Union, at Lockhart's Coffee Rooms, 35, Aldersgate Street, City, E.C. The committee which is fairly representative of all sections of the workers, meets on Wednesdays from 8 to 11 p.m. for the enrolment of members and other business. N.

The Surrey Labourers and Allotments Association.

Since the union of labourers has been started, we have received several applications from the Allotments Association to take up their cause. Now our comrade Kitz proposed this some time ago, but he being engaged in London had not the time to do it, so it has fallen on the local branch to do the work, which we hope will end in lowering the colours of the local authority. Now the programme of the association takes up the Allotments Acts passed in 1887, which empowers the local authority to provide land at prices suitable for cultivation. But so far they have entirely ignored the wants of the people. They have purchased land from some local freeholder, giving him £280 profit over that which he gave himself for the said land, and also two acres to hold as his own freehold in remembrance of the purchase. Now the association demand land at agricultural value, viz., 6d. per rod or under, but the local authority want for their purchase 10d. per rod with land tax and tithe for the parson. Now they also call on the Local Government Board to give power to take the Consolidated Act of 1845, whereby they can utilise common land for the purpose of agriculture. I will report progress later on as things develop, but I may say that the work of the League has not been in vain, for it is now bearing good fruit. We have a great live M.P. coming amongst us on Wednesday evening, this being his first address to the electors since his election, and some critical questions will be put for him to answer, let us hope he will be equal to the occasion. S.G.

LITERARY NOTES.

Mark Twain, in his description of the adventures of his imaginary Yankee visitor to King Arthur's court, has produced a striking and powerful satire upon things as they are. He goes about with the Knight. One day they come upon a group of poor, ragged creatures mending the thing they called a road:

"By a sarcasm of law and phrase they were freemen. Seven-tenths of the free population of the country were of just their class and degree—small, 'independent' farmers, artisans, etc.—which is to say, they were the nation, the actual nation; they were about all of it that was useful, or worth saving, or really respect-worthy, and to subtract them would have been to subtract the nation and leave behind some dregs, some refuse in the shape of a king, nobility, and gentry—idle, unproductive, acquainted mainly with the arts of wasting and destroying, and of no sort of use or value in any rationally constructed world. And yet, by ingenious contrivance, this gilded minority, instead of being in the tail of the procession, where it belonged, was marching head up, with banners flying, at the other end of it; had elected itself to be the nation, and these innumerable clams had permitted it so long that they had come at last to accept it as a truth, and not only that, but to believe it right and as it should be."

Such paragraphs are plentiful; nor is any opportunity missed of marking their application to present circumstances.

Many of the woodcuts in the book also embody instructive allegories; as, for instance, in a cut of Justice, with her scales, one containing the heavy hammer of Labour and the other the baubles of Aristocracy, but the latter made to outweigh the former by means of the string of Self-interest artfully attached to the toe of Law, who stands by. Another, in a similar vein, shows the Justice of the nineteenth century and Justice of the sixth century standing opposite each other, and simultaneously remarking, "Sister, your blind is disarranged," for, with the same manner of string attached to the toe of each, Money is made to outweigh Labour by the former, just as titles are made heavier in the balance by the latter. One little cut shows "Decorations of Sixth Century Aristocracy" as "Rewards for all Babes Born Under Specified Conditions," such as "Slave Driver," "Robber of Unarmed Savages," "Robber of Orphans," "Absorber of Taxes," "Murderer of Rivals," etc., the whole supported by "Honi soit qui mal y pense!" Another illustrates the remark of the King concerning a peasant—"Brother! to dirt like this?"—by depicting the three phases of oppression of man by man, first by violence under the sword of royal power, then by the book of "law," making man subject to the slave-driver's lash, and last, the subjection of the working-man to the millions of the monopolist. A strong and spirited picture of an arrogant slave-driver shows in its face the unmistakable portrait of a notorious American billionaire and stock-gambler.

It is instructive to notice that a good many paragraphs have been cut out, and more been weakened, by the English publisher.

The first number of the Phonetic Journal (Isaac Pitman's weekly shorthand journal) for this year is particularly interesting. In addition to the usual five large pages of shorthand, with key, it contains an amusing article from the pen of the well-known phonographer, Mr. T. A. Reed, on "How to save 6,000 years" by means of shorthand, and a chapter on the "Early Days of the Newspaper Press," forming the first of a series of articles on the "Newspaper World." Mr. Pitman, in his "Annual Address," records a most remarkable extension of his system of shorthand during the past twelve months, and promises an enlargement of his journal next year, when it will enter on its 50th volume. FRANK KITZ, Secretary.

"COMMONWEAL" GUARANTEE FUND.

The following further sums have been received towards this fund:—Webb, 1s.; J. R., 2s.; H. R., 1s.; H. Rogers, 1s. 6d.; F. C. S. S., 1s.; and C. Saunders, 1s.

REPORTS.

MITCHAM.—Gregory lectured Sunday evening for the association on "The Future Programme"; room crowded to excess and great sympathy shown. Comrade Kitz paid us a visit and took part in the discussion. Things are beginning to show that the work of the Socialist League members has not been thrown away.—S. G.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—No meeting at Latimer Road on Sunday morning owing to wet. At room in evening, R. Catterson-Smith gave an excellent lecture on "Individual Liberty"; good discussion followed and collected 1s. 7½d.

ABERDEEN.—The Christmas and New Year holidays have rather interfered with the holding of meetings, but Leatham has opened a correspondence in the local Radical weekly, which promises to turn out well. By the time this appears meetings will have been resumed with increased ardour.—L.

GLASGOW.—On Hogmanay night we held our annual social meeting to bring in the New Year. Between fifty and sixty were present, including ladies. After the tea, the evening was devoted to songs, readings, and dancing. At 12 o'clock comrade Leo Melliet delivered a short and stirring address, and the new year was inaugurated with three ringing cheers for the Social Revolution. "La Carmagnole" was then sung by Melliet, and danced by the whole company. "Das Proletariat" was sung by our German comrade Derwald, and dancing and song thereafter continued till 3 o'clock in the morning. The songs sung during the night were almost entirely Socialist ones, including "The March of the Workers," "No Master," "Ye Poor of Wealthy England," "Annie Laurie," and "When the Revolution Comes"; Miss Hendry, Dan. McCulloch, Arch. McKechnie, J. Gilbert, and Jas. Thomson being our chief vocalists, while Joe Burgoyne and Shaw Maxwell gave the readings. In every way the meeting was a most pleasant and successful one.—On Sunday evening at 5.30 we held our first open-air meeting for the year, at Paisley Road Toll, where Glasier spoke to a very attentive audience of about 200.

LEEDS.—On Sunday morning at Vicar's Croft a good meeting was held, when Rogers spoke to an attentive audience; Devily opposed; Weals sold out and small collection made for local propaganda. In the Socialist League Club in the evening, T. Paylor lectured on "Socialism and the New Labour Movement" to a crowded room; had a good discussion after and literature went well.

LEICESTER.—On Jan 3, we had a social evening, about 50 comrades and friends sat down to a tea in the Spiritualist Hall. After tea an agreeable entertainment was provided. We anticipated "the day after the Revolution" by one and all thoroughly enjoying ourselves. Barclay, in especial was, to use a pre-resolutionly phrase "all over the shop." Great credit is due (bearing no interest of course) to Comrade Chambers, who did most of the catering.

MANCHESTER.—Being favoured with a fine day, we held a good meeting in Stevenson Square on Sunday afternoon, Stockton, Bailie, and Bullock (of Hammersmith) speakers; 2s. 2d. collected for local propaganda.

YARMOUTH.—Next Tuesday night is our anniversary; the yearly report will be given, and secretary and treasurer elected for the next year. We intend trying to start a branch or sub-branch in Goleston, the first business meeting will be held at comrade Brightwell's, Pier Place, on Monday next.—J. H.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—On Sunday morning Councillor Sanders of Walsall, addressed a large meeting in Sneinton Market on "Municipal Socialism." Peacock presided; 4s. 6d. collected. In the evening Sanders lectured in the Socialist Hall, Woodland Place, on "Trades' Unionism from a Socialist Standpoint," Proctor in the chair. A collection realised 6s. and the lecture was much appreciated. Next Sunday night, at 8.30 p.m., quarterly meeting at Socialist Hall.

EDINBURGH (SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION).—Comrade J. Tate lectured on Sunday, in the Moulders' Hall to a good audience, his subject being "The People who have no Rights." A very interesting discussion followed, in which comrades Smith, Davidson, Hamilton, and others took part.

CHELSEA S.D.F., Co-operative Lecture Hall, 312 Kings Road, Chelsea.—Sunday January 12, at 8 p.m., Frank Podmore, "Robert Owen."
MANHOOD SUFFRAGE LEAGUE, "Three Doves," Berwick St., Oxford St., W.—Sunday January 12, at 8.45 p.m., Charles Murray, "The Gospel of Discontent."

Each number contains the Address of the preceding Sunday, delivered by the Editor in Newark, Brooklyn, and New York.

Motto: "Hear the other side."

THIS Journal advocates Personal Sovereignty in place of State Sovereignty, Voluntary Co-operation as opposed to Compulsory Co-operation, the Liberation of the human mind from Superstition, and the application of the principles of Ethics toward Social Regeneration.

But it is meant also to be a broad-minded, unsectarian meeting-place for the representatives of all schools of Religious and Economic thought. Orthodox and Liberal Christians, Spiritualists, Hebrews, Agnostics, Liberals, Infidels, Atheists, Freethinkers, and Secularists of every shade of opinion; Protectionists, Free-traders, Single-taxers, Nationalists, Socialists, and Anarchists, advocates of peaceful measures of social regeneration and revolutionists,—will all be welcomed to its columns with equal cordiality, fairness, and respect. As an indication of the broad scope of the paper, here are the names of

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto:

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

NOTES ON NEWS.

REALLY the gush of some people over some other people is too sickening. The latest sample of toadyism was the motion by Mr. Fleming Williams at the last meeting of the London County Council, "That this Council hereby resolves to give, in the name of the people of London, a welcome to Mr. H. M. Stanley on his return from Africa . . . that the committee be instructed to treat the question as one of urgency."

It was quite in the proper order of things that the proposed laudation of the filibuster should be proposed by Fleming Williams, "in the name of the people of London;" for it must be borne in mind that Williams is not an elected representative, but only one of the "aldermen," and the lowest on the list too, being made an alderman by the magnificent number of 55 votes.

It was quite in the proper order of things, too, that the proposal to beslaver this canting hunter for new markets should come from a clergyman. Christian clergymen and Christian missionaries, spurred on by Christian merchants, have for generations, centuries, made Africa a hunting-ground, where rivers of blood have been shed that a rich man now and again might build a church.

It was quite in the proper order of things, also, that this Christian clergyman should be one of those aldermen made by a Tory trick, who claims to be a "Progressive." If we are to judge by the exhibitions which some of the London County Council "Progressives" have made of themselves, there is need for a new dictionary to tell us what "progress" really means. In the eyes of all who worship Stanleyism it means, of course, the greatest possible sale in Central Africa of our manufactures, including bibles and religions, which will account for Fleming Williams's sympathy "in the name of the people of London."

It was interesting to watch the way in which the proposal was dealt with in the debate, to note the different way the matter was treated by a real representative, who knows by personal experience something of Africa and its people, and who is above all a Socialist. It was without doubt a severe shock to the Jingoism in the Council, Progressives and otherwise, to hear Burns call their temporary god the "buccaneer of the Congo," "whose sole business in life is seeking fresh markets for a shoddy commercialism and fresh opportunities to exploit the natives." That this sort of talk was exceedingly painful to the feelings of some of the Council was proved by the repeated interruptions to which Burns was subjected while speaking.

The droll point in the whole business is that Jingoism or Stanleyism had to suffer a severe pummelling, and the motion in his praise was not even reached, the whole of the discussion turning on whether a standing order should be suspended to allow the motion to be discussed!

In moving the suspension of the order the chairman allowed Williams considerable latitude, which he utilised by using up some of his gush on Stanley which should have been reserved for the motion proper—a line much resented by the whole of the Council.

In consequence of this allowance to Williams, he felt bound to allow the same to Burns, and so each of the five members who interrupted Burns on the point of order, "that the main question was being discussed," had to ignominiously subside and allow Burns to go on with what, later on, Mr. Harry Lawson called a "virulent speech which he thought quite disgraceful."

This gentleman, probably with lively feelings of gratitude to Stanley on account of what he did for the Daily Telegraph some years ago, was prevented by his bubbling indignation "even discussing Mr. Stanley with Mr. Burns." He even began a sentence which suggested a vote of censure, but a warning note from the whole chamber pulled him up in time to stay him making a further exhibition of himself.

The wind-up of the discussion was quite in keeping with the whole subject, for Mr. Boulnois suggested that it would be very unwise for the London County Council to compete with the City Corporation in the noble (?) work of acknowledging such labours as Stanley's. This seemed to strike them as being about right, and Fleming Williams withdrew his motion.

T. S.

In his political notes in the Commonweal, William Morris has frequently predicted a combination of Liberals and Tories to resist the advanced party now in the course of development. His view is confirmed by the Liberty and Property Defence League's last report, which, but for the too-evident dullness of the dry-brain that begot it, might pass for a satire on representative government, instead of the stirring appeal to patriotism that it tried to be and couldn't.

For instance: "Under the euphemism of 'social reform,' . . . Tories and Radicals are busy out-bidding one another for the democratic vote." Their differences "are in the natural course a vanishing quantity. When they have finally disappeared, the political issues that remain will have to be fought out between this new party and an opposing party to which the course of events will inevitably give rise. In the meantime great harm is being wrought to the national interests by the competition of both the existing parties in their reckless race to the common goal of misnamed domestic reform."

Evidently the League looks upon government as a decidedly shabby business—a hunting-ground for men on the make; and we, who willingly assent, would suggest that 'twere advisable therefore to have nought to do with it. Not so the noble lords and gentlemen of the L. P. D. L. With an itch to have their finger in the great dirt-pie, though with their lips disclaiming a desire to interfere, they refer to the dock strike, and covertly call upon Government to prevent intimidation and picketing, directed against men "willing to sell their labour in the open market at the market price."

Now, if they protested as strongly against the misdeeds of "trusts" and other combinations of capital as they do against the misdeeds of trades-unions, we could believe that their thick-headedness was tempered with honesty of intention. But their silence on the former matter gives a sinister meaning to their words, when they ask for money from those "with any property and liberty to lose," and allows the suspicion that they only object to legislation intended to help those who have neither. In fact, they seem to want the dirt-pie of government all to themselves.

Dirty as it is, they think it better than none. "In the choice of the lesser evil," says the report, "consists the art of politics." What a satire on that "art" to think that whatever you have to do with it must be evil, more or less! I congratulate the S. D. F. on being out of the running for that foul prize. "The influence of the Social Democratic Federation . . . has given way to that of the National Labour Electoral Association, established for attaining similar ends, but on constitutional and parliamentary lines. . . . To this latter body the more practical members of the Federation have attached themselves."

I wonder how those "more practical members" will relish sharing their prize pie with Sir William Harcourt and Lord Randolph Churchill. Perhaps we and the S. D. F. may have the best of the fun as lookers-on at the race. Probably the "All-Socialist" party will win the prize—if it doesn't first crumble to dust and get blown away; but while the sport is proceeding we can be sowing our seed for a harvest of Socialism that will satisfy the wants of man, as no Government Pie, even the least unwholesome, ever can.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. II. (continued).—A MORNING BATH.

I FELT that I must make some conversation; so I pointed to the Surrey bank, where I noticed some light plank stages running down the foreshore, with windlasses at the landward end of them, and said, "What are they doing with those things here? If we were on the Tay, I should have said that they were for drawing the salmon-nets; but here—"

"Well," said he, smiling, "of course that is what they are for. Where there are salmon, there are likely to be salmon-nets, Tay or Thames; but of course they are not always in use; we don't want salmon every day of the season."

I was going to say, "But is this the Thames?" but held my peace in my wonder, and turned my bewildered eyes eastward to look at the bridge again, and thence to the shores of the London river; and surely there was enough to astonish me. For though there was a bridge across the stream and houses on its banks, how all was changed from last night! The soap-works with their smoke-vomiting chimneys were gone; the engineer's works gone; the lead-works gone; and no sound of riveting and hammering came down the west wind from Thorney-croft's. Then the bridge! I had perhaps dreamed of such a bridge, but never seen such an one out of an illuminated manuscript; for not even the Ponte Vecchio at Florence came anywhere near it. It was of stone arches, splendidly solid, and as graceful as they were strong; high enough also to let ordinary river traffic through easily. Over the parapet showed quaint and fanciful little buildings, which I supposed to be booths or shops, beset with painted and gilded vanes and spirelets. The stone was a little weathered, but showed no marks of the grimy sootiness which I was used to on every London building more than a year old. In short, to me a wonder of a bridge.

The sculler noted my eager astonished look, and said, as if in answer to my thoughts—

"Yes, it is a pretty bridge, isn't it? Even the up-stream bridges, which are so much smaller, are scarcely daintier, and the down-stream ones are scarcely more dignified and stately."

I found myself saying, almost against my will, "How old is it?"

"Oh, not very old," he said; "it was built, or at least opened, in 1971."

The date shut my mouth as if a key had been turned in a padlock fixed to my lips; for I saw that something inexplicable had happened, and that if I said much I should be mixed up in a game of cross questions and crooked answers. So I tried to look unconcerned, and to glance in a matter-of-course way at the banks of the river, though this is what I saw up to the bridge and a little beyond, say as far as the site of the soap-works. Both shores had a line of very pretty houses, low and not large, standing back a little way from the river; they were mostly built of red brick and roofed with tiles, and looked, above all, comfortable and as if they were, so to say, alive, and sympathetic with the life of the dwellers in them. There was a continuous garden in front of them, going down to the water's edge, in which the flowers were now blooming luxuriantly, and sending delicious waves of summer scent over the eddying stream. Behind the houses, I could see great trees rising, mostly planes, and looking down the water there were the reaches towards Putney almost as if they were a lake with a forest shore, so thick were the big trees; and I said aloud, but as if to myself—

"Well, I'm glad that they have not built over Barn Elms."

I blushed for my fatuity as the words slipped out of my mouth, and my companion looked at me with a half smile which I thought I understood; so to hide my confusion I said, "Please take me ashore now: I want to get my breakfast."

He nodded, and brought her head round with a sharp stroke, and in a trice we were at the landing-stage again. He jumped out and I followed him; and of course I was not surprised to see him wait, as if for the inevitable after-piece that follows the doing of a service to a fellow-citizen. So I put my hand into my waistcoat-pocket, and said, "How much?" though still with the uncomfortable feeling that perhaps I was offering money to a gentleman.

He looked puzzled, and said, "How much? I don't quite understand what you are asking about. Do you mean the tide? If so, it is close on the turn now."

I blushed, and said, stammering, "Please don't take it amiss if I ask you; I mean no offence: but what ought I to pay you? You see I am a stranger, and don't know your customs—or your coins?"

And therewith I took a handful of money out of my pocket, as one does in a foreign country. And by the way, I saw that the silver had oxydised, was like a blackleaded stove in colour.

He still seemed puzzled, but not at all offended; and he looked at the coins with some curiosity. I thought, Well after all, he is a waterman, and is considering what he may venture to take. He seems such a nice fellow that I'm sure I don't grudge him a little over-payment. I wonder, by the way, whether I couldn't hire him as a guide for a day or two, since he is so intelligent.

Therewith my new friend said thoughtfully:

"I think I know what you mean. You think that I have done you a service; so you feel yourself bound to give me something which I am not to give to a neighbour, unless he has done something special for me. I have heard of this kind of thing; but pardon me for saying that it seems to us a troublesome and roundabout custom; and we don't know how to manage it. And you see this ferrying and giving people casts about the water is my business, which I would do for anybody, so to take gifts in connection with it would look very queer. Besides, if one person gave me something, then another might, and another, and so on; and I hope you won't think me rude if I say that I shouldn't know where to stow away so many mementos of friendship."

And he laughed loud and merrily, as if the idea of being paid for his work was a very funny joke. I confess I began to be afraid that the man was mad, though he looked sane enough; and I was rather glad to think that I was a good swimmer, since we were so close to a deep swift stream. However, he went on by no means like a madman:

"As to your coins, they are curious, but not very old; they seem to be all of the reign of Victoria; you might give them to some scantily-furnished museum. Ours has enough of such coins, besides a fair number of earlier ones, many of which are beautiful, whereas these nineteenth century ones are so beastly ugly, ain't they? We have a piece of Edward III., with the king in a ship, and little leopards and fleurs-de-lys all along the gunwale, so delicately worked. You see," he said, with somewhat of a smirk, "I am fond of working in gold and fine metals; this buckle here is an early piece of mine."

No doubt I looked a little shy of him under the influence of that doubt as to his sanity. So he broke off short, and said in a kind voice:

"But I see that I am boring you, and I ask your pardon. For, not to mince matters, I can tell that you are a stranger, and must come from a place very unlike England. But also it is clear that it won't do to overdose you with information about this place, and that you had best suck it in little by little. Further, I should take it as very kind in you if you would allow me to be the showman of our new world to you, since you have stumbled on me first. Though indeed it will be a mere kindness on your part, for almost anybody would make as good a guide, and many much better."

There certainly seemed no flavour in him of Colney Hatch; and besides I thought I could easily shake him off if it turned out that he really was mad; so I said:

"It is a very kind offer, but it is difficult for me to accept it, unless——" I was going to say, Unless you will let me pay you properly; but fearing to stir up Colney Hatch again, I changed the sentence into, "I fear I shall be taking you away from your work—or your amusement."

"O," he said, "don't trouble about that, because it will give me an opportunity of doing a good turn to a friend of mine, who wants to take my work here. He is a weaver from Yorkshire, who has rather overdone himself between his weaving and his mathematics, both indoor work, you see; and being a great friend of mine, he naturally came to me to get him some outdoor work. If you think you can put up with me, pray take me as your guide."

He added presently: "It is true that I have promised to go up-stream for the hay-harvest; but they won't be ready for us for more than a week: and besides, you might go with me, you know, and see some very nice people, besides making notes of our ways in Oxfordshire. You could hardly do better if you want to see the country."

I felt myself obliged to thank him, whatever might come of it; and he added eagerly—

"Well, then, that's settled. I will give my friend a call; he is living in the Guest House like you, and if he isn't up yet, he ought to be this fine summer morning."

Therewith he took a little silver bugle-horn from his girdle and blew two or three sharp but agreeable notes on it; and presently from the house which stood on the site of my old dwelling (of which more hereafter) another young man came sauntering towards us. He was not so well-looking or so strong-built as my sculler friend, being sandy-haired, rather pale, and not stout-built; but his face was not wanting in that happy and friendly expression which I had noticed in his friend. As he came up smiling towards us, I saw with pleasure that I must give up the Colney Hatch theory as to the waterman, for no two madmen ever behaved as they did before a sane man. His dress also was of the same cut as the first man's, though somewhat gayer, the surcoat being light green with a golden spray embroidered on the breast, and his belt being of filagree silver-work.

He gave me good-day very civilly, and greeting his friend joyously, said—

"Well, Dick, what is it this morning? Am I to have my work, or rather your work? I dreamed last night that we were off up the river fishing."

"All right, Bob," said my sculler; "you will drop into my place, and if you find it too much, there is George Brightling on the look out for a stroke of work, and he lives close handy to you. But see, here is a stranger who is willing to amuse me to-day by taking me as his guide about our country, and you may imagine I don't want to lose the opportunity; so you had better take to the boat at once. But in any case I shouldn't have kept you out of it for long, since I am due in the hayfields in a few days."

The newcomer rubbed his hands with glee, but turning to me, said in a friendly voice:

"Neighbour, both you and friend Dick are lucky, and will have a good time to-day, as indeed I shall too. But you had better both come in with me at once and get something to eat, lest you should forget your dinner in your amusement. I suppose you came into the Guest House after I had gone to bed last night?"

I nodded, not caring to enter into a long explanation which would have led to nothing, and which in truth by this time I should have begun to doubt myself. And we all three turned toward the door of the Guest House.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

DRIVE THE RICH ROBBERS AWAY.

Tune—"Drive the cold Winter away."

Who'er has a mind to freedom inclined,
A soul above life in a ditch,
No longer he'll bow, but come with us now
To break down the power of the rich.
You know very well, the poor live in hell,
Where manhood and honour decay;
So join in our band, with heart and with hand,
To drive the rich robbers away.

The man who controls the bodies and souls
Of his fellows, because they are poor;
Who sweats all his wealth from woe and ill-health,
And steals all their pitiful store;
A wolf with man's face, he's a foe to his race,
The helpless and weak are his prey,
He never will mend until we make an end,
And drive the rich robbers away.

Not much do we get, however we sweat,
Our masters their profit must make;
And then for the rent, we must be content
The landlord shall some of it take.
The kids and the wife must scramble through life,
Be thankful to eat when they may,
Be often half-fed and go hungry to bed,
Till we drive the rich robbers away.

And don't be afraid of injuring trade,
To us it is always the same;
For bad trade or good, it is well understood
The worker must lose at the game.
The game is so played, and the rules of it made,
That the workers have always to pay;
And well do we know, it must ever be so
Till we drive the rich robbers away.

Though they can with pride in carriages ride,
While we go on foot in the mud,
It is we who provide; while, whatever betide,
We ne'er get enough of good food.
Indeed we deserve to suffer and starve
Until we no longer obey;—
Then rise like a man, and do all that you can,
To drive the rich robbers away.

AN GEALBHAN.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

GERMANY.

At Offenburg, a new Socialist paper is about to be published under the title of Frankfurter Volksstimme (The People's Voice of Frankfurt). At Munich, the Münchener Post (Dispatch of Munich) is to appear as a daily organ, under the editorship of Vollmar and Birk, two candidates to the Reichstag. At Dresden, the Sächsische Arbeiterzeitung (Saxon Worker's paper) appears now three times a week. At Erfurt the Thüringer Tribune is about to appear in a larger size, and at Magdeburg a new trades' paper, Wanderburschen (The Wandering Toiler), will shortly come into existence. As it seems, Bismark has not got it all his own way.

Two Anarchist pamphlets, entitled 'Arbeitslos' (Out of Work) and 'The 11th of November' (Chicago Commemoration), have been prohibited by the Berlin authorities.

Our comrade Bruno Reinsdorf, the brother of August Reinsdorf, who was beheaded four years ago for taking the principal part in the Niederwald attempt, has been arrested at Pegau, a small village of Saxony, on his return from New York, where he was working in the Freiheit's printing department. The reason given for his arrest is such a stupidly false one that we expect him to be set free almost immediately.

A most strange event has recently occurred at Carlsruhe. M. Guttstein, royal attorney at the supreme tribunal of the great duchy of Bade, has made a formal adhesion to the social democratic party! If it is true, methinks that this clever attorney shall not much longer sit on the bench.

BELGIUM.

One of the oldest forerunners of the social revolutionary movement in Belgium has just died at an hospital of Brussels: not an unusual reward for many who have given all their life and all their energies to the cause of the proletariat. Nicolas Coulon was born at Liège, in the year 1816. A tailor by profession, he was at the same time an exceedingly clever popular writer. It was Coulon who published the first paper in Belgium which was exclusively edited by working-men. He acted in the revolution of 1830 in Brussels, and in that of 1848 at Paris. In the last years of his life he became blind, and of course he died very poor. Coulon has taken a most prominent part in the various democratic and revolutionary movements of his own country and of France. He has always been, it can be truly asserted, the right man in the right place; and the Belgian Socialists will undoubtedly ever remember most kindly their old "père Coulon."

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

The Austrian Socialist press makes good headway, and this is all the more remarkable when we think that the political conditions under which our Austrian comrades have to live are far from being favourable to the development of Socialist journalism. There are no less than eight papers, which all are, we are glad to say, very well supported by the Austrian proletarians. They are: Sozialdemokratische Monatschrift (Socialdemocratic Monthly Review); Arbeiterzeitung (Worker's Gazette); Volkspress (People's Press); Fachblatt für Drechsler (Turner's Trade Paper); Glühlichter (Glummers); Freigeist (Freethinker); Heslo, and Cervanky.

Again we ask the readers and sympathisers of the Weal to do all they can towards supporting their own paper. Surely English Socialists, if worth anything at all, can manage as well as their much more unfortunate brethren of Austria! Why, then, don't they do it?

SWITZERLAND.

Our comrades Nicolet, Darbellay, and Hänzi, who last summer placarded in various towns of Switzerland an Anarchist manifesto, have now been tried at the Court of Assize at Neuchatel and acquitted. Comrade Nicolet, for his defence, read out a piece of poetry directed against kings and potentates, and of a very much more revolutionary character than the manifesto complained of, and then declared to the astounded tribunal and members of the jury, that that piece of incendiary poetry had been written some time previous to his own leaflet by the very same attorney-general who now prosecuted himself and his friends. Hence a prompt and general acquittal!

RUSSIA.

A telegram from Moscow, via Vienna, says that Captain Tolotouchine, chief of the secret police, while making a descent upon a Nihilist club, was shot dead by a young woman named Olga Gontscharenko, who afterwards blew her own brains out rather than be arrested. Whilst we deeply deplore the death of the young combatant in the cause of liberty and justice, we cannot help sympathising with her in the prompt punishment of the police-hound's intrusion.

VICTOR DAVE.

IN AUSTRALIA.

MR. W. GRAHAME, member for Newcastle (N.S.W.), has lately gone insolvent, and had therefore to contest his seat over again. Mr. James Curley, the miners' general secretary, opposed him as a "labour candidate," and won after a "tough fight." Mr. Grahame is a believer in the restrictive policy; whilst Curley goes for free trade. This district is red-hot protectionist, and would have been all for boodler Grahame, had not the majority of the miners among the electors been in favour of their secretary. So far as can be seen, Curley has proved true and honest to the miners, both during strikes and in times of smoothness; rather too straight, in fact, for some of the big mine-owners over here. Many a time, no doubt, have they wished him out of office, and perhaps have done a great deal to prejudice many of the miners against him. This feeling has grown up in two or three districts since the last strike, in 1888, until at last, it almost seems, the feeling becoming more bitter, it has made him run for a chance at the legislative game; and the result is, that he has the honour (?) of taking a hand in the country's affairs. Whether he will act fair and square is a question as yet; he has to sit alongside some of the biggest rogues and scoundrels the earth has produced among the law-makers; and if they have not the magic power, while filling their own pockets with boodle without doing the least amount of work for it, to turn his assistance away from the workers and destroy those many true sentiments of his, it will be one of the greatest wonders of the age.

One large mine-owner was heard to say, when he heard that Curley had won the seat, "It's a good job; it's a good job," and stamped his foot on the ground with delight. This goes to show that one coal-monopolist at least was happy at partly getting one of their enemies into their clutches. It seems to prophesy that the miners can say "good-bye" to their man, who has worked earnestly for them for a period of nine years, and that now he is entering upon a road which leads to more slavery and monopoly.

The Victorian authorities have taken steps to close the wharf at Melbourne, so as to keep away the speakers who have been addressing the people there on Sundays. This goes hard against the Anarchists and Socialists, as it is their chief place of resort for propaganda work. To show that they mean business and keep up a pretence of impartiality, the authorities have come down upon a teetotal orator who made his stand upon the wharf, and fined him £5 or seven days in the "House of Correction." Upon this a meeting was held, and a very large crowd, numbering 2,000, gathered together to discuss the action taken by the Government. The meeting "firmly maintained" their right of meeting on the wharf, and have resolved to try and get public support in carrying on meetings there.

After finishing the business of the wharf affair, the opening of the public library and other institutions on Sundays was then discussed. The 2,000 strong then paraded the streets in the vicinity of the library, and before the gates of the latter institution they strongly asserted that such a place should be opened on Sundays.

The bill brought forward in the Victorian Legislative Assembly for the suppression of Sunday newspaper selling, has passed its second reading. The tyrannical law-makers of Victoria are gradually developing, and making stronger the restrictive laws of that so-called "protective" colony. We have not come to that exactly in New South Wales yet, but, who knows?

A strike recently occurred at Broken Hill, N.S.W., where about 2,500 miners refused to work with non-unionists. The strike only lasted about a week, when the miners (unionists) partly gave way and resumed work again.

The men that work on the top of Greta Pit (N.S.W.) have come out on strike, the cause being that they wish only to work eight hours per day, as the men do below the surface. Different unions are preparing to give help to the strikers, who fear a long struggle.

The unemployed army is rather large up in Brisbane, and deputations are seeking the presence of the "law-makers" often, to see what can be done towards keeping the people from dying of starvation.

The latest news interesting to Socialists comes from Melbourne, and excerpted from the Evening News (Sydney), Nov. 21, 1889:—

"An organised demonstration of Socialists paraded up Bourke Street last evening, with the intention of invading Parliament House to see Dr. Maloney, the member for West Melbourne, whose sympathies are known to be with them on the point that the public libraries should be open on Sundays. There were some hundreds of them. The police got wind of the project, and a posse of constables were summoned from Russell Street barracks and pursued the crowd up the street. Seeing that they were pursued the Socialists ran to gain the entrance to Parliament House first, but half-a-dozen constables reached the steps first, and forming themselves in a line blocked the crowd, some of whom were very excited. There was some wrangling but no violence, and several names were taken."

HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON!

THE COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

retired, and another man of the party, Avellaneda, took his place and was proclaimed President.

Since then I have witnessed many elections, and can state without the least fear of contradiction that they have all been an utter farce, the party having the control in each district, or partido, sending in any returns they chose in utter disregard of the truth. The board of scrutineers is nominated ostensibly from both competing parties, but the ballot box is delivered up to the municipality, who arrange the matter as they choose. I have seen an election, a few years ago, where not more than a dozen men voted on both sides, and the government returns published in the papers counted them by hundreds! The President of the municipality treated the matter in my presence as a good joke, and laughed heartily when telling me how that and other like things were done. He was one of those thorough fellows who saw and did not hesitate to say that the whole thing was a farce, and as a farce he treated it. He saw plainly the utter worthlessness of the peon's vote, who knows nothing and cares nothing about either political party, but who is compelled to vote by his patron or the master who employs him in order to save his family from want. The vote of the peon places great power in the hands of the large holders of land in each district, and would make them almighty if fraud and violence were not used as some check upon them.

Here you have an instance of the omnipotence of economic causes on men's conduct, and their influence even on their ideas of morality. I remember once expostulating with one of the principal men in the town of Navarro, when Moreira was in charge there, and he strenuously defended the policy or conduct of his party in employing him. He said, "The Government party employ their assassins, having let them out of the jails for the purpose, and we have a perfect right to do the same when we can." The economic conditions are, as I have said, responsible for all that I have described, namely, the slavish condition of the peons, and their submission to so much oppression, the existence of such men as Moreira, and in general for the complete failure of political institutions, thoroughly free in principle as they are in the Republic, to make poor men free while such conditions exist.

In the Argentine Republic, as I believe in all Spanish America, complete monopoly of the land has been maintained ever since its first settlement. The land was conceded or sold to government favourites or rich men, and in enormous tracts of ten, twenty, and a hundred leagues. Rivadavia, the most capable of the founders of the Republic, endeavoured indeed to put a stop to it, and for a few years while he was governor of Buenos Ayres, public lands were rented and not sold. But he was expelled, and the old system returned. This system of land monopoly is the cause, I maintain, of the whole social and political institutions of the people, their habits and customs, and manner of life. Being granted in such large areas to each owner, and no provision having been made, as in the United States, for the poor settler, who could thus emancipate himself from the slavery of peonage, the workers have been kept strictly in dependence on the owners of the land. For the same reason the industry of the country has necessarily been confined to cattle-raising. Within the last few years, since it can be done on a large scale by machinery, agriculture has received some impulse, being carried on for exportation; but this cannot last long nor go very far, the chief industry is, and will be for a long time, cattle-raising. For the same reason of land monopoly the population has been restricted, this immense country having only now about four millions of inhabitants. Then, the complete dependence of the workers on the owners of the land has been the cause, in a country so sparsely settled, of the frequent attempts at civil war which they call revolutions. Whenever the party in opposition to the Government found itself strong enough, that is to say having in its ranks enough of large landholders, it knew that it could count upon enough men to make serious opposition to the Government in the field, and if not to get all, at least to get some part of the spoils of office.

They then, as we saw in 1874, declared, as was always true, that they were defrauded of their right of suffrage, and that there was no other remedy but to appeal to arms. Every man then called on his peons to follow him to the field, in the same way as they followed him to the polls. Every peon had a horse and equipments, a cane with a knife or shears on top, and provided with a lance. There was plenty of cattle to be found everywhere, on the lands of their opponents particularly, and meat with a little yerba, the tea of the country, is all the native peon requires. As a rule they knew nothing whatever of the cause of the quarrel, but they went nothing loth, for it was a jolly time of freedom and excitement, and each man having provided himself with a good horse was determined not to be the last in retreat whatever he might be in the advance. The fighting was generally very trifling, and for the reason I have mentioned, that the peon very properly did not care to risk his life for his masters.

In the year 1880, the authorities of the Province of Buenos Ayres took up arms against the Federal Government, and called out the militia or national guards. They collected over fifteen thousand men together, who were surprised one morning by a detachment of regular troops, about a thousand men and two guns, and at the first shot the whole fifteen thousand cleared for home—very properly, too.

I think I have said enough to explain the existence of such men as Moreira. Naturally, the authorities in each district were the creatures of the government and the landowners, and so the unfortunate Gaucho who incurred their displeasure was dragged off to the frontier, or in a thousand other ways rendered miserable, until finally, provoked beyond all endurance, or, after returning from the frontier to find his home

THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC AND ENGLISH RADICAL REFORMERS.

HOWEVER, the Government party was too strong, and the Mitristas were miserably defeated; but not before there was one small fight, in which soldiers of the line took part on both sides and several poor fellows were killed. General Mitre was taken prisoner a few days after, and all was over. Then, to smoothe matters somewhat and to show clearly what a farce all their voting was, Doctor Alsina, who, according to the returns cooked up by the Government, was elected, broken up, and his wife, or companion (for the same vile system prevented them from marrying) living with another, then a man of spirit turned out at war with society. He levied blackmail everywhere he went, and was dependent on no man's will or pleasure. Such men were looked upon by their fellows as heroes, and not alone by their fellows, for they have found a poet (Fernandez), who in such poems as "Martin Fierro" has sung their sorrows, their trials, and their virtues; and a romance writer, Dr. Eduardo Gutierrez, not the least interesting of whose romances is the life of our acquaintance, Juan Moreira. Poor Juan! His life paid the penalty of his services to his masters, while the men who employed him continued to live as honoured and honourable citizens.

Under the circumstances I have related, the possession of the vote was really a great disadvantage, and the foreigner who could not be called upon to vote was in a most advantageous position. I have often laughed when reading comments in English and North American papers about the Irishman's love of politics, and wondered what they would think if they were told that there existed a country where no inducement could be found to bring an Irishman to the polls, and not alone that, but where he did all in his power to prevent his children born in the country from becoming possessed of the right of suffrage. The foreigner was unmolested in his home; not having a vote he incurred no hatred at election times, and for him there was no frontier nor any prosecution from the authorities whom he had voted against or failed to vote for. The consequence was that while the poor native remained poor, the foreigner could easily make an independence and even a fortune by steady industry. But this advantage, which was due to economic causes, the ignorant foreigner ascribed to some race superiority, and the rich native as a rule admitted it! Even in such newspapers as the Nacion, of Buenos Ayres, which belongs to and is edited by a man that should know better, I have frequently seen comparisons made between foreigners and native workers unfavourable to the latter, on the ground that they were lazy! Nothing could exceed their enthusiastic praise of the industrious Irishman, and when I mentioned the fact that in Ireland I had heard poor Irishmen continually accused of laziness by their rich masters the landlords, they would not believe I was speaking the truth.

It may perhaps be said that things have changed in the last few years, and that now there is no contingent required for the frontier, etc. My answer is that whatever change has been made such as this, has followed from economic changes which preceded it; and, that if the hold of the masters has relaxed on one side it has tightened on the other; so that I can prove if need be that the condition of the peon is in many respects much worse to-day than it was when the vile frontier service was at hand as a ready instrument of oppression. Than of the Argentine Republic, there never was a country of which it can be more truly said, "Laws grind the poor and rich men rule the law," in spite of all its Free Constitution, Universal Suffrage, Home Rule, Free Land, Free Education, and all the rest which the English Radical is trying to humbug the people into accepting as panaceas for all the social ills. In more primitive countries, like the Argentine Republic, the truth is more easily seen that economic causes really determine all the social and political life of a people.

CORRESPONDENCE.

May I correct a statement which appears in the Commonweal of Jan. 11, to the effect that "William Lloyd Garrison, the great Abolitionist, has declared himself on the side of the Single-tax and Socialism"? This evidently refers to the son of the late William Lloyd Garrison, the Abolitionist (who died in 1879), William Lloyd Garrison, jun., who is a strong supporter of the "Single-tax" scheme, but is nevertheless an Individualist and not a Socialist.—Yours truly,

TAKE HEED.

TAKE heed of your Civilisation, ye, on your pyramids built of quivering hearts; There are stages like Paris in '93 where the commonest men play terrible parts. Your statutes may crush, but they cannot kill the patient sense of a natural right; It may slowly move, but the people's will, like the ocean o'er Holland, is always in sight. "Tis not our fault!" say the rich ones. No; 'tis the fault of a system old and strong; But men are the makers of systems: so, the cure will come, if we own the wrong.

IN PARIS.

THE Parisian Municipal Council is, without doubt, the most advanced corporation in Europe. I have always had a high opinion of these city fathers, who vote thousands of francs for slaves on strike, give a Bourse du Travail to the people, etc., etc. It is certain that many people consider it a revolutionary body, and I have heard many Socialists here express that opinion. This was a puzzle to me. I knew that most of the eighty councillors were of the cursed capitalist class, and therefore must naturally oppose such resolutions. This point exercised me so much that I made up my mind to settle it by seeing them at—rest: I was going to say "at work"!

On the 27th of December, 1889, at 2 o'clock sharp, I was in my place, just above the tribune, where I could have a splendid sight of the House at large. At half-past two about half-a-dozen councillors enter the House, and a few minutes afterwards two or three more stroll in; when the huissier announces "Le President du Conseil!" in a stentorian voice, and with as much bombast as if it were Don Pedro of Brazil.

The sitting opens with nine lazy fellows present, no quorum being necessary, it seems: of these nine, two are so-called workmen. They have assembled to consider and vote upon the Budget for 1890.

The President, M. Rousselle, rings the bell, and the rapporteur mounts on the tribune and begins to read his articles, resolutions, and amendments, whilst the city fathers, who now number twelve, are chaffing with one another, reading or writing private letters. Then the President shouts, "Pas d'oppositions? accepté!" "Pas de réclamations, messieurs? accepté!"

A greater farce I never saw in my life!

By this time, 4 o'clock, twenty councillors were there: twenty out of eighty to vote on so important a matter as the Budget for the coming year! All seemed pleased to see it roll by so easily. Who will pay?—that's the least of their concern. They have each of them 6,000 francs a-year, whether they attend or not, and that's the only thing they care about. Although I do not believe very much in councillor Vaillant's workmanship, to do him justice I must say that he mounted the tribune to propose the absolute abolition of octrois in Paris,—a red herring, if you understand that better.

I see Joffrin coming; this makes twenty-one. Joffrin is one of the eleven Socialists or working-men in the House. Last week's Commonweal will tell you what kind of a card that is, if you don't know him already. He was once an engineer like John Burns, but has worn kid gloves and swagger cuffs for these twenty years past. Better for us if he wore handcuffs!

After the Budget they voted four million francs to buy the big buildings which were erected for the late exhibition. No opposition. Then thirty thousand francs for the poor children's new year. Here the Prefet de la Seine begs leave to read a letter. Everyone looks at the scoundrel, who, with a hypocritical smile, reads out that the arch-robbler Rothschild gives a hundred thousand francs to the poor of Paris. Here I was sure that I should see one of our so-called Socialists jump to his feet, and propose an amendment to the effect, that they were willing to accept it as a restitution of a small part of the money which he had already robbed from the poor; but no! all were asleep; and when the President called out, "Pas d'opposition? accepté," they even seemed to snore!

This was a good occasion for our "workmen representatives" to give that pre-eminent rascal a slap in the face, and let the capitalists who were present accept charity from their chief banker if they liked; the poor would not have lost a farthing by it. But what can you expect from men who get 6,000 francs a-year, and have some of them been re-elected again and again these twenty years? They look as much like a working-man as I look like a pope; they are spoiled by contact and association with the vermin among whom they mix, and whom they gradually come to resemble.

I was under the impression that a Socialist would treat a capitalist inside the House with the same contempt as he did on a public platform. I was mistaken; for I have seen councillors Lavy and Joffrin shake hands cordially with the Prefet de la Seine as they were passing by. These two fellows belong to the Possibilist party. The sight was too much for me; it put me into such a state that I had to leave the place abruptly, never to return there any more.

To resume, let me say that it may happen that one of our friends proposes a good resolution. He will do this at the beginning of the sitting, when very few capitalists are present; and the fact that such a resolution has passed does not at all imply that the Municipal Council of Paris are revolutionnaires, but only means that they are a damned rotten, lazy gang of good-for-nothings.

Public meetings are being held every week in different parts of Paris, in view of a general strike on the 1st of May next. Things have arrived at such a pitch that every sufferer thinks something must be done without delay. Never was society so clearly divided into two camps. Never have the non-producers more contemptuously flung their charity, as they call it, to the honest toiler, as if they threw a bone to a hungry dog. Nor has ever the toiler, that produces all, felt more hatred for those drones that live at his expense.

The speakers think a general strike would be salvation (material, be it understood). No blood need be shed, or little; only to keep our arms folded for three or four days; no necessity to build barricades; the army will be struck powerless, for the army could not march against people staying at home. The tremendous outburst of the starving men who voted for the resolution, without opposition, made me think it would be very hard to keep those dashing revolutionary arms folded during four days: it would be easier to take them to the "Elysée" au son de la Carmagnole.

Well-paid deputies and councillors do not look on this movement with favour. So much the worse for them; so much the better for us. It will show us once more that the vote is a scabbard, the sword of which is in the hands of the elected.

Paris, 12th January.

A. COULON.

THE PRINTING TRADE IN AMERICA.—An American exchange says: "Multitudes of English compositors and pressmen are still coming over, although work is dull, and they have hardly enough to pay for a day's expenses after reaching here. Many English societies of printers, or, as we should call them here, unions, have emigration funds. When work is slack in England the printer can get enough for a voyage to America, and the society washes its hands of him. English typographical journals will do well to note that, except for very superior workmen, the United States now presents no inviting field. Owing to the ease with which a boy can become a sort of a journeyman, not averaging much more than three years, the trade is crowded." We trust due notice will be taken of the fact here spoken of by any of our readers contemplating a trip to the States in search of work.—Printing Times and Lithographer.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Gas-stokers' Strike.

On Tuesday, Jan. 7th, the police had another opportunity of showing their hostility to the strikers. They were employed in evicting the strike committee, a job which they naturally took to very kindly. It appears the committee at the beginning of the strike had bought out the tenant of the premises which they occupied, and which faces the gas company's chief works in the Old Kent Road. Mr. Livesey didn't like to see the enemy at his gates, and there can be very little doubt that he did his utmost to get the committee turned out. This the landlord of the premises was only too willing to do; so on the pretext that the old tenant had no power to sublet, the police were sent down to evict the committee. But the committee had got wind of what was coming, and when a body of thirty police arrived they found the place strongly barricaded. It was only by dragging down the shop shutters and breaking the windows that the guardians of law-'n'-order were able to obtain admittance. The committee then abandoned the premises before the overwhelming force brought against them, and their property, consisting of furniture, books, papers, and musical instruments, was thrown into the street. The police acted in the most autocratic fashion, and refused to show any warrant for their extraordinary proceedings. We are becoming used to this sort of thing, and at the rate we are progressing we shall look upon police despotism as a regular institution. The committee after its eviction, found shelter in a neighbouring coffee house.

The following notice was afterwards displayed in the window: "The Battering Ram Brigade in London. Eviction of the Gas Worker's Strike Committee by the police. In consequence of the above, the Central Strike Committee Rooms is removed to 67, Old Kent Road; January 7, 1890."

Mr. Livesey has at last had to admit that matters are not going so well with him as he would like the public to believe. He informed a reporter last week that since the withdrawal of the gratuity a good number of the "new hands" had left the works. It is not surprising under these circumstances to hear that complaints as to the supply of gas continue to be made, and several vestries are threatening to summon Mr. Livesey. The men, on their side, will fight to the bitter end, and if necessary are determined to have a general strike throughout the whole of the coal industry in London. On Saturday Jan. 11th a large meeting of delegates from London trade unions was held at the Great Assembly Hall, Mile-end Road, at which resolutions were carried urging the trade unions to support the gas-stokers in their struggle for liberty and independence, and also calling upon the labour members in the House of Commons to move an amendment to the Address drawing attention to the treatment the gas-stokers have received from the police authorities. The demonstrations held on Sunday were very enthusiastic, and it was evident that the meeting of trade-union delegates on Saturday night had filled the men with courage to continue the struggle. They have already received £100 from the Engineers, and there can be no doubt that other unions will soon follow the example of the first trade-union in England.

Strike of Tea-warehousemen.

The men at Cutler Street Tea Warehouses came out on strike on Thursday Jan. 9. It appears that a blackleg had refused to pay 10s. 6d. entrance-fee imposed by the union upon those who had been at work during the strike. As this man was still kept on by the company, the men refused to work with him. On Friday there was a conference between representatives of Ship Owners and Brokers' Association and the Dock Labourers' Union, and it was agreed that the blackleg was to pay up his union subscriptions, amounting in all to 12s. 6d., and the Labourers' Union should consider his claim to a rebate of 2s. 6d., which he alleged he had been overcharged. The men returned to work on Saturday.

The Lock-out at Bristol.

The lock-out at Bristol in the boot and shoe trade is now ended. It was decided on Saturday January 11 by a joint committee of manufacturers and workmen, with Mr. Mansfield of Leicester as referee, that the classification was now so far advanced on satisfactory terms that manufacturers would employ their clickers, machinists, and rough stuff cutters on Monday, and the rest of the workpeople, with the rounders and finishers, were to resume work in the early part of the week.

Miners' Conference at Birmingham.

The miners will hold a conference at Birmingham on Wednesday Jan. 22. Prominent among the claims on the programme is that of an Eight Hours Bill. This means that the miners have been forced to give up the notion of gaining an eight hours labour day by means of a general strike. They have been forced into this by the action of the South Wales men, who have always lagged behind, and who on this occasion have refused to take part in the national movement. We fear, however, that the Bill will be defeated, for, as the miners' organ, the Labour Tribune, points out, "with the present heavy demand for coal, anything in the shape of legislative restriction of output will be bitterly opposed in the House." But still, as the same paper remarks, the legislative failure will probably teach the men a useful lesson, so that they will close their ranks in future, and there will be a better chance of obtaining eight hours by national combination. Men often learn the way to victory by past mistakes, and it may be so in the present instance.

The North-Eastern Railway Men.

It seems not improbable that there will soon be serious trouble upon this line. The railwaymen there are well organised and have plenty of backbone. On Sunday Jan. 5th a deputation waited upon the directors from the men to demand the ten hours working day. They were not met at once with a direct refusal, but with a number of petty objections. For instance, one of the directors, Mr. Dale, cited the instance of a roadside-station porter, who was on duty fifteen hours a-day, during which time there might be several intervals of rest, when the man was not actively engaged, and surely the men would not undertake to bring forward such a case as that on the basis of ten hours a-day. The deputation, however, stuck to their demands. They did not see how a man could enjoy his "leisure" very much while cooped up within the narrow limits of a country railway station for fifteen hours, even if he was not hard at work all the time. Most people would consider that kind of monotonous imprisonment as rather worse than steady work. One of the most active of the directors in opposing the demands of the men was Sir J. W. Pease, a Liberal M.P. who owes his seat largely to the votes of working-men. But as Mr. Foreman, one of the deputation, stated, Sir Joseph the director is a somewhat different person to Sir Joseph the candidate for parliamentary honours. The candidate was all smiles and affability, but the director is all frowns and severity when his men demand a reduction of their hours. The directors have now refused to comply with the men's demands. The discontent of the men is great, and many of them are thinking seriously of striking. It will probably not be long before some decisive action is taken.

"WHEN MEN PRAISE YE!"

It is the fashion just now, and has been for some time, says the Journal of United Labour, for the capitalistic press to say that labour organisations are all right if only they will content themselves with mild requests for higher wages, shorter hours, and slightly improved conditions, and provided that they carefully word these requests so as not to make them offensive to capital. It also being understood that in case their requests be refused, that is to end the matter. The press does not exactly phrase it thus, but this is the meaning of it all.

Suppose, now, that the workers should organise in this way, and suppose that the employers, moved by their neatly and mildly phrased petitions for better pay, etc., should generously grant their prayers—which is supposing a good deal—how much better off would the workers be in a year or so? While coal rings, railway pools, and the whole swarm of trusts and monopolies exist, how are such ineffectual and impotent labour organisations to keep them from getting all but the bare living which they now allow the producers of the wealth they exploit?

No doubt the journalistic Hessians of the devouring class are best serving the interest of those who pay their mercenary pens, by endeavouring to keep the workers from realising that the true cause of their poverty lies beyond and is independent of the relations which exist between employers and employed. Beyond all doubt the spoilers would be pleased to have the wealth-producers spend all their energies in fighting their employers about wages and hours of labour, and give no thought to the existence of the legalised system of plunder by which employed labour and employed capital is robbed for their benefit. In fights of that kind their interest can hardly rise above a listless curiosity—something resembling that taken by the bee-keeper in the annual struggle between the drones and the workers. But the workers are beginning to understand the true inwardness of things. They are coming to understand that if they would secure any permanent betterment of their condition they must organise themselves for the defeat and overthrow of those in whose interests the unjust laws are passed and for whose benefit the iniquitous systems exist.

The review of the 'Fabian Essays in Socialism' is held over till next week through the pressure on our space, caused by having two continued articles in one number. The book is one to be read, anyhow, in spite of its defects. It may be obtained from 'Weal' office, post free, at published price, 6s.; usual terms to branches.

"Rebels in Cork are patriots in Madrid," wrote Moore, but now the same men who in England recognise the right of Irish tenants to combine to wrest from the landlords a fairer share of the results of their labour would fain deny the right of the English working-man to combine to force from their employers a fairer share of the products of their labour. Be he Home Ruler, Unionist, or Tory, the English manufacturer believes in the divine right of capital to despoil labour. But, without a very powerful glass, the same kind of employers can be discovered here in America. Their hearts bleed for the wrongs of the Irish tenant, but they have no bowels of compassion for the worse-off American miner. They

"Du believe in Freedom's cause Ez fur away as Paris is";

but that cause, sacred abroad, is vile sedition and causeless discontent at home. Long-sightedness is a disease which the oppressors of men have always had in all countries.—Journal of United Labour.

To Help the Paper.—There are several ways in which you can help to spread the 'Weal'. Ask your newsagent to try and sell it. Get those who don't care to buy it week by week to subscribe direct. Arrange for the posting of contents bills anywhere you can. Any number of other plans will suggest themselves if you think about it.

Postal Propaganda.—Some who would like to do propaganda but dare not openly, or who cannot spare the time to do it personally, can find many ways in which it can be done quietly. Not the least useful among possible plans would be to order and pay for a number of copies to be sent to persons in whose hands they might do good. We will send six copies to six different addresses for 7d. Write the names and addresses legibly.

DO YOU AGREE?

Do you agree with us that the social awakening of the workers is a desirable end? Do you agree with us that we are working in the right way to achieve that end?

You do not? Then oppose us and prove us wrong on every platform and in every paper to which you can gain access!

You do agree? Then work with us and for us; help us to extend our circle of influence; let no day pass in which you have not interested some one in our propaganda!

There is no middle course for an honest man!

Collected at Council meeting, Jan. 13th, 6s.

"COMMONWEAL" GUARANTEE FUND.

The following further sums have been received towards this fund:—Webb, 1s.; H. R., 1s.; J. B. G., 1s.; J. Thomson, 6d.; E. Warlow, 5s.; Mrs. Schack, 5s.; F. Kitz, 6d.; D. Nicoll, 6d.; B. W., 6d.; and A. J. Smith, 1s.

REPORTS.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—Sunday evening, Jan. 12, comrade Frye delivered an interesting address on "A Sketch of Underground Russia;" the subject-matter being taken from Stepiak's "Underground Russia." Good discussion followed. Collected 1s. 4d.

NORTH LONDON.—Good meeting at Hyde Park, addressed by Cantwell, Mowbray, and Hall. Good sale of Commonweal, and 2s. 9d. collected.

ABERDEEN.—At weekly meeting on 6th, Leatham lectured on "The New Sociology."—L.

GLASGOW.—On Tuesday night Joe Burgoyne and Gilbert spoke on Cathedral Square; towards the conclusion of the meeting our comrades were subjected to a good deal of interruption and annoyance by a number of thoughtless youths. On Wednesday evening Glasier gave a lecture on "Socialism and the Reward of Genius" to the Maxwell Parish Church Literary Society. On Sunday afternoon Glasier lectured on "Socialism" to the Partick Branch of the Irish National League; the lecture was very favourably received. At 5.30 Joe Burgoyne and Gilbert spoke to a good audience at Paisley Road Toll. At 8.30 Glasier lectured to the Henry George Institute on "Socialism and the Single Tax"; our comrade's severe criticism of Henry George's theory was keenly combatted by several of the members, but it appeared to win the approval of quite the majority of the audience.

LEEDS.—On Sunday morning a good meeting was held in Vicar's Croft; Rogers spoke. At night, at the Socialist League Club, T. Maguire lectured on "John Morley" to an attentive audience; discussion followed. Commonweal sold out, also half a quire of Freedom, and other literature.

MANCHESTER.—Three lectures on "The Beginnings of Modern Socialism" were given by an Oxford Extension lecturer at Islington Hall, at which a number of our members attended and took the opportunity which the after discussion afforded to explain the principles of revolutionary Socialism and upset the lecturer's economic fallacies and criticisms of Socialism. On Sunday in Stevenson Square good meeting addressed by Barton, Bailie, Stockton, and Parkinson. Two quires of Commonweal sold.

YARMOUTH.—On Sunday comrades Ruffold and Headley distributed a large bundle of back numbers of Commonweal and leaflets in the morning, and held a meeting on Colman's Granary Quay in the evening; there was a large audience, and fair sale of Commonweal.—J. H.

DUBLIN.—At Progressist Club, 87 Marlboro' Street, Jan. 11th, R. F. Wilson delivered an address on "Capitalism"; very good discussion, Regan, Hamilton, Fitzpatrick, and Kavanagh taking part.

EDINBURGH (SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION).—Comrade Hamilton lectured on "The Spirit of the Age" to a large audience on Sunday night in the Moulders' Hall; good discussion. Our Annual Soiree, Concert, and Dance is to be held on January 24th, and we hope members will endeavour to push the sale of tickets and make the affair a success.

PLEASE TAKE NOTE!

How is it that the Commonweal does not publish more news from the Branches? Because the editor is not omniscient, and the local secretaries forget that he depends upon them for news. Hint: Let us know what you're doing.

How is it that not all that is sent is inserted? Because branch secretaries forget that the editor has less than a thousand hands, and often mix things so that it would mean entirely re-writing their letters before they could be of use. Hint: Keep reports separate from announcements, and news from both. Write briefly, plainly, and on one side of the paper.

Motto: "Hear the other side."

THIS Journal advocates Personal Sovereignty in place of State Sovereignty, Voluntary Co-operation as opposed to Compulsory Co-operation, the Liberation of the human mind from Superstition, and the application of the principles of Ethics toward Social Regeneration.

But it is meant also to be a broad-minded, unsectarian meeting-place for the representatives of all schools of Religious and Economic thought. Orthodox and Liberal Christians, Spiritualists, Hebrews, Agnostics, Liberals, Infidels, Atheists, Freethinkers, and Secularists of every shade of opinion; Protectionists, Free-traders, Single-taxers, Nationalists, Socialists, and Anarchists, advocates of peaceful measures of social regeneration and revolutionists,—will all be welcomed to its columns with equal cordiality, fairness, and respect. STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto:

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

NOTES ON NEWS.

"THEY ordain the unjust to minister justice, and do injury to them that be just." Judges are, like policemen, the paid upholders of things as they are, eager to avenge any onslaught upon property or privilege. So that when Mr. Ernest Parke, editor of the North London Press, came before Mr. "Justice" Hawkins and was found "guilty" of libelling a lord, everybody knew that his punishment was not going to be a light one. For it is to be remembered that Mr. Parke was sub-editor of the Star, and honoured in that capacity with the fear and hatred of the class whom their servant Hawkins was defending. Whatever quarrel we may have had with the Star, or with Mr. Parke himself, for occasional unfairness to Socialism and Socialists, we can have nothing but praise for their part in forcing something more than mere politics upon public attention.

If Mr. Parke had been connected with any other paper than the Star—outside of declared Socialist journals—he would have been let off with a quarter of the penalty to which he has been condemned. This was the universal opinion among press-men when they heard the verdict. And that if he had been a Socialist writer the penalty would have been doubled several times over I am equally confident. I do not yet know what his colleagues of the Star intend to do in the matter, but I hope that they are going to do something, and that they will allow the Radicals and Socialists of London to help them in doing it.

In the early days of the League, a then comrade raised a laugh upon one occasion by declaring that "his mission in life was to smash the British Empire." He has since become an "extinct volcano," as a contributor to "a contemporary" signs himself, and has apparently neglected his mission for a long time past. But there are innumerable signs that although he is not likely to carry out his threat of smashing the British Empire, the British Empire is fully capable of smashing itself, and further, that it will perform the desirable operation at no very distant date.

Despite the smooth prophecies of the Imperial Federationists, and the loud shouting of the Jingo mob, there can be no doubt in the mind of anybody who watches at all closely the course of Australian affairs that the birth of the Australian Republic is drawing very near; so near that men are counting the possibilities of repression, and preparing for their Bunker Hill. As Chief Justice Lilley, of New South Wales, said the other day:

"In truth, Australian Independence is in the air and in the hearts of men, and although no man can foretell the hour of its birth, its advent sooner or later is sure."

It will be many a long year yet before Australia will satisfy a Socialist by its administration of public affairs; a republic with private property, it will be like France or the United States; but all the same, there will be few Socialists who will not rejoice when the—well! when the republican flag replaces the Union Jack.

Rather different will be the case of the South African Republic, which is also trembling on the verge of actuality; for, in that case the rebellion will be in defence of the right of "whacking their own nigger." Brutal as is the British treatment of all subject races, including their own working-classes, there is yet some restraint imposed by the English Government upon the cruelty of the Africanders towards the poor devils of natives whom they exploit. English or Dutch, Gentile or Jew, whatever the blood may be that runs in the exploiter's veins, it makes no perceptible difference in his attitude towards the "nigger." The white folk of South Africa are nearly as degraded in that respect as those of the Southern States of the Union are now, and would soon be as bad as those were before the war without any very great trouble.

After Australia and South Africa have departed—I don't know much about New Zealand—we may begin to expect the absorption of the West Indies by the United States. Canada, too, is not far off throwing in her lot with the States—and where will the Empire be then, poor thing? where will the Empire be then?

A Mr. Sidney J. Thomson wrote as follows to the Pall Mall Gazette the other day:

"Some weeks ago you published an article on the Aërated Bread Company, and mentioned that the average wage of the waitresses is 9s. a-week. I, as a holder of a few shares in the company, could not at first believe this statement; but subsequent inquiries confirm its truth. It seems to me monstrously unjust that a company earning a dividend equal to 25 per cent. should be satisfied to pay its servants so poorly. It must never be forgotten that every shareholder is himself an employer, and as such is, to the extent of his holding, responsible for the wages paid."

It is evident that he is not far from "finding salvation," and if he can only get his fellow shareholders to agree with him will have done some good in his day and generation.

Amid all the froth and splutter about Mr. Parnell as a co-respondent, there has been only one utterance on the subject which was characterised by anything like sense; and that was the letter of our old friend and foe, Mr. Auberon Herbert, which appeared in the Pall Mall the other night, and which we reprint elsewhere. But then Mr. Herbert is honest and fearless, while all others who have written or spoken on the subject, being politicians, are also "formalists, out of fear and base flattery . . . a rout of temporisers, ready to embrace and maintain all that is, or shall be proposed, in hope of preferment."

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. III.—THE GUEST HOUSE AND BREAKFAST THEREIN.

I LINGERED a little behind the others to have a stare at this house, which, as I have told you, stood on the site of my old dwelling.

It was a longish building with its gable ends turned away from the road, and long traceried windows coming rather low down set in the wall that faced us. It was very handsomely built of red brick with a lead roof; and high up above the windows there ran a frieze of figure-subjects in baked clay, very well executed, and designed with a force and directness which I had never noticed in modern work before. The subjects I recognised at once, and indeed was very particularly familiar with them.

However, all this I took in in a minute; for we were presently within doors, and standing in a hall with a floor of marble mosaic and an open timber roof. There were no windows on the side opposite to the river, but arches below leading into chambers, one of which showed a glimpse of a garden beyond, and above them a long space of wall gaily painted (in fresco, I thought) with similar subjects to those of the frieze outside: everything about the place was handsome and generously solid as to material; and though it was not very large (somewhat smaller than Crosby Hall perhaps), one felt in it that exhilarating sense of space and freedom which satisfactory architecture always gives to an unanxious man who is in the habit of using his eyes.

In this pleasant place, which of course I knew to be the hall of the Guest House, three young women were flitting to and fro. As they were the first of the sex I had seen on this eventful morning, I naturally looked at them very attentively, and found them at least as good as the gardens, the architecture, and the male men. As to their dress, which of course I took note of, I should say that they were decently veiled with drapery and not bundled up with millinery; that they were clothed like women, not upholstered like arm-chairs, as most women of our time are. In short, their dress was somewhat between that of the ancient classical costume and the simpler forms of the fourteenth century garments, though it was clearly not an imitation of either: the materials were light and gay to suit the season. As to the women themselves, it was pleasant indeed to see them; they were so kind and happy-looking in expression of face, so shapely and well-knit of body, and though they were healthy-looking and strong. All were at least comely, and one of them very handsome and regular of feature. They came up to us at once merrily and without the least affectation of shyness, and all three shook hands with me as if I were a friend newly come back from a long journey: though I could not help noticing that they looked askance at my garments; for I had on my clothes of last night, and at the best was never a dressy person.

A word or two from Robert the weaver, and they bustled about on our behalf, and presently came and took us by the hands and led us to a table in the pleasantest corner of the hall, where our breakfast was spread for us; and, as we sat down, one of them hurried out by the chambers aforesaid, and came back again in a little while with a great bunch of roses, very different in size and quality to what Hammersmith had been wont to grow, but very like the produce of an old country garden. She hurried back thence into the buttery, and came back once more with a delicately made glass, into which she put the flowers and set in the midst of our table. One of the others, who had run off also, then came back with a big cabbage-leaf filled with strawberries, some of them barely ripe, and said as she set them on the table, "There, now; I thought of that before I got up this morning; but looking at the stranger here getting into your boat, Dick, put it out of my head; so that I was not before all the blackbirds: however, there are a few about as good as you will get them anywhere in Hammersmith this morning."

Robert patted her on the head in a friendly manner; and we fell to on our breakfast, which was simple enough but most delicately cooked, and set on the table with much daintiness. The bread was particularly good, and was of several different kinds, from the big, rather close, dark-coloured, sweet-tasting farmhouse loaf, which was most to my liking, to the thin pipe-stems of wheaten crust, such as I have eaten in Turin.

As I was putting the first mouthfuls into my mouth, my eye caught a carved and gilded inscription on the panelling, behind what we should have called the High Table in an Oxford college hall, and a familiar name in it forced me to read it through. Thus it ran:

"Guests and neighbours, on the site of this Guest-hall once stood the lecture-room of the Hammersmith Branch of the Socialist League. Drink a glass to the memory! May 1962."

It is difficult to tell you how I felt as I read these words, and I suppose my face showed how much I was moved, for both my friends looked curiously at me, and there was silence between us for a little while.

Presently the weaver, who was scarcely so well-mannered a man as the ferryman, said to me rather awkwardly:

"Guest, we don't know what to call you: is there any indiscretion in asking you your name?"

"Well," said I, "I have some doubts about it myself; so suppose you call me Guest, which is a family name, you know, and add William to it if you please."

Dick nodded kindly to me; but a shade of anxiousness passed over the weaver's face, and he said—

"I hope you don't mind my asking, but would you tell me where you come from? I am curious about such things for good reasons, literary reasons."

Dick was clearly kicking him underneath the table; but he was not much abashed, and awaited my answer somewhat eagerly. As for me, I was just going to blurt out "Hammersmith," when I thought me what an entanglement of cross purposes that would lead us into; so I took time to invent a lie with circumstance, guarded by a little truth, and said—

"You see, I have been such a long time away from Europe that things seem strange to me now; but I was born and bred on the edge of Epping Forest—Walthamstow and Woodford, to wit."

"A pretty place, too," broke in Dick; "a very jolly place, now that the trees have had time to grow again since the great clearing of houses in 1955."

Quoth the irrepressible weaver: "Dear neighbour, since you knew the Forest some time ago, could you tell me what truth there is in the rumour that in the nineteenth century the trees were all pollards?"

This was catching me on my archaeological natural-history side, and I fell into the trap without any thought of where and when I was; so I began on it, while one of the girls who had been scattering little twigs of lavender and other sweet-smelling herbs about the floor, came near to listen, and stood behind me with her hand on my shoulder, in which she held some of the plant that I used to call balm: its strong sweet smell brought back to my mind my very early days in the kitchen-garden at Woodford, and the large blue plums which grew on the wall beyond the sweet-herb patch,—a connection of memories which all boys will see at once.

I started off: "When I was a boy, and for long after, except for a piece about Queen Elizabeth's Lodge, and for the part about High Beech, the Forest was almost wholly made up of pollard hornbeams mixed with holly thickets. But when the Corporation of London took it over about twenty-five years ago, the topping and lopping, which was a part of the old commoners' rights, came to an end, and the trees were let to grow. But I have not seen the place now for many years, except once when we Leaguers went a-pleasuring to High Beech. I was very much shocked then to see how it was built-over and altered; and the other day we heard that the philistines were going to landscape-garden it. But what you were saying about the building being stopped and the trees growing is only too good news;—only you know."

At that point I suddenly remembered Dick's date, and stopped short rather confused. The eager weaver didn't notice my confusion, but said hastily, as if he were almost aware of his breach of good manners, "But, I say, how old are you?"

Dick and the pretty girl both burst out laughing, as if Robert's conduct were excusable on the grounds of eccentricity; and Dick said amidst his laughter:

"Hold hard, Bob; this questioning of guests won't do. Why, much learning is spoiling you. You remind me of the radical cobblers in the silly old novels, who, according to the authors, were prepared to trample down all good manners in the pursuit of utilitarian knowledge. The fact is, I begin to think that you have so muddled your head with mathematics, and with grubbing into those idiotic old books about political economy (he he!), that you scarcely know how to behave. Really, it is about time for you to take to some open-air work, so that you may clear away the cobwebs from your brain."

The weaver only laughed good-humouredly; and the girl went up to him and patted his cheek and said laughingly, "Poor fellow! he was born so."

As for me, I was a little puzzled, but I laughed also, partly for company's sake, and partly with pleasure at their unanxious happiness and good temper; and before Robert could make the excuse to me which he was getting ready, I said:

"But neighbours" (I had caught up that word), "I don't in the least mind answering questions, when I can do so: ask me as many as you please; it's fun for me. I will tell you all about Epping Forest when I was a boy, if you please; and as to my age, I'm not a fine lady, you know, so why shouldn't I tell you? I'm hard on fifty-six."

In spite of the recent lecture on good manners, the weaver could not help giving a long "whew" of astonishment, and the others were so amused by his naïveté that the merriment flitted all over their faces, though for courtesy's sake they forbore actual laughter; while I looked from one to the other in a puzzled manner, and at last said:

"Tell me, please, what is amiss: you know I want to learn from you. And please laugh; only tell me."

Well, they did laugh, and I joined them again, for the above-stated reasons. But at last the pretty woman said coaxingly—

"Well, well, he is rude, poor fellow! but you see I may as well tell you what he is thinking about: he means that you look rather old for your age. But surely there need be no wonder in that, since you have been travelling; and clearly from all you have been saying, in unsocial countries. It has often been said, and no doubt truly, that one ages very quickly if one lives amongst unhappy people. Also they say that southern England is a good place for keeping good looks." She blushed and said: "How old am I, do you think?"

"Well," quoth I, "I have always been told that a woman is as old as she looks, so without offence or flattery, I should say you were twenty."

She laughed merrily, and said, "I am well served out for fishing for compliments, since I have to tell you the truth, to wit, that I am forty-two."

I stared at her, and drew musical laughter from her again; but I might well stare, for there was not a careful line on her face; her skin was as smooth as ivory, her cheeks full and round, her lips as red as the roses she had brought in; her beautiful arms, which she had bared for her work, firm and well-knit from shoulder to wrist. She blushed a little under my gaze, though it was clear that she had taken me for a man of eighty; so to pass it off, I said—

"Well, you see, the old saw is proved right again, and I ought not to have let you tempt me into asking you a rude question."

She laughed again, and said: "Well, lads, old and young, I must get to my work now. We shall be rather busy here presently; and I want to clear it off soon, for I began to read a pretty old book yesterday, and I want to get on with it this morning: so good-bye for the present."

She waved a hand to us, and stepped lightly down the hall, taking (as Scott says) at least part of the sun from our table as she went.

When she was gone, Dick said: "Now, guest; won't you ask a question or two of our friend here? It is only fair that you should have your turn."

"I shall be very glad to answer them," said the weaver.

"If I ask you any questions, sir," said I, "they will not be very severe; but since I hear that you are a weaver, I should like to ask you something about that craft, as I am—or was—interested in it."

"Oh," said he, "I shall not be of much use to you there, I'm afraid. I only do the most mechanical kind of weaving, and am in fact but a poor craftsman, unlike Dick here. Then besides the weaving, I do a little with machine printing and composing, though I am little use at the finer kinds of printing; and moreover machine printing is beginning to die out, along with the waning of the plague of book-making; so I have had to turn to other things that I have a taste for, and have taken to mathematics; and also I am writing a sort of antiquarian book about the peaceable and private history, so to say, of the end of the nineteenth century,—more for the sake of giving a picture of the country before the fighting began than for anything else. That was why I asked you those questions about Epping Forest. You have rather puzzled me, I confess, though your information was so interesting. But later on I hope we may have some more talk together, when our friend Dick isn't here. I know he thinks me rather a grinder, and despises me for not being very deft with my hands: that's the way nowadays. From what I have read of the nineteenth century literature (and I have read a good deal), it is clear to me that this is a kind of revenge for the stupidity of that day, which despised everybody who could use his hands. But, Dick, old fellow, Ne quid nimis! Don't over-do it!"

"Come, now," said Dick, "am I likely to? Am I not the most tolerant man in the world? Am I not quite contented so long as you don't make me learn mathematics, or go into your new science of aesthetics, and let me do a little practical aesthetics with my gold and steel, and the blowpipe and the nice little hammer? But, hillo! here comes another questioner for you, my poor guest. I say, Bob, you must help me to defend him now."

"Here, Boffin," he cried out, after a pause; "here we are, if you must have it!"

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

GERMANY.

The German Social-Democratic party has sustained a heavy loss in the person of comrade Johannes Wedde, who died suddenly last week at Lübeck. He was a clever poet, full of originality and life, whose writings, in the older papers of the party, were signed by the nom de plume of "Silvanus." At the time of the suppression of the last Socialist paper at Hamburg, and when all the Socialists who actually were writing for the press were expelled from that town, it was Wedde who at once started the Hamburger Bürgerzeitung. An article entitled "Force no Remedy" brought, however, the flourishing paper to a violent end, and Bismarck, not satisfied with the suppression of the organ, had also its editor expelled from Hamburg. Wedde went to Lübeck, where he founded the Echo. He was a candidate to the next Reichstag.

Another misfortune has befallen the German Social-Democratic party: Ignaz Auer, formerly member of the Reichstag, has become insane, and it is said that there is but little hope for his recovery.

It is announced in the German papers that the miners of the Lower Rhine district and Westphalia, who lately struck in their thousands, have now put forward a demand for an increase of 50 per cent. in their wages and for an eight hours shift, to be counted from the time of their entering the pit to that of their leaving off work.

The whole of the stokers and coal-trimmers belonging to the vessels lying in the port of Hamburg struck work last Thursday in consequence of the shipowners having reduced the men's wages by ten marks (10s.) a-month. The strike has already increased in magnitude, and appears likely to extend still further.

BELGIUM.

The miners of the basin of Charleroi, after a hard four weeks' struggle, have won the victory over the coalowners: 30,000 workers of Jument-Gohysart, Gilly, Dampremy, Chatelet, Chatelineau, Souvet, Fleurus, Fontaine-l'Évêque, Marchiennes-au-Pont, Marcinelle, Montceau-sur-Sambre, Wanfreecies, Baullet, Pont-du-Loup, etc., have compelled their greedy exploiters to reduce the work hours from eleven to ten, and to consent to an increase of their wages according to the raise of the coal prices realised during the year. The miners have been substantially supported by the Socialists of "Vooruit," Ghent, and all the branches of the Belgian Workingmen's Party. The cause of the workers was certainly a good one. In order to prove it, we need only glance for a moment at the following figures, showing how much the shares of the Belgian mineowners have increased from January to December 1889, and then compare these figures with the scanty, ridiculous increase of wages that has been realised by the workers from 1888 to 1889.

The average daily wages of the miners for 1888 and 1889 has been as follows (one franc equal 10d.):

	Fr.	10d.	Fr.	10d.
January	3.46	4.08	3.73	4.04

May	3.58	3.95	3.82	4.24
June	3.90	4.08	3.83	4.30

The highest increase has thus been of 48 centimes, or 4½d., or 12 per cent., whereas the increase in the shares has been on an average 50 per cent.

But the miners' strike will have a better result still than a reduction of hours and an increase of wages. The miners, having now been convinced that combination alone can help them, have resolved to unite into a vast miners' union throughout the country, and they have already taken steps for the organisation of a general miners' congress, to be held on the first Sunday of February next, at Jument, when the following agenda will be discussed: 1. Rules of the Association; 2. Nomination of an Executive; 3. Economical and political platform of the Union; 4. International miners' congress; 5. Eight hours work-day.

The foregoing lines were already written when we were informed that new difficulties had arisen between the workers and the pit-owners. It is now asserted that a general strike will soon be decided upon at Charleroi if the employers refuse to grant the miners 15 or in certain cases 20 per cent. increase instead of 10 per cent. The agitation throughout the whole coal-basin is becoming very serious, and the strikers seem to be utterly dissatisfied at the recent compromise. Numerous secret meetings are being held, and it is said that the Ministers, in a conference held on the 18th inst., decided to send gendarmes and cavalry to the various spots where the strike has broken out afresh. The outlook is altogether very dark.

On the other hand, the strike in the Liège coal district has now completely terminated, but it is asserted that if the miners of the Charleroi basin resort to a general strike the district of Liège will come out "on principle."

At Antwerp, where the Socialist movement has made during the last two years a very considerable progress, the Sailors' Union, numbering nearly one thousand members, has made formal adhesion to the Socialist party.

HOLLAND.

Our Anarchist comrades at Rotterdam publish a new organ for the defence of the workers' interests, under the title of Arbeidderstolk (The Workers' Organ). The offices are: Havenstraat, 166, Rotterdam. Good luck to the new combatant! VICTOR DAVE.

THE PRICE OF FREEDOM.

["At midnight preceding the morning of his execution, Albert R. Parson's voice rang out clear and proud through the corridors of the gaol as he sang in distinct tones the beautiful ballad, 'Annie Laurie.'"] The following was prompted by reading the above item in the daily papers, and was printed in the Chicago Labour Enquirer during its brief existence.]

The night is dark about me;
I hear the midnight bell;
Before another midnight
It will ring my funeral knell.
It will ring my funeral knell;
O! the hours are speeding by
When to win the toilers' freedom
I shall pay the price and die.

To-night my babes are crouching
By their weeping mother's side;
For his country's sake the father
Leaves his children and his bride.
Leaves his children and his bride,
When men for succour cry.
Then to win the toilers' freedom
I shall pay the price and die.

Pent in a dismal dungeon,
Forbidden to be free,
A slave in chains and prison,
O what were life to me!
O what were life to me!
Speak out, my heart; reply
That to win the toilers' freedom
I will pay the price and die.

What greater love hath mortal,
For one whom he holds dear,
Than for his sake to gladly
Meet death without a fear!
Meet death without a fear—
Yes, such a love have I,
And to win the toilers' freedom
I pay the price and die.

The night will soon be over;
For me 'twill be the last;
And the night of wrong, my country,
From thee shall soon have passed.
From thee shall soon have passed;
I see the stars on high,
So to win the toilers' freedom
I will pay the price and die.

Weep not above my ashes,
This is no hour for tears,
Let every man stand ready
When he the bugle hears.
When he the bugle hears;
Let every man reply:
We to win the toilers' freedom
Will pay the price and die!

We have received the Trades and Labour Advocate of Sydney (N.S.W.), which, so far as we can tell from the numbers to hand, is a thoroughly sound labour paper on trades-union lines. It is well filled with information on labour matters, and gives a good deal of space to the meetings of the various trades organisations.

SOCIALISM IN LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE.—On Saturday January 11th a conference was held at the rooms of the Liverpool Socialist Society, to discuss the advisability of forming a union of the various Socialist bodies of Lancashire and Yorkshire, for the purpose of arranging for the interchange of public speakers, and generally to consider the best means of carrying on a more effective propaganda. Delegates were present from Sheffield, Salford, Blackburn, Rochdale, and Liverpool. Comrade Reeves (Liverpool) was elected chairman, and some discussion took place as to the proposed line of action; after which comrade W. H. Chapman (Liverpool) proposed: "That in the opinion of this conference it is desirable to form a union of the north-western counties Socialists, to be called 'The North-Western Counties Socialist Union.'" Comrade Sharples (Blackburn) seconded the resolution. After further remarks from comrades Bingham (Sheffield), Horrocks (Salford), and others of the assembled delegates, the following amendment was proposed by Bingham: "That this conference, being of opinion that it is desirable in the interests of Socialist propaganda to facilitate the interchange of speakers between the different centres, at once proceed to draw up a list of probable speakers, and make the best possible arrangements to give effect to that decision." The amendment having been put and carried unanimously, the original motion was withdrawn. Finally it was decided that the secretary of the Liverpool Society (E. C. Chapman) should be appointed general secretary pro tem., in order to draw up a list of lectures; and those societies which are willing to co-operate in this object are requested to send in the necessary particulars as early as possible. At a later hour a conversazione was held, at which a number of pieces of vocal and instrumental music were rendered by members and friends, and a most enjoyable evening was spent; W. H. Chapman, sen., superintended the arrangements for refreshments, etc. On Sunday we held two open-air meetings—the first since the formation of our society. In the morning we met at 11.30 near the Landing Stage, when Reeves, Sharples, and Bingham delivered stirring addresses. In the afternoon Reeves, Creaghe, Bingham, and Horrocks spoke to good effect to a large gathering in the old Haymarket. A considerable quantity of literature was sold, and we are much indebted to our friends from the country for the help they gave us to make a start in this work. We intend holding similar meetings each Sunday in the future.

HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON!

THE COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. For Australia, New Zealand, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Transvaal, and the Argentine Republic, a year, 8s.; six months, 4s.; three months, 2s. For India, Ceylon, China, Hong Kong, and the Straits Settlements, a year, 10s.; six months, 5s.; three months, 2s. 6d.

SPECIAL RECRUIT SUBSCRIPTIONS.—To aid in spreading our principles, the following largely reduced terms are offered to those who obtain new subscribers: Two new yearly subscriptions for British Islands, etc., 10s. 6d.; for Australia, etc., 15s.; for India, etc., 19s. Five new subscriptions: For British Islands, etc., 25s.; for Australia, etc., 37s. 6d.; for India, etc., 47s. 6d. Specimen copies will be sent on receipt of postage.

Remittances from abroad must be made by International Money Order.

FABIAN ESSAYS IN SOCIALISM.¹

THIS book is of importance as embodying the views of a society which has been so active in lecturing on behalf of the Socialist movement. Indeed, some time ago many of us thought and said that the Fabians should publish a volume of their lectures; and, without wishing to carp at the present expression of opinions from which we of the Socialist League dissent in some measure, I cannot help wishing that such a volume had appeared about three years ago: for such a book published at that date would have dealt almost wholly with the economical and practical side of the question, and would have formed a kind of text-book for Socialists of all shades of opinion; and illuminated, as it would have been, by the brilliant and attractive style of some of the present essayists, would have been a most useful weapon of attack on the capitalist position as long as the battle might last; whereas a large part of the present volume is given up to the advocacy of the fantastic and unreal tactic which the Fabian Society has ex-cogitated of late, and which is at best tentative and temporary; is hardly constructed to last longer than the coming into power of the next Liberal government. The result is, that the clear exposition of the first principles of Socialism, and the criticism of the present false society (which latter no one knows how to make more damaging than Mr. Bernard Shaw, e.g.) is set aside for the sake of pushing a theory of tactics, which could not be carried out in practice; and which, if it could be, would still leave us in a position from which we should have to begin our attack on capitalism over again; a position, it may be said, which might be better or might be worse for us than our present one, as far as the actual struggle for the new society is concerned.

Mr. Sydney Webb, to judge from this book, is the leader in this somewhat disastrous move. He seems to enjoy all the humiliations of opportunism, to revel in it, so to say; and, indeed, he would appear to drag some of his fellow-writers somewhat unwillingly behind his chariot wheels. In his hands the argumentum ad hominem becomes a rather dangerously double-edged weapon. He is so anxious to prove the commonplace that our present industrial system embraces some of the machinery by means of which a Socialist system might be worked, and that some of the same machinery is used by the present municipalities, and the bureaucratic central government, that his paper tends to produce the impression of one who thinks that we are already in the first stages of socialistic life, all the while that "the poor we have always with us," and that the workers are worse off than they were under the feudal hierarchy. The retort of the enemy is obvious: "If we are already all Socialists, be happy! for we are happy!"

I give Mr. Sydney Webb all credit for sincerity in desiring the destruction of privilege; but it is strange that his rollicking opportunism should blind him to the fact that since he is sincere, the privileged will see through his attempt to hoodwink them into joining his attack on the privilege which is their life; while the discontented miserable workers will be discouraged by being practically told that they are already entering into the fruition of the Promised Land. They may well say: "Is it to be like this society, or something like it? We thought Socialism would be quite unlike our present position; if it is not to be so—." To avoid the disaster of gaining the doubtful alliance of the well-to-do at the expense of losing the support of the poor, it is surely necessary never to cease saying: The test of the realisation of Socialism will be the abolition of poverty.

Let us be clear on this point, that if the municipal Socialism of Mr. Sydney Webb were carried and put in practice, though it should logically (perhaps) lead to the destruction of privilege and poverty, yet historically it may do nothing of the kind; and that at any rate it is not Socialism, as it would still admit of the existence of competing classes. We should remember (as a Socialist said to me the other day) that under the Roman Empire municipal administration reached a pitch which we are very unlikely to come to in England in our day; but it had no destructive effect on the society of that epoch, which was based on chattel slavery and a pauper proletariat fed by the doles of the rich.

Mr. Sydney Webb takes in hand the "historic" basis of Socialism; but he is not more historic than any other of the paper-writers, indeed, less so than Mr. Shaw; his history only begins at the period just before the great industrial revolution of the eighteenth century. The industrial conditions of this period he treats too roughly; so roughly, indeed, as to be both inaccurate and misleading. It is true that some of the industries of the country were carried on in an individualistic way on the surface; but the greater part were under the rule of a most elaborate division of labour system, of which the mediæval workmen knew nothing; and even the Yorkshire weavers (as well described by Mr. Illingworth), though they were masters of their tools, time, and materials within their workshops or houses, worked for a master (usually a neighbouring farmer) who exploited them, though mildly, and who in his turn sold the goods to a factor. The workmen had a world-market behind their backs though they were unconscious of it; the goods were made for profit, not primarily for use. In short, Mr. Sydney Webb has ignored the transition period of industry which began in the sixteenth century with the break up of the Middle Ages, and the shoving out of the people from the land. This transition is treated of by Karl Marx with great care and precision under the name of the "Manufacturing Period" (workshop period we might call it), and some mention of it ought to have been included in Mr. Sydney Webb's "history." I should not have felt bound to call attention to this blemish, however, if it were not, to my mind, another indication of the weak side of Mr. Sydney Webb and his followers; their tendency, namely, to over-estimate the importance of the mechanism of a system of society apart from the end towards which it may be used.

The great machine industries, though they have played an important part in the movement toward Socialism are not an essential condition of its existence; they may be used, as they are now, for the mere enslavement of the workers. They will be so used as long as they last, unless the workers in some form or other revolt against their slavery. On the other hand, as you may have a perfected system of co-operative production in a society of capitalism and wage-slavery, so you may have Socialism or Communism conjointly with a system of (so-called) individualist production. Nay, I feel certain that when the time comes, wherein we have forgotten the period of artificial poverty thrust upon us by capitalism and wage-slavery, the world will in a large measure return to the individual system which once produced goods; a word which our present system has deprived of three parts of its meaning. Fourier put forward his truly inspired doctrine of attractive industry to a world that could not listen to him, so sunken as it was in misery and slavery. In times to come we shall need no social philosopher to tell us that if we cannot make our work attractive we shall still be slaves, even though we have no master but Nature. But to-day the world is still so sunken in misery and slavery, that in this book, honestly devoted to the regeneration of society, the assumption is everywhere made that labour must for ever be unattractive.

It is through no disrespect to the other writers in this remarkable book that I have given so much of my space to the consideration of Mr. Sydney Webb's paper, which is rather worse than better than the others, but simply because it shows most clearly the present position of the Fabian Society towards the Socialist movement.

Mr. Clarke's paper, though not quite avoiding the historical mistake of Mr. Sydney Webb, is clear and well written, and full of very valuable information; the latter portion, dealing with the special vagaries of American "Commerce," will serve as a text-book for the subject "until the times do alter." At the same time, though we may well hope that the extravagance of exploitation and contempt of the public shown by these "captains of industry" will lead us on toward Socialism, it is dangerous to rest our hopes on this development, as Mr. Bellamy does in his 'Looking Backward.' It may, after all, be nothing but a passing phase of that capitalist organisation of robbery, which surely must be attacked in front by the workers grown conscious of their slavery.

Mr. Sydney Olivier's "Moral Basis" is worth taking the trouble of careful reading. It is less obvious to the objections against the Fabian opportunism, partly no doubt because of the subject, but also partly, I think (judging from the paper), because of the turn of mind of the writer himself.

Mr. Graham Wallas's "Property Under Socialism" is clear and free from pedantry, and shows distinct sympathies with Communism; but it is confessedly dealing with the transitional period of Social Democracy, and consequently lacks the interest which a paper on more definite principles would have. There is, indeed, a tone of apology for the feebleness of Social Democracy running through it which might be sneered at by the bourgeois. One friendly objection I make to Mr. Wallas—he allows himself to speak of Socialism as "the system of property-holding which we call Socialism," and goes on to say that this is not necessarily the wished-for new life, "any more than a good system of drainage is health, or the invention of printing, knowledge." Here is a net statement of the exaggeration of the value of a mechanical system, which I have already complained of. Socialism is emphatically not merely "a system of property-holding," but a complete theory of human life, founded indeed on the visible necessities of animal life, but including a distinct system of religion, ethics, and conduct, which, if put into practice, will not indeed enable us to get rid of the tragedy of life, as Mr. Wallas hints, but will enable us to meet it without fear and without shame.

Mrs. Besant's article on "Industry Under Socialism" gives a sketch of State Socialism in practice in its crudest form, which, owing to the difficulty of the subject rather than from any shortcoming on her part, is not satisfactory,—could hardly be satisfactory to any one.

Mr. Hubert Bland's paper, "On the Outlook," is, for this book, a curious one, for it is a not very indirect attack on his optimistic democratic coadjutors. "It is not so much to the thing which the state does, as to the end for which it does it," is stating again what I have already put forward in this article, and there is a good deal in Mr. Bland's "Outlook" to the same purport. For the rest, Mr. Bland, of course, goes in for the Parliamentary struggle which we do not believe in; but he is too acute (his eye-sight being aided, I judge, by some traditional Tory instincts) not to see that the permeation of the Radicals by Socialism does not mean the creation of a Socialist-Radical Parliamentary party, but rather the absorption of the individuals of the Radicals, on the one hand, into the definite Socialist ranks, and, on the other, into the Whig phalanx; which latter, he, very rightly, looks on as a most formidable and enduring body of obstruction, capable of "holding the fort" long after the intelligence of the nation has declared for Socialism, and of holding it in the teeth of the logical sequence of economical events. So goes history.

I have yet to mention Mr. Bernard Shaw's two papers. Whatever I have to blame in them is comprised in the statement of my differences with the Fabian tactic which is so frankly condemned by Mr. Hubert Bland. Yet, at least, Mr. Shaw does not love opportunism for its own sweet self; for in his second lecture he definitely proclaims his shame of the course to which, as he thinks, circumstances have driven him; perhaps he only needs a little extra dose of Parliamentary tactics to disgust him so much as to force him to drop them altogether. Judging from the eloquence of the concluding part of his first paper, we can hardly suppose that that disgust will drive him into despair of the whole movement, and so deprive us of the services of one of the clearest heads and best pens that Socialism has got. As aforesaid, his criticism of the modern capitalistic muddle is so damaging, his style so trenchant, and so full of reserves of indignation and righteous scorn, that I sometimes wonder that guilty, i.e., non-Socialist, middle-class people can sit and listen to him. If he could only forget the Sydney-Webbian permeation tactic, even without putting any other in its place, what an advantage it would be to all of us! He would encourage his friends thereby; and as to his enemies—could he offend them more than he does now?

I have not had any space to quote passages from this book; I thought that there was no need to do so, as I assume that all Socialists will read it whether they agree with it or not. WILLIAM MORRIS.

IN PARIS.

WE shall soon have some new elections in and about Paris, as about half-a-dozen Boulangist deputies' elections have been invalidated on account of not being on the side of the bourgeois Republic. I should let this pass by unrecorded as being without interest for us Socialists, who don't care a damn who gets in or out of Parliament, but it furnishes a good opportunity to study the different schools of Socialism we have here. As internationalists it is good for us to know our men in case we want them.

Any foreigner coming to Paris is sure to meet good Socialists here so long as he speaks to the point, that is, as long as he does not wander away from his programme or principles; but if he takes to politics he is nearly sure to fall out with them. Although we have half-a-dozen schools at ordinary times, at the polls we have but two, or rather none at all; one school, the Parti ouvrier, is swallowed up by the Government; the other, the Blanquist school, goes with Boulanger.

There are, of course, parties that remain independent, such as the Ligue Socialiste, which has L'Egalité as their daily paper; the party of Vaillant, which is without a paper since the Cri du Peuple stopped; the Anarchists, again, whose weekly paper is La Révolte. Staunch revolutionaries as these three last schools may be, they are accused of voting for Boulangists.

It is a known fact that the Parti ouvrier, 25,000 strong in Paris, with nine town councillors and one and a-half deputies—one and a-half because Joffrin is no deputy in reality, being "elected" by the government in the place of Boulanger, who got 3,000 majority over him; the whole one being Dumay, who has done good work in former years. It is a known fact, I say, that this party get secret money to play the game of the government. In their opinion all who are not with them are with Boulanger; not being able to keep to their own guns, they see a traitor in any man outside of their ranks. They do not understand a man standing aloof from their petty miseries.

They are rather strong in Paris, where the Bourse du Travail is in their hands, but are nowhere in the country. It is not so easy to make friends there, as the municipality of Paris, on which nine of them are sitting, cannot give situations outside of the town, and therefore cannot corrupt the country.

I fell into the hands of these men when I came to Paris as a delegate to the International (Possibilist) Congress, and I confess that I regret it ever since. They are Nationalists, and as much so as are Irishmen. Their ostensible programme is, "Emancipation of the toiler by the toiler himself," but they should add, "with the gracious help of His Majesty Carnot and the Bourgeois Republic."

Between these Socialists and those who intended to make a good use of Boulanger's triumph by taking hold of the Government at the first opportunity, we have about 15,000 Anarchists, who are recruited from among the most intelligent and sensible workmen here. They do not vote, but they make more recruits at the present time than any other school. While there are lots of Socialists who waver between the Opportunists, the Parti ouvrier, and the Boulangists, once a man becomes an Anarchist he usually remains there. They are promoting now the idea of a general European strike, which, if it comes off, will about finish the present delightful system of society.

The Ligue Socialiste is a combination of discontented and practical Socialists. It was erected on the ruins of the Cri du Peuple. Its members are all young and ardent men, who would not feel at home with such veterans as Vaillant and Jules Guesde. One of them, Odin, is to be prosecuted for a speech he delivered a few weeks ago in Nantes. Chirac is another rising man. The Ligue Socialiste is to French Socialism what Sandhurst is to the English army. Its paper is L'Egalité, which was started by Jules Roques, a capitalist, and doubtful Socialist. The League counts about a thousand members, and has been about a year in existence. It goes in for the grève générale (general strike); has no programme; and thinks of taking the Elysée by storm one day—a quite possible thing, if we consider the kind of men it is composed of.

Vaillant, Minister of Public Instruction under the Commune, and still a Communist, has joined Jules Guesde, the Collectivist of old fame, and in spite of all these different opinions and schools of which I have been speaking, all other chiefs would be cast into the shade in the hour of action, and Vaillant would be the rallying-point, in whose presence all differences would disappear. His name reflects a moral strength that cannot be denied. He is watching the first opportunity to strike a decisive blow. Delegates of the twenty arrondissements meet every week, and he never fails to be there also. He does not care to take the chair; he sits in the crowd, and always speaks to the point. He personifies Revolution, no doubt about it. Let the Government make a blunder, and we shall see Vaillant on the Place de la Concorde, and with him a hundred thousand revolutionaries of every school, who have descended from the heights of Montmartre and Belleville to strike a final blow at the cursed reign of the money-bag.

A big meeting assembled last week to protest against the arbitrary arrest of Bertoya, a Spanish student of twenty-four, who was arrested in the street, without any warning, by a mouchard, who couldn't even tell him for what reason it was done. The reason is, that Bertoya is a Socialist, who has been expelled already from Germany, Italy, France, and probably from Belgium, on account of his opinions and propaganda.

Before the opening of the meeting, one heard all the different languages of Europe—Italian, German, Russian, Greek, etc.: it was a truly international meeting. A Greek student was the first speaker, and he protested strongly against this disgraceful persecution, saying, however, that it was a sure sign that governments must feel their own decay when they resorted to such means as these. Citizen Brunel said they should not protest in words only, but should try to make their words good by their works; which sentiment was received with vigorous applause, waving of hats, and many curses against law's order as carried out in this grand country of freedom, where every man has a vote, where idlers have a carefully guarded right to live without producing, and where every poor man has the right and many opportunities to starve while working. Hurrah for the Bourgeois Republic!

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Gas-stokers' Strike.

The struggle is still as dogged as ever. The Seamen and Firemen's Union is nearly every day drawing men out from coal ships that supply the company, and on the whole the strikers have still a fair chance of winning. The gas-stokers' treasurer, William Byford, writing to the Star on Friday, Jan. 17, states that funds are coming in well, despite the lying statements that have been circulated in the capitalist press. He says, "The strike which has now lasted five weeks, was forced upon us by Mr. Livesey, and has cost up to the present over £5,000. This has been met somewhat by a levy upon our members, whom, I am glad to say, have responded nobly. We have paid the strikers 10s. a week and 5s. extra Christmas week, and I am pleased to state that instead of our funds being done and our society in a deplorable condition, the funds were never better. Last week our own income was over £800; this week up to date it is over £500. Independent of outside support, which is coming in very well just now, we paid our strikers last week without calling on our bankers, and are prepared to do the same next week." This statement, and, indeed, the whole history of the strike shows that the new trade unionism is not so deficient in staying power as some of its enemies thought. The gas-stokers, unlike the dockers, have received very little outside support, and yet this strike has been fought with as much strength and determination as any struggle in the history of the older trade unions. Should the men even be defeated, they have still done enough to show that the new trade unions can make a good fight without showers of gold from an enthusiastic public.

The strikers have had another opportunity of admiring the administration of middle-class justice. Two blacklegs were charged at the Central Criminal Court this week with shooting strikers. One of them, Alfred Newgrove, has been let off altogether; the other, Charles Higgins, a black man, was discharged upon entering on his recognisances to come up for judgment when called upon. If a striker had shot a blackleg I wonder if he would have got off as easily! It is a wonder that the judge and the middle-class jury, in their enthusiasm for the amiable eccentricities of these gentlemen, did not present them with a valuable testimonial as a proof of their approval—a silver-plated revolver with an injunction to make good use of it would be most suitable.

It is rather surprising, after these examples of middle-class justice, to find that Henry Weir was also only bound over to appear for judgment when called upon. But there are several explanations of this extraordinary leniency; first, it is probable that it struck the judge that it would be rather too absurd to send a man to prison for advising people to kill Mr. Livesey, when blacklegs had been let off for actually trying to kill people; secondly, the judge, Mr. Justice Hawkins, had doubtless exhausted his superfluous stock of severity upon the editor of the North London Press the day before, and was therefore in a pretty good humour.

The funniest feature of the case was the "evidence" of the police "short-hand" writer. This gentleman admitted that he was not a "professional," also that he would not swear positively as to whether the prisoner had said that Mr. Livesey had no right or no moral right to live; and finally, he admitted that since the meeting he had made several "alterations" in his short-hand notes, and had "struck out" some portions of them. Nice evidence to convict any one upon! When a policeman adds "short-hand" to his natural vices, he evidently becomes more unreliable in his "evidence" than ever.

There has been another interview between Mr. Livesey and a deputation of gas-stokers, but the interview has had no result. The good gentleman complained bitterly of the trouble and expense to which he had been put by the action of the Coal Porters' and Sailors and Firemen's Unions. We hear on good authority that some 17 coal ships have lost their crews through the pickets of the last-named union, and poor Mr. Livesey has had to partially fill up their places with blacklegs, for whom he has had to pay very dearly. He was, however, in spite of this annoyance, good enough to offer, if the men would make a total surrender, to take "some" of them back. This proposition being afterwards submitted to a mass meeting of the men, was unanimously rejected amid cries of "Fight it out to the bitter end." The demonstration held in Hyde Park on Sunday, showed by its numbers and enthusiasm that the men are determined to resist to the last. There was a large attendance of police, and their "short-hand" writers were very busy "reporting" the speeches. Mr. Livesey is finding that "smashing the union" is not so easy as he thought.

Strike of Wharfmen.

A strike broke out at several wharves in Bermondsey Friday morning, January 17, the men demanding three-quarters of an hour for dinner, and that they shall be paid for it. On Friday night Tom Mann, who represented the workers, had an interview with Captain Davis, one of the directors, at Wilson and Simmons', who conceded the men's demands, but stipulated that the agreement should only hold good till April 13th, when the whole question of payment for mealtimes should be thoroughly discussed. Mr. Morgan, secretary of the dock company, writes to the papers in a fit of virtuous indignation concerning the infraction of the famous agreement of the 14th September last by the men, one of the conditions of which, as our readers will remember, was that there should be no payment for mealtimes. But as Tom Mann explained, the agreement was never intended to be eternal. In fact by this time it has been nearly torn to pieces, as many of the workers at the docks and wharves have gained this concession. The men at Hay's Wharf are still out, but there is every hope of a speedy victory.

The East-end Tailors.

A crowded meeting of East-end tailors was held at Christ Church Hall, Hanbury Street, on Saturday January 18, to consider the breaking of the strike agreement by the masters. According to a statement made by Lewis Lyons at the meeting, two weeks had not passed from the signing of the agreement before some of the masters had broken it, and now the majority of them appear to have followed their example. It appears that the masters have issued a circular to the retail trade in which they stated that the cause which led to long hours had been abolished. The meeting passed a resolution stating that the statements in this circular were misleading and mischievous, and that they had resolved as early as possible to enforce the terms of the agreement by every legitimate means in their power; also calling upon merchant tailors, shopkeepers, and warehouses to open workshops of their own, or else give their work out to fair houses. It was stated at the meeting that the agreement would be enforced if necessary by a general strike throughout London and the provinces.

Tram and Bus Men.

This union again seems in a bad way. There was a very small attendance at a torchlight meeting held at Stratford Broadway on Saturday morning, owing, it is said, to the men being warned against attending the meeting by the company's officials. This may be so; but similar warnings have been issued before and haven't had much effect. It is probable that the weakness shown by the officials of the union towards the Road Car Co.—which has set them at defiance, broken their agreement, and discharged union men, while the union officials have borne it as meekly as lambs—has had more to do with it. The fact is that the union officials, two months ago, when the Road Car men were ready to strike, allowed the decisive moment to go by. The consequence is that the men have lost heart, and do not care to risk their places for a union that will do nothing for them. Mr. Sutherst, the president of the union, has now evidently given up all idea of organised action on the part of the men, and has prepared a "twelve hours per day bill" for Parliament. A lot of good that will do, even if it passes, though there is not much chance of that. Of what use is a union which can only prepare bills for Parliament? No wonder the men have lost all enthusiasm for such a miserable sham.

Trouble at Billingsgate.

There is a row at Billingsgate. The fish porters have had enough of being sweated by various fishing companies, and on one of the union men being discharged on Saturday morning, January 18, the union men started work on their own account for the buyers, securing half the work of the market, and receiving the full reward of their labour. The companies replied on Monday by posting the following notice on all the wholesale forms: "The undersigned companies hereby give notice that on and after the 20th inst. all fish sold over their forms will be under the sole control of the company until delivered to the stand or vehicle of the buyer, and is only sold on these conditions. This means that the buyers must not employ union labour for themselves, but must have their fish carried by the blacklegs employed by the companies. On Saturday the companies showed they meant boycotting by refusing the bid of Mr. B. Hotine, one of the largest salesmen in Billingsgate, because he employed union men. The men have issued a manifesto, calling upon the buyers to support them in the struggle, and pointing out that the blacklegs do not know their business and are therefore likely to cause them delay and annoyance. MR. AUBERON HERBERT ON MARRIAGE.

THE following letter was addressed by Mr. Auberon Herbert to the editor of the Pall Mall, in reply to some very reactionary utterances of the "family altar" type, which the Pall Mall had quoted with admiration:

A few days ago the Pall Mall Gazette quoted from a speech of Professor Murray about Mr. Parnell. Personally I have never admired the fashion or the spirit of the Irish leading. I have seen in it the same deep taint that I see in the modern Liberal party, as a party. Irish patriots have been manufactured wholesale at the price of 20 to 30 per cent.—or whatever the percentage may be—of reduced rents; just as modern Radicals are manufactured at the price of free education, taxation of land, and the promise of State services at the cost of owners of property. In neither case do I believe the product worth the producing. Having said this, and having separated myself from admiration of Mr. Parnell's leading, I wish to protest most strongly against Professor Murray's manner of speaking about Mr. Parnell. It breathes that deep unconscious hypocrisy which pervades almost all of us in this matter; especially those who, with a very slight knowledge or understanding of their own human nature, proceed to denounce their fellow men. Men safely moored in the haven of marriage sit in sublime judgment upon those who are moved by their passions in the irregular and unhappy ways that lie outside marriage. Do not think I am upholding the state of no marriage as against the state of marriage. I deeply reverence the state of true marriage—by which I mean the faithful continuous attachment of two people to each other, without any legal restraint to perpetuate that attachment, when its inner life has departed—but I say that this true marriage is the concern of the two people themselves, and not the concern of the world outside them. It always seems to me a deep unconscious hypocrisy on the part of the happily married people when they revile either the transgressions of the unmarried or a transgression such as that of which Mr. Parnell is accused. I am not minimising these transgressions. They are generally sins against one's own sense of honour and truth and constancy; they are departures from high ideals; they are acts of high treason against one's own happiness and the happiness of those involved; but I deny utterly they are the concern of the outside world, and it is just as impertinent of Professor Murray to comment upon Mr. Parnell's relations with Mrs. O'Shea, in the high tragic line of a betrayed Ireland, as it would be impertinent for me to comment publicly upon his own ill-natured treatment of his wife or his severity towards his children—if he is married, and if I had any reason to believe in either of these things, which most certainly I have not—as obstacles to our confidence in him as a trustworthy Liberal or a trustworthy Conservative. A great deal of this kind of talk comes from the shallow soil in which Liberal principles of the present day are grown. Women are to vote, to be lawyers, doctors, and so forth; but they are not to be treated as the real owners, with all the consequences, of their own selves. The modern Liberal, in this respect, is often like the Paris husband, who buys a revolver for twenty francs and dramatically shoots his wife, if she has betrayed him, amidst the half-suppressed applause of other Paris husbands. A sense of property in the wife—joined, of course, in France to the intense amour propre or vanity that has been injured—is at the bottom of the shooting, just as with us it is at the bottom of that foul creation the divorce court and its money damages. No fouler institution was ever invented; and its existence drags on, to our deep shame, just because we have not the courage frankly to say that the sexual relations of husband and wife, or those who live together, concern their own selves, and do not concern the prying, gloating, self-righteous, and intensely untruthful world outside them. What Mr. Parnell was as a political leader, that he remains to-day.

His faults are not increased; his virtues as leader are not diminished. That he may or may not have sinned against a woman's happiness and self-respect, and against his own happiness and self-respect, are matters that affect him and her, and not his political followers. If the Irish party allow him to be cast on one side—if they allow him to be sacrificed to Catholic jealousies—they will indeed barb the saying, that has been more than once pointed against them, that they cannot be well served because they betray their leaders.

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

OFFICES: 24, GREAT QUEEN ST., LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

The Offices of the Socialist League will be open for the sale of Commonweal and all other Socialist publications from 8.30 a.m. to 9 p.m. every day except Sunday. The Secretary will be in attendance from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m. daily.

Executive.—At the Council meeting on Jan. 20th, it was resolved to protest against the attempts made by the capitalist press to obtain a public ovation for the filibuster Stanley upon his return.

Commonweal Branch.—The Hall at 24, Great Queen Street, will be open to all Members of the League every evening from 7.30 to 10 p.m. Daily papers, games, and refreshments. Members must show their cards to the steward. Lectures and dramatic readings every Sunday evening at 8 p.m. For particulars of the new Commonweal Branch, now forming, address F. Kitz, 24, Great Queen Street, London, W.C.

Branch Subscriptions Paid.—1888:—Oxford, to end of September.

1889:—Bradford and Hammersmith, to end of April. Norwich, Glasgow, and Yarmouth, to end of May. Manchester, to end of September. Clerkenwell and East London, to end of October. North London, and Mitcham, to end of November. St. Georges East, and Leicester, to end of December. 1890:—North Kensington, to end of January.

Notice to Branch Secretaries.—Please remit to Central Office your Branch Capitation fees as soon as possible.

Notice.—All letters on League business, except those intended for Editors of Commonweal, to be addressed to me. No other person is authorised to sign any official communication.
FRANK KITZ, Secretary.

NEW PREMISES FUND.

Collected at Council meeting, Jan. 20th, 3s. 6½d.

"COMMONWEAL" GUARANTEE FUND.

The following further sums have been received towards this fund:—Webb, 1s.; H. R., 1s.; Mrs. Schack, 1s.; M. M., 5s.; F. Kitz, 6d.; D. Nicoll, 6d.; B. W., 6d.; J. W. Brunne, £1 1s.; and C. Saunders, 2s.

REPORTS.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—Fair meeting at Latimer Road on Sunday morning; speakers Maughan Crouch, Dean, and A. J. Smith. Comrade Albert Tarn lectured in the evening on "Capital, Money, and Interest"; many questions and good debate. Collected 2s. 6d. Commonweal sold out.

LEEDS.—On Sunday morning at Vicars Croft a meeting was held, when Rogers spoke to an attentive audience. At night, in the Socialist League Hall, Samuels lectured on "Socialism, Old and New" to a good audience; spirited discussion. Commonweal went well, also 'Appeal to the Young.'

LEICESTER.—Good meeting in Russell Square, addressed by Taylor and Chambers; audience very attentive and sympathetic. On Monday, a lively discussion on "Communal Life," which was adjourned until Thursday.

MANCHESTER.—We held two meetings on Sunday, despite unfavourable weather. At Phillips Park in the morning, Stockton, Barton, and Baillie addressed a meeting; in the afternoon, the same speakers held a meeting in Stevenson Square. About 40 Commonweal sold.

DUBLIN.—At Progressist Club, 87 Marlboro' Street, Jan. 18th, A. Kavanagh lectured on "Practical Legislation," advocating land nationalisation, eight hours, etc., etc. The views of the lecturer were forcibly assailed by Wilson, Regan, O'Gorman, and Fitzpatrick.

SHEFFIELD.—The labour movement in Sheffield is rapidly developing. Good meetings are held every Tuesday evening at Hallamshire Hall, and on Wednesday and Thursday evenings in other parts of the town. We are also getting good meetings at the above hall every Sunday. On Sunday January 12, comrade Sketchley lectured, in the morning at 11, subject, "The Labour Movement"; and in the evening at 6.30, subject, "The Land Question." On Sunday Jan. 19, morning at 11, subject, "The Labour Movement"; and in the evening at 6.30, subject, "Socialism—What it is." Admission is free, and discussion invited. The organisation is extending every week. Socialist literature on sale at the hall.—S.

PLEASE TAKE NOTE!

How is it that the Commonweal does not publish more news from the Branches? Because the editor is not omniscient, and the local secretaries forget that he depends upon them for news. Hint: Let us know what you're doing.

How is it that not all that is sent is inserted? Because branch secretaries forget that the editor has less than a thousand hands, and often mix things so that it would mean entirely re-writing their letters before they could be of use. Hint: Keep reports separate from announcements, and news from both. Write briefly, plainly, and on one side of the paper.

Motto: "Hear the other side."

THIS Journal advocates Personal Sovereignty in place of State Sovereignty, Voluntary Co-operation as opposed to Compulsory Co-operation, the Liberation of the human mind from Superstition, and the application of the principles of Ethics toward Social Regeneration.

But it is meant also to be a broad-minded, unsectarian meeting-place for the representatives of all schools of Religious and Economic thought. Orthodox and Liberal Christians, Spiritualists, Hebrews, Agnostics, Liberals, Infidels, Atheists, Freethinkers, and Secularists of every shade of opinion; Protectionists, Free-traders, Single-taxers, Nationalists, Socialists, and Anarchists, advocates of peaceful measures of social regeneration and revolutionists,—will all be welcomed to its columns with equal cordiality, fairness, and respect. As an indication of the broad scope of the paper, here are the names of

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto:

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

WHEN WILL HE GET THERE?

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE Labour Elector appeals to the mass of the trades' union workmen, and is supposed to do something toward teaching them; but one of its last efforts in this direction is not a happy one. English people are fond of boasting that they do not hit a man when he is down; but here is the Labour Elector attacking Mr. Parke in a way that it is difficult to characterise, although he is in prison for doing what most people believe he thought to be his duty.

Mr. Parke has made a mistake, and is paying a frightful penalty for it. Twelve month's persistent and intentional torture, administered by a pedantic system that does not recognise humanity except as an inconvenient something to be repressed, one would think sufficient "punishment" for any "crime" in the calendar, let alone the crime of a mere mistake, which any generous-minded man would at once forgive. But this is not enough for the "Newest Journalism"; which out-herods Herod, out-Saturdays the Saturday, in calling for pit, gallows and rack in defence of an injured society. Really, the Labour Elector has learned its lesson from its coercionist friends only too well. It seems bent on reducing political persecution to an absurdity.

The bourgeois papers are congratulating the German Socialists on their victory over Bismark, but to a Socialist onlooker it does not seem so tremendous, or at least must be read by the light of the extra-coercionist state of things in Germany. For the only doubts that the respectable parties had was as to the best method of damaging Socialism; and all the Liberals wanted to do apparently was to get a coercionist bill which should have a certain amount of respectability about it, so that it might last the longer and be put in force the more rigorously.

The Tory gentleman, Prince Zu Carolath, who spoke against the Bill and so astonished his colleagues, appears to be rather a Simple Simon. To us, at any rate, the crushing of Socialism by intellectual argument seems rather like a joke; since by this time nobody but Professor Huxley or the regular debating-club bore ventures to argue against Socialism in front; let alone that it seems rather late in the day for the countrymen of Karl Marx and Lassalle to begin to talk of intellectual opposition. But no doubt there is something in the argument that brutal coercion consolidates a forward movement.

An article in the Star the other day carried the "We are all Socialists now" about as far as that stale piece of cant could be carried. "We have had municipal Socialism for fifty years," said its writer. Have we indeed? It must be a valuable article, then, considering how it has abolished all the evils of which Labour has to complain! Let alone the London slums, I could show our Star friends a biggish population in the fields of merry (?) England to whom Socialism of any kind would be of some advantage if it were real. Whereabouts is this municipal Socialism? I should like to find out. I think it must be Socialism for the rich; that is the reason why we cannot find it out; they keep it to themselves, I suppose, like they do all the rest of their stealings.

W. M.

Mr. John P. Brown, "of Birmingham," is an admirer of Mr. Stanley and an upholder of the system which he represents. To him, this God-appointed (which is to say, self-appointed) apostle of rum, rifles, and religion, who forces his way across Africa with a wallet of bullets and bibles, appears to be not only a semi-divine hero, but "furthermore a gentleman" (!). Imagine, then, the horror of Mr. John P. Brown when he picks up a stray number of the Commonweal in a Liverpool café, and reads the "infernal rubbish" which is written therein about his idol, by "miserable hounds" who "have not the pluck to undertake one-half, nay, one-quarter of what he has successfully accomplished"! Then for the first time it dawns upon him that there are men alive who do not prostrate themselves before the feet of the vulgar freebooter whom he so adores.

What his first impulse was, who shall say? Something of its nature may be gathered from the fact, that on reflection he wrote a letter in reply to our "article on Mr. H. M. Stanley, whom you call a filibuster," in which he says:

"Your reason for so doing I cannot imagine, unless it is that his object is to open up fresh provinces for the furtherance of the gospel, and to try and enlighten the poor niggers (!) on the glorious truths contained therein. Pray is he not opening up fresh fields for commercial enterprise, and thus furthering the interests of the community at large?"— making, of course the familiar confusion between the interests of the capitalist and those of the "community at large."

But Mr. Brown proceeds in a loftier strain:

"These glorious principles are of course quite antagonistic to your own, which can be defined in one short word, and that is HELLISH. This definition may perhaps be rather strong, but in this case it is the only one adapted for the purpose of which it is used. Your other remarks are without doubt cowardly in the extreme. Because a man, and furthermore a gentleman, has the pluck to take in hand an expedition the object of which was the advancement of civilisation, knowing the privations and fatigues he would have to undergo, and having successfully accomplished his object, your miserable crew raise objections to a grateful and admiring populace giving him his just and due reward. I should like to have the task, or rather the pleasure, of stringing up every man jack of you."

There speaks the good Christian!

Having relieved himself of all that, one may now fairly ask Mr.

Brown to reflect a little. If he will only try to formulate, in some calmer moment, the benefit which has been conferred by Mr. Stanley on the "true working class"; if he will only try really to find out to how much of "mankind generally" Mr. Stanley has been a "benefactor"; if he will only do these things with a little earnestness and a genuine desire for truth, he will find that the heroic figure of his imagination will dwindle down to something like the dimensions of a commercial traveller crossed with a footpad. NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,
AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. III. (continued).—THE GUEST HOUSE AND BREAKFAST THEREIN.

I LOOKED over my shoulder, and saw something flash and gleam in the sunlight that lay across the hall; so I turned round, and at my ease saw a splendid figure slowly sauntering over the pavement; a man whose surcoat was embroidered most copiously as well as elegantly, so that the sun flashed back from him as if he had been clad in golden armour. The man himself was tall, dark-haired, and exceedingly handsome, and though his face was no less kindly in expression than that of the others, he moved with that somewhat haughty mien which great beauty is apt to give to both men and women. He came and sat down at our table with a smiling face, stretching out his long legs and hanging his arm over the chair in the slowly graceful way which tall and well-built people may use without affectation. He was a man in the prime of life, but looked as happy as a child who has just got a new toy. He bowed gracefully to me, and said—

"I see clearly that you are the guest, of whom Annie has just told me, who have come from some distant country that does not know of us or our ways of life. So I daresay you would not mind answering me a few questions; for you see—"

Here Dick broke in: "No, please, Boffin! let it alone for the present. Of course you want the guest to be happy and comfortable; and how can that be if he has to trouble himself with answering all sorts of questions while he is still confused with all the new customs and people about him? No, no: I am going to take him where he can ask questions himself, and have them answered; that is to my great-grandfather in Bloomsbury; and I am sure you can't have anything to say against that. So instead of bothering, you had much better go out to James Allen's and get a carriage for me, as I shall drive him up myself; and please tell Jim to let me have the old grey, for I can drive a wherry much better than a carriage. Jump up, old fellow, and don't be disappointed; our guest will keep himself for you and your stories."

I stared at Dick; for I wondered at his speaking to such a dignified-looking personage so familiarly, not to say curtly; for I thought that this Mr. Boffin, in spite of his well-known name out of Dickens, must be at the least a senator of these strange people. However, he got up and said, "All right, old oar-wearer, whatever you like; this is not one of my busy days; and though" (with a condescending bow to me) "my pleasure of a talk with this learned guest is put off, I admit that he ought to see your worthy kinsman as soon as possible. Besides, perhaps he will be the better able to answer my questions after his own have been answered."

And therewith he turned and swung himself out of the hall.

When he was well gone, I said: "Is it wrong to ask what Mr. Boffin is? whose name, by the way, reminds me of many pleasant hours passed in reading Dickens."

Dick laughed. "Yes, yes," said he, "as it does us. I see you take the allusion. Of course his real name is not Boffin, but Henry Johnson; we only call him Boffin as a joke, partly because he is a dustman, and partly because he will dress so showily, and get as much gold on him as a baron in the Middle Ages. As why should he not if he likes? only we are his special friends, you know, so of course we jest with him."

I held my tongue for some time after that; but Dick went on:

"He is a capital fellow, and you can't help liking him; but he has a weakness: he will spend his time in writing reactionary novels, and is very proud of getting the local colour right, as he calls it; and as he thinks you come from some forgotten corner of the earth, where people are unhappy, and consequently interesting to a story-teller, he thinks he may get some information out of you. O, he will be quite straightforward with you, for that matter. Only for your own comfort, beware of him!"

"Well, Dick," said the weaver, doggedly, "I think his novels are very good."

"Of course you do," said Dick; "birds of a feather flock together; mathematics and antiquarian novels stand on much the same footing. But here he comes again."

And in effect the Golden Dustman hailed us from the hall-door; so we all got up and went into the porch, before which, with a strong grey horse in the shafts, stood a carriage ready for us which I could not help noticing. It was light and handy, but had none of that sickening vulgarity which I had known as inseparable from the carriages of our time, especially the "elegant" ones, but was as graceful and pleasant in line as a Wessex waggon. We got in, Dick and I. The girls, who had come into the porch to see us off, waved their hands to us; the weaver nodded kindly; the dustman bowed as gracefully as a troubadour; Dick shook the reins, and we were off.

CHAP. IV.—A MARKET BY THE WAY.

WE turned away from the river at once, and were soon in the main road that runs through Hammersmith. But I should have had no guess as to where I was if I had not started from the waterside; for King Street was gone, and the highway ran through wide sunny meadows and garden-like tillage. The Creek, which we crossed at once, had been rescued from its culvert, and as we went over its pretty bridge we saw its waters, yet swollen by the tide, covered with gay boats of different sizes. There were houses about, some on the road, some among the fields with pleasant lanes leading down to them, and each surrounded by a teeming garden. They were all pretty in design, and as solid as might be, but countryfied in appearance, like yeomen's dwellings; some of them of red brick like those by the river, but more of timber and plaster, which were by the necessity of their construction so like mediæval houses of the same materials that I fairly felt as if I were alive in the fourteenth century; a sensation helped out by the costume of the people that we met or passed, in whose dress there was nothing "modern." Almost everybody was gaily dressed, but especially the women, who were so well-looking, or even so handsome, that I could scarcely refrain my tongue from calling my companion's attention to the fact. Some faces I saw that were thoughtful, and in these I noticed great nobility of expression, but none that had a glimmer of unhappiness, and the greater part (we came upon a good many people) were frankly and openly joyous.

I thought I knew the Broadway by the lie of the roads that meet there. On the north side of the road was a range of buildings and courts, low, but very handsomely built and ornamented, and in that way forming a great contrast to the unpretentiousness of the houses round about; while above this lower building rose the steep lead-covered roof and the buttresses and higher part of the wall of a great hall, of a splendid and exuberant style of architecture, of which one can say little more than that it seemed to me to embrace the best qualities of the Gothic of northern Europe with those of the Saracenic and Byzantine, though there was no copying of any one of these styles. On the other, the south side, of the road was an octagonal building with a high roof, not unlike the Baptistery at Florence, except that it was surrounded by a lean-to that clearly made an arcade or cloisters to it: it also was most delicately ornamented.

This whole mass of architecture which we had come upon so suddenly from amidst the pleasant fields was not only exquisitely beautiful in itself, but it bore upon it the expression of such generosity and abundance of life that I was exhilarated to a pitch that I had never yet reached. I fairly chuckled for pleasure. My friend seemed to understand it, and sat looking on me with a pleased and affectionate interest. We had pulled up amongst a crowd of carts, wherein sat handsome healthy-looking people, men, women, and children, very gaily dressed, and which were clearly market carts, as they were full of very tempting-looking country produce.

I said, "I need not ask if this is a market, for I see clearly that it is; but what market is it that it is so splendid? And what is the glorious hall there, and what is the building on the south side?"

"O," said he, "it is just our Hammersmith market; and I am glad you like it so much, for we are really proud of it. Of course the hall inside is our winter Mote-House; for in summer we mostly meet in the fields down by the river opposite Barn-Elms. The building on our right hand is our theatre: I hope you like it."

"I should be a fool if I didn't," said I.

He blushed a little as he said: "I am glad of that, too, because I had a hand in it; I made the great doors, which are of damascened bronze. We will look at them later in the day, perhaps: but we ought to be getting on now. As to the market, this is not one of our busy days; so we shall do better with it another time, because you will see more people."

I thanked him, and said: "Are these the regular country people? What very pretty girls there are amongst them."

As I spoke, my eye caught the face of a beautiful woman, tall, dark-haired, and white-skinned, dressed in a pretty light-green dress in honour of the season and the hot day, who smiled kindly on me, and more kindly still, I thought, on Dick; so I stopped a minute, but presently went on:

"I ask because I do not see any of the country-looking people I should have expected to see at a market—I mean selling things there."

"I don't understand," said he, "what kind of people you would expect to see; nor quite what you mean by 'country' people. These are the neighbours, and that like they run in the Thames valley. There are parts of these islands which are rougher and rainier than we are here, and there people are rougher in their dress; and they themselves are tougher and more hard-bitten than we are to look at. But some people like their looks better than ours; they say they have more character in them—that's the word. Well, it's a matter of taste.—Anyhow the cross between us and them generally turns out well," added he, thoughtfully.

I thought his eye rather wandered from me, and didn't wonder, for that pretty girl was just disappearing through the gate with her big basket of early peas, and I myself felt that disappointed kind of feeling which overtakes one when one has seen an interesting or lovely face in the streets which one is never likely to see again; and I was silent a little. At last I said: "What I mean is, that I haven't seen any poor people about—not one."

He knit his brows, looked puzzled, and said: "No, naturally; if anybody is poorly, he is likely to be within doors, or at best crawling about the garden: but I don't know of any one sick at present. Why should you expect to see poorly people on the road?"

"No, no," I said; "I don't mean sick people. I mean poor people, you know; rough people."

"No," said he, smiling merrily, "I really do not know. The fact is you must come along quick to my great-grandfather, who will understand you better than I do. Come on, Greylocks!" Therewith he shook the reins, and we jogged along merrily eastward.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

The bourgeois Republic goes on expelling foreigners exactly as if France were the counterpart of Russia. During last year, 1,612 Spaniards, 1,410 Belgians, 573 Germans, 369 Swiss, 93 Dutch and Luxemburgers, 57 Austrians, 52 Englishmen, 32 Americans, 22 Russians and 21 Turks, have been sent over the frontiers, thus making a total number of 4,247 expelled. Hip, hip, hurrah, for Republican fraternity!

GERMANY.

At the general meeting of the ships' stokers on strike, held on Jan. 22nd, it was unanimously resolved that the men should continue to hold out. A strike committee of eight members was accordingly appointed, a Hamburg Ships' Stokers and Trimmers' Union being formed at the same time. The majority of the substitutes obtained from Antwerp are already on their way back to that city. They were plentifully supplied with provisions by the strikers, and their departure was effected peacefully. At the last hour, we are informed that the strike, which has been going on for ten days, has now ended. A meeting of the strikers was held at Altona, near Hamburg, on January 25th, at which the proposal made by the shipowners, that they should cancel the reduction of 10 marks (10s.) per month, recently made in the strikers' wages, and should restore their salary to 85 marks per month, provided that the workers undertook to demand no further increase in wages during this year, was unanimously adopted. With this limitation, the ships' stokers and coal-trimmers have won the victory over their masters.

The coalowners have given their answer to the five demands put forward by the coalminers of Westphalia and the Rhine Province. The workers claimed an advance of 50 per cent. in their wages, the eight hours shift, the abolition of overtime, the suppression of all deductions hitherto imposed for what is considered unsatisfactory work, and payment of wages once every fortnight. The Masters' Association, at a meeting held at Dortmund on January 23rd, drew up a letter which was addressed to H. Meyer, of Bochum, the Chairman of the Miners' Association for the Rhine Province and Westphalia, and which declared that the demands of the workers could not be agreed to by the mine owners. What will be the result of this summary refusal of all the miners' claims, we do not know; but it seems to us that the owners are again playing with the fire, and will have to come soon to some better terms, if they do not wish a renewal of the last great strike, which did them no good.

The debate on the Anti-Socialist Bill has come to an end, and the Reichstag has rejected the whole measure by 169 votes against 98. Bismarck was not there to witness his defeat, but he will feel it all the same.

We stated last week on the authority of several Socialist papers, that comrade Ignaz Auer had become insane, and that but little hope was entertained for his recovery. We are glad to say that we have been misled. Auer, whose health has been rather severely shaken by his labours in the service of his party, has gone to Montreux, a Swiss watering-place, where a sojourn of a few weeks has already proved very beneficial, and it is said that he will soon resume his political agitation in Germany.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

Our Austrian friends, notwithstanding the very serious difficulties with which they have to carry on their propaganda, make steady progress. They have more workers' institutions, associations, clubs, reading-rooms, etc. than any other country in Europe, and in the last few weeks they have created six more such "Vereine;" namely at Alt-Harzdorf, near Reichenburg, at Feldkirchen, at Brannseifen, at Wolfsburg, at Weisbach and at Znaim.

Comrades R. Hanser and A. Gollen, have issued the first issue of a new Socialist venture, under the title of Familien-Bibliothek für des arbeitende Volk (Family-Library for the Workers). It contains the following articles: 1. The workers and the press; 2. How the rich always manage matters; 3. Illustrations; 4. The bourgeois point of view; 5. Poetry. The new organ is to appear fortnightly. Address: Familien-Bibliothek, VII., Kaiserstrasse, 117, Vienna.

BELGIUM.

One of the most valiant propagandists of the revolutionary cause has died at Brussels, a few weeks ago, after a few days of illness: comrade Emile Brassine, who has been administrator of the Anarchist paper, Le Drapeau Noir (The Black Flag).

RUSSIA.

On December 10, 1889, the Russian revolutionary club in Paris held a meeting of protest against the massacres of Russian exiles in Siberia, which occurred last spring, and are now fully known from the exhaustive documentary evidence published in the Times on December 26. Attacked as they were without any provocation by soldiers and policemen, six were killed outright, eight severely wounded, and the rest made prisoners. Three of these latter were hanged, one in an almost dying state, and the others sent for many years to the mines. The resolution adopted at the meeting referred to runs as follows:

"This meeting of Russians, held on December 10, 1889, at 308 Rue St. Jacques, Paris, heard with feelings of the deepest sorrow and indignation the news of the beastly actions of the representatives of the Russian Government, which took place at Yakutsk, and the victims of which were the political exiles Podbielsky, Pik, S. Gurevich, Shur, Notkin, Muchanov, Kohan-Bernshtein, Zotoo, and Rauman. Protesting with all their might against this incomparable cruelty, the meeting expresses their boundless contempt for the gang of henchmen who call themselves the Russian Government, and their entire solidarity with the martyrs who paid with their freedom and their lives for their protest against coercion and high-handedness."

This resolution has been published in a leaflet, written in the Russian tongue, and is signed by E. Stepanov, Ch. Turevich, E. Ashkinasi, members of the committee of the Paris Russian Club.

UNITED STATES.

We hear with much regret that the Supreme Court of the United States has rejected the appeal of comrade John Most, the editor of the Freiheit, the organ of the German-speaking Anarchists, for a revision of his sentence of one year's imprisonment for vindicating the noble cause of free speech in America. The last number of comrade Most's paper announces that in the course of this year the Freiheit will again be published in eight pages instead of four. This change will be the best answer comrade Most could give to the magistrates for their vindictive sentence.

VICTOR DAVE.

SWEDEN.

From the 1st of April the Stockholm paper Social-Demokraten is going to be published as a daily paper. Social-Demokraten has been very good as a weekly, and we only hope that its staff and the support of the North Swedish workers will be strong enough to make it as good a daily. Folkets Röst (Gothenburg) has been compelled to cease. Considering that Gothenburg is the second largest city in Sweden, with a strong working-man population, this is rather sad. Comrade Danielsson (of Arbetet, Malmö) has lately printed a small book ('Genom Gallret—i.e., 'Through the Lattice Window') with poetry and some short stories. They are not only inspired with a truly revolutionary enthusiasm, but are also nearly all of them brilliant pieces of art. Danielsson seems to be one of those very rare, highly gifted persons, who have exceptional capacities as well for science as for art. They are perhaps the most useful of all revolutionists, because not so one-sided. On the 1st of February Danielsson will leave prison, after a detainment of eighteen months.

DENMARK.

The Social-Demokraten (of Copenhagen) has not said a word about the seven "revolutionists" since their expulsion became a fact. But it does not seem that the Danish workers ignore them in the same way, because there are rumours that Arbejderen is soon going to become a daily. Just now Social-Demokraten is making a great fuss about the elections to the miserable Danish Diet, which for several years has been treated like a sheepflock by the autocratic Estrugian ministry—or rather, like that silly coward mob which it is. And to be "represented" by a few men in this contemptible mob is by a Socialist paper recommended as a great and beautiful aim for the special exertions of Socialists! That is really very like giving stones to those who cry for bread.

STN.

CORRESPONDENCE.

STANLEY.

DEAR SIR,—Some one sent me last Saturday's issue, and I am glad to find my view concerning the humbug connected with Stanley's return coincides with yours and that of other advanced and sound thinkers. I have sent further opinions to the press, and, if appearing, there will be seen the reasons I advance for not considering him a "hero"—quite the contrary. But all such honesty of expression—especially by travellers or voyagers, capable of rightly judging—is, nowadays, the bringing down upon the daring speaker or writer crushing blows of ruin, as it has upon yours truly,

Bexley Heath, Jan. 21.

W. PARKER SNOW.

A PROTEST.

"Some of us must be content to die in the wilderness." So said a Fabian. And surely it is too true that many of us will die in "the wilderness." But the question is, how hard ought we to fight that we and others may not die in that wilderness? How hard, I say? Well, our hardest. And what is our hardest? 'Tis not to sit and consider which is the most convenient method to the privileged and brass-hearted of saving the poor from their merciless clutches. No; there is a wider, nobler, altogether humaner way of acting. Moses "looked this way and that way," and seeing none about, slew the Egyptian slave-driver. Was that the noblest kind of action? No. Had Moses ninety and nine lives to lose, he should have slain the Egyptian even though the whole armed forces of Egypt were by.

It is our business to raise up the most deadly, the most unflinching, the most clear-seeing spirit of revolt that can be, and as quickly as can be too. So that the ruling classes cannot misunderstand, cannot misinterpret the handwriting on the wall. What! shall we calmly see our lives and the lives of our beloved friends and brothers trampled under foot? Shall we feel the largeness of our powers of deed and happiness, and allow them to wither within us and not be stirred to the greatest depths of our manhood? And fearless of death, fearless of all, except of being agents in the perpetuation of this gigantic curse, stand forth and say: You the privileged, you the masters, you the rulers are murdering us body and soul for no good. For no good to yourselves or us. And you will not hear our cry, you will not take the stopping from your ears. No; your feet are tangled in the carcasses of our brothers and lovers and children; you will not deprive your full gorged bellies or your grotesquely covered backs of one atom of your wantonness to save our bodies alive. We tell you plainly, that with the greatest possible speed and with the most inevitable tread, we will step up to you and strike your pitiless mouths with the iron glove of justice. We will not palter, we will not cringe, we will not calculate, but manfully take from you the power by which you grind us.

We know what we want, and ought not to be afraid to ask for it in its entirety. Why should we hold back one hour? Why hold back one jot of our demand? Up and out to the four winds, and declare for a life worthy of manhood and nothing less! "Content to die in the wilderness"? No, by the glorious hope of man's unqualified freedom!

THE COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. PLEASANT PROPAGANDA IN AID OF ST. JINGO.

THE other day your reporter received a neat card inviting him in the name of Lord Brassey to 24, Park Lane, to listen to Mr. G. R. Parkin deliver an address on Imperial Federation. In the interests of Socialism and the readers of the 'Weal' your reporter has in his time dared much, but some amount of consideration was required on this particular occasion. In the search after knowledge much has to be risked, truth is worth considerable risk; but was this really a promise of some worthy addition to the store of truth, or was it simply a deep-laid scheme to get possession of your reporter? The doubt was suggested by the word "Refreshments" down in one corner. Memory recalled in an instant the various treacherous banquets recorded in history, when dangerous persons have had to be removed without exciting too much notice, and the reporter almost wished that the sub-editor, or one of those compositors, who are always spoiling one's best bits of writing out of pure envy, had been put on the job.

However, at last deciding in the interests of the ten thousand readers awaiting for this number, and that if necessary he would greatly daring die, your reporter started off, only pausing to take on the road a penny-per-hundred ticket from an automatic insurance supply box. Being somewhat more used to the wilds of Whitechapel than to the pleasantries of Park Lane, it was some trouble to find the house, especially as, in the district of overturned park railings, it did not seem quite advisable for a dangerous-looking Socialist to "Ask a P'leeceman" where Lord Brassey lived, inquisitorial questions might be put.

At last, finding the house, fortunately just as the door was opened to let some visitors in, your reporter reached the door-mat without having to make a special appeal by knocker or bell. Fairly inside the hall doubts again took possession, for quite a display of male servitors were in evidence, one of whom solemnly pointed to a side room with an intimation to undress, an order which in olden times was a prelude to the torture-chamber. Biting his lips, however, he obeyed, but it appeared that it was only hat and top-coat that was received. Luckily, in consequence of your handsome cheque on account of arrears, your reporter was, for a wonder, in possession of and therefore wearing two coats.

Having received a ticket with a number on in exchange for hat and coat, he did as others seemed to be doing, making believe to be quite at home, mounting the stairs with a quite two-thousand-a-year air, which was a quite ten-thousand-a-year air by the time one room had been inspected; an inspection which was necessitated by the fact that there was no lecturer or lecture-hall yet to be found, and as it is quite infra dig to be in a hurry or at all curious, or to ask questions, the only thing one could do was simply to follow suit, and loaf round in the hope of striking the lecture-room and lecturer in good time for the peroration if nothing else.

At last it was announced that an adjournment was to be made to the museum, and under the guidance of the speaker we passed along some passages not originally too commodious, and somewhat reduced by cases of curiosities and a number of frames containing some hundred of most dainty little drawings and pictures, taken in all parts of the world under all sorts of conditions, and which form the illustrations of the published works of the late Lady Brassey. At last an open-gallery permits a view of the hall below, which is reached by a short and somewhat steep stairway with a twist in its foot.

A dainty hall this for propaganda, by my troth, and after having climbed up ladders into lofts, and plunged down break-neck stairs into dingy cellars, groped through the stream of pea-soup and horse-bean coffee, to the hall at the rear of some coffee palace to listen to a lecture on "Art and Socialism," or "How we do live and How we might live," it almost seemed that your reporter's devotion to that sort of propaganda had now led into the lotus land; that the time of rough plank seats, dirty walls, and paraffin smoke had passed for ever, and that the cool, calm, electric beam showed the way to really restful seats in cosy corners, where one could make love, or talk on the new economics, in which, as is suggested in "News from Nowhere," the greatest difficulty is how to fairly share out the small amount of useful labour called for to provide everything for everybody.

It really seemed quite a matter of "Make-believe Land," for most of those present were known members of various more or less revolutionary organisations. Strange, surely, to find so many of the exploited class as guests of one of the greatest exploiters of this generation; audacious rather, to let the exploited see exactly the pass to which the poor capitalist has been brought to.

Just for the moment, however, all such thoughts seemed foreign, everything seemed Peace. In truth, it was very like the peace which reigned at Warsaw just when the streets had been clean swept by artillery. This, too, was the thought which came up over and over again during the proceedings. The talk was all of peace—peaceable intentions, that is—but the calculations were wholly as to war. Our country, Our empire, Our colonies, Our supremacy, the importance of Our commerce, Our civilisation, and Our mission to spread this civilisation among the uncivilised, until in absolute impatience one felt inclined to ejaculate "Say Our Everything, and damn all the rest!"

In introducing the lecturer, Lord Brassey told the audience that Mr. Parkin's mission to Australia was to "awaken the feeling that it was desirable to maintain the Unity of the Empire." This was a particularly agreeable bit of news, because it has been a very strong point with some of the Imperial Federationists that the Australian Colonies were already very awake and earnest on the question. They have laid much stress on the few hundred Australian Jingoese who were got together to volunteer for service in Egypt to secure the interest on Goschen bonds. There was some amount of pleasure also in learning from Lord Brassey that although "the solution of the question of Imperial Federation is very important and pressing, it is not the foremost of all the questions, with which statesmen have to deal," for one could not help but think that the Federationists might be a bit disappointed if they were expecting to get their questions settled just for a day or two yet. Some are inclined to think that an English Land and Labour question will come on first.

One remark that he made, we only put on record to show that Lord Brassey has a fund of quiet humour which might not be expected of him. He said that in consequence of his inquiries while in the colonies as to what was being done in the way of defence, he found that a great work was being done in the direction of a volunteer force. When he returned to England he suggested to the authorities that besides being a great compliment to the colonies, much good could be done by sending out a Properly Qualified Influential and Competent Military Man, to report on and advise as to the future; and as one of the P.Q.I. and C.M.M., he suggested the Duke of Connaught! He said it without turning a hair, and the audience stood it bravely. We were assured that Sir Henry Parkes had favourably taken up the question of Imperial Federation, but there was no mention of the speech of Sir Charles Lilley, Chief Justice of Queensland, and the remarkable fact that "Three Cheers for the Australian Republic!" is more often heard than "Rule Britannia!"

Next, Mr. G. R. Parkin, M.A., "A man with a mission," was turned on. Turned on, is in truth the only term possible to apply, for the next three-quarters of an hour or more was simply a flow of drivel, of which one strongly marked feature was the immense care which Providence had devoted to provide Our Empire with convenient coal-beds. Speaking to an audience mostly of the working-class, or representing such, he of course made out, or struggled to make out, that Imperial Federation was most particularly a working-class question. To do this, as a start, he made a statement which proved that, however bad his knowledge of economics, his knowledge of history was worse. For a man to-day to date our great industrial departure from a period of only thirty years ago, proves a very small amount of knowledge of the real facts of the case he is arguing; one might say an absolute ignorance of English industrial history and development; nothing could be more stupendously absurd. Fancy, the great change in the centre of industrial gravitation dating from thirty years ago—ten years after the Great Exhibition; if he had put it ten years before or fifty years ago he might have made out a slight case, but very slight then. But thirty years! ye gods, what history!

The next point he laboured at was almost as bad for his knowledge of details of English Government. He said there are in Canada 5,000,000 of our people, and in Australia 3,000,000 more, all of whom might be involved in a war with Russia without having had a word to say one way or the other; "the great demand of the Imperial Federationist is that these people should have a word to say, in the same way as we have at home." Holy Simples! "in the same way as we have at home"; this, in the hearing of Hodgson Pratt, who has spent a large part of his life in travelling and working with the sole object of satisfying one of the most pressing demands of English democracy, that we should have a word to say on the question of peace or war. It is a very old dodge in rhetoric to dilate on the use of pleasures, privileges, and powers which are not possessed, but it should not be done too daringly, because it sometimes intensifies demands which have to be satisfied.

The man with a mission then launched forth on our immense commerce, how in one of the remotest of our Welsh villages in a tiny grocer's shop he found a tinned lobster which had come all the way from British Columbia; how in every corner could be found similar proofs of our dependence on food from far away; how that in a discussion before the dons of Oxford last summer a gentleman declared positively "that England was never more than six or eight weeks from want of food supplies," a fact which has been urged for years by some of us, but which seems such a novel suggestion to the Federationists that it is laboured at under all varieties of re-stating, but with the only conclusion that a Special Providence has placed coal-fields just exactly where most useful to re-coal men-of-warships. To remember that we have £1,100,000,000 sterling worth of property floating every year, is enough to make every patriotic Briton hug these coal-fields to his bosom, and swear mighty swears of devotion to "Our Flag," that flag which trade goes hunting all over the globe.

It was very interesting to note how, that all the way through the proceedings—although occasional references were made to peace and the interest the working classes have in peace—war, warships, the army and the navy, had by far the largest amount of consideration. Providence, according to Mr. Parkin, was more concerned to provide coal for war-ships than for working-men's fires. Although much was made of our immense imports of food, there was not a single word suggesting the possibility of producing any increased supply of food in England, not a word as to the thousands of acres of waste land here, not a word as to the possibility of increasing our own consumption of products, but much of increased export; although much was made of the fish from British Columbia, there was not a word on the iniquitous claims over river, lake, and sea at home, which causes the waste of tons of food every year.

As was fitting under the circumstances of time and place, it was deemed well to admit that this is a great democratic age; but by some crooked arguments from the ancient democracies we were warned against hoping too much from the spread of democracy. "Democracies have been broken up by want of power to combine." Yes, true, oh preacher! and bear in mind that aristocracies are smashed up as soon as democracies do combine, so don't be too anxious.

The wind-up was truly great—bosh! "A brave, hardy British nation ready at a minute's notice to spring to arms"; "her flag floating over one-fifth of the whole world"; "the power of war controlled by 300,000,000 people"; "if such a mighty power is to be in the hands of any nation, it should be in the hands of the British nation." Yes, we have been so good in the past! "We can shut up the coalings and refuse to supply foreign ships of war." Hurrah for general boycott! Of course our past record in war-making had to be in a measure excused by this apostle of peace. It might have been rather unfortunate that we had to fight so often, but in self-defence we had to fight them, right or wrong. In mercy we will assume that he has no knowledge of England's futile war to repress the French Revolution.

Although several promises were made of a chance to put questions or to criticise, no real opportunity was given; and Hodgson Pratt surprised some by his praise of what he termed a wonderful address, filled with facts and information, and by his want of a word of challenge on the jingoism of the whole affair.

George Howell, M.P., in seconding the vote of thanks, really struck the only sensible note when he gave a few figures on the small increase of our colonial trade during the last fifty years, suggesting that from various causes it might be our foreign trade had reached its limit of development, in spite of all our efforts.

Sir Frederick Young, President of the Colonial Institute, who it appeared had been Imperial Federalising in Africa, supported the vote, and told us that "our type of civilisation is the highest in the whole world." Snakes!

Parkin in his reply said he was satisfied that if we will only study the question (of federation) the settlement will take care of itself;—the only remark in the whole palaver with which your reporter agreed, and with which Wealers will cordially agree; upon grounds, however, which would disgust Parkin and Co.

The coffee and cake which followed was quite an agreeable change, for it was real, while the other had sham—bogus—vapour in every member of it.

An inspection of the beautiful and curious objects gathered by "Sunbeam" voyages all over the world, daintily lit up by electric lamps cunningly contrived of shells and other devices, the turning over of choice books of travel and log-books, finished up a very comforting evening, proving in the first place the utter emptiness of the Imperial Federation craze and furnishing a whole fund of suggestion to the Socialist, who sees hope that in the future the many will have more of reliefs to life's dreariness and struggle, than they ever yet have had; who believes that the producer, and not the profit-monger only, will enjoy what he produces; when the Sunbeam takes the place of foul fog and fever-laden smoke, and when the true Federation of Labour takes the place of Imperial Federation and of every other sort of Imperialism.

YOUR DEVOTED AND DARING REPORTER,

IN PARIS.

THE other week I spoke of the Parti Ouvrier as being the daily organ of the Possibilist party, supported by secret service money. Well! this week I invite you to its funeral; for the paper is dead. Dead, because the Government, having secured a majority for four years in the Chamber of Deputies, no longer needs the help of those deluded Socialists who, a year or so ago, put their confidence in the Opportunists, to fight with them against that shadowy "danger" le brave General, who is now pondering over human caprice on that safe refuge the rock of Jersey—which it is too much to hope he will leave for Zululand or Timbuctoo—to share the fate of the son of his prototype, Badinguet.

The smash-up of this paper, the Parti Ouvrier, is a striking lesson to those more half-hearted Socialists who think they may rely upon Radicals to further their Socialistic schemes. Here was a strong body of men, imbued with good Socialist principles, many of whom had built and fought behind barricades in '48, and defended their homes, arms in hand, against the bloody Versaillais. The leaders of these men were invited to a drawing-room party in the rue Cadet, and to their great shame they accepted. Boulanger had begun to be noisy, and the Government offered Joffrin a seat in parliament at the coming general election, and a daily paper for his party, on condition of fighting him à outrance, and the bargain was made.

All the time the paper lasted, Victor Dalle, Brisac and Allemaire, were its editors, and, although each of them had suffered imprisonment and persecution for the cause of Socialism in the past, they were now no longer able to write one common-sense article. They got so besmeared and mixed up with anti-Boulangist tomfoolery, that they forgot all their former sufferings at the hands of the very same "Democratic" Government they were now so warmly defending. Reading the Parti Ouvrier, one would have thought, that after Boulanger's downfall we should see ready roasted skylarks falling into our mouths, and dainty frog-legs leaping into every Frenchman's dish! Socialism was nowhere. "Let us kill Boulanger" and then—we will get a seat in parliament for Joffrin and the suppression of the Parti Ouvrier. Constant having got all he could out of these workmen, would not even leave them the journal till after the municipal elections, which come off in three months. No; the three cats who had been chestnut-getting for M. Monkey-Constant will get a small compensation; but the 25,000 proletarians who are now left gaping, amazed by the shock, will get a dog's allowance—kicks and curses.

At this critical time, when international conflicts are coming to a head, when thousands of the hungry and rebellious are learning from the past to prepare for the change which they feel is inevitable in the near future, at such a moment this smash-up of the Possibilists comes in the nick of time. The rank and file are sure to swell the number of those who believe that when the pear is ripe it must be plucked and not asked for; that guns have no will of their own, but obey the hand that can wield them. In their minds at least the cartridge-box will replace the ballot-box.

A very large percentage of the population of any country is thoughtless and careless; things may go as they will so long as they are not troubled. Place the forces of a country under the control of the enemies of the present system, and you will see that great section of the populace looking on at the change unconcerned. Well, the plan of thousands of our friends here, is to get hold of these forces, and so easy of realisation is the plan, that they are not afraid of proclaiming it upon the house-tops. We have scarcely a barrack in France where you could not find dozens of ours, and the dozens are growing into hundreds.

Now that Constant has got all he could by flattering the workmen, he is beginning to show his teeth. Odin got notice a month ago that he would have to appear before the Cour d'Assises for a speech. Last week a foreign Socialist was expelled. This week another sub-editor is to be prosecuted; and Jules Roques, the proprietor of l'Egalité, may see his paper suppressed at any time. All this is the forerunner of the great struggle which cannot be avoided. The bourgeois shot 35,000 of our friends in the last commune. If so many are killed this time, they won't be all on one side we can promise you.

A. COULON.

Paris, 26th Jan., 1890.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Gas-stokers' Strike.

Mr. Livesey has not yet crushed the gallant stokers; but they are very much surprised at the apathy of other trade unions, who calmly look on while these brave men are fighting their battle. Hugh Brown, who presided at the meeting at Deptford on Sunday, pointed this out with a certain amount of bitterness. He especially complained of the dockers, whom the gas-stokers had helped in their trouble, but who had done very little for them. Now this should not be. Even from a purely selfish point of view the unions should help the gas-stokers in their fight, for if Livesey wins, it simply means that every employer who wants to sweat his workmen will have learnt the way in which trade unions can easily be broken up. The army of labour will be attacked in detachments and utterly beaten. Therefore the unions, and especially the new unions like the dockers, should look upon the gas-stokers' strike as a life and death struggle, in which all workers are intimately concerned. If they regard the matter in this light, and rally to the aid of their brothers, Livesey may yet be defeated and the new movement be saved from a danger that threatens its very existence.

The trade union delegates who met at the Great Assembly Hall on Saturday Jan. 25, recommended the strikers to send a deputation to the London Trades Council to ask their aid in bringing the strike to a successful issue. It is to be hoped that the Council will do their utmost to help the strikers, though we fear that any attempts at mediation on their part will not be successful, as Mr. Livesey has already announced his intention of receiving no more deputations of the men or of any other persons on their behalf. What is wanted is the workmen's pence to help their brothers in the struggle, and if their fellow-workmen will only come to their aid with the sinews of war, the men may be still victorious.

The Billingsgate Fishporters.

There is very little to report during the past week. The men offer now to submit the dispute to arbitration. They have sent a letter to the chairman of the Fish Companies, in which they state that they are willing to nominate "two gentlemen of known position and character" to act with two gentlemen to be nominated by the Companies, to decide upon the points in dispute. The arbitrators are to select an umpire, whose decision in case of disagreement is to be final. The men state they are willing to abide by and to work according to this decision for six months. We do not like arbitration schemes, especially when the arbitrators are all "gentlemen of known position and character"—that is, middle-class men, whose sympathies are naturally with the capitalists, and who always decide in their interests. Surely the dissatisfaction among the dockers with the famous Mansion House agreement, which the men are so disgusted with that they have torn it to pieces within considerably less than six months after its conclusion, should teach the fish-porters how very unsatisfactory from the workers' point of view are the decisions of "gentlemen of known position and character." Probably experience will make them wiser.

Trouble at the Wharves.

The men at Hay's Wharf are still out. It appears that one reason for the strike, according to one of the men who writes to the Star, is the fact that some fifty men are even now paid for their meal-time, simply because they went back to work a few days before others at the termination of the great strike. This correspondent also states that Hay's Wharf is now the only one on the South side which does not pay for meal-times; for, while all the other wharves receive 4s. for eight hours work, the men at Hay's get only 3s. 9d., while before the great strike they were paid 3s. 4d. No wonder they are in revolt against the Mansion House agreement.

On Monday twenty-five carmen who were entering a wharf, were called upon to come out by the secretary of their union. They obeyed the summons, and Tom Mann, who cheered them, was run in by the police on a charge of obstruction. The magistrate however dismissed the case. The police seem very zealous in the interest of the capitalist; rather too zealous in fact.

The men at Chamberlain's Wharf are also out. A foreman was suspected of keeping back a certain part of the plus which was due to the men. One of the men was appointed by his comrades to inquire of the wharf-owner if this was so. He was soon assured that it was wrong, and the men were satisfied; but the man who made the inquiries has been discharged, and fifty men are now "out," and will not return till their "mate" is taken back.

Miners' Conference at Birmingham.

The conference of the National Miners' Federation was opened in Birmingham on Wednesday, January 22nd. The Miners' Federation now numbers over a hundred thousand, and is increasing rapidly. The chairman, Mr. Pickard, M.P., spoke his mind upon the South Wales men, who had indulged in daring speeches in past conferences, declaring that they would not have such a rotten system as the sliding scale again, unless they could secure a 10 per cent. advance and the eight hours system; and yet after all, when it came to fighting or not fighting, had adopted another rotten sliding scale, and had tied their hands for years to come. This cowardly action on the part of these men has made a general strike an impossibility; therefore it was not surprising that the conference agreed to adopt the Eight Hours Bill, introduced by Cunningham-Graham in 1889, with slight modifications. They decided also to make the question a test one in all elections in mining constituencies. It appears that the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Unions had been instructed at the Dundee Conference to draft an Eight Hours Bill for Miners; but the Parliamentary Committee had not done it, probably because of their objection to anything which they imagine savours of Socialism. The result was that the miners' delegates present went for the Parliamentary Committee, and said they should hear "more of it" at the next Trade Union Congress. A deputation from the Federation are going to interview Messrs. Gladstone, Churchill and Dunraven, to see if these politicians were in earnest or not with their promises. We fear that the Miners will not get the bill through, and after all will be forced to fall back upon gaining the eight hours day by means of a general strike. Referring the question to parliament is merely postponing the whole question. The conference also decided to demand another 10 per cent. advance.

The Capitalist Press and South Wales.

If the South Wales men have incurred the anger of their English comrades, they can at least shake hands with themselves upon receiving the congratulations of the capitalist press upon their moderation. A correspondent of the South Wales Daily News, points out that "Mabon," Mr. Abrahams, M.P., ought to receive a testimonial from tradesmen, merchants, bankers and professional men, because his wise and courageous counsel to workmen greatly helped to bring about the settlement." The correspondent goes on to say that: "If a strike had taken place it would have probably been the longest and most bitter strike ever known, and the loss to tradesmen, bankers and others, would have been incalculable, and in many places ruinous." Therefore of course they ought to subscribe liberally. A Trade Union leader, who considers the interests of tradesmen, bankers, merchants, and professional men, before that of the men he represents, is decidedly the sort of person that trade unions should get rid of as soon as possible. As the Labour Tribune points out, bankers, etc., are all peace at any price men, and are only anxious that there should be no strikes. It is a matter of no interest to them whether the miners get high, low, or even fair wages. We think that mine-owners ought also to subscribe to the testimonial, as Mr. Abrahams has evidently rendered them very important services, as the only people who have suffered from his "wise and courageous counsel" are the men.

SOCIALISM IN SHEFFIELD.

THE progress made by us in Sheffield during the past year may be said to be very satisfactory. In the beginning we were much hampered by the lack of a regular meeting-place, but we held meetings at each other's houses; we also had open-air meetings at Hillfoot and Westbar. We have now, however, secured rooms in a central position in the town, and our numbers are constantly increasing.

During the dock strike in London, we held a special meeting in Paradise Square to raise funds to aid the men, and we were enabled to forward about £30 to the Strike Fund.

Strikes have as yet been few in Sheffield, but there have been two in which we took part. In the month of September, the fibre-drawers of the firm of S. Laycock and Son, Limited, turned out to resist the imposition of a new rule which the masters wished to add to the long list already in force, and each of which was enforced by the penalty of a fine. These fines were already so many, and applied in such arbitrary ways, that the masters could at any time take the whole and even more than the weekly earnings of any worker. All had been meekly endured until the last straw of the additional rule or excuse for robbery, when the men struck against it. They then consulted with us, and we advised them not alone to resist the new rule but to demand the abolition of all the others, the return of the 10 per cent. taken off three years before, and also that justice should be done to the women, who, most unjustly, were paid about 20 per cent. less than the men, though payment was by piece-work! The firm of Laycock is one of the most prosperous in Sheffield, but notwithstanding this the firm stood out for their new rule, and the men surprised them by demanding all we advised. This was answered by a threat to close the works, the company falsely declaring that they would supply their customers from other houses. The men held firm, and even refused, at our instigation, to send a committee to consult with the masters as the latter proposed, saying that they would accept nothing less than all they had demanded, and if the masters had anything to say to them they might come or send to their committee room. In the end, however, the men agreed to give up the demand for equal wages for the women, and returned to work as all their other demands had been conceded.

On the 16th of November, our comrade Mowbray visited us from London, and held numerous successful meetings. On Sunday, Nov. 17th, he addressed a meeting near the Jubilee Monument in Fargate, one of the best and most central positions in the town, and which we were led to believe could not be used for the purpose without permission from the Corporation or the God-Almighty of Sheffield—the Duke. While Mowbray was speaking, an inspector attended by a policeman made his way through the crowd and demanded his name, which was given. On Dec. 7th, he returned here, and on this occasion aroused the wrath of the enemy to a most satisfactory extent. Letters appeared in the Telegraph denouncing him, and calling him every kind of hard names, at which we rejoiced and were exceedingly glad.

We had another strike at that time at the firm of John Brown and Co., an account of which has recently appeared in the Weal. Blackleg traitors were not wanting in the strike, and some of them were severely handled. We took a prominent part in the struggle, and owing to our increased activity and the plain and honest manner in which we advised the workers, the police were soon stirred to action by the masters, and at our next meeting at the Jubilee Monument we had the honour of being attended by several policemen and a short-hand reporter of the Independent, which paper had been requested to furnish a report to the Watch Committee of the Town Council. At our next meeting, beside the policemen and the reporter, we were favoured by the attendance of the chief constable and the town clerk, who stood out the whole of the time, about an hour and a-half, which showed the great interest they took in the proceedings; no doubt they have profited by our teachings. We are sorry to say, however, we were defeated mainly through the treachery of the blacklegs.

Our last meetings took place on January 5th, and we held two outdoor meetings in spite of the weather. Our evening meeting at Westbar was very well attended, and great attention was paid to the addresses of Bingham and Charles. I should mention that we had a good address in the morning from Edward Carpenter at the Monument. Comrade Creaghe gave a lecture the same evening at half-past eight at the Central Radical Club, on "Lessons for English Radicals from the Argentine Republic." The lecturer's remarks were well received by a large audience. There is no doubt that among the members of the Central Radical Club there are many already well disposed towards the teachings of Socialism. On the whole we may claim in Sheffield that much has been done with the means at our disposal. Much more we hope will be done in the future, as we now have good rooms which we can offer to trade societies as meeting-places, when they desire to confer with each other on the occasion of a strike or for other purposes.

"COMMONWEAL" GUARANTEE FUND.

The following further sums have been received towards this fund:—H. R., 1s.; Mrs. Schack, 1s.; J. Presburg, 6d.; N. Rogers, 1s.; B. W., 6d.; F. Kitz, 6d.; J. B. G., 6d.; James Thomson, 6d.; E. Radford, 1s.; W. Morris (Coleford), 5s.; and Bell Scott, £1.

REPORTS.

'COMMONWEAL'.—On Sunday evening, H. H. Sparling delivered an interesting lecture to an appreciative audience on "Cannibalism and Capitalism."—S. P.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—Fair meeting at Latimer Road on Sunday morning. Speakers were Harrigan, Crouch, R. Catterson-Smith, A. J. Smith, Maughan and Dean. In evening, owing to non-arrival of lecturer, comrade Crouch opened a discussion on "Why a Working-man should be a Socialist." The subject gave rise to a good debate, in which comrades Maughan, W. H. Rogers, Dean and Saint, took part. We made two converts; regular attendants at our meetings. All Commonweal's sold. Collected 1s. 3d.

NORTH LONDON.—Comrade Morris lectured to a crowded audience last Wednesday on "How shall we live then," and was well received. There were a fair amount of questions and discussion, but practically no opposition. Eight shillingsworth of literature sold.

ABERDEEN.—We have done good work here lately. At indoor meeting on 13th, two short papers were read and discussed. At a meeting of house and ship painters, held for the purpose of again forming a union (the former one having collapsed). Leatham spoke as a Socialist, and as a member of the Organising Committee of the Aberdeen Trades' Council (to which he and comrade Aiken were returned some months ago). The enthusiasm of his reception showed how our work tells among the working-men of Aberdeen. At indoor meeting on 28th, we discussed the Protection v. Free Trade and Currency question, with some warmth till a late hour.

GLASGOW.—On Monday evening of last week, Glasier lectured to the South-side Branch of the Single Tax Association, on "Socialism v. The Single Tax." A lively debate followed, in which comrades Joe Burgoyne and Gilbert took part, the audience being well divided in our favour. All our out-door meetings had to be abandoned during these last two weeks, owing to the unusually stormy weather; with the exception of our Paisley Road Toll meeting on Sunday evening, when Glasier, during an interval of calm, lectured to a very good audience.

LEICESTER.—Open-air meeting, Russel Square; small audience. We sold 5s. 4d. worth of literature at Mrs. Annie Besant's lecture at Secular Hall, on Sunday evening. Monday evening: Paper by comrade Timson, on "The Evolution of Socialism." Good discussion.

EDINBURGH (SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION).—Comrade Bell lectured on the "Politics of Burns," to a good audience on the two last Sundays. The lectures were much appreciated and good discussions followed. On Friday the 24th, the Federation held its Annual Soiree, Concert and Dance. A large company partook of a plentiful supply of cake, fruit and tea, provided by Mrs. Forsyth. Musical selections, recitations and songs, (mostly Burns' and Socialist), were well rendered by comrades and friends. Stirring addresses were delivered by comrades Melliet and Glasse. Dancing was indulged in until 4 a.m.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—On Sunday, Jan. 19th, T. Barclay, of Leicester, spoke in Sneinton Market to a good audience, on "Socialism;" Rooke presiding. In the evening there was a good audience in the Socialist Hall, and Barclay spoke on "Fallacious Remedies for Poverty;" Peacock in the chair.

EDINBURGH—SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—In Moulders' Hall, High St., Sunday February 2, at 6.30, comrade Gilray, "The Place of Syndicates in Social Evolution."

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB, Woodland Place, Parliament Street.—Sunday H. H. Sparling (of London), at 11 a.m., "The Evoluted Cannibal"; at 7 p.m., "Luxury now, Necessity then."

SHEFFIELD.—At Hallamshire Hall, Westbar, on Sunday February 2, J. Sketchley, 11 a.m., "The Labour Movement at Home"; at 6.30, "Free Trade v. Fair Trade from a Workman's point of view."

LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE SOCIALISTS.—All those branches and societies who are wishful to be represented on the lecture-list to be drawn up in accordance with the resolution of the Liverpool Conference, as reported Jan. 25, are to send the names and addresses of their secretaries to Edw. C. Chapman, 1 Stanley Street, Liverpool.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto:

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE Daily News, in giving a glowing account of the Gladstonian meeting, of which William O'Brien and John Morley were the bosses, says that it would be a great mistake to suppose that the country is tired of the Irish question; that this feeling of weariness does not exist outside the London clubs, etc. Perhaps a Tory would answer with the proverb, "He who excuses himself accuses himself." Why should the Daily News suppose that people are tired of the Irish question? To speak plainly there is no doubt that everybody that is not a professional politician is heartily tired of the Irish question as it has been presented to us. In other words, it has about served the business for which it was taken up by the politicians, i.e., a game over which people could get desperately angry so that they might forget the real matters of importance—matters of life and death that are crying out to us.

The Irish are beaten then? All this excitement has been for nothing? No, surely not. On the contrary the English democrat has made up his mind, and for him the Anglo-Irish tyranny is a thing of the past. I suspect also that the intelligent Tory (if there be such a thing) has made up his mind also, and is preparing for a climb down by means of the inevitable ladder of compromise.

The real point to be noticed in the lull on the subject of Home Rule is this, it has lost its relative importance because of the advance of opinion within these last years. It is no longer the Great Wrong to be righted by the Great Redresser of Wrongs, the Great Liberal Party under the leadership of the G.O.M. Many Radicals, I think, honestly believed in this once, and thought that they, the freemen, could set this nation of slaves free.

All that is gone indeed! How fast the "wide-roaring loom of time" goes! How the web is changing! The Irish peasant oppressed by his landlord is not the only figure that the English workman sees on whom to exercise his political heroism, for he sees himself also in pretty much the same condition as his Irish brother, and for him to give freedom to any one before he has got it for himself is beginning to seem to him a dull job. The Irish question is getting to be swallowed up in the one question of classes. As a political football it has been pretty much kicked to pieces. But the Irish working-man, under whatever name, need not trouble himself about that. That he could be freed from his exploiter while other workmen were groaning under theirs, was a mere delusion of his, and the only hope for his freedom lies in the awakening of his English brethren.

In commenting on the proceedings of the Society for the Preservation of Footpaths, the Daily News says of the stealers of footpaths: "Generally the attempt is made more from want of thought than from any desire to rob the public." H'm, well; I don't think landowners do these things in their sleep. I remember a country lawyer telling me that the chief part of his business came from his devising means for the shutting up of rights of way. I asked him what he thought of his career set beside that of Jack Sheppard, and he replied that he must live. He seemed rather hurt by my views on that question.

W. M.

The Labour Elector has, if trades-unionists are not the curs which they are sometimes said to be, finally broken with any large body of workmen whom it may hitherto had some claim to speak for. In its last number it repeated the offence of the week before, by again attacking Mr. Parke, who, being in prison, is unable to speak for himself. One thing which I note with pleasure is the withdrawal of John Burns and George Bateman from connection with the Labour Elector. This is what might have been looked for; the last accusation that could have been brought against either of these men was cowardice. What the reactionary sheet will do now, deprived of the only name which gained it recognition or support, remains to be seen.

John Burns's letter in the Star showed what he felt; in it he spoke of another sent by him to the Labour Elector, to which, however, that estimable paper made no reference, treating other similar letters in the same way. If this were done to conceal the receipt of Burns's letter, it was certainly useless; for "after all," like Mrs. Wilfer's underpetticoat, "we know it's there!" S.

We have been told that even Homer nods sometimes; but one is forced to think that Huxley was not only nodding, but fast asleep, when he wrote his profoundly illogical article in the Nineteenth Century, in which he makes such game of Rousseauism, as he calls the latter-day demand for equality of opportunity, or what a Yankee would call "a square deal."

To some it will sound like heresy to suggest that Prof. Huxley has, to use Oliver Wendell Holmes's phrase, only a one-story intellect. "All fact-collectors who have no aim beyond their facts are one-story men. Two-story men compare, reason, generalise, using the labours of the fact-collectors as well as their own. Three-story men idealise, imagine, predict. . . Specialists are the coral-insects that build up a reef. . . I had rather be a voyager that visits all the reefs. . . I am a little afraid that science is breeding us down too fast into coral-insects."

Prof. Huxley's latest seems to be a very sad proof of the truth of the above estimate, and of the statement which Holmes makes in another place that logic is not everything: "You can hire logic, in the shape of a lawyer, to prove anything that you want to prove." The correctness of this has seldom been proved so completely as when Prof. Huxley, starting with the fact that a new born baby is the slave of its nurse, ends up by agreeing that "there is much to be said for the opinion that force, effectually and thoroughly used, so as to render further opposition hopeless, established an ownership which should be recognised as soon as possible."

Physical-force revolutionists have not for a long time been provided with an authoritative sanction more complete than this of Prof. Huxley. As an incitement, it is as frank as when the Times said "that Liberty is a serious game, to be played out, as the Greek told the Persian, with knives and hatchets, and not with drawled epigrams and soft petitions." It is also a warning for the force to be justified must be strong enough to render further opposition hopeless. War à l'outrance means war justifiable and justified. It is support to what has been urged before, that had the men who took off Charles I.'s head have taken off a few more, there would have been no anti-revolution, no Charles II. It very considerably extenuates the later period of the French Revolution and its so-called excesses.

Prof. Huxley's method of unreason has done one little service, in that it has brought out two very eloquent letters from Robert Buchanan, who in the Daily Telegraph has shown that the son of one of Robert Owen's Socialist missionaries has still some lively sympathy with the views so ably expounded on the platform and in the Glasgow Sentinel of forty odd years ago by the Robert Buchanan of that day.

"Great wits jump, and poets are always allowed some prophetic instinct," says Buchanan. "Men advance more surely by freedom than by restraint, necessary as certain restraints may be. Before the outbreak of the English Revolution, personal prerogative, the arbitrary will of one sincere political bigot, had strangled English liberty. Englishmen rose en masse, and liberty, in the political sense, was saved. Before the outbreak of the great French Revolution, Catholicism had almost destroyed the commerce of a great nation. The inevitable cataclysm came, with what terrible accompaniments we all know. At the present hour, at the very time when the free thought of England is at its brightest and best, when the scientific and historic method have disintegrated the whole mass of religious superstition, still another great upheaval is imminent, to the peril, perhaps to the destruction, of our whole social system. . . A colossal Hand, which some call the hand of destiny and others that of humanity, is putting out the lights of heaven one by one, like the candles after a feast."

It behoves us, then, to watch heedfully that the same hand, having emptied the heavens, does not touch the lowly but life-illuminating lights of earth. The fairest of these lights is Liberty, the principle of natural freedom and equality, without which individual growth would be impossible, and social organisation, as we now understand it, an impossibility." NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. V.—CHILDREN ON THE ROAD.

PAST the Broadway there were fewer houses on either side. We presently crossed a pretty little brook that ran across a piece of land dotted over with trees, and a while after came to another market and town-hall, as we should call it. Although there was nothing familiar to me in its surroundings, I knew pretty well where we were, and was not surprised when my guide said briefly, "Kensington Market."

Just after this we came into a short street of houses; or rather, one long house on either side of the way, built of timber and plaster, and with a pretty arcade over the footway before it.

Quoth Dick: "This is Kensington proper. People are apt to gather here rather thick, for they like the romance of the wood; and naturalists haunt it, too; or it is a wild spot even here, what there is of it; for it does not go far to the south: it goes from here northward and west right over Paddington and a little way down Notting Hill: thence it runs east to Primrose Hill, and so on; rather a narrow strip of it gets through Kingsland to Stoke-Newington and Clapton, where it spreads out along the heights above the Lea marshes, on the other side of which, as you know, is Epping Forest holding out a hand to it. This part we are just coming to is called Kensington Gardens; though why 'gardens' I don't know."

I rather longed to say, "Well, I know"; but there were so many things about me which I did not know, in spite of his assumptions, that I thought it better to hold my tongue.

The road plunged at once into a beautiful wood spreading out on either side, but obviously much further on the north side, where even the oaks and sweet chestnuts were of a good growth; while the quicker-growing trees (amongst which I thought the planes and sycamores too numerous) were very big and fine-grown.

It was exceedingly pleasant in the dappled shadow, for the day was growing as hot as need be, and the coolness and shade soothed my excited mind into a condition of dreamy pleasure, so that I felt as if I should like to go on for ever through that balmy freshness. My companion seemed to share in my feelings, and let the horse go slower and slower as he sat inhaling the green forest scents, chief amongst which was the smell of the trodden bracken near the way-side.

Romantic as this Kensington wood was, however, it was not lonely. We came on many groups both coming and going, or wandering in the edges of the wood. Amongst these were many children from six or eight years old up to sixteen or seventeen. They seemed to me especially fine specimens of their race, and were clearly enjoying themselves to the utmost; some of them were hanging about little tents pitched on the greensward, and by some of these fires were burning, with pots hanging over them gipsy fashion. Dick explained to me that there were scattered houses in the forest, and indeed we caught a glimpse of one or two. He said they were mostly quite small, such as used to be called cottages when there were slaves in the land, but they were pleasant enough and fitting for the wood.

"They must be pretty well stocked with children," said I, pointing to the many youngsters about the way.

"O," said he, "these children do not all come from the near houses, the woodland houses, but from the countryside generally. They often make up parties and come to play in the woods for weeks together in summer-time, living in tents, as you see. We rather encourage them to it; they learn to do things for themselves, and get to notice the wild creatures; and, you see, the less they stew inside houses the better for them. Indeed, I must tell you that many grown people will go to live in the forests through the summer; though they for the most part go to the bigger ones, like Windsor or the Forest of Dean or the northern wastes. Apart from the other pleasures of it, it gives them a little rough work, which I am sorry to say is getting a little scarce for these last fifty years."

He broke off, and then said, "I tell you all this, because I see that if I talk I must be answering questions, which you are thinking, even if you are not speaking them out; but my kinsman will tell you more about it."

I saw that I was likely to get out of my depth again, and so merely for the sake of tiding over an awkwardness and to say something, I said—

"Well, the youngsters here will be all the fresher for school when the summer gets over, and they have to go back again."

"School?" he said; "yes, what do you mean by that word? I don't see how it can have anything to do with children. We talk, indeed, of a school of herring, and a school of painting, and in the former sense we might talk of a school of children—but otherwise," said he, laughing, "I must own myself beaten."

Hang it! thought I, I can't open my mouth without digging up some new complexity. I wouldn't try to set my friend right in his etymology; and I thought I had best say nothing about the boy-farms which I had used to call schools, as I saw pretty clearly that they had disappeared; so I said after a little fumbling, "I was using the word in the sense of a system of education."

"Education?" said he, meditatively, "I know enough Latin to know that the word must come from educere, to lead out; and I have heard it used; but I have never met anybody who could give me a clear explanation of what it means."

You may imagine how my new friends fell in my esteem when I heard this frank avowal; and I said, rather contemptuously, "Well, education means a system of teaching young people."

"Why not old people also?" said he, with a twinkle in his eye. "But," he went on, "I can assure you our children learn, whether they go through a 'system of teaching' or not. Why you will not find one of these children about here, boy or girl, who cannot swim; and every one of them has been used to tumbling about the little forest ponies—there's one of them now! They all of them know how to cook; the bigger lads can mow; many can thatch and do odd jobs at carpentering; or they know how to keep shop. I can tell you they know plenty of things."

"Yes, but their mental education, the teaching of their minds," said I, kindly translating my phrase.

"Guest," said he, "perhaps you have not learned to do these things. I have been speaking about; and if that's the case, don't you run away with the idea that it doesn't take some skill to do them, and doesn't give plenty of work for one's mind: you would change your opinion if you saw a Dorsetshire lad thatching, for instance. But however, I understand you to be speaking of book-learning; and as to that, it is a simple affair. Most children, seeing books lying about, manage to read by the time they are four years old; though I am told it has not always been so. As to writing, we do not encourage them to scrawl too early, though scrawl a little they will, because it gets them into a habit of ugly writing; and what's the use of a lot of ugly writing being done, when rough printing can be done so easily. You understand that handsome writing we like, and many people will write their books out when they make them, or get them written; I mean books of which only a few copies are needed—poems, and such like, you know. However, I am wandering from my lambs; but you must excuse me, for I am interested in this matter of writing, being myself a fair writer."

"Well," said I, "about the children; when they know how to read and write, don't they learn something else—languages, for instance?"

"Of course," he said; "sometimes even before they can read, they can talk French, which is the nearest language talked on the other side of the water; and they soon get to know German also, which is talked by a huge number of communes and colleges on the mainland. These are the principal languages we speak in these islands, along with English and Welsh; and children pick them up very quickly, because their elders all know them; and besides our guests from over sea often bring their children with them, and the little ones get together and rub their speech into one another."

"And the older languages?" said I.

"O, yes," said he, "they mostly learn Latin and Greek along with the modern ones, when they do anything more than merely pick up the latter."

"And history?" said I; "how do you teach history?"

"Well," said he, "when a person can read, of course he reads what he likes to; and he can easily get someone to tell him what are the best books to read on such or such a subject, or to explain what he doesn't understand in the books when he is reading them."

"Well," said I, "what else do they learn? I suppose they don't all learn history?"

"No, no," said he; "some don't care about it; in fact, I don't think many do. I have heard my great-grandfather say that it was mostly in periods of turmoil and strife and confusion that people cared much about history; and you know," said my friend, with an amiable smile, "we are not like that now. No; many people study facts about the make of things and the matters of cause and effect, so that knowledge increases on us, if that be good; and some, as you heard about friend Bob yonder, will spend time over mathematics. 'Tis no use forcing people's tastes."

Said I: "But you don't mean that children learn all these things?"

Said he: "That depends on what you mean by children; and also you must remember how much they differ. As a rule, they don't do much reading, except for a few story-books, till they are about fifteen years old; we don't encourage early bookishness: though you will find some children who will take to books very early; which perhaps is not good for them; but its no use thwarting them; and very often it doesn't last long with them, and they find their level before they are twenty years old. You see, children are mostly given to imitating their elders, and when they see most people about them engaged in genuinely amusing work, like house-building and street-paving, and gardening, and the like, that is what they want to be doing; so I don't think we need fear having too many book-learned men."

What could I say? I sat and held my peace, for fear of fresh entanglements. Besides, I was using my eyes with all my might, wondering as the old horse jogged on when I should come into London proper, and what it would be like now.

But my companion couldn't let his subject quite drop, and went on meditatively:

"After all, I don't know that it does them much harm, even if they grow up book-students. Such people as that, 'tis a great pleasure seeing them so happy over work which is not much sought for. And besides, these students are generally such pleasant people; so kind and sweet-tempered, so humble, and at the same time so anxious to teach everybody all that they know. Really, I like those that I have met prodigiously."

This seemed to me such very queer talk that I was on the point of asking him another question; when just as we came to the top of a rising ground, down a long glade of the wood on my right I caught sight of a stately building whose outline was familiar to me, and I cried out, "Westminster Abbey!"

"Yes," said Dick, "Westminster Abbey—what there is left of it."

"Why," said I, "what have you done with it?"

"What have we done with it?" said he; "nothing much, save clean it. But you know the whole outside was spoiled centuries ago: as to the inside, that remains in its beauty after the great clearance, which took place over a hundred years ago, of the beastly monuments to fools and knaves, which once blocked it up, as great-grandfather says."

We went on a little further, and I looked to the right again, and said, in rather a doubtful tone of voice, "Why, there are the Houses of Parliament! Do you still use them?"

He burst out laughing, and was some time before he could control himself; then he clapped me on the back and said:

"I take you, neighbour; you may well wonder at our keeping them standing; and I know something about that, and my old kinsman has given me books to read about the games that went on there. Use them! Well, yes, they are used for a sort of subsidiary market, and a storage place for manure, and they are handy for that, being on the water-side. I believe it was intended to pull them down quite at the beginning of our days; but there was, I am told, a queer antiquarian society, which had done some service in past times, and which straightway set up its pipe against their destruction, as it has done with many other buildings, which most people looked upon as worthless and public nuisances; and it was so energetic, and had such good reasons to give, that it generally gained its point; and I must say that when all is said I am glad of it: because you know at the worst these silly old buildings serve as a kind of foil to the beautiful ones which we build now. You will see several others in these parts; the place my great-grandfather lives in, for instance, and a big building called St. Pauls. And you see, in this matter we need not grudge a few poorish buildings standing, because we can always build elsewhere; nor need we be anxious as to the breeding of pleasant work in such matters, for there is always room for more and more work in a new building, even without making it pretentious. For instance, elbow-room within doors is to me so delightful that if I were driven to it I would almost sacrifice out-door space to it. Then, of course, there is the ornament, which, as we must all allow, may easily be overdone in mere living houses, but can hardly be in mote-halls and markets, and so forth. I must tell you though that my great-grandfather sometimes tells me I am a little cracked on this subject of fine building; and indeed I do think that the energies of mankind are chiefly of use to them for such work, for in that direction I can see no end to the work, while in many others a limit does seem possible."

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

DENMARK.

One of our comrades in Stockholm visited Copenhagen when the elections to Parliament were on, and made a special point of studying the tactics of the party leaders and their organ, Social-Demokraten. He says:—"The tactics have been: (1) To criticise the proposals and doings of the Government; (2) To point out the standpoint of the Danish Social Democratic party in regard to these proposals and doings; (3) Besides that, not to point out any measures that the candidates of the working-men party would struggle for if they were elected." And our Swedish comrade says he is utterly astonished to find that the Danish elections are not at all used for Socialistic propaganda, not even for agitation against the Liberals, but merely for discussion of the Conservative policy of the government and their party. Not even a word about the resolutions of the Paris Congress, eight hours working-day, and laws protecting the workers against some of the worst forms of capitalistic oppression. Not even that! These Danish Social Democrats explain that we shall get Socialism (the Social Democratic reforms) through reform legislation by Parliament. That may be some sort of standpoint, but it is socialistic?

Arbeideren has begun a very good and interesting series of critical articles upon "The Programme of the Danish Social Democracy." It would only be reasonable and evolutionistic if every party that has a programme revised and criticised it at least once every two or three years. Such "house-cleaning" will always be found healthy and necessary. Anybody doubting this will change his opinions when reading the above-mentioned partly amusing, partly astonishing articles in Arbeideren.

What I said last week about Social-Demokraten leaving Arbeideren and its group in peace, is no longer true. There have again lately been some most vile personal attacks in the former paper upon the principal supporters of the latter, who are again and again by means of evidence, that the latter has proved false, denounced as hirelings of the Conservatives and of the Government.

Every serious thinker, and the great body of the working-men, who are, if they will, the real rulers of the land, look steadily to the inevitable and noble outcome of the Australian Republic. The wise among us regard the Imperial Federation League as an important ally of republicans, because it has aroused the just and vigilant suspicion of people that it and similar enterprises are intended to impede and defeat the national aspirations for independence.—Chief Justice Lilliey.

IN AUSTRALIA.

THE Western Queensland drovers are organising; and the following suggestions are to be submitted to a general meeting of drovers called for December 28th, at Tambo:

RATES OF WAGES, AT PER WEEK.—For sheep, 10,000 or under, not less than 80s.; over 10,000, not less than 100s. For cattle, 500 or under, not less than 80s.; over 500, not less than 100s.

CONTRACT RATES.—For cattle, at per hundred miles, for 500 head, not less than 1s. 6d. per head; over 500 head, not less than 1s. 3d. per head. For sheep, 10,000 or under, not less than 55s. per week per thousand; over 10,000, not less than 50s. per week per thousand. And that the annual subscription be £2 2s.

As considerable enthusiasm prevails successful organisation seems certain.

The Darlings Downs shearing dispute still drags on, several stations being seriously crippled by the severe letting alone they are getting. In the Toowoomba Chronicle, "A Shearer" has pointed out that if the squatters offered to meet the shearers in a fair way they would find the trouble easily got over, as the union rules do not prevent the manager being boss of his own shed but simply prevent him imposing on the men. Some of the shed rules have been the grossest imposition, notably one clause which enabled an overseer to forfeit a whole pen of ten or twelve sheep if in his opinion one was improperly shorn. Such a rule is one of the many reasons why the shearers are sticking to the union.

A conference was held at the Maritime Hall, Brisbane, on Saturday last, to discuss the starting of a labour paper, which was attended by delegates from the Charters Towers and Gympie miners, Queensland railway employes, Brisbane Early Closing Association, Maritime Council, Central Queensland Labourers and Carriers, Building Trades Council, Australian Labour Federation, Boilermakers, and Butchers. Over 20,000 workmen were represented. After a long discussion a scheme was recommended to the various societies which provides for a monthly journal to be circulated free of charge among all members of co-operating societies, and to be supported by a payment of 1s. per member per annum from such societies. This paper will be the sole property of the societies supporting it, and be in charge of a board of trustees to be elected by the societies. The question will be submitted to the shearers, carriers, and labourers at their annual meetings, and it is generally thought that such advanced bodies cannot fail to lead the way by carrying a resolution to co-operate nem. con. The indications seem to be that most of the other societies represented will be similarly and spontaneously favourable, particularly as the scheme has the joint advantages of excluding every interest detrimental to labour, and of placing the finances of the concern at once on a sound and truly co-operative footing. The name suggested, by the way, is the Swagsman, the Australian term for a workman tramping in search of work, a popular and topical name that should "take."

The Australian Trades and Labour Journal, of Melbourne, has gone to pieces on the financial rocks. The Sydney Trades and Labour Advocate celebrated its tenth weekly issue by announcing the receipt of a writ for libel. Its editor, W. G. Higgs, was for a long while secretary of the Typographical Association, and was given a testimonial the other day by the members for long and good service.

At the meeting of the Council of the Queensland Labour Federation held on November 26th, the secretary was elected delegate to visit the annual meetings of the Labourers, Carriers, and Shearers Unions to be held at Barcardine and Blackall on the 2nd, 3rd, and 6th of January next; he will endeavour to secure the affiliation of these societies, and, judging from the feeling which is manifesting itself in all parts of the colony, there will be no difficulty in doing so. At a meeting of shearers held on the Downs the other day, it was unanimously agreed to instruct their delegate to the Blackall annual meeting to vote for the federation of their union with all other unions in the colony. This in itself speaks well for the success likely to attend the secretary's efforts.

The rules of the Sydney Tailoresses' Union contain provisions for the payment of 7s. 6d. per week to each member who may be ill, this sick pay to continue for the first thirteen weeks, after which 5s. per week will be paid for the following thirteen weeks. The Sydney Journeymen Butchers have formed a union, which starts with 300 members. The Journeymen Bakers are following suit. The Cutters and Trimmers are also organising, and have about 30 members in their Provisional Union.

On Saturday, a meeting of the Operative Bakers' Association and non-union men connected with the trade took place at the Temperance Hall, about 400 being present. The object was, to invite the non-union men to join the Operative Bakers' Association in consequence of the defiant attitude shown by the master bakers towards trades-unionism. The following resolutions were passed nem. con.:

"That the non-union bakers of Sydney and suburbs agree to join the Bakers' Union; that five non-union members be appointed from the meeting to meet the committee of the Bakers' Union to arrange for entrance fees and any other business necessary to further the one object they have in view."

"That the committee appointed report to the Executive of the Trades and Labour Council and request them to take the matter up, and get an interview with the employers with the object of bringing about a settlement of the bakers' question."

About 70 men handed in their names to join the union, and a committee of five was appointed to meet the union committee, and the operative bakers now seem in a fair way of being united at last.

The movement for Australian independence is growing fast. This is the sort of paragraph one comes across:—"France has recognised the Brazilian Republic. Of course it has, but Britain has as yet—witness the last Exhibition—not fully recognised the French Republic, and will probably feel disinclined at first to recognise the Federated States of Australia." But then one also sees items like this taken from the Cairns (Queensland) Post:—"Before Mr. O'Malley, P.M., at the Police-court, an aboriginal, the property of Mr. A—, was charged with having stolen a coat with a watch and chain in the pocket from one Ah Fee, a cook in the Cairns hotel."

What with wage-slavery and chattel-slavery, the working-classes here won't be much better off for their new Republic, unless they take warning in time and prepare for it.

HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON!

THE COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. For Australia, New Zealand, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Transvaal, and the Argentine Republic, a year, 8s.; six months, 4s.; three months, 2s. For India, Ceylon, China, Hong Kong, and the Straits Settlements, a year, 10s.; six months, 5s.; three months, 2s. 6d.

SPECIAL RECRUIT SUBSCRIPTIONS.—To aid in spreading our principles, the following largely reduced terms are offered to those who obtain new subscribers: Two new yearly subscriptions for British Islands, etc., 10s. 6d.; for Australia, etc., 15s.; for India, etc., 19s. Five new subscriptions: For British Islands, etc., 25s.; for Australia, etc., 37s. 6d.; for India, etc., 47s. 6d. Specimen copies will be sent on receipt of postage.

Remittances from abroad must be made by International Money Order.

MEN WHO ARE NOT SOCIALISTS.

V.

HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF HAMILTON.

I HAVE never had the pleasure of meeting His Grace,—one of the reasons being that he is so seldom in this part of the country—but if I should ever have that pleasure, I will cordially grasp his hand. It is true he is a duke, and that he steals £120,000 a year from his poor neighbours; but there is no need of our affecting to be fastidiously virtuous, so long as things are as they are. We are all thieves, if it comes to that; and if we don't steal as much as the Duke of Hamilton, it is chiefly because we have not got the chance. If we could all be dukes the thing would be right enough. After all, there is not so much harm in stealing; it is the monopoly of stealing—the preventing others having an equal opportunity—that does the mischief. If stealing were universalized, (Kant says that true morality is to act so that your actions may be universalized) it would be Socialism. (The editors of some capitalist advertising prints, will no doubt drag this little sentence from its home, and stick it in the pillory of their leader columns as a mark for the brick-bats of ignorant slander and abuse; it is foredoomed, I know, to become a martyr in the cause, nevertheless let it go bravely forth to do its duty.) The Duke of Hamilton is not a Socialist so far as I am aware; but he is better than being a Socialist—he makes other people become Socialists. He is one of the biggest propaganda forces in the country. I know many people who call themselves Socialists, who might as well call themselves cabbages for all the good they do. It doesn't matter a rap what a man is, it is what a man does that tells on the progress of the cause. There are some Socialists who have so little energy, generosity and courage, that they could better serve Socialism by dying right off, and having the words, "Here lies a Socialist," inscribed on their tombstones, than by living to the age of Methuselah; (and here let me suggest that every Socialist should stipulate on his death-bed that a text from the Socialist Catechism, or a verse from one of Morris' songs, should be engraved on the slab that decorates the sward above his mortal clay. I especially commend this idea to timid Socialists, who are afraid to avow their principles when alive—a man can say what he likes after he is dead—they don't hang corpses now-a-days.)

The Duke of Hamilton filches £120,000 from the labourers and miners of Lanarkshire. He has a magnificent palace at Hamilton, in which he has not resided for many years. He has a castle on one side of the Island of Arran, and a grand shooting lodge on the other; neither of which he inhabits for more than a couple of weeks in the year. He cruises on the Mediterranean; gambles at Baden-Baden and Monte Carlo; shoots buffaloes on the Rocky Mountains; attends race-meetings, and does anything "he damn'd well pleases," to use a favourite phrase of an Anarchist friend of mine. He is thus a living monument of the iniquity of the existing state of society; and his career speaks more eloquently than a hundred unemployed socialist agitators, in behalf of the subversion of landlordism and capitalism, and the institution of a "general divide."

A Lanarkshire miner gets on the average 1s. for hewing a ton of coal; and his work is hard, unhealthy and dangerous. For every ton of coal the miner hews, the Duke gets 1s. in the form of royalty; yet the Duke does not move a muscle or do anything in the least to produce the coal. The Duke has never worked, and never intends to work, with the help of Providence, the political parties, and the stupidity of the people! Of course, this 1s. per ton royalty, is downright, flagrant, clamorously crying-out robbery, and the Duke himself would, I suppose, be the first to admit the fact. But the Duke has to do this robbery business—people would laugh at him if he refused, and someone else would be got to do it in his stead. Even the miners who are presently being plundered, would only be too glad to step into his shoes if they could. Supposing the Duke wanted to stop the thing, he couldn't; he would just require to wait till the social revolution came, like the rest of us.

Whenever therefore I feel the interest of my audience flagging, I trot out the Duke as it were, and show him round, metaphorically. I make him take off his hat, and show his carrotty hair and low forehead. I unbutton his great-coat, to exhibit the grand dimensions of his neck and waist. I then turn his trousers-pockets inside out, and count his £120,000 in gold and bank-notes, and ask him to tell the audience where he got it all, and how he intends spending it. I ask him a few questions in elementary arithmetic, geography, history and mineralogy, to show that as a clerk or a check-weight man at a pit-head, he would not be tolerated for ten minutes. I give him a spade to dig the ground; a pick to hew coal; a saw to cut wood, to show that he could not make two pence a day at any manual craft. Of course the audience gets mad at the Duke; and if I had the real Duke, and not merely the theosophical part of him beside me, I have little doubt but that he would "fare rather roughly" at its hands—to use a happy phrase of the capitalist press, when describing how a Socialist speaker got dipped in a horse-pond, stripped of nine-tenths of his clothes, robbed of ten-tenths of his railway fare money, and afterwards pitched over an embankment on to a dung-heap.

But I would not allow the mob to harm a single hair of the Duke's head if I could help it, so long, at least, as they are fools enough to tolerate dukes and lords and capitalists at all. He is very useful to us, as I have already said, so handy for being shown round the ring; and, besides, he is quite free from the usual cant and hypocrisy of his class. He does not build churches or preside at political meetings. If he steals he does it because he has the power, and he makes no justification or apology. He doesn't attempt to prove that stealing is a virtue, and that those who allow him to pick their pockets are particularly wise and pious for so doing, or that it is the will of providence that he should steal and that they should be stolen from. He simply takes what he can get and looks for more, and allows snobbish clergymen and politicians to do the preaching and pacifying if they choose.

I will now mention an occurrence which has given me great joy, and has caused me to bless the name of the Duke of Hamilton and Brandon. The town of Motherwell is falling down! or rather, to speak by the newspaper reports, one half of it is! That half is the villadom half. The gables are cracking, the chimney stacks twisting, and the internal stucco ornamentation dropping down like April showers! There is every likelihood, says the newspaper report, of many houses becoming total wrecks, and their front gardens converted into unpicturesque heaps of débris. And not a farthing of compensation will the villa holders get! I fervently hope the news is true, that it is not exaggerated but rather understated. This wish may appear somewhat uncharitable, if not positively wicked, but I will explain.

First, the Motherwell villa residents are not Socialists, therefore I don't like them; any misfortune that may happen them brings me joy. All people delight more or less in the discomfiture of their enemies, but few have the courage like me to say so.

Secondly, the only thing that will ever make the Motherwell villa residents become Socialists, is to see their houses cracking and falling about their ears without getting a penny of compensation, or some similar catastrophe.

And that, luckily, is what is happening. The Duke in leasing them the ground, reserved the right to work out the coal underneath it. Some time ago he intimated to them that he was about to do so, and that if they wished to secure the stability of their houses they would require to purchase the necessary "stoops" of coal beneath. The cost was too great for the leaseholders, so they took their chance, trusted in Providence, and hoped for the best. But the worst came—and now they have no redress, no compensation! I just feel quite happy about the occurrence, and hope the newspapers will have pleasant reports of villas—self-contained and semi-detached—falling down every week for a couple of years or so. It will do as much for Socialism as a cholera plague does for religion.

The last time I held a meeting at Motherwell I was threatened with dislocation of the upper vertebrae, because I ventured to speak somewhat disrespectfully of the Duke and the law behind him. Now that "much has happened since then," and that "new conditions present themselves for consideration and debate," as the graceful circumlocution of the politician puts it, I am afraid my speechifying would be still less acceptable in that district; for if I attempted to say a few words in commendation of the Duke as I have ventured to do here, they might not merely threaten to break my neck; they might attempt to do it.

But we don't need to preach Socialism to the villa holders of Motherwell for some time to come. Every crack in their walls, every falling flake of plaster, speaks eloquently to their acquisitive ears against the monopoly of land and minerals. There is not, perhaps, a great deal of Socialism in that, but it is about as much as the majority of them will ever accept until the revolution comes.

I will conclude, seeing we are not quite out of the festive season, by asking every Socialist who is not a teetotaler "on principle—not because, etc.," to join with me in drinking "To the subsidence of the ground and the fall of the villas at Motherwell, and many more of them! coupled with the health of his Grace the Duke of Hamilton and Brandon!"

J. BRUCE GLASIER.

IN SOUTHERN AFRICA.

How much sympathy the workers at home may expect from the colonial press may be well judged by the following comment, which I cut from a recent article in the Cape Times on one of the London strikes. The writer says: "A striker with a grievance is a man with whom to reason, but a striker with a grudge is a victim to be scourged." The thought came to me at the time that the writer of the article from which the comment is cut knew, or sought to know, very little of what he was writing about, knew nothing of the "gospel of discontent" which is taking hold of the workers in all countries, and which will not rest till it has wrought out a happier condition of life for all. It may be that before this happens the "scourging" which the writer refers to may have to be resorted to, and I am much mistaken if the stripes do not fall upon the right backs when the time comes.

I have just returned from a visit to Robben Island, where there is a leper hospital and lunatic asylum. The article in Blackwood's a couple of months ago has brought about a little improvement in the general arrangements made for the inmates; but let the Government do what they will—and they are not over likely to do very much—one thing they will never be able to do, and that is to make the island a fit place for a human being to pass his or her lifetime. Ach mein Gott! I would not land a mad dog upon it to end its days, let alone a human being—though only a Kaffir! There seemed to be only one opinion amongst the whole of the passengers coming back, and that was, that a month or so on Robben Island would send the sanest man that ever lived—Solomon included—hopelessly mad. I should like to banish the whole Legislative Assembly for one short month to the island, with this proviso, that if they found it comfortable they could stop there, but if not, that they would shift the lepers and lunatics to some other place. I will pass my word that not a soul would be found in the island at the end of the month. From the deck of the small steamer it looks as if the ground had been thickly strewn with broken sandstone, and the glare of the sun on the white sand hurts one's eyes as much as looking into a huge furnace would. The Government seems to have found out—but mark, this is only since the brutal treatment and filthy surroundings of the inmates were exposed—that the friends of the natives do not wish visitors to be admitted. Had the article in Blackwood's never been penned, one could have almost driven a horse and cart through the wards and no notice would have been taken; but now the doors are shut, and the visitor is told that the inmates are well cared for, which is lie number one; and that they are comfortably housed, which is lie number two; and that they do not wish for any change, which is lie three. As for the friends of the inmates, well, there is nothing to fear from them; they belong to the class which does not as a rule write leading articles, and which if they did would find it a difficult matter to get any paper to print them.

I noticed some suggestive remarks in the different magistrates' reports to be found in the Blue Book of Native Affairs for 1889. From a magistrate in the district of Mganduli comes the following: "There is but little progress in civilisation worthy of remark amongst the natives during the past year; they seem contented to go on in the same course, to plant their gardens and herd a few cows." Let me here hazard a remark: I wonder if said magistrate imagines the natives have aught to gain by accepting the civilisation which the Government are trying to foist upon them. If he imagines so—but he can hardly be thick enough in the head to imagine that—I pity him. However, I should like to say to the natives—Go on planting your gardens and herding your cows, for if you accept the rotten civilisation offered you, you will very soon have no gardens to plant and precious few cows to herd.

W. E. Shanford, chief magistrate of Griqualand East, speaking of the excitement caused by a rising among the natives, says: "With the change in the form of government and the cessation of quarrels the opportunity of the European dealers and speculators came. Farms were sold for a case of gin—for a small debt due at the local store—for a trifling sum of money advanced—for a few head of stock—and after a time there was the reaction. Of course the Griquas did not blame themselves for the landless destitute condition into which they were falling. First it was the dealers and speculators who had cheated them; but the bargains were shown to have been openly entered into, and could not be upset. Then the discontent became political; 'Under our own government we were prosperous,' they said, 'but now how different.' The wilder spirits went into rebellion, but the land had gone for ever, and the last phase has been the immigration into Pondoland of the remnants of the tribe under Wm. Kook, a stepson of the old Kaptin. They have settled down in a strip of country given them by the late chief Umqakela, and are comparatively happy again." And this tale can be told of most of the tribal risings which have taken place in years past, and the same thing will no doubt occur wherever and whenever the speculator and British syndicate maker appears.

The magistrate of Bathurst reports: "As a general conclusion, I have the satisfaction of saying that the natives of this division are quiet and contented, living peaceably with one another. I heard of little distress among them, but I do not know of any who are really well-to-do. There have been no diseases except the ordinary maladies, such as measles. The state of affairs is fairly satisfactory, and the only thing that causes any anxiety is the collection of the hut-tax." This magistrate, to whom the "collection of the hut-tax" is the only cause of anxiety, seems to think it a matter of surprise that there are no millionaires to be found amongst the natives. Well, Mr. Magistrate, let me tell you that when the presence of "well-to-do" men figures in your report, that day there will also appear a statement that the natives no longer live peaceably with one another, no longer are quiet and contented, and instead of little, that there is much distress amongst them, and more maladies than measles. The state of affairs won't then be "fairly satisfactory," and other causes than the "collection of the hut-tax" will give you or your successors cause for anxiety.

From the district of Bedford comes the report that the "return of the Kaffir chiefs from transportation gladdened their countrymen, who have been since then living in expectation of hearing where they are to be located, presumably with the intention of going there too."

From all of the different districts almost an entire absence of disease and very little crime of any kind is reported. The "triumphant march of the white man" is all that is required to alter all this; a few speculators, with their "fair and open bargains," will cause more crime than shiploads of missionaries can ever hope to cure—i.e., if one put any faith in the usefulness of these people.

In an article which appeared in the Cape Times of December 31st, the writer admits that "the influence of Socialism upon the political development in England will be widely recognised before the close of another year. And the numbers of earnest politicians who are adopting Socialist views of certain questions relating to labour—who are avowing a modified Socialism—is increasing day by day." So much for the editor of the Cape Times opinion. If I thought that the influence of Socialism was going to rest with the "political development," why, I would join a branch of the Primrose League at once and be done with it. As for the said "political development," it can well be let go where it is fast going—viz., to the devil. Let us look to the industrial development.

In the meanwhile, just to show you that there is no slavery in this part of Africa, I cut this from a daily paper. Somehow it had a sound about it that puts one in mind of "down South" during the old slavery days.

"LEFT HER HOME.—Amina Mobara, a Malay Girl, aged 18 years, having run away from Stall No. 22, New Market, Cape Town, on the 9th inst. Anyone possessing information of her whereabouts kindly communicate with that address. Any person harbouring her after this date will be prosecuted."

STRIKE OF STICKMAKERS IN THE EAST-END.

It seems for some time past there has been a strike amongst the stickmakers of this district, and, strange to say, the capitalist press have ignored all communications sent to it by the secretary of the union. The greatest offenders in this matter have been the Star and the North London Press, perhaps this may be owing to the fact that most of the men are "foreigners." The chairman of the South London Gas Company is not the only one to break up the recently formed unions, most desperate efforts having been made by two stick-making sweaters, viz., Strouss and Metz. It seems that these two sweaters have seen what effect the union would ultimately have upon the robbery of labour, that cost what it would, they would use every effort to smash the organisation. The finishers can earn at the utmost an average wage of 12s. per week of 15 and 18 hours per day, with a reduction of 4d. to 6d. for the use of gas according to wages earned, 1d. for cleaning the shop, and 1d. interest in the 1s. is charged on all money lent during the week. Filers and benders can earn from 20s. to 25s. per week, with the reductions at above rate. Notwithstanding the sweating wages paid, Metz, of 20, Worship Street, and Strouss, of Playhouse Yard, Golden Lane, insist upon a reduction of 45 per cent. on these miserable wages, which will render it impossible for any of the employes an opportunity of bare existence. The men ask that the masters should receive a deputation. No answer being received to the first letter, a second was written to these firms, and met with the following treatment. The blank half was sent as an insult to the English society, and the other half containing the suggestions of the men was scribbled over and sent to the International Society of Stickmakers, with an intimation from Strouss that he would have nothing to do with the "damn union" at all. This is a matter affecting trades unionism as a whole in a most vital manner, and if the present indifferent attitude of the trades unions of London is kept up it will be one of the most effective means of retarding the movement. We appeal, therefore, to all workers, of whatever nationality, to aid the stickmakers against tyranny of the most brutal kind ever adopted against workers' organisations. This is not merely an attempt on the part of the masters to resist increased wages, but is part of a deep-laid scheme to break up all organisations, knowing that the workers have learnt that their unions are but a preliminary to the great battle of the future, which will emancipate labour.

But legal (Imperial) Federation would, if ever created, be the beginning of the end—a separation inevitably violent and unfriendly. There would be a rupture, because all experience shows that Great Britain would then endeavour to maintain the legal bond by military coercion, and with that show of right which legality gives to the wrong.—Chief Justice Lilley.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Strike at the Wharves.

It is likely that the struggle at Hay's Wharf may have some serious developments. It is evident that the attack by Mr. Livesey on the gas-stokers' union has inspired Mr. Norwood and his fellow capitalists with the idea of "smashing" the Dockers' Union. Mr. Norwood has shown in all his recent speeches that he has been writhing for some considerable time under his recent defeat; but in the speech to the shareholders last week he practically declared war against the union. After complaining bitterly that the company, through the formation of the union, had lost control over their own property, he went on to say that "the Joint-Committee must regain the control over the management of their own affairs, whatever may be the cost of their struggle." This means in plain English that the docker must be plunged into his former slavery by forcing on a quarrel with the union and locking out every man. But the quarrel must be of such a nature that public sympathy shall not be engaged on the side of the men, so that they shall be left to fight their battle with the scanty funds of a young trade union. Mr. Norwood imagines that he has such a quarrel in the fight at Hay's Wharf, and he, through the agency of his fellow conspirators—dock directors and wharf-owners—is bombarding the middle-class press with accusations against the men of breaking the sacred agreement of 14th Sept. Now, for my part, I should not regard that as a very great offence, as that agreement was in every way a most unsatisfactory one; but it just happens that the men have not broken that agreement, for the very simple reason that these men had concluded an agreement of their own with the proprietors of the wharf, and had gone back to work on 7th Sept., seven days before the Mansion House agreement was signed. Therefore the accusation falls to the ground. But no doubt this will make little difference to Mr. Norwood and his friends; they will go on repeating the same stale old lie about the "breach of agreement," and if the facts are against them—well, so much the worse for the facts!

We are glad to see that the men hold well together, and are well backed up by the Dockers' and Carmen's unions, the members of these unions refusing to take goods from the wharf. Both unions have issued a manifesto, calling on their members after the 10th February to refuse to work with non-union men. The secretary of the South Side Labour League has issued a similar notice. This is an excellent answer to Mr. Norwood's gage of battle.

At Cutler Street Tea Warehouse the men refused to load a van from the wharf, and though a hundred of them were dismissed, yet the van had to go away empty. A hundred men struck at Brooks' Wharf on Friday 31st Jan., on being asked to load tea for Hay's Wharf. The stevedores have also refused to handle goods from steamer "Bellaini," berthed beside the wharf. The boycott promises to be very effective. The enraged masters are endeavouring to get up a case against Tom Mann for intimidation; but should he be arrested John Burns, who spoke at a large meeting held in Southwark Park on Sunday, is ready to take his place.

Later.—The dock directors and wharf-owners decided on Tuesday to form a union of masters, and to sack any men who refuse to load the vans of blackleg carmen. This will bring matters to a crisis.

The Gas-stokers.

A deputation from the Gas-stokers' Union attended at the London Trades Council on Thursday Jan. 30. The Council has decided to help them to bring the strike to a successful issue, though it has not stated publicly what form that help will take. There are already signs that the other trade unions are beginning to take an interest in the gallant fight which the gas-stokers are making. The Strike Committee have received £30 from the Ironfounders; the London Journeymen Basket-makers, numbering over 400 members, have subscribed a sum averaging 4s. a-head; the Hatters, numbering 800, have promised a levy of 1s. a-man; and the Glass-blowers a sum of £5 a-week till the strike is over; and the London Compositors will also probably subscribe £100 to the strike fund. We hope that other unions who are thinking about helping the gas-stokers will do so at once, as this is probably the worst part of the struggle.

The Sailors and Firemen's Union are still loyally helping the strikers. They have sent a steam launch from the north, which they expect will be very useful in the task of calling out the men from the colliers. There is trouble, too, among the blacklegs at Rotherhithe and East Greenwich. They are holding meetings and carrying on a vigorous agitation against the reduction of their wages by Livesey taking away the £1 a-week bonus they received in the earlier weeks of the strike. On the whole, it seems that the men have still a good chance if the other unions continue to support them.

Unskilled Labour in Mines.

The recent conference of miners in Birmingham have passed a resolution amending the Mines Act, which will enact, if passed through Parliament, that no person shall be allowed to work in an ironstone or coal mine who has not entered the mine as a worker before attaining the age of 20 years, and any manager admitting such people to work in the mine to be subject to six months' imprisonment. The reckless way in which mine-owners are willing to risk the lives of their men by flooding the mines with a mass of unskilled labour from the agricultural districts, is one of the chief grievances of the miners. Great lumbering country bumpkins, 30 or 40 years of age, who have never seen a mine in their lives before, are sent down to risk their own lives and the lives of the miners in a place where a blunder frequently means death. This is done by mine owners to lower wages, the lives of the workers being a matter of very small consequence. To such a pitch has this evil gone in some cases, that a delegate stated at the conference that at one colliery in South Wales there were so many agriculturists employed, that it was known as the "farm labourers' mine." There can be no question that many of the fearful calamities that frequently startle us in the mining districts, are caused by the ignorance and stupidity of these "new hands." We fear, however, that this proposed amendment of the Mines Act will have a small chance of passing through a House of Commons composed of capitalists with a love for "cheap" labour. We think, however, that the miners would be quite within their rights in treating this as part of the great "blackleg" question, by refusing to work with people who increase to such a terrible extent the risks of a most dangerous occupation.

BUYING OUT LANDLORDS.

At the protest meeting in St. James's Hall the other evening, the following resolution was carried:

"That this meeting strongly condemns any scheme of land purchase which would entail a risk of burdening the British taxpayers for the benefit of Irish landlords."

John Burns, in seconding it, said that that meeting was called to protest against English landlords in Ireland being compensated out of the money English labourers contributed to the rates and treasury of this country. He would further say that he would object to money being paid by the English people to compensate English landlords in England, but, as sufficient for the day was the evil thereof, they could confine themselves to the iniquity of exploiting the labour of the English workpeople, so that the Irish landlords could be ransomed for having exploited too well in the past the Irish proletariat by means of rack rents, famine, disease, and civil war. A few thousand landlords, mostly Englishmen, now demanded what would be equivalent to £5,000,000 of interest to be paid by the taxpayers yearly. Having wrung from the Irish peasant all that meant a decent life, they now wanted to extract 150 millions from the English workman, and for what? for the privilege of ceasing to rob other people. Yet in Parliament, and to some extent in the County Council, men came to them saying, "In the name of justice and liberty would you expropriate the Irish landlord?" and ask them to submit quietly to the charge of 150 millions; whilst in the same breath they objected to spend a few millions to perfect the London sewerage, to provide improved workmen's dwellings, or to build a town hall on the Embarkment. He called upon the English working-men, who, he said, if they knew their power, could be the arbiters for the Irish people, not to yield to the demand. The Irish landlords were to be compensated up to the hilt, in order that they might have an opportunity of doing something to justify their existence. The men who compromised on a question like this betrayed a cause, and deluded a people. The time had come to talk plainly and openly, and the truth was that private property in land was an anomaly, an injustice, and an unmitigated curse to the community. He trusted the day was not far distant when the working-men of London would hold a meeting in that hall to celebrate the downfall of the system of compensation being paid to landlords, whether they were labelled English, Irish, Scotch, or French. Private ownership in land was doomed six years ago, when Michael Davitt, Henry George, and himself stood on that platform, and he called attention to the adherence now given to this view by the Radical candidates for London constituencies, by certain members of Parliament. He contrasted this adherence with the manner in which the doctrine of land nationalisation was scouted six years ago. He was willing to forgive all the injustice which the landlords had committed in the past provided they should have the privilege to rob no longer, and do no more injustice to their fellow men. The economic development of society tended to the abolition of all monopolies; landlordism was essentially a monopoly, and they protested against it, and objected to compensation being given for past holding. They must resolve that there should be no peasant proprietors, no leasehold enfranchisement, and no free sale of land, for this, he said, would make the work of land nationalisation more difficult, and he called upon the working-men not to content themselves with mere shouting at public meetings, but to throw aside the hereditary subserviency of the frock coat and high hat. As a Socialist and workman, he told them that the enemy they had to meet was not landlord tyranny in itself, but their own apathy, ignorance, mistrust, selfishness, and suspicion. What a year the past had been! In Brazil slavery had been abolished, and the slave-master had got the sack with a month's notice paid in advance to clear out. Forced labour had been abolished in Egypt, slavery had been done away with in more than half of the Turkish dominions, and in America and the Colonies workmen were arousing themselves with an enthusiasm that was really extraordinary. In this grand old London they had shaken up, and 200,000 men and women had combined for paltry palliatives, for higher wages, and shorter working hours. In that they had done the best as a precursor to organisation towards the further things that would inevitably follow. It had been said by Tories and Liberals that the price of denying Home Rule to Ireland was socialistic legislation as bribes to the English workmen. As a Socialist and a workman he denied that that was the truth. They would take from both parties what they could get, and would force from either all they possibly could, but if what was offered was meant as a blind to prevent those who agreed with him in extending their sympathy to the Irish people, it would only make English working-men more discontented and more determined to get justice for themselves, and whilst endeavouring to obtain justice for themselves were determined to secure for the Irish people what they had a right to demand.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE TRAM MEN.

Dear Comrade,—In the Weal for January 25th, re "Labour Struggle," some remarks are made on the tramway men and their union; I should like to supplement them with a few of mine. The union is managed similar to the Dockers' Union, the men having little or no voice in the management. They pay 3d. per week to the union, which is sent to headquarters. They do not, as far as I can gather, know what they are paying it for as far as I can learn except for out-of-work pay which they are to receive, or what the objects of the union are, except to find a job for the secretary and allowing the Rev. Mr. Barclay to pose as a philanthropist. When tram men belonging to the union leave their job on the Woolwich and South-Eastern London line to go to the gun factory at Erith to act as "blacklegs," it shows that the union is not worth much. In fact, tram men are slaves, and only fit to be slaves; as they are afraid of one another, have no luck, and put up with all sorts of insults from inspectors, clerks, and passengers alike. The managers play with them, as they like putting extra work on to them and other inconveniences, which they accept without a murmur. All their thoughts are centred on betting and horseracing; they are composed mostly of pensioners and country yokels, in fact, the trams are next to the docks, their last resort.—Yours fraternally,

H. PAUL,

"One who has been Behind."

EDINBURGH—SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—In Moulders' Hall, High St., Sunday February 9, at 6.30, lecture, "A Criticism of the Present System."

"COMMONWEAL" GUARANTEE FUND.

The following further sums have been received towards this fund:—H. R., 1s.; F. C. S. S., 1s.; J. Presburg, 6d.; B. W., 6d.; F. Kitz, 6d.; Nicoll (2 weeks), 1s.; A. Seglie, 6d.; P. Webb (2 weeks), 2s.; and C. Saunders (2 weeks), 2s.

REPORTS.

'COMMONWEAL.'—Good meeting at Broad Street, where Mowbray spoke to a very attentive audience; 17 Weals sold. We believe that this will be a good station if worked well. On Sunday, Feb. 2nd, comrade G. Netlow delivered an interesting lecture on "A Glance at the History of Anarchism;" good attendance; 1s. 8½d. collected.—S. P.

NORTH LONDON.—A good audience turned up on Wednesday, Jan. 29th, to hear Nicoll on "Law and Order;" very good discussion and good sale of Weal. On Sunday afternoon, Mowbray and Nicoll spoke at Hyde Park; about 30 Weal and other literature sold; 1s. 4½d. collected.—T. C.

ABERDEEN.—At weekly meeting on Monday, Morris's lecture on "Monopoly" was read and discussed. At the meetings held on Thursdays we have taken up the study and discussion of Spencer's "Study of Sociology," and mean to go over it chapter by chapter. The first has already gone well.—L.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday at 2 o'clock, we held a meeting on Jail Square, Glasier being the speaker. At 5 o'clock, Joe Burgoyne addressed a good meeting at Paisley Road Toll. In connection with the County Council elections, Glasier spoke at a miner's meeting at Springside, Kilmarnock, on Friday night, and at a mass meeting in Dalry on Saturday evening.

HALIFAX.—On Sunday evening, Samuels (of London) lectured here to an appreciative audience on "Socialism and the Political Economists." There was afterwards a most spirited and interesting discussion. Good sale of pamphlets.

LEEDS.—On Sunday morning in the Market, Samuels spoke to an attentive audience for an hour on "Reasons for Discontent." There was over 3s. worth of literature sold.

LEICESTER.—Sunday last, Barclay and Chambers spoke in the Square. In the afternoon, William Morris lectured at the Radical Club, Vine Street, on "How We Shall Live Then." There was a very good attendance, and Morris's ideal, a lucid and logical demonstration of the desirability and necessity of putting it into practice, was listened to eagerly, and frequently applauded; 12s. 6d. was collected. A sharp discussion followed the discourse, as also in the evening at the Secular Hall, where Morris addressed a full audience on "What Socialists Want." Monday night, Spurling spoke at Humberstone Gate; good attendance again. Sale of Commonweal and other literature amounted to 6s. 10½d.—T. B.

EDINBURGH (SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION).—Comrade Gilray lectured to a good audience on Sunday in the Moulders' Hall. "The Place of Syndicates in Social Evolution" was interesting and instructive to all. A good discussion followed.

PLAISTOW.—On Thursday 16th January, at Secular Hall, Plaistow Broadway, H. Paul opened an adjourned debate on "Is Trade necessary to Civilisation?" in the negative, and advocated Communism; which was opposed by brain-working clerks and little shop keepers, who thought that the human race would degenerate and die out without commercialism. There are a few Socialists and one or two Individualist-Anarchists in this branch of the N.S.S. Very good discussions on social questions have taken place.—H. P.

HALLAMSHIRE HALL, SHEFFIELD.—On Feb. 2, J. Sketchley lectured in the above hall—in the morning on "Free Trade v. Fair Trade from a Workman's point of view"; in the evening on "Work and Wages." We have a good piano, and hope in a week or two to get together a good choir. It is also intended to organise a band of our own.—S.

SHEFFIELD SOCIALISTS.—A good meeting was held Sunday morning at the Monolith, addressed by Mrs. Usher and Charles. In the afternoon we went down to Rotherham, where Mrs. Usher and Charles held another meeting. In the evening, at the Westbar, a very attentive audience listened to the reading of 'A King's Lesson,' and addresses by Shortland, Smith, and Charles. Commonweal sold out, also good sale of other literature. Last week a warrant was applied for against one of our comrades, but the magistrates only granted a summons returnable next Friday, when he is to be charged with persuading, inciting, etc., etc., divers persons to murder a blackleg. We hold special meetings in connection with this affair next week, and are probably in for some lively times with the authorities here, as we understand from a good source that these proceedings are being instituted on the instructions of the Home Office, and are to be taken up by the Public Prosecutor.

LIVERPOOL SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—On Saturday evening last, a paper was given to the members of the Institute Debating Society, united for the evening with the Rathbone Literary Club, Liverpool, by the Rev. J. E. Stronge (Unitarian) of Birkenhead, the subject being "Is Socialism, or complete Individualism, likely to be the ultimate goal of human development?" Several of our members attended by invitation. Mr. Stronge answered the question entirely in our favour, maintaining that the whole tendency of modern events is towards Socialism. Comrades Nance, W. H. Chapman, sen., Reeves, and Lawrence Small supported the paper. No opposition worthy of record was offered, with the exception of that from the Rev. L. P. Jacks, M.A., of Liverpool (Unitarian minister), who out-Giffened Giffen in dealing with figures relating to the comparative wealth of the capitalist and working classes. Comrade J. C. Kenworthy replied to our opponent in a short but telling manner. We hope to number Mr. Stronge among our members ere long.

SOCIALIST CO-OPERATIVE FEDERATION, LTD. (Stores: 49 Southampton Row, W.C.).—The Half-Yearly General Meeting of the members will be held on Wednesday February 12th, at 8 p.m., in the Hall of the Social Democratic Federation, 337 Strand; William Morris in the chair. Please bring subscription card for audit.

And at all Branch Meeting-Places and Outdoor-Stations of the Socialist League.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE Kaiser has quite fluttered the capitalistic doves by his rescripts. Of course we get the irrepressible article in the Pall Mall Gazette, assuring us once more that we are indeed all Socialists now, and praising heaven for the House of Hohenzollern and this last development of Monarchism. Of course, on the other hand, we get the general "Pooh! pooh!" of the orthodox capitalistic press, both Liberal and Tory.

Most of them say, "Ah! Kaiser, here's an opportunity for you! If you would only be good like us English, and have free trade, then we would go to your Congress; then, at last, and not before, would be the time to consider whether our working population should starve or thrive—or, at all events, to pretend to consider it. For, of course, you will understand, that while free trade is a practical question to us, the questions you are suggesting of the duration of the day's labour, the conditions of factories, and so forth, have ceased to be practical questions to us since we passed the consolidation of the Factory Acts in order to make the Factory Hell respectable. And as to our working-classes, we assure you we are not at all afraid of them; they are sheep and like to be shorn, and if they baa a bit under the operation, our nerves are strong enough to bear it. Liberty of the press! Free competition! Unrestricted march of economic laws! Free trade! Imitate us and keep on bawling out these phrases, which cost nothing, and you will live peacefully and die happy."

Well, perhaps! And yet, on the surface of things, it scarcely seems likely that the Kaiser should set out on his enterprise of dishing the Socialists without some reason behind him, even if his step be only an electioneering dodge, as seems likely. It is not unreasonable to suppose that he is impressed, not to say alarmed, by the spread of Socialism, and feels that it would be no bad stroke if he could detach a considerable body of working-men from the Socialist party: a thing which he may consider possible in Germany, where the superstition of loyalty is yet strong. At any rate, if the workers refuse to bite at his phantom minnow, his "intentions" will help to respectabilise his position amongst the respectables of all Europe, and in no case will they cost him much. For who knows if the quarrel with Bismark is anything else than a bit of stage effect? W. M.

Some of our Radical friends have not been best pleased at our exposure from time to time of what hollow shams "Republican institutions" can be. A few weeks ago, when we wrote of the Argentine, they could say, and some of them did, that it was a new country, populated for the most part by a heterogeneous mass of recent immigrants, and still suffering from the effects of Spanish mis-rule. But if they read the reports of the National Convention of the coloured citizens of the United States, they will find that the Stars and Stripes is still the "haunting lie" it was before the war. That in spite of the blood poured out to free the negro, he is only technically free; that so far as he is concerned, "Republican institutions" are a sham and a fraud; that even in the Northern States, where he is allowed to exercise his "political rights," he is still ostracised and treated as a helot. Together with the position of the working-classes in France, Argentina, and the United States, this continued ill-treatment of the negro needs to be accounted for, before we can accept the adequacy of "Republican institutions" to the cure of social ills.

"Ivory is worth over £2,000 per ton, and those advertising 'humanitarian' brigands, Explorer Stanley and Co., have over 600 tons of it." That is how the Sydney Bulletin speaks of the sainted person who is an object of worship to Mr. John P. Brown and men of his kidney. Where is divine vengeance and the power of respectability?

The newspapers are talking of another "Carnegie free library," and are praising Mr. Carnegie to the skies because he offers a million dollars for the endowment of a free library. Well! as we have said before, we should like to hear what the sweated iron-workers have to say about this "generous" disposal of their unpaid earnings. It is all very well to have free libraries, but they would probably have preferred to live decently first of all, and then to have built libraries where they wanted them. "Justice, not Charity."

M. Lemoine, the well-known French writer, has been speaking plainly to his countrymen, who have been so jubilant about the Russian alliance. He says:

"We foolishly take the northern visitors who flock to the Mediterranean every winter, under the combined attractions of sunshine and the roulette, to represent the Tzar and the Russian people; and there is no man to tell us that, behind these idlers and cosmopolitan tourists, there are millions of men far away in the north who know nothing of this superficial agitation, who are ignorant of our very existence, and who acknowledge but one master on earth, whose will to them is that of a god, and whom they are prepared to obey at the sacrifice of their life. We forget in our levity that we have no means of knowing the views of the solitary man who wields such crushing power, or the workings of his mind."

His utterance is quoted by the Pall Mall, with the comment:

"M. Lemoine is wrong in saying that 'we have no means of knowing the views of the solitary man.' The Tzar has expressed them frankly enough, and he never speaks without sincerity. If M. Lemoine does not know what these views are, it is his own fault for not reading the Pall Mall Gazette."

The Pall Mall has often enough been accused of being a Russian organ, but has never quite so fully and cynically avowed the fact.

The richest man in Germany, according to recently published statistics, is Herr Krupp, the notorious maker of (legal) murder-machines, whose income for the current year amounts to £279,000. Clearly his business has been flourishing in the past year, for a twelvemonth ago his revenue was officially estimated at "only" £219,000. It is a profitable trade, this tool-making for tyrants. How the poor devils who never get above skeleton-keys and burglar's jemmes must look up to and admire their big brother!

An Anti-Opium League has been formed in Holland, having for its object to bring public opinion to bear on the system of raising revenue from the farming of the opium monopoly in the Dutch West Indies. The manifesto of the League is signed by a considerable number of present or former members of both branches of the Netherlands Legislature, ex-colonial officials, and other influential persons. Anyone who has read 'Baboe Dalima' and 'Ran Away from the Dutch,' must wish all success to the League; though it is difficult for an Englishman who "looks at home" to say much upon the matter. S.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. VI.—A LITTLE SHOPPING.

As he spoke, we came suddenly out of the woodland into a short street of handsomely built houses, which my companion named to me at once as Piccadilly: the lower part of these I should have called shops, if it had not been that, as far as I could see, the people were ignorant of the arts of buying and selling. Wares were displayed in their finely designed fronts, as if to tempt people in, and people stood and looked at them, or went in and came out with parcels under their arms, just like the real thing. On each side of the street ran an elegant arcade to protect foot-passengers, as in some of the old Italian cities. About half-way down, a huge building of the kind I was now prepared to expect told me that this also was a centre of some kind, and had its special public buildings.

Said Dick: "Here, you see, is another market on a different plan from most others: the upper stories of these houses are used for guest-houses; for people from all about the country are apt to drift up hither from time to time, as folk are very thick upon the ground, which you will find to be the case at present, and there are people who are fond of crossing the water, though I can't say that I am."

"I don't help smiling to see how long a tradition would last. Here was the ghost of London still asserting itself as a centre,—an industrial centre, for aught I knew. However, I said nothing, except that I asked him to drive very slowly, as the things in the booths looked exceedingly pretty.

"Yes," said he, "this is a very good market for pretty things, and is mostly kept for the handsomer goods, as the Houses of Parliament market, where they set out cabbages and turnips and such like things, along with beer and the rougher kind of wine, is so near."

Then he looked at me curiously, and said, "Perhaps you would like to do a little shopping, as 'tis called."

I looked at what I could see of my rough blue duds, which I had had plenty of opportunity of contrasting with the gay attire of the citizens we had come across; and I thought that if, as seemed likely, I should presently be shown about as a curiosity for the amusement of this most unbusiness-like people, I should like to look a little less like a discharged ship's purser. But in spite of all that had happened, my hand went down into my pocket again, where to my dismay it met nothing metallic except two rusty old keys, and I remembered that amidst our talk in the guest-hall at Hammersmith I had taken the cash out of my pocket to show to the pretty Annie, and had left it lying there. My face fell fifty per cent., and Dick, beholding me, said rather sharply—

"Hilloa, Guest! what's the matter now? Is it a wasp?"

"No," said I, "but I've left it behind."

"Well," said he, "whatever you have left behind you can get in this market, so don't trouble yourself about it."

I had come to my senses by this time, and remembering the astounding customs of this country, had no mind for another lecture on social economy and the Edwardian coinage; so I said only—

"My clothes— Couldn't I? You see— What do you think could be done about them?"

He didn't seem in the least inclined to laugh, but said quite gravely:

"O don't get new clothes yet. You see my great-grandfather is an antiquarian, and he will want to see you just as you are. And, you know, I mustn't preach to you, but surely it wouldn't be right for you to take away people's pleasure of studying your attire by just going and making yourself like everybody else. You feel that, don't you?" said he, earnestly.

I did not feel it my duty to stick myself up for a scarecrow amidst this beauty-loving people, but I saw I had got across some ineradicable prejudice, and that it wouldn't do to quarrel with my new friend. So I merely said, "O certainly, certainly."

"Well," said he, pleasantly, "you may as well see what the inside of these booths is like: think of something you want."

Said I: "Could I get some tobacco and a pipe?"

"Of course," said he; "what was I thinking of, not asking you before? Well, Bob is always telling me that we non-smokers are a selfish lot, and I'm afraid he is right. But come along; here is a place just handy."

Therewith he drew rein and jumped down, and I followed. A very handsome woman, splendidly clad in figured silk, was slowly passing by, looking into the windows as she went. To her quoth Dick: "Maiden, would you kindly hold our horse while we go in for a little?" She nodded to us with a kind smile, and fell to patting the horse with her pretty hand.

"What a beautiful creature!" said I to Dick as we entered.

"What, old Greylocks?" said he, with a sly grin.

"No, no," said I; "Goldyllocks,—the lady."

"Well, so she is," said he. "'Tis a good job there are so many of them that every Jack may have his Jill: else I fear that we should get fighting for them. Indeed," said he, becoming very grave, "I don't say that it does not happen even now, sometimes. For you know love is not a very reasonable thing, and perversity and self-will are commoner than some of our moralists think." He added in a still more sombre tone: "Yes, only a month ago there was a mishap down by us that in the end cost the lives of two men and a woman, and as it were put out the sunlight for us for a while. Don't ask me about it just now; I may tell you about it later on."

By this time we were within the shop or booth, which had a counter, and shelves on the walls all very neat, though without any pretence of showiness, but otherwise not very different to what I had been used to. Within were a couple of children—a brown-skinned boy of about twelve, who sat reading a book, and a pretty little girl of about a year older, who was sitting also reading behind the counter; they were obviously brother and sister.

"Good morning, little neighbours," said Dick. "My friend here wants tobacco and a pipe; can you help him?"

"O yes, certainly," said the girl with a sort of demure alertness which was somewhat amusing. The boy looked up, and fell staring at my outlandish attire, but presently reddened and turned his head, as if he knew that he was not behaving prettily.

"Dear neighbour," said the girl, with the most solemn countenance of a child playing at keeping shop, "what tobacco is it you would like?"

"Latakia," quoth I, feeling as if I were assisting at a child's game, and wondering whether I should get anything but make-believe.

But the girl took a dainty little basket from a shelf beside her, went to a jar, and took out a lot of tobacco and put the filled basket down on the counter before me, where I could both smell and see that it was excellent Latakia.

"But you haven't weighed it," said I, "and—how much am I to take?"

"Why," she said, "I advise you to cram your bag, because you may be going where you can't get Latakia. Where is your bag?"

I fumbled about, and at last pulled out my piece of cotton print which does duty with me for a tobacco pouch. But the girl looked at it with some disdain, and said—

"Dear neighbour," I can give you something much better than that cotton rag." And she tripped up the shop and came back presently, and as she passed the boy whispered something in his ear, and he nodded and got up and went out. The girl held up in her finger and thumb a red morocco bag, gaily embroidered, and said, "There, I've chosen one for you, and you are to have it: it is pretty, and will hold a lot."

Therewith she fell to cramming it with the tobacco, and laid it down by me and said, "Now for the pipe: that also you must let me choose for you: there are three pretty ones just come in."

She disappeared again, and came back with a big-bowled pipe in her hand, carved out of some hard wood very elaborately, and mounted in gold sprinkled with little gems. It was, in short, as pretty and gay a toy as I had ever seen; something like the best kind of Japanese work, but better.

"Dear me!" said I, when I set eyes on it, "this is altogether too grand for me, or for anybody but the Emperor of the World. Besides, I shall lose it: I always lose my pipes."

The child seemed rather dashed, and said, "Don't you like it, neighbour?"

"O yes," I said, "of course I like it."

"Well, then, take it," said she, "and don't trouble about losing it. What will it matter if you do? Somebody is sure to find it, and he will use it, and you can get another."

I took it out of her hand to look at it, and while I did so, forgot my caution, and said, "But however am I to pay for such a thing as this?"

Dick laid his hand on my shoulder as I spoke, and turning I met his eyes with a comical expression in them, which warned me against another exhibition of extinct commercial morality; so I reddened and held my tongue, while the girl simply looked at me with the deepest gravity, as I were a foreigner blundering in my speech, for she clearly didn't understand me a bit.

"Thank you so very much," I said at last, effusively, as I put the pipe in my pocket, not without a qualm of doubt as to whether I shouldn't find myself before a magistrate presently.

"O, you are so very welcome," said the little lass, with an affectation of grown-up manners at their best which was very quaint. "It is such a pleasure to serve dear old gentlemen like you; especially when one can see at once that you have come from far over sea."

"Yes, my dear," quoth I, "I have been a great traveller."

As I told this lie from pure politeness, in came the lad again, with a tray in his hands, on which I saw a long flask and two beautiful glasses. "Neighbours," said the girl (who did all the talking, her brother being very shy, clearly), "please to drink a glass to us before you go, since we do not have guests like this every day."

Therewith the boy put the tray on the counter and solemnly poured out a straw-coloured wine into the long bowls. Nothing loth, I drank, for I was thirsty with the hot day; and thinks I, I am yet in the world, and the grapes of the Rhine have not yet lost their flavour; for if ever I drank good Steinberg, I drank it that morning; and I made a mental note to ask Dick how they managed to make fine wine when there were no longer labourers compelled to drink rot-gut instead of the fine wine which they themselves made.

"Don't you drink a glass to us, dear little neighbours?" said I.

"I don't drink wine," said the lass; "I like lemonade better: but I wish your health!"

"And I like ginger-beer better," said the little lad.

Well, well, thought I, neither have children's tastes changed much. And therewith we gave them good day and went out of the booth.

To my disappointment, like a change in a dream, a tall old man was holding our horse instead of the beautiful woman. He explained to us that the maiden could not wait, and that he had taken her place; and he winked at us and laughed when he saw how our faces fell, so that we had nothing for it but to laugh also.

"Where are you going?" said he to Dick.

"To Bloomsbury," said Dick.

"If you two don't want to be alone, I'll come with you," said the old man.

"All right," said Dick, "tell me when you want to get down and I'll stop for you. Let's get on."

So we got under way again; and I asked if children generally waited on people in the markets. "Often enough," said he, "when it isn't a matter of dealing with heavy weights, but by no means always. The children like to amuse themselves with it, and it is good for them, because they handle a lot of diverse wares and get to learn about them, how they are made and where they come from, and so on. Besides, it is such very easy work that anybody can do it. It is said that in the early days of our epoch there were a good many people who were hereditarily afflicted with a disease called Idleness, because they were the direct descendants of those who in the bad times used to force other people to work for them—the people, you know, who are called slave-holders or employers of labour in the history books. Well, these Idleness-stricken people used to serve booths all their time, because they were fit for so little. Indeed, I believe that at one time they were actually compelled to do some such work, because they, especially the women, got so ugly and produced such ugly children that the neighbours couldn't stand it. However, I'm happy to say that all that is gone by now; the disease is either extinct, or exists in such a mild form that a short course of aperient medicine carries it off. It is sometimes called the Blue-devils now, or the Mulleygrubs. Queer names, ain't they?"

"Yes," said I, pondering much. But the old man broke in:

"Yes, all that is true, neighbour; and I have seen some of those poor women grown old. But my father used to know some of them when they were young; and he said that they were as little like young women as might be: they had hands like bunches of skewers, and wretched little arms like sticks; and waists like hour-glasses, and thin lips and peaked noses and pale cheeks; and they were always pretending to be offended at anything you said or did to them. No wonder they bore ugly children, for no one except men like them could be in love with them—poor things!"

He stopped, and seemed to be musing on his past life, and then said:

"And do you know, neighbours, that once on a time people were still anxious about that disease of Idleness: at one time we gave ourselves a great deal of trouble in trying to cure people of it. Have you not read any of the medical books on the subject?"

"No," said I; for the old man was speaking to me.

"Well," said he, "it was thought at the time that it was the survival of the old mediæval disease of leprosy: it seems it was very catching, for many of the people afflicted by it were much secluded, and were waited upon by a special class of diseased persons queerly dressed up, so that they might be known. They wore amongst other garments, breeches made of worsted velvet, that stuff which used to be called plush some years ago."

All this seemed very interesting to me, and I should like to have made the old man talk more. But Dick got rather restive under so much ancient history: besides, I suspect he wanted to keep me as fresh as he could for his great-grandfather. So he burst out laughing at last, and said: "Excuse me, neighbours, but I can't help it. Fancy people not liking to work!—its too ridiculous. Why, even you like to work, old fellow—sometimes," said he, affectionately patting the old horse with the whip. "What a queer disease! it may well be called 'Mulleygrubs!'"

And he laughed out again most boisterously; rather too much so, I thought, for his usual good manners; and I laughed with him for company's sake, but from the teeth outward only; for I saw nothing funny in people not liking to work, as you may well imagine.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

IN PARIS.

I HAPPENED to be at the Bourse du travail last week, to hear how it stood with the general strike movement, and when in the secretary's office, citizen Ribanier showed me a letter he had just received from a certain citizen (?) Bennett, or something like that, at the Board of Trade, London, asking for information as to the working of our Bourse du travail, as being of the greatest interest to him. The letter was written in tolerably good French, making allowance, that is, for misplaced prepositions, which sounded very harsh to an habitué of the Quartier Latin. No matter; Mr. Bennett (?) will improve if he comes into nearer contact with French Socialists, and it will do him and his fellow-Cockneys good if they persevere in their bold enterprise.

Having read the letter, my friend Ribanier asked for my opinion upon it. "Hem!" said I, "it looks very strange to me that Englishmen should come to us for information about our Bourse du travail, for the whole of Europe knows us as Socialists; and, this being so, must know that our aim is not to make use of this municipal grant to "settle" disputes between masters and employed, nor to find employment for the unemployed—which, indeed, would be impossible, as we have double the number of hands needed for the work at any time of the year. No! our aim is to fight the capitalists to the bitter end; and I am sure if you say this in your answer to Mr. Bennett, as no doubt you will, for it is a fact, he will not favour you with another such letter."

Having said so much, I burst into a hearty laugh, whereon the general secretary stared at me, and musically joined in the laugh, without knowing what was the joke. However, I soon became conscious of my breach of good manners, and grew serious as a lobster. "So," said I, "it seems that the English Tory Government will give a Labour Exchange to the people of London; and what have you to say about that, Ribanier? Or rather, as I have an hour to spare, tell me how Paris got one at first; that's more interesting."

Here is the substance of what the general secretary of the Paris Labour Exchange told me. "The first idea of a Bourse du travail was brought before the municipality of Paris, as far back as the 2nd of March, 1790, when the motion was defeated. It was taken up again by the Chambre des Députés, and met with the same fate, being defeated by 413 votes against 218. A few years ago it was resolved on at the Hotel de ville, the Government refusing to have anything to do with it. The Municipality voted £500,000 for one central labour exchange, promising several annexes in different parts of Paris, in proportion as the Budget would admit of it.

"Before we had this first building, working-men used to meet on certain squares called grèves, waiting till masters came to engage them. Now the masters do not come to us, for the good reason that, the market being over-stocked, they get plenty of hands coming to them direct from the country or from private registry offices in town. The Bourse can give but few situations, and it will never work properly unless the Government does away with private registry offices, and this it naturally won't do. Some desperadoes, labouring under a strong sense of injury, have blown up some of these registries, and have thereby done us no good.

"Only a small proportion of the workmen are organised in unions, and have a right to hold meetings here; 130 unions, or syndicates as they are called, have joined altogether, but the great majority of the toilers are indifferent, and do not see the good they could do by banding themselves; for our object is not so much to find work as to see our way to a complete upheaval of this cursed favouritism system."

I took leave of my friend, who gave me as I came away the statistics of the Bourse, in which I could see that the officials are paid at the rate of 8 frs. a-day for eight hours work; the other secretaries are paid by their trades-unions, and, all considered, I think English trades-unions are far better off than the Paris ones. They are at home, and the police are not quite so ready to interfere; whilst here, if they are "rowdy," the police may close the building, as they did two years ago, when it was closed for three weeks and troops were camped in the streets around. This brutal interference of bayonets gave the Bourse almost a death-blow; working-men see they can agitate better in their own localities, where they are comparatively free. If Mr. Bennett would take the trouble to see for himself, instead of writing from a distance, he would soon find that all is not gold that glitters.

In most cases the groups, or trades, have so few members syndicated at the Bourse that they cannot afford to pay a secretary the whole day long, so most of them come there from seven to nine at night. Wouldn't it be better for, and more worthy of them, to meet in their own little hall where they would feel at home, and never be disturbed nor molested by any busy-bobbies. Every man supporting the funds of his trade may come to the Bourse to get a job; his name will be taken down, and when his turn comes— But why speak of his turn that never will turn up, considering that tens of thousands are out of work at any time of the year? You can get a job through the medium of a friend lucky enough to be at work, but I never saw a master inside of the Bourse du travail to look for hands. Why should he take the trouble of going there, when he has only to open his door to see numbers of toilers anxious to work at any price it may please Monsieur le patron to give them?

I will give you some day a list of the recognised rates of wages of the syndicates at the Bourse, and compare it with the real wages paid with impunity by the robbers. It is all very easy for the Bureau to publish a wage-tariff based on the strict necessity of a man's existence. It may have done twenty years ago, when all hands were employed, but then we were all law-abiding sheep, who thought of "duty" instead of "right." Now that we have a little sense, it is only to see how our tyrants are armed against us, and that we may choose between starvation and open revolt.

I would advise the secretary of every Socialist branch or Anarchist group to write to citizen Ribanier, Secrétaire Général, Bourse du travail, 35, Rue Jean Jacques Rousseau, Paris, for a copy of the Annuaire de la Bourse du travail, which will be sent them post free. If the readers have still a little remnant of respect for the present scandalous form of society, I am sure that respect will vanish after the perusal of this book, for it is heartrending to read some of the accounts given by men of the different trades in this and other countries.

It is a puzzle to understand how a man can live, as in nearly every trade men are idle four months in the year. The book does not explain what they do; but I suppose they are cursing the kind government which secures to them the right of starvation. It is interesting to read it, not so much to know about the hours, work, wages, etc., as to notice the way in which questions are answered. Some of the questions are answered with scorn, some with pride, some again with a contemptuous silence; not one complaint, that would be unworthy the dignity of a working-man. They suffer and hate until the time comes when they will endeavour to make non-producers a thing of the past.

Georges Mertz, a young Anarchist of 20, got five days prison and 15 frs. fine for having, as a conscript, drawn a handful of numbers out of the urn and thrown them on the pavement in front of the gendarmes and the Mayor. When before the judge he was asked, "If the fatherland were in danger, would you defend it?" "No," was his answer, "for to kill a man, be he a German or an Italian, is a crime!" This took place at Dijon. When the judge was reading his sentence there were interruptions and expressions of sympathy with the prisoner, which does not look bright for discipline in the French army.

I hear at the last moment that the syndicates (trades-unions) of Bordeaux are going to start a Bourse du travail for themselves, independent of the one given them by the municipality, unless the municipality allows them to make their own rules and statutes. This is a good hint for Englishmen who think so much of municipal grants.

ANOTHER SIBERIAN TRAGEDY.

INFORMATION has just reached London of another horrible tragedy in the far east of Siberia, at Kara, near the north-west coast of Tobolsk. Nadejda Sihida, formerly a superior teacher in St. Petersburg, had been condemned to penal servitude. Some copies of Narodnaia Volja had been found in her house. This refined and highly-educated woman was detained in the Kara prison, where of late many political prisoners sentenced to hard labour have been sent. Sihida was grossly insulted by the Director of the prison, but repulsed his outrageous advances with a box on the ear, whereupon he ordered that she should be stripped and flogged, a punishment illegal for politicals even in Holy Russia. The humiliation so afflicted Sihida that she poisoned herself. The women political prisoners thought they were no longer safe from insults. No sooner had Sihida killed herself than her friend and fellow prisoner, Marie Kovalevskaya, wife of Professor Kovalevskaya of Kieff, also poisoned herself. It is said that other women destroyed themselves after the flogging of their companion, but of this there is as yet no certain evidence, though it is probably true. A few miles from the women's prison is the men's, and the inmates have contrived to establish communications. It is supposed that when the men heard of the flogging and subsequent suicides, some burst of indignant sorrow naturally took place, and this, of course, was sure to be followed by violent and brutal suppression. In any case, the procurator, whose functions are somewhat similar to that of an English sheriff, the colonel of the gendarmes, and the surgeon of Chita were summoned in hot haste to Kara. One of the letters says that every day the situation of the exiles in Siberia becomes more and more difficult. The position has now become so critical that they do not know if to-morrow they will not be involved in some affair which will result in their dying at the point of the bayonet.

SCENES FROM THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

II.

THE BLACK COCKADES.

THERE is peace in Paris in these latter days of September; an ominous peace. The agitation concerning the Veto has died away, but the scarcity of bread continues, though the harvest is abundant, and is growing worse as the winter approaches. Whether it be the greed of speculators or royalist intrigues, there is a fearful scarcity of food.

Ominous grumblings are heard from groups around the baker's shops; many of the people who still had the superstitious belief in royalty which has long vanished in France, but still exists in England, imagine that if the King would but come and live in Paris matters might mend. Meanwhile, the tyranny of the officious patrols is not calculated to soothe the popular irritation; though you may still hear the cries of hunger by levelled bayonets, yet that does not satisfy a starving people. Besides, another danger threatens from above, which even makes constitutional Lafayette and Bailly feel very uncomfortable. The crushing of insurrectionary Paris by Lafayette's National Guard encourages the Court, which quickly sees its opportunity. Its foes are divided; what a splendid time, now the middle-class and the people have quarrelled, to strike a heavy blow at both. The Court knows the weakness of the bourgeoisie. Without the people, surely it will take but little to strike down these middle-class snobs, who have alienated the class that has helped them to gain their Bastille victories. A plot is accordingly set on foot among zealous royalists, not over-burdened by caution, to restore the former despotic power of the Crown. Some thirty thousand of the clergy and nobility are said to have signed a bond to stand by the King. Marie Antoinette, the Queen—a proud, haughty woman, with a genius for all kinds of intrigue and treachery—is the centre of these intrigues. The King, Louis, though naturally harmless enough, is completely swayed by his wife and her party, who would have slaughtered every soul in Paris to obtain absolute power, and who hated the people with the same fury as the Clanricardes' and Norwoods' of our own days.

Well, Marie Antoinette and her troops of Court gallants, who hovered like butterflies around her, had formed their plan. It was not a bad one, viz., to bring up, on pretext of alarm at the disorders in Paris, one of the few French regiments which was supposed to be quite untouched by revolutionary opinions—this was the regiment of Flanders; then with this regiment and the other troops at Versailles, to carry off the King to Metz, a strong fortress on the borders of Germany, where the Marquis de Bouille commanded troops, mostly German and Swiss, who could still be depended upon; and then, with the noblesse, who had fled from their burning chateaux, begin a war of extermination against rebellious Paris.

The Flanders regiment arrived at Versailles on September 23rd, bringing with it two pieces of cannon. At the same time a large number of royalist officers, who have suddenly obtained leave of absence, arrive at Paris, numbering it is reckoned from 1,000 to 1,200. The King's body-guard, which is totally composed of aristocrats, is doubled by a clever manœuvre, for the hundred men who are on duty at the chateau of Versailles, the French Windsor, are relieved by another hundred, as is the custom every month; but the men relieved do not leave the chateau. It is evident to sharp observers at Paris that there is something in the wind.

Now, if the royalists had even confined themselves to bringing up troops, and collecting royalist officers in the capital, had they possessed the caution necessary to conspirators, perhaps their plot might have succeeded; but, unfortunately for the success of their conspiracy, they were not cautious. They were so certain of success that they bragged of what they were going to do, and so the details of their plot were talked of everywhere. This was not enough, worse folly remains behind.

The King's body-guard invite the officers of the Flanders regiment to a grand dinner. Their majesties have graciously granted the use of their Opera House in huge Versailles Palace for the purpose. It is on Thursday, the 1st of October, when the dinner takes place; officers of the Flanders regiment body guards, and officers of the National Guards of the town of Versailles sit down together. The body-guard who are devoted royalists, still wear the white cockade, the symbol of despotic royalism; the officers of the Flanders regiment and National Guard, the new national colour, the tri-colour. The dinner is finished and the drinking begins; they drink the health of the King, the Queen, and royal family. A timid voice is heard to suggest the health of the nation, then the popular toast, but this is contemptuously rejected. Then, as the assembly is getting warm with wine, the King, Queen, and their son, the Dauphin, enter the dining-room. They are received with roars of half-drunken enthusiasm; the room is now thronged not only with officers, but soldiers of the various regiments at Versailles, who have been graciously admitted after the dinner. The royal family walk around the tables amid thunderous shouts; swords are drawn and frantically waved; soldiers, body guards, and officers drink, brandishing their weapons, to the health of the King, the Queen, and the Prince. The royal family retire, and as they leave the hall the band strikes up a popular opera air, "O Richard, O my King, the world is all forsaking thee." This is received with delirious loyalty, greatly strengthened by the amount of wine consumed. The band then plays a popular march, and the trumpets sound the charge. The drunken officers and soldiers scale the boxes; the national cockade, the tri-colour, the emblem of the victorious people, is torn out of their hats and trampled under foot. White cockades are distributed. They rush hither and thither in the madness of their intoxication. They then stagger in drunken riot into the marble court of Versailles; the tumult is so great that the inhabitants of Versailles imagine that the revolution has broken out afresh, and detachments are sent for from distant guard-houses to quell the disturbance. These are agreeably surprised to find it is only some drunken royalist officers on the spree. The riot dies out at last, and the revellers stagger home to bed and snore peacefully in swinish slumber; but they have done their work, they have lit a flame which they will not easily extinguish.

Imagine how the news of this drunken revel was received among the starving crowds around the baker's shops in Paris. "In Paris we starve waiting for a few pounds of bad black bread, while at Versailles they feast in profligate riot; these drunken aristocrats laugh at our misery, trample the tri-colour under their feet as they long to trample us. Shall we wait patiently till the King flies to Metz, and then with foreign troops and emigrant aristocrats advances upon Paris to put us to the sword?" These and similar murmurs arise amid these starving groups; even Lafayette and the constitutional middle-class are looking blue. What can be done to stop these plots? Alas! constitutional patriotism cannot see, for its fears the multitude as much as it does the Court, and therefore it can only wait till the King flies and civil war begins. But the audacity of the royalist party increases, the trampling of the tri-colour under foot was no drunken freak. Next day the Queen declares herself "delighted" with the drunken riot of the day before. Officers of the National Guard who enter the chateau in their uniform, are told that they "Can have no feeling to appear at Court in that dress!" They are surrounded by tilted harlots of the most vicious Court in Europe, who hold the white cockade in their taper fingers and entreat them with smiles and wanton glances to exchange it for the "odious tri-colour." "Take it!" exclaim these ladies, "it is the only true one, and it shall be triumphant!" Remember, it could only be triumphant at the cost of spilling the blood of thousands of the people.

One young officer of the National Guard, overpowered with the witching smiles and glances, had donned the royalist colour, and is remonstrated with by Major Lecointre, a popular officer of the National Guard, who is immediately threatened by a Court bully with assassination.

On Saturday, there is another drunken orgie; and now the starving groups can see that the royalist officers have mounted black cockades, "the colour of the night," nay, some of them wear a new and strange uniform of a sinister hue—green faced with red. What does it mean? Another St. Bartholomew, a wholesale slaughter of patriots by the same means as a French king once rid himself of his Protestant subjects? And bread grows scarcer, for the Corbeil corn-boat that used to come twice a day now only comes once. Are we to be decimated by starvation and then slaughtered? It is said the aristocrats are drawing up a list of proscription against the best patriots. What shall we do? In the Palais Royal, where patriots still promenade, a woman is seen speaking, denouncing the black cockades. Her husband has been forbidden to speak but she will; if the men fear to act the women must, and she calls on the men to march and bring the King to Paris. Marat flies to Versailles, and returns crying in his paper "O ye dead men, rouse yourselves!" Danton's voice thunders in the Cordeliers. The next day (Sunday) the district decides that it will march to Versailles as the advance guard of Paris patriotism and bring back the King. It is, however, held back by the persuasions of the commandant of its National Guard, M. de Crevecoeur. But, at least, one thing shall be done, these aristocrats shall not be allowed to flaunt their black cockades in Paris, and with an angry roar the patriots, as the popular party were then called, rush into the streets. The offending cockades are torn from the royalists by main force and trampled into the mud. If an individual tries to pick up the unpopular badge, they threaten to string him up to the nearest lamp-post. One royalist officer, who is more than usually obstinate, is being dragged to the lanterne, but is saved by a National Guard patrol. But though the National Guards may save individuals, they will not defend the cockades; in some cases they assist in tearing them away from the wearers. Nor are the patrols over-vigilant this Sunday afternoon, for orators arise in the Palais Royal despite them, and declare that the wearer of a black cockade is deserving of death as a man who would murder the nation by bringing upon it civil war.¹ Rumours fly hither and thither, "40,000 stands of arms have been ordered by the royalists, the massacre of a whole people is impending." The Town Hall is alarmed at the progress of the royalist conspiracy, and issues a proclamation prohibiting the wearing of any cockade save those of the national colour. At the same time the sleek bourgeoisie are quite as much afraid of the people. A rumour is abroad that night, that there is a plot in progress to attack the guard-rooms of the National Guard and disarm these middle-class militia, and with their weapons march on Versailles. Lafayette doubles his posts and his patrols, as night sinks upon disturbed Paris. The night passes quietly, but what of the morrow?

D. J. NICOLL.

Comrades coming to Edinburgh from London or elsewhere, who may wish to meet with Edinburgh Socialists, should call on Donald Mackenzie, 35, George IV. Bridge, Edinburgh.

We are glad to hear that Znamia (Banner), the Russian paper of New York, which was forced to suspend publication some time ago, has reappeared. It is now of 8 pp., double the previous size, and after the current number will be issued weekly. Comrade Guilaroff, of 5, Devonshire Cottage, High Road, Chiswick, W., is the agent for this country.

"THE BATTENBERG LOCK-OUT."—Prince Henry of Battenberg is still out on strike, but with a difference compared with those who get their wages for useful work. His "work" at Court has ceased for some time, but his wages still run on. "Society" is not quite sure whether it is a "lock-out" or a revolt against the conditions of the Prince's employment. There is some talk of the matter being referred to arbitration, and the names of the Prince of Wales, Cardinal Manning, and John Burns are mentioned as likely persons to bring it to a reasonable termination.—G. McL.

¹ These black cockades were the colour of Austria, the native country of the Queen, and perhaps were worn by men who did not dare to wear the white one in Paris. The people looked upon them as an evil emblem signifying that the royalist party were prepared to carry out the most extreme measures against them.

TO A SOVEREIGN.

Thou glittering bauble, tell me why
In thee I see all tyranny,
All grief, and shame, and misery
Personified by Gold?

For Gold—men shed each other's blood;
For Gold—they sneer at all that's good;
For Gold—become as devils rude;
And rob their God for Gold!

For Gold—they raise the battle-cry,
And wage, with bitterest enmity,
A war against each loving tie,
Which can't be bought or sold.

For Gold—the youth is taught to rove;
For Gold—the maiden gives her love;
For it—old age through life has strove;
All joys exchanged for Gold.

For Gold—the brave plunge into strife;
For Gold—risk comfort, love, and life;
For Gold—fell murder's self is rife,
And stalks abroad for Gold.

For Gold—the priest beguiles the time
Of men with nonsense called sublime;
Shrives him of every sin and crime,
And barter heaven for Gold.

Gold—give me back my feelings rude,
Ere competition chilled my blood,
And taught me to regard all good
As centred all in gold.

Gold—bitterest foe to human joys!
Gold—hoary father of all lies!
Thy name all wickedness implies,
And HELL is meant by Gold!

IN AUSTRALIA.

THE Brisbane bakers' troubles were the cause of a special meeting of the Labour Federation on Wednesday night. It was stated that of thirty-eight master bakers in the city, thirty-four had agreed to a scale providing for £3 and £2 10s. respectively. A deputation was appointed to visit the four who had refused on behalf of the Federation.

The General Labourers' Union is spreading in every direction. On Monday night a meeting was held in Brisbane to finally consider the rules, but adjourned till next Monday in order that a mass meeting, called for that night at the Maritime Hall, might definitely fix the monthly contribution. Another General Labourers' organisation meeting will be held this (Friday) evening at Lutwyche. If the attempt to federate all Queensland labour, for which purpose delegates are going to Blackall and Barcardine, is successful, the general labourers of the West, the Central, Maryborough and Brisbane, already fairly organised, will be united in one solid body along with their skilled brethren.

The Brisbane draymen last Saturday decided to organise, a large number joining. They will meet again to-morrow to decide whether they shall join the General Labourers' Union as a branch. This course is strongly urged by the best Brisbane organisers, not only for the draymen but for other shifting occupations, as it would enable casual labourers to work indiscriminately at anything, without being burdened by subscriptions which would be considerable if they had to belong to two or three distinct societies.

The Brisbane wharf-labourers held their annual meeting on Wednesday night, and decided to send a delegate to Blackall and Barcardine, as recommended by the Maritime Council, in order to join with delegates from the Labour Federation and bushmen's unions in discussing and drawing up a scheme for a Queensland federation. It is significant that at the same meeting correspondence was read from the Sydney wharf-labourers asking if Brisbane would send a delegate to discuss inter-colonial federation, from Hobart asking for federation information, also the same from Melbourne.

The newly-formed Cutters and Trimmers' Union of Sydney is experiencing the usual difficulties attendant on establishing a trades-union. One "boss" has announced his intention of "sacking" any man who joins the union. This tyrannical threat is not, however, going to deter the Cutters and Trimmers from carrying out their intentions. On the contrary, it has made the members of the new union more enthusiastic.

A minimum wage of £3 for a week of forty-eight hours has been decided on by the Journeymen Butchers here.

The Charters Towers Miners' Union, by a unanimous vote, have authorised a levy of half-a-crown per member to form a funeral fund for the newly-formed Queensland district. Next-of-kin of members meeting with fatal accidents will receive £50 therefrom.

Things are moving along here very nicely. In the Trades and Labour Advocate this week appears the League's "Statement of Principles" reprinted from your back page. This paper is going to do a lot of good. Since the Radical went Individualist, or whatever it may be by now, we have been in sad want of a labour paper. The Brisbane Boomerang and the Sydney Bulletin are real good, but all the same there was a "long-felt want." I will send you a Swagsman when it appears.

Sydney, N.S.W., Dec. 21, 1889.

CORNSTALK.

Frost and fraud have always foul ends.

Lost, in the neighbourhood of the Guelphic obstruction, Strand, by a Queen's messenger, a packet of royal condolences, assorted, to suit railway and mining disasters and fires; no cash enclosed. Also, at same time and place, an order on the Savage Semite of Fleet Street for a three-decker article on the domestic virtues of royalty. Whoever will return the above to the owner will be handsomely (sic) rewarded.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The end of the Gas-stokers' Strike.

The defeat of the gas-stokers—for it is a defeat, although the men have obtained from Livesey a promise that the eight hours system shall be continued—is a heavy blow for the new trade-unionism. The more so, because the defeat has occurred mainly through the workers not carrying out the principles which have hitherto made the new organisations successful. These principles were, first, widespread strikes, and secondly, generous support extended by workers in other organisations to those who were fighting the battle of labour. The first blunder the union made was in being too moderate in not calling out the men in the gas and coal trade all over London; and then, although it must have been evident to all workmen that the defeat of the gas-stokers meant an assault by the sweaters upon every trade union, yet they stood by in apathy while their comrades were starved into surrender. They will now find out their mistake. Already we find Col. Makins, chairman of the Gas Light and Coke Company, "congratulating Mr. Livesey and his colleagues," amid the resounding cheers of directors and shareholders, at the same time declaring his "sympathy" for Livesey during the struggle and announcing his intention of introducing a profit-sharing scheme of his own. Mr. Livesey was present at the meeting, and on seconding the vote of thanks to the chairman and directors was loudly cheered. He stated that it would be to the interest of both companies "to work cordially together." All these things show that it is extremely possible that "sympathy" was not the only aid extended to Mr. Livesey by Col. Makins during the strike, and it is most probable, as I said at the beginning of the strike, that Livesey's profit-sharing scheme was drawn up in agreement with the other company, South London being the most convenient battle-ground for smashing the union.

It is now evident that we shall have plenty of benevolent schemes from sweating capitalists for breaking up the newly-formed unions, the latest dodge being the sick and benefit society of Mr. Norwood. The capitalists have found that bribery succeeds where force would fail, and it is clear that a serious crisis has arrived for the workers' organisations. They will now be subject to a new and insidious attack, and the fate of most of the new unions will be decided in the next few weeks.

The Strike at the Wharves.

The renewal of the dock strike has only been prevented at the last moment by the withdrawal of the men's manifesto. This, under present circumstances, is a wise step on the part of the union, for the present would be a most unfavourable moment to renew the struggle of last autumn. We are still in the winter months, when trade is not over brisk, and the supply of unemployed men, who would be utilised as blacklegs, is considerable. Therefore it would certainly suit the newly-formed employers' association excellently.

A big demonstration of 25,000 men was held on Tower Hill last Sunday, at which John Burns and Tom Mann were the principal speakers. Burns stated that since the signing of the agreement in September, all the wharves with the exception of Hay's and the Monument had agreed to pay for meal-times, and it was not worth while to risk defeat in the others for these two. But still, there is the risk, if the dockers lose at Hay's, that the other wharves may declare their intention of going back to the Mansion House agreement, and refuse to pay for meal-times any longer. However, under present circumstances, the men can do very little but stand on the defensive; their opportunity will come next autumn. It is quite evident that Norwood and Co. are going for a policy of sap and mine; the announcement that the employers' union is going to start a blackleg supply association in the shape of a sick and benefit society is a proof of this. It is to be feared that the lockers will have reason to regret that they did not give the gas-stokers more help in their struggle.

The fight goes on briskly at Hay's Wharf. The blacklegs are not learning their work very quickly. The "Benamain," a steamer that is berthed beside the wharf, took forty-six hours to unload the other day—a job which the old hands could do in fourteen hours. The proprietors have not gained much by the substitution of non-union for union labour.

Mr. Bradlaugh and Eight Hours.

Mr. Bradlaugh made a speech at Northampton the other day in which, as usual, he declared his violent opposition to any interference by the State with the hours of labour. This Mr. Bradlaugh has a perfect right to do. But there is one thing Mr. Bradlaugh has no right to do, and that is to lower scurrilous and false abuse upon those who advocate measures of which he does not approve. In his speech he referred to advocates of the eight hour legislation as "blatant orators, who stood at street corners and quares, who never worked and never would." Now, Mr. Bradlaugh knows that this statement—excusable from a pig-headed capitalist who knows no better—is, to put it plainly, absolutely false. He knows as well as I do that the men who have been most prominent in advocating this measure are not only workmen, but trade-unionists, and are therefore much better able to understand the wants of their class than Mr. Bradlaugh, whose past experience as a lawyer's clerk and a private soldier—though both doubtless highly respectable occupations—does not justify him in posing as the only person who understands the rights and grievances of labour. We fear, however, despite the respectability of Mr. Bradlaugh's past pursuits, he has somehow failed to learn the excellent virtues of ordinary truthfulness and good manners.

The Stick-makers' Union.

This union held a successful meeting at Banner Street Hall, St. Luke's, on February 5. Vaughan Nash, of Toynbee Hall, spoke on Trade Unionism. These meetings will be continued on Wednesday evenings throughout February. The speakers are Tom Mann, Ben Tillet, H. Orbell, R. Feigenbaum, C. Rochman, C. W. Mowbray, B. Cooper, and H. Collier of the Cigar-makers' Society, and many well-known trade-unionists and co-operators. We wish our friends every success in their struggle against the sweaters.

The Shop Assistants' Union.

Even the most respectable of the workers, the most snobbish, probably, that exist—namely, the shop-assistants—have at last begun to be agitated by the labour boom. The union is now undoubtedly taking root in London, four or five branches having been established up to date. The early-closing people are taking up parliamentary action for a change, but the assistants are determined on having a trade-union untrammelled by politicians. In the provinces things are also moving. Manchester, Liverpool, Bristol, and Cardiff being particularly active. It is hoped to make one large organisation out of the independent local societies before long. In the meantime, London will be worked well first. Further report next week. J. T.

Dundee Dock Labourers.

A number of Dundee dock labourers have given notice of a demand for an extra 1d. per hour. A meeting of the men was held on Saturday last, and consideration of the matter was deferred till Monday morning, when they will decide whether they will ask the increase on the work in hand or not. The present rate of pay is 7d. per hour.

The Aberdeen Comb Maker's Strike.

A procession of comb makers paraded the principal streets of Aberdeen on Saturday afternoon, as a mark of demonstrative sympathy with the men that are now out from Rosemount works, not directly on account of any wages dispute, but in consequence of a dispute as to the apportionment of the work in the different departments. The procession was composed of about 400 men and women, the latter class predominating. They bore aloft an effigy, which they addressed from time to time in sarcastic and abusive terms, and at the houses of several of the employers and heads of departments they made noisy demonstrations. The police, however, were on the job in the interests of the employers, and the order of coercion was maintained.

"When Constabulary Duty's to be Done."

A mass meeting of Glasgow night constables was held in the Albion Halls on Friday morning, Feb. 7th, to consider the attitude of the Town Council on the question of wages and hours. Resolutions were passed regretting that the Police Board had again refused an increase of pay, and the men indicated their intention of continuing their endeavours until successful. They further threatened that unless a favourable answer be returned by Monday, the 17th inst., extreme measures will be taken. The resolutions were the same as those adopted at a meeting of the day constables held the previous night in the same hall. The bulk of the Glasgow constables are only paid £1 6s. per week.

Scottish Railway Servants' Agitation.

Crowded meetings of railway servants were held on Sunday Feb. 2, at Glasgow, Greenock, Hamilton, Kilmarnock, Dalry, Stirling, Perth, Dunfermline, Dundee, Arbroath, Montrose, and Aberdeen, at which resolutions were passed expressing dissatisfaction with railway directors for not meeting the men in a body. At the Glasgow meeting, Mr. Henry Tait, the secretary, said that the conditions under which the men were labouring, where the late serious accidents occurred, may have had something to do with the accidents. Referring to the accident which occurred at Maryhill on the North British Railway, he said some of the men involved in that "accident" had been on duty for fourteen consecutive hours, and that in all probability before they reached the end of their journey they would be sixteen or seventeen hours on duty. At the Gartsherrie "accident" on the Caledonian Railway, after making enquiry, he found that the signalmen had been on duty in the cabin 11½ hours when the accident occurred, and that the engine-driver and fireman had been eleven hours on duty, with fifty miles still to run before their day's work was completed. In discussing the results of the deputations of the men to the Boards of the various railway companies, some difference of opinion was expressed as to what course should now be followed. Many speakers thought that the men had been sufficiently forbearing, and that some decisive action should now be taken. A very considerable number are in favour of striking on an early date if their demands are not granted—viz., the reduction of hours. G. McL.

The Yorkshire Labour Council.

This body held its first meeting on Saturday Feb. 1st. It was decided at the suggestion of our comrades Maguire, Sweeny, and Cockayne to form a bureau of statistics of the state of labour and trade in the county, so that the unemployed workers may know where labour is needed, and also to do their utmost to federate the various sections of labour. Comrades Paylor and Constantine were elected president and secretary, and Maguire and Sweeny were appointed as honorary members to the Council. Fifty delegates were present, representing over seven thousand organised labourers.

REPORTS.

EAST LONDON.—At a meeting held last Sunday evening at Basing Place, H. D. Morgan was elected treasurer; H. Mackenzie, secretary; and Mrs. Morgan, librarian. It was agreed to commence meetings next Sunday afternoon in Victoria Park.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—On Sunday, Feb. 2nd, a good meeting was held at Latimer Road, addressed by R. J. Lyne, Saint, Catterson Smith, Bullock, and Davis. The room was filled by a crowded audience in the evening to hear Lothrop Withington on "The Iron Crown," interesting discussion; good sale of Commonweal. On Sunday morning, Feb. 9th, R. J. Lyne and Saint addressed a fair meeting at Latimer Road. In the evening, D. J. Nicoll lectured at rooms on "The Commune of Paris" to a good audience; good discussion; all Weals sold and collected 2s.

MITCHAM.—I promised when I wrote my last to let you know a little more of how we get on in our village. We have had a real live M.P. (a Mr. Bonsor) amongst us. There was a pleasant lot of people to meet him, all the shopkeeping element, landlords, and the parson and his curate. Now Mr. Bonsor rattled away, and had a good deal to say about the great social question; he said he was in favour of trade unions, and that it was the first duty of workmen to organise; as to Ireland, he said it was now happy and contented. This was rather too much for one of our comrades, who seemed inclined to make a rush for the platform, and he was only pacified by being allowed to mount the platform and oppose. In answer to my question as to organisation, he told his audience that if they wanted to better their condition as against capital he should advise them to go to work and get what they wanted, and not look to Parliament for it, which seemed to stagger some of his hearers. In answer to another question as to the excessive price charged in Mitcham for allotments, he said he would receive me or a deputation as soon as Parliament meets. He lets his land at £2 per acre free to all comers, and here it is £8; only £6 difference. There has been a nice little plot going on in this village, and which has only just leaked out. The Socialist meetings seemed to annoy the parson and some of his followers, and now it has come to light that they have held a series of meetings to discuss the best method of attack; one suggestion was that they should hold ranters' meetings on the spot where we hold forth, but which fell through; another that they should have music met the same fate; but now they have found it out at last, and are going to start a temperance lecturer in opposition. It is curious how I got the information, but some one has played them false; such is the wickedness of mankind.—S. G.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday, Gilbert and T. and J. Burgoyne spoke on Jail Square. In the evening, at Paisley Road, the same speakers were supported by comrade Lyne, of London, who chanced to be present, and delivered a stirring address.

MANCHESTER.—Though for a week or two we have not reported in Commonweal, we have been as active in the cause as circumstances and the cold weather permitted. On Sunday last in Stevenson Square a meeting was addressed by Mr. Cutcheon, an extreme disciple of Ruskin, and other comrades. Of late, some of our speakers have assisted at the meetings of the Salford S.D.F., at the request of the latter. Barton lectured at their club on "Anarchist Socialism," which created a lively discussion.

WALSALL.—On Monday evening, Feb. 3, comrade P. Kropotkin lectured to a large audience at the Institute, Dudley, on "The Colonisation of Siberia." Comrades here took advantage of his being in the district for him to pay us a visit next day; and although there was but little time to organise a meeting, a capital audience assembled in the Unitarian Schoolroom and listened to an eloquent address on "The Social Problem." Questions were put at the close, and satisfactorily answered.—J. T. D.

DUBLIN.—At Progressist Club, 87 Marlboro' Street, Feb. 8th, B. McGuinness delivered an address on "Dublin Municipal Reform," outlining a Socialist administration. Kavanagh, O'Gorman, Fitzpatrick, and King also spoke. On Thursday, Fitzpatrick and McGuinness attended a meeting of the "Ratepayers' Association," a pettifogging association of small shopkeepers and tenement-house owners, and gave these worthies a lesson on their duties. Several old stagers were indignant at such doctrines being preached in their room.

EDINBURGH (SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION).—On Sunday a friend of the cause treated a fair audience to a "Criticism of the Present System." He was subjected to a severe "heckling," and the questions on the whole were replied to satisfactorily; good discussion.

To Help the Paper.—There are several ways in which you can help to spread the Weal. Ask your newsagent to try and sell it. Get those who don't care to buy it week by week to subscribe direct. Arrange for the posting of contents bills anywhere you can. Any number of other plans will suggest themselves if you think about it.

Postal Propaganda.—Some who would like to do propaganda but dare not openly, or who cannot spare the time to do it personally, can find many ways in which it can be done quietly. Not the least useful among possible plans would be to order and pay for a number of copies to be sent to persons in whose hands they might do good. We will send six copies to six different addresses for 7d. Write the names and addresses legibly.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto:

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

WEEKLY; ONE PENNY.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE labouring mountain of the Parnell Commission has at last produced its mouse; which is in fact the final acceptance of Mr. Parnell into decent political society. If this was the aim of the Times in its "Parnellism and Crime," that renowned paper has been eminently successful. But in view of its own comments on the Report we can hardly accept that theory. We must admit that the Times has been heavily thrown; and the Times was, or perhaps is, one of the chief bulwarks of respectability.

Yes, it is breaking up, this respectable "Society" of oppression, which it is the business of Socialists to attack. It is shaken in its policy of bluster, and the carrying of everything by means of the high hand. The mere political business of Home Rule will not last much longer as a pretext for our political tricksters. They will be face to face presently with the necessities of the working people, not only of Ireland, but of England and Scotland also; and in that position they will be absolutely helpless. W. M.

A recent number of the Paris Bulletin Municipal Officiel contains a comparative table of the number of vacancies in the different departments of primary education, and also of the number of candidates entered for these vacancies. It can be seen from this table that for 43 vacancies for male teachers there are 2,021 applicants; also that 6,441 certificated girls have to divide among them 54 nominations.

It is not in England alone that the intellectual proletariat have to fight among themselves for a bare living. Figures like these speak for themselves; and when one thinks that each year so many thousand young girls and men have to be rejected, and have to wait till next time for another faint chance of being nominated, or grow tired of waiting and sink into misery and degradation, one cannot but think that their struggle for life is as bitter as that of the labour proletariat, though the hardships of it are not so apparent at first sight. M. M.

Another police plot has come to light in Chicago, and our comrades are naturally a little excited. From the story as told in the Chicago Mail and elsewhere, it seems likely that not only have the promoters been found of the plot which put Hronek into prison (for which see Commonweal of a few months ago), but that much valuable information has been gained as to the inside working of the conspiracy which ended in the murder of our four comrades. We hope to be able to lay full particulars before our readers in a week or so.

"Mrs. Hetty Greene, the eccentric millionaire, who personally conducts her business in Wall Street, has been interviewed at Chicago. She admitted being worth nearly 50,000,000 dollars (£10,000,000). She owns land in nearly every city in the United States, and says there is nothing like land as an investment. She added: 'I am a very happy woman, and the Lord has blessed me above others. I think I make good use of my opportunities, for I have endowed over a hundred churches and founded fifty schools. I give away my substance without ostentation. I belong to a Quaker family, which has been wealthy for the last five generations.'"

It is perhaps too much to expect from any preachers of the "Gospel of Wealth" that they should do any reckoning or reasoning: if they were capable of it, one might ask them to state approximately the relation between those churches and schools, etc., and the misery caused by the abstraction of so much wealth from its producers.

"Whatever else may be thought of Mr. Carnegie's 'Gospel of Wealth,'" says the Pall Mall, which is the most blatant Wealth-Gospeller in this country, "he is at any rate entitled to the respectful hearing due to any man who practises what he preaches. Our readers will remember that the foundation of Free Libraries was the first and almost the last word of Mr. Carnegie's gospel, and now this morning we learn from Allegheny that—

Mr. Andrew Carnegie has presented this city with a library worth £60,000. It was formally presented to-day in the presence of President

Harrison and a distinguished assemblage. Allegheny was the first American city that gave Mr. Carnegie shelter. He has offered Pittsburg £200,000 for public libraries, and the offer has been formally accepted."

"Mr. Carnegie," the Pall Mall goes on to say, "is like Chaucer's good monk: he teaches the law and commandments as he has received them; but 'first he followed them himself.'"

One would think that anyone who analysed the process of robbery and sweating which inevitably goes to the formation of a millionaire, with only a remote chance of his turning out even such a comparatively favourable specimen as Mr. Andrew Carnegie, would be unable to defend the system under which it is an ordinary and recognised thing. Can it be worth while to let one man plunder a million for years in order to take the chance of his benefiting a hundred or two before he dies?

"Potters' rot" is a kind of asthma brought on by the unhealthy conditions under which potters work. A man died of it last week in London, and that kind of unnecessary death is such an ordinary thing that the inquest seemed to be held as a mere matter of form. It is one of the many sacrifices that workmen must make in order to have millionaires and "gifts" of free libraries, or less desirable institutions—"Pelican Clubs," and so on.

Would it not be better for workmen to free their work from the mastership of the money-bag; to work in association for the common benefit, looking after their collective health, comfort, and happiness; and then, when they had satisfied the more immediate and pressing needs of food, clothing, and shelter, turning to the provision of libraries, concert-halls, and common-rooms for the satisfaction of other "higher" cravings?

As it is now, they are degraded at work by undue toil, in unhealthy conditions, and with scant reward; and are further degraded when work is done by accepting the "charitable" doles of their plunderers carelessly flung back to them.

I see that a "Stanley Exhibition" is to be held, and that a great German publishing firm will issue a translation of his book. If the managing committee will send their address to this office, we will furnish them with a few suggestions as to exhibits; and the publishers are welcome to a few annotations on the "great" man's book. No fees.

Mr. Stanley has found his poet; a Mr. Deane Brand is singing a song in his praise, of which a copy has been sent to us, presumably for review. Here is the chorus:

"So raise all praise through our Island home,
Till it spreads like stars on Heaven's dome;
A cheer for the right, a sword for the wrong,
Till we girdle the earth with glory and song."

After which there is nothing to be said, but that the bard is worthy of the hero, and both of their worshippers.

Exhibits and notes may both be suggested by, and the poet receive inspiration from, the following story of an "execution" told at the Savage Club on Saturday night by Mr. T. Stevens, the American "special" who was sent to meet Stanley:

"At the time, Stanley was so weak that he could not turn in his bed without help; but so strong was his iron will that he insisted upon being taken out of bed and propped up in a chair. He took a strong stimulant, and had himself carried outside of his tent, where the people were all drawn up, and where the mutineer, who had been tried and found guilty, awaited his sentence. The chair was put down, and Stanley faced the miscreant, the fever in his eye, and his thin hand outstretched. 'We have come through a thousand difficulties and dangers to save you,' he said, 'and this is our reward! Depart to God!' The people thereupon rushed upon the man, shouting 'What shall we do with him?' 'Send him to God, I say!' shouted Stanley, pointing to the overhanging limb of a tree. A rope was thrown over, noosed round the miscreant's neck, and he was swiftly run up, and soon dangled a corpse in the air." S.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. VII.—TRAFALGAR SQUARE.

AND now again I was busy looking about me, for we were quite clear of Piccadilly Market, and were in a region of elegantly-built much ornamented houses, which I should have called villas if they had been ugly and pretentious, which was very far from being the case. Each house stood in a garden carefully cultivated, and running over with flowers. The blackbirds were singing their best amidst the garden-trees, which, except for a bay here and there, and occasional groups of limes, seemed to be all fruit-trees: there were a great many cherry-trees, now all laden with fruit; and several times as we passed by a garden we were offered baskets of fine fruit by children and young girls. Amidst all these gardens and houses it was of course impossible to trace the sites of the old streets: but it seemed to me that the main roadways were the same as of old.

We came presently into a large open space, sloping somewhat toward the south, the sunny site of which had been taken advantage of for planting an orchard, mainly, as I could see, of apricot-trees, in the midst of which was a pretty gay little structure of wood, painted and gilded, that looked like a refreshment-stall. From the southern side of the said orchard ran a long road, chequered over with the shadow of tall old pear-trees, at the end of which showed the tall tower of the Parliament House, or Dung Market.

A strange sensation came over me; I shut my eyes to keep out the sight of the sun glittering on this fair abode of gardens, and for a moment there passed before them a phantasmagoria of another day. A great space surrounded by tall ugly houses, with an ugly church at the corner and a nondescript ugly cupolaed building at my back; the roadway thronged with a sweltering and excited crowd, dominated by omnibuses, crowded with spectators. In the midst a paved be-fountain square, populated only by a few men dressed in blue, and a good many singularly ugly bronze images (one on the top of a tall column). The said square guarded up to the edge of the roadway by a four-fold line of big men clad in blue, and across the southern roadway the helmets of a band of horse-soldiers, dead white in the greyness of the chilly November afternoon—

I opened my eyes to the sunlight again and looked round me, and cried out amongst the whispering trees and odorous blossoms, "Trafalgar Square!"

"Yes," said Dick, who had drawn rein again, "so it is. I don't wonder at your finding the name ridiculous: but after all, it was nobody's business to alter it, since the name of a dead folly doesn't bite. Yet sometimes I think we might have given it a name which would have commemorated the great battle which was fought on the spot itself in 1952,—that was important enough, if the historians don't lie."

"Which they generally do, or at least did," said the old man. "For instance, what can you make of this, neighbours? I have read a muddled account in a book—O a stupid book!—called James' Social Democratic History, of a fight which took place here in or about the year 1887 (I am bad at dates). Some people, says this story, were going to hold a ward-mote here, or some such thing, and the Government of London, or the Council, or the Commission, or what not other barbarous half-hatched body of fools, fell upon these citizens (as they were then called) with the armed hand. That seems too ridiculous to be true; but according to this version of the story, nothing much came of it, which certainly is too ridiculous to be true."

"Well," quoth I, "but after all your Mr. James is right so far, and it is true; except that there was no fighting, merely unarmed and peaceable people attacked by ruffians armed with bludgeons."

"And they put up with that?" said Dick, with the first unpleasant expression I had seen on his good-tempered face.

Said I, reddening: "We had to put up with it; we couldn't help it."

The old man looked at me keenly, and said: "You seem to know a great deal about it, neighbour! And is it really true that nothing came of it?"

"This came of it," said I, "that a good many people were sent to prison because of it."

"What, of the bludgeoners?" said the old man. "Poor devils!"

"No, no," said I, "of the bludgeoned."

Said the old man rather severely: "Friend, I expect that you have been reading some rotten collection of lies, and have been taken in by it too easily."

"I assure you," said I, "what I have been saying is true."

"Well, well, I am sure you think so, neighbour," said the old man, "but I don't see why you should be so cocksure."

As I couldn't explain why, I held my tongue. Meanwhile Dick, who had been sitting with knit brows, cogitating, spoke at last, and said gently and rather sadly:

"How strange to think that there have been men like ourselves, and living in this beautiful and happy country, who I suppose had feelings and affections like ourselves, who could yet do such dreadful things."

"Yes," said I, in a didactic tone; "yet after all, even those days were a great improvement on the days that had gone before them. Have you not read of the Mediæval period and the ferocity of its criminal laws; and how in those days men fairly seem to have enjoyed tormenting their fellow men?—nay, for the matter of that, they made their God a tormentor and a jailer rather than anything else."

"Yes," said Dick, "there are good books on that period also, some of which I have read. But as to the great improvement of the nineteenth century, I don't see it. After all, the Mediæval folk acted after their conscience, as your remark about their God (which is true) shows, and they were ready to bear what they inflicted upon others; whereas the nineteenth century ones were hypocrites, and pretended to be humane, and yet went on tormenting those whom they dared to treat so by shutting them up in prison, for no reason at all, except that they were what they themselves, the prison-masters, had forced them to be. O, it's horrible to think of!"

"But perhaps," said I, "they did not know what the prisons were like."

Dick seemed roused, and even angry. "More shame for them," said he, "when you and I know it all these years afterwards. Look you, neighbour, they couldn't fail to know what a disgrace a prison is to the Commonwealth at the best, and that their prisons were a good step on towards being at the worst."

Quoth I: "But have you no prisons at all now?"

As soon as the words were out of my mouth I felt that I had made a mistake, for Dick flushed red and frowned, and the old man looked surprised and pained; and presently Dick said angrily, yet as if restraining himself somewhat—

"Man alive! how can you ask such a question? Have I not told you that we know what a prison means by the undoubted evidence of really trustworthy books, helped out by our own imaginations? And haven't you specially called me to notice that the people about the roads and streets look happy; and how could they look happy if they knew that their neighbours were shut up in prison, while they bore such things quietly? And if there were people in prison, you couldn't hide it from folk, like you may an occasional man-slaying; because that isn't done of set purpose, with a lot of people backing up the slayer in cold blood, as this prison business is. Prisons, indeed! O-no, no, no!"

He stopped, and began to cool down, and said in a kind voice: "But forgive me! I needn't be so hot about it, since there are not any prisons: I'm afraid you will think the worse of me for losing my temper. Of course, you coming from the outlands cannot be expected to know about these things. And now I'm afraid I have made you feel uncomfortable."

In a way he had; but he was so generous in his heat, that I liked him the better for it, and I said: "No, really 'tis all my fault for being so stupid. Let me change the subject, and ask you what the stately building is on our left just showing at the end of that grove of plane-trees?"

"Ah," he said, "that is an old building built quite in the beginning of the twentieth century, and as you see, in a queer fantastic style—not over beautiful; but there are some fine things inside it, too, mostly pictures, some very old. It is called the National Gallery; I have sometimes puzzled as to what the name means: anyhow, nowadays wherever there is a place where pictures are kept as curiosities permanently it is called a National Gallery, perhaps after this one. Of course there are a good many of them up and down the country."

I didn't try to enlighten him, feeling the task too heavy; but I pulled out my magnificent pipe and fell a-smoking, and the old horse jogged on again. As we went, I said—

"This pipe is a very elaborate toy, and you seem so reasonable in this country, and your architecture is so good, that I rather wonder at your turning out such trivialities."

It struck me as I spoke that this was rather ungrateful of me, after having received such a fine present; but Dick didn't seem to notice my bad manners, but said:

"Well, I don't know; it is a pretty thing, and since nobody need make such things unless they like, I don't see why they shouldn't make them, if they like. Of course, if carvers were scarce they would all be busy on the architecture, as you call it, and then these 'toys' (a good word) would not be made; but since there are plenty of people who can carve—in fact, almost everybody, and as work is somewhat scarce, or we are afraid it may be, folk do not discourage this kind of petty work."

He mused a little, and seemed somewhat perturbed; but presently his face cleared, and he said: "After all, you must admit that the pipe is a very pretty thing, with the little people under the trees all cut so clean and sweet;—too elaborate for a pipe, perhaps, but—well, it is very pretty."

"Too valuable for its use, perhaps," said I.

"What's that?" said he; "I don't understand."

I was just going in a helpless way to try to make him understand, when we came by the gates of a big rambling building, in which work of some sort seemed going on. "What building is that?" said I, eagerly, for it was a pleasure amidst all these strange things to see something a little like what I was used to: "it seems to be a factory."

"Yes," he said, "I think I know what you mean, and that's what it is; but we don't call them factories now, but Banded-workshops: that is, places where people collect who want to work together."

"I suppose," said I, "power of some sort is used there?"

"No, no," said he. "Why should people collect together to use power, when they can have it at the places where they live, or hard by, any two or three of them; or any one, for the matter of that? No; folk collect in these Banded-workshops to do hand-work in which working together is necessary or convenient; such work is often very pleasant. In these, for instance, they make pottery and glass,—there, you can see the tops of the furnaces. Well, of course it's handy to have fair-sized ovens and kilns and glass-pots, and a good lot of things to use them for: though of course there are a good many such places, as it would be ridiculous if a man had a liking for pot-making or glass-blowing that he should have to live in one place or be obliged to forego the work he liked."

"I see no smoke coming from the furnaces," said I.

"Smoke?" said Dick; "why should you see smoke?"

I held my tongue, and he went on: "It's a nice place inside, though as plain as you see outside. As to the crafts, throwing the clay must be jolly work: the glass-blowing is rather a sweltering job; but some folk like it very much indeed; and I don't much wonder: there is such a sense of power, when you have got deft in it, in dealing with the hot metal. It makes a lot of pleasant work," said he, smiling, "for however much care you take of such goods, break they will one day or another, so there is always plenty to do."

I held my tongue and pondered,

THE PARTICK ELECTION.

BLESSED are those Socialists who have been several hundred miles at least away from Partick during these last three weeks. I cannot help thinking that their favourable impression of human nature will be directly as the square of their distance from the area of the conflict. Those who, like myself, have had to endure in the midst of it, have been sadly shocked with the appalling spectacle of human folly and downright knavery exhibited in that "free fight" for political advantage. The hair-brained enthusiasm of the working-class electorate who caught the fever of the fight, and the wolfish cunning and ferocity of the professional politicians and their hireling press, have been quite phenomenal. Paid agitators of every degree and description, and from every quarter of the kingdom, bull-dozed the electors nightly for fourteen days with lies, promises and threats, and every conceivable device of electioneering oratory. On the election-day carriages, cabs, dog-carts, brakes, vans, and lorries—furnished by supporters within a radius of five miles—were used by both parties to bring the electors to the poll. Canvassers, paid and unpaid, prowled from house to house beseeching the voters to vote; and every known method of cajoling and coercing the free and enlightened citizens of Partick was resorted to. Intelligent opinion, or a sense of public duty on the part of the working-class, had no more to do with the result of the contest than they had to do with the swindling vagaries of that poor idiot—Jubilee Benzon.

That Sir Charles Tennant was defeated is, however, a matter for congratulation. No more worthless Home Ruler, and no worse enemy of the interests of the workers could have been selected to fight the battle for the Liberals. The chairman of half-a-dozen large public companies, the director of as many more, and the head partner of the St. Rollox Chemical Works, which employs men at from 12s. 8d. to £1 per week to work amongst poisonous materials, his adoption as the Liberal candidate was a flagrant affront upon the democratic sentiment of our day. Mr. Parker-Smith, though a professed Liberal (Unionist), is recognised as a Tory—and his return as such can do little harm meanwhile; but the return of Sir Charles Tennant as a Radical and Home Ruler would certainly have done all the harm that a selfish capitalist, steeped to the lips in profit-mongering and the sweating of the poor, can do, when masquerading in the disguise of a champion of progress and a friend of freedom.

That his defeat was due to the fact of his being a capitalist and sworn foe of the workers is, I regret, an opinion that cannot be entertained. Most of the Liberal voters who would have voted in any case, voted, I believe, for him. His defeat was due mainly to the fact that the electorate is composed very largely of the wealthy residents of the west-end district of Glasgow, who, being always alert to their own interests, and conceiving that an anti-Home Ruler anti-Gladstonian was their safest man, voted en masse for Parker-Smith.

That Liberal papers in Glasgow and throughout the country should attribute the Liberal defeat to the advocacy of Mr. T. P. O'Connor, who was publicly charged with allowing articles to appear in the Star, expressing sympathy with the Portuguese and denouncing British missionary brigandage, shows the opinion which those enlightened prints have of the intelligence and fair-play of the Liberal electorate. Let me say that I do not believe that, stupid and ignorant as average Liberal electors are, the sentiments expressed in the Star articles were unfavourably regarded by the mass of them; and I am certainly of the opinion that the fact of Mr. O'Connor's connection with those articles did not turn a single vote against the Liberals.

J. BRUCE GLASIER.

SLAUGHTER OF SIBERIAN PRISONERS.—We have received two pamphlets from "Friends of Russian Freedom" on this subject. Those who are willing to aid in the dissemination of information on the subject should communicate with Robert Spence Watson, Bensham Grove, Gateshead-on-Tyne.

We have received an interesting report from the Cremation Society (8 New Cavendish Street, Portland Place, W.) on the valuable work they are doing in bringing about a common-sense disposal of the dead. It contains a useful bibliography of the subject, and much cognate matter.

In Lippincott's this month is a suggestive article by Francis Galton, F.R.S., which might be made the text for a good deal of Socialistic moralising. "Why do we measure mankind?" is the question he answers: if a parallel development-chart of a worker and an ordinarily wholesome middle-class man were made it would show some startling results. There is a good deal of material to be got; could not some of our scientific comrades put it in shape for us?

Let not anyone pacify his conscience by the delusion that he can do no harm if he takes no part and forms no opinion. Bad men need nothing more to compass their ends than that others should look on and do nothing. He is not a good man who, without a protest, allows wrong to be committed in his name, and with the means he helps to supply, because he will not trouble himself, and use his mind on the subject.—John Stuart Mill, Inaugural Address, St. Andrews, 1867.

IN AUSTRALIA.

THIS is a cutting from last week's Boomerang, the most powerful weekly in Queensland:

"We like men to be a little consistent, even in labour matters. At the time of the printers' strike the Boomerang was called all sorts of names for declaring that the men were right, that solidarity was an essential for the securing of a basis for conciliation between Labour and Capital. The Master Printers' Association would then get no nearer to that than talking about liberty and about permitting no interference in the internal affairs of an office. Now, having thrashed their employés on this question, they are coming the same capers themselves, and without anything like the same excuse, are trying to put the screw on non-association masters. The Boomerang and, we presume, other non-association firms, have received a circular informing us that, unless we join the M. P. A. before 1st January, the members of the association will 'decline to quote prices to, or execute work for, . . . any firm in the printing trade not being members of the Master Printers' Association.' There is an explanation pointing out that irremovable canvassers are 'cutting down prices' and 'blackmailing the public,' just as competing shipping companies are, we suppose; and this beautiful explanation is capped by another, declaring that the price-list agreed on in July shall not be binding upon members—in other words, that the cut-throat competition against which the association was formed shall proceed unchecked! We have reason to believe that the more thoughtful of the master printers disapprove of this circular; but whether they do or not, the Boomerang can't be bull-dozed in this fashion. When the Master Printers' Association recognises the solidarity principle, when it concedes to the journeymen the solidarity it demands for the employers, and acts accordingly and consistently, then the Boomerang will gladly join it and be loyal to it—but not till then."

The Australian labour movement just now seems to be in a constant state of progress, showing a strong and widespread tendency towards federation, the bringing of all wage-earners within one fold. The draymen of the far northern port of Cairns have written to some of the labour leaders in Brisbane seeking advice and have been recommended to throw in their lot with the General Labourers' Union. The draymen and carters of Brisbane have also come to the sound conclusion that caste has too long been the enemy of the common weal, and have decided to swell the ranks of what promises to be the strongest section of the proposed Federation—the General Labourers' Union.

The following letter has been sent by the South Australian Railway Commissioners to the Railway Service Mutual Association:

"The Commissioners have duly considered the communications made by you subsequent to the interview this morning—viz., that unless the Commissioners pay 6s. per day to probationary porters in future, all the employés, members of the association, would cease work to-morrow morning. I have to inform you that under the existing circumstances the Commissioners will not accept the responsibility of throwing the railway service into confusion and of causing such a dislocation of the public traffic as must be attended with serious loss and injury to many people wholly unable to protect themselves. The Commissioners therefore will adopt the following scale of wages for porters from January 1 next: First year, 6s. per day; second year, 6s. 6d. per day; third year and thereafter, 7s. per day. This scale to apply to the existing staff. The Commissioners must leave to the country and Parliament to decide whether, having regard to the position assumed by a certain section of the employés and the outside assistance rendered and promised, any other course was open to them."

The Brisbane Wharf-labourers' Union, having found that the rule providing for fifteen minutes' respite for "smoke, oh!" when engaged in working coals or heavy bagged goods was being infringed, has made an effort to enforce the rule. This "smoke" or breathing time is regarded by many people who know nothing of a wharf-labourer's occupation as an unnecessary interruption with "discipline," but these know-nothings should take a walk down to the wharves and watch the men at work for an hour or two.

I am told that the officers of the Australian coasting steamers have very frequently to work from thirty to forty hours straight off before sailing, and are completely exhausted before they go to sea. At the highest rate of pay, chief officers receive a fraction over 9d. per hour; seconds, 6d.; and thirds, a fraction over 5d. an hour.

How does this strike you, culled from the highly-respectable, vice-suppressing Sydney Morning Herald, the great upholder here of religion and property, which denounces us Socialists for our "immoral teachings":

WET-NURSE Wanted; young, unmarried preferred; arrangements made for nurse's child. Apply between 9 and 12, Mrs. —, —, Park-road, Burwood.

I hear of what seems to be a general determination to cut wages on all the mining fields. What with exemptions and reductions the miner will be a pretty much sat-on workman soon if he doesn't wake up.

The Brisbane Building Trades Council is the first to adopt the Labour Paper Conference report, of which I told you the other week.

After a "brief but lively" existence of thirteen weeks, the Trades and Labour Advocate has come to an end, "defeated, but not disgraced." The editor says in his valedictory:

"We are heartily sorry that we have been defeated in our attempt to establish a genuine labour newspaper, for there are many abuses that require to be shown up, many shams that it is necessary for the public good to expose. The sweating system is rampant in the city at the present time, and requires drastic treatment. The nigger-driving draper and late-hour shopkeeper are in want of severe castigation. One public disgrace in the shape of a gigantic business firm, who compel their employés to dine on the premises off a few small 'chunks' of mutton and a lone potato each, while the lynx-eyes of sycophantic shopwalkers watch lest the slave-driven employés shall dare, like Oliver Twist, to ask for 'More'—requires that the light of the public press shall be shed on the Siberian rigour of its 'discipline.' But all must go unscathed, and why? Because we who have the courage to denounce these people, in spite of libel actions, cannot carry on for want of capital. The daily press who have the capital but not the courage, will not refer to these abuses; for daily papers are run to make money, and no matter how earnestly the editor and his literary satellites may desire to carry out the noble work of elevating humanity by exposing its wrongs, the editor is controlled by his manager or directors, at the back of whom is a greedy body of shareholders or wealthy private firm of two or three, who clamour for 10, 15, or 20 per cent. dividends, dividends which cannot be produced unless advertisers are conciliated; and, as fully half the advertisers are the persons who carry on the nigger-driving, sweating, and starvation-wage system in conducting their emporiums, warehouses, establishments, shops, manufactories, etc., it is not to be wondered that the daily press is silent on the dark deeds that are being perpetrated on a large number of the working-classes in 'beautiful Sydney.' . . . We believe that the Labour party will never be able to assert its full strength until it has an established newspaper to give voice to its wants and requirements."

To which I say "Hear, hear!"

HUXLEY AND SPENCER.

It is instructive to note how very soon those twin champions of capitalism, Huxley and Spencer, part company when they descend from general denunciations of Socialism to an explanation of their particular views of the social evils. If the "Reasoned Savagery" controversy goes on the capitalists of all denominations will have good cause for crying out, "Save us from our friends!" Spencer, in his letter to the Telegraph of the 8th inst., evidently writes under the professor's imputation that he and his school would rather leave men to starve than advocate State help or private "charity." Speaking of the poor man the professor says, "It is not I, but the extreme individualists, who will say that he may starve. If the State relieves his necessities, it is not I, but they who say it is exceeding its powers; if private charity succours the poor fellow, it is not I, but they, who reprove the giver for interfering with the survival of the fittest." Spencer, in the letter above referred to, quotes these sentences, and protests against them as applying to his views. We may, therefore, take it for granted that both Spencer and Huxley are in favour of the principle of collective action in the solution of the great problem of poverty; or at any rate of the opposite principle not being carried to its logical conclusion.

"State" is a very elastic word, and the State of to-day may be a very different thing to the State of some years hence. But under every kind of composition its interference in social matters is utterly opposed to Mr. Spencer's individualism, which he has so strenuously advocated for years past. Extreme individualism Professor Huxley indignantly repudiates, and by implication admits the principle of Socialism. Not to be behind the professor, Mr. Spencer hastens to assure the public that his friend Huxley has misunderstood him and his works. And though he hedges a good deal (as he has done in regard to land nationalisation), the plain and logical inference is that he also is in favour, not only of private charity, but of collective action on what he would call "State interference" as well. Once having admitted the principle where will they stop? The truth is, Huxley and Spencer, like other men, must move with the times, and the latter begins to see with sorrow that all the factors of social progress are strongly setting towards Socialism. This is to him a very serious matter, for it means that his theory of economic development, persisted in to nearly the end of his life, is undoubtedly wrong: and that, so far as this part of his philosophy is concerned, he will go down to posterity as a collector of facts, and nothing more. This, to a man who wishes above all things to pose as a philosophical expounder of laws and principles, is, no doubt, very humiliating. There are many expressions in Mr. Spencer's recent utterances which seem to me to imply that he is aware that he has misinterpreted the laws of social evolution, and I would like to see him candidly acknowledge it. Apart from this, the basis of his reputation is sufficiently broad to satisfy the ambition of any man. Moreover, most of his facts will fit in with Collectivism or Socialism just as well as with Individualism.

With Professor Huxley the matter is somewhat different. Socialism is to him a little profitable diversion from cutting up monkeys. And though I do not wish to make a point of it, I may be permitted to say that those who advocate Socialism spend their earnings—many of them very scanty indeed—in so doing; whereas their opponents, by their magazine articles, etc., make the subject a source of considerable profit. I have read most of Huxley's writings on Socialism, and I venture to say there is no internal evidence in any of them that he has ever read, and, much less, understood, any work of authority on the subject. His assumption that Socialism is a revival of Rousseauism is utterly false in any sense whatever and without the smallest atom of foundation; and I challenge Professor Huxley to point to any body of Socialists in the world which bases its principles, its aims, or the justification of its actions upon the doctrine that "all men are born free and equal," either naturally or politically. If that were so, then I, for one, would begin to despair that the day will ever arrive when this earth will be the cheerful home of a happy and contented people, instead of as at present and through the long ages of the past, the theatre of suffering and want, from which for the million there is no escape but in the grave. Socialism has a deeper and more enduring foundation than any fanciful hypothesis with a dozen meanings. It is based as surely in the law of economic development as Professor Huxley's biology is in the law of organic development, and requires more time and study for its comprehension.

No Socialist that understands his science ever gave expression to the theory that all human beings are born equal, and should therefore remain equal throughout life. What a child is at birth has nothing whatever to do with the subject; nor has the natural inequality of man. And I believe Huxley's laboured and tortuous interpretation of Rousseau's equality at birth to be wide of the mark. When Rousseau said all men are born equal and free, he did not mean either of the ideas Mr. Huxley has attached to his words. He is kind enough to say that Rousseau could not have been "a mere fool"; but he tries very hard nevertheless to make him out one. And if one of the greatest writers France has produced meant either of Huxley's suppositions, then, in truth, he was but a mere fool. If he meant that a new-born infant was politically free, the expression had no meaning; if he meant it was naturally free, the assertion was equally meaningless. And in regard to equality; I do not imagine anyone will seriously maintain that Rousseau meant to affirm his belief that all human beings are born with equal powers of muscle and brain, or with potentialities for their equal development. What Rousseau probably did mean was, not that nature confers upon man any positive natural rights as a unit in the social organism, but that nature brings us all into the world under precisely the same laws, and is no respecter of persons or classes. The son of the peer is the product of the same laws as the son of the peasant; and, as regards these laws, they both stand upon the same footing at the time, and through the processes of their advent to this life. During the whole time the human being is subject to natural laws only, i.e., up to the moment of its appearance on this stage of its existence, it has met with no partial or unequal treatment on the score of social caste. Our great mother has succoured all alike, and all have been subject to the same laws. But the very moment the birth is accomplished differentiation takes place, and inequality of conditions is established: the son of the peasant being destined by human laws and institutions to be through life the slave of the son of the peer. We, of course, know much that Rousseau could not, of the pre-natal influences that form or malfonn the man or woman that is to be according to the condition and surroundings of their parents.

It is true that a few exceptionally gifted wage-earners may, and do, rise from the class in which they are born; but for the great mass of workers there is nothing for it but to work, and by the produce of their labour support in idleness and luxury those to whom human laws and institutions have secured a share of the monopoly of the sources and conditions of production. Human laws and institutions secure to these people, without any merit of theirs, a power to take from the wage-earners a large share of the fruits of their labour. No amount of disingenuous special pleading can disguise this fact, or make it appear otherwise than unjust and wrong. Nor, indeed, does Professor Huxley attempt to do so, for he plainly tells us in so many words that might is right, and that it is inexpedient and wrong to disturb or upset the possession of that which has been acquired through robbery, so long as the robbery is not of recent date. And when we bear in mind that this style of argument is applied to justify the possession of land by those whose ancestors stole it from the people, it is impossible to acquit Professor Huxley of deliberately adopting a kind of special pleading, which he would not dare resort to in the consideration of any of the sciences in which his name carries weight. He knows and feels the weakness of his argument, and to strengthen his position he tries to prove, from sources which may be made to prove either side of the contention, that land has been legally, industrially, and justly acquired.

Now, a man of Huxley's intelligence must know perfectly well that the question as to how land was acquired or held centuries ago is not of the slightest importance to us to-day, in practically approaching the subject of our food supply and the solution of the labour problem. We must be guided by the light of our knowledge of to-day, and not by the darkness and ignorance of ages ago. What would Professor Huxley say if such a line of argument were adopted in scientific discovery? On the question of sanitation, for instance, what would he say if he groped about among the darkness of past years for arguments to bring against the adoption of any new discovery in this direction; or attempted the solution of any scientific problem to-day by the ignorance of the past? The truth is Huxley knows that any absurd statements and assumptions will go down with the public, in condemnation of Socialism. He knows how largely he can draw upon the general ignorance of the subject, or he would never, surely, have trotted out a saying of Rousseau's, admitting of many interpretations, and placed it before the public as the basis of the great science of Socialism as known to-day. The laws of economic development were unknown in Rousseau's day. Nor could they possibly have been known so far as they relate to the transition from the wage-system to Socialism. The conditions of their existence had not arrived. It is not difficult to understand why Huxley went to Rousseau for his Socialism, against which he tells us he conceives it to be his duty to run a-muck. To grapple with the facts and arguments of true Socialism requires more time and study than Huxley is disposed to place at the service of his friends, though every such exertion brings him a nice little cheque. He has falsely assumed that Socialism is based upon certain doctrines of Rousseau; nothing could be more inaccurate or absurd. And furthermore, either in ignorance of Rousseau's meaning, or for the purpose of a cheap and easy victory, he has placed a false interpretation upon Rousseau's language; and then, having exposed the absurdity of his own assumptions, he flatters himself that he has done his friends, the capitalists, a service by demolishing Socialism!

The real point for Socialists is, not that Professor Huxley has knocked over an idol of his own creation, and paraded the performance as an exposure of Socialistic fallacies, but that a scientist of great, and perhaps deserved, reputation, has given the weight of his character and name to the outcry raised by the ignorant and prejudiced idle and worthless classes of society against the advent of a system, which the progress of economic laws is slowly, it may be, but surely, bringing about.

The American Federation of Labour has sent a circular letter to nearly 500 "prominent" persons. The following are the questions embodied in the circular letters:

"1. In view of the wonderful and ever-increasing inventions of and improvements in wealth-producing methods, should the working people of our country be required to work more than eight hours per day?"

"2. What effect would, in your opinion, the general reduction of the hours of labour to eight per day have upon the economic, social, industrial, and commercial condition of the people of our country?"

Some, mostly business men, doubted in their answer the feasibility of the plan in their own particular respective business; others, political demagogues, would like to see the eight hours discussed and perhaps introduced; in the answer of the rest one could plainly see the grin between the lines. Not a single one of those favoured with a letter, however, proposed to do anything.

As it is the opinion in some labour circles that, if the American Federation of Labour will do anything at all in reference to the introduction of the eight hours day on May 1st, and all the energy of the organisation will be concentrated first on the building trade, it may be of interest to know what the master builders propose to do. At the national convention of the builders, which was held at the end of January in St. Paul, Minn., a delegate offered the following resolution:

"The National Association of Builders recommend, as far as practicable in the construction of buildings, eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all mechanics employed on or in the construction of the same."

To this the Boston delegation offered the following substitute:

"Recognising the agitation for shorter hours of labour than those now prevailing, the National Association of Builders, in convention assembled, declares that, as a central body, representing so many different constituents, it is not competent or proper for it to define a certain number of hours for the building trades generally to adopt, but that it should be left to the local bodies to adjust the number of hours of labour as circumstances and conditions by which they are surrounded may dictate, but we do believe that this body should persistently urge upon local bodies that the thorough establishment of the system of payment by the hour is an absolutely necessary safeguard, and they should earnestly labour to secure the establishment of the system."

Then Mr. Purington, chairman of the Chicago delegation, presented the following brief substitute:

"Resolved, that this association deems it inexpedient to take any action on the eight hour day that shall interfere with, or in any way hamper the local exchanges affiliated with this body."

After a heated discussion a vote was called, and the Boston substitute was adopted by 111 to 4.

The Federation has issued a circular to all its affiliated bodies asking for the organisation of mass meetings on February 22nd, Washington's birthday, for the purpose of propagating the eight hour day.

The Massachusetts Federation of Labour has issued the following call:

"To the Trade Unionists of Massachusetts: It is the high and bounden duty of the trade unionists of this state to take advantage of the flood-tide of the eight hour agitation of 1890. From the definite purpose of the American Federation of Labour—to achieve an advance toward shorter hours for the wage-earners of the land—there should spring strengthened organisation, permanency of growth and unity of action in our state trade societies. To this end the state branch of the A. F. of L. cordially requests your co-operation and support, and requests that you send delegates to a convention of trade unionists to be held in Boston, Sunday, March 16, 1890, in Typographical Hall, 724, Washington Street, Boston."

At this session the eight hour movement will receive the fullest consideration. The trades that are in the best position to enforce eight hours will be determined, and plans will be formulated, and such committees appointed as will be necessary to carry forward the eight hour work.

In spite of all these nervous efforts "to do something at any price," the eight hours propagation will prove utterly abortive, as may be seen from the fact that we are close upon the 1st of May, and yet no action has as yet been determined upon.

In 1889, 3,567 murders have been committed in the United States against 2,184 in the previous year, and 1,499 in 1887, and 1,809 in 1886. And yet the police force has been increased everywhere! What about State protection of life in this case?

The Society of Christian Socialists has been given legal standing and made amenable to the laws of the commonwealth of Massachusetts. The purpose of the society is to call the attention of Christians to the necessity of so changing industrial conditions as to remove crime, misery, and want. Methinks that Christians always have professed to purpose something of the sort. And if they have effected nothing in 1,900 years, why don't they kick the "mounted policeman up above" overboard, leave all metaphysics to the devil and his assistants, and try to help solve the social problem on rational principles? Probably because they are "mostly fools."

A new political labour party has been inaugurated in the State of Massachusetts under the name of the "Working-men's League." The manifesto they issued concludes as follows:

"The issues we must put to the front at first are: A demand for an eight-hour law; the abolition of the poll-tax as a pre-requisite for voting; and the granting to cities and towns the right to own and control the plants for furnishing light, water, and various other functions which are at present enjoyed by private individuals. We urge you again, for the sake of yourselves, your homes, and the institutions of your country, to unite with us in instituting this labour party. We believe labour organisations to be necessary as educational factors; yet these organisations and our party are working on two different lines of action. While one deals with effects, the labour party is dealing with cause. Remove the cause, and you remove the effect. All industrial and social conditions are governed by, and dependent for success upon, laws controlling them; therefore it is our purpose to remove restrictions which prevent the working people from retaining an equitable share of the product of their labour. We believe that machinery and an enlightened age have made it possible to produce faster than we are able to consume; therefore, we desire to establish an equilibrium between production and consumption. Again we say commence at once. Organise your leagues and make ready for action while we have the long evenings with us."

As the new party proposes to go into politics, it will be short-lived indeed. The manager of the Lead Trust has made the following report to his organisation:

"Before organising the Trust on October 1st, 1887, the different companies always waged war on each other. During the year 1888 nothing was earned, and the Trust lost up to January 1, 1889, about 262,000 dollars. In May 1889, however, after the Trust had been properly organised, things altered. In the first six months of the last year a profit of 309,848 dols. was realised, and in the last six months 792,173 dols."

This is a remarkable statement, when trusts are said to be played out.

It will be remembered that comrade John Most was found guilty by an idiotic jury of having delivered an incendiary speech on November 12th, 1887, in the City of New York, and that he was sentenced by Judge Coming on December 8th, 1887, to one year's imprisonment in the penitentiary. He appealed against this judgment, and was admitted to 5,000 dollars bail.

Since then the affair has slumbered, and everybody thought that the asinine action of citizens of the city of New York had been buried in the pigeon-holes of the law courts. However, on January 25 Acting District Attorney Gunning S. Bedford received a notification from the General Term of the Supreme Court that the conviction of John Most for "unlawful assembly and inciting to riot" had been confirmed, and he notified Inspector Byrnes and issued a warrant for Most's arrest. Most got notice of the warrant in time, and as he had resolved to appeal again, and did not desire to be brought to the "Island," where he would have been shaved, clad in prison garb, and exhibited on private view for the benefit of political "bums" and their "ladies," he went to the house of his bondsman, Dr. Hoffmann. Of course, the press and the police, done out of their pleasure, howled in fury. The following clipping from the New York Herald may give an idea of the conduct of press and police:

"Two detectives were entrusted with the warrant of the District Attorney, and Inspector Byrnes went home to his dinner last evening confident that the Anarchistic shouter would be speedily made a prisoner. He was notified by telephone from Police Headquarters that the detectives had not succeeded in finding Most, and hurried back to his office. The detectives had searched Most's house, his usual haunts, and places where it was thought likely he might be found, but the agitator had disappeared. Inspector Byrnes was furious. "Go find him," he shouted, "and don't come back until you do." Then the Inspector soliloquised upon the publicity given the contemplated arrest, and heaped imprecations upon the head of the person who notified the Anarchist of his danger. To be outwitted by Most rattled the Inspector considerably, and it was some time before he could collect his scattered senses. All the available detectives on his staff were summoned, and inside of half an hour twenty reliable aids were scurrying about all over the city in quest of Herr Most. Detective Blissert, of the Fifth Street station, who is supposed to be familiar with all Anarchistic movements, was sent for, together with Sergeant Saul, a watcher of Socialistic movements."

On Saturday the 26th of January, Most, on leaving in company with his bondsman the latter's house, was at once pounced upon by the legal suckers and carried to the Tombs. However, Most's attorneys, Messrs. Howe and Hammond, acted promptly. No sooner was he arrested than an application was made for a writ of habeas corpus. Mr. Howe argued the case on Tuesday before Judge Van Brunt, who granted a stay of proceedings on the ground that one of the best judges had expressed his doubt of Most's criminality, and said that, if he had "incited," it was against the State of Illinois he had sinned, and not against the State of New York. Most was freed on 5,000 dollars bail. The case will now slumber again for two years, pending an appeal to the Supreme Court. This is good luck, as I do not believe that comrade Most's state of health would have stood another year in an American jail.

The orthodox Hebrew employers of Philadelphia, generally of low Polish Jewish origin, have organised a boycott against all their employes who do not believe in the Jewish God or who entertain ideas and hopes of a better social system. They have announced that such employes must sever their connection with all "Atheistic" or "Anarchistic" societies, or seek employment elsewhere. Long live liberty in the United States!

Through the courtesy of comrade Benjamin R. Tucker, I have come into the possession of a most remarkable book on economics, entitled 'Involuntary Idleness, an exposition of the cause of the discrepancy existing between the supply of and the demand for labour and its products,' by Hugo Bilgram; published in Philadelphia by T. B. Lippincott Company in 1889. As soon as time permits, I intend to review the book in the Commonweal. So much I may say now, that it is refreshing to read a serious work on social economics after one has been compelled to peruse the shilly-shally plans of social reconstruction by a Gronlund or a Bellamy, of which the latter openly confessed that when writing 'Looking Backward' he had never as yet studied seriously social economy! and that his book was nothing—this he practically admits in the first number of the Nationalist—but the fanciful product of an idle hour. In other words, a pinchbeck Utopia. And this is the fellow who says that our martyrs in Chicago "were justly hanged because they rebelled against the laws." Sic!

HENRY F. CHARLES.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Strike at the Wharves.

The masters' association has already begun to take the offensive against the men. At the meeting of Norwood and Co. last week it was decided "that the members of this association hold themselves free to employ such labourers as they require, whether they are members of a union or not, no preference being shown to unionists or non-unionists, so long as the men satisfactorily discharge their duties." Some may think this a very harmless resolution, especially members of the sentimental middle-class who were so much moved last autumn by the story of the docker and his woes. What it means is simply this: Since the end of the great strike, the work at the docks has been done entirely by unionists, but now Mr. Norwood and his fellow-conspirators declare that blacklegs shall be forced into the docks and unionists excluded, whether they like it or not. Can anyone doubt that the old sweating contractors, who are now transformed under the new system into foremen, will not prefer to employ blacklegs to men whom they know are unionists? Of course they will; and though Mr. Norwood and his friends may declare they will show "no preference," yet they have shown us plainly by their speeches and the letters that have lately appeared in the press that they want to go back to the old system of low pay and merciless sweating. Under this new regulation the unionists will be gradually ousted for blacklegs, whom Mr. Norwood will import if he cannot find them in the neighbourhood. Result: fresh conflicts, increasing in intensity, followed by a general strike or lock-out. And then Norwood and Co. will go whining to the middle-class public and will say that these wicked dockers want to interfere with the "freedom of labour." And the middle-class public will respond, "It is shameful to prevent a man earning his living because he doesn't belong to a union. Quite right, Mr. Norwood, this sort of thing must be put a stop to." It becomes daily more evident that a renewal of the struggle of last autumn is inevitable.

There have been few features of interest about the strike at Hay's Wharf during the week. The men still hold out with determination, and have great hopes of success. On Saturday the 470 who are out received 13s. strike pay instead of the 10s. they have received up till now. This increased pay will be continued, owing to promises of financial help from Australia and other quarters. As to the wharf, the blacklegs have succeeded in getting the work completely disorganised.

Ten thousand men met on Tower Hill on Sunday, and were addressed by Tom Mann, Ben Tillett, Cunninghame Graham, and Keir Hardie. Tom Mann pointed out the way in which Norwood is trying to provoke a fresh fight. On November 14th an agreement was drawn up between the men and the company by which the representatives of the men had the right to stand by and assist at the taking on of hands, in order to prevent non-union men being engaged. The company have now deliberately gone back on their engagement, and refuse to allow them to do it. He said that he had been asked to stand as a candidate for Parliament, but he emphatically protested against going among thieves, and further, was of an opinion that labour's battles would never be fought successfully at the Parliament House. Tom Mann seems changing his opinion with regard to legislation.

Already the union men are finding out the way the new rule works. On Monday at Sharp's Wharf, Wapping, they found that blacklegs were taken on in preference, and all union men employed at the wharf are now out on strike. N.

The Stick-makers' Union.

The stickmakers on strike against a threatened reduction held a meeting at the Loyal Friends Hall, Banner St., Old St., on Feb. 12, with the object of calling upon those stickmakers in work to give greater support to those on strike, and also to call upon all non-union workers to at once join the society. Mr. J. Leslie, president of the society, stated that when the men went on strike they were told by their masters that they could "get dock labourers to do the work," how they are going to do this we do not know, considering the docker wants his "tanner" an hour and the stickmakers get on an average 3d. per hour. He stated that when the men first struck work the masters treated the union with contempt and would not recognise it, but now it appears they have learnt the meaning of what organisation can do for the worker and have sent an arbitrator to the strike committee, but they in return would have nothing to do with arbitrators, and told this worthy that they would not give in one inch but would stand by what they demanded as their rights. Comrade Feigenbaum (International Workers' Club) and C. W. Mowbray (Socialist League) were the other speakers. The chairman, in closing the meeting, stated that since the strike 350 more had joined the stickmaker's society. He further stated that though only a young society they were paying those on strike 10s. a-week, and called on those who could subscribe to help them. He would just say a word of some importance to those who believed that strikes in certain trades drove that particular trade away. A stickmaker who had a large stock of certain sticks could obtain no sale for them, but it appears that since the strike he has obtained that sale, and is even supporting the union. This should teach the worker how to make use of the "master blackleg," the same as the masters make use of the "workman blackleg." The following resolution was carried unanimously: "That this meeting pledges itself to heartily support by every means in its power (specially by subscriptions) the action of the present committee in their endeavours to keep up the union, and to support the present strike till we get our rights, and in the future to thoroughly organise the stick trade for the benefit of both men and masters." Endorsing as I would the sentiment of this resolution, and as I believe all Socialists will, I must abstain from so doing owing to the last sentence, "for the benefit of both men and masters." It is indeed phenomenal that men who lead workmen should know so little of the economic basis of modern society. There can be no benefit to both sides—to master and men. The conditions of society are so formed to-day that every one who monopolises capital and does not labour, is necessarily a thief; therefore, the masters must no longer thrive if they would benefit the worker, and the worker must not submit to robbery by his master if he would improve his own position. Now you worshippers of trades unionism, which position must the worker take?

On the following evening the strike ended in a decisive victory for the men, who received an advance instead of suffering a reduction. They have thereby practically learnt the advantages of combination. S. P.

Clay Workers' Strike.

At Wortley, just outside Leeds, there are several factories that produce fire-bricks, sanitary tubes, etc. These are being controlled by a syndicate, and one or two of the firms that trade by the name of Ingham and Cliff, are paying their "hands" about 15 per cent. less wages than neighbouring firms. Two weeks ago about 300 men and boys out of about 400 gave notice of their intention to strike for a 15 per cent. advance. The masters refused, and at the end of the week the men were refused their wages (the masters allege that the notices were irregular). Their wages are on an average about 19s. weekly. One man who has a wife and four children is only earning 12s. a-week. "Britons never shall be slaves." On Monday last the men received notices to quit their dwellings, which belong to their masters; and the married men are obliged to take these, for which they have to pay 3s. 6d. a-week. The horses that are in the same employment are lodged free of charge. The men a few months since joined the Gas Workers and General Labourers Union, who are getting subscriptions in for them. On Sunday, Feb. 9, a mass meeting was held in Vicar's Croft, at which comrades Paylor, Sweeney, Cockayne, and others spoke, and there was collected for the strikers £4 5s. 7½d. On Sunday, Feb. 16, a big meeting was held in Vicar's Croft; Michael Henry (London), Cockayne, and Roper were the speakers. A collection was made which resulted in £1 10s. On Monday the notices to quit expire, and as we have advised the men to stick to their homes as Irishmen have done, there is a probability of seeing something exciting. H. S.

Miners' Movements.

At the weekly meeting of the Lanarkshire Miners' Central Board, held on Saturday last, it was resolved, "That the delegates return to their districts, convene meetings, and ascertain whether the men would be in favour of a four days' policy or a cessation of labour, the results to be reported to a conference to be held on 22nd inst., so that definite action may be taken on Monday 24th." The secretary (comrade Small) vindicated the correspondence he had with the Lord Advocate and Home Office in reference to the right of checkweighmen to be employed by the men, the inspection of fiery workings, and anomalous position of the men under the Explosives and Mines Act, and stated his belief that the Home Secretary was about to take measures whereby checkweighmen would no longer be prohibited from weighing quarters, and the men would get credit for all the coal they produced. The chairman, in expressing the indebtedness of the delegates to comrade Small's very valuable services, advocated the application of the Corrupt Practices Act to future County Council elections.

At a meeting of the Executive Board of the Fife Miners' Association, Mr. Weir stated that he had written the secretary of the masters' association, pointing out that in the month of January the miners had only been conceded about a sixpence per day advance, whereas they had asked a shilling. He had asked that the other sixpence be conceded without delay. The masters expressed surprise that another demand should have been made for increased wages, and stated that selling prices would not permit of another increase—to the men! (ah! hem!). The matter was ultimately left in the hands of the wages committee, with instructions to issue an appeal to the miners to finish contracts should other districts in the county adopt this drastic course to enforce higher wages.

At a conference of the Miners' Federation on Saturday last, delegates attended from Yorkshire, Lancashire, Derbyshire, Notts, Warwickshire, Leicestershire, Staffordshire, Shropshire, Dean Forest, North Wales, Monmouthshire, Somerset, and Ayrshire, representing altogether over 350,000 miners. Reports on the wages question were handed in, and after a prolonged discussion a resolution was unanimously carried to demand an advance of 10 per cent. on all underground wages, and pledging all the counties, federations, and districts to co-operate in giving in notices and bringing out tools, and that if the advance be not conceded all round, no district, county, or federation be allowed to accept the advance demanded except on the lines laid down in Rule 20 of the Federation. It was resolved to terminate all contracts in the week ending 15th March, and the conference was adjourned to that date. At a meeting of Durham delegates held on 15th inst. the determination already arrived at to stop work unless the further advance in wages asked for is granted was fully confirmed. Colliers, firemen, and boiler-minders are agitating for eight hours instead of twelve as a day's work. G. McL.

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

OFFICES: 24, GREAT QUEEN ST., LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

The Offices of the Socialist League will be open for the sale of Commonweal and all other Socialist publications from 8.30 a.m. to 9 p.m. every day except Sunday. The Secretary will be in attendance from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m. daily.

Branch Subscriptions Paid.—1888:—Oxford, to end of September.

1889:—Bradford and Hammersmith, to end of April. Norwich, Glasgow, and Yarmouth, to end of May. East London, to end of October. North London and Mitcham, to end of November. St. Georges East, to end of December. 1890:—North Kensington and Manchester, to end of January. 'Commonweal' Branch, and Leicester, to end of February.

Propaganda Fund.—Marland (Rochdale), 4s. 6d.

Notice.—All letters on League business, except those intended for Editors of Commonweal, to be addressed to me. No other person is authorised to sign any official communication. FRANK KITZ, Secretary.

NEW PREMISES FUND.

Collected at Council meeting, Feb. 17th, 3s. 0½d.

"COMMONWEAL" GUARANTEE FUND.

The following further sums have been received towards this fund:—H. R., 1s.; J. Presburg, 6d.; B. W., 6d.; F. Kitz, 6d.; D. Nicoll, 6d.; P. Webb, 1s.; M. Moscheles, 1s.; A. J. Dadson, £1; R. W. Buteux, 1s.; C. Saunders, 2s.; and Mrs. Schack, 1s.

REPORTS.

'COMMONWEAL.'—On Sunday evening, Mowbray in chair, A. Tarn delivered a lecture on "The First Step in the Social Revolution," mainly dealing with the "mutual banking" theory; many questions, good discussion, and 1s. 4½d. collected.—S. P.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—Fair meeting at room in evening, when H. Halliday Sparling delivered a lecture on "Luxury Now, Necessity Then;" good discussion, collected 1s. 6d., and good sale of 'Weal'.

NORTH LONDON.—We had a very good discussion last Wednesday, founded on Kropotkin's article on the "Spirit of Revolt." On Sunday morning Cantwell and Mowbray addressed a good meeting in Regent's Park. Fair sale of 'Weal', and 4s. 4d. collected.—T. C.

ABERDEEN.—At indoor meeting on 10th, Sydney Olivier's paper on "The Moral Aspects of Socialism" (Fabian Essays) was read and discussed.—L.

LEEDS.—On Sunday morning, at Vicars Croft, Taylor and Samuels spoke to a good audience, who seemed quite pleased with the remarks made, and bought Weals and Freedom well. In the evening, at the Socialist League Club, Mattison opened the discussion on "The Organisation of Labour," by Bebel. A good discussion followed.

YARMOUTH.—Socialism is slowly but firmly taking root here. Although we have not been able to do much in the open air lately, good work has been done indoors, and a lot of Commonweal distributed in the district. We are badly in want of funds to buy leaflets for distribution in the slums and the rural district. At the yearly meeting, on February 14th, there was a good attendance of members. The secretary gave the report of the work done during last year by the branch towards realising the Social Revolution. Comrade Headley was elected secretary and Comrade Brightwell treasurer for the ensuing year.—J. H.

LIVERPOOL SOCIALISTS.—In the morning a very successful open-air meeting was held near the landing stage, the speakers being S. Reeves, H. Sharples (Blackburn), and McCutcheon. Judging by the attention paid to the speakers and the literature sold, the open-air propaganda of this society promises to bear good fruit. Hubert Bland (Fabian) lectured in the morning and evening at the Concert Hall on "Where Radicalism Fails" and "What Socialism Is." Many questions and good discussion.

To Help the Paper.—There are several ways in which you can help to spread the 'Weal'. Ask your newsagent to try and sell it. Get those who don't care to buy it week by week to subscribe direct. Arrange for the posting of contents bills anywhere you can. Any number of other plans will suggest themselves if you think about it.

Postal Propaganda.—Some who would like to do propaganda but dare not openly, or who cannot spare the time to do it personally, can find many ways in which it can be done quietly. Not the least useful among possible plans would be to order and pay for a number of copies to be sent to persons in whose hands they might do good. We will send six copies to six different addresses for 7d. Write the names and addresses legibly.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto:

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

NOTES ON NEWS.

It is certainly curious that among all the comments made by the English press upon the German elections and the Emperor's rescript, the Pall Mall should have most nearly approached the truth of the matter. That the paper which is afflicted with so perverse a squint when looking at anything Russian, can see straight when over the border, is an object-lesson with a moral attached to it somewhere. Of course, all that the Emperor has done, or has had done for him, is to read the signs of the weather a little more clearly than was expected, and to throw an anchor to windward against the squall that was coming.

Every election has registered a very large increase in the number of German Socialists; since the last election there has been a tremendous amount of propaganda done, in spite of the law and at the risk of life and liberty. Working under conditions of which few Englishmen can have any idea, and which even an Irishman can hardly appreciate, meetings have been held, lectures delivered, and pamphlets and papers circulated far and wide throughout the land. The policy of repression has failed, as it always must fail, and now the Emperor has turned, too late, to make peace with the enemy who is no longer "in his gates," but within them.

As the Pall Mall says:

"Germany, by force of its position between France and Russia, is bound to be a military State. Every German adult male is a soldier. Every German 'have not' is a soldier. Every German Social Democrat is a soldier. As the 'have nots' are increasing, and the Social Democrats consequently increasing, a state of things is possible in which the army, upon which the Empire is dependent for its stability and protection, will be an army of Social Democrats, or at least in which Socialism will thrive and develop as rapidly and vigorously as Puritanism did in the army of Fairfax and Cromwell. This is the chief shadow on the German throne, and what the young Emperor wants to do is to dispel it."

Here is another good specimen of election-time benevolence; now that the elections have gone the other way there will probably nothing come of it:

"The German Government is setting another good example in its treatment of labour. The Minister of War has been personally investigating the condition of the dwellings of the workmen employed at the Government Ordnance Factory at Spandau. The result is that the Government is going to provide dwellings for its hands at a cost of thirteen million marks."

It is perhaps not much to be feared that our own rulers here will read the weather-signs too well and follow the Emperor's example with more success. The interviews which a miners' deputation had last week with Lords Dunraven and Churchill and Mr. Gladstone on the Eight Hours Question were tragic, ludicrous, or disgusting, as you may choose to look at them. Each one of the gentlemen showed well that, as the old proverb goes, "the black ox never trod on his foot."

One thing Mr. Gladstone said is likely to have a far-reaching effect:

"Whatever may be the inconvenience of strikes and the roughness of the method of their operation, I should hesitate before assenting to this, that where an object could be gained by the working-men themselves by their own independent action, with resort to strike if necessary—that that method of proceeding was less to be desired than the interference of Parliament."

If he meant all he said, which may perhaps be doubted, it would be in order to ask him to try to secure fair play for strikers and to enforce a neutral attitude upon the police.

After endorsing "independent action" he can do no less than prevent it being hampered.

The New York World says much the same as we said last week. This from an ordinary bourgeois paper is not bad:

"Andrew Carnegie is making a noble use of his superfluous wealth in founding great public libraries in Pennsylvania. But would it not be a better illustration of 'Triumphant Democracy' if the working-men in the protected industries, from which Mr. Carnegie has obtained his wealth, were paid wages which would enable them to buy their own books?"

Or in other words, "to give the pettitoes in alms will not atone for stealing the pig."

The Boston Herald has this to say on the same subject:

"Mr. Carnegie continues to give away free public libraries. He is a very generous man, but it is to be borne in mind that his money comes directly out of the pockets of the tax-payers. They are the real donors of Carnegie libraries."

Which may be translated, "'Tis a dear collop that's cut from one's own flesh."

In the opinion of Mr. Russell Sage, an American millionaire, anyone with intelligence and industry may grow rich. This is a cheering view to take, and not a difficult one, perhaps, for a man whose own fortune is put at ten millions. But he would probably modify his opinion a good deal if he had had to earn his money and not "make" it after the approved fashion of nowadays, or, in plain English, by chicanery and gambling.

The would-be Sages who had found themselves to be shorn fools, and made such a noise over it at the Allsopp meeting on Friday, can claim but little pity. Their only complaint was, that instead of a very high dividend they were getting a moderately small one. The whole thing from beginning to end was a very clear and brief epitome of commercial morality and the high aims of "men of business."

If it were possible that such a sordid, vulgar, and miserable exhibition could have been made at a Socialist meeting, as was made by these "respectable" persons, we should never hear the last of it. But then broadcloth may steal a horse while fustian mustn't look over the hedge. S.

Amid all the agitation among workers during the last few months, there seems to have been very little attempt made to induce trade unionists to refrain from supporting sweating. It is a well known fact that the greater portion of our volunteer force are members of the various trade unions, who by their action obtain their clothing at firms (and they are all alike) who pay wages very far indeed from being near the rate a unionist receives.

They may not in all cases be aware, though some of them must be, that the price paid for the ordinary infantry tunic is no more than 3s. 9d., infantry trousers, $\frac{1}{4}$ inch stripe, only 1s. 4d., and at some firms 1s. 2d.; artillery tunic, 4s. 3d. to 4s. 6d., artillery trousers, 1s. 6d. to 1s. 9d.; in all cases linen thread and silk is supposed to be used and must be bought by the worker, who receives no extra pay for it.

Now, trade unionists, you can alter this state of things, if you like, better than the working tailors and tailoresses, and I will tell you how. Send in your resignations from the various regiments until the proper price is paid, or forever hold your peace and cease prating about the power of unionism and its unselfish object.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,
AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. VIII.—AN OLD FRIEND.

WE now turned into a pleasant lane where the branches of great plane-trees nearly met overhead, but behind them lay low houses standing rather close together.

"This is Long Acre," quoth Dick; "so there must once have been a cornfield here. How curious it is that places change so, and yet keep their old names! Just look how thick the houses stand! and they are still going on building, look you!"

"Yes," said the old man, "but I think the cornfields must have been built over before the middle of the nineteenth century. I have heard that about here was one of the thickest parts of the town. But I must get down here, neighbours; I have got to call on a friend who lives in the gardens behind this Long Acre. Goodbye and good luck, Guest!"

And he jumped down and strode away vigorously, like a young man.

"How old should you say that neighbour will be?" said I to Dick as we lost sight of him; for I saw that he was old, and yet he looked dry and sturdy like a piece of old oak; a type of old man I was not used to seeing.

"O, about ninety, I should say," said Dick.

"How long-lived your people must be!" said I.

"Yes," said Dick, "certainly we have beaten the threescore-and-ten of the old Jewish proverb-book. But then you see that was written of Syria, a hot dry country, where people live faster than in our temperate climate. However, I don't think it matters much, so long as a man is healthy and happy while he is alive. But now, Guest, we are so near to my old kinsman's dwelling-place that I think you had better keep all future questions for him."

I nodded a yes; and therewith we turned to the left, and went down a gentle slope through some beautiful rose-gardens, laid out on what I took to be the site of Endell Street. We passed on, and Dick drew rein an instant as we came across a long straight-ish road with houses scantily scattered up and down it. He waved his hand right and left, and said, "Holborn that side, Oxford Road that. This was once a very important part of the crowded city outside the ancient walls of the Roman and Mediæval burg: many of the feudal nobles of the Middle Ages, we are told, had big houses on either side of Holborn. I daresay you remember that the Bishop of Ely's house is mentioned in Shakespeare's play of King Richard III.; and there are some remains of that still left. However, this road is not of the same importance now that the ancient city is gone, walls and all."

He drove on again, while I smiled faintly to think how the nineteenth century, of which such big words have been said, counted for nothing in the memory of this man, who read Shakespeare and had not forgotten the Middle Ages.

We crossed the road into a short narrow lane between the gardens, and came out again into a wide road, on one side of which was a great and long building, turning its gables away from the highway, which I saw at once was another public group. Opposite to it was a wide space of greenery, without any wall or fence of any kind. I looked through the trees and saw beyond them a pillared portico quite familiar to me—no less old a friend, in fact, than the British Museum. It rather took my breath away, amidst all the strange things I had seen; but I held my tongue and let Dick speak. Said he:

"Yonder is the British Museum, where my great-grandfather mostly lives; so I won't say much about it. The building on the left is the Museum Market, and I think we had better turn in there for a minute or two; for Greylocks will be wanting his rest and his oats; and I suppose you will stay with my kinsman the greater part of the day; and to say the truth, there may be someone there whom I particularly want to see, and perhaps have a long talk with."

He blushed and sighed, not altogether with pleasure, I thought; so of course I said nothing, and he turned the horse under an archway which brought us into a very large paved quadrangle, with a big sycamore tree in each corner and a plashing fountain in the midst. Near the fountain were a few market stalls, with awnings over them of gay striped linen cloth, about which some people, mostly women and children, were moving quietly, looking at the goods exposed there. The ground floor of the building round the quadrangle was occupied by a wide arcade or cloister, whose fanciful but strong architecture I could not enough admire. Here also a few people were sauntering or sitting reading on the benches.

Dick said to me apologetically: "Here as elsewhere there is little doing to-day; on a Friday you would see it thronged and gay with people, and in the afternoon there is generally music about the fountain. However, I daresay we shall have a pretty good gathering at our mid-day meal."

We drove through the quadrangle and by an archway, into a large handsome stable on the other side, where we speedily stalled the old nag and made him happy with horse-meat, and then turned and walked back again through the market, Dick looking rather thoughtful, as it seemed to me.

I noticed that people couldn't help looking at me rather hard; and considering my clothes and theirs, I didn't wonder; but whenever they caught my eye they made me a very friendly sign of greeting.

We walked straight into the forecourt of the Museum, where, except that the railings were gone, and the whispering boughs of the trees were all about, nothing seemed changed; the very pigeons were wheeling about the building and clinging to the ornaments of the pediment as I had seen them of old.

Dick seemed grown a little absent, but he could not forbear giving me an architectural note, and said:

"It is rather an ugly old building, isn't it? Many people have wanted to pull it down and rebuild it; and perhaps if work does really get scarce we may yet do so. But, as my great-grandfather will tell you, it would not be quite a straightforward job; for there are wonderful collections in there of all kinds of antiquities, besides an enormous library with many exceedingly beautiful books in it, and many most useful ones as genuine records of texts; and the worry and anxiety, and even risk, there would be in moving all this has saved the buildings themselves. Besides, as we said before, it is not a bad thing to have some record of what our forefathers thought a handsome building. For there is plenty of labour and material in it."

"I see there is," said I, "and I quite agree with you. But now—hadn't we better make haste to see your great-grandfather?"

In fact, I could not help seeing that he was rather dallying with the time. He said, "Yes, we will go into the house in a minute. My kinsman is too old to do much work in the Museum, where he was a custodian of the books for many years; but he still lives here a good deal; indeed I think," said he, smiling, "that he looks upon himself as a part of the books, or the books a part of him, I don't know which."

He hesitated a little longer, then flushing up, took my hand, and saying "Come along, then!" led me toward the door of one of the old official dwellings.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

JOHN MOST.

JOHN MOST's recent imprisonment and release on bail has occasioned some newspaper talk about him just now, says Hugh O. Pentecost, in the Twentieth Century. One of Inspector Byrnes's men is reported to have said of him:

"The best people in New York, by which I mean the solid, respectable, and business-like folk who make up the wealth of the metropolis, hate him about as thoroughly as they do any man in Christendom. They have abused the police pretty roundly on one or two occasions for not shooting Most down, hanging him to a lamp-post, or disposing of him in some similarly abrupt manner, and his name in many a quiet household in this town inspires a sentiment of fear and alarm."

If this is true it reveals a bloodthirstiness in "the solid, respectable, and business-like folk who make up the wealth of the metropolis" that equals all that is charged against Most. And I am quite prepared to believe it. I have no doubt that "the solid, respectable, business-like," wealthy, church-going folk are the most merciless, cruel, and bloodthirsty people on earth when the fate of a discontented poor man is in question. The way they delight in capital punishment and reward the police for shooting strikers is an indication of their heartless natures. There is only one thing that surpasses their wicked cruelty, and that is their stupid ignorance of the real character and aims of such men as John Most. The idea of Most's name striking terror into quiet households is as laughable as to suppose the intelligent persons of this city to be afraid that a banshee would appear at their firesides.

"The police have not bothered him much and for a very good reason. This reason has been explained with a good deal of frequency, but the public will not accept it. It is based on the fact that Most has really very little influence with the dangerous Anarchists of this town. He is a blowhard and that is all. There has never been any reason for people to fear him, and there never will be. The police are always in a position to take hold of him when they want him, but we have always been anxious here to avoid making martyrs of men who pose as liberators of a country that is already free. When you arrest a blatant fool of the Most stamp you make him a hero in the minds of ignorant people, and that is exactly the end he is striving for. The police have steadfastly refused thus far to make any more of a hero of Most than they could help. That is the real reason of the so-called lenity which has been shown to this silly and bumptious poser."

I may be mistaken, but I think Inspector Byrnes's man is wrong in everything he says here. If he means to say that Most has no influence with the working people of revolutionary tendencies on the east side of this city, he is certainly wrong. I have heard Most speak to two thousand working people who listened to him with rapt attention. And I have been informed that he has the confidence of the revolutionists almost, if not quite universally. My impression is that he has more influence among the social radicals in this city than any other one man.

When Most is called a "blowhard," a "blatant fool," and a "bumptious poser," he is totally misrepresented or I am no judge of men. I never saw him but once, and I confess that I was surprised to meet a perfect gentleman. Newspaper descriptions had had their effect upon me. I expected to meet a coarse person. Herr Most, as I saw him that evening, was a well dressed and perfect mannered gentleman; a man of polished and cultured address. I afterwards heard him speak, and do not hesitate to say that for choice words, fine rhetoric, and dignified though impassioned oratory, I have not heard so fine a platform performance for years. There were four or five speakers upon that occasion, Sergius G. Shevitch and I among them, but Herr Most was far and away the most finished and forcible orator of the number. There was nothing of the ranter about him. He was quiet and self-controlled even in his most impassioned utterances, and he swayed his audience with magnetic power.

I have written this for the purpose of cautioning our readers against believing what the newspapers print about Herr Most, or any other of the prominent men in the movement for social regeneration. I do not agree with Herr Most in his philosophy of society or in his advocacy of the use of physical force to resist the physical force of the capitalists. But I do believe him to be in intelligence, in learning, in gentlemanly manners, and in moral integrity, far superior to the average "solid, respectable, business-like" person who is so willing to have him shot or hanged.

SOCIALISM AS DEFINED BY PARSONS.

BRIEFLY stated Socialism means the right of the toiler to the free and equal use of the tools of production, and the right of the producers to the product. That is Socialism. The history of mankind is one of growth. It has been evolutionary and revolutionary. The dividing line between evolution and revolution, or that imperceptible boundary line where one begins and the other ends, can never be designated. Evolution and revolution are synonymous. Evolution is the incubatory state of revolution. "The birth is the revolution, its process the evolution." What is the history of man with regard to the labouring classes? Originally the earth and its contents were held in common by all men. Then came a change, brought about by violence, robbery, and wholesale murder, called war. Later, but still way back in history, we find there were but two classes in the world—slaves and masters.

Time rolled on, and we find a labour system of serfdom. This serf labour system was the main system of labour till the end of the fifteenth century, and throughout the world the serf had a right to the soil on which he lived. The lord of the land could not exclude him from its use. But with the discovery of America, and the developments which followed that discovery and its settlement a century or two afterwards, the gold found in Peru and Mexico by the invading hosts of Pizarro and Cortez, who carried back to Europe the precious metal, infused new vitality into the commercial stagnant blood of Europe, and set in motion those wheels which have rolled on and on, until to-day commerce covers the face of the earth—time is annihilated and distance is known no more.

Following the abolition of the serfdom system was the establishment of the wage-labour system. This system was finally perfected in the French Revolution of 1789-1793. It was then for the first time that the civil and political liberty of the property-holding classes was established in Europe. We see by a mere glance back into history, that the sixteenth century was engaged in a struggle for religious freedom and the right of conscience—mental liberty. Following that, in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, was the struggle throughout France, which resulted in the establishment of the Republic and the founding of the right of political liberty. The struggle to-day, which follows on in the line of progress and in the logic of events, the industrial problem, which is here in this country, "as it is in all others," pressing for solution, is no mere matter of sentiment; it is not a religious matter; it is no mere political problem. No, it is a stern economic fact, a stubborn and immovable fact. It has, it is true, its emotional phase; it has its sentimental, religious, political aspects; but the sum total of this question is the bread-and-butter question, the how and the why we are to live and earn our daily bread. This is the labour movement. It has a scientific basis. It is founded upon fact.

I will state to you briefly what capital is. Capital is the stored-up and accumulated surplus of past labour; capital is the product of labour. Its function is—that is, the function of capital is—to appropriate or confiscate for its own use and benefit the "surplus" labour product of the wage labourer. The capitalistic system originated in the forcible seizure of natural opportunities and rights by a few, and then converting those things into special privileges, which have since become vested rights, formally entrenched behind the bulwarks of statute law and government. Capital could not exist unless there also existed a majority class who were propertyless, that is, without capital, a class whose only mode of existence is by selling their labour to capitalists. Capitalism is maintained, fostered, and perpetuated by laws; in fact, capital is law—statute law—and law is capital.

Now, briefly stated, what is labour under capitalism? Labour is a commodity, and wages is the price paid for it. The owner of this commodity, of labour, sells it—that is, himself—to the owner of capital in order to live. Labour is the expression of energy, the power of the labourer's life. This energy or power he must sell to another person in order to live. It is his only means of existence. He works to live, but his work is not simply a part of his life, it is the sacrifice of it. His labour is a commodity which, under the guise of free labour, he is forced by necessity to hand over to another party. The whole of the wage-labourer's activity is not expended in earning his own livelihood—far from it. The silk he weaves, the palace he builds, the ores he digs from out the mines are not for him—oh, no. The only thing he produces for himself is his wage; and the silk, the ores, and the palace which he has built are simply transformed for him into a certain kind of means of existence—namely, a cotton shirt, a few pennies, and the mere tenancy of a lodging house. In other words, his wage represents the bare necessities of his existence, and the unpaid-for or "surplus" portion of his labour-product constitutes the vast superabundant wealth of the non-producing capitalist class.

That is the capitalist system defined in a few words. It is this system that creates the classes of privilege and disinheritance, and it is these classes that produce this conflict. This conflict intensifies as the power of the privileged classes over the non-possessing or propertyless classes increases and intensifies, and this power increases as the idle few become richer and the producing many become poorer; and this produces what is called the labour movement. This is the labour question. Wealth is power; poverty is weakness. In former times the master selected his slaves, but now it is the slaves who select their masters; and he has got to find one, good or bad, or the alternative is for him to starve.

God help the rich, the poor can beg.

COMRADES, UNITE!

Air: "The Noble 24th."

Why stand ye like cowards? Why rise ye not and say?
"Too long we've borne the oppressors scorn: too long they've held the sway."

Up! up! ye men and women all and snap the fetters fell
That bend your backs, that warp your souls, that keep ye down in hell,
That bend your backs, that warp your souls, that keep ye down in hell.

*Chorus—Your wrongs are great, your arms are strong,
Shoulder to shoulder stand;
Strike for your lives, your liberty,
And crush the tyrant band.*

Why is it that ye labour, from early dawn till eve,
Creating wealth ye dare not touch without the rich man's leave?
Why is it that the idler's rich? Why is it that ye're poor?
It is because ye all are slaves, machines, and nothing more:
It is because ye all are slaves, machines, and nothing more.

Chorus—Your wrongs are great, etc.

But, lo! the day is coming when the workers of the world
Will be united as one man. The banner's now unfurled
That bears the words "COMRADES, UNITE!" Respond ye to the cry;
Fight for the Brotherhood of Man, or bravely fighting die:
Fight for the Brotherhood of Man, or bravely fighting die!

Chorus—Your wrongs are great, etc.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIALISM.

SIR.—A copy of your issue of December 21 was put into my hands on Tuesday at the Lambeth Baths. Although there are several things in that number to which I take great exception, yet I find myself in substantial agreement with the grand ideal which the Socialist League sets before itself in its statement of principles—an ideal which has been commending itself more and more to me for years past. But, sir, if I have a pronounced idea of social regeneration I am also a pronounced Christian; and I want to know why you should, as it were, keep me and that increasing body of Christians who more or less think with me, at arm's length by sneers and unjust charges in regard to our religion? Christianity puts no bar whatever to the amplest scheme of Socialism; and although, as essentially a spiritual revelation, and a revelation addressed to all times, the New Testament is necessarily neutral in regard to the particular institutions of society which, of course, must always be adjusted according to the natural development of the age, yet the political scheme of the Mosaic code is certainly of a Socialistic nature. But many Socialists who do not profess to be Christians, yet claim that Christ's teaching is really in their favour. Perhaps writers in your own paper may have urged this. If so, it seems to me that as, in that case, it is admitted that real Christianity and actual Christianity are not necessarily the same, it would be wiser and juster not to write in such a way as to offend real Christians. We all of us, I fear, whether Christians or non-Christians, fall short of the standards up to which we ought to live, but shall those standards be abused on this account?

Like all other evolutions, that of Socialistic opinion must necessarily be gradual, and Christians, like other men, have to live and learn. Let Christians and non-Christians then put their heads together in a friendly manner, as brothers by virtue of a common human nature, and needing one another's help by reason of the common weakness of that nature. But mutual courtesy is necessary, if we are to get on as brothers; and I cannot feel that a man is a good brother to me if he is discourteous to my religion.

I think the article on the Ruskin Reading Guild shows a very desirable disposition of mind.

A. T. RICKARBY.

In consequence of the mild winter, about 25,000 miners are out of work in Pennsylvania.

There is talk of starting in the United States a strike insurance company before the 1st of May, to provide strikers with funds in time of need. I don't know how much this talk contains.

Large numbers of settlers are awaiting at Chamberlain, South Dakota, the opening of the Sioux reservation in South Dakota on the 10th of February. The same scenes which occurred at the opening of the Oklahoma territory last year will doubtless be repeated.

The Executive Council of the American Federation of Labour held a meeting in New York on the 8th of February to consult about steps to be taken in regard to the eight hour movement. The decision as to which trade should take the initiative was referred to a later meeting. Vice-President Martin of the Federation is of opinion that a beginning should be made by the steel and iron workers, and that Pittsburg should form the centre of the agitation. President Gompers, on the other hand, is in favour of the building trades in New York.

That the American workers are mostly quite as coarse, brutal, and stupidly selfish as their masters is an indisputable fact, and the "race-issue" or "colour-question" is not confined to the Southern States and the rebel brigadiers. Here is an illustration. A young coloured woman has been appointed through some political influence to a position in the Government bureau of engraving and printing in Washington. This has brought the present administration into a disagreeable controversy with the Plate Printers' Union in Washington. The union having appealed to Secretary Windom to revoke the appointment, and having been told that the appointment could not be revoked, has informed the plate printers in the bureau that it will support them in their refusal to let the coloured girl assist them. The union has already provided for one man who was discharged for refusing to let the girl assist him, and will take care of the others, who expect to be discharged this week for the same reason. Workers who act thus do not deserve to be free, and what's more, they never will be free if they do not alter their character, in spite of the evolution that is going to do everything.—CH., Feb. 11.

HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON!

THE COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. For Australia, New Zealand, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Transvaal, and the Argentine Republic, a year, 8s.; six months, 4s.; three months, 2s. For India, Ceylon, China, Hong Kong, and the Straits Settlements, a year, 10s.; six months, 5s.; three months, 2s. 6d.

Subscribers who receive a RED WRAPPER are thereby reminded that their subscriptions have expired and must be renewed immediately if they wish to continue to receive COMMONWEAL.

SPECIAL RECRUIT SUBSCRIPTIONS.—To aid in spreading our principles, the following largely reduced terms are offered to those who obtain new subscribers: Two new yearly subscriptions for British Islands, etc., 10s. 6d.; for Australia, etc., 15s.; for India, etc., 19s. Five new subscriptions: For British Islands, etc., 25s.; for Australia, etc., 37s. 6d.; for India, etc., 47s. 6d. Specimen copies will be sent on receipt of postage.

Remittances from abroad must be made by International Money Order.

LOOK TO YOURSELVES.

FRIENDS,—A word with you. I ask your attention for a few minutes while I put before you, in plain words, the present state of affairs, which particularly concerns us agricultural workers, and tell you what we have to do to make sure the next step which we are on the point of taking.

As our first consideration is naturally directed towards the well-being and advancement of ourselves and our families, so all sorts of obstacles are put in our way by the very people who live on our labour. It is our duty to remove these obstacles.

Now, we all know that it will not be long before our fellow-workers in Surrey will be looking towards us, as neighbours, for our help in the part they are taking towards bringing about that complete unification of labour which is being developed with such grand success amongst the workers in and about London. We see what they have already done and are now doing, simply by their own exertions, to better their hitherto intolerable condition. They are not going to let what they have already gained be taken from them; they will hold it and make it the stepping-stone to more extended operations. But while they are busy building up their own organisations, we in the country must look to ourselves and do likewise, so that when all is ready we may step up with the others into our proper places in the ranks. Thus will be formed a solid and irresistible body of working-men, entirely capable of holding its own and enforcing its demands.

Now, in order that this may come about, we must know that we have to depend entirely on our own exertions. Make no mistake about this. Take warning from the failures of our attempts at agricultural unions, caused entirely by our placing both funds and confidence in the hands of people styling themselves friends of the working-man. We will not forget in a hurry the doings of one scoundrel in particular who, not so long ago, bolted with our hard-earned halfpence, and left us in the lurch. This has, however, taught us what not to do.

Neither must we look for help from politicians, parsons, or landlords. Politicians are civil enough at election time, and will promise you anything you please, provided you give them your vote; after this you may go to the devil for what he cares. Now, the tithe-fed parson will promise to keep you from the clutches of this individual, and give you by way of compensation something better hereafter; that is, if you will only be meek and lowly and contented with the state in which, as he tells you, God has placed you. You may take comfort of this if you like, or you may do the other thing. Ask for more and you will find that you have come to the wrong shop.

And our masters, the landlords, what of them? I will tell you. Since they belong to the useless class of individuals who live entirely on the labour of others, it is their interest to keep us in repair, in working order, as they do their reaping machines and their horses; that is, with just sufficient means of livelihood to enable us to work for them and their kind, and to bring up our young ones to take our place when we shall have grown too old to labour and retired to the workhouse. But we must not overlook a certain difference, which exists in the eyes of our good employer, between ourselves and his other property. It is this—if his reaping-machine come to grief, or his horse grow past work, a certain amount of money must be expended before either can be replaced; whereas, our break-down is a matter of utter indifference to him, for cannot he at once find others to step into our shoes without any extra cost whatever?

We thus see in what light we are regarded by these people who are known as our superiors. By them we are looked upon as profit-producing machines, and inconvenient ones at that. By them we are kept in ignorance of our usefulness, for it is on our ignorance that this useless class depends for the security of its position. It is that they may live in ease that we labour from twelve to fifteen hours a-day. It is that they may live in a mansion that we have such mean dwellings, that to enter them we have to stoop or we would strike our head against the door-lintel; and in order that they may revel in superfluous luxury, we, our wives, and our young ones have to fare on such as they themselves would despise. Our lot now is not a bit better than what it was when I started work at Trossley twenty-nine years ago. Since then I have worked one time and another at most places round about here, and I know something of our condition.

Ask a Radical what the Tories have done for us, then ask a Tory what the Radicals have done for us. You will have the same answer from each, and you will have the truth also. There are some amongst us who prefer to be content with hard labour for life, and let things remain as they are; it may be that a few of these are brought to this pitiable condition by the life-long tyranny of their masters and their parsons (a combination well-calculated, as we all know, to crush the very hope out of their weak hearts); but the others are those contemptible beings who are kept quiet in harness by periodical doses of charity, and by the brass band and firework dodge such as we get at Eridge. These cowards would stand by while our struggle was going on for fear of something happening to their precious selves. However, we will not despair of winning these over to our side, for we must know that it is necessary that we be strong in our union, and that we all bear in our minds that if we would obtain some further share of the wealth and comfort which we produce in such plenty, we must look to ourselves to get it, keeping together steadfast and hopeful, casting aside all petty jealousies, and, above all, resisting every attempt at interference or sham offers of help from those idle classes whom I have mentioned, for they will use all the means they have, underhanded and otherwise, to prevent our combining, and revealing their true selves in so doing; while on our side we have only justice, courage, and strength in union—but that is enough. B.

REPORT OF PROPAGANDA COMMITTEE.

A MEETING was held on Sunday evening, February 23rd, in the room of the Socialist League, Great Queen Street; D. J. Nicoll was voted to chair, and W. B. Parker to take minutes of proceedings. The chairman stated that the Council had passed a resolution to call a Conference of anti-Parliamentary Socialists for the purpose of drawing up a plan of propaganda for ensuing year, and suggested that the meeting should fix a date for the Conference and elect a sub-committee to draft agenda. After some discussion March 16th was agreed upon, the place of meeting to be the hall of Socialist League. The committee was then appointed, seven in number, being Lane, Kitz, Mowbray, Davis, Mainwaring, Nicoll, and Parker. The first meeting of committee was fixed for Thursday, February 27th. It was suggested that comrades should whip up all interested in the question. It was agreed that branches of the League be written to by secretary of Propaganda Committee, asking suggestions as to the best means of propaganda and the conduct of Commonweal. Comrades are asked to send notices of motion to the committee.

HOW THE PLUNDER GOES ON.

It is often said, If the people only knew. Yes, if they only knew. It is sometimes stated that we cannot prove our statements as to the gains of the profit-mongering classes. It is difficult in some cases for an outsider to ascertain the amount of profit. It ranges from 5 or 10 up to 200 per cent. I have seen ribbons sent from Coventry at 4s. 6d. the dozen, or 4½d. the yard; the same ribbons a few days later marked 9s. the dozen at Shrewsbury, or 9d. per yard: profit, 100 per cent. Here one 4½d. represented the cost of the silk, the expenditure of labour, and the manufacturer's profits; the other 4¼d. the trouble of handing it over the counter. But it is more especially with the profits on our food supplies that I propose to deal out on the present occasion.

At the outset I may admit that it is impossible to state the full extent of the profits realised. I remember the case of a publican, not many years ago, selling bacon at the bar, and at half the price it could be bought at the provision-dealer's. On asking the publican why he was so selling it, I was told the price the provision-dealer had offered for it, and he, the publican, had determined the consumer should have the benefit in the shape of two pounds for the price of one at the provision dealer's.

In reference to what the farmers, etc., receive and what the consumers pay to the profit-mongering classes, Mr. W. Bear, a high authority on agriculture, has lately done a great service in his work entitled 'The British Farmer and his Competitors.' It is a very able work, and as important as able. In the latter part of the work he deals with the principal articles of home growth, and shows what the farmers receive for each and also what the consumers pay. At p. 151 these are put into tabular form, from which I select the following items as samples :

	Received by farmers.	Paid by consumer.	Profits.	Per cent.
Wheat ...	£12,805,645	£19,285,955	£7,181,055	35
Butter ...	10,744,496	14,325,994	3,581,548	33
Meat ...	75,712,775	113,400,000	37,687,224	48
Milk ...	17,343,750	37,000,000	19,650,250	114
Potatoes ...	15,774,790	32,358,700	15,583,916	96
Hops, Fruit, and Vegetables	6,711,000	20,133,000	13,422,000	197
	£139,074,457	£236,503,647	£97,106,463	66

And taking the whole of our home-grown produce, Mr. Bear gives the totals as follows :

Paid to farmers,	Paid by consumers.	Profits	Average.
£207,033,567	£320,660,955	£113,627,388	54

Add the same rate of profits on our imported food supplies, and the total profits cannot be less than £200,000,000, paid by the consumers on the common necessaries of life. Here we have an indirect tax to the amount of about £200,000,000 a-year. We hear a great deal at times about a free breakfast-table. What about this monster curse—the curse of the profit-mongers? The calculations of Mr. Bear are based on the prices of 1885, 1886, and 1887, and are an average of the three years.

But even the above does not exhaust the whole range of profits. The small dealers in our back slums and the country places, add their 5 or 10 or 15 per cent. on many of the articles sold.

Mark, the above £200,000,000 represents the profits on our food supplies alone. Add to that the profits on clothing, furniture, and the various articles of general use, and the total would be enormous. Taking the total as assessed to the income-tax for 1887, under Schedule D, profits are given as £285,397,963; but that £285,000,000 is not all. It only represents the profits of those whose incomes are large enough to be assessed to the income-tax. If the tax were a graduated one, and all profits assessed, it might be found the total is not much less than £400,000,000—a sum far in excess of the total paid in wages to the working-classes, who are, of course, the great mass of the population.

Turning again to returns for 1887, we find the profits on mines £7,486,512; on ironworks, £1,502,976; on gasworks, £4,695,144; and on railways, £36,249,431. It is not a question of Profits v. Wages—as between employers and the employed—but between the whole profit-mongering classes, on the one hand, and the wage-receiving classes on the other.

We must bear in mind, too, that the non-producing classes are increasing at a fearful rate, as compared to the working-classes. Taking the ten years ending 1881, the professional classes increased 34 per cent.; bankers, 35; commercial clerks, 90; and commercial travellers, 100 per cent. Agents, another class, depending on their 10, 20, or 30 per cent., increased no less than 180 per cent. Accountants increased 60 per cent., and tobacconists 34 per cent. The increase of population was 14.5 during the ten years, the increase of non-producing classes 44.5, and the working-classes only 7.5. These are matters requiring the most serious consideration.

Anyone reading and reflecting on the above must be satisfied that the very foundation of society is wrong. That the monster evils of which we complain are inherent in and inseparable from the present constitution of society, and that our only hope lies in the destruction of the present system in all its varied phases. J. SKETCHLEY.

There were 27 strikes in the United States during January, affecting 7,402 men; of these the greater number were against reductions.

Another labour organ is started in Cuba, where already El Productor is doing such good work; El Socialista, of Guanabacoa, Cuba. We are glad to see it, and hope the paper will be well supported.—M. M.

THE CHICAGO ANARCHIST TRIAL REOPENED.

THE "Associated Press" has sent out from Chicago the following telegram :

"Moses Salomon, the attorney of Fielden, Schwab, and Neebe, the Anarchists now in the Illinois prison at Joliet, has obtained from the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Illinois a writ of error, through which the trial against the Chicago Anarchists, of which five have rested more than two years in a grave on Waldheim Cemetery near Chicago, is again referred to the Supreme Court of the United States."

About the motives which have induced the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Illinois to grant this writ of error, the telegram adds :

"At the time when the condemned Anarchists appealed to the highest court of the country they maintained, apart from other objections, that they had been deprived of a constitutional right, because the Supreme Court of Illinois rendered judgment against them in their absence. In regard to this the Supreme Court of the United States said in its decision, 'The objection that the accused have not in reality been present in the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois cannot be made as long as the record of the trial states that the accused were present. If this statement is not in accord with the facts, then the record of the trial has to be rectified in the lower court but not here.' Notwithstanding that the accused, at the time when the State Supreme Court rendered final judgment against them, had not been present, yet the State Supreme Court of Illinois refused the application for scratching of the sentence in the record of the trial, according to which final judgment had been rendered against the accused in their presence. The only thing which the Supreme Court of Illinois would do was the granting of the permission to appeal to the highest court of the United States. Should it be decided that an accused has a constitutional right to be present in the court when judgment is rendered in his case, such a decision would mean the reopening of the trial of the Chicago Anarchists."

This after-act of the Chicago Anarchist trial demonstrates again in all its infamy the conduct of the American bourgeoisie towards our murdered comrades. A falsified and erroneous record of their trial was submitted to the Supreme Court of the United States; and although this forgery was pointed out to the justices (sic!) composing the Supreme Court of the United States, this body, composed of "true and honest men," decided that "if the record of the trial was not in accord with the facts, the record had to be rectified by the lower court." The lower court—the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois—refused to act in the matter, and during this game of legal football precious time was lost and no action could be taken by the attorneys of our comrades.

The 11th of November, 1887, came and passed; and five men were murdered, although the record of their trial, upon which they appealed to a higher court, contained a confessed forgery.

The trial of the Chicago Anarchists may be reopened; but it is impossible to bring to life again those who were murdered to satisfy the bloodthirstiness of a frightened bourgeoisie. And how frightened the American bourgeoisie had been is pretty plainly shown in the haste with which the Supreme Court of the United States rendered its decision.

The time is drawing nearer and nearer when even the most stupid reactionist must candidly and openly admit that the most cowardly legal murder of all times has been perpetrated in Cook County jail, in the city of Chicago, on November 11th, 1887.

HINTS TO HELPERS.

Of course you buy the Weal yourself, and pay for it; but you can also occasionally buy two copies and give one to a friend, or leave it in some public place.

If you get it from a newsagent, you can ask him to show it in his window or to display a contents-bill outside his shop.

You can have six sample copies sent post free to six different people for 7d., or three consecutive numbers to the same address for 4d.

You can ask your friends if they have seen it, and talk of what it contains.

You can send a copy for review to your local paper and in many other ways try to increase its publicity.

Above all, read it and get others to do so.

He has retired, they say, from a snug business, with a snug property, suspected by some to be rather more than snug, and enabling him to be called a capitalist, except that this word seems to be equivalent to highway robbery in the new Gospel of St. Petroleum.—Holmes, Poet at the Breakfast Table.

Cuore e Critica is a fortnightly review, published in Bergamo and Milan, for the free discussion of various sociological and philosophical subjects. Its nature is best described by the legend on the front page of the mid-monthly February number I have before me, "Every collaborator has entire liberty of opinion, and entire responsibility of the same." There are several articles of interest in the present number, though the paper is essentially non-polemical and non-political. The name of F. Turati, as the publisher in Milan, is in our eyes a sufficient earnest of sincerity and good faith.

El Productor (of Havannah) sends a circular to the cooper trade of Catalonia, and other provinces of Spain, exhorting the workers not to play into the hands of the capitalists by going to Cuba, where imported labour is advertised for by the large employers with many promises and fair words, to the detriment of native labour. The Spanish working-men will, no doubt, hail this as a word in time, and think twice before leaving the hard life they are familiar with for another whose circumstances are unfamiliar and doubtless equally hard.—M. M.

El Productor (Barcelona, Spain) first saw the light in February, 1887; it has, therefore, entered into its fourth year, having, we believe, published without interruption during that time. Its activity and usefulness are not to be contested, and few papers are freer from those unfortunate party personalities with which Socialist journals, as well as others, are sometimes disfigured. We congratulate El Productor heartily (though rather tardily) on its anniversary, and offer our best wishes for a long and active life.—M. M.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Eight Hour Question.

The result of the interview of the miners' deputation with the representatives of our various political parties has been what might be expected. All the people interviewed have been very courteous and gracious, the deputation has been soft-soaped to any extent, but save in the cases of Randolph Churchill and Lord Dunraven, nothing like a definite pledge has been obtained from anyone. Mr. Matthews "could hold out no hope that Government would support any legislation which had for its object to impose restrictions upon the freedom of adult males in the disposal of their labour." Mr. Gladstone reserved his freedom of action, which probably comes to much about the same thing. Thus the people who represent those who compose the bulk of two great capitalist parties are opposed to the measure, though Mr. Gladstone, with his customary carefulness, does not say so plainly. We fear that with their opposition, the miners will find that the aid of the two chiefs of Tory Democracy—a very small party with a big name—will avail them but little. Cunninghame Graham, though bidding the miners be of good cheer in a letter to the Labour Tribune, still tells them that if Parliament will not give them their demand they must obtain it by a general strike. He quotes a manifesto from a French miners' paper, La Revanche de Mineurs, which, after speaking of the futility of ordinary strikes, points out that a general strike of miners throughout Europe is a very different thing. "During the past few years the idea of a general strike has become popular; very well, on you miners depends its success or defeat. Because, whilst miners work and provide the necessary coal, it will be possible for employers to replace skilled men in their workshops by others less skilled, but who will still be able to keep the machinery going. But once let the miners declare a general strike and all the industries of the world must stop in a fortnight. Do you want to help your brother workers? This is no case of a long and protracted strike with its misery and starvation. In fifteen days you would be masters of Europe. The general strike of miners means the general emancipation of the working classes." After this quotation Graham continues: "It is in order to show the miners that the destiny of civilisation is in their hands that I write this letter. In asking Parliament for an Eight Hours Bill they are asking little. Let Parliament refuse; it refuses at its peril. All the dangers, the miseries, the social turmoils, will be charged to its folly. For the miners, they are safe. They can force Parliament by their united action, or they can paralyse the industries of the world. Miners, if Parliament throws out the Bill, the other course remains; you can do it." I hope the miners will take Graham's advice. Parliament is pretty certain to throw out the Bill; but a little resolute action will soon bring the middle classes to their senses.

The Strike at the Wharves.

The men at Butler's Wharf have shown that they possess the true fraternal spirit which is necessary among the workers to weld them together in their struggle against the giant power of capital. They have contributed £40 to the strike fund, and are also giving daily the 3d. allowed them for their dinner-hour to the same purpose. These men, once the most downtrodden and hopeless of humanity, show in this a noble heroism which might put many better-off people to shame. The men are all holding splendidly together, but affairs are not going so well for the proprietors of Hay's Wharf. It was stated by the Strike Committee, that the Midland Railway Co. had been applying for four days at the wharf for 110 packages of tea but could not get them. The Great Northern had also waited a whole day for forty packages, and had then been obliged to go away with only nineteen. The men on strike at Hay's, Brook's, Olivier's, Eagle, Sufferance, and Sharpe's Wharves, and Hirsch and Co.'s Oil Mills, have issued a notice asking for their fellow workers not to seek employment at these wharves during their struggle for justice to working-men. Each of the men at Hay's Wharf received 14s. strike pay on Saturday, an advance of 4s. since the beginning of the strike.

East-end Tailors.

March promises to witness a strong revival of the labour agitation. The East-end tailors have agreed to strike on March 1st against the breaking by their masters of the strike agreement, which provided that the men shouldn't work more than twelve hours a-day, while the masters are now forcing them to slave seventeen or eighteen hours. What with the miners, the boot-makers, and the tailors, the capitalists are likely to have their hands full.

Impending Strike of Bootmakers.

On Thursday evening, Feb. 20, there was a large meeting of last-riveters and shoe-finishers in the boot trade at Shoreditch Town Hall. Our readers will remember that the men sent in a demand to their masters last autumn, calling on them to provide them with workshops, so as to prevent the sweating that accompanies the present system of working at home. The men's committee was inclined to recommend arbitration, but this was vigorously rejected. It was decided at the meeting that March 21 should be fixed as the date on which the workshops must be ready. If they are not, the men will leave their work.

Mr. Livesey's "Victory."

Mr. Livesey has spent £80,000 in fighting the gas-stokers' union, and he began his preparations for "smashing the union" as early as last September. These are the two main facts in the half-yearly report of the South Metropolitan Gas Company. In consequence, the dividend to the shareholders has been "reduced" to 12 per cent. Poor shareholders! we quite feel for them. Mr. Livesey has not mentioned in the report that, as another consequence of his intrigues to upset the union, 1,500 men, their wives and families, are now suffering the agonies of starvation. This is doubtless a trifling circumstance which he does not deem worthy of notice. The sufferers will not forget, and some day even Mr. Livesey may have cause to remember it.

Broadhurst leads the way.

Who is going next? Broadhurst has resigned his post of secretary of the Trades Union Parliamentary Committee. Ill-health is given as his reason for this step. Has the decadence of reactionary trade-unionism got anything to do with it? Or has Mr. Broadhurst thought it well to retire while it could be done gracefully? It matters little; he is gone, that is the most important fact, and it is probable that the "old gang" of the trade unions will soon follow their leader.

Demonstration of Trade Unionists and Shop Assistants.

A large demonstration of trade unionists and shop assistants will be held at the Theatre of Varieties, Hammersmith, on Sunday next, March 2nd, at 3.15 p.m., to enforce the demands of the union against the selfish minority of employers opposed to the limitation of the hours of labour. R. B. Cuninghame Graham, M.P., will preside, and will be supported by Tom Mann, Stewart Headlam, Eleanor Marx-Aveling, Dr. Gordon Hogg, H. H. Sparling, F. L. Donaldson, Robert Macbeth, B. Burleigh, John Turner, Miss Laura Treherne, and Edward Charles Laws.

Strike Prosecution at Sheffield.

Our comrade Robert Bingham has been committed for trial at Sheffield because, according to the indictment, he "unlawfully did solicit, encourage, persuade, and endeavour to persuade, divers persons to murder one James McLoughlin." Our readers must not suppose our comrade mentioned McLoughlin. What he had done was this. According to the evidence of policemen and reporters, he had called the blacklegs who were working at Brown's during the recent strike "traitors," and had then gone on to say, "they are traitors to the cause. Men who did that kind of thing, if they were fighting in battle, would be shot, and serve them right. It would not be murder in that case; and to me it is not murder if one of these enemies was killed. It is killing a traitor, and traitors should have no quarter anywhere." It appears that James McLoughlin, who was working as a "new hand" at Brown's, got a severe thrashing after this speech, and the prosecution desire to make out that our comrade was responsible for it. An amusing feature of the prosecution was the fact that the police got hold of the wrong man, and prosecuted our comrade's brother, John Bingham, for Robert's "offence"; then to be sure of the right man they prosecuted both at once; but at last they have made up their minds that Robert Bingham is the proper person, and he has accordingly been sent for trial. The police-witnesses, of course, obediently swore to either, neither, or both, as they were required. Thanks to the action of the Public Prosecutor and the police, Socialism is looking up in Sheffield.

The Impending Great Strike of Miners.

There is very little change this week in the situation. The men are preparing, and the owners are also closing up their ranks for the approaching struggle. The leaders of the Derbyshire miners have met the representatives of seven of the largest colliery firms in the county. Both sides appear to think that the Miners' Federation and the Federation of Coalowners should meet to talk the matter over. In the meantime the Derbyshire men will give in their notices this week, demanding an advance of 10 per cent. The North Wales colliery proprietors are going to follow the example of the English employers, and form a federation to resist the men. In Durham, at all the large collieries, the men have given a fortnight's notice to cease work unless an increase of 15 per cent. is given. Should the strike occur, 50,000 men will be affected.

All Socialists living in districts likely to be affected by the strike, should it come off, are requested to communicate at once with the secretary of Sheffield Socialists, Lady's Bridge Buildings, Wicker, Sheffield, and say what steps they intend taking in connection with it, and how they could co-operate in either publishing a manifesto, arranging for meetings, or otherwise. Suggestions will be welcomed from any source.

Belfast Gas-workers.

On Feb. 18th, a meeting of gas-workers was held at Donegal Place School-room, Belfast, at which it was resolved to demand the eight-hour shift and to form an organisation to enforce the demand.

Strike of Cardiff Tramway-men.

The tramway-men at Cardiff came out on Saturday Feb. 15, on account of the dismissal of an inspector for belonging to their union. By Wednesday the company had engaged a number of blacklegs, who attempted to drive the cars. They had a warm reception. In one of the leading thoroughfares, despite the presence of a strong force of police, a car was completely smashed by a furious crowd. At the docks there was a pitched battle between the police and the people; and in Cowbridge Road not only were stones thrown and cars smashed, but the people also tried to drown a detective. All through the day the fight went on; cars were thrown off the rails; and so hot did the resistance become that at six o'clock in the evening they were forced to cease running. This was followed by the surrender of the company, who have taken back all their men, including the discharged inspector. When the London tramway-men show the same courage as the men of Cardiff they will also have their tyrants at their feet. N.

Leeds Clay-workers' Strike.

Since last issue, things have developed here. Besides the 450 men and boys who have been out from Ingham and Cliff's these three weeks, the men at Elland Road are now out in support of the Wortley men. The men at Burnantoff's are prepared also to come out if it is thought necessary. Comrades Cockayne and Maguire are busy amongst them, and the Huddersfield workers will be canvassed as well as the Hipperholme men as to the desirability of coming out also. The works at Wortley are strongly picketed, and as well watched by the police. The men seem very determined to hold out. A mass meeting was held in the Market (Leeds) on Sunday afternoon, Maguire, Paylor, Sweeney, and Cockayne spoke. There was £1 7s. 3d. collected for the strike fund. H. S.

My advice to my English countrymen has been to "Let well alone"—to cease prating about "our devoted, our ardent, our passionate loyalty." If you are so sure of it, why twaddle about it?—Chief Justice Lilley.

I thank God there are no free schools or printing, and I hope we shall not have them these hundred years. For learning has brought heresy and disobedience and sects into the world, and printing has divulged them, and libels against the best government. God keep us from both.—Sir William Berkeley, Governor of Virginia, 1685.—Good old aristocrat, brave old bigot, true prophet.

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

OFFICES: 24, GREAT QUEEN ST., LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

The Offices of the Socialist League will be open for the sale of Commonweal and all other Socialist publications from 8.30 a.m. to 9 p.m. every day except Sunday. The Secretary will be in attendance from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m. daily.

Branch Subscriptions Paid.—1888:—Oxford, to end of September.

1889:—Bradford and Hammersmith, to end of April. Norwich, Glasgow, and Yarmouth, to end of May. East London, to end of October. North London and Mitcham, to end of November. St. Georges East, to end of December. 1890:—North Kensington and Manchester, to end of January. 'Commonweal' Branch, and Leicester, to end of February.

Propaganda Fund.—Bines, 1s. 6d.

Notice.—All letters on League business, except those intended for Editors of Commonweal, to be addressed to me. No other person is authorised to sign any official communication. FRANK KITZ, Secretary.

NEW PREMISES FUND.

Collected at Council meeting, Feb. 24th, 3s. 5d.

"COMMONWEAL" GUARANTEE FUND.

The following further sums have been received towards this fund:—H. R., 1s.; J. Presburg, 6d.; B. W., 6d.; D. Nicoll, 6d.; P. Webb, 1s.; T. Burgoyne, 1s.; J. B. G., 1s.; and R. W. Burnie, 2s.

REPORTS.

'COMMONWEAL.'—On Sunday evening, D. J. Nicoll lectured on "Law and Order"; good discussion and 1s. 4d. collected.—S. P.

EAST LONDON.—We re-started the outdoor propaganda last Sunday in Victoria Park, when comrades Mowbray and Parker addressed a large and attentive audience. Comrade Mowbray challenged political reformers to debate the question of the futility of political freedom, but they showed their wisdom by not accepting. About 30 Commonweal sold and 2s. 2d. collected.—H. McK.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—A good meeting held at Latimer Road; speakers were R. J. Lyne, Maughan, Crouch, and Tochatti; sale of 'Weals' fair. Comrades R. J. Lyne and Maiuwaring held a meeting in Hyde Park in conjunction with members of S.D.F., and collected 11s. from a large audience. In the evening, R. E. Dell (Fabian) lectured on "Anarchism and Social Democracy" at our rooms to a large audience, who seemed greatly interested by the number of questions asked and the warm debate; 3s. 3d. collected and several 'Weals' sold.

ABERDEEN.—At indoor meeting on Monday Hubert Bland's paper "The Outlook" (Fabian Essays) was read and discussed.—L.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday 16th, Glasier, Tim Burgoyne, and comrade Warrington of the Christian Socialists, spoke on Jail Square. In the evening, at Paisley Road, comrade Warrington was the principal speaker, and delivered an excellent address. On Monday evening Glasier lectured to the members of the Buchanan Memorial Church Literary Society; good discussion. On Sunday 23rd, Joe Burgoyne spoke on Jail Square. In the evening, at Paisley Road, the same speaker was interrupted by a drunken boor, who, from the nature of the questions put by him, evidently mistook our meeting for a "Spelling Bee." The youths of the ultra-Tory Orange faction, who were present in strong force, made use of him to further annoy our speakers, and we were forced to conclude somewhat before our usual time.—J. B.

LEEDS.—On Sunday evening, at the Socialist League Hall, comrade Braithwaite lectured on "Land Nationalization"; good discussion. Commonweal sold out, and many pamphlets disposed of.

SHEFFIELD.—Samuels visited us on Sunday last, when we held three meetings during the day, when Bullard, Charles, and Bingham spoke, and Samuels at each meeting. We had good audiences, and sold for the day three quires of Commonweal. We have been doing two and three meetings and two and three quires of Commonweal every Sunday during the last two months, and hope to do more.

YARMOUTH.—At our business meeting on Tuesday we decided to start a club in Yarmouth as soon as possible. Friends who can assist us in any way in the shape of funds, furniture, or books are requested to send them to the secretary, J. Headley, 48 Row George, until suitable premises can be secured. On Sunday we started our rural propaganda at Bradwell, Comrade Brightwell being the speaker. It is intended to continue these meetings every Sunday morning during fair weather.—J. H.

DUBLIN.—At Progressist Club, 87 Marlboro' Street, Feb. 22, J. O'Gorman lectured on "The Labour Question from a Socialist Standpoint." Brisk discussion, Hamilton, Ryan, Kavanagh, King and others took part.

SHEFFIELD.—Hallamshire Hall, West Bar.—On Sunday Feb. 16, J. Sketchley lectured—at 11, "The Queen's Speech"; at 6.30, "Insufficient Remedies for Existing Evils." Attendance good; Commonweal and other literature sold well. On Saturday evening last, Feb. 22, about 160 sat down to a public tea in connection with the Sheffield and District General Labourers' Union. After tea, the secretary gave a short address on the nature of the present labour movement, its essentially revolutionary character; after which the evening was spent in an agreeable manner, with songs, recitations, etc. The organisation now numbers over 1,400 members.—S.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

To those who have obtained copies of the Commonweal through the propagandist work of our comrades, by free distribution in the streets and public conveyances, or by purchase at our outdoor stations, we ask if in agreement with our principles to help the sale of the Commonweal by ordering it of their newsagents, and sending on to us the names of newsagents willing to sell it; and still better, as our outdoor work must shortly be reduced, by joining the local branches and helping on the work.

SHEFFIELD.—At Hallamshire Hall, Westbar, on Sunday March 2, J. Sketchley, 11 a.m., "The Events of the Week"; at 6.30, "What the Workers Want."

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—Sunday March 2, Sneinton Market (open air), Edward Carpenter at 11. Socialist Hall, Woodland Place, Upper Parliament St., at 7. Comrades, roll up!

MANHOOD SUFFRAGE LEAGUE, "Three Doves," Berwick St., Oxford St., W.—Sunday March 2, at 8 p.m., "State Control, the German Imperial Plot against Labour"; adjourned debate will be opened by J. D. Bouran. A Reading will precede Debate.

MANCHESTER.—Suitable premises have now been secured for the new Socialist Club. It is our aim to make it a centre for Socialist propaganda in Lancashire. A library, reading, recreation, and refreshment rooms will be some of its attractions. Aid is invited from friends who can assist, either with fittings, furniture, books, or funds. The Club, 60 Grosvenor Street, All Saints, is now open for members every evening. Commonweal and other literature on sale.—RECEIVED, E. Carpenter, £2; R. Unwin, 5s.

LECTURE DIARY.

LONDON.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto:

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

WEEKLY; ONE PENNY.

NOTES ON NEWS.

"FAIR words make fools fain," and the fools of the world have been cackling like mad over the rescript of the German Emperor. As was said last week in this column, all that this most philanthropic emperor did was to throw an anchor to windward against the coming gale. Well! its holding qualities have been overtried even by the passing gust of the present elections, and the ship of empire has been driven a good deal nearer the rocks. Even taking them at the lowest estimate, and allowing for the doubtful nature of a good part of the Socialism which was concerned in them, the German elections mark an immense advance in the Socialism which can be open and avowed in Germany; and though what they mean in the way of more advanced but unavowed Socialism can only be guessed, it must also be very large.

As will be seen from the agenda-paper given in another column, the Labour Conference Under Imperial and Royal Auspices is not going to progress alarmingly. The only points in which the programme touches the question of the regulation of the hours of labour of adult males are connected with work in mines. The Conference is to discuss the "limitation of the shifts in peculiarly unhealthy mines," and a restriction of the output of coal by an international agreement for a more general restriction on the hours of miners' work. It is curious to note that female mine-labour was the first kind of adult labour interfered with in England, and the precedent so formed was soon applied to factories. There can be little doubt that the same process will be repeated both here and on the Continent once that male adults have been dealt with.

The Pall Mall must, of course, come in with a patriotic note:

"The other points in the Berlin programme are all matters of ancient history in the factory legislation of this country. Our factory laws, in spite of one or two curious inconsistencies and deficiencies, regulate the labour of women and children far more effectively than any similar laws in other countries. No English child may go to work under ten years of age; children from ten to thirteen are half-timers; 'young persons' from thirteen to eighteen, and all women, are prohibited from working more than 56½ hours a-week in a textile, and more than 60 in a non-textile, factory. If the German Emperor can persuade the Reichstag to impose limits as close as these on the labour of the female and juvenile operatives of the Fatherland he will do more than the most sanguine Socialist yet dares to hope for."

If you emphasise the yet in that last sentence, it will bear a meaning to which we can agree: the Emperor is not yet reduced to sacrificing the capitalist in order to save himself. "Hunger must be great when wolves eat one another."

"CALCUTTA, Wednesday.—The Bombay Millowners' Association proposes to stop working eight days each month. Three or four mills are likely to stop altogether for the present. The proposal to work short time is due to over-production, the China market being found to be glutted.

"CALCUTTA, Friday.—At the annual meeting of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce to-day, it was stated that the Jute Mill and Press owners strongly opposed the new Factory Bill. The President said that both employers and employed would be united in opposition to any change in their existing relations. Nothing in India called for an alteration in the law."

"They that are bound must obey" is somewhere near the explanation of the "unity" with their masters which the employed are displaying in opposition to "any changes in their existing relations." Eight compulsory days of idleness in a month, not holidays, for all, and chronic idleness for many, with hunger and misery thrown in as a make-weight, are the boons which benevolent millowners have been conferring on their hands; who, if they are not as cravenly contented as their English fellows, must be anxious to "change existing relations" with the aid of a rope.

Here is another move:

"The London Trades Council have issued a manifesto to the trades and labour organisations of London, calling attention to the urgent necessity for every branch of industry to be 'not only well organised in itself, but also to be associated with all other bodies having for their object the general elevation of labour.' It is stated that the disputes which took place during the past year have increased the membership of many existing societies, and infused a desire for union among workmen who had hitherto been without any organisation whatever, and it is added that 'everything done in this direction can only be effective when a given trade or industry involved in difficulty is acting in unison with all workers on a larger scale.' 'This,' the manifesto states, 'demonstrates the necessity of a Central Council, thoroughly representative of all the organised industries of the metropolis, for the purpose of mutually sustaining and advancing each other's interest.' The Council advises the metropolitan workmen to increase the London Trades Council's power and influence, and combine 'within its pale the united voice of metropolitan labour.'"

If it could only be hoped that any means at present possible would get London labour to act as a whole, their manifesto might be something for Socialists to hail with pleasure. If even one could believe in the honesty of the effort to get "all other bodies" associated in the attempt, it might still be hailed with hope. But when one reflects on what the London Trades Council has been hitherto, and is, and thinks of the place-hunters, self-seekers, bummers, and dead-beats who will be mixed up in this new development, there is nothing left but the feeling that it is good anyway to see this discredited and reactionary clique making an onward move of any kind. S.

It is refreshing to hear that an attempt is to be made to bring about a common understanding between all who are interested in land nationalisation as to future and immediate action. As the greater includes the less, so all Socialists are land nationalisers, I take it; therefore we must all feel interested in furthering this important propaganda.

Expediency will no doubt be urged in defense of the Single Tax and Compensation ideas, which some, and only some, land nationalisers hold. Nothing could be more damaging to the cause of Revolutionary Socialism than even to appear to sanction for one moment such a method of getting back our own as is implied in taxing out the land thieves; and it is impossible to conceive a Socialist listening without loud protest to any proposal of "compensating" them for having stolen our birthright.

No compromise is possible on this all important question; it would be a cowardly surrender of principles for "policy's" sake which the awakening workers are not likely to stand. If compensation is to be discussed, let it be compensation of the broken-down and worn-out workers, the "wastrels" produced by our accursed system. Compensation! who will or can compensate the toiling masses for all the mental and physical misery they have so long endured through being bereft of their birthright? No; land nationalisers, you that are men and not mere politicians, let your cry be: The land for the people, its rightful possessors; and no compensation to the thieves who have kept it away from them.

Replying to a question in the House, which, as we read in "News from Nowhere" will one day, appropriately enough, be made a Dung Market, Mr. St. John Broderick said that the factories where Army Clothing was made were inspected from time to time to ascertain whether the factory clauses were observed. No "squaring" goes on, of course? Nothing was said of places from which people took work home, eh, Mr. Broderick? Nor was any mention made of the places, oh deluded volunteers! where your ill-paid and infected shoddy clothing is made! No inspector goes there; he only goes to the cutting-rooms of the firm, has a drink, and comes away again. The horrors depicted by Kingsley in "Alton Locke" are as bad as when he wrote; but then anything is good enough to be shoved on to fools who believe in patriotism, or defending other people's country and property instead of defending themselves against the deception and treachery of their masters.

No true man, or workman at any rate, would "serve the Queen," even as a volunteer, if his mental eyes were opened as to the real meaning of what he was doing—helping to hold up with the point of his bayonet the system which dooms him and his to irremediable misery—adding one more to the armed slaves who keep their brother slaves quiet under the lash of their plunderers and parasites.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. IX.—CONCERNING LOVE.

"Your kinsman doesn't much care for beautiful building, then," said I, as we entered the rather dreary classical house; which indeed was as bare as need be, except for some big pots of the June flowers which stood about here and there; though it was very clean and nicely whitewashed.

"O, I don't know," said Dick, rather absently. "He is getting old, certainly, for he is over a hundred and five, and no doubt he doesn't care about moving. But of course he could live in a prettier house if he liked: he is not obliged to live in one place any more than anyone else. This way, Guest."

And he led the way upstairs, and opening a door we went into a fair-sized room of the old type, as plain as the rest of the house, with a few necessary pieces of furniture, and those very simple and even rude, but solid and with a good deal of carving about them, well designed but rather crudely executed. At the furthest corner of the room, at a desk near the window, sat a little old man in a roomy oak chair, well cushioned. He was dressed in a sort of Norfolk jacket of blue serge worn threadbare, with breeches of the same, and grey worsted stockings. He jumped up from his chair, and cried out in a voice of considerable volume for such an old man, "Welcome, Dick, my lad; Clara is here, and will be more than glad to see you; so keep your heart up!"

"Clara here?" quoth Dick; "if I had known, I would not have brought— At least, I mean I would—"

He was stuttering and confused, clearly because he was anxious to say nothing to make me feel one too many. But the old man, who had not seen me at first, helped him out by coming forward and saying to me in a kind tone:

"Pray pardon me, for I did not notice that Dick, who is big enough to hide anybody, you know, had brought a friend with him. A most hearty welcome to you! All the more, as I almost hope that you are going to amuse an old man by giving him news from over sea, for I can see that you are come from over the water and far off countries."

He looked at me thoughtfully, almost anxiously, as he said in a changed voice, "Might I ask you where you come from, as you are so clearly a stranger?"

I said in an absent way: "I used to live in England, and now I am come back again; and I slept last night at the Hammersmith Guest House."

He bowed gravely, but seemed, I thought, a little disappointed with my answer. As for me, I was now looking at him harder than good manners allowed of, perhaps; for in truth his face, dried-apple-like as it was, seemed strangely familiar to me; as if I had seen it before—in a looking-glass it might be, said I to myself.

"Well," said the old man, "wherever you come from, you are come among friends. And I see my kinsman Richard Hammond has an air about him as if he had brought you here for me to do something for you. Is that so, Dick?"

Dick, who was getting still more absent-minded and kept looking uneasily at the door, managed to say, "Well, yes, kinsman: our guest finds things much altered, and cannot understand it; nor can I; so I thought I would bring him to you, since you know more of all that has happened within the last two hundred years than anybody else does.—What's that?"

And he turned toward the door again. We heard footsteps outside; the door opened, and in came a very beautiful young woman, who stopped short on seeing Dick, and flushed as red as a rose, but faced him nevertheless. Dick looked at her hard, and half reached out his hand toward her, and his whole face quivered with emotion.

The old man did not leave them long in this shy discomfort, but said, smiling with an old man's mirth: "Dick, my lad, and you, my dear Clara, I rather think that we two oldsters are in your way; for I think you will have plenty to say to each other. You had better go into Nelson's room up above; I know he has gone out; and he has just been covering the walls all over with mediæval books, so it will be pretty enough even for you two and your renewed pleasure."

The girl reached out her hand to Dick, and taking his led him out of the room, looking straight before her; but it was easy to see that her blushes came from happiness, not anger; as, indeed, love is far more self-conscious than wrath.

When the door had shut on them the old man turned to me, still smiling, and said:

"Frankly, my dear guest, you will do me a great service if you are come to set my old tongue wagging. My love of talk still abides with me, or rather grows on me; and though it is pleasant enough to see these youngsters moving about and playing together so seriously, as if the whole world depended on their kisses (as indeed it does somewhat), yet I don't think my tales of the past interest them much. The last harvest, the last baby, the last knot of carving in the marketplace, is history enough for them. It was different, I think, when I was a lad, when we were not so assured of peace and continuous plenty as we are now—Well, well! Without putting you to the question, let me ask you this: Am I to consider you as an enquirer who knows a little of our modern ways of life, or as one who comes from some place where the very foundations of life are different from ours,—do you know anything or nothing about us?"

He looked at me keenly and with growing wonder in his eyes as he spoke; and I answered in a low voice—

"I know only so much of your modern life as I could gather from using my eyes on the way here from Hammersmith, and from asking some questions of Richard Hammond, most of which he could hardly understand."

The old man smiled at this. "Then," said he, "I am to speak to you as—"

"As if I were a being from another planet," said I.

The old man, whose name, by the bye, like his kinsman's, was Hammond, smiled and nodded, and wheeling his seat round to me, bade me sit in a heavy oak chair, and said, as he saw my eyes fix on its curious carving—

"Yes, I am much tied to the past, my past, you understand. These very pieces of furniture belong to a time before my early days; it was my father who got them made; if they had been done within the last fifty years they would have been much cleverer in execution; but I don't think I should have liked them the better. We were almost beginning again in those days: and they were brisk, hot-headed times. But you hear how garrulous I am: ask me questions, ask me questions about anything, dear guest; since I must talk, make my talk profitable to you."

I was silent for a minute, and then I said, somewhat nervously: "Excuse me if I am rude; but I am so much interested in Richard, since he has been so kind to me a perfect stranger, that I should like to ask a question about him."

"Well," said old Hammond, "if he were not 'kind,' as you call it, to a perfect stranger he would be thought a strange person, and people would be apt to shun him. But ask on, ask on! don't be shy of asking."

Said I: "That beautiful girl, is he going to be married to her?"

"Well," said he, "yes, he is. He has been married to her once already, and now I should say it is pretty clear that he will be married to her again."

"Indeed," quoth I, wondering what that meant.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

IN AUSTRALIA.

OUT of an adult male population of about 75,000 there are 15,000 trades unionists in Queensland. The Central Carriers, the Labourers, and the Shearers Unions have unanimously agreed to the Labour Federation proposals. The Bushmen are also expected in. The Western drovers have formed a union, their headquarters being at Tambo. The telegraph operators have also formed a union. The railway employes received consideration when the Civil Service Bill was before Parliament, but the P.O. and telegraph employes did not get any concession, although they were bitterly opposed to the bill. They were not organised then.

The annual delegate meeting of the labourers' unions of the Central district terminated at Blackall on Saturday week. It was unanimously decided to affiliate with the Labour Federation, and assist in establishing a journal in the interests of labour, though the proposed name of Swagsman was objected to. The new monthly will consist of eight pages, Boomerang size. Several conferences also took place between the Employers Association and the Labourers Union to consider the proposed reduction of the labourers' wages to 25s., but no satisfactory conclusion was arrived at. The men want 30s. as the minimum wage, and the employers want 30s. to be the maximum.

The Queensland shearers have decided to amalgamate with the N.S.W. union, and will send delegates to the conference in February. As an instance of the good feeling prevailing between the shearers of the two colonies, the employes on Corona Downs Station, Queensland, have sent £10 to the fund for the Brookong shearers, who have now been in prison over fifteen months.

The master bakers of Sydney make out that by selling bread at 1½d. per pound they have only made 3d. on every 100 pounds of flour manufactured (or 4½ per cent. on their outlay), and that is why they have determined to raise the price to 3½d. per 2lb. loaf. It further appears that after all they have decided to sell their bread at 3d. Inference?

There is a case to come before the Albury Quarter Sessions in a week or two of a man who "mistook" 1,250 sheep—and mis-took them. He isn't a workman and therefore not a thief.

A Mr. John Farrell has been writing in the Sydney Daily Telegraph on "The Philosophy of the Single-Tax," and in so doing went out of his way to misrepresent Socialism. Whereupon comrade Yewen arose and smote him in a letter which has attracted a good deal of attention. You will be glad to hear that Yewen has very much improved in health since he has been here. He is doing valuable work for the Cause.

We have lectures and debates every Sunday evening at our rooms, 533, George Street, and they are very well attended. The Free Reading Room is a great success, and much used. We have a very fine collection of the Socialist, Labour, and Radical papers of the world, which are doing great good in letting the people here see how things are going on elsewhere. "Smallest contributions thankfully received."

The Melbourne Socialists are fighting valiantly the battle for free speech on the Wharf. Some of the prominent men have been fined and imprisoned by the Victorian Nupkinses for their persistence, but they keep right on. There are two things over which the battle rages there—Free Speech and the Sunday Opening of Museums and Libraries. They look like winning, but meanwhile the struggle is a fierce one.

CORNSTALK.

Sydney, N.S.W., Jan. 14, 1890.

Never did the proletariat more literally deserve its name than since the advent of the factory period, their rapid and degenerative increase, indeed, primarily representing "the progress of investments."—The Evolution of Sex, by Prof. Geddes and J. A. Thomson.

HUMANITY'S HERO.

WHEN the rights of man lead forward, then the hero turns not back,
Though beneath the scaffold's shadow looms the torture of the rack.
While Truth's angel flits before him, fearless following her track,
He still goes marching on!

The people rise and follow, though they march o'er many a grave,
For his high example thrills them, and the coward heart turns brave,
As each broken shackle falling, shows a man for every slave,
As they go marching on.

Crouching in the age-long shadow, blinded by her lingering night,
Woman rises to her feet at last, and hails the coming light,
Echoing back with feeble voice the hero's shout of woman's right,
As he comes marching on.

Labour deafened by the factory-hum or bent above the soil,
Losing manhood's hope and manhood's heart in weary drudge and toil,
Sees the better day ahead of honest wage for honest toil,
As man goes marching on.

The oppressed of every nation, looking out across the sea,
Catch the faint and far-off echo of the time that is to be,
When each man shall own his manhood, and each hand and brain be free,
As Truth goes marching on.

Then shout aloud the heroes' name with glad exultant voice—
All heroes who for life-work have made manhood's right their choice;
And as we shout we'll follow, and while following rejoice,
And all go marching on.

MINOT J. SAVAGE.

IN SOUTHERN AFRICA.

THAT the natives in Johannesburg have not altogether lost all thought of the way the "Chamber of Mines" and the police treated Mama Letsya and the 150 men he brought with him from Basutoland, in October last, is evidenced by the number of companies which are complaining of the great numbers of natives that have deserted from the works. The "Jumpers" Co. are only working 60 stamps, while other companies are also shorthanded, and find great difficulty in getting natives to stay. And the colonial press wonders at the scarcity of native labour! Such purblind ignorance—or is it, as I am almost forced to believe it is, wilful ignoring of the cause of the scarcity of native labour?—one can hardly imagine as existing amongst aught else than gibbering idiots.

Mr. Livesey will be no doubt flattered to hear—if he is still alive—that his "bonus scheme" has found its way to the gold-fields of South Africa. "During a discussion in the Chamber of Mines on the scarcity of native labour, the chairman stated that it had been suggested that a bonus be given to natives who had been in the employ of companies over twelve months, and he thought it a good idea. The shortfall in the number of natives in the mines was quite 5,000. In the first place it was decided to ask the Government to get supplies of Kaffirs from the northern part of the Transvaal, and to make arrangements to get the boys (natives) conveyed from their districts to the mines. It was also suggested that 20,000 coolies be imported. Mr. Hoskins proposed that there should be an agreement amongst the mines to jointly make arrangements to import the boys and regulate the rate of wages. This last suggestion the chairman considered unfeasible till the supply of labour exceeded the demand" (Johannesburg Star).

Owing to failure of crops, another famine is feared on the "Rand" during the winter months. If there be any tradesmen in Britain who would like to imitate Dr. Tanner or M. Succi of fasting fame, then come out to the gold-fields and pay £2 5s. per week (board and lodging) for doing so. Many of the Australian miners who came here some six months ago have already gone back to Australia, sick and thoroughly disgusted at the South African gold-fields. One old miner with whom I got acquainted told me that he would rather work in Australia for £5 per week than on the "Rand" for £10.

In a short time the unemployed will be a standing feature of Johannesburg; as it is, there are over 2,000 men out of work, and gangs can be seen going about in the most miserable plight. Many have no shoes on, whilst others have their feet wrapped up in rags. On the whole, there are sights to be seen in Johannesburg which are aught but pleasant for any thinking man or woman to look upon. Although the industrial development of South Africa is as yet only in its infancy, still the results of our cursed system of production for profit are more evident, more plainly seen here than in Britain, where the crowding together of thousands of workers in large centres of industry partly blinds them as to their real position.

It is Carlyle who writes that "if a red indian but quarrel with his squaw on the banks of the Mississippi, the price of beavers' skins will rise in the home markets." This is true all over the industrial world. If the De Beers Diamond Co. but restrict their output—as they have done for the sake of larger dividends—the price of diamonds straightway rises in the home markets, and as a result 7,000 diamond cutters and polishers are thrown out of employment in Amsterdam. When the Scotch miners were about to resort to the same thing—i.e., restricting the day's darg to increase their wage—how the press and coalowners in general, and some labour members in particular, cried out against "artificially increasing the price of coal." I rather think the diamond-cutters would have to cry long and loudly before the press took up their cry. But then the case is different, you know.

The eight-hour day is gradually being carried all over the colony. First Natal showed the way; then Johannesburg took it up; now the following notice, which appeared in the leading colonial papers, shows that the feeling is spreading:

"NOTICE TO ARTIZANS.—Notice is hereby given that all employers in this town have agreed to the eight hours system, with the exception of Mr. R. A. Falconer, of the New Exchange Buildings. We, the Workmen's Committee, therefore advise artizans not to enter into any engagements with the said Mr. Falconer until further notice.—E. C. Perkins, G. Barnes, A. T. Thomas, committee. Potchefstroom, S.A.E., Jan. 6, 1890."

Has the Queen turned trader in her old age, or has her son's son-in-law prevailed upon her to take up a few of the £1 shares in the South African

Chartered Company? Her name (if she has got one) does not figure in the list of directors or shareholders; yet one would infer that there is some sort of connection between them from the following advertisement, which I clip from the Diamond-Field Advertiser of January 16:

"O. H. M. S.—British South African Company's Police.—Enrolment of men for the above force is now taking place at Colonel Sir F. Carrington's house, Dutoetspan Road, next door to Dr. Smith's, where particulars as to Service Act may be obtained, or of Sergt. Major Bodle, Transvaal Hotel."

Some years ago I remember either Punch or Fun ridiculed the red-tapeism of the War Office at the time when reinforcements were urgently needed for the troops in Egypt, by reproducing what purported to be an order from the Horse Guards to the effect "that a detachment of 1 lance-corporal and 6 privates will hold themselves in readiness to proceed to the front to reinforce the troops under General So-and-so." Of this failing the War Office seems to have got cured, if one can judge by their action with regard to the Chartered Company, at whose disposal they have apparently placed the British army. Colonel Carrington has been all over the colony beating up recruits for the company's police, whilst officers of volunteers have been made do duty for the company of titled land-robbers. Reuter's cablegrams also tell us that Her Majesty has been pleased to dispatch the sergt.-major of the Life Guards with a letter to Lobengula, the chief of the Matabeles; also several officers, including Colonel Brackenbury, whose services are placed at the disposal of the Chartered Company. Turning the soldiers into gas-stokers is only one remove from turning them into servants of the Rudd-Rhodes Syndicate. The company have so far only been reckoning with Lobengula; they have yet to reckon with the Matabeles, and the reckoning may after all be much different than that expected. Four Friesland bulls have been imported by the syndicate and dispatched to the king, as a part of the concession price. Let us hope for the sake of the Matabeles that the bulls are well-behaved brutes, else should they happen to frighten his kingship, some of his followers might lose their lives in consequence. To explain: Some other concession-hunters gave to a tribal chief, amongst other things, a pair of boots—part of the concession price paid by them for the mineral rights over a large tract of territory. The boots, however, so hurt the monarch's toes that in his anger and irritation he ordered the execution of the poor native who had put them on the royal feet. The Matabeles are beginning to look with suspicion on the company's doings, and threats are being uttered against the king for handing their country over to the whites. Like the blacks in the colony of Liberia, on the east coast of Africa, they ought to have been wise in time. "The constitution of Liberia is a 'close' one. Any black is welcomed and gets twenty-five acres of land free, and any number of acres more for a merely nominal sum. Missionaries are allowed in the country, and are given a hundred acres of land if they wish it; but they are not allowed to trade, and when they leave, their land and all upon it goes back to the State. White traders are on no account allowed to settle, and it is contrary to the fundamental articles of the constitution to sell them or grant them land. The Liberians, judging by painful experience of their own, as well as knowledge of the countries around, are satisfied that if they once admit the white man as a settler, they will be driven out of their own country" (Cape Argus). The Matabeles ought to have done likewise. The plot as regards their country and the Chartered Company is thickening, and what the next stage of its development will be is hard to say just now.

Here is the first valuation of property for municipal purposes ever made in the Transvaal. It will no doubt be of interest a few years hence, if only by way of reference:

"The valuation of property in Johannesburg for rating purposes is completed, and gives a total of about six millions sterling. A rate of 1d. in the £ will bring in a yearly revenue of close upon £20,000. Gold mining claims and machinery are not assessable, but the buildings alone of one company have been assessed at £10,000. The valuation raises a very important point as to whether properties like the Boksburg Tramway, the outcome of Government concessions, are liable to be rated."

This Boksburg Tramway, like the Delagoa Bay Railway, has cost more in men's lives than will ever be well known, but the Manager of Works admitted some few months ago that "hundreds of natives had died on the works and been buried without any medical inquiry." The Delagoa Bay Railway is said to have cost a man's life for every sleeper laid. There may be a little exaggeration in this, but not so much as most people would be apt to imagine.

I cannot close this letter without referring to the mockery of such talk as the Prince of Wales gave utterance to at the banquet in aid of the Leprosy Fund, when he said that "the Cape Government deserved great credit for the measures they had taken in the matter." Not many weeks ago I looked on Robben Island and the lepers, and turned away sick and downhearted at the condition of these unfortunates. Let me tell your Royal Highness if you don't know—but I'm afraid, like the Cape Government, you know quite well—that these very men and women whom the Legislative Assembly "deserve great credit for attending to" are housed and fed infinitely worse than your Royal Highness's dogs. Even Dr. Wynn, one of the medical officers of the Island, on leaving a few weeks ago, was careful in bidding good-bye to the patients to tell them that he was in no way responsible for the manner in which they were housed or fed, but that he hoped to meet friends who had interested themselves in their condition and would try and help them. No one who has not looked on Robben Island and its inhabitants can have any idea of the hopeless miserable lives these poor sufferers are doomed to endure; not the shade of a single tree to sit under, not a stretch of grass to freshen the eye or rest their poor shrivelled diseased bodies or limbs. One poor fellow I noticed, with a lump on the side of his head as big as an ostrich egg, sitting in the dust of the roadway in the shade of the gable of an outhouse, his clothes and hair covered with sand and dust; another sitting not far off, right in the glare of a blistering sun was flicking away with a handkerchief the flies which kept buzzing round his face. I was glad to get away. But it is not possible to forget the brutal way these men and women are treated by a people and a country which calls itself Christian. Such Christianity is fit only for hell.

HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON!

THE COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. For Australia, New Zealand, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Transvaal, and the Argentine Republic, a year, 8s.; six months, 4s.; three months, 2s. For India, Ceylon, China, Hong Kong, and the Straits Settlements, a year, 10s.; six months, 5s.; three months, 2s. 6d.

Subscribers who receive a RED WRAPPER are thereby reminded that their subscriptions have expired and must be renewed immediately if they wish to continue to receive COMMONWEAL.

SPECIAL RECRUIT SUBSCRIPTIONS.—To aid in spreading our principles, the following largely reduced terms are offered to those who obtain new subscribers: Two new yearly subscriptions for British Islands, etc., 10s. 6d.; for Australia, etc., 15s.; for India, etc., 19s. Five new subscriptions: For British Islands, etc., 25s.; for Australia, etc., 37s. 6d.; for India, etc., 47s. 6d. Specimen copies will be sent on receipt of postage.

Remittances from abroad must be made by International Money Order.

COMMUNE OF PARIS.

THE ANNIVERSARY of the PROCLAMATION of the COMMUNE OF PARIS will be celebrated on WEDNESDAY MARCH 19th, at 8 p.m.,

At South Place Institute,

SOUTH PLACE, FINSBURY, E.C.

(Close to Moorgate Street and Liverpool Street Stations)

The following Comrades will address the Meeting:—

JOHN TURNER, H. H. SPARLING, D. J. NICOLL, C. W. MOWBRAY, WM. MORRIS, E. MALATESTA, PETER KROPOTKIN, R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM, M.P., B. FEIGENBAUM, and EDWARD and ELEANOR MARX AVELING.

The Hammersmith Choir will sing Revolutionary Songs.

REFORM OR REVOLUTION.

THE state of society in nearly every part of the world, whether Christian or otherwise, convinces me that man has not yet reached that happy condition of life for which nature has fitted him. Towards this, nevertheless, he incessantly tends. The obstacles which stand in his way he seeks to put aside; and the efforts he makes for this purpose, when they fall short of their aim, are seditions, insurrections, rebellions, but when successful, are denominated revolutions, and regarded as blessings the world over. The authors of the former are stigmatised as criminals and put to death, while history celebrates the latter as patriots and covers their names with glory.

Much is often said about the civilisation of the age in which we live, and it may be that we are not in many respects behind our forefathers, or neglectful of the advantages springing out of our position. But if we look over the whole continents of Europe and America, and perhaps Australasia, we shall perceive nothing but depressed peoples, populations reduced to degrading servitude, the many held in subjection by the few, absolute kings ruling by the bayonet, secret leagues of despotic governments formed for mutual support, insignificant communities calling themselves free, but instead of perfecting their own internal affairs, engaged perpetually in sanguinary struggles; monarchies without power, as in the case of England, Portugal, Spain, Italy, etc., etc.; republics without freedom, as in France, America, Switzerland, Argentine, etc., etc.; ignorance and superstition, occasionally glossed over and cemented by respectable names.

There is still, therefore, much, very much indeed, for revolution to accomplish, and the future history of the world for a long time will most likely be little but a record of contests between the possessors of wealth and power on the one hand, and the disinherited slaves of capitalism on the other. In England, because some old abuses have in many cases been swept away, there are those who maintain that nothing remains to be done. But in the words of Burke, it is not to be argued that we endure no grievances because our grievances are not of the same sort with those under which our fathers laboured formerly; not precisely those which we bore from the Tudors or vindicated upon the Stuarts. Hitherto the people have been restrained from the attempt to emancipate themselves by ignorance, which has concealed from them their own strength, as well as the way of developing it usefully, and has held them in the chains of terror by propagating false notions of duty, of birth, place and power, authority, etc., and of whatever else that can influence the happiness of the peoples of the world. But at last the clouds of oppression seem breaking, and the sun of freedom bursts forth in all its splendour; for a doctrine which has hitherto been despised and whose truth only reached a few, seems in a fair way to leaven the whole mass. The people all over the world are growing weary of oppression, and see at last that their rulers are everywhere upheld by bayonets, which seem to be in a fair way of being levelled against the oppressors instead of the oppressed. To conduct mankind to the turning point at which they may emerge from the domain of authority and enter upon that of freedom, it is now only necessary to impregnate their minds with true ideas of justice and injustice, and to destroy those opinions which, operating like idolatry, withhold them from asserting their rights.

To accomplish this is not the task of cold speculation, looking forth from perfumed and gilded chambers upon the great prospect of humanity. It must be the work of strong conviction, rooted in the belief that freedom should obtain for all, and that they best do their duty as men who break the chains of the mental and economic slaves and enable them to look up and stand fearlessly before the world as freemen. No doubt the apostle of liberty must reckon on fierce opposition; the more he is in earnest the more will he be persecuted. Grandeur will behold in him an enemy; society at large will regard him as a disturber of public tranquility; literature will repudiate his efforts as things scarcely reconcilable to her effeminate rules; and even the people themselves, deluded and misled by custom, will perhaps for awhile stand aloof from him and refuse the expression of that sympathy which constitutes his best reward. But liberty has always had its martyrs, and there is no good reason why the race should ever cease.

What can be effected by individual exertion may seem comparatively little. The word written, by whatever power it may be accompanied, moves at first in a limited circle, obstructed by the differences of language, or national prejudice, sometimes by the direct interference of governments, by variations of creed, and by the natural indolence which restrains men from embracing what seems a novelty; still, what is put forward here in England finds its way by degrees to the Spaniard, the Italian, to the German, Pole, or Russian—and vice versa. I mean, the ideas penetrate, divorced from the name of the author: but this should perhaps be regarded as an advantage. The true friend of the people does not labour for fame, but is content if perchance it falls to his lot to break or loosen the chains which to-day binds his race in slavery. Liberty is too sacred a thing to be served for gain; our offerings to her must be offerings of the heart, and we should covet no reward save the consciousness of having contributed to enlarge her empire.

One of the most effectual means of promoting the cause is to extirpate from the breasts of the people their traditional reverence for States and Parliaments, for usurpers and despots. What is just and good they will continue to respect, as it is right they should; but the basis of government throughout the world being neither goodness nor justice—for government is a negation of goodness and justice alike—it deserves not their respect, but their antagonism.

The great lesson which mankind has to learn is, how they may most speedily deliver themselves from the economical and political theories which enslave them to-day. To aid them in the performance of this duty is the object of all Socialist teaching. The greatest abilities have been from time immemorial engaged in rivetting or polishing their chains, though truth and freedom have not always wanted worthy advocates. I rely greatly on the sacredness of the Cause, and trust my earnestness and sincerity may be accepted in lieu of any other qualities which nature may have denied me. If the popular mind be disenthralled, the road to liberty will be short and easy. The people's mission at the outset is to destroy what is bad. It must be for their teachers while engaged in this process to consider what is to be substituted for the vast apparatus of evil which they are trying to remove. Revolutions are brought about in various ways in the course of time, by gradual changes, when they bear the name of reformation; or suddenly, by conspiracy, insurrection, and armed conflict—when they are given their natural designation. Philosophers, commonly inclining to the form of dominion established in their country, have too frequently counselled innovations imperceptible from their minuteness, in imitation, as they say, of time, which, though the greatest of all innovators, brings about its changes by slow degrees. But this, to my mind, is timidity, sheltering itself under the disguise of prudence. The life of nations have necessarily their paroxysms when the principle of laissez faire, after a protracted struggle, is overcome by the principle of change. The work of years is then crowded into a day, enthusiasm and passion are enlisted in the service of wisdom, sufferings are endured, life is sacrificed, but society emerges from the turmoil advanced whole centuries beyond the point at which it stood at the bursting forth of the tempest. If these periodical visitations are distasteful to the rulers and monopolists, the certain means of avoiding them is by ceasing to exist as rulers and monopolists and taking their fair share of the world's useful work. C. W. MOWBRAY.

COAL IN KENT.

THE news that coal had been discovered in Kent, and that it would probably be found to be workable, has no doubt sent a shock of hope and expectation to some hearts and of terror to others. Amongst those who have anything to lose, those who are able to live in tolerably pleasant places without being too stupified by poverty to prevent their enjoying them, among the cultivated middle-classes in short, I should think the latter feeling prevails. The threat of the creation of a new black country on the ruins of the rural beauty of some of the most beautiful country in England, and close to London also, must impress most well-to-do people, who do not claim direct relationship with Mr. Podsnap, as a real terror not to be compensated by the hope of that vague and somewhat doubtful advantage, additional commercial prosperity. This feeling shines pretty clearly through the conventional twaddle which is being written in the newspapers about the splendour of the discovery, and the splendid energy of that great and beneficent employer of labour, Sir Edward Watkin, whose virtues this grand discovery is advertising in a quite providential manner. We know pretty well that though a few capitalists may make fortunes over the job, and a few landlords fill their pockets with the royalties for working the coal-field, the discovery if it leads to anything serious will be to the well-to-do public a ghastly disaster, which will not be compensated by the possible reduction in the price of coal used for household purposes; a benefit which could be obtained at a much lower price by compelling the railways to carry the coals at reasonable rates. (I say nothing about the profits of the coal-masters and the royalties of the landlords of the existing coal-fields, as they should go to the miners and other workmen engaged in getting the coal and making it marketable).

But some of our working-men readers will perhaps cry out, "O damn the well-to-do classes!" (a sentiment in which a knowledge of facts compels me to concur,) "Won't this new discovery be a great benefit to the workers?"

Well, I don't think Socialist working-men are under any delusions on this point. I think they know pretty well that whatever loss they may suffer from the establishment of a new manufacturing hell in the south-east of England, will not be compensated to them by any amelioration in the lives of, for instance, the workers in London. They have learned by this time that Sir Edward Watkin and his pals will stick to whatever swag they may filch out of Kentish coal, which belongs to the people not to them, and will only yield to the workers what they are compelled to yield.

But to non-Socialist workers I must point out that whatever gains may be made will pass by them. The new coal-fields will give employment? Yes, but at no higher rate of wages than workmen receive now; that is, wages which just take the place of the slaves' housing and rations of ancient days; wages also subject to all the precariousness which curses the lives of all other workers at present. It will cheapen the price of coal to all London workmen? Well, if it does so permanently and generally, with such an article of necessity as coal, it will on the other hand reduce the wages of the workers throughout London. As a matter of fact, as far as the present condition of the London workers are concerned, it will leave them in the same condition as they are in now, and will but destroy the beauty of the country which will one day be theirs in reality, and not in name only as it is now. A few rich men will be richer; that is to say, they will waste more of the labour of the workers than they do now; but no poor man will have advanced one step nearer towards the attainment of wealth, that is, to a decent enjoyable life.

For the rest, surely a new manufacturing district is the thing of all others which England least needs. Double, treble, fourfold if you will (and I think you can) the yield of victuals from the fields of Kent, and you will have done some good; for though the profit-monger will in the present eat up the extra produce, and keep it from reaching those who need it, yet with the first days of the break-up of monopolist capitalism (i.e., class robbery) it would at once become real wealth to be used by our teeming population.

But fresh groups of manufactories for producing the inanities and abortions of civilisation, what shall we say about them? This—in the present they are instruments for carrying on the robbery of the poor by the rich, for producing counters to be used in the gambling market, which at once dominates and supports the capitalistic system of production. That is one function of their production; and the other is the making of goods for poor people, which none but poor people (i.e., slaves) would buy. To make useless luxuries for the rich, and to force shoddy rubbish on the poor, will be the office of the manufacturing districts in the present if we are cursed with them. And in the future when we have become free, and no longer need the toys of the fool or the rags of the slave, what shall we do with them? They will be mere nuisances to be got rid of at the expense of labour and trouble.

Let us hope, then, that coal in Kent will turn out an empty scare; that is, nothing but a blatant advertisement for the worker's friend, Sir Edward Watkin.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIALISM.

Mr. Rickarby's letter, though written in a friendly and conciliatory spirit, requires, I think, some answer. Let it be admitted that Christianity, like all religions which include a system of morality, has something in common with Socialism. Let it also be admitted that many of the "sneers and unjust charges" of which Mr. Rickarby writes, are aimed at the stupidities and hypocrisies of the Christianity of the day, which no doubt men of Mr. Rickarby's stamp sincerely condemn; granted this, yet if Christianity is "a revelation addressed to all times" it can not be neutral as to political and social institutions, which, if they are to be binding on men's consciences, and not merely pieces of arbitrary coercion, must be founded on a system of morality; and that morality must not be founded on explanations of natural facts or a theory of life in which people have ceased to believe. At the risk of offending "real Christians," however well-meaning or honest they may be, we must ask "Is this true?"

Mr. Rickarby's contrast between real and actual Christianity evades the point of difference; that real (I should call it ideal) Christianity has never existed at all. Christianity has developed in due historic sequence from the first, and has taken the various forms which social, political, economic circumstances have forced on it; its last form moulded by the sordid commercialism of modern capitalism being the bundle of hypocrisies which, as I have said, Mr. Rickarby with other Christian Socialists condemns. When this beggarly period has been supplanted by one in which Socialism is realised, will not the system of morality, the theory of life, be all-embracing, and can it be other than the Socialistic theory? Where then will be the Christian ethic?—absorbed in Socialism. No separate system of ethics will then be needed; there will be no protest needed against the theory of life which will then be commonly held, we shall only have to guard the freedom which we have won.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

THE IMPERIAL MOUNTAIN AND ITS MOUSE.

ACCORDING to the Reichsanzeiger, the following is the agenda-paper of the Labour Conference called by the German Emperor:

I. Regulation of Work in Mines: (a) Is work underground to be prohibited for children under a certain age, and for females? (b) Are the working hours to be limited in mines in which the work is particularly dangerous to health? (c) Is it possible in the general interest, in order to secure a regular output of coal, to subject the work in coalpits to international regulations?

II. Regulation of Sunday Labour: (a) Is Sunday work in general to be prohibited, except in cases of emergency? (b) What exceptions are to be permitted in case of such prohibition being issued? (c) Are these exceptions to be decided by international agreement, by law, or by administrative ordinances?

III. Regulation of Children's Work: (a) Are children up to a certain age to be excluded from industrial work? (b) How is the age up to which exclusion takes place to be decided? is it to be the same for all branches of industry, or different? (c) What restrictions on working hours, and the sort of work permitted, are to be enforced for children permitted to take part in industrial work?

IV. Regulation of the Work of Youths: (a) Is the work of young people who are past the age of childhood to be subjected to restrictions? (b) Up to what age are the restrictions to apply? (c) What restrictions are to be prescribed? (d) Are exceptions to be made from the general rules for single branches of industry?

V. Regulation of Women's Work: (a) Is the work of married women to be restricted in the day time or at night? (b) Is the industrial work of all females (married and unmarried) to be subjected to certain restrictions? (c) What restrictions are to be recommended in this case? (d) Are exceptions to be permitted from the general rules for single branches of industry, and for which?

VI. Putting into Practice of the Regulations adopted: (a) Are provisions to be made for carrying out the regulations adopted, and for their control? (b) Are repeated conferences to be held by the representatives of the respective Governments, and what questions are to be submitted to them?

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

Mr. Livesey Triumphant.

Mr. Livesey was in his glory at the meeting of South Metropolitan shareholders on Wednesday February 26. He was able to stand before them as the hero who had vanquished the strike fiend. Of course, the whole aim of his speech was to represent the union as a devouring monster which would have swallowed up all the dividends of the shareholders if it had not been for the great Livesey. Now, even supposing the union had done this, it would have been no crime, for the simple reason that it is the workers composing the union, and not the shareholders, who create the dividends, and therefore by their action the men would have only taken the result of their labour. But this is what they have not done, as is proved by Livesey's own statement, that if it had not been for the strike the shareholders would have received a dividend of 13½ per cent. Such is the reward of the shareholders for sitting still with their hands in their pockets while the men who created this wealth toiled like slaves, stripped to the skin, in the heat and glow of blazing furnaces. And it was because the union men thought of reducing this monstrous dividend to unproductive idlers that Livesey determined to smash the union for making such an "unreasonable" demand. Livesey's triumph over his victory reminds one of the chuckling delight of a little dwarf who has gained a temporary triumph over a giant. For though the gas-stokers' union has received a check, the labour movement is as strong as ever, as Mr. Livesey may find to his cost. His announcement that "they had got free of the union and meant to keep free" tells us plainly what this sham philanthropist, this teetotal advocate, this pious Pecksniff meant by his desire to improve the condition of the men by his profit-sharing scheme, and that was to break up the union and to bring back the old slavery of long hours at killing toil. Probably in a month or two the eight hours system will be entirely swept away, as it has already been at several stations where the blacklegs have "unanimously" decided to go back to the old system. When these blacklegs are slaving twelve hours a-day in Livesey's hell, and the old tyranny is completely restored, even they may rebel, and Livesey may not find that he has gained so much after all by dooming hundreds of honest workmen and their families to misery and starvation.

The Strike at the Wharves.

There is little to report this week. The men at Hay's Wharf are still out, and are not likely to give way; this is the seventh week of the strike. At Oliver's Wharf the men have returned to work under an agreement drawn up at the London Chamber of Commerce, at an interview between the Labour Conciliation Committee, the proprietors of Oliver's Wharf, and Tom Mann and Ben Tillet, of the Docker's Union. Negotiations are also proceeding for settlement at Sharp's Wharf.

The men on strike at Hirsch's Oil Mills still hold out. Blacklegs who have left the works give a doleful account of the state of affairs inside. They state that the food is bad, the beds are haunted with vermin, and that over 100 tons of oil-cake have been returned to the mill as damaged by blundering blacklegs. Mr. Hirsch has tried to tempt some of the old hands back to work, but the men refuse to return till every blackleg is sent about his business and all the old hands taken back. The men in other oil mills are loyally supporting the strikers, and the Docker's Union has raised their strike pay from 10s. to 13s. a-week.

Bradlaugh and Labour.

Mr. Bradlaugh has once more distinguished himself as a defender of the divine right of capital in his attack upon Cuninghame Grahame in the House of Commons. It must be a great pleasure to him to be so vehemently applauded by the Tories, who now look upon the honourable member for Northampton as a more valuable defender of the existing social order than even the Archbishop of Canterbury. How they must chuckle over their own stupidity when they reflect that they actually fought for years to keep this good gentleman out of the House of Commons as the enemy of property and god, to find they have now got in him an eloquent believer in rent, dividends, and profit. It is true he has made no public profession yet of his belief in a deity, but still we are confident that even that may come in time, and surely his want of religious belief is made up by the fervency of his faith in the Almighty dollar. Who knows but if a profession of personal piety is necessary to a seat on the Treasury bench, that he may not even then be equal to the occasion? At any rate, however popular Mr. Bradlaugh's attitude towards labour questions may be with the Tory party, he is not improving his standing with the workers. Workmen who have hitherto been among his most earnest defenders, have been heard to use ugly words like "Traitor" and "Renegade" in referring to a once popular politician during the past week. Mr. Bradlaugh is of course only following eminent examples in kicking down the ladder by which he climbed into power; but still, if he is in too much of a hurry about it, he may chance to come a very nasty cropper.

The Threatened Miners' Strike.

It is certain that if a fight comes off, the struggle will be a desperate one. So desperate is it likely to be, that the leaders of the miners rather shrink from a labour war which may extend in a very short space of time through the length and breadth of the country. On the other hand, the employers also feel a hesitation in provoking the conflict; so it is possible that the conference between owners and men on Tuesday may end in a compromise.

Meanwhile, the miners are sending in their notices in every district throughout the country. On Thursday Feb. 27, 13,000 miners in Nottingham handed in their notices. At some collieries negotiations for a satisfactory arrangement are in progress, but the full 10 per cent. has not in any case yet been granted. In Warwickshire the men have also sent in their notices, and here many of the masters have announced that they are willing to give the 10 per cent. if the owners in other countries will also do so. At the Stavely Coal and Iron Collieries, 4,000 men and boys have handed in their notices, which expire on the 22nd of March. The Yorkshire men, as usual, are the most determined, and lead the van. The officials of their association report that all the notices sent out, with few exceptions, have been served. They call attention to the fact that while notices of Lancashire miners terminate on March 15th, some in Yorkshire take effect from 11th, 12th, and 13th days of March. The Denaby Main and Oaks miners have given notice to cease work on the 15th. A very different attitude has been taken by the North Wales men, who, alarmed at the determined attitude of the coalowners, have withdrawn their notices. The Durham miners, who demanded an advance of 15 per cent., on having the question submitted to them by ballot, have agreed to take the owners' offer of a 5 per cent. advance.

Later.—The owners are playing a game of bluff. On Tuesday, at the conference between them and the leaders of the men, they refused to make any concession except to allow the inspection of their books. There is, therefore, at present, a complete deadlock, but there can be no question that the owners will give way if the men show their determination to strike sooner than yield. They have only the weakness of their leaders to thank for their present position.

The Expected Strike of Bootmakers.

There is to be a conference between masters and men on March 24th. The masters have offered to do away with work at home if the men will submit the wages question to arbitration. It is expected that a general strike will be averted.

Dock Strike at Liverpool.

2,000 men struck work at the North Dock at Liverpool last week. The men working in the hold of a wheat vessel demanded 7s. a day, but were offered 5s. by the stevedores. The men then came out, and were joined by the labourers, carters, and coal-heavers. Affairs are very unsettled in the docks at Liverpool.

Threatened Strike of Irish Railway-men.

Some time ago I noted the probability of a strike on the Great Northern Railway. The attitude of the men is now so threatening that the directors have offered to grant an increase of 6d. a week to the wages of all country porters, 1s. 6d. being the increase they offered previously. Mr. H. Scammel, the local secretary, at Belfast, has received a telegram from the Executive Committee of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants, informing him that all members in the employment of the Great Northern Railway will be supported whether connected with the benefit fund or not in the event of a strike taking place. The men are not satisfied with this paltry increase, from which some of them will gain no advantage, and they are prepared to strike within a few days if their demands are not conceded.

Broadhurst's Successor.

Who is to take Broadhurst's place? The Labour Elector suggested, among other candidates, Mr. George Shipton as a fit and proper person for the vacant post. What next! Shipton in the place of Broadhurst! It is difficult to see what trade unionists would gain by the exchange. I wonder what virtue Mr. Shipton possesses to recommend him to Mr. Champion, save perhaps his connection with the Sugar Bounty agitation. "A fellow feeling makes us wondrous kind," and it is possible that the gentleman who wishes to take the place of "Dear Peters" as an advocate of "Fair Trade" and "Tory Democracy," may find in Mr. Shipton a worthy fellow-worker in the same great cause. Some of the other candidates recommended by Mr. Champion are not much better. For instance, Mr. Henry Slatter, Broadhurst's double, who is as like him in general appearance as in his politics; or C. J. Drummond, a hanger-on of the privileged classes, whose fitness for the post probably arises from the fact that he participated with Mr. Shipton in the famous Sandringham expedition. Mr. Champion says in his defence of his protégés, "that few are perfect." True, very true. But there is little hope for the workers if they cannot find men nearer perfection than these.

Impending Strike of Fibre-dressers.

As some of our readers will remember, a strike in the above trade took place in Sheffield in the latter part of 1889, which ended after eight weeks' hard fighting in a great victory for the workers, and was the means of a general organisation of the trade both in Manchester and London. Encouraged by the success of the strike in Sheffield, the men in Manchester are seeking to get an advance on their present rate of wages, which are considerably lower than the Sheffield rate; and as the masters seem inclined to resist the men's demands, there is every chance of a strike taking place. It is to be hoped the men in London, who are still worse off than the Manchester men, will apply at once for an advance, and also sweep away the sweating system which so largely prevails. As many of the men are only getting from 14s. to 18s. per week on account of the sweating and the low prices paid for the work, there is plenty of room for improvement. It is to be hoped they will do as the bass-dressers in London did; instead of working for the miserable pittance that they work for, they will co-operate and try to reap the full benefit of their labour by doing away with the robbing class. N.

Strike of Clay-workers' at Leeds.

On Sunday afternoon a meeting was held at Vicar's Croft in support of the clayworkers on strike. The speakers were Maguire, Paylor, and Sweeney, who denounced Mr. Bruce, the magistrate who decided a test case against the men (on the technicality that the notices were not sent in at the proper time), thereby depriving them of £600, which is the aggregate amount of their wages due. NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—We had a field day on Sunday, when Edward Carpenter lectured in Sneinton Market in the morning on "The Breakdown of our Industrial System;" collection for lecture fund realised 3s. 8d. In the hall, Woodland Place, Parliament Street, at night, Carpenter spoke on "Present and Future Society" to a crowded audience; collection 7s. 9d.—P.

MANCHESTER.—Suitable premises have now been secured for the new Socialist Club. It is our aim to make it a centre for Socialist propaganda in Lancashire. A library, reading, recreation, and refreshment rooms will be some of its attractions. Aid is invited from friends who can assist, either with fittings, furniture, books, or funds. The Club, 60 Grosvenor Street, All Saints, is now open for members every evening. Commonweal and other literature on sale.

TREATMENT OF RUSSIAN POLITICAL PRISONERS.—At a committee meeting held at the Patriotic Club on the 21st Feb., it was resolved to hold a great Demonstration in Hyde Park, on Sunday the 9th of March, at 3 p.m., to protest against the inhuman treatment of political prisoners by the Russian Government, and to express sympathy with the Russian workers in their struggle for liberty. All particulars as to the line of route of the processions can be obtained from J. Hunter Watts, hon. sec. Workmen's Protest Committee, 18 Torrington Sq., W.C.

REPORTS.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—We held a good meeting last Sunday at Latimer Road; speakers were Crouch, Tochatti, W. H. Rogers, and Mrs. Schack. At the Clarendon Coffee Tavern, W. Morris lectured on "How shall we live then" to a good audience; questions and discussion afterwards; 43 'Weals' sold during the day and 3s. 6d. collected.

ABERDEEN.—At meeting on 24th an article by Kropotkin on "The Exile in Siberia" was read and discussed, the attendance being unusually large. Propaganda goes on gaily in newspapers; a debate is being arranged between Leatham and a prominent local Georgite; and we shall soon be thinking of re-commencing open-air propaganda.—L.

GLASGOW.—Meeting on Jail Square not held on Sunday. In the evening we held a meeting at Paisley Road Toll, where Glasier spoke amid a deal of interruptions from a gang of ill-mannered youths who had apparently been sent to annoy us. Our meeting, however, despite their efforts, was held longer than usual, and a number of questions answered at the close.

LEEDS.—At the Socialist League on Sunday night, Samuels read a paper on "The Woman Question"; a good discussion followed; 'Weals' sold out and good sale of pamphlets.

LEICESTER.—This last month we have had Sparling on "The Evolved Cannibal"; fair audience, lecturer's replies witty and telling. Annie Besant next paid us a visit; hall crammed by enthusiastic audience. William Morris drew a good number to the Radical Club, February 2, to listen to "How we shall Live Then." Same evening Morris lectured at Secular Hall on "What Socialists Want"; good attendance again. The week following, G. B. Shaw lectured in the same hall on "Socialist Individualism"; capital discussion. Sparling's and Mrs. Besant's discourses have produced discussion in two of our local papers. We have also a correspondence in the papers on the right to place Socialist papers on the tables at the free library. In this dispute the Secularists and Individualists are taking part with us. One paper gives us extensive reports. We are not doing any out-door propaganda at present, but we have been invited to Newby Street Young Men's Debating Society, where a paper on Socialism has been read. The remarks that followed show that prejudice against Socialism is rapidly giving place to a disposition to study it.—T. B.

DUBLIN.—At Progressist Club, 87 Marlboro' Street, March 1st, A. Kavanagh lectured on "Education," advocating free, secular, and compulsory education in all grades. A lively discussion arose, in which O'Gorman, King, Pearson, Hamilton and others took part.

EDINBURGH (S. S. F.).—Comrade Blackwell lectured in the Moulders' Hall on Sunday, taking for his subject "Socialism without Government." A good many questions were put and replied to. In the discussion Blackwell was well backed up by Bell. The opposition was rather weak.

SHEFFIELD.—Hallamshire Hall, West Bar.—On Sunday February 23, comrade Sketchley delivered two lectures, on the following subjects: at 11 a.m., "The Events of the Week"; and at 6.30, "The Nationalisation of the Land; How and Why." The attendance in the evening was large, and the sale of literature very good. On Sunday March 2nd, comrade Sketchley lectured as follows: at 11 a.m., "The Events of the Week—Charles Bradlaugh and the Eight Hours Question"; at 6.30, subject, "What the Workers Want, and the Reason Why." Some little discussion followed, but which was hardly worth notice. All the lectures at the above hall are public. Admission is free, and discussion is always invited.

SHEFFIELD SOCIALISTS.—On Sunday evening, March 2, at the Central Radical Club, Mrs. Usher lectured on Stepniak's biography of Prince Kropotkin, and referred in conclusion to the principles, aims, and objects of Socialism, as understood and advanced by Kropotkin and other great thinkers and workers in the Socialist cause. Mr. Shaw took the chair. Good audience, and interesting discussion. Commonweal and Socialist pamphlets sold well.

NOTES ON NEWS.

At last we are to have a real all-alive boycotting prosecution in London. The Shop Assistants' Union has been trying to obtain "early closing" at Hammersmith among other places. "Early closing" means shutting up shop at 5 o'clock one day in the week, Thursday being the day usually agreed on. All but a few traders in Hammersmith met the demand in a friendly way; these few held out, and after all other means had been exhausted a poster was issued calling on all workmen to boycott them. One or two weakened under the rod, but the others have "appealed to the law for protection." Comrade Turner, who signed the poster on behalf of the shop assistants, will have to stand his trial for infringing the sacred rights of Property to exploit Labour as it pleases.

Now here is a case which the League, and I hope all Socialists, can take up and fight through to the bitter end without any "sacrifice of principle" or anything else. The demand is so "moderate" that the help of almost everybody may be enlisted, while the principle involved is just as important and clearly defined as in the docker's strike, or any other struggle made by Labour against unjust restrictions. In the East-end the Docker's Union has asked its members to boycott all blackleg shopkeepers who refuse their assistants the small concession asked for. Every trade union and organisation of workmen should follow that example in the West; especially should Socialists take the matter up, and employ every weapon which can be brought to bear. The heavier the weapons the more effective, "Better one stroke of the beetle than two of the hammer."

Awhile ago, when the "early closing" movement was run by the masters, and the assistants held aloof from organised labour, regarding themselves as bourgeois and not belonging to the working-class, there would have been little interest in a mere passing skirmish of the kind. But now that the shop assistants are beginning to regard themselves as workers, and to recognise that the labour movement affects them as much as the mechanic or labourer, the case is different. Unaccustomed as they are to self-reliance, without even the small schooling in organised self-help that productive labour has gained in the past, these poor distributors need all the help that can be given them. If the signs of the times be trustworthy they will not be ungrateful, nor let the help be unrequited, but will take their due places in the Army of Labour, producer and distributor joining hands and marching on to victory.

"The vampire of the nineteenth century does nothing so ungentle as to soil his fingers and lips with human blood, but recruits his exhausted strength by absorbing the vital forces of others, and is no less dangerous than in the olden days when bell, book, and candle, and the terrestrial influence of a good stout stake driven through his heart, were necessary to curb his evil propensities."

No! this was not written about a capitalist, as you might very well think, it is cut from a review of a "shilling shocker." However, it so closely describes the employer who sucks all his employes' life-blood, that I suggest "vampire" as a pet-name for the vermin whom the "boy-cat" is now after.

It is rather difficult nowadays to present or re-state Socialism with anything like freshness and brevity. But this difficulty has been right well mastered by comrade Morrison Davidson, who in his "Old Order and the New"¹ has put our case against the present system with great fullness and force in a condensed and handy form that will make the book a very speakers' vade mecum. However we may differ from him as to the future organisation of society, there can be nothing but agreement with and gratitude for his attack upon private property and all that goes with it. Workmanlike thoroughness in dealing with his theme, together with skill and eloquence in its presentation, make this one of the best and most useful books that have yet appeared in English.

Especially may it be recommended for careful study by the Pall Mall writer who perpetrates the following:

"As we are all Socialists now, according to Historicus Harcourt, so we are all naturally anxious to prove that we are not the detested contrary. There is touching anxiety among all sorts and conditions of men to escape the ugly imputation of being 'Bourgeois.' What is a Bourgeois? In England the landed aristocrat would feel as deeply insulted as any Social Democratic wage-slave at being characterised by that unpopular epithet. We mostly think of the comfortable well-to-do Philistine, the small or great capitalist in shop or factory, as the Bourgeois—a man corresponding in our time to the 'Cit' of the satirists and playwrights of the last century. The German Socialists, however, in their electioneering programme, have insisted upon the definition that 'jeder Besitzende ein Bourgeois ist.' Everybody who possesses anything—William Morris, for example—is a Bourgeois. Until the State, or the local commune, has become universal proprietor, it is hard to see how there can be anybody (outside the older monastic orders) who is not a Bourgeois. Even 'the beggar's rags fluttering in air,' unless he has made them over to the commonwealth, make it impossible for him to be anything but a theoretical Socialist. It is a pity that we cannot find some genuine Teutonic word, English or German, for this ugly epithet—'stolen,' as the Laureate would remind us, 'from France.'"

A course of ethnological and philological study, including elementary modern German, might also be taken with advantage by this wisacre. What he would call a "genuine Teutonic" word is easily found if the want of it were really felt, though for that matter I can't for the life of me see why an "ugly epithet" is unfitted for an admittedly ugly thing. The "aristocrat" may very well object to it, if there be an "aristocrat" left, which needs proof nowadays in England anyway. For the rest, all who own any property, not possess anything (Can you see the difference, Mr. Pall Mall?), are bourgeois. Those who necessarily live by work, owning nothing but their bodies, and not always "possessing" those, are proletarians; those who live by the owning of property, land or capital, who may work or may not, but who can at any rate, and mostly do, exist without producing, in virtue of their power to compel others to labour for them.

How the "beggar's rags fluttering in air" give him any share of this power, may be left to vain conjecture; but it may be said that we Socialists are always insisting that neither he nor anybody else, whoever he is or whatever his desire, can be "anything but a theoretical Socialist" while the means of production, exchange, and distribution are "private property," and not possessed in common.

If the Pall Mall notices our comment on its note, which is, to say the least of it, unlikely, it might at the same time explain why Socialists alone may not steal from the French, and also say what percentage of "genuine Teutonic" words appear in the column from which our cutting is taken?

El Proletario, our most recently born, but very promising Spanish contemporary, in acknowledging receipt of Commonweal, adds a kind wish for our prosperity and freedom from confiscation. Well! we are grateful for the wish, but would rather die crushed under the iron heel of despotism than be killed, as so many of our fore-runners and fellows have been, by the neglect and apathy of those for whom we fight.

The New York Times makes the following defence of England's aggressive African policy, which is, of course, both accurate and conclusive:

"Great Britain is under a vital and continuous necessity to expand. It is almost if not quite a requirement of national self-preservation that she finds new markets for British products, and the finding of such markets in Africa means the growth of new industries, the products of which can be exchanged for the products of British industry."

Which is to say, that the commercial system can only be kept alive by continually expanding the area of exploitation.

Says the Sydney Bulletin:

"Exploiter Stanley, who has been very properly denounced by John Burns as a 'buccaneer,' will probably receive a great reception when he reaches England. Why, no unbiased reasoner knows. He is a mere adventurer, plucky, probably; cruel and unscrupulous, unquestionably. That the blacks of Central Africa should resent his commercial and ostentatious invasion of their native wilds is only natural. The Englishman who resisted the burgling of his country would be considered a patriot and a hero, but Stanley shoots down hundreds of niggers, and while he is hailed as the hero, they are called 'rebels,' 'barbarians,' and 'malicious savages.' The cruelty and rapacity of the self-advertising English explorer is only equalled by the credulity, stupidity, and hypocrisy of his countrymen."

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. IX. (continued).—CONCERNING LOVE.

"HERE is the whole tale," said old Hammond—"a short one enough; and now I hope a happy one: they lived together two years the first time; and then she got it into her head that she was in love with somebody else. So she left poor Dick. But it did not last long, only about a year. Then she came to me, as she was in the habit of bringing her troubles to the old carle, and asked me how Dick was, and whether he was happy, and all the rest of it. So I saw where the land lay, and said that he was very unhappy and not at all well; which last at any rate was a lie—There, you can guess the rest. Clara came to have a long talk with me to-day, but Dick will serve her turn much better. Indeed, if he hadn't chanced in upon me to-day I should have had to have sent for him to-morrow."

"Dear me!" said I. "Have they any children?"

"Yes," said he, "two; they are staying with one of my daughters' at present, where, indeed, Clara has mostly been. I wouldn't lose sight of her, as I felt sure they would come together again: and Dick, who is the best of good fellows, really took the matter to heart. You see, he had no other love to run to, as she had. So I managed it all; as I have done with such-like matters before."

"Ah," said I, "no doubt you wanted to keep them out of the Divorce Court: but I suppose it often has to settle such matters?"

"Then you suppose nonsense," said he. "I know that there used to be such lunatic affairs as divorce-courts: but just consider, all the cases that came into them were matters of property quarrels: and I think, dear guest," said he, smiling, "that though you do come from another planet, you can see from the mere outside look of our world that quarrels about private property could not go on amongst us in our days."

Indeed, my drive from Hammersmith to Bloomsbury, and all the quiet happy life I had seen so many hints of, even apart from my shopping, would have been enough to tell me that "the sacred rights of property," as we used to think of them, were now no more. So I sat silent while the old man took up the thread of the discourse again, and said:

"Well, then, property quarrels being no longer possible, what remains in these matters that a court of law could deal with? Fancy a court for enforcing a contract of passion or sentiment! If such a thing were needed as a reductio ad absurdum of the enforcement of contract, such a folly would do that for us."

He was silent again a little, and then said: "You must understand once for all that we have changed these matters; or rather, that our way of looking at them has changed as we have changed within the last two hundred years. We do not deceive ourselves, indeed, or believe that we can get rid of all the trouble that besets the dealings between the sexes. We know that we must face the unhappiness that comes of man and woman confusing the relations between natural passion, and sentiment, and the friendship which, when things go well, softens the awakening from passing illusions: but we are not so mad as to pile up degradation on that unhappiness by engaging in sordid squabbles about livelihood and position, and the power of tyrannising over the children who have been the results of love or lust."

Again he paused awhile, and again went on: "Calf love, mistaken for a heroism that shall be life-long, yet early waning into disappointment; the inexplicable desire that comes on a man of riper years to be the all-in-all to some one woman, whose ordinary human kindness and human beauty he has idealised into superhuman perfection, and made the one object of his desire; or lastly the reasonable longing of a strong and thoughtful man to become the most intimate friend of some beautiful and wise woman, the very type of the beauty and glory of the world which we love so well,—as we exult in all the pleasure and exaltation of spirit which goes with all this, so we set ourselves to bear the sorrow which not unseldom goes with it also; remembering those lines of the ancient poet (I quote roughly from memory of one of the many translations of the nineteenth century):

'For this the Gods have fashioned man's grief and evil day
That still for man hereafter might be the tale and the lay.'

Well, well, 'tis little likely anyhow that all tales shall be lacking or all sorrow cured."

He was silent for some time, and I would not interrupt him. At last he began again: "But you must know that we of these generations are strong and healthy of body, and live easily; we pass our lives in reasonable strife with nature, exercising not one side of ourselves only, but all sides, taking the keenest pleasure in all the life of the world. So it is a point of honour with us not to be self-centred; not to suppose that the world must cease because one man is sorry; therefore we should think it foolish, or if you will, criminal, to exaggerate these matters of sentiment and sensibility: we are no more inclined to eke out our sentimental sorrows than to cherish our bodily pains; and we recognise that there are other pleasures besides love-making. You must remember, also, that we are long-lived, and that therefore beauty both in man and woman is not so fleeting as it was in the days when we were burdened so heavily by self-inflicted diseases. So we shake off these griefs in a way which perhaps the sentimentalists of other times would think contemptible and unheroic, but which we think necessary and manlike. As on the one hand, therefore, we have ceased to be commercial in our love-matters, so also we have ceased to be artificially foolish. The folly which comes by nature, the unwisdom of the immature man, or the older man caught in a trap, we must put up with that, nor are we much ashamed of it; but to be conventionally sensitive or sentimental—my friend, I am old and perhaps disappointed, but at least I think we have cast off some of the follies of the older world."

He paused, as if for some words of mine; but I held my peace: then he went on: "At least, if we suffer from the tyranny and fickleness of nature or our own want of experience, we neither grimace about it, nor lie. If there must be sundering betwixt those who meant never to sunder, so it must be: but there need be no pretence of unity when the reality of it is gone: nor do we drive those who well know that they are incapable of it to profess an undying sentiment which they cannot really feel: thus, that as that monstrosity of venal lust is no longer possible, so also it is no longer needed. Don't misunderstand me. You did not seem shocked when I told you that there were no law-courts to enforce contracts of sentiment or passion; but so curiously are men made that perhaps you will be shocked when I tell you that there is no code of public opinion which takes the place of such courts, and which might be as tyrannical and unreasonable as they were. I do not say that people don't judge their neighbours' conduct—sometimes, doubtless, unfairly. But I do say that there is no unvarying conventional set of rules by which people are judged; no bed of Procrustes to stretch or cramp their minds and lives; no hypocritical excommunication which people are forced to pronounce, either by unconsidered habit, or by the unexpressed threat of the lesser interdict if they are lax in their hypocrisy. Are you shocked now?"

"N-o—n-o," said I, with some hesitation. "It is all so different."

"At any rate," said he, "one thing I think I can answer for: whatever sentiment there is, it is real—and general; it is not confined to people very specially refined. I am also pretty sure, as I hinted to you just now, that there is not by a great way as much suffering involved in these matters either to men and to women as there used to be. But excuse me for being so prolix on this question! You know you asked to be treated like a being from another planet."

"Indeed I thank you very much," said I. "Now may I ask you about the position of women in your society?"

He laughed very heartily for a man of his years, and said: "It is not without reason that I have got a reputation as a careful student of history. I believe I really do understand 'the Emancipation of Women movement' of the nineteenth century. I doubt if any other man now alive does."

"Well?" said I, a little bit nettled by his merriment.

"Well," said he, "of course you will see that all that is a dead controversy now. The men have no longer any opportunity of tyrannising over the women, or the women over the men; both of which things took place in those old times. The women do what they can do best, and what they like best, and the men are neither jealous of it or injured by it. This is such a commonplace that I am almost ashamed to state it."

I said, "O; and legislation? do they take any part in that?"

Hammond smiled and said: "I think you may wait for an answer to that question till we get on to the subject of legislation. There may be novelties to you in that subject also."

"Very well," I said; "but about this woman question? I saw at the Guest House that the women were waiting on the men: that seems a little like reaction, doesn't it?"

"Does it?" said the old man; "perhaps you think housekeeping an unimportant occupation, not deserving of respect. I believe that was the opinion of the 'advanced' women of the nineteenth century, and their male backers. If it is yours, I recommend to your notice an old Norwegian folk-lore tale called How the Man minded the House, or some such title; the result of which minding was that, after various tribulations, the man and the family cow balanced each other at the end of a rope, the man hanging halfway up the chimney, the cow dangling from the roof, which, after the fashion of the country, was of turf and sloping down low to the ground. Hard on the cow, I think. Of course, no such mishap could happen to such a superior person as yourself," he added, chuckling.

I sat a little uneasy under this dry gibe. Indeed, his manner of treating this latter part of the question seemed to me a little disrespectful.

"Come, now, my friend," quoth he, "don't you know that it is a great pleasure to a clever woman to manage a house skilfully, and to do it so that all the house-mates about her looked pleased, and are grateful to her? And then you know everybody likes to be ordered about by a pretty woman: why, it is one of the pleasantest forms of flirtation. You are not so old that you cannot remember that. Why, I remember it well."

And the old fellow chuckled again, and at last fairly burst out laughing.

"Excuse me," said he, after a while; "I am not laughing at anything you could be thinking of, but at that silly nineteenth century fashion, current amongst rich so-called cultivated people, of ignoring all the steps by which their daily dinner was reached, as matters too low for their lofty intelligence. Useless idiots! Come, now, I am a 'literary man,' as we queer animals used to be called, yet I am a pretty good cook myself."

"So am I," said I.

"Well, then," said he, "I really think you can understand me better than you would seem to do, judging by your words and your silence."

Said I: "Perhaps that is so; but people putting in practice commonly this sense of interest in the ordinary occupations of life rather startles me. I will ask you a question or two presently about that. But I want to return to the position of women amongst you. You have studied the 'emancipation of women' business of the nineteenth century: don't you remember that some of the 'superior' women wanted to emancipate their sex from the bearing of children?"

IN AUSTRALIA.

JOHN BURNS is said here to have refused £1,000 and expenses offered him for an Australian lecturing tour. Of course, Jack knows his own business best, but he would have done great good here, and he needn't have been tender at taking money from the trades-unions, they can afford it; for instance, the assets of the Melbourne Trades' Hall Council are £40,456 over liabilities.

The work of organisation goes merrily on. The federation between the Queensland shearers and the Brisbane wharf labourers is complete. The New South Wales shearers are now negotiating with the Queensland shearers with a view to federation, and a similar desire is expressed by the wharf labourers of both colonies. A conference of wharf-labour delegates will meet in Sydney and one of shearers in Bourke to make arrangements. A delegate has been sent from the Queensland shearers to agree to federate with the New South Wales shearers, provided the latter will join the N.S.W. Maritime Union. Should the proposition be accepted, and the wharf labourers adopt the same conditions, inter-colonial federation will have made a very fair start. The Brisbane lightermen are going to join the federation; they only formed their union three months ago, and it is now over a hundred strong.

The boy-labour question is agitating the Charters Towers miners, and in future lads over eighteen will have to receive men's wages.

The newly-formed Drovers' Union at Tambo has drawn up the following rates of wages:—Cattle: 500, not less than 80s.; 800, not less than 90s.; over 800, not less than 100s.; fats, 200, not less than 80s. Cattle men, 35s. per week, or 30s. if they leave on the road; sheep men, 25s., or 30s. if they go through. Contract (Cattle): 1s. per head per 100 miles for 500 head; 1s. 4d. per head per 100 miles up to 800 head; over 800, 1s. 3d.; small lots as per agreement, but not under 1s. 6d. per head per 100 miles. Sheep: Wages—5,000, up to, 80s.; over 5,000, 100s. Contract—5,000, per 1,000 per week, 65s.; over 5,000, per 1,000 per week, 60s.; small lots separate agreement. It is, however, agreed that the scale shall not come into force till next December. In the meantime the squatters are to be approached on the matter.

The Queensland Railway Employés Conference, which was held so successfully last week, has caused many old-time unionists to open their eyes. A few months ago, when an organiser travelled up and down the lines, there were many who, although they gave in their names, prophesied a dismal failure. The most sanguine hardly dared hope for a 3,000 membership consisting of all grades in the service; and federation with New South Wales and other railway associations seemed a misty dream, but now it is all but brought about. In addition to this, eight hours will undoubtedly constitute a day's work in the near future, for a federation of 30,000 men bound together to protect their common interests is sure to constitute a respectable argument. Besides this, the Commissioners seem anxious to work with instead of against the association, and this means a lot.

I'm not quite sure if the story is true, it probably is, and anyhow I have it on good authority, that Mr. Dow, the Victorian Minister of Agriculture, in the spring glut of butter, purchased 100 tons at from 2d. to 4d. per lb. and sold it for 1s. per lb. The farmers got £2,800 for the product, and their official protector cleared the nice little amount of £8,400. Beats your effete old country, eh?

The Cooks and Stewards Union has submitted a scale for an increase of wages by 10s. to £1 per month for the various classes. The owners have arrived at no decision as yet.

This par. is cut from the Boomerang, and shows the "white" kind of a paper it is:

"Winton Herald, in noting the proposed labour paper, says: 'The Boomerang is a thorough Radical working-man's newspaper, and it is out of the question to attempt any opposition in that quarter. Let the working men unite and obtain their just rights, but by all means leave journalistic work in the proper hands.' The Herald is a little out there. The Boomerang thinks the labour paper a necessity, and so far from looking upon it as a rival, welcomes it as a friend and helpmate."

The Sydney correspondent of the Melbourne Standard having stated that about 2,000 outcasts slept nightly in the public parks and open spaces of Sydney, the statement was much ridiculed by our local press and flatly contradicted by the Sydney Morning Herald, which declared that on a dry bright moonlight night its reporter, aided by "an intelligent policeman," had been able to discover only fourteen sleepers in the Domain, the favourite haunt of the homeless. Believing that the latter was even more ridiculous as an under-statement than was the former as an exaggeration, a Bulletin man looked up the shelterless last Sunday night. He started operations at 10.30 p.m. at the woolshed on Circular Quay. There he counted one hundred and three persons outstretched on the bales, none of whom owned blankets or any substitute for them, and he was told that before midnight at least fifty more would be added. Seeing some men stretched out in the sheds on hard pieces of timber, and enquiring their reasons for such voluntary martyrdom when a softer couch was available, he found that these were bushmen who believed the exhalations from the wool-yolk to be noxious. He next explored the neighbourhood of Fort Macquarie, and here espied nine more unfortunates stretched out in two and threes on the bare ground. He now made for the Domain, and here, on a dark, damp night, counted one by one with the utmost exactitude 224 poor devils and saw more men under one tree than the Herald had done in all its wide expanse. Against the Hospital wall, around the iron shell of the Dispensary and Museum, and under the trees adjoining, were 79 men, those under the trees lying like the spokes of a wheel with their heads towards the butts. Many snored loudly, a few were smoking, and chatting in whispers, about a fourth were rolled up in blankets; perhaps twice as many more were sparsely covered by old sacks, pieces of canvas, and newspapers; the remainder, as a rule, lay on the wet ground with their boots beneath their heads, and their feet enveloped in rags or handkerchiefs. The ground sloping down from the main walk towards Woolloomooloo Bay was then explored, and here were discovered on benches, beneath trees and ledges of rock, 65 slumberers, including three women. He then made for "the Chair." On a narrow point of land, which is surrounded by water on both sides, he was able to unearth, in many cases literally, 53 miserables, but the search was superficial, and more than probably an equal number was passed over, for the footing was so insecure and the night so dark that a broken limb was likely to be the lot of the unwary stranger. Here, too, the wind had more power, and it was difficult to strike a match and even more difficult to obtain a steady light from it when kindled. Turning citywards, he counted twenty-seven more in the vicinity of the main walk and the avenue leading to Macquarie Street. He wound up with Hyde Park, where, it being fairly well lit, he easily detected forty-seven persons, of whom five were women, in every case without covering, sitting or lying on the seats that line the various avenues. It was now nearly three o'clock, and, nothing loth, he turned homeward, having counted without exaggeration 383 open-air sleepers-out, without evoking an oath, indecent expression, or ill-tempered word from the many whom he disturbed, and believing that, on a more favourable night, extended inspection of the wharves with their timber-stacks and other shelter, the vessels alongside, including cargo-boats, ferry and pleasure-steamers, tramway waiting rooms, tram-cars, the Figtree Baths, the University Paddock, Flagstaff Hill, Church Hill Reserve, Pymont Quarries, Prince Alfred, Belmore, Cook, Centennial, and other parks would certainly double the number. Taking the relative populations into account, I think we in "beautiful Sydney" beat your "effete civilisation" once more! Yet I suppose emigration touters are still telling workmen at home to come out here. CORNSTALK.

"REAL LADY" SERVANTS.

"It is so often said that the plan of engaging ladies as domestic servants does not succeed, that it is satisfactory to hear at least of one case where the plan has been tried most satisfactorily by a lady who has a domestic establishment both in London and in the country. The eternal servant question cropping up in a recent conversation with this lady (writes a lady representative to the Pall Mall) I asked her how the plan of employing educated women of the upper classes as servants had answered. 'It has been entirely successful,' was the reply, 'and my servants are now always ladies. I have one a housemaid, a charming girl, who is the daughter of a medical man, and all of whose male relations are professional men, and who does her work as thoroughly and as well as any ordinary servant could be expected to do it.'"

If we are not "all Socialists now" at least we are all Democrats (plus a good deal of humbug, I'm afraid). It seems that there is some sort of movement going on for housewives to get "real ladies" for their servants. How charming and touching this is! Think of the romance of feeling that your soups were made by a sweet girl who murmured snatches of verse from Browning or Lewis Morris as she bent over her pots and pans, or that your boots had been made shining or brilliant for the day by a young person who brought all the powers of a higher intellect to bear on the lowly task! It is so delightful to feel that one's house is full of refinement above and below stairs. For mind you, in the case I have before me, the worthy housewife does not have her lady servants at meals with her, though "otherwise I treat them as equals, and I have not found that they abuse this treatment." The noble matron who says this seems to be of that terrible class of ladies admired among their friends as "excellent housekeepers," and though obviously the most well-meaning of her sex, and relaxing in the evening towards her servants to the extent of a game of whist with them "in my drawing-room after dinner," displays a denseness and want of sympathy which I always fancy the peculiar property of the British matron (though being a Briton myself I may be prejudiced). I am usually inclined to mistrust the well-meaning of housewives who get up and proclaim loudly that they are so good to their domestics (but usually say nothing as to wages!); the women who are really on friendly and sympathetic terms with those who serve them, and honestly feel the unpleasantness (to say the least) of the position of "mistress and maid," do not advertise the fact on the house-tops that these friendly relations exist; they are a matter-of-course and a part of their lives. THE COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. For Australia, New Zealand, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Transvaal, and the Argentine Republic, a year, 8s.; six months, 4s.; three months, 2s. PROF. HUXLEY AND HIS NATURAL RIGHTS.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY tells us he feels as if he had a mission. He sees the world going wrong, and people being "led astray by plausible doctrines" of Right, Freedom, and Equality, and he comes forth, accordingly, to set the matter finally at rest. As an authority in the field of natural science, Professor Huxley must needs have something to say which carries weight. But although an expert with regard to the working of natural forces, it follows not that he is equally at home in the field of sociology. Indeed, it must be admitted that his attempt at smashing Democracy is by no means a success. He says some truths with great force, muddles up others hopelessly in his inability to comprehend the drift of contemporary thought and sentiment (perhaps that is why he writes for the Nineteenth Century), and finally compromises the cause he intends to serve by his excessive candour.

On the whole, I cannot see why Socialists should be indignant at the Professor's contentions. Although he sometimes hits inconsistent men like Henry George rather hard, there is nothing in his mixture of truths and fallacies which could injure Socialism, and much that will be found to support it.

The Professor attacks the "natural right" theory of the Third Estate men, and advocates a restriction of such rights in the interest of society, whilst he defends in the same breath the abuse of acquired rights so far as to contend (by implication and in answer to Henry George) that because a landlord has an acquired right (inherited or gained by force of conquest) in say £1 worth of land, he may also retain the £99 worth of "improvements" which his lawful slave—otherwise called "tenant"—has added to the soil by years of unremitting labour.

So far as the declamations of the "Natural Right" and "Eternal Justice" men are concerned, no Socialist can feel hurt by the sight of their discomfiture at the hands of the militant professor. We modern Socialists never based our demands on such shadowy and sentimental notions. We say nothing of natural rights, because we know that society is not in a natural state, and that in consequence of the unequal distribution of wealth and public power the rights of the favoured classes are anything but natural. We know further, without the aid of any professor (thanks all the same!) that at present no two newborn babies are "equal." On the contrary, and just because we know they are unequal, not only as to their inherited physical and mental endowments, but also as to their surroundings and facilities of existence in a society in which all are at war with each other; just because we know that the use by a few of their cunningly and lawfully acquired rights and privileges is in effect far more injurious to the public welfare than the abuse of any natural right could possibly be,—it is just because we are so painfully aware of all this, that we demand the abolition of all such rights and privileges.

When Professor Huxley says "all moral and social law is a restraint of natural rights, and the standard by which it must be judged is not whether or not it is incompatible with these rights, but whether at that time, and under the given circumstances, looking at the question all round, it is for the welfare of society that its members should be subjected to such a restraint of their natural rights," he is only right in so far as he undermines Henry George's standpoint. But what we Socialists contend against, is not so much the abuse of natural as the exercise of acquired rights (i.e., powers) regardless of the common weal.

But whilst thus on the one hand Professor Huxley pleads on behalf of "Society" for the restraint of the natural rights (of the workers), he gives us on the other hand a very striking definition of "contract." He makes no fine words about the "freedom" of such contract, but says with a frankness which is truly refreshing, that "conquest itself may be regarded as a form of contract." As the price of peace, certain lands are paid over to the conqueror. Again, "Every declaration of war is an appeal to the arbitration of force, and contracting parties are bound to abide by the decision of the arbiter." Let us see: A man is knocked on the head, say, by a policeman's truncheon. He protests, and even defends himself. In doing so he "appeals to the arbitration of force, and contracting parties," etc., etc. (to make "contracting" out of counter-acting parties is good!). What is the remedy? Force, if you have it, says the Professor. If you have it not, you must—contract yourself out of it as best you can.

There! It is, unfortunately, as yet too little understood by Socialists, that "right" is indeed mainly a question of might and capacity, and that those who have no rights of any sort are those who are too weak to do what they might do—if they could.

Our man of science furnishes the moral of Bloody Sunday plainly enough: The Democrats (social or otherwise) had no right to use Trafalgar Square because they had no force to do so. Since they appealed nevertheless to force as an arbiter, they were bludgeoned, and had to abide by it as a contracting party. Had the people given evidence of their power to assemble in the Square in spite of any odds the Government might have put against them, nobody would have dreamt to dispute their right to do so. I, for one, say the Professor is right here.

The "right to fly" is of no use to those who boast no wings, and the "right to labour" which the French Revolution so triumphantly proclaimed was practically no right to those who could not avail themselves of it; it was no right to the great mass of industrial workers, who lacked the means by which alone production could be carried on profitably in the advent of division of labour and competitive machine-work for the world's market.

The right to employ their fellow-men as servants was not a natural one to the rising capitalists of that period. They had it not from their birth; it was merely a right acquired through the circumstance of their possessing what others needed for industrial production. It was, in fact, a power, the unscrupulous exercise of which forced their poorer brethren to bend under their yoke. Had the masses been strong and clear-sighted enough to resist concertedly the insinuation of the capitalists to attend to their machinery, it would never have grown into the "right" which to-day it undoubtedly is.

Harping away at his natural rights, Professor Huxley says, "Even tigresses, when they have their cubs, waive somewhat of their natural rights in the interest of the cubs; otherwise that rudimentary polity, the family of the tigers, could not exist. . . ."

Just so. Tigresses waive their natural rights in such cases, because of their instinct, which prompts them to be forbearing to the weak of their own blood. Modern capitalists would sooner waive their natural instincts, than the exercise of their acquired right to the labour of the poor.

Was it for the "welfare of society," that before the passing of the Factory Acts in England, men, women, and children of tender age (not cubs) were ruthlessly worked into cripples and to death by the owners of industrial plant? Those capitalists used their acquired rights (their economic powers) more savagely than beasts, because upon reflection, and they could be restrained in their devilish doings only by a force superior to their own, to wit, the State. But the evil is still rampant, and another and final superior-force arbitration is urgently needed!

"Even in nomadic society," exclaims the professor, "in which property did not exist, the clever man would have ideas, the commodity which in the long run buys all others, while the witless man will have none." Here is a blossom of professional logic! I should like to see "ideas" buying all other commodities (!) in a society where property does not exist!

"Thus proclaim human equality as loud as you may," he says, "witless will serve his brother!" This is not always true even in civilised society, where Cain may slay his brother by right of his "wit," if not by violence. In a Socialist community each will serve his brother not for the want of wit, but because his wit is full of love and understanding, and hence capable of valuing the immense benefit of social co-operation and mutual assistance.

The survival of the "fittest" in the struggle for existence has lost its gruesome charm in commercial society, where we find most inferior beings pampered up and artificially equipped with powers they are not naturally worthy of. The modern Trinity—Private Property, Acquired Rights, and Vested Interest—has in the long run placed Messrs. Witless and Mean in the position to boss their brethren (by deputy!) to the detriment of the human race. Thus, civilised competition differs from the merely animal struggle for existence, inasmuch as it results in the exaltation of the worthless and the perpetuation of qualities which are the least humane, and in the crushing out of all that is noblest in the human character.

This is why we endeavour to quicken the process of evolution by which the Society of Privilege will be destroyed, and the production and distribution of wealth will be organised on the fruitful principle of brotherly co-operation.

Professor Huxley knows, of course, that natural evolution does not always choose peaceful ways, and, like a man, he says so, much to the dismay of our respectable peace-at-any-price people. The arbitration of force plays as great a part in the evolution of human institutions as it plays in the world the Professor knows most about. His admiration of superior force reaches its climax in the proposition "that force used so as to render further opposition hopeless is an ownership which should be recognised as soon as possible."

That force is a remedy we have long recognised in spite of John Bright, whose children have probably all been born without the use of forceps; but it has been left to Professor Huxley to say that the crushing use of force is an ownership worthy of speedy recognition. That he is right, must be felt by all those who through the barbaric use of their economic powers have become the owners of wealth and the commanders of men.

If the working millions have no natural right to the fruits of their labour, there is only one title left them by which they can claim what is their own—the combined, irresistible force of their countless numbers. The prayer of Professor Huxley that the ownership of superior force may soon be recognised, is being realised. The consciousness of their associated power is dawning upon the brains of the toiling and slaving masses throughout the civilised world. The men-devouring monster of Capitalism is shaking in its frame, since even the hands of his imperial police-constables are being forced by the right of the approaching host of labour.

Be not afraid, and tremble not, ye lovers of peace and compromise, for it need not necessarily come to violence and bloodshed; but force it will be most assuredly. There will be "arbitration," yes! and the result will be a "contract" in which the ownership of the united workers will be established by the exercise of their force of will in such a way as to "render further opposition hopeless." Then, in the midst of a society whose organisation will allow free play to all the manifold capacities of human beings, we shall be able to talk again of "Natural Rights" and of "Equality"!

ANDREAS SCHEU.

A Conference of anti-Parliamentary Socialists will be held in the Hall of the Socialist League, 24, Great Queen Street, next Sunday, March 16th, at 7.30 p.m., to draw up a plan of propaganda and to consider the position of the 'Weal'. All comrades are invited to attend.

A French comrade, a plumber, gasfitter, and general handy man, an active propagandist, who has been recently expelled, is looking out for work here. If any can help him and will write to this office, we shall be glad to put them in communication with one another.

"The Social Monster," by comrade John Most, is a translation of a pamphlet already published in German. It is well got up and printed, and has a portrait of our comrade on the cover. In it he trenchantly reviews the existing system, explaining his attitude towards it, and the steps he would take for its abolition. "A dagger in one hand, a torch in the other, and all his pockets brimful with dynamite-bombs—that is the picture of the Anarchist, such as it has been drawn by his enemies." Those who think that an Anarchist is necessarily like this; or that the individualist survival of Manchesterism, which sometimes goes by the name of Anarchism, is the real article, should read this pamphlet. They will find that an Anarchist can be a reasonable being; that in his belief "Communism is the main point, and Anarchism merely the finishing touch"; and that to comrade Most "Anarchist" means "Free Communist," neither more nor less. He concludes with a powerful appeal to all Communists, Anarchists or no, to see that "Doctrine is not life," and to work with more harmony to their common end.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

A new Anarchist paper has been started at Bordeaux, under the title of Bordeaux-Misère. At Roubaix, a Communist-Anarchist paper, entitled Le bandit du Nord (the Brigand of the North) has just been issued. Address: comrade Edmond Vercruysse, 21, rue Fourcroy, Reims (France). Good luck to these combatants in the cause of the proletariat!

At Commeny, Le Socialiste has been compelled to stop its publication, owing to several prosecutions it had to face of late. But very soon a new organ, Le Réveil Social, has taken its place, and is now the official paper of the Montluçon agglomeration.

The three first numbers of the new Socialist review, L'Idée nouvelle (the New Idea), are now at hand, and we heartily wish our Parisian friends good luck and success. This social and literary review is published at Paris, on the 5th of each month, under the management of comrade L. Alexandre, 8, rue du Croissant. The chief contributors are: Jules Guesde, Ed. Vaillant, Thivrier, Franconie, Paul Lafargue, Aug. Chirac, Albert Goullé, Rodelet, Picourt, Bopartz, Dormoy, Eug. Fournière, Léon Cladel, Ed. Drumont, etc.

One of the veterans of the revolutionary Socialist party has just died at Montmartre (Paris). Joseph Piconel was born at Nancy, in the year 1816, and has been a hard worker all his life through. He was a designer on cloth by trade, and is said to have been a real artist in his line. He left Nancy for Paris at the beginning of 1840, and entered in the secret societies which at that time were flourishing all over France. Later on, he was amongst the founders of the French branch of the International Workingmen's Association, and did good service in the arduous work of organising several trades. At the same time, he also published many papers, all of which were doomed to an early death, he invariably being sentenced to heavy fines and various terms of imprisonment. Piconel's last paper was La Misère, which was suppressed at its first issue, and he got nine months' jail over it. He was liberated by the people on the 4th of September 1870, and on the 18th of March 1871, became a member of the Central Committee. After the last struggle was over, Piconel was arrested, and lingered for eighteen months on the pontoons. He was released at last, but utterly broken down through the sufferings he had undergone, his last years were of a melancholy painful description. No one in the French revolutionary press has had a word of remembrance for the disinterested, sincere, and valiant Piconel, who for sixty years was a faithful soldier of the cause of the proletariat; J. B. Clément, the editor of L'Emancipation, who, by the by, escaped the Poteau of Satory through Piconel's cool-headed heroism, is the only Socialist who remembered keenly the fallen combatant of the revolution.

GERMANY.

The German Social Democrats have achieved a brilliant victory: thirty-seven of their number have secured a seat in the Reichstag. Very well, but what are they now going to do with their victory? I fancy their conquest of parliamentary seats is already most embarrassing to them. As long as they were vanishing away amid all the other parties, they were excusable not to do much—I mean, anything at all; but now, when they are entitled, by virtue of their numbers, to bring in bills of their own, what sort of thing are they going to perform? I hope that ere long they will have proved conclusively the utter vanity of parliamentarism, and by so doing they will serve well, very well indeed, the cause of international revolutionary Socialism.

The circulation of Der Volks-Anwalt (the People's Advocate), a Socialist paper published at Cincinnati, has been prohibited throughout Germany.

During the last ten years, the German magistrates have distributed among the Socialists somewhat like one thousand years of imprisonment. Leipzig comes in for 184 years; Berlin, 90 years; Hamburg-Altona, 53 years; Spremberg, 50 years; Munich, 40 years; Landshut, 10 years; Ludwigs-haven, 3 years; and so on.

The trial of the three witnesses from Dusseldorf, arrested for perjury when giving evidence at the monster trial at Elberfeld (which ended so piteously for the Government), was concluded last Saturday, after two days' hearing. Krause and Rieckman were found guilty on two counts of the indictment, and Gemmer on one count only. The two former were sentenced to eighteen months' and the third prisoner to one year's hard labour. All three also were deprived of their civil rights for five years.

BELGIUM.

At Jumet, in the coal basin of Charleroi, a general miners' congress has been held, where fifty-four delegates of the coal basins of Charleroi, Borinage, Centre, and Liège were present. The proceedings have resulted in the formation of a General Belgian Miners' Union, and this will prove to be a considerable step forward in the general organisation of the workers throughout Belgium. An executive of eight members has been elected, with comrade Defnet, a member of the General Council of the Parti ouvrier, as general secretary, to transact the national and international business of the union. This executive will at once proceed to make the necessary preparations for the convening of an international congress of miners.

The next annual congress of the Belgian Parti ouvrier is to be held at Louvain on the 6th and 7th of April. The Belgian Social Democrats are at present very busily at work in order to get up demonstrations in favour of—universal suffrage!

Comrade Paul Coureur, the young Belgian revolutionary Socialist, who was one of the victims of the agent provocateur Leonard Pourbaix, and sentenced therefore to one year's imprisonment, has just been released from jail. A procession of over 2,000 workers, with bands and torchlights, from all parts of the coal basin of Mons, went to the prison gates and gave him a most enthusiastic reception. At the "People's House" at La Louvière Paul Coureur made an impressive speech, promising to continue his propaganda work as he had done hitherto, and urging the Socialists not to rest until they had achieved complete success and victory over their enemies, allied with a reactionary government and their despicable and scoundrelous agents.

V. D.

We hear that Napoleone Colajanni is standing for Parliament, being the democratic candidate for the district of Caltanissetta, Sicily, in the place of Guidici who is dead. Colajanni is well known as a distinguished writer on social science, and if he is returned for the Italian Chamber of Deputies, will be welcomed as an acquisition by those of the advanced party who have faith in the efficacy of Parliamentary reform; though we cannot but think he will be wasting his time.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

Great Dock Strike at Liverpool.

The dock strike at Liverpool has grown tremendously during the past week. The ranks of the strikers have been swollen every day by fresh accessions to their forces, till on Friday 50,000 men were out, and formed a huge procession, headed by banners on which were placed loaves of bread. A Liverpool paper states that this procession had the appearance of "a vast army." Neither tramcar, cart, nor cab could find an inch of ground as the great torrent rolled up the street." The number is now still larger, for the men employed at the docks of Birkenhead have also joined the strikers, and it seems likely that every vessel in the docks will soon be abandoned by its crew, the sailors objecting to blacklegs. The Dock Company has endeavoured to get blacklegs from every part of England, and thousands of men have been brought into the town to take the place of strikers. Many of these men have been deceived by printed placards stating that there was no strike, but have refused to act against the strikers when they found out the true state of the case. On Thursday, four or five hundred men who had been fraudulently enlisted as blacklegs, and had refused to stab their fellows in the back, called upon the mayor to see if he would pay their fares back, but his worship was "not at home." A gentleman who was trying to enlist blacklegs in London in the neighbourhood of Queen Victoria Street lost his watch, one of the loungers he endeavoured to pick up taking a fancy to that article; we suppose he was so fond of the agent that he wanted his watch as a memento. The docks are closed, and garrisoned by 500 extra police, and no one is allowed in without a ticket from the Employers' Labour Association, which has been started as an agency for the supply of blacklegs. The blacklegs are quite unable to manage their work. While clearing a ship at Alexander Docks, a number of the "new hands" did not let go the bales and packages in time, as experienced men would do, the consequence being they were dragged down the slide or went head over heels over the ship-side among the goods they were discharging. So strong was the force of police in one dock that they almost outnumbered the blacklegs. The authorities are in such a state of alarm that they have a regiment of lancers in readiness to slaughter the people in case of any attempt at insurrection. Inside one of the docks there are also some armed soldiers on duty. Meanwhile, work at the docks is practically at a standstill. Steamers are prevented from leaving the Mersey, and four Mediterranean shipping firms request consignees not to block the Liverpool railway termini with goods, and state that packages weighing over half a ton will not be received. The dock wharves are blocked with goods, and the company is in an awful mess. The only question now in dispute is that the masters want to employ non-union men. The masters are willing to pay 5s. per day for lumpers and porters, and 7s. for unloading grain, iron, manganese, etc.; 8s. per night for lumpers and porters, and 10s. for grain and manganese; a night to count from 6 o'clock at night to 4 in the morning, with one hour for supper; regular weekly hands, nine hours per day at 30s. per week,—and have generally adopted the union rules; but owing to the Employers' Association wanting to employ blacklegs, the strike is likely to last some time longer.

The Threatened Miners' Strike.

There is little change in the general situation. The Coalowners Federation have now suggested arbitration as a method of deciding whether present prices justify an advance in wages. They recommended that the result of the arbitration should if possible be made known by 1st of May, and should the arbitrators decide that an advance should date from March 16th. The representatives of the men, however, who have assumed a much stronger attitude during the past week, don't take to arbitration, and Mr. Pickard, M.P., has informed a representative of the press that he regards a strike as inevitable after this decision. How much truth there is in the statement of the coalowners that they cannot afford the 10 per cent. advance as they are selling their coal at much the same price as they were twelve months ago, is shown the letter of a coal-factor in the Daily News of Thursday March 6th. He states that, in case the public should believe the plea of the coalowners, he begs "to mention the simple downright unanswerable fact that many of us have been and are now paying from 40 to 80 per cent. more for nearly all the coal we buy than we paid twelve months ago. If you, sir, can reconcile this fact with the coalowners' statements, it's more than I can do." As the men have only got a 30 per cent. advance out of the owners, who have, on the statement of this gentleman, advanced their prices from 40 to 80, it certainly seems that the men's demand for another 10 per cent. is of a most moderate character. I do not think there is much question but that the owners will in the end give way. There is already, in consequence of the revival of trade, a great scarcity of coal. In some districts in Staffordshire and in Sheffield certain departments in the ironworks are idle through want of coal. There can be no doubt that a fortnight's strike would stop work in most of the factories in England. The miners' delegates have decided to hold another conference at Manchester on March 15th, to see if the owners will make any offer to avoid the strike. They have also agreed that the men in any colliery or district may accept the 10 per cent. if it is unconditionally offered. As the day of the strike approaches, there can be no question that many of the masters will turn blacklegs; they are not likely to lose their chance of increased profits during a period of brisk trade, especially as the price of coal will rise still more as the day of the strike approaches, and their Federation, which now looks so imposing, will quickly go to pieces. The capitalist is naturally a blackleg when there is anything to be got by it, and what has happened before will happen again.

Later.—Two associations of Lancashire mine-owners have resolved to fight the men, and it is expected that all the colliery owners will also decide upon a general resistance to the advance throughout the country. But despite this bold attitude the masters may yet give way if the men are resolute.

Lock-out of Brickmakers in Kent.

On Saturday March 1st trouble began by the bargemen on the Medway going out for an advance of 20 per cent. on their usual scale of charges for freights. The brickmasters around Sittingbourne, the centre of the English brickmaking trade, have refused to concede the demands of the bargemen, and have tied up their barges and also locked out their brickfield hands. Five thousand men were turned out to starve last Saturday in the neighbourhood of Sittingbourne, and they are naturally enraged at the cold-blooded cruelty of the masters, who are thus dooming thousands of men to starvation for a quarrel in which they are not concerned. They declare that this has been done to raise the price of bricks and break up the union, to which they nearly all belong. The barge and brick industries of Kent are now at a complete standstill, while work has also stopped at a large cement factory at Sittingbourne. The clergy and the rest of the respectable classes are very much alarmed at the number of men out of work who may soon become starving and desperate, and are doing their utmost to get the masters to re-open their works.

The Strike at the Wharves.

There is little change at Hay's Wharf, the men still holding out with the same determination. Tom Mann addressed a meeting on Saturday, and the men declared with enthusiasm that they were prepared to keep out till the next new tea season if necessary. At Brookes' Wharf the men are in the same position, none of the regular hands having gone in; and at Sharp's Wharf, although negotiations have been carried on, yet no satisfactory result has been arrived at.

The Tyneside Engineers.

It is expected next Saturday, March 15th, that 20,000 engineers will be on strike on the Tyne. The men want to cease work on Saturday at 12 instead of 1 o'clock, and demand 1s. a-week more wages. The masters will allow the men to leave off on Saturday if they will make up the hour during the week, and will grant the 1s. advance. The offer, on being submitted to the men, was declined, and unless the masters yield, a strike is certain.

The Irish Railwaymen.

The determination and courage of the railwaymen on the Great Northern has met with its reward, the directors granting all their demands last week. When will the English railwaymen show as much pluck and backbone?

CORRESPONDENCE.

SOCIALIST PROSECUTION.

COMRADES.—One of our comrades, Robert Bingham, has been committed for trial at the ensuing assizes, which begin this day, Saturday, March 15th, the alleged offence being that of using violent language at an open-air meeting in Sheffield on the 22nd day of December last. We are hoping to raise such a defence as shall secure his acquittal, but the expenses will be very heavy as all our witnesses will have to be taken to Leeds, a distance of 40 miles, and kept there from day to day for probably the greater part of a week. To meet this expense a committee has been formed, and they will be glad to receive any sums, large or small, which may be sent to them.

AGAINST RUSSIAN CRUELTY.

LAST Sunday, in spite of the blizzards that every now and then swept across the park, and in spite of the hasty and unorganised manner of convening the meeting, a large and enthusiastic crowd of London workmen came together in Hyde Park to record their indignation at the treatment meted out to political exiles in Siberia by the brutal agents of the Holy Tzar. The Socialists were of course well represented; among the League speakers were Kitz, Mowbray, Sparling, Tochatti, and Lynes; from the League platform John Burns, G. B. Shaw, Adolphe Smith, and Mr. Brighty (Patriotic Club) also spoke. Two resolutions were carried, and it was also decided to hold further meetings for the same object.

"Scotch Notes," "In the United States," and the continuation of "Revolution or Reform" are unavoidably held over.

NEW ZEALAND LABOUR.—There was a dispute in the tailoring trade at Christchurch when the last mail left. A firm which refused to work their factory under the "log" proposed by the Tailor's Union, was waited on by a deputation from the Trades and Labour Council, and on still refusing had their hands, about 50, called out, and a boycott placed on their goods. It was expected they would soon "cave." A branch of the Amalgamated Miner's Association of Australasia was formed on January 17 at the Thames. The meeting was most successful and enthusiastic; about 300 gave in their names and put down their entrance fees. The lumpers of Auckland have come out victorious in a dispute over the discharge of a barge there on which rats had been employed, the rats being sacked and the contract being given to members of the Wharf Labourer's Union.

WHY NOT DRIVE OUT THE DRONES?—The masses of England are struggling desperately for relief. The cruel competitive system ceaselessly ruins the health and exhausts the patience of the struggling worker, and the highest wisdom of the Tory Premier is that the wrecked and despairing victims should be got out of the way. Australians would welcome with open arms an agricultural population, with means to go on the land; but it is worse than madness to encourage the emigration of the helpless surplus labour of big towns. America is over-run with the off-scourings of Europe, and talks of prohibiting further labour of this kind. Where, then, would Lord Salisbury dump his pauper labour? If it were not pauper labour, but the bone and sinew of England he wanted to get rid of, such emigration would be England's loss and the gain of the country where the emigrant made his home; but any petty attempt of that kind to palliate social evils is out of place and out of date. If the Tories really want to sweeten British society, why don't they expatriate the men who live in idleness, the drones who neither toil nor spin, the worn-out roués whose only object in life is their own selfish and degrading pleasures! Of these, indeed, England would be well rid; but, unfortunately for Lord Salisbury, they are the class of the population that seem to be so happy and "at home" in England that nothing but a police warrant will induce them to leave.—Brisbane Boomerang.

"THE HUNDRED MEN OF HASWELL."

In 1844 a hundred men lost their lives in the coal-pits at Haswell. The verdict was, "Visitation of God!"

THE hundred men of Haswell,
They all died on the same day;
They all died in the same hour;
They all went the self-same way.

And when they all were buried,
Came a hundred women, lo,
A hundred women of Haswell,
It was a sight of woe!

With all their children came they,
With daughter and with son:
"Now, thou rich man of Haswell,
Give her wage to every one!"

By that rich man of Haswell
Not long were they denied:
A full week's wage he paid them
For every man who died.

And when that wage was given,
His chest fast locked up he:
The iron lock clicked sharply,
The women wept bitterly.

FRANK KITZ, Secretary.

NEW PREMISES FUND.

Collected at Council meeting, March 10th, 4s. 8d.

"COMMONWEAL" GUARANTEE FUND.

The following further sums have been received towards this fund:—C. Saunders, 2s.; J. Presburg (2 weeks), 1s.; H. R. (2 weeks), 2s.; D. Nicoll (2 weeks), 1s.; P. Webb (2 weeks), 2s.; Z., 6d.; B. W. (2 weeks), 1s.; J. B. G., 6d.; and James Thomson, 6d.

REPORTS.

'COMMONWEAL.'—The members of this branch attended the Russian Prisoner's demonstration on Sunday last at Hyde Park with their large banner, where an immense audience was addressed by Sparling, Kitz, Mowbray, and John Burns. The members of this branch sold 4 quires of Commonweal at this meeting. On Sunday night a splendid muster of comrades at hall for 'Weal' benefit concert. At business meeting on Thursday a large number of comrades turned up.—W.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—Good meeting at Latimer Road; speakers were R. J. Lynes, Crouch, and Maughan; fair sale of 'Weal'. On Sunday night, G. Bernard Shaw lectured on "The Evolution of Practical Socialism" to a very good audience, who seemed interested; a good discussion and many questions; fair sale of 'Weals' and 4s. 9d. collected.

ABERDEEN.—At meeting on 3rd, the Fabian tract, "Land and Capital," was read and discussed. We have again secured a hall for Sunday night meetings, which will commence on 23rd March with the first of a series of special lectures.

GLASGOW.—Midday meeting on Jail Square not held on Sunday, owing to place being occupied by other agitators, religious and political. In the evening, at Paisley Road Toll, Glasier spoke to an exceedingly good meeting—questions being asked at the close. There was no interruption.

LEEDS.—On Sunday morning a most enthusiastic meeting was held in Vicar's Croft, addressed by Scott, of Bradford, and Samuels; good sale of literature; 3s. 9d. collected. In the afternoon, another good meeting was held, same place and speakers; Commonweal and Freedom sold out. At the Socialist League at night, Scott lectured on "Socialism and Religion to a crowded room; good discussion; literature sold well. We are making new members rapidly.—H. S.

YARMOUTH.—On Sunday morning, Brightwell and Headley went to Bradwell, and addressed a very good meeting of farm labourers. Comrade Brightwell opened by reading a short account of the Paris Commune; good discussion, the meeting lasting over two hours; Commonweal sold well, and a number of old copies given away.—J. H.

DUBLIN.—At Progressist Club, 87 Marlboro' Street, March 8th, R. Pearson lectured on the "Currency Question," dealing with it from the orthodox political economy standpoint. Good discussion; Hamilton, Wilson, King, Martin, and others, spoke.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—On Sunday night, in the Hall, Woodland Place, T. Proctor lectured on "The Rise and Progress of Social Democracy in Germany." Capital lecture; brief discussion; W. Doleman presided.

LIVERPOOL SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—We held excellent meetings near the Landing-stage on Sunday morning and afternoon, addressed by comrades W. H. Chapman, sen., of Liverpool, and Horrocks and Evans of Salford. Numbers of dock strikers were present, and applauded frequently. 1½ quires of Commonweal and 1 quire of Justice sold, besides other literature.

MANCHESTER.—Further donation for club premises: D. F. R., £2.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

 we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

NOTES ON NEWS.

So the great battle has begun! Even the dock strike will pale into insignificance compared to that of the coal-miners, if only these latter will hold together, and show anything like the courage, self-sacrifice, and solidarity of the dockers. Their demand is a moderate one—5 per cent. advance now and 5 per cent. more in July. This a few mine-owners have granted, but the very large majority have absolutely refused; a good many have asked for arbitration, but for the most part there is a determination to fight the matter through and come to death-grips with organised labour. The fight began Wednesday last week in Nottingham, and it has been spreading over the country since as the notices expired, until there are over a quarter of a million workers out.

Coal experts, who are not colliery-owners, admit that the men are not only entitled, even as things go, to the rise, but that the owners can well afford to give it. However, the latter know that sooner or later they will be compelled to try a fall with the men if they would retain their power of exploitation, and as the present time is a good time they may as well force it on and have it over. A good time for them that is; and so, whatever be the misery or mischief they may inflict on the community, the mandate has been given and the fight begun.

As the Pall Mall's correspondent says:

"The coalowners feel that they must try their strength with the men, and that there cannot possibly be a better time than the present. The spring is coming on apace, and the demand for gas coals and house coals lessens every day. The Baltic does not open fully for six weeks. The demand for iron is not so brisk. Under these circumstances, the colliery-owners see that if they give way now, prices will immediately relapse. It must also be borne in mind that years have now elapsed since any serious strike took place, and that a new generation of young miners has arisen who do not know the privations and miseries which a strike entails, and these young miners are the energetic and bellicose and determined element. And the owners feel that if the fight does not come off now 20 per cent. may be demanded in September, and could not well be resisted then; whereas, if the fight is forced on now, and the men's funds are exhausted and their union weakened or broken up, they won't have the stomach for a further battle in the autumn."

However, the men say that in spite of the time of the year they can hold out, and it is quite certain that if they can do so and hang well together they must win. They have announced that they can go three weeks or more without strike pay, and if this be true, and their reserve funds be what they are said to be, there is no reason to fear the collapse of the strike for a couple of months to come. If it does break down before, or even then, it will be because they are not united. There are large districts which are standing aloof altogether, and there are other doubtful ones which may rat if the thing looks at all like going against them; so that the result is far from certain. Meanwhile, so long as the struggle does last, the miners should have the enthusiastic support of every workman in every trade, and should be helped and encouraged in every possible way.

One thing which they will have to face is, that in spite of Mr. Gladstone's expressed approval of the strike as a weapon, the governing classes as a whole are exasperated by the frequency and effect with which it has been used of late. As may be plainly seen in Liverpool just now, where an ostentatious display of military force is being made, they would only be too pleased to have a fairly good excuse for "quieting" discontent. A little blood-letting would cow the mob, they think; and they will go in for it, too, if they can only manage to work up a case for it, a case which would secure public opinion on their side, the "public opinion" they care about.

But if they do this, they could do nothing better for the progress of revolutionary ideas. To repeat Peterloo would be to bring out in a condensed and dramatic fashion the facts of the commercial system, to sear them into the popular soul as twenty years of our talking would not do. Even with "Bloody Sunday" and a hundred other examples of class-hatred before their eyes, English workmen do not realise what sorry slaves they are. They are so used, in towns, anyhow, to being bullied and beaten by the police, that a little extra tyranny has no effect if only it is manifested in the familiar form. Let the bullet and the sabre supplant the baton, the red coat replace the blue, and the rattle of the musketry will roll from one end of the land to the other and the swish of the sword be heard in every wind that blows.

It would mean despair—and the politics of despair! One can but marvel at the insensate folly which would provoke of set purpose the spirit which spoke in the Chartist motto, "If you Peterloo us, we will Moscow you!" or that of the men who made the "Man with a Match-box" a byword of terror. You are not likely to pay much heed to what Commonweal says, Messieurs our masters! If you were, enemies though you be, one might ask you to reflect on the one-sided battle you would be waging, if once the masses of the people were really driven to despair. You might recall, with advantage, the fact that the have-not has nothing but his miserable life to lose; that there is a good many of him, so many, you can't kill all, and the more you kill the more embittered will be those that remain; that if he can do nothing else, every insignificant unit in the mass can manage to destroy—there is none too feeble for that. And everything is yours, and thus he can destroy nothing without injuring you; and then you are not, like him, lost in the immensity of the mob, you are set on high for a mark, and can be readily hit at.

Just call a halt, O sapient rulers! and keep your soldiers from firing on us; go on fooling us and don't try forcing us; or, you will find that even we English workmen, degraded as we are, down-trodden as we are, willing and cowardly slaves as we are, have still the capability of the proverbial worm for turning, and when we do so can make things so warm for you that you will be "sorry you spoke." S.

It seems that Bismark really has resigned, and yet the world hangs together and has not been dispersed into space. Exultation at the disappearance from active life of this most prosaic of all tyrants, this tyrant of a commercial age, is checked by the doubt as to whether it is not merely a theatrical stroke; as to whether he may not, after all, govern safely and irresponsibly under the veil of resignation. On the other hand, if circumstances have driven him to resign, it is once more a clear enough token of the advance which Socialism is making. Let us hope that it is so. W. M.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. IX. (continued).—CONCERNING LOVE.

THE old man grew quite serious again. Said he: "I do remember about that strange piece of baseless folly, the result, like all other follies of the period, of the hideous class tyranny which then obtained. What do we think of it now? you would say. My friend, that is a question easy to answer. How could it possibly be but that maternity should be highly honoured amongst us? Surely it is a matter of course that the natural and necessary pains which the mother must go through, form a bond of union between man and woman, an extra stimulus to love and affection between them, and that this is universally recognised. For the rest, remember that all the artificial burdens of motherhood are now done away with. A mother has no longer any mere sordid anxieties for the future of her children. They may indeed turn out better or worse; they may disappoint her highest hopes; such anxieties as these are a part of the mingled pleasure and pain which goes to make up the life of mankind. But at least she is spared the fear (it was most commonly the certainty) that artificial disabilities would make her children something less than men and women: she knows that they will live and act according to the measure of their own faculties. In times past, it is clear that the 'Society' of the day helped its Judaic god, and the 'Man of Science' of the time, in visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children. How to reverse this process, how to take the sting out of heredity, has been one of the most constant cares of the thoughtful men amongst us. So that, you see, the ordinarily healthy woman (and almost all our women are both healthy and at least comely), respected as a child-bearer and rearer of children, desired as a woman, loved as a companion, unanxious for the future of her children, has far more instinct for maternity than the poor drudge and mother of drudges of past days could ever have had; or than her sister of the upper classes, brought up in affected ignorance of natural facts, reared in an atmosphere of mingled prudery and prurience."

"You speak warmly," I said, "but I can see you are right."

"Yes," he said, "and I will point out to you a token of all the benefits which we have gained by our freedom. What did you think of the looks of the people whom you have come across to-day?"

"Said I: "I could hardly have believed that there could be so many good-looking people in any civilised country."

He crowed a little, like the old bird he was. "What! are we still civilised?" said he. Well, as to our looks, the English and Jewish blood, which on the whole is predominant here, used not to produce much beauty. But I think we have improved it. I know a man who has a large collection of portraits printed from photographs of the nineteenth century, and going over those and comparing them with the everyday faces in these times, puts the improvement in our good looks beyond a doubt. Now, there are some people who think it not too fantastic to connect this increase of beauty directly with our freedom and good sense in the matters we have been speaking of: they believe that a child born from the natural and healthy love between a man and a woman, even if that be transient, is likely to turn out better in all ways, and especially in bodily beauty, than the birth of the respectable commercial marriage bed, or of the dull despair of the drudge of that system. They say, Pleasure begets pleasure. What do you think?"

"I am much of that mind," said I.

CHAP. X.—QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

"WELL," said the old man, shifting in his chair, "you must get on with your questions, Guest; I have been some time answering this first one."

Said I: "I want an extra word or two about your ideas of education; although I gathered from Dick that you let your children run wild and didn't teach them anything; and in short, that your education is like the 'snakes in Iceland'—non-existent."

"Then you gathered left-handed," quoth he. "But of course I understand your point of view about education, which is that of times past, when 'the struggle for life,' as men used to phrase it (i.e., the struggle for a slave's rations on one side, and for a bouncing share of the slaveholders' privilege on the other), pinched 'education' for most people into a niggardly dole of not very accurate information; something to be swallowed by the beginner in the art of living whether he liked it or not, and was hungry for it or not: and which had been chewed and digested over and over again by people who didn't care about it in order to serve it out to other people who didn't care about it."

I stopped the old man's rising wrath by a laugh, and said: "Well, you were not taught that way, at any rate, so you may let your anger run off you a little."

"True, true," said he, smiling. "I thank you for correcting my ill-temper: I always fancy myself as living in any period of which we may be speaking. But however, to put it in a cooler way: you expected to see children thrust into schools when they have reached an age conventionally supposed to be the due age, whatever their varying faculties and dispositions may be, and when there, with like disregard to be subjected to a certain conventional course of 'learning.' My friend, can't you see that such a proceeding means ignoring the fact of growth, bodily and mental? No one could come out of such a mill uninjured; and those only would avoid being crushed by it who would have the spirit of rebellion strong in them. Fortunately most children have had that at all times. Now you see what it all comes to. In the old times all this was the result of poverty. In the nineteenth century, society was so miserably poor, owing to the systematised robbery on which it was founded, that real education was impossible for anybody. The whole theory of their so-called education was that it was necessary to shove a little information into a child, even if it were by means of torture, and accompanied by twaddle which it was well known was of no use, or else he would lack information lifelong: the hurry of poverty forbade anything else. All that is past; we are no longer hurried, and the information lies ready to each one's hand when his own inclinations impel him to seek it. In this as in other matters we have become wealthy: we can afford to give ourselves time to grow."

"Yes," said I, "but suppose the child, youth, man, never wants the information, never grows in the direction you might hope him to do: suppose, for instance, he objects to learning arithmetic or mathematics; you can't force him when he is grown; can't you force him while he is growing, and oughtn't you to do so?"

"Well," said he, "were you forced to learn arithmetic and mathematics?"

"A little," said I.

"And how old are you now?"

"Say fifty-six," said I.

"And how much arithmetic and mathematics do you know now?" quoth the old man, smiling rather mockingly.

Said I: "None whatever, I am sorry to say."

Hammond laughed quietly, but made no other comment on my admission, and I dropped the subject of education, perceiving him to be hopeless on that side.

I thought a little, and said: "You were speaking just now of households: that sounded to me a little like the customs of past times; I should have thought you would have lived more in public."

"Phalangsteries, eh?" said he. "Well, we live as we like, and we like to live as a rule with certain house-mates that we have got used to. Remember, again, that poverty is extinct, and that the Fourierist phalangsteries and all their kind, as was but natural at the time, implied nothing but a refuge from mere destitution. Such a way of life as that, could only have been conceived of by people surrounded by the worst form of poverty. But you must understand therewith, that though separate households are the rule amongst us, and though they differ in their habits more or less, yet no door is shut to any good-tempered person who is content to live as the other house-mates do: only of course it would be unreasonable for one man to drop into a household and bid the folk of it to alter their habits to please him, since he can go elsewhere and live as he pleases. However, I need not say much about all this, as you are going up the river with Dick, and will find out for yourself by experience how these matters are managed."

After a pause, I said: "Your big towns, now; how about them? London, which—which I have read about as the modern Babylon of civilisation, seems to have disappeared."

"Well, well," said old Hammond, "perhaps after all it is more like ancient Babylon now than the 'modern Babylon' of the nineteenth century was. But let that pass. After all, there is a good deal of population in places between here and Hammersmith; nor have you seen the most populous part of the town yet."

"Tell me, then," said I, "how is it towards the east?"

Said he: "Time was when if you mounted a good horse and rode straight away from my door here at a round trot for an hour and a half, you would still be in the thick of London, and the greater part of that would be 'slums,' as they were called; that is to say, places of torture for innocent men and women; or worse, stews for rearing and breeding men and women in such degradation that that torture should seem to them mere ordinary and natural life."

"I know, I know," I said, rather impatiently. "That was what was; tell me something of what is. Is any of that left?"

"Not an inch," said he; "but some memory of it abides with us, and I am glad of it. Once a year, on May-day, we hold a solemn feast in those easterly communes of London to commemorate The Clearing of Misery, as it is called. On that day we have music and dancing, and merry games and happy feasting on the site of some of the worst of the old slums, the traditional memory of which we have kept. On that occasion the custom is for the prettiest girls to sing some of the old revolutionary songs, and those which were the groans of the discontent, once so hopeless, on the very spots where those terrible crimes of class-murder were committed day by day for so many years. To a man like me, who have studied the past so diligently, it is a curious and touching sight to see some beautiful girl, daintily clad, and crowned with flowers from the neighbouring meadows, standing amongst the happy people, on some mound where of old time stood the wretched apology for a house, a den in which men and women lived packed amongst the filth like pilchards in a cask; lived in such a way that they could only have endured it, as I said just now, by being degraded out of humanity—to hear the terrible words of threatening and lamentation coming from her sweet and beautiful lips, and she unconscious of their real meaning: to hear her, say, singing Hood's Song of the Shirt, and to think that all the time she does not understand what it is all about—a tragedy grown inconceivable to her and her listeners. Think of that, if you can, and of how glorious life is grown!"

"Indeed," said I, "it is difficult for me to think of it."

And I sat watching how his eyes glittered, and how the fresh life seemed to glow in his face, and I wondered how at his age he should think of the happiness of the world, or indeed anything but his coming dinner.

AN INTERNATIONAL APPEAL.

FOR eight months past the blanket-weavers and workers associated with them have been on strike at Cours (Rhône). Counting their families, more than 4,000 have been affected—practically the entire population of the place. Their wages had been lowered again and again, until they were face to face with starvation. Banding themselves together in a union, they resolved to resist further encroachment. But the millowners had enjoyed unquestioned supremacy so long that they refused to recognise the union, and gave notice of their intention to crush it. Seven have since acceded to the men's demand, but the others are determined to destroy the trade of the district rather than give in. For eight months the men have held out, in spite of privation, but they are now compelled to ask for help from their fellow-countrymen and from all sympathisers throughout the world. They feel that although everywhere the workers have their own troubles to attend to, there must be some able and willing to help them. As they suffer in the cause of labour, so they appeal to all friends of labour to aid them in the fight. In better times they will gratefully reciprocate the proofs of international solidarity. Address, au Secrétaire du Syndicat de Cours, Rhône, France.

An adjourned meeting and conference of anti-Parliamentary Socialists will take place on Sunday, March 23rd, at 7.30 p.m., to consider propaganda for ensuing year and other important business. All comrades are asked to attend.

SCOTTISH NOTES.

THE labour vote did not make much of a show at the recent (and first) County Council election in Scotland. Every one of the labour candidates was defeated—some of them very badly indeed. It is satisfactory, however, to note that those who were most advanced or Socialistic in their utterances fared rather better than the mere trades-union apostles. Small, of the Lanarkshire Miners, who is an avowed Socialist, ran his landlord opponent very close; and Keir Hardie, who has also the bad fame of being a Socialist (of the Parliamentary school), was well up in the list.

The crofter candidates in the Highlands were very successful, however. In Sutherlandshire the Duke's factors and agents were all defeated, and crofters returned.

The Free Church is being shaken to its base by the heretical utterances of two professors—Dr. Marcus Dods of Edinburgh and Dr. Bruce of Glasgow. As at least one-half of the ministers and laymen of the Church have little or no belief in the Bible or the "standards of the Church" (i.e., the Confession of Faith and the Shorter Catechism), the orthodox party will have some difficulty in bringing the culprit professors to a sense of the error of their ways.

I used to consider myself a pagan, but since I have read Dr. Dods' definition of Christian belief I consider myself a tolerably good Christian; indeed, quite up to the mark at least of standing at the church door on Sundays and watching that none of the members of the congregation takes shillings out of the offertory plate instead of putting halfpennies into it.

One has not, however, much sympathy with professors or any other folk who accept salaries to preach or teach doctrines which they do not believe. Of course the world's all wrong; and while workers have to slave and employers oppress, and while all sorts of men have in some degree or other to lie, cheat and injure their neighbours for a livelihood, we must not be uncharitable in our judgments upon professors or preachers, especially if in other matters they are "straight," and are endeavouring to the best of their powers to do away with the conditions that make hypocrisy and all other social crimes necessary. But Dr. Dods is not of this stamp. He wallows about in his hypocrisy as a swine wallows in its filth, and he is mightily indignant when some people venture to suggest that he is not perfectly pure and undefiled. Worse than that, he is a traducer of the poor, and a bearer of false witness against the unemployed. As a patron of the Charity Organisation Society, he has on several occasions publicly assailed the hapless victims of our industrial despotism as loafers and knaves, and warned the well-to-do plunderers of our cities and towns against yielding to the temptation of sheltering them from the winter's cold or allaying the pangs of their hunger.

Had the Professor confined his misdeeds to mildly extracting money from the churches under false pretences, he might have continued his time-honoured occupation without protest from me—the more the churches are swindled the merrier am I; but since he has set himself up as an apologist of the priggishness of the rich who rob the poor and kick them afterwards, I fervently trust he may lose his comfortable crib and have to do a month or two's penal servitude tramping the country in search of manual employment at fifteen bob a-week—the experience would modify his conceit a bit.

Professors as a rule are just about as much loafers as need be, and divinity professors are the most lazy and least amiable loafers of the lot; and a divinity professor who goes out of his way to denounce tramps and beggars is much in need of a sound lesson in good manners and Christian sociology lumped into one.

Sir William Arrol, the Forth Bridge contractor, whatever ability he may possess as a practical engineer and as an architect of his own fortune, does not appear to hold views one whit above the selfish mediocrity of his class upon the labour question. In a speech which he gave at Ayr, on being presented with the freedom of the burgh, he warned working-men against demanding high wages lest they make it impossible for employers to compete successfully for contracts. He affirmed that he himself had refused contracts amounting to over a million and a quarter pounds because of his uncertainty as to the probable rise in the wages of labour.

I do not say that this statement is untrue; but I do say that Sir William Arrol, despite his hypothetical loss of contracts to the value of a million and a quarter, has on hand about as much work as he can possibly undertake, and that during the last year he has increased his works at Bridgeton to the utmost extent of the available space.

Sir William complained that certain working-men could actually commence work on Thursday mornings and lift £5 and £6 on Saturdays. Presumably he referred to certain classes of riveters and steel-workers. It may be true that in some instances that may be done; but is it not grossly unfair to refer to such exceptional cases as typical of the privileged position of workmen generally? I venture to assert that Sir William has more men in his employment working for 15s. or less per week than for £5 or £6 per week, not to speak of £5 or £6 for two and a-half days. The great mass of his labourers receive 17s. per week, and his skilled workmen from 22s. to 30s. per week. His firm is notorious for its system of supplanting skilled with unskilled labour.

Sir William told his hearers that thirty years ago he had sought employment as a working blacksmith in the town of Ayr without success. We are informed, however, that he has now an estate at Ayr worth some £20,000 or more. Sir William's wages must have been a deal more than £5 or £6 per week in the interval to have enabled him to accumulate even that portion of his present fortune! How much of that sum he honestly wrought for, and how much of it was gained by filching the labour of others, might be approximately guessed by learning what he considers a fair wage for a working blacksmith to-day.

J. BRUCE GLASIER.

THE GREAT COAL STRIKE.

THE great coal strike is ominous of coming changes, and cannot be looked on as even a great strike might have been a few years ago. The demands of the miners are so moderate, and so uncomplicated with any difficulties as to method of employment and the like, and moreover, the business facts on which the strike is based are so clear and so much in favour of the men, that it was expected in many quarters that the masters would give in at once, and in ordinary times they would have done so. The fact that they are preparing for an obstinate resistance shows that they are not so much thinking of the present strike as of their general position in face of the awakening of Labour. The red spectre of Revolution looms threateningly in the distance before them, and instinctively they are prepared to fight.

Let us look at it from the same point of view, and understand that it is a battle, not a mere business dispute. If the miners got well together, and if they are supported by the sympathy of their brother workers, even those who will suffer by the strike, they will now for the first time understand their power, and a weapon for the hand of revolution will be fashioned, which will be irresistible; which can only be resisted by the brute-force in the hands of the upper classes—i.e., the army and police. This instrument, the striking-power of the coal miners backed by the assent of their fellow workers, being once ready, there will be nothing between us and revolution but a knowledge on the part of the workers of what to claim, which can be nothing short of an abolition of the monopoly of the resources of nature—i.e., the land and all that is on it, which is used for the reproduction of wealth.

This, and not a pitiful rise in wages, is what in the long run lies before the strike of the coal miners: let us hope that the events of this strike will show them how necessary it is for them to make this claim, how feasible to get what they demand.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

GERMANY.

When on the 24th of February the Boulangists met in the Salle Cognet at Paris, they decided to send a congratulatory address to Bebel on the result of the German elections. Before even the address was gone, Léo Frankel, formerly Minister of Public Works under the Commune, published Bebel's reply, which ran as follows:

"Dresden, Plauen, March 2nd, 1890.

"My dear Frankel,—I have not yet received the announced address of the Boulangists. Probably they have thought the matter over again. If, however, they took a fancy to their idea and would carry it out, I am quite prepared to ignore their factum, as I will have nothing at all to do with them.—Yours ever faithfully,

"A. BEBEL."

At Lückenwalde, near Berlin, the general association of female workers has been closed by the police, and besides, the whole committee, consisting of Marie Tinius, Johne, Weiss, Fallner, Anna Schultz, and Jölke, will be prosecuted for having made an energetic propaganda on behalf of the Socialist candidates to the Reichstag. The trial will begin on April 10th.

DENMARK.

The revolutionary Socialists of Denmark have just issued a manifesto to all kindred associations of Europe and America, setting forth the reasons why they have come to the constitution of a new revolutionary Socialist party in their country. They also tell us that it has been resolved to transform as soon as possible their weekly organ Arbejderen (The Worker) into a daily paper, and therefore ask the moral and material support of all their friends abroad, especially of all the Scandinavians.

ITALY.

Comrade Amilcare Cipriani has left Paris en route for Forlì, where he is going to face the new prosecution got up against him by the Italian government. He is to be tried for exciting to revolt, whatever that may be.

HOLLAND.

Comrade L. Schotting, who has been prosecuted by the Dutch government for having written a pamphlet on "Military Conscription," denouncing the various atrocities of that system, has now at last been acquitted by the superior tribunal of the Hague.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

A new monthly review is to be published at Reichenberg on April 1st, under the title of "Zeitschwingen" (Time Wings). Comrade Joseph Versneck is the editor of the new Socialist organ, whose offices are situated at Reichenberg, Ladegasse, No. 23.

NOTICE.—Next week there will be an article and an allegorical sketch dealing with Mr. Stanley's "heroic efforts in the cause of civilisation."

OFFICES: 24 GREAT QUEEN STREET, LONDON, W.C.

HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON

THE COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. For Australia, New Zealand, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Transvaal, and the Argentine Republic, a year, 8s.; six months, 4s.; three months, 2s. For India, Ceylon, China, Hong Kong, and the Straits Settlements, a year, 10s.; six months, 5s.; three months, 2s. 6d.

Subscribers who receive a RED WRAPPER are thereby reminded that their subscriptions have expired and must be renewed immediately if they wish to continue to receive COMMONWEAL.

SPECIAL RECRUIT SUBSCRIPTIONS.—To aid in spreading our principles, the following largely reduced terms are offered to those who obtain new subscribers: Two new yearly subscriptions for British Islands, etc., 10s. 6d.; for Australia, etc., 15s.; for India, etc., 19s. Five new subscriptions: For British Islands, etc., 25s.; for Australia, etc., 37s. 6d.; for India, etc., 47s. 6d. Specimen copies will be sent on receipt of postage.

Remittances from abroad must be made by International Money Order.

REFORM OR REVOLUTION.

ONE of the chief reasons for discord is the growth of poverty, discontent, misery, and crime, the existence of a numerous class unpossessed of property. These are, according to our rulers, supposed to have no interest in the State (which they really have not when the truth is told), for which reason, though allowed to exist in its territory, they are treated rather as slaves, and watched and guarded against with the most jealous apprehension; and there is no reason to wonder at this when we consider the distress and degradation on the one hand, with the affluence born of robbery on the other. Statesmen may as long as possible postpone what they are pleased to call the evil day, but come it will, however pertinaciously they may withstand its advent. At present they maintain the doctrine that property is superior to humanity, because it is property that rules empires, property that has rights, property that possesses a monopoly of knowledge and (sic) honour, with whatever else is valued by man. But a time is coming when the teaching of Proudhon, that "Property is robbery!" will be believed by all men, and then will cease this hideous nightmare of property which obtains to-day.

The ruling classes, who in the season of calm make no account of the coming tempest, would think the honours of office and power not worth possessing if compelled to govern solely for the benefit of the people. The patricians of Rome, inflated by rank and distinction, and elevated by education above all around them, treated with scorn the claims of the plebeians to exercise some influence over the management of their own affairs; and the rulers of modern Europe, their equals in pride, however inferior in merit, aim in every State at the same exclusive domination. In tranquil times they oppose reforms because, according to them, they are needless; in troubled times, because they are dangerous. Perhaps 'tis better so, for the great change will come, to my mind, all the quicker for their obstinacy and greed. "The gods," says the Pagan proverb, "help those who help themselves." It is high time the workers began to practice the philosophy contained in this maxim. At present they are aliens and strangers in the land, compelled to obey laws which others make for them. But their obedience is sullen and reluctant, because accompanied by the consciousness that it implies the sacrifice of their best interests. It is a fundamental fact that when some have too much others there must be who have too little, and though there may be a system of political economy which denies this truth, mankind will not always adopt that system or suffer themselves to be deluded by it. Our rulers cannot disprove the existence of a portentous amount of misery, ignorance, and crime simultaneously with the established order of things. Whence comes that misery, which cannot be removed by Annual Parliaments, the Ballot, or Universal Suffrage? Whence comes this misery which is eating itself into the very vitals of society? We Socialists say it is brought about by various causes, chief of which is the monopoly of the means of life by a few, whose opposition to our teachings is born of the plunderer's fear lest he lose what he has been at so much trouble to gain, his property, the words "Property is robbery" always striking terror into his heart, just as the policeman's lantern and whistle strikes terror into the heart of the burglar.

One good sign of the times is the desire for reform, which to my thinking will not have the effect the reformers desire, i.e., to stay the revolution; any reform given now will only aid us, and accelerate the change which is bound to come. The worker has been excluded from the communion of intelligence; labour has been ranked in the same category as vice and crime, hunted about and trampled upon, and in many instances denied the protection of the laws. This has made him feel like a slave in spite of the noble yearnings of his nature. To nations placed in such a category, revolution speaks as with a voice from heaven proffering them deliverance from thralldom, intellectual and economical, and they become imbued with the belief that for the regeneration of the human race all things become lawful. The existence of large masses of the people inimical to the State, whose numbers are perpetually augmenting, whose misery is incessantly on the increase, whose morals are for the most part deteriorating, whose minds are cankered, whose hearts are gradually estranged from virtue, contentment, or hope of happiness—the existence of such a mass, I say, is a fact which we must recognise whether it terrifies us or not. For several ages this supposed surplus of humanity was consumed by foreign wars. Kings got rid of their domestic foes on the field of battle, and history bestows on the sacrifice the name of "Glory." All kinds of dazzling fictions have been invented to reconcile mankind to this horrid game which is at variance with the principles of humanity.

Chroniclers, poets (with few exceptions), and servile flatterers of power, have sought and still seek to disguise the brutality of the process by which instinctively, or through the system, the governors of the earth endeavour to confine the population within their artificial limits of subsistence. But civilisation in its progress gives birth to arts, which by their development completely counteract the designs of ambition. Addicting themselves to the operations of peace and industry, the people increase and multiply faster than war can destroy them; hence the cardinal difficulties of governments. There are found in every modern state multitudes of people who have no assured future. The labour of the day provides for the day only, and any interruption in their toil brings them within measurable distance of starvation. This is the case in every great city and town, where there always exists a wandering population, living, as we say, from hand to mouth, performing the rudest operations of society—a race as it were between beggars and thieves, who labour when they can get work and who steal when they cannot. This class of persons is on the increase, and though denominated the dangerous classes they are probably the least dangerous (at present), but when insurrections are actually in progress they have in the past, and will again, throw themselves into the struggle against the oppressors. It is a fearful sight to behold millions of people possessing no provision for the morrow, people born to be mere hewers of wood and drawers of water, of whom it is expected they will never look up or presume to hope for a better life. People who possess minds which society condemns to stagnation; people who possess labour force which is not required by the present system, and is thus condemned and denominated dangerous. Thousands, rather than submit to this, make open war upon society which cast them forth to perish in the struggle. Others envelope themselves in sullen pride and retreat to the noisome dens still open to them, where they expire in silence or by their own hands. Others again there are who, rising to the occasion, and seeing the misery, of which they perhaps are co-heirs, go forth to raise hope in their downtrodden and degraded fellows by voice and pen, and these are dragged by the rulers to perish in dungeon, mine, or scaffold.

Let us take a review in our own minds of the dungeons, stripes, chains, etc., with which every society is abundantly stored, by which hundreds of victims are annually offered up to support a few in pride and madness, and millions in abject servitude and dependence. Whoever, therefore, whether in the name of a deity or not, labours to perpetuate ignorance, labours to perpetuate crime and misery.

The worst effect, perhaps, of our present system, is the divorce it produces between man and virtue. First, even while employed in what is called honest toil, it cuts him off from the source of knowledge and condemns the mind to inactivity. Hence the paralysis of the faculties, intellectual and moral, narrow and sordid views of nature and society, false theories of virtue and vice, proneness to coarse pleasures, and almost total perversion of ideas. Man in this state is as far removed as he can be from his proper state in nature. His nobler aspirations have been crushed out of him one after the other, and the intercourse of misery with misery, and vice with vice, is not calculated to generate virtue. Yet, despite all this, the light of the future breaks forth from alley and slum, which can only be quenched by a force which will have to be superior to any which has yet been tried. This class of which I have been speaking, begin at last to feel that they are exiles living in a state of social banishment, and are at length, like the servile classes of Rome, discovering each other by their rags—the badge of their order—the result of which will be the counting of their numbers and organisation for resistance or revenge.

C. W. MOWBRAY.

(To be concluded).

THE COMMUNE OF PARIS.

WHY do we celebrate the Commune? Is it because it was a success or a defeat? To us it is both. It was successful, because it has inspired thousands with those principles for which its martyrs bled and suffered. It was successful, because it was the birth of a new world, the first faint gleam of a dawn that will soon bring the brightness of day to the toiling millions for whom the men of Paris fought and died; because the memory of those dead heroes should encourage us in the work which has still to be done. It was a defeat, for the triumph of the people was short and brief; the memory of the joyous days of March is eclipsed by that of the Bloody Week of May; and our hearts still mourn for the dead that have perished, trampled beneath the feet of a base, cowardly, and bloody class, who cowered into cellars at the victory of the people, but who could rise in an ignoble triumph and insult the dead whom they feared when living.

Even now, the middle class continue their insults through the pens of their hired scribes in the venal and lying press. Through these means they still slander the memory of those they murdered; but the hatred of these people is the best homage to the dead. Had they been swindlers and murderers on a large scale, the rich would have worshipped them, as they do the great stockjobber who has plundered thousands, or the adventurer who has massacred hapless savages with breechloaders and explosive bullets in the interests of commercial civilisation. No; it is because the martyrs were men of whom this world was not worthy that the middle class shower abuse upon them. Students of history will remember that the ruling classes have done the same to all preachers of new ideas that threatened their privileges. The early Christians were monsters and cannibals, according to the priests of gods in ancient Rome. No accusation was too vile for the Protestant reformers in the mouths of pope and prelate; and to slay your foes and slander them after death is always the policy of reaction; a policy that up till now has ended in deserved failure. And even at the present time the truth is beginning to gleam through the mists and clouds of lies and prejudices with which our rulers have surrounded it. The people are learning to admire the men and women who died upon the barricades and before the firing platoons for the cause of humanity. What creed, what cause, can boast such glorious martyrs as can the Commune? Think upon the leaders who died with a calm courage that has never been excelled. Old Delescluze, whose life had been one long martyrdom for the cause of the people in the prisons of France and the swamps of New Caledonia, dragging his steps wearily to a deserted barricade, to stand upright for an instant, and then fall a willing victim to the shot of the enemy. He had vowed not to survive the failure of the revolution, and he kept his word. See, again, Milliere standing on the steps of the Pantheon before the levelled muskets of his murderers. In this his death hour he thinks little of himself. "Live the Commune!" "Live Humanity!" are the cries that greet the volley from the rifles of his foes. Think of Varlin, the young and enthusiastic lover of humanity, dragged along the streets in a long agonising march, his face slashed with sabres, a mass of blood, his eye hanging from its socket, but he does not moan or complain, but bears heroically his agony till welcome death at the hands of the brutal soldiers comes at last. But do not forget the people, men and women, shot down in crowds, 20,000 massacred, but dying, as their enemies admit, calmly and proudly, their hands clasped together, shouting, in defiance of the butchers of Versailles, "Live the Commune!" Triumph! we have cause for triumph. Though the defenders of law and order made the most beautiful city in Europe one vast slaughter-house, yet they could not crush Socialism; for to-day it is more powerful than ever in every civilised country. And the workers of all nations shall yet march hand in hand to victory to the cry of "Live the Commune!"

D. J. NICOLL.

IN THE UNITED STATES.

LAURENCE GRONLUND'S latest work is now about to go to press, under the title 'Our Destiny; or, the Influence of Nationalism on Morals and Religion.' In this book the author claims that "our economic individualism, with its passion for money-getting and trampling struggle for redundant affluence, must necessarily be accompanied by such low morals and weak religious beliefs as we now witness; while a nation trained under a social régime will be distinguished by the opposite qualities; for Socialism is eminently religious—i.e., will incline men more than any other system to postulate a purpose behind evolution, in order to answer the question, what are we in this world for?" He goes on to urge that Socialism will offer the true ideal of human progress—"an ennobling religion, not limited to caring for the individual soul, but identified with efforts to realise heaven on earth, with a great sweep of social action, in which individual lives will be caught up, as it were, to meet ideal passions from on high. Such an ideal we may hope will bring to the front men filled and fired with the enthusiasm of humanity, imbued with the true conception of progress, prophets of a grand and realisable aim, and inaugurating a generation of sustained and rightly guided effort which will revolutionise for good and for all time our entire social and moral surroundings." The author of 'Our Destiny' points to various signs in support of his contention that the time is ripe for such an effort. "First of all," he says, "it is notorious that a constructive form of Socialism has for some years been evolving among American organised working-men; next, and this may prove the most important phenomenon of all, the conscience of the country has during the present year clearly been aroused as it has not been since the anti-slavery agitation. I refer to the Christian Socialist and the Nationalist movements—so much so that we may in the near future—within the coming months—indeed, expect a peculiarly profound agitation of the public mind on these subjects. A blessed change has occurred; our religious people are at length becoming conscious of really being part of a living organism which suffers. A more blessed change is evidently coming, and it is not so much the change itself as the method of bringing it about that is in issue."

After this, I think, it will hardly be possible that even the most enthusiastic admirer of Mr. Gronlund will claim that he is a scientific exponent of Socialism. It is, however, a matter of extreme satisfaction for the adherents of Socialism—using the word in its broadest sense—that one of their number is on such excellent terms with the "power behind evolution." Yet on the other hand it cannot be denied that this mysterious and well-meaning "power behind evolution" might be a more "brainless" creature. In that case, things would unquestionably move smoother in this world. As the case stands now, this "power behind evolution" can give to itself a neat testimonium paupertatis, for it has accomplished as yet nothing, and in fact can never accomplish anything. If any "good" will be done, it must and can only be done through reason. Reason, of course, cannot compromise with silly—silly in our days—metaphysical speculation. I am afraid dear Gronlund will never solve the social problem, nor will he ever contribute much toward its solution. For to be able to do so he would have to fling overboard first all religious twaddle, which he never will do, because "neither can the leopard change its skin." As for the "peculiarly profound agitation of the public mind," true, Nationalism has gone up like a rocket, but it is not less true that the signs are not missing that it will come down like a stick.

P. M. Arthur, chief of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, has spoken some wise words. He was asked his opinion concerning the eight-hour movement, and replied: "If the working-men propose to make eight hours a day's labour, and ask for eight hours' pay in proportion to the standard wages, I think nothing could be better than to adopt the plan, because it would furnish work for 20 per cent. more men, as ten hours now constitutes a day's work; but if they demand ten hours' pay for eight hours' work, then the step would not be such a beneficial one." Of course, Arthur, who has long ceased to be a worker, does not like that the capitalists should pay ten hours' for eight hours' work. And yet the workers pay this thief a large sum of money to look after their interests. By the way, I wonder if Arthur is not meant for the "purpose of evolution."

Another dam is burst somewhere up in Arizona territory. Some seventy lives were lost in the flood. And yet ample evidence already shows that this disaster, like that at Johnstown, Pa., was due to the carelessness and meanness of the New York Corporation that built it. Wonder if the finger of that "power behind evolution" could not be traced in this "accident"—beg pardon, purpose of evolution.

A conference of the Union Labour party occurred in Kansas City some days ago. The following resolutions were adopted:

"We congratulate the Union Labour party upon the brave and gallant fight which it made in the presidential campaign of 1888—a campaign characterised by the most extravagant, corrupt, and shameless use of money by the managers of the Democratic and Republican parties ever witnessed in the history of the United States. Although there has been a change of administration, there has been no change of policy calculated to relieve the agricultural and industrial classes."

"Resolved, that we reaffirm and declare our allegiance to the Union Labour party and its organisation, and that we advise our candidates, canvassers, and press in the political contest of this year to concentrate their efforts upon the reforms advocated in our platform of 1888, relating to finance, transportation, land, and the suppression of trusts. All evils which now afflict and oppress the agricultural and industrial classes have their origin and remedy in one or other of these questions. As long as these conditions exist there is a necessity for the existence of the Union Labour party. The principles of the Union Labour party being substantially in harmony with the demands and purposes advocated by the alliance, the Wheel, the Knights of Labour, the Farmers' Mutual Benefit Association, the Patrons of Husbandry, we cordially invite members of such organisations to co-operate with us politically in the campaign of 1890."

As the Union Labour party had little money it is cheap glory to boast that it used none during the presidential election. But let this party really become a real power in politics, then money will come in its hands pretty freely, and then it will burst, like so many others belonging to the same category in the past. Politics—boodle; boodle—politics; politics and boodle—the purpose of evolution!

The eight-hour bubble has practically ceased to bubble, anyhow, as regards the United States. Gompers in his last speech claimed this movement to be scientific, but if we look at his arguments we find very little science but a good deal of bunkum. He promised the worker that the realisation of the eight hours would reduce the hours and increase the wages; the capitalists were told, in order to gain their support, that as the increase of the workers' wages would undoubtedly benefit trade and industry, profits, rent, and interest would in consequence also increase. But who would have to pay for this "treat all round"? Unquestionably the "power behind evolution."

Two meetings were held in the United States on February 22nd, Washington's birthday, for the purpose of agitating for the eight-hour day. The most successful of these meetings gathered in Tremont Temple in Boston; about 3,000 persons attended. Samuel Gompers as well as P. J. Maguire, Secretary of the Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, made speeches. As it is as yet doubtful which trade will open the firing on May the 1st, Maguire's words have some significance. He said:

"This meeting is not to present an argument in support of the eight-hour demand. It is to prepare the building trades for the effort they will make on May 1 to establish the eight-hour day. The question has got beyond the necessity of argument, for all men grant the necessity of shorter hours. . . . The eight-hour agitation of the past year has made a decided impression upon the entire civilised world, and Gladstone and Randolph Churchill have stated their determination to fight for the reduction of the hours of labour. The short-hour movement in Australia resulted in the Australian ballot, and gave to the people of that country a tax law which taxed unimproved lands for their full value, and did not tax the home of the worker."

The meeting in New York was a miserable failure. Only about 1,000 people, mostly Socialists, met in the large hall of Cooper Union, the same hall which was filled to overflowing on November 11th at the commemoration meeting in honour of the despised Chicago Anarchists.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIALISM.

SIR,—May I be permitted to refer in your columns to the important notice from the pen of Mr. Morris which appears under the head of "Correspondence" in your last number?

Even for argument's sake, granting that Socialistic principles, universally accepted—as they are not yet—would supersede, by including, all the social benefits alluded to hypothetically or otherwise as conferrable by Christianity,—how about the devilry that is in men, rooted and developed in selfishness, which is answerable hitherto for all the greatest evils of our social condition or system, and may just as much be expected to continue to defy the teachings of enlightened Socialism as it is found to resist and pervert those of religion? Nay, a deal more so, we who own the reign of the Nazarene believe. Here, indeed, is a supreme difficulty in the case, which, I respectfully venture to submit, the remarks of Mr. Morris do not seem to touch.

In other words, we are presented, it seems to me, with what as conceived by so excellent an authority, whether as designer or coadjutor of other mechanicians of genius, may be a piece of machinery most admirably adapted to social needs, yept Socialism, but without provision made for the motive power. That motive power has in spite of many drawbacks proved itself over and over again, we say, to exist in Christianity as it exists nowhere else. We have seen moral transformations effected by it in individuals and in communities, which I believe, even writing in your pages, it would be folly to pretend have any parallel in the results of any other philosophy or system, if not in extent, at least in depth and social value; and if the propaganda of Socialism are true, there is no reason in the genius of Christianity why that power should not be exerted to give them tenfold more effect than they are likely to attain by any other means. But why does not Christianity originate instead of merely assimilating? Did it not originate? Where are we to find in history more genuine or earlier, or, indeed, other examples of Socialism or Communism practically carried out than in primitive Christianity or its prototype Judaism? So that we may in fact say, if Socialism is salvation, that like the "salvation" of which Jesus of Nazarus spoke to the woman of Samaria, it also "is of the Jews." Acts, chap. iv.; Josephus, Wars, Book II., chap. viii., etc. A quotation from Josephus I may give: "Among all [the Essens] there is no appearance of poverty or excess of riches, but every one's possessions are intermingled with every other's possessions; and so there is as it were one patrimony among them."

An interesting modern instance, probably unique, except in a certain reflection of monasticism, for successive ages, one also strictly in point of our contention for the benevolent genius of Christianity even in the direction of Socialistic methods, is that of the promotion of Communistic living amongst men of working trades by M. de Renty, a French nobleman of the seventeenth century, to which I can only briefly refer in closing. Over a hundred years after, as I suppose from the account to which I am indebted, there were, as the fruit of his endeavours, "two companies in Paris, one of tailors, the other of shoemakers, and of these in several quarters of the city" (and the same there were at Toulouse), who lived in community; bringing the history to within a measurable distance of the French Revolution, which may not have been entirely unaffected by the fact. M. de Renty, be it remarked, was no political type of a social reformer, but a man drawing the inspiration of all he did from Christianity, as its disciple first and everything else a very long way afterwards, so for my present purpose making the case particularly apposite.—Yours respectfully,

N. W.

Manchester, March 10th, 1890.

SIBERIAN HORRORS.—An account from Tomsk describes (says the Berlin correspondent of the Daily News) the state of the Siberian prisons as something fearful, and gives the following figures, which speak for themselves. Tomsk, the seat of the only university in Siberia, is at the same time the central depot of exiles. It possesses a prison which can accommodate 765 men, reckoning for each one 4.8 cubic feet of air. There is space for 490 healthy persons and 275 sick ones, but the number of exiles who arrived in Tomsk in 1886 was 16,184, of whom only 14,866 were transported further. In 1887 there arrived 14,277; and in 1888, 15,014; and in 1889, up to September, over 12,000—of whom 13,522, 14,239, and 11,000 respectively were taken to the interior. In 1886 the average daily number of prisoners was at least 1,313; in 1887, 1,120; and in 1888, 1,380. In some weeks these numbers increased in 1886 to 2,955, in 1887 to 2,755, and in 1888 even to 3,020 men. Among these the daily average on the sick list was, in 1886, 394; in 1887, 512 (not less than 45.7 per cent.); and in 1888, 396, the majority suffering from typhoid fever. The official report says in a few words that for want of room hundreds of beds with patients suffering from serious maladies were placed in the open air, whilst the temperature was only six degrees Réaumur (45 Fahrenheit). The mortality was, of course, enormous. Between 360 and 400 exiles are buried yearly from the Tomsk prison.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

Great Strike of Miners.

On Thursday March 13th the delegates of the men gave another proof of their extraordinary moderation. They made a last offer to the coalowners that if they would agree to grant a 5 per cent. advance now and another 5 per cent. on 1st July, the present wages question would be settled. This moderate proposal of the delegates was sent to the Coalowners' Federation and they received a reply from the secretary of that body, that the owners had adjourned till Monday, and no reply to the proposal of the men could be given till then. At this shuffling reply the delegates resolved to begin the strike, and on Saturday the men came out. The strike, however, really began on Wednesday and Thursday, when the Nottingham men led the way, and they were joined by the West Yorkshire men on Thursday. In Lancashire 40,000 men are out; in Yorkshire, 60,000; in Derbyshire, 12,000. In Staffordshire, East Worcestershire, and Warwickshire the men have also struck. On the whole, it is estimated that nearly two hundred thousand men are out. The consequences are already serious. Coal has gone up to famine prices; the merest rubbish, composed of shale, stone, and slack, which a few months ago no one would have taken away, is being sold at 10s. to 20s. in East Lancashire. Ordinary coal has in some cases more than doubled in price at the pit mouths. At Sheffield, several large ironworks have already closed for lack of fuel, and at Burnley in Lancashire not only are the cotton factories closing, but the supply of coal is running short at the gas-works. The streets are crowded with men on strike, and an extra force of police has been drafted into the town. If the strike lasts a week, the iron and cotton factories will be closed. Thousands of people are thrown out of work already. The Coalowners' Federation met on Monday, and decided to refuse the compromise offered by the men; they offer to meet the delegates in conference on Thursday to see if they could come to some arrangement. As many owners are already giving in all over the country, I do not think the strike will be of long duration, whatever the Coalowners' Federation may do; the famine prices will be too much of a temptation to many coalowners.

The Dock Strike at Liverpool.

An amusing incident occurred last week. A blackleg collector went down to the neighbourhood of the wharves to see if he could pick up some blacklegs. He did not find any, but he was followed by a very unfriendly crowd to Cannon Street station. Here he took refuge, but the people still following he was turned out as a nuisance by the railway officials. In his despair he hailed a cab, but the cabman being informed by the crowd who he was, exclaimed, "What, a blackleg! Here, get out, I don't want any blacklegs in my cab!" And he had to get out, and was only rescued from his unpleasant position by the police. We don't know whether this is the gentleman who lost his watch. If so, he was doubly unfortunate, and might be recommended to give up recruiting blacklegs as a bad business.

The men fight on with firm determination. They have refused all arbitration, and have resolved to fight to the bitter end. One of their leaders, Mr. McHugh, warned the masters last week that the consequence of their continuing the struggle might be most serious, and that if the line of docks became a slaughterhouse the responsibility must rest upon them. The authorities became so alarmed at this speech, and the threatening attitude of the men—several of whom had penetrated into the docks and given some of the blacklegs a good thrashing with belying pins—that they sent for a regiment of soldiers, quartering them in Bootle, and giving orders at the same time that all the public-houses should be closed from 5 o'clock on Saturday afternoon to 12 o'clock on Sunday. In order to further embarrass the masters, the union has called out 2,000 men who were working for those who had accepted the terms of the men.

On Monday, the carmen turned out and joined the strikers. The attitude of the men is becoming very threatening. The avenues to the docks are being watched by large crowds of unionists, who go for the blacklegs. The blacklegs are getting frightened and are leaving the docks, though the police do their utmost to stop them. The magistrates are in a fearful funk, and are demanding more troops; precautions are also being taken to prevent incendiary fires in the docks. In the docker's procession on Monday the red flag was carried. The shipowners have resolved "to starve the men out," so there will be probably rough work before the strike is over.

Demonstration of Shop Assistants.

A big demonstration of shop assistants and trade unionists was held on Turnham Green on Sunday to help the shop assistants to reduce their shameful hours of labour, and also to denounce the persecution of comrade Turner, who is one of the union secretaries, for issuing a notice recommending the boycotting of those shopkeepers who made slaves of their employés. Cunningham Graham was the principal speaker at the demonstration, and he advised the shop assistants not to petition Parliament, which was useless, but to boycott the masters who refused to give them their moderate demands. Very good advice, which we hope not only the shop assistants but every workman will act upon.

Women's Work in Staffordshire Brickfields.

A correspondent has sent me a cutting from a Staffordshire paper, which gives some interesting details of the white slavery in Staffordshire brickfields. It appears that the brickmakers, male and female, have been on strike since the 2nd December for an increase of a penny to twopence a-day, so the writer in the paper got most of his information from watching the blacklegs at work. The best skilled women workers, the moulders, labour "from six in the morning to six at night for a top price of 2s. 6d. for a thousand bricks. It is piece work, and the thousand is really one thousand and fifty, the fifty being thrown in for 'spoils.' The bricks she is making weigh about seven pounds each, and as every one has to be handled three times, the amount of labour necessary to earn the half-crown can easily be calculated. Out of this lucrative payment, moreover, she has to pay a page—a courtly title given to another girl whose age may vary between sixteen and forty years. The function of this latter is to carry the moulded bricks to the kiln, and otherwise make herself generally useful. She gets 1s. 2d. for every 1,050 bricks made, which leaves our communicative lady friend with 1s. 4d. for herself! The weekly wage of these workers is 6s. 8d. for the moulder and 5s. 10d. for the page. The writer describes at another yard "the cruellest form of women labour even in Christian England." This is the carrying by women of large fire-bricks. He says: "The bricks are really slabs made in wooden moulding frames. They measure a foot or so across, and weigh sometimes as much as a hundred weight and a quarter. The women carry these on their backs to and from the kilns; and we are assured by local experts that the men are not strong enough to do the same work. It not unfrequently happens that a woman is forced on to her knees by the weight of the mass of clay; and the wages for trotting round the miry brickyard for 10 1/2 hours a-day in all weathers like beasts of burden as they are made, is from 6s. to 8s. a-week. If the strike succeeds, they will get an advance of another shilling a-week." I wonder if there is any savage country, to which missionaries and other pioneers of the gospel-like H. M. Stanley are so anxious to extend the benefits of civilisation, where the women are in a worse condition of slavery? It is quite certain that they cannot be in a worse condition morally, for brutalised and debased by this heavy toil, the women use language which the reporter declares to be "quite unprintable." In fact, their moral condition is only what might be expected. Emile Zola is the only man who could do it justice. We are glad to hear that there is some chance of these poor wretches winning the strike. Many of the employers have given in, and it is expected that the others will soon follow them.

REPORTS.

'COMMONWEAL.'—The members of this branch went to Mitcham on Sunday to help Kitz to start the meetings there. Kitz and Mowbray addressed a good audience on the Green; fair sale of Weals and Is collected.

NORTH LONDON.—On Sunday morning at Regent's Park, Barker (of Brighton), Nicoll, and Cantwell addressed a good audience; 55 Weals sold and 3s. 7d. collected. At Hyde Park in the afternoon Barker gave another address; Weals sold out; 20 pamphlets sold, and 1s. 9d. collected.—T. C.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—Good meeting held at Latimer Road; speakers were Grierson, Crouch, R. J. Lyne, and a comrade from the S.D.F.; fair sale of Commonweal; 3s. collected. In the afternoon our branch took part in the demonstration at Hammersmith for the Shop Assistants' Union, and marched from Kensal Green with band and banners. In the evening, A. Tarn lectured to a good audience on "The Abolition of the State;" many questions and warm debate; several Weals sold and 1s. 6d. collected.

ABERDEEN.—At weekly meeting on 10th the series of articles on the Hat Controversy which appeared in To-Day long ago were read and warmly discussed.—L.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday at 1 o'clock good meeting on Jail Square, when Joe and Tim Burgoyne and Glasier spoke. At 5 o'clock, Glasier and Tim Burgoyne addressed Paisley Road Toll meeting. At 7.30, Glasier lectured on "Professor Huxley and Natural Rights" in the Secular Hall; good discussion.

LEEDS.—On Saturday afternoon, in the Gower Street Schoolroom, a splendid meeting held of Jewish workmen; speakers—Paylor, Maguire, and Figenbaum of London. Room was packed to overflowing. There was great enthusiasm when any revolutionary sentiments were expressed. At the conclusion, three hearty cheers were given for the Jewish Workers' Society, the Workers' Friend, and the Social Revolution. On Sunday morning, at Vicar's Croft, a good meeting held; speakers were Paylor, Corkwell, Maguire, and Samuels, who dwelt on the prosecution of comrade Bingham of Sheffield. Very sympathetic and enthusiastic audience, who subscribed 13s. 3d. towards the Defence Fund. In the afternoon, same place, a splendid meeting was held for the clay-workers on strike; speakers were Braithwaite, Paylor, Sweeney, Cockayne, Maguire, and Samuels. At the Socialist League, in the evening, discussion opened by Corkwell on "Socialism"; brisk discussion, and literature sold well.

NORWICH.—Sunday last we began the open-air propaganda here, when three meetings were held to celebrate the anniversary of the Paris Commune, good audiences being present. Comrade J. Turner (London) delivered some stirring addresses on the Commune, and met with a very favourable reception. He was assisted during the day by comrades W. Moore, Swash, and Lenneying. Commonweal sold out; good collection. Turner gave a short address to the members in the Hall in the evening after the close of open-air meeting. A comrade from Berner Street was also present.

YARMOUTH.—On Sunday the Branch celebrated the nineteenth anniversary of the proclamation of the Commune of Paris. In the morning, on Priory Plain, Darley, Mrs. Schack, and Poyntz addressed a large and interested audience for over two hours. In the afternoon, the same speakers held another good meeting at Colman's Granary. In the evening, at Colman's Granary, a good impression was made by Mrs. Schack, Darley, and Poyntz. Mrs. Tochatti sang revolutionary songs at all these meetings, which were all concluded by the "Marseillaise." All the Commonweal sold out; 4s. collected; fair sale of literature.—J. H.

DUBLIN.—At Progressist Club, 87 Marlboro' Street, March 15th, J. O'Gorman lectured on "The Commune of Paris—What it Meant, and Why it Failed." Kavanagh, Fitzpatrick, and Russel also spoke.

SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—Gilray lectured in Moulders' Hall on "The Commune of Paris." A few questions were asked; good discussion; the Commune was ably defended by comrade Melliet.

LIVERPOOL.—Good meeting held on Landing-stage, addressed by Balfour, Reeves, J. C. Kenworthy, and W. Chapman. Commonweal sold out, and one quire of Justice sold. Next Sunday we unfurl our new flag at the Landing-stage.

SHEFFIELD.—Hallamshire Hall, West Bar.—On Sunday last, March 16th, J. Sketchley lectured in the morning to a fair audience on "The Crisis in the Labour Movement." Also in the evening, on "The Irish Question from a Rational Standpoint." Good discussion; literature sold well.

DUNDEE.—James Davie, 6 Overgate, is agent for the Commonweal in this town. LIVERPOOL SOCIALIST SOCIETY, 1 Stanley Street, Dale Street.—Meets every Tuesday at 8 p.m.

MANHOOD SUFFRAGE LEAGUE, "Three Doves," Berwick St., Oxford St., W.—Sunday March 23, at 8.30 p.m., W. Townshend, "Gold-Grabbing Sharks," or a Star man on the London fish supply. Business meeting at 7.30.

WEEKLY; ONE PENNY.

THE CHRISTIAN PIONEER.

In a few days there will land in England a man whom all the Christians of the counter in this Christian nation of shopkeepers will rush to welcome. Why? Because Stanley is a man after their own heart; he is the personification of that commercial Christianity which gives a lip-service to its crucified Christ, and daily crucifies humanity between the twin thieves of profit and interest. He represents the armed counterman, who, whilst ruthlessly pursuing his prospecting of fresh fields for Capitalism, covers his designs with the snuffing cant of the mission-hall. No wonder that Exeter Hall is on the tip-toe of joyful expectation, and will welcome its hero when he returns.

The "Great Industry" for manufacturing opinion is also greatly agitated. Fleet Street is in ecstasy; the pen and the sword of commerce will meet when Stanley comes home. Mrs. Gamp, on one side of the famous thoroughfare, has nearly choked herself with the handle of her umbrella at the unheard-of audacity of Burns, the Socialist, in squashing the project of the "Christian" Fleming when he proposed to get the London County Council to welcome Stanley. Her indignation renders her speechless; she "refrains from commenting upon the atrocious aspersions cast upon the motives of one of the bravest of our pioneers of civilisation."

And listen also to what her great contemporary on the same side of the way, with positively, yes positively, the "largest circulation" in the world, has to say. The Red Indian has given instructions to its "young man" to let his perfervid thoughts vent themselves in three-decker articles re the glorious mission of intrepid Stanley, his deeds outshining (if that be possible, he queries in awe) the achievements of another worker in the same sacred field of duty, "Christian Gordon." The same good authority assures us, further, that every heart in this great and glorious empire, upon which the sun even declines to set, will thrill with enthusiastic joy at the prospect of welcoming home to these shores the Modern Crusader. And then, after laying upon England, who is bound by her glorious traditions as a civilising power to accept it, the duty of carrying the blessings of her civilising influences into yearning Africa, until we shake hands across her equatorial forests with the colonists of the Cape, he hurls at us Hannibal, Charlemagne, Napoleon, Rome and Greece, in their palmiest days, mind, and lastly Christ, but modestly withholding his own name, retires into obscurity.

Across the road, where another branch of the "Great Industry" is carried on, the limner lends his aid to supplement the efforts of the scribe. And we see the presentment of a lion, real British you know, often used for similar purposes, and Britannia, clad in what appears to be a damp sheet, is standing in an inclement wind awaiting her Stanley; in her hand she holds a terrific wreath suggestive of Kensal Green cemetery, and this is also for Stanley.

The patriots of the stalls at music-halls and theatres are also on the war-path. We are treated to tin swords, red fire, and second-hand uniforms in honour of those who are ready, dead boys, to dare and die, or get it done by proxy. Scribe, limner, and bawler, all pressed into the service of doing honour to the homicide.

The scribe is most probably the same who anonymously satirises and vilifies the working-class and their aspirations for a fuller share of the pleasures of life.

The sketcher will, if a strike disturbs the classes, represent the workman with an ape-like countenance, with mouth of letter-box proportions, sottishly handling pot and pipe. The same will do, with slight alterations, for our Irish comrades when their turn comes to be abused. Such are the applauders of Stanley.

If the working class allow the loafers of society to misrepresent them in this matter of swashbuckling and butchering expeditions in the name of England and civilisation, and do not by emphatic protest make their position clear, they are equally guilty with the perpetrators of the ghastly outrages committed in order to extend the area of capitalistic exploitation.

That portion of the people which has accepted the theory that we are over-populated and must needs expand at the expense of somebody else, black or white, in order to feed our alleged-to-be-redundant population, are the class who will look upon the achievements of piratical expeditions with satisfaction. To them Stanley and his ilk are foragers for us, and hence we should be grateful to them.

Calvary and its Cross are merely side-wings to this picture of robbery of distant races in order that monopoly may be maintained at home.

With a soil capable of sustaining double and treble her present population, her fields deserted and her cities overcrowded, with thousands living from hand to mouth and hundreds dying yearly of partial and absolute starvation in her great cities and towns, England has the hideous hypocrisy to talk of civilising the African races. She had better engage in reforming herself before she presumes to inflict the rotten civilisation she is the champion of upon aboriginal races.

Workhouses, jails, penitentiaries, slums, and factories, and hospitals; homeless wanderers in the streets, dwellers in wretched hovels,—this is our civilisation to-day. And Socialists owe it to themselves and their cause to attack it here at home and prevent its propagation abroad.

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. X. (continued).—QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

"TELL me in detail," said I, "what lies east of Bloomsbury now?"

Said he: "There are but few houses between this and the outer part of the old city; but in the city we have a thickly-dwelling population. Our forefathers, in the first clearing of the slums, were not in a hurry to pull down the houses in what was called at the end of the nineteenth century the business quarter of the town, and what later got to be known as the Swindling Kens. You see, these houses, though they stood hideously thick on the ground, were roomy and fairly solid in building, and clean, because they were not used for living in, but as mere gambling booths; so the poor people from the cleared slums took them for lodgings and dwelt there, till the folk of those days had time to think of something better for them; so the buildings were pulled down so gradually that people got used to living thicker on the ground than in most places; therefore it remains the most populous part of London, or perhaps of all these islands. But it is very pleasant there, partly because of the splendour of the architecture, which goes further than what you will see elsewhere. However, this crowding, if it may be called so, does not go further than a street called Aldgate, a name which perhaps you may have heard of. Beyond that the houses are scattered wide about the meadows there, which are very beautiful, especially when you get on to the lovely river Lea (where old Isaak Walton used to fish, you know) about the places called Stratford and Old Ford, names which of course you will not have heard of, though the Romans were busy there once upon a time."

Not heard of them! thought I to myself. How strange! that I who had seen the very last remnant of the pleasantness of the meadows by the Lea destroyed, should have heard them spoken of with pleasantness come back to them in full measure.

Hammond went on: "When you get down to the Thames-side you come on the Docks, which are works of the nineteenth century, and are still in use, although not so thronged as they once were, since we discourage centralisation all we can, and we have long ago dropped the pretention to be the market of the world. About these Docks are a good few houses, which, however, are not inhabited by many people permanently; I mean, those who use them come and go a good deal, the place being too low and marshy for pleasant dwelling. Past the Docks eastward and landward it is all flat pasture, once marsh, except for a few gardens, and there are very few permanent dwellings there: scarcely anything but a few sheds, and cots for the men who come to look after the great herds of cattle pasturing there. But however, what with the beasts and the men, and the scattered red-tiled roofs and the big hayricks, it does not make a bad holiday to get a quiet pony and ride about there on a sunny afternoon of autumn, and look over the river and the craft passing up and down, and on to Shooters' Hill and the Kentish uplands, and then turn round to the wide green sea of the Essex marsh-land, with the great domed line of the sky, and the sun shining down in one flood of peaceful light over the long distance. There is a place called Canning's Town, and further out, Silvertown, where the pleasant meadows are at their pleasantest: doubtless they were once slums, and wretched enough."

The names grated on my ear, but I could not explain why to him. So I said: "And south of the river, what is it like?"

He said: "You would find it much the same as the land about Hammersmith. North, again, the land runs up high, and there is an agreeable and well-built town called Hampstead, which fitly ends London on that side. It looks down on the north-western end of the forest you passed through."

I smiled. "So much for what was once London," said I. "Now tell me about the other towns of the country."

He said: "As to the big murky places which were once, as we know, the centres of manufacture, they have, like the brick and mortar desert of London, disappeared; only, since they were centres of nothing but 'manufacture,' and served no purpose but that of the gambling market, they have left less signs of their existence than London. Of course, the great change in the use of mechanical force made this an easy matter, and some approach to their break-up as centres would probably have taken place, even if we had not changed our habits so much: but they being such as they are, no sacrifice would have seemed too great a price to pay for getting rid of the 'manufacturing districts,' as they used to be called. For the rest, whatever coal or mineral we need is brought to grass and sent whither it is needed with as little as possible of dirt, confusion, and the distressing of quiet people's lives. One is tempted to believe from what one has read of the condition of those districts in the nineteenth century, that those who had them under their power worried, befouled, and degraded men out of malice prepense: but it was not so; like the mis-education of which we were talking just now, it came of their dreadful poverty. They were obliged to put up with everything, and even pretend that they liked it; whereas we can deal with things reasonably, and refuse to be saddled with what we do not want."

I confess I was not sorry to cut short with a question his glorifications of the age he lived in. Said I: "How about the smaller towns? I suppose you have swept those away entirely?"

"No, no," said he, "it hasn't gone that way. On the contrary, there has been but little clearance, though much rebuilding, in the smaller towns. Their suburbs, indeed, when they had any, have melted away into the general country, and space and elbow-room has been got in their centres: but there are the towns still with their streets and squares and market-places; so that it is by means of these smaller towns that we of to-day can get some kind of idea of what the towns of the older world were like;—I mean to say, at their best."

"Take Oxford, for instance," said I.
"Yes," said he, "I suppose Oxford was beautiful even in the nineteenth century. At present it has the great interest of still preserving a great mass of pre-commercial building, and is a very beautiful place, yet there are many towns which have become scarcely less beautiful."

Said I: "In passing, may I ask if it is still a place of learning?"
"Still?" said he, smiling. "Well, it has reverted to some of its best traditions; so you may imagine how far it is from its nineteenth century position. It is real learning, knowledge cultivated for its own sake—the Art of Knowledge, in short—which is followed there, not the Commercial learning of the past. Though perhaps you do not know that in the nineteenth century Oxford and its less interesting sister Cambridge became definitely commercial. They (and especially Oxford) were the breeding places of a peculiar class of parasites, who called themselves cultivated people; they were indeed cynical enough, as the so-called educated classes of the day generally were; but they affected an exaggeration of cynicism in order that they might be thought knowing and worldly-wise. The rich middle classes (they had no relation with the working classes) treated them with the kind of contemptuous toleration with which a mediæval baron treated his jester; though it must be said that they were by no means so pleasant as the old jesters were, being, in fact, the bores of society. They were laughed at, despised—and paid. Which last was what they aimed at."

Dear me! thought I, how apt history is to reverse contemporary judgments. Surely only the worst of them were as bad as that. But I must admit that they were mostly prigs, and that they were commercial. I said aloud, though more to myself than to Hammond, "Well, how could they be better than the age that made them?"

"True," he said, "but their pretensions were higher."
"Were they?" said I, smiling.
"You drive me from corner to corner," said he, smiling in turn. "Let me say at least that they were a poor sequence to the aspirations of Oxford of 'the barbarous Middle Ages.'"

"Yes, that will do," said I.
"Also," said Hammond, "what I have been saying of them is true in the main. But ask on!"

CORRESPONDENCE.

INVENTORS UNDER SOCIALISM.

SIR,—In course of my studies of social matters, I have carefully considered the subject of the Manifesto of the Socialist League, published in pamphlet form, and am also a subscriber to your paper.

I can readily apprehend that certain employers of labour who appropriate large profits from the industry of their workpeople, may from a Socialist point of view be considered merely as monied gangers or foremen, and who, if interest on capital be not considered due to them, are entitled to no more than such salary as their skill as organisers of labour entitle them to. But superior to this class, there constantly arises men of original talent, who invent new things, or new ways, and whose claim on profit appear to me to be of a higher character than the preceding. For example: An individual of inventive faculty may do what has constantly been done before—namely, devise an improved cheaper process of producing an article which is useful to the people, and already in demand. He employs labour for the manufacture, and pays liberally the fullest wages of the trade, but the new process being economical, a large margin of profit is left over that selling price which has hitherto been readily paid, and not considered as oppressive.

This hypothetical case may be taken as representative of the position of men who possess mental, not money capital, such as the Arkwrights, the Wedgwoods and the Salts; and my difficulty is, How would Socialism deal with the matter?

Would the inventor be permitted to appropriate the increased profit, and so become a money capitalist, accumulate property, and become rich on the labour of his workpeople? Would he be only allowed to charge a rate of profit agreeable with his needs? Then on the one hand he might argue that since he was the creator of the idea, and his workpeople only mere manipulators, all the full profit was his due and therefore his need, for all need their due. On the other hand, did he reduce his profit, he would undersell his fellow manufacturers and become a monopolist. Or would he be expected to make his invention common property?—voluntarily, which is contrary to our experience of human nature, and I apprehend we must reckon with man's faculties and dispositions as we find them, not as we would have them to be. Or to make his invention known by compulsion? which would cause to be left to a sense of philanthropy alone the incentive to commercial improvement.

I am sorry this note is so long, but should be gratified if you would assist me by your opinion of the matter.—Yours truly,
JOHN W. LOVE,
52 Wellesley Road, Wanstead, March 18.

HARD TO PLEASE.—"Look here," said a subscriber as he walked into the office, "I want you to stop my paper." "What's the reason?" "There ain't enough news in it. Too much opinions, and that sort of thing." In about half an hour another subscriber made his appearance. "I've concluded to stop my paper," said he. "You have?" "Yes, sir. I'm tired of reading about strikes and meetings and such things. What I want is good, solid opinions." And the editor sat down and thought great ponderous opinions about people in general.

REFORM OR REVOLUTION.

AMONG the worst effects of the present system is the corruption and degradation of women, witnessing too often from the cradle nothing but misery, and being compelled, when old enough, to take their places in workshops to be fleeced, as their parents' before them have been. They are thrown, by various causes, upon a world ready to pervert to the vilest purposes their beauty and their innocence. Girls, who might be the ornament of society and shed gladness around, are prematurely condemned to be polluted by degrading intercourse. Everything with which they are familiarised tends to obliterate from their minds the distinction between right and wrong. Love, the noblest, purest, and most beautiful feeling of our nature, is converted by ignorance, coarseness, and vulgarity into a brutal appetite. Their association with the opposite sex becomes gross and fortuitous. They do not look forward with hope and joy to the period when they shall themselves become mothers, and dwell with inexpressible fondness on their own images in miniature, but, on the contrary, are haunted by feelings of dread and horror, by apprehensions of the hospital, the workhouse, or the dreary and desolate streets, where every wretch who is a disgrace to his species may insult and maltreat them. Even when the fate of women falls short of this fearful consummation, their lives among the labouring classes are full of sadness and humiliation. Clothed in wretched garments, often in rags, they dwell with their male companions in garrets, cellars, or in small stifling unwholesome rooms, filled with deleterious odours, and surrounded by similar dens where the physical and moral atmosphere appears to be equally impregnated with disease and death. Civilisation should blush while it beholds these results of its influence upon society, in which it multiplies ignorance, immorality, squalor, rags, filth, and a thousand indescribable abominations in order to enable a few favoured people to live in voluptuous indolence, surrounded by all kinds of animal indulgence, effeminate, selfish, and brutal, and taking credit to themselves for abstaining from vices and crimes which they have no temptation to commit, or, if they had, could not perhaps command the energy or the courage necessary to their perpetration.

The civilisation which produces and tolerates such consequences is base and spurious, and is therefore doomed to perish from its inherent rottenness, aided by the preaching of a new idea which is fast permeating the minds of the wealth-producers of all lands. Better retrace our footsteps, and return to the barbarism from which by so many efforts we originally emerged, than to pamper a system of so-called refinement, which destroys more than it preserves.

Half a million or more of people are annually being added in our own country to our already large population. Will a majority of these new-comers be persons of property, or will they not go to recruit the ranks of the disaffected workers? How is this superfluous population to be taken off? They are rendered superfluous owing to capitalistic production, which does not require their labour, except as a means of reducing the already low wage of the workers themselves. Again I ask, How is this mass of surplus labour to be got rid of? By emigration, by famine, by plague, by pestilence, or by war? clearly they must be maintained or blotted out. There is no middle course. They cannot be prevented from being born, though much pains has been taken to effect that purpose. But the passions and affections of the heart have not been eradicated from the breasts of the workers, and in due time their offspring will make their appearance in the world to the terror of rulers and classes.

Revolutions exhibit in their progress no phenomena more remarkable than the ebb and flow of public opinion, in conformity with the character of passing events. Noble deeds, self-sacrifice, moderation, forbearance, the heroism, in one word, displayed by either party, without reference to principles, is sure to enlist for awhile in its favour the sympathies of mankind. Often, however, these sympathies are blind, and do credit to our generosity at the expense of our judgment. When nations rise against their oppressors and seek to establish liberty, it is a pure and noble thing they aim at. But considering the state of mind and morals into which men are thrown by servitude, it is scarcely rational to expect that the agencies and influences brought to bear upon the citadel of oppression will be mere moral force. Emerging from a moral chaos, degraded by ignorance, stung to madness by their own poverty and the brutality of their masters, the people are yet always expected to display disinterestedness and moderation. This, doubtless, is a compliment to our nature; we have been trampled upon, and are expected not to remember it; we have been injured, and are expected to forgive; we have been oppressed, insulted, and enslaved, and are expected to refrain from all retaliation; we have been familiarised with vice, hunger, and ignorance, and are expected to display the enlightened magnanimity of philosophers.

But in economics as in religion. "As we sow, so also shall we reap." Every man who is robbed of the results of his labour has an interest in agitation, and if he be wise will do his best to promote it. This infinite moving mass which we call humanity, filled with passions and impregnated more or less with intelligence, is not condemned by nature to remain for ever in this debased condition. Its course towards liberty and equality lies over a track, the incidents of which vary every moment. It never retrogrades, it never halts, but marches forward unceasingly like the waves of the ocean. It rises now, and now it falls into the depth of valleys. It is beaten by storms, it is drenched by showers, it is warmed, invigorated, and enlightened by sunshine, but as the phenomena of physical nature are never exactly repeated—as the tempest of yesterday differs from the tempest of today—so the aspect of circumstances which envelope humanity in its progress is ever varying. Nothing, therefore, but scorn and contempt is inspired by those who twaddle about forms and precedents, and would bind the limbs of the future in the swaddling clothes of the past. There is no halting, we must on, on for ever, whether for good or for evil. Intelligence and freedom make progress in spite of all appearance to the contrary. A truth uttered will find its use some day; the operation is not always speedy. We agitators are needed to scatter the seeds of truth over the soil of humanity, and they will sink into the heart to remain there invisible for a time, till time has changed them into principles of action, and afterwards they will burst forth into virtues, true patriotism, magnanimity, courage, which, swelling in the breasts of millions, produce revolutions. There are apostles in all ages, and prophets and martyrs too. But when the apostles and martyrs die, the doctrines they delivered do not perish with them, any more than the rain-drops perish with the storms which scatter them over the globe.

We must not be frightened by the talk of the horrible butchery which takes place during revolutions; for, if we interrogate experience, we will find that the people are habitually more merciful than their masters. From the events of the past, sad, yet not so sad as they seem, shall we derive no instruction for our guidance hereafter? Shall we be like the petted child, which shrinks from the bitter potion, and thus condemns itself to double agony? Shall we, I say, reject the advantages already gained for mankind, and through pusillanimous terror return to that Circean sty of false opinions from which the world is just awakening? No one doubts that disturbances and civil broils are unpleasant. The question is whether they be greater evils than the oppressions and persecutions of humanity from which they sometimes deliver nations? Those are foolish, however, who look upon them as accidents. They owe their birth to the tempestuous passions of the hour, which, like them, trace their origin to causes far remote. The civil wars of 1640, and the transfer of the monarchy in 1688, were precluded by portentous debauchery among the nobles. From the Court of James I. women were almost entirely banished and their places supplied by striplings, who rose like the mistresses of other princes to the highest rank and distinction in the State. The recent scandals may perhaps not unfairly be mentioned, as there seems to be a strange Nemesis dogging the footsteps of idleness and pomp. In Rome, the transition from the republic to the empire was characterised by startling and fearful social phenomena; the aristocracy fell so low that they suffered themselves to be betrayed into the perpetration of every vice and every crime. Having exhausted the whole empire of natural pleasures, the Cæsars transgressed its eternal boundaries, and rioted in nefarious and beastly inhuman gratifications. Nero, Commodus, and Caligula set mankind the example of unlimited profligacy. Some strange fate seems at hand when Barnum visits the aristocratic quarter of this vast metropolis with the play of Nero, whilst our magistracy and judges are engaged in investigating the inhuman scandals of Cleveland Street. All the forces and causes of revolutions in the past are with us to-day. It behoves the teachers of the new life to work with lightning speed in the dissemination of the truth, and not to waste their time in parrot cries of reform. The day has gone by when reform might have been useful; the system is too rotten to stand by patching; the hideous structure of capitalism must be got rid of entirely.

Revolution is now inevitable. The great question we must all ask ourselves is, Shall the revolution be a success? The answer must remain for time to solve. But one thing is certain, that if we keep before the people's eyes the true principle upon which society of the future ought to be conducted, the word failure will find no room in our vocabulary of the future. That all comrades, active and inactive, may prepare as best they can for the coming storm, and that none shall be like the foolish virgins of scripture, is the earnest wish of, and the reason for penning these lines by C. W. MOWBRAY.

The prospects of the new Australian Labour paper appear to be very satisfactory. The Wharf Labourers' Union, the Operative Tailors, and the Associated Blacksmiths' Society have adopted the scheme with slight alterations. The Queensland Shearers' Union, have forwarded a cheque for £30, being the initiation fee for 3,000 members. The Charters Towers Miners' Association have forwarded a cheque for £8 as a donation, and promised to send along a list of subscribers and their year's subscription as early as possible. The Queensland Railway Employés' Association have passed a resolution heartily sympathising with the proposal, and promising to do all in their power to extend the circulation of the paper. Up to the time of writing (Feb. 10) a circulation of 12,000 has been ensured, and it is expected that this will be increased by the 1st March, when it is proposed to issue the first number.

LEGAL BLACKLEGS.—The blackleg has found a judicial champion in the person of that good old Tory, Mr. Justice Grantham. The member for Croydon had a case of intimidation in his assize list at Leeds, and said in his charge to the grand jury that he did not know the merits of the strike, but it seemed that there were a number of men—and he hoped it would always be so—who were not members of the trade union implicated, and who went in and did the work when the union ordered a strike. But is Judge Grantham quite sincere in his liking for the blackleg species? Suppose that the principle be applied to his own profession. He is a lawyer, a member of the strictest trade union in the world. What would he say to any individual who attempted to carry on the profession of law without acting in conformity with the regulations laid down by the combined legal world for his guidance? We fancy that even Mr. Justice Grantham would object to blacklegism there. And while he admits the right of combined lawyerdom to place restrictions upon any individual who comes into the profession, and to lay down rules which all must obey, why does he deny to working-men the same right of regulating the conditions of their industry?—P. THE COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. For Australia, New Zealand, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Transvaal, and the Argentine Republic, a year, 8s.; six months, 4s.; three months, 2s. For India, Ceylon, China, Hong Kong, and the Straits Settlements, a year, 10s.; six months, 5s.; three months, 2s. 6d.

Subscribers who receive a RED WRAPPER are thereby reminded that their subscriptions have expired and must be renewed immediately if they wish to continue to receive COMMONWEAL.

SPECIAL RECRUIT SUBSCRIPTIONS.—To aid in spreading our principles, the following largely reduced terms are offered to those who obtain new subscribers: Two new yearly subscriptions for British Islands, etc., 10s. 6d.; for Australia, etc., 15s.; for India, etc., 19s. Five new subscriptions: For British Islands, etc., 25s.; for Australia, etc., 37s. 6d.; for India, etc., 47s. 6d. Specimen copies will be sent on receipt of postage.

Remittances from abroad must be made by International Money Order.

NOTES.

IN commenting on the terrible tragedy at Crewe, which is indeed quite a typical example of the results of the conventional authority mis-named Society, the Star says, "Whatever these boys are, they were made by the man whom they murdered," and goes on to say that on these grounds apart from others the capital sentence should not be carried out. With both the conclusion and the reason for it we must most heartily agree. We would go further and say that if these lads are hanged, this second and judicial murder will quite throw the first homicide into the shade; further still we will go, and say that the fact that such a sentence should be given at all, amidst a sobbing court by a judge "deeply affected," is a good example of the horror of the tyranny of that false Society that enthalls us; especially when we know that the life or death of these two poor creatures now hangs on the mood of one not very wise man—the Home Secretary, to wit.

"Whatever these boys are, they were made by the man whom they murdered." Just so; and is not that sentence, little altered, true also of by far the greater part of all the "criminals" whom "Society" slays and tortures so coolly, passing by on the other side like the priest and the Levite in the gospel? It has been said over and over again in these columns, but let us say it again as the moral of the Crewe murders: "Society" first makes its enemies and then, dastard as it is, revenges itself upon them. W. M.

Verily, the advancing tide is with us! Even the Rock is beginning to feel the lapping of its waves. In a recent number that buttress of high and dry commercial religion was constrained to deal with Socialism. It goes without saying that the writer knows nothing of the subject. Nothing? Well, very little!—so little as to make his article amusing, where, if he had known a little more, it might have been offensive. He has "small faith in the so-called Christian Socialism, such as that advocated by the Rev. Stewart Headlam," which "protests too much and will never be believed in as being sincere." He is also clear about Socialism being "mostly atheistic." But even he can see that "riches cannot be thus [as they are] enormously accumulated where honest wages are paid for labour, nor can men so numerously starve where toil is adequately remunerated."

"Except amongst extreme Socialists, there is, as yet, no defined Socialist programme before us." Well, we of the Commonweal are "extreme Socialists," so our withers are unwrung; but we may point out to our clerical critic that this saying is a hard one upon the moderate Socialists of the S.D.F. or the philosophic ones of the Fabian, who have devoted much time and labour to "programmes." "It is not necessary," says he, "nor exactly possible at the present stage, to define what Socialism is, wherefore we need not detain ourselves by an attempt to do so." How competent he would be for the task if he had "detained" himself by it may be seen when he adds, "It is enough to say that with the majority of its advocates it is not Communism." To which one may retort that when he admits that men are Christians who reject the Creed, we will talk of Socialists who are not believers in Communism.

"We also judge that for the moment it [Socialism] aims more at equality in land-ownership than in personality [!], but it is much too logical to accept ultimately such limitation." And now the whites of his eyes roll heavenward: "There is, however, one very deplorable trait in its present attitude which we cannot overlook, and that is its violent character. In some quarters this is almost Nihilist [almost, only?—dear, dear!], in most it leads to strong language and to rough manners. The treatment which the courageous Bishop Barry has met with at the Lambeth Baths, if it has been accurately described in the papers, reflects no credit upon his opponents." It certainly was not an inspiring spectacle, the way in which the soup-and-blanket brigade tried to howl down the daring Socialists who ventured to criticise the Bishop, while the sympathisers with the latter retorted in kind. But it was not the Socialists who began.

And may one venture to suggest that a good deal of the impatience and "irritability" of a Socialist audience is mostly due to the blank and callous ignorance of the subject which the ordinary parson betrays? "The courageous Bishop Barry" deserved the adjective, for he set out to teach upon a subject of which he had learnt even less than this Rock writer. Socialists are "worse than Secularists," which goes to prove the point, for freethinker and parson have battled so long as to come to some sort of an understanding. Christian apologetics are part of a parson's trade: when he has put the study of social economics on anything like a similar footing he won't find Socialists such unreasonable people.

Let him remember also that Christians were very inconsiderate "irritable" people when they really believed in Christianity; they did not calmly sit by and see a man going to hell without trying to turn him back, even if they had to burn him alive in order to do so. We do not only see people going to a future hell, but in a present one, and we with them. An old proverb has it, "They that be in hell ween there is no other heaven," and it is difficult to make them see the way out. Christian or no, the man who would induce them to lie still, and, without looking for the Land of Behest, would deny its existence—this man is an enemy, and must be fought.

This Socialist movement which men "fear in high places and are afraid of in the streets," will have to be met in bolder fashion and with better weapons than our friend of the Rock or Bishop Barry has brought to bear. They are hopelessly behind the time. Four years ago (Commonweal No. 30, Aug. 7, 1886) we dealt with an article by a Roman Catholic divine who was far and away ahead of our Anglican critics. They should read his article (Dublin Review of then current month) and our reply. If at the same time they indulged in a general reading-up of the subject, it would be better. They could then return to the charge.

In the discussion by the County Council the other day of a propose new hospital for the study and cure of insanity, Dr. G. J. Cooper, the member for Bermondsey, said that beside hereditary predisposition there were three great and almost the only causes of insanity, and these were poverty, misery, and drink. May it not rather be said that the cause is one alone, and that one the system responsible for poverty, which produces misery, which drives men to drink? Dr. Cooper also said that more good would be done by dealing with the causes than with the effects. True, O Doctor! but the three you name are after all only secondary causes; and though it would be better to strike at them than merely to study their effects, it would be still better to strike at the "great first cause" of crime, wretchedness, and wrong from which they take their origin—monopoly of the means of life.

THE PARIS COMMUNE.

WEDNESDAY 19th, South Place Hall was crammed with an enthusiastic crowd. In spite of its being the second meeting for the same object in one week, and in spite also of the unfavourable weather with which it had to contend, the audience was fully as large as and much more enthusiastic than ever before. It could certainly be no larger than it was, in that place anyhow, for the holding capacity of the institute was tested to the utmost. More enthusiastic it could hardly be. Last year, when the S.D.F. and S.L. combined their meetings, we were all jubilant over our great success, and this year the two separate meetings have each of them equalled the combined one of last year, if even they did not each of them surpass it.

The South Place meeting was opened with "A Call to Arms," sung by the Hammersmith choir, after which comrade Mowbray briefly explained, for the benefit of any strangers present, what and who it was that we had met to commemorate. The speakers were, in the order named, comrades D. J. Nicoll, Wm. Morris, B. Feigenbaum, Eleanor Marx Aveling, H. H. Sparling, Peter Kropotkin, John Turner, E. Malatesta, and Edward Aveling. Cunningham Graham was to have spoken, but was detained at Liverpool; and comrade Tom Pearson (Freedom Group) though present, was too unwell to take part in the proceedings. Comrade Brocher sang La Carmagnole, the chorus of which was taken up by the audience. The choir also sang "Boldly Break the Chain," and the meeting concluded with the Marseillaise, which was sung all standing, and was followed by three vociferous cheers for the Social Revolution.

The resolution following was unanimously voted:

"That this meeting once more recalls the glorious memory of the soldiers of liberty who suffered and died in attempting to establish the claim of the people to be the masters of their own lives, and emphatically declares that we will never cease from the struggle which they so nobly sustained until Labour has been freed from the class domination, whose purpose it is to keep the workers in slavery and misery in order that their masters may live in idleness and luxury on the fruits of their Labour."

Throughout the evening the whole of the speaking was on a very high level; in a Socialist paper it would be out of place to apportion degrees of praise for oratorical excellence, but it may be said that not one speech could have been considered poor or dull by the most exacting critic. From the opening to the close there was not a dull moment, the speakers followed one another in orderly sequence, as though they had (as they had not) arranged beforehand the subjects and succession of their speeches. Whether dealing with the history of the Commune, the events which led up to or those that followed it, with the progress we have made or that to which we look forward, every word was animated by one spirit, that of hope and resolution.

The following greetings were received during the meeting:

Glasgow Socialist League send greetings; we commemorate the memory of the Commune with you. Elle aura sa revanche!

The Socialists of Leeds are with you in spirit for the Commune. Hope soon to be with you all in the midst of the International Social Revolution.

The Freedom Group of Norwich wish successful meeting and speedy emancipation of toilers.

Dublin comrades join with you in honouring the men who bravely fought and fell in the Cause of human freedom. Vive la Commune!

Sheffield Socialists send revolutionary greetings, and hope the memory of the Paris Commune will inspire all to greater efforts for the speedy success of the Social Revolution.

The Yarmouth comrades send you fraternal greetings. Hurrah for the International Revolution! Death to all tyranny! We hope you are having a most successful meeting, and that the time is not far distant when the workers of all countries united will strike the death-blow to class-society and capitalistic tyranny, and the proletariat be free for ever. Vive la Commune! Vive la Revolution Sociale!

A collection was taken and realised £6 3s. 0d., and literature was sold amounting to £1 7s. 7d. Altogether a most successful and inspiring meeting.

BLANKET-WEAVERS OF COURS.

COMRADES,—Will you kindly make known through the Commonweal that a subscription is on foot in aid of the French blanket-weavers at Cours (Rhône), about whose long strike a paragraph appeared in your last issue, and that I shall be glad to receive any sums towards the same, which will be acknowledged in the Commonweal.—Yours fraternally,

THE GREAT COAL STRIKE.

THE strike has soon come to an end, as most people in this district thought it would. There are one or two points in a colliers' strike worth noticing. First, that the masters' interest is somewhat divided. Those who have collieries only, or make them the chief part of their business, would be prepared to resist to the uttermost the men's demands. But some of the largest and most influential colliery owners look upon their pits as subservient to the great iron works, which they carry on in addition; these would be willing to resist so long as their stocks of coal enable them to keep the ironworks going. But they become much weaker as the heaps piled up in their yards begin to dwindle, and when it finally comes to a choice of damping down furnaces at great cost, and stopping a large and paying business, or of giving the miners an extra 10 per cent., they very soon decide upon the lesser evil of giving the men another 2d. per ton for winning the coal. There is still a third class of masters who own a pit or two on purpose to be able to get coal at all times for their own consumption—in paper mills and other factories; these last are usually not prepared to resist at all.

This division in the masters' camp, as will be easily seen, is of great service to the men. For when the masters see some of their number granting the rise, and making huge profits out of the famine prices which always obtain during a strike, while they themselves are losing heavily, they soon turn "green with envy," and become as anxious to stop their neighbours' ill-gotten profits as they were anxious to prevent their workmen from getting an extra 2d.!

Another important point is that blacklegs cannot be obtained from other trades. For the law ordains that a man must have worked two years in a pit before he can be allowed to work alone at the face getting coal. These points put the miner in a much better position in case of strikes than most other workers occupy.

On the other hand, it is more difficult for a coal-getter to maintain any advance he may secure by striking, because each man is paid on a separate basis. They get so much a ton for the coal they win in their own stall, but each stall has a separate price according to the conditions. In some places nearly twice as much coal may be won as in others, owing to thicker seam, better roof, and many other similar advantages. Now there is a constant system of reduction going on in the prices of these stalls; the price will be dropped 1d. per ton in this stall and ½d. in that, and then the advance reckoned on the reduced price. Thus, suppose in stall 28 the price is 2s. 1d. and a general rise of 25 per cent. has been obtained. In the office the wages will be reckoned thus, so many tons at 2s. 1d., 25 per cent. so much, total so much. If they notice that a large wage is earned in this stall each week, the price will be dropped to 2s. say, and the percentage of rise calculated on that basis, so that the drop would really be 1½d. Another means of reducing wages arises in the extras, of which there are many in miners' work, such as fixing and recovering props and lions to keep the roof up, clearing away falls of hind, etc. All these little points form endless causes of friction and discontent. Nor can it be truly said that the friction is all caused on one side.

As one might expect under the circumstances, many of the men lose no opportunity of saving themselves time and trouble at the employer's expense, wasting his props of timber, and in a hundred ways causing annoyance and friction.

Altogether, a pit is one of the most convincing proofs of the failure of the modern conditions of work. The men are scattered in twos and threes over an area of miles, divided by dark low passages, of which there may be as much as twenty miles in one pit. Oversight by foremen is evidently out of the question; hence piecework is adopted. But that leaves the master's property entirely at the mercy of each man, as well as the lives of all in the pit; so there have to be "deputies" and "underviewers" always tramping about to watch these points, keep the pony-drivers to their work, and so on. A deputy so disposed can do a deal of bullying of pony-drivers. He meets them one by one in the dark passages; often there is no one within earshot; and if he administers a sound beating—well, the lad must submit. There is no witness to be called to corroborate his statement; and if it is a case of a pit-boy's oath against a deputy's, it can be easily surmised which will be accepted by "the bench."

Altogether, it is rough work in a pit. The numbers are large, the men have been accustomed to rough usage for generations; they expect no other, and understand no other, some of them! The managers get hardened by the friction with their men, and the friction with the directors and shareholders demanding dividends. Verily they are between the upper and the nether millstone—the men are under both—while the shareholders sit atop to make weight!

R. U.

The German Emperor's dalliance with Socialism is significant. It is an attempt of despotism to strengthen itself by an alliance with discontent. It is a mistaken attempt, we think, and one founded in a total misapprehension of the nature of popular demands. The people are not beggars asking alms, they are men demanding rights.—New York World.

BENEFITS OF LAW-N-ORDER.—In 1795, while the English working classes were being told how much better off they were than the sansculottes of France, they, the law-abiding Englishmen, were paid by the week—Carpenters, 12s.; shoemakers, 10s.; bakers, 9s.; gardeners, 8s.; smiths, 8s.; husbandmen, 7s. Provision prices were: Mutton, the pound, 10½d.; lamb, 11d.; veal, 11½d.; beef, 12d.; bread, 12d. the quarter loaf; and small beer, 2d. the quart. Work out the reward of loyalty!

NORWAY.—I have for the first time had opportunity of looking over a series of numbers of Fedraheimen, an Anarchistic paper, written in the Norwegian peasant-dialect and printed in Bergen. It seems to be very lively and straightforward, and by no means so politically one-sided as most big Socialist papers are. The editor of Fedraheimen (Arne Dybfest) writes to Freedom, "The Socialist leaders of Kristiania are not State Socialists, but they believe that we have to pass through a Social Democratic society before we can get into the Anarchist community." Socialism is certainly spreading in Norway, though may be slowly. Would some of our Norwegian comrades please to answer this question: Have they, with the present social and economic statistics of Norway as a foundation, tried to work out and realise approximately what sort of social economic organisation, or compound of organisations, Norway would represent if made Socialistic, say, within the lapse of the next few decades? My reason for putting this question is that it must be a comparatively easy one to answer, seeing that Norway has only two millions of inhabitants, has lots of primitive stable institutions, and is not a place where economic change is difficult to forecast through its rapidity and originality.—Stn.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Miners' Victory.

The victory of the miners shows how much they can do in the war which will end in the emancipation of labour. Although the strike only lasted a few days, yet many factories were forced to close; and had it continued for a week, there can be no question that work would have nearly ceased in the great manufacturing counties of Yorkshire and Lancashire, and in a fortnight nearly the whole country would have been in the same position. The victory of the miners has proved that the body of trade-unionists, on whom depends the entire trade of the country, are so well organised that they can enforce what terms they please from their masters. We hope the miners understand this. They have in their hands the key to the whole labour problem, and when they desire it, they can carry not only an eight-hour day, but a social revolution, by simply ceasing to work. This would prevent all blacklegism effectually, for without coal all factories must close, and traitors to the cause of labour would find no employment. The politicians who have been so eager in urging upon the workers to improve their condition by their own action, would be very much surprised when they were taken at their word. We don't think, however, the surprise would be an agreeable one.

There has been another curious feature about the present strike. Middle-class public opinion has been on the side of the strikers. It always is when the workers hold a strong position, as did the dock-strikers and the miners. But when the strikers are weak, as in the gas-strike and at Silvertown, the middle-class press is either indifferent or else actively hostile. It is only when men are strong enough to paralyse the trade of London or the country that the middle-class press extends to them its sympathy. They are then too powerful to be offended. Small strikes can no longer be successful; as in war, victory is now on the side of the big battalions, and if the workers wish to succeed, they must appeal, not to the sympathy, but to the cowardice of their masters.

It is true the leaders of the strikers have shown themselves excessively moderate by compromising upon a compromise. The men are to take 5 per cent. now, and 5 per cent. on the first of August instead of 1st July. But then the leaders of the men are less advanced than the miners, and if Mr. Pickard and his friends could have had their way there would have been no strike at all. But the men have forced their hands; and according to the labour correspondent of the Echo, who seems on terms of intimate friendship with the old school of trade-unionists, fear of the wicked Socialists has also had something to do with it, for they dreaded what we should say of them if they showed too much "moderation." It is a good sign that the men are already more advanced than their leaders, and we hope they will become even more revolutionary as time rolls on.

The Dock Strike at Liverpool.

Although the docks are garrisoned by troops, and there is bitter starvation among the strikers and their families, yet they still hold out with stern determination. The capitalist press has naturally taken the side of the masters, and has continually favoured us with reports during the past week that the strike is collapsing; yet it has been forced to admit that the men are as defiant, and that the strike processions are as large, as ever. Cunninghame Graham has been down at Liverpool nearly all the week, and has done good work there.

The Liverpool Chamber of Commerce has endeavoured to negotiate between masters and men, but the masters have refused these well-meant offers. They are determined "to starve the men out," and want no negotiations. The Liverpool shipowners are much disgusted at the "violent language" of Cuninghame Graham and McHugh; but one of their number stated that he considered the language used by some employers of labour in Liverpool quite as "reprehensible." The distress is terrible, but strong sympathy is felt for the men by all workers in Liverpool; and though the shipowners think they are certain of victory, their inhuman attitude may yet even prove too much for the stomachs of the middle class, and general indignation may force them to surrender.

Our Walsall comrades have done good work in intercepting blacklegs, which other branches might copy. A correspondent writes: In the earlier part of the strike, Walsall was one of the places selected to send blacklegs from to take the places of the Liverpool dockers. But unfortunately for the dealers in human flesh and blood, two of our comrades—Guillemand and Carless—were despatched to stop the men leaving the town. They were successful in stopping a number from leaving the railway-station, and then proceeded to Liverpool, where by their untiring energy and stratagem they succeeded in getting a great number of men to leave the docks, and at the end of the week not half a dozen Walsall men were filling the places of the strikers. Let other branches follow this excellent example.

The Sheffield Strike Prosecution.

We are glad to say that comrade Bingham has been found "Not Guilty," despite the desperate efforts of Mr. Justice Grantham to get a conviction. The worthy judge in his charge to the jury pronounced an eloquent eulogium upon blacklegs, as will be seen in the paragraph quoted from the Pall Mall in this issue. Our friends will remember that this was the judge who sentenced Mowbray and Henderson at Norwich. There he also distinguished himself as counsel for the prosecution. Comrade Bingham must be congratulated upon his escape out of his clutches. Bingham was charged with inciting the strikers to kill "blacklegs." Grantham said, speaking of Bingham's speech, that this sort of thing must be put down, and told the jury that "he could not see that it was possible to place any other meaning on the language of the prisoner than that suggested by the prosecution," and yet the Leeds jury immediately found the prisoner "Not Guilty" and the public applauded the verdict. How wild Justice Grantham must have been!

The Engineers' Strike.

After 40,000 men have been out for over a week, the strike has come to an end. On Monday the masters conceded the demand of the men that the week's work should consist of fifty hours, and finish at noon on Saturday. Perhaps some of our State Socialist friends will admit now that it is possible for workmen to reduce their hours by their own action. N.

Hotel and Restaurant Employes.

On Sunday last a meeting was held of all those employed in hotels, restaurants, and clubs, at the Old Friends' Hall, St. Martin's Lane, to consider the best means of ameliorating their condition. The meeting was addressed by J. Williams, J. Wood, and comrade Hornagold. Some sensation was caused by a waiter who stated that he went to Buckhurst Hill from London to wait at a masonic dinner, and his master docked 6d. out of his pay for introducing him to a new neighbourhood. His pay was 5s. a-day, out of which he had to pay his fare to Buckhurst Hill and back; so that after he had paid his fare, he had the magnificent sum of 1s. 6d., out of which he had to provide himself with a dress coat, white shirt, and collar and cuffs. At the end of the meeting a large number of waiters handed in their names as members of the international section of waiters of the National Federation of all Trades and Industries. Meetings of waiters are held every Monday evening at 9, at the Globe Tavern, Bow Street. W. W.

IN THE UNITED STATES.

I MAY again state my position to the eight-hour movement. I am not an opponent of this movement, never have been. I shall never oppose a workers' movement, if it is honestly conducted and seriously meant, even if I should promise myself little from its realisation. But I try my very best to show demagogues and pretenders who, knowing full well all the circumstances, waste the time and what little brain power the workers possess in hunting after some unrealisable object. And considering the state of the labour-market in the States, the realisation of the eight-hour work-day is a matter of absolute impossibility.

The Russian treaty, with the objectionable clause (declaring an attempt on the life of a czar not a political offence) eliminated, will probably be accepted by our Senate.

There is a strip of land near the Oklahoma territory called the No-man's Land. No laws, no authority rules there, and yet the people over there—some 20,000 in number—live happy and contented and peaceable together. This state of affairs, of course, was eminently objectionable to our law-and order citizens. And pretty quick the Senate resolved that No Man's Land should come under the jurisdiction of the Oklahoma territory. Ground: That there are now a large number of persons living in No Man's Land without laws, without government protection, and without security for life, liberty, and property, and that these people should have a territorial jurisdiction extended over them. I am now daily expecting to read in the papers of some awful murder or of a nice tidy burglar job committed in No Man's Land.

The miners in Pennsylvania are in great distress. The winter has been so mild and people needed no coal.

The Siberian Petition Association of Philadelphia has sent to the Czar the following petition:

"To his Imperial Majesty the Czar of all the Russias.—We who petition your majesty are citizens of the United States of America. We belong to a people who have long been bound by the natural ties of sympathy and gratitude to the great Russian nation, and to the Czars, clothed with her majesty, who wield her power and shape her destiny. It is your majesty's province to do for Russia what we in a certain sense do for ourselves; and though the methods of governmental action are different, the ends and aims of the government are the same—the strength and true grandeur of the State and the welfare and happiness of the people. For these things nations are organised and laws are decreed and executed; for these things great princes, in the fear of God, exercise imperial sway, and presidents are appointed. Differ though they may in outward form, your government and our government are brothers in their noblest duties. Nor are our fraternal professions an empty feeling. We remember, and we can never forget, how the Czar, by his faith in the stability of the American Union, and the presence of Russian ships in the harbour of New York, strengthened our hearts and hands when our republic was supposed by less far-sighted sovereigns and statesmen to be on the verge of ruin. Our danger then arose from an evil which your illustrious father, Alexander II., by his example, helped our illustrious President, Abraham Lincoln, to remove; and the great prince who liberated the Russian serfs, and the great citizen who freed the American slaves, by kindred deeds of humanity and through a common martyrdom, have linked their countries together by ties as enduring, we may hope, as their immortal fame.

"Sharing, therefore, as the past has taught us to do, in the thoughts that concern the glory and happiness of your people, we have been moved to bring to you, with good greetings, this petition: That your majesty will personally take note of a widespread interest among us in the workings and effects of the Siberian exile system. We do not forget the penal reforms already accomplished in the Russian empire; we are not blind to the mental and physical sufferings that of necessity are a part of any system of punishment for crime against individuals, society, or the State; nor are we unmindful of the need of reforms which are actively engaging the attention of philanthropists in our own methods of dealing with convicts. In this we are but giving expression to the feeling of a friendly people, that in the punishment of some of her subjects Russia, whether from causes peculiar to her people, or on account of ancient custom, is not in all points in harmony with the humanising sentiments of the age. Whether we err in this, or whether we are right, our wish is that by the wisdom and power of the Czar and the favour of God, Russia may continue to grow in the admiration and sympathy of the American people and of the whole civilised world."

To add the final touch to this unique document there is but one sentence necessary—to address Alexander III. as the "power behind evolution."

George O. Jones, the chairman of the National Greenback Committee, has issued a call to national greenbackers, in the course of which he says:

"On March 3, 1884, the Supreme Court of the United States decided that Congress has the sovereign and constitutional power to emit bills of credit, provide currency for the whole people, and to make the notes of the Government (greenbacks) a legal tender. March 3, 1890, will be the sixth anniversary of that decision, at which time all national greenbackers are requested to meet in their respective localities and organise themselves into national greenback clubs, preparatory to Congressional, State, and national organisations next fall. Such gatherings will entail but little, if any, expense. It is hoped that all who indorse national greenback principles will unite in forming such clubs. The future welfare and happiness, or poverty and distress, of all American wealth-producers lies with themselves. Therefore, all are alike interested in the movement."

Think of ease, but work on.

The brain that sows not corn, plants thistles.

Coolies in Fiji earn 11d. for men and 7d. for women for a day of ten to twelve hours. "Yet it is said that some of them actually save money," says our friend the Boomerang, with an air of surprise. Well! the white slaves of London don't save money, but a lot of them have to live on much about the same wages.

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

REPORTS.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—We held a fair meeting at Latimer Road; speakers were Crouch and Maughan; fair sale of Weals. At our lecture in the evening, W. L. Phillips lectured to a good audience on "Labour and Socialism;" great many questions and good discussion; 1s. 8d. collected and several Weals sold.

STREATHAM.—At the Fountain, Kitz lectured to a good audience on "Revolutionary Tactics," and said that all the moderate men who once were revolutionists now denounced the tactics of the anti-Parliamentary party, but they would have no public foothold at all but for the educational efforts of the advanced party; 33 Commonweal sold; good sale of other literature.—R. S.

ABERDEEN.—At meeting on 17th, Cunninghame Graham's article "Has the Liberal Party a Future?" (Contemporary Review) was read and discussed. On 18th, under the auspices of the Stonecutter's Mutual Improvement Association, comrade Rennie led the affirmative side in a debate, "Ought the Land to be Nationalised?" the meeting deciding by an overwhelming majority in favour of the affirmation. The commencement of our Sunday meetings had to be postponed for a week owing to delay in completion of lecture list, which we are publishing along with a manifesto and call to the unconverted.—L.

GLASGOW.—On Monday evening 17th, we held a meeting to commemorate the Commune. The attendance was not so large as it ought to have been; nevertheless, we pledged the memory of the dead, and enthusiastically vowed our devotion to the cause of Revolutionary Socialism. On Sunday at midday, Joe and Tim Burgoyne spoke on Jail Square to an attentive meeting. At 5.30, Glasier spoke to an unusually large and appreciative meeting at Paisley Road Toll. In the afternoon, Glasier lectured on "Socialism, what it means" to the Govan branch of the Irish National League; the lecture was cordially received.

YARMOUTH.—On Sunday morning, on Priory Plain, comrade Darley addressed a good audience on the necessity for organisation. In the evening, on Colman's Granary Quay, Darley spoke again, on "Where the present Co-operative System Falls." Several questions asked, and answered to the satisfaction of the audience. 9 Commonweal sold, 9d. collected, and a bundle of old numbers of Freedom given away.—J. H.

WALSALL.—On Sunday last there was a good attendance of members and friends at the Socialist Club, to celebrate the nineteenth anniversary of the Commune. Comrades Guillemard, Deakin, Rowson, and Russell were the speakers, and the meeting was most enthusiastic throughout.—J. T. D.

DUBLIN.—At Progressist Club, 87 Marlboro' Street, March 22nd, T. Hamilton delivered an address on "Looking Backward," being an exhaustive review from the Collectivist standpoint of Bellamy's book. The views of the lecturer were supported by King, Martin, and Reilly, and opposed by O'Gorman and Fitzpatrick.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—On Sunday evening R. S. Pengelly lectured in our hall on "Drifting to Socialism," Peacock in the chair. In the discussion which followed, Charles (Sheffield) and Barclay (Leicester) took part. Next Sunday, at 3 p.m., meeting of members.

DUBLIN.—The Irish Socialist Union held a commemoration meeting in honour of the Commune of Paris on Wednesday March 19, at 87 Marlboro' Street. Addresses were delivered by King, Fitzpatrick, Kelly, Hamilton, O'Gorman, Broe, and others.

EDINBURGH—SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—On Tuesday 18th we celebrated the nineteenth anniversary of the Paris Commune by a social evening. There was a large gathering, including some French comrades who had taken an active part in that memorable event. Comrade Glasse proposed "The memory of the Commune," and comrade Melliet replied, both delivering eloquent addresses. Other toasts followed, and good speeches were made by comrades Bell, Gilray, Davidson, and Howie. The proceedings were otherwise enlivened by music and Socialist songs. Much enthusiasm prevailed.—On Sunday, comrade Tait lectured on "Capital and Labour." Questions and a good discussion followed.

The funeral of comrade Neuman, of the First Section Communistic Working Men's Society, will take place on Sunday March 30, at Manor Park Cemetery, the procession leaving the Communist Club at 12 o'clock.

CLUB AUTONOMIE, 6 Windmill Street, Tottenham Court Road, W.—Sunday March 30, at 8.30, Albert Tarn, "Abolition of the State."

P. Kropotkin will lecture in the Autonomie Hall, Windmill Street, on Thursday, 8 p.m.—subject, "Why we are Communists."

CHelsea S.D.F., Co-operative Lecture Hall, 312 Kings Road, Chelsea.—Sunday March 30, at 8 p.m., H. M. Hyndman, "Ancient Society and Modern Development."

NEW MANHOOD SUFFRAGE LEAGUE, "Three Doves," Berwick St., Soho, W.—Sunday March 30, at 8.30 p.m., Prof. Lenne, "The Economic Basis of Co-operation." Committee meeting at 7.30.

EDINBURGH—SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—In Moulders' Hall, High Street, on Sunday March 30, at 6.30, C. I. Burton, B.Sc., F.C.S., F.R.S.E., will lecture on "The Evolution of Socialism."

LIVERPOOL SOCIALIST SOCIETY, 1 Stanley Street, Dale Street.—Meets every Tuesday at 8 p.m. On Sunday March 30, Edward Carpenter, of Chesterfield, will lecture at 3 p.m. by the Landing Stage, and at 7.30 p.m. in Lord Nelson Concert Hall. Subjects—"The Breakdown of our Industrial System," and "The Present and Future Society."

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE great excitement of these last days, to wit, Mr. Balfour's Land Bill, will not excite Socialists, nor need they trouble their heads about the matter. On the face of it, it is a bill for raising the value of landlord's rents; but its real aim is to try to make the long-talked-out Irish question last a little longer as a piece of occupation for our "representatives" in the House of Commons, which may delude the people into thinking that the said representatives are doing something. It is hoped, in fact, that the nearly used-up football will still hold wind enough to bear a little more kicking.

All honest men, whether they call themselves Socialists or not, will applaud the jury at the Leeds Assizes who had the courage of their opinions, and refused to hand over our comrade Bingham to the tender mercies of Justice Grantham, who was quite prepared to show the world that it is a dangerous thing for even a well-to-do man to have any aspirations towards better conditions of life than the present; dangerous, that is to say, if he expresses those aspirations openly; and if he keeps them to himself—well, it is an old saying of the philosophers, that there is no difference between that which is not, and that which is not visible.

It may be too much to hope that this verdict is the token of the beginning of a new epoch in jury-work, in which juries will give verdicts according to their consciences (and according to their oaths, too, if that matters) in spite of the judge's summing-up. But it is a significant fact that the verdict in this case was loudly applauded in Court by the general public.

It seems unlikely that the Crewe lads will be executed. But if they are not to be hanged, which, as Wilkes said, is the worst use to which you can put a man, why should they be treated to the second worst way of using a man, to wit, putting him in prison? To give a long term of imprisonment to these unfortunate young men would be a mere cruel piece of subservience to the letter of the law. Our friend, Mr. Grant Allen, acting on this view, has been circulating a petition to the Home Secretary asking for a free pardon or at least a short term of imprisonment. Surely all those people, from the judge upwards, who were so "touched" in Court the other day, will agree to this.

The Labour Conference at Berlin is over, and when all is said there is little wonder that the English press should be most patriotically proud of the fact that what has been done is little more than to generally recommend an imitation of England in the way of industrial legislation. Though they might very well remember that "he knew well that coals would burn that first invented fire-tongs," or, in other words, factory legislation came first in England because the factory-hell grew hot here sooner than elsewhere. And now, when the boasting is done about being ahead, they might begin to think of keeping so.

This from the Sydney Bulletin of February 22, looks as if religious philanthropists were the same everywhere:

"An ex-parson, some ex-black labour sympathisers, and the paid secretary of an employers' union, run what is left of the Brisbane 'London Dock Strike Fund.' Between them they have managed to keep £400 from going where it belongs, and, after every tuppenny-ha'penny local accident they try to bluff the crowd into giving the dockers' coin to some hospital ward or flooded-out village. These Bananaland pull-backs have been kicking themselves since the big strike at having let the milk of human kindness ooze out of a pore or two that wasn't quite choked with filthy lucre. Probably it is to prevent any more oozing that they are now wallowing in a class-meanness. The money belongs to the London dockers and should go to them."

George Harrison was released on Friday, after serving two years, three months, and a fortnight of the four years' imprisonment to which he was sentenced after Bloody Sunday. He has come out with an arm crippled by a policeman's kick, and a constitution nearly destroyed through the ill-treatment to which he has been subjected. Here is the story in his own words:

"It seemed a long and weary time since that day in November, '87, when the police fell on us we came over Westminster Bridge—I walking along in procession with the Progressives and the Blackfriars Club men. Somebody dropped a gas-pipe, and one of the police swore it was I hit him with it; and another fellow, when they got on to him with the staves, took his pocket-knife out on 'em, and stabbed somebody—he came and confessed it to me, and fully exonerated me to the committee of my club, when I was out on bail before my conviction, but it was no use getting two into trouble, and I knew the police meant having me anyway, innocent or not; they had been watching for a chance all day. So I said nothing about him—they would only have put us both in. Why, a policeman brought up an oyster-knife, and swore he saw me drop it. You see, the police knew me as a speaker and lecturer, and they'd warned me about holding meetings, so they were down on me, and besides, I was a witness against them in Blackwell's case."

He was first taken to Pentonville for a fortnight, then to Wormwood Scrubbs for nine months, after which he went to Chatham, where he remained until Friday. He says:

"I was very well treated at the first two places, but at Chatham it was different. I was treated very roughly there. Four times I was punished by solitary confinement in a horrible cell, and on every one of those occasions the punishment was unjustly given. They charged me with refusing to work when I was not able to work through my ill-health, and they charged me with talking when I was not. I cannot describe the terrors of those cells. The smell in them is horrible, and they are so cold, while the light is altogether insufficient. Whenever I came out of them after confinement I felt like a drunken man on regaining a better atmosphere; but if the change made me reel, as it did once or twice, I only got a clump aside the head."

One of those who interviewed him comments upon the "moderation" and the "absence of bitterness" with which he spoke of his wrongs. Well! he has shown already by his conduct that his heart is stouter than his tongue is long; he is no caterwauling weakling. But whether he himself does any of it or no, there will be a good deal of bitter thinking and strong speaking for many a long day to come about his case, which is but that of thousands of those who are not content with tyranny, and which will not be forgotten until it is not only atoned for but made impossible of re-perpetration. NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. X. (continued).—QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

I SAID: "We have heard about London and the manufacturing districts and the ordinary towns: how about the villages?"

Said Hammond: "You must know that toward the end of the nineteenth century the villages were almost destroyed, unless where they became mere adjuncts to the manufacturing districts, or formed a sort of minor manufacturing districts themselves. Houses were allowed to fall into decay and actual ruin; trees were cut down for the sake of the few shillings which the poor sticks would fetch; the building became inexpressibly mean and hideous. Labour was scarce; but wages fell nevertheless. All the small country arts of life which once added to the little pleasures of country people were lost. The country produce which passed through the hands of the husbandmen never got so far as their mouths. Incredible shabbiness and niggardly pinching reigned over the fields and acres which, in spite of the rude and careless husbandry of the times, were so kind and bountiful. Had you any inkling of all this?"

"I have heard that it was so," said I; "but what followed?"

"The change," said Hammond, "which in these matters took place very early in our epoch, was most strangely rapid. People flocked into the country villages, and, so to say, flung themselves upon the freed land like a wild beast upon his prey; and in a very little time the villages of England were more populous than they had been since the fourteenth century, and were still growing fast. Of course, this invasion of the country was awkward to deal with, and would have created much misery, if the folk had still been under the bondage of class monopoly. But as it was, things soon righted themselves. People found out what they were fit for, and gave up attempting to push themselves into occupations in which they must needs fail. The town invaded the country; but the invaders, like the warlike invaders of early days, yielded to the influence of their surroundings, and became country people; and in their turn, as they became more numerous than the townsmen, influenced them also; so that the difference between town and country grew less and less; and it was indeed this world of the country vivified by the thought and briskness of town-bred folk which has produced that happy and leisurely but eager life of which you have had a first taste. Again I say, many blunders were made, but we have had time to set them right. Much was left for the men of my earlier life to deal with. The crude ideas of the first half of the twentieth century, when men were still oppressed by the fear of poverty, and did not look enough to the present pleasure of ordinary daily life, spoilt a great deal of what the commercial age had left us of external beauty: and I admit that it was but slowly that men recovered from the injuries that they inflicted on themselves even after they became free. But slowly as the recovery came, it did come; and the more you see of us, the clearer it will be to you that we are happy. That we live amidst beauty without any fear of becoming effeminate; that we have plenty to do, and on the whole enjoy doing it. What more can we ask of life?"

He paused, as if he were seeking for words with which to express his thought. Then he said:

"This is how we stand. England was once a country of clearings amongst the woods and wastes, with a few towns interspersed, which were fortresses for the feudal army, markets for the folk, gathering-places for the craftsmen. It then became a country of huge and foul workshops and fouler gambling-dens, surrounded by an ill-kept, poverty-stricken farm pillaged by the masters of the workshops. It is now a garden, where nothing is wasted and nothing is spoilt, with the necessary dwellings, sheds, and workshops scattered up and down the country, all trim and neat and pretty. For, indeed, we should be too much ashamed of ourselves if we allowed the making of goods, even on a large scale, to carry with it the appearance even of desolation and misery. Why, my friend, those housewives we were talking of just now would teach us better than that."

Said I: "This side of your change is certainly for the better. But though I shall soon see some of these villages, tell me in a word or two what they are like, just to prepare me."

"Perhaps," said he, "you have seen a tolerable picture of these villages as they were before the end of the nineteenth century. Such things exist."

"I have seen several of such pictures," said I.

"Well," said Hammond, "our villages are something like the best of such places, with the church or mote-house of the neighbours for their chief building. Only note that there are no tokens of poverty about them: no tumble-down picturesque; which, to tell you the truth, the artist usually availed himself of to veil his incapacity for drawing architecture. Such things do not please us, even when they indicate no misery. Like the mediævals, we like everything trim and clean, and orderly and bright; as people always do when they have any sense of architectural power; because then they know that they can have what they want, and they won't stand any nonsense from Nature in their dealings with her."

"Besides the villages, are there any scattered country houses?" said I.

"Yes, plenty," said Hammond; "in fact, except in the wastes and forests and amongst the sand-hills (like Hindhead in Surrey), it is not easy to be out of sight of a house; and where the houses are thinly scattered they run large, and are more like the old colleges than ordinary houses as they used to be. That is done for the sake of society, for a good many people can dwell in such houses, as the country dwellers are not necessarily husbandmen; though they almost all help in such work at times. The life that goes on in these big dwellings in the country is very pleasant, especially as some of the most studious men of our time live in them, and altogether there is a great variety of mind and mood to be found in them which brightens and quickens the society there."

"I am rather surprised," said I, "by all this, for it seems to me that after all the country must be tolerably populous."

"Certainly," said he; "the population is pretty much the same as it was at the end of the nineteenth century; we have spread it, that is all. Of course, also, we have helped to populate other countries—where we were wanted and were called for."

Said I: "One thing, it seems to me, does not go with your word of 'garden' for the country. You have spoken of wastes and forests, and I myself have seen the beginning of your Middlesex and Essex forest. Why do you keep such things in a garden? and isn't it very wasteful to do so?"

"My friend," he said, "we like these pieces of wild nature, and can afford them, so we have them; let alone that as to the forests, we need a great deal of timber and suppose that our sons and sons' sons will do the like. As to the land being a garden, I have heard that they used to have shrubberies and rockeries in gardens once; and though I might not like the artificial ones, I assure you that some of the natural rockeries of our garden are worth seeing. Go north this summer and look at the Cumberland and Westmoreland ones,—where, by the way, you will see some sheep feeding, so they are not so wasteful as you think; not so wasteful as forcing grounds for fruit out of season, I think. Go and have a look at the sheep-walks high up the slopes between Ingleborough and Pen-y-gwent, and tell me if you think we waste the land there by not covering it with factories for making things that nobody wants, which was the chief business of the nineteenth century."

"I will try to go there," said I.

"It won't take much trying," said he.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

NOTES FROM NOTTINGHAM.

THE pleasure-house of the rich, the prison of the poor—such is this manufacturing centre of ours. All the sensual delights that are to the bourgeoisie the only relief from the ennui which follows the cares of money-getting, are here in abundance; and down in the slums—Narrowmarsh, with its dingy lodging-houses and narrow courts; the Meadow Platts, with their gloomy streets of back-to-back houses—the poor are penned in grime, squalor, and density. Perhaps no manufacturing town has fairer skies and less of the inky blackness with which capitalism elsewhere defiles the heavens, but the struggle of the worker against the plunderer is as hopeless here as amid the smoke of London or Sheffield. In what are called "good times," a proportion of the twist hands earn what are regarded as high wages, but to them there soon comes the cycle of depression when they are either unemployed or only gain a few shillings a week, and all the while the less skilled workers, and, above all, the hundreds of young women, who are employed in the finishing, patterning, bleaching, and dyeing of the lace, work long hours for low wages.

The workers, one hears, are wasteful and extravagant, and if so, they follow only too well the example of their masters in pursuing the will-o'-the-wisp of gambling, which has stricken this fair city as the Black Death smote mediæval Europe. An ex-bricklayer, who left that honest calling to turn bookmaker, and with his gains in that nefarious pursuit amassed more by running a brewery, is not a high example to hold up for a town's guidance; and yet the parsons and the fuglemen of capitalism generally have given this venerated bricklayer high municipal honour, and his great wealth has enabled him by his "charity" to buy much momentary popularity with the unthinking. The "abstinence" in virtue of which the capitalist holds the worker in chains, is aptly illustrated by the little villas in which the cocotte enjoys a luxury that the honest working-woman is a stranger to. The Corporation, packed with friends of Ireland and of Home Rule, sends its police clothing to be made in sweater's shops, and has erected a University College which for jerry-building can beat any suburban villa; the School Board, which underpays its assistant teachers and builds its educational system on their bodies as it were; the Board of Guardians, full of publicans and small tradesmen, notoriously selected by judicious manipulation of the voting papers, who put skilled artisans when unemployed to stone-breaking, and build palatial offices and a snugly-cushioned board-room for their own accommodation—these are our rulers. The Liberal party, as a rule, hold the control of local administration, and any sort of sweater is swallowed by the wire-pullers provided he bears the regulation trade-mark.

Amid a population sweated, overworked, and depressed in bad times, and corrupted and demoralised in good, the progress of the Socialist propaganda is necessarily slow. At the hearing of an election petition a month ago it was proved that dozens of voters were bought for a shilling a-piece; and while our Socialist comrades have to struggle with apathy on the part of the workers, the basest slanders and the most unscrupulous wire-pulling have been exerted on behalf of the "classes." For eight years, however, the sacred flame of Socialism has been kept alight, and though discouraged at times some few workers have laboured at the cleansing of the Augean stables of profit-mongering rule. Local elections have been fought as a means of propaganda, and comrades Peacock, Proctor, and Whalley have again and again led the assault, which has again and again proved a forlorn hope. Every Sunday in the summer open-air meetings have been held, and of late the party have secured a convenient hall near the centre of the town for lectures, etc. Comrades Sparling, Carpenter, and others, have already visited us, and the unskilled labour movement found in this room an asylum and in comrade Proctor a mentor, when official trades unionism of the Broadhurst kidney (the prevailing species) looked askance at it.

Much has been done, but much remains, and we are looking forward to the coming visit of the Socialists of the Midlands on the last Sunday in June to give the movement here an impetus that it sadly needs. After a day's pleasure the comrades from surrounding towns propose to help us in holding a great demonstration in the Market Place, when "the blood-red banner that our masters fear to see" will be a sign to the observant that the chariot-wheels of Socialism are rolling on. Next time I write I propose to deal with some of our masters and their peculiarities.

At a public meeting of women, held at Adelaide the last week in January, it was decided to form a Women's Trade Union.

Soft coal in the neighbourhood of Pittsfield is worth 2 cents a bushel, and in Kansas City 22 cents a bushel, while corn in Kansas City is worth 10 cents a bushel and 70 cents in Pennsylvania. Can the "middle-man" between the two consumers be much less than a highwayman?—Boston Globe.

MURDER BY LAW.

A FEW days ago, two brothers, aged respectively 29 and 39, were legally strangled in Worcester Gaol for the murder of a game-keeper in the employ of the royalist émigré, the Duc d'Aumale. Three human lives sacrificed in order that a royalist duke may preserve game; three more added to the holocaust of those who have suffered in the hulks, the prison, and on the scaffold, in order that an infamous gang of land thieves, who richly deserve to have the hempen ring around their own necks, may enjoy the pleasures of the battue.

"O my poor wife and children!" groaned these wretched men together as they prepared to die. When will the fierce Chartist motto, "For children and wife we will war to the knife!" be taken up again by the working masses of the country? How long will they allow a horde of aristocratic thieves to monopolise the common birthright, land, and all its products, against the rest of the community?

"Do you justify the murder of the gamekeeper?" queries the average Briton in horror, "what about his wife and children?" I maintain that all were murdered by the horrible system of land monopoly; the victims of the game laws in the country, the overcrowded who die of disease and want in our great towns, the evicted Irish peasants and Scotch crofters, those who have perished of famine on the waysides, and even those whose lives have been taken in reprisal as in Ireland, all those who have gone down in emigrant ships. All are victims of a system which is ripe for destruction.

Its basis and strength does not lie in the legal parchments, whether title-deeds or landlord-made enactments, which give legal sanction to the monstrous wrong of private property in land; nor in the soldier's bayonet or policeman's bâton, ready to defend the wrong; but it lies in the moral purblindness of the mass of the English workers. The spectacle of men, women, and children pitilessly thrust out from their homes in Ireland or Scotland does not affect the average English worker. The earth-hunger of the Celt, his aversion to pay blackmail in the shape of rent to a land thief, is to the "respectable" British "artisan" a ridiculous weakness which he unhesitatingly condemns; he has been so long divorced from the soil and its health-giving life that he has lost all vigour of view and action; he is artificialised. The huge town with its smoke and grime, its ever-extending arms swallowing up every green spot around, the blackened and blasted tracts of country where blast-furnaces flourish and Nature wilts and dies, are to him signs of greatness; and as a wage-slave, often foredoomed to the workhouse himself, he squirms of the "earth earthy" amidst the narrow courts of the town. If the tragedy of his own life will not awaken him, such a cruel tragedy as that just consummated in Worcester is scarcely likely to do so.

I have said that the present system and its most glaring iniquity, land monopoly, is not maintained so much by the physical force at its back as it is by the moral sanction it receives from even the victims it crushes. "Wouldn't you do it yourself if you had the chance?" is the reply given to the Socialist agitator when he points out the injustice of the present system. A percentage of the possessing classes are well aware of this narrowness of view, and are actively seeking at the present time, in conjunction with renegade Socialists, to utilise it for the conservation of their privileges. They will give barrack dwellings in the towns, they will even consent to concessions being given to the aristocracy of labour, but they will not give up the land. This unnatural alliance bore fruit recently, when we found a professedly labour organ, edited by a somewhat champion of Socialism, defending those implicated in the Cleveland Street abominations.

Some of the hotter and younger amongst us, disheartened at what appears to be a hopeless task, sickened by the lumpish apathy and selfishness of those they are trying to awaken, either give up in despair or dream of more forceful methods of agitation. As Kropotkin says in his "Appeal to the Young," they dream of barricades and heroic deeds: a short, sharp conflict, and then victory. To such, the slow undermining of the system seems too slow and unprofitable a task; and so we have the kaleidoscopic sections which are still a feature of Socialism in England. As well prepared and willing as any to make reprisals should there be a determined effort on the part of the "haves" to suppress the murmurings of the "have nots," or of those who voice their claims. I still contend that in agitation and education, that shall awaken the masses to a higher conception of life as opposed to mere existence, and that in preaching the gospel of discontent where filth and poverty prevail instead of beauty and plenty, lays our chief chance of success. If this were not so why do the monopolists fear free speech or subsidise the press? They create one class of opinion; we create another by agitation, by preaching unselfishness against selfishness. We have seen virgin lands bear the same crop of evils which beset us here, not because of force, but because the hearts of the pioneers contained the germs of injustice of man to man. Let us preach community of interests as the watchword of all, so that when our heritage falls to us there shall be none to undo our work and re-shackle our limbs. The beating of drums and the waving of flags are not necessary to this work, but heartfelt enthusiasm, steady work, persistent attack both on the enemy's position, and its props that I have indicated amongst our own ranks, and the result will be Victory.

The Queensland shearers have added 940 members to their roll last year, making a grand total of 2,907. The balance at their bankers has also increased by nearly £300, making a cash balance of £2,104.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

GERMANY.

LUBECK, March 31.—The movement among the timber workmen here for an increase of wages resulted to-day in the discharge of 600 men. The masters had agreed to grant the increase demanded, but requested "toleration" for non-members of the Woodcutters' Union, which, however, the union men refused. Work at the great timber yards and saw mills is almost at a standstill, and the rats are being guarded by police.

BELGIUM.

CHARLEROI, March 31.—A strike agitation is going on in some parts of this district. In several collieries the miners claim an increase of 15 per cent. in wages, and the demand has been put before the owners of the pits in the form of an ultimatum from the Labour Leagues.

SPAIN.

The strikes in Catalonia are assuming a serious aspect. On Friday, 6,000 men paraded the streets and suburbs of Barcelona, and tried to persuade the workmen of many factories to leave work. Large bands of women also paraded the streets, headed by a delegate of the Federation of Workmen. In Barcelona and other towns of Catalonia the number of men actually out is 40,000, and it is thought that the figure will soon be increased to 50,000, and that all the factories in Catalonia will be obliged to close. The movement has spread to Badalona, Martin, and Provençals, and in the last-mentioned district there is an Anarchist element among the strikers. Numerous deputations from the men have waited on the masters to try and arrive at a settlement, but hitherto without result. The strikers have posted men at some factories in order to prevent rats from continuing work. A large number of meetings were held by the strikers on Sunday, with a view to agreeing upon a common plan of action. The Civil Governor of Barcelona convened a meeting of the manufacturers of Mauresa at ten o'clock on Sunday night in order to try and put an end to the conflict. Several interviews have also taken place between the Mauresa manufacturers and their hands, and it is reported that the masters in both cases refused to re-open their workshops.

RUSSIA.

The latest news from St. Petersburg shows that the original cause of the student disturbances in Moscow is the indignation felt at the treatment of the political prisoners in Siberia. The Moscow students protested in an unmistakable manner against the cruel proceedings of the authorities, and the fear that the public might approve and participate in the demonstrations was the cause of the University being closed immediately. The letter of Marie Tschebrikova, which was secretly printed and distributed among the students in spite of police spies, had a good deal to do with the movement. The students of St. Petersburg, Charkoff, and Kasan followed the example of their Moscow friends. The revolutionary movement is showing itself more clearly every day. The only universities which are exempted from it are those of Dorpat and Tomsk. All the others have been the scenes of "disturbances." The students of all the faculties in Charkoff, Kieff, Odessa, Moscow, and St. Petersburg have made demonstrations in favour of a constitutional form of government. More than eight hundred have been arrested. The universities are watched day and night by detachments of police. For the present the garrisons of the university towns are confined to barracks, and it is probable that all the universities will be closed. Pamphlets have been distributed in which the autocracy of the Czar is denounced, and freedom of speech, religion, and the press is demanded. "Great anxiety" is felt by the guardians of order with regard to the future, the revolutionary movement having assumed incredible proportions during recent weeks. A period of convulsions and agitation is anticipated. The Czar has been releasing military prisoners, and "pardoning" Madame Tschebrikova as a precaution, but his other acts are more than neutralising these. The Imperial prohibition against solemnising the anniversary of the abolition of servitude produced a very bad impression, as it showed clearly in what light the Czar views the one good deed of his predecessor. ITALY.

MILAN.—In the cultivated and wealthy town of Milan, as in the rest of Italy, the labour crisis continues, the mechanics and masons being those who feel it the most. Meanwhile, the contractors still give their work to hands from Novara, who consent to take a lower wage than the natives. The Milanese are protesting against this, but in vain, owing to the thorough disorganisation of the workers, who are thus at the mercy of speculators.

On the 30th ult., the delegates of labour associations will meet to endorse the final project of the Labour Exchange, which will then be at once presented to the municipality.

GERMIGNAGNA (near Como).—Last week, 300 women employed in a factory here, after uselessly demanding a working-day of 12 hours, have declared themselves on strike. The director immediately gave way and work was resumed. The women had previously worked 14 hours a-day.

SAVONA.—The Fascio dei Lavoratori, a branch of the Italian Labour Party, has recently been reconstituted here, and the members expect to work it up into an active and influential body. M. M.

DENMARK.

The manifesto of the revolutionary Socialists in Denmark lays particular stress on the point that "concentration of industries into large concerns is in harmony with our evolution, when on the contrary small industries (home industries, etc.) are the raison d'être of the middle-class, and therefore reactionary." This statement may be objected to on general theoretical grounds (though it is a plausible generalisation itself), but it is certainly appropriate as a protest against the people of Social Demokratien, who simply bribe the small peasants and artisan with promises of petty reforms in their favour in order to get their votes for Social Democratic candidates for Parliament. The manifesto goes on to say: "We must, therefore, try to exterminate all false ideas as to the possibility of achieving fundamental improvements for the working-classes through legislation, and we must out that legislation as well as electioneering principally, must be looked upon as a means of agitation, and that any alliance with middle-class parties ought to be broken off, just because all middle-class parties have an interest in defending the foundation of the present society—private ownership in land and other means of production." This statement is important, and the Socialistic cause will certainly have advanced a great step when all Socialists of all countries are unanimous in letting this principle, or another principle bearing on the same point, guide their agitation and action. HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON

THE COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. For Australia, New Zealand, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Transvaal, and the Argentine Republic, a year, 8s.; six months, 4s.; three months, 2s. For India, Ceylon, China, Hong Kong, and the Straits Settlements, a year, 10s.; six months, 5s.; three months, 2s. 6d.

Subscribers who receive a RED WRAPPER are thereby reminded that their subscriptions have expired and must be renewed immediately if they wish to continue to receive COMMONWEAL.

SPECIAL RECRUIT SUBSCRIPTIONS.—To aid in spreading our principles, the following largely reduced terms are offered to those who obtain new subscribers: Two new yearly subscriptions for British Islands, etc., 10s. 6d.; for Australia, etc., 15s.; for India, etc., 19s. Five new subscriptions: For British Islands, etc., 25s.; for Australia, etc., 37s. 6d.; for India, etc., 47s. 6d. Specimen copies will be sent on receipt of postage.

Remittances from abroad must be made by International Money Order.

THE LABOUR MOVEMENT.

WHEN the present Labour agitation arose, apparently so spontaneously, and such determination was shown by tens of thousands of the unskilled workers, what hopes were raised throughout the country! Everywhere the hope was expressed that this movement would not be like the labour agitations of the past, that its essential character would be Socialistic, and that as many of its leaders were professed Socialists, their chief aim would be to so organise and educate the workers as to terminate for ever the war between capital and labour; to terminate for ever the war of classes by the triumph of labour and the supremacy of the wealth-producing millions. If the present movement is to aim at nothing higher than a paltry amelioration of the condition of the working-class while the good trade continues, at nothing more than a mere modification of the tyranny and oppression under which the workers groan, then the movement will become only a farce, a failure, and will leave the workers just where they are to-day.

When we bear in mind that in England this war between capital and labour has gone on for centuries, and that the first Act against trade organisations dates from the year 1548, we may well ask, Is this war to last for ever? In the preamble to that Act we read that "Whereas artificers, handicraftsmen, and labourers have made confederacies and promises, and have sworn mutual oaths, not only that they should not meddle with one another's work, and perform and finish what another hath begun, but also to constitute and appoint how much work they shall do in a day, and what hours and times they shall work, contrary to the laws and statutes of this realm, and to the great hurt and impoverishment of his Majesty's subjects." And this nearly three centuries and a-half ago! How far have trade organisations advanced since that period in their aims and objects? We boast that we learn wisdom by experience. Where is the wisdom we display to-day after the sad experience of centuries? True, in organising the workers so as to control the new labour movement, you are bound to combat existing evils, and to seek to ameliorate their condition; but let us not forget that those evils are incidental to the present system, and that you cannot abolish the evils while you retain the system. Organise the workers by all means, and improve their position as far as possible under existing conditions, but let their organisations be the means by which to educate them for a grander future, the destruction of those conditions which render liberty, dignity, and independence are impossible.

Nor have trade societies, either in the past or at the present, been able to move the great mass of the workers. Taking the Board of Trade report for 1889, we find 104 societies sent in their returns during 1888, the number of their members being 373,904. Suppose we take their total number at 800,000, how small a proportion of the workers they contain! The societies of 10,000 and upwards who reported in 1888 may almost be counted on your fingers. Take the following list:

	No.
Amalgamated Society of Engineers	53,740
Durham Miners' Association	38,000
United Society of Boiler Makers and Iron Shipbuilders ..	26,545
Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners	25,050
Amalgamated Association of Operative Cotton Spinners ..	16,910
Amalgamated Society of Tailors	14,214
Operative Stonemason's Friendly Society	10,261
National Union of Boot and Shoe Rivetters and Finishers	11,410
Friendly Society of Iron Founders	12,202
Northumberland Miners' Association	12,456
Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants	12,080
Blackburn and District Power Loom Weavers' Association	10,500

In pointing to these facts I am only pointing to the small number of the workers embraced by present organisations, and as showing the vast field there is for a greater and a grander organisation of workers than has ever yet been attempted.

Again, the diffusion of knowledge and the progress of our powers of production tend rapidly to break down the main differences between the skilled and the unskilled workers. And who can tell how long or how short will be the duration of the present good trade. Another and a more terrible depression will come; and when it comes what will again be the condition of even the great societies? Go back to 1879, when the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, with an income of £135,267, paid to their unemployed alone £149,931. Come down to 1886, when that society paid to its unemployed £86,460, and the other large societies paid in proportion. Trade unionists, too, ought to remember that England is not now the ruler of the waves, nor the mistress of the markets of the world. All the nations of the earth are becoming more and more independent of England. The telegraph has destroyed for ever the supremacy of England as the centre of commercial intelligence; and the international character of our modern commercial system has made equally international all our great financial operations.

Look at the trade of the world to-day. Is England still supreme? Does she control the trade of the world? Let the following items for 1887 answer:

	Total Imports.	From England.	From other Countries.
Russia ..	£39,321,000	£5,858,849	£33,462,151
Germany ..	230,100,000	27,316,544	202,783,456
Belgium ..	116,266,000	13,140,582	103,125,418
France ..	197,708,000	20,495,730	177,212,270
Holland ..	94,457,000	15,037,525	79,419,475
U.S.A. ..	144,233,000	40,240,150	103,992,850

Now take the exports of these States:

	Exports.	To England.	To other Countries.
Russia ..	£62,295,000	£9,683,388	£52,611,612
Germany ..	231,235,000	24,563,536	206,671,464
Belgium ..	108,612,000	14,732,663	93,879,337
France ..	169,528,000	38,855,296	130,672,704
Holland ..	94,457,000	25,327,277	57,299,723
U.S.A. ..	149,204,000	83,049,074	66,154,926

Here we see the trade of the world fast leaving England. It is already beyond her control. These are matters of the highest importance to the workers. They are facts we must not forget. And if we turn to our colonies and possessions, it is the same. For instance, in 1888 the total imports of Australia were 65 millions and odd. From England 30 millions and odd, and other countries, 35 millions and odd. Take North America; out of a total of over 24 millions, she took from us 8 millions and odd. Look at the matter how we will, or take our facts from what part of the world we may, the one inevitable conclusion is, that England's supremacy as a commercial nation is a thing of the past.

But there is another matter we must not lose sight of—viz., the foreign investments of British capital. These are matters which the workers cannot afford to ignore. In 1882 the total British investments were £3,494,000,000, and in 1888 £5,786,215,000; an increase of £2,295,215,000. Out of that £2,295,000,000, only £320,373,000 were invested at home. £1,974,842,000 were invested in foreign regions. While the investments at home average only £53,387,000 per annum, our foreign investments average over £328,000,000 per annum. Let the workers and their leaders think of these things. What do they indicate? They are the writing on the wall. Let the workers read and reflect.

Can the trades unions continue to fight on the old lines? Are the circumstances to-day the same as they were forty or fifty years ago? Take your joint-stock companies, your great limited liability companies, your gigantic rings and syndicates, and the federations of employers. I am glad that a federation of all the trades connected with the engineering and shipbuilding industries is about to take place. It is absolutely necessary in face of the great federation of the employers. But it is the millions that want organising, and educating, with a national federation. That is the great want to-day.

Keep in mind, too, the immense increase in the powers of production in every commercial nation, with the general spread of education, and then ask yourselves the question—Can you still fight on the old lines? But suppose it were possible, are we never to learn wisdom? are we never to advance? Is this struggle of ages still to go on? Is this war of classes never to terminate? Are the slavery, and the misery, and the degradation of the workers to be eternal? Are the men of so-called moderate views—the political tricksters, the social tinkers, the miserable creatures who can never rise to the height of a great principle,—are these to be still the leaders of the wealth-producing millions? If yes, whose fault will it be? If yes, who will be responsible? But no! The days of ever rampant tyranny are numbered. The tyrannies and the oppressions inseparable from our present system will end, and this war of classes will terminate. Yes; and the governments of the world, whether imperial or aristocratic, will not long preserve the present system. All the tyranny of the capitalist classes will not for long keep the people in bondage; and all the empty nonsense of incapables will not for long mislead the masses. Organise and educate the millions for the social revolution. There only is the emancipation of labour, the regeneration of society, possible. That alone will bring to the toiling millions liberty, dignity, and independence.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE SHOP ASSISTANTS' UNION.—AN APPEAL TO WORKING WOMEN.

I daresay most of the readers of the Weal are aware that this new union is making itself heard in Hammersmith and elsewhere. The object of this union is to shorten the hours of labour on one day, Thursday being the usual day, the time for shutting up shop being 5 o'clock; but now comes the tug of war, and that is the women will block the way and retard this very small amount of leisure and pleasure that this union is trying to obtain for the assistants. If the women are not appealed to at every meeting all over the country by our various speakers not to shop after 5 o'clock on Thursday and Saturday nights, I think two or three hours might very easily be curtailed. If the speakers at the meetings would emphatically appeal to the women not to shop at any and every hour of the night almost, as this is the fundamental point of the whole movement. I would also ask every workman on Saturdays after he has been paid, at 12 or 2 o'clock as the case may be, to return home a little earlier so that the missus can do her marketing sooner, and enable the shop assistants to arrive home before the first hour of Sunday morning. Trusting that all my unionist friends will co-operate with the above, I am, yours fraternally,

F. HERVE.

THE CHRISTIAN PIONEER.

Dear Sir,—I read with much interest the article on "The Christian Pioneer" in last week's Commonweal. Would it not be possible for members of the League, in conjunction with other Socialist societies, to organise a demonstration, say in Hyde Park, to protest in the name of the workers of London against granting of honours to such "Christian" freebooters as Stanley? No doubt there are many who would be willing to assist.—I am, yours very truly,

W. H. BROWN.

26, The Avenue, Brixton, S.W., March 31st, 1890.

The Napier (N.Z.) Branch of the Federated Wharf Labourers Union numbered 257 members on Feb. 1.

The Queensland Central Labourers' Union was formed at Saltern Creek 18 months ago. Last year 2,400 new members joined.

In Northern Mexico labourers get 37½ cents a-day. In Southern Mexico it is too hot to work more than from three to five hours, and 1 dollar is paid.

Fifty honorary members, and about 500 working members, had been enrolled up to the end of January in the newly-formed Thames (N.Z.) Branch of the Amalgamated Miners' Association of Australasia.

There is a row in the camp of the Adelaide Land Nationalists. They are broken up into two parties, the "Single-tax League" and the "Taxation Reform League," and from appearances they will run against each other at the coming elections.

Last half-year the Broken Hill Proprietary silver mine (N.S.W.) disbursed in dividends £368,000, besides spending nearly £43,000 in machinery, etc. The dividend has now been increased to £80,000 per month, and will shortly be raised still further. Wages remain about the same—starvation.

TOO LATE!

MOTHER, ah mother, hungry am I,
Give me bread or I must die!
Tarry a while, my little son,
To-morrow shall see the sowing done!

And after they had sown the corn,
Still the child cried out night and morn:
Mother, ah mother, hungry am I,
Give me bread or I must die!
Tarry a while, my little son,
To-morrow shall see the harvesting done!

And when they had harvested the corn,
Still the child cried out night and morn:
Mother, ah mother, hungry am I,
Give me bread, or I must die!
Tarry a while, my little son,
To-morrow shall see the thrashing done!

And after they had thrashed the corn,
Still the child cried out night and morn:
Mother, ah mother, hungry am I,
Give me bread or I must die!
Tarry a while, my little son,
To-morrow shall see the grinding done!

And after they had ground the corn,
Still the child cried out night and morn:
Mother, ah mother, hungry am I,
Give me bread or I must die!
Tarry a while, my little son,
To-morrow shall see the baking done!

And when they had done baking the bread,
There on the bier the child lay dead.

LAURA LAFARGUE.

AUSTRALIAN LABOUR FEDERATION.

THE first report of the council of the Australian Labour Federation, addressed to the members of the affiliated unions, shows a record of seven months of practical work. Recognising that it is only by means of organisation that Labour can win that standard of political and social recognition to which it is entitled, the council have used their energies mainly in that direction. The London dock-strike is referred to as having given an impetus to the work of union by showing how one body of workers can help another, and how hopeless it is for labour to expect to secure a fair share of the products of industry so long as the labourers remain so many units—every man fighting for his own hand. "We know," continues the report, "that hitherto labour has been only partially organised when organised at all, and that its operations towards amelioration have been sporadic; but there is some reason for believing that a new industrial era has dawned, and that the light thereof is growing." The General Labourers, the Brisbane Cordwainers, the Brisbane and Suburban Shop Assistants, the Early Closing Association, the Federated Wharf Labourers, and the Tramway and Butchers' Employes' Unions are reported as likely to shortly be represented on the council. On the other hand, the Coachmakers, and Saddle, Harness, and Collar-Makers' Unions have been dissolved, and the Ironmoulders and Tanners and Curriers' Unions have withdrawn. After referring briefly to the action taken by the council with regard to Immigration, State-aided Village Settlement, and the legislation of the Eight Hours' Day, the report goes on to state that up to the time of writing from 6,000 to 8,000 actual subscribers to the new labour paper had been secured, and an effort would be made to issue the first number on Brisbane's Labour Day (1st March). The success of delegates who visited the Central and Western districts for the purpose of attending the annual meetings of the Central Queensland Carriers', Central Queensland Labourers', and Queensland Shearers' Unions, with a view of inducing these organisations to adopt the principles of federation, is referred to; and the report speaks warmly of the kind feeling shown and brotherly sentiments expressed by the members of the Western unions. The prospect of "The Federation of Labour throughout Australasia" being accomplished is hopefully regarded. The balance-sheet up to 31st December, 1889, shows receipts amounting to £193 2s., and expenditure of £111 13s. 9d., leaving a credit balance of £81 8s. 3d. "The council feel convinced that the money entrusted to them has been laid out to the best possible advantage, and that they have placed it within the power of their successors, with the assistance of the affiliated unions, to get a fourfold return"; and they conclude with a hope—"that no effort will be spared on the part of the various societies to interest their members in Federation, and to lend all possible assistance in pursuing the grand work of organisation."

Someone having trumpeted as a discovery that the way to the millennium is through fewer hours and the consequent employment of more workers, the Sydney Echo oracularly states that "the employé would not consent to have his wages reduced by a sumptuary law while he is willing and able to earn more; the employer, on his part, will not pay eight hours' wages for four hours' work." Now, in a community where natural opportunities are free to all and old age is not looked forward to with dread, no man will desire to labour after his daily wants are satisfied, and no employer will have the power to compel him either directly or indirectly to do so.—Sydney Bulletin.

The carriers on the Adelaide side will have to take a lesson out of the Queensland book if they do not want to be crushed in detail. A movement having been started for the formation of a union, three of the firms engaged in carrying goods between Adelaide and Port Adelaide threatened their men with immediate discharge if the movement were persisted in. Some of the men were inclined to drop the movement on receiving higher wages and shorter hours, but promises of assistance having been received from the Trades and Labour Council and the Maritime Labour Council, they are likely to remain true. At present the pay is two guineas per week, the day's work ranging from ten to sixteen hours, and the men want £2 5s., or an increase of 3s. per week, and uniform hours, extra payment being given for overtime. One master, Mr. J. W. Bushnell, has agreed to pay union wages and to throw no obstacles in the way of men wishing to join the Union.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Mauricewood Disaster.

Our friends will remember this disaster, which occurred last September, through a fire breaking out at the Mauricewood Colliery, Midlothian, when sixty-three miners were stifled to death by the smoke. The Commissioners have now given their decision, and Keir Hardie reviews it in an excellent article in the Labour Tribune. He points out that the Commissioners' report briefly summarised resolves itself into this: "1st, The fire originated in the return air way, but how it originated cannot be ascertained; 2nd, the smoke found its way into the intake air-way owing to a badly-constructed trap-door being partly open, owing also to the stoppings between the intake and return air-ways being badly constructed, and through a rhone or pipe used for conveying fresh air from the intake air-way to the engine-house; 3rd, there was no proper second outlet from the part of the mine in which the accident occurred; 4th, that had the level which was at one time actually begun and afterwards stopped, been driven between the Mauricewood and the 160-fathom working at the Greenlaw Pit been gone on with and completed, the accident would not have happened. Add to these the extraordinary fact that of 14,000 cubic feet of air per minute entering the mine, only 3,500 found its way to the face, and we have a set of circumstances which point to an amount of carelessness and contempt for the provisions of the Mines Act not easily paralleled. There is no getting over the fact, try as we may, that sixty-three men lost their lives because the provisions of the Mines Act and the very commonplaces of mine management had been recklessly disregarded. What are, then, the findings of the Commissioners? They can be summed up in four words—'No one is to blame.' Every attempt is made to whitewash black spots, palliate wrongdoing, and even misconstrue the Mines Act in favour of the delinquents. Instead of an attempt to fix responsibility in an impartial manner, their special pleadings are all those of a council for defence." Quite natural, for in this case, be it remembered, it is not possible to put the blame on the shoulders of the miners. They cannot be made responsible for a "badly-constructed trap-door," or for there being "no proper second outlet from the part of the mine in which the accident occurred." No; in this case it is the greed and the meanness of the owners that turned the mine into a death-trap; and the Commissioners naturally hesitate before condemning such respectable men. Instead of judging them, they defend them. The law which can punish a miner for striking matches to light his pipe is powerless against the mine-owner, who is equally reckless of the lives of the men. What, then, is the remedy? Not in more Acts of Parliament, through which capitalists can drive their coaches and six, but in the miners taking to heart the last few sentences of Keir Hardie's article: "In the last analysis we get to this conclusion, that were the miners of the kingdom organised and watchful over their own interests, they could do much to make such things as these impossible. Where men have not interest enough in themselves to combine for the protection of their own interests, they must not expect that either governments or commissioners can be intensely interested either in them or their welfare.

"Hereditary bondsmen learn to know
Who would be free, themselves must strike the blow."

End of the Liverpool Dock Strike.

The men and the masters met several times in conference during the past week, but no agreement was arrived at. The leaders therefore determined that the men should go to work for those masters who were willing to pay the union terms. Last Saturday a large number of the men entered the dock gates to work for the masters who were paying the union wages. Soon after work had commenced some 200 labourers went for some blacklegs who were working on a steamer, and completely scattered them, one blackleg being so anxious to get away that he jumped into the dock. The police came rushing up, to find the unionists had got the blacklegs down on the deck and were pummeling them without mercy. A smart skirmish followed between the police and the dockers, one of whom sent a big stone at the head of a police inspector. He was immediately arrested, and though his comrades did their utmost to rescue him, was dragged off to the police-court and sentenced to two months' imprisonment.

On Monday a terrible rumour was afloat at Bootle. It was said that the union men had commenced a general onslaught upon the blacklegs. Seventy policemen rushed down to the docks in a great hurry to rescue the poor dear blacklegs, to find when they arrived there that all was quiet.

On the same day Michael Davitt, who has been very active in negotiating, had an interview with the employers who had not yet yielded, and persuaded them to agree to a settlement, the chief points of which are as follows: That the dinner-hour be conceded, but if the men should have to work during it they are to have two hours pay, and that they are not to do more than nine hours night work unless they choose. On their side the men agree to give a week's notice in case of another strike.

Dock Strike at Plymouth.

Four hundred dockers came out last Saturday at Plymouth. They demand 7d. an hour for day labour, 9d. an hour for overtime, and 1s. an hour Sunday labour. The masters have agreed to these terms, but have refused to sign an agreement making the terms binding for twelve months. A steamer that arrived on Sunday evening had to be unloaded by clerks and dock officials; the labourers refused to work, and the sailors, who were trade-unionists, declined to be blacklegs. The employers have telegraphed to the ports from which their ships sail to prevent them coming to Plymouth, but the strikers have also telegraphed to all ports where there are branches of the Dockers' Union and asked them to boycott Plymouth vessels.

The strike ended on Monday by the labourers accepting the employers' offer, withdrawing their demand for a twelve months' agreement.

Great Strike in the Boot Trade.

After a long series of unavailing negotiations, the strike began on Saturday, when 10,000 men came out. The men demand that the masters should provide them with workshops. This step has been taken by the men because home-work leads to sweating. The masters have offered the workshops on condition that the men will submit all questions of wages to arbitration. This the men refused to do, as they think the masters might attempt to cut down wages upon the basis of evidence collected from the country districts. The men were joined by 1,700 Jewish workmen on Monday. Ninety-seven masters have given in out of 400. The rest of the masters held a meeting on Monday night, at which they agreed to stick together. It is very doubtful, though, if they will do so, as according to most reports they are very disorganised, and the fact that so many have given in is proof that the surrender of the others is not far distant.

Livesey Breaks his Word.

Although Livesey agreed to give union men the preference for employment should any further vacancies occur at the time the strike was concluded, he has now deliberately gone back on his pledged word, and has had a notice posted outside the factory gates stating that no union men need apply. Of course this was what might be expected from the mean hypocrite who did his best to smash the union under a pretence of philanthropy; but I wonder if the capitalist press which attacked the dockers so bitterly for a pretended breach of faith will find equally strong terms of reprobation for Livesey's shameful treachery?

Shop Assistants' Union.

It was mentioned in the last report that the shop-assistants were agitated right through the country. As a proof of this, the assistants at Liverpool had a torchlight procession through the streets last week against the shopkeepers who would not close, with the result that when the police interfered a riot ensued, in the course of which one or two shop fronts of the sweating shopkeepers suffered severely in the way of broken glass. The whole work of the union in London has been concentrated on Hammersmith during the last few weeks, with the result that all the shopkeepers have given way in face of the boycott. One shopkeeper, a Mr. Retzbach, who keeps a pork and saveloy shop, kept open after 5 p.m. on Thursday Mar. 20, although he had promised to close, but on a threatening crowd gathering outside, he became alarmed for the safety of his windows and shut up hurriedly. The threatened prosecution has been abandoned, as the shopkeeper who threatened it, having shops in other parts of London, thought those might share the same fate if it was persisted in. Peckham will probably be the next point of attack, as a good branch has been established there, and the neighbourhood is a very late one.

Dublin Bricklayers' Labourers.

The bricklayers' labourers, who had been on strike for some time, resumed work on Monday March 24th, on the recommendation of Archbishop, pending the decision of the arbitrators. On March 23rd, the arbitrators, Michael Davitt, Alderman Moyer, and Archbishop Walsh, made the following award: That the rate of wages from the resumption of work till July 1st should be 16s. 6d. per week, and from July 1st the wages should be—Summer wages, March 1st to October 31st, 18s. per week; Winter wages, November to end of February, 16s. per week. As is usual in cases of arbitration, the men have gained very little; in fact, many of them will lose 1s. 6d. per week.

N.

At a general meeting of the Canterbury Trades and Labour Council, at Christchurch (N.Z.) on Saturday, Jan. 25, it was reported that 13 societies, with 1,456 members, were already affiliated to the Council, and other societies, with an aggregate membership of 1,650, were expected to join shortly, as they were in sympathy with it, and others are in process of formation and expected to join ultimately.

A meeting of the Auckland (N.Z.) Bakers' Union was held on Saturday, January 25, at which the working day was made ten hours, whereas the average hitherto has been from twelve to thirteen, and in some cases sixteen. For the first three hours after the working day, overtime is to be time and a-quarter, after that time and a-half. Delegates were appointed to the Trades and Labour Council.

We are prone to laugh at the superstitious devotions of pagans to their idols of wood and stone and the ignorance of African fetish worshippers, but the worst exhibition of pagan superstition does not fall much below the actions of some of the unthinking rank and file of our political parties. For blind profession of belief in something they have never attempted to analyse or understand, the average party machine-voter quite equals the devotees of Mumbo Jumbo. And except that the party processions are more orderly and less fatal than those of Juggernaut, they are but little to be preferred.—Journal of the K. of L.

Mrs. Astor of New York, at a recent wedding party, wore diamonds of the value of 800,000 dollars. Her earrings were valued at 50,000 dollars each. She wore a diamond chain of 500 stones valued at 1,000 dollars each. It may be well to add that 800,000 families suffered for the want of a dollar each to buy bread; that 300,000 families in Ireland are starving; that 800,000 men worked all that day for one dollar each; that 800,000 mothers were in deep distress for the need of a dollar each to help a poor sick child; that 1,600,000 little children were working all that day with weary brains and heavy hearts. And is this justice or equity? and did it represent her sacrifice, her earnings, her benefit to the world?—Paterson Labour Standard.

BERLIN LABOUR CONFERENCE.—The Conference has finished, and here, so far as they are known, are the results:—Weekly rest: 1. A Sunday holiday to be the general rule in all trades. 2. In trades where continuous work is inevitable, workers to have at least every second Sunday free. 3. Governments to arrive at an international understanding on the subject. Work in mines: 1. Underground work by women and by children under fourteen (twelve in southern countries) to be absolutely prohibited. 2. Working hours generally in dangerous mines to be shortened by such means as each country may think best. 3. Measures to be taken by the State to promote safety in mines, and to ensure compensation and relief from consequences of accidents. 4. Wages and output of coal to be regulated by voluntary agreement or arbitration between owners and workers on the British model. Labour of women and young persons: 1. Children under twelve to be excluded from "industrial work." 2. Between twelve and fourteen the period of "effective work" not to exceed six hours, with a minimum of one half-hour's rest; Sunday and night work prohibited. 3. Between fourteen and sixteen "effective work" not to exceed ten hours, with one and a half hours' rest; Sunday and night work prohibited. 4. Between sixteen and eighteen, a maximum working day to be fixed, with regulations as to work at night in dangerous industries. 5. For women above sixteen "effective work" not to exceed eleven hours per day, with one and a half hours' rest; Sunday and night work prohibited. These proposals, of course, do not go beyond recommendations, on which the various countries may or may not act. But most have been accepted by the delegates with only trifling reservations, and therefore Europe is in the main committed to an international programme on these lines.

REPORTS.

EAST LONDON.—A splendid meeting held in Victoria Park on Sunday afternoon; speakers were comrades Cores, Davis, and Hicks; 40 'Weal' sold and 1s. 1d. collected.—H. McK.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—Good meeting held at Latimer Road; speakers were Dean and Crouch; few 'Weals' sold. The Branch, in connection with Hammersmith, held a meeting in Hyde Park at 3 p.m.; we had a good audience; 12 Commonweal sold and 2s. collected. At our rooms in the evening, comrade Turner lectured to a good audience on "Co-operation" (The Socialist Co-operation Federation System); 2s. collected and several 'Weals' sold.

ABERDEEN.—At meeting on 24th, an article by Frederic Harrison on "The Eighteenth Century" was read and discussed. On the 30th we commenced our Sunday night meetings with a lecture by comrade Leatham, set down on the list as "The Only Thing that will do—By One of the Unemployed;" the hall was filled to suffocation, and the lecture, the discussion, and the singing were all voted unusually good.—L.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday we held our usual meetings at Jail Square and Paisley Road Toll, Glasier being the speaker in both instances; 'Weal' sold out.

LEEDS.—On Tuesday last comrade Morris lectured here at the Grand Assembly Rooms on "The Class Struggle"; the Rev. J. J. Bynner in the chair, and supported by two other rev. gentlemen. Morris was in good form, and was frequently applauded. Many questions asked. Good sale of our literature. On Sunday morning, at Vicar's Croft, a very good meeting was held, addressed by Corkwell, Paylor, Sweeney, Maguire, and others. Good sale of literature, and a collection made. In the afternoon, at the same place, another good meeting was held, speakers Roper and Sweeney; collection 3s.

YARMOUTH.—On Sunday morning, on Priory Plain, comrade Poyntz gave an address on "Where Trades-unionism Fails" to an attentive audience. In the evening, on Colman's Granary Quay, we held another meeting, comrades Brightwell and Poyntz speakers. 8d. collected, 15 Commonweal sold.—J. H.

DUBLIN.—On Sunday March 23rd, a general meeting of workmen was held, under the auspices of the Dublin Branch of the National Union of Gas-workers and General Labourers of Great Britain and Ireland, in the Theatre of the Mechanics Institute, Lower Abbey. Addresses were delivered by Mr. Cauty, Central Branch, comrades Graham, Shields, Hamilton, and others.

LIVERPOOL SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—We had three fine meetings on Sunday. In the morning the Christian Evidence Society lecturer opposed us. Comrades Reeves and Chapman replied. In the afternoon Edward Carpenter lectured at the Landing Stage to a good and attentive audience. In the evening he lectured in the Concert Hall, Lord Nelson Street, Cunningham Graham in the chair. The hall was well filled; several dock-labourers came, and were specially addressed by Graham. Commonweal and Justice sold out, together with 10s. worth of literature. Collections, £1 5s.

DUBLIN.—A monster labour meeting, numbering from eight to ten thousand, was held in the Phoenix Park, on Sunday March 30th, under the auspices of the National Union of Gas-workers and General Labourers. J. A. Poole, M.A., presided. The principal speaker was Dr. Aveling, London, who was well received, and whose exposition of Internationalism was very forcible. Shields, Hamilton, and Cauty also spoke. The following resolution was adopted: "That this mass meeting in Phoenix Park, Dublin, recognises the imperative necessity of the working class combining nationally and internationally in order to obtain the due share of the wealth it creates."

CHESTERFIELD DISCUSSION SOCIETY.—Some of the readers of the Commonweal may be interested to know that a little work has been going on here. Lectures have been given every Sunday evening since October 27. The following names of comrades who have lectured for us will show that the subject has not been neglected, although we have not confined ourselves to Socialism. Comrades Carpenter, Taylor, Girdlestone, Morris, Gorbitt, Thompson, Unwin, Headlam, Peacock, Proctor, Pengelly, and Cassels have all helped us with one or more lectures. Altogether, good work has been done in breaking down prejudice and spreading our gospel. Our audiences have averaged from fifty to a hundred, though once or twice both more and less have been present.—R. U.

FUNERAL OF COMRADE F. NEUMAN.

The funeral of comrade F. Neuman took place last Sunday at Manor Park Cemetery. The following clubs and societies were represented in the procession: Communist Club, 1st Section ditto, Autonomie Club, Gleichheit Club, Berner Street Club, Socialist League, and Clerkenwell Branch of S.D.F. The speeches at the grave were delivered by comrade Bettye in German, and in English by F. Kitz. After some singing by the united choir, we grouped our flags around the grave and gave three cheers for the Social Revolution. The only hitch in the proceedings was caused by the police, who tried to stop the flags being carried into the cemetery; things looked ugly for a moment, but the police had to give way. A young countryman in uniform also tried hard to create a disturbance after the funeral, but failed.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR, AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. XI.—CONCERNING GOVERNMENT.

“Now,” said I, “I have come to the point of asking questions which I suppose will be dry for you to answer and difficult for you to explain; but I have foreseen for some time past that I must ask them, will I ’nill I. What kind of a government have you? Has republicanism finally triumphed? or have you come to a mere dictatorship, which some persons in the nineteenth century used to prophesy as the ultimate outcome of democracy? Indeed, this last question does not seem so very unreasonable, since you have turned your Parliament House into a dung-market. Or where do you house your present Parliament?”

The old man answered my smile with a hearty laugh, and said: “Well, well, dung is not the worst kind of corruption; fertility may come of that, whereas mere dearth came from the other kind, of which those walls once held the great supporters. Now, dear guest, let me tell you that our present parliament would be hard to house in one place, because the whole people is our parliament.”

“I don’t understand,” said I.

“No, I suppose not,” said he. “I must now shock you by telling you that we have no longer anything which you, a native of another planet, would call a government.”

“I am not so much shocked as you might think,” said I, “as I know something about governments. But tell me how do you manage, and how have you come to this state of things.”

Said he: “It is true that we have to make some arrangements about our affairs, concerning which you can ask presently; and it is also true that everybody does not always agree with the details of these arrangements; but, further, it is true that a man no more needs an elaborate system of government, with its army, navy, and police, to force him to give way to the will of the majority of his equals, than he wants a similar machinery to make him understand that his head and a stone wall cannot occupy the same space at the same moment. Do you want further explanation?”

“Well, yes, I do,” quoth I.

Old Hammond settled himself in his chair with a look of enjoyment which rather alarmed me, and made me dread a scientific disquisition: so I sighed and abided. He said:

“I suppose you know pretty well what the process of government was in the bad old times?”

“I am supposed to know,” said I.

(Hammond) What was the government of those days? Was it really the Parliament or any part of it?

(I) No.

(H.) Was not the Parliament on the one side a kind of watch-committee sitting to see that the interests of the Upper Classes took no hurt; and on the other side a sort of blind to delude the people into supposing that they had some share in the management of their own affairs?

(I) History seems to show us this.

(H.) To what extent did the people manage their own affairs?

(I) I judge from what I have heard that sometimes they forced the Parliament to make a law to legalise some alteration which had already taken place.

(H.) Anything else?

(I) I think not. As I am informed, if the people made any attempt to deal with the cause of their grievances the law stepped in and said, this is sedition, revolt, or what not, and slew or tortured the ringleaders of such attempts.

(H.) If Parliament was not the government then, nor the people either, what was the government?

(I) Can you tell me?

(H.) I think we shall not be far wrong if we say that government was the Law-Courts, backed up by the executive, which handled the brute force that the deluded people allowed them to use for their own purposes; I mean the army, navy, and police.

(I) Reasonable men must needs think you are right.

(H.) Now as to those Law-Courts. Were they places of fair dealing according to the ideas of the day? Had a poor man a good chance of defending his property and person in them?

(I) It is a commonplace that even rich men looked upon a law-suit as a dire misfortune, even if they gained the case; and as for a poor one—why, it was considered a miracle of justice and beneficence if a poor man who had once got into the clutches of the law escaped prison or utter ruin.

(H.) It seems, then, my son, that the government by law-courts and police, which was the real government of the nineteenth century, was not a great success even to the people of that day, living under a class system which proclaimed inequality and poverty as the law of God and the bond which held the world together.

(I) So it seems, indeed.

(H.) And now that all this is changed, and the “rights of property,” which mean the clenching the fist on a piece of goods and crying out to the neighbours, You shan’t have this!—now that all this has disappeared, so utterly that it is no longer possible even to jest upon its absurdity, is such a Government possible?

(I) It is impossible.

(H.) Yes, happily. But for what other purpose than the protection of the rich from the poor, the strong from the weak, did this Government exist?

(I) I have heard that it was said that their office was to defend their own citizens against attack from other countries.

(H.) It was said; but was anyone expected to believe this? For instance, did the English Government defend the English citizen against the French?

(I) So it was said.

(H.) Then if the French had invaded England and conquered it, they would not have allowed the English workmen to live well?

(I, laughing) As far as I can make out, the English masters of the English workmen saw to that: they took from their workmen as much of their livelihood as they dared, because they wanted it for themselves.

(H.) But if the French had conquered, would they not have taken more still from the English workmen?

(I) I do not think so; for in that case the English workmen would have died of starvation; and then the French conquest would have ruined the French, just as if the English horses and cattle had died of underfeeding. So that after all, the English workmen would have been no worse off for the conquest: their French masters could have got no more from them than their English masters did.

(H.) This is true; and we may admit that the pretensions of the government to defend the poor (i.e., the useful) people against other countries come to nothing. But that is but natural; for we have seen already that it was the function of government to protect the rich against the poor. But did not the government defend its rich men against other nations?

(I) I do not remember to have heard that the rich needed defence; because it is said that even when two nations were at war, the rich men of each nation gambled with each other pretty much as usual, and even sold each other weapons wherewith to kill their own countrymen.

(H.) In short, it comes to this, that whereas the so-called government of protection of property by means of the law-courts meant destruction of wealth, this defence of the citizens of one country against those of another country by means of war or the threat of war meant pretty much the same thing.

(I) I cannot deny it.

(H.) Therefore the government really existed for the destruction of wealth?

(I) So it seems. And yet—

(H.) Yet what?

(I) There were many rich people in those times.

(H.) You see the consequences of that fact?

(I) I think I do. But tell me out what they were.

(H.) If the government habitually destroyed wealth, the country must have been poor?

(I) Yes, certainly.

(H.) Yet amidst this poverty the persons for the sake of whom the government existed insisted on being rich whatever might happen?

(I) So it was.

(H.) What must happen if in a poor country some people insist on being rich at the expense of the others?

(I) Unutterable poverty for the others. All this misery, then, was caused by the destructive government of which we have been speaking?

(H.) Nay, it would be incorrect to say so. The government itself was but the necessary result of the careless, aimless tyranny of the times; it was but the machinery of tyranny. Now tyranny has come to an end, and we no longer need such machinery; we could not possibly use it since we are free. Therefore in your sense of the word we have no government. Do you understand this now?

(I) Yes, I do. But I will ask you some more questions as to how you as free men manage your affairs.

(H.) With all my heart. Ask away.

PRIMITIVE COMMUNISM.¹

I.

"THE man who first enclosed a piece of land and said, this is mine, and found people simple enough to believe him, was the real founder of civil society," runs the much discussed phrase of the Discours sur l'inégalité. Rousseau, therefore, supposes that formerly land was held in common; Hobbes, who, in England and France has exerted so powerful an influence on the formation of modern ideas had previously made the same supposition.

"Nature hath given to each of us an equal right to all things," says Hobbes in De Cive. "In a state of nature every man has a right to do and to take whatsoever he pleases, whence the common saying that Nature has given all things to all men, and whence it follows that in a state of nature utility is the rule of right."

This quotation will show Mr. Huxley that Rousseau cannot be charged with having reintroduced into Europe the "State of Nature" of the Greek stoics, whose philosophical doctrine was a protest against the social condition of the age.

The primitive communism of Hobbes and Rousseau was a mental conviction which, probably, they could not have based on any fact duly established. Mr. Huxley, who is not to be put off with mental convictions, exclaims: "The confident assertions that the land was originally held in common by the whole nation are singularly ill-founded." And with equal confidence he asserts that: "Land was held as private or several property, and not as the property of the public or general body of the nation."

Let us see which of the two, the "ignorant" Rousseau or the learned Professor, is in the right; and, in order to that, we must address ourselves to the men who have been in contact with savages and barbarians.

Mr. Huxley, doubtless, has in his library the De Bello Gallico. Let him open it at Book VI. § 22, and he will read: "No German possesses enclosed fields of any extent, but the magistrates and the chief distribute the fields to the clans and families who live in common, and the year following compel them to go and settle elsewhere." One of the objects of this custom was "to uphold in the people the sense of equality, since every man sees his resources equal to those of the most powerful." It follows that amongst the Germans known to Cæsar the land was the common property of the entire nation. Elphinstone observed among the Afghan tribes, whom he had to combat, the same mode of possession of the land by the nation at large, and its periodical distribution among the clans and families composing the nation.² Wherever one has been able to go back to the origin, one has met with common property in land.

Morgan in his last and remarkable work on The Houses and House Life of the American Aborigines (1881), has collected a large number of examples of this primitive communism. He reproduces the following curious passage by the celebrated Moravian missionary, Heckewelder, who lived with the Indians from 1771 to 1786, and understood their languages:—"The Indians think that the Great Spirit has made the earth, and all that it contains, for the common good of mankind; when he stocked the country and gave them plenty of game, it was not for the good of a few, but of all. Everything is given in common to the sons of men. Whatever liveth on the land, whatever groweth out of the earth, and all that is in the rivers and waters, was given jointly to all, and every one is entitled to his share. Hospitality with them is not a virtue, but a strict duty. . . . They would lie down on an empty stomach rather than have it laid to their charge that they had neglected their duty by not satisfying the wants of the stranger, the sick or the needy . . . because they have a common right to be helped out of the common stock; for if the meat they have been served with was taken from the wood, it was common to all before the hunter took it: if corn and vegetables, it had grown out of the common ground, yet not by the power of man, but by that of the Great Spirit."

G. Catlin who during eight years journeyed among the savage tribes of North America, relates that "every man, woman, or child in Indian communities is allowed to enter any one's lodge, and even that of the chief of the nation, and eat when they are hungry. . . . Even so can the poorest and most worthless drop of the nation, if he is too lazy to supply himself or to hunt, he can walk into any lodge, and every one will share with him as long as there is anything to eat. He, however, who thus begs when he is able to hunt pays dear for his meat, for he is stigmatized with the disgraceful epithet of poltroon or beggar." These communistic practices, which were once general, were maintained in Lacedæmonia long after the Spartans had issued out of barbarism.

Morgan, who has specially studied the customs of the Iroquois, among whom he dwelt, tells us that they cultivated their fields in common and divided the crops, the game, and fish among the families of the clans. Frequently the division was made per every female head; but the provisions were only, so to speak, given them in keeping, for they were always at the disposal of the community.

The facts collected and related by Cæsar, Elphinstone and Morgan, whose intelligence and powers of observation nobody will think of disputing, confirm the supposition of Rousseau and of Hobbes, which Professor Huxley ridicules in so superior a way. The land has been held in common by the familiar clans of savage nations, and each and all had a right to the provisions, as long as they lasted, procured by the common labour of all the clans.

II.

The primitive communism of the land and its produce established perfect social and political equality among all the members of a nation. The war-chief, on returning to his village loses his power: "he is obeyed by no children save his own," says Volney, and the authority possessed by the magistrate is a purely moral one; chiefs and magistrates were elected by universal suffrage. The woman frequently took a part in the vote, and in deliberations of the council. "The Germans," says Tacitus, "attributed a sacred and prophetic character to them—sanctum aliquid et providum." But it was in the distribution of the food at meals that this equality manifested itself. The men and women ate apart. Every Iroquois received from the kettle his portion in a wooden bowl, and as there were neither chairs nor tables in their long houses, he ate his food where he pleased. The women and children took their meals after the men. The syssities, the common repasts of Greece, are simply a reproduction of those of the Iroquois described by Morgan.

Heraclides of Pontus, the disciple of Plato, has preserved for us a description of the communistic repasts of Creta, where the primitive manners prevailed during a long period of time. At the andreies (repasts of men) every adult citizen received an equal share, except the Archon, member of the council of the ancients (geronia), who received a fourfold portion—one in his quality of simple citizen, another in that of president of the table, and two additional portions for the care of the hall and furniture. All the tables were under the supervision of a matriarch, who distributed the food and ostensibly set aside the choicest bits for the men who had distinguished themselves in the council or on the battlefield. Strangers were served first, even before the archon. A vessel with wine and water was handed round from guest to guest; at the end of the repast it was replenished. Heraclides mentions common repasts of the men only, but Hoeck assumes that in the Dorian cities there were also repasts of women and children. Our knowledge of the constant separation of the sexes among savages and barbarians renders probable the assumption of the learned historian of Creta. Plutarch informs us that at these common repasts no one person was considered as superior to the other, wherefore he styles them aristocratic assemblies (sunedria aristokratika). The persons who sat down at the same table were probably members of the same family. In Sparta the members of a syssitia were formed into corresponding military divisions, and fought together. Savages and barbarians, accustomed at all times to act in common, in battle always range themselves according to families, clans and tribes.

It was of such imperative necessity that every member of the clan should get his share of the aliments, that in the Greek language the word moira, which signifies the portion of a guest at a repast, came to signify Destiny, the supreme Goddess to whom men and gods are alike submitted and who deals out to everyone his portion of existence, just as the matriarch of the Cretan syssitia apportioned to each guest his share of food. It should be remarked that in Greek mythology Destiny is personified by women—Moira, Aissa, and the Keres—and that their names signify the portion to which each person is entitled in the division of victuals or spoils.

Primitive Communism, when all men have equal shares, so profoundly implants the sentiment of equality in the breast of the savage, that he cannot conceive that a member of his tribe should be better treated than himself in any way. Darwin relates that having given to a Fuegian savage a woollen blanket, whose qualities he appeared to appreciate, he was surprised to see him tear up the same into strips of equal length and breadth and distribute them to his comrades. The Fuegian was no doubt prompted to this action, which appeared absurd, by a desire to satisfy his own and his companions' sentiment of equality.

In any case, men proceeded after an analogous fashion when they first divided the land. The savage, not knowing how to measure surfaces, divided the fields into narrow strips of equal length and breadth [the agrarian measure of the primitive Romans, the actus simplex, was 120 feet long by 4 wide]. The most difficult part of the operation, on account of the irregularities of the ground, consisted in obtaining a straight line, limiting these strips of land of rectangular shape. The straight line alone could satisfy him, and so powerfully was he impressed thereby that the straight line ultimately became the symbol of what was Just; in the same way that the matriarch who distributed the portions at the Greek syssities came to personify Destiny. In the European languages, and probably in the languages of all the peoples who have arrived at collective and private property, one and the same word serves to designate what is in a straight line and what is Just—Right.

It was an inspiration of genius that led Rousseau to declare "the first man who, having enclosed a piece of ground, bethought him of saying, this is mine, was the real founder of civil society." Rare, indeed, are the thinkers whose piercing insight has enabled them to penetrate so far into the obscure past.

Men lived in society prior to the constitution of property; but it is from the time of the division of the common lands into familiar or collective, and subsequently into, private, property, that customs were consolidated and converted into civil laws. The Greek genius made of Demeter, the antique goddess of the Earth, the goddess of Agriculture and Law. As the earliest division of land occurred amongst the men not yet differentiated by social inequalities, they must have been presided over by a perfect spirit of equality; and this spirit recurs in the primitive customs and savage and barbarous laws regulating these divisions. Hence when Aristotle sought for the origin of the political constitution, he found it in Equality. "The city," he says, "is simply an association of beings who are equal and seek in common a happy and easy life. The state being an association of equal beings . . . it is just that the share of power and obedience allotted to each be perfectly equal; it is precisely this that the law secures." (Politics. Book IV. ch. vii. § 2; and Book III. ch. xi. §§ 2 & 3; French edition, St. Hilaire, 1848.) The legists of the Antonine era proclaimed this equality in the origin of societies when they formulated their judicial axiom: *Omnes homines natura equales sunt.*¹ (Nature hath made all men equal.)

It is only in the course of historic development that the association of equals introduced into their community artisans, slaves and serfs, and that the equals began to differ from one another in consequence, first, of the inequality of their possessions; and afterwards, of the inequality of their political rights and duties.

The inequality which Professor Huxley proclaims an absolute principle is a phenomenon of the development of history, and susceptible, therefore, of evolution in one sense or the other; certain economic conditions, such as slavery, magnify it, others tend to lessen it. In our society the hazards of speculation, and of industrial and commercial competition, overthrow the most solid fortunes and level all social positions. Voltaire, who had been impressed by this characteristic feature of modern society, wrote humorously: "People have exaggerated social inequality. Everybody, at the bottom of his heart, is justified in considering himself as the equal of other men: it does not follow that the cook of a Cardinal may order his master to cook his dinner for him. The cook may say: 'I am as good a man as my master, and like him came into the world crying; we both of us perform the same animal functions. If the Turks take Rome, and if I turn cardinal, and my master becomes a cook, I will take him into my service.' The whole of this speech is just and reasonable, but as long as the Great Turk has not got hold of Rome, the cook must do his duty, or all human society is perverted." Commercial failures and stock exchange swindlings take the place of the Great Turk.

The tendency to equality is one of the forces in the evolution of modern society; it has already imposed universal suffrage—one of the Professor's bugbears—which establishes political equality in law, if not in fact. Economical equality will follow in good time.

Mr. Huxley charges Rousseau with ignorance. It is true that this son of a clockmaker, with but scant means of acquiring knowledge in the course of a sickly, needy, and chequered existence, was often enough constrained to make up for his want of knowledge by the imaginative and inductive power of his genius. But what shall we say of the learned professor, who, with every means of instruction, and with ample leisure at his command, treats with such confident assurance of the manners and customs of primitive societies, only just beginning to be studied in Rousseau's time, and who would seem to ignore the works of Morgan and Bachofen?

PAUL LAFARGUE.

STRIKE OF CARPENTERS AT CHICAGO.—Between five and six thousand carpenters of Chicago are out on strike. They demand an eight hours day, and forty cents. (1s. 8d.) per hour. The present rate of pay is thirty-five cents an hour, and they work ten hours a day. Building operations are practically suspended throughout the city.

REVOLUTIONARY PREACHING.—It is quite time that all the struggling nationalities should clearly understand that freemen have no sympathy with men who do nothing but howl and shriek in their fetters. Liberty is a serious game to be played out, as the Greek told the Persian, with knives and hatchets, and not with drawled epigrams and soft petitions. We may prate among us of moral courage and moral force, but we have also physical courage and physical force kept ready for use.—Times.

A ONE-SIDED GAME.—A Man with a Shot-gun said to a Bird: "It is all nonsense, you know, about shooting being a cruel sport. I put my skill against your cunning—that is all there is of it. It is a fair game." "True," said the Bird, "but I don't wish to play." "Why not?" enquired the Man with a Shot-gun. "The game," the Bird replied, "is fair, as you say; the chances are about even; but consider the stake. I am in it for you, but what is there in it for me?" Not being prepared with an answer to the question, the Man with a Shot-gun sagaciously removed the propounder. There is a moral in this somewhere when you come to think of it.

¹ The Spartans possessing full rights of citizenship were called oi omoioi—the equals. All those who had lost their lands and could not contribute towards the expenses of the syssities, were deprived of their rights and were classed, like the artisans, among the upomeiones—the inferiors. The omoi were the ruling class, and filled all public offices with the exception of the Ephorality.

DON QUIXOTE.

(By EUGENE POTTIER. Translated by LAURA LAFARGUE.)

MEETING a chain of galley-slaves,
Spain's hero, that all danger braves,
Don Quixote brandisheth his spear!
Sancho Panza quakes with fear!
The mad don makes the guards to flee
And sets the shackled prisoners free.
"Sir Knight," quoth Sancho, "spare your pains,
And leave the galley-slave his chains!"

"Brother Sancho, my duty I do,
This labourer is a convict too,
For battered tools the workers be,
Handled by a vile salary;
Flung by their bowel-less master, gold,
To the lumber-heap when broken and old."
"Sir Knight," quoth Sancho, "spare your pains,
And leave the galley-slave his chains!"

"Sancho, set free and save I must
This boy-convict from college-dust,
This duncie on musty learning fed
That pedants cram into his head,
Whose mind, with ne'er a free out-look,
Is but an ink-stained copy-book."
"Sir Knight," quoth Sancho, "spare your pains,
And leave the galley-slave his chains!"

"Ho! from the barracks come thou forth,
Thou soldier-slave of little worth!
A cartridge-box thou hast for brains,
A blunderbuss for conscience reigns.
Thou to a cannibal's trade art sold,
And art cast in a bullet-mould!"
"Sir Knight," quoth Sancho, "spare your pains,
And leave the galley-slave his chains!"

"Thou convict of the sacristy,
Throw off the cowl that stifles thee!
The cloister-walls in thee have bred
The mildew of a faith long dead,
Despite the war that sick Rome wages
For the scrofulous Middle Ages."
"Sir Knight," quoth Sancho, "spare your pains,
And leave the galley-slave his chains!"

"Arise, unhappy woman, thou,
Peerless Dulcinea, that, laid low,
Dost languish in the giants' hands
And miscreant enchanters' bands!
The law that wrongs thee, heeds thee not,
Follow thy heart and choose thy lot."
"Sir Knight," quoth Sancho, "spare your pains,
And leave the galley-slave his chains!"

O flower of chivalry!
Then said I in my reverie,
Confront these giants dire,
Despite thy caitiff squire;
For till thy sword shall set us free,
And end this human tragedy,
Will Sancho say: "Best spare your pains,
And leave the galley-slave his chains!"

If fools went not to market bad wares would not be sold.

The Michigan Labour Bureau shows that Detroit furniture-workers don't average 1 dollar a-day.

New York bricklayers have agreed to work the nine-hour day, and the pay will be 4 dols. 50 cents.

The Bible Echo, a pious paper, and the freethought Liberator are both printed at rat offices in Melbourne. Extremes meet.

Hundreds of miners in the Lackawanna Valley (Pa.) didn't make 8 dollars in February. One man was paid 2 cents for the month.

The labour question resolves itself into this: Shall the efforts of mankind be directed to the amassing of fortunes, or to the building up of true manhood and womanhood?—Knights of Labour Journal.

At Deepwater (Mo.) a reduction from 1 dollar to 75 cents for first-class coal per ton has been forced upon the miners. For second-class they receive only 25 cents per ton. Things are almost at starvation point, and there are crowds of idle men.

The shearers' strike on Meteor Downs, Queensland, is not settled (Feb. 15) the manager refusing to pay union rates to the labourers. The shearers' labourers and permanent station hands have gone out to a man, and are camped nine miles from Springsure.

Those Southern Congressmen who cannot endure to sit at table with a coloured man are not at all to be endorsed on the grounds of reason or of Christianity, and yet candour compels one to admit that the North is not at all in a position to cast stones at them upon the subject.—Boston Herald.

A Charters Tower paper says that "every sane man must know that the distinction between Radical and Republican is very wide." Not so wide, after all; the former includes the latter. A Republican is not necessarily a Radical, but a true Radical is of necessity a Republican, if he be not a Socialist.—Sydney Bulletin.

The New York shirt-makers on strike have joined hands with the cloak-makers also on strike, and will now fight for shorter hours and more pay together. Seven of the largest shirt contractors have conceded the terms of the men, and the smaller ones are expected to follow suit. The pants-makers are also making a demand for ten hours a-day and the privilege of forming a union.

THE COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d.

Subscribers who receive a RED WRAPPER are thereby reminded that their subscriptions have expired and must be renewed immediately if they wish to continue to receive COMMONWEAL.

SPECIAL RECRUIT SUBSCRIPTIONS.—To aid in spreading our principles, the following largely reduced terms are offered to those who obtain new subscribers: Two new yearly subscriptions for British Islands, etc., 10s. 6d.;

emittances from abroad must be made by International Money Order.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SOCIALIST ARTIST.—Thanks for note and enclosure. We are always glad to have sketches, etc., but if for reproduction in the paper, they must be in strong line and as nearly as may be in outline.

NOTES ON NEWS.

I SUPPOSE it is natural that after each wretched little by-election there should be a howl of triumph from one of the political parties, and of rage from the other, together with all kinds of arguments and explanations as to the meaning or non-meaning of the victory or defeat.

The Tzar has "fallen ill" it seems; four or five times over has the report been "confirmed" and "contradicted," so there must be something in it. Does it mean that another attempt at executing him has nearly succeeded? Or is it only the rage and fear and worry caused by all the troubles that he sees rising round him or threatening in the near future?

Not that they were really "patriotic" or Jingo, but they hated despotism so much that they hailed with joy the chance of bringing the "Colossus of the North" to his knees. Was it not their chance of bringing about the destruction of that great stronghold of tyranny, that storehouse of reaction, the Russian Empire.

Nor would there be now; yet, if war against Russia were to break out, the warm hopes of all of us would go on the side of her enemy. For who knows how many prison doors some shattering reverse of her arms might not open? even, it may be, giving a chance for a Siberian revolt, that would for ever end the myriad horrors of that hell upon earth.

But it looks now as though the rising would not wait for war, but would begin right off. If it does, there will be little chance of giving aid from outside. But one thing can and will be done, if any other government were to go to the aid of the Russian in repelling the arisen people, it would have to be attacked at home, and given enough to do to occupy its attention for the time being.

An artist friend writes to us as follows:

"The Royal Academy was instituted to enable very poor artists to expose their pictures for sale, and so bring their name and works before the public, by that means doing away with the cruel blackmail of the picture dealer. Now it is an aristocratic Tory club. A poor artist could sooner get through the eye of the proverbial needle than into it. Give us poor artists a word of hope and you will gain many hundreds of believers, as each studio is a little world in itself."

We do not quite see how the Royal Academy can be other than it is under present conditions. Bourgeois society moulds everything after its own image, and what is the Academy or art itself that they should escape? The only word of hope we have for artists is the same that we have for any one else.

All the same, it is not easy to refrain from damning the Academy up hill and down dale for the worst collection of snobs, flunkeys, and self-seekers that the world has yet seen. The way in which they shut out men of any independence until they are either strong enough to force their way in or weak enough to become "respectable," should make young or poor artists see that there is nothing to be hoped from these monopolists except for those who toady them.

Is there going to be a protest made in the name of English labour against the glorification of "the Christian pioneer," as suggested by a writer in our last issue? Where is the Metropolitan Radical Federation? Will they take it up? All the Radicals and Socialists of London would turn out against the representative of the worst form of "imperial" piracy, and the Irish would join to a man against the English policy of grab which is behind him.

Murder at Knutsford! dreadful murder! Dreadful enough this time, certainly; only it has been committed practically by the British nation, and therefore does not shock the moral sense of comfortable easy-going people, who think, probably, that it does not much matter to them, since they are never likely to come into the clutches of the Judge and the Home Secretary. But to those who have learned to feel the burden of collective responsibility, these legal murders are far worse than any of those homicides caused by passion or misery, which our lawyer-rulers put side by side with the calculated commercial slayings of such men as Palmer. The peculiar baseness of Matthew's "compromise" in this case is in fact swallowed up by the shame which a person, not absolutely stupified by the cowardly convention of a "society" founded on wrong-doing, feels at such murders as those authorised by law at Knutsford and Worcester. The only immediate practical remedy for such horrors is that the juries should in such cases return no more than a verdict of manslaughter.

THE TACTICS OF ANTI-SOCIALISTS.

THE lectures on Socialism which Professor Flint delivered some years ago in Edinburgh, and which were made the subject of a few critical remarks in these columns at the time, are being published in Good Words. The opening paper, which appears in the March number, deals with the definition of Socialism and is a rather puzzling production.

Although it is admitted by the author in his first paragraph that there are some good and true elements in Socialism, the definition he gives a few lines further on does not help us to see what these are. He defines Socialism as "any theory of social organisation which sacrifices the legitimate liberty of individuals to the will and interests of the community"! What he understands by this is made but little clearer by his statement, that he uses the word "Socialism" to denote only social doctrines or proposals which he thinks he may safely undertake to prove require such a sacrifice of the individual to society as society is not entitled to exact. His definition, he cordially but rather unnecessarily remarks, will not commend itself to Socialists. A definition to satisfy both Socialists and their opponents he even deems it unreasonable to ask for, since "the whole controversy has for end to determine whether the relevant facts—the doctrines, proposals, and practices of what avows itself to be and is generally called Socialism—warrant its being defined as something essentially good or as something essentially bad," and since "the adherents and the opponents of Socialism must necessarily define it in contrary ways."

But is that which he mentions, as having to be attained by means of the controversy, in its nature a definition? Is it not rather a judgment as to the morality and expediency of Socialism! And therefore, should not this judgment, or "definition"—to use the word in the Flintian sense—find its proper place at the end of the articles, rather than at the beginning?

What is required at the outset of such a discussion is agreement as to what "the doctrines, proposals, and practices" are. And what these are can be easily ascertained from the writings and teachings of those who are recognised by Socialists as the exponents of their views. This information obtained, the arguments for and against the acceptance of them have then to be considered. It is, of course, convenient for our opponents to urge that among Socialists the differences of opinion are so great as to make it almost impossible to discover the principles they hold in common. There are, it is true, several schools of Socialism; but the differences between them, when closely examined, are found to be of no great importance. As a matter of fact, all Socialists are agreed on the main points, which are precisely those which anti-Socialists need concern themselves with. Every one of us—from the extremest Anarchist to the mildest Social-Democrat—condemn, for instance, rent, interest, and profit as iniquitous; we condemn the present competitive system as wasteful of human life and happiness; and we of course maintain that it is possible, were people to set their minds to it, to establish a social system which, while giving every individual his true and legitimate freedom, would obviate the evils of competition, prevent the present enormous waste of labour-force, and result in the equitable distribution of wealth, thereby giving us the material conditions of a full and happy life for everyone.

Let Professor Flint, then, consider the essential points of Socialism; and, since he is an anti-Socialist, let him take especial care to defend—which he did not attempt to do in his lectures—on both ethical and economical grounds, the confiscation by some men of the products of other men's labour under the name of rent, interest, and profit. This is at least one thing he must do, if he wishes to make out his case against Socialism and to avoid the appearance of desiring to evade the real issues.

By going out of the way to give, contrary to all the laws of logic, a perfectly arbitrary and quite unjustifiable definition of the term Socialism, one which cannot but tend to bring the doctrines we teach into disrepute, and rouse prejudice against them among the unthinking readers of his articles, Professor Flint sorely tempts us to regard him as an opponent lacking fairness and honourableness. Conscious that he is giving us good reason for displeasure and complaint, he endeavours to justify the course he takes, but, by virtue of his paltry and untenable excuses, unfortunately succeeds only in aggravating his offence. He begs us to observe carefully that he uses the word Socialism in a peculiar sense, and that he does not intend to reason from his "definition" as if it were absolutely true. He entitles his articles Socialism. May we ask whether he means to discourse on the anti-social doctrines which he chooses to regard as Socialism, or on the doctrines of "what avows itself to be and is generally called Socialism"? If the former, how can he possibly prevent ordinary mortals mistaking them for the latter? And if the latter, of what use is his "definition"? To determine, he gravely says, whether any Socialistic system ("so-called," he cautiously adds) is Socialistic or not. Ostensibly a harmless use, but in view of the purely subjective origin of the "definition," really a ludicrously improper one. The funny thing is, that if we ever succeed in converting Professor Flint—he still persisting in his method, which in spite of its pretensions is a most unscientific one, to say the least of it—he will inform us that we are not and never have been Socialists at all.

To conclude, however. Taken all in all, the learned Professor's article is quite a curiosity of anti-Socialist literature, and a wonderful product of the mysterious workings of the theological mind.

THE ORDER OF THE GALLOWS.

At the beginning of the Christian era, the common method of executing criminals and malefactors was by crucifixion. The cross was to the Romans and the Jews of that time what the gallows is to the Christians of the nineteenth century, the instrument for carrying out the sternest decrees of the law; a symbol of infamy and shame. Crucifixion of a malefactor was supposed to cover his name for ever with ignominy. After the crucifixion of the reformer Jesus, his followers underwent dreadful persecutions. They were hunted like wild beasts from one country to another, forced to take refuge in caves, in mountain fastnesses, anywhere to escape their blood-thirsty tormentors. Partly to aid them in identifying one another, but chiefly from adoration of their prophet and master—the founder of their sect—the Christians made small crosses of wood, of bronze, of stone, any material that was found available for the purpose, and hang them about their necks. They made larger crosses and set them up in their secret meeting-places, and gathered together there, and worshipped Jehovah and him who had died to fulfil the law. As the centuries wore on, the cross became a mighty and potent emblem. Millions of people worshipped under its shade the being, now become a god, whose pure life and infamous death had glorified it. Long and dreadful wars were waged in its name, and in the name of the great reformer. To-day three hundred million people recognise in this emblem the grandest and holiest symbol in the world.

Three short years since, four other reformers were put to death by the State, their only crime a passionate hatred of injustice and an absorbing love for humanity. The Golgotha of this modern execution was Chicago, accused now for evermore. The instrument of death a gallows, used in this day of the Christian's Lord to strangle murderers. They died as did the martyrs of old, heroically, triumphantly, crying out their warnings of the wrath to come, pleading for the right of speech, shouting their devotion to their principles. The Cause for which they died grows and gathers volume with amazing swiftness. A few short years since its adherents were few in number. They suffered and still suffer persecution and ignominy. Soon it will number its devotees by the hundreds of thousands, and then by millions. Those who have been derided and maligned will be exalted. In a few years the gallows as an instrument of death will be known no more. That it may not be forgotten, or remembered only with shame and humiliation, let us preserve it as a memento of our time of travail and suffering. Coming millions of Socialists will require an emblem to perpetuate the memory of November 11, 1887. What emblem can be suggested more in keeping with the circumstances than the gallows? Let us then make gallows of available substances, and wear them upon our persons in commemoration of the murder of our martyrs. Not in a spirit of worship or adoration—those who come after us will require no gods—but as a badge of our fealty to the principles for which they died. Some of us here in Chicago have already taken the initiation, and wear as badges a miniature gallows with a noose hanging from the cross-beam. Comrades all over the world should do likewise. Let us wear these badges openly, so that the wearers may be known of men. Let them serve as an emblem of our devotion, and to bind us together more closely. Let those who wear this emblem be known to the world as a new Brotherhood—the Order of the Gallows.

FREE SPEECH IN REGENT'S PARK.

The park authorities have begun a very insidious attack on free speech in this park. During the last year they have gradually enclosed a large portion of the ground which up till now has been used for open-air meetings, on the pretext that the meetings prevent the grass from growing. The meetings are now restricted to a very small piece of land, where it is impossible they can be carried on properly; or else we can have a larger piece of ground which is a swamp the greater part of the year. Steps have recently been taken to resist these encroachments. Robert Harding has spoken on this enclosed land, and has been fined 5s. at the Marylebone Police-court. Pearson (Freedom Group) spoke there last Sunday, and had his name and address taken. A conference will shortly be held by members of the various bodies interested in the maintenance of free speech in this park. Members and friends are specially asked to turn up next Sunday.

"What is gotten over the devil's back is spent under his belly," i.e., what is got by extortion or oppression is lost by riot and luxury.

Dr. Johnson's improviso translation of a distich made on the Duke of Modena's running away from the comet in 1742 or '43—

"If at your coming princes disappear, Comets, come every day—and stay a year!"

"If thou be hungry, I am angry, let us go fight. The belly hath no ears. "And," says Ray, "nothing makes the vulgar more untractable, fierce, and seditious than scarcity and hunger. There is some reason the belly should have no ears, words will not fill it."

"By a newly-invented machine," says the Portland Argus, "now in operation in the new mill at Manchester, N.H., one girl is able to sew on three thousand buttons a-day." And yet we'll wager that she doesn't get any higher pay for three thousand buttons than she used to get for three hundred. There's the whole labour problem in a nut-shell. Civilisation enormously multiplies the productive power of labour, but, somehow or other, the benefit of the increased production does not go to labour.—Boston Globe.

Mr. Howells, in his new novel, "A Hazard of New Fortunes," which is full of radical utterances on the social question, forcibly says: "Not the most gifted man that ever lived in the practice of any art or science and paid at the highest rate that exceptional genius could justly demand from those who have worked for their money, could ever earn a million dollars. It is the landlord and the merchant princes, the railroad kings and the coal barons (the oppressors, whom you instinctively give the titles of tyrants)—it is these that make the millions; but no man earns them." Mr. Howells is wrong in his concluding phrase. Somebody does earn them. The working men and women of the country, many of whom exist in the most abject poverty and lack the bare necessities of life, they earn the millions which the millionaires steal from them.—Journal of United Labour.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Strike in the Boot Trade.

Despite the statements of the masters, who have not hesitated at what some rude people call "barefaced lying," there can be no question that they are already practically beaten. Every first-class firm has already given in, and it is only the sweating Jewish firms that are now resisting. Those who know these people, and how very truthful they are when a question of "bishness" is concerned, will be able to appreciate at their full value the various "statements" which have appeared on their behalf in the capitalist press. These sweaters have gone in for some cunning ruses. Although good business men, they are not remarkable for "backbone," being slippery and eel-like in their nature. They have sent work to Ipswich, but the union has stopped that little game by sending certain instructions to the local branch of the union. Another enterprising person sent work out in biscuit tins, but the pickets were on the alert and sent it back again. So their cunning has not met with its usual success.

On Thursday April 3rd the men marched in a huge procession from the East to the West End, through Ludgate Hill and Fleet Street, completely blocking the traffic in these crowded thoroughfares. The procession was accompanied by a brass band, and several large banners were carried by the strikers, bearing these inscriptions—"Down with Sweating," "Boot-finishers' Strike, 1890—We want the abolition of the Sweater," "United we stand, divided we fall." Other banners bore the names of the Lasters and Boot-finishers societies. Afterwards a large and enthusiastic meeting was held in Hyde Park, at which a resolution was carried pledging the men to remain out till the masters had conceded their demands.

About 2,000 members of the union received strike pay last Saturday; 700 of the Jewish workmen were paid on Friday. A ways and means committee has been formed to relieve non-union strikers. It is expected that the rest of the masters will give in soon after the holidays, as the busiest season in the boot trade is between Easter and Whitsuntide.

The demonstration on Sunday was a grand success. The procession was nearly a mile long. It was announced at the meeting that 192 masters had given way. A resolution was passed pledging the men to continue the struggle, and appealing to the public for sympathy and financial support.

What is "a Narrow Margin of Profit"?

Some little time ago, when Mr. Bradlaugh denounced Cunninghame Graham as a dangerous person in the House of Commons, he made some pathetic references to "the narrow margin of profit" of the poor capitalist, and he specially enquired what would become of the wretched people who had invested their money in Lancashire cotton factories if Mr. Graham succeeded in his attempts to make an eight hour labour day the law of the land. Owing to competition from India, Mr. Bradlaugh pointed out that the narrow margin of profit is narrower still in their case, and such an innovation would land them in hopeless bankruptcy. A correspondent of the Labour Tribune furnishes us with some figures concerning this "narrow margin" which makes Mr. Bradlaugh's pathos rather amusing. Here they are; they represent the dividends of some of the chief firms in Lancashire:

The Crawford Co., Rochdale,	10 per cent. dividend.
" Arkwright Co., Rochdale,	15 " "
" Thornham Co., Royton,	10½ " "
" Central Mill, Oldham,	10 " "
" Star Co., Royton,	10 " "
" Shaw Co.,	8½ " "
" United Co., Oldham,	10 " "
" Gladstone Co., Failsworth,	10 " "

Here is a picture of misery to wring the heart of the stern Individualist, who can gaze unmoved on the sufferings of sweated workmen and starving outcasts, for he reflects that their misery is all their own fault, because they are lacking in "backbone." Why didn't they all start as popular "Freethought" orators, get into the House of Commons, and aspire to a seat on the Treasury Bench? Then if they made themselves generally useful as defenders of the rights of property, rich Liberal M.P.'s would send round the hat for them, so that they might continue their laudable exertions on behalf of the poor capitalist with his "narrow margin of profit." But if the unfortunate shareholders of the Lancashire cotton mills are to be pitied as reeling upon the verge of bankruptcy with a paltry 10 or 15 per cent. in their pockets, and as this is the narrowest of narrow margins, we should like to know what is Mr. Bradlaugh's notion of a "narrow margin"; 40 or 50 per cent.? If this is the case, we do not think that the Eight Hours Labour Day will send them all to the workhouse. And if it did so, we think we could bear it. Besides, it might have a good effect upon them; they would have a chance then, like Mark Tapley, of "coming out strong"—with a "backbone"!

The Lock-out of Bargemen and Brickmakers.

The masters still continue the lock-out, though there is intense suffering among the brickmakers. The strike has now lasted four weeks, and with every week the distress increases; hundreds of families have been deprived of their only means of subsistence through the cruelty of the masters. On Friday, April 5, a large demonstration was held, in which, probably for the first time in Kent, women took a prominent part. Several hundred women linked arm in arm, marched in procession in their holiday dress; the rest of the processionists, who were 5,000 strong, being bargemen and brickmakers, who were on terms of complete friendship despite the attempts of the masters to set the brickmakers against the bargemen by locking them out. A resolution was passed at the meeting that followed in favour of settling the dispute by arbitration.

Durham Miners.

The men are not satisfied with the 5 per cent. advance, and a large meeting has been held at Houghton-le-Spring, when nearly thirty collieries, employing 40,000 men, were represented, at which a resolution was unanimously passed demanding a further advance of 25 per cent. A resolution was also carried condemning the sanitary condition of many of the Durham mining villages and demanding better house accommodation. The sanitary condition of Durham mining villages is shameful. The men are forced to live in cottages which are as unhealthy and overcrowded as are many of the slums in our great towns. As many of these dens belong to mine-owners, a strike for better house accommodation would not be a bad move.

LITERARY NOTES.

'AN HONEST DOLLAR.' By E. Benjamin Andrews, president of Brown University. American Economic Association, November 1889. 50 pp. (vol. iv. No. 6. Baltimore: Guggenheimer, Weil, and Co.)

THE rising portent in the ranks of the learned for a couple of decades back has been the surprising strength and activity developed by the new shrine of Minerva in the Maryland metropolis. Its present horrible tongue-twisting and jaw-breaking appellation makes it caviare to the general, but it will doubtless eventually blossom into the sweet and sonorous style of "University of Baltimore." The earnest seeker after wisdom cares little for names, and many of the best brains of England, Germany, and France have already sought the banks of Chesapeake Bay for patronage and opportunity to develop their faculties. The ancient jogging Greco-Latin grinding-mills look on with dismay at the rise of this young rival. All knowledge is the field of Baltimore, and from its midst issues some of the best theses of modern research in social as well as natural science. This pamphlet of Mr. Andrews' is one of a valuable series, and is a good sample of the thoroughness in fashion at Baltimore. Not that the conclusions of the author are of any great value to the thoroughpaced social reformer. Far from it. It would be too much to expect a college president in these days of distorted shams to grasp the utter rottenness of our social foundation. But he honestly, if blindly, delves in the vast mazes of that important but misunderstood feature of the social problem, the Money Question. In his fifty pages he has gathered more important information than could often be gleaned from a whole library. The author struggles to find some universal scheme for keeping a stable unit of value, setting out with that proposition which every tyro appreciates, that a rise in value robs the creditor, while a fall robs the debtor. Mr. Andrews starts out with the proviso that "were money merely a medium of exchange, something to be spoken into being for each act of traffic and then annihilated, permanence in its worth could be dispensed with." He fails to see that this gives away the whole case. True money must always be worthless in itself. If it is given a value, its possessor has power of his fellow man, for such fictitious value is only kept up by the use of force. Hence come the power of the usurer, the profit-monger, and the rack-renting landlord. Mr. Andrews is at the head of the modern starched and iron-out Baptists' seat of learning. The proletarian predecessors of his sect, the Anabaptists of the sixteenth century, who stood against the rights of "property" in human labour from one end of Europe to the other, could teach our modern professor lessons in social truth.

HINTS TO HELPERS.

Of course you buy the Weal yourself, and pay for it; but you can also occasionally buy two copies and give one to a friend, or leave it in some public place.

If you get it from a newsagent, you can ask him to show it in his window or to display a contents-bill outside his shop.

You can have six sample copies sent post free to six different people for 7d., or three consecutive numbers to the same address for 4d.

You can ask your friends if they have seen it, and talk of what it contains.

You can send a copy for review to your local paper and in many other ways try to increase its publicity.

Above all, read it and get others to do so.

MEN have fought and prayed
As with one breath: their energies they've spent
In brutalising wars, where hellish strife
Could prompt each man to seek a brother's life.
Called civilised! far better had ye been
Like beasts that perish; then ye would have lived
And roved in harmony through wood and glen;
Nor would ye for the future then have grieved:
Or had ye fought, it would have been for food,
And not for creeds ye never understood.—Prize Poem.

Cours Weavers Strike Fund.—Already acknowledged:—£6 18s. 4d. D'Arcy W. Reeve, £10.

COURS FUND.—Comrade William Thompson, in sending his subscription, wrote as follows: I wish to subscribe to the English fund for the blanket-weavers' (Cours) strike, because I think it is so very important that workers in different countries should unite and make common cause. In one way it almost seems as if, in such matters, he gives twice who sends to another country. Of course, that theory might be carried too far; but I do think that it matters that these poor people at Cours, for instance, should know that it is not only their near neighbours, but also some foreigners, whom they know nothing of, who sympathise with them, and that they should feel that in fighting their own battle they are fighting the battle of workers everywhere.

To Help the Paper.—There are several ways in which you can help to spread the Weal. Ask your newsagent to try and sell it. Get those who don't care to buy it week by week to subscribe direct. Arrange for the posting of contents bills anywhere you can. Any number of other plans will suggest themselves if you think about it.

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

OFFICES: 24, GREAT QUEEN ST., LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

The Offices of the Socialist League will be open for the sale of Commonweal and all other Socialist publications from 8.30 a.m. to 9 p.m. every day except Sunday. The Secretary will be in attendance from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m. daily.

Branch Subscriptions Paid.—1888:—Oxford, to end of September.

1889:—Bradford and Hammersmith, to end of April. Norwich, Glasgow, and Yarmouth, to end of May. East London, to end of October. Mitcham, to end of November. St. Georges East, to end of December. 1890:—Manchester, to end of January. 'Commonweal' Branch, Leicester, and North London, to end of February. North Kensington, to end of April. Streatham, to end of December.

Propaganda Committee.—The Propaganda Committee meets on Tuesday, April 15, at 8.30 p.m. Special meeting; important business; all members of the League interested in the propaganda invited to attend.

Notice.—All letters on League business, except those intended for Editors of Commonweal, to be addressed to me. No other person is authorised to sign any official communication. FRANK KITZ, Secretary.

REPORTS.

EAST LONDON.—We held no meeting in Victoria Park owing to the demonstrations, but comrades turned up well to push literature, of which a considerable quantity was sold, including 30 Weals, 12 Freedoms, and 36 pamphlets.—McK.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—We held a good meeting at Latimer Road; speakers were Crouch, R. J. Lyne, and Mrs. Edwards; 12 Weals sold. In Hyde Park at 3.30, we also had a good meeting; speakers were R. J. Lyne, Crouch, Saint, and Davis; 2s. 11d. collected, and 29 Weals sold. We held a social evening at 8 p.m. in our rooms, Tochatiti in the chair; Crouch gave us "The Landlord's Prayer," followed by songs, assisted by members of the Hammersmith choir; R. J. Lyne gave a short speech on the work of the branch in the neighbourhood, followed by other songs and short speeches from Coulon (of Paris), Saint, and Maughan, altogether we spent a very enjoyable evening; 11 Commonweal sold, and 4s. 1½d. collected.

ABERDEEN.—At meeting on 6th comrade U. Cooper (Woodside) lectured on "Wasted Energy" to a still larger audience than the one of last week. A lively discussion was carried on at close of lecture.—L.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday, Joe Burgoyne and Glasier addressed a meeting on Jail Square, quite a number of the audience expressing their intention of becoming members of the League. At 5 o'clock, Tim Burgoyne addressed a good audience at Paisley Road Toll. In the evening a business meeting was held, when the branch resolved to contribute 5s. weekly to the support of Commonweal.

LEEDS.—On Sunday morning a good meeting held at Vicars Croft, addressed by Paylor and Samuels. In the afternoon another good meeting held, when Samuels debated Socialism with a Mr. Crewe. The discussion was lively and amusing. Commonweal sold out.

MANCHESTER.—We have held some good outdoor meetings here of late. On Monday 31st March Edward Carpenter lectured at the Club on "The present and Future Society." Meetings were held on Sunday at Philips Park and Stevenson Square—speakers Stockton, Barton, and W. K. Hall of Salford. In the evening, at the Club, W. K. Hall spoke on "Politics for Working Men." A good discussion followed; 2s. 9d. collected.

NORWICH.—Easter Sunday comrades Mowbray (London) and Darley addressed a large meeting in the afternoon. In the evening, a good open-air meeting held, when Mowbray took for his subject "Socialism v. Christianity." Large sale of Commonweal; good collections at both meetings. Monday morning Mowbray spoke at a large meeting convened by the local trade society of riveters and finishers, in support of the strike in London. A call for our comrade was made by the audience, notwithstanding the fact that the chairman, a so-called local Radical, Mr. Burgess, did not make any response to the call, but very coolly left the chair, followed by the society's leading lights, and leaving the platform to our comrade, who received an enthusiastic greeting and was given an attentive hearing.

YARMOUTH.—On Easter Sunday, in the morning, a large demonstration on Priory Plain, addressed by C. W. Mowbray (of London) on "Socialism v. Strikes." Mowbray was assisted by C. Kitchen of Hammersmith Branch S. L. A kind Christian lady asked Mowbray "why he didn't go to church?" and said it was people like Mowbray who were causing the discontent and strikes in the country. In the evening, on Colman's Granary Quay, comrade Kitchen addressed an attentive and large audience on "Socialism v. Class Monopoly." He was listened to with marked attention. Comrade Ruffold also spoke. On Monday, in the afternoon in the Market Place, the meeting was opened by Ruffold, followed by Mowbray with an address on "Socialism v. Political Action." 4s. 1d. collected; all the Commonweal sold, and good sale of literature.—J. H.

EDINBURGH—SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—Dempster of Alyth lectured to good audiences in the Meadows and in the Hall on "Socialism." He dealt with the land question, and palliative measures generally. In the hall, many questions were asked and answered, and a lively discussion ensued.

EDINBURGH—SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—Discussion of Fabian Essays Tuesday at 8 p.m., at 35 George IV. Bridge.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—All communications to be addressed to the Secretary, A. Clifton, 11 Hawksworth Street, Clarence Street.

CHelsea S.D.F., Co-operative Lecture Hall, 312 Kings Road, Chelsea.—Sunday April 13, at 8 p.m., G. Clifton, "Socialism and the Individual."

CLUB AUTOŌNOMIE, 6 Windmill Street, Tottenham Court Road, W.—Sunday April 13, at 8.30, Tom Pearson, "Communism v. Individualism."

St. CLEMENT'S CLUB, 84 Ironmonger Row, E.C.—M. W. F. Crowther (G.S.M.), "Clap-trap and its Influence." Sunday 13th, at 8.45.

NEW MANHOOD SUFFRAGE LEAGUE, "Three Doves," Berwick St., Soho, W.—Sunday April 13, at 7 p.m., Open-air meeting, Broad Street; 8 p.m., Committee meeting; 8.30, Address by J. D. Bouran, "Co-operation."

LIVERPOOL SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—On Sunday, April 13, William Morris will deliver two lectures in the Rodney Hall—subjects: 3 o'clock, "Development of Modern Society"; 7 o'clock, "The Social Outlook."

YARMOUTH.—Suitable premises have now been secured for the Socialist League Club at 56 Row, Market Place. Amongst its attractions will be a library, reading, boxing, and refreshment rooms. Friends who can assist, either with furniture, fittings, books, or funds, are earnestly invited to do so. The club is open every evening for members. Commonweal and Socialist League literature on sale.

INTERNATIONAL OR REVOLUTIONARY SOCIALISM.—As the study of Socialism from a revolutionary or international standpoint is absolutely necessary, it is intended by several friends to form a branch of the League. I have therefore to ask all those who are willing to join in forming such branch, and who are willing to help in propagating the principles of true Socialism, to communicate with me as early as possible.—J. SKETCHLEY, 165 Gibraltar Street, Sheffield.

There are but two possible solutions of the labour problem, either capital must own the labour or labour must own the capital. The first means chattel slavery; the second national co-operation. All attempts to settle the question which include the retention of the competitive system must, in the very nature of things, fail. The new wine cannot be kept in old bottles. The world must either advance into nationalism or recede into slavery.—Journal of United Labour.

"The labour problem," as understood by a good many magazinites, amateur political economists and dabblers in social science, is how to better the condition of the worker without interfering with the "rights" of the capitalist. No wonder many of them give it up in despair and declare it to be insoluble. It can't be done any more than you could protect society from burglars without interfering with the "right" of the burglar to get his living by plunder.—Journal of United Labour.

THE JUDGMENT OF THE CITY

AND OTHER POEMS AND VERSES.

By JOHN C. KENWORTHY.

Price, 2s. 6d.

FROM THE 'MANCHESTER EXAMINER.'

"It is not often that a book of verse from a new comer contains so large a proportion of really notable material. . . . The nature of the ethical burden of Mr. Kenworthy's volume may be inferred from the inscription, in which, after quoting the words 'Blessed are ye poor; for yours is the kingdom of God,' and 'Woe unto you that are rich, for ye have received your consolation,' he dedicates the book 'to those poor.' He is, in short, a poet of Christian Socialism. . . . 'The Judgment of the City' is a poem that is exceptionally rich, not only in stern moral fervour, but in sombre imaginative power—a Dantesque vision which, once read, haunts the memory and possesses it."

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

NOTES ON NEWS.

“He overtakes at last who tires not,” says an old proverb. In the face of a thousand failures and rebuffs, over a thousand apparently insurmountable barriers, seeing a multitude of men and women falling around us as we went, and many a trusted one dropping out of the ranks, sometimes to turn traitor; in spite of all dangers and discouragements we have kept on working for the Good Cause. Under all the strain and amid the trouble, we have held on our way unflinchingly; but it may be that we are become so inured to long-continued effort, that we do not fully realise how near we are to success. And now, in all truth, our reward would seem to be at hand. It may be only a false dawn this time, but the true dawn cannot be far behind. Nor is it easy to believe that it is not the real dawn. In every country the proletariat is stirring as it never stirred before; not even in the “Year of Revolutions” was there such a universal movement; never once has the feeling of international solidarity risen so high.

From Holy Russia, that mysterious land of terror, messages crowd fast upon one another, telling of this and that manifestation of the rising tide. From Germany we hear such news as this:

“A new Socialist song, with the refrain ‘Das sind die Arbeitsmänner,’ sung to the melody of the formerly prohibited Andreas Hofer song, is being widely sung in Berlin, and it is significant that soldiers and Socialists may be seen daily marching up and down the Tempelhofer Feld arm-in-arm singing the new Volkslied.”

France, Italy, Spain—every country in Europe sends cheering news of the activity and wakefulness of the workers. Even England, Conservative England, is moving more rapidly than her masters like, though more slowly than her neighbours.

“Labour Day,” May 1st, is drawing near, and already hearts are quickening at its approach. On the side of Labour it is looked forward to as what it is, a great manifestation of the solidarity of the workers of the world. On the side of the rulers it is looked upon with dread, resentment, and distrust. Right round the globe that day will fly the warm and fraternal greetings of men, who, a few short years ago, were ready and willing to fly at one another’s throats, but who are now learning to combine for mutual benefit. If one could only stand aloof in space a little, and see the earth revolve under one’s feet that day! As country after country came into sight, one would see the armies of Labour, marshalled under many flags, it is true, but with the red flag over all. Then, as that mighty panorama unfolded itself, one would realise that in all the history of the world there has not been such a mass of men moved with one object before.

In the very height of the Crusades there were fewer eyes turned toward Palestine than there are now toward our latter-day Land of Promise; the armies of Alexander, Xerxes, Napoleon, and all the conquerors who have led vast armies to victory, sink into utter insignificance when compared with the Army of Labour as it is to-day. Yet there are millions of the lukewarm and half-converted who cannot be counted yet, although they are being forced into the ranks. And what is to be done with this host? Is it to be led on to victory? Or be turned aside from attacking its enemies to pick shells upon the seashore?

It will be to our eternal disgrace, we Revolutionary Socialists, if this great occasion should be so belittled and vulgarised, by being taken hold of to promote catchpenny palliatives or to afford an opportunity for parliamentary place-hunting and political chicanery, that its true meaning will be overlooked. We must exert ourselves to the utmost to keep it from this degradation, and to press forward its true end and aim, the celebration of the international solidarity of Labour.

Not that we are or need be antagonistic to the demand for an eight-hour day, which has been to a certain extent mixed up with the larger question. We antagonise no amelioration of the workers’ position which can be wrought by themselves without danger to their ultimate and speedy emancipation. But we do and must oppose and explode the specious promises of those who would persuade the workers to distrust their own strength and to rely upon anybody, emperor or M.P., who is outside their ranks and enrolled among their enemies; to “sell the sow and buy bacon,” surrender their own power and right of action in return for “gifts” which they might readily and more effectively take for themselves.

I notice that even in the discussion by the London Trades Council on Thursday of the Chamber of Commerce “conciliation” proposals, one of the delegates pointed out that the power of combination under the Trades Union Act was already in danger through parliamentary action. The representatives of the (rich) people will be only too apt to ask: “If you want us to do everything for you, why should you retain power to do anything for yourselves?”

By the way, that same discussion was in itself a sign of the times. Remembering what the London Trades Council was, and to a certain extent still is, how do the following speeches strike you?

Mr. Caiger (Cigar-makers’ Society) said the whole scheme [that of a permanent Board of Conciliation equally composed of capitalists and workmen] was fraught with danger to workmen. If they accepted this scheme they would be playing into the hands of the employers by giving them information they should not possess, and they would be undermining their trade organisations. Boards of conciliation had hitherto been failures, as witness the strikes of the miners, whose cases were always compromised out of existence. Mr. McBean (Compositors) opposed the scheme. Chambers of Commerce had failed to settle the dockers’ dispute in Liverpool, and it would be the same in London. Mr. Marks (Compositors) asked if they were to go cap in hand to the employers’ board of conciliation for an advance of 5 per cent. in their wages. They should like to see the employers’ profits before they submitted to the judgment of the boards of conciliation. Mr. Griffiths (Silver Plate Polishers) believed the scheme was the result of capitalist fear of the organisation of the workmen. The proposal simply meant to break up the trades unions. Mr. Left (Bricklayers) said he never knew a board of conciliation give the benefit of the doubt to the workmen in a dispute.

The scheme was unanimously rejected.

To think of that lunch in the servants’ pantry at Sandringham!
S.

The continental workers are going to show in an imposing manner their growing sense of international unity by making the first of May a general Holiday of Labour and a demonstration in favour of an eight hours’ working day. There is to be no manual work of any kind on that day, and the trades have agreed to go out in the open country for a regular feast, and to leave all the exploiters severely to themselves. The enthusiasm evoked by this idea is so great in Berlin and Vienna that at the headquarters of the Socialist party fears are entertained lest the zeal of the workers may overstep the bounds of discretion and give the barrack governments on the Spree and Danube the much desired pretext for a general massacre of the people. But I think that those who profess to be Socialists may be depended on to know what they are about, and that beyond a scuffle here and there the grand holiday demonstration will come off a success and with flying colours.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. XII.—CONCERNING THE ARRANGEMENT OF LIFE.

“WELL,” I said, “about those ‘arrangements’ which you spoke of as taking the place of government, could you give me any account of them?”

“Neighbour,” he said, “although we have simplified our lives a great deal from what they were, and got rid of many conventionalities and many sham wants, which used to give our forefathers much trouble, yet our life is too complex for me to tell you in detail by means of words how it is arranged; you must find that out by living amongst us. It is true that I can better tell you what we don't do than what we do do."

"Well?" said I.

"This is the way to put it," said he: "we have been living for a hundred and fifty years, at least, more or less in our present manner, and a tradition or habit of life has been growing on us; and that habit has become a habit of acting on the whole for the best. It is easy for us to live without robbing each other. It would be possible for us to contend with and rob each other, but it would be harder for us than refraining from strife and robbery. That is in short the foundation of our life and our happiness."

"Whereas in the old days," said I, "it was very hard to live without strife and robbery. That's what you mean, isn't it, by giving me the negative side of your good conditions?"

"Yes," he said, "it was so hard, that those who habitually acted fairly to their neighbours were celebrated as saints and heroes, and were looked up to with the greatest reverence."

"While they were alive?" said I.

"No," said he, "after they were dead."

"But as to these days," I said; "you don't mean to tell me that no one ever transgresses this habit of good fellowship?"

"Certainly not," said Hammond, "but when the transgressions occur, everybody, transgressors and all, know them for what they are; the errors of friends, not the habitual actions of persons driven into enmity against society."

"I see," said I; "you mean that you have no 'criminal classes.'"

"How could we have them," said he, "since there is no rich class to breed enemies against the state by means of the injustice of the state?"

Said I: "I thought that I understood from something that fell from you a little while ago that you had abolished civil law. Is that so, literally?"

"It abolished itself, my friend," said he. "As I said before, the civil law courts were upheld for the defence of private property; for nobody ever pretended that it was possible to make people act fairly to each other by means of brute force. Well, private property being abolished, all the laws and all the legal 'crimes' which it had manufactured of course came to an end. Thou shalt not steal, had to be translated into, Thou shalt work in order to live happily. Is there any need to enforce that commandment by violence?"

"Well," said I, "that is understood, and I agree with it; but how about crimes of violence? would not their occurrence (and you admit that they occur) make criminal law necessary?"

Said he: "In your sense of the word, we have no criminal law either. Let us look at the matter closer, and see whence crimes of violence spring. By far the greater part of these in past days were the result of the laws of private property, which forbade the satisfaction of their natural desires to all but a privileged few, and of the general visible coercion which came of those laws. All that cause of violent crime is gone. Again, many violent acts came from the artificial perversion of the sexual passions, which caused over-weening jealousy and the like miseries. Now, when you look carefully into these, you will find that what lay at the bottom of them was mostly the idea (a law-made idea) of the woman being the property of the man, whether he were husband, father, brother, or what not. That idea has of course vanished with private property, as well as certain follies about the 'ruin' of women for following their natural desires in an illegal way, which was of course a convention caused by the laws of private property."

"Another cognate cause of crimes of violence was the family tyranny, which was the subject of so many novels and stories of the past, and which once more was the result of private property. Of course that is all ended, since families are held together by no bond of coercion, legal or social, but by mutual liking and affection, and everybody is free to come or go as he or she pleases. Furthermore, our standards of honour and public estimation are very different from the old ones, and success in besting our neighbours is a road to renown now closed, let us hope for ever. Each man is free to exercise his special faculty to the utmost, and everyone encourages him in so doing. So that we have got rid of the scowling envy, coupled by the poets with hatred, and surely with good reason; heaps of unhappiness and ill-blood was caused by it, which with irritable and passionate men—i.e., energetic and active men—often led to violence."

I laughed, and said: "So that you now withdraw your admission, and say that there is no violence amongst you?"

"No," said he, "I withdraw nothing; as I told you, such things will happen. Hot blood will err sometimes. A man may strike another, and the stricken strike back again, and the result be a homicide, to put it at the worst. But what then? Shall we the neighbours make it worse still? Shall we think so poorly of each other as to suppose that the slain man calls on us to revenge him? when we know that if he had been maimed he would, when in cold blood and able to weigh all the circumstances, have forgiven his maimer? Or will the death of the slayer bring the slain man to life again and cure the unhappiness his loss has caused?"

"Yes," I said, "but consider, must not the safety of society be safeguarded by some punishment?"

"There, neighbour!" said the old man, with some exultation. "You have hit the mark. That punishment of which men used to talk so wisely and act so foolishly, what was it but the expression of their fear? And they had need to fear, since they—i.e., the rulers of society—were dwelling like an armed band in a hostile country. But we who live amongst our friends need neither fear nor punish. Surely if we, in dread of an occasional rare homicide, an occasional rough blow, were to solemnly and legally commit homicide and violence, we could only be a society of ferocious cowards. Don't you think so, neighbour?"

"Yes, I do, when I come to think of it from that side," said I.

"Yet you must understand," said the old man, that when any violence is committed, we expect the transgressor to make any atonement possible to him; and he himself expects it. But again, think if the destruction or serious injury of a man momentarily overcome by wrath or folly can be any atonement to the commonwealth? Surely it can only be an additional injury to it."

Said I: "But suppose the man has a habit of violence,—kills a man a-year, for instance?"

"Such a thing is unknown," said he. "In a society where there is no punishment to evade, no law to triumph over, remorse will certainly follow transgression."

"And lesser outbreaks of violence," said I, "how do you deal with them? for hitherto we have been talking of great tragedies, I suppose?"

Said Hammond: "If the ill-doer is not sick or mad (in which case he must be restrained till his sickness or madness is cured) it is clear that grief and humiliation must follow the ill-deed; and society in general will make that pretty clear to the ill-doer if he should chance to be dull to it; and again, some kind of atonement will follow,—at the least, an open acknowledgement of the grief and humiliation. Is it so hard to say, I ask your pardon, neighbour?—Well, sometimes it is hard—and let it be."

"You think that enough?" said I.

"Yes," said he, "and moreover it is all that we can do. In addition we torture the man, we turn his grief into anger, and the humiliation he would otherwise feel for his wrong-doing is swallowed up by a hope of revenge for our wrong-doing to him. He has paid the legal penalty, and can 'go and sin again' with comfort. Shall we commit such a folly, then? Remember Jesus had got the legal penalty remitted before he said 'Go and sin no more.' Let alone that in a society of equals you will not find anyone to play the part of torturer or jailer, though many to act as nurse or doctor."

"So," said I, "you consider crime a mere spasmodic disease, which requires no body of criminal law to deal with it?"

"Pretty much so," said he; "and since, as I have told you, we are a healthy people generally, so we are not likely to be much troubled with this disease."

Said I: "Well, you have no civil law, and no criminal law. But have you no laws of the market, so to say—no regulation for the exchange of wares? for you must exchange, even if you have no property."

Said he: "We have no obvious individual exchange, as you saw this morning when you went a-shopping; but of course there are regulations of the markets, varying according to the circumstances and guided by general custom. But as these are matters of general assent, which nobody dreams of objecting to, so also we have made no provision for enforcing them: therefore I don't call them laws. In law, whether it be criminal or civil, execution always follows judgment, and someone must suffer. When you see the judge on his bench, you see through him, as clearly as if he were made of glass, the policeman to imprison and the soldier to slay some actual living person. Such follies would make an agreeable market, wouldn't they?"

"Certainly," said I, "that means turning the market into a mere battle-field, in which many people must suffer as much as in the battle-field of bullet and bayonet. And from what I have seen I should suppose that your marketing, great and little, is carried on in a way that makes it a pleasant occupation."

"You are right, neighbour," said he. "Although there are so many, indeed by far the greater number amongst us, who would be unhappy if they were not engaged in actually making things, and things which turn out beautiful under their hands,—there are many, like the house-keepers I was speaking of, whose delight is in administration, organisation, to use long-tailed words; I mean people who like keeping things together, avoiding waste, seeing that nothing sticks fast uselessly. Such people are thoroughly happy in their business, all the more as they are dealing with actual facts, and not merely passing counters round to see what share they shall have in the privileged taxation of useful people, which was the business of the commercial folk in past days. Well, what are you going to ask me next?"

STRIKE IN THE STATES.—NEW YORK, April 11.—A thousand men employed in the building trade here have struck work owing to a firm of contractors refusing to employ union men.

THREATENED POLICE STRIKE.—The reports of a strike of the metropolitan police are by no means without foundation, says the Pall Mall. For some time past there has existed a feeling of considerable discontent at what is termed "the unfairness of the present pension rules," and this feeling is at the bottom of the trouble. There are also a number of men who are dissatisfied with the long hours and meagre pay, and these now come forward and add their grievances to the others. Some weeks ago Mr. John Burns asked that two men, well acquainted with the grievances of the force, should assist him in agitating the cause of the police. He made one stipulation—namely, that a sum of £600 should be raised in order to indemnify these two men in the event of their being discharged. It is said that there is no difficulty in raising the money, but that the martyr-champions are not forthcoming as yet. Several secret meetings have been held recently, and the agitation, which is going on strictly sub rosa, has already created a great deal of disaffection in the ranks of the metropolitan police.

IN THE UNITED STATES.

THE Massachusetts State Branch of the Federation of Labour met on the 16th inst. in the Typographical Hall, Boston. The following report has been adopted:

"For the first time in the history of the American labour movement, the bulk of organised labour has centred its efforts upon one definite reform, that of shortening the normal working-day to eight hours. We advocate the adoption of all legitimate means for the education of the general public in the justness of the eight-hour demand. A systematic plan of work is necessary, and, therefore, we make the following recommendations:

"1. The appointment by each affiliated union of an eight-hour legislative committee, whose duty it shall be to at once wait upon, or communicate with, the senator and representatives from the district covered by the jurisdiction of the union, for the purpose of notifying such legislators that their constituents, represented by organised labour, are desirous of the passage, by the present legislature of the eight-hour order introduced by representative Henry S. Lyons, of North Adams, the first section of which reads as follows: 'Eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all labourers, mechanics, or workmen now employed, or who may be in the future employed, by, or on behalf of, the commonwealth of Massachusetts, or in any county, city, or town therein. All acts, or parts of acts, inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.'

"2. We recommend the appointment by each affiliated union, and other unions in sympathy with the short-hour movement, of an agitation committee whose general duty it shall be to keep the eight-hour question prominently before the public.

"3. That each union follow out the plan already adopted by the joint labour conference of Boston, and send, either through its secretary, or by a special committee, a circular letter to each officiating clergyman in its jurisdiction, requesting the delivery, before May 1, 1890, of a sermon, address, or lecture upon the general question of the short-hour movement.

"Every tradition urges us to do our share in the mighty onward impetus to labour that the American Federation of Labour has undertaken. The spur of self-interest is supplemented by the higher motive of concern for the general weal."

So the eight hours day is going to be introduced through the parsons and priests and such like preaching about and praying for it!

The legislative committee presented a long report at this meeting, and upon its recommendation the following proposed labour measures were endorsed:

"That 58 hours per week constitute a week's work for women and children in factories.

"That eight hours per day constitute a day's work for state, city, county, and town employes.

"That the hours of labour be reduced, and better protection for life and limb be provided for railroad employes.

"That trade labels be given protection accorded other trade marks.

"That the school limit be raised to 15 years.

"That corporations be compelled to give 14 day's notice of reduction.

"That the overwork of women and children be prohibited.

"That public parks and commons be made available for purposes of public assemblage.

"That blacklisting be prevented, and, if attempted, be punishable by law.

"That the running of elevators by young people be regulated.

"That the employment of children under 13 in workshops, mercantile establishments and factories be prohibited.

"That better means of escape from factories in case of fire be provided.

"That eight hours be made a legal day's work."

Chief Wadlin, of the Massachusetts Bureau of Statistics of Labour, has issued a part of his report, which is devoted to the subject of the relation of wages to the cost of production. The result of his observations is the statement—proved by figures—that in industries representing some 73 per cent. of the manufactured products of the State, the labourer gets 20 per cent. of the cost of production. In establishments representing 27 per cent. of the entire products, the labourer's share reaches 33 per cent., and in a few special industries goes beyond that, but it never amounts to over 50 per cent. If Chief Wadlin goes on making correct statements like this, he may soon be able to shake the dust of his office from his shoes.

The Executive Council of the American Federation of Labour met on the 18th of this month in New York. All the members of the Council were present. The Council resolved to engage George E. McNeil, of Boston, and Paul Grottkau, of Chicago, as lecturers. Both lecturers will visit most of the cities of the United States and Canada, and deliver speeches in favour of the eight hour day under the auspices of the Federation and of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners. The Council resolved further, that the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, the crack organisation of the Federation, should take the lead in the eight hour movement. The Brotherhood is instructed to ask for the introduction of the eight-hours work-day on May 1st without condition. Should the demand be refused by the masters, then the 60,000 members of this organisation will cease to work till the demand is granted. In that case the strikers will be supported by the strike fund of the whole Federation of Labour. As soon as the carpenters and joiners have gained a victory, the miners will begin the fight.

Boston, Mass., March 27, 1890.

HENRY F. CHARLES.

A man has no more goods than he gets good by.

In 1870 a Sydney lady purchased a piece of land with £160 she had saved. The assessed value of the property is now £16,000—in other words, says the Bulletin, the land has, without any effort of hers, increased in value a hundred times.

Arrangements are now (Feb. 22) complete in connection with the new Australian labour paper, which will be called the Worker, not the Swagsman as at first proposed. It will consist of sixteen pages about Christian Socialist size, and will be issued about the 26th instant. This will be the first labour paper in the world owned by the workers themselves, under such conditions.

AUSTRALIAN MINERS' TROUBLES.—NEWCASTLE, N.S.W., Feb. 26.—In accordance with the orders of the Miners Association, the Wallarah men gave notice yesterday to the manager demanding payment by weight, in lieu of wages. A few hours afterward the manager posted up a notice that on and after that date the miners will receive a hewing rate of 3s. per ton, and wheelers 8s. per shift of eight hours. Under the district agreement the men are bound not to work for less than 4s. 2d. per ton, and there is little doubt that the association will call the men out rather than allow them to work at reduced rates. The mine is situated at Catherine Hill Bay, some 14 miles south of Newcastle, and at the present time about eighty men are employed.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

GERMANY.

A deep impression has been made by an order from the Saxon Ministry of the Interior requiring four veteran military organisations to remove the royal arms from their flags, and to return all standards and insignia presented to them by the King of Saxony, who is the patron of the military veteran unions throughout the kingdom. They are also forbidden to carry firearms, and are deprived of all the rights and privileges appertaining to the veteran associations in Saxony. This is due to the Socialist spirit pervading the unions. The immediate cause was that one corps recently attended the funeral of a Socialist in full uniform, and planted its flag on the grave while revolutionary speeches were delivered. The decree has led to a wide-spread interest in the affair, which cannot fail to have a good effect.

BELGIUM.

CHARLEROI.—For some time past, says La Bourse du Travail, the coal-hewers at the Charleroi pits have been making complaints and demands which are entirely disregarded. They announce their intention of striking if their demands are still received with the same contemptuous silence. The partial stoppage of work at Gilly is a sign of this, and we are assured that the workers at one of the neighbouring collieries have decided to stop work. They ask for a uniform scale of wages; in some of the collieries the wages are from 5 fr. 50 c., while in others they range from only 3 fr. to 3 fr. 50 c. for a working day of 12 to 13 hours. At several places the men demand a rise of 15 per cent., and the directors to whom the demand has been addressed have received an ultimatum from the Labour Leagues. The directors will probably think before creating a movement similar to that produced last year in all the mining centres, and will probably accede to the legitimate wishes of these unfortunate workers.

On all sides a considerable movement is noticed in favour of the International Congress of miners, which will be held next month.

ITALY.

CORBETTA (Milan).—An Association of Mutual Assistance has been formed here among the country labourers, in memory, no doubt, of last summer's disturbance and revolt, and in anticipation of a similar occurrence this coming season.

At Brescia a Labour Exchange has been inaugurated, and the same is being organized also in Bologna.

MILAN.—The police have forbidden a meeting of journeymen bakers which was to have been held in a hall granted by the municipality for the purpose, to discuss the abolition of night labour. The reason of this veto has not been vouchsafed, and remains entirely inexplicable.

SPAIN.

MATARO.—At a tannery in this town, the workmen had succeeded in organising themselves into a trade society; but this was apparently a cause of disquietude to the directors of the same, who have recently managed to break up the organisation by means of various intrigues.

A strike has announced of the glaziers of Mataró, and the Society La Fraternal have issued a manifesto charging those of the same trade in other neighbourhoods to abstain from coming to Mataró to the prejudice of the said strike, and of the solidarity of the workers.

MANLLEU.—The masons' trade society here have issued a similar announcement of strike and manifesto to their fellow-workmen.

MANRESA.—For some time an energetic propaganda has been carried on by the Federation of the Tres Clases de Vapor in Barcelona and the neighbourhood, more especially at Manresa, where several big meetings have been held to discuss the condition of affairs. About 4,000 employes in the weaving factories at Manresa are on forced strike. The master of one factory refused the demands of his employes of both sexes (some of them girls under 13), who only asked one hour's reduction in the day, which now is from 5 a.m. to 8.30 p.m.; and when the strike took place, he called on the masters of the other factories to stand by him. One and all presented a solid front to the workers, expecting to break their spirit and reduce their demands by hunger, and a lock-out was announced throughout. Great excitement prevails, and the workers say they would rather starve than give way. The movement spreads in Catalonia, and strikes are declared in numerous factories in Barcelona. It is announced that a meeting will be arranged between the masters and delegates from the Labor Societies, to try to arrange matters; but if the demands of the latter are not acceded to, the strike (which will cease while the arbitration takes place) will begin again, and will spread yet further through Catalonia.

M. M.

SWEDEN.

The Swedish Socialists have now, from the 1st of April, two daily papers, Social Demokraten and Arbetet. It is an immense step forward, and if it proves a success—as we heartily wish it may—Swedish Socialism may justly feel proud of itself, and its brave leaders of their splendid work.

A Swedish clergyman, the Rev. Johan Nylander, has for some time preached revolutionary Socialism in his parish church, and his bourgeois parishioners have promptly rewarded him by petitioning government for his dismissal. A similar fate has befallen Mr. Johan Lindström, who was one of the best Radical journalists of Sweden. He turned Socialist, and consequently the proprietors of the paper he edited turned him out. Now he is sub-editor of Arbetet, a very valuable acquisition for the Swedish Socialistic party.

The eight hours movement and the agitation for a grand working-men's demonstration on the 1st of May, are making good progress in Sweden.

NORWAY.

The Social Democrats of Norway have issued a circular to all the working-men's unions in the country, explaining the importance and justice of an eight hours working-day, and requesting them to join the international demonstration on the 1st of May.

STN.

HARD TIMES IN THE TRANSVAAL.—The Johannesburg Standard says:—It is quite appalling to see the number of active young fellows at the present time idling about the streets in quest of employment, a large number of whom are intelligent and no doubt industrious. A large percentage of them also were formerly brokers' clerks, but, as that branch of business is now at a standstill, they are forced to look around them for something else. The question is, what is there for them to do? Without desiring to take a pessimist's view of the situation, it is, to say the least of it, a gloomy outlook.

THE COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. For Australia, New Zealand, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Transvaal, and the Argentine Republic, a year, 8s.; six months, 4s.; three months, 2s. For India, Ceylon, China, Hong Kong, and the Straits Settlements, a year, 10s.; six months, 5s.; three months, 2s. 6d.

Subscribers who receive a RED WRAPPER are thereby reminded that their subscriptions have expired and must be renewed immediately if they wish to continue to receive COMMONWEAL.

SPECIAL RECRUIT SUBSCRIPTIONS.—To aid in spreading our principles, the following largely reduced terms are offered to those who obtain new subscribers: Two new yearly subscriptions for British Islands, etc., 10s. 6d.; for Australia, etc., 15s.; for India, etc., 19s. Five new subscriptions: For British Islands, etc., 25s.; for Australia, etc., 37s. 6d.; for India, etc., 47s. 6d. Specimen copies will be sent on receipt of postage.

Remittances from abroad must be made by International Money Order.

THE SITUATION IN GERMANY.

WHATEVER may be the fate of the Irish obstacle, which to the ambitious Liberalism of these islands so effectually "blocks the way," there seems at least a fair chance of some historical variety-entertainment being witnessed in Germany. The prelude, in fact, has just been rattled off in a most promising manner. The heavy form of the Chancellor, who, after his bloody work in 1871, had settled down in mid-stream of national life, impeding its flow and causing stagnation and disease, has just been lifted up by the spring tide of the Revolution, and is slowly but surely drifting out of sight.

The alarm among the worshippers of successful brutality and violence is great; they show fear and doubt, lest the so-called peace of the world should be disturbed by the fall of one of the busiest instigators of war the world has ever seen. The great press mob is full of admiration and regret, and the self-styled tutors of the "New Democracy" insult their readers and the German nation by declaring that "Bismark was the greatest man that Germany ever produced."

That his admirers are so very small, made him look big, no doubt; and that he was one of the greatest brutes to whom Germany ever gave life cannot be denied. During the lifetime of Old William, whom he had made an emperor, the chancellor ruled supreme. He set himself not only above his master, but above the constitution, and bearing down before him every opposition by the sheer weight of his reckless brutality, imposed his will and pleasure upon the suffering fatherland. He suppressed the will and stifled the voice of the people wherever his own selfish interest was at stake, and used the power placed in his hands in the meanest and most grasping manner for his own enrichment and the snug placement of the members of his family; he turned Germany into a huge barrack drill-ground, and brought the system of blind military discipline to perfection; he corrupted the public service, subsidised the "Reptile Press" in his own favour, and engendered a system of political espionage not previously known in German history. His home policy, which, besides taxing the necessities of life to the uttermost, consisted in the attempt to crush by exceptional laws the advanced party of the country's working population, culminated in the hatching of police conspiracies among the men who refused to transgress even the most stringent provisions of his national state of siege. The triumph of his foreign policy has estranged the two most cultured nations of the continent, and keeps them armed to the teeth, ready at command to tear each other to pieces. For the last twenty years the power of this man has been without mercy, his selfishness without shame, and his vanity without parallel. It seemed as if his misdeeds were to go on without check until his natural death. But Nemesis was on the way all the time. Slow came she, but she came—and at last undid him.

He was literally hoisted by his own petard. For it was he who fostered that, politically almost omnipotent, prerogative of the Prussian Crown. The king's will was to over-rule all others, and against its pleasure there was no appeal—so long as the king's will was guided by his Chancellor's. When old William was dead, and Bismark saw his providential plans with regard to emperor Frederick's throat frustrated, he played the impetuous son against his dying father and his English mother, thinking, no doubt, that young Willie on the throne would be as pliant a tool in his hand as his grandfather had been. But the chancellor had evidently reckoned without his host. For young Hotspur is Emperor now, and finding that there is no room for two despots on one throne, shows an unquenchable desire to do the ruling all by himself.

The seed of repression too, sown broadcast by Bismark all over the most fertile part of the nation, is bearing its fruit, and the triumph of his sincerest enemies was brought about in its fulness by the very methods of militarism. For it was the splendid discipline of the drill-ground, fired by the consciousness of the grand ideal they were fighting for, which led the Socialists to victory, and made the defeat of the chancellor's policy so crushing. It having proved played out, the Bismark dynasty was sent home to Friedrichsruhe, bag and baggage, dogs and all.

What next? While being not quite so sanguine as many are inclined to be, as to the probable result of the last elections and the change of government tools it has already brought about, I would yet warn the Socialists of this country not to under-rate the importance of this mighty manifestation. Socialism in Germany is not a fashionable fad, but a growing conviction in the mind of the working-classes, which cannot be ignored or suppressed, but must be reckoned with. There is no bourgeois money, no middle-class leader, scheming, gambling, and dissembling in his own interest and that of the almighty money-bag, but a sound, thorough-going, and downright working-class movement, supported and carried on by the brains, the sinews, and the enthusiasm of the workers themselves. And whatever may be the inclination of one or the other of their chosen mouthpieces in Parliament in favour of a temporary policy of compromise, the fact remains, that they are all elected on a strictly imperative mandate, to wit, the programme of the Socialist party, the fundamental aim of which is the final abolition of the wage-system, that infernal source of all the poverty, ignorance, and degradation in the world.

Twenty-five years ago Lassalle exclaimed, "Give me one hundred thousand German working-men, and Reaction is a thing of the past!" Those were boastful words, and perhaps somewhat illusory. But today the German Socialist Party have an army of a million and a half of men; men who have come of age in the thick of the fight against the infamous odds of the Bismarck system—i.e., the allied powers of everything that is bad on the Throne, in the Church, and in the Army—and the leaders of such a host have something to answer for. By overthrowing the idol of German capitalism and Junkerdom, they have begun well; but it was indeed only a beginning, and the baneful battle-field of Parliamentarism which they have now to enter is most slippery ground to fight upon. The German Socialists have become strong and powerful through persecution and adversity. Will they retain their strength in the enervating sunshine of imperial condescension? Willie Hotspur is a young man who is clearly dead for making history, and who in this endeavour conjures the spirits of the deep in the most childlike way and without seeming apprehension of defeat. He touches, after all, only the fringe of the social question, as he plays with that of every other; he offends most powerful interests and personalities, without on the other hand satisfying anybody, and may find himself presently in rather hot water. Yet, with the working classes he means business anyhow, and is not above canvassing for his "ideas" (whatever they may amount to!) among the lowliest of his realm by squeezing a workman's hand or two, and were they ever so genuine. At the same time, he rattles his sword and talks loudly of "smashing" those who refuse to take his candy and be quiet.

Nor is it the Scilla and Charybdis of the imperial smile and frown alone which the chosen ones of the German working-men's party have to steer clear between. There may be many among them who, like their young Cæsar, are brimming over with eagerness to save the world now they enter upon the stage political, whilst others, again, may prefer to play the part of diplomatists, sitting on a fence of observation above the turbulent contentions of party. A million and a half of votes given are too many to allow their delegates to assume the latter, and thirty-five members are too few to take up the former attitude. They are more than sufficient, however, to make their presence and their importance felt, by watching and spoiling the game of the reactionists and by protesting against the way in which the workers are fooled and plundered. Yet, despite all the dangers of the situation, there is much hope that those thousands of men who have just given the world such a brilliant spectacle of party discipline, have in them enough of the unerring spirit of the Revolution to keep their leaders straight and fresh and to the point at issue. The masses have not taken the imperial bait, nor have they been cowed by the imperial threat, but they have stood by their guns like men; an attitude by which their brethren in England might well profit. For, the show of their number and of their dauntless resolution has forced the hands of their ruler, and, whatever may be the temporary outcome of the present emperor's attempt at playing the Saviour of Society, it cannot fail ultimately to benefit the cause of militant labour.

True it is, that to dabble in the shaping of Social Reform Bills looks like the momentary damming back of the social sinflood, and that such would not be exactly the work of professed revolutionists; but it is not likely that the electorate of a million and a half of Socialists will allow much time and energy to be wasted over the attempt at patching up "Iniquity found out," and there is sure to be an early tussle between Cæsarism ("well-meaning" or otherwise) and Socialism.

AND. SCHEU.

IN SOUTHERN AFRICA.

AWHILE ago, the colonial press said that there was no such thing as a "Labour Question" in South Africa. To-day the different dailies are to be found admitting not only its existence, but that there is an unemployed question as well; that the former has asserted itself by carrying the eight hours day both in the Transvaal and in Natal; that the latter, though not as yet well able to make any definite demands owing to lack of organisation, may yet count on being heard later on. As regards the eight hour day in Cape Colony, a deputation of workmen from the Cape Government Railway workshops at Salt River waited on Colonel Schormbrucker, Commissioner of Public Works, a couple of weeks ago, for an answer as to the eight hour day. Although the interview has not yet been made public, I am able to give the result. The Commissioner said that the demand of the workmen was universal, and that the eight hours day, with which he personally was in sympathy, would come into operation from the 1st July next. This will affect over 5,000 workmen throughout the railway system.

The trades in Cape Town are also agitating for the same, and most likely will get it.

The sooner the eight hours question is settled, the sooner will the workers be forced to attend to their true position. That they do not understand it half so well as most of their enemies is evidenced by the tone and comments of the colonial press. As proof of this, I clip the following from an article in the Cape Times commenting on the London dock strikes:

"The response of the workers in Australia by subscribing funds, and of the labourers in Holland by refusing to fill the places of the strikers, are the fore-warning of the spread of a movement which could paralyse industry over half a continent."

Probably the "movement" will paralyse something else than industry first, and extend to more than "half a continent."

Now let us look at the Rudd-Rhodes-Duke-of-Fife-Earl-of-Aberdeen Syndicate, and see what it is doing alongside of what Lord Fife says it intends to do. The following taken from the Patriot gives a very fair idea of what it is just now busy with:

"The great Rhodes Company is also in the field, and is enlisting men who are to be sent to Matabeleland as civilisers. The civilisers will naturally be well equipped with powder and lead, and Gatling guns will certainly not be wanting."

How does the following read alongside of the granting of the South African Company's charter? It is taken from the Cape Times:

"For the student of social and economic problems the South African Republic is at present a fruitful field. The antiquated and dishonest [the italics are mine] practices of the Transvaal Government in granting monopolies," etc.

Come, come! Mr. Editor, what about the "dishonest practices" of the infallible British Government? Another tale of the Kettle and Pot. The company has begun what Lord Fife in his Mansion House speech called its "high functions," by which he said he meant "the civilisation and elevation of the aborigines of that long-neglected country," in rather a curious manner. First, Mr. Rhodes, as representing the company, smuggles into the country 1,000 stand of rifles, and is aided by Government officials in doing so. The civilising process thus begun, this is followed up by a grand horse-race in Matabeleland, under the patronage of King Lobengula, who, to show the interest he takes in the civilising process, enters two horses presented to him by the company. This he follows up on the following Sunday by a monster dance. Some people at home will raise their hands in holy horror at this, but (take heart of grace, good folk!) the dance was under the auspices of the company formed for the "Elevation and Civilisation" of these "long-neglected" people, and had, no doubt, a good deal of the Elevating and Civilising influence infused into it; of which influence Lord Fife would have us believe the company possesses a monopoly. That Lobengula is a fraud, and a puppet to boot, of which the Rhodes Syndicate pull the strings, is very certain, and the pity is that his tribe will be the sufferers from his treachery. Many of the Matabeles, however, are uttering threats against the invasion of their territory by the Fing Flibusters, and Lobengula himself admits that some of the younger regiments of the Matabeles may yet give trouble.

Lord Fife thought fit to tell the Mansion House meeting that the Rhodes Syndicate were working in co-operation with the African Lakes Company. Reading this part of the speech brought to my mind an interview I had with Mr. Moir, the manager of the Lakes Company, in Edinburgh about a year ago. When talking over the wages paid by the company, I hazarded the remark that they were very low; was it not in Mr. Moir's power to increase them? "No," said Mr. Moir, "I cannot do that, for, as you are aware, it is a limited company, and you know what that means." A second afterwards, when I blurted out that I believed it meant that said companies had neither soul nor conscience, my remark met with a consenting but silent nod—a handy way of signifying approval, which, however, cannot be produced as evidence. However, the after-conduct of the company in advertising for men to form part of an expeditionary force to be employed in "Elevating and Civilising" the Arab traders on the Zambesi, confirmed me in my opinion; and when the company went howling to Lord Salisbury and the British Government about the treatment they had received from the Portuguese authorities, simply because they were not allowed to send arms and ammunition for their hired murderers into the interior by way of Delagoa Bay, I knew what the howl meant, and felt glad when they were forced to take a back seat. They have had their revenge by urging on the Makololos to attack Major Serpa Pinto, and so, by forcing this officer to defend himself, giving Lord Salisbury what shadow of an excuse he wanted for the ultimatum to Portugal. I do not say this out of sympathy with Portugal's action in Eastern Africa, because both are playing the same game, only Britain knows best how to play "brag." I cannot close my reference to Lord Fife's speech without saying that all this hypocritical cant about the "High [capital H] Functions" and the "Civilisation and Elevation," etc., is simply rubbish, and puts one in mind of William and Mary's Attorney-General, who, when asked to assist in founding a college in Virginia, and told by way of inducement that the people of Virginia had souls to be saved as well as those of England, "Souls!" answered he; "damn your souls!—spin tobacco." It comes to the same thing with the Rhodes Syndicate; as with all others, it is a case of "damn your souls!—dig us diamonds, or gold, or any other thing by which we can fleece and rob you and your brothers in other parts of the globe; leave your souls in our keeping, we will look after them for you. But don't have anything to do with those rascally Portuguese, who don't care a rap for 'High Functions' or 'Civilising and Christianising Influences'!" So much for the South African Company.

That the whole of Southern Africa is in a state of transition is true and very evident to people who may chance to be on the spot. A few years ago, "exploitation" and "development" were words but seldom used in the colony. Now they are used by most men and by many women with a patness born of long familiarity. The only people who know the true meaning of the words are the Kaffirs whose lands have been "developed" and who have been well-nigh exploited out of existence. But for pure effrontery in the use of the word exploitation in connection with labour commend me to the following, which I picked up from the table of a share-broker in this town the other day. It is the front page of the prospectus of the "General Exploitation and Building Company, Limited," which has its motto "Labour alone ennobles mankind," and for its capital £250,000 in £1 shares. The margins of the front page are further embellished with the following: "No fruitful labour without organisation," "No prosperity without labour," "No real organisation without liberty," "No charitable (?) liberty without knowledge." To the truth of all which I heartily assent; but oh, the company they keep! The present rent-roll of the "General Exploitation," etc., Company is £6,308, and it reckons on increasing this in a few years to £25,000! Capitalise this sum at twenty years' valuation, and you have £500,000, or twice the capital of the company. Then the company goes on to say that "we would impress upon the readers the fact that Pretoria property is on the increase, and to give some idea of the value of ground, £14,000 was recently given for one erf of ground." An erf is 227 by 121 English feet. The prospectus winds up by saying that "the company is possessed of a mile of street-frontages, partly with buildings on, and nearly all in the steady solid town of Pretoria and centrally situated; also about 160,557 acres of farm lands or about 428 square miles upon which we have endeavoured to show that gold, silver, copper, and other precious metals exist. Here there is food for reflection by the investor, which can be digested at leisure."

Readers can find comments for themselves.

Harking back to "exploitation," let me give you the words of old Krel, chief of the Galekas, to a correspondent of the Cape Times who visited him recently in his rocky fastness. The old man—he is over seventy—is one of the most courageous and kindly hearted of native chiefs, and has won the confidence of the colonists, who say, "He is a man of his word to us; with the Government he has no conscience. Here are the correspondent's own words: "He told us he did not care to see strangers, for he was living like a baboon in a hole. 'Where is my country? where are my children? My country was there'—sweeping the horizon. 'Now I've no country.' Perhaps the old man's words explain the meaning of "Exploitation and Development," as applied to colonial matters, better than any dictionary definition yet given. What civilisation did for Edmund Sandilli is put by the same correspondent into few words—viz.: "It shot his father, jumped his country, and sent him for years to the breakwater to herd with other convicts, until, heartbroken and dejected, the Government thought there could be no danger in sending him back to his—or what was once his—country." And so with old Krel; for well-nigh eight years he was a fugitive. Hunted down for no crime, fighting every step of the ground, never showing the "white feather," poor old Krel was at last forced back to live as he himself says "like a baboon in a hole." And as with Sandilli and Krel and many other native chiefs, so it will yet be with many others. However, a little more claptrap about "High Functions" and "Civilisation and Elevation of the natives" from this new-fledged ducal "whistler," as fifiers are termed in Scotland, and the shareholders will grab their dividends and dispose of their shares to the highest bidders and rest with easy consciences, and the gullible British public will be as wise as ever as to the real objects of the Fing Flibusters. However, with the turn affairs are taking here, the doings of the company are likely to be known sooner than most people imagine, and I am inclined to think that it has a future before it not altogether pleasant to those most interested in it. In other words, Mr. Rhodes will sooner or later find that the days of Chartered Piracy Companies are past, and that despite the patronage of colonial and imperial governments and the professional services of officers and ex-officers, military and marine, and the help of African travellers and explorers, doctors, lawyers, and I don't know what else, that there is rougher work cut out for them than they are fitted to do.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

Cardiff and Hanley.

We had two Labour conferences on Easter Monday on the important question of labour representation. The conference at Cardiff was got up by a Liberal agent for the purpose of forming a new labour league, the members of which would bind themselves to pay $\frac{1}{4}$ d. a-week for the purpose of returning supporters of Mr. Gladstone to the House of Commons. We will own that it was not plainly stated that this was the object of the conference, but the cat was let out of the bag in the course of the proceedings. A proposal by Mr. Mahon, London, that the movement should be independent of all political parties, was indignantly rejected by an overwhelming majority; and when the same speaker hoped they would not elect Mr. Broadhurst as one of their vice-presidents, he was received with a storm of disapprobation, and Mr. Broadhurst was returned at the top of the poll. The Liberalism of the congress was admirably shown when someone proposed that Michael Davitt should be president. The meeting literally howled with rage at the notion. The conference was mostly Welsh, and a general outcry went up that "a Welshman was as good as him." A delegate from Llanerch objected to telling his constituents that a "foreigner" was to boss the show. We fear that after exhibiting this "patriotic" feeling that "the British Labour League" is likely to be confined to Wales. Probably it would be hard to find anywhere else workmen who are fools enough to give their halfpence to return Gladstonian M.P.'s of the Broadhurst stamp to Parliament, although they may be green enough to vote for them. English prefer to let Liberal sweaters pay for the return of their partners to Parliament. Mr. Broadhurst should be a happy man, for he knows now that when he has been kicked out of every assemblage of honest workmen in England he will be able to find a refuge in the "British Labour League" of Wales.

A much healthier feeling was shown at the conference of the Labour Electoral Association at Hanley. This conference was not a bogus affair got up by a Liberal agent to nobble the Labour party. The conference, which represented the organised trade-unionists of the country, decided upon "the energetic opposition of all unfair employers and enemies of labour, to whatever party they may belong." It was also the general opinion, as stated by the secretary in the annual report, that "in no case should candidates be allowed to gain their seats without being closely questioned as to their intentions, and certainly none whose primary qualifications appear to consist of ability to fence, to evade, to compromise, and to cover by a number of legal quibbles the points we contend for." On the motion of Mr. Holmes (Leicester), the delegates regretted Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, M.P.'s, attitude on the Employers' Liability Bill, and refused to recognise him as a labour representative. Poor Charles will have a difficulty in posing as a representative of labour after this. A resolution in favour of the nationalisation of the land was carried unanimously. On the whole, although the conference was not so advanced as we should have liked to have seen it, yet it certainly showed that even the trade unionists are getting on. It was generally recognised that, in the words of one of the speakers, as to the political parties, "there was more profession in both than practical sympathy or justice towards the working classes." These trade-unionists have learnt at last that both these parties are largely composed of knaves and traitors. They have yet to learn that parliamentary action is a fraud from beginning to end, and that the people can only achieve their emancipation by overthrowing the system of capitalism by their own united action.

The National Conference of Miners.

The miners showed themselves still more advanced in their Conference. They did not go for Bradlaugh, but they passed a sharp vote of censure upon that very reactionary body, the Trades Union Parliamentary Committee. It appears that the Parliamentary Committee was ordered, at the last Trades' Union Congress, to draw up an Eight Hours Bill for miners and present it to the House of Commons. As the Trades' Union Parliamentary Committee have a very strong objection to the Eight Hours movement, they "forgot" to draw up this Bill, and the miners are very angry at this shuffling on the part of the Committee. This anger found vent at the Conference, not only in the vote of censure, but in some pretty strong speeches. The chairman, Mr. B. Pickard, M.P., declaring that the Parliamentary Committee was practically dominated by Tory influence, and for the last three years, at any rate, had not been worth the money paid to them. Rather hard, this, on the late Secretary of the Committee, Mr. Broadhurst, who, you would have thought, would have been reckoned as an orthodox Liberal, and who has "dominated" the Committee up till now. Another delegate, Mr. Cowie, said that if the Committee were the autocrats of the toiling masses, the sooner they were got rid of the better. A Bristol delegate, Mr. Whitehouse, said the Committee had humbugged them from Genesis to Revelation. Poor Parliamentary Committee! It was decided to join the Trades' Union Congress, and the delegates appointed were instructed to vote for a Parliamentary Committee that would be favourable to an Eight Hours Bill for miners. The Star, which is now "dominated" by capitalist Liberal influence, makes a pitiful pretence of liking this new development, but it notes in anything but a gleeful spirit, "that the advanced sections of the miners seem to have it pretty well all their own way." The delegates also showed that they look upon the Berlin "Labour" Conference as a sham, and declared, through their chairman, that as neither the Miners' Federation nor the Eight Hours Movement had any representatives at that Conference; they repudiated any arrangements that might have been made there. It is evident that new ideas are taking a strong hold upon the miners, who are again as they have always been, in the front of the labour movement. There is evidently a bad time approaching for all reactionaries and traitors.

The Strike in the Boot Trade.

The struggle is still continued with the same determination, the men being confident of success. They have decided that the union men now on strike who want to leave London will be assisted to do so. This, if the masters still persist in their obstinacy, will mean that all the best workmen will leave London for the country, where there is now a great demand for labour, and the masters will be left in the lurch, for the London trade will follow these best hands to the country. The London Trades Council has agreed to support the strikers in their appeal to other trades for assistance. 215 out of 400 masters have given in, and will provide workshops, but the others want to force the men to submit all future wages disputes to a court of arbitration, and this the men very sensibly refuse to do. They do not want their freedom of action fettered, and they have an idea that arbitration may be used to reducing the prices already paid. Some of the Jew employers have offered 10s. and £1 to men to take work home, and thus break the ranks of the strikers, but in not a single instance have they been successful.

Strike of Thames Barge-builders.

The Thames barge-builders came out on strike on Monday. They demand that the working day shall be reduced to nine hours, and that a uniform rate of wages of 9d. an hour, and 1s. an hour overtime, shall obtain throughout the trade, two hours being allowed, or equivalent paid in money, for the grinding of tools after a job. At present the men are working an average of 58 hours per week at an average rate of wages of £2. They are willing to submit the question of overtime to a joint committee of masters and workmen, no overtime to be worked in the meantime. Out of ninety firms carrying on the trade between Brentford and Woolwich, twenty-three have already given way.

The Eight Hours Demonstration.

The societies affiliated to the London Trades Council have resolved to invite the London districts to declare in favour of an eight hours working day, without any stipulation as to the methods by which such eight hours shall be obtained, the general sentiment being in favour of a reduction of hours of labour as a pressing necessity and as likely to ensure employment to those who are now denied it. It was further decided not to demonstrate on the 1st May; but to do so on the first Sunday in May, as the most convenient time.

Tram Strike at Swansea.

A strike broke out on Saturday among the tram men owing to the dismissal without notice of two of the men who have taken a prominent part in the union. No trams ran on Saturday evening, owing to the head constable declining to be responsible if a disturbance took place. A fearful state of tram slavery prevails at Swansea, the men working 105 hours a-week for 5s. a-day. There was an attempt to run the trams with blacklegs on Tuesday, but the people collected in strong force, and trams and blacklegs were unmercifully pelted with flour bags, stones, and other missiles. The windows of the trams were broken, and they were soon forced to cease running.

Strike of Dublin Labourers.

The labourers employed by the Dublin Brick and Tile Co., Mount Argus, have struck work for an increase in wages. During the summer they work 60 hours per week, 57 in winter. Wages, 15s. summer, and 14s. 3d. winter. They demand the hour system, at $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per hour. N.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"DUBLIN BRICKLAYERS LABOURERS."

SIR,—Under the above caption there is a paragraph on page 110 of last week's Commonweal (which I have only just read) in which the following statement occurs, in connection with the arbitration between the labourers and contractors of Dublin: "As is usual in cases of arbitration, the men have gained very little; in fact, many of them will lose 1s. 6d. per week."

The facts are these:—There was an increase of 3s. per week got for every labourer (groundman), 1s. 6d. of which was to be granted immediately, and 1s. 6d. more after the 1st of July next. Hodmen to receive one shilling extra beyond the pay of the groundmen, as usual. There is no truth whatever in the assertion that many of the labourers "will lose 1s. 6d." as a consequence of the arbitration.—Yours truly,
MICHAEL DAVITT.

Land League Cottage, Ballybrack, April 9th, 1890.

Cours Weavers' Strike Fund.—Already acknowledged:—£16 18s. 4d. D. W. Reeve (second donation). £10.

COURS FUND.—When sending his subscription, Mr. Reeves said:—"I look upon such a subscription as of great importance, as all such expressions of active sympathy shown by one country towards the workers of another aid in promoting, what is so very desirable, an international solidarity of labour."

Sea-wages from Leith are:—Westward, steam—Sailors, £4 15s.; firemen, £5; donkeyman, £5 10s.; stewards, £6 10s.; cook, £5 10s. and £6. Westward, sail, £4; cook, £5; steward, £5 10s. To the southward, steam—Sailors, £4 10s.; firemen, £4 15s.; boatswain and donkeyman, £5 and £5 5s. respectively, cook, £5 5s.; steward, £5 15s. to £6. To the southward, sail, £3 10s.; steward, £5; cook, £4 10s.; and weekly wages, local, £1 10s.; non-local, £1 12s. 8d.

ALASKA FISHERMEN.—At a meeting in San Francisco, the men engaged in the Alaska Salmon Fishery adopted the following scale of prices:—For Copper River and Nushagak: 30 dols. a month, 10 cents for king fish each and 3 cents for small fish each per boat. For seining in Karluk district: 30 dols. per month and 10 dols a thousand per seine. For Chignink Bay: 30 dols a month and 20 cents per case to be divided among the fishermen. For Cook's Inlet: 75 dols. bonus to each man and one cent a case per man. Eighty per cent. of the Alaska fishermen belong to the Coast Seamen's Union, and others belong to the Steamship Sailors' Union and the Sacramento Fishermen's Union.

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

OFFICES: 24, GREAT QUEEN ST., LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

The Offices of the Socialist League will be open for the sale of Commonweal and all other Socialist publications from 8.30 a.m. to 9 p.m. every day except Sunday. The Secretary will be in attendance from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m. daily.

Executive.—The Council of the Socialist League have, at their meeting on Monday, April 14th, resolved to demonstrate on May-day and Sunday following in favour of the International Solidarity of Labour and its Emancipation by Voluntary Combination. Branches and allied societies are asked to hold demonstrations in their own districts upon the lines of the League principles.

Branch Subscriptions Paid.—1888:—Oxford, to end of September.
1889:—Bradford and Hammersmith, to end of April. Norwich, Glasgow, and Yarmouth, to end of May. East London, to end of October. Mitcham, to end of November. St. Georges East, to end of December.
1890:—Manchester, to end of January. 'Commonweal' Branch, and North London, to end of February. Leicester, to end of March. North Kensington, to end of April. Streatham, to end of December.

Notice.—All letters on League business, except those intended for Editors of Commonweal, to be addressed to me. No other person is authorised to sign any official communication.
FRANK KITZ, Secretary.

NEW PREMISES FUND.

Collected at Council meeting, April 14th, 3s. 5d.

"COMMONWEAL" GUARANTEE FUND.

The following further sums have been received towards this fund:—C. Saunders, 2s.; H. R., 1s.; D. Nicoll, 6d.; North London Branch, 3s.; Fraser, 6d.; Birkbeck, 4d.; P. Webb, 4s.; J. C. Kenworthy, 10s.; J. L. Joyner, £1; and A. K. Austin, £1.

REPORTS.

EAST LONDON.—Good meeting in Victoria Park addressed by Cores, Davis, and Mowbray; 33 Weals, 5 Freedoms, and 12 pamphlets sold.—H. McK.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—A good meeting held at Latimer Road; speakers were R. J. Lyne and Maughan; collected 1s. 10d. and several Weals sold. Good meeting in Hyde Park at 3.30; speakers were Crouch, R. J. Lyne, and Cantwell; 2s. 6d. collected, and several Weals sold. At our room in Clarendon Coffee Tavern, comrade Coulon lectured to a good audience on "The French Revolution;" animated discussion; 2s. collected.

NORTH LONDON.—We held a very good meeting on Saturday night at Hyde Park, addressed by Cantwell and Nicoll; fair sale of Weal. On Sunday afternoon at Hyde Park, Cantwell, R. Lyne, Bullock, and Crouch, addressed a large audience; very good sale of Commonweal and pamphlets, and 3s. 8½d. was collected.—T. C.

STREATHAM.—A good meeting was held at the Fountain last Sunday night. A middle-class young man of the Christian Association started the opposition with a sermon, but did not succeed in diverting the attention of those who had come to listen to our comrade Kitz; 38 Commonweal sold.—R. S.

ABERDEEN.—At meeting on 13th, comrade Rennie read an eloquent paper on "The Socialism of Count Tolstoi," which was followed by an interesting discussion.—L.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday, at 2 o'clock, Joe and Tim Burgoyne spoke to a good audience on "Jail Life." At 5 o'clock Glasier spoke at Paisley Road Toll; Weal sold out; next Saturday we intend beginning our Saturday afternoon excursions.

LEEDS.—On Sunday last, at a meeting in Vicar's Croft, when Maguire, Braithwaite and Sweeney spoke, a policeman cautioned Samuels against selling any literature, as it was contrary to the bye-laws. Samuels, who has been speaking and selling papers in the same place for months previously without molestation, got on the platform and related the circumstance to the assembled crowd and defied the constable. He then got down and in a few moments he had sold all the Weals and Freedoms that he had with him. The policeman attempted to rush him out of the market, but the demeanour of the crowd becoming threatening, he was satisfied with our comrade's name and address, whom he threatened with a summons "in the morning." I think this is a sign we are getting felt here.—H. S.

LEICESTER.—March the 4th, Stepniak lectured in the Co-operation Hall to a large audience on "Russian Democracy"; a Fabian comrade took the chair; great interest was manifested. On the 11th, William Morris was among us and took tea with about twenty of us at our rooms. Morris's address, "The Class Struggle" was a real stirring one, and his replies to objections excellent. Sunday evening, Greenman, of the S. D. F., spoke on the general question of Socialism, at Humberstone Gate, to a good audience.—T. B.

MANCHESTER.—On Sunday morning a large meeting was held at Phillips' Park; Barton and Baillie spoke; lively discussion. In Stevenson Square, in the afternoon, Sharples (of Blackburn) was the principal speaker; two quires of Commonweal sold, and 2s. 9d. collected. On Monday night, the quarterly meeting of the branch was held at the club; the financial report showed the branch to be in a sound and flourishing position; the corresponding and financial secretaries were re-elected, and other business transacted.

YARMOUTH.—On Sunday, in the morning, on Priory Plain, comrade Brightwell opened a discussion on "Socialism v. Christianity," several comrades taking part; in the evening, at Colman's Granary Quay, comrade Ruffold addressed a good audience; 11 Commonweal sold.—J. H.

DUBLIN.—At Working-men's Club, Willington Quay, April 9th, the third sitting of an Industrial Conference took place; amongst the speakers were Mr. J. A. Cree and Fitzpatrick, who dwelt strongly on the antagonism between employer and employee, and the utter impossibility of propping up the existing system; the clerical and orthodox Trades Union element being not at all pleased at some of the home thrusts.

EDINBURGH—SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—On Sunday afternoon we held a very successful meeting in the Meadows; M'Kenrie, Hamilton and Smith made very effective speeches. In the evening comrade Melliet lectured to a good audience in the Moulders' Hall, on "Capital Punishment," and showed, from the points of view of a Socialist and a man of the world, why it should be abolished; good discussion.

LIVERPOOL SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—On Sunday afternoon and evening, comrade William Morris lectured to good audiences at the Rodney Hall, on "The Development of Modern Society" and "The Social Outlook"; papers and literature to the amount of £2 9s. were disposed of.—E. C. CHAPMAN.

'COMMONWEAL' can be had from—

Mr. Read, Surrey-street, Littlehampton, Sussex.

C. A. Crump, 39, Rayner Terrace, Stratford New Town.

INTERNATIONAL OR REVOLUTIONARY SOCIALISM.—As the study of Socialism from a revolutionary or international standpoint is absolutely necessary, it is intended by several friends to form a branch of the League. I have therefore to ask all those who are willing to join in forming such branch, and who are willing to help in propagating the principles of true Socialism, to communicate with me as early as possible.—J. SKETCHLEY, 165 Gibraltar Street, Sheffield.

LECTURE DIARY.

LONDON.

Battersea.—All communications to E. Buteux, 45, Inwith Street, Battersea Park Road.

Commonweal Branch.—24 Great Queen Street, Holborn, W.C. Business meeting of members every Thursday evening at 8; Discussion Class at 9. Hall open every evening from 7 till 10. Sunday April 20, at 8 p.m., George Bernard Shaw, "The Consequences of Democracy."

STANLEY'S EXPLOITS:

OR,
CIVILISING AFRICA.

It may be interesting at the present time, when journalists, middle-class orators, lion comiques, pious tub-thumpers, and all the advertising agencies of a commercial civilisation, combine to raise a deafening chorus of praise to Stanley, to state why we Socialists are not in an abject state of admiration, and to support our objections to this modern commercial hero by indisputable evidence.

First, we do not admire Mr. Stanley because we do not like his methods of exploration, which resemble more the piratical operations of Blackbeard or Teach, or the savage warfare of the Spanish conquistadores, than the peaceful marches of his predecessors in African exploration. Secondly, we have still less liking for the ultimate result of his journeys, which carry slavery, misery, degradation, and death in their train, and leave a long and bloody trail behind them. With regard to the first objection we must admit that there is some excuse for Stanley; his early occupation, and the scenes he witnessed while pursuing it, may in some measure account for his brutal carelessness of human life. Everyone knows that he was originally a war correspondent; according to his own account he was first employed by American papers during the great Civil War. In the same capacity he witnessed battles between American troops and the Indians. His next experience was in 1868, with Napier in Abyssinia, when the main incidents of this war were a battue of helpless savages and the burning of Magdala. In 1869, he was present at some of the bloody scenes of the repression of the republican insurrection in Spain, when the people were mercilessly butchered at Valencia and Saragossa. While in Madrid, "fresh from the carnage at Valencia," he was summoned to Paris by the manager of the New York Herald, of which he was correspondent, and was sent in search of Livingstone, who had disappeared in Central Africa and was generally believed to be dead. The incidents of that journey are told by Stanley in the well-known work, "How I found Livingstone." I may mention here that whenever I produce any evidence against Mr. Stanley, it is always taken from his own works and his own words. The unfortunate natives who have come in contact with the valiant explorer cannot tell us their side of the story. Stanley is his own accuser, and doubtless, like all men he makes the best of his little eccentricities. If those who have suffered by them could tell their tale, no doubt it would be considerably blacker than it is at present. Still, we will own that he pursued his task of finding Livingstone with more humanity than has characterised his later expeditions. It is true that in chapter vi., pp. 217-18 of that work, he admits submitting one of his followers to "a vigorous and most necessary application of my donkey lash," and "to flogging right and left to rouse the pagazis and soldiers up." He also embarked upon a wicked and useless war in alliance with the slave-hunting Arabs of Unyanyembe against an African chief, Mirambo, who had successfully resisted their encroachments. Mr. Stanley tells how his allies in this war were fond "of decapitating and inflicting vengeful gashes in dead bodies," (p. 279). On p. 282, he relates how they surprised one of Mirambo's people asleep, "whose head they stretched backward and cut off as though he were a goat or a sheep." Nice allies for a pioneer of Christianity and civilisation.¹ These incidents are, however, only worth mentioning as illustrations of the character of this pioneer of civilisation, and we shall find that his passion for cruel slaughter attained a still higher development later on.

After his return from finding Livingstone, Stanley accompanied the army of General Wolesley in the Ashantee expedition, and was present during the defeat of the Ashantees and the burning of Coomassie. Stanley, in his book "Coomassie and Magdala," curiously enough censures the English General for his mildness towards the enemy. We shall have no occasion to blame Stanley for such weakness in criticising his own expeditions.

But Stanley was soon to play a more distinguished part. Dr. Livingstone was dead, and the proprietors of the New York Herald and Daily Telegraph were anxious to find a successor for the man whose name was famous throughout the civilised world. To these smart business men it seemed fit that the prophet's mantle should fall upon the shoulders of the brisk young American journalist. Stanley was accordingly sent off into the wilds of Africa to complete the discoveries of the dead man. He started from Zanzibar on November 12, 1874, with a well-equipped army of three hundred Zanzibaris, some of whom were well experienced alike in exploring, ivory trading, and slave-hunting. Mr. Stanley first journeyed in the direction of the great lakes, where, however, he did not at first make many discoveries of great importance. Still, the proprietors of the New York Herald and Daily Telegraph expected something for their money, and it was possibly with a view of providing them with some sensational articles that Stanley engaged in a series of small wars with several savage tribes, the incidents of which are both instructive and interesting as to methods usually adopted by this apostle of civilisation in dealing with the natives of Africa. These incidents were deemed so extraordinary that Col. Yule (an old soldier, eminent also as a geographer, who took a great interest in primitive peoples) and H. M. Hyndman drew the attention of the Royal Geographical Society and the public to the "civilised warfare" carried on by the representative of the New York Herald and the Daily Telegraph.¹

The first letter of Mr. Stanley, detailing his conflicts with the natives, was printed in the Daily Telegraph of October 15, 1875. He tells us there how, while he was engaged in palaver with the elders of the Waturu that

"It soon became evident, however, that though the elders were content the warriors were not, as they could be seen hurrying by in scores and gesticulating violently in crowds. . . . As we watched them we noted that about two hundred detached themselves from the gesticulating crowds east of the camp, and disappeared hurrying to the thick bush west of us. Soon afterwards one of my men returned from that direction bleeding profusely from the face and arms, and reported that he and a youth named Sulieman were out collecting firewood, when they were attacked by a large crowd of savages who were hidden in the bush. A knobstick had crushed the man's nose, and a spear had severely wounded him in the arm, but he had managed to escape while Sulieman was killed, a dozen spears having been plunged in his back."

The savages afterwards fired a shower of arrows upon the camp. Stanley's men then set upon them, and being well armed easily routed them. Here is his own description of the victory:

"The skirmishers now returned, and announced that fifteen of the enemy were killed, while a great many more were wounded and borne off by their friends. All my men had distinguished themselves, even 'Bull,' my British bull-dog, had seized one of the Waturu by the leg, and had given him a taste of the power of the sharp canines of his breed before the poor savage was mercifully despatched by a Snider bullet."

The italics are mine. This passage certainly shows a keen relish for slaughter and cruelty. You would think that the killing of one and the wounding of another man had been sufficiently avenged by the slaughter of fifteen men and the wounding of many more, but Mr. Stanley is not satisfied. His taste for massacre, acquired by seeing savages and rebellious crowds shot down in heaps by a storm of bullets and grapeshot from the arms of precision of civilised troops, has not been sufficiently gratified. On the next day the "war" was resumed. Mr. Stanley has witnessed the burning of Coomassie and Magdala, and now desires to have a little illumination on his own account. He continues:

"Accordingly, I selected four experienced men to lead four several detachments, and gave orders that they should march in different directions through the valley and meet at some high rocks distant five miles off; that they should seize upon all cattle, and burn every village as soon as taken."

The word "experienced" we have put in italics is worth noting. We suppose they were "experienced" in savage warfare and burning villages. In that case it is probable that these men who commanded Mr. Stanley's infernal columns were "experienced" in the atrocities of Arab slave-hunting expeditions, and no doubt they had now obtained work which they enjoyed. Unhappily, however, one of these detachments fell in with a strong force of the men whose villages they were going to burn, and were slaughtered to a man. The second very nearly shared the same fate, but was rescued by reinforcements dispatched to the spot by Stanley. He then describes with unctious the work of the other detachments:

¹ And yet, although even then he assumed this lofty character, Mr. Stanley recounts these atrocities as though they were rather amusing.

"Meanwhile, smoke was seen issuing from the south and south-east, informing us that the third and fourth detachments were pursuing their way victoriously; and soon a score or more villages were enwrapped in dense volumes of smoke. Even at a distance of eight miles we beheld burning villages, and shortly after the blazing settlements in the north and east announced our triumph on all sides. . . . The next day we renewed the battle with sixty good men, who received instructions to proceed to the extreme length of the valley and destroy what had been left on the previous day. These came to a strong and large village on the north-east, which, after a slight resistance, they entered, loading themselves with grain, and afterwards setting the village on fire. Long before noon it was clearly seen that the savages had had enough of war, and were quite demoralised, so that our people returned through the now silent and blackened valley without molestation."

Now, even supposing that the previous massacre was amply justified by the "offences" committed by the natives, yet nothing can justify the acts of incendiarism and pillage committed by Mr. Stanley. It was not a war upon men, it was a war upon women and children, who were left to starve amid the "silent and blackened valley," which had once flourished in abundance and resounded with the innocent mirth of thoughtless savages, who had no idea that an enterprising war correspondent was on the way to "civilise" them.

It is not surprising to find after these incidents that Mr. Stanley had a few more conflicts with other native tribes. Here is another charming little incident, which I quote in full. It appeared in a letter published in the Daily Telegraph, November 15, 1875, and describes some events which took place on the Eastern shores of Lake Victoria Nyanza, while Stanley was engaged in trading with the Wavuma, a native tribe of the district:

"While we were bargaining for potatoes with this party the other canoes came up and blocked the boat, while the people began to lay surreptitious hands upon everything; but we found their purpose out, and I warned the robbers away with my gun. They jeered at this, and immediately seized their spears and shields, while one crew hastened away with some beads it had stolen, and which a man insolently held up to my view, mockingly inviting us to catch him. At the dangerous example of this I fired, and the man fell dead in his place. The others prepared to launch their spears, but the repeating rifle was too much for the crew of so-called warriors, who had hastened like pirates to pillage us. Three were shot dead, and as they retreated my elephant rifle smashed their canoes, the results of which we saw in the confusion attending each discharge. After a few rounds from the big gun we continued on our way, still hugging the shores of Uvuma, for it was unnecessary to fly after such an exhibition of inglorious conduct on the part of fifteen canoes, containing in the aggregate over a hundred men."

Mr. Stanley seems here to have revived on his own account the ancient criminal law, by punishing the petty theft of a few paltry beads with death. Still the good gentleman doubtless suffered considerable disappointment, with which we are sure the kind-hearted reader must sympathise. Fancy! the cowardly natives would not stop to be shot down by Stanley's repeating rifle, so only "three were shot dead," and a few canoes smashed by the elephant rifle. What a falling off was there from the glorious slaughter of the Waturu!

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. XIII.—CONCERNING POLITICS.

SAID I: "How do you manage with politics?"

Said Hammond, smiling: "I am glad that it is of me that you ask that question: I do believe that anybody else would have made you explain yourself, or try to do so till you were sickened of asking questions. Indeed, I believe I am the only man in England who would know what you mean; and since I know, I will answer your question briefly by saying that we are very well off as to politics,—because we have none. If ever you make a book out of this conversation, put this in a chapter by itself, after the model of old Horrebow's Snakes in Iceland."

"I will," said I.

CHAP. XIV.—HOW MATTERS ARE MANAGED.

"BUT," quoth I, "is there no difference of opinion amongst you? Is that your assertion?"

"No, not at all," said he, somewhat snappishly; "but I do say that differences of opinion about real solid things need not, and with us do not, crystallise people into parties permanently hostile to one another, with different theories as to the build of the universe and the progress of time. Isn't that what politics used to mean?"

"H'm, well," said I, "I am not so sure of that."

Said he: "I take you, neighbour; they only pretended to this serious difference of opinion; for if it had existed they could not have dealt together in the ordinary business of life; couldn't have eaten together, bought and sold together, gambled together, cheated other people together, but must have fought whenever they met: which would not have suited them at all. The game of the masters of politics was to cajole or force the public to pay the expense of a luxurious life and exciting amusement for a few cliques of ambitious persons: and the pretence of serious difference of opinion, belied by every action of their lives, was quite good enough for that. What has all that got to do with us?"

Said I: "Why, nothing, I should hope. But I fear— In short, I have been told that political strife was a necessary result of human nature."

"Human nature!" cried the old boy, impetuously; "what human nature? The human nature of paupers, of slaves, of slave-holders, or the human nature of wealthy freemen? Which? Come, tell me that?"

"Well," said I, "I suppose there would be a difference according to circumstances in people's action about these matters."

"I should think so, indeed," said he. "At all events, experience shows that it is so. Amongst us, our differences concern matters of business, and passing events as to them, and could not divide men permanently. As a rule, the immediate outcome shows which opinion on a given subject is the right one; it is a matter of fact, not of speculation. For instance, it is clearly not easy to knock up a political party on the question as to whether haymaking in such and such a country-side shall begin this week or next, when all men agree that it must at latest begin the week after next, and when any man can go down into the fields himself and see whether the seeds are ripe enough for cutting."

Said I: "And you settle these differences, great and small, by the will of the majority, I suppose?"

"Certainly," said he; "how else could we settle them? You see in matters which are merely personal which do not affect the welfare of the community—how a man shall dress, what he shall eat and drink, what he shall write and read, and so forth—there can be no difference of opinion, and everybody does as he pleases. But when the matter is of common interest to the whole community, and the doing or not doing something affects everybody, the majority must have their way; unless the minority were to take up arms and show by force that they were the effective or real majority; which, however, in a society of men who are free and equal is little likely to happen; because in such a community the apparent majority is the real majority, and the others, as I have hinted before, know that too well to obstruct from mere pig-headedness; especially as they have had plenty of opportunity of putting forward their side of the question."

"How is that managed?" said I.

"Well," said he, "let us take one of our units of management, a commune, or a ward, or a parish (for we have all three names, indicating little real distinction between them now, though time was there was a good deal). In such a district, as you would call it, some neighbours think that something ought to be done or undone; a new town-hall built; a clearance of inconvenient houses; or say a stone bridge substituted for some ugly old iron one,—there you have undoing and doing in one. Well, at the next ordinary meeting of the neighbours, or Mote as we call it, according to the ancient tongue of the times before bureaucracy, a neighbour proposes the change, and of course if everybody agrees, there is an end of discussion, except about details. Equally, if no one backs the proposer—'seconds him,' it used to be called—the matter drops for the time being; a thing not likely to happen amongst reasonable men, however, as the proposer is sure to have talked it over with others before the Mote. But supposing the affair proposed and seconded, if a few of the neighbours disagree to it, if they think that the beastly iron bridge will serve a little longer and they don't want to be bothered with building a new one just then, they don't count heads that time, but put off the formal discussion to the next Mote; and meantime arguments pro and con are flying about, and some get printed, so that everybody knows what is going on; and when the Mote comes together again there is a regular discussion and at last a vote by show of hands. If the division is a close one, the question is again put off for further discussion: if the division is a wide one, the minority are asked if they will yield to the more general opinion, which they often, nay, most commonly do. If they refuse, the question is debated a third time, when, if the minority has not perceptibly grown, they always give way; though as a matter of fact, if there is any rule on the case, they might still carry it on further: but I say, what always happens is that they are convinced, not perhaps that their view is the wrong one, but that they cannot persuade or force the community to adopt it."

"Very good," said I; "but what happens if the divisions are still narrow?"

Said he: "As a matter of principle and according to the rule of such cases, the question must then lapse, and the majority, if so narrow, has to submit to sitting down under the status quo. But I must tell you that in point of fact the minority very seldom enforces this rule, but generally yields in a friendly manner."

"But do you know," said I, "that there is something in all this very like democracy; and I thought that democracy was considered to be in a moribund condition many, many years ago."

The old boy's eyes twinkled. "I grant you that our methods have that drawback. But what is to be done? We can't get anyone amongst us to complain of his not always having his own way in the teeth of the community, when it is clear that everybody cannot have that indulgence. What is to be done?"

"Well," said I, "I don't know."

Said he: "The only alternatives to our method that I can conceive of are these. First, that we should choose out, or breed, a class of superior persons capable of judging on all matters without consulting the neighbours; that, in short, we should get for ourselves what used to be called an aristocracy of intellect; or, secondly, that for the purpose of safe-guarding the freedom of the individual will, we should revert to a system of private property again, and have slaves and slaveholders once more. What do you think of those two expedients?"

"Well," said I, "there is a third possibility—to wit, that every man should be quite independent of every other, and that thus the tyranny of society should be abolished."

He looked hard at me for a second or two, and then burst out laughing very heartily; and I confess that I joined him. When he recovered himself he nodded at me, and said: "Yes, yes, I quite agree with you—and so we all do."

"Yes," I said, "and besides, it does not press hardly on the minority: for, take this matter of the bridge, no man is obliged to work on it if he doesn't agree to its building. At least, I suppose not."

He smiled, and said: "Shrewdly put; and yet from the point of view of the native of another planet. If the man of the minority does find his feelings hurt, doubtless he may relieve them by refusing to help in building the bridge. But, dear neighbour, that is not a very effective salve for the wound caused by the 'tyranny of a majority' in our society; because all work that is done is either beneficial or hurtful to every member of it. The man is benefited by the bridge-building if it turns out a good thing, and hurt by it if it turns out a bad one, whether he puts a hand to it or not, and meanwhile he is benefiting the bridge-builders by his work, whatever that may be. In fact, I see no help for him except the pleasure of saying 'I told you so' if the bridge-building turns out to be a mistake and hurts him; if it benefits him he must suffer in silence. A terrible tyranny our Communism, is it not? Folk used often to be warned against this very unhappiness in times past, when for every well-fed, contented person you saw a thousand miserable starvelings. Whereas for us, we grow fat and well-liking on the tyranny; a tyranny, to say the truth, not to be made visible by any microscope I know. Don't be afraid, my friend; we are not going to seek for troubles by calling our peace and plenty and happiness by ill names whose very meaning we have forgotten!"

He sat musing for a little, and then started and said: "Are there any more questions, dear guest? The morning is waning fast amidst my garrulity."

WILLIAM MORRIS.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

IN THE ARGENTINE.

COMMERCE here is in a delightful state of confusion. Gold went up the day before yesterday to 274, and to-day has gone down (!) to 255. Everything is, of course, frightfully dear, and business is paralysed. I believe we are on the eve of very hard times.

It is a great pity to see so many poor emigrants still coming to this country, though I see by the papers to-day that there is a serious falling-off of the numbers in January and February as compared with the same months of last year. The last act of the wretched Irish and English immigration has been played out. The settlers of the Naposta Colony sent a deputation to Buenos Ayres a fortnight ago to wait on the English Immigration Committee, and asked that something should be done for them. You will see the whole matter in a paragraph from the Southern Cross of February 14th, which I enclose:

"We regret to hear of very sorrowful accounts from the colony of Naposta. One account says that the owners of chacras will not average a profit of forty paper dollars each after paying the claims of the company. It is the opinion of an intelligent man who has seen the place that the crops of the most industrious Irish colonists will not pay for the interest charged on the land, and the gentleman, who is a great friend of the colony and is most impartial in his estimate, assures us that the Irish colonists have done far better than their English neighbours. Another independent witness thinks that each owner of a chacra will not have an average of 30 dols., or less than £3 sterling, after paying the lion's share of the produce to the company. And we must remember that the Viticola Company was not legally bound to supply provisions to the colony for more than one year, which is now soon to expire. The question is, then, what will become of these unfortunate people? After being infested with vermin in the 'Hotel,' after lying down for several days in the muck of an abandoned stable in the Paseo de Julio, after seeing their little ones die of cold and pestilence by their sides, after passing, in fact, through a 'via crucis' of slander, insult, and injury, they now find themselves, we fear, in the same position as they were in the day they landed from the 'Dresden.' Mr. Bulkley O'Meara, the Dublin information agent, is at present in this city. As he painted this country in such glowing colours to the emigrants, perhaps he will now come to the rescue of those who confided in his words, and interest himself in their behalf."

This will show what false hopes are held out to poor people coming here. From this time I believe the chances of doing anything here will be much less than ever, for the prices of Indian corn and wheat have gone down so much in Europe, that there will soon be perfect stagnation in the export of these articles; and it is on exportation they depend, as the consumption of the country is small compared with production.

There is but little doing here among us, but we are preparing to celebrate the anniversary of the Paris Commune on the 18th.

Four of our comrades who were suspected of having had something to do with the publication of a manifesto to the workers in Buenos Ayres, in September last, have since then been lying in jail in this free country! When they will get out we have not the slightest idea, and this though the man who did it very properly declares he was the sole author of it. Bail was refused for every man who was known to be an Anarchist. Well! the day of reckoning is coming.

J. CREAGHE.

Buenos Ayres, March 5th, 1890.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

PARIS, April 20.—At a meeting of the leather-dressers, held to consider the question of taking part in the May-day demonstration, comrade Tortellier strongly recommended their participation. He hoped the affair would result in a general strike, to be closed when the eight-hours day had been secured as a first instalment of what they wanted. Of course, their one great object was to overturn the capitalist Bastille. The Anarchist vote carried the meeting in favour of the demonstration.

LE PIN (Loire Inf.).—Here is a little scene of the joys of country life that might very well have come from 'La Terre.' A farmer of the village of Le Pin was seen by a neighbour to fall senseless while digging and tending his vines. The doctor on arriving finds that his illness is due to starvation, and the man's wife tells how one thing after another, first grain, then the cow, and so on, is sold to pay the rent, the small store of potatoes is consumed, and nothing is left but to die. The desolate scene is no uncommon one among the vineyards of Nantes, where the peasants lived formerly a prosperous if not an easy life. The last good vintage was in 1875; since then the spring frosts have each year ruined the buds; then came the mildew in '77, then the phylloxera in '89. The vines, which need the greatest care in cultivation, and much expenditure, scarcely produce anything now; the peasants, either as owners of some few yards of vineyard, or renting the same, can no longer make a living, as formerly, or even make the rent of their land, and are fallen into a state of the profoundest misery.

LE HAVRE.—Louise Michel held a meeting here last Sunday to an audience of more than 600, the subject of her discourse being the May Day Labour Demonstration. The citoyenne does not pronounce in favour of the same, considering that no practical results are to be expected from it, and according to her the only thing to be done is to prepare for a general strike, which is sure to take place sooner or later.

L'Egalité has again been prosecuted on account of "incitement to riot and murder," and the publisher and editors, Caillava, Zevaco and Couret, have been sentenced to imprisonment and fines varying from three to fifteen months, and 1,000 to 5,000 francs.

MARSEILLES.—The appearance shortly of a new Socialist journal is announced in this town. It will be a daily and of fair size, and is to be called Le Peuple.

NOTTEVILLE, DARNETAL, etc. (Normandy).—Various small and incessant tyrannies go on in workshops of some of the small towns of Normandy. For instance, in the matter of fines, we see in glancing down one column of Le Salariat, 50 centimes (5d.) for being three minutes late. In another place, the fine is different on different days, as thus: 50 centimes for being late on Monday, 30 c. on other days. When for one cause or another an employé is absent all day, hey presto! 3 francs fine, and this in a workshop where the mean wage per day is only 2 francs. And other innumerable little worries, which seem too trivial to put down, but which all the same help to make up the sum of daily miseries in which the workers live. One scarcely knows which most to execrate, these small day to day tyrannies and slow bleeding by the master in a small way who has only lately and laboriously risen "from the ranks" himself, or the exploitation on a large scale—wholesale, frank, brutal, and impersonal.

BELGIUM.

GHEENT.—The unemployed workmen of Ghent have been marching through the principal streets of the town, accompanied by trumpets, and placards on which is written "Give us work or bread," "Abandoned by man, what is there left for us to do?" etc., etc. A delegation of the unemployed, consisting of nine workmen belonging to nine different trades, was conducted to the presence of the governor. The interview lasted more than an hour, and in the course of it the men explained their situation and asked for employment in public works. The governor replied that he was not empowered to set public works on foot, but that he would transmit the demand to the Government, of which he was only a representative. At the end of the audience the procession re-formed and marched to the office of Vooruit to tell the result of the mission, distributing leaflets by the way. Afterwards the delegates were received by the burgomaster at the Hotel de Ville. The manifestation was, as can be seen, of a calm and orderly nature. It remains to be seen if the unemployed of Ghent will get much out of it. M. M.

HOLLAND.

AMSTERDAM, April 19.—The Municipality here has refused to grant the request of several labour societies for permission to hold a parade on May 1, as a demonstration in favour of a normal working day of eight hours.

GERMANY.

THE TYRANNY OF GERMAN CAPITALISTS.—The German capitalists who sent a deputation over here a few months ago to enquire into the relations between masters and workmen have made good use of the knowledge they have thus acquired. According to the German correspondent of the Labour Tribune, they have taken to heart the lesson they have learnt from the English bosses, and have formed "powerful and well-organised employers' associations, which pursue their interests in most vigorous and heartless manner." They have the workmen at their mercy, as they are completely disorganised, and their leaders are "victimised, starved, and prosecuted" by the associated masters. Most of these employers' associations have recently issued an edict that any workman who leaves his work on the 1st of May will be at once dismissed and not employed again in any of the associated works; and if a strike occurs at one of the works, the men are turned out to starve at all the factories belonging to the association. Every day the tyranny increases and the masters are becoming "more provoking and overbearing than ever." The emperor's philanthropy does not seem to have made the German workmen any better off, and it is simply another demonstration of the powerlessness of legislation to improve the condition of workers. In spite of Social Democratic parliamentary victories and imperial rescripts, the tyranny of the masters grows worse and worse, and open revolt now seems the only course left to the German workmen. THE COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. For Australia, New Zealand, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Transvaal, and the Argentine Republic, a year, 8s.; six months, 4s.; three months, 2s. For India, Ceylon, China, Hong Kong, and the Straits Settlements, a year, 10s.; six months, 5s.; three months, 2s. 6d.

Subscribers who receive a RED WRAPPER are thereby reminded that their subscriptions have expired and must be renewed immediately if they wish to continue to receive COMMONWEAL.

SPECIAL RECRUIT SUBSCRIPTIONS.—To aid in spreading our principles, the following largely reduced terms are offered to those who obtain new subscribers: Two new yearly subscriptions for British Islands, etc., 10s. 6d.; for Australia, etc., 15s.; for India, etc., 19s. Five new subscriptions: For British Islands, etc., 25s.; for Australia, etc., 37s. 6d.; for India, etc., 47s. 6d. Specimen copies will be sent on receipt of postage.

Remittances from abroad must be made by International Money Order.

NOTES ON NEWS.

ONE of the most interesting experiments in journalism which I have seen for a long time is Cynicus, the first number of which has just appeared, and which will be published every fortnight at 3d. It contains no advertisements, nor will it advertise; the proprietor, who is also editor, and indeed the whole staff, being resolved that cost shall be the arbiter of price, and that his paper shall perish rather than submit to the tyranny of the advertiser. Every reader of Commonweal who can afford the fortnightly 3d. should order Cynicus along with his Weal. The principal sketch in the present number represents Capital and Labour, and would make an admirable decoration for club and branch room walls.

The same attitude towards the advertiser is assumed by the long-talked-of Australian labour paper, the first number of which, dated March 1st, we have just received. It is called the Worker, and bears the sub-title "Monthly Journal of the Associated Workers of Queensland." About the size of the Christian Socialist, it gives 16 pages of three columns each of closely printed reading matter. While not professing more than advanced trade-union principles, it promises to be a thoroughly sound and reliable labour advocate, and a most valuable ally in the cause of progress. It says, by the way, that "It isn't true that there is a capitalistic move on foot to start an organ to be called the Drone in opposition to the Worker. Capitalism is satisfied with the way its present organs work the oracle, which teaches, 'If you have no case, abuse the other side.'"

There is a most delightful letter in the Women's Penny Paper this week. Words fail one before it; imagination shrinks from the fancied picture of its writer. Read this; I don't know what it is in reply to, but it is enormous; the italics are her own:

"A Gentlewoman" does me injustice if she supposes me to consider that any necessary or useful work is lowering. That is an opinion only held by what I fear I must continue to call "the lower classes." "A Gentlewoman" asks, "Why should there be lower classes?" To ask this is to arraign a fixed and immutable law of Nature. So long as there are wise and foolish, sober and drunken, thrifty and unthrifty, clever and stupid, so long will there be higher and lower classes. The individuals that constitute our lower classes at any given moment are those who have not in them the qualities that command success. They are drawn from all the other classes, and sink as naturally to the bottom as the dregs sink to the bottom of the cup. . . . Those who remain at the bottom for any length of time are thoroughly well suited to their situation, depend upon it. "A Gentlewoman" cannot mean to deny that there are lower classes, or why does she sign herself by that proud title? Your correspondent continues: "We gentlefolks are ignorant and we sin, and the lower classes (sic) are degraded because of our sin." I should think it much more probable they are degraded because of their own sin. I only wish the lower classes would copy the virtues, instead of merely the bonnets, of gentlewomen, namely, thrift, honesty, sobriety, prudence in marriage, and so forth. We might then do away almost entirely with our prisons, our police, our asylums for drunkards, our workhouses, and innumerable other institutions. But I am aware that this doctrine is unpalatable. Truth usually is so.

Is not that stupendous? Then what do you think of this:

"My opponent speaks of the want of sympathy between classes. I have always been greatly struck by the want of sympathy evinced by the lower classes for the higher. Hundreds and thousands of the higher classes devote their lives in part, or wholly, to striving to better the lot of the lower; but I never heard of a single instance of a reciprocal devotion, gratis. And yet the higher classes have their troubles, even more unendurable than those of the lower, if we may judge by the larger proportion of suicides among them. But they get no sympathy from below. . . . All the sympathy, all the feeling of brotherhood is on one side only; all the kind deeds done without hope of reward are done by the higher classes, and are looked on by the recipients as no more than their due."

Another correspondent of the same paper is "Perfectly persuaded that the 'ideals of villadom' are, on the whole, higher than in any other division of society. Purer lives, truer piety, deeper culture, and more unselfish care for the welfare of others are to be met with in villas than in either mansions on the one hand, or cottages or lodgings on the other. Indeed, are we not told by Socialists that in the good time coming, when all shall equal be, that every individual is to occupy the position of the now despised middle classes, being neither rich nor poor?"

What Socialists? Name! name! good lady. 'Twould be a queer kind of a Socialist who held up the respectable villa-dwelling bourgeois as an ideal before the workers. There may be so-called Socialists who do it, but they are those who have not quite freed themselves from the philistinism and cant, which are the characteristics of the bourgeois, and are themselves imbued with the spirit of villadom. S.

"There never was a time when the dignity of labour was more fully and truly recognised than at present." This stupendous statement appears in the course of an article written by an anonymous liner of the Daily Telegraph's, in bitter opposition to the projected May Day demonstrations. There was a time when "recognition" and soft phrases would have salved labour's ills, and when workmen could be lulled with canting talk about the "sympathy" of the well-to-do with the struggles of their poorer brethren, and suchlike Daily Telegraphisms. But, alas and alas, those days are gone by! The Schoolmaster in the Red Cap has been abroad, and the "recognition of the dignity of labour" is his reward. Those who, as Ruskin has it, pawn "the dirty linen of their souls in order that they may dine," by writing abuse of the working class in their vile capitalist sheets, will probably in the near future have not only to recognise in literary sugar-coated pills the "dignity" of labour, but be forced to share in it before they can enjoy its fruits.

"This throwing out of gear of all the social machinery, and just in the busy time, too," wails the scribe; and then he lauds his last hope, the "sensible British artisan," of whom on that day we may fear nothing more than his ordinary peaceful movement to and fro his daily toil. Then he gives us the superfluous information that all the work-days of the toiling masses are spent in every country in a feverish struggle to elbow each other out of the markets of the world. True, O scribe! and you and those who order your productions of the pen may take warning that we are tired and weary of this miserable fratricidal strife. A new spirit is abroad, a yearning for international solidarity; and although we dissent from the suppliant attitude of those who are at the head of the May Day demonstrations, yet we heartily welcome this sign of accord amongst the workers of the world.

Events are moving rapidly, and soon as the Social Revolution overtakes us we shall be face to face with a problem of great magnitude—no less than what to do with the anonymous scribes, whose avocation, like Othello's, would be gone. No longer should we be treated to those glowing productions anent the drum-beat that sounds the sunrise round the world to proclaim British power, or those gorgeous descriptions of the jewels and fal-lals worn by bare-necked Society belles. No longer would the world be electrified with the startling intelligence that her majesty walked out yesterday, and used presumably both feet in the process, or that Lady Fitz-Dodo gave a sumptuous repast at her mansion, possibly in recognition of the "dignity of labour." Sad to foretell, but an iconoclastic mob may in response to his plea for existence respond with Voltairian indifference that they don't see the necessity, and then will cold weather beset the Special Correspondent.

ANOTHER COMPLIMENT.

Mrs. S t requests that no more numbers of the Commonweal be sent to her house. It is a paper whose principles are subversive of all law and order; therefore, as a Christian mother she cannot allow it in her house, and should any more numbers be sent they will be returned unopened and the postage unpaid.

COMMUNE CELEBRATION.

The following letter, read at the Commune meeting, was by inadvertence omitted from report:

We, the members of the Scottish Socialist Federation, send our fraternal greetings to our London comrades on this the nineteenth anniversary of the Paris Commune. "Drink we the unforgotten dead!"

The energy of the Commune should be an example to all Socialist fellow-workers. The blood of its martyrs was shed for International Freedom. And each anniversary of this great rising of the proletariat should inspire all Socialists with fresh courage to fight for, and bring about, the triumph of the Social Revolution.—On behalf of the members, I am, dear comrade, yours fraternally,

WILLIAM D. TAIT, Secretary.

"INVENTORS UNDER SOCIALISM."

SIR,—I have been asked to prepare for our Tuesday night meeting, as a subject of discussion, an answer to the letter of John W. Love on "Inventors under Socialism," which appeared in Commonweal of March 29th. As no reply has appeared to that letter I send this, which perhaps you may care to insert. John Love asks how inventors would be rewarded under Socialism. A what-need-hardly-be-called hypothetical case, is taken from the present system. An individual of inventive faculty having control of certain means of production, devises a "cheaper process of producing an article which is useful to the people and already in demand." He "pays the fullest wages of the trade" to those he employs, but, as the fruit of his invention, he requires to employ fewer workers than other manufacturers do for the same output; he, presumably conducting his business otherwise as successfully, gathers as "rent of ability" what he thus saves in wages. It is useful to note in passing that his share in the "rent of ability" will vary as his share in the means of production. If he own all he will receive the full reward; if but partially he will have to divide with others. If he owned not at all he would have run a very fair risk of receiving not at all. It is unfortunate that John Love, in questioning as to how Socialism would deal with the matter, does not make it clear that he conceives of Socialism as anything really different from the present system. With the means of production and distribution under the community's control for the supply of its needs, it is difficult, if not impossible, to see how an inventor, except in the most subsidiary trade, could ever have an opportunity to employ people to work for him. If such, then, is the case, and the incentive of personal gain in this particular form is largely, if not altogether, wanting, might there not, it may be asked, be a danger that the inventive faculty would fall into decay and the community be all this the poorer in intellect as well as in leisure and pleasure? This, I take it, is the real though unformulated question of John Love's letter. Except from this point of view it is of really no importance whatever that the inventor should receive any reward, other than that which he gets in seeing his invention prove a benefit to his fellows.

Recognising, however, with John Love, that all are not tuned to this pitch, it might be considered a matter of expediency for communities of workers to offer rewards for inventions. Closely allied, if not really identical with this question, is that of the reward of those who, while not introducing any new methods, show special powers within the old ones. In the time of transition it may be found necessary to reward such somewhat more highly than their fellows. But as with the socialisation of the means of production and exchange we should ever more and more find ourselves committed to Communism, all such distinctions would tend to vanish. With full means of existence and ample leisure secured, all hankering after an excess of goods over others would be recognised as not merely a sin but an atrocious vulgarity. We would never think then of rewarding our inventor with a gift of goods, unless, I daresay, he were a man who could not do anything else.

Bradlaugh describes John Burns as a "blatant orator at street corners." This, says the Boomerang, is good coming from a man who is a blatant orator everywhere else.

HIGH STREET, KENSINGTON.

I DON'T know that I know any more depressing sight than High Street, Kensington, on an ordinary moderately fine winter afternoon. It is my misfortune not unfrequently to have to pass that way; but I must confess that I avoid it as much as I can, at any rate at those hours of the day when "ladies" do their shopping. King's Parade, Brighton, is pretty bad, and the slums of Sheffield are pretty bad; but for a collection of weary, dreary, heartless, hopeless faces, commend me to High Street, Kensington. On one side as you walk along the trottoir stands, in the gutter, a long row of the mere outcasts of humanity; wretched old women with thin shawls and mouldy boots, shivering visibly in the biting East, shapeless men with blue noses and bristly chins, thievish looking youths and pale-faced pert children—making a precarious living, as you may guess, by the sale of penny toys, offering all imaginable and utterly useless new-fangled wonders—if by any means one out of the well-dressed crowd may be induced to stop and buy. Thin, starved, twisted with deceit and degradation, such faces infect one with their own despair; in almost pleasant contrast to them are the looks of a few brazen coarse-featured flower-girls, who by selling from time to time the dwindling remnants of their "virtue," have obtained at any rate the wherewithal to get food and plentiful drink. Out of all the faces, flower-girls and all, there is not one on which the eye can rest without pain, not one—I have been up and down three times, but there is not one. There is not a face in which joy and happiness dwells, not one.

And then on the pavement, jostling each other, wrapped to the chin in furs, goes the highly respectable crowd, "stiff with decency and starch," from which the outcasts are trying to extort a penny; and I do not know if this is not the more damnable sight of the two. Yes, there are one or two bright, one or two thoughtful, faces among them—but the mass, the great mass—what weariness, O God! what leaden-eyed weariness and mere repletion, as they lounge into the shops, or scrutinise the objects in the windows!—what stolid and stony indifference as they glance at the things in the gutter!

Is it possible that these are human beings, and these also? On the one side a crowd gorged with money, considering what merest trifle it may buy, what faintest want it may gratify—if only a scarf to adorn the drawing-room mirror with, or a pair of kid-gloves to match its bonnet; and on the other side a crowd pining, perishing, for want of the most imperative necessities of life—physical, mental, and moral—and the two crowds close together staring, within a foot of each other! What a sight! "For mere sheer cruelty," says a friend of mine, "there's nothing like Respectability," and as I gaze at this spectacle I think I understand what he means.

It is not that these delicate-bred women (and men) have no hearts. But their cardiac ganglions are torpid, quite torpid. Bred in luxury and ease, they have seldom been called on to make sacrifices for each other; physical deprivation is a mere name to them; the life of human toil and human fellowship has passed them by; their affectional nature have become dwarfed; their power of sympathy contracted within the four walls of a stuffy respectability; and so the one thing which might at the same instant deliver them and the gutter-things, and give them both a reasonable interest in existence, is, alas! as matters are, quite impossible. A gulf is fixed; the policeman walks with his truncheon along the curb. A brougham drives up and scatters the ragged ones. A footman obsequiously opens the door; and another leaden-eyed "lady" wrapped in furs disappears into "Barker's."

It is all very strange. I walk up and down and wonder if it is a dream—some quite solid and indigestible nightmare. Supposing (I think) it were some tribe in the interior of Africa—which the pious Stanley had just discovered—of which we heard that the natives had these customs. That a certain class among them were in the habit of walking up and down a shady promenade, on one side of which were heaped great stores of bananas, mealies, dates, cotton-cloth, beads, and Sheffield knives—from which heaps said promenaders helped themselves freely to all they wanted; while on the other side, in the burning heat, stood a row of poor creatures (of the same tribe) in continual torture for want of food, waiting for hours and hours and hours, and all their lives, for bits of refuse to be thrown to them. What should we say to that? And yet, whatever plentiful villainous cruelties of burnings and other torments savages (chiefly under the influence of superstition) do perpetrate, I doubt whether any traveller has yet told us of such a scene of sheer cold-blooded indifference as that which I am describing.

And yet it goes on, and will go on—till the frame of this present anti-social "society" is rent in twain. The beggars still stand, offering their ingenious trifles in the gutter; the shops spread their piles of goods (grapes at 5s. 6d. to 7s. a lb., bonnets at 27s. each) in the windows; the policeman and the footman still marshal the show—and between goes the weary stream of stony faces whose aspect chills one to the bone:

"For Respectables are we,
And that is why, you see,
We confidently claim to be respected.
In well-ordered homes we dwell,
And discharge our duties well,
Well-dressed, well-fed, well-mannered, well-connected."

And this is High Street, Kensington, or "that part of Heaven which is called Hell."

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Eight Hours Demonstration.

It is, I think, a great pity that the English workers cannot hold their united demonstration on the 1st of May, at the same time as their Continental brethren. However large the demonstration on Sunday May 4th may be, it will lose its significance as a declaration of fraternity between the English and Continental workers. Of course, we know it is a hard thing for the workman to lose a day's work in the busy season of the year, but then the Continental workers will do it, and they cannot afford it so well as the English. Even if the demonstration had not been such a big affair upon the 1st of May, the middle classes would have known that the men composing it were determined to have the Eight Hour Day, and were not afraid of self-sacrifice in order to obtain it; but there will be no such certainty about the demonstration on May 4th. It will merely rank with the usual political demonstrations, which make plenty of noise for a few hours and then disappear and are forgotten, and no one is much affected one way or another. It is a remarkable fact that the Star, which is now manipulated by Mr. John Morley and the official Liberal gang has been very earnest in recommending May 4th as the date for the demonstration. As these people are certainly not friendly to the Eight Hours Day, advice from such a source is certainly suspicious, as it is clearly to the interest of John Morley and Co. that the demonstration should not be too successful.

But though most of the trade societies have decided for May 4th, yet some of the English workers will hold demonstrations on May 1st. The National Federation of Trades and Industries announce a demonstration for the afternoon, and the Socialist League will hold a mass meeting on Clerkenwell Green in the evening, of May Day. Thus the international meaning of the demonstration will not be altogether lost.

Threatened Great Strike of Railwaymen.

A great strike of North-Eastern Railwaymen is expected. The men have demanded the establishment of the ten hours system. The directors have made some slight wages concessions, but have refused the demand for the reduction of hours. The men have twice offered to submit the question to arbitration, but this the company has also declined. Ballot-papers have now been sent round to the men by the secretary of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants, and they are to give their decision as to whether they are prepared to send in their notices. The ballot-papers are to be returned to the central office of the union not later than April 26th. The ten hours system is very much wanted, as some of the men on this line have been working eighty hours a-week, and have to work the Sunday over and above for nothing, because they come on duty after six o'clock at night. There is some chance that the strike may come off, as the men are very enthusiastic and well organised, and as all grades on the line have grievances, they are likely to strike with the unionists. The railwaymen have as much power in their hands as the miners, if they choose to use it. By a general strike on all lines they could bring work everywhere to a standstill in a few days, and that they are still the slaves of directors is entirely owing to their apathy and cowardice in the past. Let us hope that they will now display nobler qualities.

The Strike in the Boot Trade.

This strike is now concluded, as far as the orthodox trade-unionists are concerned. The terms agreed to are as follows: 1. The manufacturers will open workshops at the earliest possible date. 2. Matters relating to classification and all other questions, except a direct reduction of wages, may be referred to arbitration. 3. A uniform statement of wages shall be forthwith prepared for all shops except the present first and second class houses. At the same time an arbitration committee was formed of seven masters and seven men to discuss the time to be taken by the masters for the provision of workshops. The Jewish workmen are not satisfied with this arrangement. They say that the sweaters have only agreed to these terms to tide the busy season over, and that after Whitsuntide they will have the men at their mercy and will then break their word. They have some reason for this suspicion, as the sweated tailors were treated in a very similar fashion, as after they had got the men to work, the sweaters broke every clause of the agreement. The men therefore refuse to return to work unless workshops are provided at once.

The West-end bootmakers have got a shilling advance a-pair on ground work from their masters. We congratulate them on their easy victory.

Victory of Swansea Tram Men.

The tram company surrendered on Saturday. Both the dismissed men have been taken back, and the company have consented to a reduction of hours.

Livesey's Testimonial.

Some middle-class snobs have presented Livesey with an illuminated address and £1,720 for his services to "society" in starving 2,000 gas-stokers with their wives and children. Livesey, who is anxious to pose as a philanthropist (on the cheap), is going to devote the money to providing a recreation ground for the poor of South London. How kind! The starving gas-stokers can go and console themselves for penury and privation by looking at the flowers. A distinguished character in old world history, commonly known as Judas, once also invested some money he had obtained by similar means in landed property. Livesey is anxious to copy him. Will he follow the example still further by hanging himself in the midst thereof? N.

Jewish Tailors' Strike in Manchester.

For a week, about 1,250 Jewish machinist tailors and pressers have been on strike in Manchester. In the past they have worked from 75 to 95 hours a-week under insanitary conditions for low wages, and they now demand that their working day should be ten and a half hours. As most of them are piece-workers, they also asked for an extra 3d. per garment for machinists and 2d. for the pressers, in order to compensate for the loss of time involved by reducing hours. The men's secretary, Mr. J. Marshall, is a member of the Socialist League, and there are some Socialists among the members—facts which the sweaters' defenders quoted to indicate the dangerous nature of the movement. The men's demands were ultimately modified to 2d. and 1½d. extra, with 1s. for stitched garments and 1s. 6d. for bound in the bespoke department; and up to Sunday night 50 masters out of 130 had given way. Many of the speeches at the strike demonstrations have been distinctly Socialistic in their character. P.

THEN AND NOW.

With horse of wood and hempen rein,
Our free forefathers coursed the main;
With hardened strength they sailed and fought,
They fronted death as brave men ought,
And made the best man master.

Their day knew no to-morrow's dread,
They drank good drink, nor wanted bread;
And though their war was never done,
They breathed the air and saw the sun,
And were the wide world's freemen.

The iron ships fly east and west,
At greedy Commerce's behest;
With giant haste they quell the waves,—
And down the stoke-holes sweat the slaves
Of money-lords in England.

Fools, fools are ye whose starveling toil
Yields to the money-lords their spoil;
With torment-smoke ye hide heaven's light,
And ease and plenty take their flight
From you, ye men of England!

JOHN C. KENWORTHY.

ROBERT OWEN'S LAST SON DEAD.

RICHARD OWEN, of New Harmony, Pozey County, one of the pioneers of Southern Indiana, died on the 24th ult., through drinking a glass of embalming fluid in mistake for mineral water. He was the third son of Robert Owen, the others being Robert Dale Owen, distinguished in the public service, as a publicist, and in his later years as a Spiritualist, and David Dale Owen, a very notable geologist, both of whom are dead. Richard was born at New Lanark, January 26, 1810, was educated in the grammar schools, and, like his brothers, at Emanuel von Fellenberg's school in Switzerland. He went to the States in 1828, intending to teach at New Harmony, Ind., the location of his father's unsuccessful community. But he went into business in Cincinnati, and when he returned to New Harmony, which was thenceforth his home, it was to manage a steam flour-mill and a stock farm. In 1847 he went to Mexico as captain in the 16th infantry, and served under General Taylor. After the war, he joined his brother David in preparing for the geological survey of Minnesota, and took part in it. In 1849 he became professor of natural sciences in the Western Military Institute of Kentucky, afterwards the University of Nashville, and there remained until his brother's appointment as State geologist of Indiana, when he was made assistant geologist and worked on the survey of the State. When the war broke out and soldiery was in request, he was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the 15th Indiana regiment, and in the fall of 1861 he became colonel of the 60th regiment. He served under General Sherman in Mississippi, and under General Banks in the Red River expedition. On his return from service in 1864, he took the chair of natural sciences in the University of Indiana, which he resigned in 1879. His geological work has been of great value, covering not only the regions aforementioned, but also New Mexico, Arizona, and North Carolina. He has for the past ten years devoted especial attention to meteorology, with relation to terrestrial magnetism and the disturbances of the earth's crust, and has published many papers in scientific periodicals, as well as reports. CH.

Bellamy's "Looking Backward" has had an unprecedented sale in Queensland, according to the Boomerang. Eleven hundred copies have been disposed of in Brisbane.

The threatened strike at the Day Dawn Block, Charters Towers, Australia, has been averted owing to the firm attitude taken up by the union, the question in dispute being whether lads over 18 should be allowed to receive less than the union wage. The manager has given way, but at the same time he threatens to discharge all lads, no matter what their age is. This seems a rather petty proceeding.

The miners clamour for food is one to which no Christian heart should be steeled. Charity's purse strings cannot be too promptly loosened in answer to that terrible cry for aid.—New York Herald.—There is something the miners need more than charity, comments the Boston Globe. It is justice. Under any just laws relating to mining property the poor miners would not suffer for work while the rest of the country suffers for coal.

NINE HOURS IN NEW YORK.—The master marble workers of New York City and State have acceded to the demand of the men that henceforth the working day in the trade shall consist of nine hours, and that the reduction of the hours shall not be followed by a relative decrease in wages. Two thousand two hundred men were affected by the dispute, which at one time threatened to result in very serious trouble.

BRICKLAYER AND GENERAL.—Last week, at Maidenhead, a bricklayer went to General Phillips' residence and offered a plant for sale. Being sharply ordered off the premises, the man, so 'twas said, assumed "a fighting attitude." The general had been an amateur wrestler, and saw here a chance for a little cheap exercise of his skill: he seized the plant-vendor and threw him to the ground. Next morning there was an assault case tried: but it was the bricklayer who was sent to gaol for 14 days, and not the general!

MAY DAY DEMONSTRATION.

London and Provincial Branches are requested to have the following resolution passed at the meetings held by them on May Day :

"That this meeting hails with joy the awakening of Labour which is taking place throughout the civilised world; declares the necessity for the union of workers in all countries to obtain complete freedom from the monopoly of capitalists; asserts that the only possible remedy for the poverty and misery of the workers is the free access to the resources of nature, and the management by the workers of the organisation of Labour; and calls on all workers to accept the task of bringing about this freedom as a necessary duty paramount over all others."

London comrades are asked to turn up at the League offices by 12.30 on May Day. Banner bearers and other help wanted.

Received towards expenses—W. M., 2s.; Webb, 2s.; R. Turner, 6d.; and S. Bullock, 6d.

REPORTS.

'COMMONWEAL.'—Our hall was crowded to overflowing on Sunday evening last to hear a lecture by G. B. Shaw on "The Consequences of Democracy," but owing to some mistake the lecturer was late. Comrade Mowbray, therefore, opened a discussion on the "Work of the S.L." The opener was criticised by Mahon, Donald, Leno, Shaw, and others. G. B. Shaw has promised to lecture for branch on May 11th; collection 4s. 4d., and good sale of 'Weals.—M.

EAST LONDON.—Comrade Mowbray addressed a good audience in Victoria Park on "Christianity and Socialism;" 14 'Weals and some Freedoms sold.—K. KILBURN.—A good meeting held at the Old Plough last Sunday morning; speakers were J. Presburg and Mainwaring. There is a prospect of a good branch being formed here if the district is properly worked; fair sale of Commonweal.—J. P.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—Good meeting at Latimer Road; speakers were J. F. Lyne, Crouch, A. J. Smith, and H. B.; several 'Weals sold. An enthusiastic meeting was held at Hyde Park; speakers were J. F. Lyne, Crouch, Cantwell, and Mrs. Lahr. A man who interrupted had his hat smashed by the crowd, and had to be escorted from the meeting by the police. At our rooms in the evening a discussion took place on the object of the May International Demonstration; Crouch, Saint, Dean, and others took part; 2s. 1½d. collected, and several 'Weals and song-books sold.

NORTH LONDON.—A splendid meeting at Regent's Park on Sunday morning, addressed by Cantwell, Mowbray, Nicoll, and Mrs. Lahr. The park authorities helped to swell the audience with the full strength of keepers and a number of plain-clothes policemen, two or three sergeants and a chief inspector, while reserves of police were judiciously placed in various places (the Zoo notably) in order to prevent us from speaking on the spot where we have spoken for the last five years; 40 Commonweal and some pamphlets sold; 6s. 9d. collected.—T. C.

STREATHAM.—Our branch assisted at the meeting at Mitcham on Sunday morning. At the Fountain on Sunday night a grand meeting was held; much interest was evinced by Sparling being announced to speak; Smith acted as chairman; six joined the branch. Bundle of leaflets distributed and one quire of Commonweal sold by our house-to-house calling during the day; 29 Commonweal sold at the meeting and 1s. 2½d. collected.—S.

ABERDEEN.—At meeting on 20th Mr. George Bisset, ex-president of Trades Council, lectured on "Labour Politics." A long and well-sustained discussion was carried on at the close of the lecture by quite a host of speakers, mostly non-members of the League.—L.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday, T. and J. Burgoyne spoke on Jail Square. In the evening, at Paisley Road, Joe Burgoyne addressed a large and attentive audience, and spoke mainly upon "The Workers and Foreign Competition."—J. B.

LEEDS.—On Sunday morning last a good meeting was held at Vicars Croft, when Samuels exhibited to the audience the summons he had received to answer the charge of violating the bye-laws of the Market by selling papers on Sunday. We adopted the device of one comrade giving the Commonweal away and another following behind and collecting towards the expenses. We found that this plan answered very well, so we must act so in future. At the meeting in the afternoon the chairman, comrade Sweeney, asked for a collection for the Manchester Jewish tailors on strike, which resulted in 11s.—H. S.

MANCHESTER.—On Saturday night we opened for the season our station on the market ground, Middleton; a good meeting was addressed by Bailie, Stockton, and Barton. At Philips Park on Sunday morning W. K. Hall (of Salford), Stockton, and Barton spoke to a large and sympathetic audience; 2s. collected. In the afternoon, at Stevenson Square, our meeting was held conjointly with the Jewish tailors, who are now on strike against the sweaters. 4,000 to 5,000 persons were present. Lewis Lyons (London), and Marshall, Reeves (Liverpool), Ritson (S.L.) were the speakers. Commonweal sold out—3 quires altogether.—B.

NORWICH.—A well-attended meeting of members was held at comrade Freeman's on Sunday evening. Members' meetings will be held each week at various comrades' houses; notice will appear in Commonweal every week—comrades, please note.

YARMOUTH.—On Tuesday we held our first business meeting in the new club room; fair attendance of members; there is every prospect of the club being a success. On Sunday, in the evening, comrade Ruffold spoke to an attentive audience on Colman's Granary Quay. 11 Commonweal sold.—J. H.

EDINBURGH—SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—Comrade Bruce Glasier (Glasgow) spoke in the Meadows on Sunday afternoon to a large and attentive audience. A collection was taken in aid of the Commonweal. In the hall, in the evening, Glasier lectured on "Socialism: How it can be Achieved." The subject was well treated, and made a good impression.

LIVERPOOL SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—We held two excellent meetings on Sunday. Comrades Bailie (Manchester), W. H. Chapman, and Balfour spoke. Some little opposition created much interest.

STAR RADICAL CLUB, 8 M: yall Road, Herne Hill.—Sunday April 27, at 8, Jos. Loman, "Michael Davitt."

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

LABOUR DAY.

Is the demonstration of Labour Day a mere isolated demonstration, bearing no relation to anything but to the claim for a legal restriction of the hours of labour to the arbitrary figure of eight? Surely it is not so, whatever may be the wishes of some of those who may take part in it. On the one hand it points to what has taken place within the last few years, on the other to the coming events of the next few.

The great event in the history of labour of the last few years has been the growing comprehension of Socialism by the English workmen, as shown by the spirit underlying all the strikes which have lately taken place, and which has been quite different to that of the strikes of the decade before the revival of Socialism in this country.

That spirit is bred from a consciousness, or instinct perhaps, on the part of the workers that these strikes are a part of a definite war which the essential circumstances of their position force them to carry on against their employers; and the upshot of which must be, either the transformation of the workers in general into mere machines without any will at all; or the destruction of the position of the employers; or lastly, as Mr. Giffen and some others try to persuade themselves, the creation of a large class of capable workmen, who, if not really well off, will be better off than ordinary workmen are now; and of a residuum beneath them of hopeless misery and brutality, whose numbers we shall try to reduce as much as we can, but whom we shall not otherwise heed, because they will be kept down by the great mass of the contented and well-to-do workmen.

Of these three conceivable outcomes of the labour war, it cannot be said that the first is really possible, although it is what may be called the high commercial ideal. For supposing the war between masters and men come to an end in the complete and hopeless subjection of the men, there would still remain the war between masters and masters, which, unrestrained by any possible struggle of the workers to free themselves, would at last reach such a pitch that it would bring the whole system to the ground, and result in mere disorganisation and confusion.

Of the third, the outcome of the reasonable and enlightened employer—the contented honest workman and the residuum or helots of both, who don't like it, but can't help themselves—it must be said that it is the ideal of the rich man, who admits that the world is an ugly creation, but knows that he profits by its ugliness and misery, and is therefore content. Happily, it is a baseless dream; for so far from there being any likelihood of any such sharp distinction taking place between one class of workers and another, the whole set of the stream of modern production tends towards breaking down such distinctions. The contented and capable workmen would be very few, instead of being the great mass of workers, and would consist of foremen, sub-managers, and the like; the discontented would be very many, and therefore their discontent would be apt to take a practical form. Have the theorists who support this possibility forgotten the agricultural labourers? If so, they may one day be reminded of them in an uncomfortable manner. There remains the revolutionary outcome; that is to say, the hope that the workers will set themselves free and become their own employers; that they will work, not as captives for a conquering enemy, but as neighbours for neighbours, exchanging labour against labour, without loss on either side, for each other's convenience and happiness.

As this outcome of the labour war is the only one which offers any betterment to the world, so most happily it is the only one which there is any chance of realising. As the war goes on, and therewith the value of the privilege of capital to compel labour without payment decreases, rent, profit, and interest will sink lower and lower, until they will scarcely be worth defending: the function of the employers will be gone, and necessity will compel the workers to push them out of their position of dignity in order that labour may be reorganised, so the world may not starve.

This, then, is the meaning of the unity of labour which the May Labour Day proclaims—that the workers must no longer be a class, but all society, or else there will soon be no society; and this new society they will certainly realise before long.

And how is it to be brought about? In the first place by the workers knowing that they are slaves and longing to be free. In the next place, by their learning that it is possible for them to be free. And lastly, by the enforcing of their will, so that they may become free.

Now, as to this last matter, Labour Day points out to us at least one instrument for the winning of freedom—to wit, an universal strike. The rich live on the labour of the workers in no way metaphorically, but really. Teach the rich this lesson practically, and their power, backed up by their armed slaves, is gone. The workers have shown that they have striking-power capable of victory on minor occasions: let them combine and organise their striking power—capitalise their resources, to borrow a word from the enemy—and how can they be resisted?

It is true that this idea of an universal strike was current amongst the Chartists and was given up by them as unfeasible: but in those days, near as they are to our own, labour was so much less elaborately organised, and the different trades so much less dependent on one another, that they assumed that a strike of a month (the Sacred Month, as they called it) would be necessary; whereas to-day if the coalminers struck with the full assent of the mass of the workers, would not three days be more than enough? The ruling classes would have either to give up or to attack the workers with the armed hand.

Would they do that? or rather, could they? Effectually, they could not; another Peterloo massacre would be the downfall of our present society, far more perilously balanced as it is now than it was in 1820. Some ineffectual sputter there might be; but if we make such a possibility a lion in our path toward freedom, we have degenerated from our forefathers' valiancy.

In short, the lesson of Labour Day is, first of all, consciousness of the unity of interests of labour; secondly, the necessity of the workers learning what it is that they can claim; and thirdly, unity once more in setting about the winning of the freedom of labour.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

STANLEY'S EXPLOITS:

OR,
CIVILISING AFRICA.

In the Daily Telegraph of August 7th, 1876, we find Mr. Stanley in hot water again with the natives of Bambireh, an island on the western side of Albert Nyanza. These lawless savages dragged Stanley's boat ashore and stole his oars and a drum. On the whole, their attitude was threatening, and the explorer wanted to get away. He says:

"As soon as I saw the savages had arrived in the presence of Shekka with our drum, I shouted to my men to push the boat into the water. With one desperate effort my crew of eleven hands lifted and shot it far into the lake, the impetus they had given it causing it to drag them all into deep water. In the meantime the savages, uttering a furious yell of disappointment and baffled rage, came rushing like a whirlwind towards their canoes at the water's edge. I discharged my elephant rifle with two large conical bullets into their midst; and then assisting one of my crew into the boat, told him to help his fellows in while I continued to fight. My double-barrelled shotgun loaded with buckshot was next discharged with terrible effect, for without drawing a single bow or launching a single spear they fell back upon the slope of the hill, leaving us to exert our wits to get ourselves out of the cove before the enemy should decide to man the canoes. My crew was composed of picked men, and in this dire emergency they did ample justice to my choice. Though we were without oars, they were at no loss for a substitute. As soon as they found themselves in the boat they tore up the seats and footboards and begun to paddle, while I was left to single out with my rifle the most prominent and boldest of the enemy. Twice I succeeded in dropping men determined on launching the canoes; and seeing the chief who commanded the party that took the drum, I took deliberate aim with my elephant rifle at him. That bullet, I have since been told, killed the chief and two others who happened to be standing a few paces behind him; and this extraordinary result had more effect, I think, on the superstitious minds of the natives than all previous or subsequent shots. On getting out of the cove we saw two canoes loaded with men coming out in pursuit from another small inlet. I permitted them to come within a hundred yards of us, and this time I used the elephant rifle with explosive balls. Four shots killed five men and sunk the canoes. This decisive affair disheartened the enemy, and we were left to pursue our way unmolested; not, however, without hearing a ringing voice shouting out to us, 'Go and die in the Nyanza!' When the savages counted their losses, they found fourteen dead and wounded with ball and buckshot, which, although I should consider to be very dear payment for the robbery of eight ash oars and a drum, was barely equivalent in fair estimation to the intended massacre of ourselves."

The reader's attention is called to this last sentence, for it is doubtful whether anyone will agree with Stanley that the killing and wounding of fourteen men was not an adequate punishment for the "intended" massacre of Mr. Stanley and his followers. He did not consider it enough, for we find him soon afterwards engaging in another expedition of vengeance. Another fact worthy of notice is the use of "explosive balls," generally known as explosive bullets. The use of these missiles, on account of the diabolical wounds they inflict, has been forbidden in "civilised warfare." Stanley, however, considered them quite good enough for savages. This fiendish cruelty—for which there is not the least defence, as he could have easily have stopped the pursuit of the two canoes without using them—makes his yearnings for "the spread of the gospel" among the natives of Africa sound like the most detestable hypocrisy. The Daily Telegraph of August 10, 1876, contains an amusing rhapsody on the pleasures of rest after massacring the inhabitants of Bambireh, which reminds one of the satisfied purring of the tiger after completely gorging himself with human flesh. The very beginning is laughable in its hypocrisy:

"Sweet is the Sabbath day to the toil-worn traveller [after a bout of shooting savages, be it observed]; happy is the long sea-tossed mariner after his arrival in port; and gladsome were the days of calm after our troublesome (!) exploration of the Nyanza. The brusque storms, the continued rains, the cheerless grey clouds, the wild waves, the loneliness of the islands, and the inhospitality (!) of the natives, were like mere faint phantasmagoria of the memory—so little did we heed what was passed while enjoying the luxury of this rest from our toils. Still, it added to our pleasure to be able to conjure up in the mind the varied incidents of the long lake journey; and they served to enliven and employ the mind, like condiments quickening digestion."

Mr. Stanley's complaints of the "inhospitality" of the natives are rather amusing. Perhaps, if that gentleman had been a guileless savage, and someone had come round setting fire to his house and firing explosive bullets at him, it is possible that he would have been "inhospitable." His reference to the "varied incidents" of his journey serving "to enliven (!) and employ the mind, like condiments quickening digestion," is very suggestive of the tiger smiling blandly after a good gorge which fills him with a sense of comfortable repletion. Mr. Stanley continues: "As the memory flew over the lengthy track of exploration, how fondly it gazed upon the many picturesque bays, margined with water-lilies and lotus plants, or by the green walls of the slender reed-like papyrus . . ." Then after a lot more talk about "green islands," "rich grain-bearing plains," "soft outlined hills," "tall, dark woods," Stanley indulges in a vision of Christianity and commercial civilisation. After speaking of how his memory clung to Uganda, "that beautiful land, with its intelligent king and no less remarkable people," Mr. Stanley's imagination from the present Uganda "painted a future dressed in a robe of civilisation; it saw each gentle hill crowned by a happy village and a spired church from which the bells sounded the call to a gospel service."

What sickening cant from a person who had just been inculcating the gospel by a system of wholesale murder; but Mr. Stanley remembers that trade follows not only the flag but the missionary, who makes an excellent commercial traveller, and he resumes with another flight of his imagination:

"It saw the hill slopes prolific with the fruits of horticulture, and the valleys waving fields of grain; it saw the land smiling with affluence and plenty, its bays crowded with the dark hulls of trading vessels: it heard the sounds of craftsmen at their work, the roar of manufactories and foundries, and the ever buzzing-noise of enterprising industry."

This picture of "enterprising industry" may commend itself to those of our readers who are the fortunate possessors of a commercial mind. Those who are not blest in this important respect will perhaps not be so pleased with its manifold beauties. To these it may seem that the beautiful land of Uganda will not be greatly improved by being turned into a manufacturing district after the model of our Black Country. Nor will its "remarkable people" achieve a higher sense of the blessings of civilised life, after labouring for 12 or 14 hours a-day amid "the roar of manufactories and foundries," by going home to a dark close den in some filthy reeking slum, to watch the way in which their thin starved children are degenerating through starvation, dirt, and disease, into puny miserable abortions of a once vigorous and happy race. The "many picturesque bays, margined by water-lilies and lotus plants, or by the green walls of the slender reed-like papyrus," will lose somewhat of their charm when they have a chemical factory on their shores vomiting sweltering smoke, and pouring forth a green poisonous stream into the placid waters of the lake. Nor will those happy people of Uganda, who trudge under heavy burdens to "the dark hulls of trading vessels," have much cause to bless Mr. Stanley as they writhe beneath the whips of his successors, even though they may receive weekly the high wage of the casual London docker. It is even possible that the inhabitant of the "happy village" on the "gentle hill" may not greatly rejoice when "from the spired church the bells sound the call to a gospel service," when he remembers that he is starving upon a wretched wage, and that though there are "waving fields of grain" in the valleys, and the land is "smiling with affluence and plenty," yet the affluence and plenty is not for him but for his hard taskmasters, those newly-imported pests, the European pests, the European landlord and capitalist. It may be profane, but we cannot help thinking that he may be inclined to say "Damn the gospel service!"

We now come to another instance of "inhospitality" on the part of the natives. A little while after, Mr. Stanley, having finished "resting," determines to start once again upon his "exploring" expedition. At this period he is much disturbed in his mind by a polite message from an African chief—Rwoma, the king of Southern Uzina—through whose territory Stanley desires to pass. Here is the message in full:

"Rwoma sends salaams to the white man; he does not want the white man's cloth, beads, or wine, and the white man must not pass through his country. Rwoma does not want to see him, or any other man with long red hair down to his shoulders, white face, and big red eyes. Rwoma is not afraid of him, but if the white man will come near his country Rwoma and Mirambo will fight him."

Rwoma showed his good sense by refusing to have anything to do with Stanley; but that pioneer of civilisation was only held back from giving Rwoma and his tribe a taste of the resources of civilisation by the reflection that Rwoma was the proud possessor of "150 muskets," and had several thousand warriors at his back. He therefore gave up this idea, and abandoning his intention of marching through Rwoma's territory by force if necessary, took the lake route to Uganda, borrowing some canoes off a friendly chief for this purpose. In crossing the lake Stanley halted at Mahyiga Island, five miles south of Bambireh, and one mile south of Iroba. Being in the near neighbourhood of the natives of Bambireh, he thought that he had not shot enough of them before, so he determined on another massacre. He says in the same letter:

"Remembering the bitter injuries I had received from the savages of Bambireh [they had stolen eight oars and a drum], and the death by violence we had so narrowly escaped, I resolved, unless the natives made amends for their cruelty and treachery, to make war on them, and for this purpose I camped on Mahyiga Island. [He then took measures accordingly]. I dispatched a message to the natives of Bambireh to the effect that if they delivered their king and the two principals into my hands, I would make peace with them. At the same time, not trusting quite to the success of this, I sent a party to summon the king of Iroba, who very willingly came with three of his chiefs to save his people from the horrors of war. Upon their arrival I put them in chains, and told the canoe-men that the price of their freedom was the capture of the king of Bambireh and his two principal chiefs."

Here is Stanley, according to his own admission, loading the chiefs of a peaceful tribe with chains, who had come to save their people from "the horrors of war"—and what those horrors were we know too well—because another tribe had inflicted a trifling injury upon him. This may be considered simple justice by explorers of the modern school, or by their comrades and friends the Arab slave-hunters, but to our minds it is simply abominable injustice and detestable tyranny.

The men of Iroba, however, succeeded in capturing the king of Bambireh, who was "chained heavily," and the king and chiefs of Iroba were restored to liberty. Then, not content with loading the king of Bambireh with chains, Stanley started for that island, to massacre the natives. As he approached Bambireh, he saw that the savages were expecting him. Scouts were on the look out, and the natives were concealed in a thick plaintain-grove, where it was impossible for even Mr. Stanley's elephant rifle to reach them. It was necessary to get the poor wretches—who seemed inclined to remain on the defensive—out of their covert to shoot them down. We will tell the rest of the story in Mr. Stanley's own words:

"Perceiving that the savages of Bambireh were too strong for me to attack in the plaintain-grove, I made for the opposite shore of the bay, where there were bare slopes covered with short green grass. The enemy, perceiving my intention to disembark, rose from the coverts and ran along the hills to meet us, which was precisely what I wished they would do, and accordingly I ordered my force to paddle slowly, so as to give them time. In half an hour the savages were all assembled in knots and groups, and after approaching within a hundred yards of the beach, I formed my line of battle, the American and the English flags waving as our ensigns. Having anchored each canoe so as to turn its broadside to the shore, I ordered a volley to be fired into one group which numbered about fifty, and the result was several killed and many wounded. The savages perceiving our aim and the danger of standing together, separated themselves and advanced to the water's edge, slinging stones and shooting arrows. I then ordered the canoes to advance within fifty yards of the shore, and to fire at close quarters. After an hour the savages saw that they could not defend themselves, and retreated up the slope, where they continued still exposed to our bullets. I then caused the canoes to come together, and told them to advance in a body to the beach, as if about to disembark. This caused the enemy to make an effort to repulse our landing, and accordingly hundreds came down with their spears ready on the launch. When they were close enough, the bugle sounded a halt, and another volley was fired into the spearmen, which had such a disastrous effect that they retired far away, and our work of chastisement was consummated. Not many cartridges were fired, but as the savages were so exposed, on a slope covered only with short grass, and as the sun of the afternoon was directly behind us and in their faces, their loss was great. Forty-two were counted on the field lying dead, and over a hundred were seen to retire wounded, while on our side only two men suffered contusions from stones slung at us."

How can one find words wherewith to characterise this infamous massacre of men who were only defending their shores from invasion, against armed murderers, directed by a gentleman who arranged the deliberate and fiendish butchery as calmly as he afterwards wrote the account of it, and who, while shooting down the natives without mercy, took extremely good care not to expose himself or his men to the slightest risk from the primitive weapons of these poor naked creatures. Be it observed that "only two men suffered contusions from stones" on Stanley's side. This shows how safe the "fighting" was. There was not even the poor excuse of passion for this gratuitous bloodshed. Let it stand upon record that Mr. Stanley deliberately went out of his way to coldly slaughter a people, whose only crime was that they had stolen some trifling articles and put the great and brave traveller in fear of his precious life. Mr. Stanley in his cold-blooded ferocity was more cowardly than Caligula, more wanton than Nero.

RE STRIKES.

COMRADE.—Your valuable column headed "The Labour Struggle" has of late bristled almost exclusively with announcements of strikes and rumours thereof. All this is exceedingly satisfactory from the point of view of the sympathetic field-glass witness; but is it not high time that practical Socialists should make some definitive and strong pronouncement on the bogus view of "labour disputes" which not only sees in them "the preliminary skirmishes of the Revolution," but holds them per se to be the axis upon which the cause of labour emancipation is to revolve? With every strike—as with every other insurrectionary symptom among the workers—we Socialists can have nothing but passionate sympathy; to them we must consistently lend our unqualified assistance. But enjoying, as we profess, the optical command of that further perspective which as yet to the average British helot is stopped by a solid though back-shifting wall, we shall not be doing our duty if we longer shirk the exposure of the solemn truth that the mere act of "striking" is in no case necessarily a blow for freedom, whilst in the majority of instances it is neither more nor less than fuel for Reaction.

It is we who have prayed for the organisation of Labour. Now that this dream of half-a-dozen years ago is approaching somewhat of reality, shall we be the last of all to raise our voice against so ridiculously shallow a course as that the strength of combination shall be continually played fast and loose with by every aspiring charlatan or honest lack-wit for merely nominal and pitifully inconsequent coigns of vantage, to the desperate hurt and demoralisation of ultimate Revolutionary principles? The futility of self-sacrificial action en masse, and in the absolute, should be at once courageously declared. The alternative processes of practical revolutionism are many and logical. My personal connection with strikes has convinced me that they were each tactical blunders—and with us it is as Talleyrand said, a blunder is frequently worse than a crime. Not that it is a case of sour grapes. Two out of three strikes were, as far as they went, successful. Yet was it not with King Pyrrhus that we were constrained to exclaim, "Another such victory and I am ruined!" It is a disappointing commentary on the sagacity of the labour leaders that they have not perceived ere this that the strike is not the weapon of a special revelation. Besides, are we forgetting that we started out, not to make the best of, but to undermine and substitute the wage-slave system? Strikes cannot do it. They do not even show the way. The very toleration accorded of late by the Philistine press to the strike epidemic should well prove the nose of the bourgeoisie for the "right" and the weakness of the hand-to-mouth proletariat for the wrong scent. The awakening to discontent is eagerly welcome. But it must be scientifically guided if it is not to be totally wasted. The as yet unwritten history of our decade will necessarily be a stew of very small potatoes, but there will be one thing that will stand out in high relief in the chapter of methods, and that will be our fatal mastery of the way how best not to do it.—Yours fraternally,

4 West Craven Street, Salford, April 19.

Plain dealing is a jewel, but they that use it die beggars.

A bad custom is like a good cake, better broken than kept.

Three of the largest marble manufacturers in Boston have notified their employees that on and after June 1 they will pay 10 hours wages for 9 hours work.

In spite of recent "concessions," bakers in Brisbane still work from 70 to 90 hours per week. No wonder, adds the Worker, bread is bad, and the Statute Day unpopular—with the sweaters.

The Brisbane butchers want a weekly half holiday, and are to know their cue on March 4th. Just why butchers haven't had a half holiday before is only known to the thousands of other hard workers who haven't one either.—Worker.

Wages at Omaha: Plumbers, 4 dols.; brickmasons, 4 dols. 50 cents; gas-fitters, 3 dols. 50 cents; plasterers, 2 dols. 75 cents; carpenters, 2 dols. 70 cents; mortar-mixers, 2 dols. 25 cents; brick-tenders, 2 dols.; roustabouts, 1 dol. 75 cents; nine hours to the day.

At Youngstown, Ohio, the painters and decorators demand, after May 1, 2 dols. 50 cents; carpenters and joiners, 2 dols. 50 cents; bricklayers and masons, 4 dols.; stonemasons, 3 dols. 50 cents; plumbers and gas-fitters, 3 dols.; and a nine-hour day and eight on Saturday.

ITALY.—The Central Committee of the Italian Labour Party has sent to the different sections and branches the programme and rules of a fund for the assistance of those of the party who are sentenced to imprisonment for taking part in strikes or other methods of propaganda. Here is a summary of the principal articles of the same:

Article 1.—From the 1st of April, 1890, a Fund of Assistance will be instituted by the Italian Labour Party for the help of those members imprisoned for striking or making propaganda. The Central Committee assumes the full responsibility of the same.

Article 2.—The necessary funds will be raised by a payment of 30 centimes a month from all members of the party and all sections.

Article 4.—Only members of the party will have a right to apply for help. The committee will send quarterly to the different nations information regarding the working of the fund. Information concerning this institution to be obtained at the Central Committee Office, Via Mazzini, 7 Alessandria, Italy.

The organ of the Federation of Journeymen Bakers, which is published in Turin, is making active propaganda for the preparation of a general congress of bakers to be held in Milan.

The Italian Socialists are very busy preparing for the May Day demonstration. In Milan, Como, Torino, Parma, Reggio Emilia, Bologna, Voghera, Bra, Cremona, Varese, and some other towns, the day will be held as a holiday. Manifestos and addresses are issued, and special numbers of the labour journals are being published in commemoration of the same.—M. M.

IN THE UNITED STATES.

THE carpenter bosses in Chicago have given their side of the present strike to the public. They say they will never acknowledge the union; they want to treat with the men individually, and not through the carpenter's council. They assert to be willing to make concessions as regards wages and hours, but under no circumstances will they agree to be "bossed" by the union. Now that each side has issued its ultimatum, the strike seems to have settled down to a question of endurance, and the general opinion to-day is that the fight may be a protracted one. Few scabs have arrived in Chicago. The resolutions adopted by the bosses favour the eight hour day, but say, as there are differences in the abilities of workmen, and as it is a matter regulated greatly by supply and demand, a uniform rate of wages is out of the question. As to recognition of the union, the resolutions say:

"As the Carpenter's Council is not the ruler of a majority of the journeymen carpenters of Chicago, and much less of the better class of mechanics, and is not wholly composed of carpenters, but of labour agitators, we can enter into no agreement with them, which from its nature they would be unable to fulfil on their part."

The strikers say the resolutions misrepresent some of their demands. They have not asked for a uniform rate of wages, but for a minimum rate of 40 cents per hour. The journeymen carpenters feel sure of winning the strike. A telegram received by the Associated Press to-day says:

"CHICAGO, Ill., April 14, 1890.—According to programme, the master carpenters belonging to the association made an attempt to-day to start up work to finish the contracts on hand with non-union men. The movement was not general, as the number of non-union men on hand was not very large. It is declared that if the master carpenters persist in putting non-union men at work, a general strike of bricklayers and masons will be ordered."

It is pretty sure that the small master carpenters will go to the wall.

The journeymen carpenters of New York have presented to the master builders the following notice:

"The conference committee representing the United Brotherhood and the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters beg leave to notify the employing carpenters of New York City and vicinity that on and after Monday, May 5, the working hours for journeymen carpenters in this city will be eight hours, and wages 3 dols. 50 cents a-day."

Forty delegates, representing 23 unions—the strongest and best—in New York, have resolved to organise under the leadership of the Socialist Labour Party a demonstration in favour of the eight hours day on Union Square in New York on the evening of May 1st. The following manifesto was given out:

"May 1, 1890, will be a red letter day in the history of labour throughout the civilised world. The determination of the American Federation of Labour to proclaim on that day the eight-hour work-day was endorsed enthusiastically by the International Labour Convention which took place at Paris last summer. Then began a movement which has now assumed grand proportions, and spread like wildfire through all the countries of Europe. Hundreds of thousands of working-men will congregate in France on May 1. Other vast multitudes will unite in Spain, Germany, and Austria for an eight-hour day. Even Conservative England is not behind in efforts to proclaim the end of wage slavery. May 1 will be the forerunner of the great day upon which labour will proclaim its declaration of independence."

The appeal goes on to say that, from the first, the Socialists headed the movement in all the world, except in the United States, but it is not yet too late to take the lead here. The address concludes:

"Socialists of New York, working-men of New York, we ask your co-operation in joining hands with the proletarians of the rest of the world by appearing on Union Square at 8 o'clock on May 1 to join in demanding a shorter work-day."

At a largely-attended meeting of Protestants at the Tabernacle in Toronto on the 13th inst., Rev. Dr. Fulton delivered an address on "William II. of Germany, his Opportunities and his Dangers." The following address was unanimously adopted, and a copy of it will be sent to Emperor William:

"To William II., Emperor of Germany.

"Dear and Honourable Sir,—As citizens of the Western world, who feel the pulsations of the life that throbs at this hour in the heart of the Germans, we desire to assure you that we have followed your accession to the throne with grave apprehensions and alarm, learning that the Jesuits have expressed a determination to return in force to the land from which they were banished in consequence of their implacable hostility to the government of which the late Emperor William I., of blessed memory, was the honoured head. Equally sad have we been made by assurances that negotiations have been entered into which shall recognise Pope Leo XIII. as the head of the government, which is false in fact, and hurtful in theory. Germany is the natural head of Protestantism. Luther marked off the channel along which the current of free thought is sweeping into the future. To surrender to Rome, is to cut loose from God, and betray the trust committed to the liberty-loving people of every land. Your loyalty to God and his commands, manifested in your elevated purpose to honour and keep the holy Sabbath at home and abroad, and your determination to champion the people's interests, lead us to hope that you have been chosen of God to strike Romanism its fatal blow, and to build up the nation of which you are the honoured head in all ennobling virtues. March at the head of the advancing thought of the hour, and you will be more than Emperor of Germany; you shall be one of the leaders of the embattled hosts of God on earth."

Stupid as the Catholic blockheads may be, the Protestant roundheads may well rival them. To think of dethroning the Pope of Rome in favour of the million and odd Protestant popes, in the days when materialism has conquered the world, is a notion as ridiculous and nonsensical as can possibly be conceived by human beings. And to suppose that William of Germany can really ever champion the people's interests! Besides, the times have passed for "somebody" to champion the people's interests; the people, indeed, begin to think that they can champion their own interest. And to do this they need not the services of a religious crank or religious rogues, nor those of a crowned head, or any other State officials, nor through captains of industry. If the people will ever achieve anything, it can only be done through their own combined effort.

The British beer syndicate in Detroit has failed in its purpose. After the syndicate had bought four breweries in Detroit, the beer brewed by these concerns became decidedly unpopular. Hardly sufficient profits were earned to cover expenses. The Germans didn't like the beer, and the Irish hated the taste of beer brewed through British capital. Many public-houses were compelled to provide themselves with other beer in order to avoid losing all their trade. The sales of the four breweries decreased from day to day. At last, to avoid bankruptcy, the manager of the British beer syndicate was compelled to sell the breweries back to their original proprietors, at a much reduced price from that which was paid for them. And it is said that all the breweries owned by the British syndicate in the United States are in much the same condition.

NOTES ON NEWS.

In Mr. Morley's speech the other day, while talking about the subject of labour legislation, he said that though State Socialism was a bad thing yet it had this advantage, that it might save us from Revolutionary Socialism, which was a worse one. Political men are so sloppy in their public talk, that they probably seldom recognise the meaning which their words bear to the ordinary intelligent person; and probably all Mr. Morley meant by this phrase was to temporise with the tendency toward labour legislation while at the same time he declared himself opposed to Socialism. But what he has actually done is to ticket himself a reactionary before the world, and a stupid one at that.

For the plain meaning of his phrase is this, "These measures you ask for will do you workmen more harm than good, that I know; but in order to amuse you, and prevent your looking into your own affairs too closely, I will yield with a good grace to your injuring yourselves; it will at least help in keeping things as they are." Isn't this politics all over? That is, the completest development of charlatany.

In the same spirit the House of Commons and the Liberal press have been dealing with the question of profit-sharing; the Star especially publishing an article on the subject, which is simply reactionary, and also very nonsensical and shilly-shally; with one hand putting forward laissez faire, with the other State Socialism, and always working the practical-politics wire, the shut-your-eyes-to-anything-that-is-not-before-Parliament platitude, which one would think too stale for even a daily paper by this time.

The Star says, "We dismiss from our consideration all proposals which look to the twenty-first century for their realisation." This is nothing but the usual platitudinary sneer of the debating-club bore; in the mouth of a writer in the Star it is either a dishonest evasion of the point at issue, or it is the result of the "invincible ignorance" of a reactionist masquerading as a Progressive Radical. I can only say that those who will not look to the essential principles of a serious subject are (I speak gravely) triflers and fools, and very dangerous fools too. Those who with all opportunity of learning what the true claims of labour are, do not learn to understand them, and who do not state them openly and simply when they have understood them, are doing their best to prepare for us a period of violence and misery in the twentieth century, or not improbably in what is left of the nineteenth.

The real question for all people not professed reactionaries is how can we speediest make an end of the disinheritance of the useful classes? How can we the speediest take the resources of nature out of the hands of the monopolists? And I assert that this profit-sharing business is not even an advance, however small, towards the answering of this question.

Here is a plain question or two on profit-sharing which every workman can understand. Will the workers who share in the profits have to pay rent to an individual for the land on which the factories stand? Will they have to pay interest to an individual for the capital which they use? Or, to put it in other words, will the factories which they have built, standing on the land which their labour has made valuable be their property, or the property of their masters who looked on while they were toiling?

Or, shall we say, What shall be the workers' share of profit? Will his employer claim extra shares,—first, because he is a manager; secondly, because he is a gambler in the world-market; and thirdly, because he is the owner of land or the instruments of labour?

Again, how many workers are to share in the profits? The dockers, the brickmakers, the navvies, the tram-men, the railway-men, the field labourers, the women and children whom the curse of commercialism has driven from their homes (when they have any) into the Factory Hell? Is the fringe of labour (i.e., nine-tenths of it) to be left out in the cold then?

There's the rub; for, in short, my practical friends, the meaning of these schemes is an attempt to avoid the consequences of the class-war which commercialism is fast bringing to a point where it will break up "modern society;" an attempt to manufacture a new class of privileged persons (though their privilege will be but a little one) in order to keep those wicked lower orders in order. My practical friends, the present strike-war, though it is wasteful and laden with misery, has two advantages over this twaddle. In the first place, it is the only way of compelling the master class to share any of the profits with the men; and in the second, it will lead to the sweeping away of profits, masters, and all—and that long before the twenty-first century.

By the way what is the matter with the Star? Amongst other smaller sins, mostly of omission, it indulged in a sin of commission in publishing a morceau of twaddle far out-doing the debating-club-bore of two or three years ago, for that obnoxious creature is being educated into silence now. This strange production, which was as dull as Punch and as fatuous as the Times, was called a "translation from the German." Hey-day! is Berlin down to that standard then? Did the Kaiser send it to Mr. T. P. O'Connor? Or, is it perhaps a joke (a very bad one in that case) of our usually brilliant friend G. B. Shaw? Or, lastly, is the "German" that branch of the Teutonic tongue which is current in Dublin?

On the other hand, the Star has had the grace to give the public some of the facts about the Hero of the Day, the Rifle-and-bible newspaper correspondent Stanley; in guarded language certainly, but still so that it cannot be misunderstood; as thus, Stanley is (perhaps) a hero; but he has done no good; killed a great many people for nothing; rescued a man who was in no danger, and didn't want to be rescued; and the reason why we are so fond of him is that we hope and believe that he is helping us Britons (who are fond of keeping curates to do the rough work) in the "scramble for Africa," which is disgracing the nations of Europe at present. All this is good as far as it goes, and we must congratulate the Star on saying it.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. XV.—ON THE LACK OF INCENTIVE TO LABOUR IN A COMMUNIST SOCIETY.

"Yes," said I. "I was expecting Dick and Clara to make their appearance any moment: but is there time to ask just one or two questions before they come?"

"Try it, dear neighbour—try it," said old Hammond. "For the more you ask me the better I am pleased; and at any rate if they do come and find me in the middle of an answer, they must sit quiet and pretend to listen till I come to an end. It won't hurt them; they will find it quite amusing enough to sit side by side, conscious of their proximity to each other."

I smiled, as I was bound to, and said: "Good; I will go on talking without noticing them when they come in. Now, this is what I want to ask you about—to wit, how you get people to work when there is no reward of labour, and especially how you get them to work strenuously?"

"No reward of labour?" said Hammond, gravely. "The reward of labour is life. Is that not enough?"

"But no reward for specially good work," quoth I.

"Plenty of reward," said he—"the reward of creation. The wages which God gets, as people might have said time ago. If you are going to ask to be paid for the pleasure of creation, which is what excellence in work means, the next thing we shall hear of will be a bill sent in for the begetting of children."

"Well, but," said I, "the man of the nineteenth century would say there is a natural desire towards the procreation of children, and a natural desire not to work."

"Yes, yes" said he, "I know the ancient platitude,—wholly untrue; indeed, to us quite meaningless. Fourier, whom all men laughed at, understood the matter better."

"Why is it meaningless to you?" said I.

He said: "Because it implies that all work is suffering, and we are so far from thinking that, that, as you may have noticed, whereas we are not short of wealth, there is a kind of fear growing up amongst us that we shall one day be short of work. It is a pleasure which we are afraid of losing, not a pain."

"Yes," said I, "I have noticed that, and I was going to ask you about that also. But in the meantime, what do you positively mean to assert about the pleasurable of work amongst you?"

"This, that all work is now pleasurable; either because of the hope of gain in honour and wealth with which the work is done, which causes pleasurable excitement, even when the actual work is not pleasant; or else because it has grown into a pleasurable habit, as in the case with what you may call mechanical work; and lastly (and most of our work is of this kind) because there is conscious sensuous pleasure in the work itself; it is done, that is, by artists."

"I see," said I. "Can you now tell me how you have come to this happy condition? For, to speak plainly, this change from the conditions of the older world seems to me far greater and more important than all the other changes you have told me about as to crime, politics, property, marriage."

"You are right there," said he. "Indeed, you may say rather that it is this change which makes all the others possible. What is the object of Revolution? Surely to make people happy. Revolution having brought its foredoomed change about, how can you prevent the counter-revolution from setting in except by making people happy? What! shall we expect peace and stability from unhappiness? The gathering of grapes from thorns and figs from thistles is a reasonable expectation compared with that! And happiness without happy daily work is impossible."

"Most obviously true," said I: for I thought the old boy was preaching a little. "But answer my question, as to how you gained this happiness."

"Briefly," said he, "by the absence of artificial coercion, and the freedom for every man to do what he can do best, joined to the knowledge of what productions of labour we really wanted. I must admit that this knowledge we reached slowly and painfully."

"Go on," said I, "give me more detail; explain more fully. For this subject interests me intensely."

"Yes, I will," said he; "but in order to do so I must weary you by talking a little about the past. Contrast is necessary for this explanation. Do you mind?"

"No, no," said I.

Said he, settling himself in his chair again for a long talk: "It is clear from all that we hear and read, that in the last age of civilisation men had got into a vicious circle in the matter of production of wares. They had reached a wonderful facility of production, and in order to make the most of that facility they had gradually created (or allowed to grow, rather) a most elaborate system of buying and selling, which has been called the World Market; and that world-market, once set a-going, forced them to go on making more and more of these wares, whether they needed them or not. So that while (of course) they could not free themselves from the toil of making real necessities, they created in a never-ending series sham or artificial necessities, which became, under the iron rule of the aforesaid world-market, of equal importance to them with the real necessities which supported life.

By all this they burdened themselves with a prodigious mass of work merely for the sake of keeping their wretched system going."

"Yes—and then?" said I.

"Why, then, since they had forced themselves to stagger along under this horrible burden of unnecessary production, it became impossible for them to look upon labour and its results from any other point of view than one—to wit, the ceaseless endeavour to expend the least possible amount of labour on any article made, and yet at the same time to make as many articles as possible. To this 'cheapening of production,' as it was called, everything was sacrificed: the happiness of the workman at his work; nay, his most elementary comfort and bare health; his food, his clothes, his dwelling, his leisure, his amusement, his education—his life, in short—did not weigh a grain of sand in the balance against this dire necessity of 'cheap production' of things, a great part of which were not worth producing at all. Nay, we are told, and we must believe it, so overwhelming is the evidence, though many of our people scarcely can believe it, that even rich and powerful men, the masters of the poor devils aforesaid, submitted to live amidst sights and sounds and smells which it is in the very nature of man to abhor and flee from, in order that their riches might bolster up this supreme folly. The whole community, in fact, was cast into the jaws of this ravening monster, 'the cheap production' forced upon it by the world-market."

"Dear me!" said I. "But what happened? Did not their cleverness and facility in production master this chaos of misery at last? Couldn't they catch up with the world-market, and then set to work to devise means for relieving themselves from this fearful task of extra labour?"

He smiled bitterly. "Did they even try to?" said he. "I am not sure. You know that according to the old saw the beetle gets used to living in dung; and these people, whether they found the dung sweet or not, certainly lived in it."

His estimate of the life of the nineteenth century made me catch my breath a little; and I said feebly, "But the labour-saving machines?"

"Heyday!" quoth he. "What's that you are saying? the labour-saving machines? Yes, they were made to 'save labour' (or, to speak more plainly, the lives of men) on one piece of work in order that it might be expended—I will say wasted—on another, probably useless, piece of work. Friend, all their devices for cheapening labour simply resulted in increasing the burden of labour. The appetite of the world-market grew with what it fed on: the countries within the ring of what was called 'civilisation' (that is, organised misery) were glutted with the abortions of the market, and force and fraud were used unsparingly to 'open up' countries outside that pale. This process of opening up is a strange one to those who have read the professions of the men of that period and do not understand their practice; and perhaps shows us at its worst the great vice of the nineteenth century, the use of hypocrisy and cant to evade the responsibility of vicarious ferocity. When the civilised world-market coveted a country not yet in its clutches, some transparent pretext was found—the suppression of a slavery different from and not so cruel as that of commerce; the pushing of a religion no longer believed in by its promoters; the 'rescue' of some desperado or homicidal madman whose misdeeds had got him into trouble amongst the natives of the 'barbarous' country—any stick, in short which would beat the dog at all. Then some bold, unprincipled, ignorant adventurer was found (no difficult task in the days of competition), and he was bribed to 'create a market' by breaking up whatever traditional society there might be in the doomed country, and by destroying whatever leisure or pleasure he found there. He forced wares on the natives which they did not want, and took their natural products in 'exchange,' as this form of robbery was called, and thereby he 'created new wants,' to supply which (that is, to be allowed to live by their new masters) the hapless, helpless people had to sell themselves into the slavery of hopeless toil so that they might have something wherewith to purchase the nullities of 'civilisation.' Ah," said the old man, pointing to the Museum, "I have read books and papers in there, telling strange stories indeed of the dealings of civilisation (or organised misery) with 'non-civilisation'; from the time when the British Government deliberately sent blankets infected with small-pox as choice gifts to inconvenient tribes of Red-skins, to the time when Africa was infested by a man named Stanley, who—"

"Excuse me," said I, "but as you know, time presses; and I want to keep our question on the straightest line possible; and I want at once to ask this about these wares made for the world-market—how about their quality? These people who were so clever about making goods, I suppose they made them well?"

"Quality!" said the old man, crustily; for he was rather peevish at being cut short in his story; "how could they possibly attend to such trifles as the quality of the wares they sold? The best of them were of a lowish average, the worst were transparent make-shifts for the things asked for, which nobody would have put up with if they could have got anything else. It was a current jest of the time that the wares were made to sell and not to use; a jest which you, as coming from another planet, may understand, but which our folk could not."

Said I: "What! did they make nothing well?"

"Why, yes," said he, "there was one class of goods which they did make thoroughly well, and that was the class of machines which were used for making things. These were usually quite perfect pieces of workmanship, admirably adapted to the end in view. So that it may be fairly said that the great achievement of the nineteenth century was the making of machines which were wonders of invention, skill, and patience, and which were used for the production of measureless quantities of worthless makeshifts. In truth, the owners of the machines did not consider anything which they made as wares, but simply as means for the enrichment of themselves. Of course, the only admitted test of utility in wares was the finding of buyers for them—wise men or fools, as it might chance.”

“And people put up with this?” said I.

“For a time,” said he.

“And then?”

“And then the overturn,” said the old man, smiling, “and the nineteenth century saw itself as a man who has lost his clothes whilst bathing and has to walk naked through the town.”

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

How to get the Eight Hours Day.

Now the London Trades Council has declared that an eight hours labour day is a necessity, on account of the “misery and social demoralisation” resulting from the “long hours of labour” in many industries, it remains for them to declare what means they will adopt to obtain this boon. On this point the resolution is vague, as it merely “urges our fellow-countrymen to be unceasing in their effort to successfully establish this limit by every legitimate means in their power”; but practically there are only two methods of obtaining an eight hour day—by organisation of trade unions, or Parliamentary enactment. Now, we cannot suppose the London Trades Council intends to adopt legislative action, or it would certainly not have declared, through the mouth of its virtuous secretary, Mr. George Shipton, that it could have no “politicians” at the meeting. We will confess that we thought George meant to exclude himself, for we remembered the sugar business, but find we were mistaken, for George is going to boss the show. Therefore this is not a case of righteous self-denial. Well, as no politicians are to be allowed to speak, we presume the London Trades Council intends to obtain the eight hours by the organised action of their trade unions. Now, there are two ways of doing this. First, sectional agitation on the part of each separate society; which would be unsuccessful, as it would simply mean hurling a small battalion against the whole organised force of capital; or a general attack by the immense array of organised labour on capitalist host, which would mean certain victory. Most trade unionists know, for they have been taught by recent experience, that small strikes mean defeat even in ordinary wages disputes, and therefore they would be useless to carry a concession which every capitalist would bitterly oppose. But supposing all the trade societies represented by the London Trades Council decided, say, on the 1st of May 1891 to come out on strike for the eight hours day. According to their own account, this Council represents from 100,000 to 150,000 workmen belonging to the principal trades carried on in the metropolis, and if they ceased work business would be paralysed, for their example would certainly be copied, in the excitement that would follow, by most of the workmen in London. This is not a matter of conjecture, but of absolute certainty, for when the excitement of the dock strike was at its height, if the employers had not made concessions nearly every workshop in London would have been deserted. Nothing could stand against such a movement, and the masters would be forced to give way. I doubt myself whether they would not surrender before the men left their work, for they would see resistance would be fruitless. Therefore it is clear that if the London Trades Council want the eight hours day they can easily obtain it. Some may say that this scheme is too revolutionary and that serious consequences might follow. Possibly, if the masters were obstinate. But I don't think they would be. At any rate, the consequences would not be more serious than those which the leaders of the miners had to face when they ordered a general strike for ten per cent. advance in wages a few weeks ago. Surely Mr. Shipton and his colleagues have as much courage as the leaders of the miners, and surely if the eight hours day is worth anything, it is worth a little risk and trouble.

Mr. Bradlaugh again.

Mr. Bradlaugh again distinguished himself as a champion of capital in the House of Commons. On Tuesday April 22nd Cunningham Graham, in a speech on the motion concerning profit-sharing, said that he thanked God that he had never intervened as conciliator in disputes between capital and labour. Mr. Bradlaugh, who followed him, attacked him on this point, and was cheered by the assembled capitalists because he declared that he had never interfered in labour disputes except as a conciliator. Perhaps this is why they unanimously repudiated him as a representative of labour. As we know that acting as a conciliator usually means getting workmen to lessen their already too moderate demands for the benefit of greedy employers, we can understand why Cunningham Graham has never played that part. We can also understand why the young gentlemen on the Tory benches, elated with wine and insolence, vociferously applaud their pet Old Bailey bully when he “courageously” attacks a man who stands alone and friendless in the House because he lifts his voice on behalf of the wronged and oppressed. But we confess we cannot understand why papers that profess to represent workmen, like Reynolds and the Dispatch, should take the side of Bradlaugh against Graham. Have they also, like the Star, received their instructions from Mr. John Morley?

Great Strike of Irish Railwaymen.

On Monday April 21 the railwaymen in Cork came out on strike as a protest against the dismissal of two porters who had refused to load some bacon which had been brought by blacklegs belonging to a firm of carriers where the men were on strike. Discontent had long been rife among the men employed on this line, and on Tuesday the strike spread to Queenstown and Limerick. On Friday at noon the strike became general; from Cork to Dublin, guards, signalmen, and porters all came out. The traffic is completely disorganised, for the only people who will do the blacklegging necessary to enable the company to carry on their business are the clerks, and they are not very efficient as guards or porters. There was an amusing scene on Friday at Kingsbridge station. Owing to the strike of porters, Right Reverend Bishops and Removable Magistrates were forced to carry their own luggage, and being gentlemen of comfortable appearance, they sweated like bulls as they toiled along under the weight of their heavy travelling bags, etc. The trade in the south of Ireland is completely paralysed. A telegram from Fermoy on Saturday stated that in consequence of the strike, flour and coal were becoming scarce in that town, as there was then only five days' supply. It is expected that if the strike continues many firms in Cork and Limerick will be forced to suspend business. Michael Davitt has been interviewing the directors to see if they will receive a deputation from the men; but the directors have vowed vengeance against the signalmen, and are prosecuting them for having left their boxes without giving notice. They have now offered to receive the deputation from the guards and porters, but these honest fellows decided they would not leave their comrades in the lurch, Mr. Foreman (the delegate of the A.R.S.) declaring amid loud cheers that they had come out together and would go back together, and that all attempts to separate them would fail. It is a curious fact that some of the Nationalist papers, particularly the Freeman's Journal, have been most bitter in their attacks upon the men and their leaders. This proves that Irish capitalists, although they may be good Home Rulers, are quite as much the enemies of Irish workers as Balfour and his gang. No one can say the men are extreme, for they have offered to submit their demands to arbitration, and it is the obstinacy of the directors in even refusing to reply to the communications from their trade union that has brought about the strike. Seven signalmen have been prosecuted, and one has been fined £10. There is still no prospect of the strike ending, owing to the unrelenting attitude of the directors.

THE EAST-END TAILORS will come out on May 4th against the sweaters, who still work them from fourteen to eighteen hours a-day.

THE JEWISH BOOTMAKERS have returned to work, the masters conceding an advance of 3d. per dozen pairs of boots. N.

INDIA.

COTTONOPOLIS is wild because India is supplanting her in China and Japan. The export of yarns from India to these countries during the past six years has increased by 300 million lbs., while during the same period the export of English yarns to China and Japan has decreased by 30 million lbs. Manchester now sees that her only chance of competing with Bombay lies in the introduction of the English Factory Acts, the advocacy of which will enable her to pose as a philanthropist. 'Tis true the factory hours in India are long, aye, too long. The average hours are 80 per week in Indian factories, 56 in English. But there is a difference. The white slave is driven hard the whole time, but the Indian works leisurely. To quote from the report of the Bombay government, “To long work they (i.e., the operatives) have no objection as long as it is light work, and provided they occasionally go out to talk and smoke.” Western civilisation has not yet produced in the East human automatic machines, wound up to go factory like without stopping. Having failed to pose as philanthropists, the Manchester cottonlords have become exasperated, and actually talk of getting “some sort of control over the mills in India.”

Behold! Western ideas are permeating India. The latest phase of Western life which the mild Hindoo has seized with avidity is the taste for alcoholic liquors. We are told that Brahmins are becoming liquor contractors in sharub, and that at high-caste weddings and religious festivals the liquor freely flows. Shocking news for the Blue Ribbon Army!

In the Jessore district matters are becoming rather strained between the ryots and the indigo planters. Mr. Suson, the magistrate, has been dealing summarily with the poor ryots; they have been fined and sent to jail in batches. Has any wicked Anarchist been circulating Commonweal amongst them?

An Indian paper, commenting upon Lord Cross's Indian Council's Bill, thus concludes, “Thirty year's experience has shown clearly that the means devised by the authors of the Act (of 1861) for ascertaining the thoughts and feelings, wishes and wants of the people of India in regard to legislation, have not been attended with the desired success, and that our Legislative Councils stand in urgent need of reform.” A. B.

Cardinal Manning speaks of “sweating” as “the greatest curse under heaven.” As the whole of our industrial system is a huge sweating shop, the cardinal must see the need for a big blessing to descend and mop the whole curse up. So the Brisbane Worker thinks.

A newspaper reporter, eleven years of age, engaged on a Sydney journal, and paid per line, made 12s. one week lately. Whereupon, says the Brisbane Boomerang, the senior proprietor on the following Monday morning notified the boy that he would in future be charged a subscriber's rates for the use of the paper, and would be obliged to pay 3d. per week for copy slips.

A London writer asserts that “now-a-days you have no choice between a society which is utterly soulless or one which is no doubt intellectual enough, but where half the company have at one time or another attacked the throne, denied the Thirty-nine Articles or assaulted the police” Quite true. All the brains are with the Radicals, the Agnostics, and the Revolutionaries.—Sydney Bulletin.

Capitalism asks pompously, as though it were putting an unanswerable question, “Can a man not do as he pleases with his own?” Before answering this question it is necessary to know what is a man's own and how he came by it. The mere assertion of a claim does not prove its equity, and sometimes unjust laws defend inequitable claims while the manner of acquisition has much to do with the integrity of an assumed title. Ethics is becoming a most important factor in modern economics.—Christian Advocate.

PARLIAMENTARY DUTY.—According to the best authorities on the subject, the chief duty of a parliamentary party is to oust the other side from power and instal itself instead, and any conduct which will tend to bring about this result is fair. Party leaders are supposed never to allow that anything done by the other side has been either really good or prompted by anything but base motives. A manifest duty of a party leader is to claim the authorship of any reform which he cannot convince the public will be injurious, by references to newspaper paragraphs and private letters to eminent persons. Should any press reports or Hansard reports seem to be against this claim, it is the duty of the leader to attribute the mistake to a hostile and misrepresenting press, ditto to Hansard.—Australian Standard.

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

OFFICES: 24, GREAT QUEEN ST., LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

The Offices of the Socialist League will be open for the sale of Commonweal and all other Socialist publications from 8.30 a.m. to 9 p.m. every day except Sunday. The Secretary will be in attendance from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m. daily.

Annual Conference.—The Annual Conference of the Socialist League will take place on Whit Sunday, May 25th. All propositions from Branches should be sent in at once to allow of agenda being made up. Place of meeting and other particulars in future issue.

London Members' Meeting.—The next monthly meeting of members will be held at 6, Windmill Street, Tottenham Court Road, on Tuesday, May 6th, at 8.30 p.m. All members interested in the propaganda are asked to attend.

Branch Subscriptions Paid.—1888:—Oxford, to end of September.

1889:—Bradford and Hammersmith, to end of April. Norwich, Glasgow, and Yarmouth, to end of May. East London, to end of October. Mitcham, to end of November. St. Georges East, to end of December.

1890:—Manchester, to end of January. 'Commonweal' Branch, to end of February. Leicester and North London, to end of March. North Kensington, to end of April. Streatham, to end of December.

Notice.—All letters on League business, except those intended for Editors of Commonweal, to be addressed to me. No other person is authorised to sign any official communication. FRANK KITZ, Secretary.

NEW PREMISES FUND.

Collected at Council meeting, April 28th, 4s. 0d.

"COMMONWEAL" GUARANTEE FUND.

The following further sums have been received towards this fund:—P. Webb, 1s.; H. R., 1s.; D. Nicoll, 6d.; B. W., 6d.; Mrs. Newnham, 1s. 9d.; and Scottish Socialist Federation, 5s. 6d.

MAY DAY DEMONSTRATION.

Already acknowledged—5s. Received towards expenses—Propaganda Committee, 15s.; Presburg, 6d.; Webb, 3s.; R. Turner, 2s. 6d.; North London Branch, 10s.; and Hammersmith Branch, 10s.

REPORTS.

EAST LONDON.—A large meeting was held in Victoria Park on Sunday, addressed by Davis, Tochetti, and Nicoll; Mrs. Tochetti sang some revolutionary songs, which were well appreciated; 40 'Weals' sold and 2s. 10½d. collected.—K.

HAMMERSMITH.—Good meeting at Bridge End on Sunday morning; speakers were Grant, Steele, Morris, Bullock, and Tarleton; 45 'Weals' sold and other literature. Good meeting in the evening at same place; speakers were Bullock, Tarleton, A. J. Smith, Grant, and Steele; 18 'Weals' sold. Fair meeting at Weltje Road; speakers were Bullock, Tarleton, and A. J. Smith; 8 'Weals' sold.

KILBURN.—A short meeting was held here on Sunday morning; Mainwaring spoke; fair sale of 'Weal'.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—Good meeting was held at Latimer Road; speakers were J. F. Lyne, Kitchen, and Davis; Hammersmith branch 'Weals' sold well, and 1s. 2d. collected. At our rooms in the evening we had an interesting discussion on the "Iron Law of Wages"; several 'Weals' sold and 2s. 1d. collected.

NORTH LONDON.—Cantwell and Nicoll held a short meeting at Regent's Park; 30 'Weals' and some pamphlets sold; 1s. 2½d. collected. Cantwell, Davies, and Mainwaring addressed a large and enthusiastic meeting at Hyde Park; 60 'Weals' and 18 pamphlets sold; 3s. 8½d. collected.

WALWORTH.—A good meeting was addressed at North Street on Sunday morning by J. Buckeridge in favour of May 1st Demonstration; the resolution in last week's 'Weal' was carried unanimously; 4s. 1d. collected for Demonstration Fund; fair sale of 'Weal' and 'Monopoly.'—W.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday at mid-day, Joe and Tim Burgoyne spoke to a good audience on Jail Square. In the evening Glasier spoke to a large meeting at Paisley Road Toll. Business meeting of members was afterwards held in rooms.

LEEDS.—On Sunday morning a good meeting was held in Vicars Croft, when Samuels debated with Mr. Devily on "Is Total Abstinence a Remedy for Poverty?" A collection was made towards the fine of 5s. imposed upon Samuels by the magistrate. At the afternoon meeting, Maguire announced that on next Sunday, May 4, there would be a demonstration at the "Croft" in support of the eight hours movement; good sale of 'Weals'.

YARMOUTH.—On Sunday morning, at Bradwell, comrade Brightwell addressed a meeting of farm-labourers; good discussion. In the evening the weather was unfavourable for out-door speaking, so several comrades met in the club-room and held an interesting discussion. 12 Commonweal sold.—J. H.

EDINBURGH—SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—Last Sunday evening Miss Cameron lectured on "The Spirit of Socialism," in the Moulders' Hall. There was a good audience, and being the first lady who has spoken here, Miss Cameron was well received; good discussion.—W. D. T.

LIVERPOOL SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—We held two excellent meetings at the Landing Stage on Sunday—at 11 a.m. and 3 p.m. Comrades Sharples (Blackburn) and J. C. Balfour, W. H. Chapman, and S. Reeves addressed those present. 3 quires Commonweal and 1 quire Justice sold. Next Sunday we take part in the annual demonstration at Manchester.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—On Sunday last, Tom M'Carthy, of the Dock Labourers' Union, London, gave two open-air addresses—in the morning in Sneinton Market on the Eight Hour Question, and in the Great Market Place, at night, on "My Experience of the Great Dock Strike"; Proctor in the chair. Our London comrade made a good impression on large audiences. The meeting was very enthusiastic as he related some of the incidents of that now famous struggle. Commonweal sold out. On Saturday night M'Carthy and our Nottingham comrades, Proctor and Knight, spoke at a large trades union demonstration at Long Eaton. They had a most enthusiastic reception.—A. C.

LIVERPOOL SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—1 Stanley Street, Dale Street.—Meets every Tuesday at 8 p.m.

NEW MANHOOD SUFFRAGE LEAGUE, "Three Doves," Berwick St., Soho, W.—Sunday May 4, at 7.30 p.m., J. D. Bouran, "Communism."

CLUB AUTONOMIE, 6 Windmill Street, Tottenham Court Road, W.—Sunday May 4, at 8.30, James Harragan, "The Late Strike in the Boot Trade."

DEMONSTRATION OF LANCASHIRE AND DISTRICT SOCIALISTS.—On Sunday May 4th, the Annual Gathering of Socialists will take place in Manchester, and a mass meeting will be held in Stevenson Square at 3 p.m. A large array of well-known Socialist speakers will address the meeting.

THE NORTH KENSINGTON BRANCH appeal to comrades and friends for their Band Fund. They have the offer of getting drums very cheap from a band that has become defunct, and want to raise about £24s. for this purpose. Please send subscriptions to G. Maughan, Sec., Clarendon Coffee Palace, Clarendon Rd.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

WEEKLY; ONE PENNY.

LABOUR DAY.

THERE is only one event this week to be noted; beside its overpowering importance all others shrink into insignificance. And this event, of course, is the world-wide demonstration of the international solidarity of Labour which took place on May Day. The capitalist press, with characteristic futility, has seized well-nigh unanimously upon the Eight Hours part of the celebration as though that were its be-all and end-all. It must be plain, however, to the most casual and careless of honest observers that the whole essence of the demonstration was the international solidarity of Labour; the Eight Hours' Day was an accidental, tacked on because it was the object of desire for the passing moment with those who, although desiring Socialism, dream of palliating the present system as they go along. There are always two divisions in the Labour movement—those who are fully convinced and avowed Socialists, and regard the present system as beyond anything but entire destruction; and those who, sometimes calling themselves Socialists, are disposed to patch and plaster here and there, rather than go in for sweeping and radical change. The former section, numerically the smaller, but intrinsically by far the more important, have throughout been at the head and front of the international agitation for a Labour Day; the other, by far the larger, and by far the least important, has been trying to divert attention and enthusiasm from the definite assertion of Labour as Labour to the claim for a legally fixed working-day.

Here, in London, the Revolutionary Socialists and the new Trades' Unions, in spite of all opposition, kept the red flag aloft and held the simultaneous meetings for which our foreign brethren looked. Those who, by dividing the London Demonstration and throwing all their weight in favour of the Sunday one, provided a means of escape and ready excuse for the cowards and sneaks of the Labour movement, did not see (or did they see too well?) that the whole value of the event lay in its proof of the capacity of the proletariat of the world for organised and simultaneous effort. They did not see (or, again, did they see too well?) that ten thousand men in the Park on Thursday, in spite of the police and damned by the press, were of immensely more weight than a hundred or two hundred thousand on Sunday, not only allowed but aided by the police, blessed by the reptile press, and looked upon with favour by all pastors, masters, and other persons in authority. Which will be remembered and looked back upon in years to come as meaning something more than a mere outing? The one was a demonstration of an intention to do something; the other of a desire to have something—when their masters gave it them. It showed that a large number of workmen would like to work shorter hours; it showed nothing else, except that it added the information they were only prepared to submissively ask for it, and would not even sacrifice a day's wages in order to get it. The international side of the question was practically ignored, as might have been expected from men who could with wanton treachery break away from the world movement to demonstrate the blindness, stupidity, and cowardice of that large part of the London workmen who follow their "legal" and "moderate" leadership. There is one consolation, if it is a small one; the May Day Demonstration in England belongs to us; in years to come, the "moderates" will be glad to come crawling behind us through the gap that we have made, but they will never be able to claim any share in its making. They will remember that while we were banned they were blessed by the police, and praised by the enemies of Labour on the press. A thought that should burn a fiery brand of never-ending self-reproach into their souls.

However, May Day was celebrated in London; and it shall be again. Though but a few of us be found who will do it, it shall be done. If we have to work double tides from now to then, it shall be done. Our comrades throughout the world may rely upon this, that though the majority of English workmen still retain a good deal of their arrogant insularity, and follow those who will stoop to play upon it, there is a large and rapidly growing minority who have awakened to the true position of Labour and the need for international action, and who are resolved to stand or fall with their brethren abroad. As we have begun we shall go on; as each recurring May Day comes and goes our strength will be seen to leap steadily up and up, until we are strong enough to push aside the sneaks and faint-hearts who embarrass us, break down the barriers that confront us, and enter into the promised land. NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. XV. (continued).—ON THE LACK OF INCENTIVE TO LABOUR IN A COMMUNIST SOCIETY.

"You are very bitter about that unlucky nineteenth century," said I. "Naturally," said he, "since I know so much about it."

He was silent a little, and then said: "There are traditions—nay, real histories—in our family about it: my grandfather was one of its victims. If you know something about it you will understand what he suffered when I tell you that he was in those days a genuine artist, a man of genius, and a revolutionist."

"I think I do understand," said I: "but now, as it seems, you have reversed all this?"

"Pretty much so," said he. "The wares which we make are made because they are needed: men make for their neighbours' use as if they were making for themselves, not for a vague market of which they know nothing, and over which they can have no control: as there is no buying and selling, it would be mere insanity to make goods on the chance of their being wanted; for there is no longer anyone who can be compelled to buy them. So that whatever is made is good, and thoroughly fit for its purpose. Nothing can be made except for genuine use; therefore no inferior goods are made. Moreover, as aforesaid, we have now found out what we want, so we make no more than we want; and as we are not driven to make a vast quantity of useless things, we have time and resources enough to consider our pleasure in making them. All work which would be irksome to do by hand is done by immensely improved machinery; and in all work which it is a pleasure to do by hand machinery is done without. There is no difficulty in finding work which suits the special turn of mind of everybody; so that no man is sacrificed to the wants of another. From time to time, when we have found out that some piece of work was too disagreeable or troublesome, we have given it up and done altogether without the thing produced by it. Now, surely you can see that under these circumstances all the work we do is an exercise of the mind and body more or less pleasant to be done: so that instead of avoiding work everybody seeks it: and, since people have got defter in doing the work generation after generation, it has become so easy to do, that it seems as if there were less done, though probably more is produced. I suppose this explains a certain fear of a possible scarcity in work, which perhaps you have already noticed, and which is a feeling on the increase, and has been for a score of years."

"But do you think," said I, "that there is any fear of a work-famine amongst you?"

"No, I do not," said he, "and I will tell why: it is each man's business to make his own work pleasanter and pleasanter, which of course tends towards raising the standard of excellence, as no man enjoys turning out work which is not a credit to him, and also to greater deliberation in turning it out; and there is such a vast number of things which can be treated as works of art, that this alone gives employment to a host of deft people. Again, if art be inexhaustible, so is science also; and though it is no longer the only innocent occupation, which is thought worth an intelligent man spending his time upon, as it once was, yet there are, and I suppose will be, many people who are excited by its conquest of difficulties, and care for it more than for anything else. Again, as more and more of pleasure is imported into work, I think we shall take up kinds of work which produce desirable wares, but which we gave up because we could not carry them on pleasantly. Moreover, I think that it is only in parts of Europe which are more advanced than the rest of the world that you will hear this talk of the fear of a work-famine. Those lands which were once the colonies of Great Britain, for instance, and especially America—that part of it, above all, which was once the United States—are now and will be for a long while a great resource to us. For these lands, and, I say, especially the northern parts of America, suffered so terribly from the full force of the last days of civilisation, and became such horrible places to live in, that they are now very backward in all that makes life pleasant. Indeed, one may say that for nearly a hundred years the people of the northern parts of America have been engaged in gradually making a dwelling-place out of a stinking dust-heap; and there is still a great deal to do, especially as the country is so big.”

“Well,” said I, “I am exceedingly glad to think that you have such a prospect of happiness before you. But I should like to ask a few more questions, and then I have done for to-day.”

CHAP. XVI.—DINNER IN THE HALL OF THE BLOOMSBURY MARKET.

As I spoke, I heard footsteps near the door; the latch yielded, and in came our two lovers, looking so handsome that one had no feeling of shame in looking on at their little-concealed love-making: for indeed it seemed as if all the world must be in love with them. As for old Hammond, he looked on them like an artist who has just painted a picture nearly as well as he thought he could when he began it, and was perfectly happy. He said:

“Sit down, sit down, young folk, and don't make a noise. Our guest here has still some questions to ask me.”

“Well, I should suppose so,” said Dick; “you have only been three hours and a half together; and it isn't to be hoped that the history of two centuries could be told in three hours and a half: let alone that, for all I know, you may have been wandering into the realms of geography and craftsmanship.”

“And as to noise, my dear kinsman,” said Clara, “you will very soon be disturbed by the noise of the dinner-bell, which I should think will be very pleasant music to our guest, who breakfasted early, it seems, and probably had a tiring day yesterday.”

I said: “Well, since you have spoken the word, I begin to feel that it is so; but I have been feeding myself with wonder this long time past: really, it's quite true,” quoth I, as I saw her smile, O so prettily!

But just then from some tower high up in the air came the sound of silvery chimes playing a sweet clear tune, that sounded to my unaccustomed ears like the song of the first blackbird in the spring, and called a rush of memories to my mind, some of bad times, some of good, but all sweetened now into mere pleasure.

“No more questions now before dinner,” said Clara; and she took my hand as an affectionate child would, and led me out of the room and down-stairs into the forecourt of the Museum, leaving the two Hammonds to follow as they pleased.

We went into the market place I had been in before, a thinnish stream of elegantly¹ dressed people going in along with us. We turned into the cloister and came to a richly moulded and carved doorway, where a very pretty dark-haired young girl gave us each a beautiful bunch of summer flowers, and we entered a hall much bigger than that of the Hammersmith Guest House, more elaborate in its architecture and perhaps more beautiful. I found it difficult to keep my eyes off the wall-pictures (for I thought it bad manners to stare at Clara all the time, though she was quite worth it). I saw at a glance that their subjects were taken from queer old-world myths and imaginations which in yesterday's world only about half a dozen people in the country knew anything about; and when the two Hammonds sat down opposite to us, I said to the old man, pointing to the frieze:

“How strange to see such subjects here!”

“Why?” said he. “I don't see why you should be surprised; everybody knows the tales; and they are graceful and pleasant subjects, not too tragic for a place where people mostly eat and drink and amuse themselves, and yet full of incident.”

I smiled, and said: “Well, I scarcely expected to find record of the Seven Swans and the King of the Golden Mountain and Faithful Henry, and such curious pleasant imaginations as Jacob Grimm got together from the childhood of the world, barely lingering even in his time: I should have thought you would have forgotten such childishness by this time.”

The old man smiled, and said nothing; but Dick turned rather red, and broke out:

“What do you mean, guest? I think them very beautiful, I mean not only the pictures, but the stories; and when we were children we used to imagine them going on in every wood-end, by the bight of every stream: every house in the fields was the Fairyland King's House to us. Don't you remember, Clara?”

“Yes,” she said; and it seemed to me as if a slight cloud came over her fair face. I was going to speak to her on the subject, when the pretty waitresses came to us smiling, and chattering sweetly like reed warblers by the river side, and fell to giving us our dinner. As to this, as at our breakfast, everything was cooked and served with a daintiness which showed that those who had prepared it were interested in it; but there was no excess either of quantity or gourmandise; everything was simple, though so excellent of its kind; and it was made clear to us that this was no feast, only an ordinary meal. The glass, crockery, and plate were very beautiful to my eyes, used to the study of mediæval art; but a nineteenth-century club-haunter would, I daresay, have found them rough and lacking in finish; the crockery being lead-glazed pot-ware, though beautifully ornamented; the only porcelain being here and there a piece of old oriental ware. The glass, again, though elegant and quaint, and very varied in form, was somewhat bubbled and hornier in texture than the commercial articles of the nineteenth century. The furniture and general fittings of the hall were much of a piece with the table gear, beautiful in form and highly ornamented, but without the commercial “finish” of the joiners and cabinet-makers of our time. Withal, there was a total absence of what the nineteenth century calls “comfort”—that is, stuffy inconvenience; so that, even apart from the delightful excitement of the day, I had never eaten my dinner so pleasantly before.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

“WHAT NEXT?”

WHO would have thought that in the short space of time that has elapsed since Sir W. Harcourt made the jesting remark, “We are all Socialists now,” statesmen and politicians of all shades would roll the word Socialism over in their mouths and use it to conjure and delude with? It has ever been so, that a new inspiration or movement has first been condemned and ridiculed, and then prostituted and stolen by its enemies to use against itself. And the avowed enemies of Socialism (the Liberty and Property Defence League and others), what have they done or not done? Has all their work and money been in vain, or will they not make one more desperate and determined effort to counteract the influence of Socialism and grapple with the inevitable? What has brought this “theory” within the range of practical politics? What is the meaning of this sudden change in our masters, this conversion to kindness? Fear? Of what? An uneducated mob held well in check, or organisation of the workers? Or may it not be some diabolical conspiracy between Capital and “Labour,” or Landlords versus Capitalists, and the People to be again used as tools for their own enslavement, and for safer but not less profits for the classes? “Socialistic” legislation, forsooth! “We are all Socialists now,” and can well afford to be, so long as “we” live on rent, interest, and profit, and you produce them.

An “eight hour day” is first in the field.—To think that our noble comrades in Chicago went to their deaths for this thing!—What is the cause of this move? Our organisations say some. Conceded, for the sake of argument. But, mark you, “limited to government employes,” which means that more people shall be employed for government purposes on worse than useless work, the work of means of destruction and jobbery. Yes, it is possible that combinations of men will be able, by signs of their earnestness and determination, to wring from their masters this same concession; but when these same masters can no longer hold their positions or make enough profit, they may perhaps introduce the “iron man” (machinery) greatly improved upon, or shift their business into sunnier climes (where the workers are not so “damned unreasonable”), and so cripple that particular industry. O well, they may by that time have stopped foreign pauper immigration, and imposed retaliative duties on foreign imports. “What next?” What next, ye blind leaders of the blind? What next, ye constructive prophetic philosophers? Nearly everybody employed a “reasonable number of hours.” Is this the social transformation? Nearly everybody (among the poor) working “for the benefit of an idle, vicious class” just the same, only different (by an hour or two). Yes, the hour or two, or more, is certainly to be considered, and we shall use this time for educational purposes, hoping the freed workers will do the same. But what a consummation! What next? Why, we'll house the poor. Build cheap lodging-houses, and compete with the doss-house, or poor man's hotel-keepers; and build “healthy” workmen's dwellings; at what price and at whose cost? And give them “free” education, elementary, secondary, university, and technical. Yes, and free meals and “free” gifts of boots and clothing and lodgings and seaside trips. And what will be provided for the big children between 20 and 50? Why not free amusements and free competitions for prizes; would not that tend to keep the people contented and happy? “Socialistic” legislation, indeed, what a horrible farce! All that they could do (with the help of men that profess to know better) in Parliament would leave the workers all the time slaves, “better-off slaves,” but still wage-slaves. Look to it, ye simple, trusting, leader-worshipping workers. Organise, organise, you are told. Good. Organise, but also Educate, or what will avail you your unions if ye know not why and when to use them. Can you understand that a commercial crisis will affect you in your unions just the same as before? A new invention, a new fashion, and your unions fall to pieces. But organise, fellow workers, for the right to live without your masters by your own labour. Organise to take possession of and use the land, with the mines, machinery, railways, docks, shipping, factories, and all that you have made in the past; the money they may have and all their scrip.

It was necessary, we are told, that men should be formed into unions all over the country. Just so, my friends; but if you are not very careful others will reap where you have sown. It was necessary to get their ears, you say. Now let us see what you speak to these multitudes and ears; you tell them—what? We'll tell them to use their votes. Ah! is that the game? But how many of them have votes? O, but we'll get them adult suffrage. And will you, by Act of Parliament force them to vote? and to vote for your selections and choices? O, but we'll get payment of members, and short parliaments, and payment of election expenses out of the rates. What next? Then they must send in the "right" man. Who's he? Conservative, Liberal, Radical, or Labour candidate? Can you make or influence one to vote for the other? What kind of man can an ignorant (socially and economically ignorant) people possibly vote for? Only some such man as "their own understanding" dictates, or one who is foisted on them as "the right man."

Is not this the same as the Americans have been doing the last hundred years, and who have they selected, and why, and with what results? Fancy electing to the House of Humbugs a "Member for Metropolitan Pauperism"! How's that for high? It's nearly as good as "a free breakfast-table" with nothing on it. But you may be considering the advisability of working up and waking up the municipalities. Good—very good. And then, having their ear, we hope to be able to educate them.

And we, we International Revolutionary Socialists—what next? With us it must be the same, the same as before, with riper experience, bigger fields, and greater energy, enthusiasm and determination. We'll Educate, Educate, and Educate. The very fact and feeling of which will cause people to Agitate against their conditions and the system that makes them. And the natural sequence of Agitation is Organisation. Thus we shall have organised an educated, agitated force, for defence or offence, as circumstances determine, and prepared both mentally and physically. And by various manifestations of our earnestness and signs of our determination, the social reformers of all kinds—politicians, priests, and princes—will introduce all kinds of palliative measures, which we will take and use for the propagation of Revolutionary Socialism. Come and help in the good work!

Now a word to the wise. What next, ye scientific evolutionists or evolutionary social scientists? We are in the midst of an evolution, of a transition period, you say. In all humility, I beg to submit that we are at the end of an evolution. The time is now ripe for the change; only one thing is needful in order that the human race be eligible for the new society, the society of truth, justice, and happiness. And the one thing needful is—Education. Come, now, ye teachers and guides, educate us as to the meaning of this great change that is waiting to come. Coming slowly, you may say. Yes, it may be so; but who are to blame? All the quicker will it come when all Socialists work for that end which they must of necessity believe in, and when we use all our faculties, energies, and all our time in the good work of "making Socialists." Come now, ye practical ones, and ye honest ones, reply and answer now—"What next?"

H. SAMUELS.

EMIGRATE! EMIGRATE!

THERE are people who say that although there are a great many abuses in the crowded Old World, in New Zealand "Jack is as good as his master," well able to take care of himself, and would not submit to any tyranny from Capital. If anybody is under that delusion, let him read the evidence given before the Dunedin Sweating Commission:

Thomas Fernley, late tram conductor, examined Feb. 13, gave evidence that the hours were from seven to four one week, and from five to eleven next week, with no time for meals. The wages were 27s. 6d. per week, with 3d. in the £ on the money collected. Overtime was paid 1d. per hour extra, and was sometimes from 4 to 6 hours per day. On the 29th January he started work at twenty-five minutes to eight a.m., and was not relieved till five minutes past nine p.m., and had had no food during that time. On going to the office he was told that he had to go on again at ten, in which case he would not have got home till half-past twelve, and would have had to resume at twenty-five minutes past seven next day. He refused, and was fined 2s. 6d., and charged 2s. alleged to be short, and 1s. for not having put the advertisement board on the car.

A seamstress on the following day gave evidence of the benefit of the union. A year ago she only earned 10s. 6d. per week, working from nine a.m. to eleven p.m. Now she could make 12s. or 13s. per week in factory hours.

A journeyman butcher gave his hours of work as from eight to at least half-past eight, and till eleven on Saturday. All last winter he had not seen his own house by daylight. His children knew him; but he was often strongly reminded of the case where the father had struck his own boy in the street, and the latter ran to his mother to tell her that he had been struck by a man who stopped in their house on Sundays.

The principles of the Knights of Labour boiled down to the smallest compass, mean "Do unto your neighbour as you would he should do unto you." This old sentiment has been changed by the present age so that it reads, "Do your neighbour before he gets a chance to do you."—T. V. Powderly.

POSTAL PROPAGANDA.—Here is a letter from one of the friends who have taken our hint as to propaganda by post: I send you 3s. to send some Commonweals to the people over-named. I think many are needed in this neighbourhood; they are the most narrow-minded bigots I ever lived amongst. I greatly sympathise on many points, and I think the Commonweal ought to be read, it may in time make their feelings more elastic. I know some of my personal friends are better to get on with in many points since they have read it a little.

NOTES.

Some more light has been thrown on England's civilising mission in Africa. On Tuesday April 22nd, in a debate in the House of Commons on the suppression of the slave trade, Sir James Ferguson was forced to admit, in answer to a question, that the British East Africa Company was carrying on its "civilising mission" by the aid of the labour of wretched slaves, and thus was supplying a fresh market for the wares of slave hunters in the interior. No wonder Mr. Hanbury, who, although he is a reactionary, happens to be an honest man, declared in the debate which took place on the same subject on the following Friday, that "the miseries of the slave trade had been enormously increased by the pharisaical way in which, while making great professions in this country about the suppression of the slave trade, had acted. We had intensified its horrors and increased its amount."

But a little thought should teach us that if our pious traders and the hypocritical butcher whom they are now engaged in worshipping would tell the truth for once in their lying lives, they would admit that they cannot "civilise" Africa without slavery. In a country where nature is so bounteous, and her resources are open to all men, what native would be a "free labourer" for a set of grinding capitalists, when he can get an easy living without? Therefore, until all the land of Africa is enclosed by European landlords, slavery is as much a necessity to the christian capitalist as to the Arab slave-driver, and accordingly slavery will be "enormously increased" under his rule. But still, although the vilest scoundrelism comes natural to a capitalist, he might do without the whining cant of Exeter Hall, and say boldly that he is "civilising" Africa to make money, not to put down the slave trade; and as long as money is made, he does not mind how it is made, and if it is coined out of the flesh and blood of miserable humanity, he means to make it. Chadband arm in arm in loving brotherhood with the slave-hunting cut-throat, or lashing the backs of "niggers" with a cowhide, is indeed a sickening spectacle. D. N.

At a meeting of the St. Pancras Liberal Association last week, Professor Stuart delivered an address which called forth (as usual on such occasions) a great deal of applause, with but a small modicum of criticism. There was indeed but little to criticise. The Professor's remarks were most pertinent, and the facts which he made known most important and suggestive. In speaking of the question of gas and water rates, he stated that the high rates of the city of London were due solely to the fact that the gas and water supplies, instead of being in the hands of the State, were held by a few monopolists, who doubled their capital in the course of a few years at the expense of the rate-payers.

The speaker was careful to give figures (which are always very effective), and showed clearly enough that not only rent, but all kinds of merchandise were affected by gas and water rates: shopkeepers paying high rates had to sell their goods at high prices. Now, under a new administration—that is, the administration of Liberal members—all this is to be changed. A man now paying a rent of £20 will in the palmy days to come pay but £18 (loud applause). How pleasant as well as reasonable this will be! Tories may say £2 is a trifle, but Professor Stuart wished to know whether £2 was nothing to a working man? He received a very hearty assurance that £2 was a great deal to the workers present, and sat down amid a thunder of grateful applause.

Now, so far so good! The Professor was right in all he said; the figures he named were large, the reforms he advocated was reasonable. He did not think it necessary to mention, however, that the sum of £14,000,000 (which was the amount to be saved in a few years by the reduction of the water rates) was, after all, but a fraction in the National Exchequer, and that the fall of gas and water rates was a very trifling reform. Two pounds may affect the purse, but it in no way affects the position of a worker. It ameliorates his lot, in the same way that alms ameliorates the lot of a pauper. But it changes nothing in his career and destiny.

Now, alms and concessions are in the main degrading to him that gives and to him that takes. The aspirant to Parliamentary honours knows that in agitating about rates he is agitating about trifles, and if he goes no further he is merely an office-seeker buying popularity, as it often can be bought, too cheaply, yet paying away his own honour in the purchase. The friends as well as the enemies of the poor hold them at a disadvantage. They are often ready to value a small concession of liberty or justice as if it were a free and munificent gift, and in the same manner they often over-estimate the value of the reforms which are suggested to them.

At the St. Pancras meeting all the speakers professed an ardent sympathy with the workers, yet no speaker suggested the necessity for an energetic movement to bring about any actual reform. Such ideas as were suggested, were all imported from foreign and despised societies; the nationalisation of gas and water supplies being but a leaf from the programme of the Socialists. The aim indeed was small, and a succession of such aims would prolong the social warfare through many centuries into a very distant future. We believe, however, that the solution of our social problem will not depend on the action of our Parliamentary representatives. For if Liberal candidates can limit their demands to things which hardly affect the people, then legislation is but a farce, kept up solely for the honour and entertainment of the privileged classes.

M. McM.

omitted, and he glides lightly over the burning of the villages, so lightly that many readers would hardly notice it. His firing on the Wavuma, and shooting the man who stole the few beads, is greatly altered. According to his book the Wavuma threw their spears before he fired, but a few sentences will serve to show how it differs from his letter :

"Forming a line on each side of us, about thirty yards off, they flung their spears, which the boat's crew avoided by dropping to the bottom of the boat. The canoes astern clapped their hands gleefully, showing me a large bunch of Mutunda beads which had been surreptitiously abstracted from the stern of the boat. I seized my repeating rifle and fired in earnest to right and left ; the fellow with the beads was doubled up, and the boldest of those nearest to us was disabled."

Now, I wonder how it was Mr. Stanley forgot in his letters that the Wavuma attacked him first, an important fact that quite changes the story. It is surely strange that Mr. Stanley should only remember this crucial point, after he had been accused of inhumanity in taking such a frightful revenge for the theft of a few beads. It is still more curious that he didn't bring it forward on the public platform in answer to the attacks made upon him. Perhaps, however, he thought that the public might look upon him as it does upon a witness in an important case, who having admitted a fact very damaging to himself, hastens at the first moment he understands what he has done, to "correct" his evidence. Mr. Stanley's behaviour to the people of Bambireh is also explained away in a similar fashion.

I have dealt first with the facts cited against Mr. Stanley by Col. Yule and Mr. Hyndman. Some people may say that this is ancient history, but still I would ask them if they think Stanley's character has changed very much. It is true he is not so frank now-a-days in giving the reasons for his numerous conflicts with the natives, but when we find that his journeys can still be clearly traced across the centre of Africa by a blood-red trail strewn with corpses, one cannot help doubting whether Stanley has acquired more humanity in later years. Most of us have a vivid recollection of his sensational letters to the Telegraph upon his battles with the "cannibals" of the Congo. It seems very doubtful now, according to Mr. Stanley's later book entitled "The Congo," whether these were cannibals at all, but one thing is quite certain—the bulk of Mr. Stanley's allies in that famous journey were. In the beginning of the journey Mr. Stanley was escorted by Tippoo Tib, an Arab slave-dealer, who with other Arabs had established their dominion over the Manyema, a nation of cannibals, and it was with an escort of cannibals commanded by Arab slave-hunters that Mr. Stanley started on his journey. No wonder the natives resisted ; the other alternative of becoming slaves or being eaten was too unpleasant. It is true Tippoo Tib and his comrades left Stanley in the heat of the fight to struggle on alone, but the natives were not to know the difference between Stanley's men and their escort. It is curious to note also that the first shot that was fired came from Stanley's party. It was fired by Billali, the Arab boy who carried Mr. Stanley's big gun, and who, doubtless, thought that he was as much justified in potting natives with it as his master. Those who would go into this question further are referred to the second volume of "Through the Dark Continent."

Stanley's march to the "rescue" of Emin Pasha¹ has also been marked by continual battles with the natives, and it is probable enough that these contests were provoked by the overbearing conduct of his own men, who had not lost the manners and customs of the slave-hunters by "exploring" in the company of Mr. Stanley. He tells himself how one of his men, a Soudanese soldier, marched into the village of a friendly tribe and deliberately began shooting the people down ; as it was a "friendly" tribe he was handed over to them to be dealt with according to the law of "blood for blood." But supposing this had not been a "friendly" tribe—what then ? The natives would then have been forced to avenge themselves, and would thus have furnished Stanley with a pretext for massacre. The mere fact of Mr. Stanley being accompanied by a strong armed force, and insisting on marching through all the countries he came to whether the people liked it or not, is quite sufficient to account for all these conflicts. I would ask any man if under similar circumstances an armed body of foreigners of suspicious appearance forced their way through our country, behaving themselves like conquerors, whether we should not resist, especially if members of this expedition sometimes walked into our villages and deliberately began shooting the people down ? If we take these things into consideration, we may understand why a continual slaughter of the natives with "smoking Remingtons" is still a feature of Mr. Stanley's onward march.

D. J. NICOLL.

(To be concluded).

Lady Lindsay says that she would sooner wear a stuffed village child in her headgear than be seen with poor little robins as ornaments in her bonnet. We believe it. In fact, we fancy the British aristocracy views the common or village kind of child as of considerably less value than any of the feathered tribe, more especially that portion of it protected by the game laws.—Brisbane Boomerang.

¹ It is worth noting that even this expedition, which has been praised as if it were a philanthropic work, was simply undertaken for the purpose of commercial exploitation. The Daily News of Monday, April 7th, 1890, gives an account of a book by a German missionary, Father Schynze, who states that the expedition was got up by a shrewd Scotch merchant (Sir W. Mackinnon) who had probably never heard of Emin Pasha before, but who saw an opportunity of getting hold of Emin's province and 4,000 cwt. of ivory that he had in his possession. So slaughter caused by the expedition cannot be excused on a plea of philanthropy.

THE TWO BUMMERS.

Air : "The Two Crows."

THERE were two bums sat in the House—
Bounce-a-bounce ! hey bounce !
'Twas getting hard their chumps to chouse
With a bounce.
Said one old bum unto his mate :
"What shall we do for puff and prate,
With a bounce, bully bounce ?

On yonder bench you see that Graeme,
Bounce-a-bounce ! hey bounce !
What say you ? Shall we make him game,
With a bounce ?
We'll pluck his feathers one by one,
We'll steal his plumes—'twill be such fun !
With a bounce, bully bounce !"

But ah ! that Graeme was all too fly !
Bounce-a-bounce ! hey bounce !
He gave each bum a sable eye
With a bounce !
He stripp'd the mask from off each face,
And show'd their selfish, rotten race,
With a bounce, bully bounce !

Those bummars each gave forth a moan :
"Bounce-a-bounce ! hey bounce !
The game is up—the gaff is blown,
With a bounce !"
—So serve all knaves who try again
To live by selling working-men
With their bounce, bully bounce !

CORRESPONDENCE.

HE MISUNDERSTANDS US.

In your issue of 21st December (which I have received after considerable delay, owing to my wanderings) you say : "There would be small need of any 'legislative remedies' if only the workers would 'perfect their organisations.'" You seem therefore to have a contempt for legislative "remedies." But I understand (1) you advocate a form of Socialism in which, although very rationally comprehending that the revolution must be effected by the people themselves, legislative measures (2) are looked to for the maintenance and regulation of the new society that will follow, at any rate in the shape of the managerial legislature (3) of a vast "social organisation," which is only a different application of the same condemned principle. Is this consistent with the concluding words of the very good Statement published in your last column ?—Yours fraternally,
J. A. ANDREWS.

THE BLANKET-WEAVERS OF COURS.

COMRADES,—In his letter acknowledging a remittance I sent lately, the Secretary of the Labour Syndicate of Cours gives news of the blanket-weavers' strike, which will interest your readers doubtless. The news has been going round that the strike was ended, but this is spread by the mill-owners, who wish to prevent further funds from reaching the Cours workers, and use this means, among others, of trying to break the indomitable spirit of their former employés. The fact is this, that though work is resumed in some of the shops, yet the hands employed by the most important and largest firm remain out, and more than 300 victims remain on the hands of the Syndicate, who don't know which way to turn to support them. The masters had issued circulars in the neighbouring country, and imported "renegade" labour ; and although most of the blacklegs found out they had been hired under false pretences and returned home, more than 300 remain at low wages, to the detriment of the strikers.

Now, though to those who are accustomed to hear of men striking in thousands, this strike in the Rhône Department may not seem very noticeable, in proportion to the district the numbers are really large, and the fact that these people have been on strike for nine months makes this struggle an important item in the annals of labour, and is in itself sufficiently eloquent. This subscription-list will be open some time longer, and I earnestly ask those who have anything to spare from other calls upon their purses to think of those people, called "foreigners" by some, but by us, brothers and fellow-workers, who are fighting as much for us as for themselves, their wives, and children.—Yours fraternally,
MAY MORRIS.

Mayor Burdekin, of Sydney (who has, say, £60,000 or so coming to him annually in house-rent), declares that his reception of Henry George at the Town Hall does not imply that he is in sympathy with the Single-Tax movement. Let us smile, says the Bulletin.

NEW ZEALAND WHITE SLAVERY.—An Auckland (N. Z.) shop-assistant, writing in a local paper, gives the following account of his time : "The 144 hours in the six working days and nights are taken up as follows—64 hours per week behind the counter ; 9 for walking to and fro to meals and work ; 9 for meals, allowing 30 minutes only for each meal ; 9 preparing for work in the morning, and also preparing for rest at night ; 48 for rest and sleep ; giving only 5 hours per week for self for mental improvement, recreation, amusements, etc., which you are generally too tired to take advantage of. If this is not 'white slavery,' what is ?"

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

THE MAY DAY DEMONSTRATION.

DESPITE the prophecies of failure from the faint-hearted and the police proclamations of Mr. James Munro, we are glad to say that the May-Day Demonstration was a complete success. Long before the procession started, large crowds assembled, and the Embankment between Westminster and Blackfriars presented a lively spectacle. The police were there in strong force. A small regiment of mounted men were ranged at the side of the roadway where the ground rises towards Blackfriars Bridge, and 2,000 foot and horse guarded the narrow hilly streets which lie between the Embankment and Fleet Street and the Strand.

The police greatly distinguished themselves during the day. A procession of our East-end comrades was broken up in Aldgate. Some of our friends from France were reminded that they were living in free and happy England by being set upon by the police in St. Martin's Lane. These bullies kicked and cuffed the "bloody foreigners," as they elegantly termed them, without mercy, and broke to pieces a flag they were carrying. On Clerkenwell Green our gallant police attacked the women who were on strike from Fenner's envelope factory in John Street, Clerkenwell, and knocked them about with the savage ruffianism with which we are now familiar. This didn't, however, frighten these plucky girls, who marched down to the Embankment and joined the procession.

At half-past three we started for Hyde Park. As we marched on, the people who thronged the pavement poured into our ranks till the procession became one vast mass of people marching onward. On we swept past the battalion of police who guarded the entrance to Northumberland Avenue, the "Marseillaise" ringing out defiantly as we marched up the hill to the House of Commons, the red flags and banners of the procession waving gaily over our heads in the bright May sun. The banner which headed the procession bore the following inscription, the motto of the demonstration—"Workers of the World, Unite!" in English, French, and German. "Workers of the World, we Hail you as Brothers!" declared another. While a third proclaimed the self-evident truth that "Those who dare not celebrate this day are Slaves!" The banner of the North London Branch of the Socialist League bore the motto, "No Master, High or Low!" while the banner of the Commonweal Branch had upon it these words full of meaning as to the revolution we preach—"Away with Authority and Monopoly! Free access to the means of Life!" A cartoon on a large white banner representing a fat capitalist being kicked in the air by the hob-nailed boot of Labour created great amusement. The Metropolitan Railwaymen bore a flag which had this announcement, which showed the value of our "freedom of labour"—"Metropolitan Railwaymen boycotted for joining the Federation." There were also the banners of the different branches of "The National Federation of Trades and Industries," and the banners of the Firewood-cutters, the Painters and Decorators, and the South-Side Labour Protection League; while over all floated the red flag, the emblem of the revolted labour in every land.

As we entered Hyde Park, the rising ground around the Achilles Statue was densely crowded. When we reached the Reformer's Tree, some 20,000 people gathered round the platforms of the Socialist League and the Federation of Trades and Industries. On the League platform the speakers were Morris, Kitz, Mowbray, Turner, Mainwaring, Tochatti, and Nicoll; while John Williams, Votair, John Wood, James Macdonald, Miss Edith Lupon, J. Baker, Bentley, Buckerbridge, Cores, and Greenman spoke on the Federation platform. The resolution of the Socialist League was carried at both platforms. It ran as follows:

"That this meeting hails with joy the awakening of Labour which is taking place throughout the civilised world; declares the necessity for the union of workers in all countries to obtain complete freedom from the monopoly of capitalists; asserts that the only possible remedy for the poverty and misery of the workers is the free access to the resources of nature, and the management by the workers of the organisation of Labour; and calls on all workers to accept the task of bringing about this freedom as a necessary duty paramount over all others."

Resolutions condemning the despotic action of the authorities at home and abroad were also carried.

In the evening, a very successful torchlight meeting was held on Clerkenwell Green. Parker, Kitz, Mowbray, Nicoll, Hicks, Mrs. Lahr, and others spoke. About 5,000 were present. The parson of the neighbouring church endeavoured to annoy the speakers by making a hideous row with his bells, but the attempt failed in any way to mar the success of the meeting. We all hope and trust that now we have begun the battle, next year the workers of London will demonstrate on May Day, and not put it off till the Sunday to please their masters and the reactionary members of the London Trades Council. English workers will then show their solidarity with labour all over the civilised world.

Sunday's Eight-Hour Demonstration.

I feel in writing of this demonstration, first the impossibility of saying anything that has not been said before, and next that the subject is too colossal for description in the scanty columns of the Commonweal. It is enough to say that the Embankment was thronged from end to end by dense masses of people; that all along the line of route were huge crowds waiting for the arrival of the procession; that Hyde Park was filled by an immense multitude that no man could number; that the clangour of bands filled the air; that the innumerable processions beneath a leaden sky of woeful gloom were enlivened by the bright banners of the trade unions and Radical clubs and the red flags of the Socialist societies; and that on the whole the demonstration was an unparalleled success, before which political demonstrations sink into utter insignificance.

There can be no question that the world of labour has been stirred to intense discontent with existing misery, and the thought must have occurred to many present that there were enough men in Hyde Park on Sunday, if they had been determined, to have swept away our rotten society, with all the misery which presses upon their shoulders so heavily. You had only to look at most of the processionists to see how they suffer beneath the tyranny of the capitalist classes. Stunted forms, faces crushed into brutalised stupidity by the heavy degrading toil, or with figures and faces shrunken and worn with hunger, want, and care. I thought as I looked upon them whether these men are likely to wait till the State Socialists can get a measure through a House of Commons composed of their worst enemies? I don't think they will. I heard a grey-headed workman exclaim, as he listened to an eloquent orator who was perorating concerning the manifold advantages of an eight hour day, "Yes, but you will have to have a universal strike to get it." True, and when the next trade depression comes, and devouring hunger grows sharper, and discontent and despair becomes fierce and deadly, the House of Commons and wealth and respectability may be swept away before an overwhelming torrent. The immense demonstrations held all over the civilised world must convince the most sceptical that we are on the eve of great events, and that the end of the reign of the capitalist is not far off.

The Provinces.

Big meetings have been held in the provinces. At Sheffield on May Day the League resolution was carried unanimously at an enthusiastic meeting at Gower Street. On Sunday 4th a large demonstration was held at the Monolith, and three other meetings were held in other parts of the town. Ten quires of Commonweal sold, and 16s. collected. Speakers, Bullas, Bingham, Edward Carpenter, Raymond Unwin, and Sanders (Walsall). A large and enthusiastic meeting was held at Hallamshire Hall by the Sheffield Labourers' Union, addressed by Sketchley, Hanson, Garbutt, and Bryne. Eight hours and S.L. resolutions carried. At Edinburgh, the meeting in the Meadows was a remarkable success. Hamilton, McWaters, and Keir Hardie spoke to an eight hours resolution; while the speakers for the resolution of the S. L. were Smith, Davidson, and Bruce Glasier. The meeting broke up with cheers for the Social Revolution. Collected, 22s. 1d.; literature sold, 10s. At Manchester an immense demonstration was held in Stevenson Square on Sunday by the whole of the Socialist organisations in Lancashire. Eight hours resolution was spoken to by Sharples, Boyden, and Parkinson; after which the S.L. resolution was moved by Mowbray, and carried unanimously. Collection, £2 16s. 10d.; a large quantity of literature and Commonweal sold. At Leeds on Sunday 36,000 people attended the demonstration. Speakers—Paylor, Cockayne, Samuels, Sweeney, Braithwaite. 12s. worth of pamphlets sold. A resolution expressing solidarity with the international demonstrations of the workers and demanding the eight hour day was carried unanimously. At Dublin, the Irish Socialist Union, at its meeting on May 3rd, adopted a resolution of sympathy with the International Labour Demonstrations on May Day, addresses being delivered by King, Hamilton, Fitzpatrick, and Kavanagh. On May 5th, a meeting in favour of the eight hour movement was held in Phoenix Park. Despite the inclemency of the weather, several thousand people attended. Addresses were delivered by J. A. Poole, M. A. Foreman (Railway Servants), Shields, Kelly, and others: At Yarmouth three most successful meetings were held on May Day and Sunday in favour of international solidarity amongst the workers. Speakers—Ruffold, Headley, and Brightwell. The S.L. resolution was carried unanimously at each meeting. "No Master," "March of the Workers," and other songs were sung. Commonweal sold out.

End of the Irish Railway Strike.

Through the mediation of Archbishop Walsh, Professor Galbraith, and Mr. Harford (A.S.R.S.), the men decided on Saturday to return to work. The directors have promised that they will give a decision upon the terms of the men in a fortnight. The two Cork porters whose discharge was the original cause of the strike are to be reinstated, and the directors have also agreed to pay £10 fine inflicted upon the signalman Fitzgerald.

Women Strike and Win.

The machine folders at Fenner's envelope factory at Clerkenwell have gained a decisive victory. They struck last week against girl labour, a foreman having put on a girl to work a machine at 8s. a-week at which a woman could earn 16s. After they had been out some days, Mrs. Besant headed a deputation to the masters, who have promised that in future girls shall not be employed in the place of women, and that the sanitary condition of the workshop shall be enquired into. These brave women deserve their victory. Their indomitable courage should make some workmen blush for their cowardice.

LIVERPOOL SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—1 Stanley Street, Dale Street.—Meets every Tuesday at 8 p.m.

ANARCHIST LEAGUE.—Sunday May 11, a meeting in Regent's Park at 11.30; and in Hyde Park, near Marble Arch, at 4.30.

SHEFFIELD.—At Hallamshire Hall, Westbar, on Sunday May 11, at 6.30 p.m., J. Sketchley, "The May Day Demonstrations: Their Meaning, and What is to be Done."

EDINBURGH—SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—Tuesdays, Reading and Discussion at 35 George IV. Bridge, at 8. Business meeting, same place and time; Sunday, meeting in Meadows at 4.30; local talent.

FABIAN SOCIETY.—A course of seven lectures on, SOCIALISM IN CONTEMPORARY LITERATURE will be given in the French Chamber, St. James's Restaurant, W. (entrance from Piccadilly), on Friday evenings, at 8 o'clock. May 16 (third lecture), A. R. Dryhurst, "Bax, Kirkup, Gronlund, and Bellamy."

THE NORTH KENSINGTON BRANCH appeal to comrades and friends for their Band Fund. They have the offer of getting drums very cheap from a band that has become defunct, and want to raise about £2 4s. for this purpose. Please send subscriptions to Mrs. Fox, Clarendon Coffee Tavern, Clarendon Road.

SHEFFIELD SOCIALIST CLUB.—We have now opened some fine and centrally situated premises at 63 Blonk Street, containing meeting room, reading room and library, smoke room for games, etc. Open every evening, and on Sunday all day. Membership, 1d. weekly. French Class, conducted by Ed. Carpenter, every Tuesday at 8.30 p.m.; terms, 3d. weekly, which goes towards club funds. Discussion every Wednesday at 8 p.m. We have a good assortment of Labour and Socialist papers from various parts of the world on our reading tables, but should be glad of any books for library. We are very sanguine of being able to accomplish grand propagands in Sheffield and district during the coming summer, and ask the earnest co-operation of all Socialists in this neighbourhood.

FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE 'COMMONWEAL'

A CONCERT AND BALL for the benefit of the Commonweal will take place on Monday, May 12th, at the ATHENÆUM HALL, Tottenham Court Road. The Choirs of the Hammersmith Branch of the Männer Gesang Verein, and the Communist Club will sing during the evening. "THE DUCHESS OF BAYS WATER & Co." will be rendered by W. Morris, May Morris, H. H. Sparling, and others. Mr. Frinxell's Quadrille Band. Programme—Single, 1s. Couples, 1s. 6d., of F. Kitz, League Office, and all Branches and allied societies.

"WESTWARD HO!"

SPENDING a little holiday in Somersetshire this Easter, I was much cheered to find how Socialistic teaching is spreading down in those parts, and how readily people are assimilating our ideas. In Bristol, of course, there has been a strong body of Socialists for some years, and they keep pegging away valiantly with untiring enthusiasm. I had the honour of speaking at their first open-air meeting for this season in the Haymarket. The members turned up well, with flag and lamp bedecked with mottoes, and the audience were exceptionally attentive for an open-air meeting. During the winter the Socialists have been helping to organise the unskilled labour of both men and women, and by means of numerous strikes they have succeeded in obtaining rather better terms for the workers generally; but the great wave of labour agitation which followed the dock strike is showing signs of being spent, and I think the Bristol Socialists are feeling disposed to throw themselves with renewed vigour into the great work of educating the people in Socialism.

The Clifton Christian Socialists are also making a move again; and, judging from their weekly meeting, at which I spoke, there seems to be a decided disposition amongst some of the well-to-do people to study the question seriously. The younger people especially—high-school mistresses, and youths just starting in life—appear anxious to find out the right and to work for it.

But it was in Bridgewater, a little old-fashioned river-pont town, thirty miles or more west of Bristol, that I was most surprised to see Socialism springing up. I found that the Congregational minister had been preaching in favour of Socialism, and that the editor of one of the local papers was publishing 'Looking Backward' in weekly instalments! At the request of some friends, the Liberal and Radical associations agreed to call a meeting jointly to hear a lecture from me on Socialism: and a capital meeting we had. A good sprinkling of well-to-do people were there, the rest of the room being nicely filled with workers from the wagon shops, brick yards, and docks. The chair was taken by Dr. Winterbotham, president of the Liberal Association, who spoke in a very sympathetic way of the Socialist movement, though dissenting from some of my "extreme views." There was very little opposition, and the meeting altogether encouraged me to believe that many of the outlying districts will ere long accept Socialistic teaching much more rapidly than we have been accustomed to expect. Even business men are coming to see that things cannot go on as they have been doing for the last fifteen years; they acknowledge that competition has made life hardly worth living, even for the employers. What must it be for the workers!

REPORTS.

KILBURN.—Mainwaring addressed a good audience at the Old Plough on May 4th; 20 'Weals' sold.

MITCHAM.—A great meeting was held upon the Fair Green last Sunday evening, addressed by Kitz, Davis, Parker, and Gregory. The League resolution of Labour Day was carried with acclamation. We aired our new red standard on the occasion, and it seemed to have a dispiriting influence upon the police around. Our Streatham comrades assisted at the meeting, which was most enthusiastic; in fact, enthusiasm and hope pervades the workers here, who are organising against their masters on all sides.—F. K.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—We held no meeting at Latimer Road on Sunday morning. The Branch attended demonstration in Hyde Park in the afternoon. At our rooms in the evening we had choir practice, after which there was a lively discussion on the "Topics of the Day;" 2s. 1d. collected; Commonweal sold well during the day.

NORTH LONDON.—At Hyde Park on Saturday, a good meeting was addressed by Nicoll and Mrs. Lahr; 22 'Weals' and some Freedoms sold. In Regent's Park on Sunday morning, Nicoll, Mrs. Lahr, and Hunter Watts addressed a good audience; 57 'Weals' sold, and 2s. 4d. collected. Altogether we have sold 126 Commonweal this week.

LEICESTER.—Sunday last, May 4th, we began our outdoor propaganda; Barclay, Taylor, and Chambers spoke in Russell Square; audience fairly good. In the evening Barclay spoke to a good audience at Humberstone Gate on "What Socialism is;" 'Weals' sold out; collection, 3s. 8d. We are making arrangements for London and provincial speakers throughout the summer.—T. B.

SHEFFIELD.—Thanks to the efforts of the defenders of law-'n'-order in general, our meetings have been much better attended of late. On Sunday, April 27th, comrade Peacock (of Nottingham) was with us. In the morning large meeting at the Monolith; 5s. collected. In the afternoon several comrades went down to Rotherham and held a good meeting; 10s. collected for the stove-grate workers, who are out on strike. Large meeting at the Pump, where Peacock again spoke; we had no 'Weals' left, having sold out at the previous meetings, but several pamphlets of Carpenter's sold, and 2s. 1d. collected.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

WEEKLY; ONE PENNY.

THE "EIGHT HOURS" AND THE DEMONSTRATION.

Now that the noise and clatter of the 4th of May demonstration are over, it may be profitable to consider what it was that that huge meeting was crying for, and whether it is likely to get it.

But first we must assume that the 4th of May demonstration did not aim at showing any expression of sympathy with labour generally throughout the civilised world. It was in fact an English trades-union meeting distinct from the meetings held on the Continent and in London on May Day, although it was only the agitation on the Continent that made it possible. The English workmen, if we may believe the Star (which is now a definitely reactionary paper) have got together a huge demonstration, which, while it was a mere hanger-on of the revolutionary meetings abroad, disclaims any solidarity with those who first began the movement, and allows the English press to insult them with jingo rot unrebuked.

The legal eight hours, then, is the thing claimed by the 4th of May. Of course, I do not deny that many who attended that meeting go much further than that; but then a great many more do not go as far, and only have very hazy ideas of what they want.

Furthermore, the spirit of that demonstration was a kind of missive to Parliament. It practically said: "We want the eight-hours day: you, Parliament, must get it for us, and settle how it is to be."

That this was its spirit is clear enough from the fact that no sort of hint has been given of any action to follow the demonstration. For instance, one would have thought that with such a definite and apparently small aim before them, the leaders of the movement would have called a congress of at least the London workmen to settle on some course of action to push the Parliament on toward some steps for giving effect to the workmen's wishes: but as above-said, nothing of the sort is being done, and the matter is to be allowed to go cold; and in the meantime the capitalist press is having its innings, and is showing with a mixture of truth and falsity peculiarly easy of employment under the circumstances, that the limitation of the hours of labour is impossible, and that if possible it would be of no advantage to the workers. Of course, these capitalist agents do not mean by this to put forth the matter from a Communist standpoint, as will have to be done here presently: all they mean is, that resistance wherever possible to the amelioration of the workers which is the great object of modern politicians.

Now let us look at this eight hours claim for a little and try to find out what it means. In the first place, no one who is not a slave-driver (and most middle-class persons are slave-drivers), would deny that it would be a good thing in itself for the maximum day's work to be reduced to eight hours; although on the other hand it would not in itself be even a step in advance towards Socialism. From that point of view it would be nothing more than an amelioration in the lot of—slaves; just as an increase in the wage-earner's wages is an increase in the slave's rations. Now, one must say that this kind of amelioration is just the thing which can only be gained by that species of "self-help" which is called a general strike; and that if it were gained in this manner, the manner of gaining it would be so educational that the gain would have a very different and much greater significance than it would if thrown to the people by Parliament as a mere tub to the whale.

Now, as to the gain of an Eight Hours Bill, what would it amount to? In the first place, would it benefit the whole of the workers or only a part? Surely there can only be one answer to that question. For instance, how is such a Bill going to deal with the work of the agricultural labourers? And I may notice in passing that this body of workers, at once the most useful and the most hardly used of all, are generally left out in the cold when it is a question of these partial "ameliorations"—unless where it is obviously intended to "work" them for some political plot. Many other instances of workers who would not benefit by an Eight Hours Bill will occur to any working man who thinks about the subject.

Again, the Bill passed, a struggle between masters and men will begin as to the wages to be paid for the shorter day's labour. Will Parliament deal with this difficulty, I ask? I will show presently what it will mean if it does. Meantime I assert that the men will have to deal with it by strikes—i.e., they will have to fight the whole battle over again. Once more, if the capitalists stand to lose by the change, they will strain every nerve to recover that loss; and the intensification of labour is one obvious means of doing this. Improved organisation (i.e., slave-driving) in the workshop, improved machinery in the factory, will set the capitalist right again and force the workers to produce more in every hour—i.e., to waste their bodily and mental powers more.

Surely all these things must, in any case, be dealt with by the usual methods of a Labour war, and the mere machinery of a statute will have very little effect on that war. Why, then, when the workers must of necessity make the new bill work themselves, should they not save time and toil by making the unwritten custom themselves at first hand? Of what use will be the mere ornament of a legal enactment when they have got what they want without it? And let us also remember once more that every gain won by the combination of labour hastens the day when the odious distinctions of class will be abolished.

But some people will say, "This may be true if we are to stop at a mere eight hours bill; we mean much more than this." Quite true; every Social Democrat who knows the aims of his party, knows that a legal eight hours day will be unworkable without a legal minimum wage in each big trade (how about the little ones?), and that that again will be useless without the enactment of a maximum price of all general articles of consumption; and these enactments will make it necessary to establish national workshops in order to destroy the profit of the capitalists, i.e., the capitalists themselves. This means complete State Socialism, with which we Communists do not agree, because we believe that the difficulties besetting it are so great, that the realisation of Communism would be no more difficult on the one hand, and on the other would mean a whole revolution, and not that most fertile parent of counter-revolution, a half revolution.

But apart from this, does any man in his senses suppose that any Parliament in England (or the world), on this side of civil war, would hesitate one moment between allowing an eight hours bill to become mere waste paper and accepting the logical consequences of it? Our artful Social Democratic friends would find they had done nothing with the small end of the wedge but jar their hands by hammering on it, and that they would have to begin all over again, unless they had force enough to compel the capitalist enemy to disgorge his ill-gotten gains for fear of worse.

We may be sure that whatever part of the Social Democratic claim Parliament yields to, will be given with the intention of its being either a nullity or a bait to quiet possible revolution.

One thing which the Demonstration of May 4th asked for they may get in a fashion, that is, the eight hours day in government factories; but it will be given, if at all, in the hope of its acting as a little bit of corruption. The price expected to be paid will be the quieting, the de-revolutionising, of the workmen so employed. One may indeed hope that the price will not be paid. But this on the other hand is sure to happen, that the Parliamentary capitalists will think they have done a prodigious stroke of Socialist business, and will take care not to do any more Socialism till the Revolution is thundering at their doors, and no man cares a button what they do.

Meantime, one must use the thread-bare fable again, and say that when the labouring mountains have produced this ridiculous mouse, the music of his squeak will scarcely pay us for all our trouble and all our—shuffling. State Socialism?—I don't agree with it; in fact, I think the two words contradict one another, and that it is the business of Socialism to destroy the State and put Free Society in its place. But State Socialism in the hands of a bureaucratic department—that is indeed a strange birth of compromise and "moderation."

WILLIAM MORRIS.

STANLEY'S EXPLOITS:

OR,
CIVILISING AFRICA.

BUT there is one thing Mr. Stanley is frank about, and that is his treatment of his own followers, and in this he shows that he has not changed with time. The following instance of how he serves them when mad with hunger is taken from his letter dated Ituri River, August 28, 1888. It runs as follows:

"Hitherto our people were sceptical of what we told them, the suffering had been so awful, calamities so numerous, the forest so endless apparently, that they refused to believe that by-and-bye we should see plains and cattle, the Nyanza, and the white man Emin Pasha. We felt as if we were dragging them along with a chain round their necks. . . . They turned a deaf ear to our entreaties, for driven by hunger and suffering they sold their rifles and equipments for a few ears of Indian corn. . . . Perceiving that prayers and entreaties and mild punishments were of no avail, I resolved to visit upon the wretches the death penalty. Two of the worst cases were accordingly taken and hanged in the presence of all."

Mr. Stanley's receipt for dealing with men driven to desperation by hunger might be copied by his middle-class admirers in future trade depressions, when unemployed men mad with famine may sack a few baker's shops. The only obstacle, doubtless, to the gallows as a remedy for discontent, is, that the English workers have not yet sunk to the abject servility of Mr. Stanley's escort, and the people who applied the remedy might perchance have a taste of their own medicine.

It is not surprising, considering the sufferings of the men—who perished by scores during the march—and the remorseless cruelty of the tyrant at their head, that later on a "mutiny" broke out, headed by one of Emin Pasha's men, who by this time had been "rescued." The scene that followed was well described by a fervent admirer of Stanley (Mr. Stevens, an American correspondent) at the Savage Club, on Saturday, February 15, 1890, and appeared in the newspapers on the following Monday. I give it in full, and ask the reader to remember that it was told by a friend of the explorer:

"At that time Stanley was so weak that he could not turn in his bed without help; but so strong was his iron will that he insisted upon being taken out of bed and propped up in a chair. He took a strong stimulant and had himself carried outside of his tent, where the people were all drawn up, and where the mutineer, who had been tried and found guilty, awaited his sentence. The chair was put down, and Stanley faced the miscreant, the fever in his eye and his thin hand outstretched, 'We have come through a thousand difficulties and dangers to save you,' he said, 'and this is our reward. Depart to God!' The people thereupon rushed upon the man, shouting, 'What shall we do with him?' 'Send him to God, I say,' shouted Stanley, pointing to the overhanging limb of a tree. A rope was thrown over it, noosed round the miscreant's neck, and he was swiftly run up and soon dangled a corpse in the air."

Other mutineers were subjected to "mild punishments," that is, "some were flogged and others ironed." You would think this would be sufficient to maintain "order" in an expedition, but it is not enough for Stanley, he must introduce that other civilising influence—the gallows—into the African wilds as well. Perhaps the savage may find a good use for it one of these days, and send somebody else to "God." We mention no names, but there are some people who are too "good" for this wicked world. Before quitting this subject we would like to say that if Major Bartelott administered Stanley's system of ironing, flogging, and hanging liberally among his men, we can quite understand why his cannibal escort made short work with him.

In summing up the methods of Stanley's system of "exploration," we find them to consist of fire, sword, and rapine among the natives, and of ironing, flogging, and hanging among his own followers. And this is the person whom the respectable middle-class from press and platform call upon us to worship as a dauntless hero, a "Christian pioneer," bringing "sweetness and light" to the benighted natives of the darkest regions of Africa! We would suggest, that after a series of Stanley banquets the middle-class should make a pilgrimage to the tomb of the late Mr. Peace, of immortal memory, and cover it with heaps of flowers. Surely if Stanley's courage and enterprise is worthy of so much admiration, we should not forget the efforts of the noted burglar in his most dangerous and hazardous occupation, which requires the very same qualities that Stanley has displayed. True, the exploits of Mr. Peace have not benefited the human race to any considerable extent. Let us see now if Stanley's explorations have improved the lot of wretched humanity. Let us look at Africa, and see if we Socialists are not right in denying that Stanley's expeditions have benefited or will benefit the natives of Africa. Our first reason is that, up to the present, he and his men have only benefited the natives by acting as the advance guard of Arab slave-hunters. In his book on the Congo, Stanley describes how in his journey up that river he found the tribes who had so valiantly opposed his passage had been massacred by slave-dealers, who, after Tippoo Tib's return to Nyangwe, had followed in Stanley's track, and with the aid of the Manyemas had carried fire and sword along the populous banks of the Congo. Stanley tells us in his book how his allies had desolated 118 villages and 43 districts, a country larger than Ireland, and had captured 2,300 women and children as slaves and 2,000 tusks of ivory. He says:

"Given that these 118 villages were peopled only by a 1,000 each, we have only a profit of 2 per cent.; and by the time all these captives have been subjected to the accidents of the river voyage to Kirundu and Nyangwe, of camp life and its harsh miseries, to the havoc of small-pox and the pests which such miseries breeds, there will only be a scant 1 per cent. upon the bloody venture."—"The Congo," 2nd Vol., p. 148.

Please admire the commercial instincts of Mr. Stanley, who, in the presence of misery, rapine, and murder, can calculate concerning the small profit upon such a "bloody venture." Further on, Mr. Stanley states that slave-hunters to get their slaves

"have shot 2,500 natives, while 1,300 more died by the wayside through scant provisions and the intensity of their hopeless wretchedness. And such slaves! They are females and young children who cannot run away, or with youthful indifference will soon forget the terrors of their captivity. Yet each of the very smallest infants has cost the life of a father, and perhaps his three stout brothers and three grown-up daughters. An entire family of six souls have been done to death to obtain that small, feeble, and useless child."—"The Congo," 2nd Vol., pp. 149-50.

And yet if Mr. Stanley had never explored the Congo, all this misery would not have occurred. Stanley, according to his own account, had some notion of avenging the massacre of the natives on the slave-drivers, but he reflected as follows:

"And yet, whom am I that I should take the law into my hands and mete out retribution, . . . I had not the slightest shadow of authority to vindicate the dictates of justice. I represented no constituted government, nor had I the shadow of authority to assume the rôle of censor, judge, and executioner."—"The Congo," 2nd Vol., p. 144.

It is strange that Mr. Stanley never thought of these things when wretched savages were in question and not well armed slave traders. He might surely have also thought what right he had to assume the "rôle of censor, judge, and executioner" when his own followers were concerned. Perhaps the fact that the slave-traders were a strong party and armed with rifles had something to do with this singular forbearance. So he treated these demons as allies and comrades. "We exchanged gifts with Karema and his blood-stained confederates" (p. 151). That Stanley still finds allies among the slave-traders may be seen in his accounts of the Emin Pasha expedition, where we find him again acting in concert with Tippoo Tib and the Manyemas. Again he serves as the advance guard of the slave-hunters, for in his letter of Sept. 1, 1888, to the Royal Geographical Society, he states that his passage through the rich and thickly populated country of the Banalaya, Bakunda, and Bungangeta has been the ruin of the people. He writes, "The abundance found by us will never be found again, for the Arabs have followed my track by hundreds and destroyed villages and plantations, and what the Arabs spare the elephant herds complete." So up to the present Stanley's explorations have hardly been a blessing to the natives of Africa. Mr. Stanley has first broken the spirit of the natives with the deadly fire of his breech-loaders, and they have then fallen an easy prey to the Arabs who have followed close upon his heels.

With the facts before us, there can be no doubt as to whether Stanley's explorations have been for the benefit of the African race. But there is something else for our consideration, even if his brightest dreams are realised and commercial civilisation is introduced into the centre of Africa. Ask those workers who live under that civilisation, and who slave in unhealthy factories for starvation wages, and eat bad and adulterated food, and dwell in rotten slums, whether they think the African savage will gain anything by exchanging his wild free life for theirs? Let the philosophers and scientists, who say that the life of the savage is preferable to that of the civilised labourer, answer. Then, surely, until the life of the mass of the population is happier than that of the savage, we have no right to go and inflict our miseries upon him. Let us set our own house in order first before we talk of "civilising" others.

Let us sum up the conclusions at which we have arrived. We have seen that Stanley forced his way by the armed hand and with ruthless cruelty through native tribes, burning their villages and shooting them down like dogs with explosive bullets. We have seen that, far from suppressing the slave trade, he has often allied himself with the slave-hunters, and has cleared the way for them to fresh fields of rapine and slaughter. Finally, we see that his ultimate aim is the extension of trade and civilisation, that is, the extension of a "shoddy commercialism" including the "improvement" of the savage off the face of the earth by the Martini-Henry rifle, the Gatling gun, the whisky bottle, and the worst diseases that our civilisation breeds. We can see in Africa, and all over the world where "civilisation" spreads, that the poor savage perishes from the face of the earth, or, at the best, sinks down into a hopeless degraded being, as wretched and miserable as the outcasts of our great cities. Knowing these things, we Socialists refuse to join our voices to the chorus of triumph which greets the man who, to swell the ill-gotten wealth of our cruel sweaters, is willing to inflict these untold horrors upon a simple people who have not yet been accursed by "Christian" civilisation. Let the great thieves and their parasites welcome the "sanctimonious pirate" who glosses over fire, slaughter, and cruelty with the "snuffing cant of the mission-hall." We will have none of him. Let him be satisfied with the applause of those who would have crucified Christ and worshipped Barabbas; but, at least, amid the applause he shall hear our hisses. We have made our protest. We have given reasons for our accusations; and though we expect to make no impression on those who recognise in Stanley a man after their own heart, yet we trust that at least some of those who have been beguiled by them will take the warning to heart, and join no longer in the Jingo worship of one who combines all the vices of an old buccaneer or a modern burglar, with all the soul-corroding humbug of Little Bethel; who is a cross between Pecksniff and Blackbeard or Bill Sikes, with a dash of Quilp to add the final flavouring—the typical hero of commercialism.

D. J. NICOLL.

FREEDOM.

AND are we free? Ah! say not so;
Gyves such as these ne'er freemen wore.
As well tell lark in gilded cage
That he in sky is free to soar.

Go watch the stunted worker creep,
Tired and worn from daily toil;
Behold his haggard face and eyes,
His body gripped in slavery's coil.

And watching; who shall say that he
Is one of Freedom's happy sons?
Free? Aye! to work, to slave, to starve,
So long as life's blood feebly runs.

Free to be sweated, and to sweat;
Free to be murdered, slowly, sure;
Free to be scorned by robber rich;
Free to be shown the workhouse door!

Free to compete with father, son;
Free to compete with mother, wife;
Struggling for bread and stifling den,
Dreading to snap the thread of life.

And while for vampires men must moil,
And o'erhead hangs the darkling mist,
While workers starve, and robbers thrive,
So long will slavery exist.

Not till the plunderer stays his hand,
And ceases rife more to be,
Not till each lives by honest toil—
Not, not till then shall men be free.

And when the mist is rent in twain,
And Freedom's face peeps shyly through—
Then will the toiler strive to reach
The throne of Love, the Good, the True.

Break, then, ye mist, that all may see
The goddess fair, the ideal bright;
Clutch fearlessly the flaming torch
Before the day shall turn to night.

Ring, ring, ye heavens, with joyous cries,
And torches glow with ruddy glare;
Let Brotherhood, majestic youth,
Wed Liberty, that goddess fair.

EDWARD J. WATSON.

IN NEW ZEALAND.

WE owe a great deal here to the London Dock Strike, in the way of stimulating workers in every trade to organise themselves for mutual help and protection and the amelioration of their lot. Ever since the strike our papers also are well supplied with cablegrams about the Labour movements, which seem to be keeping things pretty lively with you. Our only morning paper here in Dunedin has lately given a fortnightly column to the record and consideration of labour happenings throughout the world. The column is in good hands, and has been expressing views which cause intense annoyance to and evoke much hostility from the "let alone" party among our population. That they find a place at all in the columns of a paper supported by the capitalist and commercial classes is something to note as instructive.

Some idea of how the Dock Strike stirred us up may be gathered from the fact that during the last year no less than twelve unions have come into existence, with an aggregate membership of 12,250.

A few details as to the principal organisations may be interesting. The Coal Miners, whose centre is Westport, includes all coal-miners, quartz-miners, and labourers on the west coast. Its membership amounts to 1,800. It is a branch of the Amalgamated Association of Miners in Australia, whose total membership exceeds 28,000 men. The Federated Seamen's Union has a membership of about 2,000. It is also a branch of the Federated Seamen's Union of Australasia, which tots up 14,000 members. The Wharf Labourers' Union of New Zealand is of recent growth, having only been started some four months ago, but already numbers 3,000 men. It is local at present—i.e., to New Zealand—but negotiations are going on between the colonies for federation. The three foregoing unions are united together under a council called the Maritime Labour Council of New Zealand. The Railway Employés Union is also a very youthful union. It is only a few weeks old, but embraces 3,500 members. This union, it is likely, will shortly be federated with the Australian union of railway employés. Another youthful body is the Tailoresses' Union, which is only a few months old. It was first formed in Dunedin, but is now gradually extending in Christchurch, Wellington, and Auckland. Its present membership is about 1,900. The Bootmakers' Union has 850, and the Typographical Society about 600. This latter body is affiliated with Australia. The Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners have over 900 members here; they form a branch of the Home society. The Amalgamated Society of Engineers is also pretty strong, but I don't know their exact numbers in New Zealand; they also are a branch of the Home society. The Marine Engineers have a membership of close on 400, and as most of these are certificated men, affiliated to the Australian society, they are another powerful body. The Shipmasters' and Officers' Association show close on 300 members, all of whom possess Government certificates.

The foregoing are the principal unions in New Zealand, but there are still the following to swell the total: Ironmoulders (80), Boilermakers (50), Shipwrights (150), Painters (190), Bakers (300), Millers (60), Wharf Carters (250), Plumbers (100), Tailors (260), Stewards and Cooks (600—federated with Australia), Invercargill Trades and Labour Union (400), Bluff Fishermen and Oystermen (100), Plasterers and Bricklayers (number unknown). There are a few more unions of a local nature, of which the particulars are not at hand.

Each of the four chief cities of New Zealand (Dunedin, Christchurch, Wellington, and Auckland) has a Trades and Labour Council, which consists of delegates from the foregoing unions, whose duties are to look after the interests of all classes of labour, and to settle amicably, if possible, any dispute that may arise in any particular branch of trade; failing this, they invoke the whole power of all the unions on behalf of the particular one concerned.

It will be seen that the growth of trades-unionism in this colony has been somewhat remarkable. The numbers given here represent a membership of over 17,000. The movement is constantly extending. Taking the unions in process of formation, and those whose numbers are not at hand, there must be now a trades-union membership of close upon 20,000 strong out of a total population of a little over half a million. This is already a somewhat formidable organisation, and when the process of amalgamation with Australian unions, which is now going forward, is completed, it will be seen that these federated unions will give a powerful position to labour in the colonial industrial world.

Not before it is wanted, however. At a meeting to form a tailoresses' and pressers' union, held in Auckland, January 28, Mr. Preston, a tailor, alluded to the sweating system, and stated that in one establishment in Auckland a more cruel system than that employed could not be devised. For slop goods this employer paid 9d. for making trousers, 6d. for waistcoats, and 1s. 1d. for coats, making a total of 2s. 4d. for the suit. He knew of one married woman, whose husband was a carpenter and out of work, and who took some work from this employer at 9d. a-pair for trousers. Her husband, however, would not allow her to do the work at the price. At first-class shops the average price for making trousers is 6s. 6d., waistcoats 6s., and coats 19s.

There is now a Sweating Commission sitting here, cuttings of the evidence before which I send you, and you will see that we are quickly catching up to you in some things as well as in others. Here is a sample:

"S. Spragg gave evidence that he was one of the reporting staff of the Otago Daily Times. Towards the close of 1888 he received instructions to make an investigation as was practicable into what was termed the 'sweating system,' then in operation, and concerning which communications had been received and published by the journal with which he was connected. He began the inquiry without any preconceived opinions regarding it, and prosecuted it with a view to ascertaining the facts, whatever they might be. With the results of the inquiry he was in no way concerned, his instructions being to investigate the circumstances impartially. He must admit that the facts elicited soon removed his feeling of comparative indifference, but, he believed, that did not affect the inquiry in a prejudicial manner. The result of these investigations were published in a series of articles on the 'Sweating System,' which appeared in the Times during the month of January last year. In his researches he had found nothing of what he would call 'sweating,' but a very low rate of wages obtained, which necessitated to employés very long hours of work in order to obtain a sufficiency of wages on which to live. His definition of 'sweating' was the letting out of work to others by sub-contractors at a rapidly descending rate of pay, and he had seen nothing of this sort in Dunedin. If 'sweating meant that the people who do the work could make next to nothing out of it, then there had been any amount of sweating going on in Dunedin. In one case he had been informed by the proprietress of a factory that she had been induced to lower her charges upon a promise of continuous work; that for the sake of constant work her employés had consented to a reduction that enabled her to accept the terms offered; and then on one plea or another the supply of work was intermittent, and she and her employés suffered in common. He had no doubt that the state of things described in the articles was brought about by excessive and reckless competition. In using the term 'reckless' he meant to imply that the employers were not at all careless of their own interests, but that they seemed reckless as to whether their employés could live honestly or at all on the wages paid to them. He had found a reduction of wages occasionally to result from the competition of 'outsiders' to obtain occasional work. His observations were confined mainly to clothing factories. He had known girls in factories taking work home to finish, but never knew them to complain of it. He had rather thought they were glad to get it to do. He had visited their homes, and what he had observed was told in the articles referred to. In some cases he thought the girls he visited who were working at their homes were only fit to be in the hospital. The opinion had been expressed that the low rate of wages resulted from the desire of the public to obtain goods at the lowest possible price. He held an entirely different opinion. The people who made a profit out of the low rate of wages were the only people who were to blame. It was absurd to suppose that paying 1d. or 2d. less for a shirt would be any inducement to the retail purchaser. And it was also as ridiculous to suppose that the retailer who sold a few dozen shirts in a week (more or less) had a great interest in doing so. But to those who put out 100 doz. or so at a time, 2d. a-piece made a considerable difference; and those who got the profit should also get the blame. In regard to trade unions, the witness expressed the opinion that they were an undoubted good in a community, for they prevented factories from taking contracts at improper rates. So far as witness could see, the evils of the sweating system would, under the existing condition of things, best be obviated by a really strong federated trades union, supported in all reasonable demands by public opinion."

Mornington, N.Z., March 20, 1890.

H. K. WILKINSON.

The strike on Meteor Downs has been settled (March 8). After five weeks' struggle Tyson has agreed to give the labourers fair wages. The influence of the Australian Labour Federation contributed a good deal to the result.

OVER-PRODUCTION AND OVER-POPULATION.—There must be many thousands "unemployed" in Australia. There are two and a half millions of workmen out of work in America. There are over a million in England. Is it not an indictment upon our civilisation, asks the Brisbane Worker, when, in the newest countries as in the oldest, under protection and free trade and mongrel tariff alike, we utterly fail to bring together the workers, we cannot carry on production and exchange without this terrific friction? Frank Cotton, an Australian-born Georgian, tells a fine story in this connection. He says he was on a mining field down South, when along came a protectionist touter, who began to a group of miners about the iniquity of letting in cheap American goods. "How does that hurt us?" demanded a digger. "They over-produce on the cheap and unload on us," explained the touter, "so that we can't start factories of our own." "Yes, but they are protected, and yet they have cheap labour. How's that? Oughtn't men to earn high wages in a protected colony?" "Of course," responded the touter, nothing abashed; "they ought to, but the country's over-populated, and that makes wages low." "See here, mister," commented the digger, "you say they produce too much, and that there are too many of them. Over-production and over-population!—too many kids and too much tucker! What the buck-eyed rabbit are you giving us? Go to blazes out of this!" And that is about the size of it in every country. The more there is produced the poorer the workers get, because the richer the non-workers become. That's how it will be in Australia unless something is done.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. XVI. (continued).—DINNER IN THE HALL OF THE BLOOMSBURY MARKET.

WHEN we had done eating, and were sitting a little while, with a bottle of very good Bordeaux wine before us, Clara came back to the question of the subject-matter of the pictures, as though it had troubled her. She looked up at them, and said: "How is it that though we are so interested with our life for the most part, yet when people take to writing poems or painting pictures they seldom deal with our modern life, or if they do, take good care to make their poems or pictures unlike that life? Are we not good enough to paint ourselves? How is it that we find the dreadful times of the past so interesting to us—in pictures and poetry?"

Old Hammond smiled. "It always was so, and I suppose always will be," said he, "however it may be explained. It is true that in the nineteenth century, when there was so little art and so much talk about it, there was a theory that art and imaginative literature ought to deal with contemporary life; but they never did so; for, if there was any pretence of it, the author always took care (as Clara hinted just now) to disguise, or exaggerate, or idealise, and in some way or another make it strange; so that, for all the verisimilitude there was, he might just as well have dealt with the times of the Pharaohs."

"Well," said Dick, "surely it is but natural to like these things strange; just as when we were children, as I said just now, we used to pretend to be so-and-so in such-and-such a place. That's what these pictures and poems do; and why shouldn't they?"

"Thou hast hit it, Dick," quoth old Hammond; "it is the child-like part of us that produces works of imagination. When we are children time passes so slow with us that we seem to have time for everything."

He sighed, and then smiled and said: "At least let us rejoice that we have got back our childhood again. I drink to the days that are!"

"Second childhood," said I in a low voice, and then blushed at my double rudeness, and hoped that he hadn't heard. But he had, and turned to me smiling, and said: "Yes, why not? And for my part I hope it may last long; and that the world's next period of wise and unhappy manhood, if that should happen, will speedily lead us to a third childhood: if indeed this age be not our third. Meantime, my friend, you must know that we are too happy, both individually and collectively, to trouble ourselves about what is to come hereafter."

"Well, for my part," said Clara, "I wish we were interesting enough to be written or painted about."

Dick answered her with some lover's speech, impossible to be written down, and then we sat quiet a little.

CHAP. XVII.—HOW THE CHANGE CAME.

DICK broke the silence at last, saying: "Guest, forgive us for a little after-dinner dulness. What would you like to do? Shall we have out Greylocks and trot back to Hammersmith? or will you come with us and hear some Welsh folk sing in a hall close by here? or would you like presently to come with me into the City and see some really fine building? or—what shall it be?"

"Well," said I, "as I am a stranger, I must let you choose for me."

In point of fact, I did not by any means want to be 'amused' just then; and also I rather felt as if the old man, with his knowledge of past times, and even a kind of inverted sympathy for them caused by his active hatred of them, was a kind of blanket for me against the cold of this very new world, where I was, so to say, stripped bare of every habitual thought and way of acting; and I did not want to leave him too soon. He came to my rescue at once, and said—

"Wait a bit, Dick; there is someone else to be consulted besides you and the guest here, and that is I. I am not going to lose the pleasure of his company just now, especially as I know he has something else to ask me. So go to your Welshmen, by all means; but first of all bring us another bottle of wine to this nook, and then be off as soon as you like; and come again and fetch our friend to go westward, but not too soon."

Dick nodded smilingly, and the old man and I were soon alone in the great hall, the afternoon sun gleaming on the red wine in our tall quaint-shaped glasses. Then said Hammond:

"Does anything especially puzzle you about our way of living, now you have heard a good deal and seen a little of it?"

Said I: "I think what puzzles me most is how it all came about."

"It well may," said he, "so great as the change is. It would be difficult indeed to tell you the whole story, perhaps impossible: knowledge, discontent, treachery, disappointment, ruin, misery, despair—those who worked for the change because they could see further than other people went through all these phases of suffering; and doubtless all the time the most of men looked on, not knowing what was doing, thinking it all a matter of course, like the rising and setting of the sun—and indeed it was so."

"Tell me one thing, if you can," said I. "Did the change, the 'revolution' it used to be called, come peacefully?"

"Peacefully?" said he; "what peace was there amongst those poor confused wretches of the nineteenth century? It was war from beginning to end: bitter war, till hope and pleasure put an end to it."

"Do you mean actual fighting with weapons?" said I, "or the strikes and lock-outs and starvation of which we have heard?"

"Both, both," he said. "As a matter of fact, the history of the terrible period of transition from commercial slavery to freedom may thus be summarised. When the hope of realising a communal condition of life for all men arose, quite late in the nineteenth century, the power of the middle classes, the then tyrants of society, was so enormous and crushing that to almost all men, even those who had, you may say despite themselves, despite their reason and judgment, conceived such hopes, it seemed a dream. So much was this the case that some of those more enlightened men who were then called Socialists, although they well knew, and even stated in public, that the only reasonable condition of society was that of pure Communism (such as you now see around you), yet shrunk from what seemed to them the barren task of preaching the realisation of a happy dream. Looking back now, we can see that the great motive-power of the change was a longing for freedom and equality, akin if you please to the unreasonable passion of the lover; a sickness of heart that rejected with loathing the aimless solitary life of the well-to-do educated man of that time: phrases, my dear friend, which have lost their meaning to us of the present day, so far removed we are from the dreadful facts which they represent.

"Well, these men, though conscious of this feeling, had no faith in it. Nor was that wonderful: for looking around them they saw the huge mass of the oppressed classes too much burdened with the misery of their lives, and too much overwhelmed by the selfishness of misery, to be able to form a conception of any escape from it except by the ordinary way prescribed by the system of slavery under which they lived; which was nothing more than a remote chance of climbing out of the oppressed into the oppressing classes.

"Therefore, though they knew that the only reasonable aim for those who would better the world was a condition of equality, in their impatience and despair they managed to convince themselves that if they could by hook or by crook get the machinery of production and the management of property so altered that the 'lower classes' (so the horrible word ran) might have their slavery somewhat ameliorated, they would be ready to fit into this machinery, and would use it for bettering their condition still more and still more, until at last the result would be a practical equality (they were very fond of using the word 'practical'), because 'the rich' would be forced to pay so much for keeping 'the poor' in a tolerable condition that the condition of riches would become no longer valuable and would gradually die out. Do you follow me?"

"Partly," said I. "Go on."

Said old Hammond: "Well, since you follow me, you will see that as a theory this was not altogether unreasonable; but 'practically,' it turned out a failure."

"How so?" said I.

"Well, don't you see," said he, "because it involves the making of a machinery by those who didn't know what they wanted the machines to do. So far as the masses of the oppressed class furthered this scheme of improvement, they did it to get themselves improved slave-rations—as many of them as could. And if those classes had really been incapable of being touched by that instinct which produced the passion for freedom and equality aforesaid, what would have happened, I think, would have been this: that a certain part of the working classes would have been so far improved in condition that they would have approached the condition of the middling rich men; but below them would have been a great class of most miserable slaves, whose slavery would have been far more hopeless than the older class slavery had been."

DEGREES IN CRIME.

If you should steal a million golden dollars in a lump,
The people would regard you as a genius and a trump.

If you secure but half the pile, a "shortage" that would be;
Whereas a somewhat less amount would be "insolvency."

To steal a tiny, paltry sum would give them the belief
That you were a dishonest man—a robber, and a thief.

But if you steal a loaf of bread whereby your life is saved,
They'll put you into prison with the "totally depraved."

IN FRANCE.

TERRORISM has ruled for the last three weeks in France. M. Constans, Minister of the Interior, who is certainly not a man of genius, but still is a very clever rascal, has quite well understood how to support the bourgeoisie in these difficult moments. The party indeed being composed of men, and some men having through their talent and education a certain influence over their friends and the mass of the workers, M. Constans saw that depriving the party of these men the movement would, if not fail, at least be a little softened. And so he proceeded on this plan. It is true that the agitation of the last week was remarkable, but far from the importance it was expected to be. The reactionary papers were certainly very frightened, if it is to be judged from the exaggeration they made of every little circumstance. So the best informed Tory papers, as Le Matin, La France, etc., stated that a clandestine printing office had been seized, and all printers arrested, including the manager of the Anarchist paper La Révolte. In fact, the printing office was not clandestine at all, and it was the printing office of the united Anarchists, which had been removed lately from the Rue du Marais. The head printer, Cabot, was arrested; Grave, the manager of the Révolte, was not. The Révolte starts this week with a day of delay, and will be printed in a bourgeois printing office. It is true that Malato, Martinet, Gégout, Merlino, Petraroya, Prodi, and other Anarchists were arrested, and will be sent to hard labour for having distributed pamphlets and manifestoes to students and to the soldiers. Comrade Stoianoff, a Bulgarian student, was also arrested. There was a perquisition made upon the apartment of comrade Molinari, an Italian Anarchist, and there were found some manifestoes, but the comrade was successful in escaping. It is to be feared that the foreign Socialists arrested will be handed over to their respective governments after serving their sentences. Louise Michel and Rhénavin were also arrested, and some other arrests made will be kept secret. Tramps frequenting the Halles (Market) have been put in custody, but this had begun a long time ago, in November, when the crisis and starvation were growing threatening against the possessing classes. Goods are theirs who enjoy them.—Italian.

With sublime condescension, millionaires' daughters have been visiting the working-women's convention this week, and informing poor girls, who work for three and five dollars a-week, what wonders economy might be made to accomplish with their incomes. For pure heartlessness and cheek combined, this "takes the biscuit."—Boston Daily Globe, April 18.

NOTES.

THE Commission on the ill-treatment of the so-called dynamiters in Chatham prison has reported on the subject in the way that might have been expected from a Commission sitting on a very bad case; that is to say, that while practically admitting the charges, it said—"Well, it doesn't matter." The case seems to have been so plain that even the respectable Daily News has had its stomach turned by it, and a man of sense and humanity writing in its columns has condemned the finding of the Commission in cautious words, but very clearly. Let us say a few plain words on the subject.

The prison system of this country is, and is meant to be, a system of torture applied by Society to those whom it considers its enemies; but this fact is kept in the dark as much as possible, lest ordinary good-natured people, who do not want to torture persons unless fear drives them to it, should be shocked, and the system should be swept away—or at least altered. The ordinary middle-class man, till within the last few years, had no idea of what went on in a prison; and even now, after some light has been thrown on it by the imprisonment of "gentlemen" both in Ireland and England, he shuts his eyes to it as much as he can. Keeping things dark is the necessary rule in a prison.

Now it is clear that no one could accept the office of habitually torturing his fellow-creatures unless he were a specially callous and degraded man, and were probably also driven to it by hard need; it follows as a matter of course that the officials of a prison must be chosen from the off-scourings of the earth. Surely the evidence of such people should be taken with great reserve by men not interested in suppressing anything.

But the ruling classes are, as we have seen, deeply interested in proving that our prison-system is reasonable and humane; and any knowledge of the real facts will dispel that idea, and show that it is a system of hideous and wanton cruelty. Can we expect, therefore, that any enquiry into the treatment of men considered as the special enemies of Society will be a fair one? It is clearly impossible that it should be, as that highly respectable paper, the Daily News, has found out.

I appeal to all honest and generous-minded men, whatever their opinions may be, to consider what this extra torment and insult means applied to men already tortured by the mere cast-iron system up to the limits of endurance. Surely the insulting or tormenting of a prisoner so over-burdened with misery already, so helpless as he is, is such a dastardly and abominable crime, that any crime committed by the prisoners in a jail sinks by comparison into insignificance. You men of the comfortable middle-classes, so kind and unselfish in family life, so scrupulous in business—so respectable, in a word—think of what you are doing vicariously by means of the dreadful tools you have made necessary to you! Think of it—if you dare!

Amongst this Commission of Evasion we read the names of Mr. Drummond and Mr. George Shipton. These gentlemen were, no doubt, put there because our rulers thought, or pretended to think, that they represent the working-classes. I appeal, not to Socialists, but to the working-men in general to say whether it is not about time to let the said rulers understand clearly that this humbug can be stood no longer, and that these gentlemen and others like them do not represent the working-classes, or any section of them. W. M.

Hunger pierceth stone walls.

Eighty destitute men are receiving food and shelter at the old Immigration Depot, Brisbane (March 15).

Henry George says he "believes in nothing half-way." Then why, asks the Bulletin, is he not a land-nationalisationist or a Socialist.

The boy question is not yet (March 15) settled among the Charters Towers unions. At the mine where men were working for boy's pay, the management, out of pitiful spite, discharged all the lads employed, and a small minority of the miners, fathers of the lads, are attacking the executive and president of the union for their action, the president, who appears to a "white" man, coming in for plenty of abuse. The large majority recognise that the union only did its duty when it shut down on men receiving boy's wages.

ALL WE LIKE SHEEP.—Tobacco, a newspaper published in the interests of the cigar and tobacco manufacturers, gives in a recent issue the circulars sent out to manufacturers in this line of industry by a committee who are opposing the clauses in the Tariff Bill affecting tobacco imports. The circulars include a form of petition against the bill, and the recommendation to employers in the trade is as follows: "We would advise that you copy the following in duplicate, have the petition signed by every employé in your shop and forward," etc. Just notice, says the Journal of the Knights of Labour, the cool assumption in the passage we have italicised, that the employer, as a matter of course, controls the political action of his workmen and can dictate to them what petitions they shall sign. Unfortunately, the despotic language of the circular only reflects the actual conditions of matters in many establishments where workmen are completely subservient to the dictates of their masters in their political movements. But we cannot help thinking that the framers of this circular might at least have had the decency to pretend that the employés were to be appealed to on some other ground than the mere will of the employer. It would have looked better and been more politic. We commend this instance to those who are so terribly solicitous that the "individuality" of the citizen will be sacrificed by labour reform.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Lords on Sweating.

After a long delay, the Lords' Sweating Commission have at last issued their report. In this they state that the sweating system is not the result of sub-contracting or the introduction of machinery and sub-division of labour or of foreign immigration. Well, let us admit it; but what, then, is the cause? The Lords are ready with the usual middle-class answer: "Oh, it is all the fault of the poor." It is "the inefficiency of many of the lower class of workers, early marriages, and the tendency of the residuum of the population of large towns to form a helpless community together with a low standard of life and the excessive supply of unskilled labour." Indeed? O that wicked "lower class of workers"! why will they marry early and be inefficient in their work? But still we do not think the Lords have dived to the bottom of the matter. Who, for instance, is responsible for the "excessive supply of unskilled labour"? We have always thought that the grasping landlords, who have ground the agricultural labourer down to such a depth of misery that he is glad to escape out of their hands into those of the sweater in the towns, had something to do with it. Do the noble lords agree with us? But the chief cause of the sweating system is certainly the greed of capitalists, who have forced the masses of the workers down to such miserable wages that the wretched workman, having so little money, buys the cheapest of goods. Cheap goods, that chief blessing of our commercial system, lauded to the skies by middle-class Liberals, are usually the product of starvation wages. Thus there is a lower depth still to the misery of the masses—i.e., by the misery of the people who produce goods for their consumption. The labour of married women working at unskilled trades in their homes and working "at what would be starvation wages to unmarried women," is another cause, according to the Lords. Quite so; but why are these women forced to work? Because the pay of their husbands is not sufficient to enable them to live without. Thus the mass of misery which makes sweating possible is merely the result of our commercial system, and as long as that system endures, so long will the sweater thrive and flourish. Instead of the petty tinkering remedies which the Lords recommend, but which surely not even they can expect will make much difference to the condition of the poor wretches who bear on their shoulders the crushing weight of the present system, they should have advocated the extinction of themselves and all other idlers who live upon rent, profit, and interest. We are convinced that this alone will end the tyranny of the sweater.

Strike of East-end Tailors.

Just as the report appeared, the East-end tailors, who are the chief sufferers from the white slavery of modern commercialism, turned out on strike because their masters have for the last six months deliberately broken the strike agreement of last autumn. The average hours of work, according to returns sent in to the Strike Committee, are about sixteen daily. One man, in one of these returns, thus describes his slavery: "For three days I work from eight to eleven, and the rest of the week from seven a.m. until two a.m. next morning; no time for meals." He works with a crust in one hand and an iron in the other, and his pathetic reason is "compulsion." This indeed is the answer in every case. Another wretched man writes: "Hours from eight a.m. to twelve p.m.; air is very foul, and one day a-week the small workshop is used as a laundry; the stench is overpowering." Will the remedies suggested by the House of Lords sweep away these horrors? Why, they will not even palliate them.

The men demand (1) that they shall work from eight a.m. to 8 p.m., one hour being allowed for dinner, and half an hour for tea; (2) four hours overtime only to be worked during the week—two hours only to be worked in one day; (3) the first two hours to be paid for at regular wages, the second two hours at time and a half. They insist upon the masters signing a document drawn up by the Strike Committee embodying these terms. Eighty-two masters have already surrendered. The sweaters resolved at a general meeting that they should join hands with the men against their common oppressor the shop-keeper. They have decided to open negotiations with the men to boycott the shops which will not pay sufficient for the keeping of proper hours. On the whole, it seems that the workers have now a good chance of winning.

Great Demonstration of Railway Men.

The railway-men held a large demonstration in Hyde Park, amid a heavy storm of rain, although they were cheered by a glimpse of the sun towards the end of the meeting. John Burns, Cunninghame Graham, Bernard Shaw, and George Bateman were the chief speakers. The men have issued a manifesto containing their demands, which are roughly as follows: That fifty-four hours constitute the maximum week's work for railway-men on day duty and forty-eight for those on night duty; that all time over ten hours any day be paid for as overtime at the rate of time and a half, and that a week's holiday in the year and pay be granted. For platelayers and permanent-way men nine and a half hours a-day, and for shunters in busy goods yards and signalmen in important boxes, eight hours shall be a day's work; and in shops fifty-one hours shall constitute the week's work. Sunday duty is to be paid as double time, unless a day off be given in lieu thereof. That a week's pay be guaranteed to all guards having to devote the whole of their time to the company employing them. For the railway carmen, they demand fifty-seven hours a-week; for all men whose wages do not exceed 21s. a-week they ask that a rise of 15 per cent. be granted; that for all not exceeding 28s., 10 per cent.; and for those above 28s., 5 per cent. To get these concessions the men have only to organise; and if the 400,000 men working on the railway would join the General Railway Workers' Union, they could obtain these very moderate demands in a week. They would not then be kept on continuous duty for forty-two hours, or be forced to work eighty, ninety, and a hundred hours a-week for starvation wages, as many have to do at the present time.

The Eight Hours Day.

The firm of Messrs. Green and McAllan, printers, have conceded the eight-hour working-day to their employes, without any reduction in wages. Report has it that several other firms in this trade will follow suit. Caslon's, the typefounders in Chiswell Street, are also among the converted. This is very kind of them, and shows that even demonstrations may do some good. By the bye, we have a suggestion to make to the Central Committee. Messrs. Shipton and Co. profess to be very eager to obtain the eight hours day by organisation. But though this may deceive some people, most of us know that they are about as earnest in the matter as most capitalist Liberal M.P.'s. Why not take them at their word, and say, "Very well, we'll get it by organisation. We will have a general strike at an early date. Will you join us?" Strikes me that Shipton would even prefer a "legal" eight hours day to this dreadful prospect. N.

AN AUSTRALIAN LESSON.

[FROM THE BRISBANE 'WORKER.']

TOGETHER you are all-powerful, workers of Queensland, workers of Australia, workers of the world! Together you can be free men and women, citizens of a free land, never needing to crave from a fellow man permission to earn a bare living by making somebody else richer, never needing to fear the bitterness of unemployment, never needing to shrink at the thought that those you love may want. Together, by standing together, you can insure that your boys and girls will have opportunities now denied them—opportunities to be strong and learned, and honoured and happy; that in old age you and those who come after you will have enough; that in sickness or in death there will be no thought of destitution; that the workers will no longer squabble for the butter-milk of their wealth production, while the idle cunning glut themselves with the cream. All this you can do, and more if you will only stand together, and be patient and wise. You can take all social injustices and industrial inequalities and vested privileges, and strangle them one by one with your million-muscled hands, as Hercules strangled in his cradle the serpents of Juno. Not all at once, but gradually, patiently, slowly, by being thinking men working in harmony with each other for the good of all, and by ceasing to crouch in hopeless apathy within the prison-walls of competition, or to rise spasmodically and disconnectedly in impotent, because only partial, revolt.

Singly, individually, you are really as powerless, you workers of Queensland, as the slum-soaked slaves of modern Babylon, as the tenement house toilers of Paris and New York. Because there is sunshine here instead of fog, and fever instead of rheumatics, it does not follow that therefore the law of supply and demand—the divine law under which English women work for 1s. 6d. per week, finding themselves, while American miners fight for the tremendous privilege of earning 3½d. an hour—would reverse its invariable process here, and cover the worker with a blessing instead of with a curse. This is called an Eight-Hour country, but how many work eight hours? Twice as many wage-earners work Ten, and numbers Twelve, right here in Queensland. It is claimed that wages are high, but the average Queensland wage for all classes of labour, skilled and unskilled, is considerably under 30s. per week; and those who consider the pay exorbitant ought to be made to keep their families on it for a whole year—only, perhaps, the common worker isn't supposed to have a family or anything else that is luxurious. Companies and syndicates, and various other soulless forms of that Capitalism, which at its very best is little disposed to give to the worker more than it must of the wealth he produces, are forcing down wages on the mining fields and watching the maritime men for a moment of weakness, and tried only the other day to reduce rouseabouts' pay throughout the central district, and would have had it not been for the wholesome dread inspired in the Employers' Association by the Federation move. In Brisbane the tramway company used to outrage decency in its treatment of the workers whom necessity compelled to accept its terms, and the planters have been trying for years to kick out the white worker altogether, using every plea but the true one that there is more profit to be made out of kanaka, profit being the only recognised standard in the commercial morality of our Christian civilisation. And if more proof be wanted that if he stands alone the Australian worker will be driven into the gutter just like the European worker, the ridiculous wages often paid here to women-workers, and the arbitrary condition of their employment, should suffice the greediest. Women are thus compelled to work for an almost nominal wage because they do not stand together, but allow themselves to be treated individually and to be set off one against the other. If men allow themselves to be similarly dealt with, there can only be the same result, to their own sad loss and to the profit-monger's gain. This is why those who profit by the work of others object to solidarity; it is for their own pecuniary advantage that they endeavour to persuade the workers that it is far better to beg for enough to live on, cap in hand, than to march up like men and demand it.

Workers ask charity of nobody. They do not have to, for there is no wealth in existence which did not come from them, not a stick nor a stone, not a pound of wool nor a loaf of bread. They produced all that is in Queensland or the exchange value for it, which is the same thing, and the idlers who mainly "own" it, only do so because our civilisation is a ghastly failure which does not give the wealth to the worker, which needs a general overhauling in the interest of the robbed. And at this epoch, when from end to end of Australia the idea of nationality is in all men's mouths and fermenting in all men's brains, is the time for the workers to insist in their united strength, in their resistless solidarity that there shall be just such a general overhauling, that when this Australia of ours rises among the nations she shall rise as the land of free men, not as the land of slaves. For he is indeed a slave, whether he lives under a czar or a king or a president, whom circumstances force to beg for permission to work and live, who when his children are hungry and his wife in need, cannot satisfy them except by paying profit-toll to another.

It is against the conditions which have crushed down our brothers, the workers of Europe, that Australian labour is marshalling its legions; the Gospel of Organisation is only a form of the universal Gospel of Discontent. It is not good enough to drift on to the slums and the workhouse; it is not good enough to build here a nation whose head of gold shall be the private property of monopolists, and whose feet of clay shall be crimson with the blood of ill-paid toilers who suffer and die. It would be better to shake this civilisation to pieces as the Goths and Vandals shook the rotten civilisation of Rome, than to see in Brisbane and Townsville the sights one sees in English cities, than to see our bold, brave, dashing bushmen degraded to the helpless poverty of the once-hardy peasantry of the Atlantic lands. Yet the horrible sights have commenced and the degradation is not far off. On Queensland streets Australian girls sell themselves for bread just as English girls do in the Haymarket. . . . On the plains the bushmen whom no man needs are thickening; in the towns the unemployed gather; purse-proud plutocrats sneer at the complaints of the workers, and bid them be thankful if all their labouring gives them enough of bread. Are these the conditions which workers desire to see grafted in a new nationality? Will they even lift their finger on behalf of such a nationality? . . .

For an Australia that would do them justice, what would not the workers do in return? To an Australia that would earnestly endeavour to right their wrongs, and to give to each man work, and to every worker his fair share of the wealth produced, how the heart of millions would go out, how the love of a grateful people would encircle it like a wall of fire! This is the Australia that the workers seek, and that they dream of in their cheering for "The Federated Republic." But it is not this Australia that the politicians are after. Their Australia is to be an America of millionaires and misery, a republic of rent-robbery, a democracy of diamonds and destitution and despair; the workers are to be its beasts of burden, and the rich its aristocrats, and there is to be no thought for the helpless, and no sympathy for the poor. Few of them see, like Chief Justice Lilley, that the Australia which is coming must answer the industrial problems if it would root itself in the lives of the people. But they will see it soon if the workers only stand together, if to skilled and unskilled, to men and women, to all sorts and conditions and grades of the army of the workers, there comes a comprehension of the great issue at stake, and a realisation of the value of organisation.

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

OFFICES: 24, GREAT QUEEN ST., LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

The Offices of the Socialist League will be open for the sale of Commonweal and all other Socialist publications from 8.30 a.m. to 9 p.m. every day except Sunday. The Secretary will be in attendance from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m. daily.

Annual Conference.—The Annual Conference of the Socialist League will take place on Whit Sunday, May 25th. All propositions from Branches should be sent in at once to allow of agenda being made up. Place of meeting and other particulars in future issue.

Branch Subscriptions Paid.—1888:—Oxford, to end of September.

1889:—Bradford and Hammersmith, to end of April. Norwich, Glasgow, and Yarmouth, to end of May. East London, to end of October. Mitcham, to end of November. St. Georges East, to end of December.

1890:—Manchester, to end of January. 'Commonweal' Branch, to end of February. Leicester and North London, to end of March. North Kensington, to end of April. Streatham, to end of December.

Notice.—All letters on League business, except those intended for Editors of Commonweal, to be addressed to me. No other person is authorised to sign any official communication. FRANK KITZ, Secretary.

REPORTS.

'COMMONWEAL.'—On Sunday, May 11th, G. B. Shaw lectured on "Socialism in Practice" to a small audience.

HAMMERSMITH.—Very good meeting at Bridge End in spite of rain; speakers were Bullock, Morris, C. Smith, A. J. Smith, Tarleton, Johnson, Tochatti, Sparling, and Frye; 43 'Weal' sold. Large meeting in the evening; speakers were Tarleton, Davis, Grant, A. J. Smith, and Clara Watt; 12 'Weal' sold.

STREATHAM.—We were disappointed that Parker was unable to be present, but good results sprang from the disappointment; the branch and the general public turned out in good numbers, Moore, Collins, and Smith speaking for upwards of an hour; 'Weals' sold out, and 1s. 8d. collected.—S.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—Good meeting held at Latimer Road; speakers were J. F. Lyne, Crouch, and Saint; fair sale of 'Weals.' At our rooms in the evening we had a discussion on "The Wastefulness of the Present System," which was opened by Crouch and taken up well by the audience; all 'Weals' sold and 1s. 6½d. collected.

NORTH LONDON.—On Saturday in Hyde Park, Cantwell and Nicoll held a good meeting for an hour and a quarter; good sale of 'Weal' and pamphlets. In Regent's Park on Sunday morning, Cantwell and Nicoll addressed a large audience; good sale of 'Weals' and 1s. 6d. collected. Sunday afternoon in Hyde Park, a splendid meeting was addressed by Cantwell, Saint, Mrs. Lahr, and another comrade; very good sale of pamphlets and 'Weal,' and 1s. 11d. collected.

ABERDEEN.—On Tuesday a special meeting was held to discuss "Eight Hours Day," on which subject Leatham read a paper. At Sunday night meeting, Gilray's paper—"The Problem of the Poor"—which appeared in Kilmarnock Standard as contribution for a competition, was read and discussed. A belated eight hours demonstration takes place on the 17th under auspices of Aberdeen Trades Council.—L.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday at 1 o'clock, Joe and Tim Burgoyne addressed a large and very sympathetic audience on Jail Square. At the same hour Glasier gave a lecture on "Socialism—what it means" to the Springburn Branch of the Irish National League; the lecture was received with entire approval. Our Paisley Road Toll meeting could not be held owing to the rain. As we must now remove from our present room in Ingram Street, we have arranged to co-operate with the Christian Socialist Society and the S.D.F. in securing a suitable hall for public lectures and private meetings.

NORWICH.—Sunday last, in the afternoon, a large open-air meeting was held. W. Moore opened, followed by F. Kitz (London), who delivered a very interesting address upon the present position of the workers. In the evening another open-air meeting was held, the speakers being Poynts and Kitz; owing to heavy rain, the audience was not so large. Kitz made special reference to Stanley, who is shortly to visit Norwich. Audience very attentive. Commonweal sold out, and 8s. 7½d. collected for propaganda; good sale of Freedom.

YARMOUTH.—On Sunday morning, on Priory Plain, comrade F. Kitz delivered a splendid address on the Labour Struggle from a Socialist's standpoint to a large and attentive audience. In the afternoon, near the London Boat Landing-stage, an attentive audience was addressed by F. Morley; several questions asked, and answered to the satisfaction of those present. In the evening, on Colman's Quay, Morley spoke at another large meeting. Ruffold assisted at each meeting. 18 Commonweal sold, several pamphlets, and 3s. 11d. collected towards defraying the expenses.—J. H.

LIVERPOOL SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—On Sunday we held two meetings at the Landing Stage—at 11.30 a.m. and 3 p.m. Comrades Mowbray (London), Reeves, Chapman, and Balfour spoke. Mowbray created a good impression, in spite of his hoarseness through speaking too often during his week's tour in Lancashire. Papers sold, 5s. 6d.; collection for Commonweal, 3s. 8d.

SHEFFIELD SOCIALIST CLUB.—We have now opened some fine and centrally situated premises at 63 Blunk Street, containing meeting room, reading room and library, smoke room for games, etc. Open every evening, and on Sunday all day. Membership, 1d. weekly. French Class, conducted by Ed. Carpenter, every Tuesday at 8.30 p.m.; terms, 3d. weekly, which goes towards club funds. Discussion every Wednesday at 8 p.m. We have a good assortment of Labour and Socialist papers from various parts of the world on our reading tables, but should be glad of any books for library. We are very sanguine of being able to accomplish grand propagands in Sheffield and district during the coming summer, and ask the earnest co-operation of all Socialists in this neighbourhood.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR, AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. XVII. (continued).—How THE CHANGE CAME.

"WHAT stood in the way of this?" said I.

"Why, of course," said he, "just that instinct for freedom aforesaid. It is true that the slave-class could not conceive the happiness of a free life. Yet they grew to understand (and very speedily too) that they were oppressed by their masters, and they assumed, you see how justly, that they could do without them, though perhaps they scarce knew how; so that it came to this, that though they could not look forward to the happiness or the peace of the freeman, they did at least look forward to the war which should bring that peace about."

"Could you tell me rather more closely what actually took place?" said I; for I thought him rather vague here.

"Yes," he said, "I can. That machinery of life for the use of people who didn't know what they wanted of it, and which was known at the time as State Socialism, was partly put in motion, though in a very piecemeal way. But it did not work smoothly; it was, of course, resisted at every turn by the capitalists; and no wonder, for it tended more and more to upset the commercial system I have told you of, without providing anything really effective in its place. The result was growing confusion, great suffering amongst the working classes, and, as a consequence, great discontent. For a long time matters went on like this. The power of the upper classes had lessened as their command over wealth lessened, and they could not carry things wholly by the high hand as they had been used to in earlier days. On the other hand, the working classes were ill-organised, and growing poorer in reality, in spite of the gains (also real in the long run) which they had forced from the masters. Thus matters hung in the balance; the masters could not reduce their slaves to complete subjection, though they put down some feeble and partial riots easily enough. The workers forced their masters to grant them ameliorations, real or imaginary, of their condition, but could not force freedom from them. At last came a great crash. On some trifling occasion a great meeting was summoned by the workmen leaders to meet in Trafalgar Square (about the right to meet in which place there had for long been bickering). The civic bourgeois guard (called the police) attacked the said meeting with bludgeons, according to their custom; many people were hurt in the mêlée, of whom five in all died, either trampled to death on the spot, or from the effects of their cudgelling; the meeting was scattered, and some hundred of prisoners cast into gaol. A similar meeting had been treated in the same way a few days before at a place called Manchester, which has now disappeared. The whole country was thrown into a ferment by this; meetings were held which attempted some rough organisation for the holding of another meeting to retort on the authorities. A huge crowd assembled in Trafalgar Square and the neighbourhood (then a place of crowded streets), and was too big for the bludgeon-armed police to cope with; there was a good deal of dry-blow fighting; three or four of the people were killed, and half a score of policemen were crushed to death in the throng, and the rest got away as they could. The next day all London (remember what it was in those days) was in a state of turmoil. Many of the rich fled into the country; the executive got together soldiery, but did not dare to use them; and the police could not be massed in any one place, because riots or threats of riots were everywhere. But in Manchester, where the people were not so courageous or not so desperate as in London, several of the popular leaders were arrested. In London a convention of leaders was got together, and sat under the old revolutionary name of the Committee of Public Safety; but as they had no organised body of men to direct, they attempted no aggressive measures, but only placarded the walls with somewhat vague appeals to the workmen not to allow themselves to be trampled upon. However, they called a meeting in Trafalgar Square for the day fortnight of the last-mentioned skirmish.

"Meantime the town grew no quieter, and business came pretty much to an end. The newspapers—then, as always hitherto, almost entirely in the hands of the masters—clamoured to the Government for repressive measures; the rich citizens were enrolled as an extra body of police, and armed with bludgeons like them; many of these were strong, well-fed, full-blooded young men, and had plenty of stomach for fighting; but the government did not dare to use them, and contented itself with getting full powers voted to it by the Parliament for suppressing any revolt, and bringing up more and more soldiers to London. Thus passed the week after the great meeting; almost as large a one was held on the Sunday, which went off peaceably on the whole, as no opposition to it was offered. But on the Monday the people woke up to find that they were hungry. During the last few days there had been

groups of men parading the streets asking (or, if you please, demanding) money to buy food; and what for goodwill, what for fear, the richer people gave them a good deal. The authorities of the parishes also (I haven't time to explain that phrase at present) gave willy-nilly what provisions they could to wandering people; and the Government, which had by that time established some feeble national workshops, also fed a good number of half-starved folk. But in addition to this, several bakers' shops and other provision stores had been emptied without a great deal of disturbance. So far, so good. But on the Monday in question the Committee of Public Safety, on the one hand afraid of general unorganised pillage, and on the other emboldened by the wavering conduct of the authorities, sent a deputation provided with carts and all necessary gear to clear out two or three big provision stores in the centre of the town, leaving blank papers promising to pay the price of them with the shop managers: and also in the part of the town where they were strongest they took possession of several bakers' shops and set men at work in them for the benefit of the people;—all of which was done with little or no disturbance, the police-assisting in keeping order at the sack of the stores as they would have done at a big fire.

"But at this last stroke the reactionaries were so alarmed that they were determined to force the executive into action. The newspapers next day all blazed into the fury of frightened people, and threatened the people, the government, and everybody they could think of, unless 'order were at once restored.' A deputation of leading commercial people waited on the government and told them that if they did not at once arrest the Committee of Public Safety, they themselves would gather a body of men, arm them, and fall on 'the incendiaries,' as they called them.

"They, together with a number of the newspaper editors, had a long interview with the heads of the government and two or three military men, the deftest in their art that the country could furnish. The deputation came away from that interview, says a contemporary eye-witness, smiling and satisfied, and said no more about raising an anti-popular army, but that afternoon left London with their families for their country seats or elsewhere.

"The next morning the Government proclaimed a state of siege in London,—a thing common enough amongst the absolutist governments on the Continent, but unheard-of in England in those days. They appointed the youngest and cleverest of their generals to command the proclaimed district; a man who had won a certain sort of reputation in the disgraceful wars in which the country had long engaged in from time to time. The newspapers were in ecstasies, and all the most fervent of the reactionaries now came to the front; men who in ordinary times were forced to keep their opinions to themselves or their immediate circle, but who now began to look forward to crushing once for all the Socialist, and even democratic tendencies, which, said they, had been treated with such indulgence for the last twenty years.

"But the clever general took no visible action; and yet only a few of the minor newspapers abused him; thoughtful men gathered from this that a plot was hatching. As for the Committee of Public Safety, whatever they thought of their position, they had now gone too far to draw back; and many of them, it seems, thought that the government would not act. They went on quietly organising their food supply, which was a miserable dribble when all is said; and also as a retort to the state of siege, they armed as many men as they could in the quarter where they were strongest, but did not attempt to drill or organise them, thinking, perhaps, that they could not at the best turn them into trained soldiers till they had some breathing space. The clever general, his soldiers, and the police did not meddle with all this in the least in the world; and things were quieter in London that week-end; though there were riots in many places of the provinces, which were quelled by the authorities without much trouble. The most serious of these were at Glasgow and Bristol.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

THE CAUSE GOES MARCHING ON.

I HAVE often met with once active Socialists who bewailed the "utter indifference of the masses to the teaching of Socialism," and I have listened with feelings of contempt as they talked of being born 200 years or so too soon. They talked of the lull in the propaganda, and believed that prosperity in trade had made all the workers uncompromising Conservatives, and that the "march of economic events" had come to a sudden standstill.

That there is a lull in one phase of the propaganda few will deny—the work in the streets is almost a thing of the past; but this is because it has done its work. The most unskilled and thoughtless artisan has now some notion of the meaning of the word Socialism. The outdoor propaganda may still be of greatest importance in many towns yet, and I hope the "little bands" will stick enthusiastically together and preach the gospel, no matter what the obstacles may be. A few years has wrought a great change in the character of the movement. It is no longer confined to two or three small societies, but in some shape or form the ideas are part and parcel of almost every literary and political club in the kingdom, and form the raison d'être of the new trade unionism.

The attitude of the political parties towards social problems is a sufficient indication of the way in which the wind is blowing, and serves to show the growing strength of the movement towards Socialism. We find that cute politician, Randolph Churchill, dangling an Eight Hours' Bill before the eyes of the discontented workers, while other prominent politicians are fussing about the "housing of the poor," and other measures of an equally harmless import. While the "representatives of the people" are excited—or pretending to be excited—over the Parliamentary Game, nightly debating with seeming heat the most trifling incidents and measures, beneath it all lies a consciousness of coming danger and a feeling that the first note in the class-war has been clearly sounded.

Who sees and understands more clearly than the political parties the significance of Home Rule? The Gladstonians fear it just as much as the Tories, and will seek to give the Irish people the mere semblance of the thing. Well do they know that the Irish are alive to the economic problem, and each day of the delay is hastening the doom of landlordism and the emancipation of Labour.

In England and Scotland the attitude of the workers towards each other has undergone an almost complete change; a feeling of confidence and solidarity is now springing up, and they know—or shall I say only half know yet?—that the cause of one is the cause of all. That this feeling has not yet found expression in the programme of any great body of workers, is not to be wondered at when we consider the causes that have crystallized their apathy and indifference towards each other.

In a time of degradation and social brutality like the present, when everything around us tends only to develop the meanest part of our nature and blot out the feeling of love, is it not inspiring to know that the cry of the "Brotherhood of Man" is becoming a living faith and a potent factor in so many young lives? While the political parties are tearing each other's eyes out for place and power, and "coming to terms" with the new labour party, or concocting charges against each other in the vain hope of diverting the attention of the workers from their material salvation, all the elements of a social conflagration are slowly but surely gathering. A few years back the most hopeful of Socialists would hardly have dreamt that the doctrine of equality and fraternity would have quickly taken such firm root, and found such ready advocates in so many unexpected quarters. Today we cannot open a magazine, or even an "obscure country paper," without seeing an article on Socialism or a lively debate being conducted in a spirit of fairness. Even the church magazines are being forced to solicit articles on the subject, and find it more profitable than the dispensing of spiritual chloroform. Instead of a few energetic souls preaching to "a lamp-post and policeman, and making both laugh," we have now quite an army of propagandists in every part of the country—in press and on platform—with attentive audience and readers.

The Docker's Strike has rung the death-knell of the old trades' unionism, and its leaders will soon take their departure and be heard of no more, for their occupation like Othello's will be gone. The skilled artisan, the "aristocrat of labour" and the darling of the politicians at election times, is beginning to learn through bitter experience the insecurity of his position, and to know that the morrow may see him in the swiftly swelling ranks of unskilled labour—and thus the march of events is with us and everything is full of hope.

A short time ago who would have dreamt of the Docker's Strike? Had any one predicted it he would simply have been laughed at and called that most horrible of names—a dreamer! The steady and patient work of our comrades at the dock-yard gates has not been in vain, and they who were once the despair of the revolutionists have shown by their devotion and unselfishness that the organisation of the workers in the near future will be a much easier task than most of us thought.

The next depression in trade will soon be upon us, and what with the growing intelligence of the workers and the higher ideal of comfort they now have, the work of the League and other kindred bodies will be much simpler in teaching the divineness of discontent and the hollowness and rottenness of our civilisation. Already the workers are gazing at each other across the Continent, and although they as yet see but dimly, they look into each other's eyes with friendlier feelings and learn that race-hatreds and jealousies have been the weapons their exploiters used to keep them so long divided. Woe to all kings, emperors, and oppressors of the weak when they clasp hands!

The recent speeches of the German Emperor, and the sops he has thrown to the workers with advice and threats to hold aloof from those horrid Socialists, show the deep-rooted feeling of discontent with the present order of things, in spite of all the coercive laws of Bismarck and his once master. That the German Emperor will "dish" the Socialists by such adroit movements no one need fear; for, prop up the rotten edifice as he may, it will all come tumbling down about his ears and bury him and his class out of sight for ever.

To Socialists who are isolated, I would say they have almost as much power as a society; a good word in season has often more real influence than many an applauded speech at a meeting. It is astonishing the work that one man can do when he has the Cause at heart. With tact and discretion he could influence a whole village; and here I would say that it is not by suppressing the name Socialist and masquerading as a sort of respectable advanced Radical that he will do much. Nothing can be done or ever could be done on those terms, and the sooner he learns the fact the better it will be for himself and the Cause he is anxious to serve.

J. M. B.

Readers of Commonweal and sympathisers generally in Fife, Forfar, and Perth, who are disposed to do their part in pushing forward the propaganda of Socialism, are asked to communicate with R. Dempster, care of Mrs. Scott, Colenswell Cottage, Burntisland, Fife, N.B.

PROSTITUTION.—Is there morally any difference, asks the Journal of the Knights of Labour, between the unfortunate woman who prostitutes her body for the means of existence and the educated, intelligent man who, as lawyer, politician, or editor, prostitutes his intellectual faculties for gain? If there is any difference, is not intellectual more degrading than physical harlotry, inasmuch as the functions of the mind are higher and nobler than those of the body? If the rule of even justice were applied, many a proud and wealthy political magnate and social leader who had risen by lending all his mental powers to the promotion of rotten causes and unjust schemes of spoliation would be more loathed and shunned than the wretched woman, more sinned against than sinning, who lives on the wages of vice.

¹ Our comrade is somewhat mistaken here. Speaking for London at least, and I believe many places in the country, we have never had better open-air meetings than those held within the last three months.—[EDITOR.]

NOTES FROM NOTTINGHAM.

PERHAPS, of all our workers, none have more to suffer from the pressure of capitalism than the girls and women who work in the warehouses and factories. Nominally protected by the Factory Acts, whenever the employer requires it they are forced to take work home and to slave nearly all night for the miserable pittance which will result. Those who, in the exercise of the "freedom of contract" which they possess, refuse to do this, find that there is no work for them when slack times arrive. Then there are all sorts of minor tyrannies imposed to break the spirit of the workers and render them docile serfs. The forewomen are selected specially for their ability to "nag" and to "drive" the hands, and the employers themselves are often not too choice in the language they address to an employé who has broken some rule of the factory. In one great Nottingham establishment, where a number of girls are employed, the manager occasionally strolls down the room, and if one of the workers should turn her head away from work to glance at the majestic passer-by, she is instantly dismissed. This gentleman is a prominent Liberal, and a churchwarden, and his master, a member of Parliament, who inherits the virtues of a pious father, is to be the Almighty's principal instrument in returning Mr. Gladstone to office at the general election. And yet a so-called labour paper, the Factory Times, a few weeks ago devoted a long paragraph to puffing this manager for his kindness to the workers, from among whom he has risen. In several large warehouses the girls are obliged to come half-an-hour earlier in the morning to hear some hired parson preach and pray at them. One of these sky-pilots had the impudence to denounce his hearers because of the few ribbons they had managed to obtain for self-adornment, but for once he had missed his mark. The girls in a body refused to attend service, and the pious employer had to get another tool.

The most unsatisfactory aspect of the case is the way in which managers, sub-managers, chief clerks, and others in authority, use their power to seduce girls, and then too often cast them adrift. The gilded youth of two counties make Nottingham their pleasure-house, and the army of despair which lounges round the "Clarendon," the "Three Crowns," or that glorified gin-palace known as the "Talbot," is recruited from the weaker sisters of the warehouse. The result is a social ulcer which permeates the bourgeoisie in spite of its efforts to conceal it. One hears of aldermen slipping up back streets to brothels, of others who appear with their bona robas at the theatre, of the disappearance of an inconvenient witness in a police prosecution, because her evidence might compromise members of the Town Council; of that Pillar of Society who is said to have kept a woman in almost every street, and who now turns up at missionary meetings. The funniest commentary on it all, however, was the recent declaration by a solemn local geologist that a salt lake once existed on the present site of Nottingham. The salt lake has gone; the capitalists remain; where is the fire and brimstone?

But why, says the moralist from "way back," do you elect such persons to rule you? But we don't, good friend moralist. They and their crowd of scalawags elect themselves. For instance, the other day a member of the Council, a lace manufacturer, displeased the trades unionists in his ward by his bitter opposition to them, and they managed with great difficulty to procure his rejection by the Liberal ward caucus. But it subsequently appeared that half of the members of the caucus were in the habit of receiving monthly or fortnightly presents of game, wine, cigars, etc., from their member, that they borrowed money from him, and that every year the whole Liberal Association went for a picnic at his expense. Naturally they thought no man could be more fitted to be their master—and perhaps they were right. In the same way the Conservatives are bossed by a few money-bags. Mr. John Robinson, bookmaker and brewer, has been the generous spring to which the Tories in the Eastern Division have gone, while Mr. E. Cope, lace manufacturer, has been the moneyed man in the Western Division. The natural result is that while the workers are fooled with the appearance of representation, the members of the different public bodies are as a rule a set of puppets to be pulled by strings. Thus the Town Council is bossed by the Town Clerk, the magisterial bench by the Chief Constable, the Board of Guardians and the School Board by their respective chairmen. The poor puppets have often a hard time of it when pulled in opposite directions, and I can fancy the typical marionette pondering, with a wet towel round his head and a cup of coffee in front of him, the great problem, "What shall it profit a man if he gain the trades unionist vote and lose W. H. Farmer's money?"

Our M.P.'s are a curious medley, worthy of their supporters. Broadhurst, who has sold and betrayed the workers like the Judas that he is; Morley, the superior person; and Smith-Wright, a Jingo banker. Not one has an idea above the level of the grocer's shop, and not one cares two pins for the welfare of the workers. P.

LIVERPOOL SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—On Sunday we held our meeting in the morning at the Landing Stage. Barton (Manchester) and Balfour addressed those present. In the afternoon the rain was too heavy to permit of another meeting. On our arrival in the morning at our usual stand, we found it occupied by a party of religionists from the Y.M.C.A., who coolly told us to find another stand. We determined to move them, so while Barton addressed the meeting, the rest of us made such a noise by selling the Commonweal and Justice, and reading from the former, that we eventually upset them. The police, who at one time interfered, expressed themselves strongly against us, declaring that the others had an equal right to the stand. So far as law goes this was true, but we determined to make our own law, and were successful. Thanks to the Christian intruders, we had the largest meeting yet held. 6s. of literature sold; collection 3s.—E. C. C.

IN THE UNITED STATES.

THE following telegram comes this morning from Chicago:

"CHICAGO, Ill., April 28.—Committees of the new bosses' association and the striking carpenters held a conference this afternoon, with a view to arranging for the resumption of work by as many of the strikers as can be employed by the new association. At its conclusion, both sides declined to make public the result until action thereon had been taken by the general bodies which they represent. This leads to the conclusion that they reached an agreement on the terms for a resumption of work."

The Executive Council of the American Federation of Labour met on April 28th in the afternoon in New York and discussed the conditions and the prospects of the eight hours movement. Samuel Gompers presided, and there were also present First Vice-President William Martin, Second Vice-President P. J. McGuire, Treasurer Henry Emrich, and Secretary Chris Evans. The discussion was secret, and lasted several hours. This appeal was issued:

"To the Toilers of America, greeting. The manifestation of determination on your part to hold the banner of the eight hour movement aloft and to carry it along until victory shall have been achieved, gives hope, encouragement, and rejoicing to the lovers of progress in our country, and finds a hearty and responsive chord in the hopes and aspirations of the down-trodden toilers of Europe. Already are seen emperors, kings, autocrats, and all the other enemies to the cause of labour and progress, palsied and paralysed with fear of the growing power and noble purposes of the toiling masses. The combined power of position and wealth seems not only about to be concentrated to antagonise the introduction of the simple, beneficial, and essential improvement consequent upon a reduction in the hours of labour, but seeks to provoke you into a furious contest. The encouragement our movement has implanted among our fellow working people, and the corresponding antagonism manifested on the part of our enemies, should convince us more than anything else that the policy we have thus far pursued is the one which should be followed without any deviation whatever.

"The advice and suggestions thus far given and made for the conduct of our movement having received your approval, I made so bold as to submit others which to my mind will lead us to a greater degree of success than could otherwise be obtained. The Executive Council of the American Federation of Labour has selected the United Brotherhood of Carpenters to make the demand for the enforcement of the eight hour work-day. I ask you to refrain from any sympathetic strikes. Rather remain at your work and aid the carpenters and joiners to win in the contest. To the carpenters and joiners my advice is to demand and insist upon the enforcement of the eight hour work-day. It is not a matter of theory, it is a fact, that the question of wages and conditions will regulate themselves to your benefit as soon as the eight hour work-day has been in operation. For that reason, if you cannot secure the eight hour work-day with other conditions, then allow them to remain open for further adjustment.

"In the demonstration to be made May 1, turn out in vast numbers, and by your presence manifest your unalterable determination to have the eight hour work-day enforced, though by one trade at a time, yet for all as the ultimate result. Allow no one to provoke you to a breach of the peace. Maintain order, refrain from all violence, engage in no riot. Let the watchword be the enforcement of the eight hour work-day. Firm, peaceful, and positive, with stout hearts and clear heads, let us concentrate all efforts for victory upon the carpenters and joiners. Men of labour, steady along the line to achievement of the eight hour work-day!—Fraternally, SAMUEL GOMPERS."

Sergius S. Shevitsch has taken the lead of the agitation in the eight hour question in New York. It must be confessed he works like a beaver, but I fear his, like all other action taken in this question, is merely so much wasted energy, which might be invested with more profit. The arrangements for the demonstration on the evening of May 1st in Union Square, New York City, are completed.

The programme of the Boston carpenters for their action will be announced to-day.

Gompers has said to a reporter: "The movement of 1886 was chaotic, disintegrated, unsystematic. To-day it is methodical, organised, prepared. We will secure the eight hour day for the workmen of the world—not if it takes all summer, but if it takes all of our lives."

In Chicago the newspapers are publishing the most sensational articles about the action which might be expected by the workers of that city on May 1st. The "scabs" in the carpenter trade of Chicago have already appealed to Jim Blaine, Secretary of State in Washington, to give them the protection of the United States Government, as the authorities of Chicago and of the State of Illinois are unable to protect them—so they say. "Much ado about nothing."

Fully 1,000 packing-house men of Chicago, by a unanimous vote, decided yesterday afternoon to strike unless their request for an eight hour day is complied with.

The 2,000 Milwaukee carpenters strike May 1 for the eight hour day, the contractors having refused to grant their request.

A meeting of carpenters' delegates, representing 1,900 union carpenters out of a total of 3,200 in Philadelphia, adopted resolutions Saturday night pledging themselves to maintain the demand for 35 cents, an hour and to insist upon the payment of that sum on and after May 1.

A big labour demonstration took place at Montreal Saturday night in favour of the eight hour movement. Between 3,000 and 4,000 representatives of the labour organisations assembled in Chaboiles Square and were addressed by their leaders. They were advised to combine to combat capital, which was daily driving the working-men to starvation. Resolutions in favour of eight hours were passed.

Hugh O. Pentecost is doing splendid service. He is just now publishing in the Twentieth Century a series of articles written by the recognised leaders of the different reform and economic schools. The last number contains an article by "Bob" Ingersoll, and articles of "Free Trade" and on "Protection." As this paper has a circulation of about 20,000 copies in the States, only good results can be expected from such an impartial display of the different views.

HENRY F. CHARLES

BRAINTREE (Essex).—On Sunday, three large meetings were addressed by Geo. Cores (London) and W. Fuller (Norwich) in the Market Place. The audiences at all the meetings were unanimous in their approval of the Socialist ideas as explained by the speakers, and, without the least doubt, a strong branch of the S.L. will soon be established here. All our Commonweal, fifty-two in number, were rapidly sold, and a great many more could have been disposed of had we had them. Altogether, we have "broken the ice" very successfully, and made an opening for very good work in future. The next meetings are to be held on the second Sunday after Whitsunday; meanwhile, private propaganda work will be done. Special notice—The Commonweal can be obtained of Mr. Heywood, Manor Street, Braintree.—G. HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON

The COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. For Australia, New Zealand, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Transvaal, and the Argentine Republic, a year, 8s.; six months, 4s.; three months, 2s. For India, Ceylon, China, Hong Kong, and the Straits Settlements, a year, 10s.; six months, 5s.; three months, 2s. 6d.

Subscribers who receive a RED WRAPPER are thereby reminded that their subscriptions have expired and must be renewed immediately if they wish to continue to receive COMMONWEAL.

SPECIAL RECRUIT SUBSCRIPTIONS.—To aid in spreading our principles, the following largely reduced terms are offered to those who obtain new subscribers: Two new yearly subscriptions for British Islands, etc., 10s. 6d.; for Australia, etc., 15s.; for India, etc., 19s. Five new subscriptions: For British Islands, etc., 25s.; for Australia, etc., 37s. 6d.; for India, etc., 47s. 6d. Specimen copies will be sent on receipt of postage.

Remittances from abroad must be made by International Money Order.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

- R. W. B.—We regret to find your poem hardly up to publication standard.
- C. B. (Liverpool).—The photos of Chicago Anarchists can be obtained from comrade Lucy E. Parsons, Avondale Station, Chicago, Ill., U.S.A., at (we think) 50 c. each.
- L. H. (Salford).—We have something more important to do than to quarrel over details of future society. Most certainly no intelligent reader of the Commonweal could ever have suspected us of tenderness toward parliamentarism.
- J. H. WOOD (Detroit, Mich.).—Thanks for communication, which, however, we regret to be unable to utilise.
- "APPEAL TO THOSE WHO LABOUR."—We regret to find this poem unsuitable, even though it were not sent anonymously.

NOTES.

PROBABLY Mr. Stanley thought he was quite safe at the Guildhall the other night, when he fell foul of the Quakers. Unlike the honest tar in the Savoy opera, who thought the "hitting of a gal was a lubberly thing to do," Mr. Stanley likes fighting when there is no chance of effective retaliation. Bullying a Quaker, he doubtless thought, was as safe and exciting as shooting down naked savages with an elephant gun or repeating rifle. He has now found out his mistake, and has made himself look a fool into the bargain.

Stanley's accusation against Mr. Pease of having attacked the East African Company for their employment of slaves was quite unfounded, and on Mr. Pease demanding a public apology, in the cool, quiet fashion peculiar to Quakers, the great explorer has had to eat the leek, though he has not accomplished the feat with a very good grace. It is rather amusing to see the fierce African butcher conquered by a mild, peaceable Quaker.

As to Stanley's other charge against the Quakers, of being indifferent to the suppression of the slave-trade, Mr. Pease has done well to leave Mr. Stanley contemptuously to "the judgment of the public." Not only have the Quakers done their utmost in this direction, but they have always been noted for their kind treatment of native races. They have been hungry for profit, it is true, but the blood of murdered savages does not cry from the ground against them. Elephant rifles and explosive bullets have not played their part in their commercial propaganda.

Mr. Pease, however, did ask a question about the employment of slaves in Africa, but it was not about the slaves of the East African Company, but concerning the slaves of Stanley. It appears that, according to the admissions of the Government in reply to a question of Mr. Pease in Parliament on Wednesday May 7, the virtuous Mr. Stanley has been "suppressing" the slave-trade by utilising slaves as porters for his expedition, and on his return to Zanzibar he handed the slaves back to their masters, who took half their wages. We can understand now why so much flogging, etc., goes on in Stanley's expeditions. No wonder Stanley was wild with Mr. Pease for showing him up as a hypocritical fraud, who is always talking about his anxiety to "suppress" the slave-trade, and yet finds his chief allies among the slave-hunting cut-throats, and provides them with a profitable market for their wares by employing slaves for his caravans. Is this what Stanley calls "suppressing the slave-trade"? It is more like encouraging it.

But Stanley has still another cause for anger against Mr. Pease, who, it appears, had also called attention to the "Christian" enterprise of Stanley's friend and patron, Leopold of Belgium, who has been exporting 400 slaves from Zanzibar for the Congo Railway. When we remember that this "noble and public-spirited" monarch was denounced some time ago by a religious periodical as a frequenter of Mrs. Jeffries' "fashionable establishment" in Pinlico, we confess we can sympathise with Stanley's indignation on his behalf. Like Mr. Stanley, this "noble" prince does good by stealth and blushes to find it fame. He is of course perfectly qualified as a model of virtuous respectability "to impregnate the dull minds of Africans . . . with the light of religious ideas."

But Stanley was truly "eloquent" when, amid an audience of Stock Exchange gamblers, turtle-fed aldermen, the most shameless collection of jobbers and robbers in existence, he declaimed upon the advantages of his civilising march—i.e., unlimited Bibles, bullets, and Christianity for the natives and a "hundred per cent." for investors. How Mr. Stanley's "Christian" friends from the Daily Telegraph must have rubbed their hands when they heard that eloquent sound fall from the lips of the inspired orator! We can fancy them exclaiming, "Vun hundred per shent! Vy, my tear, it ish petter as money-lending." No wonder the assemblage was enthusiastic when Stanley denounced his opponents, and called down upon them the rebuke of "every man in whose soul the divine feeling of Christian charity is not quite dead." If the divine feeling of Christian charity can only exist in the souls of those who make a hundred per cent. profit out of the sweat, blood, and agony of miserable slaves, we would rather be without it. Mr. Stanley's "piety" is like the "godliness" of Shylock.

"Mark you this, Bassanio, The devil can cite scripture to his purpose. An evil soul, producing holy witness, Is like a villair, with a smiling cheek, A goodly apple rotten at the heart."

We make Mr. Stanley and his congregation of city usurers a present of the quotation. D. N.

NOTICE.

The Picture on the front page is a reduced fac-simile of a beautiful full-page Cartoon, designed by our comrade Walter Crane, to commemorate the recent world-wide celebration of the Solidarity of Labour. Printed on fine paper for framing, it may be had from this office in cardboard protector, for 4d., post free, 2s. a dozen.

With the next number of COMMONWEAL we shall be enabled, by the kindness of the proprietor of CYNICUS, to give an outline reproduction of the cartoon "Capital and Labour," which attracted so much notice when published in that paper, and which we referred to with praise a few weeks ago.

THE SONG OF THE WORKERS.

BY PIERRE DUPONT.

(Translated in the original measure, to be sung to the original tune.)

LET us who hear the shrill voiced cack
With clarion blast disturb our slumbers,
Who to the mill and forge must flock
At early morn in countless numbers ;
Who for a scanty wage must sell
Our arms and limbs but to our sorrow,
The fear of want can ne'er dispel,
Nor make provision for the morrow.

Chorus—Be brothers, let our glasses clink
Together ; never more we'll sunder,
Though shot and shell around us thunder,
We'll drink
An end to avarice and plunder.

The jealous wave, the stubborn soil,
Yield up their treasure to our labours ;
Our arms are stiff with ceaseless toil
To pamper those whom fortune favours.
We gather from the hill and vale,
From sea and shore, from mine and meadow,
Those piles of wealth the eyes regale,
Yet die ourselves beneath their shadow.

Chorus—Be brothers, etc.

Poor sheep ! our backs rich garments give
The gilded few who scorn our station ;
In pride and luxury they live
While toil and want degrade the nation.
Machines are we ; we sweat and bend
To raise great buildings high as heaven ;
Without us soon the world would end
Yet from the hives like bees we're driven.

Chorus—Be brothers, etc.

The puny heir of some domain
Our wives oft nurse to health and vigour,
And yet with them this Son of Cain
At play or feast would blush to figure.
In olden days the lords might take
The bride from out her groom's embraces ;
Now cold and want our daughters make
The prey of such as deal in laces.

Chorus—Be brothers, etc.

Ill clothed, ill housed, in cellars foul,
Beneath the thatch, in ruins hoary,
We live companions of the owl
And thief—in truth a piteous story !
Yet the red blood within our veins
Impetuous runs in bounding measure—
Ah, could we sport upon the plains,
Or seek the green wood for our pleasure !

Chorus—Be brothers, etc.

And when, as oft, we shed our gore
In streams that all the wide world cover,
The tyrant only reaps the more
From fields o'er which the vultures hover.
We have been fools : henceforth our power
We'll spend in breaking slavery's fetter,
And fill with mirth the passing hour
That brings the world from good to better.

Chorus—Be brothers, etc.

'COMMONWEAL' CONCERT AND DANCE.

MONDAY, May 12th, saw Revolutionary Socialists and their friends thoroughly enjoying themselves at the Athenæum Hall, Tottenham Court Road. The occasion was the Concert and Dance organised by the 'Commonweal' Branch of the S.L. for the benefit of the Commonweal. It was evident from the first that every one had come to enjoy themselves ; and so they did. The sketch, "The Duchess of Bayswater and Co.," in which our comrades Wm. Morris, May Morris, Sparling, Radford, Walker, and others took part, was highly appreciated, especially the little unrehearsed incident toward the end, which was so well performed that most of the audience thought it part of the play until they saw the actors laughing almost as heartily as themselves. After this the hall was cleared for dancing, which went on merrily to the music of W. H. Friswell's quadrille band, conducted by our friend E. C. Morgan. Our German comrades of the Central Männer Gesang Verein rendered some excellent singing between the dances, as did also the choir of the Hammersmith Branch, which greatly added to the evening's entertainment. Only one thing was wanting—it was that more of our male English comrades could dance. Under the circumstances it was largely one-sided, and many female comrades were somewhat disappointed at not being asked more frequently when there were so many in the room. However, those that could kept the ball rolling till the early hours, and when parting time came every one was surprised to find how quickly the time had flown, and broke up expressing the hope that it would not be long before another of a similar character was organised. It had brought comrades together who had never met before, and all agreed that a most enjoyable evening had been spent. It remains to be seen what the result will be so far as regards the object of the entertainment, the Commonweal benefit. Let us hope it will be a good one, and thus encourage comrades to get up another with even better results.

SCOTTISH NOTES.

"LABOUR DAY" was not celebrated in Scotland.

Our comrades of the Scottish Socialist Federation held a demonstration on Sunday the 4th—in Edinburgh. No other Labour Demonstration that I know of took place in Scotland.

In Glasgow a large demonstration might have been held on Sunday, but it would have required much money to have "organised" it so as to make it fairly representative of the sentiments of the workers, and neither the local Branch of the Socialist League nor the S.D.F. had funds available. The Glasgow Trades Council took no heed of the matter.

In Glasgow none of the Socialist bodies are so strong or so lively as they were a year or two ago. They have been deserted by many of their members, especially the well-to-do ones. Just when Socialist ideas are spreading rapidly among all sections of the people, active interest in propaganda has declined among many of those who in times past were energetic. Of course this is merely a temporary experience, nevertheless it is not an inspiring one. Many Socialists deserve severe reproach for their indifference. Their apathy seriously lessens the usefulness of the efforts of those who have unflinchingly stood to their posts of duty.

It must be recognised, however, that this apathy is common to all political and labour associations just now—except when a parliamentary election or a strike for an increase of sixpence a-day is on the field.

There are three Land Restoration (Henry George) Councillors in the Glasgow Town Council, yet not a single voice was raised against the proposal to confer the Freedom of the City on Mr. Stanley. One might have thought that men who vehemently assert that the land of a country belongs to the people who inhabit it, would have protested in some form against any honour, however unsubstantial, being bestowed on a man whose mission has been to confiscate territory by fraud and murder.

There has been a deal of excitement among Glasgow money-bags over the Railway Bills which have been before the Parliamentary Committees during the last two weeks. Westminster has been literally besieged with witnesses for and against the various proposals. Railway directors and officials, landlords, capitalists, lawyers, doctors, civil engineers, etc., have been there in legions delivering their testimonies in favour of their own and their clients' interests—but no working-man, and no one to represent the interest of the workers, has given evidence. Of course, working-men have no "interest" in railways, land, or vested rights of any description ; and the appearance of a representative of labour before the Committees would have been unseemly and ridiculous. Nevertheless, when Socialists venture to tell the workers this very apparent truth, politicians and editors grind their teeth in virtuous indignation and denounce Socialists as knaves and fools.

The Edinburgh police "are straining every nerve," we are told by the press, to catch the audacious thief who stole some £60 or £70 worth of the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh's jewels from the hotel wherein the royal pair sojourned on the occasion of their opening the Edinburgh Exhibition. I wonder, indeed, when these vigilant thief-catchers will "strain every nerve" to catch the Duke and Duchess for stealing these jewels, as well as every particle of property which they possess—from the shirts upon their backs to the horses in their stables—from the starving tax-payers of this rich and enlightened country ?

Frank Sherman, aged 84, one of the oldest Freemasons in Scotland, who had reached the twenty-eighth degree, and was a Knight of the Holy Sepulchre, and who "stood next to the Prince of Wales at the ceremony of laying the foundation-stone of the Glasgow Post Office," died last week in extreme poverty at Castle-Douglas. He had been in receipt of pauper relief for many years. The "charity" and "brotherhood" of Freemasonry appear to be about as hollow shams as those of Christianity, in these days.

Some 500 tailors are on strike or lock-out in Glasgow, owing to the Master Tailors' Association insisting that garments hitherto paid first and second class shall in future be paid only third class. Some time ago the masters granted an advance in price for all the three classes ; and now, after having raised the selling price of clothes, they seek to rob the poor workers of their share by reducing the first and second classes to third class—a strategem which, if successful, will actually give their workers lower pay than before. Meanwhile, the work of the men on strike and lock-out is being done in notorious sweating dens. Now these master tailors are not Jews or Germans, they are Christians and Scotchmen. Many of them are elders and deacons in the kirk, and take a lively interest in evangelical and philanthropic missions at home and abroad. I don't think we should wish capital punishment just yet.

For several weeks past the Glasgow police have been diligently honouring the Sabbath day and keeping it holy by making wholesale raids upon "shebeens." With their usual nice discrimination, they have made no attempt to disturb the Sunday merry-making in hotels, clubs, or mansions of the west-end; they have confined their virtuous efforts to the "illegal" retailing of drink in the slums. Up lanes and stairs in the most unwholesome parts of the city they have marched in martial array, seizing indiscriminately men, women, bottles of beer, and jars of whiskey.

And the temperance people have applauded. It is such good and noble work to prevent the poor, who cannot keep a magazine of champagne, wine, whiskey, and beer, all of the best quality, in their own homes, and get drunk comfortably, from going to places where they can only get raw whiskey and flat beer, and then lie down poisoned on the floor! It is comforting also to these reformers to think that the poor, who cannot afford to take a room in a hotel or hire a trap and drive to some neighbouring town, where they would be bona fide travellers, must in future be made to feel that among the many advantages of civilisation, besides having no chance of getting rich during the week days, they will have no opportunity of getting drunk on Sundays.

For downright blazing hypocrisy commend me to your average teetotal magistrates. Look at what they have done in Paisley. That town being only some six miles from Glasgow, many Glasgow people went there for a drink on Sundays, duly qualified as bona fide travellers. This the teetotal magistrates of Paisley determined to put an end to—and this is the way they have done it. Hotel-keepers in future are only to supply one drink to each traveller, and that one drink must be charged not less than one shilling! This sublime arrangement will of course shut out poor workmen and tramps—the only people likely to be bona fide travellers on Sundays nowadays—and it will keep the hotels "genteel" for the sporting men, commercial travellers, shopkeepers, and lawyers, who can hire a conveyance and have a drink in every hotel in the town; while the extra charge will recoup the hotel-keepers for the diminished custom!

The "Servant Girl" question is again up for discussion in the press here. The faults and follies of these domestic slaves are being eloquently exposed and denounced by one fine lady after another; and a proposal has been made that a "mistresses' defence association" should be formed. One energetic lady, in collaboration with her husband, has actually drawn up a form wherein may be duly entered all the faults and failings of servants, without which certificate from their last mistress no other mistress may engage them.

Servant girls are no doubt often very dirty, very lazy, very frivolous, and sometimes positively wicked; and little wonder that they are so; but in the mass they are superior in every degree of womanhood to their mistresses. Physically, mentally, and morally, they are better fitted to survive; and I should infinitely prefer that the coming race should be born of them than of their cold, artificial, enervated, and indolent mistresses.

But why should there be servants or mistresses at all? Why should one girl have to wash and dress and clean and cook for half a dozen grown-up women and men, who ought to be quite capable of doing all these things for themselves? Why should the daughters of the poor be compelled to leave their own homes and spend the best part of their lives in penal servitude, in the houses of those who exist by fleecing and toiling to death their fathers and brothers in workshops and factories? If these girls were retained in their own homes, how much lighter would be the burden of motherhood of their mothers and sisters? how much brighter and pleasanter in every way would be the dwellings of the toilers? Surely in the promise that Socialism gives of bringing back our sisters and daughters to our homes—bringing them back alike from the sunk flats of domestic servitude and from the noxious dens of warehouses and factories—there is enough to rouse every true and brave man to join resolutely in the struggle for the Social Revolution!

CORRESPONDENCE.

BLANKET-WEAVERS OF COURS.

COMRADES,—I must ask your indulgence once more, having recently received another letter from our French friends on strike at Cours. Two hundred workers are still actually out of employment, and have to be supported somehow by their fellows, who, to help them as far as their own means allow, have imposed on themselves a levy of 10 per cent. on their wages. This, however, does not suffice, and these strikers, after near upon ten months' endurance, have had no means of renewing clothes, shoes, etc., and besides the actual want of nourishment, find themselves in a most miserable condition. The blacklegs who have got their places in the workshops and who only make from 2 fr. 50 cents. to 3 francs a-day, when the masters had held out the bait of from 4 to 6 francs a-day, are not in a particularly enviable position, seeing that they have to be housed as in a barrack by their employer, and find the greatest difficulty in getting supplied with necessities, being boycotted by the tradespeople around.

Not to take up too much of your space, I will merely add to these few details of a foreign strike, which are always interesting to us Socialists, the fact that my subscription-list is not yet closed, and that I shall be glad to receive any further donations your readers are willing to spare to add to the funds of this strike.—Yours fraternally,

MAY MORRIS.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

London Postmen and the Police.

The beneficent State which is to give us a "legal" eight hours day and load us with blessings, has shown by its treatment of some of the workers who are sweated by it how likely it is to fulfil all the fond prophecies of its admirers. The London Postmen took advantage of the Jubilee of the Penny Post to hold a meeting on Clerkenwell Green to demand the right of meeting and combination, the proper enforcement of the eight hour day, and a minimum wage of 24s. a-week. The Postmaster-General issued a manifesto forbidding the men to attend the meeting upon pain of dismissal. This gentleman is deeply grieved in his heart because the postmen won't comply with official regulations, which stipulate that only postmen shall address meetings of postmen, and that there shall be an official shorthand reporter present who shall take down their speeches, so that any man who speaks out boldly may be sacked at the first convenient opportunity. Processions were to march to the meeting, but these were immediately forbidden by Mr. Munro. The East-end procession, which was to start from Mile-end Waste, was crushed at once by an overwhelming force of police. The postmen of the Western Division marched in procession in defiance of the Chief Commissioner. They were of course brutally attacked and broken up. But with dauntless courage they formed again and again, despite repeated police charges. But close to the Holborn Post-Office the police set upon the men with ruffianly fury—one sergeant setting the example to his men by striking one of the processionists with his fist. A short, sharp struggle, and the postmen were finally dispersed. Now, it is evident that the police are determined to put down all Socialist and trade-unionist processions during the week. Workmen who want to collect funds for hospitals, where experiments are carried out upon the bodies of the poor for the benefit of the rich, will of course be excepted. We have seen that done already in the case of the hospital demonstration of Saturday May 11th, which caused ten times more obstruction than trade-union or Socialist processions. Our boasted freedom of speech and meeting is rapidly disappearing. Trafalgar Square went first; now processions are prohibited on every day but Sunday. Soon Sunday processions will be stopped because they interfere with the comfort and repose of the middle classes upon that sacred day; and last of all, Sunday demonstrations will be put down on the same pretext. The time has come for workmen to make a firm stand upon this question by organising processions and demonstrations in all parts of London to protest against the increasing tyranny of the police authorities.

End of the Tailors' Strike.

The East-end strike concluded on Sunday by the masters accepting the terms proposed by the men. They have agreed to employ none but union men, and to combine with the workers to bring pressure to bear upon the shopkeepers by refusing to work for any firm that will not pay the union prices. All shops that refuse to pay these prices will be boycotted by both masters and men. A committee of masters and men has been formed to arrange details of united action. A great Government contractor, distinguished in the trade by paying only 2s. 3d. for making a policeman's coat, will be the first to be attacked. We hope the masters—who caused the present strike by refusing to carry out the terms they had agreed to—have been taught a useful lesson, and will not try any of their treacherous tricks again.

The Tram Men.

The tram-men have been very quiet for the last few months. Probably they have been waiting to see whether Mr. Sutherst's "Twelve Hours Bill" will get through the House of Commons. Some of them have got tired of waiting, and last week there was talk of a strike in Battersea. The tramway manager, Mr. Jacques, has set the union at defiance. He refuses to receive a deputation from the union, and treats it as a bogus body. The union at the last moment, on the advice of John Burns, has decided to try for another interview with the manager instead. Burns probably knows the strength of the union, but it is certainly a great pity that it should threaten a strike and then withdraw at the last moment. This is the third time this has been done. This kind of action is not likely to increase Mr. Jacques's respect for this weak-kneed association.

Another Trade Depression Coming.

Already there are signs that another trade depression is rapidly approaching. The last labour statistics from the Board of Trade, combined with the recent returns concerning exports and imports, point this out so strongly that even the middle-class press is beginning to admit it. The trade-unions report this month a percentage of 1.96 members out, as against 1.7 in April and 1.4 in March. The ship-building trade is very depressed; textile industries of Lancashire have not been in a very lively condition even during the recent brief period of prosperity, and certainly now show no signs of improvement. The depression in the iron trade, which began in Staffordshire, is now extending to the North. The iron and steel trades at Workington, in Cumberland, are in a critical condition. From Sheffield and Rotherham we hear that most of the iron and steel workers are working short time; and from Middlesboro, in Yorkshire, the centre of the iron trade, comes the same gloomy story of a rapid fall in prices. On the whole, it seems that the reckless gambling of our exploiters has had its usual result, and that the people are once more to be plunged into bitter misery through the avarice and greed of their masters. But I don't think they will suffer so quietly this time. Revolutionary ideas have spread far and wide since the last trade depression, and the people will not starve quietly this time to please their masters. If they have been discontented and restive during a period of prosperity, what will they be when they are face to face with starvation and despair?

SWEDEN.—The May Day demonstration has, in all industrial parts of Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, been a far greater success than the most hopeful Socialists dared predict. In all the larger towns enormous masses of workers came out with their banners and bands, and held meetings, where the claims for the limitation of the hours of work to eight was strongly put forward. A surprise to the Socialists of Stockholm was the very able and energetic support they got from some democratic papers and leaders. Two of the best speakers at the gigantic Stockholm demonstration were well-known democrats of high education. There is no doubt that the Scandinavian bourgeoisie has got a powerful impression of the grasp of Socialism upon "their" labourers. Who can doubt that this may be the real beginning of the end—if only agitators and leaders understand to develop this Labour Day idea in a truly revolutionary spirit?—STN.

"COMMONWEAL" GUARANTEE FUND.

The following further sums have been received towards this fund:—North London Branch (6 weeks), 18s.; Streatham Branch, 6s.; B. W., 6d.; H. R., 1s.; D. Nicoll, 6d.; Glasgow Branch (2 weeks), 10s.; Blatant, 6d.; C. Saunders, 2s.; Liverpool Socialist Society, 3s. 8d.; and Bines, 1s.

REPORTS.

HAMMERSMITH.—Good meeting at Bridge End on Sunday for over two hours; attentive audience; speakers were Morris, S. Grant, Johnson, Davis, Sparling, Bullock, Tarleton, and Catterson Smith; 41 'Weals' sold, and other literature 1s. 9d. In the evening fair meeting, Tarleton, Johnson, and S. Grant speaking; 10 'Weals' sold. Good meeting at Walham Green in the evening; speakers were Catterson Smith, Bullock, and Davis; 'Weals' and pamphlets sold, 1s. 7d. Good meeting at Starch Green, speakers being Mordhurst, Kitchin, and A. J. Smith.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—Fair meeting at Latimer Road; speakers were J. Lyne, Saint, Coulon, and Crouch. The branch held a very successful meeting on the Wormwood Scrubs, this being the first held there by the branch; speakers were Maughan, Crouch, W. H. Rogers, Dean, and Saint; fair sale of 'Weals' during the day.—M. SHARP, sec. pro. tem.

STREATHAM.—Streatham Common was opened up on Sunday morning by the Streatham branch, and considering there was no public notice of meeting a large audience assembled. Two or three hundred were induced to listen to the earnest address of comrade Collins, who preached Revolutionary Socialism pure and simple; 3s. 6d. collected, and 30 Commonweal and some pamphlets sold. In the evening a fairly good meeting was held, Collins and Smith being the speakers; the meeting was a prolonged one owing to the enthusiasm of the audience; good collection and 29 'Weals' sold.—S.

ABERDEEN.—On the afternoon of Saturday, 17th, an eight hours demonstration took place on the Aberdeen Links under the auspices of the Trades Council. With bright, sunny weather, about 10,000 persons attended—a procession of the trades with bands, banners, and men at work in lorries marching through the streets, which were blocked by enormous masses of people. There were three platforms, and among the speakers were Champion, Webster, and Leatham. A conference was held in the evening to discuss the policy of labour. Champion delivered a long address, and in the discussion which followed, amidst much vain enough talk about new political machinery, Socialism was not forgotten, any more than it was at the demonstration. Duncan, Semple, and Leatham were in evidence, and Champion declared himself, with obvious sincerity, as much of a Socialist as ever. At usual meeting on 18th, Morris's magnificent lecture, "Art and Socialism," delivered at Leicester, as long ago as 1884, was read and discussed.—L.

GLASGOW.—Sunday meeting on Jail Square not held. In the evening Glasier spoke at Paisley Road Toll, where the meeting (which was a very large one) was twice interrupted by a "thunder plump" of rain. We have not yet secured a new meeting-place.

LEEDS.—On Sunday the usual two meetings were held in the Croft, when Maguire, Roper, and Samuels spoke; a good collection was made on behalf of some labourers on strike; good sale of 'Weals'.

MANCHESTER.—A meeting was held at Middleton on Saturday night, when W. E. Strange, J. Strange, and Bailie spoke; a lively discussion followed, which terminated with a challenge to hold a public debate on Socialism between two of our opponents and two from the League, which is arranged to take place on Saturday, June 7th; 18 'Weals' sold. On Sunday morning at Philip's Park, Stockton, Strange and Charles (of Sheffield) addressed a good audience; 28 Commonweal sold. In the afternoon Charles spoke in Stevenson Square after the cabinet makers, now on strike, had held a meeting; 'Weals' sold out.

NORWICH.—On Sunday last a good meeting was held in the Market Place; Lenneying and comrade Neilson (London) spoke; good sale of Commonweal and pamphlets. In the evening, no meeting was held, owing to weather. At Colts-hall, in the afternoon, a good meeting was held, addressed by comrade Poynts and another; good impression made.

YARMOUTH.—On Sunday, on Priory Plain, comrades Neilson (Freedom Group), Darley, and Ruffold addressed a large and attentive audience. In the afternoon, in the Club-room, a discussion on Socialism by Brightwell and Ruffold. In the evening, on Colman's Quay, a meeting was addressed by Ruffold; many questions were asked, and answered by Headley and Ruffold to the satisfaction of the audience. 2s. 2d. collected; 17 Commonweal sold.—J. H.

BOLTON.—On Sunday evening last, May 18th, a meeting numbering upwards of 1,000 persons, on Town Hall Square, was addressed by Stockton (of Manchester) and Shufflebotham and Smith (of Bolton). Stockton kept the audience well together for an hour and a quarter, and when asked by Shufflebotham if they wished to hear any more speakers on Socialism, they answered "Yes." 5s. 4d. collected; Commonweal sold out. This should encourage other speakers to come down.—J. S.

ROCHDALE SOCIALISTS.—We had two open-air meetings on Sunday, afternoon and night. On the Town Hall Square comrade Bailie (S. L.), from Manchester, addressed an audience of 400; slight opposition. Collection, 6s.; papers, 1s. 4d.

EDINBURGH—SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—A large meeting was held on the Meadows, at which the men on strike in the Scottish Leader office were present and made known their position publicly. A resolution was carried unanimously to give all possible support to the strikers, and to boycott the paper. Hamilton, Smith, Davidson, and Bell, and T. C. Smith (for the compositors) were the speakers.

ALL FOR THE CAUSE.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. XVII. (continued).—HOW THE CHANGE CAME.

"WELL, the Sunday of the meeting came, and great crowds came to Trafalgar Square in procession, the greater part of the Committee amongst them, surrounded by their band of men armed somehow or other. The streets were quite peaceful and quiet, though there were many spectators to see the procession pass. Trafalgar Square had no body of police in it; the people took quiet possession of it, and the meeting began. The armed men stood round the principal platform, and there were a few others armed amidst the general crowd; but by far the greater part were unarmed.

"Most people thought the meeting would go off peaceably; but the members of the Committee had heard from various quarters that something would be attempted against them; but these rumours were vague, and they had no idea of what threatened. They soon found out.

"For before the streets about the Square were filled, a body of soldiers poured into it from the north-west corner and took up their places by the houses that stood on the west side. The people growled at the sight of the red-coats; the armed men of the Committee stood undecided, not knowing what to do; and indeed this new influx so jammed the crowd together that, unorganised as they were, they had little chance of working through it. They had scarcely grasped the fact of their enemies being there, when another column of soldiers, pouring out of the streets which led into the great southern road going down to the Parliament House (still existing, and called the Dung Market), and also from the embankment by the side of the Thames, marched up, pushing the crowd into a denser and denser mass, and formed along the south side of the Square. Then any of those who could see what was going on, could see at once that they were in a trap, and could only wonder what would be done with them.

"The closely-packed crowd would not or could not budge, except under the influence of the height of terror, which was soon to be supplied to them. A few of the armed men struggled to the front, or climbed up to the base of the monument which then stood there, that they might face the wall of hidden fire before them; and to most men (there were many women amongst them) it seemed as if the end of the world had come, and to-day seemed strangely different from yesterday. No sooner were the soldiers drawn up as aforesaid than, says an eye-witness, 'a glittering officer on horseback came prancing out from the ranks on the south, and read something from a paper which he held in his hand; which something very few heard; but I was told afterwards that it was an order for us to disperse, and a warning that he had legal right to fire on the crowd else, and that he would do so. The crowd took it as a challenge of some sort, and hoarse threatening roar went up from them; and after that there was comparative silence for a little, till the officer had got back into the ranks. I was near the edge of the crowd, toward the soldiers,' says this eye-witness, 'and I saw three little machines being wheeled out in front of the ranks, which I knew for mechanical guns. I cried out, "Throw yourselves down! they are going to fire!" But no one scarcely could throw himself down, so tight as the crowd were packed. I heard a sharp order given, and wondered where I should be the next minute; and then— It was as if the earth had opened, and hell had come up bodily amidst us. It is no use trying to describe the scene that followed. Deep lanes were mowed amidst the thick crowd; the dead and dying covered the ground, and the shrieks and wails and cries of horror filled all the air, till it seemed as if there were nothing else in the world but murder and death. Those of our men who were still unhurt cheered wildly and opened a scattered fire on the soldiers. One or two fell; and I saw the officers going up and down the ranks urging the men to fire again; but they received the orders in sullen silence, and let the butts of their guns fall. Only one sergeant ran to a machine-gun and began to set it going; but a tall young man, an officer too, ran out of the ranks and dragged him back by the collar; and the soldiers stood there motionless while the horror-stricken crowd, nearly wholly unarmed (for most of the armed men had fallen in that first discharge), drifted out of the Square. I was told afterwards that the soldiers on the west side had fired also, and done their part of the slaughter. How I got out of the Square I scarcely know: I went, not feeling the ground under me, what with rage and terror and despair.'

"So says our eye-witness. The number of the slain on the side of the people in that shooting during a minute was prodigious; but it was not easy to come at the truth about it; it was probably between one and two thousand. Of the soldiers, six was killed outright, and a dozen wounded."

I listened, trembling with excitement. The old man's eyes glittered and his face flushed as he spoke, and told the tale of what I had often thought might happen. Yet I wondered that he should have got so elated about a mere massacre, and I said:

"How fearful! And I suppose that this massacre put an end to the whole revolution for that time?"

"No, no," cried old Hammond; "it began it!"

He filled his glass and mine, and stood up and cried out, "Drink this glass to the memory of those who died there, for indeed it would be a long tale to tell how much we owe them."

I drank, and he sat down again and went on.

"That massacre of Trafalgar Square began the civil war; though, like all such events, it gathered head slowly, and people scarcely knew what a crisis they were acting in.

"Terrible as the massacre was, and hideous and overpowering as the first terror had been, when the people had time to think about it, their feeling was one of anger rather than fear; although the military organisation of the state of siege was now carried out without shrinking by the clever young general. For though the ruling-classes when the news spread next morning felt one gasp of horror and even dread, yet the Government and their immediate backers felt that now the wine was drawn and must be drunk. However, even the most reactionary of the capitalist papers, with two exceptions, stunned by the tremendous news, simply gave an account of what had taken place, without making any comment upon it. The exceptions were one a so-called 'liberal' paper (the Government of the day was of that complexion), which, after a preamble in which it declared its undeviating sympathy with the cause of labour, proceeded to point out that in times of revolutionary disturbance it behoved the Government to be just but firm, and that by far the most merciful way of dealing with the poor madmen who were attacking the very foundations of society (which had made them mad and poor) was to shoot them at once, so as to stop others from drifting into a position in which they would run a chance of being shot. In short, it praised the determined action of the Government as the acmé of human wisdom and mercy, and exulted in the inauguration of an epoch of reasonable democracy free from the tyrannical fads of Socialism.

"The other exception was a paper thought to be one of the most violent opponents of democracy, and so it was; but the editor of it found his manhood, and spoke for himself and not for his paper. In a few simple, indignant words he asked people to consider what a society was worth which had to be defended by the massacre of unarmed citizens, and called on the Government to withdraw their state of siege and put the general and his officers who fired on the people on their trial for murder. He went further, and declared that whatever his opinion might be as to the doctrines of the Socialists, he for one should throw in his lot with the people, until the Government atoned for their atrocity by showing that they were prepared to listen to the demands of men who knew what they wanted and whom the decrepitude of society forced into pushing their demands.

"Of course, this editor was immediately arrested by the military power; but his bold words were already in the hands of the public and produced a great effect: so great an effect that the Government, after some vacillation, withdrew the state of siege, though at the same time it strengthened the military organisation and made it more stringent. Three of the Committee of Public Safety had been slain in Trafalgar Square: of the rest, the greater part went back to their old place of meeting and there awaited the event calmly. They were arrested there on the Monday morning, and would have been shot at once by the general, who was a mere military machine, if the Government had not shrunk before the responsibility of killing men without any trial. There was at first a talk of trying them by a special commission of judges, as it was called—i.e., before a set of men bound to find them guilty, and whose business it was to do so. But with the Government the cold fit had succeeded to the hot one; and the prisoners were brought before a jury at the assizes. There a fresh blow awaited the Government; for in spite of the judge's charge, which distinctly instructed the jury to find the prisoners guilty, they were acquitted, and the jury added to their verdict a presentment, in which they condemned the action of the soldiery, in the queer phraseology of the day, as 'rash, unfortunate, and unnecessary.' The Committee of Public Safety renewed its sittings, and from thenceforth was a rallying-point in opposition to the Parliament. The Government now gave way on all sides, and yielded to the demands of the people; though there was a widespread plot for effecting a coup d'état set on foot between the leaders of the two so-called opposing parties. The well-meaning part of the public was overjoyed, and thought that all danger of a civil war was over. The victory of the people was celebrated by huge meetings held in the parks and elsewhere in memory of the victims of the great massacre."

PRINCIPLES OF NATIONALISM.

WE have been several times asked to explain the principles and methods of American "Nationalism." Rather than run the risk of misrepresenting a movement, which is at all events a sign of the way in which things are progressing over there, we print the authoritative statement of the California Nationalist, the foremost Western representative, edited by W. C. Owen, at one time an active Socialist in San Francisco:

1. The Principles of Nationalism. Nationalists maintain that man's struggle should be with nature alone and not with his brother man; that the way to fight successfully with nature is to join hands, to co-operate. Nationalists say that the proper function of a railroad is to distribute goods and passengers as expeditiously and conveniently as possible, and not to run the distribution of the country for the sole purpose of putting big dividends into a few pockets. They say that the sole object of farming is to supply the hungry with food, of cloth-making to clothe the naked backs, and so forth. In short, Nationalism teaches that production should be for general use, not for individual profit. They say that under the present system labour is bought just as it was in slavery, save that the purchaser has not even the obligation to provide for his "hands." They say that not only is the wage system worse than slavery in this respect, but also because the wage-slave has to beg for the privilege of selling himself. They say that this condition arises directly from the reduction to private ownership of the means of production. These private owners then compete with one another, which results in the more powerful reducing the weaker to bankruptcy. The method by which the rich become richer is by taking what is known as the "surplus value" of the labourer's work; that is to say, a labourer is only hired on the understanding that he produces more than he gets back in the shape of wages. This results in what is known as "over-production," the producer obviously not being paid enough to enable him to buy back the goods made. Apart from this, over-production naturally results from the planlessness of all modern production, each manufacturer working in the dark and being ignorant of the amount of goods his competitors are turning out. The Trusts have formed to regulate this planlessness, but they are regulating it from a purely selfish standpoint; that is to say—they produce just as much as it will suit their pockets to, not as much as the public really wants. Nationalists propose to remedy this by so regulating industry as that it shall perform, with the greatest nicety of execution, its true work, viz., that of supplying human wants—the necessities without which people CANNOT live first, the luxuries afterwards. It being clearly proven that our means of production are a long way ahead of our capacities for consuming, it follows that the putting those means at the disposal of all who are willing to work is equivalent to the abolition of involuntary poverty.

2. How do we propose to introduce Nationalism? Simply by following the natural development of affairs, as we see them now passing, to its logical conclusion. It is certain that we have long since left the day of small undertakings behind, and that the tendency of all modern invention is to produce and distribute on a larger and larger scale. The railroads in particular have rendered this possible, and there is no fact more clearly proved than that the larger the aggregate of capital employed and the greater the number of men co-operating in production and distribution, the greater the results in proportion to the effort put forth. The common sense of the race forbids its going back to the days of small production; the tendency to vaster combinations is a natural force that cannot be checked, and, as the individual grew into the partnership, the partnerships into the corporation, and the various corporations into the Trust, so the various Trusts must sooner or later merge into the great National Trust in which all citizens will be equal partners. We propose to frankly acknowledge, instead of obstinately opposing this tendency, by getting the people to absorb one after the other the leading industries of the country. This is in entire harmony with the laws of progress as we see them now working; the great National Trust swallows up one by one the smaller individual Trusts, as they in their turn swallowed the corporations, and as the corporations swallowed the small individual producers. It is probable that the two great distributing agencies—the railroad and the telegraph—will be the first to be absorbed, for distribution is to-day the most important part of production.

3. What are the best books on Nationalism? The two best are, we think, unquestionably "Looking Backward" and Gronlund's "Co-operative Commonwealth." We hope, however, to prepare a list of books upon the subject.

The Nationalist, of Boston, a monthly magazine which may be regarded as the most important periodical of the movement, of which Edward Bellamy will henceforth be editor, and to which Laurence Gronlund is a regular contributor, prints in every number the following "Declaration of Principles":

The principle of the Brotherhood of Humanity is one of the eternal truths that govern the world's progress on lines that distinguish human nature from brute nature. The principle of competition is simply the application of the brutal law of the survival of the strongest and most cunning. Therefore, so long as competition continues to be the ruling factor in our industrial system, the highest development of the individual cannot be reached, the loftiest aims of humanity cannot be realised. No truth can avail unless practically applied. Therefore, those who seek the welfare of man must endeavour to suppress the system founded on the brutal principle of competition, and put in its place another based on the nobler principle of association. But in striving to apply this nobler and wiser principle to the complex conditions of modern life, we advocate no sudden or ill-considered changes; we make no war upon individuals; we do not censure those who have accumulated immense fortunes simply by carrying to a logical end the false principle on which business is now based. The combinations, trusts, and syndicates, of which the people at present complain, demonstrate the practicability of our basic principle of association. We merely seek to push this principle a little further, and have all industries operated in the interest of all by the nation—the people organised—the organic unity of the whole people. The present industrial system proves itself wrong by the immense wrongs it produces; it proves itself absurd by the immense waste of energy and material which is admitted to be its concomitant. Against this system we raise our protest; for the abolition of the slavery it has wrought and would perpetuate, we pledge our best efforts.

All this reads very well; but, when examined, it only comes to a rather crude State Socialism after all, and there seems but little need for the new name, and none for the tremendous fuss that is being made about it. Dr. J. W. Moliere, speaking before the First Nationalist Club of San Francisco the other day, was careful to point out how very respectable they were, and how little they had to do with mere vulgar Socialism and Communism:

Communists, said he, would make all property common property; while Nationalists will place only the materials of production, land, machinery, raw materials, etc., under collective control. Communism compels every man to do his share of labour and allows him to consume as he needs. Nationalism allows every man the privilege of working as much or as little as he pleases, but "makes his consumption exactly commensurate with his performance." The motto of Communism is, "Every man according to his needs;" that of Nationalism, "Every man according to his deeds." We acknowledge that the Communist motto is a very generous one, but our motto is more just—taking human nature as it is to-day—and we claim it as our peculiar merit that we take society just as it is and endeavour to deal by it justly and without false sentiment.

After reading what the Nationalists have to say for themselves, English Socialists will most likely conclude to stick to their unrespectable name and work on in their old way. We welcome the aid of anybody who will render it, and don't object to his doing it his own way, but we can't help our unbelief in the efficacy of rose-water and half-way revolutions. S.

WHO ARE "LABOURERS."

A COMMON objection of the hired apologists for capitalism to the labour movement is that the term "labour" is used in too restricted a sense. "We are all labourers," they tell us. "The man who works with his brain no less than the man who toils with his muscles—the editor, book-keeper, manufacturer, or merchant is just as much a labourer, works as hard and as long as the hod-carrier or blacksmith." This sounds very plausible, says the Journal of the Knights of Labour, and no doubt many are disposed to consider it valid reasoning. There is one sense, indeed, in which it is true. All who do needful and useful work can claim to be labourers, whether their work be that of superintendence or a subordinate order of brainwork. No one recognises this more fully, or wants to give it greater prominence, than the Order of the Knights of Labour. We wish, indeed, that the classes who live by brain labour would realise that they have a common interest and common rights with the manual workers. There is no bar which excludes them from co-operating as members in full standing with their brethren of the class more generally recognised as "labourers" in the noble work of emancipating toil from the clutches of the exploiting class. Our only regret is, that so few of them seem willing to sink caste distinctions and unite with the manual workers.

As to the other class, the brain workers, who are also employers or capitalists, they occupy a somewhat different position. Still, even against these we have no enmity, provided they are willing to unite with us in an honest effort to rectify the abuses of the industrial and economic system. We have no quarrel with them as workers; far from it. But most of them are in this position, that, although they do more or less work, perhaps a good deal of work, they draw most of their income, not from their work, but from the fact that they control the means and forces of production, and so are able to levy a tribute on the earnings of others. Obviously it is the shallowest sort of subterfuge to say that a millionaire landlord ought to be classed as a worker because he chooses to keep his own books and thereby saves perhaps what amounts to a cent on every dollar of his income, or that a bondholder can also claim to eat his bread in the sweat of his brow because he clips his own coupons and buys and sells securities personally.

But the singular part of the matter is, that in those comparatively rare instances in which brain workers of either class show their practical sympathy with their fellow-toilers of the forge and workshop, by taking part in the labour reform movement, these very same champions of capitalism turn round on them with the sneer that they do not represent the opinions of the honest toiler, with whom they have nothing in common. Then they are not "labourers"? Oh, dear, no. They are only demagogues and jaw-smiths!

It is really very hard to satisfy the literary hirelings and toadies of the moneybags. But fortunately there is no need of our trying to do so.

"Trade is always the harbinger of peace," says the prophet of San Francisco. Is it? retorts the Bulletin. Think again—what of Britain's little and big trading wars all over the world? With America, China, in Asia, in Africa, India, Egypt, Sumatra, everywhere.

IN THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. WILLIAM ROCKEFELLER [one of the "bosses" of the Standard Oil Trust], who is building a 3,000,000 dollar cottage at Tarrytown, N. Y., says it's only just an ordinary house, merely for his amusement. That's all.—Boston Herald.

The Boston Herald says:

"Of the 14,770 murders in this country during the past six years, 558 were avenged by hanging, and 975 by lynching. This rather goes to show that Judge Lynch is more expeditious in his methods than the regular courts of law, and that both are considerably behindhand in their work."

A pity we are living in the effete East. Montana would suit the temperament and the appetites of our newspaper-men—the newspaper-men of the hub of the universe—considerably better.

Brave E. H. Heywood, publisher of the Word, was arrested in Boston Saturday evening on a charge of circulating alleged obscene matter through the medium of his paper. He was locked up in the city prison, but was released on bail, his bondsmen being George W. Stevens and Marshall A. Warren. The complaint in this case was made by Henry Chase, agent of that contemptible, because hypocritical, society for the suppression of vice. In court yesterday he was held in 1,000 dollars to May 23. It seems to me that the greater the slavery in a country is to-day, the prouder its inhabitants are of their liberty.

Edward Bellamy said to a New York Sun reporter:

"Everything is, and has been, working in our direction. The inter-State commerce law I regard as a very important entering wedge. It is a manifestation of the tendency toward centralisation, which is another form of association. You will observe that since the War of Independence there has been a gradual but very noticeable decadence in the importance of State government. The State has been decreasing in dignity and power. It got a tremendous blow in the results of the civil war. This tendency will continue until you will finally see the functions of State government lapse into innocuous desuetude, as—oh—What's-his-name says. You have only to read the titles of bills introduced of late years into Congress to be convinced of this tendency."

Bellamy might be right if it were not for the fact that besides the centripetal forces, there are in the United States, as well as in all other so-called civilised countries, also strong centrifugal forces at work. It's not wise for novices to prophecy too much.

Burnette G. Haskell, once leader of the "Black" International, the ultra-radicals, now chief of the Nationalist movement in California, made the following remarks to the Sun reporter:

"We propose to win this next election here. And then this is our programme: Our Nationalist board of supervisors will, by municipal ordinances, declare that the city and county of San Francisco henceforth proposes to conduct its own affairs; that it will begin the immediate construction of its own water works, bakeries, abattoirs, street-car lines, bathing houses and laundries. It will pay for the construction and operation of these in scrip, and will receive this scrip for water, bread, meat, car fare, and washing, and eventually for taxation. This will give this scrip full currency as money, and at par—perhaps may place it at a premium. The scrip being received for the product and redeemed by it, and then destroyed, will constitute a circulating medium, subject to no fluctuation in value." Then follows a series of calculations as to the cost of municipal plants and the returns from them, of which this is a sample: "If an aqueduct is constructed bringing the water from the Sierras across the State (and sold to other towns and farmers on the route as well), it will produce a revenue of 1,500,000 dollars per year, and will cost 10,000,000 dollars, paying for itself in seven years." After figuring similarly for the other municipal enterprises, Mr. Haskell proceeds: "The very first year we would nearly pay for all our improvements. The second year we could buy up the outside lands and build homes for our workers. The third year we could establish other industries; and in ten years we could actually alone pay off the national debt. The point of attack is the municipality; the weapon is competition with municipal scrip receivable for the goods produced, and the road is a plain and easy highway."

Mr. T. V. Powderly has some nice views on immigration—specially nice, because he is the direct offspring of a couple of "scourings of Europe." He says:

"I am not animated by a spirit of hatred or animosity, or even prejudice, against those who seek our shores, nor would I do them an injury, but it is on higher grounds that I stand, when I say that the immigration to this country as it exists to day is damaging, unhealthy, and of undue proportions. There is but one thing that causes men to look down on the miner, the street cleaner, and the ordinary day labourer, and that is the ease with which the places can be filled from the scourings of Europe, and the result is that the immigrant in his ignorance drives away the American labourer and mechanic."

Mr. Powderly suggests:

"Every immigrant should, on landing, be sworn as to his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and he should be informed at the same time that at the end of five years he would be required to read the English language and take out full citizenship papers. He should be provided, free of charge, with a copy of the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, a condensed history of the United States, all printed in his own language. His instructions should be to study them, so that when he learns to speak English he should know what they meant. Whenever an immigrant refused to comply he should be returned to his home."

The following proposal has been introduced into Congress:

"Whereas, it is the opinion of a large majority of the people of this country that the working classes should not be employed more than eight hours a day; and whereas, also, it is believed that by shortening the hours of labour, it would not only give employment to a greater number of people, but, by adding time to the hours of leisure and recreation, would improve the people mentally, physically, and morally; and whereas the uniform eight hour law is difficult to enforce, for reason of diversity of interest, and for the further reason that the manufacturers cannot well establish an eight hour system in their factories unless other manufacturers, in the same line of business, establish the same rule; therefore it is desirable that Congress should have full information on the subject, in order to proceed intelligently if possible to bring about at as early date as possible an eight hour law."

Nothing will come of it.

How dangerous it is to argue the labour question in the South from the following occurrence:

Mr. G. F. Rich, a Boston drummer, selling a patent smoothing iron for giving a gloss to laundried linen, was severely whipped by White Caps at Laurens, S. C. on Tuesday night. Mr. Rich was in Laurens selling his irons, which are principally purchased by negro washwomen. As a mode of advertising his patent, so as to reach the coloured people, it is customary for him to hire a church in each town he visits to address the people upon the merits of his chattels. On Monday evening, Mt. Pisgah Coloured Presbyterian Church at Laurens was rented by Mr. Rich, and the building was crowded with negroes. Before speaking of the advantages of the iron Mr. Rich gave his audience a lecture on temperance and morality. On Tuesday morning a negro who attended the meeting told the white citizens that a man was preaching nightly at the church to negroes, advising them to strike for higher wages and to refuse to work on Sunday. The whites, after receiving this information, organised a party to take the drummer in charge, and on Tuesday night, after the address at the church, Mr. Rich was stopped on the streets while he was returning to the hotel by a band of about twenty masked men, who severely whipped him with switches.

The "Werner Printing and Lithographing Company" in Akron, Ohio, demands of the Attorney (Edmund Furthmann) and ex-Captain of Police (Mike Schaack) 1,000 dols., as well as the money for a bill of exchange amounting to 478 dols. 63 cents. The 1,000 dols. were lent in cash, and the 478 dols. 63 cents. were spent for printing Schaack's book on "Anarchy and Anarchists." Schaack and Furthmann are known for the part they took in the great Anarchist trial in Chicago in 1886.—Five years ago to-day Louis Riel, the leader of the half-breeds rebellion in Canada, was defeated at Batouche by the military under the command of General Sir Frederick Middleton. That Middleton stole everything he could lay his hands on during the suppression of the poor half-breeds' rising has long been well known. The ministry constantly refused to act in the matter. But the stink resulting from the brave general's doings became so great that something had to be done. A motion has been to-day accepted by the Canadian Parliament censuring the general, and condemning him to pay 4,500 dols.—Such are the pillars of our society; no wonder that it is tottering.

The organisation of the small bosses in Chicago has settled with the striking carpenters. The following agreement was arrived at:

1. The working day shall be eight hours.
2. The pay shall be by the hour, and the minimum rate of wages shall be 35 cents per hour until the 1st day of August next, and from and after that date 37½ cents per hour.
3. Each of the associations, the Boss Carpenters and Builders and the United Carpenters' Council, shall at its annual meeting elect a standing committee of arbitration, consisting of five members, to serve for one year. The two committees shall meet and proceed to organise into a joint committee on arbitration by electing an umpire who is neither a mechanic nor an employer of mechanics. The working year shall commence on the 1st of April of each year, and end on the 31st day of the next March.
4. All working foremen shall be selected by the contractors, and shall be their representatives.
5. The members of the Boss Carpenters' and Builders' Association are to retain all apprentices now under service. The term of apprenticeship to be three years.

This organisation can only employ 4,000 men; 3,000 strikers are yet without employment, as the big bosses desire to fight it out to the bitter end.

In New York all the bosses have given in. Here in Boston the carpenters are yet out. In most cities the carpenters continue to work nine and ten hours. On the whole it may be said that even the carpenter movement for an eight-hour day was a failure. Those who only work eight hours are allowed to work overtime "when business requires it."

Of the demand of the coal miners for eight hours, which is the next thing on the programme of the American Federation, Mr. Gompers said on the 8th inst., "I cannot tell whether the strike will occur before the fall or not, if there is to be a strike, which is extremely doubtful, for I believe the employers will consent. We will give them due notice, as we did in the case of the carpenters, and I believe the result will be just as gratifying."

GENERAL LABOUR NOTES.

By Associated Labour Press.

Washington (Pa.) plasterers won 3 dols. and nine hours.
Boston steam-fitters were granted nine hours; no cut in pay.
New Haven masons refused 43 cents. an hour; they want 45.
Railway street labourers at St. Paul won 1 dol. 50 cents. a day.
Bridgeport (Conn.) painters won nine hours, and ten hours pay.
Lowell building labourers won the demand for 22½ cents an hour.
The San Francisco brewers have an emergency fund of 6,000 dols.
Chicago dockmen want eight hours and 25 cents an hour, instead of 20.
St. Paul gutter-layers now get 30 cents per yard; last year only 18 cents.
Chicago terra-cotta workers and the stonemasons have worked eight hours since 1867.
Carpenters' Branch No. 291 will expel any member who works more than eight hours hereafter.
Furniture workers at San Francisco on outside work will be fined 5 dols. a day for working over eight hours.
West Superior (Wis.) coal-heavers struck for 50 cents. an hour for work in the hold and 2 dols. a day for dockmen.
Chicago painters have been working eight hours since 1886. They are organising to get from 30 to 35 cents an hour.
San Francisco brewers won 1 dol. a week advance and nine hours. In 1886 these men worked fourteen hours for less pay.
St. Louis harness makers struck for 15 per cent advance. They were making from 6 dols. to 15 dols. a week. One firm granted the advance at once.
During the month ending Saturday last, charters and supplies were issued by the General Secretary of the Knights of Labour to forty-nine local assemblies.
The Coal Shovelers' and Stone Handlers' Protective Union has ordered a strike against the Hurricane Isle Granite Company, for refusing to discharge a number of "scabs." About 150 men are on strike.

To Help the Paper.—There are several ways in which you can help to spread the Weal. Ask your newsagent to try and sell it. Get those who don't care to buy it week by week to subscribe direct. Arrange for the posting of contents bills anywhere you can. Any number of other plans will suggest themselves if you think about it.

Postal Propaganda.—Some who would like to do propaganda but dare not openly, or who cannot spare the time to do it personally, can find many ways in which it can be done quietly. Not the least useful among possible plans would be to order and pay for a number of copies to be sent to persons in whose hands they might do good. We will send six copies to six different addresses for 7d. Write the names and addresses legibly.

DO YOU AGREE?

Do you agree with us that the social awakening of the workers is a desirable end? Do you agree with us that we are working in the right way to achieve that end?

You do not? Then oppose us and prove us wrong on every platform and in every paper to which you can gain access!

You do agree? Then work with us and for us; help us to extend our circle of influence; let no day pass in which you have not interested some one in our propaganda!

There is no middle course for an honest man!

NOTES.

THE West End scandals have now been wound up to the satisfaction alike of the wealthy criminals most intimately concerned and their accomplices in the present Government. Newton the solicitor—who was charged with getting inconvenient witnesses out of the way and assisting the notorious Hammond to escape to America—has been let off with six week's imprisonment.

Some perverse people may call this "a shameful miscarriage of justice." But look at the services which Mr. Newton endeavoured to render "Society." As it is he has enabled some rich men to feel quite easy in their minds concerning the possibility of a police prosecution, and if he had been quite successful who knows but that Lord Arthur Somerset might have returned to bless a virtuous, pure, and immaculate Society with the delight of his aristocratic presence?

Please admire English "justice." Poor Parke is condemned to twelve months' hard labour, an even heavier doom than that of the vile wretches who were the tools of the real criminals, who escape all punishment because they are rich and hold a high position; while Newton, the smug solicitor, gets six weeks, which he will probably pass in the hospital on account of his "delicate health," with plenty of wine and nourishing food, because he has done his best to shield these "most respectable men."

What lesson do our governing classes mean to teach us by this? That all attempts to show up aristocrat and capitalist in their true colours will be punished with the utmost rigour of the law; but that if you cover up the crimes of wealthy criminals you will be let off with a trifling punishment for your "zeal and indiscretion"; while righteous magistrates, Liberal barristers, Conservative Attorney-Generals, and impartial judges will announce in a unanimous chorus their "high opinion of you in your professional character." Thus you will also become a "most respectable man," a "Pillar of Society." But let the "libeller" who tells the truth, that "Enemy of Society," beware. He shall feel the weight of that law which defends the rich and keeps the poor in their proper places.

The Government and the upper classes may rejoice in their triumph. The chief criminals have escaped. Those that were caught—much against the will of the officers of the law, who gave them plenty of time to clear out—are let off lightly, for fear they take a line of defence which might end in awkward disclosures. But despite every effort to hush up the hideous scandal, its details are proclaimed from the house tops. Although the names of all concerned are not known, yet this is known, that rich men, worn out with ordinary vice and depravity, have spent lavishly their ill-gotten wealth in a horrible vice which has only flourished in cities and empires when ruin or revolution was approaching. It was the vice which flourished in old Rome in her worst days of corruption, before the Goths and Huns swept down upon her, gave her palaces to the flames, and covered her streets with corpses; in Paris before the great Revolution, or in the closing days of the Second Empire. Everywhere it has announced that corruption has become putrescent, and that the end of that society draws near. Policemen, lawyers, magistrates, judges, and rulers may unite to whitewash the sepulchre, we can still smell the stench of the dead bones, and for the sake of all it may soon be necessary to make a clearance.

Before quitting the subject, I would like to point out the cowardly way in which Mr. Parke has been abandoned by the Star. There cannot be any doubt that his action concerning these scandals was endorsed, to say the least of it, by the editor of that paper, who probably didn't care to run the risk of prosecution himself. Yet the Star has not said a word concerning the scandalous contrast between the sentences passed upon Newton and Parke. Is this the result of fresh instructions from the heads of the Liberal party to their humble servant, T. P. O'Connor? Do these gentlemen recognise that the West-end scandals are quite as likely to ruin the present society as even the Tory Government? Probably this is the case, but one consolation is that the treason of the Star is being found out by the people, who do not love papers that are not only treacherous and cowardly, but carry toadyism to such an extent that they will abandon their own friends to please the official heads of the Liberal party.

Mr. Balfour has been at his old games again. Meetings held at Tipperary and Cashel have been dispersed by main force, and the people brutally bludgeoned. The Liberal press, especially the Daily News, is very indignant at these unheard-of atrocities. These things never occur in England—or at least we are never treated to journalistic indignation, at seven guineas a column, concerning them. It is true that lately a few processions may have been broken up in London by the police with a certain amount of violence. But these were only processions of English workmen, and the Liberal press has no costly indignation to throw away in their case. We suppose that won't prevent the English workmen cheering till he is hoarse at next general election for the very party which has agreed to systematically boycott all mention of his wrongs.

CULTURE AND SOCIALISM.

At the close of a Socialist meeting the other evening, the word "culture" was mentioned, upon which a Socialist present declared that Socialism suffers from too much "culture" in some of its adherents. I was constrained to reply that, on the contrary, Socialism suffers from the want of "culture" in Socialists; and thinking it over, it seemed to me that this "culture" is a matter very well worth discussing. Hence this paper.

On my way home from the meeting, I tried to hit upon a figure which would put the subject of Socialism and Culture plainly; and this is what occurred to me. There are two men waiting at a railway-station where the line is blocked; they are both going to the same city, and are waiting until the way is clear. So far, they are in one and the same position. But these travellers have rather different ends to serve when they reach the city of their desire. The one, on his arrival, will make his way to a beautiful home he knows of, the inmates of which are handsome, well-conducted people, whom he will join in their useful and pleasant work, their spirited and good-tempered intercourse, their singing, music, and dancing, their literature and art. The other traveller's object is little more than to get away from where he is now. He has vague ideas of having a more or less idle time, varied with enjoyments such as commend themselves more particularly to the companions of the ale-bench.

In these two men we have represented two kinds of Socialists. The first is the Socialist whose desire to escape from the present social conditions is exceeded by his longing to enter a society where the noble life he has imagined would be lived in all its fulness. The second is the Socialist whose motive is nothing more than to avoid the restraints, privations, and humiliations he suffers at present, without much thought of how he is to live when once these are thrown off and he has his freedom.

Now, I want to make it clear that the first Socialist is a man who has culture, and that the second is a man who lacks culture. Also, that the condition of mind (intellect, soul—as you please) of the former is much more desirable than the condition of mind of the latter. Also, that it is not only desirable, but a pressing duty, for every Socialist to make himself, or herself, as much as possible a person of culture.

When we speak of anything being in a state of culture, we mean that Man has caused that thing to grow in a way that is more desirable to him, Man, than Nature's own unassisted way. Thus the little hard and sour crab, that sets the teeth on edge and produces colic, has, by cultivation, become the juicy and sweet apple, a common dainty and a valued food. This art of cultivation—an art with several names, such as breeding, training, etc.—this art of causing things to grow in a way more desirable than Nature's unassisted way, is, for his own ease and advancement, applied by Man in many and various ways. Wanting better food and clothing, and help in his labour, he cultivates plants, animals, and fishes, and for the same ends he utilises (we can hardly use the word "cultivates" here) natural forces, by diverting, developing, or accumulating them, and applying them in some desired direction. Man's aim in all this labour of cultivation is that he may live a fuller, securer, and happier life.

But there is one object above all which man finds that he is under the most absolute compulsion to cultivate—namely, himself. Nature, under cultivation, has provided abundance of fine wheat and cattle, of flax and wool, of excellent foods and materials; but man finds he has not the right capacity to appropriate and enjoy the plenty nature and himself have provided. "Man is parcelled out in man"; the individuals of the race, moved one and all by the same needs and desires, rush on the spoil, scrambling in such fashion that some get much too much, a wasteful superfluity; but the most get all too little. "The goods his soul lusted after are departed from him"; instead of ease and plenty, and that general happiness without which the individual cannot be truly happy, man finds he has attained only to riot and want, to uncertainty, to fear and hate between men and men. So, as we have said, man is driven to the cultivation of himself, to the endeavour to shape himself in a way that is more desirable than nature's own unassisted way. And he finds that the part of himself in which he must bring his power of cultivation to bear is his Conduct—his Way of Doing.

Therefore man sets himself this question: What must I aim at in my conduct? The best of men, the heart and brains of the race, give to this question but one, and that a very clear, answer; to this effect: that while the body, the animal part of man, requires certain attention, such as being fed, clothed, and satisfied, the true enjoyment of life lies not in attending to the body, but in developing, exercising, and delighting the mind (the intellect, or soul). This, then, is the aim of our conduct,—to have in a satisfied body, a free, active, and gratified mind.

Again, the teachings of these best of men, which are the ripe fruit of the race's experience, lay it down (and our own—consciences, shall we say?—confirm it) that such a state of mind is only possible to men who stand in right relations to their fellows. In short, there are certain modes of conduct which we call justice, love; which, unless a man observes and follows, he cannot be said to live his proper life.

The root-difference between the two kinds of Socialists may now be plainly pointed out; the one desires merely the satisfaction of the body, the other adds to that the supreme desire of developing, exercising, and delighting the mind (intellect, or soul), and seeks as a first condition the establishment of a new society that shall be just, harmonious, and peaceable. And it is only by, and for, such Socialists that a regenerated society is possible. The others, who wish merely to escape from their present pains, are themselves not rid of the spirit which makes society what it now is.

I have spoken of "culture," using the term, as I believe, according to its noblest meaning. There is a cant misuse of the word, by which it is applied to the worthless accomplishments, bogus educations, and heartless courtesy which our present society affords. These are about as much the result of true "culture" as are dandelions, thistles, and rushes among plants. But a true culture is that of a spirit trained to justice and love, which makes itself beautifully manifest in all the acts of life.

JOHN C. KENWORTHY.

ALL WEALTH TO LABOUR DOTH BELONG.

AIR—"When Britain really Ruled the Waves" ('IOLANTHE').

LONG since, in every land on earth,
Through night of ages slow,
The Makers of the World have worn
The garb of shame, the crown of thorn,
Their heritage of woe;
Nor knew they yet that, spite of wrong,
All wealth to Labour doth belong.

But lo, the world is born anew,
The time is gone for tears;
New hopes within our bosoms rise,
New visions float before our eyes,
New voices fill our ears;
And this the burden of our song—
All wealth to Labour doth belong.

And when the Promised Land is won,
And Tyranny is banned,
And all are friends, and all are free,
And none so poor in soul to be
A burden in the land,
We shall not need to sing the song
All wealth to Labour doth belong.

C. W. BECKETT.

THE LOSS OF INDIVIDUALITY.

It is wonderful, says the Journal of the Knights of Labour, how solicitous the capitalistic press is, lest the labour movement and the measures leading to a more equitable system of social organisation should "destroy individuality" and ruin the worker's sense of "personal independence." When every economic argument against labour reform has been exhausted the advocates of letting things alone always fall back on this time-worn objection. They do not seem to understand that the economic changes now going on with such startling rapidity, that the people have not as yet had time to take stock of their position, have already deprived their argument of any validity it ever might have possessed by making "individuality" in the old-fashioned sense of the word a thing of the past. There is no such thing possible to-day for nine-tenths of labouring humanity. Individuals who are dependent on their exertions, either of body or mind, for a living, are becoming more and more parts of a great social and industrial machine. Their sphere of independent action and volition as bread-winners is becoming continually narrowed. Labourer, employer, trader, and professional man alike are becoming increasingly dependent on circumstances and conditions—more moulded by their surroundings and less able to make any independent headway or step outside the groove marked out for them. The man who does not get adjusted to his place in the social machine and work in harmony with its movement will be crushed out by it. Under these conditions it is nonsense to talk of "individualism" in the sense in which the term was used before these days of high-pressure organisation and concentrated capital. While the individualist Rip Van Winkles are deprecating the possibility of its destruction by labour organisations and "Socialist" legislation, it is being destroyed before their eyes by modern conditions of production and exchange. The absolute dependence of the great majority of mankind upon the social mechanism for the means of existence makes it clear that the masses must either control the machinery or become its slaves. Either we must have co-operation—international ownership of all the means of production—or the pressure will become greater, the competition among workers keener, and the monopolist will rule supreme.

What a mockery it is to prate of the blessings of "individuality" and the glories of personal liberty and independence to poor wretches who are the slaves of modern economic conditions, and are compelled by the ever-present dread of poverty to toil unremittingly for a mere pittance! The pictures drawn by capitalistic writers of the "tyranny of a majority"—"the new despotism," as Herbert Spencer calls it—have no terrors for men who are already virtually enslaved by conditions which enable the monopoliser of the means of employment to impose his own terms on the proletariat. The cant about "individuality" and "independence" has no meaning in the ears of the worker who realises that only through more perfect social adjustments, which will systematise production and let the whole people control all industrial enterprises, can a gleam of hope or an opportunity of real freedom come to the wage-slave.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

To those who have obtained copies of the Commonweal through the propagandist work of our comrades, by free distribution in the streets and public conveyances, or by purchase at our outdoor stations, we ask if in agreement with our principles to help the sale of the Commonweal by ordering it of their newsagents, and sending on to us the names of newsagents willing to sell it; and still better, as our outdoor work is for the present reduced, by joining the local branches and helping on the work.

THE NORTH KENSINGTON BRANCH appeal to comrades and friends for their Band Fund. They have the offer of getting drums very cheap from a band that has become defunct, and want to raise about £2 4s. for this purpose. Please send subscriptions to Mrs. Fox, Clarendon Coffee Tavern, Clarendon Road.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The International Miners' Conference.

On of the best signs of the times for the working classes in all lands was the International Conference of Miners which met on Tuesday May 20th at Joliment in Belgium. The boldest, the noblest and best of workers, the men upon whose skill and courage the whole industry of the modern world depends, have joined together—disregarding frontiers, throwing aside those race prejudices which it is the aim of the capitalist classes in all countries to stir up between the peoples—and have determined to strive for their emancipation in the only way by which it can be obtained—by the united action of the workers of the world. It surely did not injure the meaning of the meeting that on this auspicious occasion the dying voice of old-fashioned trade-unionism should be heard giving its last feeble croak, when Mr. Burt, who had been elected to the presidency of the Congress, probably on account of his age and general harmlessness, delivered an oration which was certainly not of a militant description. Fancy the president of a Trade Union Congress saying that “he was not prepared to condemn strikes without qualification”!! I fail to see why a workman should “condemn” strikes at all, as they are practically the only weapon that the workman has to redress his wrongs. However, Mr. Burt recommends that before a strike the workmen should try “conciliation and arbitration.” Unfortunately, the English workman has tried it and he finds it don't pay. If “conciliation and arbitration” are such excellent things, how comes it that the report of the Miners Federation of Great Britain presented to the Conference states that “this Federation does not approve of sliding-scale boards of arbitration, and conciliation as at present understood and practised”? Arbitration and conciliation usually means calling in capitalists to decide between other capitalists and their men, and most of the miners have found out that rogue generally sticks by rogue, and that the men get the worst of it. It is true that in Durham and Northumberland, where Mr. Burt's association, the Miners' National Union, holds sway, the leaders of the union are so fond of arbitration and conciliation that according to their report to the Conference, they have allowed the boys employed to work ten and in some cases eleven hours a-day, while the men have only worked seven. We could not have a better illustration of the selfish individualism which is advocated by trade-union leaders of the old school. Each for himself and the devil take the hindmost is the motto of these gentlemen, and they have acted up to it in the most thorough manner.

Mr. Burt then proceeded to treat the Continental workers to a homily on the wickedness and violence, expressing at the same time a firm belief in the good intentions of the German Emperor. We can judge how much these “good intentions” are worth by the evidence of the German delegates at the Conference, who stated that their contingent was much smaller than it would have been but for the coercive laws in Germany. These laws did not allow of combination, and there had been great difficulty in raising voluntary subscriptions to send those who were present, owing to the fact that all who subscribed were liable to three months' imprisonment with hard labour. It would be heresy to doubt the “earnest desire” of the young despot “to improve the condition of the wealth producers” after this. As to Mr. Burt's objection to violence, all we can say is that such damnable tyranny justifies any means that may be used for its removal. Perhaps if it had not been for the courage and determination of the men who fought the battle of “free combination” in England years and years before the Miners' National Union was formed, and who didn't always use the most “constitutional means” considering that “outrage and riot” were the weapons that frequently brought the masters to their senses, Mr. Burt might not be preaching “law-'n'-order” to the Continental workers. No one loves “violence” for its own sake, but under such conditions as prevail in Continental countries it is the only resource left to the oppressed and downtrodden workmen. These men know their own business best, and they have no need of sleepy sermons from the friend of tyrannical despots and “Liberal” statesmen to teach them their duty.

We are glad to see that the Continental workers have taken up Keir Hardie's proposition of a universal strike of miners on May 1st, 1891, for the Eight Hours' Day so heartily. Of course, as we expected, the opposition came from the very gentlemen who are always so fond of telling the workers to get the eight hour day by their own action. Now the only practical way of obtaining eight hours by their own organisation is pointed out to them they shrink back. We leave the people to judge of the sincerity of the advice these gentlemen have so often given.

The Tram and Bus Men.

There is hope for these workers at last; John Burns is going to re-organise their union. We believe he is the best man for the work, and if the men show sufficient courage and determination, there is no doubt that in a few months they will be able to demand something more than a “Twelve Hour Day.” Let them join the union in every district in London, let there be no hanging back, and success is certain.

The Wood and Cardboard Box-Makers.

These workers have formed a trade union. The workmen employed in this trade number about 20,000. They complain of the employment of boys to perform the work of men, and also of the excessive use of machinery, which is tended by boys. The average number of hours worked by men in the trade is thirteen, and they are by no means overpaid. There are no fixed wages. The men claim shorter hours of labour, reduction of the working hours to fifty-four and a half a-week, and that improvement in their workshops which seems now to be a key-note in the demands of every workmen's organisation.

Trouble at Beckton.

It seems likely that there will be serious trouble at the Beckton Gas Works, S.E., where between 4,000 and 5,000 men are employed, consequent upon the introduction by the company of mechanical stokers, each one of which does the work of three men in charging and drawing the retorts, and which steam day and night without intermission. The strikers call the machine the “iron man.” There is a partial strike against the machine, and the places of the men who have struck have been taken by blacklegs. A strong force of police are upon the spot to protect these sneaks. The gas-stokers, as we all know, gained the eight hour day a year ago. It has not taken the company long to take away the advantage gained by the men by the introduction of machines which will probably turn thousands of gas-stokers into the street. Yet if these men grew desperate and smashed the machinery, we suppose the respectable middle class would exclaim against their “wickedness and stupidity” in rebelling against the “benefits” which the present commercial age bestows upon the working classes. Surely this incident should teach us that the reduction of the hours of labour to eight a-day will not permanently benefit the working classes, and that their only salvation lies in laying hold of machinery and all the means of production, and using them for the good of all, and not for the profit of greedy capitalists. This is the only true remedy for the misery of the people.

Government Dockyard Men.

The agitation among Government dockyard men for better pay and hours has acquired very serious proportions at Pembroke Dock. All the skilled labourers, including riveters, painters, drillers, etc., on Wednesday marched up 400 strong to the Chief Constructor's office, and demanded to see the revised list of payment. They declined to leave the office until they knew the answer of the Chief Constructor, who said that the Admiralty had prevented him from complying with their request. Afterwards the men held a public meeting, under the auspices of the union, at which it was stated that the rivet boys in the dockyard were almost worked to death. They were hardly paid enough to buy bread. It was a difficult thing to find healthy boys in the yard. Most of them had some physical ailment or deformity. The secretary of the union has been severely reprimanded by the authorities for writing to papers about the dockyard men's grievances. He was told by these gentlemen that a workman is not allowed to make public anything relating to the dockyard. A resolution was ultimately passed urging the Government to form a select committee, who shall receive delegates from among various branches of workmen in the dockyards of the country to represent their grievances.

How to make Money.

There can be no doubt that the masters have made their pile during the last year or two. The Labour Tribune says: “The Ferndale Collieries are being transferred from their present owner to a limited liability company, with a capital of £775,000. In connection with the conversion, a statement of the profits for some years past has been made. It is officially stated that the average profits for some years past have been £65,000 annually, while those for the current year are about £100,000. A profit of £2,000 is a respectable return upon invested capital, and these collieries seem a kind of gold mine for their owners.” We should think so! And remember that though the men who work in this mine are wretchedly paid, yet directly the next trade depression arrives down will come their wages. They will have to starve on a scanty pittance, while the mine-owners feast luxuriously upon the wealth gained by the labour of the men during the past period of prosperity. How much longer will the workers bear this so patiently? N.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SIR,—I can heartily endorse the closing sentences of J. M. B.'s article in last week's Commonweal, where he commends the power of “isolated” Socialists, and that “a word in season has often more real influence than many an applauded speech at a public meeting,” and to that I can emphatically subscribe, as my own personal experience has shown. For instance, in the works where I am presently employed, a strike having taken place, a sympathetic notice of it appeared in the labour column of your paper; I bought a copy of it, and since then (about three years ago) I have always continued to do, and I have either read the various articles aloud to groups of my fellow-workmen or given them copies to take home and read themselves, and in that way have sown the good seed in a quiet way; and I am glad to say, seeing that we live in a very hotbed of Radicalism, with a considerable amount of success. I also see in the same number a note by J. B. Glasier, in which he regrets the apparent falling off in point of membership and energy of some of the members of the local branches. I trust that this note of mine will give him some heart of grace, and that, in the words of M. Reclus, “though hundreds by the hard necessities of life are hindered from openly avowing their opinions, still they listen from afar, and cherish your words in the treasury of their hearts.”—Yours, etc. W. L. M.

THE ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

OUR sixth Annual Conference took place last Sunday at the Communist Club, 49 Tottenham Street. Fourteen delegates represented the various metropolitan and provincial branches. Comrade E. C. Chapman, Liverpool Socialist Society, was elected to the chair, and comrades Becket and Brookes secretaries. The verification of credentials of the delegates and the taking of reports came next in the order of business. Comrade Morris then opened the discussion on Commonweal and the financial position of the League. The various points of the agenda then came under discussion; 1, 3, 4, and 6 were passed as submitted; 2 and 5 were somewhat modified. One notable feature of this Conference was that the delegates were saved the trouble of confirming any new rules, as the late Council had sense enough to make none. The election of Council, Editors, and Trustees, and other business, having been gone through, the comrades adjourned to tea, which was served to the entire satisfaction of all who sat down. When tea was over, Mrs. Tochatti sang a few revolutionary airs, which were rendered with great effect. Comrade Coulon gave “La Carmagnole” in French.

The new Council elected are:—Comrades Morris, J. Turner, Cantwell, Bullock, Brookes, Kitz, Nicoll, Webb, Wess, Tochatti, Mainwaring, Catterson Smith, Netlow, Tarleton, and Mowbray. Kitz and Nicoll were elected as Editors and Trustees.

In the evening, the Hall at 24, Great Queen Street, was filled with comrades, who passed a very agreeable social evening. The more enthusiastic carried on the festivities till the dawn of day. A. BROOKES.

SONG OF THE RESPECTABLES.

RESPECTABLES are we
And you presently shall see
Why we confidently claim to be respected ;
In well-ordered homes we dwell,
And discharge our duties well—
Well dressed, well fed, well mannered, well connected.

We detest the common cant
About poverty and want,
And all that is distressing and unhealthy :
Certain cases may be sad,
Yet the system can't be bad,
If it gives such satisfaction—to the wealthy.

As the Times each day we read,
We realise the need
Of more and more coercion for the masses ;
And we muse with wondering awe
On the sanctity of Law—
As administered and construed by the Classes.

We stigmatise Home Rule
As device of knave and fool,
And reform as but a cloak for revolution ;
Our concern is not for self,
Not for property nor pelf,
Oh, no—but for the British Constitution !

And in truth not all for that ;
For in sable coat and hat
We never fail to flock to church each Sunday,
That with renovated zest,
And conscience rocked to rest,
We may yield our hearts to Mammon on the Monday.

So our wealth, which grows apace,
Is the outward sign of grace,
As property goes step by step with piety ;
In the present world we thrive,
Then we save our souls alive,
And move for evermore in good society.

Thus on through life we march,
Stiff with decency and starch,
Well dressed, well fed, well mannered, well connected ;
For Respectables are we,
Yes, and now you all can see
Why we confidently claim to be respected.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

NOTES ON NEWS.

No Compensation! is becoming a popular watchword. No Compensation to Irish landlords! No Compensation to English publicans! are both cries with which you are certain to stir the people.

"Why should we compensate the publican? Why should we reward a man for spreading misery, disease, prostitution, and death broadcast among the people?" say our temperance friends. Quite right, too. We certainly should not reward any person for doing mischief. In fact, our obvious duty to society is to stop him at his evil work by every means in our power. But is the publican the only person who is engaged in cheating, starving, poisoning, degrading, and murdering the people? Look around you and see.

Think of our friend the Irish landlord, and what has been his work. Living idly on the rack rents wrung mainly from a starving peasantry, who starve not because they are idle, oh dear no! If starvation always followed idleness how would the landlord get on? No, they starve because they are industrious; and though they toil like slaves upon the soil yet they only get a bare existence, while the wealth produced from the land goes into the pockets of the landlord, who grows fat and flourishing upon pillage and plunder.

But the Irish landlord is not the only robber, is not the only tyrant. In England, Ireland, Scotland, and throughout the civilised world, peasants and agricultural labourers alike are ground down to the lowest depths of misery, ground down to such wretchedness that everywhere they flock into the towns to escape from it, to fall into the hands of the sweater, or to be used as blacklegs by a Norwood or a Livesey to cut the throats of their brother workmen in the towns. Those who read the papers will remember that at the time of the gas strike an agricultural labourer, who had been brought up to London as a blackleg, was asked by one of the pickets "Why he came to take the places of men who were only struggling for their rights?" What did he reply, "At the place I have just left I was earning 2s. a day; my place is open now, and you can go there and take it, if you like!" Such is the enviable condition of the workers on the soil, who slaves his heart out for this scanty wage, that the wealth he produces may yield rent to an idle land thief.

Let us think now, have we named all those who live upon the plunder of the poor? Some of the very people who are rich and respectable, and who are ready enough to lead crusades against landlord or publican, are not in such a very sinless condition themselves that they can afford to cast stones at others. Pious philanthropists like the late Samuel Morley, for instance, who are foremost in "temperance and gospel work," and yet who pay their workwomen such wretched wages that they are driven upon the street to sell their bodies to get bread. These people, at least, have no right to exclaim against landlord or publican.

After all, is the publican alone responsible for drunkenness and the miseries that sometimes flow from it? In the case, for instance, of girls driven upon streets by pious and philanthropic capitalists like Samuel Morley and Messrs. Bryant and May? These poor girls drink to forget the horrors of the horrible and unnatural life into which they have been forced by "pious and godly men"; and strange as it may appear, perhaps the drink after all is perhaps a better friend to them than the good men above mentioned. It is the beneficent spirit which makes tolerable for a few moments the hell into which these girls have been thrust by these sublime moralists in the struggle for fortune.

I wonder, also, if the sweated worker, doomed to a long lingering life of hopeless toil, slaving fourteen hours a-day in a close, unwholesome garret, is much to blame, after all, if he reawakens his exhausted vitality by drinking long and hard. If the lives of the slaves of the present system could be made bright and happy, without exhausting toil, with cheerful homes, and those rational pleasures which are now denied them, and with enough to eat and drink would not the vice of drunkenness gradually disappear? But how could they gain all this? There is but one way—to sweep away the idlers who live upon the plunder of labour. This is the remedy for the poverty which creates the drunkard and the prostitute.

Let us consider the whole social question. Look upon those splendid mansions, those gorgeous palaces that surround Hyde Park on all sides. Who live in them? The workers who built them? Are they for the only useful part of society? No, they are built for grinding landlords and sweating capitalists by the workers, in the same way as the workers pile up their fortunes for them, leaving for themselves only misery, squalor, wretchedness, and hunger. And when workers and idlers stand face to face; when the people, as they will surely do, demand their own, the land and the wealth which they have produced, will they talk of "compensation" to these idle rich thieves? No, they will not. They will say, "No compensation! Down with the plunderers of the poor! If they want compensation they shall be paid with steel and lead. That is the only compensation they will get from us."
D. N.

DOWN A COAL PIT.

FIVE o'clock in the morning! If we are to catch the "Paddy Mail" we must turn out quickly, for it will leave the station in half an hour. So we hasten up, snatch a mouthful of breakfast, and sally forth into the chill morning air. We are soon mingling in a crowd of men and boys hurrying in the same direction as ourselves, and carrying with them their grub in all manner of tins, baskets, or handkerchiefs. The clatter of their clogs, or ironshod boots, echoes through the silent streets with a hollow sound; and the disturbed sleeper curls himself up snugly again, with a feeling of satisfaction that he will not need to put in an appearance until the streets "have been aired a little." Arrived at the station we all pack into the workman's train, or "Paddy Mail" as it is mostly called, presumably on account of the number of Erin's sons who patronise it. Our compartment has evidently not seen a paint brush for many years, and we sit on rough boards, which doubtless once were cushioned—but that was long ago, when the carriage moved amongst the aristocratic rolling-stock on the main line; it has gone down in the world since then, and is now serving its last purpose before being broken up for fire-wood. We also become conscious of a scarcity of glass in the windows, which is only poorly compensated for by a piece of flapping "brattis cloth," that is doing its best to keep out the cold wind. After half-an-hour's ride we arrive at the colliery which is our destination, and find that the men who live hard by have already commenced to go down.

While the rest are being lowered and getting to work, we go to look at some of the machinery on the surface. We see the smoothly running fan-engine exhausting the foul air from the pit, and causing a constant fresh supply to rush down the other shaft. It never stops except for repairs; night and day it drives the great forty foot fan, the beating of whose blades makes the air dither with a curious vibration. We go on past the long nest of boilers, which the firemen are feeding with coal, into the winding-engine house. There we stand some time watching the great engines with their iron arms turning away at the large drum, upon one side of which the steel wire rope is steadily coiling, while from the other it is uncoiling. One turn of the drum raises or lowers the rope twenty yards or more, and half a turn too much would send the cage full of men up into the head-gear; if the safety hook was to hold good there they would hang, but if not—well, it would be four hundred and twenty yards to the bottom! We look with some interest at the engine-man, to whom we shall presently entrust our lives, and are astonished at the easy and apparently careless way he handles the massive engines. The bell rings; with one hand he puts down the reversing lever, with the other he gives a jerk at the throttle valve, and off she goes; he sits unconcernedly watching the finger on the dial. As it approaches the end he gently raises the lever and steadies her a bit, then clang goes the indicator bell—only one more turn; the lever is raised a little more; clang again, another slight jerk of the lever, a whiff of steam against her, and she comes to a stop within an inch or two; all done with the reversing lever, the brake is never touched except in case of emergency. Then the driver turns round with a casual remark about the weather, showing a kindly face with a bushy beard and a quiet self-possessed look, which inspires confidence at once.

But it is time for us to be going below; so we bid the engine-man good-morning, and getting each a safety-lamp we soon stand by the pit ready for descending. The banksman rings three to the onsetter below, that means there are men to go down; he replies, one, two, three, and will keep the other cage empty; a few seconds and we get the signal one, "All right," and are allowed to step into the cage, an iron structure about 9 ft. by 3 ft. with two decks; there is just room to stand upright in the deck we enter. The signal is given to the engine-man, we are raised an inch or two to free the props on which the cage has been resting, then drop. Down we go into the darkness, faster and faster, while the air rushes upwards past us and we feel as if our hearts were rapidly rising into our mouths; we begin to wonder whether we are not falling loose, certainly we cannot feel our feet! Still faster we go; then, like a flash, past goes the other cage at the speed of an express train; two or three seconds more and we begin to have a sense of standing on our feet again; in fact, so great is the contrast that we seem to be going up! But no, the light on the side shows us that we are still descending; then for the first time we really feel that we are hanging, and as we steady down we feel every check of the engine by a sort of elastic pull on the rope, until a faint light appears and we gently rest on the bottom, having dropped four hundred and twenty yards in 35 seconds. It seems very dark, and we are led into a little cabin to collect our senses, and get our eyes accommodated to the dim light of the safety lamps; and a poor dim light it is after the morning sunshine which we have just left! Small wonder that the men would rather run the risk of working with a naked tallow dip than use a safety lamp.

We are each provided with a little leather cap to protect our heads from bumps, and a short stick to walk with, and then we set out towards the face, which lies nearly half a mile away. For the first few yards there is plenty of head room, and the roof is nicely arched with brick; but that soon ends, and we have to look out both above and below, which, with the dim light of our lamps, is not so easy. We have not gone far before one of our party collides with a beam a little lower than the rest, and finds himself sitting on the ground rather mixed up with a wire hauling rope which is creeping along between the little tram-lines.

It may be well to explain here that it is usual to cut all roads as far as possible in the coal, partly because it is more easily worked, and partly because the coal got helps to pay for the cutting of the road. The height depends upon the thickness of the seam and the nature of the roof. If a good solid rock comes immediately above the coal that will form a roof, and the road will be cut just the depth of the coal, which in these parts runs generally from four to six feet, though in different districts seams vary from eighteen inches upwards. Very often a thin layer of clod or loose hind lies between the coal and the solid rock, in which case it is cut away too, leaving the rock still for a roof. But in many places there is no safe rock to be come at, then the roof has to be timbered. To do this props of larch are put up on each side with bars of the same wood across the top resting on them, and if necessary rough slabs or planks across these again. Where the roof is bad it is marvellous how these bars, ten or eleven inches thick, will be bent and broken in roads only five or seven feet wide. One may walk for hundreds of yards and see nearly all the bars bent down in the centre, and many of them already splitting in two. Men accustomed to inspect the roads—deputies and underviewers—get to know from the look of the beams and the nature of the roof when they become unsafe; but to a stranger they look rather dangerous, and no doubt very often the line is not drawn far "on the safe side"!

Much has been done by the Mines Regulation Act to make coal pits safer, probably nearly all that can be done in that direction, for already many of the hard-and-fast regulations, by means of which alone a law can be operative, are being resented by the men; and it is often easy to raise in them a spirit of antagonism to the inspectors only less keen than that of the colliery owners. While the profits of the pits, or the earnings of the men, in any way depend on the greater or less margin of safety allowed—which practically means while pits are worked for a profit at all,—it cannot be but that many lives will be lost which might have been saved, and many limbs unnecessarily broken!

We have not travelled far down the plane—the coal is dipping a little here—before we find out the meaning of the wire rope. We hear a great rumbling coming towards us, and hasten to get into one of the refuge holes which are left at intervals along the route; then presently there emerges out of the darkness a long train of thirty tubs, full of coal, being drawn into the pit bottom there to be wound up to the surface. The rope is worked by an engine on the top, and comes down the shaft. When this full train reaches the pit bottom a train of empties will be attached to the rope, and they, running down the incline, will carry the end out ready to draw another full train up. Sometimes, if the roads are nearly level, an endless rope is used which is kept always running; then the tubs are attached to either side, according as they are going out or in, and slipped off again when they reach their destination. Presently we see a light coming towards us, the first we have met since we set off from the little cabin at the bottom of the shaft. It turns out to be a deputy; he is leading a little lad who is crying, his pony has crushed him against the side of the road. He seems but young to be working down in such a place; he may have to go several hundred yards alone with the pony, taking the tubs down to the plane for the rope to haul them out, a mere child twelve or thirteen years old perhaps! Many of them having passed their standards go into the pit at that age; and when they are men some of them will go to night-school to learn again to read and write! Such is British economy.

Resuming our tramp we soon arrive at the bottom of the plane. Here lads are hurrying to and fro with their ponies, bringing the loaded tubs out of the various banks and taking back empties to be filled. We make our way up one of the gates, and are soon at the face watching the actual working of the coal. By this time we are almost accustomed to the dim light of our lamps, and are getting skilled at clearing beams above or rollers and sleepers below; but we find it very trying to our backs to have to walk so much in a half-stooping position, and cease to wonder that so many of the older men look nearly doubled up. Coal-getting is all contract work. A stall, i.e., a part of the face from twenty to forty yards long, is allotted to one or more coal getters, who are paid at so much per ton for all they send out. Under them will be working one or two, and sometimes three or four fillers, who will be paid by the day. The ponies and pony drivers are generally provided and paid directly by the employers. There are a few places, however, where it is customary for a sort of contractor to take a district, comprising several stalls, and to find men, ponies, and everything. But the most usual way is for the colliery owners to provide ponies and lads and pay them directly, while the stall men pay their fillers. But here there is a curious division of authority. The stall men are responsible for, and have to pay their fillers; they have entire control of them while at their work; but generally they have no power either to engage or to get rid of them. A sort of custom in each pit mostly settles the details of the arrangement, as, for instance, how many fillers there shall be in each stall, what they shall be paid, and how much notice shall be taken of complaints about them from the stall men. But in case of any dispute, all authority lies with the manager or his deputies. The manager will settle what the filler shall be paid—though he has not got to pay him. He can send as many fillers into the stall as he thinks well—though the men who have to work it, and who will have to find their wages, may not want so many! So long as custom is sufficiently strong in any pit to regulate these little details, things go on fairly well in spite of the muddle, but a great deal of friction is often caused by it. And probably the arrangement is partly responsible for the abominable way in which some of the stall men nigger-drive their fillers. To the ordinary mind, drilled in modern commercial ideas, to be obliged to employ a man chosen by another, and whose wages are fixed by another, must seem quite a sufficient justification for nigger-driving!

As to wages it must be understood that there is a good deal of variation from district to district, and even between pits comparatively near together. But as things are now, with a total rise of 35 per cent. over the wages which were current a while back, the pony drivers and other lads will get from 1s. 8d. to about 2s. 6d. per day, according to their age, strength, etc., and their ages will vary from twelve to twenty. The fillers may be any age over eighteen, and their wages will run from 4s. 6d. or 4s. 8d. per day upwards; the top wage for old experienced hands, men who have been or could be stall men, is about 5s. 9d. The filler, according to the Act, must work two years at the face before he can take charge of a stall.

(To be concluded.)

THE "STAR" ON CO-OPERATION.

THE Star is greatly charmed at the progress of co-operation. In speaking of Lord Rosebery's speech at the recent congress at Glasgow, it says: "Lord Rosebery had a remarkable tale to tell of the progress of co-operation. A capital of four hundred and ninety-one millions realised in twenty-six years profits amounting to thirty-nine millions, and annual sales of two millions. These are healthy figures. . . . Accumulated capital was pushing co-operators forward; they did not go to the State whining for assistance; and they worked out their own salvation. This is a really noble record of self-help. When Socialists can show results like these, it will be time for them to appeal to the sympathy of the British public."

The profit of thirty-nine millions naturally catches the commercial eye of the editor of the Star. Perhaps it reminds him of the thirty pieces of silver, the price which Judas received for his treason. What was the amount of the subsidy which the Star received from Messrs. Gladstone and Morley for selling the Christ of modern Labour, the mocked, despised, and tortured? Or was it the promise of a free advertisement in Sir William Harcourt's speeches, or the prospect of a nice little sinecure, with a few hundreds yearly, in the next Liberal Government? We should like to know: will T. P. explain in his next issue? It might impart a little interest to a paper which is now as dull, stupid and respectable as the Daily News or the Times.

But let us return to our friends the co-operators. It is perfectly true that we cannot show high profits as the result of our work; but we can at least say we have not taught workmen to sweat their brothers. Can the co-operators say as much? Unlike Mr. T. P. O'Connor, we do not believe that the salvation of the people is to be obtained by the creation of a mass of small tyrants in the shape of peasant proprietors or small shareholders in co-operative factories or stores. And we regret to see a movement which was started by a noble and disinterested Socialist, Robert Owen, should sink into the petty greed of grasping traders or the cold cruel slavery of the infamous sweater. If the present system of co-operation really benefited the people, Lord Rosebery would not preside at these conferences; nor would they have the apostolic benediction of the editor of the Star.

As to the taunt concerning whining to the State for assistance, we leave that to a certain "able editor" in search of a "job." Whatever may be the opinion of the namby-pamby politicians who once pinned their faith to the coat-tails of T. P. O'Connor, we do not believe in State assistance. Nay, some day we may show capacities for "self help" which will considerably astonish capitalist Liberals and the traitorous pa.s.s.i.e.s., who fawn upon them and do their dirty work.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. XVII. (continued).—HOW THE CHANGE CAME.

"BUT the measures passed for the relief of the workers, though to the upper classes they seemed ruinously revolutionary, were not thorough enough to give the people food and a decent life, and they had to be supplemented by unwritten enactments without legality to back them. Although the Government and Parliament had the law-courts, the army and "society" at their backs, the Committee of Public Safety began to be a force in the country, and really represented the producing classes. It began to improve immensely in the days which followed on the acquittal of its members. Its old members had little administrative capacity, though with the exception of a few self-seekers and traitors, they were honest, courageous men, and many of them endowed with considerable talent. But now that the times called for immediate action, came forward the men capable of setting it on foot; and a great network of workmen's associations grew up very speedily, whose avowed object was the tiding over of the ship of the community into a simple condition of Communism; and as they practically undertook also the management of the ordinary labour war, they soon became the mouthpiece and intermediary of the whole of the working classes, and the manufacturing profit-grinders now found themselves powerless before this combination: unless their committee, Parliament, plucked up courage to begin the civil war again, and to shoot right and left, they were bound to yield to the demands of the men whom they employed, and pay higher and higher wages for shorter and shorter day's work. Yet one ally they had, and that was the rapidly approaching breakdown of the whole system founded on the world-market and its supply; which now became so clear to all people that the middle classes, shocked for the moment into condemnation of the Government for the great massacre, turned round nearly in a mass, and called on the Government to look to matters and put an end to the tyranny of the Socialist leaders.

"Thus stimulated, the reactionist plot exploded probably before it was ripe; but this time the people and their leaders were forewarned, and before the reactionaries could get under way had taken the steps they thought necessary.

"The Liberal Government (clearly by collusion) was beaten by the Conservatives, though the latter were nominally much in the minority. The popular representatives in the House understood pretty well what this meant, and after an attempt to fight the matter out by divisions in the House of Commons, they made a protest, left the House, and came in a body to the Committee of Public Safety: and the civil war began again in good earnest.

"Yet its first act was not one of mere fighting. The new Tory Government determined to act, yet durst not re-enact the state of siege, but it sent a body of soldiers and police to arrest the Committee of Public Safety in the lump. They made no resistance, though they might have done so, as they had now a considerable body of men who were quite prepared for extremities. But they were determined to try first a weapon which they thought stronger than street fighting.

"The members of the Committee went off quietly to prison; but they had left their soul and their organisation behind them. For they depended not on a carefully arranged centre with all kinds of checks and counter checks about it, but on a huge mass of people in thorough sympathy with the movement, officered by a great number of links of small centres with very simple instructions. These instructions were now carried out.

"The next morning, when the leaders of the reaction were chuckling at the effect which the report in the newspapers of their stroke would have upon the public—no newspapers appeared; and it was only towards noon that a few straggling sheets, about the size of the gazettes of the seventeenth century, worked by policemen, soldiers, managers, and press-writers, were dribbled through the streets. They were greedily seized on and read; but by this time the serious part of their news was stale, and people did not need to be told that the GENERAL STRIKE had begun. The railways did not run, the telegraph-wires were unserved; flesh, fish, and green stuff brought to market was allowed to lie there still packed and perishing; the thousands of middle-class families, who were utterly dependent for the next meal on the workers, made frantic efforts through their more energetic members to cater for the needs of the day, and amongst those of them who could throw off the fear of what was to follow, there was, I am told, a certain enjoyment of this unexpected picnic—a forecast of the days to come, in which all labour grew pleasant.

"So passed the first day, and towards evening the Government grew quite distracted. They had but one resource for putting down any popular movement—to wit, mere brute-force; but there was nothing for them against which to use their army and police: no armed bodies appeared in the streets; the offices of the federated workmen were now, in appearance at least, turned into places for the relief of people thrown out of work, and under the circumstances they durst not arrest the men engaged in such work; all the more, as even that night many quite respectable people applied at these offices for relief, and swallowed down the charity of the revolutionists along with their supper. So the Government massed soldiers and police here and there—and sat still for that night, fully expecting on the morrow some manifesto from 'the rebels,' as they now began to be called, which would give them an opportunity of acting in some way or another. They were disappointed. The ordinary newspapers gave up the struggle that morning, and only one very violent reactionary paper (called the Daily Telegraph) attempted an appearance, and rated the 'rebels' in good set terms for their folly and ingratitude in tearing out the bowels of their 'common mother,' the English Nation, for the benefit of a few greedy paid agitators and the fools whom they were deluding. On the other hand, the Socialist papers (of which three only, representing somewhat different schools, were published in London) came out full to the throat of well-printed matter. They were greedily bought by the whole public, who, of course, like the Government, expected a manifesto in them. But they found no word of reference to the great subject. It seemed as if their editors had ransacked their drawers for articles which would have been in place forty years before, under the technical name of educational articles. Most of these were admirable and straightforward expositions of the doctrines and practice of Socialism, free from haste and spite and hard words, and came upon the public with a kind of May-day freshness, amidst the worry and terror of the moment; and though the knowing well understood that the meaning of this move in the game was mere defiance, and a token of irreconcilable hostility to the then rulers of society, and though, also, they were meant for nothing else by the rebels, yet they really had their effect as 'educational articles.' However, 'education' of another kind was acting upon them with irresistible power, and probably cleared their heads a little.

"As to the Government, they were absolutely terrified by the act of 'boycotting' (the slang word then current for such acts of abstention). Their counsels became wild and vacillating to the last degree: one hour they were for giving way for the present till they could hatch another plot; the next they all but sent an order for the arrest in the lump of all the workmen's committees; the next they were on the point of ordering their brisk young general to take any excuse that offered for another massacre. But when they called to mind that the soldiery in that 'Battle' of Trafalgar Square were so daunted by the slaughter which they had made that they could not be got to fire a second volley, they shrank back again from the dreadful courage necessary for carrying out another massacre. Meantime the prisoners, brought the second time before the magistrates under a strong escort of soldiers, were the second time remanded.

"The strike went on this day also. The workmen's committees were extended, and gave relief to great numbers of people, for they had organised a considerable amount of production of food by men whom they could depend upon. Quite a number of well-to-do people were now compelled to seek relief of them. But another curious thing happened: a band of young men of the upper classes armed themselves, and coolly went marauding in the streets, taking what suited them of such eatables and portables they came across in the shops which had ventured to open. This operation they carried out in Oxford Street, then a great street of shops of all kinds. The Government, being at that hour in one of their yielding moods, thought this a fine opportunity for showing their impartiality in the maintenance of 'order,' and sent to arrest these hungry rich youths; who, however, surprised the police by a valiant resistance, so that all but three escaped. The Government did not gain the reputation for impartiality which they expected from this move; for they forgot that there were no evening papers; and the account of the skirmish spread wide indeed, but in a distorted form, for it was mostly told simply as an exploit of the starving people from the East-end; and everybody thought it was but natural for the Government to put them down when and where they could."

5TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE INTERNATIONAL WORKING MEN'S CLUB, BERNER STREET, E.

THE 5th Anniversary of the above Club will be celebrated on Sunday, June 8th, 1890, on which occasion a Tea, Concert, and Ball will take place. Wm. Morris will preside, and among others who will address the gathering will be P. Kropotkin, Stepniak, J. Turner, Janovsky, H. Sparling, and Feigénbaum; C. Graham, M.P., and John Burns are also expected. The Hammer-smith choir will render revolutionary songs. To begin at 4 p.m.

Cours Fund.—Amount already acknowledged—£28 18s. 10d. Received—And. Scheu, 5s.; A Friend, 1s. 6d.; Etudiant en Médecine, 2s.; J. Tochatti, 5s.

ERRATUM.—Comrade W. H. Chapman presided over the Annual Conference, not E. C. Chapman, as stated in last week's issue.

SHEFFIELD.—Our comrade Bruce Glasier of Glasgow has been with us during Saturday and Sunday, and gave us some stirring addresses. We held two meetings on Saturday, three on Sunday, and one on Monday, at which about 230 Commonweal were sold, and many more could have been sold had we not sold quite out of the first six quires early on Sunday. A quantity of other literature was sold. Next week we open a campaign in the mining districts; and generally must report splendid progress; fine meetings, growing interest taken in our propaganda by all sections of workers, and a largely increased sale of literature. R. Bingham, J. Bingham, Bullas, and Charles addressed these various meetings, and were opposed at Rotherham by a typical Mr. Stiggins in the shape of a local Methodist parson, who told us we should have equality in heaven, but it was wicked to strive for it here. He further told us that he preached fifty-two Sundays in the year for no payment, but after being pressed by Glasier, he admitted that he received some £100 or so for the other six days in the week for attending to the secular work of the church.—F. CHARLES.

HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON

The COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. For Australia, New Zealand, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Transvaal, and the Argentine Republic, a year, 8s.; six months, 4s.; three months, 2s. For India, Ceylon, China, Hong Kong, and the Straits Settlements, a year, 10s.; six months, 5s.; three months, 2s. 6d.

Subscribers who receive a RED WRAPPER are thereby reminded that their subscriptions have expired and must be renewed immediately if they wish to continue to receive COMMONWEAL.

SPECIAL RECRUIT SUBSCRIPTIONS.—To aid in spreading our principles, the following largely reduced terms are offered to those who obtain new subscribers: Two new yearly subscriptions for British Islands, etc., 10s. 6d.; for Australia, etc., 15s.; for India, etc., 19s. Five new subscriptions: For British Islands, etc., 25s.; for Australia, etc., 37s. 6d.; for India, etc., 47s. 6d. Specimen copies will be sent on receipt of postage.

Remittances from abroad must be made by International Money Order.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

CORRESPONDENTS who order literature should prepay postage, or state if they wish their parcels to be sent per rail or carrier, "carriage forward." To prevent inconvenience, subscribers and friends will please note that the following pamphlets are out of print:—Useful Work v. Useless Toil—Aims of Art—Address to Trades Unions—Organised Labour. These will shortly be reprinted. Speeches of the Chicago Anarchists now in the press. L. H. (Manchester).—'Socialism in England,' by Sydney Webb (Sonnenschein, 12, Paternoster Square; price 2s. 6d.) is probably the work you want.

ANTI-PARLIAMENTARY.

Most of those into whose hands this paper will fall know that as the organ of the Socialist League the Commonweal advocates abstention from Parliamentary action; that the Socialist League neither puts forward candidates, nor advises its members to vote for this that or the other candidate; that the readers of these columns will indeed find Parliament mentioned in them, but never with respect, and most commonly only to point the moral of the corruption of these latter days of capitalism. Our policy is, in short, abstention from all attempts at using the constitutional machinery of government, whereas to some Socialists this seems the only means of bringing us to the verge of the Social Revolution. Now this policy of abstention seems to some mere folly, and perhaps to others seems inexplicable. Let us, then, try to explain it, and leave others to call us fools if they needs must after having listened to our explanation.

What is the purpose of Socialist propaganda? Surely it intends to make it clear to all the working-classes that society (so-called) as it exists to-day, is founded on the robbery of the "lower" classes by the "upper," of the useful by the useless, of the many by the few; that so long as this privileged robbery goes on, those who do all the useful work that is done will be constantly deprived of the refinements of life which are supposed to make the difference between the civilised man and the savage; while their lives will be much more laborious and much more pleasureless than the lives of most savages. In short, thorough discontent with their position and a sense of its unfairness is the first thing we want to impress on the minds of the workers.

Next, we want to make it clear to them that this position of slavery, this unfairness which makes them so wretched and so bitter, is not a necessary condition for those who live by producing the wealth of the country (that is, the only people in it who have a chance of being honest); that these working-men and women could still work, live, and be useful if they were working for each other, that is to say, for their friends and not for their privileged masters, i.e., their enemies.

Again, we have to make it clear to the workers that this privilege of a few to compel the many to live miserably, is merely an explanation of the phrase, The institution of private property; that he who declares that he wishes to abolish privilege means to say that he wishes to abolish the Institution of private property; that he who defends the Institution of private property defends privilege, the gross inequality of rich and poor, the consequent misery of all genuine workers, and the consequent degradation of people of all classes. Let it be clearly understood that only two systems of society are possible, SLAVERY and COMMUNISM; all who know the A B C of Socialism know that this is so. Communism or the abolition of the individual ownership of property is our aim, the aim of all real Socialists.

Will Parliament help us towards the accomplishment of this aim? Take another question as an answer to that first question. What is the aim of Parliament? The upholding of privilege; the society of rich and poor; the society of inequality, and the consequent misery of the workers and the degradation of all classes.

Clearly if this is its aim, its reason for existence, it will only exchange its aim for ours if it be compelled to do so, or deluded into doing so.

Can it be forced? Well, Parliament is the master of the Executive; that is to say, of the brute force which compels the useful classes to live miserably; it will use that brute force to compel those classes into submission as long as it dares. When it no longer dares, it will practically no longer exist. Now I, for my part, say as I have always said, that in the last act of the Revolution the Socialists may be obliged to use the form of Parliament in order to cripple the resistance of the reactionists by making it formally illegal, and so destroying the power of the armed men on whom the power of the parliament and the law-courts really rests. But this can only come in the last act; when the Socialists are strong enough to capture the parliament in order to put an end to it, and the privilege whose protection is its object, the revolution will have come, or all but come. Meantime, it is clear that we cannot compel Parliament to put an end to its own existence; or, indeed, to do anything which it does not believe will conduce to the stability of Privilege, or the slavery of the workers.

Well, then, can we jockey Parliament into Socialism, into Communism? It seems to me a most hopeless enterprise. We shall not find it difficult, perhaps, to put so much pressure upon it as to make it pass measures for "the amelioration of the lot of the working classes." But what will that mean save the "dishing" of the Socialists?—who, if they do not take care, will find that instead of using Parliament, they will be used by it. Let us remember, too, that the knowledge of Socialism is growing with tremendous rapidity, and that even M.P.'s and their wirepullers will soon get to know what it means, and will then strain their ingenuity to take the sting out of any measures that look Socialistic on the outside; or at last, and perhaps before long, will stiffen themselves up into mere rejection of anything that looks like Socialism. The failure of the attempt to capture the Star for the parliamentary Socialists ought to be a sufficient lesson to them of the power of the reactionists, Liberal as well as Conservative, and the way in which they will refuse to be driven into a corner.

Well, then, if we cannot force Parliament to declare its function of safeguarding privilege at an end, when it is obviously in vigorous life; if we cannot jockey it into furthering the very thing which it hates most, and has most reason to hate—Socialism, to wit—what can we do? "Nothing," say our parliamentary friends. I cannot see that. Is it nothing to keep alive and increase discontent with the vile slavery of to-day? Is it nothing to show the discontented that they can themselves destroy that slavery? Is it nothing to point out to them what lies beyond the period of struggle, and how workers can be happy when they are not robbed of all the pleasure of life by the idlers that live upon their labour?

Moreover, the events of the last twelve months are producing a different spirit in the mass of the workers, and they are now beginning to learn how to combine in earnest. It is now far more hopeful than it was five years ago to turn their attention from the Parliament of their masters to their own organisation. In short, the true weapon of the workers as against Parliament is not the ballot-box but the Boycott. Ignore Parliament; let it alone, and strengthen your own organisations to deal directly with your masters in the present, and to learn how to manage your own affairs both now and for the future, and keep steadily in mind, and work for, the day when you will have to use the great weapon which your own wretched position of unrewarded toil puts into your hands, the weapon of the general strike. See to this, and let politicians elect politicians; let the upper and middle classes by themselves choose for themselves members of the Committee for the Continuance of Slavery, which should be the name of the House of Commons, and you will see what terror you will inspire in the hearts of the canting hypocrites who call themselves statesmen. A terror which will be fully warranted by events; for such an anti-parliamentary boycott will show your determination to be free, and will give you the instrument of attaining your freedom.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

Republican France has rendered to despotic Russia the service of arresting a number of Russian Socialists who were engaged, as it appears, in some scientific experiments destined to advance the progress of chemistry. The Czar and his Government don't like chemistry, and the pseudo-republican ministry of democratic France must, of course, now and then do something, however contemptible it may be, to preserve their alliance with autocratic czardom. Hence the arrest of comrades Reichstein (man and wife), Feodorovna, Bromberg, Nakatchiz, Stepanoff, Katchinzen, Peploff, Wolgrine, Lavremius, Atschiazzi, Diemski, and Mendelsohn. The police have also searched the apartments of our esteemed comrade Peter Lavroff, but without success. According to French law, the possession of such engines as those found in the lodgings of some of the arrested Socialists would bring them within the power of the criminal code. It is very strange indeed that people should not be allowed to study chemistry as much as they like.

The French Possibilists have sustained a great loss through the death of their most prominent leader, the veteran Chabert, member of the Municipal Council of Paris, who died a few days ago, at the age of seventy-two. He took an active part in the revolutionary movements of February and June 1848, June 1849, December 1851, and of the Commune of 1871.

The fifth issue of the monthly review, L'Idee nouvelle (The New Idea) has appeared at Paris, and we are requested by the editors to note the contents of the May number. Here they are: The First of May; The German Bully, by Chirac; The Relativist Altruist Socialists, by Jac; The Victims of Work, by J. Dormoy; Gambling, by Caron; The Social Republic; Socialist Ephemerides; Evolution and Darwinism, by Rendoz; Economic and Social Enquiry, by Bopartz; Literary Review, by Lefebvre; Belgian Correspondence, by Herriou; Ascanio, by Gervaise; International Socialist Gallery: Edouard Vaillant, by Pasquin.

Comrades August Chirac, one of the editors of L'Egalité, and Chaumien, publisher of the same paper, who had been sentenced to six months' imprisonment and a heavy fine for having incited to rebellion, have now been acquitted by a superior court.

GERMANY.

The Socialist muzzle-laws are not to be renewed, as our readers know, but it seems that the magistrates are inclined to replace them, as well as they possibly can, by increasing the dose of "jail" for those who happen to fall within the power of the penal code. A fortnight ago Karl Schulze, editor of the Thüringer Tribune, was sentenced to four months' imprisonment for having "offended" the Director of the Royal Gun-manufacture at Erfurt, by saying that he had reduced the wages of his workers. At Zwickau, a labourer was found guilty of having libelled a director of a coal-pit by asserting that he had committed a breach of confidence, and he got one year's imprisonment for it!

The strike funds of the lightermen at Hamburg, together with the whole of the papers of their committee, have been seized by the police. The money found only amounted to some two hundred marks. The strike is now regarded as at an end.

Through combination of the manufacturers of Maingau, ten thousand workers, engaged in the shoe-materials trade, have been thrown out of work, and relief is badly wanted. Friedrich Weinreich, Herronstrasse, 46, Offenbach on the Main, has volunteered to receive any assistance that may be sent. At Gera, three thousand weavers have also received notice to quit the works, because they refused to submit to new regulations which they considered as being unfair and oppressive. Fifteen thousand of their fellow-workers in the town and neighbourhood have resolved to stop work "on principle."

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

On the 28th of last month the first issue of a weekly Socialist organ, entitled Dělnický Listy, has appeared at Vienna, under the editorship of comrade Joseph Tobola. The offices of the paper are: VI, Gumperdorferstrasse, 79, Vienna.

From the 1st of June appears, also at Vienna, another working-men's paper, under the title of Arbeiterschütz (Protection of Workers), which will be published fortnightly by the Central Committee of the Austrian Relief Societies. The editors intend to deal chiefly with insurance and labour legislation questions. Offices: VI, Gumperdorferstrasse, 64.

BELGIUM.

Several conferences have of late taken place in Belgium. The International Miners' Conference at Jolimont, Province of Hainault, has so far resulted in a considerable success. It has been resolved that a general strike shall be set on foot next May Day. This decision, if the miners stick to it, is certainly a very important one.

Another congress, that of the Belgian Relief Societies, has been held at Ghent, under the auspices of the Executive of the Belgian Parti ouvrier. Twenty delegates represented some seventy thousand confederates. It has been decided to create a Federation of all the Relief Societies working under Socialistic principles, and also to hold another conference in September next, for the purpose of examining and discussing the rules and regulations of the new Federation.

A new Socialist paper has appeared at Brussels, under the title of La

Réforme Sociale (the Social Reform), and will be issued weekly, with comrade Octave Berger as chief editor. The offices of the paper are: 15, rue des Petits-Carmes. The new venture intends to do popular and conciliatory work in the field of revolutionary, independent, and scientific Socialism. We hope that comrade Berger, who is an acute thinker, will succeed in his task. At any rate, he has our best wishes.

DENMARK.

The stonemasons of Copenhagen are still out on strike, and their energy in the battle has from the very beginning been really astounding. They claim a workday of nine hours and wages at the rate of 34 cents an hour. Five hundred masons have already left Copenhagen, in order to work elsewhere, and so to relieve their fellow-labourers on strike. The committee of the strike, however, finding that outside assistance has become necessary, have issued an appeal for help and solidarity, and ask that all subscriptions may be sent to P. C. Olsen, 22, Romersgade, Copenhagen.

Our friends of the Fedraheimen have issued a very good pamphlet of sixty-four pages, entitled "Kann politikken hjelpe oss?" (Can Politics Help Us?), and, of course, the question is answered in the negative. The author of the pamphlet is our comrade R. Steinsvik, one of the editors of the Fedraheimen.

ENGLAND.

The East London Communist-Anarchist Group have started the monthly issue of a paper, entitled The Anarchist Labour Leaf. The first number contains three articles very well written indeed, and we have no hesitation in saying that this Leaf of our East-end comrades deserves to be encouraged and spread as widely as possible. I understand that some three or four thousand copies have been sent gratis, and that in future a larger number still will be circulated in the same way, but for that purpose money is of course urgently needed. Those who feel inclined to help the little paper, can enter into communication with comrade H. McKenzie, 12, Basing Place, Kingsland Road, London, E.C.

This week appears, also in London, the first issue of a 20 pp. journal, called Free Russia, which contains information for Western Europe concerning the atrocities of Czardom. V. D.

IN AUSTRALIA.

HENRY GEORGE has been here, as you already know, and the visit has done us good in many ways. Not that the profit-hunter of San Francisco is any more on our side now than for a long while past. Oh no! he is even more decorous and modestly but firmly respectable than ever before. But he has been troubling the waters, and we have been fishing therein. Before he came, there had been a good deal of talk about his double-posing campaign as a quick-change artiste, appearing alternately as a Free Trade hack and the "inspiring influence" of the Single Tax, and there were several controversies in the papers, of which we duly took all the advantage we were allowed to. While he was here we heckled him all we could, and the result was that his "arguments" against us got worn too smooth by constant use to pass current any more, and he finally refused to answer us anywhere, or to meet any of us in debate. However, we still managed to keep up a scattering fire of correspondence in different papers, and have also held lectures and debates upon his alleged panacea. I don't think he will ever have much of a following here, whatever he may have elsewhere; not that I should imagine it likely that the Single Tax would ever arouse much enthusiasm in the most eager and soulful breast—it is such a queer and undefined halting-place that those who have once started on the road of progress are not likely to stop short there; for there is nothing to stick to or hold by, and if they didn't go further on they would soon find themselves sliding down again on the back-track. We have published a pamphlet on the subject, which has been having a great run at George's meetings.

On Sunday last (Easter Sunday, April 6th), W. H. McNamara lectured at our rooms on "Henry George and Charles Bradlaugh: their attitude on the Labour Question," and the lecture was well reported in Friday's Australian Star. There was a right good audience, as there usually is now, both in numbers and in attention and enthusiasm, who punctuated the various points made by the lecturer with cheers and laughter. After referring to the action of the Trades and Labour Council of New South Wales, in refusing to take any part in the reception of Henry George as "he was no friend of labour," our comrade went on to detail the various phases of "the prophet's" picturesque and varied career, giving chapter and verse for most of his statements, and in all the large audience there wasn't a hand or a heart for George when the record was closed. That is only one meeting, of which I tell you as a sample, because it happens to be the last; the same sort of thing has been going on pretty widely, and has had, and will still more have, far-reaching effects. Bradlaugh was also handled without gloves. I will say there for Australians, that Bradlaugh began to be seen through here even before you on that side woke up to what he was.

But beating Henry George has not been our only work; we have only used him and the stir he made as a means of increasing our propaganda. We have to thank our chief enemy for helping us, at second-hand and reflectively as it were, by helping him. The Sydney Daily Telegraph, like its name-sake over your way, a snuffing compound of hollow cant, self-seeking hypocrisy, and ready prostitution for profit's sake, started correspondences on George and the Single-tax, and, following the example of its notorious name-sake, hired penny-a-liners to fight as gladiators on either side in the arena of its correspondence columns. So that it worked up quite a boom, and "everybody" talked of its conversion to the Single-tax. But the Telegraph was only playing a game, and it played it pretty low down too. The Bulletin comments on the affair in words that some of you at home might think of with profit as well as us:

"The Single-taxers now realise that they have been tricked and deceived. We are not sorry for them. Had their aggregated crania contained one grain of common-sense they would not have expected any other result. What—the Telegraph go straight for confiscation? What would become of Chairman Carey's mortgages? of Director Robert Sands' land-boom money? of largest Shareholder Gorman's enormous real-property-sales commissions? of Shareholder Walter Hall's Mount Morgan dividends? Did the cranks ever dream that a journal of which Bruce Smith, of the British Liberty and Property Defence League, is a reputed, and land-auctioneer Mills, a certain stockholder, would ever yell boldly for plunder by Act of Parliament, and shriek for legislative sanction to grasp it and smash at one swoop both the major source of its advertising income—land-sale "ads."—and the chief element of its subscription revenue—the pennies of Bill Jones and Tom Smith, who have sunk a life-time's hard-earned savings in a suburban allotment? If they did they are crankier than even we considered them. The Single-taxers merit no sympathy. They may be clothed with the ashes of humiliation and in the sackcloth of despair, and the popular verdict is 'Serve 'em right.' They sought to use the Telegraph, and it has used them."

But the Telegraph helped to make the boom, and though it has euhred the Georgites it hasn't hurt us, and as I said before we have been getting a good deal out of the stir.

The labour movement in general here is moving along at a great rate. Of course, the bulk of it takes trade-union form as yet; but one instructive sign of the times is the dislike for isolation that the different unions all show. Big or little, they are all on the track for federation—first of all local trades, then of the same trade inter-colonially, and then of all trades the same way; presently we shall see a federation of trades that means the organised labour of a continent; "the days of labour clans are nearly at an end." Here in Sydney there is a Trades and Labour Council of New South Wales, which, though one might well wish it would use its power better and go further on the right road, I am glad to say is getting stronger continually. Of course, they are still under the parliamentary superstition, and have drawn up a programme and will support candidates. If a "labour candidate" runs he must be a member of and accepted by his trade union; but if no labour candidate is running in any constituency, whichever of the ordinary candidates accepts the programme will get the support. The platform is as follows:

1. Abolition of plural voting.
2. Free and compulsory education.
3. Legislation on eight hours system.
4. A beneficial factories act.
5. Greater protection of persons engaged in the mining industry.
6. Extension of the franchise to seamen.
7. Extension to seamen of the benefit of the Employers' Liability Act.
8. Supervision of land and boilers, and the protection of persons engaged in such pursuits.
9. An elective Upper House.
10. Any measure that will secure for the wage-earner a fair and equitable return for his or her labour.
11. Amendment of the Masters and Servants Act.
12. Amendment of the Masters and Apprentices Act.
13. Amendment of the Trades Union Act.

Our great want is a labour paper. W. A. Higgs, who started the Labour Advocate, which broke down after two or three good numbers, has still two libel actions hanging over his head, and nobody seems inclined to take on the job after him. Up in Queensland they have the Worker, of which you will have seen two numbers already. It's about the brightest and best thing we've had on this continent—meaning no disrespect to the Boomerang or Bulletin. This is a sample of its doctrine:

"Henry George is one of those American reformers who are running frantic on the 'Australian method of voting,' which is being fought for across the Pacific as enthusiastically as Prohibition ever was. That seems funny, at this distance. To Australian workers, who know only that here in Queensland a square foot can vote in every electorate, while a square man can wander voteless from one end of the country to the other, it is a huge joke."

The bakers here have struck, and are still on strike, for eight hours. They are slowly but surely gaining a victory, as shop after shop is giving in and taking on union hands. The Sydney millers have decided to federate with them and also with Victorian millers and bakers. This is the sort of thing I spoke of above. The Inter-colonial Wharf Labourers' Conference, which has been sitting here, also agreed to federate all the wharf labourers' societies right throughout Australasia. Thursday fortnight (March 27) the Dunedin (N.Z.) tramway men had a midnight meeting and resolved to form a union; they have been working quite as long hours as in London.

Sydney, N.S.W., Sunday April 13, 1890.

CORNSTALK.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The International Miners' Conference.

The most important resolution passed at the Conference of Miners is the following; that "The Congress declares itself in principle in favour of an international strike of miners, so as to bring about the triumph of the movement in favour of an eight-hours working day, and resolves that a second Congress shall assemble in April, 1891, to examine this question." This resolution, although it does not necessarily mean that a general strike will take place on May 1st, 1891, at least pledges the miners to the strike as a question of principle. This is in every way a step in the right direction. When we remember that the Congress was not a revolutionary one, for the Continental miners represented there were mainly Social Democrats, and yet they united with English trade-unionists to pass a resolution which they would have looked upon a little time back as dangerous and revolutionary. This would once have been thought impossible; but it has come to pass. How long will it take us now to permeate the workers of the world to go in for a general strike not only for the eight hours, but for the Social Revolution? Even that seems at present within "a measurable distance."

The Congress has been in every way encouraging. English and Continental miners seem to have in their hearts that feeling of international solidarity which is rather lacking among "British" delegates of the Shipton and Broadhurst school. The only note of sadness in the Congress was the description by the Continental delegates of the horrible tyranny exercised by the capitalists upon the wretched workers. Let me give a few instances. The report for the Charleroi district in Belgium (the country of that most Christian king who wants to "civilise" the Africans with the aid of Mr. Stanley) said that there were 18,000 union men in the district. Many women worked in the mines as hewers, working twelve to sixteen hours per day for 1s. 6d. to 1s. 9d. We wonder if this is the kind of Christian civilisation Leopold would like to extend among the "heathen." Another delegate, M. Fauvian, reporting for the Boninage district of Belgium, said the men worked from twelve to thirteen hours per day, the wages being from 3s. 2d. to 3s. 4d. per day; those who looked after the woodwork getting 1s. 8d. to 2s. 6d. per day. Women worked in the mines, and also on the pit bank. Children were allowed to work at fourteen year old. When the women got to be sixteen years of age, many of them filled per day seventy trucks of fifty hectolitres capacity. The Bohemian delegate reported that the average hours per day in Bohemia was about twelve; but if the masters required, they had to work longer, and sometimes they were in the mine more than twenty-four hours (cries of "Shame"). Children began work at fourteen years of age. The men earned 50s. to 58s. per month. The children got about 10d. per day.

And yet Mr. Burt is surprised at Continental workmen being "violent." Besides the resolution concerning the general strike, the miners have decided to form an International Federation Committee, each country to send two delegates; and a resolution was passed condemning the tyranny of Continental despots. On the whole, the Congress was wonderfully successful, and the international union of the miners is now no longer a dream.

The Beckton Gas Stokers.

Matters are growing worse and worse at Beckton. The Gas-light and Coke Company are not content with turning the men out by the help of "the iron man," but want to reduce their wages from 5s. 9d. a day (the rate of payment which the men have received from Nov. 16th, 1889) to 5s. 4d. They also want to play the Livesey game by tying the men down to a monthly agreement, while they shall be able to discharge workmen at a moment's notice and confiscate their wages. If the company persist in their present tyranny, it seems by no means improbable that a strike may break out, which will spread to all the gas-works of the Gas-light and Coke Company. If the men strike they must make it a general one, and must leave without notice. It won't do to give the company time to bring up blacklegs, and it certainly won't do to allow them to beat the union in detail. Chivalry is a mistake with these huge corporations, they have no consideration for their men. Let the gas stokers remember how the South London men were beaten, and how the company trampled on them when they were down, simply because of the men's moderation.

The Postmen.

More coercion. The Postmaster-General is determined to smash the Union. Thirty postmen have had the following form sent to them. It says: "You are requested to give an immediate explanation why you attended a meeting on the 16th instant, in contravention of the special instructions given in the printed notice issued by the Postmaster-General." This of course refers to the postmen's meeting held on Clerkenwell Green on the same night as the Postal Jubilee celebration at the Guildhall. It was on their way to this meeting that the postmen's processions were broken up by the police with such brutality. The spirit of revolt is strong among the postmen, and the proclamations forbidding them to go to the meeting had to be guarded in the post offices to prevent them being torn or defaced.

Pity the Poor Police.

We confess that our hearts are not deeply stirred at the sad case of the unfortunate policeman. It is true that 24s. a-week, with a small pension at the end of your career, is a not tempting prospect, but still it is better than that of many unskilled labourers, who earn but 20s., and have the workhouse as a refuge after toiling all their lives to make profit for others. Still, it is an ominous sign of the times for the middle classes that the police should be so discontented that they should be talking of striking. We are afraid, however, that it is only talk. We should sooner expect a strike of flunkies than a strike of dastardly bullies who have bludgeoned old men, women, and children at the command of the despot of Scotland Yard. Some may consider this very unkind. But we can't help it. We have not forgotten Trafalgar Square. We are willing, however, to give the police a chance of repentance. Let them begin their strike next time they are called upon to bludgeon a peaceable procession. Then we shall believe them in earnest, and will treat them as brothers. But so long as they are only "courageous" in attacking poor, half-starved London workmen, we own we cannot feel very fraternally towards them. Still, the agitation has frightened the chiefs of the force. At the meeting on Clerkenwell Green a police superintendent was very conspicuous in urging upon the men not to listen to the "agitators."

Police Spies at Workmen's Meetings.

Throughout the Miners' Congress in Belgium some police spies were present, and were denounced by some of the delegates. The editor of the Labour Tribune seized the opportunity to sing "Rule Britannia," and pointed out that in this matter "how peculiarly blest we are above the French and German." Cunninghame Graham wrote and replied that the editor is labouring under a slight delusion. Police spies are present at public meetings in England. He says:

"All through the unemployed agitation three years ago in London, police spies disguised as reporters were present at every meeting. During the recent strike in Liverpool the same thing happened. It happens at every large meeting in London. Now, though I agree with you that in some things we are in advance of the "blasted furriner," still it is not well to assume that we entirely leave him behind in all things. This is, I take it, the position of affairs. In most foreign countries (United States included) the hatred of employers and employed is open and not disguised. The employer relies on his Maxim gun, like a Ben Benjeers as he is; the employed relies on the force of his numbers, and watches his opportunity. It is war to the knife, as Chicago and Paris know. Here in England the employers are not so stupid. Whilst relying on the Gatling gun (the great aid to law-'n'-order) as a last resource, and not in the least hesitating to use it if required, they see that humbug is still stronger and more potent. So they pretend to be the friends of the workers, and as Whig, Tory, or Radical, shoot them down with the bullets of cant, and damn it (Yes, must print me a damn), the workers fall into the trap, and, instead of laying down their lives as on the Continent, lay down their independence and become the dupes of those who pretend to be their friends. The friend of the working-classes is not and cannot be Gladstone, Salisbury, Parnell, Chamberlain, Churchill, nor even Cunninghame Graham. All these folks live off rent interest and surplus value. Therefore the friends of the workers are those who do not live off these things, i.e., themselves. However, to our police spies. They are as common in England as blackberries, as thieves on the Stock Exchange, or as duffers in the House of Commons. At least, the foreigner knows his enemy. Here in Merry England he too often hugs him to his breast and raises three cheers for him." The editor does not like Graham's criticism, with which I think all Socialists will agree. The editor says all he meant to say was that police spies are not present at Trade Conferences. Possibly not, because up till now trade unionists have been so very fond of law-'n'-order. But I think that if the English miners decide to join in the General Strike, they will not be able to boast much longer of their freedom from police supervision.

International Labour League and Federation.

A special delegate meeting is called by this organisation for Saturday June 7th, 1890, at 4 p.m., at the East Finsbury Radical Club, 134 City Road, James Macdonald in the chair. All organisations interested in the spreading of international combination are invited to send delegates to attend. The following manifesto has been issued by the Provisional Executive Committee:

"FELLOW WORKING MEN,—The great cause of the recent May Demonstrations all over the civilised world was the principle of the international solidarity of all workers. Capitalism is international, and international therefore must be the efforts of the awakening proletariat. And to strengthen the spirit of internationalism in this country, there is necessary a lasting strong organisation of the workers of all nationalities, slaving on these islands for the benefit of the capitalist classes. The recently-formed International Labour League and Federation, which already comprises fifteen different organisations, aims to become such an organisation, the following being its objects: 1. The wider and better organisation of all workers, skilled and unskilled, male and female, of all nationalities. 2. To give assistance in case of dispute in any of the affiliated organisations. 3. The diffusion of sound information on all questions affecting labour. 4. The agitation and organisation among the workers who are outside all present organisations. 5. International exchanges, preventing the supply of foreign labour during trade disputes. 6. And finally to take all possible steps to bring about the federation of all workers in all countries."

The Provisional Executive Committee is composed of delegates of the following societies, from whom further information may be obtained: M. Eagle (International Working Men's Educational Club); S. Fischbein (United Capmakers' Society); J. Land (International Labour League and Federation); S. Levy (Amalgamated Boot and Shoe Lasters' Society); M. Lightman (International Stick and Cane Dressers' Union); J. Macdonald (Amalgamated Society of Tailors, and L.T.C.); A. Siegel (Amalgamated Society of Tailors); J. Skitten (Vice-President, London Clothing Machinists' Union), Treasurer pro tem.; Ferdinand Gilles (Communist Working Men's Club), 26 Robert Street, Hampstead Road, N.W., Joint Secretary pro tem.; F. Verhoeven (United Stick and Cane Dressers', Umbrella Makers' and Mounters' Trade Union), 9 Nelson Street, Hackney Road, N.E., Joint Secretary pro tem.

We think that this is an excellent movement, and from what we know of the honesty and integrity of its promoters, we recommend all trade organisations to take part. The committee is thoroughly international, and trade unions by sending their delegates to the meeting will do much to bring about, not only the federation of workers in this country, but will do much to realise the grand aim of all Socialists, the international solidarity of the workers of the world.

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

OFFICES: 24, GREAT QUEEN ST., LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

The Offices of the Socialist League will be open for the sale of Commonweal and all other Socialist publications from 8.30 a.m. to 9 p.m. every day except Sunday. The Secretary will be in attendance from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m. daily.

Executive.—We wish to draw the attention of Branches to the decision of the Conference re Branch Reports, viz., "That monthly records of the work done, condition of the workers, etc., be, where practicable, substituted for the short weekly reports."

Branch Subscriptions Paid.—1889:—Bradford, to end of April. Yarmouth, to end of May. Mitcham, to end of November. St. Georges East, to end of December.

1890:—Leicester and North Kensington, to end of April. Glasgow, Oxford, Hammersmith, North London, East London, 'Commonweal' Branch, Manchester, and Norwich, to end of May. Streatham, to end of December.

Notice.—All letters on League business, except those intended for Editors of Commonweal, to be addressed to me. No other person is authorised to sign any official communication.
FRANK KITZ, Secretary.

NEW PREMISES FUND.

Collected at Council meeting, June 2nd, 5s. 4½d.

"COMMONWEAL" GUARANTEE FUND.

The following further sums have been received towards this fund:—North London Branch, 6s.; B. W., 1s.; H. R. (2 weeks), 2s.; 'Commonweal' Branch, 16s. 10½d.; P. Webb (3 weeks), 3s.; J. Bines, 1s.; Burnie, 10s.; C. Saunders, 2s.; A. F. H., 5s.; Glasgow Branch, 5s.; W. M., 14s.; and G. C. B., 4s.

REPORTS.

HAMMERSMITH.—On Sunday morning at Bridge End, an excellent meeting; speakers were Morris, Davis, Tochatti, A. J. Smith, and H. Grant; 48 Weals sold. In the evening at Walham Green splendid meeting, H. H. Sparling speaking for upwards of three-quarters of an hour; Bullock and S. Grant also spoke; 19 Weals sold.—W.

KILBURN.—A very large gathering was addressed here by Mrs. Lahr on Sunday morning; 54 Weals sold. Many more could have been disposed of if a larger stock had been provided.

NORTH LONDON.—We have been holding some very successful meetings during the past three weeks. At our Saturday meetings in Hyde Park we sell about 40 Weals. At Regent's Park last Sunday we sold 80 Commonweal and collected 4s. 4½d., Cantwell, Nicoll, and Mowbray being the speakers. In Hyde Park on Sunday afternoon, the speakers were Cantwell, Parker, Miss Lupton, Mrs. Lahr, and Mainwaring; 78 Commonweal sold and 4s. 4d. collected.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday at mid-day on Jail Square, a fine meeting, addressed by Joe Burgoyne, was broken up before we had got right under way by a heavy downpour of rain. In the evening at Paisley Road, Joe and Tim Burgoyne spoke to a very large audience; Weals sold out.—J. B.

EDINBURGH—SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—We had a very successful meeting on the Meadows on Sunday; Mackenzie, Hamilton, Davidson, Smith, and Bell all spoke well. There was slight opposition. Commonweal sold out.

LIVERPOOL SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—We held two meetings on Sunday. The morning attendance was excellent, owing to the Y.M.C.A. people again occupying our usual stand. We, however, took up our position back to back with them. While they sang hymns we sang the "Marseillaise" and other songs with considerable vigour, the audience giving three hearty cheers for the social revolution. In the afternoon we had a quiet meeting. Thanks to our Christian opponents, we sold 11s. 5d. worth of literature, and collected 3s.

CHESTERFIELD.—A good meeting was held last Sunday morning on Brimington Common; Andrew Hall spoke. In the evening a large audience assembled in the Market Place, and in spite of the rain, kept together and listened attentively to the addresses given by comrades Hall and Edward Carpenter. Shortland, of Sheffield, sang two songs. Three quires of Commonweal sold, and some pamphlets. The collection amounted to 5s. 8½d.

ROCHDALE SOCIALISTS.—Meetings held every evening at 28 Blackwater Street, Rochdale.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

POLICE, PUBLICANS, AND SINNERS.

WHY do the heathen beg pardon and the Christians rage so loudly? When, in the early days of the Socialist revival, our propagandists were arrested and our meetings broken up, what help did we receive from the red-hot Gospellers and Apostles of "pure" cold water? On the contrary, they then, as in the present case, put themselves forward as the friends of law-and-order, and took full advantage of the partiality shown them at that time by the police authorities to occupy the stations forbidden to us. It was not until a militant policy was adopted by our comrades in forestalling them at their stations, that they perceived there was a public question involved in the persecution of the Socialists. To-day they are in antagonism to the government. Judging from their antecedents one need not hesitate to aver that were the occasion one in which Socialists instead of the temperance party were interested, they would look calmly on whilst the Socialists were bludgeoned and their meetings suppressed.

"Our followers," say they, "are of the most law-abiding and order-loving section of the community!" What a pity that such and a law-'n'-order government should be at logger-heads! They might echo with Cæsar, "Et tu Brute!" Nothing demonstrates more clearly the power of the bung and gin-mill interest, than the fact that the government can afford to offend a large and influential section of the people, and perhaps force a proportion of that section to make common cause with ourselves upon the question of the right of public processions.

A word in relation to the proposals of the government, which have set the whole family of Stiggenses in motion. The Tories propose to compensate their friends the publicans, who may, in view of a diminution by local action of the number of licenses, be forced to "evacuate." Of course, this simply means an increase of trade to the remaining houses, and probably also an increase of drunkenness.

Landlords and publicans are the especial care of a government composed of land thieves, and hence we have compensatory legislation on their behalf. It is superfluous to point out that the worn-out wreckage of society, the over-driven slaves, who, through old age, sickness, or supercession by machinery, are pushed down in the battle of life, are never compensated by the nation—except in those pillars of British society, the prison or the workhouse. The government will not even compensate by full wages its own over-worked employes, but set their police upon them when they attempt to organise for the redress of their grievances.

As to the publican, reader. Have you ever noticed the bland beaming rubicundity of Boniface, as he rakes in the shekels from the sweltering crowds who on Saturdays and holidays are crushed in the boxes which compose his "bar"? If you wish to see a cloud settle upon that placid face, discuss Socialism, strikes, and clubs, and he will pause as he is drawing the vile decoction he calls beer, to assure you that "They 'ort to be all put down, sir, they 'ort, sir!" He is a Conservative and stands to the government, and in this case the government stand by him.

And what about his mortal enemies, the Gospel Temperance Band, the cohorts of Sion and Little Bethel, now so deeply agitated? And the Sons of the Cross? who are now so cross. And the total abstinence force, who would vend you weak adulterated aperients to wean you from beer, and who, moreover, enliven your sojourn in this vale of tears with the startling information that "He who believeth not as they believe shall be damned!" and are ever anxious about the growth of their numerous sick and burial funds, of which, judging from their lugubrious aspect, they stand in continual need.

"We are the missionaries against strong drink, and all the evils which flow from the drink curse. From drink, and drink alone, flows poverty, crime, and attendant evils! We are the party who by legislative measures will curb and finally destroy the drink fiend!" Pshaw! This narrow proposition, put forward with leather lungs and forty-parson power, seeks to amplify the powers of the policeman, and, arming him with fresh coercive powers, obtrude him upon the people in a matter of conduct that should rest upon sentiment and liberty of action.

It is the irony of fate that such a party should now be at issue with the chief of police. The total ignoring of the root cause of intem-
