perance, Poverty, and their placing it as a consequence instead of a cause, is exasperating to the Socialist and those who study the social question. It is the growth of large towns, the fierce fight for existence, which exhausts the mental and physical faculties and drives the poor to resort to artificial stimulants. Overcrowding, and breathing impure air, and adulteration, and the ogre Poverty, are responsible for drinking habits. If one wishes to search out the most flaring gin-palaces, they are found in the most fetid slums. And so the drink statistics of England are, in short, so far as they refer to the poor, a sufficient although not complete criterion of its economic slavery.

The Socialist can find no rest for the sole of his foot upon the ground now being fought over by publican and abstainer. The publican bedecks his gin-palace, and eliminates all the comfortable features of the old inn, in order that his customers shall consume quickly and constantly. The teetotallers seek to allure you from the publican into halls, where the afore-mentioned aperients are vended with a souppçon of Christian cant. Behind their coercive proposals for the cure of an evil of which they ignore the root-cause, there hides grim Puritanism and social tyranny. Wherever their peddling proposals have had any sort of enforced practice, they have been conspicuous failures.

Small wonder that the men of advanced thought who have adopted the temperance idea as a rule of conduct resolutely refuse to enter their narrow conventicles or be enrolled upon their membership. Let the fight for existence be replaced by fraternal co-operation; the homes and surroundings of the people will be in accord with these principles, and then the drink question, so far as excess is concerned, will be solved. To achieve this we must be in conflict with Law-'n'-order as represented by Privilege. To-day the teetotallers respect Law-'n'-order. Just now they and it have a temporary tiff. There is not the least doubt that if a conflict had occurred the truncheons of the police would have received the greatest injury. A plague upon both their houses!

The clerical element, now so actively in opposition to the publican, are ordinarily hard at work to persuade people to look above for happiness. In narrow courts and alleys, where children are born and reared amid sights and sounds which foredooms them to the workhouse, jail, and hospital—where, in short, humanity swelters—they pursue their way, giving their paltry charity, patching with presents of soup-tickets and blankets the hideous social cancer they are too cowardly to denounce the causes of. Ringing the changes upon the keyboard of their particular phase of superstition, they gather the wretched victims of Mammon within the narrow walls of mission-halls, and dose them with religious cant as a soporific for their present sufferings. In this wise they do the work of their employers, the rich, who pay them deliberately to the end that the poor may be cajoled into enduring the horrors of their surroundings by a belief in beatitude hereafter.

When, under the Empire, an English female evangelist sought to reclaim the wicked Parisians from their frivolous ways, she called upon the prefect of the district and sought the usual permit to open a mission-hall. "Certainly," said he, in giving permission. "Open your hall; such places are as good as police-stations." It argues a want of astuteness on the part of the governing classes that they should offend so valuable an adjunct to the police force as are the Gospel Brigade.

And as to governmental policy, it is clear that the thin end of the wedge, apparent when Trafalgar Square became a prohibited spot for public meetings, is being driven home, and we shall presently be treated to practical illustrations of Law-'n'-order in a wider sense than heretofore. The police—those brutal servants of the propertied classes—are becoming more arrogant every day; and the right of public meeting will follow the right of procession to the limbo of other extinguished rights; and this will happen, in the glib language of Monro, "in the interests of the public at large." We are only at the outset of conflicts with the police; and until working-men consider that something harder than a policeman's skull is a necessary aid to pedestrian exercise when engaged in demonstrating, they must expect to be the victims of the unrestrained brutality of the hirelings of the classes.

As to processions, it is questionable whether in the growing heat of the social conflict it is politic for bodies of unarmed men to gather into the middle of the thoroughfares as a ready point of attack and dispersal by the bludgeoners. Our friend the enemy, in the shape of that sinister organ the Daily Telegraph, said recently, in relation to the Paris demonstration, that the chief difficulty of the police lay in distinguishing Socialists from the ordinary public when mixed up with them, and that processions helped them in attack. If a change of tactics should result disastrously to the clients of Monro, whom he designates "the people at large," they will have that official and Home Secretary Matthews to thank for their troubles.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. XVII. (continued).—HOW THE CHANGE CAME.

"THAT evening the rebel prisoners were visited in their cells by very polite and sympathetic persons, who pointed out to them what a suicidal course they were following, and how dangerous these extreme courses were for the popular cause. Says one of the prisoners: 'It was great sport comparing notes when we came out anent the attempt of the Government to "get at" us separately in prison, and how we answered the blandishments of the highly "intelligent and refined" persons set on to pump us. One laughed; another told extravagant long-bow stories to the envoy; a third held a sulky silence; a fourth dammed the polite spy and bade him hold his jaw—and that was all they got out of us.'

"So passed the second day of the great strike. It was clear to all thinking people that the third day would bring on the crisis; for the present suspense and ill-concealed terror was unendurable. The ruling classes, and the middle-class non-politicians who had been their real strength and support, were as sheep lacking a shepherd; they literally did not know what to do.

"One thing they found they had to do: try to get the 'rebels' to do something. So the next morning, the morning of the third day of the strike, when the members of the Committee of Public Safety appeared again before the magistrate, they found themselves treated with the greatest possible courtesy—in fact, rather as envoys and ambassadors than prisoners. In short, the magistrate had received his orders; and with no more to do than might come of a long stupid speech, which might have been written by Dickens in mockery, he discharged the prisoners, who went back to their meeting-place and at once began a due sitting.

"It was high time. For this third day the mass was fermenting indeed. There was, of course, a vast number of working people who were not organised in the least in the world; men who had been used to act as their masters drove them, or rather as the system drove, of which their masters were a part. That system was now falling to pieces, and the old pressure of the master having been taken off these poor men, it seemed likely that nothing but the mere animal necessities and passions of men would have any hold on them, and that mere general overturn would be the result. Doubtless this would have happened if it had not been that the huge mass had been leavened by Socialist opinion in the first place, and in the second by actual contact with declared Socialists, many or indeed most of whom were members of those bodies of workmen above said.

"If anything of this kind had happened some years before, when the masters of labour were still looked upon as the natural rulers of the people, and even the poorest and most ignorant men leaned upon them for support, while they submitted to their fleecing, the entire break-up of all society would have followed. But the long series of years during which the workmen had learned to despise their rulers had done away with their dependence upon them, and they were now beginning to trust (somewhat dangerously, as events proved) in the non-legal leaders whom events had thrust forward; and though most of these were now become mere figure-heads, their names and reputations were useful in this crisis as a stop-gap.

"The effect of the news, therefore, of the release of the Committee gave the Government some breathing time: for it was received with the greatest joy by the workers, and even the well-to-do saw in it a respite from the mere destruction which they had begun to dread, and the fear of which most of them attributed to the weakness of the Government. As far as the passing hour went, perhaps they were right in this."

"How do you mean?" said I. "What could the Government have done? I often used to think that they would be helpless in such a crisis."

Said old Hammond: "Of course I don't doubt that in the long run matters would have come about as they did. But if the Government could have treated their army as a real army, and used them strategically as a general would have done, looking on the people as a mere open enemy to be shot at and dispersed wherever they turned up, they would probably have gained the victory at the time."

"But would the soldiers have acted against the people in this way?" said I.

Said he: "I think from all I have heard that they would have done so if they had met bodies of men armed however badly, and however badly they had been organised. It seems also as if before the Trafalgar Square massacre they might as a whole have been depended upon to fire upon an unarmed crowd, though they were much honeycombed by Socialism. The reason for this was that they dreaded the use by apparently unarmed men of an explosive called dynamite, of which many loud boasts were made by the workers on the eve of these events; and of course the officers of the soldiers fanned this fear to the utmost, so that the rank and file probably thought on that occasion that they were being led into a desperate battle with men who were really armed, and whose weapon was the more dreadful, because it was concealed. After that massacre, however, it was at all times doubtful if the regular soldiers would fire upon an unarmed or half-armed crowd."

Said I: "The regular soldiers? Then there were other combatants against the people?"

"Yes," said he, "we shall come to that presently."

"Certainly," I said, "you had better go on straight with your story. I see that time is wearing."

Said Hammond: "The Government lost no time in coming to terms with the Committee of Public Safety; for indeed they could think of nothing else than the danger of the moment. They sent a duly accredited envoy to treat with these men, who somehow had obtained dominion over people's minds, while the formal rulers had no hold except over their bodies. There is no need at present to go into the details of the truce (for such it was) between these high contracting parties, the Government of the empire of Great Britain and a handful of working-men (as they were called in scorn in those days), amongst whom, indeed, were some very capable and 'square-headed' persons. The upshot of it was that all the definite claims of the people had to be granted. We can now see that most of these claims were of themselves not worth either demanding or resisting; but they were looked on at that time as most important, and they were at least tokens of revolt against the miserable system of life which was then beginning to tumble to pieces. One claim, however, was of the utmost immediate importance, and this the Government tried hard to evade; but as they were not dealing with fools, they had to yield at last. This was the claim of recognition and formal status for the Committee of Public Safety, and all the associations which it fostered under its wing. This it is clear meant two things: first, amnesty for the 'rebels,' great and small, who, without a distinct act of civil war, could no longer be attacked; and next, a continuance of the organised revolution. Only one point the Government could gain, and that was a name. The dreadful revolutionary title was dropped, and the body, with its branches, acted under the respectable name of the 'Board of Conciliation and its local offices.' Carrying this name, it became the leader of the people in the civil war which soon followed."

"O," said I, somewhat startled, "so the civil war went on, in spite of all that had happened?"

"So it was," said he. "In fact, it was this very legal recognition which made the civil war possible in the ordinary sense of war; it took the struggle out of the element of mere massacres on one side, and endurance plus strikes on the other."

"And can you tell me in what kind of way the war was carried on?" said I.

"Yes," he said; "we have records and to spare of all that; and the essence of them I can give you in a few words. As I told you, the rank and file of the army was not to be trusted by the reactionists; but the officers generally were prepared for anything, for they were mostly the very stupidest men in the country. Whatever the Government might do, a great part of the upper and middle classes were determined to set on foot a counter revolution; for the Communism which now loomed ahead seemed quite unendurable to them. Bands of young men, like the marauders in the great strike of whom I told you just now, armed themselves and drilled, and began on any opportunity or pretence to skirmish with the people in the streets. The Government neither helped them nor put them down, but stood by, hoping that something might come of it. These "Friends of Order," as they were called, had some successes at first, and grew bolder; they got many of the officers of the regular army to help them, and by their means laid hold of munitions of war of all kinds. One part of their tactics consisted in their guarding and even garrisoning the big factories of the period: they held at one time, for instance, the whole of that place called Manchester which I spoke of just now. A sort of irregular war was carried on with varied success all over the country; and at last the Government, which had at first pretended to ignore the struggle, or treat it as mere rioting, definitely declared for 'the Friends of Order,' and joined to their bands whatsoever of the regular army they could get together; and made a desperate effort to overwhelm 'the rebels,' as they were now once more called, and as indeed they called themselves.

"It was too late. All ideas of peace on a basis of compromise had disappeared on either side. The end, it was seen clearly, must be either absolute slavery for all but the privileged, or a system of life founded on equality and Communism. The sloth, the hopelessness, and if I may say so, the cowardice of the last century, had given place to the eager, restless heroism of a declared revolutionary period. I will not say that the people of that time foresaw the life we are leading now, but there was a general instinct amongst them towards the essential part of that life, and many men saw clearly beyond the desperate struggle of the day into the peace which it was to bring about. The men of that day who were on the side of freedom were not unhappy, I think, though they were harassed by hopes and fears, and sometimes torn by doubts, and the conflict of duties hard to reconcile."

"But how did the people, the revolutionists, carry on the war? What were the elements of success on their side?"

I put this question, because I wanted to bring the old man back to the definite history, and take him out of the musing mood so natural to an old man.

He answered: "Well, they did not lack organisers; for the very conflict itself, in days when, as I told you, men of any strength of mind cast away all consideration for the ordinary business of life, developed the necessary talent amongst them. Indeed, from all I have read and heard, I much doubt whether, without this seemingly dreadful civil war, the due talent for administration would have been developed amongst the working men. Anyhow, it was there, and they had leaders far more than equal to the best men amongst the reactionaries. For the rest, they had no difficulty about the material of their army: for that revolutionary instinct so acted on the ordinary soldier in the ranks that the greater part, certainly the best part, of the soldiers joined the side of the people. But the main element of their success was this, that wherever the working people were not coerced, they worked, not for the reactionists, but for 'the rebels.' The reactionists could get no work done for them outside the districts where they were all-powerful; and even in those districts they were harassed by continual risings; and in all cases and everywhere got nothing done without obstruction and black looks and sulkiness; so that not only were their armies quite worn out with the difficulties which they had to meet, but the non-combatants who were on their side were so worried and beset with hatred and a thousand little troubles and annoyances that life became almost unendurable to them on those terms. Not a few of them actually died of the worry; many committed suicide. Of course, a vast number of them joined actively in the cause of reaction, and found some solace to their misery in the eagerness of conflict. Lastly, many thousands gave way and submitted to the rebels; and as the numbers of these latter increased, it at last became clear to all men that the cause which was once hopeless was now triumphant, and that the hopeless cause was that of slavery and privilege.

CORRESPONDENCE.

HOW TO WIN LANCASHIRE.

DEAR COMRADES,—If Lancashire is to take its proper place in the ranks of Socialism, we must be up and doing, and to do our work properly we must have a system, or else our efforts will be very materially depreciated, and the Cause will suffer. It has been dinned into our ears many times during elections, and especially by the party which has secured a majority of the seats, that "what Lancashire says to-day England will say to-morrow." If this be an axiom, then we must work to get Socialism in the ascendancy; and with an educated working class we ought and can do it. In this county we have at least nineteen towns with populations numbering over 20,000 without a single recognised place of meeting, either indoors or outside. These towns are: Oldham, 152,511; Preston, 93,707; Bury, 49,746; Burnley, 69,110; Wigan, 48,916; Warrington, 45,275; Ashton, 43,389; Accrington, 31,435; Bacup, 25,033; Hyde, 28,629; Heywood, 23,050; Lancaster, 20,724; Chorley, 22,792; Widnes, 24,919; Tottington, 20,324; Worsley, 23,787; Barrow in Furness, 47,276; Staleybridge and Duckinfield, 56,614; Todmorden and Nelson, 34,242; Leigh and Redford, 21,733; Gorton 33,096; St. Helens, 57,234; Southport, 32,191; and another score of towns just on the borders of these big towns, with populations from 8,000 to 20,000. They are all big enough to establish branches and provide speakers of their own. These are Atherton, Blackpool, Clitheroe, Colne, Crumpsall, Droyloden, Earlstown Junction, Eccles, Failsworth, Haslingden, Hindley, Newton-le-Willows, Padiham, Prestwich, Radcliffe, Rawtenstall, Sowerbybridge, Stretford, Westhoughton, and Whitefield.

Let every branch in Lancashire see to it. Let them determine which place is the easiest to attack, and make the attack at once. Let the branch send two or more members for some time. Let the meetings be held once a week, be punctual, and ask for enquirers to be seen after meeting. Don't make meetings too long; you may educate, but it is just as desirable to organise. Get a corresponding secretary; and you may rely upon it that a branch will be formed and you will not require to send more than one speaker afterwards. You should always take Commonweal and leaflets and pamphlets. Let us work hard, pull well together, and victory will be ours.—Yours fraternally,

E. H. P.

P. S.—A collection should be made at all meetings for the local propaganda fund to pay travelling expenses for speakers. We want the best talent procurable. All Socialists are enthusiastic enough, but not always rich enough to travel further than they can walk.—E. H. P.

A SOCIAL MEETING

WILL BE HELD

AT THE INTERNATIONAL CLUB,
40 BERNER STREET, E.,

On Tuesday, June 24th, at 8.30 p.m.

All Revolutionary Socialists are invited. The position of the Commonweal, and the best means of advancing the Revolutionary Propaganda will be discussed. To be followed by a Concert. Admission free. Further particulars next week.

SHEFFIELD SOCIALISTS.—We have a very encouraging report to make of the work accomplished here during the past week. To us in Sheffield the "Rev." is getting sensibly nearer. Had our usual meetings at Monolith, Westbar, and Rotherham. We are also holding open-air meetings on week nights as follows: Monday at Handsworth Woodhouse, a mining village about five miles out; Wednesday night in the Wicker; and Thursday, Bramall Lane. We sold last week 270 Commonweal, and a quantity of pamphlets and Freedom; we expect to equal it this week. The attendance at all our meetings has greatly increased, and the interest is getting almost intense. The members are one and all working with a will, and in the heartiest comradeship. Our comrade Andrew Hall, of Chesterfield, visits us on Sunday next, and we are expecting record audiences.

A VISION OF HELL;

OR, A PEEP INTO THE REALMS BELOW.

HEAVENS! what a list!—what shoals on shoals
Of sinners sentenced, on hell's rolls,
To scorpion-whips and brimstone-coals!
Tremble, ye lords of funds and acres!
Now is the time to save your souls,
Ye money-grubbing Jews and Quakers,
Bow your stiff wills unto your Maker's,
Ere death calls in your undertakers!

Foremost in sinful guilt and pride
Scowled land-usurpers, money-changers—
'Twixt these the world is crucified;
Authors of all its woes and dangers,
To which men otherwise were strangers.

What streams flow from this fountain-head!
What myriads tangled in their toils!
What countless hosts these monsters lead!
Who share their crimes, to share their spoils,
Filling the earth with woes and broils!

Loan-mongers, landlords, millionaires,
Contractors, usurers, speculators,
Stockjobbers, brokers, bulls, and bears,
Blacklegs, monopolists, regraters,
Dealers in spiritual wares;
And House of Commons' sham debaters,
Yea, the whole tribe of legislators,
Who cater for these depredators,
Most of them rotten fornicators,
All of them licensed spoliators,
Tramplers on right, and people-haters,
Rogues every man, and all first-raters;
With swarms of hunters after place—
A hungry, servile, graceless race.

Discounters, notaries, lawyers, proctors,
The scum of gluttonous corporations,
Of bubble-company concoctors,
Fit tools for rank abominations,
Attorneys gorg'd by litigations;
Managers drown'd in peculations,
Pauls, Redpaths, Robsons, of all stations,
Steep'd to their chins in malversations,
The produce of their incubations,
And scandal of corrupted nations.

Land-factors, merchants, bankers, brewers,
Proprietors of "hells" and stews,
Forestallers, turf-men, hired reviewers,
And fabricators of false news,
With smooth-fac'd Quakers, "saints," and Jews,

Such as pious thieves would choose
For missions to back slums and mews,
To coddle thieves, on their acquittals,
With sermons, tracts, and broken victuals,
Which they would gladly leave for skittles,
Or "swag" to earn them fresh committals.
Conscious their blots would bear the light,
Compared with their's who'd washed them white.

Legions there were of cotton lords,
And manufacturers, whom free trade
Make candidates for hell's rewards,
Through blood-stain'd fortunes wrung, not made,
From famished serfs in graves soon laid.

No devils were half so hypocritical
As these close-fisted, grinding skin-a-flints,
Most brazen-faced, yet parasitical,
With falsehood traced in all their lineaments;
Bullies to serfs, to tyrants, sycophants,
And primed with purse-proud, upstart insolence,
Which swell'd them out to huge dimensions,
Based only on their own pretensions.

Though "Lib'rals" styled, none e'er can love them,
So opposite their actions show them;
Take all they can from those above them,
And nothing give to those below them.
Behold the shibboleth to know them!
For never yet was Liberal known
To let the poor have even their own.

By J. BRONTERRE O'BRIEN.

An infamous sentence has been passed upon Moses Harman, the editor of Lucifer. He is a very plain-spoken sexual reformer, and did not shrink from printing an unusually strong letter from one of his correspondents. For this offence he has actually been sentenced to five years' imprisonment and a fine of three hundred dollars, which he is never likely to pay. Such a sentence makes one gape with wonder. Would any judge who was not a wretched bigot pass it, or would it be tolerated by any people not eaten out with hypocrisy? The wife-beaters and woman-outragers are at large, and this well-meaning, if mistaken, man is treated as a criminal of the deepest dye. Even if society—God bless its sweet, pure soul!—felt obliged to discountenance such a publication as Lucifer, one would think that a week's imprisonment would suffice, at least to begin with. But five years! It takes one's breath away. Yet this happens in America, where they are holding meetings to protest against the Czar's treatment of political prisoners. "Frailty, thy name is woman," says Hamlet. That's a mistake. But this is true—Hypocrisy, thy name is Christian civilisation.—Free-thinker

The COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. For Australia, New Zealand, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Transvaal, and the Argentine Republic, a year, 8s.; six months, 4s.; three months, 2s. For India, Ceylon, China, Hong Kong, and the Straits Settlements, a year, 10s.; six months, 5s.; three months, 2s. 6d.

Subscribers who receive a RED WRAPPER are thereby reminded that their subscriptions have expired and must be renewed immediately if they wish to continue to receive COMMONWEAL.

SPECIAL RECRUIT SUBSCRIPTIONS.—To aid in spreading our principles, the following largely reduced terms are offered to those who obtain new subscribers: Two new yearly subscriptions for British Islands, etc., 10s. 6d.; for Australia, etc., 15s.; for India, etc., 19s. Five new subscriptions: For British Islands, etc., 25s.; for Australia, etc., 37s. 6d.; for India, etc., 47s. 6d. Specimen copies will be sent on receipt of postage.

Remittances from abroad must be made by International Money Order.

DOWN A COAL PIT.

THE stall man is responsible for the safety of his bank; he has to see that the requisite props and sprags are fixed, and that nothing is left in a dangerous condition. His wages are even more difficult to fix with exactitude, depending as they do on so many varying circumstances. The tonnage price will mostly lie between 1s. 8d. and 2s. 2d., subject to the 35 per cent. rise, though both more and less may be met with. Of course 1s. 8d. in one stall may be much better than 2s. 2d. in another, so much depends on the nature of the coal, the thickness of the seam, and the character of the roof. But for a full week's work most of the stall-men will now make from 30s. to 40s., and some men as much as 50s. or 60s., and for an odd week in exceptional cases possibly even a higher figure might be touched. But, on the other hand, it is quite possible for men to work a whole week for nothing! If they come across a fault in the coal, or if the roof falls in and buries the stall, it may take them all their time to earn enough to pay the day-men. It is seldom that a stall will be worked for many weeks together without getting a poor one in for some reason or other. I have before me two pay tickets taken from the same stall for succeeding weeks; in both cases there were two stall men and one filler, and in both weeks there were only five days worked:

It will be noticed that in this case 10 per cent. of the rise had been added to the price, making it 2s. 4d.; but as successive rises were gained they were calculated on the old basis. Out of the money paid to these stall men as above, they had to pay their filler for five days at 4s. 11d, viz., £1 4s. 7d., leaving them in the first week £1 16s. 2½d. each for themselves, and in the second £1 6s. 6d. A deduction of 6d. a-week each would have to be made for powder, and wear and tear of tools, probably rather more than that would be needed. Pits are considered to be working well when they make five days a week regularly. Most of the house and gas coal-pits will not work that during the summer, though some of the hard coal ones may make six days most weeks. Only clean lump coal must be loaded by the men in the pit; for slack they will get only 9d. or 1s. per ton. The ton consists of 21 cwt. for all kinds of coal. There are fixed rates for various extras which occur, such as "ripping," or "heading," but a great deal is expected to be included in the tonnage rates, and when faults and slips occur the men have to trust very largely to the generosity of the employer for any extra payment. The pit we are examining is one of the more generously managed in many ways; a good deal of work is done by day-men employed by the owners to clear and secure the travelling roads, etc., and nowhere have we noticed the ponies rubbing against the roof, which in some pits may be frequently seen, though, of course, contrary to the provisions of the Act.

We were fortunate enough to see the whole process of coal-getting in the different stalls as we went through, but it will be more easily explained in the order in which it is done. In the first district we pass through the hard rock comes immediately over the coal, so here they "hole" the coal underneath and wedge it down. The "holing" consists in cutting a sort of groove about one foot high and four or five deep all along the face of the stall; this the miner does with his pick, lying on his side; as he goes along he will put short sprags at intervals to keep the coal from breaking down, until the whole length is holed. He then draws two or three of the little sprags and drives the end of a long steel bar between the rock roof and the coal, and so wedges down a huge block weighing often many tons. This his filler will break up and load into tubs, each tub being marked with chalk, or having a small leather ticket attached bearing the number of the stall. This will go on until all the bank is wedged down; then a fresh row of props must be fixed to keep the roof safe, and afterwards the back row will be withdrawn and the roof left to drop in at its leisure. This it does, now and then, with greater energy than is required, burying the whole stall up to the face; and as we pass from bank to bank we have to crawl through more than one small ugly-looking hole that has been cleared through such a slip to allow the air to pass. Sometimes if the coal is lively it takes little or no wedging down, but splits off without any assistance. Nothing makes one realise so vividly the immense pressure to which the coal has been subjected by the weight of the superincumbent ground—in this case 400 yards thick—as to hear it hissing and crackling when first laid bare! The men like the coal to be lively as it takes so much less winning, though of course there is a little more danger of getting caught by unexpected falls. Where there is a layer of soft clod above the coal, between it and the rock, the holing is done in this, and then shot holes are drilled near the bottom and it is broken up by blasting. The shots are fired with flameless powder by one of the deputies, they only being allowed to fire them, in dangerous pits, after making an examination to see that there is no gas about. Should the charge fail to go off the stall would be shut up until it is considered by one of the officials that all risk of its explosion will have passed.

It will be easily imagined that, even where the utmost precautions are taken, accidents cannot be entirely prevented; and there is no doubt that the present system often leads to unnecessary risks being run. For instance, the eagerness of the men to get as many tons of coal as possible—and so as large a wage—makes them run into danger in order to save time; they neglect to put enough props in, or draw too many out at once, so letting the coal down too suddenly, and in many ways they run extra risk in order to increase their earnings. On the other hand, risks are run to save expense to the owner. There is a standard of safety which varies, and which is undoubtedly influenced by the wealth of the pit and the disposition of the manager or owner. The men are held responsible for the loss of props which the officials consider it safe to recover; sometimes it turns out that they could not safely be got out, and a man is injured in the attempt. Mistakes of judgment there must always be in these things, but there is no doubt that the standard of safety is kept down a good deal by the basis of profit upon which the whole system is worked.

We pass on through many stalls, getting considerably hot and dusty, until at length we turn out once more into the travelling road. Here we find quite a cool breeze, and one is glad to button up. We at once realise the work that is being done by the fan which we saw at the surface. The air is so guided by doors, brattis cloths, etc., that it is always circulating through every part of the roads or workings, which are many miles in extent. We are now trudging along up some old roads, which were made twenty or thirty years ago, towards the shaft of another pit which is working a seam below ours. For hundreds of yards this old road is arched with brick, and altogether gives one the impression that progress during the last score of years has not in every case brought improvement! Evidently a more generous use of brickwork was common in those times. Presently we come to an old furnace, once used for ventilation, but long since superseded by a fan. Furnaces are still used in some of the more old-fashioned pits. A huge fire used to be kept burning in these furnaces, and a large volume of heated air discharged into a shaft, which, acting like a very tall chimney, caused a great draught, sufficient in fact to draw the fresh air down the other shaft and through the workings. We now pass through double doors, and find ourselves in a small cavity half way up the shaft. We watch for a while the two cages spinning past us, one up and one down; then we ring five to the banksman, which tells him that there are men waiting at this seam. Again the cages fly past us, and then ding, ding, ding, goes our bell; we know that next time one of them will call for us. A few seconds and here it comes slowly down, stopping exactly at the right level; again our bell rings one, and we get into the cage—carefully, for there is another hundred yards below us, and plenty of chance to slip down, as this is not a regular landing-stage. When we are all on, the last reaches and gives a final signal to the engine-man, and up we go. This is pleasanter than going down, one's feet seem to feel the cage well under them, except just for a few seconds when the engine first steadies, then a feeling creeps over one that the cage has begun to go down again, and one has just time to wonder, with a slight pang of horror, whether the rope has given way when the first glimpse of daylight casts a reassuring ray on the side of the shaft! Slowly we emerge into the full dazzling light, and as we glance at our lamps we wonder how we can possibly have got accustomed to walk by such slender illumination.

However, here we are, come out a mile and a-half from where we went in, and we are not at all sorry to be able to walk upright again, free from any misgivings about the roof coming down or the sides closing in on us!

It remains for us to follow the coal from the pit bank to the wagon, and see it screened and sorted. As the cage comes up two empty tubs are pushed in on one side sending out the two full ones on the other. These are run off to a weighing machine beside a little cabin, in which a clerk and check-weighman are rapidly booking the weight—of the latter of these we shall have more to say presently. From the machine the tubs are run to a tippler, which turns them over, discharging the coal on to a sloping screen, down which it slips. The small, falling through the bars, glides down a shoot on to a travelling belt underground, which conveys it away to be further sifted into nuts and slack, the latter going forward through a washer and crusher finally lands in the coke ovens, and is there converted into coke by being burned to a red heat and then slacked with water. The larger coal slips over the screen bars on to a wide belt, which slowly creeps along carrying the coal with it. On each side of the belt lads are stationed to pick out any lumps of dirt or bad coal; being stimulated by a bonus on the quantity of dirt they pick out, there is not much escapes them. At the end of the belt the coal slides down another screen into the wagons, which will carry it up to London to cook many people's dinners or warm their toes.

As we walk away from the pit towards the station, we ask our conductor about the checkweighman. It seems that he is a most important person, and holds a position almost unique. He is appointed by the men in the first instance to check the weights of the coal which they send out, to see that the weighing machines are true and that the correct weight is booked. His position is established by Act of Parliament, which authorises the majority of men who are paid by weight to elect him, and compels all so paid to contribute their share towards his remuneration, which share is stopped from their wages. But his actual sphere is much larger. Being a servant of the men, independent of the employers, he has got to be a sort of general secretary to them. He presides at their meetings, is spokesman for them in disputes, makes collections at the pit-top for strikes or other purposes, posts up any general union notices, and in fact does all the work for doing which an ordinary man would be in danger of being discharged. It will be easily seen what an immense advantage it is to the miners to have such a man, appointed by them, independent of the employers, but still holding an acknowledged official position on the pit bank. His legalisation is in fact one of the most distinct benefits conferred on the men by the Mines Regulation Acts.

Perhaps a coal pit illustrates better than anything else the advantages and disadvantages of Government regulation—grandmotherly legislation, as some like to call it. There can be little doubt that, while the relations of employers and employed remain as they are, Government regulation is the most direct and effectual means of carrying out any measure for the benefit of the men. The present standard of safety in pits, low as it still is, would not have been reached had not the law come to the aid of the men's combinations. But on the other hand, one is made to feel that the law is a poor and clumsy way of enforcing regulations which should be adopted voluntarily and carried out loyally, without the need of enforcing. And why are they not so adopted? Simply because the pits are worked for profit, and because the interests of the men and masters are all across. It is the masters' interest to bring to bank as large a quantity of coal as possible with the smallest expenditure on labour and safety precautions. It is the men's interest to get as large a payment as possible in wages for every ton they send up, and to get as much as possible out of the employers in the shape of safety precautions. At the same time, the tonnage price being fixed, they are tempted to get all the coal they can and to spend as little time as they dare in making their stalls safe. While this system of working continues, there will always be discontent, distrust, and friction of all sorts between men and their employers, between the employers and the inspectors, and even between the men and the inspectors sometimes.

Only when the pits come to be worked by free men, not goaded on by a scanty tonnage price, but secure of their fair share of life's comforts, and at liberty to make what provision for their safety they may think fit,—only then will it be possible for the miner's life to be a decent one, and for rational organisation to take the place of arbitrary regulation, with its endless friction and discontent.

SCENES IN THE PARK.

A TEMPERANCE demonstration does not, as a rule, fill me with great enthusiasm, but there were some sights in the Park on Saturday which made my heart beat a little quicker than usual. You have read in the papers about the size of the demonstration, and the way it was broken up into minute fractions by police. That I shall not trouble you with. My purpose is to relate as briefly as possible the attitude of the people towards the idle scoundrels who live upon their labour, and who have the insolence to ride them down like dogs whenever they enter the Park to vent their complaints in a more or less futile demonstration. I am glad to say these gentry got a warm reception on Saturday. They were hooted all along the line, and in fact had to run the gauntlet amid a storm of jeers and chaff. "Sweaters" was the popular name for them; and the general sentiment was well expressed by one workman, who, addressing a particularly fat and over-fed capitalist, said, "All right old man. Wait till another five years is over; we'll have you out of that blooming carriage." Not only this, but despite the efforts of the police, carriages were repeatedly stopped by a furious crowd, so as to allow the procession to pass; and a coachman who endeavoured to drive over the people was sternly warned to be careful, or the carriage would be overturned. We all know how a "gallant" baronet and an M.P. had to ride for his life, amid a volley of sticks and stones, for insulting the workmen. All these are signs that should tell us that our propaganda is taking effect, and that the people will not stand the insolent tyranny of aristocrat and plutocrat much longer. Nor will they be bludgeoned into a meek and quiet submission by an irresponsible police despot like James Monro with his horde of murderous police bullies. These gentlemen and their chief had better let processions alone for the future, or it may be the worse for them. N.

A WORD TO THE PRACTICAL MAN.—It is not a lucky word, this same impossible: no good comes of it. Who is he that says, there is a lion in the path? Sluggard, thou must slay the lion then; the way has to be travelled. In Art, in Practice, innumerable critics will henceforth demonstrate that most things are impossible; that we have got once for all into the region of perennial commonplace, and must contentedly continue there. Let such critics demonstrate; it is the nature of them; what harm is there in it? Poetry once well demonstrated to be impossible, arises the Burns, arises the Goethe. Unheroic commonplace being now clearly all we have to look for, comes the Napoleon, comes the conquest of the world. It was proved by fluxionary calculus that steamships could never get across from the farthest point of Ireland to the nearest of Newfoundland: impelling force, resisting force, maximum here minimum there; by law of nature, and geometric demonstration:—what could be done? The Great Western could weigh anchor from Bristol Port; that could be done. The Great Western, bounding safe through the gullets of the Hudson, threw her cable out on the capstan of New York, and left our still moist paper demonstration to dry itself at leisure. "Impossible?" cried Mirabeau to his secretary; "Ne me dites jamais ce bête de mot!" Never name to me that blockhead of a word.—Carlyle: 'Chartism.'

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

Shipton Triumphant.

So Shipton has gained the secretaryship of the London Trades Council and beaten the new trade unions after all. The wily old fox is not to be caught napping. Mr. Shipton is a man whom every trade-unionist you meet admits ought to have been kicked out long ago, yet he contrives, though attacked by young and vigorous men, to defeat them by sheer force of cunning, and his knowledge of all the tricks which are the capital of an old hand at electioneering. The first dodge was to prevent the most popular candidate, Mr. Parnell, from standing for election by procuring a "mysterious vote" from his society, withdrawing him as a delegate from the Trades Council. Then with a bogus majority of people who represent small and reactionary trade unions, Shipton gained the victory, by 61 to 46, against Hammil of the Engineers, a comparatively young and untried man. The new trade unions, who joined the Council to turn him out, will now have the pleasure of paying Shipton's salary for some considerable time. Would it not be a wiser plan for these bodies to boycott that effete and rotten institution, the London Trades Council, and form a federation of their own? A rival organisation set up beside the Trades Council would certainly attract all that was young and healthy in trade-unionism, and Mr. Shipton's bogus societies would then be left to stew in their own juice along with their respectable secretary. We fear it will take the new trade unions some time to beat Shipton on his own ground.

Mr. Burt and the German Emperor.

Mr. Burt's firm belief in the good intentions of the German Emperor ought to be considerably shaken by this time. Here is a copy of the proclamation issued by an official of that most benevolent and best of princes just before the International Miners' Conference:

"In virtue of section 16 of the Socialist law passed in October 1878, we prohibit herewith the collection of subscriptions having for its object to send delegates to the forthcoming International Miners' Congress at Jolimont, in Belgium. And in particular we warn you herewith not to supply any means whatever to enable any delegate to attend this said congress. Any public announcement asking for funds for this purpose is likewise prohibited. Any person acting contrary to this notice will be prosecuted, and is liable to a penalty not exceeding £20, or three months' imprisonment. Any monies so collected will be confiscated and handed over to the poor-box of the district. This notice will take effect from the day of its publication.

"Gelsenkirchen, 30 April, 1890."

"DR. BALTZ, Sub-Prefect.

This proclamation is quoted from an article on the Congress by Mr. Abrahams (Mabon) in a South Wales paper. Mabon, besides commenting on this edict, gives some other facts which show what a sham is William's "earnest desire to improve the condition of the wealth-producers." Mabon says:

"This most extraordinary notice was posted in all mining districts, and also published in the newspapers. Is not this tyrannical edict in striking contrast to the solicitude recently expressed by the Emperor William on behalf of the labouring classes? . . . In point of fact, however, proclamations notwithstanding, no country was more ably represented than Germany, one of the representatives being one of the men that recently appeared before the Emperor. These men reported that one of their comrades, who, at a public meeting recently, dared to denounce a large colliery director who had artfully and wrongfully broken a pledge given by him to them on strike in order to induce them to return to work, had been sent to gaol for twelve months. When asked why they did not take part in the question of a general strike if the eight hours day was not conceded, they said, 'that they dare not,' for if they did, they would, upon their return to their own country, be prosecuted, and placed in prison. But they knew their countrymen and their sufferings so well, that when the time agreed upon arrived they would rise to a man and 'strike the blow.'"

We wonder what the miners think of that old humbug Burt after this. It is quite evident that a reactionary Government knew what it was about when it sent him as a delegate to the Berlin Conference. But surely it will be impossible for any body of workmen to have any confidence in him in future. Has "Tory money" got anything to do with Mr. Burt's sudden zeal in the cause of reaction? Or is it the weakness and childish imbecility of advancing age? Let us charitably conclude that it is the latter. In that case the Miners' National Union had better pension him off: "Superfluous lags the veteran on the stage."

Livesey Hooted.

Livesey had quite an ovation at the Victoria Hall on Friday night. This gentleman, who drenched his blacklegs with beer and brandy during the recent strike, had the impudence to appear on the platform as chairman of a meeting to protest against "compensation to publicans." The audience were so delighted, that if they could have got hold of Livesey they would have probably "compensated" him. What Livesey's great exemplar, Mr. Pecksniff, would have called "forcible and hilarious suggestions" for Livesey's removal were made by a numerous and savage audience. "Chuck him out," "Break his neck," "Throw him off the platform," were among the yells which assailed him. So furious was the hooting, that Livesey, after vainly endeavouring to speak, had to "gracefully" retire, like Sir Charles Warren at the Oxford Music Hall. We believe Mr. Livesey professes to be "a sincere and earnest Christian" as well as a "temperance advocate," and we want to give him an opportunity of proving his Christian beneficence. If anyone will send us his private address, we will be happy to publish it for the information of some hundreds of starving gas-stokers, who are anxious to call upon him to show their "gratitude and respect" for his late "kindness" towards them, and also to "solicit a voluntary contribution" for the support of their wives and families.

International Labour League and Federation.

This organisation held a very successful meeting at the East Finsbury Radical Club on Saturday, June 7th. Thirty-five organisations were represented by sixty delegates from all parts of London. An attempt was made by the State Socialists to get the federation formed upon a "legal and constitutional basis." But most of the delegates were not authorised to pledge their organisations to this programme, and the question is held over till the 13th of July, when another conference will be held. We hope that the workers will steer clear of legality, and decide as the miners and other Socialist workmen on the Continent have done, not to wait for Governments or Parliaments to give them the eight hours day, but to obtain it for themselves by a general strike of workmen in every trade. INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

GERMANY.

The German Socialist Publishing Company have issued the second volume of a most interesting work, entitled Nach Zehn Jahren (After Ten Years), being the history of the working of the muzzle-laws in Germany for the last decade. We say an interesting work, and regret not being able to add an impartial one, but we have no room here to deal at any length with the contents of the book. We want only to say that 15,000 copies of the first volume, and already 12,000 copies of the second volume have found their way in Germany alone, and after such a widespread circulation the Berlin police have thought it necessary now to prohibit the entry on German territory of this Socialist publication.

A German Socialist, comrade Janisverski, who was the opponent of Professor Virchow at the recent election for the Reichstag, has been ordered to leave Berlin.

The police have arrested at Wiesenbach, in Saxe-Weimar, comrade Steuzleit, who recently returned to that town from America. A domiciliary visit to his house resulted in the discovery of various appliances for making explosive shells.

It is expected that comrade Bebel will become the chief editor of the daily Berliner Volksblatt, the principal Socialistic organ now issued in Germany, after the 30th of September next, when the muzzle-laws will cease to be in force. It is also stated that comrade Auer, who for the present is expelled from Berlin, will be the sub-editor of the paper.

The government of Saxony have asked that the Bundesrath may prolong the state of siege which is proclaimed over Leipzig, that would otherwise cease to exist under normal circumstances after the 28th of this month. The authorities in Saxony have always been the most ardent adversaries of the Socialists; the Draconian laws of 1878 have nowhere been applied more vigorously than in Saxony. The papers of that part of Germany are especially reactionary; they issue just now scores of articles of a most alarming nature, describing under the most sombre light the situation which will be created by the abrogation of the muzzle-laws. Another paper issued at Hamburg goes still further, and says "The government are placed in an awkward position; they cannot aggravate the general penal legislation without restraining at the same time the political freedom of all other parties; on the other hand, if they abrogate simply and purely the anti-Socialist law an insurrection becomes inevitable, and when the guns will have interfered God knows what may then happen! It is possible that a good strong bleeding following the revolt may have a salutary influence on the social organisation, but on one condition only: that this bleeding be implacable and merciless; otherwise there will be no end of troubles and revolts, and Socialism, like a cankerous disease, will permeate society at large."

There are still a considerable number of partial strikes going on all over Germany. At Altenburg, the sculptors, carpenters, and turners have won their cause. The sculptors of Erfenschlag, near Chemnitz, have also obtained an increase of 25 per cent. The cabinet makers at Gorlitz are still out of work, as well as the millers of Leipzig and neighbourhood. The cigar-makers at Brunswick have succeeded, after a strike which lasted for several months and cost over 50,000 marks, in getting rid of a tyrannical foreman. The strikers at Fleusburg have now resumed work after having won their demands. The carpenters of Leipzig and at Hamburg are still out of work, and intend to stick to their guns as long as they possibly can. Numerous other strikes, which cannot all be recorded here, are in progress, and make at the present time the German soil rather hot for the capitalist class of that country. Everywhere, in fact, all over the world, we seem to approach the beginning of the end!

RUSSIA.

The paper of the "Society of Friends of Russian Freedom" has now appeared, and we can only say that this venture is well worth of meeting with the sympathies of all true-hearted men and women. In "A Free Platform for Russian Reformers," Dr. R. Spence Watson, speaking of the Russophile movement in England, says: "The actual task which we contemplate is the wide dissemination from time to time of accurate information upon the political position of Russia in domestic affairs, the condition of the people, the treatment of political exiles, and all the action of authorities in suppressing all aspirations for freedom. From time to time news appears in the French or English papers casting a lurid light upon the darkness which surrounds Russian life, but that light and the interest it awakens speedily die away. We wish to prevent this, and to preserve the interest by ensuring that authentic information shall be regularly forthcoming. In spite of many difficulties, such information will be provided; and although in the nature of things the source from whence it is obtained cannot be disclosed, every pains will be taken to assure that everything we publish shall be so guaranteed as to stand the test of the severest investigation." Free Russia, having so stated the nature of its publication, enters at once into Russian affairs. Madame Tzebrikova's Letter to the Tzar is reprinted, and we fully agree with the commentator when he says that her letter is a most important and perhaps historical event in the record of Russian liberation. The Siberian atrocities are dealt with in an exhaustive manner, and it is clearly shown that the life of the whole mass of people exiled and imprisoned in Siberia has been made unendurable by the new rules and recent events.

Another good feature of Free Russia is the "Bibliography of the Russian Question," and we hope it may be made as complete as possible, for the benefit of those who want to become more acquainted with the history and details of the Russian question.

The paper may be had from the publisher (Reeves, Fleet Street) at 1d. a copy. Every subscriber to the fund of the Society from 1s. and upwards will receive all its publications that shall be forthcoming, free of charge till further notice.

All of us—revolutionary Socialists, Anarchists, Social Democrats—who are engaged in the battle of freedom against tyranny and oppression, must feel deeply interested in the fate of these heroic Russian men and women who, by hundreds and thousands, are willing to give up their lives as the vanguard of the army of social justice and human liberty.

DENMARK.

We have already spoken last week about the stonemasons and bricklayers strike of Copenhagen. We are now requested to reproduce the appeal launched by our Danish friends. It runs as follows: "Comrades, the bricklayers of Copenhagen, at this moment, are struggling to bring about a nine-hours working day and a payment of 50 ore (6½d.) an hour. The strike broke out on the 12th of May, after we had negotiated for about two years with the masters about this matter. But they have always opposed our claim, although want of employment increased year after year in such a manner that about 500 have been obliged to leave Copenhagen and a great number of others have been forced to seek work abroad. Under these circumstances, we had no other resource than to ask for a reduction of hours, and the masters persistently refusing to yield to this, about 1,200 bricklayers have struck work, whereby 800 unskilled workmen and a number of carpenters have also got out of work. The masters' corporation is engaged in struggling against us; they have associated with the building-speculators, the carriers and constructors, to prevent those of the masters who would be willing to accede to our demands to go on working. Thus we are at war against our whole capitalist class, and the battle will be a hard one. As the question of reduced hours is for us of great importance, we are ready to hold out until we have won our cause. Therefore, comrades and brethren, we do beg you instantly not to come to Copenhagen before the strike has ended, and we also entreat to send us your support. Remember that, owing to the strike, about 2,500 families are without bread. We also request you to let us know whether work is abundant enough with you to allow some of our striking comrades to get employment in England." Signed H. Rasmussen, chairman of the Bricklayers' Union of Denmark. Treasurer: P. C. Olsen, 22, Romersgade str., Copenhagen, K. Denmark. V. D.

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

OFFICES: 24, GREAT QUEEN ST., LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

The Offices of the Socialist League will be open for the sale of Commonweal and all other Socialist publications from 8.30 a.m. to 9 p.m. every day except Sunday. The Secretary will be in attendance from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m. daily.

Executive.—We wish to draw the attention of Branches to the decision of the Conference re Branch Reports, viz., "That monthly records of the work done, condition of the workers, etc., be, where practicable, substituted for the short weekly reports."

Propaganda Committee.—The Propaganda Committee meets on Tuesday, June 17, at 8.30 p.m. Special meeting; important business; all members of the League interested in the propaganda invited to attend.

Branch Subscriptions Paid.—1890:—Leicester and North Kensington, to end of April. Glasgow, Oxford, Hammersmith, North London, East London, 'Commonweal' Branch, Manchester, and Norwich, to end of May. Streatham, to end of December.

(Branch Secretaries will please send with remittances for Capitations the number of their membership.)

NEW PREMISES FUND.

Collected at Council meeting, June 9th, 3s. 6d.

"COMMONWEAL" GUARANTEE FUND.

The following further sums have been received towards this fund:—East London Branch, 3s.; B. W. 1s.; H. R., 1s.; 'Commonweal' Branch, 16s. 4d.; Deakin (Walsall), 10s.; A. H. (Norwich), 5s.; D. Nicoll (2 weeks), 1s.; P. Webb, 1s.; Hammersmith Branch, 2s.; Mrs. Edwards, 1s.; C. Saunders, 2s.; and Glasgow Branch, 5s.

REPORTS.

EAST LONDON.—We are trying hard to push Revolutionary Socialism among the workers in the East-end, and are very hopeful. We intend in future to make it a feature at our meetings to have female comrades open with revolutionary songs; Mrs. Morgan has been very active in this respect for weeks past. We held four meetings last week, viz., at Hoxton Church on Friday night, at Union Street on Sunday morning, and Victoria Park and Hoxton Church in the afternoon; literature sold well. At Union Street we have had the pleasure of hearing two comrades, Wright and Marsh, make a start as speakers, and we hope in future to spur on other comrades to take an active part in spreading our ideas. At Stratford Church, Mrs. Lahr and Cores tried to hold a meeting, but were driven away by the police. The following speakers have addressed meetings during the week—Blundell, Parker, Cores, Hicks, Davis, Brookes, Mowbray, Mrs. Lahr, Wright, and Marsh.

NORTH LONDON.—After the demonstration on Saturday, we endeavoured to enlighten the teetotallers as to the errors of their ways, which started a brisk discussion; one said that among the many advantages of total abstinence it enabled him to live on a pound a week and bring up a wife and family of ten respectably; our speakers were Cantwell, Moore, and Parker. In Regent's Park, Cantwell and Nicoll spoke to an attentive audience; collected 1s. 8d., and 6s. worth of literature sold.—T. C.

ABERDEEN.—Open-air work was resumed here in Castle Street on the evening of Saturday the 7th,—the first meeting (which had been announced by handbills) taking the form of a demonstration to protest against the freedom of the city being presented to Stanley, who pays us a visit in about a fortnight. Before the singing commenced we were surrounded by some hundreds of people, who had gathered there to hear us. Comrades Duncan, W. Cooper, and Leatham were listened to with close attention—a number of damaging extracts, read from Stanley's own books and letters, creating a marked impression. When a hope was expressed at the close that those who had learned what manner of man Mr. Stanley was, and what kind of work he had been doing, would show their disapproval when the celebrations came on, the large crowd responded with unanimous applause. At the indoor meeting on the night following, at which there was a large attendance of non-members, Nicoll's article on "Stanley's Exploits" was read and discussed.—L.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday we held two very successful meetings; one on Jail Square, which was addressed by Joe Burgoyne; and one at Paisley Road Toll, which was addressed by Glasier. At the latter meeting Morris's idea of how the Revolution may be achieved, as given in "News from Nowhere" in last week's Weal, much impressed the audience; all our Weals were sold out.

DUBLIN.—At the Dublin Branch of the Theosophical Society, on Wednesday, June 4th, Mr. E. A. Neale read a paper on "Socialism and Theosophy," in which he accepted the doctrines of Socialism. The opposition was of the usual thrift, reward of industry, etc., kind; Fitzpatrick, King, Hamilton, Mr. F. J. Allen, and others took part in a highly interesting discussion.

EDINBURGH—SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—We held a very good meeting on the Meadows on Sunday, and although it rained somewhat heavily, the good speeches of Mackenzie, Hamilton, Smith, Bell, and Davidson kept the crowd together till a late hour. Some statements about the Trades Council roused the ire of Purdie, the bookbinders' representative, and other unionists, and a sharp exchange of questions and answers was the only result, but perhaps the last has not been heard on the subject. Our new hall is opened, and is ready to be let for trades and other meetings. No one need fail to find us, as our name may be read at a considerable distance—large white letters on a vermillion ground.—T.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

NOTES ON NEWS.

A LITTLE too previous. Our friend the Star announces to its readers that there has been "another" split in the S. L.; and Reynolds, misled probably by the false news of the delectable evening print, comes out with a note wherein we are informed we are "waking up," and we are dividing ourselves into still minuter sections. The Star, with characteristic unfairness, refused insertion until the last moment to a contradiction sent by comrade Morris. No enemy is more virulent than a renegade; and if the Star really wishes for reliable information as to what is going on within the ranks of the Socialists, it should seek cleaner channels of obtaining it than the individual it uses now for the purpose. Presently we shall have something to say about the erstwhile Socialist press gang which will make them wince.

"Dodo" in Reynolds has disclosed the particular sect to which he belongs, by the puff he gives it as having done "all the practical work." The wish is father to the thought re the alleged split in the S.L. No doubt the existence of an International Organisation is a thorn to those who are continually abusing foreigners, and Germans in particular, because the English Royal Collar is made of German silver. We may be "somnolent," but we think that the preaching of International Solidarity is preferable to the national prejudices and continual laudation of Sham Republics like France and America, of which "Dodo," in common with the staff of Reynolds, seems to be lost in rapt admiration.

EDITORS.

The Daily News the other day had an elaborate congratulatory article on the progress of Italy, which was once nothing at all, and is now a great nation courted and flattered by all the great powers. I do not know nor care how much the Italian bourgeois patriot likes this "condescension" of the English ditto, but I cannot help feeling that all this glorification of the progress of the commercial class in the country (for that is what it comes to) is little better than an insult to the general humanity of Italy.

All this glory of the nation to which he has the honour to belong, what will it do for the Italian peasant, the Italian labourer, the Italian town-workman? The Lombard field-labourer driven to his toil in a gang, dying by inches of pellagra (in English, starvation) in the very garden of Europe, I wonder what touch of national vanity (which is what people mean by "patriotism") his master's grinding has left in him. The town workman in whom even trades' unionism is a crime, I wonder whether he thinks that his nation has done all they can for him in driving out the Germans and leaving the capitalists to fatten on his labour?

Italy is like other "civilised" nations, she keeps her successes, her progress, her civilisation for a class of masters. Who could venture to say that Italy has "progressed" who thinks of the condition of those that alone make Italy, the workers, the useful part of the country? Those who write flattering articles about Italy's progress, do in truth think of nothing human in Italy except the middle-class; to them the rest are not men and women, but parts of the huge machine which grinds the masters' sweet idle life. But how if the machine should one day burst?

W. M.

The Earl of Wemyss was kind enough in the House of Lords the other night, in a debate on the sweating system, to lay down a few rules of conduct for the people, and which he told them would be excellent remedies for their poverty. He said:

"True statesmanship consisted in telling the people the truth that to a great extent the cure rested with themselves. They must practise temperance and thrift, and must, like the upper classes, avoid marriage until they were able to support their wives and families in comfort. They must be taught not to regard emigration as banishment, but to accept it as a means of reducing the surplus population of this country."

It is quite true that the "cure" does rest with the people, but we doubt whether that remedy is one that Earl Wemyss would relish.

As to the noble lord's humbugging cant about "temperance and thrift," we should have thought that it was scarcely possible for an East-end workman, earning from 15s. to 20s. a-week, to be anything but "temperate and thrifty" upon it. If Lord Wemyss doubts this he is welcome to try the experiment of living upon this sum, and he will then be able to tell us whether it leaves him a very ample margin for expenditure in champagne, cigars, and other luxuries which the noble lord, thanks to the "temperance and thrift" of other people, is now able to enjoy.

The poor must "avoid marriage." Must they! What excellent advice from a "Christian and moral" peer! At that rate the Mile End Road would soon be as full of prostitutes as Piccadilly, and the aristocracy would not be able even to claim a monopoly of immorality. Why, we might even have an East-end Cleveland Street, if the poor "like the upper classes avoid marriage." What splendid morality and "manly virtues" the great Earl Wemyss endeavours to spread among the people! Perhaps they might reply that in these things they are not anxious to emulate the "upper classes."

But the people have still another lesson to learn, and that is, "not to regard emigration as banishment, but to accept it as a means of reducing the surplus population of the country." It strikes me that it will take the people some time to swallow this pill. Why are people forced to emigrate? Because the Earl of Wemyss and his brother thieves, the landlords and capitalists, cannot make rent or profit out of their labour, and so the workmen are forced by starvation to "emigrate." And thus, owing to the monopoly of the land and the means of production by Wemyss and Co., they cannot live in the land of their birth. Earl Wemyss may not consider this "banishment," but the people hold a different opinion.

Supposing, some day the workmen get tired of supplying idle scoundrels with wealth to spend in every form of vice and profligacy which it is possible for the most diseased and depraved mind to imagine; suppose that they rise in revolt, and hunt Wemyss and Co. out of the country, like the French peasants hunted their lords a hundred years ago. Would Earl Wemyss consider that "banishment"? It was called "emigration" then.

Some people might, however, be content "to accept it as a means of reducing the 'surplus' population of the country." Like the countryman in the story, we think that "emigration" is an excellent thing properly applied, and that in England we could very well spare "a few landlords." Earl Wemyss might with advantage set the example, and go first. The unemployed could make a good use of his acres, when they had not got to keep him into the bargain.

SCENES FROM THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

III.

THE REVOLT OF THE WOMEN.

THE 5th of October, 1789, dawns—a dull, desolate morning—and the great city of Paris is waking to life again. Already the idea is afloat among the women that the National Guards will surely not fire upon them, and at the markets and in the bakers' queues there is excited talk. "The men are cowards, and will not act; then let the women act. Forward to the Hôtel de Ville, to Versailles! Down with the fore-stallers of bread! Death to murderous aristocrats and their black cockades!"

A woman in one of these excited groups in the Quartier St. Eustace snatches a drum from a guardhouse, rushing through the adjacent streets beating it and raising cries concerning the scarcity of bread. A crowd of women gather round her, and increase in number as they approach the Hôtel de Ville. At the same time a host of women sweep in a surging flood from St. Antoine, the East-end of Paris, and pour like a torrent through the streets, pulling into their ranks every woman they can lay hold of—even breaking into houses and dragging them out. Thus the crowd rushes on—roaring, shouting, brandishing weapons of every kind—and streams into the open space, the Grève, in front of the Town Hall, raising fearful cries of "Bread! bread!" and demanding to speak with the representatives of the Commune. Lafayette, Bailly, and the other representatives are not there. The Municipal Council sat late into the night, discussing the troubled condition of Paris, and there are now only at the Town Hall a few clerks, with a slender guard of Nationals, under the command of M. de Gouvion, a major-general who has served with Lafayette in America. Just before the crowd enters upon the place in front of the Hotel de Ville, a baker who has been selling bread with short weights is brought there in custody by some National Guards. The furious crowd already gathering rush upon him with fearful shouts, but he is dragged from their hands by National Guards, taken into the Town Hall, and smuggled out of the back door. M. de Gouvion, alarmed at the vast crowd of women now covering the place, sends round to the districts for reinforcements. Meanwhile, on come the women. In front of the Town Hall are a body of mounted Nationals. These the women set upon with showers of stones, and they are forced to retreat before the desperate crowd. And now for the Town Hall. On they come in one long wave. The National Guards form on the stone stairs outside, and receive them with a hedge of glittering steel. But the crowd rushes on madly; stones begin to fly from behind; it is impossible to fire on these starving, desperate women; the guards give way; and the crowd dashes on, surging, thundering through the halls and passages of the Hôtel de Ville. List to their savage shouts—Bread! bread! Bread and arms! The men are cowards! We will show them what courage means! Others cry that the municipal councillors, especially Lafayette and Bailly, deserve hanging. Some of the women batter at the door of the magazine of arms, but cannot force it. Fierce and ragged men, armed with axes and crowbars, come to their aid; the door is broken open, and eight hundred stand of arms are pulled out, with two pieces of cannon. Here they also lay hands on three bags of gold, one of which is promptly annexed by someone, but the others are rescued.

Meanwhile, another troop have swept up to the belfry, looking for Lafayette and Bailly, whom they do not find, but find instead only one member of the Municipal Council, an unfortunate Abbé Lefevre, who was very busy distributing powder on the Bastille day, but has since ranked among the moderates. He is soon hanging out of the belfry with a rope round his neck. The rope, however, is cut, or breaks, and he tumbles down upon the leads, and lives for years afterwards, though always with "a trembling in the limbs." But below they are piling up heaps of paper, which two ladies with blazing torches announce their intention of setting on fire, when suddenly their hands are seized by a gigantic man dressed in sombre black. It is Usher Maillard, prominent in the assault upon the Bastille, now sergeant in the Bastille Volunteers, composed of men who distinguished themselves in the assault on that fortress.

Maillard had arrived at the Town Hall before the women arrived, with complaints from his volunteers. On the arrival of the women, he rushed forth and returned with the company of the Bastille heroes, arriving just in time to prevent the Town Hall from being burnt down. For the moment the women are inclined to turn their wrath on to him; but he tells them who he is, and is then received with joy. He says that he will lead them to Versailles, and entering the room where the officials are clustered in confused terror, he informs them there is only one thing to do, and that is to take the women to Versailles. The officials, half beside themselves, will not sanction this step, so Maillard takes it without them, seizes a drum, and beating on it loudly, runs down the stairs, the women rushing after him. Downstairs eight thousand women have rallied in the Place de Grève, armed with every species of weapon—pikes, guns, pitchforks, ironshod bludgeons, and several pieces of cannon, dragged by horses taken from carriages. Seated on one of these cannon is Théroigne de Mericourt, once a beautiful courtesan, but who now, moved by the enthusiasm of revolution, had given up her trade, and declared that she would have no more lovers except the great constitution-maker, the Abbé de Sieyes, noted for his coldness and his hatred for women. Thus with drums beating at the head of this motley multitude Maillard starts for Versailles, and the Place de Grève and the Hôtel de Ville are left empty as the human sea sweeps on.

On they march through the West End of Paris past the Louvre and the Tuileries, men crowding to the windows to gaze in astonishment, but no women showing their faces for fear they should be pressed. It is not pleasant weather for a march through the country to Versailles this dull dank October day, for rain is falling and they splash in mud and water as they go. In the Elysian Fields, the Parisian Hyde Park, there is a halt, and there Maillard harangues them; he is met with shouts that they wish to march to the Arsenal for arms, but he declares that there are no arms in the Arsenal, and recommends that they march without arms peacefully and petition the National Assembly. Then, forming them in somewhat like military order they march on, the Bastille volunteers bringing up the rear. Through the villages on the road they tramp, at some of which the peasants are glad to yield a supply of bread to prevent their houses being pillaged by the hungry crowd. Any woman they can lay hands on is forced to join them. Fine carriage ladies in their dainty vehicles are forced to descend, though with shrieks and hysterics, and to march on. Carriages and travellers of all kinds are stopped, especially any that come from Paris, so that news cannot be carried to Versailles. Among others is Deputy Lechappelier, who explains very nervously "That he is a good patriot, and presided in the Assembly on the famous 4th of August." This announcement is met with a shout of "Vive Lechappelier!" and several people spring up behind and before to escort him.

But, meanwhile, rumours do reach Versailles, despite the stopping of couriers and passengers. The National Assembly is in very bad spirits at the sight of royalism becoming so rampant; the king, too, has refused to accept the famous 'Rights of Man,' which has just been passed as part of the new constitution by the Assembly, and altogether the Court has taken a very defiant attitude. When the news of the march of the women reaches Versailles, Mirabeau, one of the first to hear it, crosses to Mounier, the President of the day, and informs him that Paris is marching upon Versailles, and that he must fall suddenly unwell and go to the palace and tell them. Mounier, who though a very mild constitutionalist, has been much irritated by recent events, and replies, "Paris marches on us! Well, so much the better; we shall sooner be a Republic!"

But Paris is marching; scarcely had the women departed than an immense crowd fills the Place de Grève, Nationals summoned by M. de Gouvion, the work-people from St. Antoine, and last but not least, the famous Garde Français, whose appearance caused the Bastille to fall, now known as the Centre Grenadiers of the National Guard. These are loudly cheered, but they reply "It is not cheers we want; the nation has been insulted! To arms! and come to us for orders!" A deputation of these brave soldiers enter the Hôtel de Ville, where the frightened Municipals have already assembled. They see Lafayette and speak to him in blunt soldier fashion, "My General, we are deputed by the six companies of Grenadiers. We do not think you a traitor, but we think the Government betrays you. We cannot turn our bayonets against women crying to us for bread. The people are miserable, the source of their misery is at Versailles; we must go and seek the King and bring him to Paris. We must exterminate the Flanders regiment and the body-guard, who have dared to trample on the National Cockade. If the King be too weak to wear a crown let him lay it down. You will crown his son, you will name a council of regency and all will go better!" Poor Lafayette could only reply, "What! would you make war upon the King?" But all his pleading was in vain. "The King must come to Paris; all the people wish it!" Lafayette and Bailly then try their eloquence outside, but it is lost among cries of "Bread! Bread! To Versailles! To Versailles!" Lafayette mounts his white charger and speaks from that; but it is all in vain. "To Versailles! To Versailles!" Finding eloquence and white charger useless, he tries to bolt, but is stopped by the Centre Grenadiers. "My General, you will not leave us." What is to be done? Half the day has been wasted in unavailing speech! And now from St. Antoine there come cries of "To the Lanterne!" St. Antoine has some idea of settling the difficulty by hanging the general. Lafayette sends in word to the very much frightened Municipals, to ask whether he is to go, and receives an order to do so. He informs the crowd that he will go. The decision is received with shouts of rapture, and they march for Versailles, all Paris shouting and applauding as the troops march by. The people from the suburb of St. Antoine have already marched, and the huge host pours on, covering the country roads that lead to Versailles. The drunken orgie at the Opera House has done its work. Paris throngs in tumultuous crowds, and marches in military order upon Versailles.

C. COBLEY.—This correspondent sends in a letter asking "why we Socialists have never dealt with the question of foreign immigration into this country," and then proceeds to advocate the imposition of a heavy tax upon such poor foreigners as emigrate here. "It would at least," says he, "prevent those without visible means of subsistence from landing here and working for any mean wage that is offered to them." But he doubts the efficacy of his own specific, for a little further on he says that "he believes that it is the importation of cheap foreign goods 'free of duty' rather than foreign immigration which injures the English workman." In the first place the letter should not have been addressed to us, as we attach only a conventional meaning to the word "foreigner," and recognise in our working comrades of other lands as members of the Army of Labour, whose emancipation is fast approaching. We expect that the number of persons who label themselves as Socialists and wave the red flag over every crochet, are responsible for the confusion in our correspondent's mind, and which has led him to address us. He would put a heavy fine upon foreigners, which would be a bagatelle upon such as the Rothschilds, in order to keep out poor foreigners. Very large-minded and generous indeed. From this to the re-erection of the toll-gates, which fined people for locomotion from one place to another, is but a step. Our friend has given us no indication that he objects in any way to the International Capitalistic System, which preys upon all without regard to clime: and, therefore, we would like to know whether he objects to accept the results of foreign genius simply because it is not native? Many of those who have sought refuge upon these shores have enriched Literature, Art, and Science in this country, who upon landing could not have paid a pecuniary fine. We have not yet come across the Englishman who refused to make a profit out of an invention, or take advantage of scientific discoveries when made by foreigners; in fact, hundreds of Englishmen have employment in this way. As to a "mean" wage: the strikes going on around us are not complicated by the foreigner but by the native blackleg, and certainly it is not the possibility of getting foreigners as substitutes which makes British slaves of bus, tram, and railway employes. In conclusion, we would advise our correspondent to leave the labyrinthian ways of narrow national prejudices, and strike out upon the high road of International Solidarity.—[EDS.]

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. XVIII.—THE BEGINNING OF THE NEW LIFE.

"WELL," said I, "so you got clear out of all your troubles. Were people satisfied with the new order of things when it came?"

"People?" he said. "Well, surely almost all must have been glad of peace when it came; especially when they found, as they must have found, that after all, they—even the once-rich—were not living very badly. As to those who had been poor, all through the war, which lasted about two years, their condition had been bettering, in spite of the struggle; and when peace came at last, in a very short time they made great strides towards a decent life. The great difficulty was that the once-poor had such a feeble conception of the real pleasure of life: so to say, they did not ask enough, did not know how to ask enough, from the new state of things. It was perhaps rather a good than an evil thing that the necessity for restoring the wealth destroyed during the war forced them into working at first almost as hard as they had been used to before the Revolution. For all historians are agreed that there never was a war in which there was so much destruction of wares and instruments for making them as in this civil war."

"I am rather surprised at that," said I.

"Are you? I don't see why," said Hammond.

"Why," I said, "because the party of order would surely look upon the wealth as their own property, no share of which, if they could help it, should go to their slaves, supposing they conquered. And on the other hand, it was just for the possession of that wealth that the 'rebels' were fighting, and I should have thought, especially when they saw that they were winning, that they would have been careful to destroy as little as possible of what was so soon to be their own."

"It was as I have told you, however," said he. "The party of order, when they recovered from their first cowardice of surprise—or, if you please, when they fairly saw that, whatever happened, they would be ruined, fought with great bitterness, and cared little what they did, so long as they injured the enemies who had destroyed the sweets of life for them. As to the rebels, I have told you that the outbreak of actual war made them careless of trying to save the wretched scraps of wealth that they had. It was a common saying amongst them, Let the country be cleared of everything except valiant living men, rather than that we fall into slavery again!"

He sat silently thinking a while, and then said: "Don't you see what it means? In the times which you are thinking of, and of which you seem to know so much, there was no hope; nothing but the dull jog of the mill-horse under compulsion of collar and whip; but in that fighting-time that followed, all was hope: the rebels at least felt themselves strong enough to build up the world again from its dry bones,—and they did it too!" said the old man, his eyes glittering under his beetling brows. He went on: "And their opponents at least and at last learned something about the reality of life, and its sorrows, which they—their class, I mean—had once known nothing of. In short, the two combatants, the workman and the gentleman, between them—"

"Between them," said I, quickly, "they destroyed commercialism!"

"Yes, yes, YES," said he; "that is it. Nor could it have been destroyed otherwise; except, perhaps, by the whole of society gradually falling into lower depths, till it should at last reach a condition as rude as barbarism, but lacking both the hope and the pleasures of barbarism. Surely the sharper, shorter remedy was the happiest."

"Most surely," said I.

"Yes," said the old man, "the world was being brought to its second birth; how could that take place without a tragedy. Moreover, think of it. The spirit of the new days, of our days, was to be delight in the life of the world; intense and almost overweening love of the very skin and surface of the earth on which man dwells, such as a lover has in the fair flesh of the woman he loves; this, I say, was to be the new spirit of the time. All other moods save this had been exhausted: the unceasing criticism, the boundless curiosity in the ways and thoughts of man, which was the mood of the ancient Greek, to whom these things were not so much a means, as an end, was gone past recovery; nor had there been really any shadow of it in the so-called science of the nineteenth century, which, as you must know, was in the main an appendage to the commercial system; nay, not seldom an appendage to the police of that system. In spite of appearances, it was limited and cowardly, because it did not really believe in itself. It was the outcome, as it was the sole relief, of the unhappiness of the period which made life so bitter even to the rich, and which, as you may see with your bodily eyes, the great change has swept away. More akin to our way of looking at life is the spirit of the Middle Ages, to whom heaven and the life of the next world was such a reality, that it became to them a part of the life upon the earth; which accordingly they loved and adorned, in spite of the ascetic doctrines of their creed, which bade them contemn it.

"But that also, with its assured belief in heaven and hell as two countries in which to live, has gone, and now we do, both in word and in deed, believe in the continuous life of the world of men, and as it were, add every day of that common life to the little stock of days which our own mere individual experience wins for us: and consequently we are happy. Do you wonder at it? In times past, indeed, men were told to love their kind, to believe in the religion of humanity, and so forth. But look you, just in the degree that a man had elevation of mind and refinement enough to be able to value this idea, was he repelled by the obvious aspect of the individuals composing the mass which he was to worship, and could only evade that repulsion by making a conventional abstraction of mankind that had little actual or historical relation to the race, which to his eyes was divided into blind tyrants on the one hand and apathetic degraded slaves on the other. But now, where is the difficulty in accepting the religion of humanity when the men and women who go to make up humanity are free, happy, and energetic at least, and most commonly beautiful of body also, and surrounded by beautiful things of their own fashioning, and a nature bettered and not worsened by contact with mankind. This is what this age of the world has reserved for us."

"It seems true," said I, "or ought to be, if what my eyes have seen is a token of the general life you lead. Can you now tell me anything of your progress after the years of the struggle?"

Said he: "I could easily tell you more than you have time to listen to; but I can at least hint at one of the chief difficulties which had to be met: and that was, that when men began to settle down after the war, and their labour had pretty much filled up the gap in wealth caused by the destruction of that war, a kind of disappointment seemed coming over us, and the prophecies of some of the reactionists of past times seemed as if they would come true, and a dull level of utilitarian comfort be the end for a while of our aspirations and success. The loss of the competitive spur to exertion had not, indeed, done anything to interfere with the necessary production of the community, but how if it should make men dull by giving them too much time for thought or idle musing. But, after all, this dull thunder-cloud only threatened us, and then passed over. Probably, from what I have told you before, you will have a guess at the remedy for such a disaster; remembering always that many of the things which used to be produced—slave-wares for the poor and mere wealth-wasting wares for the rich—ceased to be made. That remedy was, in short, the production of what used to be called art, but which has no name amongst us now, because it has become a necessary part of the labour of every man who produces."

Said I: "What! had men any time or opportunity for cultivating the fine arts amidst the desperate struggle for life and freedom that you have told me of?"

Said Hammond: "You must not suppose that the new form of art was founded chiefly on the memory of the art of the past; although, strange to say, the civil war was much less destructive of art than of other things, and although what of art existed under the old forms revived in a wonderful way during the latter part of the struggle, especially as regards music and poetry. The art or work-pleasure, as one ought to call it, of which I am now speaking, sprung up almost spontaneously, it seems, from a kind of instinct amongst people, no longer driven desperately to painful and terrible over-work, to do the best they could with the work in hand—to make it excellent of its kind; and when that had gone on for a little, a craving for beauty seemed to awaken in men's minds, and they began rudely and awkwardly to ornament the wares which they made; and when they had once set to work at that, it soon began to grow. All this was much helped by the abolition of the squalor our immediate ancestors put up with so coolly; and by the leisurely but not stupid country-life which now grew (as I told you before) to be common amongst us. Thus at last and by slow degrees we got pleasure into our work; then we became conscious of that pleasure, and cultivated it, and took care that we had our fill of it; and then all was gained, and we were happy. So may it be for ages and ages!"

The old man fell into a reverie, not altogether without melancholy, I thought; but I would not break it. Suddenly he started, and said: "Well, dear guest, here are come Dick and Clara to fetch you away, and there is an end of my talk; which I daresay you will not be sorry for; the long day is coming to an end, and you will have a pleasant ride back to Hammersmith."

A SOCIAL MEETING

AND CONFERENCE OF LONDON REVOLUTIONISTS

WILL BE HELD

AT THE INTERNATIONAL CLUB,

40 BERNER STREET, E.,

On Tuesday, June 24th, at 8.30 p.m.

All Revolutionary Socialists are invited, whether members of societies, clubs, or groups, or working as independent propagandists. Comrades of international clubs specially invited.

The position of the Revolutionary Organs, and the best means of extending their circulation, will be discussed.

The great object of the meeting is, the consolidation of our forces and the extension of the revolutionary and Anarchist-Communist propaganda.

A good number of well known comrades and societies have already promised to take part in the proceedings.

A Concert and Dancing will follow the conference. Admission free. All anti-parliamentary Socialists are urged to attend.

THE ORGANISING COMMITTEE.

(Appointed by the S.L. Propaganda Committee.)

OFFICES: 24 GREAT QUEEN STREET, LONDON, W.C.

HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEDD IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON

The COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. For Australia, New Zealand, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Transvaal, and the Argentine Republic, a year, 8s.; six months, 4s.; three months, 2s. For India, Ceylon, China, Hong Kong, and the Straits Settlements, a year, 10s.; six months, 5s.; three months, 2s. 6d.

Subscribers who receive a RED WRAPPER are thereby reminded that their subscriptions have expired and must be renewed immediately if they wish to continue to receive COMMONWEAL.

SPECIAL RECRUIT SUBSCRIPTIONS.—To aid in spreading our principles, the following largely reduced terms are offered to those who obtain new subscribers: Two new yearly subscriptions for British Islands, etc., 10s. 6d.; for Australia, etc., 15s.; for India, etc., 19s. Five new subscriptions: For British Islands, etc., 25s.; for Australia, etc., 37s. 6d.; for India, etc., 47s. 6d. Specimen copies will be sent on receipt of postage.

Remittances from abroad must be made by International Money Order.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

G. W. (Bristol).—Verses sent in unsuitable.

To CONTRIBUTORS.—Workmen could help us greatly by sending in accounts of capitalist tyranny and sweating in London and the provinces. We want the names of the sweaters. Those who write must send us their name and address, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee of good faith. We shall not fear to publish the truth.

SHAM SOCIALISM.

"WE are all Socialists now," remarked that Liberal leviathan, Sir William Harcourt, and though the phrase was ludicrously mal apropos in view of the row of complacent mediocrities for whom he spoke, it has become historic. Nor is there anything surprising in this. Apart entirely from the prominence which the speaker occupied in the adjacent fields of phrase-making and political somersault-throwing, it had a bearing on current thought. Of course there were some misguided enthusiasts who, like the patriarch's spouse, were inclined to cast back a glance of regret on the Gomorrah of Liberalism from which they had just managed to tear themselves. To them the spectacle of Sir William, the heavy father of the stock company which Mr. Gladstone manages, paternally opening his arms with a melodramatic "me che-ild," had an affecting side, and it apparently needed but little to make some of these "Radical Socialists" (so the cant phrase goes, I think) fall sobbing upon that expansive bosom. To those of us who are of a less confiding nature than the gentlemen who supply the bait for Mr. T. P. O'Connor's man-traps, the incident was interesting because it was typical of a certain popular feeling which one discerns to be in the air. In a period of transition like ours, when thought (or the brain contortion that passes for it) on industrial and social questions is in a state of flux, minds which lack stamina are driven hither and thither by its tides. What Carlyle called the "Universal Stygian Quagmire" is to be satisfactorily bridged over by a few tons of resolutions, and all the Mrs. Jellabys who tire of the fascinating Polynesian cannibal are busy regenerating mankind at home. But no expenditure of either money or wind ever converted that which is in its essence a No-Thing into any semblance of a Thing, and while it is certainly not unwise for the Socialist to review the situation, he may do so with confidence that the coffin-ships that surround his bark are too water-logged to long remain athwart his course.

The clerical imitation of Socialism is a very wide-spread species of wooden ham with which the worker's stomach is to be filled. "Socialism plus the Ten Commandments" shouts that sentimentalist preaching friar, Mr. W. T. Stead, and straightway the black police of capitalism supply us with an article which is "the Ten Commandments minus Socialism." Brought face to face with the gravest social problems these gentry content themselves with shouting "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!" (keeping the while a sharp look-out for the interests of the craft of the silversmiths), or else come out as political "cheap-jacks" with working-men's clubs, friendly societies, and greatest boon of all, free pews in their own particular tabernacle. All these shoddy wares are branded with the magic trade-mark "Socialism," and with the impudence of their profession they occasionally explain that this is "true" Socialism as distinguished from the "false" which you and I are preaching. Until somebody in the national jaw-shop at Westminster extends the false-marking clauses of the Merchandise Marks Act to clerical "cheap-jackery" of this nature, many unsuspecting working-men will share the fate of the Vicar of Wakefield's son at the fair.

Fabianism is one of the most recent counterfeits which have to be nailed to the Socialist counter. Its propaganda can, of course, be most effectively pursued while the Liberal party are out of office, for it preaches a policy of moralising Liberal associations and members—a thing that no one is likely to attempt to do while the Liberals are in power. The professors of this party protest that the noble hearts of Gladstone, Harcourt, Brunner, Morley, and Co. are ready to pant with affection for the workman, provided the necessary votes are supplied. It is the principle of the automatic chocolate provider applied to politics—put a majority of votes in the slot and you get the municipalisation of gas-works. "Eat, drink, and be merry" at this Barmecide feast; but above all, my proletarian friend, don't forget the munificent providers thereof. The game of promising a Socialist millenium with the advent of Sir William Harcourt to office has the additional advantage that that politician's elastic conscience will not be likely to impel him to fulfil the promises made for him by his henchmen; and thus the wealthy men who now remain—being assured that all this "playing at the barricades" is only meant for the gallery—will continue to adorn the Liberal benches. Sir William Harcourt and Mr. T. P. O'Connor (worthy colleagues in a noble cause) may be likened to the Walrus and the Carpenter of Mr. Carroll's verses, and the end of their promises may be prophesied by quoting the finale of that partnership:

"I weep for you," the Walrus said:
 "I deeply sympathise."
 With sobs and tears he sorted out
 Those of the largest size,
 Holding his pocket handkerchief
 Before his streaming eyes.

There is another species of bogus Socialism which is beginning to show its head here—the Bismarckian State Socialism with which the Man of Blood and Iron tried to stop the march of the Socialists to the ballot-boxes. The large crowd of faddists are imploring the Government to impose their pet panaceas upon the community willy-nilly, and they complacently puff their peddling "isms" as a complete substitute for the Socialist demands.

I have even met misguided enthusiasts who thought that compulsory national insurance was a step to Socialism. The idea of stripping the worker's bones still barer in order to provide for an old age, which he never reaches, is to us too unscrupulous for the comic side of the claim to be fully apparent, but the mental twist which is responsible for this counterfeit is curious enough to warrant its mention.

With so many trumpery imitations around us, there is the more need to keep steadily before us the ideal of a Socialist commonwealth, and meanwhile to denounce these shams as shams on every suitable opportunity. Many of them are but shadows, and with the coming of the light they will be dispersed. Let us therefore "spread the light." X.

AN IMPOSTOR DEPARTS.

"Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR, parasite of the Liberal party and editor of the Star." That is how this eloquent and enterprising political privateer was spoken of in the Weal a couple of years ago. We in Liverpool have been afflicted with him as the mis-representative of one of our Parliamentary divisions, and you in London have suffered from him as editor of the Star—editor as defined by Mark Twain, a man appointed and highly paid to keep truth out of his paper. Not that his unclean sheet was ever likely to be otherwise than it is, being a cross between a hired party bravo and a commercial advertising medium; for, to quote Mark Twain again, "that kind of a paper is just as well off with a sick editor as a well one, and better off with a dead editor than either."

There is a rumour going around that Mr. T. P. is not coming here for re-election any more; that a "safe" Liberal seat is to be found for him somewhere else in England, where he can "ease off" on his violent Irish-ness as he has done already on the small, cheap, and sneaking Socialism of the "London programme." There is also a rumour that reaches us to the effect that Mr. T. P. may after all not manage to carry over the Star into the orthodox Liberal camp, and trade off its gleams to John Morley for a place on the Treasury bench, but will find that it breaks away into the more useful, even if more erratic, courses it pursued awhile back.

So that it is likely that Mr. Thomas Power O'Connor, M.P., L.P.H., and S.S.,¹ will soon depart from two spheres of obtrusive and immodest uselessness, which he has filled for some time with discredit to himself and damage to the people at large.

But, you will say, what have we to do with the Scotland division of Liverpool and its representation in Parliament? Not much, indeed; but we all have some interest in the wavering Star, whose uncertain rays have a misleading and dangerous effect upon those who try to read current events by their light. In several ways we are responsible for the Star—for its coming into existence that is—not for anything else, thank goodness! And it may be worth while to call up the record and think over the history of the Star, from the time when we all, or a lot of us, anyhow, thought a new sun had arisen and was going to shine on a re-illuminated world.

For years London had been having a good rake-up by Socialist speakers and agitators. For more years still it had been a "Tory stronghold" and the despair of the Liberal wire-pullers. The "franchise" had been "widened," which is to say, more of the geese had been given a chance of choosing what kind of sauce they would be cooked with. But, to the disgust of the Liberal chefs-de-cuisine, the geese didn't come readily up to be cooked; they had lent their ears to those who had taught them they needn't be cooked at all. The proletarian voters, who had been relied on as tools for turning out the Tories, were found to have a pretty strong opinion as to the family likeness between all politicians, and a carelessness as to party cries, and a callousness toward party appeals, that were appalling to the old-fashioned machine-made and caucus-managed Liberal. Besides, the Tories were coquetting with the social question; there was talk of secret conferences between Tory members and the leaders of the unemployed; flying rumours that London was to be secured for ever to the Tory interest by immense bribes in the way of "bread and circuses."

The parting of the ways between the "Grand Old Party" and the party of progress had come; what was to be done? Why, of course, save the Party (with a big P) at all costs! Let Plunder flourish though the People fall! But the split was so very obvious, that something bold and striking and original must be done. The staid and respectable brigadiers of the Liberal front bench, trained in the scientific and red-tape methods of party warfare, were obviously out of it. Their juniors, those of them who were not mere cogs in the party machine, were too much tainted with the dangerous new ideas to be reliable. But there was one man who filled the bill; others could have been found, no doubt, but he was ready to hand. Ready in all senses; a swashbuckler who had fleshed his sword in many a quarrel; a soldier of fortune who had fought so long on "either which side" that he was case-hardened and conscience-less; whose warfare had always been guerilla-like and irregular, full of ambushes, surprises, and night attacks. Was the plan his, or that of some more astute and far-seeing general who stood behind and prompted him?

However that may be, the plan was entrusted to him to be carried out; and here it is. The assumption underlying all the moves on the political field of battle is that nobody believes anything; except, perhaps, the poor voters, who are never thought of except as mere food for powder, raw material for glory-making, fill-ditches over whose prostrate bodies their astute managers may march to victory. A consequence of that assumption is another, that nothing is real, no movement need mean anything; even if it chance to have any truth and reality underlying it, one can always manage and manœuvre that out of existence.

The parting of the ways had come; but could not the ways be brought together again? If only a "leader" could be got, vociferous enough to deafen the crowd and drown the voices of the dangerous men who were leading them away from the Liberal path of political salvation, could not he do a sort of loop-line dodge? Couldn't he tear off at full cry on the line of the "New Departure," howl hosannahs to the "New Radicalism," work up the speed until he had the whole crowd of malcontents hurraing at his heels, and then gradually work around until, before they knew where they were, he had brought them back into the ranks of the Liberal party, and he and they had fallen into line behind the renovated banners of Free Contract and Moralised Capitalism?

He could, and he did—up to the point of bringing them back. Enough time was not allowed for the work. It was getting on beautifully, but there was the threat of a general election being near at hand, and the New Radicalism was still far away from where it was wanted; the loop-line had not yet swung nearly far enough in for the plan to work as it was expected to do. So the curve was prematurely made more acute, and the return hastened too suddenly, with the natural result that there has been a considerable mix—the New Radical train has run off the rails and is churning up the gravel at a great rate—the New Radical crowd is falling all over itself in the effort of some to get on and some to turn aside—you can take your choice of similes, and invent a few more if you like. There is the situation: a Liberal trick to turn the work of the Socialists into material for their own profit and advantage, a trick which has failed and turned upon its authors.

But what of the clever and dashing filibuster who headed the attempt? What of the able editor whose one aim in life was to add another lump of sugar to the washerwoman's tea; who flourished his pen-shillelagh and asked for reactionary skulls to crack; who set up an inky guillotine in the columns of the Star, and clamoured for the front-bench heads in a basket; who entreated Oligarchy to come on and be wiped from off the face of the earth; who was ready—in a Pickwickian sense—to go through fire and blood and mud, and several other things, to the rescue of the Democracy; who posed, in short, as a regular old jabberwock of a New Radical, and ranted and raved and tore around like all possessed? Well! of course he is too valuable a tool to be thrown aside because of his one failure. He will still be a big man among Liberals, and sit in the high seat of an elected representative of property and plunder. But his power for evil over the party of the advance has gone. T. P. as the New Radical has departed, after demonstrating once more for our benefit the ingrained treachery and baseness of Parliamentary methods, the hopelessness of expecting anything but evil from political parties, and the paramount necessity of pushing forward the propaganda of principle with all the energy we possess.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MORE BOYCOTTING.

Comrade Edward Leggatt writes as follows: I have been discharged from the firm of Browne and Eagle, wool-warehousemen, of Great Alie Street, Whitechapel, for leaving off work at six o'clock on Saturday night. I had previously worked from five o'clock in the morning till eleven o'clock at night on two nights in the week; from six o'clock till ten, two nights; and from eight o'clock till six the Saturday, when we left off work. They wanted us to work till ten; and about twenty men out of a hundred refused to work after six, and paid themselves off. On going to work on the following Monday, I was told I was the leader and the sole cause of the other men knocking off, though I took no active part in it. The result is that I am not to be employed at any of the three warehouses, because I am, as the manager describes me, "a Socialist agitator."

I also was discharged from E. Smith and Co., Princes Square, for advising men not to load while the strike was on at Hay's Wharf. This makes the fourth time I have been discharged for preaching Socialism.

[We know comrade Leggatt to be a brave, honest, and sturdy worker in the Socialist cause. His treatment is only another illustration of what the "freedom of labour" is worth.—Eds.]

Great Strike in the Shoe Trade at Norwich.

A strike commenced here on Wednesday. Several thousand hands turned out. A conference between manufacturers and employes has been sitting for some time past to consider the men's demands for a uniform statement of wages as compared with other towns. On Tuesday last was the final sitting of the conference, when the masters agreed to send a list to the men to meet their demands. A large public meeting of the men was held the same evening, the list was read and refused, a resolution calling on all hands to strike work was carried unanimously, and the men have been turning out each day as they finished up their work, the non-union hands turning out as well as the union hands. From the first outset there was every prospect of a prolonged strike, the employers being stubborn and the men feeling thoroughly equal to a long struggle. Meetings of the men have been held since, and on Saturday last a large meeting was held, when one of the bosses of the union from Leicester, Mr. Inskip, suggested to the men arbitration as a means of settlement, thus making a half-hearted fight and very little gained. To this the men foolishly agreed, except one individual, who had the courage of his convictions to vote against this proposal. Such is the work of trade-union officialism. It remains for us to see what the result will be. Sunday afternoon a large meeting was held in the Market Place; our comrade Mrs. Lahr was present, and spoke from the platform of the local Gas Union Workers. Our comrade pointed out the inefficiency of trade unions, and urged them to go in for taking from the capitalists and landlord class what they had been robbed of, and to be no longer content with submitting to the present system of robbery. A large quantity of literature has been distributed. S.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

Shameful Tyranny in the Post Office.

Government officials are doing their best to introduce Russian despotism into "free and happy England." The last offender is Mr. Raikes, the Postmaster-General. Some time ago one hundred of the men who had attended the meeting of May 16th, were called upon to explain their conduct. They answered unanimously that they considered that, when not on duty, they had exactly the same rights as other citizens. On Wednesday, June 11th, after four weeks' delay, the reply came that they must give a written apology, and undertake not to attend meetings in future. With one accord the men flatly refused. Thereupon sentences were pronounced and put into execution. Some senior men, who have been from twenty-five to thirty years in the service, were deprived of their good conduct stripes, which means a loss of 3s. a-week, and 2s. in addition deducted from their weekly wages, so that 5s. a-week is the total of their loss; some had from three to six days' pay confiscated, and others were suspended and fined, and are to remain suspended until they sign the apology and undertaking as requested. Mr. Raikes acted with suddenness. At the Western and Eastern Central District Offices men were summoned by telegram within a few minutes of the instructions being received by the district postmasters, and within an hour men were being suspended and having the stripes torn off their uniforms. Great excitement ensued. As each victim appeared amongst his fellows he was loudly cheered. So great was the indignation among the men at this cowardly tyranny, that at one post-office at least there was very nearly a strike. We hear, however, from the capitalist press that the "officers of the Postmen's Union" were equal to the occasion, and greatly assisted the Postmaster-General by restoring "order." Work, however, was delayed, and it seemed very probable that at one time there would be a very serious block in the business of the post-office. On Thursday, letters were so delayed in the E.C. district through the irritation of the men, that the general post, which should have left the General Post Office at a quarter past seven to be sent to the district post-office to be delivered by the last post at night, was not sent away till Friday morning. At a meeting held on Sunday night, another "leader" (!), C. A. V. Conybeare, M.P., recommended the men to do the extra duty imposed upon them through the suspension of their comrades, so that "public sympathy" should be alienated from them. By this Mr. Conybeare means middle-class sympathy, but we do not know that the middle-class have shown any yet, judging by the way in which the men have been boycotted in middle-class papers like the Daily News. A strike would bring these people to their senses. If the men in the South Dock had listened to their "leader," Mr. Ben Tillett, the great dock strike would never have come off, and I think that if the postmen give too much attention to their "leaders," the moment for action may go by, and they may find themselves in the same position as the tram men, who are now hopeless and helpless slaves beneath the iron yoke of their tyrants.

Sneaking Livesey.

Livesey has once more given the public to understand that there is no depth of meanness to which he is not prepared to descend. The other day this model commercial gentleman was called before the House of Commons Committee, which is hearing evidence with regard to the Bill which has recently been introduced into the House of Capitalists in order to abolish the Watermen's Guild—that is, the lightermen's trade union. This Watermen's Guild is the only one of the mediæval trade unions that is still composed of working men, and it secures to its members the monopoly of navigation upon the river Thames. A large number of capitalists wish to deprive the lightermen of these privileges, to punish them for helping the dockers in the great strike. So they have introduced a Bill into the House of Commons for this purpose. In the gas-stokers' strike the lightermen did not help the strikers, but stood by Livesey, and Livesey admits that if it had not been for their aid he would have certainly been beaten. But how does this mean hound reward them for their help? Why, he recommends the House of Commons to take their privileges away. Now, I have not much sympathy for the lightermen, who deserted the gas-stokers in their hour of trouble, and who have only got the reward they might have expected. But what are we to say of that hypocritical sneak Livesey, who has basely betrayed the men who helped him in his hour of need? Why, that is a disgrace to our common humanity, that such a base, mean, treacherous and cowardly cur is allowed to crawl upon the face of the earth; and the only meaner things than Livesey are those capitalists who make a hero of that kind of vermin which a decent working-man would kick into the kennel. Let Livesey's treachery to the lightermen be a warning to all workmen who may be inclined to fight on the side of the capitalists in future labour battles. Those who are traitors to their brethren may only expect treachery from the rich whom they serve by their treason. They may see now how they will be rewarded for their pains.

"Our Dear Friends the Police."

Monro's resignation is not of much consequence to Socialists. Chief commissioners may come and chief commissioners may go, but police tyranny goes on for ever. Whoever takes Monro's place, it is quite certain that he will be quite as ready to suppress public meetings and processions. But it is certain that Monro's resignation has greatly increased the discontent within the force. Monro has fallen in defence of good pensions for policemen, and the grateful peelers will not forget him. Therefore the agitation among the force is likely to greatly increase, and talk of a strike will grow louder during the next few weeks. Whether it will come to much, remains to be seen. N.

Liverpool Tailoresses.

These workers came out on strike on June 10th, their demand for two hours per day less work not having been granted by the sweaters. It is only a few weeks ago since the women formed a trades union, so they are largely dependent on outside assistance. Our Liverpool comrades have been among them, contributing both funds and encouragement. By Saturday, seventeen out of fifty-six of the masters had given way, but some five or six of these have gone back on their word. There is every possibility of the women organising themselves into a co-operative society, thereby dispensing with the sweater altogether. In this they are promised assistance from the Liverpool Socialist Society and other organisations. We think this an excellent way of proving to these workers that they can do without their "employers." H. C.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

POLAND.

Whilst the Russian movement directed its chief attention to the Socialist propaganda among the peasants—although a certain amount of propaganda was and is being made among the industrial workers of St. Petersburg, Odessa, etc.—the Polish Socialist movement was based since its beginning on the industrial workers who crowd the growing factory towns of Poland, which is much in advance of Russia in its industrial development. So far as the organised movement is concerned, it underwent great difficulties by the prosecutions of 1884 and 1885, which led to the famous trial of the Socialist party, called the Proletariate, the execution of Bardowski, Kunicki, Pietrusinski, and Ossowski, on Jan. 28, 1886, and the burial of so many others in the Siberian mines and icy deserts. The secret printing presses of the paper Proletaryjat were then confiscated. It has only just now been possible to establish a new secret press, on which proclamations on the 1st of May and the first number of a paper were printed—namely, Walka Klas (The Class Struggle), the organ of the Warsaw Working-men's Committee. We understand that this paper deals with the eight hours and other questions from the Social-Democratic standpoint. Arrests have been made in connection with this mild propaganda. Surely things could not get worse if it took a more revolutionary turn, and told the plain truth instead of bolstering up palliatives. The same may be said of the Marxist propaganda in Russia, too; in spite of the horrors we daily hear about, the palliative and stepping-stones agitation goes on.

NETHERLANDS.

The widow of Multatuli (Douwes Dekker), the author of "Max Havelaar," has just published the first part of the "Letters and Memoirs" of her late husband (155 pp.). Douwes Dekker, it is known, exposed the shameless exploitation and oppression of the Javanese by the Dutch government in his great novel, "Max Havelaar," and in other writings. He was a Socialist, and sacrificed his position to his convictions, living for years in exile; he died in 1887.

AUSTRIA.

All over this country outrageous sentences have been passed on workers who took part in the riots—following the strikes and demonstrations of April and May. In Wadowice (Galicia), thirty-two were sentenced to prison and penal servitude up to two years for taking part in the Biala disturbances, where, as the papers stated with great satisfaction at the time the newly-introduced Mannlicher rifles were tried on the bodies of the workers, quite a number of whom were killed. The middle-class press declared that these rifles acted "splendidly." Other trials took place in Troppau and Olmütz; forty fresh arrests were made at Nürschau.

SPAIN.

We have received the first part of Segundo Certamen Socialista (Second Socialist Prize Competition), Barcelona, 1890. In 1885 the society Centro de Amigos of Reus started a competition for Socialist essays, which were printed in a volume of 580 pages. Last year the Anarchist group "the Eleventh of November," of Barcelona, took the initiative by the circular of June 10, 1889. Seventeen subjects were proposed by various groups of Spain and the Argentine Republic. We note a few: Anarchy, its origin, progress, evolution, etc.; Can human passions be of a detrimental influence in a society which is really free or Anarchist? Advantages or disadvantages to humanity of free love; A novel describing Anarchy or future society (six competed for this prize, and two stories—of R. M. of Seville and M. Burques of Sabadell—will be printed); On the production and reward of artistic and scientific work under Socialism; Is it necessary that the intellectual revolution should precede the material revolution? Production and consumption under Anarchy; The mission of machinery in future society; The scientific bases of Collectivism; The present duties of the workers; etc. Sixty-three essays were sent in, from Spain, Italy, and Brazil. The prizes were awarded at the 11th of November meeting last year, before an audience of 10,000 workers. The publication of the essay on Anarchy is begun in the part before us. * *

SWEDEN.

The northern section of the Swedish Socialist party has lately had a Congress at Stockholm. Political tactics was one of the chief debating points, and the result was resolutions in favour of parliamentary action and compromises with advanced bourgeois parties. It sounds hard, but there was really very little of Socialism and revolutionary spirit in the whole proceeding. There seems to be a real lack of independent and advanced thinking among the Stockholm "leaders."

There has been a great strike of mechanics in Stockholm. Though it ended with defeat for the workers it was a most important and gratifying event, because the men went out not for higher wages or shorter hours, but solely because they have been haughtily and arbitrarily treated by their master. From Malmö there is still better news. There was a strike in the building trade, the masters imported blacklegs from another province, and the authorities of Malmö took up the defence of masters and blacklegs in the most outrageous manner. This was too much for the people of Malmö, and they began a series of very energetic demonstrations, ending in violent collisions between the military and police on one side and the unarmed people on the other. Sweden has not witnessed anything similar for the last ten or fifteen years. The workers of Malmö have showed themselves capable of an insurrection, and the world is reminded that the Swedish proletarian, though he may be starved bodily and intellectually, is not enervated by "East-end civilisation." His anger may be slow to rise, but when once aroused it is not likely to cool off before he has destroyed his enemy or been crushed in the attempt. STR.

SOUTH AMERICA.

On the 20th of February last a small number of Italian Anarchists, who have been joined by a family of Spanish workers from Gibraltar, started for Porto Alegre, rio Grande do Sul, Brazil, with Dr. Giovanni Rossi, in order to establish there an Anarchist colony, with a view of giving to the propagandists of the cause a practical demonstration of the soundness of Anarchist ideas, and even of aiding the revolutionary agitation in Europe with financial means. These Italian friends have studied for several years, at home, the advantages and the dangers of such an undertaking, and after careful consideration, they resolved to set to work at once. They have promised to give from time to time to our contemporary La Révolte a report of their work and progress. We need hardly say that our friends have our best wishes in their bold enterprise.

At Buenos Ayres, on the 2nd of May, the Socialists, answering an invitation of the German revolutionists residing in that city, met in the great hall called "Prado Espanol" and decided, after a long discussion, in which Italian, French, Spanish, and German comrades took part, to constitute, under the name of "Partido operaio Argentino," an international revolutionary Socialist league. The cities of La Plata, Rosario, and Santa Fé have joined in the movement, which shows already signs of certain progress and prosperity.

Besides this general association, the Flemish and Dutch Socialists residing at Buenos Ayres have founded a society for revolutionary propaganda among Flemish and Dutch speaking workers, under the title of "Nederduitsche Arbeiterclub" (Netherlandish Working-men's Club). V. D.

REPORTS.

EAST LONDON.—We held four good meetings this week, but we want more assistance from comrades. At Hoxton Church on Friday night we had opposition, which is a rarity to-day; a workman of the Rip Van Winkle type wanted to know how we manage to exist without the help of our enemy, the capitalist. At Union Street on Sunday, we have to record with satisfaction additions to our list of speakers in comrades Leach and Leggatt, who held an enthusiastic meeting; collected 2s. for 'Anarchist Labour Leaf'; sold 18 'Weals and some pamphlets. At Hoxton Church on Sunday morning and Victoria Park in the afternoon, comrades Marsh and Davis held excellent meetings; 36 'Weals sold.—H. McK.

NORTH KENSINGTON.—Sunday morning we held a good meeting at Latimer Road; speakers were Dean, Crouch, and Saint; fair sale of 'Weals. On Sunday afternoon we had an excursion to Kingston-on-Thames, where we held a big meeting at the Market Place; speakers were Coulon, Crouch, Tochatti, and several members of the Shop Assistant's Union; good sale of 'Weals and of Morris's pamphlet 'Monopoly.'—M. S.

NORTH LONDON.—At Hyde Park on Saturday, Nicoll, Cantwell, and Stevenson spoke; many questions and some opposition, which so excited our audience that they formed groups all around the place and discussed Socialism with great vigour. On Sunday morning we held a splendid meeting, addressed by Cantwell, Nicoll, Mrs. Schack, and Edwards; the speakers were all in good form, and the audience showed their appreciation by subscribing 7s. 1d. and purchasing 65 'Weals and 3s. worth of pamphlets. In Hyde Park Sunday afternoon, Cantwell and Miss Lupton addressed a good meeting; 'Weals sold out. We have sold 120 'Weals this week.—T. C.

SOUTH LONDON.—Last week we had two splendid meetings. On Wednesday, at Short Street, New Cut, which is as bad as any slum in the East-end, addressed by Cores, Miss Lupton, and Casey (Freedom Group). On Sunday we had another splendid meeting, addressed by Wright, Miss Lupton, and Casey. Great enthusiasm shown by the people at both meetings; good sale of 'Weals.

ABERDEEN.—At Castle Street on Saturday night a large meeting was addressed by comrades Aiken, Rennie, W. Cooper, and Leatham—the latter replying to quite a shoal of intelligent questions at the close. At indoor meeting on Sunday night Leatham delivered the first of a series of lectures by him on "Sweetness and Light"—being an expository criticism of the Gospel According to Matthew Arnold: there was an excellent attendance, especially of strangers.—L.

BRAINTREE (Essex).—Comrade Mowbray visited this district on Saturday and Sunday last, and met with a splendid reception. Good meetings were held on Saturday night and on Sunday morning and afternoon; large audiences at each meeting. 89 Commonweal, 3s. 9d. worth of pamphlets, and 13s. 2d. collected for propaganda—this I am sure all comrades will admit is marvellous for so small a place, and does great credit to the efforts of comrade Fuller, who intends to open up Halstead, Bocking, Witham, and other towns in the district. The branch now numbers 22 already. F. Kitz will visit Braintree on Sunday week.

GLASGOW.—We had a visit last Sunday from comrade John Smith, of Edinburgh, whose sturdy vernacular addresses at Jail Square and Paisley Road Toll kept us good audiences, despite the rain. Joe Burgoyne and Glasier also spoke. Commonweals sold out.

EDINBURGH—SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—We held a good meeting on Sunday afternoon at Leith; comrades Hamilton, Bell, and Pearson were the speakers. In the evening we encountered opposition, for the first time on the Meadows, from a member of the Trades Council, who ridiculed Socialism and was cock-sure it would never be realised. Comrade Hamilton very soon disposed of him. Bell, Davidson, and Mackenzie also spoke.

LIVERPOOL SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—On Sunday we held two meetings at the Landing Stage, there being a good attendance at both. Reeves, Chapman, and Balfour addressed those present; some weak opposition from the Christian Evidence Society. A large meeting was held on Monday in the Haymarket; comrades Chapman, junr., and Parker, of London, were the speakers. Good sale of Commonweal and literature at all meetings.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—On Sunday, June 8, Frank Kitz, of London, addressed two open-air meetings for the Club; they were the largest meetings we have held in Nottingham for some time. On June 15th our comrade Raymond Unwin, of Chesterfield, gave two open-air addresses to good audiences. The members of the club are arranging for the conference of Midland Socialists, which takes place at this club on Sunday June 29th. There is a desire to form a Midland Socialist Federation, for the interchange of speakers and for spreading Socialism in the midland districts where there are not any recognised Socialist societies. Comrades will be present from Sheffield, Chesterfield, Clay Cross, Derby, Newark, Long Eaton, Leicester, Walsall. The Nottingham Branch S.D.F. will also be present. Good work may be done in the midlands if we can arrange a good plan of organisation. We shall hold a large demonstration in the Market Place in the evening on Sunday next, June 22; comrade Carless, of Walsall will give two open-air addresses.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

SOCIALISM TO-DAY.

Six years ago we could not foretell how Socialist propaganda would fare in this country—whether it would at the outset provoke fierce antagonism and repressive measures from the privileged classes against us, or whether it would be reckoned as of no little account, or of such visionary aim, that few would care to trouble themselves about us.

It is pleasant now to know that our propaganda has so far escaped both those fates, and that in quite a marvellous way it has converted men and women of all classes, and has become a formidable and threatening power against the existing order of things almost without encountering serious resistance or repression. Useless conflict with the authorities over trivial matters of tactics, the wholesale discharge of workmen for participating in propaganda work, general ostracism in social and commercial life—those and many other pains and penalties, which most of us then in the movement expected would be rife if our cause achieved much success or publicity, have been comparatively rare.

It is true that several tragic incidents, such as the Trafalgar Square murders and a goodly number of fine and imprisonment cases, have accompanied our efforts; but considering the extreme character of our teaching, its total and unequivocal subversiveness of every existing privilege and power, and remembering also the brutal treatment meted to our comrades in Continental countries, we must frankly admit that our career has been singularly free from many of the difficulties and dangers which we beforehand considered we would have to face and overcome. We are not, of course, out of the wood yet—far indeed from it—so we must not holloa; but we have, at least, passed almost unscathed one of its most perilous thickets. So far as we have yet gone we have had more fun than fighting, and have spilt more money than blood. Our enemies, too conceited perhaps of their own strength and our weakness, and too busily engaged in over-reaching and plundering each other, have allowed us to pass into and establish ourselves in a portion of their territory which they can never regain, and draw a vast number of their followers to our banner who will never desert us.

But a danger lies ahead, which, if we be not wary, will mar our further progress, and probably make all our efforts of no avail for long years. It is: that our enemies, seeing they cannot now undo our success, affect to favour it, and are attempting to so magnify the advantages of our triumph that we and their own disaffected followers may rest satisfied with the little that has been done, or is about to be done, and cease striving for more. They are, in fact, attempting to exploit Socialism as they exploit all other useful and good effort. This is apparent from the drift of all recent political utterances. Socialists are being patted on the back, and told that they are not altogether bad fellows, that they mean well, and that many of their ideas can be put into practice with advantage to everybody. Politicians are vying with each other in hastening to legalise the scraps and fringes of Socialistic propaganda; and as things are at present going on we shall have at no distant date a Parliament of Socialist-Radicals, with Sir William Harcourt or John Morley at its head, using the blessed name of Socialism to cover a mass of ill-reasoned and utterly futile legislation.

Never, therefore, was it more imperative than it is now that the true and complete aim of Socialism should be held before the people's eyes. Never was it more the bounden duty of Socialists to refuse to identify their principles with any mere passing political or mere trades union struggle. Loudly and more loudly should it be proclaimed that Socialism is not peace but war to Capitalism and class ascendancy, and that by no conceivable jugglery of names or masking of features can any form of Capitalism be made tolerable to us.

Perhaps in our anxiety to win the sympathy of timorous and unimaginative people, we have too frequently associated our ideal with the proposals of those who desire to make the existing system less patently brutal and less unendurable, and may be our teaching in future will appear somewhat vindictive in these people's eyes. Perhaps, also, many Opportunist Socialists, strong in the confidence of their own faithfulness and in their conviction that Socialism cannot be kept back, will regard us as somewhat doctrinaire and intolerant. But, surely, it is sufficient for us to say that our vision becomes clearer with the dawn, and that the nearer we approach the time of achievement the more certain and definite should be our aim. We do not say that all men are knaves or fools who do not see as we see; but we do say that we certainly would be knaves or fools if we said we saw otherwise than we do. And we see now that everything that tends to appease the people's discontent, everything that entices them aside from direct revolutionary effort, is wrong, and it is our duty at all times to say that it is wrong. We are not compelled to equivocate; we have no "authorisation," divine or human, to teach what we do not believe; and it is the most repulsive egotism on our part to assume that we can better serve the cause by becoming hypocrites than remaining honest men.

The seaman who knew from his chart that a certain land lay not far distant across the mid-ocean, and who from fear of the ignorance and cowardice of his fellows pretended it lay by some circuitous and apparently pleasanter route, but where he knew were many hazardous straits and barren and pestilent islands, would not be more culpable than we, who, seeing Communism certain of attainment right ahead of us, if we go forward bravely and patiently, should yet pretend that it would be better to turn aside to innumerable Parliamentary devices, and that we ought to rest awhile on this and that little barren measure of reform, losing uselessly many valuable years and countless lives.

There is no dearth of Opportunists in the world, and there is little likelihood of a dearth in the immediate future. We shall always have more than enough of "practical men" eager to perform the duty of camp-followers to our movement—pretty far in the rear. We know, too, that these people will reap the first fruits of our efforts, just as the crows that follow the ploughshare alight on the furrows and feast on the fresh upturning of the soil. Let them do so—perhaps they are fulfilling some humble function in the eternal economy of human progress; but let us, regardless of all these little things, do what alone we can do honestly and without misgiving, preach Socialism, and endeavour to achieve it and nothing else. The chief difficulty we have to overcome is the cowardice of the people, and if we would teach them to act bravely we must act bravely ourselves. We can only hasten the Revolution by marching boldly towards it.

SCENES FROM THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

IV.

THE WOMEN AT VERSAILLES.

It is about three in the afternoon as the women climb the last hill on the road to Versailles. Before them lie the town and the royal chateau and its splendid grounds, the glories of which are dimmed and obscured in the mist and rain of the drizzling day. Here Maillard halts and harangues them once again. The burden of his oration is still the same, the necessity for a pacific attitude, for from the town of Versailles comes the sound of tumult and alarm; drums are beating loudly the troops and Nationals together, and it is evident that they are mustering to repel the advancing army of female insurrectionists. "Let us, then," says the wise Maillard, "advance peacefully; let our cannon be put to the rear, and as we march forward singing Royalist songs and shouting 'Live the King!'" His advice is acted upon, and soon all the people of Versailles, who crowd to see, behold these women drenched to the skin by rain and worn out by their long and weary march, advancing and singing "Vive la Henri Quatre" (Live Henry the IV.), varying the singing of this Royalist air by shouts of "Live the King!" The Versailles people reply by shouts of "Vivent les Parisiennes!" (The Paris women for ever).

But all is hurry and bustle in Versailles. Body guards, dragoons, the Flanders regiment, and Versailles National Guards are drawn up outside the palace gates. The Royalist officers are very nervous and very repentant concerning the Opera House orgie. The Versailles National Guards have lost a commander, for royalist Count de Estaing has gone; other Royalists, who are rallying round the chateau, are plotting flight and civil war. Major Lecointre now commands, a linen-draper by trade, a valiant man for all that, and who has already run the risk of assassination at the hands of a Royalist bully on account of his devotion to the popular cause. The members in the Assembly are indeed very uncomfortable; the debate drags wearily, for rumour is growing more like reality. And now sounds of disorder, shouts, and cries are heard at the doors, and in burst a crowd of women, some fifteen in number, Maillard having great difficulty in persuading the others to stop back. Maillard then addresses the Assembly concerning the plots of the Royalists and the scarcity of bread, which he declares is kept from Paris by greedy monopolists and intriguing aristocrats. It is decided at last by the Assembly to send a deputation, headed by President Mounier, to represent to the King the "afflicting condition of Paris," and also to demand the acceptance of the "Rights of Man" which the King has refused to sanction.

When Mounier gets out he finds the broad open space between the Assembly and palace is covered by a hungry and desperate crowd, armed with rusty pikes and muskets, and ironshod clubs with swords and knife-blades bound upon them, altogether a formidable assemblage. The Body-guards are busy doing their utmost to irritate the people by spurring up and down, dispersing groups in true Trafalgar Square fashion, and are followed everywhere by hissing and hooting. Directly Mounier gets outside he is immediately surrounded by women, who all want to form a deputation to the King. Twelve are selected, and Mounier marches on, a respectable man in a very uncomfortable position, for the fierce haggard pikemen of St. Antoine insist upon escorting him, and he runs a risk of being taken for a leader of advancing insurrection. Nay, this really happens; for the Body-guards charge upon them and scatter or upset them in the mud.

The deputation at last get together and enter the palace. Five women are even graciously admitted to the royal presence. They are received very courteously by His Majesty. The spokeswoman of the deputation, Louison Chabray, a flower-girl of the Palais Royal, faints away and is caught in the royal arms. The deputation are sent back with gracious "promises" that the King will do his utmost to make bread plentiful. They return to the crowd shouting "Live the King and his house!" But the crowd does not credit the glowing promises; they are wet, cold, and hungry, and have not been admitted to the royal presence. The messengers are accused of treason, especially Louison Chabray, who has been reclining in the King's arms. She is seized by two desperate Amazons, very nearly strangled with their garters, twisted into a rope for the purpose, and is rescued with difficulty by the several bystanders. The others are sent back for a written order which shall secure a plentiful supply of bread in Paris.

Scarcely have they gone when another deputation is formed, probably to look after the last, with Brunout, a Parisian National Guard at their head. They advance to the gates of the chateau, but are immediately set upon by the Body-guards, headed by a lieutenant, M. de Savonnières, and are dispersed with great brutality. Brunout is pursued with drawn sabres by the lieutenant and two others, who evidently mean to murder him. Savonnières is just raising a sabre to cut him down, but the Versailles National Guard can stand it no longer; shots are fired at the Royalist murderer, and his right arm falls broken with a musket ball. Brunout is saved, but fierce cries go up from the crowd. The three pieces of cannon brought from Paris stand loaded with grape, and pointed towards the palace gates; lit matches are applied to them, but the touch-holes are wet with rain, and they will not go off. At the same moment voices are heard to cry, "Stop! it is not yet time!" The Body-guards fall back upon the gates of the chateau, and venture no more among the crowd.

And now Théroigne de Mericourt and the prettiest among the women are busy among the dragoons and Flanders regiment, and with soft words, embraces, and kisses, get them to promise they will be good patriots and will not fire upon the people; in proof of which good intentions they exchange cartridges with the National Guards.

But darkness is creeping over the agitated scene. Major Lecointre, who has been busy receiving professions of friendship for the popular cause from the Flanders regiment, the dragoons, Swiss, and even the body-guards, now approaches the Parisians, and is met by twelve delegates standing by their levelled cannon, the mouths of the cannon pointing towards Lecointre, while burning matches, ready for firing, light up the gloom. Lecointre asks them in the name of their brothers of Versailles what they desire. One unanimous shout greets him of "Bread and the end of these troubles!" He inquires how many there are of them. They reply "Six hundred." "Well, will six hundred loaves be enough for their most pressing needs?" They reply "Yes." Lecointre then goes to the municipality, which is an unreformed one, with monarchical leanings, and the municipality replies "That it cannot furnish the bread, but will two tons of rice do?" To this Lecointre agrees; but he receives from the municipality an hour or so after—the reply that it cannot find the rice and has dissolved itself, and Major Lecointre had better do what he can.

While these exciting scenes occur outside, there is panic and confusion in the court. Mounier is kicking his heels there waiting for the King to accept the articles of constitution concerning the rights of man; while the King does not know whether to accept or to take the advice of the court party, headed by her majesty the Queen, and fly. Experiments are tried in this direction; some carriages are sent out, but are always driven back by Lecointre's Nationals.

The night increases in gloom, and the rain is falling in heavier showers. The wet and weary Nationals receive orders from their commander, the Count d'Estaing, who has come out from the chateau on purpose. This is done with a view to clear them out of the way for the King's escape; but they sturdily refuse to go till the Body-guards retreat. Orders are then sent to the Body-guards to retire, which order they obey, but the people throng upon them, hooting and hissing. They respond by firing upon both people and National Guards, which firing is replied to by a smart volley from the other side; and, the Body-guards retreat confusedly behind the palace gates, out of the reach of the bullets of the people and the Nationals.

But the National Guard is unfortunately short of ammunition, and dreads more treacherous attacks from these traitorous Royalists. Ammunition must be had somehow, and a lieutenant of Nationals in desperation clutches the commandant of artillery, and, putting a pistol at his head, threatens to blow his brains out, if no ammunition is forthcoming. They are then supplied with powder and ball in abundance.

In the meantime, the people have got hold of a Body-guard, M. de Moucheton of the Scotch company, whom they are handling very roughly, and are about to submit to summary execution, when he is rescued by some Nationals. His horse, however, killed by a musket-shot, is roasted at a huge fire; but the people are so hungry that they cannot wait till it is done, and they tear the nearly raw flesh from the bones and devour it greedily.

But the rain, which is now falling in torrents, drives away the crowd. The troops and Nationals are also withdrawn, but not till Lecointre has posted strong patrols at every gate of the palace, who during the night again prevent the royal carriages from escaping. As for the people, they seek shelter in barracks and stables, and many of them, with the mass of the women, in the hall of the Assembly. Here they occasionally interrupt the proceedings of that august assembly with shouts of "Bread! bread! Not so many long speeches!" The Assembly is waiting for Mounier—who is waiting for the King to make up his mind—as to whether he will accept the articles of the constitution or run away. But the waiting is a long job, and the Assembly, finding Mounier does not come, adjourns and leaves the people in possession of the parliament house. Soon after they adjourn, the King, finding that escape is impossible, owing to the vigilance of Lecointre's patrols, signs the articles, and Mounier returns in triumph, to find a new parliament installed. For the women have started one of their own. A big fish-woman has possession of the bell and president's chair, and they are passing decrees which send the whole assembly into roars of laughter. They give way to Mounier quietly enough, though some want to know whether the acceptance of the rights of man will give bread to the poor folks in Paris. Others cry piteously, "We have eaten nothing; we are very hungry." Mounier orders provisions to be fetched from the bakehouses, and at the same time convokes the Assembly by beat of drum.

Provisions are brought, and the women feast merrily. While they eat they chat familiarly with Mounier. "My dear president," says one, "why did you defend that villainous veto? Mind the lanterne!" A word of warning which Mounier took to heart by getting out of the country soon after this insurrection. While the feasting is going on, honourable members come flocking in. News has now arrived that Lafayette is coming, and in order to fill up the time till his arrival, they start a discussion on the penal code: a discussion that is not very interesting, and is frequently interrupted by the women with cries of "Make that chatterbox hold his tongue! That is not the question: what we want is bread. Let's hear our little darling Mirabeau." But Mirabeau was sulky and would not speak. The revolution was going too far; as a moderate politician, he did not approve of feminine insurrections.

But Lafayette is steadily approaching. The march is slow, for the fat shopkeepers who form the bulk of the force, do not get along very rapidly. Lafayette also wastes time in halting for continual harangues, and the administration of oaths of fidelity to the King. At last, however, he reaches Versailles, glances at the Assembly, and is then ushered into the chateau and sees the King, to whom he presents the demands of the Parisians, which are as follows: That bread be found for Paris; that the King be guarded by the French Guards; that political prisoners have judges sent them; and finally, that his majesty come and live in Paris. The King agrees to all but the latter point, on which he reserves his decision. Lafayette withdraws, stationing guards for the night. The National Guards are left to the hospitality of Versailles, and seek shelter and sleep where they can, in spare beds, churches, barracks, and coffee-houses. Quiet settles in Versailles, and it seems likely to Lafayette and his friends, who retire to bed about five o'clock in the morning, that all may end well.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"HOW TO WIN LANCASHIRE."

COMRADES,—The surpassing naivete of "E. H. P." on this subject is too delicious. I wouldn't like to be guilty of damping his enthusiasm or shocking his simple faith, but it is evident our comrade is too much in earnest to make it fair that he should continue under a stupendous hallucination like his, as to the child's-play of provincial organisation. It is as easy to establish branches as to catch birds—by salting their tails. I should know somewhat of the modus operandi in general, and of organising in the Cotton County in particular. In the Lancaster district, for instance, we forced affiliations some years ago—when my splendid friend, Rev. E. P. Hall, and our late lamented comrade Rev. Sharman, led the van—like mushrooms, precisely on the programme sketched by "E. H. P." And the length of their existence carried out the simile. For weeks and weeks, hard running, last year, our hearty young comrades of the Manchester Branch of the League pegged heroically away at Middleton, etc. But never a sign of a branch. The Social Democratic Federation is, of course, far stronger in Lancashire than the League; their best efforts have been addressed to nearly every one of the towns mentioned by "E. H. P." I formed a branch on my first visit to Barrow-in-Furness of thirty strong, out of a sympathetic meeting of over two thousand strikers, etc. Never been heard of since. I left a couple of embryo Internationals behind at Hastings and Bechill; result ditto. Corresponding secretaries and collections for expenses are invariably and alike precarious matters. The amount of propaganda, and the extent of self-denial continually made by our Lancashire friends, would stupefy "E. H. P." The harvest is great, but the labourers are few and not always happy at their work. I find that the only stability, even in existing branches, is absolutely owing to the strong personality and energy of one or two of their members. The principles are soaking slowly through our Palatinate; but the masses fight shy of organisation. Possibly the main secrets of our indifferent progress in Lancashire are our lack of a local "gradely" Labour paper, and our distance from the revolutionary centre. Lately two of the Manchester papers—Examiner (Unionist Liberal) and the Pendleton Reporter (Independent)—have opened their columns to Socialistic correspondence. "Nunquam," of the Sunday Chronicle, has also for the last year or two nobly played the part of Socialist Messiah hereabouts, and he is widely read; but, of course, his Socialism is philosophic and sentimental—not "practical," don't you know. What we want—a want that is not local—is, of course, sinews of war, plenty of advertisement, and a few smart speakers whose livelihood could be secured them while touring the shire, and against victimisation; which, after all, is the fox at our vitals.

Yours, etc.,

LEONARD HALL.

4, West Craven Street, Salford, June 14, 1890.

COMRADE,—In your issue of June 14, a correspondent, "E. H. P.," furnishes some statistical information with a view to showing "how to win Lancashire" for the Cause. By way of reply, I shall give some particulars of what the Manchester Branch is doing to accomplish that most desirable object. I may state that it has been in existence now about eighteen months, and is the only S. L. organisation in Lancashire. It is more easy to draw up a system and explain how it may be carried out than to take one's coat off and settle down to the work of putting it in practice. To work all the towns in this district would require a very large array of speakers, competent to popularise our principles, which unfortunately have yet to be found or manufactured. But not being so equipped, the best thing to do is to make the best possible use of the few we have got. This the Manchester Branch is doing to the utmost. The usual meetings, which are kept up in season and out of season, are three each week. Some time ago, Blackley, a small manufacturing town of about 10,000, has been visited on Monday nights by our speakers. To all appearance the people are as full of hopeless ignorance, as we know them to be, of State Churchism and Toryism. On each occasion a rather boisterous opposition was developed, and a local paper has given copious reports of what has taken place. We are determined on fighting out the opposition and getting a firm hold on the place. Many sympathisers we have already, and our visits furnish the inhabitants with matter for discussion in factory, workshop, and tavern till the next meeting. On Saturday nights, Middleton, another factory town, is visited, and a very attentive hearing is obtained, whilst lengthy discussions, arising out of questions put to the speakers, form a feature of the propaganda in this place. The chief difficulty in the way of forming a branch is the fear of being marked or losing their job which people in these small towns display.

Bolton, a rather large centre of the cotton industry, where a branch of Socialists once flourished, has also been taken in hand. Meetings are now held every evening, which a speaker from Manchester goes over to address. Commonweal here sells well, and great interest is taken in the propaganda by the people who attend. There are four S.D.F. Branches in Lancashire, which work these meetings mostly among themselves, though of late our speakers have been invited and spoken at Rochdale, and arrangements are being made with the branches at Darwen and Blackburn. The Liverpool Socialists, who are making great progress, interchange speakers regularly with Manchester. We are now arranging with some comrades at Heywood and at Hyde, each about ten miles off, to start weekly meetings.

With more workers, it would be easy to largely extend the propaganda. Truly, the harvest is ready, but the labourers are few.

When anyone at all likely to be able to assist in the work is found or comes amongst us, he does not remain idle for want of asking; and if "E. H. P." wishes to give a hand in carrying out his ideas, which we have all along been working at, we shall be gladly welcomed. The Manchester Club is easily found.

Now to what was done last week. A large and most enthusiastic meeting was held on Sunday, June 15, in Manchester, at which Parker (of London), Parkinson, Bailie, Strange, and Stockton spoke. It was organised by our Branch in view of the forthcoming Stanley visit. The following resolution was unanimously passed: "That we, citizens of Manchester, in mass meeting assembled, recognising that H. M. Stanley's invasion of Central Africa has brought death and destruction upon the natives, and that the object of his mission is to introduce into those regions the system of commercialism, which means the economic slavery of the workers of this country, the only benefit of which will be to the speculating capitalists, who can no longer make large profits out of British labour, hereby indignantly protest against the action of the City Council in offering the freedom of our city and paying honour at our expense to this modern hero of Christianity and Commercialism, whose civilising agents have been fire and murder, the elephant rifle and the gallows." Twelve shillings was collected and a large quantity of Commonweal sold. The meeting terminated by singing the "Marseillaise," and giving three hearty cheers for the Social Revolution and three groans for Stanley, in which the audience heartily joined, to the astonishment of the liveried peace-preservers, who stood amazed and open-mouthed at the whole proceeding.

Good meetings were held in the morning at Philips Park and at night at a new station lately opened, at which Parker spoke.

I hope this account of our work will enlighten your correspondent as to what is being done in Lancashire.—Fraternally yours,
W. B.

IN THE UNITED STATES.

THE rather amusing story of a sham dynamite sensation, instigated by the police of the good city of Chicago, forms the news of this week. On Sunday morning, May 24th, all the inhabitants of the United States were startled to read in the newspapers the following telegram from the city of Chicago:

"The night of May 4, 1886, the date of the Anarchist riot, was recalled to mind this morning with startling vividness by the discovery of unmistakable traces of an attempt to blow up the Haymarket monument and the surrounding buildings with a gigantic charge of dynamite. A policeman passing near the monument saw at its base what appeared to be a roll of black cloth, tied with a small rope. He reached through the railing and pulled on the supposed rope. It parted in his fingers, and easily crumbled, as though charred by fire. He then climbed over the fence and found tied up in a piece of black cloth, a tin can about twelve inches long and four inches in diameter. The can and its contents weighed about ten pounds. In the top of the can was a small hole about three-eighths of an inch in size, from which he had pulled the 'rope.' Beside the can lay several pieces of the string, which crumbled beneath the touch. It was the fuse. The powder within had burned out, leaving the outer covering intact, but very brittle. On the step, approaching the base of the statue, was found an unlighted piece of the fuse, to one end of which was attached a small dynamite cap. It is believed that the heavy rain of last night prevented an explosion which must have been most disastrous in its consequences. The charge of dynamite, according to the police, was enough to blow up several blocks. The machine was probably placed there early this morning, and the rain extinguished the burning fuse. An explosion would have made terrible havoc. With street cars frequently passing so close, too, the loss of life would have been great. There is as yet no clue to the perpetrators of the outrage, but Anarchists are probably the guilty parties."

The concluding sentence, the assertion that "Anarchists are probably the guilty parties," is really delicious, besides being significant. Of course, every reasonable man reading the telegram knew at once that the police of Chicago, purposing to clear its shady reputation somewhat, and to pose again as saviours of society, happened to be the "Anarchists" in this case. Comrade Most made directly in the Freiheit the statement that no sensible Anarchist could have been so foolish as to try to blow up a block of stones. But now mark the sagacity of the Chicago guardians of peace and order. A certain Joseph Kaiser, a former tinsmith, but now excluded from all honest radical circles because of his connection with incendiaries and bona fide swindlers, happened to be at the time of the sensational "discovery" in Chicago, plying his present trade—that is, dealing with religious pictures and nicknacks. Most had warned all Chicago comrades to be on guard against this fellow. The smart police captains in Chicago, putting two and two together, concluded that Kaiser might be a suitable person to imprison for the alleged dynamite plot. And so they did! Never before have policemen taken to the road that leads to absurdity so swiftly as in this case. After the arrest of a man like Kaiser, a speedy ending of the whole matter in a bitter and ridiculous defeat of the blue-coated pillars of society was unavoidable. And so we are told now that "One of the private watchmen on duty in Haymarket Square has confessed to Police Captain Hayes that early last Saturday morning he saw a fuse burning at the base of the Haymarket monument, and, being unable to blow it out, picked out the fire with his knife. He saw no can of dynamite there at the time. He being a reliable man, Captain Hayes and Chief Marsh believe what he says. His name is withheld. It is now thought the whole thing was a fake, and that the can of dynamite was placed at the foot of the monument after the watchman left, and was not near the fuse. A dynamite expert said last night that no fuse sold by any of the powder houses can be put out by the rain, and that a fuse soaked in the water a month will burn readily. Chief Marsh is now convinced that there was no attempt to blow up the monument, but that a scare was intended by some unknown person. Kaiser, the New York Anarchist, is still in custody."

And so ends this latest attempt of reviving the old, happily now almost extinct, prejudice against Anarchism in the United States. The people—that is, the intelligent part of the people—begin to see more and more that Anarchism is a science, and not a mere doctrine of force.

Evidently our friends the police in Chicago must, if they desire to create a genuine, even if only temporary, scare, engage a man who possesses at least the ability of a Constans.

Moses Harman, the editor and publisher of Lucifer, in Valley Falls, a man of really sterling and incorruptible qualities, has been sentenced to five years' imprisonment for publishing articles containing obscene language. As he is bodily weak, and advanced in years it is questionable whether he will survive, if he has to serve out the term. It may be debateable whether it is always wise to call, under all circumstances, a spade a spade, but no one can for one moment doubt the honesty, the integrity, and the devotion to his cause of Harman. Despicable hypocrisy, the hypocrisy which would like to veil the soft splendid outlines of a Venus statue, is at the bottom of this persecution.

The trial against E. H. Heywood, editor of the Princeton Word, in Boston, who is under the same accusation, has not finished yet.

General Ben Butler, the brilliant lawyer, intends to take habeas corpus proceedings in favour of Schwab, Fielden, and Neebe. I reported some time ago that in the record of the trial of the Chicago Anarchists a legal error had been discovered.

Very little is heard now of the eight hour movement. This agitation has, it seems, ended in a fizzle.

London Members' Meeting.—The next monthly meeting of members will be held on Friday, July 4th, at 8.30 p.m., at the Hall of the Hammersmith Branch, Kelmscott House, Upper Mall, Hammersmith, W. Special meeting; important business. All members interested in the propaganda are asked to attend.

OFFICES: 24 GREAT QUEEN STREET, LONDON, W.C.

HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON

The COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. For Australia, New Zealand, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Transvaal, and the Argentine Republic, a year, 8s.; six months, 4s.; three months, 2s. For India, Ceylon, China, Hong Kong, and the Straits Settlements, a year, 10s.; six months, 5s.; three months, 2s. 6d.

Subscribers who receive a RED WRAPPER are thereby reminded that their subscriptions have expired and must be renewed immediately if they wish to continue to receive COMMONWEAL.

SPECIAL RECRUIT SUBSCRIPTIONS.—To aid in spreading our principles, the following largely reduced terms are offered to those who obtain new subscribers: Two new yearly subscriptions for British Islands, etc., 10s. 6d.; for Australia, etc., 15s.; for India, etc., 19s. Five new subscriptions: For British Islands, etc., 25s.; for Australia, etc., 37s. 6d.; for India, etc., 47s. 6d. Specimen copies will be sent on receipt of postage.

Remittances from abroad must be made by International Money Order.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

To CONTRIBUTORS—Workmen could help us greatly by sending in accounts of capitalist tyranny and sweating in London and the provinces. We want the names of the sweaters. Those who write must send us their name and address, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee of good faith. We shall not fear to publish the truth.

R. O. B.—You can lay your complaint before him; but we doubt whether he can do anything for you.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THERE is, as everybody can see who wastes his time in reading the capitalist papers, a great pothor going on about our bargain with Germany, as to what we, each of the two countries, consider our property. Just so, two highwaymen armed and masked (we are the most careful about the mask), finding themselves on the same "lay," look sourly on each other for a while, and then see the necessity of coming to some sort of agreement as to their action; and having come to the agreement each regrets that he has not bested his brother robber a little more; and each has friends to twit him with his folly, and enemies to inform the world in which he moves that he is a dunder-head and a dastard.

I think I have heard, or seen it written, that nations were got together and grew in order to afford mutual protection to their members. If so, it was a long time ago, and perhaps a long way off. For clearly the object for their existence now is organised robbery of the weak both within and without their own bounds; and surely this African business gives us as good an instance of the game as easily can be read of in history.

Then also, we must have Stanley's opinion of the said bargain, and, indeed, wait with trembling anxiety till he has pronounced before we go for the Salisbury government neck or nothing. The sense of relief shown by the Daily News, for instance, when it finds that that great and sympathetic soul does not actually condemn the transaction, is delicious to witness. Stanley has spoken and we can be happy.

Well, well! we have had several "uncrowned kings" in my time, and Stanley, it seems, is the last of them, and may be said almost to have thrust down Gladstone from his throne. One thing must be said, that his filibustering majesty keeps up the traditions of kingship pretty well. The African massacres and the hanging of unwilling "soldiers of civilisation," are quite in the style of the best performers in the trade. And surely the adoration of this last "uncrowned one" shows us pretty well what would be the fate reserved for persons at home inconvenient to the commercial aristocracy, if only the latter dared. Black men in Africa were not killed because they were black, but because they were weak.

Mr. Gladstone has been spinning one of his yarns to the railway men, and began by buttering them all over, and told them how happy they were to be a part of the machinery of commerce (if they only knew their happiness); what a blessing it was for them that it was a necessity of their occupation that they were compelled to form habits of regularity and order; and how much better they were in all respects than the old servants of the mail-coach days,—which latter is probably true enough, for if ever there was a blackguardly system of travelling, surely that was the most blackguardly in all respects.

So far so good: but what reward does Mr. Gladstone propose for these treasures that he praises so much? Well, chiefly that they shall be allowed to exercise that noble virtue, thrift. That is, that they, by compulsion (for that is what it comes to) shall half-starve themselves and their families in order to get a very small account at a savings-bank, so that they may provide against their wholly starving. In short, these admirable public servants, as Mr. Gladstone, surely not without warrant, considers them, are to be kindly allowed to pay the poors-rate which the shareholders would otherwise have to pay.

Please to observe, meantime, that thrift is the art of thriving. If that be so, I cannot call the saving railway men thrifty, for they are but poor professors of the "art of thriving." They might be so much more thrifty that they could compel the shareholders, who contribute no iota toward the business of carrying passengers and goods, to hand over to them their ill-gotten gains, wrung out of the labour of these poor useful men. That would be thriving. Their present thrift, which Mr. Gladstone praises so, is not thriving, but starving; and no one starves except a madman or a slave.

Mr. Gladstone talks about the eloquence of figures. A hundred and ten hours a-week, at fifteen shillings a-week are, it seems, the wages paid to the "cleaners." Is there no eloquence in those figures then? To think that half the United Kingdom should bow down before this uncrowned king, Gladstone! What shall we call him? Mere invective is meaningless. Perhaps he was once a man: what he really is now is an official, whose public life is simply a constant conventional masking of facts in order to make them presentable to the office. Carlyle calls him an uncolscious hypocrite. I do not know that the description can be bettered. W. M.

Our Jingo press does not exactly know whether to be grieved or pleased concerning the recent division of African territory between England and Germany. It is doubtful whether we have got the best part of the swag or not. But why does it not take the word of its Stanley, who is in ecstasies. "Half a million square miles" of land added to the glorious British empire! O Jeosophat! It takes the great explorer's breath away. He is "electrified." He is so pleased to find that there is a greater scoundrel in this world than himself—our worthy Premier, who negotiated the "treaty." Stanley, the piratical miscreant, has murdered "niggers" with "explosive balls," and burnt their villages by the score, but it has never fallen to his lot to steal "half a million square miles" of territory.

There should be great rejoicings in the City among the hundred-per-shenters. O, Father Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob! there never was such a chance for the children of Israel since they came out of Egypt with other people's jewellery!

But, meanwhile, other "Christian" powers, notably France, do not like this little bit of "bishness." It looks as if the "Christian" powers may yet fall to cutting each other's "Christian" throats in their evangelical eagerness to "Christianise and civilise" the poor unfortunate African. Such zeal for the Gospel of "vun hundred per shent" is worthy of our respectful admiration. Tartuffe, Maw-worm, Pecksniff, and Stiggins may take a back seat after this. "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow," including "vun hundred per shent." Let us prey. D. N.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. XIX.—THE DRIVE BACK TO HAMMERSMITH.

I SAID nothing, for I was not inclined for mere politeness to him after such very serious talk; but in fact I should like to have gone on talking with the older man, who could understand something at least of my wonted ways of looking at life, whereas with the younger people, in spite of all their kindness, I really was a being from another planet. However, I made the best of it, and smiled as amiably as I could on the young couple; and Dick returned the smile by saying: "Well, guest, I am glad to have you again, and to find that you and my kinsman have not quite talked yourselves into another world; I was half suspecting as I was listening to the Welshmen yonder that you would presently be vanishing away from us, and began to picture my kinsman sitting staring in the hall at nothing and finding that he had been talking a while past to nobody."

I felt rather uncomfortable at this speech, for suddenly the picture of the sordid squabble, the dirty and miserable tragedy of the life I had left for a while, came before my eyes; and I had as it were a vision of all my longings for rest and peace in the past, and I loathed the idea of going back to it again. But the old man chuckled and said:

"Don't be afraid, Dick. In any case, I have not been talking to thin air; nor, indeed, to this new friend of ours only. Who knows but I may not have been talking to many people? For perhaps our guest may some day go back to the people he has come from, and may take a message from us which may bear fruit for them, and consequently for us."

Dick looked puzzled, and said: "Well, gaffer, I do not quite understand what you mean. All I can say is, that I hope he will not leave us: for don't you see, he is another kind of man to what we are used to, and somehow he makes us think of all kind of things; and already I feel as if I could understand Dickens the better for having talked with him."

"Yes," said Clara, "and I think in a few months we shall make him look younger; and I should like to see what he was like with the wrinkles smoothed out of his face. Don't you think he will look younger after a little time with us?"

The old man shook his head, and looked earnestly at me, but did not answer her, and for a minute or two we were all silent. Then Clara broke out:

"Kinsman, I don't like this: something or another troubles me, and I feel as if something untoward were going to happen. You have been talking of past miseries to the guest, and have been living in past unhappy times, and it's in the air all round us, and makes us feel as if we were longing for something that we cannot have."

The old man smiled on her kindly, and said: "Well, my child, if that is so, go and live in the present, and you will soon shake it off." Then he turned to me, and said: "Do you remember anything like that, guest, in the country from which you come?"

The lovers had turned aside now, and were talking together softly, and not heeding us; so I said, but in a low voice: "Yes, when I was a happy child on a sunny holiday, and had everything that I could think of."

"So it is," said he. "You remember just now you twitted me with living in the second childhood of the world. You will find it a happy world to live in; you will be happy there—for a while."

Again I did not like his scarcely veiled threat, and was beginning to trouble myself with trying to remember how I had got amongst this curious people, when the old man called out in a cheery voice: "Now, my children, take your guest away, and make much of him; for it is your business to make him sleek of skin and peaceful of mind: he has by no means been as lucky as you have. Farewell, guest!" and he grasped my hand warmly.

"Good-bye," said I, "and thank you very much for all that you have told me. I will come and see you as soon as I come back to London. May I?"

"Yes," he said, "come by all means—if you can."

"It won't be for some time yet," quoth Dick, in his cheery voice; "for when the hay is in up the river, I shall be for taking him a round through the country between hay and wheat harvest, to see how our friends live in the north country. Then in the wheat harvest we shall do a good stroke of work, I should hope,—in Wiltshire by preference; for he will be getting a little hard with all the open-air living, and I shall be as tough as nails."

"But you will take me along, won't you, Dick?" said Clara, laying her pretty hand on his shoulder.

"Will I not?" said Dick, somewhat boisterously. "And we will manage to send you to bed pretty tired every night; and you will look so beautiful with your neck all brown, and your hands too, and you under your gown as white as privet: that will get some of those strange discontented whims out of your head, my dear. However, our week's haymaking will do all that for you."

The girl reddened very prettily, not for shame but for pleasure; and the old man laughed, and said:

"Guest, I see that you will be as comfortable as need be; for you need not fear that those two will be too officious with you: they will be so busy with each other that they will leave you a good deal to yourself, I am sure, and that is real kindness to a guest, after all. O, you need not be afraid of being one too many, either: it is just what these birds in a nest like, to have a good convenient friend to turn to, so that they may relieve the ecstasies of love with the solid commonplace of friendship. Besides, Dick, and much more Clara, likes a little talking at times; and you know lovers do not talk unless they get into trouble, they only prattle. Good-bye, guest; may you be happy!"

Clara went up to old Hammond, threw her arms about his neck and kissed him heartily, and said: "You are a dear old man, and may have your jest about me as much as you please; and it won't be long before we see you again; and you may be sure we shall make our guest happy; though, mind you, there is some truth in what you say."

Then I shook hands again, and we went out of the hall and into the cloisters, and so in the street found Greylocks in the shafts waiting for us. He was well looked after; for a little lad of about seven years old had his hand on the rein and was solemnly looking up into his face; on his back, withal, was a girl of fourteen, holding a three-year-old sister on before her; while another girl, about a year older than the boy, hung on behind. The three were occupied partly with eating cherries, partly with patting and punching Greylocks, who took all their caresses in good part, but pricked up his ears when Dick made his appearance. The girls got off quietly, and going up to Clara, made much of her and snuggled up to her. And then we got into the carriage, Dick shook the reins, and we got under way at once, Greylocks trotting soberly between the lovely trees of the London streets, that were sending floods of fragrance into the cool evening air, for it was now getting toward sunset.

We could hardly go but fair and softly all the way, as there were a great many people abroad in that cool hour. Seeing so many people made me notice their looks the more; and I must say, my taste, cultivated in the sombre greyness, or rather brownness, of the nineteenth century, was rather apt to condemn the gaiety and brightness of the raiment; and I even ventured to say as much to Clara. She seemed rather surprised, and even slightly indignant, and said: "Well, well, what's the matter? They are not about any dirty work; they are only amusing themselves in the fine evening; there is nothing to foul their clothes. Come, doesn't it all look very pretty? It isn't gaudy, you know."

Indeed that was true; for many of the people were clad in colours that were sober enough, though beautiful, and the harmony of the colours was perfect and most delightful.

I said, "Yes, that is so; but how can everybody afford such costly garments? Look! there goes a middle-aged man in a sober grey dress; but I can see from here that it is made of very fine woollen stuff, and is covered with silk embroidery."

Said Clara: "He could wear shabby clothes if he pleased,—that is, if he didn't think he would hurt people's feelings by doing so."

"But please tell me," said I, "how can they afford it?"

WILLIAM MORRIS.

ARBROATH.—There may be reason to doubt whether eight hours demonstrations serve to directly advance Socialism; but it must be gratifying to all Socialists to see discontent prompting men to formulate demands of any definite and not absolutely ridiculous kind. Those who believe in evolutionary Socialism will be specially glad to hear that the movement for shorter hours is being well sustained in Scotland. On Saturday, in the Abbey Green at Arbroath, some 2,000 persons assembled to demand the institution of an eight hours day. The meeting was held under the auspices of the Mill and Factory Operatives Union, and contingents were present from the Dundee, Forfar, Brechin, Montrose, Kirkcaldy, and other surrounding districts. Previous to the assembly on the Abbey Green, there was a long and well-organised procession of the Arbroath trades and industries, along with the contingents from a distance. As there were a few Socialists among the speakers, a good deal more than the ordinary trades unionist talk went on. Ritchie (Dundee), Eddy (Glasgow), Spence, Bisset, and myself (from Aberdeen) supported the resolutions, which were carried unanimously, and with a heartiness that might have surprised those who think that Scotchmen can't cheer. With so much discontent expressed by the speakers, and endorsed by the hearers, the wonder is that so small a safety-valve as the demand for an eight hours day is sufficient to let it off.—L.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Police.

Discontent among the police has certainly been increased by the appointment of the new Chief Commissioner, Sir Edward Bradford. This martinet, fresh from bullying and ill-treating the natives of India, directly he attains office begins his reign of despotism—by issuing an edict forbidding the men to hold public meetings to discuss their grievances. This, indeed, may be called poetical justice. The police for a long time have been engaged in suppressing workmen's meetings and processions; they are now enjoying a little taste of their own medicine, and they don't like it. On Monday, when the order was first issued, there were very strong symptoms of mutiny among the men. It appears that a meeting of delegates had been arranged at Bow Street, and on Saturday night at the Borough police-station the constables wanted to elect delegates, but they were informed by the chief inspector that this would not be allowed. They showed some inclination to resist, which resulted in the suspension of a sergeant and a constable. The men in a body at once refused to turn out for night duty. The dispute lasted for two hours, and was only concluded by the inspector giving way and re-instating the two suspended men.

There was great fun at Bow Street on Monday, when four hundred delegates arrived at Bow Street and found their meeting had been "proclaimed." They blocked up the pavement, and discussed the question with great excitement. They were at once ordered to "move on" by an inspector, which order they did not obey. One policeman who was "mutinous" was warned by that official, in a bullying voice, that if he did not mind he would take him inside. It would have been rather a joke if the inspector had carried out his threat, and charged the policeman with "obstruction"! The men gathered round, however, and seemed inclined to resist the "law," and the inspector wisely let the man alone. The men afterwards held a meeting at the Police Institute, No. 1, Adelphi, where it was decided to present a "respectful" petition, asking the superintendants to persuade the Chief Commissioner and the Home Secretary to allow them to meet at Bow Street on June 30th. The men have agreed to stick together in the case of any intimidation, and it is evident that the new Chief Commissioner will find the restoration of "order" a difficult task.

Later.—It appears that it was not in the Borough that the "mutiny" took place, in consequence of the suspension of a sergeant and a constable, but at Bow Street. This adds to its significance.

The Postmen.

The Postmen's Union has issued a manifesto, giving a short history of the movement. It points out, what most of our readers know already, that Mr. Raikes took no notice of the union till last April, though hundreds of meetings were held. He then issued an order by which the postmen were informed they could hold meetings outside, provided that notice was sent to the postal authorities, and none but postmen and an official shorthand writer were permitted to be present. We all know the story of the postmen's meeting on Clerkenwell Green—its proclamation by Mr. Raikes, the breaking up of the processions by the police, and finally his infamous treatment of the men concerning whom his spies had given information. To quote the manifesto: "For attending a trade-union meeting to ask for better wages and a better regulation of working hours, some postmen have been deprived of their good-conduct stripes and reduced in wages; others have had several days' wages confiscated and have been suspended until they give an apology for attending the meeting and promise to attend no more." This is the position, but what has the union done to defend the men against this abominable injustice? Some questions have been asked in Parliament by Messrs. Graham and Conybeare, which have shared the fate of most questions asked there. They have received the usual lying official reply, amid the cold contempt of the honourable and wealthy gentlemen who sit in that "den of thieves." Last week, when the excitement among the postmen was at boiling point, and the men were ready for action, they were advised not to take the only manly course left open to them—a strike in every post-office in London—by Secretary Mr. J. L. Mahon and other officials of the union. Now this gentleman appeals to the public for subscriptions to support the men who have been "suspended" for answering the Postmaster-General according to the instructions of the union officials. It is a great pity that "the officers of the Postmen's Union" did not have the same courage as the men when the time for action arrived. Questions have been asked in Parliament, indeed; but "while the grass grows, the steed starves," and perhaps in a month or two the men will not have such a high opinion of Parliamentary action as their "versatile" secretary.

Up to the present no progress has been made in connection with the above strike. A meeting of the masters was arranged to take place during the week, but was not held owing to Mr. Alfred Haldenstein, a representative of the large sweating firm of Messrs. Haldenstein and Sons, being out of town. This individual seemed to be of more consequence than the demands of three or four thousand men. During the week several incidents have taken place, such as pickets dropping on to men who are doing scabbing. It is being made a general thing during the dinner-hour, and at night when the firms close, to see these men who have been working escorted by hundreds of men and boys to the central rooms of the strike committee, where these individuals sign an agreement not to continue working during the strike. On Friday morning a bill appeared, which was extensively posted, bearing the following words, "Take the docker's advice and pay no rent till the strike is won!" The appearance of this bill seems to have created much talk among the men, who claim to be ignorant as to who has issued it. One objection from a group of men standing around the central rooms was that it was a nice thing for men who are depending on a few shillings a-week coming in for rent for them to live; not only that, but they (the strikers) would lose the sympathy of the landlords, who would probably put a bob in the collection box. The local press also contains a statement announcing that the leaders of the strike entirely repudiate the no-rent manifesto. On Saturday, the union men were paid 12s. for the week, while the non-union married received 5s., and single 3s., a noble sum. The miserable pay for the non-union men has created much dissatisfaction. These men, it is estimated, number between two and three thousand, and the union men under a thousand. Under these circumstances not much will be left for the landlord. A meeting of masters is arranged to be held, and we shall be able to give an account of the progress made next week. S.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

Every day it becomes clearer that the Russian bomb affair is a trumped-up business, invented either by the French Government to have an opportunity of displaying their servility before the Tzar, or by the Russian police, who want to get at the relations that those arrested may have with friends in Russia, and therefore have stolen their papers and letters under the pretext of searching for explosives.

It appears that an international congress of prison authorities is being held at St. Petersburg—a very proper place for such a thing. They have an exhibition there of prison apparatus—a modern torture-chamber. The French delegate made a speech, in which he declared that Russia spreads intelligence, etc.; whilst in fact she is shutting up her schools and suppressing every means of instruction. The paroxysm of servility towards Russia French bourgeois parties are so fond of displaying is the true sequel of the humbugging phrases they traded in last year about the French Revolution.

Atrocities, after the Russian fashion, are committed in France upon the political prisoners when they are expelled. In a recently published letter, it is stated that they are put on the railway in cells or boxes they can hardly move in. Two comrades spent thirty-six hours in this condition until they reached the Belgian frontier, which can usually be reached in a few hours.

The Anarchist press is increasing. Two new papers have come out, the Tocsin of Alger, and the International of London.

BELGIUM AND HOLLAND.

The decomposition of the State Socialist parties into parties going in for this or that reform is also shown by the number of papers springing up, brought out by Socialists, but specially devoted to the advocacy of this or that miraculous remedy. So a new paper called Het Algemeen Stemrecht (Universal Suffrage) is about to be published at Ghent. We have already The Eight Hours Working Day of Zurich, and the Arbeiterschutz of Vienna (on hygienic measures, etc.). Soon papers will exist for every palliative; Socialism is no more spoken of.

It is some little satisfaction, on the other hand, to read comrade F. D. Nieuwenhuis's article, "To each the full result of his labour," in which he fights this dogma, and uses the Communistic arguments against it which are familiar to our readers; nevertheless, the article is worth translation. The Dutch Socialists published some time ago a pamphlet exposing co-operation, which won a superficial success in Belgium. They exposed the action of the Congress last year, and now Communism is advocated there, which is inseparable from Anarchism, as they will learn by and by. They really are white ravens among the State Socialists as things stand at present.

AUSTRIA.

Details of the Nürschau (Bohemia) massacres are now at hand. Three hundred men and women went during the strike to the office of the mining company to get the rest of their wages in tickets for food, which they have to put up with under the truck system. An officer of the army spoke to them in the German language, which they could not understand, as the district is a Bohemian one—a sufficient reason for the Government to send German soldiers there, who cannot be spoken to by the people. After some talk in that language, they were simply shot down like dogs. Eight were killed and thirty-five wounded. Revolver bullets were found in the bodies, which show that the company's officials, who certainly understood the language and saw the "misunderstanding," murdered the workers too. All this was stated in an interpellation in the Diet, which the Liberal papers simply did not reprint.

At Prague three bakers who were out of work, as they took part in the last strike, shot themselves simultaneously to call attention to the position of their fellow workers.

AMERICA.

The Pioneer Aid and Support Association of Chicago bought the ground in which the Anarchists murdered on November 11, 1887, are buried, and propose to erect a monument on their grave, to be unveiled in 1893. In a circular published they deprecate the cultus of persons, but consider the monument to be "a symbol of the fraternisation of labour" all over the world. Subscriptions to be sent to Th. Greif, 54 W. Lake Street, Chicago, Ill.; letters to be sent to Martin Lacher, Avondale Station, Chicago, Ill.

In New York a Bohemian Anarchist paper, Volne Listy, is published, with which the issuing of pamphlets translated is connected. Malatesta's "Entre Paysans" (Between Peasants, a dialogue explaining Anarchism to peasants), and Krasser's "Antisyllabus" (an Atheist and Socialist German poem) have been published.

The death is announced of Albert Brisbane, who, fifty years ago, did more than anybody else to spread Fourier's ideas in America. Many colonies on Fourierist lines were then formed, but after some years the movement dwindled away. Even at present it is not yet dead in France, where last year two Fourierist papers were still published by H. Destrem, and also a Fourierist conference held; but it has lost every touch with the working classes.

SOUTH AMERICA.

We have received No. 1 of El Perseguido (The Persecuted Voice of the Exploited) of Buenos Ayres, an Anarchist paper, written in the Spanish, Italian, and French languages. It has no connection with the Workingmen's Party, formed in connection with the May Day demonstrations, which is a Social-Democratic concern. Much bitter feeling, and not without reason, exists between both parties. * *

GLASGOW.—Jail Square too crowded to hold meeting on Sunday at mid-day. In the evening Glasier addressed an unusually large meeting at Paisley Road Toll, where Commonweal was sold out. We intend adding Bridgeton Cross to our outdoor stations.

EXCURSION TO EPPING FOREST.—The annual excursion of the Autonomie and other allied societies to Epping Forest, took place last Sunday, and was most successful. Everybody enjoyed themselves thoroughly. Music, dancing, merry-making of all sorts, and the excellent catering arrangements, all helped to leave none but pleasant recollections of the day's outing. Nor was the serious part of our work neglected; Commonweal was on sale, and the Essex country lads showed their desire to acquire some knowledge of the labour problem by the readiness with which they bought the paper. The return procession to Loughton station, escorted by some of those detestable flunkies of law-'n'-order, was enlivened by the singing of several revolutionary airs; and the spirited playing of the band gave clear proof that they had not been overtaxed during the day.—B.

SOCIALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

LEEDS.

During the past month we have held two meetings every Sunday. We have several comrades who can speak, but hardly any with much enthusiasm. The sacred flame of Uncompromising Socialism had been allowed to gradually go out. It is hard work reviving it single-handed, but circumstances are working in that direction, and we shall in a short time, I hope, be as powerful as our Sheffield comrades (more power to their elbows). Now, in Leeds, owing to the exertions of the Socialist Club members, who worked long and hard here for about eight months, there have been formed several unions and many branches of the Gas Workers Union. It was thought that these thousands could be utilised for "Socialistic" work, but what is the result?—nothing. Not a single member made, no more purchasers among them of the 'Weal, and little or no interest shown in the various lectures and meetings. If it were not for our friends the enemy we should have a dreary time of it. But the Leeds Municipal Gas Committee are causing discontent and hatred amongst their men, by trying to force them to sign agreements which include more work in the eight hours (which they gained by striking last November). The men, however, are determined not to yield, and there is every sign of a stiff fight. The Municipality are making arrangements for scabs. It is also interesting to hear that one of the gas employes has invented an "iron man," which is so perfect that the Gas Committee (Municipal) are about to test it. What a lesson or sermon could be preached from this. I shall send more particulars as the struggle goes on. "But still the Cause goes marching on." Our Jewish comrades here are quite strong in their International Educational Club, and the activity and enthusiasm amongst them is remarkable. They are primarily teachers, not leaders nor yet politicians, and it is pleasant to see their fraternity, as well as the enthusiasm of several female comrades. They intend holding open-air meetings regularly, and it is quite certain that they will not be the last to leave the house of bondage, nor will they require a Moses to lead them into the promised land. H. S.

YARMOUTH.

It was said by some Yarmouth people during the bad weather, when no meetings could be held, or only small ones, that Socialism was dead here. But we are glad to say this is not true; in fact, Socialism, and that of a thorough revolutionary character, is growing stronger in Yarmouth than ever. 'Tis true, it is left to a few to carry the standard in the advance-guard. As you know, we were to be represented at the Conference of the S.L. on Whitsunday by three of our comrades; but still, those left behind were not idle, comrades Brightwell and Ruffold opening and keeping up a discussion on Priory Plain. The Branch received the report of the Conference delegate at their next meeting, and adopted it after slight discussion. On Thursday following a debate took place between Brightwell (S.L.) and a Mr. Adams, a "Conservative Working-man," which lasted upwards of three hours, our opponent getting the worst of tussle. On June 1st, one of our speakers being ill, no meetings were held in the open-air, but we met in the club-room and spent an enjoyable evening, singing revolutionary songs and having a chat amongst ourselves. At our next business meeting arrangements were made for three London comrades who had promised to come down and assist us; 1,000 handbills were printed, giving names and subjects. On June 8th, comrade Crouch being unable to come, owing to illness, comrade Saint took his place, who had large and attentive audiences and plenty of opposition at both morning and evening meetings; all Commonweal sold out, and 2s. 2½d. collected. On June 15th was a red-letter day with us; three very large and attentive meetings were held. In the morning, on Priory Plain, comrade Turner (of London) lectured on "Socialism v. Political Action"; although we challenged all politicians in our bill, none of them had courage enough to defend their principles; more than 1,000 people were present. On the afternoon Turner continued his lecture on the Hall Quay. In the evening, on Colman's Quay, Turner lectured on "Insufficient Remedies" to a still larger audience, Mr. Adams attacking our comrade on several points; and he had the impudence to say that John Burns was not a Socialist. He also attacked the Communists, Anarchists, and Nihilists. But he again got the worst of the fight, and was hooted by the audience. A resolution was put in favour of Socialism; nearly every hand went up, only three against. All Commonweal sold, and 5s. 4d. collected towards railway expenses. We are arranging for a tea and concert next month, and think that old members who have dropped away will rejoin; in fact, names are being given in already. The majority of workers are unfortunately very demoralised. As we reported in one of our old reports, they are only too ready to act as blacklegs when strikes take place elsewhere, but have not pluck to try to better their conditions here. We hope, however, to stir them up before long, and while drawing them into the Branch, to see that they work hard amongst their fellow-workers in trying to educate and organise them. Altogether, they are moving in the right direction, and in some future report we will try to give some facts respecting the condition of the fishermen in and around Yarmouth. Also a few facts concerning some of the capitalists of this town, from the mayor (a sweater) downwards. Success to the Cause! J. H.

The Offices of the Socialist League will be open for the sale of Commonweal and all other Socialist publications from 8.30 a.m. to 9 p.m. every day except Sunday. The Secretary will be in attendance from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m. daily.

Branch Subscriptions Paid.—1890:—Leicester and North Kensington, to end of April. Glasgow, Oxford, Hammersmith, North London, East London, 'Commonweal' Branch, Manchester, and Norwich, to end of May. Streatham, to end of December. (Branch Secretaries will please send with remittances for Capitations the number of their membership.)

REPORTS.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—On Sunday last comrade Harry Carless, of Walsall, gave two addresses at our out-door meetings, to an interested audience. Collections good; Commonweal sold out. Arrangements are now complete for the holding of the Midland Conference next Sunday, June 29th. The delegates present will travel to Stoke in the morning for a picnic, returning to Nottingham for Conference at 2.30 p.m. In the evening at 6.45, in the Great Market Place, we shall hold a Demonstration—the speakers including Edward Carpenter, Andrew Hall, Charles, Bailie of Manchester, our old comrade Pengelley, and others.—A. C.

SHEFFIELD.—On Sunday 15th our comrade Andrew Hall, from Chesterfield, addressed some very large meetings. 216 Commonweal sold. Owing to miners' demonstration at Barnsley, no meeting was held at Woodhouse. This week G. Cores has been with us, and we have had some good meetings, including a fine one amongst the miners at Woodhouse on Saturday, where 56 Commonweals were sold. Our 216 Commonweal were sold out early on Sunday evening, together with some other literature, and we had to wire for a fresh supply. No meetings here next Sunday, on account of Nottingham Conference and Demonstration. Have opened two new stations during the week.—F. C.

THE SATIRES OF CYNICUS.

"SINE IRA ET STUDIO."

CYNICUS asks no favour, is no partisan, independent and unbiassed he looks with impartial eye on the follies and corruptions of his time. Unknown and unaided, but with firm purpose, he launches his satires on a world of dissimulation and deceit, where alas—

Virtue's at a discount,
Truth is under par,
Honesty's a scarcity
Wealth is better far.

Knavery's commendable,
Cheating is no sin;
He is the true philanthropist
Who takes the stranger in.

But where, perchance, some honest kindly heart,
While smiling at his fancies, still may say—
"He acts no snarling, mean, or churlish part
Who fain would laugh the follies of the world away."

TO SUCH HE DEDICATES HIS BOOK.

To Socialists who wish to see the hypocrisy of modern society pictorially lampooned, we recommend Cynicus.

A WORD TO THE POLICE.

BRAZEN and shameless impudence has ever been a distinguishing characteristic of a hired bully, and the stout men in blue who guard the fat persons, and, above all, the fat purses of the London middle-classes, have never been deficient in this necessary quality of their vile calling. Yet, shameless and brazen as we know their impudence to be, it came as a shock of surprise even to those of us who had seen most of them, to find them posing as underpaid workers, and raising a piteous cry concerning higher wages and "pensions." Warm from the congenial business of bludgeoning under-sized and overstrained post-men on their way to demonstrate on Clerkenwell Green, these well-fed chawbacons from the country districts hold meetings, elect delegates, present petitions, and formulate demands and pass resolutions couched in quite mutinous, not to say revolutionary, terms. Apparently these men who are betraying their brethren every day for the sake of the safe weekly wages and the warm uniform, and the certain pension secured to them, and of the countless tips and gratifications of all kinds given to them on all hands, are so ignorant of their own infamy as to suppose that the workers, whose ranks they have left, will sympathise with them because they find the devil a hard taskmaster, as in the long run he generally is.

If any policeman reads this number of the Commonweal, he may be really surprised to learn that he is regarded by us revolutionary Socialists (and not, as we believe, by us only, but by tens of thousands of London workers not yet Socialists) as an infamous scoundrel. We will endeavour to make clear to the presumably dull intellect of this bobby why this should be so. Let him understand that Socialists in general (and the present writer least of all) blame no man who, under present conditions, is driven into what we look upon as an anti-social trade. For aught we care, he may get his living by thieving on the Stock Exchange or at the Bar, he may join even the hired assassins of the army, or carry advertisements of swindlers in the streets, and yet be a good comrade. We recognise the fact that, like the rest of us, he is a slave and cannot help himself. But, slave though he be, there must surely be certain limits beyond which he will not go, although the penalty for not passing them be even the Christian's hell itself. If he be born an agricultural labourer and be expelled by landlordism from the fields whereon he has grown to manhood, we can understand that he may easily drift into the police force. Once there he must, of course, perform the "duty" which is set him to do. Yet, surely, not all such duty. Even you, our dull-brained friend, must see that you would not be justified in committing murder at the command of your inspector, or even of "I, Sir Edward Bradford" himself. You see it in the abstract, do you? But that is precisely what the police of London, you yourself, perhaps, have done—not in the abstract, but in the concrete. Not yet three years ago, at the command of your Commissioner, you set upon and cruelly bludgeoned your fellows, men of your own class from all parts of London, on their way to peaceably demonstrate in Trafalgar Square. You bludgeoned them and killed some; others you made prisoners, and when you got them inside your station yards and had them completely at your mercy, you beat them before trial within an inch of their lives; jeering and mocking meanwhile at the fools who, unlike you, had not sold their manhood for a compliment from the "beak," or a share of the cook's cold mutton. But why need we recall the memories of "Bloody Sunday"? Not that they need much recalling to London workers! What you were three years ago, that you are to-day. On May-day this year you broke up our processions, tore our banners, and (brave men that you are) assaulted and insulted some stalwart lasses (who, let us hope, will never endure the shame of having given suck to creatures like you) on Clerkenwell Green.

Great, doubtless, is the powers of organisation and what is called "discipline," and you may plead that you have made yourselves mere machines, and act like automata at the word of command. Even if true, such an excuse would not avail you much. We may remind you of those sentries on duty at Buckingham Palace that Sunday afternoon last autumn, who broke all military rule and doubtless incurred punishment by facing round, and presenting arms to the dockers' procession as it passed to Hyde Park: contrast their conduct with yours. But the excuse is not true; you have played no automatic part in the outrages of the last few years; you have absolutely revelled in the base and bloody tasks which have been set you; you have cracked coarse jests as you have cracked heads; and you have shown yourselves brutal, cowardly hounds, who know neither justice nor mercy, you hired prostitutes, the baser and meaner because you claim to be "men."

On calm reflection, do you wonder that you are not appreciated at your own valuation? Seriously speaking, are you not vile and infamous? Do you wonder that we look upon your attempt to represent yourselves as ill-used workers as about the sublimest height yet reached by the blatant insolence of persons whose offensive impertinence springs from their utter lack of perception or intelligence?

Yet, even now, one way of repentance is still open to you as it is to others: it may not be open long. Even yet, you may save yourselves from that true wrath which is really coming, the wrath of the workers in the Revolution. You claim that you, too, can organise a strike for better wages and shorter hours. Organise a strike first, then, for nobler ends. Strike against such employment as you have been lately put to. The next time you are ordered to "disperse" a peaceable procession, throw down your bludgeons and refuse the cowardly and brutal work like men. Will you take this advice, now you find that the tyrants who have used you as tools for their dirty work are beginning to suppress your meetings? when the new Chief Commissioner, fresh from butchering natives in Hindustan, will not even allow you to meet in order to complain a little about your grievances? Now is the day of salvation; now is the time; now is the hour. By refusing this very day to carry out your new despot's orders you will win the sympathy of the working classes, and they will support you in your agitation. Prove that you are men, and not cowardly flunkies, base and cringing to the rich but brutal, murderous, bullies with the poor, and you will have the kindly help of your brothers in obtaining your demands. Refuse, and you will neither get sympathy nor help, and you will fail—as cowards always fail—in your agitation.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. XIX. (continued).—THE DRIVE BACK TO HAMMERSMITH.

As soon as I had spoken I perceived that I had got back to my old blunder; for I saw Dick's shoulders shaking with laughter; but he wouldn't say a word, but handed me over to the tender mercies of Clara, who said—

"Why, I don't know what you mean. Of course we can afford it, or else we shouldn't do it. It would be easy enough for us to say, we will only spend our labour on making our clothes comfortable: but we don't choose to stop there. Why do you find fault with us? Does it seem to you as if we starved ourselves of food in order to make ourselves fine clothes? or do you think there is anything wrong in liking to see the coverings of our bodies beautiful like our bodies are?—just as a deer's or an otter's skin has been made beautiful from the first? Come, what is wrong with you?"

I bowed before the storm, and mumbled out some excuse or other. I must say, I might have known that people who were so fond of architecture generally would not be backward in ornamenting themselves; all the more as the shape of their raiment, apart from its colour, was both beautiful and reasonable—veiling the form without either muffling or caricaturing it.

Clara was soon mollified; and as we drove along toward the wood before mentioned, she said to Dick—

"I tell you what, Dick: now that kinsman Hammond the Elder has seen our guest in his queer clothes, I think we ought to find him something decent to put on for our journey to-morrow: especially since, if we don't, we shall have to answer all sorts of questions as to his clothes and where they came from. Besides," she said, slyly, "when he is clad in handsome garments he will not be so quick to blame us for our childishness in wasting our time in making ourselves look pleasant to each other."

"All right, Clara," said Dick; "he shall have everything that you—that he wants to have. I will look something out for him before he gets up to-morrow."

CHAP. XX.—THE HAMMERSMITH GUEST-HOUSE AGAIN.

AMIDST such talk, driving quietly through the balmy evening, we came to Hammersmith, and were well received by our friends there. Boffin, in a fresh suit of clothes, welcomed me back with stately courtesy; the weaver wanted to button-hole me and get out of me what old Hammond had said, but was very friendly and cheerful when Dick warned him off; Annie shook hands with me, and hoped I had had a pleasant day—so kindly, that I felt a slight pang as our hands parted; for to say the truth, I liked her better than Clara, who seemed to be always a little on the defensive, whereas Annie was as frank as could be, and seemed to get honest pleasure from everything and everybody about her without the least effort.

We had quite a little feast that evening, partly in my honour, and partly, I suspect, though nothing was said about it, in honour of Dick and Clara coming together again. The wine was of the best; the hall was redolent of rich summer flowers; and after supper we not only had music (Annie, to my mind, surpassing all the others for sweetness and clearness of voice, as well as for feeling and meaning), but at last we even got to telling stories, and sat there listening, with no other light but that of the summer moon streaming through the beautiful traceries of the windows, as if we had belonged to time long passed, when books were scarce and the art of reading somewhat rare. Indeed, I may say here that though, as you will have noted, my friends had mostly something to say about books, yet they were not great readers considering the refinement of their manners and the great amount of leisure which they obviously had. In fact, when Dick, especially, mentioned a book, he did so with an air of a man who has accomplished an achievement; as much as to say, "There, you see I have actually read that!"

The evening passed all too quickly for me; since that day, for the first time in my life, I was having my fill of the pleasure of the eyes without any of that sense of incongruity, that dread of approaching ruin, which had always beset me hitherto when I had been amongst the beautiful works of art of the past, mingled with the lovely nature of the present; both of them, in fact, the result of the long centuries of tradition, which had compelled men to produce the art, and compelled nature to run into the mould of the ages. Here I could enjoy everything without an after-thought of the injustice and miserable toil which made my leisure; the ignorance and dulness of life which went to make my keen appreciation of history; the tyranny and the struggle full of fear and mishap which went to make my romance. The only weight I had upon my heart was a vague fear as it drew toward bed-time concerning the place wherein I should wake on the morrow: but I choked that down, and went to bed happy, and in a very few moments was in a dreamless sleep.

CHAP. XXI.—GOING UP THE RIVER.

WHEN I did wake, to a beautiful sunny morning, I leapt out of bed with my over-night apprehension still clinging to me, which vanished delightfully however in a moment as I looked around my little sleeping chamber and saw the pale but pure-coloured figures painted on the plaster of the wall, with verses written underneath them which I knew somewhat over well. I dressed speedily, in a suit of blue laid ready for me, so handsome that I quite blushed when I had got into it, feeling as I did so that excited pleasure of anticipation of a holiday, which, well remembered as it was, I had not felt since I was a boy, new come home for the summer holidays.

It seemed quite early in the morning, and I expected to have the hall to myself when I came into it out of the corridor wherein was my sleeping chamber; but I met Annie at once, who let fall her broom and gave me a kiss, quite meaningless I fear, except as betokening friendship, though she reddened as she did it, not from shyness, but from friendly pleasure, and then stood and picked up her broom again and went on with her sweeping, nodding to me as if to bid me stand out of the way and look on; which, to say the truth, I thought amusing enough, as there were five other girls helping her, and their graceful figures engaged in the leisurely work were worth going a long way to see, and their merry talk and laughing as they swept in quite a scientific manner was worth going a long way to hear. But Annie presently threw me back a word or two as she went on to the other end of the hall: "Guest," she said, "I am glad that you are up early, though we wouldn't disturb you; for our Thames is a lovely river at half-past six on a June morning: and as it would be a pity for you to lose it, I am told just to give you a cup of milk and a bit of bread outside there, and put you into the boat: for Dick and Clara are all ready now. Wait half a minute till I have swept down this row."

So presently she let her broom drop again, and came and took me by the hand and led me out on to the terrace above the river, to a little table under the boughs, where my bread and milk took the form of as dainty a breakfast as any one could desire, and then sat by me as I ate. And in a minute or two Dick and Clara came to me, the latter looking most fresh and beautiful in a light silk embroidered gown, which to my unused eyes was extravagantly gay and bright; while Dick was also handsomely dressed in white flannel prettily embroidered. Clara raised her gown in her hands as she gave me the morning greeting, and said laughingly: "Look, guest! you see we are at least as fine as any of the people you felt inclined to scold last night; you see we are not going to make the bright day and the flowers feel ashamed of themselves. Now scold me!"

Quoth I: "No, indeed; the pair of you seem as if you were born out of the summer day itself; and I will scold you when I scold it."

"Well, you know," said Dick, "this is a special day—all these days are, I mean. The hay-harvest is in some ways better than corn-harvest because of the beautiful weather; and really, unless you had worked in the hayfield in fine weather, you couldn't tell what pleasant work it is. The women look so pretty at it, too," he said, shyly; "so all things considered, I think we are right to adorn it in a simple manner."

"Do the women work at it in silk dresses," said I, smiling.

Dick was going to answer me soberly; but Clara put her pretty hand over his mouth, and said: "No, no, Dick; not too much information for him, or I shall think that you are your old kinsman again. Let him find out for himself: he will not have long to wait."

"Yes," quoth Annie, "don't make your description of the picture too fine, or else he will be disappointed when the curtain is drawn. I don't want him to be disappointed. But now it's time for you to be gone, if you are to have the best of the tide, and also of the sunny morning. Good-bye, guest."

She kissed me in her frank friendly way, and almost took away from me my desire for the expedition thereby; but I had to get over that, as it was clear that so delightful a woman would hardly be without a due lover of her own age. We went down the steps of the landing stage, and got into a pretty boat, not too light to hold us and our belongings comfortably, and handsomely ornamented; and just as we got in, down came Boffin and the weaver to see us off. The former had now veiled his splendour in a due suit of working clothes, crowned with a fantail hat, which he took off, however, to wave us farewell with his grave old-Spanish-like courtesy. Then Dick pushed off into the stream, and bent vigorously to his sculls, and Hammersmith, with its noble trees and beautiful water-side houses, began to slip away from us.

As we went, I could not help putting beside his promised picture of the hay-field as it was then the picture of it as I remembered it, and especially the images of the women engaged in the work rose up before me: the row of gaunt figures, lean, flat-breasted, ugly, without a grace of form and face about them; dressed in wretched skimpy print gowns, and hideous flapping sun-bonnets, moving their rakes in a listless mechanical way. How often had that marred the loveliness of the June day to me; how often had I longed to see the hay-fields peopled with men and women worthy of the sweet abundance of early summer, of its endless wealth of beautiful sights, and delicious sounds and scents. And now, the world had grown old and wiser, and I was to see my hope realised at last!

SOCIALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

LEICESTER.

Socialism has now firmly caught on here, and shows every sign of spreading. May 11th, Chambers and Barclay addressed good audiences, and there was a lengthy discussion. The Sunday following, our old friend Peacock, of Nottingham, lectured morning and evening—ruffling, in his second address, the complacent well-to-do and worldly Christians, and keeping the crowd in good humour. Proctor, of Nottingham, was the next speaker, who tore the emigration fraud to very tatters from personal experience. Sunday June 1st, Carless, of Walsall, delivered two addresses. For a young fellow of twenty-three, he is surprisingly fluent and confident, and put the principles of Socialism before his hearers with force and animation. June 8th, Raymond Unwin, of Chesterfield, gave us two most thoughtful addresses—morning, "Democracy"; evening, "The Survival of the Fittest." The speaker's exposure of our senseless shoddy production and terrible cut-throat competition was hailed with applause by the audience.

Friday, June 6th, we made our first incursion of this year into the villages. Barclay addressed the people of Ansty, a large village five miles out. Thomas Slatter and other anti-Socialists, getting wind of our meeting, went from Leicester to oppose us, and there was animated discussion, and great excitement among the audience. The next Saturday we took George Cores, of London, over, and a local capitalist, a brewer, made a personal attack upon him: but a friend of ours in Ansty, having whispered to Cores the information that his opponent was a sweating employer, our comrade lashed out, and turned the tables beautifully on the capitalist, to the immense delight of the villagers. Comrade Taylor also spoke at this meeting. Sunday 15th, Cores lectured thrice, a new station being opened up on the Old Cross, Belgrave Gate. Friday 20th we paid a third visit to Ansty, a Positivist friend taking the chair for us. Plenty of discussion again. But Sunday 22nd was by far our greatest day this season. Mrs. Lahr, of London, spoke thrice, the third time being on Sanvey Gate. Mrs. Lahr is an earnest speaker, and the fact of her being a woman told with her Leicester audiences. Three quires Commonweal were sold, 14s. 3d. collected, and six new members were enrolled.

We have had discussion at most of our meetings; and long after we have broken up it has continued among little groups. Sometimes the opponent of our principles is a fanatical teetotaler or thrift-monger, sometimes a capitalist on the make, and sometimes the discussion is simply one of difficulties among enquirers; but discussion there is sure to be, and from week to week it increases. Education inside our Branch is not neglected meanwhile. Every Monday night some member brings in a difficult phase of the great question for discussion; and as we are mostly young men, we are hoping to have presently two or three other speakers. We intend, as long as we come near paying railway-fare of speakers from elsewhere, to keep on importing them.

POLICE BRUTALITY TO WOMEN.

The question of the behaviour of the police to women is becoming so serious that it is time that public attention was called to the subject. It is very well known that the police avoid unnecessary displays of violence to men, knowing that such displays will only lead to retaliation on the part of otherwise peaceable citizens. With regard to women, the matter is, however, different. Our police force have read their Shakespeare, and knowing the line, "A woman, naturally prone to fears," they proceed to act upon it; and the hands of the police may be said to be never off the poorer class of women—shoving, pushing, hauling, or even with further violence, without any regard to their rights as citizens or the consideration due to them as women. These facts have long been known to those attending our police courts, where quite decent women, coming with the most just complaints, are besides spoken to habitually with the utmost brutality. Not long ago, at one of the best known of these courts, a woman had cancer in the breast caused by a deliberate blow from the elbow of a policeman.

The matter is, however, assuming a more acute phase, and the police are now determined to take from women that right to ventilate their grievances in public which they assume for themselves. Not long ago a peaceable meeting of women on strike on Clerkenwell Green was attacked by a number of police specially selected on account of their enormous size. One woman with a collecting box was seized upon, shaken, and told to "get home out of that." Other women were nearly knocked down, and no doubt more violence would have been offered had not some working-men closed up to protect the women, when the police precipitately retired. It is evidently by assaults on women that the "bullies" and "bravos" of our police force hope to earn promotion. The charge brought against these women was that they were causing an obstruction. An obstruction in the middle of Clerkenwell Green! And yet, strange to say, a meeting of policemen was held on the same spot not long after, to ventilate their grievances, and we have not yet heard that they have taken one another up for obstruction! But then these police were men earning 30s. a-week and upwards, who burnt with the noble desire to nobble a few more of the public shillings, in the way of increased weekly wage and secure pensions; while the women, poor ignoble wretches, only wanted to prevent a hitherto wage of 16s. being reduced to 8s.

Perhaps, however, an even more serious case of interference with public and personal rights occurred recently in regard to some women who formed themselves into a union, and wrote a letter to their employers asking for the redress of some grievances. They did not threaten to go on strike, there was no disturbance, they continued peaceably to pursue their employment; but the employer surrounded the place with policemen, and illegally threatened that unless they submitted to his will he would give them into custody. It would be interesting to know by whose authority the police in this district thus prostituted the very name of Justice. I ask, "Who controls the police—the Home Secretary or the Chief Commissioner of Police—or are they simply the paid hirelings of the capitalist class?"

Before any attention is paid to the oft-repeated complaints as to the overwork of the police or their insufficient numbers, it would be well that the public should make enquiry as to by whom, and on what work they are now employed.

E. L.

The Women's Union held a large meeting on Clerkenwell Green on Sunday evening to protest against the assaults on women by the police, more especially respecting their action on May 1st, a description of which is given above. A big van served as a platform, which, before the meeting started, was carefully looked after by a number of policemen, who showed an inclination to interfere on the stale pretext of obstruction. They complained that the crowd was blocking the footway. However, this insolence was resisted by the speakers, and the crowd gathering round us, the police left the meeting alone. Later on, when their brutal conduct towards working women was thoroughly exposed by Miss Lupton, they sneaked off to the other side of the Green to solace themselves with the psalms and hymns of a band of religionists. Parker took the chair, and Miss Lupton, Mrs. Schack, Mrs. Lahr, Nicoll, and More (Norwich) were the other speakers. The following resolution was carried unanimously: "That this meeting, assembled on Clerkenwell Green, indignantly protests against the conduct of the police in violently assaulting several women on the occasion of a public meeting held on this Green on May 1st, and also begs to call the attention of the Home Secretary to the action of the magistrates at Clerkenwell Police Court in refusing a summons against one of the constables for assault; and further protests against the employment of the police for the purpose of preventing the combination of women to secure for themselves a larger share of the fruits of their labour." A second resolution was also carried directing the chairman to send the first resolution to the Home Secretary. 9s. was collected for expenses of the meeting.

CONFERENCE OF LONDON REVOLUTIONISTS.

The Conference of London Revolutionists, held at the Berner Street Club on Tuesday, June 24th, passed off very successfully. Comrades were present from all the revolutionary societies of London, and the discussion showed at least that there was not much difference of opinion among them as to revolutionary tactics.

After a general discussion on principles, policy, and tactics, in which Mowbray, Casey, Blackwell, Davis, Nicoll, Robert Harding, Pearson, and others took part, the following motion by J. Blackwell (Freedom Group) was unanimously agreed to, "That we do our utmost to spread the idea of an International General Strike among the people." It was also agreed, on the motion of Leggatt, St. Georges Branch, S.L., "That we hold special meetings called by handbills for this purpose." The sum of 10s. 6d. was collected for the revolutionary press. During the evening the choir of the Commonweal Branch sang revolutionary songs with great fervour and enthusiasm. The Conference has certainly brought the International Revolutionary bodies in London together, and we believe that it will result in renewed vigour for the revolutionary propaganda.

RUSSIA.—Madame Maria Tchebrikova, the author of the open letter to the Czar, has been banished by the governor of Vollogd to Yaransk, a little town with a population of about 1,000, by the river Yaranga, on the north-eastern side of Vollogd. The town is situated about 600 miles away from Moscow, and about 750 miles from St. Petersburg. The colony of the exiles consists of fifteen other "criminals" besides Maria Tchebrikova, who, without exception, belong to the so-called "privileged" class, and receive from 8 to 15 roubles per month for their sustenance. There is no telegraphic or postal communication in Yaransk, and the exiles are entirely cut off from the whole world.

Reviews.

THE CHICAGO MARTYRS: their Speeches in Court. Third Edition. Published by the International Socialist Societies of London. 1890. Price Threepence.

The International Revolutionary Societies of London, including the Socialist League, have just re-issued the pamphlet giving the record of the judicial murder and false imprisonment of our Chicago comrades. It would, perhaps, enlighten the mental darkness, "assumed or real," on the part of certain Radical and Republican editors and orators in this country were they to peruse the pages of the pamphlet under notice. Our forefathers and a large percentage of latter-day emigrants have looked to America as the promised land, but they carried with them the fatal seeds of competition and exploitation, and the result has been ably expressed in the speech of our martyr comrade Parsons, when upon his trial in Chicago. After alluding to the utterances of the capitalist press, wherein it was advocated to poison or shoot down tramps and rebellious workmen, he says:

"Your honour, one of the most startling facts in connection with this trial, the labour movement, and the general situation of affairs, is to be found in the fact that during the last two or three years at least one-half of the large industrial establishments of the United States, the larger corporations, monopolies and industries, have been conducted under military supervision. A startling fact is this. Armed men, armed guards, either the Pinkertons or the police, the police of the municipalities in the cities, or the militia, or the United States army, as has been done in some cases, are supervising one-half of the industries of America, that is, the larger industries. It is a positive fact. Think of this. Who is doing this? Now, as an off-set to this state of affairs, we find 1,200 delegates assembled in Richmond, Va., representing our American working-men in the convention of the Knights of Labour. That congress, that organisation, is the reply which is being made by peaceable labourers to the rifle-diet advice, the strychnine business, and the hand-grenade business, and club business advice by the Chicago, New York, Philadelphia, and other large papers in this country. These men are assembled in self-defence. The conflict is the struggle between liberty and authority—authority in any and every form. Those who are in authority tell the working-men that if they want to enjoy the law and the protection of the law, they must render a cheerful obedience to the law. Why a man when he flogs his slave for disobedience tells him the same thing. Your honour, according to your construction of sentence, or the reason which you propose as a portion of the ground-work upon which you expect to render your proposed sentence, you deny the right of Americans to defend themselves against the rifle diet, and to protest against these outrageous things, to object to the strychnine business. These are the things that have made us what we are. If there be any wrong in me I am the product of these conditions. I am the creature of circumstances; I am the effect of a cause."

The whole book is inferentially a bitter rebuke to those who in England whilst terming us as visionaries and utopians, are seeking to delude the working-class with exploded Republican theories.

EXHIBITION OF CHAMPION HUMBUGS, and A LETTER (by J. Kaspar) TO PHILANTHROPIC CAPITALISTS (sic).

The first is at starting a rather clever satire upon American clerics and pressmen, but is obscured in its conclusions by a web of theological rubbish. The second is an attempt to float colonies adjacent to London and New York, based upon the principle of beggar my neighbour, i.e., making a profit upon the calculation "that as the value of land will be more than tenfold its cost price (who pays?) in a few years, an increased security for the loans and a large capital for the humanitarian will thus have been created." We fancy that philanthropic capitalists will rise to this bait.

IDEO KLEPTOMANIA: The Case of Henry George. By J. W. Sullivan. 'Twentieth Century' Publishing Co., New York.

'Ideo Kleptomania' is a clever demonstration of the intellectual dishonesty of the great single-tax humbug. In this little work the "prophet" of San Francisco is shown to be an advertising charlatan, who has started in business with a stock of stolen ideas. Thanks to Mr. Sullivan, Henry George has now been thoroughly exposed. If his admirers will read this pamphlet they will be thoroughly convinced, not only that Henry George is a "false prophet," but that he is also shamefully ignorant of political economy, which he pretends to thoroughly understand.

A CHAT ABOUT THE COLONIES AND INDIA. Published by the Working Men's Club and Institute Union, 150, Holborn, E.C.

'A Chat about the Colonies and India' is an interesting pamphlet by our comrade Thomas Shore, jun. It appears that some time ago Sir Charles Dilke, in his efforts to regain a lost popularity, placed at the disposal of the Working Men's Club and Institute Union the sum of £10, to be offered as a prize to any one who could write an essay in laudation of our glorious British Empire. Thomas Shore was among the competitors, but his essay did not exactly "come within the terms of the advertisement issued by the Union," as it was mainly devoted to "smashing the British Empire" from a logical point of view at least. The judges, however, thought it so good that they recommended "a special gift of £5" should be presented to the writer, and the pamphlet has also been published by the Club and Institute Union, with a "reply" by Sir Charles Dilke. The "reply" is not a very brilliant one, and does very little to shake the damaging mass of facts and figures, which prove that this glorious British Empire was built by battle, murder, and cruelty, and that even now it is simply a huge edifice of tyranny, oppression, and extortion. This pamphlet should be read by those who in this enlightened age have any lingering belief in that bastard Imperialism which our masters are so fond of preaching. It will shake their faith a little.

LIVERPOOL SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—We held two good meetings on the Landing Stage yesterday, when comrade J. Ward delivered a couple of stirring addresses. A little discussion followed the morning lecture, the opposition being taken up by the Christian Evidence Society lecturers. The second meeting was held in the afternoon. Excellent attendances at both; 14s. 5d. taken by collections and sale of literature. The tailors' strike, which has lasted three weeks, is now concluded, the last lot going in to-day (Monday). The girls have gained a decided victory. In addition to the reduction of hours, which nearly every employer has conceded, a deputation from the trades societies waited upon several of the leading shops, such as Lewises, and Beatty Bros., and succeeded in getting them to employ the girls direct on their own premises, and so abolish the middleman. Our comrades who have been taking an active part in this strike are living in hopes of establishing both tailors and tailoresses on a more advantageous basis in the coming winter by the introduction of one or two co-operative workshops, and so by this means gradually getting the work in their own hands. Should this scheme prove successful, we can make it a good field for propaganda.

HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON

The COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. For Australia, New Zealand, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Transvaal, and the Argentine Republic, a year, 8s.; six months, 4s.; three months, 2s. For India, Ceylon, China, Hong Kong, and the Straits Settlements, a year, 10s.; six months, 5s.; three months, 2s. 6d.

Subscribers who receive a RED WRAPPER are thereby reminded that their subscriptions have expired and must be renewed immediately if they wish to continue to receive COMMONWEAL.

SPECIAL RECRUIT SUBSCRIPTIONS.—To aid in spreading our principles, the following largely reduced terms are offered to those who obtain new subscribers: Two new yearly subscriptions for British Islands, etc., 10s. 6d.; for Australia, etc., 15s.; for India, etc., 19s. Five new subscriptions: For British Islands, etc., 25s.; for Australia, etc., 37s. 6d.; for India, etc., 47s. 6d. Specimen copies will be sent on receipt of postage.

Remittances from abroad must be made by International Money Order.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

J. L. (Aberdeen).—Your figures were illegible, and that is how the mistake occurred. We cannot publish your letter, as our columns are overcrowded this week, but we are willing to state for the benefit of the general public that the number attending the eight hour demonstration at Arbroath was 7,000, and not 2,000, as reported in last week's issue.

R. P.—Report of Midland Socialist Conference crowded out this week. Shall go in next.

NOTES ON NEWS.

"SIGNOR ARRIGO has given particulars of his detention by the brigands. He declares that nothing can be more horrible and infamous." Yes; quite so. What happened to the signor apart from the anxiety about his life, and his loss of liberty, was that he was ill-fed (as one is in English prisons at least). In other words he shared the short commons of his captors, and has at least gained this advantage from his captivity, that he has found out how the poor live. It is to be hoped he will use his knowledge in doing his best to get rid of that condition of poverty which he found to be so "horrible and infamous."

It is a curious thing, by the way, that even acknowledged brigandage is duly exploited, and gives a profit to the enterprising capitalist. For it seems the industrious working brigands are in the employ of gentlemen, who live on their somewhat ill-paid labour. Signor Arrigo's guard, who seems to have been a very good-natured friendly fellow, was one of these journeyman brigands, and found it as difficult "to better himself" as most journeymen do. So commercial is the present age! So bent upon using up all waste in the process of making money! Even when that waste is no better than the lives of a few poor men.

W. M.

The present Government is going to pieces—not the least doubt about it. They are perishing of dry rot, dying of too many amendments, of too much parliamentarism altogether. The editor of the Star is in raptures, and evidently considers that it is he who is dealing a death blow to the Government, while it is really perishing of general public disgust at its stupidity, meanness, cowardice and cruelty.

It is an exciting time for Government, the temperance people, and the editor of the Star; but strange to say, the work-people do not seem greatly interested. The cowardly betrayal of the people by the Liberal party, who have looked on with calm satisfaction while such small liberties as we have were torn from us by brutal force and ruffianly violence, has even alienated many a workman who used to look upon the Grand Old Sham as the incarnation of all earthly justice and wisdom. The people see now that he is but a middle-class politician with a genius for eloquence of an ambiguous character, which may mean little or nothing, although there is a lot of sound about it. The Great God Gladstone has fallen never to rise again. These who once worshipped him can see that he is only made of a very poor sort of clay after all.

But let us imagine Salisbury, Balfour, Matthews and Co. gone; and Gladstone, Harcourt, and T. P. O'Connor in their places. What then? Has the millenium come? Will the foul slums of London, with poverty, want, and care vanish like a "summer fog" before the rays of glorious sun? I trow not. The first two "nice old gentlemen" have a pleasant little trick of giving the lie to every promise they make in opposition directly they get into office. Workmen, have you forgotten how these great and good Liberals behaved when they were last in power? Peace, retrenchment, and reform was written on their banners when they went to the polls. How did they fulfil their promises? Two bloody, useless, and cruel wars—in Egypt and the Soudan; heavier and heavier taxes after, to pay for these massacres; and brutal and shameful coercion in Ireland.

"O, but they have reformed since." Have they, my dear simple friend? Have you forgotten Trafalgar Square and "our admirable police"? What a splendid Home Secretary would be our dear friend Tay Pay O'Connor! He is so fond of "free speech" in his own paper. Please ask Mr. Massingham, the late sub-editor of the Star.

If there is any one so simple as to believe in the electioneering lies with which the country will soon be flooded, he will soon be undeceived. The next Liberal Government will do what the last Liberal Government did—copy the Tories who were in office before. Neither of the great gangs of political impostors are worth a single vote or a single cheer. Nor is it by forming a "Labour Party" headed by gentlemen who are only humble imitators of these great professors of political fraud and dodgery, that the workman will improve his position; but by making a clean sweep of all political humbugs and tricksters. The only reform of the present rotten system of wholesale fraud and robbery is its complete destruction. The people must free themselves from the tyranny of landlord and capitalist, even if they have to wring the necks of these noxious vermin in the process, and the best reformer for the House of Commons would be a modern Guy Fawkes.

Here are two paragraphs from last Sunday's Dispatch, with the "common"—far too common—headline, "Sad Case of Starvation." Elizabeth Bryant, a widow, aged sixty-three, lately living at 29 Ben-Jonson Road, Mile-end, has died of hunger in a Christian land, and the inquest took place last Saturday. Henry Bryant, her son, who gave evidence, said his father died in the workhouse infirmary in February, 1889. His mother had been ill for a long time, and quite unable to get out lately. For nearly twelve months the deceased had lived on tea and dry toast. She had applied to the parish for out-door relief, which they had refused, but offered her the "house." Henry Bryant also applied, but without result. The poor old woman then ill in bed made shirts, but could not earn more than 4d. a-day. The son had been paralysed for five years, and had been unable to get work. The landlady of the house said the son used to go out looking for work every day. A juryman asked if it was true that the woman was refused out-door relief, and the coroner replied: "Yes, I am afraid it is. There seems a great objection to giving out-door relief." The doctor stated that "the cause of death was syncope from want of food," and the jury returned a verdict of death from starvation. They also said the son was not to blame, though some thought the parish authorities were. Another victim of society. Elizabeth Bryant may sleep peacefully, undisturbed by the pangs of hunger, in "a pauper's grave."

And now comes the next paragraph—Sale of Old Masters: Extraordinary Prices." In the afternoon of last Saturday, just after the inquest was held, they were selling pictures at Christie's, in King Street, St. James's. Here are the "extraordinary prices" given for these old masters, "late the property of the 12th Duke of Somerset": "Lord A. Hamilton," in blue silk Vandyck dress, in an oval, by T. Gainsborough, R.A., 4,200 gs. (Agnew). This was put up at 1,000 gs., and at the bid of 4,000 gs. the auctioneer, amid laughter, observed that it was like giving it away at that price. "Alexander, Duke of Hamilton," in black Vandyck dress, in an oval, by the same master, 1,500 gs. (Agnew); "A Lady with Powdered Hair," by J. Hoppner, R.A., 1,500 gs. (Agnew); "The Fairy Farm," a chef-d'œuvre of the rare master, Paul Potter (19½ in. by 24½ in.), signed, and dated 1646, 5,800 gs. (Agnew).

Think a moment of these scenes. They should teach you more than pages of Socialist articles. On the one hand, the poor, starved, paralysed workman, telling his sad story before the coroner; and on the other side, an auction-room, crowded with rich idlers and their parasites, ringing with riotous laughter at the "wit" of the auctioneer. The poor woman who died was a hard-working woman. Even when ill, when actually dying of hunger, she still, though feeble and helpless, tried to make shirts, and "could not earn more than 4d. a-day." Perhaps among the gang of idlers at Christie's was the very sweater who batted upon her starvation. The West feasts luxuriously upon the plunder wrung from the starving East. Enormous fortunes are made out of the misery, the degradation and starvation of people like this poor woman and her son. How much longer will the workers bear it so patiently? The laughter of the thievish idlers sounds devilish, as we hear the moan of those who die of hunger to supply these "gentlemen" with the pleasures and luxury they enjoy, including old masters worth thousands of guineas.

SCENES FROM THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

V.

THE TRIUMPH OF THE PEOPLE.

THE morning of October the 6th is dull and gloomy, the rain still falling in drizzling showers as the people wander in straggling crowds around the chateau, wondering enviously at the magnificence which surrounds them. Some of them find a gate open, and curiously enter the outer court of the chateau. Here they catch sight of a Body-guard at one of the windows, and some mutual compliments are interchanged, till the Body-guard losing his temper fires and wounds one of them. The crowd enraged rush upon the gates of the inner court, and are fired upon by other Body-guards. A Parisian National Guard, the son of a saddler, falls slain upon the pavement. With a yell of fury the people throw themselves upon the gates, which give way. They burst into the inner, or marble court, and rush up the grand staircase into the palace. Resistance is vain against this torrent of furious men and women. Two Body-guards, who endeavour to resist, are struck down and massacred by a hundred pikes; the others fly panic-stricken towards the Queen's apartments, who, terrified by the tumult and half-dressed, runs for refuge to the King. But many of the Body-guards have also fled here, followed by the people, who are now thundering with axes and hammers against the door of the Ceil-de-Bœuf, a large hall where the Court was held, and which stood between the crowd and the King's apartments. Here a frightened crowd of courtiers and Body-guards have gathered, and they are heaping the furniture of the hall against the door, which already threatens to give way.

But just as the tumult is at its height, and the door seems yielding beneath the storm of blows which falls upon it, the tumult dies away and the steady tramp of military men is heard advancing. It is the French Guards, who have been stationed in the guard-rooms of the palace by Lafayette on the preceding night, and who have at once marched to the rescue of the Court. The palace is quickly cleared by these stout soldiers, who drive the crowd from its corridors into the courts outside. In the marble court they rescue a Body-guard from the hands of the frenzied crowd, who had dragged him down to kill him beside the body of the murdered National Guard. There lie the headless corpses of two Body-guards, struck down when the people entered the palace; their heads are now borne aloft on pikes among the multitude.

The marble court is now filled by a tumultuous sea of men and women roaring and surging against the stone walls of the chateau. The King appears upon the balcony with Lafayette, and is greeted with loud cheers and cries of "Live the King!" "Live the Nation!" and also "The King to Paris!" Voices then are heard calling for the Queen. She shrinks back for a time, for she knows how great is the unpopularity she has brought upon herself by her hatred of the people and her continual intrigues against them. But the cries are becoming more pressing, and Lafayette advising her to comply and offering to accompany her, she steps up the balcony with him. Arriving there he kneels down and kisses her hand, which action is greeted by a burst of applause from the crowd. The people, who still foolishly believed in Lafayette, thought that by this action he pledged himself for the Queen's future good faith towards them. But Lafayette really had very little more love for the people than the Queen—though he had cunning enough to conceal his real feelings—so any pledges on his part for her good behaviour were of very little value. It had, however, the effect that was intended, and rendered her journey from Versailles to Paris perfectly safe.

Now it only remained for the Body-guards to go through the same mockery, and to give a lying adhesion to the popular cause. In their heart of hearts these bitter Royalists would willingly exterminate the whole of the "vile rabble" who crowd the courts of the chateau; but it would not be politic just now to give utterance to their real sentiments. So Lafayette goes through the farce of presenting their captain, decorated with a tri-colour cockade, to the multitude; while at the same time the captain takes the National oath, and declares that he will be faithful to the King, the Nation, and the Constitution, intending all the time to break his word at the first opportunity. The rest of the Body-guards go through the same hypocritical farce under the able directorship of Lafayette. The simple-hearted people, thinking as they always do "that men are honest that but seem to be so," receives all this humbug with loud applause. But the people have not forgotten why the women came to Versailles, amid shouts of "Live the King!" and the cries grow louder and louder of "The King to Paris!" At last the King comes and announces that he will go with his wife and children. The popular host is overwhelming, it is impossible to hold back any longer. The King's decision is received with a hurricane of applause; muskets and artillery are discharged wildly in the air, and the people think that the reign of happiness has really arrived.

On receiving the news that the King has decided to go, the National Assembly decrees that it is inseparable from his Majesty, and will follow him to Paris. A hundred members are appointed as a deputation to accompany him on his journey. At one o'clock the King and his family enter their carriage and the procession starts, but they do not arrive at Paris till nine in the evening, the procession being so large and moving so slowly.

But now let us glance at Paris, which has passed a night of alarm; the streets illuminated, filled with patrols, and traversed by deputations from the districts; Louison Chabray, the half-hanged spokeswoman, arrives there at two o'clock in the morning; at four, Maillard comes bearing the decrees sanctioned by the King and the National Assembly; at eight o'clock a letter arrives from Lafayette. This is followed by a placard from the Hôtel de Ville, announcing that all is going well, and several hours afterwards a second placard announces the coming of the King to Paris. But the first arrival is that of a band of men bearing on pikes the heads of the two Body-guards. The authorities, however, take care that the Parisians shall not be alarmed by these unexpected phenomena. The band is dispersed, and its trophies seized at the gates of the city.

But now the curious Parisians throng the roads to meet the royal procession, a procession truly royal since it celebrates one of the first triumphs of the common people. Through the eyes of those who gazed upon it that day we still see this rude march of the triumphant populace. The advance guard is in sight; it is composed of troops and artillery, mingled with men and women mounted on carts, hackney coaches, and cannon; other women tramp joyously along covered from head to foot in tri-colour ribbon; mingled with these are women with green poplar branches; loaves too are borne triumphantly on bayonets. Then come fifty or sixty carts of grain taken from the stores at Versailles. Behind is the royal carriage, accompanied by mounted Nationals. This is followed by carriages containing a deputation from the Municipality and a hundred members from the Assembly. In the rear of these are National Guards, fusiliers, grenadiers, and cannon mingled in wild confusion with women, Body-guards, soldiers of the Flanders regiment, and the hundred Swiss, who march in good order. The march is closed with grain carts. As to the people, men and women sweep gaily from one part of the procession to the other; they are everywhere. The whole mass is filled with mad gaiety; the air rings with song. "Courage, friends!" sing the women, as they dance covered with tri-colour ribbon around the royal carriage; "we shall not want bread any more, we are bringing you the baker, the baker's wife, and the baker's boy!" As they sing they point to the King, Queen, and the Dauphin, who are nothing more to them than providers of bread for the people. Perhaps they thought that as his most gracious Majesty's father, Louis XV., had made a considerable amount of money by buying up corn and holding it back from the market in time of famine, his son might undo the evil by feeding the starving poor. But though kings and monopolists can grind a people down to the lowest depths of hunger and desperation, they seem powerless to relieve the misery they have caused.

Thus the people marched into Paris that dark wet October evening, bringing the King in triumph with them, and hurling into hopeless ruin the plots of the conspirators of Versailles. His Majesty may now repose in the Tuileries, where conspirators may plot, but they will be well watched. Moderate persons are greatly shocked, some so much so that their health is injured; they want to retire from the National Assembly for change of air. The Constitutional party, which wished to imitate the English Constitution, is very eager to get away with its leaders, President Mounier, Lally, Tollendal, and others. The lovers of royal despotism fled on the fall of the Bastille; the Moderates follow them in their emigration; nobles, clergy, and deputies pour in thousands across the frontier. They will linger there and plot and plot till the term "emigrant" becomes hateful in France. In this case it is the right people who are going, and though they fly they cannot take their property with them. So France bears their flight with tolerable composure.

Thus the women of Paris conquered and overthrew the traitors who plotted their murder by famine and sword. It would be well if the women of all nations had the same spirit and courage.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Miners.

The miners have turned out in splendid force at their annual demonstrations this year—notably at Barnsley and Southport, where 40,000 men and 70,000 men demonstrated. The speeches at these demonstrations were of a sturdy character. Mr. Pickard, M.P., in speaking on the miners' Eight Hours Bill at Barnsley, said that—"If the Bill was voted out by a strong majority, his hearers would know what course would be pursued in January next. They would not have to wait till the 1st of May. Their course was plain; whether they laid the pits idle and stagnated trade or not, all tools would be lifted on the 1st of January unless they got the eight hours system legalised by Act of Parliament—(loud cheers). There were pamphlets going round London now asking what would be the price of coal next winter—(laughter). If the miners of the country 'played' for some time, he did not know what the price of coal in London would be, but he imagined the railway and shipping companies would find themselves crippled for want of fuel."

We can fancy that an ordinary middle-class politician must have ejaculated, on reading this speech, in horror-stricken tones, "Why, this is quite unconstitutional!" Well, my respectable middle-class friend, you told them "to get it by their own action," and if they take your advice you surely cannot complain. Of course it is quite possible, if there is no coal and no work in London next January, there may possibly be "dangerous mobs," who will make short work of all respectable middle-class people; but you are not the first man whose own medicine has disagreed with him. Talking of "dangerous mobs," according to the Labour Tribune, the "respectable people" of Southport were very much alarmed at the invasion of the town by the miners. Says that paper: "A great many people had an idea that colliers are a kind of wild species of humanity, that, if let loose in a town like Southport, would destroy all their trees and flowers, fight and almost kill each other, and that the inhabitants would be in danger of their lives all the time the colliers were in the town. A good many of these old fogies left the town on Friday." Despite this alarm, however, nothing serious occurred. We are glad these people fear the miners. After all, there is more hope for the workers in these huge processions of stalwart marching men than all the palaver of parliamentary quacks and humbugs. The miners will get the eight hour day because they are prepared to take it. When will other workers learn that they have also the same power to force the middle classes into compliance with their demands? They have only to cease working in every factory and workshop, on land, railways, and in the mines, to bring their masters to their knees and force them to surrender.

Spies at Postmen's Meetings.

The atmosphere was sultry for spies at the postmen's meeting on Sunday. One of these people received a severe thrashing with thick sticks, and would have been chucked into the Serpentine if it had not been for the interference of the police, who have a natural sympathy with this kind of vermin. Two other spies were also thrashed without mercy. Through the exertions of these spies, these mean cowards, who to carry favour with the post-office tyrants go sneaking about at the postmen's meetings to carry tales to Mr. Raikes and other officials, thirty more men have been reported to the Postmaster-General for attending a meeting in Finsbury Park. It is, therefore, clearly time that this spy business was stopped. So the postmen think; and we hope in future when they get hold of a spy that they will render him incapable of spying for several weeks afterwards. We want to know what the union is going to do about these men who have been "reported." Do the officers of the Postmen's Union mean to allow them to be disgraced and suspended without endeavouring to save them? We suppose they will have some more questions asked about it in Parliament. No doubt. But is it not time something else was done? The questions in Parliament have not "reinstated" those poor fellows who have been "suspended," and it is quite certain they will do as little for the thirty men who are now called upon to "explain their conduct." But, perhaps, if the Postmaster-General knew that if these thirty men were "punished" all the postmen in London would turn out on strike, he might possibly leave them alone. How long do the officers of the Postmen's Union think their body will hold together if that old tyrant Raikes is to disgrace and suspend men at his pleasure? Surely a union ought to protect its members against this odious tyranny, or it cannot be worth much!

The Police.

There is little to report about the police this week. Their petition asking that their delegates might be allowed to meet at Bow Street has been contemptuously rejected by the Chief Commissioner, and as might have been expected the cowardly curs bear this rebuff with a tame and slavish submission. Bullies are always cowards.

International Labour League and Federation.

The above organisation announces that a Special Delegate Meeting will be held on Saturday, July 12th, at 4 p.m., at Christ Church Hall, Hanbury Street, Spitalfields, E. All organisations interested in the spreading of international combination are hereby invited to affiliate with this organisation, by sending duly-instructed delegates to attend this meeting. The Executive Committee send us also the following statement: "A special delegate meeting, with the same object, which was convened by the International Labour League and Federation, took place on June 7th, at the East Finsbury Radical Club, City Road. Thirty-five organisations were represented by sixty delegates from all parts of London; but as many of the delegates declared they had no definite instructions, and as another delegate meeting with a similar purpose was to be held on June 22nd, called by the Central Committee for a Legal Eight Hours' Day, it was proposed to delay any decision for a few weeks, so that the different organisations interested in the matter might have time to consider the position to be taken by them. The delegate meeting of the Central Committee has been held, and it was decided to found a new political labour party, while the International Labour League and Federation is to be a purely social-economical organisation, whose objects are the national and international emancipation of labour. Four labour electoral parties being already in existence, there seems to be no need for a new fifth one. On the other hand, a strong social-economical organisation, which has for its object the fighting out the struggle between Labour and Capital by all practicable means, is a sure and sound basis for uniting all the different sections of advanced labour."

All communications may be sent to the honorary secretaries—Ferdinand Gilles, 26 Robert Street, Hampstead Road, N.W.; F. Verhoeven, 9 Nelson Street, Hackney Road, N.E.

It appears that the meeting of the "Central Committee"—i.e., the Aveling "Labour Party"—held at Vauxhall on June 22nd, was mainly composed of Radical clubs and the Gas-stokers' Union, with a few independent organisations. As it is well known that the Radical clubs and the gas-workers are entirely under the influence of the Aveling "Labour Party," who succeeded in carrying their political resolution concerning a legal eight hour day. There were seventy delegates present, and yet the Aveling "Labour Party" majority (!) only consisted of 37 delegates against the 12 delegates who voted against their electioneering humbug. Most of the independent delegates who were present abstained from voting, as they had no instructions.

We hope all workmen's organisations will attend the delegate meeting of the International Labour League and Federation, which is not under the control of middle-class political wirepullers, but is entirely composed of working men.

Another Trade Union Victory.

We are glad to hear that the National Press Agency will, after July 1st, be conducted "strictly in accordance with the rules and customs of the trade, none but trade-unionists being employed." This is an important victory for the London Society of Compositors, as the chapel consists of upwards of a hundred journeymen. It is suggested that the proprietors of the Times, the Globe, and the People might copy this excellent example. It is worth remembering that these respectable Tory publications are printed at rat houses, noted for sweating their men, the Globe and the People being especially remarkable for the low wages paid. It is only what might be expected from the advocates of despotism and shameless tyranny. Workmen do not read the Globe and the Times, so anything I may say here will not affect their circulation; but every workman who reads this, ought to do his best to get his comrades to boycott that miserable rag the People. Shun it as if rat labour had infected it with poison.

Lock-out of Gas-workers at Leeds.

The gas-workers are locked-out at Leeds. On Tuesday 200 police escorted some blacklegs into the works; but they had such a warm reception with sticks, stones, and bottles, that when they were inside they doubted whether their lives would be safe, and so came out again. A telegram just arrived says that there are 2,000 police and soldiers, horse and foot, in the town, and that the place is in darkness. N.

PARLIAMENT AND THE PEOPLE.—We have heard it asked, Why Parliament throws no light on this question of the Working Classes, and the condition and disposition they are in? Truly, to a remote observer of Parliamentary procedure it seems surprising, especially in late Reformed times, to see what space this question occupies in the Debates of the Nation. Can any other business whatsoever be so pressing on legislators? A Reformed Parliament, one would think, should enquire into popular discontents before they get the length of pikes and torches.—Carlyle: 'Chartism.'

The doctrine of hell is now only for the poor, the ragged, the ignorant. Well-dressed people won't have it. Nobody goes to hell in a carriage—they foot it. Hell is for strangers and tramps. No soul leaves a brown-stone front for hell—they start from the tenements, from jails and reformatories. In other words, hell is for the poor. It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a poor man to get into heaven, or for a rich man to get into hell. The ministers stand by their supporters. Their salaries are paid by the well-to-do, and they can hardly afford to send the subscribers to hell.—Ingersoll.

NOTICE.

In Next Week's Issue there will be a Special Article by Frank Kitz, entitled,

"THE GREAT LAND THIEVES."

Branches and Newsagents are asked to send in their orders early.

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

OFFICES: 24, GREAT QUEEN ST., LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

The Offices of the Socialist League will be open for the sale of Commonweal and all other Socialist publications from 8.30 a.m. to 9 p.m. every day except Sunday. The Secretary will be in attendance from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m. daily.

London Members' Meeting.—The next monthly meeting of members will be held on Friday, July 11th, at 8.30 p.m., at the Hall of the Hammersmith Branch, Kelmscott House, Upper Mall, Hammersmith, W. Special meeting; important business. All members interested in the propaganda are asked to attend.

Correction.—The Committee composed of delegates of the S.L. and Group Autonomie, appointed at the request of the Group Autonomie to enquire into the allegation made against J. Peukert in the 'Weal, have at their last sitting come to the conclusion that there is no proof to hand to justify the allegations made, and the delegates of the S.L. therefore drew up and signed the following resolution, "Seeing that there was no proof to hand actually incriminating J. Peukert as a police spy, we express regret that a statement to that effect ever appeared in the 'Weal."—THE COMMITTEE.

Notice.—The Branches and Allied Societies willing to share in the convocation of the Conference of August 3rd, are requested to answer the convening circulars at once.

Branch Subscriptions Paid.—1890:—Leicester and North Kensington, to end of April. Glasgow, Oxford, Hammersmith, North London, East London, 'Commonweal' Branch, Manchester, and Norwich, to end of May. Streatham, to end of December. (Branch Secretaries will please send with remittances for Capitations the number of their membership.)

NEW PREMISES FUND.

Collected at Council meeting, June 23rd, 3s. 4d.; June 30th, 7s. 9d.

"COMMONWEAL" GUARANTEE FUND.

The following further sums have been received towards this fund:—A. H., (Norwich), 5s.; P. Webb, 1s.; Andrews, 6d.; H. R., 2s.; Collection at Berner Street, 2s. 2d.; S., 6d.; D. Nicoll, 1s.; 'Commonweal' Branch, 8s. 4½d.; B. W., 1s.; Hammersmith Branch, 4s.; and Glasgow Branch, 5s.

REPORTS.

EAST LONDON.—A splendid meeting was held at Union Street, addressed by comrades Leggatt and Mrs. Lahr; 27 Commonweal sold, and 2s. 11½d. collected for propaganda. At Hoxton Church on Sunday morning a good meeting was held, when Brookes and Miss Lupton spoke to a good audience, assisted by comrade Moore from Norwich, who has migrated to London, owing to the strike in the shoe trade; fair sale of Commonweal. At Victoria Park in the afternoon, despite the strains of two brass bands, we got together a splendid audience by means of the revolutionary songs sang by Mrs. Morgan. The people were then addressed by Miss Lupton, Mrs. Lahr, Davis, Brookes, and Leggatt. Our Commonweals and *Freedom*s sold out; 2s. 6d. collected for "Anarchist Labour Leaf."

NORTH LONDON.—Our meeting at Regent's Park was a success; Cantwell, Nicoll, Mrs. Schack, and Edwards spoke; 45 Commonweal, 12 'Chicago Speeches' and 14 other pamphlets sold; 4s. 11d. collected. In Hyde Park we held a meeting Sunday afternoon, at which Cantwell and Parker were the speakers, and with the help of the comrades present we sang "Hark the Battle Cry" and the "Hymn of the Proletariat;" both songs well received by audience.

ABERDEEN.—On Saturday afternoon the Branch held its first annual picnic at Muchalls (never mind trying to pronounce it!), a village twelve miles south from Aberdeen, and famous for its rock scenery, botanical specimens, and exorbitant hotel charges. Going out in the train we roused the neighbourhood by the singing of Glasier's "Marching on to Liberty," Nicoll's "Marseillaise," "No Master," and a host of others. The day turned out wet; but we secured a barn, and, having stowed away a string-band of five in an exalted place, we "chased the glowing hours with flying feet." Solos and concerted songs were again sung; outside we had football and a ladies' race in spite of the wet; I should be afraid to say how much tea and other liquors was drunk; and while waiting for the train at the station amid a large crowd, we showed them that the Salvation Army does not possess a monopoly of singing power. Other work well sustained during past fortnight.—L.

BRAINTREE.—Last Saturday Fuller and Blundell (London) addressed good meeting in Market Place; 'Weal' went well, and a good many leaflets distributed. Sunday morning we broke new ground at Halstead, a village some six or seven miles from Braintree. Things look very encouraging here, and if well worked we should soon have very strong branch. Fuller opened meeting, and introduced London comrade, who spoke to them for an hour and a quarter; literature and leaflets were much asked for. Left here for Braintree Market Place, and held another rattling meeting in the afternoon. Our comrade from London here spoke at some length on the "Shams and Frauds of Commercialism," to the evident satisfaction of the Braintree workers, who showed their appreciation by contributing to the box and buying 'Weals and pamphlets. 52 'Weals sold and 5s. 4d. collected.—F.

GLASGOW.—On Friday evening we held our first meeting at Bridgton Cross, the centre of one of the most populous factory districts in the city. Comrades of the S.D.F. and Christian Socialists acted jointly with us. There was a good audience of working people, who listened most attentively to our speakers—McNaughton (S.D.F.), Glasier, Joe and Tim Burgoyne. At the close quite a number of questions were put, and it was evident from some of them that we will be kept lively at this station with opposition from Tories and their allies. On Sunday evening, Joe Burgoyne and Glasier spoke at Paisley Road Toll.

LEEDS.—On Saturday evening last, Sollit and Samuels addressed a good though rather noisy meeting on Woodhouse Moor. On Sunday morning, good meeting on Hunslet Moor; Maguire and Samuels spoke. In the Market, in the afternoon, a mass meeting was held to call attention to the gas-workers' position regarding the strike; about six thousand present; Thorne, of London, and several of the Leeds Socialists spoke; 11s. 6d. worth of S.L. literature was sold. In the evening, at the Vicars Croft, another good meeting was held; speakers Sweeney, Maguire, Samuels, Roper; Commonweal and Freedom sold out, and 3s. 3d. collected. The quarterly business meeting was held afterwards in the club, when we arranged for a more active propaganda and made several new members.—H. S.

EDINBURGH—SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—We held a very successful meeting on the Meadows on Sunday; comrades Davidson, Smith, and Hamilton spoke.—W. D. T.

LIVERPOOL SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—1 Stanley Street, Dale Street.—Meets every Tuesday at 8 p.m.

ROCHDALE SOCIALISTS.—Meetings held every evening at 28 Blackwater Street, Rochdale.

NOTTINGHAM SOCIALIST CLUB.—Woodland Place, Upper Parliament Street. Open-air meetings held every Sunday—Sneinton Market at 11, and Great Market Place at 7.

THE SATIRES OF CYNICUS.

"SINE IRA ET STUDIO."

CYNICUS asks no favour, is no partisan, independent and unbiassed he looks with impartial eye on the follies and corruptions of his time. Unknown and unaided, but with firm purpose, he launches his satires on a world of dissimulation and deceit, where alas—

Virtue's at a discount,
Truth is under par,
Honesty's a scarcity
Wealth is better far.

Knavery's commendable,
Cheating is no sin;
He is the true philanthropist
Who takes the stranger in.

But where, perchance, some honest kindly heart,
While smiling at his fancies, still may say—
"He acts no snarling, mean, or churlish part
Who fain would laugh the follies of the world away."

TO SUCH HE DEDICATES HIS BOOK.

To Socialists who wish to see the hypocrisy of modern society pictorially lampooned, we recommend Cynicus.

NOTICE.

Next Week we begin our Series of Articles on the Growth of Landlord and Capitalist Exploitation in a continued article by WILLIAM MORRIS, entitled, "THE DEVELOPMENT OF MODERN SOCIETY."

Branches and Newsagents are asked to send in their orders early, as we expect a large demand for this Number.

A REVOLUTIONARY POLICY.

WE are now upon the verge of a fresh economic crisis. The middle classes by their greedy gambling, will in a few months bring misery and starvation upon thousands of the workers. They will use this depression to crush the newly-formed trade unions, and force wages down to a starvation level. From the North we already hear that the Cleveland miners have had their wages reduced by 10 per cent., and everywhere in the iron trade the masters are threatening similar reductions. The wave of prosperity is passing, and it will soon be impossible for the workers by their unions to force concessions from the capitalists. With closed factories and the streets filled with unemployed, the reaction will be upon us. Down will come wages, and the newly-formed unions will have a desperate fight for their very existence. Already the gas-stokers are finding this out at Leeds and Beckton.

But though the men will be forced upon the defensive as regards wages, and will even be beaten—for with plenty of goods in stock the capitalist can rub his hands and laugh at strikes, which will only increase the price of his wares,—yet, on the other hand, the cry for an Eight Hour's Day will grow louder among the workmen, who are now gradually getting the idea that it alone can save them from being crushed to the ground. On the other hand the Social Democrats will be busy recommending Parliamentary action as the only means of obtaining their pet palliative. What, then, is our duty as a body of Revolutionary Socialists who do not believe in Parliamentary humbug, nor in those who advocate this legislative quackery? It is our duty first to preach our principles without fear or flinching. True, but we must do something more; theories are excellent, but we must show that we are willing to carry these theories into practice directly the people are ready to do and dare. Already we have repeatedly pointed out in the Commonweal that it is hopeless to expect even an Eight Hour Bill from the present Parliament, and it will be still more hopeless in the next, when the Great Liberal Party will rule the roast, the leaders of which, from Gladstone down to T. P. O'Connor, are strongly opposed to any "legislative interference with the hours of labour." There will, therefore, be only one way of obtaining the Eight Hour's Day, a GENERAL STRIKE in every trade and industry, a Strike which, to be thoroughly effective, must not be confined to any town or country, but must be International. Already the miners on the Continent have adopted the idea of an International Strike of Miners. We must preach the General Strike of all European Workmen consistently and without ceasing, and depend upon it our preaching will not be without its effect.

But there is another phase of Revolutionary policy which must not be neglected. We have not forgotten our friend the industrial capitalist. We must also remember that other thief—the "owner" of land and houses,—the landlord. The best weapon against this gentleman, especially in London, is a NO RENT MANIFESTO. We have spoken again and again of the shameful way in which the workers are rack-rented in the filthy slum dens of London. In our immediate neighbourhood they are paying 5s., 6s., 7s., and 8s. for a single room; while the "aristocrat" of labour, who wants two rooms, is forced to pay 9s. 6d., 10s. 6d., and even 11s. for the luxury! Thus, a third of the worker's wages in Central London goes to the rent thief! We, as Revolutionary Socialists, would make a quick end of this sort of thing by paying "No Rent" at all to these rascally robbers! But it may take some time to educate the workers up to our ideal; but it would not take long in a time of trade depression, with suffering and starvation in their midst, to get them to go in for a movement for, say, a 50 per cent. reduction. Even then the workmen would be paying more than the middle-class, who, according to the Rev. Price Hugh, would reckon themselves on the brink of ruin if they paid more than 10 per cent. of their income in rent, while at the present time the workman is paying 25 and 30 per cent. of his income. Still, this would not be an end to the business, for once started the workers would not stop till they had made an end of "rent" altogether.

With a little courage and daring it might be possible to carry this programme out in a very little time. It has been suggested to us by a good comrade that half-a-dozen enthusiastic Socialists, who want to do some "practical work," might take a house in the centre of the slums, and once in there, set the bailiff and the landlord at defiance. They could placard the house with bills advising the people to pay "No Rent," while their comrades flooded the slums with anti-landlord literature. If the house was well barricaded, they might hold "law and order" at bay for weeks, and by that time "No Rent" would be paid by the whole neighbourhood.

But when the slum-dwellers are universally refusing to pay rent, and general strikes are in progress in most industrial centres, the great final step in the revolutionary Socialist movement must be taken. The people must seize upon the factories, and the warehouses with their stored-up wealth, and force the landlord and capitalist to rapidly depart through the back doors of their mansions, their departure being accelerated by kicks from behind. The slum-dwellers will then find clean and comfortable lodgings in these luxurious abodes. The question of the housing of the poor would then be settled. There is luxurious accommodation for all the poor in London in these palaces, and "when the revolution comes" we will take care that the poor are properly housed.

This problem at least will receive a prompt solution on the arrival of the Social Revolution. This is what we mean when we tell the people that "they must do it themselves." A general strike, and the refusal to pay rent to thieving landlords, will be the first step, as the seizure of the land, the means of production, and the wealth produced by the labour of the people, will be the last in the Social Revolution.

These are the ideas which we Revolutionary Socialists must spread. They are simple and practicable; and if we preach them with vigour and determination—and above all, if we show that we have the courage to carry them out—they will soon get a firm hold upon the masses. The Social Revolution will not then be a "dream" or a "theory," but a "hard fact"—a very "hard fact" to our friends the capitalist and landlord, who will find that it is no longer possible to lead an idle and luxurious existence at the expense of other people.

D. J. NICOLL.

THE GREAT LAND THIEVES.

LETTER I.—TO PRIVATE SOLDIERS.

"WHY prosecute the man or woman
Who steals the goose from off the common,
But leaves the greater felon loose
Who steals the common from the goose?"

"THE earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof!" This declaration is to be found in Holy Writ, and also over that resort of thieves the Stock Exchange. If the word Land were joined to lord's, it would adequately express the condition of things in England to-day. Frequently, when a weary and footsore tramp upon the high road, I have looked wistfully through the gates of some fair demesne, and viewed the broad-curved carriage-sweep, the cool undulating park, and the stately mansion or hall, and having been warned away by snarl of hound or flunkey, I have re-commenced my trudge to the town, and there have seen the swarming slums, the noise and unrest of struggling crowds herded in the overcrowded streets and houses.

The ill-defined feeling of injustice and wrong engendered by personal suffering and the sight of wide contrasts, has since taken shape in determined attacks upon the monopolists, who seize upon the fairest portions of the earth and say to the rest of mankind, "You are trespassers!" But I still wonder at the spectacle of a people, landless and divorced from the soil, suffering all the horrors of social degradation, and yet clinging to and believing in the shibboleths of home, country, patriotism, etc., etc.

Wonder becomes mingled with contempt when the same people protest their abhorrence of violence, and yet are ever at war with some tribe or race; and who, moreover, take from the barbarian his native wilds, and yet are too cowardly to wrest their own soil from the land monopolists.

More astonishing still is the attitude of the working-women of England, who shrink shudderingly from the possibility of civil conflict involving those near and dear to them in bloodshed and loss of life, yet cheerfully and uncomplainingly render up as tribute husbands, sons, and lovers to the Moloch of False Patriotism—the God of Commercial War.

In Afghanistan, in Zululand, in the Soudan, whithersoever, in short, their master's lust for extended Empire directs them, the flower of the working-class redden the soil with their blood and offer up their lives to increase capitalistic domination, deluding themselves that they are fighting for their Queen and country. They reap the reward of patriotism as understood to-day. Search the casual wards and common lodging-houses, and find in them men who have fought and bled for what they mistakenly term their country.

It is but a few short years ago that the reward of patriotism took the form of the cat-o'-nine-tails, and the plebeian serfs in the army and navy were strung up and flogged by the orders of scoundrels of "family." Some of these uniformed gentry are now clamouring for the re-instatement of the lash to excoriate the back of the common soldier.

And what, it may be asked, has all this to do with the Land Question? Simply that it is the business of Socialists to undermine the very bases of modern Society, and as it is hoped that this article may get into the hands of the soldiery, we desire to destroy the sentiment of false patriotism which makes them the abject tools of the propertied classes. We would tear away the web of lies woven by journalists and scribes anent the glories of war, and show them Shylock waiting with knife and scale for the recovery of his usurious bond upon the completion of the soldier's work of carnage in Egypt and elsewhere.

Let the soldier know that he is only the armed servant of the money rings, and of the market riggers and forestallers of the Bourses and Exchanges of the world, and that they having used him to bind the shackles of their hideous civilisation upon native races, are equally ready to hurl him upon unarmed crowds of his own countrymen, and if need be compel him to slaughter his own kin, should they protest against the system whereby they are robbed of the results of their labour. Is this so, soldier? and if so, Are you a patriot, or a hired butcher?

In the course of these letters I shall address myself to the Scotch, Welsh, Irish, and English elements which go to make up the murder machine—the Army. The intrepid Scotsmen who have left glen and mountain to fight the battles of the Empire, have been rewarded by the destruction of their homesteads and the forcible dispersal of their kindred. Subjoined is a record of the dastardly work of eviction as carried out on the Sutherland and other Highland estates:

"Deeds have been done of a character so base and heartless on these unoffending Highlanders that it almost exceeds belief; and that as a consequence of the clearances, the land under tillage in Scotland decreased, between 1831 and 1855, by no less than one million five hundred and thirteen thousand three hundred and eighty-two acres."

"At a later period the evictions were carried out with much greater severity; the lots given to the people were often patches of moor and bog quite unfit for cultivation, the houses were often burned down, crops and furniture destroyed, and general misery spread among the people."

"In former removals the tenants had been allowed to carry away the timber of their old dwellings to erect houses on their new allotments, but now a more summary mode was adopted—by setting fire to them. The able-bodied men were by this time away after their cattle or otherwise engaged at a distance, so that the immediate sufferers by the general house-burning that now commenced were the aged and infirm, the women and children. . . . The devastators proceeded with the greatest celerity, demolishing all before them, and when they had overthrown all the houses in a large tract of country, they set fire to the wreck. Timber, furniture, and every other article that could not be instantly removed was consumed by fire or otherwise utterly destroyed. The proceedings were carried on with the greatest rapidity and the most reckless cruelty. The cries of the victims, the confusion, the despair and horror painted on the countenances of the one party, and the exulting ferocity of the other, beggar all description. . . . Many deaths ensued from alarm, from fatigue, and cold, the people having been instantly deprived of shelter, and left to the mercies of the elements. Some old men took to the woods and to the rocks, wandering about in a state approaching to, or of absolute insanity; and several of them in this situation lived only a few days. Pregnant women were taken in premature labour, and several children did not long survive their sufferings."

"The consternation and confusion were extreme; little or no time was given for the removal of persons or property; the people striving to remove the sick and the helpless before the fire should reach them, and struggling to save the most valuable of their effects. The cries of the women and children, the roaring of the affrighted cattle, hunted at the same time by the yelling dogs of the shepherds amid the smoke and fire, altogether presented a scene that completely baffles description—it required to be seen to be believed. A dense cloud of smoke enveloped the whole country by day, and even extended far out to sea; at night an awfully grand, but terrific, scene presented itself—all the houses in an extensive district in flames at once. I myself ascended a height about eleven o'clock in the evening, and counted 250 blazing houses, many of the owners of which were my relations, and all of whom I personally knew, but whose present condition—whether in or out of the flames—I could not tell. The conflagration lasted six days, till the whole of the dwellings were reduced to ashes or smoking ruins. During one of these days a boat actually lost her way in the dense smoke as she approached the shore, but at night was enabled to reach a landing place by the lurid light of the flames."—A. Wallace.

The wretched remnant were forced to emigrate to Canada, or crowded the narrow wynds and slums of Glasgow and other Scotch cities and towns, and thus "Much more than 2,000,000 acres have been depopulated and cleared of thousands of sheep to make room for deer forests: homes, farms, and food destroyed, that wealth may sport. There are now in Caithness	...	50,000	acres	} of Deer Forests.

Total	...	2,155,000	acres

According to the British Almanac for 1885, the total area of the four counties of Scotland which are Highland counties par excellence, and in which are situated the chief deer forests of the country, extends to 8,030,190 acres; the extent of land under cultivation being only 419,385 acres."—Financial Reform Almanack, 1886.

We are termed madmen, but we venture to say that it is supremely folly to offer up health, nay, life itself, to be an instrument of oppression at home and abroad in the interests of a gang of land and labour thieves, who sentence yourself and dependents to the workhouse, and would prosecute for trespass did you touch an inch of the soil of what you stupidly call your country, but which in reality is theirs.

Some day, and that not a distant one, the working-class will take to fighting for their country, and that day will be a cold one for the land thieves. See to it soldier, and stand by your kindred when the hour comes.

F. KITZ.

THE REVOLT AT BOW STREET.

WE live in lively times, but I doubt if London has ever seen more exciting events than those of last Monday. In consequence of events which we chronicle in our Labour Column, the press announced on Monday morning that the police intended to strike on Monday night unless their comrades who had been "suspended" were reinstated. When the night came an immense multitude collected in Bow Street. The people were wild with enthusiasm, cheering, shouting, and singing. I never heard the "Marseillaise" rendered with such vigour before. But soon a change came over the spirit of the scene. The mounted men were ordered out. They charged up and down, headed by a superintendent, who was evidently labouring under a fit of temporary insanity, during which he could do nothing but shout "Ride over them! Ride them down!" This brutality infuriated the people; they hooted the mounted men, calling them "blacklegs." The ruffianly police grew savage, and they charged on the pavement, trampling down men, boys, and women. Stones then began to fly, and the crowd, enraged in their turn, struck fiercely at the police with sticks and umbrellas. Missiles of all kinds were showered upon them, and it was evident that they were getting the worst of it, when suddenly there was a cry of "The Guards," and a captain's escort 30 strong came galloping down the street. They were cheered at first, but when the people saw that they had come to do the dirty work of the mounted men they were vigorously hooted. Meanwhile the foot police did nothing; they stood and quietly watched the scene, while from the windows of the station policemen waved their hands to the crowd.

Great as was the tumult outside, there was worse confusion within. The men had refused to turn out; some cowards who wanted to sell their brethren were seized and held back by main force. The Indian despot had summarily dismissed the men out of the force who had been suspended, and the police were greatly enraged. In the meantime stones were flying fast and furious outside, and a baker who threw some water on the crowd had his windows smashed, and the shop would have been sacked if the Guards had not galloped to the rescue. The swells in carriages coming from the opera had a very warm reception; carriage windows were shattered into fragments; and his "Royal Highness" Edward Guelph, who was at the opera, got away as quietly as he could. Rioting continued, despite the heavy rain, till nearly three o'clock in the morning. The last exciting incident was at midnight, when in a charge of mounted police upon the people one of them was dragged from his horse.

On Tuesday night the disturbances were not very serious, although the brutality of the police blacklegs was excessive. We hear an attempt was made to overturn a cab, probably to make a barricade. If Bow Street had been in Paris on Monday night, cabs, busses, and carts would have been overturned, and the quarter between Clare Market and Drury Lane, with its narrow streets, courts, and cul de sacs, would have been a fortress impregnable save to troops and artillery. But the London population has not learnt the art of barricade-making. Never mind; the Parisians were equally ignorant before 1789. N.

THE GUARDS MUTINY.

The 2nd battalion of Grenadier Guards have had too much "drilling" lately, and on Monday when ordered to "parade" by Colonel Maitland, a notorious tyrant, they refused to turn out, greeting their colonel with yells, hisses, and groans. When the non-commissioned officers tried to get the men out, they barricaded themselves in their barrack-rooms. The authorities are so alarmed that they have sent for "The Prince of Wales' Yorkshire Regiment" from Southampton to overawe the men. We think it is likely to have a very different effect.

SWEATERS!

THE waterproof workers employed by Messrs. David Moseley and Co., of Manchester, have recently been bestirring themselves to form a union. The manager of the firm, while passing through the works, saw a placard announcing a meeting for the union pasted up. He tore it down, and told the foreman to find out the man who put it up and sack him. The result was that a man named Michael McGee was discharged, although he had no hand in pasting up the placard. The manager further gave orders that any of his "hands" attending the announced meetings would be discharged. The Trades Council have taken the matter up, and meetings of the workers have been held and a union formed. The hubbub raised about the discharge of McGee, and the glaring tyranny of the proceeding, has compelled the firm to re-instate him. The local press in reporting the proceedings, have in deference to the firm, studiously avoided to mention their name.

THE following disgraceful practices are carried on at Ipswich by one of the largest stay factories in that county, and where about fourteen hundred persons are employed. The heads of the firm implicated, whose names are Messrs. Footmen, Pretty, and Nicholson, have long held high social positions, and bear in the town irreproachable Christian characters. How much this is deserved the disclosures I herewith make will show. At other factories here, and we have several, the employes are very badly paid. Experienced hands (young women of twenty) are unable mostly to realise more than 3s. or 4s. per week, and often less than that. They have to buy reels of cotton (illegally deducted from wages) at 25 per cent. dearer than they are bought elsewhere. For every broken needle they pay 1d., which is, according to the machine used, more or less a serious infliction upon their pitiful wage. The gross account for each, including fines, etc., is entered in the books as their nett takings, when it does not amount to two-thirds, or, as it sometimes happens, they owe more at the end of a week than what their so-called earnings can pay. When not wanted the workers have to sit inside the factory idle, and this very often lasts for days at a stretch, placed by command like bales of merchandise waiting for a purchaser. Could worse slavery exist anywhere? What a commentary upon the boasted "freedom of contract!" If they could earn anything at home or elsewhere just then they are not permitted to do so, except at the risk of notice to leave or a certain fine of 6d. for every day's absence, whether ill or not with no exception. Over five minutes late there is a 3d. fine, and for keeping away the fine is the same for every half-day. So great is the horror felt that as soon as they catch sight of the manager the poor girls feel sick and faint. We of the Labour Federation, among whom are many Socialists, are preparing to organise them into a strong union. In the meantime we think that publicity may possibly lead to some effective measures being adopted to stop this shameful tyranny.

TO CONTRIBUTORS.—Workmen could help us greatly by sending in accounts of capitalist tyranny and sweating in London and the provinces. We want the names of the sweaters. Those who write must send us their name and address, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee of good faith. We shall not fear to publish the truth.—Eds.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MORE POLICE TYRANNY.

DEAR COMRADES,—On Sunday week a few comrades of the Hammersmith and North Kensington branches went in brakes to Kingston-on-Thames, to speak to the shop-assistants and others on the advisability of organisation, and to expound the doctrines of Socialism. When all was arranged, we started from Hammersmith about 4 o'clock, arriving at Kingston at 6 o'clock. On finding our meeting at the Fairfield prohibited, we adjourned to the Market Place, where we had a large meeting. Speeches were made, and labour songs sung by a female comrade, literature being sold by myself and others.

Among our audience was a man who, I afterwards was informed, was Peter Gould, an exploiter of labour in Kingston, and a magistrate. Thinking he would like to know "how labour is robbed," I held one of William Morris's "Monopoly" up to him, when he became very indignant, and gave orders to the police—who were in strong force—to take my name and address, which increased the sale of the pamphlets 75 per cent. Our meeting being over soon after we started for home, our audience following behind cheering lustily. A week after, I received an invitation to attend her majesty's police court, for selling "Monopoly"; or, How Labour is Robbed" in the Kingston Market Place, contrary to Act of Parliament. On Wednesday 25th June I appeared at Kingston Police-court, when I was told by this Peter Gould and five others that I must pay £1 13s., or go to prison for fourteen days' hard labour—Peter Gould having the audacity to tell me I must seek some honest occupation. This is an ancient law that is still in force at Kingston, and this Peter Gould is the sort of man that is supposed to administer "justice."

[The suppression of "free speech" and public meeting is advancing with rapid strides. What will be the next move of the "authorities"? We are not allowed to march through streets, we must not hold meetings, and now the sale of literature is forbidden. We might as well be living in Russia.—EDITORS.]

Sergius Stepniak will lecture on "Tolstoi as Novelist and Social Reformer," in the Portman Rooms, Baker Street, on Wednesday July 16th, at 5 p.m. Tickets, 1s. and 2s. 6d., from Mrs. Edw. Pease, 2 Hyde Park Mansions, N.W. Proceeds in aid of some Russian exiles.

COMMONWEAL BRANCH.—Concert on Saturday July 12, for the benefit of a comrade. Doors open at 8; to commence at 8.30. Comrades and friends are earnestly requested to come. No charge for admission, but a collection will be made at the end of the concert for our comrade's benefit.

EDINBURGH—SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—Comrades Hamilton and Smith addressed a large meeting at Leith on Sunday afternoon, and sold a quantity of literature. In the evening Mackenzie, Smith, Hamilton, Gilray, and Leslie spoke in the Meadows to a large crowd. In spite of a pelting rain the meeting kept well together; Leslie's address was splendid. Some Irish Home Rulers were very angry at the speaker's allusions to the G. O. M.

SOCIALISM IN LONDON AND THE PROVINCES.

SOUTH LONDON.

THE movement in South London is going on well. We only started meetings in this part a month ago, but with great success. At Short Street, New Cut, we have held seven meetings on Sunday mornings and Wednesday evenings. We are advocating with great vigour the International General Strike to overthrow the system, and it has been received with great fervour. Comrade Backeridge has joined us, and is working heartily in our ranks; comrade Casey (Freedom Group) has also rendered some valuable help by speaking. We have distributed about 1,000 Anarchist 'Labour Leaf' and 500 other leaflets. We are arranging for a course of Anarchist-Communist open-air lectures at Short Street on the next four Sundays; Freedom and Commonweal sell well at our meetings. Since we have started the red flag at our meetings the gospel-punchers now come out with a magnificent red silk flag for the purpose of making the people go to their meeting instead of ours, but this has not come off yet. The following comrades have addressed our meetings—Cores, Wright, Holloway, Stevens, Casey, Turner, Backeridge, Miss Lupton, and Smith. We have issued 1,000 handbills announcing our lectures for next month. The comrades also decided to have as their motto, "Away with Authority and Monopoly; Free Access to the Means of Life."

NORWICH.

THE propaganda here is moving along successfully. On the 1st of June, comrades A. Moore and Poynts spoke at Crostwick in the morning; at Horstead in the afternoon, they were joined by Houghton, Morley, and Darley, and held a meeting. At both places the audiences consisted of agricultural labourers, who listened attentively. June 15th, Mrs. Lahr and W. Moore spoke in the morning at the Market Place; in afternoon, a large meeting was held by one of the local unions in aid of the strikers, when Mrs. Lahr spoke. In the evening, Mrs. Lahr and Poynts addressed a large open-air meeting. On the following day a meeting was convened for the evening at the Market Place by the Gas Workers' Union. Mrs. Lahr spoke at some length, upholding the principles she believed in, and was followed by a Mr. Watkinson, of the London Gas Workers' Union, who has been here several days holding meetings. During his remarks that evening he pointed out the blessings of returning working-men to Parliament, and advised working-men to use their efforts in this direction, and also take part in municipal affairs, etc. At the close he called for opposition, and Mrs. Lahr and Poynts were ready; comrade Poynts opened, and denounced the action that had been advised to the audience. Watkinson here lost his temper, and there was some slight disturbance, which ended in Mr. Watkinson beating a hasty retreat. Mrs. Lahr left here on the Tuesday, her visit having proved very successful. The same day she left three comrades had to answer a summons before the magistrates; one, however, did not turn up and could not be found. The "serious" charge against these comrades was stencilling on the pavement as follows, "Mrs. Lahr, Market, Sunday, June 15th." This resulted in a fine of 2s. and 8s. costs each, or three days imprisonment. The fine was paid for one comrade owing to his position, the second one took the three days, and the third is still at liberty in spite of the constable who brought the charge attending our meetings in private clothes. The following Sunday in the afternoon a meeting was held, at which Darley and Fred Henderson spoke; in the evening, Poynts and Morley spoke. On Saturday last, Mowbray lectured in one of the Board Schools on "Reform or Revolution;" Poynts took the chair. The next day Mowbray spoke at the Market Place in the morning and afternoon, and addressed large open-air meetings assisted by comrade Swash. Mowbray had to leave for London before the usual time of our evening meeting. We have sold during the month 493 Commonweals and collected £1 3s. 9d.; we have lost two or three collections owing to the strike here. Freedom has sold well, and a large quantity of strike leaflets and Anarchist 'Labour Leaf' have been distributed.

NOTTINGHAM.

A CONFERENCE of delegates from various Midland Socialist bodies was held at Nottingham on Sunday, and was an unqualified success. In the morning the party had a ramble to Stoke Ferry by the Trent, and in the afternoon returned to the Socialist Hall, Woodland Place, Parliament Street. About 30 delegates were present, besides a number of Nottingham comrades. Sheffield, Leicester, Chesterfield, Derby, Newark, Long Eaton, were among the towns represented. Peacock, of Nottingham, presided; and Proctor, on behalf of the Nottingham Socialist Club, proposed the formation of a Midland Socialist Federation for the better organisation of the lecture-lists and the missioning of new ground. In the discussion which followed, it was cordially agreed that no control could be exerted over the various branches by the Federation, and that no executive council or other governing body would be necessary. A general secretary would keep a list of speakers and arrange with various branches for a constant supply of speakers for districts,—in fact, as comrade Charles put it, it would be a sort of "post office." The Conference, which included parliamentary and anti-parliamentary Socialists, agreed unanimously to the Nottingham resolution, and Clifton, of Nottingham, was appointed secretary of the new Federation; a collection being at once taken for postage and other small expenses which will be necessary. It was resolved, on the motion of Gorrie, of Leicester, to extend the campaign to towns in which there is no Socialist organisation; and delegates from Newark, Derby, and Long Eaton addressed the Conference on the prospects of the Cause in their respective localities. It was decided to call another Conference at Sheffield on the last Sunday in June 1891; and the meeting closed with a hearty vote of thanks to the Nottingham comrades for their hospitable entertainment of the delegates who had arrived on the previous evening.

After tea, a demonstration was held in the Great Market Place, where between 3,000 and 4,000 persons assembled. There were two platforms, presided over by J. Peacock and T. Proctor respectively. The speeches were short and sharp, the speakers being A. Hall and Furniss (Chesterfield), Bingham, Bullas, Mrs. Usher, Cores, and Charles (Sheffield), Knight and Whalley (Nottingham S.D.F.), Watkinson (London S.D.F.), Chambers (Leicester), Deakin (Walsall), Purcell (Derby), Stephenson (Newark). A resolution welcoming the delegates to Nottingham, and demanding the complete emancipation of the workers, was agreed to unanimously, and the meeting closed with Socialist songs by Peacock and Cores. The gathering excited the greatest interest in Nottingham, was reported at length in the local papers, and was the occasion of much fraternal interchange of greetings on the part of Socialists of the Midlands. Collection at the Conference, 13s. 7d.; in Market Place, 26s. 2d.; literature sold, 14s. 6d.

HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON

The COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. For Australia, New Zealand, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Transvaal, and the Argentine Republic, a year, 8s.; six months, 4s.; three months, 2s. For India, Ceylon, China, Hong Kong, and the Straits Settlements, a year, 10s.; six months, 5s.; three months, 2s. 6d.

Subscribers who receive a RED WRAPPER are thereby reminded that their subscriptions have expired and must be renewed immediately if they wish to continue to receive COMMONWEAL.

SPECIAL RECRUIT SUBSCRIPTIONS.—To aid in spreading our principles, the following largely reduced terms are offered to those who obtain new subscribers: Two new yearly subscriptions for British Islands, etc., 10s. 6d.; for Australia, etc., 15s.; for India, etc., 10s. Five new subscriptions: For British Islands, etc., 25s.; for Australia, etc., 37s. 6d.; for India, etc., 47s. 6d. Specimen copies will be sent on receipt of postage.

Remittances from abroad must be made by International Money Order.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. XXII.—HAMPTON COURT. AND A PRAISER OF PAST TIMES.

So on we went, Dick rowing in an easy tireless way, and Clara sitting by my side admiring his manly beauty and heartily good-natured face, and thinking, I fancy, of nothing else. As we went higher up the river, there was less difference between the Thames of that day and Thames as I remembered it; for setting aside the hideous vulgarity of the cockney villas of the well-to-do, stockbrokers and other such, which in older time marred the beauty of the bough-hung banks, even this beginning of the country Thames was always beautiful; and as we slipped between the lovely summer greenery, I almost felt my youth come back to me, and as if I were on one of those water excursions which I used to enjoy so much in days when I was too happy to think that there could be much amiss anywhere.

At last we came to a reach of the river where on the left hand a very pretty little village with some old houses in it came down to the edge of the water, over which was a ferry; and beyond these houses the elm-beset meadows ended in a fringe of tall willows, while on the right hand went the tow-path and a space nearly clear of trees, which rose up behind huge and ancient, the ornaments of a great park: but these drew back still further from the river at the end of the reach to make way for a little town of quaint and pretty houses, some new, some old, dominated by the long walls and sharp gables of a great red-brick pile of building, partly of the latest Gothic, partly of the Court-style of Dutch William, but so blended together by the bright sun and beautiful surroundings, including the bright blue river, that it looked down upon, that even amidst the beautiful buildings of that new happy time it had a strange charm about it. A great wave of fragrance, amidst which the lime-tree blossom was clearly to be distinguished, came down to us from its unseen gardens, as Clara sat up in her place, and said:

"O Dick, dear, couldn't we stop at Hampton Court for to-day, and take the guest about the park a little and show him those sweet old buildings? Somehow, I suppose because you have lived so near it, you have seldom taken me to Hampton Court."

Dick rested on his oars a little, and said: "Well, well, Clara, you are lazy to-day. I didn't feel like stopping short of Shepperton to-day: suppose we just go and have our dinner at the Court, and go on again about five o'clock?"

"Well," she said, "so be it; but I should like the guest to have spent an hour or two in the Park."

"The Park!" said Dick; "why, the whole Thames-side is a park this time of the year; and for my part, I had rather lie under an elm-tree on the borders of a wheat-field, with the bees humming about me and the corn-crake crying from furrow to furrow, than in any park in England. Besides——"

"Besides," said she, "you want to get on to your dearly-loved upper Thames, and show your prowess down the heavy swathes of the mowing grass."

She looked at him fondly, and I could tell that she was seeing him in her mind's eye showing his splendid form at its best amidst the rhymed strokes of the scythes; and she looked down at her own pretty feet with a half sigh, as though she were contrasting her slight woman's beauty with his man's beauty; as women will when they are really in love, and are not spoiled with conventional sentiment.

As for Dick, he looked at her admiringly a while, and then said at last: "Well, Clara, I do wish we were there! But, hilloa! we are getting back way." And he set to work sculling again, and in two minutes we were all standing on the gravelly strand below the bridge, which, as you may imagine, was no longer the old hideous iron abortion, but a handsome piece of very solid oak framing.

We went into the Court and straight into the great hall, so well remembered, where there were tables spread for dinner, and everything arranged much as in the Hammersmith Guest-hall. Dinner over, we sauntered through the ancient rooms, where the pictures and tapestry were still preserved, and nothing was much changed, except that the people whom we met there had an indefinable kind of look of being at home and at ease, which communicated itself to me, so that I felt that the beautiful old place was mine in the best sense of the word; and my pleasure of past days seemed to add itself to that of to-day, and filled my whole soul with content.

Dick (who, in spite of Clara's gibe, knew the place very well) told me that the beautiful old Tudor rooms, which I remembered were the dwellings of the lesser fry of Court flunkies, were much used by people coming and going; for, beautiful as architecture had now become, and although the whole face of the country had quite recovered its beauty, there was still a sort of tradition of pleasure and beauty which clung to that group of buildings, and people thought going to Hampton Court a necessary summer outing, as they did in the days when London was so grimy and miserable. We went into some of the rooms looking into the old garden, and were well received by the people in them, who got speedily into talk with us, and looked with politely half-concealed wonder at my strange face. Besides these birds of passage, and a few regular dwellers in the place, we saw out in the meadows near the garden, down "the Long Water," as it used to be called, many gay tents with men, women, and children round about them. As it seemed, this pleasure-loving people were fond of tent-life, with all its inconveniences, which, indeed, they turned into pleasures also.

We left this old friend by the time appointed, and I made some feeble show of taking the sculls; but Dick repulsed me, not much to my grief, I must say, as I found I had quite enough to do between the enjoyment of the beautiful time and my own lazily blended thoughts.

As to Dick, it was quite right to let him pull, for he was as strong as a horse, and had the greatest delight in bodily exercise, whatever it was. We really had some difficulty in getting him to stop when it was getting rather more than dusk, and the moon was brightening just as we were off Runnymede. We landed there, and were looking about for a place whereon to pitch our tents (for we had brought two with us), when an old man came up to us, bade us good evening, and asked if we were housed for that night; and finding that we were not, bade us home to his house. Nothing loth, we went with him, and Clara took his hand in a coaxing way which I noticed she used with old men; and as we went on our way, made some commonplace remark about the beauty of the day. The old man stopped short, and looked at her and said: "You really like it then?"

"Yes," she said, looking very much astonished. "Don't you?"

"Well," said he, "perhaps I do. I did, at any rate, when I was younger; but now I think I should like it cooler."

She said nothing, and went on, the night growing about as dark as it would be; till just at the rise of the hill we came to a hedge with a gate in it, which the old man unlatched and led us into a garden, at the end of which we could see a little house, one of whose little windows was already yellow with candle-light. We could see even under the doubtful light of the moon and the last of the western glow that the garden was stuffed full of flowers; and the fragrance it gave out in the gathering coolness was so wonderfully sweet, that it seemed the very heart of the delight of the June dusk; so that we three stopped instinctively, and Clara gave forth a little sweet "O!" like a bird beginning to sing.

"What's the matter?" said the old man, a little testily, and pulling at her hand. "There's no dog; or have you trodden on a thorn and hurt your foot?"

"No, no, neighbour," she said; "but how sweet, how sweet it is!"

"Of course it is," said he, "but do you care so much for that?"

She laughed out musically, and we followed suit in our gruffer voices; and then she said: "Of course I do, neighbour; don't you?"

"Well, I don't know," quoth the old fellow; then he added, as if somewhat ashamed of himself: "Besides, you know, when the waters are out and all Runnymede is flooded it's none so pleasant."

"I should like it," quoth Dick. "What a jolly sail one would get about here on the floods on a bright frosty January morning!"

"Would you like it?" said our host. "Well, I won't argue with you, neighbour; it isn't worth while. Come in and have some supper."

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

GERMANY.

The close similarity between the English trade-unionist and the German and Austrian Social-Democratic movements is illustrated by the fact that both have undergone of late the same successes, difficulties, and trials, and neither of them manages to get better out of the difficulty than the other. In England the great success was the dockers' strike, in Germany the elections of February, and in Austria the May Day demonstrations. They were all followed by a period of shallow optimism, during which some believed they had found the remedy, and then by capitalist reaction, when these saw the workers congratulating themselves on their love of law and order. This was followed by defeats of the workers and a great deal of unpleasant quarrelling, and disillusion, etc. Only here, Socialists worthy their name kept aloof from these ephemeral events, and the people now return to those who kept up unflinchingly the revolutionary propaganda. In Germany and Austria the foremost Social-Democrats stand in the midst of all these quarrels and squabbles, and much quarrelling and intriguing goes on at present, however much the official mouthpieces of the leaders may deny this or hush it up. These leaders showed themselves utterly incapable of managing the 1st of May affair, as some persons nearer home about the general strike last year. They got frightened at the decisive moment, and "proclaimed" the holiday-making on May Day. Their ukase created much discontent, for the masses are already more advanced than their pretended "leaders." A part, however, stuck to the holiday; the result was lamentable half measures, which only encouraged the bourgeois to revenge themselves on the few who were cowardly deserted by the great mass. Hamburg was foremost in this, and now great distress prevails there among the Socialists, great numbers of them having been sacked, strikes being lost, etc. In Berlin, to give another example, during the brewers' strike scab breweries were boycotted, as the local Socialists had decided; but the official clique who still hold the local daily paper did all they could to discourage this boycott, and so it fell through. Much ill-feeling is provoked by this, and at a large representative meeting even Bebel did not succeed in lulling the growing feeling of independence of the workers, who are angry at being humbugged by their leaders. In the same way, the chief Austrian organ of the Social-Democrats thinks that there has now been enough of strikes. Of course, the workers should content themselves for a time by living on the recollection of the "glorious May Day promenades." Here also an opposition is rising. It is certain that the approaching depression of trade, the breaking up of trade organisations, and the confused demagogic escapades of the Emperor, will all combine to bring about a crisis in the German movement, which will open the eyes of many to the truth of the Revolutionary and Anarchist ideas.

JAPAN.

It appears that Socialist and Anarchist ideas begin to spread among the natives of Japan. Some information on this subject has been published by Dr. J. Hoffmann, of New York, a collaborator of the Freiheit, who visited Japan last year. Some time ago a secret radical society was organised by Talui Tokitchi, who was imprisoned for this for three years. This society is dead, but its adherents have since adopted Socialist ideas. They must be very careful and moderate in their propaganda, owing to the despotism they live under, but their ulterior aim is Anarchist-Communism. A paper called The XIXth Century was published for one and three-quarter years, and then prohibited. Since then Tgiu (Freedom) was started (since December 13, 1889), published in San Francisco, and for the time being hectographed until the funds will allow to buy type. This movement seems to be more under the influence of European Socialist ideas than under that of the native Socialist traditions of Eastern Asia, which are especially vigorous in China. We hail this movement as a new link in the world-wide chain of the Socialist brotherhood.

NOTES ON NEWS.

POLICE and Guards in revolt! Surely the whole Governmental machine is going to pieces. Even the practical middle-class man is beginning to ask, "Are we on the verge of a Revolution?" The middle-class may indeed shake in their shoes when their crack regiments are in mutiny. They always thought they could depend upon the Guards, though they could trust no other regiment in London. They have now found they were mistaken.

There is a lull in the trouble for a moment, but there can be very little doubt it will break out again; and the respectable classes must shudder when they think that the Daily News the other day said that a financial crisis is very probable in the autumn. What will become of the middle-classes when that crash comes? I think it is likely there may be an extensive "emigration" of the "surplus population" to a much warmer climate.

Bravo Leeds! Your people have shown that the men of the North have not lost their manhood in the enervating atmosphere of a commercial civilisation. Nor has the "peace at any price" cant of the hucksters of the Manchester school influenced the men, in whose veins runs the blood of the wild Norse sea rovers, who made danger a pastime, and sought in battle the pleasure which all the cheating knaves who lie and adulterate can never find in the smartest bargain. The men of Leeds have gained a victory. But how? Not by listening to the "law-'n'-order" appeals of Tay Pay O'Connor, who has the strongest objection to "violence" outside Ireland, or even by paying much attention to the mild platitudes of sentimental and political Socialists.

It is true that a juvenile contemporary of ours, with that sweet simplicity peculiar to innocent youth, says that "the gas workers have accomplished more by peaceful means than they could ever have hoped to do by recourse to violence." This is really too innocent; so innocent that we fear it can hardly be real.

Last winter, in South London, the gas-workers fought their battle in a strictly "legal and constitutional manner." They only tried the "peaceable means" of mild persuasion. How did they succeed? The gas company got more blacklegs than they wanted, and the men were shamefully defeated. Livesey's slave dens are now manned with blacklegs, and the gas-stokers are starving outside. At Leeds a huge mob assembles, armed with "formidable sticks, many of them with hooks, spikes, and nails attached," and blacklegs and police are attacked with savage bravery. With what result? The blacklegs who are in the works come out again, in consequence of the "peaceable means" employed by the crowd. Rioting continues for two nights, police, military, and town councillors are stoned; an attempt is made to force the works. There is suddenly a great scarcity of blacklegs; they cannot be had at any price; and the Town Council gives way, and it is the blacklegs who have to clear out and the men who take their places.

What is the moral of this? We fear the moral would not commend itself to the Fabian Society, or to any other body of kid-gloved pedants, with whom Socialism is a kind of high-class amusement—something to talk about, to vary the monotonous ease of their lives. But to workmen the moral is this—all means are justifiable against traitors and tyrants. "Death to blackleg! death to sweater!" must be the war cry of the working class. As they show no mercy to us, we will show none to them. This is what the people will not forget in future.

There is still another moral, and that is the futility of political reform. The Municipality of Leeds is a freely elected body, it is even a Fabian body. There are Municipal gas-works and Municipal police in that town. What more can Sidney Webb want? Yet this body does not mind sweating its employes; and when they resist, it brings its Municipal police to bludgeon them, and summons soldiers to shoot them down. And yet we are told by our Fabian friends that if the County Council had control over the London police, bludgeoning the people would be a thing of the past, and to quote the mad gentleman in 'Nicholas Nickleby,' "all would be gas and gaiters." I fear it will not be much consolation to a discontented London workman, when that happy time arrives, to remember, when his head is broken by a policeman's truncheon, that that valuable officer is not under the control of a tyrannical government, but is the servant of the London County Council. We wonder if that will make the workman feel quite serene and comfortable: we doubt it.

The leaders of last Saturday's procession are very jubilant over their "victory." According to Mr. Conybeare, M.P., it is all owing to the Gladstonian victory at Barrow. A more probable explanation is that the Government could not trust even their beloved police to bludgeon an unarmed crowd, and so as not to risk an almost certain "mutiny" they preferred to let the procession go by, especially as "it was only a little one."

The most amusing incident on Saturday was the eager way in which the mounted police accepted some copies of the Commonweal from a young comrade. We hope they liked the article on the front page. Let them read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest it. Then perhaps they may repent and be saved while there is yet time.

N.

THE LABOUR REVOLT.

The Leeds Gas-workers.

UP to October, 1889, the Municipal gas-workers were working twelve hours a-day. Then, after being agitated and organised by the Leeds Socialist League, they threatened a strike unless their demands were granted. The authorities, not caring about putting the town in darkness, gave the men the eight hours' day and 2s. 6d. more wages weekly. The consumers were, in consequence, charged 4d. a 1,000 feet more for their gas. About three weeks ago the Gas Committee posted notices up at all the works, informing the men that on and after July 1 they would have to sign an agreement binding them for four months to do a certain amount of work (about 20 per cent. more) in the eight hours. The men refused to sign, and most of them threw down their tools a day or two before the time for signing. Agents were now dispatched by the authorities to London, Manchester, and other places for blacklegs. The locked-out men were quite determined to prevent them reaching the works, and on Sunday, June 30th, Thorne, the general secretary, and Cockayne and Paylor, the local secretaries, advised the men to try their utmost to prevent the scabs getting into the works. Pickets were doubled, and through the night and all day Monday the entrances to the several gas-works were strongly guarded. The adjacent streets were blocked with people who had been obliged to stop work, on account of the failure of their gas-engines and stoves for heating in the many clothing factories, about 20,000 people being idle according to the local press. The feeling, of course, was very bitter against the Gas Committee by all sections of the general public.

On Monday night the word passed along that a gang of knobsticks had left London and Manchester, and would arrive about 4 a.m. Had it not have rained so incessantly, and thus damped the ardour of the men and women, there would have been some exhilarating scenes to record for that night. The air itself seemed charged with a nervous excitement, which seemed to fill the crowds with rage and boldness, and urge them nearer and closer to the gates and guards. The whole town was in darkness, and in the railway stations, post-office, the different hotels and large shops, a few candles and paraffin lamps were all that could be had to light up the darkness. The names of Gilston and Joseph Henry (who won't be soon forgotten) were freely bandied about, with expressions of regret that they could not be got hold of. These two "representatives" are Radical Home Rulers. Gilston, who is an alderman, went over to Ireland and was photographed in a group of similar "friends of the working classes," then came back here and lectured, and pretended to weep at the heartrending eviction scenes and cruelties under Balfourism. But this thing called "Henry" is a much more horrible example, for he is a trade unionist. He is also a teetotaler, and one who has "worked his way up" on the toil and sweat of the men he has been able to employ on municipal jobbing. The Tory press is going for the whole crew in a slashing manner, and threatens them all with extermination at the next November elections. It seems that the politicians can suggest nothing else except passing resolutions and howling round. But the men and their supporters did something and were not wasting time in mere talk. All through the wet miserable night they waited and watched, getting information as to the starting, journeying, and arrival of the scabs just as soon as the authorities.

At about 5 a.m. on Tuesday, the scabs to the number of 150 were seen coming down the Victoria Road from the Midland Railway, under a strong escort of police, with the chief constable and other chiefs. When near the bottom, and within 150 yards of the Meadow Lane Works, the people present with many Socialist comrades made a determined attack on this body. After a fierce fight they were at last repulsed, but not before many of the police were hors de combat. Several mounted men, including Chief Webb (whose arm got broken), were disabled and bleeding. The wounded on the other side were also numerous. The scabs having got into the works, the men retired for rest and deliberation.

In the morning about 11, comrade Sweeney, who was backed by thousands, got on the wall and called out to the scabs to be men and throw down their tools. About sixty then and there clambered over and joined in the shouts of exultation. They related how they had been deceived as to the position, and as to the pay also. It now leaked out that 600 scabs from Manchester and surrounding districts had been run into the Town Hall during the previous night, as it was thought too risky to venture a mile tramp through the town to the other works. A march now began with the sixty deserters and many thousands of people through the streets to Victoria Square, where stands the Town Hall and other municipal buildings. Here Sweeney and Samuels spoke to about 20,000 from the Wellington Statue, advising the people to get their wives, daughters, sisters, and female friends along, and not to leave the square until the 600 scabs came out, and then by fair means or foul to prevent them getting to the works. The authorities evidently funked, for about 5 o'clock placards were being posted up all over the town warning the people against obstruction, disorder, and unlawful assembly, the Meadow Lane Works meanwhile being strongly picketed.

At 7.30 about 300 extra carbineers from York and Strensall arrived with about 300 extra police from Halifax, Bradford, Huddersfield, etc., as well as several gold-laced idiots mounted, who galloped around and gave orders. The streets by this time were filling with working people, old and young, who were leaving work. At 8, the 600 scabs (who had been feasting in one of the halls of the building) prepared to start on their perilous march. Here they were lectured by Town Councillors, and played to by the organist, a Mr. Spark. After a time they were led out, formed into a solid square, surrounded by a strong force of police and soldiers. They started on the march, accompanied by the mayor (Emsley), magistrates, clerks—in fact, the whole gang of law-'n'-order humbugs. They were hooted, jeered, spit upon, kicked, and appealed to; but in vain, for they were hemmed in by the soldiery, and the afternoon's blow-out of beef, bacca, tea, and patriotism (they had sang "Rule Britannia" to the grand organ) had hardened them, and many of them used very bad language indeed to the people. But their time was coming, and they didn't have long to wait either.

All seemed comparatively fair sailing up to the railway bridge in Wellington Road, where thousands of people clambered up the mountains of ashes and refuse on to the bridge, under which the procession had to pass. On the bridge were three buckets full of coals, but they were not quite so full a few minutes after. Just as the procession was well under the bridge, down came planks and logs of wood, iron sleepers, great lumps of coal, bottles, clinkers, and all sorts of missiles, on to the horse and foot soldiers, police, scabs, mayor, and magistrates. The consternation and confusion baffles description; and if the people had only the knowledge (they had the pluck) the whole cursed lot would have been wiped out. As the horses and men picked themselves up, it was seen that many were bruised and bleeding, but, alas! no corpses to be seen. The party on the bridge got off without trouble or hurt.

From here to the gates of the New Wortley Works (Leeds) was only some thirty or forty yards, so they got over that distance very soon. But there was a fresh surprise in store for the authorities here, as just as the scabs were got in at the front gates, about 150 scaled the inside walls and ran away for their lives (without their bundles) at the back. The ungrateful varmint! After being fed and feted, and promised and protected! But there—frailty, thy name is blackleg! A strong force of pickets and sympathisers stayed behind to get the remainder out, and about an hour later the Meadow Lane Works were again surrounded by excited crowds, although it was raining hard. Darkness had again set in, and there was no gas at all.

At 10 p.m. Tuesday, July 1, a sudden, determined attack was made on these works; and although the police offered a most stubborn resistance, much damage was done and a few of the men got inside the gate; but they were ultimately beaten off, so they were not able to expel or set free the scabs. Many a skull was cracked that night, and many a vow was made that filled one with hope as to the action of the masses when the time comes. The 145 police had got something to think about; and it was noticed how brutally the strange policemen behaved, especially the Bradford lot. Now, this attack was quite a spontaneous affair, unorganised, unordered, and unexpected. During Tuesday night fresh troops were sent for, and early Wednesday morning about 250 hussars galloped up to the Town Hall. I heard on good authority that the volunteers were sent to individually and asked if they were willing to come out on duty, so that the regulars could be kept out of sight. They were offered 7s. 6d. for the day, but they declined.

On Wednesday afternoon the Riot Act was read, the people gradually leaving the streets; but at night the town looked as if it was in a state of siege. No gas, sky dark, air misty, streets blocked by soldiers, police, and people. On Wellington Road, leading up to the memorable railway bridge, it was very dangerous for pedestrians, who had to run the gauntlet of a demoralised police and meet the volleys of stones from the crowd. In the morning nearly all the street lamps in the vicinity were found to be smashed, and the roads strewn with all kinds of missiles. At this time two local "gentlemen" approached the gas-men and the Gas Committee with talk of conciliation. After a lot of palaver, a kind of compromise was at last settled, although the men claim to be better off now than before. They agreed to do 60 cwt. a-day instead of 55 as before, and to get paid for last Good Friday and get four days off in the year and pay. There was still the scabs to be considered, and here the men were firm. "We won't have them under any circumstances," and they had to go. Some had been engaged for three, six, and twelve months, and they naturally wanted compensation. Some got as much as £7 10s and some £5. The total cost to the ratepayers will come up to about £20,000, and the Liberals and Radicals on the Committee are doomed to defeat at the next election. The authorities will doubtless be more firm on the next occasion, so the workers must put their trust in themselves, and keep their powder dry. On Sunday last a monster procession and band marched to Hunslet Moor, where speeches were made, and all our Commonweal were sold, as well as a quantity of pamphlets. I think that we shan't be sorry when the next rising takes place. "And the Cause goes marching on."

The Police.

The trouble with the police came to a crisis on Saturday. At Bow Street the men refused to turn out on duty because Thomas Beevers, P.C., had been transferred to the X division as a punishment for issuing and distributing the following circular:

"Metropolitan Police, Bow Street, 4 July, 1890.

"Dear Sir,—Please make known to your men that Mr. Matthews last night said: 'The police have a perfect right to petition.' Also ask your sub-divisions to do likewise; it is for their mutual benefit, and the betterment of the whole force. The petition has gone in from Bow Street, and has met our respected Commissioner's approval. For further particulars, etc., apply to your obedient servant, THOS. BEEVERS, P.C. 134E."

An inspector succeeded in persuading some of the men to go on duty, and on Sunday forty men were suspended. A comical incident occurred on Sunday night. About 100 of the Bow Street force who were not on duty attempted to hold a meeting in the billiard-room at the station. The meeting would have been quiet enough had not an inspector discovered that Beevers was in the building. That he might not be found, the men had hidden him under a table. But the inspector found him, and advised him to leave the building. Beevers refused to do so, and invited the inspector to leave the room. The business ended by the men rushing the inspector out, after which they held their meeting in peace and quietness. A full account of the riot at Bow Street will be found on page 218.

The Postmen.

It must surely be a symptom of extreme discontent when the telegraph clerks, who are what the middle class call "a most respectable body of men," salute the name of that very fat old woman Mrs. Guelph with hoots and groans. If in France the name of M. Carnot was saluted with groans it would have been thought a very revolutionary symptom, but as it happened in England, we are assured that the men have "no feeling whatever of disloyalty to her majesty." No doubt if the postmen cheived Mr. Raikes as they did some of his spies the other Sunday, the officials would state that the men had no feeling of disloyalty to their "respected" chief. This amiable gentleman, however, has now succeeded in bringing matters to a crisis with the postmen. On Friday, July 4, nine men were suspended for attending the "disgraceful meeting" in Hyde Park, when Mr. Raikes's spies were "mal-treated." One of the men who has been "suspended" has been in the service twenty-five years, and was one of those who lost their stripes for attending the meeting on Clerkenwell Green.

Despite this cruel tyranny, it was decided on Monday night at the postmen's meeting at Holborn Town Hall not to strike till the London Trades Council had "interviewed" the Postmaster-General. The men, however, succeeded in extorting a promise from their "leaders" (!) that if Raikes sacked any more men for attending that meeting, they would give the order to "come out."

IN AUSTRALIA.

A TEST case is being tried now between Labour and Capital up in Queensland, that will very probably bring on a fight in London as well. The Darling Downs squatters and the Australian Labour Federation are preparing for battle; and as in your strike of the dockers, the fight began over a very downtrodden and unorganised branch of unskilled labour, but has spread and is still spreading, until it involves the whole question of organised labour against organised capital.

The "rouseabout," the unskilled labourer who picks up wool on the shearing-shed floors, waits on the comparatively skilled shearer, digs dams, makes fences, and does odd jobs, is being paid by the squatters, wool-producing monopolists, of Darling Downs any weekly wage he will take, ranging from, at the highest, 25s. down to 20s., and still oftener to 15s. Now the rouseabouts are claiming 30s. a-week and a little recognition as men. Although the squatters have been compelled to pay union wages to their shearers, they won't have union men, yet these non-union shearers are supporting the rouseabouts. The Sheep-shearers' Union has taken the matter up, has been backed by the Australian Labour Federation, and by so many unions throughout the continent, that to give their names would be to furnish a regular Australian trades-union directory.

The actual fight was brought about by the squatters on purpose to have an opportunity of squashing the unions. Messrs. Kent and Weinhold, of Jondaryan, were selected to begin, and they had a lot of wool shorn and made ready for market by blackleg labour throughout, making the rat character of the affair as aggressive as they could. Every division of labour concerned in the preparation or transport of wool took up the challenge, and the test consignment now lies on the wharf at Brisbane, having been got so far by blackleg labour. It is intended for shipment in the Jumna, but the Wharf Labourers', Lightermen's, and Seamen and Firemen's unions have notified the B. I. S. N. Company that if the wool is shipped in one of their steamers it will implicate them in the quarrel. It is threatened that it shall be shipped in a sailing vessel; if so, and it gets safely into a London Dock, it would be too much to hope, I suppose, that it should meet with the same fate that befell the tea in Boston Harbour a hundred and more years ago? Anyway, the London unions have been notified of the affair, and will take their own measures.

There are only four words wanted from about a dozen men, and the whole thing is over. The squatters, who number about that, have only to wire: "We acknowledge the union." But having chosen their own time to begin, they won't like to give in so soon, and the fight will go on. And it will be one of the very biggest and bitterest struggles between Labour and the Sweater that has ever taken place. If a general strike is found necessary throughout the back blocks, the Amalgamated Shearers will draw a cordon right round the border of Queensland to keep out blacklegs crossing from New South Wales or South Australia. The other preparations are equally tremendous; the Brisbane press has been notified that if it doesn't treat the matter impartially there will be a new paper on the streets at under two hours' notice; the strike manifesto was written, printed, and several thousand copies mailed in little over an hour; delegates have gone up and down the coast, and in every town the trades are ready to down tools at any moment.

The government has been taken by the beard, notified of the impending unprecedented strike, and the demand made that in no way shall it or any of its officials take sides in the dispute in any way. Further, it has been requested to instruct the law'n'-order lambs to behave at any strike meeting or procession as if they were at a governor's reception; to close the public-houses so as to stop one fertile means of helping the blacklegs to make trouble; to put an end to employers sitting as justices of the peace on their own cases; and to forbid any hiring at immigration depots, where the sweaters catch the "new chums" before they have had time to get acquainted with what is going on. In short, government has been sternly requested to confine itself entirely to keeping the ropes and letting the strongest win. If it does anything else you will hear of some fur flying before long.

As in your dock strike, if this great fight begins in earnest it will lead to a good many more before it is over. Among others the Townsville wharf labourers have some accounts of their own to settle, which they will see to presently when they have helped the others through.

Lots of other things are happening, but they are all of less importance than the foregoing, and may stand for next time. Our meetings continue to be large and enthusiastic, and our principles are spreading in a way that a little while ago we should have thought miraculous.

Sydney, N.S.W., May 10, 1890.

REPORTS.

ABERDEEN.—At our meeting on Sunday 6th, a comrade who is a declared Anarchist, lectured on "Anarchy" to a large audience. There was a brisk discussion, opinion being about equally divided between Anarchy and State Socialism; comrade Aitken declared that no hard-and-fast line could be drawn between Anarchy and the Socialism of the League.—G. C.

GLASGOW.—On Friday evening we held a second meeting at our new station—Bridgeton Cross. The audience, which was entirely a working-class one, listened to Joe Burgoyne and Glasier most attentively. On Sunday evening, comrade D. Stewart, and David McCalloch of the S.D.F., spoke at our Paisley Road Toll meeting, taking the place of our own speakers, who had gone on a holiday.

THE JUDGMENT OF THE CITY

AND OTHER POEMS AND VERSES.

By JOHN C. KENWORTHY.

Price, 2s. 6d.

FROM THE 'MANCHESTER EXAMINER.'

"It is not often that a book of verse from a new comer contains so large a proportion of really notable material. . . . The nature of the ethical burden of Mr. Kenworthy's volume may be inferred from the inscription, in which, after quoting the words 'Blessed are ye poor; for yours is the kingdom of God,' and 'Woe unto you that are rich, for ye have received your consolation,' he dedicates the book 'to those poor.' He is, in short, a poet of Christian Socialism. . . . 'The Judgment of the City' is a poem that is exceptionally rich, not only in stern moral fervour, but in sombre imaginative power—a Dantesque vision which, once read, haunts the memory and possesses it."

THE SATIRES OF CYNICUS.

"SINE IRA ET STUDIO."

CYNICUS asks no favour, is no partisan, independent and unbiassed he looks with impartial eye on the follies and corruptions of his time. Unknown and unaided, but with firm purpose, he launches his satires on a world of dissimulation and deceit, where alas—

Virtue's at a discount,
Truth is under par,
Honesty's a scarcity
Wealth is better far.

Knavery's commendable,
Cheating is no sin;
He is the true philanthropist
Who takes the stranger in.

But where, perchance, some honest kindly heart,
While smiling at his fancies, still may say—
"He acts no snarling, mean, or churlish part
Who fain would laugh the follies of the world away."

TO SUCH HE DEDICATES HIS BOOK.

To Socialists who wish to see the hypocrisy of modern society pictorially lampooned, we recommend Cynicus.

AFTER THE STORM, A CALM.

WE can hardly imagine that it is barely a week ago that London was filled with tumult and excitement. Unexpectedly the storm came upon us, and even we were taken by surprise. Who among the comfortable middle classes dreamt a month ago that their faithful servants the police—the Bow Street police, the picked men of the London force, the giants who guard Trafalgar Square against the assaults of the sacrilegious Socialist—would be in open mutiny? Little, too, did they think that the Guards—Her Majesty's Guards—would lead the way in revolt, and that their middle-class Government would be forced to send for another regiment to overawe the men in whom they once put their whole trust and confidence.

On the other hand, the whole Labour world is agitated, even the dullest, the most crushed among the workers, are raising their heads and dreaming of hope at last. Everywhere the talk is not of the virtues of Gladstone and Salisbury, nor the merits of Whig or Tory, the subjects of discussion are Strikes, Socialism, and the Great Revolution that is coming upon the world. The people have got new hope, a hope that nothing will take from them. They are beginning in their moments of exultation and excitement to defy the police and the military, and set at nought those who "are set in authority over them." "The Spirit of Revolt" is abroad. Two years ago you might search files of English newspapers and see nothing of "the spirit of revolt." It was a French phrase, utterly un-English. Now you may see repeated till you are almost sick of it in respectable Tory newspapers. Charming, is it not? It only shows how very ready our friends the journalists are to borrow the language of Revolutionary Socialists. Another instance, though rather a ludicrous one, is the origin of the phrase, "Who killed Cock Warren?" It was the cry with which Cunninghamham Graham was saluted on 12th November, 1888, at the meeting held to commemorate the anniversary of the martyrdom of our Chicago comrades and the massacre of Trafalgar Square. On that night Warren fell. The phrase caught the public fancy, became popular, and ultimately enshrined itself in a comic song that was sung on the stage of every music hall in London.

The notion also of gaining the eight hour day by a General Strike is forcing its way everywhere, and yet at one time we heard nothing of a General Strike but from a few Revolutionary Socialists—a sect that was so feeble that policemen, judges, jailors, and magistrates looked upon us with contemptuous toleration. That stage is passed now, and we almost seem to have passed our period of persecution also. Surely this must be so, when a Bow Street magistrate dismisses a charge against "a well-known Socialist," though the police had "sworn" that he was guilty of all sorts of "awful crimes."

"What can the world be coming to?" say old middle-class fogies. What? indeed! But to us the spectacle is full of hope and enthusiasm, for now we find our lightest words caught up and repeated again and again from press and platform. It is the advanced thinkers who lead the way; the multitude will follow those who have minds of their own, and speak without fear and flinching. Forward then, comrades! What have we to fear? A Government of doddering imbeciles; a hopeless, helpless mass of muddle and mediocrity, who are so confused and puzzled at the entanglement into which they have managed to get the "affairs of the nation," that they do not know whether to turn to the right or the left. And what have they to support their authority? A disorganised police, and a soldiery seething with mutiny. True, they have crushed the revolt; it has sunk into silence—for a time. True, the storm has passed and all is calm and quiet—for a time. But what a calm! The sky is grey and gloomy, and is growing blacker and blacker; the air is thick, close, and oppressive; a trembling of the earth, and muttered thunder in the distance. Surely this does not mean peace and quietness, but storm and earthquake. What of the winter full of gloom and terror which is now approaching? What of the commercial crisis coming nearer and nearer? What of the crash; ruin spread far and wide; closed factories; thousands thrown starving upon the streets; the spread of revolutionary ideas among the masses; wild hope in the hearts of the people? and yet among them starvation—bitter starvation—empty cupboards, hungry children, despair and desperation! Would not a modern Lord Chesterfield find to-day in England all the signs that tell of the approaching Revolution?

We need not be statesmen or politicians to see this. The plain workman in his work-day talking to his mates, can feel the storm coming closer and closer. It was only the other day that one quiet and honest workman, not as a rule given to wild enthusiasm, said to us "that the London workmen had been so excited and discontented by recent Labour troubles, that they only needed a leader to sweep the present system into ruin!" Those who mingle with the people can judge of the truth of this; we, at least, can confirm it from personal experience. If this is so now, what will it be when the next depression comes? It is not certain that the people will starve with that Christian meekness so highly commended by the well-fed journalists of the capitalist press. Nor will Lazarus be content any longer to put up with the crumbs of insulting charity that fall from the rich man's table. He will rise and grasp the rich robber by the throat, demanding and taking his own. The storm has passed, and there is calm. Let us use this period of quiet to prepare for what is coming. Do not let the trumpet sound of the Last Day of a corrupt and rotten society find us lying in lazy slumber. Let us be up and ready for action, for we know not at what hour the Revolution cometh!

D. J. NICOLL.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF MODERN SOCIETY.

ALL the progressive races of man have gone through a stage of development during which society has been very different to what it is now. At present there is a very definite line of distinction drawn between the personal life of a man and his life as a member of society. As a rule, the only direction in which this social life is felt is in that of his nearest kindred—his wife, children, parents, brothers and sisters. This is so much the case that we to-day have given to the word relations (which should mean all those with whom a man has serious and continuous dealings) a fresh meaning, and made it signify only those near members of kinship aforesaid. For the rest most civilised men acknowledge no responsibility. Though the word State is in everybody's mouth, most people have but the vaguest idea as to what it means; it is even generally considered as a synonym to the Government, which also indicates either the heads of one of the political parties, or the vague entity called by Carlyle the parish constable—in other words, the executive power of the ruling classes in our society. So little do we feel any responsibilities to this hardly conceivable thing, the State, that while few indeed feel any loyalty towards it, most men do not realise it sufficiently even to feel any enmity against it—except, perhaps, when the tax-gatherer's hand is on the knocker.

Now all this is so far the result of a long series of history, which I must just hint at before one comes to the condition of the workman during its different stages,—a series of events which tended to give to the word property the meaning which it now has; a series of events which tended more and more to consider things as the important matter of consideration rather than persons; which I may illustrate by the fact that nowadays the law looks upon the estate as of more importance than the user of it, as for instance in the case of the estate of a lunatic, which it will defend to the utmost against all attacks, and treat as if it had a genuine life and soul capable of feeling all injuries and pains, while all the time the lunatic is under restraint.

I will now contrast this entire ignoring of the community (for that will be a better word than State to use at present) with the conditions under which men lived in earlier ages of the world, and through which, as I have said, all the progressive races have passed, some of them so early that when we first meet them in history they are already passing out of it into the next development. In this early period the individual is so far from feeling no responsibility to the community, that all his responsibilities have relation to the community. Indeed, this sense of responsibility, as we shall see later on, has only been completely extinguished since the introduction of the present economical and political system—since the death of feudality, in short: but in the period I am thinking about it was a quite unquestioned habit. The unit of society, the first, and in the beginning the only bond, was the narrowest form of clan, called the gens. This was an association of persons who were traceably of one blood or kinship. Intermarriage between its members was forbidden, or rather was not even dreamed of: a man of the Eagle gens could have no sexual intercourse with an Eagle woman, nor thought of it. All property was in common within the gens, and descent was traced, not through the father, but through the mother, who was the obvious parent of the child. Whatever competition (war, you may call it, for competition was simple in those days), was outside the group of blood relations, each of which felt no responsibility for other groups or their members. But the fact that intermarriage was impossible within these groups brought about a larger association. Since an Eagle could not marry an Eagle, the Eagles must either get their wives by violent robbery in a haphazard fashion from outsiders, or have some other society at hand into which they could marry, and who could marry into their society. It used to be thought that the violent robbery was the method, but I believe the second method was the one used. There were groups of neighbours at hand who were recognised as belonging to the same stock, but who were not too near in blood to make marriage impossible. Between these groups there was affinity, therefore; the Eagles could intermarry with the Owls, the Sparrows, the Cats, or what not, according to a somewhat intricate system, and this quite without violence. And also between the clans or gentes who composed these tribes there would be no war, and the use of whatever land they fed their stock upon or cultivated (for in some places or ages this gentile-tribal system lasted well into the agricultural period) was arranged peaceably in a communal method.

Now the tribe in which a common ancestor (worshipped as a god) was always assumed, and was generally a fact, tended to federate with other tribes who still felt that they belonged to a common stock, who thus formed an association called by our ancestors the thiod, or people; an association much looser, of course, than that of the gens or tribe, but like those, founded on an idea of common kindred; founded on the personal kinship of all its members to the god-ancestor, and not on locality or the holding of certain property or position. The officers of the body, under whatever names they went, were appointed by the tribesmen for their personal qualities to perform definite duties. There was no central executive body; every freeman had certain necessary duties to perform, a shadow of which still exists in our jury, who were originally the neighbours called together to utter their finding (without direction from a judge) as to how such an one had come by his death, what was to do between two neighbours who could not agree, and so forth. If a man was injured, it was the duty of the members of his gens or clan to take up the injury as an injury to the community. This is the meaning of the blood-feud of which we hear so much in the early literature of the North, and of the Celtic clans, and a survival of which still exists among out-of-the-way folks. The practice of the vendetta in Corsica, e.g., does not indicate that the Corsicans are a specially vindictive people; it is a survival of the tribal customary law: its sentimentalising by novelists and poets is a matter of ignorance—natural enough, I admit. "Government" or administration, or whatever else you may call it, was in this condition of society as direct as it ever can be; nor had government by majority been invented—e.g., if the clans could not agree to unite in war, the war could not go on, unless any clan chose to go to war by itself.

I am conscious of not explaining fully the difference between such a state of society and ours; but it is indeed difficult to do so now, when all our ideas and the language which expresses them have been for so many ages moulded by such a totally different society. But I must, at least, try to make you understand that the whole of the duties of a freeman in this society had reference to the community of which he formed a part, and that he had no interests but the interest of the community; the assertion of any such private interests would have been looked upon as a crime, or rather a monstrosity, hardly possible to understand. This federal union of the tribes is the last state of society under barbarism; but before I go on to the next stage, I must connect it with our special subject, the condition of productive labour.

With the development of the clans into federated tribes came a condition of organised aggressive war, since all were recognised as enemies outside of the tribe or federation; and with this came the question what was to be done with the prisoners taken in battle, and, furthermore, what was to be done with the tribe conquered so entirely as not to be able to defend its possessions, the land, which it used. Chattel slavery was the answer to the one question, serfdom to the second. You see this question was bound to come up in some form, as soon as the productive powers of man had grown to a certain point. The very early stages of society slaves are of no use, because your slave will die unless you allow him to consume all that he produces; it is only when by means of tools and the organisation of labour that he can produce more than is absolutely necessary for his livelihood, that you can take anything from him. Robbery only begins when property begins; so that slavery doesn't begin till tribes are past the mere hunter period. When they go to war they only save their prisoners to have some fun out of them by torturing them, as the redskins did, unless, perhaps, as sometimes happened, they adopt them into the tribe, which also the redskins did at times. But in the pastoral stage slaves become possible, and when you come to the agricultural stage (to say nothing of further developments) they become necessary till the time when privilege is destroyed and all men are equal. There are, then, three conditions of mankind, mere gregarious unorganised savagery, slavery, and social equality. When you once have come to that conclusion you must also come to this deduction from it, that if you shrink from any sacrifice to the Cause of Socialism it must be because we are either weak or criminal, either cowards or tyrants—perhaps both.

Well, this last stage of barbarism, that of the federated tribes, gave way in ancient history, the history of the Greeks and Romans, into the first stage of civilisation. The life of the city, and in mediæval history into feudalism; it is under the latter that the development of the treatment of the conquered tribe as serfs is the most obvious; serfdom being the essence of mediæval society proper, and its decay beginning with the decline of serfdom. But, undoubtedly, there were serfs in the classical period; that is to say an inferior class to the freemen, who were allowed to get their own livelihood on the condition of their performing certain services for them, and with a certain status, though a low one, which raised them above the condition of the chattel-slave, whose position was not recognised at all more than that of his fellow labourer, the horse or the ass. The Helots, for example, were the serfs rather than the slaves of the Spartans, and there were other instances both among the Greeks and the Romans of labourers in a similar position.

However, chattel slavery as opposed to serfdom is the characteristic form of servitude in the ancient city life. In that life you must understand the idea of the merging of the individual into the community was still strong, although property had come into existence, and had created a political condition of society under which things were growing to be of more moment than persons. But the community had got to be an abstraction, and it was to that abstraction, and not to the real visible body of persons that individual interests were to be sacrificed. This is more obvious among the Romans than the Greeks, whose mental individuality was so strong and so various, that no system could restrain it; so that when that system began to press heavily upon them they could not bear it, and in their attempts to escape from its consequences fell into the mere corruption of competitive tyranny at an early period. The Romans, on the other hand, without art or literature, a hard and narrow-minded race, cultivated this worship of the city into an over-mastering passion, so fierce and so irrational that their history before their period of corruption reads more like that of a set of logical demons bent on torturing themselves and everybody else, than a history of human beings. They must be credited with the preservation of the art and literature of Greece (though with its corruptions and stultification as well), and for the rest I think the world owes them little but its curse, unless indeed we must accept them as a terrible example of over-organisation. Of their state one may say what one of their poets said of their individual citizens, when they were sunk in their well-earned degradation, that for the sake of life they cast away the reasons for living.

SOCIALISM IN LONDON.

WEST-CENTRAL ('COMMONWEAL')

THIS branch, which was formed out of the scattered elements of the late Clerkenwell branch, together with a large number of comrades who hitherto belonged simply to the League and to no branch in particular, has now been in existence several months. Up to the present we have been content to help all the London branches who desired it, having taken up no stations of our own until lately. Of course we have not been idle, for we have held a number of indoor meetings which have been addressed by various friends and comrades of all schools of Socialist thought. So successful have the meetings and concerts held by the branch been, that we have since the last Conference been enabled to aid the Commonweal considerably by supporting the Guarantee Fund. Acting on the spirit of the resolution of the Conference we were not content alone to pay the 2s. per week asked for, but have been able to hand over something like 30s. during the last few weeks, which sum will be increased as time goes on. The comrades have worked with a will in pushing papers, pamphlets, and collecting funds for propaganda purposes. During the last month a female comrade kindly made the branch a present of a piano. A choir is in course of formation, which is being conducted by a comrade of the North London Branch, who is assisted at the piano by our comrade Hurford. The choir will greatly facilitate our out and indoor propaganda, and I am sure one ought to be started by every branch. Social evenings have been held on Saturdays, when the members find a little relaxation from the every-day worry and struggle for bread, in singing revolutionary songs and dancing. This has been and might still further be, a means of keeping our members together in the bonds of close fellowship. Several new members have joined during the last month, and they are of the right kind, ready and willing to aid the movement in every way. For so young a branch we can feel pleased at having 65 members, all I hope good and true to the Cause of Socialism, and all stirred by the spirit of revolt against the present system.

NORTH LONDON.—On Sunday week we held a meeting in Regent's Park, in spite of the rain; speakers were Stone, Edwards, Nicoll, and Mrs. Lahr; and last Sunday morning our meeting was addressed by Cantwell, Stone, Edwards, Nicoll, and Mrs. Schaack. A Mr. Whelan offered some very weak opposition. Collection, 3s. 5d. In Hyde Park, in the afternoon, Cantwell, Miss Lupton, Parker, Moore, and Saint were the speakers, and we also enlivened the meeting with a couple of songs. Collected 2s. 9d. We sold 15s. worth of literature at these meetings.

ABERDEEN.—At Castle Street, on the 12th, the usual meeting was addressed by Rennie and Leatham. Questions at close. On Sunday, 13th, at weekly indoor meeting Grant Allen's "Individualism and Socialism" was read and discussed with ability and animation by W. Cooper, Rennie, Fowlie, McKenzie, Duncan, and Leatham.—L.

GLASGOW.—On Friday evening Glasier, Joe Burgoyne, McNaughton (S.D.F.), and Biggar (Christian Socialists) spoke at Bridgeton Cross. On Sunday evening Glasier spoke at Paisley Road Toll. At the conclusion, an individual disputed some of our comrade's statements in the form of a number of questions, but ran away without waiting a reply, amid the jeers of the crowd. No meetings will be held next week, owing to the Fair holidays.

EDINBURGH.—SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—Good meetings were held on Sunday—at Leith in the afternoon, and on the Meadows in the evening. Smith, Hamilton, Bell, and Gilray were the speakers. Smith was in grand form. Literature sold well.—W. D. T.

SWEATERS!

WOMEN SLAVES IN BERMONDSEY.

THE women at Messrs. Barber and Morison's, sackmakers, Bermondsey, receive commonly 1d. per sack (out of which they buy their own twine) for making large sacks of new material. The sacking is so hard as to be frequently only comparable to a deal board, and the needles have to be forced through with the palm of the hand and by the whole force of the woman, so that, as they express it, "every bone in their body is ricked." This at the best brings them in for eleven hours work a-day 1s. (two dozen sacks being the utmost they can make), but frequently it is less. Sometimes, after a day of most arduous toil, their earnings will only amount to 9d. Men who do the same work are paid 4d. an hour, and I am told by an expert, who understands the trade as well as the work, that women can compete in this kind of work on equal terms with the men, their work being quite as good as regards quantity and quality. It is easy, therefore, to understand the desperate determination of the masters to keep these sweated women in slavery, and prevent them if possible from combining, as from no other class of workers (geese, perhaps, I should have said) do they get such veritable golden eggs. The women at this factory have also to carry the unmade sacks on their heads to the work-rooms at the top of the building, no lift being used. They have also to load the waggons with the completed work, going up ladders 16 rungs high, with bales of from 1 cwt. to 1½ cwt. on their heads. In men's places of work these ladders have always hooks at the top, and frequently spikes at the bottom to avoid any danger of slipping, but as the employes at Messrs. Barber and Morison's are only women, mostly young married women, mothers of children (some unborn), the firm does not consider it necessary to take such precautions on their behalf, and the ladders are quite unsecured. The other day a rung broke under the feet of a woman, and the ladder with two women who were on it fell to the ground, and one woman was severely cut about the head and face. This firm also does not provide any water for sanitary or drinking purposes, and when thirst or nuisance becomes quite intolerable, the women have to go round with cans begging from the neighbours.

To CONTRIBUTORS—Workmen could help us greatly by sending in accounts of capitalist tyranny and sweating in London and the provinces. We want the names of the sweaters. Those who write must send us their name and address, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee of good faith. We shall not fear to publish the truth.—Eds.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

ITALY.

The series of strikes, and the agrarian disturbances and their bloody suppression continue. Last month the women engaged in the cultivation of rice went on strike, asking a salary of 10d. (one franc) instead of the 6d. they formerly earned by 15 hours work under the burning sun, and standing up to their knees in the foul water of the rice-fields. After much wrangling the employer, Signor Massari, a landowner of great wealth, who recently bought for the sum of 100,000 francs his title of duke, made a show of yielding to his worker's demands. The women went to work, but on reaching the fields they were informed by his agent that the "duke" will not pay more than 8d. a day. The incensed workwomen immediately struck again, and went to the town in a body to lay their protest before the municipal authorities against the deceit practised upon them. But soldiers and gendarmes stood at the entrance of the Town Hall, and refused them admittance. The women wanted to enter all the same, and began to shout and struggle to open a way for themselves; several men who stood by took their part. One of the women gave a slap on the face to the head of the gendarmes, and immediately, without giving the warning prescribed by law, the soldiers opened fire. Three corpses and twenty wounded were stretched upon the ground.

At Favara (Sicily), the miners of the sulphur works are on strike. A fortnight ago they made a threatening demonstration; the troops were called forth, and a bloody encounter took place. Fifteen soldiers were wounded, and many more among the miners. But the exact number of the latter is not known, for they were carefully hidden by their companions so as not to expose them to the police.

At Savone (near Genoa), there were also bloody encounters between the troops and the people, but the government tries to hush up these unpleasant stories.

At Intra, a town which is called the Birmingham of Lombardy, the majority of workmen are on strike.

At Rome, the election for the county council has taken place. Out of 62,990 electors, only 6,451 went to the poll.

The split of the Italian Republicans is now an accomplished fact. The young, generous, and democratic section moves towards Socialism; the rest pass over to the Monarchy, or are mummified by the worship of old formulas out of which the life has long departed.

At Forli, where a congress of the Republicans of Romania was held, a strong minority voted in favour of collective property. The proposal of incorporating their desires into the programme of the Republicans being rejected by the majority, they seceded from the Republican Federation. M.

HOW THE BAKERS ARE SWEATED.

COMRADES.—I feel it my duty as a Revolutionary Socialist to bring under the public notice the horrible conditions under which the journeyman bakers are compelled to work for a livelihood; not to live as men, but merely to exist in order to fill the pockets of the profit-mongers and legal thieves. I often hear people casting a slur on the baker's calling; they say they are aristocratic trade-unionists, who fancy themselves rather above their fellow-workers. But really they are among the most enslaved and down-trodden of the workers. What time have they to enjoy life or improve their minds? Remember that a baker has to begin his work at 11 o'clock at night, and keep on till 1 or 2 o'clock in the afternoon of the next day, and in some cases even longer; while on Friday he has to start earlier in the evening and work till 5—nay, even 8 o'clock—on Saturday night; and that is the only night he has off. I know shops not only in the East, but also in the West end, where you can see these slaves tearing away, not allowing themselves time to eat anything, in order to get out of their miserable, wretchedly-ventilated dens, where the atmosphere is most stifling and unhealthy. In some bakehouses the ceiling is so low that the men are constantly in a stooping position, and the suffering of these men is most horrible, and a disgrace to our sham society.

If you want to find out the truth about the baker's lot, go in their clubs or trades-union societies, also to their homes, and what will you see? Men coming in, not walking upright, but staggering in, to drop themselves down into the first chair, too tired even to smoke their pipes. They drop off to sleep with an empty stomach, worn out with the day's slavery. This is at home, where the wife and children look forward for the bread-winner's return, but the husband no sooner comes than he drops down exhausted, not caring for anything else but rest. Rest! is the cry of these wealth-producers. Some will say, But there is Sunday. But they have no rest even on Sunday. When 9 or 10 o'clock in the morning comes round, you will see the baker at work getting ready for the dinners to be brought in, and they are there at work till 2 o'clock; then they go home, just having time for a bit of dinner. Tea-time comes round, and he is just able to have his tea; then 7 o'clock strikes for him to go to set the sponge, and that takes another hour of his Sunday's leisure. Then this poor wretch is at liberty till 11 o'clock, when he is on duty again till next day. What a grand thing it is to be a baker's wife! There are some employers who do not work their men quite so hard and where they are better treated, I admit, but they are very few.

Now, that is the life of a baker's slave under the present civilised society. Just fancy that while others have their night's rest after their work is done, these poor wretches have to turn out in the night air, in all kinds of weather. Instead of sleeping peacefully, they have to tramp along toward their dens, where they are compelled by this most rotten society to gain bread, not only for themselves, but for the idlers, who have all the comforts of life, which they steal from these poor slaves. The master is able to enjoy a nice slumber at night, and so feels refreshed in the morning, and is able to bully about his worn-out employes and also to look after the profits which these men have produced while he was sleeping. These lazy profit-mongers, who never do a stroke of real work, and who thieve legally and respectably, are not satisfied by stealing from the men the results of their labour, but they must try to grind the men down lower and lower. Wages vary in the baking trade from 25s. to 30s. for the foremen; for second hands, 18s. to 24s.; and third hands, 16s. to 20s. These infamous sweaters, the masters, are constantly crying out that trade is bad, and not satisfied with their plunder, they have in most cases the meanness to lay hold of the men's privileges.

The yeast merchants allow a foreman on every pound of yeast 2d.; some only allow 1d. It does not amount to much in the week, but still these mean misers stick to the money, and many dresses and jewellery are bought out of this, and with which they adorn their wives and daughters. The same is done with the sack money. The poor wretches in the bakehouses have to stand to dust the sacks out, and are smothered in flour while the perspiration is pouring down them, and it often requires a vigorous scrubbing with soap and water to get them free from the dirt and dust again! Yet these thieves, who sit behind the counter blowing and puffing with fatness, steal all these little additions to the men's wages.

The workmen's wives and children are even deprived of the comfort they ought to have. The wife does not know what it is to go out with her husband to have a little recreation; the children are frightened to move about at home, so as not to disturb the breadwinner's sleep during the few hours he has for this purpose. Can we wonder that the spirit of the bakers is broken, and their intelligence somewhat dulled by the constant drag upon them?

Not long ago, when a strike was threatened by the men, there seemed to be some chance of the men improving their position, but owing to the mis-management of the union officials, matters are now sinking into their old condition. I want to ask these gentlemen what has become of the ten hours? Are not the firms already stealing from the men the few advantages they have gained? Take the firm of Hill and Son, for instance, soon after the "strike." These people refused to pay overtime, and the result was that the men had to accept the terms or leave, and are now working under the same conditions as before. The men at most of the other shops have now sunk into their old misery. This result, I am sorry to relate, has demoralised and dispirited them, which must show them clearly that something more must be done than to strike for a mere few shillings or shorter hours. The capitalist must no longer be allowed to fleece the worker, and the whole capitalist system must be overthrown.

Now, comrades, let us be determined to help these wretched men. It is our duty to show them the right path. Let us not lose a single opportunity. Think of these men when you sit down to your meals and see the bread upon the table. Think under what shameful conditions it has been manufactured. Let this memory urge us onward in our work, and let us tell them that a General Strike for the overthrow of Capitalism is the only way to save them from their misery and despair. JOHANNA LAHR.

The Police.

The police agitation has also broken down completely. In addition to the forty air ady dismissed from the E, twelve have been dismissed from the Y division for refusing to turn out on Monday night. Sir Edward Bradford reigns supreme, and is talking of breaking up the Bow Street division and distributing the men all over the metropolis. The tyrant, however, had better be careful; the spirit of revolt is not dead yet, though it may be sleeping.—For particulars of "Police Brutality" at Bow Street and surrounding neighbourhood, see page 230.

The COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. For Australia, New Zealand, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Transvaal, and the Argentine Republic, a year, 8s.; six months, 4s.; three months, 2s. For India, Ceylon, China, Hong Kong, and the Straits Settlements, a year, 10s.; six months, 5s.; three months, 2s. 6d.

Subscribers who receive a RED WRAPPER are thereby reminded that their subscriptions have expired and must be renewed immediately if they wish to continue to receive COMMONWEAL.

SPECIAL RECRUIT SUBSCRIPTIONS.—To aid in spreading our principles, the following largely reduced terms are offered to those who obtain new subscribers: Two new yearly subscriptions for British Islands, etc., 10s. 6d.; for Australia, etc., 15s.; for India, etc., 19s. Five new subscriptions: For British Islands, etc., 25s.; for Australia, etc., 37s. 6d.; for India, etc., 47s. 6d. Specimen copies will be sent on receipt of postage.

Remittances from abroad must be made by International Money Order.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

CORRESPONDENTS who order literature should prepay postage, or state if they wish their parcels to be sent per rail or carrier, "carriage forward."

J. W.—The name of the author should have been A. Yewen.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE total failure of the postmen's strike is in every way disheartening. The men, who a week ago were full of enthusiasm for their union, are to-day utterly broken down. What is the reason for this? Was the fault theirs, or had they to fight against discouraging circumstances. This was clearly not so, for they showed plenty of pluck at the beginning of the week, and the people were with them, as was proved by the enthusiasm of the burly butchers of Smithfield, who cheered them heartily on their march to the General Post-office.

Where was the fault then? We are sorry to have to reply in their "leaders," who knew not how to lead, and who had about as poor a notion of managing a strike as a baby in a cradle. It was prophesied by those who knew these gentlemen, when they so kindly took up the cause of the postmen, that they would make a mess of the whole business, and they have amply fulfilled that prophecy.

A few years ago we of the Socialist League were blest by the company of some of these gentlemen in our organisation, and they were always found wanting in times of emergency. The secretary, J. L. Mahon, who has now made himself so ridiculous by his capacity for being "round the corner" or in bed, when there was the greatest need for his services, is a notorious example of instability and vacillation.

It is within our knowledge that he has changed his opinions at least six times within the last five years, during which time he has been everything by turns and nothing long. A Social Democrat, Revolutionary Socialist, Anarchist, then a Parliamentary Revolutionary Socialist, whatever that may mean, then Social Democrat again, and last of all a mild social reformer and secretary of the postmen's union. He will probably end his political career as a Conservative "working-man," and this won't take him long, for, judging by present events, he will soon lose his post as secretary of the union. We can only recommend the men, when they have got rid of Mr. Mahon, to choose a secretary among the discharged men, and to be sure that he is honest, firm, and resolute.

Mr. Stanley is married. Let us hope we have heard the last of him for some little time. We present our respectful sympathy to the bride, for we are sure that a man who has spent his life in murdering hapless savages is not the sort of person with whom she is likely to be happy.

By the way, Reynolds published a portrait of the great explorer on this happy occasion, which, if it resembles him, is the most damning evidence against him. A man with a countenance like that which appeared in our contemporary, would not be content with killing natives but would eat them as well. All we can say is that if any one was brought before a country magistrate, and charged with highway robbery with violence with a face like the portrait in Reynolds, the magistrate would not require any other evidence, but would give him six months on the strength of his countenance.

Mr. Parke has been released. The Government did not want another Mandeville case, so he was treated kindly in jail and was let loose directly it was clear that his health was failing. Mr. Parke has done good revolutionary work—though it may be unwittingly—by exposing the Cleveland Street Scandals. He has dared to speak plainly and boldly concerning these hideous crimes, and for his honesty he had received twelve month's hard labour. Now Tay Pay has cleared out from the Star, we hope Mr. Parke will do the same admirable work upon that paper as he did in the past. Although we differ in opinion from him, we can always recognise honesty and courage even in those who are most opposed to us. D. N.

It appears from Woman, a journal for feminine Tories, that the wives of married constables were brought around the police stations to influence their husbands not to strike, and that the very much married Roberts, so courageous in assailing juveniles and aged people, quailed before their better halves, and "scabbed." "The fiery bachelors gave the most trouble." Just so. We were not concerned for the success of the bludgeoners' strike, such as it was; but the facts so exultingly drawn attention to in Woman are worth noting.

Every upward movement on the part of working men has found its bitterest opponents amongst the wives and female relatives of the men. If in other circles there be marriages of convenience, there are thousands of working-class households wherein the wife only views the male bread-winner in the same light that the boss of the factory does—viz., to get what is possible out of him; and if he rebels against the outside slavery, the wife is too frequently found to be a powerful ally of the boss in coercing him back to toil.

The capitalists are perfectly well aware of this preservative force, and use it unscrupulously in every struggle with their workmen. Hence during the Dock Strike the Fleet Street limners depicted the docker's wife pleading with the docker to resume work. All the enginery of the mission-hall, the muffin struggles, and tea fights, the sewing classes and mothers' meetings (good Lord, deliver us!), are means to the end that the men may be reached by these neuter agencies, and put up with that state of life which it pleases the capitalist to create for him.

We must face this kind of opposition, and not only must it be overcome, but be changed into helpful comradeship. There is, unfortunately a large number of very advanced men who are responsible for the conservatism of women, for they refuse either to recognise or treat them in thought or action as equals. The contending political factions play battledore with the catch-cries of Women's Rights, meaning thereby only partial political enfranchisement as a part of conservative and reactionary tactics. Socially and economically speaking, the Women's Rights agitators of the Mrs. Lynn Linton stamp would "free" (sic!) woman by forcing her into competition with man. Such seek to intensify the economical struggle by bitter sex strife.

The non-political Socialist, and especially our women comrades, have a large field of work in counteracting the reactionary influence which makes the large mass of women—especially working women—a dead weight of opposition and hindrance to progress. Let them penetrate into the tenements with literature and argument, and show the women that the gospel-monger and his ilk are not the only ones who make women and their work their concern. By preaching the mundane gospel of making this world a brighter and happier one, causing them to look with horror and detestation upon the grimy, sordid existence they lead to-day, filled as it is with woes and petty cares, we shall lead them to higher conceptions of life, and obtain their assistance as comrades and equals for their realisation.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. XXII (continued).—HAMPTON COURT. AND A PRAISER OF PAST TIMES.

WE went up a paved path between the roses, and straight into a very pretty room, panelled and carved, and as clean as a new pin; but the chief ornament of which was a young girl, light-haired and grey-eyed, but with her face and hands and bare feet tanned quite brown with the sun. Though she was very lightly clad, that was clearly from choice, not from poverty, though these were the first cottage-dwellers I had come across; for her gown was of silk, and on her wrists were bracelets that seemed to me of great value. She was lying on a sheepskin near the window, but jumped up as soon as we entered, and when she saw the guests behind the old man, she clapped her hands and cried out with pleasure, and when she got us into the middle of the room, fairly danced round us in delight of our company.

"What!" said the old man, "you are pleased, are you, Ellen?"

The girl danced up to him and threw her arms round him, and said: "Yes, I am, and so ought you to be grandfather."

"Well, well, I am," said he, "as much as I can be pleased. Guests, please be seated."

This seemed rather strange to us; stranger, I suspect, to my friends than to me; but Dick took the opportunity of both the host and his grand-daughter being out of the room to say to me, softly: "A grumbler: there are a few of them still. Once upon a time, I am told, they were quite a nuisance."

The old man came in as he spoke and sat down beside us with a sigh, which, indeed, seemed fetched up as if he wanted us to take notice of it; but just then the girl came in with the victuals, and the carle missed his mark, what between our hunger generally and that I was pretty busy watching the grand-daughter moving about as beautiful as a picture.

Everything to eat and drink, though it was somewhat different to what we had had in London, was better than good, but the old man eyed rather sulkily the chief dish on the table, on which lay a leash of fine perch, and said:

"H'm, perch! I am sorry we can't do better for you, guests. The time was when we might have had a good piece of salmon up from London for you; but the times have grown mean and petty."

"Yes, but you might have had it now," said the girl, giggling, "if you had known that they were coming."

"It's our fault for not bringing it with us, neighbours," said Dick, good-humouredly. "But if the times have grown petty, at any rate the perch haven't; that fellow in the middle there must have weighed a good two pounds when he was showing his dark stripes and red fins to the minnows yonder. And as to the salmon, why, neighbour, my friend here, who comes from the outlands, was quite surprised yesterday morning when I told him we had plenty of salmon at Hammer-smith. I am sure I have heard nothing of the times worsening."

He looked a little uncomfortable. And the old man, turning to me, said very courteously:

"Well, sir, I am happy to see a man from over the water; but I really must appeal to you to say whether on the whole you are not better off in your country; where I suppose, from what our guest says, you are brisker and more alive, because you have not wholly got rid of competition. You see, I have read not a few books of the past days, and certainly they are much more alive than those which are written now; and good sound unlimited competition was the condition under which they were written,—if we didn't know that from the record of history we should know it from the books themselves. There is a spirit of adventure in them, and signs of a capacity to extract good out of evil which our literature quite lacks now; and I cannot help thinking that our moralists and historians exaggerate hugely the unhappiness of the past days, in which such splendid works of imagination and intellect were produced."

Clara listened to him with restless eyes, as if she were excited and pleased; Dick knitted his brow and looked still more uncomfortable, but said nothing. Indeed, the old man gradually, as he warmed to his subject, dropped his sneering manner, and both spoke and looked very seriously. But the girl broke out before I could deliver myself of the answer I was framing:

"Books, books! always books, grandfather! When will you understand that after all it is the world we live in which interests us; the world of which we are a part, and which we can never love too much? Look!" she said, throwing open the casement wider and showing us the white light sparkling between the black shadows of the moonlit garden, through which ran a little shiver of the summer night-wind, "look! these are our books in these days!—and these," she said, stepping lightly up to the two lovers and laying a hand on each of their shoulders; "and the guest there, with his oversea knowledge and experience;—yes, and even you, grandfather" (a smile ran over her face as she spoke), "with all your grumbling and wishing yourself back again in the good old days,—in which, as far as I can make out, a harmless and lazy old man like you would either have pretty nearly starved, or have had to pay soldiers and people to take the folk's victuals and clothes and houses away from them by force. Yes, these are our books; and if we want more, can we not find work to do in the beautiful buildings that we raise up all over the country (and I know there was nothing like them in past times), wherein a man can put forth whatever is in him, and make his hands set forth his mind and his soul."

She paused a little, and I for my part could not help staring at her, and thinking that if she were a book, the pictures in it were most lovely. The colour mantled in her delicate sunburnt cheeks; her grey eyes, light amidst the tan of her face, looked kindly on us all as she spoke. She paused, and said again:

"As for your books, I say flatly that in spite of all their cleverness and vigour, and capacity for story-telling, there is something loathsome about them. Some of them, indeed, do here and there show some feeling for those whom the history-books call 'poor,' and of the misery of whose lives we have some inkling; but presently they give it up, and towards the end of the story we must be contented to see the hero and heroine living happily in an island of bliss on other people's troubles; and that after a long series of sham troubles (or mostly sham) of their own making, illustrated by dreary introspective nonsense about their feelings and aspirations, and all the rest of it; while the world must even then have gone on its way, and dug and sewed and baked and built and carpentered round about these useless—animals."

"There!" said the old man, reverting to his dry sulky manner again.

"There's eloquence! I suppose you like it?"

"Yes," said I, very emphatically.

"Well," said he, "now the storm of eloquence has lulled for a little, suppose you answer my question?—that is, if you like, you know," quoth he, with a sudden access of courtesy.

"What question?" said I. For I must confess that Ellen's strange and almost wild beauty had put it out of my head.

Said he: "First of all (excuse my catechising), is there competition in life, after the old kind, in the country whence you come?"

"Yes," said I, "it is the rule there." And I wondered as I spoke what fresh complications I should get into as a result of this answer.

"Question two," said the carle: "Are you not on the whole much freer, more energetic—in a word, healthier and happier—for it?"

I smiled. "You wouldn't talk so if you had any idea of our life. To me you seem here as if you were living in heaven compared with us of the country from which I came."

"Heaven?" said he: "you like heaven, do you?"

"Yes," said I—snappishly, I am afraid; for I was beginning rather to resent his formula.

"Well, I am far from sure that I do," quoth he. "I think one may do more with one's life than sitting on a damp cloud and singing hymns."

I was rather nettled by this inconsequence, and said: "Well, neighbour, to be short, and without using metaphors, in the land whence I come, where the competition which produced those literary works which you admire so much is still the rule, most people are thoroughly unhappy; here, to me at least, most people seem thoroughly happy."

"No offence, guest—no offence," said he; but let me ask you; you like that, do you?"

His formula, put with such obstinate persistence, made us all laugh heartily; and even the old man joined in the laughter on the sly. However, he was by no means beaten, and said presently:

"From all I can hear, I should judge that a young woman so beautiful as my dear Ellen yonder would have been a lady, as they called it in the old time, and wouldn't have had to wear a few rags of silk as she does now, or to have browned herself in the sun as she has to do now. What do you say to that, eh?"

Here Clara, who had been pretty much silent hitherto, struck in, and said: "Well, really, I don't think that would have mended matters; or that they want mending. Don't you see that she is dressed deliciously for this beautiful weather? And as for the sun-burning of your hayfields, why, I hope to pick up some of that for myself when we get a little higher up the river. Look if I don't need a little sun on my pasty white skin!"

And she stripped up the sleeve from her arm and laid it beside Ellen's, who was now sitting next her. To say the truth, it was rather amusing to me to see Clara putting herself forward as a town-bred fine lady, for she was as well-knit and clean-skinned a girl as might be met with anywhere at the best. Dick stroked the beautiful arm rather shyly, and pulled down the sleeve again, while she blushed at his touch; and the old man said laughingly: "Well, I suppose you do like that, don't you?"

Ellen kissed her new friend, and we all sat silent for a little, till she broke out into a sweet shrill song, and held us all entranced with the wonder of her clear voice; and the old grumbler sat looking at her lovingly. The other young people sang also in due time; and then Ellen showed us to our beds in small cottage chambers, fragrant and clean as the ideal of the old pastoral poets; and the pleasure of the evening quite extinguished my fear of the last night that I should wake up in the old miserable world of worn-out pleasures, and hopes that were half fears.

(This Story began in No. 209, January 11, 1890. A few sets of Back Numbers can still be had.)

THE LABOUR REVOLT.

The Postmen's Strike.

This strike has failed, mainly through the cowardice and weakness of the leaders. It will be remembered that on Monday, July 7, a meeting was held at Holborn Town Hall, to consider what action should be taken on account of the continued suspensions of men for attending the union meetings by the Postmaster-General. Through the advice of the union officials, the men decided to accept the mediation of the London Trades Council, and postponed the strike for twelve days. But the men insisted that if there was any attempt to bring blackleg labour into any post-office, all unionists should strike at once.

On Tuesday morning the men at the General Post-Office discovered, shortly after they had started work, that there were thirty blacklegs in the place. They insisted on these being removed, and as it was evident there would be a strike in the event of a refusal, the officials were obliged to submit, and they were ordered out.

On Wednesday the blacklegs employed at the Parcels-Post Office at Mount Pleasant had to run for their lives before a furious crowd of men. Alarmed at the discontent, and the possibility of a strike, Raikes endeavoured to get the postmen to sign a paper promising that they would not strike during the crisis. This the men refused to do, according to the instructions of the union.

Then on Thursday Mr. Raikes determined on vengeance, and a hundred men were dismissed at Mount Pleasant for ill-treating the blacklegs. This was followed by suspensions and dismissals at other offices. Then the union officials gave the word to strike, and the men turned out at several offices. At Finsbury Park they shut themselves in the office and refused to budge an inch. A number of tradesmen applied for their letters, when the postmen rushed at the bags and dragged them out of their hands, crying, "No letters here unless from postmen." The men were then set upon by our gallant police and dragged from the office with brutal violence. At Leicester Square thirty-five marched out of the office, amid a scene of popular excitement. Everywhere the cowardly police, who had not sufficient pluck to strike to remedy their own grievances, did their utmost to crush the postmen. These slavish bullies seemed to take a delight in the work. Never mind; Sir Edward Bradford will avenge the postmen, as the cowardly crew are already finding out.

But although the men turned out very well at many of the district offices—particularly North Islington, where, according even to official report, 108 left their work—yet at St. Martin le Grand they did not turn out. Here the men had lost confidence through the vacillating conduct of their leaders, and moreover had been deceived by a traitor on the executive of the union, who had informed them that the secretary had ordered them not to come out. Meanwhile Mr. Mahon had mysteriously disappeared, and they could get no word from him. So they remained at work all day Thursday. On Thursday night a meeting was held at Clerkenwell Green, at which the secretary announced "that they had got practically the whole of the London men out on strike," and that all was going well. The events of the next day proved that this was an empty boast. On Friday morning only some eighty or ninety men assembled on Clerkenwell Green by half-past four. There they spent some time waiting for their invaluable secretary, who did not turn up; so they determined to march on without him. He arrived, however, soon after, and caught them up; but before they had arrived at the Post Office, he had vanished again, this time into a hansom cab, which drove off, leaving the men to march along without their "leader." When they reached the Post Office, they were met by Superintendent Foster, a kind old man, despite his position, who asked them "where their leader was"—a question which they could not answer. After they had marched up and down two or three times, the superintendent informed them that he could not allow them to continue to do so, but they must break up and leave the road clear. This they did, and established pickets; but deserted by their "leaders," they had lost all hope, and the strike had evidently gone to pieces.

On Saturday it was evidently all over. A petition was received from 83 of the 94 men who struck in the Eastern district, begging in the most humble tones that the Postmaster-General would be pleased to reinstate them. This humiliating appeal only showed how thoroughly the men were broken down.

But though these postmen may lick the dust beneath Mr. Raikes's feet, it will avail them but little. That gentleman was very amiable to a deputation of postmen that waited upon him on Friday, when there was still a chance that they might strike, yet he shows a very different temper now. On Saturday, when the possibility of a strike had vanished, eight more men were dismissed; therefore it is not likely he will listen to their petition, so they might have saved themselves the humiliation.

The Guards.

The Guards' grievances are being "enquired into," and meanwhile the excessive duty of which the men complained has been reduced. It looks as if they were afraid to punish the men for "mutiny." No wonder, when the whole army is smouldering with discontent, only waiting a breath to blow it into a flame.

Corruption in Parliament.

Many workmen must have often wondered why it so often happens that a man who is honest and upright while working in the popular cause outside the House of Commons, immediately becomes tainted and corrupt soon after he gets within the walls of that edifice. The following quotation from a speech of Mr. Cremer on the Directors' Liability Bill, given in the Railway Review, will perhaps supply an answer to this question:

"If not the poorest member of the House, there were few poorer than he (Mr. Cremer), and there had been no want of temptation put in his way. A few months ago he was asked to become a director of a scheme which it was said had received the sanction of the hon. member for Kirkcaldy (Sir G. Campbell), but knowing the hon. member to be a cautious man, and to belong to a cautious nation, he made enquiry, and found the hon. member had nothing whatever to do with the scheme, and had never lent his name. The remuneration offered to him was £200 a-year. This was the kind of temptation placed in the way of poor members."

This will not only explain why men who were once sincere get corrupted, but will also explain why certain impudent adventurers, who are sincere alone in their self-conceit, are so eager to enter these charmed portals. They ought by rights to bear labels on their breasts, on which, in huge black letters might be inscribed, "This lot can be bought cheap." Certainly no sane man would expect anything but cowardice, treachery, and corruption from these people. They start as "Labour" candidates on money from suspicious sources, and they end by selling themselves and their dupes to the highest bidder. There is a chance that people may be deceived by these humbugs, and they had better keep a wary eye on some of these "Labour" candidates, of whom we are threatened with a perfect swarm at the next election. One consolation is that these swindlers will soon disgust people with "parliamentary action," and will teach them its uselessness. The people then will see that the destruction of the present system by their own action is the only way to salvation. N.

POLICE BRUTALITY.

WE have received several letters concerning the police brutality on Tuesday, July 8th, at Bow Street, and surrounding neighbourhood, of which we think our readers should be informed. The crowd appeared to us to be very peaceable and quiet, and of course the police bullies seized the opportunity of displaying their valour. The big brutes of the G division were specially noted for their ruffianism, and how shamefully they behaved our readers will see from the following:

On Tuesday night, after leaving the soiree of that glorious institution the International Arbitration and Peace Association at Essex Hall, I came upon a very different scene on my way homewards, which lay through Bow Street. I was accompanied by two ladies, one of whom was most eager to see what was going on. On reaching the foot of Bow Street, about 9.30, we found the street blocked by a crowd of policemen, so we remained in Catherine Street, just facing Drury Lane Theatre. The crowd, so far, was not excessively large, and very orderly, moving up and down the street without inconvenience; but there was an air of expectancy about the people, which showed that something was expected. We had not long to wait before the cry was raised, "Here they come!" and the mounted police turned the corner and came down the street at a trot, driving the people before them, accompanied by a number of policemen, who attempted to drive everyone off the sidewalk. There was a rush now for the public-houses and the doorways, and the orderly street instantly became a scene of confusion. One of my companions was hurried into a bar, and the door locked, but the other bravely remained with me in a doorway. The police now tried to make us leave our position by bullying, but as we refused to stir, they passed on. Two or three times this performance was gone through, the crowd each time becoming more irritated and indignant, hooting them on their way down, and accompanying their return with volleys of stones from the dark side streets. On one of their return journeys a more serious outbreak seemed on the point of happening. A woman rushed from the crowd in pursuit of the retreating squad, and tried to pull the hindmost from his horse. He brutally raised his staff to strike her down, when the crowd, with a great shout, surged up and swept her out of the way.

Another incident showed that the art of the barricade is not unknown here, though at present in a very elementary stage. Just before the mounted police were expected down again, a number of men hurried up with a coster's handbarrow, which they overturned right in front of us, and placed broadside across the road; they then retired to await the result. Unfortunately for the success of their scheme, they had placed it in the light from a bar, and just as the horses began to trot down the street, and we were breathlessly awaiting the crash, about a dozen officious bobbies rushed down and carried it off—just in time.

It was now nearly half-past ten, so we made for home, having to make a large detour to reach Tottenham Court Road.

The following glaring instance of police brutality seems to show that by Tuesday night they were so thoroughly cowed by the merciless action of their superiors, that they were ready to do any dastardly act to show their zeal. Between 11 and 12 o'clock on that night I saw a respectable-looking young man standing at the corner of Great Queen Street and Drury Lane. A guardian of the law approached him, and he was told to move on. As he moved away another guardian came forward, and twisting his leg in the young man's threw him violently down on his face. The few people who were about rushed up to try and save him, when several more guardians of the peace ran up and pushed the people back, while four of them gave him what is called the "Frog's March," that is, each policeman took him by a limb and carried him face downwards. The victim, of course, was helpless, and very soon black in the face. The subsequent fate of this young man deponent knoweth not.

The press were very careful to state on the Wednesday that the preceding night's riot in Bow Street and neighbourhood was not marked by violence on the part of the police. As a matter of fact some desperate charges were made by foot and horse police. Amongst the crowd opposite the Novelty Theatre, a foot passenger was knocked down and brutally batoned until insensible. In Drury Lane and Great Wild Street, the police broke into the houses and assaulted the inmates. In the first-named thoroughfare the mounted men rode on the pavements and roadway, and here one man in the crowd was ridden down and had to be conveyed to the hospital.

TO A FOIL'D EUROPEAN REVOLUTIONAIRE.

COURAGE yet, my brother or my sister!
Keep on—Liberty is to be subvert'd whatever occurs;
That is nothing that is quell'd by one or two failures, or any number of failures,
Or by the indifference or ingratitude of the people, or by any unfaithfulness,
Or the show of the tushes of power, soldiers, cannon, penal statutes.

What we believe in waits latent forever through all the continent,
Invites no one, promises nothing, sits in calmness and light, is positive and composed, knows no discouragement, Waiting patiently, waiting its time.

(Not songs of loyalty alone are these,
But songs of insurrection also,
For I am the sworn poet of every dauntless rebel the world over,
And he going with me leaves peace and routine behind him,
And stakes his life to be lost at any moment.)

The battle rages with many a loud alarm and frequent advance and retreat,
The infidel triumphs, or supposes he triumphs,
The prison, scaffold, garrote, handcuffs, iron necklace, and lead-balls do their work,
The named and unnamed heroes pass to other spheres,
The great speakers and writers are exiled, they lie sick in distant lands,
The Cause is asleep, the strongest throats are choked with their own blood,
The young men droop their eyelashes toward the ground when they meet;
But for all this Liberty has not gone out of the place nor the infidel enter'd into full possession.

When liberty goes out of a place it is not the first to go, nor the second or third to go;
It waits for all the rest to go, it is the last.

When there are no more memories of heroes and martyrs,
And when all life and all the souls of men and women are discharged from any part of the earth,
Then only shall liberty or the idea of liberty be discharged from that part of the earth,
And the infidel come into full possession.

Then courage, European revolter, revoltress!
For till all ceases neither must you cease.

I do not know what you are for (I do not know what I am for myself, nor what any thing is for),
But I will search carefully for it even in being foil'd,
In defeat, poverty, misconception, imprisonment—for they too are great.

Did we think victory great?
So it is—but now it seems to me, when it cannot be help'd, that defeat is great,
And that death and dismay are great.

REPORTS.

EAST LONDON.—Good meeting at Hoxton Church on Sunday morning, addressed by Moore and Davis; a large number of 'Anarchist Labour Leaf' distributed, and 1s. 1½d. collected for same. At Victoria Park on Sunday afternoon, a large audience was addressed by Mrs. Lahr, Davis, Burnie, and Hicks.
The Social Democrats distributed a number of bills at our meeting, announcing their so-called "Labour candidates" for the House of Imbeciles at Westminster.
Davis strongly criticised their policy. Burnie made his maiden speech (for this Park), and gave material support to Anarchism; Commonweal and Freedom sold well, and large number of 'Labour Leaf' distributed; collection 1s. 9½d.—H. D.

THE JUDGMENT OF THE CITY

AND OTHER POEMS AND VERSES.

By JOHN C. KENWORTHY.

Price, 2s. 6d.

FROM THE 'MANCHESTER EXAMINER.'

"It is not often that a book of verse from a new comer contains so large a proportion of really notable material. . . . The nature of the ethical burden of Mr. Kenworthy's volume may be inferred from the inscription, in which, after quoting the words 'Blessed are ye poor; for yours is the kingdom of God,' and 'Woe unto you that are rich, for ye have received your consolation,' he dedicates the book 'to those poor.' He is, in short, a poet of Christian Socialism. . . . 'The Judgment of the City' is a poem that is exceptionally rich, not only in stern moral fervour, but in sombre imaginative power—a Dantesque vision which, once read, haunts the memory and possesses it."

THE SATIRES OF CYNICUS.

"SINE IRA ET STUDIO."

CYNICUS asks no favour, is no partisan, independent and unbiassed he looks with impartial eye on the follies and corruptions of his time. Unknown and unaided, but with firm purpose, he launches his satires on a world of dissimulation and deceit, where alas—

Virtue's at a discount,
Truth is under par,
Honesty's a scarcity
Wealth is better far.

Knavery's commendable,
Cheating is no sin;
He is the true philanthropist
Who takes the stranger in.

But where, perchance, some honest kindly heart,
While smiling at his fancies, still may say—
"He acts no snarling, mean, or churlish part
Who fain would laugh the follies of the world away."

TO SUCH HE DEDICATES HIS BOOK.

To Socialists who wish to see the hypocrisy of modern society pictorially lampooned, we recommend Cynicus.

IS THE REVOLUTION COMING?

THE events of the last two years give but one answer to this, the all-important question to every Socialist. To him, as to all who look by the light of history at the throbbing of those mighty forces, which to day are shaking the dilapidated edifice of Society to its foundations, the only uncertainty regarding the question lies in the manner of its accomplishment. And it is in these yet unresolved factors that the avowed Revolutionist holds the key of the situation. For it is the business and the duty of militant Socialists to supply the force which will seize the opportunity to make the Revolution an accomplished fact. What, then, should be our attitude, the attitude of every son of labour who is intelligent enough to be discontented with his condition? The attitude of all who feel the burden of the misery engendered by Capitalism, and who know that it must be borne till the system in which it is inherent, is destroyed?

We have now reached the parting of the ways. The decisive moment has arrived. Let us choose our course. There can be no neutral ground—he that is not for us is against us. We expect no quarter, and we shall give none. The upholders of the existing order stigmatise us as the “dangerous element,” “the enemies of Society,” and by heavens we are determined that their epithets shall not lack occasion. The Revolutionary Party wastes not its time and energies on effete institutions such as Parliament. It believes in Trades Unions merely so far as they can be used as a convenient weapon with which to maintain the Holy War against Capitalism, but which like all implements of warfare, may become obsolete, and require to be superseded by more potent, if less respectable methods. It is therefore more important that it be a party of action than of great numbers. Indeed, the numbers will follow quickly enough upon the action.

The principles of Revolutionary Socialism are thorough, its policy must be the same. We are the enemies of mis-government and disorder, and must fearlessly attack those who mis-govern and maintain disorder. They include all “authority” and robbery, and these must be swept away by “revolutionary” storm. The people must not submit to tyranny of Governments any longer. No! Ignorant the masses may be, and not seldom without the least idea of their own interests on certain questions. But the instinct of self-preservation, if nothing else, will assuredly bring them to see that their very existence may depend on whether they are willing to oppose, even by armed resistance, the hirelings who are kept in readiness by the propertied classes solely to be hurled against the people when they attempt to take their own. The truth of this cannot much longer be concealed from the producing, yet property-less, classes. They are being taught by oft-repeated experience. The people are the raw material of Revolution, and there need be no fear but that when the time arrives they will be ready.

Now, the coming of that time must be hastened and brought about by the Party of Revolutionary Socialism. How? By the most uncompromising preaching of its principles, and by every means; paying no heed as to the legality, or otherwise, of the methods employed. By resisting and combating “Authority” at every opportunity. We shall then soon have law and order on our track at all points. When we throw down the gauntlet, our rulers will with alacrity pick it up. They will undoubtedly wish to crush us. They know our mission, and fully understand that it means crushing them.

Prosecution and persecution we must court, and the more of it we get, the more progress we shall make. The machinery of tyranny was never so much out of gear as at present. The organized brute force which our masters wield to enslave us and secure their own position cannot now be absolutely depended on. The spirit of revolt which is the characteristic of our time has permeated all the forces of “Authority,” civil and military. Not that we can hope much from such weak and futile displays as the recent Police and Postmen’s “Strikes,” but here also experience will prove the most efficient teacher. When these bullies on the one hand, and slaves on the other, find that vacillation, cringing servility, and an utter lack of powerful organisation, are met by their masters in merciless tyranny and coercion, and that to be treated like men they must have the courage to act like men, it will rouse them from their slavish degradation to bold and fierce revolt.

It is precisely amongst those workers who have shown themselves most fearless and determined, who have not scrupled to use violent means where pacific did not answer, and have not considered whether they elicited the sympathy or hatred of a sentimental public, that the most substantial gains have been won. Time serving and timidity can never accomplish anything except the contempt they deserve, and there has been too much of them in the labour struggles in the past.

The advantages to be won in a struggle for Socialism against the present system are so great compared with those for which Labour’s battles are now fought, the gain to every worker so enormous, that it should be the duty of each to see to it, and make the question his own. The Revolution concerns all alike. Its benefits will be shared by all. Then why should anyone stand back? If he is not a traitor to the cause of Labour, it behoves every toiler, though he may not call himself a Socialist, to lend a hand in pushing forward the great crisis which will precede his emancipation.

Let none be deluded with the idea which the enemies of real progress would thrust upon us—that the price to be paid for the change is too dear. They tell us it cannot be got peaceably or constitutionally; that blood must be spilled; civil war and universal massacre are sure to be the result of our teaching. What if they are? Have we not to-day a system which murders and destroys with greater cruelty and more torture than any social upheaval could accomplish? It sounds well to be thus denounced by the classes which are ever perfecting more and more the most fiendish implements of human destruction, to be used on a wholesale scale, not by a few fanatics or enthusiasts, but by millions of trained men, drilled to the utmost precision in the art of human butchery. The governments of Europe spend upwards of four hundred millions sterling annually, which is stolen from labour, in order to maintain those Christian institutions, their enormous armies. But yet we the Socialists, the preachers of brotherhood amongst all men, of universal peace and happiness—we, the lovers and saviours of mankind—are bloodthirsty, callous, sowers of discord and hatred, preachers of violence and murder. There is nothing we can preach, nothing we could do, had we the power, that would entail a tithe of the horrors of the state of things under which we live.

Then let us make war upon the system, and on the ruling powers which maintain it, in every possible way. When called upon at any time to assist the workers in the disputes at all times cropping up, it is our duty to urge upon them to attack the system in every possible way. The power is always with the producers, could they but realise it. When they make a demand, it is not sufficient to passively await the result; they must enforce it if necessary by a strike in every trade. Thus industry may be paralysed and the possessing classes driven into submission.

How long will it take the toilers to appreciate their strength? We revolutionists must answer by our deeds. These will spread our ideas, till we gather force to sweep away the spoilers; and when these robbers are driven away, the people will take their own. W. B.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. XXIV. (continued).—UP THE THAMES: THE SECOND DAY.

HOWEVER, that mattered little to us; the nights were light, for the moon was shining in her third quarter, and it was all one to Dick whether he sculled or sat quiet in the boat: so we went away a great pace. The evening sun shone bright on the remains of the old buildings at Medmenham; close beside which arose an irregular pile of building which Dick told us was a very pleasant house; and there were plenty of houses visible on the wide meadows opposite, under the hill; and we had seen before that the beauty of Hurley had compelled people to build and live there a good deal. The sun very low down showed us Henley little altered in outward aspect from what I remembered it. Actual daylight failed us as we passed through the lovely reaches of Wargrave and Shiplake; but the moon rose behind us presently. I should like to have seen with my eyes what success the new order of things had had in getting rid of the sprawling mess with which commercialism had littered the banks of the wide stream about Reading and Caversham: certainly everything smelt too deliciously in the early night for there to be any of the old careless sordidness of so-called manufacture; and in answer to my question as to what sort of a place Reading was, Dick answered—

“O, a nice town enough in its way; mostly rebuilt within the last hundred years; and there are a good many houses, as you can see by the lights just down under the hills yonder. In fact, it is one of the most populous places on the Thames round about here. Keep up your spirits, Guest! we are close to our journey’s end for the night. I ought to ask your pardon for not stopping at one of the houses here or higher up; but a friend who is living in a very pleasant house in the Maple-durham meads particularly wanted me and Clara to come and see him on our way up Thames; and I thought you wouldn’t mind this bit of night travelling.”

He need not have adjured me to keep up my spirits, which were as high as possible; though the strangeness and excitement of the happy and quiet life which I saw everywhere around me was, it is true, a little wearing off, yet a deep content, as different as possible from languid acquiescence, was taking its place, and I was, as it were, really new-born.

We landed presently just where I remembered the river making an elbow to the north towards the ancient house of the Blunts; with the wide meadows spreading on the right-hand side, and on the left the long line of beautiful old trees overhanging the water. As we got out of the boat, I said to Dick—

“Is it the old house we are going to?”

“No,” he said, “though that is standing still in green old age, and is well inhabited. I see, by the way, that you know your Thames well. But my friend Walter Allen, who asked me to stop here, lives in a house, not very big, which has been built here lately, because these meadows are so much liked, especially in summer, that there was getting to be rather too much of tenting on the open field; so the parishes here about, who rather objected to it, built three houses between this and Caversham, and quite a large one at Basildon, a little higher up. Look, yonder are the lights of Walter Allen’s house!”

So we walked over the grass of the meadows under a flood of moonlight, and soon came to the house, which was low and built round a quadrangle big enough to get plenty of sunshine in it. Walter Allen, Dick’s friend, was leaning against the jamb of the doorway waiting for us, and took us into the hall without overplus of words. There were not many people in it, as some of the dwellers there were away at the haymaking in the neighbourhood, and some, as Walter told us, were wandering about the meadow enjoying the beautiful moonlit night. Dick’s friend looked to be a man of about forty; tall, black-haired, very kind-looking and thoughtful; but rather to my surprise there was a shade of melancholy on his face, and he seemed a little abstracted and inattentive to our chat, in spite of obvious efforts to listen.

Dick looked at him from time to time, and seemed troubled; and at last he said: “I say, old fellow, if there is anything the matter which we didn’t know of when you wrote to me, don’t you think you had better tell us about it at once? or else we shall think we have come here at an unlucky time and are not quite wanted.”

Walter turned red, and seemed to have some difficulty in restraining his tears, but said at last: “Of course everybody here is very glad to see you, Dick, and your friends; but it is true that we are not at our best, in spite of the fine weather and the glorious hay-crop. We have had a death here.”

Said Dick: “Well, you should get over that, neighbour: such things must be.”

“Yes,” Walter said, “but this was a death by violence, and it seems likely to lead to at least one more: and somehow it makes us feel rather shy of one another; and to say the truth, that is one reason why there are so few of us present to-night.”

“Tell us the story, Walter,” said Dick; “perhaps telling it will help you to shake off your sadness.”

Said Walter: “Well, I will; and I will make it short enough, though I daresay it might be spun out into a long one, as used to be done with such subjects in the old novels. There is a very charming girl here whom we all like, and whom some of us do more than like; and she very naturally liked one of us better than anybody else. And another of us (I won’t name him) got fairly bitten with love-madness, and used to go about making himself as unpleasant as he could—not of malice prebense, of course; so that the girl, who liked him well enough at first, though she didn’t love him, began fairly to dislike him. Of course, those of us who knew him best—myself amongst others—advised him to go away, as he was making matters worse and worse for himself every day. Well, he wouldn’t take our advice (that also, I suppose, was a matter of course), so we had to tell him that he must go, or the inevitable sending to Coventry would follow; for his individual trouble had so overmastered him that we felt that we must go if he did not.”

“He took that better than we expected, when something or other—an interview with the girl, I think, and some hot words with the successful lover following close upon it, threw him quite off his balance; and he got hold of an axe and fell upon his rival when there was no one by; and in the struggle that followed the man attacked hit him an unlucky blow and killed him. And now the slayer in his turn is so upset that he is like to kill himself; and if he does, the girl will do as much, I fear. And all this we could no more help than the earthquake of the year before last.”

“It is very unhappy,” said Dick; “but since the man is dead, and cannot be brought to life again, and since the slayer had no malice in him, I cannot for the life of me see why he shouldn’t get over it before long. Why should a man brood over a mere accident for ever? And the girl?”

“As to her,” said Walter, “the whole thing seems to have inspired her with terror rather than grief. What you say about the man is true, or it should be; but then, you see, the excitement and jealousy that was the prelude to this tragedy had made an evil and feverish element round about him, from which he does not seem to be able to escape. However, we have advised him to go away—in fact, to cross the seas; but he is in such a state that I do not think he can go unless someone takes him, and I think it will fall to my lot to do so; which is scarcely a cheerful outlook for me.”

“O, you will find a certain kind of interest in it,” said Dick. “And of course he must soon look upon the affair from a reasonable point of view sooner or later.”

“Well, at any rate,” quoth Walter, “now that I have eased my mind by making you uncomfortable, let us have an end of the subject for the present. Are you going to take your guest to Oxford?”

“Why, of course we must pass through it,” said Dick, smiling, “as we are going into the upper waters; but I thought that we wouldn’t stop there, or we shall be belated as to the haymaking up our way. So Oxford and my learned lecture on it, all got at second-hand from my old kinsman, must wait till we come down the water a fortnight hence.”

I listened to all this story with much surprise, and could not help wondering at first that the man who had slain the other had not been put in custody till it could be proved that he had killed his rival in self-defence only. However, the more I thought of it, the plainer it grew to me that no amount of examination of witnesses, who had witnessed nothing but the ill-blood between the two rivals, would have done anything to clear up the case. I could not help thinking, also, that the remorse of this homicide gave point to what old Hammond had said to me about the way in which this strange people dealt with what I had been used to hear called crimes. Truly, that remorse was exaggerated; but it was quite clear that the slayer took the whole consequences of the act upon himself, and did not expect society to whitewash him by punishing him. I had no fear any longer that “the sacredness of human life” was likely to suffer amongst my friends from the absence of gallows and prison.

DO YOU WISH TO HELP THE SOCIALIST CAUSE?

IF YOU DO—Then join the Socialist League, or the local Socialist Society, and take your share in the work of educating the slaves of modern society to know how they may win their freedom.

Speak about Socialism in public and in private; at the club, in the local discussion society, or through the local newspapers; among your friends, acquaintances, and shopmates.

Take a few copies of the Commonweal and pamphlets weekly, and distribute them where you think they will do most good. Leaflets, too, are very useful. Insist upon your newsagent getting the Commonweal for you, and if he refuses get your other papers at another shop where they are more obliging. You might also leave a few other copies, and get him to show a bill by a little “gentle persuasion.”

Leave a Commonweal weekly on the table of your club-room, in the meeting-room of your trade society. Better still, order a supply of Commonweal from the publishing office every week, and sell them among your shopmates and the members of the societies you belong to, or leave them in the local public reading-room.

If there is no local Socialist Society, get a few sympathisers together and form a propagandist group, collect enough money amongst them to cover railway travelling expenses, and, after selecting a hall or a couple of open-air spots suitable for holding meetings, invite a speaker from one of the nearest towns, or London, to pay you a visit and publicly advocate Socialism.

Remember! it is the ignorance of the workers that alone postpones the day of the Social Revolution.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE Christian Commonwealth has a leading article anent our late excursion to the Epping Forest, and is so badly served by its reporter as to say that we went in company with Spiritualists and Secularists. As the London Secular Federation had their outing on the same day to another part of the Forest, the Freethinker is wroth with the Christian Commonwealth for asserting that they danced and drank lager beer with the Socialists, and protests the respectability of the Secularists thereby, viz., "they went by themselves, they took no beer barrels, and they conducted themselves with perfect propriety," and concludes its reference to the matter with the amusing statement, "that it is neither Secularists nor Socialists who go to Epping Forest with beer barrels, but certain German clubs."

We can assure the Freethinker that the German clubs and the English Socialists are one, and that they did take beer-barrels into the Forest. And now to our Christian foes! The malignant and lying reports which have appeared in the press in connection with this question, including that which appeared in the Christian friend of Czardom, the Pall Mall Gazette, was penned by a Christian of Loughton.

We do not believe that the Corporation will yield to the bigots, who are only a narrow clique of parsons and teetotallers in the vicinity of the Forest, who think that it was purchased at public expense to be a private pleasure for them. If we are caused any further inconvenience in our visits to the Forest by these fanatics, we will make it impossible for the Christian Gospeller to keep a single outdoor station in London, and make it generally so hot for these lugubrious saints, that they may come to the conclusion that it will be as well to go their way and to let us go ours without further molestation. Dear, Christian, pious Mr. Lindley, reporter of York Hill, Loughton, please note and—take heed!

Unity, the journal of Friendly Societies, says that they have asked questions of the Commonweal which have proved unanswerable. We have no recollection of the unanswerable question. It would be as well, perhaps, to re-state the cause of divergence between ourselves and Unity. We say that the benefit societies of the kingdom are only so many agencies in relief of the rates. When we reflect that the average length of life amongst the working-classes is 29 years and amongst the well-to-do 55 years, and that two-thirds of the sickness is caused by unhealthy homes and workshops, adulterated food, and anxiety for the morrow, we believe that the workers should do something more than buy their own medicines and coffins to save the pockets of the exploiters, and work to overthrow instead of patching up the system whereby they are deprived of health and life. Let the dead bury their dead. Unity has, however, a friendly word for the Commonweal concerning our attitude towards Stanley. F. K.

Scandals and strikes, with an occasional revolution in South America, are the most prominent features of these latter days. We have had so many aristocratic and middle-class scandals, that the students of divorce-court literature must be satiated with their favourite food. What a crop during the last five years, from Jeffries to Dunlo! What a very pious and respectable fashionable world it is! When the people who we are told to look upon by their hirelings in press and pulpit as models whom the poor may contemplate with respectful admiration, at a long distance, yet at same time the time the poor see that these "models" are continually appearing in the Divorce Court, or are "wanted" by the police, not alone for offences against morality, but for crimes so foul and ugly that you shrink from naming them, it strikes me that is rather what is commonly called an "eye-opener" to the poor.

It might be worth pointing out that revolutionary agitation has grown and increased exceedingly with every fresh disclosure of how the upper classes live. Nay, latterly fresh labour revolts, such as the dock strike, have taken place almost at the same time as the discovery of fresh vices on the part of the masters. It is evident that the people are getting sick of supplying wealth for a gang of idlers to spend in debauching their sons and daughters; and every fresh scandal which tells of the rottenness of modern society forms a stronger incitement to social revolution than the most fiery speech of any Revolutionary Socialist.

But let us leave the general question, and speak upon the latest development of "morality" among the people whose peculiar province it is to support the "Crown, Constitution, and Property," whose office it is to be, in fact, the pillars of society. By the by, commercial society must be in a bad way when its "pillars" are so rotten. Lord Arthur Somerset, Colin Campbell, Hughes Hallet, with numerous others, are weak supports to a tottering social system; and yet what we know is not a tithe of what is concealed. If Mrs. Jeffries had published her list of child-violators, we wonder how many models and virtues of respectability it would have included. If Hammond had also given the names of wealthy clients, we should be astonished by the addition of more than one illustrious criminal to the known list.

Lord Dunlo, after all, may plead in his defence that he is no worse than others of his class—those gilded butterflies who lounge at stage doors with the one object in life of buying women for the basest purposes. Nay, he might plead that he is better, for he is willing to give a higher price for his "amusement," although he deserted his wife as if it was just an ordinary case of seduction. His father was naturally shocked. If Lady Dunlo had been a victim of his son's, although she might have been the purest and most virtuous maiden, his father would have taken it as an ordinary incident in the life of a rich, idle youth. But that the heir of all the Clancartys should marry a woman of humble birth, who had not even the merit of being rich, was too much. So he sends his son out of England, leaving the wife penniless, with cool calculation that she must starve or sell herself. What nice notions "our old nobility" have of virtue, humanity, and "piety"!

But it is not the sons of the nobility alone who spend their lives in destroying your daughters, workmen; there are others also who "enjoy" life in a similar fashion. For instance, among the crowd of gilded youth, whose want of intellect is only equalled by their apish imitation of the vices of the aristocrats, are the sons of thousands of rich capitalists, whose fathers having ground heaps of wealth out of the sweat and blood of men and women, and are thus enabled to let their sons live idly upon their stolen wealth. Their tender mercies are not greater than those of the aristocracy, and were the ruling classes entirely composed of capitalists they would be quite as cruel, if not worse. If the aristocracy were swept away to-morrow, the new landowners would develop just the same vices as the old, save perhaps that they would be characterised by the petty meanness peculiar to the bourgeoisie. In America, where there is no titled aristocracy, the people find that their capitalist masters can boast of the same vices. No, the only remedy for the starvation and misery of the people, the prostitution and degradation of women, which, like a deadly cancer, are eating the life out of modern society, is to sweep away all the idle rich, whether they belong to the aristocracy or plutocracy. "War to the idlers" must be the battle-cry of the people, and surely the destruction of a Society, which is already going to pieces with its own rottenness, will be an easy task. N.

SOCIAL SONGS. By Munullog. 1s. Cloth, 2s. R. J. Derfel, Publisher, Manchester.

The practical style of this collection of songs we are unwilling to criticise, but the author is evidently an ardent Socialist. One example will give an indication of his method of versification:

"Men of Labour, with spade in hand,
Go forth to win a barren land;
And at the touch of every spade
The yielding soil sends forth a blade—
And corn and fruit and flowers fair
Wave on the surface everywhere—
At the charm of work by young and old,
Turning the deserts to fields of gold."

JOHN BULL AND HIS OTHER ISLAND. By Arthur Bennett. 1s. Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent and Co., London.

This is a narrative of visits to Ulster and Gweedore. The author is evidently one of the Respectables. The whole tone of the book is in the strain of the conversation on Irish topics one hears, when afflicted in cars or railway carriages with the presence of the British snob. The Irish are unthrifty. Emigration is a cure for their ills. We quote from page 85 as follows:

"Though it would have been an interesting experience to have seen the people and all their worldly belongings thrust out of doors, the scene would undoubtedly have had a painful aspect; and, if our curiosity was not quite fully satisfied, neither were our feelings unnecessarily harrowed."

Further on, we read of the kindness of the sheriffs, and the wickedness of the Irish people in boycotting the police and emergency men (the dastardly scoundrels) who thrust them homeless upon the roadside. We come across the "quite English you know" assertion that "If you want to reach a person's heart, the directest way is through his pocket; and this applies to much bigger children than the barefooted juveniles of Bunbeg."

HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON

The COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. BRADLAUGH AND HYNDMAN.

ANY unprejudiced listener to the debate between Messrs. Bradlaugh and Hyndman, which took place at St. James's Hall on the evening of the 23rd July, must have observed that there are various ways of gaining the confidence and sympathy of a mixed audience. Mr. Bradlaugh, in his closing remarks, described his opponent's eloquence as the "fizz of champagne," and brought forward continually against him the charge of vagueness. However, Mr. Bradlaugh himself, despite his flourish of figures and statistics, was far from explicit at times, and relied greatly upon the demagogic tricks which have often proved so serviceable upon the platform of the Hall of Science. Mr. Hyndman's opening remarks, general and cursory though they necessarily were, contained, we venture to think, some very definite statements. As for example: That the average age of the working man is 27 as against 55 for the class which does no manual labour; that while some men work 15, 18, or even 36 hours at a stretch, twenty, thirty, or even a hundred thousand are starving for lack of opportunity to earn a livelihood, and that all medical opinion testifies that a large proportion of the female population of London fall victims annually to excessive toil undertaken for insufficient wages. These oft-repeated statements may have become stale, but they are by no means "vague," nor did Mr. Bradlaugh make any attempt to disprove them. He, however, addressed himself promptly to the task of proving, "by figures," that the bulk of the textile industries of the country would be ruined at once if labour was limited to eight hours a-day, and referred to the case of the Northumberland miners, who had declared that a compulsory eight hours day applied to their county would throw thousands out of employment, besides lengthening the working day for many thousands more. At this point the speaker discarded his figures; and his statement as regards the textile industries was proved after all in the very vaguest of ways—viz., by an exhortation. "Let me ask you to consider," said Mr. Bradlaugh, "when the short hours are worked, whether it will be possible to conduct the special industry in question profitably so as to produce the money with which to pay the wages."

Now, the production of money is essentially a vague subject. Even the most statistic-loving legislators have hitherto neglected to throw much light upon it; and consequently a considerable amount of vagueness may co-exist with an extensive and impugnable use of "figures." Science tells us, and the great mass of workers have been allowed to take it for granted, that money is merely a convenient medium of exchange for the establishment of values—only this and nothing more! A mere medium of exchange money may be, in an ideal State, but we do not know of any such utopias. In every State of which we have any cognisance, and where there is money, there is violence—the existence of violence being proved, not indeed by murder and open slavery, but by the necessity laid upon some of the members either to toil or starve, and the ability of others to feast safely and remain idle. It is quite evident that this state of things would not be possible in a State where money was simply a medium of exchange, for there the standard of value would not depend upon the pleasure of any. Each would perforce have to produce the value of the money he desired to possess. There would be no laws or conditions by which he could escape this necessity. The taking away of money in order to give it again in exchange for the production of labour would be accounted, not as the right of a landlord, but as an act of violence and robbery. That ours is no such State Mr. Bradlaugh himself is careful to show us. "If more men are employed, they must be paid, consequently the cost of production must be greatly increased or the wages of those already employed must be reduced." In saying these words Mr. Bradlaugh declared that he appealed, not to revolutionary Socialists, but to "those who had brains": still, we think that even a "revolutionary Socialist" might understand from them how the standard of value of regulated, and how effectually the medium of exchange—money—may be used as a means of violence and oppression. It becomes easy, too, to understand the appeal of the Northumberland and Durham miners, who, finding that the cost of production had increased by 20 per cent. in consequence of reduced hours of labour, earnestly requested that they might be allowed to forego the extra leisure which entailed an insufficiency of food. What is not so easy to understand is that Mr. Bradlaugh should bring a charge of "vagueness" against his opponent, while he was himself speaking in such an unpardonably vague way about the "produce of money," etc. As for the textile industries, we fail to see why they should be in jeopardy. It is not the power of carrying on an industry which is called in question, but rather the power of a few men to fix the value of labour. Does this threaten trade? We cannot see that it necessarily threatens anything but capitalism. For if, as Mr. Bradlaugh complains, no one has given himself the trouble to prove that a certain number of hours of labour (for instance, eight) would be sufficient to conduct the industries of the country, that is only because the fact is proven every day by the existence of many persons who do not work at all—and who even dissipate and destroy the work of others.

Mr. Bradlaugh is a great advocate of thrift. He calls it the life and soul of the country (Thrift is always the life and soul of countries where Mammon is worshipped), but he says not a word about the reckless extravagance of supporting in affluence an absolutely unproductive class. His panegyric of thrift applies only to the few shillings which find their way into the worker's pocket. Of the great economic problem, with the extremes of wealth and poverty, he had not a word to say, except that it was inevitable! Legislation could not cope with it! We may advocate the punishment by law of companies who work their employés unreasonable hours, but we must not take any steps to determine the limit of "reasonableness!" That is to say, we may condemn unreasonable hours when we feel them to be unreasonable, but our feelings must not be interfered with in any way by positive and decisive measures. The capitalist must not be cabined, or confined, by Acts of Parliament. At this point Mr. Bradlaugh becomes "vague," and expresses a hope that his audience will not believe that an Act of Parliament can make bread spring out of the ground, or clothe the ragged, or educate the ignorant! It is to be presumed that no one present ever placed any faith in Parliament as a Supernatural Agency. The meeting was convened to debate merely whether an Act of Parliament could not insure some leisure and opportunity of education to the ignorant, while putting it within the power of men willing to cultivate the earth to enjoy some of its fruits. According to Mr. Bradlaugh, Parliament is perfectly helpless in this matter. If such be the case we can only agree with Mr. Hyndman's closing remark, that it is impossible for workmen to obtain justice from a legislature composed of landlords and capitalists. Such a legislature can represent only the will of a class, not the interests of a community. The fact that workmen are obliged to appeal to such an assembly to make laws regulating their labour, only proves how well and singly this devotion to class privilege has been maintained. The deliberations of this assembly may be extremely profound and interesting, but we are continually reminded that so far as the interests of the mass of workers in the community are concerned, they have neither point nor value.

M. McMILLEN.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF MODERN SOCIETY.

To these about the eleventh century were superadded another set of guilds, whose main object was the protection of trade, and which soon became powerful, and establishing themselves in the towns, drew together with the corporations, the freemen of the towns, and were fused with them. They shared in the degeneration of the municipal aristocracies, which reached its height in the beginning of the thirteenth century, and with them were attacked by the third and last set of guilds, whose office was the organization and protection of the handicrafts. These of course had been growing up with the growth of the towns, and the increasing capacity for production, and and at the time I mention were organized pretty completely, and embraced, I think, the whole of the handicrafts.

The greater part of the thirteenth century was taken up by the struggle between these new and quite democratic guilds, which were entirely composed of workmen; that struggle was partly a peaceable one. The municipalities could not quite keep the guilds from all participation in the government of the towns; their officers gradually crept into the corporations, and they began to influence the administration; but this peaceful revolution was supplemented by very hard fighting, especially in the north of Germany. The upshot of this double struggle was the complete victory of the workmen over the municipal aristocracies, and by the end of the thirteenth century the craft guilds, who no doubt had been fostered all along by the increasing productivity of labour, had the towns entirely in their power; but, although the municipal aristocracy had lost its privileged official position, the old families had not lost all their influence, and still formed a kind of middle-class nobility; this is exemplified clearly enough by the incidents in the struggle between the great town of Ghent and its feudal superior, the Earl of Flanders, in which men like James Van Artavelde and his sons clearly had a position akin to that of powerful rich men at the present day. The old struggle also was not forgotten; throughout the men of the mean crafts are on the revolutionary side; while the great crafts, led by the mariners, i.e., the shippers, merchants, and so on, are loyalists.

This victory of the handicraftsmen brings us to the apex of the Middle Ages. Let us therefore stop a little to contrast the condition of labour at that period with its condition under the height of the classical period, and see what it has gained. The classical period gives us a class of privileged persons actually idle as far as any good purpose goes, supporting a huge class of parasites, and an enormous pauper population fed on charity, and all this founded on the labour of mere chattel slaves, who were fed clothed and housed according to the convenience of their owners, just as beasts of burden were, but whom they had to buy with hard cash just as they had their horses and mules. There was a certain amount of labour done by freemen, or non-slaves rather, but that did not come to much, and I think we may class these few freemen among the parasites of the rich. The government of all this was aristocratic at first (tempered by the money-bag aristocracy), and at last mere absolutism founded on tax-gathering.

In the fully developed Middle Ages, on the other hand, we have a privileged class of land-holders deduced from the freemen of the conquering tribe, absolutely idle, supported by their serfs, who for their part are somewhat speedily turning into tenants, and so laying part of the foundations of the later middle-class. Between these two classes, which in the beginning of the Middle Ages were the essential constituents of society, lies the great body of the craftsmen, now gathered into towns administered by themselves, oppressed always, no doubt, legally by taxes, and often illegally by war on the part of the nobles, but free in their work except for such regulations as they have imposed on themselves, and the object of which in the main was the equitable distribution of employment, and the reward of employment throughout their whole body. Capitalism does not exist at this time; there is no great all-embracing world-market; production is for the supply of the neighbourhood, and only the surplus of it ever goes a dozen miles from the door of the worker. It must be added that every freeman has the use of land to support himself on, so that he does not depend on the caprice of the market for his bare necessities, and whether employer or employed, he neither sells himself, nor buys others, in the labour market under the rule of competition, but exchanges labour for labour directly with his neighbour, man to man and hand to hand.

Now, you will probably agree with me in thinking that this was a much better state of things for the worker than his condition under what have been called the "free peoples of antiquity," but whose freedom was confined to the rich and powerful. One other thing I note in this contrast, that whereas in the ancient world, the intelligence, the high mental qualities, which have made the ancient days so famous, came from the idle classes, who were in good sooth an aristocracy of intellect as well as of position, in the Middle Ages, the intelligence lay with the great craftsmen class,—and that again, I think, was a decided advantage, both for them and for us; since it has given us, amongst other treasures not so famous, but scarcely less glorious, the poems of Shakespear.

Now, on this high tide of mediæval life supervened two things: the Black Death, and the gradual decay of the guilds, both of which got the times ready for the next great change in the condition of labour. I will say little about the first, space not serving for it. I will only remark first, that the Statute of Labourers of Edward III., which was one consequence of it, and which has been so useful to enquirers into the condition of labour at that time, represents in the account of wages and labour-hours to be drawn from it, the state of things before the terrible plague, not after it, since it was avowedly enacted against the labourers in order to lower their wages to the standard of reward before the Black Death.

Furthermore, I must say that all antiquarians must be fully conscious of the decline in art that took place in Northern Europe, and in England especially, after the reign of Edward III. Before the middle of the fourteenth century the English were in these matters abreast with, and in some matters ahead of, the Italians, and in the art of architecture especially, produced works which have never been surpassed, and seldom equalled. By the end of the fifteenth century our arts had for the most part become rude, unfinished and barbarous, and lacking altogether in that self-respect and confidence which the arts are always full of in their fine periods.

Looking carefully at the gradual change, I conclude that the Black Death was answerable for some of this degradation, but that the main part of it was the natural consequence of the great change which was coming over society. For during the next century, a new plague invaded Europe, compared with which the slaughter of the Black Death was but a trifle. That plague was the pest of Commercialism; capitalism aided by bureaucracy and nationalism, began to show itself, and took away from labour the hope of a happy life on the earth.

At the end of the fourteenth century, there were no journeymen in the guilds; every worker in them was certain to become a master if he only did his duty fairly; and the master was not the master in our sense of the word, he was the man who had learned his craft thoroughly, and could teach the apprentices their business, and all sorts of restrictions were laid on him to prevent his becoming a capitalist, i.e., forcing men as good as himself to pay him for his privilege of providing them with work. But in the early days of the fifteenth century the journeyman began to appear; there were men in the workshops who were known as "servants," and, who though necessarily affiliated to the guild, and working under its regulations, would never become crafts-masters. They were few and unimportant enough, but they grew in numbers, till, e.g., about 1480 the non-guildsmen of the merchant-tailors in London attempted to form a guild under the old craft guild, just as those latter had formed their guilds under the trades guilds. In this attempt they failed, showing thereby how the times were changing, and how employment for profit was raising its hideous head. This falling of the craft guilds from their old simplicity of equality, was doubtless a token rather than a cause of the change. Capitalism was advancing from other directions. The productivity of labour was increasing, though slowly; more wealth was being produced, and men's greedy desires grew with it. The landed nobility began to see how they might recover their losses in war, and become as rich in relation to other people as they had been when the latter were so poor; and they were no longer contented, as they once were obliged to be, to live on the rents of their land, whether those rents were the enforced service of serfs, or the money rent of tenants, both limited by the custom of the manor. The Peasants Rebellion in England had foiled them in their attempt to rack-rent their tenants, growing prosperous, by forcing them to pay serfs' services on villeinage tenures as well as tenant's rent. But no matter; in spite of the high wages and comfort of the craftsmen and yeomen, they were the powerful people, since they were the makers and interpreters of the laws, and since the meetings round the Shire Oak and the folkmotes of the freemen of the Hundred, and other such direct local assemblies, had been swallowed up in the representative assembly, the central parliament, the King's taxing machine. So they set to work to steal, not a purse here, or a bale of goods there, or the tolls of a market in another place; but the very life and soul of the community, the land of the country, which was of the more importance, as in those days no direct rent could be got out of anything save the land. They got the yeomen and tenants off the land by one means or another; legal quibbling, direct cheating, down-right violence; and so got hold of the lands and used their produce, not for the livelihood of themselves and their retainers, but for profit. The land of England, such of it as was used for cultivation, had been mostly tillage where tillage was profitable; it was the business of the land thieves to turn this tillage into pasture for the sake of the sheep, i.e., the wool for exportation. This game not only drove the yeoman and tenant off the land, but the labourer also, since, as More says "Many sheep and one shepherd now take the place of many families." As a result, not only was a pauper population created, but the towns were flooded by crowds of the new free labourers, whom the guilds, grown corrupt, were ready to receive as journeymen. The huckstering landlord and the capitalist farmer drove the workman into the hands of the new manufacturing capitalist, and a middle-class of employers of labour was created, the chief business of whose fathers was to resist the rich, and the business of whose sons was to oppress the poor.

(To be concluded).

MODERN RADICALS.—There is a class of revolutionists named Girondins, whose fate in history is remarkable enough! Men who rebel or urge others to rebel, ought to have other than formulas to go upon. Men who discern in the misery of the toiling, complaining millions not misery, but only a raw material which can be wrought upon and traded in, for one's own poor hide-bound theories and egoisms; to whom millions of living human creatures, with beating hearts in their bosoms, beating, suffering, hoping, are "masses," mere "explosive masses for blowing down Bastilles with," for voting at hustings for us: such men are of the questionable species.—Carlyle: 'Chartism.'

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Strike on Channel Steamers.

Last Tuesday, July 29th, the blacklegs engaged on the steamer 'Wave' were attacked by the firemen and stokers on strike. For a time the police were helpless, but in the end with their assistance the blacklegs were enabled to get upon the vessel. On Saturday sixteen firemen and stokers were charged before the Dover magistrates with "disobeying the captain's orders," under the Merchant Shipping Acts. Of course they were found guilty, and a fine of £5 5s. was imposed. Notice of appeal was given.

Crisis in South Wales.

Affairs look very serious, as the strike and lock-out of 150,000 men threatens to entirely paralyse trade in the district. The colliery proprietors are banking their coal, and on the Cardiff Exchange absolutely no business has been done during the past week. The railway-men, despite the determined hostility of the railway directors, have shown themselves marvellously moderate, and have made a final offer to submit all points in dispute to Lord Brassey or Lord Aberdare. Surely this tribunal should commercial and aristocratic for even railway directors.

Strike at Crosse and Blackwell's.

A strike broke out on Thursday July 31st at Crosse and Blackwell's pickling factory, East Ham, when the women, to the number of 400, who are employed in skinning and cleaning onions for pickling came out for an increase of pay. They have been paid 8½d. for tub of seven quarts, but now demand 1s. 3d. The women have joined a union, and are very determined.

The Postmen.

As we expected, the postmen have got rid of their secretary Mr. Mahon, who has "resigned." Mark Burke, a postman from Notting Hill, has been appointed an "interim secretary, till a proper election by ballot can be made." The "executive" of the Postmen's Union is also going after its secretary. It is a pity both did not go long ago. All subscriptions for the benefit of the out of work postmen, many of whom are in deep distress, should be sent to W. Saunders, Palace Chambers, Westminster. N.

CHRISTIAN MISSIONS AND INDIAN MORALITY.

The Behar Herald of June 28th, says, "Christian missionaries are sent to India at an enormous cost by the English people, under a mistaken notion that the Indian people are 'savages' and have no religion of their own, and to 'reclaim' them by converting to Christianity will be an act of humanity. But the efforts of the Christian missionaries in India have proved to be a failure." The Behar Herald further quotes from the Tablet, which paper remarking on the "newly published official reports about the material and moral conditions of natives in India," says, "It appears from the figures that not alone do we, by converting the natives to our belief, decidedly lower their moral status, but the standpoint of their natural morality is so high that, although they become Christians, we cannot make them so immoral as we ourselves are. The figures, which show the comparative moral status among the different classes, are as follows: Europeans, 1 of 274; Native Christians, 1 of 709; Hindoos, 1 of 1,361; Eurasians, 1 of 509; Mahomedans, 1 of 856; and Buddhists, 1 of 3,787. The last figure is a tribute to the noble purity of Buddhism, but the statistics impart to us here at home another teaching—that as regards our social life, we would do better if we for a generation or two contributed our superfluous pennies and our energies to the moral improvement of our own countrymen, in place of trying to destroy the morality and religion of other people, people who in truth could send us their missionaries to convert us."

Whenever any canting and hypocritical humbug is about to make a collection in any church or chapel for the avowed object of destroying the morality of the natives of India, a few copies of this issue of the Commonweal judiciously distributed among the congregation would have a beneficial effect by limiting the funds raised for these immoral purposes. People also who have robbed the poor of this country, and done their best to morally degrade them; people who figure conspicuously as supporters of missions, should also have the enormity of their crimes pointed out to them. I therefore trust our comrades will send copies of this issue to these notorious criminals of bad repute. A. BROOKES.

GLADSTONE AND THE LABOUR MOVEMENT.—Mr. Gladstone has never been able to thoroughly free himself from the traditions and prejudices of his class, though as a political leader he has been hurried forward by events and partisan exigencies into a position far in advance of them. Hence the inconsistency between his policy in dealing with Irish landlordism and his solicitude for the fate of capitalism in what he regards as the remote contingency of labour getting the upper hand. Despite his famous epigram of "the classes and the masses," his ideal is evidently a society of grades and ranks—a capitalistic caste living in idleness on investments or profits, and a labouring class indoctrinated with the idea that the tribute levied by these favoured ones is just and legitimate. He very greatly misjudges the aim and spirit of the labour movement, however, if he imagines that in the "indefinitely remote" contingency of labour's ascendancy any religious or economic scruples will restrain the workers from destroying, root and branch, the entire capitalistic system. The Tory of the old school, who opposes popular education and would keep the masses ignorant so that they may be willing slaves, is a far wiser and more practical man than the "Liberal" of the Gladstone type, who wants to see the people educated, intelligent and politically free, and yet fancies that when they reach this point they will respect politico-economical traditions and continue to toil patiently and amass fortunes for the favoured few. Popular intelligence means death to capitalism.—Journal of the Knights of Labour.

JAMAICA AND SOCIALISM.

THE Jamaica labour question, at the present time, is somewhat interesting to Socialists. The march of the workers towards Socialism has thrown the English and Jewish exploiters of the negroes into "a dreadful state of excitement." The editor of the Jamaica Gleaner—owned by Jews—in a leader says:

"We are thrown into a feverish state of excitement when we are told that these fiendish individuals (Anarchists and Fenians, Socialists, and the wild and reckless members of the extreme Labour Party) have threatened to take the life of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. A note addressed to the Prince of Wales, containing the words 'Give us bread if you would reign,' and signed 'Thousands of Starving Englishmen,' is said to have been found in the courtyard of Marlborough House. But this is not all. They also want to take—and take it they will if they are allowed the opportunity—the life of England's Premier, the Marquis of Salisbury. News such as this is sufficient to, and has doubtless, thrown Jamaica and the whole world into a dreadful state of excitement."¹

Say, friends, is "the whole world" still moving? What does this hysterical verbiage mean? Does it arise from the effects of a tropical sun on a weak brain, or is it the villain's paid part this man has to play in the drama of Duping the Dunces? If the former, he ought to be secured at once as a special attraction to the Jamaica Exhibition of 1891. "Hi! ho! People of the whole world, throw off your dreadful state of excitement at the fates of Wales and Salisbury by coming here to see the man in a feverish state of excitement conducting a daily paper on business principles! His excitement is for a consideration." Now, as it is more than likely that the cause of this hysterical editor's "feverish," and the alleged "whole world's dreadful," "excitement" originated in a simple practical joke of some of the Prince's pals or the scullery-maids' young men, than in threats of labour leaders. But happily the reason is to be found in the same sheet as the nauseous froth of his fit.

It appears that the negroes of Jamaica are showing signs of a determination not to be any longer mere machines for the making of money, and they are beginning in Socialist fashion to protest against being stolen from. Strikes have hitherto been unnecessary in Jamaica, because the principal industry is agriculture. In place of strikes, the labourer can withdraw from hired employment and cultivate as much for himself as satisfies all his wants. This the negro labourers have done, and now the planters call upon the Government to assist them by acquiring labour from abroad—East Indian coolies. This was done for a considerable period; but as the expenses came out of the revenue, to which the working negroes were contributors, they very naturally objected to being taxed to provide against themselves the means of competition in the labour market. Now, the money-mongers who annex profits and interest affect to see a reasonableness in the negroes' arguments and actions so far, but when the negroes only work for enough to supply their own wants and do not extend their enterprise to permit of the money-monger operating on the surplus balance, then it is alleged the negroes are acting unrighteously. The Jamaica negroes have somehow come to distinguish between the value of the product of their labour and the rate of wages, and because the latter cannot rise to the former and provide also all the perquisites to the parasites who will not work, the negroes prefer—on business principles, be it observed—to stick to their product and work no more than is necessary for their needs. The "business-principle" men are consequently hoist with their own petard.

The negroes have grasped one central fact—viz., a sufficient livelihood is enough. They have no desire to be possessed of that they cannot themselves personally use, and what they cannot use belongs to their neighbour. This contentedness will bring them through, and all such interested piping as our hysterical hireling indulges in will not induce them to dance to his money-mongers' tune—viz., "The more a man works the greater becomes not only his employer's success, but his own prosperity." They laugh at such pipers, and say, "When cockroach make feast, him no invite fowl," or "Fowl be ever so drunk, him no invite fox to dance." The negroes have apparently got beyond their would-be teachers and advisers in their theory of wages. This editor, in feverish excitement, says: "Ere concluding, we very much regret to have to admit that a great many of the Jamaica workmen do not perform the amount of labour which their employers reasonably expect." With "reasonably" deleted, that sentence states a fact, for the wages paid are not what the negroes reasonably expect. "Reasonably" belongs rightly to the last sentence, for the negroes strive only to render to Cæsar his due.

The march and acceptance of Socialist ideas is what causes the "feverish" and "dreadful" state of excitement in the Jew's office in Jamaica, as it does in the same class throughout "the whole world." It has the same effect on them as the Communists' notice, "All Thieves will be Hanged" is said to have had on a famous Jew in Paris, who fled when he saw it. This brilliant Jamaica editor in his assumed terror shrieks "when labour is in the ascendant, and when Mr. Cunningham Graham is the leader of the dominant party in the State we may look for violence on a scale which shall be to all past violence as the French Revolution is to Trafalgar Square." Our feverish one wrings his hands and weeps over the conflict of capital and labour, which, as he says, "is the result of a natural law, and can never be brought to a permanent settlement." "It is heartily to be wished," he says, "that the working-classes had many such counsellors as Sir Michael Hicks-Beach and Mr. Charles Bradlaugh" (sic), and "If these two classes (employer and employed) were left to adjust their difficulties without extraneous interference, those differences would be adjusted on business principles, that is to say according to the laws which regulate demand and supply; but, unfortunately, a political spirit of a debased character known as Socialism has been introduced into the dispute, etc." Awful, isn't it?

Hence these bad nicknames, foul calumnies, and feverish excitements "in Jamaica" and "the whole world." The negroes of Jamaica sit and sing under their palm-trees, contented because they have raised sufficient yarns for their needs and gathered sufficient mangoes for their indulgences, and while they dance to their shadows in the moonlight, the money-mongers of Jamaica and the market manipulators of the whole world can be "feverish" and "dreadful" in their excitement at the negroes' obliviousness to commercial enterprise. What do they care, they live, and that is enough.

GEORGE McLEAN.

¹ We think the editor must be insane, as we have heard nothing yet of this alarming note, and we are rather nearer Marlborough House than the editor of a Jamaica newspaper.—EDS.

SOCIALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

MANCHESTER.

ALTHOUGH we cannot give such a glowing report of progress during the past month as some of our friends, yet our record is fairly satisfactory. We have held good meetings every Sunday at Phillip's Park, Stevenson Square, and Higher Cheetham Street, besides our usual ones at the outside villages—Middleton on Saturday night and Blackley on Monday nights. We have also sent speakers to Heywood and to Crumpsell, and intend keeping these stations on, while we are also making attempts to get a footing in Hyde and other surrounding places where the gospel of human freedom and equality has not yet been spread. We held a large demonstration in Stevenson Square on June 15th, to protest against conferring the freedom of the city on H. M. Stanley, our comrade W. P. Parker (of London) being present, which was very successful. John Ward also addressed a good meeting the following Sunday, and we have had a fairly good sale of literature during the month, so that we have done much to stir up sleepy Lancashire considering the small number of active members. We have also been considerably enlivened lately by our "active and intelligent" blue-coats. Thinking that there could be no harm in "obstructing" a thoroughfare without any traffic, and where the Salvation Army hold their meetings and howl and beat the big drum every Saturday night, we thought we might occupy the same place on Sunday evenings. Alas! for our socialistic innocence! On Sunday, July 6th, the speaker, Barton, was interrupted in his harangue by the voice of authority, which ordered him to stop. This, of course, was not done, and the result was a summons to appear in court on July 17th. This was dismissed on a technical point, the minion of law-'n'-order not having the intelligence to put the name of the right street down; result, a fresh summons, which ended in 5s. fine and costs, the magistrate informing our comrade that what other bodies did had nothing to do with the matter, that where there was a crowd there must be obstruction, presumably whether there was traffic or not, and that the police knew their duties without any one telling them. We, however, intend to continue holding the meetings in spite of the law and the police, and we trust that it will not be long before law, magistrate, and police have vanished, and a free life be possible for all men.

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

OFFICES: 24, GREAT QUEEN ST., LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, W.C.

The Offices of the Socialist League will be open for the sale of Commonweal and all other Socialist publications from 8.30 a.m. to 9 p.m. every day except Sunday. The Secretary will be in attendance from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m. daily.

Branch Subscriptions Paid.—1890:—North Kensington, to end of April.

Glasgow, Oxford, Hammersmith, 'Commonweal' Branch, Manchester, and Norwich, to end of May. Leicester, North London, and Yarmouth, to end of June. East London, to end of July. Streatham, to end of December.

(Branch Secretaries will please send with remittances for Capitations the number of their membership.)

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Funds are urgently needed for special work in connection with Propaganda. These funds will be used at the discretion of the Propaganda Committee, and to prevent confusion all money must be sent to Secretary of Propaganda Committee, at 24, Great Queen Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C., and will be acknowledged by him the Weal.
D. J. NICOLL, Sec. to Propaganda Committee.

REPORTS.

ABERDEEN.—At conference of the Branch held on 28th ult. very little was done, but at the adjourned meeting to be held to-night (Monday) probably some headway will be made. On Saturday night a splendid meeting was addressed in Castle Street by W. Cooper, Rennie, and Leatham—the latter replying to a number of good questions at close. Over a gross of pamphlets were sold, besides Commonweal and Justice, which about represents our average weekly sale during the past two months of open-air work. Judging by Aberdeen and Dundee, we should say that a distinct "boom" is setting in in the revolutionary movement. The many unsuccessful strikes that are occurring have the effect of turning men's minds to Socialism as the only thing that will do.—L.

LEEDS.—On Sunday last we held three good meetings, at which Samuels and Sollit spoke; 3½ quires of Commonweal sold and many pamphlets, besides 3s. 8d. collected.—H. S.

SHEFFIELD.—The propaganda here is being carried on with the same vigour as in the past. On Sunday, July 20th, H. Samuels (of Leeds) paid us a visit. The Sunday following, July 27th, C. Reynolds (of Hull), and on Sunday last, R. Unwin (Chesterfield) spoke for us. Among local comrades, Bullas, Kent, May, Palfreyman, Robinson, Smith, Charles, Cores, R. and J. Bingham have been actively at work in the propaganda. Our literature sales do not diminish, and during the month we have opened up a new station at Attercliffe, a suburb of the town.—F. C.

EDINBURGH—SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—We had good meetings at Leith and on the Meadows on Sunday, addressed by comrades Hamilton, Pearson, Ritchie, Smith, Bell, and Mackenzie. On the Meadows we encountered some opposition from one known to the "Evening Squeak" readers as "Burniewin," who has evidently trusted too much to the second-hand bookstalls for his knowledge of economics. Needless to say, those who took him in hand made very short work of him.—W. D. T.

ANTI-PARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCE.

THE Conference of Revolutionary Societies passed off with the most remarkable success. The utmost enthusiasm was shown by all present, and the occasion will long be remembered by all London Revolutionists. A full report of the speeches, etc., will appear in next week's Commonweal. We have only to say that the Conference has given us all fresh vigour and determination for the work that stands before us.

An Appeal.—Comrade Lessner appeals to us on behalf of A. Weiler, who, with his wife and three children, is in a terrible condition of poverty. Weiler is an old veteran in the Revolutionary Cause, who has worked in the Continental movement for twenty years, from the beginning of the International Workingmen's Association. Help is most urgently needed, and should be sent to the Secretary of the Communist Working Men's Club, 49 Tottenham Street, Tottenham Court Road, W.C., or to F. Lessner, 12 Fitzroy Street, Fitzroy Square.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome.
Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries.
There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

THE LABOUR WAR IN WALES.

MORE depends upon the conflict that is now raging in South Wales than a careless observer might imagine. It is not alone a battle between the South Wales railway men and the rich railway company, it is really a fight between the railway companies and railway workers of Britain. South Wales has been chosen as the battle-field, and that is all. If the railway company is beaten, every one of these rich corporations in England, Wales, and Scotland may look forward to reduced dividends. If the men are defeated it may be the Sedan of the New Unionism, and the Norwoods and Liveseys may rejoice, for Labour will be once more a crushed slave beneath their feet. No wonder, then, that all who love the people are looking with so much interest to South Wales.

But there is another reason why Socialists should be interested in this Great Strike. If capitalists have united against labour, then on the other hand labour stands in serried ranks against capital. Sympathy is universal among the workers with the strikers. The dockers will not take coal from blackleg railway men, and the miners on their side not only will not dig coal, but they threaten that they will prevent by main force the running of trains by blacklegs. What with the men on strike, and the miners and the dockers who are locked out, the strike is practically a general one. This fact has been recognised even by the scribes of the capitalist press. The Weekly Dispatch, among other capitalist newspapers, has pointed this out. It says:

"Another point to be noted is this. The Welsh strike for the moment simply paralysed the life of the community. And why? Because it was a case where labour operated not merely by one combination, but by a combination of combinations, and because it contrived to neutralise the blackleg. The strikers first shut up the seaport of the district, and then strangled its railway system. If that were done in London—and it can be done—we leave it to our readers to say what would happen within twenty-four hours. The alternative would be surrender or civil war, and the sooner this ugly fact is faced the better."

We do not think that a General Strike even in London would involve civil war, because we do not know who would do the fighting on the part of the capitalist classes. With outbreaks among the soldiers in our garrison towns, and with a fierce discontent among them, of which these revolts are only the outward symptoms, it will not do for fat railway directors and other sweaters to rely too much on their army. As for the police they would simply, to use a graphic Americanism, be "chawed up" in the event of a popular outbreak. Robert knows this, and he will if he is a sensible man take care to be out of the way when trouble comes. We fear that so great is the unpopularity of the force, that a blue uniform would be a certain passport to Paradise. Of course, we would not insult the "respectable" police by hinting that they would be sent anywhere else by a revolutionary mob. Therefore, provoking general strikes by "smashing unions" is not to be such a safe amusement as some capitalists appear to think. Let them listen to the words of wisdom of the Weekly Dispatch again:

"Moreover, do people know what the effect of 'smashing up unionism' must be? As Professor Lugo Brentano, of Breslau, told the Germans in his great work on English guilds, nothing but the trades union stands between England and the social revolution."

What do you think of that, ye Norwoods and Liveseys? The Dispatch, and other papers that have said the same thing, are right, but it will not be the social revolution of legality that these people are forcing on. Do you know what you are doing, you rich respectable gentlemen of the middle classes? When unions are smashed, what will happen then? Will the workers sink into the old condition of miserable slavery? Are the "resources of civilisation" exhausted when the unions are defeated? Do you know what you are doing?—you are provoking, not the Red, but the Black Terror. You are putting the torch into the hands of the incendiary to fire your mansions; you are urging on the masses to use those dread forces which the science of your civilisation has placed in their hands; you are whetting the sword for your own slaughter. That is what you are doing, gentlemen of the middle classes.

There is one thing which strikes us particularly in this crisis in South Wales—how much more advanced the men are than their leaders. Mr. Harford, the delegate of the men, accepts a compromise. The men, knowing their own business better than any trade-union leader, reject Mr. Harford's compromise, and stick to their original terms. But it has been reserved for William Abraham (Mabon) to treat the public to an exhibition of unexampled cowardice and treachery. He and two other gentlemen have issued a disgraceful document, in which they recommend the miners to let the company run the trains with their blacklegs, knowing well all the time that it is only the fear of having every bone in their bodies broken by the stalwart miners of Rhondda Valley that has kept shoals of blacklegs out of the district. We advise the miners not to follow this cowardly and treacherous advice. All the gentlemen who signed that document—we give their names, it is right that they should be remembered: William Abraham (Mabon), M.P.; William Evans (miners' agent); T. Pascoe Jenkins (president of the Rhondda Labour and Liberal Association, Pentre)—are in the pay of the Liberal party, a party that has always sold and betrayed the people. For all we know, they may be in the employ of the railway directors. We therefore advise the miners not to let a single train pass along the line manned by blacklegs. If the miners do, the treachery of Messrs. Abraham and Co. will be successful and the railway men will be defeated.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. XXV.—STILL UP THE THAMES.

As we went down to the boat next morning, Walter could not quite keep off the subject of last night, though he was more hopeful than he had been then, and seemed to think that if the unlucky homicide could not be got to go over-sea, he might at any rate go and live somewhere in the neighbourhood pretty much by himself; at any rate, that was what he himself had proposed. To Dick, and I must say to me also, this seemed a strange remedy; and Dick said as much. Quoth he:

"Friend Walter, don't set the man brooding on the tragedy by letting him live alone. That will only strengthen his idea that he has committed a crime, and you will have him killing himself in good earnest."

Said Clara: "I don't know. If I may say what I think of it, it is that he had better have his fill of gloom now, and, so to say, wake up presently to see how little need there has been for it; and then he will live happily afterwards. As for his killing himself, you need not be afraid of that; for, from all you tell me, he is really very much in love with the woman; and to speak plainly, until his love is satisfied, he will not only stick to life as tightly as he can, but will also make the most of every event of his life—will, so to say, hug himself up in it; and I think that this is the real explanation of his taking the whole matter with such an excess of tragedy."

Waiter looked thoughtful, and said: "Well, you may be right; and perhaps we should have treated it all more lightly; but you see, guest" (turning to me), "such things happen so seldom, that when they do happen we cannot help being much taken up with it. For the rest, we are all inclined to excuse our poor friend for making us so unhappy on the ground that he does it out of an exaggerated respect for human life and its happiness. Well, I will say no more about it; only this, will you give me a cast up stream, as I want to look after a lonely habitation for the poor fellow, since he will have it so, and I hear that there is one which would suit us very well on the downs beyond Streatley; so if you will put me ashore there I will walk up the hill and look to it."

"Is the house in question empty?" said I.

"No," said Walter, "but the man who lives there will go out of it, of course, when he hears that we want it. You see, we think that the fresh air of the downs and the very emptiness of the landscape will do our friend good."

"Yes," said Clara, smiling, "and he will not be so far from his beloved that they cannot easily meet if they have a mind to—as they certainly will."

This talk had brought us down to the boat, and we were presently afloat on the beautiful broad stream, Dick driving the prow swiftly through the windless water of the early summer morning, for it was not yet six o'clock. We were at the lock in a very little time; and as we lay rising and rising on the in-coming water, I could not help wondering that my old friend the pound-lock, and that of the very simplest and most rural kind, should hold its place there; so I said:

"I have been wondering, as we have passed lock after lock, that you people, so prosperous as you are, and especially since you are so anxious for pleasant work to do, have not invented something which would get rid of this clumsy business of going up-stairs by means of these rude contrivances."

Dick laughed. "My dear friend," said he, "as long as water has the clumsy habit of running down hill, I fear we must humour it by going up-stairs when we have our faces turned from the sea. And really I don't see why you should fall foul of Maple-durham lock, which I think a very pretty place."

There was no doubt about the latter assertion, I thought, as I looked up at the overhanging boughs of the great trees, with the sun coming glittering through the leaves, and listened to the song of the summer blackbirds as it mingled with the sound of the backwater near us. So not being able to say why I wanted the locks away—which, indeed, I didn't do at all—I held my peace. But Walter said—

"You see, guest, this is not an age of inventions. The last epoch did all that for us, and we are now content to use such of their inventions as we find handy, and leaving those alone which we don't want. I believe, as a matter of fact, that some time ago (I can't give you a date) some elaborate machinery was used for the locks, though people didn't go so far as to try to make the water run up hill. However, it was troublesome, I suppose, and the simple hatches, and the gates with a big counterpoising beam, were found to answer every purpose, and were easily mended when wanted with material always to hand: so here they are, as you see."

"Besides," said Dick, "this kind of lock is pretty, as you can see; and I can't help thinking that your machine-lock, winding up like a watch, would have been ugly and would have spoiled the look of the river: and that is surely reason enough for keeping such locks as these. Good-bye, old fellow!" said he to the lock, as he pushed us out through the now open gates by a vigorous stroke of the boat-hook. "May you live long, and have your green old age renewed for ever!"

On we went; and the water had the familiar aspect to me of the days before Pangbourne had been thoroughly cocknified, as I have seen it. It (Pangbourne) was distinctly a village still—i.e., a definite group of houses, and as pretty as might be. The beech-woods still covered the hill that rose above Basildon; but the flat fields beneath them were much more populous than I remembered them, as there were five large houses in sight, very carefully designed so as not to hurt the character of the country. Down on the green lip of the river, just where the water turns toward the Goring and Streatley reaches, were half a dozen girls playing about on the grass. They hailed us as we were about passing them, as they noted that we were travellers, and we stopped a minute to talk with them. They had been bathing, and were light clad and bare footed, and were bound for the meadows on the Berkshire side, where the haymaking had begun. At first nothing would content them but we must go with them into the hayfield, and breakfast with them; but Dick put forward his theory of beginning the hay-harvest higher up the water, and not spoiling my pleasure therein by giving me a taste of it elsewhere, and they gave way, though unwillingly. In revenge they asked me a great many questions about the country I came from and the manners of life there, which I found rather puzzling to answer; and doubtless what answers I did give were puzzling enough to them. I noticed both with these pretty girls and with everybody else we met, that in default of serious news, such as we had heard at Maple-durham, they were eager to discuss all the little details of life: the weather, the hay-crop, the last new house, the plenty or lack of such and such birds, and so on; and they talked of these things not in a fatuous and conventional way, but as taking, I say, real interest in them. Moreover, I found that the women knew as much about all these things as the men: could name a flower, and knew its qualities; could tell you the habitat of such and such birds and fish, and the like.

It is almost strange what a difference this intelligence made in my estimate of the country life of that day; for it used to be said in past times, and on the whole truly, that outside their daily work country people knew little of the country, and at least could tell you nothing about it; while here were these people as eager about all the goings on in the fields and woods and downs as if they had been Cockneys newly escaped from the tyranny of bricks and mortar.

I may mention as a detail worth noticing that not only did there seem to be a great many more birds about of the non-predatory kind, but their enemies the birds of prey were also commoner. A kite hung over our heads as we passed Medmenham yesterday; magpies were quite common in the hedgerows; I saw several sparrow-hawks, and I think a merlin; and now just as we were passing the pretty bridge which had taken the place of Basildon railway-bridge, a couple of ravens croaked above our boat, as they sailed off to the higher ground of the downs. I concluded from all this that the days of the game-keeper were over, and did not even need to ask Dick a question about it.

SOCIALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

NOTTINGHAM.

WE are still pegging away in Nottingham. On Sunday July 6, our comrade Proctor spoke twice—in Sneinton Market in the morning on "Quack Remedies for Poverty"; in the evening, in the Great Market Place, on "The Historical Development of Trade Unions." On Sunday July 13, comrade W. K. Hall, of Manchester, visited us, and gave three addresses in his excellent style before good audiences, our comrade Peacock silencing some working-men politicians who were giving some opposition on the temperance question. On Sunday July 20th comrade Andrew Hall, of Chesterfield, gave three stirring addresses to very large audiences. He created great interest by the way in which he spoke of gaining our object by any means. He advocated the same methods in defence of our cause as were used against us. We are expecting some lively meetings when our comrade again visits us, which he has promised to do in a few weeks' time. On Sunday July 27th no meetings were held, our members having the annual picnic, the place chosen this year being Naughton, on the borders of Charnwood Forest. The weather was all that could be desired, and we all spent a most enjoyable day, rambling amongst the bracken and foxgloves, mounting the rocks, and trespassing in the woods in defiance of Law-'n'-order, arriving in Nottingham about 11 p.m. On Sunday August 3rd our comrade Harry Carless, of Walsall, visited us again, and spoke in his usual eloquent and able manner, his addresses producing a great impression on capital audiences. Last night, August 9, comrade Proctor assisted at the first meeting held in Derby by the Midland Counties Socialist Federation, a splendid start in preaching Socialism being made, this being the first Socialist meeting held in this town. During the past month we have increased the sale of the Commonweal at our meetings, also having disposed of a number of pamphlets, especially the "Rights of Labour," "Monopoly," and "True and False Society." We have also had good collections. Although this is not such a glowing report as has been made by some of our comrades, we consider it a very satisfactory one, and hope to produce better results in the future by dint of hard work and preaching the cause in season and out of season. Our lecturers for the ensuing month are Mowbray, Bingham, Leonard Hall, George Cores, and Miss Lupton. A. CLIFTON.

LEICESTER.

UNDER the auspices of the Leicester Branch of the S.L. and the Midland Counties Socialist Federation, meetings have been held at the villages of Oadby, Ansty, and Wigston, and the towns of Loughborough and Derby. These meetings have been addressed by comrades Chambers, Taylor, Proctor, Barclay, Purcell, and Mowbray, of London. Notwithstanding that it has been Bank Holiday week, and money must necessarily be scarce, we have sold a very large quantity of literature. The meeting in Derby was to me a great surprise. Some 2,000 people answered the announcement made on the posters and handbills, and gathered early in the Market Place in order to hear what Socialism is. There was little or no opposition worth mentioning, and about 15s. worth of literature was sold by our Nottingham comrades and the Leicester Branch; £1 0s. 3d. was collected towards expenses. This is the first meeting that has been held in Derby, and to my mind the results only prove more conclusively than ever the need for more country propaganda. Owing to the rain, our meeting at Russell Square, Leicester, was shorter than usual; but, as if to make up for the loss in the morning, a very large meeting indeed was held in Humberstone Gate. Mowbray spoke out strongly and vigorously, and after his address was finished the audience kept up a discussion until 11 p.m. Filled by the spirit of emulation, our Leicester comrades are intent on entering the lists with the comrades of Sheffield, whose work recently shows what metal they are made of. The sale of literature in Leicester has been for the week about 8s., and 9s. 4d. has been collected towards expenses. I have been compelled to promise the Nottingham comrades that I will give Nottingham a turn as soon as possible. I can safely say that everything shows me that if we only work hard at our propaganda as Socialists, we shall make better headway than we have done before. Three hearty cheers for the Social Revolution is the greeting we send from the Midlands. C. W. M.

'COMMONWEAL.'—On Sunday, August 10th, Miss Lupton and McGinn held a good meeting at Hyde Park, and collected 3s. 7d. In our hall, A. Brookes addressed fair audience on "Labour."

STREATLEY.—At Fountain on Sunday night, a short but interesting meeting was held, interesting on account of interference by the law-'n'-order lads, short on account of a heavy pour of rain; Gospellers on the path and Revolutionary Socialists on their track, makes it necessary for "pass along, please" to the respectably-dressed crowd and "get away here" to the underpaid groaning worker; our purpose was served, however, and a good meeting was held.

ABERDEEN.—At adjourned Conference held on Monday, August 4th, among a good deal of other business, a set of rules for the regulations of branch business was gone over, amended, and adopted. On Tuesday and Wednesday nights new ground was broken at the Quayside, good meetings being addressed there by Duncan, Atkinson, and Leatham. At Castle Street on Saturday night, W. Cooper and Leatham spoke to the usual large crowd. At Sunday night meeting (indoors) a paper on "German Railways" was read and discussed.—L.

GLASGOW.—Last week we had a visit from comrade R. S. Bingham (of Sheffield), who was taking a holiday in Scotland. Bingham, who gave us a cheering account of the progress of the Cause in Sheffield, spoke at mid-day on Jail Square, and in the evening at Paisley Road Toll; Glasier and Joe Burgoyne also spoke.

NOTES ON NEWS.

UNDER the heading "Chickens Coming Home to Roost," our American contemporary, The Rights of Labour, after quoting the remarks in the Commonweal re the disposition to humbug the Socialist Cause by bogus ories, says "The error lies in so persistently insisting that reliance must be placed in the State." Pray where does the anonymous writer of this refreshing piece of news hail from? Has any of the U.S.A. lunatic asylums been depleted of an inmate who has found employment on the staff of the Rights of Labour, and written the notice regarding the Commonweal?

Such mis-quotations and mis-representations are part of the burden we sufferingly have to bear, because the advocates of soup-kitchens and parochialism in this country persist in waving red flags and calling themselves Socialists. I suppose that this sort of thing must be endured as patiently as it can be, until these folk reach their haven of rest in the den of thieves at Westminster, and if we let them make laws for us. But we expected better things of our American contemporary than to be classed with the mob who are striving to be our future masters.

F. K.

It is just as well to give our readers a word of warning. There is a danger that many honest and enthusiastic Socialists may be deceived by the pretended zeal of certain capitalist newspapers in the cause of the workers, and may take advice given by them as coming from thoroughly honest sources. If the workmen knew, however, who was behind these papers their confidence might not be given so generously.

Take, for instance, the Star. It is not Messrs. Parke and Massingham, who we believe are both thoroughly honest in their Socialist Radicalism, who really direct the policy of that paper, but it is Professor Stuart who in reality sets the pace. And who is Professor Stuart? He is the son-in-law of Mr. Colman, who owns the big mustard works at Norwich, and who has made an immense fortune out of the labour of men, boys, and girls, not always, if common report is true, paying the most magnificent wages. Professor Stuart is also the boon friend and trusted political agent of Mr. Gladstone! Do you smell a rat, gentle reader? Does it not seem rather probable that the "advanced" tone of the Star is only assumed by direction of the Grand Old Sham himself, who wants the workmen's votes for the next General Election?

This opens up a fruitful field of conjecture, but I leave this alone, as it was not this that I meant particularly to refer to. We were told the Star was going to be as "advanced" as ever. But the Star has not gone back to its old form. During several periods of crisis in the labour movement recently the paper has become suddenly wonderfully moderate,—during which periods people have laughed and said Stuart was getting frightened. Now, can any man put his confidence in a paper that is under the control of a hired hack of the official Liberal gang, who are without exception the worst enemies of the working class?

I have no love for the Tory party, but they at least are honest in their enmity. But the whining old humbugs who sit on the front opposition bench are not only really your foes, but they add hypocrisy to their other vices, and pretend to be the workman's friends while they are picking his pocket or stabbing him in the back. We have not forgotten the treason of the Star a few months ago, and there is some danger that under the able directorship of Professor Stuart that treason may be repeated.

Even now the Star gives treacherous advice. Only the other day, when the Welsh railway strike had "frightened" its able director, the paper was very busy recommending boards of conciliation to the people. Strikes were "barbarous." Quite so; but we had better have barbarous realities than civilised shams. And boards of conciliation and arbitration are shams and frauds. They are simply a means of cheating the worker out of his just rights. Who are the people who want boards of conciliation? The capitalist classes; they have been crying out for them for the last year—ever since the great Dock Strike. Do the workmen want them? No. A few leaders of the old school, who get their living by blacking the boots of capitalists, and who ought by rights to wear plush breeches to show in whose employ they are, join their hired voices to the general cry. But the mass of the working classes have no desire to be swindled by these "impartial" tribunals.

What does a board of conciliation consist of? An equal number of trade-union leaders and capitalists, with an "impartial" capitalist in the chair to hold the scales of justice. Let us suppose all the trade-union leaders are honest and cannot be bribed either by money or fair words—a very bold supposition. What about the capitalist in the chair, who gives the casting vote? Why, the mere fact of his being a capitalist means that he will always act with his own class, and the workers will find themselves bound by the decisions of a tribunal of which the majority is composed of their worst enemies. No, Professor Stuart; the workmen would rather do without boards of conciliation.

"Will you walk into my parlour, said the spider to the fly,

It is the prettiest little parlour that ever you did spy."

But the fly does not care about it, he does not want to be devoured by the capitalist spider. Let the workman stick to the big strike, the combined strike of all trades and industries.

It is a very inconvenient method to the Liberal capitalist. It is barbarous, brutal, unconstitutional. But the workman will get a good deal more by it than he will get out of a board of conciliation. Stick to the General Strike, boys, and you will get what you want.

John Burns's wages as a County Councillor are running short, and he has been talking of going back to the bench again. Several papers have expressed themselves strongly about the ingratitude of the London workman. Well, if the London workman believes that Burns can do anything for him on the County Council, the London workman is acting very stupidly in not paying him for his work there. But has John Burns been able to do much there? We don't think so. In our opinion the best work he has done has not been done in the Council, but outside, and could have been done equally well if he had remained plain John Burns, and had never been a County Councillor. It was Burns's reputation as a Socialist which made him the leader of the Dock Strike, as it made him the leader of the unemployed, and we are only sorry that a man who has done such good revolutionary work, and who we believe, with all his "constitutionalism," is still at heart a revolutionist, should "waste his time" among the second-rate mediocrities, insipid respectables, and corrupt jobbers who compose the bulk of the London County Council.

The capitalist press is in an awful state of alarm regarding the spread of revolt among the troops. The Leeds Mercury declares that the revolt among the Guards was caused by the underground work of the Anarchists and Socialists. The Dublin Express, the organ of high and dry Toryism, says that these outbreaks will increase and multiply, and then in a tone of deepest horror informs us that there are "paid revolutionary agents" in every garrison town who have a most "evil influence" upon the troops. Dreadful, isn't it? It seems that the "gifted" writer on the Dublin Express knows more about the revolutionary movement than we do. We know nothing about any "paid agents," but we have plenty of friends in garrison towns who have done good work in supplying soldiers with revolutionary literature. Only they do this work not for payment, but for the love of their principles. They are not like the hired scribes of the Tory press, and we are glad to see that the efforts of our comrades have not been unfruitful. Any one who wishes to aid in this good work can send subscriptions to us, and we will take care that the money is well expended.

N.

"Free" Labour is one of the catch-cries of avowed enemies of the people. Such papers as the St. James's Gazette, and its like, are at one with the directors in Wales, who are attempting to crush the workers. "Free" Labour, forsooth! What does it mean? The "right" of masters to employ the workers at starvation terms; a neat little dodge to deal with the workman as an individual, and not, as in large industries where men have united, collectively. The latter may be best while Commercialism stays!

Blacklegs versus Trade Unionists! This is the grievance; not only in Wales, but in every large movement for the advancement of wages affecting the standard of comfort, as represented by money, remember. The masters object to collective bargaining; they demand individual bargaining. The workers themselves are divided on the matter, and this, unfortunately, enables the capitalist to still hold a trump card. What does this schism among the workers come to? Why, just this, that a trades' unionist is at the best only a respectable slave, while the blackleg is an unrespectable one. Trade unionists contend that non-unionists have to thank them somewhat for even the wages they command in the labour-market. To a very large extent there is much truth in this.

Some pretty plain talk is required on the subject, and here it is. The trade unionist who contends he has done his duty when he has paid his weekly "subs.", and, maybe, kept this up since "coming out of his time" till he has reached the two score and ten period, is the veriest dolt. It is perfectly true he has done his best in so far as keeping up, at the very most, a miserable standard of comfort. We admit that this standard is better than any blackleg can expect under existing circumstances, unless he is good at "lifting" without being cothed.

But such a trade unionist has not done his duty! The broad platform of humanitarianism should have taught a bolder lesson. When unionists have reached that stage in human affairs, where men and women would act fraternally, and, in short, where the worker's interests are identical, something will have been done. When will they recognise that masters (capitalists) are not necessary for the carrying on of industry? The very system which gives cause for unions to spring up for the avowed purpose of protecting industry and its "reward," as against masters who contend for "free" labour, should convince the trades' unionist that something much more aggressive than uniting together and holding delegate and annual meetings is the course that must be taken, and to which, by the way, events are fast tending.

You want free labour, do you? Free in its proper sense! Very well, we must have abolition of capitalists, then; the taking over of the means of life, i.e., the land, machinery, tools, factories, and so on, each industry managing its own affairs; rent, interest, and profit must go; production and distribution for workers and by workers! These are matters that should and must be worth the consideration of even blacklegs and unionists.

HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON

The COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. For Australia, New Zealand, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Transvaal, and the Argentine Republic, a year, 8s.; six months, 4s.; three months, 2s. For India, Ceylon, China, Hong Kong, and the Straits Settlements, a year, 10s.; six months, 5s.; three months, 2s. 6d.

Subscribers who receive a RED WRAPPER are thereby reminded that their subscriptions have expired and must be renewed immediately if they wish to continue to receive COMMONWEAL.

SPECIAL RECRUIT SUBSCRIPTIONS.—To aid in spreading our principles, the following largely reduced terms are offered to those who obtain new subscribers: Two new yearly subscriptions for British Islands, etc., 10s. 6d.; for Australia, etc., 15s.; for India, etc., 19s. Five new subscriptions: For British Islands, etc., 25s.; for Australia, etc., 37s. 6d.; for India, etc., 47s. 6d. Specimen copies will be sent on receipt of postage.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF MODERN SOCIETY.

THUS fell the Society of the Middle Ages, by Capitalism establishing itself on the ruins of Feudality, and the rise of a middle-class who were either parasites of the nobility, themselves become commercial, trading on the grossest monopolies, and exacting rack-rent, and practically doing the state no service—partly parasites of the nobility, or partly employers living on the profit wrung out of workmen employed at a very low rate of wages. I have been giving the story of the change as it happened in England. On the Continent the divorce of the people from the land was not so sudden or complete, I think because there was less resistance possible to the centralised bureaucracy here than on the Continent. There, on the other hand, the rise of definite nations with stiff political demarcations gave rise to most horrible wars, which reduced the peasants to the last stage of misery, hampered new-born commerce, and in the long run ruined the land-owning aristocracy, and at last made the French Revolution both possible and necessary. It is no exaggeration to say that Germany is only now within the last twenty years recovering from the Thirty Year's War which went on at the end of the sixteenth and beginning of the seventeenth centuries.

But with the birth of capitalism and the world-market, the relative importance of agriculture and manufacture began to alter; and that again especially in England, a country so rich in coal and minerals, and so well furnished with harbours on all sides. The new-born power of making profit out of the employment of handicraftsmen had to be exercised and developed. The craftsmen were in a changed position; they had been completely masters of their own work with other resources, which forbade the work mastering them; they were so no longer; they were working for other people, driven by competition to sell themselves at a poor price in the market. In short, they had become wage-slaves; but they were still handicraftsmen working in an isolated way. They were not being made the most of, and could only be the instruments of a timid scanty commerce. If they could have remained thus I think that they would have been less degraded than they became afterwards, and are now; but then the last word of progress would have been said, the hope of revolution would never have arisen.

What happened was very different. Capitalism was no sooner born than she was forced to sow the seed of her decay and final destruction; she was forced to develop the power of Labour to the utmost; that was indeed her work. The mechanical invention of man had lain dormant since the early days that had invented the plough, the cart, the row-boat, and the simple machines that help man's labour and do not supersede it, such as the grist-mill, the potter's wheel, the lathe, the simple loom, the crane, etc.; that invention was now to wake up, but not very suddenly; the fuller organisation of handicraft was to precede its abolition. I say when Capitalism began to grow towards manhood at the end of the sixteenth century, production was wholly by handicraft little organised.

The work of the seventeenth century was that gradual organisation by means of the division of labour. In handicraft (supposing a man to take no pleasure in his work, to be no artist) the single worker's whole intelligence is wasted on a piece of commonplace goods; a small part of that intelligence will suffice, if the whole of some one else's intelligence is employed in organising. Therefore, set him, the single man, at doing one small portion of that work, and you can soon dispense with almost all his intelligence, while at the same time you will quicken the habit of his hand, his mechanical power, prodigiously; in short, you will at last make of him a very delicate machine, or part of a machine, for performing the small piece of work you apportion to him; but you must take care that the whole machine of him and his fellows must be properly built up. This was the work of the seventeenth century. In the eighteenth it was complete, and the unit of labour was no longer a single man but a group of men.

Commerce was now, one would think, as well provided as she needed to be; but happily she could not stop there, or there would still have been no revolution possible for us. Now, indeed, she stirred up the sleeping invention of man, and with the latter half of the eighteenth century began that marvellous series of inventions, which one would have thought should have set mankind free from the greater part of his labour, but which, as it is, has done, on the face of it, little more than make a new and enormously rich middle-class, and multiply the working population many times over in order to provide them with due wage-slaves, who work not less, but more than they did in the days before the organisation of labour, and get not higher wages, but lower for their more burdensome labour.

My briefly told tale is over now, for I need not go through the often-told story of the fly-shuttle, the spinning jenny, the steam-engine, the power-loom, and the rest of it. I will only remark that the last development of machinery is to make the factory itself the machine, of which these wonderful machines, and the men that manage them (the most wonderful of all) are only parts. There remains only on this side of human life, production to wit, one thing to do as long as machine production lasts (which I prophecy will not be for ever). That one thing is this: The machines were invented that some men might work harder and others softer than they used to do, and they have well fulfilled their purpose; but though they have in that process seized hold of the bodies of the hard-working ones, the wage-slaves, though the factory has their bodies in its grip, it has not got hold of their intelligence, and does not want it, nay, sedulously keeps it out. Suppose that intelligence to wake up and to say, The hard work and the soft work, let us no longer keep these two separate for two classes of men, but throw them together and divide them equally amongst all, so that there should be no classes! In that case would not life in general, the only holy and sacred thing we know, be purified and made far holier by taking away from it the sorrow and misery that come of anxious seeking for toil, and the need for accepting the sickening burden. Surely that is so. Surely there is nothing in the machines themselves and the invention of man which created them, that they should forbid the true use of them, the lightening the burden of human labour.

That is what we Socialists under the machine and factory system are striving for at present, leaving the consideration of what is to be done to the machines and factories to future ages, who will be free to consider it, as we are not. Freedom first at any price, and then if possible happiness, which to my mind would be the certain result of freedom. Or are we free? I have told you what was the condition of the civilised world in the days of the late Roman Republic, and the Absolutist Empire which followed it. What is its condition now that we have gone through chattel-slavery and serfdom to wage-slavery? It can be told nearly in the same words.

A privileged class partly composed of a landed nobility, partly of a money-bag aristocracy; a parasite class, ministering to their pleasures and their corruption, drinking of their cup, eating of their dish, flattering them and flattered by them but despised by them, and (woes me!) sharing in their crime of living on the misery of the poor. And those by whose labour they live? A huge population of miserable and hopeless labourers, to whom are superadded a crowd of paupers, far less joyous than the old Roman ones, fed by the fears, the remorse—the charity we call it—of the rich; and a few, a very few, free workmen, who as they work not for the workers, but the idle, must be turned back again to herd with the crowd of parasites aforesaid. Who can dare to say that this is not true of our society? And how does it differ from that of Roman corruption? Can its end be otherwise then—or worse?

Remember this, that in the days of that Roman corruption there was valiancy outside it which was ready to help the then world by destruction and new life combined; its enemies were the friends of the world, and were as good in their way as the early classical peoples had been in theirs, and I say they were outside that society, but at hand for its regeneration. All that the last two thousand years have used up; there is nothing outside civilisation that we can turn to for new birth; whatever there is to help us must come from within.

How are we to get at that? you will say. The answer to that question is the fact that we admit that the workers of to-day are wage-slaves. Those that feel themselves slaves must have been driven to desire freedom. But, again, what is the freedom which we desire? For the word has been used so often that men have forgotten its meaning. I think the answer is the freedom to develop our capacities to the utmost without injuring our neighbours. And how can that be done? By each of us working for the welfare of the whole of which we each form a part, and feeling sure that only so can we each of us fare well. Shall we not then have to give up a great deal in order to reach this point? Yes, we who are trying to bring people to that point will have to, but when people have reached it, they, when Socialism is realised, will turn round and find that their loss has only been imaginary. The rich man will have lost riches, i.e., dominion over others, and find that he is happy; the intellectual man will have given up his claim to be worshipped by the masses, and will find that he is understood by them and loved by them—and the poor man, what has he to give up? He will have to give up his chance of becoming rich—a valuable possession truly—and he will find that he is not rich, but wealthy; that is, that he has whatever a man healthy in mind and body can wish for, and that poverty has become an evil dream but half remembered.

In short, even now, while the realisation of Socialism, though it is already going on, is neither desired nor understood by most men, the mere breath and rumour of its coming can at least hold out to true men who will join our ranks one gift at least—that they shall be glad to live and not afraid to die. And is that not a wonderful contrast to the spirit of the life of those who are still living placidly, because ignorantly, amidst the dishonesty of our present society? wherein how many there are, and those not always the poorest or most ignorant, but men of culture, men of genius, who do at once hate life and fear death. Friends, join us in helping to throw off this bugbear, so that you may be no longer wage-slaves or their masters, or their masters' parasites. So shall we be our own Goths, and at whatever cost break up again the new tyrannous Empire of Capitalism. WILLIAM MORRIS.

THE REVOLUTIONARY CONFERENCE.

AN Anti-Parliamentary Conference of revolutionary bodies and groups was held at the Autonomie Club on Sunday, August 3rd. The following societies and groups were represented: Autonomie Club, Berner Street Club, East London Anarchist-Communist Group, Gleichheit Club, Hull Freiheit Club, Freedom Group, Italian, French, and Scandinavian Groups, Knights of Liberty Group, Sheffield Socialist Society, and the West-end Anarchist-Communist Group; and the following Branches of the Socialist League—North London, Hammersmith, Streatham, East London, North Kensington, South London, 'Commonweal,' Leicester, Norwich, Oxford, and Yarmouth.

The Conference having assembled, Kitz, at noon, on behalf of the Socialist League, stated the general objects aimed at—viz., greater unity and efficiency in revolutionary work and propaganda. He asked the comrades present to decide whether they would elect a chairman or not. It was unanimously agreed to dispense with any such quasi-constitutional official. It may here be also mentioned that throughout the proceedings no vote or division was taken, but that, nevertheless, perfect order and harmony were maintained. The undersigned were appointed Secretaries, and the Conference was constituted.

The first question on the agenda for discussion was—

"To secure United International Action on the part of the Revolutionary Party in the event of a European crisis, so that the Cause be not injured by indecision in such event."

Mowbray thought that the gist of the matter was to secure ourselves from waiting or indecision. In the first place, we should meet at least quarterly together. As to what he would do "in the event of a crisis," he would do his best to get the groups called together for consultation; but as to preliminary steps he should form himself into a committee of one. In the event of a crisis at home, the first thing to do was to fire the slums and get the people into the West-end mansions. In the event of a crisis abroad, the first thing to be done was to prevent help to foreign capitalists being sent from here.

Cores thought that for example in the Leeds business strong revolutionary placards might have been issued and meetings called in the neighbouring towns, so as to keep the police of those towns employed at home. He hoped that what we discussed to-day would not be kept to ourselves, but spread abroad. Workmen understood unflinching propaganda better than theoretic discussions.

Kitz said our chief enemies, strange to say, were amid the dregs of the populace. We were largely to blame for this, because of the academic mode in which the propaganda had been carried on. We should preach to the thieves, the paupers, and the prostitutes. The Christians already reached them by their emotional superstition; we might do so by preaching heaven here on earth. The first act of the Revolution ought to be to open the prison doors.

Charles (Sheffield) was sure the spirit of revolt would spread here as well as abroad. Leeds showed this. The very children looted the little provision shops for their fathers who were fighting in the streets. The women collected stones for the men to throw. If we only spread ourselves a bit in the provinces we should soon light a fire that would end the whole damned thing.

Malatesta said the problem of the best means of assuring combined international action had been often discussed. The authoritarian solution was to have committees everywhere. The committees were always too late or ill-informed, and consequently the movement was paralysed. Another system was to renounce all system. The results of this course were no better. By all means trust to individual initiative, but let every individual have a clear idea of what he should do, without necessity for any word of command. To establish an initiative of this kind the individual must know the strength behind him. As a rule men were not heroes, and they wanted to be assured that if they did some great thing they would have the sympathy of their comrades. For practical purposes, too, we should distinguish future plans from present action. For instance, as to the future, we might be either Communists or Collectivists; but both schools of Anarchists were at one as to what was to be done immediately. Each school was determined to seize property and put it in common by means of a tumultuous revolution. Why should not the two schools agree together, so long as the Revolution was yet to be made? Let us urge the people to seize property and go and dwell in the mansions of the rich; do not let us paralyse our efforts by discussions as to the future. Some organisation was desirable. There was an authoritarian system of organisation, which encouraged spies and accustomed the people to the system of delegation; but there was also a system of organisation which was spontaneous and Anarchist. A party which did not believe in organisation would do nothing; a party which believed in organisation only would soon join the Social Democrats or the politicians. In all things we went from one exaggeration to another before finding the mean. It was so in discussing the problem of how to make the Revolution. At one time Anarchists had abandoned trade-unions and strikes, and thought of nothing but making the Revolution by force. Then we found the bourgeois too strong for us upon this ground, and after the great Dock Strike we began to fancy that the General Strike would do everything. A strike, however, was not the Revolution, but only an occasion to make it. The General Strike would be good if we were ready to make use of it at once by immediate military action, whether by barricades or otherwise.

After Malatesta's speech the Conference adjourned at 1.30 for dinner. Upon resumption of business at 3 p.m.,

Ogden (Oxford) said that it would be very indiscreet, as we had no pretensions to be prophets, for us to lay down laws as to what any individual should do or as to what the future society should be like. We could at any rate here to-day make doubters understand that we were at war with the present society. What should be our immediate practical action? He answered, to bring into existence elements out of which the Revolution would be made. Natural leaders there must be, but do not let us make gods—Gladstones or Bradlaugh—of them. That was what we were in revolt against.

Pearson (Freedom Group) said that we must know what we were to put in place of the present system. The Social Democrats were revolutionists, but we could never work with them because they would not abolish authority. The Social-Democratic system was as bad as the present one. Coercion in any shape—dictating to people what was right and what was wrong—was bad. Our organisations in the past had gone wrong by electing people to do our work. We should recognise individuality. We should get into harmony with those with whom we could work and whom we could trust. For example, we had got to make it unsafe to send English soldiers to put down rioters and revolters elsewhere. This should be done by individual guerilla warfare. Don't let us try to organise the Revolution upon fixed lines beforehand, and bring people into the streets to be shot down. The Commune was ruined by councils and governors.

Kent (Sheffield) spoke of the impending colliery strike. Leaders would be required to prevent people acting all together in mobs and to utilise them individually. We wanted to know where the gatling guns and other instruments of destruction were kept, so that we might find them when wanted. So we wanted to know where the storehouses of food and clothing were, that we might take them.

Bordes said that whenever the people had conquered any advantage, it had been by means of individual initiative. It was so in the great French Revolution. At the time of the Commune, too, people did not wait for the Central Committee, but acted for themselves. Organisations of every kind had only sold the people. The thing to be done was to show the producers that everything that existed was false, and to put into their hands the means of getting rid of their masters.

Miss Lupton believed in assembling the people in the streets; only by teaching them together could we infuse courage into them. Revolt, too, was generated in this way, as fire by the sharpening of flint against flint. There must be leaders—(some cries of "No!")—but they must arise when the time came. Leadership was necessary—(renewed dissent)—but we must not plan it. We must not make a trade of it; only we must be ready to utilise it when necessary.

Casey suggested that we should stick to what he called the basic line of this discussion, viz., that our Revolution was a Revolution against property. He thought Miss Lupton's views of leadership somewhat dangerous.

Louise Michel said that the General Strike was the Revolution. In the Revolution there was no Group, no League,—only Humanity. We should not be always talking; we should act. By action the Revolution would be begun; all would understand action. In France, too, there had been too much talking. Comrades have endeavoured to make propaganda before the law courts, but they had only made themselves drunk with their own words and moved no one. The 1st of May showed they had been working on wrong lines.

Wess thought the result of the discussion was that personal and local initiative was the best means to our end. He also thought that we should not depend upon bourgeois papers for news, but upon our own journals and personal information.

The Conference then proceeded to discuss the second question on the agenda, viz.:

"To determine the best methods of propaganda."

With this question was also considered the following suggestion from the Council of the Socialist League:

"To push on the Cause by the advocacy of a General Strike and Non-Payment of Rent."

H. Davis, reverting to the previous discussion for a moment, spoke against all idea of leadership. Leadership had ruined every movement. The very fact that a leader was asked for to make a Revolution showed that the time was not ripe for a complete Revolution. Anarchism was the simplest doctrine in the world. There were scores of systems of society. The Anarchist said, "Let us have no system; the only thing we want is inter-dependence one upon the other." We ought to be more definite in our propaganda and policy. There was no half-way house between Social Democracy and Anarchism.

Netlow thought the General Strike should not be made too prominent. It might become a fetish, and take the same place in our movement as the Eight Hours with the Social Democrats. He took the same view as to a No-Rent propaganda; a strike was apt to kill individual initiative. We had too much to do to devote much time to it.

Nicoll said there was no need to preach the General Strike so as to lose sight of principles. When we were asked what practically was to be done, we must have some answer. The General Strike coupled with a No-Rent movement, would deal a heavy blow at the present system. An Eight Hours' Day, on the other hand, would tend to prolong the present system.

Mowbray thought that if we clearly advocated the taking over of the means of life, a General Strike might also be advocated as a means to that end. A propagandist should keep clear of trades' union disputes.

Mrs. Lahr thought we should do our utmost to get among the soldiers. We should distribute leaflets among them, and teach them not to fire on their brethren. She would advocate the General Strike as a revolt against the whole system. We must make sacrifices, and be courageous in preaching revolt; we had been mild too long.

Brooks said a general cessation of work meant the destruction of mastership. A General Strike meant the International Revolution.

Saint thought slavery was not to be abolished by using the means of authority. A General Strike meant authority. No-Rent he supported. The Revolution must be brought about by economic means.

Schmidt (Hull) wanted to know why, instead of going out of the shops and leaving the masters in, we should not kick the masters out? Men would not act in the way of a strike without an order from their union executive. He thought some share might well be taken in the unions, but no doubt any true Socialist would soon be kicked out of them. We should preach Socialism in the unions and everywhere else, only do not let us help any comrade to become a paid official.

Wess showed how the demand for a General Strike originated in Tortelier's Eight Hours' proposition. We must tell the people "Whatever you want you must get for yourselves." So would the General Strike be prepared. The next Revolution should be final. He also thought some good work might be done within the trades' unions.

Casey was thoroughly opposed to too much stress being laid on the General Strike; by advocating it you weakened your position. It might be used to obtain only an Eight Hours' day. We might take advantage of it, if it came. It was very dangerous to advocate it except by putting it forward as a means to an end.

Nicoll thought the General Strike meant the Social Revolution. It was not necessary to tell everybody so; all revolutions hitherto had been made by minorities. A General Strike would mean the streets thronged with desperate hungry crowds ready for anything, and that would mean the Revolution.

Cores said strikes and crowds would come of themselves; we were only going to take advantage of them when they came. As Socialists, we should preach and encourage every kind of revolt. The General Strike was the easiest way of attacking the masters.

A collection was taken for the wives and children of the men murdered by the Austro-Hungarian Government during the recent mining disturbances in that country, and realised £1.

The Conference at 6.30 adjourned for an hour. Upon resumption the following matter was referred to the various societies and groups:

"The support of the recognised organs of the party, and the printing and publication of leaflets and periodicals."

It was agreed to publish the proceedings of the Conference in the Revolutionary Press.

After a long discussion it was also agreed that the next meeting in Conference should be appointed for Easter-day, 1891, but that the groups should be requested to call a Special Conference should any urgent occasion arise.

A collection was then taken for the different anti-Parliamentary newspapers.

So terminated a most successful Conference, pervaded throughout by a spirit of comradeship and good feeling. Although all red-tapeism and quasi-authoritarianism were banished, the order maintained set an excellent example to that "den of thieves" the House of Commons. Exigencies of space have compelled us to give only the barest outlines of the speeches, and to omit some altogether. Comrades must pardon these enforced deficiencies.

The Onion-peelers Win.

The onion-peelers' strike at Crosse and Blackwells, East Ham, was settled on Thursday August 7. The women asked for 1s. for white onions and 6d. green onions, and they are to get it in future. The strike has also improved the condition of the women who gather beans for the farmers. On the same day they demanded 8d. instead of 6d. a-basket, and they got it.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

GERMANY.

The thirty-four Social-Democratic Members of Parliament have issued an address to their party, in which the party is requested to send delegates to a congress which is to be held on the 12th October and following days at Halle. The coercion law against the Socialists has lasted nearly twelve years, and will come to an end on the 30th September, and the party is asked to select their delegates on the 1st October. The order of the day at the congress will be rather rich, as it is proposed to discuss the following items: 1. Report on the condition of the party; 2. Report of the auditors; 3. Report of the parliamentary section; 4. The organisation of the party; 5. Election of officials; 6. The programme or platform of the party; 7. The press of the party; 8. Our attitude to strikes and boycotts; 9. Free propositions. The old question about centralisation and federalisation will be once more thoroughly chewed—in fact, it has already started in some papers of the party, pro and con. No doubt the big pots of the movement are very much in favour of a strict centralistic organisation, and are strongly against a too free development of private ideas and the desire for liberty in some members of the party. They also object to their trying to communicate their ideas to their fellow members. It is very sad indeed that men like Bebel and Liebknecht, who once upon a time defended their independence and federalistic principles so ably in Der Volkstaat, are now up in arms against anyone who dares to be independent. It is very doubtful whether the great mass of our comrades in Germany will be led so easily; they have outgrown their leading-strings, and very likely soon will break the strings and perhaps kick out the leaders in the bargain, even if the majority in the congress carry such measures. To talk about the necessity of closed, disciplined ranks because we are in constant warfare, is all very well, and no doubt the rank and file will work in a body if the circumstances demand such action, but if allowed freedom the local bodies will be more able and understand much better how to fight and how to win. What was the good of the centralisation at the time when the coercion laws were declared? The party had been used to look to the heads of the party; and the heads, what did they do? Nothing; they simply lost their heads. If there had been no centralisation or combination whatsoever, the chaos could not have been worse, and it would have been a deal better if the people had been used to stand on their own legs. Well, we shall soon see what resolutions the congress will come to.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

The last act of a great tragedy, which was played in a northern part of Bohemia, and in which two men were killed and many wounded, has begun. Eighty-seven glass-workers have been arraigned before the Reichenberg District Court, on the charge of riotous conduct, open revolt against the established law, plundering, etc. Out of the voluminous acts of accusation, we learn the following facts of the case. The splitting of glass into rough beads, during many years, was done by the workmen at home, and many thousands earned their living in this trade; a quick workman could split 5,000 dozen in a day, at 7½d. per 1,000 dz. In the last two years the trade has been very bad, beads being not very fashionable, and as a consequence the prices got lower and lower; the competition was also great with Venetian beads made by machines. In 1887 a large firm put some machines up, and in 1888 another firm, L. Breit, himself an engineer, improved the machines to such an extent that one machine can do more work than a hundred hands. The beads are even in better condition for further improvement. The average wages went down to 2½d. a-day, and by degrees, horrible suffering were the consequences. On the 28th January, at a secret meeting of the men a resolution was taken, and on the next day several hundred workers went from factory to factory destroying all machines and machine-made beads. The police had no knowledge of the movement, and the few in the place had enough to do to save and protect the owners until the arrival of the military. In the first instance the bourgeois papers made a hue and cry against the "Socialist agitators"; but they had no luck there; it was too well known that hardly any Socialists are in the district, and even the public prosecutor puts the revolt solely down to the horrible misery under which the people suffered. The ignorant people think the machines are the source of the evil, whereas the evil is that the machines are in the hands of the capitalist; and the evil will last until all instruments of production will be common property. The end of the tragedy will be—the accused sent to a long term of imprisonment, the wives and children in the workhouse, thousands of men, willing to work, in unspeakable misery, and the younger ones absorbed by another branch of industry equally as bad. O, ye ladies! do you think sometimes, donning your fine dresses ornamented with beads, on the many hot tears out of the eyes of the poor mixed with them?

DENMARK.

The director of the United Steamship Society, Mr. Tietgen, who was sent by the king as council delegate to the International Workmen's Protection Congress in Berlin, called together by the "Socialistic" Kaiser, used the following words: "As long as a tear can be dried from the face of a labourer we must not be lax in our endeavour to create better circumstances for them." Now the seamen and sailors are on strike for a pittance of mere wages, and, of course, the gentleman can do nothing in the matter. At a meeting the women have carried a resolution to go in procession to him with the fine sounding words on a banner, and we hope they will make him eat them, the miserable hypocrite.

SWITZERLAND.

A new paper, called the Textil Arbeiter, has made its appearance, and we wish it success. At the same time we learn that a movement is on foot to hold an international congress of the workers in the textile industry, to consider the means for an improvement of their position. They need it, indeed; it is one of the worst paid branches of industry.

Some great patriots want to erect a monument to Tell, the tyrant-remover, the personification of bold manliness and love of freedom. A Swiss labour paper says: "If to-day a Tell was to do his deed in another country and fly to us for protection, we would give him up, or turn him out of the country at least, as many a brave fighter for liberty has been insulted and hunted from our mountains. The agitation for a Tell monument by those who cry 'Bravo!' and clap their hands at the infamous deeds of the political police, is therefore a detestable hypocrisy and a barefaced lie." Rrr.

LIVERPOOL SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—1 Stanley Street, Dale Street.—Meets every Tuesday at 8 p.m.

THE SONG OF HATRED!

Yes, Freedom's war!—though the deadly strife
 Makes earth one charnel bone-yard!
 The last kiss now to the child and wife,
 And the first firm grasp of the poniard!
 Blood soon shall flow in rivers above
 The bright flowers we to-day tread;
 We have all had more than enough of love,
 So now for a spell of Hatred!
 We have all had more than enough of love,
 So now for a spell of Hatred!

How long shall the hideous ogre, Power,
 Rear column of skulls on column?
 Oh, Justice! hasten thy judgment-hour,
 And open thy doomsday volume!
 No more oiled speech!—it is time the drove
 Of despots should hear their fate read—
 We have all had quite enough of love,
 Be our watchword henceforth Hatred!
 We have all had quite enough of love,
 Be our watchword henceforth Hatred!

Cold steel! to that it must come at length—
 Nor quake to hear it spoken!
 By the blows alone we strike in our strength
 Can the chains of the world be broken!
 Up, then! No more in city or grove,
 Let Slavery and Dismay tread!
 We have all had more than enough of love,
 Let us now fall back upon Hatred!
 We have all had more than enough of love,
 Let us now fall back upon Hatred!

My friends; the tremendous time at hand
 Will show itself truly in earnest!
 Do you the like!—and take your stand
 Where its aspect frowns the sternest!
 Strive now as Tell and Korner strove!
 Be your sharp swords early and late red!
 You have all had more than enough of love—
 Test now the talisman, Hatred!
 You have all had more than enough of love,
 Test now the talisman, Hatred!

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Great Strike in Wales.

On Wednesday August 6th the strike began, as the directors not only refused to agree to the terms of the men, but had even refused to meet the secretary of union, Mr. Harford. 1,500 men came out on Wednesday evening and Thursday morning. The directors had talked very loudly about getting blacklegs, but blacklegs were scarce. The whole population sympathising strongly with the strikers, the blacklegs were very easily "persuaded" to go home. In illustration of the terror caused by the threatening attitude of the people, I may mention an amusing incident which occurred on Thursday morning at half-past three. Mr. Harford, who did not wish to "inconvenience the public," gave permission for a mail train to be run. The attitude of the working-class public who had gathered along the line was so menacing that men could not be got to run the train, and "her majesty's" mails had to go in brakes by road. On one train that did run the driver and fireman had to beat a hasty retreat before the people, the fireman being knocked about severely. The directors, seeing the blackleg game was up for the time, then entered into negotiations with Mr. Harford, who rather weakly consented to a compromise by which the men could work 240 hours a-month instead of the sixty hours a-week demanded by the men. The men, however, very rightly rejected this compromise, and declared that they would stick to their demands. They adhere to their claim for a sixty hours' week, but they are willing in the case of the colliers' monthly holiday to guarantee a week of fifty hours. The railway men have the support of both dockers and miners. The dockers will not load coal that is brought down with blacklegs, and the miners will not dig for these people. Meanwhile the miners have been everywhere locked out, and the dockers, too, are idle, so what is practically a general strike prevails in South Wales.

The strike on Saturday was beginning to be felt in the district; there was a famine in garden produce, and meat supplies except the local hill sheep were beginning to run short, while in many large towns not a single London paper had been seen since Wednesday. Trade was completely paralysed. The condition of affairs is thus described by a Times correspondent: "Nobody had anything to do, and nobody was doing anything. In the East, West, and Roath docks, everywhere, the scene was the same. Huge colliers, sailing and steam vessels, great ocean liners, lay in absolute idleness, for the very sufficient and very deplorable reason that there was not a ton of coal to place in them. The railway lines are the arteries, and the coal which they bring down are the blood and life of many hundreds and thousands of tons of shipping. The shipping lay motionless and inert. There had been, said the experienced officials, bad times during former strikes, but the appearance of the docks has never been so depressing as upon this occasion. The average arrivals have dropped from 10,000 net tonnage to 2,000. There were in the docks on Saturday steamers of a registered tonnage of nearly 59,000, and sailing vessels of nearly 68,000 tons register, of which at least two-thirds ought to have gone away. Such figures speak for themselves." The directors contrived to smuggle a large number of blacklegs into their premises while a big demonstration was being held on Saturday. Encouraged by the presence of these blacklegs, the directors refused the men's terms on Monday. The police are being got together, and troops are held in readiness. It is evident these gentlemen intend to massacre the people if they can get a chance.—Later.—No blackleg trains ran on Tuesday. The directors complain bitterly of threats of force and the talk of "hot receptions" for blacklegs among the miners. At the same time the directors do not mind using "threats," the latest of which is a proposal to work the line by "Royal Engineers." We do not think, however, these gallant soldiers will turn blacklegs, even if they are "ordered."

THE SATIRES OF CYNICUS.

"SINE IRA ET STUDIO."

CYNICUS asks no favour, is no partisan, independent and unbiassed he looks with impartial eye on the follies and corruptions of his time. Unknown and unaided, but with firm purpose, he launches his satires on a world of dissimulation and deceit, where alas—

Virtue's at a discount,
Truth is under par,
Honesty's a scarcity
Wealth is better far.

Knavery's commendable,
Cheating is no sin;
He is the true philanthropist
Who takes the stranger in.

But where, perchance, some honest kindly heart,
While smiling at his fancies, still may say—
"He acts no snarling, mean, or churlish part
Who fain would laugh the follies of the world away."

TO SUCH HE DEDICATES HIS BOOK.

To Socialists who wish to see the hypocrisy of modern society pictorially lampooned, we recommend Cynicus.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

MEN WHO ARE NOT SOCIALISTS.

VI.

THE POLICE.

THE only sensible thing acted in our theatres nowadays is the harlequinade, and I never miss seeing it. It is so thoroughly socialistic—from the stealing of hams and sausages out of the butcher's shop, to the dipping of the policeman in a barrel of treacle, burning him with a red-hot poker, and passing him through a mangle! It is the social revolution in miniature, and I enjoy it immensely—especially the treatment of the policeman. It is so full of instruction, too, and moral benefit to the young. When I have a family, I will take the youngsters regularly to see the harlequinade, and also to witness labour and free speech riots, and if they do not play a lively part in the Social Revolution it won't be the fault of their early impressions.

In olden times people walked in lonely places at night-time in dread of evil spirits—warlocks, witches, and goblins; nowadays, alike in the day-time and night-time and in busy and lonely places, they go about in terror of the police. The presence of a policeman at his door, or the touch of a policeman's hand on his shoulder, excites as much apprehension in the breast of a free-born Briton to-day, as the sight of the horns of the devil peeping over a peat-stack did to his serf-bound ancestor.

In olden times when folk suffered no skait from evil-disposed persons, when they found their horses safe in their stalls and the grain unbroken in their barns, they held that they had been warded by good spirits; nowadays, when people live without molestation, when their houses are not entered by thieves, or their children stripped of their clothes in the streets, they attribute their good fortune to the ministrations of the police.

The inhabitants of these islands have thus devised a new superstition; they have become a police-fearing and a police-trusting people. Mankind has sought out many inventions of idolatry and demonolity—there has been stone-worship, tree-worship, bird-worship, serpent-worship, crocodile-worship, cat-worship, and cow-worship; but surely police-worship is lowest and will be the last!

The cry of "Police!" lies at the bottom of the heart of every Briton, and becomes articulate upon his lips in every case of public alarm or fear of violence to his own or his neighbour's person or property. If any one assaults him he screams "Police!" and if he sees another assaulted he screams "Police!" If two drunken people fight, if a fire breaks out, if a child is run down, if an old lady trips over her poodle, if a wild bull or a mad dog rushes down the street, if some one attempts suicide by leaping over a bridge, if a purse is stolen, a window broken, or a water-main bursts—the cry of "Police!" announces the occurrence and puts the neighbourhood in a panic. Yes, the cry of "Police!" is as instinctive to the adult Briton as the cry of "Ma!" was to him when a child, and it leaps forth spontaneously, oftentimes in the most untoward and compromising occasions.

During the miners' riots at Blantyre some years ago, when a number of shops were looted, an old man was seen trudging up the street with a cheese in his arms, of which he had become possessed as his portion of the "general divide" of a grocery store. On his way some miner's wives, wishing to still further extend the application of the temporarily triumphant socialist principle, ran after him demanding shares, on observing which the poor fellow clasped the cheese despairingly to his bosom and took to his heels, yelling "Police! Police! Police!"

So habituated have people become to depending upon the police for protection, that they have surrendered the right of protecting themselves, and have ceased to recognise their own and their neighbour's duty to preserve the public peace and guard the commonweal. They have grown so familiar with the intrusion and interference of the police in the concerns and discipline of public life, that they are no longer conscious of the powers which the police have usurped. They allow the police to bully them in the streets, overawe them in their workshops and dwellings, and coerce them into submission to the most degrading restrictions and behests of class tyranny; and have actually convinced themselves that their own and the common well-being depends upon their submission, and that without the presence and dominion of the police, Commerce, Art, Science, and life itself would be impossible in a civilised community! A man may publicly disavow belief in God, the Constitution, and the Church, and no one expresses disapproval or surprise, but if he dares deny the necessary existence of the police he is laughed at as a lunatic or denounced as a scoundrel. I have seen an audience of working-men greet with applause the assertion that society could endure without landlords, capitalists, lawyers, doctors, clerks, and commercial travellers, but when the speaker added policemen, the applause ceased, a murmur passed round the crowd, and in a few minutes the apparently most sensible and intelligent portion of the audience had disappeared in disgust!

Still, although it seems almost blasphemous to say so, the police are merely men, having heads that will crack if belaboured with a truncheon, and necks that will break if suspended by a rope, just like yours or mine. Yes, stripped of their blue clothes, their helmets, and their tackety boots, policemen are not differently formed in body and not differently constituted in mind from peers, members of Parliament, lawyers, judges, burglars, parsons, editors, or tramps. The recognition of this fact enables us to consider the habits and functions of the police without that superstitious awe that clouds the perception and perverts the judgment of our fellows.

Policemen are not selected on account of their mental but their physical proportions. Intellectual policemen are few, and they seldom get promotion or pensions. Intellectuality hampers them in the execution of their duties, and is always getting them into trouble with their superior officers. It was proposed at one time to recruit the police from the discharged criminal class, but the principle didn't work well. It was found that while criminals could easily be trained up to the requisite standard of honesty, they could not be trained down to the official standard of stupidity and brutality. They were too clever and vigilant; they discovered crimes which the authorities did not wish discovered, and arrested criminals whom the authorities did not want arrested. They were much too civil towards the common people, and not sufficiently obsequious towards the rich; while their indiscreet avowal of the truth in giving evidence tended to sully the prestige of the police and sap the foundations of public order.

I often chasten my moral pride by thinking that I might have been a policeman myself!—that instead of being a Socialist, endeavouring to put down crime, I might have been a policeman promoting and encouraging it. I can never forget the circumstance that a boy who was born next door on the same day as myself is now a policeman!

Sometimes policemen may be seen everywhere, and at other times nowhere. On bright sunny days, when the toilers are locked in factories and fields under the surveillance of their masters, and when rich thieves are peacefully pursuing their calling in offices and exchanges and poor thieves are hiding in their dens—the police seem legion. Alike amid the throng of our cities and the quiet lanes of our villages their blue coats and tin-plate mounted helmets shine conspicuously, like thistles in a quarry-pit. Their decorative effect, as well as their utility, appears to be indispensable to civilised life. They are paraded on all state and civic occasions. They are stuck on either side of our theatres, public halls, art galleries, general post offices, and sometimes our churches. They are placed with flower-pots at the doors of the city residences of lords and gentlemen during important receptions. Together with lamp-posts they are the sole decoration provided at public expense on our streets; and they divide with public urinals the glory of ornamenting the junction of important thoroughfares.

Policemen perform many offices which they are not compelled to do by statute. They watch shebeens lest detectives pounce upon them unawares; they procure half-pint bottles of whiskey in the night-time for belated swells on payment of a trifling commission; they assist the Society for the Suppression of Vice by levying taxes upon prostitutes and brothel-keepers; they render thieving a less remunerative profession by exacting blackmail from thieves and reseters; and they save the public the cost of extending police-office accommodation by accepting "tips" from respectable criminals and permitting them to go home to their own more commodious and comfortable mansions.

The marvellous gift which policemen acquire of being able to testify as eye-witnesses concerning occurrences which they have not seen, has been frequently noted and commented upon. The fact that this faculty becomes sometimes so objective or hyllo-ideal that they aver to having witnessed incidents which never occurred, has brought it and the police themselves into disrepute with matter-of-fact people. But it should be borne in mind, in all fairness to the police, that the disadvantages which result from the possession of this gift are not infrequently balanced by the possession of another of an opposite tendency, which prevents them seeing—or at least recollecting having seen—incidents which transpired before their eyes and in which they themselves prominently participated. This peculiar mental endowment is the one intellectual characteristic which gives policemen an advantage over their fellows, and it inspires in common people more terror than even their truncheons and big boots. Divested of it, they would be as Parliament without party or newspapers without advertisements—their dominion over the citizens would speedily perish.

The notion that policemen are bigoted upholders of law and fanatical respecters of public order has been somewhat shaken by recent events. There never was, indeed, the slightest foundation for such an opinion. As a matter of fact, the police are, and always have been, practical Anarchists in their own way. They break the law in private as naively as they break the heads of the citizens in public; and half a dozen of them placed in the middle of a crowd will produce more anarchy in five minutes than all the foreign sections could do in five years. Wherever two or three policemen are gathered together, riot and disorder dwell in the midst of them.

Policemen have no political principles and they belong to no political party. They are not Socialists, but neither are they Tories, or Liberals, or Radicals—they are simply policemen. They are not opposed to Socialism; they are simply opposed to Socialists. They are not in favour of landlordism or capitalism; they are simply in favour of landlords and capitalists. They would club down Liberals and Tories, landlords and capitalists, as jauntily as they do Socialists, crofters, and tenant-farmers if their pay and pensions depended upon their so doing;—and perhaps they shall some day.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. XXVI.—THE UPPER WATERS.

WE set Walter ashore on the Berkshire side, amidst all the beauties of Stratley, and so went our ways into what once would have been the deeper country under the foot-hills of the White Horse; and though the contrast between half-cocknified and wholly unsophisticated country existed no longer, a feeling of exultation rose within me (as it used to do) at sight of the familiar and still unchanged hills of the Berkshire range.

We stopped at Wallingford for our mid-day meal; and though of course all signs of squalor and poverty had disappeared from the streets of the ancient town, and many ugly houses had been taken down and many pretty new ones built, I thought it curious that the town still looked like the old place I remembered so well; for indeed it looked like that ought to have looked.

At dinner we fell in with an old, but very bright and intelligent man, who seemed in a country way to be another edition of old Hammond. He had an extraordinary detailed knowledge of the ancient history of the country-side from the time of Alfred to the days of the Parliamentary Wars, many events of which, as you may know, were enacted round about Wallingford. But what was more interesting to us, he had detailed record of the period of the change to the present state of things, and told us a great deal about it, and especially of that exodus of the people from the town to the country, and the gradual recovery by the town-bred people on one side and the country-bred people on the other of those arts of life which they had each lost; which loss, as he told us, had at one time gone so far that not only was it impossible to find a carpenter or a smith in a village or small country town, but that people in such places had even forgotten how to bake bread, and that at Wallingford, for instance, the bread came down with the newspapers by an early train from London, worked in some way, the explanation of which I could not understand. He told us also that the townspeople who came into the country used to pick up the agricultural arts by carefully watching the way in which the machines worked, gathering an idea of handicraft from machinery; because at that time almost everything in and about the fields was done by elaborate machines used quite unintelligently by the labourers. On the other hand, the old men amongst the labourers managed to teach the younger ones gradually a little artizanship, such as the use of the saw and the plane, the work of the smithy, and so forth;—and once more, by that time it was as much as—or rather, more than—a man could do to fix an ash pole to a rake by handiwork; so it would take a machine worth a thousand pounds, and a group of workmen, to do five shillings' worth of work. He showed us, among other things, an account of a certain village council who were working hard at all this business; and the record of their intense earnestness in getting to the bottom of some matter which in time past would have been thought quite trivial, as, for example, the due proportions of alkali and oil for soap-making for the village wash, or the exact heat of the water into which a leg of mutton should be plunged for boiling.—all this joined to the utter absence of anything like party feeling, which even in a village assembly would certainly have made its appearance in an earlier epoch, was very amusing, and at the same time instructive.

This old man, whose name was Henry Morsom, took us, after our meal and a rest, into a biggish hall which contained a large collection of articles of manufacture and art from the last days of the machine period to that day; and he went over them with us and explained them with great care. They also were very interesting, showing the transition from the makeshift work of the machines (which was at about its worst a little after the Civil War before told of) into the first years of the new handicraft period. Of course, there was much overlapping of the periods: and at first the new handwork came in very slowly.

"You must remember," said the old antiquary, "that the handicraft was not the result of what used to be called material necessity: on the contrary, by that time the machines had been so much improved that almost all necessary work might have been done by them; and indeed many people at that time and before it used to think that machinery would entirely supersede handicraft; which certainly, on the face of it, seemed more than likely. But there was another opinion, far less logical, prevalent amongst the rich people before the days of freedom, which did not die out at once after that epoch had begun. This opinion, which from all I can learn seemed as natural then, as it seems absurd now, was, that while the ordinary daily work of the world would be done entirely by automatic machinery, the energies of the more intelligent part of mankind would be set free to follow the higher forms of the arts as well as science and the study of history. It was strange, was it not, that they should thus ignore that aspiration after complete equality which we now recognise as the bond of all happy human society?"

I did not answer, but thought the more. Dick looked thoughtful, and said:

"Strange, neighbour? Well, I don't know. I have often heard my old kinsman say that the one aim of all people before our time was to avoid work, or at least they thought it was; so of course the work which their daily life forced them to do seemed more like work than that which they seemed to choose for themselves."

"True enough," said Morsom. "Anyhow, they soon began to find out their mistake, and that only slaves and slaveholders could live solely by setting machines going."

Clara broke in here, flushing a little as she spoke: "Was not their mistake once more bred of the life of slavery that they had been living?—a life which was always looking upon everything, except mankind, animate and inanimate—'nature,' as people used to call it—as one thing, and mankind as another. It was natural to people thinking in this way that they should try to make 'nature' their slave, since they thought 'nature' was something outside them."

"Surely," said Morsom; "and they were puzzled as to what to do, till they found the feeling against a mechanical life, which had begun before the Great Change amongst people who had leisure to think of such things, was spreading insensibly, till at last under the guise of pleasure that was not supposed to be work, work that was pleasure began to push out the mechanical toil, which they had once hoped at the best to reduce to narrow limits indeed, but never to get rid of; and which, moreover, they found they could not limit as they had hoped to do."

"When did this new revolution gather head?" said I.

"In the half-century that followed the Great Change," said Morsom, "it began to be noteworthy; machine after machine was quietly dropped under the excuse that the machines could not produce works of art, and that works of art were more and more called for. Look here," he said, "here are some of the works of that time—rough and unskilful in handiwork, but solid and showing some sense of pleasure in the making."

"They are very curious," said I, taking up a piece of pottery from amongst the specimens which the antiquary was showing us; "not a bit like the work of either savages or barbarians, and yet with what would once have been called a hatred of civilisation impressed upon them."

"Yes," said Morsom, "you must not look for delicacy there: in that period you could only have got that from a man who was practically a slave. But now, you see," said he, leading me on a little, "we have learned the trick of handicraft, and have added the utmost refinement of workmanship to the freedom of fancy and imagination."

I looked, and wondered indeed on the deftness and abundance of beauty of the work of men who had at last learned to accept life itself as a pleasure, and the satisfaction of the common needs of mankind and the preparation for them as work fit for the best of the race. I mused silently; but at last I said—

"What is to come after this?"

The old man laughed. "I don't know," said he; "we will meet it when it comes."

"Meanwhile," quoth Dick, "we have got to meet the rest of our day's journey; so out into the street and down to the strand! Will you come a turn with us, neighbour? Our friend is greedy of your stories."

"I will go as far as Oxford with you," said he; "I want a book or two out of the Bodleian Library. I suppose you will sleep in the old city?"

"No," said Dick, "we are going higher up: the hay is waiting us there, you know."

Morsom nodded, and we all went into the street together, and got into the boat just above the town bridge. But just as Dick was getting the sculls into the rowlocks, the bows of another boat came thrusting through the low arch. Even at first sight it was a gay little craft indeed—bright green, and painted over with elegantly drawn flowers. As it cleared the arch, a figure as bright and gay-clad as the boat rose up in it; a slim girl dressed in light blue silk that fluttered in the draughty wind of the bridge. I thought I knew the figure, and sure enough, as she turned her head to us, and showed her beautiful face, I saw with joy that it was none other than the fairy godmother from the abundant garden on Runnymede—Ellen, to wit.

NOTES ON NEWS.

WE admire Mr. Cunninghame Graham greatly, and we especially like his command of forcible language, which puts our vocabulary to shame. But we think it would be better if Mr. Graham, in his zeal for "constitutionalism," would occasionally be a little more accurate. It is quite true he might have thought he was quite safe in repeating a wretchedly stale commonplace, very popular among constitutional trade-unionists and peace-at-any-price Radicals, when he told the English people last week in a contemporary that "violent revolution is alien to the spirit of tradition of your race." When we hear this sort of thing from an educated man, you are tempted to ask whether historical study has formed a part of his education. We will ask Mr. Graham, however, if it is not a fact that the English working class, before they were starved down and crushed into cowardly submission, were not the boldest, most stubborn and rebellious race in Europe?

Did you ever hear of Wat Tyler, Mr. Graham, and have you read what Professor Thorold Rogers says about the effect of "violent revolution" in his time? Let us quote the passage from the Professor's book, 'Six Centuries of Work and Wages':

"Once in the history of England only—once, perhaps, only in the history of the world—peasants and artizans attempted to effect a revolution by force. They nearly succeeded; at least they became for a short time the masters of the situation. That they would have held the advantages they gained at Mile End had they provided against the tragedy of Smithfield, is improbable. But they caused such terror by what they actually did, that they gained all that they claimed, and that speedily. The English labourer for a century or more became virtually free and certainly prosperous."

Now, Mr. Graham, what do you think of that? Do you know that "the golden age of the English labourers," the famous fifteenth century, followed close upon that revolt, which was conducted according to "Continental methods," and included the burning of palaces, and hanging and beheading of lawyers, tax-gatherers, and other enemies of the public weal? Do you also know, Mr. Graham, that Henry VII., one of the most grasping of English kings, was afraid to tax the people because he knew they would rebel, and preferred to tax the nobles instead? Mr. Hallam's 'Constitutional History' is our authority for this statement. Have you ever heard of Jack Cade, Kett the Tanner, Robert Aske, Lilburne and the Levellers, the Luddites and the physical-force Chartists? Why, Mr. Graham, a man of your courage and ability ought to be ashamed to talk Manchester Quakery. Let's have no more of it.

We are glad to welcome another accession to the "moderate" party. Parliamentary candidates run with money from "a friend" suit ill with "Revolutionary Social Democracy." We are not surprised, therefore, to see that Mr. Hyndman is opposed to the "general strike," and thinks the people are "short-sighted" who advocate it. It would lead to a "dictatorship." Indeed? Well, in these days of dynamite and other dangerous explosives we don't envy the "dictator." But one thing does astonish us. In our ignorance we always thought that a dictatorship was rather in Mr. Hyndman's line. Is it possible that his dwindling popularity leads him to believe that he wouldn't be the "dictator," and it is this which makes him suddenly such a "determined" opponent of "tyranny"? We should like to know.

There are still some kind-hearted people who believe in that venerable fraud and child kidnapper, Doctor Barnardo. For their benefit we quote part of a report of the meeting of the Chorlton Board of Guardians from the Manchester Evening News of August 18th, in which the story is told of a boy who had been sent into slavery and brought back to England at the request of his friends.

"Mr. Tomlinson said he had seen the boy. He was ten years of age and the story that he told of the life he had led in Canada rather shocked us (Mr. Tomlinson's) opinion as to the value of emigration. Here was a lad of ten years of age, who had not passed the fifth standard, and who was made to work on a farm from five in the morning till ten o'clock at night. He was not supplied with the food to which boys in England were accustomed, and said he had not tasted beef since he left this country. His story altogether was more like an account of 'white slavery' than anything else. If that was a sample of the treatment accorded to boys who were sent to Canada, the sooner juvenile emigration was stopped the better."

The fact is the whole business is a philanthropic fraud. Poor little boys without any friends are sent out to Canada by hypocritical scoundrels of the Barnardo type, to be worked like slaves by brutal farmers. We have very strong reasons to believe that all the atrocities of our old factory system are committed by those slave-drivers upon these helpless children. These guardians are going to investigate the affair. We hope it will be done thoroughly, and are also of opinion that when it is done that, that philanthropic swindler Barnardo will find the East-end rather too hot for him. N.

Our old friend Reynolds last Sunday had the ineffable effrontery to advocate in set terms the unconditional "endowment" of John Burns with a handsome annuity for life at the expense of the workers, and as a "reward" for his past labours in their cause! This preposterous proposal throws much light on the motives of some self-dubbed "friends of the people."

No writer in the Commonweal, no member of the League (so far as I know), has ever joined in the ignoble attacks on Burns which have been made in certain quarters. We, at any rate, have always thought well of his motives, and recognised the thoroughly good work done by him, both in spreading revolt and even in organisation, although (as anti-Parliamentarians) we deplored his wasting his energies on County Councils and such-like tomfoolery.

The fact, however, that such a suggestion as this should be seriously entertained, shows how demoralising the whole system of "leadership" is to those "led." If Burns does not repudiate the indiscreet zeal of his friends, it will show also (not for the first time) how demoralising the system is to the "leader" himself. In any case we assume that Free Communists have something better to do with such coin they possess than to contribute in any form to the support of any "leader." R. W. B.

LANDLORDISM AND POVERTY.

LANDLORDISM for centuries has been, and is now, the curse of civilisation and the progenitor of crime, vice, and misery. Poverty follows landlordism as surely as light follows darkness; where we find exorbitant rents, so in proportion do we find an equivalent amount of extreme poverty.

The question then arises—how are we to remove the cause, so as to banish the effect? Is it to be done by constitutional means, or philanthropical schemes, or even the working-men's dwellings? No! What we want to do, and what every British worker ought to do, is to overthrow it themselves, and wait no longer for those who say they have the workers' interests at heart, but unite together and fight for that liberty to live which is the birthright of all men, even though it may cost us our lives. The land for the people shall ever be our watchword.

Such is the tenacious grip of this monster that its victims dare not lift up their heads to protest against the cruel oppression that enthral them. The outcome of landlord usurpation we find has been fully and graphically illustrated in Ireland, where the cruelties of the police, soldiery, and "civic" authorities for the last century have been especially horrible and cold-blooded.

The very materials of the houses in which the workers are forced to live have been paid for several times over, and yet their occupants have still to slave in order to keep those in idleness who toil not. Then it appears to me, and I think any man with a spark of humanity in him, will agree that the causes of poverty are not, as many well-meaning people would lead us to suppose—namely, that of drunkenness, extravagance, and so forth—but of landlordism.

I have examined this subject very closely, and I find that the harder the masses work the more wretched and unhappy they become; for if by chance they do succeed in obtaining a rise of wages (which is seldom), the land-thief scoops down upon them and adds another lash to the already bleeding backs of his victims, and extorts from them in rent the additions they may have obtained by strikes.

Not long ago a friend of mine related to me (what is an everyday occurrence) how he settled some twenty years ago in a very poor neighbourhood, agreeing to pay £60 a-year for his house to carry on his business. After a time he managed to build up a decent concern, till about six months ago, when his lease expired, and he applied in the usual course for a renewal, when he was told that £100 would in the future be the yearly rental. Now this man had to get this extra rent from somewhere, consequently down went his workmen's wages, and then these workmen had either to deny themselves some article of food or clothing, or go and live in a worse slum than that in which they already existed, in order to pay this extra demand made upon their master for rent.

Well, to give way to the sentiments of my mind upon this matter, I will quote the words of a celebrated divine: If men are such cowards to put up with this, they deserve to be slaves.

I am glad that we Socialists are fully alive to the situation, and are leading the people in a No-Rent crusade. It is time something practical was done to drive this hellish monster, Landlordism, into oblivion. C. A. STONE.

HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON

The COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. For Australia, New Zealand, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Transvaal, and the Argentine Republic, a year, 8s.; six months, 4s.; three months, 2s. For India, Ceylon, China, Hong Kong, and the Straits Settlements, a year, 10s.; six months, 5s.; three months, 2s. 6d.

Subscribers who receive a RED WRAPPER are thereby reminded that their subscriptions have expired and must be renewed immediately if they wish to continue to receive COMMONWEAL.

SPECIAL RECRUIT SUBSCRIPTIONS.—To aid in spreading our principles, the following largely reduced terms are offered to those who obtain new subscribers: Two new yearly subscriptions for British Islands, etc., 10s. 6d.; for Australia, etc., 15s.; for India, etc., 19s. Five new subscriptions: For British Islands, etc., 25s.; for Australia, etc., 37s. 6d.; for India, etc., 47s. 6d. Specimen copies will be sent on receipt of postage.

JOHN BURNS AND FOREIGN COMPETITION.

JOHN BURNS is reported to have said at Hartlepool that Englishmen could always beat the foreigner. There's a smell of mildew about this statement; it smacks of the period of Gillray's satires upon the foreigners, and when it was impossible for anyone of foreign aspect and speech to pass unmolested about the streets of London. It ranks with the boast that one Englishman can fight six foreigners, and that all Englishmen dine daily off roast beef and plum pudding.

No doubt the position occupied by Burns is an equivocal one, and necessitates some pondering to the prejudices of his following. Such swallowing of principles is part of the penalty of leadership; but Burns could use his position to preach internationalism, instead of talking down to the grossest form of jingoism extant. A large proportion of his followers believe in England for the English, and all the world for them too if it can be grabbed. They want, in short, an international system of commerce handled solely by Englishmen, which very modest aspiration is not likely to be gratified.

The next commercial depression will leave its mark on the New Unionism, if it does not utterly destroy it. Burns might utilise the interval by rooting out the narrow nationalist prejudices of his followers, to preach the international solidarity of labour. It would fit them for the time when their New Unionism will be as a broken reed in their hands, and instead of looking upon a gain of 1d. per hour as a final solution of the labour problem, cause them to strive for the total overthrow of masterdom.

BE BOLD AND RESOLUTE!

ONE of the most hopeful signs of our hopeful time is the universal discontent, rising here and there (as the other day at Leeds, or in the Wellington Barracks) into open rebellion and "mutiny," which is beginning to animate the braver and more desperate of our wage-slaves to practical protest against the hideous mockery of society under which we live to-day. The motto of our League enjoins us to "agitate" and "organise," as well as to "educate," and surely we cannot but rejoice and take courage at every blow struck at bourgeois institutions and bourgeois law,—even although the striker may never have read 'Das Kapital,' and may even be quite ignorant of scientific economics.

Economics are (let us concede at once) good to know. The work of Karl Marx and the rest can never, in the nature of things, be forgotten in the happy days to come after the Revolution. Thanks to them (and to other still more daring and original thinkers), we know, roughly at least, how to assist the evolution of the new and better world. But if we are to wait, before beginning the general overthrow, until every combatant on our side has mastered the scientific aspect of Socialism, then indeed (as that Fabian said) we shall "die in the wilderness." Fortunately, even were we willing to wait, the current which is—silently for the most part, yet surely—bearing us onward towards Niagara would not wait for us. Precisely how near the catastrophe may be, we cannot tell. He would be a foolish man indeed who should pledge himself that it will not come next year; on the other hand, we may have to wait for years for the final emancipation of mankind. Come when it may, it is surely much to be desired that, if it may be, it should come as the result of passionate detestation of capitalist rule—passionate longing for the reign of equality—and not merely as a consequence of economic necessity. If so, we should foster and cherish, by all means in our power, this same passionate detestation of things as they are,—in other words, the spirit of revolt and insurrection. "What?" our doctrinaire Socialist of the arm-chair may ask, "would you stimulate and encourage aimless mutiny, aimless destruction, for the sake of mutiny and destruction?" The present writer answers, for his part, "Assuredly I would. 'Civilisation' and so-called society to-day form so vile and hateful a tyranny that, even were there nothing to put in their places, I should sympathise heartily with any attempt to destroy them. Better, a hundred times better, unknown chaos than such a loathsome system of organised robbery and murder as that under which we live now." But it is unnecessary to consider any such question. Come the destruction of middle-class society when it may, it is clear now that the race is prepared to enter on the next stage in its long history. Mistakes may be made at first; it may even go hard with our doctrinaire friend, unless he see the error of his ways (so well-read a person will surely remember the tale of the Girondists, and be warned in time); but we are certain in the long run Free Communism will replace wage-slavery, and the tyranny and robbery of landlordism and capitalism will be known no more.

It is not our business, then, as revolutionists, to fear the Revolution or to hinder its coming, but rather to hurry it on as best we can. The very finest lever we have to work with in our attack on the possessing classes is the fierce and growing hatred of the workers for the robbers who live on their labour. That hatred should be encouraged and strengthened at all hazards. Our aim is to fan the smouldering class war into a blaze which shall fire the world. Deliberately do I for my part say that hatred of capitalists is, from our standpoint, an excellent thing, as well as hatred of capitalism. We are not Christians, that we should love our enemies, do good to them that spitefully use us, or turn the other cheek to the smiter. That line of policy has been tried for nineteen hundred years, and the result is that the present representatives of the Galilean carpenter and street agitator (a "labour-leader" in his own way) are "His Holiness Pope Leo XIII.," "His Grace the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury," and "General" Booth. Revolutionary ethics are robuster and more manly, and likely, let us trust, to prove more successful as a working theory of life. As has been well said by a French comrade, "Only those who know how to hate can really love." Only those who hate a Livesey or a Norwood can sincerely love humanity. "Do I not hate them, Lord, who hate thee?" said the old Jewish singer, addressing his Jehovah, his national deity, the mythical Spirit of his tribe. Do we not hate them who hate mankind (the only mankind worth considering, the proletariat)? Let us who look not to the tribe but to the race, and with the force generated by this ever-intensifying hatred, organise revolt everywhere. Riot, conflict, and disorder will multiply and grow as the doomsday of theft and mastership draws near. The more they multiply and grow the better for us. "Mutiny" and revolt does not necessarily mean the beginning of the Revolution itself; but it is an excellent preparation and, so to speak, education for the Revolution. Wherever there is excuse or opportunity, let us strike at the odious-bourgeois in such fashion as to train ourselves for action and to make him understand that his hour has nearly come. Whenever we get the chance, let us preach detestation of him and all his deeds, contempt of his laws, resolution to re-take from him his ill-gotten wealth for the benefit of all. This is the really pressing work. When these feelings are once fairly roused it will be time to turn to theories of the future—theories which, after all, have now been tolerably well discussed, and which it is time to put in practice.

London Members' Meeting.—The next monthly meeting of members will be held on Wednesday, August 27th, at 8.30 p.m., at the Autonomie Club, Windmill Street, Tottenham Court Road, W. Comrade Kitz will give an address on "Revolutionary Propaganda." All members invited to attend.

REVOLUTIONARY GOVERNMENT.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF PETER KROPOTKINE.

I.

THAT the existing governments ought to be abolished, so that liberty, equality, and fraternity may no longer be vain words but may become living realities; that all the forms of government which have been tried up to the present have been only so many forms of oppression, and ought to be replaced by a new form of organisation,—so far, all those who think, and whose temperament is, however little, revolutionary, are perfectly agreed. To tell the truth, it is not even necessary to be much of an innovator to come to this conclusion; the vices of the existing governments, and the impossibility of reforming them, are too striking not to be seen at once by every reasonable observer. And as to overthrowing the governments, we know, speaking generally, that at certain periods that takes place without much difficulty. There are moments when the governments fall to pieces almost of their own accord, like houses of cards, before the breath of the revolted peoples. That was seen quite clearly in 1848 and 1870: it will be seen again very soon.

To overthrow a government—that is the end for a middle-class revolution. For us it is only the beginning of the Social Revolution. The machinery of the State once thrown out of gear, the hierarchy of the officials fallen into disorganisation and no longer knowing how to act, the army of the defenders of capital once put to rout—it is then that we have to face the great work of destroying the institutions which serve to perpetuate economical and political slavery. The possibility of free action is acquired;—what are the revolutionists going to do?

To this question there are only the Anarchists who reply, "No more government—Anarchy." All the others say, "A revolutionary government." They differ only as to the form to give to this government. Some desire that it shall be elected by universal suffrage in the State or in the commune; others declare in favour of a revolutionary dictatorship.

A "revolutionary government"! Those are two words which sound very strangely to the ears of those who understand what the Social Revolution ought to signify and what is the meaning of a government,—two words which contradict each other, which destroy one another. We have seen often enough despotic governments—it is the essence of all governments to be for the reaction against the revolution and necessarily to be despotic—but we have never seen a revolutionary government, and for a very good reason. It is because the revolution—synonym of "disorder," of destruction, of the overthrow in a few days of venerable institutions, of violent demolition of the established forms of property, of destruction of castes, of rapid transformation of the ideas accepted about morality, or rather, about the hypocrisy which occupies its place, of individual liberty and spontaneous action—is precisely the opposite, the negation of government, that being the synonym of "the established order," of conservatism, of the preservation of the existing institutions, the negation of individual initiative and action. And nevertheless, we continually hear people speak of this white blackbird as if a "revolutionary government" was the most simple thing in the world, as common and as well-known to everyone as royalty, empire, or the papacy.

That the self-styled revolutionists of the middle-class should preach this idea it is easy to understand. We know what they mean by revolution. It is simply a patching up of the middle-class republic; it is the taking possession by the self-styled republicans of the lucrative employments reserved to-day for the Bonapartists and the Royalists. It is, at the outside, the divorce of the Church and State replaced by the concubinage of the two; the confiscation of the wealth of the clergy for the benefit of State, and above all for the benefit of the future administrators of this wealth: perhaps even the referendum, or some other machine of the same kind. But that the revolutionary Socialists should make themselves the apostles of this idea—we can explain it only in supposing one of two things: either those who accept it are imbued with the middle-class prejudices which they have unconsciously drawn from the literature, and especially from the history, written for the use of the middle class by members of that class, and, still full of the spirit of servility produced by centuries of slavery, they cannot even imagine themselves free; or they do not desire this Revolution, the name of which is always upon their lips—they would be contented with a mere patching up of the existing institutions, on condition that they were put in power and left free to find out later on what it would be necessary to do to quiet the "mob," that is to say, the people. They are against those who govern to-day only because they wish to take their place. With these people we do not desire to reason. We will speak, then, only to those who are honestly deceived.

Let us commence by the first of the two forms of "revolutionary government" which are extolled—the elected government.

Authority, royal or otherwise, is overthrown, the army of the defenders of capital is routed; everywhere there is fermentation, the discussion of public affairs, the desire to march forward. The new ideas come to the front, the necessity of serious changes is understood; it is necessary to act, it is necessary to commence without mercy the work of demolition in order to clear away the ground for the new life. But what is proposed to be done? To convoke the people for the elections and to elect a government immediately afterwards, to confide to it the work that we all, every one of us, ought to do on our own initiative!

This is what Paris did after the 18th of March, 1871. "I shall always remember," said a friend to us, "these beautiful moments of emancipation. I had descended from my garret in the Latin Quarter to enter that immense meeting in the open-air, which was filling the Boulevards from one end of Paris to the other. Everybody was discussing the public business, all personal pre-occupation was forgotten, there was no longer any question of buying and selling, all were ready to throw themselves forward body and soul towards the future. Even some members of the capitalist class, carried away by the general enthusiasm, regarded with pleasure the beginning of a new existence. 'If we have to make the Social Revolution, very well, we will make it; let us put everything in common, we are ready!' The elements of the revolution were there; all that had to be done was to bring them into action. When in the evening I returned to my room, I said to myself, 'After all, humanity is grand! We did not understand it; it had always been calumniated!' Then came the elections, the members of the Commune were named, and the power of devotion, the zeal for action, was extinguished little by little. Every one returned to his accustomed work, saying, 'Now we have an honest government, let us leave it to act!'" We know what followed.

Instead of acting themselves, instead of marching forward, instead of throwing themselves boldly into a new order of things, the people, confiding in their government, left to it the work of taking the initiative. There was the first consequence, the fatal result of the elections. What, then, would this government do invested with the confidence of all?

Never were elections more free than those of March, 1871. The adversaries of the Commune have themselves recognised it. Never were the great mass of the electors more strongly imbued with a desire to put the best men into power, the men of the future, the revolutionists. And this is what they did. All the revolutionists of renown were elected by formidable majorities; Jacobins, Blanquists, Internationalists, the three revolutionary factions, were found represented in the councils of the Commune. Elections couldn't possibly produce a better government.

We know the result. Shut up in the Hôtel de Ville with instructions to proceed in accordance with the forms established by previous governments, these ardent revolutionists, these reformers, found themselves unable to do anything to produce any good result. With all their good will and their courage they did not even know how to organise the defence of Paris. It is true that to-day the blame is thrown upon the men, upon individuals, but it was not individuals who were the cause of this catastrophe—it was the method applied.

In fact, universal suffrage when it is free can at the most only give an Assembly representing an average of the opinions which are current at the moment amongst the people; and this average at the commencement of revolution is generally only a vague idea, very vague, of the work which is to be done, without taking into account how it should be done. Ah! if the bulk of the nation, of the commune, were able to understand one another before the movement as regards what they would have to do as soon as the government was overthrown! If this dream of the Utopians of the drawing-room could be realised, we would never have had any bloody revolutions; the will of the bulk of the nation having been expressed the remainder would submit with good grace. But it is not in this way things take place. The Revolution burst forth before a general understanding is possible, and those who have a clear idea of what they will have to do on the morrow of the rising are at that moment only a small minority. The great mass of people have as yet only a general idea of the end which they wish to see realised, without knowing very well how to act in order to bring about this end, without having much confidence as to the steps they ought to take. The practical solution will be found, will become clear, only when the change has already commenced; it will be the product of the revolution itself and the people in action—or else it will be nothing; the intelligence of a few people being absolutely incapable of finding the solutions which can arise only from the life of the people.

It is this situation which is reflected in the body elected by the suffrage, even when it has not all the vices inherent to representative governments in general. The few men who represent the revolutionary idea of the period find themselves overwhelmed amongst the representatives of the revolutionary schools of the past, or of the existing order of things. These men who are so necessary in the midst of the people, precisely in the revolutionary days, to scatter their ideas broadcast, to put the masses in motion, to demolish the institutions of the past—find themselves compelled to stop there in a room discussing at greater length than they imagined in order to tear some concessions from the moderates, to convert some of their enemies, whilst there is only one possible means of bringing them round to the new ideas—to put those new ideas into execution. The government changes in parliament, with all the vices of the capitalist parliaments. Far from being a "revolutionary" government it becomes the greatest obstacle to the revolution, and to stop its "marking time" the people find themselves compelled to dismiss it, to turn away those who only yesterday they hailed as their elected. But it is no longer an easy matter. The new government, which feels called upon to organise an entirely new administration in order to extend its rule and make itself obeyed, is not inclined to give way so quietly. Anxious to maintain its power, it clings on to it with all the strength of an institution which has not yet had time to fall into senile decomposition. It is resolved to oppose force to force, and there is only one way to dislodge it—to take up arms and make the revolution over again, in order to get rid of those in whom the people had placed all their hopes.

And in this way the revolution is divided. After having lost precious time in coming to terms with its opponents, it is about to lose its strength in internal dissensions between the friends of the young government and those who have realised the necessity of doing away with it! And all this through not having understood that a new life requires new methods, that it is not by clinging to the old forms that a revolution is effected! All this because the incompatibility of revolution and government has not been comprehended, because it has not been foreseen that the one, under whatever form it is presented, is always the negation of the other, and that outside of Anarchism there cannot be a revolution.

It is just the same as regards that other form of "revolutionary government" which is so much cried up—the revolutionary dictatorship.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

THE DOCKERS' DEMONSTRATION.

The Dockers' Demonstration was immensely successful. Sunday was one of the brightest and finest days I have seen during this dull and gloomy summer. There was no mist, no gloom to veil the brightness of the glorious sun; the weather was radiant, and everyone's spirits was up to the weather. It is quite true that the demonstration was not so large as that of the Eight Hours Day, but there were at least no leaden skies to make the demonstrators feel miserable. I shall say nothing of the muster on the Embankment or the march through the streets; that has been described again and again in the ordinary press; but there was one incident that the capitalist press has not, in most cases, described at all, for very obvious reasons. When the front of the procession reached Wellington Barracks, the bands that headed struck up "The British Grenadiers," and the whole crowd burst into a thundering shout, waving their hats wildly in the air. The sentries at the gate looked on with seeming apathy; they did not present arms this time, for commissioned and non-commissioned officers had their eyes upon them; but from the open barrack windows, where the soldiers were lounging in their shirt-sleeves, hands and handkerchiefs were waved, several men in their enthusiasm seizing their red coats and waving them. On the procession passed, and as every band reached the barracks "The British Grenadiers" rang merrily out, and there was nought but cheering from one end of the procession to the other, soldiers and people cheering each other as the procession marched by. This was certainly the most interesting incident of the whole demonstration.

Another fact of interest to revolutionists is also worth noting. The "Marseillaise" was the popular tune of the day. Even the Tory Evening News notes that it was the only tune to which the men marched with any spirit. Probably with a view of getting rid of that "dreadful tune," with its memories of revolution and of the men "who knew how to die," so comforting to the "hupper suckles," the Evening News recommends "a good labour march," and laments piteously that until it is written "the 'Marseillaise' seems to be the only piece of music which makes the London workman step in time." Probably a combination of "We don't want to Fight," "God save the Queen," and "Rule Britannia" is the sort of thing the Evening News would like. Whether it would suit the workmen is quite another question. We note with interest that the procession did not pass in front of Buckingham Palace. The police probably had made other arrangements. Popular processions must not annoy the royal flunkies with the "Marseillaise." The old woman was out of town, according to her usual custom, so her feelings could not be offended.

The speakers on the platforms all exulted in the progress of the New Unionism.

John Burns gave an indication of aggressive policy when he declared that he wished they would relieve him from the County Council and his candidature for Parliament, so that for five years he might labour to elevate the lot of the agricultural labourers, and prevent them from flocking to the large towns to depreciate an already overstocked labour market. In our opinion John Burns would be far better employed in stirring up a labour revolt among the agricultural labourers than in electioneering or in endeavouring to turn County Councillors into honest men. The latter is a very hopeless task.

Mr. Freaque, who said he was not a Socialist, was the only man to give the Socialists credit for their work in the past. He said it was the Socialists who had taught the workers to rebel by their preaching in the highways and byways.

Ben Tillet curiously enough made the best speech from a revolutionary point of view. Ben Tillet is getting on. His peroration is worth quoting:

"We call upon the pulpit to help us, we call upon the Senate; but if they won't help us we will help ourselves. We want them to come and assist us; we ask them as Christians to come and assist us. With the settlement of this difficulty there will be the advent of a time when the nation will be upright and true, when immorality and starvation will not exist, when every wife will be a happy wife, and every home a comfortable home, when every man will be an honest and a dignified man, when one generation will hand to its successor a heritage of happiness and prosperity."

If this is the ideal of the New Unionism, we can only wish it success and prosperity, for it will be found that the only way to realise this is for the workers to sweep the idlers and robbers away who live upon their labour, and to take possession of their own, i.e., the land, factories, mines, railways, docks, and all other means of producing and distributing wealth, must be seized by the people for their own use and enjoyment, and then indeed "one generation will hand to its successor a heritage of happiness and prosperity."

The Welsh Railway Strike.

On Thursday, just after an "accidental" fire, through which a signal-box was burnt down, the directors suddenly gave in. It is worth noting that this signal-box caught fire just after the directors had threatened to use soldiers as blacklegs. Perhaps the reason the directors gave in was that they thought that if they did not surrender there might be some more "accidents." It is dangerous to drive workmen to desperation. The terms of the agreement are as follows: That the company undertake to pay for a week of sixty hours, subject to the conditions that the men will not be paid for time lost through the monthly holiday at the collieries, or through strikes or other unusual interruptions or undertakings connected with the railway; the ordinary holidays at Easter, Whitsuntide, and Christmas to be treated as heretofore on the Taff Valley Railway. The hours of the pilot men, engine men, and shunting men are to be eleven per day, with six hours per week allowed, reducing the net hours worked to sixty. Signalmen's time is to be twelve hours per day, with twelve hours in the week allowed off, again reducing the total hours to sixty.

The Eight Hours Day.

The London Compositors have not only decided in favour of the legal eight hours, but have refused to allow their secretary Mr. Drummond, one of the worst of the "old gang," to go as a delegate to the Trades Congress. In his place they have appointed Mr. Matthews, a young man who is not ashamed of being a Socialist. The London Trades Council, by 62 to 30, have also decided to instruct their delegates to vote for the legal eight hours day at the Congress. Poor Shipton does not stand much chance of the Parliamentary Secretaryship. As to the legal eight hours, we do not believe that a Parliament of capitalists and landlords will ever give it to the workers, and we are sure they will have to take it themselves by a general strike of every trade and industry; and that that strike will probably end in winning much more than an eight hours day.

Lock-out of Borough Scale-makers.

Messrs. Doyle and Sons, Borough, have locked out their men because they refused to work with a man who had blacklegged for Livesey during the strike at the South Metropolitan Gas-works. Good luck to these brave fellows! We hope they will beat their masters and the blackleg.

IN SOUTHERN AFRICA.

SINCE last writing you, there has been a considerable falling-off in the demand for labour of all kinds in all parts of South Africa. Many men of all trades and no trades are going idle in Johannesburg, Transvaal, Durban, Natal, and in Port Elizabeth and other parts of Cape Colony. Wages in Johannesburg have been reduced all round, in many cases as much as 20 and 30 per cent. In the Diamond Fields there are numbers of unemployed whose condition—as if it were not bad enough—the De Beers Company have set themselves to try and make worse in different ways. The first way was by shutting up the Du Toitspau and Bullfontieu mines for no other reason but that the profits (and there has always been a considerable profit from both mines) were not large enough to satisfy the cursed greed of the Hon. Cecil Rhodes and other shareholders in the De Beers Company. The other way was by refusing many workmen leave to work as "debris-washers." Here it is perhaps necessary to explain that ever since the Diamond Fields were discovered, heaps of "debris," or earth that has been washed and searched for diamonds, have been accumulating in different places. Owing to faulty methods in washing and neglect in searching the clay, a number of diamonds were left in the debris, and the re-washing and more careful searching of this rubbish has up till recently given employment and a livelihood—precarious enough, it is true—to a goodly number of men. But the "Hon. Cecil," Lord of the (South African) Heavens and Earth, for his ambition or greed—which is it?—is such that nothing short of the annexation of the upper hemisphere or the demonstrating to him of the impossibility of such a task will satisfy himself and "pals."

And now, craving pardon for this digression, or series of digressions, let me hark back, giving our modern Alexander his full title. The Hon. Cecil, Lord of the (South African) Heavens and Earth, Premier of the Cape Colony, Amalgamator of the Diamond Mines, Paramount Chief of Mashono and Matabele lands, Commissioner of Crown Lands, and God only knows what else, seeing that the competition of these debris-washers might reduce the profits of himself and pals, instantly prohibits such work by laying claim to said debris. But the best part of the whole business is that after the debris-washers had ventilated their grievances pretty well in Kimberly (Diamond Fields), they thought—like a good many more foolish men in a country some six thousand miles away—to obtain justice by appealing to Government. And so a deputation from the Diamond Fields waited last week upon the Governor, Henry Loch, who, after giving them what the local press termed a "patient hearing," and appearing considerably interested, expressed the hope "that the Government" (the Hon. Cecil, the amalgamator, and the most interested man in the company whose action the deputation complained of) "would see their way to assist the debris-washers at Kimberly. The deputation then thanked the Governor and withdrew." And now that the mantle of Elisha Sprigg, the late Premier, has descended upon the shoulders of the Hon. Cecil, we will see what redress or manner of relief the Government will give these workers.

Which way the wind will blow is pretty plainly shown by the following motion which Mr. Laing, member for Fort Beaufort, gave notice of in the House a few days ago: "That in the interests of the country it is impolitic and undesirable that the official representative of the British South Africa Company should be Prime Minister of this colony." There are a good many other things, my dear Mr. Laing, done in the Cape Legislative Assembly which are also undesirable and impolitic in the interests of the country. What about the Masters and Servants Act, and the amendment to it sanctioning the flogging of workers, but in no way applying to masters? What about the Native Location Bill? and Mr. Trower's Bill to prohibit Amaqueta dances amongst natives? Since the native population is increasing out of all proportion to the whites, I have no doubt that at no very distant date Mr. Trower or the "Hon. Cecil" will be quite agreeable to introduce and pilot a Bill for the prevention of breeding amongst natives. And to wind up, what about the "Stock Thefts Repression Bill"? and the pass system?—all of which are directed against the natives. What the late Premier, Gordon Sprigg, would not do—viz., speak in favour of the Flogging Bill for workers—the present Premier, Cecil Rhodes, did, and was quite prepared to vote for it if a precedent could only be established, and straightway set himself the task to find one—and proved it, to the satisfaction of all concerned. Is there anything the modern politician would not vote for—precedent or no precedent—so long as it was in the interests of his own class?

In Cape Town the agitation for an eight hours' working-day still goes on, and has taken form in an organisation called the "Cape Town Trades and Labour Council," which, unlike the narrow-minded, selfish, exclusive trades unionism of Britain, is composed of workers of all kinds; the only qualification is that the members must be workers. The membership is increasing, and though there are perhaps only about 170 or 180 men employed as joiners and carpenters in Cape Town, yet the membership now numbers about 150. One of the last acts of the late ministry was the granting of the "eight hour day" to the engineering departments of the government railways, so that now the working-day commences in winter at 6.50 a.m., ending at 5 p.m., working till 12 o'clock on Saturdays. In summer, from 6.30 a.m. till 4.30 p.m. All over the colony there are more labourers than there is a demand for, so that no workmen ought to leave Britain to come here on "spec"—were I to speak more to the point, I might say that no worker ought to leave Britain if his only motive in doing so is to get higher wages. Higher wages are to be had in the United Kingdom if the workers will but fight for them. However, I trust to see the day when men the world over will work for something more than a mere wage.

The "Chartered Company" are pushing their "Filibustering Expedition" slowly up into the Matabele Country, and unless I am much mistaken they will come down country much faster than they went up. It is rumoured that troops are to be sent up from Natal to assist, I suppose, in increasing the dividends of Mr. Fife and Aberdeen, and others of a like kidney. Now that the "Hon. Cecil" is "bossing" the show, shares in the S.A.C. Co. may reasonably be expected to "boom" again, and seeing that the Chartered Company in point of dividend paying are about to put the Automatic Photographic Company into the shade completely, I suppose that Messrs. Wales, Fife, and Aberdeen will stick to what shares they have got like so many limpets to a rock. They need not be in the least afraid but that their interests will be well looked after. With Mr. Rhodes, the originator of the company, as Premier of the Cape Colony, and shareholders in the Cabinet, and a paid director of the company acting as Commissioner of Crown Lands, the "Jammery Ring" can take a back seat. When Mr. Laing, member for Fort Beaufort, brought his motion before the House of Assembly and challenged Mr. Rhodes as to what he would do in the event of Colonial interests clashing with those of the Chartered Company, the Premier was heard to say "that he would resign, but that he could not conceive of the interests conflicting." Of course not; but what has Mr. Rhodes to say about the smuggling of the guns into the interior last year, in which he as an official of the South Africa Company played the chief part? and what about the colonys interest being likely to suffer by the war which sooner or later will result from robbing the Matabeles of their territory? Of course, the motion was negatived by a large majority; no one but an idiot would have expected the result to turn out otherwise. To satisfy themselves and blind outsiders, a number of members of the "House" expressed the opinion that the Hon. Cecil meant well, but that at the same time they would "keep an eye on him"—so that whilst at home you "keep your eye on Paisley," colonists will find it worth their while to "keep their eye on Cecil," and a few other things as well.

REPORTS.

NORTH LONDON.—At Regent's Park our meeting was addressed by Stone, Nicoll, Edwards, and Turner; collection, 6s. In Hyde Park Miss Lupton and Nicoll addressed a good meeting. We have sold this week 110 Commonweal, some Chicago Speeches and other literature.

LEEDS.—We held three good meetings here on Sunday—speakers Sollit, Sweeney, Corkwell, and Samuels. Commonweal and pamphlets sold well. At a special club meeting it was resolved that we get up a demonstration here for Mowbray on September 7.

ABERDEEN.—At Quayside (foot of Market Street), on 14th, Rennie and Leatham addressed good meeting. At Castle Street on Saturday night Aiken, Duncan, and Rennie addressed a large crowd while Addie and Leatham vigorously pushed the sale of literature. A word ought to be said in praise of the exertions of the choir just now, the members of which are turning up at meetings in unusual force and making the singing correspondingly effective.—L.

An Appeal.—Comrade Lessner appeals to us on behalf of A. Weiler, who, with his wife and three children, is in a terrible condition of poverty. Weiler is an old veteran in the Revolutionary Cause, who has worked in the Continental movement for twenty years, from the beginning of the International Workingmen's Association. Help is most urgently needed, and should be sent to the Secretary of the Communist Working Men's Club, 49 Tottenham Street, Tottenham Court Road, W.C., or to F. Lessner, 12 Fitzroy Street, Fitzroy Square.—Received from the Hammersmith Branch S. L., 9s. 6d.

THE SATIRES OF CYNICUS.

"SINE IRA ET STUDIO."

CYNICUS asks no favour, is no partisan, independent and unbiassed he looks with impartial eye on the follies and corruptions of his time. Unknown and unaided, but with firm purpose, he launches his satires on a world of dissimulation and deceit, where alas—

Virtue's at a discount,
Truth is under par,
Honesty's a scarcity
Wealth is better far.

Knavery's commendable,
Cheating is no sin;
He is the true philanthropist
Who takes the stranger in.

But where, perchance, some honest kindly heart,
While smiling at his fancies, still may say—
"He acts no snarling, mean, or churlish part
Who fain would laugh the follies of the world away."

To SUCH HE DEDICATES HIS BOOK.

To Socialists who wish to see the hypocrisy of modern society pictorially lampooned, we recommend Cynicus.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

"A NEW SAVIOUR OF HUMANITY."

THE Review of Reviews for this month gives us the following information, which is of the utmost importance to Anarchists, Socialists, and revolutionists generally:

"July has been a month of peace congresses and international agreements, and it has seen the breaking out of a war as a corollary to the formation of a League of Peace. But it is possible that all these imposing international political acts and demonstrations count for less in the future of the world than the ingenious mechanical contrivance which was exhibited at the headquarters of the London Scottish Rifle Volunteers on July 18th by a French engineer named Giffard. To outward appearance it was a simple thing enough, consisting of a small tube of toughest steel only nine inches in length, containing nothing that when opened the eye can see, the ear hear, the nose smell, or the fingers touch. Yet that small tube may yet be destined to destroy empires, check the progress of Socialism [?], and establish throughout the world the principle of government by consent of the governed [sic!]. Whether it will abolish war is a question for discussion; but if all that is claimed for it is true, it will abolish gunpowder and convert all the armaments of the modern world into old iron. The tough steel tube, nine inches long, is charged with liquified carbonic acid gas, the same that we breathe from our lungs after every respiration, but converted by liquefaction into one of the most powerful propulsives known. It is fixed to the barrel of the rifle in such a way that when the trigger is pulled a drop of the liquified gas is forced into the breech of the gun behind the bullet, where, instantaneously resuming a gaseous condition, it develops a force equal to 500 lb. pressure on the square inch. The bullet is then expelled at any degree of velocity desired, for the power can be increased or diminished by a simple turn of the screw. The pressure is equally distributed and continuously increased until the bullet leaves the barrel. A slight fizz like the escape of gas from a ginger-beer bottle is the only sound which announces the dispatch of the bullet, which flattens itself against the wall at 1,200 yards. The new propellant is indifferent to heat or damp. It will not burst under the impact of a heavy blow, and it is so cheap that 250 bullets can be fired at the cost of a penny."

If this be true (and we have every reason to believe it is, seeing that Messrs. Colt, the American gun-makers, have paid £200,000 for the American rights of the patent), then at last we have something which will be better than all the firearms ever yet introduced. The firing of a rifle or revolver always betrays the whereabouts of those using them. The new weapon will not, at least, do that; and it strikes us forcibly that the Giffard gun will not check the progress of Socialism, Mr. Stead, but, on the other hand, will rather be one of the most powerful and speedy means of realising it. We would also like to say that even in the workshops of the Government it may be quite possible that our comrades will be working and learning what, though an advantage to our masters for the time being, may yet prove of infinite value to us also. The Giffard gun, like dynamite, which only gave them a temporary advantage, may some day be useful to us.

We must also remember that Col. Knollys, equerry in waiting to the Prince of Wales, has given us a valuable hint as to the most effective method of guerilla warfare about two years since in the Fortnightly Review, and again in the last number of the same magazine he thinks the smokeless powder (I suppose they mean the noiseless gun) will largely increase the list of killed and wounded, especially where large army corps are moved, for he thinks it certain that some of them may be completely annihilated. This will give the comrade who acts individually a great advantage, and individual action will in future be the best method that could be adopted, as it will render conspiracies useless, and thus leave no room for the police spy to fill the prisons with our best comrades.

With the new gun, the smoke, the noise, and the perils of powder will disappear, and the expert mounted butcher, whose past delight has been in riding people down, may be taught even a better lesson than that of the ginger-beer bottle of Bow Street. In future, the Warrens or Bradfords, the Bismarcks or Czars, may not find the butchering of unarmed crowds such a safe business, for as they ride in their pride through the streets they will tremble as they remember that the air is filled with "swift death" for them. We must also not forget that, owing to our propaganda among our comrades in the army, that with renewed effort on our part in that direction it is just possible that they will reverse their rifles and rid the world of their tyrants!

Bravo for Science! The Giffard gun can be used by the poor as well as the rich. Ways and means have always been found in the past, and depend upon it will be in the future. What to-day fills our Christian masters and others with delight, may yet be the cause of deepest remorse to them and their class, unless they are content to take their places in the workers ranks and leave off thieving for a living!

Yet one point more. The Giffard gun cannot compel men to work who refuse to do so, and the General Strike may yet be a weapon in the hands of the workers, which if used resolutely for Socialism may compel our masters to give way. For force if once resorted to can be used quite as effectively on our side as on the side of our masters. It would be well for most of our comrades, who wish to see our ideas spread into the country districts and among the troops, to do their utmost to help us with money. We are only prevented from doing this by want of means, and all our friends would do well to listen more especially now to the appeal for funds for the Special Propaganda; the Committee can make good use of all the money entrusted to them.

But do not let us be downcast at this latest man-destroyer of our masters, for as gunpowder preceded a great revolution in the past, so also may the Giffard gun be the means that will enable us to achieve our freedom. So I will conclude by saying "All hail to the Giffard gun!" which may yet be the New Saviour of Mankind.

C. W. MOWBRAY.

MEN WHO ARE NOT SOCIALISTS.

VI.

THE POLICE.

I HAVE known a number of policemen intimately, and have, by condescending to the level of their intelligence and sympathies, gained from them a deal of knowledge of human nature. To fraternise in this way properly with a policeman, one must contrive to meet them in a friendly way in a country public-house after the authorised closing time. I have spent many a sociable hour with them on such occasions, and have noticed how soon all their official characteristics except their clothes disappear under the influence of Scotch whisky. I've got them to join in singing the "Marseillaise," dance the "Car-magnole," and toast the "Social Revolution!"

I remember a sergeant of police with whom I got on friendly terms in this way. He knew I was a Socialist, and I knew that he procured smuggled tobacco, and occasionally accepted hares and rabbits which had been poached on a neighbouring preserve. There was thus a magnetism between us as it were. We used to walk arm in arm down a country road after leaving the tavern at midnight, when he confided to me suppressed information about the crimes and scandals of the well-to-do people in the district, and revealed to me many of the secrets of his profession. Having been many years a city constable, his information regarding the theory and practice of "law-'n'-order" was extensive and interesting.

He was much perplexed regarding some points of religion, and seemed to derive much consolation from my exegetical remarks. He was especially interested in the bearing of scientific investigation upon the question of the six day's creation, the flood, and similar old-fashioned points of biblical controversy. I had a deal of trouble in persuading him to give up the orthodox notion of eternal torment. We stood—I remember, some two hours under the moonlight one night arguing the point, and as I bade him "Good morning!" he pressed my hand warmly, and with emotion told me that a new light had dawned upon his soul, and that I had made him a happy man; he then pulled a flask from his hip-pocket, and we drank affectionately and separated.

He was removed to another district shortly afterwards, because a local pawnbroker, who was also a Justice of the Peace, had taken a set against him for discovering some valuable stolen property on his shelves. He was much hurt at this, for, as he explained to me, he was forced to make the discovery against his inclination, and he had befriended the pawnbroker many a time at great risk to himself. Before leaving he assured me that if the Socialists could have given him a salary to go round the country denouncing the police system—as the Irish National party had done in the case of several Irish constables—he would most readily have resigned; and he begged of me that should a favourable opportunity occur, to mention the matter to Morris or Hyndman.

My acquaintance with policemen in their ordinary-mortal capacity led me in the early stages of my propagandist career to regard them as not unfavourable material for operating upon, and for a time I had great ideas of converting them to Socialism wholesale, as the Spaniards converted the Moors to Christianity. I conjured visions of the ranks of the constabulary becoming honeycombed with our proselytes, who would refuse to act in case of a strike or popular revolt. I used, therefore, to direct my remarks so that the policemen who decorated the fringe of the crowd might be conciliated and attracted towards our principles. Oftentimes I was certain that I observed beneath their affected indifference or disdain, a glimmer of sympathy twinkle in their lordly souls. When I had occasion to pass near them I looked kindly in their faces, and if perchance I received a nod of friendly recognition my heart bounded within me. I contrived sometimes to get into conversation with them, and esteemed the vaguest expression of sympathy from one of them as of more importance than an avowal of full acceptance from twenty common citizens.

But it was all a hallucination! Ere long I discovered that their sympathy was without substance—that they were mostly incapable of an honest opinion upon any subject—and that I was only making an ass of myself. All my subsequent experience of them confirms this notion, and convinces me that it is as hard for a policeman to be a Socialist as for a bishop to be a Christian or a politician a patriot.

I never attempt to convert policemen now—I have, I hope, become a wiser man. I have reasoned the matter impartially, and have concluded that even if we could convert a few here and there—and we could not hope to do more—it would serve no useful purpose. If, after being converted, they remained in the force, they would not be men worth converting, and if they left the force others would take their place, and our proselytes being then no longer policemen, we would only have gained a few additional ordinary members—and not likely very good ones either. Besides, I think the fact of policemen becoming Socialists would tend to lower the moral and intellectual status of the movement. They may do all very well for the Salvation Army and other Christian bodies, where the acquisition of heathens and sinners adds lustre to their names and money to their treasuries; but in the Socialist movement we find that the acquisition of honest and intelligent men serves and pays best. We can look at things from a business point of view as well as our neighbours!

So much, indeed have my sentiments changed, that I now feel quite uncomfortable when I think my speeches are making a favourable impression upon any of them. The thought suggests issues that are perplexing. It seems unfair to enlist a policeman's sympathy towards us to-day and perhaps have to heave bricks at him to-morrow. It mars the field and spoils the fight. Of course, if a policeman insists upon becoming a Socialist we cannot prevent him; but it would be better if he didn't. Not that I have any animosity against them personally—none in the least. Although I regard them as destroyers of the public peace, devourers of public rights, maltreaters of the poor, and hired hacks of the privileged class; although I regard them as being mostly ignorant, lazy, bullying, cowardly, conceited rascals; and although at the beginning of this paper I expressed delight in witnessing their public execution,—yet I bear them no malice. Why should I? Are they not victims of civilisation like the rest of us? They are bad, but why should we thirst for their gore? Nay, I regard them rather as Stanley regards Congo niggers—as obstacles in the path of progress: and may not I delight in seeing policemen annihilated in the abstract for freedom's sake, just as Stanley delights to kill Congo niggers in the concrete for civilisation's sake,—without bearing any ill-will against them? Thank heaven! I have enough philosophy in me to enable me to fight and even kill a man without hating him in the least!

When the revolution is accomplished we shall be glad to open our doors to "all that is left of them"; meanwhile let them keep at a respectable fighting distance. If they don't meddle with us we won't meddle with them; if they do meddle with us, then heaven help their poor widows and orphans!

We were quite as successful on Mile End Waste at 7.30; 27 'Weals sold, and a meeting announced for next Sunday. Saturday night at Bermondsey Square, a good meeting by Leggatt, who spoke for Leather Trade strikers; 'Weals sold out.—L.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,
AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. XXVI. (continued).—THE UPPER WATERS.

WE all stopped to receive her. Dick rose in the boat and cried out a genial good morrow; I tried to be as genial as Dick, but failed; Clara waved a delicate hand to her; and Morsom nodded and looked on with interest. As to Ellen, the beautiful brown of her face was deepened by a flush as she brought the gunwale of her boat alongside ours, and said:

"You see, neighbours, I had some doubt if you would all three come back past Runnymede, or if you did, whether you would stop there; and besides, I am not sure whether we—my father and I—shall not be away in a week or two, for he wants to see a brother of his in the north country, and I should not like him to go without me. So I thought I might never see you again, and that seemed uncomfortable to me, and—so I came after you."

"Well," said Dick, "I am sure we are all very glad of that; although you may be sure that as for Clara and me, we should have made a point of coming to see you, and of coming the second time if we had found you away the first time. But, dear neighbour, there you are alone in the boat, and you have been sculling pretty hard, I should think, and might find a little quiet sitting pleasant; so we had better part our company into two."

"Yes," said Ellen, "I thought you would do that, so I have brought a rudder for my boat: will you help me to ship it, please?"

And she went aft in her boat and pushed along our side till she had brought the stern close to Dick's hand. He knelt down in our boat and she in hers, and the usual fumbling took place over hanging the rudder on its hooks; for, as you may imagine, no change had taken place in the arrangement of such an unimportant matter as the rudder of a pleasure-boat. As the two beautiful young faces bent over the rudder, they seemed to me to be very close together, and though it only lasted a moment, a sort of pang shot through me as I looked on. Clara sat in her place and did not look round, but presently she said, with just the least stiffness in her tone:

"How shall we divide? Won't you go into Ellen's boat, Dick, since, without offence to our guest, you are the better sculler?"

Dick stood up and laid his hand on her shoulder, and said: "No, no; let Guest try what he can do—he ought to be getting into training now. Besides, we are in no hurry; we are not going far above Oxford; and even if we are benighted, we shall have the moon, which will give us nothing worse of a night than a greyer day."

"Besides," said I, "I may manage to do a little more with my sculling than merely keeping the boat from drifting down stream."

They all laughed at this, as if it had been a very good joke; and I thought that Ellen's laugh even amongst the others was one of the pleasantest sounds I had ever heard.

To be short, I got into the new-come boat, not a little elated, and taking the sculls, set to work to show off a little. For—must I say it?—I felt as if even that happy world were made the happier for my being so near this strange girl; although I must say of all the persons I had seen in that world renewed, she was the most unfamiliar to me, the most unlike what I could have thought of. Clara, for instance, beautiful and bright as she was, was not unlike a very pleasant and unaffected young lady; and the other girls also seemed nothing more than specimens of very much improved types which I had known in other times. But this girl was not only beautiful with a beauty quite different from that of "a young lady," but was in all ways so strangely interesting; so that I kept wondering what she would say or do next to surprise and please me. Not, indeed, that there was anything startling in what she actually said or did; but it was all done in a new way, and always with that indefinable interest and pleasure of life, which I had noticed more or less in everybody, but which in her was more marked and more charming than in anyone else that I had seen.

We were soon under way and going at a fair pace through the beautiful reaches of the river between Bensington and Dorchester. It was now about the middle of the afternoon, warm rather than hot, and quite windless; the clouds high up and light, pearly white, and gleaming, softened the sun's burning, but did not hide the pale blue in most places, though they seemed to give it height and consistency; the sky, in short, looked really like a vault, as poets have sometimes called it, and not like mere limitless air, but a vault so vast and full of light that it did not anyway oppress the spirits. It was the sort of afternoon that Tennyson must have been thinking about, when he said of the Lotos-Eaters' land that it was a land where it was always afternoon.

Ellen leaned back in the stern and seemed to enjoy herself thoroughly. I could see that she was really looking at things and let nothing escape her, and as I watched her, an uncomfortable feeling that she had been a little touched by love of the deft, ready, and handsome Dick, and that she had been constrained to follow us because of it, faded out of my mind; since if it had been so, she surely could not have been so excitedly pleased, even with the beautiful scenes we were passing through. For some time she did not say much, but at last, as we had passed under Shillingford Bridge (new built, but somewhat on its old lines), she bade me hold the boat while she had a good look at the landscape through the graceful arch. Then she turned about to me and said:

"I do not know whether to be sorry or glad that this is the first time that I have been in these reaches. It is true that it is a great pleasure to see all this for the first time; but if I had had a year or two of memory of it, how sweetly it would all have mingled with my life, waking or dreaming! I am so glad Dick has been pulling slowly, so as to linger out the time here. How do you feel about your first visit to these waters?"

I do not suppose she meant a trap for me, but anyhow I fell into it, and said: "My first visit! It is not my first visit by many time. I know these reaches well; indeed, I may say that I know every yard of the Thames from Hammersmith to Cricklade."

I saw the complications that might follow, as her eyes fixed mine with a curious look in them, that I had seen before at Runnymede when I had said something which made it difficult for others to understand my present position amongst these people. I reddened, and said, in order to cover my mistake: "I wonder you have never been up so high as this, since you live on the Thames, and moreover row so well that it would be no great labour to you. Let alone," quoth I, insinuatingly, "that anybody would be glad to row you."

She laughed, clearly not at my compliment (as I am sure she need not have done, as it was a very commonplace fact), but at something which was stirring in her mind; and she still looked at me kindly but with the above-said keen look in her eyes, and then she said:

"Well, perhaps it is strange, though I have a good deal to do at home, what with looking after my father, and dealing with two or three young men who have taken a special liking to me, and all of whom I cannot please at once. But you, dear neighbour; it seems to me stranger that you should know the upper river, than that I should not know it; for, as I understand, you have only been in England a few days. But perhaps you mean that you have read about it in books, and seen pictures of it?—though that don't come to much, either."

"Truly," said I. "Besides, I have not read any books about the Thames: it was one of the minor stupidities of our time that no one thought fit to write a decent book about what may fairly be called our only English river."

The words were no sooner out of my mouth than I saw that I had made another mistake; and I felt really annoyed with myself, as I did not want to go into a long explanation just then, or begin another series of Odyssean lies. Somehow, Ellen seemed to see this, and she took no advantage of my slip; her piercing look changed into one of mere frank kindness, and she said:

"Well, anyhow I am glad that I am travelling these waters with you, since you know our river so well, and I know little of it past Pangbourne, for you can tell me all I want to know about it." She paused a minute, and then said: "Yet you must understand that the part I do know, I know as thoroughly as you do. I should be sorry for you to think that I am careless of a thing so beautiful and interesting as the Thames."

She said this quite earnestly, and with an air of affectionate appeal to me which pleased me very much; but I could see that she was only keeping her doubts about me for another time. WILLIAM MORRIS.

THE ST. LUKE'S EVICTIONS.

WE preserve the following taken from the Star, which should teach our Radical friends that cruel and merciless evictions are quite as common in London as Ireland:

"The drama of Golden Lane is working itself out. While the evictor and his emergency men were exulting over their victory at Clerkenwell Police-court, there was a scene of a different character going on in the filthy little court over which the dispute has taken place. Amongst the evicted was an old man, 84 years of age. He has for many years occupied one of the tumbledown rooms in this awful slum, and has weekly paid over 2s. 6d. to Mr. Marmaduke Matthews for the privilege of being poisoned with foul air and squalor. His total weekly income was 3s. 6d., a pension from a cabinet-making firm in Hackney for which he used to work in his younger days. To this he added about 1s. 3d. a month by making book-slides in his feeble old way. He has been moved twice during these cruel evictions, but he will not trouble the house jobber again. He will offer no resistance to being taken out next time, for he died after the worry and anxiety of being driven like a dog from one wretched kennel to another. Shortly after the old man died, having expressed on his death-bed a wish not to have a pauper's funeral, Marmaduke Matthews, the recipient of that weekly 2s. 6d. for rent, came along, and graciously contributed sixpence—a whole sixpence, mind you—towards the cost of a burial not at the expense of the parish. When a Star man visited the poor fellow a few days ago in his wretched room, whose only furniture was a broken bed propped up with a box, two chairs, and a table saved from falling by leaning against the wall, he found Johnson cooking his meal of rice and water, and feeding with a few grains a little linnet, which was his only companion in the world. He complained then of the cruelty with which he was being moved on, and told our man how, out of his scanty income, he had regularly paid over two-thirds for rent, and yet they were evicting him. People who imagine that good samaritanism is confined to respectable well-to-do folk ought to have seen how, even in this frightful slum, with all its horde of rough inhabitants, this old man owed many a real addition to his means to the kindness of neighbours who could ill afford the gift."

When are the English people going to be men enough to stop these brutalities by greeting the bailiff with bricks, stones, and hot water after the Irish fashion? Liberal ministers may then remember that landlord tyranny is not confined to Ireland! Don't forget Johnson was a "Free Englishman," and he lived in a place not fit for a dog and on Chinese diet—rice and water! But we all know the English workman is so much better off than the foreigner, and so superior in every way!

SOCIALISM IN LONDON AND THE PROVINCES.

WEST-CENTRAL LONDON ('COMMONWEAL').

THE 'Commonweal' Branch have been very active during this month with propaganda work, such as the pushing of the paper, distribution of leaflets, and general dissemination of anti-Parliamentarian tactics. Indoor work has proved very successful, good audiences having been addressed in our hall on Sunday evenings. The singing class practices have not been so well attended, and your secretary suggests that as it is but a step from the class to the street corner, comrades might turn up; the singing of our revolutionary songs helps to draw large audiences, relieves the speakers, and tends to sell our paper and song-books. Outdoor meetings have been held regularly at Hoxton on Friday evenings and Sunday mornings. On Friday, August 15, we took large red flag with us, and were taken for the time being as apostles of the Salvation Army, in some instances receiving groans and hisses, but this suddenly disappeared when we began speaking. A large audience was addressed by Leggatt, Kitz, Mrs. Lahr, and Blundell; at one point of the meeting some miserable half-hearted opposition on the foreign bogey came from some half-starved and pinch-faced women, who were all hat and feathers and no boots, but they were more to be pitied than blamed; our comrade Kitz let them down very gently, and the meeting at last expressed evident signs of satisfaction at what had been said by our comrades. At same place on the following Sunday morning, comrades Burnie, Mrs. Lahr, and Blundell addressed very good meeting, the flag this time proving a good attraction. The No-Rent Crusade was advocated pretty plainly by the speakers, and altogether seemed to be received with approbation. Several of our comrades attended the Docker's Demonstration in the afternoon, and distributed several thousand leaflets and pushed the Commonweal. At this meeting we had a strange experience. A meeting was started by us, and some reference made to the fact that the New Unionism was due to the work of the Socialists, but that now those who have benefited by their work shrink from the name of Socialist, and would wear anything but red as a badge, the dockers intolerantly refused to hear this lecture and broke up the meeting. It was, however, reformed further on, and a large amount of Commonweals disposed of. On Friday, August 22, at Hoxton, a large and enthusiastic meeting was addressed for three hours and a-half by Leggatt, Burnie, Kitz, Mainwaring, and Blundell, also White (S.D.F.). The usual drunken fool turned up, but disappeared after some kindly treatment of his special case. Some opposition came from a "good Christian young man," who thought our doctrines were erroneous, and would only lead to bloodshed and disorder, and further exhorted the people not to listen to us because we only made working-people more miserable and discontented than they were before, and that no good could come out of it. He also expressed regret that we should criticise the police, because in his case on one occasion, when he was on tramp, and in the town of Hastings, cold and weary, some good and kind policeman there gave him a pot of nice hot tea. He agreed with a good deal that had been said by our speakers, but as a Christian he had more faith in charity, the giving away of soup, blankets, and other little dodges which are resorted to by the mission-hall hypocrites to delude the workers. Kitz replied, and informed the good young man that the police had killed and cruelly beaten and injured many of our comrades, and that there should be no surprise at our expressions of bitterness. We think if this good Christian will read our paper, and attend some more of our meetings, it will not be long before even he will see eye to eye with us. On Sunday morning, August 24, good audience addressed by Mrs. Lahr, Kitz, and Blundell; very sympathetic and no opposition. Our meetings have closed with an endeavour to get names of the Hoxton men and women as members, and we think it will not be long before a good strong branch will be established here. Branch comrades have sold at the different meetings some 157 'Weals, besides distributing some thousands of leaflets.

W. B.

SHEFFIELD AND MANCHESTER.

LEAVING Leicester on Monday week, I went to Sheffield and at once began spreading discontent by holding meetings on Monday at the Pump, West Bar, Tuesday at Bramall Lane and Monolith, Wednesday at Wicker, going on Thursday out into the country to Eckington with comrade Cores, distributing 'Weals and leaflets from house to house, and preparing the way for a meeting which we held in the same town on Friday. The doctrine goes very well among the miners, who seemed only too eager to listen, and were sorry when we had to leave to catch a train back to Sheffield. These meetings will now be kept up by the comrades here. Comrade Bulas and myself went to Woodhouse on Saturday, but owing to all the available ground being taken up by the annual fair, etc., we were unable to hold a meeting. I went to Manchester on Sunday morning, and began by addressing a very large meeting of strikers in the water-proof trade, whose chief speakers were the official clique of the Trades' Council here, and who were so shocked at my utterances that they hastily left the platform. I will give them some more during the week. At night I addressed a very large meeting indeed at the spot where our comrades have been prosecuted. The police did not interfere, nay, what is more they never turned up; and though our Social Democratic friends of Salford promised to turn up and help, yet they failed to put in an appearance. Free speech for Social Democrats is their cry, but down with Anarchists is their action. I am going to stir up Manchester and Salford this week, and shall show our somewhat friends that "We're not asleep!" Good meetings and good sale of literature have been the result of all our meetings.

C. W. M.

NORTH LONDON.—On Saturday, our meeting was addressed by Cantwell, Nicoll, and Edwards; good discussion. Sunday morning an excellent meeting gathered to hear Miss Lupton, Stone, Edwards, and Nicoll; some discussion was replied to by Miss Lupton and Nicoll; collection, 7s. 3d. In Hyde Park, Cantwell, Miss Lupton, Emerson, Coulon, and Furlong spoke; a man of bourgeois appearance, describing himself as a working-man, a well-known leader of workmen's societies in the East-end, etc., but who refused his name, offered some opposition. He proved to be a Guardian of the Poor Law, and on being fixed with a couple of questions he declined to answer and skulked off; collection was 1s. 4d. We also held a meeting at King's Cross on Sunday evening, where Miss Lupton, Edwards, and Nicoll spoke. We have sold 7 quires of 'Weal this week and 3s. worth of literature.

LEEDS.—On Sunday last a very successful meeting was held on Hunslet Moor, speakers Allworthy, Cores, Sollit, Sweeney, and Samuels. Good sale of Commonweal and pamphlets, and 3s. 3d. collected. Afternoon, at 3, we held a good meeting and opened up a fresh station at New Wortley recreation ground, Cores, Samuels, and Wormald speaking; good sale of Commonweal. At 6.30, in the "Croft," another very good meeting was held, speakers Cores and Samuels, when 2s. more was collected and the last of our 3½ quires Commonweal sold; good sale of "Monopoly."—H. S.

Socialist Delegates to the Trades Congress.—The Liverpool Socialist Society will be glad to welcome, at 1 Stanley Street, Dale Street, Socialists who are delegates to the Trades Congress to be held in Liverpool next week.

OFFICES: 24 GREAT QUEEN STREET, LONDON, W.C.

HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON

The COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. For Australia, New Zealand, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Transvaal, and the Argentine Republic, a year, 8s.; six months, 4s.; three months, 2s. For India, Ceylon, China, Hong Kong, and the Straits Settlements, a year, 10s.; six months, 5s.; three months, 2s. 6d.

Subscribers who receive a RED WRAPPER are thereby reminded that their subscriptions have expired and must be renewed immediately if they wish to continue to receive COMMONWEAL.

SPECIAL RECRUIT SUBSCRIPTIONS.—To aid in spreading our principles, the following largely reduced terms are offered to those who obtain new subscribers: Two new yearly subscriptions for British Islands, etc., 10s. 6d.; for Australia, etc., 15s.; for India, etc., 19s. Five new subscriptions: For British Islands, etc., 25s.; for Australia, etc., 37s. 6d.; for India, etc., 47s. 6d. Specimen copies will be sent on receipt of postage.

All P. O. orders should be made payable to Post-office, 42 Drury Lane, W.C. Remittances from abroad must be made by International Money Order.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

CORRESPONDENTS who order literature should prepay postage, or state if they wish their parcels to be sent per rail or carrier, "carriage forward."

A. J. WINSTANLEY.—We have not space for the object you mention.

WILL Branch Secretaries please write Reports and Orders for Literature on separate pieces of paper.

TO CONTRIBUTORS.—Workmen could help us greatly by sending in accounts of capitalist tyranny and sweating in London and the provinces. We want the names of the sweaters. Those who write must send us their name and address, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee of good faith. We shall not fear to publish the truth.—EDS.

REVOLUTIONARY GOVERNMENT.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF PETER KROPOTKINE.

II.

THE dangers to which the revolution is exposed if it allows itself to be mastered by an elected government are so evident, that a whole school of revolutionists have boldly renounced this idea. They understand that it is impossible for an insurgent people to give itself by means of elections a government which does not represent the past, and which will not be a cannon-ball attached to the feet of the people, especially at the time when it is necessary to accomplish this immense work of regeneration—economic, political, and moral—which we designate the Social Revolution. They throw aside, then, the idea of a "legal" government, at any rate for the period during which the revolt against legality continues, and they cry up the "Revolutionary Dictatorship."

"The party," they say, "which will have overthrown the government will take its place by force. It will possess itself of all power and proceed in a revolutionary manner. It will take the measures necessary to ensure the success of the uprising; it will demolish the old institutions; it will organise the defence of the country. And for those who will not recognise its authority there is the guillotine; for those, workers or capitalists, who refuse to obey the orders which it issues in order to regulate the progress of the revolution—also the guillotine!" This is the reasoning of the Robespierres in embryo—of those who have only remembered the closing scenes of the great drama of the last century, those who have only learnt the speech of the Public Prosecutors under the First Republic.

For us who are Anarchists the dictatorship of an individual or of a party—at bottom it is the same thing—has been definitely rejected. We know that a Social Revolution cannot be directed by the intelligence of a single man or a single organisation. We know that Revolution and Government are incompatible; the one must kill the other, no matter what name is given to the government—dictatorship, royalty, or parliament. We know that the strength and the truth of our party is contained in its fundamental formula, "Nothing good and durable can be done except by the free initiative of the people, and all authority tends to kill it." This is why the best amongst us, if their ideas had no longer to pass through the crucible of public opinion in order to be put into execution, and if they became masters of this formidable machine, the government, so that they would be able to act according to their will, they would become scoundrels in less than a week. We know to what a dictatorship leads—even the best intentioned—to the death of the Revolution. And, moreover, we know that this idea of a dictatorship is always only an unhealthy product of governmental fetishism, which, in conjunction with religious fetishism, has perpetuated slavery.

But to-day we are not speaking to Anarchists. We are speaking to those amongst the revolutionary governmentalists, who, misled by the prejudices of their education, are honestly deceived, and desire nothing better than to discuss their position. We will speak to them then from their own standpoint.

First of all, let us make a general observation. Those who advocate a dictatorship do not generally perceive that in sustaining this prejudice they are only preparing the ground for those who will cut their throats later on. There is a saying of Robespierre's which his admirers would do well to remember. He did not deny dictatorship on principle, but "Mark my words!" he exclaimed suddenly to Mandar, when the latter was speaking to him on the subject one day, "Brissot will be dictator!" Yes, Brissot, the malignant Girondin, the deadly enemy of the equalitarian tendency of the people, the indignant defender of property (which he had formerly described as theft); Brissot, who would gladly have inscribed the names of Marat, Hébert, and all the moderate Jacobins in the prisoners' book of L'Abbaye Prison.

But this saying dates from 1792! At this time France had already been three years in the revolutionary state! In fact royalty no longer existed, there was nothing more to do but to give it the finishing stroke; indeed, the feudal regime was already abolished. Nevertheless, even at this period, when the waves of revolution were freely disporting themselves, it was the reactionary Brissot who had all the chances of being appointed dictator! And before this, in 1789, who had the chance? Mirabeau would have been recognised as the authoritarian chief, the man who was making a bargain with the king for the sale of his eloquence. Those are the men who would have been carried to power at this period if the insurgent people had imposed its sovereignty, supported by pikes, and if they had not followed up the accomplished deeds of the Jacquerie by rendering illusory all constituted power at Paris and in the departments.

But the government prejudice so blinds those who speak of dictatorship, that they would rather prepare the dictatorship of a new Brissot or of a Napoleon than renounce the idea of giving another master to the men who break their chains!

The secret societies of the period of the Restoration, and of Louis Philippe, have powerfully contributed to maintain this prejudice in favour of dictatorship. The middle-class Republicans of the time, assisted by the workers, made a long series of conspiracies to overthrow royalty and proclaim the republic. Not taking into account the immense transformation that would have to take place in France, even for the establishment of a middle-class republican regime to be commenced, they imagined that by means of a vast conspiracy they would overthrow royalty some fine day, take possession of power, and proclaim a republic. For nearly thirty years these secret societies continued to work with unbounded devotion, with perseverance, and heroic courage. If the republic resulted quite naturally from the revolution of February, 1848, it was due to these societies, it was thanks to the propaganda by deed which they carried on during thirty years. Without their noble efforts even now the Republic would be impossible.

Their end then was to take possession of power, and to install the representatives of their ideas in a republican dictatorship. But, as might have been expected, they never succeeded in doing this. As is always the case, as an inevitable result of the existing condition of things, the conspiracy could not overthrow royalty. The conspirators had prepared the fall. They had widely spread the republican idea. Their martyrs had put the ideal before the people. But the last effort, that which definitely overthrew the bourgeois king, was much greater and much stronger than could possibly come from a secret society—it came from the mass of the people.

Everyone knows the result. The party who had prepared the fall of royalty found itself driven away from the steps of the Hôtel de Ville. Others who were too prudent to run the risks of a conspiracy, but better known and also more moderate, waiting for the moment to take possession of power themselves, took the place that the conspirators thought to conquer in the noise of the cannon. Some journalists and lawyers, fine speakers, who were working to make themselves a name whilst the real republicans were forging arms or dying in the convict prison, possessed themselves of power. Some already well known were acclaimed by the crowd; others pushed themselves forward and were accepted because their name represented nothing but a programme of agreement with everybody.

Let no one tell us that this was due to a want of practical thought on the part of the party of action; that others would do better! No, a thousand times, no! It is a law like that which rules the motions of the stars, that the party of action shall remain outside whilst the intriguers and talkers take hold of power. They are better known among the great mass who give the last push. They get the most votes, for with or without voting papers, by acclamation or through the intermediary of the ballot box, at bottom it is always a sort of tacit election that takes place at such a moment by acclamation. They are chosen by everybody, especially by the enemies of the revolution, who prefer to push to the front those who will do nothing, and acclamation thus recognises as chiefs those who are at bottom either enemies of the movement or indifferent to its success.

The man who more than anyone else was the incarnation of this system of conspiracy,¹ the man who paid for his devotion to this system by a life in prison, threw out just before his death these words, which are a programme in themselves, "Neither God nor Master."

CORRESPONDENCE.

"JOHN BURNS AND FOREIGN COMPETITION."

Sir,—In your issue of last week you state that "John Burns is reported to have said at Hartlepool that Englishmen could always beat the foreigner." Without taking the trouble to enquire if such a statement was true, or if true the conditions under which it was made, you at once criticise the statement as if I had made it. Besides this liberal assumption, you go further and lecture me as to what I could have said upon the question of Internationalism, and conclude by saying "Burns might preach the International Solidarity of Labour."

Before you criticise any speeches of mine taken from garbled and condensed reports in capitalist papers, which alone ought to make you suspicious, it is your duty to read the speech in the local papers where it appeared. If you had done so, you would have found that I dealt with the Foreign Competition question from the Socialist point of view entirely. But in answer to a speech made by Sir Charles Palmer, I thought it necessary to prove, as I did, that even from an insular point of view that the masters were not justified in asking for a reduction or resisting an increase of wages in the coal, iron, and shipbuilding trades through foreign competition, as facts were dead against them.

You then insult the intelligence and honesty of the workmen who listened to me by saying it was necessary to pander to them. They did not desire it. I did not do it. The fact is your note was written in entire ignorance of what was really said, and with a view, I believe, of simply adding me with Graham to the already long list of people whom it seems to be your special mission to misrepresent.

In your report also of the docker's demonstration (and such is Socialist editing!) you credit Ben Tillett with the best speech from the revolutionary point of view. In this you may be right, but in Justice of this week he and Tom Mann were credited with the very opposite. Which is right?

For what I said at the meeting I would refer you and your readers to the Times, to which or any other capitalist paper I would rather look for fair reporting than to either of the Socialist papers now in existence. You were so busy denouncing me and all my works on Sunday last in the Park that you could not hear what we said. If you had heard, your report of the demonstration might have been different to what it was.

In your last week's issue you also sneer at my work on the London County Council. I can justly claim to have done a little work in London really revolutionary and also constitutional; but of all the work I have been capable of, none gives me greater satisfaction than the raising of the wages of the workmen of the L.C.C. staff and the reduction of their hours in many cases from twelve to eight.

I know this is regarded as a "dirty palliative" and labelled as mere "constitutionalism" by men who don't know anything about the working-class movement. But I intend to go on with it, in spite of deliberate misrepresentation on the part of men who talk about the reconstruction of society and denounce others who work for it, and have themselves not yet shown capacity enough to run a decent-sized apple-stall.

Take the trouble to hear what the ideal of the New Unionism is, and see, as you easily can, what is the work that Tom Mann, Ben Tillett, and others have really done, and in doing have been impeded by men calling themselves Socialists, and whose chief object seems to be to jealously wreck the good work that they themselves are incapable of doing.

In justice to your readers who read last week's note, this reply ought to be inserted.—Yours truly,

JOHN BURNS.

[The blame, if any, for taking what Burns describes as the garbled and condensed reports of the capitalist press as a basis of criticism, rests with the People's Press, the organ of the New Unionism, the quotation about foreigners being taken from it. We did not insult the intelligence and honesty of the working-men who listened to Burns, but we do know from bitter experience the hide-bound prejudices the bulk of such audiences have against foreigners, and we recognise it as one of the chief hindrances to our propaganda. We protest, therefore, against even the shadow of an attempt to foster them. As a matter of fact, we were not specially engaged in attacking Burns in the Park, but asserted that the principles of International Socialism had been preached to the disorganised workers of London, and that the present upheaval was partly the result of such work. But now a number of men seek to ignore the root principles of Socialism, and to turn the New Unionism into an Aristocracy of Labour. If any further proof were needed the following excerpt from Burns's speech to the dockers on Tower Hill will suffice:

"The docks of London had been too long the haven of refuge for all the loafers, tramps, and deadbeats of Great Britain; for too long had the flotsam and jetsam of the labour market drifted there, to knock down the wages and increase the hours of the legitimate dockers. If these loafers, who wanted to earn money for drink, could not get work, let them go to the poor-law, and throw themselves upon the pockets of the middle and upper classes, and not upon the poor dock labourers. Let them go to the Government and demand a legal eight hours day. They were not going to allow 3,000 or 4,000 loafers and ne'er-do-wells, whom society must support, drive down the wages earned by legitimate workers. In his opinion this was the best and wisest thing they had ever done. Now agricultural labourers and others will know that the docks were not the cesspool for the residuum of labour."

And this is the end of all the tall talk about the dawning day of Labour's Emancipation, etc., etc.

Burns advises us to learn what the ideal of the New Unionism is; judging from the above it seems to be the devil take the hindmost. The complaint about attacks by those who call themselves Socialists is refreshing after our experience of the Labour Elector during John Burns's connection with it and its editor. It would be, perhaps, superfluous to remind Burns what is the ideal of the Socialists, and especially of the International Revolutionary Party; but for the enlightenment of the New Unionists it may be stated that it means the inculcation of the doctrine that the unfortunates who compose the wreckage of our rotten civilisation to-day, are the direct results of the hideous competition around us. Further, that our foreign comrades are one with us in the Order of Labour, and when Commercialism pits them against us we shall attack it and not them.

Emphatically Revolutionary Socialism does not mean the carving out of a new and close order of labour, which will help to kick those already down, meanwhile stigmatising them as loafers, tramps, etc. The exigencies of the New Unionism no doubt compels them to adopt self-protective measures; but to do this and at the same time wish to be credited with holding fast still to the old faith is expecting a little too much. If to carry a kindlier message to the fallen and the dregs is a task at once too heavy and incompatible with the existence of the New Unionism, that is not the fault of the Socialists. Their task, at all events, is clear, and that is, to preach incessantly for the complete overthrow of wage-slavery.

Let us take the other points raised by Burns. As to Cunninghame-Graham, he does not need Burns's protection; if he thinks he has been "misrepresented," he has a tongue and pen and can defend himself. With regard to the Dockers' Demonstration, we stick to our opinion; we have no connection with Justice, and what that organ says is nothing to us. Our criticisms of Burns's work on the County Council were perfectly fair; we did not sneer, we only said he had done better work outside; and surely the stirring up of the labour revolt of 1889 was in the opinion of most reasonable people a greater feat than any work he has done on the County Council. The words "dirty palliative" have never been used in the Commonweal, and we shall trouble ourselves to reply to any personal abuse on the part of Mr. Burns. It is untrue—and Burns knows it is untrue—to say we have "impeded" or have tried to "wreck" the new movement. We have always been friendly to it, when it has done good work, as witness our reports of the dock strike and of the strike of the chocolate girls, and even Burns has acknowledged this in the past.

We do not think the last sentence was necessary. We believe in "free speech." We are neither "New Unionists" nor "New Journalists," and if we give hard knocks we are not afraid of them in return. In conclusion, we say we shall continue to speak out, and we are not to be silenced even by Mr. John Burns.—Eds.]

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

At Grenoble lately the trial took place against our comrades accused of riot on the 1st of May at Vienne. Peter Martin was sentenced to five years' imprisonment, Thenevin to two years, and Buisson to one year. The other accused have been discharged. In spite of the silence of the press, the public who attended were very friendly to the accused, and the opinion of the people is very favourable, so that we may consider this trial as having been very useful to the propaganda of our ideas. Comrade Martin, who has been very prominent in the movement, and who led the people to the plundering of the stores of Mr. Brocart, defended himself splendidly; endorsing all the responsibility of his action, he explained that the workers had the right to take from the rich the possessions which they have stolen from the people, and it was this robbery which has caused the workers to be in distress and want. He described the pitiful condition of the working classes in Vienne, and especially of the working women; he proved that the bourgeoisie will only yield to the legitimate pretensions of the workers when pressed by force, and that if there was any improvement in the condition of the working classes during the last few weeks, that had been in fact through the fright the capitalists had had from the riots of the 1st May. We are very satisfied, he said in his plea, with what we have done, and we are largely repaid for it, for through the walls of our prison the blessings of the working women of Vienne will reach us. I wish, he concluded, that the conscience of our judges might be as peaceful as my own.

The plea of comrade Martin ended amidst the enthusiastic applause of the crowd; everybody was highly affected, even the press people and lawyers who attended.

Thenevin, who was not at Vienne the 1st of May, was accused for a speech made the day before. Buisson was charged with having taken an official by the collar and pushing him out of the meeting, saying, "I abandon you to the justice of the people."

Comrade Louise Michel, who had in the case of Vienne the same responsibility as the others, made it possible for her to be included in the trial; but the Government were afraid that the popularity and the eloquence of this valuable comrade would be dangerous to existing institutions, so they made a vile excuse for not trying her.

In connection with the Grenoble trial, the Intransigent of M. Rochefort, seizing the opportunity that our comrade Martin is in prison and could not answer, said that he was a spy, which base calumny could only be expected from such vile mercenary people.

At Grenoble 10,000 working women and girls are occupied in the glove trade. Of these one-tenth work in factories at the rate of 6s. to 12s. a-week. The rest, who work in the manufacture of gloves from four o'clock in the morning till nine or ten at night, never earn 10s. a-week. In spite of these low wages, the manufacturer puts the work out in the country at yet lower prices, and the working women, who can hardly earn their piece of bread with the hard labour of fifteen hours daily, have to suffer the fearful consequences of want of work.

The people have not forgotten the fearful explosion in the collieries of St. Etienne. The miners are indignant against the greediness of capitalists who can send to their death 120 working-people; and the day won't be long when the united miners will force the capitalist to work underground themselves if they want coals.

ITALY.

A new Socialist paper has appeared at Adria, called Il Polesine. At Macerata (Marche) there has also appeared the Anarchist paper La Campana, specially for the propaganda among the peasants.

An enquiry made by our comrades about the spinning factories of the Calabria (S. I.) has given the following results. There are only women employed at the factories, except for the working of the steam-engines. They work fifteen hours in winter (six in the morning till nine at night) and fourteen in summer, with only half an hour for their meals. There are young girls employed there under twelve years of age. The work is continual and without rest; no holidays, neither Sundays nor weekdays. They are subject to all kinds of penalties, and no excuse is received in case of sickness. If they do not attend to the factory on Sundays they are punished with double penalty. The average wages are 2s. 6d. a-week, the minimum being 1s. 8d. and the maximum 5s.

In Rome at the last bye-elections, out of 29,398 registered electors 3,500 only attended; half voted for the ministers, the other half against. At Faenza, with 4,346 registered electors, only 800 attended, and the local press are satisfied with such a big figure. At Recanati (Marche), out of 1,900 registered electors, only 700 voted; last year the number of voters was 1,200.

At Urbino the women working in spinning factories have obtained a reduction of their work hours; they work twelve hours instead of fourteen. They earn about 3s. a-week.

BELGIUM.

A great miners' strike has broken out in Belgium, chiefly in the district of Mons, on Thursday 21st. At Liège a partial strike has also been declared, and the workers are irritated with the employers because an important company has announced that every workman who on any day does not come to his work without leave of absence shall be fined a sum equal to his day's salary. Meetings have been held at several places.

On Friday night the number of strikers reached 14,000. The men assumed a decided attitude. The solidarity which exists between the miners is remarkable; most of them are on strike in the interest of their fellows. The organisation of the workmen is formidable enough to oblige the authorities and employers to come to some agreement. At Liège they have already obtained an increase of wages.

The great demonstration on the 10th of August in favour of the universal suffrage was enormous, and it will be only a question of a very little time before the people will secure this so-much-desired right. What energy and hard-earned money is wasted in following this will-o'-the-wisp! Napoleon in France, Bismarck in Germany, gave it to the people; they did not think it so very dangerous to their class, but thought it a good safety-valve; and we see constantly what it lets off—"words, words, words."

GERMANY.

On the 30th of July the term of imprisonment (three and a half years) came to an end to which our Russian comrade, Slavinsky, was condemned in the great Socialist trial in Posen (Prussia). A great number of workmen went to the prison Plötzensee near Berlin, eager to grasp him by the hand once more; but several policemen were also in attendance, and as soon as Slavinsky came out he was handcuffed and again locked up. In accordance with the new extradition law, he has been given up to Russian authorities, now claim him for being suspected of having taken part in the removal of a certain justice of the peace in Warsaw in 1884. This is how the authorities oblige each other. A reason is soon invented, just to give it a lawful appearance; we know what being "suspected" means in Russia: if after the cruellest tortures not sufficient proofs can be brought against the accused, the unfortunate person simply disappears in the ice and snow fields of Siberia. It is a pity that no attempt was made at rescue. The people must have been perfectly paralysed; and I am afraid the constant cry of the Social-Democratic leaders, "Don't be provoked to do anything unlawful," has a great deal to do with it; it lames the movement and makes the people afraid to act quickly and on the impulse of the moment. It will be some time before such a good opportunity offers itself again. Later on an attempt was made on the frontier to free Slavinsky, but they had their prey too well secured.

The Home Minister, Herrfurth, has sent a ukase to the provincial presidents, in which he orders that the Socialist movement shall be strictly watched, and suppressed as far as the law can be stretched. Coercion or common law, they strike always in the same way; we are still to be gagged in the good old style. Freedom of speech, press, meeting, and combination is under the merciful consideration of the gentlemen in blue. To us Socialists it makes very little difference by what law we get treated—or rather, ill-treated; our enemies can do and try as they like, there is only one way to stop the movement, and that is by the turning of the private property into common property, the distribution of the stored-up necessities of life to those in want of them, and the use of all machines, tools, and means of communication by the people, for the people. That the present owners will never peacefully submit to these terms any child can see, and it is best to tell the people that the time will come when they will have to show their teeth to get it, and more so to hold it when they have got it. RTR.

The "Postmen's" Gazette' and the 'Commonweal.'

The Postmen's Gazette accuses us of telling "lies" about the secretary of the Postmen's Union, J. L. Mahon. The lies are as follows. We first accused J. L. Mahon of losing the postmen's strike through cowardly mismanagement. Of the truth of this accusation, the public, who read the accounts of the strike in not only the ordinary press, but in the labour press, can judge for themselves. We then said that Mr. Mahon had repeatedly changed his opinions within the last few years, and we especially noticed his apostasy from Revolutionary Socialism to mild Parliamentarism. His frequent changes of opinion are so notorious that Socialists of all schools know our accusation to be true. We beg respectfully to inform the editor of the Postmen's Gazette that lying is not in our line. We need some lessons in that useful art from the small gang of political swindlers who boss what is left of the Postmen's Union.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

Tom Mann makes a Revolutionary Speech.

The leaders of the New Unionism are beginning to speak out. The following speech by Tom Mann delivered last week at a meeting of the Seamen's and Firemen's Union at Bermondsey Town Hall may be of interest to our readers:

"Their objects as trade-unionists were not only to obtain an advance of wages, but to obtain what was far more necessary, the extirpation of poverty and the causes of poverty. There was nothing in nature that said that any one man, woman, or child should be short of the necessaries and comforts of life, and they were working not only for a bare existence wage, but for conditions of affluence. He believed that a greater educational work had been carried on amongst the workers of London during the past year than during any period of their history. Discontent was rankling in their breasts, but it was discontent on a higher plane, a discontent appreciating knowledge and thirsting for it, thinking less of the public-house and more of the lecture-hall and concert-room. They were not content to be thought good women and praised as steady fellows; that was all very well as far as it went, but it did not go far enough. They could, some of them, make fine houses, yet they had to dwell in miserable slums and leave others who had done nothing to live in the splendid mansions they had been building. Others of them were able to make splendid furniture, yet they had to be content with a few squalid sticks. They could build Pullman cars, and yet they let the parasites who lived on their labour travel in them, whilst they were relegated to cattle-trucks. All good things came as the result of labour. Nothing ever came that dropped from heaven, or was shot from hell. Workmen make all the good things of life, and then go without them. Those who created ought to enjoy, and they were striving to alter the word 'ought' into the word 'shall.' These ideas might be called revolutionary. Very likely. So was every great idea that inspired the human race when it was first mooted; but was not the cause of their own welfare and well-being as well worth fighting for as any great cause that had ever been fought for? They were taking part in a great movement, and there was a shaking of their chains, which was frightening a good many people—the German Kaiser, for instance, who began to recognise that if he valued his own skin he must do something for the workers. It was frightening their own statesmen, too, although he had not one atom of confidence in what they could do for them, but he had far more confidence in what they could do for themselves."

Tom Mann must be congratulated. A Revolutionary Socialist could not have made a better speech.

The Dockers.

The dockers' leaders have drawn up a co-operative scheme by which work is to be offered to the men at a certain agreed price, and the men will then form themselves into a company to undertake the work on co-operative principles. Each member of the company will be allotted his share of the work and his wages, the contract stipulating only that the work shall be carried on under the direction and to the satisfaction of the company's official. Under such a system there would, of course, be no guarantee of the sixpence an hour. But if the directors fall in with the suggestion that they shall officially recognise and deal only with the union, it will sweep away the necessity for such a guarantee. We fear, however, that the directors will not agree. Norwood never forgives or forgets. The executive of the union has also issued a resolution declaring that no candidates for admission to the union will be accepted in future. We think it is a mistake; already the clouds of trade depression are beginning to overhang the land, and Norwood is waiting his opportunity. When the crash comes, this notice will not prevent unemployed men flocking into the London labour market. Norwood can provoke a strike when he chooses by insisting on the "freedom of labour," and there will be plenty blacklegs to take the strikers' places. Knowing how much they will then need public sympathy, we do not think that resolutions of this description, or calling the broken-down outcasts of our present system hard names, will help the dockers in the coming struggle. We think, therefore, the resolution should be withdrawn, and that it would be a good thing if a little more sympathy was shown for "criminal tramps," whose help is sometimes very effective in a labour revolt. Remember it was the memory of the "casual labourer" fighting madly at the dock gates for a few hours' work at a miserable wage, that brought in the big subscriptions which enabled the dockers to win the Great Strike.

The Dockers and the Trades Congress.

The dockers' executive have passed the following resolutions as instructions to its Trades Congress delegate:

1. Believing that the time is now ripe for the trade unionists of this country to take united action to secure the payment of trades union rates of wages and a maximum day of eight hours in Government dockyards, and believing that the Union of Dockyard Labourers is not sufficient in itself to enforce the same, we hereby instruct our delegate to urge upon the Trades Congress the need for pledging itself to use its best efforts to secure such trades union wages and a maximum working day of eight hours to dockyard workers.
2. Recognising that no trade union can be sure of success in its action unless free from blacklegs taking the places of unionist strikers, and believing that at the present time blacklegs mostly come from agricultural labourers, owing to their scanty pay and unorganised condition, we hereby instruct our delegate to urge upon the Trades Congress the need of at once taking steps to organise the agricultural labourers for the protection of the trade unionists already existent.
3. Believing that the organisation of labour in this country has now reached a stage when a general system of boycott might be effectively used to bring pressure to bear on unscrupulous employers, we hereby instruct our delegate to the Trades Congress to bring that subject up for discussion, and to urge upon the delegates to that body to pledge themselves to use their best efforts in their respective societies to get the members to boycott all goods, railways, and establishments where the employers refuse to comply with trade union regulations.

We think the ideas of organising the agricultural labourers and boycotting unfair employers are excellent, and we know them both to be thoroughly practical. We doubt, however, if the Trades Congress can do much for the dockyard labourer. According to Cunninghame Graham in Monday's Star, Liberal capitalists and Tory leaders have formed a coalition against the Eight Hour movement. If they have not done so already they will, and a General Strike will be the only way in which the people can effect a change in their condition.

The Trades Congress.

Arrangements are almost complete in connection with the twenty-third annual congress of the trades unions of the United Kingdom, which will be opened in Hope Hall, Mount Pleasant, Liverpool, on September 1, and will be continued throughout the week. The preliminary programme of subjects to be discussed with a view to the next parliamentary session includes (1) the Employers' Liability Bill; (2) certificates of competency for men in charge of steam-engines and boilers; (3) the desirability of increasing the number of factory and workshop inspectors; (4) the right of relatives of deceased miners to be represented at coroners' inquests; (5) public contracts and fair wages; (6) co-operation and its relation to trades unionism; and (7) representation of labour in Parliament.

Strike of Women Fur-pullers.

Herbert Burrows sends the following appeal to the press:

"Sir,—Will you kindly allow me to make an appeal to your readers, especially to women? Between fifty and sixty girls and women employes of a firm in South London—J. Vancailli, 186 Old Kent Road—have been on strike for three weeks against a system of work which involves a considerable addition to their already too laborious toil. The details are technical, but it may be shortly stated that fur-pulling is hard and dirty work, and that by an unfair method of giving out too large a proportion of heavy skins a reduction of wage (the work is piecework) is effected. At the best, the pullers can only earn 11s. or 12s. a-week, and sometimes only from 5s. to 7s. The employer has acknowledged to me that they work hard and 'earn the money,' and such an admission from an employer means much. One great cause of the difficulty is the foreman, who, to quote the women's phrase, treats them as if they were 'the scum of the earth,' and who has told them when they have complained about low wages to 'go round Charing Cross and the Elephant and Castle.' Your readers will know the meaning of that. The behaviour of the women during the strike has been most quiet and exemplary; so quiet that during the more exciting labour commotions they have been almost overlooked. I ask those of your readers who can, particularly the women, to send me at once what sums they can afford for the help of their sisters who are bravely struggling, not simply for themselves, but for womanhood.

"All fur-pullers are requested to avoid Vancailli's while the strike is going on, and I shall be much obliged if any carmen or railway-men who know of any goods being sent out by the firm will at once communicate with me."

Subscriptions to be sent to Herbert Burrows, 283 Victoria Park Road, N.E. The foreman seems to be modelling himself upon that eminent philanthropist Samuel Morley. I wonder if, like his great exemplar, he professes to be pious.

Lock-out of Gas-workers.

The gasmen at Enfield have been locked-out. The company wanted to drive the men back into their old slavery of twelve hours a-day. This the men resisted, and were paid a week's wages instead of notice on Thursday August 21st. Some blacklegs have been supplied by Livesey, but otherwise the company are rather short of hands. The men who work at the Small-Arms Factory and the workpeople of the neighbourhood are standing by the locked-out men.

"COMMONWEAL" CONCERT.

THE North London Branch gave a very successful concert for the benefit of the Commonweal Fund on Wednesday, August 20th. Songs were given by Cantwell, Mrs. Mackenzie, Mrs. Leatham, and Williams. Darwood and Nicoll were the reciters. Comrade Fox gave us a splendid solo on the violin, which was loudly encored. McKechniewas an excellent accompanist to the singers. Lurache sang the "Carmagnole" with great effect, and Blundell was equally successful with the "Starving Poor," the chorus of both songs being taken up vigorously by the audience. Dancing was kept up till three o'clock in the morning. Altogether we spent a very jolly evening, and the concert will result in a substantial addition to the Commonweal Fund. Other Branches might follow suit.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Funds are urgently needed for special work in connection with Propaganda. These funds will be used at the discretion of the Propaganda Committee, and to prevent confusion all money must be sent to Secretary of Propaganda Committee, at 24, Great Queen Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C., and will be acknowledged by him the 'Weal'.
D. J. NICOLL, Sec. to Propaganda Committee.

REPORTS.

ABERDEEN.—A good meeting was held on Castle Street on Thursday night; the speakers were Leatham and Duncan. On Saturday night, at the same place, Aiken, W. Cooper, and Leatham spoke to a large crowd; the latter was kept answering questions until half-past eleven o'clock; literature sold well.—C.

GLASGOW.—On Friday night Glasier spoke at Bridgeton Cross. On Saturday evening, in response to an invitation from a number of new comrades in Beith, we held an open-air meeting in that town at the Star Hotel. Comrade McLagan (Beith) presided and made an earnest appeal to his fellow-townsmen to study Socialism. Glasier then addressed the meeting at length on the general aims of Socialism, and was followed by Joe Burgoyne, both of whom were listened to with marked attention and sympathy. Two quires of Commonweal were sold, and a large number of pamphlets. It is obvious that our Beith comrades are awaking great interest in the question in their little town, and there is every likelihood of a Branch of the League being formed there. On Sunday evening Glasier spoke at Paisley Road Toll, where Commonweal was sold out and 4s. 2d. worth of literature sold.

THE

SATIRES OF CYNICUS.

"SINE IRA ET STUDIO."

"CYNICUS asks no favour, is no partisan, independent and unbiassed he looks with impartial eye on the follies and corruptions of his time. Unknown and unaided, but with firm purpose, he launches his satires on a world of dissimulation and deceit, where alas—

Virtue's at a discount,
Truth is under par,
Honesty's a scarcity
Wealth is better far.

Knavery's commendable,
Cheating is no sin;
He is the true philanthropist
Who takes the stranger in.

But where, perchance, some honest kindly heart,
While smiling at his fancies, still may say—
"He acts no snarling, mean, or churlish part
Who fain would laugh the follies of the world away."

TO SUCH HE DEDICATES HIS BOOK.

To Socialists who wish to see the hypocrisy of modern society pictorially lampooned, we recommend Cynicus.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

THE PARLIAMENTARY FRAUD.

"WHY do we not believe in Parliamentary action?" is a question often asked by inquirers. We answer because we believe it is useless, not only to effect a revolution but even to effect the smallest change in the condition of the people. We see also that to send a honest man into Parliament is the best way to turn him into a knave, and even if his honesty is untainted, yet he can do nothing, for the whole force of the privileged classes is there arrayed against him.

We are told by its members that the House of Commons is composed of "freely elected representatives of the people." Indeed! Who are these "representatives"? Let us see. All save 8 "labour" representatives, most of whom are hired to black the boots of the "respectable" members, belong to the robber classes. The Financial Reform Almanack, not a Socialist authority but a capitalist Liberal publication, gives the following list of the "trades" and "professions" of the House of Commons:

Land-holding interest	209
Trade, commerce, and manufacture	186
Law	135
Fighting (Army and Navy, etc.)	128
Official (placemen and ex-placemen)	91
Literary and professional (law excluded)	77
Railway	62
Banking	33
Liquor	24
Labour	8

"Oh! Gemini! What a bloody crew!" a certain well-known painter once exclaimed on hearing the names of certain Royal Academicians. We echo this exclamation on reading this list of the "interests" represented in the House of Commons. And yet some people, the "friends" of the working-classes, are anxious to get M.P. after their names. They appear to think that the moral atmosphere of the House of Commons would be improved by their presence. We are very doubtful, however, if the "moral atmosphere" will improve them. The House of Commons was a "den of thieves" a hundred years ago in Cobbett's time; it has not altered since, unless the presence of Broadhurst, Howell, and Co., has improved its general character. But even our friends, the New Unionists, might doubt that.

Those people who are still idiots enough to expect to get an Eight Hour Bill through the present House of Commons, might read with advantage Cunninghame Graham's letter in the Star of Monday, August 25th. It does not give much hope for "labour" legislation. We quote the most important passages in it:

"For five years have I striven to get one day to discuss my Eight Hours Bill for miners. Why had I no success? 'Oh!' cry some, 'the Tories cannot stand the idea of it.' Fair and softly, my friend. The Tories! Oh, yes, the Tories. I quite believe none of them, except a small modicum, would vote for such a project. Did not Lord Randolph Churchill, in order to catch votes and win popularity, make a fair pretence to the miners on the question; and did he not, when we discussed the question of the Berlin Conference, funk and climb down, not daring to vote against his party on a mere labour question; though on the Parnell trial, an affair of almost microscopic import compared to labour, he strutted and swaggered like a brass Napoleon on a Palais Royal clock. No; the Tories will do nothing.

But what gives them confidence to do nothing on labour questions but the consciousness that they have the tacit approval of the commercial Liberals? It was stated openly in and about the lobbies that influential Liberals had made representations to the Government that there was nothing in the eight hours movement; that it was the work of agitators. If they act thus (and I firmly believe they did) on the eight hours, thus also will they act upon the land question. Many of the Parliamentary Liberals who, at the beginning of the Parliament, were loud on the land question, have now, since the assault on capital fairly began, drawn in their horns on land, seeing to what their land theories would lead."

Mr. Graham has toiled for five years to get a day to discuss his Eight Hours Bill for miners, and he has not got a "day" yet. How long will it take to get an eight hour law for all trades and industries through the House of Commons? Here is a pretty little conundrum for those who are good at guessing them. We should imagine that at this rate of "progress" the present generation will be in their graves before that "valuable" measure is passed. Nor will a capitalist Liberal House of Commons like we are promised in a little while make much difference. Does not Mr. Graham say that the Government have been backed up in their opposition by "influential Liberals"?—in plain English, the leaders of the Liberal party, Gladstone, Morley, Harcourt, and Co. And will these gentlemen be any more friendly to the "labour cause" when they are in power? By past experience of them, we should say not. But let us take another supposition. Suppose there is a Labour party in the next House of Commons, composed of thirty men, all honest and trustworthy: could not they do something? We answer no. The stronger in numbers the Labour party is in the House of Commons, the weaker it will be in reality. Tory and Liberal both know that, however "moderate" the "leaders" may be, the people are not; and capitalist and landlord, Liberal and Tory, will fight tooth and nail for their threatened property and privileges. So the Labour party will find they are helpless, and will be forced, if they are honest men, to go back to the people and tell them that parliamentary action is hopeless, and that the people must help themselves. Or if they are knaves and dastards, they will join with the capitalist and landlord in keeping up the parliamentary fraud—for a time.

D. J. NICOLL.

REVOLUTIONARY GOVERNMENT.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF PETER KROPOTKINE.

III.

To imagine that the Government can be overthrown by a secret society, and that this society can implant itself in its place—this is an error into which all the revolutionary organisations which have sprung up from the republican middle-class in France since 1820 have fallen. But other instances are plentiful which illustrate this delusion. What devotion, what abnegation, what perseverance, have we not seen displayed by the secret republican societies of Young Italy—and yet all this immense work, all these sacrifices made by the youth of Italy, before which pale even those of the revolutionary youth of Russia, all these corpses heaped up in the casemates of Austrian fortresses, which have fallen under the knife and the bullet of the executioner—all these had for heirs the wretched middle-class and royalty.

It is the same in Russia. It is difficult to find in history a secret organisation which has obtained with such limited means such immense results as those secured by the Russian youth, who have given proofs of an energy and an action so powerful as that of the Executive Committee. It has shaken Tzarism—that Colossus which appeared invulnerable,—and it has rendered autocratic government henceforth impossible in Russia. Nevertheless, they are very stupid who believe that the Executive Committee will become the master of power on the day in which the Crown of Alexander III. is thrown into the gutter. Others, the prudent ones, who are working to make a name for themselves, whilst the revolutionists are digging their mines and perishing in Siberia; others, the intriguers, the talkers, the lawyers, the journalists, who from time to time drop a tear, very swiftly wiped away, on the tombs of the heroes and pose as friends of the people. These are they who will come to take the vacant place of government, and will put the unknown people who will have prepared the revolution into the background.

It is inevitable; it is fatal; and it cannot possibly be otherwise. For it is not the secret societies, not even the revolutionary organisations who give the finishing stroke to governments. Their function, their historical mission, is to prepare the people's minds for the revolution, and when minds are prepared and the other conditions are favourable, the last effort comes, not from the initiatory group but from the mass which has remained outside the organisation of the society. On the 31st of August, 1870, Paris was dumb to the appeals of Blanqui. Four days later it proclaimed the fall of the government; but then it was no longer the Blanquists who were the prime movers in the uprising; it was the people, the millions, who dethroned the man of December and hailed the place-hunters, whose names had resounded in their ears for two years previously. When the revolution is ready to take place, when the movement is in the air, when success has already become certain, then a thousand new men on whom the secret organisation has never exercised a direct influence, come to take a part in the movement—like birds of prey who are come to the battle-field in order to share the spoil of the victims. These help to make the final effort, and it is not from the ranks of the sincere and irreconcilable conspirators, but from amongst the men on the fence that they select their leaders, so long as they are inspired with the idea that a chief is necessary.

The conspirators who maintain the prejudice of dictatorship are then working unconsciously to enable their own enemies to mount to power.

But if what we have just said is true as regards political revolutions—or rather risings—it is still more true with regard to the revolution to which we are looking forward—the Social Revolution. To promote the establishment of any government whatsoever—an authority which is strong and obeyed by the mass—is to hamper the progress of the revolution from the start. The good that this government might do is nothing whilst the evil is immense.

In fact, what is it that we desire?—what do we understand by the Revolution? It is not a simple change of rulers. It is the taking possession by the people of all the social wealth. It is the abolition of all the authorities which continue to hinder the development of humanity. But is it by decrees emanating from a government that this immense economic revolution can be accomplished? We saw during the last century the Polish revolutionary dictator, Kosciusko, decree the abolition of personal slavery, but slavery continued to exist eighty years after the issuing of the decree.¹ We have also seen the Convention, the all-powerful Convention—the Terrible Convention as its admirers say—decree the general division of all the communal lands taken from the aristocracy. Like so many others this decree remained a dead letter, because in order to put it into execution the proletarians of the country would have had to make a new revolution, and revolutions are not made by the issuing of decrees. So that the taking possession of the social wealth by the people may become a real fact it is necessary that the people should have their hands free, that they should shake off the servility to which they are too much habituated, that they should act of their own individual initiative, going forward without waiting for the orders of anyone. Now it is just this which will prevent a dictatorship, even if it were the best intentioned in the world, and, moreover, it would be incapable of helping on the revolution in the slightest degree.

But if the government—be it even an ideal revolutionary government—does not create a new force and presents no advantage for the work of destruction which we have to accomplish, still less have we to count on it for the work of reorganisation that must follow the demolition. The economic change which will result from the Social Revolution will be so great and so deep, it must alter so thoroughly all the relations based to-day on property and exchange, that it is impossible for one or many individuals to elaborate the social forms which will arise in the future society. This elaboration of new social forms can only take place by the general work of the masses. To satisfy the immense variety of conditions and wants which will spring up the moment that individual property is abolished requires the flexibility of the entire wisdom of the country; all outside authority would be only an impediment, only a hindrance to this organic work which will have to be done; and in addition it would be a source of discord and hatred.

But it is quite time to abandon this illusion of revolutionary government, which has so many times proved a failure in practice, and for which we have had to pay so dearly. It is time to tell ourselves once for all, and to admit this political axiom, that a government cannot be revolutionary. We are reminded of the Convention, but we do not forget that the few measures which had a revolutionary character, however slight, were but the sanction of deeds already done by the people, who were at that moment marching over the heads of all governments. As Victor Hugo has said in his picturesque style, Danton was pushing Robespierre, Marat was watching and pushing Danton, and Marat himself was pushed forward by Cimourdain—that personification of the clubs, of the "madmen," and of the rebels. Like all the governments which have preceded or followed it, the Convention was only a weight attached to the feet of the people.

The facts which history has taught us are so conclusive in this connection; the impossibility of a revolutionary government and the uselessness of that which is described by this name, are so evident that it seems difficult to explain the tenacity with which a certain school describing itself as Socialist holds to the necessity of maintaining a government. But the explanation is very simple. It is that, as Socialists as they term themselves, the adepts of this school have quite another idea to ours of the Revolution which it is our duty to work for. For them—as for all the middle-class French Radicals—the Social Revolution is rather an affair of the future, which is not worth dreaming about to-day. What they are thinking about, in the bottom of their hearts, without daring to admit it, is quite another thing. It is the establishment of a government like that of Switzerland or the United States, making some attempts to appropriate to the State that which they ingeniously term the "public services." It is a cross between the ideal of Bismarck and that of the workman who strives to elevate himself to the dignity of president of the United States. It is a compromise made beforehand, between the Socialist aspirations of the masses and the greed of the middle class. They would like complete expropriation, but, not having the pluck to attempt it, they put it off for another century, and before the beginning of the struggle they have already begun to negotiate with the enemy.

For us who understand that the moment is at hand to give the capitalist class a mortal blow, that it will not be long before the people will lay their hands upon all the social riches and reduce the exploiting classes to powerlessness—for us, I say, there can be no hesitation whatsoever. We throw ourselves body and soul into the Social Revolution; and as with such a programme a government, whatever it may call itself, is an obstacle, we shall render powerless and sweep away from before us the ambitious individuals who may seek to put themselves forward as rulers of our destiny.

Enough of governments; room for the people, for Anarchy!

MEN WHO ARE NOT SOCIALISTS.

THE POLICE.

WITH APOLOGIES TO J. B. GLASIER.

THE Committee of Enquiry into the allegations against the Cheshire County Police made by Mr. Slater Lewis (county councillor) held its eighth day's sitting at Chester Castle last week, Sir Horatio Lloyd presiding.

A great mass of correspondence was read by the Clerk of the Peace, the first letters being from ex-Chief Superintendent Egerton, of Birkenhead, to ex-Inspector O'Donnell, and upon these Mr. Slater Lewis said he based his case.

In the first letter Superintendent Egerton stated that O'Donnell's case had been treated by the Joint Committee just as he had anticipated, and proceeded: "I think you were unwise in mixing up with the Radical side. You know all the Home Rulers and their supporters hate the police as they do poison, and would be a rotten stick to lean on, from old Gladstone down to the mad fanatic O'Brien, and at present they are greatly in the minority. Perhaps in long years to come, when neither I nor even yourself inhabit the sublunary globe, things may have been changed. We may be then living again, but the mischief is we shan't remember what has occurred in this decade." . . . "You must bear in mind that, according to Holy Writ, since our Saviour left this world and returned to Heaven miracles ceased, except in the minds of silly women and superstitious men, and those of the Church who invent them and get them up, so as to impress the ignorant portion of their flocks, and keep them under their priestly domination—so the worthies you have named must bide their time. And you may possibly live to see your desire on your enemies."

In the course of another letter Superintendent Egerton says: "As regards the strikers, no words in my vocabulary could half convey my detestation of the hounds. I trust they will get shot down if they begin rioting, as they richly deserve. The paid delegates who are fattening on the misery they cause don't deserve such an honourable fate. Cunningham Graham, Burns, etc., down to the lowest agitator in the scale, I would hang, along with the Irish members; and Lord Randolph should be the executioner. That office would suit his tastes, as he is always ready to stab his best friends. . . . As to Lewis, they have given him a sop to keep him quiet. You know when a man becomes troublesome and mischievous at St. Stephen's, if he possesses talent sufficient to make him dangerous he always gets a sop, such as a Foreign Secretary or the governorship of an island." . . .

"It has always a shady appearance to wait until you are injured before you complain of malpractices in carrying out the law. I don't mean it is requisite to see those of higher rank if they happen to get tight—this would be certain to make enemies all round. . . . Of course there are always individuals who do wrong—bobbies who go night-looking with keepers, accept tips from justices who are game-preservers, etc. This class of men—I should say a few of them—will probably be ruined by the immaculate Mr. Lewis. . . . Men have an objection to cut their own throats when they come to the point, and deny former statements or put different colour on those given, perhaps, under the influence of whiskey-toddy and sympathy, which dies away on reflection afterwards."

"I have not much faith in the Secretary of State, or, in fact, any of them. All men of high or low office are simply placemen, whether they be Whigs, Tories, or Radicals."

ST. LUKE'S EVICTIONS.—The Fair Rents Union is doing some useful work. Last Sunday, after the removal of the corpse of poor Johnson, an indignation meeting was held on a vacant piece of land adjoining Golden Lane. Useful advice, couched in language none too strong, was given by several speakers, which was evidently well appreciated by the best part of the audience, and if acted upon would create quite a small revolution in the relations between landlord and tenant. The first resolution, proposing to municipalise the land of London, was carried unanimously. How or by what means this was to be effected no speaker attempted to point out. Surely the people who would go so far as to agree to municipalise the land of London could be persuaded without much extra effort to agree to a No-Rent campaign, which would end in the communisation of the lands.—A. B.

¹ This decree was decided upon on the 7th of May, 1794, and made public on the 30th of May in the same year. If it had been carried into effect it would have been, in point of fact, the abolition of personal slavery and of patrimonial justice.

THE "RESPECTABLE" WORKING-MAN.

ONE often meets with the type of workman to whom no argument can appeal, except the one of the breeches pocket. He has been so often patted on the back by his clergyman and employer, who have held out all the glories of "thrift" before him, and encouraged him with the hope that he himself might become some day a master of slaves, or failing in that "ideal," he might by diligent becking and boring become a foreman or overseer, and keep his more unfortunate fellows, who then become his "inferiors," with their noses to the grindstone.

He has a horror of anything suggestive of the discontent that awakens the people to a sense of their true manhood, and which when once awakened places them in the position of rebels to a canting society that thrives only on their continued degradation, and the hope that they will ever act the mere part of machines in the production of superfluities for others, and the barest necessities of life for themselves.

The type of workman to whom I refer is, unfortunately, so common, that a full description of his peculiarities is not needed—everyone has met him, and most I hope have meted out to him the contempt which he deserves. He is a regular attendant at church, and is to be met with in every teetotal society, where he finds scope enough for the display of his distorted manhood and all the pride and uncharitableness of his stunted nature.

His conception of Christianity is so loathsome that I do not wonder at strong sensitive natures flying to the other extreme, and finding relief in an active crusade against everything pertaining to that name. His life is one long blasphemy against the "lowly Nazarene," and he believes in the eternal reign of Wrong on earth, and takes care that every act of his at least shall help to prolong it. With the hope of rising in the social plane a little above his fellows, he cants about the position in which it "pleases providence" to place people, and teaches that submission to poverty is a Christian acquiescence in the divine order of things.

He is a perfect pattern of the morality taught by the bourgeoisie to the workers. He neither spends money upon himself nor his fellows; loves with all the little heart he possesses every form of approved respectability, and is prepared to go off the beaten track only when wealthy brigands lead the way. To show that he is a "man of feeling," he will at some "mothers' meeting" shed a tear for the aborigines of South Africa, protesting against the "indecent" of their nakedness, and wonders at the apathy of a Christian nation not sending out more bibles and guns. He is a born "blackleg," and is ready to take the place of his comrades during a strike, for he abhors "agitators," and is more covetous of the friendly eye of his employer than the manly approval of his brother workmen.

Old in heart and decrepit in spirit, all ideal of a better and nobler life on earth is dead to him. Selfish to the core, he cannot believe in the disinterestedness of human conduct nor understand the generous enthusiasm of the Socialist. With a steady weekly wage and a shilling or two in his pocket of overplus, his whole energies are bent in making people believe that he is not a mechanic or mere handicraftsman, but a clerk—or better still, an "overseer" or small capitalist. He holds aloof (with a comic air of superiority) from his brother artizans, and is shocked if he finds himself in company with a shabbily dressed mortal; his look then protests against acquaintanceship, and he summons into his expressionless eyes a look of far-off recognition. His panacea for all our social sores—for all our sweated workmen and workwomen—is in total abstinence from strong drink and a more regular attendance at church. This cheap gospel he trots out on every occasion, in total ignorance of the economic factors that govern our competitive society. His conception of morality can go no further, and to be "respectable" is to fulfil the law and the prophets. His notion of love is of the most brutish kind, and the dream of a true comradeship has never once dawned upon him; he laughs at the higher qualities of love, and believes that only somewhere in the damp clouds (where we have no bodies to gratify or to hurt) will the realisation of peace and brotherly feeling be attained, when such as he will be presented with a harp and golden crown, and make one in a procession through the orthodox New Jerusalem, croaking their cuckoo-cry of Hallelujah, while the Socialist agitators are getting their deserts in doses of fire and brimstone.

That this strange product of our civilisation is by no means rare, everyone will admit; but his power for doing evil in the world is slowly passing away. He is no longer looked up to as a pattern of "behaviour" by workmen, and "not all the king's horses nor all the king's men" can ever reinstate him in his former position of an "ideal." All the big and little Smiles may write him up as much as they like, but "the word has gone forth," and derision and well-deserved contempt meet him at every turn. He can no longer enter the councils of the workers and plead on behalf of the profits of the employer and the "reward to capital," seeking for an increase in the "benefit fund," and urging that this only ought to be the main object of combination. He finds his place now at the street corner degrading the teaching of the Jewish Carpenter—getting up evangelical meetings and striving by sneers and words of hate to stem the rising tide of the divine discontent, that will sweep him with our rotten society out of sight for ever.

NOTICE.—Next week there will appear a Special Article on the life of the country workers, entitled,

"THE AGRICULTURAL LABOURER."

Branches and Newsagents are requested to send their orders early.

"DINNER-PAIL AVENUE."

(On the North-West Side of Chicago, for nearly four miles, there is an avenue which, morning and evening, presents a crowded thoroughfare. Milwaukee Avenue, or as it is more popularly called, "Dinner-Pail Avenue," lies through a section of the city where thousands of our sturdy toilers reside. At close of the day, from five to seven, there is a constant jam of men and women returning home from their work.]—'RIGHTS OF LABOUR.'

O, the city is great,
With its pomp and state,
With its towering piles,
With its parks and miles,
With its wealth and gold,
With its pride unrolled—
But stand in the dawn, or twilight hour,
And gaze on the city's vital power!

Close to its beating heart,
Close to its centered mart,
Where the angles meet
Is a crowded street
That resounds to the tramp of the toilers' feet!

Feet that are young, and feet that are old,
Through the summer's heat and the winter's cold,
Must measure the distance, mile by mile,
Must save the cost of the ride meanwhile,
For the pittance gained means fire and bread,
To the pinched, and hungry, and poorly-fed!

There grey-haired men, that are bowed, and bent
With the weight of the years, and the burdens sent,
With their faces wrinkled, and seamed, and worn,
With their garments scanty, and patched, and torn—
So they stumble along, on tottering feet,
To the rugged toil they must daily meet,
Through the winter's cold and the summer's heat—
And with them all are the pails of tin,
The pails they carry their dinners in!

There are children, too, of the tenderest age,
Little ones learning to turn life's page!
There are boys and girls of every size,
With hollow cheeks and with hollow eyes—
They are trudging along through dust and din,
And they swing, as they walk, their pails of tin!

So childhood and age march side by side,
To the toil that builds for the city's pride—
Through the days, and the years, that have just begun,
Through the days, and the years, that are almost done,
The child and the man must steadily tramp
Through the crowded street, through its dust or damp—
Down "Dinner-Pail Avenue" moves the throng,
With its joy, and its sorrow, its right, and its wrong!

Watch, if you will, this wonderful force,
Measure the power that flows from this source,
As these thousands all pour
Into workshop and store,
Into channels of labour—the higher and lower!

Mark the creative touch that shapens and forms,
The grandeur that crowns, the skill that adorns,
This city far-reaching, this city of pride—
Where the need of its toilers should ne'er be denied—
The toilers who stand for the work of the world,
With their right arms upraised and their banners unfurled!

Let fashion take heed and let beauty beware,
Though the hands that have wrought may be horny and bare,
To these hands they are owing an unceasing debt,
And the services done they should never forget—
O, let the streets of the city, its finest and best,
Give "Dinner-Pail Avenue" its rights with the rest!

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

HOLLAND.

We have received the following communication from the Dutch Railway Workers' Union:

Since last year a Railway Workers' Union has existed in Holland, called "Steeds Voorwaarts" (Always Forward), and bearing the initials "S. V." The object of this union is, besides the management of trade interests and the obtaining of political rights—the improvement of social conditions.

Though the union has not yet joined the Social Democratic Federation, it is more and more working in our direction, and its members are for the most part convinced Socialists.

The union has been going ahead since its establishment at extraordinary speed. At the end of February, 1889, eight railway-men joined together, who, helped by thirty-two others, formed in March a provisional committee to establish a union. On July 1st, 1890, the strength of the new organisation was 2,000 members, divided into ten sections and about forty branches. The organ of the union, named De Seingever (Signal-giver) is published every fortnight.

Our railway-men regret that our efforts have not yet been seriously devoted to the formation of an international railway-workers' union. Let us take an example, for instance, by the miners of different countries, who have joined together already. The time is now arrived for the slaves of the steam-engine to act like their gallant companions the miners. The Dutch railway-men therefore call on their fellow-workers to form an international organisation.

The address of the S. V. Union is: Mr. J. Hoekstra, Roggeveenstraat 54, The Hague, Holland. The initials S. V. are not to be forgotten. Railway slaves of all countries, let us join together!

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. XXVI. (continued).—THE UPPER WATERS.

PRESENTLY we came to Day's Lock, where Dick and his two sitters had waited for us. He would have me go ashore, as if to show me something which I had never seen before; and nothing loth I followed him, Ellen by my side, to the well-remembered Dykes, and the long church beyond them, which was still used for various purposes by the good folk of Dorchester; where, by the way, the village guest-house still had the sign of the Fleur-de-luce which it used to bear in the days when hospitality had to be bought and sold. This time, however, I made no sign of all this being familiar to me; though as we sat for a while on the mound of the Dykes looking up at Sinodun and its clear-cut trench, and its sister manelon of Whittenham, I felt somewhat uncomfortable under Ellen's serious attentive look, which almost drew from me the cry, "How little anything is changed here!"

We stopped again at Abingdon, which, like Wallingford, was in a way both old and new to me, since it had been lifted out of its nineteenth century degradation, and otherwise was as little altered as might be.

Sunset was in the sky as we skirted Oxford by Osney. It was a matter of course that so far as they could be seen from the river, I missed none of the towers and spires of that ~~once~~ don-beridden city; but the meadows all round, which, when I had last passed through them, were getting daily more and more squalid, more and more impressed with the seal of the "stir and intellectual life of the nineteenth century," were no longer intellectual, but had once again become as beautiful as they should be, and the little hill of Hinksey, with two or three very pretty stone houses new-grown on it (I use the word advisedly; for they seemed to belong to it) looked down happily on the full streams and waving grass, grey now, but for the sunset, with its fast-ripening seeds.

The railway having disappeared, and therewith the various level bridges over the streams of Thames, we were soon through Medley Lock and in the wide water that washes Port Meadow, with its numerous population of geese nowise diminished; and I thought with interest how its name and use had survived from the older imperfect communal period, through the time of the confused struggle and tyranny of the rights of property, into the present rest and happiness of complete Communism.

I was taken ashore again at Godstow, to see the remains of the old nunnery, pretty nearly in the same condition as I had remembered them; and from the high bridge over the cut close by I could see, even in the twilight, how beautiful the little village with its grey stone houses had become; for we had now come into the stone-country, in which every house must be either built, walls and roof, of grey stone or be a blot on the landscape.

We still rowed on after this, Ellen taking the sculls in my boat; passed a weir a little higher up, and about three miles beyond it came by moonlight again to a little town, where we slept at a house thinly inhabited, as its folk were mostly tented in the hay-fields. We started before six o'clock the next morning, as we were still twenty-five miles from our resting place, and Dick wanted to be there before dusk. The journey was pleasant, though to those who do not know the upper Thames there is little to say about it. Ellen and I were once more in her boat, though Dick, for fairness' sake, was for having me in his, and letting the two women scull the green toy. Ellen, however, would not allow this, but claimed me as the interesting person of the company. "After having come so far," said she, "I will not be put off with a companion who will be always thinking of somebody else than me: the guest is the only person who can amuse me properly. I mean that really," said she, turning to me, "and have not said it merely as a pretty saying."

Clara blushed and looked very happy at all this; for I think up to this time she had been rather frightened of Ellen.

As we passed through the short and winding reaches of the now quickly lessening stream, Ellen said: "How pleasant this little river is to me, who am used to a great wide wash of water; it almost seems as if we shall have to stop at every reach-end. I expect before I get home this evening I shall have realised what a little country England is, since we can so soon get to the end of its biggest river."

"It is not big," said I, "but it is pretty."

"Yes," she said, "and don't you find it difficult to imagine the times when this little pretty country was treated by its folk as if it had been an ugly characterless waste, with no delicate beauty to be guarded, with no heed taken of the ever fresh pleasure of the recurring seasons, and changeful weather, and diverse quality of the soil, and so forth? How could people be so cruel to themselves?"

"And to each other," said I. "Dear neighbour, I may as well tell you at once that I find it easier to imagine all that ugly past than you do, because I myself have been part of it. I see both that you have divined something of this in me; and also I think you will believe me when I tell you of it, so that I am going to hide nothing from you at all."

She was silent a little, and then she said: "My friend, you have guessed right about me; and to tell you the truth I have followed you up from Runnymede in order that I might ask you many questions, and because I saw that you were not one of us; and that interested and pleased me, and I wanted to make you as happy as you could be. To say the truth, there was a risk in it," said she, blushing—"I mean as to Dick and Clara; for I must tell you, since we are going to be such close friends, that even amongst us, where there are so many beautiful women, I have often troubled men's minds disastrously. That is one reason why I was living alone with my father in the cottage at Runnymede. But it did not answer on that score; for of course people came there, as the place is not a desert, and they seemed to find me all the more interesting for living alone like that, and fell to making stories of me to themselves—like I know you did, my friend. Well, let that pass. This evening or to-morrow morning I shall make a proposal to you to do something which would please me very much, and I think would not hurt you."

I broke in eagerly, saying that I would do anything in the world for her; for indeed, in spite of my years and the too obvious signs of them (though, indeed, I felt much younger already than when I first woke up in that new world)—in spite of my years, I say, I felt altogether too happy in the company of this delightful girl, and was prepared to take her confidences for more than they meant perhaps.

She laughed now. "Well," she said, "meantime for the present we will let it be; for I must look at this new country that we are passing through. See how the river has changed character again: it is broad now, and the reaches are long and very slow-running. And look, there is a ferry!"

I told her the name of it, as I slowed off to put the ferry-chain over our heads; and on we went till the stream narrowed again and deepened, and we passed through walls of tall reeds, whose population of reed-sparrows and warblers were delightfully restless, twittering and chuckling as the wash of the boats stirred the reeds from the water upwards in the still, hot morning.

She smiled with pleasure, and her lazy enjoyment of the new scene seemed to bring out her beauty doubly as she leaned back amidst the cushions, though she was far from languid; her idleness being the idleness of a person, strong and well-knit both in body and mind, deliberately resting.

"Look!" she said, springing up suddenly from her place without any obvious effort, and balancing herself with exquisite grace and ease; "look at the beautiful old bridge ahead!"

"I need scarcely look at that," said I, not turning my head away from her beauty. "I know what it is; though" (with a smile) "we used not to call it the Old Bridge time ago."

She looked down upon me kindly, and said, "How well we get on now you are no longer on your guard against me."

And she stood looking thoughtfully at me still, till she had to sit down as we passed under the middle one of the row of little pointed arches of the oldest bridge across the Thames.

"O the beautiful fields!" she said; "I had no idea of the charm of a very small river like this. The smallness of the scale of everything, the short reaches, and the speedy change of the banks, give one a feeling of going somewhere, of coming to something strange, a feeling of adventure which I have not felt in bigger waters."

I looked up at her delightedly; for her voice, saying the very thing which I was thinking, was like a caress to me. She caught my eye and her cheeks reddened under their tan, and she said simply:

"I must tell you, my friend, that when my father leaves the Thames this summer he will take me away to a place near the Roman wall in Cumberland; so that this voyage of mine is farewell to the south, of course with my goodwill in a way; and yet I am sorry for it. I hadn't the heart to tell Dick yesterday that we were as good as gone from the Thames-side; but somehow to you I must needs tell it."

She stopped and seemed very thoughtful for awhile, and then said smiling:

"I must say that I don't like moving about from one home to another; one gets so pleasantly used to all the detail of the life about one, it fits so harmoniously and happily into one's own life, that beginning again, even in a small way, is a kind of pain to one. But I daresay in the country which you come from you would think this petty and unadventurous, and would think the worse of me for it."

She smiled at me caressingly as she spoke, and I made haste to answer: "O, no, indeed; again you echo my very thoughts. But I hardly expected to hear you speak so. I gathered from all I have heard that there was a great deal of changing of abode amongst you in this country."

"Well," she said, "of course people are free to move about; but except for pleasure-parties, especially in harvest and hay-time, like this of ours, I don't think they do so much. I admit that I also have other moods than that of stay-at-home, as I hinted just now, and I should like to go with you all through the west-country—thinking of nothing," concluded she, smiling.

"I should have plenty to think of," said I.

Religious Humbug.

Multifarious are the forms and numerous are the devices through which young intellects are swindled out of their rights and power by the zealous piety and charity of religious teachers (alack for the perversion of words!), who cunningly aim at impressing the way while it is too soft to resist, and sagely imagine that the hypocrisy and falsehood indented there will grow indelible hardness, so to be applied to their use as stepping-stones to mind and soul domination; for intrenching the intellectual slavery they inculcate, and for building up walls that shall securely enclose their usurpations. A few of their victims may continue through life too cowardly indolent, too bigotedly depraved, too hypocritically dissolute to make an independent effort towards ascertaining in their riper years whether those tales were true; but the many, the majority will read, and will find other interpretations of scripture than those which were imposed by the fraudulent tyranny of an established domination, the craft of a creed, or the selfishness of a priestly greediness of lucre. The man will remember—and he will have all the scenic getting up of the gorge-heaving mummery strongly placed before his mental retina—how when he was a poor child in one of their fens of cant, craft, and catechism—the National Schools—he and his little comrades were examined on texts of scripture, in order to prove to the pious patronesses present how religious was their training. He will remember his quoting, or rather gabbling like a parrot, "Render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and to God the things which are God's"—and he will again see the pious and condescending smile on the face of the begowned parson; again hear the said parson's "Well, my child, and what does that text of scripture teach you?" and he will feel sick at the recollection of the answer which said parson had taught him to squeak—"to pay taxes and tithes cheerfully"; and his face will burn with shame and self-scorn at the remembrance of the delighted vanity (under which he blushed, even to the tips of his fingers) with which he received said parson's "Right, my good child." And the bitterness of pity will swell in his heart for those clever women, and those bright-minded men, who then and there lauded the success of their scheme and prophesied the important and fruitful results to "true religion." "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it."—From 'The History of Ivel Verjuice,' 1853.

CORRESPONDENCE.

JOHN BURNS.

COMRADES,—I notice that Burns complains in last week's Commonweal, not only of a leaderette on certain alleged statements of his concerning foreign competition, but also of a "Note on News" written by me. I may, perhaps, say that in speaking of "County Council tomfoolery." I was obviously sneering not at Burns but at the London County Council—an institution which, as an Anarchist, I cannot be expected to hold in reverence. The main point in the note, however, Burns leaves quite unanswered. I invited him to repudiate the indiscreet zeal of his friends in asking for an unconditional life-endowment of him. As he has condescended to notice the paragraph at all, it would surely have been easy for him to supply the asked for repudiation. Are we, then, to infer that he approves of the monstrous suggestion that he should receive an annuity for life in consideration of his past services? It is a sad illustration of the evils of "leadership" to note the truculent tone of his whole communication. "I am, Sir Oracle," he seems to say, "and when I ope my lips, let no dog bark." Anarchists at any rate, are not to be either conciliated or terrified by his bad temper.—Fraternally yours,
R. W. BURNIE.

THE COSMOPOLITAN RESEARCH ASSOCIATION.

Sir,—This Association has been started by a number of working-men with the sole object of getting their fellow-workers to take an interest in the discussion of all questions which affect their interest. Meetings will be held every Wednesday evening at 8.30, at the Temperance Bar, 46, Wharfedale Road, King's Cross, and discussion on the question of the evening will be cordially invited. It is to be hoped that working-men of the district will rally up and help to make this venture a success. All inquiries concerning condition of membership, management, etc., should be addressed as above, or to Yours fraternally,
C. GRASON, Secretary.
22, Middlesex Street, Euston Road, London.

NOTES ON NEWS.

ALL the plagues of Egypt seem to be descending upon us. Cyclones, tornados, tempests, storms of rain and hail, showers of frogs, blight, famine, influenza, and cholera are among the pleasant things which the "power that stands behind evolution," or whoever it may be that presides over the affairs of this terrestrial globe, is now inflicting upon suffering humanity. The "world is out of joint"; very much so, and the poor old planet is in some danger of going to pieces. Nature is in travail; what will she bring forth?

Man is the child of Nature, and when she is feverish and excited he gives way also to the prevailing influence. Therefore we hear of big strikes and boycotting, and revolt once more seems likely to break out among all sections of Labour. But we have another epidemic lately, which is also worth noticing, as it perhaps may be ascribed to the agency of man—an epidemic of big fires breaking out in every part of this immense city. Let us remember that all these fires break out in warehouses, wharves, and factories, and in every case the cause was "unknown." What was this "unknown" cause?

Possibly in some cases the fire was really accidental; in others perhaps the "owners" could tell us more about it than any one else. An "accidental" fire is an excellent way of avoiding bankruptcy, especially when an approaching trade depression threatens to throw you into that unhappy condition, but you first must take care to be heavily insured. But we are firmly convinced this will not account for all the "big blazes" we have seen in London recently.

Some time ago there were several big fires at Mr. Whiteley's establishment, and both these theories were brought forward by many people to account for these remarkable occurrences. But it came out that Mr. Whiteley was not insured against the last fire, so the latter theory fell through. The Pall Mall Gazette then started a new one; it said that a shameful system of tyranny prevailed in Mr. Whiteley's establishment, and it believed that some one driven to desperation had set fire to the place. Whether this was correct or not, the employes of that firm have been treated better since the last fire, and the public have not been startled by the announcement on the press placards, "Another Great Fire at Whiteley's" since that period. It would be interesting to inquire if sweating prevails in any of the establishments that have been in flames recently.

This might form a good subject for study to employers who talk so glibly of "smashing unions." Men in whom the spark of divine discontent has been aroused, will not be driven back into their old slavery like whipped curs. Capitalists who hate the unions should remember that the time of the middle-classes has come. "Gentlemen, you have got to be shaved, and if you wriggle you will get cut." Unions may be "smashed." Smash away, gentlemen of the middle-classes, but you haven't got rid of the discontent, you have only made it more fierce and dangerous. Woe to the commercial classes who are driving the people into a corner, at a time when matches are so cheap and factories so inflammable. It might be well for these commercial autocrats to pause, and reflect whether they had not better allow themselves to be "peacefully" improved out of existence. It is not pleasant, but it is much more comfortable than the other process.
N.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

THE TRADES CONGRESS.

The twenty-third annual Trades Congress opened on Monday at Hope Hall, Liverpool. The first breeze occurred on the question of the credentials of John Williams, but the Parliamentary Committee quailed before the storm it saw was rising, and the question was left for the new Standing Orders Committee to report upon on Tuesday. This committee consists of John Wilson, M.P., Durham; J. M. Jack and Henry Tate, Glasgow; Judge, Leeds; and Haslam, Derbyshire. John Burns then moved a resolution pledging the Congress to help the Australian strikers with sympathy and monetary aid. John Burns spoke eloquently upon the "international solidarity of labour," which shows that the teaching of the Commonweal has not been without effect. Advanced revolutionists who speak their minds sometimes influence "public men." See our comrade Kropotkin's article this week. Burns's resolution was carried with acclamation. The resolution of H. Quelch, that the Congress do not adjourn till five o'clock, a direct negative to the proposition that Congress do adjourn for a trip up the river and a tea at the Town Hall under the auspices of the Mayor of Liverpool, only received the support of 31 votes. This is not a healthy sign. Surely trade-unionists ought not to take river trips and feeds from the Corporation of Liverpool, which won't allow its workmen to become unionists, and which only a few months ago imported troops into the town to shoot down the strikers like dogs if they laid a hand upon the blacklegs who were robbing them of their means of existence. If the New Trades Unionism goes on in this way it will soon become as corrupt as the old. The capitalist is the deadliest enemy of the working class, and those who parley with him and are feasted by him are treading in the steps of Shipton and Broadhurst. If they go on in this style it won't be long before their treason will be discovered, and they will be denounced and repudiated by the men whom they have betrayed.

Tuesday's events were rather amusing. Mr. Matkin, the president, made a speech—a "splendid speech"—in which he declared himself in favour of the Social-Democratic programme. But when James Macdonald moved a resolution pledging the Congress to vote for no candidates save those who would pledge themselves to this programme, it was quite evident that the Broadhurst mob, with whom the Congress was packed, did not agree with the president; for these braying asses and yelping curs kicked up such a hideous row that not a word could be heard of Macdonald's speech. What nice, reasonable, rational people these orthodox trade-unionists are. John Burns supported Macdonald, and gave it hot to Broadhurst and Co. In the end the resolution was lost, 55 voting for and 263 against in a Congress composed of 457 delegates.

Co-operation among the Lightermen.

One result of the Dock Strike is that the lightermen have formed a co-operative society, which seems to be worked upon better principles than most co-operative enterprises. The company formed is no mere commercial speculation; there are no founders' shares, no promotion money is paid, and the directors receive no remuneration (excepting those who are licensed lightermen) until a dividend of 5 per cent. has been declared and the bonuses paid, and then only such sum as may be voted to them by the shareholders. Every person employed by the company is a shareholder—this being an indispensable condition. The £10,000 capital is divided into 10,000 shares of £1 each, most of which are in the hands of the watermen and lightermen of the Thames. The articles of association provide that the profits should be divided as follows: (1) 5 per cent. is paid into a reserve fund; (2) a dividend upon the share capital of 5 per cent. is declared. The remainder is divided as follows—one-third is paid as a bonus to the workmen, one-third to merchants and shipowners who have been customers, and one-third to the shareholders; so that the watermen and lightermen get nearly 75 per cent. of the profits earned, besides being paid the maximum rate of wages under Brassey's award. It is needless to say that the proceedings of the new co-operative society are viewed by the Masters' Association with no friendly eye; in fact, there was the greatest difficulty in the first instance in obtaining barges from the builders, as when the destination of the barges was discovered, for some mysterious reason the barge-builders were unable to carry out the order. The same difficulty arose in obtaining the service of tugs, but this has been got over, as the new society have now a tug of their own. Thirty-nine barges are at present owned by the society, and the amount of work done this month is already quite double that done during the whole of July. The Master Lightermen's Union took advantage of the late strike to run up their charges enormously, and while in no case were the men's wages increased more than 25 per cent., in many cases the rates have been doubled. Take the case of rum: before the strike the rate for 41-50 puncheons was 47s. 6d.; it is now £5. Under the old scale the rate for sago was 1s. 3d.; it is now 2s. So that there is no wonder at the cry about trade leaving the port of London, when the master lightermen are making a 25 per cent. increase in wages the excuse to double their profits.

This is an experiment in productive co-operation which should be watched with interest by Socialists, and we wish it every success. N.

The Norwich Shoe Strike.

No doubt many of the readers of the Commonweal have read the notices of the above strike which appeared in it. Comrade Sutton gave a few instances of the way it was being carried on. One of them was when the secretary of the union, Mr. Inskip, came down and described a new scheme to the men, which he said would not be a compromise—viz., to assimilate the wages for Norwich to those as paid in other towns. This the men accepted in good faith, but there were yells of "No compromise!" when he first appealed to them. The men when they first came out had a uniform statement for the city; they came out with the intention of fighting for the original statement, which was a good advance all round for the men, with very few reductions, if any, to the highest paid wages in the city. Finding in a few days the masters wouldn't give way, and the secretary thought more of public opinion, apparently, than the men's demands, they were foolish enough to listen to his appeal to take into consideration his offer. But when the men had given way, it was all up; it seemed to be in the hands of a few committee men, who bungled the whole business, the masters practically getting things all their own way. After close upon six weeks' fighting, there was a statement agreed to, which is an immense reduction almost all over the city. Notwithstanding the quality of the new statement, some of the masters are continually giving the work out in the wrong classification, which means about three, four, or five shillings a-week reduction in the men's wages. Some of the masters are so "benevolent" that they are letting the men work on their old wages. There has scarcely been a day passed without the men of some firm or the other being several days on strike, as the men's committee repudiate the printed list the masters have got out, and say that is not the list they adhered to. Horobin, who was boss of the show, advised the men to go in before they did; but they would not, but greeted the humbug with some very objectionable remarks, for which he had to keep himself quiet for a time. This Horobin is boss of the committee which objected to the idea of paying "No Rent" when placards were posted around the city, and advised the men to take no notice of the above, though over a thousand men were only drawing about five or six shillings a-week. While I was in London at work, one of the shop-mates showed me a handbill, which was an extract from Horobin's speech which he made after the London strike about the London people down at Leicester, for which they pulled him up to London and made him apologise; which is one of the hardest things in the world for an official—a treasurer—of any union to do. When the strike terminated there was a mutual agreement agreed to that the men should go to work as if nothing had occurred. As per usual, the employers played the game of autocrats, and signed an agreement that they should set no one on to work unless they could get a written agreement from their last exploiter of labour to say that they had no need for them. After the strike was over, they discharged some of the men who they thought were the agitators, and so they are left on their own resources. As to the rest of the men, they are in a fearful mess, and many of them say that they are worse than before the strike. Some of the men declare they will go in for a twelve and a half per cent. advance next spring if they can get enough financial members, so they can stand out longer and fight the capitalists. Such is the position of affairs after six weeks' endurance of poverty, untold misery, unhappy homes, and semi-starvation. This ought to be a lesson to the trade-union workmen. The question they now have to ask themselves is this to be our only aim, to strike for a semi-subsistence and find after all that they have gained nothing; or shall we organise to take possession of all the wealth produced by our labour? But all these failures only increase the numbers of revolutionists and bring the present system nearer to its end. The workmen are finding out that not a paltry rise in pay or a shorter day will save them from their wretchedness, but that in the Social Revolution lies the only hope of the working class. M.

The General Strike.

Our comrade H. Hopkins sends us a cutting from the Bobcaygeon Independent of July 18th, which, after giving extracts from the Commonweal, makes the following pertinent comments: That is the present position of the leading Socialists in Britain. They desire to make the masses thoroughly discontented with their position, and to awaken in them a sense of the unfairness of that position. That is the present purpose of the Socialists, and they are accomplishing the end they have in view. When the masses have awakened generally to a sense of the unfairness of their position, then they propose to organise a general strike. Provided the strike were sufficiently extensive, the whole social machine would collapse. There should be no mistake made as to the strength and depth of the movement of which Mr. Morris is one of the leaders. Only the silly will pooh-poo it. There is grave discontent among the wage-earners in all civilised countries; that discontent has a substantial foundation in reason and justice; and the strike has already been found to be a most efficient weapon. When Mr. Morris's general strike takes place, modern "civilisation" will probably be considerably modified.

Labour and Capital.

Labour can not be patient, for while it deliberates and plans it starves. The crimes which capital perpetrates are too numerous to mention in detail. Oppressive and tyrannical governments depend upon and result from wealth. All the horrors of centuries committed through the feudal age are the results flowing from privileged and wealthy classes clothed with political power. Slavery, from the period of the patriarchs, through the Roman era down to the Civil War in America, is but one and the lesser of the evils penetrated by the privileged and wealthy few. Standing armies, wars, and dynastic conflicts for succession and for empire, come from few other causes. Trusts, corners, combines, and moneyed syndicates, all are criminal organisations which men of wealth resort to in order to enhance the values of the necessaries of life indispensable to sustain physical strength necessary to enable the working-man to endure the hours of toil which the master exacts—unscrupulous interest, a monopoly of lands, special laws for the protection of property, the cost of legal expenses. There is only one proceeding at law which is conducted by the State at the expense of the tax-paying public, and that is prosecution for crime. The rich may oppress the poor by corporate or other exactions, may deprive the poorer man of his land or estate and drive him to a ruinous defence at law, the success of which may impoverish him. If against any of these modes of oppression and devices to which rich and unscrupulous men resort to increase their capital, there should be strikes and unlawful combinations, and out of them should result destruction of life and property and an interruption of the law, let all reasonable, intelligent, and just-minded men calmly consider whether labour has not causes for dissatisfaction, which it has not the intelligence to consider nor the time to remedy. The world is in the throes of rebellion. The working-man has revolted from his yoke, and if he does not lie down in his furrow and patiently wait for relief, it is because the labour he must perform is the penalty of the original sin which the church has imposed upon him as a religious belief. The Church and the State are in conspiracy to bind the toilers' conscience and control his acts that capital may secure more than it earns in its co-operation with labour. The two are working in co-partnership upon unjust terms, and this revolution will never go backward or be stayed till the classes who possess the wealth, the brains, and the leisure to consider the relations between labour and capital, shall adjust them more rationally and equitably.—The Argonaut, San Francisco, Col.

SOCIALISM IN LONDON AND THE PROVINCES.

YARMOUTH.

HAIL the Social Revolution! is the greeting the Yarmouth comrades send to the readers of Commonweal. Since our last report we have been pegging away with all our might at the foundation of our present rotten system of wage-slavery. On Sunday, July 27th, some thousand or over assembled on the Priory Plain to hear a lecture from comrade Turner, who had been announced the week previous, but he was unable to attend, owing to severe illness. Headley, however, distributed 300 or 400 Commonweal and Freedom back numbers, and a large bundle of leaflets. Sunday following we held the last meeting at Bradwell until after the harvest, the labourers having to sweat too much during the week to be able to attend any meetings on Sundays, they have to make up for the loss of sleep, etc., on the day of rest; nature will make herself felt, even in the down-trodden agricultural slaves. On Sunday, August 10th, comrade A. Coulon, of Paris, paid us a visit for a few days. In the morning, on Priory Plain, a few 'Weals' were sold, but no meeting held, owing to bad weather. In the afternoon, on the London Boat Landing-stage, Coulon had a large audience and any amount of opposition, one opponent threatening to throw him in the river if it wasn't for the law. In the evening, on Colman's Quay, another large meeting and exciting opposition; some pious robber of the middle-class cursed the "blarsted furriners" for coming to England to spread discontent amongst the British slaves. Our comrade assisted with his accordion at each meeting. Sunday, August 17th, comrade Darley, of Norwich, assisted us; in the morning on Priory Plain he was listened to with marked attention, special reference being made to the Welsh strike; and in the evening on Colman's Quay, although the audience was small, there was great interest shown in the speaker's remarks. On Sunday, August 24th, comrade Sparling, of London, addressed two large meetings here; in the morning on Priory Plain, subject "The Leprosy of Politics." Although our comrade attacked the political fraud pretty roughly, no one in the audience had the courage to oppose any of his remarks. In the evening on Colman's Quay, subject "How we Live and How we Might Live." This interesting subject was well handled by Sparling; the audience, or most of them, went away wiser than they came. Sparling kept his audiences together well by his occasional witty remarks. Comrades R. Turner and W. Wess, of London, are staying with us for a week, and we have had some enjoyable evenings in the club-room during their stay. Comrade Hindes has been compelled to emigrate to London, owing to the boycott of the capitalists. This and the want of funds is the greatest drawback to the Cause in Yarmouth, for as soon as a comrade takes an active part in the propaganda he is spotted, which of course means starvation in this degrading hole. Comrades Brightwell and Headley assisted at all meetings. Since our last report we have sold 240 Commonweal and collected 7s. 3d. for local propaganda. But still, despite suffering and starvation, we look forward hopefully when the evils of our present society will have vanished like an ugly dream.
J. HEADLEY.

LEEDS.

SPLENDID meetings here on Sunday, at Hunslet Moor in the morning and in the "Vicars Croft" in the afternoon and evening. Audiences thoroughly sympathetic with revolutionary Socialist ideas. 3s. 6d. collected, and good sale of Commonweal. Speakers were Allworthy, Sollit, Sylvester, Menkey, Dyche, and Cores. Comrade Mowbray will be here next week, when we expect to have grand times. We hope to bring Leeds to front in the future.
H. S.

COMMONWEAL BRANCH.—At Union Street last Sunday morning a large and attentive audience was addressed by Leggatt and Mrs. Lahr; 49 Commonweal sold; collection, 1s. 1½d. We held a meeting on Sunday afternoon in Victoria Park; very good audience, who seemed very interested; speakers Burnie, Mrs. Lahr, Mrs. Blundell, and W. Blundell; 37 Commonweal sold, and could have sold more if we had had them; collection, 3s. On Mile-end last Sunday a very large gathering was addressed at 8 o'clock in the evening by Mrs. Lahr and Leggatt; good sale of 'Weal'. We have sold this week six quires. In our hall E. Lupton addressed us on "Woman"; animated discussion; collection £1 4s. 4d.

SOUTH LONDON.—Good meeting at New Cut on Thursday evening by Mrs. Lahr and Leggatt; one quire of 'Weal' sold. On Friday evening good meeting at Oxford Market by Miss Lupton and Leggatt; 20 'Weal' sold. Bermondsey Square on Saturday, meeting of leather trades on strike; good meeting by Leggatt; 25 'Weal' sold. At Oxford Market the police interfered and told Miss Lupton to leave off speaking and go away, but she declined to move and told them they could carry her if they liked; they then left us alone.—L.

ABERDEEN.—On Sunday evening 24th August the first chapter of Matthew Arnold's "Culture and Anarchy" was read and discussed. A meeting was held on Castle Street on Thursday night; the speakers were Duncan, Rennie, and G. Cooper. Another meeting was held in the same place on Saturday night, when Duncan and Leatham spoke to a large crowd. The literature sold well.

THE

SATIRES OF CYNICUS.

"SINE IRA ET STUDIO."

CYNICUS asks no favour, is no partisan, independent and unbiassed he looks with impartial eye on the follies and corruptions of his time. Unknown and unaided, but with firm purpose, he launches his satires on a world of dissimulation and deceit, where alas—

Virtue's at a discount,
Truth is under par,
Honesty's a scarcity
Wealth is better far.

Knavery's commendable,
Cheating is no sin;
He is the true philanthropist
Who takes the stranger in.

But where, perchance, some honest kindly heart,
While smiling at his fancies, still may say—
"He acts no snarling, mean, or churlish part
Who fain would laugh the follies of the world away."

TO SUCH HE DEDICATES HIS BOOK.

To Socialists who wish to see the hypocrisy of modern society pictorially lampooned, we recommend Cynicus.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

THE "LEGAL" EIGHT HOURS DAY.

THE great event of the week at the Trades Congress was the carrying of the Legal Eight Hours motion by a majority of 38. It has had one great result—an almost unanimous yell of disapprobation from all sections of the middle-class press. Even the Star and Daily Chronicle, which are both supposed to be friendly to the working class, receive the news with such cold approval that it is evident the proprietors of these papers do not like the prospect. Of course, the New Unionists will not allow the proposal to remain a dead letter, and all parliamentary candidates will be heckled at the next election as to whether they will vote for an Eight Hours Bill or not. We are sure, however, that though even some capitalists who sit for working-class constituencies may "pledge" themselves—and we know what "election pledges" are worth—yet the measure is certain to meet determined opposition from both political parties.

Any workman who believes that the Conservative Party, with all their love of State aid for the rich, will carry an Eight Hours Bill for the poor, may be recommended to read the Standard and St. James's Gazette of last Friday; this will be quite enough to shatter his simple faith. And as to the "intelligent Radical," we ask him if he is still green enough to imagine that Gladstone, Morley, Harcourt, and Co., are going to advocate Eight Hours with enthusiastic bursts of parliamentary eloquence, should read the organ of the official Liberals, the Daily News, of the same date, and then to ask themselves this question—even supposing, in their thirst for office, these gentlemen agreed to this measure, can the Great Liberal Party afford to send all its wealthy members over to the Conservative side? Why, even with the Unionist secession hard cash has begun to run short, and how many more capitalists would follow them if Eight Hours was inscribed on the Liberal banner? No; it is evident that, save in a few instances, both the political parties will form in a solid front against the oncoming tide of Labour.

But some will answer us with the cry that a Labour Party must be formed. But have trade-unionists sufficient funds to send a majority of labour members into the House of Commons? I don't think so, and at any rate, if they had, it would be a work of years to carry this measure. When all the rich men are united, every means would be used against the Labour Party—bribery, corruption, and intimidation, and it would be a long and bitter fight. Remember that to the solidarity of labour the rich oppose the solidarity of capital, and before that a minority of labour members would be powerless in Parliament. I am sure the political game of the Irish Home Rulers cannot be played again. However corrupt our political parties may be, however eager for place and office, they have too keen an eye to their then commercial interests to played off one against the other. They are landlords and capitalists first, and politicians afterwards. They remember, too, that the men who head the eight hours agitation also voted for the nationalisation of the land and means of production, and the sneaking gang of swindlers and pickpockets—we won't dignify them by calling them robbers; for they have not courage enough to take with the strong hand—will fight the "beginnings of evil," for they know that Socialism, which would force them to earn their living honestly, would be a very great evil for them. Therefore we shall see landlord and capitalist prepared to fight in mass in defence of their rights and privileges; and it will be useless attacking them in a place where they will have a majority for years to come, and where even a strong minority of labour representatives would be useless.

But "while the grass grows the steed starves," and probably before the Labour Party has even got an active minority in the House of Commons another commercial crisis will be upon us. Our present commercial prosperity is nearly at an end. On the day the Trades Congress met, a procession of the unemployed appeared again in the streets of London; an ominous sign for the coming winter. The storms, the floods, the heavy rains, have spread the potato blight in Ireland, and will make bread dear when the cold weather is upon us. These calamities affect not only England, but the whole civilised world. We seem to be approaching another year of revolution, such as our fathers saw in 1848. In that year also there was a serious commercial crisis; bread was dear; there was a terrible potato famine in Ireland; and the man who might be looked upon as the embodiment and type of despotism and "divine right," Pope Pious IX., declared in favour of a reforming policy. So to-day the German Emperor, the head-centre of the military despotism of the Continent, says he is a Socialist. He may also, like Pope Pious IX., be lighting the match which will fire the powder magazine. But in 1848, although Socialism was talked of, yet the leaders of the revolt in all countries were middle-class constitutionalists, who were fighting merely for the interests of the bourgeois. To-day the Revolution, when it comes, will be Socialist; it is a working-class movement; the middle classes take no part, they do not even stand aside in indifference, but they stand shoulder to shoulder with their old enemies the landed proprietors to resist the advancing peril.

It is therefore quite possible, when we are plunged into the coming commercial crisis, with closed factories, sharp starvation among thousands of unemployed, and reduced wages, and fierce discontent among all sections of labour, from engineers down to sandwich-men—that events may move a little too quickly for Parliament and Parliamentarians, and that their sage deliberations concerning Eight Hour Bills and the future of labour may be rudely interrupted by the roar of the revolutionary torrent which will sweep babbling chatterers and thievish humbugs into well-deserved oblivion. Not a "legal eight hours day," but "The land and all that is therein for the people," will then be the battle-cry of the working classes.

D. J. NICOLL.

THE AGRICULTURAL LABOURER.

WE hear much now about the agricultural labourer. It has been found by leaders of the New Unionism that it will not do to ignore him, that leaving him alone simply means that he becomes an ally of the Liveseys and Norwoods, to be used with crushing effect in a big strike or lock-out; so they are now talking of organising him, although that at first was not included in their programme.

We Revolutionary Socialists have for a long time endeavoured to spread our doctrines in the country districts, but we have been crippled for want of funds, and what work has been done is nothing to what remains to do. Seeing the agricultural labourer is likely to have much attention bestowed upon him in future by all sections of the Socialist and semi-Socialist party, I thought that an article from one who has lived in the country for some time and understands the conditions under which the labourer works and lives, would be of interest to the readers of the Commonweal.

I will begin by describing the man and the conditions in which he lives at Newnham, a village in North Hertfordshire. He begins the day's work at six and leaves at six; two hours are taken for meals. This is the normal day; in the depth of winter, when it is impossible to see as early or as late as six o'clock, the hours are less; in summer it is usual to do some of the work by the piece, when the hours are pretty much what the men like to make them. They can begin at 3 or 4 a.m. and take a long dinner-hour. By steadily toiling through all the hours that he can stand the man may obtain as much as 3s., and for one month in harvest he may secure 5s., a-day, but this is when there is no "reserve army of labour." But it must be clearly understood that every shower of rain stops his work and his pay; sometimes a night's rain prevents two days' work; during these two days there may or may not be other work to which he can put himself—it may happen that it is not convenient for it to be done. Certainly the day's rest is a great boon to the worker; it would be greater still if he had more facilities to amuse or instruct himself.

The normal day's pay (not piecework) has been as low as 1s. 10d., and in some villages near Newnham it has been as little as 1s. 8d., but as a general rule a week's continuous work would follow, regardless of the state of the weather. In fact, the men in this particular place very seldom lose any time, in which respect it is totally different from most villages. This arises from the small number of resident workers for the 950 acres of arable land, held by two farmers.

There are twenty-three work-people's cabins, for which they pay 1s. a-week rent. Fourteen of these twenty-three cabins have only one door. I do not know how many have only one bedroom; but it is a fact that in one of them a man, his wife, two sons, and a daughter sleep in one small bedroom. The oldest son is fourteen and the youngest nine. There are, of course, thousands of cases of greater "crowding," but this particular case is in a small village. This man is one whom the clergymen and members of "county families" would term a "very respectable person"; so much so that his employer has asked the agent of the "owner" of the "property" to have the space over the wood-barn converted into a bedroom for the children at a cost of £16. The agent requires 10s. a-year more rent if the outlay is made. The employer protests that the man ought not to be asked for more rent; then the agent offers to find material if the man's employer will pay for the carpenter's time fixing it into the landlord's "cabin," to remain the landlord's "property" for all time. The employer having no other interest than that which exists between employer and employed, the work remains undone.

These workers exist upon the wages stated. They cannot exactly tell you how they exist; I do not think they know: they have been brought up to it. In addition to existing and paying the shilling rent, they clothe themselves also. I have never seen a Newham man in rags. You very seldom see an agricultural worker in actual rags; at the same time it is the rare exception for him to possess two complete sets of clothes to work in. If he gets wet, he gets dry again as he moves. Rheumatism is common, but is not complained of so much as might reasonably be expected.

Of amusement I cannot find a trace. Undoubtedly the people have amusement of some kind, but I do not know what it is.

Anything in the shape of a country lane is not to be found. There are no nooks in which to look for brambles—you may not go off the public road without a shiver. It is all private property, straight and stiff; as formal as a coffin; private property always is. But for all that, if you bring proper letters of introduction you will find the custodians of property are very nice people indeed. The fact remains, however, that you do not get "letters of introduction" very often.

The sale of alcoholic liquors is very strictly forbidden; but the secret consumption of laudanum is not. It would amount to exactly the same thing if it were prohibited, and all the pains of hell threatened against those who took it.

This is part of the inner life of Newnham, Hertfordshire, in 1890. It is really a great deal better than that of an average agricultural village. Take the case of the adjoining parish—Stotford. Men walk thence to Newnham to dig potatoes, by the day or the piece. Having raised a few tons for very little wage, they naturally carry a few home in their dinner-baskets—not in wheelbarrows; they are too much toil-worn to carry home a "load" of goods worth only a farthing a-pound—but still they have helped themselves to some few potatoes out of some scores of tons which their labour has secured from the rapidly approaching frost, having no land of their own on which to grow potatoes or any other thing, and having little, if any, prospect of regular work for six months to come. Tramping their weary way towards Stotford in Indian file on the narrow footpath, they meet an enemy of the human race wearing a blue suit. This representative of Law-n'-order has lately been moved into the locality, and wants to make his little self a name and get his self-conceit puffed out by a little promotion. He is then and there seized with the idea that the men's dinner-baskets look like Mark Twain's Mr. Smiley's frog—i.e., "mighty baggy"—and his inquisitiveness goes as far as taking the names of the useful men into his useless and harmful pocket-book, from which he makes an elaborate "report" to his superintendent.

Now I have no love for farmers as a class, but the particular farmer whose potatoes are in question, would in my opinion heartily wish the policeman and his report at the devil. He does not wish to go seven miles to be witness against men who dig potatoes. He will be expected to ask the Nupkinses to be lenient; he does not wish to press the case. Finally, he pays the small fines and large costs, amounting together to more than all the potatoes that all Stotford could have carried home in the way these few were "lifted."

I am of opinion that the lot of the occasional labourer, agricultural or other, is worse than that of the 23 cabin-holders at Newnham, although it is a lonely place. These 23 and their families have the sympathy of thousands of people, who are rapidly becoming very indignant at the system carried on for the benefit of a landlord who so seldom visits the place that he actually lets the shooting—and lets it to a person other than either of the two farmers. Here we see the case put by Carlyle of the Worker, the Master-Worker, and the UN-WORKER. The latter is believed to possess four millions worth of property of one sort or another. A kindly man in his way he does actually give to the poor every Christmas, and at other times, if asked to help through a hard winter or an exceptional difficulty. The two farmers are also kindly men, and the workers are all most amiable people. But the fact remains that these 950 acres produce three or four times the value that reaches the actual workers, who could very well manage all the business without the parish constable. They know when and how to do the work, but the system leaves them with only one tool of their own—the hoe. The corn and clover are cut by "reapers" of the Hornsby and Samuelson sort.¹ For all which these men's lot is more free from actual dire necessity than that of the majority of those who work in the adjoining parish of Bygrave. This little parish is "owned" by the present Chancellor of the ever sun-lit British Empire, and the 1,100 acres are in the occupation of one farmer. Not a bad sort in the heart of him. He would have it all ploughed without hurting a worm if he could, but the "system" holds all his community in the same grip; the workers for the most part walk from Baldock or Ashwell to work when required. At other times they are free to help the South Metropolitan or any other gas company. They know that weeds remain in the Bygrave land, and they also know that those weeds are to be removed on a system of which they form part, but not that part which has the direction of agriculture. They are always paid the amount of their contract wages; the Chancellor's agent is not troubled about the cabins in which they live, those cabins are not on the Chancellor's estate.

THE ENEMY'S TESTIMONY.

THROUGHOUT the world to-day the progress of Socialism is the central phenomenon, and even the enemy, Clericalism, has to testify to the "growth" of our ideas. Curiously enough, it is the Roman Catholic Church that has first awakened to this fact, and with characteristic astuteness has attempted to turn it to its own advantage. I came across the other day a little twelve-page tract issued by the Catholic Truth Society, entitled, "Modern Socialists on the History of the Church." It is written by Mr. A. Hilliard Alleridge, and although he is innocent enough to describe Henry George as a Socialist, his production is not, I think, uninteresting. Premising that "Socialist writers of the revolutionary type" are not likely to be prejudiced in favour of the Church of Rome, he says: "It is curious to note the recent progress of Socialist views among English speaking peoples. Ten years ago English Socialists were almost unknown—to-day they are a large and an increasing body of men. English names that have a world-wide reputation in literature and science appear on the lists of adherents of this or that Socialist programme; not a week passes without a number of Socialist meetings and lectures, and the literature of the party is a rapidly growing one and has a wide circulation." He then proceeds to quote from the writings of Henry George (who, I suppose, is a Socialist "of the revolutionary type" ?), Morris, and Hyndman, passages which denounce that pious fraud "the Reformation," and give the Roman Church credit for what really social work it performed in the Middle Ages.

Mr. Alleridge is kind enough to add that on these matters "the would-be organisers of a Socialist Utopia are teaching plain and simple truth." Not a few of their objections "to the pet maxims of current political economy are sound and valid," and we hear that "on the negative side Catholic economists have several points of contact with their teachings, especially in the recognition of the evils resulting from the present relations of labour and capital, the so-called freedom of contract in the labour market, and the unequal sharing of the profits of Labour." All this is, of course, very pretty, and one expects to hear that Grant Pope has doffed the tiara for the bonnet rouge. But, alas! the mountain is in labour again! I find, after all, that "confiscation" cannot be accepted, and phrases like "bureaucratic tyranny," "brotherhood of rich and poor," "linking of class with class," bob up with a cork-like persistency throughout the last few pages of the tract. Clerical sympathy with Labour is generally a swindle, but still it is worth noting as a sign of the times. Rome has never lacked foresight, and this recognition of our progress from one of our most powerful enemies—let no Socialist under-rate the power of Clericalism to chloroform the workers—must be interesting and encouraging. X.

DUBLIN.—On Monday, September 1st, most of the coal merchants locked out their workmen as a reply to a demand for an increase of wages. Their present object is to break up the union. A meeting of 13,000 to 20,000 people was held in the Phoenix Park Sunday, September 7th, the principal speaker being Wm. Thorne, general secretary National Union of Gas-workers; Shields, Graham, Cauty, Dench, and Poole also addressed the meeting.

SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION—EDINBURGH.—We have for the past month been holding very successful meetings at Leith and on the Edinburgh Meadows. Considering the material which we have got to work upon here, we have every reason to feel gratified at the results of the propaganda, which is not by any means of the milk-and-water kind which our comrade Kitz may imagine it to be. It is our purpose to form a branch in Leith during the incoming winter, and there is no doubt a strong one can be set agoing there. Last Sunday comrade Hamilton spoke well on Leith Links to a large crowd, and the attention and liberality displayed augurs well for a successful winter campaign in Leith. On the Meadows Smith dealt with the tramways question, which is exercising the minds of our civic misrulers at the present time, and which we intend to have discussed publicly in our new hall in a short time. Bell was in splendid form, his scathing criticism of Carnegie's Dundee speech being much relished. Hamilton also spoke of that triumph of hypocrisy, the Scottish Leader. When the stool was taken down the crowd divided itself into groups, in the centre of which some comrades were tackled on the subject of Socialism by persons who had not the courage to mount the rostrum when questions were called for. We continued in disputation till a late hour. Good collections and sales of literature.—T.

NOTES ON NEWS.

Most of our readers have heard of the false and shameful charge brought against our comrade Miss Lupton by those blue coated scoundrels, who make a trade of perjury and brutality. Those who know Miss Lupton know how utterly ridiculous and shameless this charge was. We wonder that the slinking cowards who made it was not ashamed to crawl upon the earth in the sight of other men. We all know that it is always been the practice of those in power to try and throw disgrace and dishonour upon those they cannot corrupt or bribe. Our comrade has our sincere sympathy, and we are sure she will persevere, despite the cowardly brutality of ruffianly policemen, in carrying the glad tidings of Socialism to the poor and oppressed.

EDS.

The arrest of our comrade Miss Lupton, when holding a meeting, on a false charge of being "drunk and disorderly," is an instructive example of police methods. Our comrade has made herself especially obnoxious to Bradford's boys in blue,—as much by making them look silly when hanging about our gatherings as by any other means. Nothing annoys a bobby so much as that he (with his helmet and his truncheon and his "ammunition" boots) should be turned into ridicule by a mere "civilian." He feels then that the very foundations of society are indeed being undermined by insolent iconoclasts.

Miss Lupton accordingly made herself the mark for the vengeance of the first "active and intelligent" officer who could take her at what he conceived to be a disadvantage. 11 L R and 317 L (it may be just as well to note these numbers) thought they saw such an opportunity on Thursday week last. They found our comrade addressing a meeting without any others of the League to support her. Here was a woman all alone. There were no hard knocks from male fists to be feared, and not much chance of any independent witness, likely to be credited by a magistrate, turning up. 11 L R and 317 L felt that the time had come for action.

The question remained, however,—what action should they take? It was then that a brilliant idea struck one or both of these twin heroes of "the Force." The old plan of charging speakers with "causing an obstruction" was distinctly rococo, and had had its day. Besides, it was desirable to select a charge which, it might be supposed, would annoy Miss Lupton, and perhaps cause her to lose her temper. Accordingly, the constabular imagination (proving equal to its task) evolved the daring conception of a charge of drunkenness, and the constabular arms and legs marched the speaker to the station, where she was detained for some hours before she was allowed to send for bail.

Unhappily, accidents will happen to the best arranged police cases. Our uniformed friends had relied too implicitly upon the loyalty of their divisional surgeon,—perhaps had thought that an "unprotected female" would never dream of demanding to see him. Both expectations were disappointed. Miss Lupton insisted upon her right, and the very police doctor was compelled to certify that she was perfectly sober.

Nevertheless, with a courage worthy of a better cause, our two gallant constables refused to confess themselves beaten. They had made a charge, and when a policeman makes a charge he sticks to it. With the sanction, doubtless, of their inspector, they duly appeared to prosecute next morning before Mr. Fenwick, and, upon the insidious invitation of counsel for the defence, 317 L covered himself with ridicule by swearing that, despite his divisional surgeon, he still thought that our comrade was drunk, or (he added by way of saving clause) "if not drunk, mad"! Of course, the magistrate was compelled to dismiss the case, and the gentlemen in blue "took nothing by their motion."

R. W. B.

The Scots Observer, an Imperial magazine, has a fling at the Socialists in an article ironically entitled "The Good Time Coming," wherein the writer says when England is a vast convict establishment the iconoclasts will give Art the shortest shrift in history. When we have lost our individuality, and are known to the officials who supply our barest necessities by a number branded upon our foreheads or stitched upon our attire, we must needs live out our lives of dulness and despair. We may then, he says in conclusion, see Mr. Crane doling out slabs of coarse beef in a booth, and the earnest Mr. Sanderson officiating with a broom and a shovel at the tail-board of a scavenger's cart. Appropriately enough, this journal has as a tag an article on stocks and shares and the money market.

Really, the scribe must have had the present system in his mind (sic) when he penned his pitiful plea for Art. The convict establishments abound; the hideous blocks of "dwellings," and the railway-arch, and the advertising screen are here; so also are the slums, the true products of this "art-loving" age. It excites no surprise that this aristocratic publication sneers at the sandwich-men's attempt to wring a better wage out of the sweater for their wretched occupation. To become advertising mediums between two boards is frequently the fate of broken-down literary flunkies and paragraph-mongers, and this will be increasingly so as their commercial ink-slinging fails; therefore it is rather hard that the writers for the imperial magazine should deride attempts to increase the pay for what may after all be their last and certainly most fitting occupation.

SOCIALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

MIDLAND COUNTIES SOCIALIST FEDERATION.

The movement is looking up in the Midlands. Everywhere the greatest activity is being displayed by our comrades. The propaganda goes on at an increasing rate, notwithstanding all the obstacles which are placed in the path of all who are ready to fight for Freedom. The Sheffield comrades hold about thirteen meetings every week, and sell about an average of fifteen quires of Commonweal, a great number of pamphlets, besides carrying on the propaganda in various other ways. Meetings are also held in Clay Cross and Chesterfield every Sunday and during the week. Andrew Hall and John Furniss have been very active in carrying on the fight in these two places, and through their efforts good societies have been formed. They have now a comrade from some other town to address the meetings every Sunday. The revolutionary propaganda has certainly caught on at these places. The Leicester comrades are also very active, holding about eight meetings per week and selling a large amount of literature. The Socialist Cause has been started in Derby and Loughborough, places where no meetings were ever held, and the most astonishing results have followed.

LOUGHBOROUGH.

The meetings were started here on Friday, August 8, by C. W. Mowbray and W. Taylor (Leicester), who had a most successful meeting. On Friday, Aug. 15, W. Doleman and J. Peacock were the speakers. Our comrades created quite a stir, discussion having started in the columns of a local paper as the result of their speeches. On Friday, August 22, T. Barclay and J. C. Chambers (of Leicester) journeyed there, but the meeting was unfortunately interfered with by a heavy downpour of rain, which also stopped the sale of literature. On Friday, August 29, T. Proctor and P. H. Knight paid them a visit, and there was a slight scrimmage with some of the crowd at the conclusion of comrade Knight's speech. On Friday, September 5, comrade Peacock again paid a visit there, effectually silencing the opposition, holding a discussion extending over an hour and a quarter, and replying to the arguments urged against Socialism to the entire satisfaction of the meeting.

DERBY.

This is one of the large towns which has until recently been overlooked by the Socialist missionaries, but which promises to take a foremost position in the Socialist movement of the future. It has been the despair of all reformers; but the workers are rapidly awaking from their apathy, and enthusiastically embrace Revolutionary Socialism. It is one of the most hopeful signs of the progress of our propaganda, and gives more courage to those who are fighting this battle. The first meeting was held on Saturday, August 9, when comrades Mowbray, Barclay (Leicester), Proctor (Nottingham), and Purcell (Derby), spoke on the "Aims of Socialism." Their remarks were taken up by the crowd, who gave to the collection £1 0s. 3^d., the sale of literature amounting to 17s. On Saturday, August 16, comrade Harry Carless (of Walsall) gave a very able address, which won the sympathy of the crowd. Our comrade on the Sunday morning turned up at the meeting of the temperance party, and after hearing the quack remedies for poverty put forward by the speakers, proceeded to go for them and spoke for upwards of an hour, completely pulling their arguments to pieces, the audience taking up and cheering every fresh plea made for Socialism. Our comrade also held a meeting in the evening, when he addressed about 2,000 people. This in a town where it was openly boasted that the Socialists were frightened of holding any meetings whatever, and that Sunday meetings were not at all possible. One amusing incident occurred during our comrades visit. As he was in the Market Place in the afternoon, he was asked by a constable of the police if he was the "Socialist chap" who had been speaking in the morning. On his replying in the affirmative, our comrade was asked if he had any literature he could give him, and he gave the policeman his Commonweal. The man in blue then thanked our comrade, and wished him and the Cause good luck and withdrew, after telling the small crowd who had assembled to move on. On Saturday, August 23, comrade Chambers (Leicester) paid Derby a visit. He met with a very good reception, and made a strong appeal to the audience to join the local society. On August 30, comrades Leonard Hall (Manchester) and H. Davis (London) were the speakers; good addresses were given, and the remarks of our comrades listened to with attention. On September 6, comrade George Cores journeyed from Leeds and held a splendid meeting, his rendering of the song for Socialism—

"When the Worker has his place at the top of the tree,
And the Loafer is somewhere down below," bringing forth cheers from the crowd. He was listened to with rapt attention. Good help has been rendered in Derby by comrades Goodwin and Purcell in helping at these meetings and organising a Socialist Society. These results of our propaganda put new life into our comrades, and make them more determined to overthrow the rotten state of society, and place in the labourer's hands the full result of his toil. It is a pity there were not more speakers for Socialism in the Midlands than there are, as there is the most splendid ground for preaching our ideal and converting the workers. The comrades of the League in London would do well to try a scheme of sending out more missionaries into the provinces, and to try and obtain work and stop there if possible.

NOTTINGHAM.

We still keep the ball rolling here with the spread of the spirit of revolt. On Sunday, August 17, our comrade Proctor, Peacock, and Knight spoke at both our meetings. On Sunday, August 24, comrade S. Bingham (Sheffield) paid us a visit, his very pointed remarks calling for the opposition from some trades union leaders as to his attack upon them and their methods. The meetings which he addressed were very lively. On Sunday, August 31, Leonard Hall (Manchester) was the speaker for the day. Our comrades two addresses were given in a very able manner, his address in the morning on "The Cause of Poverty" being delivered in very clear and convincing language, and his revolutionary remarks being enthusiastically received. In the evening, in advocating his "Remedies for Poverty," the S.D.F. policy was given in the best manner ever heard in Nottingham, being put before the people in the plainest possible form; he held the best audiences we have had for some time. On Sunday, September 7, comrade George Cores gave two very able addresses, his remarks on "The Money Question" being exceptionally good, and were eagerly taken up by the crowd. At the conclusion of the meeting Cores sang his "Song for Socialism," Peacock singing "The Coming of the Light" and the "Ninety and Nine." This is an excellent means of keeping an audience interested. Our comrade Peacock has done good service by taking the chair for the speakers and addressing the crowd on local topics. Comrade Proctor has also been busy at organising the unskilled labourers of the town and district. The sale of literature still keeps up to the standard, Commonweal selling out every week and the collections being good. At the half-yearly meeting of our club, recently held, Clifton was again elected secretary, Peacock treasurer, Mrs. Shakleton being elected president; a strong committee was also formed. The question of deciding on the future work of the club was adjourned until next Sunday. It is our intention to go in for a very vigorous propaganda during the winter months, and use all the means at our disposal in spreading discontent. The speakers appointed for the ensuing months are Chambers (Leicester), Mrs. Lahr, Joe Tanner (Birmingham), Andrew Hall, and Mrs. Schack. "Success to our comrades in all countries, and three cheers for the Social Revolution!" are the greetings sent from the comrades in the Midlands.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. XXVII.—A RESTING-PLACE ON THE UPPER THAMES.

At a place where the river flowed round a headland of the meadows, we stopped a while for rest and victuals on a beautiful bank which almost reached the dignity of a hill-side: the wide meadows spread before us, and already the scythe was busy amidst the hay. One change I noticed amidst the quiet beauty of the fields—to wit, that they were planted with trees here and there, often fruit-trees, and that there was none of the niggardly begrudging of space to a handsome tree which I remembered too well; and though the willows were often polled (or shrowded, as they call it in that country-side), this was done with some regard to beauty: I mean that there was no polling of rows on rows so as to destroy the pleasantness of half a mile of country, but a thoughtful sequence in the cutting that prevented a sudden bareness anywhere. To be short, the fields were everywhere treated as a garden made for the pleasure as well as the livelihood of all, as old Hammond told me was the case.

On this bank or bent of the hill, then, we had our mid-day meal; somewhat early for dinner, if that mattered, but we had been stirring early: the slender stream of the Thames winding below us between the garden of a country I have been telling of; a furlong from us was a beautiful little islet begrown with graceful trees; on the slopes westward of us was a wood of varied growth overhanging the narrow meadow on the south side of the river; while to the north was a wide stretch of mead rising very gradually from the river's edge. A delicate spire of an ancient building rose up from out of the trees in the middle distance, with a few grey houses clustered about it; while nearer to us, in fact not half a furlong from the water, was a quite modern house—a wide quadrangle of one story, the buildings that made it being quite low. There was no garden between it and the river, nothing but a row of pear-trees still quite young and slender; and though there did not seem to be much ornament about it, it had a sort of natural elegance, like that of the trees themselves.

As we sat looking down on all this in the sweet June day, rather happy than merry, Ellen, who sat next me, her hand clasped about one knee, leaned sideways to me, and said in a low voice which Dick and Clara might have noted if they had not been busy in happy wordless love-making: "Friend, in your country were the houses of your field-labourers anything like that?"

I said: "Well, at any rate the houses of our rich men were not; they were mere blots upon the face of the land."

"I find that hard to understand," she said. "I can see why the workmen, who were so oppressed, should not have been able to live in beautiful houses; for it takes time and leisure, and minds not overburdened with cares, to make beautiful dwellings; and I quite understand that these poor people were not allowed to live in such a way as to have these (to us) necessary good things. But why the rich men, who had the time and the leisure and the materials for building, as it would be in this case, should not have housed themselves well, I do not understand, as yet. Of course, I know," she said, looking me full in the eyes and blushing, "that you mean to say that their houses and all belonging to them were generally ugly and base, unless they chanced to be ancient like yonder remnant of our forefathers' work" (pointing to the spire); "that they were—let me see; what is the word?"

"Vulgar," said I. "We used to say," said I, "that the ugliness and vulgarity of the rich men's dwellings was a necessary reflection from the sordidness and bareness of life which they forced upon the poor people."

She knit her brows as in thought; then turned a brightened face on me, as if she had caught the idea, and said: "Yes, friend, I see what you mean. We have sometimes—those of us who look into these things—talked this very matter over; because, to say the truth, we have plenty of record of the so-called arts of the time before Equality of Life: and there are not wanting people who say that the state of that society was not the cause of all that ugliness; that they were ugly in their life because they liked to be, and could have had beautiful things about them if they had chosen; just as a man or body of men now may, if they please, make things more or less beautiful—"

"Stop! I know what you are going to say."

"Do you?" said I, smiling, yet with a beating heart.

"Yes," she said; "you are answering me, teaching me, in some way or another, although you have not spoken the words aloud. You were going to say that in times of inequality it was an essential condition of the life of these rich men that they should not themselves make what they wanted for the adornment of their lives, but should force those to make them whom they forced to live pinched and sordid lives; and that as a necessary consequence the sordidness and pinching, the ugly barrenness of those ruined lives, were worked up even into the adornment of the lives of the rich, and art died out amongst men? Was that what you would say, my friend?"

"Yes, yes," I said, looking at her eagerly; for she had risen and was standing on the edge of the bent, the light wind stirring her dainty raiment, one hand laid on her bosom, the other arm stretched downward and clenched in her earnestness.

"It is true," she said, "it is true! We have proved it true."

I think amidst my—something more than interest in her, and admiration for her, I was beginning to wonder how it would all end. I had a glimmering of fear of what might follow, of anxiety as to the remedy of that age for the missing of something one might set one's heart on, when Dick rose to his feet and cried out in his hearty manner: "Neighbour Ellen, are you quarrelling with the guest, or are you worrying him to tell you things which he cannot properly explain to our ignorance?"

"Neither, dear neighbour," she said. "I was so far from quarrelling with him that I think I have been making him good friends both with himself and me. Is it so, dear guest?" she said, looking down at me with a delightful smile of confidence in being understood.

"Indeed it is," said I.

"Well, moreover," she said, "I must say for him that he has explained himself to me very well indeed, so that I quite understand him."

"All right," quoth Dick. "When I first set eyes on you at Runnymede I knew that there was something wonderful in your keenness of wits. I don't say that as a mere pretty speech to please you," said he quickly, but because it is true; and it made me want to see more of you. But, come, we ought to be going; for we are not half way, and we ought to be in well before sunset."

And therewith he took Clara's hand, and led her down the bent. But Ellen stood thoughtfully looking down for a little, and as I took her hand to follow Dick, she turned round to me and said:

"You might tell me a great deal and make many things clear to me, if you would."

"Yes," said I, "I am pretty well fit for that,—and for nothing else—an old man like me."

She did not notice the bitterness that, whether I liked it or not was in my voice as I spoke, but went on. "It is not so much for myself; I should be quite content to dream about past times, and if I could not idealise them, idealise some of the people who lived in them. But I think sometimes people are too careless of the history of the past—too apt to leave it in the hands of old learned men like Hammond. Who knows? happy as we are, times may change; we may be bitten with some impulse towards change, and many things may seem too wonderful for us to resist, too exciting not to catch at, if we do not know that they are but phases of what has been before; and withal ruinous, deceitful, and sordid."

As we went slowly down toward the boats she said again: "Not for myself alone, dear friend; I shall have children; perhaps before the end a good many—I hope so. And though of course I cannot force any special kind of knowledge upon them, yet, my friend, I cannot help thinking that just as they might be like me in body, so I might impress upon them some part of my ways of thinking; that is, indeed, some of the essential part of myself; that part which was not mere moods, created by the matters and events round about me. What do you think?"

Of one thing I was sure, that her beauty and kindness and eagerness combined forced me to think as she did, when she was not earnestly laying herself open to receive my thoughts. I said, what at the time was true, that I thought it most important; and presently stood entranced by the wonder of her grace as she stepped into the light boat, and held out her hand to me. And so on we went up the Thames still—or whither?

THE GREAT LAND THIEVES.

LETTER III.—CYMRU FYYD.

"The proud throne shall crumble,
The diadem shall wane,
The tribes of earth shall humble
The pride of those who reign;
And War shall lay his pomp away,
The fame that heroes cherish
The glory earned in deadly fray
Shall fade, decay, and perish;
(But) Honour waits o'er all the earth,
Through endless generations,
The art that calls her harvests forth
And feeds the expectant nations."

In turning one's attention to Wales as a scene of landlord domination and capitalist exploitation, one is struck by the present passiveness of a once brave and hardy race in the hands of their despoilers. To see the descendants of the wild and daring Celtic tribes imprisoned in mine and factory, slaving for a pittance, and to traverse their once beautiful hills and vales, but now disfigured by blast-furnaces and prodigious accumulations of filth; to see (and smell) what were once pure gushing mountain streams turned into faecal disgusting sewers,—then truly can we say with Marx that commercialism shapes the world after its own image.

As a writer in a local Glamorgan journal has remarked, the once lonely vales have been converted into teeming hives, resonant with the clash and whirr of great industries, increasing its resources and population at an amazing rate. It is enlarging everything except its sanitation. Beauty and purity have fled the scene, but commerce and typhus reign in their stead.

Hiring capitalist scribes and political economists wax ecstatic over the impetus given to trade by the utilisation of the vast mineral resources of Wales, but the other side of the shield is carefully kept out of view. The hideous disfigurement of the country, the waste of life and limb, the overwork and scanty pay, are glozed over, if not ignored. Moreover, the same sage writers carefully keep silent upon the monstrous pretensions of landlordism, which claims the minerals beneath the soil. It is computed that the landlords of these islands receive £36,000,000 per annum from mining rents and royalties, and of this enormous tribute paid to idle thieves who have never mined a shovelful of coal or an ounce of ore Wales pays a large proportion. My Lord Marquis of Bute, owner of 116,683 acres of land, claims eightpence per ton royalty upon coal raised in Glamorganshire Valley. His lordly castle at Cardiff stands out in strange contrast to the wretched cottages of the miners in the Rhondda Vawr.

The swarms of men and boys who daily descend the mines and pursue their deadly calling, to emerge again only at nightfall, must first earn this tribute to an idler and his fellows. Nor is this the whole of the tax levied upon their labour by the land thieves. Before a mine can be sunk an enormous bonus must be paid the landowner. The mining lease is frequently so high, and bristles with so many pitfalls, that by a delightful arrangement peculiar to landlordism, the mines, after having been opened by the labour of others, lapses into the landlord's hands. My Lord Dunraven demands £40 per acre for land upon which it was necessary to build cottages; the pasture value was 5s. per acre, and he in common with the landlords of North and South Wales claim the cottages built by others upon the expiry of the leases. And thus a society which punishes the theft of a loaf with imprisonment erects into lawgivers and legislators those who thieve legally the results of other men's labour.

The question of Way Leaves, i.e., the tax or fine paid to the landowner before the soil can be touched for mining, also the rents and royalties, is a sore one with the mine-owners; but both mine-owner and landowner are an incubus upon the bent shoulders of the miner. At present he pins his hopes on Mabon, and other House of Common debaters. Some day he will divest himself of Parliamentary hallucinations, and take a sharp and decisive method of ridding himself of both.

If we leave the underpaid miners and quarrymen, and turn to agricultural Wales, we find Landlordism pressing like a blight upon the land. Lord Cranbrook has insisted upon the need of greater attention being paid to agriculture in Wales. The class to which his lordship belongs are responsible in Wales, as elsewhere, for the neglected state of agriculture. Of the 4,700,431 acres of common lands, once completely wild, the greater portion has been seized by the land thieves. 270 odd persons claim 4,000,000 acres of the soil. One wonders at the ancient and dilapidated cottages that are to be seen about the country, and the explanation is Landlordism. By the most unscrupulous use of their power to grant or withhold leases, except upon their own terms, they have confiscated the cottages built by the tenantry; and in this way some of the best portions of Holyhead, Cardiff, and other towns are OWNED by patrician robbers.

The thrifty quarrymen and labourers have, by self-denial and tremendous exertion, brought great tracts of barren hill-side into cultivation, and built cottages worth £110,000, with the result that the land thieves have increased their rents fourfold, and charged them for "improvements." In Carnarvonshire and Merionethshire, half a million worth of property thus created lies at the mercy of peers and patricians.

A few samples of landlord tyranny are sufficient to illustrate the question. B grants a lease to A, A must keep a dog for the behoof of his landlord; he may not, however, keep one for his own sheep. He must agree to allow a suit to be instituted in his name, but by the landlord, against anyone whom it may please the landowner to prosecute. In this way a tenant may be compelled to prosecute his own kith and kin. The landlord may shoot or hunt over his tenant's land, but the tenant must not kill or snare the game which destroys his crops. For each and all the things which the tenant may not do there are fines varying from £20 to £100.

Superadded to landlord and capitalist is the parson of the Established Church. He exacts tithes from a people who neither desire nor receive his ministrations. Bodies of police and troops, with emergency men, are being moved about the country, valiantly seizing upon the chattels and stock in satisfaction of the claims of a State parson. Truly the spectacle is a strange one to see the followers of the lowly Nazarene enforcing their claims with the aid of truncheon and sabre, and enlisting in their service hired bullies in the shape of scoundrelly emergency men!

Religious and political Nonconformity is punished in the most arbitrary manner. Wholesale evictions, ending frequently in the death of the victims, are the penalty for disobedience to landlord mandates. Legislation is supposed to have given the tenantry some protection in respect to game and holdings, but they dare not avail themselves of the provisions of the Acts without incurring the risk of eviction. So a tenant may have his garden produce eaten in a night by hares and rabbits, and yet must not harm one; in short, the fish of the rivers, the birds of the air, the land above and the minerals below are mine, saith the lord of the soil.

The pettifogging politicians who crawl at the heels of the Great Liberal Party, delude the Welsh people with the hope that with their advent to power, the evils under which they groan will disappear. Yet, singular to relate, the list of the great landowners of the country show Liberals and Tories in nearly equal proportions, and the most exacting and tyrannical are the "Liberals."

Socialism has found a foothold in Wales. As it grows in strength the old political and religious fetishes will lose their worshippers, and Wales will truly advance towards the Social Revolution.

FREE SPEECH MEETING AT SHORT STREET.

LAST Sunday morning, a demonstration was held by the Socialist League in Short Street, New Cut, to protest against Miss Lupton's arrest at that place on the previous Thursday. Our comrades brought a van and banners, but though costermonger's barrows habitually stand in the street, and though a teetotaler on a hansom cab occupies every Sunday the next opening, the Socialists were not allowed to use their van. Comrade Buckeridge took the chair, and was ably supported by Parker, Kitz, Mrs. Lahr, and Miss Lupton. A large and enthusiastic crowd assembled, who encouraged the speakers, and showed every sympathy with the meeting. A resolution condemning not only Miss Lupton's arrest, but also the attack on Free Speech, was passed with acclamation.

ABERDEEN.—On Sunday night, 31st August, Leatham lectured to an unusually large audience on "Is Marriage a Failure?" A lively discussion followed. Duncan and Leatham addressed an open-air meeting on Castle Street on Thursday night. On Saturday night W. Cooper, Rennie, and Leatham spoke in the same place to a large audience. Our new red flag apparently added to the enthusiasm both of the speakers and the audience. The literature sold well.

LEEDS.—On Sunday last we held three splendid meetings—morning Hunslet Moor, afternoon Woodhouse Moor, evening Vicars Croft—when Mowbray was the principal speaker. We were unable to get any opposition, although we had been threatened seriously. We sold 133 Commonweal and some copies of Freedom and pamphlets, and we collected 19s. Comrade Bland, from Bradford, visited us on Saturday night, and J. Burgoyne, of Glasgow, was with us on Sunday; he hopes to find employment here. And the Cause goes marching on.

YARMOUTH.—Good meeting addressed by Leggatt for an hour and a half. Good sale of Commonweal and Freedom; 1s. 6d. collected. Comrade Burnie announced for next Sunday.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

THE TRADES CONGRESS.

There can be no question that the New Unionism has gained the victory all along the line; and we must confess that the leaders have come through it a great deal better than we expected. When Mr. Champion was the main mover in the New Unionist movement, there was always an uneasy suspicion among many Socialists that not only was the agitation being utilised for purely reactionary ends, but that its main object was to ruin the Socialist movement by insisting upon one item in the Social Democratic programme, the legal eight hours day, by dragging it as a red herring across the path of progress. But there is little fear of that now; the leaders of the New Unionism, by declaring for the nationalisation of the land and the means of production, have shown that they have not forgotten the principles they once prominently advocated; and it is evident from the outburst of ill-concealed rage and fury from the reactionary press that they have been disappointed, and have found out, as many reactionists have done before, that people who play with fire often burn their fingers. Neither Maltman Barry nor his clever pupil H. H. Champion have been able to turn the popular movement in the direction they wished. The revolutionary forces were too strong for them; and the present leaders know well enough also that neither they nor anyone else can boast that they control the rushing stream which merely bears them with it. Even John Burns is as little master of the popular movement as he was of the crowd which bore him through the West-end of that famous 8th of February, mid the crash of shattered glass and the shouts of a rebel populace. I was speaking just now of the fury of the reactionary press. Let us give a few extracts from a "highly respectable" capitalist newspaper, the Liverpool Mercury:

"The advanced section of the Congress were ripe with suggestions which, if adopted and carried out, would turn the world topsy-turvy. The eight hours proposal is one of the least revolutionary of these proposals. During the closing scenes on Saturday some of the wilder spirits of the party gave vent to suggestions so extravagant as to make one wonder whether they were brought forward in a serious vein. Boycotting is the latest resort proposed by Mr. John Burns and his friends in order to bring about the establishment of the new order of things which is to make labour the supreme power in the State, even if it be erected on the ruins of society. Everything and everybody standing in the way of the realisation of their schemes, however utopian in conception, is to be swept aside. All commodities made by so-called 'blackleg' labour are to be boycotted; only those rail, tramway, and steamship owners who allow their employes to work under the most favourable conditions and pay them the best wages are to be patronised by trade unionists. Even reporters representing newspapers which do not pay the full rate of union wages to printers are to be placed under a ban, and be refused permission to take notes at a trades-union meeting; while the newspapers in question, as well as general printing establishments of the same stamp, are to be anathematised as unworthy of receiving any support whatever from unionists. The new boycott is to be made universal. It does not seem to have struck the advanced section that in clamouring for what they call their rights they are resorting to the worst methods of tyranny, and setting up a claim that no one else shall have any rights. . . . Under the present condition of things no Government would entertain the idea of introducing an Eight Hours Bill, and still less would Parliament contemplate passing such a measure."

We think it a remarkable fact that an organ like the Liverpool Mercury agrees with us that a "universal boycott" is a more "revolutionary proposal" than an Eight Hours Law. They know that the Eight Hours Law is impossible, for the capitalists cannot be beaten in their fortress the House of Commons, where "no Government would entertain the idea of introducing an Eight Hours Bill, and still less would Parliament contemplate passing such a measure." But not even Parliament can save the sweater from the boycott; and there is a better weapon than the universal boycott, and that is a Universal Strike, as the capitalists may find out before long. Several of the New Union leaders—for instance, Keir Hardie, Mann, and Tillett—have very little belief in parliamentary action; a little more experience of the parliamentary fraud will shatter the faith of those who still believe.

There is a warm time coming for the capitalist. Even the dear little Star, which had such a touching faith in Fabianism and New Unionism, because it imagined that they might be utilised to return Gladstone, Morley, Stuart, and Co., to the top of the poll at the next election, talks about the "over-bearing attitude of the eight-hour men," and sneers at Cunninghame Graham because he objected to the presence of lying press reporter at a meeting at which he was speaking. Whigs, Tories, and Radicals have all been dished, and they are a little wroth in consequence. Probably Professor Stuart thinks he made a mistake in getting rid of T. P. O'Connor. Tories and Radicals can now go in company, and shed bitter tears over the graves of Broadhurst and Shipton—they have lost their best friends for ever. The most fossilised of the old trade-unionists are going; the ideas of the New Trade-unionism are triumphant, alike on the Parliamentary Committee and in the Congress. What will they do—go forward with the popular stream, or try to struggle against it? If they dream of doing the latter, the putrescent corpse of the old trade-unionism, stranded in the mud of the river bank, should be a sufficient warning. To dare, again to dare, and without end to dare, is the only safe motto for those who are in the front of a revolutionary movement.

Great Dock Strike at Southampton.

On Tuesday, just after the Trade Congress, news arrived that a serious strike had broken out among the dockers at Southampton. The company have been engaging blacklegs, who they sweetly call "permanent men," at one guinea per week of ten hours a-day—i.e., 33d. an hour. Immense crowds collected round the docks, and a party of sixty blacklegs were sent home by the people. A train of cattle-trucks, which the people thought might contain blacklegs, was stopped by the strikers collecting on the line, chucking the engine-driver off the engine, and thus making a temporary seizure of this part of the company's plant. The engine was afterwards drawn back and not allowed to pass, one man telling the people to smash the cattle-trucks to pieces before they allowed them to go into the docks. In the end, the company found it impossible to get blacklegs into the docks in the face of the opposition of the men, upon whom the lesson of Leeds has not been lost, and agreed to a twenty-four hours' truce.

On Tuesday night the military were called in by the mayor, and there was desperate fighting, the troops charging the people with the bayonet. The crowd then marched round and smashed the mayor's windows. No blacklegs have yet arrived. The people of Southampton are showing a splendid spirit, and we hope they will continue their courageous fight against blacklegs and sweaters.

CORRESPONDENCE.

BOARDS OF CONCILIATION.

In the Chronicle of August 28th, I find a letter from Mr. Ben Tillett advocating and sketching an ideal Board of Conciliation. Mr. Ben Tillett is, of course, quite at liberty to occupy his time with this sort of thing, but when he is spoken of as a revolutionary character I find it impossible to reconcile the two ideas.

The Commonweal of August 23rd says that Mr. Ben Tillett, "curiously enough, made the best speech from a revolutionary point of view."¹ (A remark, by the way, which has roused the ire of the gentleman who did make the best speech). "Curiously enough," indeed, when read by the light of his letter to the Chronicle. I cannot say that I found anything specially socialistic or revolutionary in the speech. It is the sort of speech the popular orator feels bound to make to the working-man nowadays.

I should like to digress here a moment to protest against the ill-advised remark in last week's Commonweal about a speech of Mr. Tom Mann, that "a Revolutionary Socialist could not have made a better speech." The only difference I can see between the two speeches is that Mr. Tom Mann has learnt his lesson better. There is nothing in it to lead us to suppose that he would not devise a Board of Conciliation if he had the inventive genius of Mr. Ben Tillett.

To return to the letter. It is too long, too involved and straggling for quotation. Here, however, are a couple of sentences that could never have been written by a Socialist. It appears there is an economic necessity for a Board of Conciliation:

"Seeing the economic necessity for such a board on account of our social environment assuming more complex forms every day, it behoves all concerned to strive for a permanent good understanding."

And—

"Trade unionists are only too anxious to see capital organised, provided the means and powers to organise are also recognised for labour. The more perfect the organisation of either, the less will there be of strikes or even disputes."

We know that such a Board is quite opposed to the principles of Socialism. To refer disputes to it is an admission on the part of the workers that the capitalist has rights to defend. It permits the capitalist to make a slight concession (which he has been forced to make) with a good grace, and to pose as a benefactor of the working-classes. The hypocrisy of such an institution is worthy of the canting spirit of our time. We say capital has no rights. The capitalist has no right to force the worker to sell his labour power to him for a mere existence. The capitalist has yet to justify the possession of wealth, which is not the result of his own labour, but the result of the labour of generations of workers.

It cannot be too strongly expressed that trades unionism, even with its new leaders, is not Socialism. It is too limited, too exclusive, too conservative in spirit. Trade unionism, if it would be Socialistic, must be all-embracing; it must be militant and aggressive; its aim must be the expropriation of landlords and capitalists, and its battle-cry, "No Compromise!"

I would a thousand times rather see a strike to protest against the discharge of comrades, or some other act of tyranny, than for a rise in wages. The first strengthens the bond of sympathy between the workers; the other is a doubtful good if it tempts the worker to lay down his arms and lapse into a state of indifference, from which it will take a tremendous effort to rouse him.

Let us rather preach and work for the Great Strike, which will be for nothing less than Freedom. Freedom for the proletariat. Freedom for all to use the means for producing the necessities and pleasures of life. Freedom from the thraldom of wage-slavery. Freedom for each to develop his latent talents to the utmost, and to find his highest pleasure in devoting them to the common good. "But!" the timorous trade unionist will exclaim, "this is a Revolution,—the General Overturn!" Yes, my dear friend, exactly!

WHY NOT A UNITED MEETING ON THE CHICAGO MARTYRS?

COMRADES,—I notice with some surprise and regret the fact that Freedom and the groups that journal speaks in the name of are organising a meeting for the purpose of announcing and speaking on the anniversary of those noble men who died or are imprisoned for Labour's Cause. More power to these Freedom groups for their initiative, but why should they stand alone? It is time some international comradeship was shown in these matters. Why could not the whole, or, at any rate, the majority of the schools of thought in London who are in any way revolutionary, unite on these questions? There are two events in the year that all Revolutionists delight to honour—the Paris Commune of 1871, and the noble deaths of those Chicago Martyrs on November 11, 1887. If not unity this year, let us see what can be done next—i.e., either a series of meetings throughout the country on the same day, or, a large one in each town. If the Social Revolution has not overtaken us, may unity prevail next year.—Fraternal greetings,

AN ANARCHIST.

"REVOLUTIONARY GOVERNMENT."

Although looking upon comrade Kropotkin's article as a splendid piece of criticism of all forms of possible revolutionary government, still I feel there is one difficulty he has not met, one question he has not answered. Supposing that the Labour Party, the Social Democrats, and the Revolutionary Socialists have all made a mess of the business, and a popular revolution declares for Anarchy: what will the Anarchists do? I ask this question, for it is one that is continually asked by thinking men, and it would be well to supply some answer. It is no good saying that you will not be pushed to the front, and you will only have to spread your ideas among the people; you cannot be sure of this. Who would have thought in 1789, when Bailly, "a most respectable man," surrounded by other "respectable men," was mayor of Paris, that in three years' time the Hotel de Ville would be occupied by men between whose opinions and Bailly's there was far more difference than between the opinions of Burns and Kropotkine? It is therefore no use to reply by saying you might not be placed in that position.

¹ The writer of the note did not say Ben Tillett was a revolutionary character but that he had made what was a "revolutionary speech." Very moderate people indeed sometimes do this. Even Morley and Gladstone have given vent to some very revolutionary utterances at various times; but this does not make them revolutionists. We have never given the character to either Ben Tillett or even Tom Mann. We only recorded how the tendencies of the time affect even them. Whether they are sincere or not is only known to themselves, and we fully agree with our friend that the leaders of the New Unionism are not models of consistency.—EDS.

Let us suppose that an Anarchist revolution has just come off in this huge city of five millions. As in all revolutions, provisions run short. Who is to direct the men, for instance, who must be sent into the country, and into other countries also, to get supplies of food? Who is to direct the distribution and exchange of commodities? Do modern Anarchists agree with Bakounine? According to Emile Laveleye in 'Socialism of To-Day,' Bakounine, in a pamphlet entitled 'Letters to a Frenchman,' 1870, thus laid down the Anarchist programme after the revolution:

"The insurgent capital forms itself into a commune. The federation of the barricades is maintained in permanence. The communal council is composed of delegates, one for each barricade or ward: deputies who are responsible, and always revocable. The council chooses separate executive committees for each department of the revolutionary administration of the commune. The capital declares that, all central government being abolished, it renounces the government of the provinces. It will invite other communes, both urban and rural, to organise themselves, and to send to a place to be named delegates with imperative and revocable mandates, in order to establish the federation of the autonomous commune and to organise the revolutionary force necessary to the triumph over the reaction. This organisation is limited to the insurgent country. Other provinces or countries may join in it. The communes which pronounce for the reaction shall be excluded from it."

With this I and other members of the League agree. I believe also that it is practical enough to commend itself to the ordinary English workman. Does it represent the ideas of the modern Anarchist?

There is another question I should like to ask: Was not the Commune of Paris of 1793 a revolutionary government with which little fault could be found? If it also failed in its work, why did not Kropotkine select it also for his criticism? Surely he should have touched upon that famous body, which was surely more revolutionary in spirit than even the Commune of 1871.

REPORTS.

NORTH LONDON.—On Saturday at Ossulston Street, our meeting was addressed by Kitz, Mrs. Blundell, Blundell, Miss Lupton, and Cantwell; 27 Commonweal sold. In Regent's Park a most successful meeting held; Cantwell and Nicoll spoke; our old opponent Whelan filled up an interval with some opposition, which amused the audience very much by its imbecility; collection 4s. 9½d., and 60 Weals sold. In Hyde Park, Coulon, Miss Lupton, Mrs. Lahr, and Cantwell spoke, and in conclusion comrade Smith sang a couple of songs, and we disposed of all the song-books we had; collection 1s. 9½d. We held a meeting at Liverpool Street, King's Cross, in the evening, where a virtuous Christian woman inquired what was Nicoll's salary, and when asked what was her salary she offered to give me a "wipe across the jaw," and then went to take her position in the congregation of the Rev. Zephaniah Woffendale. We have disposed of 7 quires of Weals, and 5s. worth of other literature; we have the red flag at our meetings now, and find it a great attraction.—T. C.

MANCHESTER.—On Sunday, September 4, Samuels (of Leeds) paid us a visit, and spoke at three meetings during the day—morning St. Phillips Park gates, afternoon Stevenson Square, and at night at Higher Chatham Street. Barton and Stockton also spoke, and other comrades assisted. Commonweal sold well, and we made a collection at each meeting, which resulted in 8s. 7½d. for the day. These visits of fresh comrades do a deal of good, and we gladly welcome all our surrounding friends.

NORWICH.—Good Meetings Sunday afternoon and evening; about 2½ quires of Commonweal sold; about 4s. collected; addressed afternoon for two hours by Leggatt, evening by Leggatt, Poynts, and Emery. Collection made for Leggatt, who is out of work, amounting to 7s.

Agent for Commonweal—

Streatham—Mr. Bush, newsagent.

BRIGHTON.—W. B. Parker will speak on the Level Sunday Sept. 14, at 3.30.

COSMOPOLITAN RESEARCH ASSOCIATION, Wharfdale Temperance Bar, 46 Wharfdale Road, Kings Cross.—Wednesday September 17, at 8.30, Houchin, a lecture.

A Tonic Sol Fa Class meets every Thursday evening at 8 o'clock at Kelmescott House, Hammersmith; comrade J. Munday conductor. All members of the League are cordially invited to attend and assist.

"COMMONWEAL" BRANCH S.L.—A Course of Lectures and Concert and Ball (under the management of the above Branch) for the benefit of the Commonweal is in active preparation. The full particulars of same will shortly be announced. There will be some initial expenses in connection therewith, and Branch comrades and friends are asked to help in this direction. All donations will be gladly acknowledged in Commonweal by WM. BLUNDELL, Branch Secretary, 24 Great Queen Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE

SATIRES OF CYNICUS.

"SINE IRA ET STUDIO."

CYNICUS asks no favour, is no partisan, independent and unbiassed he looks with impartial eye on the follies and corruptions of his time. Unknown and unaided, but with firm purpose, he launches his satires on a world of dissimulation and deceit, where alas—

Virtue's at a discount,
Truth is under par,
Honesty's a scarcity
Wealth is better far.

Knavery's commendable,
Cheating is no sin;
He is the true philanthropist
Who takes the stranger in.

But where, perchance, some honest kindly heart,
While smiling at his fancies, still may say—
"He acts no snarling, mean, or churlish part
Who fain would laugh the follies of the world away."

To SUCH HE DEDICATES HIS BOOK.

To Socialists who wish to see the hypocrisy of modern society pictorially lampooned, we recommend Cynicus.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

THE GREAT STRIKE AT SOUTHAMPTON.

ONE lesson at least we have learnt from the Southampton Strike is that the workers have, if they choose to exercise it, the power of inspiring a wholesome terror in the craven hearts of their masters. To understand this clearly, let us hastily run over the most remarkable events of the strike. The strike breaks out; the people surround the docks and literally besiege them; trains are stopped to see if they contain blacklegs; no one is allowed to go out or in without giving a proper account of himself; blacklegs are conspicuous by their absence; the whole town is in the hands of the people. What do the middle-class authorities do? The Mayor, a most worthy man, resembling greatly the Mayor of the famous Town of Hamelin, or shall we say Mr. Justice Nupkins, is in a mighty flurry; he knows better, however, than to let loose his police upon the crowd with their bludgeons. He has an idea, a strangely sensible one for an amiable imbecile—that the police might possibly get hurt more than the crowd. So he telegraphs for troops; troops are sent; and by way of getting the crowd in a good humour, the Mayor, on the advice of the officer in command of the troops, orders the firemen to play upon it with a fire-engine; the people retaliate by throwing stones, of which several hit the soldiers; a lieutenant gets his nose broken with a stone; the troops, irritated in their turn, are ordered to charge upon the people with the bayonet; several men are seriously injured; in revenge, some of the crowd march round to the Mayor's place of business and smash his windows; more power to their elbows.

Well, this awful act of revolt throws the local swells into the most abject terror. The next day there are the most fearful rumours about; the mayor's house is to be sacked and pillaged; the London dockers are marching on Southampton, as the Paris women marched on Versailles. The mayor's house is guarded by troops; a few hundred more soldiers are ordered into the town; and two gunboats are sent for—possibly with a view of affording a chance of escaping by water to the mayor, should the insurrection prove too strong and the commune be proclaimed. So great is the general terror among the respectable classes that many of them take to their heels and run for their lives at sight of a dockers' procession. For these and other interesting facts see the reports of the Daily News correspondent. The terror is not confined to Southampton; it unfavourably affects the prices on the London Stock Exchange, and it has an even worse effect on the Paris Bourse. Please admire the easy way in which the capitalists are frightened out of their lives.

Supposing that the people had routed the police and soldiers—such things have happened—and instead of breaking the mayor's windows had burnt his house and hung him on a lamppost—our forefathers would have done that with less provocation; suppose an Anarchist revolt had really taken place and the dockers had taken possession of the docks and the factories, while the shipping and railways had been seized by the rest of the people, who at the same time had made a free distribution of tea, meat, bread, clothes, and groceries among the poor of the town; suppose even the insurrection had been crushed,—how much more should we have heard of "smashing unions" from the gentlemen of the middle classes? I believe they would even prefer the "tyranny" of the unions to a miniature social revolution, which certainly would not stop at Southampton, but spread like a prairie fire through the length and breadth of the country.

But though the men showed they had the courage to face bayonets and cannon, yet, as our comrade Kitz has clearly shown, the leaders by their cowardly action, first by recommending the men to "obey the law," and next by the shameful action of the Executive in abandoning these brave dockers, did their utmost to crush down the spirit of revolt and play the game of the masters. It is true the leaders of the Dockers' Union may imagine they have not done this, but we should like to ask them if they do not think their surrender at Southampton will encourage Norwood and Co. to attack their new unions everywhere before many months are over?

In the Labour War that will follow, the masters will not only have the assistance of police and soldiers, but will doubtless take the advice of the Tories and St. James's Gazette, and hire a gang of Pinkerton assassins to murder men, women, and children. The capitalists are showing by their tactics that they mean to crush the Labour movement, even if they spill human blood like water to do it. The men must be prepared for a desperate fight; and if every man in the ranks of the dockers who is used to bearing arms had a good revolver in his possession, the hiring of Pinkertons by the capitalist classes would be a difficult job, and even bloodthirsty military officers who "don't hesitate to shoot," would perhaps be not quite so eager for massacre as they were at Southampton. J. D. NICOLL.

AT SOUTHAMPTON.

Southampton presented a lively appearance upon my arrival. The Docks Railway Station was surrounded with police and soldiers. They were, however, exceedingly civil to passengers by train, and sir'd me as I needed their service to get through the cordons. Had they known my mission, doubtless their tone would have been different; but it was very nice of them however.

Oh that every town in England had a mayor like his worship of Southampton! the Revolution that we dream of and libate to would be hastened by leaps and bounds. Soldiers at every street corner, bayonet charges upon the slightest pretext and on no pretext at all—that is the way to familiarise the people with Law-'n'-order in its worst aspect. The officer in command of the Yorkshire Regiment, who did the dirty work of the frightened bourgeois of Southampton, is evidently a student of Colonel Knollys' advice as to the treatment of crowds, for he ordered the town fire-brigade to play upon the strikers. Everything, in short, was done to exasperate the people in order to afford a pretext for slaughtering them. One drunken officer stationed at the corner of a street in charge of a file of soldiers deliberately lurched amongst the civilians, hoping, no doubt, that they would retaliate and give this carpet soldier the chance of fulfilling his expressed wish to fire on what he elegantly termed the —.

I watched the crowd narrowly at all points, and must say that there was a certain stolid good humour about it, which under repeated provocation was rapidly becoming grim; and had our friends the enemy continued their exasperating tactics a little longer they might have found that, if water is a valuable element, fire is also of use in equalising odds; and certainly the strikers would not have lacked precept and example in its use.

The leaders, so precipitate to order the strike, speedily lost control over it. They showed a lamentable want of grasp of the issues involved. The companies, and in fact the capitalists generally, together with the reptile press of London, notably the Times, made no such mistake: the prompt and unsparing use of the military and naval forces, the significant use of Knollys' tactics against the strikers, and their fixed determination to ignore the union, shows that they, at least, were determined to make it a test fight in the labour war. The apologetic and pusillanimous tone of the leaders (sic!) encouraged them. It was my painful duty to have to listen to T. McCarthy. His speech was made up of "ifs" and "buts," and pitiful supplications to preserve order. If the strikers were without weapons, they certainly had canons enough (excuse the pun). As McCarthy stood up, he had canons to the left and to the right of him, for unctuous clerics in the persons of Rev. Messrs. Scannell, Wilberforce, and Leach beamed peace upon the crowd. When later on the final fiasco and defeat took place, the last-named cleric appealed to the infuriated and betrayed strikers to accept their fate as the will of God. So that God, it appears, is a friend of the dock companies and views strikes with disfavour (please note, my unionist friends who are so fond of hobnobbing with sky-pilots).

On Tuesday, the men could have secured possession of the dock if properly led, for two of the dock-gates are, although high, merely planks battened together. But the leaders took the courage out of the men, and after a struggle that had lasted barely four days, McCarthy made the hideous blunder and practical confession of defeat by leaving an open-air meeting in company with a cleric as a deputation to the Dock Company "to see," as he feebly put it, "what they would do," and they having seen his hand would do nothing—not even allow him in.

During his absence on this bootless errand, I took occasion to address the men on Socialism. I got an immense reception, for a great number of the men had been unable to hear McCarthy's weak voice. But he returned whilst I was speaking with the doleful message of his failure, and fearing, I suppose, that I should alienate his followers, he mounted a seat and denounced me. I had desisted from speaking upon his return. I owe it to the impression I created that I was not subjected to personal violence through his action. Mr. McCarthy has mistaken his vocation; he would no doubt be able to marshal a small Sunday-school treat, and come out of the ordeal with flying colours; but as a Labour leader he is a woeful failure.

Tom Walsh made a better show; he denounced the tactical blunder that McCarthy made in going unsolicited to the Company, and showed his contempt for the parasitical reporters by telling them he liked them at a distance.

The Sailor's Union had come out on sympathy with the dockers, and for the recognition of their union. The subsequent collapse brought about by the action of McCarthy and Co., has placed the sailors in a difficult position. They are determined to have their union recognised, and as they are strong enough to boycott the port they are to be reckoned with.

There is a class of boy labourers here known as the scurfer boys; they are a hardy and courageous set. They were prominent in all the scimmages that took place, and they furnished nearly all the fun. They burnt handlights in the streets to fool the police and military, and were to the front when hard knocks were distributed. The union leaders, having got into a moral mood, denounced these frisky lads, although they too were out with the men strikers, and even went so far as to urge on the men to put the boys down with a strong hand. I confess that my admiration for these lads rose in proportion as they incurred the displeasure of the parson-loving leaders.

To summarise. Some £6,000 have been lost to the men in wages; several men are in prison; a great number have been stabbed or bludgeoned, and the point fought for has been lost. Of course, Labour will eventually have also to bear the cost of the movements of troops, police, etc., and the broken windows of the Mayor. I heard the epithets of "loafers" and "tramps" applied to those outside the New Unionism by the suddenly made Aristocrats of Labour. It is a fatal mistake. The propertied classes are preparing for a mighty struggle, in which the Southampton scenes are but an episode. The marching and countermarching, the proclamations in the name of our Sovereign Lady the Queen to keep the peace, etc., are but the pattering rain-spots before the storm. It is not the time to use harsh words in regard to paupers and tramps, who, after all, are what Society makes them; and least of all should the men in command of the forces of Labour join in the abuse of the residuum. If on no higher ground than policy, it is a tactical mistake to turn the unorganised mass into a reactionary force at the possible disposal of the enemy.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. XXVIII.—THE JOURNEY'S END.

ON we went. In spite of my new-born excitement about Ellen, and my gathering fear of where it would land me, I could not help taking abundant interest in the condition of the river and its banks; all the more as she never seemed weary of the changing picture, but looked at every yard of flowery bank and gurgling eddy with the same kind of affectionate interest which I myself once had so fully, as I used to think, and perhaps had not altogether lost even in this strangely changed society with all its wonders. Ellen seemed delighted with my pleasure at this, that, or the other piece of carefulness in dealing with the river: the nursing of pretty corners; the ingenuity in dealing with difficulties of water-engineering, so that the most obviously useful works looked beautiful and natural also. All this, I say, pleased me hugely, and she was pleased at my pleasure—but rather puzzled too.

"You seem astonished," she said, just after we had passed a mill¹ which spanned all the stream save the water-way for traffic, but which was as beautiful in its way as a Gothic cathedral—"you seem astonished at this being so pleasant to look at."

"Yes," I said, "in a way I am; though I don't see why it shouldn't be."

"Ah!" she said, looking at me admiringly, yet with a lurking smile in her face, "you know all about the history of the past. Were they not always careful about this little stream which now adds so much pleasantness to the country-side? It would always be easy to manage this little river. Ah! I forgot, though," she said, as her eye caught mine, "in the days we are thinking of pleasure was wholly neglected in such matters. But how did they manage the river in the days that you—" Lived in, she was going to say; but correcting herself, said—"in the days of which you have record?"

"They *mis*managed it," quoth I. Up to the first half of the nineteenth century, when it was still more or less of a highway for the country people, some care was taken of the river and its banks; and though I don't suppose anyone troubled himself about its aspect, yet it was trim and beautiful. But when the railways—of which no doubt you have heard—came into power, they would not allow the people of the country to use either the natural or artificial waterways, of which latter there were a great many. I suppose when we get higher up we shall see one of these; a very important one, which one of these railways entirely closed to the public, so that they might force people to send their goods by their private road, and so tax them as heavily as they could."

Ellen laughed heartily. "Well," she said, "that is not stated clearly enough in our history-books, and it is worth knowing. But certainly the people of those days must have been a curiously lazy set. We are not either fidgety or quarrelsome now, but if anyone tried such a piece of folly on us, we should use the said waterways, whoever gainsaid us: surely that would be simple enough. However, I remember other cases of this stupidity: when I was on the Rhine two years ago, I remember they showed us ruins of old castles, which, according to what we heard, must have been made for pretty much the same purpose as the railways were. But I am interrupting your history of the river: pray go on."

"It is both short and stupid enough," said I. "The river having lost its practical or commercial value—that is, being of no use to make money of—"

She nodded. "I understand what that queer phrase means," said she. "Go on!"

"Well, it was utterly neglected, till at last it became a nuisance—"

"Yes," quoth Ellen, "I understand: like the railways and the robber knights. Yes?"

"So then they turned the makeshift business on to it, and handed it over to a body up in London, who from time to time, in order to show that they had something to do, did some damage here and there,—cut down trees, destroying the banks thereby; dredged the river (where it was not needed always), and threw the dredgings on the fields so as to spoil them; and so forth. But for the most part they practised 'masterly inactivity,' as it was then called—that is, they drew their salaries, and let things alone."

"Drew their salaries," she said. "I know that means that they were allowed to take an extra lot of other people's goods for doing nothing. And if that had been all, it really might have been worth while to let them do so, if you couldn't find any other way of keeping them quiet; but it seems to me that being so paid, they could not help doing something, and that something was bound to be mischief,—because," said she, kindling with sudden anger, "the whole business was founded on lies and false pretensions. I don't mean only these river-guardians, but all these master-people I have read of."

"Yes," said I, "how happy you are to have got out of the parsimony of oppression!"

"Why do you sigh?" she said, kindly and somewhat anxiously. "You seem to think that it will not last?"

"It will last for you," quoth I.

"But why not for you?" said she. "Surely it is for all the world; and if your country is somewhat backward, it will come into line before long. Or," she said, quickly, "are you thinking that you must soon go back again? I was going to propose that you should live with us where we are going. I feel quite old friends with you, and should be sorry to lose you." Then she smiled on me, and said: "Do you know, I begin to suspect you of wanting to nurse a sham sorrow, like the ridiculous characters in some of those queer old novels that I have come across now and then."

I really had almost begun to suspect it myself, but I refused to admit so much; so I sighed no more, but fell to giving my delightful companion what little pieces of history I knew about the river and its border-lands; and the time passed pleasantly enough; and between the two of us (she was a better sculler than I was, and seemed quite tireless) we kept up fairly well with Dick, hot as the afternoon was, and swallowed up the way at a great rate. At last we passed under another ancient bridge; and through meadows bordered at first with huge elm-trees mingled with sweet chestnut of younger but very elegant growth; and the meadows widened out so much that it seemed felt that the trees must now be on the bents only or about the houses, except for the growth of the willows on the immediate banks, so that the wide stretch of grass was little broken here. Dick got very much excited now, and often stood up in the boat to cry out to us that this was such and such a field, and so forth; and we caught fire at his enthusiasm for the hayfield and its harvest, and pulled our best.

At last, as we were passing through a reach of the river where on the side of the towing-path was a highish bank with a thick whispering bed of reeds before it, and on the other side a higher bank, clothed with willows that dipped into the stream and crowned by ancient elm-trees, we saw bright figures coming along close to the bank, as if they were looking for something; as, indeed, they were, and we—that is, Dick and his company—were what they were looking for. Dick lay on his oars, and we followed his example. He gave a joyous shout to the people on the bank, which was echoed back from it in many voices, deep and sweetly shrill; for there were above a dozen persons, both men, women, and children. A tall handsome woman, with black wavy hair and deep-set grey eyes, came forward on the bank and waved her hand gracefully to us, and said:

¹ I should have said that all along the Thames there were abundance of mills used for various purposes; none of which were in any degree unsightly, and many strikingly beautiful; and the gardens about them marvels of loveliness.

“Dick, my friend, we have almost had to wait for you! What excuse have you to make for your slavish punctuality? Why didn’t you take us by surprise, and come yesterday?”

“O,” said Dick, with an almost imperceptible jerk of his head toward our boat, “we didn’t want to come too quick up the water; there is so much to see for those who have not been up here before.”

“True, true,” said the stately lady, for stately is the word that must be used for her; “and we want them to get to know the wet way from the east thoroughly well, since they must often use it now. But come ashore at once, Dick, and you, dear neighbours; there is a break in the reeds and a good landing-place just round the corner. We can carry up your things, or send some of the lads after them.”

“No, no,” said Dick; “easier going by water, though it is but a step. Besides, I want to bring my friend here to the proper place. We will go on to the Ford; and you can talk to us from the bank as we paddle along.”

He pulled his sculls through the water, and on we went, turning a sharp angle and going north a little. Presently we saw before us a bank of elm-trees, which told us of a house amidst them, though I looked in vain for the grey walls that I expected to see there. As we went, the folk on the bank talked indeed, mingling their kind voices with the cuckoo’s song, the sweet strong whistle of the blackbirds, and the ceaseless note of the corn-crake as he crept through the long grass of the mowing-field; whence came waves of fragrance from the flowering clover amidst the ripe grass.

In a few minutes we had passed through a deep eddying pool into the sharp stream that ran from the ford, and beached our craft on a tiny strand of limestone-gravel, and stepped ashore into the arms of our up-river friends, our journey done.

I disentangled myself from the merry throng, and mounting on the cart road that ran along the river some feet above the water, I looked round about me. The river came down through a wide meadow on my left, which was grey now with the ripened seeding grasses; the gleaming water was lost presently by a turn of the bank, but over the meadow I could see the mingled gables of a building where I knew the lock must be, and which now seemed to combine a mill with it. A low wooded ridge bounded the river-plain to the south and south-east, whence we had come, and a few low houses lay about its feet and up its slope. I turned a little to my right, and through the hawthorn sprays and long shoots of the wild roses could see the flat country spreading out far away under the sun of the calm afternoon, till something that might be called hills with a look of sheep-pastures about them bounded it with a soft blue line. Before me, the elm-boughs still hid most of what houses there might be in this riverside dwelling of men; but to the right of the cart-road a few grey buildings of the simplest kind showed here and there.

There I stood in a dreamy mood, and rubbed my eyes as if I were not wholly awake, and half expected to see the gay-clad throng of beautiful men and women change to two or three spindly-legged back-bowed men and haggard, hollow-eyed, ill-favoured women, who once wore down the soil of this land with their heavy hopeless feet, from day to day and season to season and year to year. But no change came as yet, and my heart swelled with joy as I thought of all the beautiful grey villages, from the river to the plain and the plain to the uplands, which I could picture to myself so well, all peopled now with this happy and lovely folk, who had cast away riches and attained to wealth.

More “Fire and Slaughter.”

The following paragraphs, clipped from the Star in one day (Tuesday, September 9), will perhaps persuade some of our “union-smashers” that there is something in the epidemic of incendiaryism of which I spoke a week or two ago:

“Francis William Hulley, 21, a farm-labourer, was yesterday apprehended at Draylsden on the charge of setting fire to four stacks of hay, and attempting to murder Amelia Bonsall, a farmer’s daughter at Macclesfield.”

“Another outbreak of fire, the second within a week, took place last evening at Beckingham Hall, near Maldon. Two large barns with their contents and four cattle-sheds were destroyed.”

“When a charwoman named Grant was lighting a fire in a house at Deal to-day an explosion occurred, seriously injuring her face and arm and burning her hair. A tin containing 1½lb of gunpowder, used for clearing the furnace flue, had been placed in the stove and covered with loose paper.”

There is a dangerous spirit abroad, and our Norwoods, Raikes, Liveseys had better pause in their exploits. These deeds prove that there are plenty of people about whom a little more tyranny would soon goad into “outrage.”

TRADE UNIONIST TACTICS.

HAVING spent a week as a listener to the proceedings of the Liverpool Trades’ Congress, I may perhaps report briefly thereon. Leaving to others any comment on the reactionary and pettifogging nature of much of the business done, I desire to make clear to readers of the Commonweal a few of the playful ways of the aristocracy of labour. First, their slavish adherence to red-tape was worthy of a vestry. A Standing Orders Committee is elected before which all resolutions must pass, and when any resolution distasteful to the “old gang” was proposed, they managed to have it referred to the committee to take its chance in the ballot. Thus a resolution that the delegates of the insurance agents should be admitted was adroitly delayed by this dodge until the last day of the Congress, when, of course, its effect was nil. On every possible pretext men with the mark of the vestry on their brow rose to “points of order,” and many resolutions were thus shelved. Then the rampant intolerance of the Congress merits notice. No representative of a minority had any chance of being heard, and this applies not only to the Socialists present, but to any representative of an unpopular cause. When a Socialist dared to rise there was an immediate howl, and many resolutions which some of them desired to oppose were summarily passed without a word of opposition being audible. For snobbery no gathering of grocers could have beaten this democratic assembly. While Macdonald (London) was shouted down, as described already in the Commonweal, the Congress actually cheered Fenwick, M.P., when he complained that Macdonald had not explained his resolution! On the other hand, Burns (who is influential and determined) was allowed in quiet to second the very resolution which Macdonald had not been allowed to propose. Money is as much a god here as on the Stock Exchange, and it was sickening to hear these curs laugh derisively when it was stated that John Williams represented the firewood-cutters—much too plebeian a body for these sucking capitalists. The voting papers for the election of the committee bore opposite to each name the amount which its owner’s society had subscribed to the funds—as though this was any evidence of a man’s fitness for office. When the Lairds of Birkenhead were accused of being “sweaters,” delegates positively fought for an opportunity of whitewashing that firm, while the so-called labour members were cheered to the echo over their miserable defence to the charge of being political hacks. In fact, while the delegates found Burns, Tillet, and Mann too strong to be entirely “burked,” they took it out of Quelch, Williams, and the rest of the Socialists to make things straight. “Verily there is no god but Gladstone, and Broadhurst is his prophet!”

‘POLITICAL ECONOMY OF SOCIALISM.’ By John Carruthers. 1d. Hammersmith Branch S.L., Kelmscott House, Hammersmith.

Comrade Carruthers has written a tract upon what used to be once called the Dismal Science, which, strange to say, is not dismal at all, but is both bright and interesting. We know how the name of “political economy” frightens a good many people, and we do not wonder at it; but even the ordinary reader can get through comrade Carruthers’ little pamphlet, and after all some knowledge of political economy—it need not be much—is necessary to every Socialist. With regard to the pamphlet, we think Carruthers’ use of the words “purchase and sale” is unfortunate. “Purchase and sale,” in the ordinary public mind, is associated with profit-making, and I am sure the author does not want the British shopkeeper to understand that he is going to make a profit under Socialism. We admit that possibly in the transition period a paper currency may be needed, but it will simply be used as a measure of value, so that each community could exchange its products for others of equal value. We think with Carruthers that perfect morality and honesty will not be attained directly after the Revolution, but that it may take some considerable time to free ourselves from the vices engendered by the present system. We recommend all friends interested in that great question of what the future society will be like to read Carruthers’ pamphlet. Although they may not agree with all his conclusions, yet it will give them some idea of how a Socialist society might manage the production, distribution, and exchange of commodities.

‘OUR SOCIAL SYSTEM; and How it Affects those who Work for their Living.’ By David Andrade. Published by David Andrade, Sydney Road, North Brunswick, Melbourne.

A most damaging criticism of our present society from the Individualist-Anarchist standpoint. The following figures, showing how the Australian worker is robbed by his rulers the capitalist and landlord, are worth quoting:

HOW THE AUSTRALIAN LABOURERS SPEND THEIR ANNUAL EARNINGS.
Taxes	£15,000,000
Rent, at 10 per cent. on estates value (£190,000,000)	19,000,000
Interest, over 12 per cent.	10,000,000
Profits, at 75 per cent. on merchantable commodities	67,000,000
Remuneration to labour	22,000,000
	£133,000,000

The moral of the pamphlet to the English worker is, “Don’t go to Australia,” for you will find that the labourer is no better off than he is in England. Nothing but the destruction of capitalistic monopoly can ever free the workers of the world from over-work, robbery, and starvation.

Our Spanish contemporary La Anarquía has an enlarged cartoon upon the lines of the one published by the S.L., entitled “When will he get there?” In the Spanish copy the characters are attired in native costume, and a priest is added to those opposing the progress of the Labourer towards the fruits of his toil. The picture has an effective appearance.

This is the state of the agricultural districts as they now are, and appear likely to remain. It has another side—the supply of workers to the towns. The young people cannot stay in the villages if they would. Even if they wished to remain sleeping in the small room with their father and mother, the introduction of reaping machines, hoeing machines, and the rest, which are considered to be a necessity of extensive agriculture, compels them to seek a livelihood in a centre of greater activity, where human life is worn out much more quickly. There is no present prospect of the establishment of workshops at such villages as Newnham and Bygrave. Neither is there any advance being made towards a higher state of cultivation. The tendency is rather to put land to permanent pasture, although it is capable of growing a higher class of plant than has hitherto been cultivated. The system under which land is held restricts the spread of knowledge into the ranks of those who could and would use it. Our agricultural worker does not know the extent to which margarine is eaten. He is quite able and ready to cultivate carrots, cabbage, and a variety of plants, which would assist in feeding cattle and in producing good butter, and would at the same time free the land from weeds far more effectually than the four-course rotation of rough crops, which the "landlord" insists shall be grown, to the exclusion of plants which he, poor thing, thinks might exhaust "his" land. In many instances the farmer gets free from vexatious stipulations as to cropping, but he remains attached more or less to the old rotation of simple crops which require the least attention, and which can be gathered and thrashed by machinery.

When we talk of municipalising the land, and playing hey-day with landlords, agents, bailiffs, and all their paraphernalia, we ought not to forget that it will be a work of some years of patient study and hard manual exertion to bring the soil up to such a pitch of cultivation and fertility, that it could bear what is wanted. The "organisation" of the home food supply is in a very deranged state. The "classes" certainly have their cattle shows and various displays, but they are of no practical use. It is the village workman who needs to be permitted to use his wits upon something more than the eighth of an acre of "allotment," grudgingly given at an exorbitant rent which he is too poor to pay.

The declared value of food imported into this much disunited country is a hundred millions annually, while millions of acres are abandoned to grass which does not grow, and millions of other acres are cultivated in a way that shows the extent to which the "system" has broken down.

Agriculture is the industry first organised by a new colony; its decay is the sure sign of the decay of civilisation.

The difficulty in the agricultural labourer's way is his apparent incapacity to understand that anything can come to him otherwise than through his master, and then in the shape of wages. His whole world is his little parish, sometimes his master's farm. He would be unhappy if away from the farm more than a day; it would tire him more to walk about London four hours than to hoe turnips for ten hours. He is capable of feeling that one and eightpence a-day is a miserable wage for him to receive, but he is also puzzled to know how any more is to be given him "while prices are so low," as the farmers tell him. These gentry will sometimes condescend to jabber a sort of "account" of the working of a given piece of corn, telling the details of expense and of produce, always producing a loss of a shilling or a pound per acre per annum. The workman does not get beyond this mode of assessment, and so remains mystified. I have seen groups of them mystified, dazed, silent, in the streets at Biggleswade, Stotford, and Ashwell in winter, when there is no particular field work that must be done. How they get through a long winter is the greatest wonder of all. The "casuals" often do not get more than three days work a week, and then at 1s. 8d. a-day.

The winter that tries them most is that which follows a hot summer, and for two reasons. A hot summer means an early harvest with short straw. The smaller bulk of straw is got through the thrasher much more quickly than bulky straw, such as grows in a dull summer; consequently work runs short soon after the Christmas which follows a hot summer. But the farmer, landlord, and parson do not trouble about short and long straw and its effects on the life and death of the the workers—they have to do with the CORN.

Again, a hot summer is unfavourable to the growth of turnips, consequently there are less to take up and shelter from frost while the sheep-fold slowly advances. This is another dead loss to the worker, for which the farmer cares not two straws. Whatever he requires to replace turnips he can easily get in the shape of foreign barley, oats, or cotton-seed cake and linseed cake, which the workers of other countries have to supply to the British farmer by their own wretched slavery. With Mr. John Bull it is "Heads I win, Tails you lose!" Hot summer—heavy corn; light expenses; cheap imports. Dull summer—heavy turnips; no imports.

This is putting aside losses from floods and special causes, which are made a great deal of when they happen. But the view I try to put before these mystified workers waiting in the January slush is this: You and your comrades have done work in this village upon 4,000 acres, which has caused the forces of Nature to make a return of £20,000 value of one kind or other—the low average of £5 an acre—can any of you show me where half of that produce has gone? You and your comrades of all sorts have not had half in wages. But the Landlords have had a pound an acre, and the Church has had over a £1,000 in all, the Government has had its taxes, and your nine neighbours, whom you call master farmer, they have—well!—they have lived! and lived in some style. You cannot put it much under £4 a

THE AGRICULTURAL LABOURER.

THESE farms are singular in being situate in a place containing nothing but agriculture of the decidedly extensive sort. No factories or mines are near enough to influence the price of wages. The men leave for Yorkshire, London, or the army, only when compelled by actual necessity to do so.

In one other respect, too, the three farms enjoy a peculiarity. They are blessed by the total absence of any sub-manager or person who has to make his own account by petty harrassing of the actual workers. There is no man in either of the villages who is trying to wriggle himself out of his position by climbing up the backs of those about him. It may be very gloomy for individual men to feel that they cannot look forward to any amelioration of a life of monotonous work, but it has its better side in the circumstance that life is at least free from the prying of a downright "prig," the person who in many villages thinks he can climb out of the slough by starting pig-dealing and developing into a cattle dealer, and ultimately into a full-blown tyrant. That is the person who is a danger to the progress of humanity.

week for each of the nine. Why should you not be standing in this horrid cold slush in the street here in Ashwell, near the extreme north of north Hertfordshire in 1890?

It would be drier and warmer in the ale-house, but these men have not the wherewith for a pint of "cold fourpenny." For this they are dubbed lazy fellows who will not work. How can they work under the system? The landlord has got his rent, the farmer has got a "living" by his system of four-course cropping—the only system he knows or cares to know, since it gives him an easy existence. It is nothing to him that his "system" has left a few casuals out in the cold. But is not this carelessness on your part a little dangerous, gentlemen? Has not similar recklessness and oppression sometimes produced very alarming phenomena among the downtrodden wretched slaves of similar systems, when driven by hunger and desperation into riot and rebellion? Did you ever hear of the Jacquerie in France in the last century, my dear friends? Did you ever hear of agricultural riots, blazing ricks, and smashed machinery in England? If you have, and can read the signs of the times, you would not drive your labourers to despair by grinding them down into shameful misery and horrible starvation. Even the worm will turn, and the overlaid ass revolt at last!

C. WALKDEN.

(To be concluded).

IN THE ARGENTINE.

OUR comrade J. Creaghe, now in Buenos Ayres, sends us the following vivid account of the recent Political Revolution in the Argentine. After recounting the attempts to found an Anarchist paper in Italian, French, and Spanish, he says:

Comrades,—As I write the city of Buenos Ayres is en fête. The whole place is covered with flags, and crackers and rockets are blazing away in all directions. The reason is that we have just had a very pretty political revolution carried out, which I shall now tell you about. The party in power for the last four years had steadily neglected everything but the most barefaced filling of their own pockets, even the bourgeoisie could not stand it, particularly as a commercial crisis came to make things unupportable, and so the party in opposition gained over a large part of the army (about half), and on Saturday morning last the troops took possession of the artillery barracks and arsenal, which is situated in one of the squares in the centre of the city. They were there joined by large numbers of the citizens, who were immediately armed, as there was abundance of arms and ammunition in the arsenal. They entrenched themselves in the square, and armed citizens stationed themselves on the roofs of the houses all round. The government then with the troops at their disposal took post on the edge of the town, and three thousand police of the city armed with rifles in anticipation of the movement joined them. There was some desultory fighting during the day, and you will be sorry to hear that policemen were shot down in all parts of the city as they went to join their comrades.

On Sunday, we were aroused at six in the morning by the most furious fusillade of small arms, mitrailleuses, and Krupp guns, which continued without the least intermission for two hours. The police (who are old soldiers by the way) had with the troops of the line made a desperate attack on the position of the revolutionists, but were repulsed after two hours hard fighting. The police suffered awfully. During all that day there was much fighting in different parts of the city, and both parties continued to strengthen themselves. In the evening an armistice was agreed to until ten the next morning. Next day the whole fleet declared for the revolution, or was taken possession of, and began to bombard the position of the government, and the government house and the private residence of President Juarez. A shell fell in a house about 600 yards from this, and killed a woman and child and wounded many others. Several other cases of this kind occurred.

On Monday evening there was another furious attack made by the forces of the government, which, after twenty minutes hard fighting was again repulsed. Everybody was delighted, for the whole city sympathised with the movement. When, on Tuesday—things having been quiet in the morning and forenoon—in the evening, we were all surprised by the news that all was over, and that the revolutionary leaders had submitted to the government on the condition that no one was to be punished. They said the reason was that they had not enough ammunition to continue the struggle. No one believed this, and the young men in great part refused to give up their arms, but disbanded and rushed about firing and shouting; some even committed suicide, saying they were sold.

However, the leaders of the revolution knew what they were doing. They had gone far enough, and did not wish to go farther. Many of them were within the government party itself, and after all was quieted down the ministers resigned. The president found it useless to try to form a cabinet, no one would come to him; the clamour for his resignation became too loud to be unheard. Another outbreak was expected on the part of the army, and so the members of the Congress at last, who had up to this time said "Amen!" to all the president's paternosters, sent him a written demand to resign, which he did, and the vice-president, Pelligrini (who by the way is nephew to the late John Bright) became president. He is very much liked by all parties, and he has already formed an administration which gives confidence. Juarez resigned the day before yesterday, and since then there have been continual rejoicings.

We had a very lively time I can tell you while the affair lasted. Bullets were flying about in all directions, and the number of persons killed and wounded, who found themselves in the streets from mere curiosity, was very great indeed. One of our comrades got a grape-shot through his arm and into the flesh of his ribs, where it lodged; I am still attending him and several others. I had a narrow squeak myself one day, as a bullet passed close to my face and struck the wall near me. It nearly happened to me as to one poor citizen who was standing on the balcony at one of the windows of his house, when a bullet carried away both his eyes and his nose.

We Anarchists were in great hopes that the fighting would last for about fifteen days, and if it had the city would certainly have been sacked. Some thirty of us met and consulted what might be done in order to get funds for the Revolution (our Revolution), but the next day all was over.—With fraternal greetings to all comrades,

J. CREAGHE.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

The men employed in the dye-works of Reims earn 2½d. an hour and work twelve, fourteen, and sixteen hours a-day, without any meal-time. Except a few Socialists, the mass of the workers are so crushed that they only ask to work longer, in order to get more money to drink on Sunday, and recommence again their life of slavery on Monday. The peasants of the country about Reims, on the contrary, seem to become every day more rebellious, and promise to be useful to the cause of humanity.

Comrades Cabot and Vinchon (Paris), who had already been condemned to two years' imprisonment and £20 fine under the accusation of having distributed proclamations to the soldiers on the 1st of May, having had recourse to the Court of Appaal, were re-tried the other day. They energetically pleaded for their ideas and explained the Anarchist theories, confounding the public accuser. The jury found Cabot guilty, and condemned him to three months' imprisonment and £2 fine. Vinchon has been acquitted.

The solidarity between the workers has defeated the masters, and so the victory of the parquet-makers has disorganised the trust of the master carpenters and parquet-makers. The masters who had not been damaged by the strike protested against those who yielded to the demands of the workers, and withdrew from the trust.

The glass and crystal cutters of Charleville have struck work. The masters try by all means to get foreign workers, but as until at present they have not succeeded, the workers hope that the international solidarity of the working men will be successful once more.

The tobacco-workers of the whole of France have organised against their powerful master, the Government.

The French are forced to pay each year fifty million pounds for interest of the public debt, so that every Frenchman is bound to pay from his birth £1 5s. to feed a handful of parasites. When will they make a bonfire of these stock-books?

ITALY.

At Milan, the 1st September, a great meeting of engineers was held. After a lively discussion the following conclusion has been voted: "The engineers and allied trades who have met to deliberate about the present crisis which has disorganised our industry are convinced that only through a strong organisation shall we be able to reclaim the machines, the ground, and the tools as a property to the workers, and put an end to our misery." Considering that every man has a right to earn his livelihood, they repel alms as a cause of demoralisation and humiliation. They protest against the foolish waste by the Government of the money of the tax-payers, throwing it in wrong speculations, leaving the workers, who are the only producers of wealth, to lie in starvation and in want. They intend to ask the Government to promptly provide the unemployed with work, and propose if in a fortnight the Government and proprietors won't have put an end to such a state of things, that they will be ready to sacrifice their lives rather than die of starvation.

From Naples the constitution of several Anarchist groups is announced. A new Anarchist paper, Il Grido del Popolo, will soon appear in that town.

In several towns of Italy the workers have been occupying themselves for some time with an important agitation for next 1st of May, which they hope will become historical. Most likely this question will be treated also in future congresses.

The trials and judgments for the riots of the 1st of May are still going on, and at Turin and Leghorn several comrades have been condemned to one, two, and three years' imprisonment.

Several comrades of La Spezia have been one year and a half in prison under the charge of having prepared explosive material and conspired against the safety of the State. A public trial has taken place twice already, but the judges declared themselves incompetent, and remanded them to another court.

SPAIN.

The 14th August the Spanish comrades missed a good friend, Rafael Farga Pelicer, one of the founders of the International in Spain, and one of the most intelligent, energetic, and influential propagandists of Socialism. A good father to his family and a good friend to his comrades, he was devoted to the cause of mankind. Although impotent because of an infirmity, he was loved not only by all comrades, but by the whole working class of Barcelona and Catalogna. His death will leave a great void in the hearts of all who had the opportunity of knowing him.

At Madrid there has appeared a new Anarchist organ, the Anarquia. Long life to our comrades' paper.

The locksmiths of Barcelona have struck work.

The workers of Manresa imprisoned for striking have been discharged.

M.

More Testimony.

We take the following from the Echo of September 4th:

"There is untold tragedy in the simple contrast of the death-rate in the New Town of Edinburgh with that of the Old Town. Of every thousand of the comfortable classes 10·27 die; of every thousand of the poor 21·16 die. Broadly stated, this means that for one case of child mortality in a good street, at least two occur in the slums, and that to be born to poverty is to receive a sentence of death at middle-age."

And yet some people complain of our "violent" language. When we remember that everywhere the poor are slowly murdered by the present system before they have lived out half their lives, I say we are not "violent" enough, and that any means are justifiable against a system of society under which 27 people have been starved to death during the last year in the richest city of the world. Scores are also horribly murdered every day by continued under-feeding. Death to the commercial system! The best means to use against are those which will the quickest end it.

"COMMONWEAL" BRANCH S.L.—A Course of Lectures and Concert and Ball (under the management of the above Branch) for the benefit of the Commonweal is in active preparation. Full particulars of same will be announced next week. There will be some initial expenses in connection therewith, and Branch comrades and friends are asked to help in this direction. All donations will be gladly acknowledged in Commonweal by WM. BLUNDELL, Branch Secretary, 24 Great Queen Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

Strike at Barratt's Confectionery Works.

Three hundred and fifty girls and boys have been out on strike for the last few days at Barratt's Confectionery Works at Wood Green. They complain of the atrocious sweating and also the system of fines, which are imposed upon the slightest pretext, and are especially hard upon the girls, who only earn the miserable wages of some 6s. or 8s. a-week, and have even these considerably reduced by the "ingenious" fine system. How the system works is clearly shown by the following letter handed in by a boy who had worked in the firm to a Star reporter. It runs as follows:

"SIR,—Since I have worked at Barratt's I have (with Care) lost so much as 1s. a-week. On Monday I was 1 minute late Fined 3d. Tuesday 4 minutes 3d. Wednesday 10 minutes late 3d. Thursday 20 minutes late 4½ and The same week I was fined 3d. for aming a Turnover, making an amount of 1s. 4½d. out of 6s. per week. Sir I know a girl who has lost so much as £3 in one Year for being late only. Sir, I have seen Boys come to work with only two slices of Bread and Butter for their Dinner Meal. I have been very Pleased to get 1d. fish myself. Many a morning I have Lost 3d. and worked till 10 the same night to make it up I know Boys who to make what they call a good week has worked from 6 in the morning till 10 at night and came home half Dead. Sir I would like to see you win the 8 hours won't the boys think they had a easy time of it. Sir try and get them all out Barratt's won't give in until they all come out. I pity the Girls who is in lodgings. Sir that is all I have to say just now. Excuse the riting."

The strikers are fighting gallantly. They demand the abolition of the fines and also ask for a reduction of hours. The hours at present are from eight to eight, and till three on Saturday. The workers demand that they shall be reduced in future to eight till six, and one on Saturday; all work done out of these hours to be paid for at the rate of time and a half. Subscriptions are urgently needed, and should be sent to the Strike Committee, Star Coffee House, Wood Green.

Strike of Hair and Fibre Workers.

A strike has taken place among the horse-hair workers at Messrs. Grey and Unsworth's and Messrs. McDonough's, Manchester, owing to the employment of non-union men. Over £100 has been received from London and Sheffield, and the smaller unions are forwarding donations. A meeting will be convened in London to consider the advisability of forming a co-operative factory at Manchester for the employment of the men on strike. The London secretary states he can procure the services of skilful buyers, and can command orders far into next year. This is considered an important suggestion, as it will be the first step towards getting the Manchester trade into the hands of the workers themselves, and will open employment for workers of other districts who may require it.

Mr. Threfall on the Coming Winter.

Mr. Threfall, one of the most intelligent of the old trade unionists, has a thoughtful article on the Old and New Trades Unionism in the Bristol Evening News of Friday, September 12. He appears to share our views as to next winter being a very "rough" one. He says:

"A Maidstone correspondent sends me a very gloomy account as to the prospects of labour in the southern counties. Farmers have in many cases given up the struggle in despair, and thrown their farms up; and their labourers, having nothing to look forward to, are flocking into the metropolis and other large centres in the south. In addition to this, the mould has assailed the hops, and consequently fewer people are this year employed in hop-picking than for many years past. These facts, taken in connection with the potato famine in Ireland, and the inevitable invasion of agricultural labourers into our populous centres, certainly do not forecast a very bright winter. With plenty of surplus labour to work with, we may expect employers endeavouring to reduce wages, and this will undoubtedly lead to terrible struggles."

He points out also that a defeat at Southampton would speedily lead to a terrible strike at the London docks. The "defeat" has now occurred, and it is evident that the New Trade-unionism will soon be fighting desperately for its very existence.

Glorious War.

What, speaking in quite unofficial language, is the net-purport and upshot of war? To my own knowledge, for example, there dwell and toil, in the British village of Dumdrudge, usually some five hundred souls. From these, by certain "Natural Enemies" of the French, there are successively selected, during the French war, say thirty able-bodied men: Dumdrudge, at her own expense, has suckled and nursed them: she has, not without difficulty and sorrow, fed them up to manhood, and even trained them to crafts, so that one can weave, another build, another hammer, and the weakest can stand under thirty stone avoirdupois. Nevertheless, amid much weeping and swearing, they are selected; all dressed in red; and shipped away, at the public charges, some two thousand miles, or say only to the south of Spain; and fed there till wanted. And now to that same spot, in the south of Spain, are thirty similar French artisans, from a French Dumdrudge, in like manner wending: till at length, after infinite effort, the two parties come into actual juxtaposition; and Thirty stands fronting Thirty, each with a gun in his hand. Straightway the word "Fire!" is given: and they blow the souls out of one another; and in place of sixty brisk useful craftsmen, the world has sixty dead carcasses, which it must bury, and anew shed tears for. Had these men any quarrel? Busy as the Devil is, not the smallest! They lived far enough apart; were the entirest strangers; nay, in so wide a Universe, there was even, unconsciously, by Commerce, some mutual helpfulness between them. How then? Simpleton! their Governors had fallen out; and, instead of shooting one another, had the cunning to make these poor blockheads shoot.—Alas, so it is in Deutschland, and hitherto in all other lands; still as of old, "what devilry soever Kings do, the Greeks must pay the piper!"—Carlyle: 'Sartor Resartus.'

LEEDS.—The "Chicago Martyrs" annual meeting will be kept up in Leeds on Monday November 10, when comrades Bingham, Carpenter, Reynolds, Samuels, Cores, and Maguire will take part. Other particulars will soon follow.

FABIAN SOCIETY.—A course of lectures on "COMMON OBJECTIONS TO SOCIALISM" will be given at Bloomsbury Hall, Hart Street, New Oxford Street, W.C., on Friday evenings at 8 o'clock.—Sept. 19th. I. That Socialism is contrary to Human Nature. "Professor Huxley and Natural Inequality," Sydney Olivier; "The Seven Deadly Sins," G. Bernard Shaw.

SOCIALISM IN LONDON AND THE PROVINCES.

STREATHAM.

THE never-to-be-forgotten revolutionary meetings in Streatham last year shows unmistakable signs of bearing fruit. The outspoken truths concerning the hideous commercial system and landlord robbery seems the only sort of talk that rouses enthusiasm and revives to fresh life and vigour the men whose lives are wellnigh wrecked in the rush for luxury and ease of the privileged classes. Except for the Liberal Club, bossed by a few of the snobocracy (lower middle class), and the Bee Hive Coffee Tavern (very little patronised by the worker), nothing of an educational character is carried on except our meetings in the open-air. They are well attended, very orderly, and very popular. The morning meetings are held for reorganising the Streatham Labour Union. At night the meetings are for revolutionary propaganda. Owing to difficulty of getting speakers, C. Smith has to do most of the revolutionary propaganda.

Since my last report the cause still goes marching on. Miss Lupton and Smith addressed a large audience on Sunday morning, August 17th. Miss Lupton's comparison of the lawyer's charges for useless work, while the workman was still the prey of the sweater, created a good impression. Throughout the meeting enthusiasm and order was maintained, and 1s. 10d. was collected for the union. Wimbledon was visited by three comrades, who spoke to a small but sympathetic audience on the Common, starting the meeting by singing the "Hymn of the Proletariat," and at the close was asked to sing it again, when it was received with waving of hats and cheers for the revolution. On Saturday, August 30, the Good Templars started opposition with their usual hypocritical canting psalm-singing and cold water, not proving sufficient to damp the longing of the worker here for economic freedom, a more lively meeting I never attended. Smith asked a question, but was not answered. Sunday 30th, Smith and Osbourne addressed a good audience at the Fountain; 5s. collected for fur-pullers. At night, at the Fountain, Smith, Osbourne, and Rees addressed a large audience, opened by Smith singing the "Proletariat." Osbourne spoke well, but on scientific Socialism, the salvation of society depending on the return of Socialist candidates to Parliament; Rees followed in the same strain. Now this was more than Smith could stand; like the last speakers he agreed that this present system was based upon the plunder of the worker in the interest of the idler; and as the future society must be work for all, with its results enjoyed by all, it was futile to imagine that the institutions and traditions of the old order must be brought into the new. The question of physical force was dealt with, and its necessity maintained, as it was used in the present to maintain the robbery and plunder in our midst. Our comrade was well received. Commonweal sold out; 2s. ½d. collected for fur-pullers, making 7s. ½d. for the day. S.

LEICESTER.

Sunday, July 27, Mowbray spoke three times; good meetings; 14s. 4d. collected, and 8s. 10d. worth of literature sold. Bank Holiday Sunday, had Navy Hall for the first time; he likewise spoke three times. Hall's evening discourse was truly eloquent, and the audience was much impressed; 16s. 7d. collected, and 8s. 6d. worth of Commonweal and pamphlets sold. Tuesday following, Mowbray with us again, and stayed till the end of week. Thomas Purcell (of Derby), a Christian Socialist, occupied platform. On 24th, Joe Tanner, of Birmingham (S.D.F.), spoke three times. On 31st, H. Davis, of London (Anarchist), addressed us twice. Davis also met us at Exchange Buildings by our request for an exposition and discussion of Anarchist principles. Saturday, Sept. 6th, Harry Carless (of Walsall) spoke on the Old Cross, Belgrave Gate, and on Sunday, 7th, at our usual places. During July, we have opened up the new stations of the Old Cross, Belgrave, and Wigston. At the last place we have been interfered with by the police, accused of obstruction, and our names taken, but nothing more. Some wretch has been distributing our pernicious literature among the soldiery stationed four miles out from here; and their colonel has been in a devil of a sweat over it. We are propagating now five nights a week somewhere, town or village, but find that the towns gives the best result. It is the most open to attack. People in the rural districts feel isolated and almost hopeless; still, they would succumb if we only had more workers. Together with Nottingham comrades, and by aid of a Loughborough comrade, we have held weekly meetings in Loughborough, and have tried to destroy the belief of the workers there in political shams. On August 31st, Barclay spoke at the Secular Hall on "Socialism the Salvation of the People"; fair discussion. Comrade Clara Warner made her first real speech last Monday night. Have begun to criticise our critics in the press for the sake of ventilating our principles; good sale of literature at all our meetings. B.

COMMONWEAL.—Good meeting on Sunday at Union Street; speakers were Miss Lupton and Leggatt; Freedom sold out and 3s. collected. In the evening at Mile End Waste, Leggatt held a good meeting.

NORTH LONDON.—We have held good meetings at Ossulston Street, Regent's Park, and Liverpool Street; speakers were Cantwell, Nicoll, Edwards, and Miss Lupton. The attendance of the choir at Liverpool Street made the meeting a grand success, and brought seven or eight police and an inspector to see whether the "Rev" had broken out. We collected 2s. 9½d. at Regent's Park, and sold 5 quires of Commonweal.

ABERDEEN.—On Sunday evening comrade Leatham lectured to a large audience on "Massaniello and the Neapolitan Revolt of 1647." In the discussion, which turned chiefly on revolution and parliamentary methods, comrades Rennie, Duncan, W. Cooper, G. Cooper, McLean, Moir, Addie, and Paul Blottman (a Swiss comrade) took part. The usual open-air meetings were held on Thursday and Saturday, Rennie, W. Cooper, and Leatham being the speakers on both occasions.

GLASGOW.—We are still maintaining our out-door propaganda here, our Paisley Road Toll meeting on Sunday evenings being as well attended and as useful as ever. Owing to the loss of our comrade Joe Burgoyne, who has gone to Leeds, we are short of speakers—comrade Glasier having meanwhile to do all the oratory himself. We are anxiously hoping providence may send us an additional speaker or two.

LEEDS.—We held three splendid meetings on Sunday last. Commonweal sold out. In consequence of several letters on Socialism appearing in the local press, we had some good opposition, and at the afternoon meeting on Woodhouse Moor we got some hearty support from an old temperance orator, Mr. Campbell, who spoke after an enthusiastic retailer of teetotal heresies, who said that even were everybody converted to total abstinence, there would still be poverty and degradation consequent on the monopoly of the natural resources of the country. This testimony from such a source is highly encouraging, and it was noticed at the evening meeting that other teetotal lecturers also declared themselves "in the fashion." But we can only gain by this.—H. S.

MANCHESTER.—We have held three good meetings Sunday the 14th, addressed by Cores (of Leeds), Barton, Stockton, and Scott. Collections amounted to 7s. 8½d. Commonweal all sold out, besides a number of Freedom, 'Monopoly,' and 'Chicago Speeches.' In the evening, at Higher Chatham Street, we had another taste of police interference, which ended in the complete discomfiture of the guardians of Law-'n'-order.—A W.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"REVOLUTIONARY GOVERNMENT."

Truly, Kropotkin's articles, as Nicoll observes, constitute an able attack against the chimeric idea of Government associated with Revolution. By Revolution, I mean doing away with the causes of poverty. When once this is achieved certainly it will matter little whether there exist Governments or not. They will be mere shadows of Governments. But one objection may be that even such shadows could be dangerous for a time. It is indeed useless to ignore how easily the people can be led astray by these "saviours." The blow, therefore, should be strong enough to destroy the faintest vestiges of power, lest these people contrive once more, by establishing the old tyranny, to bring back the causes of poverty.

In the event, then, that all Socialists combine to bring about the Revolution, by persuading the people to take possession of all the resources of wealth, the great difficulty to deal with would be—How to prevent individuals from extorting power from the people. The other difficulty referred to by Nicoll, as to who is to direct exchange and distribution of commodities, seems to me secondary. This work can be done by special societies, committees, etc. England affords a very instructive example of such a tendency of the people. But I attach to the word Government the meaning of power outside of the people. When the Revolution is effected it will bring home to the mind of the people the principle that they are the power, and furthermore, that the notion of some power standing outside of them is an absurdity, if not a positive danger.

Let us suppose that during the time in which that principle is borne in mind by the people, a Revolutionary Government contrives to arise by some means or another. Unless the people soon lose sight of the principle, the Government will be forced to carry out one single measure, and that is—to lose itself at once into the people. Here the difficulty presents itself. Are we sure that some other Government will not arise at a, for it, more propitious moment, and secure itself in a popular belief that it is carrying out the principles of Revolution until it ceases to call itself Revolutionary? Nothing more likely. Some great guarantee then is absolutely needed, that nobody will ever dare either to ask or to accept power. This is a point which ought to be thought over by Anarchists. They should make up their minds that if any people tried to seize upon power they would be lynched at the first opportunity (it is to be hoped that they will resign in time).

If this method be not the best, it would be important to be shown what could enable the people to attach a criminal character to the idea of somebody governing them, or what guarantee can be obtained against the formation of Governments?

But another view of the matter might be considered. May it not be that the abolition of poverty will involve the gradual extinction of all forms of Government? The essential idea of Anarchy is that all power should be kept within the bosom of the people, and never be delegated to either minorities or majorities. How can this be done otherwise but either by force, such as the above suggestion implies, or by our passing through all the intermediary stages until we reach the Anarchist ideal? It may be said that the latter alternative means deferring the ideal to the twenty-first century. Not if all Socialists work for it, by concentrating their forces in each stage. All Socialists do not go for this ideal, but it would be wise of Anarchists to work with those who would help the advent of the first stage of Socialism, and so on with regard to each succeeding one. Since we can go together as far as a certain point, better together than separate. In this way we would shorten the intermediary stages, and bring them all within the compass of less than a century. And it would not be long before every revolutionist would work, having as his ideal the motto, "No Poverty, No Government."

THE SATIRES OF CYNICUS.

"SINE IRA ET STUDIO."

CYNICUS asks no favour, is no partisan, independent and unbiassed he looks with impartial eye on the follies and corruptions of his time. Unknown and unaided, but with firm purpose, he launches his satires on a world of dissimulation and deceit, where alas—

Virtue's at a discount,
Truth is under par,
Honesty's a scarcity
Wealth is better far.
Knavery's commendable,
Cheating is no sin;
He is the true philanthropist
Who takes the stranger in.

But where, perchance, some honest kindly heart,
While smiling at his fancies, still may say—
"He acts no snarling, mean, or churlish part
Who fain would laugh the follies of the world away."

TO SUCH HE DEDICATES HIS BOOK.

To Socialists who wish to see the hypocrisy of modern society pictorially lampooned, we recommend Cynicus.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

EVIDENCE IN BLACK AND WHITE.

THAT the workers are prodigiously fleeced by capitalists is, one would think, a fact as self-evident as any fact can be. There are, however, some people who will deny anything, if they think they can profit by the denial; and there are other people who will scarcely believe anything—no matter how palpable to their sense or judgment—until they think everybody else believes it. There is consequently no physical or moral fact but has probably upon occasion been disputed by interested knaves or disinterested fools.

We need not wonder, then, that the robbery of labour has been denied by some important and clever people, and many unimportant and stupid people: the former because they benefit, or imagine they benefit, by preventing the detection of the robbery; the latter because they have so lost the faculty of seeing or judging for themselves that they actually believe the lie, although the truth stares them in the face every moment of their lives.

It does not seem much use trying to convince people of facts by means of figures, when the everyday evidence of their own five or seven senses fails to impress them: but it is one of the vagaries of the depraved mental habits of this commercial age that if a fact or an argument can be resolved into figures of pounds, shillings, and pence, certified in "black and white," its credibility becomes established as if by a miracle. I verily believe there are some folk who would doubt death itself if it were not for the registrars' returns and the bills for funeral expenses!

It is, I suppose, our duty to try and convert such people: even if they don't prove of much account when converted. We at any rate appease our own consciences; and, what is quite as comforting, add to the moral damnation of those who persist in abiding in error. With that view I submit the following.

A prospectus appeared a few weeks ago in the chief commercial newspapers of the country announcing the conversion of the firm of Messrs. J. and P. Coats, thread-manufacturers, Paisley, and Rhode Island, U.S.A., into a limited liability company. According to the certified report of the auditors the average profits of the business during each of the last three years reached the gigantic sum of £457,719. The report also states that the total number of hands employed by the firm is 6,000. A simple calculation, therefore, shows us that the firm makes a profit of £76 per year, or 30s. per week, off every one of its workers! The sheer voracity of this fleecing will be still more apparent if we bear in mind that the majority of the workers are girls whose wages average less than twelve shillings per week. It means that the girls get less than a third of the net remunerative value of their labour. I say remunerative value because it must be borne in mind that before this "divide" takes place an enormous portion of the wealth created by these girls has been thrown away in high salaries for management, rent, advertisements, and in the woeful waste entailed in everyday competitive trading,—all of which is lost to the girls, although not included in the profits of the masters.

If we could get to the bottom of the matter, and find the actual number of people whose hands and minds contribute to the production and marketing of the thread—excluding all whose service, great or small, has merely to do with safeguarding the business and its profits to the proprietors, and whose labour consequently does not contribute one iota to the value of the material—if we could get thus at the real makers of the wealth, and find on an average how much of it each produces, and compare it with what each on an average now receives from the Messrs. Coats, the revelation would be vastly more astounding.

But as it is—even making full allowance for all uncertain qualities in such statements—these facts and figures are enough to startle even the most unimaginative stickler for black and white evidence. It is not easy to see how facts and figures bearing more direct testimony of plunder could be desired by any sentient being. There is no getting out of their conclusion by assuming that the wealth produced is due chiefly to the genius, industry, and thrift of the Messrs. Coats themselves. A heap of wealth the genius, industry, and thrift of these princely personages would produce without the labour of their six thousand workers! It is probable that without the Messrs. Coats, these six thousand workers might produce as much, and most likely more, than they now produce; but it is quite impossible that without the six thousand workers the Messrs. Coats could manufacture as much thread as would serve to patch the seats of their own breeches.

If enquiry were made, it would be found that whatever genius or industry these employers display during the one or two hours per day or per week which they give to business is devoted, not to the manufacture of thread or any useful adjunct of its manufacture, but in taking devilishly good care that the profits of their workers' toil is scooped into their own pockets and not diverted into the pockets of anybody else; and it would also be found that their thrift is more manifest in scrimping the pays of the poor girls in their factories than in scrimping themselves of any luxury or pleasure.

No; the abilities and virtues of the Messrs. Coats have as little to do with the production of thread which yields them the profit of £457,719 per year, as prayers have to do with potato-growing or philanthropy with the colonisation of Central Africa. Were they, or the new directorate, to take a pleasure trip to the South Sea Islands and unfortunately get gobbled up by native epicures, the business would probably go on and the fleecings roll in as briskly as ever,—their heirs and successors would get the fleecings, that is all; and even if through mismanagement the business of the firm diminished, the business of other firms would proportionately increase, and the girls who are presently fleeced in the Coats' factories would be fleeced in those other factories, and the bosses of those other factories would get the fleecings instead of the Messrs. Coats. As it is, the Messrs. Coats are selling out, and in future the concern will be owned by a whole swarm of money-bags, who will divide amongst themselves the spoil of the workers.

L'ENVOI.

The Messrs. Coats dwell in palaces in the west of Scotland; they have horses and carriages and sumptuously appointed pleasure yachts, and they lease expensive shootings. There are ten of them—one is reputed insane—the others are mostly strong handsome fellows, who seem thoroughly contented with their lot. They contribute liberally to the church and public charities, and are highly respected.

Their work-girls dwell in single and two-apartment houses in the narrow lanes of Paisley. They never ride in carriages or sail in pleasure yachts, and are bereft of almost every means of seeking health and recreation. They are not strong; they are mostly pale, wearyful looking creatures, who do not seem happy.

The Messrs. Coats keep patent automatic time-recording machines in their factories, and the girls are fined if they are five minutes late. The girls are not allowed to read their Bibles or sing hymns during working hours; and if they are off work through sickness they don't get any pay.

J. BRUCE GLASIER.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. XXIX.—AN OLD HOUSE AMONGST NEW FOLK.

As I stood there Ellen detached herself from the merry group on the little strand and came up to me. She took me by the hand, and said softly, "Take me on to the house at once; we need not wait for the others: I had rather not."

I had a mind to say that I did not know the way thither, and that the river-side dwellers should lead; but almost without my will my feet moved on along the road they knew. The raised way led us into a little field bounded by a backwater of the river on one side; on the right hand we could see a cluster of small houses and barns, new and old, and before us a grey-stone barn and a wall partly overgrown with ivy, over which a few grey gables showed. The village road ended in the shallow of the aforesaid backwater. We crossed the road, and again almost without my will my hand raised the latch of a door in the wall, and we stood presently on a stone path which led up to the old house to which fate in the shape of Dick had so strangely brought me in this new world of men. My companion gave a sigh of pleased surprise and enjoyment; nor did I wonder, for the garden between the wall and the house was redolent of the June flowers, and the roses were rolling over one another with that delicious superabundance of small well-tended gardens which at first sight takes away all thought from the beholder save that of beauty. The black-birds were singing their loudest, the doves were cooing on the roof-ridge, the rooks in the high elm-trees beyond were garrulous among the young leaves, and the swifts wheeled whining about the gables. And the house itself was a fit guardian for all the beauty of this heart of summer.

Once again Ellen echoed my thoughts as she said: "Yes, friend, this is what I came out for to see; this many-gabled old house built by the simple country-folk of the long-past times, regardless of all the turmoil that was going on in cities and courts, is lovely still amidst all the beauty which these latter days have created; and I do not wonder at our friends tending it carefully and making much of it. It seems to me as if it had waited for these happy days, and held in it the gathered crumbs of happiness of the confused and turbulent past."

She led me up close to the house, and laid her shapely beautiful sun-browned hand on the lichened wall, as if to embrace it, and cried out, "O me! O me! How I love the earth, and the seasons, and weather, and all things that deal with it, and all that grows out of it,—as this has done!"

I could not answer her, or say a word. Her exultation and pleasure were so keen and exquisite, and her beauty so delicate, yet so interfused with energy, expressed it so fully, that any added word would have been commonplace and futile. I dreaded lest the others should come in suddenly and break the spell she had cast about me; but we stood there a while by the corner of the big gable of the house, and no one came. I heard the merry voices some way off presently, and knew that they were going along the river to the great meadow on the other side of the house and garden.

We drew back a little, and looked up at the house: the door and the windows were open to the fragrant sun-cured air; from the upper window-sills hung festoons of flowers in honour of the festival, as if the others shared in our love for the old house.

"Come in," said Ellen. "I hope nothing will spoil it inside; but I don't think so. Come! we must go back presently to the others. They have gone on to the tents; for surely they must have tents pitched for the haymakers—the house would not hold a tithe of the folk, I am sure."

She led me on to the door, murmuring little above her breath as she did so, "The earth and the growth of it and the life of it! If I could but say or show how I love it!"

We went in, and found no soul in any room as we wandered from room to room,—from the rose-covered porch to the strange and quaint garrets amongst the great timbers of the roof, where of old time the tillers and herdsmen of the manor slept, but which a-nights seemed now, by the small size of the beds, and the litter of useless and disregarded matters—bunches of dying flowers, feathers of birds, shells of starling's eggs, caddis-worms in mugs, and the like—seemed to be inhabited for the time by children.

Everywhere there was but little furniture, and that only the most necessary, and of the simplest forms. The extravagant love of ornament which I had noted in this people elsewhere seemed here to have given place to the feeling that the house itself and its associations was the ornament of the country life amidst which it had been left stranded from old times, and that to re-ornament it would but take away its use as a piece of natural beauty.

We sat down at last in a room over the wall which Ellen had caressed, and the walls of which were still hung with old tapestry, originally of no artistic value, but which had now faded into pleasant grey tones which harmonised thoroughly well with the quiet of the place, and which would have been ill supplanted by brighter and more striking decoration.

I asked a few random questions of Ellen as we sat there, but scarcely listened to her answers, and presently became silent, and then scarce conscious of anything but that I was there in that old room, the doves crooning from the roofs of the barn and dovecot beyond the window opposite to me.

My thought returned to me after what I think was but a minute or two, but which, as in a vivid dream, seemed as if it had lasted a long time, when I saw Ellen sitting, looking all the fuller of life and pleasure and desire from the contrast with the grey faded tapestry with its futile design, which was now only bearable because it had grown so faint and feeble.

She looked at me kindly, but as if she read me through and through. She said: "You have begun again your never-ending contrast between the past and this present. Is it not so?"

"True," said I. "I was thinking of what you, with your capacity and intelligence, joined to your love of pleasure, and your impatience of unreasonable restraint—of what you would have been in that past. And even now, when all is won and has been for a long time, my heart is sickened with thinking of all the waste of life that has gone on for so many years."

"So many centuries," she said, "so many ages!"

"True," I said; "too true," and sat silent again.

She rose up and said: "Come, I must not let you go off into a dream again so soon. If we must lose you, I want you to see all that you can see first before you go back again."

"Lose me?" I said—"go back again? What do you mean?"

She smiled somewhat sadly, and said: "Not yet; we will not talk of that yet. Only, what were you thinking of just now?"

I said falteringly: "I was saying to myself, The past, the present? Should she not have said the contrast of the present with the future: of blind despair with hope?"

"I knew it!" she said. Then she caught my hand and said excitedly, "Come, while there is yet time! Come!" And she led me out of the room; and as we were going downstairs and out of the house into the garden by a little side door which opened out of a curious lobby, she said in a calm voice, as if she wished me to forget her sudden nervousness: "Come! we ought to join the others before they come here looking for us. And let me tell you, my friend, that I can see you are too apt to fall into mere dreamy musing: no doubt because you are not yet used to our life of repose amidst of energy, of work which is pleasure and pleasure which is work."

She paused a little, and as we came out into the lovely garden again she said: "My friend, you were saying that you wondered what I should have been if I had lived in those past days of turmoil and oppression. Well, I think I have studied the history of them to know pretty well. I should have been one of the poor, for my father when he was working was a mere tiller of the soil. Well, I could not have borne that; therefore my beauty and cleverness and brightness" (she spoke with no blush or simper of false shame) "would have been sold to rich men, and my life would have been wasted indeed; for I know enough of that to know that I should have had no choice, no power of will over my life; and that I should never have bought pleasure from the rich men, or even opportunity of action, whereby I might have won some true excitement. I should have wrecked and wasted in one way or another, either by penury or by luxury. Is it not so?"

"Indeed it is," said I.

She was going to say something else, when a little gate in the fence, which led into a small elm-shaded field, was opened, and Dick came with hasty cheerfulness up the garden path, and was presently standing between us, a hand laid on the shoulder of each. He said: "Well, neighbours, I thought you two would like to see the old house quietly without a crowd in it. Isn't it a jewel of a house after its kind? Well, come along, for it is getting towards dinner-time. Perhaps you, guest, would like a swim before we sit down to what I fancy will be a pretty long feast?"

"Yes," I said, "I should like that."

"Well, goodbye for the present, neighbour Ellen," said Dick. "Here comes Clara to take care of you, as I fancy she is more at home amongst our friends here."

Clara came out of the field as he spoke; and with one look at Ellen I turned and went with Dick, doubting, if I must say the truth, whether I should see her again.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

[TO BE CONCLUDED IN OUR NEXT.]

A Tonic Sol Fa Class meets every Thursday evening at 8 o'clock at Kelmscott House, Hammersmith; comrade J. Munday conductor. All members of the League are cordially invited to attend and assist.

COSMOPOLITAN RESEARCH ASSOCIATION, Wharfedale Temperance Bar, 46 Wharfedale Road, Kings Cross.—Meets every Wednesday at 8.30 for discussion of social subjects. October 1st, Mr. Sweet, "Social Democracy v. Anarchy."

FABIAN SOCIETY.—A course of lectures on "COMMON OBJECTIONS TO SOCIALISM" will be given at Bloomsbury Hall, Hart Street, New Oxford Street, W.C., on Friday evenings at 8 o'clock.—October 3rd. II. That Socialism is condemned by the lessons of history. "Because Democracy has always broken down," Sidney Webb; "Because all Socialist experiments have failed," Graham Wallas.

SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION—EDINBURGH.—Our meetings in Edinburgh and Leith on the past two Sundays have been very successful, especially in Leith, where we anticipate crowded houses during the winter. We have all but secured a nice hall in Henderson Street. On Monday, 15th, we held our first annual picnic at Rosslyn, to which place a good number of our comrades, with their wives and children, drove out by coach. Comrade McDonald and his daughter, with their violins, furnished the music for the dancing, which was largely taken advantage of by the strangers present. The singing of revolutionary songs attracted a good many natives and others towards us, and the opportunity was taken to make an appeal for Socialism, comrades Glasse and Smith addressing the gathering. Comrade J. H. Smith took a capital photo of us all in group. On Wednesday, 17th, we held a public meeting in our hall, 50, South Bridge, when we had for discussion "The Tramways Question." It was fairly successful and well reported in the newspapers. We are still adding to our numbers.

SWEATING AMONG THE FISHERMEN.

Of all the white-slavery there is in Christian, commercial, and loyal England, perhaps the slavery of the demoralised, unorganised, and down-trodden fisherman is the worst. Little do the people in our inland towns and villages know the hardships, starvation, and degradation these men have to endure to procure the celebrated Yarmouth bloaters they hear so much of and get so few of, and the way they are robbed by the owners and middlemen. Well might John Ruskin say, "England has become a nation of thieves. Everybody is trying to rob everybody else, and that not bravely and strongly, but in the cowardly and loathsome ways of lying trade." When will the fishermen rise and assert their manhood like true men, and not go begging and crawling, cap in hand, to their so-called masters for a petty pittance, not sufficient to keep body and soul together, but by their united efforts, and organisation with their fellow-workers of the whole world, rise and shake off the chains of commercial slavery, and strike down monopoly and authority? Know ye not that the workers produce all wealth, yet do not get for themselves, their wives and children, the bare necessities of life; whilst the idlers—not the poor devils who hang about the quay, wearing shoddy clothes, eating adulterated food, and living, or lingering is perhaps nearer the mark, in filthy, insanitary slums, not fit for dogs to live in, but those rich idlers, those sweaters, "those luxurious drones who would eat your flesh and drink your blood"—live in mansions, that we the workers have built—not one single brick or nail have they made themselves—nay, they would not make them if they could, and they could not if they would? Have you never walked along a nice pleasant country road and seen some large mansion, in the midst of a splendid park, in which there is a large board announcing that "trespassers will be prosecuted" or "Beware of the dog," and has not your blood boiled within you to think that one useless creature should monopolise the glorious gifts of nature, and the labour of scores of poor workers, who perhaps have not where to lay their heads, some in prison for "stealing" a rabbit, or even a turnip, to ease their hunger for a little while, and some dying in our modern bastille the workhouse? Oh, workmen, do show a little spirit of rebellion, and try to break down the present wage-slavery. Why should we not enjoy the very best of everything nature and labour has provided for us all, but which we the workers never get? Everything is produced by labour, every nail, every rope, every sail, everything that is necessary to catch the fish, is made by some worker or other. Then why should not everything belong to labour? It should, and it will do as soon as you make up your minds to do it. "Why, then, and for what are we waiting? There are three words to speak, We will it, and what is the foeman but the dream-strong wakened and weak?"

But the fisherman. It will be as well to state here the conditions on which the men are engaged, as most people inland think the boats belong to the men—which they should do. After all expenses are paid, including towing, harbour dues, wharf-dues, salesman's commission, food, etc., the remainder of the money, earned by the men, is divided into seventeen shares, the owner taking ten, for which he has done nothing, and the crew seven shares; which seven shares are again divided into ten or ten and a half shares amongst the crew of ten men and a boy as follows:

Number of Shares.	Boat's Crew.
2 for the	Master or Skipper
1½ "	Mate
1 "	Oarsman
1 "	Whalesman
7-8ths "	Net Ropeman
7-9ths "	Net Stower
¾ each for	4 Scudders or Junkers
½ for the	Boy

As will be seen by the above, the master, who does the least work and gets the most sleep, also gets the most pay. The first four get more than the other seven. The scudders, who do the hardest and the most work, get the worst paid. The owner, the damned monopolist, the greatest curse of the present society, gets more than all the crew put together. Men, is not this eating your flesh and drinking your blood? See to this, like true men. If you are too cowardly to do it for your own sakes, think of your children at home crying for bread, their poor little faces pinched with hunger; compare them with the children of your masters—nay, they will not bear comparison; their little feet cold and often bare as they have to trot off to school, sometimes without a bit in their insides, whilst the children of the monopolist have the best of everything their hearts can desire, and your daughters, who ought to be at home helping their overworked mother, have to wait on them hand and foot.

If only we can get the mothers to understand Socialism, our cause is won; for instead of instilling respect for authority into their little hearts, which, when they reach manhood, takes so much to knock out of them, they would instil into their young hearts the noble principles of Socialism.

On signing to a boat, the men have to go and rig her out for sea—the boat having been laid up since the last fishing—which lasts four or five days. All the men get for this is a little bread and cheese and beer. Directly she has got all on board that is required she is towed out to sea; then the slavery begins. There is always something or other to be done, either pulling on ropes, scudding the fish, scrubbing down, etc.; the crew, with the exception of the master, very seldom get more than four or five hours sleep at a stretch, and that in a little bunk not large enough to keep a rabbit in, in fact, if any one was to keep rabbits in places like the men have to sleep in they would soon have the inspector of nuisances down on them. Can you wonder at them being degraded?

On coming into harbour with her catch, and directly she touches the quay, she is covered with a swarm of men and boys anxious to get a job, telling out or carrying the herrings ashore. The money they are paid comes out of the boat expenses instead of out of the owner's share. When all the herrings are got out the boat is washed down and got ready for sea again; all this is done by the crew. If they get her ready by 12 or 1 p.m., they very often go to sea again the same day. If not, the crew are allowed a night ashore, which happens about once in eight or ten days, but they are sent off to sea first thing in the morning. If any of the crew stop rather late the owner sets another slave on in his place, sometimes paying him as much as £1 a night during the time they are at sea, which money comes out of the man's share that stops ashore. Sometimes by an accident of this kind a man with a wife and family has to go the whole of the fishing for nothing, the owner having paid most of his money away to the man he set on in his place, the rest of his wages go for sea clothing.

The following is a bill one of the Yarmouth men had stopped out of his share:

not including the other sweater's pound of flesh.

A sweating exploiter, one of the great unpaid, has a monopoly in this gigantic robbery. When will the fishermen awake to their own interests?

And so the game goes on year after year, to the latter part of December, when the boats make up, which last three or four days. Then comes the grand settling of accounts, some getting £10 or £12 for twenty or more weeks of the worst of slavery, whilst others pay off their "debts" the owner taking good care that he gets his plunder. After Christmas the fishermen are forced by hunger to go begging to the Corporation to allow them to break stones or some other slavery for 2s. per day. Some day they will go to the sweaters and demand the wealth they have stolen from them.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

GERMANY.

The discussion of the proposed party programme, etc., which will be the order of the day at the Congress, is going on, and has already stirred up a great deal of bad temper. The way in which the old ones want to enforce their authority is certainly very provoking, especially as everybody knows that they are very far from being the "old ones." They have shifted and drifted about according to circumstances, that it might be said it is surprising that still such a great number follow them in their antics. Berlin seems to be the stronghold of the "kickers," and some meetings there have been far from harmonious. No doubt that the enemies of the Socialistic movement are rather pleased at this sight, but that can't be helped; it is much better that these differences are open and freely discussed than kept back; they only go in the blood of the body, forming diseases much worse than sores which can receive open treatment. Meanwhile everybody is anxiously waiting for the coming Congress, and most members wished that the wrangling should be stopped till then, though it is not at all unlikely that a split will take place.

The great lock-out in Hamburg is nearly at an end now. It can't be said that it has ended quite in favour of the workmen, though it is true the combined capitalists have been unable to smash the union (which was their desire), and must take men on without asking them to sign a paper declaring that they belong to no union; but on the other hand the unions have lost a good many members and have an enormous drain on their funds. The committee thank all friends who so liberally helped them in their struggle; and after all, if the beneficial results are not great, the workmen have learnt to stand together, and the different trades will work more and more in combined unity; if one organisation is touched it will be felt and resented by all.

NEW SOUTH WALES.

The son of our old friend, John Bedford Leno, in writing to his father a few days since from Helensburgh, N.S.W., says:

"The masters of this continent are beginning to quake. The miners, to which body of workers I belong, are all combined, the three districts as one. The trades here are like a bundle of sticks, the tie that binds them being formed of one common interest. We have been paying sixpence in the pound weekly for six months in order to keep the men out at a neighbouring pit. I can see that Labour is about to turn the table on Capital, or, in other words, assume the position of 'boss.'—Yours, dear father, WILLIAM LENO, Miner."

"The Labour World."

Michael Davitt's paper, although "moderate" in tone, is certainly the best written and best edited "labour paper" we have yet seen. Morrison Davidson begins a fine series of articles entitled 'The Book of Labour.' The 'Scottish Notes' and the column on 'Social Contrasts' are also excellent. Some sensational revelations about the dealings of the present Government with Pigott, and also concerning the way dynamite explosions have been got up by the "law-'n'-order" party, are promised for next week. We are glad to see Mr. Davitt doesn't share the Republican prejudices of our old friend Reynolds, since the following appears in the pages of the Labour World:

"Let us hear no more trash about 'free' America as compared with down-trodden Europe. Both continents are down-trodden by the rich men who own the raw material out of which wealth is created by human labour. When the land of the United States is all absorbed by private persons, as it will be in 20 years' time, there will not be a pin to choose between America and Europe, so far as wage-workers are concerned. Wages may be higher in America, but the increased cost of living there will nearly equalise the condition of the two continents. While for swindling, lying, and merciless oppression, many American capitalists leave their European brethren far behind."

What does Reynolds think of this? Mr. Davitt and his friends know the condition of the American workers, unlike the writers in Reynolds, whose sole knowledge springs from reading the works of Mr. Andrew Carnegie.

The COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

THE AGRICULTURAL LABOURER.

THE enemy of the human race in the larger village is the worker who tries to climb the backs of his comrades; the creature who curries favour with his "superiors" by telling tales of hare-catching business. He scrapes or steals a few pounds worth of goods to start a beer-shop or a pig-dealer's cart, or anything to lift him a little out of the ruck, so that the exploiters will listen to him when he gives information of "dangerous" men among the lower multitude. His path is hard and his progress slow, but his character is as bad as the conditions in which he creeps along towards a position in which he can "employ" others. This creature always becomes a tyrant, and his children as surely degenerate into "respectable" prigs.

The case of the agricultural worker who migrates is different. He most likely remains a worker among workers. I know young men who have turned shoemakers in the Northamptonshire shoe district who are still as distinctly workers as ever, and decidedly more alive to their position. The manufacturing and mining districts have a great influence upon the agricultural labourer over a narrow belt around the busier centre. But as you penetrate the more decided space and silence of the districts which produce only food, then the pace becomes slower, and the difficulty of approaching the men increases; they are more afraid of combining, or even of listening to any one who tries to inform them. They are overawed by the power that the money-bag exercises over them.

And what fearful confusion that money-bag works upon the material of agriculture, as well as upon its slaves! It is farming "for a profit" that we see. It is a sad sight. In place of the sickle we see a huge machine that smashes all before it, sweeping ears and stumps into a littering mess, to be trampled by horses drawing the next "machine." To cut the corn down quickly before it has time to shell, that is the business—never mind if there are not enough "hands" to get it sheafed to-day or to-morrow, it can be tied up "some day" so long as it is cut. There it lays sprawling Saturday, Sunday, Monday; rain, rain, rain; all the ears of grain laying upon the warm and sodden ground. They ought all to have been gathered neatly and bound within an hour of being cut, and all the sheaves set up in tens every day. How can we expect our agricultural worker to be more than an animal, while we "basely view the ruin" that he is compelled to see made by the machines of luxury and pride? While he is compelled to see the new wheat spoiling upon the wet ground because his own children have been compelled to leave the country to make room for a labour-saving machine which cannot save that corn from destruction. Why, I say, do we wonder the worker is dull? The wonder is that he is not mad.

But these few hasty remarks are only upon the harvest. The winter work is as bad or worse destruction. What has become of the threshing floor? Where are its associations,—the pigeons picking the newly turned out straw, the pigs burrowing under it, the calves rubbing themselves clean in it? Gone, all gone, nothing now but noise, dust, and disgust. The farmer says men will not thrash with a flail now. No, they will not! they have not the chance! The man on a thrashing floor in a winter's storm was lord of creation. True he toiled ten hours; but the length of the day was no fault of the flail, it was Commercialism that made the ten hours toil!

Thrashing with "two sticks and a leathern thong" for a reasonable time at a bout is fine exercise; and what an interest it gave the worker in his tools! The ash "hand-staff" wore itself as smooth as polished marble by sliding through the hard hand as the "flail" swept the air around the man's head. The whitethorn "flail" wore itself as smooth as plate glass by continually striking the straw. The eelskin, which attached the head of the flail to the swivel of the hand-staff, was the joy of all the boys that ever had access to Ambrose, as he patiently flogged away at the golden grain. The "thrasher" made his own tools until 1850. Now, he cannot even mend the "machine" that mangles a stack of corn in a day, and what is much worse, he may not take any care of the heaps of straw and chaff which used to make the young cattle so happy. The straw may wait till it can be sold to go to London for the packing of shoddy furniture, and while so waiting it may or may not get rotten, the worker cannot interfere. As with the straw so with the chaff, and worse. At Bygrave, aforesaid, they burn it to kill the seeds of weeds that ought to have been uprooted before they choked the corn! They also burn, or expect to burn, certain rats and mice at the same time. It is no wonder that condensed milk and canned meats have to be imported to feed the people of England—

"England, bound in by the triumphant sea,
Whose rocky shores beat back the envious siege
Of wat'ry Neptune, is now bound in with shame,
With inky blots and rotten parchment bonds."

This is a true picture of the life of the agricultural labourer. It is not a pleasant nor an hopeful one; and yet, when the spirit of revolt is spreading everywhere, who can be sure that in a very little time even the agricultural serf may be roused to revolt at last. Of this I feel sure; the awakening will be terrible, and the rich will have reason to fear him when he is roused. C. WALKDEN.

[Now comrade Walkden's interesting article is concluded, we shall be very glad to have facts concerning the labourer in other agricultural districts. We want information concerning the wages paid, the length of the working-day, the condition of labourer's cottages, overcrowding if any, the extent to which labour has been displaced by machinery, and all cases of oppression and sweating. Comrades need not have great literary talents to do this; send us the facts and we will put them into shape. Sometimes, too, a plain tale simply told touches the hearts of the people more than all the learned rhetoric in the world.—Eds.]

ON TEMPERANCE.

Sir,—I would be a Socialist bona fide. I have been one at heart for many years, but have as yet only a slight acquaintance with the generally accepted principles of the League, and, furthermore, have only quite recently come across a copy of the Weal containing the "Notes on News" (enclosed), to which I trust I am in order in asking your kind attention. Said "Notes" comment in somewhat adverse terms, to my mind, upon the subject of Temperance, the adoption of which as a firm basis I always understood (and practice myself) as being one of the first principles of reform, and advocated by Socialists and all other friends (of whatever denomination) of the masses, who are the chief sufferers from the effects of Intemperance. You will not deny that, sir. It may be that I am too young a Socialist and reader of the Commonweal.—Yours sincerely,
SPERO.

[The objections we have to temperance folk is when they step out of their way to coerce others, and also when they assert that their principles are the sole panacea for evils flowing from our social system.—Eds.]

LABOUR LITERATURE.—A large meeting was held last Saturday afternoon at the Sewing Machine Makers' Hall, Antigua Street, Nelson Street, Glasgow City, for the purpose of considering the establishment of a depot for labour literature. The proposal was well received, and a committee was appointed to carry out the necessary arrangements and report to a future meeting. The above step has been rendered necessary, as the newsagents refuse to give labour literature any publicity whatever.

AN ANARCHIST PAPER ON THE LABOUR MOVEMENT.

OUR Anarchist friend who writes the leading article in La Revolte appears to be very indignant with the Revolutionary Socialists of England because they have not played a prominent part in the great Dock Strike of last year and in the labour revolt which followed. We should like to point out to this writer, whose knowledge of English affairs is evidently on a par with that of most writers in the French press, that he might have spared his lofty indignation if he had known the elements which made up this tremendous labour revolt. It is not altogether true that the dockers themselves were prejudiced against Socialism, although they were downtrodden, as our friend seems to think. Thanks to the propaganda done among them by a few poor Socialist workmen, years before the leaders of New Unionism had blessed the Socialist movement with their presence, they were rather friendly than otherwise. This anyone who spoke at the numerous outdoor meetings held by the Revolutionary Socialists during the Dock Strike can testify; but on the other hand the aristocratic trade unionists like the stevedores and the lightermen would certainly have withdrawn from the strike altogether if any Revolutionary Socialist had taken an active part in the movement, and this would probably have led to the failure of the strike.

We will endeavour to explain to our French friends why these aristocratic gentlemen objected to Socialism. The lightermen and watermen, whose trade union is an old city guild which dates from the Middle Ages, were bitter Conservatives and Jingoists to a man. Their ideas with regard to politics are those of a "bold British tar" of the reign of George III.; they believe most devotedly in their queen and country, and hate "French principles" like poison. Among the stevedores there is a large section of Irish Catholics, on whom a red flag would have the same effect as a red rag upon a bull. The remainder of them, with very few exceptions, were ordinary "British trade unionists" of the most hopeless type. By personal experience, we certainly say that you might as well talk to a brick wall as preach Revolutionary Socialism to such people. Our Anarchist friend would probably know what would happen if he attempted to convert an assembly of Breton peasants—those people who were so active in exterminating the "enemies of the Church" in Paris in 1871. We should admire our friend for his courage, but we do not think any practical good would come from his exertions, unless his speedy martyrdom could be considered in that light. Therefore we think we are justified in saying that it would have been hopeless for a Revolutionary Socialist to have attempted to lead a motley host of this description—unless, of course, he was prepared to abjure his Revolutionary Socialism, and talk as much like an orthodox trade-unionist as possible.

Perhaps our French friends will now understand why it was necessary to exclude the red flag from the dockers' procession; why, also, when in response to a cry for help from the leaders of the strike the Socialist League sent two speakers, these men were carefully kept off the platform by the "leaders"; why also Mr. Champion, to still further oblige his Conservative and Catholic friends, consented to alter the sub-title of his paper, which stated that it was the "organ of practical Socialism," into something much more "moderate." We admit that the alteration was needed, for we never could make out what that paper was called the "organ of practical Socialism," unless its "practical" Socialism consisted in advocating an Eight Hour Bill and a heavy duty on all foreign imports, together with rabid professions of jingoism and savage abuse of every Socialist who, unlike Mr. Champion, was too honest to sell himself as a base and venal tool to the Tory party. It was therefore not the Social Democracy of most of the leaders of the Dock Strike, that recommended them to the stevedores and lightermen, whatever it may have done with the dockers. Burns was popular with the Irish section of stevedores because he was fresh from assisting at a Home Rule victory at Kennington; while on the other hand the lightermen thought there could be nothing "revolutionary or Socialistic" about the business, for Mr. Champion, the friend of Maltman Barry the trusted agent of the Tory party, was the real leader of the movement. So the New Unionism at its start conciliated both the Conservative and the Home Rule working-man.

The secret history of the New Unionism, like the secret history of the unemployed movement of 1887, has yet to be written. But behind both hovered a Mephistophelean figure, whose gifts, like those of the demon in the old legend, always brought curses with them, and the name of this modern edition of Satan is—Maltman Barry. It is the old story of many a popular movement in France, including the Boulangist movement. The reactionists have played what they thought was a deep game; they have stirred up a popular movement with a cry, which they thought would drown a popular cry of their political adversaries, and they have done it. The movement has grown too strong for their friends, and now the raging whirlpool of their own creation threatens to engulf not only Liberals but Tories also. To daring young Tory Democrats it seemed an excellent plan to drown the siren song of Home Rule with a popular shout of Eight Hours. So they set the heather a-fire, and to their dismay the blaze not only threatens the mansion of the capitalist but their own ancestral halls. If we were the writers on La Revolte, we should give thanks not to the leaders of the New Unionism but to Mr. Maltman Barry and his Tory Democratic employers, "who have done more to awaken the most downtrodden of the masses, who are the most prejudiced against Socialism, than all the Socialists put together."

When the work of these gentlemen is completed, and London is in the throes of a popular revolution, then the Revolutionary Socialists will take a hand in the game, and not even the leaders of the New Trade Unions shall say them nay. Till then we shall continue our work of quietly impregnating the masses with revolutionary ideas by open-air meetings and the distribution of revolutionary literature, and although such work may not make a great noise or provide us with much popular applause, yet perhaps, the people who come after us and enjoy the fruits of our work, may not forget the obscure propagandists who worked on in silence amid difficulty and discouragement, and the hatred and persecution of the enemies of the people, their only aim being to free the poor and downtrodden, and seeking neither honour, glory, nor gold for themselves. It was such men as these, after all, and not Mirabeau or even Danton who made the French Revolution. Mirabeau and Danton merely took advantage of the work of other men to raise themselves into greatness and prominence.

Verily they have had their reward! A brief period of prosperity and then—death; one dying in his bed worn out by his own vices, the other perishing on the scaffold as a traitor to the Cause of the people. And down to the present historians are still squabbling over the point as to whether they were heroes or scoundrels. We, at least, do not want their "fame." "Better be a poor fisherman than a ruler of men," and we rather fancy the leaders of the New Trade Unionism are by this time rather inclined to be of Danton's opinion. Meanwhile, we should advise our critic in La Revolte, before he writes about the work of the Revolutionary Socialists in England again, to read the reports in the Commonweal of the work we have done during the past year, and then perhaps he will come to the conclusion that after all we have done something "to awaken the downtrodden masses who are the most prejudiced against Socialism!" Further, we hope a writer in an Anarchist paper will not tell us to abandon our "principles" in order to gain a little temporary popularity and applause. N.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"REVOLUTIONARY GOVERNMENT."

As criticism is invited on this article, I wish to make a few observations with reference to the same. In the first place, as to the elected "government," Kropotkin states "to confide to it the work that we all, every one of us, ought to do in our own initiative" would be a blunder.

Kropotkin then contents himself and his Anarchist followers with the remark that "the practical solution will be found, will become clear, when the change has already commenced"; as though each of the workers would thoroughly educate himself at the last moment, and know exactly what to do in his own initiative and the most suitable way of doing it. Past experience of revolutions teaches us that the way of carrying on the Revolution so as to make it a success can only be arrived at by careful study and discussion through the Commonweal and at Socialist meetings for months beforehand.

An elected "government" would of course be unsafe, as the people would naturally elect the persons who "talked" the most at the time.

As to the "dictatorship," Kropotkin states, "We know that a Socialist Revolution cannot be directed by the intelligence of a single man or a single organisation," thus leading us to believe that the intelligence of one hundred human machines (alas! that the term should be used) must be greater than that of a William Morris. Kropotkin paints the dictatorship as black as he possibly can, and his description of the French Revolution seems to be his principal argument in favour of Anarchism, and he appears to think that all future leadership will be as bad and as muddled. It is certain that he could not trust a non-elected temporary administration, consisting of long-standing workers in the cause, which must necessarily arise when the time comes.—Yours fraternally,
J. SMYTHE.

In relation to this very important question comrade Nicoll asks "What will the Anarchists do?" and seems to fear they will become corrupt, which they may. But when, as he says, "a popular revolution declares for Anarchy," one must assume the people declare against the very evil Anarchists are as a body a living protest—government; or, if you will, mere authority, say of the most "palatable" form, the humble chairman (presumably a most harmless creature, but still a type of authority). And also assume the Revolution has just come off, and in this city of five millions provisions run short—"who is to direct the men, for instance, who must be sent into the country, and into other countries also, to get supplies?" A natural question, and undoubtedly there would be much confusion resulting from the social disturbance, and present supplies would, however near or distant (if not actually in consumption) would be at the least retarded in transit. But if the popular revolution declares for Anarchy, if I have any faith in my fellow creatures, those who can go will not wait to be sent, they will go, they will do and not wait till some one orders them to do: being no longer at arm's length, with all the absurd, degrading, and artificial social barriers of this unnatural society, but free to use head and hand in the highest and best manner to mutually serve each other. The distribution of necessaries would follow in the natural course of things, though perhaps the people would possibly congregate where they were easiest of access for a time. Generally men retain the position most suitable or pleasing to them, and I can't help saying that immediately after the Revolution those who even are part of a "means of transit," say, will quietly and rapidly fall into their places, seeing the necessity of it, and as there will be plenty of help there will not be so much "utter confusion and irretrievable disorder" as even some of our friends suppose. I trust my fellow creatures that when they rid themselves of their chains, however long their tuition of submissive helplessness may have been, their submission will take a new turn, and just as they have been willing slaves to be exploited, they will set to work to use and enjoy all the good things of life, but not at the dictation of others.—Yours fraternally,
HENRY HOPKINS.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

"Free Labour."

We hear a lot about free labour nowadays from employers of the Norwood and Livesey type, and it is just well for workmen to consider what kind of freedom the dock-labourer used to possess in the good old days which Mr. Norwood so eloquently regrets. Here is Mr. Tillet's description to a reporter the other day:

"I know what our critics, and the employers, and those who rant about free labour, want to see down at the docks. They are anxious for the return of times such as I have seen at the London Docks in the past. There is a place at the London Docks called the cage—a sort of pen fenced off by iron railings. I have seen 300 half-starved dockers crowded round this cage, when perhaps a ganger would appear wanting three hands, and the awful struggle of those 300 famished wretches, fighting for that opportunity to get perhaps two or three hours' work, has left an impression upon me that can never be effaced. Why, I have actually seen them clambering over each other's backs to reach the coveted ticket. I once saw a man's ear torn off in the struggle, and I have frequently seen men emerge, bleeding and breathless, with their clothes pretty well torn off their backs. I think if some of the critics who talk so glibly about free labour had seen the sights I have, they would not complain so much of our new departure."

We must remember that the shipowners of this "free country" have formed a federation with a capital of £100,000,000 for the benevolent purpose of reducing the dock and other labourers into their old misery, by which they would be forced into a mad struggle for such a miserable existence as starvation wages would give them. Now, the poorer English workers have been fighting for nearly two years to improve their position by peaceful combination, and now a robber gang is threatening to do their best to hurl them back into slavery and starvation. These scoundrels are not alone content with the power of their combination, they talk openly and boast of crushing the new union by shooting the unionists "down like dogs." Troops alone are not enough for this purpose—these capitalists are beginning to feel doubtful about the troops now—so they must have their gangs of hired assassins, their Pinkertons, to murder the rebels against their law and authority. Well, let them begin the shooting. Within a minute after the first shot has been fired the carcasses of deceased Pinkertons in the neighbourhood of the docks would be as common as dead flies in November; and even some members of the "Shipping Federation" might find out that the lamp-post would form as good a gallows for the robbers and assassins of the capitalist classes, as ever it did for their progenitors, the Foulons and Berthiers of old feudal France.

Gladstone and Scamped Work.

Old Gladstone the other day took to lecturing the working-man. This has become quite an amiable weakness on his part recently, and he usually succeeds in demonstrating how completely ignorant he is of all questions relating to labour. In course of his remarks he accused workmen of scamping their work out of sheer idleness and carelessness. Mr. Davis, the secretary of the Brass-workers, has given the Grand Old Sham a rap over the knuckles, and has proved conclusively that it is the employers' love of cheap and shoddy goods, which correspond in many particulars to most middle-class politicians, and not the desire of the workman to scamp his work, which causes so many trashy articles to be thrown on the market nowadays. Here is Mr. Davis's statement. He begins by quoting Gladstone's, which runs as follows:

"It was bad altogether, and they were speaking of the working man. In this case it was bad, first because it was a fraud on his employer, and secondly because it was a fraud on himself. In the long run the interest of the working man was to do his work in the best manner; not to do it so that it would pass possibly a cursory and hasty inspection, but so that it should be done as well as the nature of the case permitted."

"The case thus stated gives colour to the fallacy that the individual mechanic is responsible for scamped work. Now from an extensive, intimate, and practical knowledge of the inner workings of our manufacturing system, and from general representations made to me from a variety of sources, I do not hesitate to say that the opposite can be demonstrated by a statement of facts. It will be well to give one or two illustrations of our desire to maintain England's commercial supremacy by producing an honest article. In 1882 Mr. Birtwistle and myself were appointed to represent the Trade Union Parliamentary Committee at the Co-operative Congress held at Oxford on behalf of the Lancashire operatives. The deputation called attention to the over-sizing of cotton goods by industrial co-operative concerns as well as by private traders. The system was denounced as a fraud on the public, and by the application of certain chemical ingredients in the process of manufacture a danger to the health and longevity of the workers. More recently still, when acting as one of her majesty's inspectors of factories at Sheffield, I had the opportunity of witnessing the working men of that town putting forth an almost unanimous effort to bring about the enactment of the present Merchandise Marks Act. The opposition to the proposed legislation came from the manufacturers and the Cutlers' Company and Chamber of Commerce, doing all they could to frustrate the intentions of the trade unionists. The object of the Act is, as you well know, to prevent commercial fraud by protecting the genuine article from the eyeable counterfeit."

"Only the other month some of the hatters of London struck against being compelled to put best silk on common shapes, the result being a discontinuance of the deception."

"The Trade Union Congress has year after year carried unanimously resolutions against fraud in manufacture in various industries, and Congress after Congress recommends Parliament to allow none but competent certificated engineers to be permitted to take charge of engines and boilers. The opposition to this latter proposal, it need hardly be said, emanates from the capitalists."

"I will now deal with how the shape, finish, and workmanship is taken away from hand labour by those who are ever lowering labour's dignity by debasing industry and marring and destroying the country's reputation for fair trading. . . . Well, sir, the way the standard of quality is pulled down is by manufacturers or their agents going to the workman and saying, 'I can have a large order for these' (producing a pattern) 'if you can reduce the price.' The artisan remonstrates. Then he is informed that the article is not required to be highly finished. The mechanic pleads that he has not been used to make bad work, and that he would prefer that all his work should be of good quality, but in vain. He is told that he must work to the wishes of the firm, or make room for those who will. Some of the smaller merchants, and I fear also some of the larger ones, are factors in bringing down hand labour to a low level. They not infrequently obtain large orders from samples supplied by reputable houses, and, wishing to obtain the greatest profit, take them to what are known as the 'slaughterhouses,' and accept the lowest tender. This is done to the injury of the firm who made the pattern, and who paid for the brains of the skilled designer and artisan to produce it, and depreciates the reputation of the district in which such goods are made."

"Mechanics all over Great Britain and Ireland know to their cost that bad workmanship means low wages, and low wages bad trade."

The Grand Old Sham returns a very lame reply; and it is to be hoped that in future he will not give vent to any more "good advice" to workmen without first ascertaining whether his advice is needed. N.

IN SOUTHERN AFRICA.

On Saturday night, August 23rd, news reached Cape Town that the "Pioneer Column" of the Chartered Company's force had been attacked by the Matabeles and slaughtered almost to a man—two natives were all that the rumour stated had escaped. The news caused a deal of excitement and distress, for many residents in Cape Town and district had friends with the column. The rumour, however, has since been officially contradicted, but there is not the slightest doubt but that the Matabeles are massing themselves at different points to resist the advance of the filibusters. It is a fact that, as I mentioned some time ago, the younger regiments of Matabeles are determined to resist any attempt of the Chartered Company to rob them of their birthright. Lobengula—the king—finds that the young warriors are dead against him for granting concessions to the Rhodes syndicate, and he, Lobengula, will be compelled to take the field against the Chartered Company, whether it is his wish or no. White European natives have yet something to learn from their coloured brothers in other lands. Many of the company's force have taken "French leave" already, and patrol parties are out in search of deserters. The company's police are keeping a matter of 150 miles or so from the "kraals" (or huts) of the Matabele regiments, lest a too sudden and near approach should end in their complete annihilation. The Daily Independent (Kimberly paper) states that the Chartered Company has already expended nearly a round million in the creation and equipment of their troops. And when one remembers that the "pioneer column" is provided with such civilising agencies as Gatling guns, electric search light for night attacks, and betwixt four and five hundred professional cut-throats all armed to the teeth, one begins to understand what wonderfully cute liars the Hon. Cecil and Messrs. Fife and Co. are. Were the "pioneer column" only composed of shareholders and directors, and other such like fry, then the cutting up of such a lot of vermin would be no great loss to the world at large.

Truly, the workers in the neighbouring colony of Natal have much to be thankful for. First they were taxed for the importation of Indian coolies for the use of sugar-planters and other capitalists. Then their wages are kept down indirectly by the presence of cheap labour and a low standard of living. Then, as if that were not enough to be thankful for, they are given by a considerate and careful Immigration Board an epidemic of cholera into the bargain. On the arrival at Durban (Natal) of the S.S. "Congella" eight deaths were reported from fish-poisoning, and a number of coolies were in hospital. Since then the following official proclamation has been published: "Under and by virtue of the provisions of the 11th section of the Public Health Act, 1883, his Excellency the Governor, with the advice of the Executive Council, hereby notifies that the port of Durban in the colony of Natal is infected with cholera."

A "Labour League" (which I take to be a fraud) has been formed in Durban, mainly for the purpose of bringing forward candidates in favour of "responsible government," and amongst others have nominated Sir John Robinson, Mr. Escombe, and a Mr. Greenacre.

Another thing which shows the stuff which this party is made of was a petition made by this body that a large number of coolies, Arabs, and natives be struck off the roll of voters. This the magistrate has done, but the natives were not to be squashed so easily. They appealed against the magistrate's ruling, and the Chief Justice upset the magistrate's decision and ordered them to be again placed on the voters' roll—a very questionable benefit.

As regards the "debris-washers," of whom I spoke in my last letter, the whole affair has turned out a farce all through. In short, it was a "put-up job" from the first. Those who have received licences from the De Beers Company are all fairly well off, not one really poverty-stricken case amongst the whole batch of so-called respectable and deserving licence-holders. And yet there are hundreds in Kimberly out of work at the present moment.

The Chamber of Mines (or masters, it comes to the same thing) announces that competent miners are required. I trust no one in England or elsewhere will be gulled by this announcement. There are plenty of miners in the country: why doesn't this Chamber try and be honest and plainly say that they want to reduce wages all round?

The same body has issued a circular to mine-managers, asking particulars as to native labour and prices paid, and calling for suggestions about effecting a reduction. Native labour on the gold-fields costs about £54,000 per year, and the Chamber of Mines, or masters, think that it could be easily reduced one-half. I wonder if the same body ever thinks of effecting a reduction of dividends, or of directors' salaries. JOS. BAIN.

For the 'Commonweal.'

A TRUTH OF BOTANY AS WELL AS OF SOCIALISM.—Neither conquering nations, nor earthquakes, nor fires, nor tempests, nor rain, nor all put together, have destroyed so many workers of man as have the roots of plants, which have all begun their work as slender fibres.

A SONG FROM QUEVEDO'S VISIONS.

(Written by Clio Rickman in 1784, and sung at the Anacreontic Societies of that day; and in America, where fifty thousand copies were circulated. See the Pope's Curse, or Bell, Book, and Candle; the Creed of St. Athanasius, and many other "sacred" denunciations.)

Air—"Liberty Hall."

WHEN Quevedo peep'd into the regions below,
He met with a Devil, a sort of a beau;
Who, scraping his hoof with a courtier-like grace,
Made offers of service to show him the place.

"Sir Devil, your servant," the stranger replied,
"Your offer's most kind, since the place is so wide;"
So, bowing politely, they set off together,
Like a couple of beaux in the park in fine weather.

Wide around the drear regions of Tartarus flamed,
Where Quevedo on all sides saw millions of damned,
Each profession pent up in a separate cell,
Which divided, like pews, the interior of hell.

Damned lawyers, damned courtiers, damned cowards, damned braves,
Damned counterfeit patriots, damned time-serving slaves, Damned bishops, damned cardinals, damned priests, and what not,
With red-letter saints, now in hell were red-hot.

Damned generals, who ravage mankind for ambition,
Damned prophets, who cheat the world into submission,
With founders of sects, sat a-warming their noses;
There were Peter, Mahomet, Paul, Aaron, and Moses.

Having viewed all these curious and terrible things,
"Be so good," says the stranger, "to show me your kings;
For fain would I know if these high-titled brothers
Are damned to a hell any hotter than others."

"The hottest of holes," says the fiend, "they are crammed in,
And a still ten-times worse they deserve to be damned in:
Take a peep through the key-hole, their kingships you'll see;
For, by Satan! their stink's too offensive for me."

Quevedo peeped in, and through sulphur and smoke
Espied certain monarchs, and instantly spoke—
"Sir Demon, I think, with submission to you, Though the world is so ancient, their numbers are few."

"But few!" quoth the demon; "why surely you rave;
Speak out, man, and tell me how many you'd have?
Without bate, or exception of climate or nation,
Here are all that have reigned ever since the creation."

Just on quitting these regions of sulphur and smoke,
To the demon, so civil, Quevedo thus spoke (For now they had reached of hell's boundary the door)—
"Among all these damned I see none of the poor."

"The poor," quoth the Devil; "you mean those on earth,
Who are slaves to their kind of rank, riches, and birth;
We have none such in hell"—grinning full in his face—
"For 'tis wealth and possessions that damn all your race!"

REPORTS.

SOUTH SIDE BRANCH.—Three meetings were held on behalf of above Branch, on Sunday, Sept. 21st, at Thornton Heath, Brighton Road, and Crown Hill, Croydon; speakers were Leggatt, Buckridge, Parker, Smith, and Miss Lupton. Good audiences, and 2s. 8d. collected and song-books sold. Much sympathy was expressed with Socialist views generally, and as to the police action in regard to Miss Lupton; speakers cordially invited to come again. At Crown Hill (in centre of Croydon slums) the police attempted to interfere, and stated loudly that they were not going to allow a meeting to be held; on comrade Leggatt asking "Why?" they stated in lordly fashion "They were not going to argue with such as him!" and yet, after this bombastic display, the meeting proceeded quite unhindered, speakers receiving quite an enthusiastic reception from the crowd.—E. LUPTON, Sec. pro tem.

ABERDEEN.—Socialism seems to be on the boom here. On Sunday, Sept. 14th, the hall was again well filled, when an article on "Russian Nihilism" was read and discussed. On Thursday night, the usual open-air meeting was addressed by comrades Duncan and Leatham, and comrade Watt of the Hammersmith Branch, who along with Mrs. Watt was visiting here. On Saturday night, W. Cooper, Aiken, and Leatham spoke to a large audience. Long after our meetings are over, groups are to be seen eagerly discussing the points that have been raised.—C.

TYRANNY AND ROBBERY IN THE ARMY.

THE greatest sign of the approach of the Social Revolution is the growing discontent in the whole army. This last three years a great deal of work has been done in educating the soldiers to understand their position. We have carried the red flag in front of the Guards marching from Chelsea Barracks; we have distributed pamphlets and leaflets; we have chatted with them in the barracks and canteens; and conversed with them on every possible occasion; and now we can rejoice in the fruits of our work.

Why does a man join the army? He has been thrown into the ranks of the unemployed, who are very great through the introduction of wage-saving machinery monopolised by a class for the benefit of that class; so the workers have no other alternative than to join the army if they would live. But why do we want an army? The means and instruments of production—viz., the land, mines, and machinery, and all the means of transit—being in the hands of the capitalist class, the army (and police) are required to keep the workers from taking their own property given to them by Nature. The capitalist requires protection whilst he robs the workers of their inheritance. The soldiers when they enlist have to swear they will shoot down their own kith and kin—spare not thy father nor thy mother, but do your duty, uphold those (the capitalist and landlord class) who rob the workers of the fruits of their toil. The young man walking through the streets in a starving condition, looking for work, sees the fly-papers on the wall outside the barracks or elsewhere, which are nothing but fraudulent misrepresentations, which the recruit finds out when caught by them. The poor fellow who, through insufficiency of food, has not the power to use his faculties, is easily caught by these lying statements of free kit and free rations. He is taken before a doctor for inspection (I cannot explain this as I should like on account of its indecency; fifty or upwards of men standing naked before several doctors is a thing which will shock the feelings of anyone). He passes the doctor, and is then taken to the quartermaster's stores, where he is served out with his kit, which consists of 1 tunic, 1 short jacket, 2 pairs trousers, 2 shirts, 3 pairs socks, 1 cap, 1 helmet, 2 pairs boots, 1 box blacking, 1 box brass ball, 1 hold-all complete, consisting of 1 knife and fork, 1 razor, 1 shaving-brush, 1 spoon, 1 button-stick, 1 comb, 1 pocket-knife, shoe, hair, and cloth brushes, 1 knapsack or valise, 1 great-coat. After this everything required by the soldier has to be purchased by him out of his miserable pay, except tunic, trousers, helmet, boots, and great-coat, and these have to be replaced if the nature of the duties are such as to wear them out before the time. He is then taken to the tailor's shop, where his clothes are marked for alterations. These alterations have to be paid for indirectly, for if the soldier does not tip the tailor the clothes never fit him, or they are made so tight in different parts that when he bends at drill he splits them; he is then put down for new trousers, etc., only receiving a penny per day until the clothing is paid for (oh, what jobbery!). He has to keep a double kit of small things, such as hold-all complete, brushes, etc., for kit inspection, for if he shows the knife and fork or spoon, brushes, etc., he uses, he is confined to barracks for two or three days and told he must get others. Cleaning articles, such as pipeclay brickdust, soft-soap, rubbers, sponges, etc., have to be found by the soldier out of his starvation wage, so that at the week's end the soldier finds he has not a sou to call his own. If he is a man, and has the spirit of a man, he rebels, and is placed under arrest, marched to the insanitary guard-room, to remain there under lock and key until the one who calls himself his superior calls him. The man is then sentenced to confinement to barracks with pack drill, or sent to the cells to be fed on bread and water, etc., for a period of seven days and upwards.

The barrack-room is void of comfort in the day, and at night is dangerous to the health of a soldier through the "tub" being used for all purposes. A sanitary arrangement fitted up with a good self-acting flusher would be far better than the "tub," but what do the classes care for the soldiers? There are plenty more men out of employment ready to sell themselves as food for powder and shot, and to keep up this present dastardly system of jobbery, robbery, and mismanagement. The food of a soldier is bad and insufficient. He is told by the recruiting officer that he will get 1 lb. of "ruti" (bread) and $\frac{3}{4}$ lb. of meat, beer, potatoes, "duff" (pudding or pie), etc. The poor recruit thinks he is to have a good feed every day, comes to the conclusion it is better than starving; he enters the service, dons the shoddy made clothing, becomes a soldier, and sits down to the dinner-table only to find he has about $\frac{1}{4}$ lb. of meat and an insufficiency of other things to satisfy him. He is sold; curses fall from his lips, but he is a soldier, and has to bear it. He does not dare to make a complaint to the officer when he comes round, for he would be spotted, and on some trifling pretext would be punished at the first opportunity.

When I was in Her Most Gracious Majesty's Royal Regiment of Artillery (Field Brigade) I saw recruits collecting hard stale crusts, the refuse of the officers' mess. They put them into a publican's can with water, boiled the mess on the fire, adding pepper and salt, and eating it, to satisfy the cravings of their stomachs. They called it "slingers," "ruti soup," and when mustard was added, "stingo harry." The ration of bread is not sufficient to make two meals. To make the most of this, the bread is broken; one half is put into the coffee; it swells up twice the size; the soldier fancies he has had a glorious feed. This is called "coffee cutlets."

This free ration statement is a lie. The soldier is starved unless he spends the whole of his pay in extra food. How would His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, Commanding Chief of the whole of the British Army, like to live on such food? He does not care. Even when the soldiers were on the field backing up the robbery of the plundering classes by murdering the poor Soudanese, they were not fed nor clothed as they should be. The soldiers, when marching across the sands of the desert, had no boots to their feet, and had to eat food that was unfit for human beings. The sick and wounded were not cared for; the surgical appliances and medicines, kept far in the rear, was of no service. Many a poor fellow drawn from the ranks of the workers was murdered through neglect. Were any of the officers who were responsible punished? Were they court-martialed, as the soldier would be for a frivolous neglect of duty? No; they belong to the classes, who murder and plunder, and the classes protected them.

But let us return home and look at the tyranny of the officers towards our brothers, from the hobble-de-hoys who wear their first stripe of promotion, to the commissioned officer whose only qualification is to bully, swear, and yell at the men because they do not please him. They place the young recruits in the guard-room, and then have him punished for something that does not please these tyrants fancy. Take the non-commissioned officer who is a man to the men, what is his life like? One continued round of hardship; pegged (made a prisoner) for the slightest offence. Pegged for the purpose of getting him reduced to put some fellow into his place who is senior, and who is a friend of some high official. I know of a case where a gunner in the Royal Artillery was made a sergeant before he had finished learning his elementary drill, or goose step, and this young stripling was the cause of an old soldier with four good conduct badges losing two of them. A man with 17 or 18 years' service finds it unbearable to be tyrannised over by these raw recruits. No wonder the discontent and mutiny in the army! To see an old soldier on the parade ground being inspected by a young officer just out of the cadet's school, who tells him he is dirty and does not know how to clean himself, who has to tip-toe (as the stripling we called "Shavo" did) to see if the man has shaved himself. This man confined a soldier to barracks for some days because he had not shaved the down off his face, and the young recruit had not shaved in his life. That does not matter, the soldier has to shave himself even if there is no hair to shave off. No wonder this officer ("Shavo") had a basin thrown from the barrack-room window at him when on his rounds at night inspecting the guards. There were also several attempts made on his life, and in the time of war many an officer will be shot by his own men through his past tyranny.

The soldiers must not act as men, they must submit themselves to all their governors, teachers, spiritual pastors, and masters, and order themselves lowly and reverently to all their betters. It is the soldiers place to do his duty. When he enlists he is told the first duty of a soldier is strict obedience ("Obedience is the first duty of a soldier!" is on his account book). He has orders to proceed to some eviction scene in Ireland, or to keep some Trade Unionists or Socialists down; or he is sent to some far-off land to slaughter Ashantees, Burmese, Zulus, and others. He is told to remember the words, "England (the capitalists and landlords) expects that every man this day will do his duty!"

Let the soldier consider that he belongs to the workers, and that it is his duty to fight for those to whom he belongs, for those who are robbed by the plundering classes of the fruits of their labour. It is not his duty to fight for a class who monopolise the means of life. Remember, soldiers! when the Revolution takes place do your duty, and do it well! Do not fire a shot on the people! Do not murder your own kindred! Do not let the voices of the fatherless children curse you as hired murderers! Do your duty! J. J. CHAPMAN.

NEWS FROM NOWHERE:

OR,

AN EPOCH OF REST.

BEING SOME CHAPTERS FROM A UTOPIAN ROMANCE.

CHAP. XXX.—THE FEAST'S BEGINNING—THE END.

DICK brought me at once into the little field which, as I had seen from the garden, was covered with gaily-coloured tents arranged in orderly lanes, about which were sitting and lying on the grass some fifty or sixty men, women, and children, all of them in the height of good temper and enjoyment—with their holiday mood on, so to say.

"You are thinking that we don't make a great show as to numbers," said Dick; "but you must remember that we shall have more to-morrow; because in this haymaking work there is room for a great many people who are not over-skilled in country matters: and there are many who lead sedentary lives, whom it would be unkind to deprive of their pleasure in the hayfield—scientific men and close students generally; so that the skilled workmen, outside those who are wanted as mowers and foremen of the haymaking stand aside, and take a little downright rest, which you know is good for them, whether they like it or not: or else they go to other countrysides, as I am doing here. You see, the scientific men and historians and students generally will not be wanted till we are fairly in the midst of the tedding, which of course will not be till the day after to-morrow." With that he brought me out of the little field on to a kind of causeway above the riverside meadow, and thence turning to the left on to a path through the mowing grass, which was thick and very tall, led on till we came to the river above the weir and its mill. There we had a delightful swim in the broad piece of water above the weir, where the river looked much bigger than its natural size from its being dammed up by the weir.

"Now we are in a fit mood for dinner," said Dick, when we had dressed and were going through the grass again; "and certainly of all the cheerful meals in the year, this one of haysel is the cheerfulest; not even excepting the corn-harvest feast; for then the year is beginning to fail, and one cannot help having a feeling behind all the gaiety of the coming of the dark days and the shorn fields and empty gardens; and the spring is almost too far off to look forward to. It is, then, in the autumn when one almost believes in death."

"How strangely you talk," said I, "of such a constantly recurring and consequently commonplace matter as the sequence of the seasons." And indeed these people were like children about such things, and had what seemed to me a quite exaggerated interest in the weather, a fine day, a dark night or a brilliant one, and the like.

"Strangely?" said he. "Is it strange to sympathise with the year and its gains and losses?"

"At any rate," said I, "if you look upon the course of the year as a beautiful and interesting drama, which is what I think you do, you should be as much pleased and interested with the winter and its trouble and pain as with this wonderful summer luxury."

"And am I not?" said Dick, rather warmly; "only I can't look upon it as if I were sitting in a theatre seeing the play going on before me, myself taking no part of it. It is difficult," said he, smiling good-humouredly, "for a non-literary man like me to explain myself properly, like that dear girl Ellen would; but I mean that I am part of it all, and feel the pain as well as the pleasure in my own person. It is not done for me by somebody else, merely that I may eat and drink and sleep; but I myself do my share of it."

In his way also, as Ellen in hers, I could see that Dick had that passionate love of the earth which was common to but few people at least, in the days I knew; in which the prevailing feeling amongst intellectual persons was a kind of sour distaste for the changing drama of the year, for the life of earth and its dealings with men. Indeed, in those days it was thought poetic and imaginative to look upon life as a thing to be borne rather than enjoyed.

So I mused till Dick's laugh brought me back into the Oxfordshire hayfields. "One thing seems strange to me," said he—"that I must needs trouble myself about the winter and its scantiness in the midst of the summer abundance. If it hadn't happened to me before, I should have thought it was your doing, guest; that you had thrown a kind of evil charm over me. Now, you know," said he, suddenly, "that's only a joke, so you mustn't take it to heart."

"All right," said I; "I don't." Yet I did feel somewhat uneasy at his words, after all.

We crossed the causeway this time, and did not turn back to the house, but went along a path beside a field of wheat now almost ready to blossom. I said: "We do not dine in the house or garden, then?—as indeed I did not expect to do. Where do we meet, then? for I can see that the houses are mostly very small."

"Yes," said Dick, "you are right, they are small in this country-side: there are so many good old houses left, that people dwell a good deal in such small detached houses. As to our dinner, we are going to have our feast in the church. I wish, for your sake, it were as big and handsome as that of the old Roman town to the west, or the forest town to the north;¹ but, however, it will hold us all; and though it is a little thing, it is beautiful in its way."

This was somewhat new to me, this dinner in a church; but I said nothing, and presently we came out into the road which ran through the village. Dick looked up and down it, and seeing only two straggling groups before us, said: "It seems as if we must be somewhat late; they are all gone on; and they will be sure to make a point of waiting for you, as the guest of guests, since you come from so far."

He hastened as he spoke, and I kept up with him, and presently we came to a little avenue of lime-trees which led us straight to the church porch, from whose open door came the sound of cheerful voices and laughter and varied merriment.

"Yes," said Dick, "it's the coolest place for one thing, this hot evening. Come along; they will be glad to see you."

Indeed, in spite of my bath, I felt the weather more sultry and oppressive than on any day of our journey yet.

We went into the church, which was a simple little building with one little aisle divided from the nave by three round arches, a chancel, and a rather roomy transept for so small a building, the windows mostly of the graceful Oxfordshire fourteenth century type. There was no modern architectural decoration in it; it looked, indeed, as if none had been attempted since the Puritans whitewashed the mediaeval saints and histories on the wall. It was, however, gaily dressed up for this latter-day festival, with festoons of flowers from arch to arch, and great pitchers of flowers standing about on the floor; while under the west window hung two cross scythes, their blades polished white, and gleaming from out of the flowers that wreathed them. But its best ornament was the crowd of handsome, happy-looking men and women that were set down to table, and who, with their bright faces and rich hair over their gay holiday raiment, looked, as the Persian poet puts it, like a bed of tulips in the sun. Though the church was a small one, there was plenty of room; for a small church makes a bigish house; and on this evening there was no need to set cross tables along the transepts; though doubtless these would be wanted next day, when the learned men of whom Dick had been speaking should be come to take their more humble part in the haymaking.

I stood on the threshold with the expectant smile on my face of a man who is going to take part in a festivity which he is really prepared to enjoy. Dick standing by me was looking round the company with something of an air of proprietorship in them, I thought. Opposite me sat Clara and Ellen, with Dick's place open between them: they were smiling, but their beautiful faces were each turned towards the neighbours on each side, who were talking to them, and they did not seem to see me. I turned to Dick, expecting him to lead me forward, and he turned his face to me; but strange to say, though it was as cheerful and smiling as ever, it made no response to my glance—nay, he seemed to take no heed at all of my presence, and I noticed that none of the company looked at me. A pang shot through me, as of some disaster long expected and suddenly realised. Dick moved on a little without a word to me. I was not three yards from the two women who, though they had been my companions for such a short time, had really, as I thought, become my friends. Clara's face was turned full upon me now, but she also did not seem to see me, though I know I was trying to catch her eye with an appealing look. I turned to Ellen, and she did seem to recognise me for an instant; but her bright face turned sad directly, and she shook her head with a mournful look, and the next moment all consciousness of my presence had faded from her face.

I felt lonely and sick at heart past the power of words to describe. I hung about a minute longer, and then turned and went out of the porch again and through the lime-avenue into the road, while the blackbirds sang their strongest from the bushes about me in the hot June evening.

Once more without any conscious effort of will I turned my face toward the old house by the ford, but as I turned round the corner which led to the remains of the village cross, I came upon a figure strangely contrasting with the joyous, beautiful people I had left behind in the church. It was a man who looked old, but whom I knew from habit, now half-forgotten, was not really much more than fifty. His face was rugged, and grimed rather than dirty; his eyes dull and bleared; his body bent, his calves thin and spindly, his feet dragging and limping. His clothing was a mixture of dirt and rags long over-familiar to me. As I passed him he touched his hat with some real good-will and courtesy, and much servility.

Inexpressibly shocked, I hurried past him and hastened along the road that led to the river and the lower end of the village; but suddenly I saw as it were a black cloud rolling along to meet me, like a nightmare of my childish days; and for a while I was conscious of nothing else than being in the dark, and whether I was walking, or sitting, or lying down, I could not tell.

* * * * *

I lay in my bed in my house at dingy Hammersmith thinking about it all; and trying to consider if I was overwhelmed with despair at finding I had been dreaming a dream.

Or indeed was it a dream? If so, why was I so conscious all along that I was really seeing all that new life from the outside, still wrapped up in the prejudices, the anxieties, the distrust of this time of doubt and struggle?

All along, though those friends were so real to me, I had been feeling as if I had no business amongst them; as though the time would come when they would reject me, and say, as Ellen's last mournful look seemed to say, "No, it will not do; you cannot be of us; you belong so entirely to the unhappiness of the past that our happiness even would weary you. Go back again, now you have seen us, and your outward eyes have learned that in spite of all the infallible maxims of your day there is yet a time of rest in store for the world, when mastery has changed into fellowship—but not before. Go back again, then, and while you live you will see all round you people engaged in making others live lives which are not their own, while they themselves care nothing for their own real lives—men who hate life though they fear death. Go back, and be the happier for having seen us, for having added a little hope to your struggle. Go on living while you may, striving, with whatsoever pain and labour needs must be, to build up little by little the new day of fellowship, and rest, and happiness."

Yes, surely! and if others can see it as I have seen it, then it may be called a vision rather than a dream.

THE END.

LITERARY NOTES.

'Igdrasil' for October,—the first number of a new volume—(Price 6d., London: Geo. Allen, 8, Bell Yard, Temple Bar, W.C.), will contain inter alia a powerful poem dealing with the social question, entitled, "Poor People's Christmas," by the Hon. Roden Noel; "Ruskiniana": Letters dealing with the Irish Question; and "The Last Laird of Monkbarns and his Bequest to the Nation," by W. Marwick, accompanied by illustrations. The Handbook of the Reading Guild for 1890-91 can be had from the publisher, price 3d. post free.

'New Amazonia,' by Mrs. George Corbett, is a sketch of a new state of Society wherein women enjoy the amplest rights, including the choice of finely developed and intelligent servants of their own sex, a Domestic Aid Agency seeming to be the great institution in this "foretaste of the future."

Our comrade P. Argyriades announces that he is about to issue a revolutionary almanack, entitled, 'Almanach de la Question Sociale.' This almanack will contain notices of all the Socialist parties in various countries, interesting statistics, articles on scientific Socialism, and various economic subjects, with poetry by Louise Michel and Eugene Pottier, also the celebrated case of the woman Soubain, who, driven by misery, has strangled her five children; finally, a catalogue of Socialist journals and reviews. Post free, 1 franc 25 cents. for France, and 1 franc 50 cents. for England and other countries. Subscriptions should be sent to P. Argyriades, 5, Bouboard, Saint Michel, Paris. All subscribers will receive with the almanack an interesting pamphlet on the Socialist poet, Eugene Pottier.

'Fabian Essays on Socialism.' Walter Scott, 24, Warwick Lane. Cheap Edition, price 1s. The 'Fabian Essays' have already been reviewed in the Commonweal, and it only remains for us to note that this cheap edition is really cheap. It is well printed and well written from a Fabian point of view. It is also nicely bound in a paper cover, which is decorated with a cartoon by Walter Crane, representing a capitalist up a tree and two workmen trying to pull him down. The design has more physical force about it than a judicious Fabian would appreciate, as the capitalist is provided with two revolvers, and the workers with two agricultural implements, an axe and a spade, which we fear they may put to a use very dangerous to the capitalist if he comes any of his nonsense with those revolvers. The axe will probably split his head open, and the spade will decently bury him. If the Fabians go on in this style Sir Edward Bradford will be arresting Sydney Webb as a dangerous character.

London Members' Meeting.—The next monthly meeting of members will be held on Wednesday, October 8th, at 8.30 p.m., at the Hall of the 'Commonweal' Branch, 24, Great Queen Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C. All members invited to attend.

SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—EDINBURGH—Labour Hall, 50 South Bridge. Business meeting Fridays at 8 p.m. Sunday, October 5th, at 6.30, McDonald (Fabian Society), "Socialism Defined and Defended." LEITH—Henderson Street Hall, Sundays, at 6.30.—Secretary, W. D. Tait, 20 Dundee Street.

THE LABOUR WAR IN AUSTRALIA.

THE great Labour Battle which is being fought out in Australia is at once one of the most interesting and most momentous of all the struggles that have lately taken place between Labour and its oppressors. When the opposing classes are face to face all over a whole continent at once, we who are only accustomed to embroiling a town or so at a time have to look on with admiration, almost with wonder. And when it is seen that the question at issue is not in the least one of an advance or reduction in wages, or any other trumpery palliative, but is a bitter fight over the cardinal principle, the right to combine—when it is seen that the labour-class of a continent are defending desperately their very existence, there is a feeling of awe as well as of absorbing interest.

Readers of the Weal will remember the Jondaryan squatters, who tried their strength against that of organised labour, and were beaten before the battle had fairly begun. That defeat enraged and roused Australian monopolists; it showed them that in order to maintain and preserve their supremacy they must make a final stand against the "encroachments" of Labour.

The "pastoralists," wool-growing landlords, the squatter aristocracy of Australia, were the sorest of all. Before the Shearers' Union began its work they had been able to "do what they liked with their own" and with other people's too. But although they fought the union long and bitterly, they could not prevail against it in fair fighting. So they made up their minds to circumvent it and smash it up.

They began to pay 10 per cent. over the union rate (22s. instead of £1 per 100 sheep), and do other benevolent things to those who would swear off the union. This was done in order to demoralise and divide the union ranks, and so prepare for a smashing blow later on. But if the monopolists were far-seeing enough to think out this plan of attack, the men were awake enough to see what was meant and to meet it half-way.

The Shearer's Union insisted on the definite acceptance of its rules by the employers in all cases. Admitting fully in most cases that these rules are fair and just, the pastoralists have yet refused to accede to them, making a point of principle of their "freedom of contract" in each individual case. Here was war at once.

To support the principles of labour organisation all the various unions which had to do with the handling of wool in preparation, storage, or transit, gave notice to the warehouseman, railway, dock, and shipping companies that they would not handle non-union wool. Preparations were made for a strict boycott upon all blackleg wool, and on the other hand tremendous efforts were made by the bosses to scrape together enough blacklegs to carry on the work.

Meanwhile, the Marine Officers' Association had been coming into collision with the shipping companies over the same question—the right of combination. Following the example set them by the seamen, the officers had been organising on ordinary union lines, and were taking up their position as part of the Labour army. Alarmed at the approach to solidarity between officers and men, the owners tried to get up a bogus sort of association, apparently something like that which the Lemon-Peters gang have been trying at here, and attempted to force the officers into it. But the officers knew better than to bind themselves hand and foot in the hands of their employers, preferring to cast in their lot with the general body of organised labour. The owners would hear of nothing until the officers renounced their organisation, and the officers were equally determined to have their union recognised and get what they had asked for besides.

What between the shearers and the marine officers, and those who were backing them up, the battle spread to the Wharf-labourers, Seamen and Firemen, Carriers, Trolly and Dray Men, Cooks and Stewards, Railway-men, Coal-lumpers, General Labourers, and in fact to pretty nearly the whole strength of Australian organised labour.

The possessing classes presented an almost equally united front; and there was the position, as plainly as it ever has been in the labour struggle, with a clear definite issue, and a strong determination on either side to fight the matter out to the bitter end.

Both sides announce that they mean to make the struggle a decisive one; it will be a fierce one while it lasts, and whichever side wins will follow up the advantage with relentless vigour. On the side of the men there is much more at stake than even the principle of unionism: they openly avow that they are defending their organisations, and will do so to the death, because they intend them to be the component parts of a vast federation of labour which shall enable the working classes of Australasia to move as one man when the time comes to exert their strength. And they say, further, that the ameliorations they from time to time demand are not merely to meet the needs of the passing moment, but are preparations for a greater struggle than is even now taking place—one that will end all strikes and labour troubles for ever and inaugurate the new era.

It is hardly necessary to warn Commonweal readers that almost every line is a lie in the ordinary press telegrams. The letters that reach us from trusted men put quite another face on the matter from that which the venal newsmongers endeavour to present. We would say, believe only half of what you read, and have a good deal of doubt about even that. And, above all, don't forget that this is a really revolutionary struggle in the true sense of the word, and one that must command the help and sympathy of Socialists everywhere. HOODLUM.

THE UNEMPLOYED OF 1890.

ON Monday afternoon at 3 o'clock a large meeting of the unemployed took place near the Marble Arch, Hyde Park, at which several well-known speakers spoke on behalf of the unemployed, and the following resolutions were carried unanimously:

1st. It was resolved that a meeting of the unemployed be held on Saturday, October 4th, at 2 o'clock, on the steps of the Royal Exchange, thence to the Tower; after that a series of meetings will be held in different prominent places in the East and West End of London, with the object of calling together thousands of the unemployed and to compel the various authorities to adopt measures for their employment.

2nd. That we, the unemployed, propose that a deputation of the unemployed should wait upon the Executive Council of the South Side Labour Protection League, Dockers' Union, and other large trade unions, to lay before them the question of the unemployed, and ask them to take action in forcing the local bodies to start municipal workshops and factories for the unemployed, and by that means preventing blacklegs from working against trade-unionism.

HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON

The COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. HOW THE POOR ARE "RELIEVED."

THE news has been going the round of the capitalist papers that "the figures as to the poor relief in England and Wales during the first half of 1890 are said to be encouraging, since they show that pauperism is decreasing rather than increasing. The expenditure is smaller than in ten out of twelve of the preceding half-years, and there was a decrease in 36 out of the 44 union counties. The largest increase was in Essex, and amounted only to 4 per cent." When this is read in the light of a case that came before the Stirling Sheriff Court on Sept. 2nd, it suggests unspeakable cruelty and brazen hypocrisy. That the relief of the poor has decreased is no proof against the fact that poverty has increased. The poor we have still with us in increasing numbers and privation, and however big-bellied, church-going, handsome-salaried superintendents of poor funds may try to cover up the fact with the aid of mock philanthropic religious "adopters" of orphans, the cruel crime of their decreasing figures will not be hid. The Stirling case is a fair sample of hundreds that help to keep down the figures of poor relief, and which demonstrate that the only relief for the poor in our present society is in Death or Revolution.

Mary Wright is the wife of an innkeeper at Buchlyvie. There is a great deal of hard work about an inn to keep all things clean, and the profits of the inn will sometimes not afford to pay for that work after rent, taxes, etc., are handed over to provide a livelihood for others who are above living off the sale of drink. The people who live by fleecing the publican's profits, are generally those who for political reasons load the publican with the drink excesses, which are the outcome of inherited results of overwork and underfeeding. The primary cause of Mrs. Wright's crime is not to be found in Mrs. Wright, but in the social system that produced her and her environments. Mrs. Wright, with a just appreciation of how profits are made, thought it would not be wrong to become the proud possessor of a slave who would do the work with the least possible expenditure. The poor relief authorities helped Mrs. Wright to that by relieving themselves of the cost of the keep of poor wee Agnes Campbell. By such means the figures of poor relief are made encouraging news to capitalists and church goers, who have to listen at times to Matthew xxv., 45. Agnes Campbell is nine years of age, diminutive (no wonder) but intelligent, and she lived with the accused first in England and afterwards in Balfroon. She had to wash and shine dishes and pans, sweep and scrub the floors, was not sent to school, and was only allowed out to the back to brush the boots. She was kept so close indoors that the neighbours did not know there was a child in the Endrick Inn. She was not provided with a bed—that would cost money, and Mrs. Wright could not give the money to her betters and also to Agnes—and so she slept on a piece of canvas on the floor. She had to go without food—that costs money also and the laird needs it—and had to put up with thrashings with a walking stick, or straps, or kicks, in order that she might not grow too proud for her station in life.

Owing to such treatment poor Agnes made up her mind to become a revolutionist in her own small way. So on Sunday, August 3rd, when her philanthropic adopters and reducers of the figures of the poor relief—Mr. Thomas and Mrs. Mary Wright—were at church (it wins the minister to your side when you attend church), poor Agnes was locked in an upper room feeling weary, sore, and hungry. Chattel slavery, as cruel as any that ever existed in the Southern States of America, exists still in Britain with the aid of our poor relief authorities, notwithstanding our bellowings of "Rule Britannia." Poor Agnes, in pursuance of her revolutionary idea, took a rope which lay on the floor of her prison and fastened it to a chair and lowered herself from the window to the ground. This revolutionary act exasperated her slave-drivers, but although it was the cause of some personal suffering, it brought on the crisis which promises to bring relief to the revolutionist.

Let it be noted that however small and weak, and limited in resources one may be, there is always improvement to be got behind rebellion to tyranny. "Rebellion to tyrants is obedience to God." Rebellion troubles the waters of the pool and imparts healing for the ills our economical professors pronounce to be incurable. Rebellion works miracles of healing to the overburdened and hopeless. When things are at the worst it is well to try something desperate. Poor Agnes Campbell's exploiters, like all other exploiters of human lives, resented her attempts to better herself. But the truth came out at last, and at the trial which followed Mrs. Bennet swore to having examined the child's body and found "her shoulders to be black and blue and covered with wales. Her dress consisted of a dirty ragged frock, and a chemise which witness could compare to nothing but a duster." Dr. McCandlish described the filthy condition the child was in and the bruises on her body, which he said "were very severe." All these are bare unadorned facts, sworn to in court, and found clearly proven by the sheriff, who, in sentencing Mrs. Wright to thirty days without the option of a fine, said "that this girl was used as a drudge, underfed, and assaulted in a manner that was cruel and disgraceful."

Now for the sequel, which shows the direct interest the poor relief authorities have in such treatment, and the light it throws on the decrease of poor relief figures. Mrs. Wright had one witness to stand by her. He was not sent to prison. He was Mr. W. Grimmond, superintendent of children for the city parish of Glasgow. This man swore "he had every reason to believe she [Agnes] was well treated." His reasons were based on the admissions drawn from him in further examination "that though the Parochial Board got intimation on the 4th August—the day after Agnes's revolt—of the condition the child was in, no reply was sent or enquiry made." It is very easy to show an encouraging balance if no notice be taken of one's liabilities. In this manner the figures of our poor relief are kept down and reduced in face of the increasing poverty and distress that press the workers under. When the workers consider and understand what it means, that for every pound paid by them towards the relief of the poor only about 2s. actually reaches the poor, they will try to prevent the parochial guardians of their orphans pocketing so much for rendering such services as they did to poor Agnes Campbell. In paying poor rates the workers are not only supplying salaries to these useless and un-needed darlings and friends of the classes; they are also helping to protect the profit-mongers, who exploit human lives, from the just vengeance of their victims. Out of the mouths of babes cometh wisdom, and the sad experience, and the revolt and escape of Agnes Campbell speak eloquently to the workers who have eyes to see and ears to hear. Her case is just a miniature of Labour's treatment.

GEORGE McLEAN.

If it were possible that a people brought up under an intolerant and arbitrary system could subvert that system without acts of cruelty and folly half the objections to despotic power would be removed. We should, in that case, be compelled to acknowledge that it at least produces no pernicious effects on the intellectual and moral character of a people. We deplore the outrages which accompany revolutions. But the more violent the outrages, the more assured we feel that a revolution was necessary. The violence of those outrages will always be proportioned to the ferocity and ignorance of the people: and the ferocity and ignorance of the people will be proportioned to the oppression and degradation under which they have been accustomed to live. Thus it was in our civil war. The rulers in the Church and State reaped only that which they had sown. They had prohibited free discussion; they had done their best to keep the people unacquainted with their duties and their rights. The retribution was just and natural. If they suffered from popular ignorance, it was because they had themselves taken away the key of knowledge. If they were assailed with blind fury, it was because they had exacted an equally blind submission.—Macaulay: 'Milton.'

NOTES ON NEWS.

MY remarks about the Southampton Strike are treated by the People's Press, the journal of New Unionism, in what doubtless the editors think to be a humorous vein. It is a fearfully laboured attempt to be funny, and could be passed over without comment but for the deliberate lie contained in the note immediately above it.

Therein the anonymous writer states that I bolted when McCarthy approached. As a matter of fact I simply desisted from speaking in order first not to divide the audience, and secondly to hear the result of McCarthy's "mission," and so far from bolting was amongst the hearers who listened to the tale of his failure to obtain a hearing from the dock authorities.

If the editors of the People's Press like to meet adverse criticism of their pet leaders with ridicule instead of serious answer, that is their business, but as "New Journalists" they might at least be truthful, and abstain from making their sheet a vehicle for anonymous slander.

New Journalism like New Unionism is supposed to be a grand departure from old methods. Why do not the working-class readers of the Labour Press insist upon signed articles? The mysterious "we" could no longer then be used to hide the personality of some parasitical penny-a-liner or literary dead-beat.

It is an ill wind that blows nobody any good. The New Unionism is a god-send to a host of impecunious ink-slingers and hungry paragraph mongers, superior persons with severely correct pronunciation and credit suits, who but for the advent of the New Unions might have gravitated to the Older Unions under the Poor Law.

The Registrations now taking place are instructive as showing the absurdities of Parliamentarianism. In one place an official is charged with putting the names of 2,000 unqualified persons upon the register. In another a dead man is registered as eligible to vote. Smart limbs of the law, representing the political Ins and Outs, seek under every pretext to disfranchise as many as possible of their opponent's friends. The would-be voter is metaphorically used as a shuttle-cock between the battledores of contending lawyers. A Registration Court would be a good place to harden Revolutionary Socialists in their principles.

F. K.

The great glove-fight is not a subject that I love, but it is the most prominent topic of public interest during the present week, judging from the prominence given to it on the newspaper bills. This is a Christian country, a civilised country, and yet gentlemen of the middle and upper classes pay thirteen guineas for seven minutes' "sport," to see two beefy brutes pound each other into jelly. It would take a skilled artizan seven weeks to earn the money spent by a labour robber for his "amusement." Yet Christian divines talk of the blessings of Christianity. This glorious creed has swept away the brutal sports of the Roman arena. Indeed, but does not the modern "masher" greatly resemble the effeminate Roman dandy who gazed in wondering delight on the huge muscles of the gladiator, or shrieked with joy to see blood redden the circus sands? The records of the divorce court and Cleveland Street show that the modern masher resembles the Roman dandy in more ways than one.

Mr. John Morley nearly had his head smashed by a policeman's truncheon in Ireland a few days ago. We wish his head had been smashed. Perhaps then he and other middle class politicians would feel more sympathy with unemployed workmen who will probably go through a similar experience at the hands of "our admirable police" this winter.

N.

We who are in revolt against the loathsome society of to-day, founded as it is upon force and fraud, have no prejudices against so-called "criminals," but rather always commiseration for them, sometimes sympathy with them. Such a man as Wright, the "Hoxton burglar," appears to be, excites a feeling of admiration in every real revolutionist. Not for the first time this brave convict made a determined onslaught on one of the uniformed scoundrels told off as taskmasters to the wretched slaves undergoing what is known as "penal servitude." Probably he would have rid the world of at least one defender of "law and order," if (for the sake, doubtless, of ingratiating themselves with the authorities) some of his fellow convicts had not proved themselves dastardly hounds and come to the "warder's" rescue.

The Government have been afraid to bring Wright to trial in open court, although his "offence" clearly amounted to "attempt to murder." He has been dealt with in secret by some "visiting justices" or "prison commissioners" or other privy torture-dealers, and sentenced apparently (amongst other things) to a succession of cruel floggings. At any rate, the capitalist journals announce with ferocious glee that he has received a "first instalment" of three dozen lashes! The official report describes him as "cowed"—a palpable lie, since in the same breath the bureaucratic scribe adds that "his demeanour is as desperate as ever, and he states that he is determined to have revenge, and would rather be hanged than endure penal servitude." Probably the very damned hypocrites who order the infliction of these punishments upon a fellow human being are among the first to denounce similar atrocities in Siberia.

IN EAST KENT.

PROPAGANDA is having a good result amongst the hop-pickers, who are pretty plentiful round about here just now, but it can only be carried on group by group, the plantations being scattered over such wide areas. There will be, say next season, a good opportunity for a handful of organisers to go from plantation to plantation and work with, and make the acquaintance of the pickers themselves, and judging from the readiness with which they have received what little propaganda has been given to them during the past fortnight, I am certain that a thoroughly successful campaign could be carried out without the slightest difficulty. At ripening-time, hops are the most capricious crops imaginable; every day adds to their value or to their detriment. The pickers know this, and if they could only be kept in touch with one another by the organisers, and strike work all together when there were signs in the air that a day's delay with the picking would mean the ruin of the whole crop (these signs occur at least once during picking-time), they would obtain double wages at the first time of asking.

Last Wednesday week, about 400 men, women, and children, employed by a Mr. T. Phillips at Offham to pick his hops, came out on strike and returned a few hours afterwards, having obtained their demand that a shilling be paid for picking four bushels instead of a shilling for six bushels as heretofore. This strike also resulted beneficially to some of the neighbouring groups of pickers, their employers giving them the same terms sooner than the gathering should be delayed. The pickers are frequently swindled most unmercifully in the measuring. The measure has a ring fixed a certain height inside, and the hops are shovelled in and shaken level until they reach this ring. This quantity represents a bushel, and is put to the picker's credit; but in nine cases out of ten the employer, by means of unfair measures and false entries, manages to obtain about nine gallons to the bushel.

One affair in particular happened a fortnight ago at a place known as Mercer's Farm, where the perpetrator, who is the employer himself and a leader of the local Y.M.C.A., had unobserved, and with a craftiness peculiar to his sect, raised the ring in the measure to such a height that ten gallons instead of eight were required to reach it, hoping by these means to get two gallons picked for nothing. The trick was discovered early in the day, and the Christian cheat narrowly escaped a severe beating.

A family of six can earn, provided the weather be fine, barely 1s. 9d. a-day, which will just keep them in food and provide a little tobacco and beer besides; but as often as not the pickers return to their "homes" with only a few coppers in their pockets; indeed, last year many of them had to foot it back, begging their keep on the road.

But by far the most outrageous feature of the hop-picking season is the dwellings with which the employers provide these people. There is no accommodation for them in the neighbouring villages, so they are bound to use them. They have no choice. One place, called St. Leonard's Street, is a fair sample. It is a low building but 6 ft. high, and covered with a low-pitched roof and making three sides of a square. It is divided into seven or eight chambers, with a door to each, which opens into the piece of open ground inside the square, where all the cooking, washing, etc., must be done. There is no room for such matters inside the building, for as soon as one rises in the morning, outside he or she must go to give room for the others to get up. The crowding inside is simply incredible. I saw myself in one of the rooms, 14 ft. by 9 ft., twenty-seven persons! and in another room, 10 ft. by 8 ft., 23 persons! Men and women, married and otherwise, lads, girls, and infants all crowded together—at bed-time! The men wait outside until the women undress, and then slip in to find their own places in the dark. They sleep upon straw spread on top of low stacks of faggots; the things are suggestive of auto da fé. Naturally the air inside at night-time is fearfully heated and close.

In this particular case the employers are two wealthy ladies, who are regular attendants at the parish church, and who find time to comfort their victims on Sunday afternoons with a gratuitous distribution of tracts washed down by a short sermon on the blessings of honest poverty. After the "divine service" on the Sunday afternoon we were present, a collection of 1s. 5d. was made, but not for the Gospel as preached by these two wealthy ladies.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

War to the Knife.

Although the present time is a period of comparative quiet, yet it is evident that serious events are impending. Mr. J. H. Wilson, the secretary of the Seamen's and Firemen's Union, has issued a circular, in which he warns the men. He says, speaking of the Shipowners' Federation:

"I have private information of the tactics they intend to adopt. They intend to promote conflicts in as many ports as possible, and to have a constant supply of men on hand to fill up the places of our members who may be on strike: consequently, at any moment, we may be embroiled in one of the largest labour battles ever known. If we are successful in tiding over the next three months without a fight, it will be as much as we will be able to do. . . . The most serious part of the business is that many of the dock-labourers' organisations, owing to the strikes during the past twelve months, are financially in a weak position, and in the event of any general strike taking place the burden of the battle would be on the shoulders of the sailors and firemen."

In the very same paper in which this appears—the Daily Chronicle of September 27—there is also a significant paragraph, which is calculated to give one the impression that Mr. Wilson's private information is rather near the truth:

"At a meeting of the Association of Employers, held at Southampton yesterday, it was unanimously decided that it was desirable at once to establish in the interests of all concerned a free labour association for the port. Immediate steps are being taken to carry the resolution into effect."

It is therefore evident that a terrible crisis is near at hand. It may be even upon us within the next few days. Everyone knows that ships manned by blacklegs will arrive in the docks from Australia before many days are over. What are the dockers going to do? Go dead against every principle they have proclaimed, and to please Mr. Norwood, unload these vessels, that are loaded by blacklegs and manned by blacklegs? We hope they will stand firm, and refuse; but if unfortunately they do give way, they have only postponed the conflict, unless they are willing to capitulate at once and let Mr. Norwood trample them beneath his feet. Norwood never forgives or forgets, and do dockers think that amiable gentleman has forgotten the volleys of hard names showered upon him during the Dock Strike? Does he not remember how he was called "a financial Jack the Ripper," and his effigy carried on a gallows through the public streets? No, Mr. Norwood has not forgotten; and he is only biding his time; he lacks the amiable Christianity of Mr. Ben Tillet. So the leaders of the New Unionism must prepare for the worst. And in the fight that is close at hand, not only the interests of the dockers are in question, but the interests of every workman in London who gained a rise in wages during the great labour revolt of last year. If the Dockers' Union is smashed, the citadel of New Unionism is in the hands of the enemy, and all is over; in a few months every advantage gained by the unskilled labourers of London will be lost. What must be done to avert this calamity? On the day on which Mr. Norwood begins the attack on the Dockers' Union by a general lock-out, the men belonging to all the new unions in London must strike. Let the gas-stokers, colliers, railway-men, carmen, tram-men, bus-men, join with sailors, stevedores, dockers, and lightermen, and the battle is won. The trade of the metropolis would be paralysed, and no body of employers could stand against this immense revolt of labour. This is practically the only chance for New Trade-Unionism, the battle before it is a fight to death. The last Dock Strike was partly won through fear of riot and insurrection, and also because Mr. Norwood could not get blacklegs enough. He will have no difficulty in getting blacklegs this winter, and the whole forces of the Government, the army, navy, and police, will be at his command; so the leaders of the dockers must either basely surrender or else proclaim a general strike. If it was worth while doing this to get the docker his tanner, it surely ought to be done to prevent him losing it. The case is desperate, and desperate means must be employed. If they are not, the speedy decease of the New Trade-Unionism is not far off.

Making it Hot for Blacklegs.

The people of Plymouth know how to appeal to the tender feelings of the blackleg. There was a blackleg recruiting sergeant in Plymouth the other day, and he obtained twenty blacklegs to go and take the place of some joiners who were on strike at Newcastle. The blacklegs had scarcely taken their train when the station was invaded by a mob of two thousand people, who dragged them out of the carriages by force. One of the crimps employed by the bosses nearly got his arm broken, and a railway guard who interfered had his clothes torn off his back. "Gentle persuasion" ultimately triumphed, and seventeen blacklegs "were prevailed upon to stop." Bravo, Plymouth! Three cheers for the Spirit of Revolt!

The Shop Assistants' Union.

Last Sunday a meeting of shop assistants was held in Regent's Park, under the auspices of the Shop Assistants' Union. J. Turner was in the chair, and opened the meeting with a most practical speech. He was followed by Mr. Thomas, who spoke pretty plainly of the way assistants were treated, saying we had to eat food not fit for human beings to eat, and mentioned a case he knew personally where an employer went to the butcher's the last thing Saturday night and offered him 2d. per lb. to clear him out of all odd pieces; it was then put into an ice-safe and brought out as wanted—"plenty good enough for assistants." He said he had often had to sleep on a bed not fit for a dog, and he had known assistants who had to sleep three in a bed. He had slept on beds which he could make an impression upon, and he had also slept on beds which had made an impression on him. Assistants had to put up with being driven about and insulted by some petty official, which a mechanic would never think of standing, let alone work the number of hours we were compelled to work. He had always noticed that the bigger liar an assistant was the more the masters appreciated him.

The assistants, however, seemed to resent being shown up to such an extent. With a few remarks from A. Mussett regarding the degrading agreements the assistants were compelled to sign at large establishments, which put them right outside the pale of the law, the meeting was closed, and 3s. 5d. was collected.

A Tonic Sol Fa Class meets every Thursday evening at 8 o'clock at Kelmscott House, Hammersmith; comrade J. Munday conductor. All members of the League are cordially invited to attend and assist.

SOCIALISM IN LONDON AND THE PROVINCES.

DUNDEE.

COMRADES H. H. Duncan, William Rennie, and the writer (Aberdeen) went to Dundee on Saturday, Sept. 20th, to further the Cause of Socialism. Our first meeting was held on the Green Market on the Saturday evening; comrade J. Duncan (Dundee) presided. The speakers at this meeting were Rennie and H. H. Duncan, and both comrades were listened to by a very orderly and intelligent audience; no questions were put; a fair supply of literature was sold. I may say that at this meeting we sung two of our songs, a part of propaganda work which was quite new to Dundee friends. On the Sunday afternoon a large and enthusiastic meeting of unskilled labourers was held in the Labour Institute, 72, Overgate. The object of this meeting was to organise the carters, dockers, etc., into one solid organisation; comrade Addison presided. After the chairman had explained the objects of the union, Rennie, H. H. Duncan, and the writer addressed the men; our speeches were listened to with close attention, and we were glad to hear after the meeting that good results followed. I may just add that Addison, Munday, Munro, and a few other comrades are working very hard in this movement of organising the unskilled labourers. At six o'clock we held an open-air meeting in Barrack Street, where a large audience listened attentively to H. H. Duncan and Rennie; both comrades were in splendid form and delivered stirring speeches. Our last meeting was held at 7 o'clock in the Labour Institute; Addison was again in the chair. There were over 200 persons present of all shades of opinion. We began the meeting by singing "Marching to Liberty," the chorus of which the audience soon took up. Rennie and H. H. Duncan then read papers on "The Labour Movement in Relation to Socialism" and "The General Strike." A lively debate followed; one opponent—a Trades' Councillor—was alarmed lest we might be the means of driving the capitalists with their capital out of the country, to which we replied that we should only be too glad if they would do so, and take all their "bonds, bank-books, and bills" with them. As usual, we had the "practical man" to contend with. At this meeting he appeared in the shape of John Nicol, a man well known in Dundee; on the whole the opposition was very tame and easily disposed of. In conclusion, I would just say that it is a pity that Dundee is so very hard up for speakers in the Socialist movement, for there is splendid material to work upon, and I am convinced that if only any of our speaking comrades would visit Dundee, whenever it is possible for them to do so, they would be the means of converting a very large number of the workers to our ideal in a very short time. Meanwhile, success to our comrades in Dundee!

JAMES MACLEAN.

LEEDS.

FAIRLY good meetings on Sunday, 21st ult., when comrade Stockton (of Manchester) spoke, in spite of the rain and very chilly weather. The temperance party, who have been riled by our letters in the local press, turned up in force and attempted to spoil our meetings by rude and intemperate interruptions. As a consequence of their action, aided by the correspondence in the press already referred to, and also by the denunciations of our meetings, our "dirty red flag," and "pernicious doctrines," which have appeared in other local papers, large crowds attended on Hunslet Moor, Woodhouse Moor, and Vicar's Croft on Sunday last, when Reynolds (of Hull) delivered three eloquent and forcible addresses. The sympathy of the people with us was proved by the subscription of 14s. 6d. to our funds, and the purchase of four quires of Commonweal and some other literature, a very unpleasant answer indeed for the local scribes who have actually appealed to the readers of their papers to drive us by main force from Woodhouse Moor. The Woodhouse Moor meeting proved to be the most successful of all. Bland (of Bradford) assisted us on Sunday, 21st ult., and among local speakers comrades Sollitt, Sweeney, Corkwell, and Cores, and James of the Universal Labour Union of Newcastle, who delivered a very powerful speech in our support. Altogether we have been immensely encouraged by our recent meetings in Leeds.

G. C.

NORTH LONDON.—A very good meeting at Ossulston Street was addressed by Cantwell, Nicoll, and Mrs. Lahr. We enlivened the meeting with several songs, and after we had sang the "Red, White, and Blue" (revised edition), some Jingoos said it was a shame we were "allowed" to sing it in England, but that we dare not sing it in Portsmouth among the loyal and patriotic militia. Our three meetings on Sunday were very successful. At Regent's Park the speakers were Cantwell and Nicoll; Whelan opposed, but devoted his time to calling us brainless, uncultivated, and saucy-tongued, and as he did not refer to Socialism at all the audience became very impatient; Nicoll replied; collection 2s. 11½d. At Hyde Park the meeting was opened by a song from the choir, and addressed by Cantwell, Mrs. Lahr, and Coulton; good sale of Commonweal and song-books; 1s. 5½d. collected. At Liverpool Street, Cantwell, Nicoll, and Blundell spoke; 20 Weals sold.

SOUTH SIDE BRANCH.—Three very successful meetings were held in Croydon on Sunday, at Thornton Heath, Handcroft Road, and Crownhill; speakers were Leggatt and Miss Lupton; 2s. 2d. collected; two quires Commonweal and song-books sold.—E. L.

ABERDEEN.—Monday the 22nd ult. being a holiday here, comrades Duncan and Rennie journeyed to Dundee on the Saturday. (See report above.) We held our usual Sunday night meeting here, when the Duke of Argyll's attack upon Henry George, and Henry George's reply, was read and discussed. We had no meeting on Thursday night owing to the rain. On Saturday, Duncan, W. Cooper, and Leatham spoke to a large crowd, the latter answering quite a host of questions at the close.—C.

HULL.—On Sunday last, Samuels (of Leeds) visited us (while Reynolds went to Leeds), and spoke twice at Tribal Green in company with Sketchley, who is living here; good meetings were held; Weals and Freedom sold out and many pamphlets; collected 5s. 8d. We intend to have a champion Commemoration Meeting here for the Chicago Martyrs on Nov. 10th in the Sailors' Institute, Hull.

SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION—EDINBURGH.—On Wednesday the 27th ult., we had a good meeting in Labour Hall, when Cunningham Graham delivered a capital address on the "Eight Hours' Day," which was much appreciated; a discussion followed. After the meeting dispersed we had a "social" in the small hall, when we had short speeches from Graham, Spence (Aberdeen) and Glasse, and the meeting was otherwise enlivened by appropriate toasts and the singing of revolutionary songs. Graham also spoke at the Scottish Home Rule meeting, which was being held at the same time in the music-hall. He had a decent reception from the audience, but his Socialistic speech was too much for Professor Blackie, who shook his "kail runt" at the "unsentimental gentlemen," and generously made an exception in his case when moving a vote of thanks to "all the speakers." We had good meetings in Leith and Edinburgh on Sunday, and lively discussion. Henderson Street Hall has been secured for our Sunday evening meetings in Leith, which begin on Sunday first.

COSMOPOLITAN RESEARCH ASSOCIATION, Wharfedale Temperance Bar, 46 Wharfedale Road, Kings Cross.—Meets every Wednesday at 8.30 for discussion of social subjects. October 8th, Mr. A. Bradfield, "Natural Causation."

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

GERMANY.

Twenty-two soldiers of the 78th Regiment stationed at Oldenburg have been sentenced to two years' imprisonment for insubordination, and they freely declared that they were Socialists. How the cowardly and false bourgeoisie must shake in their shoes at reading such news! What is to become of them if they can't rely any more on the army, the strongest pillar on which that miserable structure, so-called modern society, rests? Though we have great pleasure at the sight of the cold perspiration which breaks out on the leaders of the present social "civilisation," we are sorry for the young men; but even they will get over it, and the hate against their tormentors will only grow stronger and more intense. We hope if these young soldiers of Socialism ever use the ballot-box as a means to destroy the present state of society, they will use to smash the skulls of some of its brightest ornaments.

Ever since the last great miners' strike the large manufacturers and capitalists have been very dissatisfied with the way the Emperor interfered in the strike, and also with his meddling with the "free contract" between employers and employed, and as they dare not attack the Socialist kaiser himself, their warfare is directed against Councillor Hinspeter, who was teacher to the Emperor, and who is supposed to have infused the social reforms into the royal "brain." On the other hand, the workmen have shown at the elections and otherwise what they think of the royal humbug. It is certain that young Billy suffers very much from some nervous disease, for he travels and runs about from place to place, from one military show to another, it looks certainly as if something was not quite right, or as if he hadn't his right change anyhow. In his social reforms we find the same feverishness and inconsistency throughout; further, the actions of the Ministry show that they are affected in the same way. The Home Minister, Herrfurth, who declared in the debate about the removal of the coercion law that they could not do without it, has now (since Bismarck got the sack) said that the law was a great mistake. It is strongly rumoured that the Government is going to publish on the 1st October a manifesto to the working classes, asking them to stand by the Emperor, telling them what he is going to do for them; and if this has not the desired effect, and the workmen refuse to be good boys, the policy of in the one hand sugar, and in the other the whip will be dropped, and the policy of only whip will again be adopted. It seems as if the Socialist members smell the rat; they try to make the new organisation as flat as possible, and get the ribbons well in their hands, to be able to excommunicate everyone who dares to kick.

At a congress at Halle of German miners a federation of unions was agreed upon, and the rules prepared by a committee adopted. A petition was also drawn up to be submitted to the Imperial Parliament and other bodies, setting forth the following demands:

1. That a shift shall not exceed eight hours.
2. That overtime shall be abolished.
3. That the shifts to be reduced in wet or too hot places.
4. That the minimum wages of pickmen be 4 marks per day, the pay of the other workers in mines to be fixed in proportion.
5. That wages be paid weekly, and one system of pay-books be introduced in all mines.
6. That courts of arbitration be established to settle all disputes.
7. That a new German mining law be passed.
8. That improved sanitary arrangements be introduced.
9. That the restrictions which prevent miners from going from one district to another be removed.
10. That the administration of miners' co-operative unions be entirely in the hands of the men.
11. That measures be taken to prevent the importation of foreign labour.
12. That the power of employers to dismiss their men be limited by law.
13. That capitalist rings be abolished or suppressed if they are directed against workmen.

Some of these demands show that the authors of this petition have very childish notions about the grim warfare between capital and labour. Petition, indeed! they can petition till they are black in the face; it will only fill the waste-paper baskets. If the miners want any lightening of their burden they will have to make their demands in a different key. RTR.

DAMNATION!

How the parsons do laugh in their sleeves!
They laugh, for they care not a pin,
Though the world with themselves has been damned,
Because Eve gave Adam a pipin.

If you think this untrue you will go
To the Devil, the parsons tell you;—
O, believe in such nonsense as that!
You deserve to be damned if you do!

A TREACHEROUS ATTACK.

HUBERT BLAND STRIKES HIS BLOW.

HUBERT BLAND has struck his first blow, and has dealt it not against the foes, but against the friends, of Socialism. We had always a misgiving that some such untoward occurrence would result from so much waiting and hesitation.

In a letter which appeared recently in the Sunday Chronicle, he tells the people of Manchester that the leaders of London Socialism are about to visit their city, and then proceeds to warn them against the faults and follies of modern Socialist agitators. These are chiefly, he says, "bleat," "blether," and "bunkum." Under these headings he accuses them of morbid sympathy with lustful wives who become enamoured of good-looking young lodgers; of sentimental pity for criminals, and hatred of judges and jailers; of general ignorance of economic fact, and with frequent and foolish repetition of the term "bourgeois"; of magnifying the strength of Socialism, and using grandiloquent and specious phrases when talking of rights and wrongs of labour. Our Fabian "friend" concludes with a hint that the sensible and virtuous citizens of Manchester should kick the Socialist agitators out of their sacred city.

Of course, Hubert Bland professes that Socialism is very good although Socialists are very bad, and that it is only his exceeding love for Socialism that incites him to urge the Manchester mob to meet our comrades with the points of their clogs!

Had this letter appeared in the Times or the St. James's Gazette above the signature of Charles Bradlaugh or Professor Tyndall, we would have regarded it merely as an unusually silly and spiteful diatribe of the enemy; but coming from the pen of an avowed Socialist, and appearing in a democratic journal, we can only regard it as one of the meanest and most cowardly tricks that have yet sullied the comradeship of militant Socialism.

The difficulties and dangers of Socialist propaganda in the past have been many, and Hubert Bland is evidently anxious that they shall not be less in the future; and so, to the interruptions and abuse, the brick-bats and horse-ponds of the ignorant and bigoted avowed enemy, he hastens to add the satire and affront, the kicks and the cuffs, of the educated and polite professed friend.

The Socialists who speak in the highways and byeways of our towns and cities are mostly workmen, who have neither been taught fine speaking in universities or fine manners in London drawing-rooms, but they have a nobler ideal of Socialism and a higher perception of morality than anything yet revealed to us in the writings of Hubert Bland. They do not believe in the existing law of marriage, perhaps because they do not see the ethical beauty that Mr. Bland sees in the licensed prostitution of our marriage system; they do not love judges and jailers, having some perception, that Mr. Bland apparently lacks, of the utter brutality and hypocrisy of their office; and they do not sympathise with criminals because, unlike Mr. Bland, they do not sympathise with crime.

As for maudlin sympathy with "the married woman who is hindered by Society—that baneful entity—from indulging in her passions without risking her position," and who is compelled "to fill the feeding-bottle while she might be discussing Browning [why not Theosophy?] with some good-looking young men of her feather," we dare assert it to be a characteristic, not of London Socialist clubs, but of the saloons where Fabians and their fashionable literary and dramatic friends most delight to congregate.

If the solicitude which our monitor has for the delicate moral and intellectual susceptibilities of the readers of the Sunday Chronicle, and his utter disregard of the common feelings and intelligence of the brave men and women who have through good and evil report made a highway to social freedom in our country, are examples of the higher culture of Fabianism, then let us hope that there are few of his friends who will care to aspire to that "bad eminence" of manners and morals, with him.

It is a "remarkable coincidence" surely, as Mr. Weller the elder might have put it, that while Mr. Bland is crying down the credit of the "leaders of London Socialism" to the people of Manchester, he and the leaders of London Fabianism are meanwhile vigorously pushing their own literary and oratorical wares in that city and district!

Anyhow, let us hope that Mr. Bland does not over-estimate the discrimination of the people of Manchester, and that they may not make the ridiculous blunder at any time of mistaking a Fabian for Socialist, and meting out the treatment to him that Mr. Bland would reserve exclusively for the poor, despised, apostles of liberty, equality, and fraternity, who lack the culture and the priggishness of this new public censor of Socialist morals and education.

J. BRUCE GLASIER.

THE SLAVES OF THE STOKE-HOLE.

IN the vast Inferno—wide as the world itself—in which Labour writhes and toils, there are (as in that old hell of the mediæval poet) varying circles of intensifying torture. Surely almost in the lowest of them all are placed the wretched men who work as "firemen" aboard ocean-going steamships. This is the tale of their lives, as told, not by some Socialist or Anarchist, but by the sober bourgeois pen of a black-coated, tall-hatted, highly respectable middle-class doctor.

First, what is the toil required of him? He must labour in the intense heat of the furnaces. "The exhaustion due to the exposure to the fire is most painful, and breaks down the strongest constitutions. Six or seven years' constant work as a fireman on board a steamer seems sufficient to ruin the health of a strong man. . . . Sometimes a man may go down to the stoke-hole in sound health, and yet in an hour or two is so overcome that he is unable to climb on deck again. Straps have then to be fastened about his body, and he is hauled up with a rope. The men often remark that four hours down seem a longer time than twelve hours up. . . . When there is a strong breeze blowing, a good draught is created, which keeps the stoke-hole cool. But by the time the next watch comes in, the wind perhaps has changed; the stoke-hole becomes oppressively hot, and the number of revolutions falls off. Then the engineer manifests all the symptoms of bad temper. He abuses the firemen; and to avoid reprimand they seek by extra effort to compensate the effects resulting from the unfavourable direction of the wind. Such extra strain in such unhealthy heat is naturally injurious. The heat at times is so great that the tools burn and the steps of the iron ladder leading to the deck are too hot to be held with the bare hand." Out of this burning Gehenna (which yet has its variations of temperature, amounting sometimes to 35° Fahr.) the men have often to come up to the mayhap cold and rain-swept deck. "Sometimes they come up simply to breathe for a moment a little fresh air, or else they have to carry ashes and throw them into the shoot, or they have to fetch water."

Scorching heat, alternated with cold, is not the only demon with its clutch upon the poor stoke-hole slave. In consequence of the constrained position in which he works he suffers from excruciating cramp. "The muscles so contract as to stand out like thick ropes. The men roar with pain till their mates lay them down and by the exercise of friction restore the contorted muscles to their normal condition. It is only the firemen who suffer from such cramps; sailors are exempt, though travelling by the same ship. Firemen, when attacked by cramp, cannot eat; they cannot retain food, but drink constantly and lose weight very rapidly."

Nominally, this torture, miscalled work, only lasts for four hours in every twelve (these four hours, be it remembered, meaning three times as long in the upper air). In fact, the men are constantly bent under their tasks for a much longer period. "There are ashes and clinkers to be cleared away after the watch is over, and this takes up some considerable time. More serious than that objection is the fact that firemen are often ill. There are never any extra hands on board, and therefore, when one fireman is ill, two other firemen have to work for six hours instead of four in every twelve. This makes twelve hours per day of exposure to the fierce heat of the stoke-hole. With the sailors it is possible to work the ship even when there is a hand or two short; to keep up the fire for the engines the full complement of firemen and trimmers must be there—not one can be spared. It is a terrible misfortune for the firemen if any among them fall ill. There is then every chance of illness increasing in a ratio that might be compared to compound interest. Thus, if one man is ill, two men have to work six hours instead of four. Overcome by this stress, they also may fall ill; then four men have to work extra time. If three men are ill, then six men are affected."

Such is the daily work of a fireman. What provision is there made for him when he comes off duty? Let us see. "When the fireman comes off duty he goes to his cabin and removes the clothes that are black with coal-dust and soot and saturated with perspiration. These foul-smelling clothes have to dry in the 72 cubic feet of space allotted to him, and naturally contribute very materially to pollute the atmosphere of the cabin. A sooty sort of grease, formed by the mixture of perspiration, smoke, and coal-dust, is daubed on all sides of the cabin, and the firemen become so repulsive in their appearance that, in many ships, precautions are taken to prevent the passengers seeing them." The good, cleanly, well-clothed bourgeois passenger must not, forsooth, be offended by sight of the poor drudge whose hellish toil is carrying him across the ocean. The 72 cubic feet of air-space are never properly ventilated, and the air is often rendered still more foul by paints and mineral oils stored in lockers on either side of the narrow gangway leading to the fore-castle. Convicts in prison enjoy 370 cubic feet of well-ventilated space. Very frequently, to reach their quarters, the sailors and firemen "have to pass through a very small hatch and descend by a ladder to a depth of ten or more feet into the lower decks of the ship. If an accident or collision occurs and something falls over the hatch, this aperture is so small that the sailors or firemen below are unable to get out. Many lives have been lost in this manner. The men below might have saved their lives and perhaps the ship also, if the hatch had been wider and not so easily blocked by debris." At night the sailors and firemen lie "sweltering in the heat of the overcrowded, badly-ventilated cabin." So close are they together that one man's head lies against his neighbour's feet, without any partition. At meal-time food is literally thrown to the men in huge pieces. The recipients make a rush for it and hack and cut it "in a semi-savage manner."

The result of this terrible existence is, says the calm medical witness from whom we are quoting, to "occasion great nervous excitement and irritability. Men who by nature are not quarrelsome, end by losing their tempers; disputes and even fights ensue." The system would be bad enough even were all the men competent and able-bodied; but unfortunately incompetent hands (usually, we may presume, black-legs) "are smuggled on board at the last moment. When the firemen see with whom they have to sail, they sometimes refuse to start with the ship. Then legal complications arise." This is a pleasant euphemism for prison with hard labour. "Those who cannot afford to abandon the ship at the last moment—and these are generally the married men—have to bear throughout the voyage the brunt of the work. The incompetent hands fall ill, and those who are healthy become invalided because they have more than their share of work to do."

The summing-up of the whole matter is that, as we have seen, after six or seven years, the fireman ceases to be able to work at his trade. He can do no more hard work, and "goes," says our medico, "to swell the great army of the unemployed who loiter about the docks in search of some light, if ill-paid task." Alas! in this instance our medico is not "up to date" in his information. Under the régime of Burns, Tillet, McCarthy, and the rest of them, there is no room at the docks for the "loafer and the tramp" of ruined physique. They may go to the workhouse or the prison for aught our "labour leaders" care.

Once more, we are quoting from no madcap Communist, but from the "Report on Sanitation at Sea" of the Lancet "Special Sanitary Commission." The Lancet is a paper published at sevenpence, and unlikely to come in the way of the worker. Therefore it is that we have reproduced so much of its Report. The editor of the medical journal, in a soft-spoken leader, observes, apparently with astonishment: "Ship building and ship management seem to have been conducted solely for the one purpose of ensuring the commercial success of the enterprise taken in hand. Little or no thought has been given to the risk of life attendant on such ventures." Exactly so, oh respectable editor! Here, as elsewhere, what cares the idle profit-grinding capitalist, in his comfortable mansion, "replete" (as the advertisement in its vile jargon doubtless said) "with every modern convenience," for the poor stoke hole slave who helps to pile up riches for him? All he cares for is that his soft and cushioned life should not be disturbed by complaints from poor damned Lazarus in his furnace, that he should neither see him nor hear of him. Medical officers of ships who report upon these matters are quickly told that their services can be dispensed with. Even the Board of Trade, it seems, has suggested that the ship's surgeon should report whether the ventilation on board ship be sufficient, but Dr. Leet, of Liverpool, has publicly stated that when he acted in that capacity he received written instructions from his owners to do nothing of the kind. No Board of Trade regulations, no parliamentary enactments, so long as commercialism continues, can sensibly improve the condition of workers at sea any more than that of workers on land. For them, as for others, the "only thing that will do" is the Social Revolution. As our editor, in his mild way, has truly said, the "one purpose" of our present system is "the commercial success of the enterprise taken in hand," and the lives of "common" labouring men—their happiness or misery—are matters of small concern indeed to the lazy thieves who make to themselves what they conceive to be an earthly paradise from their torment. Of these, by the way, our dear friend Norwood is one. Free Communists are not vindictive; they do not, like the middle classes to-day, love to torture and "punish" criminals; but we should be less than human did we not wish for the Chairman of the Joint-Committee just one week of the stoke-hole. Probably one week would suffice to dispose of him for ever.

In a later issue of the Lancet, a certain "Arthur Moss, M.B." (let us by all means note his name), opines that firemen are themselves largely to blame for their early deaths. It seems, according to Dr. Moss, that they often suffer from diseases which result from dissipation. This, being interpreted, means that some of them, during their brief holidays ashore, seek in reckless bestial debauchery forgetfulness for a little of the hell from which they come and the black future before them. Probably if Arthur Moss, M.B., were a thrall of the stoke-hole, even he (model of morality as he doubtless is) might also give way to such ignoble pleasures as came his way. Possibly he, as well as Norwood, would (to adapt the famous saying of the old Scotch judge) be "nane the waur" for a good roasting at the furnace. R. W. BURNIE.

FELIX VOLKHOVSKY.

OUR contemporary, Free Russia, which is very good this month, has the following article on our brave comrade Felix Volkhovsky, who has had the good fortune to escape from the horrors of Siberian exile:

We are very happy to be able to announce to our friends the news of the safe arrival in England of one of the most hard-trying champions of Russian freedom. Felix Volkhovsky, the same of whom Mr. George Kennan spoke in such high terms in his article upon the Tomsk exiles, is with us, having succeeded in escaping from Siberia. A total of seven years solitary confinement in the Fortress and other prisons of European Russia, and eleven years exile in Siberia: such was the reward of our friend's services. We do not propose to give his biography. We will only say that these eighteen years of suffering were inflicted upon him because he was known to hold certain opinions unfavourable to the present Russian régime, and suspected of spreading these views among workmen and educated people. He could not possibly be implicated in terrorism or the like, because nobody thought of such things when he was first arrested. With his health to a great extent wasted, but with his energy and talents unimpaired and fresh, he resolved to escape, with the deliberate purpose of devoting himself to forwarding the Russian cause in foreign countries. He succeeded in eluding the vigilance of the Siberian authorities, and after many adventures, which he will tell us, we hope, some day, he reached Canada through the Pacific, having travelled right across Siberia. His little daughter was left behind, as it would have been madness to take her with him. The fear that the child might be laid hold of by the Russian Government, as was the case with the children of several political offenders, imposed upon Volkhovsky the necessity of keeping himself as quiet as possible, concealing his identity under the name of Felix Brant. But now, after a year of anxieties which it is easier to imagine than to describe, the child arrived in London and joined her father, so that there is no longer any need of concealment on his part.

Though Felix Volkhovsky stayed in Canada only about eight months, he succeeded in laying in that country the foundation of a pro-Russian movement. He wrote upon the Russian question in various periodicals: the Toronto Globe, the World, the Woodstock College Monthly, and other Canadian papers. Three months after his arrival he was able, thanks to his exceptional linguistic capacities, to appear as a lecturer.

Though small in number, these lectures awakened a deep interest in the Russian cause, and a number of the most prominent and influential Canadian citizens offered to form a committee similar to the English and Philadelphian. Amongst them are Sir Daniel Wilson, president of the Toronto University, Professor Rev. Dr. William Clarke, of Trinity College, Dr. Daniel Clarke, of the Asylum, Rev. Dr. Dewart, of the Christian Guardian, Rev. John Burton, Dr. Geikie, and Dr. Aikins.

In July last Volkhovsky reached London, where he will settle permanently. The Russian cause here has made in his person an invaluable acquisition. This man, who is himself a living indictment against Russian despotism, comes straight from the land of exile and suffering. His experiences are those which few men have had, because very few could outlive what he has outlived, and we know of no one who would deliver such a message as his with more impressiveness.

NOTES.

It must be now evident to all that the policy of coercion is about to be tried in England as well as in Ireland. At Leeds, Southampton, and Beckton the Government have shown a determination to crush the labour movement by force; and at the same time the Revolutionary Socialists are attacked by the police for exercising the right of free speech in places where public meetings have been held for years. A large section of the workers have asked the Government to shorten their hours of labour. The Government replies by attempting to crush their combinations by main force. After all, this is all that might be reasonably expected from any government.

We have witnessed a strange sight during the last few days. Eight hundred men specially selected from regiments that are known to be untouched by the discontent which prevails in the army are ordered out and are provided with ball-cartridge. For what? To put down riot and disorder? No, to terrorise men who are suspected of desiring to exercise the most elementary right of labour—i.e., to leave their work if they are dissatisfied with the conditions under which they labour.

The Government are not content with threats to shoot rebellious workmen down like dogs, but they even offer—taking a leaf out of the book of the worst despots on the Continent—to find soldiers to act as “blacklegs.” It is to be hoped that if this is done in future these gallant men will strike against such “employment.” The Revolutionary Socialists at least will do their utmost to persuade them to do so.

In face of the attack that is now being made on “free speech” and “free combination,” men of all sections of advanced thought should prepare to act together. Whatever may be our differences of opinion, we must close up our ranks in front of the common enemy. Above all, we must commence a vigorous propaganda among soldiers, we must spread the spirit of discontent and revolt which is already smouldering among them. The new unions should not neglect this work, or else their movement may be crushed, not by the wealth of the capitalists, but by the bullets and bayonets of the army.

We rejoice, however, in one fact. The present Government is proving conclusively that it is hopeless to expect anything from them. And we hope that they will soon drive the workmen into the only method of action which will really improve their position—a general strike in every trade and industry. D. N.

I do not suppose that many readers of the Commonweal concern themselves with the proceedings of a congregation of sky-pilots and their friends known as the “Church Congress.” It is, however, possibly worth while to note occasionally the abject ignorance—made all the more conspicuous by bumptious and insolent pretence of knowledge—of some “doctors of divinity” and “right reverend prelates” who boss this show. These persons would not hesitate to repudiate in strong language the presumption of a working-man who, discoursing upon Socialism as one having authority, should show himself absolutely uninformed of its fundamental doctrines. This, however, is precisely what Bishop Moorhouse of Manchester, despite his university education, has been doing.

This wonderful “successor of the apostles,” in what the Pall Mall Gazette characteristically calls a “very striking sermon” addressed to the Congressional wiseacres, declared that “some forms of Socialism prescribed the worship of gold as a god!” This will be news to those who are looking for the time “when no slave of gold abideth ’twixt the breadth of sea and sea.” Moorhouse went on to say that “men were not born equal, and all State decrees for the equal payment of labour would end in discord and the same heart-breaking failure as attended all Louis Blanc’s State workshops.”

It would seem, then, that this foolish prelate is under the impression (a) that Socialists contend that all men are born equal; (b) that Louis Blanc was responsible for the plan or the management of the National Workshops which were organised by the bourgeois Government of February as a sop to Cerberus and with the preconceived determination that they should fail; (c) that a “State decree for the equal payment of labour” is advocated by any school of Socialists. The first two misstatements look very like deliberate misrepresentations. The last is of course equally inaccurate, since it does not describe the orthodox Collectivist programme and has no application to Communists like ourselves, who adopt the famous formula of that very Louis Blanc of whom Moorhouse ignorantly prates: “From each according to his capacity; to each according to his needs.”

It is fair, perhaps, to add that at a subsequent discussion on Socialism the Bishop of Durham managed to speak on the subject with some sympathy and without betraying crass ignorance. Of course he deprecated revolution and violence. The “Rev” would naturally not be very acceptable to a prelate who receives £7,000 a-year for his shepherding, and about whom still cling the traditions of his predecessors’ mediæval principedom. Judge Thomas Hughes (a survival of the Kingsley and Maurice period) discoursed concerning “co-operation” (falsely so-called) and “thrift”! How truly intelligent the “educated and cultured” middle classes are, and how infinitely wiser than the poor workman!

The egregious General Booth is a gospel-grinder of another colour; but his grasp of the social question is as feeble as that of his Anglican rivals. Our “excellent friend” Bombardos-Booth has been entertaining us for months past with various puffs preliminary of the new departure about to be taken by the “Army” he commands. The Daily Chronicle, the Star, the Pall Mall Gazette and other Radical capitalist journals have vied with each other as to who should most advertise the schemes of the pious General. Bombardos has now, with his usual flourish of trumpets, published his precious plan for what he has the audacity to style a “social revolution.” It turns out only to be a rehash of the old familiar nostrums—shelters tempered by hymns, the “workhouse test” in a new form, emigration (!), and, above all, of course, implicit obedience to Bombardos. Shut your eyes, you vicious, wicked unemployed, and see what good Bombardos-Booth will send you. R. W. B.

THREE REVOLUTIONARY SONGS.

THE three songs published in the Commonweal this week have a common character. They are songs of the poor alike in France, Germany, or England. In all you hear a cry of despair, but of an awakened despair, that knows where the evil is, and is determined to find a remedy. The three songs are characteristic of the nations to which they belong. In the “Carmagnole” desperation is mingled with gay cynicism that laughs at all things in heaven or earth; the people feel that they have power in their hands, and as they dance lightly through the streets, even their laughter menaces the tyrants of the earth. But with all this cynicism there is vision of a brighter world of peace and happiness. “The Song of the Lower Classes” and “The Hymn of the Proletariat” are curiously alike. In both you hear the bitter wail of the poor, and in both there is the stern determination to end their misery by the strength of their right arms; but there is no laughter in their songs, the people suffer too much to laugh, and the hope of the future seems farther off than it does to the Parisian populace.

A few words with regard to “La Carmagnole,” the most revolutionary song that the French Revolution produced. Like everything revolutionary, it has had a wreath of strong adjectives showered upon it by middle-class journalists and historians. To these it is even more objectionable than even the terrible “Ca ira” of 1793, the chorus of which was as follows: “Ah! ça ira, ça ira, ça ira! Les aristocrates a la lanterne! Ah! ça ira, ça ira, ça ira! A la lanterne, on les pendera!” (Ah! it will go, it will go, it will go! The aristocrats to the lamp-post! Ah! it will go, it will go, it will go! Up to the lamp-post we will hang them!) It is but fair to remember that at that time the people had been driven mad by hunger, and been made desperate by continual Royalist plots to overthrow the Revolution by a merciless slaughter of the poor.

But to return to the “Carmagnole.” Little is known of the origin of the song, the author is unknown, though the tune had been probably popular as a country dance on the sunny plains of Provence for many generations. The tune is supposed to have been brought to Paris by the Marseillaise, the six hundred men who knew how to die, along with the famous song to which they have given this name; but even this is doubtful. It is, therefore, a true song of the people; author and musician are both among the great unknown. One thing is quite certain, it became popular soon after the capture of the Tuileries on the famous 10th of August. It was at first merely a topical song, laughing at King, Queen, and Court, and rejoicing in the popular victory. The chorus, “Dansons la Carmagnole! Vive la son du canon!” (Let us dance the Carmagnole! Hurrah for the sound of the cannon!) is a reference to the insurrectionary cannon that battered down the walls of the Tuileries. The song became so popular that at every victory of the Republican armies and every Revolutionary outbreak a new version was made. The version, of which we give a translation, probably came from the Hébertists, the Revolutionary Socialists of the French Revolution. It is, therefore, the most interesting to all those who are doing their best to sweep away the tyranny and robbery of the ruling classes, and to bring back the golden age of peace, happiness, truth, and justice for the oppressed peoples of the earth. To the Memory of the Sentimental Rad.

Our vivacious contemporary, the Scots Observer, prints the following entertaining “Epitaph on the Modern Sentimental Radical.” It has the merit of being true, which is more than can be said of some epitaphs:

Moved by their Sorrows, He was ever ready to Relieve the Poor
Out of the Rates:
Zealous in the Public Weal, He Sacrificed
For the Public Benefit
His Neighbour’s Land:
Generous to a Fault,
He gladly expended
Any Sum, however large,
Which brought Him a steady Ten Per Cent.:
Eminently gifted with a Tender Heart,
A Sympathetic Nature, and a Strict Sense of Duty,
He dropped a Tear in every Good Cause,
and Subscribed Largely to His own Monument.

The COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. WHY WE DO NOT VOTE.

THIS question has been so often answered and the reasons given so abundant, that to those who have thought the matter out it seems altogether superfluous to answer it. Nevertheless, as there still exist men who, while styling themselves Revolutionary Socialists (?), are going to establish by vote a Progressive Government (by the way, an impossibility), I therefore think it is a necessity to answer once again this question.

Now, whatever benefits may accrue to those who own land, etc., by a change of government, it is self-evident that the propertyless class can obtain nothing. As Parsons says, An economic slave cannot in any country obtain political liberty. The science of politics is law-making. The right to vote implies the right to make laws, consequently the right to govern. Now, as a propertyless man has no right to live, inasmuch as the laws under which he is born denies him access to the means of life, it is absurd to tell him that he can make laws to govern those who own his means of life, and consequently himself also. In whatever country he happens to be born he is a trespasser according to the law. Imagine a man who cannot control either the price of his day's labour or his productions voting! The only capital he possesses is the power to labour, which he must sell to those who own his means of life or starve. What is Law? What is Government? These two words embrace all the villainies that has ever been imposed on the human race. Morality never did or can exist without liberty. You may tie a man's hands and thus make virtue a necessity, but you leave his moral nature untouched. He who invades another's rights commits a crime, thus every law-maker is a criminal, and as to law, as Burke says, "Its every form is bad." With Bakounine, we deny either its necessity or morality, for under government and civilisation (?) precisely the same state of things obtains now as would in a savage state without government or civilisation, for the weak and defenceless are robbed by those stronger than themselves, either physically, mentally, or financially. By law they hold our common birthright in the land. Money, first introduced and used to exchange equivalent values, has had its true function destroyed by Acts of Parliament, thus giving a few banking swindlers the power to fix the purchasing power of what was once a medium of exchange.

What is Liberty? Briefly stated, it is an equality of conditions or reciprocal rights; unequal liberty is tyranny such as now exists, and were it not for this fact that some have undue privileges government would be superfluous, as it is only necessary in a community of slaves on the one hand and tyrants on the other. Ask any sane man if he is willing to concede the same right to another as he himself enjoys, and he will immediately answer "Yes." He will also tell you that he has no wish to violate the rights of any man. Propose then to abolish governments, and he will at once tell you that you must have laws to restrain not himself but the other fellow. Past and present laws have so hardened mankind, that even a majority of our so-called reformers are tyrants at heart. But, says modern morality, man is so imperfect that you need laws to restrain him. They forget that that fact alone supplies the strongest reason why he should not be allowed to impose his imperfection on others.

Now that Social Democratic mob rule, or H. Spencer's coming slavery, is likely to be the next, and let us hope the last, wave of political swindledom that will afflict us, it behoves us to redouble our efforts to spread the light.

With regard to majority-rule, I would not say with Carlyle that the majority will always be fools, but it is plain that for a time yet the workers will not be over-educated. First, then, where votes are counted and not compared, intelligence would count for nothing. Secondly, any fool would be eligible for office if he obtained a majority of votes. Murder and robbery would be as right then as now if the majority said so. Reading a leaflet issued by the S.D.F., entitled, "What is the use of a Vote?" I came across this sentence, "Remember, never for a moment forget this eternal truth, Equality in the ballot-box is a mere juggle when there is inequality of social conditions all round!" "Amen!" said I. A few lines below I read, "What is the use of the suffrage? It has but one use, to enable the workers to take peaceful possession of the power of the State, and to use said power for social purposes." It goes on to say that the people must instruct their delegates to proclaim only that land, etc., belong to the people, and that, therefore, private property in these things must cease.

Now, as possession under the law is equivalent to ownership, do these men imagine that a proclamation will be sufficient? and will the present owners hand it over without a struggle? Having asked a question of a Mr. Jones, an S.D.F. advocate, as to the honesty of politicians, he told me and the people that all politicians were thieves, but, said he, "You must set a thief to catch a thief!" Now what guarantee have we that these said thieves, like all their predecessors, would not if they go into power do just the same? Surely the replacing one gang of thieves (as they would be by labour pence) by another will not improve the condition of the people. The capitalist might then boast with Vanderbilt, "That delegates could be bought cheaper than votes!" These men in their madness (or are they joking?) assert in their leaflet that they are economic slaves, which is true. Nevertheless, they declare in a few lines below that they are going to use their economic slavery to obtain political freedom. The lessons that America, France, Germany, and other countries afford, has been thrown away on them, or has the sophistry of the rotten Republicanism of Reynolds thrown them off their base. Let us hope before committing themselves to this most detestable policy of reaction, they will study the question a little deeper, and learn with us that we must gain the unconditional right to the resources of life before true freedom is even possible.

In conclusion, it has been said that hero-worship has ever been the curse of the world, and I fear that John Burns, whatever good work he may have done in the past, according to the tendency of his recent speeches will soon rank with Bradlaugh, Broadhurst, and Co., as being the most reactionary enemy of human emancipation. As for us, as Fielden says, "We must hew to the line, let the chips fall where they will. Better far to stand alone in an honest fight for principle than join a multitude of sycophants." W. BARKER.

NOTICE.

Next Week will begin a Series of Articles, entitled

"REVOLUTIONARY WARFARE."

BY D. J. NICOLL.

Branches and Newsagents are requested to order early, as we expect an large demand.

LA CARMAGNOLE.

O what is it the people cry?
They ask for all equality.
The poor no more shall be
In slavish misery.
The idle rich shall flee;
Vive le son, &c.

O what is it the people need?
They ask for bread and iron and lead;
The iron to win our pay,
The lead our foes to slay,
The bread our friends to feed;
Vive le son, &c.

O what is it the people cry?
Away with pious priests that lie!
Christ to the stable go;
The Virgin lieth low;
Their God to hell may fly!
Vive le son, &c.

O let the peoples all agree
To live in love and liberty!
Are we not fools to fight
To please the rich man's spite?
Let's feast right merrily;
Vive le son, &c.

HYMN OF THE PROLETARIAT.

Air: "Zu Mantua en Banden."

Who hammers brass and stone?
Who raiseth from the mine?
Who weaveth cloth and silk?
Who tilleth wheat and vine?
Who worketh for the rich to feed,
Yet live themselves in sorest need?—
It is the men who toil, the Proletariat.

Who strives from earliest morn?
Who toils till latest night?
Who brings to others wealth,
Ease, luxury, and might?
Who turns alone the world's great wheel,
Yet has no right in commonweal?—
It is the men who toil, the Proletariat.

Who is from aye a slave
To all the tyrant brood?
Who oft for them must fight?
Oft sacrifice his blood?—
O folk! hast thou not yet perceived,
'Tis thou that ever art deceived!
Awake, ye men who labour! Up, Proletariat!

Together join your powers!
And swear to banner red!
For freedom boldly fight!
So win ye better bread!
Then quicken ye the despot's fall!
Bring peace unto the nations all!
To battle, ye who labour! Up, Proletariat!

In your hands lie the means!
Work but with unity!
Hold ye but firm together
Then ye will soon be free.
With quick-march forward to the fight,
Though scorn the foe in grape-shot might!
Then win, ye men who labour! Wiu, Proletariat!

JOHANN MOST.

SONG OF THE "LOWER" CLASSES.

We plough and sow—we're so very, very low,
That we delve in the dirty clay,
'Till we bless the plain with the golden grain,
And the vale with the fragrant hay.
Our place we know—we're so very, very low,
'Tis down at the landlord's feet:
We're not too low the grain to sow,
But too low the bread to eat:
We're not too low the grain to sow,
But too low the bread to eat.

Down, down we go—we're so very, very low,
To the hell of the deep-sunk mines:
But we gather the proudest gems that glow
When the crown of a despot shines:
And whenever he lacks, upon our backs
Fresh loads he deigns to lay:
We're far too low to vote the tax,
But not too low to pay:
We're far too low to vote the tax,
But not too low to pay.

We're low, we're low—mere rabble, we know;
But at our plastic power
The mould at the lordling's feet will grow
Into a palace, and church, and tower.
Then prostrate fall in the rich man's hall,
And cringe at the rich man's door:
We're not too low to build the wall,
But too low to tread the floor:
We're not too low to build the wall,
But too low to tread the floor.

We're low, we're low—we're very, very low;
Yet from our fingers glide
The silken flow, and the robes that glow
Round the limbs of the sons of pride.
And what we get, and what we give,
We know, and we know our share:
We're not too low the cloth to weave,
But too low the cloth to wear:
We're not too low the cloth to weave,
But too low the cloth to wear.

We're low, we're low—we're very, very low;
And yet when the trumpets ring,
The thrust of a poor man's arm will go
Through the heart of the proudest king.
We're low, we're low—our place we know,
We're only the rank and file:
We're not too low to kill the foe,
But too low to touch the spoil:
We're not too low to kill the foe,
But too low to touch the spoil.

ERNEST JONES.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

The Dockers' Congress.

It must be confessed that the published reports of the Dockers' Congress are very dull; there was, in fact, an air of gloom about the whole proceedings. The leaders have lost hope, and appear to already anticipate defeat. There was a good deal too much talk about "arbitration" and "conciliation" in the speeches of the various leaders. Do they not know very well that their capitalist opponents will only look upon this as a sign of weakness? These gentlemen know very well that if the union was strong the leaders would talk in another fashion, and it only encourages the capitalists in their determination to go for the dockers and other new unions at the first opportunity. The outlook, we admit, is not a cheerful one, but it will not be improved by letting the world see you are losing heart already. Why not face the masters boldly, and tell them you will fight to the bitter end, and that if they attack one of the new unions the others will strike also? A little of the spirit of the men of the Commune—"We will burn Paris to the ground sooner than surrender"—would be more worthy of the leaders of the New Unionism.

Meanwhile, there is not much talk of conciliation about the masters—"smashing the unions" is more in their style. According to a Times correspondent, who seems to know, the "Free Labour Association" at Southampton is going on swimmingly, and the masters are going to start Blackleg Supply Associations all over the shop. It is strange to see the Social Democratic idea of a Labour Bureau utilised by the scheming capitalist as a means of hurling back the workers into their old misery. Matters have not been improved at Southampton by the weakness of the London executive. The local branch is in revolt against them. But surely a body that is meek and humble to the employers and high-handed and autocratic to the rank and file of the organisation cannot expect anything else. A little less severity towards their own men, and a little more boldness in dealing with the capitalists, is what is wanted. It is worth noting that the dockers of Southampton, judging by their attitude at the Congress, appear to share our comrade Kitz's opinion of Mr. McCarthy. Mr. McCarthy has decidedly left "a bad impression" behind him.

Pious Sweating.

Here is a black-list published by the London Society of Composers of religious and temperance newspapers printed at rat houses. Well-wishers to the cause of the working people are asked not to purchase these "scabby" publications.

It is surely strange that the salvation of men's souls should be so closely bound up with the starvation of their bodies. Sweating and piety seem to go together nowadays.

The Scotch Iron-workers.

The masters are taking the offensive everywhere. All the furnaces in the Scotch black country around Glasgow were put out on Sunday, so that the Scotch black country at night is nowhere lit up with fires except at Wishaw and Carron, the owners of which are not in the masters' combination, because they manufacture iron for their own private purposes and not for sale in the market. The workers abide firmly by the demand for time and a half for Sunday labour, or for the stoppage of work on that day. The masters, on the other hand, declare that they have been making iron for a number of months at a loss, and that they are not disposed to put their furnaces into blast again except on a reduction of 10 per cent. on the wages of the past twelve months.

The depression in trade is already beginning to be felt, and all the masters will seize upon the first chance of attacking the unions and forcing down wages. Reductions of 10 per cent. will soon be the order of the day everywhere.

FREE SPEECH IN DANGER.

It is evident that the London police are beginning an organised attack upon the right of public meeting. We have to report three cases of police interference with Socialist meetings last Sunday. At Union Street comrade Burnie was ordered to go away while speaking by a pompous peeler, but refused. He was then allowed to continue the meeting in peace. At Streatham, in the evening, Mrs. Lahr's meeting was surrounded by a force of twenty policemen. She was ordered to "get down," and replied by defying the police to arrest her. This the police would probably have done, had not the crowd assumed such a threatening attitude that the police thought it best to leave her alone. Our comrades at Liverpool Street on Sunday were also informed by an inspector that no meetings could be allowed there. We replied that if the Christians were allowed to hold their meeting we should hold ours. However, Mr. Woffendale's choir didn't turn up, and it was evident that they were acting in agreement with the police. We then marched away to Ossulton Street, where, in conjunction with the S.D.F., a big indignation meeting was held, which caused so much alarm among the police of the neighbourhood that some thirty of them, including two inspectors and four sergeants, turned out to crush any attempt at riot and insurrection. A resolution was passed condemning the action of the police in suppressing Free Speech and Free Combination. Mrs. Blundell, Nicoll, an East-end comrade, and two comrades of the S.D.F. were the speakers. The choir sang several revolutionary songs, to the great enjoyment of the assembled bobbies. It may be mentioned that while the police were carefully guarding our meeting, a little boy was being brutally knocked about down by St. Pancras Station by some ruffian; the pavement was covered with the child's blood. But the police were too busy looking after the Socialists to trouble about such a trifle as this. We hear on good authority that orders have been issued from Scotland Yard for a general suppression of all Socialist meetings.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE UNEMPLOYED AND SOCIALISTS.—A DENIAL.

J. J. Chapman, General Secretary of Street-masons, Paviers, Stone-dressers, and Hammermen Amalgamated Union, writes: In Lloyds Newspaper, of the 28th of September, there is a paragraph on the above subject, and as it is hurtful to my reputation and to the unions to which I have dealings (Social Democratic Federation, Socialist League, etc.), will you kindly insert this and clear the stigma which it has brought upon me at my work. It is reported that Mr. Chapman was in Hyde Park on Sunday, Sept. 21st, and when he attempted to speak was received with groaning and hooting. That when he sat down the next speaker said Mr. Chapman was a fraud, and was attempting to make money out of the poor of London. (Applause.) It was a Socialist dodge to smash windows. He advised them not to have anything to do with Mr. Chapman or any other Socialist. Cries were raised for Mr. Chapman to reply, but he had left the meeting. The red flag was torn in pieces and the pole broken; a resolution was carried condemning the Socialist agitators.

This is a deliberate falsehood; Socialists are not as described here. This is the work of someone who is an enemy of the Cause of the workers. I was at home the whole of that day seeing to the welfare of my home, family, etc., which had been neglected so long for the Cause of Humanity. If this letter is not inserted, the above statement will do me a great injury.

A PLAN OF CAMPAIGN.

Our Leeds comrades have been carrying on an active propaganda lately both in the open-air and in the capitalist press. Our comrade Samuels in a local paper thus explains and defends the revolutionary plan of campaign:

"We would have the people organised so powerfully in unions and federations, internationally, as to be able to resist payment of rent, interest, profit, and taxes, to any individual, company, or clique. We must of necessity put out of all consideration any immediate results to ourselves and others from such preaching and action. Just the same as the Irish, and other peoples from time to time in the world's history, who have felt that 'he who would be free, himself must strike the blow.' We take advantage of all strikes, lock-outs, and disputes between the classes and the masses, masters and 'hands,' not shrinking from using any means, unconstitutional and terrorist, agreeing with Jeremy Bentham that 'only by making the ruling few uneasy can the oppressed obtain a particle of relief,' and for the time being give all the help necessary to win such struggles for the people, but unceasingly and uncompromisingly preach the inevitableness of a crisis, the power of the general strike, and the necessity for preparation for the social revolution. We seek, find, and use all the help we can gather from history, science, economics, and even theology, for the purpose of showing the people the causes and effects of civilisation, Christianity, arts, sciences, and invention, and how the evolution of capitalism itself is towards that end that we see and preach.

"The philosophy of this kind of education and agitation is that earnest propagandists are not corrupted, misled, or bought, as so many 'leaders' have been; and the immense power that an 'anti-political' movement is credited with or exerts, has and will cause more fear in the ranks of statesmen, politicians, and reformers, and will bring out all the 'known and tried leaders of the people,' and their pet schemes, and consequently more and quicker Reform Acts and palliatives, which will doubtless be eagerly taken and used by the people in their struggles with monopoly and greed, until the time when there are enough brave and intelligent men competent to take over the land and all the industrial capital of the country, and leave the people free to manage their own affairs in whatever way they may think fit and best. How the people will or ought in the future to work and live is a matter for them to discuss.

"It is neither necessary nor wise to know, care, or prophesy for the time when 'labour shall be free,' for if the intelligence and determination is there to grapple with the economic evolution and cause the social transformation, there will assuredly be sufficient for the task of giving, or rather allowing the children of the earth full scope in the grand air of liberty and equality, for the development of fraternity, love, and happiness, which is the ideal of true Socialism and Socialists. This is the text we preach from three times every Sunday in the open air."

For the 'Commonweal.'

A Course of Special Lectures and Concert and Ball for the above purpose (under the management of the 'Commonweal' Branch of S.L.) will be given at the Club Autonomie, 6, Windmill Street, Tottenham Court Road, W., as under:

Monday, October 13th, at 8.30 p.m.—D. J. NICOLL (S.L.), on "The Glorious Reformation; or, How the English People were Evicted, Robbed, and Murdered by the Ruling Classes." 'Commonweal' Choir. Admission free.

Monday, October 20th, at 8 p.m.—WILLIAM MORRIS (S.L.), on "Art for the People." This Lecture will be delivered at the Athenæum Hall, 73, Tottenham Court Road, W. Admission by Ticket, Sixpence. For full particulars, see large bills. Tickets can be had from Wm. Blundell, 'Commonweal' Branch Secretary, or F. Kitz, S.L. Secretary, 24, Great Queen St., Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.; and of all Branch Secretaries.

Monday, November 3rd.—A Concert and Ball. Full particulars of this will be duly announced in Weal.

Any further information will be gladly supplied by 'Commonweal' Branch Secretary, 24, Great Queen Street, W.C.

Something Wrong.

And yet there must be something wrong. A full-formed Horse will, in any market, bring from twenty to as high as two hundred pounds: such is his worth to the world. A full-formed Man is not only worth nothing to the world, but the world could afford him a round sum would he simply engage to go and hang himself. Nevertheless, which of the two was the more cunningly devised article, even as an Engine? Good Heavens! A white European Man, standing on his two Legs, with his two five-fingered Hands at his shackle-bones, and miraculous Head on his shoulders, is worth, I should say, from fifty to a hundred Horses!—Carlyle: 'Sartor Resartus.'

The second international congress of diamond polishers and cutters of Europe and America will be held at Charleville, near Mezières (Ardennes), France, on the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd of November, 1890. The chief associations of Holland, Germany, France, etc., will be represented. For all information address M. Samu-l Vuillet, secretary of Syndicat des Ouvriers Diamantaires de St. Claude, 5 rue Lacuzon, Juro, France.

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

REPORTS.

'COMMONWEAL' BRANCH.—Good meetings have been held at the Hoxton and Union Street stations, and several new members made; at the latter station last Sunday we collected 2s. 0½d. The branch choir have worked hard at our meetings in pushing literature as well as singing. The first lecture of the course arranged by this branch came off last Monday, October 6th, at the Autonomie Club, 6, Windmill Street, W., when G. Bernard Shaw lectured on "Ferdinand Lassalle." Our branch choir opened the proceedings with revolutionary songs. The audience were deeply interested in Shaw's lecture. Good and spirited discussion followed, which turned mainly on "physical force" and "the woman question." We collected 11s. 9½d., and another song by the choir finished a very pleasant evening.—W. B.

SOUTH SIDE BRANCH.—Three meetings were held on Sunday. Short Street in the morning meeting addressed by R. Harding and Miss Lupton; R. Harding gave admirable address on "Politics and the Democracy"; received with enthusiasm by a large audience; 1s. 3d. collected. Afternoon, meeting on Streatham Common; speakers, Smith and Miss Lupton; good audience, mostly well-dressed people, who at first jeered at red flag and Socialist doctrines, but afterwards became respectful and attentive. Battersea Park Road in the evening meeting addressed by Miss Lupton, assisted by comrade Buteux; good-humoured and lively audience. The following questions were put by some of the audience: "Do you believe a universal strike is possible?" and "Don't you think that if we got rid of Conservatives and Liberals, and had a nice 'Labour Parliament' (composed of members of the S.D.F.), we should do very well?" They were answered to the satisfaction of those present; 27 Weals sold.—E. L.

ABERDEEN.—At the Sunday night indoor meeting, Kropotkin's "Law and Authority" was read and discussed. At the Monday night business meeting we decided to still further increase our open-air propaganda. An open-air meeting was held at Woodside on Friday night, at which comrades W. Cooper and Rennie spoke; another meeting was held at Tory on Saturday afternoon, and on Saturday night the usual meeting was held on Castle Street, when Duncan, Rennie, and Leatham spoke to a large crowd. A large number of pamphlets continue to be sold at all our open-air meetings.—C.

GLASGOW.—The bad weather here has greatly interfered with our meetings. We have, however, held our Paisley Road Toll meeting every Sunday evening—a meeting that is still growing in popularity—quite a number of the workers on the Clyde travelling many miles to attend it. Glasier has been our only speaker, except last Sunday, when comrade Haddow of the Steel Worker's Union spoke at the Toll to one of the largest meetings we have yet had, Haddow's vigorous exposition of the Labour question and advocacy of Socialism having a telling effect. We collected for the Australian strike on Sunday, Sept. 20th, 4s. 11d.; Sept. 27th, 4s. 10½d.; and last Sunday, 5s. 4d. Last Sunday forenoon, Bradlaugh was vigorously heckled in the Waterloo Hall by Socialists and trades unionists, quite the half of his audience being against him.

LEEDS.—Our success continues. We had good meetings at all three stations on Sunday, addressed by Allworthy, Cores, Sollit, and Samuels. Four quires of Commonweal and one of Freedom were sold; 9s. 6d. was collected. Next Sunday we expect to have the assistance of comrade Sketchley from Hull, and the week following Andrew Hall from Sheffield. We are making arrangements for a vigorous winter campaign, à la Fabian, in imitation of the example set by our comrades of Bradford; and we venture to recommend this method of propaganda to comrades everywhere. We are having a circular printed, giving a list of lecturers and lectures and other information, which will be sent to all Tory, Liberal, and other clubs and societies in Leeds and district. On Sunday evening a united meeting of Leeds Socialists was held at the International Club, Templar Street, at which a committee was appointed to make preparations for a great Chicago Martyrs Commemoration Meeting in a large hall in the town.—G. C.

SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION—EDINBURGH.—Our winter campaign has begun well. A large audience gathered to hear "Socialism Defined and Defended" by comrade McDonald, of the London Fabian Society. It was a capital lecture, and was much appreciated by everyone. After the lecture, questions were asked and well replied to. A good discussion followed, in which McKenzie and Purdie of the Trades' Council, comrades Gilray, Caddow, Davidson, and Campbell took part. Mrs. Parker, of Dundee, who was on her way home from a sojourn in California, was present, and described a co-operative colony she had visited.—At Leith a crowded meeting was held in Henderson Street Hall. Comrade Hamilton discoursed on "The Spirit of the Age"—a lecture which was full of hard knocks, of which the capitalist and the British working-man got each their due share.—At both meetings good collections were made, and literature sold well.—W. D. T.

SOUTH SIDE BRANCH.—Comrades who either have joined or are willing to join above Branch are requested to communicate immediately with Miss E. Lupton, 59 Selhurst Road, S.E., secretary pro tem.

TURNHAM GREEN.—A lecture will be delivered by J. Turner on "True and False Co-operation," at the "George IV.," Turnham Green, on Friday, Oct. 10, at 8 o'clock.

FABIAN SOCIETY.—A course of lectures on "COMMON OBJECTIONS TO SOCIALISM" will be given at Bloomsbury Hall, Hart Street, New Oxford Street, W.C., Friday, October 17, at 8 o'clock—III. That Socialism is contrary to Science. "As interfering with Natural Selection," Grant Allan; "As certain to cause a ruinous increase of population," Annie Besant.

SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—EDINBURGH.—Labour Hall, 50 South Bridge. Business meeting, Fridays at 8 p.m. Lecture, Sundays at 6.30. LEITH—Henderson Street Hall, Sundays, at 6.30. Particulars in Evening News, Sat.

"REVOLUTIONARY WARFARE."

I.

NO RENT AND A GENERAL STRIKE.

WHAT are you Revolutionary Socialists going to do? what is your programme, your policy? is the cry which greets us from opponents and enquirers alike. Let me try as a Revolutionary Socialist to answer this question by pointing out the means by which the present society can be overthrown.

What are we doing now? We are preaching the Gospel of Discontent in every highway and byway; and the spread of that gospel, as shown by the great Labour Movement, that has filled society with scarcely-concealed terror, shows that our preaching has not been without its effect. But the period of what we may call purely educational Socialism is passing. Education is still needed, admitted; but it is no longer the first thing. Thanks to the cheap productions of the modern printing-press, thanks to almost innumerable lectures delivered in all parts of London and of England also, anyone who really desires to know what Socialism is can easily find out for himself. Besides, there is no reason why we should not carry on educational work with the revolutionary warfare which we intend to wage against capitalist society. Nay, the work in itself will be an education, for we mean to teach the people how to take their own, and finally how to hunt the landlord and capitalist out of the land.

What are the first steps? We have already frequently mentioned them in the Commonweal—the No Rent movement and the General Strike.

The most immediately practical of these is the No Rent movement, so let us deal with this first. It is agreed by all that a fearful trade depression is coming. How are the people, the slaves of the capitalist, to meet it? Are they to starve patiently while the landlord wrenches from them the money which should keep their hungry children alive? No, certainly not; the people must no longer pay shameful rack-rents for the rotten slums in which they dwell. Do you not know, you wretched workers, that you have paid in rent the value over and over again of the stinking bricks and mortar in which you are forced to dwell, worse housed than dogs and swine.

It is time this was ended. The people have suffered dumbly too long; the moment has arrived for action; and in the coming winter those brave men who do not fear to sacrifice themselves for their principles must be prepared to act. Let us set the example, let us be willing to endure some slight risk for the good of humanity, and we shall soon rouse the people from their apathy into bold and vigorous rebellion.

What is to be done? We have already answered. Let a house be taken in the centre of a slum by a man not well known in the movement, and whose appearance will not arouse suspicion. Let the house be garrisoned—five resolute men will be enough. Let us then placard it with bills advising the people to pay No Rent. Let the slums be flooded with revolutionary and No Rent literature. And if the house is well barricaded and fiercely defended with bricks, stones, and hot water, it will not be long before the whole neighbourhood—especially if there is a strong infusion of Irish blood among the inhabitants—will be in open revolt against the house-farmer. And what will that mean? Unless the authorities can suppress it—and it will take more than police and bailiffs to do that—the No Rent movement will spread through every district in London.

But some may ask, how could you defend a district that had gone in for improving the landlord off the face of the earth, so as to defy police and bailiffs? We will tell them how the people might defend it, for it is the people who will have to fight this battle.

Any revolutionist who has walked through the slums, which eighty years ago were suburbs of the city of London, must have noted how well suited they are for a No Rent campaign. The streets are narrow and easily barricaded as they wind among high lofty houses, which women and children might defend against men. Imagine the streets torn up and blocked with overturned barrows, carts, and heaped-up paving-stones. In a No Rent campaign it will not do to stick at trifles. Imagine police and bailiffs climbing slowly and painfully over these barricades under a hail of bottles, bricks, stones, hot water, and missiles of all kinds. Dost thou like the picture? Then do you but to make it a reality.

The No Rent movement has one great advantage, which should commend it to Anarchists. It is not alone at the landlord it strikes a heavy blow, but at all forms of government. What happens to the landlord without rent is what happens to a government that can get no taxes; both are starved out. The workman pays rates and taxes when he pays rent, and when rent ceases taxes cease also. Thus government, having not wherewithal to pay officials, police, and soldiers, will perish of starvation. But supposing the capitalist classes voluntarily tax themselves in order to keep up the government? We have an answer for this. Let the Rent Strike become general, and the General Strike also comes within "the range of practical politics." Nay, has it not become practical now? Did we not nearly see London in the throes of a general strike on that famous Tuesday in 1889, when the labour revolt was at its height? Was there not practically a general strike a few months ago in South Wales, and in Australia also it has since become almost an accomplished fact. The miners, too, have shown how by a few days' cessation of work they can bring the whole industrial machine to a sudden stop. With all these examples before us it is impossible to say that the project of a general strike is impracticable.

It is certain that a general strike of workers cannot be made an international or even a national affair at once. We feel sure that first attempts will be confined to a single large town, or perhaps a district containing several towns, where revolutionary ideas have gained a firm hold upon the people. I have an idea that it may first break out in London, where the idea has been widely preached by Anarchists, Revolutionary Socialists, and even by Social Democrats. The pretext for the strike may be an eight hour day; but its real aim must be the Social Revolution. Revolutions have been repeatedly made for what seemed very trifling demands. For instance, the dismissal of Necker, a popular minister, was the spark which set fire to the powder-magazine in Paris in 1789. In 1848 it was the prohibition of a Reform demonstration by the Government that led to the upheaval of that famous year. And the Commune of Paris was proclaimed through the disgust of the people at the cowardice of their bourgeois republican Government, while the immediate pretext arose from the question as to whether the National Guard were to keep in their charge the cannon they had paid for with their own hard cash. So it is not unlikely that the General Strike which will herald the coming revolution may be brought about by the demand of the workers for an "eight hour day." The working-classes of all countries are unanimous in demanding it; the middle and upper class will be as unanimous in refusing it. It will be impossible to get it through the capitalist Parliament; and in despair the workers who hope that it will make a paradise of this earth will, as a last resort, decide upon a General Strike. Remember that the situation in a few months' time will be so desperate, so many thousands will be out of work and starving, that new unionists and old unionists in despair will throw by their ideas of legislation, and endeavour to obtain what they want by the only means left open to them.

D. J. NICOLL.

THE REDCAP IN THE CITIES.

OUR comrades of the Midland Socialist Federation have published an article by the Rev. A. Reaney in the form of a halfpenny pamphlet. The article is so good, taken from the point of view of an intelligent and friendly middle-class man, that we think some of it is worth quoting:

"Redcap is not the 'rough' nor the 'rowdy,' he is the 'revolutionist.' The rough is quite another sort of being. He is generally a sot, with not a little of the simpleton in him, who goes with his pals and plays their little game. The rowdy is a rough, plus the criminal, vicious, venomous, and vile, but not generally dangerous, save when the police play the fool with the harmless and useless political demonstrator; then the rowdy sees his chance, uses it, and the 'West End' is a little looted and greatly scared. The rough and the rowdy are comparatively brainless, having no ideas on organisation, utterly non-political, and usually cowardly. The 'redcap' on the contrary, is the man of virile mind, with a lurid imagination, full of notions, with a ready eloquence, and quite capable of fighting it out in the streets to the death—his own or another's. The redcap is not a criminal, only so far as a rebel in posse is a criminal. . . . He would not harm a child, and he is generally most polite to women; but child, woman, man, or dog, if they get in his way—the way of the revolution—so much the worse for them. He contemplates civil war as the only remedy for things as they are. The redcap is of all nationalities. In Berlin he is a Socialist; in St. Petersburg he is a Nihilist; in Paris a Communard; in New York a Knight of Labour; and in London he is the redcap. As a politician he is filled with scorn of all political parties. The Tory he pities, sneers at the Liberal, hates the Radical, and looks upon the Socialist as a mere mouth! For all these statesmen he has the utmost contempt. 'They are,' he says, 'surgeons who would stop a bleeding artery with a bit of sticking plaster, and mend a broken leg with a poultice.' Society is rotten, and must be rooted up. Monarchies, parliaments, churches, councils, trade unions, poor law, Sundays, etc., must all go, and will go. The first mission of the redcap, he admits, is to destroy—to be an iconoclast; and then, when the ground is cleared, he would create—a home, a city, a commonwealth, a world!

It may be said, Where is he? Is he numerous, or is he the one mad earnest man, only to be met with here and there? It is a little difficult to answer that question. In all our great cities there are thousands of men discontented, disaffected, defiant, and yet inactive. Redcap is the strong man rising to the surface of their social condition. Count such men from the unit, and they would seem many; reckon them down from the million, and they would look few, very few. I have met them, and have heard others speak of them as being numerous. The foreign element is doubtless, large; but between the English redcap and the Continental redcap there has never been much real sympathy. I remember hearing of a very excited meeting at the time of the West End riots, at which there were some two hundred men, redcaps, with revolvers. Happily the weapons were not used, but they were in hand. But, to rightly estimate the extent of the redcap condition, it is needful to consider this point: Are they representatives of a quiet but deep and extensive feeling which possesses the hearts of thousands in our great cities, but is silent? I am inclined to say, Yes. Three scenes in London life have been very strongly impressed upon my mind and memory. There was a meeting at Stepney Hall a few years since to discuss immigration. The audience was composed of some 700 Socialists, and of about an equal number who were supposed to be anti-Socialists. During the debate a noted Socialist leader was speaking about East End poverty, and stopping for an instant, said, 'There is wealth enough for us all at the West, and shall we take it?' The answer came, as it seemed to me, from the whole audience, 'Yes.' I have seen men moved by the oratory of Gladstone and Bright; but I have never seen men so moved as those East Enders were that night. To some it was the thought of their life put into words; to others it was a new idea, but passionately welcomed. Another scene full of significance was the funeral of the man killed in some row at Trafalgar Square. What a sight it was that winter Sunday afternoon from Whitechapel to Bow Cemetery. Men by thousands, tens of thousands, quiet, moody, too angry and grieved to talk. And another time, at Dod Street—the street pulpit of the Socialists at the East End, from which some assinine inspector ran in two Socialistic preachers. I bailed them out. The next meeting was a sight; it was said forty thousand men were there. Possibly redcaps! There is the quantity unknown. Given some grave social trouble—bad times, a big blunder by the Government or police—and the redcap might colour the life of our cities like an epidemic."

In the same pamphlet there is an account of what is called "An Attempt to Realise Bellamy's Ideal," but as it was started before Bellamy's Book was written we prefer to call it an attempt to realise Socialism:

"My visit to Kaweah will be one of the pleasantest memories which I shall carry with me across the Atlantic. Here I found such a bond of union between the members that they seemed to be really one family. Kaweah is founded on the principle of co-operation. Everything is bought at wholesale prices, and sold at cost to the members. Meals are served at ten cents (5d.), of the most abundant nature, and other things in like manner. At present the people all live in tents, the supports for which have been cut from the trees, and covered with 10 cent drill. A prettier sight cannot be imagined than in the evenings when they are lighted up. Many thousand acres of land are in possession of these colonists on the banks of the Kaweah river, whose rushing waters are the music of the place. The most gorgeous scenery—something like the Yosemite—is the surrounding of as happy a people as live on this green earth. If there is a reflection of the higher summerland it is there, where all men's weal is each man's care. Everything is carried on after the principles of Bellamy's book, although the colony was commenced before that book was written, four years ago. It is situated in Tulare Co., California, thirty-six miles from Visalia. To become a member 100 dols. (£20) cash is paid. Then if the applicant is judged a fit character, he or she is admitted and allowed to work out 400 dols. more, such labour being paid in time checks, which are exchanged for goods in the colony. This 500 dols. (or £100) constitutes life membership, and entitles the recipient to one share in this joint stock company. No member is allowed more than one share and one vote. This is a guarantee that no one member or members can alienate the property away. It seems to me that the future of this colony is protected on every side, not even the trustees, of whom there are five, can have more than one vote, or any power not possessed by the weakest member.

"Men and women are exactly on an equal platform; their labour is paid exactly alike. Eight hours is the length of the day's work. Each chooses the occupation they like best. There are no overseers. I asked one member, 'Do they ever take credit for more than they do?' 'Such a thing has never been known,' said he, 'if it ever was, the member would be so ashamed that it would not occur again. Indeed there is a great deal of work done that is never rendered. I work ten hours a day,' he continued, 'but I never hand in more than eight hours time. I know that it helps the colony.' This is the feeling of all; even of the little children, who are like the children of all the colony. Their education is carefully carried on, the kindergarten system being the foundation of all education. Here, if nowhere else, the divine principle of human brotherhood is carried on."

It does not look as if Socialism was so "impractical" after all.

CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM ON POVERTY.

WE have had reason to differ with Mr. Graham recently, but we will say that if he always wrote and spoke in the style of the following article in this month's Journeyman, the organ of the Amalgamated Society of Tailors, there would not be much difference of opinion between us. He says:

Now, what's the reason of it all? Why is it that there are so many bare backs and such a plethora of coats? Some will answer you, monopoly; others something else. All have their own idea. Mine is, because the balance of mankind are idiots! How easy it would be to change all this. How? you say. My friend, that is my secret. If, though, let us say, merely for purposes of argument, that all the poor of London had resolved to remain so no longer? You may say, "What man by taking thought can add a cubit to his stature?" That is so, of course, and a good thing too, or what a race of giants we should all be;—not that that, by the way, would do much damage to your craft. However, suppose these poor—and poor also predisposes rich; for to develop thoroughly your rich you must also have your poor—well, suppose these all united in one thing, who could stand against them? Hell let loose would not be in it.

Do you know the rich pass lives (in these latter days) of terrible dread of the poor? To be poor is, as we all know, to be a rogue. What a feeling it must be for a rich man to walk out and scarce find (unless in the course of his walk he happens upon Rothschild or Carnegie)—to walk and walk and walk, and never see another honest man! Naturally the poor fellow begins to sweat with terror, and to think, "Fancy if all these (poor) dishonest rogues had the least idea how few of us really honest (rich) men there are in the world!" It is horrible to contemplate the feelings of that man!

Some say, "Poor, but honest." I say, "Bosh!" The rich are honest, wise, handsome, and all the rest of the combined virtues; but the poor—why, of course not; how can they be? The only crime that is never pardoned or forgiven is poverty.

Well, fear is a good lever, too, you know. Having your lever, though, you want a fulcrum. Some old toff, I think it was Archimedes, could have moved the world (at least, he said so) could he have found a fulcrum. Where is your fulcrum? This leads me back again to moralise about the decadence of man. Once there were men, men who shrank at nothing, holding it just as lively after all to die once (fighting, let us say) as to pass a life of slavery. And what is slavery, too? Slavery is that blessed state in which a man works all his time, every day of his life, for some one else, urged on by grim starvation, always waiting, hardly in the middle distance of the picture.

Now, Mr. Graham, you would do far more good by writing like this than by talking about Eight Hour Bills. After all, the capitalist is more afraid of the Revolutionary Socialist than of the mild Labour Reformer.

LIVERPOOL SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—Vegetarian Restaurant, Eberle Street, Dale Street.—Meets every Tuesday at 8 p.m.

NOTES.

THE People's Press returns to the charge re their pet leaders, after restating the falsehood that I bolted from the docker's meeting at Southampton. It adds another by saying that I attempted to stir the meeting into revolt against its appointed trade leader. It will interest the Southampton men as a piece of news to be told that they appointed McCarthy their leader; they think differently.

The literary scullions and paragraph mongers, the Fleet Street hacks who hide behind the anonymous "we," have been the curse of the Labour movement. Some of them have been great wavers of the red flag, but now, having either satisfied their exigencies, or being disappointed in their quest for pelf and notoriety, abuse those who keep with the moving column of Revolutionary Socialism.

The People's Press say that an introspective study of myself would be humorous. An exposure of the hungry ink-slingers who have infested the Labour movement would be very funny indeed. Well, well, they shall have it presently. Cobbett said that he wished all newspaper writers could be paraded in Hyde Park, so that the public might be able to see what a contemptible lot of curs are the "we's" of the press.

F. K.

Our prophecies of impending trouble this winter are likely to be fulfilled. It is quite evident that Messrs. Allan and Co. are determined to bring on a fight with their corn-porters at the first opportunity. Their policy of writing a string of slanders to papers, stating that the only thing necessary to "reform" their men is to smash their union at the first opportunity, is but the beginning of the campaign of slander and force which the capitalists of this country are preparing to carry on against the labour unions.

There are more ways of telling a lie than one, and Messrs. Allan have hit upon a very ingenious method. They informed the public that the men in their employ were earning 15s. a-day, but they forgot to mention that the work of the corn-porters is exceptionally dangerous, unpleasant, and unhealthy, and also that it is very irregular. They also forgot to mention that the ordinary dock-labourer was certainly not earning 15s. a-day, but barely averaged 20s. a-week. Ingenious gentlemen.

The hirelings of the capitalist press did not hesitate to lie boldly, and told the middle-class world that that bloated aristocrat of labour the London docker was earning 15s. a-day, and then was not satisfied; and though the lie has been contradicted, the majority of the middle-class men and a good many workmen are also of the opinion that that is the rate of wages down at the docks. This lie no doubt will also have its effect in increasing the rush of blacklegs to the docks when "the cold weather comes," and brings with it the Great Lock-out.

Yes, this inhuman threat of Messrs. Allan and Morgan shows what dockers may expect. They will first cruelly slander the men, and when they have turned "public opinion" against them, will ruthlessly turn them out to starve, importing shoals of blacklegs to take their places. Let it clearly be understood that these gentlemen are going to wage a ruthless war of extermination against women and children, and their allies in this infernal warfare will be hunger and cold.

When the "cold weather" comes there will be starving men, women, and children down by the docks. Cupboards will be empty, grates fireless, little children will cry to their parents for bread and they will have none to give them. And for what? That the unholy alliance of the blackleg and the sweater may cut the throat of organised labour, and bring back the old slavery of shameful sweating and starvation wages.

Will the men bear this patiently? We think not. We are sure that "bloody times" are coming, and we cannot afford to lose a single man in skirmishing with the police. It would doubtless please these valuable officers to get all the "dangerous men" in London under lock and key before the Great Lock-out takes place, but we must not play into their hands. We must not waste our strength in fruitless struggles before the great battle is upon us. Wait till the iron is hot before you strike, and then Strike and strike hard.

We were startled last week by the news that our brave friends the Guards were dying of fever in Bermuda. There has since been an "official contradiction," which nobody believes. It is clear that these gallant soldiers have been sent out to an unhealthy station to be swept off through fever and pestilence by our present government. It is not the first time this mode of "punishing" rebellious soldiers has been adopted by the "authorities." Our friends are referred to Dickens' "Uncommercial Traveller" for a similar case. We do not know what the members of the present Government call the sending of soldiers to a station where they know they will be swept off by pestilence, but we call it MURDER. We also hope that the soldiers will remember the gentlemen who sent their comrades out to perish in an unhealthy climate because they had revolted against their small-minded tyranny.

N.

Various Radical newspapers (of course including the Star—under the inspiration, I presume, of "Colman's-Mustard" Stuart) are working themselves into quite a frenzy of admiration over W. A. Hunter's State Insurance scheme, which, it seems, is another infallible nostrum warranted to cure all social diseases. Even that eclectic-minded scribe, "Dodo," in Reynolds', thinks it has much to recommend it, although of "such magnitude" that it is "open to criticism." Who would believe that all this fuss was about a plan for giving a starvation pension to a stray workman here and there who has contrived to survive to 65 (the average length of life of his class being 27 years) and to subscribe 6d. a-week during his life of toil?

The fact is, of course, that the middle classes are so firmly persuaded of the necessity of their own continued existence and the impossibility of any root and branch change in social organisation, that even the more kindly-natured of them are ever seeking for some feeble palliative of present ills which does not involve the destruction of that bourgeois civilisation which is so dear to them. To do our Radical friends justice, they have never realised the horror of present conditions—a horror which, once realised, does make some half-a-dozen born bourgeois as irreconcilable revolutionists as are to be found in the proverbial day's march. Most of them, too, are really profoundly ignorant of what the Socialism, of which they speak so glibly, really means. They are authorities, it may be, on Roman Law or Austin's Jurisprudence (learning which has less importance or value in modern life than the disquisitions of Thomas Aquinas); but they know nothing of Marx (not to speak of Kropotkin), and they think themselves wondrously well read in revolutionary literature because they have skimmed through the "Fabian Essays."

If, for my part, in these Notes I seem to harp unduly on the one string of bourgeois ignorance and bourgeois incapacity, it is because that touching faith of the proletarian in the "educated" man which has so often led him astray in the past appears to me to be by no means yet dead. Yet die it must, if the Revolution is not to fail as former revolutions have failed. If middle-class men join the movement, they must do so as privates in the ranks, and the workers must take care to guard themselves from any exaggerated regard for their opinions. The present writer feels every moment of his life the poisonous influence of the vaunted bourgeois education and the hateful bourgeois surroundings—an influence from which it is hard, indeed to shake oneself free. Slavery does not as a rule produce ideal types of humanity, and the worker has doubtless defects enough of his own, but in his advance towards the more perfect day let him not seek aid from middle-class professors—blind leaders of blind folk.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"A TREACHEROUS ATTACK."

Sir,—Having read your leader of last week and Mr. Hubert Bland's article in the Sunday Chronicle to which it refers, I hope you will allow me through your columns to utter a word of protest. The opinions expressed by Mr. Bland in the article are neither here nor there. False or true, he has the same right to hold and to express his own opinions as any one else. But the whole gist of Mr. Bruce Glasier's attack lies in the use of the word "cowardly." What are the facts? When Mr. Bland wrote his article he was on the point of starting on a lecture campaign in Lancashire, on platforms where free discussion was invited, and where it would have been perfectly possible for the "Socialist leaders" to meet him and overthrow him. He appears to have thought it desirable to advise the Lancashire folk to see that they got their Socialism undiluted with "Bleat, bletcher, and bunkum," whatever may be the true inwardness of that alliterative trinity. This he might easily have done by means of an anonymous article, noms de plume only being usually attached to articles appearing in the Sunday Chronicle. Even had he adopted this course, I fail to see how a charge of cowardice could have been sustained against him, but he deliberately threw away the shield of anonymity and stated his opinions above his signature. In these circumstances the epithet "cowardly" is singularly unfortunate, and can only be excused by the assumption that Mr. Bruce Glasier's brain at the time of writing was somewhat overheated by the too closely-fitting cap with which Mr. Bland had gratuitously supplied him.

As to Mr. Bruce Glasier's astounding interpretation of the closing sentence of the article of which he bletheringly complains, if his penultimate name be any indication of his nationality, explanation is useless and I am dumb. Neither Mr. Bland, nor I, alas! have the requisite surgical skill which alone could elucidate the point to Mr. Glasier.

Trusting to your sense of fair-play to give the same publicity to this letter as you have given to the eloquent bleat of Mr. Glasier,—I am, Sir, Your Obedient Servant,

F. E. MARSHALL STEELE, Hon. Sec.

Practical Malthusianism.

The old spartans had a wiser method; and went out and hunted down their Helots, and speared and spitted them, when they grew too numerous. With our improved fashions of hunting, Herr Hofrath, now after the invention of firearms, and standing armies, how much easier were such a hunt! Perhaps in the most thickly peopled country, some three days annually might suffice to shoot all the able-bodied Paupers that had accumulated within the year. Let Governments think of this. The expense were trifling; nay, the very carcasses would pay it. Have them salted and barrelled; could not you victual therewith, if not Army and Navy, yet richly such infirm Paupers, in workhouses and elsewhere, as enlightened Charity, dreading no evil of them, might see good to keep alive?—Carlyle's: Sartor Resartus.

THE CRY FOR WORK.

AGAIN we hear that lamentable cry, which becomes more loud and fierce every year—the cry for work. Already the Social Democrats are stirring, and meetings of the unemployed are daily being held in London. I have been a patient listener to some of the speeches delivered, and must say that the language used has been plain and unmistakable; and if such plain speaking continues we may, during this winter, look out for squalls, as our nautical friends put it.

“Pray, what is all this talk about?” said a bystander (evidently one of the classes) to me at the steps of the Royal Exchange. “The old story,” I replied; “agitating for work for the unemployed; for the opening of municipal workshops, shortening the hours of labour, and so on.” “Ugh!” grunted my enquirer, “then they will never get it.” I silently agreed with him that they would never get it, unless they were victorious over the batons of the police and bayonets of the soldiery. I ventured to say so to one of the speakers (privately, of course), and he answered, “Well, I agree with you; but at any rate we will have a damned row, and so help the Revolution forward.” Mr. Edward Sansom puts it like this—that if you lock up a dozen pigs in a sty without food, they will set up such an agitation that life in the neighbourhood will become unbearable, and the pigs will get food, if only for the sake of peace and quietness; and such, it appears to me, will be the case with the unemployed. The classes will, no doubt, give a little food to the people—whose numbers this winter will, as John Burns puts it, be upwards of one and a half millions—in order to stave off the dread day of reckoning which is fast approaching. Deputations from the unemployed are to wait on the executive of the Dockers and other unions to urge them to take up the question, with what result still remains to be seen.

I venture to say that, judging by the action of the capitalists in this and other countries, and the activity shown by the various governments the world over in sending soldiers and police to their assistance, the classes are getting into a great funk, and are intent on a little blood-letting if needs be, in the hope that they may stay the great Social Revolution, if only for a time. Seeing all this as we do, is it wise, I ask, that the Revolutionary Socialists should hold their hand, as it were, or would it not be wiser and better that they should enter the breach at once, before the position is taken up by our quondam friends the charitable philanthropist and his kindred, and point out that nothing short of the complete overthrow of the system will or can sweep away this everlasting misery for the workers? The fear of being unemployed makes a man a coward, because he is bound to submit to the whims and caprices of the capitalist and his bullies, more especially if he is a married man. Furthermore, being unemployed also makes a man a coward, for he also has too often to cringe and beg for work, very often becoming a blackleg against his will, because he has a stomach to feed and perhaps a wife and children.

It seems to me, in face of this, that plain speaking is necessary above all things, and that is why I venture to pen these remarks. I contend that there is no time to waste if we wish to prevent the useless shedding of blood. That the authorities are bent on mischief is shown by such an expression as the following, which dropped from an inspector of police who accompanied Chief-Superintendent Foster on Saturday last. This officer called out “Drive over the ——!” to a Custom-Office carman. No doubt his intention was to provoke a premature conflict, in which (as there were some two hundred police in reserve) the people would no doubt have had a rough time of it at the hands of those believers in “moral persuasion.” However, their hopes were not realised.

Now, it appears to me that if fighting is to be indulged in this winter, it should be for something better than municipal workshops, or eight-hours day legislation, neither of which are worth the shedding of one single drop of the workers' blood. I contend, therefore, that we ought to lose no time in putting before the workers, either employed or unemployed, the real and only cause of their misery—namely, the existence of a legalised band of robbers, who make them strangers and paupers as well as slaves in their native land. This band of robbers are known by many names, such as landlords, capitalists, shareholders, debenture and consol holders, and usurers. Let us tell the people that the workers' misery will continue until these are got rid of. Let there be no mistake, for if people are taught to look to Parliament and municipalities for relief, the rising, if there be one, will only be for a change of masters. We must teach them something more—i.e., the abolition of the master class altogether. There are not wanting signs throughout the country that this cry of the unemployed will become very loud and savage during the next few weeks, and we ought, I think, to preach the doctrine that the country people should seize on the land, the mechanics on the workshops and factories, the miners should take the mines, while all workers should help themselves to the stored up wealth produced by their labour. Our cry should be—Death to thieves and idlers! and if we are agreed and determined, who shall say us nay?

In a recent number of the Whirlwind, a paper for the classes, we find that about half of the British army are not to be trusted. If this be true—and from what I have seen and heard personally from soldiers I have come in contact with in various parts of the country it is not far wrong—the day of revolution is near at hand. I have recently paid visits to the soldiery near Leicester, Sheffield, Hull, Leeds, Nottingham, Derby, and other places, circulating among them revolutionary literature, and have received from them many expressions of sympathy and support. We may also be able to do the same with the 19th Yorkshire Regiment presently, and if it has no other effect, it will make them not quite so eager to use their bayonets as in the Southampton strike. There will be plenty of work of a disagreeable nature for soldiers to do this winter with strikes and the unemployed. We should be at all times ready for whatever may turn up, and not hesitate to take advantage of every circumstance that may offer itself by striking a blow at our common enemy. I hold that anything done to check the growing encroachments on our right of public meeting, and any action that may be taken to check the mock patriotism of some of the soldiery and police, will be of infinite value to the revolutionary cause.

Our masters seem bent on appealing to force to settle labour's appeals. Well, I see no reason to fear or dread their action. If force is appealed to on their side, it is surely no time to parly about “moral persuasion” or heroically standing with arms folded to be shot down. We shall only be called cowards on the one hand and fools on the other. Our answer must be in the words of Lingg of Chicago: “If you cannonade us, we shall dynamite you”; and this, I contend, is and can be our only answer. It is no use becoming sentimental. This agitation is growing, and the question of the hour, wherever I have been, is not what is Socialism, but “How can we get it: we are ready to act, show us how and we will do it?” And I firmly believe that the first blow struck, be it where it may, will be the signal for a general uprising all over the country—aye, even in places where as yet Socialism is little known.

In conclusion, my advice is: Be ready, for there is no knowing at what hour the Revolution cometh.

CAPITALIST CATCH-WORDS.

THE fact, daily becoming more evident, that the capitalist class has found itself out should be an encouragement to Socialists. The feudal lord and the Elizabethan squire no doubt sincerely believed that they were heaven-sent blessings to their dependents; the modern Sir Gorgius Midas has begun to have an uneasy consciousness that he is a useless humbug, and he is taking infinite precautions against the catastrophe which history warns him must follow the general acknowledgment thereof. An oligarchy that believes in itself may live long; a ruling class that has no faith in itself or in anybody else may linger, but cannot last.

Significant is the outcry of the capitalist press when the Dilkes, Dunlos, Colin Campbells, and Cleveland Streetists by their impudence reveal to the proletarian who has a spare penny what a flimsy thing is his master's "morality." These exposures we often hear must shake the respect of the people for their masters, and this point is cynically emphasised in "Society in London by a Foreign Resident," a work that had a big sale a few years ago. The "Foreign Resident" tells us frankly that "Society" does not care what its members do provided they don't make a scandal about it, and he mentions that the Prince of Wales (the "little fat man in red," as Mr. Stead's young man once called him) is most particular about church-going, and insists on maintaining a respect for religious ordinances. So we also find that unscrupulous wire-puller, Mr. Gladstone, keeping up the game with articles on the "Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture,"—for he knows that plenty of Christianity is good for workmen.

The patronage of the "Labour members" by the rich, which enabled Mr. Broadhurst at the Trades Congress to unctuously talk about advocating the Cause of Labour "in the palace and in the cottage," is another ingenious little dodge of the capitalist. But most typical of all is the attitude of the press in the event of a strike, such as the gas-stokers at Leeds and the dockers at Southampton. No cry is too mean to use to disparage the workers, and the press exults as they are drenched with a fire-hose or given a "taste of cold steel"—the latter being much in favour in Fleet Street. The strike leaders are taunted with urging their dupes to violence while keeping their own skins safe, the real meaning of this being that the capitalist would like to get the orators, the organisers, and the advisers of a strike into his clutches to make an example of them by slowly murdering them in his prisons. When the dispute hinges on the recognition of a union, the public are told that this is the miserable vanity of the agitators, who want to get power into their own hands, while all the time lawyers, parsons, police, and military, who have nothing to do with the dispute, are working their hardest against the workers.

The latest hypocrisy is the cry of "free labour," which bids fair to be the shibboleth of aggressive capitalism for some time. Although all concerned know that the sole object of the capitalists is to increase their own profits, they and their apologists have the assurance to pretend that they are only anxious about protecting those who desire to work untrammelled by the tyranny of agitators. Newspapers who find it no hardship to be compelled to employ only society men, and lawyers and doctors, who boycott practitioners who try to undersell them, combine in denouncing any interference with "blacklegs," and it would seem that the whole machinery of Government instead of being directed, as Brougham said, to getting twelve men into a jury-box, is intended to get a blackleg into a capitalist's employment. It is satisfactory to find that the hypocrisies of capitalism have less power than of old to mislead the workers, and there can be no doubt that the capitalist beginning by finding himself out will end by being found out by others. And then the end is near!

A NEW VERSION OF THE BATTLE OF HASTINGS.

THE year one thousand and sixty-six was, I think, the year of the great battle. I think so, but am too lazy to consult the guide-book—and Battle Abbey is supposed to stand on the spot where the fight was thickest. Battle Abbey is an old, old place now, and Englishmen—so the guide-book says—"cannot look upon it without emotion." Perhaps this is true. I cannot say, because I did not look upon it. But I looked upon the fleet of boats which disfigured the bay with their painted advertisements of patent pills, and I thought if Englishmen can see that sight without emotion, they may manage calmly to contemplate the spot on which eight centuries ago the Norman pirates and the Saxon brigands fought for plunder's sake, and filled the trenches with their broken block-heads and sullied the rivers with their boozey blood.

The Normans spent the night before the battle in prayer and praise. The Saxons spent it in riot and drunkenness. The Normans won the battle; and having buried the murdered men and built an abbey to the glory of God, they set to work and robbed the country from end to end, sharing out the spoil amongst the professional footpads, broken-down libertines, pot-house bullies, and hireling cut-throats, from whom many of our haughty English nobility are so proud to claim descent. Well, so much for Hastings. If you want a good and graphic account of the battle, I can recommend Dickens's "Child's History of England." There is only one fact in connection with the battle which I want to remind you of, and that is the fact that William the Conqueror is dead. I mention that fact because the majority of my countrymen do not seem to realise it. William has been fatally dead these eight hundred years or so. But the people of this country are still very much like serfs. They still endure the pressure of feudal institutions; they still suffer the land to remain in possession of the spoiler. These are facts which I, as an Englishman, "cannot contemplate without emotion."—"Nunquam" in Manchester Sunday Chronicle.

BELFAST.—On Sunday evening Mrs. Besant delivered an address in the Secular Hall on "Why We Advocate Socialism." Crowded audience.

Review.

THE main attraction in the October number of Igdrasil is a poem by Roden Noel. There is a good deal of Christianity about it, which in our opinion rather spoils it; but the writer shows considerable power in his description of the horrors of the life of the poor, as the following extract will show. It is the soliloquy of a starving workman who is about to commit suicide, listening to the merry peal of the Christmas bells:

O Christmas bells, ye chime to jeer
Poor folk shut in with mortal fear!
"Peace and goodwill to all mankind!"
—Save those whom want and rich men grind—
Art, Science, Banquet, Church, and Revel
Westward feed sense, heart and mind;
Down East, the unshared rule of the devil!

Long have I sought; I cannot find
God who delivers men from evil! . . .

(Bells peal) Well I loved those chimes
In happier times. . . .

Once more we have our cheerful home,
Around the window roses blow;
I see my Mary fair as foam,
Blithely singing, come and go,
While rosed with health the children roam. . . .

Now we are ground 'twixt two mill-stones—

The man that wrings the murderous rent,

Yet shelters not the naked bones
Cooped in his plague-fraught tenement,
And vampires who suck sleek content
From human anguish, tears, and groans,
Clutch the fruit of our life's toil
And batten upon the unholy spoil—
Throwing a wage-scrap back for fuel,
Lest man-mills stop the labour cruel,
And cease with Death unequal duel.

Shall we, chained starvelings, go,
buy law,

To save us from the robber's claw?
Law is a cumbrous thing to move;
It will not come and help for love!
Buy women to starve at "market-price,"

With regard to the robber above we think it a great pity he was not "clutched," and "clutched" so securely that his speedy decease would have been a certainty. If poor people would only stick together and pay "No rent," they would soon make an end of the land thief. In the poem the husband commits suicide, and the poor woman stitches herself into her shroud. This is not so uncommon after all, and yet middle-class political humbugs, with their cant of moderate reform, say that "violence" is very wicked. We think that if the poor were a little more "violent" (the prisons, it is true, might be fuller), but, at least, there would not be so many deaths through over-work and starvation.

PIONEER AID AND SUPPORT ASSOCIATION.

TO THE WORKING MEN AND LOVERS OF LIBERTY OF ALL COUNTRIES.

FRIENDS AND COMRADES,—A heavy burden rests upon our consciences. An indelible stain clings to the American name. We allowed on November 11, 1887, several of the best of our class to be sacrificed to the tyranny of class hatred. The generation that perpetrated, or allowed to be perpetrated, the judicial murder cannot atone for the crime. The cemetery of Waldheim encloses the strangled bodies of our immortal friends. Thousands of brave men and women every year make a pilgrimage to this Golgotha of the proletariat, to dedicate tears to the memory of our heroes, and hear their voices—more powerful in death than in life—crying out, "Lift up your hearts!"

Hence it behoves us to erect a token to show the pilgrims the sacred ground where their dead rest. We are aware that the preservation of their memory does not require a monument of stone or bronze, for they already have erected themselves an eternal monument in our hearts. It is not an imitation of the customs of a conventional world that induces us to direct this request for your help for the erection of this sign of remembrance. This monument shall be worthy of our martyrs—a monition to our duties, an appeal from the dead to the living! The Pioneer Aid and Support Association—whose object is the providing for the families of the murdered and imprisoned labour leaders and other victims of the reaction, as well as to erect a monument to the entombed leaders of the people in Waldheim Cemetery—has, by acquiring title to their graves, removed all obstacles to the execution of their project.

It is the intention to unveil the monument at the next World's Congress of Working-men during the World's Exposition in 1893, to be enabled to show to the visitors that four hundred years after the discovery of this continent a new era has commenced for the wage-workers.

There is no doubt that in Chicago alone the necessary funds could be raised for this monument, a considerable amount having already been obtained; but everywhere the desire has been clamoured to give all comrades and lovers of liberty an opportunity to contribute their mite to the erection of this monument. We, though opponents of the monument culture, consider this clamour as justified. We perceive in the projected monument a symbol of the fraternisation of the wage-workers which has to precede the freeing of an enslaved world. It therefore appears to us appropriate that everybody sign his name to the roll of honour, no matter how small the amount may be.

Please send moneys to the treasurer, Mr. Thomas Greif, 54 West Lake Street, Chicago, Ill., and forward letters-of-advise to the secretary, Mr. Lacher, Avondale Station, Chicago, Ill.

WORKING MEN'S COLLEGE, Great Ormond Street, W.C.—Sidney Webb will give a series of six lectures on "The Economic Results of an Eight Hours Bill," on Thursday October 23rd, and following Thursdays, at 8 p.m. Fee, 2s. 6d.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

Trouble at the Docks.

We have referred in another column to the probable end of Messrs. Allan's dispute with the corn-porters. The Daily Chronicle states that far from earning 15s. a-day at their work, the men were really not receiving more than half that sum, and the fact is that the dispute has simply arisen from Messrs. Allan and Co. wanting to break the agreement of last November. It is clear that Messrs. Allan intend to bring back the old state of affairs, and in order to get sympathy for the blacklegs they desire to employ they have published a very "pathetic" letter, which we imagine was written by some blackleg reporter on a newspaper or by Messrs. Allan's office-boy. It relates the supposed woes of a broken-down small middle-class man, from the point of view of the ordinary begging letter-writer. This gentleman is thirsting for employment as a corn-porter, and suggests that Messrs. Allan should advertise for broken-down clerks and shopmen to go blacklegging down to the docks. Possibly when Messrs. Allan in their "benevolence" have locked out corn-porters and dockers they will despatch a contingent of these abject creatures to take their places. Might we also suggest that Messrs. Allan and Co., in their benevolence, should insure their lives before starting? After all, you know, it is only right that some provision should be made for their "wives and children of tender years" in case of "accidents."

The Unemployed.

A correspondent writes: It was rather amusing on Saturday last to see a large number of policemen, sergeants, and inspectors huddled together round the tomb of the Roman-nosed knight—to wit, Wellington—in St. Paul's Cathedral. It was impossible to imagine a more incongruous mixture than Christopher Wren's magnificent building and about a hundred fat, healthy, uniformed City police. What was the cause of this vast and awe-inspiring assemblage? The unemployed had threatened to hold a meeting on the steps of the sacred edifice. Aye! actually proposed to ventilate their grievances in public. Therefore, this force was hidden away, ready to spring forth at a moment's notice to baton them without mercy, if necessary. But somehow the unemployed didn't turn up in the number expected. Those that did assemble were headed by Power, who, as soon as he tried to speak, was promptly arrested and conveyed to Bridewell Lane Police-station. This broke up the meeting entirely; still the police remained ensconced around Wellington's tomb as though something further was expected. But, alas, nothing occurred, and at four o'clock, just in time to escape the service, about a hundred constables poured forth from the doors of London's cathedral and dispersed. And this is in Christian England—England, the home of the free, where they would sooner profane a "sacred" building with the presence of a horde of perjurers than allow the victims of our corrupt society to protest against their being crushed out beneath the wheels of the Juggernaut of Commercialism.

On Sunday, H. H. Chapman was arrested for attempting to speak in Trafalgar Square. He was dragged to the police-station, and charged with attempting to cause a "breach of the peace." Trafalgar Square must be a very explosive sort of a place, when the deliverance of a speech which would be quite harmless, say, in Hyde Park, causes there "a breach of the peace." We cannot understand why a change of locality should totally alter the character of the act. Surely what is harmless in Hyde Park should be harmless in Trafalgar Square. Our "admirable" and intelligent police think differently; but why, we do not know; we should like an explanation.

On Monday Chapman and Power were bound over to keep the peace for six months. They will be thus prevented from taking part in an agitation during the winter. We must say, we think the sacrifice of two good men is a mistake at this period of the agitation. We cannot spare a man, as we shall need all our forces in a few weeks' time.

ESCAPED SLAVES.

From the Executive of the Cape Town Trade and Labour Council to the Executive of the Socialist League, 24 Great Queen Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, London.

COMRADES,—With the same mail as this you will receive colonial papers containing particulars of the case in which we desire your help. We leave the manner in which you can help us in your own hands, but think some of the Labour members in the House of Commons ought to be requested to bring the matter before the Government. Not that we expect much help from that quarter, but that an explanation might be got as to how to prevent a similar case from occurring, and perhaps be of some service to the unfortunate men whose case we now submit to your consideration.

The particulars of the case are as follows. The Portuguese mail steamer "Rei-da-Portugal" put into the port of Cape Town with a cargo of slaves on board. The vessel was from Mozambique, en route to St. Paulo-da-Laonda, west coast of Africa. On Monday, 15th September, fourteen of the slaves made their escape, and a writ was applied for to the Supreme Court by the Attorney-General to have the men on board produced in court, but owing to the application having been made on behalf of the escaped men instead of and from the men detained on board, the application was not granted. The result was that before another writ could be moved for, the vessel had got clear away, so that forty-two or thereabout are still in slavery. If the Socialist League can do anything to make this matter public and can get it brought before the Government of the country you will help us in this matter greatly.

The Executive of the Trades Council interviewed the men through the aid of an interpreter who had been brought as a slave from the same district (Mashalla, four or five days' journey from Mozambique) several years ago, and found that they had been seized by the Portuguese authorities and thrown into gaol for a month, thence shipped on board the "Rei-da-Portugal" for conveyance to the west coast, St. Paul-de-Loando, and brutally treated during the time they had been detained. We will forward you, if possible, a photo of the group of slaves, with several members of the Trades Council included, as it may be of some use as evidence.

Signed on behalf of the Trades and Labour Council,

JAS. BAIN, Chairman.

Cape Town, South Africa, September 24th, 1890.

We have received a large number of newspaper cuttings, which are at the service of anyone who may like to take up the case.—EDS.

SOCIALISM IN LONDON AND THE PROVINCES.

SOUTH NORWOOD AND STREATHAM.

STREATHAM is waking up! Announcements of speakers from London by our local speakers bring good audiences. Being a middle-class village, our audiences are very critical and hard to please; but our experience is that when the economic basis of Socialism is dealt with by the speakers, well-to-do folks not only listen, but are heard by comrades in the meeting to exclaim, "That is true; you cannot get away from it." Now, this is very encouraging. Our Commonweal always sell out, and good literature is in demand here.

September 13th Smith and Osbourne spoke at Fountain to fair audience. Smith dealt chiefly with the wasted energies of the worker in finding and supporting Socialist candidates to Parliament, and with such effect that he was asked to open a debate at the Battersea Labour League, 164 Lavender Hill, September 25. This was gladly accepted by our comrade. After speaking forty-five minutes, was called on by the chairman to close for discussion, which amounted to disgraceful disorder; three questions aimed at once; no debate was intended. When questions were answered, a fresh batch ready on the organisations of Socialist bodies and their numbers. The climax was reached when our comrade asked every man to produce his trade-union card; and one responded, that of a mason with 9½d. per hour. When denouncing the anti-parliamentary party (the committee of John Burns's election) will never forget the licking-up they had by a Revolutionary Socialist. I quite expect every one has since joined a union.

Sunday 20, no meetings were held. Smith attended the meetings at Thornton Heath and South Norwood; reports per Miss Lupton. September 27th Couchman and Smith spoke at Fountain to good audience; Couchman's first attempt at active propaganda. Commonweal sold out. In the afternoon both comrades went to South Norwood and spoke to large audience, mostly gas-workers and general labourers. We found the People's Press on sale, but after Smith's address Couchman sold out the Commonweal. At the close Smith was asked to sing the "Marseillaise." Cheers for the revolution closed the meeting. October 5th Miss Lupton and Smith spoke on the Common to an audience that did not seem to receive us very favourably, but comparing numbers at ours with the "Gospelers," we had by far the largest, in spite of the attraction of a brass band. Fair sale of Commonweal. At night Mrs. Lahr spoke at the Fountain to a crowded audience, the police having all their work to keep the footpath clear—so much so that Mrs. Lahr was threatened with arrest if the obstruction continued. To satisfy this bully the chairman asked the people to close up, which had the effect of wearying the speakers, not having a platform. Mrs. Lahr spoke over an hour and promised to come next Sunday—expect good meetings all day. Commonweal sold out; 2s. 3d. collected. The "Marseillaise" by Smith closed the meeting, and a most useful month's propaganda was closed.

R. SMITH.

YARMOUTH.

"HURRAH for the Social Revolution!" Prepare for the great revolt so that we be not taken by surprise, for it is coming as sure as light follows darkness. Everywhere we look we see signs of discontent. The spirit of revolt is spreading even in Yarmouth, and the least spark will set fire to the whole country. Therefore it behoves us all to be prepared, for we know not what this winter will bring forth.

In Yarmouth we are working with all our might to educate the people in revolutionary ideas. Our comrades have taken it up lately with great energy, being thoroughly convinced that authority and monopoly has but a short time to live. The lack of funds is the great drawback to the branch. During the summer months 10s. weekly has been spent to pay the fares of speakers from London, besides bill printing, etc., and being all working-men and women, earning at the best of times only from 10s. to 18s. per week, we cannot do much financially, but what is done is done with a willing heart, willing even to sacrifice our lives for the advancement of our noble Cause.

Our comrades of the Hammersmith Branch have assisted us greatly, especially Tochatti, who has been working hard but willingly for us, sacrificing money, and pleasure for the Cause. On Tuesday, August 26th, and during the week, good propaganda has been done in the club-room. Comrades Wess and R. Turner (of London) were with us on a visit for a week or two, revolutionary songs being sung every evening. On Sunday, August 31st, in the morning, on Priory Plain, comrade Wess gave a thoroughly revolutionary speech, which was much appreciated by the audience, assisted by comrade Rogers (of London). A clod-hopper in blue tried to upset the meeting, but seeing we were determined to stand our ground he went away like a dog with his tail between his legs. In the evening on Colman's Quay, Rogers again addressed a fair audience of workers, Wess and Turner having gone to Norwich to assist the comrades there. On Sept. 2nd, a revolutionary concert was held in the club room, comrades A. Tochatti and Headley assisting with their fiddles; altogether a most enjoyable evening was spent. On the 7th, Sunday morning, comrade Leggett (of London) delivered a pointed address to a large and attentive audience, his plain and open speaking having a marked effect on the attentive listeners. In the evening, comrade Mills (of Norwich) addressed a meeting. On the following Sunday morning, a most successful meeting was held on Priory Plain; comrade Bradley (of London) acted as chairman, and opened the meeting by reciting Morris's chant, "The Day is Coming," very effectually; Mrs. Tochatti followed, singing "A Song for Socialism." Comrades Tochatti, Mrs. Tochatti, and family, and Bradley, Mrs. Bradley, and family were on a visit to Yarmouth for a week. Comrade Tochatti then gave an address on the "Practicality of Socialism" and "Some Objections to Socialism," which was well received by a large working and middle-class audience, the meeting being continued for over two hours, and three new members joining as a result of the meeting. In the evening on Colman's Quay, on arriving at the place of meeting, some 50 or 60 children occupied the ground, singing "When Leisure and Pleasure shall be free." This in itself is a healthy sign; they were rather noisy at the beginning of the meeting, but were very attentive a little while after. Mrs. Tochatti sang "No Master," and comrade Tochatti gave a lecture on "The Principles of Socialism." Although the audience was not so large as usual, much interest was shown towards our comrade's able and sensible remarks; good sale of Commonweal. We have again started the Bradwell meeting, comrade Brightwell being the speaker. As a result of our propaganda here a club is going to be started on Socialistic principles.

It is encouraging to see the Cause making such headway in the North of England and the Midlands. The only thing we want is more workers. Unless every Socialist does his utmost to educate his brother or sister workers, if they cannot speak publicly, they can to their shopmates or workmates, also by writing to Commonweal facts of their every-day life, by distributing literature, and those who can by financial help, for the Cause is in great need of it. Work with all your might, comrades, losing not an hour or a minute for the overturn of the present rotten Society. Since last report we have sold 240 Weals, besides Freedom and other literature; collection, 7s. 7½d.

REPORTS.

'COMMONWEAL' BRANCH.—Good meetings have been held at the Hoxton and Union Street stations, Commonweal selling well. The second lecture of the course arranged by this branch took place last Monday, October 13th, at the Autonomie Club, 6, Windmill Street, W., when D. J. Nicoll lectured on "The Glorious Reformation: or, How the English People were Evicted, Robbed, and Murdered by the Ruling Classes." Very interesting lecture indeed. The choir opened and closed the proceedings with revolutionary songs. Collection, 7s. 7d.—W. B.

SOUTH SIDE BRANCH.—Three meetings have been held during the past week. At Short Street on Wednesday, Oct. 8th, large audience; speakers were Leggatt, Buckridge, and Miss Lupton. Short Street again on Sunday morning; speakers were Leggatt, Miss Lupton, and McCormack; 34 Commonweal sold, and 2s. 3d. collected for branch of International Federation of Trades and Industries, the stick umbrella makers, who are on strike. On Sunday evening, meeting at Crown Hill, Croydon; speakers, Leggatt and Miss Lupton; 33 Weals sold. No meeting was held in the afternoon, as Miss Lupton spoke in Victoria Park on behalf of East London Communist-Anarchists. The secretary has to report that this branch, though in its infancy, is in a very flourishing condition; the audiences are large and continually increasing in number, and very attentive and appreciative. There is a great lack of speakers and comrades who could assist from other branches who would be heartily welcomed, also comrades to sell literature, etc.; 7s. 6d. received for branch propaganda from R. Harding.—E. L.

ABERDEEN.—A good meeting was held at Woodside on Sunday, October 5th. The speakers were W. Cooper, Rennie, and Leatham; the singing was excellent. At night our hall was crowded to hear Kropotkin's "Scientific Basis of Anarchy" read; there was a good discussion. The Thursday night meeting on Castle Street was addressed by comrades G. Cooper and Leatham, and on Saturday night in the same place W. Cooper, Rennie, and Leatham spoke to a large crowd. We are looking about for a larger hall for our Sunday night meetings.

GLASGOW.—On Friday Glasier spoke at Bridgeton Cross. On Saturday afternoon comrades Haddow and Glasier went to Tollcross and addressed a meeting of blast-furnacemen and miners, together with a number of their wives. Both speakers explained the principles of Socialism at length, and were enthusiastically received. At the conclusion a quantity of back numbers of the Commonweal were distributed. On Sunday Glasier addressed the Joe Biggar Branch of the Irish National League on Socialism. His criticism of the parliamentary party and his revolutionary statements created quite a spirited discussion, but were heartily approved by the great majority present. In the evening Glasier spoke at Paisley Road Toll, where our members gathered in good force. 7s. 7d. was collected in aid of the blast-furnacemen now locked out.

LEEDS.—We held three splendid meetings here on Sunday, although comrade Sketchley was unable to come from Hull. Our best meeting was on Woodhouse Moor, when Sweeney, Sollit, and Samuels spoke to a most attentive audience, who showed their appreciation and sympathy by subscribing to our funds and buying up nearly all our Commonweal. They sold very fast, owing to the list of "scab" printing houses in London which it contained. I don't think anything could have gone better just now here, as we are at present troubled with a scab evening paper, which is getting roundly abused. We collected 8s. 9d., and sold 130 Commonweal, besides many pamphlets.—H. S.

SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION—EDINBURGH.—On Sunday, in Labour Hall, comrade Ritchie addressed a good audience on "The Two Nations." Many questions were put and replied to, and a lively discussion followed. At Leith comrade Bell delivered a good lecture on "What Socialism is NOT." There was a large audience, and a good discussion, in which Chalmers, president of the Dockers' Union, took part.

DUBLIN.—On Monday, Oct. 6th, Annie Besant and Herbert Burrows (S.D.F., London) addressed a meeting of Dublin factory-girls at St. Patrick's Hall, Clanbrassil Street. Mrs. Besant dealt with the methods of organisation, and showed how the London match-girls had won their great strike. Later in the evening Mrs. Besant lectured in the Antient Concert Rooms, Great Brunswick Street, taking as her subject "The Class War." Mr. James Walker was chairman. There was a good audience, who listened attentively. Discussion was rather poor—O'Hea, Foreman (Railway Workers), Brown, and Fitzpatrick, the last-named "going for" the lecture from the Anarchist standpoint. Several dozen of Commonweal and leaflets were distributed.

Commemoration Meeting of the Chicago Martyrs and Bloody Sunday.

ON Thursday, November 13th, a great meeting (convened by the Socialist League) will be held in the large Hall of the Radical Club, Kay Street, Hackney Road, to commemorate Bloody Sunday and the Murder and Imprisonment of our Chicago comrades. Full particulars, names of speakers, etc., will be given next week. See small bills.

The Wrongs of the Poor.

It is not because of his toils that I lament for the poor: we must all toil, or steal (howsoever we name our stealing), which is worse; no faithful workman finds his task a pastime. . . . But what I do mourn over is, that the lamp of his soul should go out; that no ray of heavenly, or even of earthly knowledge, should visit him; but only, in the haggard darkness, like two spectres, Fear and Indignation bear him company. Alas, while the Body stands so broad and brawny, must the Soul lie blinded, dwarfed, stupefied, almost annihilated! Alas, was this too a Breath of God; bestowed in Heaven, but on earth never to be unfolded!—That there should one Man die ignorant who had capacity for Knowledge, this I call a tragedy, were it to happen more than twenty times in the minute, as by some computations it does.—Carlyle: 'Sartor Resartus.'

A "QUIET" TIME.

POSSIBLY the ordinary newspaper reader would not think that during the last week we have been passing through a very critical period. If, however, he had been interested in Stock Exchange speculations he would have known it. Anyone who has read the Money article in the papers recently, though he may not be an expert in these matters, can see quite clearly that a serious crisis was only prevented last week by some of those clever manipulations in which the thieves of the Stock Exchange excel. Yes, but this crisis has been postponed, not prevented. It must come, and the longer it is held back by the expert manœuvres of these gentlemen the heavier will be the crash in the end.

Another dangerous sign, the number of unemployed even among the skilled trade unionists is steadily increasing. Mr. Burnett in his recent Board of Trade Report, says: "The unions reporting show an aggregate membership of 229,517, and of this number 6,197 are out of work, this being a proportion of 2.60 per cent. as compared with 2.28 in the month preceding and 2.10 for the corresponding month of 1889." So the number of unemployed is steadily growing, and after all work is not so easily obtained as the reverend Canon Gregory of St. Paul's appeared to think the other day. The unemployed who appear in our streets have, then, some reason for their existence. If so many men are out of work in skilled trades, what must it be in the unskilled, and what will it be when the big crash comes on 'Change which we can all see approaching?

And now, despite the seeming peace at the docks, preparations are being actively made for the coming battle. "No lock-out is intended," say the dock directors. Of course, bless their innocent hearts, they never thought of such a thing! They are only engaging a thousand "permanent hands." "The committee entertain no vindictive feeling toward the dockers, and wish to work amicably with them, but for their own protection and in the interests of their customers, they will in case of future intermittent troubles, draft these permanent men to the spot at which their services are most required." Kind, thoughtful gentlemen! We hear also they are going to propose a new wage system on the 4th November. So in addition to employing blacklegs to take the men's places if they strike against any tyranny, they will benevolently lower their wages also. We wonder if the dockers will stand this. We do not think so, though it is a pity that the weakness and vacillation of their leaders should have encouraged the directors to have taken up this openly hostile attitude.

This is indeed a very quiet time—depressingly quiet. But it only reminds us of an old story. An Irish gentleman was once complimented upon the "quietness" of his country. "O, yes," he replied, "we are very quiet; we are as quiet as gunpowder over there." Yes, and this is the position of affairs everywhere at the present time. The resolution of the Lille Congress in favour of a general strike of miners; the appearance of a strong revolutionary section in the "constitutional" German Social Democratic Party; the growing discontent and agitation among the workers in every country in Europe,—all point to serious trouble in the immediate future. The crisis is inevitable, and when it comes—and come it will—no power on earth can save the capitalist classes from swift and speedy destruction. N.

THE CURSE OF LAND-MONOPOLY.

"Ill fares the land to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates and men decay."

OF all social diseases, that of land-monopoly is the most widespread, the deepest rooted, and the oldest standing; it is the origin and fount of poverty, want, disease, and the thrice-accursed wage-system; the upholder of modern warfare, class institutions, and the hateful spirit of nationality, and forms the rotten basis of our so-called civilisation—a civilisation which requires the constant support on all sides of Church, Army, State, and Law to prevent its crumbling to pieces and disappearing. Though these buttresses form worthy points of attack by the Revolutionary Socialist, yet the one which he goes for with the greatest ardour is that of the sacred institution of land-monopoly, the haven to which the bourgeois ever turns his head after a successful business career; for private property in land is the pedestal of privilege and power, and to be a landed proprietor is his final earthly beatitude. Huckstering and sweating must give place to rent-mongering, which is much more respectable.

What an amazing change our worthy friend undergoes after his retirement from "shop." The metamorphoses of a grub are nothing to it. After having gorged himself to his satisfaction on the toil of his "hands" (I don't mean his own useless paws, but the men and women who have spent what ought to have been their brightest days in his factory-hell), he turns his attention from vulgar trade to the more gentlemanly existence of a landed proprietor. True, during his days of labour exploitation he has been the means of shortening the lives of his hirelings to one-half of Nature's allowance, and has recruited to some extent the ranks of prostitution from his work-women; but in this there is nothing at all illegal. It is not his place to keep girls in finery and luxuries; besides, they agreed to work for the wages he offered them, and they were free to go elsewhere if they were not satisfied. This is a free country.

Well, let bygones be bygones. He is somebody else now; a country gentleman living on his estate; a churchwarden, perhaps, taking a strong interest in Sunday-schools, agriculture, philanthropical movements, and the like, and ready to hold out the hand of fellowship to the working man—particularly if it lies in the power of the working man to return him to Parliament at the next election.

Until very recently the attention of the bourgeoisie was so rigidly fixed on their own contemptible and selfish interests that they could not spare a glance for the symptoms of approaching disaster. They failed to see that “Slowly comes a hungry people, as a lion, creeping nigher, Glares at one that nods and winks behind a slowly-dying fire.”

But now they are fully awake to the dangers which beset their blessed estate, they are no longer blind to the ever-growing spectre of Communism, which stalks around and threatens this monster of Land-monopoly; a monster resembling a gigantic octopus, holding nations in its stifling grasp, and sucking from them their life blood through its numberless tentacles.

No other country is held by such a comparative handful of individuals as is the United Kingdom, at once the wealthiest and most pauperised country in the world.

Two-thirds of the soil of England and Wales are held by 10,200 persons ” ” Scotland ” 330 ”
 ” ” Ireland ” 1,942 ”
 One-third of the United Kingdom is held by 500 peers
 35,000 persons practically “own” the whole of the British Islands.

Here are figures relating to a few of the large land-monopolists in these islands :

	Acres.	Rental.
The Duke of Sutherland holds	1,358,545	£141,667
Earl Doncaster	460,108	231,855
Marquis Breadalbane	438,358	58,292
The Duke of Richmond and Gordon	286,409	79,671
The Earl of Fife	249,220	72,563
The Duke of Devonshire	198,572	180,750
The Duke of Northumberland	186,397	176,048
The Duke of Portland	183,199	107,920
The Duke of Hamilton	179,650	162,165
Marquis of Lansdowne	142,916	62,025

	Acres.
400 peers and peeresses hold	5,728,979
1,288 great landowners have	8,497,699
2,529 others hold	4,319,271
10,888	51,885,185
2,184	38,875,522
955	29,663,849
421	22,880,755

There is no need to continue these dry, sickening statistics—anyone can read the entire table if he care to look it up. The whole thing is a hideous legend in figures, showing the growth and development of the worst side of man's nature, dominating and befouling the whole history of our peoples; where should be a glowing narrative of real progress and development of a happy race living natural lives in the beautiful regions which Nature has so lavishly provided for all her creatures, we find a dreary record which requires coercion to make even children read, and which nobody cares to recollect after leaving school—a dreary record of little else but bloody destruction, enslavement, and robbery, a state of things continuing with unchecked fury at the present hour, only to be brought to a full stop by a collision with the fast-gathering forces of Social Revolution.

Before the invasion of William the Norman, private property in land was entirely unknown. The soil was divided into folk-land, belonging to no person or community, but to the nation as a whole, and common-land, held by organised communes and not by separate individuals.

With the Norman Conquest the whole of the land became vested in the Crown, and all lands were held from the king, as representative of the nation, the holders being bound to render certain duties in return, the chief of which were military service in person and the raising of so many capable men-at-arms, proportionate to the extent and population of their estate. This, of course, implied that the first essential was a healthy population.

It is curious to compare the value with regard to the land in which the ruling class held their fellow-men then and the value in which they hold them now. In those days the land was considered of less value than the men who worked upon it, and was looked upon merely as the natural means of raising healthy and capable human beings. Nowadays, a man is regarded by the landlords only as a rent-provider, to be chased from his home and country as soon as he ceases to be useful to them as a tenant. Our outcast will find much consolation and encouragement in that his exodus will have been already provided for by that great and good assemblage of capitalists and landlords, the People's Representatives, in the shape of Assisted Passages to the ends of the world—anywhere, so long as he gets off their land and out of their sight.

Now, the feudal barons, without doubt, were heavy-handed masters, but they were not rent and profit mongers; they did not compel a man to toil for them sixteen hours a-day and then pay him for only four; neither was a woman forced to exist in a rack-rented garret and make shirts for ninepence the dozen. In those days there was rough plenty and comfort and leisure for all; and industry was free, for the new lords of the soil readily relinquished their feudal rights when groups of skilled craftsmen happened to be formed within their manors. Industry thus finding herself fancy-free, grew and grew, and soon found herself giving birth to her offspring, Art, who quickly began to bedeck and adorn her with her lovely blossoms in a thousand different ways, so genial a soil had she now found, and before long the people's lives were interwoven through and through with her bright and joyous fantasies; churches (of which some bare, discoloured shells still exist), dwellings, arms, dress, every detail of daily existence, became an illuminated and beautified outcome of the new life. Every surviving fragment of craftsmanship of these days seems to carry with it the warmth of the worker's hand and the impress of the worker's love for his work. What of our modern everyday articles will find a place in the museums of the future? Will a policeman's helmet or an automatic sweetmeat-machine be treasured up alongside of Greek, Indian, and Gothic wreckage as examples of a lost and admired art? Yes, surely, if competition should continue to be the ruling factor in our industrial system for another century or two. But this will not be. “The revolt of the New World against the Old,” says Auguste Bebel, has broken out. The stage is crowded with actors; the struggle will be carried on with an amount of intellect such as the world has seen in no struggle before, and will see in none after. For it will be the last social struggle. The nineteenth century will hardly end before the conquest is decided.”

The feudal system may be said to have been maintained, in a loose enough manner, no doubt, for about five hundred years, and came to an end towards the close of the fifteenth century. From about this date commenced landlordism, such as we now know it. The holders of estate began to find out that the soil was the only stay between man and starvation and that he could not exist apart from it, and that private possession of land gave the owner almost unlimited power over the lives of the creatures upon it. Then began the general scramble for the soil, and the landlords with greater rapacity proceeded to enclose and tighten their grasp upon their own estates and whatever lands besides they could manage to lay hold of.

The success of this first stroke for plunder whetted the greed of the landlords, and they panted for more booty. They did not have to wait long for a champion: they found one in Bluff King Hal (Bluff Bill Sykes, he should have been called), the wife-murdering bully, who entered into a conspiracy with them to seize the Catholic churches, priories, and hospitals, and the lands attached thereto. The upshot of this affair was that Henry the Eighth, King by the Grace of God, and his favourites, netted between them about a third of the best agricultural land of the kingdom.

The next great step towards completely monopolising the land took place in the reign of Queen Anne, when began the enclosing of the commons. This kind of legalised robbery continues to the present hour. Altogether over 7,000,000 acres of common land have been filched from the poor by Acts of Parliament. There is not much more land left now worth pilfering. Here and there are little bits of common supporting a family or two with their donkey or their cow. These patches will be nibbled up by the neighbouring landlord bye and bye, perhaps, when he gets or can manufacture a suitable excuse. But there are places in these islands—places worth looking at, too—where a man is still free to ramble unmolested and without fear of prosecution or spring-guns. Have these places, then, been overlooked by the land-grabber? Not a bit of it. They would have been filched long ago had it been worth while; but then, don't you see, nobody else wants them, and a land-grabber does not care to go to the trouble of filching that which nobody else wants. “The force of the guinea you have in your pocket,” says John Ruskin, “depends wholly on the default of a guinea in your neighbour's pocket. If he did not want it, it would be of no use to you. The degree of power it possesses depends accurately upon the need or desire he has for it.”

Now, up to the time of the Stuart Restoration, no taxes were paid by the people, the income from the land forming the principal source of revenue for defraying the expenses of the State; but, during the reign of Charles II. these feudal enactments were abolished by Act of Parliament (carried by means of threats and bribery on the part of the landlord party), and their burdens shifted on to the shoulders of the landless in the shape of an excise on beer, wine, tobacco, and a number of other articles. Thus the landlords threw off their obligations but they stuck to the land, and their descendants and successors stick to it still, drawing rent, together with royalties on minerals, to the amount of about £300,000,000 a year. This is the price which we have to pay them for their permission to use our land. Truly the original squatters perpetrated the most profitable piece of piracy on record; they little thought that their descendants and successors would at the present time be able to plunder the earnings of the workers to this extent.

A land monopolist's privileges now extends to everything in the heavens above and the earth beneath, and in the waters and minerals under the earth; a privilege born of bloodshed and seizure, and enforced to this hour by means of prisons, police, and soldiery. How mercilessly a land monopolist will enforce his “rights” to enable him to satisfy his lust for rent, or his spite at being foiled in his pursuit of it, is best shown in Dr. Wallace's book on “Land Nationalisation,” also in the Liberal newspapers of to-day, wherein the reports of evictions and agrarian matters are given with a faithfulness of detail well calculated to damage the reputation of the present Jacks-in-office, and to inspire one with the idea that one has only to place the reins of government (and the fat salaries hanging thereto) in the hands of the Liberal gang to see how nicely they will settle all these unfortunate disagreements between landlord and tenant.

NORWICH.—C. W. Mowbray addressed two good meetings here on Sunday. In the afternoon he spoke at an open-air meeting in the Market Place to a very attentive audience. The evening was also very successful, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather. Afterwards a meeting of members took place to consider what steps should be taken to carry on a vigorous propaganda during the winter months. 4s. 8d. worth of Commonweal sold; 10s. collected towards Mowbray's fare from London, and 8s. 4d. for Chicago Martyrs' Commemoration Fund.—S.

TOMMY ATKINS.

(From Songs of the Army of the Night.)

I STAND and watch the soldiers
Marching up and down,
Above the fresh green cricket-ground
Just outside the town.

I stand and watch and wonder
When in this English land
This poor fool Tommy Atkins
Will learn and understand?

Zulus and Boers and Arabs,
All fighting to be free,
Men and women and children,
Murdered and maimed has he.

In India and in Ireland
He's held the people down,

While the robber English gentleman
Took penny and pound and crown.

To make him false to his order,
What was it that they gave—
To make him his brother's oppressor?
The clothes and pay of a slave!

O thou poor fool Tommy Atkins!
Thou wilt be wise that day
When with eager eyes and clenched teeth
Thou riseth up to say—

“This is our well-loved England,
And I'll free it if I can
From every rotten bourgeois
And played-out gentleman!”

FRANCIS ADAMS.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

Above the mingled din of Congresses—Possibilist, Collectivist, Marxist—there comes to English workers' ears the cry for help of the Calais lace-makers. It is cheering news indeed that that cry has been so well responded to, especially by those of the same trade at Nottingham. Frenchman and Englishman joining hands across the Channel against the common enemy, Capitalism, is the sort of “cordial understanding” that Socialists like to see.

Our Anarchist comrade Dumas (of Saint-Etienne) speaking lately at Romans, gave a good answer to an inquirer who suggested that Collectivism would serve as a transition to true Communism. “Collectivism,” said Dumas, “is too late in the field, and can no longer play the part which might have been open to it forty years ago. The workers have discovered that they are exploited, as it is, by masters and governors; they will never yield to the yoke of a Statistical Committee, which would necessarily transform itself into a reactionary Government. The Anarchist ideas have fostered wider views, and are easier to understand by brains which are evolving new conceptions. If road-locomotives had been invented in time they would have ploughed along every highway, but they were anticipated by the more useful railway-engine, and so remained an antiquarian curiosity. So will it be with Collectivism and Anarchism.”

The Congress of the so-called Workmens' Party at Châtellerault fell to internecine strife in the most approved Parliamentary fashion, and some delegates were expelled by the majority acting under the orders of the excellent Brousse. It is claimed that the delegates excluded really represent the majority of the party, and a meeting of the party has been held in Paris repudiating the Congressional action. La Parti Ouvrier, the organ of the dissidents, uses strong language concerning the conduct of the Possibilist Municipal Councillors.

The Marxist Congress at Lille seems to have passed off more quietly. The “Marxists” decided to take part in the Brussels International Congress next year.

I am sorry indeed to note that the editors of the excellent Paris Révolution are driven to publish the following notice: “We only appear this week by dint of lengthening our already long list of debts. Comrades must not be astonished if they do not receive the paper next week.” Now, you French-speaking revolutionists, hurry up. It would be deplorable indeed if the workers were to lose yet another organ by their own default.

ITALY.

Il Fascio Operaio of Alessandria translates with approval the article on the English Working Class Movement in La Révolution, upon which our comrade Nicoll commented a week or two back. Our comrades of the Italian “Workmens' Party,” if they read English, should correct false impressions by referring to Nicoll's article.

The Italian Workmens' Party holds its fifth General Congress at Milan on November 1st and 2nd. The agenda-paper compares somewhat favourably with those of Social Democratic gatherings elsewhere. The foremost question on the “order of the day” is “The necessity of organising the party on the one basis of ‘Resistance.’” This sounds well.

An excellent new Anarchist paper, La Campana of Ancona (to which our comrade Merlino contributes a most interesting paper on “Objections to Anarchist Socialism”), hopes to organise a general congress of all Italian Socialists early in the spring of 1891. Ticino has been mentioned as a suitable locality. Crispi is hardly likely to allow a revolutionary gathering in the kingdom of Italy. A general congress of Italian Socialists is being actually attempted at Ravenna under the auspices of the parliamentarians. Revolutionists apparently will not be welcome there and will not attend.

A somewhat astonishing bit of Italian news comes to us by way of Barcelona. An Anarchist journal, La Nuova Riscossa, was prosecuted before the local court at Trapani on account of its articles on the First of May movement. “The defence of the advocate Grignany,” says El Productor, “was a reasoned and brilliant exposition of Anarchist principles. It carried away the audience, and even the very jury, who returned a unanimous verdict of ‘Not Guilty.’” English bourgeois are made of sterner stuff, and imagination fails to realise an English advocate delivering an Anarchist oration in court. It would be an excellent way of disposing of some of our more obnoxious judges. Surely they would die of the shock. Seriously speaking, I join with the writer in El Productor in congratulating our comrade Grignany and his clients.

The Roman correspondent of the Daily Chronicle (for once I may quote from a capitalist paper) says that “according to official information on the subject, the number of unemployed workmen amounts to about 100,000 in Rome and the provinces, with perhaps a like number in the Romagna and at Milan, and some 60,000 at Turin, not to mention those in the remaining provinces.” How glorious a triumph it is to be a citizen of “free Italy,” and what a sweet boon to the workers is the thing called “constitutional government”!

CUBA.

Havannah has been deeply moved by the provisions of the American Tariff Bill, and it seems not unlikely that many a worker's child in Cuba will have reason to curse the name of MacKinley. The Cuban employers talk of a general cessation of manufacture and commerce with the object of forcing the Spanish Government to enter into a commercial treaty with the United States. That meanwhile the workers (already hard pushed by eight months of scarcity of work) would be starving, is not, of course, a matter that masters care about. It may be, however, that the bosses will hesitate before taking this extreme step, not from pity but from fear. It may be dangerous to drive the workers too much into a corner. El Productor (of Havannah) says: “We warn our workers beforehand, so that should this cessation of work come they may know how to rise to that height to which every people should reach when the means of subsistence are snatched from them, and it is sought to lead them to death by hunger. Mayhap this lock-out may prove true the saw which tells us that ‘the unification of the toilers will be the work of the rich, even as the Social Revolution will be the work of the poor.’ Let the lock-out come; we do not desire it, but as little do we fear it. Should it come, the rich will be responsible for what may happen.”

SPAIN.

Our comrades in Barcelona are preparing to celebrate the Chicago anniversary. Strikes, of a more or less sporadic character, continue there.

At Játiva the Anarchists are holding a series of meetings, to which the “partido obrero,” or “Workmens' Party” (here as elsewhere an euphemism for parliamentary Socialists), are invited. There has been free and open debate on parliamentary and anti-parliamentary tactics, and, judging by the reports in the Barcelona Productor, the Anarchists would seem so far to have more than held their own.

The Anarchists of the Basque Provinces are working to establish a Communist-Anarchist newspaper. It is to be named El Combate (“The Combat”) and to be published at San Sebastian. This is good news to come from that curious old-world Basque-land which has ever been a stronghold of feudalism and reaction,—no doubt mainly because the people have identified Carlism and reaction with their local autonomy—of which, for that matter, they do well to be jealous, at least until the time comes when they can conquer for themselves complete individual autonomy. R. W. B.

A TOUR THROUGH THE MIDLANDS.

I BEGAN on August 4th a propaganda tour through the Midlands, beginning with Leicester, where I stayed a week, during which the comrades worked hard at the various meetings which were held. We broke new ground at Oadby and Anstey, two villages near to Leicester, and with the comrades in this district I paid a visit to Loughborough and Derby, going from there to Sheffield. There I also spent a week, and we carried on vigorous work among the miners of Eckington, where comrade Cores and myself delivered Commonweal from house to house, as well as meeting the miners coming from the pits with leaflets. We afterwards held a meeting in the market place. I also addressed a meeting at Woodhouse, and held several meetings at Sheffield. The comrades worked very hard, and making a special feature of the Chicago Martyrs' Speeches, selling during my visit over a hundred. These were sold mainly among the miners, who seem to admire greatly those noble heroes our comrades of Chicago.

On leaving Sheffield I went to Manchester, and addressed a series of meetings in both Manchester and Salford. Here also success crowned their efforts of our comrades, for we held splendid meetings at all places to which we went. I returned to Sheffield after my Manchester trip and again did a week's propaganda, after which I went to Leeds. Here we had three splendid meetings, where I was splendidly supported by our comrades. We made the most of my visit, and notwithstanding the various threats of opposition from our erstwhile comrade McGuire, the day went over without an explosion. I again returned to Sheffield, and spent another four days, prior to my visit to Hull, where I again had three good meetings. The comrades of all nationalities (and there are many in Hull) worked with that energy which is certain to bring success, Smith and Reynolds to help, besides others whose names escape me, we had some enthusiastic meetings.

I may mention in passing that I missed no opportunity of spreading our literature among the soldiers in all the places I visited.

I returned again to Sheffield, this time nearly exhausted, and spent another week prior to my return to London. In all I addressed forty-eight meetings. Literature sold well at all, and collections were good. My general impression of the visit has been to strengthen the views I already held—i.e., that our work in the future must be more in the provinces if we do not wish to court failure. There is a large tract of country comparatively untouched by Socialist teaching, south, west, and north.

The collections in most cases nearly cover the expenses, and I found the people not only eager to listen and question the speakers, but ready and willing to aid in paying expenses. Take Derby as an instance. The first meeting held (I believe) was the one I addressed, and £1 0s. 1½d. was collected. Many comrades I met with feared that a vigorous, thoroughgoing propaganda would frighten the audiences, but the result showed them the mistake. It is no use trying to preach down to the people if you want to make earnest revolutionists of them, for the greater your earnestness the more impression you are bound to make on your audience.

There is one thing also I must not forget, i.e., our paper the Commonweal. I found on explaining our principles, and making a point of speaking as far as I could from the paper, that there was no difficulty in selling it; but that on the other hand it went off even beyond my own expectations. Most of the places are trying to vie with Sheffield in paper selling, but are as yet far behind, though to all appearances Leicester will not be long before it takes a place alongside. Leeds also will soon catch up, owing no doubt to our comrade Samuels, who is not only an earnest worker but is filling the other comrades with the same spirit. I must not forget Manchester, who have progressed wonderfully of late. Hull could sell more papers, and before long I have no doubt they will see their way clear to quadruple their order.

Altogether I am pleased with the result of the tour, which shows that our ideas are getting a firm hold in the provinces. I can as a further result say that Leicester, Loughborough, Nottingham, Derby, Sheffield, Manchester, Leeds, and Hull will not be behind when the day of revolution dawns upon us, and the desire of all the comrades was to work hard and earnestly in order to hasten that day. Preparations are also being made in all these places to celebrate the anniversary of the murder of our Chicago comrades for the purpose of explaining to the people why our heroic comrades lives were sacrificed. THE CURSE OF LAND MONOPOLY.

SINCE Christianity determines the worth of the tree by the quality of its fruit, so may our Church-going land monopolists be judged by our increasing crops of pauperism and prostitution. The following cuttings from contemporary papers speak for themselves:

The Rev. H. V. Mills, in his 'Poverty and the State,' affirms that "eight million people in the British Isles, by inevitable circumstances, cannot obtain honest continuous employment;" while Mr. John Rae (as cited by Mr. Mills) informs us that, "in the wealthiest nation in the world every twentieth inhabitant is a pauper; one-fifth of the community is insufficiently clad; the agricultural labourers, and large classes of working-people in towns, are too poorly fed to save them from what are known as starvation diseases; the great proportion of our population lead a life of monotonous incessant toil with no prospect in old age but penury and parochial support; and one-third, if not indeed one-half, of the families of the country are huddled six in a room in a way quite incompatible with the elementary claims of decency, health, or morality."

Ben Tillett, in his 'Dock Labourers' Bitter Cry,' cites from Professor Thorold Rogers the following appalling statement: "There is a large population collected in our great cities, equalling in numbers the whole of those who lived in England and Wales six centuries ago; whose condition is more destitute, whose homes are more squalid, whose means are more uncertain, and whose future is more hopeless than the poorest serf in the middle ages."

Then, as regards East London in particular, Mr. Charles Booth, whose area of inquiry embraced 900,000 people, tells his readers that 314,000, i.e., 38 per cent. of this great host, "suffer from poverty sinking to actual want."

Canon Duckworth, preaching at Westminster Abbey on Sunday afternoon, said: "We may boast of an empire upon which the sun never sets, a commerce which belts the planet, but let us also remember that 170,000 paupers inhabit this the richest city of the world."

"Ninety per cent. of our work-people have no place they can call a home beyond the end of the week."

It has been calculated that there are about 200,000 families living in London on about a pound a week, and they are in a large measure the people of one room.

A calculation has been made by Dr. Rhodes "that if all the paupers in England formed into column four deep, the procession would be 100 miles long."

In London one person in every five will die in the workhouse, hospital, or lunatic asylum.

It is extremely difficult to even approximately estimate the number of prostitutes in this country. The police, who might be taken as the most competent authorities in these matters, have it that there are between 90,000 and 100,000 in London alone. This gives an average of about one in fifty for all our large towns.

And yet all this sacrifice of human life and happiness is sanctioned by the law. There is no law on our statute books to require that a man may not let his brother starve or his sister get her bread on the streets, even though he have the means of preventing it. Of course not. The class who have framed these laws took good care that there should be none. The absence of such an enactment is the very breath of their existence, and it is absurd to think that they will permit any alteration in the existing state of affairs while they can keep armed forces in their pay to prevent it. Yet, in the face of all this, Collectivists and Democrats will refer us for freedom to the ballot-box, triumphantly pointing to the Board Schools and the posts and telegraph systems as the real dawn of the Socialistic era. We have, they tell us, only to hammer away and thrust monopoly bit by bit beneath the fostering wing of government, and by the time we are all brooded under the old parliamentary hen, and there you are don't you know. By the way, what will be the State fine when the State workman comes in late to the State factory?

Let us suppose for a moment that after striving and hoping for, say another decade or two, we managed to institute State water-works, State gas-works, and State tramways, what does that mean? Why, merely an extension of our present civil service, that is, we should be jockeyed by more batches of highly-paid useless nobodies such as are now on exhibition at Somerset House and other Government offices, and the really useful servitors would be placed in the underpaid and trammelled position at present borne by our postmen. Of all sweaters the State is the biggest, with its strangulating red tape and its sealing-wax. If it thought fit it would nationalise these and other matters to-morrow. Posts and telegraphs were monopolised by the State solely to facilitate warfare, government, and competitive commerce, and not in the interests of the people at all. Our Board Schools are merely factories for turning out more capable, and therefore more profitable, tools for the service of the labour exploiters; but they are turning out sharper-edged tools than their founders anticipated. The tools are sharp enough to find on facing the world why they are not free to work and live as Nature bids them, and accordingly the young proletarian is a trade unionist as soon as he becomes a hireling, thus, consciously or not, befitting himself for the coming Commune.

Before the workers can free themselves of the murderous grasp of Landlordism, they will have to reckon with the whole of the forces at the command of the bourgeoisie. They have long ago outgrown that old superstitious reverence for the powers that be, and notwithstanding the cant with which some of them have been dosed by their leaders, they are awakening to the fact that freedom is only to be gained by bullet and not by ballot. Parliament seeing that it can no longer pose as the people's voice, has thrown aside its masquerade and is now the honest enemy. Mark the present conspiracy of silence on the part of the Liberal gang in the face of the growing labour organisations. But this is a useful factor, for it makes still clearer the plan of campaign, and is driving the waverers into the ranks of the unions.

As the land and capital have been taken from us by force, so must they be retaken by the same means. You might just as well hope to turn away a shark by prayer when you have tumbled overboard into his jaws as to hope to get them back by any other. By the time a few more affairs like those of Trafalgar Square and Southampton have happened, the Labour battalions will be sufficiently in touch with one another to respond to the general signal to throw down their tools all together. The air may be still for a little while, and then the bourgeoisie will shout for their soldiers, but can they be depended upon to do their "duty." We shall see.

JONATHAN BINES.

THE COMPLAINT OF THE IDLE CLASSES. — Will you bandy accusations, will you accuse us of over-production? We take the Heavens and the Earth to witness that we have produced nothing at all. In the wide domains of created Nature circulates no shirt or thing of our producing. . . He that accuses us of producing, let him show himself, let him name what and when. We are innocent of producing; ye ungrateful, what mountains of things have we not, on the contrary, had to "consume" and make away with! Mountains of those your heaped manufactures, wheresoever edible or wearable, have they not disappeared before us, as if we had the talent of ostriches, of cormorants, and a kind of divine faculty to eat? Ye ungrateful!—and did you not grow under the shadow of our wings? Are not your filthy mills built on these fields of ours; on this soil of England, which belongs to—whom think you?—Carlyle: 'Past and Present.'

THE GREAT AUSTRALIAN STRIKE.

WHEN the last mails left Australia the strike was in full swing. The men had been wrought up to a high pitch of excitement and enthusiasm by the news that the English unions were rallying to their support; and on the other side the capitalists were in a fearful state of funk, which was only equalled by their furious rage. The temper of these people is shown by the following extract from our plucky little contemporary the Brisbane Worker: "Lies, calumnies, misrepresentations, all the weapons of wild and fanatical opposition, have been shamelessly used, and this incitation has been assisted by employers who should have more self-respect. Threats of 'We'll shoot the strikers down like dogs'; 'They ought to be hung on the lamp-posts'; 'We'll crush that sanguinary unionism out'; 'We'll teach them who's master' have been openly made. One gentle minister of religion wished he could get the strike leaders at a whipping-post and have the job of flagellator; he'd 'draw blood every stroke,' he said. Persistently and unremittingly a panic among the employers has been worked up by the press and its bloodthirsty assistants, who have spread rumours of general strikes, organised riots, attempts to bring in Communism by force, and other fantasies. As a result firearms are carried by every bank-robber and adulated shopkeeper; special constables have been sworn in from the swell athletic clubs; and a mob of employers waited on the Government in order to terrorise Tozer into proclaiming a sort of martial law. Brisbane is practically being terrorised by Capitalism, which in its miserable fear seems to thirst for the chance to mow a street full of unarmed, inoffensive unionists down with Gatling guns."

But whether the capitalists could carry out these "wild ideas" is exceedingly doubtful. At Newcastle they were threatening to bring the marines and the sailors ashore, to shoot down the miners on strike. A correspondent of the Sydney Sunday Times heard one of the marines asked if they were going to shoot the people down. He replied, "Well, we may be sent ashore and we may even be ordered to fire, but I don't think any of you will be hurt." The correspondent, who is certainly no friend of the unions, afterwards got into conversation with the sailors. He says: "He answered my questions with the utmost frankness, and from what he, and scores of his shipmates, told me, I have arrived at the conclusion that it would be folly worse than madness on the part of the Government to seek assistance at the hands of the naval authorities. Such aid might, and probably would, be granted readily enough, but it must be borne in mind that a large majority of the blue-jackets and marines sympathise with the strikers, and, once landed, they might be induced to take sides with them. Were they to do this the consequences that would naturally follow might prove more serious and far-reaching than any of us imagine." This must be nice and reassuring for the capitalist advocates of force.

What has particularly frightened these gentlemen is the fact that the strike has led to a tremendous upheaval of Socialist ideas; the strike and Socialism seems to be the main topic of conversation everywhere. Of course the Socialism discussed is of a very mild type; but even the immense sale of Bellamy's "Looking Backward," and the adoption by the Australian Labour Federation of a Social-Democratic programme, has been quite enough to frighten the capitalists. It is true the Federation only proposes to attain its ends by ordinary political methods, but the red spectre cannot be made alluring even under a robe of legality.

It is difficult to imagine the vast extent of this strike. It is an immense war of labour and capital, extending over a whole continent and affecting even the neighbouring island of New Zealand. On Sept. 7, Sydney and Melbourne were very nearly in darkness, owing to the failure of the gas supply. Not only are the gas-stokers out on strike, but most of the miners are also out, or have been locked out by the masters only to there be no ships to carry away their coal. A curious instance of what may be called by the capitalists "retributive justice" is that the strikers' paper, the People, was in danger of suppression through the gas-engine that works the press having to stop through the failure of the gas supply. The editor, however, declared the issue would be got out in spite of all difficulties. The Bulletin has a cartoon entitled "Melbourne in Darkness." It represents a middle-class man, who has just arrived home with two lamps, addressing his wife. He exclaims piteously: "Yes, my dear, I succeeded in buying a couple of lamps, but they are very scarce, and to get them home safely I had to buy a revolver." The same paper represents the capitalist undergoing many tortures. He is teased by a cow (Labour) he has been engaged in milking, and as he is flying in the air all the milk (profits) is spilt. Another cartoon shows us the capitalist suffering from the horrors of a general strike. In a dream he beholds a hobnailed goblin (Labour) dancing on his chest. He imagines he awakes in the throes of a general strike, and the poor man has to dress and shave himself, clean his own boots, while his wife cooks his dinner; and finally he has to behold his park turned into corn-fields for the proletariat; and at last, owing to "a great shrinkage of values" and a "great shrinkage" of capital's corpulence, he is compelled to work or starve.

From the capitalists to the blacklegs is an easy transition. As in England, so in Australia, the capitalist has a pet name for them—he calls them "free labour." This is not a very honourable term in Australia, as it used to be applied to those convicts who were handed over to private masters by the Government. Well, these "free labourers" are not very efficient at wharf work, but judging by the precautions taken for their safety by the Government and their employers, you would think their lives were the most valuable in Australia. Huge barricades have been erected at the entrances to the docks for their protection. One of these barricades at the P. and O. Co.'s wharf is thus described by the Sydney Daily Telegraph. The barricade might be used for the backing of the 22 in. steel armour of a 10,000 battle-ship. The posts, which are 14 in. by 14 in. and about 9 feet in height clear of the ground, are only a few feet apart, and are connected by strong rails and hard wood planking. This huge barricade is at the foot of Argyle Street, and completely shuts in the King's Head Hotel. The barricade also extends across from the street to the edge of the wharf, and at the Circular-Quay side of the P. and O. wharf a similar gigantic barricade is being constructed. The same paper states: "It is painful to watch the efforts of the 'free labourers' in discharging the 'Coromandel.' Six men are incapable of moving a piece of iron casting, and they simply stand and look at each other. After one of them puts in a quiet three minutes in curling a sling round the chain and then giving the order to heave away, a round of cheers from the onlookers greeted the ascent of the dangling ropes." The correspondent, from watching at work, expresses the opinion that a "hospical job" is by no means improbable. As I said before, great care is taken of these free labourers. Special constables, police, infantry, and artillery are all mustered for their protection; but despite it all, some of them have been rather roughly handled by the men whom they have robbed of their work.

The strikers hold stoutly together, although the capitalists are doing their utmost to crush them. It appears that the wholesale supply of provisions for Sydney is in the hands of about fifty persons all told—i.e., some seven carcass butchers, a dozen or more flour merchants, and the balance made up of merchant grocers and produce importers. It was proposed at a meeting of masters that these wholesale dealers should refuse to sell to retail shopkeepers except for cash, thus forcing the shopkeepers to refuse credit to their customers and so break the back of the strike. However, this plan has not been carried out. Probably the masters thought that it might drive the men—not into submission, but into open revolt.

To fight against the lies of the capitalist press, the strikers have started an organ, which was first known as the Labour Defence Journal, but has since changed its name to the People. It is a bright little two-paged sheet, and its tone shows how wonderfully the Australian workers have advanced in opinion during the last few years. For instance, when the barricades were erected and the streets filled with troops and military, this paper gave some very plain words of warning to the "authorities." It said: "Do the enfranchised people of these colonies intend that the authorities shall turn their cities into garrisoned towns, and continue to barricade and fortify the public thoroughfares, in the interests of private individuals? If it is right that one party in the labour struggle should erect barricades and stand by them, to sweep the streets with Gatlings, it is equally right that the other side should do the same. But we would remind those who are responsible for this deliberate outrage that barricades have, ere now, been the overthrow of the very governments who built them."

An "Appeal to the Friends of Labour" is also worth quoting:

"People of Australia! you are the witnesses of a Titanic struggle—the capitalist press tells you—between Capital and Labour. Disabuse your minds at once and forever! The struggle now taking place before your eyes is between two forms of labour—Labour on the one hand, and labour stolen, disguised under the name of Capital, on the other. The subsidised press of the stockjobbers and labour-filchers denounces this strike! It stigmatises this strike as criminal! It appeals to you, the public, to withhold your sympathy from the strikers! . . .

"Yet your best interests are the interests of every individual man who does not live on the labour of his fellows. Every man who lives without working demands some other man to do two days' work—one day for himself and a day for him that idles. Have you thought of this?"

"You are told this present strike is merely a question between employers and unionists. Oh, no! its ramifications are much more extensive than that. The present struggle is between the Past and the Future. The strikers are to-day fighting for the recognition of a great and vital principle, a principle which underlies all liberty, a principle which ought to be the foundation-stone of every nation which bases its hopes on the realisation of all that is involved in the word 'Democracy'—the principle of the full liberty of Labour to organise for its own protection. . . .

"To you, unionists of Australia; to you, public of workers and toilers everywhere in this great continent; to you, all of you, who live by the suffrage of those who have filched the earnings of Labour; to you who, whether by hand or brain, are compelled to sue for the right to labour,—we appeal, and we appeal with confidence! Your conduct in the past merits that confidence. When humanity has ever sued you for aid, it has never been, hitherto, in vain. Your sympathy in the past has ever been one of acts, not of words. You cannot withhold it now. For our fight is your fight, our danger is your danger. If we fail, what one of your boasted liberties is safe? . . . Combination alone has made Australia the free land of free men. Combination is threatened! Stand firm! Stand by us! Assist us in maintaining the right to combine, for thereby you assist us in maintaining the standard of wages.

"If we are worsted in the struggle, be not indifferent. Your turn will come! All along the line so-called Capital will lift its head for the subjection of the worker! If we triumph, you will triumph with us! If we triumph with your support, we shall remember in your day of need who have been for us and who against us! Labour never forgets her friends. She cannot afford to do so. Labour never forgets her foes, nor the foes of Labour anywhere—witness our conduct in the London dockers' struggle against vested interests and funded exploitation.

"Unionists of Australia! help us now, and we will rally around you when the day of your battle shall also come. Our fight is a fight for life! We are challenged on a vital point; a defeat means death! If we fail, not a single union is safe—for the very principle of unionism is at stake. Every unionist has a vital interest in our struggle. Everything we have won in the past may be lost at the cast of the dice. The Rouseabout, the Shearer, the Mechanic, the Wharf-labourer, the Seaman—every trade is threatened; no branch of labour, however humble, but views with interest and anxiety the present crisis. The very bread of our children depends upon our victory!

"Think not that our defeat will not affect you. What is won by Labour in one land is won by Labour everywhere. What is lost by Labour in one land is lost by Labour everywhere. And that word 'Labour' means the people—it means humanity."

Surely this spirited appeal should stir up all of us to help our gallant comrades in the desperate battle they are fighting. Labour in all countries must recognise the fact that the interests of Labour are everywhere the same, and that the battle which the Australian workers are now fighting is the holy war for social salvation of the workers of the world.

[Since the above was set up, we have received another batch of Australian papers, which explain why Mr. Champion sent that lying telegram the other day. The Australian trade unionists will have nothing to do with him, and he has been unanimously denounced as a fraud by them, both by speech and in the press. In revenge he has tried to wreck the strike. There is no need to advise workmen to take no notice of any statements made by Mr. Champion.]

GLASGOW.—On Saturday afternoon comrades Glasier, Anderson, and Robb distributed literature at Tollcross to the miners and blast-furnacemen. Afterwards, together with comrades Haddow and Brodie of the Trades Council, they went to Coatbridge, where they were prevented speaking by the police; they, however, distributed a deal of literature. On Sunday, at mid-day, Glasier spoke at Jail Square to about 400 people, and collected 4s. 2d. for blast-furnacemen on strike. In the evening Joe Burgoyne spoke at Paisley Road Toll, when 2s. 11d. was collected for the furnacemen.

LEEDS.—We had three of the best, if not the best, meetings of the year on Sunday. Although the weather was very cold, large audiences listened to and applauded comrade Andrew Hall. Collections were—Hunslet Moor, 7s. 8d.; Woodhouse Moor, 9s. 5½d. (the largest we have yet had at these stations); and Vicars Croft, 2s. 4d.—a total of 19s. 5½d. Four and a half quires of Commonweal were sold, four Chicago Speeches, and a good number of pamphlets. We only regret that the open-air season is almost ended, but we intend to be as active as we can even in the winter season. Our comrade Hall will speak again in Leeds on Sunday the 9th of November.—G. C.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

Allan and Co.'s "Settlement."

Everyone knows that the dispute with Allan and Co. is settled, for a time at least, on terms which to us seem eminently favourable—to Allan and Co. The men are to be paid by piecework instead of by the hour. The consequences being that while the strong and the skilful may earn more than a tanner an hour, the weak and the less skilled will earn less, and the "full round orb of the docker's tanner" in their case will disappear. We are getting on. We always had the idea that the Dock Strike was fought for the benefit of the "poor and downtrodden casual docker," who is not usually the strongest and most vigorous of mankind. Now we see that the weakest must go to the wall, and it is only the men who can and will slave their hearts for the benefit of a gang of greedy shipowners, who will get even "decent" wages under the new system.

There is another clause in the agreement we like still less. According to this valuable document, the men undertake in the discharge of grain to continue working, even after they have made a demand for extra money from heat, dust, or any other cause, until an "expert" from Mark Lane has been called and given a decision upon the question raised. We should like a "definition" of the word "expert." Being left, however, to our own unassisted imagination, we suppose it is a gentleman who jobs in corn in Mark Lane. Of course this gentleman will give a perfectly unbiased verdict. Gentlemen who "deal in corn," like those who deal in stocks or "make books" on races, are never rabid reactionaries and are always perfectly unbiased with regard to questions of capital and labour. The only improvement we can suggest in this excellent plan of deciding labour disputes is to get Newton, Edlin, or some other gentleman who adorns the magisterial bench of the metropolis, to settle all similar questions at the docks; and as a further bright idea, we beg to suggest to the "leaders" of the Dockers' Union that he be empowered to give a sentence of six months hard to any strikers who will not conform to his decisions. We are afraid that poor McCarthy, who seems specially selected to do all the dirty work of the "leaders" of the Dockers' Union, has put his foot in it again. We are sure that the men will not be bound by a decision of an "expert from Mark Lane." Why, they have a worse chance from such a tribunal than even from a "conciliation board," and we believe that the "leaders" of the Dockers' Union have in this agreement provided Messrs. Allan with a weapon that may be used with deadly effect against them. In their "prudence" and "moderation" they have given their worst enemies a splendid chance of creating trouble.

The International Seamen's Congress.

The Seamen's Congress which opened at Glasgow on October 6th, was in every way a great success; their union is really international. In addition to delegates from England, Wales, Ireland, and Scotland, delegates were present from New York, San Francisco, Boston, Holland, and Belgium were present at the Congress. The sailors seem very proud of their internationalism, and they made a special point of extending a hearty welcome to their brethren from other lands. We must say the Seamen's Union is in a thoroughly healthy state; there was a sturdy manly ring about the speeches of their leaders when they spoke of the approaching struggle with the Shipowners' Federation. There was none of that feeble flaccidity about them which too often characterises the utterances of Mr. Ben Tillet or Mr. McCarthy. Mr. Plimsoll and Mr. Cunningham-Graham were both present. Although our opinions differ widely we admire Mr. Plimsoll; we can remember the desperate battle he fought for years for the sailors against the murderous greed of the excellent and worst of the capitalist classes. We remember this, and we can reverence and honour this old man who fought in the people's cause when it was not so "popular" among the middle-class as it is at the present time. We are glad the sailors are not ungrateful. One interesting fact came out at a public meeting held after the Congress. It appears that Messrs. Allen and Co., in spite of the good character given to them by the Star, have always been the worst of sweaters. They made themselves especially prominent in fighting the Seamen's Union at Glasgow, and they have always been noted for their love of "free labour." Probably the heads of the firm were "good Liberals," and that in the opinion of the Star covers a multitude of sins.

Sacking Trade Unionists.

We clip the following paragraph from the Weekly Dispatch. It is interesting as showing the spirit of the shipowners, dock directors, and other slave-drivers towards the unions: "Last Saturday night the men employed by Messrs. Cory and Son, Charlton, were called up by the manager, and asked if they intended to stand by the union. The men were unanimous in their determination to stand by the union, and immediately upon giving their answer ten of them were discharged." Messrs. Allen, Norwood, Morgan and Co. are not yet so bold and outspoken in their hostility, but when "the cold weather comes" we may be sure they will be quite ready to follow this bright example.

LEICESTER.—September 14, Andrew Hall spoke three times; large audiences; collected 21s. 2d. Sunday following, John Turner spoke three times. Weather was bad, but it was encouraging to see the people stand in the wet to hear our lectures; we are convinced that no other subject but Socialism would make people stand in the rain. Made five new members on this date. Sunday 28th, Frank Kitz—three addresses, humorous and satirical, much relished by audiences. October 5th, Chambers, Taylor, and Barclay were the speakers. We have averaged 12s. a-week the last four weeks in sale of literature. Are making arrangements for winter course of lectures to be given inside.

MANCHESTER.—During the past month we have done good propaganda work. Good meetings have been held three times every Sunday and during the week. We have had Cores and Samuels of Leeds down several Sundays, and had good meetings and collections and sale of literature. Reeves of Liverpool gave three good addresses Sunday, October 5; and last Sunday Andrew Hall of Sheffield made a grand impression by his fervid revolutionary oratory. In addition to these, our own members—Baillie, Barton, Stockton, and Scott—have helped forward the cause by their efforts in the propaganda of its principles. Altogether we have done a great deal for Socialist propaganda in this district, and intend during the winter to carry it on by a series of indoor lectures and discussions, and only hope that our efforts will help forward the great object of our life—the Social Revolution.

PHILPOT STREET.—Brillerman and other comrades held a meeting here last Sunday night; some opposition, but good sale of literature.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LAUNDRY WOMEN'S CO-OPERATIVE ASSOCIATION.

COMRADES,—We request you to allow us to make an appeal in the Commonweal to our Socialist comrades on behalf of a Laundry Women's Co-operative Association which we are about to start. Our rules are modelled as nearly as possible on those of the Socialist Co-operative Federation, and we have entirely adopted the principle of the formation of a common fund, to which individual members can lay no claim.

Our object is to put a stop to the "sweating" which so largely and increasingly exists in the laundry industry, to pay proper wages, to shorten the hours of labour, to provide comfortable and well-ventilated work-rooms, and to raise the workers at the same time from the position of wage-slaves to that of the owners of their own earnings. We also make a special appeal to our comrades as women, for not only do women suffer as wage-slaves but as chattel-slaves also.

It is probably not necessary to enlarge on the sufferings of the present workers in laundries, for as most of your readers are working-men they probably know as well as we do what the sufferings and privations of these women are, but perhaps there are some who may not know that women are now to be found frequently washing in dark, damp, unventilated cellars for 13 hours a day, not even allowed to sit down for half-an-hour in the afternoon to drink a cup of tea, and cases are known of women who have died at the wash-tub from exhaustion and want of food.

The collar for which the customer pays, perhaps, a penny, is washed, starched, and ironed by the sweated laundress for a farthing; and women who take families washing in their own homes, frequently work from dawn to midnight for a few miserable shillings which will not even pay the rent. The work, too, is exceedingly arduous, and results in certain disease if not premature death for women ill-fed and ill-clothed.

Considering, therefore, the present miserable condition of the trade, we confidently hope that our Socialist comrades will help us to improve our own condition and that of other women (as we intend to establish branch laundries in various localities as our funds permit) either by taking shares or sending work to our laundry.

The shares are £1 each, but may be held by two or more shareholders. Application for shares should be made to the Secretary, Miss E. Lupton, 59, Selhurst Road, S.E., who will also supply all information desired.—We are comrades (on behalf of the Committee),

Yours in the Cause,

Signed { ANNIE MARSH,
JENNY WILLIS,
IDA MACKENZIE,
EDITH LUPTON, Secretary.

N.B.—Washing will be received from any locality, the carriage paid there and back, and thoroughly good workmanship at moderate prices will be guaranteed.

[We have read the prospectus of the Association, and notice that 5 per cent. will be paid on the shares. We think this is unnecessary, as the Socialist Co-operative Federation has shown that it is possible to carry on a co-operative society without interest. We think it would be better if the new society followed their example. People who really wish to improve the condition of the workers do not want 5 per cent. interest for their trouble, and we are quite sure that ordinary dividend-grabbers are not likely to invest their hard cash in what they would look upon as a "Socialist concern."—Eds.]

"ART FOR THE PEOPLE."

ON Monday, October 20, at the Athenæum Hall, Tottenham Court Road, W., under the management of the 'Commonweal' Branch of the League, William Morris delivered a lecture on "Art for the People." The proceedings opened with music, and the lecture was well attended. Our comrade Morris having traced the history and development from pre-historic times, when the cave dweller scratched a rude imitation of the mammoth on the walls of his dwelling, and dealt with the imitations which it had undergone under the influence of the ancient Egyptians, the Greeks, the Romans, the Goths, and others, down to the time when the English workman placed in position the last stone of Henry VII.'s chapel at Westminster, asked what had become of popular art in the comparatively short time which had since elapsed, during which England had grown from an island kingdom into a mighty empire, dominating the world. He could tell them in three words. It had disappeared. That was a strange story indeed, and they might well doubt its truth, for the change was so tremendous. So far from people rejoicing in the making and using of artistic things they did not know that art existed. What passed as decorative art was touched by the hand of man, but never by his mind. He worked at it not knowing what he did. The workmen found work a sacrifice, a burden, which they would cast off altogether if they could. Not one hour's work would be done if it were not that the worker feared death by starvation if he left off working. He hoped no one present supposed that under such conditions they could have art which had any life in it. If they did he could not imagine the depth of a stupidity which thought that slavery would bring forth art. The great gulf between the rich and the poor, between the two nations nominally under the same laws, had swallowed up the popular art which had produced our ancient buildings, in which every man's intelligence was subordinated to the great work of art, whereas it was now accepted as a fact that whatever intelligence a non-gentleman might possess he must on no account exercise it during his working hours. In order to win that privilege he must raise himself up and be a gentleman—that is have nothing to do, and exercise his intelligence in doing it. The real artist should be considered as a workman, and he wanted the real workman to elevate himself to the position of an artist. That could not be so long as the labour war went on, which made him sacrifice himself in the interests of his union or of the war which was being carried on. It was a natural law that man must work, and in proportion as he had pleasure in his work so would his life be happy or unhappy. The first thing necessary in order to bring about a better condition of things was that there should be no more poverty, none of those sordid troubles which destroyed the imagination and intelligence, or turned them into other channels. Every man must be certain of earning a due livelihood and those things which were necessary for the mind as well as for the body. All men must have a due measure of rest and recreation for the body and the mind, and the daily hours for such labour as was unpleasant must be very short. Eight hours a day for such toil would one day appear to them an absolute absurdity. All work which was unpleasant should as far as possible be done away with, looked upon as a nuisance. It should be done by machinery; but machinery should never be used as it was now, in doing work in which man could take pleasure and delight. Again, those who were to produce beauty should live in it. A man's home must be cleanly and orderly, and beautiful. That should not be so hard a thing to accomplish, seeing that the whole world was beautiful, save where man had made it ugly. Men should also be educated and have a due share in the stored-up knowledge of the world—not down to his station in life, but up to his capacity. Lastly, the last claim for labour would come to this, that there must be no class distinctions. All crafts should be honourable and honoured, and every man should be able to raise himself in the respect and admiration of his fellow-citizens by the exercise of his own craft. These were the only conditions under which they could hope to see a revival of popular art, and he asked them whether it was worth while to strive to bring about this happy life to which he had alluded. Some discussion followed the lecture. An appeal for funds on behalf of the Special Propaganda Fund realised 13s. 3½d.; Commonweal and other literature went well.

HERE'S A CURSE ON VARMERS ALL.

[NOTE.—We believe the following ballad was modelled upon some traditional songs current among the English peasantry concerning rick-burning. Does any one know whether any old songs of this kind are still current among the people in remote parts of the country? If any one can send us some we shall be glad to publish them.]

I ZEEED a vire o' Monday night,
A vire both great and high;
But I wool not tell you where, my boys,
Nor wool not tell you why.
The varmer he comes screeching out,
To zave 'uns new brood mare;
Zays I, "You and your stock may roast,
Vor aught us poor chaps care."
Chorus—Then here's a curse on varmers all
As rob and grind the poor;
To re'p the fruit of all their works
In — for evermoor-r-r-r.

A blind owld dame come to the vire,
Zo near as she could get;
Zays, "Here's a luck I warn't asleep
To lose this blessed hett.
They robs us of our turfing rights,
Our bits of chips and sticks,
Till poor folks now can't warm their hands,
Except by varmer's ricks."

Chorus—Then here's a curse on varmers all
As rob and grind the poor;
To re'p the fruit of all their works
In — for evermoor-r-r-r.
—From Charles Kingsley's "Yeast."

REPORTS.

SOUTH SIDE BRANCH.—Meeting in Short Street on Friday; speakers Buckridge, McCormack, and Miss Lupton; meeting interrupted by gas-stokers, who as usual went in pretty extensively for "gas and gaiters." Sunday morning same place, speakers R. Harding and comrade from North Kensington. R. Harding gave admirable address on "Anarchism." Collection 1s. 10d.; 24 Commonweal sold. Afternoon meeting at Coopers' Hall on behalf of East-end bakers, promoted by International Federation; speaker from South Side Branch, Miss Lupton. Evening meeting at Crown Hill, Croydon; speakers Leggatt and Miss Lupton; Commonweal, Freedom, and Free Russia sold. On Sunday, Nov. 2nd, R. Harding will give address in the morning at Thornton Heath on "First Steps in Civilisation," and in the afternoon in Handcroft Road, Croydon, on "Principles in Politics." On Sunday, October 26, at 3 p.m., Miss Lupton will give an "Address to Women" at Short Street.—E. L.

ABERDEEN.—Comrades W. Cooper and Rennie spoke at an open-air meeting at Woodside on Sunday afternoon, October 12th. The indoor meeting was held as usual in the evening, when comrade Bax's "Address to Trades Unions" was read and discussed. The usual open-air meeting was held on Castle Street on Saturday night, in spite of the inclemency of the weather; the speakers were W. Cooper and Leatham.—G. C.

SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION—EDINBURGH.—On Sunday last we had a good meeting in Labour Hall, when comrade Howie delivered a very humorous address on "The Energy We Waste," in which he showed up the ludicrous aspect of Capitalism. The lecture was much appreciated. Comrade Ritchie lectured at Leith to a full house. At both meetings there was good discussion.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

WORKHOUSE SOCIALISM.

"GENERAL" BOOTH no doubt does deserve his title; his conduct of the "Army" shows that he is a general of no mean order. But like other people, he has the "defects of his qualities" as the French phrase it, and a good general is not likely to be a good citizen; for it is the business of a general to sacrifice everything to immediate success, and I cannot help thinking that the Salvation General does not fall behind others of his kind in this respect.

Anyhow, his "great scheme" as it is called, seems on the face of it to be meant as a bait to catch those who are looking open-mouthed for something to happen in the way of the improvement of life in this world, the reduction of some of the misery of modern civilisation. Indeed, there are plenty of well-meaning people with money to spare willing to impart it to the setting on foot of a "well-considered scheme" for the easing of their consciences by means of the amelioration of the lot of the poor; especially if such a scheme seems likely to dull the discontent now so rapidly rising all round about us, and which we hope will one day put an end to philanthropy by abolishing poverty. A safe scheme for the regeneration of society is likely to make rich people open their purses, and I think it is no injustice to the General to say that he knows this well enough. Otherwise he might have discovered any time these twelve years that before people can turn their attention to religion, or anything else than the satisfaction of their daily needs, "they must be helped out of their present social miseries."

Meantime, since Mr. Booth is being proclaimed a new Socialist, and a prophet at that in some quarters, it may be as well to look for a minute at his scheme and see what it is worth, bearing in mind that it is put forward confessedly as a sort of shoeing-horn for a peculiarly degrading form of a worn-out superstition, which sees in the struggling world of men with all its aspirations and every changing succession of deeds, little more than an appendage and plaything of an irresponsible master, who neither asks nor allows mankind to understand him or his arbitrary commands.

For such a scheme of the universe, this social scheme of Mr. Booth's for dealing with the world as it is, is perhaps good enough, but for anybody with manly hopes for finding himself one of a band of friends, with a God, if he has a God, who is also a friend, this scheme of reform is inexpressibly shabby and sordid.

Yet, in a way, we should thank him for the figure of speech under which he shows us the labour of modern civilisation; or, to speak more plainly, the men who labour. Says he: "The cab-horse has its charter of two points; work is found for it, with food and lodging sufficient to enable it to get through its daily task—that is the first; the second is that when it falls down, whether it be by its own fault, or by that of others, it is helped up again—all questions as to who was responsible for its fall being deferred until it is set upon its feet again!"

We have said something like this ourselves from time to time, only we were looking on this state of things as a condition to be struggled out of, while to General Booth it is an ideal which has to be attained to. We must needs thank the General for showing us so clearly that we have not yet reached the cab-horse stage of prosperity.

It is natural that General Booth from the standpoint of this cab-horse ideal should sneer at those who venture to hope that civilised men may one day become as happy as savages and somewhat more wealthy. Natural also that as a "practical man" he should declare himself unable to wait any longer than the time necessary for effecting the smallest and most miserable of improvements. This is an old story that we are quite used to by this time; for we have seen on the one hand useless palliatives and blind-alleys of political trickery gone in for with enthusiasm, and on the other foolish pieces of rashness elevated into principles to be adored through thick and thin, all on the ground that we "cannot wait"; when in good truth we must wait for all that is worth having till people's minds are sufficiently impressed by the coming change to allow us to take definite action.

As for the "practical man" in question, the General: his practical scheme does not come to much; on the whole, it comes to less than any evasion of the real question which has been before the public. Whatever in it is not sheer nonsense—"utilising the waste of London," and so forth—seems to be taken from Mr. Herbert Mills' workhouse colony plan, which itself was taken from the Dutch beggar-colonies scheme actually in operation.

In fact, this wonderful new scheme of Salvation Socialism will not save many bodies, whatever it may do for souls. It is a very low form of what may be called, for lack of a better name, Workhouse Socialism, which takes it for granted that the workers must be in the main paupers, and which casts about for devices at once to get them better rations and to lower the cost of keeping them to the capitalists. The professors of this kind of Socialism (save the mark!) can see only that part of the workers who have been so degraded by the vile system under which we live that they seem at least wholly unable to help themselves, and so are fit subjects to be trotted about and organised by those of the well-to-do who are afraid or ashamed of the huge mass of misery which they form. These gentlemen never take any count of whatever is self-reliant or thoughtful amongst the workers, believing them, perhaps, to be too respectable to be either unhappy or discontented—in short, dangerous to the stability of society. I think they are reckoning without their host, and that it is rather from the work-shops than the slums that the serious attack on "civilised society" will come; though I admit it may come with sickening slowness. That is not so much our business as the making it sure, as we certainly shall.

Indeed, the real point of interest in General Booth's cab-horse Socialism is that he should have found it necessary to take up the miseries of the disinherited in order to keep his Army going and to advertise it. A few years ago such a move would not have been thought of. Now nothing is of any interest in politics, sociology, or religion which does not manage to pin itself to the subject of the impending change which is certainly coming on the world. The failure of civilisation is manifest to everyone who takes the trouble to think at all, to everyone who is not fossilised by party political warfare. That gain at least we have won, and it is no small one.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

ANARCHIST MORALITY.

Now and again, perhaps, it is well to turn aside for a while from the haps and chances of the daily conflict and get back to first principles—those first principles of which one is a little apt to lose sight in the strife of detail which necessarily occupies so much of our time. The new Ethic of Free Communism is (as it seems to me) a subject of which we may well think a little at such times. It would be a pity if we should unreflectingly make our adversaries a present of the contentment they are so fond of, that without god or master there can be no morality at all. In striving to show that a Free Ethic is quite conceivable and intelligible, I am conscious for my part that I am not putting forth any very original views, and I do not claim to answer difficulties save in somewhat sketchy fashion. I had at one time thought of translating for the Commonweal a very admirable series of articles on Anarchist Morality which have recently appeared in La Révolte (and to that series of articles I at once confess myself deeply indebted for much of what follows); but on reflection I have thought it best to give my own conclusions on the matter, for what they may be worth. Of course it is understood that nothing that is written here is put forth as a dogma, but only as the provisional opinion of one comrade addressing other comrades. There is no such thing as dogma among Free Communists, and, at best, our opinions on this question must be provisional, since we have, and can have, no experience of Anarchism in actual operation.

A terrible word in the ears of some, that word of Anarchism!—and a word to the use of which the Socialist League is of course in no way committed. Individually, I call myself an Anarchist, because I look forward to a state of society where there shall be no more coercion in any shape exercised by any human being or set of human beings upon any other human being or set of human beings, where there shall be neither laws nor government—government being replaced by voluntary organisation, law being replaced by order (two words which ought not to be linked together, since they are really opposed to each other). Whether we may pass at once into such a free society as this, or whether it be possible to dispense with all government while we are actually in the throes of the Social Revolution, need not be considered here.

Anarchism being defined, then, for the purposes of this discussion, as the absence of any kind of coercion, what do we mean by "morality"? As already intimated, it doubtless seems to some that to talk about "Anarchist Morality" is like talking about snakes in Iceland or freedom in the England of to-day. Let us dispassionately enquire if, in truth, this be so.

We may at once make a verbal concession to our opponents—a concession which will serve, perhaps, to put us upon the true track which our investigation should follow. Taking the word "morality" in its strictly etymological sense alone, there is no such thing as Anarchist morality.

In that sense, of course, the word merely means "that which is customary." It is an heirloom from the old times of primitive tribal communism, when that was good which was in accord with the custom of the tribe, and that was bad which was contrary to such custom. The custom had usually (perhaps invariably, if analysed) some reason of tribal advantage behind it. It might indeed be very hurtful to the individual in its operation, very injurious to other tribes; but that mattered nothing: tribe A. cared naught for tribe B., and no heed was taken by any tribe of individual as distinguished from tribal welfare. Hence, of course, there were as many systems of morality as there were tribes. Morality, in this old and original sense, may still be found among many savages at the present day. Indeed (although the old customs have perished and others taken their places, and the reasons for these others have often also vanished) large survivals of the ancient reverence for what is customary still continue even under modern civilisation. Hence the conventionalism from which we all suffer to-day. A convention is only a custom the reason for which has departed.

However, in the main, the breaking up of the old tribalism was followed by new theories of good and evil, new systems of right and wrong. Right was no longer (in theory, at least, and largely in practice) based on what was customary, but on considerations of a very different character. Still, we may note, the old word "morality" was used, just as we propose to use it in speaking of Anarchist right and Anarchist wrong. The result of the disappearance of the primitive communism of the tribe and of the coming in of private property was to make the lives of the vast majority of men and women very miserable and wretched. In this world there was no hope for them. They were not indeed perhaps quite so unhappy in their lot as they have since become, as chattel-slavery has transformed itself into wage slavery; but they were quite unhappy enough to make them despair of ever attaining to content in this life. In a way that would be too long to trace here, a belief in another life hereafter had gradually evolved itself. What wonder that the workers in desperation began to lend ear to any who would bring them glad tidings of great joy of happiness for them after death, since in this present life they could not enjoy it? What if torments in that other life were reserved for their masters, for the "certain rich man" of the parable; Abraham's bosom and the delights of paradise for them? To such a gospel as this (I am dealing, of course, with the instance best known to us of a change which took place wherever "civilisation" conquered; in Asia as well as in Europe) the poorer people listened gladly—listened so eagerly and with such conviction that in the end, for a time at least, and helped by barbaric invasions and other causes, they carried their masters over with them to the new faith. The workers were wretched because for them there was nothing but work; the masters themselves even found this life somewhat barren, because they had left themselves without work at all and without aim or object for their days:—

"In his cool hall, with baggard eyes,
The Roman noble lay;
Then drove abroad, in furious guise,
Adown the Appian way;
He made a feast, drank deep and fast,
And crowned his head with flowers;—
No easier or no quicker passed
Th' impracticable hours."

This is by the way. We are only now tracing the moral story of the human beings alone worth considering, them of the proletariat. The new religion brought in the new morality. Since Heaven was reserved for the wretched, Hell for those who had their good things here, was it not clear that someone up in the sky objected to people enjoying themselves, on earth at least?—that he liked to see men miserable below? This seemed logical, at any rate. As, of course, good people went to Heaven, bad people to Hell, it must evidently be good and moral to be wretched, bad and immoral to be happy. Hence, while the old morality had been founded on tribal custom, the new morality was founded on asceticism—i.e., the renunciation of natural pleasures here, in order to find supernatural pleasures by and by. Anything that attached us to this earth, where we had "no continuing city," was wicked. Of course, the very constitution of our bodies, our old friend "human nature" (which, as we know, is "desperately wicked") would not allow this theory to be fully acted upon in practice; but approximations were made to it. Cardinal Manning, General Booth, Mr. Stead, gospel-grinders of all shades, preach it to this day. Meanwhile the modern bourgeois has evolved a new form of morality for himself, which he calls Utilitarianism or "enlightened self-interest." This practically means that he is the good and moral man who succeeds by force or fraud in forcing himself to the front in the struggle of modern commercialism. I do not think this morality ever had any real hold on the workers, and therefore I pass it by here. It has been well dealt with by a comrade from whom most of us differ very widely, and who is not an Anarchist—I mean Belfort Bax, in his essay on the "Ethics of Socialism."

Now Anarchists, of course, reject all these theories of morality,—the old customary morality because the particular society to which it was applicable has gone, never to return; the religious morality because they know nothing of any life beyond the grave, and because they decline to be miserable at the behest of any real or fancied god or lord; the bourgeois morality because it involves the system of competition, which means, in the result, the system of bossdom, which is the negation of Anarchism. Moreover, Anarchists, I apprehend—believing (as they do believe) in the autonomy of the individual and his need for free self-development, unfettered by physical coercion or intellectual dictation from others—cannot accept any dogmatic system of morality saying to each, "Thou shalt not do this, or leave that undone," at all.

Does it follow, then (returning to our original question) that there is no such thing as Anarchist morality? Some calling themselves Anarchists have answered, "Yes, there is no such thing. Man is only an animal like the others. In every action of his life he is merely obeying a need of his nature. His needs, call them good or bad, he must satisfy. If it pleases him to die on a barricade for human solidarity, like a Parisian artisan, or on the scaffold for Anarchy, like our comrades in Chicago, he does it because it gives him pleasure to die for an idea—more pleasure than to live,—because he must. So, if he betrays his comrades to the police, he only does it because, given his constitution and his surroundings, he must. In either case, he only acts as circumstances force him, and it is absurd to apply terms of praise or blame to acts which he cannot help. Such acts are neither bad or good; they are indifferent."

R. W. BURNIE.

(To be concluded.)

LEEDS.—On Sunday we held two meetings with the assistance of comrade Pillier who came over from Dewsbury. Audiences and collections not so large as usual because of the severe coldness of the weather and the distressing rain which fell in the morning. In the afternoon many of our comrades attended the labour demonstration on Hunslet Moor and sold about 170 Commonweal and pamphlets, making a total of about 290 Commonweal and pamphlets for the week. We are vigorously pushing forward our arrangements for the commemoration meeting of the Chicago Martyrs. The Oriel Hall, Cookside Street, has been taken, posters and handbills are being printed, and we are expecting a party of comrades from Sheffield to aid us in making it a thorough success. We are expecting a crowded meeting. The speakers will be Hall, Charles, Bingham, Sweeney, Cores, and Samuels.—G. C.

DIVES.

You go to Church clad in your Sunday best,
And pray for all the needy and oppressed;
And who the needy are, you best should know:
For you, and such as you, do keep them so.

You praise the Lord, and rise refreshed from prayer,
To kick the hungry beggar down the stair;
And fondly think you'll enter Heaven's gate
Because you've put a halfpenny in the plate.

Your daughters, too, to sing their (dress) maker's praise,
In Church assemble on the Sabbath days;
While half the gaudy flummery they wear
Would keep a poor man's family for a year.

You leave the House of God resigned and meek,
To rob and cheat your neighbours all the week;
You tell the poor of mansions in the sky,
And draw your rack-rents from the slum close by.

Though indigence and want are everywhere,
You will not see—your eyes are closed—in prayer.

NOTES.

At the Halle Congress the "old gang" of Social Democrats have been showing themselves in their true colours. We knew before that, in the eyes of Bebel, Liebknecht, and the rest, anti-Parliamentarians were invariably traitors and police spies. It is, I suppose, only natural that "leaders" who have become absorbed in that Parliamentary game of "much ado about nothing," which seems to have such a strange fascination for some minds, should in all honesty take this view. Now, however, Liebknecht extends the accusation even to Social Democrats, who chafe a little under the dictatorship of the Reichstag members. It is, perhaps, time that Revolutionary Socialists should frankly express a little of the disgust they must feel at seeing the red flag dragged through the mire in this fashion.

The scribe who writes the demi-semi Socialistic leaders in the Daily Chronicle, is of course delighted to see that "the Germans . . . have finally resolved to trust to Parliamentary methods and constitutional action in the pursuit of their objects." He takes opportunity at the same time to attack the First of May demonstrations (boycotted, it will be remembered, by the Social Democratic leaders in Germany). Moreover, it seems that, according to him, even Parliamentary methods will not avail unless they be left mainly in the hands of bourgeois thieves. "We would warn working-men," he says, "against the mistake of supposing that no man can be a good Labour candidate who does not work at what is called manual labour. . . . No one should be proscribed because of his occupation. The merchant and the lawyer, the doctor and the journalist" (does the cloven hoof peep forth a little here?), "the teacher and the artist should be equally eligible, if their principles are such as to entitle them to public confidence." How nice it is to "earn" two or three guineas a leader by "warning" and admonishing working-men, and how unfortunate it would be if a "violent" Revolution were to interfere with this pleasant arrangement!

Let justice, however, be done even to a Radical newspaper. The Daily Chronicle has rendered our Cause a signal service by printing a verbatim report of our friend Grant Allen's quite admirable lecture on "Socialism and Natural Selection." It is not often that I find much to praise in Fabian deliverances; but here surely we have the proverbial exception to every rule. Grant Allen has crushed once for all, in most masterly fashion, the silly but constantly recurring objection of half-educated would-be scientists that Socialism would seek to interfere with natural selection. "Those who advance it," says our friend truly, "do not know what is meant by Socialism, and do not know what is meant by natural selection." The whole paper breathes the principles of Free Communism.

Mrs. Fawcett, who is delivering a "course" on the "Problems of Poverty," is a lecturer of another sort. This "lady" (she would be offended, I suppose, were I to speak of her as "this woman") is of opinion that one great cause of poverty is drunkenness, an example of the "cart before the horse" to which we are accustomed. Some of us will remember that her late husband (who was, forsooth, in middle-class eyes, a great authority on "political economy") was actually under the impression that Socialists proposed to divide the land of the country equally among all the inhabitants! Mrs. Fawcett, thanks perhaps to the propaganda of the last ten years, knows just a little better than this; but, as with many others, so with her, her hide-bound bourgeois prejudices will not allow her to realise our position.

She thinks it would be "dishonest" to retake from the capitalist his ill-gotten riches. This is because she does not even yet understand that his riches are ill-gotten, taken from the worker by force and fraud. She deems it very wicked to seek to intensify in violence the class-war, so that by bringing things to a head we may terminate that war by the abolition of classes; but she has not attempted to show how the conflict is to be ended in any other way. Her great argument, however, is based upon the favourite middle-class wheeze that, taken away the fear of hunger, there will be no "stimulus to exertion." Of course the answer is of the simplest, viz., that men will work because the energy generated in the human body is greater than is needed for mere existence, and must be used up in some fashion. Man, all through his history, has shown that (odd as it may appear to Mrs. Fawcett) he, on the whole, prefers to use this surplus energy (whatever it may be) for social ends.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

SPAIN.

The Barcelona Productor continues to furnish an admirable example of what a workers' paper should be. It is at once revolutionary and practical, full of "common-sense," yet with nothing bourgeois or academic about it. In the number for October 16, there is an interesting account of a method of federation of labour organisations which might well be imitated elsewhere than in Spain. A society has been formed there, entitled, "Pacto de Union y Solidaridad ó Federaci6n de Resistencia al Capital" (Covenant of Union and Solidarity or Federation of Resistance to Capital). This new federation (sprung from the First of May movement, and which has had such a vast influence in the Peninsula) proposes to "unite in common action the resisting force of the Spanish proletariat, so as to direct it against ruling Capitalism." The guiding principle of its constitution is the preservation of perfect autonomy to every individual, society, group, or federation joining it. There is no central directing body, no central fund. Each group or individual is responsible for its or his own conduct, and takes instructions from no "leaders." (Ben Tillett, McCarthy, and the rest, please note). The chief point insisted upon by the federation is simple enough, viz., "unconditional support of every strike entered upon by workers for the protection of their wounded dignity or the betterment of their conditions of labour." (If the Docker's Union had acted upon this principle, Southampton might have turned out differently). Every member undertakes to abstain from acting as a blackleg, no matter what the temptation, and to give all necessary support to every toiler who suffers in any way through doing his duty to his class.

It may be worth while again to repeat that Anarchists in Spain take an active and leading part in the labour struggles of the hour, without in the least compromising their opinions. In return they are trusted by the workers. The Parliamentary Socialists set their faces against strikes, but the Anarchists encourage them all as a preparation and rehearsal for the coming Universal Strike. In this connection I may note that our Spanish Anarchist comrades are already working towards a movement on the First of May next, which shall eclipse even that of this year.

One of the most striking figures of the past First of May, our comrade Joaquin Lopez, has just died, and died for others in such fashion as to extort the admiration even of the middle-class press. Lopez, who was only 26, had embraced Anarchist ideas with an enthusiasm which seized his whole being. He founded a paper in Valencia entitled La Victima del Trahajo ("Toil's Victim"). He took part in every meeting with entire forgetfulness of the personal responsibility that he incurred—ever urging the workers to leave pacific methods and enter upon the revolutionary period. On the 27th of April last he spoke some burning words on the occasion of a meeting of sympathy with the downtrodden Siberian prisoners which Spanish proletarians are not likely to forget. A prosecution followed, which is not yet over. During the events of May he worked with such activity as to inspire a most salutary terror in the capitalist ranks. He was cast into prison, and only released upon bail after two months' detention. Upon his release, he found that the masters had closed their doors upon him, and he led (he and his family) a life of terrible suffering and privation. When cholera broke at Valencia he offered himself as nurse and rendered (says a bourgeois organ) most important sanitary services. He joined the Society of the White Cross, and toiled day and night at the service of the plague-smitten patients, proletarians and bourgeois alike. Although he never ceased to be a revolutionist of revolutionists, yet his enemies themselves now admit that he was "a hero of the rarest virtue" ("en el fando un virtuosismo varán"). One afternoon, meeting a friend in the street, he told him that he thought "the snake had bitten him," speaking of the matter carelessly enough. Sure enough, cholera had claimed him, and in a few hours he was dead. He leaves behind him a widow and children who are in the greatest misery.

Our friends at Barcelona are still hard at work preparing for the Chicago celebration. They have sent to every workers' society of that city and neighbourhood a circular explaining the murderous deed of three years ago, and inviting the presence of all toilers. This admirable plan of propaganda might perhaps be imitated here.

The Basque-land Anarchists are in good hope of soon producing their journal, El Combate, of which I spoke last week. It is to be a Communist paper. Oddly enough, many Spanish Anarchists (possibly most Spanish Anarchists) are Collectivists, and the Barcelona Productor for October 19 contains an article on Communism attacking our formula, "From each according to his capacity, to each according to his needs," on the familiar lines of the "man who will not work," and so on.

We have received the third number of the series of papers contributed to the "second Socialist Contest" (Segundo Certamen Socialista), held at Barcelona on the 11th November, 1889. Some of the papers are really of exceptional value, and the present writer hopes to return to them.

FRANCE.

Up to the date of writing, there is little to report from across the English Channel this week. The internecine strife between the two factions into which the Parti Ouvrier (so-called Workmen's Party) has divided itself continues with redoubled venom. Le Proletariat and Le Parti Ouvrier fill their columns with little else. To anti-parliamentarians it seems a battle of kites and crows.

"REVOLUTIONARY WARFARE."

II.

NO RENT AND A GENERAL STRIKE.

LET us now try to imagine what a General Strike would be like, and let us suppose that London leads the way. Let us see what it would mean to the smug City capitalist who resides, we will say, at Wood Green. He comes down to breakfast one morning, and as he gazes over the table which is plentifully spread with a luxurious breakfast, consisting of all delicacies in season and out of season, he muses over working-class discontent and the numerous strikes which have lately taken place. He sits down and commences to eat; while eating he takes up his Times, and reads in that "valuable" paper some news which rather spoils his appetite. The first head-line that meets his eye runs as follows: "Serious Revolutionary Movement in London," "A No-Rent Campaign in St. Luke's," "Police and Bailiffs Severely Beaten," "Barriades in the Streets." In disgust, he turns his eye to another portion of the paper; but here worse news awaits him. "The Eight Hours' Movement," "Important Meeting of Delegates," "A General Strike Resolved Upon." Throwing his eye down the paragraph, he finds that the strike is to begin that very morning, and that the men, despairing of any help from Parliament, are resolved to help themselves. He feels alarmed, but on further reflection decides on pooh-poohing the whole business in a superior middle-class fashion, "Nonsense! Nonsense! A General Strike, never heard of such a thing; and as to the other rebels, the police will quickly put them down. If not the police, the soldiers. It is all those damned Socialist agitators; they ought to hang every man-jack of them!"

He finishes his breakfast and strolls down to the station. Outside he meets an agitated crowd of two or three thousand city men. "What is the matter?" he pompously inquires of a friend. "There are no trains," is the reply; "there is a General Strike in London, and not a single train has come out from there. Besides, I should not dare to go if there were, for they say there is a huge mob waiting at Finsbury Park, who threaten to lynch not only the guard and engine-driver of the first train that starts, but the passengers! They say the Social Revolution has broken out! Oh! what shall I do? What shall I do? I shall be late at the office!"

Our middle-class friend is not easily frightened, and as no trains arrive resolves to walk. Some friends accompany him, after leaving all their valuables behind. They reach Finsbury Park, and sure enough there is a big crowd there. The big crowd playfully inquiring as to "Whether they are blacklegs?" they explain that "They are City gentlemen!" and one murmurs an inquiry concerning the police. He is met with a yell of "Gone home! There ain't no police. We are our own police to-day!" The explanations of the City gentlemen, however, are accepted, and they are allowed to proceed upon their way after some jokers have bonneted them in a spirit of merry frolic. A little further on they notice that "No-Rent" is conspicuously posted up in every slum. At one time a merry populace takes them for bailiffs or landlords, and gives chase. They are rescued with difficulty, and the other two City gentlemen return home. Our friend, who is proud of his courage, perseveres. He soon comes upon a tram-car thrown over in the road, and he looks with a melancholy interest upon this relic of an attempt to run traffic with blackleg labour. He is not noticed now, for he moves with a dense crowd that is pouring towards the "Angel" at Islington, and besides, a good-natured workman is acting as his protector. He probably was never so polite to a working-man in his life before, and he clings to him with a personal affection which only an extreme sense of personal danger could excuse in a man of his respectability.

As they approach the "Angel" they are met by a dense crowd marching towards them, waving their hats and cheering like madmen. A gigantic workman on the shoulders of his comrades calls out in a stentorian voice for "Three Cheers for the Social Revolution!" The two crowds meet and mingle, and glad news is passed from mouth to mouth. The soldiers who were called out have refused to fire, and have joined the people; the police have mysteriously disappeared; the middle-class volunteers have not responded to the call of the Government, they preferred stopping at home, it was more comfortable and safer; the people, pouring in their thousands upon Downing Street, have found that the Government, together with the House of Lords and Commons, have also "retired," and the Revolution is accomplished.

Our City friend has scarcely time to grasp this remarkable fact before he is carried away in a big rush of starving unemployed, who are going for the provisions. They express such opinions as this, "As the Social Revolution has broken out they may as well have some grub! Wot's the use of a Revolution if you can't get nothing to eat?" Down go the shutters, and there is a free and rapid distribution of bread, meat, and groceries. Our friend, who is now rather dilapidated, is seized by some of the hungry and suspicious crowd. Opinions are divided as to his identity; they are doubtful whether he is a capitalist, landlord, bailiff, or "copper's nark." Many are inclined for Jeddart justice, stringing him up to a lamp-post first and settling these abstruse points afterwards. He is rescued, however, and is locked up in Islington Police-station for safety. He is released at midnight, and returns home to find that the Social Revolution has broken out at Wood Green also, and that there is a merry little party consisting of one sweep, two bricklayers, and a costermonger with their wives and families enjoying a communal meal in his drawing-room. They are very hospitable and good-natured, and advised him "to keep his pecker up and 'ave something to eat." He refuses any supper, however, and goes to bed very much shaken up by the events of the day.

We have treated from a humorous point of view the case of our City friend; we could treat it in no other way. But, speaking seriously, in our opinion the people must seize their own factories, streets, railways, mines, and all other means of production at the first favourable opportunity; they must clothe the naked and feed the hungry, and the first day of the Revolution must see the end of misery, poverty, and starvation. No Government can do this, the people must do it all and carry out the Revolution by the strength of their own right arms and their own courage, intelligence, and determination. Then if they fail, they will have no one to blame but themselves.

For the 'Commonweal.'

A CONCERT AND BALL will be held at the Autonomie Club, 6, Windmill Street, Tottenham Court Road, W., on Monday, November 3rd, at 8.30 p.m., under the management of the 'Commonweal' Branch of S.L. The programme consists of music, choir singing, recitations, etc., and a grand variety entertainment by Rowson and Sons, who will give selections on violins and zither, violins and banjo, clog dancing, and character songs. Dancing will follow. Admission by programme, 6d. Programmes may be had from the Secretaries of London Socialist Clubs and Branches.

REVOLUTIONARY SOCIALISM AND "LABOUR REPRESENTATION."

THE Revolutionary Socialist often puzzles the novice in Socialism by his determined stand against and denunciation of "palliatives." He is often asked in tones of wonder why he should oppose anything that would make the strain of our social system press more lightly upon the oppressed. The novice naturally turns his eyes to Parliament, and visions of remedial measures pass in succession before him till he beholds the transformation of society into the "statist" of State Socialism.

His dreams of Parliamentary action are naturally seldom disturbed by the thought of the mighty economic movement that is working in its own way with dreadful earnestness the destruction of Modern Industrialism, and that to stop the action of the elements of decay—if that were possible—is only to prolong the agony and increase the miseries of a large section of the workers. No Act of Parliament can humanise competition, nor bring within its reach the helpless thousands whose sorrowful homes are their workshops.

The Revolution alone can bring salvation to the workers, and palliatives can only strengthen the conservative element in human nature and make the workers that they "benefit" more contented slaves. The Revolutionary Socialists are the only real practical men, and the politicians are the dreamers and utopists.

The agitation for an eight hours' day may be of use in knitting the workers more closely together, and turning their minds more directly to a consideration of their position in society as mere agents for the manufacture of wealth for others, and thus making more sure the destruction of the tyranny that renders them helpless to think seriously of any other question save the one of food, and that adulterated too! What a hollow mockery it is for the "professional spiritual guides" to preach "Take no thought for the morrow," when it is the leading impulse of all our actions to-day, developing the greed, the heartlessness, and separateness of all our lives.

An Eight Hours' Bill is an impossibility for a goodly number of years; but, supposing it were passed to-morrow, it would not do one-half the good claimed for it by its promoters. At the most only a few trades would benefit, and for a short time the aristocracy of labour would look with still deeper contempt upon the struggles of their more helpless brethren. I could almost go down on my knees and thank the gods for every new machine that is introduced. When Socialists fail the machines succeed! It is the duty of the Revolutionary Socialist to hail with delight every factor that tends to destroy our present society, and wherever possible to help it in the good work. He will not vote for tyrannical Tory, canting Liberal, or well-meaning Social Democrat, knowing well that "Labour representation" is a farce and a misdirection of energy that could be far better spent in organising the workers for the General Strike. He will help every act that tends to destroy the "sacredness" of "law-'n'-order" and promote a wholesome contempt for landlord and capitalist made "crimes." Rent, interest, etc., are so many devils set up for worship, and he ought to have the zeal of the theologian in striking at them on every possible occasion. He will help the workers to fight their battles in their own way, and show that by "constitutional methods" failure inevitably will be theirs. Whatever weapons the workers find at hand it is their duty to use; they cannot wait like the wealthy capitalist, for he wields the rod of starvation and will use it unmercifully.

Therefore, the revolutionist will teach that only by what is termed "lawlessness" can the workers gain the slightest temporary concession, till co-operation takes the place of brute competition. That the workers are already learning this lesson the Leeds and Southampton strikes show, and the grand spirit of revolt that is rapidly spreading will awaken the constitutional leaders from pleasant dreams of seats in the House of Commons and debates in County Councils.

The increasing solidarity of the workers throughout the world is one of the most hopeful signs to the revolutionist of the coming change, for in that alone he sees the one thing needful to make the General Strike a success. He can look serenely on the posings of the constitutional leaders in the front ranks of the Labour movement, knowing that the truce between Capital and Labour will soon be broken, and that they will have to move more quickly or be left far behind by the onward movement of the rank and file. While our blessed Parliament is "debating," and the Labour leaders moving heaven and earth for seats in the House of Commons, the economic movement, which is far beneath all that and far beyond their influence, is steadily going on, making more naked the social war and stripping it of the fine-spun garments woven by the professors of the "dismal science." It would indeed be difficult to-day to come across a worker who cannot in some fashion define his position in society. The most ignorant of them will agree that he is a mere instrument used by the more cunning, and consequently more powerful section of society, in ministering to all its real and fancied wants, his own always being strictly left out of account; and if he has soul enough in him to feel the "still small voice" of his ruined manhood, he will at once place himself in the active ranks of the rebels and declare war against a system that forcibly denies him the right to live.

The novice in Socialism does not see that all attempts at propping up our rotten system can only be done at the expense and still greater suffering of a large portion of the most helpless victims of society, even supposing Parliament sincere in its efforts to make more bearable the condition of the wage-slaves. Let him think of the years it would take before a "respectable minority" of Labour representatives could be sent to the House of Commons, and he will soon conclude that far more effective and practical work can be done outside in organising labour and giving direction to the growing feeling of revolt. Instead of waiting for reactionary measures, let him preach the ideal of Socialism and inculcate the spirit of rebellion wherever he goes.

In the East-end of every great city a most successful crusade could be made against the payment of rent and taxes. Much would follow from this alone, and who can doubt the success of this when the huddled-up workers will be starving in the coming depression of trade. Not all the schemes of General Booth and his army of chloroformers will be able to stem the tide of discontent, and it is for the Socialist to give it enlightenment and direction.

The time has come now for an extension of the movement in a practical way. In every city and town where Socialist societies exist, bands of young men ought to be formed and excursions made through those parts of the country where "trespassers are strictly prohibited," and if a few rabbits or grouse could be caught it might give a zest to this new phase of the propaganda, which would soon become popular. The time is ripe for a new departure, and action like this would soon make the conditions possible for the issuing of a "No-Rent Manifesto."

Let us take every means in our power to harass the enemy, for every act of lawlessness is the preliminary to the Social Revolution. The resources of civilisation are great, and many are the ways of striking terror into the hearts of the enemy. J. M. B.

LIFE ON AN EMIGRANT SHIP.

COMRADES,—Having just come from Buenos Ayres among the human merchandise in the steerage of one of the Royal Mail steamers, it may interest some of the readers of the Commonweal to read what my experiences was under the circumstances.

We sailed on the 19th of September, and after leaving the Rio de la Plata we called first at Santos in Brazil. This is a beautiful place and splendid harbour, and is beside the port of disembarkation for the human material which is being imported in rather large quantities at present for the colonies in the province of San Paulo. As we anchored, a French steamer arrived, crowded with Italian immigrants, and in the evening, being ashore, I witnessed the transshipment of them to a lighter, which later on was towed up the river with barely standing room on board of her. From some of the passengers who came ashore in Santos I learned that there were 800 in all and that they were all going to San Paulo.

From our own experience on board of the "Trent" I judged that the passengers of the "Bearn" must have had a pleasant voyage of it in such a full ship. Worse awaits the poor creatures, however; for an Italian who joined us at Santos, and who had come down from San Paulo, told me that a few weeks before more than two thousand immigrants had arrived there and that they were wandering about half starved.

Brazil is at present going ahead on the same road of progress which I have seen have such a pleasant turning in the Argentine Republic. Free passages are given to all who wish to come, purely with the object of giving a value to the lands on which they may settle, and, where the climate permits them to do so, this will give such a value to the land as will completely exclude any but capitalists from possessing it. Then the earnings of the labourers becoming less and less—or as the "practical" people put it, "labour becoming cheaper and cheaper," everyone will soon be astonished at the great "progress" of the country, as shown by the rise in the value of land. Speculation will then drive this up far beyond its real value, the future prices of land will seem to have no limit, and then one fine day will come the inevitable smash, which will paralyse everything, and drive the labourer back to starve or fight in the country he came from.

It will take but a short time for this to be brought about in Brazil, for the greater part of the country is quite unfit for European races to live in. Men told me who came from Santos that there was no want of work there, as public works were in progress, but they said it was so horribly unhealthy that it was worse than other places where they were half starved. Everyone knows what a fever-den Santos is.

In spite of this I found that the hard work of loading and unloading ships and the coaling of steamers was done entirely by white men (Portuguese and Italian "free" labourers). Formerly, as I have seen, this hard work was all done by black slaves, but now the free whites have the privilege of killing themselves at it. The black man, as I have been told, is taking it pretty considerably easy in Brazil at present. He is not yet ambitious of making a fortune, the lazy fellow!

We loaded about ten thousand bags of coffee in Santos, and I don't know when I saw men working so hard as those who carried it aboard. Every man with a bag of coffee on his shoulders, and some with two and even three, came running up the gangway, flinging their load into the hold and rushing back again for another. It was quite a lively scene, and some of the poor fellows laughed and shouted as they became excited, and I heard some of our respectables remark how very happy the fellows were and what a lot of money they must earn! Some of them, I know, looked very much distressed, as the weather was very sultry, though we were very far indeed from the really hot season.

We took in a good many passengers here, and sailed for Bahia. Up to this the space provided for steerage passengers had not been quite full, and yet there was a horrible stench in the steerage, which I at first attributed to my fellow passengers, but which I found disappear here, though the number increased. The fact was that a quantity of jerked meat was discharged here, which had been stowed under our noses! When it left I had a better opinion of the passengers and felt a truly Christian spirit toward the company!

We called at Bahia, Rio Janeiro, and Pernambuco, and by the time [we left the latter place our space was well filled. It was almost impossible to sleep below, the atmosphere was so stifling, and we were not allowed to bring the company's mattresses on deck for fear they might be soiled, but a blanket and pillow on the hard deck was preferable to smothering below.

And the food! and the feeding! There was a group of Spaniards on board coming from Buenos Ayres—fine sturdy, strong fellows they were, as the Spanish workers in general are, thanks to the fact that Spain has not progressed like some of her neighbours, and ground body and soul of the workers into riches for a few capitalists. Well, these men complained loudly one day of their treatment, and as I agreed with them, they requested me to go with them to the captain and protest.

We were fed almost exclusively on black beans and rice. Black water called coffee was served, with a piece of bread badly baked, at 6 a.m. Then at 8 we had beans and rice boiled in a mash, and ladled out to us from a bucket; which each one had to receive at the end of his bunk. As there are two rows of bunks, the feet of the man on top either brushed the hair of the man below or hung on each side of his nose! Fortunately I was on top.

Then you received your ladleful of the mash, scalding hot, on a tin platter which the ladle nearly filled, and then you must decide while your fingers burn whether you will be able to endure it on your thighs, or with a wrench round of your body place it hastily in the middle of your bed!

We generally got a chunk of nauseous-looking tough uneatable meat as second course, on the same platter, and a cup of wine; and the same at dinner at 1 o'clock. Tea and bread and butter at 5 p.m., and this closed the festivities. We occasionally got some variety in the way of macaroni and potatoes, but the diet was substantially as I mentioned from day to day. The wine supplied was by nature good common wine, but we were defrauded of it by the stewards, who went in for doing a little business on their own account. They contracted with a number of passengers to give them good diet on payment of two sovereigns a-head, and the way they did it was by keeping the best part of the food apart for them and getting it cooked specially, and by taking part of the wine for them and filling up with water for the other passengers.

Of course the protest to the captain had little or no result, except in bringing the wrath of the chief steward down on my devoted head because I acted as spokesman. The watering of the wine was, however, put a stop to, and the food was not quite so abominable as before.

Ah, how far the workers are yet from understanding their rights in such matters! While they who ought to have everything are treated invariably as animals, or as merchandise to be made money of, their masters in the cabin have plenty of space and ventilation and every convenience that can possibly be provided. The workers produce everything and are grudged the merest necessities; their masters produce nothing and have everything at their disposal.

J. CREAGHE.

(To be concluded).

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

A Bait for Blacklegs.

The dock directors undoubtedly know their game. They have prepared a bait for their "permanent men" which will undoubtedly take. Here are the particulars of this splendid offer: 1. An eight-hour day; 2. Twenty-four shillings a-week; 3. A week's notice on either side; 4. Half-pay during sickness; three days' leave a-year and holidays.

Now, the Company know very well that these terms will attract a tremendous rush of labour from the country districts, and not only will all the permanent men's places be filled, but there will be a large reserve army of labour at hand ready to crush the dockers should they revolt against the wholesale introduction of blacklegs which the company are evidently contemplating. For the amiable company announces that it will make no distinction between "free labour" and unionists for the future. This means that when they have attracted enough blacklegs by their glowing announcements, blacklegs will be given the preference. How much chance do our readers think anyone will stand who has made himself prominent as a unionist? When the company's foremen select their workers at the dock gates, it strikes me the blackleg will get the preference. The men will practically lose their last protection if their representatives are driven away by the company on November 3rd, when the old agreement expires. The union will then be no longer recognised, and if the men show fight a big lock-out will follow as a certainty. But what are the leaders of the union doing? O, they have the most touching faith in the directors; they appear to think that the directors are as much in love as the representatives of the dockers with Tom Mann's co-operative scheme; but they will find their mistake out. The company's magnificent offer of a "high" wage, with an eight hours day and a pension, to outsiders to come in and take the places of the dockers, ought to be quite enough to warn these gentlemen of the trouble in front of them; but they are totally blind to what everyone else can see. Although affairs are looking so threatening, yet the dockers' leaders are still standing cap in hand to the men who are about to make war on them. For instance, when Mr. Wilson, of the Seamen's Union, advised his men to be prepared for a strike last Saturday, the dockers' leaders at once announced that Mr. Wilson would find himself alone, and that a strike was the very thing they were "labouring day and night to avert." Very likely, but when the masters are determined on war, not all their piteous pleading will save them from it.

Allan and Co.'s "Settlement."

We said last week that Allan and Co.'s "settlement" would not work well, and we were right. On Thursday there was another dispute on account of the dust among the corn on the steamship "Brazilian." The "expert" was called in and gave his decision against the men. The men struck against this "decision," but their leader McCarthy persuaded them to go to work. The "friendly" press was very much down upon the corn-porters for striking against the decision of a Mark Lane gambler in corn; they ought to abide by agreements drawn up by their leaders, etc. We wonder if this precious agreement was explained to the men or whether it was concluded behind their backs. We know the dockers' leaders have done this before, and what they have done once they may do again.

MR. CHAMPION IN AUSTRALIA.

MR. CHAMPION has certainly made a mess of it in Australia. There is ample evidence of this in the Australian papers that have reached us. Soon after this worthy gentleman landed, he began lecturing the trade unionists upon their proper behaviour, and curiously enough his advice was just what the employers desired. The Marine Officers were recommended to withdraw from union with the men; at the same time he advised the gas-workers to go back to work without demanding the dismissal of the blacklegs, and the unionists were told generally to treat the blackleg as a "brother." In fact, Mr. Champion recommended a base and cowardly surrender of nearly every claim the men had made. Luckily they saw through this treacherous advice, and our own comrades also were able to give some interesting facts concerning Mr. Champion's past career; and the result was that the Trades Councils of Melbourne and Sydney both passed resolutions repudiating Mr. Champion. The resolution of the Sydney Trades Council was passed after our comrades Thompson and McNamara had attended and shown Champion up. It runs as follows: "That this Council declines to recognise Mr. Champion as representative of trades-unionism, refuses to accept him as mediator in the present dispute, and regards his action during his visit to Australia as opposed to the best interests of labour." Great credit is due to our friends for their action; in fact it is certainly owing to the Australian Socialists that the workers were saved from the machinations of a treacherous scoundrel.

Mr. Champion got it very hot from the popular press. Truth, a well-known Sydney paper, has an article entitled "Mr. Chameleon Champion," from which we give a few extracts, just to show in what sort of estimation the late editor of the Labour Elector is held in Australia. The paper, after giving some account of the changes that "reptile" the chameleon undergoes, describes the changes of opinion which Mr. Champion has also experienced, and then says:

"Now, as regards Mr. Champion's fitness to act as mediator in the present dispute. His antecedents would scarcely seem to qualify him for the confidence of the Labour party. But admitting, for the sake of argument, that there had been nothing in the past career of this perigrinating Proteus to bar his way to the confidence and councils of Labour at this critical juncture, what shall be said of his recent utterances, artfully couched in the form of cautious deprecation and mild reproof? Hardly had this man been a week on our shores than he began to play the part of public catechist and rebuker. Without knowledge or the slightest circumspection he deals out approval and censure like some omniscient Solon, at whose nod and dictum the united forces of federated Australian Labour are expected to bow in abject obedience, to lay down their arms and fraternise with blacklegs. This would be yielding the neck of the Democracy to the crushing heel of Capital with a vengeance! Well may the Trades Hall Council of Melbourne and the Trades and Labour Council of Sydney repudiate the mission of one who preaches such dastardly subservience as this. In doing so they have vindicated the dignity of Labour and the righteousness of Labour's cause in the present terrible conflict. Such a mission is one which the paid emissary of a military tyrant and of the Tory Times alone is fit to undertake. Seeing themselves approached under the guise of friendship, by the agent of such interests, the workers might well exclaim, in the paraphrased language of Shakespeare's apostrophe to Cranmer:

Again! there is sprung up
A heretic, an arch one, Champion; one
Hath crawled into the favour of the King.

Mr. Champion has, doubtless, discovered ere this that his record has preceded him to Sydney; and that neither the countenance of an Emperor nor that of the aristocratic press of England, nor even that of the capitalistic press of Australia, will suffice to reconcile the Australian Democracy to the advocates of "scab" labour. Such advocates might as well sell their souls to the devil, as hire out their services to the enemies of their fellow-men. Perhaps the bargain with Beelzebub would be the less blameable. In any case, Mr. Champion fully understands by this time that he can have no honourable part or lot in the present great fight for the rights of humanity, as represented by Australian Labour. The confidence of the workers in England he irretrievably lost long ago; and now he has, consistently in accord with his past chameleon-like career, forever forfeited the right to enjoy that of the workers in Australia."

The reference to "a military tyrant" and "the Tory Times" may need some explanation. It is generally supposed that Mr. Champion has been employed by the German Emperor to collect facts and statistics concerning English trade unions. It has also leaked out that he has been sent to Australia as correspondent for the Times newspaper. Now we all know that the Times is the official organ of those capitalists who are the most bitterly opposed to trade unionism. It is, therefore, not remarkable that its correspondents should try to play the game of the capitalists in Australia. The Australian and English capitalists have formed an alliance in order to crush the workers, and Mr. Champion has been employed by these people as a useful and unscrupulous tool. The plot, however, has failed, and neither Mr. Champion's "conciliatory advice" nor his lying telegram of the other day, has had the least effect in defeating the Australian workers in their struggle for freedom. Mr. Champion has one consolation, if he is unpopular with the Australian workers he is very popular with the Australian capitalist classes. Their press praises him to the skies, and the "democratic" government, composed of sweating and swindling capitalists, has granted him a free pass on the "State" railways as a "distinguished" visitor. It is a pity that these gentlemen cannot provide Mr. Judas Champion with a "free" rope to hang himself, for his treachery is discovered and he will be of little use to his employers in future.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LAUNDRY WOMEN'S CO-OPERATIVE ASSOCIATION.

COMRADES,—We think in your haste to condemn us that you have scarcely correctly stated the principles of our Association. Our circular states that 5 per cent. will be paid on non-worker shares only, and that no interest is paid on worker shares at all; and if, therefore, our Socialist friends would kindly assist us by taking these shares, there would be no obligation upon us to issue the others. But, in any case, the Socialist Co-operative Federation, which permits its committee to borrow money at 5 per cent., should scarcely be thrown as a stone at us for adopting a plan by which we can raise the necessary money, which at present we have no other means of obtaining. The non-worker shares are by the rules to be paid off out of the first profits. We comment on your straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel by drawing attention so severely to a mere technical point, while making no remark on the terrible trade conditions under which laundry women are at present suffering, which we are at any rate honestly trying to alleviate—conditions of suffering which we think should appeal to all Socialists who have the cause of humanity at heart.—We are comrades (on behalf of the Committee), Yours in the Cause,

Signed { ANNIE MARSH,
JENNY WILLIS,
IDA MACKENZIE,
EDITH LUPTON, Secretary.

[We do not see that Miss Lupton's explanation alters the case very much. Although the Socialist Co-operative Federation may have power to borrow money at 5 per cent. in case of necessity, yet no interest is paid upon their shares, and we thought Miss Lupton's scheme would get more support from Socialists if this example was followed. We have quite as much sympathy with the sweated laundry women as Miss Lupton, only we are not sure that co-operation, or even trade unionism, will sweep their slavery away. They both may do something to improve the condition of some of these workers, but nothing but the Social Revolution will raise the mass from the horrible misery from which most working-women suffer at the present time.—Eds.]

"PIONEER AID AND SUPPORT ASSOCIATION."

COMRADES,—The appeal in the Commonweal two weeks since must not be neglected. I should propose that at every one of the Chicago Commemoration Meetings special collections be made, or the surplus remaining after expenses are paid, be reserved and sent to Mr. T. Grief, 54, West Lake Street, Chicago, Ill., for the purpose of helping to defray the expenses of a grand memorial stone to the memory of our murdered comrades, and as a token of our fraternity and international solidarity. Might I suggest to the committee in Chicago the advisability of placing on record the names of all the subscribing towns and cities, or societies, clubs, and branches. In conclusion, I would urge on all comrades the necessity of going over and taking part in the World's Congress of working-men in Chicago in 1893, and also at the unveiling of the monument, assuming of course that the system does not break down or up before then.—Yours fraternally,
Leeds. H. SAMUELS.

REPORTS.

'COMMONWEAL' BRANCH.—Good meeting on Friday at Hoxton addressed by Blundell, Mrs. Blundell, and Cook; some opposition by a well-dressed individual in the crowd, who, on hearing the announcements made with reference to our commemoration meetings and Chicago comrades, thought they were justly hanged and imprisoned; he was advised to come to our meetings and hear the facts; we sold one quire of 'Weals.

ABERDEEN.—Comrades Leatham, W. Cooper, and Rennie addressed an open-air meeting at the fountain, Woodside, on Sunday afternoon, 19th Oct. At the indoor meeting in the evening the Introduction to 'Commercial and Communal Economy,' by Carruthers, was read and discussed. A good meeting was held on Castle Street on Thursday evening; the speakers were W. Cooper and Leatham; and on Saturday night in the same place Rennie, Aiken, and Leatham spoke to an enthusiastic crowd. Through the overcrowding at our indoor meetings we have been induced to take the Oddfellows' Large Hall for Sunday nights, which is seated for 400, where we commence to-night (26th Oct.) with a debate on the best means of securing an eight hours day. Comrade Duncan will open in favour of a general strike and comrade W. Cooper in favour of legal enactment.—G. A. C.

GLASGOW.—We have had to abandon our Bridgeton Cross meeting on Friday nights, owing to the space being quite monopolised by hucksters and cheap-jacks. On Sunday evening comrade Brodie, vice-president of the Trades Council, addressed our Paisley Road Toll meeting. 4s. 8d. was collected for the blast-furnace men on strike.

SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION—EDINBURGH.—Good meetings were held on Sunday both here and at Leith. In the afternoon Mackenzie, Hamilton, and Connolly spoke in the Meadows, but cold and rain, or providence, drove the audience off. In Labour Hall in the evening Gilray addressed a good audience on "Comradeship." Howie spoke at Leith on "The Energy We Waste," and was well received. Good discussion followed at each meeting.—W. D. T.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

CHICAGO MURDERS & BLOODY SUNDAY.

"Let the voice of the people be heard."—Parsons.

Two Meetings to celebrate the Anniversary of above events will be held as follows—

ON TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 11th, at 8 p.m.

AT THE

MILTON HALL, HAWLEY CRESCENT, KENTISH TOWN ROAD, N.W.

The following Speakers will address the meeting :—

WM. MORRIS. F. KITZ. R. W. BURNIE. J. TURNER.
MRS. LAHR. MRS. SCHACK.
D. J. NICOLL. C. W. MOWBRAY. LOUISE MICHEL.

The following Resolutions will be submitted to the meeting :—

CHICAGO MARTYRS.

"That this meeting, called together to commemorate the legal murder of four men in Chicago on November 11th, 1887 (Parsons, Spies, Fischer, and Engel), the driving to suicide of another (Lingg) in prison, and the cruel imprisonment of three more (Fielden, Schwab, and Neebe), by the government of the State of Illinois, for the crime of encouraging workmen on strike and helping them to carry on the struggle against their masters, and the further crime of trying to maintain the rights of free speech and public meeting, calls the attention of the workmen of the world to the gradual abrogation of these rights in all capitalistic countries, and while emphatically denouncing the tyrannical interference with these elementary rights, points out that it is a natural and necessary result of a so-called Society based upon the robbery of Labour."

BLOODY SUNDAY.

"That this meeting also denounces the similar attack on free speech and the right of public meeting in London on Sunday, November 13, 1887, through which three men were killed (Linnell, Curwen, and Connell), one (Harrison) so injured that he died after a painful and lingering illness, and many sent to prison after a mere mockery of trial for being present at a political meeting which was ferociously attacked by the police."

Revolutionary Songs will be Sung during the Evening.

Doors open at 8 p.m.; commence at 8.15. Admission Free.

ON FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 14th, at 8 p.m.

AT THE

UNITED RADICAL CLUB, KAY STREET,
HACKNEY ROAD, E.

For full particulars see small bills. Admission free.

Funds are urgently needed for the carrying out of the above meetings. All donations will be gladly acknowledged in the Commonweal by
F. KITZ, Secretary of S.L.

THE capitalists of America thought that they had crushed the Labour movement when they strangled four men upon the gallows at Chicago. The rich men of England also imagined they had provided an adequate remedy for the wrongs of the poor by driving them away by blows of the bludgeons of their hired bullies from Trafalgar Square; but have they been successful? No! the memory of the murdered men in Chicago and London now stirs the hearts of the people, and in the place of thousands who believed then that a better life was possible for the workers in all lands, hundreds of thousands believe now.

"Our silence will be more powerful than the voices you strangle to-day!" said Spies upon the scaffold at Chicago, and has not the silence of these murdered men been powerful? Why, if we were superstitious we should say that the avenging spirits of the dead were sweeping over the world borne by the wings of the wind to rouse the people to battle against their tyrants.

Let our friends who believe that an Eight Hours' Day is one of the things needed to free the workers from the evils of low wages and over-work, which now weigh so heavily upon them, remember that it was for taking part in an attempt to realise an Eight Hours' Day—in the only way in which we Revolutionary Socialists maintain it can be carried, by a General Strike in all trades and industries—that our comrades were murdered. As revolutionists they knew that an Eight Hours' Day would in the end make but little difference to the workers, but they did not refuse to take part in a General Strike, which they knew is the only method by which the people can ever rid themselves of their tyrants and oppressors.

And it is because our comrades were revolutionists, because they did not cry "Peace! Peace!" when there is no peace, that we find that they are not so popular with those organs of the capitalist classes, who affect to champion the cause of the workers, and who diligently puff every humbug who pretends to cure serious social diseases with quack medicines. Well, wisdom is justified of her children, and the admirers of the pious quack-salvers, who do but "skim and film the ulcerous place, whilst rank corruption mining all within affects unseen," may some day cease their eloquent cackling and learn what geese they were!

Yes, our comrades were revolutionists, and therefore said that the ills with which modern society is sick unto death sprang from one cause alone, the robbery of labour by a rich idle class; remove this cause and our sick society would return gradually to health and vigour, let it remain and not all the quack remedies of politicians, cardinals, bishops, and "generals" can save society from death. It was for preaching these ideas, which were rightly held to be very "dangerous" to the wealth of the monopolists, that our comrades were murdered.

But were they not physical-force revolutionists? Did they not advise the people to use armed force against the capitalists? What if they did? Did not the capitalists previously threaten to use force against the people? They not only threatened, but they did it—witness the men shot down at McCormack's Works. And is it not also a fact that a gang of hired murderers was advancing upon a peaceful meeting with the full intention of murdering the people who were present, when an unknown hand threw the bomb which prevented the massacre. Surely the rich men who, whenever a strike is on in any country, shriek for Pinkertons, troops, ball cartridge, and gatling guns, have no right to complain if the workers meet force with force.

Not even the deadliest foes of our comrades can deny their courage and sincerity. They believed what they taught and they died for their faith. Let us ask the same question of you, reader—do you believe what you preach? Whether you are politician, religionist, Socialist, or freethinker, that is really the question of questions. Not in the history of the world was there such an age of shams as the present. Men have lost faith in all, and rightly too. The very food we eat, the clothes we wear, the houses we dwell in, the gods we worship, or affect to worship, are not what they pretend to be. And it is in these days, in a world from which goes up a mournful wail of pessimism from the satiated rich in their heaven of idle luxury, and a cry of frightful despair from the suffering poor, tortured and starved in the hell of the slums; at a time when all can see the inevitable revolution approaching that has come at the end of every century for the last five hundred years,—we feel that there is only one living faith on earth. For this faith our dead comrades lived and died, for this faith three others are now suffering a doom that is even harder—a living death amidst prison tortures; and in the name of both living and dead we appeal to you to-day to join hands with us to save the people from starvation, misery, and oppression.

D. J. NICOLL.

SOCIALISM OF THE MARKET-PLACE.

HEARD FROM THE STOOL.

A MISTY damp night, the oozy London mud beneath one's feet; above the sky reddened with the glare of an adjacent street market. The light of a street lamp falls upon the folds of a red flag, and the pallid anxious faces of a crowd gathered in the middle of the muddy road to hear the Socialists. What a study those faces are! Here with gaudy feathers and glaring hats, but sorry clothing and boots, are a group of work-girls returning from the sweater's den in which they have passed their working hours. They are not an encouraging element in the audience, as leaning upon each other's shoulders munching apples or rancid fried fish they titter and giggle at the speeches.

A female comrade is the first to speak, and her remarks are greeted with jeers and jibes from these wretched wage-slaves of her own sex. Nor do they lack incitement from the older women in the crowd. True types of the slum-dwellers, squat and unkempt, repulsive and vile, they join in the chorus of abuse. Horrible oaths and ribald utterances assail our comrade upon the stool, but she holds bravely on, and at last the men in the crowd turn fiercely upon her assailants and insist upon their "shutting up," bidding them be ashamed of themselves. At last the contentious voices are silenced, the abuse turns into applause, and as the strains of a revolutionary song arises upon the murky air the words are eagerly devoured by the now attentive audience.

A strong male voice now claims attention, and the crowd thickens to hear the Gospel of Discontent and Revolution. Says the speaker: Friends, we are here for the distinct purpose of preaching the glorious Gospel of Discontent. We do not shrink from openly avowing this, for discontent is the forerunner of Revolution, and we as ardent Revolutionists are bound to show the present system in all its naked hideousness, and where the people have become accustomed through apathy and usage to the daily horrors and wretchedness of the present system, it is our mission to stir them up to a true perception of the veiled barbarism we call civilisation to-day. The other side, the defenders and participators in the swindle of modern society, the stock-jobbers, the usurers, the landlords, in short, your masters generally, are equally active in striving to make you contented with your daily existence.

Enlisted upon their side are the sky-pilots, who assure you of a heaven hereafter as a reward for your tribulations here. Postpone your happiness to the sweet by-and-bye, whilst their employers rob you hourly and daily here. There's your perigrinating slum visitor and gospel grinder, who cant to your wives about the blessed Saviour's redeeming blood, doling out soup-tickets to stave off the Revolution. He is as much a policeman as the hulking chawbacons stationed around this meeting, because their masters, the Labour robbers, are afraid of the spread of the Gospel of Discontent.

We have been told here of what Christians give in charity, of their efforts to help the wreckage and outcasts of society, and we have been tauntingly asked, What do you Socialists do in this direction? and we reply, We want justice, and not charity.

Out upon the smug-faced humbugs who, like the late S. Morley, wring thousands out of robbed labour, and then build hospitals and refuges for those driven to prostitution. Yes, it is true that we do not subscribe to maintain the lazar-houses of our rotten civilisation; but it is also true that we are not guilty of causing the evils which they are intended to patch up, but we stand out, on the contrary, preaching the truths which shall eventually cause the people to see the sham of Christian charity, and demand their full rights instead. How I laugh when I come across one of their appeals for help from the wealthy toward their slum mission work. "Dear Sir or Madam," it generally runs, "we are engaged in a benevolent work in one of the most benighted and dangerous districts in such and such a district, to the saving of souls we add the clothing and feeding of the bodies of those whom we bring to the feet of the Saviour." Oh, and then of course a little is needed for the maintenance of the missionaries. Yes, slightly so. And then the dear sister or brother in the Lord is informed of the Bible classes—where, no doubt, they explain where Cain got his wife and the microcosms in the ark—and there are also the mothers' meetings and the sewing classes, and last but not least the model soup-kitchen, where the problem of how to live upon next to nothing is being practically solved, for we are told wholesome soup is distributed daily by the ex-P.C. (saved) in charge to crowds of hungry poor at 1d. per quart, leaving a slight profit to the blessed mission.

Now, I have satirised this sort of thing again and again, and the reason I do so is because these people batten upon the social misery of the people. Not one word of protest or denunciation of the rack-renters of the slums, no sound of indignation escapes them at the palpable causes of the physical and moral deterioration around them. They advise Christian meekness and resignation. How else were it possible to find wretched women stitching their fingers to the bone, earning a few paltry pence for hours of life-destroying toil, and satisfied with a crust and a cup of tea? Their patience under intolerable burdens is the result of the unctuous cant of the missionaries. They preach patience in the interests of their wealthy patrons; I advise revolt in the interests of the masses and for a higher and better life.

What are the net results of Christian rescue work in connection with paupers, prostitutes, and criminals? To put cheap labour into competition with those already in employment and indirectly to bring them down to the same level. In this wise mat-makers, shoe-makers, laundry-women, brush-makers, etc., etc., are hampered by pauper and prison labour. And why? Because the Christians engaged in these so-called reformatory efforts are the accomplices of the land and labour robbers. It is not their interest, therefore, to go to the root-causes of poverty and crime, but to nibble at the fringe of the matter, simply because, as Ingersoll has it, they cannot afford to damn their paymasters.

F. K.

[This article is inserted to show the nature and conditions of out-door propaganda in the slum districts, and to exhibit the difference between Socialism of the Market and that of the Arm-chair, of which latter we are having a surfeit. It depends upon the suffrages of our readers whether this kind of propaganda shall be continued.—Ed.]

THE GLASGOW LABOUR LITERATURE DEPOT.

OUR friends will remember that some time ago a meeting was held in Glasgow for the purpose of forming a Labour Literature Depot. A committee was formed for that purpose, and they have sent in a prospectus in which they point out that it is expected that the expenses connected with such a depot, including wages, rent, taxes, etc., would be £2 10s. per week. As the profit on literature may be safely taken at 25 per cent., the promoters are of the opinion that there can be no difficulty in securing sufficient patronage to make the venture successful. This estimate is based on the fact that there are in Glasgow and vicinity 35,000 trade unionists, besides many thousands of other workers, who take a sufficient interest in the Labour Question to support newspapers and literature bearing on it, if they had an opportunity to do so.

If but 10 per cent. of the trades' unionists alone spend only one penny per week, a trade of over £14 per week would be secured, 25 per cent. on which sum would be £3 10s., which would cover the working expenses and leave £1 profit. But as the amount expended in literature by most men is, at least, on the average, three times the amount taken in this estimate, as such a depot will have the support of the unorganised as well as the organised workers, and a large amount of support may be expected from other sources, it will be seen that this venture should be successful even from a commercial point of view.

The promoters have agreed to the following as the financial basis to establish the Labour Literature Depot on:—

1. That the capital be raised in shares of 5s. each—2s. 6d. payable on application, and 2s. 6d. on the opening of the shop.
2. Shareholders' liability will be limited to their share capital.
3. Neither interest or dividends will be paid on the shares. Any surplus will be applied to repayment of shares, until no member holds more than one share.

The profits then accruing from the business can only be used for purposes that will benefit the working-class collectively.

The committee are as follows:—William Parkhurst, Chairman, 853, Govan Road, Govan; Peter Anderson, Treasurer, 31, West Campbell Street; Samuel Bolton, James D. Boyd, M. T. Burgoyne, George Carson, Peter Dougan, David H. Drummond, Henry Flett, John B. Glasier, Alexander Haddow, John Munro, Richard M'Ghee, Duncan M'Naughton, Thomas Sinclair, James Smith, Donald Stewart, and John W. Warrington. Application for shares should be made to George Mitchell, Secretary, 26, Burgher Street, Parkhead.

We are pleased to see that no interest is paid on shares, and that, therefore, the depot will be managed on a Socialist basis.

THE ELECTOR'S CHOICE.—What is it to the ragged grimy Freeman of a Ten Pound Franchise whether Aristides Rigmarole, of the Destructive or the Hon. Alcides Do-little, of the Conservative Party, be sent to Parliament? Destructive or Conservative, what will either destroy or conserve of vital moment to the Freeman? Has he found either of them care, at bottom, a sixpence for him or his interests, or those of his class or his cause, or any other class or cause that is of much value to God or man? Rigmarole and Do-little have alike cared for themselves hitherto; and for their own clique and self-conceited crochets—their greasy dishonest interest of pudding, or windy dishonest interest of praise; and not very perceptibly for any other interest whatever. . . . Why, reader, if they asked thee or me Which way we meant to vote? were it not our likeliest answer, Neither way.—Carlyle, 'Past and Present.'

NOTES.

THE case of Castioni which will soon come before the Court of Appeal, shows that the authorities are endeavouring in an underhand way, to sweep away the right of asylum which the dauntless rebels against Continental tyranny have hitherto found in England. The game was begun by the Gladstone Government in the Freiheit prosecution, and our present Tory Government are now following in their footsteps. It is evident that our rulers, alarmed at the spread of revolutionary doctrines in every country, are determined to crush these ideas even by handing over political refugees to the hangman. But is not this action on the part of all European Governments very much like sitting on the safety-valve when the steam is up?

Our dear friend Stanley is in hot water. Everybody who took part in the expedition will soon be anxious to prove what a crew of infernal scoundrels his comrades are. Mr. Stanley began it by accusing the deceased Major Barttelot, whose brother then opened fire on Stanley and was backed up by Mr. Troup, who has certainly produced some damning testimony against Stanley and his companions.

Mr. Troup declares that with regard to the "horrible acts" of which Stanley accuses Major Barttelot, that in quelling "mutiny" among the natives "he did not see anything done in retaliation that Stanley had not done himself." When we enquire into what caused the "mutiny," we find that "the natives refused to work under English officers, for they said they had seen what treatment the natives had received, and did not want to be treated similarly." And Mr. Troup admits they saw "some things which ought not to have occurred." When we find also that the virtuous Major Barttelot was shot by a native because he attempted to beat his wife with a thick stick, we agree, for once, with Stanley that Barttelot deserved his fate: the only cause for regret is that some native did not shoot Stanley as well. If it is the custom in these "philanthropic" expeditions to beat women with "clubs," we can imagine what sort of treatment the men get, and why "mutinies" which are quelled by ironing, flogging, and hanging so frequently occur.

Mr. Troup has settled all the humbug about these expeditions having a philanthropic motive. He says:

"Mr. Stanley is a great explorer, but he went into this Emin Relief Expedition for fame and what he could get out of it. He has no more philanthropy than my boot. I will go further, and say that the expedition was in the nature of a speculation, and not a philanthropic relief movement. The capitalists backing it were after the ivory which Emin Pasha was supposed to have collected. The officers of the expedition were promised certain shares in the expected big supply of ivory as a reward for their services. The release of Emin Pasha was a secondary consideration entirely. Emin Pasha did not wish to be released, and had been up there ten or twelve years and held his own all right."

Mr. Stanley and his friends will hardly be able to cant about their "philanthropy" and "piety" after this. We revolutionary Socialists said months ago what Mr. Troup and thousands of people are saying now. The idol of society is finding out that "exploration plus elephant-rifles and explosive bullets" does not always succeed in gaining popular applause; and the murdered African natives may be avenged at last, when their murderer is driven from public life by a howl of universal execration.

CHICAGO MARTYRS COMMEMORATION MEETINGS.

LONDON.—The Socialist League will hold meetings in London as announced on another page.

DUBLIN.—The Irish Socialist Union will hold a Commemoration Meeting in honour of the Chicago Martyrs on Monday, Nov. 10, at 8 p.m., at 87 Marlboro Street. All sympathisers are invited to attend.

LEEDS.—The Chicago Commemoration Meeting will be held here at Oriel Hall, Cookridge Street, on Monday, November 10. Speakers—R. Bingham, Andrew Hall, F. Charles, T. Maguire, H. Samuels, and G. Cores.

HULL.—A Great Meeting will be held at the Sailors' Institute, Waterhouse Lane, on Monday, November 10th, at 7.30, in remembrance of our Chicago brothers, who were murdered November 11th, 1887. Speakers from London and elsewhere will be present.

SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—EDINBURGH—Labour Hall, 50 South Bridge. Business meeting, Fridays at 8 p.m. Sunday, Nov. 9, at 6.30, "The Chicago Anarchists: their Views, and the Circumstances which led to their Execution." LEITH—Henderson Street Hall, Sunday, November 9 (see Leith Burghs Pilot).

NORWICH.—Chicago Commemoration meetings will be held in Norwich as follows: Saturday, November 8th, on the Haymarket at 8 p.m.; Sunday 9th, Market Place at 11 a.m. and at 3 and 7.30 p.m.; Monday 10th, at St. Augustine's Boys' School at 8 p.m. Amongst the speakers will be C. W. Mowbray and W. B. Parker (London), Mr. and Mrs. Oldman (Manchester), J. Headley (Yarmouth), G. Poynts, W. Moore, T. Swash, G. Lenneying, and others.

YARMOUTH.—Commemoration of the legal murder of our five comrades in Chicago, and protestation against the unjust imprisonment of three other comrades, on Sunday, November 9th, in the morning, at 11, in the hall of the Radical Club; at 3 p.m., on the Fish Wharf; at 7 p.m., in the hall of the Radical Club, to be addressed by Mrs. Schack, Mowbray, and Parker (of London), Oldman and Mrs. Oldman (Manchester), and Saunders, Brightwell, and Headley (Yarmouth). Several comrades are also expected from Norwich.

LIFE ON AN EMIGRANT SHIP.

(Concluded from p. 350.)

THERE was a partial strike one day by the fireman on board the "Trent," which forcibly called my attention to the way these workers are treated. One morning I found the chief officer of the ship and the chief engineer, log-book in hand, surrounded by a group of the firemen, who were called upon each in turn to say if they would turn to and go down below or not. The dispute seemed very serious, and there was evidently a savage determination on the part of the chief engineer not to grant whatever the men demanded. After considerable hesitation, and some words between this chief machinist and one of the men—in which the said chief adopted the principle of saying what he liked in as angry a tone as he chose, and ordering the other to shut up when he answered him quietly—the men had to give in for fear of being logged and afterwards heavily fined. The chief engineer or machinist triumphed over them, calling them the usual "damned" in a remark which he made to the chief officer as he went away, a remark which was heard by the men and repeated from mouth to mouth.

And what was it all about? The men demanded to get a cup of coffee before turning to at their hard exhausting labour. Ah! if they only chose, they could have their coffee and everything else they asked for, or stop the whole machinery, as I hope to see the coal miners do some day with the whole machinery of Capitalism.

I could not help thinking of this, and all that I saw and have seen in former years of the life of the poor sailor, when I read to-day an indignant article in the Times and other papers about the "absurd" demands of the sailors and dock labourers, and how the indignant shipowners had federated to bring down their pretensions, and were going to lay up all their ships. I devoutly wish they may, and then perhaps they may stir the workers to go and take a part of what belongs to them.

Why the life of a sailor is worse than that of a prisoner in jail, with the addition of running the chance almost every day of being drowned, as Doctor Johnson is reported to have said about a century ago. And what it is in steamers is nothing to what it is in sailing ships! Beastly food, filthy styes to lie in, wet, cold, slobber, hard work, little sleep, hard words, contempt, more kicks than halfpence—such is the paradise which the shipowners are so astonished to find sailors getting tired of. May they never cease, and they never will until they dine and sleep in the palaces which up to now they have provided for these ship-"owners," and others who call themselves owners of the wealth of the workers.

The evening before reaching Lisbon the steerage passengers had another specimen of the utter contempt and indifference for their comfort with which they are treated, and will be treated like all the workers as long as they put up with it. We had little enough room on deck in all conscience, but this evening what space we had was in a fair way to be filled up with empty barrels, and which were to be put ashore in Lisbon. Cargo of all importance, steerage rubbish none. Along came the barrels, rolled and flung end over end by the underlings, with a savage "Look out, there!" putting to flight women and children as well as men, who were settling down to converse and amuse themselves in one way or another.

Again the passengers became indignant, and as we had no faith in protests to the authorities any longer it was proposed that we should go and occupy the space kept apart for the second-class passengers, which a group of us, chiefly Spaniards, accordingly did, and we remained there in spite of efforts to dislodge us until we were tired of it. But that we were so near port the barrels would all have gone overboard; but at Lisbon the bulk of the passengers were to leave, and then we would have plenty of room.

I tried to improve the occasion by pointing out to the men how the life of the worker and producer was everywhere the same as on board that ship. Plenty of space and ventilation and comfort in their dwellings for the proud idlers, and the life of pigs (far worse in one way for more unhealthy) for those who feed these idlers and provide them with healthy, commodious, and luxurious dwellings. In the conversation I heard some dreadful accounts of the misery endured by working people out of employment in Buenos Ayres and Montevideo. I did not really know all of it until told by some of these eye-witnesses. I was told of strong young men going round in the morning and collecting scraps of refuse food from the vasura, or refuse boxes, which are left at the doors to be emptied into carts which call round for the purpose. One man said he saw poor women, brought out as immigrants, going about near the Immigrant's Home in the most frightful state of filth and crawling with vermin, offering themselves for sale for any trifle they could get to buy themselves some decent food.

There is one comfort in all this for us Revolutionists, and it is that the so-called new countries are no longer what they were; they do not any longer offer the immigrant the slightest hope of getting out of his class and living as an exploiter. Nor do they any longer offer him a field for labour where competition is less than elsewhere and wages higher. I, for one, rejoice at it, for if there was one selfish class more than another that filled me with disgust it was that of the men who, finding their own bellies filled, no matter where, turned a deaf ear or laughed contemptuously at whoever tried to call their attention to the sufferings of their class.

Buenos Ayres and Montevideo, that is to say, the two Republics of which they are the capitals, I can assure my comrades are entirely "played" out as immigration fields. Everything is delightfully monopolised there to that extent and in so short a space of time, that even the poor Italians, who suffer such misery in their own country, are returning in thousands, and this has been going on for the last six or eight months. Brazil will never amount to anything, as may be seen from what I said before.

At last the emigration fad is thoroughly played out. The wanderers are returning, and with a vengeance, for from men of all nations I have heard the opinion invariably expressed that poor men had better remain in future in their own country, and do what they can to change social conditions so as to make it possible to live there. When we remember that we have means of producing twice as much food and three times as much of other articles of consumption as we require, it is easy to see what has to be done.

Down with the exploiters, the rich robbers! Down with the vile system which compels the producers of wealth to starve in the midst of plenty.—Yours in the Social Revolution,

J. CREAGHE.

'John Bull and his other Island.' We have already noticed one number of this series. We are now pestered for the "favour of a review" of No. 3, just issued. Any one with bowels of compassion for Irish landlords brought to want through non-payment of rent, or who delight in abuse of the democracy written in the caddish style of a City 'Arry, should read the book. Life is hard enough. Don't send in any more of such productions,

That capital little dialogue, "Jones's Boy," which some of us have found so effective at open-air meetings, bids fair, it would seem, to go the round of the world. An Italian translation is published in the Turin Lavoratore and in the Ancona Campana.

ANARCHIST MORALITY.

(Concluded from p. 346.)

Now it seems to some of us that people who argue in this way are simply unable to free themselves from the ideas of the old moralities we have been considering;—they are by no means such advanced Anarchists and such terrible fellows as they fancy. As has been well put lately in La Révolte, because roses obey a necessity of their nature in smelling sweetly as they do, assafoetida a necessity of its nature in stinking as it does, am I to conclude that there is no such thing as perfume or stink, no good smell or bad smell? Let us sweep away all these legacies from old times—these attempts to show that, because there is nothing moral or immoral, bad or good in the abstract, apart from our human likes and dislikes, there is nothing bad or good at all. The whole ridiculous contention rests upon a mere word-strife. We cannot put ourselves outside ourselves and say, "Now, if I had no olfactory nerves, rose and assafoetida would smell the same, or rather, not smell at all; therefore in the abstract they have no smell at all, but only in the concrete and in reference to me." Neither can we put ourselves outside our instinctive liking and admiration for a hero, our instinctive detestation of a scoundrel, because the hero cannot help being a hero, the blackguard help being a blackguard.

I think, if we look at the matter in a truly positive and common-sense way, it is just here we touch bottom, and get upon the track of a really scientific conception of morality. That instinctive liking or disliking furnishes a key to the whole problem. What is instinct! Is it not an inherited tendency to do those things which tend to the preservation of the individual and the race?—in the long run (although not, of course, in particular cases) the two things are usually the same. An instinctive liking for an act done by another is founded upon the tendency of that act to our preservation, or the preservation of our race. Deep down in the very fibres of our nature is worked that instinct for the race, as well for ourselves, which goes back hundreds of thousands of years to the first appearance of our father man upon this earth,—aye, and before his appearance, to the time of our remoter ancestors who were before him. Man has always been a social animal, anxious for his race as well as for himself, and (as has been repeatedly shown) the social instinct exists so strongly in other of the higher animals that it is clear man must have inherited it from his animal ancestor who preceded him. Two or three thousand years of individualism and private property have only, so to speak, lightly touched man with anti-social impulse. When you find him admiring the action of another, he does not know why—certainly not because custom or religion or self-interest tell him to admire it—you may be sure that it is the social instinct unconsciously at work, and that he admires it because it tends to the preservation and development of the race.

Have we not here the test and the criterion of Anarchist morality? Those actions are good—"moral"—which the immense majority of men ("normal men") instinctively admire, not because they are told to do so, but because they cannot help it. Conversely, those actions are bad—"immoral"—which men in like fashion instinctively dislike. In speaking of "badness" and "goodness," of course, we are only speaking relatively to man. Of absolute "badness" or "goodness" we can know nothing—never can know anything.

This morality is Anarchist, because it needs no enforcement by artificial law or penalty,—it enforces itself. For example, after the Revolution there will probably, for a time, be here and there our old friend the man "who will not work." Usually, no doubt, he will spring from the remnant of the middle classes. He will of course be a worthless bad lot. But the Anarchist will not put him in prison, or beat him, or "punish" him in any way. The Anarchist will not even say to him (like St. Paul or a Social Democrat) "neither shalt thou eat." To him also shall be given according to his needs. But the Anarchist will hate the idle loafer—the survival of the bad old times. He will be no comrade or friend of his. Moreover, all the world (when the world is once released from the tyranny of artificial law and artificial morality) will be, in the main, of the Anarchist's opinion. Women will be ashamed to love a loafer. Under the pressure of an effective public opinion of this kind the type will tend to disappear—will finally disappear. There will thus be a real "survival of the fittest"—the fittest for social purposes. The thing will work automatically. The loafer is free to satisfy his need of loafing; the worker is free to satisfy his need to associate with those he likes, to avoid association with those he hates. As with the loafer, so will it be with other anti-social individuals—with the liar, the quarrelsome person, and so on. General dislike and sexual selection will bring about their elimination. Here as elsewhere, if we only leave natural laws unfettered, the race will develop on true lines; it is when we seek to impose artificial restraints upon the free course of evolution that we land ourselves in difficulty.

Can we prepare the way for the New Morality? Surely we can, if we recognise the impotence of the older systems to help. Let us (so far as the wretched conditions of life to-day will allow) do our best to harmoniously develop all our faculties—physical and intellectual. A poor, anemic, physically weak man or woman will never shine as an exemplar of the New Ethic. The preservation of the individual life always has the first call on the organism, and if that organism be weak or badly harmonised there will be no energy to spare for social effort. It is out of the abundance of vitality that great deeds for others spring (vitality does not, of course, necessarily imply muscular strength). The mere maintenance of the individual existence does not exhaust the energy of the vitally strong man, and (since there is ever in any animal an intense desire to employ all its available energy) he is impelled to spend it in obeying that instinct of social preservation and development which is deeply rooted in his nature and which is only second to self-preservation itself. To put it shortly, health and morality are inter-dependent on each other. We find here that theoretical reasoning is borne out by experimental observation. Lombroso and others have shown that the modern criminal (in so far, of course, as he is really anti-social; very often he is a true hero) is invariably a man of low vitality. Of course we must always remember that, under present conditions, even a man of rich vitality often finds his superabundant energy (which under Anarchism would take social lines) diverted to other ends. That does not touch the main argument. Let us, so far as our vital energy will carry us, fight in every way to bring the happy time when all will be free to spend their life-forces for the benefit of all; when the distinction between individual effort and social effort will be a distinction without a difference, because the individual will find in society a full satisfaction of his needs, and work for self will be work also for everybody else.

DEATH.

THE AMERICAN "PUBLIC" AND PHYSICAL FORCE.

THE American public in general believe in accomplishing their purposes by physical force. The whole country is blotched by forts, arsenals, and police stations, which are depots for firearms and rallying places for men to use them. Prisons and jails are on every hand. Armed men constantly parade the streets, singly, in couples, and at times in regiments and battalions. The people applaud, praise, pay, and pension these professional killers. If John Smith comes from Europe with a paper of pins about his person, he is searched and robbed by force. If Jack Robinson refuses to deliver up part of his goods to the politicians each year his house is entered and plundered by force, or he is dragged off to prison. If James Brown owes Bill Jones a dollar, he is compelled by force to pay it. If a poor man wishes to employ himself by using vacant land, he is driven off by force. If a poor woman cannot pay her rent, she is thrown out of the house, and her little property is destroyed by force. If poor Italians choose to sleep under the piers on which the garbage is dumped, to save paying rent, they are dragged out by force. If a poor man wants to sell shoestrings on the street, until he has given a politician something for the privilege, he is prevented from doing so by force. If a person wishes to listen to music and drink beer at the same time, he is hindered by force. If a small boy smokes a cigarette on the street, he is "run in" by a big policeman. If an earnest, honest man tells the truth about some married people, he is put in the penitentiary. The legal right of the monopolists to steal is defended by force, and the attempt is made to protect conventional virtue and sham religion by force.

I know the reply that will be made to this. It will be said that in all these cases force is used for the good of society, for the good of the very persons against whom the force is used. The majority is supposed to know what is for the good of everybody, and they force everybody to do it. It is dangerous to society to allow people to bring pins from Europe, or to wickedly sell shoestrings right out in the open street, or to smoke cigarettes, or to mix music with beer, or to tell the truth; and so such things must be prevented.

I will not stop to argue this question, but will call your attention to some other phases of the use of force of which the American people highly approve. A few years ago the Southern monopolists of slave labour were robbed of millions of dollars' worth of property by force, and that was all right. General Sherman marched through the Southern States, tearing up railroad tracks, stealing food for his army, burning houses and killing people right and left,—and that was all right. It was so right that the word "bummer" became a title of honour, and to this day you will find men who glory in that they were among "Sherman's bummers," and everybody is proud to be noticed by the chief "bummer" of them all.

Ah, but those were days of war. Precisely. Stealing, train-wrecking, arson, and murder are all right if you call it war; "holy" war; war with "God" on our side; war to put down rebellion. Exactly. The Southern States were in rebellion, and it was right to steal and burn and kill to compel them to stay in the Union when they wanted to go out.

But what about standing on Concord Bridge and shooting Government troops who came to put us down when we were in rebellion? Oh, that was all right, too—because it succeeded. But were we not rebels? Were we not traitors? Were we not every bad thing that we afterward called the Southerners? Oh, yes; but that was different. One was a "holy" war of revolution; the other was a "holy" war to put down revolution. What you mean is that any amount of physical violence is right to accomplish what the majority can succeed in doing.

The American people believe in physical violence to avenge insults or resent several kinds of personal injuries. They believe generally in the doctrine that is expressed by the familiar saying: "An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth." How comes it then that they have tacitly laid down the dictum that under no provocation shall working people avenge their wrongs by violence? Was it right to resist taxation a hundred years ago, and is it now wrong to do the same thing? Was it right to take away the monopolists slaves thirty years ago by force, and is it now wrong to take away the monopolist's vacant land or charters by force?

I cannot understand why it is right for everyone except a working man to use force to get what he wants. I cannot see why if a money-lender or landlord is justifiable in collecting by force money that he does not earn, a working man is not also justifiable in taking by force what he does earn. It seems to me that if General Sherman is to be glorified for tearing up railroad tracks and stealing chickens and burning houses to whip the South, the strikers should not be blamed for wrecking trains to whip the New York Central Railroad, which is a worse enemy to them and the general public than the South ever was to the North.

The American rule of conduct is: If you cannot get your rights in any other way, fight for them; but when there is the slightest indication that the working people, who are robbed every time they turn around—now by the State, now by the Church, now by the landlord, now by the employer—mean to fight for their rights, everybody calls them fiends incarnate. This is humbug; and it is folly to suppose that you can teach people to almost worship George Washington, who was a rebel against tyranny, and Thomas Jefferson, who said that the roots of the tree of liberty should be watered every twenty years by blood, and General Grant, who waded knee-deep in the red stream of death, and then expect these same people to tamely submit to worse wrongs than provoked the heroes of the past to rebellion.

It is bad teaching, this, to hold up so many fighters to reverence; it is a bad education to have armed policemen on every corner, and celebrate every conspicuous event by a military parade. I deplore it, and warn you that unless more peaceful precepts and examples are held up to the people trouble will ensue. By predicting trouble I do not encourage it. They encourage it who preach the holiness of war and practice the subjugation of the poor by the employment of armed policemen and detectives.

NOTICE.

ON MONDAY, NOVEMBER 10, at the ORIEL HALL, Spiritual Institute, Cookridge Street, Leeds, a Chicago Martyrs Commemoration Meeting will be held at 7.30 p.m. Speakers: Andrew Hall, F. Charles, and Robert Bingham (of Sheffield), H. Samuels, G. Cores, and J. Sweeny (of Leeds). Admission free.

SPECIAL APPEAL TO OUR READERS.

DURING the winter a large number of outdoor meetings will have to be discontinued, and a large circle of readers will be deprived of their Commonweal, unless they help us by making their newsagents obtain it. The hostility and indifference of newsagents, with few exceptions, from monopolist W. H. Smith downwards, are really the chief obstacles to the circulation of the Commonweal and the spread of our ideas. Owing to this boycotting there are a large number of towns where the Commonweal is never seen.

Amongst our subscribers and friends there are many who are anxious to forward the Cause of Socialism, and yet they do not know exactly how to render help. Here is a field for quiet and useful work, where no heroic sacrifices are demanded—

1. Insist that your newsagent obtain you your 'Weal. Don't trade with him for other things if you find him throwing obstacles in the way.
 2. Pester W. H. Smith's agents at all railway stalls by enquiries for the 'Weal.
 3. Introduce it to the notice of wholesale agents, and send us the names and addresses of all who are willing to sell the journal and display bills. Above all, push it amongst your friends.
 4. Distribution in tram-cars and railway carriages can be unostentatiously effected by leaving copies upon seats and in luggage racks.
- In short, those willing to aid us can find plenty of opportunities where there is a will to do so.

THE GREAT STRIKE IN AUSTRALIA.

"It seems generally conceded as a fact," says the Sydney Star, "that there is a kind of revolutionary tidal wave rolling over everything and everybody." Well, on Friday, September 17, the "revolutionary tidal wave" burst into surf and foam in Sydney. Or in plain English, there was a lively riot, which filled the middle and upper classes with intense terror. It appears that a large consignment of non-union wool had arrived in Sydney, and the capitalists desired to move it from the Darling Harbour railway-station to the Circular Quay. This was difficult, as the carmen were on strike on principle. The capitalists, however, feeling themselves perfectly safe with the strong force of troops, police, and specials massed in Sydney, determined on driving the vans themselves in a kind of triumphal procession. It is probable they desired to provoke a riot by this action, but the riot they provoked was rather more serious than they expected. At half-past ten on Friday, September 19, the procession, consisting of some twelve or thirteen trollies of non-union wool, started from the railway-station and moved slowly through the streets, fat capitalists driving, while "specials" were seated on the wool as guards, the trollies being escorted by mounted troopers. The procession was followed by an immense crowd of unionists, whom the worthy employers proceeded to madden by jeering laughter and insulting gestures. The crowd retaliated by hooting and yells, which so alarmed one of the masters that he drew a revolver and levelled it at the people. Then the stones began to fly. A trooper received a blow behind the ear with a piece of road-metal, and blood began to trickle over the collar of his coat. At the corner of George and Market streets a man was arrested by the police, who dragged him into a cab. A "heavy-limbed individual" then calmly proposed that the cab should be overturned and the prisoner rescued, and a heavy stone came crashing through the window of the cab. The police then got out with their prisoner, who was promptly rescued. The shower of stones now grew into a storm, and police and troopers had to dodge very considerably to avoid them. Windows were smashed in all directions, and continual shouts and yells rent the air. Reinforcements of foot and mounted police arriving on the scene, the crowd assailed them desperately, and with the evident intention of stopping the passage of the trollies. In Market Street a trooper was nearly dragged off his horse, and the capitalists driving the trollies began to look very pale and uncomfortable. However, the procession reached the Circular Quay at last, and the blacklegs started to unload the bales. A crowd of ten thousand had now collected on the quay, and the most desperate of them rushed to the front to stop the unloading, while stones came flying thick and fast. Then the Riot Act was read, and mounted troopers and foot police charged upon the people, the police using their batons mercilessly. They met with a fierce resistance; one trooper was thrown from his horse and another had his cheekbone laid bare. After a short sharp struggle, however, the people were completely routed, and "order" was restored.

This riot had a most alarming effect on the capitalist classes. They thought that the Social Revolution was coming off at once, and there was immediately a tremendous rush by the propertied classes upon the gun-makers. It is stated on the authority of the Sydney Evening News that in twenty-four hours more revolvers and revolver-ammunition was sold than would have been disposed of in two or three weeks of ordinary business. The Government, in fear that these weapons should get into the hands of strikers, ordered the buying up of all revolvers in Sydney, so that between 3 and 4 on Saturday afternoon not a single revolver could be had for love nor money. The ranks of the special constables were also greatly increased, and in many instances clerks and other workers were forced into their ranks by threats of dismissal on the part of the masters. A corps of fifty mounted specials was formed, and one of these gentlemen at the outset of his career tumbled off his horse and hurt himself, which rather destroyed the effect which this redoubtable body might otherwise have had upon the public mind. The specials created, in fact, as much merriment as they did in England in '87. There are a lot of mere boys among them, and the mass are weedy-looking clerks, narrow chested and short in stature, whose physical education has evidently been neglected. The Bulletin has a very funny picture of a special of the short and podgy species endeavouring to arrest a big, dangerous-looking wharf-labourer of about six feet, who looks as if he could eat the special. The cartoon has under the ironical direction, "Prisoner must be taken to the nearest lock-up." Not content with specials, police, and troops, it was known that the Government were contemplating landing the marines with machine-guns from H.M.S. Orlando and Curacoa, while ball-cartridge was served out among the soldiers. Mr McMillan, the Colonial Treasurer, who was mainly responsible for issuing this order, and who had also shown himself a bitter opponent of the strikers in a speech made to a deputation of capitalists, in which he described the Labour Defence Committee as a "semi-revolutionary government," and practically declared that this sort of thing must be put down, was pulled up in his wild career by Sir Henry Parkes, the premier, and resigned in consequence.

Meanwhile the terror was increased by the calling out of shearers and rouseabouts, and also by the statement of the Labour Defence Committee that unless the employers would meet them in conference they would proclaim a general strike by calling out all trade-unionists. In fact, their difficulty was at that time to keep the rest of the unionists at work, so intense was the excitement among them. A correspondent of the Australian Star who had been conversing with all sections of the workers agrees in this opinion. He says:—"So far from talking of yielding, this is what they said: We will stop the gasworks, call out the compositors (which I believe they intend doing early next week), call out the butchers, bakers, and shopmen who belong to the unions, and at last take out the engineers, employed anyhow and anywhere, ashore or afloat—railways also. Enquiry gave the strength of this position. Of course the stopping of supplies to the gasworks means no light, and a picnic for burglars and pickpockets; if the compositors are called out there will be no daily papers; if the other branches of labour mentioned are told to be idle there will be no trade; and if the engineers and engine-drivers stop work the theatres, leading hotels, and places of public entertainment generally will be left without reliable assistance of any kind."

With this awful prospect before them, the capitalists were literally frantic with terror and rage. Their press shrieked for the prosecution of the Labour Defence Committee for conspiracy, but Sir Henry Parkes knew better; although he thought the committee "could be prosecuted for conspiracy," yet he doubted "whether it would be expedient and advisable to take that course." Sir Henry Parkes is a wily old politician, and knew very well that to arrest this committee would be more likely to drive the strikers to riot and insurrection than to crush the strike; and though the Sydney Daily Telegraph, the organ of the capitalists, indulged in tall talk, and declared that the "public" (the capitalists) would take "very drastic measures in their own defence," they have not done so yet: possibly, like Sir Henry Parkes, they know better. Shooting down the people, or an attempt to lynch the Labour Defence Committee, might have very serious results: the capitalists might taste their own medicine, and find that rope, lead, and steel did not agree with them.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

Trouble at the Docks again.

We do not think the union officials have gained much of a victory by their agreement with the dock directors. As far as we can see, this agreement involves the surrender of every point the Dockers' Union has hitherto fought for. We all can remember the declaration of the union officials that they could take no more men into the union and therefore there was no chance of work for any stranger down at the docks. It is very strange to see these gentlemen, who objected to the admission of any more workers into the union, and told the casual docker to go to that other union, the workhouse, for relief, now consenting meekly, at the dictation of the all-powerful dock directors, to allow blacklegs to work at the docks without joining their union at all. The men who are displaced by these blacklegs are being told as a consolation "to make known their grievances through their branches in the usual course, and the same will be promptly dealt with." But how, if the dock company are to be allowed to take the place of the "genuine docker," and if the union agrees to this, do they think that they can persuade the company by mild words to sack their blackleg pets to give the unionists work? At any rate, it is rather a come-down for the men who refused to receive the poor casual docker into their union and called him all sorts of opprobrious names—"criminal loafer," "dead-beat," etc.—to have to stand by and let him take the bread out of the mouths of their own men as a blackleg. Their admirers in the press may call this a "triumph," and talk of the remarkable trio of leaders who accomplished it, but it seems to be the fashion now to call a surrender by that name, and we fail to see where the genius of the leaders comes in.

If the capitalist press, the dock directors, and the leaders are satisfied with the new arrangement, the dockers are not. They complain bitterly of the introduction of blacklegs and the loss of the 3d. dinner money. There has been a succession of strikes at most of the docks during Monday and Tuesday, and the discontent with the leaders is so intense that it may force them into vigorous action.

Federated Labour.

The federation of sailors, dockers, gas-stokers and coal-porters, bargemen, etc., is a good idea, but why was it not done before? The present crisis has been certain for months, and surely directly the Shipowners' Federation started it ought to have been answered by the federation of the workers engaged in the shipping industry. However, better late than never, and if the new federation could only get the miners and railway-men to join with them, they would have in their grasp the whole trade of the country and could make what terms with the capitalists they pleased. We are sure that a federation as large and powerful as this will be required to fight and defeat the federated unions of the capitalists.

THE FATE OF PARLIAMENT.—Our poor old Parliament, thousands of years old, is still good for something, for several things;—though many are beginning to ask, with ominous anxiety, for what thing? But for whatever thing or things Parliament may be good for, indisputably it must start with other than a lie in its mouth. On the whole, Parliament working with a lie in its mouth will have to take itself away. . . . At all hours of the day and night some Chartism is advancing, some armed Cromwell is advancing, to apprise such Parliament. "Ye are no Parliament. In the name of — Go!"—Carlyle, 'Past and Present.'

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

BELGIUM.

I copy from the Paris Révolte a little story of the workers at Lize-Seraing which merits reproduction. A master named Rose turned out of doors a toiler of fifty, simply because he could no longer work quite as hard as in his younger days. Thereupon the old worker's mates (by the way, what middle-class man is old at fifty?) fell upon the cruel boss and beat him in such fashion that he had to be carried home. With La Révolte I say, "Bravo, comrades! Don't be afraid to hit hard; masters have tough hides."

FRANCE.

La Révolte still continues, I rejoice to say, to pursue its useful career. It affords a pleasant relief to one wearied with the barren personal polemics of Le Parti Ouvrier and Le Proletariat—Montague-and-Capulet-like disputes about loaves and fishes and seats in parliament. I do not think, however, that our comrade Nicoll the other day quite meant to suggest that the "New Unionist" movement in this country was to be explained entirely by Tory intrigues. This is what seems to be suggested by an article in La Révolte on the "1st May, 1891." However, Nicoll is quite able to take care of himself. For my humble part, I quite accept the following passage from the article in question: "What we must above all bring clearly out is that, if you search, you will find in the working-class movement—in England Conservative intrigues, in Belgium German intrigues, aye, even Governmental intrigues, in France Boulangist intrigues; but you will find much else besides. Every reactionary party, but every revolutionary party also, has sought to profit by the movement. Conservative gold you will find, if you please; but you will find the freemasonry of the miners, the restless energy of the Knights of Labour (we speak of the men, not of their chief), the feverish activity of the Irish, republican dreams, the charitable sentimentalism of the thousand organisers of women's unions, the propaganda of the Social Democrats, the inflammatory speeches of revolutionists, and the deeds and blood of Anarchists. Everything has contributed to this great movement. To explain it by a single cause would be as absurd as to maintain that Philippe-Egalité's money made the French Revolution, or that monarchist gold caused the burning of the country-houses, or that the Jacobin Club (then a constitutional assembly) produced 1793."

ITALY.

Our comrade Malatesta, in La Campana for October 23, urges preparation for the congress of all Italian Socialists, of which I spoke lately in these Notes. Comrades at Lugano (Ticino) have offered themselves as centres of communication. A broad-based congress, such as is proposed, would be of great practical utility.

I cannot resist reproducing the announcement of the Fabian campaign of this winter, as it is given in La Campana: "The lecturers are all celebrities—Sydney, Oliver, Besant, Mrs. Bernard Shaw, etc." ("Sydney, Oliver, Besant, la signora Bernard Shaw, ecc."). No doubt equally funny blunders are made in this column, but it is not unpleasant to find our excellent Fabian friends thus travestied.

SPAIN.

El Socialismo of Cadiz is publishing a translation of the Révolte articles on Anarchist Morality of which I have spoken elsewhere. This journal also gives a pretty full account of our Anti-Parliamentary Conference of last August, with reports of the speeches of comrades Mowbray, Kitz, Charles, Malatesta, and Louise Michel.

At Gibraltar Spanish and English workers have cast aside jingoism and the hateful spirit of race hatred and joined as one man in a successful strike.

The Socialismo is not only an Anarchist, but also a Communist paper, and, as a Communist, one is pleased to note in its reports of the formation of Anarchist-Communist groups in all parts of Spain.

The last copy of El Socialista (organ of the so-called "Workmen's Party") we have received is mainly filled with a report of the Halle Congress and the dictatorial calumny and stale abuse of the "dumb driven cattle" who follow the Reichstag Socialists. I do not know if I am prejudiced, but I always find Social-Democratic sheets singularly dull reading.

The first number of the Basque-land Combate has been seized and its editor imprisoned. This will make a good advertisement for the second number; for Spanish comrades are not the men to be easily disheartened by Governmental rigour.

CUBA.

On the 28th of September a most important meeting of tobacco workers (to the number of about four thousand) was held at Havannah, for the purpose of considering the course to be pursued in view of the McKinley Bill, which, as I have already explained, bids fair to bring about a serious crisis in Cuba. The whole spirit of the gathering (judging from the official report published in El Productor) seems to have been thoroughly revolutionary. The following was one of the resolutions voted unanimously:—"This assembly declares that it asks for the abolition of no law, since, on the day when it deems its strength sufficient for the purpose, it will demand the abolition of all laws." Our comrade E. González spoke out with especial manfulness. "The workers," he said, "ought never to take sides in any matter with the bourgeois, since the bourgeois are their hangmen. The middle classes grow rich upon the sweat and misery of the toilers; they cause us to live in hovels while they dwell in sumptuous palaces; they debauch our daughters with the gold they steal from us. Never let us join with the manufacturers for any purpose. When our situation becomes so desperate that we have no food for our families, let us sally forth into the street, and to the cry of 'bread or lead' seek food where it is to be had." At this stage the Chief of Police interfered, and our comrade sat down amid continued cheering.

R. W. B.

Our Leeds comrades announce that they are willing to deliver lectures upon the following subjects to any society in their immediate neighbourhood. Application for their services should be made to the Secretary of Propaganda Committee, Socialist League Club, Clarendon Buildings, Victoria Road, Leeds. GEORGE CORES.—The Coming Change in Society—The Fraud of Politics—Why Pay Rent—Trades' Unionism and Socialism—Socialism, its Aims and Methods. HENRY SAMUELS.—The Evolution of Cannibalism—Insufficient Remedies for Poverty—Socialism and Political Economy—Reform or Revolution—The General Strike. JAMES SWENEY.—The Labour War—Trades' Unionism and Socialism. MATTHEW SOLLITT.—Individualism Realised in Socialism.

DO YOU AGREE?

Do you agree with us that the social awakening of the workers is a desirable end? Do you agree with us that we are working in the right way to achieve that end?

You do not? Then oppose us and prove us wrong on every platform and in every paper to which you can gain access!

You do agree? Then work with us and for us; help us to extend our circle of influence; let no day pass in which you have not interested some one in our propaganda!

There is no middle course for an honest man!

REPORTS.

'COMMONWEAL' BRANCH.—Good meeting on Friday at Hoxton addressed by Kitz and Mrs. Lahr. On Sunday, Nov. 2, Mrs. Blundell addressed meeting in hall on "Socialism"; our comrade laid great stress on the necessity of fraternal unity amongst comrades, and thought the movement would soon become larger if minor differences were put on one side, keeping in sight the real enemy—Capitalism; good discussion. On Monday, at the Autonomie Club, our Concert and Ball, given for the benefit of the paper, went off well; songs and recitations were given by comrades, and a variety entertainment by H. Rowson and Sons was well appreciated; dancing followed.—B.

ABERDEEN.—Our first meeting in the Oddfellows' Large Hall was a great success, the hall being filled with an enthusiastic audience. Comrade Duncan opened the debate in support of the general strike as the best means of securing the eight hours day. W. Cooper supported legislative enactment as a means to that end. Discussion was carried on by several friends and members throughout the audience. Comrade Cooper replied in a fifteen minutes' speech, and Duncan closed the debate. Rennie occupied the chair. 14s. 2½d. was collected to defray expenses. The open-air meeting on Castle Street on Saturday night was somewhat spoiled by the rain. Comrades Duncan and Rennie spoke for some time, however, before the rain got too heavy.—G. A. C.

HALIFAX.—On Sunday evening, at Helliwell's Hotel, Cores, of Leeds, addressed a good audience on "The Fraud of Politics." He pointed out the failure of political methods and changes to affect economic evils, and advocated direct revolutionary action by the workers. The audience were thoroughly sympathetic, the chief opponent being a "Socialist" who advocated the claims of the Liberal Party as "the friends of the working men." Ten Commonweal were sold. Unfortunately the reply to the opposition was cut short by want of time. A promise to commence revolutionary propaganda in Halifax was received with evident favour.

LEEDS.—We are still doing well here. In addition to our usual propaganda work, a debate is being carried on in the Leeds Evening Express on "Socialism and Temperance" between G. Cores and the local agent of the U. K. Alliance, a Mr. Pearson. It is affording us a splendid opportunity of preaching our Socialist ideas. Last Wednesday week, October 15, comrades Cores and Samuels visited the Spiritualists' Mutual Improvement Class and took part in a debate on Socialism. As a consequence comrade Samuels by invitation opened the debate the following Wednesday, and Cores is to open on the 5th. The members are intelligent and thoughtful, and are eager to get information on Socialism. We wish to draw the attention of all our comrades and friends in Leeds to our discussions on Thursday evenings. Comrade Dyche opened on October 16th by reading a paper on "Economics." Cores following last Thursday on "Anarchist-Communism," and Menkey is to continue the debate on Thursday the 6th from the democratic point of view. This subject promises to be specially interesting and productive of vigorous discussion. On Sunday we held our usual meetings on Hunslet and Woodhouse moors, Cores and Samuels speaking.—G. C.

SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION—EDINBURGH.—On Sunday evening, comrade Bruce Glasier (Glasgow) addressed a large meeting in Labour Hall on "Gladstone and the Labour Problem." His criticism of the G. O. M.'s recent utterances was certainly fearless, and he showed in a most convincing manner the utter uselessness of politics and Parliament in the way of doing anything to benefit the people. The lecture was listened to with great attention, and although no one attempted to defend Gladstone, some discussion took place on the general question of Socialism and the Universal Strike, to which Glasier referred and advocated. Gilray lectured at Leith on "Comradeship"; there was a good attendance and a discussion followed. The Leith Pilot is reporting our lectures there at some length.

The Persecution of Jews in Russia.

We did not, even after his amusing performance on the London County Council as a puritanical fanatic, expect to find Mr. Charrington among the enemies of free speech and public meeting. But after the way in which he turned our comrades of the International Club into the street last Saturday, because the Chief Rabbi did not approve of their calling attention to the sufferings of the Jews, it is impossible to look upon this intolerant bigot in any other light. The Chief Rabbi and Mr. Charrington are both in the same boat, and have proved once more to the workers that clericalism is the enemy, no matter whether it wear the garb of Roman Catholic, Salvationist, Jewish Rabbi, or English Puritan. However, a very successful meeting was held outside the hall on Mile-end Waste, at which William Morris, Stepniak, Felix Volkhovsky, Edward and Eleanor Aveling, James Beal, R. W. Burnie, and others spoke, and a strong resolution censuring the heads of the Anglo-Jewish community for procuring the boycott of the meeting was carried unanimously.

WHERE ARE WE NOW?

It is good from time to time for those who are engaged in a serious movement to look back and review the progress of the past few years; which involves looking around them and noting the way the movement is affecting other people. It is good to do so for this reason amongst others, that men absorbed in such a movement are apt to surround themselves with a kind of artificial atmosphere which distorts the proportions of things outside, and prevents them from seeing what is really going on, and consequently from taking due council as to what is best to do.

It is now some seven years since Socialism came to life again in this country. To some the time will seem long, so many hopes and disappointments as have been crowded into them. Yet in the history of a serious movement seven years is a short time enough; and few movements surely have made so much progress during this short time in one way or another as Socialism has done.

For what was it which we set out to accomplish? To change the system of society on which the stupendous fabric of civilisation is founded, and which has been built up by centuries of conflict with older and dying systems, and crowned by the victory of modern civilisation over the material surroundings of life.

Could seven years make any visible impression on such a tremendous undertaking as this?

Consider, too, the quality of those who began and carried on this business of reversing the basis of modern society! Who were the statesmen who took up the momentous questions laid before England of the nineteenth century by the English Socialists? Who were the great divines who preached this new gospel of happiness from their pulpits? Who were the natural philosophers who proclaimed their hope and joy at the advent of a society which should at last use their marvellous discoveries for the good of mankind?

There is no need to take a pen in hand to write their names. The traveller (i.e., the toiler) had fallen among thieves, and the priest and the Levite went by on the other side; or perhaps in this case threw a stone or two at the wounded man: it was but a Samaritan, an outcast, an unrespectable person, who helped him.

Those who set out "to make the revolution"—that is, as afore said, to put society on a new basis, contradictory to the existing one—were a few working-men, less successful even in the wretched life of labour than their fellows; a sprinkling of the intellectual proletariat, whose keen pushing of Socialism must have seemed pretty certain to extinguish their limited chances of prosperity; one or two outsiders in the game political; a few refugees from the bureaucratic tyranny of foreign governments; and here and there an unpractical, half-cracked artist or author.

Yet such as they were, they were enough to do something. Through them, though not by them, the seven years of the new movement toward freedom have, contrary to all that might have been expected, impressed the idea of Socialism deeply on the epoch. It is true that the toilers have not begun to reap benefit from that impression; but it was impossible that they should. No permanent material benefit can accrue to them until Socialism has ceased to be militant, and is merged in the new society. But as I said the other week, the movement has at least accomplished this, that no one who thinks is otherwise than discontented with things as they are. The shouts of triumph over the glories of civilisation which once drowned the moans of the miserable (and that but a dozen years ago at most) have now sunk into quavering apologies for the existence of the horrors and fatuities of our system; a system which is only defended as a thing to be endured for lack of a better, and until we can find some means of packing it off into limbo: and the workers, who in the period of "leap and bound prosperity" were thought to have reached the end of their tether, and to be fixed in a kind of subordinate heaven on earth, are now showing that they are not going to stop there, at any rate, and whatever happens. And the principles of Socialism are beginning to be understood, so that to some of ourselves, who are always hearing of them, they seem now mere commonplaces which need not be insisted on. Though with that view I can, as I shall show presently, by no means agree.

All this has come to pass. How and why? Was it by virtue of the qualities of those who have furthered it? That little band of oddities who fell in with Socialism during these last few years, did it turn out after all that they were so much better than they seemed? Well, they were (and are), most of them, human at least; but otherwise it cannot be said that great unexpected talent for administration and conduct of affairs has been developed amongst us, nor any vast amount of foresight either. We have been what we seemed to be (to our friends I hope)—and that was no great things. We have between us made about as many mistakes as any other party in a similar space of time. Quarrels more than enough we have had; and sometimes also weak assent for fear of quarrels to what we did not agree with.

There has been self-seeking amongst us, and vainglory, and sloth, and rashness; though there has been at least courage and devotion also. When I first joined the movement I hoped that some working-man leader, or rather leaders, would turn up, who would push aside all middle-class help, and become great historical figures. I might still hope for that, if it seemed likely to happen, for indeed I long for it enough; but to speak plainly it does not so seem at present.

Yet, I repeat, in spite of all drawbacks the impression has been made, and why? The reason for it has been given in words said before, but which I must needs say again: because that seemingly inexpugnable fabric of modern society is verging towards its fall; it has done its work, and is going to change into something else. That is the reason why, with all our faults, we have been able to do something; nor do I believe that there will ever be lacking instruments for bringing about the great change, exactly in proportion to the readiness of the solid elements in society—the workers, to wit—to receive that change, and carry on the new order to which it will give birth.

So much at least we have to encourage us. But are not some of us disappointed in spite of the change of the way in which Socialism is looked on generally? It is but natural that we should be. When we first began to work together, there was little said about anything save the great ideals of Socialism; and so far off did we seem from the realisation of these, that we could hardly think of any means for their realisation, save great dramatic events which would make our lives tragic indeed, but would take us out of the sordidness of the so-called "peace" of civilisation. With the great extension of Socialism, this also is changed. Our very success has dimmed the great ideals that first led us on; for the hope of the partial and, so to say, vulgarised realisation of Socialism is now pressing on us. I think that we are all confident that Socialism will be realised: it is not wonderful, then, that we should long to see—to feel—its realisation in our own life-time. Methods of realisation, therefore, are now more before our eyes than ideals: but it is of no use talking about methods which are not, in part at least, immediately feasible, and it is of the nature of such partial methods to be sordid and discouraging, though they may be necessary.

There are two tendencies in this matter of methods: on the one hand is our old acquaintance palliation, elevated now into vastly greater importance than it used to have, because of the growing discontent, and the obvious advance of Socialism; on the other is the method of partial, necessarily futile, inconsequent revolt, or riot rather, against the authorities, who are our absolute masters, and can easily put it down.

With both of these methods I disagree; and that the more because the palliatives have to be clamoured for, and the riots carried out by men who do not know what Socialism is, and have no idea what their next step is to be, if contrary to all calculation they should happen to be successful. Therefore, at the best our masters would be our masters still, because there would be nothing to take their place. We are not ready for such a change as that! The authorities might be a little shaken, perhaps, a little more inclined to yield something to the clamours of their slaves, but there would be slaves still, as all men must be who are not prepared to manage their own business themselves. Nay, as to the partial violent means, I believe that the occurrence of these would not shake the authorities at all, but would strengthen them rather, because they would draw to them the timid of all classes, i.e., all men but a very few.

I have mentioned the two lines on which what I should the methods of impatience profess to work. Before I write a very few words on the only line of method on which some of us can work, I will give my views about the present state of the movement as briefly as I can.

The whole set opinion amongst those more or less touched by Socialism, who are not definite Socialists, is towards the New Trades' Unionism and palliation. Men believe that they can wrest from the capitalists some portion of their privileged profits, and the masters, to judge by the recent threats of combination on their side, believe also that this can be done. That it could only very partially be done, and that the men could not rest there if it were done, we Socialists know very well; but others do not. Let that pass for the present. The Parliamentary side of things seems in abeyance, at present; it has given place to the Trade Union side. But, of course, it will come up again; and in time, if there is nothing to cut across the logical sequence of events, it will achieve the legal Eight Hours' Day—with next to no results either to men or masters.

For the rest, I neither believe in State Socialism as desirable in itself, or, indeed, as a complete scheme do I think it possible. Nevertheless, some approach to it is sure to be tried, and to my mind this will precede any complete enlightenment on the new order of things. The success of Mr. Bellamy's utopian book, deadly dull as it is, is a straw to show which way the wind blows. The general attention paid to our clever friends, the Fabian lecturers and pamphleteers, is not altogether due to their literary ability; people have really got their heads turned more or less in their direction.

Now it seems to me that at such a time, when people are not only discontented, but have really conceived a hope of bettering the condition of labour, while at the same time the means towards their end are doubtful; or, rather, when they take the very beginning of the means as an end in itself,—that this time when people are excited about Socialism, and when many who know nothing about it think themselves Socialists, is the time of all others to put forward the simple principles of Socialism regardless of the policy of the passing hour.

My readers will understand that in saying this I am speaking for those who are complete Socialists—or let us call them Communists. I say for us to make Socialists is the business at present, and at present I do not think we can have any other useful business. Those who are not really Socialists—who are Trades' Unionists, disturbance-breeders, or what not—will do what they are impelled to do, and we cannot help it. At the worst there will be some good in what they do; but we need not and cannot heartily work with them, when we know that their methods are beside the right way.

Our business, I repeat, is the making of Socialists, i.e., convincing people that Socialism is good for them and is possible. When we have enough people of that way of thinking, they will find out what action is necessary for putting their principles in practice. Until we have that mass of opinion, action for a general change that will benefit the whole people is impossible. Have we that body of opinion or any thing like it? Surely not. If we look outside that glamour, that charmed atmosphere of party warfare in which we necessarily move, we shall see this clearly: that though there are a great many who believe it possible to compel their masters by some means or another to behave better to them, and though they are prepared to compel them (by so-called peaceful means, strikes and the like), all but a very small minority are not prepared to do without masters. They do not believe in their own capacity to undertake the management of affairs, and to be responsible for their life in this world. When they are so prepared, then Socialism will be realised; but nothing can push it on a day in advance of that time.

Therefore, I say, make Socialists. We Socialists can do nothing else that is useful, and preaching and teaching is not out of date for that purpose; but rather for those who, like myself, do not believe in State Socialism, it is the only rational means of attaining to the New Order of Things.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

A DEAR GOSPEL.—“Men cease to regard money!” cries Bolus of Houndsditch. What else do all men strive for? The very Bishop informs me that Christianity cannot get on without a minimum of five thousand five hundred in its pocket.—Carlyle, Past and Present.

TO THE “PHILANTHROPISTS.”—O Anti-Slavery Convention, loud-sounding, long-eared Exeter Hall!—But in thee too there is a kind of instinct towards justice, and I will complain of nothing. Only, black Quashee over the seas being sufficiently attended to, wilt thou perhaps open thy dull sodden eyes to the “sixty thousand valets in London itself who are yearly dismissed to the streets, to be what they can, when the season ends”; or to the hunger-stricken, pallid, yellow-coloured “Free Labourers” in Lancashire, Yorkshire, Buckinghamshire, and all other shires? . . . Quashee has already victuals and clothing; Quashee is not dying of such despair as the yellow-coloured pale man's.—Carlyle, Past and Present.

FALSE REMEDIES FOR POVERTY.

IN all directions, and from nearly all parties of the State, we hear various proposals for the solution of the greatest problem of the time—i.e., the Labour Question. A few short years ago no statesman, and very few indeed connected with politics, would admit that there was such a thing as a labour question at all. We were told by Liberal and Tory alike that we, the Socialists, were merely a set of agitators, who were stumping for notoriety. Even Mr. C. Bradlaugh compared us to a set of dreamers, fools, or worse. But thanks to our steady plodding propaganda since 1880, in the alley and slum, in the hall and park, with voice and leaflet, we have compelled our masters to listen to the voice of the people who have been silent, alas! too long; and true to the order to which our rulers and masters belong, even now they refuse to listen to, or deal with, the truth, but vainly attempt by various schemes (most of which have been tried in other countries) to gull or mislead the people of this country, even as the people on the Continent have been misled and deceived by somewhat similar proposals.

Let us take a sample or two of the proposals—and there are many before us at the present time. The one which seems to meet with most favour is that relating to pensions for worn-out or disabled workers, who are not only to continue to be robbed by the capitalist, but are further expected to contribute from their already scant wages to this pension fund, from which they are to draw a certain sum per week after they are 65 years of age. Considering that the average life of the worker is only 35 in the whole of the country, and in some particular districts—such as London, Liverpool, Manchester, Sheffield, etc.—it is only some 27 years, I would ask workers (who think) is this worth a trial at all so far as they are concerned? I have no hope of its even being a good palliative; as it appears to me, it is only another method of easing the pockets of our masters of their poor-rates; or in other words, our rulers are getting tired of keeping the worn-out human machines, and would fain have the workers compelled (seeing their stone-yard and oakum-picking tests have failed) to insure themselves whilst young in order not to be a burden to the robber class when they are old. The workers are to be docked 1s. per week from about 16 years old to 65, and then to have 10s. per week after that for life. What a glorious prospect for the worn-out decrepid wretch who can contrive to live to 65 years! But, as the immense mass of the workers have no chance of living so long, I cannot see what this precious scheme with its pauper pensions has to do with them. What fools we workers are, and have been, to be misled by every plausible cry, present and past.

The position I take up might seem to the wilfully blind that I have no sympathy with the old, but I think that those who care to study will see that it is much better to end the system (at once) that renders it possible for aged workers to end their days in receipt of charity. Seeing as I do that every able-bodied worker can and does produce three times as much as he consumes, I would warn any worker from expecting any success from this so-called insurance scheme, and would have them bear in mind that its promoters only aim at making it impossible for cases of “extreme hardships” to exist; not “hardship,” mark, but only “extreme hardships”; not a solution of the question, but only a little paint over a worm-eaten beam, which must continue to rot until the burden becomes too great, and then a crash must come.

Well, it may be said, this is only one scheme; there is the new and old unionism, which is securing more comforts for the workers—more wages, less hours, more leisure, all of which will enable the worker to beautify his home, increase his knowledge, and build up the physical condition of himself and family; and all for what?—that he may continue a wage-slave. Nay, I can never believe that; for alongside of the workers unions we have growing up with lightning rapidity the federated unions of the capitalists; and what, pray, is their object? It is, and can only be, to break up or curtail the power of the workers' unions; and does anyone think that this coming battle—the signs of which are already appearing—can end successfully for the workers? I don't believe it will.

Say our critics, these are only two instances. Well, let us take a third. The workers are to get and keep the franchise; which is most difficult, for according to both returning officers in the Eccles division of Lancashire, the number of removals has been something alarming, and with the coming struggle between Labour and Capitalism this evil of removal must increase. But, for the sake of argument, we will suppose the workers get, and do keep, the franchise. Does anyone really believe that they are going to avoid an appeal to force to settle this great question? What do you think the land-holding and capitalist class are made of? Does anyone think they will give up all their monopoly and the power it gives them without a struggle? If there is anyone who believes this I am afraid they are doomed to a sudden and awful awakening to the truth. The only thing worth dying for is freedom; but I am afraid a large number of workers are doomed to lay down their lives for a mere shadow, and all because they are either mentally blind or morally cowards. Is it not wiser, then, to try and find out the truth of the economical position and strengthen the workers' position in the coming struggle by being prepared to raise the cry, “The land for the people, the product to the producer,” and see that there is no petty shuffling for only a part of what belongs to us? “No Compromise” must be written large on our flag, and “No Surrender” be firmly engrafted in heart and head. If the workers are going to fight for anything less than this, then their case is hopeless, because it can only end in disappointment and failure. Isn't this the truth, you who are half-starved and ill-clad; you who are in work, you who are fathers of families, not knowing what will become of them? Do you not also know it, you who are compelled to tramp from town to town in search of what you perhaps already know you cannot get—work and food; you who to-day are compelled to risk so much to obtain so little, you who are compelled to steal; and you also who are forced to eke out a miserable life by prostitution, contracting diseases and ending by a terrible death, either at the hands of some monster of the "Ripper" type or perhaps disease in a hospital? Be ready, then, ye fathers and mothers, young and old, for we are nearing a terrible crash. Have no fear in your hearts of the power of our masters. They may for a time be able to hire ruffians like the Pinkertons of Chicago, who with revolver and club may attempt to crush our hopes; but already we see signs that they dare not rely on our kinsmen who have been forced from field, mine, and workshop to be dressed and drilled to do their fighting for them. Detachments of guards, artillery, army service corps, and infantry of the line, have shown what is inwardly working among them by open mutiny; it was only a little while ago we heard that a large number of the 2nd Surrey Regiment revolted against going to India, no doubt believing that their enemies as well as ours are here at home. The sun of Freedom is shining in all lands, and we here ought also to prepare for the day of revolution. Let us waste no more time in trifling, but strike; strike quick, strike hard, and the day will be our own.

C. W. MOWBRAY.

NOVEMBER 11TH.

BENEATH the frowning battlements of wrong
Our fallen comrades we commemorate;
To those immortal dead our hearts belong,
They met, for us, their undeserved fate.

For us they suffered in the prison cell;
For us they dared the evil powers of state;
They strove to rescue us from economic hell;
And we, their heirs—their deaths commemorate.

We meet, and on their tombs our garlands place
While listening to the voices of the dead,
Which echo from their final resting-place
And urge us forward in the fight they led.

They tell us of the wrongs endured by men;
Of slavery and its thrice-accursed chains;
Of strong exploiting weak since time began,
Of Labour foully robbed to swell the idler's gains.

How Mother Nature's ever-bounteous yield,
By legal schemers is monopolised;
How chartered Might holds factory and field,
While Labour, all-creating, is ever pauperised.

As storm-birds predicate the coming storm,
So do their voices bid us to prepare
For social tempest, when grim ranks shall form
Of fierce determined men, angered to do and dare:

When states shall crumble, rotten to the core
With parasitic wrongs; while in their place—
Nor gods nor constitutions vexing more—
Shall rise a free, an all-enfranchised race.

Thus do their words their mission yet fulfil,
And we to them eternal fealty vow;
Their smothered words shall volume gain until
The world shall listen, as we do listen now.

FROM THE CHICAGO Alarm, 1888.

Coercion in "Free America."

The American middle-classes received Dillon and O'Brien with great enthusiasm as the representatives of the oppressed Irish people. At the same time, Anarchists who desire to celebrate the murder of our Chicago comrades, are first driven from the hall in Newark, N.J., where they were going to hold their meeting, and then when they hold a meeting of protest outside the hall they are set upon by those uniformed bullies, the American police, and cruelly bludgeoned. In addition to this object lesson as to the blessings of freedom in a "Democratic Republic," their leaders are arrested and Lucy Parsons has been committed for trial. At another meeting held in New York, "100 policemen marched into the hall and took up positions, standing around the hall and alongside the platform," ready for more brutality. American middle-class politicians and their friends in England are very severe on "bloody" Balfour, and shrieks of horror arise when he does in Ireland what the "Republican authorities" are doing in America.

"PINKERTONS."—One of the many "prophecies" which remain to be proved in opposition to Socialism, is that, if the workers revolted, many of them could be bribed to become traitors and armed assassins, or Pinkertons as in America. To such statements as this we answer that the average worker, robbed, degraded, and enslaved as he is, has still a small amount of courage, a brain to think, and a heart to feel, and has not yet descended to the brute level in spite of the ruling classes, who have done their level best to keep him in ignorance so that they may the more effectively fleece him. No Pinkertons can ever stand against the forces of the Revolution, which will be composed of all those workers who are dissatisfied with their position, and are at last resolved to take their own and sweep away all obstructions in the path to Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity.—J. Smythe.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

The "Marxist" Cri du Travailleur ("Toiler's Cry") of Lille publishes the agenda of the Brussels International Congress as agreed upon at Halle by the Social Democrats there gathered. The Congress is to be held in August 1891, and to last a week. The Congress at large is to verify delegates' credentials, and it is to be "open to every workers' organisation and to every Socialist party without distinction." This is all very pretty; but (inasmuch as the first question for discussion is "The state of labour legislation, both national and international, and the means by which it may be extended and rendered effective") it does not seem very likely that anti-parliamentarians will be especially welcome.

At Lyons Anarchists are being arrested right and left, on one pretext or another, and their rooms searched. At Tarare our comrade Brault has been prosecuted for announcing a public meeting without making the "preliminary declaration" required by law. For this "offence" the judicial authorities of the French Republic have sentenced him to three months' imprisonment!

The Brousseist section of the old "Possibilist" party now issues the Proletaire as its official organ, the "Allemaneists" having captured the daily Parti Ouvrier. This latter "Socialist" organ gratifies its readers by publishing racing news and Stock Exchange quotations! I am sorry that space fails me to reproduce an extremely foolish article on English Socialism in the number for November 7th. It seems that we are showing our sense by going in for trades-unionism, John Burns and State interference. Evidently we must go abroad to hear news.

In view of what looks very much like the final collapse of the "Workmen's Party" (falsely so-called), Eugène Chatelain in the Revue Européenne suggests the formation of a true "French revolutionary party," and appeals to all citizens who would wish to finish, once for all, with hampering directors and governors. The formation of such a party will, however, be of little good if, like the others, it is to sink in the political bog. Surely the history of the "Parti Ouvrier," with its three divisions—"Marxist," "Brousseist," and "Allemaneist"—ought to completely cure French workers of parliamentarianism. In the meantime, I welcome our comrade Chatelain as a fellow-worker for the First of May, 1891. Only I prefer the cry of "Bread for all" to that of "Long live the Universal Republic,"—for which most of us, I fancy, care nothing. This "universal republic" might easily become (would probably become) the greatest engine of oppression the world has yet seen.

PORTUGAL.

The Oporto Revolução Social reproduces the recent Révolte article on the English Working-class Movement. Our Chicago comrades seem likely to be worthily commemorated at Oporto.

SPAIN.

The delegate of the Spanish Workers' Party (i.e., the Social Democrats) to the Brussels International Congress is to be instructed to "combat every proposition having for its object the advocacy of the general strike." El Socialista endeavours to justify this resolution by the usual arguments. It seems we must wait for the Revolution and be patient until the workers are educated and organised, and we must not hurry matters by any such leap in the dark as the general strike. This is the kind of "hush-a-bye baby" twaddle that we have heard nearer home. Happily, in Spain genuine revolutionists have much more influence than the parliamentary nostrum-vendors.

CUBA.

El Productor has been twice seized within a few days. The last number which has reached us (October 19th) is full of a great strike of cabmen, omnibus-drivers, and tram-car drivers which had broken out at Havannah. The Government turned on soldiers (protected by police) to act as blacklegs and run the omnibuses and cars. They also, on various pretexts, prohibited public meetings. The people replied to this action by stoning every vehicle they found on the streets. Gradually, too, other trades came out in sympathy, and, by the 17th (the strike having begun on the 11th) something very like a general strike was on foot. Our comrades of El Productor were expecting their paper to be altogether stopped by the authorities; in which case they propose to issue leaflets as opportunity serves.

Still more serious news has, however, since come from Cuba by cable—viz., that the tobacco-manufacturers have actually begun the general lock-out which is intended as their reply to the McKinley Bill. Up to date of writing, the telegraph has brought us no further explanation. If the prize-fighters had been knocking each other about (or pretending to do so), we should doubtless have heard all about it long ago—even if the encounter had taken place in the depths of China.

ARGENTINE CONFEDERATION.

In September of last year two Anarchist groups, entitled respectively "November 11th" and "Land and Liberty," prepared for publication a Communist-Anarchist Manifesto addressed to the workers of the Argentine Republic. The manifesto spoke out clearly for the Social Revolution on Anarchist-Communist lines, but assuredly there was nothing more "violent" in its tone than there is, for example, in the Statement of Principles of the Socialist League (I do not, of course, mean that the principles contended for in the two documents were necessarily the same). Nevertheless, the Buenos Ayres police seized ten thousand copies which had been printed ready for distribution and cast into prison three of our comrades—Emilio Piette, Victoriano San José, and Matei—as presumed authors of the "dangerous" tract. In prison they remained until the 19th of August last, when they were released as an indirect consequence of the so-called "revolutionary" movement of last July. The manifesto is now at length issued with an account of its history. How delightfully free an institution is a "free republic"!

We have received the sixth number of a new Communist-Anarchist journal published at Buenos Ayres, El Perseguido ("The Persecuted One"). It seems well worthy of support. There is certainly no feature of commercialism about it, for payment for it is entirely voluntary. Mayhap it will be none the less successful on that account. There is in the number which has just reached me, a good article on "That which is needed"—i.e., to bring about the Revolution. According to the writer, the thing needed is simply "daring" (audacia). Revolutionists should not be ashamed of being called "criminals," either by the ordinary bourgeois or by the State Socialist. From the bourgeois point of view they are criminals, and they should accept the title with pride.

HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON

The COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

SCRIPTIONS, including postage:—For British Islands, Europe, United States, and Canada, a year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d. For Australia, New Zealand, Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Transvaal, and the Argentine Republic, a year, 8s.; six months, 4s.; three months, 2s. For India, Ceylon, China, Hong Kong, and the Straits Settlements, a year, 10s.; six months, 5s.; three months, 2s. 6d.

Subscribers who receive a RED WRAPPER are thereby reminded that their subscriptions have expired and must be renewed immediately if they wish to continue to receive COMMONWEAL.

All P. O. orders should be made payable to Post-office, 42 Drury Lane, W.C.

Remittances from abroad must be made by International Money Order.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

WILL Branch Secretaries please write Reports and Orders for Literature on separate pieces of paper.

TO CONTRIBUTORS—Workmen could help us greatly by sending in accounts of capitalist tyranny and sweating in London and the provinces. We want the names of the sweaters. Those who write must send us their name and address, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee of good faith. We shall not fear to publish the truth.—Eds.

SOCIALISM OF THE MARKET-PLACE.

HEARD FROM THE STOOL.

II.

A WINDY inclement night; a few ardent Socialists standing in the road, and waiting to gather an audience; but the tired workers hurry past on their way from toil. Now and again one or two stop to gaze at the flag, the meaning of which they do not quite gather, for one says impatiently to the other, "Oh, come on, its only the Salvation Army lot!" The keen wind does not conduce to the holding of a meeting, and if one is to be held some one must perform the heroic task of addressing the stones in front of him, and calling one or two irreverent youngsters who are standing around staring curiously, "His dear comrades!"

How my heart has yearned in sympathy at times for the first speaker under such circumstance! By cheek-splitting efforts at last a small crowd is gathered, and there, of course, is our old friend the inebriate, "Who (hic) knows we get blooming well paid for spouting; ort to be all locked up, we ort!" And then there is the sour querist, whose outward appearance would disgrace a respectable scarecrow; he is thoroughly assured "that it is such as us lot who are driving the trade away from this glorious Empire; and we as runs down the rich, what should we do without them, eh, he would like to know?" And having fired his shot, without waiting for a reply, he contentedly shambles off.

But he has afforded a cue to the speaker, who now stands upon the stool. "Oh! what should we do without the rich?" says the slave, who, contented in his wretchedness, is yet so solicitous about the probable fate of the wealthy when our ideas obtain headway. I have seen a journal, devoted to the interests of what is termed Tory Democracy, represent the probable departure of the capitalists from these shores in consequence of the demands of Labour. "Oh! consummation devoutly to be wished!" and oh! still more devoutly to be wished, that the vessels in which they depart were their own, over-insured, unseaworthy tubs, which are intended to be the death-traps of our hard-working seamen—for then, whilst there might be more fish in the sea there would be less capitalists.

We are told even now when Labour—so far as the New Unions are concerned—only demands a larger pittance, that Capital will fly the country. Capital, we are assured by the hiring scribes of the press, is sensitive; Capital fluctuates, is governed by the law of supply and demand. By Capital they mean their money-bags, their scrips, bonds, shares, debentures, leases, and all other kinds of legal machinery whereby they contrive to live in idleness upon the sweat and tears of the workers. You have become so debased in ideas by this kind of thing, that you accept it as truth that money and scrip are Capital.

"What!" says our friend at the back of the crowd, "How will yer do without money?" Well, that seems a plausible and pertinent question, but allow me to answer it by putting another, "What will you do with it if Labour refuses to be the bond-slave?" What would a Goschen, a Bleichroder, or a Rothschild do if shut up alone with their scrip and cash for a week and deprived of food? I'll tell you what would happen,—they would be discovered dead as door-nails and not a sovereign digested, and yet these thieves hold the fate of nations in their hands because of the power of gold!

Ah! my fine soldier, you sneer at the Socialist, and yet you are also the poor blind tool of the cosmopolitan gang of money-mongers. You shed your blood to recover their Shylock bonds. Holocausts of human beings are slain by war, overwork, or starvation, and all because you allow the metal coin, the means of exchange, to be made in the hands of blood-stained criminals the master of Labour instead of its servant.

What do you call shareholders? I call them thieves. You are shocked; and if you saw a deliberate robbery of the vulgar sort performed before your eyes you would probably help the police to capture the thief. Does it ever strike you that the horde of shareholders in mines, railways, trams, etc., etc., who are content to take dividends wrung from the overwork, the daily risk to life and limb, of the labourers,—that these sort are thieves? They take that which they have never toiled for. The thief who may purloin a loaf or a pocket-handkerchief is sent to jail; those who rob labour sit in judgment upon him. The J. P. who sentences a poacher has stolen a country-side; the poacher has taken a hare; the poacher goes to jail, the J. P. to the county ball.

The man who smiles in your face and solicits your attendance at the next gospel-grind or muffin-struggle whilst he weighs or measures up your purchases for you is selling you something which is not what it is represented to be. It may be some fabric which he assures you is all wool, when it is half cotton; or if for cotton, half glucose and clay; or adulterated food, which half poisons the consumer. And oh! how nimble he can be should an unsophisticated prig, too stupid or poor to be able to keep a shop and mix religion and trade, come along and annex some of his wares. "Where's the police!"

You see that your ideas of thieving are wrong. Honesty is a purely relative term. It depends upon the method of your theft whether you shall have the power to punish others or go to jail yourself. Accept the Bright philosophy that adulteration is justifiable, live upon labour not your own, and you shall be respectable and an ornament to society as constituted to-day.

Now, I have said here over and over again that the teachings of revolutionary Socialism have nothing to do with political warfare, and my remarks here to-night will show you that if we tear up the prejudices which have hitherto caused you to join in the chorus of condemnation of the unfortunate inmates of our jails (those are termed generally the criminal classes), and rouse you to perceive with us the fact that as society stands now, with the means of labour and exchange in the hands of monopolists,—if we have succeeded in enlarging your mental vision and reaching your hearts upon the subject, then we really shall have been (as is alleged by our friend who has been interrupting me at the back of you) paid for our work, and well paid too. For the hour that the people see that the vast mass must either work, starve, or thieve, that all cannot under present conditions obtain work, they will deny the right of the legal robbers and monopolists to punish. Soon they will turn and view the misery, bloodshed, and degradation of the system with increasing detestation; and in pulling down in your minds the moral supports which you have hitherto conceded to existing institutions, we have performed one portion at least of our duty as revolutionary teachers. I thank you: good-night.

NOTES.

WE feel it our duty at the present time to denounce General Booth as an old fraud, and his precious "Social Salvation Scheme" as a miserable imposition. That General Booth is a fraud is almost self-evident; a glance at the countenance of that "venerablest of dodgers" reminds you so forcibly of the late lamented Mr. Fagin, "the merry old gentleman" who "took in" Oliver Twist out of "charity," that an instruction to give General Booth as wide a berth as possible ought to be superfluous to any one of average intelligence.

With General Booth's "Scheme"—an excellent word "Scheme," so suggestive of the author—it is different. The working people have seen it highly praised in the capitalist press, and they hear at the same time that it has received the benediction of canons, bishops, cardinals, philanthropists, princes, and those two other great potentates—the Emperor of Germany and the Czar of all the Russians! Probably they imagine that the scheme is really for their benefit. It is, therefore, necessary to point out that this is an error.

The adhesion of the Czar of Russia is almost enough to damn the whole affair. When we heard that that monster had praised the scheme, we almost expected to hear that General Booth had received a congratulatory telegram from the devil himself. As the father of lies, his Satanic Majesty would naturally highly approve of such a gigantic swindle. Cannot the General obtain a little approbation from hell? It would be a splendid advertisement; better than any puff he could obtain in the Star or the Daily Chronicle.

But the General shall be judged out of his own mouth, or his own book, it is all the same thing. How does he propose to feed and clothe the unfortunates who fall into his hands? The good man says that he does not propose that every individual should be content to live a human life. Even the "jail idea of comfort" he regards as beyond the range of practical politics. He says it would be hopeless to demand that every willing worker should be as "well lodged, warmly clad, and regularly fed as the criminals in our convict prisons." This, we suppose, means that any one applying for relief to General Booth must expect worse treatment than he would get in jail. Therefore, the kind-hearted magistrates who give starving lads six weeks' hard for stealing turnips are better practical philanthropists than General Booth. Those boys can be sure that they will be as "well lodged, warmly clad, and as well fed as the criminals in our convict prisons."

But what of the food which General Booth's free labourers are to eat? Why he is going to form a Salvage Brigade to collect the broken victuals of middle-class families, and these "broken victuals and endless stores of old crusts will be capable of being served up when steamed and dressed, as human food."

O let us be joyful! Has General Booth ever read the parable of Dives and Lazarus? In that ancient story, in which General Booth professes some belief, the rich man got warmed up considerably in another world for giving a beggar the crumbs from his table. Another philanthropist, who discovered and advocated a still cheaper mode of feeding the people—namely, a nice diet of grass—was strung up on a Parisian lamp-post in the last century by a hungry and savage mob. Don't forget Dives and Foulon, General Booth.

But now comes the crowning point. Fagin Booth announces that when his scheme is in full working order, any outcast who may object to slaving in his beggar-colonies, on a diet of steamed crusts and broken victuals—worse fed, clothed, and lodged than the criminals in our jails—shall be sent to prison; he would make "begging a penal offence." Let him. The proletarian who accepts Booth's "hospitality" in preference to going to jail is a fool, the only greater fools being the middle-class people who subscribe the money Booth asks for in the hope of staving off the Social Revolution.

What do the Christian philanthropists think of the gang of devilish fiends, Stanley's companions and comrades? I wonder what is the opinion of the natives of Africa concerning those nice young men Barttelot and Jameson. If in future these poor savages desire to make an effigy of the devil, they will surely paint it white.

The whole story is so monstrous and horrible that even the demon of Whitechapel must hide his diminished head before these highly educated British officers, the product not of frightful slums but of public schools and colleges; and they have evidently derived their taste for stuffed negro heads, cannibalism, and flogging and kicking boys and men to death, from their education at these centres of refinement and culture. Cleveland Street and the African horrors spring from the one cause—the corruption which always springs from great riches and idleness. The sons of the rich English middle classes are threatening to outrival in lust and cruelty Nero, Caligula, and the nobles of old feudal France.

Meanwhile Lieutenant Troup and Barttelot inform Stanley that he is no better. So we are likely to have some interesting information concerning the great explorer. It fills me with joy to see these tigers tearing one another to pieces. N.

SOME REMINISCENCES OF THE DARK DAYS FOLLOWING MAY 4.

THE following appeared in the Chicago Alarm of November 10, 1888. We reprint it, as it contains some facts not generally known among English workmen:

THE history of the great strike of May, 1886, for eight hours is well known. Equally so are the details regarding the famous Haymarket meeting for the proceedings of the celebrated trial has been read by thousands. Affidavits have been given showing that special pains were taken to pack the jury; a leading paper proposed to raise a fund of a hundred thousand dollars as a present for their verdict of conviction; it is a matter of record that the informers were suborned, or at least generously paid for their alleged "truthfulness." Even the press, so eager for the deaths of our comrades, have since admitted that they died for their convictions. Still, well known as are these facts, it is well now on this anniversary occasion to recall a few of them to refresh the memory.

Briefly stated, the great strike for eight hours had on the third of May become general. Over 50,000 toilers had quit work and were soberly, if sullenly, demanding the concession from their imperious masters. In the meanwhile most of the since condemned men were actively engaged on the stump cheering the strikers, pointing out to them the deeper issues involved, and nerving them to resolute and patient endurance. So pronounced was the animosity against Parsons and Spies that on May 1, when the strike began, the Chicago Mail, a leading daily, in a leader marked these two men as special objects of attack for capitalistic hatred. It was a warning, but it fell on ears too devoted to their cause to pause in the advocacy of unpopular truth.

The selfish industrial barons grew alarmed at the revolt of their slaves. Human rights and human lives are secondary in importance to property. This must be defended, even though lives are ruthlessly destroyed.

The Haymarket meeting, it is proven by the testimony of the mayor himself, was pre-eminently a peaceable meeting. After so notifying Inspector Bonfield, he went home. Scarcely had he disappeared than a hurried order was given to the police to form, and they were rushed upon the meeting with hurried strides and swinging batons, ready to club every head they could reach.

Although "legal," inasmuch as it was authorised by the legal representative of property's protective army—though even this might be well disputed—it was in reality a burglarious entrance into a peaceful meeting. As much, to all intents and purposes, a burglary as would be a surreptitious entrance into a private house with felonious intent. As is shown upon the trial by a witness of unquestioned veracity, Bonfield had the same day expressed his desire to get several hundred of the Socialists together, and he would then make short work of them. Against the burglar who seeks to rob you of property, common law recognises the right of self-defence, and you may shoot him down on the spot. But when a band of uniformed ruffians attack a public meeting, with design to rob men of the right of free speech—a right recognised as dearer than property rights—a just resistance is met with a storm of rage.

But the bomb! There are many incidents connected with that fatal tragedy which will probably never be written, but one important fact connected therewith may as well be told. Only two of the prisoners, as was shown—Fischer and Engel—had anything to do with the calling of the meeting. They had resolved to defend themselves if attacked. So bitter had grown the feeling that the possibility of a raid and wholesale clubbing was admitted. In the first draft of the call appeared a summons to come armed. When Spies saw this, he sent for Fischer and peremptorily demanded that this be stricken out. This was done. Further, Spies insisted that word should be at once sent out to all their friends that no arms must be brought under any circumstances whatever. To execute this commission a gentleman connected with the office devoted the entire day riding around the city giving the above instructions. So thoroughly did he execute Spies' orders, that when the police raided them they stood like sheep before a pack of wolves.

One man, unknown, was present with a bomb; and probably righteously indignant at this invasion of their constitutional right, hurled it at the police. There is no evidence that the spectators had weapons. The police in their wild fright shot each other. The only conspiracy was that carried out by Bonfield. Neither Fischer, Engel, Lingg, nor Parsons were present at the meeting when the event occurred. How far the course pursued by Spies was wise there will be a difference of opinion: I simply narrate the fact.

Mr. Parsons left the city that night and went to Geneva, Ill., where he stayed two days with a friend. He then went to Elgin, and after a short time went on to Waukesha, Wis. He had a subscriber there, but whom he had never met. He was a small manufacturer. Mr. Parsons walked into his shop and entered into conversation with him. They talked on various matters, but soon the all-pervading topic of the Chicago riot was brought up. The gentleman expressed himself so decidedly that Mr. Parsons revealed his identity and was at once welcomed to the house, where he remained and worked under an assumed name. His return to stand trial was an act of his own volition. Reports that either his wife or Captain Black were instrumental in inducing him to take this step are without the slightest foundation. His own proud sense of honour made him reluctant to leave his comrades alone to face trial.

He wrote to Captain Black his intention, and returned to the city, went directly to the house of Mrs. A., on S. Morgan Street, where he remained for two days consulting with his wife and counsel. The step was a characteristic one; and if he believed that a conviction of guilty of a charge of murder could not follow, he but shared the feeling of all of us at that time. He was in the best of spirits, and evidently enjoyed the situation. On the morning of the trial, Captain Black drove up to the house with a carriage for him, and together they drove to the Court-house, where, without any theatrical display, they quietly passed through the crowd of officials and detectives arm in arm to the bar of the Court.

As they passed up the steps to the Court-house a man said to a detective, "I'll bet five hundred dollars that is Albert R. Parsons." "Nonsense," replied the detective; "arn't we looking for him? I guess we ought to know." His astonishment a few minutes later was extreme. Many thoughtless persons have called Parsons "a fool" for that act; but in the last week of his life he solemnly assured me that he had no regret for his action and honestly believed that he did right and wisely.

SPECIAL APPEAL TO OUR READERS.

DURING the winter a large number of outdoor meetings will have to be discontinued, and a large circle of readers will be deprived of their Commonweal, unless they help us by making their newsagents obtain it. The hostility and indifference of newsagents, with few exceptions, from monopolist W. H. Smith downwards, are really the chief obstacles to the circulation of the Commonweal and the spread of our ideas. Owing to this boycotting there are a large number of towns where the Commonweal is never seen.

Amongst our subscribers and friends there are many who are anxious to forward the Cause of Socialism, and yet they do not know exactly how to render help. Here is a field for quiet and useful work, where no heroic sacrifices are demanded—

1. Insist that your newsagent obtain you your 'Weal. Don't trade with him for other things if you find him throwing obstacles in the way.

2. Pester W. H. Smith's agents at all railway stalls by enquiries for the 'Weal.

3. Introduce it to the notice of wholesale agents, and send us the names and addresses of all who are willing to sell the journal and display bills. Above all, push it amongst your friends.

4. Distribution in tram-cars and railway carriages can be unostentatiously effected by leaving copies upon seats and in luggage racks.

5. We must also ask our comrades to do their utmost to subscribe to the Guarantee Fund. Revolutionary Socialists are not rich, we have no capitalist advertisements to bring in cash, and it is a hard fight to keep an advanced paper alive in the cold and dreary winter months. All those who approve of the principles of the Commonweal should send subscriptions, however small, to this fund. If every workman who reads the paper only subscribed a few pence weekly, the Commonweal would be secured from all possibility of failure.

In short, those willing to aid us can find plenty of opportunities where there is a will to do so.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

Does the Dock Company mean Mischief?

I hear that the co-operative scheme has gone very well in the small experiment that has been tried during the past week in the Albert Docks, for it has resulted in securing 7½d. an hour to the men. The plan adopted is for a gang of men to bargain with agents of the Dock Company as to what rate they will carry out a certain piece of work, without the intervention of any middleman. The men are to receive a subsistence wage of 4d. an hour and take the surplus when the work is completed. There is only one objection to the scheme: if blacklegs were not employed it might work all right, but it is possible that if there are a large number of the blacklegs to be had, the company might make agreements with gangs of these to take the work at a stated price which would be considerably less than even sixpence an hour. And we must bear in mind that as long as blacklegs are allowed to work in the docks they may be easily used for this purpose, and with these ready allies at hand the company will not be long inclined to pay 7½d. an hour. The main question, after all, is whether the company, like the shipowners, are inclined for union-smashing or not. And there are some other reports from the docks which make us think that these gentlemen mean to play the same game as the shipowners. At Tilbury Dock the superintendent has refused to discuss the co-operative scheme with the men's representatives, and at the India Docks the superintendent has been taking on blacklegs in the place of old hands and has been employing as overmen the sweating subcontractors who were swept away by the agreement concluded at the end of the great strike. This looks as if the company is thinking more of restoring the sweating system than of paying the men a fair wage for their work.

Although matters have settled down at Cardiff and Liverpool, still the study of the articles in the Times concerning the present position at the various ports is not reassuring. These articles are obviously inspired by the Shipowners' Federation, and they show that these gentlemen mean "smashing the unions" at the first opportunity. An anonymous correspondent to the Times of Monday last, who talks as if he had some connection with the London Dock Co., suggests that shipowners shall supply the company with funds to fight the Dockers' Union. And at the same time we fear from reports received that despite a gallant fight, the Australian unions have been beaten. All these facts taken together go to prove that war is inevitable sooner or later, and I fancy that it is lack of funds and not want of will that has prevented the Dock Company from making even a more determined onslaught upon the union within the last few days. For the present the company prefer undermining the union by the gradual enlistment of blacklegs and permanent men; but there can be no question that directly they feel strong enough they will throw off the mask and declare open war.

London Compositors.

There was a crowded attendance of delegates at the usual quarterly delegate meeting of the London Society of Compositors on Wednesday, November 5th, at the Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street. This was no doubt due to the fact that it was rumoured that something definite would be stated regarding the advance in wages which the comps. are going in for. The only information that was obtained was that during the current year the members and masters would have the revised scale in their hands, and that a memorial would be presented to the masters. The time has arrived when some very drastic alterations should be made in connection with the Book Scale. Compositors have frequently been known to work fifty-four hours on book-work and take the magnificent sum of 28s. In no trade is there so much overtime worked as by comps., and some of it, it is almost impossible to abolish, owing to customers bringing in their work at the last minute and wanting a proof the next morning. One of the features of the meeting was the presence of Mr. Fitzgerald, the Australian strike delegate, who in a very pointed speech explained the position of affairs in Australia when he left for England. He further said that he placed no reliance upon telegrams received through Reuters or any other capitalistic agency, and he hoped that the delegates would not let such information influence them when the vote for a donation to the Australian Strike Fund came on. Answering a question as to the letter of recommendation which John Burns gave to H. H. Champion (wonder is how Burns could recommend such a traitor to the cause of labour) he said that Champion had done the mischief before the letter arrived. If that is so, it shows that the Australians must have been very careless in taking into their confidence any one who said that he sympathised with them. The compositors are going to entertain Mr. Fitzgerald, who is a fellow craftsman, to a complimentary dinner on Wednesday evening, November 19th.

The good old English Sweater.

The polishers at Brinsmeads and Collards pianoforte factories have been agitating for a rise. So Brinsmead's patriotic British manager went to see the manager of a German firm to know what is the price in Germany. Strange to say, the "blarsted furrin" polishers at Bechsteins are getting from £2 to £2 5s., while Collards only pay 30s. This seems to contradict the prevalent theory that Germans always work cheaper than Englishmen. The good old English sweater is not always beaten for low wages and long hours.

SOCIALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

SHEFFIELD.

THE Cause is still progressing, and our sale of literature keeps up well; though the season for outdoor propaganda is drawing to a close, yet we shall continue to hold our outdoor meetings whenever we can. The average sale of literature is about 25s. per week. The Commonweal and "Chicago Speeches" are going very well; we are now selling the third hundred of these speeches. Since our last report in August we have held over 116 meetings, besides supplying speakers to Manchester, Leeds, Derby, Nottingham, Hull, Leicester, Clay Cross, Chesterfield, Glasgow, and London. We have had the following comrades with us during the last few months—Samuels (Leeds), Chapman (Liverpool), Bailey (Manchester), and R. Unwin and Furnis (Chesterfield). Some rowdy opposition has lately been organised by some of the Conservative clubs with a view to breaking up our meetings, which has, however, miserably failed. The only result was that it gave us splendid audiences at our meetings on several successive Sundays, though it secured an unlimited supply of free booze and several cheap feeds to the roughs employed by them. We have now made arrangements for meetings on Sunday evenings in the Hallamshire Hall, so as not to have our meetings stopped by wintry weather. We are also making further arrangements for a thorough lecturing campaign throughout the surrounding villages on week-nights, intending to give courses of lectures dealing with the various phases of the revolutionary movement. This is being taken in hand upon the suggestion of several workers residing in these villages, and who are anxious to acquire more knowledge of our aims and objects. This is one encouraging result of our summer country propaganda. Our comrade Dr. Creaghe is now staying with us, and intends helping us to get the Rev. over speedily. The comrades here, without exception, have been highly pleased and encouraged at the thorough character of most of the articles that have recently appeared in the Commonweal, and will send in 15s. weekly to the Guarantee Fund.

E. ROBINSON.

CARDINAL MANNING AND THE JEWS.

SURELY the Millenium has come at last, with its lion lying down with the lamb! The affecting spectacle of Cardinal Manning being presented with an address by the arch enemies of his creed and Lord would lead one to think so. This remarkable incident has no parallel in history. On the contrary, the Catholics of the Middle Ages would have thought it an indelible disgrace to allow a Jew to eat at the same table. They were also the self-appointed dentists to the rich Jews, whose teeth they kindly extracted daily, until a certain little arrangement was come to.

What is the cause of this great change? A common danger, a common enemy to resist. When the floods rise animals of all kinds, the fierce and the weak, crouch together in terror. Religionists of all grades, seeing the waters rising that shall overwhelm them, rush into each other's arms. This, we are told, is the age of religious toleration; in other words, the age of shams and hypocrisy, otherwise it would be impossible to reconcile two creeds so antagonistic. Does not this go to prove that intrinsically there is only one religion, i.e., that of money-getting, and that Commercialism has Judaized the so-called Christian of to-day? We are convinced, at any rate, that if Christ walked the earth to-day the Christians would be the first to cry, "Hang him!" or "Kill him by electricity!" The execution of our Chicago comrades for preaching the Gospel of Universal Brotherhood is only a small item of proof.

There must be a common interest to unite two once bitter enemies. It is, in the first place, to preserve their own position, which is threatened by the advancing torrent of men who have freed their minds from cant, and who are determined to have their own. The bulwark that has been, and is to be used to stem this torrent, is religious education in schools. We know that the essence of school education is to inculcate respect for the law and the worship of authority (for business purposes). Religious education by turning this worship into a dogma, with penalties attached, has been the chief obstacle to the realisation of Liberty and Equality. The writer remembers, with disgust, that he was taught in a Catholic school never to rebel against any laws, or any one in authority, however palpably unjust they might be, because there was such merit in obeying bad laws and bad governors. When we consider that this sort of teaching is forced upon millions of people, we must hold it responsible that so many injustices stalk the earth to-day. He has so far recovered as to throw that lie to the winds and to profess himself an Anarchist, a rebel against all law and authority; and as a revolutionist is certain that before the Social Revolution the hoary superstitions of the Dark Ages will vanish as the mists of night dissolve before the rising sun.

REPORTS.

ABERDEEN.—On Sunday afternoon, November 2nd, comrades Duncan and Rennie spoke to a good audience at the quayside. In the evening the Oddfellows' large hall was again well filled to hear comrade Leatham lecture on the question "Was Jesus Christ a Socialist?" Discussion was carried on by comrades Duncan, Rennie, McLean, Webster, and Mr. McKenzie, to which comrade Leatham replied. No open air meetings have been held during the week, owing to the heavy rains.—G. A. C.

MANCHESTER.—Owing to the inclement weather of late, our out-door work has had to be given up in a great measure, though good meetings have been held regularly in Stevenson Square every Sunday. Last Sunday our indoor course of lectures was commenced, and comrade Scott addressed a good audience on "Poverty: its Cause and Cure," followed by some discussion which was fully answered. We have lately started nights for discussion, and last Friday an interesting discussion took place on "Revolutionary Warfare," which passed off very successfully, and resulted in showing that all our members were agreed in supporting the revolutionary policy of the Commonweal. Though we have still hard work before us, we look hopefully forward to the Revolution which shall bring to all leisure, freedom, and happiness.

YARMOUTH.—Most successful meetings have been held during the past month; a lot of revolutionary literature has been distributed amongst the soldiers and police; large bundles of Commonweal and other literature have also been sent to sea to enlighten the fishermen to their true position. Altogether, things are moving in the right direction. On October 19th two successful meetings were held in the club room; fair audience, good discussion; revolutionary songs sung; two new members. 24th, comrade John Oldman, Apostle of Anarchy, from Manchester, delivered a stirring address in the morning on Priory Plain on "The Voting Swindle." Mr. Smith, a Radical, occupied the platform for several minutes, advising the audience to vote for Mr. Ecookes, "the working-man's friend"—a man who has put up for the North Ward. Oldman thoroughly convinced the audience that the voting dodge was a swindle. In the afternoon, on the Fish Wharf, another successful meeting was held. Comrade Oldman lectured on "The Wage Swindle," after which opposition was invited. Five Scotch fishermen responded to the call. Oldman, Saunders, Brightwell, Barnes, and Headley formed five groups, taking one opponent each. The meeting was continued for upwards of three hours. In the evening, good discussion in club-room, weather too wet for out-door speaking; room crowded to excess until a late hour. November 2nd, good muster in the club-room in the morning—too wet for out-doors. On the Fish Wharf, in the afternoon, good meeting addressed by Oldman and local comrades; interesting discussion. In the evening, on Hall Quay, comrade Oldman lectured on "The Morality of Force." Large audience; host of questions, answered by Oldman, H. Ceiley, Saunders, Brightwell, and Headley. The meeting was again continued for over three hours. Since last report 4s. 10d. has been collected; one quire of Freedom and 320 Commonweal sold, besides good sale of literature and songs.—J. H.

SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION—EDINBURGH.—On Sunday, in Labour Hall, Bell delivered an address on Anarchism, in the course of which he made special reference to the circumstances which led up to the execution and imprisonment of our comrades in Chicago. The address was listened to with marked attention throughout, and at the close many questions were put and ably replied to; discussion followed. At Leith Elder spoke in our Hall in Henderson Street.

FUNERAL OF HEINRICH REUTER.

On Sunday last we buried our comrade Heinrich Reuter, aged 41. The procession started from the Club Autonomie, and consisted of members of the Socialist League, Freedom Group, and the German, French, Italian, and Scandinavian Sections; altogether about 800 comrades followed the remains. The speakers at the grave were F. Kitz (Socialist League), Neilson (Freedom Group), comrades Stansleit and Trunck (Club Autonomie), and Louise Michel (French Section). Our comrade Reuter, whose career is thus early closed, was a hardworking member of the Revolutionary Party. He was for some time German correspondent for the Commonweal. His death, due primarily to consumption, was accelerated by the brutality he endured at the hands of the police in their raid upon the Stephen Mews Club. F. K.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

CIVILISATION ON THE WAR-PATH.

"LIGHT FIELD PIECES, INCLUDING MAXIM-GARDNER GUNS"!

THE Chartered Company is a syndicate of British and South African capitalists who obtained a charter from the British Government some years ago to explore and "open up" the territory north of the present South African States. Its constitution is akin to that of the nefarious old East Indian Company. It has power to employ an armed force, to appropriate land, and to grant concessions to traders. The notorious millionaire, Cecil Rhodes, who is presently Prime Minister of Cape Colony, is the chief boss of the enterprise. The Duke of Fife and other royal and noble personages are stated to have large money investments in it, and there can be no doubt that its proceedings will be approved, and its claims and privileges supported by the British Government.

At present a "pioneer force" of over a thousand men, commanded by General Pennefather, is marching up the country. "It is not," we are told by the Natal Mercury, "an avowedly warlike movement. On the contrary, it is proclaimed to be a mission of peace and civilisation; yet it advances into the interior with all the precautions and methods that would be employed by an army of invasion. The whole force is under arms. Its march is carefully sheltered by scouts and reconnoitring parties as though it were passing through an enemys country. . . . It is equipped with a few light field pieces, including Maxim and Gardner guns, electric search lights, and other appliances of modern warfare. No available resource of civilisation has been wanting in its equipment, nor has money been spared in providing for an ample commissariat and transport service."

"Light field pieces including Maxim and Gardner guns"! "Search-lights and other appliances of modern warfare"! These are pretty playthings for a mission of civilisation and peace! One wonders what they would have taken with them had their mission, instead of being "avowedly" one of civilisation and peace, been avowedly one of barbarism and war! It is not easy conceiving how the most avowed gang of cut-throats and brigands could set out on a raid of rapine and plunder more fully equipped for their exploits than this expedition of the hirelings of the Cecil Rhodes and the Chartered Company.

What would our Christian newspapers say, and what would our Christian Government do, were it reported that a "pioneer force" of Russians, "equipped with light field pieces including Maxim and Gardner guns," was descending upon Afghanistan or India? What would the South African colonists say and do if a "pioneer force" of Hottentots, similarly equipped and professing a similar philanthropic mission, marched down upon their territory?

"But," says the Natal Mercury, "by far the most important statement is that which refers to the enlistment of Transvaal farmers 'to work up the country under the Company.'" It indeed ought to be an important statement to the dupes of imperial politics in this country. Were they not told some half dozen years ago that the Boer farmers were a gang of indescribably brutal and greedy taskmasters? That the black population were harder wrought and more cruelly whipped under Boer masters than under Arab and Algerian slave-drivers? That the rule of the Boers was inimical to every interest of civilisation and humanity, and that they should be routed off African soil? And yet these are the men whom the Chartered Company intend placing upon their appropriated territory of the Matabeles with the view of "opening it up" and conferring upon the natives the inestimable blessings of "civilisation and peace"!

The whole business is quite sickening in its hypocrisy and cynicism; and we can only hope that the villainy of the enterprise may be frustrated by the natives—even if they have to do so at the expense of their own lives.

True, these natives are themselves cruel and in some instances even cannibal; but their cruelty and cannibalism are only less refined and less disguised than those of their civilised invaders. Moreover, cruelty and cannibalism are in them the unconscious disposition of their savage and animal nature, and may be regarded as we regard the ferocious habits of most animals—habits which do not contaminate us or do violence to our social responsibilities. But the heedless butchery and torture, the oppression and plunder perpetrated by Britons upon them, are done consciously and in defiance of what the perpetrators know to be humane and just, and the perpetration of them is a crime that reacts upon and inflicts outrage upon us as well as upon the victims.

The civilisation which is presently being forced upon the Africans at the point of the revolver, rifle, and Maxim gun, is more hideous, more immoral, and essentially more cruel than the barbarism which it is displacing; and it is sad to see it making such inroads. Were the lakes and rivers of Africa studded with replicas of our Liverpools and Londons, replete with public-houses, jails, poor-houses, lunatic asylums, churches, hospitals, divorce-courts, sweaters' dens, factories, and slums—were Africa, in fact, made like England to-day—there would be more tears shed, more blood spilt, more hearts broken, and more lives wrecked than under the worst form of existing barbarism.

Would that the natives could raise a wall of devastation round their land, so that no white men might enter, till white men had learnt what true civilisation is, and practising it themselves, could then teach it to others!

J. BRUCE GLASIER.

THE GLORIOUS REFORMATION:

OR,

HOW THE ENGLISH PEOPLE WERE EVICTED, ROBBED,
 AND MURDERED BY THE RULING CLASSES.

I.—THE PEASANT REVOLT.

MANY workmen have an idea that there was a period in which the English people were far better off than they are now. This notion is always vigorously attacked by middle-class teachers in pulpit, school, and lecture-room, and yet after all it is the workman who is instinctively right, and the middle-class people who are wrong. These worthy persons, who for interested motives are always assuring the workman that the people were never so well off as they are at present, and who inform him that the "Merrie England" of the past is a dream of poets and romancers, will perhaps be surprised to learn that not only the writers of works of the imagination, but grave, practical men, professors of political economy and historians of the highest character and "respectability," give an overwhelming mass of testimony against them. In these articles I mean to explain by what means the working classes rose to a state of high prosperity, and also who were the robbers who plundered them of all that makes life worth living—wealth, happiness, and leisure. We shall not rely for our information upon poets or novelists, although men of imagination often by a kind of intuition arrive at truths to which the "practical" man is completely blind; we will fight the practical man with his own weapons, and he shall have facts and figures to his heart's content—facts and figures which it will be impossible for even him to disprove or deny.

But now to our story. But before we describe the famous fifteenth century, the golden age of English labour, let us first glance further back and see how this golden age came about. From the Norman Conquest, when England was conquered by William the Conqueror and his robber horde, the history of England is the story of one long struggle between the king and the barons on one side, and the barons and their Saxon serfs on the other. Every baron was practically a little king—with the power of life and death over his serfs—on his own domain, which he held on condition of providing a certain number of men to serve the king in time of war. These men were quite as often used against the king as for him, and practically the central government had very little power beyond the actual crown lands. On his own estates the Norman baron did just what he pleased, and cared a fig for the king or the king's justice. On the other hand, the serfs were continually revolting against the tyranny of the barons. This revolt took several forms—actual insurrection, ending probably with flight into the greenwood and the wild free forest life so joyously sung of in the ballads of Robin Hood and Little John; but more often, as with all servile races, took the form of flight from the baron's paternal protection to the refuge of some town and city, where they sought refuge among the handicraftsmen, who were protected by the king's power and also by their own strength and courage from the tyranny of the nobles. But one thing at least must be understood: this tyranny rarely took the form of depriving the serfs of the necessities of life, unless his lord for some offence or imaginary offence confined him in a dungeon, beneath the castle moat, and starved him to death. But this kind of punishment was rare. It is true, however, that early Norman barons looked upon their serfs as cattle—"Saxon swine" was a favourite term of reproach applied to them; it is true that they had the power of life and death over them; that they exercised also their seignorial rights by seizing the fairest women as their property; but the Saxon serf was a sturdy fellow, a good bowman, who could send a cloth-yard shaft even through a coat of mail; and perhaps it was this fact that induced the barons, after the first four Norman kings, to treat their serfs with more kindness and humanity. Frequently we find, as in the reigns of John, Henry III., and Edward II., barons, serfs, and citizens united in revolt against attempts of tyranny on the part of the crown.

But though no doubt in those days there were plenty of wiseacres who, when they saw the huge feudal fortresses, that a system of which these strong stone buildings were the outward signs and emblems was eternal as the heavens, yet in reality already feudalism was doomed. In the reign of Edward III., a king placed on the throne by the revolt of the barons against his father, when feudalism seemed to have reached a height of glory and prosperity, in the midst of his French victories in a war undertaken in assertion of feudal rights to the throne of France—feudalism was already doomed to destruction. A new spirit was abroad; men were ceasing to believe in the divine right of king and pope, priest and baron to rule, rob, torture, and murder as they pleased. Years before, a dreamy scholar, groping blindly in the dark after the elixir of life and philosopher's stone, had discovered the blind force—gunpowder—that was destined to shatter feudalism into fragments. Already at Oxford John Wickliffe in his quiet cell was questioning all the most "sacred theories" on which the feudalism rested. A few more years his poor priests would wander through the country preaching these ideas to the common people, denouncing the luxury and corruption of baron, monk, and priest; nay, some of them, like that mad priest of Kent, John Ball, would go further, and finding in book Wickliffe had translated, the doctrine of rough and ready communism, would tell the people how they might sweep away all their oppressors and live a free and happy life in the land of their birth.

The crimes of the feudal aristocracy, particularly the bloody and useless wars which were characteristic of feudalism just as much as commercial war is of the present system, was hastening its end; the barons already began to show signs of decadence; continual warfare swept them away; but more fatal still was their own exclusiveness—their habit of marrying only in their own class. Forgetting that their ancestors were but brave and spirited warriors who had sprang from the people, becoming leaders only through their skill in warfare and their courage, they did not seek to strengthen their race with strong healthy peasant blood; they married with fine luxurious ladies of their own class; and so we find noble family after noble family dying out, till according to Green, from the reign of Edward III. till the time of the Tudors the number of temporal peers in the House of Lords had sunk to the lowest ebb: from this time to the time of the Tudors they number but fifty. The war with France ended in total defeat of the English king and nobles. Defeated in war, they returned to England and sunk into habits of idle luxury, in which the old king set the example. In place of real warfare, mimic war was waged in the lists of the tournament, to which idle nobles rode attended by their courtisans dressed as pages in rich silken attire; the most unblushing profligacy was common.

Meanwhile the Lollard peasant or handicraftsman, ground down with taxes, the result of the unsuccessful French war, his mind seething with new ideas, looked on grimly and gloomily, prophesying nought but evil of all this luxurious pride, offensive alike to gods and man. And evil came. The Black Death, a horrible pest, swept through Europe; the people died like rotten sheep; land went out of cultivation; villages were depopulated; and most historians reckon that a third of the population of England perished. But good came from evil. Labour was scarce; masters were running after men instead of men after masters. The serfs took advantage of the time to break their bondage in large numbers and throng into the towns. The scarcity of labour sent wages went up in all directions. The ruling classes tried to keep them down by legislation; the famous Act of Edward III. was passed, fixing wages at the old standard that prevailed before the plague; but it was useless. The nobles, finding that they could not make enough out of the work of the labourers on their own domain on account of the high price of labour, endeavoured to revive the system of forced labour, by which the peasants had in the past paid their rent by cultivating the lord's land without any wages for their work. These labour-rents had been commuted for years by a small money payment; but now the lords insisted on the peasants paying them by their "free labour." But the peasants would not stand this; they were not going to be forced back into slavery for an idle luxurious class.

The old king was dead, and his grandson, Richard II., the model of a courtier youth of his time, had been on the throne only a few years, when the peasants rose everywhere in revolt against the attempted enforcement of the old labour-rents, against the king's taxes, against all forms of feudal and royal authority. Remember the bold deed of one man, which lit up the flame of revolt in Kent, was the killing of a royal-tax gatherer, who in course of his extortions had insulted Wat Tyler's daughter.

The men of Kent admired strength and courage, and placed Wat the Tyler, of Dartford, at their head. It is not my purpose here to tell the story of that rebellion; another comrade, whose knowledge of mediæval history is far greater than mine, has promised to do that for us. It is my purpose to notice its results. Still, there is one observation worth making—the frantic terror which fell upon the nobles at this uprising of the people. This may be due to the fact that a Jacquerie of such dimensions had been unknown in England before, and men always fear the unknown. But we imagine there was also another cause. What we call the democracy now was the most powerful part of the English army. Yeoman and peasant were trained to arms from boyhood; it was the long bows of these men, and not the lances or the battle-axes of the knights and men-at-arms, which had gained the victory in many a well-fought field in France and Scotland, and the English nobility, who had seen that the armour of Scottish and French chivalry was powerless against the cloth yard shafts launched from the English archers bows, had no desire to fall struck down by the deadly hail of arrows. The bow was a democratic weapon, and to its use may be traced the fact that the English working-classes were never crushed down into the slavish misery of many Continental peoples. Therefore, the nobles enervated by luxury, shrank before the popular storm.

But where force failed cunning succeeded; many of the peasants were moderate and dispersed to their homes on being granted charters of emancipation from serfdom by the king. Their leader was then basely murdered, and his followers, who would have avenged his death, foolishly listened to the voice of the cunning young diplomatist, Richard II., and dispersed to their homes, to find out afterwards what royal promises were worth. But though the king and nobles might hang the boldest of peasants and their leaders, and burn the parchments on which were written their lying promises, it was useless. The insurrection had done its work; serfdom could not be restored for the peasant revolt had killed it. Let us quote two standard authorities for the benefit of our practical friends, and also for the good of the people who are always canting about "moral force" and the folly of "violence." Let us hear on the authority of these what "violence" did for the English workmen in the fourteenth century. Green in his "History of the English People," says:

"Terrible as were the measures of repression which followed the Peasant Revolt, and violent as was the passion for reaction which raged among the proprietary classes at its close, the end of the rising was in fact secured. Cancel charters of manumission as the Council might, serfage was henceforth a doomed and perishing thing. The dread of another outbreak hung round the employer. . . . A hundred years after the Black Death the wages of the English labourer were sufficient to purchase twice the amount of the necessaries which could have been obtained under Edward III. The incidental descriptions of the life of the working-classes, which we find in Piers Ploughman, show that the increase of social comfort had been going on even during the troubled period which preceded the outbreak of the peasants, and it went on faster after the revolt."

And here is the testimony of another authority, whose evidence even Bradlaughite Radicals of the "peace at any price" school will admit. Professor Thorold Rogers, in his "Six Centuries of Work and Wages," says:

"Once in the history of England only, once perhaps only in the history of the world, peasants and artisans attempted to effect a revolution by force. They nearly succeeded; at least, they became for a short time the masters of the situation. That they would have held the advantages they gained at Mile-end, had they provided against the tragedy of Smithfield, is improbable. But they caused such terror by what they actually did, that they gained all that they claimed and that speedily. The English labourer for a century or more became virtually free and certainly prosperous."

Thus a "bloody revolution," which, according to modern political humbugs and capitalist swindlers, "never did any good and never will," shattered the might of feudalism and ushered in the dawn of the golden age of English labour, for it made by the terror it inspired a free, prosperous, and happy life possible for the workers of England.

THE GOSPEL OF CHEAPNESS.—The Continental people, it would seem, are importing our machinery, beginning to spin cotton and manufacture for themselves, to cut us out of this market and then out of that. Sad news indeed, but irremediable;—by no means the saddest news. The saddest news is that we should find our National Existence, as I sometimes hear it said, depend on selling manufactured cotton a farthing an ell cheaper than any other people—a most narrow stand for a great nation to base itself upon!—Carlyle: 'Past and Present.'

"IF YOU WISH TO SUCCEED."

(WITH APOLOGIES TO W. S. GILBERT.)

Air: "If you wish to succeed as a Jester."—Yeoman of the Guard.

If you're a working-man,
Then the following plan,
May assist you to gain a position
As a Labour employer,
Both of children and sire,
If you act as requires my tuition;
You must always be sure
To be first at the door,
When your workshop is opened on Monday.
Above all, don't forget
To take care to be met
Coming out of the church every Sunday.

Its the thing you desire,
To make sure you are met
By your honest employer,
Coming out of the church every Sunday.

You'll abhor all strong drink,
Say it leads to the brink
Of eternal damnation and ruin,
Take your dear wife and Ethel,
Round to Little Bethel,
To see what Brother Stiggins is doing;
Mind you make a good shift,
For the practice of thrift,
Take your cash to the saving's bank weekly,
And you say you're content
With the life God has sent,
Be it ever so humble or meekly.

It cannot be denied
Its a very good plot,
To say you're satisfied
With whatever your lot,
Be it ever so humble or meekly.

Say the workmen don't like
Things so go out on strike,

You must take care to be at their meetings,
With tales of disaster
Run back to your master,
Be sure that he'll give you good greetings.
By this means he'll frustrate,
And the men's plans checkmate:
In return for your service I'm sure,
man,
That your wage will be higher'd
And a job you desired
Will be given—that is, you'll be foreman.

If their fingers they burn
Through your able abuse,
See, you get in return
For your cooking their goose
The envied position of foreman.

When as foreman instated,
Pray don't be elated,
But plod ever humble and steady;
Live in just the same rank,
Surplus put in the bank—
By this means you'll have plenty of "ready."
Then with smile on your face,
Take and rent a small place,
Send out letters and handbills for custom;
Then men you'll engage,
At a sixth their fair wage:
Though you sweat 'em, be careful don't trust 'em.

It's a very good plan
When your hands you engage,
To see every man
Gets a sixth his fair wage—
Though above all be careful, don't trust
'em.

NOTES.

"WHEN thieves fall out honest folk may come by their own," and in the recriminations of Mr. Stanley and his subordinates the public has come by some knowledge of the real meaning and methods of British philanthropy in Africa. The details of the fiendish brutality perpetrated by educated English gentlemen on the poor and ignorant natives of mid-Africa will not surprise Socialists, who are familiar with the barbarities which educated English gentlemen perpetrate upon the wretched wage-slaves of their own country.

Sickening as some of the incidents recently revealed are, they are not more loathsome than multitudes which occur every day in our own land without comment or protest from the public or the press. We have thousands of Stanleys, Barttelots, and Jamesons at home! We have thousands of poor men, women, and children who are prodded and kicked and killed in the interests of commerce and civilisation in our own "darkest England"—and it is doubtful if even the most hapless victims of that filibustering escapade suffered torture comparable to the torture which is inflicted every day upon the poor throughout the length and breadth of our own land, for the greed, gratification, and pride of the very people who planned and paid for the "Emin Pasha Relief Expedition"!

Nevertheless, it is our duty to join loudly in the protest against these atrocities in Africa. Just because they are perpetrated on poor black people abroad, they are much more visible and shocking to the "British Public" than when perpetrated upon the poor white slaves at home, and perhaps the horror of them may rouse some people to a perception of what civilisation and commerce really are, alike in Africa and in England.

J. B. G.

Deeper and deeper into the mire plunge the combatants in the Rear Column fray. The unfortunate Mrs. Jameson is—like so many other people of her class—so morally blind that she has proved the guilt of her husband out of his own mouth, to the satisfaction even of a Times leader-writer. Jameson himself seems to have thought that, in the letter his wife has published and which proves every substantial fact against him, he was "clearing his character." I do not suppose that these Barttelots, Jamesons, and the rest, are really worse than their fellows—possibly to men of their own colour and class they may be kind and helpful; but they do not really look upon "niggers" as human beings like themselves. Never let the workers forget that, in their inmost hearts, these folk, and others like them, look also upon the toilers whom they rob as of another and inferior species.

The capitalist press—with the honourable exception of the Daily Chronicle—has, naturally enough, carefully boycotted the various London celebrations of the Chicago murders. Even from the erstwhile socialistically-minded Star, all mention of our meetings has been excluded. Chairman's Mustard Stuart has, no doubt, instructed his young men upon the matter. After all, it is but natural that the plundering classes should dislike to be reminded of the deeds of their analogues in America; deeds which our millionaires (Radicals or Conservatives, as the case may be) are no doubt ready to repeat here, upon occasion.

One small bit of consolation comes to us to make some slight amends for the failure of the Australian strike, and that is the final and complete exposure of Iscariot Champion. This personage is now shown as the traitor he is to every worker throughout the world. Words need never more be wasted on him. Nevertheless, one really could wish that John Burns would see his way, even now, at this more than eleventh hour, to openly and conclusively repudiate the betrayer of the Australians. Accepting to the full Fitzgerald's explanation that Burns' letter, in fact, did no harm, since Champion had been accepted as an ally on his own merits, yet still it would surely have been better if no such letter had been written.

Bombardos Booth continues to receive adhesions from all sorts and conditions of upper-class folk. Paunchy Albert Edward, "of Wales," instructs one of his flunkies to signify his august approval; and the rich society actor, who likes to be called "Squire" Bancroft, is ready to give the Salvation General £1,000,—upon conditions. That strange compound of hysteria and business aptitude, the pious Stead, still beats the big drum, and is ably seconded by Colman's Mustard Stuart's staff and other "advanced" middle-class philanthropists. It is only natural that these things should be so; anything which seems likely to stay the onward march of the Revolution, by filling for a time, at a cheap rate, the hungry bellies of the men who alone can make it, is of course only the welcome to those who will (as they think) lose everything by the Great Change.

The Executive of the Docker's Union, however, need not have gone out of the way to pat Bombardos on the back. This, I suppose, is another instance of the wisdom and "moderation" of our heaven-sent Labour leaders. The workers themselves I believe, do not take Bombardos at his own valuation by any means. One was glad to notice that, at a mass meeting at Canning Town the other day, "reference to General Booth's new social schemes provoked much laughter." I quote from the Daily Chronicle, which is almost a semi-official organ of the S. A.

What is known as the "right of asylum" in this land is preserved for the present by the decision in the Castioni case. For all that, do not let us deceive ourselves into thinking that it rests upon any very secure basis. For myself, I have little confidence that future Communards (if such there be)—not to speak of Anarchists of a practical turn—will be safe here, as the refugees of twenty years ago were safe. Even in Castioni's case, the Government decided to give up the accused, the Secretary of State allowed proceedings to be taken, and the Attorney-General argued in favour of extradition. Only, in this case, the prisoner happened to be a bourgeois, well-off and respectable, and the "revolution" in which he took part was sworn to be a bourgeois revolution, fomented by "wealthy and respectable people." This point was made the most of by the "wealthy and respectable" (and also astute) advocate who argued for the defence. Is it wonderful that the "wealthy and respectable" judges pronounced in favour of liberty?

It is perhaps worth while to point out that the crop of "accidents" which shocked and horrified us during the past week would have been impossible under any real system of Socialism. Under Free Communism old men of 65 would not be set to anxious and exhausting work. No signalman, on such railways as it was thought worth while to keep going, would be encouraged to work more than a couple of hours a day. Special trains to take folk hastily to London through the night would be unknown; since the nineteenth century hurry would have vanished, never (we may hope) to return. It is needless to add that Socialists would not build war-ships "crank" by reason of their heavy armament; since war-ships and armaments would be things of the past.

Everywhere the same lesson meets us, writ plainly, so that truly we may run and read. The mother of the unhappy "Mrs. Percy" tells a story to the reporters bearing truth stamped upon it to one who has ever had a glimpse of "lower class" lives—a story strange enough, I daresay, to the middle-class woman (the ideal denizen of Podsnap's harem) who has never been allowed to glance outside the limits of her own fenced and guarded life. A kindly human little girl—with "bad headaches" now and then (through some ancestral taint, possibly, the product of evil conditions)—who by-and-bye tires of the weary monotony of her life of toil, disappears in search of amorous adventure, and finds that life hard, too, and poverty-stricken more or less. Under such treatment the nervous taint spreads and developes, and then comes the miserable catastrophe. Wretched daughter, wretched mother, upon you, too, the yoke of "civilisation" has borne hardly!

The COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

THE "COMMONWEAL."

After November this Journal will appear Monthly until we can tide over present difficulties. We fear that the several appeals which have been made on behalf of 'Commonweal' have fallen flat because of their frequency. We are now hampered by want of premises, and still worse, want of money. We wish to send out an independent Revolutionary paper that will strike hard and often at the rotten system around us, and if the comrades and sympathisers in this and other countries wish to see us do this they must help, and that quickly. This is a final and urgent appeal. Surely the Revolutionary Socialists are not going to allow the common enemy to chuckle over the disappearance of a paper from the small list of those which appear in England to fight oppression and monopoly!

ANNIVERSARY MEETINGS

OF THE

CHICAGO MURDERS & BLOODY SUNDAY.

"Let the voice of the people be heard."—Parsons.

On Friday, November 14, the Socialist League held its annual commemoration of the Chicago Martyrs and of Bloody Sunday in the large hall of the United Radical Club, Kay Street, Hackney Road—which was kindly placed at our disposal. There was a good gathering, despite the many anniversary meetings which had been held in various parts of London during the week.

Burnie occupied the chair, and for the benefit of the Radicals present, stated the facts of our comrades' martyrdom. He read a resolution of sympathy passed by the Irish Socialist Union and telegrams to the same effect from Glasgow, Manchester, Hull, Leeds, Sheffield, and Norwich,—as well as a letter from our friend Cunninghame Graham wishing our meeting great success and regretting his inability to be present. "Every day," said our friend, "I see more clearly the great impression the Chicago affair made on the American working classes. . . . In regard to Trafalgar Square, that, too, is still unpaid—for I like to pay my debts. One day it is to be hoped that the working classes of London will endeavour to pay theirs (with compound interest). Neither will they, I hope, forget the base and tricky snivellings of the commercial Liberal hack, who, whilst baying at wrongs in Ireland, never raised a whimper in London. . . . Let us not forget either event, friends!"

The united choirs of the "Commonweal" and Hammersmith Branches (conducted by comrade Sparrow) then sang "All for the Cause" and "Annie Laurie"—Mrs. Sparling accompanying at the piano.

Nicoll moved the following resolution:

"That this meeting, called together to commemorate the legal murder of four men in Chicago on November 11th, 1887 (Parsons, Spies, Fischer, and Engel), the driving to suicide of another (Lingg) in prison, and the cruel imprisonment of three more (Fielden, Schwab, and Neebe), by the government of the State of Illinois, for the crime of encouraging workmen on strike and helping them to carry on the struggle against their masters, and the further crime of trying to maintain the rights of free speech and public meeting, calls the attention of the workmen of the world to the gradual abrogation of these rights in all capitalistic countries, and while emphatically denouncing the tyrannical interference with these elementary rights, points out that it is a natural and necessary result of a so-called Society based upon the robbery of Labour."

He said that some non-Socialists there might deem the events in Illinois a few years ago no concern of theirs; but it was a true saying that the Cause of Labour was the same all over the world. The same tactics were pursued by capitalists in every civilised country. Lately in Australia the capitalists had shown the same animosity to the workers that was displayed in Chicago, and if the leaders there had been Revolutionary Socialists or Anarchists the same fate would have befallen them which befel our comrades in Illinois. There could be no doubt that the agitation at present going on all over the world for an eight hours' day had spread from Chicago. The martyrdom of our comrades was being everywhere remembered. The workers would never forget these men,—the men who had told them that nothing but a complete change would ever really benefit them—a change which would sweep away Vanderbilts, Goulds, and Carnegies. The only way to gain concessions was by the method advocated by our murdered heroes—the method of the General Strike (Loud cheers).

Samuels (of Leeds) seconded the resolution. He was not sure that that was a night to make propaganda or to discuss Socialism. We Socialists ought to feel very sad that night, and to try if we could not find some means to avenge our friends' deaths. He did not advocate force, but sooner or later force might have to be resorted to, if we were attacked.

Johanna Lahr supported the resolution. She reminded those there who were outside the movement that the rich lived upon the robbery of the workers' labour. The toilers who produced all wealth found it monopolised by a few idlers. The evil would never be cured by governments or leaders; the workers of the world must themselves unite and do it, by sweeping classes away for ever. In this great work that we had undertaken our comrades' deaths had been of infinite help. August Spies had truly said that their silence would speak more loudly than the voices strangled that day. The very German Emperor had found that he must somehow deal with the social question. Do not let us fight for a country which was no country of ours, but for the right to live as men and women, to bring up our children as men and women—the right to food and clothing. Where now, under commercialism, was the English freedom boasted of old? England was filled with the haggard faces of pale careworn slaves.

The resolution was then put to the meeting and carried unanimously. The Choir then sang "Linnell's Death Song" and "No Master." Both songs were greeted with continued applause, and the meeting would take no denial but insisted upon "No Master" being encored.

William Morris then moved:

"That this meeting also denounces the similar attack on free speech and the right of public meeting in London on Sunday, November 13, 1887, through which three men were killed (Linnell, Curwen, and Connell), one (Harrison) so injured that he died after a painful and lingering illness, and many sent to prison after a mere mockery of trial for being present at a political meeting which was ferociously attacked by the police."

Our comrade was received with cheers. He said that perhaps the second event we were met there to commemorate might seem almost like the comedy after the tragedy. No doubt in the eyes of some there were elements of the comic in the Trafalgar Square business. He had himself seen one of the processions, consisting of 3,000 men, put to flight by some 30 policemen. That, no doubt, was very funny. It was very funny, too, he supposed, to see Graham's head hammered, and it supplied, he concluded, an additional element of comedy that poor Linnell, the law writer, should be killed in a quarrel with which, as he (the speaker) frankly admitted, he had nothing to do. It was doubtless funny that neither we nor our Radical friends could speak in Trafalgar Square to this day. In all seriousness it was a tragical enough thing that men should be sent to prison (let alone being killed) for allowing themselves to be beaten by the police,—for that was what it came to. If our rulers did these things in the green tree of the Revolution, what would they do in the dry? Surely pit and gallows would be the least of their doings. Three years ago Sir Charles Warren had got it into his head that the Revolution was coming then and there,—an idea sufficiently absurd,—but his consequent action was yet more absurd. What could we say of a man who tried to put down a Revolution by stopping a public meeting? Why, if people could not talk in public they would plot in secret,—and so the Revolution would come sooner. (Cheers). Warren with his drum-head courts-martial had lost ground for his side, rather than gained it. The Socialists were far stronger now than three years ago. The attempt to put down the coming Revolution by bludgeoning in London, and by murder in America, had been perfectly futile, and had had, in fact, the contrary effect. The word "Revolution" was often used to denote some last dramatic event in which a gradual change culminated, but when he spoke of "the Revolution" he meant the realisation by mankind that they might in the mass be happy—have at least a chance of being happy. The essence of the Revolution was the intense desire and settled intention of the people to be free in the only way a people could be free—by the realisation of equality of conditions. If that feeling once grew in people's hearts, it could not be put down. Something had been said about revenge, but the only real revenge we could possibly have was by our own efforts bringing ourselves to happiness. Only unhappy people thought of revenge; when we were happy we should forget it. The great change coming was the sure outcome of our present state of misery and discouragement, and our efforts should be directed to bring it about as soon as possible.

Kitz seconded the resolution. He complained of the indifference and apathy we sometimes found among the workers. Chicago was too far away for them to care for what happened there. Even in regard to Trafalgar Square they often deemed it a mere political difficulty, and not (as it was) an event in the Labour War. The governing classes knew better, and were determined to put all these movements down. Chicago and Trafalgar Square were battles in the great conflict between the Haves and the Have-nots. All party distinctions the capitalists and their hangers-on pushed on one side, so soon as the Labour War came to the front. Some might think us dreamers, but it was dreamers who had led the world forward. We were practical enough, and we wanted every worker to remember that at some time or other his life was shortened by what he suffered. Why, then, should he fear bloodshed, if bloodshed were to come? The fact was the tragedy of the workers' lives was so slow and insidious in its operation that they did not realise it. To-day we reared children in slums where no flowers would grow. Those who came after us would blush for shame at this cowardly generation.

The second resolution was also carried unanimously.

The Choir then sang the "Carmagnole" and the Marseillaise amid great enthusiasm, and a successful meeting was brought to a close with three hearty cheers for the Social Revolution. R. W. B.

We also had a most successful meeting at Milton Hall on Tuesday, November 11th. R. W. Burnie took the chair. Kitz, Mrs. Lahr, Morris, Louise Michel, and Nicoll were the speakers. Louise Michel made a most eloquent speech in memory of our murdered comrades. Revolutionary songs were sung by the choir with great effect. There were many strangers present who were evidently deeply impressed. On the whole, excellent propaganda was done. A large quantity of literature was sold, and £2 2s. 6d. was collected. N.

ABERDEEN.

On Sunday, Nov. 9th, we celebrated the anniversary of Bloody Sunday and the Judicial Murder of the Chicago Martyrs. Spies' speech was read, and stirring speeches were made by comrades Rennie, W. Cooper, Duncan, and Leatham. Comrade Duncan sang "Annie Laurie," and was vociferously applauded by the large and enthusiastic audience; he also sang "England Arise." The choir of the branch sang revolutionary songs at intervals. The meeting was most enthusiastic throughout, all the speakers being loudly applauded.

BRIGHTON.

On Sunday, Nov. 9th, a well attended meeting was held at the Bath Arms Assembly Rooms, in commemoration of the Chicago Martyrs; comrades Barker and Ford delivered impressive speeches.

DUBLIN.

On Monday, Nov. 10th, the Dublin Socialist Union held a very successful meeting at 87, Marlboro Street, to commemorate the judicial murder of our Chicago brethren. The room was decorated with Anarchist mottoes, etc. Speeches were delivered by Graham (Glass Bottlemakers), Hamilton (Gas Workers), Greene, Fitzpatrick, O'Gorman, and Weichsleder, a German comrade.

EDINBURGH.

On Tuesday, Nov. 11th, the members of the S.S.F. celebrated the anniversary of the martyrdom of the Chicago Anarchists in Edinburgh. The memory of our murdered comrades was toasted in silence. The "Social Revolution" was also proposed, stirring speeches made, and several revolutionary songs sung by various members

GLASGOW.

On Tuesday, Nov. 11th, a meeting of the joint Socialist bodies was held in the Sewing Machine Maker's Hall to commemorate the anniversary of the Martyrdom of our Chicago comrades and Bloody Sunday. The meeting was opened with "The March of the Workers," and the Commonweal resolutions—moved by our Swiss comrade Jaques Dupont and seconded by James Biggar—were passed. Thereafter addresses were given by Glasier, Joe Burgoyne, Downie, and Robert Biggar. Carl Derwald (who with several of his German comrades, has attended these celebrations every year) sang "Das Proletariat" and the "German Marseillaise"; Dupont sang the "Worker's Marseillaise," Miss Biggar "Annie Laurie," and McKechnie "La Carmagnole." Revolutionary songs were sung by Smith, Bolton, and others. The meeting terminated with three ringing cheers for the Social Revolution.

LEEDS.

On Monday, Nov. 10th, we had a very satisfactory meeting at Oriel Hall. Despite bad weather and other disadvantages, the body of the hall was fairly full. The spirit of the audience was thoroughly in sympathy with the objects of the meeting. Our comrades Charles Bullas, Hall, and Robert Bingham (of Sheffield) made good speeches; Cores, Samuels, and Sweeny also spoke. Altogether the meeting must result in greatly strengthening our movement here.

MANCHESTER.

On Sunday, Nov. 9th, our projected demonstration in the Square could not take place owing to the heavy downpour of rain, but a fairly large and enthusiastic meeting was held in the club at night, when comrades Bailie, Barton, Scott, and Kennedy gave an account of the murder of "our martyrs," and denounced the system which enabled such a deed to be accomplished, and a resolution was unanimously passed protesting against their brutal execution and the system of plunder and murder it was done to support.

NORWICH.

On Monday, November 10th, we held a meeting at St. Augustine's School to commemorate the anniversary of our Chicago comrades. Amongst the friends present were Oldman and Mrs. Oldman (Manchester), C. W. Mowbray (London), J. Headley, Brightwell, and two more comrades from Yarmouth. Comrade Poynts took the chair, opening with a short address, explaining why the meeting was held. Oldman followed at some length, dwelling upon the object of these men, and what they died for. Mowbray spoke next, dealing with each of the speeches delivered by these comrades before the judge, and pointed out that the men were hanged, not for the bomb-throwing, but because they were Anarchists. On Saturday evening a good meeting was held on the Haymarket, when reference was made to this matter. On Sunday afternoon a large meeting was held in the Market Place. We had a large red banner with two Liberty caps on each pole, draped with black, and bearing the following words—"Chicago Martyrs. Their silence is more powerful than speech. Hurrah for Anarchy!" Comrade W. Moore opened; Mowbray and Emery followed; meeting closed with three ringing cheers for our Chicago comrades. In the evening, open-air meeting held in the Market Place. Emery opened, followed by Mowbray, which brought these meetings to a close. We have been very successful, having sold over two dozen Social Science, and a good number of Commonweal and Freedom, and collected £2 8s. 2½d. Our success is a plain proof of the sympathy towards the cause.

SHEFFIELD.

On Tuesday, Nov. 11th, a very successful meeting was held in the Hallamshire Hall in commemoration of the murder of the Chicago Anarchists. Comrades Cores, Samuels (Leeds), Hall, Charles, Creaghe, and Bulas were the speakers, and their stirring revolutionary speeches were received with the utmost enthusiasm by the large audience. Revolutionary songs were sung during the evening, and it was most encouraging to see how the audience joined in the singing. Our large posters announcing the meeting were boycotted by the Bill Posting Company, but an enthusiastic set of amateur bill-posters sallied forth from our club at midnight, and before daylight dawned every hoarding in Sheffield had our posters.

YARMOUTH.

On Sunday, Nov. 9th, three mass meetings were held at Yarmouth, flags and banners being draped in commemoration of the murder of five of our comrades and imprisonment of three others in Chicago. In the morning, on Priory Plain, large audience was addressed by Oldman, Poynts (of Norwich), and Headley. In the afternoon, on Fish Wharf, a large meeting was addressed by same comrades; a few questions were put and answered. In the evening, on Hall Quay, another splendid meeting was opened by singing the "Marseillaise"; Headley then read Lingg's address out of Chicago 'Speeches,' followed by Oldman and Poynts. Great interest shown, and the meeting was continued by Saunders and Brightwell until 10.30 p.m. amid general excitement.

Very near a Crash!

We very nearly had a crash in the City last Friday. Baring Bros., generally known in commercial circles as "highly respectable bankers," and known to the unfortunate natives of Egypt and the people of the Argentine Republic as one of the most remorseless gangs of usurers which even our blest country has produced, had rather overdone it with their "shent per shent" operations, and narrowly escaped bankruptcy. Luckily our present Government contains that prince of usurers, Joachim Goschen, and doubtless upon his advice they came to the rescue, and thus averted a "terrible calamity." But there are more big houses than Baring Bros. that have been on the same game. Over-speculation has been common during the period of prosperity which is now passing away; and it is certain that the crisis has been only postponed. When it does come we shall have a crash that will put past panics into the shade; and then—

Good News.

We hear that our contemporary Die Autonomie will in future appear as a weekly paper. Up till the number for November 1st it has been issued as a fortnightly. We are glad to hear that the paper has been so successful. N.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

Illustrations of the freedom the workers enjoy under a free republic are being constantly furnished to us. A Belgian named Brion has been taking a leading part in the miners' strike at Carvin. He is a working miner himself, much respected by his French comrades, among whom he had long worked. He has eight children. The French Government has expelled him from French territory—simply and solely because he is a striker. As the Charleville Emancipation most properly says: "Under the bourgeois Republic of Constans and his friends, a foreign workman has a right to come and toil in France at a rate below that of French workmen; the manufacturers may nobble foreign workmen and bring them here to replace Frenchmen, and in so doing be protected by policemen and judges; but if a foreign worker, recognising his rights and duties, makes common cause with his comrades, like Brion he is run in and expelled."

The Révolte publishes a tolerably full report of the prosecution of our comrade Lorion, who has been sentenced to fifteen months' imprisonment. The Public Prosecutor's description of our comrade in his inflammatory opening speech to the judges is quite charming in its simplicity: "You have before you a man boldly intelligent, arrogant, a cold-blooded reasoner who shrinks from nothing, who would have neither god nor master, neither policeman nor constable!" Exactly so, oh innocent Public Prosecutor! From your point of view, you have described our friend as he doubtless is and as we would wish to be. Upon hearing his sentence Larion exclaimed in a loud voice, "Long live Anarchy!"

BELGIUM.

It is finally settled that a Congress of the National Federation of Belgian Miners shall meet on the 14th of December next. The agenda includes four points—Universal Suffrage; General Strike; Eight Hours' Day; Paris International Congress.

The State Socialists of Belgium have been holding great demonstrations in favour of Universal Suffrage (!). At Charleroi there were 20,000 processionists, headed by Calbawaere, "General Master of the Knights of Labour, wearing his insignia." The demonstrators, being forbidden to carry red flags, bore French and Swiss standards instead. At Mons there were 4,000 or 5,000 demonstrators, who played the "Marseillaise" before the French Consulate and shouted "Long live France!" It is pitiable to see workers thus enthusiastic for universal suffrage and middle-class republics. At Brussels there were as many as 40,000 demonstrators in a similar sense.

ITALY.

Il Fascio Operaio brings us the official report of the Fifth General Congress of the "Italian Workmen's Party," held at Milan November 1st and 2nd. The Congress commenced by a somewhat warm discussion as to whether the following question should be added to the agenda: "Ought the Workmen's Party to take part in political and administrative elections?" The majority held that this matter had been clearly settled at the Bologna Congress, and refused to allow it to be reopened. Resistance to capitalists by means of strikes was approved, as were also the institution of Labour Exchanges and the Eight Hours' Day. As regards the First of May, the Congress declared "that the First of May ought to be the holiday of the workers of the whole world," and ordered "that all its own branches should upon that day celebrate, in great and worthy manner, the reaching out of the toilers towards Liberty and Justice." It was agreed to push propaganda among the peasants. Resolutions were also adopted on Co-operation, which are too long to set out here, but which do not seem specially objectionable, so long as palliatives are deemed admissible at all.

In the Ancona Campana for November 2 our comrade Merlino has a good article on the "Conduct of Anarchists at the Approaching Elections." There are words in it as applicable to England as to Italy, and which we shall do well to remember when—possibly in a few weeks' time—we are plunged in that hateful melée of liars and swindlers known as a "General Election." The abstention of anti-parliamentarians, Merlino contends, should be an active abstention and not a passive one. We should manifest our abstention and the reasons for it everywhere, even, if possible, in the very polling-booth. Our Italian Anarchist comrades seem to be likely to act upon this advice.

SPAIN.

La Anarquía for Nov. 7th publishes the portraits of our five murdered Chicago comrades, with brief biographical notices of them and an account of their slaying. Shiploads of emigrants are returning to Spain from the Argentine, sick of democratic and federal republics.

The editor of the San Sebastian Combate remains in gaol, very heavy bail having been required which it is impossible to find, as the authorities well knew when they fixed it.

Our Barcelona comrades have published a Spanish translation of Hugh H. Pentecost's discourse on the Chicago crime.

BULGARIA.

Our Anarchist comrades here are beginning to have their share of legal worrying. One of them was prosecuted the other day for publishing a pamphlet called the "Right of Poverty." The trial took place at Scolievo, and the court was crammed with persons anxious to see the "New Men," as they are called. Strange to say, much to the disappointment of the Government, the judges decided in our comrade's favour. Many students are being expelled for reading the Paris Révolte or Anarchist pamphlets, as well as for making propaganda.

CHILI.

From the Madrid Anarquía, I learn that our comrade Castro is working hard to spread Socialism in this republic. With the help of one other comrade he is publishing a little paper called El Obrero (The Worker). He fears that the life of this journal is precarious. Socialism, he says, has no existence for the native Chilian, who is a patriotic person who cares for nothing save praise of the land of his birth. Jesuitry reigns everywhere. I am sure the Weal would be glad to hear from Castro direct and to exchange with him.

UNITED STATES.

The vile Chicago police (as vile as any policemen in the world, save the loathsome "Pinkertons") are harassing even respectable middle-class women by their habit of arresting innocent work-girls on manufactured charges of street-walking. "This is done," says the "Christian Socialist" Boston Dawn,

"on the slightest pretext, often merely because they happen to be on the side-walk. . . . Some of the deeds of these Chicago policemen are an outrage on humanity." I may note, by the way, that a memorial has been presented to the Federal Senate for the suppression of the "armed assassins known as Pinkerton detectives." "It is not likely," says the Tacoma Globe, "that the memorial will ever come back from the committee to which it was referred." Pinkerton's men are far too useful to the bosses (who "run" the Senate, as they "run" everything else) to be spared. Powderly proposes to his "Knights" to abolish Pinkertonism by promoting Bills in the State Legislatures. Various States have adopted enactments which, in his view, do prevent the employment of these ruffians. I regret to say I cannot agree that the legislation in question has that effect, or, for that matter, was intended to have it.

Another Bellamy experiment is to be tried in California. A certain Mrs. Olive Washburn, residing at San Francisco, "will devote nearly her entire fortune to the founding of a Nationalist" (i.e., Bellamyite) "colony, where the ideas advanced by the National leader can be developed to their fullest extent. A part of her large fortune consists of 1,700 acres on the road from San Jose to the Lick Observatory on Mount Hamilton, and it is there the colony will be located. The tract is desirable in every respect, and, when improved according to Mrs. Washburn's plans, will be a veritable paradise. Over 100,000 dollars will be spent in the erection of factories, dwelling houses, etc., and the purchase of farming implements; and, when all is ready, she will present the entire estate to the colony. All people of good moral character, irrespective of religious belief" (this last is a delightful touch—the self-conscious tolerance is so characteristic of the bourgeois mind) "who are willing to work are welcome to become a part of the community. Mrs. Washburn does not expect any colonists to use funds they may have, and merely asks them to do the work allotted to them." (Suppose, oh excellent Mrs. Washburn, they should prefer doing the work they "allot" themselves?) "The work of improvement was begun about two months ago, and at present is well advanced. Mrs. Washburn has invited several hundred prominent Nationalists to be present at the dedication of the colony, which will take place shortly, and she is in hopes of having Bellamy himself to lead the exercises [sic!]. He has been written to regarding the matter. Several families are ready to start to the colony as soon as the arrangements are complete, and many others have signified their intention of joining. Mrs. Washburn is a Spiritualist also, and claims to have received suggestions from spirits [!]." It is sad to see so much energy wasted upon an attempt to redeem from poverty at most a few hundred of workers—an attempt, too, probably doomed to failure, as every attempt must be, until (not a space of 1,700 acres, but) the world is changed. The fascination of the barrack Socialism of 'Looking Backward' for our "law and order" friends of the middle classes is symptomatic of much. Our quotation is from the Journal of the Knights of Labour.

That remarkable journal the Boston Liberty welcomes the Herald of Anarchy in a fashion not very complimentary to some of our Anarchist-Communist comrades here. "The English Anarchists," we are informed, "have had to rely thus far on Liberty as their only organ." This is rough on Chancery Lane. Are Communist-Anarchists to be drummed out of the Anarchist church? That queer product of Anglo-Saxondom, the Individualist-Anarchist, should remember that, outside a few score of people in England and the States, he has no existence, whereas Socialist Anarchism (be it Communist or Collectivist) is spreading far and wide.

Dawn is very much exercised by what it calls "the dastardly train-wrecking on the New York Central," which has "proven to be the work of a few wretched Knights" of Labour, "probably involving even one or two local officials of the Order." This illustrates the kind of "dastardly" desertion and pious whining scrupulosity which we shall meet with from the Christian Socialists whenever serious business begins. Happily, like the Individualist-Anarchists, they are not numerous—there being, after all, some sense of logic in that much-abused human nature of ours.

We are glad to receive from Chicago the first number of a new Revolutionary Communist-Anarchist monthly entitled Freedom. It is dated November 11, and appears with a black border in memory of our martyrs. "A few of the 'old guard,' steadfast and true, have banded themselves together as Albert R. Parsons Assembly" and issued this new journal. Lucy Parsons contributes to the first number. A hearty welcome to the fresh-comer.

SWEDEN.

Two of our comrades in Stockholm (Carleson and Bergegren) have started a series of sociological lectures for working men. Sweden offering very few facilities for the intellectual training of workers, this scheme, full of truly revolutionary inspiration, will be very useful.

Branting, the editor of Socialdemokraten (Stockholm), was present at the Halle Congress as delegate of the Swedish party. It is evident that he has been very favourably impressed by the proceedings at Halle, and it is also evident that he has been able to communicate his admiration of the German Social Democratic party to a great number of his Socialist countrymen. What this means to the future aspect of Socialism in Sweden remains to be seen. One thing appears to me certain, that our Swedish friends for several reasons understand the events in Germany better than English Socialists generally do.

Branting in Stockholm and the Socialist Danielson in Malmö got several hundred votes in the Parliamentary elections this summer. SYN.

ABERDEEN.—The usual meeting was held on Castle Street on Saturday night, when comrades Duncan and Leatham spoke to a large crowd. Next week we are to have comrade Glasier of Glasgow here on a propagandist trip.—G. A. C.

SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION—EDINBURGH.—On Sunday, in Labour Hall, Miss Cameron spoke on "Socialist Ideals," and at Leith Hamilton spoke on the "Eight Hour Day." At both meetings the audiences were large; questions plentiful, and good discussions followed.

SHEFFIELD.—All our outdoor meetings are still well attended, and a thorough revolutionary propaganda is being carried on by our comrades. The police are at last beginning to display some activity. An attempt was made last Sunday by the representatives of law-'n'-order to stop our meeting at Attercliffe Road—a place where the Great Booth's chloroformers meet regularly. Comrade Kent refused to "move on," and continued the meeting amidst the cheers of the people. His name and address has been taken, and it is likely we shall hear of a prosecution shortly. Considerable feeling has been roused here by comrade Morris's article in last week's Commonweal, and a night will be set apart to debate it.—J. M. B.

LIVERPOOL SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—Vegetarian Restaurant, Eberle Street, Dale Street.—Meets every Tuesday at 8 p.m.

DUBLIN.—Dublin Socialist Union, 87 Marlboro Street. Lecture every Saturday at 8 p.m. Nov. 22, J. E. Masterson, "Politics for the Worker."

DWELLINGS FOR THE LABOURING CLASSES.

THERE are some good kind people in this world, as the following extract from the prospectus of a "philanthropic" joint stock company will show. The italics are ours:

"The excessive rate of mortality, and the large proportion of sickness in the numerous old and dilapidated dwellings in all the thickly populated districts of Manchester and Salford, cry aloud for immediate remedy. These dwellings, utterly unfit for human habitation, are the abodes of about one-fourth of the entire population, wherein disease generates, and vice abounds to an alarming extent. Investigations have shown beyond dispute or doubt that all efforts at social improvement of the poorer classes are rendered futile by the unsuitable arrangements of their dwellings, and that their physical and moral condition cannot be ameliorated except by the demolition of these rookeries and hot-beds of disease, clearing the sites, and erecting thereon healthy and comfortable dwellings. The immediate demand for labour on the opening of the Ship Canal will, it is expected, induce large numbers of porters, labourers, and others to seek residences as near as possible to the docks; thus small tenements at rentals within their means will be instantly required. The evils hereinbefore alluded to, the prospect of further overcrowding, and the energetic measures now being taken by the Corporations in condemning unhealthy dwellings, render the present time opportune and advantageous for the establishment of a limited company. In London, several million pounds have been invested through joint stock enterprise in such dwellings with highly satisfactory results. Encouraged by the hope of similar success in Manchester and in Salford, it is proposed to establish a Joint Stock Company, to be called the 'Manchester and Salford Dwellings Corporation Limited,' with practical and comprehensive powers to erect suitable blocks of dwellings. The capital of the Corporation will be £250,000, in 50,000 shares of £5 each, half in 4 per cent. preference shares and half in ordinary shares; the first issue being £25,000, viz., £12,500 preference and £12,500 ordinary capital. The rentals of the proposed tenements will be from 1s. 6d. to 4s. 6d. per week, estimated to yield, after providing for repairs and all expenses, a sum equal to a dividend of between four and five per cent. on the total capital expended. Apart from the material welfare not only of the people occupying these improved sanitary dwellings, but to the residents of Manchester and Salford at large, the investment will, it is believed, be equally safe and more profitable to investors than the majority of investments in municipal bonds yielding only 3 to 4 per cent."

Now then, all you good people who want "five per shent" for your money, and to "benefit" the working classes at the same time, now is your opportunity. Of course we understand it is all pure philanthropy on your part, and if even there was not a "safe and profitable five per shent" hanging on to the business you would be just as ready to invest your money. You can tell that story to the Marines, but we fear the working people will not believe you. We should like to know also how many of the former tenants of the slums will find shelter in these "Dwellings for the Labouring Classes." It may be that they are not "respectable" enough!

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

REPORTS.

NORTH LONDON.—Comrades who have not seen our report for some time might imagine that we have been somewhat idle; but we have been carrying on a pretty vigorous and successful propaganda during the summer and up till the present time, the receipts from our meetings on Sunday frequently amounting to 25s. and 30s. We have distributed 10,000 leaflets of various kinds, and have disposed of 125 Chicago Speeches. We have kept up a donation to the Guarantee Fund of 4s. weekly, and at our four meetings sold from four to seven quires of Commonweal, and we expect to carry on the propaganda of theory and practice energetically all through the winter.—T. C.

DUBLIN.—The opening meeting of the Dublin Socialist Union was held on Saturday, November 15th, at 87 Marlboro Street. J. O'Gorman delivered an address, "What is Human Slavery." A good discussion followed, in which King, McDonnell, Masterson, Cully, Fitzpatrick, and others took part. There was a good attendance.

LEEDS.—On Sunday, November 9th, Andrew Hall spoke on Hunslet and Woodhouse Moors; good audiences, etc. On Sunday evening, at the Club, we had a free feed, free drinks, and general jollification as a farewell gathering to comrade Samuels. Speeches were made by Sweeny, Cores, Hall, Allworthy, Wilkinson, Sollit, and responded to by Samuels. Songs and recitations were rendered by comrades Foster, Orsman, Curlin, and others. Altogether, a capital evening's enjoyment was obtained. It was manifest that the propaganda in Leeds is to be maintained as vigorously as the weather and circumstances generally will permit. On Sunday the 16th rain prevented our meeting at Hunslet Moor, but Cores and Menkey spoke at Woodhouse; 'Stanley's Exploits' sold well. In the evening, for the first time, we held a good meeting at the Market Gates, Roper, Cores, Menkey, and Sollit speaking. Thirty-five Commonweal and pamphlets sold.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

THE GLORIOUS REFORMATION:

OR,

HOW THE ENGLISH PEOPLE WERE EVICTED, ROBBED,
AND MURDERED BY THE RULING CLASSES.

II.—THE GOLDEN AGE.

THE storm of revolution passed, but it cleared the air and left peace behind it. Though the great lords might destroy their own power in civil war or private vendetta, peasant and serf tilled their land in quiet and craftsmen worked undisturbed in their workshops; for the people had shown their might in revolt. The lords therefore feared the people, who were therefore left undisturbed during all the great battles which turned the fair fields of England from green to red, and who enjoyed a condition of freedom, happiness and substantial wellbeing such as had never been known before, and has certainly never been known since.

Serfdom being abolished, the immense majority of the people consisted of free peasant proprietors. The ordinary agricultural labourer even was a landowner on a small scale, having several acres attached to his cottage. Besides this, the peasant enjoyed the use of the common land, of which there was plenty near every town and village—wide stretches of heath, pasture, and woods, where his pigs, geese, poultry, and cattle could freely graze, where he could find timber to repair or rebuild his cottage. He did not have to pay for coal; there was plenty of turf or firewood to be found on the common. And as for his cottage and small holding, he lived there nearly rent free. Between yeoman, small farmer, and peasant there was little real distinction; both frequently worked together as labourers on the lands of king, abbot, or noble for a daily wage. The fact was, feudalism, with all its faults, as Karl Marx, has well pointed out, encouraged the division of soil among a large number of small proprietors. The more men the feudal lord had upon his estate the greater the number who fought behind his banner and the greater his might as a man of war. But we have spoken of yeomen and peasants working for a wage. Let us see now what these wages were. Professor Thorold Rogers says, speaking of this period:

"The fifteenth century and the first quarter of the sixteenth were the golden age of the English labourer, if we are to interpret the wages he earned with the cost of necessaries of life. . . . The wages of the artisans during the period to which I refer were generally and throughout the year about 6d. a-day. Those of the agricultural labourer were about 4d. I am referring to ordinary artisans and ordinary labourers. Persons who plied a craft in which greater skill was needed, perhaps one which was rarely procurable except from a distance, received more. . . . There is no reason to think that these labourers were paid well because their employment was precarious. Men got just as good wages, in the fifteenth century, whether they were employed for a day or a year. Nor, as I have already observed, were the hours long. It is plain that the day was one of eight hours. Nor was the period of winter wages, when the pay was lessened, considerable, for the short-pay season is, when such a period is specified, only the months of December and January. Sometimes the labourer is paid for every day in the year, though it is certain he did not work on Sundays and the principal holidays. Thus at Windsor, in 1408, four carpenters got 6d. a-day, and six got 5d., for 365 days in the year—i.e., the former receive £9 2s. 6d. for their year's wages, the latter £7 12s. 0d.; the rate per day and the amount for the year being specified in each case. These men were no doubt in the service of the king, and the king, as I shall show presently, was a very good paymaster; but he is not the only person who hires labour on these liberal terms. At York Cathedral six masons got £8 8s. a-year each; six more £6 3s.; and one carpenter gets £7 5s. 4d. This is in 1415, when the prices of labour had not risen to their full amount." (Six Centuries of Work and Wages, vol. ii., pp. 326-328.)

What glorious times, when religious bodies and even kings gave their men seven days pay for six days' work! What do you think of that, postmen, police, sailors, soldiers, and dock-labourers? What do you think of it, you sweated matchmakers, and other workers employed in sweating-factories to produce big dividends for holy men? What do you think of it, sweated tailors, who produce cheap clothes in feverdens for their use? And you, too, agricultural labourers, who toil on the soil to provide these good men with their living in the shape of tithes? Is the Church, or anybody connected with the Church, a good paymaster now? Perhaps we had better ask the sweated authors and authoresses who write religious publications for a "moderate wage"—a very moderate wage: £5 for a good-sized book—for the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge;—the "Christian knowledge" for these authors and authoresses being how to live on air, or, say, visions of heaven, where it is to be hoped they will be adequately remunerated for their pious labours in this wicked world. We fancy, also, the women employed in folding cheap Bibles for certain pious firms might also give a decisive opinion on this point. As to the Queen paying well nowadays—why, everyone knows that Her Majesty's Government is the greatest sweater in this happy land.

But the contemplation of the present times tends to lower your spirits: let us get back to Professor Thorold Rogers and the glorious fifteenth century. Doesn't it make your mouths water, you free British workmen and workwomen? But it appears that high wages and an eight hours day were not the only blessings enjoyed by the workers of this golden age. In addition to high wages, the labourer often got his food as well. Professor Thorold Rogers says:

"Very often the labourer is fed. In this case the cost of maintenance is put down at from 6d. to 8d. a-week. Sometimes the labourer is paid as though he were fed and a further allowance for his board is given him, this probably being paid to some person who has contracted to feed him at a rate. Sometimes the food is given in, and the labourer's wages are paid at the full average. This is especially the case when the labourer is hired by opulent corporations and on their premises. There was always a servants' table in these establishments, and the workman is bidden to it without stint or grudging. I find, for example, at some of the Oxford colleges that ordinary rates are paid and the workman is fed into the bargain. Food is so abundant and so cheap, that it was no great matter to throw it in with the wages."

Thorold Rogers then deals with the condition of the agricultural and unskilled labourers, and also with that of the women workers of the time. Let us note what he says of these, now the most oppressed and sweated of all the labouring classes:

"The agricultural labourer gets about 4d. a-day for his work; but in harvest time, 6d. The practice of paying this person by the day instead of by the piece becomes commoner than it was. . . . The man (homo) who is employed as a help to the thatcher and tiler, and often to the mason, later on to the bricklayer, is paid at the rate of the agricultural labourers in ordinary times, or a little less. This help was sometimes a woman, as was generally the case in the earlier period; and thus it is seen that women's work, when of what we may call an unskilled kind, was equally well paid with that of the men. . . . The full price of a labourer's board was a shilling a-week, often considerably less; his wages were twice or three-times the cost of his maintenance under contract. In 1467 two girls are hired to work, and are paid twopence a-day; they are also boarded, and this put at twopence a-day more. In the same year, at Selborne Priory, in Hampshire, the board of men is put at 2d. and of women at 1½d." (Thorold Rogers: 'Six Centuries of Work and Wages.')

But let us see what the artisan could buy with his sixpence a-day and the unskilled labourer with his fourpence. Professor Thorold Rogers quotes in his 'History of Agriculture and Prices' the following:

"The price of diverse sorts of provisions and fresh Achates, spent in the Priory of Southwick from A° 2 R. Hen. V. to the end of 2 Hen. VI., taken forth of an old parchment book written at the time :

Wheat at 4s. and 5s. 4d. the quarter betwixt both.	Chickens, ½d. to 1d.
Malt from 3s. 4d. to 5s.	Eggs, 25 a penny.
Barley from 3s. 2d. to 4s. 10d.	Cheese, 1 lb. ½d.
Salt, qr., 4s.	Honey, quart, 3d.
Oxen and bulls, 12s. to 16s.	Cider, tun, 10s. to 14s.
Calves, 1s. 4d. to 2s. 8d.	Mallard, 1½d. to 2d.
Hogs for pork or bacon, from 2s. 3d.	Pigs (i.e., sucking), 2½d. to 5d.
Lambs, from 4d. to 8d.	Geese, 2½d. to 5d.
Capons at 3d.	Pigeons, three a penny.
Hens at 2d.	Conies, 2d.
Fresh Congers, 4d. to 1s. 8d.	Butter, 1 lb. 1½d.

Fancy a country labourer having lamb, goose, or capon, or chicken for his Sunday's dinner! Yet we see that was quite possible. Nay, even in the reign of Henry VIII., when the people were being ruthlessly driven off the land to make way for sheep—a sad story we shall have to tell soon—an Act of Parliament of the twenty-fourth year of that noble British monarch, which fixes prices, enacting that “no person shall take for beef or pork above a halfpenny, and for mutton or veal above three-farthings, a pound avoirdupois weight, and less in these place where they are sold for less” also gives us the information that “beef, pork, mutton, and veal” were “the food of the poorer sort.” What do you think of that, you London poor, who only taste meat in the shape of “pieces,” which your forefathers would have disdained as carrion, fit for dogs and swine, but not for men?

But here is some more “respectable evidence.” Those people who may look upon a bourgeois Radical writer as too “advanced,” and therefore untrustworthy, may listen to the opinion of a moderate Whig like Mr. Hallam. In his ‘History of the Middle Ages’ he states that—

“There is an unpleasing remark, which everyone who attends to the subject of prices will be inclined to make, that the labouring classes, especially those engaged in agriculture, were better provided with the means of subsistence in the reign of Edward III. or Henry VI. than they are at present. In the 14th century, Sir John Cullum observes, a Larvestman had 4d. a-day, which enabled him in a week to buy a comb of wheat; but to buy a comb of wheat a man must now (1784) work ten or twelve days. So under Henry VI., if meat was at a farthing and a half a-pound, which I suppose was about the truth, a labourer earning threepence a-day, or eighteenpence a-week, could buy a bushel of wheat a 6s. a qr., and twenty-four pounds of meat, for his family. Several Acts of Parliament regulate wages which might be paid to labourers of different kinds. Thus the Statute of Labourers in 1350 fixed the wages of reapers during harvest at threepence a-day without diet, equal to five shillings at present; that of 23 H. VI. c. 12, in 1444, fixed the reaper's wages at 5d. and those of common workmen in building at 3½d.—equal to 6s. 8d. and 4s. 8d.; that of 11 Hen. VII. c. 22, in 1496, leaves the wages of labourers in harvest as before, but rather increases those of ordinary workmen. . . . I know not why some have supposed that meat was a luxury seldom obtained by the labourer. Doubtless he could not have procured as much as he pleased. But now the greater cheapness of cattle as compared with corn, it seems to follow that a more considerable portion of his ordinary diet consisted of animal food than at present. It was remarked by Sir John Fortescue that the English lived more upon animal diet than the French, and it was natural to ascribe their superior strength and courage to this cause.” (Middle Ages, vol. iii., p. 371-3.)

Mr. Hallam as an orthodox Liberal is naturally not anxious to paint the condition of the labourers in too glowing colours. Our readers will notice that he takes his prices from Acts of Parliament passed by the masters to keep wages down, and not from old records of wages actually paid. It is notorious; in fact, political economists of all schools admit it, that all these statutes fixing wages were total failures, and that prices and wages were always higher than those fixed in these Acts of Parliament. So Mr. Hallam's grudging testimony as to the prosperity of the English labourers is only valuable because it comes from the enemy. Even he, like Macaulay and other writers of his school, is forced to admit very much against the grain that the people in the “barbarous Middle Ages” were much better off than under the beneficent rule of the Whig capitalists. Mr. Hallam has mentioned Sir John Fortescue, Lord Chancellor of England in the reign of Henry VI., who, while an exile in France through the triumph of the Yorkist party in England, wrote a book for the instruction of Edward of Lancaster, the son of that monarch entitled “De Ladibus Legum Angliæ” (Praise of the Laws of England), in which he gives some valuable contemporary testimony as to the condition of the people at that time. He says:

“The King of England cannot alter laws or make new ones, without the express consent of the whole kingdom in Parliament assembled. Every inhabitant is at his liberty fully to use or enjoy whatever his farm produceth, the fruits of the earth, the increase of his flock and the like; all improvement he makes whether of his own proper industry, or of those he retains in his service, are his own to use and to enjoy without the let, interruption, or denial of any. If he be in any wise injured or oppressed he shall have his amends and satisfactions against the party offending. Hence it is that the inhabitants are rich in gold, silver, and in all the necessaries and conveniences of life. They drink no water unless at certain times, upon a religious score and by way of doing penance. They are fed in great abundance, with all sorts of flesh and fowl, of which they have plenty everywhere; they are clothed throughout in good woollens, their bedding and other furniture in their houses are of wood and that in great store. They are also well provided with all sorts of household goods and necessary implements for husbandry. Every one, according to his rank, hath all things which conduce to make life easy and happy.”

Why the people were so well off perhaps appears in another statement of Fortescue's—they were the most riotous, rebellious, and independent race in Europe. They also had a very revolutionary method of preventing huge accumulations of wealth in the hands of the rich.

Fortescue, who was a bit of a Jingo, cites this as a proof of national superiority. He says that more Englishmen were hanged for robbery in a single year than Frenchmen in seven, and that “if an Englishman be poor and see another having riches which may be taken from him, he will not spare to do so.” Our upper and middle-classes are fond of boasting now-a-days, that English people are quite tame and law-abiding, and not like those revolutionary French. How nations do alter to be sure, and how upper-class opinion has changed from the days when a Lord High Chancellor could boast of the fact that “more Englishmen were hanged for robbery in a single year than Frenchmen in seven.” The natural habit of taking from the rich to give to the poor certainly discouraged what Marx calls “capitalistic accumulation,” and kept the poor but not the rich in a state of great prosperity.

Such was life in the fifteenth century; food was abundant and cheap, wages high, work light and pleasant, for you must remember the men did not work hard during their eight hours day but took it leisurely. Every one knows, who has talked with an old workman, that even down to the present century the workman was not driven like a slave as he is now, but “took it easy.” So it was then, but rather more so, for besides this, there were numerous holidays ordered by the church, and these days were given up to enjoyment and merriment. The lasses danced on the village green, while the men and lads shot at butts or played with the quarter-staff, and practised all those warlike exercises which made the people feared by the nobles. “Englishmen were very prone to defend their rights, real or supposed, by insurrection,”¹ says Professor Thorold Rogers; and he further says, “I believe that under ordinary circumstances the means of life were more abundant during the Middle Ages than they are under our modern experience. There was, I am convinced, no extreme poverty.”² Yes, because Englishmen were men and not craven slaves, crouching like curs at the frown of their masters. Be men again; show that you have the courage of your fathers, and we will bring back the golden age and make it impossible for landlord or capitalist to make us slaves again.

D. J. NICOLL.

THE “SEX-SLAVERY” FAD.

THERE are so many fads becoming confused with the economic question that it would be discouraging if it were not ludicrous. The most prominent among these many fads just now in vogue is the “sex-slavery” fad. But this fad, like all other fads, will have its day. “Sex-slavery” is due to the present false iniquitous economic system. To illustrate: Here is a family of grown-up children, say a boy and a girl, who have just passed school. The girl has received as high honours as the boy, so there is no difference on this score. The girl is as frolicsome as the boy; her cheeks aglow with health. Let us watch their lives from now on. The boy joins base-ball clubs, gymnasiums, and engages in occupations which develop muscles, wears clothing which permit the free action of the body and limbs. What becomes of the girl? She laces her frame, uses cosmetics—the statistician informs us that the females of America expend yearly several millions of dollars for cosmetics!—pours over silly “love-stories,” enters occupations of a sedentary nature, and works too long hours. The result is inevitable. Pale-faced, hollow-eyed, languid, vapid-minded, ever on the look-out for a “mash,” she finally succeeds in finding one—a strong, vigorous, strapping fellow, with veins full of rich, red fluid. One or two children come. The woman is used up. She is, in the language of certain sentimental reformers, a “sex-slave”; he a “brute” because he still has desires and insists on having them gratified by his legal spouse. Do you ask me if this isn't bad? Yes, awful. But suppose he went elsewhere—out of the bonds of matrimony—would he not be pointed at also as a “beast”? Who are those we find lashing themselves into ecstatic fits about “sex-slavery” and rummaging around in real or imaginary bed-chambers, and pulling out the real or imaginary horrid ghosts? Are they the vigorous and healthy—those whom the life current courses through their veins, where the electric currents vibrate, showing the passions are at play and indicating the demands of nature regardless of sex? No, it is not this class who are troubling themselves, but as a rule it is those whom the eternal laws of nature have made such ravages upon their systems that their sexuality is of a very limited quantity and a rather uncertain quality. These seem to think that all you have to do is to make women “sexually free”—whatever that may mean—and then the world is saved and safe.

I have a specific for “sex-slavery,” and I do not intend to patent it either. Here it is: Let women live according to nature's laws; keep the blood circulating; don't lace in the waist, lungs and chests; take plenty of physical exercise; keep the mind healthy by reading healthful literature; use your influence to make divorce as easy to obtain as marriage, and above all, work for your economic emancipation, because on this alone rests your whole case.

LUCY E. PARSONS,
in Chicago ‘Freedom.’

THE DAWN OF DAY.—Yes, here as there, light is coming into the world; men love not darkness, they do love light. . . . “Some Chivalry of Labour,” some noble humanity and practical Divineness of Labour, will yet be realised on this earth. Or why will; why do we pray to heaven without setting our own shoulder to the wheel? The Present, if it will have the Future accomplished, shall itself commence. Thou who prophesieth, thou who believest, begin thou to fulfil.—Carlyle's Past and Present.

THE SOCIAL HOUSE THAT JACK BUILT.

THIS is the house that Jack built.

This is the nine hundred millions of wealth
That's forced from the worker, or taken by stealth,
In the national house that Jack built.

This is the worker, tattered and torn,
That of the result of his labour is shorn,
The toiling, moiling slave of the "ring,"
The abject adorer of lord and king,
Producer of nine hundred millions of wealth
That he's dispossessed of by force and stealth,
And that ought to be used for the life and the health
Of the labouring house that Jack built.

This is the wife of the working-man,
Who lays out the coppers as well as she can,
And suckles her children in sorrow and fear,
With never a holiday year after year,
The anxious ignorant drudge of a drudge,
Who never can rise from poverty's sludge,
Having married the worker, tattered and torn,
Who wishes sometimes he'd never been born,
The down-trodden, thick-headed, slave of the "ring,"
Who cringes to plutocrat, placeman, and king,
While his muscle and brain create the wealth
That gives him no power for joy and health,
Since it's taken away by the force and the stealth
Of thieves in the house that Jack built.

This is the youth, and likewise the maid,
Who start life hopeful and undismayed,
Buoyant and hearty, they've no misgiving,
But that they can earn a capital living ;
But find, when they've tried for years to get on,
That the chances against are a hundred to one,
That from worry and want they never may budge,
And perhaps to the workhouse must take the last trudge,
Being robbed, and reduced, and left forlorn,
In livery which they detest and scorn ;
To life, in spite of their shame, to cling,
Who ought to be blithe as birds on the wing,
Having toiled their lives long making the wealth,
That property-leeches have sucked by stealth,
And will waste in destroying the life and the health
Of the flower of the house that Jack built.

This is the "boss," the employer of labour,
Who lives by the sweat and blood of his neighbour,
Higgling with riggers, and "bulls" and "bears,"
Who manipulate consols, stocks, and shares,
Grinding the white slave haggard and worn,
The human sheep, that is yearly shorn
Of nearly a thousand millions of wealth
Which contemptible drones acquire by stealth,
But that yet shall be used for the joy and health
Of the bees in the house that Jack built.

This is the banker, the lord of the dross,
Who lends to the boss, and lives by the loss
That the worker sustains, who must pay the per cent,
Of whatever the flint-hearted Shylock has lent,
Who to squeeze a per-centage never does fail,
Causing the poor to groan and to wail,
Building the piles of "bulls" and of "bears,"
Till they've plundered enough to become millionaires,
Exploiting the white slave tattered and torn,
Who must rise and rebel upon some fine morn,
And no longer submit to be slave of the "ring,"
But attack the usurer, jobber, and king,
Determined to die or to win back the wealth,
He's been dispossessed of by force and stealth,
To the loss of his freedom and joyous health,
And place in the house that Jack built.

This is the landlord, the primary thief,
That with banker and boss shall be yet brought to grief.
Who is made a statesman the further to cheat,
Taking ten pounds a foot for the pave of the street,
Who bribes the priest with a share in the feast
To persuade the worker he's blessed and not fleeced,
That it's God's design to so order the hive
That the drones are the fittest and must survive,
That the poor should abstain from children and wife
And think on another and happier life,
As suffering here in the hell of the slum
Will be compensated in kingdom come :
That struggling is good, and the best thing to do
Is to live upon folks, or let them live on you ;
For the laws of the Kosmo's are fixed, and ordain
That robbery's right, and its vain to complain.
You must still go on toiling for blue-blooded varlets,
Mashers and flunkies, and high-flying harlots,
Lords of the bedchamber, gold-sticks-in-waiting,
Spies and ambassadors, fawning and fétting,
Canting, false-witnessing, editing scribes,
War-breeding generals, and takers of bribes ;
Still must you groan and sweat for the shares
Of asses, and foxes, and "bulls," and "bears,"
Who keep you in misery, tattered and torn,
Cut off from your wine, and oil, and corn,
Your land, and whatever springs from it—the wealth
Which cannon, and truncheon, and legal stealth

Forbid you to use for the life and the health
And the peace of the house that Jack built.

This is the lawyer—for shortness called "liar" ;
No night-walker fouling her form in the mire
But shines when compared with the pandering wretch—
The plunderer's hack, the tyrant's Jack Ketch—
Who robs without risk, and cares not a straw
For fair play and justice, but only for law,
Which crushes the wage-slave, tattered and torn,
Who's beginning to feel that it shouldn't be borne ;
That lawyer and law-maker back up the stealth
From the workers of full two-thirds of their wealth,
Which is needed for joyous and perfect health
In the hapless house that Jack built.

This is the priest, who would think he was "green"
To live like his Master the poor Nazarene—
The priest, who says "Seek not for riches down here,"
While getting himself some thousands a-year :
A hireling who preaches peace where there is none,
And seeing the evil done under the sun,
Is afraid on account of the loaves and the fishes,
And sticks to his dear, dainty flesh-pots and dishes ;
Retained by the boss, and bribed by the dross,
A reproach and a scorn to the faith of the Cross ;
Bamboozling the poor sheep fleeced and torn,
Who may go to the devil when old and outworn—
Victims of merciless greed and stealth,
On every hand plundered of hard-earned wealth,
Debarred of the sweetness, the joy, and the health
Of a prosperous house that Jack built.

This is the humbug they call politician,
Ensnoring himself in an easy position,
Who first cries reform, but who finally "rats,"
And for sweets of office throws over us flats ;
Who damns, when he's out, the other side's sin,
But plays the same fiddle himself when he's in,
Facing both ways with an ease that at least
Out-Herods "by many chalks" even the priest ;
He'll swear, with more lies than his confrere the lawyer,
To make earth a heaven, if you make him "top-sawyer ;"
Yet bribes the wire-pullers, all running races
For pensions and entrances into high places,
Sniggering meanwhile at the poor voting fool
Who gives him the power to rack-rent and rule—
The free-born British elector,—the blind,
Who neither sees through, before, nor behind,
Expecting the wolf to be good to the lamb,
And will not behold the dodging and sham,
Thinking that hope should not be foresworn,
Though he's hungry and desperate morn after morn,
And so must remain till there be no such thing
As jobber, or robber, or lord, or king :
No more pillaging mis-named rent,
But the land for all, as common-sense meant ;
No more swindling of neighbour by neighbour ;
No more profit extorted from labour ;
No longer a fear of getting the "sack" ;
No creeping for power behind a man's back ;
No more "sweating," no more competing ;
No more shoddy, nor other such cheating ;
No more oppressing of one by another,
But thorough agreement of brother with brother :
The capital common, and masters none,
And goods galore for everyone
Who manfully wishes to take a share
In the small burden everyone able should bear,
When we've throttled the force, and stopped the stealth,
And things are used for the life and the health,
The leisure and pleasure, and culture and wealth
Of the whole of the House that Jack built.

THOS. BARCLAY.

THE SCOTCH FREE CHURCH AND SOCIALISM.

In the busy little manufacturing town of Beith in Ayrshire an active Socialist propaganda has been going on since the beginning of the year. Comrade Brown, now of Sheffield, was responsible for the inauguration of the movement, and during eighteen months of quiet work he made many converts among the cabinet-makers of "Chairopolis." Most wonderful of all to relate, the Socialists have invaded the "sacred" precincts of the Free Church—the most straight-laced of all the Scottish churches. On Monday, the 3rd of November, two young and ardent Socialists debated, in the Church Guild, before a large audience, on the best Socialistic ideals. Mr. John Hamilton pinned his faith to Bellamy's system ; while Mr. James Anderson adversely criticised 'Looking Backward,' and offered as an alternative scheme village communes, with home industries, rendered possible and profitable through the electric conveyance of energy from large waterfalls or steam-engines. The discussion which followed was the most spirited and the longest sustained ever held in the Guild. On Monday the 10th the attack on the Church citadel was renewed by Mr. Harry Brown, in an essay on "The Moral Aspects of Socialism." The discussion was again keen and all for social improvement. To show that working men are not the only converts here, I may state that half-a-dozen scholars, including four M.A.'s, took part in the first night's discussion, and two of the latter returned to the charge on the second night while another sent a letter of apology for absence, regretting that some people had understood his remarks of the previous night to imply that he was less advanced than was really the case. The seed planted by comrade Brown is now shooting up and spreading its branches over the community like a green bay tree. The Beith Socialists are ambitious enough to take up the unusual task of trying to convert the churches, and, Quixotic though the task may seem, they are confident of a measure of success.

The COMMONWEAL is the official organ of the Socialist League; but, unless definitely so announced by the Editors, no article is to be taken as expressing in more than a general way the views of the League as a body. In accordance with the Manifesto and Statement of Principles of the League, the COMMONWEAL is an exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. On minor differences of opinion the widest freedom of discussion is maintained. As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to their position in the paper.

Articles and letters dealing with any phase of the social problem are invited and will meet with earnest consideration. They must be written on one side of the paper only, and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication. MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope accompanies them.

Advertisements can only be inserted if unobjectionable in all particulars. Scale of charges and special quotations may be obtained from the Manager.

Remittances from abroad must be made by International Money Order.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

CORRESPONDENTS who order literature should prepay postage, or state if they wish their parcels to be sent per rail or carrier, "carriage forward."

To CONTRIBUTORS—Workmen could help us greatly by sending in accounts of capitalist tyranny and sweating in London and the provinces. We want the names of the sweaters. Those who write must send us their name and address, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee of good faith. We shall not fear to publish the truth.—EDS.

THE "COMMONWEAL."

Whilst thanking the many friends and comrades who have volunteered their sympathy and help during the present crisis, we wish to assure all that no efforts will be spared to resume the Weekly Issue at the earliest opportunity. We by no means despair of being able to do so if our comrades will but rally round at this juncture. We regret as much as our comrades do the disappointment and inconvenience which even the temporary suspension of a Weekly Issue entails. We also ask the indulgence of Subscribers and Correspondents for any delays that occur in forwarding answers, as the task of obtaining New Premises and Removal from present address is a heavy one. We are confident that if all do their share of work in helping, that we shall take up a stronger and more durable position in the future than we have held in the past. The First Number of the New Monthly will appear early in December.—EDS.

NOTES.

Our friends will note that several comrades do not agree with comrade Morris as to revolutionary policy. In common with these comrades, I also think that Morris is mistaken in imagining, as he seems to do, that Socialists have no other task but to educate the people. Unfortunately, before the task of education can even be begun the agitators, or "disturbance-breeders" if you please, must be at work.

Let us look back a bit and take the earlier Socialist agitation in this country. What first drew general attention to our doctrines? Lectures on Scientific Socialism? They were excellent, doubtless; far be it from me to under-value them; but they did not make much noise in public, nor did the people come in large numbers to hear them. No; if the only Socialists had been those of the armchair and the study, Socialism would not have made the impression it has at the present time. After all, was it not the "blatant agitators" at street corners who translated the thoughts of the scientists, poets, and philosophers into the language of the people, and made Socialism popular? Free-speech fights, unemployed meetings, the Trafalgar Square riots of '86 and '87, the great strikes of '89—was it not these events which drew public attention to the new ideas? I believe that is the general opinion.

And were not all these events the work of men who in many cases might not have a thorough knowledge of the "law of economic rent," and who had not yet mastered all the mysteries of Marx's 'Capital'?—I wonder how many educated people can put their hands on their hearts and truly say they have. Did not their preaching stir up crowds still more ignorant, but who had an idea they were hungry, and that knew by bitter experience the evils of the present system, who smashed windows, sacked shops, and thereby got an audience for even scientific and educational Socialism?

Morris has mentioned Edward Bellamy's 'Looking Backward.' I wonder how many people would have waded through that extremely dull and stupid work if it had not been for the "disturbance-breeders" in London and Chicago. And is not the popularity of the Fabian Essays and numerous other educational works due to the same cause? Would they have sold so well if it had not been for the men who have done the rough and dirty work in the highways and byways of our great towns and cities? I do not under-value educational Socialism. I see the necessity of large numbers of the people understanding what Socialism really is before the revolution can be accomplished; but I think on the other hand that there is a tendency on the part of many men who have been gifted by nature and society to disparage the work of those who have not been so fortunate. Let them remember that the agitators and "disturbance-breeders" are quite as necessary as the learned and cultured Socialist, for without the help of the former the ideas of the latter would often be fruitless.

I frankly confess that the disgusting spectacle of sanctimonious hypocrisy presented by some of the "lights" of English Society during the past week, is even more horrible than the frank cruelty and brutality of our African filibusters. The cruelty and brutality is real, but the present howling outcry raised by Pecksniff, Stiggins, Chadband and Co. is not. The very people who have been silent over the African Horrors, where there was something to shriek about, are now yelling themselves hoarse over the case of Mr. Parnell.

Any one to hear these people talk, would imagine that Mr. Parnell had committed some new crime. Of course, the fact that "Society's" favoured sons are purifying the lusts of flesh in Cleveland Street, and encouraging the spread of "Civilisation and Christianity" by flogging niggers to death and assisting at cannibal feasts in Africa, perfectly qualifies it to raise a yell of virtuous horror at an act of commonplace adultery which has injured no one, but, on the contrary, has freed two people from a yoke too heavy to bear.

We note also that Mr. Stead is to the front in the cause of "morality and virtue." Mr. Stead, in the same cause, a few years ago flooded the town with every nasty story he could collect in the fashionable brothels of London, and thereby has done more harm to "public-morality" than even Mr. Parnell. Yet Mr. Stead leads the chorus. "Morality and Religion" must be in a very bad way indeed when Stead is its champion.

If Stead, Price Hughes and Co. are really in earnest, why not strike a little higher? Why not deal a crusade against certain members of the Royal family, who are notorious "evil livers"? Why does not the Vigilance Society set their spies and keyhole reporters to dog the steps of the "little bald man in red"? or, better still, watch his beloved son in his rumoured wanderings towards certain dens of curious vice? Then let Stead and Stiggins, Price Hughes and Chadband, Pecksniff and Parker raise a howl against "such persons ever ascending the throne of England." Their ancestors, the Puritans they are so fond of talking about, would have done this. But then, the Puritans were men; their "descendants" are only scandalous old women.

N.

We have received a request to give "as extended a notice as possible to an appeal for funds" made by the Young Women's Christian Asso; ciation, for the furtherance of their work in establishing "Homes" (sic), Bible-classes, and Tract distribution, etc. The appeal is written in a perfervid strain. "Have you thought," it says, "of the great army of factory girls? In London, about 150,000 of them are ill-fed and without any true home; they are brought up amid drunkenness, wickedness, and wretchedness. . . . Many of them earn only a few shillings per week, yet they must toil on often having to support a widowed mother. . . . Many a girl, ill-clad, badly shod, has to tramp on a wet morning from East to West in the chill air to their occupation!" and we are asked whether we have thought of the long hours and the weary round of the same occupation.

Yes, we have, and the thought of it makes us bitter enemies of the system which demands from our women folk their health, nay, their lives, in order to obtain bread. We know that the physical deterioration of our women workers strikes at the very future of the race, and we are astonished at the cool audacity which prompted the request to us to advertise a paltry palliative scheme, consisting of Flower Mission Bible-classes, backed up by thousands of pounds given towards these objects by a horde of titled and untitled parasites upon Labour, whose luxurious idleness is enjoyed at the expense of the tired work-women. When the women workers of England bestir themselves to obtain Justice, the need for Charity doles accompanied with the inevitable snuffle of cant will disappear; and so also will disappear the list of idle donors.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"WHERE ARE WE NOW?"

The article headed "Where Are We Now?" by William Morris, which appeared in the Commonweal for Nov. 15th, has been read by many of us in Sheffield with a shiver—as if a bucket of cold water had been poured unexpectedly down our backs. The effort to cool us is very palpable, but there is really so much effort about it that the effect has only been to awaken a decidedly warm reaction.

It certainly seems to me that our comrade has a strange conception of the social struggle we are engaged in, when he lectures us as if we were merely conspirators seeking to overthrow the authorities and establish ourselves in their places. In such case we could understand our leaders warning us to avoid such methods as "partial, necessarily futile, inconsequent revolt or riot against the authorities," as Morris says. Such methods, we know, do not suit "leaders" or mere political parties, who are seeking their own advantage; but it is a very different case with the workers engaged in the social war, who are really in the position of slaves desirous to revolt against their masters rather than of soldiers in the ranks of an army.

I must say that I think it is a gross abuse of language to state, as Morris does, that the authorities are our absolute masters. The slave who prefers death to a continuance of his slavery cannot be called a slave any longer, and if his example be followed by his fellows there is an end of servitude. This is the position in which the workers are to-day, and every blow, no matter how struck at their masters, must benefit them. It surely cannot injure them as a class, though some of them may lose their lives.

But it must be remembered that in estimating our position, bad as the condition of the wage-slave is, it is infinitely more hopeful than that of the chattel slave, and much of this is due to the very insecurity of his existence. He is forced to consider his condition, as the well-fed and well-cared for chattel slave was not, and he is even encouraged by his masters to talk and think of freedom as his right. We have then much better ground to work on, and much more encouragement in our efforts than if we had only chattel slaves to deal with.

There are, under such conditions, a thousand simple methods of action much more effective and natural than that which Morris has in his mind, which seems to be a conspiracy with numbers of men "who do not know what Socialism is" enlisted in the service. Strange enough, too, he really thinks they might possibly be successful, but he says "we are not ready for such a change as that." For my part, I think that it would not be anything to be frightened at if it could be thus effected. It really would not be such a great change after all.

But the change which we seek to make is very different, and must be brought about by individual action, or by the action of individual groups, for by that means alone can slaves obtain a freedom worth having and be educated in the exercise of it. By that means alone can it be done in fact, and in every hungry man we will find a recruit who will very soon learn what Communism and Anarchy are if he has not known them before.

Every rising then, or even riot, of wage slaves against their masters, though, as Morris says, it would at first "leave them slaves still," would not leave them so much enslaved as they were before it, for the hold of their masters on them would either be relaxed, or they would be forced to use such measures of repression as would only have the effect of intensifying the struggle and leading to more violent efforts in the future.

For us, then, however partial it may be, there is no such thing as "necessarily futile, inconsequent revolt." Every man who openly declares himself a rebel against our present atrocious system of society, and proves that he is so by doing something to show his contempt for property, authority, or law; any one who asserts his own dignity or that of his class, or makes it more difficult for the land-grabber or money-grubber to live in peace by perpetrating some act of violence, is waging active war upon Society, and is doing a thousand times more to make Socialists than one who is merely lecturing or writing. Of course, the most effective action will be done by those who are our comrades and do such acts consciously; but even the ordinary criminal is an unconscious revolutionist, and is doing good work for us. If then, as Morris says, our business is to make Socialists, he certainly has not shown us the best way, and he has tried to discourage those who are beginning to find out the most effective way.

I think it is clear from what I have said that the struggle in which we are engaged is one that entirely excludes such Fabian tactics as Morris recommends. It excludes them from its nature. Let those, then, who can speak and write do so by all means, but let us clearly understand that this is not the only way to make Socialists, nor by any means the best, and that it is absurd to think of stopping at it even now. The best way, on the contrary, both to teach and to make a beginning of really revolutionary action, is to have the courage of our opinions, and by acts as well as words show our contempt for what is called private property and every institution based on it.

Every man should take what he requires of the wealth around him, using violence whenever necessary, and when dragged before his enemies he should tell them plainly that he has done what he knows to be right and what he is proud of having done. His example will soon find imitators, and in a very short time the people will find it quite right and proper, and only wonder it was not done before to provide food for empty bellies; and can any Socialist say that this action is not justified by his principles.

This will be the first step and the first battle. We will have to fight for it, for we know that our enemies will not take in a Christian or Fabian spirit the attempt to deprive them of their power to plunder us, though we are expected by so many to submit, or only mildly expostulate, in that spirit.

J. CREAGHE.

Our comrade Morris's article of November 15th with the above title must, I am sure, impress all readers of Commonweal—more especially those who are active propagandists—as calling for serious meditation before arriving at any conclusion. Being myself a speaker and one who has certainly seen as much as any other speaker the condition and position of Socialism in London and the provinces, I feel bound to try and answer our comrade.

I agree with our comrade that the result of our past seven years' work is not exactly that which we had pictured to ourselves. Yet, as he says, we have done something, and that something is, we have drawn the attention of the masses, as well as the classes, towards Socialism; and though the workers who have heard our teaching have not gone exactly as we might have wished, yet they are to-day in thought where many of us were a few short years ago.

Our comrade admits that the principles of Socialism are being understood, and that the workers are not going to stop at merely being a little better off. That being our opinion also, it seems to me that the time has arrived when another step forward ought to be taken. Our comrade seems to deprecate riots and revolts, but how else are the masses to be prepared, how are they to receive that necessary education in revolutionary action, if they are to wait, and never make an attempt to strike a blow at this accursed system until the majority are converted to our way of thinking? We who, like our comrade, refuse to have any dealings with parliamentary warfare, must, when questioned as to how we are going to attain our object, have some answer to give; and it seems to me the only answer that can be given by us is that at the first favourable opportunity we will strike a blow against our present masters and the system which upholds them. To what result this course will lead must be left for time to reveal; but this may be fearlessly stated now, that it is a mistake to be too moderate in our language, and we should not care so much as to what others may think. When the matter in hand is to overthrow a rotten system like the one we live under, we should not hesitate, but seize any and every opportunity to strike pitilessly at the system, and leave to time and experience the task of modifying or improving upon our labours.

Our comrade seems to regret the fact that no working man has stepped forward as a leader, and thus qualify himself to become a great historical figure; but the very fact that amongst us there is not a leader, is (I think) not only good, but perhaps the very best, proof of the genuineness of our teaching, which is, and must be, "No master, high or low"—for, to my mind, leadership implies mastership; though I have no doubt in my own mind that when the time comes there will spring up in our midst, not one, but many who will be able to grapple with the question of the reorganisation of society. This our comrade himself admits, and I believe admits it readily. He, however, seems to think that our very success has dimmed the ideals which first led us on. I hope not—nay, I feel confident, in my own mind, that instead of our ideals being dimmed, it is those very ideals which urge us forward to the attempt at the realisation of our life's dream. He seems further to think that our masters could easily put us down. There I join issue with him. I feel confident that a few determined men—and when I say determined, I mean men who are prepared to do or die in the attempt—could paralyse the forces of our masters, providing they were acquainted with the power which nineteenth century civilisation has placed within their reach. The monopolist press of the world has advised gattlings, hand-grenades, strychnine, arsenic, and lead, instead of bread, for the starving workers seeking to better their condition. This has been urged by the law-and-order press, and everywhere there are signs of the bloody conflict which is about to take place between the workers and their masters; and are we to see that conflict approaching without warning our fellow-workers of the consequences unless they are prepared for the struggle? And how, I ask, are they to become prepared for the struggle, unless we—to whom a very large section of the people look—tell them or show them how to meet this warfare of the capitalist? It is no use crying Peace, Peace when there is no peace. Therefore let us recognise that we are at war, and that we are criminals even now in the eyes of the law; that hitherto it has been a war of words; in future this war will have to be one of deeds, whenever opportunity occurs to abolish our slavery. It is always comparatively easy to be a slave, because capitalism, like despotism, only strikes at those who stand up in opposition to it, while it is gentle and forbearing towards the tame and submissive. Knowing, as I think I do, that our comrade is neither tame nor submissive, the wonder to me is that he differs with us upon the matter.

Science has placed within our reach the means to achieve our freedom: are we, then, to refuse to stretch out our hand and grasp the weapon so easy of attainment? Those who make half revolutions simply dig their own graves—so said St. Just. Well, seek to avoid making a half revolution, and prepare the people's minds at once for what is sure to come. Our masters will not much longer tolerate the teachings which have led to the great upheaval of labour during recent years, but will try and teach the masses a lesson in the use of physical force, which must be answered—as it only can be answered, to be consistent—by force in return. Our comrade thinks that our masters are yet too powerful for us to resist by this means. I think otherwise; for the army, on the showing of the commanding officers, is more or less permeated by Socialist ideas; and even though they (the army) do attack us, as in the case of Southampton, I hold the opinion that the use of scientific force would have the effect of destroying a thousand as against one on our side. This is an advantage not to be overlooked. General Sheridan of the American army said "arms are worthless," and that dynamite was a lately discovered article of tremendous power, and such was its nature that people could carry it around in the pockets of their clothing with perfect safety to themselves, and by means of it they could destroy whole cities and whole armies. Gunpowder in the fifteenth century marked an era in the world's history. "Dynamite is man's best and last friend; it emancipates the world from the domineering of the few over the many, because all government in the last resort is violence, all law in the last resort is force. Everything is based on force. Force is the law of the universe, force is the law of nature; and this newly discovered force makes all men equal, and therefore free." So said our comrade Parsons, and so say I. I hold, therefore, in conclusion, that the answer to force used by our masters must be the use of force by ourselves. This does not prevent me in the meantime preaching the ideals of Socialism which I hold; nor will it, for preach I will as long as I can and am allowed to do so; but when I am not allowed, and an attempt is made to crush me by force, I know my answer to it, and hope others will also learn what their answer ought to be. We must make war—open war, if necessary—upon this accursed system, which grinds us to the ground to-day.

SHOP ASSISTANTS' UNION.

SIR,—Kindly allow me, through the columns of your valuable paper, to make a public apology to all trade-unionists, clubs, and others who may have purchased tickets for the benefit at the Royalty Theatre, Dean Street, Soho, in aid of the funds of the Shop Assistants' Union; as, after carefully making all arrangements and having over 2,000 tickets out, the above theatre is suddenly closed through some unforeseen circumstances; and as we are constantly receiving letters asking for money to be returned and explanation of same, we take this opportunity of explaining to all friends who may have purchased tickets; and to assure them that we are not in any way responsible for any inconvenience they may have been put to, and that all monies will be returned on application to 8 Featherstone Buildings, W.C., or Branches.

It is possible that some arrangement may even now be made to have those tickets which remain out honoured at a later date.—Yours truly,

A. MUSSETT, Hon. Sec.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

ITALY.

Some weeks ago I gave some official statistics of the unemployed in this land of "constitutional liberty." Here are some more facts and figures, published by the Roman Statistical Institute. Two hundred thousand workers lodge in "absolutely insanitary" cellars. Nine thousand dwell in caves scooped out of rocks. In 1,700 parishes people only eat bread on holidays; and in 4,695 parishes no meat is eaten. Sixty-three per cent. Italians can neither read nor write. "Yet doubtless," as the Charleville Emancipation says, "the King of Italy and his Prime Minister, when they have well eaten and well drunk, firmly believe that Italy is happy."

SPAIN.

The Madrid Socialista for November 14 gives a prominent place to a tribute to our Chicago comrades. This is a sign of grace in a "Social Democratic" print. I am wrong perhaps in styling the "Spanish Workmen's Party" Social Democratic. In this very number of El Socialista the phrase is repudiated. However, the "Workmen's Party," although calling itself "Socialist" and "revolutionary," believes in parliamentary action and looks forward to majority rule. Without entering upon nice distinctions, that is what we here understand by "Social Democratic." Our Anarchist comrades in Madrid duly kept the anniversary of the murders.

A large Anarchist meeting was held on the 9th at Bilbao to celebrate our comrades' slaughter. As it made the local correspondent of El Socialista very angry, we may conclude it was successful.

Accounts of similar celebrations are coming in from all parts of the Peninsula. At Barcelona, as might be expected, there was an especially striking commemoration.

In the Barcelona Productor for November 13 "R. M." pursues his study of "Communism, Individualism, and Collectivism," and endeavours to show that Collectivist Anarchists are really at one with Individualist Anarchists, and that Communism is the enemy both should unite against. He seems to attach altogether too much importance to the tiny Anglo-American Individualist side-movement. This probably arises from his taking the Individualists at their own valuation as given in their journals. Collectivists or Communists, we should do well to remember what our comrade Malatesta said at our Revolutionary Conference last August, that we are both at one as to what is to be done immediately—viz., to seize property and put it in common by means of a tumultuous revolution.

UNITED STATES.

The Kaweah Colony in California is passing through an acute crisis, and may possibly come to final grief. The present writer cannot profess to regret this. The Colony is founded upon entirely false principles—the principles of Governmental Collectivism laid down in such books as Gronlund's 'Co-operative Commonwealth.' Provision is made for bureaucracy at every turn, and, instead of giving to each according to his needs, a system of payment by "time-checks" is adopted, which must speedily bring in all the inequalities of the outside world. An official notice in the Kaweah Commonwealth informs us that "Kaweah Colony is neither an Anarchist or a Free Love Colony, and persons of that turn of thought are not desired, nor will they be received as members. . . . We have laws in Kaweah, but we make them ourselves. Once made, until changed, they must be obeyed." This has the true ring of "law and order." "I, Edward etc. Bradford" could not be more peremptory. It is not wonderful under these circumstances that differences should soon arise between the bureaucrats and some, at any rate, of the workers. A society pretending to be Socialist and which yet believes in laws, officials, property marriage, unequal retribution, and (as one of the writers in the Kaweah Commonwealth expresses it) the "fatherhood of God" (whatever that may mean) is deservedly foredoomed to failure. May one not perhaps add that all socialistic experiments are mistakes? Instead of a few hundred enthusiasts departing into the wilderness, would it not be better that they should remain with us and help us to take from the masters their stolen wealth and change the face of the whole world?

Last week I said something of the "outrages" on the New York Central, attributed to the "Knights of Labour." It now appears that the supposed Knights who were arrested and made confessions were not Knights at all, but "Pinkerton" detectives, paid and bribed by the railroad company. This rests upon the admissions of the wretched men themselves. After this, the suggestion of our comrade Parsons in his speech, that one of these vile Pinkertons may have thrown the Haymarket bomb, will not seem so far-fetched.

R. W. B.

THE CAUSES OF GREAT REVOLUTIONS.

In the long run no people are governed better than they deserve to be. He who will read the history of all people and all times will read of many republics. There have been aristocratic republics as well as democratic. Some in which might finally became right. It was so in the ancient Greek and Roman, so in the city-republics of the Middle Ages. Many republics were ruled by the few nobles. Some were ruled by "councils" and some by tyrants; some by consuls and some by doges, and even by kings, such as Sparta. Rome under the Cæsars continued to be called a republic, and even the French coins of 1805 have the words "Napoleon Empereur" on one side, with "Republique Francaise" on the other.

The ancient Carthaginians were a trading people not unlike the genuine Americans of to-day. They were not over fond of manual labour. For their hard work they employed foreigners. For their armies they simply furnished the commanders. They accumulated great wealth, became opulent, extravagant, and effeminate, living in royal luxuriousness, looking down upon their foreign labouring element. Then one day these foreigners arose in their wrath. Who was to take the place of the "workers" became the great question. Where was the native "after-growth" to take the place of the "strikers"—aye, even of the fighters in their armies? The natives were unfit for hard work; there was no "after-growth," strong and vigorous, among them, and so Carthage, the strongest power of the then known world, had to succumb to the Italian free state of Rome, with its strong and vigorous constituency.

In the very zenith of its prosperity and power, the Roman Republic, after the complete destruction of Carthage, Rome's only rival, in turn became the victim of its own wealth and splendour. The City of Rome, having sprung from a mere town of brick, grew to be a city of marble palaces. It could boast of four hundred and twenty temples, five theatres, two amphitheatres, seven circuses of vast extent, sixteen public baths, fourteen aqueducts, besides pillars, triumphal arches, porticoes, lofty obelisks, and broad, well-paved highways, like Via Appia. But then it began to weaken, for out of its very prosperity and riches, grew vice, heartlessness, and monstrous debauchery. By its very opulence it fell into decay.

During the centuries of its struggle and growth, which of course was slow compared with this age of steam and electricity, the people submitted their political destinies to the rule of Kings, Councils or Praetores, Decimviri, Dictators, Triumphirates, and Emperors. These governments were all more or less republican in form, with a senate, etc. But the people themselves fell into corruption and dishonesty.

The elder Cato contended bravely but effectually against bribery at elections. We learn from his writings that in the sixth century of the Roman Republic family ties became almost entirely loosened in Rome most prosperous period. He upbraids the women for their extravagance and their vanity, and he called them glib of tongue. We learn that the women of his time demanded emancipation and the right to control property, and it was an established principle as a matter of public economy, for the protection by families of their immense wealth, that they should bear but few children. The great moral disciplinarian, who regarded the individual householder as the germ of the family, and the family as the germ of the state, rails against women of his day, saying that those of the best families vie with the public dancers and the woman of the bagnio for the favours of the rich Roman youth as well as for those of the actors and acrobats of the theatre and the arena, and that the daily scenes at the baths of Baja and Patroli were a public scandal. When subsequently the once noble Romans exceeded in licentiousness and voluptuous extravagance the Greek before them, their country and their government became doomed, until finally came that downfall which has no parallel in the history of nations. It fell before the sturdy blows of the Teutonic invaders.

We need only read what La Bruyère, an attaché of the Court, says in regard to the licentiousness and extravagance of France under Louis XIV. to learn the real cause of the downfall of that then prosperous country. It is said the most aristocratic ladies of the Court were not at all ashamed when accused of their liaisons even with the most masculine lackeys; and La Bruyère, who has laid bare so much of the wickedness of his day, relates where he accused one of the most prominent ladies at Court of too close an intimacy with the executioner Bronte, without even her resenting it as an insult. Even Prof. Huxley takes occasion to say that the extravagance and profligacy of the Court of that day and its surroundings had a great deal more influence in generating the catastrophe than all the philosophers that ever put pen to paper had to bring it about.

In all countries and among all nations which have passed through great upheavals from time to time in the history of the world, women have been conspicuous in one way or another by directly influencing their rise or fall.

The third republic of France is already threatened by a dangerous indulgence in luxury and extravagance, instead of returning to a wholesome and healthy economical simplicity after the demoralising régime of the Second Empire. For the poor middle classes, nothing—for the rich, everything, seems to be the order of things there. The sansculottes are less patient than the free-born American citizen, who, with very little more love of law and government than the former still rests easy upon "the old flag and an appropriation." But this thoughtless complacency is getting dangerous. There must come a change in our own social affairs.

—From the 'The Rights of Labour.'

A CONCERT AND BALL will be held on behalf of the proposed International School, at the Athenæum Hall, Tottenham Court Road, on December 9th.

SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—EDINBURGH—Labour Hall, 50 South Bridge. Business meeting, Fridays at 8 p.m. Sunday, November 30, at 6.30, lecture by Hamilton, "Teetotalism."

A REVOLUTIONARY SITUATION.—A world all rocking and plunging, like that old Roman one when the measure of its iniquities was full; the abysses and subterranean and supernal deluges plainly broke loose; in the wild dim-lighted chaos all stars of heaven gone out. No star of heaven visible, hardly now to any man; the pestiferous fogs and foul exhalations grown continual, have, except on the highest mountain-tops, blotted out all stars; will-o'-wisp, of various course and colour, take the place of stars. Over the wild surging chaos, in the leaden air, are only sudden glares of revolutionary lightning; then more darkness, with philanthropic phosphorescences, empty meteoric lights; here and there an ecclesiastical luminary still hovering, hanging on to its old quaking fixtures, pretending still to be a Moon or Sun, though visibly it is but a Chinese Lantern made of paper mainly, with the candle end foully dying in the heart of it.—Carlyle's 'Life of John Stirling.'

DO YOU AGREE?

Do you agree with us that the social awakening of the workers is a desirable end? Do you agree with us that we are working in the right way to achieve that end?

You do not? Then oppose us and prove us wrong on every platform and in every paper to which you can gain access!

You do agree? Then work with us and for us; help us to extend our circle of influence; let no day pass in which you have not interested some one in our propaganda!

There is no middle course for an honest man!

DUBLIN SOCIALIST UNION.

OUR Dublin comrades have issued the following Statement of Principles. We wish them good luck in their work.

The Dublin Socialist Union offers a common platform to representatives of the various schools of Socialistic thought, with a view to the more effective propagation of the principles on which all are agreed.

It advocates cordial union with all who seek to abolish the present "Capitalist" system of production, under which the producers of all wealth lead lives of privation and actual want, whilst the non-producers live in idleness and luxury, and the construction in its stead of a system under which the worker shall receive the full value of the product of his industry.

It calls on all workers to recognise the solidarity of labour—i.e., the identity of interests which exists both between the different branches of industry and between the workers of different countries, and the consequent necessity for international organisation.

It will assist by every means in its power all combinations amongst the workers for the bettering of their condition, and by means of lectures, meetings, distribution of literature, and every means that may be practicable, advocate Socialist ideas and principles.

Meetings, open to all, are held in 87 Marlboro' Street, every Saturday at 8 p.m.

REPORTS.

ABERDEEN.—On Sunday 16th, Kropotkin's "Appeal to the Young" was read and discussed. On Thursday night, comrades Rennie and Leatham spoke to a meeting on Castle Street. On Saturday night, comrades Rennie and Bruce Glasier (of Glasgow) spoke to a large crowd. A meeting of members was afterwards held in comrade Duncan's house.—G. A. C.

DUBLIN.—Socialist Union, 87 Marlboro Street, November 22nd, J. E. Masteron delivered an address on "Politics for the Workers," advocating the orthodox Social-Democratic ideas—labour representation, payment of members, etc., etc. A brisk discussion followed, King, Kavanagh, O'Shea, Fitzpatrick, and others taking part.

SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION—EDINBURGH.—Comrade J. H. Smith delivered a splendid lecture on "Rent, Interest, and Profit" in Labour Hall on Sunday evening. An animated discussion was started by a Mr. McGregor, a staunch supporter of the present order of things. A good meeting was held at Leith which was addressed by Hamilton and Pearson.—W. D. T.

FABIAN SOCIETY.—A course of lectures on "COMMON OBJECTIONS TO SOCIALISM" will be given at Bloomsbury Hall, Hart Street, New Oxford Street, W.C. Friday, December 5, at 8 o'clock—VI. "The Coming Slavery." "That Socialism involves Bureaucracy and Jobbery," G. Bernard Shaw; "That Government can be dispensed with," H. W. Just. Dec. 19th. VII. "That Socialism, though desirable, cannot be brought about." "Because it would involve national dishonesty," W. S. de Mattos; "Because all except the destitute and reckless would be injured by the process," Frederic Hudson; "Because the revolution would involve violence and bloodshed," Edward R. Pease.

WHAT HAS COME TO PASS.—Yes, were the Corn Laws ended to-morrow, there is nothing ended; there is only room made for all manner of things beginning. . . . We shall have another period of commercial enterprise, of victory and prosperity; during which it is likely much money will be made, and all people may by extant methods still for a space of years be kept alive and physically fed. . . . It will be a priceless time. For our new period or paroxysm of commercial prosperity will and can on the old methods of "Competition and the Devil take the hindmost" prove but a paroxysm; a new paroxysm—likely enough, if we do not use it better, to be our last. If our Trade in twenty years, "flourishing" as never Trade flourished before, could double itself, yet then also by the old Laissez faire method our Population is doubled; we shall then be as we are, only twice as many of us, twice and ten times as unmanageable.—Carlyle's 'Past and Present.'

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.

TOWARDS THE TRUTH.

IN the present condition of Society what is the paramount duty of every right-minded person? Is it to ally himself with the partisans of reaction, to exhaust his intellectual faculties in the support of authority, to perplex the minds of men by a defence eloquent or otherwise, according to his powers, of the prejudices of past generations? or to fall in with the march of humanity where it now stands, and to advance with it towards the new era which Socialism has in store for us? It is well that we tread over the past as we tread over the ruins of extinct races, fallen cities, and shattered empires. We Socialists have done with consulting dumb oracles, or worshipping at desecrated shrines, and content ourselves with collecting and preserving all that may prove to be good to mankind. We now stand upon the threshold of a new era, in which mankind will divest themselves of all reverence for authority, of all worship of names, of all deference for anything but truth and just principles.

All great social catastrophes have been preceded by a questioning of the moral principles on which Society rested. The civil wars of England were ushered in by tempestuous discussions on things ethical and spiritual. First the authority of the church was disputed, then its liturgies and dogmas, then the civil institutions connected with it, viz., marriage, social subordination, and property. When the people's mind is in a state of ferment, there are sure to be many individuals arise in our midst with new theories of the salvation of the human race. The great mass of the people understand little indeed of the reasons of their own actions and opinions. Their religion and their morals, as well as their politics, are traditional; and, therefore, when a bold thinker arises to contest all their positions, divested of all reverence for their creeds and systems, the whole fabric of their belief is easily shaken.

No one has yet explored the entire domain of the possible, and therefore, when it is affirmed that Socialism is a fallacy, or that it would prove unworkable, we may safely answer our critics by saying, "They whose minds abound in the principles of truth see nothing in the teachings of Socialism which is in any way contrary to natural law." To produce a revolution it is as important to create belief in new opinions as to discredit old ones. The great point is to remove the ancient landmarks of religion and authority. Nothing is admitted to possess the character of stability. Whatever exists is regarded in many minds as merely provisional, but there are many apologists for the present system dwelling on the difficulty of reforming or overthrowing it. There are also many defenders of the system who will declaim with great force and ingenuity on the dangerous nature of Socialism, nay, even warn the community against adopting it. They will take refuge alternately in scorn and terror, and labour in the cause of authority with untiring earnestness. They will, however, labour in vain, without perhaps being conscious of it; their very mental activity is a symptom of the disease against which they combat. The approach of Socialism has disturbed their nervous sensibility, and the efforts they make to disentangle themselves from the great intellectual current in which they are plunged, are like those of the scared swimmer who finds himself in the first absorbing eddies of the whirlpool; the water may be comparatively smooth, but he has entered on the imperceptible current which must inevitably hurry him to destruction, or to the acceptance of the truth.

All the records which preserve the forms of thought of the age are deeply imbued with irritation and discontent. A few superior minds moving along the giddy heights of speculation, foresee the necessary abandonment of the old system and the adoption of a new one; and what with them is an intelligible necessity descends like a revelation to inferior minds, and is propagated with undoubted belief. In most countries of Europe the advocates of established institutions greatly outnumber the men of the morrow, who, however, make up by superior energy and vitality for the seeming fewness of their numbers. We feel ourselves to be engaged in a sacred mission; we know that the truths we reveal will be carried by the poor to their hearths and homes, and that they will be cherished. From the beginning of the world those who addressed themselves to the poor and became their friends, are for a while persecuted by the rest of mankind. Look at the greatest names treasured up in the minds of the people to be set forth some day in the people's history—yet to be written—those names which are still pronounced with love and veneration, and hosts of others who struggled against tyranny in their day, or devoted their lives to the discovery of those truths which humanity will always cherish as its noblest inheritance. The consciousness of having done this is something to face death with.

If we ask ourselves toward what the present current of things is bearing us, I answer towards Socialism! Now if we, in reality and not in vain, would be free, we must not shrink from paying the price of liberty. Slaves of old purchased their freedom at the expense sometimes of all they possessed, and though nations may not be called upon to pay so great a price, yet we would be servilely-minded indeed if we shrank from any sacrifice that might be required of us—even to life itself—for the purpose.

The two antagonistic principles now brought into collision are the love of liberty and the love of property. At present, men seem to incline more to the love of property than to liberty. Bitter experience will at length teach them that liberty is more valuable than wealth, inasmuch as the noble sentiments of a man transcend the physical enjoyments of a beast. Liberty, moreover, includes riches, but is not included in them. Under this conviction it is reasonable to expect that the enlightened people of the world will make towards truth and liberty; this is worth all the allurements of a spurious civilisation. Man really has no superior; the superiority of man to man is an insult, a mockery, a crime, and the system which recognises it stands by that very fact condemned to the eye of reason.

During seasons of prosperity men are apt to reflect but little on their social condition. It is when calamity knocks at their doors, when the air is heavy with the storms of revolution, that they apply themselves to the investigation of the social problem. Then the studies of their youth are perhaps remembered, and History presents herself pointing with gloomy finger to the causes which everywhere bring about the ruin of empires. Then they make the discovery that their instructors were no better than empty pedants, who taught them to respect words for things, prejudices for principles, errors for truths, birth, titles, fortune, and all the wretched masquerade of corrupt society for the genuine power of humanity. But when the flood-gates of revolution are broken open, when the tempest of popular passion rages through a whole realm, when all the ancient institutions of an empire are tottering, when the whole soil of the political world is reeling as with an earthquake beneath their feet, then perhaps it is that the people will remember the teachings of the Socialists and others who have made for liberty. Then the work of a hundred years will be crowded into a day, for the people will throw themselves fearlessly into the revolutionary torrent, to be hurried to freedom or death according to the chances of the hour. It may be asked, Will they show themselves equal to the crisis? I believe they will, and in order that there may be nothing wanting to prepare and fit them for the crisis, we must not only preach the theory of Socialism but the active means to be adopted, through enthusiasm, determination, and self-sacrifice for its speedy realisation.

THE GLORIOUS REFORMATION:

OR,

HOW THE ENGLISH PEOPLE WERE EVICTED, ROBBED,
AND MURDERED BY THE RULING CLASSES.

III.—THE FALL OF FEUDALISM.

BUT while peace and plenty prevailed among the workers, a terrible war was raging between two sections of the English nobility. The feudal aristocracy had fallen out as to whether the "meek usurper," Henry VI., or Richard Duke of York should fill the English throne. The Duke of York was slain at last in battle, and his young son—afterwards Edward IV.—took up his claim. This war, known as the War of the Roses, so-called from the badges of the rival parties, which were Red and White Roses—Red for Lancaster and White for York—has very little interest for us. It is only worth noting that the middle-classes of that day, the citizens of London, espoused the Yorkist cause, and at the same time the most splendid representative of the old feudal aristocracy, Richard Neville, Earl of Warwick, "the greatest as well as the last of those mighty barons who formerly over-ruled the Crown," was on the same side. We read that this mighty personage, known as the King-maker, for he made and overthrew them at his will, feasted 30,000 persons daily at his different castles and manor-houses in England; we hear of oxen roasted whole in his castle-halls, from which every one could cut a slice as they hung up on the spit. So great was his power that Edward IV., who owed his throne to this mighty baron, dreaded and hated him. The King longed to be a despotic monarch, and this was impossible while Warwick lived. So King and King-maker quarrelled at last, and when the Last of the Barons fell fighting in the Lancastrian cause on Barnet field his death rang the knell of feudalism.

With an aristocracy broken and impoverished by a long and terrible war,¹ for not only were many nobles slain in fair fight, driven into exile, or had their estates confiscated, but it was the custom on both sides to behead all noble prisoners taken in battle, and although Green assures us no noble family became extinct, yet there can be no doubt that the war and the death of the Earl of Warwick completely shattered what power they still possessed. Besides, there was another force coming into being which rendered their mighty castles and hosts of armed retainers useless. I have mentioned the invention of gunpowder, and gunpowder was now used in warfare. Green, in his 'Short History of the English People,' says truly enough:

"What wrecked the barons as a military power was the revolution which was taking place in the art of war. The introduction of gunpowder ruined feudalism. The mounted and heavily armed knight gave place to the meaner footman. Fortresses which had been impregnable against the attacks of the Middle Ages crumbled before the new artillery. Throughout the Middle Ages the call of the great barons would have been enough to raise a formidable revolt. Yeomen and retainers took the bow down from the chimney corner; knights buckled on their armour, and in a few days a host threatened the throne. Without artillery such a force was now helpless, and the only train of artillery in the kingdom lay at the disposal of the king."

A fifth of the land of England had also been confiscated during the Wars of the Roses, and had come into possession of the King, who not only was far more powerful owing to the fall of the barons and his possessions, but possessed wealth such as no King of England had known since the reign of Henry II. Edward IV., cruel, unscrupulous, and sensual, was a masterly politician; he surrounded his throne by a new aristocracy, composed of obscure men who had ennobled himself and who owed everything to him. In this policy as in other matters he was imitated by all his successors. At the same time, he added to his wealth and pleased the London citizens by becoming a trader on a large scale, winning their friendship by visiting them in their dwellings, and getting very intimate—especially with their wives. Though one of the worst men—he had not a single virtue except courage—who ever sat on the English throne, he was tremendously popular.

Edward IV., who increased his wealth by levying benevolence, i.e., forced loans upon his wealthy subjects which were never paid back again. The King asked a rich man for money, and he knew better than to refuse the tyrant, so he had to stump up with a groan. Edward began the establishment of despotism, and from his reign dates the gradual disappearance of that English freedom of which Fortescue spoke so lovingly. The Tudor monarchs were to complete his work. "So vast and sweeping were the changes," says Green, "that to careless observers of a later day the constitutional monarchy of the Edwards and Henries seemed suddenly to have transformed itself under the Tudors into a despotism as complete as the despotism of the Turks." Ranke, Green, Hallam, Lingard, and all historians of the period agree that freedom prevailed in England before the rise of the Yorkist power, and that it was Edward IV. who began the establishment of despotism. But what did the middle classes care, the King could be as despotic as he pleased so long as he encouraged them in their swindling operations and they grew rich and wealthy during his reign. After all, those "friends of the people" who would ally themselves with reaction do but copy the middle classes of this period.

We do not intend lingering over that record of lust, cruelty, and murder, viz., the history of the reigns of the Yorkist Kings, Edward IV. and Richard III., but let us come at once to that typical representative of the rising middle class, the English Louis XI.—Henry VII. This gentleman continued the policy of his predecessors. In nature he was even more of a middle class king. Edward IV. and Richard III. did possess the fiery courage of the Plantagenets. They lived during a transition period, and there was something of the time in their characters. Even Edward never quite sunk the feudal baron in the petty huckster, but Henry VII. was quite a middle-class king. His courage was not remarkable, but he made up for this by craft and cunning, while like a true bourgeois his avarice was boundless. Every pretext was seized by him to break up the power of the nobility, especially by diverting the wealth from their pockets into those of the King. They were ruined by heavy fines levied upon them for keeping retainers; at the same time the old feudal dues which had not been exacted during the confusion and disturbance of the great civil wars were revived, and the nobles had to pay up all arrears; when other means of robbing them failed, "benevolences" were wrung from them. There was no chance of escape from these forced loans; if a noble lived luxuriously he was told by an ingenious minister of the King, Cardinal Morton, that his wealth was manifest; if he lived plainly, a benevolence was extorted from him on the pretext that his economy must have made him wealthy. The Court of Star Chamber, destined to become infamous in English history, was formed by His Majesty of members of his own Council. It could always be depended upon to pass sentence according to the King's desire, and it proved a splendid means of impoverishing the nobles. Robbery now was becoming legalised, and the pen of the pettifogger was of more power than the sword of the warrior. From the reign of Henry VII. dates modern law-'n'-order. In despair the nobles revolted, they set up pretenders to the throne, but "the only train of artillery in the kingdom lay at the disposal of the King," and they were always defeated. Their estates were confiscated, or else heavy fines were wrung out of them, which all went to swell Henry's wealth; the result being that this most Christian monarch died worth two millions, which he left to his son. There is no clearer proof of the decay of the nobles than that they could be robbed with impunity by such a small-minded scoundrel as Henry VII.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE 'COMMONWEAL'

DEAR SIR,—I write in sympathy and indignation. To me it seems humiliating that you should have to beg week by week for funds to carry on the 'Weal. What an opportunity for our many friends to twit us with our inconsistency to principle! I do hope you may be spared by timely help from again appealing for help, and that you may be able to continue to publish weekly. I should feel it personally as a keen loss—bad grammar—the absence of my weekly 'Weal, I look forward so anxiously each week for it. Its my weekly consolation, the only one, after the slavery is ended for the week. You, the active workers and light-spreaders, want sympathy and help, and should get it spontaneously from the many, who I am sure, like myself, feel gratified and edified by the labours of yourself and co-workers. O, the apathy of the ordinary British slave is terrible! I try very hard to make one fresh reader for the 'Weal each week, but often fail; I did make six or seven regular readers in Oldham, after many weeks and months of preaching and arguing, etc. Have found much less trouble in selling odd copies of the "Old Order and the New,"—Davidson's book. That book, later on, will make hundreds of converts to our ranks. Your past labours are now beginning to bear fruit. Keep up your courage, comrades of the 'Weal. If only one dozen earnest men appreciate your badly paid labours, it were worth continuing the fight. A poor devil of a mechanic, I keep on hoping that shortly I may be able to do something more definite than to send a few stamps; extremely annoyed that I cannot do better. How many readers of the 'Weal (who do not contribute to the Salvation Army) will guarantee 6d. a-week? "Can't afford it!"—I can't afford it; am terribly involved in debt, etc., but I'll guarantee 6d. a week while in active slavery. Why the Salvationists shame us in their contributions! If only for those beautiful word-pictures of the grand and soul-inspiring glimpses of the possible future, portrayed by W. Morris in his recent articles in 'Weal, common gratitude and decency should prompt all of us to show our appreciation of the sacrifice of time and talents given in those articles, as well also of the labours of the working staff. Wake up, comrades! and do not allow another appeal for help!—Yours, etc., T. W.

More Unemployed!

The bottle-washers, rag-sorters, and other humble folk who get their living in ways that are obscure to the great mass of the population, will either have to go packing to the workhouse when the Booth competing scheme comes into operation, or they can enter his pauper colony and be fed on pigswash and piety! "Praise the Lord!"

DUBLIN.—Dublin Socialist Union, 87 Marlboro Street. Lecture every Saturday at 8 p.m. Nov. 22, J. E. Masterson, "Politics for the Worker."

SCOTTISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—EDINBURGH—Labour Hall, 50 South Bridge. Business meeting, Fridays at 8 p.m. Lectures every Sunday, at 6.30 p.m.

¹ It is worth noting that the people suffered very little at the hands of either party during this bloody and cruel war. The fact was that if their houses were plundered or burnt by either party, they threw themselves upon the other side. As Margaret of Anjou, the wife of Henry VI., found out, when she allowed her bands of Northern marauders to plunder as they pleased, the people immediately swelled the ranks of Edward of York, and Her Majesty was defeated in consequence. Philippe de Comines, the celebrated historian, bears witness to the fact that acts of plunder, or of burning and destroying peasants houses, were very rare in this war.

INTERNATIONAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

In the Parti Ouvrier (which now, to the huge joy of Le Proletaire, appears as a weekly only and no longer as a daily) there is a good and clearly-written article on the part played by machinery in modifying Lassalle's "iron law of wages." Under the operation of that law the worker's wage fluctuated to about subsistence point, but still wage and subsistence he received. As machines multiply and grow, the very "iron law" becomes a too optimistic description of the situation. Machines take the place of men, and presently the worker becomes a non-worker, receiving neither wage nor subsistence. Then it is that the unemployed and the half-employed are told by complacent middle-class economists (like Professor Marshall) that wages are "slowly rising." If they are rising (which is very doubtful, if all factors be taken into consideration), they are rising only because one man now does the work which one hundred years ago would mayhap in some industries have taken 180 to achieve. The 180th gets a trifle more a week possibly, but what becomes of the 179?

I note that Le Proletaire, unlike a certain virtuous Social Democratic sheet on this side of the Channel, has at least sufficient common-sense and frankness not to pretend indignation at Parnell's very natural attraction to Mrs. O'Shea. The leading lights of the S.D.F., who are so fond of the Paris Possibilists, should take a lesson from them in this matter. A self-styled "Revolutionary Socialist" playing Podsnap is not a pretty spectacle.

From all parts of the Ardennes district news of strikes continue to come in. Workers in a great variety of industries are out. The Federation of Ardennes Socialist Workers has taken up the striker's cause, and have issued an appeal on their behalf.

Paul Lafargue has begun contributing to the Cri du Travailleur (Toiler's Cry), of Lille, what promises to be a good series of articles on the "Evolution of Property."

The French post-office has never been very trustworthy where the correspondence of revolutionists was concerned, and it appears from L'Action Sociale that the police at Lyons have been at their old tricks again. Our Anarchist comrades in that city have had many of their letters opened. We all know, of course, the tragic result of the seizure by the Paris police of our Nihilist comrades' letters, upon the occasion of their arrest last summer. In consequence of the infamous treachery by which this correspondence was communicated to the Russian Government, some of our Russian friends are now lying under sentence of death in the fortress of Peter and Paul, and may, for aught I know, by the time this appears in print, have been slaughtered. Meanwhile, the Paris police (who really seem to have become a branch of the "Third Section") have taken advantage of the execution of the infamous Sevilierstoff to place a number of Nihilists under lock and key, amongst others the excellent Mendelsohn, who happens, by the way, to be a "Marxist," and opposed to the "propaganda by deed" of our Anarchist friends.

PORTUGAL.

The Oporto Anarchists held a meeting in memory of our martyrs on the 16th of November, and founded a new group, the "11th of November," which group will shortly publish a manifesto to the Portuguese workers, urging them to hasten their organisation for the struggle of the next First of May. As A Revolucao Social rightly says, "This is assuredly the best way to pay homage to the martyrs of the Revolutionary Ideal who were sacrificed in the 'model' republic in 1887."

SPAIN.

The Madrid Anarquista publishes an interesting biography of our recently deceased comrade, Juan Serrano y Oteiza, a Revolutionist and Anarchist of long standing, who founded La Revista Social, a periodical which had greater success than any worker's paper in Spain, circulating 24,000 copies. It was subjected to the most unrelenting persecution by the Canovas Government, and any one found reading it was cast into prison.

The Anarquista is improving much, and is publishing some capital cartoons, some of which might be usefully reproduced here with modifications.

So many commemorations of Chicago have been held in all parts of Spain, that it is impossible to speak of them in detail. I make an exception, however, for Barcelona, whose noble-minded people are ever to the front in whatever may speed the Revolution. As I have already noted, all the worker's societies of the city and neighbourhood were invited to take part in the solemnity, and they nearly all at least sent delegates. The spacious Barcelona Circus was crammed with a thoroughly sympathetic audience. The Productor gives a very full report of the speeches. Possibly the present writer may hereafter reproduce some passages from them in these columns.

El Socialista is publishing Engels' "Utopian Socialism and Scientific Socialism."

CUBA.

We have been cut off from Cuban news for some time, owing to the suppression of the Havannah Productor. When the last intelligence came to hand, the island, or at least Havannah, was in the throes of something like a General Strike. Bad news now comes by way of Barcelona. There seems a fear of something like a repetition of the Chicago murders. Many of our comrades have been put in prison, and they are apparently to be accused of imaginary and capital crimes. I reserve my account of these infamous transactions until fuller news arrives.

UNITED STATES.

The Knights of Labour have been holding their General Assembly (14th Annual Session) at Denver, Colorado. There was, of course, a characteristic report from "General Master Workman" Powderly, who is as Pecksniffian as ever. The Order, it seems, asserts the "eternal and undeniable rights of man to everything that his Creator drew from the depths of the earth." (Pecksniff Powderly, of course, knows all about that same Creator). "The Order has been called Conservative, but it is only so in its methods, for it stands a Radical among Radicals. Radical but not rash." Powderly is naturally very anxious to clear himself from responsibility for the New York Central failure, and really does not make out a bad case. He commits himself, however, to the following extraordinary advice to railway men: "Permit the interests of the company to receive the same consideration as those of the employe (!). Remember that we are asking the employers to show the same consideration to our interests that they do to their own, and in order to be consistent we must practise what we preach." This is verily Pecksniff sublimated. Truly a wage-slave should "consider the interests of his employer,"—he should consider how he can best injure and destroy them; that is the only consideration they merit from him. We read in the official journal of the Knights that "although ardently active in the secular work of the General Assembly, General Master Workman Powderly found time to deliver a lecture on Sunday night at the Tabor Opera House, under the auspices of the Mercy Home and for the benefit of that excellent institution."

This pestilent Powderly (whom our comrade Charles has so repeatedly exposed in these columns) is as wearying with his "All-Wise Being" as ever was Robespierre with his particular Mumbo Jumbo. Socialists, however, could readily forgive the G.M.W. this little idiosyncrasy (shall we call it ?), if only he were "straight." But I fear me that, like certain other religious-minded Generals nearer home, he is about as straight as Bret Harte's "Heathen Chinees." R. W. B.

SOCIALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

LEEDS AND BRIGHOUSE.

On Sunday, November 23rd, heavy rain all day prevented us holding any open-air meetings, but comrade Cores lectured twice for the Brighouse Radical Association; in the afternoon on "The Coming Change in Society," and in the evening on "The Fraud of Politics." Although it was the first time that a speaker belonging to the Revolutionary School of Socialism had addressed them, many of the members expressed their strong agreement with his views. We have arranged to send them a small supply of literature periodically. Although C. Bradlaugh and Auberon Herbert have championed "Individualism" (?) to the Brighouse friends, they have rather prepared the ground than otherwise for our propaganda. On Sunday, November 30th, we held two short meetings at the Market Gates, in the morning and evening, Allworthy, Cores, and another comrade speaking. In the afternoon we attended at the Grand Assembly Rooms, where Dr. F. R. Lees lectured on "The Relations of Temperance and Socialism," showing a great ignorance of the latter although a deal of sympathy with it. The lecture was brought about by the debate in one of the local papers, which is still going on, and the speaker referred to it in his speech. No opposition was allowed, the meeting being a "sacred" one. However, we sold a number of Commonweal outside, which rather riled some of our temperance friends. We make a point of attending any lectures having any relation to the questions of Land, Labour, or Capital that are held. It will interest our comrades to hear that at a recent lecture in the Co-operative Hall, a certain well-known apostate, an ex-revolutionist, supported the proposal of beggar colonies on the Dutch plan as a remedy for the unemployed problem. According to this honourable gentleman, they, the "practical people," are doing all the necessary reforming work (what are they doing ?) while the Revolutionary Socialists are "vapouring" about theories. This gentleman no longer "vapours," but goes in for things that are "practical," i.e., that PAY. On Monday, December 1st, we visited Booth's meeting at the Town Hall, and sold a fair number of Commonweal. We would like to remind our friends in Leeds that they may find a welcome in our club in Victoria Road any evening, and if they will give their aid we shall be able to carry on a more powerful propaganda in Leeds, and Yorkshire generally, than ever before. G. C.

YARMOUTH.

REVOLUTIONARY Socialism is making headway in Yarmouth. The Commonweal is looked for with great interest by comrades and friends. We are still able to sell our usual quantity, although the weather has been too wet for open-air propaganda during the last three weeks. We find that the revolutionary tone of the paper makes it popular. A series of addresses and papers have been arranged for by several comrades, at which collections will be made for Commonweal. Comrade John Oldman and his wife (from Manchester) have been with us for several weeks, doing splendid propaganda for the advancement of Revolutionary Socialism, and our local comrades have been considerably enlightened in revolutionary ideas. We are certain the day is not far distant when the Social Revolution will be an accomplished fact, for even in Tory-ridden Yarmouth we can count our friends by hundreds. On Sunday, November 16th, in the morning on Priory Plain, a short meeting was held from 11 to 11.30, addressed by Oldman, when we adjourned to the Radical Hall to hear the Secretary, D. T. King, read a paper on "Co-operation, Trade Unionism, and Strikes." Discussion was afterwards continued by Caley, Oldman, and the secretary of the United Radical Club, Kay Street, London, all speaking in favour of Revolutionary Socialism, believing the subjects to be false remedies for poverty. G. Lee (Radical Club) moved the adjournment of further discussion until the following Sunday. In the afternoon on the Fish Wharf, a large meeting was held, addressed by Oldman; Headley opened by reading "Statement of Principles" from the Commonweal, and closed with "Jones's Boy." In the evening good muster in club room, and discussion on "Physical Force." On November 23rd in the morning, at the Radical Hall, good attendance of comrades to hear the adjourned discussion, opened by G. Lee, who supported the paper. Kitchen (S.L.) (London) with a well-delivered address against, completely knocked the wind out of the Radical sails. On the motion of Oldman (S.L.), further discussion was adjourned for a week. In the afternoon we assembled in the club-room. Again in the evening; good attendance of comrades to hear a discussion on "Anarchy," opened by Oldman, who gave a very good explanation, followed by Kitchen and five of our local comrades; we had no chairman, yet perfect harmony prevailed throughout the whole evening. November 30th, at the Radical Hall in the morning (Headley in the chair) a good attendance of Radicals and Socialists; Oldman resumed the discussion at some length, followed by Gibson (Radical Club), and several local comrades. Our Radical friends got rather excited, and refused to allow any further adjournment. Most of them left the hall long before the discussion was finished, so we kept the meeting going until 1.30. In the club-room, afternoon and evening, Oldman lectured on "Law-'n'-Order"; no discussion, all present agreeing with the lecturer's able remarks; seven members have joined since last report; 160 Commonweals sold, several Freedoms, and fair collections, "and the Cause goes marching on." J. HEADLEY.

ABERDEEN.—A good meeting was held on Sunday afternoon, November 23rd, at the Quay Side; the speakers were comrades Glasier (Glasgow), Leatham, and Duncan. In the evening the hall was well filled to hear Glasier's lecture on "Socialism, its Progress and Prospects." On Thursday, comrade Rennie spoke on Castle Street; and on Saturday, Duncan and Leatham addressed a good meeting at the same place in spite of the bitter coldness of the night. On Sunday afternoon, November 30th, another good meeting was held at the Quay Side, the speakers being Rennie and Leatham. At the indoor meeting in the evening, comrade Rennie lectured on "The Unemployed." We are making arrangements for our annual social meeting and dance.

NOTES.

BRITISH virtue and respectability are having just now an immense boom. Mrs. Grundy is largely in evidence. The Parnell-O'Shea case gave occasion to all the political dodgers, wire-pullers, and party hacks to asseverate with their hands upon the vacant region—where should be their hearts? That their morals are shocked, their consciences (sic) are outraged, nothing less than the complete abdication by Parnell of his political position will assuage the wounded feelings of these humbugs who hide their party purposes behind sham morality.

Parnell, like Dilke, has committed the unpardonable offence of gratifying his appetites within the ranks of his own class. Had he seduced a workman's daughter, or sought the pleasures of St. John's Wood or Cleveland Street, possibly the editors and scribes who now attack him would suffer the same fate as Parkes did in the Cleveland Street affair.

The next case that has afforded Mrs. Grundy an opportunity to vent her virtuous indignation, is the trial of Mrs. Pearcey for the Kentish Town murders. Both the judge and the prosecuting counsel laid great stress upon the fact that F. Hogg—for whom Mrs. Pearcey betrayed such ardent affection—was a commonplace fellow. They hurled at his devoted head all the withering epithets those legal word-weavers are capable of. What right had a workman, and a commonplace fellow to boot, to dally with two women at once? He ought to be taught that such luxuries are reserved for our masters and pastors, including, of course, lawyers and judges.

Betting and brothels are institutions for well-to-do people, and when poor people venture to indulge in such things they must be sternly shown that they are treading upon the prerogatives of the rich, and made to keep their places. Viewed in this light it is easy to understand the deference paid by Bench and Bar to the Jeffries and Somersets when their laches bring them within the law.

We are told that the gallery, and even the bench, was packed with a crowd of well-dressed "Ladies" who came to view and gloat upon the agony of the prisoner in the dock. These bedizened harridans of the fashionable world, living upon labour not their own, must needs enliven the inane lives they lead by making the scenes of a courtroom contribute to their hideous pleasures.

"The so-called 'weaker sex' (writes an indignant correspondent of a contemporary) besieged the court with shameless persistency. No sense of decency restrained them, no amount of personal discomfort kept them outside the doors of the grim forum. Wives came with their husbands, brothers brought the female members of their families, mothers sat side by side with their young daughters. Hour after hour did these ghoulish women, armed with opera-glasses, sherry-flasks, and sandwich boxes, hang with eager curiosity upon every movement and look of their miserable sister, whose fate was so firmly fixed from the very outset. To the end they stayed; for the solemn closing scene had special attractions for them. These women were not the wives and daughters of labourers and costermongers, but ladies of gentle birth and no inconsiderable position. They hailed from the West-end, not from Whitechapel—from Bayswater, not from the 'Borough.'"

General Booth is reaping in the shekels from the Land and Labour thieves, who look upon him as a New Saviour of Society (their Society). He is the scavenger who will, if allowed, clear away the filth out of sight, at least, of those whose robbery of the means of life causes the misery of the mass. Society does not like the sight of its own wreckage and filth. It does not wish it to come between the wind and its nobility, or to disturb the day-dreams of the parasites who are helping Booth's scheme forward.

Booth, pious man, comes forward, and says he, "Just give me a million and the thing is done. I will hide your ugly poor away in pauper colonies, no longer to affront your eyes and noses with their unsightly presence, and between steamed crusts and prayers it will be a marvel of cheapness!"

We read in an evening paper that Vitreo, the Human Ostrich, is given to eating with relish broken glass bottles, coal, coke, oyster shells, rags, old boots, etc. Having done the land of Barnum he is going to visit the land of Booth! Now, General, secure him at once to give lessons on Dietetic Reform to the extravagant people who may clamour for Steamed Crusts and Salvation!

Immediately subsequent to the death of Lord Byron there grew up a school of persons who, devoid of his other attainments, strove to imitate his manners and dress. They wore Byronic collars, and a languishing air of inextinguishable sorrow. They refused to allow the barber's shears to come into contact with their long and tangled locks. They disappeared, and the only mementoes of their existence are a few deep collars and cuffs still hanging about in third-rate wardrobe shops.

We of the Socialist Party have been troubled with a similar set. During the drawing-room and æsthetic stage of the Socialist movement we were afflicted with the presence of hungry ink-slingers, who had evinced the same disinclination to receive the attentions of the barber. They allowed their locks to flow and also their speech; they talked of blood, nothing but blood; they clutched the red flag with a wild and feverish clutch; they wore a red fez in public to emphasise their devotion to the "Cause"; and they discovered that Art was rooted in Socialism. Now all is changed. They perigrinate with cut hair between Chancery Lane and Fleet Street; they pawn in anonymous paragraphs the dirty linen of their souls in order that they may dine, and dine to live, though no man besides themselves sees the necessity. Some have found pelf and spouses; what they will leave behind it is difficult to say. Perhaps the fez is still in existence, and may yet be shown in company with a famous straw-yard hat as a relic of the past.

And so it is that our sometime friends are the authors of the vile communications against the Revolutionary Party, that are paid for at so much a line by the capitalistic press. The envenomed pens of these renegades are actively at work to injure the Commonweal during the present crisis. Paragraphs have appeared in several daily and weekly papers to the effect that the Commonweal is dead. The Daily Chronicle, with which Morrison Davidson is connected, stated this falsehood in a conspicuous paragraph. A reply was sent to the Daily Chronicle, but appeared in a mutilated form in an obscure part of the paper two days after the original statement. We have reason to know that the paragraphs all emanated from one source, viz., a Star scribbler, instigated thereto by the afore-mentioned renegades. Mr. Morrison Davidson, of the Daily Chronicle, is a member of the Central Democratic Club, Chancery Lane, where most of these delightful ink-slingers foregather.

F. K.

Our good middle-class friends of the Pall Mall Gazette and the Weekly Dispatch have kindly announced the death of the Weal, and the approaching final dissolution of the Socialist League. No doubt it would be a matter of congratulation to many "able editors" and enterprising "journalists" if the only really revolutionary journal published in English in London were to disappear, and the Socialist League to follow it; but I fancy we may assure these excellent folk that neither event is in the least likely to occur. Rather, we may hope that recent happenings will establish us firmly on a broader basis, and make us more thorough-going and "dangerous" Revolutionists than ever. As for the disappointed wire-pullers and rejected "leaders" who vent their impotent venom by sending these too gross and palpable lies to the capitalist press, we can surely afford to treat them with merited contempt.

As I write, there is renewed trouble brewing at the Docks. Certain of the shipowners of London have broken through all custom by requiring "their" sailors and firemen to sign articles on board ship and not at the regular shipping-offices provided by the Board of Trade. This is done with the double object of terrorising unionists and protecting blacklegs. The United Labour Council of the Port of London and the Sailors' and Firemen's Union have not been slow to take up this challenge, and the Shipping Federation has issued an appeal for blacklegs. By the time these lines appear in print the matter may be settled. On the other hand, it may be the beginning of a prolonged struggle.

The point specially worth noting, in the meantime, is that the officials and leaders of the Docker's Union are beginning to show themselves in what one fears may be their true colours. The autocratic Tom Mann and the other bureaucrats refuse to allow their union to come to the help of the sailors and firemen, because, forsooth, such important personages as themselves were not consulted beforehand. Like the late lamented General Trochu, it seems that these superior persons have a "plan" which they will not allow more impetuous—not to say more energetic—warriors to interfere with. Like Trochu, too, they maintain a position of masterly inactivity while the enemy closes round them more and more securely.

It is not wonderful, under the circumstances, that the dockers should begin to be a little tired of their union, and that an increasing proportion should fall off in their contributions. The natural result of the tame way in which rats have been allowed to take the place of loyal unionists, is that only five per cent. of the entire number of the latter are employed four days a week, while fifty per cent. are only working two days a week, and a great proportion of the remainder are out of work altogether. These figures are furnished by Mann himself, who, after setting them before a docker's meeting, had the audacity in the same breath to blame some of the branches for their "apathy." Naturally enough, there was "considerable interruption," and the speaker had some difficulty in obtaining a further hearing. One man gave expression to a wide-spread complaint by telling Mann that they could "only hear him at public meetings—nowhere else."

One of Mann's expressions was that "if there were no hope in trades' unionism, where was hope to be found?" Well, Mann ought to know. Surely not in "docker's tanners" or so-called "co-operative" schemes, but in the General Strike for Freedom of determined men, who have resolved never to work for wages again, but to bring about, once for all, the Social Revolution, and to destroy mastership (aye, and "leadership," too) for ever. That General Strike, however, will never be helped forward by well-paid union officials, whose interest it is to keep the class-war, as it were, on the smoulder, instead of fanning it into a blaze which shall fire the Old World, and destroy it as were destroyed the fabled "Cities of the Plain."

The actor, Wilson Barrett, has opened his "New Olympic" (at what are facetiously called "popular prices") with a piece which seems to be an audacious libel on strikers and unionists. If workers here had only the spirit of our Paris comrades, for example, they would take care to attend and manifest their disapproval in such fashion as to show the enterprising lessee that his ignoble playing to the stalls is not to the taste of the gallery at any rate. Louise Michel and our French Anarchist friends the other day took advantage of a piece called "The Strike" to make propaganda.

R. W. B.

IN EAST KENT.

At this time of the year, in rural places as well as in the towns, Socialism finds a good propagator in the cold weather. The greater its severity the greater is the force with which King Winter drives home his message to the mind and the stomach of the rustic.

Now that he has all but bared the branches of their leaves, and wind-swept the face of the country to a more or less naked condition, he invites the husbandman to rest awhile in the shelter and warmth of his dwelling until spring-time comes round again, and to peacefully enjoy in the meanwhile the fruits of his past season's labours.

As certain little animals during the warmer months gather together a store of food for their winter keep, so the agricultural worker, by his labour and his labour alone, raises and brings together his store of corn, fruit, live stock, and agricultural produce generally. But there the simile ends, for nobody thinks of disputing the aforesaid animals claim to what is their harvest. As for that of the agricultural worker, well,—we all know who takes possession of that.

Until very lately the popular rustic faith was this—that the good employer was a man whom God, in the goodness of his heart, had prospered in order to "find" work for those of his fellow-creatures who had not been thus blessed, and that if it were not for the likes of him men would soon starve for want of employment, and things would quickly come to a general standstill. In fact, he was the goose which laid the golden eggs. Though he does not yet see clearly what is the matter with him, our rural labourer realises in a vague sort of way that things are not as they ought to be. Certainly his ideas on this point are in a very nebulous state at present, but, in spite of the red herrings of politics and religion which his squire and parson take care to have drawn freely under his nose, he is evidently finding out that it is on himself alone that he must depend for real help, and that his employer does not give him work out of love for him.

It is only after his day's work is done that he has any inclination or any opportunity to think and talk of such matters, and this is the proper time to catch him. To do this one must go to the village inn, where, over the evening pipe, work and wages now form the principal topics, and are always taken up and discussed with more or less warmth. As the interest in these subjects increases the discontented man is revealed, and the gospel of truth and progress is drunk in with as much avidity as the Kentish ale—it is only at such moments as these that one has any opportunity of reading aright the mind of the rustic labourer, for at other times it is to all appearances quite a blank.

Now, for my part, I have not the least belief in the grinning bacon-fed yokel in smock and billy-cock. If he does exist he is not to be found in these parts, at any rate. If you want the real article behold him on the other side of this thorn hedge here. What with wind and weather he is tanned, hair, clothes and all, into very nearly the same colour as the brown furrows which he is turning. The brightest feature about him are his brick-red cheeks, making a good bit of colour in the winter landscape, more so when he follows his team westward; then, if there be a fairly clear horizon, the afternoon sun quite glorifies the poor chap. Look at him closer still, and you will find out what a shrivelled piece of humanity he would be without his clothes, moulded and stiffened to his limbs as they are by perhaps half-a-dozen year's accumulation of clay and sweat. You would also discover what a hollow mockery is the popular idea about the wholesomeness of the ploughman's existence with its fresh air and outdoor exercise, for here you have the result of too much of these good things.

But it must not be forgotten that other matters have contributed to the deterioration of our friend's physique. For instance, we must take into account his three centuries of ancestors living in a state of bondage, from which they had not the ghost of a chance of escaping; and again, we must not forget that he has an insufficiency of food and rest. Town dwellers may be surprised at being told that the agricultural labourer does not get enough to eat, but let them judge for themselves. Herewith is given a fair statement of wages obtained by the average farm-worker in East Kent, and in this particular it must be borne in mind he is much better off than his brethren in other parts of England, notably in the Eastern Counties:

Taking one season with another, he earns on an average throughout the year about 13s. 6d. per week, or per year				35	2	0
His wife and children together may earn at the year's hay-making, harvest, and hop-picking				6	0	0
Total years earnings of the family				41	2	0
From this we must deduct the following—
52 week's rent of cottage at 2s. 6d. per week	6	10	0
Cost and repair of tools	2	0	0
And at least four weeks of the man's time lost through bad weather and other causes	2	14	0
				11	4	0
Total per year				29	18	0

This gives about 1s. 7½d. per day for providing food, clothing, fuel, and other necessities to existence for six people. And yet this is the class selected by the political and religious hacks as special subjects on which to graft their humbugging gospel of thrift, contentment, and teetotalism!

The farm labourer's day usually begins at six o'clock in summer, and seven o'clock in winter, and when he has horses to attend to he is obliged to be out and about at least an hour earlier. The day's work may be taken at about 13 hours in summer and 11 hours in winter. The horse works about 7½ hours a day. Shorter hours of labour you see for the animal than for the weaker creature—why? Because if the animal were overworked, or underfed, or badly housed, he might die, and this would mean parting with a quantity of money before he could be re-placed. As for the men that is quite a different matter; we know that sooner or later they fall victims to one or more of the causes mentioned, but this does not matter to our Christian farmers and landlords,—there are plenty more waiting to fill up the dead men's places.

The present outlook for the agricultural labourer is anything but bright, and is likely to be more hopeless as time goes on; mainly, because more and more of the land is being withdrawn from cultivation every year. For instance, in this county alone there are this year 1,962 acres less under cultivation than there were in 1889, and an average falling off in the yield of 4.13 cwts. per acre. In 1889, the estimated average yield per acre was 9.35 cwts., whereas this year the average yield is only 5.22 cwts.

In the face of this and the consequent influx of agricultural labourers into the towns, some of the trade unionists are making active preparations for a rural campaign to be opened by the Docker's Union in the spring; and again, as far as this district is concerned, the workers in the neighbouring riverside cement factories, who are, to a man almost, members of the Dock, Wharf, Riverside, and General Labourer's Union, are profiting by the opportunities which their daily business intercourse affords them of pointing out to their disorganised brethren the advantages which they themselves have already gained by their own federation.

JONATHAN BINES.

THE CAUSES OF ILL-HEALTH AMONG THE WORKERS.

WHAT are the causes of ill-health among working-men and women in the present day? We hear much about the hated tenement house, badly heated and ventilated, where whole families are huddled into one or two small rooms; some directly under the rafters, others in the cellar where the light of day never penetrates. This is an awful state, but it is not all. Men and womed women work all day in poorly-lighted factories, some reeking with the fumes of deadly chemicals. In the morning they arise early, with insufficient sleep and rest; hurry about to get breakfast, a portion of the year before daylight, in order to get to the mill or factory in time; hurry home to dinner, which they bolt for want of sufficient time; eat in haste a late supper when tired, and then to bed. This, in addition to their work, often in cramped positions and unhealthy surroundings, is their daily life. Is it any wonder that they are unhealthy? And yet the instructors of hygiene in our public schools are instructing the youth under their charge that health is one of the freest of Nature's gifts, and not to be purchased with riches. Compare the life and health of the nabob with that of the working-man, and see if it is a free gift or is to be purchased with money. What is the toil of the rich man who daily inspects a few condensed statements of his assistants, and signs his name thereto to that of his servants? His meals can be ready for him at seasonable hours, and garnished with the best of sauces—conversation. He has the means of purchasing both palatable and nutritious food, which many times his employes have not. He has sufficient and suitable clothing. He has a dwelling built with thought in regard to convenience, pleasure, beauty, and sanitary conditions. He has time for rest and healthy recreation. Compare the men at threescore and ten, and, if the rich man has obeyed the laws of temperance and health, note the difference. One is broken down and despondent, and the other, who has riches, is the picture of happy old age.

Many instructors of hygiene seem to insist that everything necessary to insure health is plenty of pure air, yet this is contradicted by the fact that the health of farm labourers does not hold out so well as that of their brethren who work in mills, where pure air is not always to be had. The exposure and fatigue of farm work counteracts any effect that plenty of pure air could give. To secure health, suitable clothing, suitable hours, and suitable shelter are necessary in addition to pure air, and this the want of money many times forbids.

When the hand of disease and mental depression is laid heavily upon the working people, it simply brings more vividly before them their poverty, and they feel that they can neither rest nor procure the necessary medical assistance. When the physician is called he does what he can; but this class of patients has aggravated and complicated forms of disease, springing from many roots, that only persistent nursing, rest, and change of life can cure, all of which seem impossible to secure. This does not end with the life of the person, but is bequeathed to innocent babes. Children are born into the world tired, and possessed by inheritance of a nervousness and irritability caused by our system of competition, where all honour and gain is to the foremost, while, to use the common expression, "the devil take the hindmost."

What is the grand panacea for all this disease? Nothing but a complete change of our mode of life; and what plan is more complete, more just, and more humane than the internationalisation of all industry and the abolition of monopoly?

CHARLES E. WATERMAN.

What Peasant Proprietary Means.

The peasant proprietary system of France has done practically nothing for the mere labourer, except to degrade him into the veriest drudge, or make him a miserable rack-rented tenant-at-will to some peasant land-owner, who has gradually got hold of several farms, and so is becoming in turn a small landlord. It is thus by no means certain that the prosperity of the peasant proprietors means the prosperity of the labourer. The talk of general prosperity is very edifying no doubt, but, if one class of the community secures to itself complete control of the land, and of sites for labourers' cottages, and the unearned increment under the proposed settlement, it is not easy to see how the labourer and artisan classes will be in any way better off. If one had to go to a peasant owner for half an acre of land and a cottage, he might find him even less generous than the old class of landlords, bad as they are. In all peasant proprietary countries, the mere labourers have to pay two or three values for any favour of this sort from one of these close-fisted peasant landlords. The general prosperity of shareholders in railway companies does not mean shorter hours or higher wages for their employes. Neither does that of farmers necessarily involve the prosperity of the labourers; but it does mean the severance of the labourers from any interest in the soil.—Belfast Weekly Star.

DO YOU AGREE?

Do you agree with us that the social awakening of the workers is a desirable end? Do you agree with us that we are working in the right way to achieve that end?

You do not? Then oppose us and prove us wrong on every platform and in every paper to which you can gain access!

You do agree? Then work with us and for us; help us to extend our circle of influence; let no day pass in which you have not interested some one in our propaganda!

There is no middle course for an honest man!

AN EXCEPTIONAL LANDLORD AND CAPITALIST.

THE following extract from a letter written by the Hon. Theophilus West, is worthy of note. It appeared in the Nationalist News:—"I will tell you at the commencement that I am a capitalist. I do this in no vulgar spirit of ostentation, but merely as a fact, and an explanation. I am the largest owner of land in this parish, and I inherited this from forefathers in a line for two hundred years. I own some land and houses in Bath also, and on the same title. But I am an earnest Socialist, despite, I believe, that capitalists will benefit much as individuals, by the abolition of private ownership in capital. Citizenship in a socialistic community will more than compensate the loss of property in capital. The feeling of brotherhood with all one's kind will be more than equivalent for the loss of that gratified ostentation and arrogance which property and position confers, by exacting homage from those who are less fortunate. By 'brotherhood' I mean a real equality, not a sophistical one, based on a corporeal similarity. I mean an equality of cultivation and culture. I mean an extinction of what is now called the lower class,—not a destruction of the higher. I was a declared Socialist before 'Looking Backward' appeared, and I have been an unconscious Socialist all my life, even when, in my ignorance, I actively opposed Socialism from a misconception of what it was.—Yours in brotherhood (as I hope), THEOPHILUS WEST."

"Labour Saving" Machines.

As a man in a quicksand sinks the deeper because of his every struggle, so labour in struggling by the invention of machines to escape its taskmaster but sinks itself deeper and more hopelessly into the quicksand of the competition that is destroying it. So it will ever be until the workers learn that they must own the machines, and, by substituting co-operation for competition, become their own employers. Now the man of work is the slave of the man of money, but when labour learns the lesson that those only are free who are their own employers, the reign of injustice will come to an end and the men of work will be themselves the men of money. Then, "If any will not work, neither shall he eat."—Belfast Weekly Star.

Seamen's Meeting in Barry.

And I asked how they thought a man could be expected to keep a wife and family on the wages they were getting. The reply I got was, "We have nothing to do with the men's wives and families. What do sailors want with getting married?" The men received £3 10s. a month, were taken on at Cardiff and paid off at Newcastle, and then they were put to the expense of about £2 to get back to their homes. How could a man be expected to keep a wife and home together? Yet those shipowners, who used to preach the doctrine of supply and demand to the men, and that they had no responsibility as far as the seamen's wives and families were concerned—they used to give a £200 note towards building a Sailors' Mission Room, in order to convert and purify the souls of you men, and at the same time these very men were advocating a system which meant a doctrine of prostitution, and denying to you the right to take unto yourselves a wife and a home. That doctrine was preached in order that they might pile up their dirty ill-gotten gains. I appealed to those men sympathetically, but it had no impression on their minds or their souls, for they only worshipped one god and that god was the god of gold—the dearest god that ever the shipowners had.—Seafaring.

"COMMONWEAL" GUARANTEE FUND.

All monies sent to this fund will be duly acknowledged in the Next Issue.

To Help the Paper.—There are several ways in which you can help to spread the Weal. Ask your newsagent to try and sell it. Get those who don't care to buy it month by month to subscribe direct. Arrange for the posting of contents bills anywhere you can. Any number of other plans will suggest themselves if you think about it.

Postal Propaganda.—Some who would like to do propaganda but dare not openly, or who cannot spare the time to do it personally, can find many ways in which it can be done quietly. Not the least useful among possible plans would be to order and pay for a number of copies to be sent to persons in whose hands they might do good. We will send six copies to six different addresses for 7d. Write the names and addresses legibly.

FABIAN SOCIETY.—A course of lectures on "COMMON OBJECTIONS TO SOCIALISM" will be given at Bloomsbury Hall, Hart Street, New Oxford Street, W.C. Friday, December 5, at 8 o'clock—VI. "The Coming Slavery." "That Socialism involves Bureaucracy and Jobbery," G. Bernard Shaw; "That Government can be dispensed with," H. W. Just. Dec. 19th. VII. "That Socialism, though desirable, cannot be brought about." "Because it would involve national dishonesty," W. S. de Mattos; "Because all except the destitute and reckless would be injured by the process," Frederic Hudson; "Because the revolution would involve violence and bloodshed," Edward R. Pease.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

THE Socialist League advocates International Revolutionary Socialism. That is to say the destruction of the present class society, which consists of one class who live by owning property and therefore need not work, and of another that has no property and therefore must work in order that they may live to keep the idlers by their labour. Revolutionary Socialism insists that this system of society, which is the modern form of slavery, should be changed to a system of Society which would give every man an opportunity of doing useful work, and not allow any man to live without so doing, which work could not be useful unless it were done for the whole body of workers instead of for do-nothing individuals. The result of this would be that livelihood would not be precarious nor labour burdensome. Labour would be employed in co-operation, and the struggle of man with man for bare subsistence would be supplanted by harmonious combination for the production of common wealth and the exchange of mutual services without the waste of labour or material.

Every man's needs would be satisfied from this common stock, but no man would be allowed to own anything which he could not use, and which consequently he must abuse by employing it as an instrument for forcing others to labour for him unpaid. Thus the land, the capital, machinery, and means of transit would cease to be private property, since they can only be used by the combination of labour to produce wealth.

Thus men would be free because they would no longer be dependent on idle property-owners for subsistence; thus they would be brothers, for the cause of strife, the struggle for subsistence at other people's expense, would have come to an end. Thus they would be equal, for if all men were doing useful work no man's labour could be dispensed with. Thus the motto of Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, which is but an empty boast in a society that upholds the monopoly of the means of production, would at last be realised.

This Revolutionary Socialism must be International. The change which would put an end to the struggle between man and man, would destroy it also between nation and nation. One harmonious system of federation throughout the whole of civilisation would take the place of the old destructive rivalries. There would be no great centres breeding race hatred and commercial jealousy, but people would manage their own affairs in communities not too large to prevent all citizens from taking a part in the administration necessary for the conduct of life, so that party politics would come to an end.

Thus, while we abide by the old motto

Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,

we say that the existence of private property destroys Equality, and therefore under it there can be neither Liberty nor Fraternity.

We add to the first motto then this other one—

FROM EACH ACCORDING TO HIS CAPACITY, TO EACH ACCORDING TO HIS NEEDS.

When this is realised there will be a genuine Society; until it is realised, Society is nothing but a band of robbers. We must add that this change can only be brought about by combination amongst the workers themselves, and must embrace the whole of Society. The new life cannot be given to the workers by a class higher than they, but must be taken by them by means of the abolition of classes and the reorganisation of Society.
