This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world’s books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that’s often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book’s long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google’s system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google “watermark” you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can’t offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book’s appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google’s mission is to organize the world’s information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world’s books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at http://books.google.com/
A DICTIONARY
OF
CHRISTIAN BIOGRAPHY, LITERATURE, SECTS AND DOCTRINES; BEING A CONTINUATION OF 'THE DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE.'
EDITED BY WILLIAM SMITH, D.C.L., LL.D., AND HENRY WACE, D.D.,
PRINCIPAL OF KING'S COLLEGE, LONDON; PREACHER AT LINCOLN'S INN, ETC. ETC.

VOLUME II.
EABA—HERMOCRATES.

LONDON:
JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET.
1880.

The right of Translation is reserved.
UNIFORM WITH THE PRESENT WORK.

A DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIAN ANTIQUITIES. THE HISTORY, INSTITUTIONS, AND ANTIQUITIES OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.
BY VARIOUS WRITERS. EDITED BY WM. SMITH, D.C.L. AND ARCHDEACON CHESTHAM, D.D. WITH ILLUSTRATIONS. 2 VOLS. MEDIUM 8vo. 3L 13s. 6d.

A DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE: ITS ANTIQUITIES, BIO-GRAPHY, GEOGRAPHY, AND NATURAL HISTORY. BY VARIOUS WRITERS.
EDITED BY WM. SMITH, D.C.L. WITH ILLUSTRATIONS. 3 VOLS. MEDIUM 8vo.
5L 5s.

DR. WM. SMITH'S ANCIENT ATLAS.

AN ATLAS OF ANCIENT GEOGRAPHY, BIBLICAL AND CLASSICAL, INTENDED TO ILLUSTRATE THE ABOVE WORKS. COMPILED UNDER THE SUPERINTENDENCE OF DR. WM. SMITH AND SIR GEORGE GROVE. WITH DESCRIPTION TEXT, GIVING THE SOURCES AND AUTHORITIES, INDICES, &C.
WITH 43 MAPS, FOLIO, HALF-BOUND. 6L 6s.

"The students of Dr. Wm. Smith's admirable Dictionaries must have felt themselves again and again brought up short for want of an Atlas constructed on the same scale of precise and minute information with the article they were reading. This want has been supplied by the superb work before us. The indices are full, the engraving is exquisite, and the delineation of the natural features very minute and beautiful. It may safely be pronounced—and higher praise can scarcely be bestowed—to be a worthy companion of a series of familiar volumes which it is intended to illustrate, "—The Guardian.

LONDON: PRINTED BY WILLIAM CLOWES AND SONS, LIMITED, STAMFORD STREET AND CHARING CROSS.
LIST OF WRITERS

IN THE DICTIONARIES OF CHRISTIAN BIOGRAPHY AND ANTIQUITIES.

INITIALS. NAMES.
A. H. D. A. Arthur Herbert Dyke Acland, M.A.,
Of Christ Church, Oxford.
S. A. Sheldon Amos, M.A., Late Professor of Jurisprudence in University College, London.
M. F. A. Rev. Marsham Frederick Argles, M.A., Fellow of St. John's College, Oxford, and Principal of St. Stephen's House.
H. T. A. Rev. Henry Thomas Armfield, M.A., F.S.A., Vice-Principal of the Theological College, Salisbury.
W. T. A. William Thomas Arnold, M.A., University College, Oxford.
C. B. Rev. Churchill Babington, D.D., F.L.S., Disney Professor of Archaeology in the University of Cambridge; Rector of Cockfield, Suffolk; formerly Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge.
H. B—y. Rev. Henry Bailey, D.D., Rector of West Tarring and Honorary Canon of Canterbury Cathedral; late Warden of St. Augustine's College, Canterbury, and formerly Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge.
C. J. B. Rev. Charles James Ball, M.A., Master in Merchant Taylors' School.
J. B—y. Rev. James Barmby, B.D., Vicar of Pittington, Durham; formerly Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, and Principal of Bishop Hatfield's Hall, Durham.
A. B. Rev. Alfred Barry, D.D., Principal of King's College, London, and Canon of Worcester.
S. A. B. S. A. Bennett, B.A.,
Of Lincoln's Inn.
E. W. B. Right Rev. Edward White Benson, D.D.
Bishop of Truro.
LIST OF WRITERS.

INITIALS.

H. B.  Henry Bradshaw, M.A., (in Dict. Biog.) Fellow of King's College, Cambridge; Librarian of the University of Cambridge.

W. B.  Rev. William Bright, D.D., Canon of Christ Church, Oxford; Regius Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the University of Oxford.

I. B.  Isambard Brunel, D.C.L., Of Lincoln's Inn; Chancellor of the Diocese of Ely.

J. B.  James Bryce, D.C.L., Of Lincoln's Inn; Regius Professor of Civil Law in the University of Oxford.

C.  Venerable Samuel Cheetham, M.A., Archdeacon of Southwark; Professor of Pastoral Theology in King's College, London, and Chaplain of Dulwich College; formerly Fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge.

E. B. C.  Edward Byles Cowell, M.A., Professor of Sanskrit in the University of Cambridge Fellow of Corpus Christi College.

LIST OF WRITERS.

INITIALS.

L. D. Rev. Lionel Davidson, M.A., Curate of St. James’s, Piccadilly.

W. P. D. Rev. William Purdie Dickson, D.D., Professor of Divinity in the University of Glasgow.

A. B. C. D. Miss A. B. C. Dunbar.

E. S. Ff. Rev. Edmund Salusbury Ffoulkes, B.D., Vicar of St. Mary the Virgin, Oxford; formerly Fellow and Tutor of Jesus College, Oxford.

W. F. G. The late Rev. William Frederick Greenfield, M.A., Master of the Lower School, Dulwich College.

LIST OF WRITERS.

INITIALS. NAMES.

A. W. H. The late Rev. Arthur West Haddon, B.D., Rector of Barton-on-the-Heath; Hon. Canon of Worcester; sometime Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford.

C. E. H. Rev. Charles Edward Hammond, M.A., Lecturer (late Fellow and Tutor) of Exeter College, Oxford.

E. H. Rev. Edwin Hatch, M.A., Vice-Principal of St. Mary Hall, Oxford.

E. C. H. Rev. Edwards Comerford Hawkins, M.A., Head Master of St. John's Foundation School, Leatherhead.

L. H. Rev. Lewis Hensley, M.A., Vicar of Hitchin, Herts; formerly Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge.

C. H. Rev. Charles Hole, B.A., Lecturer in Ecclesiastical History at King's College, London; formerly Rector of Loxbear.

H. S. H. Rev. Henry Scott Holland, M.A., Senior Student and Tutor of Christchurch, Oxford.

H. Rev. Fenton John Anthony Hort, D.D., Hulsean Professor of Divinity, Cambridge; Chaplain to the Bishop of Winchester.

H. J. H. Rev. Henry John Hotham, M.A., Vice-Master of Trinity College, Cambridge.

J. H. John Hullah, LL.D.,
Honorary Fellow of King's College, London.

W. I. Rev. William Ince, D.D., Canon of Christ Church, Oxford; Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Oxford.

W. J. Rev. William Jackson, M.A., F.S.A., F.R.A.S., Formerly Fellow of Worcester College, Oxford; Bampton
Lecturer for 1875.

G. A. J. Rev. George Andrew Jacob, D.D., Formerly Head Master of Christ's Hospital, London.

W. J. J. Rev. William James Josling, M.A., Rector of Moulton, Suffolk; formerly Fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge.

C. F. K. C. F. Keary,
Of the British Museum.

S. L. Rev. Stanley Leathes, D.D., Professor of Hebrew in King's College, London; Prebondary of St. Paul's; Minister of St. Philip's, Regent Street.

L. Right Rev. Joseph Barber Lightfoot, D.D., Bishop of Durham.

R. A. L. Richard Adelbert Lipsius, D.D.,
Professor of Divinity in the University of Jena.

J. M. L. John Malcolm Ludlow,
Of Lincoln's Inn.
LIST OF WRITERS.

G. F. M. Rev. George Frederick Maclean, D.D., Head Master of King's College School, London.

G. M. Rev. George Mead, M.A., Chaplain to the Forces, Plymouth.

F. M. Rev. Frederick Meyrick, M.A., Rector of Blickling, Norfolk; Prebendary of Lincoln Cathedral; Chaplain to the Bishop of Lincoln; formerly Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford.

W. M. Rev. William Milligan, D.D., Professor of Divinity and Biblical Criticism in the University of Aberdeen.

G. H. M. Rev. George Herbert Morgan, M.A., Rector of Duntesbourne Rous, near Cirencester; Examining Chaplain to the Bishop of Salisbury; formerly Fellow of Corpus Christi College, Oxford.

T. D. C. M. Rev. Thomas Daniel Cox Morse, Incumbent of Christ Church, Forest Hill.

J. R. M. John Rickards Mozley, M.A., Formerly Fellow of King's College, Cambridge.

F. P. Rev. Francis Paget, M.A., Senior Student and Tutor of Christ Church, Oxford; Examining Chaplain to the Bishop of Ely.
LIST OF WRITERS.

INITIALS.

G. W. P. Rev. Gregory Walton Pennethorne, M.A., Vicar of Ferring, Sussex, and Rural Dean; formerly Vice-Principal of the Theological College, Chichester.

W. G. F. P. Walter G. F. Phillimore, D.C.L., Of the Middle Temple; Chancellor of the Diocese of Lincoln; formerly Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford.

H. W. P. Rev. Henry Wright Philott, M.A., Rector of Staunton-on-Wye; Praelector of Hereford Cathedral; formerly Student of Christ Church and Master in Charterhouse School.

A. P. Rev. Alfred Plummer, M.A., Master of University College, Durham.

E. H. P. Rev. Edward Hayes Plumptre, D.D., Professor of New Testament Exegesis in King’s College, London; Prebendary of St. Paul’s Cathedral; Vicar of Bickley; formerly Fellow of Brasenose College, Oxford.

De Pressensé. Rev. E. De Pressensé, Of Paris.

J. R. Rev. James Raine, M.A., Canon of York; formerly Fellow of the University of Durham.

W. R. Very Rev. William Reeves, D.D.,
        Dean of Armagh.

H. R. R. Rev. Henry Robert Reynolds, D.D., Principal of Cheshunt College.

G. S. Rev. George Salmon, D.D., Regius Professor of Divinity, Trinity College, Dublin.

P. S. Rev. Philip Schaff, D.D., Bible House, New York.

F. H. A. S. Rev. Frederick Henry Ambrose Scrivener, M.A., D.C.L., Prebendary of Exeter and Vicar of Hendon, Middlesex.

W. E. S. Rev. William Edward Scudamore, M.A., Rector of Ditchingham; formerly Fellow of St. John’s College, Cambridge.

J. S. Rev. John Sharpe, M.A., Rector of Gissing, Norfolk; formerly Fellow of Christ’s
        College, Cambridge.

B. S. The late Benjamin Shaw, M.A.,
        Of Lincoln’s Inn; formerly Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge.

W. M. S. Rev. William Macdonald Sinclair, M.A., Domestic Chaplain to the Bishop of London.

R. S. Rev. Robert Sinker, M.A., Librarian of Trinity College, Cambridge.

I. G. S. Rev. Isaac Gregory Smith, M.A., Vicar of Great Malvern; Prebendary of Hereford Cathedral; formerly Fellow of Brasenose College, Oxford; Bampton Lecturer for 1873.
LIST OF WRITERS.

INITIALS.

R. T. S.  Rev. R. Travers Smith, M.A., Vicar of St. Bartholomew's, Dublin.

J. de S.  Rev. John de Soyres, B.A.

J. W. S.  Rev. John William Stanbridge, M.A., Fellow of St. John's College, Oxford.

W. S.    Rev. William Stewart, D.D., Professor of Biblical Criticism in the University of Glasgow.

G. T. S.  Rev. G. T. Stokes, M.A., Vicar of All Saints, Blackrock, Dublin.

J. S.—T.  John Stuart, LL.D.,
          Of the General Register House, Edinburgh.

S.       Rev. William Stubbis, M.A., Canon of St. Paul's; Regius Professor of Modern History in the University of Oxford.

C. A. S.  Rev. Charles Anthony Swainson, D.D., Margaret Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge; Canon of Chichester Cathedral; formerly Fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge.

H. B. S.  Rev. Henry Barclay Swete, B.D., Rector of Ashdon; formerly Fellow and Divinity Lecturer of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge.

E. S. T.  Rev. Edward Stuart Talbot, M.A., Warden of Keble College, Oxford.

C. T.    Rev. Charles Taylor, M.A.,
          Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge.

R. St. J. T.  Rev. Richard St. John Tyrwhitt, M.A., Formerly Student and Rhetoric Reader of Christchurch, Oxford.

E. V.    Rev. Edmund Venables, M.A., Canon Residentiary and Precentor of Lincoln Cathedral;
          Chaplain to the Bishop of London.

H. W.    Rev. Henry Wace, M.A., Chaplain of Lincoln's Inn, and Professor of Ecclesiastical History in King's College, London.

M. A. W.  Mrs. Humphrey Ward,
           Oxford.

F. E. W.  Rev. Frederick Edward Warren, B.D., Fellow of St. John's College, Oxford.

           Warden of St. Augustine's College, Canterbury, and Professor of Logic and Metaphysics in King's College, London.

E. B. W.  Rev. Edward Barnet Wensley, B.A., Vicar of All Hallows, Hoo, Rochester.
LIST OF WRITERS.

INITIALS.  NAMES.

B. F. W.    Rev. Brooke Foss Westcott, D.D., or W.        Canon of Peterborough; Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge; formerly Fellow of Trinity College.

G. W.      The late Rev. George Williams, B.D., Vicar of Ringwood; Hon. Canon of Winchester; formerly Fellow of King's College, Cambridge.

Chr. W.    Rev. Christopher Wordsworth, M.A., Rector of Glaston, formerly Fellow of Peterhouse, and Scholar of Trinity College, Cambridge.

J. W.       Rev. John Wordsworth, M.A., Prebendary of Lincoln; Examining Chaplain to the Bishop of Lincoln; Tutor, and formerly Fellow, of Brasenose College, Oxford.

W. A. W.    William Aldis Wright, M.A., Trinity College, Cambridge.

E. M. Y.    Rev. Edward Mallet Young, M.A., Head Master of Sherborne School; Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge.

H. W. Y.    Rev. Henry William Yule, B.C.L., M.A., Rector of Shipton-on-Cherwell and Vicar of Hampton Gay.
PREFACE TO VOL. II.

In publishing another volume the Editors have to explain that it has been found desirable to extend the work to four volumes. They felt that the value of a Dictionary of early Christian Biography would depend both upon the completeness of its onomasticon, and upon its thorough discussion of the greater names. It became apparent, as they proceeded, that to attain these objects a larger space would be required than was at first contemplated, and the liberality of the publisher has allowed them the space necessary to carry out their design. Although the present volume terminates with Hermocrates, it will be found that, for the special purposes of the Christian Biography of the first eight centuries, one half of the Alphabet has practically been treated. A remarkable number of the important names in Church History occur in the early letters. This volume, for instance, contains articles which are necessarily of exceptional length on such names as Eusebius of Caesarea, Gnosticism, the Gregories of the East and the West, Ephraim the Syrian, Epiphanius, the Apocryphal Gospels, the Hebrew Learning of the Fathers, and Hermas; while Anglo-Saxon names commencing with the letter E are peculiarly numerous. There will consequently be no difficulty in completing the work within the limits now prescribed to it.

In reference to this extension of the book, the Editors feel that it is but justice to the generous labours of the contributors to call attention to the original research which has been bestowed upon it and to the scientific purpose which has been kept in view. The first volume was very kindly received; but some further explanation of the design and character of the undertaking seems still due to the distinguished English and Foreign scholars who have cooperated in it. In combination with the Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, the book will be found to be unique in the comprehensiveness with which the whole sphere of Christian life during the first eight centuries has been treated. It has been compared with the valuable German cyclopaedias of Herzog and of Wetzer and Welte. But in the first place it is an attempt, to which those works make no pretension, to notice every name connected with the history of the early Church; and though many such names may be insignificant in themselves, they are frequently of considerable importance in determining critical difficulties which arise in respect to the greater personages. It sometimes happens, for example, that exact knowledge respecting some obscure name which is mentioned by two writers may throw important light on their relations to each other. The information, moreover, furnished by these minor articles is often precisely that which a student finds it most difficult to obtain, and the minute points they illustrate in Church History are sometimes very characteristic. But a not less important difference between this work and the foreign cyclopaedias which have preceded it will at once be seen if reference be made to a few of the more important articles. The subjects of such articles will be found to be treated not merely with independence and originality, but with a fulness which no modern work has attempted. Since, indeed, the Cyclopaedias just mentioned survey the whole range of religious history, from its commencement to the present time, it would have been impracticable for them to enter with any fulness of detail into the history of the first eight centuries. From this point of view it is hoped that this Dictionary may serve to remove a reproach which has not unfrequently been cast upon Protestant learning, and for which it must be admitted that there has hitherto been some ground. Since the admirable work of Cave, the subjects of Patrology, and of early Christian life and literature, have been less comprehensively treated among us than is their due. The present work, however, will supply a greater mass of materials for the history of the early centuries of the Church, together with a more complete application to them of the resources of modern learning and criticism, than is anywhere else accessible; and the credit may, therefore, without presumption, be claimed for it of being, at least in design and effort, the most important contribution to Church History which, either in this country or abroad, has been made for many years.

In dismissing a second volume, the Editors have again to express their gratitude for the ready and cordial co-operation they have received; but their acknowledgments are pre-eminently due to two distinguished scholars, to whose generous assistance the work is peculiarly indebted. Dr. Salmon, the Regius Professor of Divinity in Trinity College, Dublin, and Canon Stubbs, the Regius Professor of Modern History in the University of Oxford, have not only written numerous and important articles, but have had the goodness to read the proofs of this volume. They are of course in no way responsible for the final result of the Editors' labours; but their suggestions have been of the greatest service. The Editors must also express their continued obligations to the Rev. Charles Hole, Lecturer in Ecclesiastical History in King's College, London, for the constant devotion with which he has assisted them, and for the invaluable learning and labour he has bestowed upon the work.
A DICTIONARY
OF
CHRISTIAN BIOGRAPHY,
LITERATURE, SECTS, AND DOCTRINES.

E

EABA

EABA, a daughter of Eanfrith, brother of Eanhere, under-kings or eldersmen of the Hwicce, and wife of Eadwald, king of the South Saxons (d. 685). She was baptized in her brother’s dominions, and, with her husband, who received Christianity about 661 under the influence of Wulfhere, king of the Mercians, encouraged Wilfrid in 681 to attempt the conversion of the South Saxons. Nothing more is known of her, but from her father Eanfrith, her friendship with Wilfrid, and the connexion between the Hwiccian princes and the royal house of Northumbria, she was probably nearly related to St. Ebba, abbess of Coldingham. (Bede, H. E. iv. 13; Edd. V. Wulf. c. 40.) [S.]

EABA (2), an abbot of Malmesbury in the 8th century. His name occurs among the memorials of St. Boniface, in a letter addressed by a monk unnamed [Hildeg] to Lullus of Mainz. In this the writer reminds Lullus of their ancient friendship “in Maldubia civitate, quando Eaba ubus in amabilis caritate nutritvit,” and calls to his recollection that Eaba had given him the name of “Lytel.” (Mon. Magunt. ed. Jaffé, p. 300; Bonif. Append. ed. Würdtevin, ep. 123.) No such name occurs in the received, but very imperfect lists of the abbots of Malmesbury. (W. Malmesey, G. P. lib. v.; Monast. Angl. i. 255.) There is, however, in the list recently discovered by Mr. W. de G. Birch in the Cotton MS. Vitellius A. 10 (Birch, Abbats of Malmesbury, pp. 6, 30), an abbot Aembrht, who may be identical with Eaba, and with an abbot Embrht, who, between 755 and 757 had a charter from Ethelred of Mercia, and Cynwulf of Wessex. [Embrbht.] However this may have been, as Lullus must have been over thirty when in 754 he was made bishop, and as according to his biographers he was seven years old when he was admitted into the monastery (Vit. S. Luli, ap. Surium, Oct. 16), Eaba’s date at Malmesbury must fall about 730. [S.]

EABA (3), presbyter of Boniface and bishop of Maastricht. [Eodanucus.]

EABB (Kemble, C. D. 37; Thorin, in Twaed. col. 1770; Elmhamp, pp. 223, 234, ed. Hardwicke), abbess. [Eodmensbury.] [C. H.]

CHRIST. BIOGR.—VOL. II.

EADBald

EADA, presbyter, a valued friend of Alcuin, who thanks him for presents, and praises his munificence towards him. Alcuin says his bark has been hurried along by gales into the vortex of wealth, and he envies Eada his chosen life of poverty, where he would gladly follow him according to his own earliest bent. Mabillon concludes that Eada was a monk. The editors of the Monumenta Alcuiniana have no doubt that the epistle addressed to him was written before Alcuin went to reside over his abbey at Tours and they suggest the date A.D. 796. (Mon. Alcuin. ep. 47, ed. Jaffé, p. 269; Alcuin, Opp. ed. Froben. i. 201, ep. 140; Mabill. Annal. Ord. S. Ben. lib. xxvii. c. 31.) [C. H.] and converted. This is the tale; it has been suggested that originally it was only a story of a dream, and that the corporal inflictions were a later addition to it; in that case Eadbal must have been impressed by Laurentius's account of the dream, and by that only. The other alternative is to suppose that Laurentius stooped to a fraud for the purpose of making a salutary impression on the self-willed pagan prince. Whatever was the cause of Eadbal's change, it was most thorough and practical. He broke off his unlawful "cunnabulum" (Bede, i. 6), denounced all manner of idolatry, accepted the faith, was baptized, and took pains in all things to consult for and promote the interests of the church, to the utmost of his power. He sent to Gaul, and recalled Mellitus and Justus; the latter returned in peace to Rochester, but the Londoners would not receive the former, and Eadbal, not having inherited his father's lordship, was unable to constrain them. What he could do he did; "in union with his own people," he studied to devote himself to the divine precepts. He built a chapel of the Virgin within the monastery of SS. Peter and Paul. He is said to have bestowed a munificence to Folkestone for his daughter Eanswitha, who became the local saint of the place. The venerable church within the precincts of Dover Castle is thought to be substantially a work of his reign (see Freeman, Norw. Conq. iii. 939). But he did not enforce the abandonment or destruction of idols (cf. Bede, ii. 8). When Edwin, who had recently gained possession of the throne of Northumbria, sent envoys to ask the hand of Eadbal's sister Ethelburga—called Tata in her own family as a name of endearment—her brother answered firmly, that he could not allow a Christian maiden to be wedded to a heathen husband. The envoys reported this refusal to Edwin, who sent them back with the assurance that he would in no wise hinder Ethelburga from the practice of her own religion; on the contrary, he would freely permit both herself and her attendants, male and female, to worship as Christians, and would even himself adopt their faith, if, on inquiry, it should seem better to wise men "holier and worthier of God." On these terms Eadbal consented to the marriage in 625, and sent with her on her journey northwards Paulinus, consecrated by archbishop Justus, in the episcopate, in the hope that he might act not only as her spiritual guide, but as a missionary bishop in Northumbria. When Edwin fell in the battle of Hatfield, and Ethelburga and Paulinus returned to Kent, Eadbal established the latter in the vacant see of Rochester (Bede, ii. 20). This was in the close of 633; Eadbal lived seven years longer, and died in 640, "leaving his kingdom to his son Earcombert" (Bede, iii. 8). For a Cottonian MS. referring to Eadbal, see Hardy, Descr. Cant. i. 359. [W. B.]

EADBALD (3), an ealdorman, whose name (printed Facundius by the Magdeburg Centurio-dators) appears among the witan, who approved the acts of the legatine council held in southern England in 787. He is identified by Jaffé with the ealdorman Eadbal, who attested Mercian charters from 777 onwards. (Kemble, C. D. i. 158, 167, 170; Mon. Alcuin. p. 162; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 402.)

EADBERHT (5), aedbolus, F. Wig. M. H. B. 546), the twelfth bishop of London in the ancient lists. (M. H. B. 617.) As his name occurs between those of Kenwalch, who was bishop in 753, and Heathoberht, who attested grants in 798 and 799, he is no doubt to be identified with the bishop Eadbal, who, according to the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, went away from the land in the year of Offa's death, 796. (M. H. B. 338.)

EADBALT (Gaimar, Estoria, v. 1273, M. H. B. 780), king of Kent. [EADBERHT (1).]

[CH.]

EADBERHT. [EADBERHT, EADBERHT.]

EADBERHT (1) (Kemble, C. D. 72, a.d. 724, brother of Ethelberht king of Kent; C. D. 85, a.d. 738; 1003, a.d. 741; 1004, a.d. 747), king of Kent. [EADBERHT (2).]

EADBERHT (3) (Kemble, C. D. 106, a.d. 761; 107, a.d. 761; 110, a.d. 762, all doubtful), king of Kent. [EADBERHT (3).]

EADBERHT (4) (A. S. C. ann. 757, 788 in M. H. B. 333, 334; Simeon Dunelm. G. R. A. in M. H. B. 639 a, 662 a, c, e, 663 e), king of Northumbria. [EADBERHT (5).]

[CH.]

EADBERHT (5) (EADBERT), a monk of Lindisfarne, succeeded Cuthbert in a.d. 688 as bishop of that see, being especially noted for his knowledge of the Scriptures, and for the strict way in which he gave a tenth of everything to the poor (Bed. H. E. iv. 29). He was the first prelate who removed from his monastery the old roof of reeds or wattles, with which Finan had covered it, replacing them with sheets or webs of lead (id. iii. 25).

In the spring of a.d. 698, the first translation of the remains of St. Cuthbert took place. Eadberht gave his assent, but was from home when the examination of the grave was made, spending Lent, according to his wont, in solitude and prayer on some neighbouring island. The monks open the grave, and find what they consider to be an un decayed body. Delighted at their discovery they hasten with the news to Eadberht, taking with them some of the robes which they had found in the tomb. The bishop kissed them, and bade his brethren clothe the saint anew, and inter him in the coffin above ground, which had been prepared. Then the tears rushed down his cheeks, and he told them that the place where the body had been taken would soon be filled again. The words were prophetic. On the 6th of May following the speaker himself died, after a long and a painful illness, and in accordance with his earnest desire, as he deprecated a sudden death. The monks laid his body under Cuthbert's coffin (Bed. H. E. iv. 30; Via S. Cath. cap. xlii. xiiii.; Symeon, Hist. Eccl. Dun. i. 11).
The memory of Eadberht was dear to the “family” of Lindisfarne, and in their enforced wanderings they carried about with them his remains, together with those of their great patron. At Durham, where they finally rested, the bones of Eadberht occupied one of the little vats of relics with which Cuthbert’s body was surrounded (Sivon Poem de Svit: Danemâc; Hist. Transil. S. Cuthberti, ed. Surtees Soc. 191; Symeon, Hist. Eccl. Dumn., ii. 18). When Cuthbert’s tomb was opened in 1827 some of these relics were discovered in it. Eadberht has a place in the calendar on May 6. (Cf. Acta SS. Boll. 6 Maii, ii. 107–8.) There is a short account of Eadberht derived from Bede in MS. Cotton, Julius, A. x. 93–4. [J. R.]

EADBERHT (6), bishop of Dunwich. [ALDBERT (1).]

EADBERHT (7) (EADBERT, FIDIBERT, Wharton, Epp. Lond. p. 20; ALDBERT), the ninth bishop of London (M. H. B. 617). He is probably the “Eudberchus,” whose name occurs among the attestations of the legatine council of 787 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 461), and, as two bishops of this name are attested at the date of Offa at the council of Brentford in 781 (Kemble, C. D. 145; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 439), it is probable that he became bishop between 772, when his predecessor Wighest was living (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 402), and the year 780. Endgar, his successor, was bishop in 788. Eadberht would, if these limits are correct, be bishop of London at the time of the foundation of the archiepiscopate of Lichfield.

EADBERHT (8) (Kemble, Coll. Diplom. 992, A.D. 683; 995, A.D. 892), bishop. [EADBERHT (7).] [C. H.]

EADBERHT (9), abbot of Reculver. To him about the year 747 a grant of land at Berhamstede (Berstow) was made by Eardulf king of Kent. (Kemble, C. D. 1005.) The name appears as Henberht in Monast. Angl. 1. 454, 455.

EADBERHT (10), a Mercian abbat, who attested a charter of Offa, dated in 774 (Kemble, C. D. 121), in which land is granted at Heaham (Higham) to archbishop Jacobert.

EADBERHT (11), an abbot of the diocese of Sherborn, who attested the acts of the council of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 546.)

EADBERHT (12), a priest of the diocese of Leicester, who attested the acts of the council of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 546.) The name is common to three other priests who attended the same council from the dioceses of Elam, Dunwich, and Selby. (Ib.)

EADBERT (1) (Alcuin, Carm. 289, Opp. ii. 240, ed. Froben.), bishop of Lindisfarne. [EADBERHT (5).] [C. H.]

EADBERT (2), king of Kent, son of Wihtred, and brother of Ethelbert and Alric, whom Bede (B. E. c. 28) mentions as Wihtred’s heirs. At the witagemot of Bescanced (696–716) there appears among the attestations “signum Aethelberthi pro se et fratrem suo Eadbarto,” from which it would seem probable that Eadbert was the second son. According to the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (M. H. B., p. 380) Eadbert succeeded Wihtred in 725 and died in 748. Withred’s death is fixed by Bede to April 23, 725, and it would seem probable from charters that the brothers, or at least Eadbert and Ethelbert, then began to reign conjointly. Thus, besides the evidence afforded by charters of Ethelbert as king dated in 732 and 740 (Kemble, C. D. 77, 80), in a charter dated April 738 Ethelbert grants ten ploughlands at Hohgild to Andscobesham to the church of Rochester (K. C. D. 85), and the grant is confirmed by Ethelbert; another charter of Eadbert, dated 747, is a grant from the port dues at Fordwich to the church of Reculver (S. 1004), which appears in a genuine charter of Ethelbert dated 741 (S. 80) as a grant of that king. In a third grant, however, Eadbert seems by himself to give fisheries at Limenes to Christ Church, Canterbury. (Kemble, C. D. 1003.) The last document, in its present form, is spurious, as it identifies Eadberht with his namesake and contemporary, the king of Northumbria, Eadbertain Exitage; and the other two are of questionable authority. If this last charter is genuine, the death of Eadberht in the Chronicle and by Florence of Worcester be accepted, all the later charters in which the name appears must be assigned to another Eadbert; on this point the evidence of historians is both weak and conflicting. Florence of Worcester in his Chronicle (M. H. B. 643) makes Ethelbert succeed Eadbertain in 748 and die in 760 (C. 544), whilst in the Gesta regum (S. 635) he makes Ethelbert succeed Wihtred, and Eadbert, whom he confounds with Eadbert Praen, succeed Ethelbert. William of Malmesbury assigns to the three brothers successive reigns, Eadbert twenty-three, Ethelbert eleven, and Alric thirty-four years; a computation which agrees with that of the Chronicle of Florence so far as concerns the two elder brothers, but would give an inordinately long life to Alric, whom also he represents as conquered by Offa in 774. (G. R. lib. i. 15; ed. Hardy, p. 24.) The Canterbury writers and the charters of St. Augustine’s add a new element of confusion. According to Elmhelm, Eadbertain, in the thirty-sixth year of his reign, which he makes coincide with the year 760 and the archiepiscopate of Bregwin, bestowed land at Mengham on St. Augustine’s (Elmhelm, ed. Hardwicke, p. 319), and the same year confirmed to the abbess Sigeburga a grant which had been made by Ethelbald king of Mercia. (Ib. 322.) The king’s death is also dated in 761 and it is added that he was buried at Reculver (S. 324), Ethelbert being his successor and reigning only one year. It is obvious that the chronology is here constructed to agree with the charters; the writer was conscious of the difficulty, and tried to correct the supposed misstatement of the Chronicle; but he follows William of Malmesbury in ascribing to Alric the third brother a reign that ends in 795. (Ib. 337.) In this confusion it would seem most reasonable to set the reign of Alric aside altogether, and to take the evidence of Eadbertain’s charters rather than that of William of Malmesbury; to accept the year 762 for the death of Ethelbert [ETHELBERT (2)], and to suppose that any genuine grants, if such there be, which bear the name of Eadbert later than 762 were issued by some other Eadbert, who, in the anarchic condition of Kent, may have risen to power. Such would be the grant of king Sigwine to bishop Eadulf, dated 762, and confirmed by Eadbert (Kemble, C. D. 110; Mon. Angl. i. 162); that of Offa to Rochester dated 764, and attested by king Hebert (K. C. D. 111), and two undated grants by Ecgbert to Rochester, also attested by Hebert. (7b. 113, 160.) The great uncertainty as to the true date of Eadbert’s death makes it impossible to refer any important events of English history to his reign; Elmham, however, accuses him of burning the town by the command of Archbishop Cahtbert attempted to deprive St. Augustine’s of the privilege of the archiepiscopal burials. (P. 317.)
EADBERT

EADBERT (3) king of Kent, referred to in the preceding article, seems to reign conjointly with Egbert in 765. (Kemble, C. D. 113.) In another charter in which Doria is mentioned as bishop of Rochester (K. C. D. 160), and which therefore must be dated between 765 and 785, Eadbert (under the form Henberht) subscribes an act of Egbert. Nothing more is known about him, unless, which is difficult to suppose, he was identical with Eadbert Pena.

EADBERT (4) PRAEN, king of Kent, a member of the royal house of Kent and a kinsman of Egbert of Wessex. (H. Hunt. M. H. B. 733; cf. Chr. L. A.D. 923; M. H. B. 343.) Although he was in holy orders, he had been perhaps ordained in order to disqualify him for the Kentish crown, he obtained, after the death of Offa, the support of a great part of Kent, and made himself king. Notwithstanding the hostility of Kuenulf king of Mercia, and of archbishop Ethelhard, who enlisted pope Leo III. against him as an apostate priest, he maintained his position for three years. As these years must be computed from the death of Offa they fall in 795, 796, and 797; in the last of which Eadbert Pena was taken prisoner by Kuenulf, who ordered his eyes to be put out and his hands to be cut off. Kuenulf then annexed Kent as a subject kingdom to Mercia, and placed it under the government of king Cuthred. (Sim. Dun. M. H. B. 670; H. Hunt. ib. 732, 733, 734.) If the tradition of the abbey of Winchelcumb rests on any authority Eadbert Pena survived his overthrow for many years, and on the occasion of the dedication of that monastery in 811, recorded by William of Malmsbury (G. P. ed. Hamilton, p. 294; G. R. ed. Hardy, lib. i. § 85), was unannounced by Kuenulf. During his short reign he struck coins bearing his name, “Eadbirt rex,” and those of four different moneys, Babba, Ethelmod, Juenerht and Thidren. (Hawks., Silver Coins of England, pp. 32, 33.)

Several interesting points might be raised respecting Eadbert Pena. The origin of his surname is unknown. His relation to the Aescings is obscure, and his political career may be read in two ways. It is even possible that he was identical with the Eadbert whose name appears in the charters of 762 and later years [EADBERT (5)], and that having been deposed in one of the struggles of the time, he may have been condemned to the touscure. As he was a kinsman of Ethlmand, father of Egbert king of Wessex, who reigned in Kent in 786, he probably belonged to a branch which represented the West Saxons as opposed to the Mercian interest in Kent; and as archbishop Ethelhard was altogether under the influence of Kuenulf, he had ably been a nominee of Offa, his opposition to Eadbert Pena was no doubt as much political as ecclesiastical. We may then infer that Eadbert, instead of being a mere adventurer, was the champion of Kentish independence; such a conclusion is warranted by the words of Henry of Huntingdon, who, following some lost authority (or perhaps the Chronicle, M. H. B. 343), describes the deposition of Eadbert as an unjust act. (M. H. B. 733.) A great deal of light is thrown on this side of the subject by the letters of Alcuin. In one he entreats Ethelhard not to desert his church (Mon. Alcuin. ep. 44, p. 265; H. and S. iii. 495), and mentions that he has written to Offa to defend him. Although Eadbert is not mentioned by name the letter suggests that his schemes had been in preparation before Offa’s death. In another letter Alcuin writes to the nobles and clergy of Kent, urging them to recall Eadbert, and warns them of the evils of discord, alleging that the ancient lines of the kings had nearly become extinct. (Mon. Alcuin, ed. Jaffé, p. 369; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 509–511.) Although we cannot accept 795 as the date of the death of King Alric, to which Alcuin might seem to refer, it is probable that the direct line of succession was quite extinct before the West Saxon Ethel- mund became king in 786. In 795 Leo III. writing to Kuenulf says that he has superintended the deposition of Eadbert, “qua nos de clerico illo apostata qui ascenderat in regnum, similem illum deputasset Juliano Parbatasae, anathematizantes abijcimus, salutem animae ejus procurantes,” and promises that if the pretender still holds out he will issue letters to the whole nation of Britain to rise and expel him. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 524.) It is clear, therefore, that Eadbert was no ordinary rebel; but the obscurity that hangs over the Kentish succession cannot now be penetrated. The mistake of Florence, by which Eadbert Pena is confused with the earlier king, son of Wihtred, has been noticed [EADBERT (1)].

EADBERT (5) (EADBURGH), king of Northumbria, son of Æsta, and cousin of “the most glorious Ceolwulf,” whom he succeeded a.d. 737 (Cont. Bed. in M. H. B. 288 n.). His brother Egbert became archbishop of York two years earlier. Eadberht was a very able ruler, and added largely to the dignity and extent of his dominions. Symeon tells us that he won the admiration and the friendship of the Angles, Picts, Britons, and Scots, and that Pepin, king of France, regarded him with respect, and sent him various king-like gifts (Hist. Eccl. Dom. ii. 2). In a.d. 740, whilst Eadberht was attacking the Picts, a part of his kingdom was ravaged by Ethelbald king of Mercia (Chronol. apud Bedan). In a.d. 750 he took from the Britons of Strathclyde the district of Kyle in Ayrshire, which had formerly belonged to Northumbria (id.). In the same year Eadberht came into violent collision with the officers of the church of Lindisfarne. Symeon gives a somewhat different account of the occurrence in his History of the Church of Durham (ii, cap. 2) from that which is recorded in the chronicle ascribed to him.
EADBERT
(p. 19, ed. Surtees Soc.). It appears that Offa, son of Aldfrid, a man of royal descent, took sanctuary in Lindisfarne at St. Cuthbert's shrine, from whence he was forcibly taken by his foes and killed. In connexion with this outrage, Cynewulf, bishop of Lindisfarne, was imprisoned by Eadbert at Bambridg, and the charge of his diocese was intrusted for a time to Fritho bert bishop of Hexham. It seems probable that the king was offended with Cynewulf for giving protection to the fugitive, who, if he was a son of king Aldfrith, may possibly have been looked upon by Eadbert as a rival.

In A.D. 756 Eadbert met with a great reverse. He made an alliance with his former enemies, the Picts, and joined Uungs their king in an expedition to Alcestrœ, where the Britons surrendered to him. But a few days subsequently, on the 10th of August, his army was routed and destroyed between Ouana and Nivanbürig (Symeon, Hist. Regnum, 20). Mr. Hodgson Hinde was of opinion that these places were Loch Duan and Newburgh in Perthshire. Mr. Skene, however, prefers Newburgh in Northumberland.

In A.D. 757 pope Paul I. wrote to Eadbert, stating that abbot Forcdred had complained to him of his taking away three monasteries which had been granted to him by a certain abbess, Staninggarve (Stonegrave), Cohawalla (Cowxold) and Donasmethe (Jarrow), and giving them to the patrician Moll (possibly Ethelwald Moll), who is spoken of as "frater ejus," a layman. The pope asks him to make restitution (Wilkins, i. 145; cf. ed. Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 394).

Two years after this disaster, and perhaps in consequence of it, Eadbert voluntarily resigned his throne in behalf of his son Osulf, and adopted the religious life. Symeon tells us that the other English kings tried to prevent him by promising to surrender a portion of each of their kingdoms for the augmentation of Northumbria, if he would continue to preside over it (Hist. Eccl. Dan. ii. 3). They pleaded in vain. Eadbert retired to the munster of York, of which his brother Egbert was the head, and there spent ten years. He died on Aug. 19, 768, and was buried in the cathedral in the same porch (or chapel) in which Egbert had been laid two years earlier (Saxon Chron. sub anno).

The two brothers possessed a mint at York, at which they coined stycas, the little copper coins which were peculiar to Northumbria. They show the legend of the king on one side, and the archbishop on the other. Several types have been discovered, which used to be erroneously ascribed to Eadbert of Kent.[r.]

EADBERT (5) (Eadbirt), the first bishop of the South Saxons. He was abbot of the monastery founded by Wilfrid at Selæ; and when, under the administration of Daniel bishop of Winchester and Forthere bishop of Sherborne, the South Saxons were detached from the West Saxon dioceses, Eadbert was consecrated bishop of the new see. This event took place after the death of Aldhelm (A.D. 709), and is commonly dated in 711. (Matt. Paris, ed. Luard, i. 323.) The attestation of Eadbert is found attached to the act of the council of Clovesho, A.D. 716, by which the privilege of Withred was confirmed (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 300); his name is likewise found in the attestations of charters of Nuna king of Sussex, which in their present condition are of uncertain date and questionable authenticity. (Kemble, C. D. 955, 1000, 1001.) The name "Eadburtus abbis" attached to a spurious charter of Caedwalla, dated 888, was probably intended to denote this person (ib. No. 994). William of Malmesbury, by a curious mistake, represents Eadbert as consecrated by archbishop Nothhelm. (G. P. lib. ii. § 96.) He and his successor Eola were both dead before Bede closed his history. (H. E. v. 18.)[s]

EADBERT (8), one of the East Anglian bishops at the time of Bede's death, according to Florence and Simeon, whose general narrative at that point is based upon the account in Bede (H. E. v. 23), Aldbert however, not Eadbert, being the name in Bede. All three mention the two East Anglian bishops (Heathelac being the second, in which they agree) without assigning their respective sees, whereas Wenvower gives Eadbert to Elmham and Heathelac to Dunwich. The ancient lists however (M. H. B. 618), which are of supreme authority to Wenvower, assign "Albertus" (if he be the same) to Dunwich. There is evidently much obscurity as to the succession in Elmham and Dunwich at that period, as to which, vid. ALDBERT (1), and Stubbs, Regist. Sacr. 168. (Flor. Wig. Chron. ann. 731 in M. H. B. 542 b; Sim. Dun. G. R. U. in M. H. B. 657 c; Wond. F. H. ann. 731, ed. Coxe.)

EADBERT (9), the fifth bishop of the Middle Angles at Leicester. (M. H. B. 624.) He was consecrated according to the northern chronological preserved by Simeon of Durham, in 704. (M. H. B. 663.) His name is found attached to the charters of the Mercian kings from 707 to 781, and, as his successor Unwona appears among the prelates at the legatine council of 787, his death probably took place between 781 and 787. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 436; W. Malmsb. p. 7; Kemble, C. D. 116, 120, 121, 126, 129, 131, 134, 137, 143, &c, &c.)

EADBERT (10) (Kemble, Cod. Dip. 139), bishop, see unnamed, witnesses a charter of Offa king of Mercia, reckoned spurious or doubtful by Kemble, Sept. 22, 780. His name occurs next to that of the archbishop. [EADBIRHT (7).]

EADBERT (11) (Ricard. Hagulst. cap. 18, ed. cap. 19 EADBIRHT; Tswysden, col. 299, 300; ed. Raina, pp. 41, 42; Wond. F. H. ann. 800, ed. Coxe), bishop of Hexham. [EADBIRHT.]

EADBERT (12), according to Wenvower a bishop of London, who died A.D. 802, and was succeeded by EADGAR (Wond. F. H. ann. 802, ed. Coxe). He is possibly intended for Heathelbert, the thirteenth bishop. [EADBIRHT]

EADBIRHT, a bishop whose name is attached to a charter of Nuna king of the South Saxons, granting him lands, A.D. 725 (Kemble, C. D. 1000). [EADBIRHT (7).]

EADBIRTH (Nenn. Hist. in Mon. Hist. Brit. 75 b), EADBIRHT (Flor. Wig. Chron. ann.
EADBOLD (A. S. C. ann. 633 in M. H. B. 309), king of Kent. [EADBALD (1).] [C. H.]

EADBRYHT (3), bishop, see unnamed, attesting a charter of archbishop Ethelward, considered spurious or doubtful by Kemble, A.D. 798. (Kemble, C. D. 1018.) Probably bishop of London. [EADBERT (10).] [C. H.]

EADBRITH (Wend.F.H. ann. 675, ed. Cox), bishop of London, succeeding Wiger, i.e. Wided. He is the Aiderbirht, ninth bishop, of Stubbs’s Registr. Sacr. 159.

EADBURG (Gaimar, Estoire, v. 2066; M. H. B. 789), queen of Wessex, daughter of Olf king of Mercia. [EADBOLI (1).]

EADBURG (1), daughter of Olf, and queen of the West Saxons. She is mentioned by Olf in a grant to Chertsey abbey, dated 787, together with his wife Cynethritha, his son Egfrith, and his daughters Ethelberga, Ethelfleda, and Ethelswitha. (Kemble, C. D. 151.) In 789 (Chr. S. 787) Eadburga was married to Britric, king of Wessex, who thus obtained the protection of Olf. According to Asser (M. H. B. 471), that says that he heard the story from king Alfred, and no doubt preserved the tradition of the West Saxon royal family, Eadburga was extremely jealous of any one who had influence with her husband, and altogether unscrupulous in the use she made of the sword or poison to get rid of her rivals. On one occasion she prepared poison for one of the favours, whose dismissal she had failed to secure; Britric drank the poison and left Eadburga a widow in the year 802. (Chr. S. 800.) As the West Saxons would not tolerate her continuance in the kingdom, she fled to the continent, and took refuge with the emperor. Charles on the occasion of her reception, jestingly gave her the choice between himself and his son. Eadburga replied: “If the choice is given me, I choose your son, inasmuch as he is the younger.” Charles answered: “If you had chosen me you should have had my son; as you have chosen my son you shall have neither.” He gave her, however, a monastery, over which she presided as abbess, but having been unchaste she was expelled, and died after having beggad alms daily, attended by a single servant, in the streets of Pavia. (Asser, M. H. B. 471, 472; Flor. Wig. 546, 552; Sim. Dun. 673.) In consequence of Eadburga’s misconduct the West Saxons refused to give the title of queen to the wives of their kings, a rule which was first broken when Judith, the wife of Ethelwulf, was crowned by Hincmar at Verberie. (Asser, p. 741; Ann. Bertin. ap. Pertz, i. 450; cf. Will. Malmesb. G. R. lib. ii. § 113.) [S.]

EADBURGA (2) (Bonif. Epp. in Monument. pp. 53, 84, 98, 211, 212, 214; Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 475), abbess of Minster in Thanet. [BUGA (3).]

EADBURGA (3), abbess of Repton; daughter of Eadulf [ALDWULF], king of the East Angles; called also Ethelburga (Wallisford, ap. Gale, p. 528), Aedberga, Aetberga, and Redburga (Ld. Elensa. p. 25), Aegburga (V. S. Guthlac; A.A. 86. G. S. sacc. iii. pt. 1, p. 270). After having lived as a nun for a number of years she became abbess of Hrepsundun or Repton towards the close of the 7th century. She is recorded to have sent to St. Guthlac a leaden coffin with a shroud for his burial, and to have asked him to foretell his successor. Guthlac described her as a person who was still a pagan, but would shortly be baptized, a prophecy which was fulfilled in Cista, who succeeded him. (Vit. S. Guthlac; Hist. Elensa. lib. i. c. 7; ed. Stewart, p. 26.) (Bromton, ap. Twyden, v. 797.) Another Eadburga, who is said to have been a nun at Aylesbury, and to have given her name to the village of Edbury, is called a daughter of Redwald of East Anglia; but she seems altogether mythical. (See Hardy, Cat. Mat. Brit. Hist. i. 476.) [S.]

EADBURGA (4), the second in the list of the abbesses of St. Peter’s, Gloucester. According to the “Historia” of that monastery she was the widow of Wulfhere king of Mercia, and received benefaction from St. Egwin in 710; is the 15th (or 25th) year of her abbacy she died, and was succeeded by bishop Wilfrid. (Another, A.D. 735. (Hist. Glosn. ed. Hart, i. 6, 7; Mon. Anglii, i. 532, 542.) This story is scarcely reconcilable with the history of St. Eorlend, who is likewise described as wife of Wulfhere [EORLMIELD]; and the authority on which it rests is scarcely worth consideration. It is, however, possible that Eorlend may have left her husband to become a nun, and that Eadburga was a later wife. [S.]

EADBYRHT (1) (MSS. in Hardy, Deor. Cat. i. 365), bishop of Lindisfarne. [KADBEIRT (5).] [C. II.]

EADBYRHT (2) (Ithelwerth, Chron. ii. 15 in M. H. B. 507 e, d), king of Northumbria [EADBEIRT (5).] [C. II.]
EADDA, bishop, see unnamed, who attests a charter of Ethelward subregulus of the Hwiccii, a.d. 706. (Kemble, C. D. 56.) [Hedd.; Heada.] [C. H.]

EADFERD FLESARUS (Nenni, Hist. in m. H. B. 76 A), king of Northumbria. [Ethelefrid (1).] [J. R.]

EADFIRD (Hist. Nennii in m. H. B. 75 b), son of Edwin king of Northumbria. [Eaefrid (1).] [C. H.]

EADBRD (Eadfrith), a son of Edwin king of Northumbria and his first wife Coenburga, daughter of Ceall of Mercia. He was born whilst his father was in exile, prior to his accession to the throne. With the rest of the royal family he became a Christian, and was baptized by Paulinus (Bed. H. E. ii. 14). In A.D. 633, after the death of his father at Haethfelth, Eadfrid was obliged to take refuge with Penda king of Mercia by whom he was treacherously put to death (id. ii. 20). [J. R.]

EADFRID (2) (Eadfrith), bishop of Lindisfarne from A.D. 698 to 721 (Flor. Wigorn. i. 45, 50). There is little known of him except in connection with his monastery. There is a single letter addressed to him by Alhelin abbate of Malmsbury on his return from Ireland. It is written in the uncouth Latinity of the period, and is of trifling importance (Epp. Hib. Syll. iv. 13; Aldhelm, cd. Giles, 90–95).

Eadfrid’s chief mission in life was to spread the fame and glory of his great predecessor, Cuthbert. “Multum servas amore,” says Synoe, “rebuild the oratory on Farne island, where Cuthbert had lived, and Fuldige then being its occupant (Synoe, H. E. D. i. 11).

But he did more than this. He was an artist of no common skill, and wrote and illustrated the famous Evangelarium, known as the Durham book, or Lindisfarne Gospels, which is one of the most beautiful MSS. in Europe. Eadfrid probably commenced it during Cuthbert’s lifetime, whilst he was a monk at Lindisfarne, and it was afterwards laid by the scribe as an offering upon the shrine of the saint. Ethelwald, Eadfrid’s successor in the see, gave the cover, which Bilfrid decorated with silver and gold set with precious stones, and Aldred added an interlinear gloss. This volume was henceforward one of the most precious treasures of Lindisfarne.

When the monks were obliged to flee before the Danes they took it with them. On one occasion, in the 9th century, it had a wonderful escape. The monks were trying in vain to cross over the channel to Ireland, when the Gospels fell into the sea (Synoe, Hist. Eccl. Danelm. ii. 12). After three days they discovered the book to their great delight on the coast of Whithern, uninjured, save by a few stains of seas-water, which it still shews. When the monks rested at length at Durham, and Lindisfarne was restored, the volume went back to its old home, and there it stayed until the Dissolution. It was called in the Inventories of the House ‘Liber S. Cuthberti qui demersus est in mare.’ After a while it passed into the hands of Robert Bowyer, clerk of the House of Commons, from whom it was acquired by Sir Robert Cotton. It is now among the Cottonian MSS. in the British Museum, Nero D. 4. The text of these Gospels, with their invaluable Anglo-Northumbrian gloss, has been edited for the Surtensis Society by Messrs. Stevenson and Waring. A more exact rendering has been made for the Syndics of the University of Cambridge by Messrs. Kemble and Hardwick, and since their deaths by Mr. Skene. The gloss has been printed by Karl Guterweck (Die vier Evangelien in altuordnungssprachischer Sprache, 800, 1857). The beauty of the writing and the exquisite illuminations are noticed by every writer on paleography, especially by Professor Westwood.

The writing of these Gospels was not Eadfrid’s only offering to Cuthbert’s memory. He took care that his good deeds were handed down to posterity. The nameless author of the first biography of Cuthbert dedicates his work to Eadfrid and the family at Lindisfarne, stating that he had written it at their desire (Appendix, Bede opp. cit. “De Cuthberto”), and that they had also the honour of evoking a greater boon to history, in inducing Bede to draw up his famous Life of the saint, in return for which Eadfrid promised that the writer should be duly remembered in the prayers of the house of Lindisfarne (Vita S. Cuthb. Prologus).

It can be no matter of surprise that the wandering Cuthbertines carried about with them the bones of Eadfrid, to whom their beloved saint had been so dear. The relics rested at last in Durham, in the shrine, where they were deposited in a little bag, and even now they have not wholly disappeared (Carmen de Situ Danelm. Hist. Translat. S. Cuthbl. 191; Synoe, Hist. Eccl. Danelm. ii. 6.)

EADGAR (1), the third bishop of the Lindisfar, or people of Lindsey (M. H. B. 924; Bed. H. E. iv. 19). His name is attached to an Evangel of the year 706 (Kemble, C. D. 157), and to the act of the council of Cloesfana in 716, by which the privilege of Whithred was confirmed (Haddan andStubbs, iii. 300). Before the year 731, where Bde closes his history, Edgar had been succeeded by Cynberct or Kinbert. (H. E. v. 23.) [S.]

EADGAR (2), the tenth bishop of London. (M. H. B. 617.) He is known only by the fact that his name appears in the ancient lists between those of Eadberht or Alderberht, and Coenwulf or Kenwulf, and in the attestation of a grant made by Offa to Rochester at a council at Cealhyth in 789 (Kemble, C. D. 157; see also 155; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 463). As Eadberht was alive in 727, and the episcopate of Coenwulf ended before 796, Edgar’s date must fall between those limits. [S.]

EADGAR (3), presbyter, who signs a charter of Coenwulf king of Mercia, a.d. 814. (Kemble, Cod. Dip. no. 206.) [C. H.]

EADGUIN (Nenni, in m. H. B. 74 c, 76 b), king of Northumbria. [Edguin.] [C. H.]
EADGYD, a nun of Barking, mentioned by Bede. (H. E. iv. 8.) She died on the plague of 664, after being thrice called by the boy Ascelin whilst he was dying. [S.]

EADHAETH (Bed. H. E. v. 24, Recapit. Chron. ann. 678 in M. H. B. 288 d), bishop of Lindsey. [EADHER.] [C. H.]

EADHAMAIR, Irish saint. [EDHAMAIR.]

EADHED, a priest of Oswy king of Northumbria, sent by him with Ceadda into Kent to seek episcopal ordination for the latter at the hands of Deusdred. This was in A.D. 664. Finding that Deusdred was dead, they went to bishop Wini, by whom Ceadda was consecrated. (Bed. H. E. iii. 28.) In A.D. 678, archbishop Theodore, at York, consecrated Eadhed bishop of Lindsey, that province having come under the rule of Egfrid of Northumbria (Bed. H. E. iv. 12; A. S. C. ann. 678). Soon afterwards Ethelred king of Mercia recovered the province of Lindsey, and Eadhed retired from it. He was then placed at Ripon. (Bed. ut sup.) [J. R.]

EADHERE, a priest of the diocese of Lichfield, who attended the council at Clovesho in 883. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, ii. 546.) [S.]

EADHOLAC (Chron. Marv. ann. 731), bishop of East Anglia. [HEATHOLAC.] [C. H.]

EADILBALE (Hist. Nennii, M. H. B. 75 a), king of Mercia, son of Alguin. [ETHERBALE (1).] [C. H.]

EADILFRID (Hist. Nennii, M. H. B. 76 b), king of Northumbria. [ETHERFRID.] [C. H.]

EADILIT (Hist. Nennii, M. H. B. 75 a), king of Mercia, son of Penda. [ETHERRED.] [C. H.]

EADRED (1) (Angl. Soc. i. 404), bishop of Dunwich. [EARDULF (3).] [C. H.]

EADRED (2) (HEARDRED, HEARDRED), was consecrated bishop of Hexham on Oct. 29, A.D. 797, at a place called Wudufordia. The consecrators were archbishop Egfrid and bishop Higbald (Saxon Chron.; Symeon, Chron. ed. Surtees Soc. 35). He died in A.D. 800, in the third year of his episcopate, of which there is nothing known (Symeon, ut supra, 38). [J. R.]

EADRED (3), a name common to two priests, one of the diocese of Leicester, the other of that of Sincaster, who attended the council of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 546.) [S.]

EADRIC (1), king of Kent, son of Egbert. On the death of his father, which took place in July, 673, Eadric was probably under age; anyhow his claim to the succession was set aside in favour of that of his uncle Hlothere, who occupied the throne from 673 to 685. During some part of this time Eadric was apparently admitted to a share of the royal dignity, but towards the close of his reign he ran into exile among the South Saxons, with whose aid he engaged in war with Hlothere. In the campaign Hlothere was wounded, and died under the hands of his surgeons, Feb. 6, 685. (Bede, H. E. iv. 26.) After his uncle's death, Eadric reigned for a year and a half, dying, according to Florence of Worcester (M. H. B. 537), in 686; but the depositions given in the very ancient Annales Cantuarienses (Pertz, Scr. iv. 2) as Aug. 31, 687. He is probably identical with that Eadric whom William of Malmesbury (G. R. lib. i. § 34) calls king of the South Saxons and successor of Ethelwalh, who was killed by Caedwalla of Wessex in his attack of Sussex in 686. Eadric is mentioned by Hilton in a charter dated May, 679, in which he bestows lands in Thanet on abbot Berecwald with the consent of archbishop Theodore and of Ethric, his brother's son (Kemble, C. D. No. 16). It is possible, then, that his claim to share the throne was recognised thus early. The Textus Roffensis has preserved a short code of laws of sixteen articles, entitled, "These are the dooms which Hlothere and Eadric kings of the Kentishmen established," but containing no clauses of ecclesiastical interest (Thorpe, Ancient Laws, pp. 11-15). This would seem to prove that the relations of Eadric with his uncle had been for some time at least pacific. Kent was, during the whole period assigned to Hlothere and Eadric, in a very uneasy state; Ethelred of Mercia, Osywy of Northumbria, and Swibeheard, son of Sebbi of Essex, claimed, if the charters of the Kentish monasteries are at all to be trusted, the right of overlordship. A new share in the Kentish territory, and the enterprise of Mul and Caedwalla added a new element of trouble. Sussex was the place of refuge for discontented princes from both Kent and Wessex. It is just possible that Eadric in 686 had succeeded in uniting Kent and Sussex under his own sway; both kingdoms broke up after his death. Sussex was governed by two ealdormen, Aedelnoth and Berthun, who, after the death of Ethelwalh, had resisted Caedwalla, but now fell before him; and Kent was devastated, as Bede says, by foreign and doubtful kings, until Wibert, the brother of Eadric, succeeded in recovering the royal authority about the year 694 (Chr. S. M. H. B. 323). One charter granted by Eadric as sole king was preserved at St. Augustine's; in this he granted to that monastery lands near to Canterbury, adjacent to an estate which had been given by Hlothere; it is dated June, in the fourteenth indiction, which fixes it to 686 (Kemble, C. D. 27; Elpham, ed. Hardwick, p. 251; Thorn, ap. Twysden, c. 1770). According to Elpham, who asserts that he was killed by Mul and Caedwalla, he was buried at St. Augustine's (p. 252). William of Malmesbury, who likewise mentions his violent death, regarded the shortness of his reign as a punishment for the sin committed by his father Egbert against the rights of the children of Eormenred (G. R. lib. i. § 14). [S.]

EADRIC (2), the second abbott of St. Alban's (Gesta Abbatum, i. 8, 9; Monast. Angl. i. 179). He is not mentioned in any ancient authority and may be entirely mythical. According to the St. Alban's story, he was a kinsman of Offa, and was, in compliance with Offa's request that the abbots should withdraw out of the world, the first monk chosen to the abbacy after Offa's death in 796. He ruled his house discreetly, and maintained its rights when they were threatened by Egfrid. [S.] EADULF (1) (Stubbs, Reg. Sac. pp. 5, 173), bishop of Rochester. [ALDULF (2)]

EADULF (2) (Stubbs, Reg. Sac. 168), bishop of Dunwich. [EADULF (3)]

EADULF (3) I. (ALDULF, EALDWULF), the sixth bishop of Lindsey (M. H. B. 625). He had served his predecessor Alwig as deacon, and was consecrated as his successor in 750 (Sim. Dun. in M. H. B. 662). The only charter to which his name is appended is a grant made by Cynwulf of Wessex to Bath in 758 (see Kemble, C. D. 193, where the date is wrongly given 808 instead of 758; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 396). He died in 765 (Sim. Dun. M. H. B. 663). The proper form of his name is unquestionably Eadulf.

EADULF (4) II. (EALDWULF), the eighth bishop of Lindsey (M. H. B. 625). He succeeded Cynwulf in 796, and ruled his diocese for forty years. He is probably the "Eadulfus" who is described as "Eboracensis humilis episcopus" in the profession of obedience made to archbishop Ethelhard of Canterbury (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 508), a document which was no doubt garbled to support the later claims of Canterbury over York. It is hard to see what such a bishop of York at the time, nor, although the profession is in other respects sound, was any claim of the sort as yet asserted for Canterbury. As Eadulf attests two charters of Egfrid of Mercia (Kemble, C. D. 170, 171, A.D. 769) as "electus," it is probable that he was consecrated by Ethelhard, but the rite may have been delayed by the fact that jurisdiction over Lindsey was just at this time claimed by the archbishop of Lichfield. Eadulf's signature is appended to acts of the council of Clovesho in 796 (Kemble, C. D. 175; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 515). He attended the synod of Clovesho in 803 with two abbots and four priests of his diocese (K. C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 540); and his name is attached to meretricious Mercian charters of the age and to the records of councils and synods. Of these the most important is that of Celicyth in 816 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 579). He appears for the last time in 836. The proper form of his name seems to be Eadulf. Although he was bishop during the most trying period of Mercian history, nothing more of his personal action is to be discovered.

EADULF (5) (ALDULF), the fifteenth bishop of Lichfield (M. H. B. 626). He succeeded Higbert, probably at the time when Lichfield was reduced to the rank of a suffragan see; attended the council of Clovesho in 803 (Kemble, C. D. 1024), and subscribed Mercian charters from that year until 814. In 816 his successor Herewin attended the council of Celicyth, so that Eadulf died or resigned before that year. He is mentioned as the predecessor of Herew in the profession made by the bishop of Lichfield to archbishop Ceolnoth (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 614). If it were not that his name is authoritatively written Aldulf, it might be suggested that the profession of Eadulf referred to in the preceding article [EADULF (4)], was his. Much of the historic importance of this prelate is owing to the fact that William of Malmesbury, and most of the writers who followed him supposed Eadulf to be the archbishop of Lichfield who was appointed by Offa in 787 or 788, thus confounding him with Higbert his predecessor. Malmesbury may have been misled by further confusion between Aldulf of Lichfield and Aldulf bishop of Mayo, whose consecration is mentioned by Simeon of Durham under the year 784. This mistake, which perpetuated itself throughout the Fasti of the bishops, and even misled the learned Henry Wharton, was not cleared up until the publication of the Anglo-Saxon charters satisfactorily proved Higbert to have been the only archbishop of Lichfield. (See Will. Malmseb. G. F. ed. Hamilton, pp. 10, 208; Wharton, Ang. Sacra, i. 400.) [HIGBERT.]

EADULF (6) (EALDWULF, ALDULF), a South-Saxon dux or ealdorman, contemporary with Offa king of Mercia, and bishop Wlothun of Selsey, whose name appears in grants of lands in Sussex about the year 830 (Kemble, C. D. 1015, 1016). One of these is a gift to bishop Wlothun for a church of St. Andrew at Ferring, the other a gift to Selsey in the time of bishop Gislehere, who attests it. The latter is probably the earlier in date, as Gislehere was bishop in 780 and 781, and Wlothun from 789 to 805; but both share the general doubtful character of the Selsey charters.

EADULF (7) (EALDWULF), a priest of the diocese of Sidnaecaster, who signs the acts of the synod of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 546.)

EADUUNE (Ethelward, Chron. iii. 2 in M. H. B. 510 d), king of Northumbria. [EDWIN.]

EADUUNE (Kemble, Cord. Dip. 170, 171, 175, 183, 185, 190, 191, 217), bishop of Lindsey. [EADULF II.]

EADWAD (1) (Wend. Flor. Hist. ann. 665, 680), king of East Anglia. [ELDWULF.]

EADWAD (2), Wilfred's adopted son. [EADWALD.]

EADWARA, a British saint, sister of St. Ithwara, mentioned by Cressy (Ch. Hist. Brit. xxii. 8) from Capgrave's Vita S. Ithwar. In the 8th century (Rees, Welsh Saints, 321).

EADWULF (Kemble, Cord. Dip. 1023, of Kenulf, king of Mercia, a.d. 801), EADWULF (9. 1023, of Kenulf, a.d. 801; 1024, of archbishop Ethelhard, Oct. 12, 803; 188, of Ethelric king of Mercia, a.d. 804; 207, of Kenulf, a.d. 814), bishop of Lindsey. [EADULF III.]

EADWOLF (Wend. F. H. ann. 655, 680, ed. Cox), king of East Anglia. [ALDULF (1).]
EAFA, son of Eoapa and father of Ealhmund, king of Kent, the father of Egbert of Wessex. (Ch. S. M. H. B. 348.)

EEHPFRID, an Anglo-Saxon scholar who studied in Ireland, and to whom on his return Aldhelm wrote a curious letter, in which he tries to exhibit the scholarship of Theodore and the Canterbury school as greatly superior to the Irish. (Aldhelm, Opp. ed. Giles, pp. 91-95.) He is possibly identical with Echfrith abbot of Glastonbury [ECHFRITH], or with Eadfrid bishop of Lindisfarne [EADFRID (2)].

EALCHEARDUS, bishop, see unnamed, who attests a charter of Offa king of Mercia, believed spurious or doubtful by Kemble, a.d. 793. (Kemble, C. D. 162.) [ALHEARD] [C. H.]

EALDBALD (Nenn. Hist. Brit. cap. 66, in M. H. B. 74 c), king of Kent. [EALDBALD (1).] [C. H.]

EALDBEOORCH, one who at the conclusion of a letter from Egberga to archbishop Boniface who doubt the penman of it, describes himself as panopelus Christi. He salutes Boniface affectionately in his own name, and claims his prayers on the ground of old friendship. (Munum. Magunt. ed. Jaffe, p. 66.) [C. H.]

EALDEL (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1574, in M. H. B. 780), EALDEL (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1574, in M. H. B. 780), abbot of Malmesbury and bishop of Sherborn. [EALDELH.] [C. H.]

EALDÆPERTH (Ethelweard, Chron. ii. 11, in M. H. B. 507 a), king of Northumbria, ob. a.d. 705. [EALDÆPERTH.] [C. H.]

EALDFRITH (1), king, who witnesses a charter of Ealdwulf of Sussex, a.d. 791, signing last and after Offa king of Mercia. (Kemble, C. D. 1016.) [C. H.]

EALDFRITH (2) (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1500 in M. H. B. 782), king of Northumbria, brother of Egfrid. [EALDFRITH.] [C. H.]

EALDFRIH (Bed. v. 18, Saxon version, Smith's Beda, p. 635, 18), son of Oswy. [EALDFRIH.] [C. H.]

EALDULF (1) (Wend. F. H, ann. 732), bishop of Rochester. [EALDULF (2).] [C. H.]

EALDULF (2) (Kemble, C. D. 203, charter of Kenulf), EALDULPH (Flor. Wig. Nom. Præsid. Lindisf. in M. H. B. 629), bishop of Lindsey. [EALDULF (4).] [C. H.]

EALDMUND, EALDULF (3), South Saxon alderman [EALDULF (4).]

EALDWULF (1) (Flor. Wig. Nom. Præsid. Lindisf. in M. H. B. 625 a), bishop of Lindsey. [EALDWULF I. bishop of Lindsey.] [C. H.]

EALDWULF (2) (Kemble, Cod. Dip. 1023, charter of Kenulf, a.d. 801), bishop of Lindsey. [EALDWULF II.] [C. H.]

EALDWULF (2) (Kemble, C. D. 1015, a.d. 791 in 1016, cir. A.D. 791), king of Sussex. [C. H.]

EALDWULF (3), bishop of Rochester. [Aldulf (5).]

EALFRID (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1588 in M. H. B. 783), king of Northumbria, died at Drifeld. [AELFRITH.] [C. H.]

EALHEARD, EALHEARD, bishop, see unnamed, who attests charters of Offa king of Mercia, a.d. 789, 790. (Kemble, C. D. 157, 159.) [EALHEARD.] [C. H.]

EALHEARD, a deacon whose attestation is appended to a spurious charter of Kenulf of Mercia in 799. (Kemble, C. D. 177.) [B]

EALHLPÆDE (Bed. H. E. iii. 21, sat. transl. in Smith's Beda, p. 550, 42), daughter of Oswy, wife of Peada of Mercia. [AELHPÆDE.] [C. H.]

EALHFRITH (Bed. H. E. iii. 14, 21, sat. transl. in Smith's Beda, p. 539. 19, 551-5), son of Oswy. [AELFRITH.] [C. H.]

EALHMUND (1), king of Kent, son of Eaf and father of Egbert afterwards king of Wessex. His reign in Kent is fixed by the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle in 784 (rightly 786). The same year, 784, is given as the date of a charter (Kemble, C. D. 1015), in which he grants to abbot Wetred, and the monastery of Reculver, twelve hides of land in Scildwine, and that is all that is distinctly known about him; but it is possible that the Ænamundus rex who is company with archbishop Bregwin confirms a grant of Sigiræd to Rochester (Kemble, C. D. 114), before 706, may be identical with Ealhmund. It may further he conjectured that he was one of the many kings of divisions of Kent who sprung up after the main line of the Aescings was extinct; and that, as his son Egberht is spoken of as a kineman of Eadberht Pæn (H. Hunt. M. H. B. 733), he was an earlier champion of the national party in Kent opposed to the supremacy of Mercia. [See EORBERT (4) and EADBERHT PÆN.] [S]
EALHMUND

EALHMUND (2) (Kemble, C. D. 1018, a.d. 798, marked by Kemble doubtful or spurious), intended for Alhmund bishop of Winchester, who was not consecrated until 802. (Stubb's, Reg. Soc. 9, 16.)

[C. II.]

EALHMUND (3), abbat, attests a charter of Offa king of Mercis, A.D. 789. (Kemble, Cod. Dip. No. 155; Birch, Fasti Monast. p. 68.)

[C. II.]

EALHUN, a priest of Canterbury, who attested a charter of archbishop Wulfred, dated 811. (Kemble, C. D. 195.)

[5]

EALHWINE (Lapp. Hist. Eng. i. 181), [ALHWINE.][AULCHIN.]

EALRED (Wend. F. H. ann. 773, ed. Cox), king of Northumbria. [AULCHRED.] [C. II.]

EAMBERCH, archbishop of York. [EGBERT.]

EANBALD I. (EANBALD), the pupil and the successor of Albert in the see of York. It is probable that he was brought up in the minster under the charge of Egbert and Albert, and, winning their regard, in due time became a teacher himself. Albert showed his regard for Eanbal and Alcuin by making them the keepers or masters of the fabric of the new minster which he built. In the last years of his life Albert, according to the old Celtic custom, practically nominated Eanbal his successor by making him his coadjutor in the see about the year a.d. 780. In this capacity he was associated with Albert in his last public act, the dedication of his new cathedral. (Acuin, de SS. Fict. Ebor.)

Eanbal succeeded Albert in a.d. 782, and Alfwold, king of Northumbria, took immediate steps to procure for him the pall. (Sixon Chron.; Symeon, Chron. ed. Surtees Soc. 26.). Alcuin, at his old friend's request, went to Rome to bring it. (Vita Alcuini, ed. Jaffé.) As he was returning with it he met Charlemagne at Parma, who exerted from him a promise that he would come and stay with him in France if he could gain the consent of his own king and archbishop. In a little while the desire of Charles was realised. Alcuin, on his return to York, obtained the permission that was required, and went to France accompanied by some of his most distinguished scholars—Wizo, Frigidusius, and Sigulf. The result of this visit was the establishment of a system of universities, or higher schools, in France, Germany, and Italy.

In a.d. 786 was held a great council of the Northumbrian church, before the legates George and Theophylact, at which Eanbal and his suffragans and king Alfwold were present. (Stubb's and Haddan, ill. 444, etc.; Alcuin, Letters, ed. Jaffé, 155, etc.)

The state of Northumbria during Eanbal's archiepiscopate was very long unsatisfactory. King after king was murdered or dethroned, and all the foundations of society were so violently shaken that it would be impossible for the church and school of York to make their influence properly felt. Alcuin did his best to restore peace and order. He had gone to France soon after Albert's death to assist Charlemagne in his educational work, but he came home to Northumbria in a.d. 790 to lend the king and Eanbal a helping hand. (Ep. ed. Jaffé, 170-1, 174-5.) It was all in vain. The disorder was so great that a short while after the great scholar left Eanbal and York and went back to France, where the rest of his life was passed.

In a.d. 795 Eanbal's name was inscribed on the Domesday Book into Northumbria added largely to the misery of the kingdom. The famous house of Lindisfarne was devastated by the marauders, who made an attempt upon Jarrow in the following year. These were only the beginnings of such troubles, but they cast dismay upon the northern church. Alcuin, from his home in France, wrote more than one warning letter to king Ethelred (Ep. 180-90); he consolled Higbald of Lindisfarne for his loss, and promised to use his good offices with Charlemagne for the restoration of the captives (id. 190-4); he spoke many kind words of comfort and hope to the brethren of Wearmouth and Jarrow (Ep. 196-201); he impressed upon all the absolute necessity of union in the face of so savage a foe.

In a.d. 795 great efforts were made by Eanbal and the church of York to bring Alcuin back to England. It seems to have been Eanbal's intention, like his predecessor, to retire from his charge, and it was no doubt the general wish that Alcuin should succeed him. Alcuin gives his Northumbrian friends good advice, and speaks of them with the utmost affection (Ep. 249-56), but manifests no eagerness to return. In a letter to Eanbal he begs that if he is determined to resign there may be a free choice of a successor in the hands of the chapter; and upon the chapter itself he impresses unanimity and the avoidance of simony in a fresh election (id. 257-8, 290-1). Eanbal's idea, if seriously entertained at all, was never carried out. His last official act was the coronation of Eadulf, king of Northumbria, on 25th of June, a.d. 796. On the 10th of August the archbishop died at a monastery called Etlete or Etlete (Symeon, Chron. p. 34). T. Stubb's (col. 1697) calls it Aetece. It may possibly be Etmer (Leeds), where there was a monastery in Bede's time. Eanbal's remains were interred with those of his predecessor in York. Alcuin, writing after his death to Ano, archbishop of Salzburg, solicits his prayers for Eanbal, who was, he says, "mihi pater et frater et amicus fidelissimus, etiam et condiscipulos sub magistro meo." (Ep. p. 324.)

There are silver and copper coins of Eanbal in existence struck by him during his archiepiscopate.

[J. B.]

EANBALD II. (EANBALD, HEANBALD, EANTBALD), archbishop of York, following Eanbal I. Our information of him, which extends only through a period of about twelve years, is derived chiefly from the epistles of Alcuin; and among the historians we are the most indebted to Simeon of Durham. Eanbal was trained in the school of York, where he was a favourite pupil of Alcuin. His name first occurs in the correspondence of Alcuin in the latter days of Eanbal I. Alcuin in an epistle to the brethren of the church of York (ep. 6. ed. Froben) speaks of having received their letter through the presbyter Eanbal, and Froben, dating the epistle a.d. 793, rightly concludes that the presbyter was he who afterwards became Eanbal II., referring to Hoveden's statement that Eanbal presbyter of York was the successor of Eanbal I. (See Hoved. ann. 796; ed. Stubbs. i. 16). Since Froben's time there has been found among the Cotton manuscripts a passage (Mon. Aec. ep. 35, p. 254; Hadden and Stubbs, Concil. iii. 500), purporting to be a continuation of ep. 6, stating that Eanbal was unable to return home, being detained by a severe illness with Alcuin, who was in attendance on Charles the Great in Saxony. Charles is known to have been in Saxony at the beginning of the year 793, when the death of Eanbal is recorded (as Hadden and Stubbs) or 795 (as Mon. Aecuini. ed. Jaffé, p. 252). There does not seem any sufficient reason to doubt that the presbyter Eanbal of the new passage is identical with the presbyter Eanbal of ep. 6, and the second archbishop of the name. No translation to the northern metropolitan see from another see had yet occurred; every archbishop had been elevated directly from the diaconate (e.g. Hadden and Stubbs, Concil. iii. 506, in locis). Alcuin in the next epistle (ep. 49, Froeb. Aug. 796; ep. 37, Mon. Aec. a. d. 795; H. and S. iii. 499, A. D. 499) addresses one whom he calls "dominus omnium dilectissimus," and Alcuin "his son" is prevented coming to him by a sharp fever and King Charles' detention in Saxony; Alcuin longs to see him again, and trusts he may find him enjoying the same honour in which he left him; he rejoices in the intelligence of his prosperity, and dispatches to him by Eanbal (who is not here designated "presbyter," only "famulus vester," but Froben thinks he is perhaps the presbyter of ep. 6); a new archbishop is about to be appointed, and Alcuin beseeches this "dominus" to permit no violence against the church of God, and to take care that the brethren have a free election. Froben does not attempt to identify the person here addressed; in Hadden and Stubbs he is a "powerful man"; but in the Mon. Aecuini he is assumed, and we think with much probability, to be none else than archbishop Eanbal I., who in that case would be meditating resignation. It is at all events clear that a formidable danger was menacing the succession at York, and Alcuin was employing his great influence in securing the free action of the clergy in the appointment. Alcuin's next letter reveals another danger. It is addressed to his "beloved friends at York." (Ep. 48, Froeb. A.D. 797; ep. 38, Mon. Aec. a. d. 795; H. and S. iii. 500, A. D. 796.) Alcuin urges that it should be necessary for them to elect an archbishop before he could reach them (implying, as Froben notices, that he was a member of their body and had a voice in the election) they would proceed with scrupulous integrity and tolerate no manner of simoniacal doings. In the most solemn terms he bids them maintain their old unsullied reputation in the choice of their archbishop. One more letter belongs to this crisis (ep. 39, Mon. Aec. a. d. 795). It is from the presbyter Eanbal to archbishop Eanbal, reporting his return from abroad, and delivering a letter he has brought him from Alcuin, so that there is a strong presumption that the "dominus" was the archbishop, whose "famulus" the presbyter might well have been termed. Eanbal I. died Aug. 10, 786, and Eanbal II. was consecrated on Sunday, Aug. 14. (A. S. C. ann. 796; Simeon of Durham's Sunday, Aug. 13, being an error, as Aug. 13 was Saturday.) As the vacancy lasted but four days, it is obvious that Alcuin's letters of the 10th and 13th were written before it occurred and while it was in expectation. Matters seem to have stood thus: Eanbal I. feeling the approach of death meditated retirement; the court was watching the event and preparing to force its nominee; the presbyter Eanbal, as the candidate favoured by the archbishop and the best of the cathedral body, was sent to Alcuin to obtain his adhesion and procure his return; his reply could only be to accept the intended appointment; the archbishop died, and the election was made at the earliest possible moment. The subsequent views obtained of Eanbal II. are consistent with this account of the crisis; the new archbishop has to deal with a worldly-minded clergy and a hostile court, but he is constantly supported and encouraged by letters from Alcuin. It may be remarked that an unsettled state of affairs is similarly described by the Surt. Hist. Durk. iii. 243, 265.) which is septiform in the gifts of the Spirit, may shine in a septiform distinction of ecclesiastical degrees, all occupying their proper positions and vested according to their rank. The clerics in costly apparel, in domenour staid, should in their singing avoid all swagger of tone, and seek to please God rather than man. Nor let them disdain to make themselves acquainted with the rules of the _Ordo Romanus_ (the earliest historical mention of which work is believed to occur in this passage, _Aec. Opp. Frob. i. 66, note f_; _H. and S. iii. 504 note_; for in thus imitating the chief of the church of Christ they may win St. Peter’s blessing. In another letter of advice _op. 57, Frob.;_ H. and S. iii. 505, a. d. 529; Alcuin strongly recommends him the use of Gregory’s _Pastoral_, which he should read and re-read, taking it with him wherever he went.

It was on Sept. 8, 797 (A. S. C. ad ann.), when the Nativity of St. Mary was celebrated (Sim. Dun. G. R. A., true reading of the date in _Surtees Soc. ed. p. 34_), that Eanbald, having received the pallium from Rome, was “solemnly confirmed in the episcopate of the Northumbrians,” but in what the confirmation consisted Simeon, who alone mentions it, does not state, and, as usual, using the language of his own day. He was the fourth archbishop of York (not the third, as Malmes. G. R. i. 65, ed. Hardy) reckoning from Egbert, and the tenth bishop counting from Paulinus. The contemporary king of Northumbria was Eardulf, whose accession was about three months before Eanbald’s, and the archbishop of Canterbury was Ethelhah. His first recorded metropolitical act was the consecration, on Oct. 29, 797, of Heardred bishop of Hexham at Wadsaforda, assisted by his suffragan Higbald of Lindisfarne. (Rich. of Hexham, cap. 8, Twyd. col. 299; Sim. Dun. G. R. A. in M. II. B. 669 e, “_Wudoforda_”; A. S. C. ann. 797 does not mention Higbald nor the place._) The localities of all the consecrations held by Eanbald are mentioned, but not one of them, nor even the place of his own consecration, was York, an indication possibly of a hostile court influence in that city. Another letter of Alcuin to Eanbald, whom he now begins, after his whim [Alcuin], to call “Simeon” (Ep. 171, Frob. “de anno et loco minimè constat”; _H. and S. iii. 507, a. d. 796, or later_), discloses growing difficulties. Alcuin sympathises with him in certain trials (not further indicated) which have accompanied his elevation; he replies to inquiries respecting the _Liber Missalis_ again, and with much point, he returns to the _Ordo Romanus_, his language plainly shewing that the book was meeting with anything but a welcome at York. He hopes that in the faith and piety of his son Eanbald he will himself survive after death, while he trusts that sacred studies will never be neglected at York to render all the pains he once took in the collection of books a labour lost. With this letter Alcuin sends a present of four cups (caucelli); and a hundred pounds of ‘stagnum’ (stannum, tin) for covering the ‘domusula cloacaecorum’ (the bell-tower, as Raine understands it) “propter ornamentum et loci celebratitatem. It is to be observed, in reference to Eanbald’s troubles that in these last days of the heptarchal church the archbishops of both provinces were at feud with their sovereign, Ethelhald of Canterbury with the Mercian king _Seo_ ruled the south, and Eanbald with Eardulf. The temporary establishment of a Mercian archiepiscopate [Hesmer] proves how intense was the quarrel in the southern and strongest division of England. This community of trouble drew the two archbishops together to a degree that was quite unusual in those days as compared with the intercourse they each had with foreign churches (H. and S. iii. 520). In 798 we find Alcuin counselling Ethelhald to confer with Eanbald in reference to the great schism that then existed between Mercia (Ep. 60, Frob.; H. and S. iii. 520). To this year also belongs the most interesting of all the actual facts recorded of Eanbald’s archiepiscopate—his assembling a synod at Pincanhalth (on the supposed identity of which with Finchale, near Durham, see note in H. and S. iii. 444. Neither Surtees nor Raine could venture to affirm the identity. Raine, _Priory of Finchale_, pref. pp. xii. xiii.). The synod of Pincanhalth (again it is some other place rather than York) is worthy of notice on several accounts. It is the first Northumbrian synod of which any particular account survives since that of Whithby, in 684, so fully reported by Bede, and the synod of Whitby was not the synod of the south with which it may be compared—Haethfylth under Theodore in 680 (Bede. _H. E. iv. 17_; H. and S. iii. 141), and Celychth under Jaenbert in 787 (H. and S. iii. 444). It may be noted also that the Paschal controversy, which was a grand topic at Whithby, is prominent here again at Pincanhalth, shewing that the old Celtic and anti-Roman party of the north had not died out, another token of which is the cold reception of the _Ordo Romanus_ already noticed. Finally, the synod of Pincanhalth was the last in the north previous to the downfall of the Northumbrian church under the Dunes, and its latest testimony was according to the orthodoxy of the day. This synod therefore ought certainly to have received more attention than it has had from the modern historians of the heptarchal church (see a brief and quite exceptional notice in Collier, _Eccles. Hist. i. 339_). It was attended, writes Simeon of Durham, by many great laymen (principales) and ecclesiastics, who “consulted on many things affecting the interest of God’s holy church and the nation of the Northumbrians and of all the provinces, and concerning the observance of the Paschal feast, and of decisions divine and secular which were made in the days of righteous kings and good dukes and holy bishops and other wise men, monks and clerics, of whose wisdom and justice, and divine virtues the state of the kingdom of the Northumbrians was at that time sweetly and unspadamente redolent. They took care by wise counsel to make arrangements for the honour of God and the services of the faithful that and to augment the service of God, that for these things they might receive the good recom-pine of eternal reward. The lord bishop Eanbald commanded the faith of the five councils to be recited." Here Simeon indicates the dogmatic articles from The History of the Angles, in a rough quotation from Bede's account of the synod of Haethfelth, and concludes: "Having asserted and confirmed these things they returned home, praising God for all his benefits" (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann. 798, Stevenson's trans. p. 460). The synod of Haethfelth in 680 was of course unable to affirm the sixth council (on the Monothelitism heresy), that council commencing its sessions only in the same year; but why the sixth council of Tyro was Pincanalth also does not appear; perhaps this northern synod held it sufficient to adopt the precedent preserved by the great northern historian. The synod of Celsyth in 787 accepted the sixth council as well as the first five; but it was too early for it to express an opinion on the seventh council (on image worship), which was sitting only in that year. To this extent, then, the proceedings of Eadberht with his territorial bishop, Alfred, and Eanbald, being then in conference with Alcuin, must have witnessed his uncompromising attitude in regard to it. The ignoring of the seventh council at the synod of Pincanalth so soon afterwards was a victory on Alcuin's side in his own country, and may well be regarded as a sign of his influence.

To proceed chronologically with Eanbald; in the year 800 another of the suffragans of York, Eadbert bishop of Hexham, is consecrated, and the archbishop may be assumed to have officiated, though he is not expressly mentioned (Rich. of Hexham, capp. 18, 19, in Twysd. X. Script. col. 299). The consecration was at Ethingaham. In 800 or 801, Alcuin once more and for the last recorded time, addressed "the son of his prayers Symeon saceros" (Ep. 174, Fab. a.D. 800; Mon. Acl. ep. 80, p. 629, post, Ap. 3, 801; H. and S. iii. 534, a.D. 801). Here the archbishop's troubles come more distinctly into view. Alcuin suspects that they may have arisen partly from Eanbald himself, in case he has harboured the king's enemies or protected their possessions. If he suffers justly, why is he disturbed? If unjustly, he should remember the tribulations of the saints. Let him not, however, think of forsaking his church, but rather await the martyr's crown. Thus was Eanbald warned against a desertion of his flock like that so severely blamed by Alcuin in his brother archbishop of the south. Eanbald must stand fast as the standard-bearer of Christ. Let him remember how the venerable Mattathias, in the peril of death, exhorted his sons to contend against the Lord's adversaries. Eanbald has seen how kings and princes who persecuted his predecessors and the church of Christ came to untimely ends; let him be patient and prayerful; God will perhaps convert his opponents from foes to friends. This being the state of affairs, it may well be suspected that the recent synod of Pincanalth was implicated in the dispute. Eminent laymen were present but not the king, though secular and ecclesiastical were discussed; it was a quasi-parliamentary gathering under the archbishop, and may have been a general rallying-point of the Northumbrians to the spiritual power in opposition to the royal authority, for Eardulf was at strife with his lay subjects as well as with the great ecclesiastic, and in 808 was a fugitive from his throne.

In the year 800 Alcuin writes (Ep. 175; Frob. a.D. 800). He has heard of the affliction of his beloved "Symeon." Calvines and Cuculina must exhort him to be of good courage; his predecessors in the see had to endure the like; may, all the saints have been sufferers, and the Baptist died a martyr to the truth. But let "Symeon" be jealous of any other cause of suffering than that of declaring the truth; for Alcuin fears he may be courting trial through his connection with the turbulent and enemies of the king. And why does he number so many soldiers in his train? Apparently it is out of compassion to others, but that is a shortsighted compassion which injures the many, even the good, while seeming to benefit the few, and those perhaps not innocent. For "Symeon" is injuring the monasteries, when he takes a crowd of such followers into them to be entertained with him on his visits; never had his predecessors so numerous. From these expressions, and from other indications noticed in the course of this article, we seem to view a prelate generally on the move, keeping the rural roads, travelling from monastery to monastery, never far from the lands of the see, and scarcely, if at all, abiding in the city of York. Medallic testimony points much the same way, disclosing a great lord who coin's his own money to circulate from the monasteries, and on the estates of the church. Mr. Edward Hawkins observes that the earliest known coins of the see of York, next to those of archbishop Egbert, belong to Eanbald, whose coins he was once disposed to regard as the earliest of all (1st ed. 1841, p. 53); and this Eanbald he concludes to be the second archbishop of the name from the fact that all the types and moneyers on his coins appear likewise on the coins of king Eanred, in whose reign Eanbald II. died. Nor is it without significance that in a hoard of 8000 coins found at Hexham in 1833 those of Eanbald were numerous enough to have made the specimens common, while out of 10,000 discovered at York in 1842 not more than one of Eanbald was found. (Hawkins, Silver Coins of England, 2nd ed. 1876, pp. 73, 105.)

In 801 Eanbald is mentioned in a letter of Alcuin addressed to Ethelward (Ep. 173, Frob. A.D. 800; Mon. Acl. ep. 171, a.D. 801, p. 619; H. and S. iii. 535, a.D. 801). Alcuin is pleased that the two archbishops have met and conferred, one result of which he trusts will be that the churches of Christ will be exalted in honour, and the lives of those who minister in them will be amended. Very corrupt have those lives been, hardly above the level of the vain show. Clergy and people seem to differ in nothing but the tombsure.

There occurs another consecration by him of a suffragan, Egbert of Lindisfarne, probably on Trinity Sunday, June 11, 803, Eanberht of Hes-ham, Badulf of Withern, “and other bishops” assisting, the place being Bignall (Sim. Dun.
Hatt. Ch. Durham, Stevenson’s note; Stubbs, Reg. Soc. p. 9). In 808 Eanbeald is mentioned in the correspondence of pope Leo III. with the emperor Charles, in connection with the expulsion of Eadulf from his kingdom, but it is uncertain what were the archbishop’s relations with the deposed king and his rival (H. and S.
iii. 564, note); one of the letters shews Eanbeald opposed, as well as the archbishops of Canterbury (now Wulfred), to Kenheim king of Mercia, who ruled in the south (Ep. of Leo III. to Charles, Mansi, Concil. xiii. 969; Mon. Carolina, ed.
Jaffe, 311; H. and S. iii. 563); in another letter he is again mentioned, but with no light; he has sent a dispatch to Charles, but his messenger has misunderstood his business, and offended the emperor by proceeding to Rome before delivering it. (Mansi, xiii. 974; Patr. Lat. xcviii. 553; H. and S. iii. 565.)

Here ends the clear contemporary light cast upon this Northumbrian metropolitan. It is but a few glimpses we get of him after this.
The “præsenal Eanbealdus,” who loves pope Leo in Alcuin’s poem (Carm. 226, Opp. ii. 298, Prokh.
is probably Eanbeald II., or Eanberht.
Eanbeald was evidently on a visit to Alcuin when this little poem was written. There is independent proof that after his elevation to the see Eanbeald was with Alcuin, but at what date cannot be determined, except that it must have been between 800 and 807, while George was patriarch of Jerusalem. In a letter to that prelate (Ep. 123, Prokh.) Alcuin begs his intercessory prayers for “Sycon, bishop,” for Onias and Martinus “sacerdotes,” for Nathansel, archdeacon, and others, adding, “Who are with us, and never cease to intercede for your solita-tude.” As Alcuin died May 19, 804, the interval for this visit is defined within narrow limits.

He lived long Eanbeald II. lived after 808 is uncertain. Simeon of Durham says that his successor, Wulfys, was archbishop in the reign of Eanred (Sim. Dun. Epist. de Archip.
Floro, Opp. Surt. Soc. p. 134), and 812 is the year some have supposed (Raine, Archbishops of York, p. 111). Pits attributes to Eanbeald II. a work entitled Decretum Symodalia (Pits, Angl. S.
Theol. 181), and Tanner repeats the statement (Tann. Bibl. Brit. 248), but as Raine observes, without any foundation. [C. H.]

EANBERCH, denounced with Hunred and two others by Boniface archbishop of Mainz, in his Life of Wilfrid, as false brethren, who in the name of religion seduced the people into

EANBERHT (1), one of five presbyters in Thuringia, whom Lullus archbishop of Mainz directs to arrange in their localities for public prayers and a week of abstinence to avert a plague of rain which was then afflicting the country. Each was likewise requested to offer thirty masses for the deceased bishop of Rome, who is not named, as well as for the two laics Megenfrith and Hraban. During the episco-pate of Lullus three bishops of Rome died, so that this letter may belong to any of the years 757, 767, or 772. (Monum. Magunt. ed. Jaffé,
281.) [C. H.]

EANBERHT (2), an abbot to whom Ethel-bald king of Mercia, in a charter attested by Cynewulf, of Wessex, and the West-Saxon bishops and abbots, granted lands “in dominium Christi ecclesiae.” (Kemble, C. D. 100, A.D.
755-757.) The list of abbots of Malmesbury recently discovered by Mr. Birch contains the name of Aescumbri, who may be identified with this person and possibly with Eaba [EABA
(2)]. (Birch, Abbates of Malm. p. 6.) [S.]

EANBERHT (3), ealdorman of the Hwiccei, and brother of Aldred and Uhtred. (Kemble, C. D. 102, 105.) The three brothers were benefactor to Worcester from 755 to 770. [Hwiccl.
[3.]

EANBERHTTA (Cod. Dipl. 10) ; Birch, Abbates of Malmesb. p. 6; H. Fasti Monast. 68), abbat. [EANBERHT (2); EABA (2).] [C. H.]

EANBERHT (4), Eadberht; Eanberht; Osbert, bishop of Hexham, between Heorred and Tidferth. Richard of Hexham states that he was ordained at Ethingaham, A.D. 806, and sat four years; but the Saxon Chronicle places his death in 806. His episcopate fell in the reign of Eadulf, king of Northumbria, and his metropolitan was Eanbeald II. archbishop of York.
Nothing further is known of him. (Ricard.
Hagulast. cap. 18, 19 in Twysd. Scriptores, coll.
299, 308; Wendl. Flor. Hist. ann. 800, ed. Core;
A. & C. ann. 808; Stubbs, Regist. Soc. 9, 181.)

EANBRYTH (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann. 800 in
M. H. ii. 671), bishop of Hexham. [EANBERHT
[C. H.]

EANBURGA, an abbess mentioned in a quattro-stanzo charter of Offa, belonging to Worcester, and dated 761. In this the king conirms to Eanburga, for her life, lands in Huntingt and Fuchalouge, which bishop Heathred had given her, subject to the rights of the mother church of Worcester. (Kemble, C. D. 141.)

EANFERTH, bishop of Elmham. [EANFERT
[3.]

EANFLED (1), a name inscribed on the fourth tablet of the taller pyramid in the cemetery at Glastonbury, which William of Malmesbury describes as of great antiquity. (Malm. G. R. i. § 21, ed. Hardy.) [C. H.]

EANFLED (2) (EANFLEDE), daughter of Edwin king of Northumbria, by his second wife Ethelburga of Kent. She was born on Eleventh Sunday, A.D. 626. On her birth Paulinus, who was the queen’s chaplain, ascribed the safety of the mother and child to God’s answer to his prayers, and Edwin, who was then wavering between Christianity and paganism, allowed Paulinus to baptize the infant. The ceremony was performed on Whitsunday. (Bed. H. E.
ii. 9.) On the death of her father, in A.D. 635, the princess was carried by her mother into Kent. (Ed. ii. 20.) About A.D. 643 she became the wife of Oswy king of Northumbria EANFRID (ed. iii. 15), who at her request gave Ingel-llingum (Gilling?) to Trumheri, to be the site of a monastery in memory of the murdered Oswin (ed. iii. 24). Eanael was a great patroness of religion, observing the Roman method of counting Easter, and having a chaplain of her own, named Romanus (iii. 15). It was by her assistance that the youthful Wilfrid was enabled to pay his first visit to Rome. (Eddi, cap. p. 213; Bed. H. E. v. 19.) Eanael was buried with her husband at Whitby, in the monastery of which her daughter Elfleda was subsequently the abbess. (Bed. H. E. iii. 24.) [J. R.]

EANFRID (1) (ANFRID, EANFRITH), a son of Ethelfrith king of Northumbria, and himself king of Bernicia on the death of Edwin in A.D. 633. During his predecessor’s reign he had been in exile with his brothers in Scotland, where he had been converted to Christianity and baptized. On becoming king he apostatized. In the following year he was treacherously slain by Caedwalla, whom he had incautiously sought with twelve chosen knights to sue for peace (Bed. H. E. iii. 1). [J. R.]

EANFRID (2) (Kemble, C. D. 198, A.D. 808, an error for 758 [EADULF (3)],) bishop. [EANFRITH (3).] [C. H.]

EANFRIDUS, Alcuin’s agent on the continent. Alcuin in 790 writes from England to his disciple Josephus abroad beging him to send for Eanfridus, and confer with him as to the transmission of some silver, the proceeds apparently of his villa of Vurnec, and a goat’s-hair dress, “vestimentum caprimum.” (Mon. Alcuin. ed. Jaffé, p. 171, ep. 16, not in Froben’s collection.) [C. H.]

EANFRITH (1) (Flor. Wig. Chron. ann. 593, 634; M. H. B. 526 b, 528 e; id. Gesta Reg. North. M. H. B. 632,) king of Bernicia. [EANFRID (1).] [C. H.]

EANFRITH (2), king of the Hwicci, brother of Eanhere and father of Eoba queen of the South Saxons (Bede, H. E. iv. 13), about the year 661. He was probably father or near kinsman of Osric and Oshere, who, in the next generation, were benefactors of the Mercian churches. [HWICCI.] [S.]

EANFRITH (3) (EANFERTH), the fifth bishop of Elmham, called Lanfranc in the printed lists. (M. H. B. 618.) His name occurs between that of Ethelfrith, who was consecrated in 736, and that of Ethelwulf, who attested a charter of 781. He may thus be identified with Eanfrith, who attests a grant of Cinewed to Wessex to Bath in 758 (Kemble, C. D. 128; for date cf. EADULF (3),) and possibly with the bishop Eanfrith, who, having been a monk of Glastonbury, died, according to William of Malmesbury, in 782. (Antt. Glaston. ap. Gale, p. 325.) [S.]

EANGHEARD, a priest of Canterbury, who subscribes a charter of archbishop Wulfred, dated April 21, 811. (Kemble, C. D. 195.) [S.]

EANGIST, a disciple of Alcuin, who is said to have been cured of his toothache by a touch of his master’s comb. (Vit. Alcuini Auscl. Anon. ap. Mon. Alcuin. p. 33, ed. Jaffé.) [C. H.]

EANGITHA, an English abbess, mother of Heburga otherwise called Bagga. [BOGA (2).] A letter is extant addressed by her to St. Boniface, to be dated between 719 and 722. In this she complains of her many cares, the poverty of her monastic estate, the hostility of the king, and the frowardness of her relations. She refers also to the abbess Wale as her spiritual mother, and recommends a brother named Denewald to the good offices of Boniface. (Bonif. Epist. 14; Mon. Moguntia, p. 66.) If the identification of Bagga, or Heburga, with Eadburga abbess of Minster, be allowable, then Eangitha may have been the widow of Centwine king of Wessex, and sister of Eormenberga queen of Northumbria. It is perhaps safer not to rely too much on the identification. [S.]

EANGYTH (Monum. Mogunt. ed. Jaffé, p. 66), abbess. [EANGITHA.] [C. H.]

EANHERE, brother of Eanfrith, king or viceroy of the Hwicci. [EANFRITH (2).] [S.]

EANMUND (1) (Kemble, C. D. 114, between A.D. 759 and 763), king in Kent. [EALMUND.] [C. H.]

EANMUND (2), founder and first abbot of a monastery of St. Peter, in Northumbria, the history of which, written by the monk Ethelwulf, is dedicated to bishop Egbert of Lindsey. [ETHELWULF (2).] [S.]

EANRED (1), presbyter of the diocese of Leicester, who attested the acts of the council of Clovesho, Oct. 12, 903. (Kemble, C. D. 1024.) [C. H.]

EANRED (2), king of Northumbria, who succeeded Elfwold or Elfwh, A.D. 810, and reigned thirty-two to thirty-three years. Within the period embraced by this work, he was contemporary with Eanbald II. and Wulfsey archbishops of York, Egbert bishop of Lindsey, and Tidferd bishop of Hexham. (Symeon Dun. ed. Surtees Soc. pp. 134, 211, 219; Wend. P. H. ann. 810.) On Eanred’s coins, see E. Hawkins, Silver Coins of Eng. ed. Kenyon, pp. 71–73. [C. H.]

EANSWITHA (EANSWIDA), a daughter of Eadbad king of Kent, who lived a virgin and was buried at Folkstone. (Flor. Wig. in M. H. B. 627, 635; Elmham, Hist. Aug. pp. 175, 176.) Her life (printed by Capgrave, fo. 97, and in the AA. SS. Bolland. Aug. vol. vii. pp. 686, 687) says that Eadbad built her a church at Folkstone, which was dedicated to St. Peter, near which she founded a nunery, with a church of her own. She was asked in marriage by a king of Northumbria, but refused him. The day of her death was Aug. 31, the year is given as 640 or 673, alike without authority. Her relics, which had been at first buried in her own church, were subsequently translated to St. Peter’s. The present church of Folkstone is dedicated to her conjointly with St. Mary, and that of Brentwell, in Kent, is dedicated to her sole honour. On the seal of the corporation of Folkstone she appears carrying two fishes in a half-hour. (Park. Anglicam Calendar, p. 229, quoting Hussey’s Emblems of the Saints. See also Mon. Angl. i. 451; Harly, Cat. Mat. Br. Hist. i. 229, 229, 382.) [S.] EANTBALD. This name with the title of præsulis occurs in a poem of Alcuin addressed to pope Leo III. Eantbal sends his presents to Leo, and Alcuin sends a poem by his messenger. It is thought that Eantbal is the archbishop of York, Eanulf II, so often mentioned in Alcuin's works. (Alc. Carm. 226; Opp. ii. 228, ed. Froben.) [C. H.]

EANULF (1), a Mercian noble, son of Osmund and kinsman of Ethelbald king of Mercia (716–757). He founded the monastery of Bredon, in Worcestershire, about the year 716, with the advice of Ethelbald, who began to reign in that year, and of Egwin bishop of Worcester, who died soon after. His monastery was dedicated to St. Peter, and archbishop Tatwin was educated there. Eanulf was grandfather to king Offa, who was a great benefactor of Bredon. (Kemble, C. D. 120, 138, 140, 248, 261.) Besides Bredon, Eanulf had a grant of land at Westbury, which subsequently was given to Worcester. (Rem. C. D. 166; Monast. Angl. l. 607; vi. 1625.) [S.]

EANULF (2), a prebendary addressed by Alcuin in or before the year 804. Alcuin was then abroad, but where Eanulf was not apparent. Eanulf, who had been a disciple of Alcuin, is counselled, among other things, not to wander about in his ministry, but remain where he was appointed to serve. The letter, which shows in what a way he was a man who had to regular discipline, gives a hint of what had been his previous life, and what were some of the temptations and difficulties of his office. (Alcuin, Ep. 226, ed. Froben.; Ep. 281, Mon. Alcuin.) [C. H.]

EANWALD, a priest of Worcester, who attests a charter of bishop Deneberht in or about 892. (Kemble, C. D. 181.) [S.]

EANWELF, an abbot of a monastery, unnamed, who addresses Lullus archbishop of Mainz, May 24, 773, expressing gratitude for a letter received from him and a deep sense of the honour. On the following day, May 25, he addresses Charles king of the Franks. It was about two years after Charles's accession, and when his expeditions against the pagan Saxons had commenced. The abbot counsels him to be zealous for their conversion, hunt down (inaequir) idolaters, overthrow their temples, reform their manners by severity, by gentleness, by good example; Christ will then reward him in the next life, besides giving him a glorious name on earth to future ages. (Monum. Mogunt. ed. Jaffé, pp. 282, 283.) The letter indicates how the church was watching the opening career of the great Frank. [C. H.]

EAPP, one of the priests of Wilfrid, who materially assisted him in A.D. 678 in the conversion of Sussex, baptizing many of the people (Bed. H. E. iv. 13). He afterwards became the head of the monastery of Selsey, and probably gave to bishop Acca an account of a miraculous vision at that place, with which his name is connected (Id. iv. 14). Eappa is not mentioned by Eddi. [J. E.]

EARCOMBERT, king of Kent, son of Eadbald and Emma, succeeded his father Eadbald in Christ. Biogr.—Vol. II. 640, and reigned until 664. According to the later writers he was younger than his brother Eormenred (Eormenrad), and secured the succession either by the will of his father (Sim. Dun. in M. H. B. 640), or by usurping the rights of his infant nephews (Elpham, pp. 176, 184), Ethelbert and Ethelred. Bede, however, says nothing about this, but describes Earcombart as a zealous Christian king, as the first English king who by his royal authority ordered the worship of idols to be abolished, and as having directed the observance of the Lent fast (H. E. iii. 8; Chr. S. in M. H. B. 310) under severe penalties. No laws, however, bearing the name of Earcombart have been preserved. He married Sexburga, the elder daughter of Anna king of the East Angles, who, after his death, became abbess of Sheppey, and subsequently succeeded her sister St. Ealhreda as abbess of Ely. By Sexburga Earcombart was the father of St. Earcongota (Bed. H. E. iii. 8), St. Eormenred (Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 627), and Egbert and Hlothere, who successively reigned in Kent. Earcombart is mentioned by Eddius (c. 3) and Bede (H. E. v. 19) as welcoming Wilfrid in his first visit to Kent, and Eddius in particular enlarges on the assistance afforded by Earcombart. Notwithstanding his piety, Earcombart does not occur as a monastic benefactor. He died after a reign of twenty-four years, July 14, 684, the same day as archbishop Deusdedit (Bede, H. E. iv. 1), and was buried at St. Augustine's. (Thorn. c. 1768.) [S.]

EARCONGOTA, the daughter of Earcombart, king of Kent, by his wife Sexburga. She is described by Bede (H. E. iii. 8) as a virgin of great virtue, and as a nun of the monastery of Farmoutier in Brie, recently founded by St. Fara or Burgundofara. Bede says that many stories were told of Earcongota's miraculous powers, and gives an account of the circumstances of her death. As the time, of which she had warning, approached, she visited the cells of the sisters and asked their prayers. She had seen a band of white-clad men approach the monastery, and when she asked their errand was told that they were come to fetch the coin of gold that had come from Kent. Some of the faithful saw her soul carried off by angels; her body was buried in the church of St. Stephen. (See Bede, H. E. iii. 8; Elpham, p. 191; A.A. S. Boil. 25 Feb. iii. 387, 388, 759; Hardy, Cat. Materials for British History, i. 389, 370.) Her life, written by John of Tynemouth, is still in MS. William of Malmesbury (G. R. lib. i. § 11) places Earcongota at Chelles, not at Farmoutier. [S.]

EARCONUALD (Bed. H. E. iv. 6; M. H. B. 217), bishop of London. [EERKENWALD.] [C. H.]

EARDRED, the third bishop of Dunwich after the division of the East Anglian diocese. (M. H. B. 618.) There is great difficulty in assigning the dates and even the relative position of the bishops of Dunwich. Aldberht, the bishop mentioned by Bede at the close of his work (H. E. v. 26) appears as the fifth bishop in the ancient list; if both these authorities are right, Eardred's date must fall within the first thirty years of the 8th century. If again he is identified with Eardulf, 'the East Anglian bishop who attended the council of Clvesho in 747 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 360), Alderberht must be misplaced.

EARDULF (1), a king of Kent, who flourished about the middle of the 9th century, but of whom very little is known. The most important point of certainty in his history is his joining, after the year 755, with bishop Eardulf, of Rochester, in the letter to Lullus, of which an account is given in the notice of that bishop. In charters he appears as a benefactor to the Kentish monasteries; one of these, dated by Kemble in 747, is mentioned in the same notice (Kemble, C. D. 96, referred by Lappenberg to the year 758); another is a grant to Eadburt, or Henhbert, abbot of Reculver, of lands at Bernhamsted. (Kemble, C. D. 1065.) If both the dates are to be accepted, Eardulf must have begun to reign in Kent before the death of king Eadburt, and have retained his rule during a great part of the sole reign of Ethelbert II. It is, however, impossible to fix his place either in the pedigree or in the chronology of the Oescings. He is unknown to the annalists, and no coins are extant on which his name occurs. Lappenberg (vol. i. p. 247) supposes him to have been a son of Eadburt, and nephew of Ethelbert II., and to have died before his uncle. But this is mere conjecture.

EARDULF (2) (Ardwulfus, Eardulfus, Eardulf, Heardulf), king of Northumbria, son of Eardulf, a Northumbrian duke or ealdorman of the royal blood (Symeon, ed. Surtees Soc. 34, 211). During the reign of Ethelred, son of Moll, Eardulf incurred his master's displeasure. He was arrested, and carried to Ripon, and there seemingly executed before the entrance into the minster. The brethren of the place carried the body inwards with Gregorian music, and then laid it out on the outside, but in the morning the supposed victim was found alive in the minster (Symeon, 30). This made men look upon Eardulf with a reverence which was certainly unmerited.

After this Eardulf was in exile, from which he was recalled in A.D. 796, by the popular voice, to be king in the room of the murdered Ethelred. He was consecrated in York minster at the altar of St. Paul, on May 25, archbishop Eanbald officiating, assisted by three of his suffragans (Symeon, 34; Saxoz Chron.). Alcuin wrote a letter to him on his elevation, reminding him of the incident in his earlier life, and urging him to be a just and a God-fearing king (Epp. ed. Jaffé, 320). Besides the charter of king Eardulf, this bishop received other grants for Rochester; land at Woldham from king Ethelbert in 750, and land in the city of Rochester from Sigiræc, king of half Kent, in 762. In 764 Offa and Sigiræc gave him twenty ploughlands at Eslingham, Frensham, and Wicham. (Ann. Roif. Ang. Sac. i. 341.) The charters by which these grants were secured are some of them preserved in the Tectus Roffensis, but are not free from the suspicion of forgery, and add considerably to the difficulty of settling the chronology of the Kentish kings; see Kemble, C. D. 110, 111, 113, 114. The last two, which are less suspicious than the others, are of the time of archbishop Bregwin, and one is dated (Symeon, 37). In the next year another dangerous rival was arrested and slain at Eardulf's bidding, Alchmund son of Alred, who was really the legitimate heir to the Northumbrian throne (Symeon, 38). Three enemies having been thus removed, Eardulf, in A.D. 801, led an army against Kenulf king of Mercia, whom he accused of harbouring and encouraging the conspirators against his life. No bloodshed, however, occurred, the bishops and nobles making peace between the intending combatants (Symeon, 39). These, however, were troublesome times in Northumbria. Archbishop Eanbald II., like king Kenulf, found it necessary to keep soldiers in his retinue for protection, and is said to have protected the lands and persons of the foes of Eardulf. Alcuin blames him for this conduct (Epp. 621, 623), probably seeing that the only chance for Northumbria was having a stern king like Eardulf at its head. At last, in A.D. 808, a competitor of the name of Alfwold drove Eardulf from his kingdom. He was too active to be long in exile. He visited Charlemagne and pope Leo, who suspected archbishop Eanbald and king Kenulf of hatching the successful conspiracy, and in A.D. 809 the banished sovereign was restored through the interposition of Charlemagne (Einhard, apud Duchesne, ii. 233; Bouquet, r. 602; Mabillon, Ann. Bodl. ii. 283). In the following year Eardulf died, and transmitted his kingdom to his son Eanred, who was the last independent monarch of Northumbria. During the reign of Eardulf the province of Galloway came into the possession of the Picts. There are coins of Eardulf in existence, and those struck by his son are exceedingly numerous.

EARDULF (3) (Herulf), a bishop of East Anglia, who was present at the council held at Clvesho in 747. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 360.) As Eanfrith was at this time bishop of Elmham, Eardulf must have been bishop of Dunwich; but nothing more is known about him, and his name does not appear in the ancient lists.

EARDULF (4), the twelfth bishop of Rochester. (M. H. B. 616.) He first appears in a grant made by Eardulf, king of Kent, to Rochester, the date of which charter (762) is confirmed by the titles of the names of the witnesses to 747. If this charter and its correction be trusted, Eardulf must have become bishop the very year in which his predecessor Dunno had attended the council of Clvesho (Kemble, C. D. 96), and have been involved in a contest about the rights of his church with a person called Walthun. His successor, Diora, appears first in 775. Eardulf's dates fall between these two limits. In the following year Alcuin, writing to Osbert, expresses his opinion that Eardulf will lose his kingdom speedily as a punishment for putting away his wife, and taking a concubine in her room (Epp. ed. Jaffé, 350). In A.D. 798 the anticipated storm broke upon him. A revolt was made, apparently by those who had placed Eardulf on the throne, among whom were Alric son of Ethelred and Wada the duke. The rebels were utterly defeated near Whalley, in Lancashire, Alric falling on the field, and Wada securing safety by flight (Saxon Chron.; Symeon, 35). In A.D. 799 Eardulf made his throne more secure by putting to death Moll, a duke, who was probably a son of his old master Ethelred
EARDUULF

785. Eardulf's name as witness also appears in a grant to Minster. (K. C. D. 112.) See Ang. Soc. i. 343. A more interesting relic of Eardulf is a letter addressed by him, in conjunction with Eardulf king of Kent, to Lullus of Canterbury, the successor of St. Boniface. In this he calls Lullus his most intimate friend, addresses Mercia as an intimate friend, and desires his prayers for both the Eardulfs. A little present, "reptia reptilia," is sent with the letter; the bearer is the priest Lazaerold, and the names of three kinsmen are appended, for whom the prayers of Lullus are requested; irmigi, Notthary and Ducha. The date of the letter must of course be 755, or later, as in that year Lullus became bishop. (Mon. Mogunt. pp. 285, 286.) [S.]

EARDUULF (Kemble, C. D. 98), king of Kent. [EARDULF (1).] [C. H.]

EARDWULFUS (Sim. Dun. G. R. A ann. 798 in M. H. B. 699 a, 670 a, 671 a, d), king of Northumbria. [EARDULF (2).] [C. H.]

EARNUULF (Chron. Mailr. ann. 794), king of Northumbria. [EARDULF (3).] [C. H.]

EARPWALD (Earpwald, Aerthwald, Lb. Kilims. p. 13), the son of Redwald, king of the East Angles. Redwald had received Christianity in Kent, but had relapsed on returning to his own kingdom. Earpwald was converted under the influence of Edwin, king of Northumbria, and introduced Christianity into his dominions soon after Edwin's own conversion, and some time before the year 632, in which year the event is referred to by Florence of Worcester. (M. H. B. 528.) We have no account of the date of his succession to the throne. Shortly after his conversion he was murdered by a pagan named Richert. Smith, the editor of Bede, arguing from the chronology of the East Anglian bishops, places this event in 627; and Hussey remarks that at least twenty-eight years elapsed between the conversion of Earpwald and the death of archbishop Honorius (Bede, H. E. ii. 15), which would throw back the date to 625. The years of his reign are given by Luppenberg as 617-828. Redwald is last mentioned in 617. (Chr. S. M. H. B. 308.) Henry of Huntingdon ascribes the death of Earpwald to Penda. (M. H. B. 716.) [S.]

EASCULPH (Angl. Soc. i. 404), bishop of Dunwich. [A스트WULF.] [C. H.]

EASCWINUS (Wend. F. H. ann. 673, 676, ed. Coxe), king of Wessex. [BONEW.] [C. H.]

East Angles, Kings of. The kingdom of the East Angles, which in its later extension was co-extensive with the diocese of Elmham, Thetford, or Norwich, comprised in its earlier stages, besides the modern counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, some of the frontier lands which were afterwards parts of Mercia. The fen country of the Gyvri, extending from South Lincolnshire to South Cambridgeshire, which, after the consolidation of the Mercian power, was regarded as part of Mercia, was earlier a debatable land between Mercia and East Anglia, and earlier still was a part of East Anglia itself. Ely, according to Bede, was in East Anglia (H. E. iv. 19); and Florence of Worcester and William of Malmsbury place Cambridgeshire also under the rule of the kings of the East Angles (Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 644; W. Malmsb. G. R. ed. Hardy, lib. i. § 192). The East Angles were converted to Christianity, but the conversion addresses Mercia, and was probably the early foundation of the nun monasteries. The see of the first four bishops of the East Angles was at Dunwich, on the coast of Suffolk; the diocese was divided in 673 between two bishops, one of whom, at Elmham (Helhjem, North Elmham), ruled Norfolk; the other, at Dunwich, ruled Suffolk. In the Danish ravages of 870 both lines of bishops were for a time extinguished, and when the church revived under the sons of Edward the Elder, Elmham was regarded as the sole see for the whole province.

The kings of the East Angles, within the period known to history, traced their descent from Woden through Wuffa in the ninth generation from the mythical patriarch Wealhtheow (called by the hagiographers Offa) was father of Tytla or Tytil, who was father of Eini and Redwald. The East Angles must have been among the earliest of the German settlers; the details of their migrations are altogether unknown, but Henry of Huntingdon probably represents a true tradition when he asserts that, like Mercia, the East Anglian territory was long divided among a number of nameless "proceres." If Wuffa was the first who united the whole nation under one sceptre, this would account for the prominence given to him in the genealogy. As grandfather of Redwald he could hardly be dated earlier than 530 A.D. Henry of Huntingdon (M. H. B. 714) gives him the title of king, and makes him a contemporary of Corelin, king of Wessex, cir. 571 A.D. The dates assigned in the later chronicles are of no authority whatever. Matthew Paris, however, following Henry of Huntingdon, dates Offa in 571, and Tytil in 578. (Chron. Maj. ed. Luard, pp. 248, 249.) The first Christian king was Redwald, the son of Tytil [KIRPWALD]. No date is assigned for his accession; he is counted by Bede as the fourth of the kings who from the time of the Conquest have exercised supreme power over the whole of Britain, and by the Saxons as the fourth Bretwald. Such a position he could have acquired only after the death of Ethelbert I. of Kent, in 616. (Bede, H. E. ii. 5; Chr. S. A.D. 827, M. H. B. 843.) The date of the conversion and relapse of Redwald cannot be fixed. Earpwald [KIRPWALD] succeeded him, probably about 824. Richert, who killed Earpwald, was a pagan, and a period of anarchy followed the murder. Sigbert, son of Redwald, restored unity to the kingdom about 861, reigning conjointly for a few years with his kinsman Egric, who succeeded him on his resignation. Sigbert and Egric both perished in battle against Penda, about A.D. 850 (Flor. Wig.). Anna, son of Eini the brother of Redwald, succeeded [ANNA], and reigned until 854 (Chr. S. cf. Smith's Notes on Bede, H. E. iii. 18, 19). Ethelhere, brother of Anna, the next king, perished at the battle of Winwaed, A.D. 655 [ETHELHERE]. Here at last a definite date is found. Ethelwald, brother and successor of Ethelhere, died according to Florence (M. H. B. 332) in 684. Aldulf, son of Ethelhere, was in the seventeenth year of his reign in 689 (Bede, H. E. iv. 17). [ALDULF (1)]. His accession is therefore definitely fixed. If the letter of pope Sergius on the appointment of archbishop Britwald (Hadden and Stubbs, iii. 229) be genuine, Aldulf must have been alive in 692. Aldwulf or Elfwald, his brother and successor, is mentioned in the genealogies without definite dates. There is a letter of a king Elwald of the East Angles to St. Boniface, which must be dated about 747 (Mon. Magn. p. 210); and the death of Elfwald is given by Simeon of Durham under the year 749 (M. H. B. 663). A king named Selred, who is called king of the East Angles, and made (Chr. Malm. ) the predecessor of Elfwald, is really king of the East Saxons.

On the death of Elfwald, the East-Angelean kingdom was held conjointly or contemporaneously by two kings, whom Simeon calls Alberht and Hunbeanna, who divided the kingdom. Hunbeanna is perhaps a misreading for the name of Beorna, who in the genealogy by Florence (M. H. B. 638) is made a contemporary of Ossa, and, in the Chronicle of Florence (M. H. B. 544), is represented as king in 752. Beorna was succeeded by Ethelred, who was the father of St. Ethelbert (ETHELBERT (3) ), who perished in 729. Edmund, the martyr king of 870, is the only other king of English race known to have borne the title. The obscurity and uncertainty of the whole series is partly owing to the destruction of all national monuments during the Danish occupation, and partly to the fact that from the age of Ethelbald king of Mercia onwards the East Angles were entirely under the rule of Mercia, a state of things which may possibly be dated earlier, as it is clear that from the death of Anna the kings were in a very secondary position.

Some coins ascribed to East Anglian kings are in existence; a silver coin resembling a sceatta assigned to Beorna (or Hunbeanna); and coins bearing the name of Eadwald, with that of monefer Wintred, who is known to have struck East Anglian coins under Ossa and Rurulf, are recorded to an East Anglian king of the name, but only conjecturally, as there is no other evidence that such a person ever existed (Havkins, English Silver Coins, pp. 55–57). [S.]

EAST SAXONS

The kingdom of the East Saxons was conterminous with the old diocese of London. That diocese embraced the counties of Essex, Middlesex, and southern Hertfordshire; the last-mentioned district, however, largely consisted of the territories of St. Alban's Abbey, and was exempt from episcopal jurisdiction. This exemption was of much later date than the period embraced in this work; but it had the effect of continuing an uncertainty of boundary which existed earlier in consequence of the uncertainty of the boundary between Mercia proper and the East Saxons kingdom, which was almost invariably subject to the Mercian kings. London itself, although the seat of the East Saxon bishopric, was not in the Saxon kingdom. It was often regarded as Mercian, and occasionally seems to have admitted the influence of the Kentish and West Saxons in a way that is extremely difficult of explanation. Northern Hertfordshire belonged to the diocese of Lincoln, and was never regarded as part of the East-Saxon kingdom. The deaneries of Braunging, Edwinstree, and Hertford, containing twenty-nine parishes, and coinciding with the hundreds of the same names, were East Saxon and subject to the see of London. The archdeaconry of St. Alban's, containing twenty-two parishes in Hertfordshire and four in Buckinghamshire, was added to the diocese in 1114 by Richard de Redenhall, who was of the family of the earls of Convers of Edward VI. The independence of the St. Alban's parishes dates a long way back into antiquity, and they may be regarded either as Mercian or as a border land between the two kingdoms.

The kings of the East Saxons traced their genealogy through Ecwine, in the ninth generation from Woden; and the peculiar feature of their pedigree is that with one exception, that of Offa, all the rulers of the East Saxons are related, according to the old legend, to S. To Ecwine, who is also called Erchenwic, no historian has ventured to assign a date; but he is regarded as the first king of the East Saxons. His son Sleda was married to Ricola, the sister of Ethelbert I. of Kent. Sebert, his son and successor, was the first Christian king, and must have been reigning under the supremacy of Ethelbert in the year 694, when the see of London was founded. Sebert, some time before the death of Archbishop Offa, was banished in 616, died, leaving his kingdom to his three sons (Bede, H. E. ii. 5). Saxred, Seward, and Sigeberht, who all fell in battle against the West Saxons (B. Flor. Wig. M. H. B. p. 527). The date of this event is fixed by Matthew Paris (l. 272) in 623, but without authority. The next king was Sigeberht the Little, the son of Seward (Bede, H. E. iii. 29; Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 629). Sigeberht the Good, who succeeded his uncle, Sigeberht the Little, restored Christianity among his people, who had fallen away after the death of king Sebert; he was the son of Sigezal (or Sexalbald), a descendant of Sleda through another line, was baptised about 653 under the influence of Oswy king of Northumbria, and soon after (civ. 660) was killed by his subjects. Swithhelm, his successor, seems to have been his brother (Bede, H. E. iii. 29; Flor. Wig. in M. H. B. 657); he was baptised by Verbius, and, like Sigeberht, was restored Christianity among his people, who had probably a competitor for the kingdom of Kent with Wihtric. Offa seems to have survived these two kings, and to have united the kingdom again (Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 637). On Offa's departure the kingdom of the East Saxons passed to Sigebert the Good (ib.), succeeded. His death is recorded by Symeon of Durham in 747 (M. H. B. 662). Swithred his successor (Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 637) was king in 758 (Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 544); he appears in the genealogy as Swithred, and his position in the pedigree is not fixed. Seled had a son Sigeric (Flor. Wig. 639) or Sirico, who went to Rome in 798 (Ch. M. H. B. 330); and Sigereid was his son (Flor. Wig. 629).
This Sigemund is mentioned in the Winchcomb charter of 811 (Kemble, C. D. 197) as present at the dedication of the church, in company with Kenuil. His is the last name in the genealogy; but another king, named Swithred or Swithred, is mentioned by Matthew Paris as conquered by Egbert in 828 (ed. Luard, i. 374, 375). The name mentioned in this article may be suspected.

The dense obscurity that hangs over every portion of East-Saxon history is not broken by any light derived from coins or charters. [5]

EASTERWINE (EASTERWINT), coadjutor abbot of Wearmouth, was the nephew of Benedict Bishop, founder and first abbot of that monastery. He was born in 650 (Hist. i. 157), the eighth year of King Oswy, and, being of noble birth, held the rank of a "minister" or "king's thane," under Oswy's son and successor Egfrid, before he was 24. At that age he renounced all secular prospects in order to join the community of which his uncle was then the head at Wearmouth. As a monk, he was so far from presuming on his "earl-kin," that he took pleasure in sharing the homeliest work with his brethren; he was to be seen, conspicuous by his vigorous form and kindly demeanour, engaged in threshing, winnowing, milking, baking, gardening, cooking, always "lingua suavis, et animo hilaris" (Bede, Hist. Abb. 7). He was ordained priest in 678. After Egfrid had been sent with a new monastic colony to Jarrow, Benedict made Easterwine his own coadjutor at Wearmouth, "in the 9th year from its foundation," i.e. in 682-3. In this dignity he retained all his frank humility; whenever he came across monks at work, he would join them by handling plough or hammer or winnowing machine, as if simply one of themselves; he shared their meals, slept in their dormitory, and, while careful to maintain discipline, was accustomed, "from his innate and habitual affectionateness," to warn beforehand against the misconduct which, if it occurred, would bring a cloud of sorrow over his bright countenance ("limpidissimam nullus ejus lucem"). During Benedict's last summer, Benedict's journey to Rome, a new colony, Easterwine, with many others of the community, was attacked by the "yellow pestilence." Even after fatal symptoms appeared, he remained two days in the common dormitory, and then removed into a private room. On the day before his death he came out, sat in the open air, and summoning all the monks, gave them, "more nature than coordinates," the kiss of peace and farewell, while they were weeping over the imminent departure of "such a father and pastor." He died while matins were being sung in the church, on the 7th of March, 686, aged only 36 years. See Bede, Hist. Abb. 6, 7. [W. B.]

EATA (1), the first bishop of Hexham and the fifth of Lindisfarne. He was one of the twelve Northumbrian boys whom St. Aidan, in the first days of his episcopate at Lindisfarne, "received to be instructed in Christ" (Bede, iii. 28). One of his fellow pupils was Cedd or Chad (3, iii. 28). In the year of Aidan's death, 651, we find Eata presiding as abbot over a monastery at "Malloruc," Old Melrose, a spot which Bede describes as "almost surrounded by the windsing of the Tweed (65, v. 12). He happened to be absent when, in the winter of that year, Cuthbert applied for admission into the monastery, and was received by Boisil the prior (Bede, Vit. Cuthb. c. 6). When, "after a few years," the sub-king Alchfrid, son of king Oswy, gave Eata some land at Ripon for the construction of a monastery, the abbot sent Gauther with other monks to occupy the new home. Eata himself appears to have spent some time there, for we read that he with the other inmates was sent back home (Vit. Cuthb. c. 8), or as we may infer from another passage (Bede, E. H. v. 19), preferred to depart rather than adopt the Catholic Easter and other observances which differed from those of Lindisfarne. After the conference of Whitby, bishop Colman, on the eve of his departure from Lindisfarne, asked king Oswy to place Eata over that monastery; and the abbot of Melrose thus (contrary to the rule established in foreign churches, C. of Epson, A.D. 517, c. 9) held in combination the government of two monasteries, and the priorship over both communities by qualities which Bede commemorates in the brief description of him as "the gentlest and simplest of all men" (Bede, iii. 26, iv. 27). About the same time he lost his prior Boisil, who, as he himself, we are told, had forewarned Eata three years previously, died of the plague which then ravaged Britain, and was known in Ireland as "the yellow pestilence" (Vit. Cuthb. 8). After some years, Eata transferred Cuthbert, who had succeeded Boisil as prior of Melrose, to the priorieship of Lindisfarne and employed him in a task which, perhaps, was too rough for his own disposition, that of improving the discipline of the house (Bede, iv. 27 Vit. Cuthb. 10). By Eata's request Cuthbert framed a body of rules for the monks (Anon. Vit. Cuthb. i. 3). In 678, when the diocese of York was divided by archbishop Theodore and king Egfrid without the consent of bishop Wilfrid, Eata was selected for one of the new bishoprics. He was to preside over Bernicles, having his episcopal chair either in Hexham or in Lindisfarne. Three years later, in 681, a further subdivision took place; Eata retained his office in Lindisfarne, while Wilfrid was made bishop in Hexham (Bede, iv. 12). When in 685 Cuthbert was consecrated as successor of the deceased Trumbert, Eata yielded to his former prior's strong feeling in favour of Lindisfarne, and returned to Hexham, where he spent the remainder of his life. He died of dysentery (Bede, Vit. Cuthb. 8) on October 26, 686, after an episcopate of eight years, and probably about fifty years after he had come to Lindisfarne, as a boy, to be trained by Aidan. He was commemorated on the anniversary of his death, and a church, called after "St. Eata the Confessor," was standing at Attingham (Atcham) on the Severn, near Shrewsbury, in 1075. The village was the birthplace of Ordericus Vitalis, who was baptised in the church on the "Easter Sunday" of that year (Ord. Vit. v. 1, xii. 45). See also Hardy, Desc. Cat. i. 292. [W. B.]

EATA (2) (A. S. C. ann. 738 in M. H. B. 322; EATE, Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1732 in M. H. B. 783), son of Leodwald, was the father of Eadbeth king of Northumbria, and of Egbert archbishop of York [C. H.]

Hosted by Google
EATA (ECHA, ETNA), an anchoret who lived at Clytha, in Yorkshire, and whose death in 787 is recorded by Simeon of Durham (M. H. B. 683). In a marginal note of the MS. of Simeon the event is placed in 752 (b. 662). Under the name Echa, this person is described by Alcuin, in the poem on the saints of York, as a chaste man who had given up worldly honours to hold communion with God, and as endowed with the gift of prophecy. He makes him a contemporary of archbishop Egbert of York, A.D. 734-746 (Mons. Alcuin. ed. Jaiffé, p. 125). His name appears in the list of anchorites in the Liber Vitae Duennemenis, p. 6, as "Echa presbyter."

EATBERT (Bed. H. E. Chronol. in M. H. B. 288 e), king of Northumbria. [EATBERT (4).] [C. H.]

EATHED (Flor. Wig. Nom. Præael. Lindis. in M. H. B. 624 d, e; Id. Chron. ann. 677, 681), bishop of Lindsey. [EATHE.] [C. H.]

EATTA (Wend. F. H. ann. 678, 686, ed. Coxe), bishop of Hexham. [EATA (1).] [C. H.]

EBAGNUS, a magistrianus, or official of the magister officiorum in the imperial court (Ducange, s. v.). He was sent with a letter from the emperor Theodosius II. to Augustine inviting him to the council of Ephesus. On arriving at Carthage, Ebagnus learned from the bishop Capreolus that Augustine was dead; he then returned to Constantinople with a letter from Capreolus to that effect. (Liberatus Dionysius, Brevarium, c. 5, Patrol. Lat. lxvii. p. 977; Cellarius, viii. 417; Baronius, a. D. 430, lxiv.) [W. M. S.]

EBALTERIUS, EBAULTIUS, EBARCIS. [EBARCUS.]

EBARCUS (1) Sixteenth bishop of Nevers, following St. Itherius, and succeeded by Opportunus. He flourished about A.D. 696, according to the Gallia Christiana. His date, however, is very doubtful. Coquelle, in his list of the bishops of Nevers (Hist. du Neversois, Paris, 1612, sub fin.), places Quercius or Evacius between St. Redatus (called by him Herdatus) and Galdo, while Le Coite (ann. 766; n. x. tom. v. p. 692) mentions an Evacius or Enardus as in occupation of the see in A.D. 766, as the successor of Waldo, or nearly a century later. It is possible, too, that the passages quoted under the head of Ebascius bishop of Tours, may refer to Ebacius of Nevers (Gallia Christiana, xii. 628.) [S. A. B.]

EBARCUS (2) (EBALTUS, EBASTUS, EBARCIS, EBALTHERIUS, EVARCUS), 33rd bishop of Tours, succeeding Bertus, and followed by Palladius. He appears under the name of Ebacis as a subscriber of a privilegium or charter of Agirardus, or Agardus, bishop of Chartres, given, A.D. 696, to the monastery of the Blessed Virgin, on the Loire (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxviii. 1226, and Mabillon, de die Dipl. lib. v. tab. 21, who, however, conjectures him to belong to Nevers) and again, in a placitum of Childebert III. concerning Noisy-sur-Oise (Nocito-Villa) (Bouquet, Hist. de la Fr. iv. 676). In a charter of Louis, king of the Aquitaniens (the Piouc), in favour of Noelles (Nobiliacum), mention is made of an Ebacius, who may have been identical with Ebarcius of Tours (see Gall. Christ. ii. instrumenta, p. 346, and see also Eparchius bishop of Poitiers). In none of the above quoted passages is the see mentioned, so that it is at least possible that Ebarcius bishop of Nevers is the person referred to, or Eparchius of Poitiers (Gall. Christ. xiv. 30). [S. A. B.]

EBARCUS (3) bishop of Poitiers. [EBARCUS (2).]

EBASISUS, bishop of Vicus Aeteri, a town in the province of Byzacia in Africa. He subscribed the synodal epistle of St. Stephen the primate of the province of Byzacia, purporting to be addressed to the emperor Constantine against the Monothelites. Hardouin (Concil. iii. 739) and Mansi (Concil. x. 927) both date this council and letter A.D. 648, when no Constantine was reigning, but Constans II., who succeeded Constantine III. in 641. Morelli (Afr. Christ. i. 353), though referring to Hardouin as his authority, gives A.D. 641 as the year. Baronius (Annal. ann. 646. i. vi.) gives 646 for the date, and reads Constans for the emperor. [C. H.]

EBASTUS. [EBARCUS.]

EBBA (1) (AERBA, AERBE, EBBE, Malmes. Gest. Pontif. 231, ed. Hamilton), abbess of Coldingham, a daughter of Ethelfrid king of Northumbria, by his second wife, Acha or Aeca, sister of king Edwin, to whom he was married about A.D. 603. She was ueterine sister of St. Oswald, and sister or aunt to several kings of Northumbria. After her father's death in A.D. 616, she sought refuge in Scotland with her brothers, where Donald Breck, the king, protected her (Aberdeen Brevery). Capgrave states that she was sought in marriage by Aedan king of Scots, and that to escape from him she fled to Coldingham, where she was protected by a miracle. This story may be possibly be dismissed when we remember that Aedan was vanquished in battle by Ethelfrid before Ebba was born. Capgrave says that Ebba received the veil from bishop Finch. Her brother king Oswy gave to her a small Roman camp, on the Derwent, in the western part of the county of Durham, which she turned into a monastery, and which was called Ebchester after her. The village church is also dedicated to her (Capgrave; Surtees, Durham, ii. 301).

Ebba was also abbess of Coldingham, in Berwickshire, and gave her name to St. Abb's Head, the bleak rock hard by, which juts out into the sea. Coldingham was a twin or double monastery, i.e. an establishment in which monks and nuns resided, apart indeed, but under one head. This system was at all times a dangerous one, and in this particular case, as history shews, had afterwards its peculiar disadvantages. Of Ebba's rule at Coldingham there is but little known. It was under her that Etheldreda her nephew Egfrid's wife placed herself when she took the veil in A.D. 671 (Bed. H. E. iv. 19). [ETHEL- DREA (2).] Here Cuthbert visited Ebba at her desire, and went to pray by night on the desert beach, where the souls' came nesting up to him out of the water (Hist. Vitae S. Cuth. cap. x.) On one occasion queen Ermenburga, Egfrid’s second wife, was mentally afflicted under her roof, and Ebba ascribed it to the imprisonment of Wilfrid by Egfrid, and blamed her nephew severely for his conduct. She also described a miracle which Wilfrid is said to have wrought while he was in ward (Eddi, cap. 37, 39).
EBBA

In A.D. 679, the monastery of Coldingham was destroyed by fire, an event which made a great sensation far and near (Bed. H. E. iv. 25). The buildings were probably of a very humble description, the walls of wood and clay, and the thatch of straw. Ebba did not long survive the destruction of her house. She is said to have died on August 26, A.D. 688 (on which day her festival was observed). Capgrave says that she was buried in her monastery, where a long while after her death her body was found by some shepherds. This was probably after its subsequent destruction by the Danes. Ebba’s remains are said to have been removed, and placed on the south side of the altar. In a later day another Egfrid, a nobleman of the north, brought Ebba’s bones, or some of them at least, to Durham, where they were laid beside those of her friend St. Cuthbert, in his shrine (Symeon, Hist. Eccl. Dun. iii. 7).

Ebba was worshipped as a saint, and divers miracles are ascribed to her agency. A life of her by Reginald, a monk of Durham, is in the Bodleian library (Fairfax, 0). It is short, and of little merit, compared with the other works of the same author, and although unpublished itself has largely been used by Capgrave. Cf. Nova Legenda Angliae, ff. 99-101; Acta SS. Aug. 25. v. 196-9; Forbes, Scottish Saints, 530; Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 288-290. [J. R.]

EBBA (2), an abbess who was sent to bishop Wilfrid in A.D. 709 by Ceolred, king of Mercia, to invite him to a conference on the state of the monasteries in his kingdom. (Eddi, Vita Wif. cap. 61.) [J. R.]

EBBI, an abbess, probably in Northumbria, of whom we know nothing more save that he died in A.D. 775. (Symeon, Chron. ed. Surtees Soc. 24.) [J. R.]

EBBO (1), ST., the 29th occupant of the see of Sens, succeeding his uncle Gericus, was born towards the close of the 7th century at Tonnerre, of noble parents. In early life he was elected to the administration of the district, a post which had become almost hereditary in his family. Civil honours, however, were distasteful to him, and while still young he relinquished his post and entered the monastery of St. Pierre le Vif, near Sens, of which, on the death of Viriaiboldus, he was elected abbot. He could not have remained here long, for in the first year of Dagobert III. (A.D. 711) he subscribes himself episcopus to a charter or deed, by which his sister Ingoara made over certain lands to the monastery of St. Pierre (Migne, Patr. Lat. Ixxxviii. 1258). According to the Chronicon Fontanellense (see D’Achery, Spicilegium, tom. ii. p. 270) he was present at a convent of bishops at Tolpiac, which is assigned to A.D. 722 or 723. A few years later he is said to have saved the city of Sens. The Saracens, after a long siege of Gaul, arrived before Sens, and laid siege to it (A.D. 732). The garrison, reduced to the last extremity, besought the aid of Ebbo, who, after prayer, rallied forth, almost unaccompanied, and put the enemy to flight, their arms being miraculously directed against themselves. The latter portion of his life he spent in solitude and meditation at Arce (Arec), a place situated a few miles from Sens, returning, however, at intervals to teach and console his flock. He died about A.D. 750, and was succeeded by Merulfs, or, according to the Bollandists, Arthuretus. He was buried at his old monastery of St. Pierre, by the side of his sisters, Ingoara and Leoteria. (Chroniques de St. Denis, liv. v. c. xxvi.; Chron. Auct. Incert.; Vita Ebbo. Episc. Sen. Auct. Anon. Socci. x., all to be found in Bouquet, iii. pp. 311, 315, 350 respectively; Roll. Acta SS. Aug. vi. 94; Gall. Christ. xii. 12.) [S. A. B.]

EBBO (2) (EBUL, EUBLUS), 29th bishop of Limoges, succeeded St. Cessar, and was followed by Aedelicus. He is said to appear in the catalogue of the abbots of Paris as “Ebulo Episcopus.” Le Coince (Ann. Eccl. a. 752 n. clv. tom. v. 387) conjectures that he was abbott and bishop as late as the beginning of Pippin’s reign A.D. 752. (Gall. Christ. ii. 506.) [S. A. B.]

EBDJEDESUS (1) (ΔΑΣΡΟΣ), the name of a bishop, three prebendaries, a deacon, and a monk, in the Persian martyrdoms under Sapor, about A.D. 361.

(i) In a bare list of bishops mentioned by Sozomen (H. E. ii. 13) as suffering in that country at this period Abdas and Ebedjedesus occur together, while Dausus, who closes the list, is briefly stated to have been taken captive at Zabde and martyred. Copious Acta of these two bishops and numerous companions were first printed in the original Chaldæan, with a Latin translation by Assamani (Herm. gr. et Lat. 1748, p. 144). The Monumentum of Balli also relates (May 16) how bishop Ebedjedesus in Persis, denounced by his own nephew, a deacon, was martyred under Sapor with bishop Abdas and others.

(ii) Three prebendaries, Ebedjedesus, are named in the Assamani MS. just referred to as martyred with bishops Abdas and Ebedjedesus.

(iii) In the same Chaldæc Acta occurs a deacon Ebedjedesus, a mere name, in a company of deacons martyred with the two bishops. But in another of Assamani’s Chaldæic MSS. (ut sup. p. 133), wherein the martyrdom of bishop Dausus is related, Ebedjedesus appears as a distinct and prominent character. [DAUSAR.] Sozomen is silent as to this companion, whereas the Acta in Assamani are very full, and are supported by the Memoria (Ap. 9) which it cites. Assamani states that a mutilation in his MS. prevents any information being given concerning the death of deacon Ebedjedesus.

(iv) The monk Ebedjedesus is enumerated with other monks in the Assamani Acta (s. p. 144) as suffering with bishops Abdas and Ebedjedesus. [C. H.]

EBDJEDESUS (2) was a disciple of St. Abda Durkonensis, and flourished in the episcopal of Tamuz or Tomarra, who was bishop of Seleucia about the end of the 4th century (Assamani Ebd. Orient. iii. 614). He founded the monastery
EBERHARD, bishop. [C. H.]

EBERHARD (2), bishop. [C. H.]

EBERLULFS, chamberlain and alleged murderer of Chilpéric I. The crime was committed in A.D. 564, and the same year Guntram, Chilpéric's brother, and king of Burgundy, announced his intention of investigating the matter. Fredegund, the widow, denounced Eberlulf, who, she said, had afterwards stolen part of his treasure and fled to Tours. Guntram thereupon swore before his nobles to take vengeance upon Eberlulf and his posterity to the ninth generation, that the sight of their punishment might arrest for ever the impulse of custom of killing kings. Eberlulf took refuge in the sanctuary of St. Martin at Tours. Whether he was guilty of this particular crime remains doubtful. According to Gregory of Tours his denunciation was due to the fact that he had offended Fredegund by refusing to remain with her after Chilpéric's death. The author of the Gesta Regum Francorum imputes the crime to Fredegund herself, alarmed at the prospect of detection in her adultery with Landericus (c. 35, Migne, Patr. Lat. xcvii. 1453-4), and in this is followed by Almain (ii. 57; Patr. Lat. cxxxix. 730, 731). But whether implicated in the murder or not, Eberlulf was one of the most lawless and desperate men of his time. Though a refugee in the sanctuary, and scarcely daring to quit the actual tomb, he put no check upon his violent nature. He blasphemed the saint, and committed murders at his very feet, and the shrine was polluted with his orgies and extravagances. A priest who hesitated to give him more wine, when he was already drunk, barely escaped with his life; and Gregory of Tours himself, to whose championship of the rights of the sanctuary he might at any moment have to look for his life, he outraged and threatened continually declaring that he should die contented if he could first slay him and every other of St. Martin's servants. Guntram sent one Claudius with instructions to draw him, if possible, out of the precinct, and then kill or take him prisoner, but to be careful not to violate the sanctuary. Arrived at Tours, he succeeded in ingratiating himself with Eberlulf by protea9tions of friendship and assurance of his good offices with the king. In the absence of Gregory, the two made a feast in the church, in the course of which Eberlulf was induced to send away his servants for more wine. Claudius and his attendants then fell upon him, and killed him within the sanctuary. They themselves lost their lives either in the combat, or from the indignation of the people, who resented the insult done to the saint. Such of his goods as had not been already pillaged when he first fell into disgrace were distributed by Guntram among his friends. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. vii. 21, 22, 29.)

EBIONISM and EBIONITES. The name Ebionite first occurs in Irenaeus (circa A.D. 180-190; Adv. Haer. i. c. 29; [al. c. 26.] pp. 212-13, ed. Harvey). It was repeated, probably from him, by Hippolytus (c. A.D. 225-235; Refutat. Omn. Haeres. vii. c. 34 [al. c. 22]. ii. p. 406, ed. Duncker) and Origen († A.D. 254; Contr. Celsum, ii. c. 1) who set the example of introducing explanations of the name not always consistent with each other (cp. loc. cit. and De Principiis, iv. c. 1, § 22, Greek). In this, others imitated him, but offered different explanations (e.g. Eusebius [† c. A.D. 340]; Eccl. Hist. iii. c. 27), while other writers fabricated a leader, "Ebion," after whom the sect was called (cp. Oehler, Corpus Haeres. i. for the opinions of Philastrius (p. 42), Pseudo-Tertullian (p. 275), Pseudo-Jerome (p. 290), Isidore of Spain (p. 306), &c.).

These derivations and explanations owe their origin to the tendency to carry back the character of Ebionism, or the date of its founder, as far as possible. Thus the "Ebionite" was (according to his own statement) the "poor" man (Πων), who voluntarily strove to practise the Master's precept (Matt. x. 9) in Apostolic times (Acts iv. 34-7; cp. Epiphanius, Haer. xxx. c. 17); and the correctness of the etymology is not shaken by the Patristic scorn which derived the name from "poverty of intellect," or from "low and mean opinions of Christ" (see Eusebius, l. c.; Origen, de Princ. i. c.; Ignatius, Epist. ad Philadeph. c. 6, longer recension). "Ebion," as a name first personified by Tertullian, was said to have been a pupil of Cerinthus, and the Gospel of St. John to have been as much directed against the former as the latter. St. Paul and St. Luke were asserted to have spoken and written against Ebionites. The "Apostolical Constitutions" (vi. c. 6) traced them back to Apostolic times; Theodoret (Haer. fideb. ii. c. 2) assigned them to the reign of Domitian (A.D. 81-96). The existence of an "Ebion" is, however, now surrendered. Ebionism, however, had a nucleus, but the belief that its birth-place was the Holy Land, and its existence contemporary with the beginning of the Christian Church, is, with certain reservations, probably correct. A tendency to Ebionism existed from the first; gradually it assumed shape, and as gradually it developed itself in the two special forms presently to be noticed.

The records of the Church of Jerusalem contained in the Acts of the Apostles prove how strong was the zeal for the Law of Moses among the Jewish converts to Christianity. Gradually the leading Apostles there, SS. Peter, James, and John, whose powers of restraint and conciliation cannot be over-estimated, piously, drew away, or were withdrawn. The fall of Jerusalem (A.D. 70) took place, and the Church was formed at Pella under Symeon. The Jewish Christians were from the time of this visitation of God brought face to face with two leading facts. The first was that the temple was being obliterated, and the observance of the Law and its ordinances being positively impossible in part, there was valid reason for doubting the necessity of retaining the rest. The second was that if they adopted this view they must henceforth expect to find in the Jews their most uncompromising enemies. As Christians they had expected a judgment predicted by Christ, and, following His advice, had fled from the city. Both prediction and act were resented by the Jews. What the Jews were prepared to do, and actually did, is shown not only by the contemptuous term (Minim) they applied to the Jewish Christians (Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, iv. p. 89, &c.), but by the share they took in the death of the aged bishop Symeon (A.D. 106). The breach was not full; there still remained a portion of the Jewish Christians to take part in the national struggles—notably that of Bar-Cochba (A.D. 132)—against the Romans, by the tortures they had to suffer for their refusal, and lastly, by the erection of Aelia Capitolina (A.D. 138) on the ruins of Jerusalem. The Jews were forbidden to enter it, while the Jewish and Gentile Christians who came there were reviled and allowed no rights of Roman citizenship. The abolition of the most distinctive Jewish rites, and they practically signified their assent to it by electing as their bishop a Gentile and uncircumcised man—Mark (Essuc. Eccl. Hist. iv. 6).

Changes hitherto working gradually were now rapidly developed. Jewish Christians, with predilections for Gentile Christianity and its comparative freedom from the observance of the Sabbath, and the absence of the more precise observance of a kindred law, were able to adapt themselves to the contempt of Rabbin as well as Christianty (Grätz, p. 433); others lastly receded farther from Christianity, and approximated more and more closely to pure Judaism. The Ebionites are to be ranked among the last. By the time of Trajan (A.D. 96–116) political events had given them a definiteness of organization to which they had been previously strangers, and their position as a sect opposed to Gentile Christianity became fixed by the acts which culminated in the erection of Aelius Capitolina. The Ebionites were known by other names, such as "Homunculi," Greek "Anthropomorphites," or "Anthropolatriots" from their Christological views, "Periscars" from their settlement at Persa, and "Symmacians" from the one able literary man among them whose name has come down to posterity "Simmachus." Acquaintance with Hebrew was then confined to a few, and his Greek version of the Old Testament was produced for the benefit of those who declined the LXX adopted by the Ebionite Christians, in the Greek version of Aquila and Theodotion accepted by the Jews. Many, if not most, of the improvements made by the Vulgate on the LXX are due to the Ebionite version. (Field, Origines Hexaparum, quae supersunt. Preface.)

Ebionism presents itself under two principal types, an earlier and a later, the former usually designated Ebionism proper or Pharisaic Ebionism [see Nazarenes], the latter, Essene or Gaotic Ebionism. The earlier type is to be traced in the writings of Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Hippolytus, Tertullian, &c.; the later in those of Epiphanius especially.

(a) Ebionism proper.—The term expresses the opinions and practices of the descendants of the Judaiizers of the Apostolic age, and is very little removed from Judaism. Judaism was to them not so much a preparation for Christianity, as an institution eternally good in itself, and but slightly modified in Christianity. Whatever merit Christianity possessed was possessed as the continuation and supplementation of Judaism. The divinity of the Old Covenant was the only valid guarantee for the truth of the New. Hence the tendency of this class of Ebionites to exalt the Old at the expense of the New, to magnify Moses and the Prophets, and to allow Jesus Christ to be "nothing more than a Solomon or a John" (Tertull. de Carne Christi, lib. iv. 18). Legal righteousness was to them the highest type of perfection; the earthly Jerusalem, in spite of its destruction, was an object of adoration "as if it were the house of God" (Irenaeus, l.c.); its restoration would take place in the millennial kingdom of Messiah, and the Jews would return there as the manifestly chosen people of God. They distrusted the life of Jesus Christ into two parts; one preceding, the other following, His Baptism. In common with Cerinthus and Carpocrates, they represented Him to have been "the Son of Joseph and Mary according to the ordinary course of human generation" (Iren. l. c.). They denied His birth of a Virgin, translating the original word in Is. vii. 14 not ωθηθας, but ωθησαν. He was a "mere man, nothing more than a mere descendant of David, and not also the Son of God" (Tert. c. 14). But at His Baptism a great change took place. The event is described in the "Gospel according to the Hebrews" current among them, and the description is an altered expansion of the record of St. Matthew (iii. 13, 14). The voice from heaven spake not only the words recorded by the Evangelist, but also the words: "This day have I begotten Thee." (Ps. ii. 7). A great light suddenly filled the place. John the Baptist asked, "Who art Thou, Lord?" and the Voice answered as before. John prostrated himself at the feet of Jesus, "I pray Thee, Lord, baptize me," but Jesus forbade him, saying, "Suffer it to be so," &c. &c. (Epiphanius, Haer. xxx. 13). The day of Baptism was thus the day of His "anointing by election and then becoming Christ" (cf. Justin Martyr. Dial. c. Tryph. c. xii.). It was the turning-point in the life of Jesus: from that moment He was endowed with power necessary to fill His mission as Messiah; but He was still man. The Ebionites knew nothing of either pre-existence or divinity in connexion with Him. They are said to have freed themselves from Jewish dogmas, and to have held that the Messiah was to be an earthly king; they were not shocked, as were so many of the Jews, at the humbleness of the birth, the sufferings, and crucifixion of Jesus; but they agreed with them in looking upon the advent of Messiah as future, and in denouncing the restitution of all things to the millennium.
EBIONISM

EBIONISM

In conformity with these opinions upon the relationship between Judaism and Christianity, and upon the person and dignity of Jesus Christ, the Ebionites proper insisted that the Law should be strictly observed not only by themselves but by all. They quoted the words of Jesus (Matt. v. 17), and pointed to His practice (cp. Matt. xxvi. 55; John vii. 14, &c.). In like manner, the author of the New Testament seems to diminish the value of faith in Christ and a corresponding life. Of far greater moment to them, and as necessary to salvation, was the due observance of circumcision, the sabbath, the distinction between clean and unclean food, the sacrificial offerings—probably with the later Pharisaic additions (cp. Euseb. Eccl. Hist. vi. c. 17)—and the refusal of fellowship or hospitality to those who refused. They even quoted the words of Jesus (Matt. x. 24, 25) as their warrant, and affirmed their motto to be: "We also would be imitators of Christ." (Origen, quoted by Schleierm.) Jesus, they asserted, "was justified by fulfilling the Law; He was the Christ of God, since not one of the rest of mankind had observed the Law completely. Had any one else fulfilled the commandments of the Law, he would have been the Christ." In consequence, they declared, "when Ebionites in like manner fulfill the Law, they are able to become Christ." (Hippolytus, l.c.) As might be expected, the Apostle Paul was especially hateful to them. They repudiated his official character, they reviled him personally, in language which recalls that of the Judasizers alluded to in the Epistles to the Corinthians and Galatians, they represented him as a teacher directly opposed to St. Peter, St. James, and St. John; they reproached St. John with having no apostolical authority because (as they affirmed) he had not been "called of Jesus Christ Himself," nor trained with the other Apostles in the Church of Jerusalem. They twisted into a defamatory application to himself his employment of the term "deceiver" (2 Cor. vi. 8); he was himself one of the "many which corrupted the word of God." (2 Cor. ii. 17); he proclaimed "deliverance from the Law" only "to please men" (Gal. i. 10) and "condemn himself" (2 Cor. iii. 1). His personal character was held up to reproach as that of one who "walked according to the flesh" (2 Cor. x. 2), puffed up with pride, marked by levity of purpose (2 Cor. iii. 1), and even by dishonesty (2 Cor. vii. 2). They rejected his Epistles—not on the ground of authenticity—but as the work of an "apostate from the Law." (Euseb. iii. c. 27; Iren. i. c.) They went so far as to assert that by birth he was not a Jew but a Gentile (wresting his words in Acts xxi. 39), who had become a proselyte in the hope of marrying the High-Priest's daughter, but that having failed in this he had severed himself from the Jews and had occupied himself in writing against circumcision and the observance of the sabbath. (Epiphanius, adv. Haer. i. xxx. 16, 23.)

In common with the Nazarenes and the Gnostic-Ebionites, the Pharisaic Ebionites used a recension of the Gospel of St. Matthew, which they termed the "gospel according to the Hebrews." It was a Chaldee version written in Hebrew letters, and was afterwards translated by Jerome into Greek and Latin, who declared that he was acquainted with the "gospel of the Twelve Apostles," and the "gospel of the Nazarenes" (see Herzog, Real-Encykl., "Aporkr. d. N. Test," p. 520, ed. 1877). In the Ebionite 'gospel' the section corresponding to the first two chapters of St. Matthew was omitted, the supernatural character of the narrative being contradictory to their views about the person of Jesus Christ. It is difficult to say with certainty what other elements of the New Testament were known to them; but there is reason to believe that they (as also the Gnostic-Ebionites) were familiar with the Gospels of St. Mark and St. Luke. The existence among them of the "Protevangelium Jacobi" and the Nēprōn τοῦ Ἡσαυροῦ indicates their respect for those Apostles. (b) Essence or Gnostic Ebionism.—This, as the name indicates, was a type of Ebionism affected by external Gnosticism. They even accepted features of the Ebionite reformation were reproduced in its practice, and the traces of influences more directly mystical and oriental were evident in its doctrines. The fact that Ebionism generally passed through different phases at different times renders it, however, difficult to define with precision the line which separates Gnostic and Pharisaic Ebionism. Epiphanius (Adv. Haer. xxx.) is the chief authority on this class of Ebionites. He met them in Cyprus, and by personal inquiry obtained information upon points in which the older Hæresiologists had failed him (cp. G. A. Lipsius, Zur Quellen- Kritik d. Epiphanius, pp. 138, 143, 150, &c.).

Their principal tenets were as follows:—Christianity they identified with primitive religion or genuine Mosaism, and as distinguished from what they termed accretions to Mosaism, or the post-Mosaic developments described in the later books of the Old Testament. To carry out this distinction they fabricated two classes of "prophets," προφήται ἄληθες, and προφήται σύνεσις ὑπὸ ἄληθες. In the former class they placed Adam, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Aaron, Moses, and Jesus; in the latter David, Solomon, Isaiah, Jeremiah, &c. In the same spirit they accepted the Pentateuch alone among the Old Testament writings, and emasculated it; rejecting whatever reflected questionably upon their favourites. They held that there were two antagonistic powers appointed by God, Christ and devil; to the former was allotted the world to come, to the latter the present world. The conception of Christ was variously entertained. Some affirmed that He was created (not born) of the Father, a Spirit, and higher than the angels; that He had the power of coming to this earth, where He would, and in various modes of manifestation, that He had been incarnate in Adam, and had appeared to the patriarchs in bodily shape; others identified Adam and Christ. In these last days He had come in the person of Jesus. Jesus was therefore to them a successor of Moses, and not of higher authority. They quoted from their gospel a saying which was attributed to Him, "I am He concerning Whom Moses prophesied, saying, A prophet shall the Lord God raise unto you like unto me," &c. (Clem. Hom. iii. c. 63), and this was enough to identify His teaching with that of genuine Mosaicism. But inasmuch as they declined to fix the precise moment of the union of the Christ with the man Jesus—a union assigned by the Pharisaic Ebionites to the hour of Baptism—they admitted His miraculous origin.

In pursuance of their conception that the devil would seek to destroy the Church by the set of heretics and ascetics. They abjured flesh-meal, repudiating passages (e.g. Gen. xviii. 8) which contradicted their view; they refused to taste wine, and communicated with unleavened bread and water. Water was to them "in the place of a god;" ablations and lustrations were imperative and frequent. In one point they rejected asceticism for truer rules; they held the married life in honour, and recommended early marriages. To the observance of the Jewish sabbath they added also the observance of the Christian Lord's day. Circumcision was sacred to them from the practice of the patriarchs and of Jesus Christ; and they declined all fellowship with the uncircumcised. They observed the sacrifices of the altar and the reverence of the Jew for the Temple. In common with the Ebionite proper, they detested St. Paul, rejected his Epistles, and circulated stories creditable to him. The other Apostles were known to them by their writings, to which they assigned inferior rank in comparison with their own gospel.

It may perhaps be impossible to state precisely when Gnostic Ebionism replaced Ebionism proper, just as it is impossible to state definitely when Esseniastic Ebionism became affected by Gnosticism; but the conjecture appears not improbable that as the siege of Jerusalem under Titus gave an impetus to Ebionism proper, so the ruin under Hadrian developed Gnostic Ebionism. Not that Gnostic Ebionism began then to affect it for the first time, but that Gnostic ideas hitherto held in solution were precipitated and found a congenial home among men who through contact with oriental systems in Syria were already predisposed to accept them. The Essene Ebionite in accepting Gnostically Christiansitied Christianity brought it to the customs to which he was most attached. (Cp. Mansel, The Gnostic Sect, viii.)

This is further evident from the book of Elchassai and the Clementine Literature (see these names). These works are the production of the Essene Ebionites; and where they speak of Jesus Christ and His Apostles, His sayings and their lives, they do so, not in the words of the canonical Gospels and Epistles, but with additions or omissions, with that colouring which transforms (e.g.) St. Peter, St. Matthew, and St. James the Just into Essenes, and yet with that Gnostic tendency of thought which makes them lineal descendants of the Judeaizers who impelled the church at Colossae. (See Lightfoot, Colossians, p. 73, &c., and Essenism and Christianity, p. 397, &c.) The Essene or Gnostic-Ebionites differed from the Pharisaic Ebionites in another respect. By missionary zeal, as well as by literary activity, they sought to obtain converts to their views. In the earlier part of the 3rd century the Ebionite Alcibiades of Apamea (Syria) repaired to Rome. He brought with him the book of Elchassai, and "preached unto men a new remission of sins (proclaimed) in the third year of Trajan's reign." (A.D. 101.) Hippolytus, who gives an account of the matter (Hær. ix. c. viii. &c. ed. Clark), exposed the decided anti-Judaism which penetrated the teaching of the mythical teacher and of the pupil, but it is evident that many "became victims of the delusion." The immorality which the book—in imitation of the teaching of Callistus—indirectly encouraged probably attracted some; but could not fail to discredit the views of the mischievous sect.

Ebionite Christianity did no; however, last very long, neither did it exercise much influence west of Syria while it lasted. In Palestine the discomfiture accorded to "a certain one" (probably Alcibiades) who came to Caesarea about A.D. 247 maintaining the "ungodly and wicked error of the Elchsassai" (Baseb. vi. c. 38; cp. Redepenning, Origines, ii. p. 72) was in keeping with the reception accorded to less extreme Ebionite views from the time of the reconstitution of the mother Church at Aelia Capitolina. Judaism of every kind gradually passed out of favour. The attitude of the bishops of Palestine in the Paschal controversy of the 2nd century was the attitude of men who sympathized with the sympathies of the Jews; the language of Justin Martyr and of Hegesippus was the language of the representatives of the Samaritan and the Hebrew Christianity of the day, not of the Ebionite. And outside of Palestine Ebionism had even less chance of survival. From the very first the instructions and memories of St. Paul and St. John excluded it from Asia Minor; in Antioch the names of Ignatius, Theophilus, and Serapion were vouchers for Catholic doctrine and practice; and the daughter-Churches of Gaul and Alexandria naturally preferred doctrine supplied to them by teachers trained in the school of these Apostles. Even in the Church of Rome, whatever tendency existed in Apostolic times towards Ebionism, the separation also in Apostolic times—of the Judaising was the beginning of the end which no after-amalgamation under Clement could retard. The tone of the Shepherd of Hermas—a work which emanated from the Roman Church during the first half of the 2nd century (see Lightfoot, Galatians, p. 59, n. 2)—however different from the tone of the Apocrypha and St. Paul, is yet, in the slightest comparison with another so-called Roman and certainly later Ebionite work—the Clementine writings—is sufficient to prove it. The end of Ebionism had actually come—so far as the Roman Church was concerned—when in the 2nd century Jewish practices—notably as regards the observance of Easter—were unsuspectingly rejected. The creed of the Christian in Rome was the creed which he held from Irenaeus in Gaul and Polycarp in Asia Minor, and not from the Ebionite. When the above-named Alcibiades appeared in Rome (A.D. 219), Hippolytus denounced his teaching (that of Elchassai) as that of "a wolf risen up against many wandering sheep, whom Callistus had scattered abroad;" it came upon him as November; he had "risen up," he says, "in our own day." (Hær. ix. c. 8, 12.) The bishop's language is a proof of the oblivion which had certainly befallen any previous propagation of Ebionism in Rome.

For a couple of hundred years more, Ebionism—especially of the Essene form—lingered on. A few Ebionites were left; the time of Theodoret, about the middle of the 5th century: the rest had either returned to strict Judaism and to the EBODICHUS [EBODUS].

EBORAS, a Persian presbyter, martyred with Miles a bishop, and Sebosa a deacon, during the reign of Sapor II. (A.D. 346). He was commemorated Nov. 13. (Memol. Bas.) [T. S. B.]

EBORIC, king of the Suevi in Spain. [EBURIC.]

EBORINUS (EBORINTS), sixteenth bishop of Toul, succeeding Theodelfiridus and followed by St. Leudinus. He is one of the bishops addressed in the charter of Numeriani archbishop of Toul, to the abbot of Neronus, the founder and abbot of the monastery of Vallis-Gallasen in the Vosges (circ. A.D. 664).

(Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxxix. 1191; Gall. Christ. xii. 963, in str. 291.) [S. A. B.]

(EBORIJUS, (1). The name of "Eborius episcopus de civitate Bibracensi provincia Britannia" is attached, with those of Restitutus and Adelfius, to the acts of the council of Arles in 314. [ADELFUS.]

He is possibly the person called Hibernius in the synodal letter to pope Sylvester (Mansi, li. 469). The name may represent the British Ivor, Ebor, or Ibar. (See Haddan and Stubbs, i. 7; Mansi, Conc. ii. 466, 467; Labbe, Conc. i. 1430.) [EBURICUS.]

(EBORIUS, (2), king of the Suevi in Spain. [EBURIC.]

EBRAISILUS (Boll. Acta SS. Aug. vi. 694), bishop of Meaux. [EBREGISILUS.] [C. H.]

EBREGISILUS (EBREGISILUS, EBREGISILUS), ninth bishop of Cologne, succeeding Charentinus, and followed by Remedius, or, according to some, eighth, preceding Charentinus. In Gregory of Tours the name appears in a double connection, as borne by an ambassador of queen Brunehild, and a bishop of Cologne. Although there is no statement to that effect, it is by no means improbable that the two are identical. In the former capacity he was sent by the queen to Spain with a golden shield and two costly bowls as presents for the king, but Guntram, at Paris, being informed that gifts were on the way to the sons of Gundobald, his enemies, and suspecting that the ambassador was intended to excite hostilities against himself, intercepted the ambassador, and condemned him to death. He escaped, however, by affirming that the presents were for king Richardus, the betrothed of Chlodosuinda, sister of Childebert II.

As bishop, he was sent by king Childebert in A.D. 590 to assist in quelling the scandalous disturbances which had arisen in the monastery of the Holy Cross in Poitou, and he took part in the council of Poitiers, which was necessitated by them. [CHROTELIGUS.]

Two miracles are related by Gregory in connexion with him. Being seized with pains in the brain, he was healed by the application to his head of some of the dust of those fifty of the Theban Legion, who were said to have been buried at Cologne. He was also famous as the discoverer at oppidum Bertone of the body of St. Malouus. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ii 29; x 15; De Glor. Mart. iii. ixi. vii.; Gall. Christ. iii. 625; Labbe, Sacros. Conc. vi. 1317.) [S. A. B.]

EBREGISILUS (Boll. Acta SS. Aug. vii 694), bishop of Meaux. [EBREGISILUS.] [C. H.]

EBREGISUS (EBREGISUS, EVERGISUS), ST. twenty-fourth or twenty-fifth bishop of Trogres (afterwards Liège), succeeding St. Perpetuus. In the Gesta of Herigerus bishop of Liège (ob. A.D. 1009), the following words occur after a notice of St. Perpetuus, "Beatus quoque Ebergissus succedens 24 in Trumonia ejusdem episcopatus villa futu tumulatus." (Gesta, xxviii. Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxxix. 1033.) In a short Chronicle of Liège (see Gall. Christ. iii. 820) it is stated that he was bishop in A.D. 618. According to the compilers of the Gallia Christiana, his day of commemoration is the 28th of March, as distinguished from that of Evergisus of Cologne, with whom he has been confused, and whose day is the 24th of October (cf. Usuard, Martyrologium; Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxxii. 884, cxvii. 616, 617, 618). He is said to have died in A.D. 623, and to have been buried at Dortmund (Trumonia). His successor was Joannes. (Le Coite, Ana. Eccl. Franc. anno. 609, n. 15, anno. 623, p. 6, temp. iii. pp. 609, 723.) [S. A. B.]

EBRELINDUS, bishop of Lon. [ELINANDUS.]

EBREMUNDUS (EBREMUNDO), priest, and abbot. Migne and the Bollandists agree in the account of his life, but place it at quite different periods; the former saying he was born about the middle of the 7th century, and died about A.D. 720; the latter placing his death before A.D. 584. He was born at Bayeux, of a noble family, and passed his youth at court, Thierry III. being then king according to Migne, and Chliperic I. according to the Acta and Du Saussay. There he was rich and honoured, and married a wife of noble birth. Reading one day the words of our Lord "He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me," he resolved to renounce the world, and with the consent of his wife, who took the veil, retired from court and founded the abbey of Fontenay, in the diocese of Seez. He was afterwards made by the bishop of that diocese abbot of Mont Maire. Many miracles are related of him. His body was buried at his monastery, but was translated to Creil in the 10th century, for fear of Norman sepulchres. It was burned by the Huguenots in 1567, with the exception of part of the head, which, being in a separate reliquary, was preserved by the monks.

The common source of the various accounts of the saint seems to be a life of doubtful authority, taken from a breviary of Sensis, and given at length in the Acta, which places him in the time of King Chliperic, who was assassinated in A.D. 584, and makes him a contemporary of St. Ethel- phus or Evroux, and of St. Aloubert or Anobert.
EBRETINGUS, bishop of Leoni, who attended a council at Rouen in A.D. 689, and died in A.D. 701. The same life says he was buried by Loithaire, bishop of Sées, who is said to have been either next or fourth in succession from Alarbert. Migne seems to have chosen one mode of cutting the knot of the self of the name of Bayeux which was founded in the reign of William the Conqueror. The former abbey was destroyed by the Normans and never restored. Its site was two leagues north of Sées. (Gallia Christiana, xi. 413, 712.) [F. D.]

EBRETINGUS, bishop of Leoni. (ELEN-ANDUS.)

EBRIGISILUS, ST. (EBREGISILUS, EBRAI- SILUS), twenty-third bishop of Mœurs, the successor of St. Patarius. He is said to have been a monk of Jourarre (Jotrum), near Mœurs, and the brother of Aguilberta, the abbess of the nunnery in the same place. His date is quite uncertain, but perhaps may be placed towards the end of the 7th century. He was succeeded by Edolus. He was buried in the burying-place of the monastery, but in 1627 his remains, together with those of his sister and St. Theolechild, were disinterred in the presence of the queen Maria de Medicis, and placed in the church of Jourarre (Gall. Christ. viii. 1601; Boll. Acta SS. Ang. vi. 694.) [S. A. B.]

EBRIOINUS (Bed. iv. 1), mayor. (EBRONIUS.)

EBRIOINUS (1) was set up by the Frankish chiefs as mayor of the palace in Neustria and Burgundy about the year 638 (Gesta Reg. Fr. 45). Balthildis, mother of Clotaire III., regent during the minority of her son, was in some degree a check upon Ebroin. With her retirement in 644 to the monastery of Chelles, Ebroin's unlawful and tyrannical rule became arbitrary, rapacious, and cruel; he sold justice for money; he trampered under foot both nobility and clergy [pro levi offensâ sangvinem nobilium multorum fundebat innoxium (Vita Leodegari, c. 2, ap. Bouquet, ii. 611)]. In 670, on the death of Clotaire, Ebroin determined to set up Theodoric (or Thierry), Clotaire's brother as king; without calling together the customary Frankish assembly. The chiefs who, unwilling, came to salute the new king were repulsed with insults (V. Leodec. c. 3). A conspiracy was formed. Childeric of Austrasia was set up as king of the whole realm, Theodoric deposed and banished to a monastery; Ebroin was also banished to Luxeuil. The leader in this revolution was Leodegar bishop of Autun. Three years later, Thierry himself shared the same fate and the hands of Wulfoald. Wulfoald's tyranny again brought about the murder of Childeric, and universal anarchy prevailed (magna turbatio patriae, V. Leod. c. 7). In Neustria Theodoric was set up as mayor by the Burgundian party under Leodegis, Erchinoald's son, and Leodegar, who had returned from banishment. In Austrasia Dagobert II. was king of one party (Wulf-

EBRULFUS (3) (EVROLT, EVROYLT), St.,
said to have been abbot of the monastery of St. Fuscien-aux-Bois, near Amiens, probably towards the close of the 6th century. A life of him written by an anonymous author not earlier than the 9th century, was first published by Mabillon from a very old MS. (Acta SS. Ord. S. Benedict. i. 566, Paris, 1668-1701), and again from another MS. by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 25 Jul. vi. 194). Historically it is probably worthless. He was born at Beauvais, of French parents, in answer to the prayers of his mother, who had been long barren. From earliest childhood he was prompt in obedience and averse to evil. Soon, for the love of Christ, he withdrew himself from his parents, esteeming the carnal affections as enemies of his soul, and passed his youth in fasting and reading the scriptures. After a time he assumed the monastic habit, and built himself a cell at the place which was called, from its numerous houses of prayer, Oratorium (Oroir). The fame of his sanctity reached the bishop of Beauvais, who summoned him to his presence, and ordained him a deacon. In due course he became a priest, and his eminent piety was evidenced by the performance of many miracles. The monastery he established on the spot where St. Fuscienus and St. Victorious had suffered martyrdom, near Amiens, lost its abbat, and queen Fredegund, who, according to this most improbable narrative, venerated Ebrulfus, persuaded the nobles of her court to confer on him the office (cf. Gall. Christ. x. 1302). A vision directed him to accept it, though against his will. In the monastery he shewed himself humbler than the lowest of the brethren. It was vouchsafed to him to find the body of Maxianus or Maximinus (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 461), directed in a vision by St. Lucian, the fellow-sufferer of that martyr. He died July 25, and was buried in the oratorium, in the territory of Beauvais, where he had formerly dwelt, and which was afterwards called by his name. Some years later his tomb was adorned and enriched by a pious and noble matron named Theclana or Teclana, and Theodebert, or Chrodeberht, bishop of Paris (Gall. Christ. vii. 25), built a church over it. A nursery too was established there, which in the time of the first abbess Angadrismna was saved from conflagration by the presence of the saint's body (cf. Gall. Christ. ix. 813). When the Northmen devastated France his body was translated to Beauvais and placed in the church of St. Peter (circa 850). The life is followed in the Acta SS. by an account of his miracles (p. 196) by another anonymous and still later author. Though his death is assigned to July 25, and is marked under that date in the martyrologies (e.g. Usuard auct. Reg. Suec. in Migne, cxxiv. 297), the church of Beauvais commemorates him on the 26th. There has been some discussion as to his date. Mabillon and the Bollandists (obs. praevar. ut supra, p. 192) follow the life, which plainly speaks of the reign of Chilperic I, at the close of the 6th century. Le Cointe would place him a century later, but this view is generally disseminated from.

(Hist. Lit. de la France, vi. 88.)

[EBRULFUS (3)]

EBRULFUS (2), eighth bishop of Noyon and Tournai, following Chrodegang and succeeded by Bertundus or St. Acharius. According to Le Cointe he died in A.D. 621, but he is placed earlier than 575 by the compilers of the Gallia Christiana. Nothing is known of his life. (Le EBULUS (1) (Evolum, Elmius), third bishop of Limoges, placed by the Sammarthani next to St. Aurelianus, whose death they date A.D. 89. He fled through fear of persecution to Evraeum (Eueva) in Briis, where he remained in concealment (p. 379). Jordanus, a bishop of Limoges in the 11th century, mentions him by the name of Ebulus. (Gall. Christ. ii. 500; Jordanus, Epist. ad Bened. viii. pop. in Patr. Lat. ciii. 1159 a; Gams, Serm. Ep. 564.) [R. T. S.]

EBULUS (2) (Evulus), sixth bishop of Avignon, succeeding one unknown, A.D. 202, according to an ancient manuscript quoted in the Gallia Christiana (ii. 852), where it is stated that he was ordained and sent to Vienne from Rome by pope Victor at the close of his pontificate, and that having sat sixteen years and above eight months (the last three years being spent in the desert), he died in his church before the altar of St. Mary in the act of blessing his clergy and people, on 12th June (the year being by computation 219), having previously consecrated the presbyter Joannes as his successor. The Sammarthani in this place conjecture that he was the Ebulus who carried the letter of Victor to Augustinus the fifth year of his pontificate (cir. 194) to Desiderius bishop of Vienne, Victor calling him “de collegio nostro,” and begging for him a favourable reception as one ready to live and die with Desiderius. This letter of Victor occurs in Baronius (A. E. ann. 198, xvii.), and Baronius, on the strength of it recognizes Desiderius as bishop of Vienne. But the later compilers of the Gall. Carol. (xvi. 9 b) reject this Desiderius, and Jaffé prints Victor’s letter as spurious (Reg. Post. 922). The doubt cast upon Desiderius of course makes the existence of Ebulus questionable. [C. H.]

EBULUS (3), EBULO, 29th bishop of Limoges. [Evno (2).]

EBUR, or, according to another reading, Ywou, a bishop who is said in the Annales Cambirensis to have died A.D. 501, “nano clero aetatis susce.” (Annales. Camb. ann. lvi. i.e. A.D. 501, in M. H. B. 830 b.) In the Annales de Téjernach, where he is named Ibar (O’Conor, Script. ii. 157), he is said to have died 9 kal. Maii. A.D. 503, aged 303 years. [EBURUS (1).]

EBURIC (Eborich, Esborius, and in Gregory of Tours Eboricus), king of the Suevi in Spain. He succeeded his father Miro A.D. 583, and immediately after his accession acknowledged the supremacy of the Goths under Leovigild. “He asked for Leovigild’s friendship, rendered him the oath of allegiance as his father had done, and received from him the kingdom of Gallicia,” says Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. vi. 43), an act which may possibly have given umbrage to the national party among the Suevi, and caused the rising of Eburic’s brother-in-law, Audika, in 584. Eburic was deposed and forced into a monastery. (Isid. Hist. Suev. apud Exp. SAGR. vi. 506, and Baron. Annal. ann. 584, ix.) Audika then married Miro’s widow, Sigisvandhis, Eburic’s step-mother, his first wife being apparently dead. His success, however, was short-lived. In the following year, 585, Leovigild took him prisoner and condemned him to the same fate that he had previously forced upon Eburic, says Isidore (I. c.). Leovigild, however, took no steps to reestablish Eburic, of whom we hear nothing further, and the Suevi were incorporated in the Gothic state (Joannes Bichiresia, ann. 585, apud Exp. SAGR. vi. 346). Eburic therefore was lost as the last of the native Suevian kings. From 584 onwards the Gothic kings are often found bearing the title of Rex Suevorum. (Dahn, Könige der Germanen, Vte. Abth. 571.) [M. A. W.]

ECBERCOTUS (Bed. de Sex. Aetat. in M. H. B. 100 d), ECBERT (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1659, in M. H. B. 784), ECBHRHIT (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1725, in M. H. B. 780), presbyter. [EGEBERT (5).]

ECBERITH EATINGO (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1755, in M. H. B. 786), ECBRATH EATINO (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1751, in M. H. B. 785), king of Northumbria, son of Eathan. [EADBEERT (4).]

ECBERT (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 2215, in M. H. B. 791), ECBRITH (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 2235, 2249, 2256, 2257, 2258, 2278, 2295, 2345, 2353, 2356, 2361, 2363, 2375, 2386, 2329, in M. H. B. 791–794), king of Wessex. [EGEBERT (43).]

ECBRICTH (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1389, in M. H. B. 781), ECBRICH (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1407, in M. H. B. 781), king of Kent. [EGEBERT (1).]

ECBRITH (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 2181, in M. H. B. 790), king of Kent. [EADBEERT FRAX.]

ECCAC (1), Mac h-Uca, of Letheain, is in the Mort. Taltagh at Jan. 20, and attempts have been made to represent him as the same person with St. Fechin, of Fore, or with Aenna Na Laighisigh, both commemorated on this day, or again with Acca, bishop of Hexham, but his name, family, and place are alike unknown (O’Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 379–383). [J. G’]

ECCAC (2) (Flor. Wig. Nom. Proseul. Mugeset, in M. H. B. 621), bishop of Hereford. [HECCAC.]

[C. H.]

ECCELEIA, one of the eight primary aeons in the system of VALENTINUS (Iren. i. i. p. 7, v. p. 17; Hippl. Ref. vi. 50, p. 197; Epiph. Diogn. 31, pp. 165, 109). This higher Ecclesia was held to be the archetypus of the lower Ecclesia constituted by the spiritual seed on earth (Iren. i. v. 6, p. 28). In a Gnostic system described by Irenaeus (L. xxx. p. 109) we have also a heavenly church, not, however, as a separate aeon, but as constituted by the harmony of the first existing beings. According to Hippolytus (v. 6, p. 95), the NAAMBENNE counted three Ecclesiae.

It is especially in the case of the church that we find in Christian speculation prior to Valentinus traces of the conception, which lies at the root of the whole doctrine of aeons, that earthly things have their archetypes in pre-existent heavenly things. Hermas (Vis. ii. 4) speaks of the church as created before all things and of the world as formed for her sake; and in the newly discovered portion of the so-called Second Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians (c. 14) the writer speaks of the spiritual church as created before the sun and moon, as pre-existent like Christ Himself, and as Him manifested in the last days for men's salvation; and he even uses language which, if it were not sufficiently accounted for by what is said in the Epistle to the Ephesians as to the union between Christ and His church, might be supposed to have affinity with the Valentinian doctrine of the relation between Anthropos and Ecclesia. In the notes to the passages just cited, in Lightfoot's and in Gebhardt and Harnack's editions will be found references to other early writers who have used similar language concerning the church. It need not be supposed that this language was directly suggested to those who used it by the Platonist philosophy, for there are passages in the New Testament which sufficiently account for it; and the so-called Clement claims to have derived his doctrine from "the books and the apostles." The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews quotes the direction to Moses to make the tabernacle after the pattern shewn him on the Mount (a passage cited in Acta viii. 44), and the argument dwells on the inference that the various parts of the Jewish service were but copies of better heavenly archetypes. This same heavenly tabernacle appears as part of the imagery of the book of the Revelation (xi. 19, xv. 5). In the same book the church appears as the Lamb's wife, the new Jerusalem descending from heaven; and St. Paul's teaching (Eph. i. 5) might be thrown into the form that the church existed God's election before the foundation of the world.

ECCELESIASTICAL HISTORIANS [HISTORIANS, ECCLESIASTICAL.]

ECCELESIASTICUS. It would seem from Irenaeus, iii. 15, that this title was first used by the Valentinians as a nickname for the members of the church who refused to join their sect. However this may be, it soon became a recognised appellation for members of the church, whether of the church as opposed to the world (Cyril. Hier. Catech. 15. 2, p. 296), or of the church as opposed to heretics. On the uses of the word, see DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIAN ANTIQUITY. Further illustrative references will be found in Du Cange, in the notes of Valesius and Heinichen on Eus. H. E. ii. 25, and of Massuet and Toutée respectively on the passages cited from Irenaeus and Cyril. But it is to be noted that several of the instances cited by these authors are of the early use of the word to denote members of the clergy are not at all decisive, and that when the word first came to be so used, it was limited to the inferior orders of the clergy.

ECCELESIASTICUS (1), bishop of Ravenna, from c. 523 to 532, between Aurelianus and Ursicians. July 27, according to tradition, was the day of his death. He accompanied pope John I, whom Theodosius compelled to go on a mission to the emperor Justin in 526. (Anastasius Valesianus, i.e. the Chronicle of Maximian, archbishop of Ravenna, so Waiz and Holder Egger, Monum. Rerum Italicarum, i. 273, p. 273, ed. Gardthausen, 1876, p. 303.) He had some disputes with his clergy, and the matter was carried to pope Felix IV, who summoned Ecclesius to Rome. The matter was arranged by a decree of the pope (Agnellus, Liber Pont. cap. 60), and the customs instituted under Ecclesius were appealed to by later archbishops. (Cl. Agnellus, Vita Theodori; Jaffé, Regest. Pontif. ann. 526–550, p. 71.)

Ecclesius built the church of Sancta Maria Maggiore in Ravenna. (Rubens, Hist. Ravenn. p. 154.) Under his direction also was begun the celebrated basilica of St. Vitalis in Ravenna, built by Julianus Argentarius, and consecrated in 547 by archbishop Maximianus. Agnellus, cap. 77, records an inscription in the narthex of the church commemorating the work. It is mentioned also on the gravestone of Ecclesius, who was buried in the church of St. Vitalis. (Richter, Die Mosaien von Ravenne, 1876, p. 72.) In the central mosaic of the apse of this church the angel on the left introduces Ecclesius bearing a model of the church. (Kugler's Hand book of Painting, Itali. School, Lady Eastlake's 4th ed., pt. i. p. 32; Richter, p. 92, and note.) In the church of St. Apollinaris in Classe, whose mosaics belonging to the end of the 7th century are intended to place the church of Ravenna on a level with that of Rome, Ecclesius appears among the four bishops of Ravenna below the apse. (Richter, p. 104; Kugler, p. 60.) For the life of Ecclesius, the chief authority is Agnellus, Liber Pontificiorum. Eccles. Rav. ed. Holder Egger, Monum. Rerum Italicarum, etc. 1878, pp. 318–322.

ECCELESIUS (2), bishop of Chiusi (Clusium), a.d. 600–602, the second known bishop of that see standing in the list between St. Florentius and Marcellinus (Ugel. Ital. Sacr. iii. 587, where he is called Eulogius; Games, Sac. Ep.
paganism at Antioch, and read a composition in praise of Apis on that occasion (Ammian. Marcell. xxii. 14). There are also edicts of Julian addressed to Ecdicius in the Codex Theodosianus, both of which were issued at Antioch, and are dated Dec. 2, A.D. 362 (XV. i. 8, 9, ed. Ritter, v. 317, 318; Prosopogr. iii. vii. pt. ii. 50 b).

[A. H. D. A.]

ECDICIA, a lady to whom St. Augustine wrote a letter of rebuke, on account of her conduct towards her husband. Having partly persuaded him to adopt the rule of matrimonial continence, she persevered in her resolution when he wished to put an end to the engagement; and sent only so far, but by assailing widow's weeds and withdrawing from his society she so irritated him as to induce him to give way to the temptation to adultery. Besides this, she had given away to some wayfaring monks nearly all the money of his that she had in her possession, and thus excited in him a general spirit of indignation against persons of this class. With the view of training their son for the monastic life, she had stinted him in necessary food. Augustine, therefore, rebukes her sharply, in a letter full of sound sense and clear spiritual discernment. (Aug. Ep. 262; see also Serm. 354.)

[H. W. P.]

ECDICIA (1) or ECDITIUS, martyr, Mar. 10. [Sectane, Forty Martyres op.]

ECDICIA (2), a civil officer of high rank under the emperor Julian. He was governor of the great diocese of Egypt in the prefecture of the East, in succession to Hermogenes, and as such enjoyed the dignity of "praefectus augustalis" and resided at Alexandria (Cod. Theod. XIV. xxvii. 1). As Georgius, the previous bishop of Alexandria, had been a great collector of books, and left a considerable library, Julian wrote to Ecdicius that he would do him a personal favour if he would search for those literary treasures and have them sent to him. However, Ecdicius may have fulfilled these instructions, he would appear to have been somewhat remiss in the discharge of his official duty with regard to paganism. The beauteous of Alexandria had long been accustomed to celebrate a great festival at the rising of the Nile, when, among other ceremonies, the praefect of Egypt cast "golden presents" into the river (Seneca, Nat. Quaesit. iv. 2). Constantine had forbidden this festival, but an edict of Julian had re-established it (Euseb. u. z.; Sozomen, v. 1). Julian evidently had his doubts about the heartiness of Ecdicius in the revival, and accordingly wrote to him a characteristic letter on the subject, telling him that he had heard of the "rise of the Nile from Theophilus the Stratopedarch, and that "perhaps he would like to know it" (Julian. Ep. 50, Heyler, p. 93). Ecdicius was the officer charged by Julian with the expulsion of Athisanians, and appears to have been lukewarm in that proceeding. There is extant another letter from Julian to Ecdicius. In this the emperor declares his great personal interest in "music," and charges the praefect to encourage it in Alexandria "by all means," making special mention of the praefect of Dioscorus, a "musician" of the city (Ep. 56, Heyler, 108; Ammian. Marcell. xxii. 16). Ecdicius would be the "Rector Aegypti," who took a prominent part in Julian's ostentatious display of his CHRISt. BHOOr.—VOL. II.

ECFERTH (2) (Gaimar, Estorie, 2175, M. H. B. 790), ECFRIRD (Kemble, C. D. 162, spurious or doubtful charter of Osca king of Mercia, a.d. 793, signature; Ecfrird in the body), king of Mercia, son of Osca. [Ecfeird (2).] [C. H.]

ECGBALD (1), abbat. [Ecgbald (1).]

ECGBALD (2) (Kemble, C. D. 133, 143), bishop. [Ecgbald (2).] [C. H.]

ECGBERT (2) (Bed. H. E. iii. 14, 17, 18, 19, 31, 29, 27, 28; v. 1, 19, 24, Recapit. Chron. ann. 675, 685; M. H. B. 198 a, 265 b, 215 c, 222 c, 227 c, 228 c, 229 c, d, 232 d, 241 a, 242 b, 244 a, 249 a, 271 c, 273 a, 285 d e; Flor. Wig. Chron. in M. H. B. 537 a; id. Ad Chron. App. in M. H. B. 624 d, 638 b, 639 d, e; Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann. 794, in M. H. B. 668 e), ECGBRTH (Flor. Wig. Gen. Reg. Northum. in M. H. B. 642), king of Northumbria, son of Osy. [Ecbert (2).] [C. H.]

ECGBRTH, king of Mercia. [Ecberth.]

ECGLAF (Egvalf), the sixth bishop of Dunwich. (M. H. B. 618.) He must have flourished during the latter half of the 8th century, as his successor Headred was at the council of Brintford in 781. Only his name is known. [S.]

ECGRIC (2), reader (lector), mentioned by Simeon of Durham as dying in 771. (Sim. Dun. M. H. B. 664.) He was one of the same class of teachers with Higlac and Colcu, the contemporaries of Alcuin. [S.]

ECGULUF (Kemble, C. D. 129 a, d, spurious or doubtful charter of Osca king of Mercia, a.d. 765-775), ECGULUF (Kemble, C. D. 119), spurious or doubtful charters of Osca king of Mercia, a.d. 750-764; Flor. Wig. Nom. Episc. Lund. in M. H. B. 617), bishop of London. [Egulf.]

ECGWALD, abbot of Tisbury, in Wilts, in 759. He is known only from a charter found in the Shaftesbury chartulary, preserving a notice of a grant made by Coenred, the father of Ina, to an abbot named Bectun, between the years 670 and 676. Catwulf, the successor of Bectun, sold the land to Wintra abbot of Tisbury. A dispute arose between Egwald the successor of Wintra and Tidball the successor of Catwulf, and the land was in 759 adjudged by king Cynwulf to Egwalid (Kemble, C. D. 104). The interest of the matter lies in the fact that Wintra abbot of Tisbury was an early friend of St. Boniface, and from this charter we get a glimpse at the early monastic life of Wessex. (See Willibald’s Life of Boniface, cap. 4; Mon. Magnus, p. 439.) It is just possible that the Ecgwin may be identical with Ecgald bishop of Winchester. [Ecgald (3).]

Echa, anchoret at Crayke. [Eata.]

Echdach (Echaad, Ann. Tg.), son of Eudin (Cutin) king of the Saxons, clerked and put in confinement (Ann. Ult. A.D. 730; Ann. Tg. A.D. 731; O’Conor, Scriptt. ii. iv.). He has not been identified in the Anglo-Saxon royal families. The name is generally used by the Annals of Ulster for Echdaidh. [J. G.]

Echea, niece of St. Patrick. [Echt.]

Echen, Echeus. [Echen.]

Echpferd (Gimal, Estoria, v. 1932, in M. H. B. 787), king of the Mercians. [Eofrad (2).]

Echpfrith (Atfrith), the fifth abbot of Glastonbury in William of Malmesbury’s list. He presided, according to the same authority, from 719 to 729, during which time Ina’s greatest privileges were granted to the monastery (Will. Malmes. Antq. Glast. ap. Gale, pp. 316, 313, 328). The name does not appear in the more ancient list given in MS. Tiberius B. 5; Memorials of St. Dunstan. p. lxxii. See Kehfrith. [S.]

Echi (Echea, Achaa), niece of St. Patrick, commemorated Aug. 5. In Eruin’s Life of St. Patrick (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 132, c. 21, 175 n. 4) mention is made of the three sons of Conis and Darerca, sister of St. Patrick, and also of their two daughters, St. Echea of Killglass in the region of Telfa (now Annaly, co. Longford), near the church of Ardagh to the south, and St. Lalanna or Senilia in Connaught. St. Angusus the Cudlee (in Matr. Sanc. iv. c. 6), O’Clery, and other Irish authorities, refer to the two sisters with more or less distinctness, yet of their history nothing is really known, and attempts at identification are fruitless (O’Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 363). Of St. Ech’s nunnery in the parish of Killglass, co. Longford, there are now no remains; Senilia, Senilia, or Senalia, where her sister Monus’s daughter is said to have been, is unidentified, but was probably in the county of Roscommon, on the west side of Slieve Baun. (Todd, Book of Hymns, Fasc. i. 111; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 211, calling Darerca his (sic) mother; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 231, col. i. 227, nn. 5, 6.) [J. G.]

Echlech, son of Daighe and brother of Cusmine and Caemhann, is commemorated on Aug. 14 (Mart. Doneg.). [J. G.]

Echtach (Ectagiu), commemorated Feb. 5. In the Life of St. Corbmac (Mar. 27) it is related (Colgan, Acta SS. 753, c. 13) that St. Corbmac fixed his monastic seat among the sons and posterity of Almakeithid son of Fiachra, that is, in the present barony of Tirawley in the county of Mayo, and that there they, with their relations who were descended from Dathli, another son of Fiachra, venerated the most pious stranger and his successors with great readiness, till in course of time their devotion gradually turned away to a number of saints, and among others to St. Ectica, virgin. Colgan (fn. 755 n. 23) says this is the Echtach virgin whose dedication is given (Mart. Doneg. and Tall) on Feb. 5. [J. G.]

Echu. [Echadhur.]

Ecianus, bishop of Cluainfnda. [Echen.]

Ecclesiastics. Ecclesiastics have existed in many ages of the world; and the early history of Christianity furnishes a remarkable instance of such a system. It was impossible that the early Christians, when once they had received into their body men of culture and learning, should not be struck with that noblest product of ancient morality, the philosophy which took its birth from Socrates, and was thenceforward known by the names of its divergent branches, as Platonism, Aristotelianism, Stoicism, etc. Hence arose attempts to reconcile the various forms of philosophy with Christianity, and to present the whole under one view. The author of the Epistle to Diognetus; Justin Martyr; Athenagoras;Justin Alexander; and Origen, are the chief names connected with this tendency. It is to be observed that this eclecticism differed in its animating principle from every ordinary eclectic philosophy, in that it aimed in the first instance to reconcile philosophy with religion, and only as a secondary aim and by a sort of consequence to reconcile the different philosophies with each other. The following very remarkable passage from Justin Martyr displays the first and principal aim in its purest form: “We have been taught that Christ is the firstborn of God, and we have before shewn Him as being the word (or reason), in which every race of men has obtained participation; and they who lived by the aid of this word (or reason) are Christians, even though they were esteemed atheists, as among the Greeks, Socraletes and Heraclitus and those like to them, and among the barbarians Abraham and Ananias.” (τὸν Χριστὸν πρωτόκοτον τοῦ θεοῦ ὑπὲρ ἀδίκημον, καὶ προφητεύουσαν λόγον ἐμπαίμαμεν, εἶναί τὸς ἄνθρωπος μετέχει καὶ οἱ μετὰ λόγου βιωτισμένοι Χριστιανοὶ εἰσὶ, καὶ οἱ θεοὶ εὐθερμοθεῖται οὐν ἐν Ἐλληνὶ μέλι Ακαδμίας καὶ Ἕρακλείτους, καὶ οἱ ἰδωμενικοὶ ἐν βαρβαρίας τῇ Ἀθηνᾷ καὶ Ἀνανίᾳ. Apol. pr. p. 71.) It will be seen from this passage that Justin laid stress (and with perfect truth) on the spiritual element of the ancient philosophers as the uniting point between them and Christianity; with their system-making he had less concern, though he had been converted from Platonism to Christianity, and when a Christian always esteemed Platonism as far above the other ancient philosophies. Of the secondary aim above-mentioned, the reconciliation of the different ancient philosophies with each other, though always in subordination to Christianity, Clemens Alexandrinus is the typical example. He ridicules the fear which many have of the Greek philosophy, calling it a bugbear (Strom. lib. vi. cap. 16, p. 278). "By philosophy," he says, "I mean not the Stoic, nor the Platonist, or the Epicurean, or the Aristotelian; but whatever things have been spoken well by each of these sects, and which teach righteousness along with a pious knowledge, all this eclectic (or selected) matter I call philosophy." (φιλοσοφίας θε ού της Στουηίδι λέγω, ούτε την Πλατανικήν ή την Τάκτικον κι ο Αριστοτελίκην αλλα είναι παρ' έκδητι των άλλων τοιν καλά, δηδοισθείς μελ' ούτοι δια πάντα κατ' άλλας σειράς διαλεγομενής φιλοσοφίας σμί—Strom. lib. i. cap. 7, p. 124). Clement looked upon the ancient philosophies as definitely leading men on the way to absolute truth. It may be doubted if he went to the heart of the matter as much as Justin had done; and his idea that the ancient philosophers borrowed from the Hebrew Scriptures was baseless and untrue. But of all the ancient Fathers, none presented so much of the type of an eclectic philosopher as Clement.

In Origen, philosophy, in so far as it is apparent, returns again to the Platonic form; and after Origen, attempts to reconcile Christianity with philosophy, though not quite unknown, are very rare among the early Fathers; for the use which Christian theologians afterwards made of the terms of Greek philosophy is quite different from an actual reconciliation of religion and philosophy. With the school of Origen, the bishop of Alexandria, continued the philosophical tradition is uncertain, though at an early age he had been a pupil of Ammonius Saccas. Synesius of Cyrene at a much later date was well known in philosophy; and Proclus, the Neoplatonist, is said to have been a Christian. Doubtless the rise of the Neoplatonic school, with its tendency to present itself at once the rival and the antagonist of Christianity, kept Christian writers in the main far removed from the domain of philosophy. But the approximation had been very close at the end of the second century A.D.; the founder of the Neoplatonic school, Ammonius Saccas, was himself born a Christian, and it is even not quite certain whether he did not continue such throughout.

None of the writers above mentioned called themselves Eclectics, or would appear to have been called by this name in ancient times. With reference to this whole subject see especially Vacherot's Histoire Critique de l'Ecole d'Alexandrie, vol. i. ch. v. pp. 223-302, from which chapter the quotations in the present article have been derived. See also the names of the writers here mentioned in the present Dictionary.

[J. R. M.]

ECLECTUS (ELECTUS), chamberlain of the emperor Commodus. On the last day of A.D. 194, that prince, after shedding during a long period the noblest blood of Rome, had determined on the following morning to execute amongst others Marcia his favourite concubine, Eclectus his chamberlain, and Laetus his Praetorius prefect. Learning their intended fate, they determined to prevent it by the death of the tyrant, and the same night they introduced to his chamber a wrestler, who strangled him without a struggle.

[W. M. S.]

His name has suggested a suspicion that he was a Christian (see vol. i. p. 611), and though this ground is but slight, the name Eclectus being found in non-Christian inscriptions (Gruter, 403-5, 691-4, 980-5, 1142-4; Boeckh, 4105, 6224, 6379), yet the conjecture receives some confirmation from the fact that he became the husband of Marcia, who was a Christian, certainly in sympathies, and possibly by profession. His Christianity is not disproved even if it be true that though he personally took no part in the assassination of his master, he was an accessory to it before the fact. He had ascertained that by his remonstrance against a mad and murderous project he had so incensed the tyrant's deadly resentment that it was only by the emperor's death the lives of himself and of those who had joined in his advice could be saved. The question is not how in such circumstances a Christian ought to have acted, but whether it can be pronounced improbable that a professing Christian might have acted as Eclectus is said to have done. His conduct on this occasion may claim the more lenient judgment on account of his fidelity to his new master. When a mob of soldiers came in to take the life of Pertinax, Eclectus was the only one of his attendants who did not desert him, and he died fighting in his defence against overwhelming odds; on which his contemporary, Dion Cassius remarks that he had before that considered Eclectus a good man, but then gave him real admiration. On the other hand, Tertullian has said (Apol. 15) that any of the murderers of Commodus was a Christian. Eclectus was by birth an Egyptian; he had been a freedman of L. Verus, on whose death he was retained by M. Aurelius, passed then into the service of Quadratus, where Marcia was his fellow servant, and on the destruction of Quadratus was taken with her into the service of Commodus. (Dion Cass. lxxii. 4, 19, 22, lxxiii. 1; Capitol. Ver. 9, Part. 4, 11; Herodian. i. 51.)

[G. S.]

EC PHY SIUS, martyr. [EPHYRIUS.]

EC TGA ILE, son of Bait, abbat of Muicirt, died A.D. 787 (Ann. Ult. in O'Conor, Script. iv. 113). [J. G.]

E C - T H E S I S, a declaration on the nature of the Person of the Son issued by the emperor Heraclius, in A.D. 639. During the greater part of the 7th century the Greek church was disturbed by the Monothelite controversy. The name arose from the party who maintained that the Son had one will and not two. For the details of the controversy reference should be made to Monothelism, Sergius, Patriarch of Constantinople, Theodore, Bishop of Pharan, ECThesis

Sophonius, Patriarch of Jerusalem, and Maximus, a Monk. It is only necessary to say here that about 616 Sergius had met with words ascribed to his predecessor, Menas, "one will and one life-giving operation," that after consulting bishop Theodore about them, he adopted them in 618. It was then that the controversy began, and that the opposite contention was that there were two wills acting in the same direction. At the same time the emperor Heraclius was, from political motives, anxious to reconcile the great Monophysite party to the ruling church of the Greek empire. In his campaign against the Persians in 622 he met many Monophysite bishops, and it occurred to him that the formula "one divinely human mode of working and willing in Christ" might serve as a ground on which Chalcedonians and Monophysites might both stand. Or, at any rate, these words became the subject of his inquiries and correspondence. Both parties recognized the Greek father Diodore; Sergius attributed to Christ an θεοτειχώμενος, Sergius the patriarch, when consulted by the emperor about the phrase (Harduin. Concil. iii. 1338), could not object to it.

But Cyrus of Phasis doubted its propriety. He consulted Sergius. Sergius, in a letter which displays a most servile adherence to patristic language, replied that many fathers had used the expression one mode of working, none had spoken of two. If one had done so, it would be necessary to follow him. The scruples of Cyrus were removed. In 630 he found himself patriarch of Alexandria. He brought back thousands of Monophysites by a compromise in nine points, placing the Monophysite tenets beside the language of Chalcedon.

But there was in Alexandria a zealous monk of Palestine named Sophronius. The doctrine of the phrase seemed to him to lead to Monophysitism. He opposed it. The matter was referred to mutual consent, to Sergius. Sergius, approving rather the "one mode of working and willing," did not wish to make it binding on the church; against two modes of working and willing, he was decided. He persuaded Cyrus to abide by the forms in use; and Sophronius promised he would speak neither of one mode nor two, and avoid all dispute. In 634 Sophronius was elevated to the patriarchate of Jerusalem (Hard. iii. 1315).

This gave a new turn to affairs. Sophronius would now have to issue his profession of faith, and might be considered a more independent authority. Sergius invoked the aid of pope Honorius. Honorius wrote twice to Sergius, in concurrence with his views; he wrote also to the patriarchs of Alexandria and Jerusalem. Although his language may be in some points questionable, he was, with much good sense, opposed to the logical determinations on such a subject. Christ must have one will. He approved the ἀλεξανδρία or accommodation which had united the Monophysites of Alexandria and elsewhere with the Catholic church. But on the one hand, "one mode of working" might lead to Nestorianism; "two modes" might end in Eutychianism. Both expressions should be avoided.

Monteith's customary encyclical of Sophronius had appeared on his assumption of the patriarchate of Jerusalem. Without rejecting the phrase θεοτειχώμενος, he insisted on two modes of operation, each belonging to the different natures, acting in the harmony of the one Christ. The Saracens soon afterwards separated Palestine from Christendom. But this revival of the controversy was the origin of the Ecthesis.

The emperor Heraclius, anxious to nip in the bud a danger so menacing to the peace of the empire, issued in A.D. 638 this document, ἔκθεσις τῆς γονευμοσύνης. It expressed the opinions of Sergius, and was probably his work. According to the teaching of the Catholic councils it upheld the doctrine of one Christ in two natures, one and the same person working that which is divine and that which is human. But the phrase one θεοτειχώμενος was to be avoided, because, though it occurred occasionally in the writings of the fathers, yet it caused uneasiness to some persons, as it seemed to deny the duality of the natures. So, likewise, it was forbidden to speak of θεοτειχώμενος, because the expression had been used by no authority, and gave offence to many. It might involve two contradictory wills in Christ, and that was beyond even Nestorius. "The humanity with its own rational soul had never determined itself of its own will in opposition to the Αὐξερικια υπὸ τίνα, but always so as the divine Αὐξερικια willed."

The tendency of this document was evidently in favour of the Monothelites. And as far as it could help the peace of the church, it could only be by concealing real differences instead of removing them. It remained in force about ten years.

The Ecthesis received the sanction of councils at Constantinople under Sergius and his successor Pyrrhus, and at Alexandria under Cyril, no opposition could arise from Antioch and Jerusalem, which were in the hands of the Arabs. Honorius was dead; his successor in the papacy, Severinus, appears to have rejected it, and the following pope, John IV., condemned it with a council. The emperor thereupon dissolved it, telling John that Sergius was its author, and that it had been only issued at his urgent request.

Heraclius died in 641. Constantine, Heraclonas, and Constans II. followed in quick succession. John IV. and his successor, Theodore, begged these emperors to suppress the Ecthesis, and at length, in 648, it was superseded by the Typus of Constans. The Monothelite tendency of the Ecthesis had been vigorously opposed by Maximus.

(Euthynian.]

Ecuuin (Kemble, C. D. 53), bishop. [Egvin.] [C. H.]

Eda (Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 198, note), one of the names of Aidan or mabdec bishop of Ferns. [Edan.] [C. H.]
EDA (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. anno 801, in M. H. B. 672 b), dux and afterwards abbat. [EDWINE.] [C. H.]

EALDULUS (1), bishop of Vienne, the supposed recipient of an undated letter from pope John III. (560–573). This letter, which purports to be in answer to inquiries of the archbishop on some point of ritual in the service of mass, and to be accompanied by a gift of the pallium and relics, was first published by Joannes à Bosco, and is supposed, from internal evidence, to be a forgery. It is given by Migne (Patr. Lat. lxix. 18). Ealdulus does not appear in the list of Vienne bishops given in the Gallia Christiana (xvi. 26), where Naumatus and Philippus occur as the contemporaries of John III. There was a later Ealdulus in this see. [EOALDULUS.] (Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs sacrés, xi. 334.)

[S. A. B.]

EALDULUS (2), bishop of Meaux. [EODULUS.]

EALDULUS (3), forty-first bishop of Vienne. [EOALDUS.]

EDAN, a common form of AEDHAN, is most frequently attached to St. Maehog, of Cluniamor-Maehog (Apr. 11), brother of bishop Etchen (Feb. 11), of Clonfad. Edan was alive a.D. 598 [MAEHOG]. See also Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 188. [J. G.]

EDANA. [ETAOIN.]

EDANCUS, magister militum, and duke of Sardinia, allied to in a letter of Gregory the Great to the deacon Honoratus, concerning the better treatment of the inhabitants of the island. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. i. indict. ix. Ep. 49 in Migne, lxvii. 512.) [A. H. D. A.]

EDAPHUS, one of the three descents of Constantine whom Chrysostom was accused of having maltreated. (Phot. Biblioth. cod. 59, p. 18 a; Patr. Gr. cii. 107.) [E. V.]

EDATIUS, presbyter of Arthona, now Artonne, a village of Auvergne, dep. Puy-de-Dôme. (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Conf. cap. b.) [C. H.]

EDBALD (A. S. C. text, anno 640, in M. H. B. 310; Malmbst. G. R. A. i. §§ 10, 48, ed. Hardy), king of Kent. [EADBALD (1).]

[C. H.]

EDEBALT Brut y Tywysegion, Engl. tr. in M. H. B. 842), king of the Saxons. [ETHEDBALD.]

[C. H.]

EDBERGE (EDBURG), Mercian princess, venerated in Flanders (Butler, Lives of the Saints, June 29; Chambers, Book of Days, i. 798). [IDEBERGA.]

C. G.]

[C. H.]

EDBERT (2) (Wend. F. H. ann. 675, ed. Coxe), bishop of London. [HEATHBERT.]

[C. H.]

EDBERT (3) (Kemble, C. D. 129), bishop, signs charter of Offa king of Merina. A.D. 774, with Berthan bishop of Lichfield, and Ceolwulf bishop of Lindsey. [EADBERT (9).]

[C. H.]

EDBERT (4) (Gimair, Estoria, v. 1397, in M. H. B. 787), king of Northumbria. [EADBERT (5).]

[C. H.]

[C. H.]

[C. H.]

[C. H.]

EDBIRT, king of the West Saxons, mentioned in a spurious charter of A.D. 801 (Kemble, C. D. 178) as conferring land in Bodecanlage to his minister Eadgils. Kemble thinks that "Edbirht rex," in the body of the charter was a mistake of the writer for "Eadburh regina," "Eadbubh" being said at the conclusion to be the grantor of the charter to Glastonbury. But may not "Edbirt" have been an error for Bribrik king of Wessex, who was the husband of Eadbubh or Eadburga?

[C. H.]

[C. H.]

EDBRIHT (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. in M. H. B. 728 b), king of Kent, who reigned twenty-two years and died in the ninth year of Cuthred. [EADBERT (3).]

[C. H.]

EDBRITH PREN (Malm. G. R. i. § 85, ed. Hardy), king of Kent. [EADBERT (4) PRAEK.]

[C. H.]

EDBURGA (1) (Dudg. Monast. i. 581, 582; Birch, Fast. Mon. 64), queen of Mercia, and afterwards abbess of Gloucester. [EADBURGA (4).]

[C. H.]

EDBURGA (2) (Emh. p. 219, ed. Hardwick; Dudg. i. 448), EADBURH, abbess of Minster in Thanet. [BUGGA (2).]

[C. H.]

EDDANUS (Gall. Christ. v. 784), bishop of Strassburg. [ETHDO.]

[C. H.]

EDDI (Kemble, C. D. 19, A.D. 680), bishop, who grants lands in Lantocul and Ferramore to abbat Hemjigls. [HEDDA, bishop of Winchester.]

[C. H.]

EDDIUS (or "ÆDID," named STEPHEN, as Bede calls him (iv. 2), "ÆDEDE" as he calls himself (Vit. Wulfr. 14), was distinguished as a chanter in Kent, when Wilfrid, unable to obtain possession of the see of York for which he had been elected and consecrated, visited Egbert king of Kent, during the vacancy of the see of Canterbury, and performed episcopal work in that diocese. He says of himself simply that Wilfrid returned from Kent into Northumbria with the chanters "Æedde and Aednus: Bede says that Wilfrid "invited him from Kent, and that he was the first teacher of chanting in many Northumbrian churches, excepting James," the deacon (iv. 2). He lived on confidential terms with Wilfrid, and accompanied him to Rome, on his second journey as an appellant, in 704 (see Vit. Wulf. 50, 51). After Wilfrid's death he was requested by Awwa, bishop of Hexham and Tabetbert abbot of Ripon to write the life of their common master and patron. He undertook the task (so he says in an elaborately modest preface), as a matter of obedience, but also as conscious of the "great gain" to himself personally involved in his remembrance of "bishop Wilfrid." He tells the tale like one who had heard from Wilfrid himself the most minute particulars of his personal history. But he is not only, as was natural, credulous as to whatever might enhance the glory of his hero, but inaccurate in regard to other persons; and the accusation which he makes (and in which Bede follows him) against queen Bathildis, or "Baelchild," as having been the cause of the execution of Wilfrid's early patron, the archbishop of Lyons, has been usually reckoned among these errors,—Bathildis being a devout woman whom the Frankish church learned to honour as a saint. Eddius also confounds the name of the archbishop (who was really called Anemund) with that of his brother or canon, Delphinus (Mabillon, Ana. Bened. i. 425, 438). He calls Colman metropolitan bishop of York—a double mistake (c. 10), and stranger yet, his text exhibits "papa" after the name of that presbyter Agatho who took part in the Whitby conference (6; cf. Bed. iii. 29). While he does full justice to Chad's excellence ("religiosissimum, admirabilissimum, servus Dei, verus et mississimus"), he makes him admit—what in all probability he never would have admitted—that he had "sinned" by receiving consecration from Wini and the two British bishops. He apparently exaggerates the rites performed by Theodore in regard to Chad (c. 15). He sometimes substitutes vague generalities for precise narrative, as in the account of the canonical division of Wilfrid's diocese in 678 (c. 24). He calls the Lombard king Pertharit "king of Campania" (c. 28). He seems to have had somewhat imperfect information as to Wilfrid's mission work in Sussex. He represents Theodore as humbling himself to Wilfrid in a strain which outruns probability (c. 42). He does not bring out the fact that both the first and the second restorations of Wilfrid were arrangements in the nature of a compromise, and that the second was still less favourable than the first to his original claim as bishop of York. On the whole he writes like a hearty partisan, but he cannot be called unfair or disingenuous. He does not conceal the harshness of Wilfrid's speech at Easiterfeld ("durus sermonibus," c. 45; he uses "durus" in a like sense in c. 37), and when he speaks of him as coming on one occasion from Ripon, "cum filio suo proprio" (c. 57), he uses words which have raised some question as to Wilfrid's character, but which have been naturally explained by his own anecdote about Eadwald, his brother's adopted son (c. 18). He was a well-educated man after the ecclesiastical standard of his age, his Latin is occasionally rather amalous, but he makes his readers see what he dejects, and his book has some passages at once terse and impressive. His "praefatio" contains a quotation from Horace, Carm. ii. 10, 11. The date at which he flourished, according to Gale (Ser. xv. vol. I.), is 720. [W. B.]

EDDO (1), bishop of Curia Rhaetorum, now Chur or Coire, a town of the Grisons. He stands sixth in the list, between Sidonius and St. Valentineus, and is believed to have sat from about the year A.D. 500 to about 530, during which period Rhaetia was for the most part at peace under the rule of Amalasuntha and Theodatus in the reign of Theodoric (Ambro. Eichhorn, Episcopatus, Curiensis, 1797, p. 9). [C. H.]

EDDRAN, Irish bishop. [Etherean.] [C. H.]

EDELAND (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 38, ed. Hardy), king of Wessex. [Ethelhard.] [C. H.]

EDEBALD (1) (Gaimar, Estorie, 1105, in M. H. B. 718), king of Kent. [Eadbald (1).] [C. H.]

EDELBRITH (Gaimar, Estorie, vv. 2210, 2306, in M. H. B. 791, 792), king of Kent. [Eadbred (4).] [C. H.]

EDELBURGH (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1247, in M. H. B. 779), daughter of Ethelbert king of Kent, wife of Edwin king of Northumbria. [Ethelburgh (1).] [C. H.]

EDELBURGA (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 90, ed. Hardy), daughter of Offa king of Mercia, wife of Britric king of Wessex. [Eadbred (1).] [C. H.]

EDELRUD (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1469, in M. H. B. 782), daughter of Anna king of East EDELFRED, EDLEFRED, is given as a chropeiscopus of Caerleon or Llandaff; he is also claimed by London, Colchester, and Lincoln, being probably the same as Adelphius, who sat in the council at Arles, A.D. 314. [ADELPHIUS (1).] (Lib. Land. by Rees, 623; Stubbs, Reg. Sac.
Angl. 154.) [J. G.]

EDELFERT (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. ii. in
M. H. B. 714 d, 715 b, 719 d), EDELFRED (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. ii. in M. H. B. 715 a, c, d; Gaimar, Estoric, vv. 1009, 1141, 1147, 1160, 1258, in M. H. B. 777, 778, 780), EDLEFRED (Gaimar, Estoric, v. 1081, in M. H. B. 778), EDELFRIZ (Gaimar, Estoric, v. 1007, 1017, in M. H. B. 777), king of Northumbria. [ETHE-FRID (1).]
[C. H.]

EDELHARD (Gaimar, Estoric, v. 1761, in
M. H. B. 785), king of West Saxons. [ETHEL-HARD (1).]
[C. H.]

EDELHERE (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. ii. in
M. H. B. 717 a), king of East Anglia, brother of ANEL. [ETHELHERE.]
[C. H.]

in M. H. B. 718 c, 723 c, 724 c, 725 b, 727 d, 755 b; Gaimar, Estoric, vv. 1487, 1633, "EDIL-RED PENDING," in M. H. B. 782, 784), EDIL-RED (Gaimar, Estoric, vv. 1485, 1585, in
M. H. B. 782, 83), king of Mercia. [ETHEL-
RED (2).]
[C. H.]

EDELRED (2) (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. in
M. H. B. 730 d, 732 a, b), EDILRED (Gaimar, Estoric, vv. 1977, 2140, 2174, in M. H. B. 788, 790), EDILRED (Gaimar, Estoric, vv. 2018, 2193, in M. H. B. 788, 790), king of Northumbria, son of Moll. [ETHELRED (4).]
[C. H.]

EDELRED (3) (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. in
M. H. B. 732 b, 733 a, marg.), archbishop of Canterbury. [ETHELWALCH (5).]
[C. H.]

EDELWALCH (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 34, ed. Hardy), king of the South Saxons.
[ETHELWALCH.]
[C. H.]

150-159. [JUSTINUS.]
In the system of Simon (Hippol. vi. 14, p. 168)
the account of Eden and its four rivers is explained as allegorically representing the womb in which man is formed, and the veins and arteries which proceed from it, and in the system of the Naassenes (v. 9, p. 120) there is a speculation apparently derived from this, in which Eden is made to denote the brain.
[G. S.]

EDENUS, sixteenth bishop of Meaux, consecrated about A.D. 552. His predecessor and successor were Medeves and Baudouwald respectively.
(Gul. Crist. viii. 1558; Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl.
Franc. ii. 587.) [S. A. B.]

EDESIUS (1), martyr. [AEDESIIUS.]

EDESIUS (2), one of the shorthand writers at the inquiry concerning Donatism held before the iii. 29.) [DONATISM, vol. i. p. 882.] [H. W. P.]

EDESIUS (3) (AEDESIIUS) shared the romantic fortunes of his brother Frumentius, the first bishop of Auxumia (Axum), in the 4th century. [FRUMENTIUS.] The biographical details at our disposal consist of a lengthy narrative, introduced on the authority of Edesius, by Rufius into his Historia Ecclesiastica Libri III. The narrative has been copied, with slight deviations by Socrates (H. E. i. 19), Sozomen (ii. 24), and Theodoret (i. 23, 24). Compare also Baronius (Ann. 327, viii. ix. x.). Frumentius, and Edesius, the young relatives of Meropius, a Syrian philosopher (merchant), accompanied him on a voyage of adventure to India. On their return to Phoenicia by way of the Red Sea, they landed at a certain port, "where there was a safe haven," and there suffered from the barbarous assault of the "Indians," who murdered every individual of the ship's company, with the exception of the two youths, upon whom the savages looked with compassion, and whom they conveyed as prizes to the king. This personage appointed Frumentius and Edesius to positions of trust, the former becoming the treasurer and the latter the cupbearer of the king. By their charity Xvangs Christianity was introduced among the "Indians." The names they bear in Ethiopian documents given by Ludolf (Hist.
Eth. iii. 2) were Frémonatos and Syracou.
(Cf. Gesenius, Athyon. Kirche in Ezech and Gruber, and Hoffmann in Herzog’s Ency.) The word "India" is used with the same indefiniteas as we elsewhere find Ethiopia and Libya used.
From the time of Aristotle to those of Eratosthenes and of Hipparchus, India and Africa were believed to unite with each other at some unknown point south of the Indian Ocean. (Dict. Anc.
Geography, vol. ii. p. 45, art. India; Pline. vi.
22-24.) These "Indians" were, from the subsequent career of Frumentius, no other than Abyssinians.
The king, according to Ludolf’s Ethiopian Codex, was called Abreha, and on drawing near his end, offered his liberty to the two young men; queen mother and queen besought them to remain, to undertake the education of the young prince Erazanes, and to assist her in the regimen during the minority of the heir to the throne.
They consented, and moreover lost no opportunity of diffusing a knowledge of Christ. They sought and discovered Christian merchants trading in the country, gathered Christian disciples, and built houses of prayer, “that worship might be offered, and the Roman ecclesiastical routine observed.” (Sozomen, Ic.) They were, however, destitute of orders, and the infant church was not incorporated into the general organization of the church until their condition had been made known. The two brothers sought permission at length to return to their friends. Edesius remained at Tyre and became a presbyter in the church in that city, where Rufius came into contact with him. Frumentius, the more energetic of the two, went to Alexandria, and laid the whole case before Athanasius. It is uncertain when this occurred. Theodoret places this visit to Alexandria "about the time" of the persecution of Eustathius, other hints seem to bring the event to the period when Athanasius had returned from his second exile. The consequently the visit can hardly be doubted.
Frumentius himself was appointed bishop of "the Indians" at Axumia, and received the title of Abba Salama, and was regarded as the founder of the church in that country, the Ἀἰγύπτιοι deriving his ecclesiastical rank from the patriarch of Alexandria. [ETHIOPIAN CHURCH.]

[H. R. R.]

EDESIUS (4) (Aedesius), a philosopher in the 4th century, by birth a Cappadocian, of a noble but impoverished family. He was sent by his father to Greece to learn some trade, but applied himself instead to the study of philosophy, relishing rather reading than disputing. He travelled to enlarge his knowledge, and went into Syria to hear Jamblichus, and became almost his equal, and succeeded to his school on his death. He was obliged, however, to conceal his talents during the reign of Constantine. In reply to his prayers a god appeared to him in his dreams and uttered an oracle, to the effect that he had two lots open to him, either to dwell in cities and direct the minds of young men, by which he would win immortal fame, or to take a farm and turn shepherd, by which he would be reckoned among the blessed. He chose the latter lot, but was compelled by the entreaties of the students who besieged his dwelling to return to the city, and teach them. He accordingly left Cappadocia, and fixed his residence at Pergamus in Asia, where crowds, both of Greeks and natives, came to hear him. He shewed much kindness to Sesipatra, the widow of Eustathius, his successor in Cappadocia, when after her husband's death she came to live at Pergamus. Julian (afterwards emperor), at the age of twenty-three, A.D. 354, was attracted to Pergamus by the fame of Eudesius, now advanced in years and in weak health, and wished to remain with him; but Eudesius, feeling his health unequal to the task of instructing him, advised him instead to give the greater part of his time to his disciples Eusebius and Chrysanthisus, which Julian accordingly did, without however leaving Eudesius. He was a man of gentle disposition, and used converse with carpenters, smiths, and others whom he met, about their trades, for which he was rebuked by Priscus, one of his disciples, as betraying the dignity of philosophy. (Eunapius, ed. Stephani, 1616, Lives of Eudesius, Maximus, and Priscus, 32-66, 69-70, 82.)

[F. D.]

EDESIUS (5), deacon of Cyril of Alexandria, who, with his fellow-deacon Peter, was at Constantiople when Alexander bishop of Antioch came there to urge the restoration of St. Chrysostom's name to the diptychs. Eudesius and Peter brought back to Cyril an account of the state of things at Constantiople. When the patriarch Atticus wrote to Cyril to ask him for the sake of peace to restore Chrysostom's name to the sacred diptychs, he wrote also to Peter and Eudesius, urging them to use their influence with Cyril on the side of peace, so that the Egyptian bishops might not be the only ones to resist the imperial desires, and to disturb the universal tranquillity. At the end of the letter Atticus hopes they will soon return to Constantiople, as he misses the pleasure of their society, and finds his present companions less appetising. (Siccephorus Collisti, episc. c. 26, 491, 494, in Migne, Patr. Gr. col. 1138-1144; Ceillier, Aut. sacr. viii. 15.)

[F. D.]

EDGES (5) (Aedesius), a Christian orator and poet. The only knowledge we possess of this author is derived from the Life of St. Hilarus bishop of Aries (who died A.D. 449), of which Honoratus bishop of Marseilles is supposed by some to be the author. In this Life two miracles occur from Eudesius, whom the author honours with the title of saint, and calls "rhetoricae facundiae et metrice artis peritissimum vir."

The first quotation describes the writer's astonishment at seeing Hilarus at the same time reading and dictating to his secretary, and also making a note with his hands; the second describes the bishop's sympathy with charity towards the suffering. (Life of St. Hilarus, c. 12, in Migne, Patr. Lat. i. 1233, 1239; Hist. Lit. de la France, 1865, ii. 352.)

[F. D.]

EDESSA, MARTYRS OF. In the reign of Trajan a fierce persecution was carried on at Edessa. Barsimaesus was bishop there at the time; he was arrested, subjected to cruel tortures, and according to Barinus was martyred (A.D. 114). In the Menology of Basil, however, the account is that he was flogged and kept in prison, that as soon as the persecution was over he was released, and that the bishop being at the church of Edessa, Sarbelius, together with his sister Barbes, who had both been baptized by Barsimaesus, were martyred during this persecution. Special cruelties were practised towards Sarbelius in consequence of his having been an idol priest before he became a Christian. They are commemorated Jan. 30. (Men. Bas.; Baron. Anot. 107, i, 2.)

[T. S. B.]

EDESTUS, MARTYR. [HEDERTUS.]

EDEBNYN (1) (Edern, Ebyrn, Edryn) son of Gwrtheyrn (Vortigern) king of the Britons 449-466. He belonged to the company under St. Catwg (Cdoci), and gave his name to Llanderyn in Glamorganshire, where he had a community with three hundred members. It has been conjectured that he is the Faustus mentioned by Nennius as a son of Vortigern, and as having his residence on the banks of the river Rhis. Faustus was the child of incest, and according to the legend was attributed to Vortigern by St. Germanus (Rees, Welsh Saints, 108, 186, 337; Ussher, EccI. Ant. c. 12, v. 439-490).

[J. G.]

EDEYNYN (2), commemorated January 6; a bard who embraced a life of sanctity, and whose memory is preserved in the chapel of Bodedyrn, under Holyhead, in Anglesey, and in Edeyrn, county Caernarvon. He was the son, or grandson (by Nudd), of Beli ab Rnun, descended from Cunedda Wledig (Myny. Arch. ii. 23, 40; Rees, Welsh Saints, iii. 298, 323; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 593, 601). In the mediæval legends he assumes a wholly military garb, and as one of the chivalrous knights of his court, under the name of Hider, accompanies Arthur in his celebrated expedition to the continent against the Roman emperor (Myny. Arch. ii. 339; Geoff. of Monm. x. 4; cf. Lady Charlotte Guest, Mabinogion, ii. 153-4, et al.).

[J. G.]

EDGILS (Aedisil), a priest in the monastery of Coldingham, who, after its destruction by fire in A.D. 679, took up his residence at Jarrow, where he died. He was a friend of Bede, and gave him some information about Coldingham and its inmates. (Bed. H. E. iv. 25.)

EDGUIN (Nenn. Hist. Brit. in M. H. B. 75 b), king of Northumbria. [EDWIN.]

[Ch. H.]

EDGYN, called brother of Cyngar and son of Geraint ab Erbin in the Pedigree of Welsh Saints, but he does not appear as either of these in Professor Ree's list (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 508; Rees, Welsh Saints, 113). [J. G.]

EDHAMAIR (AEDHAMAIR, AUDEMARA, EADHAMAIR, EUDUMAIR), virgin, daughter of Aedh, commemorated Jan. 18. Eadhamair, or Edhamair, is commemorated on this day in Mart. Dom. (by Todd and Reeves, 21), and as Aedhamair, in Mart. Tall. (Kelly, Col. Ir. SS. xii.), and in both is called daughter of Aedh. But Colgan (Acta SS. 598, c. 3), in classing her among the saints of the house of St. Mochoemuc or Pulcherius (Mar. 13), and race of Conmaic, gives both a different form of the name and a different genealogy: "S. Auromara seu Eudomara, filia Engenni, f. Talvy, f. Ailenii, f. Brugacii, f. Careldi, &c., collat. 18 Januarii." Colgan (Tr. Tunn. 112 a. 6) seeks to identify her with the Cathubris, who appears to be known under so many names in the Lives of St. Patrick (Cethrubris) (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 323-26). [J. L.]

EDHNIUCH (EGNACIUS), son of Erc, abbot of Lich, died A.D. 787 (Four Mast.). His place is supposed by Colgan (Acta SS. 598, c. 4, who calls him Egnacius) to have been Lich-mor-Mochoemhog, now Leamkeveroge, in the parish of Two-Mile-Burris, in the barony of Elygorty, co. Tipperary (Four Mast. by O'Donovans, i. 266 a. b, 371). [J. G.]

EDIBIUS (2), sixth bishop of Amiens, one of the subscribers of the first council of Orleans, held in the year A.D. 511. He followed Andoenaus, and was succeeded by Beatus. (Le Coiteau, Ann. Eccl. Franc. vol. i. p. 288; Gall. Christ. x. 1152; Labbe, Conc. v. p. 549.) [S. A. B.]

EDICTIUS (EDICUS, ECIICIUS, HECIDIIUS), ST., said to have been the thirty-fourth occupant of the see of Vienne, between St. Syndulpus and Chalcedolus. ADO, who wrote in the 9th century, says in his Chronicon, "Sindulpho episcopo defuncto, Hecidius Viennensis Ecclesiae praeulssatum susceptor, magnae religiosi vir." He goes on to say that Hecidius died at the close of the reign of Justinian (Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiii. 115). But this chronology is generally rejected as extending his life too long. A Recollectum of Vienne (quoted in the Gallia Christiana, xvi. 31) speaks of him as living in the time of Constantine, the successor of Maximus, while Dagobert II. was still on the throne, and at the time of the condemnation of Macarius of Antioch. Dagobert II. died in A.D. 678. A spurious letter purporting to be addressed to him by pope Aga tho is extant. He is commemorated on Oct. 23 (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. x. 71). [S. A. B.]

EDILALD, "illustrious virgin," commemorated by Mar. O'Gorman at April 21 (Mart. Domeg. by Todd and Reeves, 107 n.). [J. G.]

EDILBARD (Bed. H. E. e. 24, Addenda ann. 740, 750, in M. H. B. 288 b, c), king of Mercia. [ETHELBALD (1).] [Ch. H.]

EDILBERT (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. in M. H. B. 724 e), king of Kent, son of Wlhtred. [ETHELBERT II.] [Ch. H.]

EDILBIGIN, eleventh bishop of Llandaff (Stubb, Reg. Sacr. Angl. 156), and probably the same as Ufelywy, a bishop in Ergyngh. [UPELYW.] (Lh. Land. by Rees, 524; Godwin, De Paenae Angl. 623). [J. G.]

EDILFYW appears to have been bishop of Llandaff, and to have died in the middle or latter part of the 7th century. Beyond his receiving from Gwyrron and Bonns two pieces of land, devoted to God and to St. Dubricius, for the good of their souls, we know nothing of him. He is probably to be distinguished from both Elyvutus and Edilbin (Liber Landav. by Rees, 415, 626). [J. G.]

EDILHARDUS (Bed. H. E. e. 24, Addenda ann. 739, in M. H. B. 288 b), king of Wessex. [ETHELHARD (1).] [Ch. H.]

EDILHUN (Bed. H. E. iii. 27, ed. Moberly), brother of Edilhun. [ETHELHUN.] [Ch. H.]

EDILTRUDIS. [ETHELREDATA.]

EDILUALD (Bed. H. E. e. 23, in M. H. B. 283 c), EDILWALD (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. in M. H. B. 726 d, 727 a), bishop of Lindisfarne. [ETHELOLD.] [Ch. H.]

EDILUVANUS (Bed. H. E. iv. 25, add. ann. 758, in M. H. B. 289 a), king of Northumbria, succeeded Oswulf. [ETHWALD MOLL.] [Ch. H.]

EDIRSEKEL. [ETRSESEL.]

EDILFRED FLESAUR (Nenn. Hist. Brit. in M. H. B. 74 b), king of Northumbria. [ETHELWHRD.] [Ch. H.]

EDNYFED is said to have been the son of Maesaw Wledig (the Roman emperor Maximus), by Elen, daughter of Euddaf, a wealthy lord of Carnarvon; but though he is counted among the Welsh saints, like his brothers Owain and Fledig, he is not remembered in any church dedication or name (Rees, Welsh Saints, 108, 115; Gibbon, Decl. and Fall, ii. c. 27). [J. G.]

EDOBIUS (EDOVICUS, EDOCHIUS, EDOCHIUS, EDOBECUS, ODOSBECUS), a general of the EDOCHIMUS. [EDOCHUS.]

EDOLDUS (HELDOALDUS) is placed twenty-fourth in the list of the bishops of Meaux, after St. Eribigilus, and preceding Adulfus. His date may be about the close of the 7th century. [Gall. Christ. viii. 1602.]

EDOVICUS. [EDOBIUS.]

EDRABORDUS, an unknown or corrupt name of an abbot who attests the reception of the acts of the Legate Synod of 787 in the southern province. It may represent Ethelhard (afterwards archbishop of Canterbury) or Forthred, a prominent Mercian abbot of the time. [Hadden and Stubbs, iii. 462.]

EDRIC (1) (Bed. H. E. iv. 26, in M. H. B. 242 a; Flor. Wig. Chron. anno 688, in M. H. E. 537 d; Malm. G. R. A. i. §§ 13, 14, ed. Hardy), king of Kent, son of Egbert. [EDRIC (1).]

EDRIC (2) (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 34, ed. Hardy), successor of Ethelwald king of S. Saxons. [EDRIC (1).]

EDRIC (3), son of Eeni and the father of Aldulf (or Eadulf) king of the East Angles, according to Nennius, who is the only authority for his existence. He would thus be a brother of Anna king of East Anglia. Lappenberg's pedigree of the East Anglian kings makes him Eribric's uncle, not father, of Eadulf. (Nenn. Hist. Brit. in M. H. B. 74 c; Lappenberg Hist. Engl. i. 287.)

EDULF (Malm. G. P. i. § 7, ed. Hamilton, p. 16; Id. G. R. A. i. § 87, ed. Hardy), bishop of Sidnaestzer, suffragan of the archbishop of Lichfield. [EDULF (4).]

EDUS, ST. (MS. Vita, referred to in Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 189), one of the names of Aidan, Aedhan, or Maidoc, bishop of Ferna. [EDAN.]

EDWALD (Annal. Camb. ann. ccxiii. i.e. A.D. 757, in M. H. B. 833 c, and note), king of the Saxons; perhaps Ethelwald king of Mercia. [EDWIN, AEDGUN, KEDWIN, AEDWINE, AEDWIN, KEDWIN, EDWIN, EADWIN) was the son of Ella or All, who for at least thirty years was king of Deira. On the death of Ella in A.D. 593, Edwin was a child, and was deprived of his inheritance by Ethelric, whose son Ethelfrid had married Acht, the boy's sister. Ethelric reigned three years, and then his son Ethelfrid continued his father's usurpation. Between the brothers-in-law there was naturally much suspicion and jealousy. Edwin was obliged to flee, and for many years was in banishment or retirement. At last he found shelter with Redwald king of East Anglia, who was tempted by Ethelfrid with bribes and threats to surrender him. His faithless host resolved either to kill his guest or give him up. A trusty friend conveyed to Edwin the tidings, and promised to shew him a place of security. Edwin was incredulous, and said that, should his news be true, he had rather perish there than continue his wanderings. The friend retired, and Edwin, sick at heart, was sitting in front of Redwald's palace, when during the night a man came up to him, strange in features and dress. The visitor cheered the sad-hearted prince with his words, suggesting to him the possibility of safety and future power, and seeking and obtaining a promise of the maintenance of the listener's gratitude if his suggestion should be verified. Finally, he asked him what he would do if, in addition, the speaker should be able to put before him a method of life and security better far than any of his kindred had attained to. Edwin at once promised to adopt it. The stranger then laid his hand upon his head, and bade him, when that sign was repeated, remember and keep his pledge. He was gone as suddenly as he had come. The young prince sat still, anxious although less sad than before, and he was sitting there when his friend returned with the happy news that Redwald, at the request of his queen, had now made up his mind to protect him. War thereupon broke out between Redwald and Ethelfrid, which ended in the rout and death of the latter in a battle near the river Idle in Nottinghamshire. This was in A.D. 616. By the death of Ethelfrid, Edwin obtained the kingdom of Deira, and that of Bernicia as well. (Bed. H. E. ii. 12.)

During his exile, Edwin married Cœurnburga, daughter of Cœfæl king of the Mercians, by whom he had two sons, Osfrid and Eadfrid. In A.D. 625 he took for his second wife Ethelburga or Tatha, daughter of Ethelbert king of Kent. The princess was a Christian; and for a time her brother Eadbald refused to give his sister to a pagan. The difficulty was settled by Edwin undertaking to allow the princess and her suite the most ample use of their own creed. The missionary bishop, Paulinus, accompanied the lady into the North as her chaplain. (Bed. H. E. ii. 9.)

In A.D. 626 a desperate assault was made upon Edwin with a poisoned weapon, by an assassin named Eumer, who was sent on his base errand by his father. Edwin was at his royal villa on the bank of the Derwent when the attempt was made, which was only frustrated by a faithful servant named Lilla interposing his body and dying in his master's stead. This was on Easter Day. In the evening of the same day the queen bore Edwin a daughter, who was called Elfrith. The king in the presence of Paulinus thanked his god for the boon, but Paulinus ascribed the mercy to Christ, and said that it was through his intercession that the life of the queen had been preserved. This pleased Edwin, who promised to become a Christian if he could punish Cuichel for his treachery, and as a pledge of his sincerity he permitted Paulinus to baptize, on Whit Sunday, his new-born child. The victory over Cuichel was gained; but Edwin, although worshipping idols no longer, shrank from adopting Christianity. Many conferences on the subject took place between the king and his nobles and Paulinus (Bed. H. E. ii. 9). Every spiritual agency was brought to bear upon the wavering monarch. Beæ preserves two letters which pope Boniface addressed to Edwin and his queen, urging on the great religious change (id. ii. 10, 11). It was at this critical period that Beda tells us, that the mysterious stranger at Redwald's palace re-appeared in Paulinus, who laid his hand upon Edwin's head, and bade him remember and be faithful. Edwin gave way, but wished to consult his council, that, if possible, the change should be a national one. The opinion of Côlô, the pagan chief priest, swayed the rest, and their idolatry was abandoned. This was evidenced by the destruction of the great heathen temple at Goodmanham, near York, on which Cœfæl himself (Côrfr) made the first assault (id. ii. 13).

The barriers were now broken down, and Edwin with his nobles and a vast multitude of his people became Christians. The king was baptized on Easter Day, A.D. 627, in the church of St. Peter, in York, which he had hastily constructed of wood for that purpose, and for catechetical instruction. At the same time he made York the seat of a bishopric for Paulinus, who prevailed upon the king to begin the erection of a larger and grander edifice of stone, enclosing in a square the wooden shrine in which the baptism had recently taken place. Edwin, however, never saw its completion. Meanwhile, the progress of Christianity was most rapid. All the king's children were baptized, and the people flocked in crowds to that holy rite. Every help was given to Paulinus, who was often in attendance upon the court. We hear of him spending thirty-six whole days at Adgefrîn (Yevering), in Bernicia, with the king and queen, instructing and baptizing the hosts which came to him. When the missionary baptized in the Trent Edwin was with him. But the details of the conversion of Northumbria are reserved for the life of Paulinus (Bed. ii. capp. 14, 16). Edwin did not confine his religious fervour to his own people. He induced Eadbald king of East Anglia, the son of his old friend Redwald, to embrace Christianity with his subjects (id. ii. 15). In A.D. 634, when Honorius became pope, he wrote a letter to Edwin, praising him for his good works and fervour, and urging him to still greater efforts (id. ii. 18). They travelled slowly in those days, evil or good. When the letter was written, Edwin was dead.

In A.D. 633, Caedwalla, a British king, rose against Edwin in rebellion, aided by Penda king of Mercia, who was eager to release his province from Northumbrian thraldom. The battle was fought at Haetherfelth (probably Hatfield Chase), which is called Melcan by Nennius, and ended in the victory of Edwin's forces over the British and his own death. Nennius says that not one of his men escaped (p. 52). Everything was then disorganized. Edwin's head was brought to York, and buried in the minster, in St. Gregory's porch. His body was interred at Whitby (Bed. H. E. iii. 24). Paulinus and his royal mistress Ethelburga returned to Kent by sea, conducted by Basus, a trusty soldier, and brought with them Eanfrid and Vescræa, the royal child-queen, with the son of Osfrid, Edwin's grandson (Bed. ii. 20).

By his first wife Cœurnburga Edwin had two sons, Osfrid, who fell at Haetherfelth (id. ii. 20), and Eadfrid, who was afterwards put to death by Penda, with whom he had taken refuge (id. ii. 19). By his second wife, Ethelburga of Kent, Edwin had several children. Ethelhun and Ethelberht died young and were buried at York (id. ii. 14). Vescræa, another son, was sent with his sister Eanfrid for protection and education to the court of Dagobert king of France, and died there (id. ii. 20). Eanfrid, the only surviving child, married Osfrid king of Northumbria, and is interred at Whitby. In an after day the monks of St. Alban's imagined the existence of another daughter, Rosella, who is said to have been baptized at Tynemouth, in a wooden chapel or church which her father had built. There is no early evidence of anything of the kind.

The kingdom of Edwin was small at the first, but grew to a very considerable size. His father Elia was king of Deira, which extended from the London to the Humber; the West Riding, or Elmete, being an independent British state. On the death of the intruder Ethelfrid in A.D. 616, Edwin recovered not only his own kingdom of Deira, but acquired that of Bernicia as well. Bernicia extended from the Trees to the Frith-of-Forth, and included Reged. Edwin added to Deira the British kingdom of Elmete, and we hear of him subjugating the Mevanian islands, by which we must understand Anglesey and Man (Bed. H. E. ii. 9; Malm. de Gestis Regum, i. 69). On the death of Redwald he attained the dignity or office of Bretwalda, which he exercised over the whole of England save Kent, that kingdom being exempted, according to Malmesbury, because Edwin would not exert jurisdiction over the brother of his wife (William of Malmesbury. 68). Over Mercia he was more directly the sovereign, and the native British states generally recognized his over-lordship. He had thus a very large dominion. Still his subjects were composed of various races, especially in Northumbria. More than half the people in this province must have been Britons at this time, particularly in the west, and over these Edwin's hold must at all times have been precarious. That it was so is abundantly shewn by the success of the rebellion which, in spite of a long reign of peace and toleration, not only destroyed Edwin, but brought to an end the rule of his children.

Edferic, or York, was the chief city in Edwin's dominion, but the principal temple of pagan worship was at Goodmanham, near Market-Weighton; there was a royal town on the Derwent, and another at Campodunum, which is probably the modern Doncaster. Catterick on the Swale was the centre of a large population. In Nottinghamshire there was the city of Tiuswulflingcestor on the Trent. Edwinstow, in the same county, probably derives its name from Edwin, but Edwin's path, the scene of a council in Wilfrid's days, is changed by the light of modern criticism into Aestawinapath, the swine's path. In the north, the modern Bam- brough, king Æda's towers, was a royal residence of renown; there was another at Adegerfin, or Yevering, and the whole neighbourhood of the Cheviots in Edwin's time was densely populated. Still farther northwards, it is probable that Edinburgh is Edwin's-burgh, the town or burgh of Edwin.

The reign of Edwin was eminently prosperous and happy. Bede tells us that so profound was the peace in those days that in the writer's time it was still a proverbial saying that, when Edwin was king, a woman with her new-born child could walk from sea to sea without being molested. It was told of him that at the springs by the highway-sides he fixed posts with bronze basins fastened to them for the use of travellers, which none would carry away. Not only in war were banners borne before him, but in the times of peace, whenever he walked abroad, a standard and banner in advance, bearing an ensign called a Tuy, i.e., a tuf; of feathers fastened to a spear's point (Bed. H. E. ii. 17).

In the days of turmoil which followed, many would look back with longing to the peaceful reign of Edwin.

EDWINE (EDWINUS, EDA), described by Simeon of Durham as once a dux of the Northumbrians, afterwards abbot of Et-Gegenforde, mighty in the service of God, who died a "miles eremitus," Jan. 15, 801, at his monastery in the presence of the brethren, and was interred with much honour in the church of the monastery (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann. 801, in M. H. B. 672 b). He may have been the "dux Wada" who was put to flight in the rebellion of 798, as suggested by Mr. Hinde (Sey. Dun. p. 39, ed. Surtees Soc.). A similar instance of a military leader in Northumbria turning ecclesiastic about the same time occurs in the case of "Alric quondam dux," who died a cleric at York in 796 (Sim. Dun. s. a.).

Gegenforde must be the modern Gainford on the Durham side of the Tees, between Darlington and Barnard Castle, described by Camden (ed. Guage, 1768, iii. 112) and Surtees (Hist. Durham. 1846, iv. 9). Shortly after abbat Edwin's time (A.D. 821-845) "built a church at the vill which is called Gengford, and gave it to St. Cuthbert, and all belonging to it from the river Tees as far as the Weor." (Hist. S. Cuthbert, in Sim. Dun. ed. Surtees Soc. p. 142; see also Sim. Dun. Hist. Eccles. Dun. ii. 3.) From this passage Surtees infers that Gainford was thus early considered, what it certainly is found to be afterwards, the head of a district, but he does not notice Simeon's record of Edwin's monastery given above. That passage seems the only one that mentions the existence of a monastery at Gainford. The Chronicle of Melrose (ed. Stevenson, 1835, p. 13), calling him Edwinus and Eda, "quondam dux," and dating his death Jan. 15, 801, states that he was buried in his monastery. At Gainford it says nothing as to a monastery. Tanner and Dugdale are equally silent with Camden and Surtees as to any tradition of one. Birch (Festi Monastici, p. 71) includes abbat Eda in his list (calling him also "rex," not "dux") without naming his abbey, and referring only to Chron. Malm. dating his death Jan. 15, 800. Mr. Hinde, in a note on Simeon, remarks (p. 39) that "some interesting remains of an early ecclesiastical settlement have been recently (1867) discovered" at Gainford.

[CH.]

EGBALD (1) (EGBALIV, EGBOLD, EGBALD), mentioned in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle as third abbot of Peterborough or Medeshamstedte (M. H. B. 329). The insertion of the name in the list of abbots is due to the fact that a charter is found in the Peterborough Chartularies in which land at Hogh, in Hurburheage in Kent, is granted to an abbat Ecgbald, and the grant is confirmed at Medeshamstedte by Etheldred king of Mercia, and Saxulf his bishop. The charter, which is full of difficulties, would claim a date about A.D. 690; but, even if it is not spurious, it proves no connection between Ecgbald and Medeshamstedte (Kemble, C. D. 40; Monast.
EGBALT, EGBALT, EGBALT, EGBALT, a West Saxon abbot, whose monastery was at Waltheim (probably Bishop's Waltham in Hampshire), and which flourished early in the 8th century. It was to his care that Willibald, afterwards bishop of Eichstaett, was committed when five years old. As Willibald was consecrated bishop in 741, in the forty-first year of his age, Egbert's date will fall in the very first years of the century, and he may be the true Egibald (No. 1) to whom the abbacy of Medeshamsted is ascribed. [Visa Wilhildi, Mabillon, AA. SS. O. S. B. sac. iii. pt. 2, p. 334.]

EGBALT (8), the tenth bishop of Winchester (M. H. B. 610). His name is attached to a charter of Cynegul, king of Wessex, dated 778, and to an act of the synod of Brentford in 781. He was succeeded by Dudda, and Dudda by Kyneburt before the year 787. [Kemble, C. D. 133, 143; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 438, 439.]

EGBERT (1) (Flor. Wig. Chron. ann. 672, in M. H. B. 534 a), presbyter. [Egburt (5).]

EGBERT (2) (Flor. Wig. Nom. Archep. Ebor. in M. H. B. 625 b), archbishop of York. [Egburt (9).]

EGBERT (3) (A. S. C. ann. 784, in M. H. B. 336), king of Wessex. [Egburt (4).]

EGBERT (4) I, king of Kent, son of Eorlures and Sæxburga, succeeded his father in 654, and reigned until 673. (See Ann. Cant. in Hardy, i. 584; Pertz, S. c. iv. 2.) Like all the Anglo-Saxon kings of the age, he has a history with two sides, one legendary and the other historical. The veritable details of his reign we learn from Bede. His father Eorlure having died on the same day as archbishop Deusdedit, July 14, 664, Egbert's first important task was to obtain a new archbishop. The slow development of the episcopate in the south and the scarcely healed division between the Scottish and Roman partisans in the north, made it extremely desirable to obtain for the church a ruler about whom the title there be could be a question. Accordingly Egbert joined with Oswy king of Northumbria in selecting for the vacant post an English priest, Wigfrid, whom they sent to Rome for consecration. Wigfrid died at Rome, and pope Vitalian, thinking it incumbent on him to find a substitute, sent Theodore in his place. Theodore was consecrated in 668, and arrived at Canterbury in 669, His companions by Basfrid, whom Egbert had sent to conduct him to Britain (Bede, H. E. iii. 29, iv. 1). During the interval Egbert had invited Wilfrid to Canterbury, where he ordained priests and deacons and discharged other episcopal offices (Edd. V. Wilfr. c. 14, ed. Gale, p. 58). In the year 669, after Theodore's arrival in Kent, Egbert bestowed on his priest Basfrid land at Reculver for the foundation of a monastery (Chr. S. in M. H. B. 318), which became the burial-place of some of the later Kentish kings. He died in 673, on the 4th of July (Annal. Cantuar. in Pertz, Scriptores, iv. 2; Belo, H. E. iv. 5), leaving by a wife, whose name is not recorded, at least two sons, Eadric and Wihtred, who ultimately succeeded him. His immediate successor was his brother Hlothhere. He is regarded by Edius as a religious prince, and was certainly a powerful one, for his authority must have extended over Surrey, when Erkenwald bishop of London, partly under his auspices, was founding the monastery of Chertsey. Legend, however, has thrown a dark shadow over the history of Egbert. According to the Canterbury traditions, Eorlurul had succeeded to the throne of Kent in spite of the claims of Ethelbert and Ethelberht, the infant sons of his brother Eormenred, and had left to Ethelred a thronless embarrassed by a doubtful title. In order to gain favour with Egbert, Thunor, one of his friends, murdered the two princes, who were accounted martyrs; and Egbert, who had conspired at the murder, or rather had shown himself negligent in preventing it, gave to his sister Eormenburh or Domneda a mansion as a hide could run round in a day. On this she founded the monastery of Minster in Thanet. [Eormenburh (1); Ethelbert (5); Ethelred (1).]

EGBERT (2) II, king of Kent. A second Egbert reigned in Kent, or a part of it, in the latter half of the 8th century. His existence is proved by several charters which are found in the Texutus Roefensis, and by coins which apparently can be referred to no other period or country. If these are to be depended upon, Egbert began to reign at least as early as 775, in which he granted land at Rochester to bishop Eardulf in a charter which was confirmed by the kings Heberht (Eadburt (3)) and Offa (Kemble, C. D. 113; Monast. Angl. i. 163), another king named Sigref, claiming half Kent about the same time as Ethelbert, who had his see at Canterbury in 778; in this he bestows land at Bromgéhe (Bromley) on Rochester (Kem. C. D. 132; Monast. Angl. i. 166); and this is confirmed by another grant of the next year (K. C. D. 135; Monast. Angl. i. 167). Another undated grant, confirmed by Heberht, bestows land at Halling on the same church (Kem. C. D. 160; Monast. Angl. i. 166). Unfortunately all these documents proceed from the same scribe, and must either stand or fall together. If they stand, Egbert must have retained power longer than any of the other Kentish pretenders of the age, and have even survived the subjugation of the kingdom by Offa in 774. He is noticed by none of our historians, unless he be the Egbert who, according to Henry of Huntington (M. H. B. 734), ruled Kent for thirty-four years, after the death of his father Ethelberht, who died in 733, accompanied by Hawkins (English Silver Coins, ed. Keynes, pp. 31, 32), as struck by two monasteries, Úd and Babba, who also struck coins of Offa; so that all through his reign he may possibly have been under Offa's supremacy. But this must remain conjectural.

in M. H. R. 721; Malm. G. R. A. i. §§ 65, 69, 70, 72), king of Northumbria, son of Eata, also called Æthelbert. [Æthelbert (5).] [C. H.]

EGBERT (4) (Egbert, Ecgbert), king of the West Saxons 802–839. Although the longer and more important part of the reign of Egbert falls outside of the period comprised in this work, his position and power render the reign itself a mark of an epoch which in English history answers to that furnished by the reign of Charles the Great in the general history of Europe. It is impossible to point out in brief the main features of the reign and its special bearing on the unity and continuity of our ecclesiastical and civil history.

Egbert was the son of Ealhmund, who was the great-grandson of Ina's brother Ingild. Since the reign of Æthelbald in 725 the West-Saxon crown had been worn by a succession of kings who, whatever were their relation to the main line of Cerdic, were not in the direct line of succession. Ethelbert, Cuthred, Sigebert, Cynewulf, and Beorhtric are all described as kinsmen to one another, but in no case is the pedigree preserved. It is probable then that the direct line of Ingild having been set aside in favour of Ethelbert who founded the line in more distant times, the former was a competitor, Oswald, the restoration of the fortunes of the house was first attempted by Ealh mound, who is said in the Chronicle to have been king in Kent in 784, or perhaps, allowing for two years' variation, in 786. Nothing can be affirmed positively as to his relations to Beorhtric [Berothric], but it is obvious that if both began to reign in 786, and both claimed to be kings representing the house of Cerdic, their relations could not be friendly. As no more is heard of Ealhmund, it must be inferred that his pretensions to Wessex, if he made any, were defeated; his position in Kent seems to have been taken up ten years later by Æthelbald Præn; and his son Egbert, who would probably be a child in 786, appears first in 802, on the death of Beorhtric. Beorhtric was a mere dependent of Offa; and to the agency of the two kings the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle and the authorities that followed it ascribe the banishment of Egbert and his exile at the court of Charles. Of the fact there need be no doubt, but the length of the exile is doubtful; the more ancient authorities (Chr. S., Flor. Wig., H. Hunt.) making it three years, William of Malmesbury, who probably had other authorities for the West-Saxon history, making it thirteen.

If Egbert returned from exile in 802, three years would be too short, as Offa had then been six years dead; but he may have returned on the death of Offa, and taken his chances with Æthelbald Præn; two dates may therefore be suggested, 793–796 and 789–802; the other two, 785–790 and 799–802, being excluded by the mention of Offa and Beorhtric as acting together.

As, however, Offa's hold on Wessex was finally established by the marriage of Beorhtric and Eadburga in 789 (Chr. S. 877) and thirteen years from that date bring us to the accession of Egbert in 802, probability, as contrasted with evidence, is in favour of this computation. If this be accepted Egbert must have witnessed some part of the career of Offa. Of his relations to Charles, especially his assumption of the imperial crown, and must have returned to England qualified by education and experience for the great part which he afterwards played. On the death of Beorhtric, which occurred in 802 (Chro.

A. 808), Egbert seems to have succeeded to the throne with little trouble.

England under Kenulf [Kunulf] was in a very different condition from that in which it had been under Offa, who had either subjugated all the other kingdoms, or reduced them, by bestowing his daughters on the kings, to the condition of humble allies. Before his death Northumbria had broken away from him, and his son-in-law Ethelred had broken away from him. Kenulf seems to have been under Æthelbald Præn, and Wessex itself was disquieted by the intrigues of Eadburga. Egfrid the son of Offa had reigned only a few months, and Kenulf, who was only a distant kinsman, possessed neither the policy nor the alliances of Offa. Still Kenulf during part of his reign retained supremacy in Kent and East Anglia, and was the most powerful king in England. What slight opposition was offered to Egbert's succession must have been owing to Kenulf's suggestion. According to the Chronicle, on the day of Egbert's succession, possibly in consequence of something which occurred at his election. Ealhewed, the ealdorman of the Hwicci, which made an immediate impression on the ealdorman, with the men of Wiltshire, withstood him, and although both leaders fell in the battle the invaders were routed.

From this year to 815 (813 Chr. S.) the annals of the reign of Egbert are blank. There is indeed a legend, or rather fabricated story, that in the first year of his reign Egbert called together his tenants at Winchester, and decreed that for the future his kingdom should be called Anglia (Monast. Ang. vi. 608), but the story need only to be mentioned to be rejected; it is clearly a forgery of a late date, at which Egbert had come to be popularly regarded as king of all England. Neither letter, charter, nor legend breaks the silence for fourteen years. Matthew Paris alone seems to assume the later conquests of Egbert, by placing the conquest of Cornwall in 808, and that of the northern Welsh in 810 and 811. These years were given, if we may argue from the results, to the consolidation of the West-Saxon power at home, and on the western border. Not a word is said of any participation of Egbert in the struggle between Canterbury and Mercia, nor does his name appear in the correspondence of the emperor: there are no West-Saxon synods, nor even a monastic charter.

Egbert, in some of his later charters, which are regarded as genuine, adopts with the computation of his regnal years, a method of dating by the years of his "ducatus," dating from 812: in charters of 826 the twenty-fourth year of the reign answers to the fourteenth of the "ducatus" (Kemble, C. D. 1035, 1036, 1038.) It may be inferred from this that the year 812 or 813 was marked by the initiation of hostile measures, probably against the Welsh. Whether the "ducatus" implies the assumption of the character of Bretwalda, or the national hegemony, or whether the charters in which the term occurs are genuine, may be most questions, but Egbert certainly had not in 812 or 813 performed such great career of enterprise as entitled him to such a claim; and the form was adopted only in later years when his suecesses had justified the assumption. Anyhow his military activity begins about this time, and in 814 we have the first gleam of light on the ecclesiastical history of the West-Saxon realm. In 814 (Chr. S. 812), bishop Wigthen of Winchester went to Rome in company with archbishop Wulfred. From that period seems to date the gradual coldness between Wulfred and Kenulf, which broke out later into an open quarrel, and possibly also that closer intercourse with Wessex which still later grew into a strong alliance.

In 815 (813, Chr. S.) Egbert laid waste West Wales or Cornwall from east to west. If his victories in this struggle suggested to him the assumption of a new title, as he had seen Charies assume the imperium, he may now have assumed the "ducatus," dating it by the commencement of his expedition. After this another blank of ten years occurs, during which the great synod of Cealchyn in 816 was held, no mention of Egbert being made in it. King Kenulf died in 821 (Chr. S. 819), Ceolwulf his successor was deposed, and Beornwulf was placed on the throne 823. In 823 we have the first notice of the restitutions of the West-Saxon lands under Egbert; it was held at Aedleah, Oakley (probably the Hampshire Oakley, near Basing-stoke), and approved of a grant made by the king to his "praefectus" or reeve Wulfheard (Kemble, C. D. 1061, from the Codex Wintoniensis). The next year he was again at war, and his career of aggression began as before. His first expedition was against the Britons of Cornwal; the men of Devon fought with them at Camelot; there was great slaughter, but the result is not stated. (Chr. S.; H. Hunt. in M. H. B. 733.)

Egbert himself was probably employed in this campaign; for there are two charters drawn up with the date Aug. 19, 825, at Croedantrewe, "in hoste quando Egbertus rex Gewisorum movit contra Britones." (K. C. D. 1033, 1035.)

The same year was fought the battle of Ellandune, in which Egbert won his place as the first of the decisive encounters between Mercia and Wessex. The place is uncertain, but it was probably not far from Winchester, as Hun the ealdorman of Somerset who fell at Ellandune was buried at Winchester. (Ethelward, M. H. B. 510.) If Beornwulf had penetrated so far into Wessex as this, he must have taken advantage of Egbert's absence on the British frontier. The battle was a cruel one, and the streams ran with blood. Egbert was completely victorious, and the tottering fabric of Mercian supremacy fell at once. Into Kent Egbert sent his son Ethelwulf with the ealdorman Wulfheard and bishop Ealdhstan of Sherborn to recover the kingdom of his father Ealhmund, which, as the Chronicler says, had been unjustly lost. (M. H. B. 548.) Surrey, Sussex, and Essex submitted at once; East Anglia, whither Beornwulf had betaken himself, made overtures to Egbert, and there Beornwulf himself was killed by the people. The Mercians, divided among themselves, continued the unequal struggle for some few years. In 825 or 826 Ludecn succeeded Beornwulf; he fell in an attempt to recover East Anglia, after a reign of two years. (Fior. Wig. in M. H. B. 640.) Wiglaf his successor, who seems to have recovered the folkland of Essex, 828, was immediately attacked and deposed by Egbert (829, Chr. S. 827).

It is at this period that the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle applies to the victorious king the title of Bretwald. After two or three years of exile Wiglaf was restored in 831 to the throne of Mercia by Egbert as a tributary king. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 557.) It was probably about this time or a little earlier that Egbert gave the kingdom of Kent to his son Ethelwulf. The Chronicle, under the year 827 (corr. 829), mentions an expedition of Egbert against Northumbria; he advanced to Der (Derbyshire) and there received the submission of the nation. Another expedition against the North Welsh completes this portion of the reign. During these years there is a very little light from charters; in 828 Egbert, together with Ethelwulf, whom he calls in the charter king of Kent, granted to the church at Rochester immunity for its estates from public imposts except the three regular exactions (Kem. C. D. 229)

In 830, as king of the West Saxons and the Kentishmen, Egbert gave lands in Kent to the thegn Etheric (Kem. C. D. 224). In 833 he gave a small estate in Kent to an abbat named Dun and his church at Sandon (Kem. C. D. 234), and that year held his court on St. Stephen's day at Dorchester, where he granted witan-geld, that is, land in a charter preserved in the Shaftesbury Cartulary (Kem. C. D. 232).

Shortly after this occurred the first alarms on the south coast from the northern sea kings. In 832 (corr. 834) Sheppey was ravaged by the heathen; in 833 (corr. 835) Egbert, in a battle at Charnouth (Carrum), had to contend with thirty-five ships of the Danes; he was defeated, and lost in the fray the two great Kentishmen. In 835 (837) the Danes and Cornishmen united and were defeated by the king at Hengistdewa. (M. H. B. 344, 345.) This was Egbert's last victory, although after the intermission of a year the Danes renewed their attack.

During this period of war and danger, archbishop Ceolnoth had established himself in the see of Canterbury; he had thus been brought into closer intercourse with Egbert, with whom Ceolnoth was on friendly terms. Ethelwulf was, as his later history shows, peculiarly open to religious impressions, and Egbert seems in his last years to have shewn a strong inclination to strengthen himself by obtaining ecclesiastical support. Up to this time none of the West Saxon kings, except Ine, had shewn themselves liberal founders of churches; their charters are very few, and unless we suppose that the benefactions of later kings have been referred back to Ine, their gifts were neither many nor large. Egbert's own benefactions had been chiefly bestowed on Winchester, and for the first twenty years of his reign no extant charter is producible; nor is he found in attendance in any synod. The interdiocesan and other disputes of his bishops are settled in the synods of Ceolnoth and Cealchyn, under the direct influence of the Mercian king, and with no notice of his participation; and of his bishops, two or three, Herefrith, Wiften, and Ealhstan are known as warriors rather than as ecclesiastics, whilst the others can scarcely be said to be known at all. The apparent parsimony of the West-Saxon monarchs may be accounted for by the poverty of the kings, or by the smallness of the folkland in England, and the character of both kings and prelates by the constant needs of defensive warfare and internal organisation. In this latter point it is even possible that more was done by Egbert than appears on the surface, and that we should refer to the appointment of bishops and ealdormen for each shire of his West-Saxon kingdom, an institution of which there are traces somewhat later, but not earlier. The year 838 seems to be marked by a step in advance. In a council held at Kingston-on-Thames, if the Canterbury story is to be trusted, Archbishop Ceolnoth concluded an alliance with Egbert and Ethelwulf, for themselves, their heirs and successors for ever. (Kem. C. D. 240; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 617, 518.) It appears from the document that an estate at Malling had been given to the church of Canterbury by king Baldred while flying before his enemies; the title of the convent was therefore regarded as imperfect, and the kings were moved by the prayers of Ceolnoth to complete it. This was done on the understanding that they and their heirs should receive from Ceolnoth and the convent, and their successors, firm and unshaken friendship, patronage and protection; all the Kentish monasteries, with the two kings and their defidents, were included in the alliance; the bishops agreed to it, and with the addition of certain immunities it was recorded and ordered to be kept among the "telligraphia" of the church of Canterbury.

A very similar document embodied a like alliance between the kings and the church of Winchester. (Kem. C. D. 1044; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 619.) Some doubts may be thrown on the genuineness of these charters, but those doubts arise rather from the nature of their contents than from their diplomatic unsoundness; the Winchester charter, which may have been drawn up in imitation of the Canterbury one, is the one to which these doubts mainly apply. It is, however, by no means impossible that we have in this record a monument of great importance, an alliance, so to speak, between church and state in Kent, which was on the verge of independence for later times. It was afterwards confirmed by Ethelwulf as sole king. This was nearly the last act of Egbert. His death, placed by the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle and the authors who have followed its guidance, in 836, really took place in 839; an important point of chronology which is proved both by the charters of Egbert, and by the number of years assigned to him by all authorities. He reigned thirty-seven years and seven months, which, dating from 802, fix the period of his death about the middle of the year 839. Ethelwulf calls 839 the first year of his reign after his father's death (Kem. C. D. 240), and the year 802 may (notwithstanding the confusion of the Chronicle) be safely accepted as the first year of Egbert.

Egbert's coins are described by Hawkins (Silver Coins of England, ed. Kenyon, pp. 111–113). Some of them were struck at Rochester; about twenty different moneys seem to have been employed. The inscription is "Egbert (spelled variously Eggbeart, Aegbeartb, Hecbeartb) Rex"; in some of them the word "Saxo" occurs instead of the royal title, indicating the title of "Rex Saxorum," and in some the Mercian and the East Anglian A are possibly discernible. The title by which he appears in charters is "Rex Anglorum," A.D. 828 (K. C. D. 233); rex occidentalium Saxorum.

CHRIST. HIGHS.—VOL. II.
which he thought he saw the soul of bishop Cedd descend with angels to take the soul of Chad into the "heavenly kingdom" (Bede, iv. 3).

Egbert renounced with king Egfrid of Northumbria, when in the spring of 884 he was planning an invasion of Ireland (S. iv. 26): "Why should he attack a country which had done him no harm?" But to Egbert, Egfrid "refused to hearken." Egbert, some two or three years later, was fired with that missionary ardour which at that time so powerfully animated the Irish church: he thought of "sailing round Britain" in order to evangelise some of the German tribes, as Frisians, Old-Saxons, Booruckarians, &c, or, if this could not be done, he meditated a pilgrimage to the "threshold of the apostles" at Rome (S. v. 9). He had selected his companions, and provided all necessaries for the voyage, when one morning a monk, who had lived at Melrose under Boisil, told him of a dream in which he had been warned by Boisil to say to Egbert, in Christ's name, that he was not to go, as the intended journey, and must rather go to teach the "monasteries of Columba." "Say nothing about this," said Egbert, "lest it should prove an illusion." He himself, "considering the matter in silence, feared that it might be true, yet did not like to give up his missionary enterprise. After a few days the monk told him that he had been rebuked in another dream, for having given the warning negligently and coldly: he must go again and say to Egbert, "that will he, nill he, he must come to the monasteries of Columba, because their ploughs do not go straight: that is his duty to recall them to the right path." Egbert no longer doubted, and yielded according to the picture he had made one more attempt to carry out his one purpose. His vessel was laden and was awaiting a fair wind, when a storm arose, destroyed some portion of the freight, though nothing of what belonged to Egbert and his friends, and left the ship "lying amid the waves near the shore." Then, at last, Egbert gave way. He remained, however, in Ireland until 728, and then went to Iona, where, by his piety and diligent exertions, he persuaded abbat Dunchad and the community to adopt the "Catholic Easter" and the crown-like tonsure, and then, in Bede's view, "consecrated" the island anew "to Christ" by bringing it into "the light of church fellowship" (S. v. 22). He spent there the remaining thirteen years of his life, dying happily on Easter-day, the 24th of April, A.D. 729.

Bede had a special veneration for this "most reverend and holy father," this "servant of Christ and friend, to be named with all honour" (lll. 4, v. 9, 29), who was sometimes commemorated as St. Egbert. [W. B.]

EGBERT (6) (CAMBRERIS, EGBERTUS, HEGBERTUS), archbishop of York, the son of Eata, and a scion of the royal family of Northumbria. He was sent by his father, in his infancy, to a monastery to be educated, and, when grown up, Egbert went to Rome with his brother Egred, where he was ordained deacon. Egred died there, and Egbert returned home. In A.D. 732, bishop Wilfrid II died, and Egbert was appointed his successor by king Coelwulf. (Symeon, H. E. D. ii. 3.) The Northumbrian chronicle places Egbert's accession in A.D. 732 (supd Bede), the Saxons Chron. two years later. Other dates are given, which are manifestly erroneous.

Soon after Egbert's accession, Bede addressed to him a most admirable letter, which gives a clearer insight into the history of the northern church than any other document of that age. In the first place Bede exhorts Egbert not only to personal piety, but also to an observance and dissemination of sound doctrine as well. Instead of abrupt changes from grave to gay, instead of seeking after worldly society and amusements, he bids him study God's word, and ordain more priests to preach and administer the sacraments in the country villages; to translate, also, the Greek and the Latin, and the Latins, as far as possible, into English, for the guidance of teachers and listeners. Bede then goes on to speak of the neglected state of the diocese. He says that there are towns and hamlets in the more inaccessible districts, which, although taxed for the support of a bishop, not only never see him from year to year, but are also without any clergy, and, through the want of such, he hitherto the great hindrance to the much-needed subdivision of dioceses has been the greed of bishops. Against this evil a wise and salutary remedy was provided by the prescience of pope Gregory, who directed that there should be twelve bishops in the northern province, and Bede exhorts his friend to obtain from the pall, which will give him metropolitan authority, and to obtain the permission of king Coelwulf to appoint suffragans. The creation of these can be effected by an arrangement with the monasteries, which may be made as episcopal centres; the power of election might rest in them, at all events they might facilitate it. Bede then goes on to speak of the condition of these monasteries. They were hot-beds of vice and iniquity, without discipline or superintendence. For the last thirty years and more it had been a habit among the laity to purchase lands for the establishment of monasteries, which, when they were established and freed from secular jurisdiction, became the property of the foundresses and their families, who paid no attention to celibacy or anything else. There was scarcely a prelate who had not founded a monastery in this way, and the officers and servants of the king had followed their example, and this prelate or officer called himself an abbot. The whole diocese, Bede said, was full of disorder, corruption, and luxury, and stood in need of the most vigorous and searching reform. (Bede, Opp. ed. Smith, pp. 305-12.)

The advice and the warnings of Bede were not lost upon Egbert. In A.D. 735 he got the pall at Rome from Gregory III., thus becoming the metropolitan of the north, and the first archbishop of York since the time of Paulinus (Saxon Chron.). In A.D. 738 his brother Eadbert became king, so that he could now rely upon the support of the secular arm. There is no record, however, of his making any attempt to increase the number of his suffragans—territorial reasons were probably against this—but there is strong evidence that Egbert was not only a learned man, but at the same time a wise and successful ruler. His literary works were of great repute. Alcuin commends him for the way in which he distributed his wealth, especially among the poor. Egbert was evidently a digni-Sed ecclesiasticus, accustomed to patronize and to be looked up to, and yet with more suavity and geniality than might have been expected in a schoolmaster. He had also splendid tastes. He acquired many sacred vessels for his churches made of silver, and ornamented with jewels and gold, together with figured curtains of silk, apparently of foreign manufacture. He was also a reformer of church music, and seems to have introduced the observance of the hours. (Alcuin, de 33. Ebor. Eccl. 1262–1271.)

Egbert's chief claim to the gratitude of posterity is the establishment of the school or university of York, and his commencement of the library in connexion with it. The school was attached to the minster, on which it has conferred an enduring fame. Egbert himself was the moderator or head, and gave the religious instruction, whilst Ethelbert or Albert was the vice-principal or abbot, and had the charge of grammar and the arts and sciences. Scholars flocked to York from all parts of Europe, and among the pupils was the illustrious Alcuin, who speaks affectionately of the piety and goodness of Egbert, telling us what an excellent instructor he was, how just and yet gentle. We gain a glimpse of the scholastic life. It was his wont in the morning, as soon as he was at leisure, to send for some of the young clerks, whom he instructed in succession, sitting on his couch as he did so. At noon he went into his private chapel, and celebrated mass. When dinner was over, at which he was present with pleasure, his scholars discuss literary questions. In the evening he said compline with them, and then each received his blessing, kneeling at Egbert's feet. (Vita A. Alcuini, ed. Jaffé, 10–11.)

Towards the close of his life, Egbert resigned to Albert and Alcuin the management of his school, and devoted himself exclusively to his spiritual work. His brother king Eadburt laid aside his crown, and came to live with him in A.D. 737 in religious retirement at York. The archbishop died first, on Nov. 19, A.D. 766; his brother survived him until Aug. 19, A.D. 768. They were laid side by side in one of the porches or chapels of York Minster. (Gawro Chrom.; Symeon, B. II. 29–32.)

Egbert, in conjunction with his brother, struck coins, of which several types have been discovered. It was the fashion at one time to ascribe them to the kingdom of Kent.

Egbert was the most practically able man that had hitherto ruled the church of York. We do not mean he was a great reformer; he gave rather to the work that was generated on the side of order and godliness by his educational efforts, and his own gentle yet firm example. His books are classic or text books, pointing to what must then have seemed a very ideal state of discipline and purity, and setting up a possible standard of the most excelled kind. He had the advantage of being an educated man with a brother on the throne, so his plans had every reasonable chance of success, and he lived long enough to see them have a fair trial. It is not too much to say that the gentle influences of the school of York and its teachers kept Northumbria together until the close of the century in which Egbert lived. When we mark the political changes, and the violence and bloodshed of the times, we can only wonder that it endured so long. At the last, when Northumbria became hopelessly disorganized, the discipline and the learning of Egbert were enlightening other countries than that which they were intended to humanize. The children of the school of York taught the schools or universities of Italy, Germany, and France.

Among the letters of Boniface there are two addressed to Egbert, in one of which Boniface asks him to send him into Germany a part of Bede's Commentary; in the other he sends Egbert transcripts of the epistles of Gregory made for him at Bononia, as unknown, as the texts in England. The letters show the writer valued the archbishop's opinion, and are very genial and instructive (Epp. ed. Giles, i. 87, 113). York had a great deal to do in the 7th and 8th centuries with the evangelization of Germany. There is also a letter extant, written in A.D. 757, in which Hetruchi, called Hetrud, both Egbert and his brother Eadburt, for an injustice done to abbot Fordred (Wilkins, Conc. i. 144; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 394). The name of Egbert ought not to have been inserted in it, as the rebuke was intended for the king, not for the archbishop.

Egbert was an author of note and fame, his works having for their aim the elevation of the moral tone of his clergy and diocese generally. They consist of the following.

1. A Pontificale, or volume of episcopal offices, printed for the first time by the Surtees Soc. (vol. xxvii.), from a MS. in the national library at Paris, formerly that of the bishop of Chartres, and of Evreux. There are extracts from it in Martyr., de Ant. Eccl. Ritu. ii. 11; lii. ii. c. xii.; cf. Maspell. Monument. Ritual. var. loc.

2. Saccinctus Dialogus Ecclesiasticus Institutiones, a treatise on various points of church discipline, in the form of question and answer; printed for the first time by Sir James Ware, 8vo. Dublin, 1694, pp. 91–119, at first prefixed to a work of his own, Towards A.D. 1604–11; Johnson, ed. Baron. i. 161–179; Wilkins, i. 82–86; Mansi, xii. 482–88; Thorpe, Lives and Instit. ii. 87–96; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 403–13; cf. Leland, de Script. Brit. i. 114 Oudinuis, i. 1796.

3. Excerptum de Consenibus Catholicores populorum, seu Poenitentiatae acta remissione condemnati, printed in Martene and Durand, Ampl. Coll. viii. coll. 40–8; Wasserschleben, Busserudungen, etc., pp. 231–247; Haddan and Stubbs, Conc. iii. 413–81, where there is a learned and exhaustive note on the history of this work. The text printed by H. and S., and derived from Wasserschleben, seems to be the original work of Egbert, but it was subsequently overlaid with additional materials from other sources, which are sometimes called a Confessionale and Poenitentiata. These are printed in a variety of forms by Labbe, vii. coll. 1611–19; Spelman, 281–8; Wilkins, i. 113–44; Mansi, xiv. 458; Thorpe, ii. 228–239; cf. Wanley, ii. 109; Let. de Script. Brit. i. 114; Oudinuis, i. 1796; Wright, Let. i. 308; see also Fuller, Ch. Hist. b. ii. 111.

To Egbert there are also ascribed a series of Excerptiones, or extracts from the fathers and canons of the church, on matters of discipline. Wasserschleben, however, has shown that they cannot be Egbert's, as they contain extracts from the Capitularis of Charlemagne (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 415). They are printed as Egbert's EGBERT (T), bishop of Lindisfarne. Florence of Worcester (ann. 802) says that Egbert being elected on the death of Higbald was consecrated on June 11 by archbishop Eanbald. Simeon of Durham (Twysd. Script. col. 119) writes: "Anno decimii. Higbaldus episcopus obit et Egbertus ei successit." The MS. however, has an hiatus after "Egbertus," and "ei successit" is supplied by Twysden from the continuation (see note in Sym. Dun. ed. Surtees Soc. p. 42, and M. H. B. 673.) but this fault in the manuscript affects Egbert’s succession less than that of Ceolnoth archbishop of Canterbury. June 11, 803, was probably the day of Egbert’s consecration, as that day was Trinity Sunday, and this is the date adopted by Wharton (Angl. Sac. i. 698) and Stubbs (Regist. Sacr. 9). Wendorow also gives 803. We are indebted to Simeon of Durham (Duceton. Eccl. ii. 18, Twysd. 13) for the information that Egbert was ordained bishop at Biggella, and that the assisting bishops were Eanbald of Hexham and Badulf of Whithern. Biggella is identified with Bywell on the north bank of the Tyne (Sym. Dun. ut sup. ed. Stevenson), an account of which spot is given in E. Mackenzie’s Northumberland, ii. 350, ed. 1825.

Egbert’s successor was Heathred, A.D. 821. His metropolitans were therefore Eanbald II. and Wulfald; the kings of Northumbria contemporaneous with him were Eardulf and Eanred. [Ethelwulf (2).] [C. H.]

EGBURGA, EGBURG, who writes to bishop Boniface A.D. 716-722; Ep. 32 in Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 732; Mon. Magunt. ed. Jaffé, p. 63. She is "ultima discipulorum vel discipulorum ejus"; she describes her regard for him in enthusiastic and almost fond terms, telling him how she has transferred to him, her abbat and her brother, all her sisterly affection since the death of his friend her brother Osberhe. A new befriending has been set on her, by her beloved Wutburga’s incarneration at Rome. But Wutburga is a happy confessor; Winfrid too is an honoured apostle; while she, the miserable Egburga, not deemed worthy of being a companion with such servants of God, is left to bewail her own sinfulness in the vale of tears. Deprived of the privilege of seeing Winfrid in the flesh, she implores him, on whom alone she leans, to place her upon the rock of his supplications, and moreover to send her some relics, a few written lines also, that by those tokens she may be able to think of him as present with her. Her amanuensis Ealhbeorceth may be responsible for the Latin and for some of the exuberance of style; but the sentiments are those of one who has wound herself up to believe she cannot serve God in the common round, the pairing of being anything because her heart is not an heroic one. One of the variants of Eadbubga abbess of Repton [Eadbubga (3)] is Aegberga; but whether Boniface’s correspondent was any of the known Eadbubgas may be questioned. [C. H.]

EGCBALD (Kemble, C. D. 35), presbyter and abbat. [Egbald (1).] [C. H.]

EGCLAF (Kemble, C. D. 87), bishop of Dunwich. [Ingelf.]

EGCUINF (Kemble, C. D. 193), bishop of London. [Ingulf.]

EGCUIN (Kemble, C. D. 124), bishop of Worcester. [Eugine.]

EGDUNUS, a presbyter, martyred at Nonemedia with seven others. They were amongst the first victims of the Diocletian persecution (A.D. 303). Egdunus was hung up by his feet and suffocated with smoke. [Mart. Adon. Usuard.] He is commemorated March 12. [T. S. B.]

EGELERHT (A. S. C. ann. 552 in M. H. B. 302), king of Kent. [Ethelbert I.] [C. H.]

EGELRIHT, ST. (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 97, in § 86 Ethelbrht), king of East Anglia, slain by Offa. [Ethelbert (3).] [C. H.]

EGELRED (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 70, ed. Hardy), king of Northumbria. [Ethelred (4).] [C. H.]

EGEMONIUS (Agemontius, Ionoitus), bishop of Autun, mentioned by Gregory of Tours (De Gloria Conf. c. 75) as possessed of every episcopal virtue; died A.D. 374. [Gesta Chin. iv. 333; Gams, Spec. Ep. 499.] [R. T. S.]

EGEREDUS, bishop of Salamanca in A.D. 646. His signature appears among those of three councils, the seventh, eighth, and tenth of Toledo, in the years 646, 653, and under Lindastrith and Reckerrinth. [Exp. Sagr. iv. 276; Aguirre-Catalá, ii. 423, 444, iv. 158.] [Elfrithius (14).] [M. A. W.
EGFRID OF NORTHUMBRIA

EGFRID (1) (EGFRID, EGFRITH, EGIFRIG, EGFRID, EGFRITH, EGIFRUD), one of the younger sons of Oswy king of Northumbria and Eanfleda, daughter of King Edwin. In A.D. 655, when his father had been exiled to Strathclyde with Penda king of Mercia, Egfrid, then about five years of age, was kept as a hostage in Mercia by Cynwine the queen (Bed. H. E. iii. 24). After this we hear nothing of him until A.D. 670, when he succeeded his father on the Northumbrian throne as his eldest surviving son (ibid. iv. 5). He was in every way fitted to rule, and inherited a kingdom which his father at his death had left in profound peace.

Egfrid's first wife was Etheldreda, a daughter of Anna king of East Anglia, and widow of Tontbert, one of the rulers of that kingdom. The alliance with Egfrid was forced upon her, as she was under a vow of virginity, to which during her two years' alliance with his brother carefully adhered. Wilfrid was high in the favour of both husband and wife, and Egfrid is said to have solicited the bishop's aid to enable him to overcome the objections of his wife, but to no purpose. The ill-matched couple were divorced, and Etheldreda became a nun at Coldingham, whilst Egfrid took as his second wife Ermenburgha, sister-in-law of Ceolwulf king of Wessex. They had no children. (Bed. H. E. iv. 19.)

The part which Wilfrid had taken in the domestic affairs of the Northumbrian palace was partly, no doubt, the cause of the trouble in which he was afterwards involved. In queen Ermenburga he had a determined and energetic foe, and her influence soon brought over her husband to her. The love of splendour, the wide-spread popularity of Wilfrid, and, above all, his success made the queen and her husband look upon him with suspicion and dislike. An opportunity soon occurred for diminishing Wilfrid's power. Archbishop Theodore was invited into Northumbria by Egfrid, and without Wilfrid's consent his large diocese was subdivided. A bishop was placed at Hexham, and another at Whittingham. To this change Egfrid made a vehement but unsuccessful resistance, and finally appealed to Rome in defence of his rights. After a long journey thither and many delays, he came back to the Northumbrian court with a papal decree in his favour, to find it treated with derision and contempt. He was robbed, cast into prison, and finally banished.

The dread of Egfrid's revenge denied him also a shelter in Mercia and Wessex, and it was in heathen Sussex at last that he found a temporary home. In the meanwhile other changes were made in the Northumbrian diocese. Bosu became bishop of York, Eadheah came back from Lindsey to Ripon, whilst Trumbert, Eatas, and Trumwin were also prelates in the province. Wilfrid was thus excluded from his diocese, and as long as he lived Egfrid denied him access to his kingdom.

In the management of Northumbria Egfrid was a bold and vigorous ruler. He made but few additions to his kingdom towards the south, Mercia being in his way. He held indeed Lindsey for a short time, but soon lost it. With Ethelred of Mercia he waged, in A.D. 679, a bloody war, in the course of which Egfrid's own brother Ithelred was slain. Learning the news, Egfrid seemed to be imminent when peace fortunately was restored by the intervention of Theodore. Egfrid was thus enabled to turn his arm with greater success in a different direction. He consolidated his power far and wide by treaties or annexation, subjecting to his rule the independent states of Cumbria and Lothian, in which the Galloway. Strathclyde would also have been secured had Egfrid lived.

Egfrid was a true and generous friend to the Northumbrian church. In its management and welfare he took the greatest interest. He was present at the ecclesiastical synod at Haestfelth (Bed. H. E. iv. 17). In A.D. 684 he was at the synod at Tayford on the Alne, at which Cuthbert was elected bishop of Lindisfarne in his absence. Egfrid tried in vain to induce him to accept the office. At last he went himself, and with great persuasion and difficulty obtained his assent and brought Cuthbert back to the synod (H. E. iv. 29). Egfrid was afterwards present when Cuthbert was consecrated at York (Symeon, H. E. D. i. c. 9). Between Cuthbert and Egfrid there existed the most intimate and affectionate relations. The king and archbishop Theodore gave the saint divers lands in the city of York, where there is still a church which bears his name. They gave him also the village of Crayke near York, and the country around it three miles in circuit, that Cuthbert might be able to reside there as he went to and from York. The charter, however, which professes to record the gift is a fictitious one (Beda, ed. Smith, App. 782). As this benefaction was small, Egfrid added to it the city of Luel or Carlisle, with a circuit of fifteen miles. He also gave him Cartmel in North Lancashire and all its Britons, and the will of Sutwardibut, together with Cuthbert in Northumberland (Jist. de S. Cuth. ed. Sutroes Soc. 140–1). Benedict Bishop also experienced Egfrid's bounty. The king gave him the land at the mouth of the Wear on which Benedict erected his monastery of Wearmouth (Vitae Abb. auct. Beda). He was also, no doubt, connected with the building of Jarrow, the dedication stone of which still exists, stating that it was put there in the fifteenth year of king Egfrid's reign (Jarrow and Wearmouth, ed. Sutroes Soc. pref. 26). The place itself, which is situated at the confluence of the rivulet Don with the Tyne, was called Portus Egfridi (Symeon, H. E. D. ii. c. 5). Well might the memory of Egfrid be dear to the Cuthbertines and the houses of Wearmouth and Jarrow.

In A.D. 684 the lust of empire induced Egfrid to send an expedition under Beccus to Ireland, Christian country although it was. The outrage evoked the expostulations of Egbert (EGBERT 5)) for the unjust onslaught upon a peaceful and friendly people. The expedition seems to have failed, but it caused much misery and destruction of sacred places, and generated a bitter feeling, which was more injurious to Egfrid than a reverse in the field (Bed. H. E. iv. 26).

In the following year Egfrid attacked the Picts, whose king, as Nemius (p. 50) says, was his kinsman, contrary to the entreaties of Cuthbert and his own friends and advisers. The Picts lured him on until they got him entangled among the hills, and then they fell upon him and slew the invader and most of his army at a place called Cauthing, being the name of a fort, Necthan. The king's body was interred at Hii, or Iona (Bed. H. E. iv. 26; Symeon, H. E. D.
EGFRIHD OF MERCIA

i. 9). Bede tells us that the disaster was known beforehand to Cuthbert. In the preceding year he made Egfrid's sister, Ælfsca abbess of Whitby, acquainted with the approaching termination of her brother's life and dominion (Vita S. Cuth. c. 24). At the time of the defeat in Pictland Cuthbert was at Carlisle, his own town, where Ermensburgh the queen was anxiously awaiting some news from the north in a monastery, recently founded by Cuthbert, of which her sister was the abbess. The inhabitants escorted the saint over the city to shew him the walls and a fountain, built by the Romans, of wonderful construction. All at once Cuthbert bent over his staff, turning a saddened face to the ground. A vision seemed to pass before him. He raised his eyes and groaned as he spake aloud, "Perhaps now the crisis is over." "Whence knowest thou?" asked a priest near him; he would reveal no more; but went quickly to the anxious queen and bade her return with speed to the royal city in case the battle should have gone ill with her lord (Vita S. Cuth. c. 27). The spite of one of the biographers of Wilfrid represents that saint as beholding in Sussex, whilst he was celebrating mass, two demons carrying off the soul of the slaughtered monarch from the battle-field to the abode of the lost (Vita S. Wilf. asc. Ædmer. cap. 48). Bede, however, speaks of Egfrid as "pissimus rex!"

Egfrid was in many respects a great king. He possessed the power of organization which was so rare among the princes of his time, and had he only been free from restlessness, he would perhaps have established on the firmest and most lasting foundations the lordship of Northumbria. Egfrid was most munificent to the church. In every territory which he acquired he seems to have planted bishops and set apart lands for ecclesiastical purposes. With men of Cuthbert's stamp Egfrid was always on the best of terms, although he did not always listen to their advice; but he was strictly in favour of the position and rights of national church, and on that account the Ultramontanism of Wilfrid was excessively, though unsuccessfully, set against him. He set his face against it once and for all. It was upon Egfrid's character and personal influence, often overstrained, that the cohesion of his dominions depended. As soon as he fell the process of dissolution began, "Spes caeptit et virtus regni Anglorum fuere, ac retro sublapse referri," says Bede. The Picts, flushed with victory, recovered what they had lost in the north, and bishop Trumwin retired from Whithern to Whitby to die. We hear no more of this noble man. Cuthbert, belonging to Cuthbert and Lindisfarne. Lindsey went irre- vocably to Mercia, and the supremacy of Northumbria, which had lasted for more than a century, came to an end for ever.

About the beginning of this century a small hoard of copper coins, which have been ascribed to Egfrid, was found in the churchyard of Jarrow. On one of them was the word "LXV." In the York Museum there are two other hoins of the same monarch, but of a different type. [J. R.]

EGFRIHD (2) (Eogfrith, Egfrith, Eoferth, Egfrith, Egfrith), king of Mercia. He was the only son of Offa and Cynewrith, and was from an early age destined to be the heir to his father's extensive power. In the year 787 (Chr. S. 785; M. H. B. 336) he received the royal consecration, the projected arrangement being probably one of the matters which were discussed at the legatine council held by the Roman legates George and Theophylact in that year. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 444, 445.) Henry of Huntingdon (M. H. B. 731) supposed that Egfrid was made king of Kent on this occasion, but the assumption is not borne out by the charters, and it is far more probable that he was thus admitted to a share, or prospective share, of his father's full power. From the year 787 Egfrid frequently attests his father's charters as king; thus in 788 he, as "rex Merciorum," consents to a grant to Rochester (Kemble, C. D. 152); as "Egfrith rex," he sanctions other grants to Rochester in 788 (ib. 155 and 157) at the council of Caenlchyth. In two charters of Worcester (K. C. D. 164, 167) of the year 794, he signs as "Silius regis." His attestations as king are not, however, confined to Kentish charters, as would be the case if he were king of Kent, for he attests a Peterborough charter of abbat Beonna (787-796), K. C. D. 165, as "rex Merciorum." Nothing particular seems to be known about him during his father's lifetime. On Offa's death, July 28, 796, Egfrid succeeded him, but retained his royal power for a few months only, dying before the end of the year. (Chr. S. 794; M. H. B. 338.) William of Malmesbury (G. R. lib. i. § 94) says that during his short reign he shewed himself anxious to redress the evils that his father's cruelty had wrought, that he restored the monastic charters which his father had annulled, and in particular gave back an estate which had been alienated from Malmesbury. Several charters were issued by him during his short reign, one granted at Bath to Ethelmund, ealdorman of the Hwicci (Kemble, C. D. 170, 171), one to Malmesbury (Kem. C. D. 174); Malmesb. G. P. ed. Hamilton, p. 388), besides two questionable or spurious grants to St. Albans (Kem. C. D. 172, 173), dated in synod at Caenlchyth. There can be no doubt that the break-up of Offa's empire had begun even before his death, and that Egfrid's reign only comprised some part of the time under Eadbert Præn. But there are no other traces of personal action. Alcuin, in a letter to the Northumbrian ealdorman Oserberht, expressed his belief that Egfrid's early death was a sign of divine judgment on the bloody means by which Offa had procured his advancement. (Mon. Alcuin. ed. Jaffe, p. 350.) Florence of Worcester gives the exact length of his reign as 141 days, which would fix the day of his death at about Dec. 17. He was succeeded by his distant relation Coenulf. [KENULF.]

EGHLIONNA, virgin, commemorated Jan. 21. She is commemorated along with Fæniche a virgin, and they are both in Cluain-Deil or Cluain-Cean, in Eoghanacht, of Cashel (Mar. Doney.; Mart. Tall.). This is now Clooneen, a parish in the barony of Clannwilliam in Limerick, and the living is a messuage to the see of Cashel; it is probably the same as the Cluain-caen-Modimog (Four Mast. ii. 936, n. 8, 937), which O'Donovan says was in the territory of Eoghanacht Chaisil, which he considers to be the present barony of Middletresh, in the county of Tipperary. The irony of Middletresh a EGIALÉUS contiguous to that of Clanwilliam on the east (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 395–96).

EGIALÉUS (EGIALÉUS), Grammaticus, one of the judges between Manes and bishop Archelaus (Baron. Ann. 277. 13).

EGICA (1), bishop of Segovia (Sigüenza) in A.D. 655. His signature appears last but one among those of the eleventh council of Toledo.
He died before 680. (Exp. Sacr. viii. 129; Aguirre-Catalan, iv. 247.)

EGICA (2), Gothic king of Spain, from A.D.
678 to 701. He was the son-in-law of his predecessor Ervig (q.v.), having married his daughter Cixilo. Lucas of Tuy makes him the nephew of Wamba (iii. 69, apud Schott, Hist. Illus.), while Sebastian of Salamanca (Exp. Sacr. xiii. 477) speaks of him as Wamba's cousin (consobrinus).
It is tolerably certain, from the contemporary evidence that remains, that he belonged either to the family or party of Wamba, and that his elevation to the throne may be regarded on the one hand as an atonement or Ervig's part 218) for the treatment which Wamba and his adherents had received (Ervios, Wamba), and on the other as a demonstration of the triumph of the strongly ecclesiastical forces of the Gothic state.

Egics was anointed king by Julian, the metropolitan of Toledo, Nov. 24, 687. Six months later, May 11, 688, the fifteenth council of Toledo met in the church of the Holy Apostles, under the presidency of Julian. The ceremonial observed was exactly the same as under Ervig. The king appears, asks, kneeling (humo proractus), for the prayers of the bishops, and then bade to them the tomus, in which his wishes and his reasons for summoning the council are contained. He asks the advice of the bishops upon a point of conscience—How is he to reconcile two contradictory oaths? At the time of his marriage with Ervig's daughter (her name does not appear until the following council in 694) Ervig had obliged him to swear that he would at all future times, and on all possible occasions, protect the lives and property, and further the interests of Ervig's children and his wife's relations.
The text of this curious oath is given later on in the acts, and is well worth attention. (Tejada y Ramiro, Coleo. de Can. il. 545.) Afterwards, when he became king he had taken the usual constitutional oath of justice and fidelity towards his people, also in the presence and with the knowledge of Ervig, and he now complains that it is impossible for him to keep both oaths.
On the one hand he fears to incur the guilt of perjury by unjustly defending the family of Ervig against the just claims of his people, or on the other by dealing justly with his people at the expense of those whose interests he had sworn to advocate and protect. Ervig is said (ut fertur)
to have treated many with injustice and cruelty,
degrading some from the condition of nobles
that of slaves, torturing and oppressing others,
but all plaintiffs are suspended because of the
royal oath, and because also of the general oath,
which Ervig had extracted from the whole
nation on behalf of his interests he had sworn to
advocate and protect. Ervig is said (ut fertur)
to have treated many with injustice and cruelty,
degrading some from the condition of nobles
that of slaves, torturing and oppressing others,
but all plaintiffs are suspended because of the
royal oath, and because also of the general oath,
which Ervig had extracted from the whole
nation on behalf of his interests he had sworn to
advocate and protect. Ervig is said (ut fertur)
to have treated many with injustice and cruelty,
degrading some from the condition of nobles
that of slaves, torturing and oppressing others,
but all plaintiffs are suspended because of the
royal oath, and because also of the general oath,
which Ervig had extracted from the whole
nation on behalf of his interests he had sworn to
advocate and protect. Ervig is said (ut fertur)
to have treated many with injustice and cruelty,
degrading some from the condition of nobles
that of slaves, torturing and oppressing others,
but all plaintiffs are suspended because of the
royal oath, and because also of the general oath,
which Ervig had extracted from the whole
nation on behalf of his interests he had sworn to
advocate and protect. Ervig is said (ut fertur)
to have treated many with injustice and cruelty,
degrading some from the condition of nobles
that of slaves, torturing and oppressing others,
but all plaintiffs are suspended because of the
royal oath, and because also of the general oath,
which Ervig had extracted from the whole
nation on behalf of his interests he had sworn to
advocate and protect. Ervig is said (ut fertur)
to have treated many with injustice and cruelty,
degrading some from the condition of nobles
that of slaves, torturing and oppressing others,
but all plaintiffs are suspended because of the
royal oath, and because also of the general oath,
which Ervig had extracted from the whole
nation on behalf of his interests he had sworn to
advocate and protect. Ervig is said (ut fertur)
to have treated many with injustice and cruelty,
degrading some from the condition of nobles
that of slaves, torturing and oppressing others,
but all plaintiffs are suspended because of the
royal oath, and because also of the general oath,
which Ervig had extracted from the whole
nation on behalf of his interests he had sworn to
advocate and protect. Ervig is said (ut fertur)
to have treated many with injustice and cruelty,
degrading some from the condition of nobles
that of slaves, torturing and oppressing others,
but all plaintiffs are suspended because of the
royal oath, and because also of the general oath,
which Ervig had extracted from the whole
nation on behalf of his interests he had sworn to
advocate and protect. Ervig is said (ut fertur)
to have treated many with injustice and cruelty,
degrading some from the condition of nobles
that of slaves, torturing and oppressing others,
but all plaintiffs are suspended because of the
royal oath, and because also of the general oath,
which Ervig had extracted from the whole
nation on behalf of his interests he had sworn to
advocate and protect. Ervig is said (ut fertur)
to have treated many with injustice and cruelty,
degrading some from the condition of nobles
that of slaves, torturing and oppressing others,
but all plaintiffs are suspended because of the
royal oath, and because also of the general oath,
which Ervig had extracted from the whole
nation on behalf of his interests he had sworn to
advocate and protect. Ervig is said (ut fertur)
to have treated many with injustice and cruelty,
degrading some from the condition of nobles
that of slaves, torturing and oppressing others,
but all plaintiffs are suspended because of the
royal oath, and because also of the general oath,
which Ervig had extracted from the whole
nation on behalf of his interests he had sworn to
advocate and protect. Ervig is said (ut fertur)
to have treated many with injustice and cruelty,
degrading some from the condition of nobles
that of slaves, torturing and oppressing others,
but all plaintiffs are suspended because of the
royal oath, and because also of the general oath,
which Ervig had extracted from the whole
nation on behalf of his interests he had sworn to
advocate and protect. Ervig is said (ut fertur)
to have treated many with injustice and cruelty,
degrading some from the condition of nobles
that of slaves, torturing and oppressing others,
but all plaintiffs are suspended because of the
royal oath, and because also of the general oath,
which Ervig had extracted from the whole
nation on behalf of his interests he had sworn to
advocate and protect. Ervig is said (ut fertur)
to have treated many with injustice and cruelty,
degrading some from the condition of nobles
that of slaves, torturing and oppressing others,
but all plaintiffs are suspended because of the
royal oath, and because also of the general oath,
those, however, who are willing to forsake their errors various rewards and inducements are held out, and nothing is said of the specially atrocious provisions which disgrace the succeeding councils. (For a discussion of the Jev-laws of Ervign and Egica see the articles of the Archipeele des Westphalen-Redts, 192-207.) Canon 5, De Reparatione Ecclesiarum, &c. provides that the thirds (tertiis quas antiqui canones de parochiis suis habendae episcopis censuerant) shall be applied to the repairs of the church fabrics. Only if the church is in proper order is the bishop to appropriate them, and in no case is he to exact from the parochial churches more than the thirds either for the payment of the royal taxes (pro regis inquisitionibus), or for the salaries of officials (causa stipendiis). It is also forbidden that one presbyter shall under any pretext take charge of several churches. Every church which possesses ten slaves (the meaning of this condition is doubtful, Dahn, Vite Abh. 482; Tejada y Rumire, note to C. Tol. xvi. 5) must have a presbyter of its own.

There are certain errors in the Eucharistic ceremonial. The clergy are commanded to use bread specially prepared, and not to cut pieces from the ordinary bread made for their own use. In the seventh canon we get a glimpse into the procedure by which the acts of these national councils were made known and enforced throughout the country. The bishops are ordered on their return home, within six months at the latest, to gather together all the abbots, presbyters, deacons, and clerks of their dioceses, in order to read to them publicly the acts of the council, and make them fully known and understood by them. And whoever shall despise the acts, or shall endeavour to discredit them, or excite others to rebellion against them, is to be punished with two months' excommunication. In canon viii. we have a repetition of the oath of the Atalanta Prisca Regiae, referred to in the preceding canon as having been sworn to Ervign on behalf of his family, and now renewed in the case of Egica's children. The council enumerates the king's many virtues, his gifts to churches, his moderation in matters of taxation, his magnanimity towards his enemies, and his generosity in restoring those who had forfeited their liberty to a free condition, and out of gratitude, not only grants him the oath of protection, but decrees that in future in all churches wherever mass is celebrated prayer shall be made for the king and his children, his grandchildren, and all who belong to him. Canon ix. decrees the deposition and excommunication of Sisebert, the traitor metropolitan of Toledo, who had plotted the destruction of the whole royal family—king, queen, sons, and daughters. [SISEBERT:] Before the opening of the council Sisebert's case had been adjudicated upon and his successor appointed, in order that the council might not begin without a president. (Since JULIAN, q. e., the metropolitan of Toledo had presided irrespective of antiquity of ordination.) This is proved by the Decretum Judicii annexed to the acts. The decision is, however, now repeated so far as it concerned Sisebert, omitting the various translations of bishops [FELIX OF TOLEDO], and is then duly followed by the tenth canon, De his qui juramenti sui profanatores exsitternt, modelled upon C. Tol. iv. 75, and repeating three times by common acclamation, as in the earlier canon, the council's anathema upon those who shall plan the death of the king, or the forcible seizure of the kingdom. Then with thanksgiving to the omnipotent and indivisible Trinity the proceedings of the council are concluded, and a decree concerning Sisebert is inscribed immediately after the acts, and the royal confirmation of the acts follows. It is given in the form of a speech from Egica (Ecce sanctissimi in Christo patres, &c.), and contains one or two curious points. Egica represents himself as inclined to treat those who have rebelled against him with gentleness, and he asks the council's opinion as to the advisability of clemency. They know how many times he has been the victim of treachery, and how many disturbances have been raised in the state. Let them say whether the authors of them can be fitly pardoned. But although the council is asked for its opinion upon exceptional cases, the king reserves full liberty of action for himself and his descendants in all future cases of conspiracy. (For the case of Thuretundus see Epistulae noster ecce Christiani acis, see Ex. 74.) The answer of the council upon the points thus raised has not come down to us. Sixty bishops, of whom five were metropolitan, three vicars of the sees of Denia, Pampelona, and Ossoneba, five abbots and sixteen comites et tui illustres, attended the synod.

Nearly two years later, Nov. 4, 684, the seventeenth council of Toledo met in the church of St. Leocadia without the walls of the city. The king appeared et in medio nostra consistent in altum opat reclinans, commanded himself to the blessing and prayers of the council. The royal speech, drawn up probably, like that delivered at the sixteenth council, by the metropolitan Felix, puts forward in the first place all the matters to be dealt with by the council a conspiracy lately discovered between the Spanish and African Jews against the Goth rule. "Præsertim quin nuper manifestis confessionibus indubie invenimus hos in transmarinis partibus hebrasios alios consuluisse at unanimitatis contra genus christianorum agentem." Egica recalls his mild treatment of the Jews in making all possible efforts for their conversion, and in allowing them the use of Christian slaves, which had been previously forbidden to them. Now, however, seeing that all such efforts are in vain, the council is invited to proceed to extremities against them. From their decrees, however, are to be exempted the Jews living in the mountainous parts of Gallia Gothica (Galliae provinciae—infra clausuras—habitatores), because of the depopulation of that region by pestilence (plague ingenualis inferior) and invasion (externe gentis incursu), and because also no doubt of the unlikelihood of their being concerned in the plot of their southern brethren. For the connexion of this passage with a war with the Franks mentioned only by Sebastian of Salamanca see below.

Next among the subjects for legislation comes the crime of those priests who say masses for the dead in the case of men still living, meaning thus to bring harm upon persons who have injured or offended them. The law which throws light upon the debased condition of the lower Spanish clergy at the time; and finally, the council is exhorted to revive the custom of monthly litanies, with the especial object ap-pently of countering the seditious tendencies of the time. (Tejuda y Ramiro, ii. 595.)

The first canon of the council, which ordains that only spiritual and ecclesiastical subjects are to be discussed during the first three days of the council, gives rise to a feeling on the part of those composing these synods that the councils had of late become too much secularised. The growing preponderance of the secular element in the councils of Toledo, from the eighth onwards when we first find the signatures of the palatini is indeed evident to any student of these much-debated assemblies. The seventeen and the last which has come down to us, has to some extent the air of an attempt to return to the earlier and more purely ecclesiastical traditions. Of its eight canons six are concerned with ecclesiastical matters, the closing of the gates of the baptistery at the beginning of Lent, can 2, the washing of feet on Holy Thursday, the misuse of the ornaments and properties of churches, the celebration of the missa defunctorum for those who are still living, and the monthly celebration of litanies (which is enjoined upon all the churches of Spain and Gothic Gaul, as a practice prescribed by ancient canons, and now revived because of the prevalence of crime and perjury). Of the other canons the first provides for the safety of the queen and the royal children in case of Egica’s death, and the second deals with the Jews. The canon de Munitione Conjugata atque Provisi Regni, is partly a repetition of a formula with which preceding councils have made us familiar (C. Tol. xvi. 8 and C. Tol. xiii. 4), and partly a special provision for Cisilia, Egica’s wife, and (according to later chroniclers) Ervig’s daughter. The canon de Judiciorum Donatione, the last canon of a Gothic council remaining to us, is a striking witness to the spirit of intolerance, cruelty, and persecution which marked the later years of Gothic Christianity. All Jews in all the provinces of Spain (with the exception, however, made in the fonsa) are condemned to perpetual slavery, together with their wives, children, and descendants. They are to be exiled from their homes, and dispersed wherever the king pleased. The Christian slaves of the Jews are to receive from their property whatever the king may choose to assign to them. Those to whom Jews are given as slaves are to watch them strictly lest they observe any of their own ceremonies or follow in any way the “perfidy” of their fathers. Finally, as soon as Jewish children of both sexes reach the age of seven they are to be taken from their parents and given to Christians to bring up in the Christian faith, with the object of marrying them, when grown up, to Christian wives and husbands. Then with the customary thanksgiving and lex de confirmatione concilii, the proceedings of the council come to an end.

The acts of the seventh council of Toledo bring us to an end of the historical material available for these last years of the Gothic state. Just as the plot thickens and the interest reaches its highest point all information fails us. The nearest chronicler to the events of the last seventeen years of the Gothic rule is Isidore of Seville (circa 750), from whom only very scattered fragments are to be gleaned of the three last reigns. We learn from him, however, that in the aera 736, A.D. 698, Egica availed his son Wittiza with him in the government, and that in 701 Egica died at Toledo, and Wittiza succeeded to the kingdom. Later chroniclers add that Egica assigned Tuy in Galicia on the Minho to his brother-in-law, perhaps in order to keep the scarcely amalgamated Suevi in order. Coins are extant bearing the joint names of father and son, which is the case also with various laws in the Fuero Juzgo (Maden, ix. 33-36; Heflerich, 217, note).

The repudiation of his wife Cisilia by Egica is not mentioned before the 9th century (Chron. Albed. Expos. S. Gr. 449), and is sufficiently contradicted by C. Tol. xvii. 7. The war with the Franks appears first in Sebastian of Salamanca — "adversus Francos inurumpentes Gallias, ter praemium egit, sed triumphum nullum cepit." (apud Expos. S. Gr. 477). Sebastian seems to be supported by the externae gentes incursus of C. Tol. xvii. mentioned above, and it may be easily shown that some forays of Eudes of Aquitaine into Gallia Gothica may have led to these indecisive hostilities.

With regard to the general political meaning of the reign, it may perhaps be inferred from the acts of the three councils, and from the relation of Egica’s legislation generally to that of Ervig (Heflerich, 206 seq.) Dahn, Vite Aeth. 486), that Egica represented the Gothic party as opposed to what Heflerich calls the Byzantine-Roman party of Ervig and Julian, and that his relation to the church was not so docile a one as that of his predecessor. He appointed a Goth (Siesbert) for the first time to the see of Toledo upon Julian’s death in 690, an experiment repeated later in the appointment of Gunderich or Guethnerich, about 699. We may suppose him to have been less Romanised than Ervig—more of a barbarian, and Ervig certainly appears to have recognised him as the head of Wamba’s party, the Gothic and comparatively speaking anti-clerical party, when he attempted to buy his support by the hand of his daughter, and exacted from him the oath of protection towards his wife’s relations. But in the darkness of these times it is rash to attempt to lay down with any certainty the outlines of general politics, though no doubt by a careful sifting and comparison of all materials much has been done of late years in Germany to clear up difficulties, and more light may still be hoped for. (Acts of 15th, 16th, and 17th councils of Toledo in Aguirre, iv.; Gams, Kirchengesch. von Spanien, ii. 175, 181, 183; Hefele, Conc. Gesch. iii. 295, 318, 322; or Tejuda y Ramiro, Colec. de Con. ii. 598, 553, 588; Isid. Pacenso, Expos. S. Gr. viii.; Seb. of Salamanca, ii. 32; Chron. Albed. 62; Lucas of Tuy and Rod. of Toledo, apud Schott, Hist. Illustratae; Fuero Juzgo, Madrid Academy edition, 1815; Dahn, König. der Germanen, Vite Aeth. 218, 224; Vite Aeth. 468-561. For complete list of literature see the preface to Dahn’s Vite Aeth. For an inscription at Baylen containing Egica’s name, see Jason, Hist. Christ. Hübner, p. 55.) [M. A. W.]

Egidius (Aegidius, Gilles), nineteenth occupant of the see of Rheims, succeeding Mamainius (A.D. 565), not to be confused with the popular St. Gilles. [Aegidius] He was a liberal benefactor of his church, and hospitably received at Rheims Gregory of Tours, whom he consecrated to the office of bishop. But despite the zeal for his flock, eloquence, learning, and benevolence which Venantius Fortunatus discovered in him (ii. 20 in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 141), and his "amiranda sanctitas," commemorated by the biographer of St. Basulus (Acta SS. Ord. S. Benedicti. ii, 65, Paris, 1733), he was one of the most ambitious and intriguing prelates of his time. One of the first known acts of his episcopate was the consecration of Pro- mutius as bishop of Châlons, in contempt of the rights of Poppulus of Chartres, in whose diocese Châlons was situated. This was the occasion of the fourth council of Paris, from which emanated a letter of grave reproof to Egidius, and another of remonstrance to king Sigebert, who had encouraged the infringement. Upon the death of Sigebert in 575, and the accession of his infant son Childeric II. to the throne of Austrasia, he became largely mixed up with the plots and intrigues of the several Frank kingdoms. Employed on embassies, ostensibly on behalf of the young king, to his uncle Chilperic, to concert measures of hostility against Guntram, he contrived to ingratiate himself with Chilperic and the notorious Fredegond, in whose behalf he appears to have plotted against his kinsman. In the end he was the queen's hand-servant and haughty and unceasingly naturally especialy recommended him, and he was universally credited with aiding her in the murder of her stepson Merovechus (A.D. 577). In the end, however, he overreached himself, and became an object of suspicion. In A.D. 583 or 584, while he was in attendance on Childeric in his camp, the soldiery rose against him and the other adherents of the young king, and his life was saved only by instant flight to Rheims. A little later, being sent by Childeric on an embassy to Guntram, the latter openly upbraided him and, sent to his nephew to warn him against one who was forewarned, both to him and his father before him. The occasion of his downfall, however, was the conspiracy against Childeric of Rauschinus and Ursic, which he was suspected of having favored. For two times, by dint of his persuasive tongue and rich gifts, he reconciled himself to the king, but a little later, one of the conspirators, under the influence of torture, implicated him. He was arrested, but released again upon the remonstrances of the bishops against this indignity, and summoned to appear at the council of Metz, in the autumn of 590. The office of acusers was delegated to Eudoxius count of Tours, who charged him with being a friend and ally of Chilperic against his master and queen Brunichilde, and with receiving large sums of money as the price of treason. The bishop stoutly denied the charges, but the proofs derived from his letters and the evidence of his subordinates left no room for doubt. At evening the council was adjourned till the third day, at which he might have to say in justification. Upon the deceiving Egidius despairing of acquittal, pleaded guilty to the charge of high treason. Upon the intercession of the bishops his life was spared, but he was deposed from his see and exiled to Strasburg. The large treasure discovered in his palace was duly apportioned between the church and the royal treasury. He was succeeded by Romualdus (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. v. 13, vi. 3, 31, vii. 14, 33, ix, 14, x. 10; Flodoard, Hist. Eccl. Rom. ii, 2, 3, Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxv. 94, 97; Gall. Christ. ix. 14; Labbe, Sacr. Conc. ix, 865, x. 459, Florence, 1759-98). [S. A. B.]

EGILA (1), bishop of Osma from about A.D. 633 to 656. His signatures appear among those of the fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh councils of Toledo. To the eighth, being then probably old, he sent a priest, Godescalcus, to represent him. There is no trace of him in the ninth council, but in the tenth, A.D. 656, an abbat, Argefreudus, signs for him. (Esp. Sagraudo, vii. 289; Aguirre-Catalanii, iii. 385, 405, 413, 423.) [M. A. W.]

EGILA (2), bishop of Eliberi (?). In the Codex Emonianensus, a MS. of the 10th century, used by Florez in the Espafia Sagraudo, as one of his main authorities for the episcopal catalogues of the various sees up to that time (see Esp. Sagraudo, iii appendix xxxvi. for a description of it) the name of Egila appears in the catalogue of Eliberi is a position which seems to suit with the end of the 8th century. On these grounds only, the Egila of Eliberi has been identified with the Egila to whom pope Adrian I. addressed two letters in the years 781 and 782, and of whom he speaks in his letter to the Spanish see (785) in which the first mention of Adoptionism occurs. [ADOPTIONISTS.] Egila, however, was a common Gothic name, and on the whole the balance of evidence inclines against the identification of the Egila of Eliberi with the Egila of Adrian's letters. Very little is known of this last Egila, but that little raises one or two interesting points. According to Adrian's second letter (the only one in which the name is mentioned), Migne, Patr. Lat. xviii. 326, but the first in date, as it was a copy of one previously sent and lost on the way) Egila was ordained bishop by Wulcharius, archiepiscopus Galliarum (identified by Florez and others with Wilichar, archbishop of Sens, who signed the Lateran council of 789, and journeyed to Rome in 777. On this subject see Ceanni's notes in a contrary sense to Cod. Ca. Migne, xcviii. 410; see Ers. Migne, xcviii. 507; see also Stosi, 68.) "Quem benevolo et prudens, dominum et virum Je- stem dimitto," says Adrian, "de vestris ordinacionibus, atque auctoritatim dirigere vos pro orthodoxae Fidei, Sanctae Catholicae Ecclesiae praedicatione in partibus Spaniensis Provinciis." As to the nationality of Egila and the history and purpose of his consecration we shall have more to say presently. In the letter to the Spanish bishops the pope adds that he made it a condition of the pretended adoptionism that Egila should act only as reginian bishop "et nullam quamlibet sedem ambiret vel usurparat." After his arrival in Mohammedan Spain, the date of which is uncertain, Egila addressed a letter to Adrian, giving an account of his work, and asking for advice upon certain points. This letter, which is not extant, was carried to Rome by two messengers, who were to bring back the answer. From some unknown reason it did not reach Egila, and Egila applied to Charles the Great for help in the matter. Charles, through his Missus Peter, bishop of Pavia, requested the pope to send a copy of the former letter. Adrian did so in 783, writing also a fresh letter, in which he shortly admonished Egila to resist the attempts of the heretics who would overthrow his faith, and to observe the Saturday fast. The first letter, of which a copy was enclosed, and which was in answer to one from Egila, now lost, contained instructions on the following points: (1) the observance of Easter, with regard to which Adrian is informed that certain persons in Spain refuse to follow the rule laid down by the council of Trent. They do not keep the full moon on a Saturday, instead of celebrating Easter on the following Sunday, they postpone it to the Sunday after. (Hefele, Conc. Gesch. i. 315, ii. 590.) (2) The eating of things strangled, and of the blood of swine and other animals. The pope reports on Egila's authority that certain persons in Spain had denounced any one who refused to eat such things as "luxuriae inimicius." [EVMATIUS.] Adrian, however, forbids the practices, (3) Intercourse between believers and unbelievers. "Many calling themselves Catholics lead a common life with Jews and unbaptized pagans, both in eating and drinking, and in divers false doctrine, declaring that they are thereby in no way polluted." Such persons give their daughters in marriage "sacramentulibus," and their pseudo-sacerdotes ordained without preparation, marry women whose husbands are still living. All these, says Adrian, are Priscillianist errors. (4) Predestination and free will. Some say, "Why should we trouble ourselves to win everlasting life if, notwithstanding, all depends upon God only?"—and others say, "Why do we pray and lead us not into temptation, when our will is free?" Adrian lays down the orthodox doctrine. The letter winds up with an exhortation to Egila to be watchful and constant, lest old errors should break out afresh, and his own faith be overthrown. The next mention of Egila occurs in Adrian's letter to the Spanish bishops in 785. (Esp. Supr. v. app. or Migne, i.e.) From this we learn that Egila, whom Walcharius, according to Adrian, had "too much praised," had been led away by the errors of his master, Mingentius" [MENGITIUS], and the Spanish bishops are warned to grant him no authority or obedience.

Until 1729 this was all that was known of Egila. In that year Florez discovered a MS. in the cathedral library of Leon, containing the acts of a synod held at Cordova in 839 in consequence of a scandal committed by the clergy. This MS. is preserved in the archives of Cordova, and (temporarily) of Aegabo (Cabra), and by Quiricus, bishop of Accifundis, as to the proceedings of a heretical sect, "nomine Casianorum," within their dioceses. The tenets described in the acts are evidently those of the Monetians, though some new points are added which are not to be found in Eulipandus's letter to Migetius. (Esp. Supr. v. appendix, or Hefele, Conc. Gesch. ill. 588.) The heretics are described as Acephalos, i.e. separatists, vaga clerici. [ACEPHALE.] (Isidore gives two definitions of the word. It seems to be used here in the sense described in cap. 3, lib. ii. of the De Off. Ecc.] "Advancing little by little, by a tortuous road, from the sea-shore, they have entered Epagro in the territory of Aegabo (Esp. Supr. xi. 2), and have there practised their abominable rites in corners and caves, the authors of the evil-doing giving themselves out as sent from Rome (proponentes se a Roma missos) with their traditions, which are not agreeable to our doctrines. The passage which follows is extremely corrupt and defective, but it appears to be an argument against one who had assumed the position of bishop of the sect. The council declares that no one can be a bishop "quem nec clerus nec civium conventus eligat." It is a crime to believe that anyone can be a bishop who is without place and city, "quem nec clerus nec populus propriae civitatis exquisivit." The tenets of the heretics are then described. They refuse to be baptised, hoping for an imitatio dei. They were called Monetians by Adrian to Egila (3), and Eulipandus to Migetius, (Esp. Supr. v. 543, or Hefele, Conc. Gesch. iii. 589.) They fast on Christmas Day if they should fall on a Friday. They separate themselves from the Catholic church, thus following the example of Dathan and Ahabron. They refuse to venerate the relics of the saints. They baptise with saliva, saying, "in imitation of the miracle performed by Christ upon the deaf man. They boast of being saints, "se jaquant esse Sancti" (conf. Eulipandus to Migetius, i.e.), refuse to eat with others, and communicate out of different chalices at the sacrament. They are not to be admitted into the ministry of the church, for the synod cannot hold those who have been rightly ordained who said that Egila of Emerita was "ab Agilarnem Emeritae," which Gams, Kircchengesch. von Spanien, ii. 2, 314, reads "ab Agilanem Emeritae") had alone the right of conferring ordinations, which is against all sound doctrine. (Such seems to be the general sense of an extremely corrupt passage.) Further, on the synod anathematizes, "damnallem illam doctrinam cum suorum autores, vel Antifrasium illum Quericiurn cum sociis suis," and we are told that the sect had a church in the sandy waste lands near Epagro (arenas) dedicated to St. Casian, who, in the beginning of the acts is spoken of as "sector corum Casianus." In this curious and almost unintelligible document (fast uelucanzt, as Hefeler says, and not used by Hefele), it seems tolerably clear that Egila's followers are described, and that he himself and his successor, Huneric or Guneric, ordained by him are mentioned. The bishop of the sect has no particular see, his followers speak of themselves as sent from Rome, and the sect maintain the asceticism preached by Migetius, and controverted by Eulipandus, but very possibly supported by the St. John of the Synod, which is copied from Adrian's letter to Egila, in which those who eat unlawful foods, and those also who eat and drink with Jews and unbaptized pagans are anathematized. Two things may be inferred from these acts with regard to Egila: (1) that he was dead in 859; (2) that in all probability the tradition which connects him with the see of Elberii is a mistaken one, though what the word Eumenites is to be taken to mean is very doubtful. The name Casianisti, applied to the sect and their church of "St. Casian," are not altogether easy to explain. Eulipandus, however, calls Migetius "magister Casianorum et Salibanorum," which Hefele, taking it in connexion with the predestination errors mentioned by Adrian in his letter to the Spanish bishops in the same breath with Monetianism, interprets as referring to Cassian the semi-Pelagian. (The author of the Collationes was well known in Spain. Braulio possessed his works, and Fructuosus had some of the Collations, and asked Braulio for a loan of the rest [FRUCTUOUS, ST.]) Gams mentions two recognised saints of the name (A. G. ii. 2, 515), to one of whom he supposes the church to have been dedicated, but considering that the council expresily mentions Cacianus as auctor eorum, it seems most probable that their church was really dedicated to the founder of the semi-Pelagianists, whom they had made their patron saint. With regard to the connexion with Rome put forward by the sect, it should be remembered that Migetius taught that Rome was the centre of holiness, from which all good things came (Eipl. to Migetius, etc.) and that Egila was the envy of Adrian. Elipandus shows great jealousy of the Roman claims in his letter to Migetius, and Egila, a bishop consecrated abroad by permission from Rome, and appearing in their midst with an undefined position, and claims to superior authority, was probably extremely unpopular with the majority of the Spanish episcopate, which was at that time thrown into an attitude of hostility towards Rome and the empire by the influence of Adoptionism.

Of what country was Egila a native, and what is the real history of his consecration? Florero holds him to have been a member of one of the Gothic families of Galicia Narbonensis. Ferreras—in defiance of the documents—boldly makes him a priest of Eliberti, who journeys into France on the death of bishop Baldwin, to seek consecration from Wulcharius (Hist. Thes. d'Espagne, ed. D'Hermilly, ii. 511). It is at least a plausible conjecture that Egila may have been a native of Seville (or of the neighbouring Emerita?) the home of Migetianism, and that his connexion with Migetius may have begun before his journey to France, and may, in fact, have prompted it. The Spanish episcopate at the time was in a most unsatisfactory state. The right of nominating bishops had passed from the Visigothic kings to the Omaiades (Dozy, Hist. des Mussulmans d'Espagne, ii. 47), and the office was frequently sold to the highest bidder, with the natural result that many of the sees were filled with men of heretical beliefs and immoral lives. Alvaro of Cordova, in the 9th century, accuses Saul of Cordova of having paid a large sum to the emperors of the palace for his consecration (Ep. 13, Esp. Sagr. x. 169), and Samuel I. of Eliberti (Esp. Sagr. xii. 167), and Hostegisis of Malaga (Dozy, I.c.) are further instances of the degradation of the episcopate. On the other hand we have the renown of Charles the Great as the champion of the church and of Christendom. Elipandus's letter to him on behalf of Felix of Urgel (Esp. Sagr. x. 550) is a sufficient proof of the respect with which even the isolated and disaffected Adoptionist bishops regarded his position. It seems allowable, therefore, to take Egila's career, and to some extent Migetianism in general—as a protest against the disorganised and corrupt state of the Spanish church under the Mohammedans. He belonged apparently to a strict ascetic party, which disapproved of the various compromises effected between the rival religions, and especially resented the manner of ecclesiastical elections. Hence the journey into Charles's dominions, the consecration by Wulcharius, and the close connexion both with Charles and Rome, which the various Egila documents disclose. The whole story, with its strange sequel, throws a ray of curious light on Spanish ecclesiastical history during the 9th and 9th centuries. (Esp. Sagr. xv. preface. x. 2nd ed. Madrid, 1792, pp. 363, 525; Hellefich (Ad.), Der West-EGILWARD (2) (EGILWARD, AGILWARD, EGILBERT, EGILHART), fifth bishop of Würzburg, succeeding Linterich, and followed by Wolfgar. Little is known of him. He is stated to have received the episcopal office (episcopate munus) on June 16, 803, and Usameron understanding this expression to mean his episcopal consecration, assumes that the year must have been 804, (and not in 803) June 16 was a Sunday. According to the same authority he died April 24, 810. Gams also accepts these dates. (Usameron, Episcopatus Württerburgensis, 1794, i. 18; Gams, Ser. Episc. 324.) [C. H.]

EGINHARD, biographer of Charlemagne. [EINHARDS]

EGINO, twenty-first bishop of Constance, succeeded Johannes Ill. and was followed by Wolfhez (A.D. 781 to 813). At this time the traditional policy of the see was the annexion of the monastery of St. Gall. Egino threw himself into the contest with unscrupulous energy. By heavily bribing the nobles about the king he influenced Charlemagne in his favour, who tried to settle the quarrel by subjecting Waldo, the abbot, to the jurisdiction of the bishop. But Waldo refused to exchange the fief he owed to the king for obedience to any "villar persona," and preferred to withdraw to a neighbour monastery, of which he afterwards became abbot. Egino thereupon appointed a secular priest ("presbyterum forensis"), a tool of his own, to the abbey. The monks demurred, and Werdo, yielding, adopted the garb of a monk, and was then received. Henceforth the bishop and abbat together did very much as they wished with the monastery. (Kapferinus, de Concordia Mon. S. Galli, cap. iv. v.; Migne, Patr. Lat. cxixvi. 1053.)

We know nothing more of him than that he gave to the church of Constance a cross made of gold and silver and set with precious stones, on which were three dedicatory lines in Latin to the Virgin (Chronicon Constant. Jac. Manili, to be found in Pistorius, Beren German. Scriptores, tom. iii. p. 704; Gall. Christ. v. 896). [S. A. B.]

EGINO, bishop of Verona in 796. He gave up his see and retired to the monastery of Reichenal in 799, and died there in 802. (Cappellelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, x. 783.) He built and dedicated the church of St. Peter at Angia (Reichenal), where he was buried. (Herimann Angiensis Chronicus, in Pertz, Monum. v. 101; Bouquet, v. 365 G, E.) [A. H. D. A.]

EGLAF (Stobs, Regist. Soc. 168), bishop of Dunwich. [EGLAF.] [C. H.]

EGNACIUS (Colgan, Acta SS. 598, c. 4, Irish saint. [EDNICH.] [J. G.]

EGNATIUS (Cypr. Ep. 34, ed. Migne), uncle of Celerinus, martyr. [IGNATIUS.] [C. H.]

EGOALDUS (EPPOALDUS), twenty-fifth bishop of Geneva, succeeding Aridanus and followed by Albo. The compilers of the Gallia Christiana mention an unauthentic tradition that he was expelled from his see by Chilperic II., but restored later on, between 660 and 672, at the bidding of pope Vitalian. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 383.) [S. A. B.]

EGREAS (EGRAD, EGGRAD) appears in Caradoc's Life of Gildas (Albanus), as brother of St. Gildas [GILDA], son of Caw. With his brother Allaecus and sister Peteona, he renounced the world and retired into Somersetshire; there the three built monasteries for themselves near each other, and all at some distance from the monastery of their brother St. Maeog or Meilig, at Llows, in the rural deanery of Efael ("Lynheu in pago Eimal"). But Professor Rees is of opinion that Egreas, his brother, and sister, when they withdrew "in extremis partes regionis illius," went to Anglesey, in the extreme north-west of Wales, and are known as Eigrad, Galigo, and Peithen, their names being given to Llanefrog, Llanallgo, and perhaps Lingswy. In Myr. Arch. iii. 42, 51, he is called Eugrad, brother of Peirio at Rhooseirlo. (Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 15, wks. vi. 217; Rees, Welsh Saints, 298, 324; Glyn, Trans. Camb. antiq. Soc. i. 476; Lib. Landau. 399, 529; Skene, Celt. Scot. i. 116-118.) [J. G.]

EGRED, a son of Eata, and brother of Egbert, archbishop of York, and Eadberd king of Northumbria. When his brother Egbert went to Rome in early life, Egred accompanied him and died there. (Skeat, Hist. E. D. 1. ii. cap. iii.) [J. R.]

EGREGORI (Epyfropons, watchers), a name for angels, derived from Dan. iv. 13 (versions of Aquila and Symmachus) and used by Clement of Alexandria (Fac. ii. 9, p. 218). In the book of Enoch (Civireus, Comp. Hist. viii.) this title is given to the last of the angels who married the daughters of men (Gen. vi. 2), and so Suidas interprets epyfropons as denoting the sons of Seth. For the patristic references as to the names of the different orders of angels, see Coteleri (Const. Ap. viii. 12), and as to the interpretation of Gen. vi. 2, see Suicer (e. v. "Agγελοι", p. 38). [G. S.]

EGRIC (1), king of the East Angles. He was allowed by his kinsman Sigebert, who acquired the kingdom after the usurpation of Ricbert, to share his authority, and when Sigebert retired to his monastery, obtained the entire sway. When Penda invaded East Anglia, the people drew Sigebert from his monastery to assist them in battle, but he was slain, and Egric with him. Anna succeeded to the kingdom (Bed. H. E. iii. 18). There is great uncertainty about the dates of these events; they are noted by Florence of Worcester (M. H. E. 529) under the year 636, which may, perhaps, be the year of Anna's succession. Smith (on Bede, H. E. iii. 19) places the death of Egric and Sigebert in 635; and the same may be inferred from the evidence of the Liber Eliensis, which gives Anna, who fell in 654, a reign of 19 years (Lib. Eliensis. ed. Stewart, p. 23), but places the fall of Egric in 637 (ib. p. 14). If, as seems probable, bishop Felix began his ministry in East Anglia as early as 630, the whole reign of Egric will fall within the period of his episcopate. [B.]

EGRIC (2) (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann. '71 in EGRILUS

M. H. B. 364 a, also in Twysl. x Scriptt. col. 107, "Egrie et Lector;" Chron. de Mailros, ed. Stevenson, "Egrie lector"), reader. [ECRIC.] [C. H.]

EGRILUS (AGRICOLA), martyr at Caesarea in Cappadocia, commemorated Nov. 2 (Hieron. Març.; Tillen. Men. iv. 812; Migne, Hagiogr.) [C. H.]

EGRYN is given by Professor Rees (Welsh Saints, 71, 304) among the Welsh saints of the latter half of the 7th century, as the son of Gwyrd Drwn ab Gwdrog of the line of Cadell Dyrvallog, and founder of Llanegryn, Merionethshire (Myn. Arch. ii. 40). [J. G.]

EGTAN, king of the Scoti (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1013, in M. H. B. 777). [AIDAN.] [C. H.]

EGULF (Wend. F. H. ann. 675, ed. Coxe), bishop of London. [EGULF.] [C. H.]

EGUALD (1), a bishop witnessing a spurious charter of Cadwalla, king of Wessex, Aug. 3, 683, bestowing land at Selsey on Wilfrid for a monastery. The charter bears the signature also of Archbishop Brihtwald, who was not consecrated until 693 (Kemble, C. D. 992). Perhaps the forger intended ECKENWALD bishop of London. [C. H.]

EGUALD (2) (Kemble, C. D. 104), abbat. [EGUALD.] [C. H.]

EGWALD is placed by Professor Rees (Welsh Saints, 298, 330) among the Welsh saints of the first part of the 7th century, as son of Cyaddilig ab Ceunyd ab Gildas, and as founder of Llanegwd and Llansmwedd, Carmarthenshire. [J. G.]

EGWALT, abbat. [EGWALT (2).]

EGWIN (EGWINE, EGWINE, EGWIN), third bishop of Worcester (M. H. B. 623), and founder of the abbey of Evesham. He is not mentioned by Bede; his history has therefore to be made out of the very questionable biographies, the Chronicles and Cartulary of Worcester, and the History of Evesham.

According to Florence of Worcester, he succeeded to the see in 692 (M. H. B. 539), and died in 717 (3. 341). The first date probably requires correction, as the names of Brihtwald archbishop of Canterbury and Offor bishop of Worcester occur in the same charter of Oshere (Kemble, C. D. 36; Hadden and Stubbs, iii. 232); Brihtwald only returned from France in 693, and must have been archbishop when Egwin was appointed. Egwin's name does not appear in dated charters before the year 704, in which the caldorman Ethelward, with the consent of Coenred, king of Mercia, granted him lands at Ambersley for his church at Crouchame (Kemble, C. D. 56; Hadden and Stubbs, iii. 279). All the Evesham charters are liable to the charge of spuriousness, and cannot be cited safely. The name of Egwin appears, however, in some Worcester grants which are of better authority: in a grant of Ethenward and Ethelheard to Cudewirtha, which is also attested by Coenred (Kemble, C. D. 53); and in a gift of Ethelwald to the "family" at Worcester of land at Salwarp, which must belong to 716 or 717, as Ethelwald's reign began in the former year, and Wilfrid, Egwin's successor, was in office in 718 (Kemble, C. D. 67, 69).

The evidence is thus very slender, but so far as it goes, it tends to establish the dates given by Florence. Egwin took part in the council of Cloveshore in 716, in which the privilege of Wilhred was confirmed (Hadden and Stubbs, iii. 300).

The biographers are much more circumstantial. According to these, Egwin was a member of a royal house in Mercia, who had quitted the world and become a priest in the days of Ethelred, and, against his will, was appointed by the wishes of king, clergy, and people to the see of Worcester. In this office he was very zealous, converted the heathen, enforced the sanctity of marriage, and preached strongly in favour of reform in morals. By his strictness in the last point he lost his popularity, and complaints against him were laid before both the king and the pope. He determined to clear himself at Rome, and therefore set out thither, having first bound his feet with iron fetters, fastened by a key which he throw into the Avon. On his arrival at Rome he was lodged by St. Peter's, and prepared to celebrate Mass; whilst he was doing so, his servants brought a fish in the belly of which the key was found. Egwin then released himself from his fetters, presented himself to the pope, and, having obtained from him a favourable determination of his cause, returned home, where he was immediately restored to his see, and undertook the tuition of the king's sons. His next act was to obtain from Ethelred a gift of land on which he built the monastery of Evesham, so called from the shepherd Eves, who had seen in the wood where the monastery was built a vision of three holy virgins, one of whom was the Blessed Virgin Mary. The apparition was reported to Egwin, who went to the place, saw the same vision, and determined to build there. From Ethelred he obtained also the gift of an old monastery at Flandbury. Coenred, Ethelred's successor, was a close friend of Egwin, and gave him more land in the vicinity of his monastery. After the death of Aldhelm, whom he buried at Malmesbury, Egwin went to Rome in 709 with Coenred of Mercia and Offa of Essex. On this second journey he obtained from pope Constantine a great privilege of exemption for Evesham in the consecration of his monastery; Egwin is said to have been assisted by St. Wilfrid, a story which, if it contains any vestige of truth, shews that Evesham was dedicated before the second visit to Rome, and not in 714, to which year it is referred by the biographer. After this work was completed, Egwin devoted himself to sacred studies and preaching. The castle of Alcester, which was inhabited by men who despised his preaching, was destroyed by an earthquake. The biographer gives his last words to his disciples, and gives as the day of his death Dec. 30, about the year 720. Such is a sketch of Egwin's career as described in the life written by a monk of the 11th century, and printed by Mabillon. There is another life, ascribed without authority to one Brihtwald, who was not, as has been supposed, the archbishop of that name, which is said to have been written based on Egwin's own narration; this is still unprinted, but fragments are given by Mabillon, and in Wright's Biographia Literaria, pp. 228, 229. It seems to contain much the same matter.
but more copiously told, and apparently with more regard for chronological probabilities. It is described by Macray in his preface to the Chronicle of Evesham (pp. xii. sq.), where also is a full account of the legendary materials for Egwin's life.

According to Florence of Worcester, Egwin died Dec. 30, 717, Wilfrid, his successor, having been appointed before his death (M. H. B. 541).

[S.]

EGWULF, the seventh bishop of London (H. M. B. 617), and successor of Ingwald, who died in 745 (Sleman. in M. H. B. 695). Egwulf was present at the council held at Clovesho in 747 (Hadda and Stubbs, iii. 360); and his name appears among the subscriptions to charters of 748 and 758 (Kemble, C. D. 98, 193), and to a grant of Osa to Worcester, which, being attested also by archbishop Jaelbert, must be dated at least as 766. His successor, Wighed, is first heard of in 772. (Hadda and Stubbs, iii. 402.)

[S.]

EGYPTIANS, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO. [GOSPEL, APOSTHIAL.]

EHOARN, hermit and martyr in Brittany, cir. a.d. 520, mentioned in the anonymous Vita of Gildas the Senesch (cap. vii. § 40, in Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 965). He dwelt in a cell adjoining the church of the monastery of St. Gildas de Rhuis in the diocese of Vannes, placed by the Sammarthani on the coast south of Vannes (Gall. Christ. xiv. 1, map), but by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Feb. ii. 586) on the left bank of the Ilave. Ehoarn's abode was broken into by a band of robbers, one of whom, Leonardus, dashed out the hermit's brains with an axe on the threshold of the church. He was commemorated Feb. 11.

[C. H.]

EHRENFRIED (Gams, Sscr. Episc. 271), bishop of Constance. [EHRENFRID.] [C. H.]

EIBEACHTA, one of St. Patrick's attendants (Four Mast. a.d. 448). [J. G.]

EICHBERICHT (Ann. Ul. A.D. 728), Egbert the priest. [EGBERT (S).] [J. G.]

EIDDIGHRN, abbat of the monastery of Docunmus, in the diocese of Llandaff. He witnessed several grants to that see in the time of St. Oudocus, but the site of his monastery is unknown (Lib. Land. by Rees, 381–87).

[J. G.]

EIDDILFRED, clerical witness to the grant of the village of Is-pant by Cuchein, son of Glywi, to Guodolouc bishop of Llandaff in the 6th century (Lib. Land. by Rees, 415).

[J. G.]

EIDDILG, Welsh saint. [IDDAWEN.] [C. H.]

EIGEB, the legendary accounts of Wales, has the honour of being regarded as the first female saint among the Britons. She was the daughter of Caradog (Curnacenn) ab Bru, the chief of the Silures, who fought so long and manfully against the Roman legions in the middle of the 1st century, and obtained the favour of the emperor Claudius, who carried him captive to Rome to grace the imperial triumph.

Eigeb was married to Sarillog, lord of Caer-

Sarillog, now Old Sarum. If any reliance is to be put upon the legend (and difficulties surround it on all sides), Eigeb was the daughter who, with her mother and uncles, was made captive and conveyed to Rome, as related by Tacitus (Ann. Lib. xii. c. 33 sq.), and was liberated with her father and friends. (On the whole question, as treated in the Welsh Triads, see Rees, Welsh Saints, sec. iv. 17 sq.)

[J. G.]

EIGILWARD, bishop of Würzburg. [EIGILW.
ORD.]

EIGRAD, Welsh saint. [EGRAS.

EIGRION is enumerated among the many sons of Caw the father of Gildas, and founded a church in Cornwall in the 6th century (Rees, Welsh Saints, 230).

[J. G.]

EILUNWY, a Welsh saint in the first half of the 7th century, was brother of Drydaw, and son of Heliog Fael ab Glanawg; he thus belonged to Carnarvonshire, but has left no trace in feast or church dedication (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 599; Rees, Welsh Saints, 298).

[J. G.]

EIMBETHA (EINBETTA), ST., a virgin, commemorated with two others, Vorvetta and Villibetta, on the 18th of September. They are unknown to the older martyrologies, but in the Auctaria of Molanus to that of Usuard occur the words "In territorio Argentinensi (in Alsace) sanctae Einbeth virginis, præclarae sanctitatis" (Bligny, Patr. Lat. cxxiv. 478). The legend is that they were three of the companions of St. Ursula left by her to tend St. Aurelian when the fell sick of a fever on the return journey from Rome to Cologne (Boll. Acta SS. Sept. v. 315).

[S. A. B.]

EIMHIN (EMIN, EVIN), son of Eoghan, bishop of Ros-glas and Ros-mic-Triuin, commemorated Dec. 22. The name is evidently a phonetic form of the Irish aimhinn [pron. evin], joyous, delightful, beautiful, written with m aspirated (aimhín), instead of b, or without aspiration (aimhín and aimhín (Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 2 ser. p. 63). An account of this saint is given in the Life of St. Corbanus (Mar. 29), his brother, which Colgan (Acta SS. 761) has abridged from the Book of Leinster and rendered into Latin. [CORBAEG (S).] He belonged to Muster for birth, and was son of Eoghan, son of Murcadh, of the race of Fiacha Muilethan, son of Eoghan Mor, son of Oiliill Olum; his mother was Iamhna, daughter of Sinell (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 345). According to the Life of St. Corbanus he left Muster for the province of Leinster, and when on the banks of the Barrow, in a town near the top of the frith, he built his noble monastery, the place being formerly called -Rog-mic-Treoin or Ros-mic-Triuin, and now New Ross, in the county of Wexford. There he EINHARDUS, EINHARD (Einhard) is not found in contemporary documents, biographer of Charlemagne. He was the son of Einhard and Eulgilritta, persons of good birth and station in Francia, was born circa 780, and received his education in the monastery of Fulda. He is described as of small stature "homuncilo," "statura despicabilis" (Walfrid, *Prot. in Einhardi Vitam Car. ap. Jaffé, Monum. Car. 507–8), and there are epigrams extant by Alcuin and others directed against him on this account. (*Mon. Car. 492, and Wattenbach, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen, vol. i. 139.) He married Emma or Imma, sister of Bernhard bishop of Worms. (*Einh. Epist. 3, Jaffé.) The tradition that Emma was the daughter of Charlemagne, and the romance of Eginhard and Emma do not date before the 12th century. (*Mon. Car. 492, note 6; Hist. Pet. de Charlemagne, par Gaston Paris, pp. 404–5.)

His intelligence and industry soon made him known at Fulda, and he was sent by the abbot Bernulf to the court of Charles the Great, and Theodulf of Mopsuestia, and the latter became most intimate with the king, who looked upon him as a son. He was distinguished also as a craftsman, probably in the precious metals, whence he got the literary name of Beziebel (*Exodus xxil. 2, xxiv. 30) at Charles's court. In one of his letters he speaks (*Ep. 56, Jaffé) of his studies in Vitruvius, and appears to have superintended some of Charles's architectural works, though it is doubtful whether he possessed any architectural skill himself (cf. Jaffé, 490 note, and Wattenbach, i. 140). His removal to Charles's court probably took place after 791, for there are six documents in the Codex Dipl. Fuldensis (cited by Jaffé, 488) written by Einhard, the latest of which is dated Sept. 12, 791. Einhard was an important personage at the Frankish court, and was charged, amongst other duties, with ordering the annals of the court (see below). In 806 he went on a mission to the pope with regard to a proposed scheme for the division of the empire (*Einh. Ann. s. a. *), and in 813 it was at his advice that Lewis was nominated emperor (*Nigellii Carm. ap. Pertz, Script. ii. 479).

Einhard's position suffered no diminution as Charles's death. Lewis made him counsellor to Lothar, the young emperor, in 817, and in 830 he acted as a mediator between father and son. His public life, however, had become less active during these latter years; several abbots had at different times been conferred upon him (*Mon. Car. 493–494), especially that of Michelstadt is the Odenwald, to which, and from 828 onwards to Mullainheim (Seiligenstein on the Main), he began to retire more and more from court and the world.

To the latter place he had transferred his precious relics of SS. Marcellinus and Petrus, and there his wife Emma died in 836, and Einhard himself on March 14, 840. (For the date, Jaffé, 499, note 6.) His epitaph by Rabas Maurus is extant, e.g. in Jaffé, 506. Besides the Vita Caroli and the Annales attributed to him Einhard is the author of a Libellus de suppliciis crucis (not now extant), and a treatise De trast-
Einion and Einthea

There was a late inscription on the tower of Llanengan containing the words Eincawm rex Walliae, and the name Einiau occurs on an inscribed cross at Margam in Glamorganshire (Hübner, Inscr. Brit. Christ. No. 73): "Einiau pro anima Guergoret fecit." Einion's festival day was February 9.

[From ETHNE]

Einon (Eithne, Ethne) appears to have been a common name among the women of Ireland, so that we find it often among the saints and the mothers of the saints (Colgan, Acta SS. 416; Reeves, Almanac, p. lx.).

(1) Daughter of Bait, Mar. 29. On this day are commemorated in Mart. Dom. (by Todd and Reeves, 89) "Eithne and Sodhelabh, two daughters of Bait, by the side of Sord Coluim Cille;" the entry in Mart. Talleght (Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. p. xx.) is "Ingena Baite, quee nutribient Christum, Ethne osce Sodheliba nomina earum." Colgan (Acta SS. 785) gives some account of the two virgins Ethne and Sodheliba, daughters of Aith, king of Ireland, and says that they were killed about or after the middle of the 6th century, but he thinks that Bait may have been a surname of Caireb his grandfather (To. 416 n. 1), or that "daughters of Bait" should be interpreted as "daughters of ardent charity," from the love they bore to Christ, who is said by Cath. Maguire, in his Additions and Scholion to the Felic of Lencog, to have come into their arms in the form of an infant to be embraced and kissed. They and their sister Cumian were daughters of Aith, son of Caireb, king of Leinster; and we read in the Life of St. Machog (Jan. 31), bishop of Ferns, how that bishop visited them, and how the ox he brought with him to plough their land, and gave to a leprous woman, had his plow supplied by sea, and that daily came up from the sea. No account is given of their own dates, but their grandfather Caireb, son of Cormac, died a.D. 549 according to the Four Mast. Their chief festival is Mar. 29, but others are appropriated to them. Their abode called Tech-inen-baite, or the House of the daughters of Bait or Charity, was near Swords in the barony of Nethercross, co. Dublin, and Killnais, another place where their memory was honoured, seems to have been near the same (Kelly, Cal. Ir. Saints, 108). Lanigan (Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 14, § 7) affirms only the certainty of their being distinguished by their piety, and of their living in a nunnery, "but the history of Ethne, Sodheliba, and Cumian, and whether such were the names of the holy daughters of king Aith, or how many were these daughters, is so involved in the obscurity of jarring documents, that I shall do no more than refer to Colgan who treats of them at Mar. 29."

(2) The Fair, daughter of Laegaire. Colgan (Acta SS. 54–6, 415–6) at Jan. 11, and Feb. 26, has given extracts from the Lives of St. Patrick regarding the two daughters of king Laegaire, named Ethne the Fair and Fedelim the Ruddy, who, he thinks, may be commemorated on these days, though in the calendars there are merely the names, without place or parentage. The story of the two sisters Ethne and Fedelmina is given at less or greater length in Colgan's Third, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh Lives of St. Pat. Seen, Conveyed to Thomas (Book of Armagh, fol. 12 A.). Colgan places it in a.d. 432. King Lochaire had sent his two daughters to Connacht to be under the charge of two Druids or Magi, named Mael and Caplit. St. Patrick had come to the royal cemetery of Crochan or Cruachan, now Rathcoroghany, the very ancient residence of the kings of Connacht in Roscommon. On the side of the fort there was a well called Clebach, and when St. Patrick and his attendants or synod of bishops were assembled there one morning at sunrise, the two virgins came early to the well to wash, and, finding St. Patrick and his companions there, the young maidens thought they were supernatural beings. St. Patrick, however, entered into conversation with them, as related by Tirenach, and the result was that they believed and were baptized; and on their departing, the bishop they received the sacrifice of Christ and soon passed in death to see the Unseen. They were buried beside the well of Clebach, and upon them was placed a Farta, Relec, or sepulchral mound, which became the property of St. Patrick and his successors. The two Druids, their guardians, were also converted by St. Patrick. (Tod. St. Patrick, 451-55; O'lanlon, Irish Saints, i. 183-71, ii. 716; Skeen, Celt. Scot. ii. 108-9; O'Curry, Lect. Anc. Ir. ii. 201-2.)

(3) Daughter of Cormac or of Manius, virgin, commemorated July 6. The Mart. Tallaght. (Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. p. xxvii.) has on this day "Tri inenna Maíne in Airidh-Bóinne, i.e. Cormac ete ocus Cúmmín," and Mart. Doney. (by Todd and Reeves, 189) has "Dormor, daughter of Maíne, of Aridh Baine," also as a separate entry "Etne, and Cummann." To this last Dr. Todd (p. 189 n.) has appended the note, "Etne and Cummann vás both virgins and sisters, daughters of Cormac, son of Ailill, of the race of Cathair Mór, king of Ireland (Sanct. Gen., B. of Leom)." But Colgan in his note, commenting upon the story, in the Tripartite Life, concerning the chiefman Manius and his wife being converted, and of the latter who was blessed by St. Patrick, bearing "duis prætos fœdemalem," accepts the reading of the Martyrology of Tallaght that there were three daughters, and that July 6 was their feast (Tr. Thum. 149, c. 2, 1184 n., 270, col. 1). Cormac, son of Ailill, died a.d. 535, according to the Four Masters.

EITHRAS has no pedigree given him among the Welsh saints; it is merely stated that he was one of Cadfan's companions, when the latter came from Armoric into Britain in the beginning of the 6th century, and that afterwards he was with Hennawy in Bardsey (Myg. Arch. ii. 24, 40; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 594, 595; Rees, Welsh Saints, 213, 234).

ELADIUS, St. (HELADIUS), fourth bishop of Anzorre, cir. a.d. 387. He followed St. Valerianus, ruled for twenty-three years, and was succeeded by St. Amator, whom he had admitted to the priesthood, and who wrote his Acta. He is commemorated on May 8. (Gall. Christ. xii. 262; Acta SS. Mai. viii. 300.)

ELAETH, surnamed Frenhin or Vrenin "the king," was a bard and saint, but though his genealogy is traced to Coel Godogog, and thus is purely Welsh, Elaeth is only found in his latter days living in Wales. In the Pedigrees of the Saints it is said:—"Elaeth (king) was the son of Meyric, the son of Idno; and Onnengrec, daughter of Gwallawg, son of Lleeanawg, was his mother." He seems to have been in early life a chieftain in the north, and, on being driven from his possessions, to have found refuge in the monastery of Bangor, or in Seiriol's College at Penmon in Anglesey, in the middle of the sixth century, or, according to others, in the seventh. He was founder and patron of the parish church of Amlwch on the north coast of Anglesey. His festival is November 10. As a bard there are several poems attributed to him. The Myvyrian Archaiology, i. 161, has a collection of Moral Triplets. From the Black Book of Carmarthen (fol. 35 b), Dr. Skeen (Four Ancient Books of Wales, i. 501-503, ii. 35-37) has printed The Myvyrian of Elaeth, an elegy on seven stanzas, and another poem of the same length, both written in a strain of deepest piety; in the latter he says he loves "to praise Peter, who can bestow true peace," and, "in every language is, with hope acknowledged as the gentle, high-famed, generous porter of heaven." (Myv. Arch. ii. 25, 40-1; Rees, Welsh Saints, 271; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 596; Skeen, Four Anc. Books of Wales, i. 19, ii. 344.)

ELAFIUS (1), a British chief who appears in the story of Germanus returning to Brittany to put down the Pelagian heresy. Hearing a rumour of the saint's coming, Elafius went to meet him, taking his son, who was suffering from a withered leg, and all the country flocked after him. Germanus and his company of priests arrived; the youth was healed by their prayer, and by this miracle the Catholic faith was confirmed in the minds of the people. See the life of Germanus by Constantius, copied by Bede and subsequent writers. (Bed. H. E. i. 21; Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. in M.H.B. 709; Boll. Acta SS. Jul. vii. 216; Baron. Annal. ann. 435, xvii.)

ELAFIUS (2) (Ruricius, Epp. ii. 7, in Patr. Lat. viii. 86), founder of a church. [ELAFIUS.]

ELAFIUS (3) (Greg. Tur. H. F. v. 41), bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne. [ELASius.]

ELAGABALUS, the short reign of this feeble and profligate emperor, though not presenting any points of direct connexion with the history of the Christian church, is not without interest as a phase of the religious condition of the empire. His grandmother, Julia Moesa, was the daughter of a Phoenician named Bassianus. Her sister, Julia Domna, became the second wife of the emperor Septimius Severus, and was the mother of M. Aurelius Antoninus Augustus, commonly known as Caracalla, and of Geta. By her husband, Julius Avitus, Moesa had two daughters, Julia Soemia and Julia Mammea, of whom the former became the mother of Elagabalus by Sextus Varuis Marcellus, and the latter the mother of Alexander Severus by Gessius Marcianus.
ELAGABALUS

The name given to the young prince on his birth, Varius Avitus Bassianus, recorded the main facts in the genealogy just given. He was born at Emesa, in Syria, about A.D. 205. Both his mother and his aunt were devoted to the worship of El-gabal (= God the Creator, or, according to another but less probable etymology, God of the Mountains), and he and his cousin Alexander Severus were in early childhood consecrated as priests in the temple of that deity in his native city, and the young Bassianus took the name of the god to whom he ministered. On the murder of Caracalla by Macrinus, his grandmother, who had shared with her sister Julia Domna the splendour of the imperial court, was compelled to retire into Syria, where she watched for an opportunity of revenging herself on the usurper and regaining her lost power. The discontent caused among the troops of the empire by the rigid discipline of Macrinus presented an opening which she was not slow to use. A report was circulated that Caracalla was the real father of the son of Soemia. Largesses were given to the soldiers stationed on the Phoenician border, and they received the boys, with his mother and grandmother, into their camp, and saluted him by the title of M. Aurelius Antoninus, on the 16th of May, A.D. 218. Macrinus, after an unsuccessful attempt to quell the revolt by sending Julianus with a body of troops, came in person, was defeated in a pitched battle on the border of Syria in Phoenicia, and after an attempt to escape in disguise was taken and put to death. A letter was at once despatched in the name of the young prince to the Roman senate, in which, without even waiting for their formal consent, he assumed all the titles of imperial sovereignty, Caesar, Imperator, Pius, Felix, Augustus, with the tribunitian authority, and with vague promises of reform declared that he proposed to himself to follow in the footsteps of the first and greatest of the emperors. Neither senate nor people offered the slightest opposition; and when the Flavii Arvales met in the Capitol on the 14th of July, within five weeks after the death of Macrinus, they offered up their prayers for the welfare and prosperity of the new emperor.

The letter was written from Antioch, where the young emperor for some time held his court. His mother would seem to have been simply a devotee of the Syrian sun-god, but his aunt Julia Maximae had more eccentric tendencies, and by her invitation the great Origen came to Antioch (probably, however, after the death of Elagabalus), and was received with many marks of honour. Eusebius, who relates the fact (Hist. E. vi. 21), speaks of her as a woman of exceptional piety (πολίτις θεοφανεστάτης εἶ καὶ τε ἐλαία γεγομενή), and we may legitimately trace her influence in the character of her son Alexander Severus. [SEVERUS].

After spending some time at Nicomedia, where he settled on his return from Antioch, the young emperor proceeded in A.D. 219 (we may note, in passing, that it was the year in which Callistus succeeded Zephyrinus as bishop of Rome) to the capital. His short reign there may be described as a frenzy of idolatrous impurity. He laid the foundation of a splendid temple on the Palatine in honour of his patronymic god, and transferred thither the conical stone which had been the symbol of his divinity at Emesa, and which was now carried to its new abode in a triumphal chariot, drawn by the six white horses and driven by the emperor himself. To that temple was also brought the sacred stone of Cybele from Pessinus, and the image of the Syrian Astarte from Carthage. Preparations were made for celebrating the nuptials of that goddess with the sun, and a heavy tax was levied on the people of Rome to defray its expenses. The dignity of the senate was outraged by his nominating a council of women, over which his mother was to preside. As if disposed to recognise the religion of his Jewish subjects, he abstained from swine's flesh and accepted the rite of circumcision, while, at the same time, dark stories were current as to his offering boys in sacrifice, in order that he might divine the future by the inspection of their viscera.

The subserviency of the senate and people of Rome to the master of the legions, so long as he could count on the support of the Praetorian soldiers, led them to tolerate even these enormities. His jealousy and suspicion caused him to imprison his cousin Alexander Severus, whose virtue attracted the admiration both of soldiers and people, and whom, in deference to his mother's advice, he had adopted and proclaimed as Caesar soon after his arrival in Rome, and the troops rose and rescued their favourite. The two sisters, each with her son, appeared at the head of their supporters, and the followers of Severus were victorious. Soemia and the boy-emperor were thrown into the Tiber (hence the epithet Tiberinus afterwards attached to him in derision), and the senate met and branded his name with eternal infamy. (Dion Cass. lxxvii. 30-41, lxix.; Herodian, v. 4-23; Lapid. Faks. 9, 12, 7, 12; Auct. Victor, de Caes. xxiii. Epit. xxiii.)

[II. B. P.]

ELAIR (ELARIUS, HILLARIUS, HILLARIUS), of Inis Locha-Cre, commemorated Sept. 7. This saint is commemorated in the Mart. Donuc. and Mart. Tallaght on this day. To him was dedicated the church built upon the island in Lough Cre; this lough is now a bog, with the ruins of the well-known church still standing in it, in the middle of Monashinch or Mounshinch, from which the bog takes its name, in the parish of Corbally, barony of Ikerrin, and county of Tipperary. The ruins stand about two miles south-east of Roscrea. St. Elair, anchoret and scribe of Loch-Cre, died A.D. 802 (recte 807) according to the Four Mast. (by O'Donovan, 412 n. 1, 413, the note giving an account of Loch-Cre and its ruins; Irish Kenniss, by Todd and Herbert. 216 n. 1; Lanigan, Eccles. Hist. Ir. iv. c. 30, § 15; Skene, Celt. Scit. ii. 253). But Colgan treats Elair of Loch-Cre as one with Elair or Hilary, nephew of St. Columba by Sinch St. Columba's sister. This other Elair was son of Fintan, descended from Cian, son of Oillil Olum, and hence was one of the Moekeine; but though placed by Colgan on Sept. 7, both this and the connecting him with Loch-Cre have sprung from Colgan's desire to find a place in the calendars for the nephew of St. Columba. (Colgan, Tr. Trans. 478 n. 4, 479 n. 23, 490 n. 11.)

ELANO, bishop of Menerva, now St. David's, but possibly the same as Elvaed (Stubbbs, Reg. Sacr. Angl. 155).
ELAPHIUS (1), a notary to whom, in reward for his services, Gregory Nazianzen bequeathed some articles of clothing and twenty pieces of gold. (Greg. Naz. Testam. 203, in Migne, Patr. Gr. xxxvii. 394.) [E. V.]

ELAPHIUS (2), a gentleman residing in a castle among craggy rocks, in the diocese of the Ruthenian (Rodez), addressed by Sidonius Apollinaris bishop of Auvergne (Sid. Apol. Ep. iv. 15, in Patr. Lat. Iviii. 520). Elaphius had built a church on his estate, but as the diocese was without a bishop, like many other dioceses in the south of Gaul then in Gothic occupation (G., vii. 6), he requests Sidonius to come and consecrate it. Sidonius consents, and hopes, in common with the Ruthenians, that Elaphius, now offering altars for himself, may one day offer sacrifices for them. This was a hint of the priestly office, or even perhaps, considering Elaphius's rank and the dearth of bishops, of the episcopate, and so Cellier understands it, who adds an excellent confirmation an epistle that Eutropius, bishop of Limoges, addressed “Domino sublimi semperque magnifico fratri Elaño” (Rur. Ep. ii. 7, in Patr. Lat. Iviii. 86). The lists do not sustain the inference (Cellier, Ant. Sacr. x. 382.). [C. H.]

ELAPHIUS (3), bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne. [ELAUNCHIUS.]

ELAPIUS (ELAPHIUS), fifteenth bishop of Poitiers, succeeding Adelphius and followed by Daniel, about A.D. 535 to 540. His name only appears in the list of the bishops of that diocese (Coll. Christ. ii. 1154; Le Conte, Ann. Ecol. Fran. ann. 533, n. xii., tom. i. p. 402.) [S. A. B.]

ELASIPPIUS, Melasippus, and Speusippus, “jurgemini frateres,” were Cappadocians by birth, horse-breakers by profession, and martyrs in the reign of Trajan. They were still heathens at the age of 25, when, having invited their grandmother Neanilla to a feast, she discovered of Christ while they made offerings to Jupiter. Convinced by her words, they rose from table and broke their idols in pieces. In vain their masters sought to reconvey them, and after cruel tortures the brothers suffered death in a furnace. They were commemorated on Jan. 17 in the church of Langres, whether their relics were subsequently conveyed (Bas. Menot; Mort. Adon., Usuard.; Acta SS. Jan. ii. 76-80). [C. H.]

ELASIVUS (ELAPHIUS), ST., seventeenth bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne, succeeding Tattonius and followed by his brother, St. Lendomer, was a native of Limoges. He is said to have granted large estates to his church, and to have obtained the subscription of Egidius, archbishop of Rheims to the deed of gift (see Bull. Acta SS. Aug. iii. 747). He died of fever, with which he was seized while on an embassy from Queen Brunhilda to Spitalk, i.e. A.D. 590. His remains were brought back to Châlons for burial, and were translated in A.D. 1164 to the church of St. Pierre-aux-Monts in the same diocese. He is commemorated Aug. 19. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. v. 41; Bull. Acta SS. Aug. iii. 747; Gall. Christ. ix. 862.) [S. A. B.]

ELAVE, bishop of Meneria, possibly the same as ELVAUD (Stubbs, Reg. Sacr. Angli. 155). [J. G.]

ELBODG (Annal. Camb. ann. ccclxv. i.e. A.D. 808, in M.H.B. 884), ELBODUGUS (Annal. Camb. ann. ccclxv. i.e. A.D. 768, in M.H.B. 834), ELBOT (Brut y Tywysog, in M.H.B. 843; Nenn. Hist. init. in M.H.B. 47 b), archbishop of Gwynedd. [ELBODG.] [C. H.]

ELBODUS, ST., became bishop (or archbishop) of Bangor in 755, and induced the people of North Wales to adopt the Roman cycle of Easter, the one really important revolution in the Welsh church from the 5th century to the 12th. The bishops of South Wales refused to comply, and the dispute continued until 777, when the time of Easter was altered there also. On Elbodus's death, in 809, the controversy was again renewed, and there is reason to think that the Welsh were still slow to surrender their ancient custom (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils i. 148, 203-4).

Nennius used the nineteen years' cycle which Elbod had introduced; but it is first used in the Liber Landavensis under the year 1022, and by the credo y Tywysogion, 1005, and by both erroneously. Ussher traces the last echo of the British Easter controversy in a statement of the anonymous Life of St. Crysostom, written about 950, which says that certain clerics of those who dwell at the ends of the earth amid the ocean, came to Constantinople in the days of the patriarch Methodius (842-847), to inquire of certain ecclesiastical traditions, and the perfect and exact computation of Easter. [C. W. B.]

ELBIVALD, king of the East Angles. [ELFIVALD.]

ELCHASAI. [ELKERASAI.]

ELCWOULD, styled by William of Malmesbury (G.R.A. i. § 87, ed. Hardy) to have been king of East Anglia, the brother of Alulf (Aldulf (1)) in the latter part of the 7th Century. They were the sons of Ethelhere king of East Anglia and St. Hereswitha, succeeded their uncle Ethelwald, and according to Malmesbury were succeeded by Beorn. Wendover calls him Elswald. (Flor. Wig. Geneal. in M.H.B. 628; M. Ad Chron. Appr. in M.H.B. 636; Wend. F. H. ann. 655, ed. Coxe, note.) [ELFIVALD.] [C. H.]

ELDAD (HELDAN) is the name of two Welsh saints mentioned by Prof. Rees.

(1) Son of Arth. This person, whose pedigree the Welsh genealogists profess to trace in an unbroken line from Caractacus, the British chieftain in the time of the emperor Claudius, was son of Arth ab Arthwyg Frych ab Cystennan Goronog (A.D. 542). He is said by Rees to have been a member of the college of St. Illtud, at Llantris Major, and is classed among the Welsh saints of the beginning of the 7th century (Rees, Welsh Saints, 89, 288).

(2) Son of Geraint ab Carannog. He was in the fifth degree of descent from Cadell Dwyrain, and a member of St. Illtud's College. He afterwards became bishop of Gloucester, and is said to have given Christian burial to the followers of Vortigern when they were slain by the treachery of Hengist and his Saxons near Salisbury.
Piteseus attributes to him Orationes infectæs, lib. i. and places him after A.D. 490, but laces includes him in the list of the Welsh saints who flourished from A.D. 600 to A.D. 634; he was slain by the pagan Saxons. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 161, 298; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 12, wks. v. 475–476; Stubbs, Reg. Sac. Angl. 153; Piteseus, de Hl. Brit. Scrup. 90.)

[J. G.]

He is mentioned by Geoffrey of Monmouth as having buried the British nobles slain by Hengist (lib. vi. 15), and as urging his brother Eildo to kill Heugist and spare his son Ootca. (Jb. viii. 7, 8.)

He deserves a place here only as having sometimes been identified with St. Aldate, an unknown saint, to whom churches in Oxford and Gloucester are dedicated. He is commemorated on June 14. (Parker, Augl. Kalend. p. 181; Peshall, Hist. Oxon. p. 144.)

[8.]

ELEDERT, impostor. [ALEDERT.]

[J. G.]

ELEAZARUS, martyred with eight sons at Lyons, in company with Minervius; commemorated Aug. 23. The Martyrology gives the names only in the genitive, Eleazar being in the form in Aed and Eleazarri in Usuard. Grevenus and Molanus in their notes to Usuard alter (but on conjecture alone, and contrary to manuscript authority) "cum filio et octo" into "cum aliis octo." (J. B. 1.)

Eleazar was regarded as being more holy than the Audetors, and seem to have been under restrictions from which the Audetors were exempt (Augustus. de Morb. Manich. ii. 18; Contr. Faust. xx. 23). It was from the Electors that the Minacæans chose their officials; "Princeps," "Magistri," "Episcopi," "Presbyteri," and "Decani." (Privatan ia. de Haeres. xlvii.)

Augustine was one of these Electors for some time (Possidius, u.s.). [MANICAEANS.]

[T. W. D.]

ELECTION. [PREDETERMINATION, Vocation.]

ELECTUS, chamberlain. [ELECTUS.]

ELDE-SANUS, legendary bishop of Alclu or Dumbarton, said to have been appointed by king Arthur in 519 (Gall. Monum. ix. 15; Stubbs, Reg. Sac. Angl. 153). [J. G.]

ELEMO-SINARIUS. [INDEARCAIGH.]

ELEFANTUS, bishops. [ELEPHANTUS, ELIFANTUS.]

ELELETH, one of the four luminaries in the Barbelioit system (Ironeaus, i. 39, p. 108). [G. S.]

ELEN (HELENA). Elen or Helen Llywyddawai, daughter of Coel Ceodehebawg, has been represented in mosehsh legend, the Welsh Brus, and the equally fabulous history of Geoffrey of Monmouth, as the wife of Constantius Chlorus and mother of the Emperor Constantine the Great. Eglwys Ilan, co. Glamorgan, Tref Ilan, co. Cardigan, and Llanelan, co. Monmouth, may be dedications to Elen or St. Helena (Myg. Arch. ii. 207; Cressy, Ch. Hist. Brit. i. 12; Williams, Emn. Welsh. 90, 138; Tanner, Ibid. 588–90.)

[8.]

ELENARA (ELEVARA), martyr with Sponsaria, virgins, in Gaul, under Rictovar for the reign of Diocletian; commemorated at St. Riquier, May 2. (Chron. Centuriae. lib. iii. c. 29, in D'Achery, Splics. i. 328, ed. 1723; Boll. Acta SS. 2 Mai. 186.)

[8.]

ELENOG, a Welsh saint of the 7th century (Rees, Welsh Saints, 307). He might be the same as Elnog son of St. Tuddlyd of Holyhead, but that the latter must have flourished in the preceding century (Rees, Camb. Brit. Saints, 599).

ELEOCADIUS (Ughell. Ital. Sac. ii. 327).

ELEOCHADUS (Gams, Sac. Episcop. 718), bishop of Ravenna. [ELEOCHADUS.]

ELEPHANTUS (ELIFANTUS) I., eleventh bishop of Uzes, succeeding Armimundus and succeeded by Walfridus, is said by the compilers of the Gallia Christiana (vi. 616) to have been living in A.D. 800. All we know of him is that in the year following the death of Louis the Pious he was commissioned by Bernard duke of Septimania to conduct his infant son from Uzes, where he had been lately born, to his presence in Aquitaine. (See the preface to the Liber Manualis given by Dodani the wife of Bernardus to her son, quoted by Bouquet, tom. vii. p. 23 n., and Migne, Patr. Lat. cxi. 109.) [S. A. B.]

ELEPHAS has been placed seventh in the list of the bishops of Valence, succeeding Ragnaloidus and followed by Salvius I, at the close of the sixth century. But the old authorities are silent, and his existence is very doubtful (Gall. Christ. xvi. 294; Gams, Series Episc. 648).

[8. A. B.]

ELERI (ELERI, MELERI) I. In the Pedigrees of the Welsh Saints, Eleri is entered as daughter of Brychan, and wife of Ceredig, the son of Cunedda Wledig, and mother of Sandie, the father of Dewi (St. David). As belonging to the family of Brychan, one of the "three stocks of saints of the island of Britain," Eleri is numbered among the saints, and is placed by Prof. Rees in the middle of the 5th century.
In the Account of Brychan of Breconigion she is called Meleri (Myn. Arch. ii. 41; Rees, Welsh Saints, iii. 137, 147; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 600, n. 1.)

(2) Another is placed among the saints of the end of the 6th century, and lived at Pennant, in Gwytherin, Denbighshire. She was daughter of Dingad ab Nudd Hael, and has her genealogy traced from Macsen Wledig, i.e. Maximus the Roman emperor of the West; her mother was Thenol, Tievoc, or Tenwy, daughter of Lleuddyn Liweddawg, of Dinas Eiddin or Edinburgh, and she had five brothers, saints and members with her of the college of Barddion (Myn. Arch. ii. 24, 42; Rees, Welsh Saints, 108, 275; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 594).

J. G.

ELERIUS was a Cambrian monk, who lived in the vale of Clwyd, Denbighshire, and is to be distinguished from Elerius or Helerius, a martyr in Jersey. In the legendary Life of St. Winefred (Nov. 3), she is represented as receiving the veil from St. Elerius at her monastery of Gwytherin in the county of Denbigh, and as being soon afterwards buried by him there. The Vita S. Winefredi Virginis et Martyris (in MS. Cott. Claud. A. v. ff. 138-141, and printed by Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 191-209) is said to have been written by Elerius, and is only slightly different from that published by Surius and Capgrave, and attributed to Robert, monk and prior of Shrewsbury, who flourished about A.D. 1140.

J. G.

ELESBAAN. The difficulties which beset the biography of this king, hermit, and saint (Rome, Oct. 27; Ethiopia, Gibbot, xx. May 15; cf. Ludolphus, p. 415), are acknowledged by all who have tried to trace consistency in the history of Ethiopia during the 6th century. (Cf. Ludolphus, History of Ethiopia, ed. 1884, p. 167. Lebeau, Histoire du Bas Empire, ed. 1827, vili. 47, note 4; Walch, in Novi Commentarii, xii. 359.)

The importance of those crusades on which his fame rests is attested by Gibbon, who justifies the mention of his wars by the assertion that, had their purpose been attained, "Mahomet must have been crushed in his cradle, and Abyssinia would have prevented a revolution which has changed the civil and religious state of the whole world." (Decline and Fall, ch. xiii. sub fin.)

It may be well to mention, and very briefly to estimate, the authorities from whom come both the records of his life and the confusion in which they are involved. First in importance are two Syriac writers, of whose work fragments are extant in manuscripts in the Vatican library and edited by Asseman, with a Latin translation, in the first volume of the Bibliotheca Orientalis Clementino-Vaticana, pp. 341 seq.; Simeon, surnamed Sophistus, bishop of Beth-Arsam in Persia, between 510 and 525 A.D., a Catholic according to Asseman's estimate, though he accepted the Henoticion; and John, the Mono-

physite bishop of Asia (for his life cf. Bibliotheca Orientalis, tom. ii. pp. 83 seq.), a native of Amida in Mesopotamia, during the latter half of the 6th century, and the author of an ecclesiastical history, written from the reign of Theodosius the younger, and carried on to the death of Justinian. To these must be added Procopius, Theophanes, and Joannes Malala: (cf. Corpus Scriptorum Historiae Byzantinae, Bonn., pt. x. vol. i. p. 104 seq.; Id. pt. viii. p. 433 seq.; Id. pt. xxi. pp. 346-7); but the witness of the first, though contemporary, is incomplete, and becomes untrustworthy if his notorious inconsistency and secret attachment to Paganism be considered (cf. Gibbon's Decline and Fall, ch. xi.): while Theophanes (who only contributes an evident blunder in saying that the king of Ethiopia was a Jew), and Malala, a native of Antioch, in the earlier and more important part of this period, closely and uncritically follow John of Asia; the importance of the last being further impaired by the great uncertainty of his own antiquity and character, Walch placing him later than Theophanes, while others hold him to be contemporary with Justinian. A most valuable fragment is the record of Nennosus, himself an ambassador to Eleusbaan, preserved in the Bibliotheca Photii (Cod. 3). But the details of the saint's wars and character are drawn from the Acta S. Arethas, extant in two forms: of which the earlier and more authentic, found by Lequien in the Colbert Library (Orina Christianus, ii. 428), is referred by the Jesuit author of the Acta Sanctorum, to a date not later than the 7th century; while the later is, at best, but the recension of Simeon Metaphrastes, in the 10th century. Not much is contributed for the elucidation of the period by the Arabic historians adduced by Walch; and very little by the Ethiopian documents to which Job Ludolphus had access in the 17th century. (Cf. the translations from the Senkessar appended to the life of Eleusbaan in the Bollandist Acta; October, vol. xii.)

Of the majority of the later writers who have used or abused these authorities (as Baronius, Gedees, Migne, Gieseler, Rohrbacher, Alban Butler) it is not proper to enumerate; but of them are eminent, by their sense of the difficulty of the period, and their critical treatment of its records. First should be cited J. G. Walch, as author of two papers, contributed to the Novi Commentarii of the Royal Society of Göttingen (vol. iv.), and entitled "Historia Rerum in Homeriide Sacro vi. Gestarum, p. 4.

The importance of those crusades on which his fame rests is attested by Gibbon, who justifies the mention of his wars by the assertion that, had their purpose been attained, "Mahomet must have been crushed in his cradle, and Abyssinia would have prevented a revolution which has changed the civil and religious state of the whole world." (Decline and Fall, ch. xiii. sub fin.)

It may be well to mention, and very briefly to estimate, the authorities from whom come both the records of his life and the confusion in which they are involved. First in importance are two Syriac writers, of whose work fragments are extant in manuscripts in the Vatican library and edited by Asseman, with a Latin translation, in the first volume of the Bibliotheca Orientalis Clementino-Vaticana, pp. 341 seq.; Simeon, surnamed Sophistus, bishop of Beth-Arsam in Persia, between 510 and 525 A.D., a Catholic according to Asseman's estimate, though he accepted the Henoticion; and John, the Mono-

Physite bishop of Asia (for his life cf. Bibliotheca Orientalis, tom. ii. pp. 83 seq.), a native of Amida in Mesopotamia, during the latter half of the 6th century, and the author of an ecclesiastical history, written from the reign of Theodosius the younger, and carried on to the death of Justinian. To these must be added Procopius, Theophanes, and Joannes Malala: (cf. Corpus Scriptorum Historiae Byzantinae, Bonn., pt. x. vol. i. p. 104 seq.; Id. pt. viii. p. 433 seq.; Id. pt. xxi. pp. 346-7); but the witness of the first, though contemporary, is incomplete, and becomes untrustworthy if his notorious inconsistency and secret attachment to Paganism be considered (cf. Gibbon's Decline and Fall, ch. xi.): while Theophanes (who only contributes an evident blunder in saying that the king of Ethiopia was a Jew), and Malala, a native of Antioch, in the earlier and more important part of this period, closely and uncritically follow John of Asia; the importance of the last being further impaired by the great uncertainty of his own antiquity and character, Walch placing him later than Theophanes, while others hold him to be contemporary with Justinian. A most valuable fragment is the record of Nennosus, himself an ambassador to Eleusbaan, preserved in the Bibliotheca Photii (Cod. 3). But the details of the saint's wars and character are drawn from the Acta S. Arethas, extant in two forms: of which the earlier and more authentic, found by Lequien in the Colbert Library (Orina Christianus, ii. 428), is referred by the Jesuit author of the Acta Sanctorum, to a date not later than the 7th century; while the later is, at best, but the recension of Simeon Metaphrastes, in the 10th century. Not much is contributed for the elucidation of the period by the Arabian historians adduced by Walch; and very little by the Ethiopian documents to which Job Ludolphus had access in the 17th century. (Cf. the translations from the Senkessar appended to the life of Eleusbaan in the Bollandist Acta; October, vol. xii.)

Of the majority of the later writers who have used or abused these authorities (as Baronius, Gedees, Migne, Gieseler, Rohrbacher, Alban Butler) it is not proper to enumerate; but of them are eminent, by their sense of the difficulty of the period, and their critical treatment of its records. First should be cited J. G. Walch, as author of two papers, contributed to the Novi Commentarii of the Royal Society of Göttingen (vol. iv.), and entitled "Historia Rerum in Homeriide Sacro vi. Gestarum." Lebeau's history of the period has been greatly increased in value by the careful annotations of his scholarly St. Martin. (Histoire du Bas Empire, vol. viii. It may be noted that Baronius and Pagi had access only to the Greek authors, and are therefore useless.) Lastly, the Bollandist Acta Sanctorum give, under the name of St. Eleusbaan and the date of October 27, a very full and fairly critical account of all the evidence which has yet been gathered. (Cf. also their history of St. Arethas and his fellow-martyrs: Oct. vol. x.) It is here impossible to follow at length the arguments which these writers confute and urge: it is therefore intended in this article to give those facts in the life of Eleusbaan which seem most clearly attested; and to speak parenthetically of the mistakes by which it has been obscured, and whose correction must presuppose a knowledge of the disputed events.

One confusion must however be resolved at the outset. The wars against the Homeritae which form the central interest of Elesbaan's reign in Ethiopia are associated by different historians with at least ten different names; nor can these be corruptions of less than three originals. The hero of these wars is called Caleb in the Ethiopian Senkessar (cf. Acta Sanctorum, Octob. xii. p. 328), Caleb, by Gibbon: Elzatabab, by the central of Cosmas Indicopleustes." Where-temporary writer: Elesbaan, Elesbaan, and Elesbaan, by other Greek writers: Elzatabab, in the Ethiopian rendering of his name given in the Bollandist Acta: Hellestheaeus by Procopius: Aidog, by John of Asia: Andas, by John Malalas, and Adad by Theophanes. It seems probable that the first two forms express his proper name, which may be written Olvzatabab; the following six are variants of Elas-Atzabab (i.e. benedictus), the vernacular title of canonization; the last three misrepresent Ela-Ameda, the name of his grandfather, with whom, as will be seen, he was confounded by John of Asia and his followers. The name Elesbaan will be most convenient for understanding, since it has supplanted its most writings the more distinctive name of Caleb.

It was probably during the later years of Anastasius's reign, and shortly before the ascention of Justin in 518, that Elesbaan succeeded his father Tazena on the throne of Ethiopia. The diverse lists of the Ethiopian kings have been reduced to three reigns, whereas one is confused at this period; the other two give the following order of succession:—

Salaloba,
His son Al-Ameda,
His son Tazena,
His son Caleb,
His son Ghibra Masul.
(Ch. Dillmann, in Mon. Subaud., p. 348.) In two inscriptions of Tazena, discovered at Axum in 1830, and translated by Saper and by Dillmann, the king calls himself the son of A1-Amida; and in the second he uses language which could only be used by a Christian. It will presently be seen that there are reasons for thinking that the faith was restored throughout Ethiopia in the reign of his father, Al-Ameda, the grandfather of Elesbaan.

The kingdom of Elesbaan was greatly dependent for its welfare upon the good will and good order of the people of Yemen, the Homeritae, from whom it was separated by the narrow strait of Bab-el-Mandeb: for through the territory of the Homeritae the merchants of Syria and of Rome came to the great port of Adulis (cf. Assemanii Bibl. Orientalis, i. p. 360), near whose ruins in Annesley Bay the Arabian traders still unload their ships (cf. Henry Salt, A Voyage to Abyssinia, ch. ix. p. 451). A Greek inscription discovered at Axum, and a law of Constantius bearing date in the year 356, prove that even in the 4th century the province of Axum bore the style "King of the Homeritae" (cf. Id., ut. p. 411; Lebeau, Bas Empire, viii. 46, n. 2); but the range and reality of their power in Arabia seems very uncertain; Lebeau (Matériaux pour l'His-toire du Christianisme en Nubie, p. 39) speaks slightly of the "sanfronnerades communes chez ces royaumes de l'Abyssinie." While Elesbaan bore the title of king of Ethiopia, the Homeritae had greatly obscured the Christianity which they had received in the reign of Constantius, but the language of Cosmas Indicopleustes (Migne, Patr. Gr. vol. lxxviii. p. 170), shows that it was not wholly extinct. They were subject to a king whose name is variously written as Dunaan and Dhu Nowas; also writing the name of John of Asia as Dumen by Theophanes as Damian. He had been raised to the throne about 490, by the people whom he had freed from their gross tyrant Laknias Dhu Sjenati; and having shortly after his accession forsworn idolatry and embraced Judaism, he determined to enforce his new creed with the sword (cf. Acta Sanctorum, Octob. xii.). Professing a zeal of retaliation for the sufferings of the Jews throughout the Christian empire, he exacted heavy tolls from all Christian merchants who came through his territory to the port of Aden and the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb, and, according to the account given by John of Asia (cf. Assemanii Bibl. Orientalis, i. 360), put many Christians to death. The effects of this action were felt in the commerce of all the neighbouring peoples, but nowhere so injuriously as in the kingdom of Ethiopia; and Elesbaan soon after his accession sent to Dhu Nowas an useless remonstrance, and then prepared for war. About the year 510 he crossed the straits, attacked and utterly defeated the Arabian forces, and driving the Jew to the hills, left them to bear Christian rule over the Homeritae, and returned to Ethiopia (Asseman, ut. p. 362). Of this expedition and victory no details are recorded; its time is incidentally and approximately marked by Cosmas Indicopleustes, who tells us that he was at Adulis "αν τη φερει τη Βασιλεια Ισωντου του Ρωμου Βασιλεως" (A.D. 518-527), when the king of the people of Axum, being about to undertake an expedition of war against the Homeritae, sent to the king of Adulis to ask for a copy of a certain inscription; which copy Cosmas and another monk were charged to make (Migne, Patr. Gr. vol. lxxxviii. p. 102).

It is necessary at this point to consider the first great error by which the witness of the bishop of Asia and of those who follow him in regard to these events is marred (Johannes Malalas, and Theophanes). The conqueror in this war, while proved by the sequel of their story to be identical with Elesbaan, is called by them Aidog, Adad, or Andas: he is said to have vowed before leaving Ethiopia that, since he fought as the champion of Christ, he would, if victorious, renounce his false faith and become a Christian; and after the defeat of Dhu Nowas it is told how, in fulfilment of this vow, he sent to Alexandria to pray that a bishop and clergy might come to form the church of Christ in Ethiopia. Then John of Asia goes on to record that this message was forwarded from Alexandri a by one Lucius to the emperor, who bade the ambassadors choose a bishop; that they chose John, the Paramonarius of the church of St. John, at Alexandria, by whom Aidog and all his princes were presently baptized, and the church, which St. Frumentius had founded in the 4th century, was quickened afresh (Assemaeli Biblioth. Orientalis, i. 362-3).

But this is scarcely consistent with the language of the Arabic, which speaks of Elesban at the time of his first war as Rex Christianissimus (cf. Bollandist Acta, October x. p. 697). Or with the inscription of Tazena discovered at Azum, and shewing that he, the father of Elesban, was a Christian; or with the Ethiopian Senkesser, which tells that Elesban about the year 525 consulted St. Pantaleon, who had at that time a 340 forty-four years in Ethiopia (cf. the translation from the Senkesser, jointly with the Acta S. Actae in the Bollandist Acta, October xii. 331); or lastly, with the Ethiopian chronicle of great antiquity, extant in MSS. in the Bodleian Library and British Museum, which says that in the reign of Alamedon, son of Saladosa, nine saints, whose names are especially commemorated in the Senkesser, came to Ethiopia and brought the true faith; while another copy says that in that reign many monks came from Rome, or the Graeco-Roman empire. All these authorities would make it clear that Elesban was from the first, and by birth, a Christian; and that there must be some error in the accounts which make his victory over Dhu Nowas the occasion of his baptism.

The error may probably be traced to a confusion of the exploits of Elesban with a previous defeat of the Homeritae by his grandfather Al-Ameda, and the consequent conversion of that king and of his people. The evidence of these events is fragmentary and inconclusive: but the balance of probability seems in favour of the belief that they occurred. No slight force must be allowed to the connexion of names which seems to represent that of Al-Ameda with the victories of Elesban over the Homeritae; for such a connexion would be inexplicable unless like exploits had been associated with the earlier reign. Again, it appears from a letter written by Justin to Elesban in 523 or 524, that Dhu Nowas' accession to the throne of the Homeritae had required and received the sanction of the king of Ethiopia (cf. Bolland. Acta S. Actae, Oct. xii. 311), and in a phrase in a letter of Dhu Nowas to Mandibhir, king of the Arabs of Hira, on the skirts of Arabia Deserta, seems to imply a like relation of dependence: a relation such as would ensue upon a recent defeat. But two stronger reasons remain to be urged in support of this theory: it solves two difficulties with a simplicity which greatly commands it. For first,

---

4 "Ut Christianum Regem de more constitutum." The letter is extant in the Syriac MS. of Simeon of Beth-Arama, Assemaeli Bibl. Orientalis, i. 360.

John of Asia ends his account of this expedition with the death of the Arabian king whom he calls Dimon, and for whom no place can be found in the list of the Arabian kings at this time, unless he be identified with Dhu Nowas. But Dhu Nowas reappears in the persecution which provokes Elesban's second expedition in 525, as an event attributed to him alike by Greek, Syrian, and Arabic historians. Here then the story of John of Asia seems unaccountably wrong, save on this supposition of the defeat and slaughter by Al-Ameda (or Andas) of a previous king of the Homeritae, whom John has confused with Dhu Nowas just as he confuses Al-Ameda himself with Elesban. And this supposition is at once confirmed by the Arabic historians, who hide in significant silence the end of Hassan, second from Dhu Nowas on the throne of Yemen, the last of a long dynasty, and succeeded by the despot Dhu Sjenatir; while the time of his death is marked by a revolt by the Magi, a sign of weakness among the Homeritae (Bollandist Acta, October, vol. x. p. 310), and a likely result of such a blow as they may have received by the defeat and death of Hassan at the hands of Al-Ameda. Secondly and lastly, the supposition that it was Al-Ameda's victory over Hassan which led to the mission of the bishop and clergy from Alexandria, John the Paramonarius and his companions, exactly coincides with the witness of the Ethiopian Senkesser, telling how in that reign the nine great saints came from the Graeco-Roman empire to revive the church of Ethiopia; and also with the statement of Theodorus Lector (ii. 58) that Christianity was introduced among the Homeritae in the reign of Anastasius; for the new faith of Al-Ameda would not be slow to reach across the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb towards the people whose conquest had given it birth.

These convergent lines of circumstantial evidence seem to point to the belief that those parts of the bishop of Asia's story of Elesban's life, which are irreconcilable with other authorities, are taken from an imperfect knowledge of an expedition into Arabia, wherein the grandfather of Elesban defeated and killed Hassan, predecessor of Dhu Sjenatir; for John has confounded Dhu Nowas; and that to this earlier date, towards the close of the 5th century, must be referred the name of Aidog or Andas, the religious revival in Ethiopia and Yemen, and the death in battle of the Arabian king, so much of the bishop's account being retained as was given before this long digression, which might well be lengthened by the consideration of the probable orthodoxy of John the Paramonarius. Henceforward the historians are more nearly consistent.

It was probably in the year 522 or 523 that the death of the viceroy whom Elesban had left in Yemen, encouraged Dhu Nowas to come down from his hiding place in the hills ("tanquam daemon carne induitus," Acta S. Actae, Oct. xii. 316), and reassert his self as king of the Homeritae and champion of Judaism. Choosing a season when the Arabian Gulf would be an impassable barrier to the intervention of Elesbaan, he gathered a force which presently numbered 120,000 men, and having put to death all the Christians whom he could find, and turned their church into a mausoleum, he pressed on to Negran, the head-quarters of the Ethiopian vice-royalty, and held at this time by Arethas, the pylarch. Here he found the garrison forewarned and the gates closed; nor were they opened to the terror of his threats, when coming to the wall and holding up a wooden cross he swore that all who would not blaspheme the Crucified one would suffice. The gates were shut, the citizens might die. At last by treachery Dhu Nowas won an entrance, promising that he would hurt none of the citizens, and demanding nothing harder to be yielded than an exorbitant tribute; but having entered he began at once the reckless massacre which has won him a title in Arabian history and left its mark even in the Koran (cf. Walch's paper in the Göttingen Commentarii, p. 25, and article ETHIOPIAN CHURCH, p. 250). Arethas and Ruma his wife died with a defiant confession on their lips: more than four thousand Christian men, women, and children were killed (commemorated in the Roman calendar on October 24); and from the fiery dyke into which the victims were thrown, Dhu Nowas received the name Saheb-el-Okhud, "Lord of the Trench."

---

f From which patriarch of Alexandria did he come? Cf. article ETHIOPIAN CHURCH, p. 249.

It happened that at this time, probably in the January of 524, Simeon, the bishop of Beth-Arsam, had been sent by Justin, together with one Abraham, a priest of Constantinople, to gain the alliance of Mundhir III, king of the Arabs of Hira, a friend valuable alike for reasons of commerce and in regard to the war with Persia. As the ambassadors drew near to the royal presence (the story is told by Simeon in a letter to the abbot of Gabala) they were met by a crowd of Arabs crying that Christ was driven out of Rome and Persia and Herodias; and they learnt that messengers were present from Dhu Nowas. Abbot Simeon sent letters to Mundhir, which presently they heard read. They heard at great length the recital of the treachery by which Negran had been taken, of the insult done to the bishop's tomb, of the slaughter of the Christians, of the triumph of Judaism; they heard the confession of the martyr Arethas, and the speech wherewith Ruma urged the women of Negran to follow her to the abiding city of the divine Bridgroom, praying that the blood of the martyrs might be the wall of Negran while it continued in the faith, and that she might be forgiven for that Arethas had died first. They heard the story of her brutal murder, and then the appeal of Dhu Nowas that Mundhir should at once enact a like massacre throughout his kingdom. For a moment their own end must have seemed very near; but the courage of a soldier who stood forth as spokesman of the many Christians in Mundhir's army decided the hesitation of the king, and the ambassadors went on their way unhurt (but apparently unanswered) to Naaman, a port in the Arabian Gulf. There they heard more fully the story of the massacre, especially in regard to the constancy of a boy, who was afterwards known to the bishop of Asia at Justinian's court. Simeon of Beth-Arsam thus closes his letter, praying that the news of the martyrdom may be spread throughout the church, and the martyrs receive the honour of commemoration, and that the king of Ethiopia may be urged to help the Hermitae against the oppression of the Jew. (Cf. Assemani, B. S. D. 1. 364-379.)

When this message reached Elesbaan, it was reinforced by a letter from the emperor Justin, solicited by the patriarch of Alexandria, who, at the request of Justin, urged Elesbaan to invade Yemen, offering him a little sign and appointing a vigil on his behalf, and sending to him the Eucharist in a silver vessel. Without delay Elesbaan collected a great army, which he divided into two parts; 15,000 men he sent southwards, in order that they might cross at Bab-el-Mandeb, and marching through Yemen divert the strength of Dhu Nowas's forces from the movements of the main body of the Ethiopians, which Elesbaan intended to send by sea to some place on the south coast of Arabia. For the transport of these latter he appropriated sixty merchant vessels then anchored in his ports, adding ten more, built after the native fashion, the planks being held together by ropes. On the eve of the enterprise he went in procession to the great church of Axum, and there, laying aside his royalty, he sued in forma pauperis for the favour of Him whose war he dared to wage; praying that his sins might be visited on himself, and not on his people. Then he sought the blessing, the counsel, and the prayers of St. Pantaleon; and received from within the doorless and windowless tower, where the hermit had lived for forty five years, the answers of Mundhir, and some from present miracles; and, again, "Hεϊχω τον θρυ- πολεμον Αλεξανδρειας κα τα διακα τινών και θου τί θωσε (και ευδοκέως των μαρτυριων ειναι τον νοορ θυσιαστιρων.)" And so the armament was sent on its twofold route.

In regard to the chief facts of this expedition, the Arabic historians quoted by Wright and Walch agree fairly well with the Greek writers and with the brief account of the bishop of Asia; differing chiefly in regard to the presence of Elesbaan himself, which is asserted by the Greeks, denied by the Arabsians, and in regard to the manner of Dhu Nowas's end. For the 15,000 Bab-el-Mandeb was indeed a gate of tears: they died of hunger, wandering in the desert. The rest of the force were safely embarked, and sailed southwards down the Gulf of Arabia towards the straits; which Dhu Nowas had barred by a huge chain, stretched across the space of two furlongs from side to side. Over this chain, however, first ten ships and then seven more, were lifted by the waves, the Ethiopian admiral being on board one of the seven; the rest were driven back by stress of

---

1 Thought by Walch and by Wright to be identical with the Abdaillah Ibn Athamis of the Arabian historians.
2 All mention is here omitted of the many details of this great narrative which are given in the Acta S. Aethiae, and the MS. of Simeon of Beth-Arsam.

1 Walch seems rather to overstate the discrepancy (cf. p. 56), Lohndolphasis greatly understimates it (p. 165).
weather up the Gulf, but presently, the chain being, according to one account, broken, forced the passage, and, passing the smaller detachment of seventeen, cast anchor farther along the coast. Meanwhile Dhu Nowas, having been encamped on the western shore, where he thought the hindrance of his chain would force the Ethiopians to land, hurried from his position, and leaving but a few men to resist the smaller fleet watched with his main army the movements of the rest. Those on board the seventeen ships under the command of the Ethiopian admiral easily effected a landing near the port of Aden, and defeating the troops opposed to them, pressed on to the chief city, Ta'far or Taphan, which surrendered immediately. (Cf. Wright, Early Christianity in Arabia, 58–60.) Broken in courage by the news of this disaster, the main body of the Arabs offered a feeble resistance to the rest of the Ethiopian armament: and Dhu Nowas saw that the end of his reign and of his life was very near. According to the Arabic historians he threw himself from the cliff and died in the waves; according to the Acta S. Arethas, he bound his seven kinmen in chains, and fastened them to the throne on which he sat, lest they should fail to share his fate; and so awaited the death which Elesbaan inflicted with his own hand. The Arabic writers are unsupportive in their story of the useless resistance of a successor Dhu Gidanan; it was probably at the death of Dhu Nowas that the kingdom of the Hermitae ended, and Yemen became a province of Ethiopia. At Ta’far Elesbaan is said to have built a church, digging the foundations for seven days with his own hands: and from Ta’far he wrote to tell the patriarch of Alexandria the news of his victory. A bishop was sent from Alexandria and appointed to the see of Negman, where again questions are raised both as to the orthodoxy and as to the identity of this bishop. This town the king restored, and entrusted to the care of Arethas’s son; rebuilding and endowing the great Church, and granting perpetual right of asylum to the place where the bodies of the martyrs had lain. And so Elesbaan returned to Ethiopia. (Bell. Acta SS. October, xii. 322.)

Here again begins a period of confusion and infection of justiciary. A reaction against the Arab that among all other histories that of the Hermitae is the most imperfect (Ludolphus, p. 167): it is impossible to harmonize the diverse accounts of the course of events in Hermitae after the departure of Elesbaan. The great preponderance of authority is with Procopius, who is here at one with the Arabic writers, and followed by Walsh, Ritter, and for the most part by the Bollandist Acta. It may be enough therefore to give his account, since reconciliation is impossible, and since the events bear only indirectly upon Elesbaan’s life.

It would seem then, that the king, when he returned to Ethiopia, left a Christian Arab, named Esmiphaeus, otherwise known as Arianthus to be his viceroy over the conquered people. But he also left an element of discord, a part of his army being detained by the luxury of Arabia Felix, and refusing to leave the land which they had won. These soldiers not long after set up a rival to Esmiphaeus, in the person of Abraham or Abraham, the Christian slave of a Roman merchant, who was strong enough to shut up the viceroy in a fort and seize the throne of Yemen. A force of 3000 men was sent by Elesbaan, under the command of a prince of his house, whom some call Aryates or Arethas, to depose the usurper; and it seems that Abraham, like Dhu Nowas, sought safety among the mountains. But his retreat too was only for a time: about the year 540 he came down and confronted the representatives of Elesbaan; and at the critical moment the Ethiopian troops deserted and murdered their general. Determined to maintain his supremacy and avenge his kinman, Elesbaan sent a second army; but this, loyally fighting with Abraham, was utterly defeated, and only a handful of men returned to Ethiopia. The Arabic historians record the great oath with which Elesbaan swore that he would yet lay hold of the land of the Hermitae, both mountain and plain; and that he would pluck the forelock from the rebel’s head, and take his blood as the price of Aryates’ death; and they tell of the mixed cunning and cowardice by which Abraham satisfied the Ethiopian oath, and evaded his anger; winning at last a recognition of his dignity. Procopius adds that Abraham paid tribute to Elesbaan’s successor; and the Hermitae remained in free subjection to the kings of Ethiopia till the century had almost ended.

In this continuous history of those relations between Elesbaan and the Hermitae, which are the most vivid part of his life, no mention has been made of the two occasions at which he appears near the main course of the life of his age, in contact with the history of the Roman empire. For two reasons the alliance of Ethiopia and Yemen was attractive to Justinian; for not only might their armies do good service in the Persian war, but it was also possible that their merchants might draw the silk-trade of China from its normal course through Persia, so that the Byzantine court might neither lose its supply in time of war nor in time of peace enrich its enemies. Records are extant of two embassies sent by Justinian, recorded in Bibliotheca as the very words of the ambassadors. Joanna Malala, in writing the history of the first, had before him the autograph of the envoy whom Procopius (de Bello Persico, i. 20) calls Julian: Photius has preserved in the third codex of his Bibliotheca his fresh memory of Nonnos’s story of his experience in the second mission. Julian must have been sent before 531, for Cabaden was still living, and according to Procopius Esmiphaeus was viceroy of Hermitae. He was received by Elesbaan, according to his own account, with the silence of an intense joy; for the alliance of Rome had long been the great desire of the Ethiopians. The king was seated on a high chariot, drawn by four elephants.
ELEUCHADIUS

expatriated with gold: he wore on his shoulders a broad robe studded with pearls, and round his loins a covering of linen embroidered with gold. He received Justinian's letter with every sign of respect, and on learning that he was called to take part in the Persian war, he began to prepare his forces even before Julian was dismissed from his court with the promise of peace. (Johnannes Malalæ Chronographia, xviii. Bonn. edit. pp. 457, 458.) Malala records no sequel of these preparations, Procopius complains that none occurred.

The second embassy, which was sent primarily to Raisus or Imru'lays, the prince of the Chindini and Mazdati, and only secondarily to the Homeresite and the Ethiopians, seems to belong to the last years of Elephas's reign. Nonnosus the envoy belonged to a family of diplomatists, for his father and grandfather had been employed in like missions. But Photius has copied from his manuscript no details of the purpose or result of this journey: only telling of the great herd of 5000 elephants which Nonnosus saw between Adulis and Azam, and the pigmy negroes who met him on an island as he sailed away from Pharsan. (Photii Bibliotheca; Bekker's edit. pp. 2, 3.)

The story of Elephas's abdication and seclusion is told in the Acta S. Arctae: the last years of his life are embalmed in Ethiopian hagiography, with many strange miracles which their Jesus critic unhesitatingly disbelieves. Having accepted the fealty and recognized the royalty of Abraham, and having confirmed the faith of Christ in Homeritis, "pro tanta Dei beneficitione nihil se dignum reddere posse aequum Elephas: hoc tantum invent ut coronam regioni deposuerit et indutum vestrum monasticam." The cell to which he betook himself is still shown to the traveller: it was visited in 1865 by Henry Salt, and has been elaborately described by Mme de Lencz and Le Fèvre. There nothing remained in solitude and great rigour of asceticism; and the year of his death is lost in the darkness of his hermit's life. His crown he sent to Jerusalem, praying that it might be hung "in conspectu jamnon viventis sequelquii; in quo principium resurrectionis et incorruptionis nobis extendit Christus Filii Dei a mortuis resurgentibus cujus gloria cum Patre est Spiritu Sancto nunc et semper in saecula saeculorum." [F.P.]

ELEUCHADIUS, 100 a.d., bishop of Ravenna; commemorated on the 14th of February. He is the subject of the sixth sermon of Peter Damianus, in the 11th century. His name is also given in the Martyrologium Romanum, and in Heremans Creven's Additions to Usuard. His life is given by Johannes Camansius (Bolland. AA. SS. Feb. 747) from a MS. in a monastery in Westphalia; and by Hieronymus Rubeus (Historiarum Ravennatam, libri decem. Venice, 1572, folio). By these he is said to have been one of the four pupils of St. Apollinaris who succeeded him in Martyriology; in his line he bore the name of Adericus, Eleuchadius, Martianus, Calocerus. He is described as an eminent Platonic philosopher, converted to Apollinaris on a visit to Rome. He accompanied his master and fellow disciples to Ravenna, to rule the church in that place. Apollinaris was martyred under Vesperian, and Eleuchadius succeeded Aderitus a.d. 100. He died a.d. 112, and his remains were buried outside the walls, where a church was afterwards dedicated to his memory, existing in the time of Peter Damianus. It is thought that his bones were carried by king Aulf to Ticinum. Peter Damianus believed him to have written books on the Old and New Testament, and probably on the Incarnation and Passion. He was not actually a martyr. (Pit. Dam. Opp. part ii. 29, etc.; Patr. Lat. exv. 534, etc., Ughell. Ital. Sacr. ii. 327.) [W. M. S.]

ELEUSINIUS (1), a very reverend person (μισθωτατος) despatched by Eustathius of Sebaste, a.d. 571, to apprise Basil of the approach of the Emperor Valens, and to express the apprehension he felt for the safety of the Catholics at Caesarea, and especially for Basil himself. Basil wrote thanking Eustathius for sending him such an ally and supporter in the spiritual contests he was engaged in. (Basil, Epist. 79 [318], p. 300.)

ELEUSINIUS (2), (ELESIUS, Baron. A. E., ann. 449, xii.), one of the deacons in the monastery of Eutyches at Constantinople. At the meeting in November, a.d. 448, of the council of bishops by whom he was eventually condemned, Eutyches sent round a "cure" or doctrinal treatise, by the hands of Eleusinus and a brother deacon, Constantine, to be signed by the heads of the chief monastic establishments of the city, with the view of committing them to his cause against Flavian, his bishop. In this they met with but little success. (Labbe, Concil. iv. 198, 210.) When the messengers of the synod presented themselves at Eutyches' convent, demanding to see him, Eutyches came forward to receive their messenger, and on their refusing to give it to any one but the archimandrite himself, they were conveyed by him to Eutyches' presence. (Ib. 200.) Eutyches refusing to appear before the council on the plea of illness, Eleusinius was commissioned with Abraham and others, to represent him at the fourth session. (Ib. 204–207.) Eleusinius of this said five cited as the six titulars who lobbied the substance of the charges brought against Eutyches by Eusebius of Doryleum (Ib. 213). He successfully urged a claim to be present, with other members of Eutyches' monastery, when sentence of excommunication and deposition was pronounced. (Ib, 238.) On the meeting of the "Latrocinum" at Ephesus, a.d. 449, Eleusinius was one of the members who lodged a formal complaint against Flavian for the condemnation of Eutyches at Constantinople. (Ib. 280.)

ELEUSINIUS (1), tribe of Thamugada, in Numidia, bearer of a request from the people of that place to St. Augustine that he would reply to the letter of Gaudentius concerning Donatism. (Aug. Ep. 204, 9.) [H. W. P.]

ELEUSINIUS (2), (Baron. Annal. 512, xxiii.,) bishop of Sasima. [ELEUSINIUS (5).] [C. H.]

ELEUSIPPUS (Baron. Annal. ann. 179, xxvii.; Flor. Wig. Chron. ann. 716, in M. H. E. 541a; Sim. Dun. G. E. A. in M. H. E. 533 d), martyr. [ELISIPPUS.] [C. H.]
ELEUSIUS (1), a deacon and philosopher in the reign of Constantine, quoted by Codinus as one of the authorities for the events at the foundation of Constantinople. (Codinus, p. 8, A.D.)

ELEUSIUS (2), bishop of Cyzicus, one of the most prominent and influential members of the Suniarian party in the second half of the 4th century, intimately connected with Basil of Ancyræ, Eustathius of Sebaste, Sophronius of Ioupeopolis, and other leaders of the Macedonian party. He is uniformly described as a man of high personal character, holy in life, rigid in self-discipline, uniting in his soules for what he believed to be the truth, and, according to St. Hilary, more nearly identified with the orthodox doctrine than most of his associates (Hilar. de Synod. p. 133). The people of his diocese are described by Theodoret as zealous for the orthodox faith, and well instructed in the Holy Scriptures and in the doctrines of the church, and he himself as a man worthy of all praise. (Theod. H. E. ii. 22.) He is said to have occasionally found acting with the tyrannical and unsparingly party, of which Macedonius was the original leader, and sharing in the discredit of the measures directed by them against the holders of the Homoeouarian faith, Elesius was uncompromising in his opposition to the pronounced Arians, by whom he was persecuted and deposed; and a calm view of his career, as far as we know it, leads us to acquiesce in the substantial justice of the condemnation passed upon him by the voice of antiquity.

Elesius had held a military office in the Imperial household with considerable distinction, when he was suddenly elevated to the episcopate by the notorious Macedonius, the bishop of Constantinople. He was appointed bishop of Cyzicus, on the Propontis, at the same time that Marathonius, paymaster of the prefects of the Praetorian Guard, was appointed to the see of Nicomedia, a.d. 350 (Socr. H. E. iv. 20; Suidas, s. v. Eλευσιος). Elesius signalized the entrance on his episcopal office with a vehement outburst of zeal against the relics of paganism at Cyzicus. He demolished the temples, heaped contempt on their gods and their rites. He even had the power to arrest merchant vessels. This, as will be seen, was remembered against him on the accession of Julian. He showed no less decision in dealing with the Novatians, with whom a community of persecution had caused the Catholics to unite. He destroyed their church, and forbade their assemblies for worship. (Socr. H. E. ii. 38; Socr. H. E. iv. 21. v. 15.) He soon acquired great influence over his clergy, not by the eloquence of speech, of which he was destitute, but by his religious zeal, the austerity of his life, and the consistent gravity of his manners. He established in his diocese a large number of monasteries, both for males and females (Suidas, s. v.) He took part in the semi-Arian council which met at Ancyræ 358 a.d. (Hilar. de Synod. p. 127), and was one of the members delegated, with Basil of Ancyræ, Eustathius of Sebaste, and Leontius, to lay before Constantius at Sirmium the decrees they had passed, condemnatory of the Anomoeans, and obtain their ratification. (Hilar. u. s.; Socr. H. E. iv. 13; Labbe, Concil. ii. 790.) We find Elesius again taking part in the indecisive Council of Seleucia, a.d. 359 (Socr. H. E. ii. 39-40), at which he met the proposition of the Acacians to draw up a new confession of faith, by the assertion that they had not met to learn anything they had not previously taught, nor to receive a new faith, but to plead for themselves for death to that laid down by the fathers (Socr. H. E. ii. 40). Having been commissioned with Eustathius of Sebaste, Basil of Ancyræ, and others, to communicate the result of the synod to Constantius, Elesius denounced the blasphemies attributed to Eudoxius so vigorously that he was compelled by the emperor's threats to retract them (Theod. H. E. ii. 234; Eutrohis. Eustathius de Sebaste). The Arians speedily gained the ear of Constantius, and, turning the tables on them, secured the deposition of their semi-Arian rivals, of whom Elesius was one, a.d. 360. The nominal charge against him was that he had, without due examination, baptized and ordained one Hercules of Tyre, who, being accused of magic, had fled to Cyzicus, and that with the facts usually to the contrary, he had refused to depose him. He was also charged with having admitted to holy orders persons who had been condemned by his neighbour, Maris of Chalcodon (Soz. H. E. iv. 34; Soz. H. E. ii. 42). His old patron, Macedonius of Constantinople, who had been got rid of at the same time on equally frivolous grounds, wrote to encourage him and the other deposed prelates in their adherence to the Antiochene formula, and to maintain the "Homoioasian" as the watchword of their party (Socr. H. E. ii. 45; Socr. H. E. iv. 27). The subtle Anomoean Eunomius was made bishop of Cyzicus in his room by Eudoxius, who had succeeded Macedonius as bishop of Constantinople (Socr. H. E. iv. 7; Philost. H. E. v. 3). Eunomius, however, failed to secure the goodwill of the people who refused to attend the church where he officiated, and built a church for himself outside the town. On the accession of Julian, a.d. 361, Elesius, in common with the other deposed prelates, returned to his see, from which he was soon expelled a second time by Julian, on the representation of the heathen inhabitants of Cyzicus, on account of the zeal he had shown against paganism (Soz. H. E. v. 15). The death of Julian's dream made it easy for Elesius to regain possession of his see. He took the lead at the Macedonian council of Lampsacon, a.d. 365 (Socr. H. E. iv. 4). At Nicomedia, a.d. 366, he weakly succumbed to Valens' threats of banishment and confiscation, and declared his acceptance of the Arian creed. Full of remorse at his cowardly submission, on his return to Cyzicus, he assembled his people, confessed and deplored his crime, and expressed a holy desire, since he had denied his faith, to resign his charge into the hands of a worthier bishop. The people of Cyzicus, who were devotedly attached to him, refused to accept his resignation (Socr. H. E. iv. 6; Philost. H. E. iv. 13). In a.d. 381 Elesius was the chief of the thirty-six bishops of Macedonian tenets summoned by Theodosius to the eccumenical Council of Constantinople in the hope of bringing them back to Catholic doctrine. This anticipation proved nugatory, and Elesius and his adherents obstinately refused all reconciliation, and maintained their heretical views on the Divinity of the Holy Ghost, in spite of their condemnation by the council. (Socr. H. E. v. 8;
ELEUSIUS—Bishops

77

ELEUTHERIUS (3), one of the fourteen bishops (of these unnamed) mentioned by Augustine as composing the synod of Diopolis (Lydda) on Pelagianism, A.D. 415 (Aug. contr. Julianum, I. 5, § 19, in Patr. Lat. xlv. 632). In that list was also a bishop Eutonius. There was at the same time at Diopolis the presbyter Julianus, known for the invention of the body of St. Stephen, and in his account of that matter (in Lipomani at inf.) he mentions two bishops that accompanied him from Diopolis to the place of the invention, Eultherius of Sebaste, and Eultherius of Jericho. Their identification among the fourteen synodal bishops (one only of whom is called Eultherius by Augustine) is made out by supposing that Eutonius was otherwise or properly Eultherius. It then remained to conjecture which of the two was the bishop of Sebaste and which of Jericho. Mansi assigns Eultherius to Jericho and Eutonius "sive Eultherius" to Sebaste; Le Quien, vice versa; (Lipomani, de vitis SS. ed. Suris, Aug. 3, iv. 147, Venet. 1581; Mansi, iv. 315, 316; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 692; Baron. 415, xiv.)

ELEUTHERIUS (4), bishop of Geneva in the 5th century. No credit is due to the story of the abbé Besson, the historian of the diocese of Geneva, that he was a native of Britain contemporary with Constantine, and died in 334. He is placed between Cassianus and Dominianus I (Gall. Christ. xvi. 378; Gams, Ser. Epis. 277.)

ELEUTHERIUS (5) (Gall. Christ. i. 863), archbishop of Avignon. [ELEUTHERIUS.]

ELEUTHERIUS (6), St., 8th in the list of bishops of Terracina, about A.D. 443. He was an African by birth, and succeeded his son St. Silvanus. He governed the see for "some years," and died Sept. 6, on which day he was commemorated at Terracina. The next bishop in the list, Martyrinus, was living in the year 502. (Ugolini. Ital. Soc. i. 1296.)

ELEUTHERIUS (7), a bishop addressed by Sidonius Apollinaris (vi. 11), who recommends to his notice a Jew, on the ground that there is hope while a Jew lives that he may become our brother. (Coll. Ant. Eccl. x. 390.)

ELEUTHERIUS (8), bishop of Chaledon, at the time of the council A.D. 451, whose decree he signed among the metropolitan. He also signed the synodal decree of Gennadius of Constantinople against the simoniacs, A.D. 459. He received a letter from the emperor Leo concerning the murder of St. Proterius of Alexandria, as if he held metropolitan rank, A.D. 458. (Le Quien, Oris. Christ. i. 602; Mansi, viii. 137, 322, 917.)

ELEUTHERIUS (9), said to have been elected patriarch of Constantinople, by the orthodox A.D. 484, in the time of the Eutychian Acacius and the emperor Zeno. Acacius had been communicated by pope Felix III. and a council at Rome. Eleutherius is said to have suffered much from Acacius and Zeno, and after a rule of seven years to have died towards the close of that reign (Migne, Encycl. Thesal. vi. 815). Fravitta succeeded Acacius; and no mention of ELEUTHERIUS (10), ST., commemorated Feb. 20, was the third bishop of Tournai, succeeding Theodorus and preceded by St. Melarius. The authorities for his life are of a late date, the earliest of them an anonymous one (to be found in Boll. Acta SS., Feb. iii. 187), being probably of the 9th or 10th century, and the recital is overlaid with legend. He was born at Tournai in the year a.d. 456, of Christian parents named Sereus and Blanda, whom the legends, ignoring the interval of about 150 years he converts years, St. Pius I. While he was still a young man a persecution of the Christians arose in Tournai, and the Franks, who were not yet converted, expelled the whole of them from the city. Eleutherius and his family, with many others, settled at Blandinium (presumably Blandain), a village a few leagues distant, where a church was built and Theodorus consecrated bishop. Upon his death Eleutherius, having first been sent by the Christians to Rome to obtain the sanction of the pope, was consecrated to the see. The date is variously given in 470, 483, 484, 487, 501, and 502. The weight of authority seems, however, in favour of the year 487. The first nine years of his episcopate were spent at Blandinium, but the conversion of Clovis and his followers enabled him to return to Tournai. His episcopate which lasted forty-five years, seems to have been chiefly passed in struggles with the pagans and heretics. The latter belonged to sects of the Arians, whose doctrines at this time influenced the greater part of Christian Gaul except the Franks. He is said to have visited Rome three times in all: first, on the occasion already mentioned, and twice when bishop during the pontificates of Symmachus and Hormidas, the two latter visits being in connexion with his efforts against heresy. With the same object he conveyed a synod about the year 527, in which he expounded the true faith and confuted his opponents. These efforts entailed much persecution, and finally in a.d. 531 or 532 his enemies lay in wait for him as he quitted a church, and so mistreated him that he was left for four years disabled of the injuries received on that occasion. He was buried at Blandinium, and his remains are said to have been translated twice. Among the miracles ascribed to him are the raising of a girl from the dead (see the somewhat romantic account in the first of the Lices, Boll. Acta SS. ut sup.) and the curing of a cripple, a blind man, and a leper. The following writings have been assigned to him: Sermo, seu Confessio de SS. Triumeate, said to have been presented by him to pope Symmachus in the fourteenth year of his episcopate; Transitus S. Eleutherii Episcopi; Sermo de Triumeate; Sermo de Incarnacione Domini; Sermo de Notabilis Domini; Sermo in Annumfianis Festum; and Oratio Beatii Eleutherii (see Migne, Patr. Lat. lxv. 89-102), but without sufficient authority. (Rivet, Hist. Lit. de la France, iii. 154; Gall. Christ. i. 863.)

[S. A. B.]

ELEUTHERIUS (11), ST., was the fifteenth bishop of Auerre, preceded by St. Droctoaldus, and followed by St. Romualdus. He is said to have sat twenty-eight years, from a.d. 532 to 561, the date of his death. Nothing further is known of him than that he was present at the four councils of Orleans, held in the years 533, 538, 541, and 549. He is commemorated on Aug. 16. (Gall. Christ. xii. 246; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iii. 298; Bar. ann. 530 exxiv., and 552 xxvii.; Labbe, Sacrae Conc. v. 929, 1282, 1371, 1384.)

[S. A. B.]

ELEUTHERIUS (12), a bishop in whose diocese, on an estate named Pancellus, the demon Maximus had erected an oratory in honour of the saint Cantiana. Eleutherius was requested by Pelagius I., bishop of Rome (555-560), to consecrate this oratory. (Pelag. Epist. fift fragm. Patr. Lat. lxix. 414; Ceillier, Antiqu. Sac. xi. 333.)

[T. H.]

ELEUTHERIUS (13), bishop of Cordova, signs the acts of the third council of Toledo in 589. (Esp. Segr. x. 227; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 238; Gomez Bravo, Catálogo de los Obispos de Cordoba, p. 64, ed. 1739.)

[M. A. W.]

ELEUTHERIUS (14) (LEUtherius in some MSS.), the first bishop of Salamanca of whom any record remains. He signs the acts of the third Council of Toledo, 589. The bishop of Salamanca was a suffragan of Merida up to the Moorish conquest, and is now under Valladolid. (Esp. Segr. xiv. 273; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 238.)

[M. A. W.]

ELEUTHERIUS (15), erroneously said by Gervase (Acta Pontif. in Tywsyl. 1630. 15) and after him by Dugdale (i. 81) to have been bishop of Arles, and to have consecrated Auchinleck (i.e. Auchinleck), bishop of Canterbury. The bishop named by Bede (H. E. i. 27) is Aetherius, and he was bishop of Lyon, not of Arles.

[C. H.]

ELEUTHERIUS (16), bishop of Lucca, signed the second Epistle of pope Agatho, which was sent in 680 after a synod in Rome to the third council of Constantinopel. (Mansi, xi. 307; Hefele, § 314.)

[A. H. D. A.]

ELEUTHERIUS (17), martyr in Persia under Sapor II. After he had become a Christian and had been instructed by Simees, a bishop, he began to preach amongst his countrymen; they judged information against him, and he was brought before the king, by whose orders he was tortured and put to death. He is commemorated April 13. (Menol. Bas.; AA. SS. Ap. ii. 130.)

[T. S. B.]

ELEUTHERIUS (18), soldier and martyr at Nicomedia in the Diocletian persecution. He was amongst those whom the emperor commanded to be put to death in consequence of his palace having been burned, as he supposed, by the Christians. (Mart. Hier., Ad., Us.) He is commemorated Oct. 2.

[T. S. B.]

[T. S. B.]

ELEUTHERIUS (20), martyr at Tarsus in Bithynia, commemorated on Aug. 4. He was native of Byzantium, a senator, and a chamberlain in the palace of Maximian at Nicomedia.
Having embraced the Christian faith, but fearing to avow it, he procured some land beyond the Sanganus, where he built a house with an un-grounded chapel in which he set up altars and silver lamps. He also employed a priest to minister in it, and here he was secretly baptized.
He returned to court, but retired as often as possible to his retreat. The emperor, becoming suspicious, visited him there, discovered the crypt, learned the whole truth, and finally came to do it be put to death. (Cotel. Mon. iii.
193; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. i. 318.) Tillemonr identifies this martyr with Eleutherius of Oct. 2 (No. 18), but Papebroche argues against that view (Tillen. Men. v. 25, art. ix.; Boll. ut sup.
p. 320 c).

[ C. H. ]

ELEUTHERIUS (21), mentioned by Bar-onius among the martyrs of Byzantium, A.D.
311. (Baron. Annual. ann. 311, xix.) [C. H.]

ELEUTHERIUS (22), abbat of St. Mark, at Spoleto, 6th century.
From him, whom he styles venerable father, Gregory the Great had the story of Isaac the Ixxvii. p. 244), who settled at Spoleto. Eleuth-erius was his authority for various anecdotes mentioned in the Dialogues, as that of the young noblewoman of Spoleto dishonored by her father for refusing to marry (Dialog. iii. 21), that of the possessed boy at a convent (iii. 33), and that of Eleutherius's own brother John having sum-mmoned with his dying breath the monk Ursus, then in a distant monastery, to follow him (iv. 35).

He was a greatly honored friend of Gregory, who relates (Dialog. iii. 33) his being rescued one from the devil, which, however, he considers to have only heard of from some of his disciples (u. s. 33). Gregory's own recovery through the abbot's prayers is also related by Adrian I. in one of his letters to Charlemagne, which is given in full by Baronius (a. a. 604, xxxiv.). Eleutherius died in the monastery of St. Andrew's at Rome, where he frequently stayed, and, it is said, expired in the arms of Gregory, a.D. 585. The Canonists have much about him. (Act. Sanct. Sept. 6, ii. 685; see also Peter de Natal. Catal. SS. viii. 45, and the Martyrologies.) His body was first buried in St.
Mark at Spoleto, but was afterwards removed to the church of St. Peter in that city (Act.
Sanct. u. s.).

[T. W. D.]

ELEUTHERIUS (29), exarch of Ravenna, a.
D. 616, 620. He is called "patriicus et cubicularius," and never actually "exarch," in the Liber Pontificalis, the only authority for his life, but there can be no doubt that he should be ranked among the exarchs. He came to Ravenna
a. D. 616, and executed all who had been concerned in the death of his predecessor, John Lemigius. He then went to Rome, where he was well received by the pope Deusdedit. He passed on to Naples, where he defeated and killed John Cempisina, who had set himself up as a rebel against the empire. He then returned to Ravenna annually, for a time in peace; but in 619 Deusde-dit, in Liber Pontificalis, Migne. ccxxvii. 685.) About A.D. 620 we find that he set himself up as emperor in Italy; he was, however, killed (by his own soldiers according to one reading of the Lib. Pont.), and his head sent to Constantinople.
He was a cunning, like one at least of his processors, and like the rest of his successors. (S.
Bonnifi. V. in discussion of his pontificate, Migne, h 693; Paulinus Diaconus, iv. 34; Erch and Graber, Encycl. "Exarch und Exarchat," xxxix. i, p. 318.)

[A. H. D. A.]

ELEUTHERIUS (1), Bishop of Rome in the reign of Marcus Aurelius and Commodus, during 15 years, 6 months, and 5 days, according to the Libyan catalogue as compiled by Turkish pope, places his accession in the 17th year of Antoninus Verus (i.e. Marcus Aurelius), viz.
A.D. 177; which date would involve A.D. 192 as that of his death. But the consuls given in the Liberian catalogue as contemporary with his election and death (a cons. Veri et Hereniani usuque Paterno et Bradus) are those of 171 and 185. For a discussion of the more probable dates see "Lipsius, Chronol. der römischen Bischöfe."

Hegesippus, quoted by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 22), states that at the time of his own arrival in Rome Eleutherus was deacon of Anicetus, who was then bishop, and that he became bishop on the death of Anicetus. The successor of Anicetus (cf. Irenaeus adv. Haeres. iii. 9, and Jerome de Vir. ilustr. c. 22).

As is the case with the generality of Roman bishops of the earlier centuries, the episcopate of this prelate is memorable rather for contemporary events and celebrations than for anything certainly known of himself or his influence on the age. He was contemporary with the Aurelanian persecution. There is, however, no evidence of the Church of Rome itself having suffered under it to any great extent; and after the death of Aurelius the Christians there, as elsewhere, are known to have had peace, in consequence, it is said, of Marcian, the conciliator of Commodus, being favourably disposed towards them; the only recorded exception in Rome being the martyrdom of Apollinaris in the reign of Commodus (Euseb. H. E. v. 21, Jerome, Cata-
l. c. 42). The chief sufferers under Aurelius were the churches of Asia Minor and Southern Gaul. With the persecution in the latter region, which took place A.D. 177, and of which the Christians of Lyons and Vienne were the victims, the name of Eleutherus has become connected from the following circumstance. Eusebius has not only preserved long and interesting extracts from an account of the persecution, addressed by the Christians of Lyons and Vienne. to those of Asia and Phrygia (H. E. v. 1), but states further that, opinions being divided as to the claims to inspiration of Montanus and his colleagues (Montanus having asserted his pretensions about the middle of the century), these same Christians of Gaul expressed their own judgment on the question, setting forth also divers epistles which had been addressed by their martyrs, while still in prison, to the churches of Asia and Phrygia, and to Eleutherus, bishop of Rome; which letter had been sent by the hands of Irenaeus, described as still a presbyter, "for the sake of the peace of the churches" (H. E. v. 1). The fact of the bishop of Rome having been especially addressed on this occasion has been added as an instance of the acknowledgment difficulty in placing the sojourn in Rome of these heresiarchs in the episcopate of Eleutherus, Valentinus certainly, according to other accounts, having died previously. (See Tilmont on Eleutherus.)

Besides these noted heresiarchs, Florinus and Blastus, two degraded presbyters of Rome, bronched during the episcopate of Eleutherus certain heresies of their own, of which nothing is known except what may be gathered from the titles of certain lost treatises written against them by Ireneus, viz. De Schismate, De Opifcio, and Of Monarchianism in the West, about which there is no dispute. Of the course taken by Eleutherus with respect to Montanus nothing can be alleged with certainty. By some he is supposed to have believed in him for a time, and countenanced him, the grounds of this supposition being these. Tertullian (adv. Prax. c. I.) states that a bishop of Rome gave credence for a time to the claims of Montanus and his two pupils, though his predecessor had condemned them, and issued letters of peace in their favour, but afterwards, after the arrival at Rome, and at the instigation of Praxeas (the author subsequently of the Patrispanian heresy) retracted his temporary approval. Some have thought this bishop of Rome, whom Tertullian does not name, was Eleutherus, the supposition being supported by the statement of Eusebius that the mission of Ireneus by the martyrs was "for the sake of the peace of the churches," from which it is concluded that they recommended conciliatory measures. This view is taken by Pearson, Cave, Valerius, and Neander. Others, however, as Tilmont, Bower, Giesler, and Milman (though the last of these somewhat doubtfully) prefer the supposition of Victor, the successor of Eleutherus, being the bishop referred to, as agreeing better with the probable dates of the rise of Montanism and of the arrival of Praxeas in Rome. Baronius supposes Anicetus, the predecessor of Soter, to be the bishop of Rome referred to, and accounts for his temporary approval of heretics by supposing the superior sanctity of their lives, for which they were at that time principally notorious, and not their errors, to have called forth his letters in their favour.

Montanism was not the only heresy that troubled the episcopate of Eleutherus. The Alexandrian and Syrian forms of Gnosticism developed by Basilides and Valentinus, and by Cerdo and Marcion, were at their height, and gained many adherents in Rome. Valentinus and Cerdo came thither between A.D. 138 and A.D. 142; Marcion a little later. Having attached himself to the Syrian Gnostic Cerdo, he developed his own peculiar system. According to Tertullian (de Praescript. Haeres. c. 30), both Valentinus and Marcion were in Rome during the episcopate of Eleutherus, under whom they were twice excommunicated, two hundred sestertia which Marcion had offered to the church being restored to him on his dismissal. Tertullian adds that Marcion again sought re-admission into the church, which was accorded him on condition of his bringing back with him those whom he had seduced into heresy, a condition which he accepted, but was prevented from fulfilling by death. There is, however, some story with Llandaff, saying that there ' Lleirwmg made the first church, which was the first in the isle of Brittain, and gave lands and privileges to those who embraced the faith of Christ'. The book of Llandaff also, written in the 12th century, repeats the story. In the same century William of Malmesbury and Geoffrey of Monmouth tell the tale with many details: the former, in his Antiquitates of Glastonbury, connects the mission with that place, and from both together we learn that Elvan and Medwin were the founders, and that Lucius was Pope, and that they were by him consecrated bishops; that Fugacius (or Fagan) and Damian were the Pope's legates sent to Britain, and that three archbishops and twenty-eight bishops were founded in the island. A further connexion of the tradition with Llandaff is found in the dedication of certain churches in the diocese to Lleirwmg, Dyfyan, Fagan, and Medwy.

Thus the history of the story as far as we can trace it is this. It is found first in its simplest form in the Pontifical annals at Rome, in the 6th century. It is introduced into Britain by Bede in the 8th: it grows into the conversion of the whole of Britain in the 9th; it appears full-fledged, enriched with details, and connected with both Llandaff and Glastonbury in the 12th. What ground is there for believing in a fact for its foundation? The accretion of details is of course untrustworthy. Two suppositions involved in the story as told by Bede, that Lucius was king of the Britons generally, and that a mission from Rome to him was the main origin of Christiani in Britain; the other that the Pope of the first, as inconsistent with the known political condition of the country under the Roman empire; the second on the ground that the resistance to Roman claims on the part of the British bishops when Augustin came from Rome A.D. 597, and the difference at that time of their customs from those of Rome point to some source of their Christianity other than the Roman Church. See the question remains whether the statement in the Eusebian catalogue may not be true, involving as it does no more than this: that a British prince called in Latin Lucius, having gained some knowledge of Christianity from Gallie or native believers, applied to Eleutherus for instruction in the faith, and that a mission from Rome followed. Some of the arguments adduced by those who discredit the whole story are inconclusive. Ist. It is said that Bede is at fault in his dates, giving A.D. 158 instead of 161 as the date of the accession of Marcus Aurelius, and being otherwise confused or inaccurate. But, even if the error above noticed could not be so easily accounted for by the want or resemblance between the Roman numerals CLVI and CLXI, chronological inaccuracies in the transmitter of a tradition do not invalidate the truth of the story itself, if otherwise probable. 2ndly. The silence of all general ecclesiastical historians is alleged: to which argument it may be replied that such a transaction as this may be supposed to have been between a bishop of Rome and an obscure British prince may easily have escaped the notice of such writers, or been deemed of less importance than to claim admission in general histories of the Church. But 3rdly. The silence of Gildas, and his apparent ignorance of the whole story, is a valid argument against its truth; as is also the entire absence of any mention of the mission to Lucius in the earlier edition of the Pontifical catalogue, viz. the Liberian, A.D. 354. Such complete silence on the subject of the early British and even Roman records suggests strongly the probability that the story was first fabricated at Rome in or before the 6th century, and owed its origin to the same motive that has caused many other successive additions to the Pontifical annals, the desire to trace the origin of all western churches to some bishop of Rome. On the other hand, it may be argued that there is nothing improbable in the original story itself, that it is more likely to have had some fact than pure invention for its origin, and that the Welsh traditions about Lleirwmg, though unnoticed by Gildas, may have been ancient and genuine ones, independent of Bede's account. Lingard takes this view, laying stress on the dedication of churches in the diocese of Llandaff to Lleirwmg and the saints associated with him, and supposing him to have been an independent British prince outside the Roman pale.

In confirmation of the truth of the story it is alleged further the fact that, shortly after the death of Eleutherus, the writer of the Liber Pontificalis at Rome begins to speak of British Christianity. For Tertullian, Cyprian, and Arnobius are the first to allude to the triumphs of the Gospel, though partial, in this remote island. What they say, however, is quite consistent with the earlier, and other than Roman, origin of the British church; and it may be that it was the very fact of their having borne this testimony that suggested the idea of Eleutherus, a pope shortly anterior to their date, being the one to whom the mission might be assigned. It may be remarked in conclusion that undue heat has been introduced into the controversy on the subject from advocates of one or the other view being anxious, on polemical grounds, to prove or disprove the connexion with, and subordination to, Rome of the early British church.

In the Liber Pontificalis Eleutherus is said to have ordained that all kinds of food were to be allowed to Christians; and there is a spurious decretal attributed to him, addressed to the provinces of Gaul, containing this ordinance about food, with others about the trial of clerics by provincial synods, with an appeal to Rome. In some later MSS. of the so-called laws of Edward the Confessor there is also a letter from Eleutherus to king Lucius, undoubtedly spurious.

He is commemorated in the Roman Calendar on the 26th of May as a saint and martyr, having however no claim. resting on any ancient authority, to the latter title. [J. B.—Y.]

ELEUTHERUS (S), a resident in a village of Lydia, by whom Lampetius, one of Chrysostom's partisans, was hospitably received during the persecution of the Joannites. (Pallad. Dial. p. 195.) [E. V.]

ELEUTHERUS (S), a martyr at Caesarea in Cappadocia. Commemorated Sept. 27. (Mart. Hier., Wand.) Ferrarius says he was put to death during the reign of Hadrian, but this seems very uncertain (AA. SS. Sept. vii. 482). [T. S. E.]

ELEVARA (Chron. Centulens. Ill. 29), martyr. [ELENARA.]

G
ELFAN (ELVAN) appears in the legend of King Lucius and his application to pope Melch-etherus for instruction in the Christian faith. According to Bale he was surnamed Avalonius. As the account of Lucius is considerably uncertain, that of Elfan or Elvan must be infinitely more obscure, though in monkish legend there is no hesitation in accepting him. [LUCIUS.] According to the Welsh Triads, and the Silurian Catalogues of Saints, the application was made to Rome by Lleuder Mawr or Lleuwrg ab Coel ab Cyllin, otherwise more usually known as king Lucius, and Elvanus sent four persons, named Dyfan, Plegan, Medwy, and Elfan, to inform him in the Catholic truth. ButElfan is generally spoken of as messenger, along with Medwy, from Lucius to the pope, as having received baptism and the orders of a bishop from Elvanus, and then as having been sent back with two additional companions to teach his countrymen the faith. The Welsh authorities say that Elfan presided over a body of Christians at Glassonbury, where Harp- ofield says he was educated; but according to Jocelyne of Furnes, he succeeded Theunan, and thus became the second bishop of London. As contemporary with pope Elvanus, Elfan must be placed in the end of the 2nd century. Piseus, following Radulphus Niger and Bale, attributes to him a work entitled De Origine Ecclesiae Britanniae, and Demeter cites this by saying he was the first who illustrated Scotch affairs, and wrote in the ancient Scotch tongue Historia Scotiae, lib. 1., De origine Scotiae, lib. i.; but none of these extant or otherwise known. (Baronius, Ann. ii. a.D. 183; Radulphus Niger, Chron. a.D. 179, § 37; Bale, cent. i. c. 19; Piseus, de Hist. Angl. Scrip. 14, 79; Holland, Acta SS. Jan. i. tom. i. 10; Geoffrey Monm. Hist. l. cc. 19–29; Demeter, Hist. Inf. Gent. Not. l. 264; Usher, Hist. Inf. c. 31, u.s. v. 53 sq. ; Roes, V. Script. Sci. 32 sq.; Lib. Landar. 230 sq.; Gille, Hist. Anc. Brit. l. 255 sq.; R. Nicolson, Th. Hist. Libr. 96, 3rd ed.; Tanner, Bibl. 264; Creasy, Ch. Hist. Brit. l. 3 sq.)

[J. G.]

ELFIN (AELFFYN, AELFYW, ELVIN), Welsh saint of the 6th century, and son of Didan by Daudlow, daughter of Grynwr of Cefnogawr. The church of St. Elfin, co. Pembroke, is dedicated to him, and his name is probably derived from St. Ailbe, who may have baptized him when living at Menevia (Res, Welsh Saints, 162–3; Williams, Eloc Welsh. 11).

[J. G.]

ELFIN (ELPHIN) (1) was a saint of the college of St. Illtyd in the beginning of the 6th century. He was son of Gwvdan Garanhir by Garonhaw, descended according to the Welsh tradition from Maeen Wledig (i.e. Maximus the Roman emperor of the West). In the Myrygian Archaeology, vol. i. 17, and more fully in the Cambrian Quarterly Magazine, vol. v. 200, there is a prose tale or Mabinogion, entitled Hanes Taliesin, which gives a weird-like account of the saving of Taliesin by Elfthin from death in infancy and of Taliesin's gratitude, which among other things prompted the composition of the Dduadant Elphin, or The Consolations of Elfthin (Mgy. Arch. l. 20). This is in reality a romance, probably belonging to the 12th or 13th century. The Hanes Taliesin is also given, with a translation and notes, in Lady Cl. Guest's Mabinogion, iii. 321 sq. As Elfthin and Elphun his name often occurs in the poetry of Taliesin. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 108, 236–7; Skene's Peer Anc. Books of Wales, i. eu. 2–11; Williams, Eloc. Welsh. 138.)

ELFFYN (2), clerical witness to a grant made to Grecelis bishop of Llandaff, about the close of the 7th century (Lib. Land. by Recr. 421–22).

[J. G.]

ELFFRITT (Brut y Tywysog), text in M. H. B. 842, king of Northumbria, son of Oswy. [ALGFRETH (1), ALGFRETH.] [C. H.]

ELFLED (Nemius, Hist. Brit. cap. 66, in M. H. B. 74, b. marg. EANFED), daughter of Edwin king of Northumbria, an error for Eanfled, who had a daughter Elfled. [C. H.]

ELFLED (1) (AELFFLED, AELFLED, AELFLED), abbess of Whitby, daughter of Oswy king of Northumbria, and of Eanfled daughter of king Edwin. In 655 her father vowed that if she succeeded Penda king of Mercia, he would dedicate his child to God's service, and send her from him full-handed as well. The vow was achieved, and Elfled, then scarcely a year old, was set apart for a conventual life. Her father gave her a noble fortune, and sent her to the monastery of Heretau (Hartlepool), over which Hild was abbess. After two years Hild acquired some ground at Streaneshalh (Whitby), where she built a monastery, which became a house of renown. Thither Elfled went, and there, first as pupil and lastly as abbess, she spent the remainder of her life. She died at the age of fifty-nine, and was buried at Whitby, where her father and mother were interred (Bed. H. E. iii. 24). In the management of her house Elfled had for a long time the valuable help of Trumwine, sometime bishop of the Fricts, who died and was buried at Whitby. (Bed. H. E. iv. 26.)

In the latter days of Wilfrid, Elfled took a strong part in alyning the animosity against him, and it was chiefly her recollections of the last wishes of king Aldfrith which brought about his recall at the synod on the Nidd. Elfrith, full of gratitude, calls the peace-making abbess, "semper totius provinciae consolatrix, optimum consolatrix" (Vita Wilfridi, cap. xliii. lix. 1.)

Elfled was a friend and a great admirer of Cuthbert. On one occasion he is said to have cared her of an infirmity with his girdle (Bed. Vita S. Cath. cap. 23). In A.D. 684 she and Cuthbert had an interview on Coquet island, in the course of which he revealed to her the nearly approaching end of her brother Egfrith, and his own elevation to the episcopate (H. cap. 24). Elfled also gave an account to the anonymous biographer of Cuthbert of a vision in which the saint had beheld Hwadwald, one of the brethren at Whitby, carried up into heaven (Vita, inter Bed. Opp. Mss. 280–1, and Bed. Vita S. Cath. cap. 34).

ELFLEDA (2) (AELFLEDA, ADELEFLEDA, ASELEFLEDA), a daughter of Osra king of Mer-ELFOD.

ELFOD (Elford). [S.]

ELFIRA (1), abbess of Repton (Ripon), the monastery in which St. Guthlac received the tonsure. (Msb. A.A. SS. O. S. B. sec. iii. pt. 1, p. 260.) [S.]

ELFIRA (2), daughter of Ofa king of Mercia. [ELFETHRITHA (2).] [C. H.]

ELFRYT (Bryt y Tywryd, Eng. transl. in M. H. B. 442), king of Northumbria, son of Oswy. [ALFETHRITHA (1), AELFRYTHA (1).] [C. H.]

ELFETHRITHA (1) (AELFRYTHA), a lady mentioned in the letter addressed by Wulhere, bishop of Lichfield, to Archbishop Rhyddodd, a widowed mother under Ceolwulf, king of the Mercians, had lately been held, in which “the reconciliation of Elfethritha was discussed. Nothing more is known of the matter; as the dates run, she may be identified with the abbess of Repton (ELFIRA (1)).” (See Haddon and Stubbs, vol. 275; Smith’s Bede, app. n. 24, pp. 700, 747. [S.]

ELFETHRITHA (2), daughter of Ofa, king of Mercia, betrothed to Ethelfred, king of the East Angles. (Dor. Wig. M. H. B. 619.) She is not mentioned by 0fa in the Charters (Kemble, C. D. 1.41) in which he names his other daughters, but she is described in the legendary life of St. Ethelred as a noble and claret; she was the sister of Ceolcan (Cirencester, Spec. Hist. ed. Mayor, i. 286, 287). Brompton (Twycoten, c. 730) adds that she retired as a solitary to the anchorites at Crewland, and that she prophesied that her brother Ethelfred would reign only three years after Ethelbert’s death. The author of the lives of the two Ofs calls her Aelfreda. (Vir. Hist., O.C. Ed. Wits, p. 24.) See ELFETHRITHA (3). There appears no authority for the spelling Elfida adopted by Hume. Florence writes it AELFRYTHA (Geneal. in M. H. B. 630), and ALFRYTHA (Ad Coro. App. in M. H. B. 638) ed.; Richard of Cirencester (Spec. Hist. i. 286, ed. Mayor) writes ALFRYTHA in the heading, and AELFRYTHA in the text; Brompton (Coron. in Twycoten X. Scrivitt, col. 750, 39), ALFRYTHA. Among later historians, Turner (Hist. Engl. i. 414, ed. 1839) writes Elfethritha; Lappenberg (Hist. Engl. ed. Thorpe, 1845, i. 235, 237), AELFRYTHA and (p. 291, Steamma) AELFRYTHA; Lindarg (Hist. Engl. i. 144, ed. 1849), Ethelreda. [S.]

ELFETHRITHA (3), the wife of Kenulf, king of Mercia. [KENULF. [S.]

ELFWAD (Chron. de Maires, ann. 791, ed. Stevenson), king of Northumbria, son of Oswulf. [ELFWAD (2).] [C. H.]

ELFWALD (1) (AELFWALD), king of East Anglia. According to the Chronicle of Malmesbury, he succeeded Szelred in 747 and died in 749, whereupon East Anglia was divided between Hunbain and Albert. Simeon of Durham also states, without mentioning Szelred, that Elfwald died in 749, when the kingdom was divided between Hunbain and Albert. William of Malmesbury is silent as to Elfwald, and states that Brunno, ie. Hunbain, was succeeded by Berulf and Ealduf, and the two by Elfwald (ob. 664). This last statement suggests the inquiry whether Malmesbury’s Elfwald may not be identical with the Elfwald of the Chron. Mcl. If he be, then this king and his brother Aulduf between them reigned eighty-five years (664-749), which is very difficult to conceive. Lappenberg assumes the identity, but does not appear to have observed what it involves. Hickes also assumes the identity, and makes Beorra succeed in 690, so reducing the united reigns of the two brothers to the reasonable period of twenty-six years, but he does not attempt to justify his chronology, and is evidently dissatisfied with it. The 80 years appears too conjectural. It appears preferable then to assume the non-identity of Ecclewood and Elfwall, and to attribute to Malmesbury an omission of the two kings mentioned by the Chron. Mcl., Szelred and Elfwall. Hardy takes this line, making the succession run thus:—Elfewald (ob. 664), Aulduf, Ecclewood, Szelred (ob. 747), Elfewald (ob. 749), Hunbain. The objection to this scheme would be that Szelred, whom the Chron. Mcl. reckons a king of East Anglia, was in reality king of the East Saxons. It is met by Hardy concluding that there must have been two Szelreds. It might also be met by an alternative hypothesis, that one Szelred ruled both the contiguous states.

In the correspondence of Boniface of Maltot occurs a letter to him from Elfwald, king of East Anglia, variously written by the editors Elfwald (Migne), Aelfwald (Jaffé and Sertrunus), Ashewald (Wurtzwein). It is dated by Migne A.D. 733, and by Jaffé 747-749. The king assures Boniface that his instructions as to masses and the frequency of prayers shall be followed in the monasteries of his kingdom; that Boniface’s name shall be held in perpetual memory in the services of the seven hours; that the royal bounty in support of the monasteries shall be regulated in accordance with Boniface’s recommendation; that Boniface shall be regarded as their patron; that the names of those who through Boniface’s prayers die in the faith of the undivided Trinity shall be introduced in the public prayers. (Chron. de Mailt, ed. Stevenson, pp. 4, 5, or in Gale’s Script. i. 137; Sym. Dun. ed. Surtess Soc. p. 19; Malm. G. R. A. i. 98, ed. Hardy, and note; Wend. F. H. ed. Cole, i. 154, ann. 655, note; Lappenberg, Hist. Engl. ed. Thorpe, i. 243, 244, Thorpe’s note 3, 287 General; Hickes’ Thesaur. pars 3, tab, chron. p. 184.) [ECLWALD, EAST ANGLES]. In 747-749 the see of Elfwall was occupied by either Ethelfrith or Eanfrith, and the see of Dunwich by Eardred or Eardulf, one of whom, if they are different persons, attended the council of Clovesho in 747. [C. H.]

G 2
ELFWIN

665 a, b, 666 c, 667 a, b, 668 a; Chron. de Maltros, ed. Stevenson, 758, 793; id. ann. 791, ed. Gale, Script. ii. 139, where Stevenson has Elfward, king of Northumbria, son of Oswulf [Alfwold].

[C. H.]

ELFWIN (Aelfuin, Aelwin, Elwin, Aelfwine), son of Osywy, and brother of Egfrid, kings at Northumbria. He was present with his brother of the dedication of Ripon minster (Eddi Viða Wiffridi, cap. 19). When Wilfrid appealed to Rome against the decision of Egfrid the courtiers were driven out on that day their laughter would be turned into tears. On that very day the corpse of Elfwin was brought to York amidst the lamentations of the whole kingdom (Id. cap. 19). This took place in a.D. 679. Elfwin was slain in a battle between Egfrid and his brother-in-law Ethelred king of Mercia, near the river Trent, being then only eighteen years of age. By the intervention of Archbishop Theodore Egfrid was satisfied with the payment of a blood-money from Ethelred, and peace was restored (Bed. H. E. iv. 21; Sax. Chron. Flor. Wigm. i. 35).

[J. R.]

[C. H.]

ELGAR, ST., the hermit, a life of whom is printed in the Liber Laudensis, p. 1. The life says that he was born in Devonshire, and taken by pirates as a slave to Ireland. He at last escaped to Bardsey, off Carnarvonshire, called in the British tongue Ynys Enlli, or the Island of the Current, from the violence of the current, now called Bardsey Race, between it and the mainland. The only dates mentioned are that Ructri, grandson of Conchor, was ruling in Ireland, and that North Wales was desolate for seven years (? by plague). His remains were removed to Llandaf, in 1120, after which date the life must have been written (see Haddan and Stubbs, Concilia, i. 161, who point out the very doubtful character of these lives. The legends are unhistorical, but the persons for the most part really existed).

[C. W. B.]

ELGISIL (Stubbs, Reg. Sacr. 615.)

[ElwyStyl-]

ELGUSD lived in the latter half of the 6th century, but has no festival or church dedication. He was son of Cadfarch ab Caradog Fraithfocs ab Gwen. Gwen is known as St. Gwennelin of Talgarth, and was daughter or grand-daughter of Brychan of Brycheiniog (Rees, Welsh Saints, 150, 202, 280).

[J. G.]

ELGWGORD. [Elwrgord.]

ELHAEARN (Aelhaiarn, Aelmayarn, Elmear), son of Hygfaerel ab Cynlynw of Llanon, Montgomeryshire, in Caernarvon, Montgomeryshire. His festival is Nov. 1, and he founded Llanelaia, Carnarvonshire, and Cegidvy, or Guilsfield, Montgomeryshire (Myvn. Arch. ii. 24, 41; Rees, Welsh Saints, 275; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 593; Williams, Emais. Welsh. 11). [J. G.]

ELHAEFED, a clerical witness to the grant of the village of Bertus by "King Ithael in the presence of Meirig (Ithael’s father), before the chief-tains of Glevysig, to bishop Berthgwyn,” as bishop of Llandaff, in the end of the 6th or opening of the 7th century (Lich. Land. by Rees, 440-41).

[J. G.]

ELI (Itu), a clerical witness to many grants to the church of Llandaff, while Berthgwyn and Trychan were the bishops, in the end of the 8th and beginning of the 7th centuries (Lich. Land. by Rees, 454 sq.).

[J. G.]

ELIAB, deacon and martyr of Ethiopia. He was one of forty martyrs, viz.: two bishops, Abdas and Elaneus, sixteen presbyters, nine deacons, six monks, and seven virgins, who were slain on Saturday, May 15, in the sixty-sixth year of Sapor II. king of Persia (309-381), a.d. 375. Eliab was one of the clergy of a city called Casarea, of which Abdas was bishop. Eliab is commemorated in the Ethiopian calendar on December 2 (see Assemari Acta SS. Martyrum Orientalum et Occidentalis, 1748, part i. p. 144; Ludolf, Historia Ethipica (ed. Baldus; Robertson, Ch. Hist. i. p. 291)). [J. W. S.]

ELIAN, Geimlad (the pilgrim), a Welsh saint, whose name is confused with that of Hilary. His churches at Llanelliai, Anglesey, and Llanelsi, Denbighshire (near Montgomery, of which is a famous well), were renowned for the care of diseases. His wake was held in August (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 297). [C. W. B.]

ELIANUS (Aelianus), the proconsul of Africa, before whom Felix bishop of Aptum, the successor of Caecilian of Carthage, was tried, and acquitted on the charge of having been a "traditor," a.d. 314. Optatus (Migne, Patr. Lat. xi.; De Schismate Donat. i. 25) narrates the actual words of the proconsul’s decision. Aelianus also received letters from the emperor Constantine about the conveyance of the African bishops to the council of Arles. (Ibid. Hist. vii. note 7; Ceillier, v. 112.) [L. D.]

ELIANUS (Aelianus), a pagan, with whom St. Gregory Thaumaturgus disputed. Certain expressions in the exposition of the faith that Gregory composed on this occasion were wrested by the Sabellians to the support of theiretical views, but St. Basil exposes the fallacy of their reasoning (Basil. Ep. 210, in Migne, Patr. Gr. xxxii. 316; Greg. Thaum. Frag. de Tris. in Migne, Patr. Gr. x. 1103, 1143; Ceillier, ii. 442.) [L. D.]

ELIANUS (Aelianus), one of the leaders of the rebellion of the Bagaudae in Gaul, to subdue which the Theban legion was brought by Maximian from the East. Aelianus was slain in the battle which decided the fate of the rebellion. (Entrop. Hist. ix. 20; Oros. vii. 25; Baroz. A. E. ann. 297, iv.; Martin, Hist. de France, i. 281; Ceillier. Aut. Eccl. ii. 473.) [R. T. S.]

ELIAS (I), bishop of Jerusalem, a.d. 494-513; he was an Arab by birth and received his education with his friend Martyrius, also bishop of Jerusalem, in one of the Nitrian monasteries. Being driven from Egypt by Timothy Aelurus, the two friends took refuge, a.d. 494, in the laura of St. Euthymius, who received them with great favour, admitted them to frequent converse, and predicted that they would both be bishops of Jerusalem. Euthymius took them to... his companions in his periodical retreats and administered the Eucharist to them every Sunday (Cyril. Scyth. Vit. S. Euthym. nos. 94, 95). After a time Elias quitted the laura with Martyrius, and constructed for himself a cell at Jericho, which in process of time, by successive enlargements, became a monastery. The first friends met at Euthymius' death-bed in A.D. 473, though not present at his actual departure (ib. nos. 109, 110). Anastasius, the bishop of Jerusalem, having come down to the laura for the translation of the body of St. Euthymius, took Elias and Martyrius back with him and ordained them to the priesthood on the roll of the church of the Anastasis (ib. No. 111). Five years later, A.D. 478, Martyrius succeeded Anastasius as bishop of Jerusalem, and was followed by Sallustius in A.D. 486, who dying in A.D. 494, Elias became his successor. Moschus records that having practised total abstinence from wine as a monk he observed the same rule as bishop. In 535, according to the practice of the times his residence became the nucleus of a collection of cells of ascetics, which developed into a monastery adjacent to the church of the Anastasis (Cyril. Scyth. Vit. S. Sabae, c. 31). At the time of Elias' succession to the patriarchate, the Christian world exhibited a melancholy spectacle of discord. There were at least four great parties mutually anathematizing one another. The church of Rome denounced the whole of the East as heretical, with the exception of the monks of Constantinople, who thought more highly of communion with the bishop of Rome than with their own bishops, on account of their refusal to recognise the excommunication of Acacius. The Eastern church, though comprehended under the general ban, and forced into seeming unity by the Henoticion of Zeno, was split into three by intestine divisions. While Alexandria and the bishops of Egypt subscribed the Henoticion and rejected the decrees of Chalcedon, the churches of Jerusalem, Antioch, and Constantinople, though also accepting the Henoticion, maintained themselves independent in law and fact; they were unwilling to enforce them. Besides this, there was the extreme section of the Eutychians or Monophysites, as they now preferred to be called, known as Acephali, who regarded the council of Chalcedon as tainted with Nestorianism, and cherished the memory of Dioscorus and Eutyches. Elias, as a leader of the party of the centre, was in communion with Euphemius of Constantinople, and on his deposition and banishment, in 496, ostensibly on the ground of treasonable practices, he maintained communion with his successor, the gentle and peaceable Macedonius, on being assured of his orthodoxy, though without expressing his approval of Euphemius' removal, much to the annoyance of the emperor Anastasius. When the Monophysite party in Syria, under the leadership of Xenias of Hierapolis, broke out into open insurrection, treating as heretics all who acknowledged the two natures, Elias was one of the chief objects of their attack. In A.D. 509 they demanded a confession of his faith, and Anastasius required him to convene a council to repudiate the decrees of Chalcedon. He declined to summon a council, but he drew up a letter to the emperor, containing a statement of his belief, accompanied by anathemas of Nestorius, Eutyches, Diodorus, and Theodore of Mopsuestia. This letter was entrusted to members of the Acephali to convey to Constantinople. When it was opened, it was found to contain an anathema against the two natures. According, however, to the emperor, having falsified the document and thus laid him open to the charge, which he found it very hard to refute, of having condemned the council of Chalcedon (Evagr. H. E. iii. 31; Theodor. Lect. p. 561; Theophan. Chronogr. pp. 128, 130). Macedonius having been deposed A.D. 511, and Timotheus, the patrocles, summoned on the former occasion, he with Flavius declined to acknowledge the justice of Macedonius' deposition, and with the same result. Communion with Timotheus was of no avail, unless they would recognise him as the rightful bishop. On their refusal, the long-stifled wrath of Anastasius broke out vehemently against his two feeble and wavering antagonists, and he availed himself of the ready services of Soterichus, bishop of the Cappadocian Caesarea, and Xenaisa, to accomplish their ruin. In obedience to the emperor's directions, a synod was convened at Side, A.D. 512, to condemn the decrees of Chalcedon and remove the two unaccommodating prelates (Theophan. p. 131; Marcellin. Chronicon; Coteler. Mon. Eccl. Gr. iii. 300; Lobbe, Concil. iv. 1414). Elias, in alarm, despatched St. Sabas to Constantinople to plead his cause with the emperor (Cyril. Scyth. Vit. S. Sab. No. 50). Meanwhile, he and his companion Flavius by their diplomatic address succeeded in breaking up the council before it had pronounced any sentence on them. After its separation they addressed complimentary letters to the emperor, acknowledging his disposal of their real sentiments. By this mean compliance they succeeded in keeping their see a short time longer. Their implacable enemies, Soterichus and Xenaisa, furious at having missed their aim, represented to the emperor that he had been imposed upon by these adroit masters of language, who were really at heart supporters of the impious doctrines of Nestorius. Anastasius, ready to believe the worst of those who had repeatedly opposed his wishes, gave them permission to do what they pleased with the culprits. St. Sabas, however, had not yet left Constantinople, and pleaded the cause of Elias so effectually that Anastasius revoked the order for his deposition (Coteler. s. a. p. 300). But all his concessions were in vain. Flavius' sentence of deposition was carried into effect, and Severus, the leader of the Acephali, having been made patriarch of Antioch in his room in A.D. 512, Elias steadfastly refused all token of communion with him. Once and again the synodal letters of the intruder and the act of deposition of Flavius were contemptuously rejected by the patriarch, together with the clergy and laity of Jerusalem (Evagr. H. E. iii. 33). St. Sabas supported them in their resolution.
complained to the emperor in strong terms of this insult. Anastausius, determined to bring matters to a point, despatched Olympius, count of Palestine, to give Elias his choice between submission or deposition. To damage his cause with the orthodox, the emperor put in Olympius' hands Elias' former letter, in which to save his see he repudiated the decrees of Chalcedon. Elias was now in a great strait. He lacked the strength for prolonged resistance. But for the earnest entreaties of St. Sabas and the monks of Jerusalem he might have yielded again, but, backed by their moral support, he persisted in his refusal, and was forcibly driven from his episcopal seat by Olympius, and banished to Aila, on the shores of the Red Sea, A.D. 513. He survived his banishment five years, breathing his last A.D. 518, during a visit of St. Sabas and other abbas, having previously, it was said, seen a vision which announced the death of his old enemy, the emperor Anastausius, and bade him follow in ten days (Moschus, Prat. Spirit. c. 35; Cyril. Scytoph. Vit. S. Eob. no. 80). Before he expired, he gave directions for the government of the monasteries he had founded, the oversight of which he had continued during his banishment. He was eighty-eight years old at the time of his death. (Tillemont, Mémo. Eccl. vii.; Cyril. Scytoph. Vita S. Euthymii; Vita S. Sabae; Joannes Moschus, Prat. Spiritual.; Evagrius, H. E. iii. 31, 39; Theophan. Chronogr.) [E. V.]

ELIAS (3) II., bishop of Jerusalem, c. A.D. 760-797, of whom very little is certainly known. His see was invaded by an ambitious monk named Theodorus before A.D. 763. In this year Theodorus joined in the condemnation of Cosmas, bishop of Ephesus, on the charge of Iconoclasm (Theophan. p. 260). Theodorus also sent synodal letters to Rome, concerning the worship of images, in A.D. 767 and 769. Theodorus is charged with having secured the deposition of Elias, by accusing him of crimes to the chief-counselor (πρωτοσύμβουλος) of Arelia, by whom he was thrown into prison, loaded with fetters, and banished. The date of his restoration is uncertain. He, together with the other patriarchs of the East, was represented at the second Council of Nicaea, A.D. 787, by Joannes, a presbyter, and Thomas, the provost of the convent of St. Arsenius, near Egyptia, Babylon. (Papebroch, nos. 167, 172; Leontius, Vita S. Steph. Sabattae, c. 5; Le Quen, Or. Chríst. iii. 300.) [E. V.]

ELIAS (3) (AELIUS, HELIAS), bishop of Lystra, next but one after St. Ireneus. No particulars of his life are known, but Gregory of Tours (de Glórdi Consecr. c. 62) relates a curious legend that a robber coming to spoil the corpse of Helias was seized in its arms and held fast till found by the authorities and condemned to death; but the corpse would not let him be taken away for execution, and retained him until he was forgiven. (Gall. Chríst. iv. 13; Gams, Scr. Ep. 569.) [R. T. S.]

ELIAS (4) (HELIAS), bishop of Sedunum (Sion, Sitten). In the island of St. Julianus on the lake of Orta, not far from Lago Maggiore, rest the remains of Elias, who is venerated in that place as a hermit who brought the bones of St. Audensius into Italy. An ancient inscription, however, is said to have described him as bishop of Sion in the Valais. But his age is very uncertain. If, as some say, he succeeded St. Julius, he must have lived about the beginning of the 5th century, but others assign him a later date. The Sammarthani relate that he transferred the see from Octodurum to Sion, in consequence of the prevalence of floods in the former place. (Gall. Chríst. xii. 735; Acta SS. 21 Mar. iii. 360.) [R. T. S.]

ELIAS (6), bishop of Balandus, or Blandes, a town of unknown position in the province of Lydia, present at the ecumenical council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quen, Oriens Chrísti. i. 890; Mansi, vi. 1089.)

ELIAS (7), bishop of Seleucia-belus on the Orontes, in Syria Secunda. He signed the synodal letter of the bishops of Syria Secunda, addressed to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 551; Le Quen, Or. Chrísti. ii. 922.) [J. de S.]

ELIAS (8), bishop of Majorca, A.D. 484. His name appears in that year among the suffragan bishops of the Sardinian see of Cagliari, who attended the colloquy held at Carthage between the Catholic and Arian bishops under the Vandal rule, by command of Hunnerich, king of the Vandals (see Dahn, Könige der Germanen, i. 250). In the 9th century the Balearic islands are found attached to the bishopric of Gerona; in the eleventh they were transferred to Barcelona. At the present time the bishop of Palma is a suffragan of the archbishopric of Valencia. (Villanueva, Vía Litéraria d' las Iglesias de España, xii.; Gams, Series Episc. Harduin, ii. 875.) [M. A. W.]

ELIAS (9) (EOLIA), bishop of Fezoumi in the canton of Dourourperan in Great Armenia, succeeded Isaac III. as catholicos or patriarch of Armenia. According to the list of Saint-Martin he ruled from A.D. 703 to 718. The same author gives Ardishch as his birth-place. (Saint-Mart. Hist. Armen. i. 438; Le Quen, Or. Chrísti. t. 1390.) [ARMENIANS.]

ELIAS (10), bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia. [HELIAS.]

ELIAS (11), bishop of Rachlena in Phocis. He took part in the synod of the Phocianian province, held at Tyre, A.D. 518, to condemn the heresy of Severus. (Mansi, viii. 920; Le Quen, Or. Chrísti. ii. 831.) [J. de S.]

ELIAS (12), bishop of Joppa, who, in the synod of Jerusalem, A.D. 518, signed the letter of John of Jerusalem to John of Constantinople against the errors of Severus (Labbe, v. 191), and in A.D. 556, the sentence of Peter of Jerusalem against Anthimus (Ibid. 283). (Le Quen, Or. Chrísti. iii. 628.) [E. V.]

ELIAS (13), bishop of Botrys in Phocis. He adopted the heresy of Severus, and was executed...
thematized in the synod of Tyre, A.D. 518. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 827.)

ELIAS (14) (Heliæa), bishop of Caesarea in Palestine, who signed the sentence against Anthimus in the synod of Jerusalem, A.D. 536. His name stands second after Peter of Jerusalem. (Labbe, v. 283; Le Quien, Ori. Christ. iii. 572.)

ELIAS (15), bishop of Hadriana (Iambouli; Lat. version, Adrianopolis) in Bithynia, of which town coins are extant. He is mentioned in the accounts of the synod of Constantineople under Mennas, which condemned Anthimus, A.D. 536, though his name is found nowhere in the subscriptions. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 625; Mansi, viiii. 879, 880 A.)

ELIAS (16), bishop of Areopoli (Rabbath-Moab), on the left bank of the river Arnon. Mansi’s Greek text names the see Ραββαθος, but the Latin has Hadrianaeopoli, with Areopoli in the margin. Elias was present at the synod held at Jerusalem under the patriarch Peter, A.D. 536, and signed the sentence upon Anthimus. (Mansi, viii. 1175, 1174 A; Le Quien, Ori. Christ. iii. 736.)

ELIAS (17), metropolitan of Thessalonica, c. A.D. 548 to 553, subscribed the profession of certain bishops concerning the three chapters, which is included in the “constitutum” of pope Vigilius addressed to the emperor Justinian (Mansi, ix. 64). At the fifth general council, Benignus bishop of Heraclea in Macedonia, one of his suffragans, acted as his proxy. (Mansi, ix. 389; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 38; Gams, Series Episc. 429.)

ELIAS (18) (Heliæa), bishop of Diocletianopolis. It is doubtful whether this was the see situated in Thrace or the one in Palestine. (See Wiltisch, Handbuch der kirchlichen Geographie, i. 172, and note 4, 210, and note 21.) Harduin mentions a third Diocletianopolis in Phrygia, which, as well as the other, is now impossible to trace. An Elias, bishop of one of these sees, was present at the fifth general council at Constantinople, A.D. 553. Le Quen places him under the Thracian see as well as under the Palestinian, without deciding to which he belongs. Gams assigns him to both sees, as though there were an Elias in each that year. (Mansi, ix. 176 B, 392 C; Le Quen, Oriens Christ. i. 1164, iii. 464; Gams, Series Episc. 427, 455.)

ELIAS (19), archbishop (or metropolitan) of Aquileia, c. 572, successor of Probus. (Paulus Diaconus iii. 14.) His predecessor, Paulinus, had fled before the Lombards in 568 to the island of Grado. Elias is said to have held a synod in 579 (in hoc castro Gradensiac nostram confirmare metropolitam), with nineteen other bishops, to confirm the translation of the see to Grado. (Chronica Patriarcharum Gradensiae in Mon. Bolland. 1878, p. 393.) According to this, probably the earliest authority, the synod appears to have been held in 582. This synod has given rise to much discussion. It is probably apocryphal, and the letter of Pelagius II. consenting that Grado shall be the metropolis of Venetia and Istria spurious. (Hefele, § 472; Mansi, ix. 929; and Jaffé, Regest. Pont. i. 168.) A full discussion of the matter is found in De Rubris, Monum. Eccl. Aquil. p. 227.

Elias and others had been unwilling to subscribe to the condemnation of the Three Chapters passed by the council of Chalcedon, and he was at the head of those bishops of Venetia and Istra who refused to hold communion with Rome on account of her views in the matter. Gregory the Great, then a deacon, intervened between Pelagius II. against them, and it is thought that he himself wrote them the letters which bear his master’s name (Pelagii Epist. 3, 4, 5; Greg. Mag. Epist. ii. num. 86). The authority for Gregory’s authorship is Paulus Winfridus, A.D. 784 (Patr. Lat. xcv.; De Gestis Langobardorum, cap. 10, xx.). The letters were unsuccessful, and Pelagius stirred up the exarch Sumaragus against Elias and three other Istrian bishops, Joannes Parentinus, Severus, and Vin- demius. Sumaragus dragged Elias from the basilica at Grado, and carried him off with his suffragans to Ravnena, where he forced him to communicate with Joannes, metropolitan of Ra- venna, who was consecrated by Grado, the end of a year they returned to Grado. The people and the other local bishops refused to communicate with them. Sumaragus afterwards fell into disgrace, and returned to Constantinople. A synod of bishops subsequently accepted Severus as their patriarch, on his re- cantation of his weakness in submitting to communion with the Catholic patriarch of Ravenna. Elias is said to have died about the time of Greg- ory’s mission of Augustine to England. But the account of Paulus Winfridus Daciaeus is obscure, and it is not perfectly clear that Elias was really dragged to Ravenna with the other bishops by Sumaragius. Baronius also points out his mistake in describing John, patriarch of Ravenna, as in ecclesia communicatis in 558, and not in 553, as charged by Grado. (Paulus Winfr. De gest. Langobardorum, iii. 26, in Patr. Lat. xciv. 557; Baronius, A.D. 586, 26; Jaffé, Regest. Pont. c. ann. 585, letters 686-688.) He was succeeded by Severus. [A. H. D. A. & W. M. S.]

ELIAS (20), bishop of Poreno, in Istra, c. 558, of somewhat doubtful authenticity. (Gams, 799; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d’Italia, viii. 785; Ughezzi, Italia Sacra, v. 396.)

ELIAS (21), circ. A.D. 640, bishop of the Jacobites and writer of a letter to Leo bishop of Charsa (Haran), in which he gives apologetic reasons for having passed from the faith of Chalcedon to the sect of the Monophysites. He mentions the work of George bishop of Tagrit against Probus and Philoponus, and his letter to the monks of St. Matthew. He also mentions Constantine bishop of Haran, and three books which he had written against the Monophysites (Anonymi Biblioth. Oriental. i. 465, 466; Cellier, vii. 107.)

ELIAS (22), bishop of Coria, signs the Decretum Gundemarii, 610. (See Giesenhain; Expag. Sagra. xiv. 56; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 324.)

ELIAS (23), bishop of Libyaeum, present at the Lateran synod under pope Martin in 844.
ELIAS—BISHOPS

which condemned the Monothelite heresy. (Hefele, § 307; Mansi, x. 967.) [A. H. D. A.]

ELIAS (24), bishop of Syracuse, a Benedictine, c. 656. (Cappelletti, La Chiesa d’Italia, xxi. 659.) [A. H. D. A.]

ELIAS (25), bishop of Iconium, the metropolis of Lycaonia, present at the synod held at Constantinople A.D. 692, called Quinisexta or Trullan (Mansi, xi. 992; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1071). [L. D.]

ELIAS (26), bishop of Seville in the 8th century, appears thirty-seventh in the catalogue of the bishops of Seville contained in the Codex Aemilianensis in the Escorial (A.D. 962–994; see Gonzalez, Collectio Canon. Eccl. Hist. præf.). He is the second bishop after the Moorish invasion, and comes next after the tritorus Oppas. [MARCELJUS.] (Eosp. Sapr. ix. 124, 293.) [M. A. W.]

ELIAS (27) CRETENSIS, bishop of Gortyna and metropolitan of Crete, at the second council of Nicea, A.D. 787 (Labbé, vii. 39, 323, 661, 704). Several works are ascribed to him, is a commentary on these nineteen orations of St. Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. 1, 3, 4, 10, 11, 19, 23, 24–30, 33–37, 51, 52). The commentary is not continuous, but takes the form of explanatory notes on various words and expressions. These commentaries were first published in Latin by Billius, at the end of his editions of Gregory Nazianzen, the first of which appeared at Paris, in 1583; and in Greek by Albert Jahn, Berne, 1858, and in the Patrologia of Migne (xxvi. pp. 737–902). Jahn has added a satisfactory proof (printed also by Migne, u.s.) that the author of the commentaries was a different person from the Elias who attended the council of Nicea, in the fact that he quotes Basilius, surnamed 'Edysapros (to distinguish him from Basil the Great), who lived in the first half of the 10th century, and his contemporary Gregorius (Oudin, de Script. Eccl. i. 649; ii. 428, 443). Jahn places this Elias in the middle of the 11th century.

To Elias is also ascribed a huge commentary in these volumes, on the Symbol Parodiun of Joannes Climacus, MSS. of which exist in the collection of Cardinal Bessarion at Venice, and in the Cosinian and Chigian libraries. Nic. Commersus mentions a work of Elias, de Moribus Ethnorum (p. 213), also several series of answers to the questions of monks in cases of conscience, the whole of which Jahn considers variant forms of the Response ad Monachum Dionysium, printed in v. Juris Graeco-Roman. (pp. 335–341; Oudin, de Script. Eccl. ii. 1066; Ceiller, ii. 691; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 641; Fabr. Bibl. Graec. viii. 430; ix. 525; xi. 615.) [E. V.]

ELIAS (28), bishop of Jabruda in Phoenicia Secund, north-east of Damascus. He is known only by the mention in a Greek Codex of Joannes Damascenus. Gams places him in the 8th century. (See Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 846; Gams, Spec. Ep. 435.) [J. de S.]

ELIAS (29), sent from Egypt with some companions to minister to the necessities of the confessors in Cilicia. They were all arrested in the city of Ascalon by the spies appointed to watch the gates, and like those to whom they had come to minister were mutilated in their eyes and feet. Three of them, Ares, Elias, and Promus, were martyred. Ares was burned, Elias and Promus were beheaded by orders of Firmilian, governor of Palestine (A.D. 308), during the reign of Galerius and Maximian. They are commemorated Dec. 14. (Eus. Mart. Pal. x.; Ruinart, AA. Sincera Mart. 330; Men. Bas.; Baron. 307, xiv.) [T. S. B.]

ELIAS (30) had also gone to Cilicia from Egypt with four companions; they were all arrested and brought before Firmilian. After they had been tortured, they were asked their names, and (doubtless because they had been originally named after some of the idol gods) they replied that their names were Elias, Jeremias, Elias, Samuel, and Daniel. They were then asked what country they came from; their reply was that Jerusalem was their city. The judge, not understanding their meaning, thought that the Christians must be about to establish collectively a city in opposition to the Romans, and so he put them to further torture, hoping to gain information from them. Failing in this, he sentenced them to be put to death (A.D. 309). They are commemorated Feb. 16. (Eus. Mart. Pal. xi.; Men. Bas.; Ruinart, 380; Baron. 308, iv.) [T. S. B.]

ELIAS (31), a priest who suffered martyrdom in Palestine during the Diocletian persecution, A.D. 305. On the dispersion of the Christians who were working in the copper mines, he was sent with three companions to the military governor, and on his refusal to abjure Christianity was burnt alive. Eusebius in his Martyr. Pal. does not give his name, but it is mentioned with those of his fellow-martyrs in the Menaes of Basilii, 19th Sept. (Basil. Men. i. 53; Ceiller, iii. 13.) [L. D.]

ELIAS (32). [SEBASTE, FORTY MARTYRS OF.]

ELIAS (33), March 27 (Symeon Metaphrast.), Dec. 24 (Assennat). Martyr in Damascus under Sapor II. A.D. 327 with Erichus and nine others. Ruinart and Tillemont would postpone this martyrdom to the persecution which began in A.D. 343, denying that there was any persecution at the earlier date. However the exhortation against persecuting the Christians contained in the letter of Constantine to Sapor looks as if a persecution had already taken place. (Euseb. Vita Const. lib. iv. cap. xi.; Boll. Acta SS. Mart. iii. 691; Assenn. Mart. Or. et Occ. i. 215.) [G. T. S.]

ELIAS (34), a martyr of the 5th century. Commemorated Jan. 14. (AA. SS. Jan. i. 553; Ruinart, AA. Sincera Mart. 334.) [T. S. B.]

ELIAS (35), governor of a monastery for women, described as of Atritibus in the Delta, an excellent disciplinarian (optimus exercitator) and an especial friend of unmarried females (amanissimus virginum). Having property at Atritibus, he erected there a large monastery for the reception of vagrant persons of that condition under his own management, he being between thirty and forty years of age. He supplied all the wants of his inmates, about three hundred in number, and provided gardens and implements for their occupation. But they won’t not live in harmony among themselves, and in the discharge of his duties as peacemaker he was brought into close and frequent intercourse with them. So great did he find the snares of such a position for himself as well as for them that he one day fled in despair from the monastery. The same night he had a vision of angels, who so strengthened his mind while he slept that he awoke a different man, and soon returned to his charge, in which he continued for forty years, without any further annoyance from his carnal nature. (Pallad. Laua. Hist. viii. 35, in Patr. Lat. lxxiii. 1135.)
ELIAS—MONKS AND CLERGY

[CH.]

ELIAS (38), solitary near Antinous, capital of the Thebaid, 4th century. The same account of him is attributed to Palladius (Hist. Lausiac. viii. 51, in Patr. Lat. lxxiii. 1154), and to Rufinus Aquileienses (Historia Monachorum, 12, in Patr. Lat. xxi. 452). The writer, whoever he was, saw him with his own eyes; they said he was about 110 years old, and that he had passed seventy years in that awful solitude, the horror of which no tongue could express. It was high on the bare mountains, approached only by a narrow and rugged path, hardly to be discovered by travellers. The place where he sat was a terrible cavern; and more horrid dread seized the minds of those who dared to look in. For from his extreme age he shone visibly in every limb. He was said to effect many cures. Nobody remembered the time when he had retired to this desert. He was believed to eat three ounces of bread daily, and three olives of an evening. In his youth he had only touched food once a week.

[W. M. S.]

ELIAS (37), a solitary of Palestine, near the Dead Sea. His cell being near one of the chief roads, he showed hospitality to all wayfarers who needed it. (Pallad. Hist. Laus. c. 110-111, p. 1026.)

[E. V.]

ELIAS (38), abbot of a monastery in Syria, celebrated for his personal holiness and the wisdom of his rule. Alexander Acacemites spent four years of his early life (c. A.D. 378) under his discipline, but left him on the plea that the precepts of the Gospel were violated in his community because what was necessary to supply the daily wants of the brethren was provided beforehand, and something was left for the wants of the morrow. (Bolland. Jan. 15, p. 1021, § 4-6.)

[E. V.]

ELIAS (39), abbot and presbyter of Isauria, in the diocese of Antioch, towards the close of the 5th century. He sent Epiphanius, one of his monks, to Gregory L., A.D. 555, with an apology for not coming to him in person, on the plea of illness and old age, and a request that a copy of the Gospels might be sent to him, and a sum of money for his monastery: he also prayed that his messenger might receive orders. Gregory complied with all his requests, but detained Epiphanius at Rome, refusing to allow him to return to the monastery, on the plea that no one who had received orders in “this church” was ever permitted to leave it. (Greg. Ep. V. xiii. 38; Baron. Mar. xcv., xxvi. 1xxx.)

[T. W. D.]

ELIAS (40), circ. A.D. 621, presbyter at Jerusalem. He is said by the writer of the Acts of Anastasius the Persian to have been in charge of the church of the Holy Resurrection; his holiness is spoken of in the highest terms; and it was to him that Anastasius (at that time named Magundat) was brought for baptism by his host the silversmith. Elias consulted Modestus bishop of Jerusalem, and then gave him the rite. (Symeon Metaph. Vit. S. Anastasii Perae, § 5, in Patr. Gr. citiv. 778 c; quoted in Surius de Prot. Hist. 22 Jan. i. 362, ed. 1617, and in Baron. A. E. an. 621, xl.)

[W. M. S.]

ELIAS (41) (ELIAS), president of Cappadocia, to whom on his entrance on his government Basil wrote, A.D. 372, to defend himself from the calumnies brought against him by his enemies in connexion with the hospital he had recently established in the suburbs of Caesarea. (Basil. Epist. 94 [372?].) [BASILII OF CAESAREA, vol. i. p. 291, b.] In the same year Basil wrote to Elias in behalf of an aged man, whose orphan grandson, only four years old, had been placed on the senatorial roll, thus compelling his grandfather to serve again (Epist. 94 [389]). Garnier and Cellini probably right in identifying Elias with the governor of Cappadocia, who, to the grief of the province had been removed from his office after a brief rule, through the calumnies of those whom his highminded uprightness had displeased, in whose behalf Basil wrote in A.D. 373 to his early friend and fellow townsman, Sophronius, prefect of Constantinople (Epist. 96 [392]). Basil commends this governor most highly for his incorruptible integrity, his justice, his impartiality, his accessibility, as well as for the favour he had shewn to the Christians, and begs Sophronius to plead his cause with the emperor, and dispel the calumnies of his enemies. This governor is identified by Tillemont with Theresius, but was probably mistaken.

[V. E.]

ELIAS (42) SCHOLASTICUS, an advocate of Cynicus, to whom Theodoret transmitted the chief of a band of robbers, named Abram, together with the persons he had plundered and the evidence of the case, with the desire that Elias would compel the evildoers to restore their plunder. (Theod. Epist. x.)

[V. E.]

ELIAS (43), friend and slayer of Justinian II. A.D. 711. As the tyranny and cruelty of that prince grew darker, Bardanes and Elias, an officer in high command, conspired against him. Justinian, in the violence of impotent anger, had the children of Elias slaughtered in the bosom of their mother, and gave her to his own Indian cook, a monster, according to one MS., of deformity. After the defection of his fleet and army, and the death of his heir Tiberius, Justinian was made a slave, Sinope by Elias, cut off his head with his own hand. (Theophanis, Chronographia, 317, 318, 319, Patr. Gr. evii. col. 368; Baron. Annal. ad ann. 711, viii.)

[W. M. S.]

ELIAS, APOCALYPSE OF. An apocalyptic work under this title was current in the 2nd century, and was supposed by Origen (35 in Mith. 27, vol. iii. p. 916) to have been the source whence Paul took the quotations he hath not seen.” &c. (1 Cor. ii. 9). This view is controverted by Jerome, who refers the quotation to Isaiah lxxiv. 4 (xvii. in Isaicam, iv. 761
ELIDIUS

Vallar.; Ep. ad Pammach. 54, i. 919). See HIER-EPHEM. It is no doubt the same work which is rejected, Ap. Const. vi. 16, and in the Synopsis Sac. Script. ascribed to Athanasius, ii. 154.

[G. B.]

ELIDIUS (1), ST., from whom one of the Scilly Isles is named. The name is now corrupted into "St. Helen's Isle"; but we find in William of Worcester's extracts from the Calendar of Tavistock, "S. Elidii episcopi 8 die Augusti. Jacet in insula Syllya;" and again, "Saint Lyda filius regis;" and see Leland, Rit. 3, p. 9. Some Geraldine chapels in Cornwall seem to be dedicated to him under the name of "St. Lyde," once in conjunction with the Irish saint, St. Ida, and hence Elidius also has been supposed to have come from Ireland. His name is sometimes confused with that of Loy or Eloy, i.e. Eligius, bishop of Noyon (see Monasticon, l. 596, 1002, and Whitaker's Cathedral of Cornwall, ii. p. 211).

[C. W. B.]

ELIDIUS (2), martyr. He was an acolyte of St. Praesulius (Prix), bishop of Clermont, and was slain with St. Ammaeus at Volvic, in the Auvergne, as they were returning from the court of Childeric II. (674). He is commemorated Jan. 25. (See the second Vita S. Praesulii, cap. iii. 18-20, in Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 635.)

[S. A. B.]

ELIEZER B. HYRCANOS, also called Eliezer the Great, or simply R. Eliezer, one of the most distinguished Jewish teachers during the 1st century of the Christian era. He was brother-in-law of Gamaliel II., who succeeded to the presidency of the Sanhedrin about A.D. 80. His father, Hyrcanos, who was a wealthy farmer, intended him to cultivate his estates, but he found that a quiet rural life was uncongenial to his active mind, and having felt an uncontrollable desire for study, he betook himself, contrary to his father's wishes, to Jerusalem at the age of twenty-two. Here he placed himself at the feet of the celebrated R. Johanan b. Saccai, and soon became one of his most distinguished disciples. When Hyrcanos, a few years afterwards, came to the metropolis to disinherit his son for having acted contrary to his wishes, he found that Eliezer had already attained the position of a prominent teacher, and that well-known disciples attended his public lectures. Instead of discarding him, Hyrcanos now offered him all his property, but this Eliezer declined, declaring that he would only accept an equal share with the other children. His prodigious memory made him a living depositary of the canon and civil laws, which were developed in the course of time, and which were orally transmitted from school to school for generations. His teacher, R. Johanan b. Saccai, therefore aptly described him when he said that "he was like a well-cemented cistern, which never loses a drop of water" (Mishna Aboth, ii. 8). He moreover declares that "if all the sages of Israel were put in one scale, and R. Eliezer b. Hyrcanos in the other, he would outweigh them all." (Mishna Aboth, ii. 8). After the destruction of Jerusalem, he went with R. Johanan b. Saccai, and other doctors of the law, to Yabne. Here the Sanhedrin continued to hold their sittings under the presidency of R. Gamaliel II. Of this distinguished assembly he was a prominent member. But his deep originality, his independence of opinion, and his determination not to be overruled by any pretensions in matters of conscience, soon brought him into serious collision with the president and with his colleagues. Gamaliel, who feared lest the dissolution of the Jewish state and the dispersion of the nation, should bring about the loss of some of the traditional laws, and thus produce diversity of opinion, determined to secure once for all uniformity of faith and practice. To effect this, the distinguished doctors of the law who constituted the Sanhedrin brought forward the different cases with their different interpretations, which were handed down in the respective schools, and the president ruled that the decision of the majority was to carry every point, and that it should henceforth be unalterably binding. The canon thus carried was at once shewn to be implied or expressed in some verse of the Mosaic law by the elastic rules of interpretation or application which were in vogue in the time of Christ.

For such work of co-operation and compromise, Eliezer was ill-fitted. His principles of interpretation were adverse to those of R. Joshua, R. Akiba, and others who were distinguished members of the Sanhedrin. They maintained that every particle, to the very sign of the accusative (Pn), represented some recondite law, and ought to be explained accordingly. He advocated the literal meaning of the Bible, and declared that when a canon obtained in the course of time, having been called forth by circumstances unforeseen in the Mosaic law, it should be regarded as an independent oral law, and no attempt should be made to find it into the Bible. He moreover could not recognize the principle that the majority is infallible, and hence on one occasion would not abide by their decision, especially when the point at issue was a question of memory, involving the accurate record of ancient tradition. The immediate cause of rupture between him and the Sanhedrin was a difference of opinion about the treatment of an oven of parallel construction. The majority decided that it comes under the category of earthenware, and hence is capable of defilement. R. Eliezer, who remembered an ancient tradition to the contrary, would not submit to the decision, and practically acted against it. For this insubordination R. Gamaliel II., the president of the Sanhedrin, his own brother-in-law, excommunicated him (Jubia Metzia, 50 b).

The manner in which this Rabbi who lived in the Apostolic age was excommunicated, and the issues involved in it, as described in the Talmud, strikingly illustrate those passages in the New Testament where this penalty is spoken of (John ix. 22, xii. 43, xvi. 2; 2 Thess. iii. 14, 15). Before the sentence of excommunication was pronounced, the offender was admonished three times on three different occasions, generally on Monday, Thursday, and Monday. It was only when he persisted in the offence after these several admonitions that the excommunication was pronounced, which was called Nidah (Yid), and Shematha (Shemepr). If the offender was present, the judge stepped forward, rent his garments, and said, "A, thou art punished as an excommunicated person." During the period of this penalty, which at first was only for a week or month, thus allowing time for repentance, the sufferer had to tear his garments, wear mourning, sit on the ground, and be excluded from free intercourse with his friends.
It was only on very exceptional occasions that the nature of the guilt was publicly proclaimed, and that a horn was blown to announce it. If the offender was absent, the judge declared, "A has the penalty of excommunication inflicted upon him," and the sentence was then conveyed to him by an official. If the offender died during the period of suspense and submission, the tribunal ordered a stone to be put on his coffin "to indicate that he who is excommunicated and dies in his excommunication is stoned in his coffin." (Mishna Eduyoth, v. 6). In the case of R. Eliezer, his own favoured disciple, R. Akiba, conveyed to him the sentence of excommunication, and the mournful narrative which records the event gives a vivid picture of the religious life and practices in the time of Christ. "Everything which R. Eliezer declared was collected and burnt with fire, then the majority of the members of the Sanhedrin was counted against him, and he was sentenced to excommunication. Whereupon the question was asked of his teacher, 'What can I do to help?' R. Akiba answered, 'I will go, lest some inferior person should go and announce it, and thereby cause irreparable damage to the world.' R. Akiba then dressed in mourning, and wrapped himself up in black, and sat down on the ground before him at a distance of four cubits. R. Eliezer exclaimed, 'Akiba, why differest this day from all other days?' He replied, 'Rabbi, it seemeth to me that thy colleagues have separated from thee.' He too, then, tore his garments, took off his shoes, left his stool and sat down on the ground, tears rolling down from his eyes." (Baba Metzia, 59 b). Never was so bitter a message conveyed in a more tender manner.

Thus excommunicated, R. Eliezer left Yanniah, and removed to Lydda and Caesarea, where he established schools, and had numerous disciples. The sympathy which the people felt with this distinguished scholar is seen in the public apology which the president of the Sanhedrin was obliged to make for his rigorous measure. When R. Akiba conveyed the sentence of excommunication to R. Eliezer, he told R. Gamaliel was at sea. "A fearful storm arose against him, threatening to swallow him up. He exclaimed, 'It seemeth to me that this cometh upon me because of R. Eliezer b. Hycranos.' He then stood up and said, 'Lord of the Universe, it is revened and known to Thee that I have not done it to exalt myself, or to exalt my father's house, but to exalt Thee, and lechism should take place in Israel.' Whereupon the sea became calm." (Baba Metzia, 59 b). Though the storm of public opinion against the president of the Sanhedrin was thus allayed, the kindly feelings towards the learned Rabbi, discharged from his membership of the national assembly, increased in intensity. His schools, both at Lydda and Caesarea, were much frequented, and his teachings greatly influenced and moulded Jewish doctrines and practice in Palestine during the Apostolic age. His frequent intercourse with the disciples of Christ, and with the first preachers of the Gospel, tended to preserve feelings of amity between those of his brethren who believed, and those who did not believe, that Jesus was the Christ, thus affording a peacable platform for discussion of the claims to the Messiahship of Him who was sentenced to death by some of the same members of the Sanhedrin which afterwards excommunicated R. Eliezer. As it is of the utmost interest and importance to the student of ecclesiastical history and theology to know what doctrines were propounded by eminent expounders of the law, and what were the phases of faith which competed with the teachings of the Apostles in the infancy of Christianity on its native soil, we subjoin a brief summary of the teachings and sayings of this excommunicated member of the Sanhedrin.

The cardinal doctrines which R. Eliezer urged on his disciples were absolute faith in the goodness, justice, and mercy of God as our heavenly Father, and a corresponding filial confidence in Him, which should manifest itself in loving Him above all things, in walking before Him in holiness and righteousness, in scrupulously obeying His commandments, and in living a life of union with Him from whom all our blessings flow, and from whom no evil can proceed, who punishes the evil-doer, but shews mercy to the penitent. On the passage "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thine might," he remarks, 'Why this treble expression of heart, soul, and wealth?' It is to teach thee that there are some who love life more than mammon, and that there are others who love mammon more than life. Now, the love of God is to be above both life and wealth" (Pessachim, 25 c).

Man should pray for his daily bread. To be anxious for the future betrays a want of confidence in the goodness of God, and is evidence of little faith. 'He who hath stili bread in his basket and saith what shall I eat to-morrow, belongeth to those of little faith' (Sota, 48 b). This is a striking illustration of Matt. vi. 30-34. Next to the love of God He laid the greatest stress on the reverence and obedience due to parents. He was once asked, 'To what extent is the honouring of parents to go?' To which he replied, 'Go and learn it from a heathen who resided at Ashkelon, and whose name was Dama b. Nethina, what he did. The sages came to him to buy precious stones for the ephod for a very large sum, but the key of the box containing them was under the power of the king of the Medes. The king was very apprehensive. The son refused to give his father, though he thereby lost the sale of the costly gems' (Babylon Kiddushin, 31 b, with Jerusalem Pesa, i. 1). Equally exacting were the lessons which he inculcated about the sacred jealousy with which the honour of our fellow-creatures is to be guarded. 'Let the honour of thy fellow-man be as precious to thee as thine own, and be not easily provoked' (Aboth, ii. 10). In opposition to the celibate practices which obtained among the Essenes, and which began to find favour among the Jews generally immediately after the destruction of Jerusalem, he laid it down that "he who abstains from marriage and propagating the race is like one who commits murder" (Tebanot, 63 b). The form in which he inculcated into the minds of his disciples about the sanctity of marriage, and his denounced of being influenced by wealth or rank in contracting this sacred tie for their children to the disregard of the disparity of the respective ages, may be gathered from his remark on Levit. xix. 29: 'Do not prostitute thy daughter, to cause her to be a whore,' he declares; 'this refers to one who causes his young daughter to be married to an old man.'
(Sanhedrin, 76 e). He moreover urged that girls should be well educated and be instructed in the divine law (Baba, 20). Considering the general condition of women in the East and the opinion which some of the doctors of the law shared in common with other nations of antiquity on this subject, it will be seen how far R. Eliezer's teaching was in advance of the age, and how it harmonizes with the teaching of the gospel. Again he maintained that Gen. ix. 5 denotes, "Your blood I will require from your persons," deducing from it that the Mosaic law forbids suicide (Baba Kama, 91 b), which contradicts the statement of Josephus, that it positively enjoints it under certain circumstances (War, III. viii. 9; VII. vii. 7; with L. xiii. 10). He deprecates the practice of offering up fixed, formal, and lengthy prayers, declaring that "he who offers up his prayer as something fixed, his prayer is not with devotion," and he has bequeathed the model of a collect for travellers, which for terseness, earnestness, beauty, and brevity would do honour to any liturgy. "Let Thy will be done in heaven above, and grant a contented mind to those who worship Thee here below, and do Thou keep close in Thine holy angels the Thine, O Lord, who hearest prayer" (Berachoth, 93 b). To him, moreover, biblical students are partly indebted for Aquila's Greek version of the Old Testament, for we are distinctly told that "Aquila the proselyte made the translation under the auspices of R. Eliezer and R. Joshua, and they praised him for it" (Jerusalem Megilloth, i. 9). Prompted probably by a discussion on Christ's conduct in anthropomorphizing the woman taken in adultery, thus apparently setting aside one of the laws of Moses on adultery, R. Eliezer wanted to know if Christ also interpreted another law on the same subject with equal leniency. He relates the story as follows. "Once upon a time I was walking in the upper street of Zipporith when I met one of the disciples of Jesus of Nazareth. He said to me, 'James of Kefher-Sachnia. He said to me, 'It is written in your law thou shalt not bring the hire of a whore into the house of the Lord thy God' (Deut. xxii. 18). May a water-closet be made with it for the high-priest? This question I could not answer. Whereupon he said to me, 'Jesus of Nazareth taught me thus on the subject. It is written she gathered it of the hire of an harlot, and it shall return to the hire of an harlot (Mich. i. 7); that is, it came from an impure source, and it may be applied to an impure use.' When I heard this explanation, I was pleased with it." (Aboda Zara, 17 a.) This James is also mentioned as having offered to cure a nephew of R. Ishmael of the bite of a serpent, but the rabbi, not being so liberal as R. Eliezer, declined his services (Aboda Zara, 27 b).

Having himself profited so much from liberal intercourse with heathen philosophers, with Jewish Christians, and with those who held the different phases of faith which agitated the minds of people at the advent of Christ and immediately after the destruction of Jerusalem, and knowing moreover the benefit to be derived from personal contact with the learned at a time when books were of the extremest rarity and of forbidden price, R. Eliezer laid down the maxim, "He who has read the Bible and studied the Mishna, but has not cultivated personal intercourse with the sages and the doctors of the law, is an Ann Ho-Aretz = ignorantus." But with all his appreciation of their society, he almost fathomed the depth of theological rancour, and no modern satirist could more witheringly chastise this undivine spirit of divines than R. Eliezer did in his earnest advice to his disciples. "Warm thyself at the fire of the sages, but beware lest thou come too near their glowing coals and burn thyself, for their bite is the bite of a jackal, their sting is the sting of a scorpion, their hissing is the hissing of a venomous serpent, and all their words are like burning coals" (Aboth, ii. 10). Towards God he admonished that we should cultivate a spirit of increasing devotion. The cry " repent " which was raised by John the Baptist, was urged by him with the earnestness of voice of a dying man to his dying fellow-creatures. "Repent one day before thy death" (Aboth, ii. 10) was his watchword. But as it is impossible to say on which day we may die, we are to repent daily. This he not only preached, but practised. At Caesarea, which was the last scene of his active life, he felt that he was called to die, and he assembled his followers in the presence of his former colleague and friend, and now his great opponent, the learned R. Joshua b. Chanina, he put the phylacteries on his arm and head to meet his Creator. Arrayed in these symbols of prayer, which had the name of the Lord inscribed on them, and in this attitude, he gave up his spirit to the Father of all spirits about A.D. 118-120. R. Joshua embraced the helpless body, took off the phylacteries and cried, "My father, my father, the charriot of Israel," in allusion to 2 Kings ii. 12. He annulled the sentence of excommunication, and the body was removed with great obsequies to Lydda. Here, where he first established a school, and where he delivered public lectures on a stone in an old racetrack, R. Akiba, who conveyed to him the sentence of excommunication, delivered a most solemn funeral oration. R. Joshua kissed the stone on which he used to lecture, exclaiming "This is Mount Sinai, and the man who sat on it was like the ark of the Lord," and the whole nation said, "With the death of R. Eliezer the book of wisdom is buried" (Babylon Sanhedrin, 68 ; Jerusalem Sabbath, ii. 7).

As he is often quoted in the Mishna and in the Talmud by the simple abbreviation ר"ל, R. Eliezer, and as there was a R. Eliezer of a later period, who is likewise quoted by the initial רל, R. Eliezer, the two have often been confounded. To guard against this confusion, it is to be remarked that when the name occurs in full, that is, when רל b. Hyronas is meant, it is spelt רל in with Yod, and when רל b. Shamma is meant it is spelt רל without Yod. If the abbreviation רל is used, which is the same for both, it is to be distinguished by the association of other names. When R. Eliezer, R. Gamaliel, and R. Akiba are associated with רל, R. Eliezer is meant, and when it occurs in connexion with R. Meier or R. Jehudah, R. Eliezer is intended (comp. Frankel, Darks Ha-Mishna, 73-83; Leipzig, 1859; Hamburger,
ELIFFANTUS

Real-Encyclopädie für Böbl und Talmud, p. 102, &c.

[C. D. G.]

ELIFFANTUS (Elefantus, Alphantus), thirty-third archbishop of Arles, between Rhet-terus, or, according to Le Coite, Arladis, and Johannes II., was one of the subscribers at a synod held in the church of St. Just, at Narbonne, in the year 788. At the council of Frankfort, in 794, a long standing difference between the sees of Arles and Vienne, concerning the limits of their metropolitan jurisdiction, which had broken out afresh between Eliffantus and Ursio of Vienne, was settled by the eighth canon, giving to the former nine suffragan sees (Le Coite, Ann. Eccl. Franc. tom. vii. ann. 791, n. xx, 794, n. xviii; Gall. Christ. i. 545; Labbe, Baron. Conc. ix. 4, 103.)

S. A. B.

ELIPIUS, martyr. [Eliipius.]

ELIGIUS, bishop of Noyon (640-648), saint. The only authority is the Vita S. Eligii, Nonio nensis Episcopi, auctore Dado neve Audono, Episc. Rotom. The extant biography is really a later work, modelled perhaps upon the original of St. Ouen. It is printed in the 2nd vol. of D'Achéry's Episcopologia, and extracts from it in Besonnet, vol. iii. pp. 552-561. The French translation, with notes, etc., has been published by M. Charles Barthélemy, being the first part of his Études Historiques, etc. sur le vœu Siècle, Paris, 1847.

Euligius was a native of Aquitaine, born near Limoges. A skilled worker in gold, he emigrated to the Northern Frankish land, where, by his construction of a chair of state, he won a place at the court of Clovis II. He was equally in favour with Dagobert I., Clovis's son. He continued to work at his art, but acquired at the same time great fame for piety and humility. His generosity was exhibited in the ransom of slaves; when a band of captives arrived, "of Romans, Gauls, and Britons, and of Moors and above all of Saxons," he would buy the freedom of the latter all. He is described by the biographer as tall, of high colour, bearded, with finely-shaped hands, and of graceful figure. Whilst still a layman he founded and built the monastery of Solemniac, near Limoges, besides numerous churches. In 660 he was ordained a priest and consecrated bishop of Noyon. His diocese comprised all the semi-heathen lands to the north, principally inhabited by the Frisians; to their conversion and to the permanent establishment of Christianity by the foundation of churches and monasteries he devoted himself unremittingly. In 658 Eligius died, but was not buried until a contention had arisen over his body at Noyon. Both in life and after death, according to the biographer, he was a great miracle-worker, and largely endowed with the gift of prophecy. The sermon in the Vita (ii. 15) is really taken from the works of Caesarius of Arles. The festival of Eligius is on the 1st of December. The Officium S. Eligii is given by Barthélemy, pp. 464 sqq. For much legendary matter connected with Eligius, see Annales de l'Eglise Cathédrale de Noyon, par Jacques le Vaseur, Paris, 1633. Compare also for his place in the conversion of the Frisians, Retberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, ii. p. 508.

T. R. B.

ELLEUS. Given by Epiphanius (Haer. 26, p. 91) as the name of one of the seven ruling spirits in one of the Gnostic systems. This name does not occur in the corresponding lists (Irenaeus, l. 10; Origen, adv. Cels. vi. 31), but it may be compared with the name Eleleth (Irenaeus, l. 29).

G. S.

ELIMAS, martyr. [Elymas.]

ELIN (Aelvedha, Aed, Almedha, Elyvedha, Eluned, Lunned, Lusette) is given in the Pedigree of Welsh Saints as "daughter of Brychan in Crug Gorawl," but she is more likely to have been a grand-daughter. Her festival is on August 1. The chief authority on her life is Geraldus Cambrensis, who (Hist. Camb. i. c. 2) mentions the site of her chapel on the top of a hill, called Penginger, near the town of Brecon or Brecknock (Aberthomeli), where, "rejecting the proposals of marriage of an earthly prince and espousing herself to the Eternal King, she triumphed in happy martyrdom." This hill is identified with Slwych, where there was a roofless chapel in the end of the 17th century, and the saint locally called Taylau (i.e. St. Aylded). The hill may have received the descriptive title of Crug Gorawl or Gorseddall, the hill of Judicature, a name connected with Elined in the Mynegian Archeology. In the Arthurian legends of the 12th century this maiden has her praises celebrated, and by the Welsh bards she is called Luned, while in the French romances of the same period she is better known as Lunette. By the former name she appears as one of the leading characters in the Mabinogion, The Lady of the Fountain, given in Lady Charlotte Guest's collection, and by the latter in that of Gareth and Lynette, reproduced by Tennyson. It is most probable also that Enioll is the same as the patient and faithful Enid, daughter of Earl Ynyw, whose bow, bending the arms of the Romancists seem never tired of extolling, as in the Mabinogion, Geraint ab Erbin, in the same Collection of Mabinogion. "Enid, Yniol's only daughter," is one of the sweetest characters of Tennyson's Rhymes of the King. In the Mort d'Arthur (b. vii. c. 36) Lynet is sister of dame (or lady) Lyones, and King Arthur makes Sir Gaherys "to wed the damosel sausage that was dame Lynet," probably named the "damosel sause" from the properties and effects ascribed to her magical ring, which was one of the thirteen varieties of the royal jewels of Great Britain. (Geraldus Camb. Rin. Camb. vii. 32, Myv. Arch. ii. 41; Rees, Welsh Saints, 149-50, 318, 323; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 600; Williams, Elin. Welsh. 13, 143; Baring-Gould, Welsh Saints, July 6, pt. i. 148, and Aug. 1, pp. 6-8; Bolland. Acta SS. Aug. 1, tom. i. 70; Lady Ch. Guest, Mabinogion, i. 113-14, ii. 164.) [J. G.]

St. Elined is the Aelvedha of Giraldus Cambrensis (Rin. Cambriae, i. c. 2, p. 32). St. Almedha's day is August 1 (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 149). See Acta Sancorum, August 1, vol. i. p. 70, where she is assigned to the 6th century. Perhaps the name of Elyw, who has given name to Llanelli, Brecknockshire, and Llanell, in the same county, where her wake is held on the Sunday next before August 1, O. S., is only an abbreviation of Eined (Rees, 156). [C. W. B.]

ELINGAUDUS, bishop of Aradshad, and a near mount Ararat, the people of which were named Amadunians, after the prince house that ruled the district. Eliseaus as bishop of the Amadunians was one of the eight fathers of the Armenian church who assembl into synod at Aradshad, the capital, in 490, and in reply to the persecuting edict of Isidorig, king of Persia (to whom Armenia was then subject), signed a truly noble manifesto of the Christian faith and their resolution of adhering to it. An insurrection, headed by Vartan, fol. Vartan perished, and Eliseaus was compelled to fly. In his exile the bishop composed the work on which his literary fame rests, The History of Vartan and the Battle of the Armenians. About A.D. 480 he was in Persia, where he had some relations with the Nestorian Baranas, to whom he presented another work (now unknown) which he had then written, a History of the Armenians. In his old age he lived a retired life in the canton of Ershedunuk (also written Ershchoudiun and Reschoudiun) on the southern shore of the lake Van.

The History of Vartan was first printed in 1764 at Constantinople. In 1830 an English translation by professor C. F. Neumann of Munich was brought out by the Oriental Translation Fund (Murray). In 1840 Giuseppe Capellelotti published an Italian version under the title Eliso, storico Armeno (Venice), and in 1844 a French translation by G. K. Garabed came out, entitled, Souvenirs National de l’Arménie Chrétienne (Paris). To the valuable preface of Neumann and notes of Garabed this article has been chiefly indebted. The History of Vartan is not the only work of Eliseas in existence. There is appended to it and included in the translation a panegyric on the monastic life, containing many interesting historical notices. Professor Neumann mentions other works, unprinted according to his belief, namely, exceptional illustrations of Joshua, Judges, the fourth book of Kings, and the Lord’s Prayer, besides numerous sermons. [T. W. D.]

ELISEAUS (2), bishop of Arezzo, 713. (Cappellelotti, Le Chiese d’Italia, xviii. 73; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 410.) [A. H. D. A.]

ELISEAUS (4), thirteenth bishop of Noyon, following St. Eutudius and preceding Adalbodus, is only known as one of the recipients of a letter of pope Zacharias addressed to Boniface and various other Gallic and German bishops, which may be found in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 948. (Baron. an. 748. xil. Gall. Christ. ix. 986.) Le Counte (Ann. Eccl. Fran. an. 748, n. lxiv. vi. p. 199) says he was made bishop of Tournai and Noyon in A.D. 747. [S. A. B.]

ELISEAUS (5), forty-third bishop of Aach, or Auz, succeeding Galinus and followed by Joannes, about the close of the 6th century. Nothing is known of him except that he is not found in the list of Bams, the place being filled by Mainfridus (Maurifredus). (Gall. Christ. i. 977; Bams, Seric. Episc. 497.) [S. A. B.]
ELISENIUS, a Cretian, is placed by Spotswood (Hist. Ch. Socf, p. 5, A.D. 370) among the companions of St. Regulus, but the name is probably a mistake for CHIENIUS.

[O. G.]

ELISSAEUS (1), bishop of Dioctelianopolis, in Palestine Prima, one of the forty-three bishops who signed the semi-Arian formula at Seclucia, in A.D. 359. Adrian Reland has been cited without reason for an opinion that this bishop was called also Epictetus. (Epiph. Haeres. lixiii. No. 26, p. 874; W. Quinr. Or. Christ. iii. 845; Reland, Palest. Itin. ii. 706.)

[O. V.]

ELISSAEUS (2), a priest, who, by the eighth act of the council of Seville, A.D. 615, was condemned to slavery as a punishment for his ingratitude, because, having been made free by the kindness of his bishop, he had broken the canons and discipline of the church, and had entered into plots against his bishop. (Manesi, x. 559; Cellier, xi. 915.)

[O. D.]

ELITHIR (Allither, Alitir, Alitherius, Alithir, Elithir, Eulithir). There are three of this name in the Irish calendars, and though the word signifies a pilgrim, yet it seems at an early period to have become a proper name. Adamnan (Vit. S. Col. I. c. 5) and O'Donnell (Vit. S. Col. III. c. 17) mention that when St. Columba was founding Durrow, he paid a visit to the brethren in the monastery of Cloonmacnois, where Alithierus, Alitherius, or Eulithierus was then abbot. This was the fourth abbey; he died A.D. 599 (Ann. Tig.), and is mentioned to Muskerry in Munster (Reeves, Adamnan, 24 n.; O'Fiainn, Irish Saints, Jan. 7, l. 100). Colgan (Tr. Thom. 373 n. 24, 434 n. 18) says he is the Alither or Elithir of May 12, but on that day Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 125) has "Elithir, of Muic inis, in Loch Derg derge," and Mart. Taltyhot "Allither Muccinsi:" Muic inis is now Muckishin in Lough Derg, on the Shannon. Elithir of Cluaingeil is commemorated in the calendars on April 25, but without farther notes for identification or place in history. And at Doneg. li. 125, his name is confirmed by that of the Twelve Pilgrims of Inis Uachtair ("De Allither de Inse uchtair," Mart. Taltyhot), now Upper Island, in Lough Sheelin.

[O. G.]

ELIUD, a Welsh saint. [Tt.]

ELIZABETH Thaumaturge, or the wonder-werker, commonly called of Constantinople. A short account of her is given in the menology of the emperor Basilius Porphyrogenitus, who lived in the 10th century. She appears to have flourished long before; no date is given and few details, except the usual general tributes to piety. The principal characteristic related of her is that during the whole course of her life she never once washed her body with water. For three whole years also she never looked at the sky, in order to fix her mind more uninterruptedly on the invisible heaven. (Basil. Menolog. iii. 70, April 24, Patrol. Græc. orvii. 421; Molanus, ap. Usuard. Auct. Ap. 24, Patrol. Lat. cxiii. 970.)

[W. M. S.]

ELKESAI, ELKESAITES (Μακεσας, Hippolytus; Μακεσας, Epiphanius; Μακ-κεσας, Origen). A book bearing the name of Elkessai, and purporting to contain angelic revelations, was, at the end of the 2nd century, in high repute among certain Ebonite sectaries, who were most numerous in the district east of the lower Jordan and of the Dead Sea. This book first became known to orthodox writers in the 3rd century, and we have accounts of it from three independent primary sources, Hippolytus, Origen, and Epiphanius. Hippolytus (Ref. ix. 12, p. 292) states that this book, several extracts from which he gives, was brought to Rome by a certain Alcibiades, a native of Apameia in Syria, and indicates that the time was either during or immediately after the episcopate of Callistus, A.D. 89, about the end of 292AD, which was agitating the church of Rome at the time was the question whether, and with what limitations, forgiveness might be bestowed on grievous sin committed after baptism, a dispute in which Hippolytus took the side of rigour and Callistus of leniency. This book of Elk sas announced a new method of forgiveness of sins, asserted to have been revealed in the third vision of Tranjan, by which any person, no matter of what sins he might have been guilty (some of the very grossest are expressly mentioned), might obtain forgiveness by submitting to a new baptism with the use of a certain formula of which we shall speak presently. The use of a similar baptism was prescribed as a remedy to be used by a person bitten by a mad dog or by a serpent, or otherwise afflicted with disease. Hippolytus takes credit to himself for the resistance which he made to the teaching of Alcibiades, and blames Callistus for having, by the laxity of his doctrine and practice concerning church discipline, predisposed men's minds for the easy methods of forgiveness of sins expounded in this book. Origen, in a fragment of a homily on the 82nd Psalm, preserved by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 38) and assigned by Redepenning to the year 247, speaks of the teaching of the Heseeai, some specimens of which he gives, as having then but lately troubled the churches. Epiphanius, though a later witness, professes to speak from personal acquaintance with the book, and this is confirmed by his concurrence in a number of particulars with the other authorities. His notices are distributed between his accounts of the Jewish sect which he calls Osseans (Haer. 19), of the Ebonites (Haer. 30), and of the Synagogue (Haer. 53). Under these names the same people seem to be described, those who honoured the book of Elk sas (whom it probably was never accurate to speak of as constituting a distinct sect of Elkessai) being found among those Ebonites who owed their origin to the acceptance of Christianity by Jewish Essenes. But we may infer that the book had some extent of circulation in the time of Epiphanius, being held in honour among different Jewish sectaries whom he counted as distinct from us. We may conjecture that these Pseudo-Clementine writings as a fourth source of information concerning the book of Elk sas; for although these writings do not mention that name, and although the question of relative priority is not absolutely settled, yet we have already (see vol. i. p. 575) enumerated coincidences between these books sufficient to authorise us in looking on them as works of the same school, and in using the one to throw light on what we are told about the other.

Hippolytus states that the book of Elk sas,
In giving an account of the doctrine of the book it will be convenient, first, to state the points in which it agrees with the doctrine of the Clementine writings, and afterwards those in which it goes beyond them. The book is evidently of Jewish origin. Jerusalem is made the centre of the world’s devotion, and it is described as the right of prayer, though the pilgrimage to the Holy City was not necessarily to the East, but towards Jerusalem in whatever quarter of the world the suppliant may be. It has been already noted that the names of the book are formed from Hebrew roots, and a further mark of Aramaic origin is the representation of the Holy Spirit as a female. The influence of the use of a noun of feminine form to denote the Holy Spirit shews itself also in some of the Gnostic theories as well as in the well-known passage from the Hebrew Gospel,

Aρτι σαβεί η μητέρα μου το σιω πνεύμα (Origen in Joann. tom. ii. 6, Opp. iv. 63).

Epiphanius also quotes from the book of Elkesai a Hebrew form which the Greek and Roman versions were constructed to use without trying to understand it. Epiphanius gives a literal interpretation of this formula on which others have attempted to improve (see Bagad, Annot. ann. 104, pp. 12, 13); but the right key seems to have been found in a highly ingenious solution given by Stern and Levy (see Hilar. Nov. Testamenta extra Can. Rec., iii. 105). The book ordained compliance with the other ordinances of the Jewish law, but commanded the rite of sacrifice, and this condemnation involved the rejection of certain parts of the Old Testament, and was coupled with aversion to the eating of flesh (see vol. i. p. 575). The superiority of the method of forgiveness of sins by the washing of water over that by the fire of sacrifice is based on the superiority of the element of water to fire (Hipp. ix. 14; Epiph. Haer. 19, p. 42; Clem. Rec. 1. 48; Hom. xi. 26). It is taught that Christ is but a created being, and, as has already been said, He is in the introduction spoken of as an angel; but He is the greatest of creatures, being Lord over angels as well as over every other created thing. The name Great King is applied to Him (Epiph. Haer. 19, p. 49; Hipp. ix. 15; Hom. viii. 21). The formula of baptism is found in the name of the Most High God and of His Son, the Great King; but this Great King is not exclusively identified with Jesus of Nazareth, for it is taught that He appeared in the world as successive incarnations, Adam being the first. The book of Elkesai agreed with the Clementines in complete rejection of the apostle Paul. It is said to have been hostile to virginity, and to have compelled men to marry (Epiph. Haer. 19), and this agrees with the inculcation of marriage upon all (Hom. iii. 68; Epistle of Clement, ch. 7). The book contained some astrological doctrine recommending the abstention from certain works on days under the influence of evil stars (Hipp. ix. 15, p. 286). Compare Hom. xii. 22, where the saints of God are healed on the days on which the race is ascribed to the non-observance of proper times for cohabitation. The book taught that it was lawful to deny the faith in time of persecution (Eus. vi. 38; Epiph. 19), thus annihilating at once the class of offences as to the forgiveness of which there was most controversy at the time; and so the Recognitions (i. 65) describe Gamaliel... as really a Christian, but, by the apostle's advice, concealing his profession; and, similarly (x. 55), represent Christians by a like dissimilation conversing with Simon Magus and acting as spies upon him.

Presided to the Homilies is a protestation of secrecy to be taken by all to whom the book should be communicated. This does not take the form of an oath to God, but of an appeal to witnesses, viz. heaven, earth, water in which all things are contained, and air which pervades all things and without which we cannot breathe. In this it appears that this appeal was made to that made at the time of their regeneration when they promised to sin no more. After making this protestation the candidate was to partake of bread and salt with him who administered it. We read constantly in the Homilies of this partaking of bread and salt* (iv. 6, xii. 8, xiv. 2, xxi. 25), and among those Ebionites who do not seem to have used wine, this rite takes the place of the Eucharist of the church. We have here marks of very close affinity with the book of Elkesai. The formula of baptism already spoken of contains a solemn promise to sin no more, made before the seven witnesses who are enumerated as heaven, earth, water, oil, salt, the holy scriptures and the prophetess Hagar. This tells us that the witnesses are elsewhere in the book enumerated as salt, water, earth, bread, heaven, sether, and wind. The interchange of the sether and wind for the spirits and angels has its explanation perhaps in a theory that these regions were the abode of the spirits in question. The mention of oil among the seven witnesses is illustrated by the affirmation made in this sect as a necessary preliminary to baptism (Rec. iii. 67; see also the discussion on omitting Rec. i. 46-48). At all events it seems plain that the protestation in the Clementines, referring as it does to the witnesses appealed to in the baptismal formula, harmonizes completely with the account of the baptismal formula given by Hippolytus.

* The text here has been altered. It was previously: the seven witnesses between the Clementines and the book of Elkesai; Hippolytus states, p. 239, that the book taught the necessity of circumcision, and if this be correct it went beyond the teaching of the Clementines. In the addresses to the heathen therein contained they are never told that they must be circumcised; yet it is to be noted that a statement of the non-necessity of circumcision found in the Recognitions (v. 34) disappears from the corresponding passage of the Homilies (xi. 16), and in the preface to the Homilies, which is more strongly marked with Elkesaiite features than the work itself, it is ordered that those Homilies should be communicated only to a circumcised believer — a phrase rather suggesting the inference that the circumcised were regarded as a higher class of believers than all were circumcised. With regard to baptism the Clementines are silent with respect to all that is most peculiar in the doctrine of Elkesai. The heathen addressed by Peter are exhorted to a single baptism in the account of which no mention is made of the appeal to the witnesses. This baptism is represented as the divinely appointed means for forgiveness of sins and new birth unto righteousness through the power of the Holy Spirit which since the creation of the world works through the water (Rec. vi. 8, 9; 1 Hen. xi. 28). Peter is represented as practising a daily religious washing; but this is never spoken of as a special means for obtaining a new forgiveness of sins. On the other hand, it is to be owned that the Recognitions state a principle from which the repetition of baptism might logically follow. The Ebionite theologians have generally done, make baptism correspond to circumcision, a view from which they were probably precluded by the fact that in their community both rites were simultaneously observed: but they make baptism take the place, as a means of forgiveness of sin, which sacrifice had occupied under the old dispensation (Rec. i. 29). Hence it was possible to draw the inference that baptism should be used as frequently as sacrifices had been as an atonement for constantly recurring sin.

The differences here noted bear on the question of relative priority between the Clementines and the book of Elkesai. Ritschl had counted the latter as the later. Uhlhorn in opposition pointed out the greater development of the Jewish and heathen elements in greater and the Christian element in less prominence in the book of Elkesai than in the Clementines, and that the latter are therefore to be regarded as the product of a time when the Essene doctrine of the former had been modified by Christian influences. It may be added that the violent hostility to the rite of sacrifices which appears both in the Homilies and in Elkesai is likely to date from a time antecedent to the destruction of Jerusalem, and is hardly intelligible if supposed to originate in times when sacrifice was only a rite practised by heathen. Uhlhorn's arguments are conclusive in proving that the doctrine of the book of Elkesai is considerably older than the time when it became known to the orthodox, but the question still remains open, what was the date of the embodiment of the doctrine in this particular book? — a point which our information is too scanty to determine. There would be no question as to the date of the book if we could accept its own account, that the revelation in which it originated was made in the 3rd year of Trajan; but though many have attributed to this statement some historic value, it deserves absolutely to go for nothing. If we refuse to believe on the author's word that the two gigantic angels ever appeared, why should we accept the date that he assigns to the occurrence? We have noted, however, already (i. 575) that the work which was the common groundwork of the Recognitions and Homilies asserts that a new Gospel was published (the Homilies add "secretly") after the destruction of the Holy Place. And it seems on other grounds probable that a number of Essenes, who had always held the Temple sacrifices in abomination, were brought to recognise Jesus as the true Prophet when the destruction of the Temple and the abolition of its sacrifices fulfilled the promises which he was known to have made. At this time then probably had their origin those Ebionite sects which combined a certain reverence for our Lord's utterances, and an acknowledgment of

\[H\]

\[\text{CHRIST. REG.} \text{- VOL. IL}\]
Him as a divine prophet, with the retention of a host of Essenian usages and doctrines; and this date would be remembered as an epoch in the history of these sects. It is likely that we are to connect with this the statement of Hesegippus (Euseb. H. E. iii. 32; iv. 22), that the reign of Trajan was the time when the church, till then a pure virgin, was corrupted by the breaking out of heresies. There seems to be no foundation for the opinion that Hesegippus was himself of Eikonite tendencies, and Jewish heresies are those of which the context would suggest that he was speaking. In sum, then, though it may be the more probable opinion that the book of Elkessai had been, as it professed to be, a considerable time in secret circulation among the Eikonite sects before Alcinobis brought it to Rome, yet it is possible that it may have been then of quite recent manufacture. We have elsewhere given reasons for thinking that the Clementine Homilies are not earlier than the beginning of the 3rd century, and that the corresponding story, that this work had been in mysterious circulation, under a pledge of secrecy, since the days of Peter was only a fiction intended to explain why the book had not been heard of before.

It would seem to be long before the sect of Elkessiates disappeared. Ex-hedim, an Arabic author who wrote about A.D. 987, quoted by Chwolson (Die Schiit, i. 112, ii. 543), tells of a sect of Sabaeans of the Desert who practised frequent religious washings and who counted one El-Chassach as their founder.

The primary authorities with respect to Elkessai have been already mentioned. Of recent dissertations on the subject most information will be found in Ritschl, Zeitschrift für histor. Theol. 1853, p. 573 sqq., and Entstehung der altkatholischen Kirche, p. 234 sqq.; Hilgenfeld, Nov. Test. extra Canones receptum, iii. 153, where all the fragments of the book are collected; Ullhorn, Historia et Recognovit des Chelmen Rumanus, p. 392; and Lightfoot's Dissertation on the Essenian, 'Epistle to Colossians,' p. 118 sqq.

[8.]

ELLA (3) (AELLA, AELLI, ALLA, ELLI, Ulli), king of Deira, and, according to his recorded pedigree, a lineal descendant of Woden. (Nennius, 51; Sax. Chron. ann. 588.) The Saxon Chronicle makes him king of Northumbria, but it was only over the southern portion of it that he reigned. The same authority places his accession in A.D. 560, and says that he was king thirty winters. It also states, along with Florence, that Ella died in A.D. 588.

The only interest attaching to Ella's reign arises from the well-known story of the English youth, whom he is said by Gregory in the slave market at Rome, and replying that they were Angles from the province of Deira, and the subjects of king Alla. (Bed. H. E. ii. 1; Malms. G. R. i. 63-4.) Bede gives the story as one of hearsay only, and in the chronicle of Ethelward the incidents are somewhat differently narrated. The young men are not spoken of as slaves; there is no mention of Ella or Deira, and Gregory's play on their names is omitted. Ella left two children, Edwin, who, after a long interval, succeeded him on his throne, and Acha or Aca, a daughter, who was the second wife of Ethelfrid son of Ethelric, who intruded himself into Edwin's heritage.

[9. R.]

ELLENUS, bishop of Siguenza (Segontia) c.e. A.D. 680-685. His signature appears among those of the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth councils of Toledo. [Photogene.] (Ep. Sagra. viii. 126; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 270, 287, 304.)

[6. A. W.]

ELLADIUS, presbyter of the palace. [Elladius.]

ELBBRIgh, abbot of Clonain-Bronagh (Cloonbroney, bar. Granard, co. Longford), died A.D. 785 (Four Mant. A.D. 780; Ann. Ul. A.D. 784). This is said by Archibalt (Mon. Hdb. 346) to have been one of the earliest patronic foundations, and the earliest abbots mentioned is St. Samthann virgin, who died A.D. 734 (Four Mant.). [J. G.]

ELLEYRYN (1), according to the Aedh y Saint, was son of Gwrtheyrn (Vortigen), and must have flourished towards the end of the 5th century. His name is preserved in Llanelltyr or Llaniltenr chapel, in the parish of St. Fagan's, Glamorganshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, 152, 186, 358).

ELLEYRYN (2), chorepiscopus, of Caerles, prior to the time of St. Dubrittios (Llb. Land. by Rees, 623 n. 2; Stubbs, Reg. Sacr. 154).

ELLDYD. [Illtyd.]

ELLE, king of Deira. [Ellla.]

ELLEBICHUS (1), Gregory Nazianzen addressed his two hundred and twenty-fifth letter to this man, wherein he regrets his inability to visit him through ill-health, and consigns to his care Mamas, a reader, the son of a soldier. Mamas had been enrolled, and Ellebicus is requested to obtain his discharge. (Greg. Naz. Ep. 235, in Migne, Patr. Gr. xxvii. 368.)

[6. B.]

ELLEBICHUS (2), a military official (præfet urbi) attached to the imperial court, sent with Caesarius by the emperor Theodosius ii. to Antioch to seize the guilty parties connected with the throwing down of the statues. Chrysostom delivered his seventeenth homily to the Antiochenes in the presence of these officers. (Chrysost. Homil. xvii. in Migne, Patr. Gr. xi. 171.)

ELLEJ, a Jewish patriarch, who lived in the time of Constantine, and was baptized on his death-bed (Epiph. Haer. 30, p. 128).

[9. G. S.]

ELLENUS succeeded St. Cadoc in the abbey of Llanccarvon (Cadoc), but Ussher gives too early dates, when he says Ellenius became abbot in A.D. 514, and was succeeded by St. Brendan, of Cloonert, in the year 520. Cadoc probably died about A.D. 570, and St. Brendan about A.D. 577. (Brendan 2.) Ellenius is said to have been an excellent disciple of an excellent master, and to have done much in making the college at Llanccarvon so famous. Of his own kindred or previous life we know only the tradition that he was "reginae cucismatic transmarinae filius," and one of the principal disciples of St. Cadoc. But the Welsh authorities (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 354, 383, 393) trace an entirely different order of succession, and make Cynog immediately fellow St. Cadoc as abbat. [ELLI.] (Usher, Eccl. Ant. cc. 13, 14, wks. v. 538, vi. 50; O'Flaharan, Irish Saints, i. 423; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 9, § 11.) [J. G.]

ELLI, "unmarried disciple," the "very dear unmarried auditor" of St. Cadoc, is said, in the Life of St. Cadoc, to have been the child of a queen long barren, and born on the islands of Grimbail. He lived at the White Court (probably Whitten, near Llanrannian) in the time of Mearig ab Tewdrig, king of Morganwg and Gwent, and seems also to have been connected with Cruycegreif or Garallwyd, near Llanfechan, in the same neighbourhood. He is one of those who are said to have been the immediate successors of St. Cadoc in the abbacy of Llanrannian [ELENION]. St. Cadoc having divested himself of the office in his favour, with procession of relics, etc., on a Palm Sunday. We find him as witness to several grants to St. Cadoc or his church in the 6th century (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 332, 363-4, 379, 582, 387-9). [J. G.]

ELLOC, of Cill-moelloc, is given by O'Clery (Mrt. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 3) and Colgan (Acta SS. 312, c. 5) among the sons of Bracan, or Brychan, and the brothers of St. Canoc (Feb. 11) and St. Dabnoegg (Jan. 1); the latter places Cill-moelloc near Loch-garmar, now Wexford Harbour. Elloc is unknown in the Welsh and Cornish genealogies of Brychan. Colgan (ib. 313, c. 17) puts his commemoration on July 24, where Mart. Tallagh (Kelly, Cat. Ir. SS. p. xxx.) has "Olleoc Ciuana Etchen." This is the probably the same person as stands in Mart. Doneg. on July 13, "Mathiold, of Cill-Moelioth, in Ui Ceinnmacailch, or Mathiold, of Cruinan Athcinn." Cill-moelloc and Cill-Moelioth are now two parishes, called Killmallock and Kilmaclanchogue or Gorey, in the barony of Ballyliscane, and part of the latter in the barony of Gorey, co. Wexford. (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 14; Skeene, Cat. Scott. ii. 23; and on the sons of Bracan or Brychan of Brycheiniog, see Brychian and Dabnoegg.) [J. G.]

ELLI'TIN (1) Son of Maelan of Seanchus, commemorated Jan. 11 in the Martyrologies of Donegal and Tallaght. His church was one which is said by Trechane, and in Colgan's Lives of St. Patrick, to have been founded by St. Patrick. It is now Shancroe, in the barony of Tirerril, co. Sligo, on the borders of Leitrim. (Colgan, Tr. Thurn. 89, c. 105, 134, c. 35, 271, c. 24, and notes; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 176.)

ELLI'TIN (2) of Kinsale, confessor, commemorated Dec. 11. He was brother of Seina (Mar. 10), son of Eren, and native of a district in Munster, called Altairige Cliahe. He was revered at Kinsale as one of its patrons, and is known by the affectionate title Melteog, "My little-Elitin," or "My Elitin-dear," now corrupted into St. Multose. (Mrt. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, xliii. n. 4, 332 n. 1, 333; Colgan, Acta SS. 575; Colgan, Cens. and n. 4; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 94; Caulfield, Life of St. Finbarre, 15 n. by.) [J. G.]

ELLYW (ELYW) is given by Professor Rees as a grand-daughter of Brychan of Brycheiniog, yet he does not think it unlikely that she is really identical with St. Elined, or Alvedha, on whose festival that of St. Ellyw depends, the former being on Aug. 1, O. S., and the latter on the Sunday immediately preceding. She is patron, or has probably given her name to Llanelli in Pembrokeshire, and to Llanllowel and Llanelly, both in Brecknockshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, 156, referring to Hist. Brocyn. ii. 473). [J. G.]

ELMERUS (ERMELIUS), patron saint of a collegiate church at Molianium, in the diocese of Liege, near Mazimburg. What is known or believed of this obscure saint, who is placed in the 7th or 8th century, and where Molianium was, is discussed in Boll. Acta SS. Aug. 28, vi. 485. [C. H.]

ELMGAUDUS, officer of Charlemagne. [HELMGAUDUS.]

ELNOG. [ELENOR.]

ELIOASUS (Eloes, Irenaeus; ADeatu, Origens; EEnoas, Epiphanius), one of the seven ruling spirits in the Ophiite system (Irenaeus, i. 30, p. 109; Origens, adv. Cels. vii. 31; Epiph. Haer. 26, p. 91). These authorities differ both as to some of their names and to the order in which they are placed. On the obvious derivation of the present name from the Hebrew name of God, see Irenaeus, in. 35, p. 170; Epiph. Haer. 40, p. 296. [G. S.]

ELOC, clerical witness to the grant of Mafura by king Cynyn, son of Peblau, to Aidan, bishop of Lladaad, probably in the 6th century (Lid. Land. by Rees, 409). [J. G.]

ELODIA, a virgin martyr, put to death, together with Nunilo at Oca (Huesca). Commemorated Oct. 22 (Mrt. Us.). [T. S. B.]

ELOHIM, Easulio, Hippol. Ref. v. 20, pp. 150-159. [JUSTINIANUS.] [G. S.]

ELOI, ST., bishop of Noyon. [ELIGUS.]

ELOPHIUS, martyr of Tol. [ELPHIUS.]

ELOQUIUS, abbot of Lagny, commemorated Dec. 3. He was one of that illustrious stream of missionaries which flowed from Ireland and flooded the continent of Europe in the sixth and following centuries. He was an Hibernian Scot, and accompanied St. Fursey (Jan. 16) to Lagny, where he associated with such other saints as St. Fursey's two brothers, Paolan or Pohlan and Uitan, with Mumbulius, Eto, Aedelgous, and Fregedan, but it seems an anachronism to make him contemporary with St. Tressan (Feb. 7), who flourished at least a century earlier. Probably setting out from Lagny, he went with twelve disciples and taught in Belgium, and on St. Fursey's death he is said to have become abbot of the monastery at Lagny, as being the special friend of the late superior, but it is probable that Emilian [ELIANUS (10)] came between, and this succession is adopted by the Gall. Chr. (vii. 492). He flourished about the middle of the 7th century. Colgan had a Life of St. Eloquius in contemplation for the Acta SS. and Sect. Acod. vii. 575, which was probably that one given by Mirraeus (Belg. Fast.) and Molanus (Not. Sanct. Belg.) on the same day. (Colgan, Acta SS. 51 n. 1, 96, c. 6, 273 n. 4, 436 n. 2; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 16, § 10; Reeves, Adamnan, 299; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 264—86; ii. 378 sq.; Camerarius, De Scot. Fort. 501, Dec. 4; Ware, Irish Writ. c. 3.) Dempster says he flourished A.D. 651, and wrote Echatariae ad Gentiles, lib. i.; Homiliae, lib. i. (Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 250; Tanner, Bish. 260.) [J. G.]
ELO THEORY—BISHOPS

ELO THEORY (ELO BETHUS), twenty-seventh bishop of Avignon, succeeding St. Saturninus and followed by Julianus. He is said to have been a priest of that church before his elevation to the see (A.D. 475), and to have been remarkable for his learning, faith, humanity and integrity. The authors of the Gallia Christiana (l. 883) conjecture he has too been the Elothearius addressed by Sidonius Apollinaris (Epist. vi. 11 in Migne, Patr. Lat. xvi. 552), who has also been assigned to Tournai. He does not appear in Gams’s list of the bishops of Avignon. (Series Episc. 503.) [S. A. B.]

ELOY, ST., bishop of Noyon. [ELPIDIUS.]

ELPENIPSA (ELPHE, Bull. Acta SS. Jan. i. 155), one of the forty-eight martyrs at Lyons. [LYONS, MARTYRS OF.] [L. D.]

ELPIDEPHORAUS (1), a Persian of senatorial rank, converted to Christianity by witnessing the constancy of the martyrs Acidynus, Pegasus, and Anempodistus. He was cruelly tortured by order of Sapor II., king of Persia, and afterwards beheaded, circ. A.D. 320. He is commonly commemorated Nov. 2 (Men. Bap.; Cal. Byzant.) [T. S. B.]

ELPIDEPHORAUS (2) (ELPIDEFORTHUS), bishop of Cuiculis or Cuizis in the province of Numidia, was present at the council of Carthage under Gratian, A.D. 349, and was the mower of the eleventh canon against the pride of the junior clergy. (Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 147, ii. 253; Mansi iii. 148.) [L. D.]

ELPIDIUS (1), bishop of the Tauric Chersonese. [EUGENIUS.] [L. D.]

ELPIDIUS (3), bishop and martyr, sent during the reign of Diocletian, after the death of Basili the bishop, together with Agathodorus, Capelo, and Eupentas, to Cappadocia, where they were all slain by the Greeks. They are commemorated March 8. (Men. Bap.) [T. S. B.]

ELPIDIUS (3), bishop of Comans in Cappadocia, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 448; Mansi, ii. 694.) [L. D.]

ELPIDIUS (4), a bishop of Palestine, who subscribed the council of Sardica, A.D. 347 (Athanasii Opera, I. 133, in Patr. Graec. xxv. 339 B; Mansi, iii. 89 A). He also subscribed the letter of a synod at Jerusalem (Ath. edit. 139). [W. M. S.]

ELPIDIUS (5), bishop of Satala in Armenia, deposed by the triumphant Acacian party in the council of Constantinople, Jan. A.D. 360, together with Basil of Anacyra, Cyril of Jerusalem, Silvanus, and others. The nominal grounds were his participation in the violent acts of Basil, his having occasioned great disorders in the church, and particularly his having violated the decree of the council of Melitene by reinstating a presbyter named Eusebius, deposed for having appointed one Nectarius as deaconess, though excommunicated for perjury. (Socr. H. E. ii. 42; Soz. H. E. iv. 24.) [E. V.]

ELPIDIUS (6), bishop of a maritime town in the East, A.D. 375, separated by Eustathius of Sebaste from his communion ostensibly on account of his holding communion with the intruded Arian bishop of Amasea, but more truly as a friend of Basil (Basil, Epist. 251 [72]). Basil wrote to Euplius, A.D. 375, by a presbyter Meletius, requesting him to arrange with his brother bishops of the seaboard of Pontus a time and place for Basil’s meeting them in the hope of removing mutual suspicions and confirming mutual charity (Epist. 205 [392]). Soon after this Euplius lost a little grandson. Basil wrote to console him exhorting him to Christian fortitude, and expressing his hope that this bereavement would not prevent their meeting at Comana (Epist. 240 [384]). His see is uncertain, but Bloudel is certainly wrong in placing it at Neocassarea. (Tillenium, ix. 674.) [E. V.]

ELPIDIUS (7), bishop of Dionysia or Dryasias in the ecclesiastical province of Bostra, present at the council of Constantinople, A.D. 381. (Mansi, iii. 370; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 865.) For Dionysia, see Hierocles Symmachus, Corp. Script. Hist. Byz., pt. 5, vol. iii. p. 399, Beaus, 1840, and Wesseling’s note, p. 535. [J. de S.]

ELPIDIUS (8), bishop of Laodicea in Syria at the close of the 4th century and opening of the 5th. He was originally a priest of Antioch under Meletius, whose confidence he enjoyed and with whom he resided (συνήπατος) as we shall now call bishop’s chaplain, and of whose moderation and gentleness of disposition Theodoret tells us he afforded a more exact copy than the word does of a seal (Theod. H. E. v. 27). He shared in his master’s sufferings under Valens, and accompanied by Flavian, attended Meletius at the council of Constantinople, A.D. 381 (Labbe, ii. 955). We next find him bishop of the Syrian Laodicea, in succession to Pelagius, in which capacity he attended a council at Constantinople, A.D. 394 (Labbe, ii. 1151). We again find him at Constantinople at the close of A.D. 403, as a member of the council summoned by Chrysostom’s enemies, and issuing in his deposition. Elpidius had been an intimate friend of Chrysostom at Antioch, and lent the weight of his advanced years and his well-deserved reputation for learning and piety to the defense of his friend and associate. When the validity of the canons of the council of Antioch, of suspected orthodoxy, used by Chrysostom’s enemies as an instrument to secure their object, came into question before the emperor, Elpidius adroitly turned the tables on Acacius and his party by proposing that the advocates of the canons should declare themselves in the same case with those who had promulgated them (Pallad. Dial. c. 9, p. 80). After Chrysostom’s deposition and exile Elpidius exerted himself strenuously in his behalf, despatching letters to the bishops and faithful
ELPIDIUS—Bishops

ELPIDIUS (12), ST. The first of the four recorded bishops of Atella in Campania cir. A.D. 400. Great sanctity and many miracles were attributed to him and to his brother St. Cyo a presbyter and his nephew St. Eclipus a deacon, both of whom also lived at Atella. St. Eclipus was buried at Salerno, and his festival was on May 26. Some suppose that he is an African refugee in the Vandal persecution. (Ug. Ital. Soc. x. 17; Boll. Acta SS. 24 Mai. v. 282.)

[ELPIDIUS (13), a bishop who with eleven companions is commemorated on Sept. 1 (A.D.SS. Boll. Sept. i. 210). The accounts concerning him are obscure, but he is supposed to have been one of the African bishops exiled by the Vandal king Hunneric, A.D. 434; by others he is identified with Eclipus, bishop of Atella in Campania, who might have been an African refugee (No. 12).]

[ELPIDIUS (14), (HELPEPIUS), bishop of Tamathis (Damietta), in Egypt, one of the orthodox Egyptian bishops, who, with some Alexandrians, fled to Constantinople in A.D. 487, to escape from Timotheus Aelurus and the Eutychians. (NESTORIUS, bishop of Pharamacon.) His name does not appear in their petition to the emperor Leo, but it does appear at the head of the letter addressed to them by the pope Leo (Leo, Mag. Ep. clx. 1330). It appears also in the list of bishops subscribing the synodal letter of the council held at Constantinople under Generius in A.D. 489 against simony (Harduin, ii. 783; Orosius Christianus, ii. 599).]

ELPIDIUS (15), bishop of Volterra, present at the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth Roman synods under pope Symmachus in Oct. 501, Nov. 502, in 503, and Oct. 504, according to the reckoning of Dahn (Die Könige der Germanen, ii. 209), who accepts with a slight alteration the arrangement of Hefele, § 220. (Masai, viii. 253, 269, 299, 315.)

[ELPIDIUS (16), bishop of Ancyræ, the metropolis of Galatia Prima, in the early part of the 6th century. (Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, i. 334; Gams, Series Episc. p. 441.) He sent Gaiana, a presbyter, as his legate, to the council of Constantinople, A.D. 536. (Masai, viii. 879 b, 938 d, 951 a.)]

ELPIDIUS (17), one of four brothers, all bishops (the others being Justianus, Justinianus, Nebridius), who flourished in Spain during the first half of the 6th century. Isidore, de Vir. Ill. cap. 33, has two or three lines about Eclipus, whose reported writings, he says, together with those of his brother Nebridius (bishop of Egara), had remained unknown to him. (Ximeno, Escritos del Reyno de Valencia, i. p. viii; Ceillier, Aut. Soc. xi. 265.)

ELPIDIUS (18), bishop of Thebes Phthioticæ in Thessaly, A.D. 531, mentioned in the petition of Stephen of Larissa to pope Boniface II. and the Roman synod against the conduct of Epiphanius of Constantine, bishop who had excommunicated bishop Stephen, and had summoned him and his co-conspirators to appear at Constantinople. The Thessalians rejected the jurisdiction of the bishops of Constantinople. (Mani, viii. 743; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 121.) [L. D.]

ELPIDIUS (19), bishop of Catania, c. 580. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xxi. 636.) [A. H. D. A.]

ELPIDIUS (20), a bishop most probably of some Eastern see, to whom, along with two other bishops, pope Gregory the Great addressed a letter (Epist. vii. 7), blaming him for crying out, "This is the day which the Lord hath made," at the ordination of Cyriacus the patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 597 (Migne, Patr. Lat. Ixvi. 859). [L. D.]

ELPIDIUS (21), bishop of Tarazona (Turesso), signs the acts of the fourth and sixth councils of Toledo (A.D. 633, 638), being fifty-second out of sixty-nine bishops in the former, and eighteenth out of fifty-three in the latter. [Leon.] (Mani, x. 643 A, ELPIDIUS, 671 C; Esp. Sgr. xiii. 114; Aguirre-Catalan, iii. 385, 413.) [M. A. W.]

ELPIDIUS (22), bishop of Astorga from about 654 onwards, signs the tenth Council of Toledo A.D. 656. His name is variously written—Elpidius, Hilpidius, and Hiplidas. [FELIX OF ASTORGA.] (Mani, xi. 43 C; Esp. Sgr. xvi. 114; Aguirre-Catalan, iv. 158.) [M. A. W.]

ELPIDIUS (23), a Roman presbyter, who, with Philexenus in 341, transmitted the letters of Julius I. to the Eusebian bishops in the East by whom Athanasius had been condemned at the Council of Dedication, inviting them to a council in December in that year. Elpidius and his companions were sent back in January, A.D. 342, with the reply of the bishops couched in grossly defamant terms. (Ath. Opp. i. iii. in Patr. Gr. xvi. 282; Labbe, ii. 494, 514; Baron. A. E. 340, iii.) [E. V.]

ELPIDIUS (24), priest of the Roman church sent by pope Liberius to the bishops of Ilyricum, A.D. 355, who, the provincial synod being assembled, commissioned Elpidius as their delegate to the Asian bishops. Their synodal letter containing his credentials, warning the Asians against the Macedonian heresy, and exhorting them to preach the Nicene faith, is preserved in Theodoret. Baronius thinks he may be the same as the legate of Julius in the preceding article. (Theodoret, H. E. iv. c. 8; Migne, Patr. Græc. Ixxii. 960; Baron. A. E. 365, xvii; Mani, Concil. iii. 385-386.) [L. D.]

ELPIDIUS (25), a deacon by whose hands Basil received a letter from Eusebius of Samosata A.D. 373 (Basil. Epist. 138 [80]; and by whom, A.D. 376, Basil sent a letter of consolation and sympathy to the Egyptian bishops Eulogius, Alexander, Harpocrates, in exile for the faith in Palestine. (Epist. 265 [293].) [E. V.]

ELPIDIUS (26), St., abbot, and patron saint of the town of St. Elpidius in Picenum (the March of Ancona), where his relics are preserved. According to the traditions collected by the Bollandists, he was a Cappadocian by birth, who visited Rome, and preached the Gospel in Picenum, where he died A.D. 393. According to another tradition, he was an abbot in his own country, and moved to Palestine, his remains only being translated into Italy. (A. A. S. Boll. 2 Sept. i. 378.) [L. D.]

ELPIDIUS (27), Spanish presbyter, who with the Spanish bishop Hilarus appealed to pope Innocent on the prevailing dissentions in Spain, occasioning innocent to address the bishops assembled at the first council of Toledo, A.D. 400. (Innoc. Ep. 3, cc. 1, 2; Mani, Concil. iii. 997.) [C. H.]

ELPIDIUS (28), presbyter of Constantinople, who deposed against Chrysostom at the council of the Oek, A.D. 403 (Phot. cod. 59). One of the attempts to assassinate Chrysostom after his condemnation, A.D. 404, was made by a slave of Elpidius, who asserted that he had been bribed by his master with fifty pieces of silver. (See H. E. vii. 21; Pallad. Dialog. cap. 20.) [E. V.]

ELPIDIUS (29), presbyter, who laboured with much zeal and success as a missionary among the heathen tribes inhabiting the mountain range of Aramans between Cilicia and Syria. Many were converted by his means, and several churches and monasteries built. Chrysostom wrote from Cucusus, A.D. 404, to commend Elpidius and his work to the liberality of his ancient friend Agapetus (Chrysost. Epist. 175). [E. V.]

ELPIDIUS (30) OF CAPPADOCIA, priest and abbot. Having passed his earlier years in a monastery founded in Cappadocia by Timothy, a chrysopiscus under Basil the Great, he became the abbot or superior of an anchorit community in the mountains in the neighbourhood of Jericho, originally founded by Chariton, with whom Paladius passed some time in his twentieth year shortly after embracing the solitary life. Paladius speaks of his austerities as surpassing those of all the hermits of that district. The last twenty-five years of his life he spent in a cavern on the mountain side, only partaking of food on Saturdays and Sundays, passing the whole night in singing the praises of God, with his face constantly turned to the east, night and day, not changing his posture even when suffering intensely from the poisonous sting of a scorpion. He became priest after Paladius left him, and died before A.D. 420. (Pallad. Hist. Lucian. cc. 106-108, pp. 1024-1026.) [E. V.]

ELPIDIUS (31) (HELPIDIUS), presbyter and archimandrite of Constantinople, who subscribed the deposition of Eutyches at the council of Constantinople in 448 (Labbe, iv. 232 a). He, among the other orthodox archimandrites, is addressed by Leo I. (Leo. Mag. Ep. 71, 1012, FAUSTUS). His name does not appear among the orthodox archimandrites who petitioned Marcian, the emperor, in 451 (FAUSTUS), but he or one of his name does appear as subscribing the almost contemporary appeal to that emperor from the Eutychians, headed by Charinus, who were, or claimed to be, archimandrites [Alexias, 793 (Labbe, iii. 479); Theod. Hist. xiv. 3, Tillemont, c. 638]. In the 4th session of the council of Chalcedon, the orthodox archimandrites, who had been summoned to sit there before their Eutychian brethren were introduced, recognized the name of this Elpidius as that of the μεροφόρος τῶν Ἴδρων, for as it is implied in this that he could not rightly claim the title of archimandrite, we must probably distinguish him from his orthodox nameake.
ELPIDIUS—DEACON AND POET

[C. G.]

ELPIDIUS (32) RUSTICUS (HELPIADIUS), a deacon of Lyons, and, according to some, an ex-monk (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxii. 545 n.), who studied medicine, and became one of the physicians of Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths (Procop. Bell. Goth. lib. i. cap. 1), to whom intimate friendship he was also admitted (regia potestas ac sedulo famulatu intimus, Cyprian. Tolones. Caeasar. Arist. Vita, lib. i. 25, Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxii. 1016). His skill in his profession is evidenced by a letter from St. Avitus bishop of Vienne, begging him to cure the son of one Celerius, and speaking of his "peritia singularis" (Avitus, Epist. 35 in Patr. Lat. lxxii. 251), and by another from Eudocius bishop of Ticinum, informing him that he is daily afflicted with such a complication of diseases that he desists from his life (Eusebius, Epist. 10, Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxii. 155; cf. too lib. viii. ep. 8, Migne, lxxii. 135). The facts of his life known to us are scanty. He was on intimate terms with Eudocius (see the letters above quoted, and a fourth, lib. vii. ep. 7; Patr. Lat. lxxii. 117). Cyprian in his life of Caesarius bishop of Arles (lib. i. n. 29, Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxii. 1016), tells a story of his having a haunted house, apparently at Arles, which the bishop, by the sprinkling of holy water, freed from the spirits. In the Epist. Var. of Cassiodorus (lib. ix. ep. 24, Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxii. 612) there is preserved a letter addressed to him by his master Theodoric, towards the close of his reign, in the highest terms of respect and admiration. Euplontius had seemingly petitioned the king for a grant to enable him to restore some of the buildings of Spoleto, which had suffered from age. The letter readily conceals his request. From this it has been inferred that he was, at least temporarily, a resident at Spoleto.

Two short poems by him are extant, both on sacred subjects, and both written in the hexameter metre. The former is in two twenty-four separate stanzas of the lines, each consisting of a different subject from the Bible, but for the most part alternating between the Old and New Testament, a stanza on a subject from the former being followed by a corresponding one from the latter, the type by the antitype. For instance, one on the confusion of tongues at the destruction of Babel, has for its complement the miracle of tongues at Pentecost, that on the selling of Joseph by his brethren, the selling of Christ by Judas. The other poem is somewhat longer, and not distinguished by this peculiarity. It is a hymn on the blessings conferred by Christ, and the language is perhaps more spirited. Both are classical for the age. They may be seen in

ELPIDIUS—MARTYR; LAYMAN

8. [Epiphanius (2).]

ELPIDIUS (34), a martyr under Julian with Marcellus, Eustachius, and others. Special cruelty was practiced towards Euplontius as he was a man of senatorial rank, and had been made "praefectus praetorio" by Constantius (Baron. Annal. 362, 15). He is commemorated Nov. 16. [T. S. B.]

ELPIDIUS (35), HELPIADIUS, a Paphlegonius who held several important offices under Constantine and Constantius. A law of 323 was addressed to him by Constantine, when he was perhaps vicarius of Italy (Cod. Theod. xvi. 5, 5; see Gothofredus). He was a man of mean aspect and a poor speaker, but of very gentle and honest character. He succeeded Hermogenes as praetorian prefect in 361, but begged to resign his office when Constantius ordered him to torture an innocent man in his presence (Amm. xx. 6, 9). Before he became prefect he paid a visit, with his wife Aristsetia and his children, to St. Anthony of Egypt. On his return his three sons were taken ill of fever at Gaza, and were healed by the prayers of St. Hilarion (S. Hieron. De Vit. H. tom. i. p. 249). Libanius addressed a complimentary letter to him, in which the wife and children are also mentioned (Lib. Ep. 1301). Baronius identifies him with the Roman senator martyred by Julian (no. 34), commemorated by the Roman church on Nov. 16; but this is improbable (see Tillemont, Emp. iv. p. 691). It is uncertain whether he is the "count of the private estate" in the next article who is said to have apostatized under Julian. (Theodore, H. E. ii. 12, and Tillemont, l.c.)

[J. W.]

ELPIDIUS (36), nicknamed "the Sacrificer" (Δεσπότης, Philostorg. H. E. vii. 10), a friend of the emperor Julian, under whom he held the office of Comes Rerum Privatarum. During the reign of Constantius he had professed himself to be a Christian, but under Julian he became an earnest pagan (Philostorg. u. s.; Theodoret, H. E. iii. 12). Libanius, a great correspondent of his, describes him as, though inferior in learning to Maximus and Priscus, two other friends of Julian's, yet their equal in zeal for the gods and in affection for the emperor. (Liban. Orat. pro Aristoph. ed. Reiske, pp. 435, 436.) When Julian commanded him to sacrifice, he told his master that Constantine had erected at Antioch to be spoiled of its treasures and closed, Euplontius was one of the three officers who were sent to execute the mandate. (Theodoret, H. E. u. s.) He survived Julian, the uncle of the emperor, and Felix, his associates on that occasion, but being implicated in the treason of Procopius, A.D. 365 he was deprived of all his property and cast into prison, where he died amid universal detestation. (Philostorg. u. s.; Theodoret, u. s.;Niceph. x. 29.) Euplontius is frequently mentioned by Libanius in his letters, and always in terms of great praise. (Epp. 29, 33, 136, 208, 237, 302, 303.) [T. W. D.]

ELPIDIUS (37), A.D. 371, assessor of Tha-ELPIDIUS—LAYMAN

ELPIDIUS (38). A.D. 375. bearer of a letter from Basil to Amphilochius bishop of Iconium. He was servant to Amphilochius and was hastening to him to refute certain calumnies about himself (Basil. Epist. 231, Patr. Græc. xxxii. p. 861).

ELPIDIUS (39) (HELPIUS), a Spanish rhetorician of the 4th century, one of the promoters of the Zoroastrian opinions in Spain which culminated in Priscillianism. He is mentioned by Jerome (Ep. cxxxiii. 4; see also Ep. lxxv. 3, and Vallarini's note) as having been misled by Agape [Agape] and as having imbibed his opinions from Mark the Egyptian; and by Sulpicius Severus (Chron. ii. 46, 47) as having been condemned together with Priscillian (both of them being laymen) by the synod of Caesar Augustus (Sara-gossa) A.D. 380. It is singular that in the letter of Pope Innocentius on the synod of Toledo, about A.D. 402 (Inn. Ep. 3), the name Elpidius appears as that of a presbyter who had come with others to lay before the apostolic see the state of the province of Baetica, which was distracted by Priscillianism. [ELPIDIUS (27)]. [W. M. S.]

ELPIDIUS (40), a Spanish nobleman, cousin to Theodosius I. The emperor endeavoured to obtain for him the hand of Olympia shortly after her widowhood. On her steadfast refusal of his overtures, Elpidius, imagining that she would yield to the emperor's authority, suggested the use of forcible measures. Theodosius ordered the confiscation of her property till she should be thirty years old, and forbade her to hold any intercourse with the bishops, or to go to church, but without affecting Olympia's resolution to remain a widow. ( Pallad. Dial. p. 164.) [E. V.]

ELPIDIUS (41), an Arian gentleman, who, having sent to Bonosus and Jason a work of St. Augustine's, afterwards sent to the latter a treatise by an Arian bishop, in the hope of clearing up the whole question, and reclaiming him from his supposed errors of doctrine. The reply of Augustine is directed to the object of illustrating the Catholic doctrine in this question, and is remarkable for its studious yet genuine courtesy and moderation of tone. (Aug. Ep. 242.) [H. W. P.]

ELPIDIUS (42), one of the two imperial commissioners (Eulogius being the other) sent by Theodosius II. to represent him at the infamous "Robbers' Synod" of Ephesus, 449 A.D. Elpidius was a man of high official rank, "count of the divine assembly," a president of the council. (Labbe, Concil. iv. 105.) His whole behaviour exhibited the most unblushing partiality and a determination to intimidate the party opposed to the emperor's wishes. Stephen bishop of Ephesus having shown hospitality to Eusebius of Dorylaeum and other members of Flavian's party, Elpidius and Eulogius paid him a demis- cilliary visit, with a band of 300 men, partly his own soldiers, partly disorderly monks, and threatened him with punishment for receiving the emperor's enemies (ib. 112). On the opening of the council he unblushingly took part against Flavian, delivering a long and rhetorical harangue, at the close of which he produced the emperor's letter to Dioscorus, postponing the reading of that from pope Leo (ob. 128, 145). The request of Flavian that the accuser of Eutyches, Eusebius of Dorylaeum, might be heard, was con- tumeliously refused by Elpidius, who rebelled the venerable prelate for daring to speak with- out permission of the council, and told him that the accusation was a thing of the past, and could not be entered on again (ob. 145). In the scene of excitement and disorder which followed the revocation of the condemnation of Eutyches and the sentence of deposition pronounced on Flavian and Eusebius, Elpidius and Eulogius resorted to the grossest measures of intimidation, calling in the provost of Asia, attended by a tumultuous body of soldiers and monks, bearing swords, clubs, and chains (ob. 112, 129). These guards of public order, if not actual abettors of Barsumas and his brutal adherents in their assault on Flavian and the other orthodox bishops, certainly did nothing to restrain their violence. (Tillemont, Mémo. Eccl. vol. xv. passim.) [E. V.]

ELPIDOFORUS, an apostate from the ranks of the Catholics during the general persecu- tion of the orthodox in Africa by the Vandal king Hunneric, c. A.D. 484. Elpidoforus was ap- pointed to superintend the punishments of the catholics, and amongst those brought before him was Muritta the deacon, who had received him from the font on his baptism. Muritta before his burning produced the very towels or sheets in which he had received Elpidoforos or stepping out of the font, and reproached him with so much force that Elpidoforus was burned with fire of conscience before he entered the eternal fire, as Victor Vitensis narrates. (De Persec. Vandal. v. 9, in Migne, Patr. Lat. Iii. 246.) [L. D.]

ELPIDOPHORUS (1) (Mansi, Concil. iii. 148), bishop of Cuicilus. [ELPIDIPHORUS (2)]

ELPIDOPHORUS (2), bishop of Anastasie- polis, in Cariæ, present at the fifth general council, A.D. 553. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 813; Mansi, ix. 394.) [L. D.]

ELPIN, of Glais-Naidheen (Glasevin, an ancient monastery founded by St. Berchan, who is better known as Mobhi Clairenehc (Oct. 12), on the Lifey, near Dublin [BRECHAN (4)]), died A.D. 753. (Four Mast.) [J. G.]

ELPIS (1), one of the auxons in the system of VALENTINUS (Iren. i. i. p. 7; Hippol. Ref. vi. 30, p. 187; Epiph. Haer. 31, pp. 165, 169). [G. S.]

ELPIS (2), martyr with Pistas, Agape, and their mother Sophia. [CARIAS].
ELPIUS (5) (also written Helpis), daughter of Festus, a Roman senator, and, according to a doubtful tradition, wife of Boethius, who at one period of his life was certainly married to Rustici, the daughter of Symmachus [Boethius]. The only evidence for the double marriage of Boethius to be found in his writings is the passage in the "Consolatio Philosophiae" (Lib. ii. Pros. 3), "Quis non te telicissimum ... tanto splendore socerorum ... praeclari?" which is obviously capable of a different interpretation. Elpis is the reputed authoress of two hymns in the breviary addressed to the Apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul, Deo cara lacrantes acearum, and Beate Pastor Petri clementis accepis (Migne, Patrologia, vol. liii. p. 558). An epitaph upon this lady in six elegiac couplets (ibid. p. 558) speaks of her as "Siculae regionis alumnis," and records the fact that she followed her husband into banishment. It has been ascribed, but without authority, to Boethius himself (Vallini, Vit. Beoth. praefat.). [E. M. Y.]

ELPISTUS, a contemporary of Dionysius bishop of Corinth. [DIONYSIUS (3)]. Eusebius relates that Dionysius attributes his letter to the Amastriani and other churches of Pontus to the influence of Beccylides and Elpestus (Guseb. H. E. iv. 23). [W. M. S.]

ELRIG, son of Ealdwulf (or Aldulf) king of East Anglia, according to Nennius, who is the only authority for his existence. He would thus be the brother of Eadberht abbess of Ripon. (Nenn. Hist. Brit. in M. H. B. 744; Lappenberg, Hist. Eng. i. 267.) [C. H.]

ELTUTUS (Nennius, Hist. Brit. in M. H. B. 744), Welsh saint. [ILTUTUS.] [C. H.]

ELVEUS, ELVUIUS, bishop of Menevia. [ELVEUS.] [C. H.]

ELUOC (ELNUT, ELNUT, ELWAD) was bishop at Carygyl in Anglesey, and in the Achan Saint ysgy Frayddin is identified with ELWAD, bishop of Bangor. (Myn. Arch. ii. 42.) [J. G.]

ELURION, A.D. 347, Egyptian bishop, present at the Council of Sardica (Mansi, iii. 66 d; Athanas. i. 130). [W. M. S.]

ELUSIUS (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 199), deacon. [ELUSIUS (1).] [C. H.]

ELYAVED (ELANG, ELAVE, ELVODE, ELWAED), are probably all names of the same person who is numbered among the bishops of Menevia or St. David's, but beyond the names we know nothing; it is suggested by Professor Stubbs that he may be Elyad or Elob, bishop of Bangor (A.D. 755-809) [ELMOI], but it is very doubtful for many reasons, though the names are similar. (Stubbs, Reg. Sacr. Angl. 155, 157; Girald. Camb. Hist. Camb. ii. c. i. vita; Godwin, de Prasulis Angl. 601.) [J. G.]

ELYAN (Stubbs, Reg. Sacr. p. 159), legendary bishop of London. [ELYAN.] [C. H.]

ELYEIS, Welsh saint. [ELYEIS.] [C. H.]

ELYETUS, bishop of Arretio, 775. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xviii. 76; Ugheili, Ital. Sacr. i. 412.) [A. H. D. A.]

ELVIANDUS (HELVIANDUS), bishop of Treviso (Tarvisium). When Attila had sacked Aquileia, Concordia, and other neighbouring cities, and was approaching Treviso the bishop saved the town by a prompt surrender, A.D. 452. (Ugheili, Italia Sacra, v. 410; Games, Series Episc. 806.) [L. D.]

ELYVOD (Stubbs, Reg. Sacr. p. 157), bishop of Bangor, archbishop of Gwynned. [ELYVOD, ELVAD.] [C. H.]

ELYVODUGUS, educated at Bangor in Wales, and author of Historia Britonum, lib. i., is probably the same as St. Elod, whose contemporary he is otherwise said to have been, though his reputed date (A.D. 590) is at least two centuries before St. Elod's time. Piseus (de Hist. Angl. Script. 103) calls him Elvedugus Probus, and adheres to the early date; he also gives a separate account of Elodus, and yet he appears to give an account of the same individual in both memoirs. [ELYVOD.] (Wright, Biog. Brit. Lit. 153; Tanner, Bibl. 262.) [J. G.]

ELYVOED, bishop of Menevia (Stubbs, Reg. Sacr. p. 155). [ELYVOED, ELVAD.] [C. H.]

ELYVOGUS (Stubbs, Reg. Sacr. p. 156), bishop of Llandaff. [ELYVOGUS.] [C. H.]

ELYWAED. [ELYWAED.]

ELYWAED (ELWOED), a clerical witness to grants of land to Llandaff when Teilo and Arwystyl were the bishops in the 6th century (Llib. Land. by Rees, 308-60, 412-13). When St. Oudocus was chosen to succeed St. Teilo, Elwaed was one of the most prominent electors. According to the Life of St. Oudocus, he, Mercwych, and Cyanwyf went, apparently as delegates from the clergy, to present the bishop-elect to the Archbishop of Canterbury for consecration. (Ib. 372.) There can be little doubt but he is the Elgwared who attended the school of St. Durtigius at Hertland on the Wye (Dubriction 16, 324). [J. G.]

ELWINUS (1), ST., or Aluanus, one of Breca's companions in her voyage from Ireland to Cornwall. A life of him was extant in Leland's time (Itim. iii. p. 5, 15, 16, 21). His day was Feb. 22. The parish named after him, St. Allen, is a little way north of Truro, and the parish between it and the sea is dedicated to St. Perran, also an Irish saint. [C. W. B.]

ELWINUS (2) (Munm. G. R. A. i. § 77, ed. Hardy), brother of Egfrid. [ELWINUS.] [C. H.]

ELYWOED (ELWOED, ELWOD), abbat of St. Illtys, now Lantwit Major, and witness to several grants of land to the see of Llandaff, when Oudocus and Berthwyr were bishops, in the 6th century (Llib. Land. by Rees, 402 sq.). [J. G.]

ELYWOG (ELYVOGUS) was bishop of Llandaff in the time of Meurig, Rhys, Fierwael, and Ichodri, sons of Isfeal, king of Owainysg (Glamorgan). He is said by Ussher to have been the sixteenth bishop of Llandaff, and the Liber Landavensis places him next to bishop Trychan, but the editor inserts three bishops between them and counts Elwog only the ninth prelate at Llandaff. He must have flourished in the second half of the 8th century. Professor Stubbs suggests his identity with Elbo, bishop of Bangor. (Lb. Londav. 400, 626; Usher, Eccl. Ant. c. 5, wks. v. 110; Godwin, de Praesatul. Angl. 625; Stubbs, Regat. Sacr. 156.) [J. G.]

ELWORED. [ELWIREDE.]

ELWYSYTL (ELOISTIL), one of the clergy under St. Druirci, is placed among the bishops of Llandaff, but only as one of the suffragan, according to the system instituted by St. Telio, who raised (suitable persons) to the episcopacy, sending them through the country, and giving dioceses to them to suit the convenience of the clergy and the people.” Elwysyt appears to have been stationed in Ergyng, and flourished in the first half of the 6th century, in the times of Cyfrif and Gwyddai, sons of Pechain, kings of Ergyng. (Lb. Londav. by Rees, 352, 408, 624; Godwin, de Praesatul. Angl. 622; Stubbs, Regat. Sacr. Angl. 156.) [J. G.]

ELXAI (Ephian. Haeres. xix.), founder of Elkesaites. [ELKEISIAL.] [C. H.]

ELYMAS, a presbyter, martyr in Persia, together with Polychronius bishop of Babylon, and several other presbyters and deacons during the Decian persecution. Commemorated April 22. (Boll. Acta SS. Apr. iii. 11; Tilmel. Hist. Eccl. v. 561; Baron. Annal. 254, 27.) [T. S. B.]

ELYW. [ELYW.]

EMA or AMA—May 22. Martyr with six other nuns, captives with Eliabas. [ELIABUS.] They were offered freedom on condition of marriage and offering sacrifice. They refused, and were once beheaded. (Assem. Mart. Orient. i. 144.) [G. T. S.]

EMAGOLA. [MULUSC.] [MULUSC.]

EMAN, a clerical witness to a grant made to Grecilin, bishop of Llandaff, late in the 7th or early in the 8th century (Lb. Londav. by Rees, 417-18). [J. G.]

EMANT, of Cluain, commemorated July 1. He is called a bishop by Mar. O'Gorman, and his name is inserted by the second hand in the Martyrology of Donegal (by Todd and Reeser, 183 and n. 7). It appears in the Kalendar of the Arubhchnitt Missal (Bp. Forbes, Col. Scott. Saints, 102), in the phonetic form of St. Evan, bishop. [J. G.]

EMMANUEL, archimandrite. [EMMANUEL.] [EMMANUEL.]

EMANUS, martyred at Chartres in the 6th century with St. Mauritius and St. Almerus. According to the legend he was a Cappadocian, who in early youth made a pilgrimage to Rome, where pope Leo befriended him and furthered his education. After a stay of seven years, he conceived the desire of visiting the shrine of St. Nazarius at Milan. Here he stayed two years, and then proceeded to that of St. Symphorian at Autun, but a little later, warned by a vision, quitted that city to preach the Gospel at Chartres. In a remote part of that district he was set upon by thieves, who received with con-

EMERITUS, bishop of Cambrai. [HILARUS.]

EMERENTIANA, a virgin, martyr at Rome, A.D. 304. She was the foster-sister of Agnes [AGNES]; as she mourned for her at tomb, she was stoned by a crowd of people. She was at the time a catechumen. She is commemorated Jan. 23. (Men. Bas. Mart. Act. 304, 31.) [T. S. B.]

EMERIA (1) is the name given by Joceline and Erinus in their Lives of St. Patrick to the two daughters of St. Patrick's master Milcho, and sisters of bishop Guassacht (Jan. 24) of Granard. While Joceline (c. 36) gives few particulars regarding them except their place of burial, Erinus (Vita. v. c. 39, ii. cc. 56, 57) gives first an account of a wonderful dream of Milcho, and then tells how St. Patrick placed bishop Guassacht over the church of Granrod, co. Longford, and the two sisters were put in charge of the neighbouring nunery of Claisbranach, now Clonbroney, where at death they were interred, and are now venerated on July 11 (Colgan, Acta SS. 741, col. 2, and Tr. Thams. 73, c. 36, 100 n. 36, 120, c. 20, 183, c. 30, 148, c. 135, 170, b. 9). Lanigan (Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 146, 219, 405) allows that there may have been such persons in Ireland, and even at Clonbroney, but many difficulties in the way of their receiving them and Guassach as children of the unfortunate Milcho or Maelchul.

EMERIA (2), one of St. Trinian's two companions at Rescob, Forfarshire [TRIDIANA] (Brev. Aberd. Prop. SS. p. aestiv. f. 122.) [J. G.]

EMERINUS (EAMENUS), a bishop of Limoges, whose name is found in the catalogues between Atticus and Hermogenian, who flourished in the 3rd century. He is not mentioned in the letter written by Jordanus bishop of Limoges to pope Benedict VIII., in which he gives a list of the early bishops of the see in their chronological order. (Gallic. Christ. ii. 501, Instrumenta, 165; Gams, Series Episc. 564.) [L. D.]

EMERITA (1), supposed sister of the British king Lucius. Her death by martyrdom, after she had followed her brother in his missionary journeys, is placed at Trinum or Trinomeum, near Curia, now Coire, or Chur, the capital town of the Swiss canton Grisons, a.d. 193. Her feast is Dec. 4. Dempster has her commemoration at May 26 and Dec. 3, and with other Scotch authorities gives her nativity to Scotia (Usher, Eccl. Ant. c. 5, 6, wks. v. 53 sq. 186; Creasy, Ch. Hist. Brit. iv. 18; Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 261; Res. Welsh Saints, 83, 316.) [J. G.]
EMERITA

EMERITA (2), virgin martyr at Rome, together with Digna. They were put to death during the Valerian persecution, circ. A.D. 257. Consecrated Sept. 22. (AA. SS. Sept. vi. 302.) [T. S. B.]

EMERITA (3), sister of Cornelia, confessress. (Cyp. Epp. 21, 22.) [MACARIUS.] [K. W. B.]

EMERITUS (1), Donatist bishop of Julia Caesarea, or Jol, once an important town on the coast of Morocco, now called Scherschell (Shaw, Trav. p. 18).

A conference between the Catholics and Donatists was held at Carthage in June, A.D. 411, by command of Honorius, at which Marcellinus the proconsul presided. For the general character of the discussion, and the part taken in it by Emeritus, see above, vol. i. pp. 893, 894, but some remarks may here be added to illustrate his own character. He may be described as showing himself inquisitive and adroit, and to this extent able, partisan and special pleader, exhibiting much profession of fairness and anxiety that the case should be decided on its real merits, but meanwhile making it his business to divert attention from them, affecting a mock modesty as to his own slowness of comprehension, and on this ground repeatedly asking for more time to consider the whole matter, declaring his inability to understand the grounds taken by his opponents, and complaining of their alleged attempt to regard the Donatists and not themselves as the challenging party. He attempted also to shew that the ground taken by them in their invitation to discuss the disputed questions was different from that laid down by the imperial commission, that the genuineness of the invitation itself was doubtful, and that there was on the part of the Catholics a wish to conceal the truth in this matter. At the same time he disclaimed any obligation of being bound by the result of the discussion, insisted on regarding the question as merely an African one, and protested against its being extended beyond the limits of the province.

When Augustine replied that it affected not the African church only, but the universal church of Christ, Emeritus accused him of shifting his ground, and of taxing him with a fault of which he himself was guilty. When the president recalled the attention of the Donatists to the real question, viz. whether the case was to be argued on the ground of fact or on that of doctrine, Emeritus replied, that if there were two grounds there ought to have been two commissions, and to the remark of Augustine, that if facts were to be judged, they must be attested by evidence, if doctrine, arguments taken from Scripture must be used, Emeritus repeated his former protest against treating the Donatists as challengers of the discussion. When Augustine asked whether they abandoned their objection to the consecration of Cascellanus, Emeritus complained that if they did so they were treated as challengers; if not, the Catholics claimed the right of replying to them as objectors. He protested against the importation into the controversy of the name of Cascellanus. Had the proceedings concerning him made him a righteous man or not? The church ought to be pure, and is vitiated by the presence of impure persons.

The world is not the church, nor does God in any way regard the two as identical. The above account is taken from the Monumenta Vetera de Don. Hist. in Oberthur's edition of Optatus, No. 55, pp. 285-482; see also Ribbek, Don. und Aug. pp. 515-608.

On Sept. 20, 418, a meeting of Catholic bishops was held at Caesarea by desire of Zosimus, bishop of Rome, at which Deuterius, the metropolitan, presided. Emeritus, who happened to be in the place at this time, was invited to attend. Having mentioned the insinuations which were current as to the unfairness of the inquiry, whose decision it was said had been purchased by the Catholics, Augustine called on him to give a reason why, after the decisions against him and his party, he still refused to rejoin the church. Having recited the declaration of the Catholic bishops previous to the inquiry, in order to shew their candour and spirit of fairness, Augustine gave a summary of the Maximianis proceedings, in which Emeritus had taken a prominent part as a member of the council of Bazaia, and by assisting in drawing up its decision, if not, as Augustine appears to say, actually dictating it. He shewed that these had been pressed without effect upon the Donatists at the inquiry, and pointed out their inconsistency therein. But he failed in drawing from his opponent any satisfactory reply. (Ang. de Gratia cum Eoner. vol. ix. p. 698; Tillemont, lxvi., lxvii.; Donatism, sup. 887.)

Two days after this Emeritus was present at a discourse delivered by Augustine in the principal church of Caesarea, in which, while he justified the imperial proceedings against the Donatists, proceedings which they chose to call persecution, he entreated his former opponent to return to the communion of the church. Augustine mentions in his Retractations that shortly after this he addressed a letter to Emeritus, containing an account of the points in which he thought the Donatists had been vanquished in argument, but this letter is not extant. From this time we hear no more of Emeritus. (Ang. Retract. i. 46, 51; Ep. 190, 193, c. Gens. i. 14; Possidius, V. Aug. c. 14; Ribbek, u. s. pp. 645, 649.) [H. W. F.]

EMERITUS (2), bishop of Macri in the African province of Mauritania Cidna, summoned to Carthage to confer with the Arians by the Vandal king Hunneric, A.D. 484; at the conclusion of the conference he was sent into banishment, where he died. (Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 207; Gams, Series Episc. 466.) [L. D.]

EMERITUS (3), eleventh archbishop of Embrun, succeeding Salonius, who was deposed for treason and followed by St. Alphonse, who seems to have held the see from A.D. 585 to 610. He was present at the second council of Mâcon in 585, and himself convened a provincial synod in A.D. 588. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. lib. v. cap. 28; Labbe, Conc. vi. 681, 692; Ceillier, Hist. des Ant. Sacr., xi. 896; Gall. Christ. ii. 1063.) [S. A. B.]

EMERITUS (4), a reader, who suffered martyrdom along with Saturninus and many others at Abitina in Africa during the Diocletian persecution, A.D. 303. He openly avowed that an assembly had been held in his house on a Sunday, and refused to surrender the sacred books, for, as he said, "they are written on my heart." He was commemorated on Feb. 11 or, according to some, on Feb. 12. (Boll. AA. SS. Feb. ii. 513-519; Beluze, Mucchi. Hist. i. 14; Ceilier, iii. 20; Vict. Vit. de Pers. Vand. lib. iii.; Ruinart, A. A. Sacra. Mart. 382; Baron. Annal. 303, 38, 49.)

[Porta.

EMERIUS (1), bishop of Treves. [EYERMUS.

EMERIUS (2), the eighth bishop of Saints, succeeding Eusebius, flourished in A.D. 562 or 563. His election was irregular, for he had usurped the see on the sole authority of a mandate of king Clovis, without the consent of his metropolitan, who was absent, and apparently without having obtained the suffrages of the people and clergy. Accordingly, Leonius the archbishop of Bourges convened a council of the bishops of his province at Saints, and having deprived Emerius, put Heracleus a priest of Bourges in his place (Labbe, Conc. vi. 527; Gueydon, Mem. doc. 237). The document attesting the fresh election, subscribed by the archbishop and bishops, was forwarded to king Charibert, who had succeeded his father C lovis. Charibert at once ordered Emerius to be reinstated, and sent his officers to exact a thousand gold pieces from Leonius, and from the rest according to their ability, and so avenged the insult. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iv. 36; Coll. Hist. des Auctores Sacros., xi. 896-7.) This was one of the high-handed impieties to which Baronius (ann. 566, n. xviii.) ascribes Charibert's death. But he infers from some verses of Venanius Fortunatus, lib. i. (given in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 74), that Emerius continued to hold the see, and was reconciled to Leonius.

[S. A. B.]

EMERIUS (3), St., son of St. Candida, founder and first abbot of the monastery of Benzoles (Balmeolum) in Catalonia. He lived during the time when the Gothic inhabitants of Spain were hard pressed by the Mahometans, during the life of Charles Martel, A.D. 739; other traditions assign to him the time of Charlemagne. (AA. SS. Boll. 27 Jan. ii. 761.)

[Porta.

EMERIUS, bishop of Treves. [EYERMUS.

EMETERIUS, bishop of Tarentaise. [EMI-

EMETERIUS (1) AGRICOLA (MATINS, St. MADIR), said to have suffered martyrdom near Barcelona about A.D. 890. He was commemorated on March 3. (Boll. AA. SS. Mart. i. 244.)

[Porta.

EMETERIUS (2) only known as a subscriber of the fifth council of Arles, A.D. 554. He was not present, but was represented by Claudianus, a deacon. The name of his see was not added, and he has been claimed conjunctively as the sixth bishop of Riez, and the eighth of Marseille. The latter is Le Cointe's conjecture, and is the more probable. (Le Cointe, an. 554, n. xvii. vol. i. p. 799; Gall. Chist. i. 394, 637; Labbe, Conc. vi. 462.)

[S. A. B.]

EMETERIUS (HAEEMETERIUS,HEME-

EMETERIUS, HEMETERIUS), martyr, who is said to have suffered along with Cledonius, at Calais, in the modern Calabshara, on the river Elbe. He must have lived before Prudentius, but at what period is quite uncertain (Gregor. Turon. de Glor. Mart. i. 83, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxii. 825). He was commemorated on March 3. Prudentius composed a poem (Peristep. Hymn i) in honour of the two martyrs (ibid. lx. 275; AA. SS. Boll. Mart. i. 228). The Galliandt distinguish between this martyr and Emeterius. (Vet. Rom. Mart., Usuard, Adon., Notker, Wadulb. In Mart. Hieron. he occurs as Eremitas.)

[Porta.

EMILIA

EMIGDIUS (EMYDIDUS), first bishop and tutelary saint of Asculum or Ascoli in Picenza. In the reign of Docietian he came out of Germany, with twelve brothers, to visit the tombs of the martyrs at Rome, where by his zealous preaching, overthrowing a statue of Aesculapius and casting it into the Tiber, he so exasperated the prefect that Marcellus bishop of Rome ordained him bishop and sent him for safety to Asculum. Here he eventually suffered martyrdom under the prefect Polimius, A.D. 303 or 304. The Roman Martyrology commemorates him on Aug. 5. His Life has been written by Lebertus, the Jesuit Historian of Ascoli, but the authorities for his highly legendary Acta are allowed by Boschius to be conflicting and suspicious. (Ugel. Ital. Sac. i. 439; Baron. Annal. 309, iv.; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. ii. 25; Paolo Antonio Appiani, Vita di San Emilico, Rom. 1702.)

AMPLIA (1), bishop of Barcelona (2) from about A.D. 600 to about 615. His name appears among the signatures to the disputed decreetum Gundemarii [GUNTUMARI], which professes to date from 610. An Emilia is also found among the subscriptions to the synod of the province of Tarraconensis, held at Egrara in 615. No see is mentioned, but as Barcelona is one of the suffragan bishoprics of Tarraco, it seems justifiable to identify this Emilia with the Emma ecclesiast Barcinonensis episcopus in Gundemarius's decree, which, even if not of the date it pretends to be, was probably put together with the help of documents now inaccessible to us. It is not pretended in any case that the decreetum is later than 681 (Esp. Supr. xxii. 128; Aguirre-130atalia, iii. 942 and 984). [SEVERUS, 52.]

[Porta.

EMILIA (2), bishop of Mentessa. After the (disputed) synod of Carthaginensis bishops at Toledo, in 610, and the decree of Gunthamar in the same year [GUNTUMARI] (which documents are appended to the Acts of C. Tol. iii.), there appear in the most ancient MSS. three letters, or Suggestions, from the clergy and people of Mentessa, the first from Sossul in the name of the clergy, the second from Sussil, which latter takes to have been the chief civil authority, and the third from John, Ermengild, and Venedus, in the name of the people of Mentessa, asking that one Emilia of noble birth and character, should be consecrated "per Dei et vestrum ordinacionem." There is no name given of the church to which these letters are addressed, and we add further mention of Emilia; but if the letters, together with the synod and decree, are genuine, and not a forgery of the time of Julius, it is probable, as Gams has suggested, that the letter

[Porta.]
were tacked on to the Acts of the synod and to Guthimir's decree, as documentary evidence in support of the claim to supremacy then brought forward by, and formally conceded to, Toledo, and that Emila must be dated, not after 610, but before 599. The charter belongs to the name of the bishops of Mentasa are known (Esp. Sagra.
vii. 255, Aguirre-Catalani; Gams, Kirchengesch.
vol. ii. pt. 2, 77).

[M. A. W.]

EMLA (8), bishop of Ilicii (Elche), subscribes the acts of the fiftieth council of Toledo under Egica, a.d. 688, as "Ellicianae, qui et Elotanae sedis Episcopus." For the connexion of the see of Ilicii with the older bishopric of Elotana vid.
Serpentinae. (Esp. Sagra. vii. 241; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 313.)

[M. A. W.]

EMLA (4), the last bishop of Coimbra under the Gothic rule whose name remains to us. He signs the acts of the sixteenth Council of Toledo, der Egica, a.d. 693. (Esp. Sagra. xiii. 76; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 333.) [LUCRINCIUS.]

[M. A. W.]

EMILIA (8), dean of Cordova, martyr with Hierenia, a layman, under the Saracens. They were beheaded in the Arabin town, in which they so eloquently denounced the false prophet beyond all previous example that the Saracens mutilated the extirpation of the whole Christian church at Cordova. Eulogius of Toledo gives Sept. 15 as their day (Eulog. Tolet. Memor. SS.
t. 12, in Patr. Lat. cxxv. 793). Emila is named also Emilianus. [EMILIANUS (15).] [C. H.]

EMILIANUS (1) (AEMLIANUS), reckoned by the Sammariath, according to their authorities, the first bishop of Valencia in Gaul. He is mentioned, without any see, among the bishops who attended the council of Valence in the year 374. (Bruno, Canon. Apost. ii. 111; Ital. Chrift. ari. 201; Ceilier, iv. 600.) [C. H.]

EMILIANUS (2) I, eleventh bishop of Vercelli, cit. a.d. 500, present at the third and fourth councils of Rome under Symmachus (Nanai, viii. 225 a, 268 a), buried in the church of St. Eusebius, where his remains were discovered in 1081; commemorated Sept. 11. It is stated that he was born in Spain in the town of Libyum, that he was a disciple of bishop Felis, and a hermit for forty years, and that his great fame caused him to be unanimously elected bishop by the clergy and people of Vercelli (Boll. Acta SS. 11 Sept. iii. 797; Ugelli, Ital.
Sacra. iv. 782). The story of his life thus crosses that of the famous Spanish San Millan. [EMIL-IANUS (9).] [C. H.]

EMILIANUS (3) II., twenty-second bishop of Vercelli according to Ugelli (Ital. Sacra.
iv. 783), who is followed by Gams. The period assigned to him is the year a.d. 653, and he is stated to have received many privileges from the Lombard king, Aripert I. Some confusion with Emilianus III. may be suspected. [C. H.]

EMILIANUS (4) III., bishop of Vercelli. In a deed of Aripert I., king of the Lombards, dated Oct. 5, 626 (Proc. Cor. Diom. 3, p. 80), Emilianus receives a confirmation of the lands which Gandersius ("olim nostro miles suae Antonii abas") had given to the monastery known afterwards as that of St. Michele di Luccedo near Vercelli. Aripert also decrees that the monastery which Emilianus had consecrated should be under the control of himself and his successors. (See also Historiarum patriarca Monumneta Chartarum, vol. i. 15-15. The charter belongs to a.D. 706 or 707, according as the "fifth indiction" is reckoned. Ugelli (Ital. Sacra. iv. 783) has no Emilianus III., and calls this bishop, of whom he relates the same facts, Magnetius, the twenty-fifth in his list. See the preceding article.)

[A. H. F. A.]

EMILIANUS (5) patriarch of Grado 749 to 757. See Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, ix. 749.
For the relations of Grado and Aquileia, see Elias and Epifanius. (Ugelli, Ital. Sacra.
v. 1090.) [A. H. D. A.]

EMILIANUS (6) (AEMLIANUS), an Irish bishop, patron of Fquentia, now Faenza, in the north of Italy (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 16, § 10; Camerarius, de Lond. Port. Nov. 12, p. 198;

EMILIANUS (7) (AEMLIANUS), a hermit who retired into the forest of Ponticiacum in Auvergne. This locality has been thought to be either Pontgibaud at the sources of the Sioule, west of Clermont beyond the Puy de Dôme mountain, or Pionsat at the north-west angle of the dep. Puy de Dôme. Here he passed his life in prayer and manual labour, with the birds and wild beasts for his familiar companions. He died at the age of ninety, a.d. 538, leaving what possessions he had to his disciple Brachio. (Greg.
Tur. VIII. Patr. c. 12, in Migne, Patr. Lat. Ixii.
1210; Ceiller, xi. 381.) [L. D.]

EMILIANUS (8) (AEMLIANUS, SAN MILLAN), solitary; one of the most famous and ancient of Spanish saints, claimed by the Spanish Benedictines as joint patron of Spain with St. James (Sandoval, Fundaciones de San Benito en Espafia, Madrid, 1601). The only original source of information about him is the life of him by St. Brulio, bishop of Saragossa, written about fifty years after his death, on the testimony of four of his disciples—Citoctaus, Sophrosnius, Gerontius, and a holy woman Potamia. St.
Brulio died about 657, and we have a mention of his life of Emilianus by St. Idefonso (de Script. Eccl. lib. ii. cap. 12), which must have been written before 657. The life was written for the express purpose of being read on the saint's feast-day, November 13, and was sent to the bishop's brother Frontimianus, accompanied by an Iambic hymn, which appears at length in the Mazarabic Breviary. It was first published by Sandoval in 1601.

St. Brulio gives no dates and no names of parents, but the common tradition is that St.
Emilianus was born about 475, and died about 572, not long before the destruction of the town of Amaya in Castilea (Otho, v. 150), by Leo-vigid in 575, a fact mentioned in the Acta as having been prophesied by the saint "ante annu fere migrationis suae centumverso vita." His birth-place and the site of his oratory have given rise to endless controversy, Castile claiming him as a native of the Ronja, a district of Old Castile, born at Berceo, close to the existing monastery of San Millan, while Aragon puts forward Verdeyo, near Calatayud. The name of his native place is given by St. Braulio as Vergegüm. The question then is, is Vergegüm represented by Bereco in Castile or Verdeco in Aragon? and which relics are genuine—those at Torrelapaja near Verdeco, or those at San Millan near Bereco? In the fifthieth volume of the *España Sagra*da, Señor Lasante devotes a good deal of space to these difficulties, and comes to the following conclusions: (1) that Vergegüm, He is Verdeco, and that San Millan was therefore a native of the Arragonese diocese of Tarrazona; (2) that the cult of the saint at or near the present San Millan is extremely ancient, and springs from the fact that the saint passed the first forty years of his anchorite life on the mountain of La Cogolla, which overhangs the monastery, being recalled thence by command of the bishop of Tarrazona; (3) that his oratory, of which St. Braulio speaks as the scene of his last years ("ubi unus ejus habetur corpusculum gloriosum"), is rather to be identified with Torrelapaja, near Verdeco, than with the site of the upper and elder monastery of San Millan de Suse, near Bereco. The archives of the monastery, from the 12th century onwards, have been so hopelessly tampered with and falsified that it is almost impossible to arrive at the facts of the original cult or of the early history of the community. The present Benedictine house was probably founded in the 11th century in the time of the Oligaric reform, though there may have been an elder community there, and the cult of the saint on the Cogolla mountain is certainly very much older. (Exp. Sagra*da*, vol. i. p. 2.)

Emilianus began life as a shepherd, and it was while following his flock over the mountains that the dream overtook him which was the cause of his conversion. Moved by what seemed the direct call of God to a holy life, he betook himself to St. Felix, a neighbouring hermit, living at Bili*bu*m (absorbed in the 12th century into the modern town of Haro), and was by him instructed in Catholic belief and practice. Thence he returned to Vergegüm (Verdeco), but finding his life there too public on account of the strangers who flocked to see him, he soon left it for the mountains, wandering north-west into the remotes of his mountainous sendzit between Burgos and Logroño ("ad remotiores Disterti montis secreti"). For 40 years he lived a hermit's life there, for the most part on or near the peak of La Cogolla (according to the tradition of the monastery; there is no mention of the Cogolla of St. Braulio's life), whence the above name of the monastery which commemorated him—San Millan de la Cogolla. At last, attracted by the fame of the holy father, Bishop Díindsay, bishop of Tarrazona (Turiasso), sent for him, and much against the saint's will ordained him presbyter, imposing upon him at the same time the cure of Vergegüm, his birthplace. In this office his entire unworldliness (locupletem redens ecclesiam Christi virtutibus non opibus; religione non redditiis; Christianis non rebus) drew upon him the hatred of his brother clergy. He was accused before Díindsay of wasting the goods of the church, and deprived of his cure. Thus released from an unwelcome office, Emilianus retired to an oratory near Vergegüm, and there passed the rest of his life. During this second period of retirement, although the severity of his personal asceticism increased rather than diminished with time, he allowed himself to be surrounded by a small circle of disciples and became widely famed for his charity and tenderness towards the poor. In extreme old age he even allowed himself to be nursed by certain holy women (habitabant cum sacris virginibus), a fact which, taken together with the manner of his possessing a horse at one time upon which he rode to church, seems to dispose of the absurd assertions of later times that St. Emilianus was the founder of a Benedictine monastery and himself a Benedictine abbot. St. Braulio nowhere speaks of him as monachus, but only as presbyter; there is of course no mention of any monastery, though we hear of friends and disciples, and we are told that he died in the arms of a certain "Arellum presbyterum, cum quo habebat collegium." Ildefonsus indeed speaks of St. Braulio's life as "vitam ejusdam monachi," and Braulio himself applies the title of abbat to Citonatus, one of the four disciples and eye-witnesses, a fact however which proves nothing for the Benedictines, as monachism in Spain is at least as old as the reign of the Christian princes of the Council of Saragossa in 380. On the whole it seems most likely that the Benedictine rule was unknown in Spain during the whole Visigoth period. (Mem., de la Real Acad. de Hist. de España, vol. viii. p. 469. See arts. FROMSTAN and ST. MARTIN of Braga.) About the beginning of the 13th century there was a curious upgrowth of legends, of miraculous appearances, forged privileges, and so forth, round San Millan and his monastery. Of this the Latin and Castilian versions of the famous "Privilegio de la Vota" (Sandoval, Fundaciones, &c. i. fol. 40), and the "Vida de San Millan" of Gonzalez Borco, written about 1240, and one of the earliest monuments of Spanish vernacular poetry are well known instances. (Tamayo de Salazar, Mart. Hosp. vi. 109; Exp. Sagra*da*, l. 2; Mobilet, saec. i.; Yepes, Cron. Benedict. i. ann. 572; Sanchez, Poesias Cast. ant. al Siglo XV. vol. ii.)

[8. A. W.]

EMILIANUS (9) (AEIMILIANUS), a notary who was retained by Gregory the Great amongst his clerics, and with his company wrote down from the pope's delivery (excepted) the forty homilies on the Gospels, as we learn from the life of Gregory by John the Deacon (lib. ii. 11, in Migne, Patul. Lat. i. xiiii. 48; Ceillier, r. 550).

[8. D.]

EMILIANUS (10) (AEIMILIAN, EMILIAN, EMIAN), abbot of Lagay. At March 16, Colgan (Acta SS. Mat. 574) gives a memoir, "De S. Emilianis, Abate Latiniae et Magnae Britanniae Desmaiyo et alii," This was a disciple of St. Fursey (Jan. 16), and a follower in his footsteps, first in study and discipline, and then across the sea. He left Ireland and joined St. Fursey at Lagay, in France. When St. Fursey set out for England, shortly before his death by the way, he gave his monastery at Lagay (Latinenses) in charge to Emilianus. St. Eloquiuous was chosen by the brethren successor of St. Fursey at Lagay, continued to rule it until his own death. The date of this is unknown, but he must have flourished about A.D. 648, and his festival at Lagay was on Mar. 10, as we gather from Marcardius in the Benedictines, EMILIANUS.—MARTYR

and from Sausaegus in the Gallican Martyrologies. (U’lanon, Irish Swis., i. 278-79; Gall. Christ. vii. 491; Mabill. Acta SS. O.S.B. saec. ii. 624, ed. 1733.)

EMILIANUS (12), martyr in Numidia with bishops Agapius and Secundius, during the persecution of Valerian, A.D. 259. He is commemorated April 29. (Mart. Ad., Us.) [T. S. B.]

EMILIANUS (13)(Aemilianus), the Spanish governor who condemned St. Fructuosus and his companions to death at Tarragona, A.D. 259. (Fructuosus.) (A.A. SS. 21 Jan. ii. 340; Ceillier, ii. 387.) [L. D.]

EMILIANUS (14), martyr at Dorostorum, in Moesia, during the reign of Julian. He entered an idol temple, broke the statues of the gods, and scattered the victims. He then went and informed himself to the governor of the province, by whom he was condemned to be burned alive. (Men. Bas.; Mart. Us.) Commemorated July 18. [T. S. B.]

EMILIANUS (15), a deacon, martyred at Cordova with Hierennias. Commemorated Sept. 17, according to Usuard, but Eulogius assigns him (under the name of Emilia) a different day. (Mart. Us.) [Emilia (5).] [T. S. B.]

EMILUS (4)(Aemilus), a bishop, the father of Is, whose epithalium on her marriage with Julian of Elana was written by St. Paulinus of Nola, who speaks in flattering terms of her father. (Migne, Patr. Lat. Ixi. 607; Ceillier, viii. 86.) [L. D.]

EMILUS (5) (Aemilus), St., bishop of Beneventum, was sent to the emperor Arcadius by pope Innocent and the Roman council concerning the affairs of St. John Chrysostom, A.D. 405. He is identified by some with the bishop Aemilus mentioned by St. Paulinus of Nola in the epithalium on the marriage of Julian and Is. (Paulin. Nolan., Poem. xxvi., in Migne, Patr. Lat. Ixi. 638, 922 note 292; Sarnelli, De' Vescovi Benev. 23; Mansi, iii. 1162.) [L. D.]

EMILUS (6)(Aemilus), father of Remigius (St. Remi) bishop of Rheims. According to the traditions embodied in the lives of St. Remi, Emilianus was an illustrious man, and he is said by some to have been a count. (A.A. SS. Bell. Oct. i. 65, 135.) [L. D.]

EMILUS (7) (Gall. Chr. ii. 500), bishop of Limoges. [Eumou.] [C. L.]

EMIN, EMINUS. [Eimhinn.]

EMINIANUS, abbat of Lagy. [Eimilianus (10-)].

EMINO, bishop of Tarentaise. [Emmo.]

EMITERIUS, EMITERIUS, twelfth bishop of Tarentaise, succeeding Budemarus and followed by Widenars, about the middle of the 7th century. The name alone survives. (Gall. Christ. xii. 702; Gams, Series Episc. 829.) [S. A. B.]

EMITERIUS (Adon. Mart. Mar. 5).

EMITHERIUS, (Wand. Mar. 3), martyr. [Emetheriuis.]

EMMA, the wife of Eadbald king of Kent, 616-640; daughter (according to Florence of Worcester, who probably followed the Kentish hagiographers) of a king of the Franks, who is identified by Pagi with Theobert king of Austrasia. (M. H. B. 635.) Thorn, the Canterbury historian, says that she died two years after her husband, and was buried beside him. (Thorn, ap. Twysden, col. 1769.) She is said to have been the mother of all his children. (Eldham, pp. 175, 176.) Her name appears in a spurious charter of Eadbald. (Kemble, C. D. No. 6; Eldham, p. 144; see Will. Malmesb. G. R. lib. i, § 11.) [S.]

EMMANUEL (Manuel), presbyter and archimandrite of Constantinople. In A.D. 448 he appears as informing the archbishop Flavian, through the presbyter Asterius, that Eutyches, the heretic, had sent to him a "tome" which he had drawn up and had endeavoured to secure his signature to it. (Labbe, Concil. iv. 197.) It appears however that when Flavian sent messengers to the archimandrites to ascertain the truth in this matter, Emmanuel was one of those who said the tome had not been sent to him. (Labbe, Concil. iv. 211.) This contradiction has not been explained. Tillemont suggests the possibility of there having been two Emmanuels, contemporary archimandrites (as there were two Enseblises), but of this there are no traces. Nor, again, is it possible to suppose two archimandrites, one Manuel and one Emmanuel, for wherever Manuel occurs, he stands in the place which Emmanuel occupies in other lists.

Emmanuel is addressed by pope Leo, Oct. 15, A.D. 449, together with Faustus, Martinus, and Petrus, other archimandrites of Constantinople, in a letter exhorting them to constancy, faith, and charity, and denouncing the acts of the second council at Ephesus (Epp. 51, 71, 937, 1012, Migne). In 451 he signs the address of the orthodox archimandrites to the emperor.
EMMANUEL, bishop of Adrianople, present at the seventh general (second Nicene) council, A.D. 787, where in the acts he is called Manuel (Origen Christ. i. 1173) with the Manuel bishop of Adrianople who was carried away and cruelly murdered by Crumus the Bulgar chief. Another account says that he was carried off by Crumus along with the parents of Basil the Macedonian, who afterwards became emperor; that he converted many of the Bulgarians, and was murdered with others by Cutrago or Mutrago, the successor of Crumus, who was enraged at his missionary success, but that Basil, being a mere lad, was allowed to escape. This latter version is that adopted by Constantine Porphyrigenitus in his life of his grandfather Basil (c. 4). (Migne, Patrol. Graec. cix. 216.) [L. D.]

EMME (Bel. H. E. iv. 1, in M. H. B. 210), bishop of Sens. [EMXO.] [C. H.]

EMMELIA (EMELIUM), the mother of St. Basil, who supplied her son and Gregory his food while living as anchorites in Pontus, as we learn from Gregory's fifth letter (Migne, Patrol. Graec. xxxvii. 5). On her death, Gregory wrote an epitaph for her, in which he extols her on account of her children, three of whom were priests (ibid. xxviii. 1128, 1129; Baron. A. E. 363, lxxxviii.). [L. D.]

EMMERAMMUS, EMERAMNUS, ST., martyr and missionary bishop. There is no distinct authority for his see, but it has been inferred, with great probability, that it was Poitiers, and in the list of the Gyllia Christiana (ii. 1151) he appears as 25th bishop of that diocese, succeeding Johannes L and followed by Dido. We know, however, that about A.D. 649, he resigned his see, whichever it was, and, after providing a successor, left country, family, and large possessions to seek the wilds of Pannonia, where he had heard the people were still idolaters. He was accompanied only by a priest named Vitalis to act as interpreter. On his way he arrived at Ratisbon, the residence of Theodon, who governed Bavaria for king Sigebert III. Here he learnt that the country before him was so hostile as to be impassable, and reluctantly yielded to the entreaties of his host that he would stay, and, as bishop, or if his humility declined that office, as abbot, charge himself with the spiritual jurisdiction of the district. He allowed himself to be persuaded with the less regret, as he saw that the recently converted people of that part mingled the worship of their old gods with their new-found Christianity. For three years he preached and worked in all parts of the country round, and his labours were crowned with success. At the end of that period, A.D. 655, he obtained permission to make a pilgrimage to Rome. Accompanied by a few priests he set out on his way amid the lamentations of his flock, but when he had been three days only on the journey, and was resting at a place called Helfendorf, where there was a pleasant spring of clear water, he was overtaken and slain by Lantbert, Theodon's son, and a band of armed followers. An almost incredible story is given as the reason of his murder. He was buried at Aschaim, but his remains were later on translated to Ratisbon. Two churches were built, one on the spot where he was struck down, the other at the place where he breathed his last. Both were reputed to be the scene of numerous miracles. Before the close of the century, the well-known monastery called after him was erected at Ratisbon. He is commemorated Sept. 22. The authority for this account is the life by Aribio, who calls himself Cyrus, bishop of Freising, who lived about a century later, in Surius de Prob. Sacr. Sept. 22, v. 367, and Boll. Acta SS. Sept. vi. 474. There are also extant a treatise, De Passione B. Emmeram, by a priest called Constans, written at the end of the 7th or beginning of the 8th century (Patr. Lat. xcvii. 1397), a Vita B. Emmeram, by Megistus, provost of Magdeburg, and two books of Miracula S. Emmeram by Arnoul, a monk of the monastery, both in the 11th century (Canisius, Lect. liii. pt. i. p. 105; Pertz, Script. iv. 543; Migne, Patr. Lat. cxii. 973, 995), but they add nothing to the account of Aribio. (Cf. Ceillier, Hist. des Autres sacrés, viii. 94, 95; Usuard. Mart. Sept. 22.) [S. A. B.]

EMMETIUS, bishop of Nantes. [EMELIUS.]

EMMANIUS (Gall. Christ. vii. 491), abbot of Lagny. [EMILIANUS (10).] [C. B.]

EMMIA, abbess. [ENIMIA.]

EMMO, ST., twenty-fifth bishop of Sens, succeeded Arnulpus. In 659 he subscribed a preceptum or privilegium for the abbots and monks of the monastery of St. Columba, and another for the monastery of St. Peter of Sen (both given by Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxviiii. 1168, 1171). In 662 he was one of the subscribers of a charter of Berthefredus, bishop of Amiens, in favour of the monastery of Corbie (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxi. ii. 1178). He entertained anias, the companion of Theodore archbishop of Canterbury, during part of the winter of A.D. 669, which they spent in France, on the way to their new country (Beute, Hist. Eccl. iv. 1). He is said to have died in A.D. 675, and to have been buried in the monastery of St. Peter Vivus. His successor in the see was Landeburchius, or according to the Bollandists, St. Amatus. (Gall. Christ. xii. 9; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. iv. 124-5.) [S. A. B.]

EMMO (EMINO), eighteenth bishop of Tarentaise, succeeding Bunimondus and followed by Possessor, towards the close of the 8th century. Nothing but the name survives. (Gall. Christ. xii. 702; Gams, Series Episc. 829.) [S. A. B.]

EMNERUS, deacon of Nantes, whose servant Leudarius was cured of blindness. (Greg. Tur. de Mirac. SS. Martyr. iv. 20.) [C. H.]

EMNERUS, bishop of Nantes. [EMERIUS.]

EMPIRE, ROMAN. The religion of the empire at the time when it came in contac-with the church of Christ may be best described as one of confluent polytheism. Following in the line of the great Macedonian conqueror it had recognised the religions of the nations it had conquered, and had, with some natural exceptions, tolerated their introduction even at Rome itself, in the name of Romanism. But the Romans were not without their votaries at Rome (comp. Apuleius, Metam. bk. xii.; Juvenal, vi. 526-541, ix. 22, xiii. 93). The exceptions, which proved the rule, were significant in their character. Rome had been startled, even in the days of the Republic, by the introduction of the new rites of the Bocchanalla. A secret society with mysterious orgies, which drew within its influence men and women of the higher classes, and in which licence of the worst character was practised, or reported to be practised, alarmed the Senate. Edicts were issued for their suppression, and those who were suspected of joining in them were watched with jealous suspicion (Tib. Legal. xix. 13, 14).

When the course of conquest brought the Roman government into contact with the Jews a new phenomenon presented itself. Here was a people unlike the rest of the nations, professing a religion which stood out in marked contrast with theirs, which worshipped one God and not many gods, and in whose hearts dwelt a sense of the reality of the Deity, as anthropomorphic or thermomorphic, but as invisible and apart, not capable of being represented by any human art. Political considerations made it expedient to court the support of the Jews in the conflict of Rome with the kings of Syria, and the Jews, on their side, welcomed the protection of the great republic. When the outbreak of war brought large numbers of Jews to Rome, they were allowed to settle in the Trastiberine quarters of the city by themselves, and, although belonging mostly to the slave or freedman class, they gained, partly by their higher culture, partly by the mysteriousness of their faith, a considerable influence over both men and women of the higher classes. Horace alludes sportively to his reluctance to offend them (Sat. 1, 9, 69). Juvenal notes it as a sign of the degeneracy of the times that the groves of Egeria had been let to them, either as a quarter where they might take up their abode, or for purposes of worship (Sat. iii. 12-15), and speaks of their oratories (proseusecher as more or less frequented by cottars (Sat. iii. 298), of their women as beguiling the minds of others of their sex by whispering the secrets of the future, or unfolding to the them mysterious lore of the books of Moses (Sat. xiv. 102). Judaism also took its place as a religio licita, though it was regarded with a feeling of unapproachability, its ceremonies, as far as they were practised, affinities with the magic arts practised by the Claudii and mathematici, who cast horoscopes, and whose predictions were at times a disturbing element in the state. Traces of this feeling are found in the edicts of expulsion which either included Jews, as under Tiberius, or were specially directed against them, as under Claudius.

In the edict of the latter we may probably find the first trace of the followers of the new faith. The Jewish quarter had been for some weeks or months in a state of tumult, and that part of the city was occupied under the name of Christia. We can scarcely fail to recognise in that name the fact that the question whether the name of the Christ of right belonged to Jesus of Nazareth had become, as in other cities of the empire, a bone of contention between hostile parties, and that the Romans, looking at the matter as one of civil sanitation and public order, and taking Christia (or, as they afterwards, and, probably, then also, pronounced it (Tertull. Apol. c. 3) Christus, for the leader of one of the parties, thought it necessary, as a measure of police, to eject the whole body of the Jewish population. This was, however, only a transitory measure of precaution. The salutations in Rom. xvi. 19 show that the Jews soon returned, and with them a considerable number of those who were now known as Christians. They, too, we must believe, so far as they distinctly recognised at all, were regarded at first as professing a religio licita.

Soon, however, a more hostile feeling began to show itself. When St. Paul arrived at Rome (see above, p. 243, where speaking of Scrib. epist. iv. (22)), and possibly also among the soldiers and centurions of the Praetorian camp (Phil. i. 13), there was a counter-current of feeling which led men to look on the Christians with the hatred which grows out of fear, and when Nero, in what is reckoned as the first general persecution, exposed their men to the constant threat of public outrages yet worse than torture, he fell in with, rather than shocked, the current of popular feeling. It was easy to turn the tide of suspicion after the fire of Rome, against those who spoke of the vengeance revealed in fire that should destroy their enemies. Disciples might honour the remains of St. Peter and St. Paul, and other martyrs, but statesman, men of letters, and the crowd of sightseers looked on with indifference. The death of Nero, however, brought with it a temporary relief. There was no law or edict of the senate forbidding the practice of the new religion, and as it had its meetings for worship, and its organised government by a bishop and his elders, it must either have continued to profit by its identification, for legal purposes, with Judaism, or have been recognised as having a distinct existence as a religio licita. Under Domitian, however, they were again in danger, not from

---

*It has been maintained, and, I think, fairly proved, in Hindekofer’s Judaism at Rome (1877), that the senatorial patrician party, who looked back with regret to the days of the republic, were all along the advocates of a rigorous and repressive policy against both Jews and Christians, while the popular party, represented commonly by the emperors, were in favour of a wider tolerance, or were secretly inclined to a monolithic faith.*
any systematic persecution, but from the jealous suspicion which marked the policy of that emperor, and which turned the bureaucracy of the empire into a vast army of delatores. His victims were not many, but they were illustrious. The emperor's cousin, Flavius Clemens, was put to death, and his wife and daughter, each bearing the name of Flavia Domitilla, banished, on a charge of feeling the fire in which the martyrs of Christian writers enables us to recognise the profession of the new religion. The traditions that the grandsons of Judas the brother of the Lord were brought to Rome as possibly dangerous rivals, that with this there was a local persecution in Judaea, and that St. John was only delivered by a miracle from the caldron of boiling oil, are probably all connected as parts of the results of the same policy [Domitianus]. The conversion of these members of the imperial family may at any rate be taken as shewing the extent to which the church was gaining followers among the upper classes, and it is a noticeable fact that from this time to the conversion of Constantine no name appears so frequently among the Christian inscriptions as that of the Flavian gens.

The reign of Trajan (A.D. 98-117) presents the first instance of a persecution set on foot, not by a brutal or cruel emperor, but by one whose general policy was one of vigorous equity. The letters, however, that passed between him and Pliny, the proconsul of Bithynia, shew that it was forced on him against his will, and that his own nature was inclined to tolerance. He was told that the temples were deserted, that sacrifices were no longer offered. The vested interests that were connected with the established worship were threatened by the growth of the new society. Vague rumours were current that its members met together for Thystean banquets and orgies of frightful licence. The truthful report of the proconsul shewed that there were no grounds for the charges, but he tried against the tranquility of the province had to be maintained, and the aggressive movement of the new sect to be checked, and the directions given by the emperor issued in the rule against which Tertullian protests as a "sentientia necessitate confusam" (Apol. c. 2), flagrantly at variance with the first principles of justice. Christians were to be punished if they confessed that they bore that name, to be set free if they disclaimed it. The very plea of not guilty, which in other cases was but the prelude of a trial, was in this to be tantamount to a sentence of acquittal (Pliny, Ep. x. 96, 97). In the report of the trial of Ignatius of Antioch before the emperor, we trace, with all allowance for the exaggeration of the martyrologist, the half-conscious feeling that the empire was coming into contact with a new force, acting upon society as well as upon speculative thought, which would in the long run prove incompatible with its religion, and therefore, as it seemed, with the authority with which that religion was identified. The members of the Christian church acknowledged "another king, our Jesus," and his supremacy as a matter of the Flavian authority. The reigns of the two Antonines (Antoninus Pius, A.D. 138-161, Marcus Aurelius (A.D. 161-180) presented nearly the same features as those of Trajan. They too, were wise, liberal, equitable in their general administration. They were content to treat Christianity as a religio licita, so long as it did not thrust itself forward in real or apparent antagonism to the supreme authority of the state. They had their places of meeting and of burial. They had, as Tertullian (Apol. 37) boasted, with perhaps some pardonable exaggeration, filled the courts and the camps, and were set without regard to the testimony in the civil forum. They claimed the protection of the law so long as they were not guilty of crimes against social order. They numbered among them men of education and culture who were not ashamed of their religion, and were prepared to undertake its defence. The 2nd century, especially in its second half, was emphatically the age of the apologists, of Quadratus (temp. Hadrian), of Justin (d. 167), of Tertullian (d. 240), of Minucius Felix (fl. 270). Their tone is for the most part that of those who are contending against vague calumnies and a widespread suspicion, threatening a future persecution, rather than of men who are themselves at the time suffering from it. Justin, it is true, earned the same of Polycarp, the first martyr, and of Irenaeus, the great father of the church. He had to the passions of the populace at Smyrna, backed by the vindictive hatred of the Jews, but there are no traces of any active persecution at Rome itself, or throughout the empire generally, and the very stress which Justin lays in his second Apology on one or two individual cases in which Urbicus the prefect of the city had punished Christian propagandism with death shows that they were exceptions to the general tolerance (Apol. II. c. 2). Apart from propagandism, there was nothing to prevent the Christians of Rome from meeting for worship and burying their dead in peace, and holding undisturbed possession of their catacombs. The reigns of Septimius Severus and his sons (A.D. 193-235) were marked by no fresh legislative or executive activity against the Christians, and the influence which Origen had exercised over the mind of Julius Mamarea when he visited her at Antioch, were seen in their treatment by her son Alexander Severus (A.D. 222-235). In the eclectic worship of that emperor busts of Christ and of Moses were seen, even in his private oratory, side by side with those of Orpheus and Lycurgus, and when a question arose as to the contesting claims of the church at Rome as a corporation (the very dispute shews that it was recognised as having a right to hold property), and that of a guild of butchers, the emperor gave judgment, on ethical grounds apart from the legal merits of the case, in favour of the former, as likely to make a better use of the property for which the two parties were contending. Under these conditions it was natural that the inherent vitality of the Christian church should assert itself, and that men and women should turn to it as affording a refuge alike from the sullenness of heathen life and the scepticism which had been the outcome of the decay of the old faiths of Greece and Rome and the conflict of rival schemes of philosophy. The beautiful and powerful poetry which filled your senate, your camps, your courts, may perhaps, as has been said above, be exaggerated, but it bears testimony, after all due discount has been allowed for its high-flown rhetoric, to the spread of the new faith among.
the upper ranks of Roman society. The foreign origin of PHILIP THE ARABIAN, even if we set aside the doubtful tradition that he was himself a Christian, naturally made him indifferent to the maintenance of the national cultus, and was so far favourable to the church's peace. It was not till the accession of DECUS (A.D. 249–253) that the officials of the empire, under an emperor best upon restoring the old vigour of Roman policy and checking all innovations on its religion, awoke to a sense of the seriousness of the situation, and began to take active measures for the suppression, or at least the repression of the Christian movement. There was accordingly a violent though brief persecution in which all the provinces of the empire. Some sought safety by flight, some retired to the hermit life of the wilderness, some languished in prison, many died under cruel and varied tortures. Not a few, the _theriaca_, the _lapis_, of ecclesiastical history, purchased their lives by apostasy. Others, technically known as _libellatores_, without participating actually in the idolatrous act which was made the test of conformity to the religion of the state, purchased a certificate (libellatum) that they had complied with the emperor's edict and so escaped.

The immediate effect of the Declan persecution was to throw into confusion and weakness the followers of Christ, and to strengthen the energy of those who continued faithful. The martyrs gained new honours, the confessor's greater influence, and the very controversies which arose as to the treatment of the _lapis_ and the _libellatores_ bear testimony to the church's freedom of action. The first eight years of Valerian (A.D. 253–260) were a time of rapid increase in numbers and growing consciousness of strength. In A.D.
259, Xystus, bishop of Rome, had had the courage [Cyprian] to transfer the supposed remains of St. Peter to the catacombs, afterwards known as that of St. Callistus, on the Appian Way, those of St. Paul to a burial-place on the Oval, which had been active supporters of the policy of Decius felt that there was a fresh necessity for supporting it, and at the instigation of Macrinus, the emperor issued an edict which was the signal for a fresh persecution. Xystus and four of his deacons were apprehended as he sat teaching in his episcopal chair in the cemetery of Prætestatum [Cyprian].
Cyprian was seized and condemned to death by Galenus at Ucits, and the last three years of the emperor's reign witnessed sufferings in all parts of the empire, like those under Decius.
When Galenus came to the throne (A.D. 261– 268), as if shrinking from the possible issue of a prolonged struggle, he adopted a more temporizing and tolerating policy, restored to the Christians the places of assembly of which his father had deprecated them, and for the first time formally recognised their faith by name as a _religio licita_ (Euseb. _H. E._ vii. 13). The taunting speech of Aurelian to the Roman senate, when he reproached them for not consulting the Sibylline books in a time of national danger, that "it would seem as if they were sitting in a church of the Christians, and not in the temple of the gods," implied at once that he recognised the effect of Galenius's edict, and was more or less alarmed by it, and it is probable that had his life been prolonged he would have followed in his footsteps, and rescinded the edict of toleration. As it was, however, he so far acted on that edict as to recognise the authority of the church of Rome in determining a question affecting property in the church of Palmyra.

The edict of Galerius remained in force as yet and other, till A.D. 303, when Diocletian (A.D.
284–305), who had begun his reign with the policy of toleration, who had Christians, recognised such, among the officers of his household, and whose wife and daughter were more than suspected of being proselytes to the rival faith, issued the decree which made his reign memorable for the sacrifice of many, and gave the signal for the last great struggle. Churches were burnt or desec-crated. The sacred books of the Christians were destroyed. Christians were to be deprived of all official dignities and civil rights, and reduced to the level of slaves. The test of sacrificing or burning incense was applied with a ruthless severity. Every one was compelled to content himself, in spite of all the leanings to a more tolerant policy, which were due probably to the influence of his wife, Helena, with endesvouring to save the lives of Christians while he acquiesced in the destruction of their buildings and their books. The eight years that followed were the work that the policy had countered. The first signal of a return to the older policy was given in A.D. 311, in the decree issued by Constantine, Licinius, and Galerius, which gave Christians permission to rebuild their churches, and restored their faith to the position of a _religio licita_, but by another edict in A.D. 312, propagandism was still treated as criminal, and the early Christian church was recognised as a corporation that might be dealt with as having a legal existence, all sects outside the church were excluded from the benecit of the decree. The edict of Milan, A.D. 313, gave an ample measure of freedom in allowing conversions to the church, as well as protecting those who were already in it, and in ordering the removal of all marks of paganism that had been taken from them in the time of persecution.
The battle of the Milvian bridge, in which Constantine, after the memorable vision of the _In hoc signo vinces_, adopted the monogram of Christ, so familiar in the Christian inscriptions of the catacombs, and ordered it to appear on the shields of his soldiers as they marched against Licinius, closed the long struggle, and the decrees which followed in A.D. 319, giving to the ministers of Christian churches immuni-ties from public burdens, in A.D. 321, allowing the enfranchisement of slaves in churches as well as temples, and ordering the observance of the _Dies Solis_, by the suspension of public works and judicial business, placed an end on the footing of the most favoured faith. The religion of the empire was avowed, and it tended naturally, even without actually repressive measures against the religion of his fathers, to become the religion of the empire.

It is difficult to form any accurate estimate of the actual amount of suffering caused by the intermittant persecutions of the fluctuating policy which we have traced for nearly 300 years. Probably not more than fifteen or twenty years out of that period were marked by any very rigorous measures of repression. The tendency of Gibbon's mind may have been to underrate the severity of the sufferings of the early Christians as that of the martyrologists was to indulge in enormous exaggerations, but some weight must be given to the language of Origen that those who had died for their religion were "few and very easy to be counted" (Conf. Celsum, iii.), and to the fact that Dionysius of Alexandria, giving an account of the sufferings of the Christians there, names only ten men and seven women as having suffered martyrdom (Euseb. Hist. vi. 41). The calculation which, starting from the fact that Eusebius names only ninety-two Christians in Palestine as put to death in the persecution of Diocletian, in which for the first time the cruelty of panic was added to the policy of repression, and which was therefore at once more violent and more protracted than any that had preceded it, and that as Palestine was about the sixteenth part of the Eastern empire, the total number of sufferers may be reckoned at 1500, or throwing in Italy, Africa, and Spain, at about 2000, is open to the charge of being a somewhat precocious method of statistical inquiry (Gibbon, c. xvi.), but it must be admitted that such conclusions were drawn by the Christian church at the hands of Roman emperors ever approximated to those which Christians afterwards inflicted on each other; and the aera of Diocletian falls into insignificance as compared with the crusade against the Albigenases under Innocent III., or that against the Protestants of the Netherlands under Charles V. and Philip II., or the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, or the Dragondades that followed on the Revocation of the edict of Nantes by Louis XIV.

The difference was indeed natural, looking to the motives that prompted the persecution in either case. There was no odium theologicum in the policy of the Roman emperors, no intense conviction that those whom they persecuted were enemies of God, and bringing others into peril of a condemnation, compared with which the state and the sword, and the torments of the Inquisition, were light and temporary evils. With them persecution was but a measure of police, necessary to uphold the religion of the state when its existence was threatened by the active propaganda of men who were not content with exterminating the roots of conscience for themselves. Among those who occupied a lower position than that of emperors and statesmen there were doubtless other motives. There were the vested interests, which, like those of Demetrius and his craftsmen, gathered round the established worship, and which made every great temple, with an organisation like that of a cathedral or medieval abbey, the people's Church (Ephes. iv. 4-5) the centre of a resistless movement to a new faith. There was the feeling prevalent at first among the lower classes, but finding its way afterwards to the more educated, for whose instruction Augustine wrote his De Civitate Dei, that the gods were offended at the spread of those who said that they were demons and not gods, and which led the people, was it not suffered from inundations or earthquakes, famines or pestilences, to cry, "Christianos ad Leones!" There was the irritation caused in the minds of the people by the presence of a purity and holiness that reproved their vilness, presenting features such as have been seen in later times in the outrages endured at the hands of mobs by Puritans and Methodists. There were the calamities inversely propagated, and telling, probably, on the more decent and respectable classes, which represented the eucharistic feast of Christians as a Thracian feast upon flesh and blood, and their feasts of love as polluted by incestuous and unnatural licence. There was the dread, telling upon men of the official order, and reproduced in the feeling of English politicians towards the Jesuits of the court of Rome, and of the despotic monarchies of Europe towards freemasons and other secret societies, caused by finding themselves face to face with a vast organised community spreading throughout the empire, and owing other laws of duty as superior in authority to theirs. At one period there seemed, indeed, something like the fanaticism of a rival worship. The cultus of Mithras, the Sun-god, introduced at Ostia in the time of Pompeius, had gradually spread throughout the empire. Mithraic groups have been found in well-nigh every province from Cyprus to Pannonia. The basilica of St. Clement at Rome stands over what was once a sanctuary of Mithras. With this worship the main action of the last battle of the Germans was more or less closely identified, and Constantine's edict for the observance of the Dies Solis was probably intended as a concession to the worshippers of Mithras as well as to those of Christ. These influences, varying from time to time in their effects, led doubtless in many cases, to great brutality and cruelty, like that of the reign of terror in the French Revolution; but putting aside legends like those of the 10,000 martyrs slaughtered in a single day at Ararat, and the 6000 soldiers of the Thessalonian legion in the valley of the Rhone, commemorated by the abbey of St. Maurice, the history of the church and the empire presents nothing like a massacre. It was the aim of stateful-like emperors, and they for the most part were the only persecutors, to repress rather than to exterminate. To plead "not guilty" to the charge of being a Christian was to secure acquittal. The forms of law were carefully observed. The accused was allowed time for his defence; and opportunities for flight so frequently given and used that Tertullian thought it necessary to write a tractate (De Fugis in Persecutione) against it. Compromises like that of the libellarii in the Decian persecution were readily contrived; and the question which arose within the church as to the treatment of those who had accepted it, or had actually burnt incense, and so placed themselves among the lapsi, shows how widely the door of escape had been thrown open.

What was it, then, which sustained the Christians of the first three centuries in their conflict with the empire? What was the secret of their final victory? The answer, looking for the present to human causes only, is found first, and chiefly, in the fact that they had faith, and that the statesmen and emperors had none. They did verily believe that they were worshipers of the Son of God, through whom they found access to the Father; that heaven and hell, their future destiny through long, it might be, endless ages, depended on their steadfastness in that faith. Few philosophers were willing to suffer or die for a theory about the Supreme Good. The disciples of Christ were ready to suffer and die for their belief in the Supreme
EMPODIUS, bishop of Volterra. [ELPIDIUS (15.)]

EMPTACIUS, bishop of Sessa, a town in all probability to be identified with Siga, in the African province of Mauretania Caesariensis, at one time the royal residence of Syphax. He was one of the catholic bishops summoned to Carthage and subsequently banished by the Vandal king Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 278; Gams, Series Episc. 468.) [L. D.]

EMUNDUS is said to have been the fifteenth bishop of Avignon, following St. Maximus, and succeeded by St. Magnus; about A.D. 630 to 644. The evidence on which this assertion rests is an old manuscript list of the abbots of the monastery of Mons-Major near Arles, to which he belonged before he was made bishop. This list is said by Le Cointe to have been published by Francis Nouquier, a priest of Avignon, in 1659. (Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 941, n. vi. tom. iii. p. 132; Gall. Christ. i. 800.) [S. A. B.]

EMYGDUS, bishop of Asculum. [EMPODIUS.]

EMYR LLYDAW, though not the ancestor of any of the "three stocks of saints of the island of Bangor," i.e. Branwen, Cunedda, and Caw, yet had many descendants among the saints, a list of twenty-two being given by Rees. He was an Armorican prince, nephew of St. Germanus, and flourished in the 5th century (Rees, Welsh Saints, 165; Williams, Edwin, Welsh, 144).

ENAN (HENAN). (1) Son of Gemman, commemorated Jan. 30. Mart. Doneg. places him at Roe-Mor in Ul-Denagh, in Ul-Cellinseanlaigh, in the south of Leinster, but this Rees or Rosmore is unidentified. It is also conjectured, but against probability, that he may be the person who wrote the lives of the saints. In this, Enan is evidently regarded as the same person with St. Evin, to whom is attributed the writing of the so-called Book of Killemany and the Life of St. Patrick. [REMMEN.]

H. H. D. Doneg., by Todd and Taylor, Mts. 31 407; Rees, Adamnan, 137; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 361 n. 41, 511-12.) In the Kal. Drummond, Jan. 30 (Bp. Forbes Kal. Scott. Saints, 4), it is said "apud Hiberniam S. Enan confessor migravit ad Christum." [J. G.]

ENAN (2), son of Muadan, commem. Mar. 25. When St. Patrick came into Dalriada and adjacent districts, and was building churches there, Etnnaus (Pat. S. Patr. ii. c. 130) mentions his erection of the church of Drum-indh, in the region of Cathriga, and his placing over it St. Enan, whom in his note Colgan (Tr. Thom. 146 col. 2, 182 n. 204) identifies with the son of Muadan, though in another place (Acta SS. 747) he had doubted as to assigning the dedication of Mar. 25 to this saint, and not rather to a disciple of St. Comgall (May 10), of Bangor, whom M. Comgall brought back to life: Lanigan (Ecc. Hist. Ir. i. p. 158) rejects the old doubt, and says Enan must have lived late in the sixth century; but Lanigan's great and seems to be to controvert the statements of Archdall in his Monasticon Hibernicum, where an abbey is raised on St. Patrick's foundation. There is little doubt, however, but that this is the saint who is called in the Kalendr of Marian O'Rowan, "Ennus egregius, diurnae qui, quietis, ut Muadanili filius," and who had his church in the townland Drumsey in Glenesh, in the parish of Ramoan and barony of Cary, co. Antrim, where there is also an old burying-ground, now under cultivation, called Killeena: in the same neighbourhood there was a church given to St. Ercalch, called Rath-muadan, "Ar Muadan," from Muadan, the father of Enan, and this, being contracted, has given its name to the parish, Ramoan (Rees, Ecc. Ant. 79, 284-5, 323). Colgan thinks he flourished about A.D. 460. [J. G.]

ENAN (3) of Drumrath, commem. Aug. 19. He was son of Ermeus, of the race of Eochaidh Finnauchtair, and thus cited by Colgan (Tr. Thom. 613, col. 29) among the saints belonging to the family of St. Briga (Feb. 1). His church, which some call an abbey, was at Drumrath, a parish in the barony of Kilkenny West, and county of West Meath, and this, which was built about A.D. 586, is said to have been destroyed A.D. 946, by the foreigners, and again by Brian Mc'Coninide fifty years later (Nat. Gazet. "Drumraney "; Mart. Doneg. Todd and Reeves, 225). In the Life of St. Aedh (Nov. 19), this bishop is said to have paid a visit to St. Enan, the hermit, who lived in the place where the famous monastery of Drumraney now stands in his honour, but nothing is really known of St. Enan's history. According to Tigernach (O'Connor, Rec. Hid. Scrip. ii. 192) he died A.D. 633.
ENAN

ENAN (4) of Glenn-Faidi. Commemorated on Dec. 29. [Monoc.]

ENAN (5) of Inis-Aego, commem. April 29.

He was one of the successors of St. Donnán (Apr. 17), after the island of Egg again became a religious abode, but his date and history are unknown, unless he be the be man mentioned in the Annals of Ulster. "A.D. 724, Qan princeps [superior ecclesiastically] Ego mortuus est." (O'Connor, Rec. Hid. Scrip. iv. 79; Reeves, Adamnan, 296.)

ENCHONIUS (Baron. A. E. ann. 608, xi.), bishop of Maurienne. [ICONIUS] [C. H.]

ENCRIATIS, ST., or ENGRATIA, " Santa Engracina " in Spanish parlance, one of the Saragossa martyrs in the persecution under Diocletian, who suffered at the hands of the well-known Dacian. She is not one of the famous eighteen martyrs of Saragossa, but her name and sufferings, together with those of St. Vincent, are celebrated in the hymn devoted to them by Prudentius (Peristeph. Hymn iv. vv. 109 sq.). The peculiarity of her passion is that she did not die under the hands of her persecutors, but survived for some time in an inextricably torn and mutilated state, until at length the release of death came. In certain epigrams attributed to St. Eugenius II. (III.) of Toledo (Esp. Sagra. v. 273), who is known, from his life by St. Ildesorus, to have had a special devotion to the Saragossa martyrs, she is mentioned as buried in the same church, but not in the same tomb, as the eighteen.

Hic etiam separe meritis Engratia Martyr Sorte septemviri dissociata Joact.

For an account of the discovery of the relics of Engracia and Lepercius at Saragossa in 1389 in the foundations of the cathedral and of the present cult of the saint, see Esp. Sagra. xxx. 289. The late Acta, together with Prudentius's Hymn, are given in Tamayo de Salazr, Martyr. Hisp. ii. 645. Engracia is also mentioned in the well-known Panormitanus Martiriorum Constantinopolitanorum Martyrum, attributed to Basilie of Saragossa. (Esp. Sagra. xxx. 260, 307; Gams, Kirchengesch. von Spanien, i. 320; Boll. Acta SS. Ap. ii. 410-412.)

[ENRATISTAE (Cod. Just. i. v. 5), heretics. [ENRATISTI.]

[ENRATISTES ("Epigrarcs", Irenaeus; "Epigrarcs", Clem. Alex.; "Epigrarcs", Hippol.), heretics who abstained from flesh, from wine, and from the marriage bed, not temporarily, as in the earliest ages of the church, with a view to more intense devotion, but permanently, and from a belief in the essential impurity of the things renounced. Persons who so abstained called themselves continent ("Epigrarcs", Iren. i. 28, p. 167); and the slightly modified form, Encratites, soon became a technical name to denote those whose asceticism was regarded as of a heretical character (Clem. Alex. Pæd. i. ii, p. 182; Strom. i. 15, p. 359; eccl. ii. 17, p. 900; Hippol. Ref. vii. 20, p. 276). We are not bound to suppose that all who were known by the name formed a single united sect. Irenæus, for instance (i.e., c. ii. 25, § 4), says that some of the early followers of Saturninus and Marcion; and it is reasonable to understand by this, not that followers of Marcion coalesced with followers of Saturninus to form a single new heretical body, but rather that followers of these two heresiarchs, independently using the same mode of life, and making the same boast of continence, were known by the orthodox under the same name. The practice of abstinence of the kind in question was anterior to Christianity. Not to speak of the Indian ascetics (to whom Clemen of Alexandria refers as predecessors of the Encratites), the abstinence of the Essenes, both in respect of food and of marriage, is matter of notoriety. Josephus's account of the Essenes is referred to by Porphyry, who, like Irenæus, objected both to the use of animal food and to animal sacrifices. An interesting specimen of Pythagorean doctrine on this subject is his work, ἡ βαθείαν τῶν ἐφισάχων, addressed to a friend who after trial of abstinence had wickedly relapsed into the use of flesh diet. He insists on the importance of keeping the soul, as far as possible, free from the bonds of matter, under which the use of animal food tends to enslave it; on the wisdom of avoiding everything over which evil demons have power, viz. all material things, and especially the use of animal food; and on the injustice of depriving of life our pleasure animals who are akin to ourselves, and in everything like ourselves, having reason, emotion, sentiments, completely like our own.

The account given by Hegesippus of James the Just (Eus. H. E. ii. 23) shows that righteousness of the Essene type was early held in admiration in the Christian church; and we learn from 1 Tim. iv. 3-6 that at the date of that epistle teachers who had aroused who indulged such abstinence as a duty. But it does not appear that they held the Gnostic doctrine that matter is essentially evil, and its creation the work of a being inferior or hostile to the Supreme; for the apostle's argument with them assumes it as a point still uncontroverted that the things they rejected were... creatures of the good God. We find from the Clementines that the Ebionite sects which arose out of Esseneism, though they permitted marriage, disallowed the use of flesh meat and wine; and that their doctrine respecting God's work of creation was quite orthodox. Hippolytus, too, who lived about the year 240, knows not the Encratites, not as in several other cases, from Irenæus, but from his own acquaintance with them as a then existing sect, describes them as orthodox in their doctrine concerning God and Christ, and as only differing from the church in their manner of life. But the Gnostic teachers named in the passage cited from the Clementines, and the Ebionite sects, are different from the Encratites on the doctrine of the evil of matter which they denied to be the work of God; and in consequence they deemed it wrong, by generation, to bring new souls under the dominion of death, and expose them to the miseries of this life. A full discussion of the arguments which they used will be found in the third book of Clement's Stromata (though in this book the name Encratites does not occur), the principal writers whom he combats being Marcion, Tatian, already mentioned by Irenæus as a leader of that sect, and Julius Cassianus. It appears that the Gospel according to the Egyptians contained alleged sayings of our Lord, which they used in support of their doctrines. Epiphanius mentions that they used other apocryphal writings, such as the Acts of Andrew, John, and Thomas. This controversy seems to have been actively carried on in the last quarter of the 2nd century. Eusebius (H. E. iv. 28) relates that Musanatus, a writer of the beginning of that period, addressed a very effective disusasive argument to certain brethren who had turned aside to that sect, then newly come into existence; and Theodoret (Haer. Eeb. i. 21) mentions that another writer of the same date, Pollinarius, wrote against the Severian Encratites.

Eusebius (iv. 29) derives this name Severians from a certain Severus, who became an Encratite leader shortly after Tatian. He adds that these Severians received the Old Testament and the Gospels, only putting their peculiar interpretations on them, that they reviled Paul, rejecting his Epistles, and not even receiving the Acts of the Apostles. There are Ebionite features in this description, and it is quite possible these Severians may have been of Ebionite origin, for we have already said that great diversity may have existed between the teaching of persons known by the common name of Encratite. The Severians are described by Epiphanius (Haer. 45) with all the features of an Ophite sect; but he seems to have had only a hearsay knowledge of them, for he speaks of the sect as having almost died out of his time; and Lipsius (Q—E. de Epiph. 215) gives good reason for thinking that he did not find any article on them in previous heretical treatises. In his chapter on the Encratites (Haer. 48) Epiphanius describes them as widely spread, enumerating seven different countries where they were then to be found; and we may at least conclude that he had reason to know that there were in these countries heresies leading an ascetic life, though, as has been already remarked, it would be unsafe to assert an absolute identity in their teaching. We may set it down as a mistake of Epiphanius that he places the Encratites after the Tatianites, as if they were a branch of the latter sect, the true relation between the two names being just the opposite. Some additional information about the Encratites is contained in the lately recovered work of Macarius Magnes, published in Paris, 1876. In this work (ii. 43, p. 151), written about the year 400, Macarius refers to some of the countries where the Encratites (whom he also calls Apocactites and Eremites) were to be found, which so far agrees with that of Epiphanius as to suggest that Macarius was acquainted with the work of Epiphanius. But he adds that a defence of their doctrines in eight books had been published by a heretic named from Ambrosius a Cilician, in which he inveighed against marriage, saying that "by sexual intercourse the world had had its beginning, but by continence would receive its end," and equally condemning as abominable the tasting of wine or the partaking of flesh meat. In his account of the Samaritan Doctheus, Epiphanius introduces some Encratite features not attested by other authorities; and perhaps it is not incredible that Epiphanius may have allowed his knowledge of the doctrine of the one Doctheus to affect his account of the other. We cannot give much weight to the account of Philaster, who (72) assigns the name and doctrine of the Encratites to the followers of Ambrosius (see Alciat:アメリカンテス); and we may wholly disregard the inventive "Fresetinatus," who represents the Encratites as refuted by an Epiphanius, bishop of Anepry. It is worth while, however, to repeat the last writer's distinction between Encratite and Catholic abstainers; viz. the former asserted the food which they rejected to be evil; the latter owned it to be good, too good for them.

With the advance of asceticism in the church care was always taken to distinguish in some such way between orthodox and heretical abstinance. At first the distinction seems to have been between occasional and permanent abstinance, the latter being regarded with suspicion in the church. We learn from the 4th and the 5th centuries that Vienne and Lyons (Fix. H. E. v. 3) that Alciatides, one of the confessors who had been in the habit of living on bread and water, reformed his practice on the exhortation of his fellow prisoners, who represented to him that he did not well in refusing to use God's creatures, and in causing a stumbling-block to others. In like manner the 53rd (45th) of the apostolic canons deprives any clergyman who refuses to partake of flesh and wine on festival days. Perhaps this willingness to partake of flesh and wine on festival days may have been intended as a test of the distinction made in the 51st (43rd) canon between those who abstained from the flesh (βυδονομία) and those who abstained from βεβαλωμα, as abominating God's creatures. The 14th canon of the council of Anepry permits clergy to abstain from flesh, on condition of their first tasting it. This would show that they had no heretical horror of the food itself. (See ASCETICISM, DICT. CHRIST. ANT.) For the controversy raised on the subject of asceticism by Eustathius of Sebastea, see that article and GANORA, DICT. CHRIST. ANT. Canons of St. Basil on the subject of Encratite baptism (clxxxviii. can. 1; cccix. can. 47) have given rise to some dispute, but it seems to us...
ENOTHININ

clear that St. Basil wished to reject the baptism of the Encratites in question, not because they did not use the orthodox formula of baptism, but because, regarding them as tainted with Marcionite error, he could not accept the verbal acknowledgment of the Father in the baptismal formula as atonement for the insult offered to the Creator, whose words they looked on as evanescent. Reference has been already made to these canons in the article APOSTOLICI, as well as to the law of the Theodosian code (A.D. 381) against the Manicheans, who sheltered themselves under the name of Encratites. Not many years earlier we have mention of the Encratites as a then existing sect in Gaulia; for Sozomen (v. 11) records the sufferings of Busiris, who was at that time one of them, in the persecution under Julian.

[HYDROPARASTATE] [G. S.]

ENOTHININ, a crocodile-shaped archon presiding over the first division of the place of punishment (Pistis Sophia, p. 320). [G. S.]

ENDA, ENDE. [ENNA (1.1)]

ENDDWYN is a Welsh saint of uncertain date, whose name remains in Llanddwynt, Merionethshire. (Myv. Arch. ii. 42; Rees, Welsh Saints, 307, 341.) [J. G.]

ENDELECHIUS, a rhetorician, who is said to have held the chair of rhetoric at Rome, mentioned by St. Paulinus of Nola in his twenty-eighth letter as a Christian man, and the inspirer of his panegyric on Theodosius. He is identified by some, but without any sufficient reason, with "Sanctus" to whom Paulinus wrote his forty-sixth and forty-first letters. (Vit. Paulin. cap. 25, Paulin. Ep. 28, § 6 and 75, Epp. 40, 41, in Patr. Lat. Ixi. pp. 66, 312 b, 367, 377, 870 c; Ceillier, viii. 70.) [L. D.]

ENDELIENTA, ST., daughter of Brychan, king of Brecknock, one of the numerous Welsh devotees who settled on the Cornish coast opposite to Wales. The parish of St. Endellion is on the Bristol Channel, west of St. Tēth (also named from a daughter of Brychan). In it exists a very early sepulchral pillar, with the inscription, "BROÉGAN HIC IACIT," which some connect with the name of the Welsh king (see Whitaker's Cathedral of Cornwall, ii. p. 85; Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 160; Sir J. Maclean, Trigv Minor, i. p. 485.) [C. W. B.]

ENDEUS, (Hardy, Descr. Cat. Mat. i. 86), Irish abbat. [ENNA.] [C. H.]

ENDRIGHETTUS, bishop of Feltre, received a grant of certain privileges from Charles the Great between 769 and 781. (Cappellari, Le Chiuse di Itala, x. 134.) [A. H. D. A.]

ENDULUS (ENDULANUS, ENTLANUS, ETULANUS), fourteenth bishop of Toul, following Autmundus and succeeded by Theodofridus, was born at Toul, and was believed of the kings of Germany. He obtained for his church several fresh possessions, which are said to have been confirmed by a charter of Theodobert II., king of Austria, in the eighth year of his reign (A.D. 602 or 603), but it does not appear to be extant. (Gaul. Christ. xiii. 962.) [S. A. B.]

ENEAS of GAZA. [AEMEPAR.]

ENCELEPHANTUS (ENCELEPHANTUS, ENSCLEPHANTUS), a Frank of good birth ("hand ignotae familiae" Nithard, iv. 5), brought up from his earliest years in the palace of Charlemagne (Epist. Hadrian; see Jaffé's Mon. Alcini, 464, and Ep. 112, p. 458), and employed by him on political missions of importance. He was appointed abbot of St. Riquier about the year 796. He had previously (circa 783) been attached to the court of Pippin, king of Italy, Charles's son, as "primicerius" and chief counsellor (Mon. Alc. 149), and in 794 he was entrusted by Charles to carry the carillones of the synod of Frankfort relating to the worship of images to pope Hadrian (Mon. Alc. 245, and V. Caroli Libri). In 796 he was again sent to Rome as the accession of Leo III. nominally to congratulate him, in reality to secure his fidelity to the Frankish king. The instructions given to him by Charles show the confidence reposed in him. (Ep. Carol. 9, ap. Jaffé's Mon. Carol. 353.) Originally a pupil he always remained a close friend of Alcini, by whom he was specially recommended to pope Hadrian. (Mon. Alc. 344. Compare also Ep. Alc. 51 and 54, in Mon. Alc. 279 and 281, the latter of which, addressed to Engelbert himself, shews the very intimate character of the friendship; cf. also Ep. 163, Mon. Alc. 603–4.) It was not only affection and religion, but of books and of literature. Engelbert is said to have collected a library of 200 MSS. for his monastery. Alcini continued to entertain Engelbert, when at Rome or elsewhere, to bring him relics, also books (e.g., a copy of Jordanes, de Getarum Origine, Ep. 164, Mon. Alc. 602–3), and the latest letter in Jaffé's collection is one in which Alcini elaborately discusses certain grammatical points with Engelbert. (Ep. 259, Mon. Alc. 802 sq.) Engelbert in the literary round table of the court of Charlemagne, bore the name of Homer, and even in the letter of instructions above referred to (Mon. Car. 553) he is addressed by the king as Homer and "Homerianus poeta." So, often by Alcinus, see especially Ep. 54, Mon. Alc. 281–3. Charles and Alcini both spent Easter of 800 at Engelbert's abbey of St. Riquier, and Alcini was requested by the abbate to write a life etc. of the patron saint, which he subsequently sent to the emperor. (Ep. 238, Mon. Alc. 755.) Engelbert apparently accompanied Charles to Rome, and was present at his coronation. In 811 he was consecrated bishop of Charlemagne. (Einhard, Vita Karoli, 33.) He died a few days after the emperor, on Feb. 18, 814, and was buried at St. Riquier. (Nithard, iv. 5.) His remains were translated from the porch to the choir of St. Riquier with great solemnity, twenty-nine years later. (Nith. l. e.) His epitaph is to be found in Bouquet, ENGLUNDUM, presbyter, abbot, and patron saint of Velgona, a fortified spot four miles from Hanlem. He was an Englishman of Frisian descent, born of Christian parents, and in the time of Willeibrord, the apostle of the Frisians, came among these people, and preached in Kennemari, the district about Hanlem. He died in the pagus Velgona, where was formerly one of the five mother churches raised by Willeibrord between the Meuse and the insula Tenelia. He was commemorated on June 21. (Bell. Acta SS. June iv. 115.)

[ENHENEL was son of Cynan Garwyn ab Beochwel Yaghthrog, descended from Cadell Deyrslugg. Rees (Welsh Saints, 161, 397) says he is the saint to whom Llanegunedden, under Liaschwarf in Anglesey, is dedicated, and places him in the beginning of the 7th century. (Myr. Arch. ii. 41.)

ENGLATTUS, ENGLACIUS, abbot, commemorated Nov. 3. This saint appears in most of the Scottish Calendar, but is not in the Litanies of Dunkeld. Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 248) says he wrote Lectures sacrae, lib. i., Scriptura ad scrutinium, lib. i., Epistolae ad Varios, lib. i.; but Dempster's literary assertions are usually extremely doubtful. Englattus's dedication is Nov. 3, but Camerarius places him on Nov. 5, and Dempster gives him a double dedication, pointing to a two-fold history. (Cf. Bell. Scot. Nov. 5.)

In Scotia Englatii episcopi, qui Picti cum Haldus vidit et ante bellum delevit. Kat. A. King.† Adam King calls him bishop and confessor in Scotland under Kenneth III. A.D. 966, and Dempster says he flourished in the year 1010; but Kenneth III. was not King in that year: Spotswood (Hist. Scot. 27) classes him with Blane O'Moressen, and Monteanus in the 10th century. But there is evidently much confusion, and of the place, time, and circumstances of the saint's death we are altogether uncertain. No details of his life are known. The collect in the Aberd. Breviary (Prop. SS. p. est. f. 146a), prays that by his intercession we may be saved from the concurrence of the world, and neither be corrupted by its blandishments nor crushed by its frowns. His only known dedication is at Tarves, Aberdeenshire, where he is locally called St. Tanglan. (Bp. Forbes, Col. Scot. Saints, 122, 136, 166, 212, 217, 352; Vinc. Dio. Aberd. 359; Camerarius, de Scot. Forth, 185, Nov. 5; Tanner, Bibl. 283.) [J. G.]

ENGRATIA, Spanish Martyr. [ENGRATIS.]

ENI, brother of Redwald and father of Anna, kings of East Anglia (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 97, ed. Hardy; Wend. F. H. ann. 852, ed. Coke).

[ENIMIA (ENYMA, ENNYA), abbess; said to have been the sister of Dagobert king of the Franks and daughter of Clotaire II., though some traditions make her the daughter of Clovis II. and even of Clovis I. She founded a double monastery, one for monks and another for nuns, in the mountains overlooking the river Tarn (dep. Tarn), and was consecrated the first abbess by Isus bishop of Meude, her diocesan. She was commemorated on Oct. 6. (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. iii. 408; Gall. Ch. i. 111; Le Coindre, Ann. 714.)

ENNA (ENDA, ENDE, ENNE, latinised ENDEUS) (1) Son of Connall Derg, and abbat of Ard, commemorated March 21. The primary authority on the life and acts of St. Enna is Magrinius's Vita, in which both Colyer (Acta SS. 704–10) and the Bollandists (Acta SS. Mart. ii. 287–72) have printed, as taken from MS of the Island of All Saints, Loch Ree (Hardy, Descript. Cat. i. 86, 779). With probably much that is fact, there is also mixed up much which must be purely fabulous, and drawn from the customs and notions of the writer's own age, the fourteenth century. St. Enna belonged to the noble house of the princes of Oriel, in Ulster, and was born in Louth, where his father was a ruler. His father was Connall Derg, son of Daimhin, son of Coigrin Domhairg, of the race of Colla-da-Crioch, and his mother was Briga, or Aeabhshin, daughter of Aimeire, son of Ronan, king of the Ards, in the county of Down. He had a brother, probably sterile, called Libes, or Molibbs, and four sisters, Fanchres, Lochnia, Carecha, and Darenia, the first three having been dedicated to the Lord in virginity, and the last espoused to Aengus, king of Cashel, becoming thereby the mother of a royal and holy race; she must have been his first wife, as his second, the infamous Ethne Vathoch of the Deisi, was slain with King Aengus in battle. On the death of his father St. Enna was unanimously chosen chief of the Orielis, but the future celebrated soldier of Christ did not long retain an earthly magnificence, and the sophraneous life in Colgan begins by relating how, as a rude warrior, triumphing over his enemies, he came with his soldiers to the nunnery of his sister Fancha, and was converted by the sudden and voluntary death of one of Fancha's virgins, whom he demanded for his wife. [FAINCHE.] After resigning his position among the Oriers, he was under the tutelage of his brother, and engaged under the direction of the monks engaged in heavy manual labour, a very common employment for one in his condition in those days, and then was sent to Rosnait, in Britain, to be a pupil in the monastery of Mansenus, that is, in all probability, to the great monastery at Candida Casa, to be under St. Ninian, or rather one of his successors (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 437; Bp. Forbes, SS. Nin. and Kent. xiii.-iii.; Todd, Book of Hymns, Fasc. i. 103-8). From Rosnait he is said to have proceeded to Rome, where, after building a monastery called Lateinum, or, as Colgan suggests, Laetinum, expressive of his spiritual joy, he was joined by his sister St. Fancha, who came to induce him to return. In the course of a year he followed her to Rome, and in the same place, in Meath, where St. Patrick also had landed, and after founding many churches on the banks of the Boyne, he applied to Aengus, son of Nadrach, the first Christian king of Cashel, for a grant of the Island of Aran. After some delay on account of Aengus's desire to have St. Eanna's monastery in the neighbourhood of Cashel, this request was granted, and most of the remaining part of his life is taken up with the account of St. Eanna's voyage to Aran, his taking possession of it, and his subsequent division of it into ten portions, with ten monasteries under as many abbots, his own monastery being built on the east side of the island, at a place called to this day Killeeney, on Killynan Bay. This was on Inishmore, the most westerly of the Aran group, and his monastery was the resort of the saints of God. His monks are said to have been one hundred and fifty, and the training he had received at the Magnun Monasterium of Whithera, he imparted to the younger race of founders of monasteries, whose fame remains to this day. Among his disciples are enumerated St. Kieran (Sept. 9) of Clonmacnoise, St. Brendan (May 19), St. Finnian (Sept. 10) of Moville, St. Columba (June 10), and other well-known abbots and bishops. The celebrity of Aran as an ecclesiastical seat is still attested by the ruins of churches and monasteries which cover the area of Inishmore, and which to this day are visited as objects of special veneration. Mingled with the cyclopean architecture of a former military era are the stone-roofed oratories, and little bee-hive stone cells of the sixth and seventh centuries, pointing to a period and place of religious activity and earnestness. From the numbers who flocked to it, the island received the name of Ara-na-naomh, or Aran of the saints, and the occupants, living and dead, were said to be innumerable.

Eanna is said by Ware to have his name in the register of bishops at Clogher, in the end of the sixth or beginning of the seventh century, but this can hardly be, as he must have lived earlier, and his name is not elsewhere connected with Clogher. St. Eanna himself belongs to the second order of Irish saints, but his dates are for the most part conjectural. If Inishmore was given him by the king of Cashel, it must have been before A.D. 489, as in that year Aengus fell at the battle of Cell-Usnaitha, now Killistown, in the barony of Feth, co. Carlow. The time of his death is uncertain, but he probably died in A.D. 542, the date usually accepted; he was buried in or near the sandy mound on which the little church of Teaglach-Einne now stands, and his memory is held in great veneration throughout the west of Ireland. His feast has always been attached to March 21. (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. cc. 8-10; O'Flaherty, Ear-Connamph, 42, 74 seq., 626-63, and Ogygia, vol. ii. pt. iii. c. 76; Ware, Tr. Ant. cc. 26, 28; Geneal. Hy-Finch, by O'Donovan, 462-63; Journ. Hist. and Arch. Assoc. Ir. 3 ser. i. 79-80; Journ. Kilk. Arch. Soc. iv. 263-4, new ser.; Butler, Lives of the Saints, March 21; Baring-Gould, Lives of the Saints, i. 376-7; O'Halloran, Irish Saints, i. 231-2. Colgan, Historia Hibernica, son, Irish Hist. Lab. 45, London, 1736; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, p. 83; Skeene, Celt. Soc. 47, 60, 62, seq. 245.) The only Scotch Calendar in which St. Eanna appears is that of the Drummond Missal (Bp. Forbes, Kol. Soc. Saints, 8), which is closely affiliated to the Irish Martyrology and Calendars, and he is always called Eanach or Eanna. Doubtless, however, as is nearly always the case, there is none of his acts recorded in any of the Irish Annals, so that these give us no direct clue to the time when he lived.

[J. G.]

ENNA (2), son of Nuadhan, and abbis of Imleach-foda, commem. Sept. 18. O'Donell (Iv. S. Columb. i. c. 104) relates how St. Columba founded a church on the west side of a hill called Tulach-Segra, in the district of Corran (now Tully, in Toomour), and gave it to his pupil Enna, son of Nuadhan. The place was called Imleach-foda, now Emlaghfad, or Emlyfad, a parish in the barony of Corran and Aran; Enna is also called Anua, and Co., Colgan (Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. c. 8, § 7; ii. c. 12, § 10) believes that this Enna, rather than the saint of Aran, is the Eanach who is named among the Irish saints of the second class. But there is no Enna, son of Nuadhan in the Irish Kaleders, and Colgan may have connected this Ean with Sept. 18, because Eanach of Drumnath is so placed in the Martyrology of Tallaght. It is also questionable whether Enan, son of Nuadan (ENAN (2)), and Enna, son of Nuadhan, be not the same person, though usually referred to the different eras of St. Patrick and St. Columba (Colgan, Tr. Thom. 406, c. 104, 451 n. 80, 49, 460; Reeves, Adamnan, 292).

[J. G.]

ENNA (3) of Cill-na-manaich, commem. Dec. 31. Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 351) has the dedication at Dec. 31, of Enda and Lochan, of Cill-na-manaigh in Ui-Dunchada (probably in the county of Dublin), or of Cill-mac-Cathail, in Ui-Baireich (in Quee's County); and of Beal an-Cathailin (now Gowran, and in the county of Kilkenny). But in tracing out the topography of Kilkenny, Mr. John Hogan says St. Enna is one of the patron saints of Kilmashag, co. Kilkenny, where his holy well is still recogused as "Tober Edaun," and Cill-mac-Cathail is now anglicised Kilcassociated in Gowran Pass. (Farr Mast., by O'Donovan, i. 359; Mart. Hibern., by Todd and Reeves, 351; Journ. Kilk. Arch. Soc. v. 300 n. 1.) [J. G.]
ENNA

ENNA (4) (ENNA CSON), son of Amhalaghshíl, of Tirawley, co. Mayo. Having, with his son Consil, been favoured by St. Patrick at Tara before king Laeghaire, he was the means of saving the apostle of Ireland from the plots of the Magi (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 140-41, cc. 76-84; Luigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 253). [J. G.]

ENNA (5). In the Lives of St. Patrick attributed to Joceline (c. 100), and Ervinus (ii. cc. 17-19), Ena and Fiacc, brothers of king Laeghaire, are represented as resisting and then embracing the Christian faith as proclaimed by St. Patrick. On his conversion Ena gave to the church and St. Patrick, not only the holocaust of a devout mind, but his first-born son Cormac, and the ninth part of all the fields and property he had in Ireland (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 88, 131). This Cormac is by some identified, but most improbably, with St. Cormac of Armagh. [CORMAC (2)]. King Laeghaire seems never to have had brothers so named (Luigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 238, 258).

ENNA (6) (ESDEUS), son of Cathabhath, has his death entered in the Irish Annals about A.D. 455 (Ann. Inf. a.d. 459; Ann. Coll. a.d. 456; Farr. Matt., a.d. 456), and it is supposed by O'Conor (Rer. Hibern. Script. ii. 109 n. 44) to be the same as St. Enna of Aran; but it is most unlikely. [J. G.]

ENNA (T). [MOENNA.]

ENNATHAS, a virgin, martyred in Palestine during the Dioncletion persecution. She was brought before Mary the tribune, who caused her to be led through the city of Caesarea by men who kept scourging her with thongs all the time; after this she was condemned to be burned. Modernized the name is Enathas i. 185, she is named Manetho, and is commemorated Nov. 13. [T. S. B.]

ENNEIM, one of five virgins martyred in Persia under Sapor II. (A.D. 309). Commemorated June 9. (A.A. 826 June 172.) [T. S. B.]

ENNEPIUS, bishop of Maximianopolis (formerly Impara) in Thrace, near Rhodope. He was present at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. (Mansi, iv. 1365; Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 1192.) [J. de S.]

ENNIUS (1) (EUNUS), appears in the ancient lists of bishops of Nantes as second among them, and is said to have built the first church in that place, but everything concerning him is uncertain. (Gall. Christian. xiv. 795; Gams, Serv. Ep. 581.) [R. T. S.]

ENNIUS (2) (EUNUS, EUNUS), sixth bishop of Vannes, succeeding Maciarius and followed by Bepalis. In the third year of Childerich or the 17th of Chilperic (A.D. 578) he was sent to the latter king with an unwelcome message by Warochus a Breton leader, whose offence he expiated by sending him into exile with reproaches. The sentence, however, was relaxed in the following year so far that he was permitted to dwell at Angers, though not to return to Vannes. Subsequently he visited Paris, and while celebrating mass fell down in a fit. He was carried out and recovered, for, as Gregory explains, "siamium vine deditus erat, et plerumque its deiformer invidiae unguum nostrum sacra non vulnerat." (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. v. 27, 30, 41; Albin, Hist. Franc. lib. iii. 25 in Migne, Patr. Lat. xxxix. 703.) [S. A. B.]

ENNOIADUS (CHAIANOILUS), twenty-third bishop of Poitiers, the successor of Caregisisus and predecessor of Johannes I. We know nothing of him unless he may be the bishop Chaianoilus or Chaianoilus (both forms are used) whom St. Bertram, bishop of Le Mans, in his will speaks as of a relation, and begs to bury him. The date of St. Bertram's will was A.D. 616, and as Ennoiatus was alive in A.D. 615, the theory is not improbable. (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxx. 405; Gall. Christ. ii. 1151.) [S. A. B.]

ENNOIADUS (1) MAGNUS FELIX, bishop of Pavia, was born at Arles (Ennod. Epist. lib. vii. 8) about 473. Through his father, Camillus (ibid. ii. 25), he was connected with Faustus, Boethius, Avienus, and other Romans of distinction, though he constantly dwelt in humble terms of his family. The invasion of the Visigoths, and the consequent loss of his patrimony, caused him to migrate at an early age to Milan, where he was educated in the house of an aunt. At this time study had no attraction for him, as we learn from one of his letters addressed to Arator (Epist. ix. 1). In 483, the year in which Theodoric invaded Italy, his aunt died, and he was again reduced to destitution, but having rendered himself acceptable to a young lady of family and fortune he was happily saved from beggary by marriage (Euchariest. de Vit.): A dangerous sickness, from which he recovered by the aid of St. Victor, martyr, who administered extreme unction to him (Epist. viii. 34), first led him to reflect about his thoughts, and in an interview with his Eucharisticus, in which he reviews his past life with many expressions of penitence. He was subsequently ordained deacon by Ephianius, bishop of Pavia, whose exhortations determined him to renounce his marriage. This he did with the consent of his young wife, who retired into a convent. In 494 he accompanied Ephianius (Ennod. Vit. Epiph. 234 A) on a mission to Gundaeber, king of the Burgundians, to procure the ransom of certain Ligurian prisoners. Upon the death of Ephianius two years later he visited Rome, and gained reputation by composing an apology for pope Symmachus and the synod which acquitted him, as well as by a panegyric which he pronounced publicly in honour of Theodoric. The former of these discourses was inserted in the Acta Conciliaum; the latter is generally included in collections of the Panegyrici Veteres. Under pope Hormisdas, who succeeded Symmachus, he was advanced to the see of Pavia in the room of Maximus II., and on the strength of this decision was sent in 515, and again in 517, on an embassy to the Emperor Anastasius, in order to oppose the spread of the Eutychian heresy. In the first instance he was accompanied by Fortunatus, bishop of Catania, in the second by Peregrius, bishop of Missenum. Both embassies were unsuccessful. Anastasius continued to favour the heretics, and failing to corrupt or bend the bishop, he had him placed at his second departure from Constantinople, on board an unseaworthy vessel, with orders not to put into any Greek port. Ennodius, however, arrived safely in his diocese, which he continued to administer for the space of four years. He died in an early age of forty-eight, and was buried in the church of St. Michael at Pavia, July 17, A.D. 521, which day is observed as his festival by the Roman church.
ENODIUS MAGNUS FELIX

The following is a list of his works:—
(1) Epistolarum Libri ix., consisting of 297 letters addressed to various correspondents.
(2) Dictiones xxviii., comprising six sacred, seven scholastic, eight controversial, and five ethical discourses.
(3) Panegyricus Theodoreci regi dictus.
(4) Apologeticus pro Synodo.
(5) Vita bestissimi viri Epiphanius Ticinensis Episcopi, on the whole his best written work.
(6) Vita Beatonii Antonii monachi Lirinensis.
(7) Enchiridion de vita.
(8) Paraenesis didascalica ad Ambrosium et Beatum.
(9) Praeceptum de cellulis in aepiscoporum, an ordinance relating to the Count商用车es, or associates, whose office it was to protect the chief pastors of the church from slander.
(10) Petitorium quo Gerontius pleur Agapiti absolutam est, of interest as showing that slaves were emancipated at this time with the accompaniment of a religious form.
(11) Correi paschalis benedictiones duae.

To these works a supplement was added by Martene and Durand (Nov. Thesaur. Anecdot.), from a MS. of St. Remy, of Rheims, comprising a discourse, "In nuntiali Laurentii Mediolanensis episcopi," and a short letter addressed to one Venutius.

The writings of Ennodius exemplify throughout that profound tendency of thought and expression which the Christian writers of Gaul were so slow to abandon. Many of his letters would seem to have proceeded from the pen of a heathen rhetorician, rather than of a Christian bishop. His illustrations are commonly drawn from Greek mythology. He speaks of divine grace as descending "de Superia," and sets the Fates side by side with Jesus Christ. His letters addressed to the other sex breathe a spirit of gallantry, little in keeping with his sacred office. Most of his poems were written before his conversion, but even in those which were composed subsequently the old Adam occasionally reappears. His style is turgid, involved, and affected. He seems to shrink from making himself intelligible lest he should be thought commonplace, and the result is anything but attractive to the reader.

The works of Ennodius were first collected and printed among the Augentes Orthodoxographici, Bale, 1569, fol. Two editions were published in 1611, that of Andrew Schott at Tournai, 4vo., and a more complete edition by Sirmond at Paris, 1709, with notes, which is reprinted in Migne's Patrologia Latina, vol. lxxiii., together with the supplement above mentioned.

For the life of Ennodius, see Funcicius, de inertia ac decrepita, L. L. senecute, c. iii. § xx. c. vi. § viii. c. vii. § x. c. 11, § 31: the Vita Ennodii prefixed to Sirmond's edition, Collier, Annales Ecclesiastiques, v. 569; and for a just estimate of his literary merits, Amphiara, Hist. Lit. de la France, tom. ii. ch. vii.

ENODIUS (2), addressed by Sidonius.

ENNOEA ("Ennoai"). In the attempts made by the framers of different Gnostic systems to explain the origin of the existing world, the first stage in the process was usually made by personifying the conception in the divine mind of that which was to emanate from Him. We learn from Justin Martyr (Ap. l. 26), and from Irenaeus (I. 23, p. 99), that the word Ennoea was used in a technical sense in the system of Simon. The Latin translation of Irenaeus either retains the word, or renders "mensa conceptiva." Tertullian has "injictio." (De Anima, 34). In the "Arbaaaria "Meydan" cited by Hippolytus (Ref. vi. 18, 19, p. 174), the word is used as "Ennoia" but "Ennoia" [HELENA, SIMON]. Irenaeus states (I. 23, p. 100) that the word Ennoea passed from the system of Simon into that of Mereanens. In the Barbelo system early in the third century Irenaeus also counts as derived from that of Simon (I. 29, p. 107). Ennoea appears as one of the first in the series of emanations from the nameless Father.

In the system of Valentinus (Iren. i. i. p. 5) Ennoea is one of several alternative names for the consort of the primary Aeon Bython (CHARIS, SIEGE). For the somewhat different form in which PROLEMAEUS presented this part of the system see Irenaeus (I. xii. i, p. 56). Irenaeus criticises this part of the system (II. xiii. p. 195). The name Ennoia is similarly used in the Orphic system described by Irenaeus (I. xxx. p. 108). [0. 8]

ENOCH, APOCRYPHAL BOOK OF. In Gen. v. 24 it is said of Enoch that he walked with God. This expression was interpreted to mean not only that he led a godly life, but also that he had been vouchsafed the privilege of Divine intercourse, and of receiving Divine revelations. Jewish antiquity regarded him therefore as a prophet, equally familiar with heavenly things and the future fortunes of the human race. These views of his character gave occasion for attributing to Enoch the apocalyptic writing which constitutes one of the principal monuments of the apocalyptic literature of later Judaism. This Book of Enoch, which was already cited in the Epistle of St. Jude (v. 14), and much used by Jewish and Christian writers in the following centuries, was subsequently almost entirely lost—a few fragments only having been preserved in the chronography of Georgios Syncelloclus—till rediscovered in the last century in an Ethiopic translation. James Eusebius in 1773, brought back two MSS. into Europe, to which some others have been subsequently added. Silvestre de Sacy was the first to publish, in 1800, some particulars concerning the contents of this writing (Magasin Encyclop. vi. 383 seqq.). Archbishop Laurence was the first to edit an English Translation (The Book of Enoch, an Apocryphal Production, &c. Oxford, 1832, 1st ed. 1833, 3rd ed. 1838), followed by the original Ethiopic text from Bruce's manuscripts (Liber Enoch Versio Aethiopica, Oxford, 1838). A German translation, with learned introduction and com-tensive commentary, was published by Prof. A. G. Hoffmann in Jena (Das Buch Henoch in vollständiger deutscher Übersetzung, etc. Theile, Leipzig, 1833–1838). The first part is translated from the English, but the second is based likewise on the Frankfort manuscript of the Ethiopic text. The Latin version of Griesbach, made from the English and German translations, is of no value (Propheten etc. pseudographi, Stuttgart, 1840). The best edition of the Ethiopic text is that of Prof. Dillmann, who made use of five manuscripts (Liber Henoch Aethiopicus, Leipzig, 1851). Of the improved text of his journey, Dillmann published another German translation with critical introduction and copious commentary (Das Buch Henoch übersetzt und erklärt, Leipzig, 1853). The Ethiopic version was not made immediately from the Hebrew original, but from the Greek. There is no reason to doubt its substantial fidelity, though it not unfrequently differs from the Greek text of fragments preserved elsewhere, one at least of which is not to be found in the Ethiopic text. The whole work as it now lies before us is divided into five books, but closer investigation makes it evident that this text has passed through various hands, and is a composite work. It has been assumed by various critics that we have before us a collection of several books of Enoch independent one of another. This hypothesis, however, is untenable; we must, on the contrary, assume the existence of an original document, which at different times was enriched with additions from various sources. The critical treatment of the book has occupied, beside de Sacy, Lawrence, and Hoffmann, the following scholars, whose labours deserve a special mention here: — Ernurt Krieger [Lützelsberger] (in the Heilige zur Kritik und Exegese, Nürnberg, 1845, Lücke (Einleitung in die Offenbaring Johannis, 2nd ed. Bonn, 1852), Dillmann (as above), Ewald (Uber das äthiopischen Buches Henoch Entstehung und Zusammenstellung), K. R. Linnemann ("Uber die Entstehung des Buches Henoch," Theologia Aethiopica et Osyria, 1856), and Hilgenfeld (Südliche Apokalypse, Jena, 1857; Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie, 1860, p. 319 sqq., 1861, p. 212 sqq., 1882, p. 216 sqq.).

Excluding first the so-called Parables (cc. 37–71), the following chapters — 1–19, 21–36, 72–105 — form a well-connected whole, which professes to be a variety of revelations committed to writing which had been vouchsafed to the prophet Enoch, partly in ecstatic visions in the heavenly world, partly in prophetic dreams. The introduction (cc. 1–5) announces first a benediction of the prophet on the righteous, and then a prophet of the great day of judgment, on which the impious will receive well-merited punishment for their disobedience to the ordinances of God. Whereupon follows (cc. 6–16) an account of the origin of the universal corruption of the human race, induced by the fall of the angels and their carnal intercourse with the daughters of men. In consequence of the abominations resultant from this fall God is about to impose a heavy judgment, which Enoch has to announce to the fallen "Watchers." These are to be in future bound in subterranean prisons for the whole period of earth's history, the duration of which is fixed at seventy generations, until the day of final judgment, whereon they will be cast for ever into the lake of fire. In what follows, the original text appears in a somewhat fragmentary form in the Ethiopic version. As in the introduction, a reference to the fixed Divine laws which heaven itself and the whole created universe are subject to is exhibited in the strongest light the guilt of sinners in transgressing the will of God, so now is made to follow (cc. 17–19, 21–36) an account of the mysteries of heaven and earth which have been exhibited to Enoch by angels during a ecstatic rapture from earth to heaven. In this miraculous journey, the universe Enoch sees first the place of the winds and the regions whence lightning and thunder come. After that the water of life, and the sea of fire which is destined to receive the setting sun, the streams of Hades, the dwelling-place of the dead, the mountains of black winter clouds, the waters of Oceanus, the winds which support the universe, seven fiery mountains of precious stones, the mid-one of which, being the throne of God, reaches to heaven, the hell of fire, and in the vacant spaces of the universe the prison-houses of fallen star-spirits, and the future place of punishment for the angels who had held sinful intercourse with the daughters of men. In a subsequent journey Enoch is taken a second time to the same places. First to the place of punishment for the fallen angels; then into Hades and its different compartments; to the fire at which the stars are kindled; to the place of future judgment; to the seven mountains, the middle one of which rises in the form of a throne; and then into the Holy Land and the vale of Hinnom, the future place of punishment for impious men; and then further eastward to the legendary home-lands of noble spicae, and on as far as Paradise. In a third journey Enoch arrives at the gates of heaven, and the places whence issue stars and winds. Thereupon follows (cc. 72–82) the book concerning the courses of the heavenly lights, which describes once more in the form of a journey the change in the appearance of the constellations, the courses of sun and moon, and the relation of the solar to the lunar year, to which are attached a series of further communications regarding the various winds, their origin and operations, concerning the seven mountains, seven streams, and seven islands. The laws of the lights and powers of heaven are announced to Enoch on his journeys by the instrumentality of angels. All this he imparts to his son Methuselah, who is to commit it in his turn to following generations. In some parts of this section the original order seems to have been disturbed. Chapter 82 sought properly to stand before chapter 79, while chapter 81 forms the conclusion of this section. Enoch in this chapter contemplates the writing on the heavenly tables, wherein are recorded the actions of the men to the latest generations, and then returns from his journeys to earth, in order to spend one last year in the circle of his family.

The revelations which follow concerning the future form of mankind (cc. 83–91, 11: 9–93) are presented in the form of visions which Enoch has vouchsafed at different times of his life, but now for the first time, on the conclusion of his wondrous journey, related to his son Methuselah.
The first vision, seen by him while still a boy, in the house of his grandfather Mahalaleel describes the flood (c. 83); the second, which had been imparted to him before his marriage gives in apocalyptic figures a general survey of the history of the chosen people, from the first human pair to the struggles of the Israelites against the Syrians, in the time of John Hyrcanus. The account of these struggles is immediately followed by that of the approaching universal judgment (cc. 84–90). A third description of the future, introduced by exhortations to his children, gives once more a rapid survey of the world’s history divided into ten great weeks. At the end of the seventh week, which is the actual writer’s own time, the righteous receive a sevenfold instruction concerning the whole creation; in the eighth week the righteous celebrate their triumph and enter on their kingdom; in the ninth, judgment is passed on the ungodly; to the tenth is assigned the judgment of the fallen angels and the renewal of heaven and earth. The last section (cc. 92; 94–105) contains the Doctrines of Wisdom which Enoch, the writer imports to his children and all future generations, warnings against sin in its various forms, admonitions to righteousness, fidelity, and perseverance, comminations against the ungodly, and promises for the righteous.

The text of this comprehensive work appears in some parts not to belong to the original form. Apart from the lacunas between chapters 16 and 17, and some smaller interpolations of which we shall have to speak farther on, it strikes one with surprise to find several things seen by Enoch in his journeys repeatedly told again in the same words. The revelations, moreover, vouchsafed to Enoch on his first journey (cc. 17–19) are for the most part repeated, chapters 21–36. The section about the Winds, on the other hand, chapters 76 and 77, together with the additions subsequent to the Mountains and the Lights of Heaven. It repeats also, in more detail, what has already been treated of (chapters 33–36), only much more briefly.

As there is little probability that these repetitions were intentional, we are warranted in supposing that there may have been different recensions of the text which held their ground side by side, and were put together by some simple-minded collector.

There is also much probability in Ewald’s supposition that the author of our Book of Enoch had another and older book before him, perhaps in different editions, a “book of celestial physics,” which is mentioned as part of the description of the mysterious regions above the earth, under the earth, and at the world’s ends; and in its second part comprised the laws of the motions of sun, moon, and stars. This original work, more or less revised, seems to have been comprised in chapters 17–19, 21–36, 72–79, and 82. As a “scribe of heaven” to whom all the mysteries of creation and the courses of the stars were known, Enoch appeared to be the most suitable person to be represented as teacher of the higher wisdom. The second author, who regarded Enoch chiefly as a preacher of repentance and foreteller of judgment to come, adopted this other view of his character the more readily as the description of the place of torment prepared for the ungodly, in the lower world, fitted it well with his special purpose. At the same time he worked out the thought that the whole universe is governed by fixed laws and ordinances, and that every disorder or disturbance is simply a consequence of the sin of the fallen angels and of the impious among mankind. To him belong the form of representations somewhat late and abruptly introduced, according to which Enoch is imparting to his son, Methuselah, the mysteries which have been revealed to himself. The apocalyptic pictures drawn of the future (a main object with the second writer) are somewhat awkwardly presented in the form of dream-visions, related by Enoch, long after he had seen them, to his son. This second Book of Enoch seems never to have existed as an independent work, but only as an expansion and completion of the former. The pieces peculiar to the second author are chapters 1–18, 80 and 81, 85–105.

The date of the original work cannot be determinedly fixed, while that of its revision is clearly indicated in the Victoriae of seventy-shepherd-times which begin after the destruction of the first Temple are the times of heathen dominion over Israel, till the rise of the Hasmonene monarchy. The seventy shepherds, each of whom obtains dominion for a definite period over the sheep, can indeed hardly be regarded as so many heathen princes, but rather as punitive angels who destroy more sheep than were included in their commission. At the same time the longer divisions into which these shepherd-times are distributed, though in detail the reckoning may be somewhat uncertain, correspond on the whole with the ruling periods of Babylon, Persia, Macedonia, and Syria; the last twelve appearing to answer exactly to the reigns of twelve kings of Syria, from Antiochus IV to John Hyrcanus. In any case the rams, born in the last twelve shepherd-times, whose horns grow, and which call the sheep together to fight with the ravens, are the pious zealots of the Hasmonene period, and the great horn which the rams, along with other birds of prey, vainly endeavour to cast down, is John Hyrcanus, the victorious Hasmonene (cc. 125–106). The author looks forward to the close of Gentile domination and the day of final judgment as soon about to follow these days of victory. The date of composition might be still more definitely made out could we fix more exactly the dates of the seventy shepherd-times. They do indeed evidently correspond, as Hilgenfeld was the first to observe, to the 70 weeks of Daniel or 840 years. This, reckoning exactly, would give us the period from 588 B.C. to 84 A.D., and so bring us down to the early years of Janneaus Alexander (105–79 B.C.). On the other hand, we do not certainly know that the date fixed in the author’s own mind for the destruction of the first Temple was exactly B.C. 588. Putting this in round numbers at 600 B.C. we are brought by the 70 weeks down to 110 B.C., which Dillmann fixes as the approximate date of composition. In any case, the young whelp (chap. 90, 13, 14) is not distinguished from the great horn, and cannot therefore refer to Janneaus Alexander but to John Hyrcanus himself.

The reckoning according to 70 generations
The book, in any case, remains a remarkable monument of Jewish theological opinion at the close of the second and beginning of the first century before Christ. It is without sufficient foundation that criticism has been made of its having proceeded from Essene circles. It neither advocates Essene asceticism nor rejects the Temple worship; the angelological speculations are still very undeveloped, while the writer's imagination is so much the more occupied with final judgment and consummation, with futurity blisslessness of the righteous, and the torments of the ungodly. It is further noteworthy that the Messias plays a quite subordinate part in its Eschatology. The specimens given of Jewish natural science are of special value.

What must be regarded as a third Book of Enoch is formed by the three Parables. These contain a most interesting and at the same time a very interesting and most surprising, a story how, in the midst of a thousand times ten thousand and ten thousand times ten thousand. In the older writing, on the other hand, Uriel occupies throughout the place of Phanuel (the name Suriel for Raphael, 9, 1, is not confirmed by the parallel passage in the Greek text, nor is it met with elsewhere). The Seraphim and Ophanim are not mentioned at all. In the older writing represents Enoch as under the guidance of Uriel, Raguel (Gabriel?), Raphael and Michael, he now appears under the guidance of the angel of peace, and sees the archangels in their lofty station round the throne of God. Azazel, moreover, is here placed at the head of the fallen angels (54, 5; 55, 4) rather as in chapters 6, 3-7, and 9, 7 (compare 10, 11) Sennaja is the first, Azazel the tenth in the list of those unhappy beings. In the passage 69, 2, the catalogue of fallen angels is an interpolation disturbing the context which treats only of originally evil spirits. Azazel is indeed in the older work also represented as the author of all kinds of iniquity, who teaches mankind the use of murderous weapons, luxurious living, and covetousness (8, 1; compare 9, 6; 10, 4; 13, 1), whereas in the second, those functions are ascribed to the evil spirit Gudroel, who (69, 9) teaches mankind the construction and use of instruments of slaughter. It is yet more significant that the Parables of the second work presuppose a host of intermediate beings, that is, evil spirits by whom the angels have been seduced (69, 4, sqq.; compare 40, 7; 55, 4; 54, 6), and in accordance with this, they appear also to teach the existence of two races of mankind. As God originally divided light from darkness, so has He also divided the spirit of men, conforming in goodness those of the righteous (41, 9). This dualism is not, however, carried out to its legitimate consequences. We may further reckon among the pecularities of these Parables the teaching of the development of the church concerning the heavenly wisdom (chap. 43; compare 37, 2 sq.); 48, 1, 7; 49, 1-3; 51, 3); the doctrine of the general resurrection of the dead (chap. 51); and the doctrine of an endless blessed life of the righteous in heaven (37, 4; 58; 71, 16 sq.). The designation of the Messias as "Son of Man," which, as is well known, is elsewhere applied to our Lord, only by Himself, is borrowed from Daniel, and this alone accounts for the representation of Heaven as the native home of the Messias. The name, "Son of Woman" (65, 5), occurs once in a passage in which the text appears to have been corrupted, while "Filus Viri" in another passage (69, 29), instead of "Filius Hominis," may simply result from a mistranslation. The name Son of Man (Filius Hominis) is, in fact, the regular predicate of Massias, and this, combined with other somewhat developed Christological ideas in the Parables, has led to the supposition of a Christian authorship, in favour of which may also be alleged the expression “church of the elect,” and the sharp antithesis between elect and reprobate, which is by no means identical with that between Israelites and Gentiles. Neither of these notes can, however, be regarded as decisive. The work is in the main directed against the kings who deny the name of the Lord of Spirits (38, 5; 41, 2; 46, 4, sq.; 48, 10; 53, 5; 54, 2; 55, 3, 63), and oppresses the theocracy. This indicates a time not earlier than that of the later Hasmonaeans and the Herods. That we cannot go farther back than such a time is determined amongst other circumstances by the mention of the Parthians (56, 5) who then first began to be formidable neighbours to the Jews. Hilgenfeld contends that by “the kings,” Gentile or heathen sovereigns are designated, and that because they are spoken of (chap. 46, 7) as the “chafers whose own hands have made;” this view is contradicted, however, by other passages, while the Gentile proclivities of the later rulers of Palestine, and specially of Herod and his sons, may be held to justify the expression on which his theory is founded.
ENODOCUS

These Parables, moreover, are not on their side free from interpolations. Such beyond doubt are the so-called Noachian sections, which not only disturb the context in which they stand, but also introduce Noah as the speaker instead of Enoch. They all refer to the first divine judgment, that of the Deluge. The limits of these Noachian sections are variously determined; Dillmann and Köstlin make them include chapters 54, 7, to 55, 2; 60; 65 to 69, 25, the former adding also chapter 70. Ewald, on the other hand, would assign only a few verses of chapters 69 and 60 to the interpolator. But the section chapter 68, 2–5, which is immediately connected with chapter 64, and the whole chapter 69 (with the single exception of the Catalogue of Angels, vv. 2 and 3, and perhaps the note of Time, v. 1), together with chapter 70, must have already belonged to the Parables, but of chapter 60, on the other hand, only vv. 1–6. As certainly Noachian sections then can be regarded only chapters 54, 7, to 55, 2; 60, 7–25, and 65 to 68, 1. Another passage which seems to have proceeded from the same interpolator as Ewald already has perceived, is the passage interpolated in the older writing; chap. 10, 1–3, 23 containing the announcement of the Deluge to Noah by an angel, not elsewhere mentioned as Arsalalj lur. Whether he also inserted the Catalogue of Angels, chapter 20, and the list of fallen angels (chap. 69, 2, 3), repeated from 6, 7, cannot be definitely ascertained. It is however highly improbable that these additions are fragments of an independent Book of Enoch. The other hand we must regard as mere interpolations in part the close relation in which Noah is placed here and afterwards to Enoch, and in part the circumstance that the Noachian additions borrow various expressions from the Parables (Lord of Spirits, Angel of Peace, &c.).

It is more difficult to determine the origin of some other sections. To these belong among the Parables some pieces which break the connexion of thought, and remind us of The Book of Celestial Physics (41, 2–9; 43; 44; 45; 48, 23). A comparison of these with the section 60, 11–23, which belongs to the Noachian additions, makes it probable that they also proceed from the same interpolator. To the same source may likewise be referred the story of the birth of Noah and the Deluge which is told in his time, but here Enoch is the speaker and not Noah. Chapter 108, on the other hand, is certainly the work of another author, as is clear from the title, “Another Treatise which Enoch wrote for his son Methuselah, and for those who came after him.” It was evidently after the insertion of the Parables with which it has several points of resemblance, as, for instance, the antithesis of light and darkness. For the date of composition of the Noachian additions, we have no certain indications. One passage, 67, 5 sq., is important, which speaks of the custom of kings to seek for healing by bathing in warm springs; the allusion seemed to be to Herod the Great and perhaps the baths of the Dead Sea (Antt. xiv. 6, 5); that these baths are placed “the west” appears to have arisen from a thoughtless reproduction of what had been said about localities in chapter 52, 1. Hilgenfeld prefers to think the allusion to be to the warm baths of Campania, so much frequented in the imperial times as really situated in the “west” of Palestine. This information, presupposing the Christian origin of the Parables, would indeed be necessary. Chapter 108 is, at any rate, the latest piece of the whole collection.

The result of these observations seems to be that the Book of Enoch must be regarded as a collective work, consisting of various parts, about the composition of which it will be difficult to form a certain judgment until the Hebrew original, or at any rate the Greek version from which the Ethiopic is derived, shall have been recovered. Apart from the question of the interpolations and especially the Noachian fragments, the chief point of interest for us at the present time is whether we are to regard the Parables as a Jewish or a Christian work; could it be proved that they were made use of in the Book of Jubilees, the question would be decided in favour of a Jewish origin. The Christian authorship of the whole book as maintained by Lücke (in the first but not the second edition of his Einleitung in die Offenbarung Johannes), Weiss (Evangelienfrage, 1856, p. 214 sq.), J. Chr. K. Hofmann (Zeitschr. f. deutschem Morgenl. Gesellschaft, 1852, p. 87 sq.), and Philippi (Ezechiel und Enoch, Stuttgart, 1860) is quite inadmissible. Volkmar’s theory on the other hand is still more fanciful (Zeitschr. f. deutschem Morgenl. Gesellschaft, 1860, p. 87 sq. and Eine Neuentstehende Entdeckung und deren Bestreitung, Zürich, 1862), namely, that the book proceeded from the school of Rabbi Akiba, A.D. 132, and was written to invite his followers to the apostolic church, the importance to the Antiochians, Bar-kochbas, and join the Jewish revolt against Hadrian. [R. A. L.]

ENODOCUS (GUINEOCUS), ST., to whom a chapel in the Cornish parish of St. Miewt (Menefrida), on the Bristol Channel, is dedicated, was probably a Welsh saint. William of Wor-ENO DORUS, Bishop Lacy, of Exeter, in 1434, allowed the parishioners to celebrate their dedication day, to all future time, on the 13th of July, instead of on the 54th, which was the feast-day of St. Christina (Oliver's "Monasticon Dioc. Ebor."
p. 441). In the parish of St. Cubert, also on the northern sea, is a sepulchral stone with the inscription, "CONOTOCI FILLI TEGERNOMALLI," which some connect with this saint. The inscription is very like those on the sepulchral stones of Brecknockshire (compare those given in Bidwell and Stubb's "Councils," i. pp. 169, 825), which seems to have been a central point for missionary enterprise.

[ C. W. B. ]

ENO DORUS, ST., an Irish saint, who gave his name to St. Enoder, or Enolder, in Cornwall. His feast is the Sunday nearest the last Thursday in April. The name is Celtic, and not the same as Athenodoras. He is said to have died in Cornwall late in the 5th century. The church dedicated to him, just south of St. Columb Major, is called Egoseneaton in Dominges. The prefix Egos is comparatively rare and early in Cornish names. The old fair-day of the parish was Sept. 25. (See Cressy's "Church History of Brittany," i. 19, [C. H.]

ENOGRAS, said to have been bishop of Marbrium (St. Malo) in Brittany, and to have died A.D. 531 (Migne, "Hug.""). But the Samaritans do not feel certain enough about him to include him among the occupants of this see ("Jd. Christ, xiv. 995").

[ C. H. ]

ENON, martyred together with Quirio and forty others under Gallienus, A.D. 260. He is commemorated Jan. 13. ("Mart. Hier.; A.A. SS. Jan. i. 767.)

[ T. S. R. ]

ENTHEUS, a monk, commemorated by the Ethiopian church on the 17th of the month Naha—as (August 10). Lindoulus adds no note to his name ("Lindolph and Swani Historiarum Aethiopicarum Commentarioria"); Franchetti (1691, p. 425). In the Ethiopian MS. of the Senkessar in the Bodleian Library, the 17th of Naha—as is marked thus: Martyrium Entei, Amoraei; and the martyrdom of his brother, Acrates, is commemorated on the same day (cf. Dillmann, in "Catalogus Cod. Mss. Bibl. Bodleianae," pt. viii. p. 67).

[F. P.]

[ G. S. ]

ENTHYSIME, one of the six "roots" in the system of Sinox (Hippol. Ref. vi. 20, p. 177). "Orphani (Iren. l. xxx. 6, 7, p. 110) and Vales tines."

[ G. S. ]

ENTICUS (EUTICUS), of Caesarea in Cappadocia ("Scheffer"), one of the numerous Christians who were required to surrender their sacred books during the period of the persecution of Diocletian, A.D. 303-4. ("Monum. Vet. de Den. Hist. Oberthur, p. 171; -d. Migne, Patr. Lat. viii. 733 a.")

[ H. W. P. ]

CHRIST. BIOL.—VOL. II.

ENTULANUS, bishop of Toul. ("Endulsa.")

ENTYCHITAE, a sect of the followers of Simon, who, according to Clem. Alex. ("Strom. viii. 17, p. 900"). Derived this name from the unlawful things which they had the audacity to practice (δύνατόν εὐθεῖας τῇ ἐν ἐννομον). We know that Christians believed the charge to be true of certain of the Gnostic sects which had been brought by heathen against the Christians, viz. that hap hazard sexual intercourse took place at their nightly meetings; and this would seem to be what was referred to in this nickname. Theodor ("Haer. Fab. i. 1") copies the name in the form Eutyctaeae. Coteler notes ("Mon. Eccl. Gr. iii. 640") the occurrence of Eutyctaeae as a transcript's error for Euchitaeae, and conversely Euchitaeae in a passage where Sophronius intended the name Eutyctaeae, derived from Theodor. [G. S.]

ENUTUS, bishop of Noyon. ("Envitus.")

ENVAEL, Welsh saint. ("Enval, Envalp.")

ENYMIA, abess. ("Enymia.")

EOAIN, Irish saint. ("Ioain.")

EOALDUS (EOLDS, GOALDS, EDALDS, CAEOLDS), ST., was an archbishop of Vienne. In the "Gallia Christiana" (xvi. 35) he is placed forty first in the list, succeeding St. Agratus, and followed by St. Barolinus II. He flourished about the year 710. He has sometimes been confused with Cadeolus, who preceded him by about forty years in the same see. Almost the whole of his authentic history is summed up in a sentence from the "Chronicon" of Ado, abbishop of Vienne, for the year 718 (see Migne, "Patr. Lat. xxviii. 120," to the effect that at that time Eoldus enriched the church of Vienne, for he was related to the kings of the Franks, and built within the city a chapel crypties, in honour of the Thebaean martyrs, St. Maurice and his companions, and there placed a considerable number of relics, both of these and other martyrs, and the church was thenceforth called St. Maurice's. Eoldus is commemorated on the 27th day of July. ("Gall. Christ. xvi. 35.") [S. A. B.]

EOALDUS, bishop of Lyons. ("Fuloldus.")

EOBANACH (EOBANUS), martyr, commemorated June 5. His name occurs in the list of martyrs in the Dunkeld Litany, and Camerarius, calling him St. Eobanus, martyr, places him on this day. ("Bp. Forbes, "Eod. Scott. Saints," ivii. 239, 539; Camerarius, "De Scot. For." 153.") [J. G.]

EOBANUS, presbyter of Boniface, of Mentz, in whose correspondence his name is also written "Eaba" and "Eobo." The archbishop calls him his son and a bearer of his letters. In the latter capacity Eaba visits the abbots Dudo, Eadburga abbes of Thanel, and Siegald, apparently abbot of Chertsey. Boniface once addresses him from Italy among the friends he had left behind in Germany, viz. Geppan, Tatwinus, and Wygibertus. ("Mon. Mogunt." ed. Jaffé, pp. 98, 99, 100, 166.) He is mentioned as amanuensis of Boniface in a letter from the latter to the abbess Edburga. He was sent by
EOBE

Pippin on an embassy to pope Zacharias to consult in the name of the princes of Christendom on questions of church discipline (Baron. A. E. 744, 3). He assisted Boniface as a choric presbyter in his preaching and baptizing among the Frisians, and was afterwards appointed by him bishop of Trajectum (Maastricht). (Vit. Willibr. in Momms. Mag. ed. Jaffé, 463; Baron. Annals Eccles. a. D. 724, 8; 755, 98.)

[I. G. S.]

EOBE, an abbat who attests a charter of Ethelbald, king of Mercia, between 723 and 737. (Kemble, C. D. 83.) He is probably identical with Ibe, who attests a Worcester charter of the same king in 736 (ib. 80; Mon. Angl. i. 585) and Iebe, whose name is appended to a similar undated charter. (K. C. D. 89.) All the three charters are of respectable authority, and coincide in other points besides the attestation of this otherwise unknown person. As he was distinctly a Mercian abbat it would be hazardous to identify him further with Eaba of Malmesbury, who flourished at the same time. [Eaba.]

[3.]

[C. R.]

[T. S. B.]

EOCHAUA TUIATHAIL, anchoret, bishop and abbat of Lughmhadh (Louth), died A.D. 820 (Four Mast.).

[J. G.]

EOCHAIHID, pronounced Oby, and derived from the Irish each, a horse, is literally a horseman (Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 2 ser. 135). It is latinised Eochaidh and Echuidh, and retains also the Irish forms Eochaidh and Echuidh.

(1) Abbat of Lisnare, commemorated Apr. 17. The Irish annals mention the death of this saint in the year 694, and seem to make him abbot of an monastery at Lisnare before St. Carthach Mochuda (May 14) was driven from Rahan. But however we may get over the special difficulty involved in the chronology, the truth seems to be that while Carthach was bishop, Eochaidh was the second abbat of Lisnare in Waterford. [Carthach (2.), Reeves, Chdnea, 87; Br. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 335.]

In times of his being either an abbot of Lismore in Scotland, or else the same as Eogoluid (Jan. 25), of Iona.

[J. G.]

EOCHAIHID (3), son of Gearóid, steward of Armagh, died a.D. 796 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 399). Ann. Ult. (A.D. 795) call him Echua mac Cernaig, and say he died "immutura morte."

[J. G.]

[J. G.]

Joyce (Irish Names of Places, 2 ser. c. 3, p. 124 seq.) has a very curious and interesting chapter on the Irish love for attaching nicknames to persons, either as descriptive of some personal or hereditary peculiarity or as based on similarities or contradictions. It is from this custom we have the name of Eochaidh, son of Colla, entirely supplanted by the nickname Dallan Forgaill, "the blind son of Forcaill." [Dallan Forgaill.]

[J. G.]

EOCHAIHID (6), son of Conall Menna, abbat of Faebhban (Foyran, in the barony of Fore, co. Westmeath) (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, vii. 35, but cf. t. 537 n.); died A.D. 759 (Ann. Tyg.; Four Mast. A.D. 754.)

EOCHAIHID (7), son of Diarmait, bishop and abbat of Armagh. He succeeded St. Caerlian (Mar. 24) at Armagh in 588, and was there for ten years, dying A.D. 598 (Stuart, Armagh, 91; Lanigan, Hist. High. ii. c. 14, § 9).

In his work the Irish annals say Eochaidh, son of Dermot, called abbat of Armagh, died in January 598, but his reference to January is probably taken from Colgan's vague suggestion that if this Eochaidh is to be numbered among the saints, he is likely to be the one who is venerated on Jan. 1, though the person there is said in the Kalendars to be Eochaidh of Ulseanach. (Colgan, Tr. Thom., 293, col. 2; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 5; Ware, Bishops, by Harris, 38.)

[J. G.]

EOCHAIHID (8), son of Fiacrach, a wise man, died A.D. 759 (Ann. Tyg.; Four Mast. A.D. 754.)

EOCHAIHID (9), son of Fogarta, abbat of Fochaidh and Inisalothairn (the former a woody district near Killala, barony of Threavy, co. Mayo, and the latter an island in Lough Eo, in the Shannon), died A.D. 785 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 386-7).

[J. G.]

EOCHAIHID (10), son of Nathri or Dathri, was converted by St. Patrick on the restoration of his wife Eochaidh to life before the churchyard of Kilmore, as related by Jocelin and Eriwan. Dathy, son of Fiacrach, was the last pagan king of Ireland, and killed by a thunderbolt at the foot of the Alps, a.D. 428 (Colgan, Tr. Thom., c. 145, 141, c. 91, 180 n. 142).

[J. G.]

EOCHAIHID (11), of Uisnech—Jan. 1.

There is an account given by Ervins (Trip. V. St. Patr. ii. c. 123) of St. Patrick's arrival in the country of Enna, who was brother of King Lasghaire, and of his request for ground to build a church. Without apparently giving his full consent at the time, Ervins next day brought his son Eochaidh or Eochan Lucus to St. Patrick to be made a bishop, and, failing to meet with St. Patrick at Alltech-Airtech, prevailed upon two of St. Patrick's disciples, who were bishops to consecrate Eochaidh. But when St. Patrick heard of this transaction he was highly incensed, and pronounced a doom upon both the young bishop and his consecrators. Colgan thinks this Eochaidh must have been the Eochaidh of Ulseanach, who is commemorated in the kalendars of Jan. 1, chiefly because Ulseanach or Uisnishill is in Westmeath, which belonged to the sons of Eochaídh

Laeighair, and Aileach-Airtreach was probably on the other side of the Shanoon, in Roscommon. (Colgan, Acta SS. 737, c. 4, and Tr. Thom. 131, c. 17, 145, c. 123, 181 n. 160; O’Hanlon, Irish Saints, l. 19.)

Eochaídh (12) of Cill-Toma. In the Irish annals is the death of Eochaídh (Eochadh, Ann. Uí), of Cill-Toma, now Killtoor, a hamlet in the barony of Fore, near Castlepollard, co. Westmeath. He died in the year 751 (Ann. Tg.), and was succeeded by Coibhdeanach.

Eochaídh (13) of Cluain-ratha, brother of St. Magister of Killmagister, descended from the Ui Baireach who occupied Slievemargy, Queen’s County, and some adjoining districts. He was thus related to and nearly contemporary with St. Fiac, of Sletty, who, by his mother, was a step farther removed from the common ancestor Dubh Barrach (Book of Rights, 212; Journ. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Assoc. Ir. 4 ser. ii. 547).

Eochod, apostle of the Picts. [Eochadius.]

Eodberht, by a deed dated the 16th of May, in the tenth year of king Childerbert (704), sold all his possessions at Rumiacum, in the district of Therouanne, to Rigobert abbot of the monastery of St. Bertin at Sithium. This document is by some mistake given twice over in Aigile, Patr. Lat. lxviiii. 1248 and cxxxvii. 1198, the author of the Index biographicus evidently supposing there were two distinct deeds of different purport.

Eodwald (Eadwalde), the son of a poor woman whom Wilfrid is said to have restored to life at a place called Outladunferi (7 Twyscon). Wilfrid desired that the child should be brought to him when seven years old, to enter into his service. When the time came, the mother, at the instigation of her husband, fled from home with her child, and was concealed among the Britons. They were discovered by Hocca, one of Wilfrid’s elders, and the boy was brought to him. He was generally called “bishop’s son” (filius episcopi), and died at Ripon in the great mortality. He was in some religious service there. (Eddi, Vita Wifr. n. e. cap. 18.)

Eoghan (Eogenus, “well-born” Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 2 ser. 150). (2) Son of Caithnech, and bishop of Ardras, commemorated August 23. He was of the royal blood of Leinster, his father being Caimnech, of the race of Laighair Lorc, son of Uaigne Mor, and his mother Muindecha, of the race of the Medorni, probably in the county of Monaghan. He is said by Colgan and others to have been in the court of Patrick, but he does not appear to have really been such, unless we are to suppose that his age was of a prolonged nature. It is more likely that he was under St. Finian (Dec. 12), of Clona; and on his liberation from the captivity in which he was held when the pir-es carried him off in his early youth, along with Tighernach (Apr. 4) of Clones, and Canire (Nov. 11) of Coleraine, and others, to Britain, he studied for some years at the great monastery of Rosnatt or Whithern, founded by St. Ninian. He founded a monastery at a place called Killmagheragh in the county of Wigtown, where, according to Ussher, he flourished in the year 570, and had under him St. Kevin (June 3) of Glendalough, his kinsman. St. Etichen (Feb. 11) of Clonfadd is said to have been related to him as belonging to the same sept in the Dal Messianore. St. Eoghan afterwards was bishop at Ardstraw, now Ardsraw, in the barony of Strabane and county of Tyrone, where the bishop’s seat was fixed before it was transferred to Maghera and thence to Derry; he was also bishop at Rathkeal, now Rathkeal or Rashee, in the barony and county of Antrim, and as such is usually entered in the Annals. At Ardstraw he had also a monastery. To Utter history probably came from Wicklow, on account of its being the province of his paternal relationship. He was a great and industrious preacher, and after a life of zealous labour in declaring the gospel, he fell asleep in the Lord in the beginning of the seventh century. In all the Irish annals his death is associated with that of St. Coemgen, or Kevin, of Glendalough, and took place in the year of grace 618 (Ann. Tg.). The Bollandists (Acta SS. Aug. 23, tom. iv. 624) have a memoir, “De S. Eugenio vel Eogano, Episcopo Ardrasathanii in Hibernia. Vita ante aeternum anonimo ex MS. Salmanticensium;” and Baring-Gould (Lives of the Saints, Aug. 25, p. 251) compares the short notice, but gives no other date or evidence of a date. In Ann. Clonmacon, he is called “Owen, bishop of Ardarsthy,” and Caldwell or Cawder, a parish in the counties of Nairn and Inverness, was dedicated to St. Ewan and anciently called Borrowin, properly Bar Ewan or Ewan’s Midight. He was patron also of Collare, Porthshire. O’Donnell (Vit. S. Columb. i. c. 11) gives an account of the bishop of Ardstraw, for which reason the name of Eoghan was given to the birth of St. Columba, and O’Clery refers to it as a fact, but as St. Columb was born about A.D. 521 and bishop Eoghan died about A.D. 618, we must doubt the genuineness of the prophecy. (Marti. Doney, by Todd and Reeves, 159, 227; Colgan, Acta SS. 406, 438, and Tr. Thom. 391, 460, c. 31; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 12, § 3; Todd, Book of Hymns, favo. i. 103–6; Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 68, 250; O’Connor, Rev. Hk. Script. ii. 184, iv. 40; Bp. Forbes, Cal. Scott. Saints, 335; Survey Prov. Moray, 202; Ware, Bishops, 48, and Ir. Ant. 131; Butler, Lives of the Saints, Aug. 23, vili. 397; Ulster Journ. Arch. 1. 197 n. 1 Book of Oibly, C.C. Dublin, Inx. ix. ; Hardy, Descript. Cat. i. pt. ii. 194.)

Eoghan (2), son of Laiscre. “Eogenius mac Laiscreus” is given in Ussher’s Irish saints of the second class, who were few bishops and many saints, to the number of three hundred, and extended for a period of about sixty years up to the close of the sixth century. But nothing satisfactory is known of him: he could not have been bishop of Ardsraw, as Caimeach was that bishop’s father’s name, nor could he well have been master of St. Kevin (Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 17, works, vi. 478, 538; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 10, § 4, c. 12, § 7).

EOGHANAN, commemorated Dec. 20 (Mort. Doneg.), but 19, Mort. Talk. He was son of Aenghus, and had his residence or dedication at Ardleigh, in Magh-Ene, near unto Eas-Rath, that is, in the plain of Moy, and Donegal, and near the cataract of Assaro or Essaroe, on the river Erne. "Mort. Doneg." by Todd and Reeves, 343; "Mort. Tullagh" in Kelly's Col. Ir. SS. xxxix. 13). Eoghanan is the diminutive of Eochaidh, and probably the double diminutive of Eog or Eocha.

EOGLIDUS, Irish saint. [CECHADUS]

EOGN, son of Tripot, an abbat, died a.d. 745, but the entry in the Stowe copy of the Four Masters is modern (O'Conor, Rev. Ir. Scir. iii. 270).

EOGUIN (Nennius, Hist. Angl. in M. H. B. 76 A), king of Northumbria. [C. H.]

EOIL, Irish saint. [EUHEL]

EOIN, son of Carlan, of Tech-esin in Uith, commemorated Aug. 17. Eoin is the Irish form of the name John, and this saint is commemorated in Mort. Doneg., and Mort. Tullagh. His church Tigh-Eoin, "John's House," has given its name by contraction to Styrou, now St. John's Point, a detached townland of Rathmullan parish, co. Down. (Reeves, Eccl. Antiq. 32, 33.)

EOLANG (EULAGUS, EULOGUS), of Achadhe, commemorated Sept. 5. O'Clery (Mort. Doneg.) by Todd and Reeves, 237 has on this day "Eolag of Achadh-bo-Cainnigh in Osraigh [now Aghabo], founded by St. Caineach (Oct. 11) in the barony of Clandonagh and Clarnamagh, Queen's County," and he is of the race of Cumaire, son of Noglich, Monarch of Erin." In the calendar of the Drummond Missal (P. Forbes, Kol. Scit. Saints, 23) he is Eulag Confessor. A saint called Eulangius or Eulogius is mentioned among the twelve disciples or companions of St. Barry or Finnbar (Sept. 25) in his journey to Britain, and at his monastery of Loch Ire or Ere; but this was really St. Ollan or Olan, of Aghabollige, in the barony of East Muskerry, in the county of Cork. [OLLAN.] (Caulfield, Life of St. Fin Barre, 19 n.; Colgan, Acts SS. 232, c. 2, 607, col. 1.) Another homonymous saint, Eolang of Lecan, had his feast on Dec. 29.

EOLDUS (Adon. Chron. ann. 718 in Patr. Lat. cxiii. 120 b), bishop of Vienne. [EODULON]
EOLLA

EOLLA, the second bishop of Selsey (M. H. B. 618). He is mentioned by Bede as the successor of Edbert, and as dead some time before the Ecclesiastical History was completed (H. E. v. 19). His name is inserted in a spurious or interpolated charter of 714 issued at a South Saxons vigenagemost (Kembie, C. D. 899), and in need of a charter he appears as his suzerain, king of Nunno (85. 1001). Unfortunately the text of the Selsey charters is in such a state that nothing can be argued from these facts.

EONAN (AEONIA), a singer, who, with Eddi accompanied Wilfrid during his sojourn in Mercia and Kent in A.D. 644, teaching the people, no doubt, church music and the Gregorian tones. (Eddi Vita & Wilf. cap. xiv.)

J. R.

EONIUS (1), bishop of Vannes. [ENNIUS (2).]

EONIUS (2), twenty-second bishop of Auch, succeeding Aieclus and followed by Paulinus, towards the close of the 5th century. The name in the ancient catalogue has also been read as Conus, Conius, and Genius. (Gall. Christ. i. 975; Gams, Series Episc. 497.)

S. A. B.

EONUS (APONIUS), of noble birth in the territory of Chalon-sur-Saône, succeeded Leonius as bishop of Arles. The Sammarthiani date his accession in 492. The Bonollandists suppose it possibly earlier. Pope Gelasius writes to notify him, and through him to the other bishops of Gaul, his accession to the pontificate. He was present at the discussion held at Lyons between Vitalis and Aratus, which inspired king Gundobaud with a certain leaning towards Catholicism [AVitus] (see Hefele, Conc. Gesch. i. iii., sec. 219). In a long-standing dispute between the churches of Arles and Vienne, regarding primatial rights, pope Anastasius II. had made certain arrangements favourable to Vienne, by which more ancient regulations were restored. He was also infructuous, and having been made to pope Symmachus, he wrote a letter to Eonus (Petr. Lat. xlii. p. 40), in which he directs both churches to send delegates for his information. Crescentius was sent on the part of Arles, but it does not appear that Vienne sent any one. Upon hearing his statement, Symmachus again wrote to Eonus in the year 500. After perusal of the great accumulation of documents relating to the case (quibus eclesiasticum gravem scrinium) he rescinds the innovations of Anastasius and maintains the ordinances of St. Leo, on the ground of the reverence due to antiquity, and the need of maintaining the consistency of the apostolic see. The letter bears the appearance of a final decision on the question; but Avitus of Vienne having remonstrated, the pope replies to him that the case is still open, and in fact it was only in 513 that it was finally decided in favour of Arles. [CAESARIUS.] Eonus was the relative and fellow countryman of St. Caesarius, whom he placed over a monastery on an island near Arles, and recommended to the people as his successor. His death occurred Aug. 16, A.D. 502; but the feast of St. Roche being in possession of that day, Eonus is commemorated on Aug. 30. (Acta SS. Aug. 30; Gall. Christ. i. 534; Cell. x. 504 and 523; Tillemont, Mémo. xv. 96.)

R. T. S.

EOPA

EOPA (Wend. Flor. Hist. ann. 661, ed. Core); EOPPA (A. S. C. ann. 657, 661, in M. H. B. 316, 317), presbyter. [EATPA.]

C. H.

EOPPA, son of Ingeld, who was brother of the king of Wessex. Eoppa was great-grand- father of Egbert. (Chr. S. M. H. B. 348.)

S.

EORCMBERT (ancient Cotton MSS. fragments described in Hardy, Descr. Cat. i. 259), king of Kent. [Earcombert.]

C. H.

EORCNGOTHA (Flor. Wig. Geneal. Reg. Cant. in M. H. B. 627), daughter of Earcombert. [Eorcongota.]

C. H.

C. H.

EORMENBEORGE, or -GA (Flor. Wig. Geneal. Reg. Merc. in M. H. B. 630; id. Geneal. Reg. Cant. in M. H. B. 627), daughter of Eormenred, king of Kent, wife of Merewald, king of Mercia. [Eormenburga (1).]

C. H.

EORMENBURGA (1), (EORMENBURGH, ERMENBURGA), otherwise called Dompneva or Domniva, a name probably derived from Domina Eaba, the latter being the name given to her in Kentish charters, supposing the two to be identical. She was a daughter of Eormenred, son of Eadsdalf king of Kent. She was married to Merewald, son of Penda, who was called king of the West Mercians or West Hecaul of Herefordshire, to whom she bore three daughters, Milburga, Mildreda, and Mildgith, and a son, Mildreda. According to the Canterbury hagiographers she received from her cousin, king Egbert of Kent, an estate in the Isle of Thanet, in composition for the death of her brothers Ethelred and Ethelbert. Upon this she built a monastery, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, at the place now called Minster, in Thanet, where she herself became the first abbess, and was blessed by archbishop Theodore. In this dignity she was succeeded by her daughter Mildrida or Mildreda, who gave her own name to the monastery. (Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 534, 635, 638, 648; Will. Malmsb. à P. ed. Hamilton, p. 319; Elmham, pp. 207, 215.) In Thurn's Chronicle of St. Augustine's he names of St. Mildred's, his predecessor at Minster is given as Aebba, and to Aebba the forged grants of Whittred and Swebbear are given. (Kembie, C. D. 15, 37; Elmham, pp. 234, 288.)

It is extremely difficult to unravel the Kentish hagiography, and it would not be safe to say that the three names Eormenburh, Dompneva, and Aebba represent the same person. Florence of Worcester (M. H. B. 635 c) calls the wife of Merewald Ermeneberga, and makes another sister Ermenburga, of whom nothing more is said but that she was "sancta virgo" (ib. p. 627).

EORMENBURGA (2) (IREMENBURGE, IRREMBURG), 2nd wife of Egfrid king of Northumbria, and sister-in-law of Countwine king of Wessex.

(Eddi, cap. 40.) She is charged with stirring up the wrath of her husband against bishop Wilfrid, reflecting upon his wealth and influence, in consequence of which the diocese of York was subdivided by Theodora and Egfrid, and Wilfrid appealed to Rome. This was in A.D. 678. (Id.
cap. 24; Simeon, de Arch. Ebor.) On his return from Rome, Wilfrid was received again at Ermengoruga, and used it as a personal decoration. (Id. cap. 34.) Eddi tells us how for this conduct she became darnged, or possessed, at Coldingham, and how her ailment went away when Wilfrid was released and restitution made. (Id. cap. 39.)

When her husband fell, in A.D. 685, Ermengoruga was in her husband's monastery at Carlisle, awaiting the news of the expedition, and there she had an interview with Cuthbert. (Bede, Vita Cath.
cap. 27.) After this Ermengoruga seems to have taken the veil, as her name appears in the Book of Life of Durham among the queens and abbesses (p. 3). See also Malm. G. P. p. 232. ed. Hamilton; Hist. Elenas. lib. i. ed. Stewart, p. 38. [J. R.]

EORMENGILDA, EORMENHILD, a doughter of Eorcomeht, king of Kent, by his wife Sexburga; married to Wulfhere king of Mercia. (Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 634, 635, 637; Elm-ham, p. 191; W. Malm. G. P. p. 338, 329.)

The history of Eormenhild as the wife of Wulfhere is crossed by that of Edburgha abbess of Gloucester. [EADBURGA (4)] A life of St. Eormen-hild, which exists in several MSS., appears abridged by Capgrave in the Novea Legenda Angliana. (Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 368, 369; A.A.
SS. Boll. Feb. 13, ii. 686-691.) Her name, “Eormenhilda,” as abbess, is attached to the spurious form of the privilege of Witfred.
(Haddan and Stubbes, iii. 246.) [S.]

EORMENGITHA (ERMENGITHA), daughter of Eormenred, son of Eadbald king of Kent.
(Flor. Wig. Gen. Reg. Cont. in M. H. B. 627.)

[C. H.]

EORMENRED, son of Eadbald king of Kent.
According to the Canterbury tradition, as delivered by Simeon of Durham (M. H. B. 648), he was the elder son of Eadbald, but set aside
by his father in favour of Eorcomeht. Elmhams
(p. 173) makes him die before his father, whilst Thorn (c. 1906) seems to favour the notion that he survived his father and left children to the care of his brother Eorcomeht. The fact that his wife Oslawa is called “regina” by Florence of Worcester (M. H. B. 627), and it was in favour of the latter supposition. On the other hand Eormenred is never mentioned by Bede.
By Oslawa he was father of Ermengoruga, otherwise called Domnena, Ermengitha, Ethelredrytha, Ethelred and Ethelbert, to whom the “Genealo-gia” of Florence (M. H. B. 627) adds Ermengor-uga. His name is known chiefly as that of the father of a family of saints, of whom the father of a family of saints, of whom the two sons were, in legend at least, reputed as martyrs. (See Will. Malmebi. G. R. i. § 11, 13;
iii. 209, &c.; Elmhams, pp. 175, 176, 184; Ors.
S. M. H. B. 310.) [S.]

EORPNELAII (Wend. F. H. ann. 634, 632, 635). EORPNELAL (Bede, B. Z. ii. 15, in M. H. B. 167 a); EORPNELAII (A. S. C.
ann. 632, in M. H. B. 309; Flor. Wig. Calp.
ann. 632, 636, in M. H. B. 528 c, 529 a; id.
Chron. App. in M. H. B. 636 a; Malm. G. R. A.
ed. Hardy, i. § 97), king of East Anglia. [Eor-PNELAII.]

EORPNWIN, abbot of the northern monastery described by the monk Ethelwulf (AA. SS.
O. B. S. Sacc. vi. part 2; pp. 323, 327). See Ethelwulf (2). His name appears among the priests, abbats, in the Liber Vitae Dunctmeni,
P. 6. [S.]

EORTASUS of Sardis. [HEORTASUS]

EOSTERWINUS (MSS. described in Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 419; Sim. Dun. G. R. A. in M. H. B.
561 c), abbat. [EASTERWINUS.] [C. B.]

EOYVALDS (Hou), saint and martyr who, along with Sittus, suffered under Dacian the governor of Spain, during the Dacian persecution, at Gerunda in Catalonia. The Bollandists give an account of the discovery of the bodies of these saints taken from an original Spanish authority. They were confirmed on May 7. (AA. SS. Boll. Maii ii. 134.)

[1. B.]

EPACHIUS, presbyter of Ricomagius (Rienauvergne, spoken of by Gregory of Tours in the 6th century. Being of senatorial rank and of better birth than anybody else at Ricomagus, he was asked to celebrate mass on the feast of the Nativity. Having accordingly to keep the vigil in the church, he was ordered to go to the church, he was ordered to go to during the day to his house from hour to hour,
during the day to his house from hour to hour,
and drink “wanton cups from foaming tankards.”
He was even seen drinking after cock-crow, ac and therefore not in a state of fasting on the day of communion. While administering the elements to the congregation he had an epileptic fit, and was carried out of church. The fit returned monthly. Gregory relates this story, to which he adds another from his personal history, to enforce the special sanctity of the vigil of the Nativity.
(Greg. Tur. lib. i. De Glor. Mart. cap. 87.) [W. M. S.]

EPAENETUS, bishop of Carthage, according to Baronius (Annal. s. a. 58, iv.), who, however, gives no authority for his statement but that of Dorotheus (De Ixx. Discip., Patr. Grac. xi.
1061). He is the person mentioned in Rom.
xxv. 5. In the Greek Menaeus he is said to have preached in Carthage, as well as in Italy and everywhere, but there is no mention of his par-pate (Menaeus, Jul. 30, ed. Constantinople, 1843; Calmet in Rom. xvi. 5). The anonymous Comment. de SS. Pet. et Paul (cap. 3, § 11) printed by the Bollandists represents Epainetus to have been placed by St. Peter as bishop at Sirmium in Spain. No Spanish Sirmium is known.
Flavius Dector makes it Seilirmus, identified EPAGATHUS

by his editor with Pfeiderhita. (Boll. Acta SS. Jun. v. 416 n.; Dext. Chron. ann. 50 and Bivar’s Comment. in Patr. Lat. xxi. 103.) [T. W. D.]

EPAGATHUS (1) VETTIUS, one of the martyrs at Lyons under Marcus Aurelius (A.D. 177); commemorated June 2. (Euseb. H. E. v. 1; Mart. Hier., Ad., Us.) [T. S. B.]

EPAGATHUS (2), bishop of Marcianopolis in Moesia Inferior, south of the Danube, present at the synod held at Constantinople under Nectarius, when the dispute between Apænius and Bagarius for the bishopric of Bostra, the metropolis of the province of Arabia, was settled in favor of Bagarius, A.D. 394. (Le Quien, Orient Chris. i. 1218; Manzi, iii. 852.) [L. D.]

EPAPHRAS (Col. i. 7, iv. 12; Phil. 23), legendary bishop of Colossae. Jerome in his Commentary on the Eph. to Philemon, vv. 23, 24 (Patr. Lat. xvi. 617), mentions a tradition relating to the connexion of Epaphras with St. Paul, but nothing of his episcopate. Epaphras is first called bishop of Colossae by Ado archbishop of Vienna (Adon. de Festiv. SS. Apost. in Patr. Lat. xxiii. 193), who records the tradition that he was ordained a bishop at Colossae by St. Paul, and that he was martyred and buried in the same city, his natalis being July 19. Usuard under this day repeats the statement. The anonymous Life of St. Augustine (said to have been bishop of Soli in Cyprus, A.D. 102) gives a different tradition; that St. Paul, in consequence of the death of Barnabas and there being no longer an apostle in Cyprus, sent Epaphras, Tychicus, and others to Hercules archbishop of Cyprus, directing the latter to ordain Epaphras to be bishop of Paphos, and the rest for other towns. (Vit. S. Anunci, cap. 2, § 8, in Boll. Acta SS. Feb. iii. 126 e; Le Quien, Orient Chr. i. 155, ii. 1050.) [C. H.]

EPAPHRODITUS (1), reputed bishop of Philippi, and imagined to have been the 4th bishop (Clement of Phil. ii. 25). This E. (Comment. in Isc.) interprets the word as implying that Epaphroditus was the ecclesiastical superior of the ἤλεσθον (i.e. ἐλέος) of Phil. i. 1; and this father, although writing as a commentator rather than as a historian, was afterwards added as the authority for making Epaphroditus first bishop of Philippi. (Baron. A. E. ann. 60, iii. i; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 87.) [T. W. D.]

EPAPHRODITUS (2), reputed bishop of Andraca and one of the seventy disciples (Dorothos, de Septuag. Dom. Discip. in Migne, Patr. Græc. xxii. 1053; Basil. Menol. ii. 17, Dec. 19, Patr. Græc. cxvii.). Andraca was the port town of Myra in Lycia; Baranios erroneously writes it Hadrin or Hadrian, and places it in Syria. (A. E. ann. 60, iii.) [T. W. D.]

EPAPHRODITUS (3), reputed bishop of Terracina in Italy or Tarragona in Spain, and supposed to have been either one of the seventy or the companion of St. Paul. The authority is an anonymous (Commentarius de SS. Pet. et Paul. prolixi) by Surius and the Bollandists, Surius attributing it to Symeon Metaphrastes. Terracina is the reading in Surius (cap. x.) and the Bollandists (cap. 3, § 11); but Salazar and other Spanish writers read Tarraco, so transferring Epaphroditus to their own country. (Surius, de Prob. Hist. tom. ii. p. 353, ed. 1618; Boll. Acta SS. 22 Mart. iii. 369, 370, § 6, 29 Jun. v. 411; Salazar, Mart. Hist. tom. ii. p. 356; Ugh. Ital. Sacr. i. 1283; Constatore, Hist. Terracin. p. 490; Cappellari, Le Chiese d’Ital. vii. 517; Baron. A. E. ann. 60, iii.) [T. W. D.]

EPAPHRODITUS (4), A.D. 431, reader and notary to Hellanius, bishop of Rhodes. He was with three bishops to give a formal and solemn summons to Nectarius to attend the Council of Ephesus on the first day of its session. A deposition the previous evening had been unsuccessful. (Concil. iii. 453; Ceillier, vii. 577; Pope Paul V.‘s Concilia Gener. i. p. 325, Rome, 1628.) [W. M. S.]

EPAPHRODITUS (5), bishop of Terracina in Cyprus, present at the oecumenical council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, where he acted also as proxy for Didymus of Lapithus in the island; at the sixth session he signed for Olympus the metropolitan of Constantia (Salamis) and the absent sufragans of Cyprus. (Manzi, vii. 165; Le Quien, Orient Chris. ii. 1060.) [L. D.]

EPARCHIUS (1), bishop of Sicca, in the proconsular province of Africa. His name is found in the preface of the acts of the council held at Carthage, under Gratus, A.D. 348 or 349 (Morcelli, Africa Chris. i. 277; Manzi, iii. 144, margin, the text reads PATRICKIUS; ib. 1515.) [L. D.]

EPARCHIUS (2), tenth bishop of Clermont in Auvergne, between St. Namatius and Apollinaris Sidonius, held the see from about A.D. 462 to 472. Gregory of Tours calls him vir sanctissimus atque religiosus. It is said that he built a monastery on the summit of the Mons Cantobenicus, where now is a chapel, and used to shut himself up there during Lent, but on the day of the Ecce Domini would return to his church with singing of psalms, accompanied by the clergy and people. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ii. 21; Gall. Christ. ii. 231.) [S. A. B.]

EPARCHIUS (3), St., a recluse of Angolène (Egolisma), was born at Périgoux in the early part of the 6th century of parents named Aurilius and Principia. At the close of his school days he became the cancellarius of his grand-father, Felicissimus, a count; but his heart was not in his duties, and after fifteen years of unwilling servitude, he escaped secretly to the monastery of Sedacium, and throwing himself at the feet of Martin, the abbot, besought to be made a monk. His prayer was granted, and he underwent the usual drudgery of a novice in the field and vineyard. Feeling drawn towards the solitary life, he selected a desert spot, and built for himself a hut. According, however, to the account of Gregory of Tours, he was not altogether solitary, but was accompanied by a few monks. He passed his time in constant prayer, and devoted the offerings made him to the relief of the poor and the redemption of captives. He provided no food, but was supported by the charity of his neighbours. It is said that he died four, or, according to another account, thirty-nine years of this existence, he was seized with a fever, and died in A.D. 581, or, according to Baronius, 584. He is commemorated on the 1st EPARCHUS (4) [EPARCHUS], said to have been a bishop of Poitiers, the Galitza Christiana (ii. 1154) placing him twenty-eighth on the list. His existence, however, seems to rest for proof on a passage occurring in a charter of Louis the Pious, as king of the Aquitanians, in favour of Gaas (Mobilianus). The king confirms to Nantes amongst other provisions, "illæ conjunctiones quas anteriori pontifici Pictaviensis, quem nos recognovimus, Ænsaludus, Ebazius et Grosbertus ad ipsum cellam detulerunt" (Gall. Christ. ii. Instrumenta, p. 346), but making the fullest allowance for the barbarisms of the kings of this passage, as the later compilers of the Galitza Christiana tinted out (xii. 30), can scarcely be made to imply the existence of a bishop Eparchus at Poitiers. [S. A. B.]

EPARCHUS (Aparcius, Huparchus), bishop of Haliac (Ecclesius), from about 630 to 655. He was the acts of the fourth Council of Toledo (a.d. 833) in the fifty-seventh place, preceding five only. In 636 Eparchus was present at the death of St. Isidore, who had sent for him and for Joannes bishop of Elepa, to receive from them the penitential habit and the last sacraments. The signature of Eparchus is also found to the acts of the sixth, seventh, and eighth Councils of Toledo. In the seventh he signs fifth after the Metropolitans, in the eighth second. (*Epig. Soyr. ix. app. 7, xii. p. 206; Aguirre-Catalanii, iv. 385, 413, 423, 426."

EPATHIMITUS (Uph. Ital. Scr. vi. 20), bishop of Naples. [Epithemius] [C. II.]

EPHEBUS (1). CLAUDIUS, one of the bearers of Clement's epistle to the Corinthians (ch. 45). He must have been at the time (about A.D. 95) in advanced years; for he is described as "walking among us from youth to old age unblamably." Lightfoot conjectures that he and his companion, Valerius Bilo, may have been freedmen of the imperial household, and that they may have received their names at the time (A.D. 41-48) when Claudius was emperor and a Valeria his consort. [G. S.]

EPHEBUS (2) (EPHEBUS), a martyr at Terni. He was arrested by order of Leo the consul, and was beheaded A.D. 288. He is commemorated Feb. 14. (Mant. Ato, Rab, Notker.) [T. S. B.]

EPHEBUS (3) (Gams, Scr. Episc. 904), bishop of Naples. [EPHEBIIUS] [C. H.]

EPHEBUS (Faustin et Marcellin. Libell. Proc. in Migne, Patr. Lat. xiii. 99), Lucerian bishop at Rome. [Kiiiihius; Luciferians] [T. W. D.]

EPHEBUS, THE SEVEN SLEEPERS OF. The first person in the West to relate the legend thus entitled appears to have been Gregory of Tours (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Mart. cap. 95, in Migne, Patr. Lat. ixx. 787 a. Ruinart). According to him the names of the seven were Maximianus, Malchus, Martinianus, Constantinus, Dionysius, Joannes, Serapion. They were Christians, and all related to one another. When the emperor Decius visited Ephesius they were brought before him, and on refusing to adore were put to death for the time; the custodian of the temple concealed themselves in a cave, where they abode many days, their food being fetched from the city by one of them who is described as a lad. Decius heard of their proceedings, and commanded the cave to be closed upon them. While they were thus being entombed a certain Christian caused their story to be engraved on leaden tablets, which he hid at the entrance of the cave. After many years Theodosius, a Christian, succeeded to the empire, and then arose the "foul heresy" of the Sabaeans, "who deny a future resurrection." At that time it chanced that a citizen of Ephesius in constructing a sheepfold made use of the stones that blocked up the cave, and so opened it. The Lord thereon sent the spirit of life upon the seven who rose up, and thinking they had slept but a single night, set out "the lad" to buy food. On coming into the city he was astonished to see everywhere the symbol of the cross and to bear the name of Christ. When he offered the money for his purchases he was seized and taken before the bishop and the magistrate as one who had discovered hidden treasure. The cave was visited, the leaden tablets read, and the entire story revealed. Theodosius came in person, and the seven said to him: "A heresy has arisen, glorious Augustus; the Lord has therefore hidden us arise, that we should say to you, according to the apostle Paul, we must all appear at the bar of Christ; see that you are not deceived and shut out from the kingdom of Christ." On this they again lay down and fell asleep as before. Gregory states that he had their passage from a certain Syrian who translated it for him into Latin. It is quite possible that the original from which the story was related to Gregory was the source from whence the Syrian bishop Jacobus (ob. a.d. 521) derived his version, which is commented on by Assenam (Or. 535, p. 221), and quoted at least by the Bollandists (Act. SS. 27 Jul. vi. 375). Jacobus gives eight as the number of sleepers, and varies as to their names. Photius (bibl. cod. 253) varies from both Gregory and Jacobus. In Basil's Menology (Oct. 23) the legend is very briefly related, and again differently. Symeon Metaphrastes (Patri. Graec. ekt. 427) gives the fullest and most graphic version of all. Similar legends are met with both in the East and West. One of another "seven" is attributed to Gregory of Tours (Opp. ed. Migne, p. 1106); another occurs in Paulus Diaconus (De Gest. Lang. i. 4, in Patr. Lat. xcv. 441); another in the Korn (Sale, transp. cap. 18, p. 238, ed. 1834), while others are referred to by Baranius (Mart. Rom. Jul. 27), Hensch (De Fest. Christiani, Lib. 3. cap. 4, p. 1612), Gibbon (D. F. c. 33, vol. iv. p. 188, ed. Smith), Hampson, Med. Anti. Cole. 355). July 27 was the day of their commemoration. [T. W. D.]

EPHRAIM (1), bishop of Alexandria. Le Quien (Or. Chr. ii. 389) says that the fourth bishop, called Primus by Eusebius (Chron. ann.
my boyhood understood not the greatness of the benefit, I knew it when trial came."

In his Testament (Opp. Gr. ii. 408) he tells us that his childhood was one of early promise.

"When I was a child, and lay in my mother's bosom, I saw as in a dream that which has become a reality. From my mother's bosom, the city, sprang a vine twig, which grew and reached to heaven: it brought forth fruit without end, and leaves without number. It spread, it grew, it lengthened, it expanded itself, it went round about, it stretched abroad till it reached the whole creation. All beings gathered of it, and there was no lack, yea, more they plucked, so much the more its clusters multiplied. Many were the warriors, those leaves were hymns, and God was the giver. To Him be glory for His grace, whereby He has made me receive according as He willed from the storehouse of His treasures."

This also seems to suggest that Ephrem from the first was educated as a Christian, and the statement that he accompanied St. James to the council of Nicæa is probable enough. Of course it would be in an inferior capacity: but as Ephrem was from the first a diligent student of Holy Scripture, and a keen disputant, the bishop might not unwillingly have taken with him a youth of such promise. Of the council itself, he speaks with great reverence, describing it as "the illustrious synod, gathered by the memorable king, at which the Creed was committed to writing," and condemns heretics for not submitting to it (Opp. Gr. ii. 488 D).

In the year 337 Constantine the Great died, and Sapor, king of Persia, at once seized the opportunity of invading Mesopotamia. After ravaging the open country, he commenced the siege of Nisibis in A.D. 338, and at the end of seventeen days had brought it to the verge of surrender. For having dammed up the waters of the Mydonus, he suddenly set them free, and they rushed with such great violence against the walls of the city as partially to overthrow them. In vain the citizens raised inner walls of defence; but when all seemed hopeless, Ephrem prevailed upon the aged bishop, James, to mount the walls, and in the presence of the besiegers, to pray for the divine succour. Shortly afterwards so great a multitude of mosquitoes and horseflies, bred probably in the swamps lately covered by the waters of the river, assailed the Persian camp, that the horses and elephants, being rendered unmanageable, threw the whole army into confusion; and Sapor, recognising that the scourge was divine, withdrew his forces, lest he should bring upon himself heavier chastisement.

Before the end of the year St. James died, but according to the Acts Ephrem remained at Nisibis till its surrender by Jovian, and he even afterwards, when he withdrew into Roman territory, having previously been baptized at the age of twenty-eight years. But the surrender of Nisibis took place in A.D. 363, when Ephrem was about fifty-five years of age; and besides, the same Acts describe him as living at Edessa, in the reign of Vologes IV. Probably he left Nisibis upon the death of James, and after a short stay at Amid, to which city his mother is said to have belonged, travelled onwards to Edessa, the chief seat both of Christ-tianity and of learning in Mesopotamia. As he entered the city a number of women were engaged in washing linen on the banks of the river Daisan, and as one of them looked at him more intently than seemed becoming, he rebuked her, saying, "Be modest, O woman, and fix thy look upon the ground." "It is quite right, she answered, for men to look upon the ground; for God, it they are taken, yet for the same reason I may surely look at thee, for woman was taken out of man." "If the women here," he said, as he passed on, "are so wise, what must the men be?" With some slight modification, this story is also told by Gregory of Nyssa, in his Encomium referred to above.

Not having been taught any handicraft, and having no means of living, Ephrem entered at Edessa the service of a bath-keeper, but devoted his spare time to teaching and reasoning with the natives. While so engaged one day his words were overheard by an aged monk who had descended from his hermitage into the city, and being rebuked by him for still mending with the world, Ephrem withdrew into a cavern among the ruins, adopted the ascetic dress, and commenced a life of extreme austerity and asceticism, while at the same time he also gave himself up to study, and began to exercise that wonderful facility for writing which has made him the most prolific of authors.

Of course many portents foretold his future greatness. In one, which is vouched for by Gregory of Nyssa, an angel was seen descending from heaven with a roll inscribed within and without. He asks the aged hermit for whom he supposes it to be intended, and the answer is remarkable, as shewing who were regarded as the most famous writers of the time, "Origen or the monk Julius in the land of the north." The marvellous roll was really Ephrem's commission to declare heavenly mysteries. And quickly his reputation grew, his works were diffused far and wide, and disciples gathered round him, of whom many rose to eminence as teachers, and several of whom he commemorates in his Testament.

Many years were probably spent in this way, but the growing fame of Basil, bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, inspired Ephrem with a strong desire to visit one who had been shown him in a dream as a column of fire reaching from earth to heaven. The Acts, however, represent him as travelling first into Egypt, and though there is no corroborative evidence, still it is not in itself improbable, as Egypt was the favourite home of multitudes of ascetics such as Ephrem himself. His narrative exceeds the bounds of probability when it represents him as having spent eight years there, as having been divinely gifted with the power of speaking the Egyptian language, and as having not only reasoned against Arianism in the vernacular tongue, but as having even composed in it expositions and discourses.

This reference to Cæsarea rests upon sure evidence, as it is vouched for by Basil's brother, Gregory, and by Ephrem himself in his Encomium on Basil. Accompanied by an interpreter, he arrived there on the eve of the Feast of the Epiphany, and so deficient were the people a hospitality that they allowed Ephrem and his companion to spend the night in the streets. The next morning they took their place in an obscure corner of the church, and Ephrem groaned in spirit as he saw Basil seated in a magnificent pulpit, arrayed in bright and shining garments, with a mitre sparkling with jewels on his head, and surrounded by a multitude of clergymen with almost equal splendour. "Alas!" he said to his interpreter, "I fear our labour is in vain. For if we, who have given up the world, have advanced so little in holiness, what spiritual gifts can we expect to find in one surrounded by so great pomp and glory?" But when Basil began to preach, it seemed to Ephrem as though the Holy Ghost, in shape like a dove, sat upon his shoulder, and suggested to him the word. From time to time the people murmured their applause, and Ephrem twice repeated sentences which had fallen from the preacher's lips. Upon this Basil sent his archdeacon to invite him into his presence, which, offended at the saint's ragged attire, he did reluctantly, and only after he had been twice bid to a sumptuous dinner. After embracing another with many florid compliments Basil asked him how it was that knowing no Greek he had twice cheered the sermon, and repeated sentences of it to the multitude? And Ephrem answered, "It was not I who praised and repeated, but the Holy Ghost by my mouth."

Shortly afterwards the same miracle was repeated which has already been told of him in Egypt. Under pressure from St. Basil he had consented to be ordained deacon, while his disciple, the interpreter, was admitted to the priesthood. When Basil had laid his hands upon him, being suddenly endowed with the knowledge of Syriac he said to Ephrem in that tongue, "O Lord, bid him arise," upon which Ephrem answered in Greek, "Save me, and raise me up, O God, by thy grace."

But in an age when Greek was the current language of the learned we cannot imagine an able man like Ephrem travelling about with an educated companion, and not picking up some slight acquaintance with it. He had grown also to eminence as a teacher at Edessa, a place famous for its schools: and as a commentator also he must have felt the need of some knowledge of the New Testament, and of the Septuagint, though the loss of his exposition of the former deprives us of the means of testing the extent of his learning, which seems to have been real, though perhaps not very great. We may add that Ephrem also speaks of himself as a priest, though all external authorities conspire in calling him only a deacon. The value of the story lies in the general testimony it bears to Ephrem being an uneducated man. Even upon this we must not lay too much stress. We shall endeavour, however, in due time to gather from his own writings evidence as to the extent of his knowledge both of Greek and Hebrew.

Two instances are given in the Acts of the

---

* In Opp. Epp. iii. 481 n, Ephrem says, "Christ gave me the talent of the priesthood, and I, in my reverence, hid it in the ground." Vossius always speaks of him as a presbyter, but in opposition to his own chief authorities.
Influence of Ephrem's teaching on the mind of St. Basil. It had been usual at Caesarea in the Doxology to say Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, to the Holy Ghost; but after Ephrem's visit Basil inserted the conjunction and before the third clause. Whereat the people in church murmered and forestook him from their displeasure at his interference with so familiar a formula by saying that his Syrian visitor had taught him that the insertion of the conjunction was necessary for the more clear manifestation of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. The other instance is as follows: In Gen. i. 2, the Septuagint has “Spirit of God brooded upon the surface of the water.” In this sense St. Basil had understood it, but the Peshito-Syriac version renders it, “The Spirit of God brooded upon the face of the waters,” which Ephrem explained of the Spirit resting upon them with a warm and fostering influence as of a hen sitting upon her nest, and so endowing them with the power of life, and making them crowded with life. In the loose phraseology of Benedict St. Basil is made to talk of the affinity between Syriac and Hebrew, and so on. Really he gives two reasons for trusting his Syrian friend. The first, that Ephrem led very ascetic life; “for in proportion as a man abandons the love of the world, so does he excel in that perfection which rises above the world.” The second reason is more in accordance with modern notions. “Ephrem,” says St. Basil, “is an acute thinker, and has a thorough knowledge of the divine philosophy,” i.e. of the general sense of Holy Scripture. There is nothing to suggest that any appeal was made to the Hebrew, though as a matter of fact the Syriac and Hebrew words are the same; and curiously enough in his own exposition (Op. Syr. i. 8) Ephrem says that the words simply mean that a wind was in motion; for the waters were instinct, he argues, with no creative energy till the fourth day. 4

From Caesarea Ephrem was recalled to Edessa by the news that the city was assailed by numerous heresies. On his journey he rescued the people of Samoanta from the influence of false teaching by a miracle, and on reaching home took the step which has made his name so famous, of encountering heresy by teaching orthodoxy in hymns. The fatalistic tenets of Bardean, a Gnostic who flourished at the end of the 2nd century, had been embodied in a hundred and fifty psalms, a number fixed upon in irreverent imitation of the Psalter of David. His son Honorius had set these hymns to music, and so sweet were both the words and tunes that they were known by heart to the very girls and children, and sung by them to the sound of the guitar. To combat their influence Ephrem both composed numerous hymns himself, and trained young women, who were aspirants after the conventual life, to sing them in chorus. These hymns have no rhyme, nor do they scan, but are simply arranged in parallel lines, containing each, as a rule, seven syllables. 5 Their poetry consists in their elevated sentiments, and richness of metaphor, but their regular form was an aid to the memory, and rendered them capable of being set to music. The chosen subjects of these hymns were the Life of our Lord, including His Nativity, Baptism, Fastings, Passion, Resurrection and Ascension. He wrote also on Repentance, on the Dead, and on Martyrs. Upon the Festivals of our Lord, we read, on the first days of the week, and on the days kept in honour of martyrs, Ephrem gathered round him his choirs, and so well had he instructed his singers in the variousmodulations of music, that the whole city flocked together to hear them, and the poems of Bardesnian lost their influence.

While thus occupied Basil endeavoured to prevail upon him again to visit Caesarea, intending on his arrival to make him a bishop, but the saint even feigned madness rather than consent. Meanwhile, Ephrem went on channelling his talent for his subjects the devastation committed by the Persians, the Maccabees, the Tetrarchy of Constantine, and so on, until the accession of Julian to the throne ruddy disturbed his studies. On his expedition against the Persians Julian had advanced as far as Haran, a town so famous for its obstinate adherence to heathenism, that Haranites in Syriac is equivalent to pagan, and there he determined to hold a great sacrifice, to which he commanded the Edessenes to send chosen citizens to do him homage, and grace by their presence his restoration of the old cult. But the emperor's messengers were met with such fierce opposition on the part of the people, and such an eager desire for martyrdom, that the embassy withdrew in haste, and Julian threatened Edessa with bitter vengeance upon his return. And now Ephrem, who had exerted himself to the utmost in this crisis, resumed his hermit life, quitting the mountains only for controversy with heretics or for services of a more charitable nature.

As a controversialist, Gregory of Nyssa relates of him with the utmost approbation that an act entirely contrary to modern views of morality. The "insane and irrational Apollinaris" had written a treatise in two volumes containing much that was contrary to Scripture. These volumes he had entrusted to the charge of a lady at Edessa, from whom Ephrem obtained a loan of them by pretending that he was a disciple of Apollinaris, and was preparing to defend his views. But before returning them he glued the leaves together, and then challenged the heretic to a public disputation. Apollinaris accepted the challenge only so far as to consent to read from these books what he had written, declining more on account of his great age. They met, but when he endeavoured to open the books he found the leaves so firmly fastened together that the attempt the success, and he withdrew mortified almost to death by his opponent's unworthy victory.

Far more creditable is the last act recorded.

4 This, which is the Jewish interpretation, is the only one ascribed to Ephrem by Bar-Hebraeus in his Gunv of Myriarchs; and in Basil's own treatise on the Hexameron, Hom. 2, all that is said is that Ephrem told him that the word meant "fostered," and not "was borne."

5 Ephrem also uses metres of four syllables, of five, and of lines of varying length. For discussions upon Ephrem's versification, see the works of Hahn, of Zingerle, and of Burgers.

6 Extant in the Carmina Nisibena: see below.
of Ephraim's earthly labours. While withdrawn in his rocky cavern he heard that Edessa had been visited by a severe famine. Leaving his seclusion he came down to the city, and so wrought upon the minds of the richer citizens that they brought out their secret stores of food, on condition, however, that Ephraim should himself take charge of them. He did so, and managed what was given him with such skill and prudence, as well as honesty, that it sufficed not merely for the Edessenes, but for numerous strangers also. The next year was one of great plenty, and Ephraim resumed his solitary life amidst the prayers and gratitude of all classes.

His death followed shortly afterwards, fully foreseen by himself, as his Testament proves. In this hymn written in heptasyllabic metre, after playing upon his own name and professing his faith, he commands his disciples not to bury him beneath the altar, nor in a church, nor amongst the martyrs, but in the common burying-ground of strangers. They were to wrap him in no mantle of silk, but bury him in his gown and cowl, with no spices nor waxlights, but with their prayers. The rest is too long for quotation. Ephraim was buried with an account of Lamprotata, daughter of the prefect of Edessa, who earnestly sought permission to be buried in due time at Ephraem's feet. In consenting to some extent to her request, the saint commanded her and her friends never again to permit themselves to be carried in litters on men's shoulders, because such a thing was degrading to those of whom the apostle had said that the head of every man is Christ.

The works of Ephraem were most voluminous. Sozomen (Eccl. Hist. iii. 16) says of him that he wrote three million lines (three hundred times ten thousand), but a large proportion of them has perished. For at the time when so great activity prevailed in gathering manuscipts for the Vatican, an Egyptian vessel laden with books for pope Clement XL unfortunately sank in the Nile, and many of Ephraem's writings were lost, and others rendered illegible. The general character of what remains is briefly but aptly said by Bellarmine to be "pious rather than learned." The great edition of his works is that in six volumesfolio, published at Rome in 1732–43, under the editorship of the Maronite Peter Mobarek, better known by the Latin translation of his surname Benedict, and completed after his death by J. S. E. Asseman, titular bishop of Apamea, who is answerable however for the translation of only vol. vi. pp. 425–687. The first three volumes consist of sermons and discourses in Greek with a Latin translation; many of these are probably genuine, for Sozomen says that already in his lifetime works of Ephraem were translated into Greek, and as both Chrysostom and Jerome were acquainted with them, and Gregory of Nyssa quotes his Testament, it is certain that several of his writings were very soon thus made available for general use. But among them are pieces which must be received with caution, and one, for instance (Opp. Gr. ii. 356 sq.), arranged after the order of the Greek alphabet, can scarcely be genuine. The idea that Ephraem himself wrote discourses in Greek is to be altogether rejected. As there is generally a slavish adherence to the Septuagint version in these Greek works, we must suppose that the translation was as loose as that of Benedict himself. Certainly, the translation of his Testament into Greek (vol. ii. 230–247) is inaccurate and periphrastic in the extreme, and as the object of Ephraem's writings is edification, the translators may have thought that it was best to use the version that was generally received. These three volumes are however but a sample of the numerous works ascribed to Ephraem existing in translations into Latin, Greek, Arabic, and Armenian, some published and some unpublished, and which are to be found in most of the great libraries of Europe. In due time many of these may be useful in giving us a critical edition of his writings.

The three other volumes of the Roman edition contain Syriac works of Ephraem, the most important of which is his Exposition of the Old Testament. Though affirmed in the Acta to be the earliest of his writings, it is really one of the latest, for he says in the preface that when asked to write a commentary on Genesis he declined, because it would only be to repeat what he had said before in his homilies and hymns. The text of this commentary occupies 115 pages, but is followed by a second taken from another manuscript, arranged as a catena by a monk of Edessa named Severus. In this form a large portion of it consists of passages taken from the writings of James, bishop of Edessa, and the rest is full of interpolations, of notes, and of additions intended to correct Ephraem's views, probably by Severus himself. Besides this double commentary on Genesis, vol. i. contains expositions upon the other books of the Pentateuch, on Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings; in vol. ii. we have Job, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Micah, Zechariah, and Malachi, occupying pp. i–315. The exposition of Lamentations consists only of two notes extracted from a catena of Severus. From the Bibliotheca Orientalis of J. S. Asseman (l. 70, 71) we learn that commentaries in Syriac by Ephraem upon the other prophets are to be found among the manuscripts of the Vatican, and Ebed Jeu, bishop of Soba, ascribes to him a commentary on the Psalms (ib. iii. i. 83), of which some remains in Greek exist in Cod. Vat. Dec. (G. i. 157). Of the commentary upon the Gospels few traces remain, but Dionysius Barsalibi, bishop of Amid, says that Ephraem had followed in it the order of the Diatessaron of Tatian. As copies of Dionysius's own commentary exist in the British Museum, the Bodleian Library, and elsewhere, some portions of Ephraem's work, as well as some idea of Tatian's arrangement, might be obtained from it. An Armenian translation of the commentary on St. Paul's epistles may be found in the third volume of a collection of Armenian translations of Ephrem's works, published in four vols. octavo by the Mejjitarists at Venice in 1836. The commentary are twelve metrical expositions of portions of Scripture, such as the creation of man in God's image, the temptation of Eve, the translation of Enoch, &c., occupying pp. 316–319. Some of these, especially that upon the mission of Jonah and the repentance of the Ninivites, have been translated into English by the Rev. H. Burgess, London, 1856, the author also of Select Metrical Hymns and Homilies of Ephrem Syrus; two vols. London, 1853.

---

\[a\] The first important publication of works of Ephraem extant in Greek was that of Gerhard Voss in three folio volumes at Rome in 1649, and often republished afterwards. It contains, however, only a Latin translation of them. The first publication of a Greek text was that of Thwaites at Oxford, in folio, 1709. It contains 94 discourses collected out of eighteen MSS. in the Bodleian Library.

\[b\] Cardinal Wiseman, Hor. Syl. 157 sq. has affirmed, not without probability, that all we have really consists only of extraneous remains. This criticism is supported by the remark of Lengoreto, De Ephra. Socr. Artis Her. p. 93, note, that whole chapters are often passed by without a single observation, though full of interesting matter.

These expositions are followed by thirteen metrical homilies upon the Nativity, pp. 396–436. Assenev says, however (B. O. i. 80), that in Cod. N. S. viii. fifteen (or really twenty-seven) such hymns exist, and as they possess much poetical and imaginative power, and, as they are not inferior to the most learned, it is to be hoped that the rest may soon be published.

Next come fifty-six homilies against false doctrines (pp. 437–560), leveled chiefly against Bardean, Maron, and Manes. Some use has been made of these by Hahn, and also by Cursius (com. on Isaiah, ii. 339 sqq.) and others.

In vol. iii. after the Acta S. Ephraemi (i.–xiiii.) the first place is held by eighty-seven homilies on the Faith, in answer to freethinkers. The last seven are called sermons upon the Pearl, which Ephrem takes as an emblem of the Christian faith, and works out the idea with great beauty, though with that diffuse style which is the common fault of his writings. Three very long controversial homilies (pp. 164–208) follow, repeating many of the thoughts urged in the previous eighty-seven.

A sermon against the Jews, preached on Palm-Sunday (pp. 209–224), has been translated by the Rev. J. B. Morris into English.

Eighty-one funeral hymns succeed (pp. 225–309) to be used at the burial of bishops, presbyters, deacons, monks, princes, rich men, strangers, matrons, women, youths, children, in time of plague, and some for general use. Translations of these will be found, into English in Burgess's Select Metrical Hymns, into German by Zingerle, in the fourth volume of his Translation of Select Works of Ephrem, six vols., Innsbruck, 1851–45; and into Italian by Paggi and Lasario, Florence, 1851. These are some of the most striking of Ephrem's poems, containing passages upon the horror of death, the ravages of pestilence, the punishment of the lost, the pains of hell, the blessedness of faith, the love of the Redeemer, of great power and eloquence, as these are the subjects which most strongly influenced his imagination. Some, however, of these hymns are mere compilations for liturgical use, notably the first six, (see Beckell, Carm. Nis. p. 6).

Next come four short homilies on Free-will (pp. 359–360), partly following the order of the Syriac alphabet; then seventy-six homilies on Repentance (pp. 367–501), being chiefly earnest exhortations to this duty. Next, twelve sermons on the Paradise of Eden (pp. 502–508), and finally eighteen sermons on miscellaneous subjects (pp. 509–517).

Considerable activity has been displayed in recent years in editing other Syriac works of Ephrem, as, for instance, by Dr. J. J. Overbeck, in 5. Ephraemi Syri, Rabulae, Balaei, aliorumque Opera Selecta, Oxonii, Clarendon Press, 1865. This selection contains a Discourse against Julian, Hymns, Select Homilies against False Doctrines, against Hypatius, Marxism, Manichaeism, and Bardesane; Expositions on Adam's Fall, on being created mortal, on Satan's Fall, on the coming of the Holy Ghost and the Gift of Tongues, on the Love of Supremacy, a Letter to the Tyrians, Selections from a Discourse against Bardesane, and finally Ephrem's Testament, extant also in the Roman and the Syriac, in Opp. Gr. ii. 395–410, and in the loose Greek translation referred to above.

Almost more important is "S. Ephraemi Syri Carmina Nisibena," edited by Dr. G. Bickell, Lipsiae, 1866.

Of these hymns, the first twenty-one treat of the long struggle between Sapor and the Romans for the possession of the city of Nisibis, beginning with its siege in a. c. 350, and carrying down its fortunes to the year 363, but stopping short of its miserable surrender by Jovian at a later period of the same year. The next five hymns have perished; in the next five, 36–30, the scene is changed to Edessa, and the subject is the sacrifice made by the Edessenes in the Holy and the Body of Haran, a. c. 361–370. Bickell considers that these were written about a. c. 370, and therefore towards the close of Ephrem's life. Hymns 31–34 treat of Haran and the many troubles which its bishop Vitius had to endure from the pagans there. The other hymns (35–77) treat of the Overthrow of Death and Satan by our Lord, of the intervention of the Body in the restoration of the views of Bardasane and Manes, of Dialogues between Death Satan and Man, and of hymns upon the Resurrection, not of a controversial but of a consolatory character. It is evident from this enumeration that the title Carmina Nisibena is taken from the twenty-one hymns placed at the head of the collection. From the directions for singing them given at the beginning of each hymn, and the existence in most of them of a response or refrain noted in the manuscript by its being written in red, it is plain that the collection was made for liturgical use.

Bertheau edited a Syriac homily of St. Ephrem from a manuscript at Rome (Göttingen, 1837), and another from the Museum Borghianum was published by Zingerle and Mosinger in Monumenta Syriaca, Innsbruck, 1866, vol. i. pp. 4–12; in vol. ii. published at the same place in 1878 numerous fragments collected from manuscripts at Rome may be found in pp. 33–51. In most Chrestomathies specimens of Ephrem's writings are given, and that by Hahn and Siedentopf consists entirely of them.

As a commentator Ephrem holds a middle place between Theodore of Mopsuestia, who contended for the literal interpretation alone, and Origen, who cared only for the allegorical.
As Basil and Gregory were both strongly influenced by Origen, Ephraim’s independence is the more remarkable. In commenting on Lev. xxxv. 7, vol. ii. 61, he gives a statement of his method as follows: “Though the prophet is speaking of Sennacherib he has a covert reference to Satan. For the spiritual sense is usually the same as the ecclesiastical. The words therefore of the prophets concerning those things which have happened or were about to happen to the Jews are mystically to be referred to the future propagation of the church, and the providence of God and His judgments upon the just and upon evil-doers.” Benedict, followed by Lengerke, instead of ecclesiastical translates historical; what Ephraim really says is that there is first the literal interpretation, and secondly a spiritual one, which generally refers to the church. But not always. When a text is explained of God’s Providence, &c., or used for homiletic purposes, and for personal edification, such an interpretation is spiritual without being ecclesiastical. Ephraim’s habit accordingly is to give first the literal and then the mystical exposition. Some of these passages are actually fished out of Lev. 316 he explains Paradise of the human body, the four rivers being the four operations of the mind; or where on Judg. vi. 37 he says that Gideon’s fleece signifies the conception of Christ by a virgin; while the bowl into which the water is wrung out is the baptismal font, and the floor which remained dry is the world. So also his use of types is constantly overhanging, as where the stone, set up between Mizpeh and Shen (1 Sam. vii. 12), is explained as a type of Christ, the corner-stone placed between the Old and the New Testaments. But we must remember in his excurse that ancient commentators too generally delighted in ingenious and fanciful interpretations. But as a rule he also cares to explain the literal meaning, explains hard words, and gives geographical and other notes, generally valuable, though one or two are erroneous enough, as where he says (i. 171) that Dibloth was Daphne near Antioch, and the river Pison the Danube (i. 23). Throughout, however, his object is rather edification than knowledge.

As to his scholarship the question has often been asked whether he really possessed any competent acquaintance with Hebrew and Greek. Now Ephraim confessedly was not a man who had had a learned education, but he nevertheless displays considerable knowledge. Many of his interpretations of Scripture are drawn, as Lengerke has shown, from Jewish sources; but this is not surprising, for the Jews were very active in Mesopotamia in the 3rd and 4th centuries, and Nisibis abounded with those whom Ephraim calls “circumcised vagabonds” (Opp. Syr. ii. 460), but who must have made people acquainted with the current views of their nation. Subsequently his home was at Edessa, a place crowded with schools and educated people, and Ephraim was himself a teacher, and not a man to cast such opportunities away. For in Opp. Syr. ii. 316–318 in his expository homily on Gen. i. 27 he says that wisdom is not to be acquired without labour and study, and therefore he exhorts his hearers to read Greek writers, especially Porphry, Plato, Aristotle, and authors acquainted with physics like Galen and Hippocrates. He shews himself in this homily some knowledge of physical science, as also elsewhere; and generally in his discourses on fate, freewill, and so on, he manifests, without parading it, a sufficient mastery of Greek philosophy to be able by its help to refute the Gnostic errors so prevalent in the East. We need not be surprised, therefore, at what Sunni says (Hist. Eccl. iii. 10) that Basil wondered at his learning. The wonder was that one who had spent his life as a monk “in practicing ascetic philosophy” (ibid.), should know so much; but he seems to have acquired it chiefly by hearsay. And this is, I think, the key whereby to unlock the difficulties which beset the question as to his knowledge of Greek and Hebrew.

The chief places which suggest that Ephraim knew something of Hebrew are as follow. Commenting on the creation of whales in Gen. i. 21 (Opp. Syr. i. 18), he says that while they are leviathan inhabit the waters, behemoth inhabits the land, quoting not only Job xii. 15, but Ps. xi. 10, which he translates, “And behemoth upon a thousand hills.” Now these words the Septuagint and the LXX translate “cattle upon the hills and bulls.” But Ephraim’s rendering, though not correct, is perfectly possible, and must have been obtained by him from some Jewish source.

On 1 Sam. iii. 11, he explains the verb to taste of the effect produced upon the ears by the beating of cymbals, and rightly says that both the Syriac and Hebrew names for cymbal resemble the word to hear or understand.

In 1 Sam. xxi. 7 he correctly explains the word “detained” by noting that the Hebrew word Neasar signifies pressed or hidden away.

In 1 Kings xviii. 44 the note that the Hebrew word yamin rendered sea also means the south is probably an addition by James of Edessa; as also is that on 2 Kings viii. 10, noticing that the Hebrew word Taranon means “Thou hast not recovered.”

In 2 Kings iii. 4 he rightly says that the Syriac Nokodo is really a Hebrew word, and means “head shepherd.” Other instances might be quoted from his commentary on Job xii. 13 (in our version 21), and on Isa. xvii. 9, where, however, though he knows that Horeb, in our version bough, means in Hebrew a wood, he does not know that Azubah does not signify a rod, and Amir he leaves altogether without explanation.

In his Sermon against the Jews (Opp. Syr. iii. 218) he quotes Gen. xlix. 11 thus: “and his ass, my son, unto the choice vine.” But in his Commentary on the passage (Gen. 108, 190) he twice reads “his ass’s son,” i.e. the foal of his ass, and so even in this sermon (iii. 224). Now “my son” is the apparent, though not the real, meaning of the Hebrew, and the quotation is curious. Probably, however, it is only a false reading, the difference between my son and as of being in Syriac very slight, and Ephraim makes no use of nor any allusion to strange rendering.

These are the main passages in which Ephraim makes any use of Hebrew, and all might have been picked up from conversation with others. On the other hand there is a marked absence of acquaintance with the language in his commentaries as a whole. Thus, in Gen. i. 1, he explains the Syriac particle yuqadda as signifying the person... or substance of the heavens, and the person of the earth (vol. i. p. 0). In the Cateca (p. 116) this is quoted, but only to be condemned, and the true explanation is given, probably by James of Edessa, that the Hebrew word is merely a sign of the accusative case.

Thus, at first sight, the Hebrew word, in places where a knowledge of the Hebrew language would have greatly aided him, he makes no appeal to it.

The firmament, for instance, is something compact, and the cause of darkness: "For darkness does not exist," he says, "of itself, but is caused by the clouds and the firmament, which lies between them and other waters like a child in its mother's womb, or, as others say, it is itself
the womb of the universe."

So again on Gen. ii. 6. The word mist is rendered there in the Syriac version fountain, and Ephraim speculates upon its being the outflow from a subterranean reservoir into which the lower waters were gathered at the discharge of the seas; whereas, in our days, it would be an act of bursting forth, caused the flood.

No man acquainted with Hebrew could have so written.

On Gen. xi. 9, he says that Sarah was called Ischah, because of her beauty, i.e. she derives the same name from their meaning in Aramaic, as Ischah. But as it would be impossible to go through even a tenth part of the places in which Ephraim shews a more or less complete ignorance of Hebrew, where one would have expected the contrary, I shall content myself with an examination of those places where explanations are given of Hebrew or other rare words retained in the Syriac version.

In Gen. i. 1 the Peshito keeps the original words, rendering "the earth was tohu and bohu," a word, says Ephraim, "desert or empty, showing that nothing existed but the bare earth." In p. 116, Sevnuus tells us that in another copy Ephraim explained the words as meaning "fantastic," because the waters covered the earth on all sides, and water was brought in on account of the desert for man's use. These explanations were probably given from Jewish sources, but show no knowledge of the language.

The names of Job's three daughters (ch. xiii.
14) he explains thus:—The first, Jemima, signifies daylight, its Syriac meaning. Bezai, though the word is more than once rightly translated cauze, the spice, in the Septuagint, he renders a log of wood, i.e. the Syriac kasa; while Kerehappuch, the antimony-horn, or, as we should say, the rouge-box, is again explained from the Syriac
as the twisted-horn, the fast two interpretations being painfully far-fetched. In 1 Sam. viii. 5, where the Hebrew has Askorokh, in complete ignorance of this, he explains the Syriac word as meaning shady gardens. In 1 Sam. ix. 4, the land of Shalisha, triangle-land, is in the Syriac the hill of Gumare, which he renders cat-land, absurdly translated by Benedict cucumber-field.
Bose, in ch. xiv. 4, is explained as meaning slim, its Syriac signification; while Shen, a common Hebrew word meaning figure, becomes Ska in Syriac word signifying a wall or fence of loose stones. We might go on indefinitely with this examination, and always with the same result, that Hebrew names and words are explained from the Aramaic with no reference to the Hebrew, except where, as in Bethel, the Hebrew and Syriac words are the same, but with nothing to show that Ephraim was aware of their identity.

Once or twice he does appeal to the Hebrew, but only to go wrong. Thus he says that for I prayed, in Deut. xi. 18, 25, the Hebrew has I fasted. But thus I fell down, I threw myself down. I fasted is a false reading of the Syriac text. So, in Josh. xiii. 6, he says that Hamath is called Misrephoth-Maim, and that this means a gathering of waters, i.e. a lake.
Benedict inserts hot before waters to connect the name with the Hebrew root saraph, "to burn."

The Aramaic word from which the Hebrew saraph is derived has the meaning of running together, though probably derived from the fusion of metals. Ephraim knew its Aramaic meaning, but Benedict has to supply him with its meaning in Hebrew.

From his errors, therefore, and still more from his general neglect of the original language in places where he would have known the true meaning of the word or passage on which he was commenting, we conclude that Ephraim had no independent knowledge of the language, though he had picked up some useful information concerning it, probably by verbal communications with Jews; from which source also seems to have derived considerable acquaintance with Jewish expositions of Scripture.

One more passage must be quoted. Upon Ezek. vii. 17, he says, "The Hebrew has, 'All thighs shall be polluted with water.'" The Hebrew here is really the Syriac version of the Hezodla of Origen, made at a date subsequent to Ephraim's death. So manifest an interpolation confirms the suspicion that many similar notes have crept from the margin into the text.
Such interpolations are usually found appended at the end to Ephraim's own exposition.

Of Greek he also shows a very moderate knowledge, though his acquaintance with it was more real than with Hebrew. His own words in Opit. Syr. ii. 317 are to the point, as follows:

But from that time forward, after I had opened these things for thy drinking, for I am poor and destitute alike of meat and drink; but, like a bottle from the sea or drops from a cal-dron, I have begged these things from just men, who were lords of the fountain." After mentioning Moses, whose words he was expounding, he explains these just men of the philosophers and medical writers of Greece. Without much knowledge of the language, he had apparently been able at a learned place like Edessa, which shortly afterwards became even famous for the numerous translations made there of Greek authors into Syriac, to acquire considerable acquaintance with their views. It is not sheweworthy that in his controversies with Gnostics he gives Syriac equivalents for all their philosophic terms, and never uses the original Greek words.

Possibly some Syriac compendia of their writings and of those of the chief Greek philosophers were in use in the schools of Edessa.

But an example will best shew how much more at home he is in Greek than in Hebrew.
In 1 Kings xiv. 3 (Opit. Syr. i. 480) the Syriac version has, instead of cracknels, a rare word signifying sweetmeats. Ephraim notices that the Greek has grapes, and gives this as an explanation of the Syriac. But he makes no reference whatevertsover to the Hebrew word, which certainly signifies some kind of cakes, such as might rightly be called sweetmeats, but certainly is no kind of fruit.

As a poet, we have seen that he possesses merits of no common order, marred only by too great diffuseness. From his intense devotion and piety, hymns were largely adopted into the services of the church, and prayers also composed by him are found in most Oriental liturgies. His personal character deserves high praise. He was an extreme ascetic, passing his whole life in poverty, in raggedness, in humility, and also in gentleness. The latter has been denied on account of the fierce language he sometimes uses in his controversial writings. Certainly the trick he played upon Apollinaris was disgraceful, though too much in accordance with the temper of the times. But as regards those whom he chiefly assailed, the Gnostics, he had no personal feelings of antipathy against them; most of them had been long dead; but his hatred, with his intellectual feelings curbed back, like all ascetics, he bursts forth into turbulent declamations, entirely devoid of malice and ill-feeling, but giving the necessary relief to a strong but repressed temperament. We may take his words in his Testament as literally true where he says, Opp. Gr. ii. 396: "Throughout my whole life, neither by night nor day, have I reviled anyone, nor striven with anyone; but in their assemblies I have disputed with those who deny the faith. For if a wolf is entering the fold, and the dog goes not out and barks, the master beats the dog. But a wise man hates no one, or if he hates at all, he hates only a fool."

Of his other virtues, and especially of the reality and depth of his humility, there can be no doubt; as also that the Syrian church has not without reason extolled him as its greatest orator and poet, and styled him its teacher, its prophet, its pillar, and even, as its hymn writer, "the harp of the Holy Spirit." Roediger concludes his account of him in Herzog's Encyclopaedia with the following eloquent words: "His doctrines were those prevalent in the church in his day, but he sets forth not didactically in dogmatic form, but hortatively with pathos. He urges their acceptance without refining upon them. It is moral earnestness and self-denial, even to asceticism, for which he strives, while he blames and despises all seeking after worldly good. The holy Scripture in its general sense and verbal expression forms the groundwork of his intellectual activity, but he allows himself largely to amplify it in a poetical and even rhetorical manner, for which purpose he calls in the aid not merely of the Apocrypha, but of legends. He states his subject in a picturesque and lively manner, and even dramatically (not always in this respect keeping to the rules of good taste, as where, in Opp. Syr. ii. 415, he introduces actual activity, but he allows the infant Saviour); he loves exclamation, apostrophe, antithesis, and plays upon words; he piles up metaphors and images, and knows how to employ them to bring out the manifold meaning of a passage, but is occasionally guilty of exaggeration, and of using far-fetched allusions. As a rule, however, his manner is tasteful and that of a master in the art of description, and where he fails, it is from diffuseness and from overloading his ideas with eloquent words. But his words reach the heart; for they treat powerfully of human joys and cares; they depict the struggles and storms of life, and sometimes its calm rest. He knows how to awaken terror and alarm, as he sets forth before the sinner his punishment, God's right to punish wickedness, his destined condemnation; he knows, too, how to build up and comfort, where he proclaims the hopes of the faithful and the bliss of eternal happiness. His words ring in mild, soft tones when he paints the happy rest of the pious, the peace of soul enjoyed by those who cleave to the Christian faith; they thunder and rage like a storm wind when he denounces heretics, or chastises pride and folly. Ephraim was an orator possessed of spirit and taste, and his poetical gifts were exactly those calculated to give weight and influence to his authority as a teacher among his countrymen."

As such venerated him, giving him especially the title of Malaphohn, the teacher, but one of his greatest services to the ecclesiasth as a whole is the marvellous variety and richness which he gave to its public worship.

[R. P. S.]

EPHRAIM (8), ST., bishop of Mylasa is Caris, mentioned in the life of St. Eusebius, a Roman virgin of the 5th century, ecclesiasth stated (cap. iii. § 12, Boll. Acta SS. 24 Jan. ii. 600) that she died at Mylasa on the feast day of St. Ephraim, a former bishop of Mylasa, whose body lay in the neighbouring village of Luce. Leo Allatius mentions Ephraim of Caris among the hymn writers of the ancient Greek church. (Allatius, de Eccl. Eccles. Grac. Dissert. i. 20, Paris, 1649; Le Quien, Ori. Chr. i. 923.)

[CE. H.]

EPHRAIM (6) (Ephremus, Ephraemus, etc.), Theophanes gives the name, Ephraimitus, bishop of Antioch and patriarch, 527-545 A.D. The title,

Amias, given him by Theophanes, indicates that he was a native of Amida in Armenia. He devoted the early part of his life to civil and political employments, and rose to high distinction in the service of the emperor, and became count of the east in the reign of Justin I. The city of Antioch having been nearly destroyed in the years 552 and 556 A.D. by successive shocks of earthquake, and by the conflagration which broke out among the ruined buildings, Ephraim was sent by Justin as commissioner to take measures for the relief of the sufferers and the restoration of the city. The high qualities manifested by him in the fulfilment of these duties gained the affection and respect of the people of Antioch, who unaniomously chose him as the bishop in room of Euphrasius, who had been crushed by the falling buildings. (Evagri. H. E. iv. 5, 6.) His consecration is placed in 397 A.D. Moschus records (Prud. Spirit. c. 37) that his elevation to the episcopate had been shortly before predicted to him by a deposed bishop who appeared to him in a dream working for his livelihood. As bishop he continued to manifest the same benevolence, and care of the poor and exhibited an unwavering firmness and zeal against the heretical tendencies of his day. Theophanes says that he shewed "a divine zeal against schismatics" (Chronogr. p. 118). Moschus tells a story of an encounter he had with one of the pillar ascetics, a follower of Severus as the Aecaphi, in the neighbourhood of Hierapolis. This Stylite having proposed as a test of orthodoxy that they should each walk through a fire, drew back when he found that Ephraim was ready to accept the ordeal, and was eventually brought back to the orthodox faith on the bishop's casting his "emphorion" or stole into the flames, and its remaining unharmed. (Prat. Spiritual. c. 36.) He examined synodically the tenets of Syncreticus, metropolitan of Taras, who was suspected of Eutychian leanings, but who was acquitted. (Phot. Cod. 228.) In 537 A.D., at the bidding of Justinian, acting under the influence of the archipriscus (the archbishop of Virgilius, afterwards pope himself) he repaired with Hypatius of Ephesus, and Peter of Jerusalem to Gaza to hold a council in the matter of Paul, the patriarch of Alexandria, who had been banished to that city on account of supposed complicity in the death of Psino, a deacon and treasurer of the catechumens, and as well as a Nestorianist, and who was there deposed from his primatial see. Pelagius having been urged by the turbulent monks of Palestine to secure the condemnation of their Origenistic brethren, obtained a rescript from Justinian, addressed to the patriarchs of the East, requiring them to order the condemnation of the Origenist. On the advice of the emperor's command, Ephraim held a synod at Antioch, which repudiated the doctrines of Origen as heretical. (Liberat. c. 23, apud Labbe, Concil. v. 777 sq.; Baronius, Annal. 537, 538.)

He was a very copious writer, being the author of a large number of theological treatises directed against the errors of Nestorius, Eutyches, Severus, and Pelagius, and in defence of the decrees of the council of Chalcedon. In 548 A.D., he yielded to the severe pressure put upon all the bishops by Justinian, and to escape deposition voluntarily subscribed the edict the emperor had put forth condemning "the three chapters," saec potius honoris quam virtutis dilecte rerum asservationem. (Pro Defens. Cath. 6. 4.) He did not survive the disgrace of this cowardly concession, and died 347 A.D.

Ephraim's copious theological writings, and his own works, have almost entirely perished, and we have little knowledge of them save through the prolix account given by Photius (Bibliothech. Cod. 228, 229). He speaks of having read three of the volumes, but gives particulars of two only. The first of these volumes contained (1) a letter to Zenobius, a layman of Emesa, of the sect of the Aecaphi, defending the orthodoxy of the Oriental addition to the Triasion, δ ἀναφυλάξεις & φασμα; (2) three letters to the emperor Justinian; (3) two letters to Anthimus, bishop of Tarsus, to the Emporion, bishop of Tarsus; (4) a letter to a Person named Bazes, containing scriptural proofs of the doctrines of the Trinity, the Incarnation, &c., to certain monks of Nestorian proclivities, and others; (4) synodical acts respecting certain Eutychian books; (5) eight panegyric discourses delivered on Christmas Day, Maundy Thursday, and Lent, &c. The second volume contained four books, the first and last two of which were devoted to a defence of Cyril of Alexandria and the Synod of Chalcedon against their heretical opponents, and the last comprised his replies to five inquiries, more curious than edifying, proposed to him by his correspondent, the advocate Anatolius; e. g., whether Adam was of compound substance; in what Adam's immortality consisted; the prolonged existence of St. John, &c. Some few fragments of his defence of the council of Chalcedon, and of the third book against Severus, and other works, are given by Mai (Bibl. Nov. iv. 63, vili. 204) and are printed by Migne (Patrolog. xxi. pars 2, pp. 2009 sq.). A sermon of Ephraim of Antioch on the Transfiguration has been erroneously included in the works of Ephrem Syrus (Tillemont, v. p. 757). (Photius, Biblioth. 228, 229; Theophanes, Chronographia, p. 519; Moschos, Prat. Spiritual. c. 36, 37; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 507; Fabric. Bibl. Grac. lib. v. c. 38; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 733.)

Ephraim (2.)

Ephesus, bishop of Jerusalem. (Ephraim (2.)

Ephesus was born at Jerusalem in the third century. His parents were pagans, and when Ephesus came to reside in Rome he still adhered to his religion. He was appointed governor of Sardinia by Diocletian, and a short time after this he was converted to Christianity. This fact soon became known to the emperor, who at once appointed him a new governor, Julius, to supersede the former. He arrived at Rome during the once instituted proceedings against Ephesus, and finding that he was determined to stand to his Christian profession, he ordered him to be put to death about A.D. 303. He is commemorated Jan. 15. (Mart. Rom.; A.A. SS. Jan. i. 997.)

Ephesus, bishop of Beneventum, the subject of a letter of pope Leo I. to Dorus, bishop of Beneventum, March 8, A.D. 448. Paulus, another presbyter of Beneventum, had complained of the uncannonic transgression of Epiphatius above his seniors, many of whom of the first and second rank had yielded precedent. Pope Leo strongly blaming Dorus for the favouritism, praises Paulus for not going away, and is indignant with the other prebendaries for their subservience. (Leo. Mag. Epist. 18, al. 19 in Patro. Lat. liv. 708.)

Epiphanius, a martyr at Rome under Diocletian. She was arrested by Caesarion the prefect, tortured, and put to death. She is commemorated Sept. 27. (Men. Bas.; Baron. Annal. 303, 15; A.A. SS. Sept. vii. 478.)

Epiphatius (1.) This philosopher was born at Hierapolis in Phrygia. Afterwards he finds him a slave at Rome; his master was Epaphroditus, one of the courtiers of Nero. He obtained his liberty, but when or how is uncertain. In the reign of Domitian, all the philosophers were banished from Rome, and Epiphatius retired to Nicopolis, a city of Epirus. There he discoursed on morals; and one among his hearers, Arrian, preserved notes of his lectures, which have come down to our own time. He is reported to have returned to Rome in the reign of Adrian, and to have enjoyed the friendship of that emperor. Some even say that he lived in the reign of M. Antoninus, but this seems very unlikely. That emperor was however a great admirer of his works. The stories told about him evince at once his excessive poverty (at any rate as far as the extant part of his life is concerned) and the resignation and sweetness of his character. In his old age he saved the child of one of his friends, that would otherwise have been exposed to perish; the nurse whom he procured for this child, it appears, the first servant he had ever had.

Epictetus lived strictly according to his philosophy; and hence his writings have that vital power which can be attained by no other means. They have indeed the characteristic marks of Stoicism; and among those marks there may perhaps be found in them the defect, that they treat the desires which men commonly experience in the course of their life too much as aberrations to be subjugated and put down. This character does of course belong to some desires, but not to all, nor to the greater part. Again, Epictetus is perhaps liable to the charge that as he deprecates too much the desires, so he exalts too much the power of the will; he thinks it far more capable of governing the desires than, by itself, it can be.

But when these defects are admitted (and they belong to all Stoical writers, though we, following Horace, are generally disposed to exagerate them and to forget the merits of the philosopher thus criticised) it must also be said that they do but slightly mar the excellence which appears on almost every page of the writings of Epictetus. His spirit was, indeed, of a higher order than the system which he nominally followed. "A poor man, a slave, a cripple, but beloved by the gods;" such was the account which he, not untruthfully, gave of himself. A few extracts will, probably, give a better idea of his teaching than any description. The following are from the Discourses:

"When you have shut your doors, and darkened your room, remember, never to say that you are alone, for you are not; but God is within, and your Genius is within; and what need have they of light to see what you are doing? To this God you ought likewise to swear such an oath as the soldiers do to Caesar. For do they, in order to receive their pay, swear to prefer before all things the safety of Caesar: and will not you swear, who have received so many and so great favors; or, if you have sworn, will you not stand to it? And what must you swear? Never to disobey, nor accuse, nor murmur at any of the things appointed by him: nor unwillingly to do or suffer anything necessary." (1.14.)

"When one consulted him, how he might persuade his brother to forbear treating him ill; Philosophy, answered Epictetus, does not promise to procure anything external to man; otherwise it would admit something beyond its proper subject matter. For the subject matter of a carpenter is wood; of a statuary, brass; and so, of the art of living, the subject matter is each person's own life. 'What, then, is my brother's? That, again, belongs to his own art of living; but to yours is external, like an estate, like health, like reputation. Now, philosophy promises none of these. . . . But how, then, is my brother to lay aside his anger against me?' Bring him to me, and I will tell him; but I have nothing to say to you about his anger." (1.15.)

The following are from the Enchiridion:

"Seek not things to happen as you wish; but then let them happen as they do happen, and you will go on well." (T. B.)
EPITETUS (8) I., bishop of Centumcellae (Civita Vecchia) in Eturia, on the sea coast, a see which was afterwards incorporated in that of Viterbo. This bishop is found amongst those who attended the council of Arles, A.D. 514, which was assembled at the order of Constantine to inquire into the question of the Donatists. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. x. 58; Mansi, ii. 477, where, together with the bishop of Porto, he subscribed the canons after the African bishops.) [L. D.]

EPITETUS (8) II., bishop of Centumcellae, a violent Ariam, a persecutor of the Catholics, and a friend of the emperor Constantinus. Athanasius describes him (M. Arian. 307, Migne, Patr. Gr. xxv.) as a neophyte, audacious, and prepared for every evil; he narrates how Epictetus with two others consecrated Felix as pope in the place of the exiled Liberius, when three eunuchs from the imperial household represented the people in the election, as the place did the church. (Baron. 355, li. lix.; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. x. 56.) [L. D.]

EPITETUS (7), circ. A.D. 369, bishop of Corinth. He received a celebrated letter from Athanasius in reply to his request for arguments against certain errors then in controversy at Corinth. Some had maintained that the human body of our Lord was consubstantial with His divinity; others that He was a man adopted only to be the Son of God. Athanasius blames Epictetus for having even allowed these opinions to be set forth. The letter has been quoted by Epiphanius (Haer. lxxvi. p. 997), by Theodoret, Cyril, Leo, by the councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon, and by Justinian in his letter to Neman. It was early corrupted for party purposes, as Paul of Emesa found to his cost in his controversy with Cyril. He imprudently quoted a false edition, and was corrected by Cyril. (Patrol. Græc. xxvi. p. 1049, § 720; Athanas. Epist. Ad Epictetum; Ceillier, iv. 142; Gams, Novæ Episq. 430.) [W. M. S.]

EPITETUS (8), deacon of Rome, A.D. 432, hero of the condemnation of Nestorius to pope Cyril I. The pope in his constitution to the synod of Ephesus calls him and his companion the presbyter John, “my devout sons, beloved of God.” (Coelae. Pap. Epist. xx.; Patr. Lat. i. 538.) [W. M. S.]

EPITETUS (9), bishop of Diodaticanopolis, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Concil. Gener. ii. 326 b, ed. Rome, 1828.) His see town was probably the Diodaticanopolis of Thrace. He has been confused with Eliasaeus, bishop of Diodaticanopolis in Palestine. (Reland, Pansl. Illust. ii. 736; Le Quien, Or. Che. iii. 445; Gams, Series Episc. 427.) [Eliasaeus (1).] [C. H.]

EPITETUS (10), bishop of Claudianopolis (Scythium) in the province of Honorias, present at the council held at Constantinople, A.D. 536, under Menas. (Le Quien, Oriens Chrest. i. 569; Mansi, viii. 878.) [L. D.]

EPIDAUROS, bishop of Side, the metropolis of the first Pamphylia, subscribed the canons of the council of Ancyræ, A.D. 314; Pisidænsis in the subscription should be altered to Sideæns. Some MSS. have Pergamæus, whence it has been supposed that a second Epidaurus, bishop of Perga, the metropolis of the second Pamphylia, was also present. (Mansi, ii. 534; Gams, Series Episc. 450; Le Quien, Orient. Chrest. i. 997, 1013.) [L. D.]

EPIGNIUS, an African bishop, one of two legates sent by the first African council, A.D. 399 or 401, under Anastasius (Mansi, iii. 979), to the emperor Honorius, praying him to issue an edict for the protection of the privilege of sanctuary, which had long been enjoyed by the churches (Cod. Th. IX. lxi. 1, 2, 3), but which had been seriously invaded by Masceæ, during the recent rebellion of Gildo. Epignius also took an active part in the third council of Carthage, A.D. 397 or 398. (Mansi, iii. 887, cc. 42, 44; Brun, Canon. i. 130, 131.) [T. W. D.]

EPIGNUS, a disciple of Noetus of Smyrna, who came to Rome about the year A.D. 200, and there promulgated his master’s opinions (Hippol. Ref. ix. 7). He seems to have passed from the school of Hippolytus wrote having been succeeded as leader of the monarchical party at Rome by his pupil Cleomenes. But it does not appear that either of them was in formal separation from the church, for we are not told of the excommunication of any of this school prior to that of Sabelius by Callistus (Hippol. ix. 12). [CLEOMENES.] On De Rosal’s proposed identification of Epignus with Praeaces (Bulit. di Arch. Chrest. 1866, p. 69), see PRAXEAS. [G. S.]

EPIMACHUS (1), a martyr at Alexandria with Alexander during the Decian persecution; commemorated Dec. 12. They were kept for a long time in prison, and finally burned. (Eus. vi. 41; Mart. Us.; Baron. Annal. 253, 105.) [T. S. B.]

EPIMACHUS (2), a martyr at Rome with Gordianus during the reign of Julian. They were scourged and tortured, and then cast into prison; upon refusing to renounce their faith they were beheaded. They were commemorated May 10. (Mart. Rom. Vet.; Hier., Bedæ, Ad., Us.) [T. S. B.]

EPINOEA. [ENNOEA, SIMON.]

EPIPHANES, a Gnostic writer, who taught about the middle of the 3rd century, or earlier. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iii. p. 511) gives the following account of him. He was the son of Carpocrates, by a mother named Alexandria, a native of Cephalenia. He died at the age of seventeen, and was honoured as a god at Same, a city of Cephalenia, a handsome temple and other buildings having been raised in his memory; and at the new moon the Cephalenians being wont to come together to celebrate his apotheosis by sacrifices, libations, banquets, and the singing of hymns. He was prepared by his father in the ordinary circle of arts and sciences, and in the Platonic philosophy. He was the founder of the "Monadic Gnosis," and from him flowed the heresy of those afterwards known as Carpocratians. He was the author of a work on Justice, which he made to consist in equality. He taught that God having given his benefits to all alike and in common, human laws are consumable which instituted the distinction of .msan and *τύμημα, and which secure to one as his peculiar possession that to which all have an equal share. This communitistic doctrine he extended to the sexual relations. It was injustice in a man by marrying a woman, in whom he had no more rights than any one else, to claim that she should be considered as peculiarly belonging to himself. The commandment, "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife," the condemnation was absurd. It was ridiculous to imagine that the same Being could make concupiscence a part of man's nature and then issue to him the command Thou shalt not covet. Whatever may have been the origin of the phrase "Monadic Gnosis," the doctrine here described seems the direct opposite of Dualism. Instead of accounting for the existence of evil as the work of a hostile principle, this theory would represent moral evil as having no existence, but as being a mere fiction of human laws, perversely instituted in opposition to the will of the Creator.

[PAGE L 2]

We may well believe on Clement's authority, the existence of the work on Justice bearing the name of Epiphanius. Very likely he was too well informed as to his relation to Carpocratia. But it has seemed to some improbable that if he had died so young he could have held the place ascribed to him as head of the sect of Carpocratians. This perhaps may be explained by the fact that we are not told of any book written by Carpocratians, so that it may have been through the writings of the son that the sect was really extended itself. Though we never find the name Epiphanius, the sect is described by Epiphanius (Hær. xxv. p. 77) as οἱ τῶν Ἐπιφανῶν. But the honours said to have been paid to Epiphanius at Sime have appeared to many quite incredible. Dodwell (Diss. 4 in Irenaeum, §§ 29) suggests that he might have held his school at his mother's native place, and there have enrolled a multitude of disciples. But Mosheim (De Reliis Christ. ante Const. p. 370) conjectured that Clement made the same mistake that Justin Martyr is supposed to have committed in the case of Simon Magus, and imagined a heathen festival that he witnessed at Sime, and which was there known as καὶ Ἐμπαθάνει, to have been instituted in honour of the Epiphanius with whom he was then familiar. Volkmar has worked out this hypothesis with much detail (Monatschrift des wissenschaftlichen Vereins, Zurich, 1856). The God worshipped was the Moon God, nor, however, the ordinary lunar deity worshipped at the full moon, but ή Ἐμπαθάνει, the new appearing moon. The story that Epiphanius died in his 17th year mythically represents the fact that the new moon no longer exists when 17 days (or more than the half of the month) are over. And licentious community of women accompanied all moon worship. However little confidence the details of this theory inspire, we must admit the possibility that Clement may have been mistaken in supposing the Cappadocian rite to have been in honour of the Cappadocian Epiphanes.

There is a passage in Irenaeus (I. xi. 3, p. 54) which, it has been contended, gives us another specimen of the teaching of Epiphanius. In giving an account of the doctrines of some followers of Valentine, after stating the theory of Secundus, he goes on to mention the description which another "illustrious teacher of theirs" (clarius magister) gives of the origin of the primary Tetrad. In this the first principle is stated to be one existing before all things, surpassing all thought and speech, which the author calls Oneleness (αὐτοτροπία). With this Monotes co-existed a power which he calls Unity (νομότητα). This Monotes and Henotes constituting absolute unity (οὐ δὲ ἕνα ἐκεῖνο) emitted (though not in any proper sense of that word) a principle the object of thought only, which reason calls Monad. And with this Monad co-existed a power consubstantial with it, which the author calls Unit (οὐ δὲ νομότητα). From this Tetrad came all the rest of the Aeons. Pearson conjectured (see Dodwell, Dissert. in Iren. iv. §§ 25) that this "clarius magister" of the old Latin translation represented ἐνεργείας διαδοχαίος, and that this Epiphanius was a proper name, or at least that there was a play upon words referring to that name. The doctrine of the extract then, which seems an attempt to reconcile the theory of a Tetrad with strong belief in the unity of the First Principle, might well be a fusion of Monadic Gnosis, of which Epiphanius was said to be the author. Pearson's restoration of the Greek has since been pretty nearly verified by the recovery of the passage as reproduced by Hippolytus (Ref. vi. 38), where it runs ἐνεργείας διαδοχαίος αὐτοῖς. Here the word in question is plainly an adjective, and the author thus understood it, which makes (Ad. 37) "insignioris apud eos magistri." On the other hand, Epiphanius understood the passage of Epiphanius. On examining what he tells of that heretic (Hær. 32) it is plain that Epiphanius has been following Irenaeus until, on coming to the words ἐνεργείας διαδοχαίος he goes off to Clement of Alexandria, and puts in what he there found about Epiphanius. But Neander has made it almost certain that the person to whom Irenaeus really refers is Marcus. He points out that these four names for the members of the primary Tetrad, Monotes, Henotes, Moes, and Hen, which the "illustrious teacher" (ch. 11) speaks of as names of his own giving, occur again with a καὶ ἐρμηνευτη γεννημένοις in a passage cited from Marcus by name (Iren. i. 15, p. 79). The assertion of Epiphanius that Epiphanius comes chronologically after Secundus has been treated with more respect by Dodwell and others than the statements of so careless a writer deserve. He does not seem to have had any ground for his assertion except that he found in Irenaeus, after the mention of Secundus, what he supposed to be a mention of Epiphanius.

[85] EPIPHANIA (1), wife of the general Heracleus, and mother of the Eastern emperor of that name. (Theoph. Chron. A.C. 602.) (Eutocia (5.).)

EPIPHANIA (2), also called Eutocia, daughter of the emperor Heracleus by his first wife Eudocia. She was born July 7, 615; baptized August 15 by the patriarch Sergius in the church of the Deipara in the district of Blachernae at Constantinople, and on October 4 was crowned in the palatine oratory of St. Stephen. In 629 she was betrothed to Zacharias, prince of the Chazari, from whom her father had received considerable reinforcements in his wars; but I EPHINAPHNIUM

her way to be married she heard of the prince's death, and returned to Constantinople. The Chazarii were also called Gazarii, and were Turks. (Theop. Chronogr. 250 in Patr. Graec. civili. 627; Du Cange, Hist. Byzant. p. 101, ed. Venice, 1729; Baron. A. E. ad ann. 635, ill.)

[W. M. S.]

EPHINAPHNIUM (Eumæus), a niece of Chrysostom's friend Constantina, the presbyteress of Antioch. To her godly education Constantius entrusted her mother to devote especial care. (Chry. Ep. 238.)

[E. V.]

EPHINAPHNIUS (I), bishop of Salamis, in the island of Cyprus, and one of the most zealous champions of orthodox faith and monastic piety, was born at Besanduke, a village near Eleutheropolis in Palestine. The year of his birth is unknown, but we see that in A.D. 392, twelve years before his death, he was already an aged man, we may conjecturally set the date of his activity in some part of the decade between A.D. 310 and A.D. 320. Much of his early lifetime was spent among the monks of Egypt, among whom he not only acquired a burning zeal for ecclesiastical orthodoxy and the new forms of ascetic life then coming into vogue, but also came for the first time into contact with various Gnostic sects and the Nestorians. It is probably a reminiscence of life in Egypt, when he tells us that in his early youth, Gnostic ladies of seductive beauty had endeavoured to obtain his adherence to their sect and given him some of their books to read. But the youthful anchorite, successfully resisting all temptations, revealed the matter to the bishops of the neighbourhood, and caused an investigation to be set on foot, which resulted in the banishment of eighty persons (Haer. xxvi. 17). At twenty years of age he returned home and built a monastery near Besanduke, of which he himself undertook the direction. It appears that he was ordained presbyter by Eutychius, then bishop of Eleutheropolis. With St. Hilarius, the famous anchorite of the same see, Ephinius early stood in intimate relation, and at a time when the great majority of Oriental bishops favoured Arian or semi-Arian views, adhered unshaken fidelity to the Nicene faith, and its persecuted champions, Eusebius of Vercelli and Paulinus of Antioch, whom Constantius had banished from their sees. In A.D. 367 he was elected bishop of Constantinia in Cyprus, the ancient Salamis, where, for six and thirty years, he discharged the episcopal office with a zeal to that with which he had presided over his monastery in Palestine. Under his influence the whole island was soon covered with monastic institutions. With the monks of Palestine, and especially those of his own monastery at Eleutheropolis, he continued as bishop to hold uninterrupted communication; and these last were unwearied in their efforts to extend his renown for piety, orthodoxy, and learning. It soon came to pass that people consulted him on all important questions of doctrine and discipline, and Ephinius found it no difficult in convincing himself that a watchman of the church must reckon it among his chief duties to let his voice be heard in all the ecclesiastical controversies of the time. Some years after his elevation to the episcopate, he addressed a letter to the faithful in Arabia, in defence of the perpetual virginity of Mary, which was afterwards incorporated, almost without alteration in his great work, Against all Heresies. (Haer. xxviii.)

Soon after this several presbyters of Suedra, in Pamphylia, invoked his assistance in their controversy with Arians and Macedonians, by drawing up for them a detailed exposition of the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity.

Similar applications were at the same time made to him from various other quarters; by an Egyptian Christian, for instance, named Hylaphe, who himself undertook a journey to Salamis for that purpose, and by a Thracian, Conops, apparently a Pisidian, who, in his own name, and that of his co-presbyters, sought instruction from Ephinius in reference to a long series of disputed doctrines. This was the origin of his Ἀνακοροτὰ (Anacoretus) published in the year 374 A.D., being an exposition of the true faith, which he had begun to teach in the church, which, anchor-like, might fix the minds of its readers, and save them from being tossed about by the malice of Satan amid the stormy waves of heresy.

A similar occasion gave the impulse to his great heresiological work, written in the years 374 to 377 A.D., commonly called his Haeremata, on which his fame as a combater of heresy chiefly rests. He wrote this work at the request of Acacius and Paulius, two presbyters and heads of monasteries in Coele-Syria, and in it attacks with like zeal the numerous Gnostic sects of the second and third centuries, and the ecclesiastical opposition of his own time, Arians, semi-Arians, Macedonians, Athanasians, and others. Through various opinions he regards as so many corruptions of the true faith, as it had been handed down from the apostles themselves, but a merely literary activity could not satisfy his pious zeal; we find him also embracing every opportunity of personally opposing what appeared to him soul-destroying error. So, about the year 376 A.D., when Vitalis, a presbyter of Antioch, undertook a journey to Antioch for the purpose of recalling Vitalis from his error, and reconciling him to the orthodox bishop Paulinus. His utmost efforts, however, proved unsuccessful. Though not himself present at the oecumenical council of Constantinople, A.D. 381, which ensured the triumph of the Nicene doctrine in the Oriental churches, his shorter confession of faith, which is found at the end of his Anacoretus (c. 120), and seems to have been the baptismal creed of the church of Salamis, agrees almost word for word with the Constantinopolitan formula. He took no part in the synod held at Constantinople in the following year, A.D. 382; but towards the end of that year we find him associated with St. Jerome, Paulinus of Antioch, and the three legates of that synod, at a council held under bishop Damarus at Rome, which appears to have dealt with the Macedonian and Apollinaris controversies. During his residence in the Eternal City he was domiciled at the house of the elder Paula, who, under the spiritual guidance of St. Jerome, had dedicated her ample fortune to the support of the poor and sick, and he seems to have strengthened her in her resolution to forsake home and children in order to lead an ascetic life at a great distance from Rome. At the beginning of the following spring, when the bishops were returning to their sees, Paula also went on pilgrimage to the Holy Land. On her voyage to Syria she stayed with Epiphanius in Salamis, remaining there about ten days. Somewhat later St. Jerome also came to visit Epiphanius, on his return from Rome and way to Bethlehem, bringing with him a train of monks to Cyprus, to salute "the father of almost the whole episcopate, the last relic of ancient piety." From this time onward we find Epiphanius in almost unbroken intercourse with St. Jerome. In alliance with this father he began in the last years of his life those miserable Origenistic controversies, in which monkish fanaticism combined with personal hatreds and jealousies, to brand with heresy the greatest theologian of the primitive church. Epiphanius had indeed already, in his Anecoraticus (c. 54), and still more copiously in his Panarion, attacked Origen as the ancestor of the Arian heresy, in a most violent manner. It has been conjectured that his zeal in these sermons, when among the Egyptian monks, had been already filled with horror at the erroneous doctrines of Origen himself. In confirmation of this view appeal has been made to what is related in the Vita Pachomii (Bull. Acta Sanctorum, Mai., tom. iii. Appendix, pp. 25 sqq.), that St. Pachomius had not only forbidden his monks to read the writings of Origen, but that he had even intercessed with those who did so. But this was probably a mere invention for the sake of ascribing to the founder of Egyptian monasticism the glowing hatred with which St. Jerome and his circle were afterwards inspired towards the great theologian. It is contradicted by the fact of the extreme reverence in which Origen was held by these very Egyptians in the time of Epiphanius and St. Jerome. It is far more probable that the zealous confidence with which the Arians were wont to appeal to Origen in support of their doctrine directed the attention of Epiphanius to the writings of the great Alexandrine father, and in them, though held in the highest esteem by Athanasius himself, to detect the hidden sources of Arian pravity. Incapable as he was of impartially estimating the various sides of Origen's speculative theology, Epiphanius seems to have fixed his whole attention on those passages which appear to teach the creaturely nature of the Son, and which in reality did emphasize His filial subordination to the Father in a stronger way than later orthodoxy found admissible.

Origen's predilection for Hellenic philosophy he regarded as the source of all kinds of error, as well as his audacious undertaking to explain the mystical doctrines of Holy Scripture. He had also a particular aversion from Origen's allegorical interpretations and the whole idealizing tendency of his speculation, which seemed to Epiphanius to destroy the reality of the objective facts of Christian faith. The sourness of the flesh, for instance, that is of our mundane corporeity, was zealously maintained by Epiphanius against the spiritualistic conception of Origen.

St. Jerome himself had originally belonged, like the friend of his youth Rufinus, and John bishop of Jerusalem, to the warmest admirers of the great Alexandrine father. But, attacked as he now was, with remonstrances from different sides, he began out of anxiety for his own reputation for orthodoxy to separate himself with the utmost care from the heresies with which he was charged on this account. Epiphanius, moreover, on hearing that Origenism had made its appearance in Palestine himself hastened thither, in advanced old age (A.D. 394), to combat these audacious heresies. His appearance sufficed to drive the ci-devant Origenist, St. Jerome, into the camp of the opposition, and into the bitterest enmity with his old friends, who with greater independence of character refused even now to repudiate their old attachment. Epiphanius, received with all honours by the bishop of Jerusalem, proceeded at once to abuse the rights of hospitality by preaching in the most violent manner in the Church of the Resurrection. Bishop John, after listening for a time in silence, and expressing by gestures only his disapproval, set at last his archdeacon to the preacher to beg him to abstain from speaking further on those topics. When this was done, he walked by the side of John to the Church of the Holy Cross, was thronged by the people, as St. Jerome tells us, who pressed upon him from all sides with tokens of veneration; those thought themselves happy who were able to touch the hem of his garments or to kiss his feet. Mothers held up their little ones before him to receive his blessing. This blessing became the greater that Epiphanius stood still. This homage was possibly spontaneous or possibly artificial; however that might be, bishop John, irritated as he was by the sermon, evidently preached against himself, reproached Epiphanius for the vanity and self-conceit which he showed in not leaving the spot where these honours were press upon him, and towards Epiphanius himself of the next opportunity to preach for his part against certain simple and uneducated persons who represented God to themselves in human form and corporeity. Whereupon Epiphanius rose, and expressing his full concurrence with what John had said, went on to declare that it was quite necessary to repudiate the heresies of Origen as that of the Anthropomorphists. He then hastened to join his friend Jerome at Bethlehem, and required the monks of that community to renounce at once all church-fellowship with the bishop of Jerusalem: they, on the other hand, entreated him unanimously to return to John. Epiphanius yielded, and went back to Jerusalem the same evening, but immediately regretting the step he had taken, and without so much as speaking to the bishop, he left Jerusalem again at midnight, and betook himself to his old monastery of Eleutheropolis. From these quarters he continued to press the monks of Bethlehem, with demands to renounce church fellowship with the Origenist bishop John, and finally availed himself of the occasion provided by a deputation, sent to him from Bethlehem, to ordain a new bishop, in a somewhat violent manner, St. Jerome's brother Paulinus, and impose him on the community, as one who should in future administer the sacraments among them. This intrusion into the rights of another bishop Epiphanius endeavoured subse-
EPHIPPANIUS OF SALAMIS

Epiphanius of Salamis, as an act of Christian charity supplying a spiritual want long felt by the community at Bethlehem, and even on the ground that the ordination had taken place in a monastery, exempt from his episcopal jurisdiction. He also alleged that he had himself empowered his neighbour bishops in Isidore and two of the "Long Brothers," who went to the patriarch, St. John Chrysostom, a formal complaint in writing against Theophilus. Chrysostom endeavoured to persuade them to withdraw their complaint, and meanwhile refused to admit them to the Mysteries till the matter had been decided by a synod, according them, at the same time, a friendly reception, and intervening on their behalf with Theophilus A.D. 401. But Theophilus, irritated by false reports, replied with an anathema against Dioscurus, and accused his colleague in Constantinople of acting against the canons, in setting himself up as judge in the affairs of another pro-

EPHIPPANIUS OF SALAMIS 151

About three hundred monks are said, at that time, in order to escape the violence of Theophilus, to have fled from Egypt. An Alexandrian synod, at which Theophilus presided, confirmed this condemnation of Origenist heresies. But the zeal of the bishops in their behalf was not without a certain measure of satisfaction. He not only continued to abuse Origen in his Paschal letters, but reporting at once to foreign bishops what had been done in Alexandria, he required them to condemn the heresies of Origen in similar terms. A synodal letter addressed to the bishops of Palestine and Cyprus (first published by Vallarsi in his edition of St. Jerome—Hieronym. Opp. tom. i. Ep. 92, p. 557) contains a long list of errors in doctrine said to have been discovered in the works of Origen. Similar writings were also sent to the bishop of Rome and other heads of the church. Theophilus wrote to Jerome that, "If he and the other bishops, theotrepi and the schismatics, had not been treated by them sharply," he had with prophetic sickle cut down the adherents of the Origenist heresy, and Jerome answered in triumphant strain—"The old serpent hisses no longer, crushed and disembowelled (devicerata); she has crept away into caves of darkness." "Still greater joy was expressed at this. More than once he expressed the idea that at an advanced age such happiness had beenfallen him, and to see what he had always himself maintained now confirmed and established by the witness of so just a bishop. "Know, my beloved son," he writes to Jerome, "that Amaelek is destroyed to the very root; on the hill of Rephidim has been erected the banner of the cross. God has strengthened me and the sickle of the TRENOWH, pro- viously church communion with the bishop of Jerusalem, and with his old friend Rufinus. In the subsequent renewal of personal strife between St. Jerome and Rufinus Epiphanius took no part. On the other hand, a few years after the close of the first Origenist controversy he found himself involved in much more the philological and ecclesiastical disturbances. Amongst the monks of Egypt, the controversy between Anthropomorphists and Origenists continued to rage, and found no end. Theophilus of Alexandria, having in the a.d. 398, directed a Paschal epistle against the Anthropomorphists, a wild army of monks from the wilderness of Scete rushed into Alexandria, and so frightened the bishop that he thought his life depended on immediate concession. From that time and onwards Theophilus suddenly appeared as a violent opponent of Origen. In the paschal epistle of the following year, a.d. 399, he hastened to controvert the heresies of Origen in the most violent manner, and even named his old friend Isidore, and with the so-called "Long Brothers," Dioscorus, Ammonius, Eusebius and Euthymius, who all enjoyed, on account of their piety and learning, the highest esteem amongst monks of Origenist proclivities, were added to the causes of strife, and inflamed the wrath of the passionate and violent bishop. Isidore and two of the "Long Brothers" had found a refuge among the monks of the Nitrian mountains. Theophilus followed them into the wilderness, assembled there a number of bishops, who under his influence condemned them as erroneous teachers, and persuaded the secular authorities to issue a decree for the banishment of Origenists.

According to another account, he accused him, as he himself states, that Anthrapomorphis in this controversy little or no support from other bishops. He returned to his Cyprian diocese, and was followed thither by his newly ordained presbyter Paulinianus. In this way, the main point in dispute between bishop John and the monks of Jerusalem was set at rest, and St. Jerome, as if from lands of personal and provisionally church communion with the bishop of Jerusalem, and with his old friend Rufinus. In the subsequent renewal of personal strife between St. Jerome and Rufinus Epiphanius took no part. On the other hand, a few years after the close of the first Origenist controversy he found himself involved in much more the philological and ecclesiastical disturbances. Amongst the monks of Egypt, the controversy between Anthropomorphists and Origenists continued to rage, and found no end. Theophilus of Alexandria, having in the year a.d. 398, directed a Paschal epistle against the Anthropomorphists, a wild army of monks from the wilderness of Scete rushed into Alexandria, and so frightened the bishop that he thought his life depended on immediate concession. From that time and onwards Theophilus suddenly appeared as a violent opponent of Origen. In the paschal epistle of the following year, a.d. 399, he hastened to controvert the heresies of Origen in the most violent manner, and even named his old friend Isidore, and with the so-called "Long Brothers," Dioscorus, Ammonius, Eusebius and Euthymius, who all enjoyed, on account of their piety and learning, the highest esteem amongst monks of Origenist proclivities, were added to the causes of strife, and inflamed the wrath of the passionate and violent bishop. Isidore and two of the "Long Brothers" had found a refuge among the monks of the Nitrian mountains. Theophilus followed them into the wilderness, assembled there a number of bishops, who under his influence condemned them as erroneous teachers, and persuaded the secular authorities to issue a decree for the banishment of Origenists.

About three hundred monks are said, at that time, in order to escape the violence of Theophilus, to have fled from Egypt. An Alexandrian synod, at which Theophilus presided, confirmed this condemnation of Origenist heresies. But the zeal of the bishops in their behalf was not without a certain measure of satisfaction. He not only continued to abuse Origen in his Paschal letters, but reporting at once to foreign bishops what had been done in Alexandria, he required them to condemn the heresies of Origen in similar terms. A synodal letter addressed to the bishops of Palestine and Cyprus (first published by Vallarsi in his edition of St. Jerome—Hieronym. Opp. tom. i. Ep. 92, p. 557) contains a long list of errors in doctrine said to have been discovered in the works of Origen. Similar writings were also sent to the bishop of Rome and other heads of the church. Theophilus wrote to Jerome that, "If he and the other bishops, theotrepi and the schismatics, had not been treated by them sharply," he had with prophetic sickle cut down the adherents of the Origenist heresy, and Jerome answered in triumphant strain—"The old serpent hisses no longer, crushed and disembowelled (devicerata); she has crept away into caves of darkness." "Still greater joy was expressed at this. More than once he expressed the idea that at an advanced age such happiness had beenfallen him, and to see what he had always himself maintained now confirmed and established by the witness of so just a bishop. "Know, my beloved son," he writes to Jerome, "that Amaelek is destroyed to the very root; on the hill of Rephidim has been erected the banner of the cross. God has strengthened me and the sickle of the TRENOWH, pro- viously church communion with the bishop of Jerusalem, and with his old friend Rufinus. In the subsequent renewal of personal strife between St. Jerome and Rufinus Epiphanius took no part. On the other hand, a few years after the close of the first Origenist controversy he found himself involved in much more the philological and ecclesiastical disturbances. Amongst the monks of Egypt, the controversy between Anthropomorphists and Origenists continued to rage, and found no end. Theophilus of Alexandria, having in the year a.d. 398, directed a Paschal epistle against the Anthropomorphists, a wild army of monks from the wilderness of Scete rushed into Alexandria, and so frightened the bishop that he thought his life depended on immediate concession. From that time and onwards Theophilus suddenly appeared as a violent opponent of Origen. In the paschal epistle of the following year, a.d. 399, he hastened to controvert the heresies of Origen in the most violent manner, and even named his old friend Isidore, and with the so-called "Long Brothers," Dioscorus, Ammonius, Eusebius and Euthymius, who all enjoyed, on account of their piety and learning, the highest esteem amongst monks of Origenist proclivities, were added to the causes of strife, and inflamed the wrath of the passionate and violent bishop. Isidore and two of the "Long Brothers" had found a refuge among the monks of the Nitrian mountains. Theophilus followed them into the wilderness, assembled there a number of bishops, who under his influence condemned them as erroneous teachers, and persuaded the secular authorities to issue a decree for the banishment of Origenists.
vines, whereupon the "Long Brothers" presented their complaint to the emperor Eutocia, who called upon the bishop of Alexandria to answer in person for himself at Constantinople. Theophilus made the most strenuous efforts to gain the assistance of the aged Epiphanius. He had already, on hearing of the arrival of the monks in Constantinople, called upon Epiphanius to pass judgment upon Origen and the worthless heresy, by means of a Cypriot synod, to inform the bishops of the neighbouring provinces of what had taken place in Egypt, and, above all, to forward the Alexandrine synodal decree to Constantinople by the hands of a trustworthy messenger. Epiphanius complied with his usual zeal; assembled a synod, at which he prohibited the works of Origen, and called on Chrysostom to do the same. He was then moved by Theophilus, as an ancient combatant of heresy, to appear personally at Constantinople, while Theophilus intentionally delayed his own departure. The astute plan succeeded. In the winter of the year 402 A.D. Epiphanius set sail for the imperial city, convinced that only his appearance was required to destroy the last remains of the Origenistic poison. Meanwhile a party at court which had long been displeased with Chrysostom's administration, were earnestly endeavouring to make use of the opportunity for deposing the stern detector of moral evils. This opportunity appeared to be given by the arrival of a bishop with such a name for piety as Epiphanius. The object was to make use of the approaching council in order to pass judgment less upon Theophilus than upon Chrysostom himself. Full of suspicion against the protector of the Origenistic heretics, Epiphanius, accompanied by several of his clergy, landed in the neighbourhood of Constantinople. His first step was, at the request of some fanatical monks of the party of Theophilus, to ordain a deacon in a monastic church. Notwithstanding this breach of the canons Chrysostom sent the whole of his clergy to give him the most honourable reception possible at the gates of the city, with a friendly invitation to take up his abode in the episcopal residence. This was rudely refused by the passionate old man, who declared himself unable to hold church communion with Chrysostom until he had expelled the "Long Brothers" from the metropolis, and had subscribed a condemnation of the writings of Origen. This Chrysostom gently declined with reference to the synod about to be holden, whereupon Epiphanius at once assembled the bishops, who had already gathered in considerable numbers at Constantinople, and by means of his own provincial council against the writings of Origen, and required them all to subscribe them. Some of the bishops present consented willingly to do this, others, on the other hand, like the Scythian bishop, Theotimus, steadfastly refused. Whereupon the opponents of Chrysostom urged Epiphanius to come forward at the service in the Church of the martyrs, and open the doors to the people to preach against Origes, the Origenists, and Chrysostom, as their protector. The latter, however, received timely notice of these intentions, and warned Epiphanius to abstain before it was too late from his passionate undertaking. The honest zealot may by this time have begun to suspect that he was but a tool in the hands of others. On his very way to the church he tumbled back, and soon after, at a meeting with the "Long Brothers," was obliged to confess that he had passed judgment upon them on hearsay evidence only, and, growing weary of the miser- able business, determined to return home as soon as possible. A legend says that he rode farrever to the bishops who accompanied him to the ship and was wont to say to the world, "I leave you the city, the imperial palace, and their hypocrisies." According to another narrative, he sent a message to Chrysostom before his departure, "I hope the- wilt not die a bishop," to which the other replied, "I hope thou wilt not return hither." Unhistorical as this narrative may be, it clothes in the form of two prophecies the fate which befell them both. Chrysostom soon after this, at the instance of the empress, was deposed from his see of Constantinople by a synod composed of his personal enemies, and presided over by Theophilus. Epiphanius died on board ship before he reached home in the spring of A.D. 403.

The end of the controversy proved so little that it had to do with any real interests of faith. Theophilus, having once gratified his thirst for revenge, made up his quarrel with the banished monks.

The character of Epiphanius is well illustrated by these last transactions. An honest, but credulous and narrow-minded zealot for church orthodoxy, and notwithstanding the repressions in which he was held by episcopal collations, and still more in monastic circles, he was often found promoting divisions, where a more moderate course would have enabled him to maintain the peace of the churches. His violence of temper too often led him, especially in the Origenistic controversies, into an ill-considered and uncanonical line of conduct; and the narrow-minded spirit with which he was wont to deal with controverted questions contributed in no small degree to impose more and more oppressive fetters on the scientific theology of his time. His contemporaries, nevertheless, regarded him as an ideal of ecclesiastical piety. His charity to the poor was loudly praised, it went so far that when his own means failed he distributed without hesitation the rich possessions of his church among them. It is related that once when all had been given away, and his steward was complaining of such prodigality, an unknown benefactor suddenly appeared with a sack full of gold pieces. In practical life he often manifested that sound common sense which in theological conflicts too frequently failed him. It is related for instance how, after the deposition of the ascetic zeal of St. Hilary by a word of genuine evangelical spirit, Hilariot, at a common meal, had refused to partake of some fish which was offered him, alleging that he never partook of anything that had life. "And I," said Epiphanius, "since I commenced monastic life have never suffered any one to go to rest with any ground or offence of his mouth." "Thy rule, my father," replied Hilariot, "is better than mine."

Less success had he with the elder Paula, whom, at St. Jerome's instance, he vainly endeavoured to persuade to relieve her physical infirmities by the use of a little wine. On Jerome's asking him what he had accomplished, his reply was, “Only this, that she nearly persuaded an aged man to abstain likewise from the use of wine.” In opposition to the attempts that were then being made to enlist pictorial art in the service of the church, Epiphanius maintained the full puritanical rigour of primitive times. Having examined on one occasion a village church in Palestine he found a curtain adorned with a picture of Christ or some saint; in sudden anger he tore it in pieces, and then promised the local presbyter to send him another curtain in its place. It was natural, therefore, that in the iconoclastic controversies of a later time the image-breakers appealed to the example of St. Epiphanius.

His learning was much celebrated, he was said to have spoken five languages, Hebrew, Syriac, Egyptian, Greek, and also a little Latin, for which Rufinus satirised him with the remark that he thought it his duty as an evangelist to speak evil of Origen, among all nations and in all times.

His frequent journeys and extensive reading enabled him to collect a large but ill-arranged store of historical information, and this he used with much ingenuity in defending the church orthodoxy of his time, and opposing every kind of heresy. But as a man attached to dry literal formulism, he exercised really very small influence as dogmatic theologist, and his theological polemics were more distinguished by pious zeal than by impartial judgment and penetrating intelligence. He is fond of selecting single particulars, in which to exhibit the abominable nature of the errors he is combating. When on one occasion his whole life was occupied in the Origenistic controversy, his refutation of the doctrine of the Alexandrine theologian is quite astoundingly superficial, a few menagere utterances detached from their context, and in part thoroughly misunderstood, is all that he has to give us by way of characterising the object of his detestation, and yet at the same time he has at least 3500000 of Origen’s works. According to Rufinus, he was much occupied in the refutation of the heresies, as Rufinus remarks, than the man had written. His credulity allows the most absurd relations to be imposed upon it; a heretic was capable of any abomination, nor did he think it at all necessary quietly to examine the charges made. He nevertheless enjoys the fame of having been, if not the most powerful champion of orthodoxy, yet certainly the most learned opponent of heretical pravities in his time, and one who, however deficient in critical acumen and orderly arrangement, had collected an enormous material for his purpose. In the eyes of contemporaries, his credulity and want of criticism detracted as little from his credit as the passionate violence of his mode of action.

The whole age regarded him as a saint; wherever he appeared, he found himself surrounded by troops of admiring disciples, and crowds waited for hours to hear him preach. Already in his lifetime all kinds of miracles were said to have been worked by him, and immediately after his death rumour said that demons had been exercised and sick persons healed beside his grave.

His biography, written in the name of Ptolemaeus, as alleged companion of the saint (printed in the editions of Epiphanius by Petavius and Dindorf), is little more than a collection of such legends. His day in the calendar is the 12th of May.

Among the writings of Epiphanius the two most important are the Ancoratus and Panarion already mentioned. The Ancoratus comprises in 121 sections a prolix exposition, full of repetitions, of the doctrine of the Trinity, as well as of those of the true humanity of Christ and of the resurrection of the body, with a constant polemic against Origen and the heresiarchs of his own time, especially Arians, Sabellians, Pneumatomachi, and Dimorites (Apollinarisians). The whole is concluded with the Nicene creed in a twofold form with various additions. Epiphanius having had a taste peculiar to himself, this work has no other interest for us than as a witness to the orthodoxy of its time. The Panarion is of much greater importance. It is so called as being a kind of medicine chest, in which he had collected means of healing against the poisonous bites of the heretical serpent. It embraces in three books, which again are divided into seven sections, not less than 80 heresies. The catalogue of heresies is essentially the same as that which he had already given in his Ancoratus (chap. 11 and 12). He begins with not less than 20 heresies existing at the time of our Lord’s birth; Barbarism, Scythianism, Hellanism, Judaism, Samaritanism, last year the third, divided again, each into several heresies; Hellenism and Samaritanism into four each, Judaism into seven, making 20 in all. Then follow 60 heresies after the birth of Christ, from the Simonians to the Massalians, and among them some which, according to the acknowledgment of Epiphanius himself, are not to be reckoned so much as heresies as schisms. Otherwise, each division into seven, every variation from the orthodoxy of the time is in his view a heresy. The extraordinary division of pre-Christian heresies is founded on a passage he often quotes (Col. iii. 11). Barbarism lasted from Adam to Noah, Scythianism from the time of Noah to the migration of Peleg and Ken to Scythia. Hellenism, he thinks, springs up under Oriental culture, and thereby idolatry proper. With regard to the various Greek schools of philosophy, which he regards as particular heresies belonging to Hellenism, and offers a complete list of them in the conclusion of his work, he shews himself but poorly informed. His communications, likewise, concerning the various Jewish sects are for the most part worthless; and what he says of the Nasarenes and Essenes (Hær. xviii. and xix.) is derived purely from respectable but misunderstood narratives concerning the Ebionites and Elkesaites. The accounts he gives of the Jewish-Christian, and Gnostic sects of the 2nd and 3rd centuries exhibit a marvellous mixture of valuable traditions with misunderstandings and fancies of his own. His pious zeal to excel all heresiologists who had gone before him, by completing the list of heretics, led him into the strangest misunderstandings, the most adventurous combinations, and arbitrary assertions. He often frames out of very meagre hints long and special narratives. The strangest phenomena are combined with total absence of criticism, and things which evidently belonged together are arbitrarily separated. On the other hand he often copies his authorities, with slavish dependence on them, and so puts it in the power of critical commentators.
to collect a rich abundance of genuine traditions from what seemed a worthless mass. For the section extending from Heresi. xiii. to lvii., from Dositheus to Noetus, he used as clue a writing now lost, but of very great importance, which is also made use of by a contemporary writer, Philastrius of Brixia, the work namely of Hippolytus, Against all Heresies. Besides this he made use of the well-known book against heresies by Ireneaus of Lyons, as a welcome mine of information. The narratives derived from both sources are often pieced together in very mechanical fashion, and hence frequent repetitions and contradictory statements are found perpetually.

In addition to these two main authorities, he had at his command many original works of heretics themselves and numerous oral traditions derived from trustworthy witnesses. Very valuable are the extracts given from an old Valentinian work (Haer. xxxii.), the Epistle of Ptolemaeus to Flora, which is quoted entirely (Haer. xxxiii.), and the copious extracts from Marcellus's gospel (Haer. xliii.). For his section against the Montanists (Haer. xlviii.) he makes use of an anonymous work on the same heresy, from which Eusebius also (H. E. v. 17) gives large extracts; in his article on the Alogi (Haer. lii.) he probably makes use of the work of Porphyry against the Christians. In the section against Origen (Haer. xlv.) copious extracts are introduced from the work of Methodius ὁ ἀναδεικνυτικός.

Several notices of heretical parties existing in Epiphanius's own time are derived from his own observation. The last main division of the Panarion (Haer. lxv. to lxxx.), which takes special care to note the different opinions of Arians, semi-Arians, Photiniats, Marcellians, Pneumatomach, Arians, Aetians, Apollinarists, or Dinoiritae, is one of the most important contemporary authorities for the history of the Trinitarist and Christological controversies since the beginning of the 4th century. Although a fanatical partisan, and therefore not always to be relied on in his statements, Epiphanius speaks almost everywhere from his own knowledge, and moreover enhances the value of his representations by the liberal communication of important documents. Of far inferior value to these historical sections are the refutations of various heresies attempted by Epiphanius. Apart from his strange fancy for calling his adversaries by the names of various animals, he has acquitted himself in a marvellous fashion in all kinds of fanatical terms of abuse, misrepresentation of opinions, and attacks on character. He takes pleasure in describing real or alleged licentious excesses on the part of heretics; his refutations proper contain sometimes really successful strokes of argument, but are for the most part weak and unhappy. The conclusion of the whole work is formed by the section ἡ ἀναδεικνυτική, a glorifying description of the Holy Catholic Church, its faith, its manners, and its ordinances. This description is of great and manifold significance for the history of the church of that time. Each section is preceded by a short summary. An Ἀνακεφαλαίωσις, the work of Epiphanius himself (preceded by a short extract from an epistle of Epiphanius to Acacius and Paulus, and followed by an extract from the section setting forth the Catholic faith), is itself an almost literal repetition of the contents of these summaries. This Ἀνακεφαλαίωσις, a work made use of by St. Augustine and St. John Damascene, seems to have circulated as an independent writing in a similar way to the oikoumenae of the Philosophumena and the summary added to Hippolytus's άνθυγμα against all heresies, preserved in a Latin translation in the Priscianicæ of Tertullian. Of another somewhat more copious epimetheus, occupying in some measure a mid-position between the brevity of the Ἀνακεφαλαίωσις and the details of the Panarion, a large fragment has more recently been published by Dindorf from a Paris MS., No. 854, in his edition of Epiphanius, vol. i. pp. 339–399, from a transcript made by Fr. Duembner (cf. also the various readings given by Dindorf from a Cod. Crypt. ferrari. vol. iii. p. 2, praef. pp. iv. to xii.).

Among the other writings of Epiphanius shall first be mentioned his book, De mensuris, et ponderibus (περὶ μετρῶν καὶ σταθμῶν), written in the consulate of Arcadius and Rufinus, a.d. 392. The title is unsuitable, inasmuch as only the smallest part of the work gives any account of bibliographical knowledge or antiquity. This book is a somewhat irregular collection of different notices, serving to introduce the reader to the Greek Bible of the Old Testament, with remarks on the accents and critical and grammatical signs concerning the origin of the Septuagint, the translations of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, the Hexapla of Origen, etc. The section on the Greek version of the Old Testament was published by Montfaucon as a work by itself, with the help of two manuscripts (Prologi. et Orig. Hexap. p. 77 sqq.), and also by Dindorf (vol. iv. part i. praef. p. viii. sqq.). The treatise De Geminis, that is, concerning the 12 jewels is the breastplate of the Jewish high priest, is preserved in only two Greek extracts, the one first published by Bode, the other in the Quaestiones of Anastasius Sinaita (chap. xi.), and in an old Latin version, incomplete towards the end, first published by Foggial at Rome (a.d. 1743). This treatise, which is preceded by an epistle of Epiphanius to bishop Diodorus of Tyre, contains bits of information concerning names, origin, nature, and use of the different precious stones, together with all manner of spiritualisations.

Further, there are two letters of Epiphanius in reference to the Origenist controversy, one, longer, addressed to John of Jerusalem; the other, shorter, to Jerome, preserved in a Latin version made by that father (found in the best form in Vallarsi's edition of St. Jerome). Among his lost writings must be reckoned an Eulogium on St. Hilarion, of which Jerome makes mention. Of doubtful origin is the so-called Physiologus, a short treatise on the nature of beasts, and with somewhat tasteless pious meditations (Pitra, S. P. V. E. S. n. Paris, 1855).

Cassiodorus (de Instr. in Literar. Opp. ed. Venet. tom. ii. p. 515) mentions a commentary by Epiphanius on the Song of Songs, of which he had caused a Latin translation to be made. This work is supposed to be identical with the mystical interpretation of the Song first published by Foggial, from a Vatican Codex, Rome, 1750. But of this work there also exists another somewhat amplified reduction, bearing the name of Philo of Carpathus, one of Epiphanius's suffragan bishops, first published with the Latin translation of Stephanus Salutis, Paris, 1537, and afterwards by Giacomelli, Rome, 1772. Further are ascribed to Epiphanius the following works: A fragment of An Exposition of the Creed of St. John (in Codexis Augustae, Novae. Bibl. Patr. tom. i. p. 300). Seventeen Apophthegmata (in Cotelierii Monumenta Eccl. Græc. t. i. p. 426) and a lately discovered tractate, containing under 102 heads a collection of passages from the Old Testament, in which the author found the history of our Lord, announced beforehand (Quasusulm S. Epiphani Si de Divina Incarnatione, ed. Steph. Ant. Mornellus, Mutiaeae, 1828). Unquestionably spurious is the work De Vitis Prophetarum, which is full of fables, and nearly related to that of Pseudo-Dorotheus, concerning the prophets and disciples of the Lord (recently published by H. A. Hamaker, Amsterdam, 1859). And so are likewise several attributed to Epiphanius.
EPIPHANIUS OF SALAMIS

The Epitome Princes is that of Basle, edited for the printer, Joh. Hervagius, by Joh. Oporinus, 1544. This edition contains the Panarion with Anacophaloseis, the Anoratus, and De Meneuris und Ponderibus. The first part of the MS. was used by Oporinus, sent him by Ersart, such a one that contained the Panarion up to p. 604, of Petaurus's edition. The second part of the MS. remains in the university library at Tena. It was written in the year 1304. The same MS. had before Oporinus been already made use of by Janus Cersarius for his Latin translation of Epiphanius, Basle, 1543. The second edition of Epiphanius is that prepared by the learned Jesuit, Dionysius Petaurus, Paris, 1622, in two volumes. It contains the Greek text with a new Latin translation, and numerous and still valuable Latin notes. To the writings contained in the epitomes, a few smaller ones are added, most of them doubtful or spurious. A reprint of this is the Cologne or rather Leipziger edition of 1892, which contains many doubtful or spurious, of the Paris MS. used by Petaurus (Bibl. Nat. 833, 835) is derived from the same source as that of Tena, but is more recently written, 16th century. To the same class of MSS. belong another Codex Membr. sec. xv. in the Bibl. Rhetoricae, at Breslau, and a Codex chart. Findemionis, sec. xiv. (127, in suppl. Kollarii, p. 738), which contains only fragments of the Panarion and of the Anacophaloseis. To another and better family belong a MS. now no longer heard of, in the Vatican (Codex Vatican.), and another in St. Mark's library at Venice (Cod. Marcian. 125). Of the former Petaurus used a collation made by the Scaliger, as is evident from the collation of the Ist Book of the Panarion (pp. 55-395, ed. Petaur.). This collation appears attached to the margin of a still existing copy of the Basle edition, which fell accidentally into Oehler's hands.

The Codex Marcianus, 125, in the year 1507, is reliance on which the brothers Coleti began to prepare a new edition, contains, alas, only the first part of the Panarion, to p. 604 (ed. Petaur.). This manuscript contains a much more original text than those of the first-named family. With its help not only are we enabled to correct innumerable corruptions and arbitrary alterations of text made by later writers, but also to fill up numerous and some very considerable lacunae. A complete collation of this MS. was first made by W. Dindorf as ground work of his edition of Epiphanius (Leipzig, 1853-1862, 5 vols. Sm. 8vo.). This, now the best edition, contains all of Book 2 of the Anacophaloseis (the Anoratus, the Anacophaloseis, the Panarion, and the De Meneuris et Ponderibus in the Greek text, De Gemmis, in all three text forms, and the two Epistles, in Jerome's translation), and beside these the spurious homilies, the above-mentioned epitome, and the Vita Epiphaniis of Polibius. Vol. iii. pt. 2, contains the critical apparatus to the Panarion, vol. v. the Annotationes of Petaurus. An appendix, which has not yet appeared, besides several supplements, not further described, is announced to contain various readings of two MSS. of the first part of the Panarion, rivaling in value the Venetian Codex, as well as the remaining doubtful or spurious writings of the same author.

The Greek and Latin edition of the Panarion by Franz Oehler, in the Corpus Harensiologicum, vol. ii.-iii. (Berlin, 1850-1861), has only made use of a few specimens of the text of the Codex Marcianus, and that for its two first sections containing the first and second books of the Panarion. The third division of the original Panarion, containing the third book of the Panarion and the Anacophaloseis adds, pp. 592-676, addenda et corrigenda, by way of making up for neglected revision of the text. The third volume contains, besides the Annotations of Petaurus, valuable contributions by Albert Jahn, to the criticism and exegesis of the Panarion. Compare reviews of both editions by Lipsius, in Litterarisches Centralblatt für Deutschland, 1859, N. 15, 1860, N. 42, 1864, N. 23. A worthless edition is that of Migne, in the Patrologia (Series Graeco-Latina, tom. xli.-xliii. Paris, 1863-64). This edition contains the Panarion, the Anacophaloseis, the Anoratus, the book De Meneuris et Ponderibus, the treatise De Gemmis, the two letters addressed to John and to Jerome, the pseudo-autographa, De Vita Prophetarum, De Numerois Mysticis, Seven Homilies, and the Physiologia. A Syriac translation (so-called) of the Panarion, which has found its way from the Nitrin monastery of St. Maria Delnara into the British Museum, appears to contain nothing but the Anacophaloseis. This last is found not only in MSS. of the Panarion, but in several other Greek Codices. A Syriac translation of De Meneuris et Ponderibus is found in two Syriac MSS. of the British Museum, Cod. add. 17148 and 4820. A number of various readings of this treatise have been published by F. de Lagarde (Philologus, 1863, 2nd series, 34), and indications of the Biography of Epiphanius are pretty numerous and scattered; beside the notices found here and there in his own writings, the reader may compare especially Socrates, Hist. Eccl. vi. 10, 12-14; Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. vii. 32, vii. 27, viii. 14-15; Palladius, Dialogus de Vita Chrysostomi (in Chrysost. Opp. ed. Montfaucon, tom. iii.); Hieronym. Catalog. Veror. Illust. 114; Epist. ad Pamnach. 38 (61), ad Theophil. 39 (62), Vita S. Hilariam, tom. iv. pt. ii. p. 72, ed. Martianay; Apol. ado. Rufin. ii. passim. Compare also Vitei' Patrum, ed. Rosweye, tou.
EPIPHANIUS OF SALAMIS

[ R A. L.]

EPIPHANIUS (2), bishop of Crata or Flaviopolis, in the province of Honorias adjoining Paphlagonia, present at the occumencal council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. (Le Quien, Orients Christ. i. 577; Mansi, iv. 1213.)

[ L. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (3), according to Iadius, the unlawful possessor of the see of Seville from A.D. 441 onwards, in which year Sabinius, the rightful bishop, was driven out. (Idat. Chron. s. vii. Olymp. 305, in Miero, Patr. Lat. iii. 831; Exp. Sagris. iv. Ann. 441.) The con quest of Seville by Rechila, the Arian king of the Suevi, in 441, probably led to the expulsion of Sabinius and the intrusion of his successor. (Exp. Sagris. iv. 137.) [Marcellus.]

[ M. A. W.]

EPIPHANIUS (4), bishop of Arce in Phoenicia. He was present at the synod of Antioch, A.D. 448. (Mansi, vi. 405; Le Quien, Orients Christ. ii. 925.)

[ J. de S.]

EPIPHANIUS (5), bishop of Perga, the metropolis of the second Pamphylia, present at the Latrocinium Ephesinum, A.D. 449, where he spoke against Flavian of Constantinople and Eusebius of Dorylaeum (Mansi, vi. 918); he afterwards attended the council of Chalcedon, and subscribed to its decrees, A.D. 451 (Mansi, vii. 140). He received a letter from the emperor Leo, and sent back a synodal reply, concerning the murder of St. Proterius and the faith of Chalcedon, A.D. 458 (Mansi, vii. 573; Le Quien, Orients Christ. i. 1015.)

[ L. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (6), bishop of Colossae in Phrygia; his name was subscribed in his absence by his metropolitan, Nunchesius of Laodicea, to the definition of the faith that was read before the emperor Marcian at the sixth session of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 165; Le Quien, Orients Christ. i. 815.)

[ L. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (7), bishop of Soli in Cyprus, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, by Soter of Theodesiana in Cyprus as his proxy. (Le Quien, Orients Christ. ii. 1072; Mansi, vii. 159.)

[ L. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (8), bishop of Cestrus, in Isauria, to the north of Antioch (Wittsch, Händbuch der kirchl. Geographie, i. 203, note 15). He was present at the fourth general council at Chalcedon, A.D. 451, and also signed the synodal epistle of the Eusebian bishops to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 402; Le Quien, Orients Christ. ii. 1025.)

[ J. de S.]

EPIPHANIUS (9), bishop of Epiphania in Syria Secunda. He signed the synodal letter of the province of Syria Secunda, addressed to the emperor Leo, referring to the murder of Proterius, and the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 523; Le Quien, Orients Christ. ii. 917.)

[ J. de S.]

EPIPHANIUS (10), bishop of Asponsa, Galatia, subscribed to the synod of the province to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458, to his enquiry concerning the murder of St. Proterius of Alexandria, and the faith of Chalcedon. The signatures are corruptly written; Julianus is called bishop of Asponsa, and Epiphanius (Eusenius) of Spona. (Mansi, vii. 616; Le Quien, Orients Christ. i. 481.)

[ L. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (11), bishop of Hierapolis (Spello), a town about three miles from Perugia in Umbria. He was present at the synod held at Rome by pope Felix III. A.D. 487. The reading Spoleitus has been corrected to Spoleto, both on the authority of MSS., and because Amasis was at that time bishop of Spoleto. (Mansi, vii. 1177; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. x. 115.)

[ L. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (12), bishop of Satalis in Lesser Armenia, subscribed the letter of his province to the emperor Leo concerning the faith of Chalcedon and the murder of St. Proterius, A.D. 458. Atalenus, in the subscription, should be altered to Satalenus. (Mansi, vii. 589; Le Quien, Orients Christ. i. 434.)

[ L. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (13), ST., bishop of Paris. We are indebted for all our knowledge of this estimable prelate to a Life of him written by St. Eansodius, who was intimately acquainted with him. He was born A.D. 438, and was from his infancy regarded with affectionate interest by St. Crispinus, bishop of Paris, who ordained him deacon at the age of twenty. Designated by Crispinus as his successor, he was unanimously elected bishop by the clergy and people of Paris in the year 467. His life was one of marked austerity and devotion; but what is most interesting about him is that he was largely employed as a peacemaker and public benefactor in the stormy strifes of the 6th century. In 469 he succeeded in bringing about a reconciliation between the emperor Anthemius and his son-in-law Ricimer; in 474 he made peace between the emperor Glycerius and Euric, king of the Visigoths. Euric was much impressed by him, and invited him to dinner, but Epiphanius, knowing that he was accustomed to have Arian bishops dining with him, excused himself from accepting the invitation. When Paris was stormed by Odoacer in 476, Epiphanius was able to save his sister St. Honorata and other women from being taken as captives. He had influence enough with Odoacer to obtain for the town a five years' exemption from taxation. His reputation commended him equally to the conqueror of Odoacer, the great Theodoric, who sent him on a mission to Gundobald and his Burgundian vassals to redeem the captives whom they had carried away from Italy. Epiphanius is said to have brought back 6000 persons, partly given up freely by Gundobald, and partly purchased with a very moderate payment. "Such deeds," observes Gibbon, "are the best of miracles." In 496 he travelled to Ravenna, to ask of Theodoric the remission of the next year's tribute. Two thirds of what he asked was granted. But the journey proved fatal to him, and he died some days after his return to Pavia, A.D. 405, in the 50th year of his age. Ennodius's Life may be found in Sirmund, tom. 1.; see also Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 1078; Bull. Acta SS. 21 Jan. ii. 364.
EPHIPANIUS—Bishops

[J. L. D.]

EPHIPANIUS (14), bishop of Beneventum, present at the first synod in March 493 under pope Symmachus at Rome. (Mansi, viii. 235; Heldt, § 220.)

[A. H. D. A.]

EPHIPANIUS (15), bishop of Mildamum (Mildamur, written also Mildasum and Mildamum) in Paphgia Salutaris, present at the council of Chalcedon; his name occurs also among the bishops signing the synodal letter of that council to Leo I. (Leon. Ep. 98, 1106; Oriens Christ. i. 841). His name appears also in the list of bishops signing the decrees of the council held at Rome in 503, but this list certainly belongs to some earlier council (Baron. ann. 503, ix.).

[G. G.]

EPHIPANIUS (16), 14th bishop of Nastes, succeeding Clematius and followed by Eume- rius. He was present at the first council of Orleans in 511. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 708; Labbe, Sac. Conc. viii. 356; Flor. 1758-88.)

[S. A. B.]

EPHIPANIUS (17), 16th bishop, 5th patriarch of Constantinople. He succeeded John II. A.D. 520 (Theophanes, A.D. 512), and died in A.D. 535, after a rule of 16 years.

He appears to have been a quiet, prudent, amiable person, living unobtrusively in strictness and regularity, and giving the council that respect due to the ecclesiasticity of his emperor. Seven years he was under the peasant general Justin; the other eight under Justinian. The contemporary popes were Hormisdas, John I., Felix III., Boniface, and Agapetus. The kings of Italy were Theodoric, Athalaric, and Theodahad, the ungrateful murderer of his queen Amalasuntha. The modern empire was hearkening to a high degree of splendour through the victories of its generals, Belisarius and Narses. Melatry was universally suppressed, heathen books were burnt, pagan images destroyed, the professors of the old religion imprisoned and dragged. At Constantinople, the zeal of Julian for a church policy was shown during the patriarchate of Ephipanius by such laws as those of 528 and 529, which regulated episcopal elections and duties. These enactments, and the passivity of Ephipanius and his clergy, are remarkable proofs of the entire absence in these times of any claims such as the clergy of later centuries assumed, an exclusively clerical legislation for the spirituality.

The chief civil event in the city was the great sedition in 531, called Nika, which arose from the celebrated quarrel between the greens and the blues in the Hippodrome. The church of St. Sophia and other public monuments were burnt. Julianus even thought of flying to Heracleae, in Thrace; but Narses and Belisarius put down the insurrection of the slaughter of 30,000 of the insurgents. Through these varied scenes Ephipanius lived. His first conspicuous office was the charge of the catechumens of the church of Constantinople. In 519, the year before his election, he was sent with bishop John and Count Licinius to Macedonia, to receive the documents "libellus," or subscriptions of those who wished to accept reunion with the catholic church, at the request of the apospraiarius of Dorotheus bishop of Thessalonica.

In 530, February 25, he was elected by the emperor Justin, with the consent of the bishops, monks, and people. He is described in the letter of the synod of Constantinople to pope Hormisdas as "furnishing in virtues, reproofs, Scripture meditations; holding the right faith, and maintaining a fatherly care for orphans; in fact, too good to be praised" (Patrol. Lat. liii. 453). He accepted the conditions after a feud between east and west concluded by the patriarch John, his predecessor, with pope Hormisdas, and ratified them at a council held at Constantinople, where he accepted also the decrees of Chalcedon. Dioscorus, agent of Hormisdas at Constantinople, writes thus:—"His beginning does not look bad, for he takes reasonably, and promises that he will keep the rules of the fathers, and, far from dissipating the unity and peace that has been arranged, will increase them. So much he promises: what he can fulfil we don't know. He has not yet asked us to communion." (Patrol. Lat. liii. 482.)

Four letters of Ephipanius remain, addressed to Hormisdas, telling him of his election, sending him his creed, and declaring that he condemned all those whose names the pope had forbidden to be recited in the diptychs. Hormisdas had written to Ephipanius, complaining that he had not heard from him, and that he had sent no deputes according to custom; that he might have congratulated him, and sent the seal which he had shown for unity. Ephipanius adopts the symbol of Nicæa, the decrees of Ephesus, Constantinople, and Chalcedon, and the letters of pope Leo in defence of the faith. His second letter was accompanied by a chalice of gold surrounded with precious stones, a patina of gold, a chalice of silver, and two veils presented in the name of the Roman church. In order to make the peace general, he advises the pope not to be too rigorous in exacting the expression of the names of former bishops from diptychs, about which the people of the see concerned might be reluctant. His excuse for the bishops of Pontus, Asia, and the East is composed in very beautiful language. The answers of Hormisdas are given in the Acts of the Council of Constantinople held under Mennas. He trusts to the prudence and experience of Ephipanius, and recommends lenity towards the returning, severity to the obdurate. Ephipanius is to complete the reunion himself. (Labbe, Concil. iv. 1524, 1597, 1545, 1546, 1556, ed. 1671; Patrol. Lat. liii. 497, 507, 523.)

The severe measures by which Justin was establishing the supremacy of the Catholics in the east were arousing Theodoric, the Arian master of Italy, to a policy of retaliation in the west. Pope John I., the successor of Hormisdas, became thoroughly alarmed, and in 553, at the demand of Theodoric, proceeded to Constantinople to obtain the revocation of the edict against the Arians, and et their churches restored to them (Marcellin. Chron. ann. 525; Labbe, Concil. iv. 1600). Great was the honour paid to him in the eastern capital. Twelve miles the whole city went out to receive him, bearing ceremonial tapers and crosses. The emperor Justin prostrated himself before him, and wished to be crowned by his hand. The patriarch Epiphanius, with great civility, invited pope John to perform mass; but the pope, mindful of the traditional policy of encoachment, refused to consent until they had offered him the first seat. With high solemnity he said the office in Latin on Easter-day, communicating with all the bishops of the East except Timothy of Alexandria, the declared enemy of Chalcedon. Nothing was omitted at Constantinople which could do honour to the pope; there was universal joy because the old men of the Greeks declared that since the days of Constantine the Great and pope Sylvester the saint, no bishop of Rome had come into "Greece." John was less happy on his return. He was thrown into prison at Rome, and died in his cell. The reason assigned is that he refused to ask that Arians who had become Catholics should be allowed to return; and perhaps he owed part of his disgrace to his excessive honours at Constantinople. Theodoric, in fact, though once just and tolerant, had now become cruel; witness the deaths of Boethius and Symmachus (Baron. 555, 8, 10; Pagi, ix. 349, 351; A.A. SS. May 27; Schröckh, xvi. 102, xvii. 214-16; Gibbon, iii. 473; Milman, Lat. Chris. i. 309).

In April, 537, Justinian was associated with Justin, in August became sole emperor. In 532 he rebuilt the church of St. Sophia. In 529 he succeeded in extinguishing the last Pagan philosophy, Neo-Platonism, by the closing of the schools of Athens. In 529, also, pagans and heretics were excluded from civil and military office; a great mass of pretended conversions followed, some sectarians put an end to their lives; the Monastists in Phrygia burnt themselves in their churches (Procop. Hist. Arcam. xi. 34-5). How far Epiphanius acquiesced in all these measures we do not know; the medlesse nature of Justinian allows us to give him the benefit of the doubt.

In 531 the dispute between Rome and Constantinople was revived by the appeal of Stephen, metropolitan of Larissa, to pope Boniface, against the sentence of Epiphanius. Stephen was eventually deposed, notwithstanding his appeal.

In 535, on June 5, Epiphanius died, after an episcopate of sixteen years and three months (Theoph. a.c. 529 in Patro. Grac. civii. 477.) All that is known of him is to his advantage.

Besides his letters to Hormisdas, we have the senatus consultum of his council, against Severus and Peter (Patro. Grac. lxxxi. 783-786). Forty-five canons are attributed to him (Assemani Bibl. Orient. 619). [W. M. S.]

EPHINIANUS (18). Bishop of Ascoli (Asculum), one of the four Italian bishops present at the synod at Constantinople, in May, 536, presided over by Mennas, the patriarch. (Manii, viii. 969; Hefele, § 250.) [A. H. D. A.]

EPHINIANUS (18). Bishop of Pitane in the province of Asia, on the Eulatec gulf, present at the synod held at Constantinople by Mennas, a.d. 536. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 706; Manii, viii. 1147.) [L. D.]

EPHINIANUS (20). Bishop of Baratta, a town in Lycaonia, whose position and exact name is uncertain; present at the synod held at Constantinople under Mennas, a.d. 536. (Manii, viii. 974; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1079.) [L. D.]

EPHINIANUS (21). Bishop of Hersedia Pontica, in the province of Honorias, present at the council held at Constantinople under Mennas, a.d. 536. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 573; Manii, viii. 974.) [L. D.]

EPHINIANUS (28). Bishop of Raphia (on the seacoast of Palestine, to the extreme south), who in a.d. 518 signed the synodical letter of John of Jerusalem against Severus (Labv. 191), and in a.d. 536 the sentence against Anthimus (Gist. 283). (Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 629.) [E. V.]

EPHINIANUS (23). Bishop of Tyre and metropolitan at the beginning of the 6th century. He was strictly orthodox, and refused to hold communion with Severus of Antioch, and rejected his synodical letters. (Evagri. E.E. iii. 23.) A letter from him and his friend Epiphanius to Theophilius, bishop of Heraclia and his synod, detailing the evil deeds of Severus, was read in the fifth day's proceedings of the synod of Constantinople under Mennas, a.d. 536. (Labv. 193-202; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 809; Baron. A. E. ann. 518, xl.) [E. V.]

EPHINIANUS (24). Metropolitan (or possibly called patriarch) of Grado, to which place the see of Aquileia had been transferred after the Lombard invasion, c. 612. "Ex illo tempore" (says Paul Diac. iv. 33) coeperunt duo esse patriarches. The earlier metropolitans had been in schism with Rome on the subject of the three chapters, but Candidianus, the predecessor of Epiphanius at Grado, had made peace with Rome. At Aquileia itself, however, with the consent of the Lombard king and Gisulf, duke of Friuli, a metropolitan (or patriarch) was appointed. Probably the name of patriarch was usurped by the bishops of Aquileia, and therefore allowed by the pope to the bishops of Grado. See the Chronic. Patri. Grad. Moret. Egitani Latiari. 1878, p. 295. Those who think the patriarchs of Aquileia are spoken of as schismatics, in the year 707 the schism was finally brought to a close by a synod at Aquileia. See Paulus Diac. vi. 14, quoted from Bede. The two patriarchs of Aquileia and Grado—with no powers really beyond those of metropolitans—had controversy as to their rival jurisdictions. Their limits were ultimately defined by Leo IX. in the 11th century. (Wiltsh. Handbuch der kirch. Geog. Engl. transl. vol. i. p. 296; Hefele, § 283.) [A. H. D. A.]

EPHINIANUS (25). Bishop of Albaneum (Albano), at the first Lateran council, a.d. 498. (Manii, x. 895; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 250.) [L. D.]

EPHINIANUS (26). Commonly called the Younger, bishop of Constantinople or Salamin, the metropolis of Cyprus, in the latter half of the 7th century. He was represented at the council of Constantinople, a.d. 680, by Theodorus of Stratoniceus, Stratoniceus of Selii, and Tycho of Citrus. Several of the discourses printed in the collected works of his eminent namesake and predecessor are suspected to be his, as also is a treatise "in Hexameron," which is still in MS. (Fabric. Biblioth. Gr. ed. Harles, i. 94; ii. 113, 129; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 1038, et seq.; Epiphanius (9), Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biogr. ii. 38 n.) [T. W. D.]

EPHIPPUS (27), bishop of Euchaita in Helenopolus. His name is found both in the subscriptions to the canons of the sixth general council, A.D. 580, and in those of the "Trullan" or Quinisext symod, A.D. 692. (Mansi, xii. 693, 992; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 543.) [L. D.]

EPHIPPUS (28), bishop of Selymbria (Sadokopolis) in Thrace, following Georgius, who was bishop in 692. He took part in the Iconoclastic controversy, according to Suidas, and wrote an useful work against the image-burners. (Index Scriptorum, ap. Migne, Patrol. Græc. cxxv. 1258.) [J. de S.]

EPHIPPUS (29) (Theophanus), bishop of Silva Candida, not far from Rome, on the Via Aurelia, an episcopal seat combined in later times with Portus. This bishop lived during the pontificate of Zacharias, and was present at the councils held at Rome A.D. 743 and 745. (Mansi, xii. 387, 388; Hefele, § 387; Ughelli, Italia Sacra, ii. 91.) [L. D.]

EPHIPPUS (30), bishop of Perugia, subscribed a letter of pope Paul I. in June 761, to the abbot John about the privileges of the monastery of St. Stephen and St. Silvester in Rome. (Mansi, xii. 649; Jaffé, Regesta Pont. viii.) [A. H. D. A.]

EPHIPPUS (31), bishop of Mileto, present at the seventh general council, A.D. 787, when he signed, not among the Carian bishops, but among the archbishops, as if he claimed the metropolitan chair; whilst Theophylactus, a deacon, signed as locum tenens for the bishop of Nauplius (Aphrodisian), the proper metropolitan of Caria. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 919; Mansi, xii. 1093.) [L. D.]

EPHIPPUS (32), bishop of Porta in Lyconia, present at the second Nicene council, A.D. 787. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1088; Mansi, xii. 998 n.) [L. D.]

EPHIPPUS (33), bishop of Lappa, in the west of Crete. Present at the council of Nicaea, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xiii. 735; Or. Christ. ii. 268.) [J. de S.]

EPHIPPUS (34), bishop of Eleutheriana, in central Crete, present at the seventh general Council at Nicaea, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xiii. 391 and 735; Or. Christ. ii. 270.) [J. de S.]

EPHIPPUS (35), bishop and martyr in Africa with Donatus and others. Commemorated April 6 (Mart. Hier., Notker); April 7. (Us.) [T. S. B.]

EPHIPPUS (36), archdeacon of Alexandria; author of a letter in reply to one received from Maximian, bishop of Constantinople, about the end of 432 or beginning of 433 A.D. The letter is preserved only in a Latin version. After some account of the state of the controvery between St. Cyril and the Nestorians, the writer of the letter says that St. Cyril is vexed because Maximian has not been as zealous as he might be for him, and gives him various directions and suggestions as to services expected of him. He states that letters have been sent by St. Cyril to Pulcheria and other persons attached to the court, and that presents have been sent as well. So many gifts (benedictiiones), the writer proceeds, were sent from Alexandria at this time that the clergy complained that the Alexandrian church was stripped naked (undata), and already owed 1500 pounds of gold besides 20,000 pounds of silver. (See appendix, Concil. Baluz. pp. 907-909; Ceillier, Actes Conc. Tunis. viii. 385; Robertson, Ch. Hist. i. p. 453.) [J. W. S.]

EPHIPPUS (37), presbyter of Constantinople, sent with Memnon and Germanus to summon Eutyches the third time to the Council of Constantinople in 448. Their report was received on the 17th of November. (Mansi, vi. 496 a; Barcinus, ad ann. 448, xxix.) [W. M. S.]

EPHIPPUS (38), the bearer of letters from the presbyters and archimandrites of Constantinople, A.D. 476, to pope Simplicius, informing him that Basiliscus had restored Timotheus Aelurus to the see of Alexandria (Simplic. Pont. Patr. Lat. in Migne, Patr. Lat. xii. col. 140; C. C. 43; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 50). Epiphanius seems to have also carried letters to Simplicius, from the patriarch Acacius a few months later (Simpl. ep. 19; Jaffé, s. v.). Ceillier (x. 402) calls Epiphanius a layman; but Simplicius, replying in the letters just cited, styles him "filius" and "discipulus." [T. W. D.]

EPHIPPUS (39) SCHOLASTICUS, an ecclesiastic about the beginning of the 8th century, A.D. 510, but of whose personal history almost nothing is known to us except that he was the friend of Cassiodorus, the celebrated founder of the Monasterium Victoriam. (Cassiodor. Histor. x. 7.) He seems to have taken the same name Scholasticus, not so much because of any devotion to literature or theology, but in the sense frequently borne by that word in the middle ages, when it was applied to the chaplain, or amanuensis, or general assistant of any dignitary of the church (Du Cange, Glossarium s. v.). It was in this relationship, in all probability, that Epiphanius stood to his distinguished master, by whom he was summoned to take a part in the great work then engaging his attention, that of urging his monks to classical and sacred studies, and especially to the transcription of manuscripts. The task assigned to Epiphanius was the translation into Latin of the histories of Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret. Cassiodorus himself revised the work, corrected its faults of style, abridg'd it, and arranged it into one continuous history of the church. It is then published for the use of the clergy. The book attained a high reputation. It was known as the Tripartite History; and, along with the translation of Eusebius by Rufinus, it became the manual of church history for the clergy of the West for many centuries. The book is generally published as if Cassiodorus were its author, under the title of Historiae Ecclesiae Tripartitae Epitome.
EPIPHANIUS—MONKS; CLERGY

EPIPHANIUS translated several additional works, such as the commentaries of Didymus upon the Proverbs of Solomon and the seven Catholic Epistles, those of Epiphasis, bishop of Cyprus, upon the Canticles, and perhaps others, all of which are said by Caez to have perished. One, however, survives, and may be found in Llibe (Conc. tom. v.), his Codex Epiphasis, a work to which he was also urged by Cassiodorus, and which consists of a collection of synodal letters addressed by different synods to the emperor Leo in defence of the decrees of the council of Chalcedon against Timotheus Aelurus. [TIMOTHEUS AELURUS.]

[W. M.]

EPIPHANIUS (40), presbyter in Thessalonica, cir. 520, apparently one of the mission from pope Hormisdas for regulating the disordered affairs of that province, and possibly author of a novel which is given the 60th letter of Hormisdas (Hormed. Pap. Epist. et Decret. Patrol. Lat. ixii. 481).

[W. M. S.]

EPIPHANIUS (41), deacon, to whom Lcinian bishop of Cartagena and Severus bishop of Cariaga, addressed a letter on the incorporeal nature of angels, and of the human soul (Gams, Kirchengesch. ii. 1, 53; Exp. Sgrv. Append. 4. p. 426).

[M. A. W.]

EPIPHANIUS (42), abbot of St. Remigius at Rheims, by whose evidence mainly Aquilus bishop of Rheims was convicted of treason against king Childbert II., A.D. 590. Epiphasis was himself deprived of his abbacy about the same time. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. x. 19.)

[T. W. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (43), subdeacon of Rome, commissioned by pope Gregory I. to associate himself with Scholasticus, the "judex company," in investigating an outrage perpetrated at Nort upon Paulus bishop of Nepesina. (Greg. Mag. Ep. lib. iii. ind. ix. Append. 1, 2, A.D. 593, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxvii. 603, 604; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 102.)

[T. W. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (44), presbyter in Sardinia, accused of serious crimes. Gregory the Great, writing to Sabinus, Defender of Sardinia, orders him to be sent to Rome. Writing later to Januarius bishop of Cagliari, Gregory sends him back, and declares him innocent. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. iii. indict. xi. Ep. 36; lib. iv. indict. xi. Ep. 27; Migne, ixvi. 632, 697.)

EPIPHANIUS (45), Abbot of Caralis (Cagliari) in Sardinia, who bequeathed money to found a monastery in that town. Januarius the bishop objected to the house selected for the purpose, as it adjoined a monastery of "ancille Dei," and pope Gregory, to whom the decision was referred, directed either that the females should remove into another house, or that the founder of Epiphasis should take effect in an unoccupied monastery outside the city. (Greg. Mag. Ep. lib. xi. ind. iv. ep. 25, Nov. 600; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 141.)

[T. W. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (46), archbishop of Caralis (Cagliari) in Sardinia, present as a witness at Rome in Oct. 508 (Greg. Magn. Ep. lib. ix. ind. ii. ep. 7; Migne, Patr. Lat. lxvii. 948; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 126). In a subsequent letter of Gregory (lib. xiv. ind. vii. ep. 7) Sept. 603, he is called oecumenus of the church of Caralis, and Vitalis the defender is charged to see that he takes proper care of the Xenodochias, which had been greatly neglected in consequence of the age and ill-health of Januarius the bishop of Caralis. [T. W. B.]

EPIPHANIUS (47), ordained deacon by pope Gregory I. [ELIAS (39)].

EPIPHANIUS (48), deacon, who with Theodore bishop of Catania was ordered by the governor to accompany the envoy of the patriarch Tarasius to the pope Adrian in 785. At the Council of Nicaea in 787 he was the representative of the archbishop of Sardinia. He pronounced a panegyrick, which is contained in the synodal acts of the Council, on the council itself, on Tarasius, patriarch of Constantinople, on the empress, whom he compared to St. Helen, on the emperor, and on the town of Nicaea, already famous for the council held there against Arius. (Mansi, xii. 1076; xiii. 442; Hefele, § 545; § 557; Cellarius, xiii. 830; Patr. Græc. xviii. 1313–1332, from Mansi.) [A. H. D. A.]

EPIPHANIUS (49), an archimandrite of Constantinople sent by Theophorus Studites, when he was exiled and in prison, to implore the aid of Leo III. bishop of Rome, A.D. 805. (Theod. Studi. Lat. xiii. 523; Jaffé.) He was kindly received by the pope, and when he returned brought letters from him to Theodore. Epiphasis was also sent by Theodore to Paschall I., A.D. 818, when the Studite was once more an exile and a prisoner. Theodore addresses him as "great Ephaphon," and with a play on his name bids him "manifest himself a faithful messenger." Paschall also received him kindly, and on his return was brought with him letters of sympathy and encouragement for Theodore. (Baronius, Annu. a. a. 818, ix.)

[T. W. B.]

EPIPHANIUS (50), a Sophist, friend of Apollinaria. [APOLLINARIS THE WISE, EPIPHANIUS (10) in Dict. G. and R. Dig.]

EPIPHANIUS (51), a young man challenged by Gregory Nazianzen in a playful letter to contest of friendship in the form of an epistolary correspondence. (Greg. Naz. Ep. 239, in Mige, Patr. Gr. xxxvii. 381.)

[T. W. B.]

EPIPHANIUS (52), tribune, carried a letter, Ep. 44, among the letters of Leo, dated October 13, 449, from pope Leo I. to the emperor Theodosius (Leo. Magn. Ep. 54, 656, Migne) and a letter, Ep. 60, dated Oct. 15, 449, from Leo to the clergy and laity of Constantinople (cf. Ep. 59, § 1. 976).

[C. G.]

EPIPHANIUS (53), a person in Sardinia who left the income of his property to Maternus his wife, for the support of a monastery in the house of her mother Pompoziana. Vitalis, the defender of the Roman church in Sardinia, and bishop Januarius, were charged between them with diverting this property both from Maternus and the monastery, A.D. 603. (Greg. Mag. Ep. lib. xiv. ind. vii. ep. 2 in Patr. Lat. lxvii. 1305.)

[C. B.]

EPIPHANIUS (54), Patricius of Constantin-EPIDuDUS

people, who was active in the prosecution of Maximus the Confessor, for his opposition to Monothelitism, towards the commencement of the latter half of the 7th century [Maximus, Confessor, Dict. Gr. et Rom. Biog. ii. 908, et seq.].
...CAPIT. No character has been more persistent in not treating the Confessor with some consideration, but afterwards he allowed himself to indulge in very strong and abusive language, which he followed up by harsh and cruel treatment of him (Maximi, Opp. in Migne, Patr.
Gr. xc. 114, 120, 163, 165, 168; Freyry, H. E.
xxviii. 12-20).

[T. W. B.]

EPIDUIDUS (1), one of the martyrs of Lyons. When the persecution had commenced, he retired, together with his friend Alexander, to a villa in the neighbourhood of Lyons, where they remained in safety for a considerable time, owing to the watchful care of a widow named Lucia. At length, however, they were discovered, brought before the governor, and Epipodius, after having been tortured, was put to death, a.d. 178. He is commemorated Ap. 22. (Mart. Hier. Ad., R; Surius, Ap. ii. 22 and 24; Greg. Tur. de Glor. Conf. cap. 64; Baron. Annal. 179. 36.)

[T. S. B.]

EPIDUIDUS (2), St., appears in the Catalogues as ninth bishop of Le Puy, between St.
Scratius and St. Suscarius, before the year
451. (Gall. Christ. ii. 689.)

[S. A. B.]

EPISMENON. The word ἐπίσημον is included in this dictionary, being strangely absent from the lexicons, ancient and modern, in the sense in which it occurs in ecclesiastical writers.
The Gnostic Marcus laid much stress on the mysteries derived from names by calculating the numerical values of their letters. In the account of his system given by Irenaeus (xv.
p. 65 sqq.), copied by Hippolytus (Ref. vi. 45) and by Hippianus (Hier. 34), ἐπίσημον is repeated at the beginning of the letter to three, six; the number 3 is δ ἐπίσημον ἀριθμὸς;
the six-lettered name ΙΩΝΙΩΝ is δ ἐπίσημονος ιωνιων, &c., language perplexing to the old Latin translator, who renders the word by "insignis." A similar use of the word is found in Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vi. 16, p. 815);
but this cannot be called a quite independent illustratio, for an comparison of the sections just quoted from Clement and from Irenaeus the coincidences are found to be such as to put it beyond doubt that Clement, in his account of the mysteries of the number 6, makes unacknowledged use of the same writings of Marcus as were employed by Irenaeus. Eusebius (Quest. ad Eugen. iii. 2) and Tertullian (Ap. Pat., loc. cit. iv. 25) probably accept the view copied by Jerome or Pseudo-Jerome (Bren. in Psalm. 77, vii. 198, ed. Vallarini), suggests, as a way of reconciling the difference between the evan-elists as to whether our Lord suffered at the third or the sixth hour, that a transmitter's ever may have arisen from the likeness of Gnomon and the Episemon, i.e., apparently P and F.
The source whence all modern writers have learned their use of the word epismenon is Scaliger's essay on the origin of the Ionic letters (Anon. in Chron. Euseb. p. 110). He there
(p. 116) quotes as from Bede, de Indigatione but we have not been able to verify the refer-
CHRIST. BIOGR.—VOL. II.
ice), a statement of an old grammarian, who, having mentioned that the Greeks denote numbers by letters, and for this purpose join the letters of their alphabet three other charters, goes on as follows:—"Prima est γ quae dicit Epispomenon et est nota numeri VI.; secunda est Γ quae vocatur kophê et valet in numero XC.; terzis est Ψ quae dicitur enneaconsa quia valet DOCCC." Here, as well as in the preceding passages, episemon is used with special reference to the character for six; but Scaliger turns into Greek the phrase "not aumeri VI."; τὸ ἐπίσημον τοῖς ἄρðμοις, and seems to have inferred that the marks for the numbers 6 and 900 had equal rights to the same title; and he also gives the name Episemon to each of the six Phoenician letters said not to have been received by the Ionians, saying, for instance, that the letter Σα was originally an episemon, and distinguishing between the episemon of the number 6 and the digamma or episemon of Van. He does not name his authority for this way of speaking, and we have not been able to find any; nor do we know that the character which was by some called βα, and by others τὸ ἐπίσημον, was ever called by any one before Scaliger by the combination ἐπίσημων Σα.
However this may be, Scaliger has been followed by all who have written on the subject since his

The true account of these three characters seems to be that though the Phoenicians themselves did not use the letters of their alphabet for purposes of numerical, the Greeks, who derived their alphabet from them, did so in the 5th century for certain purposes: their alphabet then still contained two of the Phoenician letters which in the next century were disused, viz., βα and ἕνθημα, the Roman Q, coming after ψ;
that these letters then took their natural place in the system of numerical, which was afterwards made complete by the addition, at the end of the characters of the new alphabet, of another letter to denote 900, which from its shape was at a considerably later period called ἐπίσημον (Hankel, Geschichte der Mathematik,
p. 34; Kirchhoff, Studien zur Geschichte des gr.
Alphab.). The character for six had not come to be identified with the abbreviated for σ in the time of Marcus, as known through Hippolytus. In calculating the numerical value of his inscription he counts the δ and τ separately; and it is to be noted that he calls the former σ and the latter San. It is possible that Marcus expressly identified his episemon with the digamma, though for Irenaeus, p. 71, line 91; p. 72, line 7, the reading is undoubtedly δδα διαμεμέρητα, against Hort, conjecture.
Hort's conjecture that Marcus wrote γδια-
He says that this number added to the number of the twenty-four letters makes thirty.
Now the double letters are already included in the twenty-four, but the Digamma stands outside the alphabet, and therefore its number might properly be added to that of the letters.
With regard to the properties of the number 6, Marcus and Clement were in part indebted to Philo, who explains (De Op. Mund. 8) that it is the first perfect number, i.e., according to Euclid's definition, one equal to the sum of the numbers 1, 2, 3 which divide it without remainder (Aug.
de Civ. Dei, xi. 30), the second such number being 28, which is the sum of its divisors 1, 2, 4, 7, 14 (Orig. t. 28 in S. Joann.); that being 2 \times 3 it arises from the marriage of a male and female, i.e., odd and even number; that there are six directions of motion, forward, backward, right, left, up, down; &c. Marcus observed that not only was the world made in six days, but instruction and education ended after six days went up to the Mount of Transfiguration; that there, by the appearance of Moses and Elias, the number of His company became six; that He suffered at the sixth hour of the sixth day of the week; and thence concludes that this number has the power not only of production, but of regeneration. As seven is the number of the heavens, and eight is the super- celestial odgol, so six denotes the material creation (see also Heracleon, Orig. iv. 221); and, in particular, the material body through which the Saviour revealed Himself to men's senses, and conveyed to them that enlightenment of their ignorance in which redemption consisted. Clement, if not Marcus, finds the Saviour's life in the Scripture epitomized by the episodion, which is not taken into account by one who looks merely at the order of the letters in the alphabet, but reveals itself in the system of numeration.
M

Irenaeus points out that the mysteries of Marcus all depend on the employment of the modern form of the Greek alphabet, and that they disappear when a Semitic alphabet is used. He shews also (ii. 24) that it is possible to say as fine things about the properties of the number 5 as about those of the numbers which are glorified by Marcus. [G. S.]

EPITHEME, martyr. [GALACTON.] EPISTLE TO DIONETUS. The Greek text known by this name has been known only since its publication in the year 1592 by Henricus Stephanus, in whose handwriting it is extant at Leyden (MS. Voss Q 30), as taken both by him and by Beurer, whose transcript is lost, from a single faded exemplar, the same which (as Gebhardt has shewn) was collated latterly by Cunitz at Strasburg, where it perished in 1870. In this codex the text given under the heading To Dionetus was broken into three fragments by two clear breaks with marginal notes from the old scribe in Greek manuscripts of the 13th century, saying, "Thus I found a break in the copy before me also, it being very ancient." and "Here, too, the copyist had a break." No other copy of any portion has yet been found.

The author of the discourse directed To Dionetus is thus known to us only through a single medieval transcript by a very ancient and defective original, and is reported through this solitary channel of our knowledge to be "the same" as the author of a preceding oration To Greeks, preserved only by the same transcriber, and of some other previous work which bore his name in the title. No reason has ever been shown for doubting this tradition taken by its own; but the medieval transcriber had no more such unique treasures to offer, and the place at the head of the series was usurped by the tailpiece of the series that preceeded. For the codex contained in the same old hand, 1st, two pieces, each of "the holy Justin, philosopher and martyr," demonstrating the divine monarchy and adorning Greeks; 2nd, a discourse of a man said to be "Justin, philosopher and martyr," and after an accidental error, 3rd, the discourse of the man said to be the same, To Greeks ad To Dionetus; and lastly, after a few pages left blank and filled in by a later hand; 4th, "Athesagoras On behalf of Christians," and "the same On Resurrection." Thus the pleader with Greeks and with Dionetus seemed to be identified with the ambiguous person of the Expositor said to be Justin, and so was ushered before the world by Stephanus as none other than Justin himself.

In the discourses To Greeks and To Dionetus the author never says who he is, except that To Greeks, he begins: "Think not, men and Greeks, that my succession from your custums was unreasonable or unjust, for I found nothing right nor comprop. in the episcopion which is not taken into account by one who looks merely at the order of the letters in the alphabet, but reveals itself in the system of numeration.

Irenaeus points out that the mysteries of Marcus all depend on the employment of the modern form of the Greek alphabet, and that they disappear when a Semitic alphabet is used. He shews also (ii. 24) that it is possible to say as fine things about the properties of the number 5 as about those of the numbers which are glorified by Marcus. [G. S.]

EPITHEME, martyr. [GALACTON.] EPISTLE TO DIONETUS. The Greek text known by this name has been known only since its publication in the year 1592 by Henricus Stephanus, in whose handwriting it is extant at Leyden (MS. Voss Q 30), as taken both by him and by Beurer, whose transcript is lost, from a single faded exemplar, the same which (as Gebhardt has shewn) was collated latterly by Cunitz at Strasburg, where it perished in 1870. In this codex the text given under the heading To Dionetus was broken into three fragments by two clear breaks with marginal notes from the old scribe in Greek manuscripts of the 13th century, saying, "Thus I found a break in the copy before me also, it being very ancient." and "Here, too, the copyist had a break." No other copy of any portion has yet been found.

The author of the discourse directed To Dionetus is thus known to us only through a single medieval transcript by a very ancient and defective original, and is reported through this solitary channel of our knowledge to be "the same" as the author of a preceding oration To Greeks, preserved only by the same transcriber, and of some other previous work which bore his name in the title. No reason has ever been shown for doubting this tradition taken by its own; but the medieval transcriber had no more such unique treasures to offer, and the place at the head of the series was usurped by the tailpiece of the series that preceeded. For the codex contained in the same old hand, 1st, two pieces, each of "the holy Justin, philosopher and martyr," demonstrating the divine monarchy and adorning Greeks; 2nd, a discourse of a man said to be "Justin, philosopher and martyr," and after an accidental error, 3rd, the discourse of the man said to be the same, To Greeks and To Dionetus; and lastly, after a few pages left blank and filled in by a later hand; 4th, "Athesagoras On behalf of Christians," and "the same On Resurrection." Thus the pleader with Greeks and with Dionetus seemed to be identified with the ambiguous person of the Expositor said to be Justin, and so was ushered before the world by Stephanus as none other than Justin himself.

In the discourses To Greeks and To Dionetus the author never says who he is, except that To Greeks, he begins: "Think not, men and Greeks, that my succession from your custums was unreasonable or unjust, for I found nothing right nor comprop. in the episcopion which is not taken into account by one who looks merely at the order of the letters in the alphabet, but reveals itself in the system of numeration.

Irenaeus points out that the mysteries of Marcus all depend on the employment of the modern form of the Greek alphabet, and that they disappear when a Semitic alphabet is used. He shews also (ii. 24) that it is possible to say as fine things about the properties of the number 5 as about those of the numbers which are glorified by Marcus. [G. S.]

EPITHEME, martyr. [GALACTON.] EPISTLE TO DIONETUS. The Greek text known by this name has been known only since its publication in the year 1592 by Henricus Stephanus, in whose handwriting it is extant at Leyden (MS. Voss Q 30), as taken both by him and by Beurer, whose transcript is lost, from a single faded exemplar, the same which (as Gebhardt has shewn) was collated latterly by Cunitz at Strasburg, where it perished in 1870. In this codex the text given under the heading To Dionetus was broken into three fragments by two clear breaks with marginal notes from the old scribe in Greek manuscripts of the 13th century, saying, "Thus I found a break in the copy before me also, it being very ancient." and "Here, too, the copyist had a break." No other copy of any portion has yet been found.

The author of the discourse directed To Dionetus is thus known to us only through a single medieval transcript by a very ancient and defective original, and is reported through this solitary channel of our knowledge to be "the same" as the author of a preceding oration To Greeks, preserved only by the same transcriber, and of some other previous work which bore his name in the title. No reason has ever been shown for doubting this tradition taken by its own; but the medieval transcriber had no more such unique treasures to offer, and
EPISTLE TO DIOGENETUS

(Add. 14,658 in the British Museum), is a version of what appears to be another set of notes or Hypomnema of the same discourse To Greeks, which is there ascribed to one "Ambrosius, a chief man of Greece, who became a Christian". The author of this work raises a clamour against him," and this was his Reply, Cureton's English rendering of the Syriac and Otto's recension of the Greek are collated on pp. 61-89 of the Specilagioum Syriacum, and the two reports are plainly reports of the same discourse.

Thus the only tradition respecting the writer To Greeks is that there was another as a certain writer To Greeks, concerning whom there is no further tradition, except that he is clearly the same as one concerning whom the only tradition is that he is a certain Ambrosius.

It is natural enough from facts otherwise known to us to find an Ambrosius addressing a dialogue to Marcellus in the old Greek world, the only Digenetus known to us in times after Christ was a pointing master, who, about the year 333, had charge of the boyhood of a young noble, and led his little pupil, even through his failures art, to turn from dilettante ways, cockfighting, and belief in charmed charms of their mind, and to attend the lectures of philosophers and begin writing dialogues, and to sleep on a hard bed, and live with Attic simplicity, for which lessons the younger recorded his thanks, and probably gave substantial expression to his gratitude, when he had grown to manhood as the emperor Marcus Aurelius. The Greek names became Roman surnames, and were transmitted from generation to generation, and those who received the Roman franchise not seldom took the gentle name of the reigning house. So, looking back from Aurelius Ambrosius, the royal defender of British Christianity against the Severii, and from the senatorial Marcellus, sprung of illustrious martyr lineage, to the Ambrosius and Marcellus of high station in the palace, encouraged to confession by Origin in the usurper Maximin's persecution in A.D. 236, and led into the church by the same father, probably at Athens in A.D. 239, from some Valentinian, Marcionist, or Sabellian heresy, we turn to the more ancient Christian presence converted from actual heathendom, and to a first rise of the Ambrosian family of the gens Aurelia from a Grecian magistrate of the age of the Antonines (cf. De Rossi, Roma Sotterranea, lli. 23). It is natural enough, therefore, to be told that such an Ambrose became a Christian in the desert when pen and pencil took our place, in outbursts of local clamour rather than in imperial onslaughts interrupting a guaranteed repose, before the sanction of Christianity by Alexander Severus, and before the commencement of imperial concomitant at Christians in high places under Commodus. It is natural to find such a convert by such a path, and to find him a man of his own kind among others of his peers, still keeping all his wits about him on the unworldly quest of a wisdom not offered by the art of the rhetoricians, nor supplied by the ideals of the poets, nor to be hoped from the debates of the philosophers, nor to be found but in the heroes of the King incorruptible, nor to be learned except from the Divine Word, and when found and when learnt to be offered to all who will come to it to share. He repeats the same succession of echoes, first of psalmist and prophet in their warnings, not their predictions (Ad Gr. 4. Is. i. 14; ὅ, 5; Ps. ii. 10; lvii. 5; Ad Dogn. 2. Ps. cvx. 8; ὅ, 7, Mal. iii. 3); then of the simplicity of the Galilean teaching (Ad Gr. 5. Jas. iii. 17. Lu. xv. 18; Ad Dogn. 4. Matt. xii. 13; ὅ, 6. Matt. v. 44); then of the summons to devotion and an eating of the word heralded by Paul (Ad Gr. 5. 1 Tim. i. 17. Heb. iv. 12. Gal. iv. 12. v. 21; Ad Dogn. 4. Gal. iv. 10; ὅ, 5. Rom. viii. 12. 1 Cor. iv. 10. 2 Cor. vi. 9. x. 3. Phil. iii. 18; ὅ, 6. Eph. v. 29; ὅ, 7. Heb. xi. 10); then of the new commandment that was from the beginning as recorded by John (Ad Dogn. 6. Joh. xvii. 16; ὅ, 7. Jn. iii. 17. v. 22). He shews the same liberal culture, as of one who has made the history of the Greek mind the story of his own, and the same plain independence of tone, as of one who has sworn fealty to no human dogmatist, and the same manly adhesion to that which he has now discovered to be the law of his being. And the same ingenious desire to establish not immunity for his creed but community with the apostles and the ascendants to #venerate in not choosing to give holy things to dogs till they have been brought to hunger for the crumbs of the Master's table. He never even says expressly that he is a Christian himself.

The connexion of the various portions of the treasure-trove of Stephanus, one with another and especially of the last appended fragment with the discourse to Dionetus remains to be considered. We shall distinguish the answers to Greeks and to Dionetus, no longer as orations and epistles, but as Reply and Responses. The author's peculiar position, as through study of the apostolic writings directly and immediately a disciple of apostles becoming in turn a teacher of Gentiles, whether of Greeks at large or of a single inquirer like Dionetus in particular, is awowed after the second break. But in this concluding fragment, where the author is excusing himself for frank communication of Christian mysteries to Gentiles, a change of style is soon discernible. It is no longer a pleading of Greek with Greek, but the voice of a steward of the ancient revelation among his disciples, promising Paradise to the upright, but warning a new-comer that knowledge must not be parted from life, and that no serpents may touch the fruits. Even as he silences the scruples of the believers he passes on to unfold such depths of doctrine as seemed to Stephanus far too profound for the ears of Dionetus. Hence both Stephanus and nearly all the critics of the whole text will have insisted on this whole section for an accidental accretion. As either of the gaps might represent a chasm in which the commencement of a fresh piece had dropped out, the question whether the appended peroration be proper to the body of the discourse is to be decided on internal evidence only, and therefore, before approaching it, it is needful to have a clear and just conception of the writer to Dionetus himself, and of the scope of his discourse. Now Stephanus is already found guilty of giving rise to four several misconceptions of the preceding discourse. If the writing were Justin's, if it belonged to any of the authors supplied by conjecture, if it were an epistle, if it were up to this point continuous, it would be impossible to suppose the oration really to belong to it. Stephanus directly ascribed it to Justin, prefixed it to the oration To Greeks, distinguished it as an epistle, and omitted to print it as fragmentary. The two pieces, To Greeks and To Dionetus, being once disjoined from their true order, so obviously belonged to different classes of writing that they have never again been so treated as printed side by side, and though they have been denied to Justin on precisely similar grounds, yet nobody seems to have thought of comparing them together till just the other day. Thus the writer to Dionetus has been set down to the first century, and supposed Apollos, or at least regarded as an apostolic father and referred to the reign of Trajan, or again he has been assigned to some school of thought, real or imaginary, that was antagonistic to Justin, in a supposed division of the early church between Judaizers and Helenizers; but only in his capacity of writer to Dionetus, not as writer to Greeks. On all these hypotheses it has been found difficult or impossible to credit him with the entire Peroration, whereas the second section as it is actually printed is capable of being restored to that part of the letter to the Apostle which is of the whole. However, the early date assigned to the whole by Borners (who supposed it prior to Justin) is rejected for the body of the discourse by the most recent German verdicts, but is still more difficult to accept in the case of the Peroration and has never been even suggested for the oration To Greeks. Again, it has been argued that the Peroration could not form part of a first lesson in Christianity, but if the Response be the sequel to the Reply To Greeks, and that to a preceding refusal of conformity, the lesson was really not the first but the third. Again, the Peroration is manifestly not the conclusion of an epistle, but of a homily before the uncleanness departed, and there is no reason whatever against accepting the previous discourse as such. Again, the piece has never been printed as three fragments, the second fragment so obviously belonging to the author of the first, and yet the former gap is presumably as important as the latter.

We claim, then, to have presented on ancient authority a view of the writing To Dionetus, which is (strange to say) novel in modern times, though really the oldest accessible, and thus we are entitled to demand a reconsideration of the current opinion regarding the connexion of the Peroration with the rest. For we have shewn grounds for believing that we have a complete discourse of the same author for comparison with this discourse, which is incomplete, to assist us in determining what kind of completion might have been intended, this whole section for an accidental accretion. As either of the gaps might represent a chasm in which the commencement of a fresh piece had dropped out, the question whether the appended peroration be proper to the body of the discourse is to be decided on internal evidence only, and therefore, before approaching it, it is needful to have a clear and just conception of the writer to Dionetus himself, and of the scope of his discourse. Now Stephanus is already found guilty of giving rise to four several misconceptions of the preceding discourse. If the writing were Justin's, if it belonged to any of the authors supplied by conjecture, if it were an epistle, if it were up to been denied to Justin also. Now, we have suggested that the Reply and Response, so similar yet so dissimilar, belong not only to the same author, but to the same argument. The resemblance between them is shewn by the recurrence in each, not only of the same style, but of the same two successive contrasted styles, and an author who has two styles, must have three. The change of style in each piece is necessitated by the progress of the argument, and the contrast between the two pieces themselves is due to their difference of standpoint and of object. Having denounced wordlings and their rhetoric in renouncing the world, he replies upon the bigots with a review of their poetry, and then offers to introduce a desirous and candid inquirer to a better school than was to be found among the hypocrites with their philosophies. Thus, in the second discourse he is able to begin to take religious ground, but he is not yet able to withdraw his own person into the background, and so with his boldness like Justin’s naivety, frankness, he gives a review of his own past error and tests false religion by its incompatibility with common human morality. But in the third discourse he prays that speech may be given him, and then that the Speaker may not be grieved (Eph. iv. 30), and throughout he strives to persuade; but that it is possible to sin not only against self or against a neighbour, but against God, and that redemption is needed not only for the soul but for the world.

Thus, the Reply To Greeks alone might have left us in doubt whether the author were a Christian or a Gnostic; but in the Response To Diognetus he shows himself manifestly catholic, as revealed in his slight, in the breadth and display in creation, his admiration for the unworldliness of a simple, unpretentious, Christlike life, his reverence for the Son as author, not only of salvation, but of all harmony. There is nothing Marcionistish in the Reply, but in the Response every word uttered against Judaism tells of the equivalence. In the Reply at the last he speaks of the Maker of the soul; but it is in the Response that he begins to speak with reverence of the God of the Jews, the Maker of the world. In the Reply he speaks of a Divine Word; but in the Response he shews that with him the Divine Word is the gospel of Christ, and though at first he merely opposes Christianity and Judaism, he says that God alone can reveal Himself, and yet that the Jews thought rightly of Him, and so he shews quite plainly that he regarded the old revelation as divine, and we might expect to find him saying so at last. Thus, again, though in the Reply he tells his own story, and in the Response he almost with unconsciousness, begins to put his Jewish friends of himself in the Response than in the Reply. For in the Reply he is engaged on the common task of refuting Hellenism, in the Response he girds himself to his proper task of proving Christianity to be ordained the only possible substitute. But all the doctrines which are first brought to Justin’s attention belong to him as he sketches himself in the Reply. In shewing the possibility of sin against God, he appears the same man who could find nothing higher to adore than such virtues as may be human, who was, like the Hebrew prophets, unlike the Platonist Justin, led to abhor idolatry by the very anthropomorphism of his theology. In discovering his catholicity he shews himself to be the same man who unlike Marcion was quite averse to asceticism, and yet was not repelled, but attracted by discipline. He shews himself in the latter piece, as in the former, to be opposed to that philosophizing tendency in the church of which Justin and Marcion were themselves opposite representatives.

Now as the earlier piece changed in style when its work was accomplished, and a fresh standpoint was reached, so we might expect it to be with the latter. Moreover, we perceive that the Author’s task was now reconstituted. He has been called along with the speaker in his renunciation of the ways of the Greek world and in his reply to Greeks. It was important that he should hold back no longer.

"If any chose to come to me," says Justin, speaking of his abode in Christian medicine, his house (Acta 3), "I imparted to him the words of truth." The great danger of the Christians in the reign of Marcus was that they could not celebrate the Eucharist in the presence of unbelievers. If a great man found his way into a Christian meeting, it must have been hard to induce him to withdraw to win the catechumens. Now the Peroration is manifestly the conclusion of a homily before the withdrawal of the catechumens, and if Diognetus himself had shewn his desire for instruction by coming as men came to Justin, the whole discourse may have been delivered before just such an audience as is addressed in the Peroration at the close. Thus the whole discourse is one of the growing out of the other, and each a brave act, as well as a solid work, though each successive act was less memorable, and each successive work more valuable.

The first question of Diognetus starts from the point to which he had been led in the previous discourse. He asks, "On what God relying and how worshiping, Christians all look above the universe itself and despise death, and neither reckon those gods who are so accounted by the Greeks, nor observe any superstition of Jews." He is answering that the reasons for non-compliance with Hellenism or Judaism are obvious, but the Christians’ God is the one God of the Jews, and their religion consists of purity and charity, and was founded by the mission of the Son, whom God will send again. The answer probably continued after this fashion. An end of all things is the doctrine of your God even Jesus, which he enunciates as the perpetual earthly kingdom, and when Christ proclaimed a kingdom not of this world they killed Him. Yet (he resumes) you see He is not dead, and Christian worship is not to deny Him.

Thus far, then, Christianity has been vindicated as a sect, and as such has been vindicated completely. Diognetus has been able to shew that it was a thing religious and heroic, not quite unnatural, and perhaps not quite unphilosophical, but he had been offended by the seeming impertinence of Christian nonconformity, and he is now made to see that this is a proof not of contempt, but of loyalty. Far from being clandestine enemies to society, they live openly and mingle freely with others, and only escape notice because they are peaceable good citizens, while the doings for which they are condemned are confessedly unknown, for their worship remains unseen. This passive submission to persecution does not make them less active as patriotic citizens. Even their close union and their recent origin are shewn to be no grounds for suspecting them, for they love all men, and their Founder was not man but God. Christian miracle is shewn to be conformable to the law of nature.

The second question of Diognetus is still unanswered. It yet remains to say, "What the kindly affection is that they have one for another." So the author passes to vindicate Christianity as a doctrine, as that question touched the inmost springs of Christian life. Christian love is indeed supernatural, as it comes from belonging to the family of God the Father. Now, having shewn Christianity to be superior to natural religion, and to Judaism, it remains to notice philosophy as a last refuge of lies, and to shew that it is the philosophers who are the charlatans and the dupes of whom are the dupes, while Christian love is just the natural expression of the knowledge that comes of Christian faith.

Thus having named the Lord of Christians, he goes on to speak of faith, revelation, the Saviour, a ransom, the Servant of God, the Only Begotten, &c., all which Christian notions were absent from the former part of the discourse. In the tenth chapter a fresh section seems to commence with the fruits of faith, first of all in the Father; but before he has gone any further into the Christian creed the piece is broken off. But the author has shewn that as his sect is not Marcionish but Catholic, so his doctrine is not Sabellian but orthodox. For if in the reply to Greeks he spoke of God and the Divine Word in the usual terms of the pleroma of the Word, as each personal, without setting them forth as a triad, and if in the first fragment of the response he described God as doing all the works in the Son, and thus shewed his deep sense of the unity of the Godhead, he here again sets forth the everlasting communion of the Divine Persons, as God shared His counsel with His Servant (wait) from the beginning.

The third question asked by Diognetus was "What, in short, this new race or practice might be that has invaded society now and no earlier?" This question was the sum of the other two, and in answering the other two completely it would be answered with them. But the answer would not be complete and catholic and orthodox, till it is further than merely saying that "it was God who implanted the Word," or that He did so "when the time came." "The Word that appeared new" must have been "found old," and this is the answer given in the third fragment. Again we are led into quite a new region, but the course is still straightforward, and the guide is still the same. The style is not really different, except so far as a difference is necessitated by the difference of subject. There is the same anarthrous use of nouns; there is the same accumulation of clause on clause, not pursued too far; there are the same unexpected turns at the close of the sentences. There is the same union of dignity with sweetness; there is the same blending of Pauline and Johannine teaching; there is the same persistent subordination of doctrine to life. To the last the writer never uses the word Spirit. If "the fear of the law is chanted," and "the grace of the prophets is known," so it was before. We say without any hesitation that no other terminus was probable from that author to that discourse than that which we now actually appended to it, and again that the peroration itself must have belonged to some such discourse as that to which it is found appended.

The frank unfolding of doctrine is justified by the example of the Word who was believed among Gentiles. "This is He that is from the beginning, who appeared new and is found old, and is always young in hearts of saints being engendered. This is He that is ever reckoned a Son to-day." At His bidding in presence of His Grace, which rejoices and may be grieved, the man is stirred to speak with pain, out of love. But those who love rightly become a paradise yielding all manner of fruits. Knowledge and life grow side by side, for the knowledge that (as the apostle says) puts to death the workings of the bidding of truth unto life. "Let thy heart be knowledge, and life, the true Word entertained. Whose soul if thou bentest and fruit if thou choosest, thou shalt eat those things that with God are desired, which the serpent toucheth not, neither doth error approach, nor is it ever corrupted, but a virgin is trusted, and a salvation is shewn, and apostles are made intelligible, and the Lord's passover cometh forth, and wax is bright together and is fitted up in order, and teaching saints the Word is gladdened, through when the Father is glorified, to Whom be glory world without end." We have adopted Beuer's interpretation of the phrase Κυριος συνάγεται και μετά ακόμην αριστερά. Compare Virg. Georg. iv. 57, "Excedunt ceres." Stephonius renders "wax that is bright", and again of the word, Syllburg conjectures καιρόι; Massius, χροί; Lachmann, ταυροί; Bunsen, λίκνου. It is worth while comparing with this whole Peroration a homily ascribed in the MSS. to Cyril of Jerusalem on the feast of the Hypapante, or Presentation in the Temple, where Christians are told to bring their tapers to the true light (Migne, Patr. Gr. xxxiii. col. 1187). This discourse has been denied to Cyril, because its style is contrasted with the style of his catechetical homilies much in the same way in which the style of this Peroration is contrasted with the style of the preceding discourse, and also because the observance of the Hypapante and the ritual use of wax lights have both been supposed later than Cyril; but the two never say, however, of Cyril's discourse was the Hypapante on the day before the Epiphany, the old manner of observing the feast, which we find noted in the Feiler of Aengus and in the Hieronymian Martyrology. Thus the meeting of Christ by Simeon the day before His manifestation to the Magi, and the meeting of the Lamb of God by Nathanael the day before the manifestation at His glorification at Cana, were in a typical of the meeting of the Lord in the air by the church before His manifestation to the world. This manner of observing the feast may very well be as ancient as the 2nd century, and be the occasion of the present discourse. At that time wax lights were neces-
EPISTLE TO DIOGENETUS

The epochs to which we should assign the whole group of writings may be determined with great probability, not with absolute certainty, except that, if genuine, they cannot be Post-Nicene. The picture of the church presented to Digenes, and the account given of the life of Ambrosius, pretty plainly belong to a date earlier than the accession of Constantius. The chief school of Christian thought would seem still to be at Athens, though on the eve of its transference to Alexandria by Athanasius.

In the reign of Marcus it was death either to confess Christianity, or to accuse another of being such. Hence Ambrose is arraigned, not for Christianity, but for abstinence from Grecian rites. Yet he defends himself, not for atheism, but for fanaticism. The charge of atheism had been exploded by Justin; it revived in A.D. 177 as a fresh charge of atheistic priest-worship, to be met by a new argument.

It is among the writings of Tatian, Melito, and Theophilus and the fragments of Apollinarius, Abarcius, &c., that these pieces seem most at home. The writer seems to appear in his freshness beside Justin in his ripeness, and to be the meeting-point of the teachings of Justin, Tatian, and Melito; the point of departure of Irenaeus, Tertullian, Hippolytus, and Origen on the one hand, and Praxeas, Noetus, and Sabellius on the other.

It is worth noticing that the Ambrose of the 3rd century was accused of Marcionism and Sabellianism, and that the writer to Digenes has been taken for Marcion himself; while the perversion furnished a model for a Sabellian formula found in an inscription at Rome, "Qui filius dieris et pater inveniens" (De Rossi, Bulletins, 1866, pp. 86, 95). The words, "This is he that is ever reckoned a Son to-day," seem to furnish the germ both of Hippolytus's doctrine of the fresh birth of the Virgin's Son in every man, and Origen's doctrine of the eternal generation of the Son of God. In the second fragment we find two phrases unwarranted by scripture, which seem to be derived from reminiscences of heathen poetry. The "wrought-less" God gave His Son, "the deathless for the dying." The doctrine of Irenaeus that "violence appeareth not to God" is anticipated in this piece.

Lost in the crowd of predecessors whom Irenaeus and Clement hardly ever name and merged in Justin's shadow, convinced that God alone can reveal Himself and, content to be hidden in his Saviour's righteousness, the old writer has gradually emerged by virtue of an inborn lustre, somewhat at once and most brilliant of his contemporaries, and has cast a glory on the early church while remaining himself unknown. It is time that he should take his own place, and receive his proper name, for some have begun to take him for a forger, though when or why or how a man should have forged such masterpieces in Justin's name no one has ever been able to say.

Authorities.—Stephanus (Justini Philo sophi et Martyris Epist. ad Digenetum et Oratio ad Graces, 1592), Sylburg (Justini Opera, Heidelberg, 1593), Maranus (Justini Opera, Paris, 1742), Gallandi (ap. Migne, Patr. Gr. ii. 1159 E), Bickersteth (Christian Fathers, 1838), Dorner (Person of Christ, i. 260 ff), Hefele (Patres Apostolici, Tübingen, 1842), Otto (de Justini Scripta, Jena, 1841), Semisch (Justin Martyr, i. 84 ff, 193 E, Clark), Neander (Church History, ii. 420, 425, Bohn), Westcott (Canon ed. 1875, p. 85 E), Luthardt (St. John the Author of the Fourth Gospel, p. 67), Otto (Justini Opera, ii. Jena [1842, 1849], Hollenberg (Der Brief an Digenet, Berlin, 1853), Bunsen (Hippolytus, i. 187 ff, Analecta Antenomica, i. 103 ff), Credner (Kanon, p. 58 ff), Kayser (Reue de Théologie, p. 265 ff, 1856), Donaldson (History of Christian Literature, ii. 126 ff), Davidson (Introduction to the New Testament, ii. 399), Overbeck (Ueber den pseudoumittelsten Brief an Digenet, Basel, 1872), Gebhardt and Harnack (Patres Apostolici, i. 205 ff, Leipzig, 1878, 2nd ed. 1878), Supernatural Religion (ii. 37 ff, 554 ff. ed. vi.), Church Quarterly Review, April, 1877, and references supplied to us by the writer of this article, Cebrellon, the editor of the Syriacum, London, 1854, Ceillier (Auteurs sacrés, i. 412, ed. 1865).

EPISTLES, APOCRYPHAL. I.—1. The Epistles of Abgarus or Abgarus, King of Edessa, to Christ and the Answer of our Lord are given by Eusebius (HE, 15.12) to have been found among them from the archives of Edessa, and to have carefully translated them out of the Syriac. Abgarus expresses his faith that Christ must be "either God or the Son of God," requests the cure of a disease, and since the Jews reject Him, offers Him a share in the kingdom of Edessa. The Lord replies by blessing Abgarus, since it is written of Him that they who see Him should reject Him, that they who see Him not, believing, may obtain life. He must accomplish that for which He is sent, but after his departure one of His disciples shall come to cured Abgarus, and endow him with the gift of life. And to this is added, according to Eusebius, a narrative in the Syriac of the message of Abgarus to Jesus in the last of the seventy by "Judas, who is also called Thomas," to cure Abgarus and many of his subjects, and convert them to the faith. The story and the letter of Abgarus are found in a different form in the Acta Thaddaei, first published by Tischendorf (Acta Ap. Apoc. p. 201). Thaddaeus (as in St. Jerome's version of the story, vii. 57, ed. Vallarsi,) appears as one of the twelve, and is said to have been an Edessene by birth. The name Ananias is given to Abgarus's messenger; the letter contains the offer of the kingdom, and far more severe expressions against the Jews, but not the alternative supplications concerning the nature of the Lord. Ananias also receives from Abgarus the commission to bring back an exact description of the appearance of Jesus, who, miraculously discerning the man's desire, gives him a napkin on which He has impressed His portrait by wiping His face in it after washing. At the same time He delivers a verbal message to Abgarus, promising the visit of Thaddaeus by name. Abgarus, to conceal the sacred picture, is cured before the arrival of Thaddeus, who baptizes him and his people. Tischendorf (Proleg. p. ixxi) supposes these acts to have possibly been drawn from some very ancient original. Ephe mer Syrus (in Testam., quoted by Reading in his note on Eusebius, L.c.) gives the legend without the addition concerning the picture, quoting Abgarus’s letter, but representing the answer of Christ to have been an invocation of blessing upon the city of Edessa. The whole story is probably a local legend invented for the glory of Edessa; see Heinichen’s note on Eusebius, L.c. The epistle of Christ to Abgarus is said by Fabricius (Cod. ap. l. 517), who accepts the authority of Hicke, to be extant in an Anglo-Saxon MS. in the Bodleian. 2. Other supposed writings of Christ, Augustine (De Conven. Eclog. cc. ix. and x.) mentions some who believed in writings of Christ revealing the secret by means of which His miracles were worked, and in letters of His to Peter and Paul. Augustine denies their ignorance in supposing that because Peter and Paul were placed with the Lord in sacred pictures they were therefore the most likely persons to have received letters from Him. The same father (contra Paustum, xxviii. 4) mentions a pretended letter of Christ alleged by the Manicheans. St. Leo (Serm. iv. de Episc.) accuses the Manicheans as confinings sub apop tếpsia from vius loci theogony, i.e. nullius volitionis falsitatis. Timotheus, presbyter of Constantiopole, in his epistle published by Meursius (Var. Div. p. 117), gives a long catalogue of Manichean apocrypha, third among which is ἡ τῶν ἐκτυπωμένων ὑμας, ἡνικὸν εἰπτολομοῦναι. Licinius, bishop of Carthage, reproves Vincentius, a bishop, for believing in an epistle of Christ sent down from heaven, and from the doctrine which he gives of its contents, it appears to be the same which Adelbert, a Gallic bishop of the 8th century, declared to have fallen from heaven into the city of Jerusalem. It is chiefly directed to urging the observance of our Lord’s Day. (Fabricius, Codex Apost. l. 314.) II. Epistles of the Blessed Virgin. 1. To Ignatius. This letter fills but nine short lines in Fabricius (Cod. Ap. l. 843). It is an exhortation to faith and courage. The letter of Ignatius to the Blessed Virgin, is said by Ussher (Dis. ad Epp. S. Ign. c. 19) to be quoted by St. Bernard. But this is owing to a mistake in the earlier editions of that saint, who is really referring to the well-known letter to Mary of Castabala. (Zahn, Ig. de Ant. l. 81.) The letter of the Blessed Virgin was first printed at Paris, 1495, with that of Ignatius to her, and one to the Apostle John—a blank page at the end of a Life of Saint Becket. They do not appear ever to have existed in Greek, and their genuineness is surrendered by Baronius, Bellarmine, and Suarez (Fab. l. c.). 2. Epistola S. Mariae ad Messanenses, ten lines in Fabricius, conveys an exhortation to faith in the latter writing. The text, who seems to have forged it (see Mabillon in Fabricius) pretended that it existed in Hebrew, but it is unknown in any language but Latin. 3. Epistola S. Marie ad Florentinos was expounded by Savonarola in a sermon, Oct. 25, 1495; but no ancient testimony to it exists. It is but of four lines, exhorting to peace (placatus), Fab. i. 852.) III. Epistles of St. Paul. 1. The Epistle of St. Paul to the Laodiceans. This forgery is founded upon Coloss. iv. 16. It is only extant in Latin, and has been generally supposed to have been originally written in that language. The Greek version given by Fabricius (Cod. Ap. l. 873) is that of Elias Hutter, published in his polyglot New Testament. 1590. But Professor Lightfoot, in his exhaustive treatise upon this epistle (appealed to his edition of Coloss, p. 347 sqq.) gives reasons to think that it was originally composed in Greek, and he appends a new Greek version of his own, in which the Pauline phrases which constitute the staple of the work are given as they stand in the Greek Testament. Rejected by St. Jerome (Commentary on James), and by the heathen, it was not until it was met with by Theodoret, that obtained a species of recognition (or what seemed such) from Gregory the Great (Mor. in Job, lib. xxv.), and under the sanction of his name was widely used. Professor Lightfoot gives a list of nineteen MSS. of the Vulgate which contain it, and two pre-Reformation English versions. It consists of twenty brief verses, most of which are extracted from St. Paul, but the connecting matter is so rapid that the result is inexpressibly poor. It has no doctrinal object whatever, and must have been a mere exercise of perverted ingenuity, or composed upon the idea that it was well by a pious fraud to obviate the supposition that an inspired epistle had been lost. 2. A third (or rather first) Epistle of St. Paul is extant, the question whether 1 Cor. v. 9 refers really to an earlier epistle now lost, see Meyer and Stanley in loc. Ussher, in a note upon Ignat. ad Traill. (see Cotel. Pot. Apost. ed. Cler. ii. 67), mentions a spurious Epistle of the Corinthians to St. Paul, with the reply of the apostle, as existing in an Armenian MS. in the library of Gilbert North. The text was published by Wilkins (Ant. 1715; see Fab. Cod. Ap. i. 918; iii. 670). The Corinthians announce that Simon and Cleobis had come to Corinth preaching that it is not right to read the Prophets, that God is not omnipotent, that there is no resurrection, that man is not the creature of God, that Jesus was not born of Mary in the body, that the world is not the creation of God, but of some angel; these errors the apostle himself should reply, St. Paul replies that he had taught what he himself received from the apostles who walked with the Lord, that Jesus was born of Mary, was sent to her from the Father in order that He might be made one with the world, and might free every body by His body, and might save us from death, who showed His person in an example that man was created by the Father, and was not left in his perdition but sought, that by the hand of adoption he might remain living. It has been conjectured that this epistle, of very doubtful orthodoxy, was composed by some Armenian Christian after the condemnation of Nestorianism and Eutychianism, and was written to foster a blessing, without really existing in Armenia; the Eutychian doctrine being aimed at under the names of Simon and Cleobis. Ussher, however, considers it to have been written in reference to Gnosticism, while La Croze (quoted by Fabricius) ascribes it to some monk of the 10th or 11th century, who intended it against the errors of the Bogomil. The names of Simon and Cleobis were probably taken from the Apost. Constit. (Clemenh.) 3. The correspondence of St. Paul and Seneca. The whole question of the relations of this philosopher to Christianity and to St. Paul is discussed by Professor Lightfoot (on Philipp. 268 sqq.). The extant correspondence, including eight letters of Seneca and six of the apostle, may be read in
EPITACIUS

Hase's edition of Seneca (Teubner). They are given in a less correct text in the earlier editions of that author, and in Fabricius (Cod. Ap. i. 892 sq.). They are first mentioned by St. Jerome (Vit. Ill. cap. xii. ed. Vallars. ii. 851). But he speaks of them as so widely received that he considers their existence a sufficient reason for placing Seneca in his catalogue of sacred writers. St. Augustine also apparently accepts them. (Seneca, cujus quaedam ad Paulum Ap. legatur epistolae, Ep. cliii. ad Macedoniam. See, too, De Cœlit. Dei, vi. 10, where the allusion seems very doubtful.) The correspondence was very widely read in the middle ages. Among the moderns Faber Stapulensis ventured to append these pretended letters of St. Paul to the genuine epistles and to defend their authenticity. But they have been generally given up both by the Romanists and the Reformers. Baronius (ad ann. 49, num. 13) supposes himself to have discovered the origin of the fiction in the spurious Acta passionis Pauli ascribed to Linus, in which mention is made of the friendship of the apostle and philosopher. But these Acta Pauli were little known (see Fabricius, i. 888); and the early belief that Seneca was at least half a Christian, suggests that the object of the forgery may have been the mere satisfaction of the curiosity of Christian readers as to an intercourse which would have so naturally taken place during the apostle's visit to Rome. If any more deliberate motive be looked for, it may be found in Professor Lightfoot's suggestion that the letters were written "either to recommend Seneca to Christian readers, or to recommend Christianity to students of Seneca." Certainly the reader will search in vain for any of that interchange of spiritual ideas which a qualified forger of such an imaginary correspondence might have devised. They are little more than an interchange of empty compliments. The date of the forgery is placed by Professor Lightfoot in the 4th century. See the subject amply discussed in his appendix to the essay above mentioned. (On Phil. p. 237.)

IV. Epistles of other Apostles. 1. An Epistle of Peter to James is mentioned by Photius (Cod. 113) as prefixed with the epistle from Clement (printed by Cotet. Pat. Ap. i. 611) to the Recognitions of the latter author. The import of Peter's letter according to Photius is, that he sends his Acts in consequence of a request to that effect from James. This letter, therefore, appears to be different from the letter of Peter to James, first printed by Turrianus (Pro Ep. Pont. lib. 4 and 5), and given by Cotelerius (i. 608). For the latter is an admonition from Peter to keep his preaching strictly secret. Both these letters belong to the same literary period, and their genuineness falls with it. 2. An epistle of St. John to a dropical man, healing his disease. It is given by Pseudo-Prochorus in a forged narrative of the acts of St. John (Fab. i. 927).

[Epictatius] (Epitatus, Epistotus, Epicotius, Epoctitus, Epicotitus), said to have been Bishop of Tudes (Teudus) in Gaul and afterwards of Ambriata in Lusitania, where he suffered martyrdom, A.D. 57. Ambriata is the modern Placentia in Estremadura, still preserving, says Bivar, a memory of its earlier name in a small tower named Torre de Ambriz.

He was commemorated on May 23. (Dossi. Chron. ann. 37., Biver's note 8, in Migne, Patr. Lat. xxi. 124a; id. ann. 268, note 4, p. 398; Mart. Rom. May 23; Boll. Acta SS. 23 Mai. v. 248; Sandoval, Antigüedades de la Ciudad y Iglesia de Tuy, 1610, fol. 11.)

[T. W. D.]

EPITHYMIA in a Gnostic system described by Irenaeus (i. 29, p. 108), one of the evil offspring of the Maker of the world. [G. S.]

EPITITIMUS (Epaphitimus), bishop of Naples in the 1st century according to the received lists; he stands third, following Petrobas, in one reckoning, and second, Petrobas being omitted, in another. He is commended for his munificent charities; his body was translated to the church of St. Stephen. (Ugel. Ital. Sacr. vi. 26.)

[C. H.]

EPITYNCHANIIUS, bishop of Germa in the province of the Hellespont, present at the synod held at Constantinople under Menaus, A.D. 386. (Le Quen, Orient Christ. i. 788; Mansi, viii. 974.)

[L. D.]

EPELECIUS, EPLETUS. [Explecius.]

EPODIIUS, bishop of Opitergium in Italy, A.D. 421, according to Ughelli (Ital. Sacr. i. 152) on the authority of an ancient inscription which he gives (v. 1178). (T. W. D.]

EPOLONUS, one of three children baptized by Babylas (Babylas (1)), and martyred with him at Antioch during the Decian persecution. Commemorated Jan. 24. (Mart. Bedae, U.; Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. i. 28.)

[T. S. B.]

EPPA, bishop of Illisi (Eleche), subcribes the acts of the sixteenth council of Toledo, under Egles, A.D. 693. (Expugna Sagrada, vii. 241; Aguirre-Catalan, iv. 533.) (Serpentinus.)

[Epollandus.]

EQUITIES (Egoaldus.), tribune of the first schola of scutarii at the time of the death of the emperor Jovian, 364. His name was proposed as successor to the empire, but without success, his want of polish ("asser et subagressit") being felt to disqualify him (Amm. xxvi. 1, § 4). In the following year he was made commander of the army in Illyria, and afterwards magister for his services during the rebellion of Procopius (Amm. xxvi. 5, §§ 3, 11). He still held this office in 371 (Amm. xxix. 6, § 8). The Ostrogoths suspected him of being the instigator of the murder of their king Gabinius (Amm. xxix. 6, § 12), and St. Jerome (Coron. sub ann. 376) accuses him of being the real author of the troubles in Illyria, which Ammianus attributes to Probus. On the death of Valentinian I. Equitius was instrumental in raising to the young Valentinian to the purple (Zosim. iv. 19).

[M. F. A.]

EQUITIES (1), a deacon of Apamea, about 389. Theodoret tells us that when Marcellus the bishop of that city was trying to destroy the temple of Zeus, the fire refused to burn until Equities sprinkled holy water upon it, after which the building was quickly reduced to ashes (Theodoret, H. E. v. 21, § 19).

[M. F. A.,]

EQUITIUS (3), bishop of Hippo Diarrhytus, notorious for his turbulence and misconduct, but in what respect the latter consisted is not known. The Council of Carthage, A.D. 401, in consequence of his repeated misbehaviour, appointed a commission of twenty bishops to take steps for deposing him and appointing a bishop in his stead. But their purpose was not carried out immediately, for we find that in 404 Thaeusius and Erasius, the deputies appointed by the council to convey to Honorius its request concerning the Donatists, are desired also to request the emperor that Equitius might be expelled from his diocese. This was in accordance with the law of Gratian, A.D. 378. (Cod. Ecol. Afr. 78, 93; Bruns, Canon. i. 175, 185; Cod. Theod. lib. XVI. tit. ii. 35; Tilmont, art. 134, vol. XIII. p. 356; Mansi, Concil. iv. 490, 500; Morelli, Afr. Christ. i. 180.)

[H. W. P.]

EQUITIUS (4), one of three bishops addressed by pope Simplicius, Nov. 19, 475, on the subject of Gaudentius bishop of Auxinum (Simplic. Pap. Ep. 3 in Pat. L. vii. 37, and Mansi, Concil. vii. 973; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 49; Ceillier, Aut. Soc. x. 402). [C. H.]

EQUITIUS (5), bishop of Matelica, a town at the source of the Esino in the March of Ancona; present at the third council of Rome, A.D. 487, under Felix III. (Mansi, vii. 1171 c.)

[T. W. D.]

EQUITIUS (6), a Roman noble, father of the abbot St. Maur, whom at the age of twelve he placed under St. Benedict, A.D. 522 (Greg. Mag. Dial. ii. 4 in Migne, lxvi. 140). Faustus, the contemporary biographer of Maurus (Vit. S. Maur. cap. i. § 8), has Eutychius instead of Equitius, and the Bollandist editor notes Eutius, Aequitius, Euthitus, as other variants of the name (Acta SS. 15 Jan. i. 1040).

[T. W. D.]

EQUITIUS (7), abbot of a monastery in the province of Valeria, of whom an account, mixed with legend, is given by pope Gregory I. (Dial. i. 4) and quoted by Baronius (A. E. ann. 504, xi. sq.) and the Bollandists, the latter assigning his commemoration to March 7 (Acta SS. Mart. i. 449), while the Roman martyrology commemorates him on Aug. 11. The "province of Valeria" is explained to be that district about the Lucus Fucinus in the land of the Marsi (Abruzzo Ultraiore) traversed by the Via Valeria, which reaches it from Rome through Tibur. The small town of Pescina near the east shore of the lake is thought to represent the general locality of Equitius (Ferrarius, Lex. Geogr. voc. "Valeria"). Basilius the Magnus, expelled from Rome in the reign of Theodoric the Great, sought an asylum under Equitius, having disguised himself as a monk, but the abbot soon detected and repelled him. Baronius places this story under the year 504. Equitius lived as an humble rustic, working on his monks' property, often preaching as an itinerant in the neighbourhood, poorly mounted, meanly clad, but with the Holy Scriptures in his satchel. Jealous of these proceedings, the Roman clergy complained of him to the pope (Symmachus in the chronology of Baronius, but unnamed by Gregory), who invited him to an interview, and ultimately stood his friend. (Cf. Fuller, C. Hist. vol. iii. pp. 260, 261, ed. Brewer.)

[ERACL.] [ERACL.]

ERACLIANUS. [HERACL.]

ERACLUS (1) (Heracles, in the older editions Eradus), deacon of the church of Hippo, A.D. 425. He had inherited a considerable property, part of which he spent in raising a "memoria" of the martyr Stephanus; the rest he offered as a gift to the church of St. Augustine, fearing that the acceptance of such a gift from so young a man might be the subject of future reproval or regret, would not receive it in the form of money to be spent; but casul Eracleus first to invest the money permanently in the purchase of land, which might be given back to him, should any unforeseen misfortune or replacement arise. On becoming one of Augustine's clergy, Eracleus made his poverty complete by setting free a few slaves whom he had retained. (Aug. Sermon. 356, vol. v. 1387.) In the year 426 Augustine was summoned to Millesium, to obviate some threatened dissensions. Severus, the late bishop, had designated his successor in life-time, but had only made his choice known to his clergy, without publishing it to his people. This caused some discontent, and the interference of Augustine was judged necessary to secure the unanimous acceptance of the bishop so chosen. Augustine, being then in his seventy-second year, was thus reminded of the experience of taking steps to secure his own church from similar trouble in the event of his death, and he made the choice of Eracleus, then apparently the junior presbyter of the church, to be his coadjutor and designate successor. (See Dict. Christ. Ant. i. 228.) Only, though he had himself been ordained bishop in the lifetime of his predecessor, Valerie, he now held that this had been an unconscionable violation of the Nicene canon against keeping two bishops in the same church, and therefore resolved that Eraclesus, while discharging all the secular duties of the see, should remain in the office of presbyter until his own death. To remove all possibility of future dispute, he assembled his people (Sept. 26, 426), to obtain their consent to the arrangement, having the notaries of the church in attendance to draw up regular "gesta" of the proceedings, which the persons present were asked to subscribe (I. e. p. 213, vol. ii. p. 788). These gesta contain an interesting specimen of the recording of popular acclamations. According to present English parliamentary usage, interruptions to a speaker are usually inarticulate, or at most amount to an "Oh, oh," or "hear, hear." In the Roman Senate usage permitted the interruption of a speaker by calling out a short sentence, which was duly recorded by the reporters of the proceedings. When the cry found favour, it was often taken up by the assembly and repeated by them (probably in a kind of chant), and the acts then carefully noted the number of times it was repeated. The ERADIUS (Trebellius Pollus, Claud.) "Auguste Claudii di te nobis presertum; dictum sacrovum; principem te aut qualis tu es semper optimum; dictum quadriges; te republicae requiverebat, dictum quadriges," etc. Similar instances are common in the Augustan historians. On the whole subject of such acclamations, see Ferrarius, de Veto. Aen. in Grativ. Thuc. Ant. Rom. Christian assembly of course followed the usage of their time; and the reader of the acts of councils will be familiar with the record of acclamations sometimes as interrupting the proceedings, and ordinarily as testifying the assembly's approval of the final result. In the present instance the gesta record the different acclamations by which the discourse of Augustine was interrupted, and the final acclamations made at his special request, "Fiat, fiat, dictum vicis quinquevis, Dignum est justum est dictum vicis octies decies. . . . Exaudi Christe, Eradulcium conserva dictum octies decies."

The fall of Hippo into the hands of the Vandals prevented the arrangements of Augustine from taking their course, and it appears to have hallowed any successor in his see. Eradius, in 427, held a private discussion with Maximinus, the Arian bishop, which led to the subsequent public dispute between Maximinus and Augustine. (Coll. cun Max. viii. 650.) Two sermons by Eradius are preserved, the first of which, preached in the presence of the bishop, is almost entire and has been taken up with compliments and apologies (v. 1523 and 72, Append. p. 131). [G. S.]

ERADIUS (2). Isidore (Orig. viii. 634) commences a heretic of this name and a sect of Eradius; but on comparison with Augustine (Brev. 47) it becomes apparent that Hinnan and his followers are intended. [G. S.]

ERADIUS (1), martyr at Tuderum in the Becelian persecution, together with Cassian the bishop. (Baron. Annal. 363 B.) [T. S. B.]

ERADIUS (2), bishop of Orange, mentioned in the letter of the bishops of the province of Vienne, A.D. 355, as a supporter of Saturninus, the Arian bishop of Arles. (Gall. Christ. i. 785; Gams, Scr. Ep. 591.) [R. T. S.]

ERADIUS, deacon. [ERADIUS (1).]

ERAMBERTUS, bishop of Sensia. [ERAMBERTUS (2).]

ERAMBOLDUS (Gall. Christ. xi. 350), bishop of Bayeux. [FRAMBOLDUS.] [C. H.]

ERARD (Eberhard, Erhard), bishop at Ardeag and Ratisbon. Commemorated Jan. 8. The life and acts of this saint are involved in great obscurity which is much undoubted as to the time when he lived and the places where he exercised his ministry. The Bollandists (Acta SS. Jan. tom. i. 533-546) give three Lives: two of these are also given by Colgan (Acta SS. 22-38), who says six lives of this saint have come into his hands, but the other four contain nothing which makes them worthy of publication; he adds extracts, however, from two Breviaries of Augsburg, the Breviary of Herbipolis (Würzburg), and the Breviary of Ratisbon, and gives an Appendix of four chapters upon the commemoration, see, time, and country of St. Erard. Yet even these form but a small portion of the accounts compiled of this very celebrated missionary preacher. St. Erard is generally allowed to have been a native of Ireland, and to have had companions, whom some call his brothers, Albert and Hildulphe. Before leaving Ireland, he was bishop at Ardeag, in the county of Longford. With nineteen companions he set out for Germany, and first, quitting Ireland, to St. Hildulphe in his place of retirement in the Vosges Mountains in the east of France; whether this was St. Hildulphe of Treves, or another of the same name and brother of St. Erard, is matter of dispute, and for decision will depend upon the time when it is supposed that St. Erard lived, as Hildulphe, bishop of Treves, is stated to have retired about A.D. 676 to the Vosges, and there founded a monastery. From the Vosges St. Erard went to Bavaria to proclaim the Gospel, and is said to have become a great favourite with Pepin, king of the Franks (A.D. 741-88). But here there is evidently, on the one side or the other, a mistake, for Erard has not begun attempts to extol by supposing that the Pepin now spoken of was not the father of Charlemagne, but the father of Charles Martel, Pepin d'Heristal, Mayor of the Palace.

While in Bavaria, he had his chief place of abode at Ratibon or Regensburg, where the Regen falls into the Danube, and it is almost certain as to what position he occupied there. Tradition asserts that he built a church, which he dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, and seven different monasteries; but Mabillon (Ann. O. S. B. tom. i. lib. xvi. sec. xx. 507), while affirming this, does not believe that he was bishop of Ratibon, or acting otherwise than as a zealot missionary. There he spent the remainder of his life, and we hear of only one journey which he undertook beyond the Bavarian frontier, namely, to baptize the infant daughter of Etto or Ethicus, duke of the Alemani, who was living in Alsace, near the Rhine. This infant was afterwards known as the famous St. Odilia, of whom Mabillon (Ann. O. S. B. tom. i. lib. xvi. sec. xxx. 489-90) gives an account. From the Rhine St. Erard returned to the banks of the Danube, built in Ratisbon the Lower Monastery, which he dedicated also to the Blessed Virgin, and, after a lingering illness in the scene of his labours, died there on Jan. 8. The year is unknown. Colgan thinks he flourished A.D. 750, and in this Waræ agrees; so also does Baronius, whom Colgan follows. But Mabillon and Lanigan, with more probability, maintain that he lived before Charles Martel (A.D. 714-41) and belongs at latest to the end of the seventh century. The Bollandists also seem to prefer an early date, but do not fix a year. (Tanner (1749) gives mention of A.D. 675, and his ascription of the work Ad Bavaros fidei rubricantos, lib. i. St. Erard's tomb was, as usual, surrounded with miracles, and multitudes of pilgrims attended to partake in the gifts of healing. And such was the celebrity it had attained, that about A.D. 1055, when Pope Nicholas II. visited Germany, in his stay at Ratibon, the saint received formal canonisation, and his relics were removed to a more spacious shrine. (Colgan and Bollandists, ut supra; Lanigan, Eccles. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 18, §§ 7, 8; Ware, Bishops, by Harris, vol. i. "Bishops
ERERIC, one of the tribe of the Rugii who had accompanied Theodoric into Italy, and always kept themselves distinct from the Ostrogoths. He was elected king by his own people after the murder of Ildibald, whom the Ostrogoths had chosen as king when Vitigis was carried prisoner to Constantinople. The Ostrogoths, however, were thoroughly discontented with the inefficiency of Ereric, and called Totila, nephew of Ildibald, to be their head, a.m. 541. But Ereric entered into secret negotiations with the emperor Justinian to betray Italy to him, and receive the title of Patrician. During the absence of his messengers Ereric was murdered by the Goths after a few months' reign, and Totila became sole king. His life illustrates one of those phases of disunion which existed among the followers of Theodoric after his death. (Procopius, de Bell. Goth. iii. 2, ed. Bonn. ii. pp. 287-290; Dahn, Die Könige der Germanen, ii. 237.)

[ERASISTRATUS, bishop of Corinth, present at the robber-synod of Ephesus, a.d. 449, where he spoke in favour of Éutyches (Mansi, vi. 837). Le Quien (Or. Chr. ii. 151) puts him thirteenth bishop of Corinth, between Perigenes and Peter. Pope Leo I., addressing certain bishops in Illyricum (ep. 13, cap. 3, in Patr. Lat. liv. 695), mentions a certain metropolitan of Achaia (unnamed) who was slitting the papal authority. In 462, an inquest into the murder of Anastasius bishop of Thessalonica, the papal vicarius, who had, moreover, offended the Theophans by consecrating for their bishop a stranger whom they had never seen. This metropolitan is identified with Erasistratus bishop of Corinth by Migne's editor, and Ceillier (x. 206) takes the same view. Jaffé (Reg. Pont. 35) dates Leo's letter a.d. 444.

[ERASMAS, a noble Roman virgin, said to have suffered martyrdom at Aquileia with Euphemia, Dorothea, and Thecla, under Nero; commemorated Sept. 3. (Rom. Martyrolo. Boll. Acta SS. Sept. i. 606.)

[ERASMUS (1), sent, together with Onesimus and fourteen others, to Rome to Licinius: by him they were delivered to Diomedes the prefect, who had them conducted to Puteoli, where they were beheaded. They are commemorated May 10. (Men. Bas.)

[ERASMUS (2) (HERASMUS, Us.), bishop and martyr in Campania, during the Diocletian persecution. Commemorated June 3. (Marti. Ad., Us., Notker, Flor.)

[ERASMUS (3), bishop of Cibyra, on the borders of Caria and Phrygia, present at the fifth general council, a.d. 553. (Le Quien, Oriens Christian. i. 904; Mansi, ix. 393.)

[ERASMUS (4), a martyr at Antioch; commemorated Nov. 25. (Mart. Us.)

[ERASTUS, the econtouos of the city of Corinth (Rom. xvi. 23), reputed bishop of Philippi. The pseudo-Dorothean, confusing his title and his locality, says he was first coconsacrist of the church of Jerusalem an i afterwards bishop of Panæa, or Caesarea Philippi, in North Palestine (Clement, Dial. ii. 62. Yu. 465. xi. 10683). Other traditions place Erastus at Philippi in Macedonia (Rom. Mart. July 28; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 67, 833; Boll. Acta SS. 26 Jul. vi. 298 e.)

[ERATOAITH, the name of a dogma two de in the diagram of the Ophites (Origen, adv. Cels. vi. 30). [HEEODOMAD.]]

[ERBIN, brother of St. Digine, and son of Cystennin Garanu, a prince of Devon, was himself included among the Welsh saints, and was the ancestor of many holy persons; he flourished in the 5th century, but is remembered in a dedication. (Myn. Arch. ii. 42; Resc. Welsh Saints, 113, 134.)

[ERO (1) (EARG, ERCUS, HERCUS), bishop of Slane. Commemorated Nov. 2. He was son of Deg or Dece, of the race of Corb O Emer, descended from Budrhuige, king of Ireland (A.D. 491-4) by the Irish calculation; he himself died immediately to the royal house of Ulster, but his progenitors came from the province of Munster, and he is always spoken of as belonging to Munster (Colgan, Tr. Thurn. 544 n. 4, for his kindred; Mart. Donny. by Todd and Reeves, 253). As the Four Masters (by O'Donovan i. 197) say his age was fourscore and ten years when he died in A.D. 515, he must have been born in A.D. 622, or, as Usher prefers, A.D. 624, which is the date assigned for his birth by the Annals of Tigernach. When St. Patrick landed at Colpa Isibeal Colptha or Colbdi (now Colp in the barony of Lower Duleek, at the mouth of the Boyne), and had travelled with his companions to the great plain of Brega, he arrived at nightfall on Later Eve, A.D. 433, at Pertuis-de-Feix (the "graves of the men of Fice"), now Slane, on the north bank of the Boyne, in Meath (Four. Mast. by O'Donovan, i. p. 167 n. 11). He set up his tent and kindled his Paschal fire; but this was the time when, according to the Pagan custom, every fire had to be extinguished in Ireland, and kindled again from the sacred fire on Temora or Tara Hill at the idolatrous feast. Whether knowingly or ignorance, St. Patrick began his Paschal fire at usual by lighting a fire, and his fire on the hill of Slane was seen in amazement by King Laeghaire on the hill of Tara. The king at once took counsel with his people, and set out to see the reason, but as his Druids would not permit the king to enter the Christian enclosure for fear of magic, St. Patrick was required to come before the king and give an account of his doings. St. Patrick entered the royal assembly, intoning the verse of the Psalm (xx. 7): "Some put their trust in chariots, and some in horses; but we will remember the name of the Lord our God." But while the king had commanded that none should rise to shew the Christian bishop REVANCE, there was one of the king's pages, "Venus ex juvenibus regis, nomine Ercus," &c., who rose up, is said by some even to have offered St. Patrick his seat, received, at any rate, his blessing, and became the famous bishop of Naen, the place where the assembly was then held. (This story of the first meeting between St. Patrick and Naen, then a church, and of the first appearance of Erc, is told in the Lives of St. Patrick, as given by Colgan, and also by Trench in his Annotations in the Book of Armagh: see also upon it Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. c. 5, § 5; Todd, St. Patrick, 414 sq., and the account of St. Erc's coming from Trench, in ib. 442–5; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. i. 17, wks. vi. 409 sq.; Petrie, Tara Hill, 84 sq.) By the four Masters (by O'Donovan, i. 136 n. 137) he is included among the family of St. Patrick as "Bishop Erc, his sweet-spoken Judge," and Erninus (Vit. Tripl. S. Ftr.) calls him "Sanctus Ercus Episcopos, Cancellarius, et Supremus Judex in spiritualibus." He is spoken of as a speaker and the orator of St. Brendan (May 16) of Clonfert, who also received the monastic garb from him: this may have been the case, as both belonged to Munster, and may have been related by kindred. He was also a friend of St. Brigid (Feb. 1), and accompanied her into Munster, where they attended a large synod for some days. His obit is given by the Four Masters at A.D. 512. "St. Erc, bishop of Liscalp and of Parata-feur-féig, by the side of Sléithe-Truin, to the west, died on 2 Nov. His age was fourscore and ten years, when he departed," and the Mart. Doneg. gives the same entry, adding his genealogy, and the testimony of the "very ancient old vellum book" that in his last and life he was as great as St. Martin; but Ussher places his death in A.D. 514, and this Lanigan accepts as the true date. His relics appear to have been enshrined with those of St. Finnan of Clonard in 770 (Ann. Ulter.). In the Annalisa of Trenchan (preserved in the Book of Armagh, fol. 10, a.) St. Patrick would appear to be the head of the Havil cathedral, in which St. Ia and the other Irish devotees landed. His feast was on the vigil of All Saints, i.e. Oct. 31, and the parish feast at St. Ethel is still on the Sunday nearest to the festival of All Saints (Whitaker, Cathedral of Cornwall, i. p. 291, ii. p. 4 and 210; see, too, Lealand, Hist. iii. p. 20). Some identify him with St. Patrick, and eight churches in the plain of Leigh (in Meath), in which he first preached the gospel and built churches; of these in order is, "i. sickelis Cerne, in qua sepultus est Hercus qui portavit mortaliitatem magnam," but the reference in the closing words is unknown, though pointing apparently to his dying of the plague. (Colgan, Tr. Tanaum, 167, c. 98, 535, c. 71, 536, c. 72; Ussher, Eccl. Antiqu. vi. Ind. Chron. A.D. 514; O'Connor, Rev. Hibern. Scrip. ii. 88, 128; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. c. 8, § 4, c. 16, § 7; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 80 sq.; O'Connor, Ep. Nasc. 106; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 64, 75 n., 263.)

[ J. G. ]

EBC (3), bishop of Domnach-mór-Maigh-Leodhath in the north of Ul-Faolain. Commemorated Oct. 27. O'Clery says this may be Erc, bishop, son of Fergna, son of Folacha, of the race of Bresal Brec, from whom the Osraigh are descended. Erc, son of Fergna, is included by Colgan among the saints belonging to the house of St. Íker (Mar. 5) of Clogher. If so, he belongs to Leinster, about Kilkeney or Waterford, but O'Donovan (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, ii. 1138 n. 1) is of opinion that Magh Luadhath or Magh Luaghath, though the name is now obsolete, is probably the ancient name of the plain now called Maghera-Cregan, situated near Newtown-

Stewart, in the barony of Omagh, and county of Tyrone. Colgan thinks he may be the Erc who was a disciple of Senann, but the identification of this Erc is very uncertain (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 31, 91, 95). Colgan calls him "Martyr," and the Drummond Calendrical "confessor." (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 297; Colgan, Acta SS. 472, c. 3, 540; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 10, § 7, c. 11, § 4; bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 28.)

[ J. G. ]

EBC (3) Nasce, of Tulach-ulis, now Tullisky, in the barony of Lower Iveragh and county of Down, commemorated May 12. O'Clery's full entry on this day (Mart. Doneg. 125) is: "Hero Nasce, of Tulach-ulis, in Ui-Eachach Uladh. And Eare is of the race of Art Corb, son of Fioncha Suigheirdhe," but Dr. Reeves' version (Eccl. Antiq. 316 n. *) is: "Beanogsua of Tulach-ulis ('hill of the fort') in Ireach of Ultiaca, while Mart. Tidignt (Keller, Col. Ir. SS. p. xxvii) gives "Nasci" as a different individual, and the Drummond Kalendrical (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 13) has "apud Hibernian sancto confessoris Erci utale celeberrum." Among the saints who are descended from the family of St. Mida or Itsa (Jan. 16) Colgan (Acta SS. 73, c. 2) includes an Erc, virgin daughter of Magh Luadhath. His feast is May 12, but Erc of Tullyish is the only person of the name who stands in the calendars on that day.

[ J. G. ]

EBC (4), ST., or Herghy, brother of St. Ia gives name to the Cornish parish of St. Eth or "ecclesia St. Eth," in early documents known as the head of the Hayle estuary, on which St. Ia and the other Irish devotees landed. His feast was on the vigil of all Saints, i.e. Oct. 31, and the parish feast at St. Ethel is still on the Sunday nearest to the festival of All Saints (Whitaker, Cathedral of Cornwall, i. p. 291, ii. p. 4 and 210; see, too, Lealand, Hist. iii. p. 20). Some identify him with St. Ia or with the fourth bishop of Cornwall (Iselin 11), in Ireland, who died A.D. 514, and whose day is also at the beginning of November. William of Worcester makes St. Ercy the patron saint of Chitlehampton, in Devonshire, as well, and calls him a bishop, and adds, "jacet in quadrum ecclesias sita sub cruco ecclesiae Sancti Pauli Loundiarum." [C. W. B.]

ERC A (1), virgin, daughter of Eruin, of the family of St. Ia, is confirmed by Colgan with Erc of Tullisky. [EBC (3)].

ERC A (3) (Erbha), mother of St. Blane. [BLANE.]

ERCAMBERT is given in the list of the bishops of Beauvais as twentieth, succeeding the Ragingus and followed by Rocoaldus. (Gall. Christ. ii. 696.)

[ S. A. B. ]

ERCANBALD (Ercubald, Baron. Annal. ann. 801, xx. ed. Theiner), an officer (notarius) of Charlemagne, sent by him to Liguria in 801 to bring home the presents of the king of Persia. (Einhard Ann. s. a.) An Erkanbaldus 'cancellarius' (possibly identical with the above), is mentioned by Leo III. in a letter to Charles,

[ERCANRAD, bishop of Paris. [ERCHENRAD]]

[ERCENUALD (Kennel, C. D. 35, 38, 40), ERCEWALD (v. 18), bishop of London. [ERKENWALD]. [C. H.]

[ERCHAD, ERCHAN, ERCHARD. [IRCHARD]. [J. G.]

ERCHAN, clerical witness to the liberation from laical possession of the church of Tryleic Lann Mainiouc (Trelech, Monmouthshire) by Meurig, son of Arthfael, in the time of Cenethir, bishop of Llandaff (Lév. Land. by Rees, 453). [J. G.]

[ERCHANFRIDUS, named as bishop of Lau- rarecum, and likewise of Juvaviam (Salzburg), in the 6th century (Gama, Ser. Ep. 307, 327), the former town having been the primitive, and Juvaviam the later, seat of the Noricum bishopric. The transfer of the see is discussed by Friedrich, Das wahre Zeitalter des heil. Rupert. 1866, pp. 13-44). Laurarecum, on the right bank of the Danube, near the junction of the Leina opposite Mauthausen and below Linz, is the modern Lorch (Ferrarius, Lex. Geog. ; Witsch, Handb., i. 120). Neither in Friedrich nor in Hund (Metrop. Salisburgiens. 1582) does the name of Erchanfridus occur. Hainz (Germ. Sterc. i. 100) makes him bishop of Passavia (Passau) from 598 to 623. [T. W. D.]

[ERCHANWALDUS (Fredugar, Chron. continuit. i. 91, in Patr. Lat. ixxi. 665), mayor. [ERCHINOALDUS]. [C. H.]

[ERCHENEGODE (Gaimar, Estoric, v. 1285, in M. H. B. 780), daughter of Ercombert, king of Kent. [ERCOGONOTA]. [C. H.]

[ERCHENRADUS I. (HERCHENRADUS) was the forty-third bishop of Paris, following Deo.sfridus, and succeeded by Ermenfredus. The 1st extant a placitum dated in the seventh year of king Charles the Great (A.D. 775), in which judgment is given against Herchenradus in a dispute between him and Folraudus, abbot of St. Divodurum concerning the monastery of St. Mary and St. Peter, at Plaisir (Placium), near St. Germaines (Cod. Dipl. xxv. in Migne, Patr. Lat. xvii. 945, reprinted from Mabillon, de Re Diplom. lib. vii. num. 50, p. 518. The document does not occur in the collections of either Baluze or Pertz). In a diploma or charter of Louis the Pious given in the seventh year of his reign (A.D. 820) to the church of Paris, it is recited that Charles the Great had, upon the petition of Erchenradus, given a charter to the same church confirming it in the possession of property which the title-deeds had been burnt or lost. (Migno, Patr. Lat. civ. 1102.) He is said to have been present at the council of Frankfurt in A.D. 794 (Gall. Christ. vii. 29). [S. A. E.]

[ERCHERBRICHT (Gaimar, Estoric, 1275; M. H. B. 780), king of Kent. [ERCOMBERT]. [C. H.]

[ERCHINOALD succeeded Aega as mayor of the palace in Neustria to Clovis II. in 610. Erchinoald was of the Merovingian royal race, and is described by the chronicler (Fredugar, 84) as a man full of long-suffering and kindness, gentle and respectful towards the clergy, and without pride or rapacity. On the death of Fiochat in 642, Erchinoald became the ruler of Burgundy, if not titular mayor of the palace. (Pertz, Geschichte d. Merovingischen Hausern, p. 46.) On the death of Sigebert III. of Austrasia in 656, when Clovis became king of the united Frankish realm, Erchinoald became mayor of the palace in all three kingdoms (Pertz, 83; Bonnell, Anfänge d. Karolingischen Hause, p. 113), being the first to unite in his own person these three dignities. Shortly afterwards (c. 658) he died (Gesta Reg. Fr. 45), and Ethelwulf was appointed in his place in Neustria and Burgundy, Wulflof in Austrasia. [T. R. E.]

[ERCONAT (ERONAT, ERCA HERENAT), virgin, of Dun-la-er, now Dunów, in the barony of Upper Toome and county of Antrim. Commemo- rated Jan. 8, Oct. 30. Colgan (Acta SS. 41-2, Jan. 8) gives an account of this virgin from the references made to her in the Lites of St. Patrick. Her father was Daire, Dergs, or Dair, son of Finacht, son of Eugenius, son of Niall, of the race of Colluchachrioch, a tribal chief of the Hy-Néill, in that part where Armagh now stands; he gave Drummisleighe, now Armagh, to St. Patrick. So worthy in grace and virtue did St. Ercnat appear that St. Patrick gave her the charge of the sacred vest- ments, to make, cleanse, and repair them. This charge she received along with St. Luqita St. Patrick's own sister, and St. Cruibhresia, daughter of Britagh; but failing in her work with St. Benignus (Nov. 9) through her foolishness for that art in which the psalmist of St. Patrick excelled, she is said to have actually died of love and been brought to life again, thenceforward to love the saint only spiritually. She rests in Tamlacht-bo, a church in the prov- ince of Ulster, supposed by Dr. Reeves (Ecol. Antiq. 300 n. 2) to be Tamliaght, an- ciently called Tawlagahts-bo, a towanland in Eglash, near Armagh, and her feast is observed there and at Dunasane. According to Colgan she flourished A.D. 460, and had a double commemoration, Jan. 8 and Oct. 30; on the former the Mart. Doneg. commemorates "Ercnat, virgin, of Dún-da-éen, in Dal Araidhe," and on the latter "Herencat, virgin, of Dún-da-éen, in the Field- bhand, in 8 Dal Araidhe." The Four Masters calls her Erca, and count her one of the three embroderers of St. Patrick. But in the Réit of Aemnys the Culdees, there is a curious note on "Cuch, virgin, of Cill-Cuache in Caibre-Ua- Cardhha, she is called by the yellow bird (A.D. 789) at Jan. 8): "Ercnat, the virgyn nun, was cook and rooke-master to St. Columb Cillé, and her church Cille Ciocca, in Caibre-Ua-Cardhha.
ERECBERT

Erect was her true name, which means an embroidery, because Erwood, in the ancient Gædicæ, was the same as drawing and embroidering for: it was for that virgin who was the embroideryer, cutter, and sewer of clothes to St. Columba Gillæ and his disciples. ” [COCOA.]

(O'Curry, Lect. Anc. Ir. iii. 122; Mart. Doney, by Tedd and Reeves, ii. 599; Reeves, Ecl. Ant. 300 sq, and Anc. Ch. Aranagh, i–2; Four Mast. by O'Neavon, l. 138 n. 8, 139; Bp. Forbes, Ed. Scotti. Saini, p. 27; O'Hallan, Irish Saints, i. 124–6.)

[3. G.]

[3. H.]

EREBERT, king of Kent. [EREBERT.]

[3. H.]

ERCONVALD (Bed. H. E. iv. 11, in M. H. B. 221 a), ERECONVALD (Flor. Wig. Chron. ann. 664, 675; in M. H. B. 529 c, 535 a, b; id. Rom. Episc. Land. ib. 617 b; Boll. Acta SS. Ap. iii. 781), bishop of London. [ERKONVALD.]

[3. H.]

ERCONBERHT (Nennius, Hist. in M. H. H. 74 c), king of Kent. [EREBERT.]

[3. H.]

ERCUBALDUS (Bed. H. E. iii. 19, in M. H. B. 193 a), patrician in Gaul. [ERECHAR.-D.]

[3. H.]

ERCUIS, Cornish saint. [ERcu.]

ERECHOREUS (ERECHTIUS, ERETIUS, ERREDHORUS, ERYTHERUS), bishop of Lagnaria, in the province of Galatia Prima. (Wiltch. Handbood, i. § 104.) He was present at the Council of Nicaea, a.d. 314, and also at that of Nicaea, a.d. 325. The MSS. only give the name differently, but also the designations of thesee, some having Damasianus, others Gadatianus, Galatianus, Laganensis, Platonensis, Phoceanus, and Platanensis. Le Quen supposes all these variations to have arisen with Latin transcribers, who mistook the Greek letters of their originals. (Orosius Christ. i. 488; Gams. Sr. Episc. 441.) Lagnaria is the only known Galatian see to which the designations can apply. [T. W. D.]

ERECHTHIUS, bishop of Antioch in Pisidia, c. 440. A fragment of a sermon delivered by him in the great church at Constantinople before Proclus, at the Theophania, is given by Mai (Script. Vet. v. 165; and Migne, Patrolog. ix. 2, p. 3321).

[3. H.]

ERECHTHIUS, bishop of Lagnaria. [ERECHOREUS.]

ERECHTHEUS (ERECHTHEUS), commemorated March 3. Colgan gives a short memoir of St. Erecleth, presbyter and confessor, from the Triparty Life of St. Patrick. He was the friend and fellow-traveller of St. Patrick; when St. Patrick was in the region of the desertus, he was probably the father of Eochaidh Mainreamhar, and had built the church of Fothłam, in the same region built the church of Rathmadian which was so called from Muadan, father of Enan [ENAN (2)], and gave it to Erecleth. Colgan thinks this must have been about a.d. 450. (Colgan, Acta SS. 653–6, and Tr. Acta SS. 146, c. 130, 180 n. 147; Reeves, Ecl. Ant. 79, 284, 392; Lanigan, Ecl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 14 n. 8; Kelly, Cat. Ir. SS. p. 82.)

[3. G.]

EREDNAT (EREDNAN, HEREDNAT), commemorated Apr. 10. Known under these names in the Irish Martyrologies, she is identified with the Erniat, virgin daughter of a king of Cillauchan, in Ulster, who went south and took up her abode at Tulach Bennain, which is unidentified but appears to have been in Munster, and was a cell of St. Fintan (Jan. 3), abbati of Dunblaimise. (Colgan, Acta SS. 11 c. 7, 13 n. 14, 14, O'Hallan, Irish Saints, i. 46.)

[3. G.]

ERELEVA, a concubine of Theodemir, by whom she was the mother of Theodoric the Great, c. 454. She became a Catholic, and was known by the name Eusebia. (Excerpta Valesiana, i. e. the Chronicle of Maximian, archbishop of Ravenna; so Waits and Holder, Egger's, Montanis Recurum Ital. et Langob. 1878, p. 273; ed. Gardthausen, 1875, 58, p. 295.) She was living in 490, and probably later. (Jordan. ed. Closs, 180; Dahm, Die Kunst der Germanen, ii. 63.)

[3. A. H. D. A.]

EREDERRICH (Willehalm, Vit. Bonif. ii. 22, in Patr. Lat. lxixiiii. 605 n.; Baron. Ann. i. 739, 1), bishop of Freising. [ERLEMIRK]

[3. H.]

EREBERTUS (1), St., eleventh bishop of Toulouse, succeeding Willegisius. He was born at a place called Villollocorte, on the Seine, about five leagues above Paris, in the time of Dagobert I. or his son Clovis II. He joined the monastery of Fontanelle, where Wandregisius, or, according to another account, Lantbertus was abbot. At this time he must have been no longer young, as from the Life of St. Wandregisius it appears that he already had a son, Harthamius, who is spoken of as vir illustris and a benefactor of the monastery. In the time of Clotaire III. he was elected to the bishopric of Toulouse (c. 650). Nothing definite is related of his acts while bishop, except that he miraculously quenched a fire which broke out during a visit to his native place. After twelve years' labour in his see, he retired to his former monastery of Fontanelle, now ruled by Lantbert, afterwards archbishop of Lyons. His successor in the bishopric was Arduin. He is said to have died in a.d. 671 or 676, and was buried in the church of St. Paul, though his remains were more than once translated. He is commemorated on the 14th day of May. (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iii. 389; Gall. Christ. xiii. 8; Vita S. Wandregisii et Vita S. Anserii in Bouquet, tom. iii. pp. 593, 617.)

[3. A. B.]
EREMBERTUS, bishop of Thessalonica. [HEREMIUS.]

EREFA, sister of pope Damasus (Boll. Acta SS. 21 Feb. iii. 244.) [IRENE.] [J. G.]

ERENAUUS (ERENNEUS), confessor and Eremite, is a saint in Mra, Aberdeen-shire, mentioned by Dempster and Camerarius, but he is probably a Scotch reflection of the Irish Ermian (Aug. 18), son of Crecan, of Rathno. Dempster calls him the friend of St. Columba and author of Acta St. Columbae, lib. i. He says he flourished A.D. 587, and had his feast on Feb. 15, but Camerarius says Apr. 26. [ERINNUS (3.)] (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 192, 237; Tanner, Bd. 263; Camerarius, de Sot. Fort. 135; Dempster, Hist. Ecc. Gent. Scot. i. 265.) "Reliques celebantur in Sutherlandia" (Ferdun, Scotiah. iii. c. 14.) [J. G.]

ERENBREHTUS (ERENBREHTUS), tenth bishop of Worms, succeeding Folcwinus, and followed by Bernhardus. From a distinguished abbait at Weissenburg, he became bishop. He is said to be mentioned as bishop in a diploma of Charles the Great, dated in A.D. 798, confirming a gift made by king Dagsbert I. to St. Amandus, fifth bishop of the see, and to have died in the same year. The document attesting the original gift of Dagsbert is in Limog, Patr. Lat. ix. 505. (Gall. Christ. v. 663.) [S. A. B.]

ERENDRUDA (ERENDRUDA, ERENTROD, EREDRODA, AERODRUDA), abbess at Salzburg cir. 585 or later. She was niece of Rudbert or Rupert bishop of Worms, afterwards of Salzburg, and the apostle of Bavaria (first Vita S. Rudol. cap. 2, § 9, Boll. Acta SS. 27 Mart. iii. 704 a; second Vita, cap. 2, § 5, ibid. 705 e). Owing to the title "seror" by which Rudbert addressed the abbess in her spiritual capacity, they have been, as observed by Pagi (vii. ad Baron. 719), erroneously considered brother and sister (vid. Boll. Acta SS. 30 Juni. v. 580 c, marg.: Hund, Metrop. Salisb. i. 2, ii. 409, ed. Ratisb. 1719), while some have increased the confusion by making the Irish St. Trudpert their brother (Boll. 26 Apr. iii. 425 b; ibid. 427, Sylabyrinth. 3, 7, note). As Rudbert belonged to the royal stock of the Franks (Boll. 27 Maii. M. Rudol. ii. 2, 3, note), his niece was a lady of rank, "nobilitis virgo," and she was residing at Worms when invited by her uncle to preside over the female monastery he was founding at Salzburg. Thither she proceeded, accompanied by a body of matrons and virgins, one date of the event being A.D. 585; but much uncertainty attaches to the precise chronology of this abbess (second Fas. cap. 2, ut sup.). The monastery was seated high up the hill beyond the city walls, and was originally named Cella, but it subsequently became known as Nonnenberg, "Nunnarum mons" (Hund, ii. 409). The Bollandists, who reckon Erendruda's period cir. A.D. 630, commemorate her death on June 30 (ut sup.), but the feast of her translation was observed at Salzburg on Sept. 3 (ibid. 582 e). An account of this abbess will be found also in Hainaut, Germ. Sac. ii. 46. [C. B.]

ERENFRIDUS, bishop of Constance. [ERENFRIDUS.]

ERENIUS (HERENIUS; IRENUS, Jerome; *Aphthonos, Soc.; *Epiphanius, Soc.; Epiphanius, Epiphanius), one of the bishops invited to the see of Jerusalem by the Arians after the deposition of Cyril in A.D. 348. Jerome places him second, as successor to Eutyches. Eutyches is ignored by Socrates (H. E. ii. 45), Sozomen (H. E. iv. 30), and Epiphanius (H. E. iv. 30), who all place Erenius immediately after Cyril's deposition. See on this perplexed and intricate subject, Tillemont's note, Mem. Eccl. viii. 782. [E. V.]

ERENWALDUS (Baron. Annales Ecle. A.D. 724, 13), bishop. [ERENWALDUS.] [L. O. S.]

EREPTOLUS, bishop of Coutances, died about A.D. 475. He was, according to some accounts, a native of Coutances, sent from Rome as a missionary to his countrymen; according to others he was sent thither by St. Germanus while in Britain. (Gall. Christ. xi. 864; Gens. Eccl. Ep. 542.) [R. T. S.]

ERETIUS (Labbe, Conc. i. 1488 n, ed. 1671), bishop. "Eretius Placentensis Galliae Primus." [ERECHERUS.] [T. W. B.]

ERFO, A.D. 762. His name occurs in an ancient charter of a monastery of Friuli, found in the monastery of S. Mary, Val d'Aoste. In a corresponding copy found elsewhere the name is printed Herto. Whatever his name was, he states that he and his two brothers have founded certain monasteries at Friuli. In one of the copies he signs as abbot (Patr. Lat. xcl. 627). [W. M. S.]

ERFOINUS, A.D. 720. In a charter dated at Annunziata, February, in the reig of Chilperic II., Erofinus and his sons Tautarius and Rotarius make a grant of lands and goods in favour of the monastery of St. Coll. The lands are Oppenwiller (probably Poppenwiller, near Pfaffenweiler, near Freiburg), and Efferingen (Ecclesiast. Monum. iv. 51. sac. cci. vii. et viii. Patr. Lat. lxxviii. 1268). [W. M. S.]

ERFURWIN (EVURWIN, EFORWIN), a benefactor, with his coheirs Hildirad and Immerin, to the monastery of St. Virginia, at Venterode, the Aller, founded by St. Ludger the apostle of Saxony. Erfurwin's deed, dated at Diessen, Sept. 17, in the thirty-second year of Charlemagne, grants land in the wood of Hoist to the presbyter Ludger "and the relics of the Holy ERGNAT, Irish saint. [ERGNAT.]

ERHARDUS (Gama, Gr. Ep. 304), bishop of Katisbon. [ERARD.]

ERHART, a Northumbrian abbot who attended the synod in which the legates canons of 787 were accepted. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 460.)

ERIBALDUS, eighteenth in the list of the bishops of Vivilres, succeeding Arcandius, and followed by Thomas I. at the beginning of the 9th century. There is an instrument of gift in favour of the church of Vivilres bearing his name, but without date. (Roucher, Hist. religieuse etc. du Vincais, tom. i. p. 556; Gall. Christ. xvi. 547.)

ERIBALDUS CERNUUS, praepositus or provost of the cathedral of Arles, mentioned in the years 796, 799, during the pontificate of bishop Elixandus. From an early period it progressed to modern times the head of the chapter of Arles has borne the title of provost; though that of dean, which was a distinct office, occasionally occurs. Eribaldus Cernnus commences the extant series of provosts; but no successor occurs until A.D. 809. (Gall. Christ. i. 595 c.)

ERICIUS (ABRICO), bishop of Lausanne, present at the council of Chalon-sur-Saône, A.D. 650, (Gall. Christ. xv. 329; Manas, x. 1194.)

ERIMBERT (EREMBERT, ERMBERT), second bishop of Freising, brother (apparently the elder brother) of Corbinian, his predecessor, and the son of Waldekis, a Frankish noble (vil. Corbinian. by Aribus, cap. 1, § 1, in Bull. Acta SS. 8 Sept. iii. 281, and cap. 5, § 43, vid. p. 291 a, note ce; Swyss's Comment. cap. 7, § 84, vid. 276). He was consecrated to the see by Boniface, the apostle of Germany, according to the biographers of that saint (Otholin. cap. 31, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxiv. 645; Willibald, cap. 23, 623), and the date of this event is computed by Barbinius (A. E. ann. 739, i.) to have been A.D. 739 (see also Witsch, Handboek, i. 370). Not much reliance can be placed on this date. Hund (Metrop. Salisbury, i. 70, Ratisp. 1719) quotes one ancient authority, making Erimbert to have sat twenty-eight years, and another, which he prefers, giving him only thirteen. His successor Joseph was (according to Hund) elected in 755. Hansia (Germ. Soc. ii. 73) believes he did not live later than 748. The Annales Alamanici Majores (Pertz, Monum. Germ. xxiii. Script. xx. p. 782) give 750 as the year of his consecration. Erimbert's episcopalsee appears to have comprised a territory with the reign of Ulfo duke of Bavaria, Freising (on the Isar, north of Munich) being then the capital of Upper Bavaria and the ducal residence. In Erimbert's time the dioceses of Bavaria are said to have been definitely marked out. During his rule also many benefactors of the church of Freising appeared, a certain Mandebert with his wife Gisabur being especially named. Erimbert condu-

CHRIST. BIOGR.—VOL. II.

ERKND, thirteenth-seventh bishop of Auch, succeeding Amerius and followed by Lupus and Anzor, about the middle of the 9th century. (Gall. Christ. i. 976; Gams, Series Episc. 497.)

ERINYS, in a Gnostic system described by Irenaeus (v. 19), who describes it as the solemnities of the feast of St. Justus at Lyon. (Cell. x. 389.)

ERKEMBODUS, or ERKEMBOD, ST., fifth abbey of the monastery of St. Bertin (also called the monastery of Sithiu from its position) in the diocese of St. Omer. There are extant a charter of Chilpéric II., given in the third year of his reign (718), confirming to Erkemodus and the monastery gifts of his predecessors, and two of Theoderic IV. in A.D. 721, of similar import, all making mention of venerabilis vir Erkemodus (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1120-1132). In 723, upon the death of Ravengerus, he was made bishop of Teroianne (ecclesia Morinensis), but retained the government of the monastery, and in the same year enriched it by the purchase of various lands, the deed conveying which may be seen in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1279. He died April 12, on which day the ceremony was observed, about the year 737, and was succeeded in the bishopry by Adalgerus. He was buried in the church of St. Omer. (Boll. Acta SS. Ap. ii. 92; Gall. Christ. iii. 487, x. 1531; Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. ann. 723, n. x㎡. tom. iv. p. 699.) [S. A. B.]

ERKENEBERT (1) (Gama, Gr. Episc. 294), bishop of Minden. [HERKEBERT.]

ERKENEBERT (2) (Wend. F. H. ann. 640), ERKENBRIGT (Gnaimar, Estoríc, v. 1263, in M. H. B. 789), king of Kent. [EARCOBERT.]

ERKENGOTA (Wend. F. H. ann. 640), daughter of Earconbert, king of Kent, abbess of Brie. [EARCONGOTA.]

ERKENWALD, the fourth bishop of the East Saxons, whose capital and episcopal see was London (M. H. B. 617); brother of St. Ethelberga, founder of the abbey of Bucking and Chertsey, and specially honoured at St. Paul's. On the early life of Erkenwald we have no historical light, but the legendary biographers assert that he was born at Stallington, in Lindsey, and was connected by birth with the family of Offa, king of the East Angles, by which statement probably the "Ulfings," the family denomination of the East Anglian kings, is to be understood. (Capgrave, f. 130.) According to the same authorities he was brought early under the influence of Mellitus, who was bishop of London from 604 to 619. From Bede we have more trustworthy information as to the next stage in his career. We learn that before he was raised to the episcopate he had gained a high reputation for sanctity, and become the founder of two monasteries: one at Chertsey in Surrey, in the kingdom of the West Saxons, the other at Barking in Essex. Chertsey he governed himself; Barking he committed to the care of his sister Ethelburga as a school for women. (Bede, H. E. iv. 6) In the foundation of Chertsey Erkenwald was assisted by Frithewald, who is called by William of Malmesbury (G. P. ed. Harland, p. 89) a regius canonicus, or canon regular, of Wulfhere, king of Mercia. This statement is to some extent supported by charters of Chertsey, in which Erkenwald and Frithewald are mentioned as joint founders, and which, though not beyond suspicion as charters, are good evidence of ancient tradition. In one of these (Kemble, C. D. 35) Frithewald bestows estates on the monastery which Erkenwald rules, and which had been founded in the days of Egbert, king of Kent; in a third (ib. 988) Erkenwald and Frithewald join in a full settlement of the monastery, whose offfice, a unit of 131* CNA, in 787, confirms the grants of the two founders settled a century before. If these documents are to be trusted Chertsey must have been founded whilst Surrey was in the hands of Egbert of Kent, who died in 673; it must later have come under the rule of Frithewald, the future saint, whose death is mentioned in 675, and who was Egbert's brother-in-law; the foundation could therefore have preceded Erkenwald's elevation to the episcopate by a very few years. The foundation at Barking probably kept pace with that of Chertsey. To instruct his sister in the monastic rule, Erkenwald, according to his late biographers, invited Hildebold, bishop from Chelles; the nun Eadgifu died of the plague in 684 (Bede, H. E. iv. 8), Barking must have been founded before that year; the Chertsey register, however (Mon. Angl. i. 436), gives 663 as the year of the foundation of Barking, and there is a charter of Erkenwald, no doubt spurious but ancient, in which the year 677 is given (ibid. p. 435).

N

[Erinthelwulf (3.)]

On the death of Wina, to whom Wulfhere had sold the see of London, and probably, after the death of Wulfhere, to whom the East Saxons kings Sebbi and Sighere were subject (Bede, H. E. iii. 30), Theodore consecrated Erkenwald as Wina's successor, or rather, as the legendary life puts it (Dugdale, Hist. Poul. ed. 1658, p. 182), as successor to St. Cedd, the apostle of the East Saxons. The exact date of his appointment is not given by Bede, but as it is placed directly after the deposition of Winfrith, bishop of Mercia, in 675, it was probably in that or the following year, and may denote the reconstruction of the church of Barking for the East Saxons after the death of Wulfhere. In 676 the name "Friuginaldus," which probably represents Erkenwaldus, is found attached to a copy of a charter of the Hwiccian prince Osric. (Kemble, C. D. 12). The other charters throw no light upon this point, unless we may trust the abstract quoted by the charter of 684, in which Erkenwald is made to say that he had visited Rome in the time of pope Agatho and in the year 677; even this he might have done as abbot.

The length of his episcopate is uncertain: eleven years are assigned to it in the notice of his life cited by Wharton (Episc. Lond. p. 17); if this be accepted, his death would fall in 687, but 685 is the year assigned by the same authority (Dugdale, Hist. Poul. p. 113); in the Barking charter he is represented as alive in 685, eighteen years after his visit to Rome. On this point we have two important evidences in the king of Wessex, who began to reign in 688, in the preface to his laws, issued in or about 690, describes himself as legislating with the counsel of Eorcenwald his bishop. (Thorpe, Ancient Laws, p. 45; Haddan and Stubbs, cii. 214). With this the evidence of charters agrees; there are two attested by him in his closing years, in one of which, undated, he witnesses a grant to Barking made by Hildilirid, a kinsman of King Sebbi, attested by bishops Wilfrid and Haedde, and therefore probably belonging to the period of Wilfrid's exile in Mercia after the year 692. (Kemble, C. D. 35). In another which is less trustworthy and dated 698 (ib. 594) he attests a charter of an archdeacon, and it appears probable, then, that Erkenwald survived Theodore, who died in 690, and did not live to see the consecration of Britwald in 693. When Sebbi king of Essex, shortly before his death in 695, went into a monastery, he received the monastic habit from Wulfhere, Erkenwald's successor. The year of Erkenwald's death is not fixed about 693; the day as observed among the festivals at St. Paul's was April 30.

Erkenwald is one of those early prelates whose posthumous fame, bearing no property to the known events of their history, shews that their whole life and character impressed their generation more than any single act or trait. He was in close relations with three if not four of the rival dynasties of southern England, Kent, Wessex, Essex, and Mercia. He was summoned by Theodore when on his deathbed to advise him as to the restoration of Wilfrid in 686. (Edw. Y. Wilfr. c. 42). He was the founder of two famous monasteries, and such a benefactor to his cathedral foundation that he was reputed to have founded its first at Erkenwald. His personal sanctity is spoken of by Bede in language which even his professed enemies in the biographies do not exceed; and the tradition that miracles of healing were ordinarily wrought by the horse-carcass which he had used in his illness is recorded with no expression of doubt by the venerable historian himself.

To the details of his life, as given by Bede, the biographers add little, except the story of a miracle in which his carriage is represented as running on one wheel when the other had parted from the axle, and some circumstances about his death and funeral. According to this story he was attacked by robbers at the Mannau, for at the East Saxons he called his friends and servants around him and blessed them before he breathed his last. Whilst he was dying the chamber was filled with a sweet odour. As soon as he was dead the monks of Chertsey and the nuns of Barking each claimed his body for burial in their own church. During the struggle the citizens of London broke in, and insisted that, as he had been ordained bishop in their city, he should be buried there. They then proceeded to carry off the body, followed by the monks and nuns. As soon as they quitted the monastery the torches were put out by a storm of wind and rain. When they came to the river Lea, they found it swollen and impassable without boats, which were not at hand. The monks and nuns claimed this as a divine interposition on their behalf; the Londoners stoutly resisted, and declared that they would not yield. The quarrel was allayed by the mediation of one of Erkenwald's clergy, who advised both parties to pray for a sign from heaven that might determine the question; and the multitude immediately betook themselves to prayers and hymns. Thereupon the water divided and allowed the procession to advance to Stratford, where the torches were miraculously relighted and the storm ceased. The remains of the bishop were carried into London, being met by a crowd of rejoicing citizens, and placed in a shrine in the body of the church of St. Paul. On Feb. 16, 1140, the body was placed in a new shrine in the same place. From that place the relics were removed in 1143, and on Nov. 11, 1148, and placed in a new shrine on the east side of the wall above the high altar. (M. Westm. p. 245.) In 1386 bishop Braybrooke decreed that the feasts of the deposition and translation of St. Erkenwald should be kept on equal terms with the highest festivals; offerings were made and masses were said at the shrine till the Reformation; it had considerable endowments, and was the centre of a religious gild. (Dugdale, pp. 20–22.) An engraving of the shrine is given by Dugdale, who has likewise preserved the short biography of the saint which was hung by the side of it, and which gives 675 as the date of his consecration, 625 as that of his death. (Ch. 113.) The tablet containing this was erected apparently in 1632.

At St. Paul's Erkenwald received all the honours due to a founder. His festivals were kept as first-class feasts, "sicut sanctum diem Dominicam," by bishop Braybrooke's ordinance (statute of St. Paul's, ed. Simpson, p. 393); on them bishops and priests officiated, and the personal attendance on the service (so p. 11); there were special forms of S. Acta and Post-communion. (So p. 394.) Among the muniments was preserved a privilege brought by the saint himself from Rome (So. p. 379; Haddan and Stubbs, vol. i. 161), by which pope Agatho (A.D. 678–681) among other benefices secured to the clergy (congregatio) of the monastery the right of electing their bishops, who were to be confirmed at Rome. The continuity of the miracle-working at the shrine is remarkable even in an age of such wonders; and the indulgences granted were in proportion to the reputation of the sanctuary.

The memory of Erkenwald was cherished as long and as continuously. Besides the charters already noticed, the cartulary contained a privilege of exemption granted by pope Agatho to Chertsey, probably forged in the time of Edgar, but seemingly the model on which the privilege of St. Paul's was framed; by which the monastery was exempted from all interference from without, and the election and confirmation of the abbot were provided for. (Haddan and Stubbs, vol. i. 161-163.) A more genuine as well as more ancient evidence is found in a letter addressed by Sigebald, abbot apparently of Chertsey, to St. Boniface, in which he entreats him to allow himself to be recorded as a patron of the writer, together with bishop Daniel of Winchester, his diocesan; and, should Sigebald survive, the saint's name is to be inserted with that of St. Erkenwald in his prayers. (Mon. Mogetini, pp. 166, 167.) The Cartulary (MS. Vitellius A. 13) also contains a history of the foundation of the abbey, which is placed in 665. (Mon. Angl. i. 426.) At Barking also the memory of Erkenwald was had in honour. The charter granted by Erkenwald himself secured to the monastery privileges analogous to those contained in the papal grants to St. Paul's and Chertsey (Mon. Angl. i. 453, 499), which privileges the grantor had been empowered by pope Agatho to bestow when eighteen years before the granting of the charter, in 677, he had visited Rome. If this charter was genuine, which it is not, it would prove that Erkenwald lived until 695; it is attested by the same witnesses as those who attest the charter of Hildirex above mentioned. The fact that Erkenwald's name rests on the evidence of these charters and on the words of the biographer, that he was "de urbe Romulea destinatus." (Dugdale, p. 183.) It is not in itself improbable, but cannot be accepted as true without better evidence.

The historical materials for St. Erkenwald's life and miracles are less rich than those concerning Cedd, quoted, a Vita S. Erkenwaldi, preserved in two 12th century MSS., Cotton, Claud. A. 5, and C.C.C.C. 161, is printed by Dugdale (ed. 1658, p. 181; ed. 1818, p. 289). This life is supposed by Sir T. D. Hardy to be the work of a canon of St. Paul's, nephew of bishop Gilbert of Universalis (1128–1134), who also wrote the book on the miracles, which is found in the same C.C.C. MS. (Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 299, 293.) Two other lives, one based upon this and printed by Capgrave, and in the Acta S. Ruperti, Holland, Apr. 30, vol. iii. p. 780; and another unprinted of the 14th century are also noticed by Sir T. Hardy. But all these are really of too late date to add anything trustworthy to the account of Bede, or the local tradition exemplified in the charters, which were probably fabricated in the reign of Edgar. The real fame of Erkenwald must rest on the fact that under the guidance and advice of Theodore he developed the condition of his great and influential diocese from the missionary stage in which Cedd had left it to the full-grown state in which it became a well-organised church. Unfortunately the history of London during the whole Anglo-Saxon period is very obscure, but the great fame of Erkenwald, and the continuous honour shewn to him, seem to prove that he had been the greatest founder at Westminster for whom the memory was cherished. It is not, however, recognised through the space of the four centuries that followed the conversion. More can scarcely be said; the continuity of his cultus and the permanence of the work ascribed to him, tell more than the most minute biography.

[S.]

ERLAUREUS. Twenty-eighth bishop of Meaux, following Sigebaldus; and succeeded by Aidenerus, in the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. viii. 1902.)

[1 A. B.] 2
ERLEFRIDUS. In the Chartulary of Saint Bertin, compiled by Folquinus, a monk of that abbey, about A.D. 875, chapter xix. recounts the succession of Erlefridus to Rigobertus as abbot of the monastery of Sithun; chapter xx. is a deed of purchase of certain lands executed by him; chapter xxi. relates the death of St. Bertin (the founder of the monastery), under the rule of Erlefridus; chapter xxii. the death of Erlefridus and succession of Erlemman as abbot. For an inscription on a stone which is declared to have been found in 1753 in the cloisters of the monastery of Samos, in the diocese of Lugo, in which Ermeferdus appears as the founder or restorer of the monastery, see Exp. Sagra. xiv. 367. Hubner has not admitted it into his Inscriptiones Hispaniae Christianae, and the authority of the stone for the attribution of the work in matters of inscriptions. (Exp. Sagra. xvi. 80; Aguirre-Catalanii, iii. 448, iv. 158.) [M. A. W.]

ERLINGUS, an archbishop of Tours, said to have been the forty-third, succeeding Gaviusus, and followed by Josephus I., but there is great uncertainty as to the order of the bishops of this see, between Gregory and Josephus I. He lived towards the close of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 33; Game, Series Episc. 560.) [S. A. B.]

ERLOMANN had been kept in chains by Moenach, king of Munster, but on being released at the intercession of St. Fechin, he embraced the monastic life, lived under Fechin's rule, and died in sanctity. He does not appear in the calendars. (Colgan, Acta SS. 137-38; O'Healon, Irish Saints, i. 370, 371.) [J. G.]

ERMACICUS appears among the signatures of the third Council of Toledo as Ermanicus Laniobrencis. The see of Laniobris cannot, however, be identified. The name appears in three councils—the third, thirteenth, and sixteenth, and nowhere else. Florrez supposes the name to be a copyist's error for Britonicius, a theory which Game has adopted in his Series Episcoporum. (Exp. Sagra. xvii. 20; Gama, Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, vol. ii. part ii. p. 15; Aguirre-Catalanii, iii. 236, iv. 257, 353.) [M. A. W.]

ERMERT (Annales Altabenses Major, ann. 750; Boll. Acta SS. 8 Sept. iii. 201 A) bishop of Freising. [ERMERT.] [C. H.]

ERME, Cornish saint. [Hermes.]

ERMEDHACH (Airmedhach, Airmedhach, Ermedhach, Ermedhach, Hermid), abbot of Craealaisa, commemorated Jan. 1. He was the founder and patron of the monastery of Craealaisa ("the tree of St. Laisre"), now Crevagh, near Clonmacnoise, and on the banks of the Shannon, King's County. He is called Ermidhach in the Ann. Four Masters, which places his death on Jan. 1, A.D. 681. In attempting to identify Athinem or Ermedus, bishop of Clochar (Clogher), who is named in the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick among those who wrote the acts of that saint, Colgan suggests that he may be this Ermighach or Hermid of Craealaisa, but the only likelihood lies in the similarity of names. (Colgan, Acta SS. 742, c. 8; and Tr. Thom., 62. 8c. 129 127 n. 44; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 268, n. t, 269; O'Healon, Irish Saints, i. 19, ii. 261; Irish Nunnery, by Todd and Herbert, 208; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 5.) [J. G.]

ERMEFRIDUS, bishop of Lugo from about A.D. 655 onwards, signs the eighth council of Toledo in 653, under Rekeasvitha, and the death in 656. He was, therefore, the contemporary and, after the tenth council of Toledo, the sufragans of St. Peter of Salamanca. For an inscription which is declared to have been found in 1753 in the cloisters of the monastery of Samos, in the diocese of Lugo, in which Ermeferdus appears as the founder or restorer of the monastery, see Exp. Sagra. xiv. 367. Hubner has not admitted it into his Inscriptiones Hispaniae Christianae, and the authority of the stone for the attribution of the work in matters of inscriptions. (Exp. Sagra. xvi. 80; Aguirre-Catalanii, iii. 448, iv. 158.) [M. A. W.]

ERMEGUNDIS, an Anjouin woman, healed of blindness and contraction of the limbs on the feast day of St. Martin at Tours. (Greg. Tur. Mirac. St. Martin, iv. 23, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxi. 1000.) [T. W. D.]

ERMELENDIS, a virgin anchorite in Brabant, c. A.D. 600. She was born of noble parents, Ermenoldus and Ermesindis, and was related to Pippin and his daughter, St. Gertrude, a saint whose virtues she was desirous of emulating. As she was resolved to spend her days in celibacy and solitude, contrary to the wish of her parents, they assigned her the profits of their little village of Odene. The spot, where was probably their abode, is the modern Donck, not far from the left bank of the Demer, near its junction with the Gete or Gette, its principal affluent, below Hasselt. She would not remain however, but, divesting herself of her locks, set out alone, and, after a narrow escape with her honour in one place where she attempted to settle, reached the village of Nielst. Now Meldert, some eight miles distant, beyond the Demer, on a little beck named the Zwart that runs into that river. Here she subsisted on wild herbs for the rest of her days. Forty-eight years after her death her obscure tomb was discovered in a vision to a wayfarer, who built a chapel over it in her honour. She was canonized on Oct. 29. Her life and feast are in an ancient manuscript belonging to the church of Maestricht, is given by Surius. (De Prob. Hist. SS. 29 Oct. iv. 398.) [C. H.]

ERMELIUS, a Belgian saint. [Elmerus.]

ERMEMBERTUS (Erminbertus, Mon. Carol. 278), thirty-ninth occupant of the see of Bourges, succeeding Decudatus. There is extant a letter of pope Adrian to Charlemagne, assigned to the year 786, from which it appears that the king had sent Ermenbertus to Rome to obtain from the pope the pallium, which at this time was worn by archbishops only. Bourges being the metropolitan see of Aquitaine, the request was granted, as appears from Adrian's letter. Ermembertus is said to have died A.D. 788, and was succeeded by Serquitus (Cass. Greg., De Ord. Hier., ii. 20, and Instr. 2; Migne, Patr. Lat. xxvii. 392; Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. anno 760, n. 59-60; anno 788 n. 19, tom. vii. pp. 315, 370.) [S. A. B.]

ERME, virgin, commemorated on Feb. 13, and perhaps to be identified with Mar. O'Germain's Ermita of the same day, but otherwise unknown (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 49, and n. ; O'Healon, Irish Saints, i. 516). [J. G.]
ERENALDUS, bishop of Senlis. [Ericinus.]

EREMARIUS (1), bishop of Limoges. [Ericinus.]

EREMARIUS (2) (Hermennarius, Herminarius), twenty-sixth bishop of Autun, succeeding St. Leodegarius (Léger) and followed by Ansebertus. Our information concerning him is derived from the earliest and best of the Lives of St. Léger dedicated by the anonymous and contemporary author to Eremarius himself. During the persecution which ended in the martyrdom of his predecessor, Eremarius was abbot of the monastery of St. Symphorian. St. Léger being shut up in Luxeuil, the people, wishing for the presence of a bishop among them, asked Childeric II. to appoint Eremarius, and it seems that the latter at the same time begged earnestly of the king that St. Léger might not be brought forth from Luxeuil, fearing that his enemies meant him harm. It appears that the motives of Eremarius were misunderstood, and he was accused of being his bishop's foremost enemy, in order that he might obtain his place (a. 6). Later, when St. Léger was lying in the custody of Wanigus with his features mutilated, Eremarius obtained access to him, tended his wounds, and gave him food and drink (a. 13). Lastly, he came forward to claim, though unsuccessfully, the body of the martyr for his own church of Autun (a. 17). This life is published by Mabillon in the Acta SS. Ord. S. Benedicti, sec. ii. p. 680 seqq., Paris, 1928-1701. Eremarius's episcopate began in 678, the year of St. Léger's death, but its duration is unknown (Gall. Christ. iv. 356).

[S. A. B.]

ERENBERGA (1), daughter of Bettero or Witieric, king of the Spanish Visigoths. In 697 she was sought in marriage by the Theuderic king of Burgundy, and was allowed to be conducted to him by his ambassadors, Aridius bishop of Lyon and two others, after they had engaged by oath that she should never be degraded from her royal dignity. She became, however, the victim of court intrigues, which made her disliked by Theuderic, who sent her back to her father, but kept the treasure she had brought with her. (Fredeg. Chron. ann. 697, § 30, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxi. 631.)

[T. W. D.]

ERENBERGA (2) (Flor. Wig. od Chron. App. in M. H. B. 635 c, 638 a), queen of Mercia, daughter of Eorean king of Kent. [Eormenburgh.]

[C. H.]

ERENBERGA (1) (Flor. Wig. Gen. Reg. Cont. in M. H. B. 627; id. od Chron. App. in M. H. B. 635 c), daughter of Eorean king of Kent, sister of Erenberga queen of Mercia. Wendover (F. H. ann. 654, 676) makes her daughter of Eorean king of Kent, wife of Merewald king of Mercia, and the foundress of an abbey; but see Eormenburgh (1). [C. H.]

ERENBURGA (2), supposed abbess of Eastry [Eormenburgh (1)].

ERENBURGA (3), queen of Northumbria and abbess. [Eormenburgh (2)].

EREMFRIDUS (1), son-in-law of Aega or Aequae the mayor of Nucastria. Having in 640 slain count Aenulf or Ainsulf in a gallus held at a place named Albiederum (unidentified; see Bouquet, Recueil, iii. Geog. Index), he fled for sanctuary to the church of St. Remigius at Rheims. (Fredeg. Chron. cap. 83, ann. 640, in Patr. Lat. lxii. 658; Aimoin, iv. 37, in Patr. Lat. cxxix. 37.) [C. H.]

EREMFRIDUS (2), forty-fourth bishop of Paris, succeeding Erchenradus I. and followed by Inchadus. He is said to have been present at the council of Aix-la-Chapelle in A.D. 809, but it is only a conjecture. (Gall. Christ. vii. 30.)

[S. A. B.]

EREMFRIDUS (1), abbot of Cusantia (Cusae) in Franche-Comté, a spot about seven miles from the left bank of the Doubs at the source of a little stream, the Cuisancin, which flows into that river near Beaune-des-Dames, above Besançon. It is still marked by some castle and monastic ruins. Eremfridus was born of noble parents, and with his brother Wandalen passed some years of early life at the court of Clotaire III. About 627 he entered the religious life under abbot Waldebert at Luxovium (Luxeuil), the foundation of Columbanus, and at that time in the freshness of its fame. A monastery had been already erected at Cusantia by a nobleman named Iserius, and the property came by inheritance to Eremfridus, who restored or enlarged the buildings, and, with the help from Luxeuil, went to preside there in person. Before the third year of Dagobert he subjected the house as a priory to Luxeuil. After a good old age he was buried near his brother in the church of St. John the Baptist at Cusantia, and his memory was long afterwards venerated in those parts. He was commemorated on Sept. 25. His life by Egilbert or Gilbert, a subsequent prior of Cusantia, is given by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Sept. vii. 111). The monastery was in the 12th century made a priory of St. Eugenius Jurenensis, now St. Claude, on the southern slopes of the Jura, at the junction of the Bienne and its affluent the Tacon. [T. W. D.]

EREMFRIDUS (2) (Ermefrundus, Hermefrondus), the slayer of Ebroin mayor of the palace, was a Frank noble, who held a fiscal office in the kingdom of Theodoric III. Ebroin had deprived him of the greater part of his property, and threatened him with death. Eremfridus, driven to despair, resolved to anticipate his persecutor. Stationing himself one Sunday morning at daybreak before Ebroin's door, he struck him down with his sword as he issued forth to attend matins (A.D. 681). He made good his escape to Austrasia, where he was welcomed by Ebroin's foe, duke Pippin. (Vita S. Leodegar. aucl. anon. xvi.; Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. S. Benedicti ii. 694, Paris, 1868-701; Fredeg. Chron. Cont. xviii.; Gest. Regum Francorum, xlviii.; Siegb. Gembl. Chron. ann. 688; Chron. S. Denis, v. 24; Breuv. Chron. in Bouquet, iii. 385.)

[S. A. B.]

EREMFRIDUS (3) (Gall. Christ. v. 894), abbot of Augia Dives, and bishop of Caestia. [Eremfridus.]

[C. H.]

Slaughered by Google
ERMENGITHA

ERMENGITHA (Flor. Wig. ad Chron. App. in M. H. B. 635 c), daughter of Eormenred king of Kent. [EORMENGITHA] [C. H.]

ERMENHILDA (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 76, ed. Hardy; Wend. F. H. ann. 676, ed. Coxe)

ERMENILDA (Flor. Wig. ad Chron. App. in M. H. B. 635 d, 637 e; Thom. Eliens. in Angl. Sac. i. 580; Dagbl. Monast. i. 458, ii. 48; Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 368, 369), daughter of Eorcumbert king of Kent, queen of Mercia, abbess. [ERMENGHILDA] [C. H.]

ERMENY, thirty-first occupant of the see of Arignon, succeeding Eucharius and followed by Antoinius. The compilers of the Gallia Chris tiana (i. 865) quote an old codex to the effect that he was born in Burgundy, and that, when ordained bishop by St. Caesarius of Arles, he was a priest or abbot of the monastery of the Holy Cross at Arles. Pope Boniface II., in a letter to Caesarius, speaks of Antoinius, presbyter and abbot, as the bearer of letters from Caesarius (A.D. 530). The variation in the initial letter is of no great weight. He is said to have died in A.D. 547. (Gall. Christ. i. 865; Migne, Patr. Lat. Liv. 31.) [S. A. B.]

ERMENO, bishop of Senlis. [ERMINTUS]

ERMENRED (A. S. C. ann. 840, in M. H. B. 310; Flor. Wig. Chron. ann. 875, in M. H. B. 534 k; id. ad Chron. App. in M. H. B. 638 A; Wend. F. H. ann. 640, 654; Malm. G. R. A. i. § 78, ed. Hardy), son of Eadbad king of Kent. [ERMENRED] [C. H.]

ERMETHIEUS, nineteenth bishop of ToUL, succeeded Adeodatus, after whose death the see was vacant for some months, owing to the wars between Dagobert II. of Austrasia, and Theodoric III. of Burgundy. He flourished about 890, and is said to have obtained from Theodoric the restitution of a piece of land called Occiavilla, wrongly held from the church by count Hild eranus. He was succeeded by Magnaldaus. (Gall. Christ. xiii. 904.) [S. A. B.]

ERMENRANNUS, an archdeacon who subscribed the council of Ronen, held in A.D. 682. (Baron. ann. A. E. 682, n. xi.; Labbe, Conc. vii. 1449.) [S. A. B.]

ERMENTRUDA, a matron of rank, who be quathed certain possessions to certain churches at A.D. 700 at Paris. A long fragment of his will remains, signed by her friend count Mt. mmolus and other distinguished persons. Its Latinity is extremely barbarous. Among churches she mentions the basilica of the Holy Cross or of St. Vincent of Paris, also that of St. Symphorian. Among her bequests is the chariot in which she was driven, with the oxen that belonged to it. This was the custom of noble ladies under the Merovingian kings. (Greg. Turon. Hist. iii. 26. The will is given in Eccles. Monum. sac. vii. et viii. in Patr. Lat. lxxviii. 1243.) [W. M. S.]

ERMENUS (ERMIARIUS, ERMENUS), 23rd bishop of Limoges, succeeding Caesarius, and followed by Salutaris. In A.D. 690 he is said to have buried the remains of St. Tillo (St. Thillo) the recluse of Solignac, and to have been the cause by which he was miraculously healed of an infirmity. (Gall. Christ. ii. 505.) [S. A. B.]

ERMESINDA (BERMESINDA), Pelayo's daughter and the wife of Alfonso the Catholic duke of Cantabria. Through her marriage (? before 737) with Alfonso the two small Christian states of Cantabria and Asturias were, after Faviola's death, united, when Alfonso succeeded his brother-in-law, in right of his wife, and in the absence of other sons of Pelayo. The union thus achieved of the whole of the country north of the Asturias mountains, between the Pyrenees and Galicia under one head, is of course an important step in the history of the infant kingdom. [ALFONSO I.] Ermesinda was the mother of Fruila I. (q. v.) and Vimarauns, and of Adosinda, who afterwards became the wife of Silo, and who is mentioned in the Liberius of Beatius and Etherius against Elipando. [ADOSINDA.] Alfonso the Catholic and his wife were buried together in the monastery of St. Mary, near Oviedo, (Seb. Sal. cap. 15, and Esp. Sagra. xiiii.), but her tomb, together with Alfonso's, is now shown in the church of Covadonga (Flores, Regnum de España, i. 44). [M. A. W.]

ERMINA. [ERMIN (7)].

ERMINFRID, son of Eadbald king of Kent. [ERMIRNRED]. [C. B.]

ERMINSUS, ST., born at Laudunum (Laroix) in Picardy. Becoming famous for his learning and piety, he was removed to the monastery of Laubium (Lobbes), on the left bank of the Sambre, nearly opposite Thuin, in Hainault, where he succeeded St. Ursus as abbot and bishop. He excelled as a preacher, and was held in great repute as a prophet. He died A.D. 737, and was commemorated on April 25. (Acta SS. 25 Apr. iii. 374; Baron. Annates Eccles. a.d. 737, 3.) [I. G. S.]

ERMINSUS (ERMENUS, HERMINUS, ERMENYSUS, ERMENALDUS), twenty-fifth bishop of Senlis, following Ragnaldus, and succeeded by Godsfredo. All we know of him is that he was present at three councils held at Rheims in A.D. 815, at Noyon in 814, and at Aix-la-Chapelle in 815. (Gall. Christ. x. 1834; Pliodratian, Hist. Eccl. Eiren. ii. 18; Labbe, Conc. ix. 339, 393, 399.) [S. A. B.]

ERMUS, bishop of Nantes. [ERNUS].

ERMOALD I., a Frank noble near Chartres in the 8th century, who after an ill-spent life sent a present of forty solidi on his death-bed to the abbot Launomarus with a request that he would pray for his recovery. The abbot returned the money with this text: "The sacrifices of the wicked are an abomination to the Lord." (Vita Launomari, cap. iv. § 19, Boll. Acta SS. 19 Jan. ii. 233.) [T. W. D.]

ERMILOUNDUS, bishop in Brittany, 710.

ERMULFUS, bishop of Coimbra in 633, in which year Renatus, archbishop of Coimbra, signs his name as his vicar, and the men of Toledo. (Ep. Sagra. xiii. 73, Aguirre-Catalan, iii. 385.) [LUCNISIUS] [M. A. W.]
ERNUFOLUS (Bar. A. E. ann. 733, iv.), heretic. [ERNUFOLUS] [C. H.]

ERNUCHUAG, of Dun-da-en, is given in the Fechtir of Aengus at Oct. 30 as "Ernachuag, son of Jairn his name, and of Dun-da-en in the Fhearch (wood) of Daladrach he is commemorated" (Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 300, 380). The place is now Dunane, in the barony of Upper Toome, co. Antrim, and the person is to be distinguished from Ernacht or Herenart virgin of Dunane (Oct. 30), and Ernacht, son of Echin (Oct. 30).

J. G.

ERNADHACH (EIKHNAK), son of Echin, abbot of Leithghlinn (Leighlin, co. Carlow), died A.D. 774 (Ann. Uit. 773; Four Mast. 769).

J. G.

ERNEUS (ERNEUS, ERNEUS, HERNEUS), founder and abbot of the monastery of St. Martin, near Le Mana, in the 6th century. His name appears only in modern martyrlogies. (Boll. Acta SS. 9 Aug. ii. 423; Gallia Christ. xiv. 432.) [T. W. D.]

ERNAN is a name which assumes many forms, such as ERNAN, ERHAN, etc., and MARNOCH (from the use of the affectionate prefix Mo- sad of the diminutive oc), and is sometimes turned into the Latin equivalent FERREOLUS; it frequently occurs in the Scottish and Irish Hagiologies. O'Harlon (Irish Saints, i. 175 n. 9) gives a list of twenty-five with their days of dedication in the calendars.

J. G.

ERNAN (1), son of Aedh. Commem. May 16. O'Clery (Marti. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 133) supposed this to be Ernán, son of Aedh, of the race of Brid, son of Conn Cearnaich, as he does not find any other Ernán, son of Aedh, in the Saint History or Naomhscanaich. Colgan (Acta SS. 17 n. 11) says he was buried in Ulster about A.D. 690.

J. G.

ERNAN (2), son of Eoghan. Commem. Jan. 1. Colgan (Acta SS. 7–9) gives a short memoir of this Ernan, and in a note adds an interesting account of this and the other Ernans, associated with the name of St. Columba, namely, the uncle and two nephews of that saint, and the little boy whom he blessed and declared would be in course of time so famous. St. Ernan of Jan. 1 was nephew of St. Columba, being son of Eoghan, son of Felim or Feidhilmidh, and thus was connected with the ruling families of the Dalrisc Scots. In the Appendix to Adamnan (Vit. E. Col.) in Codex E we find "illeges germanus frater Columbae junior." But concerning Ernan Boethius and Dempster have these serious mistakes, which Colgan has generally accepted; they have confounded him with Ernan, the uncle of St. Columba and prepositus of Hina, and thus have included him among the twelve who accompanied St. Columba from Ireland; they have given his name of Eterhan, and made him brother of Cithbachus or Cobthach, brother of St. Baithen (June 9) Etherhan; and based on these, they have, rightly or wrongly, supposed that he was many years with his uncle in Scotland before returning to take up his residence in Ireland (Usheer, Eccl. Anti. c. 15, works, vi. 287; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 157; Colgan, Acta SS. 7, 8). Whether he was in Scotland or how long he remained we really do not know, but he outlived St. Columba by a long time, as when he was a very old man he related to St. Adamnan (who was born A.D. 624) the wonderful vision vouchsafed to himself and others when they were fishing in the river Finn, in Donegal, on the night of St. Columba's death; he assured St. Adamnan, who was then a youth, that the whole vault of heaven suddenly became illuminated, and, when he raised his eyes and looked to the east, he saw something like an immense pillar of fire, which seemed to be ascending into heaven, and when it penetrated the heavens it was followed, as if the sun had just set. St. Adamnan's informant was, he says (Vit. St. Colum. iii. c. 24), "a very old man, a servant of Christ, whose name may be called Ferredel, but in the Scotch tongue Ernane, of the race of Mocufirriude, who, as being himself a holy monk, is buried in the Riges of Tomna (now Drumhorne), amidst the remains of other monks of St. Columba, and awaits the resurrection with the saints" (Reeves, Adamnan, 237–8). He is called Mocufirriude, because he was descended from Fergus, son of Conall Gulban. He established himself, apparently neither as abbot nor bishop, in the Diocese of Tomna, in the region of Tyr-Aedna (now Drumhorne, in the barony of Tighruh, co. Donegal), and, as said above, died and was buried there about A.D. 640 or a few years later (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 11; § 10; O'Harlon, Irish Saints, i. 21, 429; Bp. Forbes, Adv. Scot. Saints, 332–3).

With so many Ernans identification is difficult, but this point is said to be patron of St. Killern, the (Church of the Son of Eoghan), in Mull, and of Killernan. He may also have given its name to Killern, Killernail, or Kilkenarnalice, a parish in Jur, Argyleshire, and now united to Colouay (C. Innos, Orig. Par. Scot. ii. 278; Monre, West. Isl. 117; Martin, West. Islands, 232).

Usheer (C. E. Col. i. 17, 18) works, vi. 287 notes the similarity between the name and characters of this Ernan and the Ernan who appears in pope John's pastoral letters, but the person was really St. Ernan (Aug. 17), of Torach or Tory. In the Scotch kalendar he is called Etherhan, and commemorated on Dec. 21 and 22. Thus Adam King has "Dec. 22, St. Etherhan, bishop and confessor, notable to St. Columba in Scotland under king Aidanus, A.D. 582." Dempster has on the same day, "In Scotia Ethernetani episcopi qui in Insulis Scotticis natus, sancti Columbae discipulus fuit;" and Camerarius completes the identification, "Dec. 21, S. Eterhanus, abbas et confessor, S. Columbae, ex fragre nepos." [ETHERHAN.] (Bp. Forbes, Adv. S. 176, 222, 243.)

J. G.

ERNAN (3), abbot of Hinba. He was uncle of St. Columba, and accompanied him to Iona. Being brother of St. Columba's mother Eithne, he was son of Dina, son of Nioe, of the race of Cathair Mór. He was placed by St. Columba in charge of the mission for the north by St. Columba at Hinba, but the place, though evidently a favourite resort for St. Columba and the scene of many wonders, such as the appearance of the fiery pillar above St. Columba's head when he celebrated the Eucharist in the presence of St. Connolig (May 10), of Eanger, St. Coinnech (Oct. 41) of Aghaboe, St. Brendan (May 10) of Cien... fert, and St. Corbiac or Luthain or O'Lethan (June 21) of Derry, and again the "glorious and unseparable visitation" made for three days and three nights by the Spirit to St. Columba (Adamnan, Vit. S. Columb. iii. cc. 17, 18), is not clearly identified, though probably it was Eileith, one of the Garvagh group of islands. He died at Iona immediately on his arrival from Hima, and before St. Columba and he could meet, according to the prophecy of St. Columba (Adamnan, Vit. S. Columb. l. c. 35). (On his life, see Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 11, § 13; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 15, works, vi. 237 sq.; Trench, E. B. 266; Colgan, Acts SS. 8, n. 4, and Tr. Thom. 379-80, 409; but Colgan err in regarding him as the same with Ernin or Mernoc, of Rathnooth; Reeves, Adamman, 26, 87, 246-7, et al.) Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. l. 253) ascribes to him Excortations ad fratres in Hima inani, lib. i., and In regulam S. P. Columbae, lib. i., but they probably never existed. [J. G.]

ERNAN (4), nephew of St. Columba, son of his sister Cumania and his husband Degillus, but it is doubtful as to whether he has any dedication, either as Ernin or Mernoc, the latter name being given him in the list, in Codex B, of St. Columba's relations (Colgan, Acts SS. 8, n. 2, and Tr. Thom. 490 n. 41, 491 n. 41; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 15, works, vi. 231; Reeves, Adamman, 246). [J. G.]

ERNAN (5) of Cill-na-sagart, Oct. 26. In the Martyrologies he is "Ernan of Moidhlanchair, of Cill-na-sagart" (Mart. Doneg). Moidhlanchair being the name of the great road which led from Leinster to Armagh, but beyond this we have no information regarding his time, place, or history. Dr. Reeves, however, suggests the probability of his being Ternoc, son of Cronin, who died A.D. 716 (Anna. Tigh.), and whose memorial is still seen in the form of a pillar-stone at Kilnasagart, near Jonesborough, co. Armagh. [Ternoc.] (Uist. Journ. Arch. i. 223-24; Mart. Doneg., by Todd and Reeves, 285.) [J. G.]

ERNAN (6) of Cluain-deochrigh, Jan. 11. In St. Fedhina's Life (Colgan, Acts SS. 138, c. 38, 142 n. 28) there is a notice of his paying a visit to St. Ernan in his monastery of Cluain-deochrigh, in Meath; he was so annoyed with the sound of the mill beside the guest-house or hospice that he gave it his blessing, and thereby delivered the guests of all future time from the noise of the grinding. O'Clery, by his entry in the Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 13) evidently seeks to identify this Ernan as Ernin, son of Crasen, but they are probably different persons; others regard him as the same with Ernan, of Torach; and Archdall has placed Cluain-deochrigh at Clonare on the Bresna, co. Westmeath. But by either name the place is unknown, and the facts regarding the saint remain uncertain (Archdall, Mon. Hibern. 703; Reeves, Adamman, 238; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 174-75, ii. 448). [J. G.]

ERNAN (7) of Togher-ernan, Jan. 17. He is thus designated in Mart. Doneg.; in Mart. Tallaght on this day is "Ernan ocus Herind o Tigh-Uilfan," "Tigh probably being the place, and Ulltain the name of another person, as in Mart. Doneg. Colgan somewhat doubtfully suggests his identification with Ernin or Mernoc, nephew of St. Columba and son of Degillus (see above, No. 4); efforts also are made towards localising Tigh or Tigh-ernan, in the counties of Meath and Westmeath, but with no very marked success. (Colgan, Tr. Thom. 491 n. 41; Mart. Doneg., by Todd and Reeves, 21; Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. xii.; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 297, 298.) [J. G.]

ERNAN (8) of Torach, Aug. 17. He was son of Colman, son of Maenam, son of Muireadhach, of the race of Eoghan, son of Niall, and thus second cousin to Damongoch, son of Saran, pilgrim of Tory. O'Donell (St. Columb., l. c. 73) relates the wonderful history connected with the foundation of the first church on the island of Torach or Tory, on the north coast of Donegal, and the placing St. Ernan over it as its first abbot, but Colgan is mistaken in trying to identify him with Ernan (Jan. 11) of Cluain-deochrigh, in Meath. He was evidently a well-known person in his day, and his name appears as Ernanaus or Hernanans in the famous letter which John the pope-elect sends, ii. c. 19) addressed to the Canons Regular in 640 to the clergy of the north of Ireland, urging them to conformity with the rest of Christendom upon the Paschal questions and to a firm opposition to Pelagianism. [Chonan (11).] St. Ernan, of Torach, flourished about a.d. 650 (Colgan, Acts SS. 17 n. 11, and Tr. Thom. 401, 431 n. 40, 490 n. 41; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. 162, § 11; Reeves, Adamman, 238; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 17, works, vi. 540-1; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 174; Uist. Journ. Arch. 150 n., 153; Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 253.) [J. G.]

ERNANIA was a nun in a monastery called Drumf-farachaidh or Kill-Ua-sona, in Carbery, co. Longford, who is said in the Via St. Fechini to have drawn milk from a hind for the use of those labouring in the mill (Colgan, Acts SS. 138, c. 41, 140 n. 28). [J. G.]

ERNDBUDA, abbess. [ERNDBUDA.]

ERNENUEUS, Scottish saint. [ERNENUEUS.]

ERNENGILDA, Irish saint. [ERNENGILDA.]

ERNESTUS, abbey, mentioned as present at a council held at Dingoltinga, or Dingolling, in Bavaria (Baron. Annuales Ecle. a.d. 772, 24.) [L. G. S.]

ERNUEUS, abbot of Le Mans. [ERNUEUS.]

ERNFRIDUS (ERNFRIDUS, ERNFREDUS), abbate of Angia Dives, and 18th bishop of Ca- stance, succeeding Rudolthus or Rodulfo, and followed by Sidonius or Sidoinus. In the Chronicle of Hermannus Contractus (ad an. 738, Migne, Patr. Lat. col.iii. 157), he is given as the successor of Audoinus, who preceded Rudelthus, but a letter addressed by pope Gregory III. in 738 to various German bishops, of which amongst them Rudolfo (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxix. 580), has induced the authors of the Gallia Christiana (v. 894) to insert his name between those of Audoinus and Ernfrid. The latter's episcopate lasted ten years, and his death is placed in the year 748. [S. A. B.]

ERNIN (ERNIN) is only another form of the name of ERNAN, and often, like it, becomes MERNOC, MARNOC, and MARNAN. In the Irish Martyrologies there are many Erinis, but comparatively few admit of identification or present any point of use or interest.

(1) Of Clusian-righeach, commemorated Aug. 5. In the Life of St. Faraman (Feb. 15) this Ernin is included in the list of those prelates who met St. Columba on one occasion of his retiring to Ireland, but from this, which is so full of anachronisms, nothing can be deduced as to his time or history; Clusian-righeach is said to be in Carlow (Martyr. Donagi. by Todd and Reeves, 213; Colgan, Acta SS. 337, c. 7, 339 n. 27).

(2) Of Cremechoill, commemorated May 31. He has his commemoration on this day in Martyr. Donagi., but in Mart. Tadhgait he is mixed up with Eochain, abbot of Magh-bile. [Eochain (9.)] The name of his church has passed through a series of changes, Crockamill, Croghill, Craughill, Crewill, to the present Cranfield, a parish in the barony of Upper Toome, co. Antrim. (Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 97 et al.; Joyce, Ir. Names of Places, 2 ser. 329; Colgan, Acta SS. 650, c. 8.)

(3) Of Rathooi, commemorated Aug. 18. The entry in Martyr. Donagi. (by Todd and Reeves, 223) is "Erenin, i.e. Mernog, of Rath-nee, in Ui-Garadach, i.e. in Fotharta, of Leinster; and of Cill-draighneach, in Ui-drona;" and the entry in Mart. Tadhgait (by Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. xxiii.) is "Errini Mac Creisini, o Rathaibh, in h. Garchoch." The person thus designated is the saint who in Meath is usually known as Ernin or Ernog, and in Scotland as Marnoc, i.e., "my dear little Ernin." [Marnoc.] He was son of Crasen or Cressin, and probably belonged to the neighbourhood of Connemarocke, in the barony of Garrycastle, King's County. On one occasion when St. Columba visited that monastery, he was found in the company of Erenin, as related by St. Adamnan (Vita St. Columba, i. 3), and was being conveyed with great state and acclamation by the assembled monks into the precincts of the monastery, where came, among the crowd, a poor lad, mean in dress and bearing, and evidently not much thought of by his seniors. Yet St. Columba passing by his piety, eloquence, and renown. "This," says St. Adamnan, "was Erenan, son of Crasen, who was afterwards famous and most highly honoured in all the churches of Scotia" (Ireland) (Reeves, Adamnan, 25–6). This was about A.D. 590. His death, unnoticed in the Ann. Four Mast., took place in the year 636 (Ann. Tyg.). Ussher says he flourished about that time in Ireland, but evidently that great antiquity's mind was in the utmost confusion regarding the saint. His churches are Rathanao, now Rathnew, the parochial name of Wicklow, and Kill-draighneach, in Ui-drona, now Killdree-ragh, a townland in the parish of Dunleekay, barony of Idrone East, and county of Carlow. (Reeves, Adamnan, 256; Montalembert, Monks of the West, ii. 29–10, Edinb. 1881; Lanigan, Eccles. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 17, § 1; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 17, wks. vi. 502, 540–41; Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 5 ser. 4; Colgan, Trahaum. 340, c. 3, 573 n. 29, 401, c. 71, 434, c. 17, 450 n. 42.)

(4) Son of Flannach, abbot of Leithghinn (Leighlin, co. Carlow). Commemorated Nov. 12 (Martyr. Donagi.).

(8) Cas, of Leithglinn (Leighlin, co. Carlow) is commemorated in Martyr. Donagi. and Martyr. Tadhgait on Feb. 23, but otherwise unknown (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 681).

(6) The sons of one of this name had their dedication on Sept. 22, in Inismac-u-Erin or Inismacinerin, now Church Island, in Lough Key, co. Roscommon (Martyr. Donagi.).

(7) Ernin or Ermina, daughter of Archeus or Archenn, and by some identified with Fehbr or Fedbair (Nov. 6), is commemorated in the Irish Martyrologies on Feb. 28, and placed among the Bollandists among their praesterniss. (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 733.)

[Q. G.]

ERNIESUS, presbyter, one of two who are said to have founded Lianthon, Monmouthshire, in the time of St. David, its original patron (Giraldus Camb. Hist. Camb. i. c. 5, vsa. vi. 40).

[Q. G.]

ERONUS (Hero), twenty-eighth bishop of Langres, succeeding Garobaldus, and followed by Astoricus. In the chronicle of the Monastery of St. Benignus (quoted Le Coute, Anna. Eccl. Franc. an. 666, n. xxixi, tom. iv. p. 153, and Gall. Christ. iv. 524), it is related that in the time of Wulfranerus, the abbot, the head of the church of Langres was the venerable bishop Eronus, who, among other benefits which he conferred upon that monastery, obtained from popes Johannes and Sergius a mandate that none should dare to make or consecrate any cemetery besides that belonging to the church of St. Benignus. And, in accordance with this, there is extant a charter given by pope Sergius in the tenth year of his reign, confirming to the monks of St. Benignus the privileges of their cemetery. The genuineness of this instrument, however, is called in question by Le Coute, from internal evidence (Gall. Christ. iv. 524; Le Coute, an. 697, n. iii., tom. iv. p. 336, and an. 713, n. xxxvii, tom. iv. 526). [S. A. B.]

EROS." (Eros, Heroes, Hérons), fifth bishop of Antioch, coming between Cornepheus and Theophilus (Euseb. H. E. iv. 29; Niceph. Coll. H. E. iii. 25, p. 258; Georg. Syncell. p. 350 a). He has been called (as by Constantius, ut infra.) Heroes II. through the mistake of supposing that the name of the third bishop (Heron, Héron) might be a slight variety of Eros. Fleury (lib. iii. 33, 39) miscalls him Heron. There is some discrepancy as to the dates of Eros. The Chronicle of Eusebius places his accession under A.D. 143, there stating that he ruled twenty-four years, while Theophilus is made to succeed under A.D. 170, so that either there was an interregnum or there must be an error in the "twenty-four years," which, however, is the authoritative reading: it is the one assigned by Migne. The episcopate of Eros is stated to have lasted twenty-six years by Syncellus, who is here followed by some in preference to Eusebius, as e.g. by Boschius, who gives A.D. 142–168. Constantius (in Neale's Patriarchii of Antioch) has 151–168. Eros of Antioch is thought by Neale (Pat. Ant. p. 24) to be the "Eros of a Greeks imbued with at June 24 of the Messina.

EROS, bishop of Arles. [HEROS.]

EROTEIS, martyr. [CAPITOLINA.]

ERPUILLON (ERPUILLON), son of Wiziza king of Spain. On his father's death he fled with his brother Farmanius or Furmalus to Africa, where count Julian (the husband of their father's sister) espoused their cause against Roderick, and occasioned the Moorish conquest of Spain. Mariana calls the two brothers Eba and Sibebutsus. (Lucas Tudens, Chron. ann. 748 in Schott. Hist. Illust. tom. iv. p. 70; Marian, De Reb. Hispan. lib. vi. cap. 19, vol. i. 239, 240, 243; Baron. A. E. 713, 19.)

[EDD.]

ERPWALD (Her. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iii. ann. 582, in M. B. 720 D), king of East Anglia. [ERPWALD.]

[CH.]

ETHLA, Irish saint. [BLANE.]

ERTHAD, Pictish saint. [IRCHAD.]

ERVIGIUS (1), ERVIG, ERWICH, Gothic king of Spain from A.D. 680 to 687. Sebastian of Salamanca, Hist. Lang. i. cap. 175, says that his father Arpadustus was a Greek exile from Byzantium, who married a relation of his to King Kindravith. What is more probable is that Arpadustus was a native of one of the coast towns which remained under Byzantine rule up to 625, or possibly of Tingis or Septum, which still obeyed Byzantine governors at the time of the Moorish invasion. Anyhow, his marriage had brought him within the circle of the Gothic nobility, and we find his son Ervig among Wamba's builders at the time of the extraordinary conspiracy which overthrew that king. [WAMBA.] What was Ervig's share in the plot cannot now be made out with certainty. The story, however (Sebastian of Salamanca, in Esp. Sagra. xii.), seems to be a legendary secretion of later times. What probably happened was that in the unconsciousness of illness Wamba was hurried into the penitential habit (see for an account of this custom and its abuses, legislated upon before Wamba's time by Kindravith, Masleu's Hist. de Espafia, vol. i. Espafia Goda, p. 272), that when he returned to his senses he found arrayed against him a conspiracy of the nobility and clergy, headed by Ervig and the famous Julian of Toledo, too formidable to be resisted, and by which he was forced first to surrender his crown, and secondly to subscribe to two documents: (a) nominating Ervig his successor; (b) making the metropolitan of Toledo to anoint Ervig king. Accordingly, on the 22d of October, 680, eighteen days after the monastic habit had been imposed upon Wamba, Ervig was anointed bishop by Julian (the second instance of anointing known in Spanish history; Wamba's is the first). On the 5th of January the twelfth Council of Toledo, called by Ervig, met in the church of the Holy Apostles. It consisted of thirty-four bishops, four abbots, three proxies, and fifteen viri illustres officii palatini. The king appeared, asked, knelt, for the prayers of the bishops, implanted in them to find remedies for the dangers of the state, and handed to them a tomos containing his wishes and recommendations. He then retired, and the tomos was read. In it the council was asked to confirm his election to the throne, to approve his fresh laws against the Jews, twenty of which had been drawn up by himself and Julian in the interval between his accession and the assembly of the council, as well as to reaffirm the existing laws (Lex iug. gotorum, edition by Spanish Academy, Madrid, 1815, tit. 12, lib. 5). The modification of Wamba's law of military service, De his qui ad bellum non evadant, is recommended also on the ground that the half of Spain had forfeited civil rights under its over-strict provisions. The king had indeed resolved to amend the law for the future, but the council is asked to reinstate those who have already suffered from it.

The four canons which follow are of considerable historical and constitutional interest. The first records the legality of Ervig's rise to the throne. The council have, it says, examined three documents laid before them: (1) a declaration signed by the seniores of the palace, describing the assumption of the ecclesiastical dress and tonsure by Wamba; (2) a paper in which Wamba names Ervig his successor; (3) a document addressed by Wamba, in which Julian is directed to anoint Ervig king. After inspection of these it declares Ervig elected king by the unanimous consent of all the bishops, and releases the people from the oath of allegiance to Wamba. May anathema and the reverence of God overtake any who lift a hand against Ervig.

The second canon provides that all who have assumed the garb of penitence, even against their will, shall thenceforward be compelled to keep their oath, and to refrain from all temporal employments. The argument that the vow was made for them, and the dress assumed by them without their consent and consciousness, is to have their heads shaven. Of these are not to be excepted those in baptism of what is done for them, but the baptismal vow is none the less binding. Notwithstanding the priest who rashly imposes the penitential dress upon an unwilling or unconscious person is to be punished by a year's excommunication. It shall be sufficient, however, if he can prove that the penitential dress was asked for by signs only, manumissius. (Under Kindravith, Co. Tol. 3, 3, a declaration in writing had been required.) This canons is of course levied against the still living Wamba.

The third canon provides for the readmission into ecclesiastical communion of certain political offenders who had been pardoned by the king and invited him to the royal table. It is not fitting that those who sit with the king should lie under the ban of the church. Daha (Könige der Germanen, Vite Abtheilung, 477) takes this as referring to Ervig's co-conspirators, who had been the traitors of Wamba's reign, and most probably concerned in Paul's rebellion and by whose help, together with that of the church, Ervig had risen to power.

Stephen, metropolitan of Merida, is then introduced, and implores the pardon of the assembled bishops for his complicity in certain acts of Wamba. Wamba had attempted with "his acustomed self-will" to institute two new bishoprics, upon his own responsibility only. Stephen pleads compulsion by the king, and the fourth canon absolves him, and arranges what is to be done with regard to the bishoprics. The fifth canon restores to all those who had suffered outlawry for the violation of Wamba's military law, the capacity of giving evidence, together with the titles of their former rank and class. In the ninth canon the laws against the Jews, of which the titles as given in the acts correspond exactly with those now standing in the above quoted book and title of the Fuero Justo, are confirmed. The sixth canon is perhaps the most important of the council. It provides for the transference of the right of election to bishoprics to the metropolitan of Toledo and the king only, abolishing thereby at one fell swoop all the constitutional process of election by clergy and people, consecration by metropolitan and suffragans, and confirmation by the crown, which had been decreed in C. Tol. iv. 19. We shall have more to say of this famous canon under the head of Julian. In connexion with Ervig it is interesting, as throwing light upon the character and objects of the conspiracy to which he owed his throne.

The twelfth council of Toledo, as Hefele states (Entwicklung und Geschichtliche Verhältniss, &c. 194), was imitated in all points from the eighth council under Revesviinth. "Like Revesvith, Ervig calls the council in January, makes a speech, brings forward proposals of legislation, has the decisions drawn up in twelve canons, the thirteenth canon being merely a thanksgiving which has its parallel also in the eighth council, contains the complete list of signatures, and that decreetum and lex shall not be wanting (see C. Tol. viii. ; Aguirre-Catalani iii. 448) appends a decreetum and constitutio from Gundemar's time." [Guntzmur.]

The intention seems to have been to connect the new reign immediately with that of Revesviinth, Ervig's relation, pitting over the reign of Wamba, and thus to give it, if possible, an air of legitimacy.

Nearly three years later (Nov. 4, 683) Ervig summoned the thirteenth council of Toledo, which, under the presidency of Julian, consisted of forty-seven bishops, nine abbots, twenty-six provys, and twenty-six viri illustres. The same ceremonies were observed as at the preceding council, and we have again the king's appearance among the bishops, his prostration before the fathers (coram coetu vestri reverentia humillis deortusque posterior), and the delivery of the bolla. In this council those who had suffered outlawry and confiscation of goods under the previous councils of rebellion were still further propitiated. Canon 1 ordered the restitution of the forfeited property except in cases where the property had been already bestowed on others. All that still remained in the royal treasury (fisci—juribus applicata) of the confiscated goods was ordered to be restored. Cases of the most severe imprisonment, ill-treatment of palatini or ecclesiastics. Accused persons of high ecclesiastical or secular rank were not to be tortured or chained or robbed of their goods before trial. They were to be brought without delay before the tribunal of their peers, and there judged after a fair hearing.

By canon 3 all arrears of taxes up to the first year of Ervig's reign were remitted, a measure which looks like a bid for popularity on the part of a consciously weak government. Canon 4, de Munitione Regis Prolicitis, is the first appearance of a form which recurs in later councils under Egica. Decrees on the same subject, differently worded, are found in C. Tol. vi. 2 and C. Tol. vi. 16. Attempts to murder the queen or the royal family, to despoil them of their goods, to impose the tunique upon the sons or the religious habit on the daughters or daughters-in-law, to inflict exile, mutilation, or stripes upon any of them, are described and denounced with singular minuteness. We shall find this canon first attacked and then imitated by Egica, Ervig's successor (q. v.). Canon 5, which no doubt had a clear political meaning at the time, is now inexplicable to us. It forbids the marriage of a king's widow with any one, even though a king himself, much less with a subject. It cannot be said that a female, queen, a part of the body of the deceased king, should give herself to a subject. The third council of Saragossa, held in 691, went further than this, and drew up a canon (Can. 5, Hefele, Conc. Gesc. iii. 297) directing that a royal widow should be compelled to retire into a cloister immediately after her husband's death. Canon 6 provided that henceforward no slave or freedman should ever be admitted to the palace offices. "Exceptis servis vel libertis facillibus," no no-noble person should be made administrator of the fiscus or of the royal property. The canon contains an interesting reference to past slave revolts.

For the remaining six canons of C. Tol. xiii. on matters of ecclesiastical discipline see Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 285, or Hefele, Conc. Gesc. iii. 289. The council was scarcely over, and all the members of it had not yet left Toledo, when legates arrived from pope Leo II. (towards the end of Nov. or Dec. 682) asking for the confirmation in council by all the Spanish bishops of the acts of the sixth general council against the Monothelites. The king and Julian, however, replied that it was impossible immediately to reassemble the national council which had just broken up, and to compel distant bishops to undertake another winter journey. They consented, however, to call a council for the following year, and meanwhile copies of the acts of the Council of Constantinople were sent to every metropolitan to receive the signatures of the bishops of his province. In Nov. 684 the fourteenth council of Toledo met. Only seventeen bishops from Carthaginensis were present, though the metropolitan of Tarragona, Narbonne, Merida, Braga, and Seville sent a council. At the same time with the canon of the twelfth council upon which rests the primacy of Toledo, it is noticeable that here, as in the thirteenth and fifteenth councils, Julian alone signs as metropolitan out of the six Spanish metropolitan. All the rest (Merida, Braga, Tarragona, Narbonne, and Seville) sign as plain episcopi. Julian's antagonism was at once against the Spanish bishops generally and the great power of the state, and seems to have completely governed the vacillating and often conscience-stricken Ervig.

At the C. Tol. xiv. the acts of the sixth general synod were approved, and the acts of the council of Chalcedon were ordered to be incorporated in ERVIGIUS (2) or ERVIGIUS, sixth bishop of Beziers, succeeding Paetasis (Gall. Christ. vi. 299). Among those present at the sixteenth council of Toledo occurs "Beterrensis ecclesiae episcopus" (Manzi, xii. 84 c). See the following article.

ERVIGIUS (3), bishop of Calabria, subscribes the fifteenth and sixteenth councils of Toledo, 688 and 693, under Egica. The Ervig of the sixteenth council has been held erroneously to have been a bishop of Beziers (Biterres), in Galla Narbonensis. Florcz gives various reasons against this (Exp. Supr. vi. 927), and certainly the order of the signatures in the fifteenth and sixteenth councils seems to identify the two Ervigs. Ervig is the last bishop of Calabria (Exp. Supr. iv. 47; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 313, 353.) [Sanctus-Dei] [M. A. W.]

EWALD (2) (Annual., Annual, Ewald, Ercaldus) was a Scotch monk, companion and disciple of St. Kilian of Frasconia; he was mart- tyred Jan. 19, a.d. 650, but is not found in the Acta St. Kiliani, and much doubt surrounds his history. The Bollandists place him among their praetermissi of Jan. 19, Feb. 15, July 8, and Oct. 2, while the Scotch annalists also commemorate him, but can give no authentic information. (Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 244; Camerarius, de Scot. Pet. 178; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 565.) [I. S.]

ERYTHARIUS, praetorian prefect under Leo I. and Zeno. (Cod. Just. lib. i. tit. 4, 16) Finding that the taxes which Zeno was trying to levy were excessive, he asked leave to retire from his office, to the universal regret of the state (Suid. ad nom.) [M. F. A.]

ERYTHRAEUS (ERYTHRAEUS), bishop of Amissa, in the province of Heleneopoli, who signed the letter addressed by the bishops of that province to the emperor Leo on the subject of Timothaeus Aelurus, c. A.D. 458. (Acta Chalcad. pt. iii. c. 54; Mansi, vii. 608 a; Le Quien, Orb. Chr. i. 536.) [T. W. D.]

ERYTHRIUS, bishop of Lagonia. [EREBITUS] [T. W. D.]

ESADDAEUS, the name of one of the paternal angels in the system of JUSTINUS (Hippol. Ref. v. 26, p. 151). The name is apparenly the same as that given by the NAZARENES to the Maker of this world, Ἄρχων τῶν τῶν κυρίων ζωῆς δυνάμεως καὶ ἰδρυμάτων (Hippol. Ref. v. 7, p. 104). Both forms do not represent the Hebrew אֱלֹהִים, as the Gnostic systems the Hebrew names for God are commonly used to denote subordinate agents; and Epiphanius (Haer. 40, p. 296) notes this in particular of the name Άρχων. Harvey (Irenaeus i. 225), adopting the form Esaddaeus, attempts, with little probability, to connect the word with ΛΑΡΑ, a tree. [Seeдоб.] [G. S.]
ESAIANI, heretics. [ESAIAS (8).]

[ T. W. D.]

ESAIAS (2). a Persian knight of the royal guard, and the son of Adabus of Arzun in Armenia. He was present at the torture and execution of Brichjunos, Elias, and their companions under Sapor II. in 327. [ELIAS.] He wrote the narrative of their acts in Chaldee, whence Metaphrastes translated it into Greek. (Assen. Martyr. Orient. i. 211, 224.) [ G. T. S.]

ESAIAS (3). [ISAIAH], an Egyptian abbot. There are assigned to one of this name and designation twenty-nine Orationes on the monastic life, apparently addressed to those who were under the author’s care, and nineteen Capitula on the monastic life, entitled De Religiosa Exercitatione et Quietur. Both these works are given by Gr Migne (Patr. Gr. xx. 1106-1211). Cotelerius, in his Ecclesiae Graecae Monumenta, has published several sayings of an abbot Esaias, as well as the saying of an ascetic who mentions Esaias as one well known (Apophth. Patr. in Eccl. Gr. Mon. i. 445, 586, 801, 808). Among the works of Benedict of Aniane (708-721) there are sixty-eight Regulae of Monachos by “Isaias abbas” (Patr. Lat. ciii. 427-437). John of Damascus also has preserved two fragments of an abbot Esaias (Patr. Gr. xii. 1212). Whether all these works are to be ascribed to the same person or not is by no means clear. Ammonius, a bishop (apparently Egyptian, possibly Ammon of Antinoe, c. A.D. 394) writing to Theophilus, patriarch of Alexandria (385-412), mentions an Esaias whom he had known, and respecting whom Theophilus had made some enquiries; but he acquaints us with nothing more than his name and the fact of his being an ascetic. Rufinus of Aquileia (c. 410), in his Historia Manochorum (Patr. Lat. c. 427), speaks of three monastics (Esaias, being one) who met on the banks of the Nile and went in company to visit the anchorite Anuph, and he adds that they were present at Anuph’s death. Anuph, otherwise known as Anub, seems to have died c. A.D. 401 (Boll. Acta SS. Jun. i. 643). Palladius (c. A.D. 420) relates a story very similar to that of Rufinus (Hist. Lusec. cc. 55-56, in Patr. Gr. xxxiv. 1138). He also (cc. 15, 16) speaks of an Esaias, the son of a wealthy Spanish merchant, devoting himself along with his brother Pasius, on the death of their father, to an ascetic life, one of them founding a monastery, the other becoming an anchorite; but which of them it was that became an abbot cannot be determined from the narrative. (Galland. Notit. præf. Orationes Is. Abbat.; Tillemont, vii. 711; Vie Mace Abbé en Thebaïde; Cave, Hist. Lat. i. 254.)

[ T. W. D.]

ESAIAS (4). bishop of Hermopolis Parva (Damanhur) on the Egyptian Delta. He took part in the Epiphene “ Lairacium,” A.D. 449, but also in the fourth general council in 451, having apparently changed his opinions. (Mansi, vii. 404; Le Quen, Or. Christ. ii. 516.) [J. de S.]

ESAIAS (5), bishop of Elaesa, in the province of Asia, signed the decree of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quen, Oriens Christ. i. 699; Mansi, vi. 1085.)

[ L. D.]

ESAIAS (6) [ISAIAH], bishop of Naucratis, in the province of Aegyptus I., in the latter half of the 5th century (Le Quen, Oriens Christ. ii. 523). He was one of the Egyptian bishops who wrote to the emperor Leo, after the murder of Proterius bishop of Alexandria by Timotheus-Aelurus and his followers, A.D. 457 (Act. Or. Chalced. pt. iii. c. 22; Mansi, vii. 530 c), and also one of the signatories to the synodal letter of Gennadius bishop of Constantinople, condemning simony, A.D. 459 (Mansi, vii. 917 s). When the emperor Zeno restored Timotheus Solofacius, the successor of Proterius, to his see, Esaias was one of the legates who sent to Simplicius, bishop of Rome, to announce the fact of his return (Simpl. Pap. ep. 11, in Migne, Patr. Lat. viii. 49; Baron. A. E. ann. 478, ix.; Le Quen, ii. 523.)

[ T. W. D.]

ESAIAS (7), bishop of Rhodes and metropolitan, under which designation his name is attached to the report of the synod of Constantinople, A.D. 520, to pope Hormisdas, respecting the ordination of Epiphanius (Mansi, viii. 492 D). In the following year, as related by Theophanes, Esaias of Rhodes was deposed and punished for corrupt morals by the emperor, together with Alexander of Diospolis in Thrace. (Theoph. Chron. ann. 521, p. 151, in Patr. Gr. xviii. 407; Le Quen, Oriens Christ. i. 925.) [O. H.]

ESAIAS (8) [Heracles], a deacon, apparently of Palestine, who was ordained bishop of Alexandria in succession to Peter Mongus (Liberat. Brev. c. 18, in Migne, Patr. xvii. 1029 a; Le Quen, Oriens Chr. ii. 420). Sophronius calls him “a disciple of another Peter,” whence he denomines in no measured terms (εἰς Ἐραταν καὶ πρεσβύτερον μαγία, Ep. Simod. ap. Act. Const. Const. A.D. 680, actio xi.; Labbe, vi. 889 n, ed. 1671; Conc. Gener. iii. 167, ed. 1628). His election being opposed, and the validity of his ordination being challenged, on the ground that the hands of the ordinary, Epiphanius of Perga, the metropolis of Pamphylia Secunda, had been laid on him by others after that prelate was dead, on which account his opponents called Esaias τερασκασιστόρστρυς, and numbers still adhering to him, a schism took place, and his followers were designated “Esaians” (Liberat. s. a. 1029 a; Theoph. Presb. de Recup. Introct. in Migne, Patr. Gr. xxxiv. pt. i. 45, § 14; Assenian. D.iss. de Mono- physit. Bibli. Or. ii. s. l.). Sophronius (s. a.) charges Esaias and Peter with having originated “another Acasthalian heresy among the Aca- phalici” (Nestle, Patriarchate of Alexandria, iii. § 3, p. 29).

[ T. W. D.]

ESALDAEUS. [ESALDAEUS.]

ESCHATOLOGY. The word, of comparatively late origin in theological language, is applied to that branch of theology which deals with the ultimate destinies of mankind, with the four last things (εἰς ἐκκαίρων)—death and seqand that the "Gospel was preached to the dead" (1 Pet. iii. 18; iv. 6). It cannot be wondered at that these conclusions of Christian eschatology have, for the most part, affirmed the endlessness alike of the rewards and punishments which shall be awarded by the Judge after the resurrection, that they have looked to the intermediate state with both hope and fear; that there, if anywhere, they have seen the region in which a work of illumination and purification might be carried on behind the veil.

On the other hand, it cannot be denied that the teaching of the New Testament tends not to a few passages to the thought of an universal restoration. The very term "restoration of all things" (Acts iii. 21) seems to imply a return to the primordial state in which God looked on the work of His hands, and saw that it was good (Gen. i. 31) before sin and pain, evil, moral or physical, had marred its perfection. If evil is both its aspects was the devil's work, Christ came to destroy the works of the devil (Heb. ii. 14; I John iii. 8), and that destruction is hardly accomplished by accomplishments in which even as he was, one soul in a thousand. He is to reign, this reigning apparently being closed by the judgment, and therefore including the whole intermediate state, until He has put all enemies under His feet (1 Cor. xv. 25). And among these enemies are death and Hades (1 Cor. xv. 26, 55), and that destruction is accomplished, the power of death as to its hold on the human race narrows in its range than that of the first. The many who "shall be constituted righteous" are represented as corresponding with "the ungodly who were constituted sinners (Rom. v. 19), and the language of the previous verse shows that "the many" are equivalent to "all." The hope of St. Paul for his kinsmen that "all Israel shall be saved" (Rom. xi. 26) is not satisfied by the conversion of a few, or even of many, individual leaves in their works of condemnation. Even those who stumbled at the root of offence had not so suddenly as to fall irretrievably (Rom. xi. 11). All, Jews and Gentiles alike, have been concluded under unbeknown that God might have mercy upon all (Rom. xi. 32). Lastly, there were not a few passages in the apostolic writings which might suggest, and, as a matter of fact, have suggested, rightly or wrongly, the idea of "destruction" in the sense of "annihilation" as the ultimate punishment of the wicked. There is the constant use of the word "destruction," and its equivalent "perdition" (ἀπώκτησις) of the various forms of the cognate verbs "destroy" and "perish." There is the present of the judgment, the long sleep, in which the soul is unconscious, between death and the resurrection, while this again is, in its turn, balanced by the language which speaks of death, as others spoke of it, as a sleep (1 Thess. iv. 15, 14; 1 Cor. xv. 50; Matt. xxvii. 52; John xi. 11). That the sleep was not one of unconsciousness, but a period of external life, represented as the gift of God (Rom. vi. 23); that unrepented sin brings the loss of that life; that the King destroys his enemies; that the extremest penalty is described as the second death (Rev. xx. 14; xxi. 8). The language of the New Testament writers, it has been shown, deviated not of rising on equal grounds, as Plato did, the natural immortality of the soul. It speaks of God only as having immortality as belonging to His essential being.
ESCHATOLOGY

(1 Tim. vi. 15): of the gospel of Christ as having brought to light or illuminated that hope of immortality (2 Tim. i. 10). Death, which is, at least, the ever-recurring symbol of the punishment of evil, suggests the thought of the loss of conscious existence rather than of a perpetual consciousness of misery (Gen. iii. 17; Rom. vi. 23).

It is obvious that as the language of the New Testament was, for the most part, addressed to those who had been trained in the popular beliefs of Judaism, it was likely, so far as it did not protest against them, to be interpreted by those beliefs. We have to ask, accordingly, what they were, what sense was attached to them such terms as "death," "destruction," "hades," "Paradise," "Gehenna." As far as one Jewish sect, that of the Sadducees, is concerned, there is no room for doubt (Matt. xxii. 23; Acts xxiii. 25). They denied the resurrection, and did not fall back, as the Greek thinker did, upon a belief in the immortality of the incorporeal souls. They confined the action of the retributive justice of God, following, as they urged, the teaching of Moses, to the rewards and punishment of the present life. With the Pharisees and the great body of the Jews of the dispersion, who attached themselves to no school or system of thought, otherwise, they believed in a resurrection (Acts xxii. 26), and, if we accept the statement of Josephus (Ant. xviii. 13), in the natural "immortal vigour" (Tyrus libenter) of the soul. They spoke of the joy of Paradise, of the flames and torments of Gehenna. There is no room for doubt that they looked upon the state of the dead as that capable of being influenced for good by the prayers of the living (Death and the Dead). Prayers for the dead were an established part of the ritual of the synagogue at the time of the Maccabees, and is that of the temple sacrifices were added to the prayers (2 Macc. xii. 43-45). They are apparently implied in St. Paul's prayer for Onesiphorus (2 Tim. i. 14). They appear in the earliest inscriptions, probably in the 2nd century after Christ, in Jewish cemeteries (Garucci, Cimitero degli Ebrei). How far the Pharisees, or the popular, belief accepted the endlessness of punishments is, from this point of view, a question of great importance. It has been broadly asserted by those who speak with the authority of experts that the Talmud is altogether silent on that point; that the punishment even of the worst sinners is, in the judgment of the Rabbis, but for a season, and that the sacrifices, or even the prayers of the day of atonement avail to obtain pardon for those who have deserved condemnation. But the evidence, Eusebius (p. 35, and the authorities cited in Farrar's Eternal Hope, Exc. v). It may be questioned, however, whether this is not a somewhat one-sided statement. Josephus, who, at least, represents a widely diffused form of Hellenistic Pessimism, speaks of the Pharisees not only as holding the natural immortality of the soul, but as thinking that those who have done evil are kept in an everlasting (aiōnos, not aitoos), prison-house (Ant. xviii. 1, f. 3), and Schöttgen (Hor. Hebr. in Matt. xxiv. 46), quoted from the Midrash on Koheleth (col. 74), "In hoc mundo quae peccata sunt possunt reparari, sed futuro tempore quod pecatum est non potest reparari." "If a man prepares no food before the sabbath, how can he expect to share in the sabbath meal?" Taking, however, the great stream of Rabbinic traditions, as represented e. g. in Kisenmenger's Antichristus Judææ (part ii. c. 6), it may be admitted as true that they surround the idea of Gehenna with well-nigh all imaginable alleviations. They think of the condemned as allowed to rest on sabbaths and new moons; Abraham and Moses and Elias, and the prayers of kindred and of friends have power to deliver from it; the souls that are tormented praise God in the midst of the fire for the mercy that is mingled with His judgments. Some are punished for a few days, or weeks, or years (Ugoioli, Thes. xxx. p. 177), and when they are purified pass to Paradise. A few only, apostates and "Epicureans" (i.e. unbelievers in the resurrection), suffer for "many generations;" but in the end, Gehenna, which even now is separated from Paradise only as by a party-wall two hand-breadths thick, shall be itself purged, and made fit for the habitation of the blessed.

Lastly, there were the beliefs which Gentile converts, who were not deterred by physical or metaphysical difficulties from accepting the doctrine of the resurrection, would bring with them, and which were likely to modify more or less, consciously or otherwise, the re-creation of the teaching of Scripture. It is, of course, admitted that the cultivated intellect of the age had engendered a widely-spread scepticism as to the existence of a life after death —

E esse aliquos manes et subterranea regna
Noe pueri credunt ... .

Juvenal, Sat. ii. 140.

The hopes of Tacitus did not go beyond, "Si quis piorum manibus locus; si, ut sapientibus placet, non cum corpore extinguantur magne animae," holding, as it were, an aristocracy of immortality, while the great mass of mankind kept the dead soul in the fixed and stereotyped formula of Greek and Roman epitaphs (Agric. c. 40). Cicero, after an eloquent utterance of his hope, confesses his misgiving, "Quod si in hoc erro, quod animos huminum immortales esse credam, infector erro" (c. Senect. c. 23); and though he speaks much of the glory of the just, is silent as to the punishment of evil doers. Julius Caesar urged torture and imprisonment rather than death as a punishment for those who were traitors to the republic, on the ground that, as men looked for nothing after death that penalty had lost its deterring power (Sallust, Catil. c. 50). On the other hand, the old belief was not without its fatal effects. The teaching of Plato in the Phaedon, the Gorgias, and the Republic, had been popularised by Virgil in the sixth book of the Aeneid, and those who accepted it thought of the unseen world as a scene partly of retribution, partly of purification. Some pass to the Elysian fields, and some are cleansed in the Stygian lake, and some are sent to Tartarus for ever, and some remain there for ever (Phaed. p. 113).

... allis sub gurgite vasto
Infectum culitur solum, aut exturrur igni;
Quiesce suas patimur manes. Extinde per amplum Mittimus Elysium et pucri laeta arva tenemus."

Verg. Aen. vi. 743-746.
The Eleusinian and other mysteries, perhaps, helped to diffuse and sustain this belief among those who were initiated, and the language of Lucretius is that of one who sees in the belief in endless punishment not an extinct superstition, but one against which the philosopher has to do vigorous and earnest battle.

"Nam si certam finem esse viderent Avernorum homines, aliquis ratione valenter Religiosus aegre minus oblesset vanum. Nunc ratio nulla est restandii, nullus facultas, Aeternas quoniam nonas in morte timendum." De Nat. R. III. 107-111.

II. It remains for us now to trace the course of Christian thought working upon these materials. For the most part it will be necessary to notice only those who held some modification of what may be recognized as historically the general belief of Christendom, that the punishment assigned to evildoers after the resurrection will be endless as the blessedness of the righteous, or who taught that a redeeming and purifying work might be carried on in the intermediate state, giving fresh opportunities, and therefore the fresh probation to some of not so many; who, at the time of their death, were not qualified by their faith or works for the peace and rest of God.

Of the two methods which present themselves,—that of noting chronologically the views maintained by the great fathers and teachers of the church on the point now before us, or classifying them, still retaining as far as may be, subject to that classification, a chronological arrangement, according as they represented this or that school of thought,—the latter will be adopted, as presenting, on the whole, most advantages.

1. It would not be true to say that the theory of the annihilation of the wicked after they have endured, subsequent to the resurrection, a penalty commensurate with their guilt, is altogether without patristic authority; but Taylor’s language (Christ’s Advent to Judgment, vol. v. p. 45, ed. Heber), that it was what “the primitive doctors were willing to believe,” is unduly coloured by his own manifest leaning towards that view, and his shrinking from the popular belief in equal and endless torments for all the lost. The passages that look in that direction are, indeed, very few, and their main purpose is less to assert the finite character of punishment than to protest against the Platonic assumption of an inherent immortality involving, as that seemed to do, an eternal pre-existence, and a perpetual series of transmigrations. Thus Justin speaks: “Our souls are not immortal nor uncreated, yet I say not that all souls die, for that indeed would be a godsend (ἐγκομιόν) to the wicked, but that those of the godly abide in a better place, and the unrighteous and evil in a worse, waiting for the time of judgment. And thus some, appearing worthy of God, die no more, and some are punished (καταδίωξο) so long as God wills them to exist and to be punished” ( Dial. c. Tryph. c. 5). The words clearly admit the thought of an ultimate “cessing to be” in the lost, but they cannot be said to do more. Elsewhere, in the same treatise (Dial. c. Tryph. c. 130), he speaks, in reference to Isai. lxxv. 24, of the very bodies of sinners as consumed by the worm and the ceaseless fire, and yet remaining immortal (ἀθάνατα), and in his Apology he speaks freely of ἄνευς θάνατος as contrasted with the thousand years of Plato (Reg. p. 615; Phain. p. 240; Apol. i. 192), of the punishment lasting for a limitless period (ἀτείχον αἰών), (Apol. i. 28). What has been said of Justin holds good also of Irenæus. He, too, speaks of life as the gift of God: “And he who shall reject life and prove himself ungrateful to his Maker . . . deprives himself of continuance for ever and ever” (v. 34, § 2). “God’s fixed things are eternal, and without end in God, and therefore the less of them is also eternal and never ending” (v. 27, § 2). Taken by themselves, these words, though they are compatible with, and perhaps even suggest, the thought of the annihilation of the wicked, cannot be said to affirm it. Irenæus, like Justin, argues against the Platonic theory of the pre-existent immortality of the soul. Eternal life is God’s gift to those who are worthy of it, but the privation of that life may mean the loss of the blessedness of being rather than of being itself, and his language elsewhere shows that this is what he actually did mean. “Those who fly from the eternal light of God . . . are themselves the cause of their inhabiting eternal darkness, destitute of all good things” (iv. § 39, 4). “The word of God prepares a fitting habitation for both those who seek and those who shun the light . . . for those who are in the light that they may rejoice in it, for those in darkness that they may partake in its calamity” (v. 29, § 1). So a passage in the Epistle to Diognetus (c. 10), which speaks of the eternal fire as punishing ἐπίθετοι τοῦ ἀποκαταστάσεως being interpreted of ultimate annihilation. Hints of the annihilation of the lost after this period are few and far between. Arnobius, however (Dopp. adv. Gentes, ii. 15–54) teaches that the soul has no natural immortality, and that after the resurrection souls and bodies are gradually consumed and annihilated in Gehenna. [ARNOB.] 2. The belief in a universal restoration is commonly associated with the great name of Origen. It would be truer to say, and this was afterwards treated as the vulnerable point in his system, that he taught the perpetual freedom of the will, and therefore set no time-limit to the capacity for restoration. The fullest statement of his views is found in the treatise Ἐκκόλογιον, noticeable as the first attempt at the systematic and scientific treatment of theology in Christian literature. He is brought face to face with the question, What does the whole scheme of redemption amount to, in what is the end and consummation of all things? He opens, after half fearing the charge of heresy from prejudiced hearers, and premises that he speaks with caution, discussing rather than dogmatizing. But he openly proclaims his belief that the goodness of God, when each sinner shall have received the penalty of his sins, will, through Christ, lead the whole universe to one end. This seems to him involved in the promise that all enemies shall be put under the feet of Christ (Ps. cx. 1; 1 Cor. xv. 25). The end will be like the beginning, and all shall be very good. The statement in Phil. ii. 10, that "At the name of Jesus every knee shall bow, of things in heaven and things under the earth," seems to him to involve a willing subjection, and therefore the cessation of a rebellious and resistent evil. Even the angels who kept not their first estate may, some of them at least, profit by the help of their unfallen brothers and be capable of restoration. The prayer of Christ for unity (John xvii. 21), which embraces the universe, as also does St. Paul's vision of the "perfect man" in whom all shall be united (Eph. iv. 13). This hope to be extended to the devil and his angels, or has inveterate habit hardened in them into a second nature? He, for his part, will not refuse to extend this grace to them, as they may deserve, greater punishments be endured; but if the will is free, any nature endowed with reason may pass from one order of being to another, each act of volition bringing with it its own punishment or reward (De Princ. i. c. 6). The change, as distinct from the destruction, of the heavens or the earth or the human frame, shall be the work of God (2 Pet. iii. 5, 12, witnesses for him to a like change, and not destruction, of those who are wending their way to that final blessedness. He is led to examine into the nature of the fire which tries every man's work and is the penalty of evil, and he finds it in the mind itself—in the memory of every sin committed before his eyes as an open scroll, and he looks on it with shame and anguish unspeakable. The Physician of our souls can use his own processes of healing. The "outer darkness" and Paradise are but different stages in the education of the great school of souls, and their upward and onward progress depends on their purity and love of truth (Princ. i. 6). It is his wish that "all these things" may come to pass; and in his mind he has the ideas of the resurrection as well as the nakedness; all alike need a sacrament to cleanse and purify us" (Hom. xiv. in Luc.). The fire of the last day will, it may be, be at once a punishment and a remedy, burning up the wood, hay, stubble, according to each man's merits, yet all working to the destined end of restoring man to the image of God, though, as yet, men must be treated also as they treat the servants of the judgment rather than the final restoration have to be brought before those who can be converted only by fears and threats (Cont. Cels. v.). Gehenna stands for the torments that cleanse the soul, but for the many who are scarcely restrained by the fears of eternal torment it is not excepted to go far into that matter, hardly indeed to commit our thoughts to writing, but to dwell on the certain and inevitable retribution for all evil (Cont. Cels. vi.). God is indeed a consuming fire, but that which He consumes is the evil that is in the souls of men, not the souls themselves (Isa. 41. 24). The hope of Origen colours even his view of the guilt of Judas, and he sees in his suicide the act of one who wished to meet his Master in the world of the dead, and there to implore forgiveness (Tract. xxxv. in Matt.) It is noticeable, however, that he does not there speak of the final salvation of Judas, and that his doctrine of reserve shows itself in his dwelling on the separation of the evil and good in Matt. xxxv. 46 as final, without speaking of the hope of a restoration as lying beyond it in the remote future.

What Origen thus whispered, as it were, to the ear in the secret chamber was proclaimed by Gregory of Nyssa as from the house top. His universe is an unseen and unknown work of God, that of bishop Newton of Bristol. The whole course of life was for him a discipline leading to virtue. If any one remain uncurbed by its health process (θεραπεύει) is continued in the life that follows. It may take for some, sharp and severe forms, the work of the knife and the scythe, "the golden chisel" (de Mon. 1). The creature of God's hands to its original likeness will be sufficient (Orat. Catech. viii.). Those who are not sharers in the purification by baptism will be purified by fire (Orat. Catech. xxxv.). Men are angry often with those who use severe remedies, but afterwards they thank them, and so, in like manner, when evil has mingled and implanted in their nature has been, after long periods of time, eradicated, and there shall be a restoration (ἀφοδησώσει) of those who are now lying in evil to their primal state; there shall be an accordant thanksgiving to God from all creation, both of those who needed and those who did not need purification (Orat. Catech. xxxvi.). This same idea has been developed more systematically in the treatise de Anima et Resurrectione. "The process of healing shall be proportioned to the measure of evil in each of us, and when the evil is purified and blotted out, there shall come in its place to each immortality and life and honour" (vol. iii. pp. 255, 260, ed. 1837). Now the race of men is by its evil shut out from the divine, but the barriers by which sin excludes us from that within the veil will one day be broken down, and when our nature shall be reconstructed, as in a new tabernacle (Σάλβος), and all the corruption that sin has brought in shall be blotted out, then shall God be the great feast of God for all whom the resurrection has brought together as His guests (iii. p. 245). In the end there shall be one common joy for all, and those who are now through sin outside the sanctuary of the divine blessedness will then cling to the horns of the altar, e.g. to the Founder of the world above (De Animi, Opp. ii. p. 672). It is true that he, who seeks his punishment through seems to which no limit can be assigned (De Animi, Opp. ii. p. 650) of a chastisement that shall extend through an eternal interval (εἰς αὐλον διαστήμα). But it is clear, as indeed the last word shews, that he looks forward beyond this to the ultimate...
mate extirpation of evil and the restoration of mankind, to a time "when there shall no longer be a sinner in the universe (in Psalm. iii. vol. ii. p. 289), and the war between good and evil shall be ended (ὅσις), and the nature of evil shall pass into nothingness, and the divine and unmingled goodness shall embrace all intelligent existence." (vol. i. 946). What is noticeable in Gregory of Nyssa is the admission of an apparent consciousness that he is deviating into the by-paths of new and strange opinions. He claims to be taking his stand on the doctrines (δόγματα) of the church in thus teaching with as much confidence as when he is expounding the mysteries of the divine nature as set forth in the creed of Nicaea (ii. p. 663). And the same absence of any sense of being even in danger of heresy is seen in most of those who followed in his footsteps or those of Origen. The Apologia for Origen, which was the joint work of Eusebius and Pamphilus, defends him without any hesitation. Theodore of Mopsuestia teaches that "those who have sinned evil all their life long will be made worthy of the sweetness of the divine bounty. For never would Christ have said 'until thou hast paid the uttermost farthing,' unless it were possible for us to be cleansed when we have paid the penalty. Nor would He have spoken of the many stripes and few unless after men had borne the punishment of their sins they might afterwards hope for pardon." (Fragment, ed. Fritzsche, p. 41.) Even Gregory of Nazianzus, when speaking of the filters that is not quenched, throws out the thought, as though it were at least admissible, that there may be a πῦρ φιλαθροῦντος καὶ τῶν καλῷστων ἐκαστῶν (Orat. xi. 36), destined to receive not in the fire of evil punishment, but in the fire of the divine, and filled with a sweetness of immortality, and was followed by Stephenus, bishop of Edesa, and Solomon of Bassora, and Isaac of Nineveh. "Even those who are tortured in Gehenna are under the discipline of the divine charity" (Assemani, Biblioth. Orient. iii. p. 329); and they were followed in their turn by Constantine, bishop of Soba (ibid. iv. p. 204). Timotheus II. patriarch of the Nestorians, wrote that "by the prayers of the saints the souls of sinners may pass from Gehenna to Paradise" (ibid. iv. p. 344). Many of these teachers were, it is true, like the last-named, followers of Nestorius, and were so far in communion with the orthodox churches of the East, but it is obvious that the special point on which Nestorius was condemned had no direct connexion with this or that form of eschatology, and that it was derived by them from those whose orthodoxy, like that of Gregory of Nyssa, was unquestioned. We have no evidence that the belief in the αἰωνιοῦν νόμισμα, which prevailed in the 4th and 5th centuries, was ever definitely condemned by any council of the church, and so far as Origen was named as coming under the church's censure it was rather as if involved in the general sentence passed upon the leaders of Nestorianism than singled out for special and characteristic errors. So the council of Constantinople, the so-called fifth general council, A.D. 553, condemns Arius, Æmonius, Macedonius, Apollinarius, Nestorius, Eutyches, and Origen in a lump, but does not specify the errors of the last-named, though they differed in kind from theirs, and it is not till the council of Constantinople known as in Trullo (A.D. 696) that we find an anathema which specifies, somewhat cloudily, the guilt of Theodore of Mopsuestia and Origen and Didymus and Evagrius as consists in their inventing a mythology (μυθολογία) after the manner of the Greeks, and inventing changes and migrations for our soul and body; there is no mention of the drunken ravings (μυθομαστήματα) as to the future life of the dead" (Conc. Quinis. can. i.). It deserves to be noted that this ambiguous anathema pronounced by a council of no authority under the weak and vicious emperor Justinian II. is the only approach to a condemnation of the eschatology of Origen which the annals of church councils present. So even in the West, where the harder nature of the African and the practical character of the Roman section of the Latin church made men indisposed to share in the wider sympathies and hopes of the great Alexandrian thinker, there was no form of sect that have dared to denounce him as a man without horror in the language of individual writers. Jerome, who does not accept Origen's view, speaks of it with a tolerant fairness, as though it were almost or altogether an open question: "Those who think that the punishment of the wicked will one day, after many ages, have an end rely on these testimonies," he writes on Rom. xi. 25, Gal. iii. 22, Mic. vii. 9, Isai. xii. 1, Ps. xxx. 20, which he gives in extenso. "And this we ought to leave to the knowledge of God alone, whose torments, no less than his compassion, are in due measure, and who knows how and how long He ought to punish. This only let us say, as suitting our human frailty, 'Lord, pass over the fault of thy servant,' which means 'Lord, berate me in thine anger.'" (Hieron. in Essai, iv. 1, v. 13.) So in commenting on Isai. xxiv. "post multos dies visitabitur." "This," he says, "seems to favours those friends of mine who grant the grace of repentance to the devil and to demons after many ages, that they too shall be visited after a time." He explains the text in a way to which it is said God's necessity forbids him to proceed this, and then, as before, falls back upon man's ignorance. "Human frailty cannot know the judgment of God, nor venture to form an opinion of the greatness and the measure of His punishment." (Hieron. in Essai, xxiv.)

The drift of Augustine's mind, with his exclusion of all outside the visible church from the hope of salvation, his leniency damnum for unbaptized infants, his doctrine of the divine decrees, hardly leads us to expect anything at his hands less than an absolute rejection of the Origenistic views. It deserves to be noted, however, that it was Pelagius rather than Augustine who laid stress upon the eternity of future punishments, insisted on Matt. xxv. 41, adding new objections over their endlessness, and taunted his Catholic opponents who held a remedial discipline as applicable at least to Christians dying with an imperfect holiness as being followers of Origen (de Gest. Pelag. c. 9–11). The taunt apparently had its effect. Augustine shrank from the term "Origenism" as the framework of the forty-second article of 1552 shirked from being classed with the Anabaptists who revived Origen's wider hope in the 16th century, and was led to disclaim more emphatically any approach to the special view of Origen. On the other hand, he continued also to assert even more definitely his own view of a purgatorial punishment for the baptized. Even in him, however, there is at times a strange absence of the horror and alarm with which the assertion of the hope of universal restoration has not unfrequently been greeted; later, however, he admits that that view was held by "nonnulli, itu quum plurimi," who were led by feelings of human pity. He does not accept it, but he allows men to believe, if they like, that there will be "mitigation and lumen" of the punishments of the lost (see infra). When he deals more systematically with the question it is in the same half-supercilius tone as Jerome: "We must now enter on a peaceable discussion with our compassionate friends"... He names Origen as holding that even the devil and his angels would after long ages of punishment be restored to fellowship with the holy angels. On this ground, he says, and for other reasons, especially for the "unceasing alternations" of blessedness and misery which Origen's theory was supposed to have involved, the church had rightly rejected (reprobavit) it. He condemns two modified forms of the Origenistic view—(1) that of the universal restoration of all mankind, but not of fallen angels, or even spirits, through the goodness of God, or (2) that of a like restoration obtained by the intercessions of the saints, as inconsistently stopping short of their logical consequence. If the assumption that the divine compassion will include the whole human race, why should it stop short there? Those who held the latter view, and Augustine states that he had met many who held it, in the preceding chapter on the belief that the saints in Paradise will not cease in their perfection to pray for those for whom they used to pray on earth; (2) on the words of Ps. lxxvi. 10 in the Latin version, Num obliviscor misericordiae tuae, aut continebit in ira et miseratione tuae sanctus? and (3) on the fact that the history of Jonah's mission to Nineveh proved that punishments threatened in the future were not to be withdrawn. He notices further modified forms of the wider hope which held out the promise of salvation to all who have been baptized, even though it be with heretical baptism, or to all who have received baptism in the Catholic church, even if they have fallen afterwards into heresy, or, at least, to all who have kept the Catholic faith, irrespective of holiness of life, or have not failed, whatever other sins they may have committed, in works of charity. He urges against all these views that the scriptural word aeternum, with its equivalent in saecula saeculorum, can only mean "quod fera non habitum" and that it must be the same meaning in Matt. xxv. 46, whether describing the blessedness of the righteous or the punishment of the wicked (de Civ. Dei, xxi. 17–27). It may be noted that in this discussion of all the views on this matter that seemed to him at variance with the language of scripture, Augustinus seems not to have the theory of the manifestation of the impetuous doers of evil. That view, if it had been ever really held in the Christian church, had clearly been thrown altogether into the back-ground, and was practically nowhere. From this period, with the authority of the great African father thrown into the scale against it, the doctrine of universal restoration tended to fall into the same position, as far as the Western church was concerned, and though never formally condemned, may be said to have virtually been rejected. It was, perhaps, partly as a consequence of that rejection that the intermediate view, the history of which now remains to be traced, came into greater prominence.

3. Those who shrank from the consequences, real or supposed, of the teaching of Origen were able to cherish the hope of an undefined though not an universal restoration, even in the case of those who departed this life in a state so imperfect that it is called for punishment. As the greater includes the less, it is obvious that the followers of Origen and Gregory of Nyssa would admit both the beliefs and the arguments of those who maintained the more moderate and cautious view. The dominant thought in the mind of these latter was that the redeeming work of Christ and the possibility of repentance, and the special agency of the oblation in the prayers and sacraments, and the sanctifying work of the Spirit, are not confined within the narrow limits of this life, but have a wide range of action in the period that lies between death and judgment. Here again it is in the church of Alexandria, as represented by Origen's master, Clement, that we find the earliest and most distinct utterances of the wider hope. He recognises that Christ preached the gospel to those in Hades, and that it brought repentance not to the souls of patriarchs and Jewish saints only, but to heathen seekers after righteousness. Then also the apostles had been fellow-workers with their Master in proportion to their likeness to Him, some working, according to the task assigned to them on earth, among the souls of the Hebrews, some among those of the Gentiles (Strom. vi. 44, 45). The punishments (κολλοδεία) of God in Hades are remedial and reformatory (σωτήριον καὶ παθετηρίαν), and lead to repentance, and this work is easier for those who are no longer under the temptation of the flesh (ibid. c. 46). God is all-good and all-powerful, and is able to save all who turn to Him, whether it be here or there (ibid. c. 47). He quotes the Κηρυγμα Πέρατος as showing that the moral government (μετακομη) of God requires that those who have had no opportunity of knowing the truth in this life should have that opportunity elsewhere, since otherwise they would have no adequate probation (ibid. c. 48). He recognises in the κερκυραίος of the Stoics an anticipation of the Christian doctrine of the purification by fire of those who have lived evil lives (ibid. v. 9). The souls that are punished (κακάφηλα) are yet purified by the fire (Phragm. 14).

The wide acceptance of the gospel of Nicodemus, with its vivid pictures of the descent into Hades, and the work of deliverance accomplished there, robbing death and Hades of all their prisoners (Evang. Nicod. c. 24), wiping away the tares from the wheat (ibid. c. 23), and rescuing those whom Satan had held bound, and placing him in chains in place of Adam and his sons (ibid. c. 23), testifies to the prevalence of the belief which Clement thus asserts, and we must not forget that when the article "He descended into hell" was received into the Apostles’ Creed, in the earlier text of which it does not appear, it came weighted, so to speak, with all the associations that had thus gathered round it. It was received because it spoke to men of Christ as the cornerstone of this world, but extending to the unseen. Even in Hades the cross had been set up as the symbol and pledge of deliverance. Even there He was drawing all men unto Him. So Athanasius (if the treatise de Passione et Cruci Domini is his) speaks of Satan as cast out of Hades at the time of the deliverance, all whom he had kept in prison set free by the victorious Christ (Opp. ii. p. 1017, ed. 1586). So Chrysostom (de Coen. et Erope, Expos. in Ps. xlvii.) speaks of the descent into Hades as binding the devil and bringing his prey, the human race, into the treasury of the eternal King. So Cyril of Jerusalem, almost reproducing the very language of the gospel of Nicodemus, speaks of Christ as descending to Hades that He might ransom the just. He descended alone, but He returned with many following Him. The souls that had been long in prison were set free (Catech. i. xiv.). So Epiphanius describes the descent as made to rescue those who had not fallen away utterly from the Church, but whose frailties in Hades, by giving them, as it were, an amnesty (ampierein) (adv. Haer. i. 3). And in this view the Latin fathers are at one with the Greek. Ambrose refers the gospel preached to the dead of 1 Pet. iv. to the descent into Hades “utquotque cupidit ejus essent, liberarentur” (50). So the message with the saving of the souls that He had rescued (in Rom. x.). Some of these were they who appeared to many after His resurrection (in Ep. iv.). Comp. also the statements in the De Myst. Pasch.

It was natural that men like Origen and his school should interpret the “fire that tries every man’s work” of 1 Cor. iii. 13, the “fire” of 1 Cor. vii. 9, of purifying punishment in the intermediate state, and should extend that idea even to the “seasian fire” of Matt. xxv. 46, and the “unquenchable fire” of Mark ix. 43. It is more suggestive to note that even those who strayed from that path, did not confine the redeeming or purifying work in Hades to the brief period of the actual descent. So Symeonis (Ep. 44), though he speaks of the deathless soul paying, if its guilt is incurable, a deathless penalty, teaches that there are δαιμωνια, whose work it is to purify souls, as fullers cleanse a soiled garment. Even Tertullian (de Anim. c. 58) teaches that the last fasting “of the sinner’s debt, if it be not a medicum delictum,” may be paid by sufferings there. Even Cyprian (Ep. ix.) holds that some of those who are sent, on death, into the prison-house may come forth when they have paid the uttermost fasting, while martyrs receive their crown at once; that it may be necessary for some to be cleansed and purified by fire before they can enter into the suffering, waiting for the judgment of the great day. Even Jerome, while holding that there are eternal torments for the rebprobate and godless, speaks of the works of Christians as “having to be tried and purified by fire” (in Eus. lixi. ad fin.); of Christians who have fallen into sin as “salvandos post poenas” (Dial. c. Pelag. i. 28), and adopts the general (“a plerique”) explanation of the undying worm and the fire that is not quenched, of the anguish of conscience (in Essai lvi. 24). Even Augustine admits that between death and judgment there may be punishments that endure for a season only (de Civ. Dei, xxii. 13); that some sins not forgiven in this world are forgiven in the world to come, sc. in that interval (de Civ. Dei, xxii. 24) and are purgatorial in their nature (ibid. xxii. 16; Enchirid. ad Laurent. c. 18). We pray for those who have not fallen utterly from grace, that after their punishment the right of being shewn to them, so that they may not go into eternal fire (ibid. xxii. 24). The fire which tries and purifies is not eternal, and of this view that each soul will suffer according to its need of suffering, Augustine says: “Nee redarguo quod forsitan verum est” (ibid. xxi. 28). The effect of this earlier doctrine of purgatory on devout souls is well illustrated by the touching prayer at the close of the Hemartogeneia of Prudentius already quoted (Art. DEATH AND THE DEAD, vol. i. p. 796). Those that are suffering that “ignis purgatorius” may be helped in the interval between death and the resurrection by the prayers and alms of the faithful, and the “saltatio altaris.” The fact that that sacrifice was offered in the liturgies of Augustine’s time for all souls, and not for the elect only, to whom his theory limited the hope of salvation, presented a difficulty which he meets with a characteristic subtlety. These sacrifices differ in their effects from prayers with their object in mind, of which there are “valde bonis gratiarum actiones sunt; pro nee valde malia propitiationes sunt; pro valde malis etiamis nulla sunt adventus mortuorum, quae deorum vivorum consolationes sunt.” Quibus autem prosum aut ad hoc prosum, ut sit plena remissio, aut certa ut tolerabilis fat damnatio” (Enchirid. c. 20). But after the resurrection the doors of the dead will be closed. Admitting the fact that the belief is a regret or cessation of the “aesterna damnationum poena” was held by “nonnulli imo quas plurimi” (a doctrine so held must have been at least regarded by the church as not incompatible with the faith of which she was the keeper) be for his part rejected. He barely allows (non ide conspico quia non resistis, de Civ. Dei, xxii. 24) the possibility of a levamen of the cruciatius or poena sensiis of the lost, but the poena damnii, the alienatio a vita Dei will be the common portion of all (Enchirid. c. 29).

And so the dark shadow of Augustine fell on the theology of the Western church, and condemned its thoughts of the love of God to many centuries of disastrous twilight. It started from the assumption that the whole human race was, through the sin of Adam, una massa perdification. From this Divine grace elected some to salvation. But none are elected outside the range of those who believe and are baptized. The whole of this world, therefore, was left to eternal torments: its virtues were but “splendidis vita” (de Civ. Dei, xix. 25). Even for unbaptized infants dying before they had done good or evil there was but the “levissima damnatio” of the alienation from the life of God, which was the common lot of all the lost, and compared with the eternity of which, any torments enduring for ages and then ceasing.
would be a light thing to bear (Ezech. v. 29). And baptism, though indispensable, was yet not sufficient. To hold the true faith, to live a holy life, these they rightly saw were conditions of eternal blessedness, and these were possible only for those who came under the decree of God's electing grace. The narrowness of medieaval scholasticism, the hardness of Calvinistic Protestantism are each of them traceable to the influence of the great bishop of Hippo. And to that influence also, it must be added, is traceable the whole scholastic and Tridentine doctrine of purgatory, with all its practical corruptions. The instincts of mankind led them to turn to the one mitigating feature in the terrible theology that shut out ninety-nine hundredths of mankind from all hope of escaping hell, and the "ignis purgatorius pro non valde malignis," admitting of mitigation, capable even of being short-cased by prayers, alms, the sacrifice of the altar, came into greater and greater prominence. Practically even in the next great Latin father, Gregory the Great, it is thought of by each man his own kindred and friends as non valde mali, and natural affection, or even the conventional decorum which required the shew of affection, led men to provide the means of mitigation. They could repeat prayers, give alms, pay for masses. The indulgences of Tetzel were but the natural development of the theology of Celistantianism. It was reserved for Calvinism and popular Protestantism to reproduce all that was hardest in it without even that element of mitigation. The teaching of the Western church from this period offers hardly any exception to the reproduction of Augustine's leading lines of thought. The language of the next great Latin father, Gregory the Great, is indeed even more sternly: "There is a purgatorial fire, but it is only for very small sins." Admitting the natural meaning of Matt. xii. 31, it is only for such sins as "an idle word or immoderate laughter" that remission may be looked for in the other world, and then only by those who have deserved remission in this world. (Dialog. iv. 34). Even the "mitigatio" of Augustine has passed into the back-ground, and he teaches a progressive increase in guilt and therefore in punishment: "ad deteriora quotidie impulsus est."

K. H. P.

ESCHROPOEI (Alexaprovot), mentioned by Antichus, the monk of St. Saba, as a designation of the later Origenist sect (Antioch. Monach. Homil. 130, p. 1246, Patr. Gr. Lxxix. 1847 a).

T. W. D.

ESCONN, bishop of Bochlinuad, commemorated Nov. 20. He is thus designated at his commemoration in Mart. Doneg. but in Dr. Reeve's Calendar he is said to be "of Drumidaganda." The attempt is made, though not very successfully, to identify this Esconn with the heretic name, Mo-Esscon, with Maxentius, Virgin Martyr, who is venerated on the same day, and also on April 16 and Oct. 24. [Makentia] [Mart. Doneg.] by Todd and Reeves, 314-15, 406-7; Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 381; Butler, Lives of the Saints, Nov. 20, xi. 429; Sp. Forbes, Kut.

ESDRAS (Ezr, Jeser.) catholicos or metriarch of Armenia. He was born at Pharhajagerd in the canton of Nik or Nica, and the province of Ararad in Great Armenia, and in 628 succeeded Christopher Abrahamita. Le Quien (Or. Chr. i. 1386), who does not date his accession, quotes a catalogue which assigns ten years to his rule, but Saint-Martin makes him... succeeded by Nersea III. in 640 (Mém. sur L'Arménie, i. 438). For the important synod of Charanum (a.d. 672 or 673) which distinguishes the pontificate of Eudes, see Armenian, Vol. I. p. 165. [C. H.]

ESEWINE (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1419, in M. H. B. 781), king of Wessex. [ESWINE] [C. H.]

ESL, abbat. [ESL.]

ESCHIUS. [ESCHIUS.]

ESCHIUS I. and II., bishops of Poitiers, stand respectively eleventh and twelfth in the episcopal lists of that see, but nothing whatever is known of their history. (Gall. Christ. ii. 1143; Gams, Ser. Ep. 50.) [R. T. S.]

ESICIA (Greg. Mag. Ep. lib. i. ind. ix. ep. 6, Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 450), a lady. [ESCHIA.] [C. H.]

ESIMPHAES (ESIMPHAES), king of the Homeritae or Himyari, the people of Yemen in Arabia Felix. He was a Christian, and was raised to the throne of his country by Hellestheues the king of Anthiphaios, on the condition, however, that he became his tributary. During his reign, he rendered valuable aid to Justinian in his war with the Persians. After the death of Hellestheues Esimphaes was deposed, and Abraham, who also was a Christian, was chosen in his stead. (Procop. de Bell. Pers. i. 20.) [T. W. D.]

ESITUSS, bishop of Grenoble. [ESCHIUS.]

ESLINGUS, bishop of Tours. [ESLINGUS.]

ESNE (AEINE), the tenth bishop of Hereford. (M. H. B. 631.) Under the form of Peine his name appears among the signatures to the legatine canons of 787. As his predecessor Alderbert was at Brentford in 781, and his successor Coelmonud attests charters in 788, the date of Esne is so far ascertained, but nothing more is known of him. The name, which signifies a servant, or a serving man (see Schmidt, Ges. p. 569) seems to be peculiar to this bishop as a distinctive appellation; but it appears in the will of king Alfred as belonging to a bishop of his time, unassigned to any see, and may there be an interpolation: see Lib. de Hyda, p. 65; Kemble, C. D. No. 314. [S.]

ESNIG, Armenian patriarch. [EZNIK.]

ESOTUS. [ESOTUS.]

ESPASANDUS, bishop of Complutum (Alcala de Henares), subscribes the acts of the fifteenth and sixteenth councils of Toledo, under Egica. He was bishop from about 686 till after 693 (Esp. Syns. vii. 189; Aguirre-Catalan, iv. 313, 333) [ASTURUS]. [M. A. W.]

ESPERAINDOW, bishop of Italica, signs the twelfth council of Toledo, called by Ervig, and presided over by Julian. [ERVINO.] His name comes eleventh among thirty-five. He died probably a.d. 682, and was succeeded by Cuniald, whom Wamba had endeavoured to make bishop of Aquit (Esp. Syns. vii. 267, Aguirre-Catalan, iv. 270). [EUALUS.] [M. A. W.]

ESPIAN, venerated at Beaumais in France is said, by Guerin and Girry, to have been son of Ella, king of Scotland and Northumbria, and of his queen Pantihomena in the 9th century, and that the brother of SS. Maura and Brigida (the first Ella reigned in Deira 559-588; another Ella, or Aella usurped the throne of Northumbria, a.d. 867. Anglo-Saxon Chron.). On the death of his father he declined the throne, and went with his sisters to France, where, after visiting Rome, they were seized upon by barbarian hordes and murdered at Balangry, near Creil, in the diocese of Beauvais. Their bodies were exhumed at Nogent-la-Vierges in the 12th century. But the whole story is legendary, and does not rise to the value of history (Saring- Gould, Lives of the Saints, July 23, p. ii. 306-308). [J. G.]

ESPIUS, fifth bishop of Syracuse, probably early in the 2nd century. He succeeded Eusias I., and was followed by Ethmotheus (Rcsa- Pirri, Sicilia Sacra, i. 600.) [R. S. G.]

ESSENES or ESSAEANS ('Esseni or Essowen). One of the three sects of Judaism at the time of Christ, the other two being the Pharisees and the Sadducees. The etymology and import of this name will best be considered after an examination of the tenets and practices of this sect or brotherhood, as well as of their rise and development.

1. The Doctrines and Practices of the Essenes.—Being Hebrews of the Hebrews, the Essenes firmly believed in God as the Creator and Disposer of all things. They believed in the immortality of the soul, and in a future state of retribution, where the righteous and the wicked will be rewarded according to the deeds done in the body. They regarded death as a great gain, inasmuch as it was the entrance into glory. With the discarding of this corruptible body, the incorruptible soul obtained her liberty from bondage, and mounted upwards to the region of pure spirits, whilst the souls of the wicked were consigned to a dark and tempestuous dungeon, full of never-ceasing punishments. But if we are to accept the opinion of Josephus, which, as we shall hereafter, is seen to be correct, they did not believe in the resurrection of the body. Their faith in the inspired law of God was so intense that they were led thereby to pay the greatest reverence to Moses the lawgiver, and to consider blasphemy of his name a capital offence. They divided their doctrines into three classes: 1. Love to God; 2. Love of virtue; and 3. Love to mankind. "Of their love to God," Philo tells us, "they give innumerable demonstrations, by their constant and unalterable holiness throughout the whole of their life, their avoidance of oaths and falsehoods, and by their firm belief that God is the source of all good, but of nothing evil. Of their love of virtue they give in signs their contempt for riches, fame, and pleasure; their continence and endurance; in their satisfying their wants easily; in their simplicity, cheerfulness of temper, modesty, order, firmness, &c. As instances of their love to man, are to be mentioned their benevolence, equality, and their having all things in common." Their aim in life was: to be separate from the world with its evil practices, to live a life of holiness and devotion to God, to benefit mankind, to become the temple of the Holy Spirit, so as to be enabled to prophesy and perform miraculous cures, and to prepare themselves for a future state of bliss and reunion with the Father of Spirits. To obtain this end they had to adopt stringent regulations which should keep them from the contaminations of the world.

The Levitical and ceremonial laws of purity which were developed after the restoration by Ezra, and especially during the Maccabean period, and which were observed with more or less rigour by the different schools of the Jewish nation, constituted the foundation upon which the Essenes reared the whole edifice of their domestic arrangements and regulations, according to these laws, contact with any one who did not observe the rules of purity, or even did not observe them to the same degree, rendered the faithful followers impure, the Essenes had to form themselves into a separate society or community. Moreover as contact with things manifestly unclean was forbidden by any one who did not keep the same rules, likewise produced impurity, the Essenes were also obliged to cultivate and manufacture all the articles of food and dress which their commonwealth required. The rigorous observance of the laws of purity also led some of the Essenes to choose a celibate life as a profession of consecration, and the periodical defiled state of women arising from their courses and childbirth were a perpetual source of defilement to a sanctified life. Their regulations were therefore religio-industrial.

II. Their Daily Occupation and Manner of Life.

—To raise the supplies, all the members took their share in the common labours, whether by tilling the soil, or by the trade or art which they possessed. They got up before sunrise, and never talked about any worldly matters till they had all assembled together, and, with their faces turned towards the sun, offered up their national prayer for the renewal of the light of day. Immediately after this religious duty they betook themselves to manual work under the direction of the stewards whom they elected by universal suffrage, to their respective employments. The farmers among them cultivated the ground and reared the bees; the shepherds tended the flocks, the bakers prepared the food, the tailors and shoemakers made and repaired the articles of dress. At this work, they remained till the fifth hour, i.e. 11 o'clock A.M., when the labour of the forenoon regularly terminated. Hereupon all of them assembled together, submitted to their daily rite of baptism in cold water, discarded their working-clothes, arrayed themselves in white garments, being the symbol of purity, and resorted to the repast which was brought by the priest, who entered in solemn silence, as if it were the holy Temple. Having seated themselves according to their age and order, the brethren who were the bakers and cooks placed before each a little loaf of bread and a dish of the most simple food, consisting chiefly of vegetables. The silence which was continued all through the meal was broken by the priest of holiness, of whom as descendant, who invoked God's blessing upon the repast. The mysterious silence was again resumed, and continued during the meal, which had the character of a sacrament. After the meal, the priest offered thanks to the bountiful Supplier of all wants, which was the signal of dismissal. All then withdrew, put off their white garments, dressed in their working clothes, resumed their several employments till the evening, when they again assembled to partake of a common meal, under the same regulations. All of them devoted certain hours of the day to the study of the mysteries of nature and revelation, as well as of the celestial hierarchy. Such was their manner of life during week days. The Sabbath they observed with the utmost rigour. Even the removal of a vessel from one place to another, they regarded as a violation of this holy day. They took special care not to forsake the assembling of themselves together. Ten persons constituted a complete and legal assembly. As Divine worship in the synagogue. In the presence of such an assembly they would never spit. As at meals, each one took his seat in the synagogue according to age, and in becoming attire. They had no ordained ministers, whose exclusive right it was to conduct the service. Any member who felt moved to ask up from the Bible and read in it, whilst those who had much experience in spiritual matters expounded the portion thus read. The distinctive ordinances of the brotherhood, and the mysteries connected with the Tetragrammaton, as well as with the angelic worlds, constituted the principal theme of their Sabbatic intercourse. The study of logic and metaphysics was eschewed as injurious to a devotional life.

III. Candidates for and Mode of Admission into the Brotherhood.—Every candidate for admission into the order had to pass through a noviciate of two stages, extending over three years. Upon entering the first stage, which lasted twelve months, the candidate adopted all his possessions into the common treasury, he then received (1) a copy of the regulations of the brotherhood, which he had carefully to study, and rigidly to follow the rules contained therein; (2) a spade to bury the excrement (comp. Deut. xxiii. 12-15); and (3) a white robe to put on at meals, bring the symbol of holiness to himself in the midst of these symbols, he was an outsider during the whole of the twelve months, and was not admitted to the common meals. At the expiration of his probationary period, the novice was admitted into the second stage, if the community found that he had properly acquitted himself. He was now called an "approacher," (προσαγωγής), and during this stage, which lasted two years, he was admitted to closer fellowship with the brotherhood, and shared in their lustral rites. But he was still excluded from the common meal, and was ineligible for any office. If he passed satisfactorily through the second stage of probation, he then became an associate or full member of the society (ζυγανος), when he bound himself by solemn oaths, * First to fear God, and next to exercise justice to all men; neither to wrong any one of his own accord, nor by the command of others; always to detest the wicked, and side with the righteous; ever to keep faith inviolable with all men, especially with his fellow associates; for no one comes to office without the will of God; not to be proud of his power, nor to outshine his subordinates, either in his garments or greater finery, if he himself should attain to office; always to love truth, and strive to reclaim all inns; to keep his hands clear from stealing and his mind was unholy gain; not to conceal anything from the brotherhood, nor disclose anything belonging to them to those without, though it were at the hazard of his life. He has, moreover, to swear not to communicate to any one their doctrines in any other way than he has received them; to abstain from robbing the common treasury of the sect, and from writing or dictating any of their communications, their writings of the society, and the names of the angels" (Josephus, War, II. viii. 7).

The whole brotherhood was divided into four classes—(1) the novices, (2) the approachers, (3) the new full members, and (4) the old members.

Each class advanced so much in holiness above the others by the longer number of years of their membership, that if the senior member of a class happened to touch the member of a class below him, he had to purify himself by lustration in the same way as if he had been defiled by contact with a stranger. If a brother was accused of sin as he was brought before the brethren, and could not be judged unless there were, at least, a hundred of the community present, and agreed in their verdict.

If he was pronounced guilty, he was excommunicated, yet was he not regarded as an enemy, but was admonished as a brother, and received back after due repentance.

IV. The Relationship of Essenes to Judaism.—The fact that the Essenes professed to be guided by the teachings of the Hebrew Scriptures, that a rupture between them and the Jewish community is nowhere mentioned, and that, on the contrary, they are described by the orthodox Jews themselves as the holiest and most consistent followers of the Mosaic law, would, apart from anything else, show that they were an orthodox Jewish sect. We have, however, more minute and definite data, which incontestably prove that in doctrine, as well as in practice, Essenesim is simply an intensified or exaggerated form of Pharisaism, which was the national religion in the time of Christ. It is unfortunate that the only two contemporary Jewish accounts of the Essenes as a separate body are in the writings of Josephus, which is manifestly shaped to exhibit the Jews to the cultivated Greeks in a Hellenistic garb.

In spite, however, of this mystification a careful examination of these strongly-coloured records will show the identity of the cardinal doctrines and principal practices of Essenesim and Pharisaism. Passing over their belief in God the Creator and Disposer of all things, as requiring no proof that this also constituted the most essential article of the faith of the Pharisees, we shall examine the other doctrines and practices which Josephus describes, and which might be deemed to be distinctive features of Essenesim.

1. The Essenes, we are told, believed in the immortality of the soul, and in a future state of reward and punishment. So the Pharisees, "This world is the outer court to the world to come; prepare thyself in the outer court so as to be admitted into the palace" (Aboth, iv. 16).

"Those that are born are destined to die, those that die are destined to live again, and those that live again are destined for judgment" (Aboth, iv. 22).

2. The Essenes considered blaspheming the name of Moses a capital offence, so did the Pharisees. It was to bring him under the penalty of this law that Stephen was charged with having spoken "blasphemous words against Moses" (Acts vii. 11).

3. The Essenes were divided into four classes, according to the age of membership, and according to the degree of holiness which they practised, and the member of a higher class became defiled if it is at all possible for a member of the lower class to be the member of a higher class. The Pharisees, in consequence of a conscientious desire to discharge their religious duties in a state of legal purity, prescribed in Levit. v. 2; vii. 20, 21; xi. 1-8; xv. 19-31; Num. xix. 14-22, the authoritative exponents of the canon law ordained that since one does not know whether he has been defiled by contact with any unclean person or thing, every member of the Pharisaic association is "to wash his hands before eating his ordinary food, the second tithes or the heave-offering; to immerse his whole body before he eats the portions of holy sacrifices; and to bathe his whole body before touching the water absorbing the holy sacrifice, even if it is of unclean fruits which are unclean. If one immersed himself for ordinary food (טומא), and designed it only for ordinary food, he could not eat second tithes; if he immersed for second tithes (טומא) he could not eat of the heave-offering; if he immersed for the heave-offering (טומא), and meant by it the heave-offering, he was not allowed to eat the portion of the holy sacrifice; if he immersed for the holy sacrifice (טומא), and meant it for the holy sacrifice, he could not as yet touch the water absorbing from sin (טומא), but he who immersed for the more important could share in the less important (טומא)."

This gave rise to four degrees of purity, and to four divisions in the Pharisaic association. Each degree of purity required a greater separation from the above-named Mosaic defilements. Hence "the garments of an Am Ha-Aretz (טומא), or a non-member of the Pharisaic association) defile the Pharisee (i.e. him who lived according to the first degree of the Pharisees); the Pharisee defile those who eat the heave-offering (i.e. the second degree); the garments of those who eat the heave-offering defile those who eat the holy sacrifice (i.e. the third degree); and the garments of those who eat the holy sacrifice defile those who touch the water absorbing from sin (i.e. the fourth degree) (comp. Bava Kamma 7a; Tosephoth, v. 5).

Hence it is declared that "he who takes upon himself to become a member of the Pharisaic association must neither sell to an Am Ha-Aretz moist or dry fruit, nor buy of him moist fruit, nor become the guest of an Am Ha-Aretz, nor receive him as guest in his garments into his house" (Mishas Demai, ii. 3).

4. A candidate for admission into the order of the Essenes had to go through a novitiate of twelve months. The same was the case with the Pharisees. When any one applied to become a member of the Pharisaic association he had to pass through a novitiate of twelve months (Berachoth, 60 a).

5. The novice among the Essenes received an apron the first year of his probation. The same was the case in the Pharisaic association. The newly-admitted associate received a garment called דרי, and having duly qualified himself
11. The highest aim of the Essenes was to attain to such a state of holiness as to be able to perform miraculous cures and to prophesy. So the Pharisees. Thus Josephus, among other things, foretold the coming of Vespasian and Titus to the Roman empire (comp. Antiq. iii. 8, 9; Life, ed. Zinzendorf, iii. 7). The Essenes “being bound by oaths and customs cannot receive food from any out of the society, so that when any are excommunicated they are forced to eat herbs” (Josephus, War, ii. viii. 8). So the Pharisees. Josephus himself tells us when at Rome while Felix was procurator of Judea, he pleaded for Caesar the cause of certain captive priests who were his friends, and who were so God-fearing that even under affliction they subsisted on figs and nuts (Life, § 3).

12. The Essenes had esoteric doctrines and ancient books on magical cures and exorcisms, and the novice had to swear that he would not seek to “preserve” or “keep” or “transmit” any writings of the society that were “names of the angels” (Josephus, War, ii. viii. 8). So had the Pharisees. Josephus himself assures us that “God enabled Solomon to learn that skill which expels demons, which is a science useful and sanative to man. He composed such incantations also by which distressers are alleviated. And he also taught him the manner of using exorcisms, by which they drive away demons so that they never return, and this method of cure is of great force until this day. For I have seen a certain man of my own country whose name was Eleazar releasing people that were demoniacal in the presence of me, one of the Jewish priests, and the whole multitude of his soldiers” (Antiq. VIII. ii. 5). The esoteric doctrines of the Jews which comprised the mysteries connected with the Tetragrammaton (שִׁמְרֵי-אִישֶׁ תְּאָוִית) and the other names of God and the angels, the theosophy (תֵּשּׁוּפָה) and the cosmography (תֵּשֶׁבּוּת) could only be communicated to the initiated, hence the injunctions of the Mishna. “The mystery of the cosmography (תֵּשֶׁבּוּת) must not be explained when two present, and the mystery of the theosophy (תֵּשּׁוּפָה) not even to one unless he is a sage” (Chagiga, ii. 1).

The real differences between Essenism and Pharisaism are—(1) The Essenes, or rather a portion of them, led a celibate life; (2) they were not present at the offering of their sacrifices, though they sent their holy gifts to the temple; and (3) they did not believe in the re-surrection of the body, though they firmly believed in the immortality of the soul and a future state of reward and punishment. The first and second differences, as we shall see hereafter, were exaggerated, but still strictly logical developments of the Levitical and Pharisaical laws of purity, whilst the third was not peculiar to the Essenes, if it can be attributed to them at all.
hand it is as firmly asserted that the supposed coincidence in doctrine and social institutions of the two communities simply exhibits the natural outgrowth of the moral sense common to mankind which may be seen wherever and wherever circumstances favour its development. As is often the case in controversies both these antagonsist views suffer from admixture of truth and error. The advocates of the former betray prejudice against Christianity and a want of sympathy with its nature; that the existence of the latter shew ignorance of the varied opinions and institutions which obtained among the Jews before the time of Christ, and are equally prejudiced against Judaism. They seem, moreover, to be possessed by an unworthy fear lest the admission that Christ belonged to a branch of the national synagogue established by law, into whose membership He was admitted by the prescribed rites, and whose services He attended and publicly took part in, and that He found some excellent doctrines and commendable practices in the religion of His people which He deemed worthy to incorporate into His own teaching would betray the undue spirit of the enemy. The truth will be found between these two extremes, as will be seen from the following comparison.

The ruling principle of Essenism was, above all, to seek the kingdom of God. Christ urged on His disciples to seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness. (Matt. vi. 33; Luke xii. 31.) The Essenes demanded of those who wished to join their community, to sell their possessions and give to the poor. (Josephus, War, ii. viii. 8.) Christ told the young man who kept the commandments, and whom He loved, “If thou wilt be perfect, sell that thou hast and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven, and come and follow Me.” (Matt. vi. 33; Mark x. 21-23; Luke xii. 31.) The Essenes regarded the laying up of treasure upon earth as injurious to leading a spiritual life, hence they despised riches, and were content with self-imposed poverty. (Josephus, War, ii. viii. 3.) Christ told His disciples, “Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth...” (Matt. vi. 19-21; xix. 23, 24.) Love of the brotherhood was the soul of Essenea life, and was the basis of all their actions. So intense was this feeling amongst them, that the love which they manifested for the brethren called forth the greatest admiration, and was declared to be without a parallel in the rest of the Jewish nation. (Josephus, War, ii. viii. 2.) Christ made love the basis of His teaching: “This is My commandment, that ye love one another as I have loved you.” (John xvi. 12, 17.) “This is the message which ye have received from the beginning, that ye love one another.” (1 John iii. 13-17.) “We know that we have passed from death to life because we love the brethren.” (1 John iii. 14.) To realise the idea of brotherhood, the Essenes lived together like one family; had all things in common, and appointed one of the brethren steward to manage the common bag. (Josephus, War, ii. viii. 3.) So the primitive Christians: “All that believed were together, and had all things common, and sold their possessions and goods, and parted them to all men as every man had need.” (Acts ii. 43, 44.) One managed the common bag. (John xii. 8; xiii. 29.) Even in travelling the Essenes “go to those whom they have never seen before, as if they had been most intimate, so that they take nothing with them when they go on a journey.” (Josephus, War, ii. viii. 4.) Christ, too, commanded His disciples that they should take nothing for their journey, neither bread, nor scrip, nor bread, nor money in their purses; but be shod with sandals, and not put on two coats. (Mark vi. 9, 10.) As a result of this mode of living together like brethren, the Essenes put all their members on the same level, forbade the exercise of authority of one over the other, and enjoined mutual service. (Josephus, Ant. XVIII. i. 5.) Christ declared that all His disciples are equal; forbade them to lord one over another; but commanded them to be servants to each other. (Matt. xx. 25, 28; Mark x. 35-37; i. 42-45.) Again, as a result of the great moral law which was the foundation of Essenism—viz. love to God and to one’s fellow-man—none could be absolutely proscribed slavery. (Josephus, Ant. XVIII. i. 5.) Though no single detached precept can be adduced in which Christ explicitly condemns this social institution, yet who can fail to see that the whole spirit and genius of His teaching is antagonistic to this degrading practice? Owing to the same great moral law, the Essenes proscribed all who wished war and warlike pursuits; they even refused to manufacture martial instruments, and only took weapons with them when they went on a perilous journey. Christ, too, who declared that “all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword” (Matt. xxvii. 52), told His disciples, when about to start for the Mount of Olives, “He that hath no sword, let him sell his garment and buy one.” (Luke xxii. 36-38.) The aim and end of Essenism were to be meek and lowly in spirit, to mortify all sinful lusts, to be pure in heart, to hate evil but reclaim the evil-doer, to be merciful to all men. (Josephus, War, ii. viii. 7.) The same qualities Christ sets forth as constituting the blessedness in the Sermon on the Mount. (Matt. v. 1-10.) With the Essenes, therefore, truthfulness was the natural result of their life. Hence, swearing to attest the veracity of a statement was strictly forbidden; their communication was “Yea, yea,” and “Nay, nay.” (Josephus, War, ii. viii. 6.) So sacred was their word, that Herod the Great, who exacted the oath of allegiance from the other Jews, exacted the Essenes. (Josephus, Ant. XV. i. 4.) Christ enjoined His disciples, “Swear not at all... but let your communication be Yea, yea; Nay, nay.” (Matt. v. 34-37.) The Essenes especially devoted themselves to alienate the ailments of the sick, thus combining the healing of the body with that of the soul; and regarded the power to perform miracles as the mark of Christ and the cast out evil spirits, &c., as belonging to the highest state of discipleship. Christ, too, combined the two functions, and gave His true disciples power “to heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead, cast out evil spirits,” &c. (Matt. x. 1-8; Mark xvi. 17, 18; Luke x. 17.) It was the aim of the Essenes to live such a life of purity and holiness, and so to devote themselves to the study of the sacred Scriptures, as to become the temples of the Holy Spirit, and to be able to prophesy; and Josephus assures us that they hardly ever failed in their predictions. (Josephus, War, II. viii. 12.) And this eye-witness describes several of their prophets, and the fulfillment of their predictions. (War, I. iii. 5; II. viii. 3; Antiq. XII. ii. 11; XV. v. 5.) St. Paul urges the Corinthians to desire, of all spiritual gifts, the gift to prophesy. (1 Cor. xiv. 1, 39.)

Though all the Essenes as a body waited for the kingdom of heaven, and aimed to live a life of more immediate communion with the Deity, which involved abstention from conjugal intercourse, yet it was not given to all to attain to this command, invested in the words "once fruitless, only a portion of the brotherhood attained to that elevated spiritual life which enabled them to be celibates, or, as it is called in the language of the New Testament, "eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake." (Josephus, War, II. vii. 2, 13.) It is the striking after this gift which is to be "defiled according to the law of Moses." (V. 11.) The reach that state of holiness which will enable one to abstain from marriage for the kingdom of heaven's sake, is indeed not within the power of all, for it is a special gift of God; "but he that can receive it, let him receive it." (Matt. xix. 10-12.) Hence the declaration of St. Paul, who had a legal standing: "I have already received the gift of the Spirit, I am myself married; but every man hath his proper gift." (1 Cor. vii. 7.) This agreement between Christ and the Essenes on the doctrine of celibacy in connexion with holiness is all the more remarkable, inasmuch as it is at variance with the general Pharisaic opinion. The Talmudic law regards marriage as a Divine command, and multiply" (Gen. I. 28), which is binding on all. Hence it declares that "a man without a wife is without the law of God, and without a wall of defence against sin;" and, "a man without a wife is without joy, without a blessing, and without happiness." (Yalkomoth, 92b.)

V. VI. Origin and Date of Essenes and its Relation to Philo-Semitism. - Essenes, like its less intensified form, Pharisasim, arose out of the rules which were enacted after the return from the Babylonish captivity for the observance of the Mosaic institutions. Besides the feasts and fasts, the national religious party bound themselves by solemn promise (1) to keep the tithes lawfully, (2) to observe the sabbath, and Levitical purity. According to the Mosaic law, the neglect of these two enforcements was a heinous sin. The non-separation of the tithes rendered the whole produce unlawful, thus affecting every article of food, whilst the non-eschewing of defiling objects hampered every action in public life, and even those in family intercourse. Thus not only are numbers of animals proscribed as food, but contact with their carcasses pollutes both man and things (Levit. v. 2; xi. 1-47). A man who has an issue not only defiles everything upon which he lies, or which he touches, but his very spittle is polluting (Levit. xv. 1-13). The same is the case with every one who comes in contact with a corpse (Numb. xix. 14-22), with a woman in menstruum and childbirth (Levit. xii. 1-8; xv. 19-31), and with a husband after conjugal intercourse (Levit. xv. 18). Individuals thus defiled were forbidden to come into the sanctuary (Numb. xix. 20), and were visited with the severest punishment if they had ever touched the flesh of a peace-offering (Levit. vii. 20, 21). The effect of these laws was that thousands upon thousands were daily rendered unclean, that these thousands of unclean men and women legally defiled myriads of people and things by contact with them either wittingly or unwittingly, and that it therefore became absolutely necessary for those who were conscientiously desirous of discharging their religious duties in a state of legal purity to adopt such precautionary measures as would preclude the possibility of violating those laws. Hence obtained those rules and those four different degrees of purity with the four corresponding classes of persons which the body of the Pharisee was divided, already described (sec. iv. 3). Anyone who did not belong to the established national religion, that is, to one of the four classes, was termed an _Am Ha-Aretz_ (אַם הָאָרֶץ)—one who lives for earthly things, publican, sinner. Contact with him was defiling, and no articles of food or drink would be purchased by the religious from such an one. It was for eating with such persons that Christ was upbraided (Matt. ix. 10–13; Mark ii. 16, 17, etc.), which showed beyond doubt that he belonged to the national religious body, else the rebuke would have no meaning, since all the unattached, that is, _Amme Ha-Aretz_ could have intercourse among themselves. Besides, as an unattached or defiling person, Christ could not mix with the national and religious body. Of St. Paul we know, from his own words, that he was not only a Pharisee, but that he belonged to the strictest order, that is, he practised the fourth degree of holiness. (Acts xxvi. 5.)

With such a wide field for difference of opinion before them, with the tendency of some to regard the ritual observances as paramount and the only vehicle of divine grace; with the conviction of others that though necessary they are secondary emblems, and that a holy consistent life is the bond of union and communion with God; and with the teachings of others again that they are altogether useless, and are only to be observed because to disregard them would offend the national conscience and expose the nonconformists to penalties and disabilities, different schools arose among the ranks of the Pharisees, who represented the national religion. It is only by a careful study of the post-biblical Jewish writings, and by thoroughly analysing their spirit, that one can appreciate their sentiments and minute shades of differences, and is able to see that the apparent outstanding and mal-shaped sections are in reality only different but genuine branches of the same parent stem, deriving their sap from the same root. The two somewhat different lists in the two recensions of the Talmud—the Jerusalem and the Babylonian, enumerating the different branches of Pharism, show how fully alive the spiritually-minded Pharisees were to the conscientious extremes and the unconscionable abuses to which these stupendous observances gave rise among the various schools of thought comprised in the national religion. As the Talmud gives the Babylonian recension elsewhere, we here give the one from the Jerusalem Talmud:

"There are seven kinds of Pharisees: (1) the _Shoulder Pharisee_ (זרע מסלך), who carries, as it were, his good works on his shoulder that they may be seen by all, in order that he may be praised of men; (2) the _Talmud-Reading _Pharisee_ (מרדו תלמוד), who, when asked for anything, always says, 'Let me go first and perform a divine command'; (3) the _Deducting Pharisee_ (קביל nedin), who says, 'My few sins will be deducted from my many virtues'; (4) the _Seeing Pharisee_ (визר אף 논), who says, 'I save from my scanty income in order that I may perform a good deed'; (5) the _New-searching Pharisee_ (职务 nuevo), who always searches for any sin which he may have committed, in order that he may atone for it by an act of piety; (6) the _Pharisee from fear_ (פוער פחד), who dreads Divine punishment; and (7) the _Pharisee from love_ (פוער כלות), who is one from pure love to God like Abraham." (Jerusalem Berachoth, ix. 5, with Jerusalem Shochah, v. 5.) These seven classes comprise all the different ramifications, all the various tendencies, and all the offshoots. It is in the seventh class, the Pharisees from pure love to God and His divine commands, which the Talmudic sees, and it is from this class that Essenes proceeded. What those who belonged to this class had to practise, and how identical they are with Essenism, will be seen from the following declaration in the Talmud, which describes the gradual growth in holiness:— (1) "The study of the divine law leads a man to circumcision; having passed the circumspection, he (2) accepted as a novice, and receives the symbol of purity, whence he attains (3) to the state of outward purity by lustrations. Thence he progresses (4) to that stage which imposes abstinence from connexion of intercourse from celibacy he advances (5) to the stage of inward or spiritual purity; thence (6) to the higher stage of holiness; thence (7) to meekness and lowliness; thence (8) to the dread of every sin; thence (9) to the highest degree of holiness; thence (10) to becoming the temple of the Holy Spirit and to prophesy; and thence, finally (11), to the stage which enables him miraculously to heal the sick and raise the dead." With impartial students who have no special theories, we believe this will sufficiently show the origin of Essenism. It will demonstrate that the individuals here described exhibit an ultra type of Pharismism, and are none other but the Essenes. Bearing in mind that the name Essene does not exist in the whole range of Talmudic literature, and that the brotherhood has to be identified from the descriptions of its features, simply because they were a branch of the Pharisees, it will readily be conceded that this is as faithful a picture of the Essenes as can be expected.

We have now to examine several practices which obtained among the Essenes which some maintain are heterodox and of non-Jewish origin, and which we are assured constituted their heresies and separatisms. 1. "The most crucial note of heresy which is recorded of the Essenes" —

---

* There are less than five recensions of this _Bavli_—two in the Jerusalem Talmud, _Sotaita_, ii. 3; _Shochah_, iii. 3; two in the Babylonian Talmud, _Aboda Sara_, b. 101b, 102a; Tract._ _Shab, _b. 101a, 102a, 102b; _Bab_, b. 103a, 103b. The erudite Dr. Jellinek, who we believe was the first to call attention to this important _Bavli_ (Ben Chaim iv. 374) most unhesitatingly declares that it is a description of Essenism. Those who are Talmudic scholars will readily concede that this distinguished Rabbi understands the Talmud, knows what his own Judaism is, and will accept his opinion about the traits of his brethren.
n that "they declined to take part in the sacrificial offerings." Josephus, who mentions their abstention from offering sacrifices in the temple, distinctly says that it is owing to the different degrees of holiness which they practised. His words are, "Though they send offerings to the temple they do not offer the sacrifices themselves on account of the different rules of purity which they observe, hence, excluding themselves from the common sanctuary, they offer sacrifices in themselves" (Antiq. XVIII. i. 5). To understand the meaning of Josephus, we must advert to the sacrificial regulations which obtained during the second temple. Those who had the arrangement of the temple service aimed at making the people at large realise that they were a nation of kings and priests. Hence they ordained that every individual should personally participate as much as possible in the offering up of the sacrifices. Not only had the offerer, who was present, to bring his own victim, but it was made, by the representatives of the people (υπηρέται ἄνδρες) represented the entire nation, which could not be personally present at the daily sacrifices. These were divided into twenty-four divisions, answering to the twenty-four divisions of the priesthood. Even the slaughtering of the sacrifices was done by the priests. The priest was responsible, and the sprinkling of the blood and the actual altar work were left to the priests. Now the Essenes, who were more rigorous about the laws of defilement than the other Pharisees, were afraid to enter the temple, and thus to participate personally in the sacrifices, lest they had not been properly purified. Therefore they sent thither their sacrifices and partook of their sacrificial meal at home. It is therefore evident that they did not break off their connexion with the national sanctuary, for they periodically sent their consecrated gifts, for its maintenance, and for the keeping up of the temple worship, nor did they repudiate sacrifices in themselves. If they were simply excluded from being present in the temple to participate in offering by a difference of opinion about the degree of holiness which those practised who officiated in the sanctuary. The specific nature of this difference Josephus was precluded from giving by the plan of his work, which was intended for the cultivated Greeks. However, as rightly pointed out, the Mosaic law ordained the burning of a red heifer, the ashes of which mixed with water were to be used for the sprinkling of those who were defiled by a corpse (Numb. xix. 1–22). The entrance into the sanctuary was made dependent upon the purification by this "water of separation," and he who entered the tabernacle of the Lord without his process was "cut off from Israel" (Numb. xix. 13, 20). The sacred nature of the ashes and the momentous consequences involved in the use of "the water of separation" required the utmost care and the most minute ceremonial in the preparation thereof, as the efficacy of the water, and the validity of the purification depended upon the fulfilment of all the conditions prescribed in connexion with the burning of the heifer. The omission of a single item rendered the ashes ineffectual. In consequence of this the Mosaic law on this subject was minutely explained by the canon law, and a whole treatise in the Talmud is devoted to it. Children were trained from their birth to engage in this ceremonial. "There were special courts in Jerusalem built upon a rock which was hollowed underneath to prevent the penetration of any Levitical pollution. Thither pregnant women were brought to be confined; here they brought up the children" (Mishnah Para, iii. 2). "An arched bridge was made from the temple mount to the mount of Olives, constructed in such a manner as to preclude defilement from beneath. On this bridge only the priest, and those who assisted him in burning the heifer, and the heifer itself were allowed to cross to the mount of Olives" (Babli. iii. 6). But the most extraordinary part connected with this ceremonial was that the Pharisees, contrary to the law laid down in Levit. xxii. 6, 7, commanding the defiled person who had undergone the necessary lustration to be unclean till sunset, purposefully defiled the priest on the very day in which he had to burn the heifer, and demolished the baptistery on the mount of Olives, and immediately after perform the service, because of the Sadducees, who maintained that it must be done after sunset" (Mishnah Para, iii. 7). As the Essenes regarded this act as illegal, and hence "the water of separation" ineffectual, they had no means of purifying their temple and their sanctuary, as prescribed in the Mosaic law. They demanded another purification than the one practised by the managers of the temple service; their water of purification the Essenes regarded as impure (Frankel, Monatschrift, iii. 64, 65).

To this must be added, that throughout the whole of the prophetic writings and the hagiographa sacrifices are regarded as of very inferior value, and that the greatest importance is attached to inward purity and to holiness of life. Of the numerous passages we can only quote a few:—"Sacrifice and burnt offering thou didst not desire" (Ps. xi. 6); "Thou desirest not sacrifice, else would I give it; thou delightest not in burnt offering; the sacrifices of God are a broken spirit," &c. (Ps. li. 16, 17). I will praise the name of God with a song, and will magnify him with thanksgiving; this shall please the Lord better than an ox or bullock that hath horns and hoofs (Ps. lxi. 30, 31). "I hate, I despise your feast days... though ye offer me burnt offerings and your meat-offerings, I will not accept them," etc. (Amos v. 21, 22).

More remarkable still is the declaration of Jeremiah that sacrifices as a part of worship were no divine ordinance at all. "I spake not

Professor Lightfoot's assertion that "Frankel suppose that their only reason for abstaining from the temple sacrifices was that according to the Essene notions the temple itself was profaned, and therefore unfit for sacrificial worship" (Commentary on St. Paul's Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon, p. 371, 2nd ed. London, 1876), seems due to a mistake. What he says in seinen Schleife, also das Mittel sich euch respektieren sie hatten kein Reinigungswasser für den sich einer Lache Verunreinigten, also i.e. the Essenes, accordingly had not the means to purify themselves, they had no water of purification for one who contracted defilement by a corpse. Professor Lightfoot has therefore mistaken Frankel's meaning; they themselves are not the temple.
unto your fathers, nor commanded them in the day I brought them out of the land of Egypt concerning burnt offerings or sacrifices" (Jerem.
vii. 21, 22). Hence Rashi (1040–1105) who is the highest authority in Talmudic matters, and represents traditionally the doctrines of the Pharisees (Cautlin, 5 a); Maimonides (1135– 1204), who is called the "second Moses," and who for the first time formulated and introduced into the Talmud the system on which it is received by the orthodox Israelites to this day (Mose Nebuchim, iii. 32, 46), and Kimchi (1163–1235), the celebrated expositor and lexicographer (Levit. i. 1; Jerem. vii. 20), maintain that sacrifices were altogether optional, they were permitted on account of the hardness of heart, and that the Mosaic ordinances aimed to restrict them as much as possible. The Essenes could therefore easily be satisfied with sending their gifts to the temple to mark their union with the national sanctuary, and believe that "the sacrifices of God are a broken spirit," which they con-scioniously endeavoured to offer. It is for this reason that Josephus, through himself or a Pharisee, does not describe them as cut off from Judaic orthodoxy in matters of sacrifices, and that he tells us himself of distinguished Essenes frequen-ting the temple and instructing their disciples there without let or hindrance (War, I iii. 5).

(2) It is maintained that the Essenes offered up prayers to the Sun, and that this practice not only shows a Yankee influence, but cuts them off from the body of orthodox Jews. The ground for this assertion is the statement of Josephus, "their piety towards God is extraordinary, for they never speak about worldly matters before the sun rises, but offer up, with their faces towards it, certain prayers, handed down by their forefathers, and composed to "rise." (War, ii. vii. 5). But the most inconceivable part about it is that those who advocate this opinion make Josephus, who was a Pharisee (1) describe their extraordinary piety towards the God of Abraham to consist in offering up prayer to the sun, i.e. in an idolatrous practice expressly for-bidden in the very law of Moses (Deut. iv. 10), which Josephus himself, as a Pharisee of second degree, and that (2) for this idolatrous worship they used the national orthodox prayers transmitted by their forefathers, thus insulting the national conscience by this degradation of the prayers of the faithful. The prayer here spoken of is the well-known national morning hymn of praise ("YHWH NADH") for the return of the light of day, which forms a part of the Jewish services to the present day, and which according to an ancient canon had to be offered up at sun-rise (Mishna Bereareth, i. 4). The orthodox or Pharisaic Jews to this day offer up the following prayer, every month, on beholding the new moon, "A good sign, good fortune be to all Israel! (to be repeated three times) Blessed be thy (the moon's) Creator! Blessed be thy possessor! Blessed be thy Maker (repeated three times)! As I leap towards thee (i.e. the moon) but cannot touch thee, so may my enemies not be able to injure me (said three times, leaping)," (Sopherim, xx. 2). It would be farther almost to charge the Pharisees with moon-worship, than to draw from the remark of Josephus that the Essenes were cut off from the Pharisees by sun-worship.

(3) On the subject of marriage again, we are told the antagonism between the Essenes and the Pharisees is a vital matter. The following are Josephus's remarks. "They disregard marriage, but they do not repudiate marriage and its consequent succession of the race is themselves, but they are afraid of women, and are persuaded that none of them preserve their fidelity to one man" (War. II. viii. 5). "There is another peculiar feature of the Essenes, which is their living, customs, and laws exactly agree with the others, excepting that they differ from them about marriage, for they believe that those who do not marry cut off the principal part of human life" (ibid. ii. viii. 13). The reason which Josephus here assigns for the celibacy of some of the Essenes, like that of Philo, is simply shaped to suit the taste of those cultivated Greek readers whose maxim was "a handsome wife would be common, one deformed a punishment, therefore we should have none" (Whitby's Commentary, I Cor. viii. 3). He tells his Greek readers that in Exod. xxii. 27 Moses forbids the Jews to revile the heathen girls, which is exactly the expression used in the Contr. Apion. ii. 37. That the law prohibits to spoil our enemies (Contr.
Apion. 26), that the law of Moses commands the Jews to kill themselves rather than go into slavery among heathen (War, III. viii. 9; VII. viii. 7; with I. xxii. 10), etc., and in order to expose the Egyptian custom of married men being subdivided to their wives he positively declares
"the Scripture says a woman is inferior to her husband in all things" (Contr. Apion. ii.
25). Because the Greeks and Romans ridiculed the Jewish rite of circumcision, he actually suppresses the fact that the sons of Jacob imposed it on the Shechemites, and says that the brothers of Joseph sold him at all events, whilst they were revelling and feasting (Antiq. I. xxi. 1). For the same reason he alters the text of the Bible, which says that Saul demanded of David a hundred foreskins of the Philistines as a dowry for his daughter, into six hundred heads of the Philistines (Antiq. VI. i. 2).
The reason, therefore, which he assigns for the celibacy of some of the Essenes, is to be accounted for to the same category. The very nature of Essenism supplies the cause of it. The foundation of their arrangements is based upon the avoidance of every kind of defilement. According to the law connubial intercourse was defiling, and required sanctification (Levit. xv. 18), and Josephus himself says "the law enjoins that after the man and wife have lain together, in a good way, they shall bathe themselves, for there is a defilement contracted thereby both in soul and body" (Contr. Apion. ii. 25). Even Bathsheba underwent this humiliation after violating her conjugal fidelity (2 Sam. xi. 4).
Keeping from women was, therefore, considered indispensable to a holy life (Exod. xix. 15; 1 Sam.
xxii. 5, 6; 2 Sam. xi. 4; Enoch, Ixxxi. 3; Ixxxv. 3).
Even Ben-Azai, who agreed with the theory that men should marry to propagate the race in accordance with Gen. i. 28, was himself a celibate, and when asked for the answer he replied, "What can I do? my soul is wedded to the Divine Law, and the world can be propagated by others." (Yoma, 63). The Essenes, therefore, who felt themselves constrained to be celibates, because they were devoted to a holy life, were quite as orthodox as the Pharisees. But it must, however, be added that Josephus most explicitly states that the Essenes did not repudiate marriage in itself, that celibacy was quite optional, since it was an open question, and that a portion of them were married, and still were faithful members of the brotherhood. How such statements can be made, that "marriage was to him (i.e. the Essene) an abomination" (Lightfoot, St. Paul's Epistles to the Colossians, etc. p. 85), and that "R. Channah's wife is a prominent person in the legends of his miracles reported in Tanith, 24 b., and thus we need hardly stop to discuss the possible meaning of פָּנֹא יִשָּׁר, since his claims to being considered an Essene are barred at the outset by this fact" (Yad. p. 363) is surpassing strange.

(4) The Essenes did not believe in the resurrection of the body, which the Pharisees held as a cardinal doctrine. What Josephus says on this subject is not false but he believes that the bodies perish, and that their substance is not enduring, but that the souls are immortal" (War, II. viii. 11). Any impartial student will carefully read the whole of this section will at once perceive that Josephus's aim here is to show that the Essenes, to use his own words, "agree in the opinion of the Greeks, they say that for the good souls there is a life beyond the ocean, and a region which is never molested either with showers or snow or intense heat, is always refreshed with the gentle gales of wind constantly breathing from the ocean." To take this piece of Paganism as a sober description of an article of creed believed by a Jewish brotherhood whose distinguishing features were as excessive veneration and a more rigorous observance of the Mosaic teachings than the rest of their co-religionists, is betraying a want of appreciation of evidence. Speaking of the Pharisaic doctrine on this subject, Josephus says, "the soul by being united to the body in after-life, is not separated from it, but is renewed again by death" (Contra Apion. i. 25). Here Josephus represents the Pharisees as maintaining that "the soul was confined in the flesh as in a prison-house. Only when disengaged from these fetters would it be truly free. Then it would soar aloft, rejoicing in its newly-attained liberty." Unfortunately, however, the stupendous Jewish literature which has come down from ancient times enables us to correct this anti-Jewish view contained in a piece of special pleading whilst in the case of the Essenes we are obliged to Hippolytus (Ref. ix. 27), who distinctly declares that they did believe in the resurrection of the body (comp. also Hilgenfeld's Zeitschrift, xiv. 10, "the Essenes and Josephus, to say the least, as firmly believed by the Pharisees as the doctrine of the resurrection. The orthodox Jews expected the Messiah to be not only of Jewish descent but the son of David. Yet Josephus declares that "the oracle found in the sacred Scriptures certainly denoted the government of a Messiah, and was appointed emperor in Judaea" (War, VI. v. 4).

(5) Again, great stress is laid on the Essene abstention from the use of ointments. Josephus says "they regard ointment as defiling, and if one of them happens to be anointed against his will he immediately wipes it off his body" (War, II. viii. 3). This is not only declared to be a point of divergence between them and the Pharisees, but a distinct proof of Buddhist influence. But as Geiger has pointed it out, the question about the use of ointment constituted one of the differences of opinion between the older conservative Pharisaic school represented by the followers of Shammait, and the younger progressive Pharisees represented by the followers of Hillel. The latter, who opposed vehemently the arrogance of the Romans, regarded this custom, though practised among the Jews from time immemorial, as an aristocratic luxury. Hence they laid it down as a principle that "it is not seemly for a learned disciple-Pharisee to walk about anointed" (יִשָּׁר יְבִא הַמַּעַל לְכָלָּה) Josephus Berachoth, v. p. 13; ed. Zuckermandel, 1877; Babylon Berachoth, 43 b. The Essenes, therefore, in this respect, as on all other points, simply followed the practices of the more rigorous portion of the Pharisees (Geiger, Jüdische Zeitschrift, vi. 105-121; vii. 174; ix. 32).

VIII. The Name and its Signification.—It has already been said that the name Essene does not occur in the whole range of Talmudic and Midrashic literature. Not even of the gate of the Essenes, such as Josephus, who arrived at Jerusalem (War, V. iv. 3), is a trace to be found in the description of the temple and of the holy city given in the Mishna and Talmud. This is all the more remarkable when notice is taken of all other sects and offshoots of Judaism. We have the Samaritans, the Sadducees, with the Beithusans, and the Tanna'im, the Talmudic and Chassidim, both earlier and later; the Daily Baptists, and all shades of Pharisees. It is this which makes it so difficult to ascertain its etymology and signification. It is still disputed whether it is Greek, Hebrew, or Aramaic; whether it is to be derived from a proper name, of a person, or of a place. Some idea of the difficulty may be gathered from the various enumerations, which we arrange according to the sequence of the letters in the alphabet. It is derived from סָנָה (SDN), to hearken, whence assa (SDN), a physician, because they paid great attention to the healing of diseases; from צָוָּה (TN), to bind, to associate, whence assimim (TN), associates, because they united together to keep the law; from קַשְׁתָּה (KN), to see, whence chazyah (TN), a seer, because they possessed prophetic powers; from קַשָּׁה (TKH), watchman, guardian, whence chazzanim (TKH), watchmen, servants of God, because this was the whole aim of their life; from the Hebrew chazan (TN), to be loving, good, pious, whence chazans (TKH), the ministers of their extraordinary piety; from the Syriac chodi (TN), pious, or chazay (TN), pious for the same reason; from chasen (TN), powerful, strong, because they were morally strong to subdue their passions; from chasay (TN), a fold of a garment, an apron, because each neophyte obtained this symbol of purity; from chashap (TN), to be silent, whence chasam (TN), the silent ones, because they meditated on mysteries; from chasok (TN), endowed with the gift of prophecy; from isso (TN), the disciple of R. Joshua b. Perachia; from sechah (TN), to bathe, which with Ateb..."
ETCENIUS. [ETCHEN.]

ETCEN (ECHEN, ECHINES, ETCHENIUS, ETIAN), bishop of Clunia-foda in Fur-Bile, is Meth (Mart. Doneg.), commemorated Feb. 11. Of this saint the Bollandists (Acta SS. Feb. 11, tom. ii. 551–2) and Colgan (Acta SS. 305–6) prefix short memoirs, neither taken from the Lives of St. Brigid and St. Columba. The witness of these two is decisive, since the former is the Life of St. Brigid and the latter of St. Columba. The Life of St. Brigid of the 5th century is descriptive of her, and Echino was born in an illustrious family of Leinster, ennobled by both his parents. His father was Egan Eges (or the Sage), son of Fergus Laiderg, of the Race of Laeghaire Lorc, through Mesincorb, the Milesian ancestor of the Dal Mesincorb, and the kings of Leinster (see his genealogy traced through twenty-four generations in Todd, St. Patrick 253). His mother was Briga, daughter of Connacht, descended by a collateral line from the same Mesincorb, and his birth is said to have been through the special blessing of St. Brigid. He had three uncles brothers, bishop Aidan of Killmore, abbot Segene, and Aedh, son of Aisnire, who was slain by Bran Dubh, son of Eochaidh, in the battle of Duinebolg, in Leinster, in the year 598. He is represented by Colgan as a great physician, who was consulted by St. Brigid for the cure of his ailments, and Colgan quotes a long passage from the Life of St. Brigid, by Laurence of Durham, in which a bishop Echus is mentioned

ESTHA, according to the account given by Africanus to reconcile the two genealogies of our Lord, the name of the wife of Matthew, who afterwards married Melchi. (Ep. ad Aristid. ap. Euseb. H. E. i. 7.) [G. S.]

EGisti, given by Procopius of Gaza on (2 Kings xviii. 4) as another name for Philoctetes. He came by this name from a corrupt reading in his copy of Theodoret's Commentary on the same passage, where the title Naassenes is connected with the word Naassan (see Coteler, Mon. Eccl. Gr. i. 769). [G. S.]

ESUS (EIS), an abbot from whom Bede obtained his few details respecting the foundation of the East Anglian Church. (H. E. pref.) [S.]

ESYCHIA (EICHA), a lady to whom, along with two others, Dominica and Eudochia, pope
ETECUSA

as contemporary with her and St. Mel (Feb. 6) of Ardclog, but as St. Mel died A.D. 488, St. Etchinius, who was probably born about A.D. 490, could not have been a bishop in his day, and the whole story is extremely doubtful. That, however, for which he is most famous, and of which there appears to be no reason for doubt, was his ordination of St. Columba, though the form of the legend may be largely fictitious. The point of it is the showing how by mistake on the part of the consecrating bishop, that is, of St. Etchinius, the presbyterate only was conferred on the candidate for episcopal orders. It is preserved in a section of the Acta of Denys, and is given in the original Irish with an English translation by Dr. Todd (Quisit et Martyrologie Christ Church, Dubhlinn, introd. lili., iv.,) by Colgan (Acta SS. 306 n. 11) and in an English translation by Dr. Todd (St. Patrick, 71). O'Donell also (Vita. S. Colman, l. c. 47) gives his own version of the same story, and this version is what Colgan gives in his memoir of the saint. [COLUMBA (1.)]

(To see O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 472-75, on the legend, its origin, and general teaching.) St. Etchinius also ordained St. Berach (Feb. 15) of Clonmacnoise, now Kilbarry, in Roscommon, St. Cosma (June 3) having brought him to bishopric from Glendalough for the purpose (Colgan, Acta SS. 306, c. 10.) St. Etchinius seems first to have lived on the borders of Ossory, then at Clonfad in Westmeath; and at last, after many illustrious works, he exchanged the earthly life for the heavenly in the year 578 (Ann. Tlg.); his festival is Feb. 11. He is commemorated in all the liturgies of the western world and was an important character in the Scotch calender of the Drummond missal. (Lasagna, Eccles. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 11, § 9; Todd, St. Patrick, 70 sq. 253, and Book of Hymns, Fasc. i., 171 n.; O'Connor, Iter. Hdb. Scrip. ii. 153, iv. 28; Íep. Forbes, Kal. Scoit. Saints, vii; Reeves, Adamnan, ixixi. 22, 348, 371; Archdall, Monast. Hdb. 709; Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. 73; Marty. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 45.)

ETETUS, also called Numeria, a Carthaginian woman, who, with her sister Candida, landed at Rome under the Decian persecution. Fell causes the confusion which he claims of them when he makes three sisters. Their brother, who was also martyred, was indeed the priest of a church near Carthage (Cyp. Ep. xxi.) that she had bribed officers in order to be exempted from sacrificing, and he begs that the first martyr selected for death among those in prison at Carthage may “iatis sororibus nostris Numeriis et Candidae tale pecatum remittat. Nam hanc ipsam Ercusam semper appelleri sollemnitatem ut se dona numeraviti ne sacrificaret.” As translated, “our sisters Numeria and Candida, for this latter I have always called Ercusam . . . because she gave gifts”; the passage is, as Dr. Wallis himself says, “altogether unintelligible.” Hence the conjectures et urcos, for acrocor, áyxyeran, áyxyeran (Dodwell, Diss. loc. cit.), and even Hartelius’s excusat. There is no various reading, except etecusam and et recusam, which confirm the usual one.

We must observe, however, that Numeria is not a real praenomen (Varro, Ling. Lat. ix. 55); that the whole letter is incorrect in taste and in grammar; that hanc ipsam may perfectly well be predicative; and that hanc need not refer to CHRIST. BIOGR.—VOL. II.

ETYRELATU, bishop. [HADULAC.]

ETYELIG is witness, as a cleric, to two grants of land made to the see of Llandaff, in the time of bishop Berthw Wyn, in the end of the 6th or early in the 6th century (Lb. Land. by Rees, 428, 442).

ETYRRNITY, from a patriotic point of view solely, which, however, was not original, but culled from Greek and other philosophies in agreement with Scripture. Aión, the Greek equivalent, may, according to Aristotle (de Cael. i. 9), have several meanings, but all deducible from, and subordinate to, the idea it was meant to express: the past, present, and future; duration without beginning or end: ἀδίν ἡ ἡ ομορρία τῆς ἡμερας. In this sense it cannot, of course, be predicated of anything short of God. Of His existence alone could this and nothing short of this, be truly said—as Tertullian puts it, writing against Hermogenes, who asserted that matter was co-eternal with God—“qui omnino aliis Dei censuris, quam æternitatis; quis alius æternitatis status, quam semper fuisse, et futurum esse, ex praecognitâ nullius intitii et nullius finis . . . . Aedacqualtijur Deo matreia, cum æterna consentur” (ad. Hermog. c. 4). Which last is a pregnant remark.

This definition of matter, he tells us in an earlier chapter (de Frinc. iii. 3), “is opposed to the Stoic; for he refutes it himself at great length, and with much point. “Veritas autem,” he maintains, “só unum Deum exigit, defendendo ut solius sit, quicquid Ipsius est” (c. 5). Origen (de Frinc. iii. 3) was of opinion that as this world was not the first that God created, so neither would it be the last. Others, of course contrary, saw no reason why the world should not have been eternal, had God so willed it (Estius, Diss. in II. Sent. dist. i. § 11); orthodoxly, they thought indeed, would not allow them to follow Aristotle in asserting it was this in fact. Origen expressed what strict orthodoxy required in terse terms, as follows:—“Species eorum, quae per passiones Apostolorum et sanctorum traduntur, istae sunt. Primo, quod unus Deus est, Qui omnin creativ atque compositum: Quicque, cum nihil esset, esse fecit universum.” (Ib. i. 4). This position was accepted, uso ore, by all; and it was within its enclosures solely that they considered themselves free to speculate. “Qui quaeque quemadmodum sentit,” says Minucius, P Felix (Oct. § 18): “magnitudinem Dei qui se putât nosee, minuit: qui non vult minuere non novit... Cum palma sit parentem omnium Deum nec principium habere nec terminum; Quí nativitatem omnibus praestet, Sibi perpetui tatem; Qui, ante mundum, fuerit Sibi Ipsus pro mundus?” Eternity was from their point of view the negation of time, and infinity the negation of place. First they held that they had obtained their notions of both, as St. Thomas says: “Sicut enim ratio temporis consistit in numeratio tione prioris et posterioris in motu; ita in apprehen done uniformitatis ejus, quod est omnino extra tum motum consistit ratio aeternitatis...” Síc er gó ex duobus notificatur aeternitas; primum ex c hac, quod id quod est in aeternitate est inter-minabile: id est, principio et fine carens, ut terminus ad utrumque referatur; secundò per c hor, quod ipsa aeternitas successione caret, ita
e nec principium aut finem habere potest.” (S. Theol. P. i. q. x. art. 1.) This was analogous to getting to a conception of God from His works, and in the same way to the first cause of all. As St. Augustine says (on Ps. cx. 9), “Quod est ante luciferum, hoc est ante sidera: et quod est ante sidera, hoc est ante temporis: si ergò ante tempra, ab aeternitate. Noli quaerere quandò: aeternitas non habet quando; Quàndò, et aliquandò, sunt verba temporum...” And again (on Ps. cxv. 29), “Non enim aliud sani Dei, et aliud Ipsè; sed aliud Dei aeternitas Dei est: aeternitas, ipsa Dei substantia, quae nihil habet mutabile. Ibí nihil præteritum, quia jam non sit, nihil est futurum, quasi nundinum sit: non est ibi, nisi est. Non est ibi, fuit et erit; quia et quod fuit, jam non est: et quod erit, nundinum est, sed quicquid ibi est, nonnisi est.” Conséquenté, when aeternitas were measured by the standard of His immutability, there were some that might deserve to be called eternal from their approaches to it. Though there could be no duration without beginning—retrospective erenity—but His; there might be, and there was actually, duration without end—prospective erenity—by His gift: “Solus Deus est omnibus immutabilis; omnibus aeternus; immutabilis et aeternus; Deus est divinus et immutabilis.” Secun dum tamen quod aliqui ab Isti immutabilitatem percepunt secundum hoc aeternus ejus aeterni tatem participat. Quædam ergò quantum ad hoc aeternitatem sortiuntur a Deo, quod nunquam esse desinunt... Et sic aeternitas angelis attribui potest.” (Ib. art. 3.) Such, he adds, will be the portion of those who inherit eternal life.

Creatio in time, whether everlasting or not, are thus harmonised by St. Augustine with eternal purpose. “Novimus, Domine, novimus quoniam in quantum quicquid non est quod est, et quod erat, in tantum moritur et ortur. Non ergò quicquid Verbi tali sed quicquid menditum; quoniam verò immortale atque aeternum est. Et ideo Verbo tibi custodier simul et sempiternè dicis omnia quae dicis, et fit quicquid dicis ut fiat; nec alter quam dicendo facis: nec tamen et simul et sempiternè sunt omnia quae dicendo facias. Cur queso, Domine, Deus meus? Ut cumque video: sed quomodo id eliguer nescio; nisi quia omne quod esse incipit et esse desinat, tunc esse incipit et tunc esse desinat, quando debuisse incipere vel desinere in aeternò Ratione cognoscitur, ubi nec incipiet alicujus nec desinat.” (Conf. xi. 7, 8.) Whether all things, once created, are to last for ever, is a further point.

Scripture says of the earth itself, that it “abideth for ever” (Eccl. i. 4); besides speaking of the everlasting hills (Gen. xlix. 26). Here, no doubt, the general view taken by the Fathers is, that by the phrase “for ever” is expressed “a relative eternity, an unbroken perpetuity for a given period of time.” Hence our Lord (apart from the system of things”) (Divinaton, On Proph. p. 205), and ending only when that system ends. At the same time we nowhere find them affirming categorically, that anything, once summoned by God into being out of nothing, would return to nothing again. Porphyry, says St. Augustine, “Christians ob hoc arguit maximæ stultitiae etiam ex oraculis Deorum suorum, quod istam mundum dicunt esse peritum” (de Cr. D. xx. 24). This he shews was an unfounded charge. “Peracto quippe judició, tunc esse desinat hoc caelum et hanc terram, quando incipiet esse caelum novum et terram novam. Mutatio nànque rerum, non nisi modo interea transit hic mundus, Unde et Apostolus sit: Petrus enim figura hujus mundi; volo vos sine sollicitudin ede esse. Figura ergò præterit, non aeternus.” (Ib. c. 14.) When they talked of the world perishing by fire, they meant no more than St. Peter, who talked of its having already perished by water. “Indicat quippe his, qui scripi non sunt in libris vel in aeternitate munda missias (qui ignis, cauæmodi et in quæ mæsi vel rerum parte futurus sit, hominem scire arbi tor neminem, nisi forte cui Spiritus Divini ostendit) tunc figura hujus mundi mundationem ignati confugurationis præteribit, sicut factum est mundanarum aquarum inundatione dilutor. Ilia itaque, ut dixi, confuguratione mundi elementorum corruptilibus qualitatis, quæ corporibus nostris corruptibilibus coegebant, ardendo penitus interibant: atque ipsa substan tia eas qualitates habebit, quæ corporibus immortalibus mirabilis mutatione conveniebat; ut scilicet mundus in melius immutabatur spatia commodeuetur hominibus etiam curae mæsæ innovationem donaret. Et ideo dicimus a Deo, quod nunquam esse desinat...” (Ib. art. 2.) Thus, the absurd things, however, they were unanimous in holding that there was to be no further change. “Quod igitur de sempiterno supplício damas torum per suum prophetam Deus dixit, sit omnino fit;—Vermis eorum non moriétur, et ignis eorum non extinguébitur...” (Ib. xii. 8.) Neque enim toti sancti et sacris veteribus se novis litteris eruditi mundationem et regni aeterno be studium in post quavisqueque et quavisqueque supplicia qualiscunqueque et quasia quaque ignis invaderunt: sed potius viserunt Divinam vacui vel infirmari non posse sedé tiam, quam se Dominus præsenativit in judicio prolaturum atque dicturum: “Discidete a me, malesciti, in ignem aeternum, qui pascat et diabolum et angelos ejus forum, qui erit aeterno igne diabolum et angelos ejus aram...et quod scriptum est Apocalypsi: ‘Diabolum, qui sedebat eos, missus est in stagnum ignis et sulphuribus, qui et bestia et pseudopropheta: et cruciabantur die et nocte in saeculo sae culum.’ Quòd igitur dictum est aeternum, hic dictum est in sæculum sæculorum, quibus vero nihil Scriptura Divina significare conueri, nisi quod finem non habet temporis.” (Ib. c. 23.) Órigen, says St. Augustine, was more merita in pleasing for the ultimate release of the devil and his angels from their abys of woe, than some of his own contemporaries, who were for assigning a limit to the torments of the better class of the wicked amongst men. "Sed illum," he adds, "et propter hoc, et propter alia nonnulla, et maximè propter alterantias sine cessationebeatitudines et miseriae, et, statuas saeculorum intervallassub istis ad illas atque ab illis ad istasius ac reditus interminabiles, non immorteto prorebut ecclesia: quia et hoc, quod misericors videbatur, amisit, faciendo sanctis veras miseriaiquibus poenas inerent, et falsas beatitudines inquis verum ac securum, hoc est sine timorecertum, sempiterni boni gaudium non habebant. Leagutatem istorum misericordiarum humanoerat affectus, qui hominum filo judicio damnatorum miserias temporales, omnium verò qui vel cius vel tardiis liberantur, aeternam felicitatem putant. Quae sententia, si propertia bona et vera, quia misericors est, tantò erit melior et verior quantò misericordissor. Extensur ergò ac profundior fons hujus misericordiae, quae nos angelorum et superemulta atque prolixa quantitatem saecula liberandos. Cur usque ad universam naturam maest humanam, et omnem angelicam ventum fuerit, mox aesscit? Non aetern tamen se ulterior miserando porrigrat, et ad liberationem ipsiusque diaboli pervenire. Verum si aliquis aeterni remedium aeternum tanto inventurerrare formosius, et contra recta Dei verba perversius, quanto sibi videtur sentire cementius."

These passages may suffice to illustrate the teaching of the Fathers on the points to which they relate; but the fundamental principle which underlies them all, is what Butler calls "the probability that all things will continue as we experience them, in all respects, except those in which we have some reason to think they will be altered." (Anat. c. 1.) And the Fathers found no change propounded or foreshadowed in Scripture which implied annihilation even where immortality alone was concerned; nor, again, any probability suggested, that wills which had deliberately resisted Divine grace in this life would ever be persuaded or coerced into receiving and being influenced by it in the next.

Other secondary senses of the Greek αἰών, and the Latin aevum, are noticed by the Fathers as being current, in explaining their own views. "Aetas," says St. Isidore, "plerumque dicitur pro uno anno, ut in annalibus, et pro septem, ut hominis: et pro centum, et pro quovis tempore. Usque et aetas, tempus quod de multis saeculis instructum est: et dicta aetas, quasi aevitas, id est temporum circitus, ut et quies. Nam aevitas est tales perpetua, cujus neque initium neque extremum nocet, quod Graeci αἰών vocant, quod aliquando apud eos pro saeculo, aliquando pro aeterno ponitur. Usque et aevitas Latinos est derivatum." (Etym. v. 38.) On the other hand, St. John Damascene says, even of the Greek αἰών, that it means occasionally no more than the life of a man, or present life in the abstract. He notices other meanings, of course, which are wider. A period of 1000 years, for instance, and life beyond the grave that has no end. According to the first of these meanings, he adds, there are commonly said to be seven aetae, or ages, of this world from its creation to its consummation, that is from the second coming of the Saviour. His definition is perhaps of a primary sense. "Οὐτε γὰρ τούτο ἢ χρόνος ἢ καὶ τούτο τούτου τοὐτοῦ χρόνου, τούτοι τοῖς ἀπὸ τοῦ οὗ αἴώνων (De Fide O. ii. 1). And the same view had been expressed, centuries before, by the author of the treatise de Div. Hom., ascribed to Dionysius (c. x. 2). Διὰ καὶ οὖν ἐπὶ αὐτῆς καὶ χρόνος οὐκ ἑκατέρων, αἰῶνας δὲ καὶ θεοὺς ἐθνοὺς καὶ ἀνθρώπους ἥκεν καὶ ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ἐκ τῶν αἰώνων ἐφεκτείνα. Eternity, without beginning or end, was the primary meaning according to both, which aorism bore. Its other meanings were derived from, and dependent on, this one; and so far they were both in accord with Aristotle and with Scripture.

See Suicer, s. v. Aetos; Petavius, Thol. Dogm. iii. 3–6; Estius (and the older commentators) in Sent. i. Dist. 8 and iv. Dist. 47, § 14–16; Cajetanus in S. Thom. Sum. Theol. i. 9, 10; D. Scoti, Quaest. Quodib. vi. 13; Pearson on the Creed, Arts. i. and xii.; King, On the Origin of Evil, c. 1, § 3, with the remarks note 18; Hagenbach, Dogm. Theol. 866, § 106; Marshall's Concord. Pat. continued in Schramm's Analysis; Fessler, Inst. Patrol. [E. S. F.]

ETERNITY OF PUNISHMENTS. [Eschatology.]

ETESIUS (Aedebius), bishop of Claudopolis in Lazania, on the river Calcybonus. He was present at the first general council at Nicæa, A.D. 325. (Mansi, ii. 695; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 1027.) [J. de S.]

ETFRID, presbyter of Leominster, Herefordshire, whose legend is recorded in a manuscript (Harl. 2253, ff. 132, 133) described by Hardy. On his journey from some northern locality to convert Merewold, a pagan king, he has a vision of a lion. Merewold is converted and founds a monastery (A.D. 660), which, in consequence of the vision, is named Leominster. (Hardy, Cat. Nat. i. 257.) [C. H.]

ETGAL, abbot of a monastery on one of the Skellig islands, off the coast of Kerry, was taken by the Northmen, whom the Irish monks represent as exceedingly active at the time in their attacks upon the Irish coasts, and was starved to death A.D. 824 (Ann. Ult. A.D. 823; Ann. Infis. A.D. 811). [J. G.]

ETGFIRD (Nennius, Hist. Angl. in M. H. B. 75 n), king of Northumbria, son of Oswy. [Esfrid.]

ETGUN (Annal. Camb. ann. clxxii. i.e. A.D. 826, in M. H. B. 832 a.), king of Northumbria. [Edwin.]

ETHAN (Gismar, Extorie, v. 1456, in M. H. B. 793), bishop of Lindisfarne. [Eata.] [C. H.]

ETHBALDE (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 39, ed. Hardy), king of Mercia. [Ethelbald.]

ETHBIN (Ebrin, Ethen), commemorated Oct. 19. Dec. 30. Of this saint a life is given by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Oct. 19, viii. 474, and by Capgrave (Nos. Leg. Angl. 122; and see Surius, De Prob. SS. Hist. Oct. 19, iv. 307). He was a Briton, and said to have belonged to a noble family; he died in the Danish immigration soon after he arrived in Armorica; he too passed over to France and was a disciple of St. Samson of Dolé, and of St. Winwaloe; he retired to the abbey of Taurac, and lived there till the community was dispersed by an attack of the Franks in A.D. 560. He went thence to Ireland, and remained there 10 years. The 20th cent took place about the close of the 6th century; he is said to have attained the age of 83 years, and to have died on Oct. 19, the day on which his name stands in the Roman Martyrology, but the Scotch calendars commemorate him on Dec. 30. Yet even his existence at all is not without suspicion, as its evidence is entirely legendary, and his time is placed by some in the 6th and by others in the 7th century. (Haddan and Stubbs, Concilia, &c. i. 160, ii. pt. i. 89; Butler, Lives of the Saints, Oct. 19, vol. ix. 539–40; Camerarius, de Scot. Hist. 204; Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 259; Pitsenus, de Ill. Angl. Scrip. App.; Hardy, De Scot. Hist. i. 385–377, 781; Tamplin, 584, 287; Cursus, CH. Hist. Brit. i. 10.) Pitsenus calls him a "scriptor egregius," whose writings are lost even to the titles, but Dempster does not scruple to supply the missing names. (Acta Sasanis Magistri, lib. i., Meditationes et Preces, lib. i. He is placed among the holy confessors and monks in the Dunblane Litany. Bp. Forbes, Kol. Scoti. Saints, pp. 13, 353.)
ETHELA

[J. G.]

ETHELA. [Attilla.]

ETHELARD (Dugd. Monast. i. 255), abbot of Malmsbury. [ETHELHARD (2, 3).] [C. H.]

ETHELARDE (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 39, ed. Hardy), king of Wessex. [ETHELHARD (1).] [C. H.]

ETHELARDEUS (Malm. G. R. A. i. §§ 89, 94, ed. Hardy), archbishop of Canterbury. [ETHELHARD (3).] [C. H.]

ETHELBALD (1), king of Mercia, 716–757. He was the son of Alwine or Alwino, son of Ethfrith, the brother of Penda (Chr. S. A.D. 716). He succeeded Ceolred, the son of Ethelred, who died in 716, and whom it seems to have been the last descendant of Penda. According to the life of St. Guthlac, the anchorite of Crowland (A.A. SS. C.S.B. spec. iii. pt. i, pp. 267–271), Ethelbalad had been in exile during the reign of Ceolred, and had been accustomed to visit the anchorite in his retirement; on these occasions he and his attendants, Wilfrid, Egis, and Obba, seem to have witnessed some of the miraculous acts of Guthlac. Ethelbalad also received from Guthlac a prophecy of his future exaltation; he had come, after exhausting all means of human help, to seek divine assistance; Guthlac encouraged him, and told him that he knew the misery in which all his life hitherto had been spent; he had prayed for him, and God would shortly deliver him. He would obtain his kingdom "non in praeside nec in rapina," but from God's hand. His enemy would be crushed without his agency. The prediction was fulfilled, and Ethelbalad succeeded quietly on the death of Ceolred.

After the death of Guthlac, Ethelbalad honoured his burial-place with special buildings and gifts, and frequently visited Crowland; but unfortunately the history of the monastery there is so obscure that the gifts cannot clearly be stated as to his share in the foundation. (V. Guth. ut supra, pp. 273, 275.)

Ethelbalad's career as a warrior and as the great creator of the Mercian power, which reached its climax under Offa, seems to have begun soon after he obtained the crown. Bede, who only mentions him in his history, describes Offa as the supreme in 731 over all the south of England from the Humber to the sea (H. E. v. 23). How this supremacy was attained we are not told; but, in point of fact, Wessex was the only competing power, and Wessex, which had been disturbed by intestine war during the latter years of Ine, was, at the moment when Bede wrote, under the rule of Ethelheard, who had not yet made any struggle for independence. It was on the side of Somersetshire that the struggle was renewed. In 738 Ethelbalad conquered Somerton, and so probably completed the humiliation of Ethelheard. Ethelheard died in 739 or 741, and Cuthbert, his successor, made a bold struggle for the independence of the West Saxons.

This part of Ethelbalad's reign has some illustration on the ecclesiastical side. Almost immediately on his accession he is introduced as patronising and furthering the work of Egwin at Evesham (Chr. Evesham, ed. Macnay, pp. 72, 73; Kemble, C. D. no. 95, 68, 75). Under Egwin was founded also the church of Worcester (Kemble, C. D. 67), which was followed by other donations under bishop Wilfrith (Kemble, C. D. 69, 70, 79, 80, 81). Many of these, however, were grants to smaller monastic establishments which afterwards were absorbed by the cathedral church. Other charters made a period testify to the fact that Ethelbalad's influence extended far beyond Mercia.

He appears as a benefactor to Glastonbury (Kemble, C. D. 71; Mon. Angl. i. 49), to Rochester in 734 (Kemble, C. D. No. 78; Mon. Angl. i. 184), and to Abingdon (Kemble, C. D. 81; Chr. Abbas. i. 38). In a Worcestershire charter of the date of 735, he entitles himself as "rex unius solum Marche anunu, sed et omnium vicinorum quae generali nomine Sutengil dicatur" (Kemble, C. D. 80; Mon. Angl. i. 585; see also Kemble, C. D. 83). It was also possibly by Ethelbalad's influence that three archbishops of Mercian connection were successively chosen to the see of Canterbury—Tatwin, Nothel, and Cuthbert; the last of whom was translated from Hereford. Ethelbalad was during the episcopate of Cuthbert regarded as the leading king in ecclesiastical as well as civil affairs. In a council held at Clovesho in 742 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 340, 341), in which the privilege of king Wïhtred was confirmed, Ethelbalad is said to have presided. Soon afterwards St. Boniface and five other German bishops were sent to Guthlac to excoriate him a letter of exhortation and remonstrance, from which it appears that Ethelbalad had never married a lawful wife, but was accused of adultery and fornication, especially with virgins dedicated to God. They likewise tell him that infanticide prevails in the monasteries, that he has himself been accused of seizing ecclesiastical property, and subjecting the clergy to undue insults; and they especially warn him of the fate of his predecessor Coelred, who had died suddenly as at a feast (Mon. Mogunt. No. 59; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 351-357). Notwithstanding this plain speaking, Boniface was on friendly terms with Ethelbald; made him presents of a hawk and two falcons, two shields, and two dishes (ib. p. 357); and wrote also to Herefrith, a Mercian priest, on whose influence with Ethelbald he seems to have relied, asking him to urge the king to comply with the advice given him (ib. 357).
ETHELBALD

A similar letter was addressed to the archbishop of York (ib. 358-360). In consequence of this urgency a great church council, the decrees of which are extant, was held in September, 747, at Clovesho (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 360-376). It is clear from these facts that the character of Ethelbald had not improved as his power increased. It is not surprising that the religious state of the king was very bad, and that his conduct instead of emulating that of his pious predecessors, resembled that of the Frank and other German princes after the first decline from the Christianity of the conversion.

The temporal supremacy of Ethelbald was not as yet endangered by the hostility of Cuthred and the West Saxons. In 740 he took up arms against Eldef, king of Northumbria, and devastated the country as far as Landaff (Cant. Bed. M. H. B. 288). In 743 (Cant. S. M. H. B. 329) Ethelbald and Cuthred appeared united in war against the Welsh. Ethelbald's liberality to the monasteries continued, Worcester especially owning him as a patron (K. C. D. 88, 89, 90, 91, 95). In 744 Ethelbald and Cuthred appear conjointly in a grant to Glastonbury (K. C. D. 92; Mon. Angl. i. 47). The grants to Minster in Thanet, dated 747 and 748 (K. C. D. 97, 98), are probably spurious. In 749 Ethelbald seems to have completed his series of benefactions by a general grant, dated at Godmanseleah, in which he releases the clergy from all ordinary taxation except the building of bridges and the national defence (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 386-387). Ethelbald's benefactions to the churches of his kingdom after the year 749, noted above, were much fewer than before; a grant to abbot Eanberht, who possibly was abbot of Malmesbury, is given in Kemble, C. D. 100; attested also by Cynwulf of Wessex, who began to reign in 753 or 755. The long supremacy of Ethelbald, however, was now contested. In 750 a struggle between Cuthred and Ethelbald the proud ealdorman, probably a potentate who had prevented him from acquiring supreme control in Wessex, is recorded; and in 752 the West Saxon king, in a battle at Beergford or Burford, put the great Mercian ruler to flight. Cuthred died in 755, and Wessex after his death was disturbed by intestine division. Ethelbald, however, did not recover his power.

In 757, at Secundunae, or Segeswold, perhaps Seckington in Warwickshire, Ethelbald was killed. Henry of Huntingdon affirms that he fell in battle, but the older authorities say that he was killed in the night by his guards (Cont. Bed. M. H. B. 289; Sim. Dun. ib. p. 662). His ill success or growing infirmities had probably wearied out his servants and his people as well. Beornred, who is called a "tyrannus" or usurper, may not improbably have put himself at the head of a conspiracy among the "comites" or "gesiths" of Ethelbald, who thus perished in the same way as many of the Northumbrian kings. The date for his death, 757, as given by the continuator of Bede and Simeon of Durham, is preferable to that given by the Chronicle, 755, which, like many of the dates between 731 and 849 requires to be adjusted by the addition of two years, as suggested by Sax. Chron. S.; Sim. Dun. M. H. B. 288, 688.)

He was buried at Repton. In a vision recorded in one of the letters preserved among the memorials of St. Boniface, Ethelbald's soul was seen in torments (Monument. Mogunt. ed. Jaffé, pp. 375, 376). His character seems to have combined the lust, violence, and pride, which are specially noted by historians, with an amount of official liberality to the churches and a great neglect of the duty of spiritual supervision. But it is not impossible that it underwent a change during his long reign, and that the earlier uneventful years were not devoid of promise. His position as a great consolidator of the Mercian state, and as a king regarded by the continent as a great sovereign, is less unquestionable. He was no doubt the most powerful king since Ethelbert of Kent, not excepting the Northumbrian rulers.

A letter to St. Aldehelm, when abbot, accompanied by a long poem, written by a certain Aeddialwaid (Mon. Mogunt. ed. Jaffé, pp. 35 sq.), are ascribed by Jaffé to Ethelbald, afterwards king of Mercia. The writer refers to the troubles of his country, and compares himself to Rehoboam; but few allusions in the poem are to Devonshire and Cornwall. There is no doubt about the reading "Aeddialwaid," and it is most probable that it is the work of a West Saxon pupil of Aldehelm.

ETHELBALD (2) (AETHELBALD, EADHALD), abbot of Wearmouth and Jarrow. See references under EADHALD (4). He does not appear in Duggleby (i. 502), nor is he included in Birch's Eadmonitici (p. 63). His existence is known from a letter addressed to him by Alcuin, an extract of which was given by Keynes, and afterwards copied by Bede, while the letter was preserved in full by Jaffé (Mom. Alcuin. 830).

ETHELBERHT (2), called king of Wessex and Kent in a spurious or doubtful charter of 781, bearing the signatures of archbishop Jaenbert and Diora bishop of Rochester (Kemble, C. D. 144). No king of the name in Wessex is known from any other source, and no king of Kent after the death of Ethelbert II, until the reign of Ethelbert, son of Ethelwulf, in the following century.

ETHELBERHT (3) (Sim. Dun. G. E. A. ann. 790, in M. H. B. 667 c), bishop of Candida Casa. [ETHELBERT (7)].

ETHELBERHT (1) (properly AETHELBERHT or ETHELBERHT; Bede, AELDBERHT), king of Kent. He was the son of Irminric, and greatgrandson of Oeric, surnamed Oisc, the son of Hengist, and succeeded to the kingdom of the Kentishmen as the heir of the "Aescings," in 569 (the date 565, given in the Chronicle, is inconsistent with Bede's reckoning given below).

Some years after his accession, he provoked a conflict with Cutha, another Saxon king, and his brother, Cutha, was defeated at Wimbledon with the loss of two of the cildarmen, and driven back into Kent (Sax. Chron. a. 654). He had already married Bertha or Berhte, daughter of Charibert, king of Paris, on the under-

Ethelbert faithfully observed this compact, but showed no curiosity to hear more about his wife's creed. She and her episcopal chaplain worshipped undisturbed in the old Roman-British church of St. Martin, on a hill to the east of Ethelbert's city of Canterbury (Bede, l. 28). Ethelbert succeeded on the death of his old enemy Cælin in 593, to that pre-eminence among the Saxon and Anglican kings which is usually described as the Bretwaladom (see Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 542). And four years later, in the spring of 597, he was brought face to face with the first Christian missionaries, led by Augustine, whom pope Gregory the Great sent to "bring him the best of all messages, which would ensure to all who received it eternal life and an endless kingdom with the true and living God." (Bede, i. 29).

Ethelbert had sent word to the foreigners to remain in the city, and the clergy that they had landed, and "supplied them with all necessary until he should see what to do with them." He soon came into the isle, and sitting down with his "gesiths" or attendant thanes in the open air, (for he feared the effect of spells under a roof), listened attentively to the speech of Augustine [Augustinus]. Then he spoke in some such words as these: "This is a new and uncertain kingdom, I cannot give in to them, and leave the rites which I, with the whole race of the Angles, have so long observed. But since you are strangers who have come from afar, and, as I think I have observed, have desired to have your faith and customs to be true and thoroughly good, we do not mean to hurt you, but rather shall take care to receive you with kindly hospitality, and to afford you what you need for your support; nor do we forbid you to win over to your faith, by preaching, as many as you can." He gave them also a dwelling in Canterbury, somewhat to the north-west of the present cathedral precinct. They took possession of their new home, and began to make converts, as Bede tells us, through the charm of their preaching, and the still more powerful influence of lives consistent with what they taught. In a short time afterwards Ethel-

Ethelbert himself expressed his belief in the truths of those whom he had welcomed as unheard of; he believed and was baptized; the time, according to Canterbury tradition, was the Whitsun-eve of 597, which fell on the 1st of June; the place, undoubtedly, was St. Martin's. The king thenceforward proved himself to be one of the truest and noblest of royal converts. He even removed from Canterbury to Regulbium or Regulphi, where he built a monastery, abandoning his old abode to Augustine, now consecrated as archbishop, and adding to it the gift of various "needful possessions" (Bede, i. 28).

He assisted Augustine in the work of converting an old Roman-built church into "the cathedral church of the Holy Saviour," and also built "after exhortation," a monastery outside the eastern wall of the city, dedicated in the names of SS. Peter and Paul, but afterwards known as "St. Augustine's." He received by the hands of Mellitus, who, with others, joined the mission in 601, a letter from the pope Gregory, and he sent his aid as a present to the arrangements for a conference, near the Bristol channel, between his archbishop and some bishops of the ancient British church. Among the many "good services which he rendered to his people," Bede reckons those "dooms" or decrees which, "after the example of the Romans, he framed with the consent of his wise men"... and among which he first of all set down what satisfaction (bó) was to be made by any one who robbed the church, the bishop, or the clergy. For he was "mindful to afford his protection to those whose doctrine he had received" (Bede, ii. 5). For these dooms, extant in the "Regulbium Constitutiones," he is held by Ancient Laws and Institutes of England, p. 1. They are 90 in number; the first, just as Bede says, establishes a scale of penalties for wrong done to the property of the church, of the bishop, of a priest, of a deacon, of a cleric.

Ethelbert's nephew Sabert, the son of his brother Rieula, held the kingship which he had inherited from the East Saxons, and embraced the faith under the persuasion of his uncle and overlord, who built a church of St. Paul in London for Mellitus as bishop of that kingdom. He also built at "Hro's Castle," i.e. at Rochester, a church of St. Andrew for a bishop named Justus; "gave many gifts to both priests and added lands and possessions for the use of those who were with them." It was, we may be sure, in Ethelbert's reign and under his influence that Redwald, king of the East Angles, while visiting Kent, was prevailed on to receive baptism, although, as his after conduct shewed, his convictions were not deep (Bede, ii. 19). After Bertics's death, Ethelbert married a young woman whose name is unknown. His last days must have been saddened by anxiety as to the future reign of his son Eadbald, who refused to receive the faith of Christ. Ethelbert died, after what Bede describes as a most glorious reign of 56 years, on the 34th of February, A.D. 616, and was buried beside his first wife in the "porticus" or transept of St. Martin, within the church of SS. Peter and Paul, leaving behind him a memory long held in grateful reverence as that of the first English Christian king. (Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 176, 214-216, 250.)

[W. B.]

ETHELBERT (3) II., king of Kent. He was a son of Wihtred, probably the eldest left on his father's death in 725, coheiir with Eadbald and Alric. [KABBERHIT, ALRIC.] If the act of the council of Beckancold, in which the privilegium of Wihtred was granted be received as genuine, Ethelbert, who attested it on behalf of his brother Eadbald and himself, must have been of age to be given a share in the proceedings; Haddan andStubbs, iii. 240. Although, however, there is a presumption that Ethelbert was the eldest son, the chronicles give more prominence to Eadbert, who is said to have reigned from 725 to 748, leaving Ethelbert as his successor in the latter year. From charters the inference may be drawn that the brothers reigned contemporaneously or concurrently; but if Eadbert really died in 748, Ethelbert must have then assumed the position of chief king; sole king he could hardly be, as Eardulf appears in 747 as king, and other competitors appear before Ethelbert’s death, of whom it is uncertain whether they were partners or mere pretenders to the crown. The joint acts of Eadbert and Ethelbert have been noted under the article EADBERT (2). Ethelbert reigned after Eadbert’s death, or at least after the year 748, and reigned for about fourteen years, dying in 762 or thereabouts. Ethelbert is best known as the writer of a letter to St. Boniface, written before the year 755, in which he reminds him of a promise made some years before to the abbot Bugga, that he would pray for him. He also sent presents, through his messenger Ethelhaun, a man ‘cuthneagtus’ (pl, ‘cuthneagta’) or lord, of pounds and a half, and two ‘reptae;’ and ask Boniface to procure him two falcons, such dons being scarce in Kent. He also begs to have an answer in writing. (Bonif. Ep.
ed. Wurdtwein, Ep. 84; Mon. Monast., pp.
254–255.)
The only charter of Ethelbert after the death of Eadbert is a grant to St. Augustine’s of a mill at Chart, attached to the royal township of Wyth, on the condition that the tenant should have the pannage of a herd of swine in the wood of Andreid. (Elmham, ed. Hardwick, p. 325; Kebkle, C. D. no. 108.) The charter is dated 762, and the same year appears in the same chartulary of St. Augustinians, a grant by Dunwald, a thegn of Ethelbert, of a property in Queen-gate, Canterbury, in memory of Ethelbert, for whose soul also he was going to carry money to Rome. (Elmham, p. 326; K. C. D. 108.) It appears from this charter that Ethelbert was buried at St. Augustine’s of Canterbury. (Hawkins, English Silver Coins, ed. Kenyon, pp. 30–31.)

EATHELBERT (3), ST., king of the East Angles. Heir to known history as one of the victims of the aggressive policy of king Offa of Mercia. In the year 792 (rather 794) Offa ordered him to be beheaded. Such is the brief statement of the Chronicle, which Florence of Worcester expands by the statement that the most glorious and most holy king of the East Angles, ‘Aegel-britone’ (Arbuthnot’s ‘Aegaelphig’) reigned in splendour and the virtue of his life, and passing the test of the court of Offa, at the instigation of his wife Cynethritha, deprived of his life and kingdom, and, as a king and martyr, established the court of blessed spirits. (M. B.
545.) The same writer (M. B. 650) says that he was the son of Ethelred, king of the East Angles, and his wife Leoruna. William of Malmsbury says that Ethelbert was treacherously allured by Offa, and killed within the precincts of the palace (G. R. § 86), having been enticed thither in hope of becoming Offa’s son-in-law. (Tob. § 210; Gesta Pontificum, § 170.) He also mentions that St. Dunstan regarded Ethelbert as a martyr. It is obvious that the name of Ethelbert gained ground as years went on, and we have the complete form of his legendary history in the Life of Ethelbert, incorporated by Richard of Cirencester in the Speculum historiale, and existing in more or less complete form in Capgrave, in the so-called Chronicle of John Brompton, and in several MSS. According to this legend Ethelbert was the son of Ethelred and Leorona, a Merican lady of royal descent, piously educated, and raised to the throne on his father’s death by the lords of the kingdom. After winning the good will of all by wisdom and piety, he was urged by his mother to take holy orders, and on his advice an ealdorman named Gwero specially recom-manded Sodelria (or Seledritha) the daughter of a ruler named Egeo, who had succeeded to her father’s kingdom. Ethelbert declined this prop-sal because Egeo had been a traitor to his father Ethelred, and by the advice of another ealdorman, Gwinbert, determined to marry a daughter of Offa. After prayer and other preparations Ethelbert set out for Offa’s court, although strongly pressed by his mother not to proceed;
he left his city Buderog (Bedrichesworth = St.
Edmonds), and in spite of an earthquake and eclipse of the sun, which was ended at Ethelbert’s prayer, he sent presents to Offa as he approached “Villa Australis,” where the king was enwrapped. He had next a vision which Oswald unfortunately misinterpreted, but which was honestly explained by subsequent events. On his arrival he found acceptance in the eyes of Alfrida [ELFRITHHA (3)]. Offa’s daughter, who expressed the same admiration in language as she had done in action, that Ethelbert should procure her mother to special hatred of Ethelbert. Cynethritha warned Offa that Ethelbert would supplant him, and Offa determined to sacrifice him. A courtier named Gwinbert offered to contrive the murder, and induced Ethelbert to visit Offa in his chamber, where he was seized, bound, and beheaded, by Gwinbert himself. His body was ignominiously buried, but, being discovered, owing to the heavenly light which marked the spot, was translated to Hereford, and there buried in the cathedral, where many miracles attested Ethelbert’s sanctity. His head was preserved in a magnificent shrine at Westminster. (Ric. Cirenc.
Spec. Hist. i. 262–293.) Some additional partculars are supplied by Brompton: (Twysden, ca. 748 sq.) Alfrida became an anchoret at Crowland: Ethelbert was buried in the first instance on the bank of the Lugg; three nights
after he appeared to a man named Brithfrith, and bade him remove his body to “stratus Way,” or the wide land to the west; the banks of the Wye at Taunton, but Brithfrith obeyed, and with the help of Egnumul removed the body, with the head, which by the way fell off the waggons and restored to sight the blind man who picked it up; they then buried it at Fernlegh, which was afterwards called Hereford. In after times a king of the Mercians

Hosted by Google
named Milfrith exalted Hereford, in honour of St. Ethelbert, into a cathedral city. (See also Capgrave, ff. 137–139.)

However the legend grew, it is certain that Ethelbert soon became the patron saint of Hereford. The story of Milfrith is of course apocryphal (Mon. Angl. vi. 1210), but bishop Ethelstan, 1012 to 1058, was the first to mention it in his honour; and although this was burned by the Welsh in 1055, it was rebuilt soon after the Conquest by bishop Robert of Lorraine. The services of St. Ethelbert occupy an important place in the Missal, Breviary, and Hymnal of the use of Hereford. The 20th of May is observed in his honour, and to him are dedicated, besides the cathedral, the churches of Marden in Herefordshire and Little Dean in Gloucestershire, besides six churches in Norfolk, three in Suffolk, and one in Essex in honour of St. Mary and St. Ethelbert. The author of the life of St. Ethelbert is said to have been Osbert of Clare, a monk of Westminster in the reigns of Edward the Elder, Ethelred, and Henry II. (See Hardy, Cat. Med. i. 495, 496.)

Matthew Paris, or the author of the life of Offa, who tells the story of Ethelbert's martyrdom more favourably to his hero, throwing all the blame upon Cynethritha, and making Offa ignorant of the plot until after the murder was committed. He also called Offa's daughter Aelfleda, ed. Wats, p. 24. [8]

ETHELBERT (4), king of the South Saxons. He is known only from the Selsey charters, in which he appears as a contemporary of Offa, and possibly he is to be identified with one of the claimants of the Kentish throne during the latter half of the 8th century (Kemble, C. D. 1010, 1011.) More probably the charters are fabricated without any regard for dates. [8]

ETHELBERT (5), ST., martyr with his brother St. Ethelred at the court of their cousin Egbert king of Kent. Their father Eormenred was a brother of Eorcumbert the predecessor of Egbert, and their murderer was one of the royal household named Thuron. Neither the princes nor their father are mentioned in Bede, and the Saxon Chronicle cursorily relates (sub ann. 640) only that Eormenred's two sons (unnamed) were afterwards martyred by Thuron. A detailed legendary account of the murder (for it was no true martyrdom) occurs at the commencement of the Gesta Regum Anglorum of Simeon of Durham in all the editions of that author until Mr. Binde's, in which it is made a separate piece. In Simeon's story Eormenred was an elder son (which the Saxon Chronicle also implies, naming him before his brother Eorcumbert), Thuron proposed the murder to Egbert for the security of the succession, and the king connived. The crime was committed at a royal residence in the vicinity of Eorcatun, which must be Eastrig, a short distance south of Sandwich, and the bodies when discovered were solemnly interred at the "famosissimum monasterium Wracinene." Eorcatun or Domneva, a sister of the martyrs, received from the conscience-stricken king a grant of land in Thanet, where she founded a memorial monastery and made her daughter Mildred abbess of it. A council that was held to investigate the murder was presided over by archbishop Deusdedit, who also consecrated the nuns of the new foundation; but as, according to Bede, Deusdedit and Eorcumbert died the same day, Eorcumbert in his monastery in honour of that, it was impossible. The account in Goscelin makes the archbishop to have been Theodore, and so defines the period as that between 669, when Theodore arrived in England, and 678, when Egbert died. Simeon's narrative does not name the spot in Thanet where Eormenberga's monastery was built, but Thuron in a later censure as Minster, a place to which he himself belonged. In Dugdale's list the monastery occurs as that of St. Mildred in Thanet (Monast. Anglic. i. 447). As the tradition of this martyrdom involves the question whether there ever existed, besides that monastery at Minster, a second one at Eastrey and another at Wakering, it becomes necessary to follow the story in other early sources.

Goscelin, about A.D. 1090, a few years before Simeon, introduces the tragedy of St. Ethelbert and St. Ethelred at the commencement of his life of St. Mildred (MS. Harl. num. 105, ff. 137–139, see Hardy, Cat. Med. i. 376), but makes no mention there of the burial-place or of the subsequent translation, after description of the fate of Thuron, to the main subject of his saint. Thoro, three centuries afterwards, in his life of St. Mildred closely follows Goscelin (Twysd. Scriptt. col. 1905). Goscelin, in another of his lives, briefly introduces the martyrdom of the princes, but there again he is silent both as to sepulchral dedication and translation (Vis. S. Winters. cap. 1, § 1, in Boll. Acta SS. 3 Feb. i. 386 e). A few years later (cir. A.D. 1124), and about the time of Simeon, the story is related by William of Malmesbury (G. P. iv. § 181, pp. 318, 319, ed. Hamilton), who states that the martyrs were buried at a place in East Anglia "cujus nomen excitid;" but according to Sivile's reading (Scriptt. p. 292, 7), which is endorsed by the Bollandists, it is "cujus nomen Estrea," which means either that the burial-place was at an Estrea in East Anglia, or that the burial-place was in East Anglia a province also called Estrea. Malmesbury evidently had not identified Simeon's "Wracinene." He goes on to say that Ethelwulf the earl of East Anglia conveyed the relics of the martyrs "celebris poma" from the "obscure church" of their sepulture to the abbey of Ramsey, and this is the first intimation we have met of the connexion of St. Ethelbert and St. Ethelred with that house, of which Ethelwulf was himself a founder (cir. 974 or 991), dying in 992. (A. C. C. ann. 992; Flor. Wig. Chron. ann. 991, 992, in M.R.R. 580 a. 581 l. H. Hist. vi. in M. H. B. 747 e; cf. Tanner, Notitia, Huntingdonshire, v.) Here it may be mentioned that the Historia Raveseniensis (Gale. Scriptt. iii. 405) makes the martyrs to have been buried in a villa of the earl Wachinger, who caused them to be translated to Ramsey; clearly showing that the Ramsgate of Eastrey of the Chronicle must be ignorant of the place meant by Wracinene. John of Timnouth (cir. 1347) devoted a separate title to our two martyrs in his Sanctiogium (MS. see Tanner, Bibloth. p. 439), a list of the lives of which work is given by Dr. Thomas Smith.
ETHELBERT.—BISHOPS. 217

(Catalogus Librorum MSS. Biblioth. Cotton. 1696, p. 28), and Timouth's legend of St. Ethelbert and St. Ethelred (num. 121 in Smith) was one of those transferred to Capgrave's collection (see Nov. Leg. Angli. i. 143). Here it is stated that the martyrs were buried at "Wakering" and afterwards translated to Ramsey. Thorn, whose chronicle is later than Timouth, repeats Goscelin, as already stated, and adds the information that Eormenburga's monastery was at Minster. (Thorn has also a brief mention of the martyrs sub ann. 686, col. 1770.) From Timouth and Capgrave then "Wakering" has been adopted as representing Simeon's "Wacrincense" (M. H. B. praef. p. 89; Stevenson's Eng. trans. of Simeon, p. 430). The only Wakering known is that in Essex, near Shoeburyness. It is a very ancient manor, the history of which is detailed in Wright's History of Essex (vol. ii. p. 614), but without a hint of a monastery having ever existed there; as to which matter Camden also is equally silent. Nor do either Tanner or Dugdale speak of Wakering monastery. The absence of all local trace and all literary record is noticed by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 17 Oct. viii. 94 #) as an objection to the proposed identification, and the editors of the M. H. B. in the body of their work (p. 648 note) are doubtful as to "Wakering Essexiae.

Monasteries at Eastry arising out of our story, it is to be noted, in the first place, that the spot is exterior to Thanet, within the limits of which it was Eormenburga received her grant. In recent times Harpsfield (Hist. Eccles. Angli. 1622, sec. viii. cap. 10), calling the princes Ethelbert and Ethelbriht, makes their martyrdom give birth to two monasteries, one at Eastry and the other at Minster, intending probably to combine the statements of Matthew Paris (with whom agrees Matthew of Westminster, cir. 1320) and Thorn, the first two writers placing Eormenburga's monastery at Eastry and saying nothing as to Minster. Harpsfield, lib. xi. cap. 4, § 6 puts "a church" at Eastry, perhaps to place himself in conformity with Malmsbury. On the joint authority of Harpsfield and Cressy, Tanner (Notit. Kent, xxii.) inserts an Eastry monastery, but without vouching for it, and the Monasticon (vi. 1920) simply copies Tanner's paragraph without observation.

As for the legend itself in its present form, perhaps a clue to its origin may have been furnished by a remark of the editors of the Monasticon (praef. 89) that Simeon's silence about the translation to Ramsey implies a date for the story prior to that event (i.e., prior to 591) and that in Britain lib. ii. cap. 4, § 6 puts "a church" at Eastry, perhaps in conformity with Malmsbury. On the joint authority of Harpsfield and Cressy, Tanner (Notit. Kent, xxii.) inserts an Eastry monastery, but without vouching for it, and the Monasticon (vi. 1920) simply copies Tanner's paragraph without observation.

As for the legend itself in its present form, perhaps a clue to its origin may have been furnished by a remark of the editors of the Monasticon (praef. 89) that Simeon's silence about the translation to Ramsey implies a date for the story prior to that event (i.e., prior to 591) and that in Britain lib. ii. cap. 4, § 6 puts "a church" at Eastry, perhaps in conformity with Malmsbury. On the joint authority of Harpsfield and Cressy, Tanner (Notit. Kent, xxii.) inserts an Eastry monastery, but without vouching for it, and the Monasticon (vi. 1920) simply copies Tanner's paragraph without observation.

For the legend itself in its present form, perhaps a clue to its origin may have been furnished by a remark of the editors of the Monasticon (praef. 89) that Simeon's silence about the translation to Ramsey implies a date for the story prior to that event (i.e., prior to 591) and that in Britain lib. ii. cap. 4, § 6 puts "a church" at Eastry, perhaps in conformity with Malmsbury. On the joint authority of Harpsfield and Cressy, Tanner (Notit. Kent, xxii.) inserts an Eastry monastery, but without vouching for it, and the Monasticon (vi. 1920) simply copies Tanner's paragraph without observation.
well-known passage enumerates many of the works which the library contained. He mentions forty-one authors, a few out of many, whose works were in the collection at York. Among these are some of the fathers, Christian poets, and grammarians. The classical writers are only Cicero, Pompeius, Pliny, Virgil, Statius, Lucan, and Suetonius. Their names are in Latin and in Greek. Alcuin speaks of treatises in Greek and Hebrew without telling us what they are. In the western world there was probably no library out of Rome itself so large and important as this. Certainly there was nothing to be compared with it in France, which was just beginning to awake to the long-dormant claims of learning.

In A.D. 768 archbishop Egbert died, and Albert, by the popular voice, was appointed his successor. He was consecrated on 24th April, A.D. 767, and in A.D. 773, pope Adrian sent him the pall (Saxon Chron.; Symeon, ed. Surtees Soc. 22, 24). Albert made an excellent archbishop. He was a strict disciplinarian, but was considerate and accommodative in such things as made no difference in his personal habits. He was as frugal and simple as before.

Albert, however, was by no means sparing in what he did for God's house. In A.D. 741 the minster of York had been burnt (Symeon, Chron. p. 14). What mischief the fire actually did we do not know. It is probable that some portion of the building, which was of stone, would be temporarily patched up for the celebration of divine service. Albert, however, took in hand the erection of what must have been a new building. The old minster contained as its most precious feature the chapel or oratory in which king Edwin was said to have been baptized in A.D. 627. Here Albert set up an altar dedicated to St. Paul, which he decorated with silver, jewels and gold. Above it hung a large candelabrum with three branches. A tall crucifix or rood was set up at the altar, also made of precious metals. Albert built another altar dedicated to the Martyrs and the Holy Cross. This, too, was covered with silver and precious stones, and he provided flags of pure gold to contain the wine which was to be poured into the chalice.

The new basilica, or cathedral church—minister it has always been called in York, although it has never been tenanted by monks—was built under the superintendence of Eanbald and Alcuin, and is to the pen of the latter that we owe the only description of it which we possess. Alcuin speaks of a lofty temple uplifted by pillars, which stand in their turn over crypts below. He says that it is bright with ceilings and windows, which were probably coloured. Around it were a number of porches, or apsidal chapels, and the whole building contained as many as thirty altars. Some remains of this structure may still, I think, be discerned in the crypt beneath the present fabric.

About two years before his decease, Albert retired from the cares of office to end the remnant of his days in solitary devotion. In preparation for this he made Eanbald his coadjutor in the see, consecrating him bishop; the charge of his school and books he gave to the faithful Alcuin. Ten days before his decease he emerged from his cell to dedicate the minister which it had been his privilege to begin and complete. This was a last effort. Alcuin saw his old master die, and among the last wishes of Albert was the desire that Alcuin should visit France and Rome. He died at York on the 8th of November, A.D. 781 or 782, at the sixth hour of the day (Fl. Wigorn. i. 58), and was laid to rest in his cathedral, a large procession of ecclesiastics and laymen accompanying him to his grave. Albert's body was brought from Alcuin's cell (Saxon Chron. and Symeon in A.D. 780). They have, I think, mistaken the time of his retirement for that of his decease. Eanbald probably became coadjutor bishop in A.D. 780.

Albert was undoubtedly one of the most able men in Europe in the 8th century. His learning, his educational powers, his widespread sympathies and acquaintance with the scholar and great men of other countries gave him a position and a power for good which no one perhaps possessed to a greater degree. Under him the city of York became the centre of a great educational system which developed in every direction. It was famous at the same time for its literary than for its ecclesiastical existence. It kept up its missionary fame, for Northumbria was the country of Wilfrid and Willibrord. Boniface had kind friends in Egbert and Echt helm (Epp. ed. Giles, i. 87–9, 113). Albert, under the name of Coena, seems to have been also a correspondent of Lullius, archbishop of Mainz, and a letter is preserved from Albert, king of Northumbria and his queen, addressed to the same dignitary, asking for and promising prayers (Bonifaci Epp. ed. Giles, §§ 83, 21, 242, 247; Haddan and Stubbs, iii.). About the same time a council was held in Northumbria to send Willehad as a missionary to the Frisians and Saxons (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 450). To his efforts and those of Alberht and Liudger, who were connected with the school of York in its brightest days, the church of North Germany is under inestimable obligations (Maclear's Christian Missions, 222–27).

The principal authorities for the life of Albert are Alcuin's poem De Sanctis et Pontificibus Ebor., his Letters, and the Life appended to them in the editions of Froben and Jaffé. [E. C.]

ETHELBERT (7) (ÆDELBERHT, AEDIBLECHUS) was consecrated bishop of Withern, in Galloway, at York, on June 10, A.D. 777. (Saxon Chron.; Flor. Wigorn. i. 58.) In A.D. 785, in the death of Tilbert, he left Withern for Hexham. (Symeon, Chron., ed. Surtees Soc. p. 30.) In A.D. 791 he was one of the consecrators of Badulf, bishop of Withern, and of archbishop Eanbald II. In A.D. 796 (Symeon, pp. 30, 34), also of Eardulf, king of Northumbria, in the same year. He died on Oct. 16 in the following year at a place called Barton, probably on the Tees. His body was brought to Hexham, and was interred by the brethren in the church. (Fl. 34; Ric. of Hexham, p. 34.)

Ethelbert, as bishop of Withern, signs the decrees of the Northumbrian legatine synod in A.D. 787. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 460.) There is a letter to him and his congregation at Hexham from Alcuin, speaking of their old friend ship, and asking for his prayers. The great scholar advises Ethelbert to collect books and to organise a school at Hexham. (Epp. ed. Jaffé 374–5.)

Dempster states that Ethelbert wrote a ETHELBRITH

treatise against Ellipandus of Toledo, one of the opponents of Alcuin, but this is more than doubtful. (Wright, Beogr. Lit. i. 998.) [J. R.]

ETHELBRITH (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 9, title § 10, ed. Hardy), ETHELBERT (ibid. § 9)
ETHELBRITH (ibid. § 17), king of Kent [ETHELBERHT (1).] [C. H.]

ETHELBRCT (Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 264), martyr. [ETHELBERHT (5).] [C. H.]

ETHELBRICH (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 86, ed. Hardy), king of East Anglia. [ETHEL-BERHT (9).] [C. H.]

ETHELBURGA (1) (TATAE), daughter of Ethelbert, king of Kent and his queen Bertha.
She was bestowed in marriage by her brother Eadbald king of Kent on Edwin king of Northumbria, after the latter had promised to do nothing hostile to the spread of Christianity, both to her and her attendants in freedom of worship; whilst he himself would receive the faith if on examination it should be found more holy and worthy of God than the religion he professed. Ethelburga accordingly was sent to Northumbria, accompanied by Paulinus, and the conversion of the king and his people would be very shortly. Bede has prepared a letter from pope Boniface to Ethelburga, encouraging her to attempt the conversion of Edwin (H. E. ii. 11); the king himself was moved to the change on the occasion of the birth of his daughter Eanfled, and was baptized April 12, 627, less than two years after his marriage.
[EDWIN.] After Edwin had fallen before the arms of Peada in 633, Ethelburga, accompanied by Paulinus, her daughter Eanfled, her son Wulfhere and Ulf, son of Osfrith and grandson of Edwin, returned to Kent, bringing with her many of Edwin’s treasures, especially a golden cup and cross, which were preserved at Canterbury in Bede’s time. (H. E. ii. 20.) The royal bequest was a source of education for Ethelberht, where king Dagobert took charge of them. In this Ethelburga showed some mistrust of Eadbald, who was now in alliance with Oswald, the head of the rival dynasty in Northumbria. Dagobert died in 638, and the two boys also died in infancy, and were buried in France with royal honours.
Ethelburga had by Edwin two sons, Ethelhun and Wuscelm, the former of whom died soon after baptism; and two daughters Eanfled and Ethelthritha; Ethelthritha died in infancy and was buried, as was Ethelhun, at York. (H. E.
ii. 14.) Eanfled became the wife of king Oswy (Oosin) of Northumbria. Bede gives no account of Ethelhun’s life during her husband’s, but we learn from the Canterbury traditions, and on the testimony of Florence of Worcester that she founded a monastery at Liming in Kent (M. H. B.
635; Elmharn, ed. Hardwick, p. 176; Dugd.
I. 452), where she was buried. (Elmharn, p.
177.) [S.]

ETHELBURGA (2), daughter of Anna king of the East Saxons, sister of Sexburga the wife of Eareombert king of Kent, and sister of Ethelreda abbess of Ely; she, with her half-sister Saethryd, took the veil in the monastery of Fumouttier in Brie, where Ethelburga became abbess. (Bede, H. E. iii. 5, for Wig. M. H. B. 636; Liber Eliensis, ed. Stewart,
p. 15; Hardy, Cat. i. 265.) [S.]

ETHELBURGA (3), sister of Erkenwald bishop of London, and first abbess of Barking.
[ERKENWALD.] Bede gives (lib. iv. cc. 7, 8, 9, 10) an account of several miraculous events which happened during her period of rule, and which he extracted from a book which had already been written on the history of the monastery. One of these is a vision which Torgyth, one of the nuns, bad of the death of Ethel-burga, a few days before it occurred, and a vision of Ethelburga herself a few days after her death
(c. 9). What little is known of the foundation of Barking will be found under ERKENWALD.
Capgrave (N. L. A.) gives a life of St. Ethel-burga, according to which she was born, like Erkenwald, at Stallington, in Lindsey, was doughter of Offa, who was subsequently converted by her agent; in order to avoid marriage she fled from her father’s house; Earecon-bald built her a monastery out of his patrony and invited Hildelitha [HILDELETH] from France to teach her monastic customs. This writer also expands the miraculous stories given by Bede.
(Acc. Leg. Angli. ed. 1516, fol. 139, 140.) The biography of course proceeded from the same mait as that of Erkenwald. The date of Ethelburga’s death, given by Florence of Worcester under 676, is very doubtful; and even the dedication day of the church in Bishopsgate, London, can only hesitatingly be ascribed to her. Oct. 11 is the usual date of her commemoration. (A.A. S2. Boll.
Oct. 11, tom. i. 649-652.) There is, however, confusion between Ethelburga and the abbess Eadburga [BUGGA] of Minster, which appears in the life of St. Werburga (Mon. Angli. i. 452), but is corrected by Elmharn, p. 224. (See also Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 365.) [S.]

ETHELBURGA (4), abbess of Repton, doughter of Ealdwulf king of the East Angles [AULDULF], more properly called Ealdinga.
(Wallingford, ap. Dale, p. 528.) [EADBURGA (4).]

ETHELBURGA (5), the wife of Ine king of the West Saxons. She is described by William of Malmesbury (G. G. & Lib. i. § 25; ed. Hunt.
M. H. B. 649) as a woman of royal race and mind, and this is borne out by the testimony of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle which represents her as capturing and destroying Taunton in 722, during the struggle in which Ine was engaged with the Etheling Eadbriht. (Chr. S. 327; H. Hunt. M. H. B.
724.) William of Malmesbury tells the story of the way in which she impressed upon Ine the Corruptible nature of all worldly things. Having held high festival at one of his palaces, which is described as exceptionally sumptuous, the king and queen set out for another place. After going a little way she prevailed on him to return, and showed him his palace filled with filth and rubbish, in accordance with a command which she had secretly given to the steward. The lesson was obvious. Ine determined to renounce his crown; he resigned the kingdom to Ethel-hard (who appears in a spurious charter, Kemble, C. D. no. 73, as Ethelburga’s brother), and, accompanied by his wife, went to Rome,
where they lived, employed in works of humble charity among the poor, and died in the odour of sanctity. According to another tradition which is less plausible and less probable, Ethelburga retired to Barking, where her sister is said to have been abbess, and died there; but this story is of later date, and probably originates in a confusion between the two Ethelburgas. The name of Ethelburga is appended as a consenting party to the great charter of Ine to Glastonbury (Kemble, C. D. 73; Mon. Angl. i. 25); and occurs in the body of another charter to the same monastery. (K. C. D. 74; Mon. Angl. i. 49; Elpham, pp. 267, 268; W. Malmesb. G. R. i. § 35-37; ed. Hardy, pp. 49-55; Higden, Polychr. ed. Gale, p. 258; Mon. Angl. i. 456 sq.)

ETHELBURGA (6), daughter of Alfred; a Mercian abbess of some importance in the Worchester cathedral. Her father was a kinsman of the ealdormen of the Hwicci, who were hereditary friends and patrons of the cathedral monastery at Worchester. In 774 she had, by the gift of bishop Milred, a grant of the monastery founded by Dunna at Withington, for her life (K. C. D. 124; Mon. Angl. i. 586), and a few years afterwards (778-781) a similar gift from Aldred, the ealdorman, of the monastery of Fladbury, also for life. (K. C. D. 146.) The reversion in each case was secured to the cathedral monastery. The idea that Ethelburga was the first abbess of a monastery of St. Mary at Worchester (Mon. Angl. i. 567), which was afterwards transferred to monks, is without any historical or even legendary foundation. [S.]

ETHELBURGA (7), wife of Wihtred king of Kent (Kemble, C. D. 41, 42, &c.). Possibly Wihtred was more than once married; for a spurious charter (Kemble, C. D. no. 37) gives him a wife Knygghtha; and in the Privilegiosa (Huddan and Stubbe, iii. 240) his queen calls herself Werburga; cf. note, &c. p. 242. [S.]

ETHELBURGA (8), daughter of Offa king of Mercia, and abbess. She is mentioned by Offa, together with her mother Cynethritha and her sisters Ethelfleda, Eadburga, and Ethelswitha, in the grant of Offa to Chertsey (K. C. D. 151) and attests the same charter. She is not, however, noticed in the Mercian genealogy given by Florence of Worchester. (M. H. B. 630, 638.) To her, without the title of abbess, Alcuin addressed one letter by name (Ep. 59), probably another without name (Ep. 60), and possibly two others under the name of Eugenia. (Ep. 229, 278.) In the first of these he reminds her of the instructions which she has received from him, sends consolations to her sister Ethelfleda [ELFLED], the widowed queen of Northumbria, and presents from Laidgards, the wife of Charles the Great. The second is of similar purport, and the other two mere consolations and good advice. (Mon. Monunt. pp. 293, 295, 737, 857.) These are referred by Jaffé erroneously to the abbess of Fladbury. [S.]

ETHELBYRHT (2) (Ethelward, Chron. iii. init. in M. H. B. 509 d), king of East Anglia. [ELFLETH (3.)] [C. H.]

ETHELRED (1) (Hardy, Cat. Mud. i. 264), young prince of Kent, martyred. [ELFLETH] (9.). [C. H.]

ETHELRED (2) (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann. 798, 799, in M. H. B. 669 n, 671 b), king of Northumbria, son of Æthelreda. [ELFLETH (14.)] [C. H.]

ETHELRED (1) (ÆDELETH), a daughter of Edwin king of Northumbria and Ethelreda his second wife. She was baptised at York in A.D. 627, and died in her infancy (Bed. H. E. ii. 14). [J. R.]

ETHELRED (2) (ÆDELETH, ÁEDELÚTH, AUDRY, ÆDELETHA), queen of Northumbria and abbess of Ely; a daughter of Anna king of East Anglia. Anna had four daughters, Sexburga, Ethelburga, Ethelreda, and Withburga, all of whom were great in the medieval calendar. Of these daughters Ethelreda seems to have been the third. The Ely histories (ed. Stewart, p. 157), who confound the family of Anna with that of his brother Ethelhere, makes Hereswitha the wife of Anna and mother of these daughters. According to Thomas of Ely, Ethelreda was born at Exning or Ixning in Suffolk. When she grew up she was married to Tondert, a Saxon prince, who bestowed on her the isle of Elie, or Ely, as a dowry. The marriage was sorely against the lady's will, as she had practically devoted herself already to a conventual life, but her husband seems to have allowed the union to remain nominal. This so-called marriage is said to have taken place two years before Anna's death, which occurred in A.D. 654. Tondert died soon after his marriage, and his widow retired to Ely, where it seems to have been her intention amid the general wreck of her family, to devote herself solely to a religious life. But in A.D. 650 a second and an illustrious alliance was in store for her. She became the wife of prince Egfrid, son of Æswy king of Northumbria, her own kinsman, and a husband whom her own family would think it by no means prudent to refuse. The union lasted for eleven or twelve years, and was of the same nature as that with Tondert. No entreaties or threats could induce Ethelreda to break her resolution of perpetual virginity. Egfrid ascended the Northumbrian throne in A.D. 670, and was then too free to act with much regard to the matter of his marriage. To bring Ethelreda over to his views he sought the help of Wilfrid, who had very great influence with husband and wife. He promised him a great reward if he could succeed; but the monk of Ely does not hesitate to say that the influence of Wilfrid was secretly exerted to confirm the resolution of the queen, and that it was through his means that a divorce was suggested and carried out, after great opposition from Egfrid. The desires of Ethelreda, it is plain, were directed only towards an ascetic life, and she was at all times a kind patron of religious work and men. It seems pretty evident, from a passage in Eddi (cap. 22), that Elyham was at one time her property, before it was passed over to Wilfrid, who erected there a church of stone, without a peer in his day on this side of the Alps. For Cuthbert, Etheldreda wrought with her own hands a stole and maniple, rich with gold and precious stones, which, as the monk of Ely says, were preserved in his day in the great shrine at Durham.

In A.D. 671, the ill-sorted couple separated—Egfrid to seek a second consort, Etheldreda to take the veil at the hands of Wilfrid. She was placed as a nun in the house of Coldingham, in Berwickshire, which was then presided over by Ebba, king Egfrid’s aunt. She continued there for a year. The monk of Ely says that Egfrid tried in vain to carry her off, but Bede does not mention this attempt, and it may therefore be discredited; still it is easy to understand how Etheldreda’s stay at Coldingham might be unpleasant to her. She had the 101 hand and had of her husband a self a second wife. She would be happier in her old home, and among her own people. Etheldreda therefore made her way to Ely. Thomas of Ely mentions some incidents in the journey. Etheldreda was attended by two companions, called Sewenna and Seware. She crossed the Humber at Holderness, with a chariot at Allhill, where the party made a short halt. Her priest was a person of the name of Huna, who afterwards died in the sound of sanctity. The isle of Ely at that time was a waste of rushes and waters, out of which arose here and there little eyes or eyots, bright with green pasture land, on the edges of which the scene of unnumbered buildings were built. It was necessary to take a boat to travel from village to village, There was but one church in the district, at Ely itself, built originally by Augustine, and recently destroyed by king Penda. This Etheldreda restored, with the help of king Aelfred, her brother, and endowed with the island, of which it became the gem and glory, and in addition to the house for nuns, which Bede calls a nunery, whilst the monk of Ely speaks of it as a twin monastery, like Coldingham, with the working of which Etheldreda would be perfectly acquainted. Over this house Wilfrid made her the abbess, and when he visited Rome next he made it his business to secure for Ely and his old friend a grant of privileges from the pope. Bede gives a short account of Etheldreda’s ascetic life, which Shows that it was of the severest kind. She was thoroughly in earnest, and made Ely a devotional centre for the whole of the eastern counties. Her life, however, was only a short one. She was attacked by the plague, and died on the third day of her illness, on the 23rd of June, A.D. 679. Her physician, Cryfrid, mentioned to Bede one or two circumstances in connexion with her complaint.

The remains of Etheldreda were deposited in a coffin of wood, and interred at Ely. Her elder sister, Sexburga, succeeded her as abbess. In A.D. 688, Etheldreda resolved to translate Etheldreda’s body. Where could she find a fitting tomb? There was no stone in the neighbourhood of Ely, and so the abbess sent off several of the brethren of the house in a boat, to find elsewhere, if possible, what was unattainable at home. They made their way to Grantham, the site of the modern Cambridges, where, near the walls of the Roman town, they found a white marble cut or coffin, rifted pithily of the remains of its former tenant, which was the very thing they required. They brought it back with them to Ely, and therein Etheldreda’s body was deposited. Like that of Cuthbert, it is said to have been undecayed, and to have been the means of effecting a number of miraculous cures. The authorities for this account of Etheldreda are, the notices of her in Bede and the Life by Thomas, a monk of Ely.

The present “stately pace” of Ely owes its existence to the fame of Etheldreda, who was regarded as one of the greatest of the mediaval saints. The church which she constructed herself perished in the Danish instead of A.D. 866-7, but the marauders did no harm to the coffin of the saint. The building was restored about a century afterwards, under whose auspices it became a house of Benedictine monks, and acquired by degrees great estates and influence. In A.D. 1107 it was made a bishopric, and the see of Ely was founded, and the series of abbots came to an end, the monks thenceforward being ruled by a prior. One of the last official acts of Richard, the last abbot, was a solemn translation of Etheldreda’s remains, necessitated by the progress of the new Norman fabric. The monk of Ely describes the wall as being of red bricks, with an interesting nature. The old marble coffin was taken into the new church and laid near the high altar (cf. Malmes. Gest. Pontiff. 322-3). Over this arose a portable shrine of wood-work, richly ornamented, which was borne about on festival days. In A.D. 1144 the monks stripped the shrine of the mass of useless wood for the pecuniary necessities of bishop Nigel, who acknowledged their kindness by giving the manor of Hadstock to the convent, for the special purpose of decorating and repairing the shrine. It was afterwards richly ornamented by bishops Ridel and de Burgh. In A.D. 1235 bishop Northwold commenced the fabric of the present magnificent church, and erected a beautiful house for Etheldreda and the saints of the house in the centre of the presbytery. Of this a sketch has been preserved. The shrine perished at the Reformation (Bentham’s Ely. var. loc.). The life and merits of Etheldreda were a fertile theme for the mediaval writers, of whom the following are the most conspicuous.

The earliest notice of the saint is that by Bede, which is really the kernel of every subsequent biography. Appended to this notice is a poem by the same author, in elegiac verse (H. E. iv. 19, 20).

Next in order comes the Life contained in the first of the three books of the Liber Eliensis, written by Thomas, a monk of Ely. Thomas, who seems to have lived in the reign of Henry II., has availed himself of the work of a brother of the same house of the name of Richard, which is now lost, and he is also much indebted to Bede. His narrative is exceedingly diffuse. This Life is printed in the Anglia Sacra, i. 53, et seq.; Acta SS. 23 Jun. iv. 489; and in Mabillon’s Acta SS. Ord. S. Ben. ii. 707, et seq. The best edition is that printed in 8vo. in 1848, for the Anglia Christiana Society, and edited by the Rev. D. J. Stewart. Unfortunately it carries the Liber Eliensis only to the end of the second book.

The next in importance, although earlier in date, is the Ibis, written in hexameters, in the time of Henry L., by Gregory, another monk of Ely, to commemorate the foundation of the church and the bishopric. It is unpublished, and contains some curious passages describing the church and neighbourhood of Ely (cf. Hardy's Catalogue, i. pt. 1, 780–1). In MSS. Cotton, Faustina B. iii. is another Life in English verse, unfortunately imperfect, but running to the length of 1200 lines (id.).

There is a Life in Capgrave, a compilation (ff. 141–2), and several others, very brief and of little importance, all of which are described in Hardy's Catalogue, i, 278–84. [J. R.]

ETHELREDIDA (Adilhryche, Ethelhrythu, Ethelhrytha) became the wife of Ethelwald Moll, king of Northumbria, Nov. 1, 762, at Catterick (Syeneum, Chron. 21). Ethelwold lost his kingdom in A.D. 765. Their son Ethelred afterwards became king, and was slain in A.D. 796. After the death of her husband, Ethelredida took the veil, and became the abbess of some religious houses. She was a long letter from Alcuin in that capacity, between A.D. 793 and 796 (Ep. ed. Jaffé, 274 et seq.). He also wrote to her in A.D. 796, consoling her on the death of her son (id. 297). [J. R.]

She is identified with the Aedilithyda "sambula Dei olim reginae" to whom Alcuin addressed a letter of thanks for prayers and some exhortations (Mon. Alcuin. Ep. 50, p. 274). [S.]

ETHELFLIDA (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 50, ed. Hardy), daughter of Oswy king of Northumbria, abbess of Whitby. [Ethelfleda (1).] [C. H.]

ETHELFRID (Ethelfrith, Ethelfrith, Ethelfrid, Eadberht Flesaurs, Ethelfrach) was king of Northumbria. He was the son of Ethelric, and grandson of Ida. Ethelric was king of Bernicia, and on the death of Ella seized the kingdom of Deira, to the injury of Edwin, Ella's youthful son. Ethelfrid, who afterwards married Acha, Edwin's sister, did not scruple to continue his father's usurpation of Deira. Ethelfrid became king in A.D. 593. Pagan although he was, Bede speaks of him in terms of the highest eulogy, comparing him with Saul, king of Israel, for his military genius, and proud of the boldness and persistence with which he subjugated or exterminated the Britons. The Britons, in Bede's view, were irrelatable heirs. One famous onslaught was made upon Ethelfrid in A.D. 603 by Aedan, king of Dalriada, which ended in his utter defeat. In this fight Theobald, brother of Ethelfrid, fell with all the army that he led. It seems probable from this that Theobald had been fighting against his brother on the side of the invading Scots. In one of the versions of the Saxon Chronicle we are told that Hering, son of Hussa, led the hostile army. In the annals of Tighernac (ed. Skene, p. 68), Ethelfrith's brother is called Esnafrith. The scene of the battle is said to be Dignostr, i.e. Dignostr (Bed. H. E. i. 34). But in several versions of the Saxon Chronicle it is called Eghesan stane. It has been conjectured that this may be Eggleston, near Barnard Castle. An invading force from Scotland might well descend the Tees to strike a deadly blow at Northumbria, on the very boundary line between Bernicia and Deira. (Arch. Astiana, n.s. pt. 22, p. 109.) The defeat of Aedan was so decisive, that up to the time of Bede's History so Scottish monarch had ever entered the field against an English kingdom. (Bed. H. E. 25.)

In A.D. 607, according to the Saxon Chronicle (A.D. 613, Annals of Uster and Cambro-Annals), Ethelfrid struck another very terrible blow at the British race and church. He was carrying his victorious arms beyond the Dee. He nears the city of Chester, then in British hands, called by its inmates Caerleon and by the English Legnovaest. When the battle was about to begin, Ethelfrid's attention was attracted by a crowd of men remaining aloof from the combatants. They were monks from Bangor and other places in the neighbourhood, who had come to assist their compatriots with their prayers. Ethelfrid ordered his men to attack them first, alleging that they were his enemies, inasmuch as they were fighting against him with their prayers. His wish was carried out so terribly that only fifty monks escaped, whilst two thousand were slain. A chief of the name of Brocnail had been charged with their defence, but fled on the first onset, leaving the power helpless to destroy their enemy. This was followed by the overthrow of the whole British army, but without great loss to the victor. And thus, says Bede, somewhat triumphantly, the prediction of Augustine came fearfully to pass upon those who had spurned his warnings and advice (Bed. H. E. ii. 21; Malm. G. R. i. 65, 66).

We are told in the Bedae Nennii Genealogies (53) that Ethelfrid gave to his wife Bebb a place called Dingoaroyg, which was renamed Bebbanburh after her death (cf. Bed. H. E. iii. 6, 10). Bebb was Ethelfrid's first wife. About A.D. 608 he re-married Acha or Aces, the daughter of Ella, and sister of Edwin, who was the mother of St. Oswald and St. Edwin. Ethelfrid had seven sons—Esnafrid, Olaf, Olof, Oswald, Osric, Olic, and Oswin; but it is not known for certain which of his two queens was their mother. It seems probable that Esnafrid was the first born.

The reign of Ethelfrid, prosperous although it seemed to be, was by no means free from anxiety and care. He was sitting unjustly on his brother-in-law Edwin's throne, and the thought of some possible retribution made him very jealous of his kinsman as he grew up to man's estate. Edwin also was afraid and left Ethelfrid's court, hiding himself where he could, until at length he found shelter with Redwald, king of East Anglia. Ethelfrid discovered his retreat; and by promises, gifts, and kindness endeavoured to make Redwald violate the ties of hospitality. So urgent was his importance that Redwald began to waver through fear; and it was only in consequence of Edwin's appeals, and the earnest intervention of his own queen, that at last he became firm. Firmness is such a case means war; and Redwald was so active in his preparations and onset that he overthrew Ethelfrid's army, and slew its leader, in a battle on the bank of the river Idle, in Nottinghamshire, in A.D. 616. Among the ETHELFRITH

ETHELFRITH (ETHELFRIT, ETHEL-
FRITH), the fourth bishop of Elmham (M. H.
B. 618). He was consecrated by archbishop Notohelm, who received his pall in 736 (Sim.
bus. M. H. B. 659). His successor was Enfrith, who was bishop in 758. As no bishop of Elmham attended the synod of Clovesho in 747, the see may have been vacant in that year.

ETHELGITHA (ETHELGITHA, ETHEL-GITHA), a Northumbrian abbess, probably of Coldingham, whose relics were brought to Durham by Elfred the sacrist in the 11th century, and deposited in St. Cuthbert's shrine (Symeon, H. E. D. iii. c. vii.). Her name is in the Liber Vitae of the church of Durham (p. 3).

ETHELHARD (1) (ETHELHARD, ETHEL-HARD, ADIELHARD, EDELHARD), king of the West Saxons, 725-739 (Cont. Bed. M. H. B. 288; 728-741, Chr. S.). He succeeded to the West Saxon thronc on the departure of Ine for Rome. Ine was childless, and Ethelhard, although he is described as kinsman to Ine (Chr. S. M. H. B. 327) was not a near relation, and is not definitely fixed in the general list of the kings of the West Saxons (M. H.
B. 632), but generally assigned to the house of Cerdic (ib. 641). The charter of Glastonbury (Kemble, C. D. no. 75), in which Ethelhard is described as brother of queen Ethelfheburga, is not genuine. It is probable that Ine left the succession unsettled among the junior members of his family, and that his settlement was disputed by the family, for Ethelhard in the first year of his reign had a struggle with the etheling Oswald, who was despatched in another line from Cuthwin, the son of Ceolwin. As Ethelhard retained his throne, we may infer that Oswald was forced to submit.
The Chronicle mentions only two events in the year of his reign, viz. the victory of Somerton (probably representing Somersetshire) by Ethel-hard of Mercia in 733, and the departure of queen Frithgith for Rome in 736 or 737. Of these the former indicates one phase of the ever-pressing struggle between Mercia and Wessex on the side of the Hwicce, and the enormous preponderance acquired by Ethelhard, which is attested by the composition of Bede, who, at the close of his work, describes the Mercian king as supreme over the southern provinces. It is probable that the weakening of the West-Saxon power on the western border was followed by the loss of territory on the Welsh and Cornish border, and some unrecorded victories are claimed by the later Welsh writers over the king Adelrad.
(Torpe's Lappenberg, i. 267.) All that can be argued from this, however, is that Ethelhard failed to recover the territory or restore the peace which had been lost in the later years of Ine. The documentary history of the reign is very slightly illustrated. Neither Ethelhard nor Frithgitha is mentioned in the letters of Boaiface. In charters the name of Ethelhard occurs in the year 729 as granting land of sixty manesates at Pobolt to Glastonbury, in a witena-genom held at Pencricle (Kemble, C. D. 78); and in an Abingdon charter unrolled, Ethelhard appears as confirming a grant made by Ethelhard of Mercia. (K. C. D. 81.) Neither of these documents is of good authority, and additional doubt is thrown on the latter by the circumstantial character of the attestation which purports to have been granted "in expeditio ultra fluvium Sabrina adversum Britonum gentem"; it is, however, the form rather than the substance of this statement that excites suspicion.

There is likewise a grant made by Ethelhard, at the request of Frithgitha, of land at Taunton to the cathedral of Winchester, which, if genuine, belongs to the year 737 (K. C. D. 1002).

Cuthred, the successor of Ethelhard, is called by Simeon of Durham (M. H. B. 659), his brother; by other writers his kinsman. According to Radburne (Ang. Sac. I. 194) Ethel-hard was the brother of Frydewith, mother of St.
Frideswide of Oxford, and both he and his sister were buried at Winchester. The mother, however, of Frideswide is called in the legend Sefrida, although it is given as Frisedwisa in the life printed by Mabillon. See also W. H. Labb.

ETHELHARD (2), the ninth bishop of Winchester. (M. H. B. 619). As his name occurs between that of Cynewulf, who was bishop in 754, and that of Egel, who was bishop in 778, he cannot be identified with Ethelhard, who became archbishop of Canterbury in 793. William of Malmesbury held the bishop of Winchester, the archbishop, and an abbat Ethelhard, abbat of Malmesbury, to have been the same person, but this is impossible.

ETHELHARD (3) (ETHELHARD), fourteenth archbishop of Canterbury (M. H. B. 616). His appointment is noted by Simeon (M. H. B. 667), on the authority no doubt of the ancient Gesta Regum Northanobrorum, under the year 791; "Abbas vero Ethelhardus Hildensis monasterii ad can-dem sedem est electus et ordinatus episcopus."
The more precise date given by Flodoard of Canterbury, July 21, 793, probably marks the day of consecration. The Chronicle places the appointment in 790. As Jaenbert died in the month of August his successor's consecration, if it occurred in July, could not take place earlier than the next year. As July 21 was a Sunday in 793, it may be accepted as the true date; it is not contradicted by any evidence in charters, and the apparent delay may easily be accounted for by the circumstances of the Kentish church and kingdom; Offa was attempting to consolidate his rule, and the church of Canterbury was shorn of half its power by the creation of the archbishopric of Lindisfarne, which was not annexed with the see of Canterbury until 813; the consecration was performed, but it is not impossible that it was by archbishop Higbert of Lichfield himself. Ethelhard before his election to Canterbury was, according to Simeon, abbot of a monastery called "Hild," which may either have been some obscure place, as e.g. Lydd in Kent, or a more important one, such as Louth in Lincolnshire; but there is no record of the existence of any monastic foundation at this early period in either of those places. It may be argued in favour of Louth that Ethelhard must almost of necessity have been a Mercian abbot, as it would be impossible for Offa, in the existing state of affairs, to have allowed the appointment of a Wikt
Saxon or Kentishman; and the later attitude of the Kentish men towards Ethelhard shews that he did not belong to the patriotic party. William of Malmesbury, finding the name of Ethelhard in the lists of the bishops of Winchester, and either finding or placing it in that of the abbots of Malmesbury, has not scrupled to identify the archbishop of Canterbury with Ethelhard (G. D. C. ed. Hamilton, pp. 160, 389.) As for the bishop of Winchester, his date is irreconcilable with any such theory; and of the abbot nothing is known except from William of Malmesbury himself; that supposition may then be set aside.

Ethelhard, as has been said, found the church of Canterbury at its lowest ebb, and so long as Offa lived he could make no attempt at its emancipation. In a council held at Clovesho in 794, he was obliged to sign the documents there issued after the rival archbishop (Kemble, C. D. 167; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 484, 485). During these years he stood it would seem high in Offa's favour, for he despatches the latter addressed letter to him, asking him to intercede with the Mercian king for certain English exiles. (Monumenta Carolin, p. 352.) Early in his episcopate Alcuin had written him a letter full of pious advice (Mon. Alc. Ep. 28; p. 202; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 474), and one of his first acts may have been a participation in the measures taken for declaring the mind of the English Council at Frankfort in 7917; but of this there is no evidence.

Before the death of Offa the troubles of Ethelhard had begun; early in 796 Eadbert Pnaen had raised the standard of revolt, and met with such support among the Kentish nobles that Ethelhard was compelled or induced to fly from his see (Mon. Alc. Ep. 44; p. 468; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 496) urging him to support the archbishop; he wrote to Ethelhard himself entreating him not to desert his flock (Mon. Alc. Ep. 44; p. 265; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 495), and to the Kentish men urging them to recall their archbishop (Mon. Alc. Ep. 86; p. 989; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 500).

The position of Ethelhard, although an important part of the imperial policy of Offa, was not such a great object of desire with Kenuill, who no doubt thought that the archbishop was much more valuable as an ally than as a subject, and who intended to rule Kent as a subordinate kingdom through his dependent Cuthred. If, as seems likely, Ethelhard, on leaving Canterbury, sought an asylum at the Mercian court, he would take the opportunity of impressing on Kenuill the injury done to Christianity in England by the degradation of the mother church. However this may have been, the exact professions of obedience made to Ethelhard by the Mercian as well as by the English bishops, which contain a distinct recognition of the authority of Canterbury, seem to shew that Higbert, after the death of Offa, could have retained but little more than the title and precedence which Adrian I. had accorded to him by bestowing the pall. Of these professions that of Eudulf of Lindsey, Tidforth of Dunwich and Deneberht of Worcester, seem certainly to belong to this period. (Haddan and Stubbs, i. 506, 511, 525.)

As soon as Eadbert Pnaen fell into the hands of Kenuill (798) Ethelhard returned to his see. Alcuin wrote to advise him to be peaceable for having deserted his see (Mon. Alc. Ep. 86; p. 989; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 518), and the proceedings of the synod at Clovesho held the same year shew that both the archbishop's authority and the Mercian power had been re-established. In that synod Ethelhard exchanged lands at Cookham in Mercia for an estate in Kent, with the abbess Cyanethira [Cynethiria], and Kenuill bestowed state at "Hrempingius", on the monastery of Liminge. In the charter by which this gift was conferred, the attestation of Ethelhard takes precedence of that of Higbert, but the latter is still called archbishop. (Kemble, C. D. 1019, 175; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 512-515.) It scarcely need be the pressing advice of the prior of Reims, told to Ethelhard to attempt the restoration of church unity, to induce the archbishop to reopen the question of the Lichfield archbishopric. (Mon. Alc. p. 369; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 520.) Alcuin in particular recommended him to take the advice of the archbishop of York on the subject. Accordingly the discussion recommended by a letter of Kenuill to Pope Leo III., in which this subject was put before the pope the scheme of St. Gregory for the provincial arrangement of Britain, tells the story of Offa's quarrel with Jænsbert and the men of Kent, and mentioned likewise a full statement of the case which had been exhibited by Ethelhard before all the bishops of the province (Proc. lat. episcop, p. 427; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 521-523.) Although Ethelhard's letter has not been preserved, the pope's answer to Kenuill is extant. (Mon. Alc. Ep. 84; p. 363; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 523.) In it he explains that pope Adrian's division of the archbishopric was the result of a synod at Rome, of the English bishops, which Offa had represented as unanimous; he refers to the conduct of Eadbert Pnaen, who had been still in arms when Ethelhard wrote, and pronounced him anathema; he declares that the primacy belonged not to London, as Kenuill had hinted, under St. Gregory's direction, but to Canterbury; and further reminded the king of the annual payment which Offa had promised to the apostolic see at the time of the legation of George and Theophylact. He did not, however, decide or hold out any promise of a decision on the all important question.

In 799 there was a synod at Clovesho, and likewise a great witenaemot at Tamworth; in the latter assembly Higbert took precedence of Ethelhard, and certain lands in Kent were restored to Canterbury (K. C. D. 1020). The state of affairs continued for two years longer. In 801, after a synod held at Cleschlyth (K. C. D. 1023), and an interview with archbishop Eardhold II. on the subject, a letter was sent to that prelate that Alcuin had advised him (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 532.) Ethelhard set out for Rome. He was met by Alcuin's servant at St. Judoc's (Saint-Josse-sur-Mer). Alcuin sent his own horse, saddle and servant to meet him, and wrote him... a letter of encouragement, inviting him to visit Tours on his way home, and also wrote to the emperor to help him on his journey. He was accompanied by Colunm, a thegn of Offa, Terthinum, the friend of the late King Ethelred of Northumbria, bishop Riwbert of Winchester, and another bishop whose name does not appear. (Mon. Alc. Epp. 172, 173; Hadden and Stubbs, iii. 533.)

Ethelhard's mission was attended with complete success. He reached Rome, found favour with Leo III., and on Jan. 18, 802, received from the pope a letter, which, without even mentioning the hostile archbishopric, he declared the ancient rights of Canterbury to be unimpaired, denouncing deprivation against any archbishop or bishop, and excommunication against any layman, who might infringe them. (W. Malmesb. G. P. lib. i. 36, ed. Hamilton, pp. 57–69; Hadden and Stubbs, iii. 538, 539.) At the same time he wrote to Kenulf acknowledging the receipt of letters and money, mentioning the visit of Ethelhard, and announcing his decision that both the episcopal seats subtracted from the province and the monasteries withdrawn from the church of Canterbury should be restored, and that the provincial see restored in the dignity defined by the letters of St. Gregory to Augustine. (W. Malmesb. G. k. i. 89; Hadden and Stubbs, iii. 538, 539.)

It appears from this letter that Ethelhard's appeal touched not only the integrity of the province but the property of the see, and this explains some measure of the long-continued litigation for the recovery of the Canterbury estates which marks the next thirty years, and was the subject of discussion in many councils.

Alcuin, on hearing of the success of Ethelhard, wrote to congratulate him, and advised him to use his victory with firmness and discretion. The long struggle came to an end at the council of Clovesho, Oct. 12, 806. In that assembly, which was attended by all the bishops and a large body of clergy from each diocese of the province, the right of the see of Augustine was solemnly recognised according to the tenour of the pope's letter, and to this not Kenulf and his witan gave their full adhesion: "Coenwulf Magnus Rex et suorum senatus suis"; the archbishopric of Lichfield was abolished, and the letters of pope Adrian I. under the authority of Leo III. declared null (Kemble, C. D. 185; Mon. Angl. i. 107; Hadden and Stubbs, iii. 542–544). The same day, by a synodal act, Ethelhard and the clergy assembled in obedience to the papal orders, forbade the election of laymen as lords of the monasteries (K. C. D. 1624; Hadden and Stubbs, iii. 445–547). This latter act is attested by the whole body of the synod; among the signatures Aldulf appears as bishop of Lichfield, Higbert the deposed archbishop signing as "Higberht Abbas" first among the clergy of that diocese. Alcuin in his letter of 798 (Hadden and Stubbs, iii. 620) had urged that the pious archbishop should not, so long as he lived, be stripped of his pall, but the recommendation was not adopted, or the necessity for degradation was avoided by resignation.

In the year 804 there was a synod at Acle, at which Ethelhard was present with the Mercian bishops (Hadden and Stubbs, iii. 548); and in 805 he secured the restoration of an estate given by Aldhun to Christchurch, but alienated by royal tyranny, and now recouped by synodal decree.

This is the last recorded act of Ethelhard, who died on May 13 in the same year, 805. Alcuin had died a year before him. Besides the letters cited above, some other epistles of Alcuin to Ethelhard are extant; the whole may be found in Jaffe's Monasticon Alcuinianum, pp. 202, 366, 616, 619, 620, 669, 719, 794. See also, in Alcuin's letters to Charles and others, mention of Ethelhard, pp. 288, 290, 365, 371, 618. In one of these letters, printed for the first time by Dr. Jaffé, Ethelhard is exorted to put down the custom of carrying "ligatures" or charms containing relics, and phylacteries (Mon. Alc. p. 719); and also to prevent the conventicles or meetings on the hills, at which the people instead of praying indulged in drunkenness.

In the chronology of Ethelhard's Life, as given above, the computation of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle and Florence of Worcester has been altered by two years in order to harmonise it with the undisputed dates of documents and other certain authorities.

The correspondence of Alcuin with Ethelhard, together with the general history of his episcopate, exhibits him to us as a man of high reputation for devotion, and of no small power in the conduct of affairs. The fact of his using the power which he had received as a dependant of Offa, to circumvent and overthrow the design which was so important a part of Offa's policy, is scarcely to be regarded as a blunder on the character of the age and the changed circumstances of the Mercian kingdom be taken into account. The appeal to Rome is one link of the scanty chain which bound England to the apostolic see in this obscure age; and the whole episode, falling in one of the darkest periods of the early middle ages, but singularly well illustrated by documentary evidence, is perhaps the most important piece of English church history between the death of Bede and the age of Dunstan.

ETHELHEARL (1) (Ethelheard), a Northumbrian "dux" who adopted the religious habit, and died at York, August 1, A.D. 794 (Symeon, Chron. ed. Surtees Soc. 33). [J. R.]

ETHELHEARD (2) (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann. 791, in M. H. R. 687 q.), archbishop of Canterbury [ETHELHEARL.] [C. H.]

ETHELHERE (Edelhere), son of Ead, the brother of Redwald, succeeded his brother Anna as king of the East Angles in 654. As his brother had been defeated and slain by Penda, it is probable that he obtained the succession by Penda's influence. The next year, 655, he fell fighting on Penda's side, at the battle of Winwaedford; and Bede charges him with having been the 'auctor bellii' on that occasion. His wife Hereswit was the sister of St. Hilda, a great-niece therefore of Edwin of Northumbria. As the connexion between Edwin and Redwald had been very close, and the family of Edwin had fallen before the rising fortunes of Oswy, the quarrel of Ethelhere with Oswy may have been a result of the old rivalry between the descendants of Ella and Ida. By Hereswithe Ethelhere was the father of Aldulf and Aifred. Whether
ETHELHILD

Jurwinus or Jurminus was the son of Ethelhur of Annia, our authorities are not sufficiently in accord to prove. Ethelward was succeeded by his brother Ethelwold. (Bede, H. E. iii. 24; Hist. Ebor. ed. Stewart, pp. 14, 15, 23; Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 636.) [S.

ETHELHILD, a sister of Ethelwold bishop of Lindsey, and Aldwine abbot of Partney. She was abbess of a monastery near Partney, and survived until the time of Bede, who reports a miracle which was wrought in her monastery by a relic of St. Oswald. She had also seen a pillar of light reaching from heaven to the place where his relics were laid. (Bede, H. E. iii. 11.) [S.

ETHELHUN (1) (Aedilhun), a son of Edwin king of Northumbria and his second wife Ethelburga of Kent. He was baptized by Paulinus soon after his father in A.D. 627, and died shortly afterwards, whilst still wearing his white baptismal robe. He was buried in York minster. (Bede, H. E. ii. 14.) [I. R.

ETHELHUN (2) (Oddilhun), a brother of Ethelwold bishop of Lindsey, who went with the famous Egbert to study in Ireland. They were together in the monastery of Rathmelsigi (Mel- font) in 664, the year of the great plague. The two friends were attacked by the disease; Egbert vowed that if his life were spared he would give the life of a pilgrim and ascetic. (Egbert [5].) Ethelhun, in his sleep, had miraculous information of this vow, and said to Egbert, "O brother Egbert, what hast thou done? I hope we might live in eternal life together; yet know that what thou hast asked shall receive." Egbert recovered, and Ethelhun died the next night. (Bede, H. E. iii. 27.) [S.

ETHELHUN (3), a monk who carried letters and presents from Ethelbert II. king of Kent to St. Benifacce (Mon. Mogunt. p. 255). [S.

ETHELINGA, third priestess of Minster in Thanet, according to Weever (Fun. Monum. p. 309) as noticed by Dugdale (i. 448, note a), but without reference to authority. [BULGOA (2).] [C. H.

ETHFALED (Arthelmod, Ethelmod, Adalmundus), fourth bishop of Sherborne (M. H. B. 620). His name occurs in the charters first in the year 778 (Kemble, C. D. 132); his predecessor, Herewald, appears for the last time in 766. A MS. of Florence of Worcester (H. M. B. 545) places Ethelmod's succession in 782, but the notice is a mere interpolation; for Ethelmod not only attested the dated charter of king Cynewulf in 778, but took part in the synod of Brentford in 781 (K. C. D. No. 143; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 439). He was present also at the legatine council of 787 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 461), and attested a grant of Offa to Canterbury, at a council at Celchyt in 788 (Kemble, C. D. No. 153, Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 464), and a synodal act of a council at the same place in 790 (K. C. D. No. 156, cf. 157). Deneolith, his successor, is first heard of in 794. See also Will. Malmesb. G. F. ed. Hamilton, p. 175. [S.

ETHELNOTh (1), the twelfth abbot of St. Augustine's, according to Elmham. He succeeded Eanbald, who became archbishop in 766, and was blessed by him after he had received his pall; probably in 787. Elmham, however, gives the dates 765 and 764 for the two events (p. 331). The same authority gives 787 as the date at which his abbacy ended. There is a grant made by Offa to Ethelred and Godwine at Beaufield, dated in the fifth year of Offa. (Kemble, C. D. No. 119; Elmham, 331; Thorn, ap. Twysden, c. 1775.) [S.

ETHELNOTh (2), the fifteenth bishop of London (M. H. B. 617). He succeeded Godwin between 805 and 811, and subscribed charters from 811 to 816 (Kemble, C. D. 197, 207, 210). His profession of obedience made to archbishop Wulfred on the occasion of his consecration is preserved. Besides the printed charters already mentioned, he attested an unpublished grant of king Kenseil (MS. Lambeth, 1212, p. 301). He was present as "Lundonie civitas episcopi" in the council held at Cælchity in July 816. How much longer he lived is uncertain; his successor, bishop Ceolbert, appearing first in 824. (Haddan and Stubbs, ii. 586, 589, 574.) [S.

ETHELRED (1), St., young prince of Kent, martyred with his brother Ethelbert. [ETHELBERT (5).] [C. H.

ETHELRED (2), king of Mercia. He was the son of Penda and brother of Wulfhere, whom he succeeded in 675 (Bede, H. E. v. 24), his nephew Coenred, the son of Wulfhere, being too young to govern. In 676 he was at war with Kent and destroyed Rochester. (Bede, H. E. v. 12.) This expedition was probably connected with the internal divisions in the Kentish kingdom itself, where the Mercian influence seems to have alternated with the West Saxons. Before his accession, or shortly after it, Ethelred married Æthritha, daughter of Oswy, and sister of Egfrid of Northumbria. This near alliance did not secure peace between the two kingdoms; Egfrid had a few years before wrested the province of Lindsey from Wulfhere, and had regarded it as so safe a conquest that in 678 he obtained from Theodore the consecration of a bishop for it. In 679 Ethelred and Egfrid were at war; in a battle near the Trent Ethelred, the brother of the one and brother-in-law of the other, was slain, and it was only at the strong entreaty of archbishop Theodore that a wergild or money compensation for the life of Elfwine was accepted by the Northumbrian king. The balance of advantage remained, however, with Ethelred, who recovered Lindsey for Mercia. The peace between Egfrid and Ethelred was permanent, and the latter king seems not to have engaged in external warfare during the remainder of his reign. He devoted himself to the care of his people and the consolidation of the Mercian church. One immediate result of the peace was the division of Mercia into five dioceses; a measure which was probably adopted by Theodore in the council of Hatfield, or about the year 680 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 141 sq.), although the decree of Theodore which directs it is apparently spurious. This must have been done with the co-operation of Ethelred, and is indeed said by Florence of Worcester (M. H. B. 622).
ETHELRED

ETHELRED

227

The last document in which his name appears as king is a grant of Swanholme of Essex to bishop Waldhere of London, dated June 13, 704. This is confirmed by his successor Coenred. (Kemble, C. D. 52.) This date may furnish the exact time of the resignation; see Lappenberg (ed. Thorpe), l. 223.

Although so little there is definite is known about Ethelred, it is clear that he was one of the typical princes of Anglo-Saxon hagiography; that under him the organisation of the Mercian church was perfected, the monastic life devoutly cultivated, and peace fairly well preserved. He was the close friend both of Theodore and Wilfrid, the patron of Medeshamstede, Worcester, Ely, Malmsbury, and other obscure monasteries; and he died in the odour of sanctity. Possibly the years of peace which Mercia enjoyed under his rule enabled her to take the place among the English kingdoms which she attained under Ethelbald and Offa.

ETHELRED (3), king of the East Angles. He succeeded Beorn, and by his wife Leofrunga was father of St. Ethelbert, the king of the East Angles who was one of the victims of the policy of Offa. (Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 636); The succession of the East Anglian kings is very obscure. According to Simeon of Durham, Ethelwald, the correspondent of St. Boniface [Eldward], died in 749; and after him Hunbeanna and Alred divided the kingdom. According to Florence (M. H. B. 636), Beorn reigned in the time of Offa, and, more definitely, under the date 758 (M. H. B. 544). Thorpe, in his edition of Lappenberg, supposes Hunbeanna to be a corrupt reading for Beorn. Nothing more is heard of either Beorn or Alberht, and Ethelred is only known as father of St. Ethelbert. (ETHELBERT (3)).

ETHELRED (4). (ETHELRED, ETHELRED, EADMUND, ELMHEDRED, called also by Florence M. H. B. 653, ETHELHELM), king of Northumbria. He was the son of Moll Ethelwald, who had occupied the Northumbrian throne from 759 to 765, and succeeded Alred, the king in whose favour Moll Ethelwald had been set aside, in the year 774. If he were a son of Moll Ethelwald by his wife Ethelmesta, whom he married in 762, he must have been a child at the time. He was apparently promoted by a triumphant faction, as Alred had been, and was obliged, in order to maintain his position, to authorise some cruel acts; for in 778 he ordered two of his exiled subjects, Ethelbald and Heardberht, to put to death three of the Northumberland "duces," Aldulf, Cynwulf, and Egea. In consequence, probably, of this, he was deposed and driven into exile the next year, Alfwald the son of Oswulf being substituted for him. Ethelred's exile lasted until Alfwald, in 788, was murdered, and Osred, son of Alred, who succeeded, was deposed within a year. In 790 Ethelred recovered his throne. The cruelties which had disgraced his first reign were repeated in his second. In 791 he seized the ealdorman Eardulf, and ordered him to be executed at Ripon, where having been left for dead, he was rescued by the monks; the same year, apparently, the sons of king Alfwald, Olf and Olfthir, were put to death at Wirksworth; and in 792 Osred, who had returned from...
banishment, was put to death. The same year, 792, Ethelred, in order to strengthen himself by an alliance with Offa, married Ethlæda, daughter of that king on Sept. 29, at Catterick. The rest of Ethelred's reign was a period of domestic quiet and barbarian invasion. In 793 and 794 the coasts were devastated by the Norsemen, who destroyed the monasteries at the mouth of the Tyne. In 796 Ethelred was killed at Corbie (Corbridge?) on April 18, the result of another of the faction quarrels which had placed him on the throne. (Sim. Dun. in M. H. B. 665-668; Chr. Sax. 69. pp. 337, 338, 339.) As Alcuin was in close correspondence with York and the Northumbrian church during Ethelred's second thronery, the name of the king frequently occurs in his letters; in 790, writing to his steward Joseph, he mentions that Ethelred had been just transferred from a prison to a throne, and that he himself was detained in England in consequence of the change of sovereign (Mon. Alcuini ed. Jaffé, p. 170). In 793 he wrote to command his bishops to condemn the devastation of Lindisfarne, and declared the calamity to be a divine judgment called down by the sins which had been practised since king Alfred's death (ib. pp. 180, 181); another letter to the same effect was addressed about the same time to Ethelred and his great men, one of whom, Osbald, afterwards became bishop. In 798, ib. pp. 184-186, and there is another short letter of good advice (ib. p. 264). From a letter of Charles to Offa, we learn that after pope Adrian's death (Dec. 27, 795), the emperor had sent presents to the several sees of Ethelred's kingdom in memory of the pope (ib. p. 268), whilst from a letter of Alcuin to Offa it appears that the presents had not arrived until after Ethelred's death (ib. p. 269). Charles was greatly distressed on account of the king's murder (ib.). Lastly, in a letter written in 801 to the emperor, Alcuin states that Torthmund, one of Ethelred's servants, had valiantly avenged his master's death (ib. 619). (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 488, 492, 496, 498, 533.)

ETHELWITHA, a daughter of Offa, mentioned in the Chertsey charter of 787. (Kemble, C. D. 151.)

ETHELWALCH (ÆDELWALCH), the first Christian king of the South Saxons. He was baptized in Mercia at the suggestion of king Wulfhere, who was his godfather, about 661. His wife Eafa, daughter of Easfrith, ealdorman or under king of the Hwicedi, had been baptized in her own country previous to her marriage with Ethelwalc. Of the ancestry of Ethelwalc we have no account, but he was probably the hereditary ruler of the South Saxons, and patronized by Wulfhere as a thorn in the side of the West-Saxon kingdom. When Wulfhere in 661 had ravaged the Isle of Wight and the province of the Meawars (the district of Meon in Hampshire) he bestowed them on Ethelwalc. The conversion of the South Saxons did not follow the baptism of Ethelwalc for many years. The Scottish missionary Dieul had his small monastery at Bexley, but little success in his labours. And this state of things continued until Wilfrid in 681, having failed to recover his see in Northumbria, undertook the conversion of the nation. In this work he was very successful. Ethelwalc gave him land of eighty-seven families or hides at Selsey, and there was founded a monastic mission, which in 709 became the head of a new diocese. In the year 686 (Flor. Wig. 537) Ethelwalc was killed by Caedwalla, the young aspirant to the West-Saxon throne, who had been driven into exile among the South Saxons. Caedwalla was still a heathen or unchristened; Centwine, against whom he was in rebellion as a devout prince, but, on his connexion with the Northumbrian kings, disclined to receive Wilfrid, who at this time had no friends in Mercia. It is, however, difficult to unravel the string of the obscure quarrels, in which Sussex was involved as an outpost of Mercia and a debatable land between Kent and Wessex. After the death of Ethelwalc, the country was governed by two ealdormen, Berchtun and Andhun. In the two following years it was devastated by Caedwalla, and afterwards remained subject to the king of Wessex. The Selsey charters furnish the names of South Saxon kings during the next century, but always depended on Wessex. William of Malmesbury (ed. Hardy, G. R. p. 46) gives Ethelwalc a successor named Eadric, who was killed by Caedwalla, but this was no doubt the Kentish king of the name whose strength lay in Sussex. (EADRIC.)

ETHELWALD (1) (OEDILWALD), a son of Oswald king of Deira, and nephew of Oswy. He ruled some portion of Northumbria under Oswy after Oswin's death, and on one occasion took up arms against him (Bede, H. E. iii. 14). His importance in ecclesiastical history is owing to his friendship with Cedd, to whom he gave land for the foundation of the monastic church of Lastingham (Bede). Cedd, brother of Cedd, was minister in Ethelwald's household. Notwithstanding his piety and his relationship to Oswy, Ethelwald joined Penda in the attack upon his uncle in 655; but he withdrew from the battle in which Penda fell at Winwaed. It is uncertain at what period of his reign he founded Lastingham, but it was after Cedd had become a bishop, and therefore later than 654. Nothing seems to be known as to the date of Ethelwald's death; but Alchfrith, the son of Oswy, is called by Florence of Worcester his successor.

ETHELWALD (2) (ÆDLWALD), king of the East Angles. He was brother of Anna, and son of Eni. He succeeded his brother Ethelhere, who fell in the battle of Winwaed in 655, and reigned until 664, when he was succeeded by Aelfulf, the son of Ethelhere. (Flor. Wig. M. E. B. 533, 636.) Bede mentions him as godfather to Suidhelm, son of Seaxwald, king of the East Saxons, who was baptized by St. Cedd at Redes- sham (H. E. iii. 22).

ETHELWALD (3) (ÆDLWALD, ODILWALD), the successor of Cuthbert, a.d. 687, in his oratory or hermitage on Farne island. Much of his early life had been spent in the monastery of Ripon, where Cuthbert, no doubt, had been for a while his companion in his labours. It is believed which Ethelwald wrought in rescuing three of the brethren of Lindisfarne from a storm. In his Life of Cuthbert the same writer tells us the condition of the oratory on Farne. It was made of wooden planks, which were in great decay.
ETHELWALD

Cuthbert had stopped up the cracks and holes with hay and clay. When Ethelwald came he begged a calf's skin of the brethren who visited him, and made himself up in the corner where he and Cuthbert used to pray, to keep the wind and rain out. After a twelve years' sojourn at Farne Ethelwald died, and was buried at Lindisfarne about A.D. 699. Bishop Edfルド then reconstructed the oratory for the use of Feldgeld, the new abbot. Feldgeld made a relic of the calf's skin and believed it, from his own experience, to be gifted with miraculous powers. (Bed. H. E. r. 1; Vita S. Cuth. cap. xlv.)

There is a notice of Ethelwald in the Acta SS. for March, iii. 463. His day was March 23. His name occurs the first on the list of auntures in the Liber Vitae of the church of Durham (ed. Surtees Soc. p. 6).

[ F. E.]

ETHELWALD (4), an obscure writer, who addressed a letter and a small collection of poems to St. Aldhelm whilst the latter was abbot of Malmesbury. These compositions, which have been, with very little show of probability, attributed to Aldhelm king of Mercia, are printed among the works of St. Boniface. (Ed. Wurdtein, Epp. 149, 81 b; Mon. Mogn. ed. Jaifie, epp. 5, 6, pp. 35-48.) The writer of the letter describes himself as having been a pupil of Aldhelm during a summer fatally marked by civil wars, and as having been fostered by him from his infancy; he also compares himself to Beohboam, Aldhelm apparently being the Solomon from whose teaching he had degenerated, and asks him to continue his instructions. He describes the poems which he sends; one is in dactylic metre in seventy verses; the second and third are in octosyllabics, and the second is sent by their common client, Wynfrith. Of the poems subjoined the first mentions the travels of the writer in Domnonia and Cornubia; this makes it possible that he was the bearer of Aldhelm's letter to Gerontius. (Aldhlm.) All five poems are in octosyllabics; and although the name of Ethelwald occurs in one of them, it is questionable whether any of them very answers to the description in the letter. In Seren's MS. of Boniface, these poems are added to another letter, addressed by an anonymous person, to a sister, after Boniface had been made a bishop; with this letter the poems can have no connexion. Dr. Giles, however, followed Serenus.

[5.]

ETHELWALD (5) (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann. 732, 740, in M. H. B. 657 a, 659 b), abbat of Melrose, and bishop of Lindisfarne. (Ethelwold (2)).

[C. H.]

ETHELWALD (6) Moll, king of Northumbria, succeeded after the murder of Oswulf, July 24, 759. The accession of Ethelwald is dated Aug. 5, which seems to imply that a short interregnum must have occurred. (Sim. Dun. M. H. B. 663.) He may possibly be identified with the sirederman Moll, brother of abbot Forthred, who is mentioned in the letter of pope Paul I. to archbishop Egbert in 757 or 758 (Haddan and Stubbs, ill. 385). His surname may be a contraction for Muciul, i.e. Great; but this is very uncertain. In 761, he had to resist the attack of a competitor, Oswin, who fell in a great battle at Eldunam (Eldon Hills, near Melrose), or Edwinesluffe (Chr. S. p. 343), on Aug. 6. The next year Ethelwald married at Catterick a lady named Etheldritha. In 765, Ethelwald was deprived of his kingdom by his nephew, king Aelfthred at Winchenhealle (Sim. Dun. p. 963), and was succeeded by Alphred. Nothing seems to be known of his lineage, or his ultimate fate. He was father of Ethelred, who succeeded Alphred in 774. (See Lappongen, ed. Thorpe, i. 214, 215.) There are coins attributed to Ethelwald Moll, which bear on the obverse the head of archbishop Egbert, but the ascription is very uncertain. (Hawkins, English Silver Coins, ed. Kenyon, pp. 67, 68.)

ETHELWALWUS (Malm. G. R. A. l. § 76, ed. Hardy), king of the South Saxons. (Ethelwold.)

[C. H.]

ETHELWIN (OEdlwin). (1) A prefect or reeve of Osywy king of Bernicia, who at his master's command put to death Oswin of Deira in 651 (Bede, H. E. iii. 14).

[5.]

ETHELWIN (2) Second bishop of Lindsey (M. H. B. 624). He was an Englishman of noble race, brother of Ethelhun the companion of the presbyter Egbert and of Aldewin abbot of Partney, and of the abbess Ethelhild (Bede, H. E. iii. 11). Like his brother Ethelhun he studied in Ireland (H. E. iii. 27), and after his return, when in the year 679 the province of Lindsey had been reconquered by Mercia, he was appointed bishop in succession to Eadred, who retired to Ripon (H. E. iv. 12). As this was the first formal division of Mercia into dioceses, Ethelwin is by Florence of Worcester counted as properly the first bishop of Lindsey (M. H. B. 622; ed. Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 128-130). Of the duration of Ethelwin's episcopate we have no evidence. He was succeeded by bishop Eosgar before the year 716. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 716.)

[8.]

ETHELWOLD (1), second abbot of Evesham. (Chr. Aethelw., ed. Myn, p. 76.) He is said to have succeeded St. Egwin, but nothing is known about him. (Mon. Angl. ii. 1.)

[8.]

ETHELWOLD (2) (AEdlwulfaun), bishop of Lindisfarne, A.D. 724-740. There is some doubt as to the duration of his episcopate. The best authorities (Chronol. apud Bedan; Symeon, Chron. ed. Sertes Soc. p. 13) place his death in A.D. 740, and Symeon (Hist. Ecc. Duclm. i. 12) says that he was bishop sixteen years, which fixes his consecration in A.D. 724, the date generally received. But if this is correct, the see of Lindisfarne must have been vacant for three years after the death of Edfrith, a fact which it is not easy to account for.

Ethelwold was an officer or servant under Cuthbert, and was afterwards abbot of Melrose, a house which was most intimately connected with Lindisfarne. He ruled there when king Aelfthred visited the monastery to hear the visions of Drythelm (Bede, H. E. v. 12). The anonymous biographer of Cuthbert, who wrote between A.D. 698 and 705, mentions Ethelwold as abbot, and records a miracle wrought upon a cousin of his which he had no doubt described to the narrator. (Bed. Opp. Hist. Min. ii. 107, 108; Vita S. Cuth. cap. xxx.)
ETHELWULF

Before Ethelwulf became abbot, he caused to be made a beautiful cross of polished stone, which was probably designed by himself. His own name was carved on it, but he no doubt intended it to be a memorial of Cuthbert. The cross was one of the ornaments of Lindisfarne until the Danish invasion in A.D. 793, when the marauders broke off the head. This was afterwards fastened to the base and then thrown forward, wherever the Cuthbertines wandered the cross accompanied them, an object of great veneration to the Northumbrians, who were reminded of it by Cuthbert and Ethelwold. In the 12th century Symeon speaks of it as standing erect in the cemetery of the church of Durham. (Hist. Eccl. Dun. i. 12.) The cross was probably ornamented with that delicate interlacing work which was then at its highest point of excellence.

The taste of Ethelwold gave a cover to the famous Lindisfarne Gospels which were written by his predecessor Eadfrid. [EADFRID (2).] This was of gold, enamel, and jewels, and was brought by Bilfrid the anchorite, who was a cunning goldsmith. (Symeon, Hist. Eccl. Dun. ii. cap. xii; Lindisfarne Gospels, ed. Surtees Soc., ad finem.) An attempt has been recently made by the authorities of the British Museum to restore it. There seems to be no authority for crediting Ethelwold with the beautiful illuminations with which the MS. is adorned. The honour of these must belong to Eadfrid the scribe.

Among Aldhelm's letters there is one addressed to him by Ethelwold, but it is doubtful whether it can justly be ascribed to the bishop. (Ed. Giles, 100-2.) Dempster, in his History of Scotland (25, 13), attributes to Ethelwold a life of Cuthbert and a chronicle of the abbots of Melrose, but his statement is unsupported.

Ethelwold's remains accompanied the monks of Lindisfarne in their wanderings with those of Cuthbert, Eadfrid, &c., until they found a resting-place in Durham, where they were deposited in the shrine. (Symeon, Hist. Eccl. Dunelm. ii. 6, 7.) It is said in one place that Ethelwold died in the calendar, and his day is Feb. 12. There is an account of him in the Acta SS. for that month (ii. 604-6 and 897). [J. R.]

Ethelwold's episcopate fell in the early part of the Northumbrian troubles, which began after the death of king Aldfrid; he witnessed the great Northumbrian struggle in 731, which probably shook the fabric of church and kingdom, when Ceolwulf was deposed and restored, and Aethelred had to fly from his see at Hexham. He lived through the first seven or eight years of the archiepiscopate of Egbert, under whom the pall was restored to York, and the Northumbrian schools began their career of brilliance and usefulness.

[8]

ETHELWULF (1) (AETHELWULF), the sixth bishop of Elmham. (M. H. B. 618.) He was present at the council of Brentford in 781 (Kemble, C.D. 143; Hadden and Stubbs, iii. 439). In 787 a place was made for Ethelwold in the legatine synods of 787. [8]

ETHELWULF (2), the author of a poetical history dedicated to Egbert bishop of Lindisfarne (803-821), which is printed by Mabillon in the Acta SS. O. S. B. saec. iv. part 2, pp. 317-335, MSS. of which are found in the Bodleian, Cottonian, and Cambridge libraries. (Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 509-511.) The poem contains the history of a monastery and the lives of its abbeys. A certain ealdorman named Eammand takes refuge from the persecution of King Northumbria (703-716) in a monastery dedicated to St. Peter. From a bishop, Egridr (Eadfrith of Lindisfarne, 689-721), he obtains instruction, and a learned priest to instruct his little company, and from Egbert, a bishop of the Scots, he receives rules of monastic life. Among others whose holy lives have shed honour on the place is Ulltan a Scottish priest, Frigedil, and Cunin the smith. Eammand on his death is succeeded by Eororp, and Eororp by his brother Aldfrid. The fourth abbot is Sigebald, who greatly increased the beauty of the monastery, and who at his death is succeeded by his brother Sigwin. During Sigwin's episcopate the monastery flourished. Sigwin's successor was Wulfisig, under whom the writer was brought up. Of all these the only persons otherwise known are Sigebald, who is probably identical with the abbot Sibwald, whose death is noticed by Symeon of Durham under the year 771, and Higlac the reader. It is very difficult to understand how these facts can be reconciled with the history of any monastery at Lindisfarne, to which they are, according to the MSS., applied. Mabillon points out that the history of the foundation, the date and institution of the monastic rule, the differences in the list of abbots, the fact that the monastery of the poem was situated in a town, and the account of the situation of the church are quite inconsistent with such a theory. Yet the connexion with Lindisfarne and the memory of St. Cuthbert was very close. Mabillon conjectures that Eammand had founded a monastery on the mainland, to which he may have given the name of Lindisfarne, as the new Corby was called after the old Corvei. No explanation seems to be to be found in 816 since the days of Mabillon. The names of Sigwin, Ulltan, Eammand, and Wulfisig are in the Liber Vitas Eclesiae Dunelmensis. [8]

ETHELWULF (3) (AETHELWULF), the tenth bishop of Sebye. (M. H. B. 618.) He first appears as taking part with archbishop Wulfred and bishop Deneberht of Worcester in a council at London, in which king Kenulf sold certain lands to the archbishop, Aug. 1, 811. (Kemble, C. D. 196; Hadden and Stubbs, iii. 571.) His name is also attached, with the interpolated description 'East Anglorum' episcopus, to the Winchelcomb charter of the same year. (Kemble, C. D. 197; Hadden and Stubbs, iii. 574.) As 'Aethelwulfs Selesegae episcopus' he attended the Council of Clovesho in 816 (Hadden and Stubbs, iii. 579); after which no more is heard of him; but his successor Cenred was bishop in 824.

ETHEMBRIA. [CETHUBERIS.]

ETHERIANUS. [FIDELIS.]

ETHERIUS (1), (EUTHIRIUS, EUCHERIUS), fourth bishop of Antibes, following Agnellus, and succeeded by Eusebius. He was present at the second council of Orange in 509, and at the fourth council of Orleans in 541, subscribing his name Eucherius at one and Eutocius at the other. The Bollandists (Acta SS. Jan. ii. 390) give from old MSS. a narrative of the acts of the Spanish martyrs Vincentius, Orontius, and Victor, the writer of which (c. 4) speaks of himself as the successor of Aethierius, Anticiacae Ecclesiae Antistes." This Anticiacae has been supposed to be Antibes, and the writer to have been Eusebius the successor of Eutocius. (Gall. Christ. iii. 1148; Ceillier, Hist. des Ant. Soc. xi. 308; Labbe, Conc. v. 814, 1371.) [S. A. B.]

EUTERIUS (2) (Aethierius, Eutherius, Hetherius), sixteenth bishop of Chartres, succeeding St. Aventinus, and followed by St. Leobinus, was one of the subscribers of the second, third, and fourth councils of Orleans, held in A.D. 533, 538, and 541 respectively. His name occurs several times in the life of his successor by Venantius Fortunatus, but in no important connexion. He is said to have built a church about three miles from Chartres, and dedicated it to St. Prisces, whose relics he placed there. (Gall. Christ. viii. 1059; Venant. Fort. Vita S. Leobini, 8, 13, 14 in Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 553, 554; Labbe, Conc. v. 929, 1282, 1371.) [S. A. B.]

EUTERIUS (3) (Aethierius), ST., seventeenth bishop of Auzerre, following St. Romanus, and succeeded by St. Aunacharius. He is said to have held the see nine years and six months, and to have been buried in the church of St. Germans. He flourished probably about A.D. 577. Ursard, in his Martyrologium, under the 27th July, has "Antiniodoro, deposito Eutierii episcopi." (Patr. Lat. exxiv. 301; Gall. Christ. xii. 267; Boll. Acta SS. Jul. vi. 446.) [S. A. B.]

EUTERIUS (4) (Aethierius), thirty-first sovereign of the see of Lyons, following St. Prisca. In a Life of St. Austregisilus (given in Boll. Acta SS. 20 Maii, v. 230* & there stated to be by a contemporary author) it is said that at the court of King Guintran, distinguished among the other senators was one Aethierius, a man of the highest wisdom and endowed with unusual cauntion, to whom the king confided beyond any other the secrets of his policy. He was worthy at that time of a bishopric, and afterwards was made bishop of Lyons, the most famous state of Gaul. St. Austregisilus, whom he loved exceedingly, was ordained by him priest and abbat. In or about 589 Eutierius, with other bishops, subscribed the rescript to the letter of Gundegeolus on the subject of the payment of the authors of the disturbances at Poitiers. (CRODELDUR.) In 584, he was summoned by Guintran to Nanterre to be present at the baptism of that king's nephew Clotaire II. He died in A.D. 602, and was succeeded by Secundinus. Gregory of Tours relates of him that he made for St. Nicetius a little bed, which after the saint's death worked many miracles in the cure of diseases.

Three letters to him from Gregory the Great are extant; the first addressed to him jointly with several other Gallic bishops, being directed against simoniacal practices, the ordination of laymen to high places in the church, some of whom, Gregory states, did not adopt the tonsure till a see was vacant, against the practice of women other than those permitted by the canons dwelling with the clergy, and the neglect of the yearly synods; the second being addressed to Eutierius alone, again insisting on the holding of synods, and commending to his care the monks whom he was sending to St. Augustine in Britain; the third as to his acquiescence in the incapacitation of a bishop for his duties by disease or failing faculties. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. lib. ix. c. 41, lib. x. c. 28; Fredegar, Chron. c. 52, Greg. Tur. Vit. Pat. viii. 5, 8; Greg. Mag. Epist. lib. ix. ep. 106, lib. xi. ep. 56, lib. xiii. ep. 5 in Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 1028, 1173, 1258; Gall. Christ. iv. 58.) [S. A. B.]

EUTERIUS (5), according to Bede (H. E. i. 24, 26), bishop of Arles, who consecrated Augustine bishop of Canterbury. But the Eutherius of that date was bishop of Lyons (see the preceding article), and the bishop of Arles was Virgilius.

C. H.

EUTERIUS (6), bishop of Basii (Baza), one of the fifteen suffragan bishops of the see of Cartagena, summoned to the synod at Toledo, A.D. 610. (GUTHINIAN.) He signs eleventh on the list (Mansi, x. 507 b; Esp. Sagra. vii. 86; Aguirre, iii. 322). [ETYCHIANUS (4)]. [M. A. W.]

EUTERIUS (7), bishop of Basti, signs the acts of the eleventh council of Toledo (A.D. 675), at which only bishops of the province of Cartagena were present (Mansi, xi. 147 a; Esp. Sagra. vii. 88; Aguirre-Catalana, iv. 247). [ETYCHIANUS (4)]. [M. A. W.]

EUTERIUS (8), bishop of Elberi from about A.D. 630 to about 646. His signature appears among those of C. Tol. iv. 633, and his vicar signs for him in the seventh council, 646. Losayn and Aguirre are wrong on this point (Esp. Sagra. xii. 156; Aguirre-Catalana, iii. 385, 423). [FLAVIANUS (1)]. [M. A. W.]

EUTERIUS (9), titular bishop of Osmo towards the end of the 8th century. He is known as having, together with Beatus, published a defence of orthodoxy against the Adoptionist heresy of Elipandus and Felix. (ADOPTIONISTS.) Osmo was at the time under Saracen rule, and as we find Eutierius writing, jointly with Beatus, from Asturias, and speaking of himself as "Osmonis sedis dignissimae nominatis episcopus," or, according to another reading, nuncupatus, the inference seems to be that he was titular bishop only. To him were dedicated the commentaries on the Apocalypse ascribed to Beatus. The friendship between Beatus and Eutierius seems to have been a very close one. Elipandus speaks affectionately of him, as well as of the youth of Eutierius, in his letter to the abbat Fidelis A.D. 785. [ELIPANDUS.] The dates of his birth, consecration, and death are alike unfixed, but we may put his consecration probably about A.D. 780, and his death in the early years of the 9th century (Esp. Sagra. vii. 282, viii. 253, Nic. Antonio, Biblioth. Latina, 1058, 35; Migne, Patr. Lat. xviii.). [M. A. W.]

EUTERIUS (10), according to Anastasius (Eh.Pontif. pp. 318, 319), chaplain and notary of Charlemagne at Rome in 774, drew up the ETHERNAN (1) (EDRAN, IPHRANAN), bishop and confessor, commemorated Dec. 2. This holy bishop lived in the 6th century, and is often confounded with the Ernanus, uncle and nephew of St. Columba, as the names may be used interchangeably, but he is different from both. From his legend as given in the Brev. Aberd. (Prop. SS. p. hymn, ff. vi. vii.), we learn that, born of noble parents, and early devoted to religion, he went to Ireland in pursuit of learning and was made a bishop. When he returned to Scotland he brought with him some learned men, presbyters and clerics, with whom he traversed the country, labouring indefatigably for the salvation of souls, teaching, baptizing, confirming, visiting the sick, and consecrating churches. His cell was in the parish of Rathen, Aberdeenshire, where the church was dedicated to him. That cell is still known by his cell in the supposed to have been still called “Edran’s slack.” He had also a dedication in the priory of the Isle of May, and the church of Madderty, Perthshire, was St. Iphranan or Ethernan’s. His feast in the Aberdeen calendar is Dec. 2, but King, Camerarius, and Dempster place him on Dec. 31 or 22, mistaking him for others. Various attempts at identification have been made, but there appears no distinct record of him in the Irish Annals, unless he be the Starnan or Tarman (read by Skene Itharnan), in Ann. Utt. A.D. 688, and Ann. Tig. 689, who died among the Picts. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 333-4; View Duran. A.D. 133-44; V. Disp. Hist. Eccles. Gent. Scott. i. 251; Camerarius, De Scot. Fort. 203; Old Stat. Soc. Scot. vi. 15; Rec. Pr. Isle of May, pp. xv-xvi. 19; Ogilvie, Christ. in Buchan, 15, 17, 34-5; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 168.)

J. G.

ETHERNAN (2). Dempster has a St. Ether nanus, nephew of St. Columba, and “monasterii Divinii Bursis, ut vacant, praepositus,” who wrote Gesta Columbae auream.” Commemorated Dec. 22. This St. Ethernanus is not to be confounded with Ethernan of Rathen; there seems little doubt but he is identical with Ethernaise, venerated on Dec. 22 at Clane, co. Kildare. He is associated in the calendars with St. Ultan Tua, and the two are said to have been brothers of St. Maighbearn (Dec. 18), of Kilmainham, and thus belonged to the Ordels on the side of their father Aedh, and to the Dalcorrains on the side of their mother Sinell. St. Ethernanus must have flourished in the beginning of the 7th century; Skene (Celt. Scot. ii. 311) suggests the day of the end of the ninth. In the Brevary and Martyrology of Aberdeen he is called a bishop; his dedication in Scotland was at Lathrisk, now Kettle, Fife, which probably had its name of Leathress, or Lathrisk, corrupted from Llu-Ethernan. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 334 et al.; Journ. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Asoc. Ir. & ser. iii. 281-2; O’Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 199, 431.)

J. G.

ETHI (Cod. Theod. XVI. v. 8), followers of Aetius. [AETIUS, Vol. I. 51.] [T. W. D.]

ETHICOPROSOPTAE (Ἡθικοπροσωπώ ντα), literally “offenders (προσωπούντες) in matters of ethics,” is the title under which St. John of Damascus (De Haeresibus Liber, § 96) describes the holders of certain erroneous opinions, who had come into notice before the age of Heraclius (610-642). They are spoken of as “erring in ethical, that is to say, in practical virtue; gallanising some precepts of it which are praiseworthy, and following as good other precepts which are to be blamed.” The expression, ἐν τῇ ἴστη ἰδίας ἐπικρατεῖν, is somewhat difficult, since Damascenus elsewhere makes ἐν τῇ πραξείν τα δικαία not an explanatory equivalent of ἰδίας ἐπικρατεῖν, as he appears to do here, but as the whole, of which the ethicus is one of three parts, the economical and political being the other two (Dialectica, c. iii.). In any case it is plain that the reference in the name Ethicoprosopetae is not to any erroneous tenets of theology, but to upholding morality in the conduct of life, and the description given is too vague and general to admit of our applying it to any particular sect or persons.

J. H. L.

ETHILAU, bishop of Edessa. [ETHIUS (2).]

ETHILBALD (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann. 732 M. H. B. 687 p, 686 c; ann. 750, ii. 662c), king of Mercia. [ETHILBALD (1).]

ETHILMU, sixth bishop of Vaison, succeeding Fonteius and followed by Gemellus, is said to have sat at a synod at Orange in 501, not to be found, however, in Labbe. One of the subscribers of the first council of Orleans in A.D. 511 was “Ethillus episcopus ecclesiae Venetiæ,” whom some have thought without sufficient reason to be identical with Ethilius of Vaison. (Gall. Christ. i. 922; Labbe, Conc. v. 548.)

S. A. B.

ETHIMOTHUS, sixth bishop of Syracuse, early in the 2nd century. His predecessor was Euplius, his successor Venatus. (Pirri, Sicil. Sacra, i. 600.)

R. S. G.

ETHIOPIAN CHURCH. The designation “Ethiopia” (Ἀθηνία, Ἡ Ἑλλάσ of Herod. iii. 114, and also of Strabo and Pliny; the LXX translation of the Curt of the Hebrews, Esth. xxxix. 10; Amos ix. 7; Ps. lviii. 31) is a geographical expression of great indefiniteness, and must be distinguished from the civilised “Aethiopia” limited to the province or kingdom of the island of Meroe (ἡ Ἑλλάσ ἡτρ Αἰγύπτου of Herod. ii. 146), of which we find memorials in the Greek writers and in the Coptic, not in the monumental records of Egypt. According to Pliny, Ἡ Ἑλλάσ consisted of forty-five kingdoms, of which Meroe was the chief. The term is used very vaguely to denote the whole of Africa south of Libya (Herod. iv. 197), and also... is confounded with India, and appears to denote occasionally large portions of Arabia. Jerome regards Arabia Felix as the home of the Ethiopian chamberlain (Cat. Script. Eccl. i. 265); and the account of the foundation of the church in Ethiopia is undoubtedly described in Socrates (i. 15) and Sozomen (ii. 24) as the conversion of the Indians. Thus Hen. Valesius, commenting on Sozomen, ii. 24, says: "Fantauze autem Frumentium dictum verbum Dei praedicavisse, sed nullos ibi reliquisse episcopos." Baronius supposes that there were two Frumentii; one for the Indies, and one for Ethiopia.

It is not necessary here to attempt to penetrate the ancient history of Ethiopia, even where it crosses the Biblical history. The Shishak of Scripture and of the monuments conquered Ethiopia—i.e. the seat of Ethiopian power in Meroë; but his successor was killed by the Ethiopians. Shortly afterwards Zerah not only subdued Egypt, but menace Asa, king of Judah (2 Chron. xiv. 9), who nevertheless overthrew and scattered his vast host (B.C. 941). There is grave difficulty in identifying the kings with any personage, either of Ethiopia or Egypt, though attempts have been made to identify him with Oserkon I, the son and successor of Shishak. The Ebed-melech mentioned by Jeremiah (xxxviii. xix.) was in ready sympathy with the prophet and his career. This fact indicates the prevalence of pro- or other sympathies to the Jewish faith among those who bore the designation of Cush. The boundaries of the African Ethiopians are necessarily indefinite. If they were, as seems probable, the ancestors of the Shangilals, Bishiries, and Nubians, their positions may be loosely stated as having to the north the African highlands; to the west, the Libyan desert; to the north, Egypt and Armenia; and to the east, the Indian Ocean and the Red Sea (Dict. Geog. art. "Aethiopia"). But Abyssinia itself is the principal portion of these lands which went under the name of Ethiopia, and may, according to Hofmann (Herzog's Noms. art. Ethiopia) be divided into three parts: (1) the north-east highlands, including Axum; and the whole district of the Tigré; (2) the south-west highlands, Amhara, Shon, and Gondar, including the capital city; (3) the surrounding lowlands. The aim of the present article is to deal with the religious condition and ecclesiastical relations of that portion of the Ethiopian peoples which, after the decline of the kingdom of Meroë, recognised the supremacy and submitted to the authority of the emperor of Abyssinia. The extraordinary development of the power of Abyssin or Abyssinia is rather the transference of the hegemony or supremacy to what was once a dependent province. Even after the transfer, Nubia must not be altogether shut out from the political and ecclesiastical relations of Ethiopia. The chief seat of the empire was at Axum (cf. Dict. Geog. Adiäboes, Axœmos, Ptol. iv. 7), the modern Axum. This city was extensive, and its power was considerable, in the commencement of the second century of our era.

The identity of the Ethiopic or Geez language with the Amharic, or the Homerite, makes it probable that we have here an ancient branch of the Arabic race. Here Gesenius (Erzäch und Gritzker, art. "Abessinische Kirche") and Adelung are opposed; but Ludolf strongly emphasises the dialectical and tribal identification of the Habes- sini and Homerites: "The land of Ethiopia is a connected and concentric speculation that the city Axum and Tigré generally were colonised from Arabia, and even leading to the belief that Egyptian civilisation descended in early times from the sources of the Nile. It should be observed that, while one-third of the roots of the Ethiopic tongue are found in the Arabic, and there are numerous Syro-Arabian peculiarities and many Greek roots, no trace of Coptic can be found. The ancient Ethiopic language has now passed away from living use, and the Amharic variety has taken its place (Gessenius).

There is a valuable tradition that the Abyssinian Ethiopians became proselytes to Judaism under the influence of the queen of Sheba, who visited Solomon, and on her return to her own land introduced the rites and customs resembling those of the Hebrews, which no one disputes to have prevailed in the past, and even to prevail at the present day in Abyssinia. The name of the queen is said to be Rehabeam, and her son by Solomon is said to have been called Menilehec and Ebn-el-Haqim. The title here given to the king is Araemic in form, and may easily be referred to his reputed royal birth, "Son of the wise man, or Solomon." Such a prince may have lived, but his prominence in the midst of legendary names is itself confused. The catalogues of kings are reckoned differently, some giving twenty and some twenty-four names between Menilehec and Basenus, in the eighth year of whose reign we are told in Ethiopian history that our Lord was born. Customs analogous to the Hebrew rites did prevail, and were still capable of recognition, in the 18th and 17th centuries, as may be seen at large in the Historia Ethipica, by Telleseus (Father Tellez), and Hist. Ethiopica of Job Ludolf (lib. ii. c. 4 and lib. iii. c. 1). Among these customs were circumcision, the observance of the Sabbath, the distinction of clean and unclean food, the levirate law. There are many ways in which the people of Abyssinia observe these customs without resorting to the mythical proselytism of an Ethiopian queen. The Egyptians practised circumcision. Phoenicians, Colchians, and other nations borrowed it from them. The Arabians practise it still, but do not profess to have derived it from the Jews. It is not a religious rite with the Mussulman, nor is it referred to in the Koran. The confessio fidei of king Claudius, who reigned in Abyssinia 1541–1559 (Ludolf, v. ii. 6, 18, and Commentarium, xxvii. xxviii.), is a rather late authority, but it counts for something. He said: "We do not circumcise as the Jews (giving Christian reasons and quotations from St. Paul on the subject), but like as incisions on the face are made in Ethiopia and Nubia, perforations of the ear in India, so that which we do is not in observance of the laws of Moses, but is a human and national custom." The same argument was used by him with reference to abstinence from swine-flesh and other unclean meats. Doubtless abstinence from blood and things strangled obtained far beyond the limits of Judaism. The observance of the Sabbath may be accounted for on other grounds than on that of the general prevalence of Jewish ceremonial before the introduction of Christianity. The form of Christianity which prevailed was of the primitive and ante-Nicene type. There is no doubt that in the earliest form of the Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 33 and vii. 24) we find reference to an early Christian observance of the seventh day as well as the first. The Ethiopian king Claudius in his confession of faith discriminated between the two, as a manner which led us to infer that both days have been regarded with reverence by the first preachers of the gospel to this people, and that the Sabbath observance was due to Christian rather than Jewish influences. The custom has prevailed in the Ethiopian church to the present day. We have not only the effort made in the 15th and 16th centuries to disprove the Jewish charge of Judaism, but the repeated testimony of modern travellers and missionaries (Isenberg and Krafft, Journals; Major Harris, Highlands of Ethiopia, ii. 177, iii. 144).

Hofmann (Herzog's Enzy.) appears to reckon the peculiarity as akin to the extraordinary love shown to the observance of a number of special days. There prevails among them another custom, which has been held to prove a wide diffusion of Jewish ideas, viz. the marriage of the childless widow of a deceased brother under what has been termed the levirate law. Alvarez used this as an argument. Ludolf urged that the Ethiopians and Jews show some tribal or religious associations which cannot be disposed of with a sneer. It would be more to the purpose to observe that some law of the kind import prevailed in many oriental nations, as, e.g., the Mosbites (Ruth i. 11–13), the Persians (Zendav. iii. 228, quoted by Lehrer, arms. i. 349), the Egyptians, and certain Arabian tribes will endure great sacrifices with a view of preserving in this way the name of a family. Hence the custom prevalent among the Ethiopians which resembled the Mosaic law (Deut. xxi. 5–10; vide treatise of the Mishna called Jeb moth) may simply indicate a common practice of the custom among both peoples without giving a warrant to the charges brought by the Jesuits.

The interesting narrative in Acts xvi. 24 of the conversion by Philip the Evangelist of an Ethiopian, alike a Jewish proselyte, and a chamberlain of Candace, queen of Ethiopia, is naturally the starting-place of Ethiopian legend as to the origin of Christianity, and is a still further confirmation of the suspicion that Jewish ideas, Scriptures, and observances were already familiarly known to some branch or division of this great family. The Codex Aethiopicus to which Ludolf continually refers contains the simple narrative of the conversion, but adds no further details. Zaganazabo in his "Confession of faith," as given by Ludolf, states the bare fact and knows nothing more of the subsequent history of Christianity. It should, moreover, be observed that in the lists of Abyssinian princes, from the time of Ezana to the date of the undoubted introduction of Christianity into Ethiopia, there is no mention of any queen Candace or of any female ruler at all. On the other hand, Candace was the royal title of the queens who ruled for some centuries over the kingdom of Meroë. From the days of Alexander to the Roman general Petronius, and from Petronius to the time of Ezana (B.C. 350), this name, title, and honour had prevailed. Pliny (lib. vi. 29) said: "Regnasse quodam foeminae Candacensi atque id nomen multis annis ad reginas transisse" (cf. Strabo, vii. p. 820). Eusebius does not hesitate to say that this Ethiopian convert was the first preacher of the gospel to his own people, and gives him the name of Indian. It is doubtful whether the Ethiopia referred to was on the eastern or western side of the Red Sea, but most probably on the latter, and thus in the earliest times of Christianity it is not impossible that the idea of Meroë at least may have received the tides of the way of life, that other Jewish proselytes may have imported the observance for use in Abyssinia as well as willing to receive the Christian interpretation of the ancient oracles as was the Ethiopian eunuch. Ecclesiastical writers referred the first offer of the Gospel to the apostles themselves; thus Jerome (Cat. Script. i. 262) said St. Andrew; Rufinus (Hist. Eccl. iv. 9) and Socrates (i. 19) made Sts. Mary and Agnes; Theodoret (Hom. 31) St. Thomas as the first preacher of the Gospel to the Ethiopians. This great diversity is probably due to the cause already adverted to, viz. the extreme indefiniteness of the term Ethiopia, and the confusion of India and Arabia with it.

Whether the gospel had been introduced by apostolic or sub-apostolic hands among any of the subordinate kingdoms of (Abyssinia) Ethiopia or not, it is tolerably clear that no authentic proof of the existence of any Christian ideas, worship, or organisation can be traced to an earlier period than to the visit of the Tyrian youths Frumentius and Aelesius, about the year A.D. 358. The basic story is a marvellous and curious one. Rufinus has preserved (Hist. Eccl. i. 9), having personally gathered the facts from one of the two brothers. The narrative is repeated by Socrates (i. 15), Sozomen. (ii. 24), Theodoret (i. 22), cf. Baronius. Ann. 327–8, and Ludolf, H. Eth., and is to the following purport. Between India exterior and Parthia lies India interior, inhabited by numerous and various tribes and nations untouched by any apostolic influence or preaching. This India is thus discriminated from Ethiopia, which Rufinus says had been entrusted by lot to St. Matthew. A philosopher, Metrodorus by name, of whom some mention is made in the Chronicles of Jerome, penetrated "ulterior India," being surnamed by the love of travel. Meropius (also Rufinus), a Tyrian philosopher (and it is supposed by some that he was the same as the above), imitated his example, and sought to enter India, taking with him two youths, his relatives (according to some accounts these youths were his sons), whom he instructed in the liberal arts. The name of the younger was Aelesius, and that of the elder Frumentius. The vessel in which Meropius and the lads were travelling touched at a port to obtain food or water. The barbarians, who had just thrown off their alliance with the Romans, were ready to put to the sword all and sundry who claimed affinity with
ETHIOPIAN CHURCH

there, if they fell into their power. It was the case on this occasion: the whole ship's crew with the philosopher, were murdered, but the barbarians took compassion on the youths, who were found meditating and reading under the shadow of a tree. They were brought to the king of the barbarians, and secured at once his interest, confidence, and love. This king, if we identify the narrative with the Ethiopian version of the story, must have been the father of the Abreha and Atzabea of the Ethiopian annals.
He made Aedesius his cupbearer and Frumentius the keeper of his rolls (scrinia) and his finances or business affairs (rationes suas). Sozomen describes him as his treasurer. Rufinus says that on his approaching death he left his wife regent, and gave full liberty to the Tyrian youths to take their own course. The widowed queen besought the youths to remain at her court until her infant son (?) some should become of age.
She earnestly entreated them, especially Frumentius, whose mental faculties and knowledge of affairs were renowned, to assist her in the management of the kingdom. They consented to remain, and Frumentius was led by some divine impulse (Deo mentem et animos ejus instigante) to make diligent inquiry whether there were any Christians among the Roman merchants who visited or resided in the land, and in the churches of Tyre, and to adopt the houses of prayer, and to adopt all necessary and opportune methods, so that there the Christian seed might spring up among them.
When the young man reached man's estate, Frumentius and Aedesius, notwithstanding many eventfuls on the part of the queen and her son to remain, returned to their own country. Adesius proceed to Tyre to revisit his friends and relatives. He was shortly afterwards made a presbyter of the church in Tyre, and from his liis, not from common report, Rufinus tells us that he received the above narrative. Meanwhile Frumentius, thinking it was not just to con-ver from his work at this time, went to A-ndia. He arrived in Alexandria and laid the whole matter before the bishop Anthanasius, who had recently been appointed, urging him to send a bishop to the Christians who had been gathered together, and the churches that had been formed in that barbarous locality. Anthanasius having given much consideration to the recital of Frumen-tius, and in a council (concilium sacerdotum)
"What other man shall we find such as thou art, in whom is the spirit of God, as He is in thee, who will be able to discharge these duties?"
He was at once ordained and ordered to return to the place from which he had come.
When he arrived at the court of the emperor, apoestic signs accompanied his ministry, and an infinite number of the barbarians were converted to the faith."

Frumentius, or Frumentatos, received the title of Abbuna, or Abba Salama, father of peace, and by that name he is chiefly known in the Ethiopicannals. The bishopric of Auzzume assumed a metropolitan character, and was always renewed at the instigation of the king, by the patriarch of the Coptic church. The title of "Abba Salama" is borne by this dignitary to the present day.

The Ethiopic annals, the Ethiopic liturgy, and the Ethiopic poetry from which Ludolf perpetually quotes, confirm this narrative of Rufinus, and thus increase our knowledge.

We learn, e.g., that there were thirteen kings between Bazenus and the two kings under whose name fromontos (Frumentius) and Sidracus (Aedesius), or Abba Salama, as the former was afterwards called, diffused the knowledge of the gospel. The names of those two kings were Abreha and Atzabea. The Ethiopic poet praises these kings "for their brotherly love, and because they obeyed the laws of Moses, diffused the gospel of Christ, and built a house to his praise" (Ludolf, L. c. ii. c. 4). In the Ethiopic liturgy Ludolf found the following encomium on the same kings:
"With joyful voice I hail them, extolling and exalting Salama, door of pity and mercy, who caused the glory of Christ to shine in Ethiopia, where before all was dark, murky night."
Elsewhere, Abba Salama is described under the image of the "Light-bringer." This appears somewhat inconsistent with the statement of the Codex Auctorissimus, to the effect that the Tyrian women, in their husband's absence, disguised themselves with the sign of the cross, when they had never received the gospel from an apostle.
Ludolf advances a number of subjective reasons and argumenta e silentio which appear to him conclusive that Christianity could never have been diffused prior to Frumentius. The silence of the Ethiopic Church to the patriarchal bishops, presbyters, or baptism, and of the church historians of earlier times as to the diffusion of the gospel in this remote neighbourhood, weigh strongly with him; also the absence of any record of conflict, persecution, or martyrdom. These considerations deserve weight, but they are not conclusive. Many inhabitants and half-developed forms of Christianity diffused themselves widely in the East, without leading to conversion, to the formation of churches or the creation of literature. And, moreover, the representation which Frumentius gave of the success of his own labours implies that there were Christians who were converts of prayer, and churches in existence before he was entrusted with the episcopate. It is not impossible that Christian merchants, that Ethiopian proselytes, that wandering Jews converted to the faith of Christ had the way for Frumentius. A discussion was raised by Hen. Valesius, Commenting on Socrates (H. E. i. 15), he disputed the consecration of Frumentius to the episco-pate of Auzzume by Anthanasius, on the ground that Anthanasius was made archbishop of Alexandria, A.D. 326. Further, that Meropius is said to have imitated the example of Metro-dorus in his Oriental travel. Now Metrodorus did not return from his travel till 328, when he brought Indian treasures to Constantinople. This, says he, could not have occurred until Constantine had been victorious over Licinius. If the journey of Meropius had not commenced until that year, then it is in the highest degree improbable that Frumentius could have passed through the several stages of his career, or become in age or character fitted for the office until 340, or still later. There are many ways of avoiding this apparent conclusion. Metrodorus may have paid two visits to the East. Meropius need not have waited for his return before being smitten with the love of travel, or again Metrodorus may have returned from his wanderings long before he presented his trophies to Constantine. The explicit statement of Rufinus that Athanasius had been recently (supper) appointed to his high office, or reueri, as Socrates phrases it, is rather too strong to be overthrown on a conjectural argument. Besides, the authentic proof that Constantius wrote to the prince of Ethiopia to ask him to replace Frumentius by Theophilus, a second Arian patriarch of Alexandria, shows that the appointment of Frumentius must have taken place before 337, when Constantius came to the throne of the East. This letter, which is preserved in "Apology of Athanasius, addressed to the emperor Constantius" (Athenagoras, Historic Tracts, Book I. N. pp. 182, 183; Athan. Opp. ed. Ben. I. i. p. 158), assured the princes, "Azaanes and Sazaanes" (either the Greekized form of Abreha and Atzbeha or else the Christian names adopted by the sons of the late king) that Athanasius was "guilty of ten thousand crimes," that the canonical appointment of Frumentius as the successor ought to be tried, and that he must be examined on these matters and instructed by the "most venerable George." Constantius confessed, moreover, his alarm lest Athanasius might himself find his way to Auzume and corrupt the people with his accursed and impious doctrines. The advice and threats of Constantius appear to have produced no effect at Auzume, for Athanasius never crossed the Red Sea among them (cf. Le Quien, Orient Christ. ii. 644).

This bright flash of light reveals the presence of churches, Christians, dogmatic beliefs, and the commencement of hierarchical order; moreover, it confirms the truth of the traditional and vague utterances of the Ethiopic annals and poets. But the dark image is only one of the history, and we are led to grope our way onward by the register of a few names and facts, by the occurrence of certain peculiarities in the subsequent constitution of the church, by the deference paid in the Ethiopic church to extra-canonical Scriptures and ancient canons of church order, by some confusing traditions with reference to a lady of Christian name, a moving into the latter centuries, and by the unquestionable adhesion of the Ethiopian church of later days to the Monophysite (Jacobe) church of Alexandria and Egypt. Each of these sources of information may be briefly touched upon.

The names of the following bishops of Auzume are gathered from the Ethiopic calendar* by Gams, Series Episcoporum, viz.: Frumentius, Theophilus (Arian Missionary to the Homeriotes), Alexander, Bartholomaeus, Joannes, Jacobus (cf. Le Quien, 642-660).

The two great names of Abreha and Atzbeha are praised by the Ethiopic poet (Ecc. 4, Ludolf, I. c. li. c. 4) for their brotherly love. They are commended for obeying the laws of Moses, as well as diffusing the gospel of Christ and building a house to his praise. The annals of the Ethiopian poet mention as reigning subsequently to these brothers three contemporaneous kings, whose names were Atzfa, Atzfed, and Amey, who are said to have ruled by turns most harmoniously, but in what way we can only conjecture. To them succeeded Arad, Aladota, Alamid, the latter called elsewhere Amiadi, son of Sulodoba (cf. Ludolf, ii. ii. c.) is the reign of Amiadiam or Alamid, we are told that many monks came from Rome and filled the kingdom with the renown of their virtues. Mendesius says this event must have occurred between 460 and 480. If so, it must have been coincident with another event of immense importance. It is the year of the emperor Constantine, the schism in the church of Egypt, which followed upon the council of Chalcedon. In the first ardours of that conflict these monks arrived. They were probably called "Roman," in the sense in which all Greeks were called Roman at that time from being submitted to the Eastern Roman empire ruling from the throne of Constantinople. Several of these great saints are enumerated—(1) Aragawi, (2) Pantaleon, (3) Gavima, (4) Alef, (5) Saham, (6) Af, (7) Likanos, (8) Adumata. With the exception of Pantaleon, all these names are Ethiopic, and are the translation of the Greek appellatives of these worthies. Thus Likanos is the Greek name of Michael. It may be borne in mind that the archangel Michael is the patron of the Ethiopian church and kingdom, and to him is consecrated the twelfth day of every month in the calendar (Ludolf, Comm. cf. Harris, i. c.). The poet sings about him that his life was wise, and his death prudent; that the Trinity was with him, and he destroyed the kingdom of the serpent (arwe), probably some form of heathen serpent worship, which prevailed up to his date. The poet tells us that temples were erected, and churches dedicated to the memory of Pantaleon. This great saint is credited with raising the dead and causing the widow and orphan to sing for joy. In the song of the Ethiopic poet concerning Likanos, all the nine saints are mentioned as making a crown for his brow. When Likanos prayed, the fingers of his upturned hands burned like lamps of fire, and when he held a staff, his hands were seen to be perforated. Is this an anticipation of the legend of the stigmata of St. Francis of Assisi? The Ethiopian poet, Greek and Latin, going into the latter centuries, and the martyrs of the Ethiopian church, wrought astounding miracles—walked on the sea, moved mountains, drew water from the rock, and raised the dead. Latatzaans lives on leaves and herbs, and that so sparingly that his body became light as air (Ecc. xvii). Gabra-Monies clothed himself in the leaves of trees, and the Ethiopian poets record the fabulous history of twenty or thirty workers of the most astounding miracles, who not only raised men but even animals from death; and of one saint who restored the same person three times from death to this miserable life. Special ascriptions of praise are made to Eustathius, Jacobus, Horus, Marthanos, Biones, and the Jesuits who subsequently sought to convert the Ethiopian church to the communion of Rome, made no account of the astounding miracles wrought or the extreme asceticism practised by the Ethiopian monks. They did not repudiate the thinny evidence on which they are based, but discounted it being any proof of the Divine approval of their communion because they were separated from the true church. Nevertheless, the eremitic life is traced back to the great Anthony, who in time of persecution devoted himself to the life of abstinence and prayer. [Antony.] The well-known Macr ius, well-known on the tradition of self-mortifica tion. Pachomius was his successor, and Aragasi, one of the nine saints, the destroyer of the serpents, kept the succession alive, and was reg arded as the first "general" of the whole monastic order of Ethiopia. His place was subsequen tly filled by Christus-Bezana, by Nestel-Mos, by Johann, who left his robe (askema) to Tecla-haimonos, the Benedict of Abyssinia, who in the 15th century founded the great monastery of Debra-Libanos. The part played by this great ascetic leader of the regu lar clergy appertains to a later period of the history than that contemplated in this work. The successors of Tecla, the president, antistes, and visitor of all the monks, acquired a position equal to that of the occupants of the see of Azum (Auzume), who successively derived their orders and consecration as their prototype from Frumentius had done, from the patriarch of Alexandria. In other parts of the Christendom, the contest was often sharp and protracted between the chief of the monastic order and the Abuna.

Another story of the introduction of Chris tianity into Ethiopia is told by Nicephorus Calli stus in his annals, and it has the support of Simeon of Athos. Assemani (Bibli. Orient. tom. i. pp. 358 f.) gives the Syrian authorities for a narrative which represents Adad or Aigod, emperor of Axumites, avenging vengeance on the Homerite King, a Jewish warper, who had cruelly murdered "Roman" merchants, on the ground of their Christian activity in his dominions, as well as numerous Homerites. Assemani's authority is a history written by "John, bishop of Asia," and preserved in the Chronikon of Dionysius, and it is followed up by the Syriac letter of Simeon, bishop of Ith Aimasen, whose statements coincide with those of Simeon Metaphrastes (in Surius, l. p. 943), Theophanes, Cedrenus, and of the Portuguese visitor of the times, who refers to the martyrdom of three Homerites. The story of Nicephorus, however, is that Adad or Adad (or, as Greek and Roman writers call him, Elebran), emperor of Ethiopia, uttered a vow that if he conquered the Homerites of the Red Sea coast he would embrace Christianity; further, that he was successful, fulfilled his vow, and appealed to Justinian, who sent bishops to effect the conversion of the Ethiopians, that a Christian-Ethiopian kingdom was thenceforward extended to the Homerites. There are many improbabilities in the latter portions of this statement. Not the least of the difficulties is that if Justinian had sent bishops to Ethiopia, he would not have sent Jacobites, but Melchite or Catholic bishops, and there can be little doubt that the church of Ethiopia in its inception and a hundred years before the reign of Justinian had accepted the Jacobite patriarchry, and repudiated, as it has done to the present day, the Roman Church. As for the Church, which makes a strange blunder in appealing to the spurious Nicene canons in proof of the existence, presence, and position of the Ethiopian patriarch at the date of the council of Nicaea in 325! In his commentary (p. 282) he admits the anachronism involved in a statement which would utterly overthrow all his Ethiopian authority, for the conversion of Ethiopia by Frumentius, and the annals and writings of Constantius by Athanasius before the accession of Constantius. Strangely enough Selden led Ludolf into this blunder, which was pointed out by Fabricius, and corrected by himself. It is not impossible to see through the appar ently conflicting accounts. The Greek and Latin authorities, the Syrian and Ethiopian annals and writers all combine to throw some light on the curious vow, from which, as reported by John, "bishop of Asia," who flourished in the reign of Justinian, it has been supposed by no less an authority than Assemani (Bibli. Orient. tom. i. 359), that Ethiopian kings and princes had given up their faith in Christ until it was renewed in the time of Justinian. All authorities combine to include among the Homerite sufferers one Aretha and his wife, and a number of his companions, variously estimated as 280 and 340. The Syrian writer, John, speaks of 280 provincials being a white curtain of Christianity in the region. Aretha had been a distinguished man at Auzume, and there built himself a palace. He was appointed governor of Nigran by the emperor of Ethiopia, whose dominions must have included a nominal suzerainty over portions at least of Arabia Felix. The Homerites inhabit the eastern coasts of the Horn of Africa, north and east of the Red Sea, but their principal seat must have been in Arabia. They appear to have received an Arian form of Christianity during the reign of Constantius, under the teaching of Theophilus Indicus (Philos. Frag. lib. iii.). How ever that may be, they suffered cruelly at the hands of Dunaam, a Jewish sectary who had usurped the authority, besieged Nigran, and punished the Christian with various forms of refined cruelty. The date of the persecution in which Aretha and his wife and companions fell is differently given. Theophanes, quoted by Asse man (i. 358), gives the year A.D. 535, and Niciphorus assigns it to 541. Bonnus places it under the reign of Theodosius II. The authorities quoted at length by Bas nius (Ann. 532), viz. Niciphorus, Zonaras, and Cedrenus describe the courage of the martyrs, the bold answers made by Aretha to his tor ments, his refusal to submit to the rites of Judaism, and his unflinching confession of the Trinity and the Incarnation, and his cruel death. The Arabian authorities, Abjaamuatis, and Ahmed Ibn Jusef, confirm the story of the cruel death of those who would not conform to the Jewish faith. Philostorgius (iii. c. 4) refers to the fact, and in Sour la nxv., of the Alcoran, Mohammed is supposed by his commentators to have condemned the cruel act in these words: "Cursed were the contrivers of the pit of fire supplied with fuel, when they sat round the same, and were witnesses of what they did against true believers, and they afflicted them for no other reason, but because they believed in the mighty glorious God, unto Whom belongeth the kingdom of heaven and earth, and God is witness of all things" (Sale's translation). The specula tion, based by some on this passage, that the Christian Homerites, or Christian Ethiopians, days were "days of peace." A few other names of princes occur down to the rise of the Zangane family in the 10th century.

During the whole of this period one important fact must be borne in mind. The Ethiopian church derived its orders from the patriarch of Alexandria, but shared throughout the fanatical rejection of the decisions of the council of Chalcedon, which illuminated the Christian church; it regarded Diocletian as the pillar of orthodoxy, and took sides throughout the long and weary strife with the Jacobite schism. [COPTIC CHURCH; DIOSCURIUS] Ludolf endeavours to minimise the monophysitism not only of Armenian and Ethiopian churches, but of Eutyches himself, and excites an indignant condemnation of himself and his "miserable Ethiopic poet" on the part of Renaudot in his Historia Patriarcharum Alexandrinarum. It is, however, remarkable that though the Ethiopian church was cut off ages from all intercommunication with the rest of Christendom, it continued in connection with the patriarch of the Nubian church by the Mohammedans, yet that it retained so many Christian ideas unimpaired. The Jewish element prevailed from the first, and in fasting, circumcision, sabbath observance, and in their reverence for the Temple at Jerusalem, and their confident belief that they possessed the ark of the covenant which had been miraculously transported to them, the Ethiopians present a curious and almost unique amalgam of religious sentiments. Notwithstanding the vehement repudiation of Chalcedonian formulæ, the very phrases of Chalcedonian orthodoxy are actually inwoven into their liturgy. Ludolf quotes the following (Comm. lib. iii. c. 9): "... sanguis Domini ... quod subest ex Maria ... et fecit illud unam cum divinitate suae, sine mixtura, neque praestiones, sine separatione, neque distinctione Divinitatia. If the whole question had been merely one of words, and if they did hold the whole thing, and the same thing with the Catholic church, the age-long controversy would be very important in the history of the most remarkable facts in the history of Christianity. 4 It is unnecessary to repeat the story of the strife. The Ethiopian church, believing itself pre-eminently orthodox, accepted the Jacobite patriarch as the supreme fountain of its hierarchy. The same Jacobite seems lost in obscurity, though variously explained. Thus Nicephorus (lib. viii. cap. 52) says that Jacobus was a Syrian of the name of Tzanzalus, that he was a disciple of Severus, i.e. the monk who harmonised the conflicting Monophysite sects, in the days of Justin (cf. Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 1346). Eutychius (Alex. Ann. ii. 147) calls his name Baradaeus, and states that he diffused his opinions, those of an extreme Monophysite, throughout Armenia, Mesop-
The Coptic Christians use the Coptic Bible in their churches and monasteries without comprehending a word of its meaning, and the Ethiopians have followed the same unedifying example. The origin of the translation (Dillmann, art. Herzog, Enc.) is lost in obscurity. The tradition of the Ethiopic poet to the effect that either Frumentius, in the 4th century, or that the nine saints in the 5th century translated the Bible from Arabic into Ethiopic, does much to refute itself. Doubtless the books of which the poet speaks (Encycl. xxi.) were in the main the Old Testament and New Testament, but it is certain that the Ethiopic text was made from the Alexandrine text of the Old Testament, as it follows the LXX, where they differ in arrangement from the early Arabic version, e.g. in Exodus xxxvi, and Numb. xxvi. The names of animals retain their Greek names; and very frequent conformity with the Alexandrine text renders the speculation of Renaudot that it was made from the Coptic quite superfluous. Moreover, Frumentius could not have made use of the Arabic, since it seems proved (Bryan Walton in his prolegomena to the Polyglott), that the Arabic version was made between the years A.D. 340 and 350. It is equally unsatisfactory to contend, as some Romish writers have done, that it was made from the Latin Vulgate. The only evidence for this is its correspondence with the Vulgate in some places where our codices of the LXX reveal lacunae. The simple supposition that the Ethiopian scholars had more ancient codices than those we possess is sufficient to account for these facts. Chrysostom (Hom. in Jon. ii. § 36, tom. viii.) recognised a translation of the Bible into Ethiopic. Bruce and Cajetan averred that fragments of both the Old and New Testaments existed in the Ethiopic language before the time of Frumentius; Dillmann repudiates the opinion as a mere guess. According to this great authority, the historical books of the Old Testament reveal manifested study of the Greek Testament, and knowledge of the Greek language. Many changes have occurred in the text to accommodate it to the changes in the Ethiopic language. The names of the books have been ignorantly Arabized. Thus, Πραξης comes to be Abridziz, and Apocalypsis, Abadal-Imapia. The earliest codices contain no division into chapters and verses. The canon contains the Apocalypse, and other works, and these are not discriminated from the canon. There are 81 books, 46 of the Old Testament and 33 of the New Testament. The Old Testament is divided into four parts.

(1) The Law, including Joshua, Judges and Ruth: 8 books in all.
(2) The Kings, including Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, Ezra, 2 books each; Tobit, Judith, Esther, Job and Psalms, 13 in all.
(4) Prophets: Isaiah, Jeremiah with Lam., Ezekiel, the minor prophets (12) and 2 Macc. 18 books.

Sometimes Henoch, and 4th Ezra are reckoned as in the canon of Old Testament.

The New Testament is divided into 4 parts.

---

* Le Quen (Oriens Christianus, ii. 1346 B, Dioecesis Jacobitica) makes it probable that Severus appointed a Jacobus as bishop of Edessa. Severus died in Alexandria, 533, having nominated Sergius as his successor, who took the title of patriarch of Antioch. From him the Jacobite series of patriarchs has proceeded unto this day. The Severian Monophysites of Syria and Theodotian Monophysites of Egypt, also called Jacobites, were alike called Jacobites.
and often indicates some trace of the Peshito Syriac, and of the Vetus Itala.

(1) The Gospels; (2) Acts; (3) Paul; 14 Epistles, including the Pastoral Epistles and the Epistles to the Hebrews; (4) The General Epistles and Apocalypse.

In close association with the New Testament are the collection of canons, headed by a very profound and apostolic canons, which appears first of all to have been translated into Arabic and thence into Ethiopic. There are three copies of this great Codex, one is still in Abyssinia, two copies are in the Vatican library. Ludolf saw and examined one of these in the year 1643. The Codex enumerates 470 or 480 canons in all, which are thus enumerated: (1) The canons of the 12 Apostles, 127; (2) Canons of Hippolytus, 38; (3) Of the 318 bishops of Nicaea (7). (4) Of Ancrea, 25; (5) Of Neoacademia, 15; (6) Of Gangra, 20, 21; (7) Of Caesarea, 124 (7). (8) Of St. Basil, 106; (9) Of St. Chrysostom, 17; (10) of Constantius, 123; making a total of from 470 to 480.

The most important of these are the 48 canons of the 12 apostles." The ordinary Greek and Latin copies of the apostolic canons in the 8th Book of the Constitutions enumerate 85. Of these there are only 71, inaccurately and inharmoniously arranged in the Greek codex, and another collection of 56, which Ludolf printed from the Ethiopian texts; making in all 177. To these are added in the great codex, the statutes or precepts, or the διακοσμοί of the apostles. The list of the apostles by which they are introduced is very strange, e.g., John, Matthew, Peter, Philip, Simon the Cananaite, James, Alpheus, Nathanael, Thomas, Cephas, Andrew, Simon Peter, and James the Brother of the Lord. The 38 canons of Hippolytus (of Abulides) are given by Ludolf from a French translation of them by Wannsleh, and they differ from 38 canons called διακοσμοί of the apostles, and of which mention is made by the Ethiopic king Claudius in his Confession of Faith as of paramount authority. These canons, identified with apostolic forms of the apostolic canons, were edited (at least 21 of them) in Ethiopic, with an English translation by Thomas Pell Platt, London, 1834. It is admitted that this διακοσμοί is more ancient than the Nicene canon. Eusebius (H. E. iii. 25), Irenaeus (in the Fragmenta Pseudo-, Athanasius (Epist. Fest. 39), Euphranius (Iber. xl. 5, lxx. 10) all refer to these canons. The pastoral epistles are the framework on which they are obviously raised, and the very varied opinions have been entertained about their genuineness. Dr. de Pressense has recently argued (Christian Life and Practice in the Early Church, p. 4 ff.) that the Coptic form of these canons (edited by Yatzam), and with which these Ethiopic texts agree, indicates a more ancient Greek text than that which is current in the Greek form, and that the original Greek has been interpolated by a very similar hand as that which interpolated the letters of Ignatius; and also that in all the canons, in the interpolation of the direction of sacred tomatism and the interpretation of the apostolic forms in this business, but as in the case of the Ignatian letters, the shortest Syriac recension contains the germ of the full-grown episcopal order which is so prominent in the larger Greek form. The Ethiopic form of the canons and of the διακοσμοί was free of all admixture of elements introduced into this antiquity of the church of the council of Chalcedon. Their authority in their Ethiopic form led to the most thorough-going rejection by the Ethiopians of the 16th century of the supremacy of the Roman see.

The Liturgy of the Ethiopic Church (Intro- greges, De ecclesiae canonis,) is a large subject to be discussed here. There are many forms of Ethiopic liturgy referred to by Ludolf. One, he edits is full, under the title of Oratio Eucharisticae Domini et Salvatoris nostri J. C. (Comm. iii. c. 4, xxxi.). It contains many noble sentiments. There is, however, an invocation of apostles, the mother of God, of the patriarchs, martyrs, etc., as "the prayer of the deacon," and in the prayer after the words of institution there is a petition that the bread and cup may become the body and blood of the Lord. There is no passage resembling this in the liturgy of St. Mark or St. James, or in the liturgies edited in parallel columns by Dr. Neale.

The so-called Book of Henoch (Enoch, Book 96), which was said to have been found in Abyssinia in the 17th century, was proved to be a forgery of the Abba Babaila Michaelis, and rejected by scholars. Two hundred years afterwards three copies of an Ethiopic translation of that remarkable work were actually found by the traveller Bruce, and introduced him to Ethiopian scholarship. Archbishop Laurence, Moses Stuart, Ewald, Dillmann, have annotated, edited or translated it, and thus restored it to the students of early literature. The contents of this book do not concern us here. It is not Ethiopic in its origin, but one can judge a little by the prolongation of Gnosticism in Ethiopia, when all other traces of it had perished, that was the daily bread of the Ethiopian church during the silent years.

Some further idea may be gained of the primitive condition of this church, by enumerating some of the ideas, customs, and tendencies, which have survived the contest with Rome, and come under the observation of European travellers.

There has been no common name or term for "sacraments." The word "mystery" was applied to baptism and the eucharist; but the church knew nothing of episcopal confirmation or extreme unction. Transubstantiation was set classically held. The Ethiopians maintained a vigorous tradition of the doctrine of original sin. They prayed for and invoked the dead, but they had no doctrine of purgatory. They have had many objects of worship, but have laid the greatest stress on the unity of the Trinity. Special homage has been paid to the Virgin Mary as the Queen of heaven. There are still thirty- three ancient rites and ceremonies; and has unquestionably conserved the strong Jewish element which is more conspicuous in the remains of the Ethiopian church than in any other Christian community. The
The marriage rites were very repulsive. Polygamy is not condemned by civil law, but only by ecclesiastical law. Kings and magistrates have many wives; bishops and clergy are limited to one. The levirate marriage was legitimate by civil law, and second marriages of the clergy were repudiated. Some funeral rites which are seen throughout the Mohammedan world astonished the early travellers, such as running with the dead body to the tomb, and clapping hands and shouting ballehulah over the grave. Dancing still forms part of their ritual, as it did in the Jewish temple. (Dean Stanley, Eastern Church.)

The supreme hierarch of the Ethiopian church is the Jacobite patriarch of Alexandria, the metropolitan or abuna, or Abba Salama, bishop of Aujuma, but since the fall of Aujuma taking his residence with the dominant court. The abuna is for all practical purposes, but Chalcedonian, the Coptic patriarch as Frumentius was in the first instance, and sent into Ethiopia at request of the monarch. The statement of Tszaazabas, that he is elected by the monks of Jerusalem has no truth in it. The condition of the patriarchate was for many ages so deplorable that humble Egyptian priests, hired to the priests immediately afterwards. The supposed baptism with fire was only an application of cautery used as a sanitary precaution against catarrh.

The mode of celebrating Epiphany led the Portuguese travellers to accuse the Ethiopian Christians of indecent practices, and of an heathenish ceremonial. Major Harris describes scenes of extraordinary character, where, by way of celebrating the solemnity of our Lord's baptism, the entire population of a district, men, women, and children, plunged at a state of perfect nudity into the same font, by torchlight. It would seem that the ceremony is not a repetition of their own baptism, but a commemoration of the Lord's, and at all events a barbaric and grossly indecent ceremony. In the celebration of the Eucharist, leavened bread signed with the cross is generally used except on the fifth day of Passion week, when unleavened bread is used. The wine used is mixed with water. The Eucharist is administered to the workbook, but never by the priest in a private house, not even to a king or to the metropolitan himself. The Jesuits accused the Ethiopians of celebrating the Eucharist in neither kind, because that which they used was not wine but water, being merely the unfermented juice of the grape.

The fasts practised were unusually severe and frequent. The great fast of 40 days, in imitation of our Lord's fast, followed immediately on the wild nocturnal baptism of Epiphany. Demetrius, the twelfth patriarch, thought it better to associate this fast with that of Passion week, and he is credited with the cruel commendation of fasting from water as well as from food. Their feasts were in honour of the conception, nativity, circumcision, baptism, passion, resurrection, and ascension of our Lord, and of the return of Christ at Pentecost, and in the midst of Pentecost a feast called Rekeb, in which bishops held "synods" of their clergy for the settlement of dogma, ecclesiastical and disciplinary disputes (cf. Apost. Const. 38). The calendar is of great length and complexity, many saints are commemorated, none are canonized.

CHRIST. HIGHER.—VOL. II.
ETTOPHONES "(Eθνοφώνες), z same given to certain heretics by St. John of Damascus (De Haereticis Liber, § 84). They are placed among the sects which came into prominence between the times of Marcianus and Hercilius, that is, between A.D. 450 and 610. We are prepared, therefore, to meet them in Epiphanius; but beyond this their name does not occur in Timotheus Presbyter, or in Sophronius of Jerusalem, or indeed, so far as the writer can discover, in any other ancient author down to Nicetas Choniates (c. 1200), who repeats the account of Damascenus with some trifling variations (Thesaurus Orthod. Fidei, lib. iv. c. xiii.). They are described as "following the language of the heathen, though in other respects Christians, introducing the casting of nativities, fortunate-telling, and destiny; accepting the whole system of astronomy and astrology, with all manner of soothing and augury." They "give heed to omens, expiations, prophetic sounds, observation of times, and similar fables of the profane, as well as to the rest of the pagan customs." Further, they "hold in honour certain Gentile festivals, and observe days, months, and times, and years."

It will be apparent from this that those whom St. John of Damascus had in view, under the name of Ethnophorians, or "Gentile-minded," were not so much the members of any particular sect, as the class of people, doubtless a numerous one in that age, whom sought to combine, in varying proportions, the old pagan superstitions with the profession of Christianity. An interesting light is thrown on their practices by the 61st and 62nd canons of the second Trullan council, which was held in 680, and which is analogous to that of Damascenus, the having recourse to σάτων καὶ έμπροστήριον καὶ γενεαλογία, κ. τ. λ. (Concill. Gener. Romae, 1828, iii. p. 323). The reference to "Gentile festivals" (διάδας των ΕΛΛΗΝΩΝ) is illustrated by the provision in the 62nd canon of "Calendae, as they are called, and Vota and Brumalia, and the associated festivals on the 1st of March. It would thus appear that the old Matronalia and Bacchoi festivals (Brumalia), and others, were still lingering on in the Eastern church, as the Lupercalia had done till the time of pope Gelasius in the Western. The Vota, hardly re-recognisable under its Greek form Βόρδη, were votive offerings for the welfare of the emperors at the beginning of the year (Suicer, Thesaurus, s. v. Βόρδη; Gibbon, c. xxxii.). It is not improbable moreover that the return of Damascus from the court of Persia, about 533, may have had some influence in stimulating the efforts of a paganism not yet extinct. There is no evidence to show that he returned to the city from which he, as well as St. John of Damascus, took his name; but his presence would be sure to be felt in whatever part of the Byzantine territories he was settled. The extraordinary portsents related by him in connexion with his Life of his tutor, Isidorus of Gaza, if we may trust the confused abstract of it preserved in Photius (Biblioth. cod. cxxi.), will quite explain the severe language of the Trullan canons, and justify the name of hιμετερε Μαμωνατου, which Nicetas borrows from the Romans to apply to such Ethnophorians as believed in them. [J. H. L.]

ETTIA (Etna). The twen	second bishop of Straburg, is said to have been the son of Hugh, whose wife was St. Odile, the abbess of Hohenburg, and popular saint of Alsace. Little is known of the details of his life, though the outline and dates are determined by letters and other documents. He ruled the monastery of Augia Dives (Reichenau in Baden) for seven years before he was made bishop by Charles Martel upon the death of his predecessor, Wiggerinus, A.D. 734. Soon after his consecration he built the monastery named after him, Ettenheim or Etteinheim, and it must have been about the same time that he, with other bishops, received a letter from Gregory III. (d. 741), commending bishop Bosiface to his care (Patr. Lat. lxxiv. 580). The next occasion on which we hear of him is a German council summoned by Bosiface in A.D. 745 at Ratibson or Augsburg, of which he was a subscriber (Labbe, Conc. viii. 273). Under the name of Hedius he is addressed, together with a number of bishops of France and Germany, in a letter of pope Zachary, which has been assigned to both A.D. 744 and 748 (Nigle, Patr. Lat. cxxx. 1165). About the latter date he subscribed a charter confirming old and granting new privileges to the monastery of Schwarzachum (Arnulph-Augs) in Lower Alsace (Patr. Lat. ixixv. 1314). In A.D. 762 he published his will, making large gifts of land to his monastery (Le Coite, Ann. Eccl. Franc. sae. 762, n. i. tom. v. 643), and three years later his signature appears with those of twenty-six other bishops to the placitum Attiinacese, which regulated for the subscribers the service to be said for the souls of the dead (Patr. Lat. xcv. v. 669). He died about A.D. 778, and was buried at Etteinheim. His successor in the see was Formigus. (Hermannus Contractus, Chron. Colbr Angiensis in Patr. Lat. cxxiiii. 157; Gall. Christ. v. 784; Le Coite, Ann. Eccl. Franc. tom. v.) [N. A. K.]

ETHOLIUS (Aitallahas), ordained bishop of Edessa, the metropolis of Orshothon, A.D. 524, and present at the council of Nicea, 325. He constructed the cathedral and the monastery and the tomb of the church at Edessa. (Assemani, Bibl. Orient. 394, e Chron. Edess.; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. 956; Mansi, ii. 694.) [L. D.]

ETIANUS. [Ethien.]
ETTO

ETTO (1) (HETTO, OTTO, ZE), bishop, confessor, communit. July 10. Of this bishop and confessor the Bollandists (Acta SS. Jul. 10, tom. iii. 47-80) give a Life "ex perpetuo MS. monasterii Marchianensis." He was a disciple of St. Fursey at Lagny, and contemporary with Emilian, Elocuus, Amandus, Hoernert, Mimbibus, Prefegandus, &c. He had accompanied St. Fursey into Gaul; in the course of time he visited Rome, and at last, after much labour and spiritual increase, died in the monastery he had founded at Fisciacum, which became afterwards a priory, dependent on the abbey of Laetitia (Lesse), near Avenue, in the French department of Nord, on the borders of Belgium. Molanus (Not. Sacr. Belgii at July 10) mentions Ettô being called "Hibernensis Episcopus," and speaks of a church under his name at Byam as the confines of Arras. He flourished about a.d. 550 or 670 (Lanigan, Ecle. Hist. Fr. ii. c. 16, § 10; Dupont, Hist. Eccl. Gend. Sot. i. 281, ii. 340; O'Conor, Rev. Eccl. Script. iv. 186 a; Colgan, Acta SS. 51 a. 1, 96 c. 6, 436, col. 2; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 227, 246). His relics were translated to Mons, and then on July 25, 1555, to the abbey of Liesse; he is the same as the French St. Ze, and is the special patron of cowherds, to one of whom, the legend says, he gave speech. (Bollandists, Acta SS. Jan. 7, tom. i. 447; Baring-Gould, Lices of the Saints, July 10, pt. i. 261.)

[C. G.]

EUBULUS (1), bishop of Avignon. [Eubul.]

EUBULUS (3), martyr, together with Julianus, both disciples of Arcadius bishop of Cyprus. They were beheaded during the reign of Julian, and were commemorated March 7. (Men. Bas.)

EUBULUS (5), bishop of Lysstra in Lycaonia, R 2 EUCADDIRES

cir. A.D. 621. Le Quien (Or. Christ. i. 1076) mentions having seen a fragment of his in reply to a profession of faith submitted to the emperor Heraclius by Athanasius, a Severian bishop. The fragment formed a part of a MS. Panoplia Graecia in a Paris library, and appears to have been the same manuscript as that which Cave found quoted by his correspondent of Labbe's year, the printed edition of Joannes Damascenus (Cave, Lit. Hist. i. 582). Le Quien refers to this consecutus in sec. 10 of his general preface to the works of that father (see Patr. Gr. xcv. 74). Theophanes, however, who relates the conversation of Athanasius and Heraclius at some length, makes no mention of Eubulus (Chronogr. ann. 621, p. 274 in Patr. Gr. cviii. 678). The bishop is called by Cave Eubulus Lyrensis, and his episcopal city Lyra, which Cave believed to be in Syria. [T. W. D. J.]

EUCADDIRES, a burlesque name for pagan priests, suggested by St. Augustine (Ep. 17). [H. W. P.]

EUCAPRIUS, a monk of the 5th century, a friend of St. Nilus, who terms him γέροντας φίλος μακάριονας. St. Nilus's correspondent Pionius was his son. (Nil. Epod. iii. 31 in Migne, Patr. Gr. Ixxix. 588 d.) The fact of his having been a monk is known from Anastasius Sinai, who quotes one of St. Nilus's writings to that effect addressed to Eucarpius. (Anast. Sin. Quares. iii. p. 189 in Patr. Gr. Ixxix. 358.) [T. W. D. J.]

EUCAPPUS, A.D. 347, subscribed the council of Sardica (Athan. Opp. i. 132; Mansi, iii. 46 b). [W. M. S.]

EUCAPRIUS, EUCAPPUS, bishop of Messana, present at the 6th Roman synod of Symmachus, A.D. 501 (Mansi, viii. 315 d). There is a letter addressed by pope Pelagius, "Eucarpo episcopo Messanensi," who is charged to see to the election of a fit person to the vacant bishopric of Catania (Mansi, ix. 907; Patr. Lat. Ixxxii. 747). The letter also appears in Grattian (Dist. ixi. cap. 17). Mansi (ut sup.), Baluze (Miscell. iii. 3) and others ascribe the letter to Pelagius ii. (579-596), and if they are correct the Eucaropus of Peligius must be different from the Eucaropus of the council. But that the writer of the letter was Pelagius I. (555-560) is clearly shown by Jaffé. (Bequest Pont. 85; see also Berard on Grattian, Canon. tom. ii. p. 2, p. 475, ed. 1783; Bues, Comment. Praen. de S. Pucidio, sec. viii. § 124 in Boll. Acta SS. 5 Oct. iii. 94; Samperi, Iconolog. della Gloria. Virg. Protettrice di Messina, 181, 185.) [T. W. D. J.]

EUCADUHIS (Eogodudois, Eoglodach, Eogludius), commemorated Jan. 25, Oct. 13. The identity of this saint is obscured by the later Scotch annalists changing his name into Eoglodius; this is done by Hector Boece (Scot. Hist. lib. ix. f. 116), and adopted from him by Lesley, Dempster, and Camerarius; Fordun (Chron. Gen. Scot. iii. c. 29) has Eoghodius. The Bollandists (Acta SS. Jan. 25, tom. ii. 610 c) follow the Scotch tradition in noticing "Eoglodius Pictorum Apostolus," but show their hesitancy by inserting his name among their praetermissi of that day. The true form of the name is Echid, Echoid, Echaidh, or Euchadus. He was one of the twelve who are said to have accompanied St. Columba from Ireland to Iona (Adamnan, St. Columb, append. to Book iii. Codex B). Colgan (Acta SS. 163) gives a short account of him from the Annalists already named, where he is called Apostle of the Picts and Scots. In his Kalendar at Jan. 25, Camerarius has "S. Eoglodius, monachus et confessor apud Galba- dianos [people in Glenelg's way] sanctus," from an Irish ms. of the Sacramentum miraculosum glorias celebres. Fuit magis illius Columbiis socius, et Pictorum alter Apostolus." He is by some supposed to have died A.D. 587, but Colgan thinks it more probable that he survived his master, who died A.D. 597. Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 265) places his death in the year 606, and says he wrote Colombe magistri vitam, lib. i.; Epistolam of Hibunos, lib. i., but builds his assertion on a wrong identification. Euchadius's feast is variously given as January 25 and October 13, and his name occurs in the Dunblane Litanies among the monks and confessors as Eogladoch. (Up. Forbes, Kat. Scot. Sincts, 334, et al.; Tanner, Bibli. 262; Kelly, Cat. Ir. ss. 61; Colgan, Tr. Thum, 468, 470, 489 n. 45; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 356; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 431-33.) Colgan (Acta SS. 163 n. 1, 164 a.) cites several who are called Eochodus, in order to find a higher place for this Eunchadus, and suggests that he may be Eochaidh Dallán (January 29), who wrote a life of St. Columba, but Colgan is evidently at fault in his suggestions, and probably refers to Eochaidh, son of Cella, better known as Dallán Forgall, who wrote the Amhrá Cuchnincille. [Dallán Forgall]. [J. G.] EUCHAITAEE (Baron. Annal. ann. 329, xxxivii.), heretics. [EUCHITAE.] But it may not be amiss to add the caution that Euchaitis is also a geographical word, concerning which see Bolland. A.D. SS. Jan. i. p. 595, they were in Migne, P. G. cxx. 1039; Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. viii. 627; Labbe, Soc. Conc. ii. 55.) [G. S.]

EUCHARIST, the sacrament of the Christian Church, commonly so designated in the writings of the Fathers, and here treated solely with reference to their teaching on it. For the term itself, see Dictionary of Christian Antiquities (i. 624, 625); of its application in primitive times to this sacrament Casaubon is probably right on both points when he says, "Non estat in Scripturis haec dictio pro sacramentii hujus nominis: quam tamen apostolorum tempore natam non dubitamus" (Exerc. ad Evarn. xvi. 40). Certainly, the well-known words of St. Justin, εις αυτη καλεσαι παρα μεν Ευχαριστη (Apol. i. 65), and Tertullian's "Eucharistias sacramentum" (De Cor. In. c. 3), go far to establish the last; and as regards the first, it cannot be doubted that "breaking of bread" (St. Luke xxiv. 35; Acts ii. 42 and 46 and xxi. 7) and the "Supper" (1 Cor. i. 7) must have been more familiar equivalents for it to the contemporaries of St. Paul and St. Luke; the former of whom, again, in enumerating its component parts, calls one "the cup of blessing." not thanksgiving (1 Cor. x. 16). There is just one passage where the term ευχαριστη occurs in the sense of meaning in St. Paul which it has in the Fathers: viz., 1 Cor. xiv. 16 (see Palmer's Orig. Lit. i. 14); but, on the other hand, such is not the interpretation put upon it by the Fathers themselves, viz. Chrysostom, Tertullian, and Prismasius, &c., in commenting on this passage.
Besides, even in their day, the term “Eucharist.” had other well-known meanings, as well as the sacrament other well-known names. (See par-iii.; comp. Cassian, Exær. ad Bar. xvi. 30, et seq.). Their gradual preference for this term arose probably from tacit agreement, that is solemn a commemoration of the death of Christ by man, the act of thanksgiving absorbed all men. There is one “locus classicus” in St. Chrysostom at least to this effect (Hom. xxxv.
in St. Mith.).

However, the term “Eucharist.” has long since passed out of popular use, and is now only retained by the learned. Latin theologians still speak of the “Sacrament of the Eucharist.”; but it is called “the sacrament of communion” by the Greeks. And as the majority frequently each celebration of it in both churches has a common origin, it is really the service, not the sacrament, which is the prominient idea with the many. This, in primitive times, was called everywhere “the liturgy;” and the Greeks speak of “attending the liturgy” still.
But the popular term for it everywhere with the Latins has long been “the Mass,” and it is at this that everybody with them talks of assisting.
Now in neither is the distinctive character of this sacrament recognised, except by the faintest implication. In this respect it stands out in marked contrast to baptism.

Baptism was best known to the Fathers, and is still popularly best known everywhere by its sacramental name, both as a sacrament and as a service. There are two points of ritualistic and dogmatic import, on the contrary, where the accord of one sacrament with the other is no less striking. 1. Both alike had their formal counterparts in the legal ordinances of circumcision and of the passover; yet their material parts were not taken, that custom from which had become custom in “the middle ages” of the synagogue than from anything actually prescribed in the law. 2. Both alike seem not seem to have been administered in the church, though they had been instituted by Christ, previously to the descent of the Holy Ghost.

Each of these remarks will assist us in estinating the teaching of the Fathers on the sacrament in question.

The passages in the New Testament we find interpreted by them in connexion with it, and on which they ground their teaching, are: I. The fourfold account of its institution by St. Matth.
xxv. 35–30; St. Mark. xiv. 22; St. Luke xxii. 17–20; and St. Paul, 1 Cor. xi. 23–29. II.
The sermon in anticipation of it, recorded by St.
John alone (vi. 26–53), whose gospel alone contains no account of its institution. III. Two more passages in the epistles of St. Paul, where it is contraeted, first with idolatrous altars and sacrifices, and then with Jewish (1 Cor. x. 15–21, and Heb. xiii. 10). IV. All the passages above gespoke from the Gospel of St. Luke, the Acts, and St. Paul, where the Scriptural names for it occurred. V. Possible references to it should be, perhaps, added. Of these, 1 Cor. xiv. 16 has been anticipated; and the remark there made holds equally good of 1 Cor. ii. 4, where, because that quotation occurs word for word in the liturgy of St. James, we may contend it may have been taken from hence (Neume’s Prim. Liturg.
p. 79); and again of 1 Pet. ii. 5, though the transition, so far as words are concerned, from this passage to the Primitive Liturgies is direct

And, as it is in the Primitive Liturgies that we shall find the best clue to the collective teaching of the Fathers from the first, it is to these that we shall most conveniently turn next.

At first it would seem that liturgies were not written, as Renaudot says (Disc. c. 1), but oral, like the creed—Bunyan, in arguing against Re-naudot (Hist. iv. 143), has overlooked Le Brun (Expos. de la Messe, vol. iii. p. 4 sqq.)—and like the creed everywhere substantially the same.

We must appeal in the first place, therefore, to accounts given of them before they were written;
and referring to them solely for dogmas, we must be brief in our references. Of these St. Justin’s is the earliest document.

“Him also who has been baptized . . . we conduct to where the brethren are assembled . . . then bread and wine, mixed in a cup with water, are brought to their president, which he receiving offers up praise and glory to God the Father of all, through the name of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, together with prayers and thankgivings at which we, after having blessed us these things: to which, when he has finished, the people respond, Amen. . . . For it is not as ordinary bread, or ordinary drink, that we receive these things: but as Jesus Christ our Saviour was incarnate by the Word (i.e. the Spirit: comp. c. 33, where St. Luke, i. 35, is quoted) of God, so we have been taught that the food from which our flesh and blood derive nourrishment by assimilation, having been blessed by invocation of the Word that is from Him (viz.
the Holy Ghost, once more) is both the flesh and the blood of that same Jesus who was made flesh.

For so the apostles, in the books of remembrance which they caused to be written, have handed down that Jesus commanded them: that having taken bread, and given thanks, He said, Do this in remembrance of Me:
This is My body. And, in like manner, having taken the cup, and given thanks, He said, This is My blood: and gave to them alone” (Apoc. i.
66, 66). Elsewhere, contrasting Nalchik i.
10 and 12, he says: “With regard to those sacrifices which are offered to Him everywhere by us Gentiles, that is, of the eucharistic and of the eucharistic cup equally, He there foretells that we should glorify, but that you should profane, His name” (c. Troph. c. 41).

And again, “Get thee to anticipate all the sacrifices made by Christians in all the earth through this name, which Jesus, Who is the Christ, ordained to be made, viz. in the eucharist of the bread and cup—that they are wellplessing to Him” (9. c. 117).

St. Cyril of Jerusalem agrees with St. Justin in the main, but writing to instruct his flock is naturally plainer spoken. He begins his twenty-second lecture by referring to 1 Cor.
xi. 23, &c., on which he says, “This teaching of the blessed Paul alone should suffice to satisfy you thoroughly respecting these holy mysteries, by admission to which you have been made one body and blood with Christ . . . His body is given you in the shape of bread, and His blood in the shape of wine. . . . For thus we become possessed of Christ by having His body and blood distributed throughout our members; and thus, as St. Peter says, are we made partakers of the Divine nature . . . (6. § 3). Fully persuaded, then, that what appears bread is not bread although tangible by the taste, but the body of Christ, and that what appears wine is not wine, though the taste pronounces it to be so, but the blood of Christ . . . stabilish your heart by partaking of Him as spiritually present, and gladden the face of your soul” (6. § 9). In the next lecture, which treats of the liturgy then in use, he explains how it becomes what he says it is: “After we have sanctified ourselves by these spiritual hymns” — the prelude to which consists in the well-known words, Ἐχαριστήσωμεν τῷ Κυρίῳ, by the priest— “we invoke the God of mercy to send the Holy Ghost on the offering exposed to view, that He may make the bread the body of Christ, and the wine the blood of Him; and that the Holy Spirit touches is hallowed and transformed” (§ 7); or, as he says further on: “Αγνά τά προσκείμενα, ἔκτοτας δέξαμεν Ἀγίου Πνεύμ.-ματος (§ 19). Then he proceeds: “After that the spiritual sacrifice, the bloodless service, has been consecrated, we supplicate God, in presence of the congregation, for the common peace of the churches, for the weal of the world, for kings, for soldiers and allies, for the sick and afflicted; in a word, we all pray and offer this sacrifice for all who need help. Then we commemorate those who have fallen asleep in time past: first, patriarchs, prophets, apostles, martyrs, that God by their prayers and grace may accept our petitions. Then, also, for the holy fathers and bishops, and for all among us in general, who have fallen asleep similarly, believing it will be of the greatest advantage to those souls for whom prayer is offered up, with that holy and awe-inspiring sacrifice lying exposed to view” (6. §§ 8, 9). We must not expect, of course, to be able to discuss at all this part of the subject; this and the next are treated by Origen speaks for the bulk of his contemporaries, when he says, in reference to St. Matt. xxvi. 28, “He that has been initiated in our mysteries knows both the flesh and blood of the Word of God. Let us not dwell, then, on what is already known to the faithful, and must not be divulged to the unlearned” (in Levit. ix. 10). Incidental allusions, indeed, are not wanting in parts. Fir- milian, in his well-known letter to St. Cyprian, for instance (Ep. lxv. 10), speaks of a possessed woman who went about Cappadocia, where his see lay, “pretending, by a no means despicable innovation, to consecrate bread, and celebrate the Eucharist. . . . besides administering baptism in such form as to seem to adhere to the ritual of the church throughout.” But the written liturgies of the East, to which we must shortly refer, all witness to the account just given of them in their unwritten state, besides shewing how they were added to, or departed from, in later times. Africa, rather than Rome, being the Latin-speaking church, and the liturgy of Africa seeming to have come to an end, before it had been put into writing at all, there is the more probability that what members of the African church tell us of it at any time, may be so much testimony to it as its original form. Tertullian is explicit enough, as far as he goes, though his references are inci- dental. “Many think,” he says, “that on station days they ought not to attend the prayers at the sacrifices because the station would be broken by receiving the Lord’s body. What! the Eucharist breaks the sacrifice? Does it not bind us to God all the more? Will not your station be all the more solemn, if it include standing at the altar of God? Then by receiving and preserving the Lord’s body, both the participating in the sacrifice, and the per- forming of the service, are secured equally” (De Ovlt. c. 14). This shews what the char- acter of the liturgy then in use must have been, so far as it goes. Elsewhere we find him speaking of the Eucharist as a “sacrament,” the “banquet of the Lord,” or “of God,” the “sacra- ment of the bread and cup” (Kaye’s E. H. p. 447). St. Cyprian attests another point, where he is blaming those presbyters, who, without waiting for the episcopal authority, dare to offer and to give them the Eucharist; in other words, to profane the Lord’s body, as it is written, “Whosoever shall eat the bread, or drink the cup of the Lord unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord” (Ep. x. 2). And another as follows: “When water is mingled in the chalice with wine, Christians are joined with Christ, and the multitude of believers knit and united to Him on whom they believe . . . but if wine be offered alone, it begins to be the blood of Christ without us; or if water, it begins to be the multitud of believers without Christ” (Ep. liii.). St. Fulgentius is no less explicit on a third point, where he speaks “of the descent of the Holy Ghost being asked to sanctify the sacrifice of the whole church” (ad Monit. ii. 9), and of “the church asking for the descent of the Holy Ghost to consecrate the sacrifice of the body of Christ” (6. c. 10); having explained just before how it is that “the sacrifice should be offered to the whole Trinity, and yet presumed to be made to the Father alone for the descent of the Holy Ghost alone” (6. c. 6, 7). St. Optatus attests the same, though his allusion to it is incidentally, 150 years earlier. “What can be more sacrilegious,” he asks the Donatists, “than to break, raze, and remove the altars of God, where ye yourselves offered formerly, where the prayer of the people, and members of Christ, are de- posited, whither Almighty God is invoked, and whither the Holy Ghost having been asked for descends?” . . . (c. Parm. vi. 1). St. Augustine is habitually reserved, even when addressing children; but there is one passage (Serm. cviii. Ed. Ben.) where he says: “You ought to know what you have received, and what you are going to receive, and what you ought to do. The bread which you behold on the altar, sancti- fied by the word of God, is the body of Christ. That chalice, or rather what it contains, sancti- fied by the word of God, is the blood of Christ.” Here the context shews, that by “the word of God,” he means the Holy Ghost; and in addi- tion to the old meaning of τὸ ῥῆμα, those that imply the spiritual matter, he virtually repeating St. Ireneaus (Ies. iv. 18, 5; and v. 2, 3), and he St. Justin, in the first pass- age quoted and explained above from the latter. Theophilus, in conclusion, whose nephew and successor St. Cyril was, may answer for Egypt, in an encyclical which St. Jerome thought so orthodox as to deserve translation. According to Origen of having denied that the Holy Ghost ever acts on irrational or inanimate natures, he remarks, that in asserting this, ‘‘Origen could not have reflected, that the mystic waters in baptism are consecrated by the advent of the Holy Ghost; or that the Lord’s bread, for exhibiting the body of the Saviour, which we break for our sanctification, with the holy chalice which we set on the table of the church, being both inanimate, are both sanctified by the invocation and advent of the Holy Ghost’’ (St. Hier. Ep. xcix. § 15).

We have thus before us in a few words the teaching exhibited by the liturgies in their unwritten state. Ordinary bread and wine mingled with water having been placed on the altar, an act of thanks and praise followed, after which God was invoked to send His Holy Spirit to make the bread Christ’s body, and the wine Christ’s blood. This is followed by the breaking of the bread, or the wine, and praying. Both served a double purpose, viz. as symbols to indicate, and as veils to hide, what was never intended to meet the eye. Then, over this spiritual and bloodless sacrifice, as it was then called and considered, and in union with it, prayer was offered for the welfare and conditions of men in the church militant, and commemoration of all the faithful departed in the church triumphant; everybody present joining in by responding ‘‘Amen’’ at their close. Lastly, the words ‘‘Corpus Christi,’’ ‘‘Sanguis Christi,’’ were pronounced in administering communion to each person; and each person in communicating replied ‘‘Amen’’ (St. Cyril, Cat. xxii. 21, 22, with Toutée’s Adm. § 6, and St. Aug. Serm. ccxlii. Ed. Ben.). It was thus a service, from beginning to end, in which all joined, and to which all subscribed, and of which in conclusion, the only recorded acts were, first and foremost, one of praise, followed by prayers.

Here we have several points requiring explanation: 1. The absence of any mention of the act of blessing, used by St. Paul as well as our Lord; or of the breaking the bread either, which according to Paul was also symbolical; and 2, the prominence given to the invocation of the Holy Ghost, which, so far as appears, was neither used nor enjoined by our Lord, nor by St. Paul. Certainly there must have been a very strong tradition for both one and the other, or both are inexpressible. When our Lord instituted the Eucharist, no mention was made by Him of the Holy Ghost, as though according to the remarkable words of St. John, ‘‘the Holy Ghost was not as yet’’ (vii. 30, ‘‘given,’’ in the A. V., is a gloss). Yet He had ‘‘descended and remained’’ on Jesus at His baptism, and co-operated with Him throughout His ministry, as the following passages prove (St. John i. 22, et seq.; St. Luke iv. 1, 2, and 18; St. Matt. xii. 28; with St. Mark x. 39–40; Heb. ix. 14; 1 Pet. iii. 19, 20); and of Him our Lord had Himself said emphatically, though to those who then heard Him obscurely, with special reference to this sacrament: Τὸ Πνεῦμα ἐντοῦ Τὸ Κυριο-ωσόν. St. Paul too, as we have seen, in contradistinguishing between the ordinances of the law and the gospel, had expressly laid down that the reality characterising the latter was due to His action, and to that alone. How was His action to be secured then, except by prayer? As it was said even of our Lord: ‘‘It came to pass, that Jesus being baptized and praying, the heaven was opened, and the Holy Ghost descended . . . on Him’’ (St. Luke iii. 22). Man’s act in blessing and breaking was of inefflably small account, in comparison with the part performed by the Spirit of God in ministering to this sacrament its hidden gift. His descent was required in each case to make the Eucharist all it was designed to be. Naturally, therefore, what we find preoccupied the mind of the church most in celebrating it, is the prayer for His descent. Indeed, it is as though less heed had been taken of what Christ had said and done, than of what He had taught. The importance that has for so long been attached to the recital of His ‘‘ipsestima verba’’ is far from resting on any command of His. For His command was not ‘‘say,’’ but ‘‘do.’’ Further, the command that this be done is not repeated in the act of posturing, or gesture, nor the quantity nor the kind of bread, nor the mixing of the wine with water, nor the employment of any prayer whatever, can be deduced from it. But His teaching on it fills a whole chapter, and it is to this that the Fathers are certainly most alive. St. Cyprian, to be sure, writes in his Epistle to the Corinthians: ‘‘Qua passionis Ejus mentionem in sacrificio omnibus facimus . . . nihil aliud quam quod Ille fecit, facere debemus’’ (Ep. lxiii. 17). But this is indefinite. Whether His words were recited in early times, whether His actions were copied minutely, we are nowhere told—just possibly they were—but the key-note to the unwritten liturgy beyond dispute consists in what the Holy Ghost is asked in it to do for man. As St. Ambrose says in a parallel case: ‘‘They ask, Divinity grants; they officiate, Heaven confers the gifts’’ (De Ep. S. iii. 18). And St. Jerome more distinctly: ‘‘What can a server of tables (or of altar) mean by placing himself above those (priests and bishops) at whose prayers (not acts or words, gestures or bidding) the consecration of the body and blood of Christ takes place?’’ (Ep. clxi. ad Ec. § 1).

Further, ‘‘Which of the saints left us this prayer in writing?’’ asks St. Basil (De Ep. S. § 86). Lastly, the principle of this prayer was maintained long after it had been shaken virtually by the additions that, in process of time, found their way into the Western liturgies, and from them came to be copied even in the Eastern at last.

This is proved incontestably from the following fact: viz. that all through the period of which we treat, that part of the liturgy where consecration takes place was called in the West 'preces' or 'oratio,' and not 'canon,' as now. Thus Tertullian in a passage before quoted speaks of those ‘‘who thought that on station-days they should absent themselves from the prayers at the sacrifice.’’ And St. Cyprian, in the singular number, opposes the "prayer" at the sacrifices to the "private prayers" that were said at home (Ep. xv.). Elsewhere he speaks with reprobation of those schismatics ‘‘who dared to erect another altar, and frame with unlawful expressions another prayer . . .’’ (De Unit. Eccl. c. 17), that prayer, for which the priest, after a suitable preface, prepared the minds of the brethren by exclaming "Lift up your hearts" (De Orat. Dom. c. 31). And St. Augustine no less explicitly: "We call that the body of Christ which taken from the fruits of the earth, and duly consecrated by the mystical prayer, we receive for our spiritual health, in remembrance of His dying for us; and which invested with its visible form by the hands of man, is not sanctified to be so great a sacrament, but by the unseen action of the Holy Ghost" (De Trin. iii. 4 ad fin.). Upon another occasion, indeed, he tells us that he preferred making a distinction, in common with nearly the whole church: "Ut procioniones acipiamus dictas, quas facimus in celebratione sacramentorum, aequum illud, quod est in Donum mensae, incipiat benefici: orationes, cum benedictur, et sanctificetur, et ad distribuendum communitur: quam totam petitionem fere omnis ecclesia Dominici oratione concilitat" (Ep. clxxii. 16). Notwithstanding, in the next century, pope Vigilius, after distinguishing between the variable part of the liturgy and this which is always added, says: "Quoniam et ipsoe communicacione precis textum diecrimus subter adjectum, quem Deo propitio ex apostolica traditione accipimus..." (Ep. ii. ad Profut. § 5). Similarly, pope Gregory, who perhaps was the first to apply the term "canon" to this prayer in one place (Ep. lib. xiv. 2 ad fin.), says in another (lib. ix. ind. 2, Ep. 12): "Orationem Dominum in imprimis misericordiam suscipiendam, quia nos Apostolorum fuit, ut ad istam solummodo orationem obligationis hostiam consecrarent." On the other hand another contemporary, St. Isidore, following St. Augustine, throws additional light on his distinction thus: "Sexta exhine oratio: sucede conformitati sacramenti: ut oblati quae Deo offeratur, sanctificatae prie Spiritum Sanctum, Christi corporis et sanguinis conformetur" (De Exe. Off. i. 15). Even Amalaritus had not forgotten this term in the 9th century, commenting on the ritual then in use: "Perseverant retrò stantes inclinati, usque dum finiatur omnis processus oratio: id est, usque dum dicitur post orationem Dominicam: Sede libera post officium, sicut Neor had another commentator of the Roman school forgot its intention: "Quam consecrationem corporis et sanguinis Dominici ideb semper in silentio arbitror celebrari, quia Sanctus in suis manens Spiritus eundem sacramentorum latenter operatur effeclum: unde et Graecè mysterium dicitur, quod secretum et reconcitiam habeat dispositionem" (Martene, de Ant. Rit. i. 4, 11). But in the 11th, Berno, while letting pope Gregory speak in his own words, as before quoted, resumes the general subject as follows: "Hac de canonie, qui et actio dicitur, licet sunt." The old terminology, vigorous as was its protest to the last, had at length crumbled away before new dogma. To say all ad more noteworthy, as the Greek equivalent, ἐκκορομάστηκας, was of much later date. Suicer (s. v. Κορομάστηκας, II. B.) volunteers an assertion respecting this prayer, unsupported, as was natural, by any proof, because totally groundless. We consider that it has been shown on the clearest evidence that all the liturgies without exception, including the Roman, in the earlier times, made consecration, or sanctification, of the elements consist in this prayer.

Of written liturgies, probably, but one remains in the original form in which it was penned, in whatever age it was penned, viz. that of the eighth book of the so-called 'Apostolical Constitutions.' St. Epiphanius may be supposed to refer to it, with some probability, when designating the apostles ἀντίγραφος ἀρχήρ (Haer. ixxix. 3, quoted by Le Brun, Épisc. iii. 38). It was never altered or simplified because it was never used in any church, as Mr. Palmer says (Orig. Lit. i. 38). Who composed it is a question variously answered by conjecture, but never solved (n. Cotel. i. 195). It affects to have been the joint work of the apostles, like the creed called after them: but, unlike the creed, it belonged to no church. It is thus a pseudo-demonic composition that acquired prestige solely from the honoured name—St. Clement of Rome—that was made to vouch for it. Its consecration prayer (c. 12) is called the Constitution of St. James the Great, and that part of it which alone concerns us here, translated in the main by Bingham (xv. 3, 11), runs thus: "We therefore in common with all the things which Christ suffered for us give thanks to Thee, Almighty God, not as Thou deservest, and as we ought, but as we are able, so fulfilling our command. For He in the same night that He was betrayed, took bread in His holy and immaculate hands, and looking up to Thee His God and Father, He brake it and gave to His disciples saying: This is the mystery of the New Testament: take of it and eat this: it is My body, which is broken for many, for the remission of sins. This do in remembrance of Me. Likewise the cup mingled of wine and water, after He had sanctified it, He gave them saying: Drink ye all of it: for this is My blood which is shed for many for the remission of sins in My remembrance of Me. For as oft as ye eat this bread and drink this cup, ye do shew forth My death till I come. "We therefore being mindful of His passion, and death, and resurrection from the dead, and His return into heaven, and also of His second coming, when He shall return with power and glory to judge the quick and the dead, and His works, do offer unto Thee, our King and God, this bread and this cup according to Thy apointment: giving thanks to Thee by Him, for that Thou dost vouchsafe to let us stand before Thee and minister unto Thee, and we beseech Thee to look propitiously upon these gifts here set before Thee, and to accept them favourably to the honour of Thy Christ, and to send Thy Holy Spirit upon this sacrifice—the Spirit that is witness of the sufferings of the Lord Jesus—that He may (ἀφορμήσῃ) declare this break the body of Thy Christ, and this cup the blood of thy Christ: that all who partake thereof may be confirmed in godliness and obtain remission of sins: may be delivered from the just deserts of his errors; may be filled with the Holy Ghost, and being made worthy of Christ and sanctified to Thee, O Lord Almighty, may obtain eternal life." Strange as it may seem, the portion of this most familiar to English ears—for he is the same night... till I come"—was to primitive ears almost certainly, or we should have found some reference to it in the earlier Fathers, had it entered into the untranslated liturgies. It is scarcely credible, for instance, that had it stood in the liturgy commented on by St. Cyril, he should have passed it over without a word. Now what was the liturgy commented on by St. Cyril, if not that of Jerusalem? But is that same liturgy, as it stands now, we have this very passage reproduced nearly word for word, or in some cases amplified. There can be no question, therefore, which borrowed from the other. It is reproduced in the Alexandrian, in St. Basil's, St. Chrysostom's, and in all the other written liturgies extant similarly, not excepting the Roman, with this difference: that in the Eastern, the prayer for the descent of the Holy Ghost which follows it is uniformly retained; in the Roman, and those which copied subsequently from the Roman, this prayer is as uniformly discarded: "Itaque memorae passionis Eius" being there made to take a new turn just at that point: and the prayer preceding the words of institution being so framed as if to compensate for its omission in some depictions without impairing the effect of what followed.
EUCHARIST

For in the West this picture of the Last Supper, apocryphal though it was in part, as it professed to come direct from St. Clement, became the parent of a modification of dogmas, though this also was of spurious birth. It is not St. Ambrose who first of all brought it to the West, as he is said for the first time: "Quomodo potest qui panis est, corpus esse Christi? Consacratae. Consacratum autem quibus verbis est, et cujus sermo- moenus? Domini Jesu... Ergo sermo Christi hoc conficet sacramentum." (De Sacr. iv. 4.) And: "Antequam consecrarit panis est: ubi autem verba Christi accesserint corpus est Christi... et ante verba Christi calix est vini et aquae pienus: ubi verba Christi operata fuerint, ibi sanguis Christi efficitur... Ergo sive quoties gnobilis potens est sermo Christi universa convertere" (ibid. 5), thus making their being pronounced by the priest or by Christ all one, and attributing to their bare recital the exact efficacy ascribed to the Holy Ghost (Cant. xxiii. 7). It may be urged that St. Ambrose, in a work generally thought to be his, had expressed the same view (De Myst. § 52-4); but it is expressed just in three sections, which are consecutive, and too unlike the rest to be genuine. Besides, at the end of it, the treatise we have the following: "In illo sacramento Christus est, quia corpus est Christi. Non ergo corporalis esca, sed spiritualis est... corpus enim Dei corpus est spiritale: corpus Christi corpus est divini Spiritus, quia Spiritus Christi" (§ 58; comp. 1 Cor. xv. 45). This passage is studiously kept out of sight in De Sacramentis, in the work, St. Ambrose says of the Holy Ghost: "Qui in oblata" (De Esp. S. § 112): and of the effect of His action: "Nos autem quotiescumque sacramenta sumimus, quae per sacra orationis mysteriwm in carne transiguntur et sanguinem mortem Domini annuantum" (De Fide et Grat. § 124). On the other hand, the Pseudo-Cyprian agrees doctrinally with the Pseudo-Ambrose: "Ex quo a Domino dictum est: Hoc facite in Meam commemorationem; haec est caro Mea, et hic est sanguis Meus: quotiescumque hic verbis et hic foed actum est, panis iste super-substantialis et calix benedictionis solenni sacra-...
strangely fails to recognised, and by his instance would prevent others from recognising what this prayer was. It was no prayer peculiar to these liturgies by any means. It was the old prayer common to all liturgies in primitive times, which the Roman church had by then not only transposed, but transformed. Its substitution of the terms "canon" or "action," for the "prayer" this part of the liturgy was conceived in the same spirit. Other Western churches, by adopting the Roman canon, gradually lost sight of their ancient doctrine. In the East, where this prayer was and is still maintained in every liturgy, whatever else may have been changed, the teaching of the Fathers on the Eucharist was never departed from—either among the sects, or by the orthodox—in the period of which we treat. Two passages may serve for its commencement and close. "These coals," says St. Ephrem, on Ezek. x. 2, "and the man clothed in fine linen, that bringeth and casteth them upon the people, are a type of the priest, by whose mediatorship the living coals of this altar of Eucharist of our Lord are given away. But see, there is another cherub that reacheth them forth, and placeth them in his fists; this is a type of shew that it is not the priest who is able to make the body of the bread, but another: to wit, the Holy Ghost" (Oxford Tr. p. 146, note d). And St. John Damascene: "God said, this is my body a remembrance of Me: and by His Almighty command it is done till He come. Till He come, for thus He said: and being invoked, the rain descends on this new corn-land, to wit, the power of the Holy Ghost overshadowing it... Do you ask now, how the bread becomes the body of Christ, and the wine and water His blood? I do not know of what this body is composed, and works what is alike beyond thought and word." (De Fid. orthodox. iv. 13). "Sextcenta sunt testimonia veterum quibus idem astraire," says Le Quien (ad 1. Comp. Pfaffi's Dis. de Concass. ad S. Iran. Prag. vol. ii). And it is equally true that none can be produced where this is denied. Controversialists have made the most of a passage from the sermon on the rich man in the New Testament: "the betrayal of Judas" (torn. ii. 384, ed. Montf.), which runs thus: "The same Christ who prepared that table, prepares ours now. For it is not man who makes the elements become the body and blood of Christ, but Christ Himself, who was crucified for us. The priest in the discharge of his office pronounces those words: but it is the power and grace of God. 'This,' he says, 'is My body.' This word transforms them. This word, once spoken, effects the sacrifice prepared in the churches on every table from then till now, and till His coming." St. Chrysostom, it is quite possible, may have been engaged just then in accommodating the form of consecration in the Cenacle liturgy to that of his own church, which it, at any rate, bears now. Yet the point of his teaching, after all, consists in this: that he asserts consecration distinctly not to be the act of the priest, but of God; so that the question is merely, to which of the three persons in the Trinity should his phrase "the power and grace of God" be applied? Not to his first person on the Feast of Pentecost: "when your bishop," he says, "stands at this holy table, about to offer that tremendous sacrifice—the initiated know what I mean—and when, before touching the gift thereon, he prays that the grace of the Lord may be with you, and you answer, with thine spirit: you remind yourselves by the very words you use, that he who stands there is not the agent, neither is it human nature that operates on those gifts in any way; but it is the grace of the Holy Ghost descending on them, and present in every case that sanctifies that main sacrifice" (q. ii. 463). Thus, when he expands his meaning, it amounts to this: that consecration is due to Christ in one sense, as is shewn by using His words; in another to the Holy Ghost, as is shewn by invoking Him; but in no sense to man. Man, therefore, cannot obtain it, without distinctly praying for it, under say circumstances. Such, again, is the doctrine, not of St. Chrysostom merely, but of all the Fathers (v. Toutoudi, Dia. iii. § 96, de Doct. S. Cyr.).

One more set of passages, and we shall be able to exhibit their meaning in the clearest light. St. Irenaeus (Haer. iv. 33; and v. 2) and Tertullian (adv. Marc. iv. 40; and v. 8) both appealed to the Eucharist as the body of which our Lord assumed. How, asked Tertullian, can there be a figure of a nonentity? What he meant by this was, not that the Eucharist was no more than a figure, but that its outward and visible part was a figure of what was hidden under it that was truly real, and to which it points. To this in Proculius, patris calich sacramentarium, probavimus corporis et sanguinis Dominici veritatem adversus phantasmatum Marcionis," as he says. In later times, when Eutyches asserted of our Lord that His human nature was absorbed in His divine, the Eucharist was brought forward again in disproof of this, and in a way that explained all the previous teaching of the Fathers thereon to ainity, beyond cavil.

Nowhere could this be found expressed more lucidly than by Pearson on the Creed (Art. iii. 202 et seq., with the notes). His authorities are St. Chrysostom, Theodoret, Ephremius, and the tract of Pope Gelasius already cited. It is true, though not surprising, that strong objections have been made to his sermon on times on these arguments. Rambler, as a work of Gelasius: but the fact of its being quoted as such on dogmas, within about thirty years of its being written, by two such authorities as St. Fulgentius (Ep. xiv. 19) and Pope John II. (Ep. iii. add fin.) alone disposes of them. "That then which he disputes against," says Pearson, "is the transubstantiation of the human nature into the divine." The argument which he employs against it is drawn from the Eucharist: "Certé sacramenta quae summinus corporis et sanguinis Christi divina res est, propot quod et per eadem diviniae efficiuntur consortes naturae: et tamen esse non deminut substantia vel natura ponis et vini. Et certe imago et similitudine corporis et sanguinis Christi in actione mysterii celebratur. Satis ergò nobis evidentur ostenditur, hoc nobis in ipso Christo Denimo sentiumd quad in Ejus imagine profectum, celebramus, et suminus."... We curtail this passage, to give what follows from Thodoret entire (Dial. ii. p. 122): "You have discussed on the divine mysteries, most opportunely," says the heretic Eunapius: "for I will shew you that the body of our Lord is changed into another nature. Please, then, answer my questions." Says the Orthodoxos; - "E. "What then do you call the gift which is offered, before the invocation of the priest?" O. "I must not speak too plainly, lest there be some present who are not initiated." - E. "Answer then enigmatically." O. "Food of such and such grains." - E. "And the other symbol, how do you call that?" O. "This toe has a common name, signifying a kind of drink." - E. "But, after consecration, how do you call them?" O. "The body and blood of Christ." - E. "And is it your belief that you receive the body and blood of Christ?" O. "Yes." - E. "As, then, the symbols of the body and blood of our Lord are one thing before the invocation by the priest, and after that are changed, and become another, so the body of our Lord after His ascension was changed into the Divine substance?" O. "You are taken in the net you have just woven. For neither are the mystical symbols after consecration robbed of their own nature; but, on the contrary, they remain in their own substance, and there are seen and touched just as before. That which they have become is indeed an object of thought and faith; and is adored as being what it is believed to be. Compare, then, the image with the archetype, and you will see their resemblance. For the type must needs correspond with the prototype. This body has its origin to be in the substance, shape, form, and figure; in a word, its bodily substance, though it has become immortal since the resurrection, and superior to decay; and having been placed in a seat on the right hand, is adored by every creature, being styled the body of the Lord of all." - E. "But the mystical symbol changes its former appellation—for it is no longer called by its former name—but it is called the body. The truth, then, should be called God, and not the body." O. "You betray your ignorance, as it seems to me. It is called not only body, but the bread of life. It was so designated by the Lord Himself. And of the body itself we say that it is divine, life-giving, and ever-blessed; just as it is common to no man, but belongs to our Lord Jesus Christ, who is both God and Man..."

Praising the passage from St. Chrysostom, as only known as yet through a translation, through Nestathion admits its full force (Op. iii. 742), we cannot refrain from adding the following sentence from Ephraim, at the close of a singularly dogmatic argument, in his own words: Eλήντη καὶ ἐν τῷ πρωσάετε κατένευ, ἀλλ’ οὔτως εἰ εἰσέχει δύναυτά τούτον ἔχουσαι, δι’ ἡ αὐτὴ φύσις ψυλαργοῦ καὶ ἀλφατρυγμίτης, καὶ δρατός καὶ δοριτώς· ὡς καὶ τὰ πάρα τῶν πιστῶν ἑκατέρους, σώμα Ἱησοῦ καὶ τῆς ἁγιασμοῦ, ἑτέρως εἰς ἁγία καὶ ἀμώμην, ἕνως μὲν, ἑνώς δὲ ἑνώς ἀδικίας ἡμῶν μείναι χάριτος (ap. Phot. Bibl. cxix. p. 794, ed. Schott). Ephraim was patriarch of Antioch in the 6th century; Theodoret a suffragan of Antioch in the 5th; St. Chrysostom, before becoming patriarch of Constantinople, was ordained priest at Antioch in the 4th; Gelasius, who was the abbot of the monastery of St. John at Mount Sinai, founded the foundation of the monastery in the 5th century, and after his death it was continued by his monks. Thus in these four authorities, besides the weight that belongs to them respectively, we have the dogmatic teaching of the churches of Antioch and Constantinople, Africa and Rome, represented for three centuries, as evoked by heresy. Yet this, after all, is not their chief merit. It is their chief merit, that they prove what the mind of the Fathers was, on all the points to which they relate, the sacristies, all their various modes of expressing it to the minutest details. For they show that, in the judgment of their predecessors and contemporaries, the Eucharist consisted of two parts, that ever remained, and were to be kept, therefore, distinct: one cognerible by the senses, the other by the mind alone. "Bád dicasum sacramenta, quia in alias videtur, alius intelligitur," as St. Fulgentius quotes from St. Augustine (Ep. xii. 25). Consequently, the sign and the thing signified belonging to a different order all along—the spiritual and material—the laws regulating the one could not affect the other. Hence too, there could be neither substantiation, nor consubstantiation, nor impanation, in the manner of their connexion: the difference between them being as radical as the difference between soul and body. Yet they were far from being connected in the same way. They never constituted one substance any more than the soul is constituted as a substance. Only in the state of grace, for a temporary purpose, so it left them uncombined. The sole change wrought by it consisted in the accession of a new element distinct from, although to be conveyed with, the other. Both passed into the mouth of the receiver simultaneously, yet separated the next moment: the sign by a profession of faith, the substance by a profession of grace. The body of Christ, as a part of his bodily frame: the other, conversely, to be the means of assimilating his soul to Christ, not Christ to him: or else to be withdrawn instantaneously, should he have partaken in unbelieving or unrepented sin. Thus to confound them—to say that one was merged in the other, or otherwise done away with—was sacramental Eutychianism. The condition of their conjunction was held to be, that the substance, no less than the properties or characteristics of both, was preserved intact: so that the whole might be designated to the last, and without impropriety, by either name: though in practice devout Christians ordinarily preferred one name to the other. Yet, even in what concerns the ascertainment of the Liturgy, the priest is made to say: "Fac nobis hanc oblationem sacramentum, nautam, rationalem, acceptabilem: quod figura est corporis et sanguinis D. N. I. Christi..." (Op. ii. 371). And St. Fulgentius, in his most dogmatic work: "Firmissime tene, et nultaneus dubites, quia unigenitum Deum varhum carmen formem... S. pro nobis obtulisse sacrificium, et hostiam Deo in orodem suavissit: Cui, cum Patre et Spiritu Sancto... sacrificium panis et Vinis, in fide et caritate, sancta catholica ecclesia per universum orbem terrae offere non esset... in isto autem sacrificio, gratiarum actio atque commemoratio est carnis Christi, quam pro nobis obtulimus, et sanguinis quem pro nobis idem Deus esuisit..." (De Fide, c. 19). Yet compare this with what he says in the same dogmatic of his epistles, where the ordinances of the Old and New Testament are contrasted: "In ipso sacrificio corporis Christi a gratiarum actione incipimus, ut Christum non solum mundum Sanctum, sed ipsum nobis, natiua veritate resupcrans in sanguinem nostrum, et non sanguinem quem pro nobis idem Deus esuisit..." (Ep. xiv. § 44). Here we have the same father teaching in each... case, and what he had called in one "the sacrifice of bread and wine," he calls in the other differently, "the sacrifice," or "oblation, of the body and blood of Christ." Albeit his consistency comes out in a moment, when he is understood to be speaking of the outward part of the sacrament in one place, and of the inward in the other.

Another African bishop, Facundus of Hermoinae, says: "Sicut sacramentum corporis et sanguinis Ejus, quod est in pane et poculo consecrate, corpus Ejus et sanguinem dicimus, non quod prærior corpus Ejus sit panis, et poculum sanguin: sed quod in se mysterium corporis Ejus sanguinique continent —that is, veiled under them (Def. Trium Corp. ix. 5).

On the same principle, whether the priest said "the body," as in the Gelasian; or "the figure of the body," as in the Ambrosian Liturgy, when he prayed, made no difference. He meant the same thing. It mattered not that St. Cyril, in c. 20 of his discourse, told the faithful that what he offered in baptism was "the figure of the body and blood of Christ:" and in putting the same into their hands, said "the body," or "the blood, of Christ," to which he bade them respond "Amen," in c. 21 and 22. Universally, when the Fathers speak of this sacrament as a type or figure, they mean only so far as its other effect is concerned; when they speak of it as a reality, they are just as far from asserting that it had ceased to be, or could be no longer called, a type. True, there was no reference to the type, when it was administered, or after it had been received, for the type went for nothing to the receiver. "Auditis corporis," says St. Augustine, "et respondetis, Amen. Et sumit corpus Christi, ut verum sit Amen." Eating and digesting the outward part could do nobody the least good, unless the inward part was similarly fed upon in the soul.

It should be added that, in this passage, the phrase "corpus Christi" bears two senses, not one. In other words, Christ has two bodies; one, with which he was born and rose, the other which is the sum of his Church or, his mystical body, called the Church. Of these the last owes all its life to the first: yet so, that participation in the life bestowed by the first is limited to those who compose the last. The act of the Holy Ghost at the font engraves men members of the last: and then, subsequently, the act of the Holy Ghost at the altar supplies them with the first to be their food through life. "For we, being many, are one bread—one body—for we are all partakers of that one bread": as the apostle says. And this, as St. Augustine sees, is also symbolised in the Eucharist: "Unus panis: quis est iesus panis us? Unum corpus multi. Recolite quia panis non sit de una grae, sed de multis . . . et sic de vine. Fratres, recolite unde sit vinum. Grana multa pendent ad botrum: sed liquor granorum in unitate confuditur. Ista et Dominus Christus nos significavit, nos ad se pertinere voluit, mystericum pacis et unitatis nostrae in suum meum consecravit." (Serm. ccixii. ed. Ben.)

Thus, as long as the Holy Ghost was invoked, and wherever he is invoked still, to consecrate, never was any confusion of terms or extravagance of thought, or unwise reasoning witnessed in discoursing on the Eucharist. God being held to be the actor throughout exclusively, reason was never applied to for explanations; nor was any miracle pre-supposed, beyond that of love. It was the natural action of the Infinite upon the finite which the Fathers considered to be sought in that prayer, and the answer to it they held to be that Christ became present on earth, yet being still in heaven, was communicated to thousands, yet received entirely by all; multiplied without increasing in bulk, consumed without the withdrawal of a particle from his actual body. Infinite agency being assumed, such results would ensue naturally, just as naturally as finite results from a finite cause.

To, then, to the same extent that they held Christ to be present in the Eucharist, they held the Eucharist to be a sacrifice, though they denied it to be distinct from the sacrifice offered upon the cross. Hence the same varieties of expression occur that were noticed before. If St. Chrysostom applies to it the epithets "awful" and "tremendous," he calls it also "spiritual" and "holy", but never "sacrament"; he speaks of it as a "propitiation." SS. Guadens and Augustine speak of it as a "figure" of the Passion. Indeed, the latter goes so far as to say, in one of his most careful works, that morality forbade too literal a construction of St. John vi. 53. "Facinus vel flagitium videtur jubens Figura cum pax et pacificis processit passionem communicandum; et suavitatem utilem recondendum in memoriam, quod pro nobis eam Ejus crucifixus et vulnerata sit." (De Doct. Christ. vii. 16). "One sacrifice cleansed us," says St. Chrysostom, "there is no other . . . . The apostle, consequently, keeps repeating this at every turn, one priest, one sacrifice, lest thees that there were many should encourage people to think they might sin with impunity" (1 Heb. vii. Hom. xiii. 3). "What, then, do we not offer daily? Of course we do, but in remembrance of His death; and this is one, and not many. How one, and not many? As having been once offered, like what was offered in the holy of holies, which perished not; for our offering is always, one lamb to-day, and another to-morrow, but always the same; so that it is one sacrifice. Or else, from being offered in many places, must it not follow that there are many Christs? Certainly not. Christ is one everywhere, and entire everywhere— one body. He, then, who is offered in many places being one, not many bodies, so the sacrifice is also one, our High Priest being the offerer of the sacrifice that cleanses us. And this, which both was offered then, and is inexhaustible, we still offer; and offer in remembrance of what then took place in obedience to His command. Unlike the high priest under the law, who offered a different sacrifice from day to day, what we offer is always the same; or rather, what is done is in the commemoration of a sacrifice" (ib. c. x. Hom. xvii. 3). "Far from offering," says Theodoret, "another sacrifice, we perpetuate the memory of that saving one" (ad Heb. ix. 4, 5). Thus it was a sacrifice of remembrance, from their point of view; and whatever efficacy they ascribed to it in this way was active, not absorptive.

Still, as St. Paul taught that Christ had an "unchangeable," that is, an "abiding" priesthood, and "ever liveth to make intercession for us" (Heb. vii. 24; comp. 3 and 25), it could not... be but that He had an abiding sacrifice, "somewhat also to offer," in the words of the same teacher (ib. viii. 3). And what could that be but His own human nature that was crucified once for all? He was "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world" in the words of another apostle (Rev. xii. 8), "that taketh," not takest, "away the sin of the world"; in the words of the Baptist (St. John i. 29). He had described His body as being given, and His blood as being shed, Himself before the actual event occurred, to signify that the offering of both on His part was continual. His humanity was thus a ceaseless and abiding sacrifice wherever it was.
It was being offered whole and entire by Himself in heaven. It was being offered whole and entire by His Spirit on earth. Hence, whenever Fathers term the Eucharist a "spiritual sacrifice" from this point of view, they mean not only that it was immaterial and impalpable, but that it became this strictly, by the action of the Holy Spirit in making Christ crucified present, and that representation, as it were, transformed the sacrifice no less as a sacrament, its real as well as its figurative side. For though the sacrifice of the cross was not renewed, the Eucharist was identified with it in each case through Christ, who was present; and therefore, so far, each celebration of the Eucharist might be called, and was called, by this light, that it was not more natural than the heart-stirring prayer for the whole church which, in all the primitive liturgies without exception, immediately follows consecration, while Christ was present objec-tively through the action of the Holy Ghost previously to His being received. Surely this was to address God "in a time when He might be found," as the Psalmist says (xxx. 6); and, as in words already quoted from St. Cyril, was believed then.

Lastly, this description of sacrifice both original and received illustrates another, in which St. Paul elsewhere dwells (Rom. xi. 34). For this was an immediate and objectively due to their having been made temples of the Holy Ghost: and ultimately, to the redemption wrought by Christ for man. Further, it is a sacrifice which is at core real and spiritual. Our bodies are there, but they are to be mortified, not slaughtered, says Theodoret (ad. 1). There is to be no more repetition even of the crucifixion in their case than in Christ's. What is required is that they should be presented to God in the full spirit of that sacrifice, whole and entire, their acceptability with Him depending upon it alone.
As Origen says: "Paulus obsercat credentes in Christo, ut aliquid in suis templo hostiam sanctam, placentem Deo, viventem dicit hostiam, quae vitam, hoc est, Christum in se gerit. . . . sanctam dicit, in quâ Sanctus Spiritus habitat . . . placentem Deo, utpote a peccatatis separatam?" (ad loc.). St. Chrysostom adds:
"By reasonable service, is meant walking after the Spirit; leading the life which Christ led." (ad 1). This offering of our bodies, then, is not real, because it is spiritual; nor has the sacrifice upon the cross to be repeated to be thus applied.

It is true that the references in the Fathers to this subjective sacrifice are neither full nor frequent. Johnson only quotes two such in his Appendix: one from St. Gregory Nazianzen (Orat.
li. Apol. c. 95, the other from Eusebius (Dem.
Evangel. ii. 10, ad fin.) who says: "Accordingly
we offer both sacrifices and incense; at one time celebrating the memorial of the great sacrifice, according to the mystic rites delivered to us by Him, and presenting the thanksgiving for our salvation to God in pious hymns and prayers;
at another, consecrating ourselves wholly to Him, and to His high-priest, the Word; dedicated to Him in soul and body?"

Eusebius makes a distinction here between the objective and subjective offerings: calling the one sacrifice, and the other incense. More than this, from the order in which he has named them, he may be supposed to refer to the consecration and post-communion prayers in his own Liturgy. Of these the first is common to all liturgies; the second, which may compare with the second of our own post-communion collects, occupies the same place in that of St. James alone, but the prominence given to the subjective offering in our first post-communion collect is probably without parallel "in this part of the ancient liturgies," as Mr. Palmer says (Orig, Lit. c. iv.
§ 22).

In conclusion, the Fathers often apply the term "sacrifice" to the Eucharist, objectively as well as subjectively, from other points of view besides the above. No celebration of the Eucharist could pray, or should pray, in which the sacrifice of prayer and praise was not included, and this was of course subjective.
No celebration, again, could take place without a solemn oblation of the bread and wine. This was objective, but it was also material; and hence was bloodless, without being spiritual.
Thus there was a material oblation of the outward part of the sacrament as well as a spiritual of the inward to be taken into account. Now, as the Fathers frequently pass from one point of view to another in their varied descriptions, all the more care should be taken to discriminate between their different meanings, and to render to each its due weight. Perhaps, too, their attention on some points is as deserving of notice as their "consensus" on others.

1. Their "consensus" is very marked in interpreting the following passages of the Eucharist: Gen. xiv. 18-20; Malachi i. 11; St. John
v. 51-53; and Heb. xiii. 10—for which moderns have tried to find other meanings. It is unnecessary to do more than refer to the passages quoted in Johnson's Appendix, supplemented or elucidated by Wilberforce (Euch. chap. vii. xi.) on this head. But two inferences were drawn by them from these texts, one which has been abandoncd long since, the other which regulates practice still. From the first, they inferred that it was indispensable for every baptized person to communicate. Accordingly for eight centuries, according to Bingham (xiii. l. 2, and xiv. 4, 1), communion was administered regularly to infants as well as adults—as soon as they had been baptized and confirmed—and in both kinds of course. From regarding the Eucharist as a sacrifice, they were led to infer it could not be celebrated by any below a priest.
Now the words, "Go ye, and teach all nations, baptizing them," &c., were spoken as exclusively to the apostles as the words, "Do this in remembrance of me." Why, then, should either command have been relaxed at all, or if at all, why not both in the same degree? Besides, in the New Testament, we read of the apostles ordaining deacons, presbyters, and bishops, but never priests. However, the Fathers are both unanimous in considering the offices of presbyter and priest identical, and in denying that the Eucharist would be celebrated by any who were not priests, while conceding that, in emergencies, even a layman might baptize (sac. Baptism). Nor was unworthiness in the minister held to invalidate this sacrament any more than the other. Further, they were no less unanimous in looking upon it as prefigured in the passover, the manna, the shew-bread, the offering of fine flour, &c., and here, too, there were several maxims current among them in consequence. "Una est domus Ecclesiae," says the Pseudo-Cyprian, epitomising them (App. ad Op. S. Cyr. p. cxv. ed. Ben.). "In qui agnus editur: nullus ei communicat, quem Israelitici nominis generisitas non commendat;" excommunication, as well as the exclusion of the unbaptized, may be traced to this. "Hijus panis figura fuit manna, quod in deserto sustinebat Alitum versus sanitatem in sacramento promissionis ventum est, cibus iste defect. . . . Panis iste Angelorum omne delectamentum habens virtute mirifici, omnibus qui digné et devoté sumunt, secundum desiderium sumum sapit, et amplius quàm manna illud eremi implicit et satiat edendum appetitus" (ib.); spiritual communications may be traced to this.

2. Contrariwise, such passages as St. Luke xxiv. 36-39; St. John x. 19, 20, and 26, 27; and 1 Cor. xiv. 42-50, are passed over, comparatively, by the Fathers untouched: as though they shrank from measuring the facts recorded in the two first by the dogmatic teaching of the third. "It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." . . . As it is written: "the first man Adam was made a living soul, the last Adam was made a quickening spirit." For this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, neither doth corruption inherit incorruption." And certainly Christ, in shewing Himself to His disciples after His resurrection, said: "Flesh and bones are not able"—not flesh and bones, but a body like this—"to have everlasting life and dominion." Notwithstanding, we talk of His "natural body" to this day, as though St. Paul had never spoken: as though its properties and composition had undergone no change, when it was "raised in glory:" as though it was still held in subjection to all the laws, physical and material, under which He was graciously pleased it should be born.

Assuredly the Fathers never asserted this, or anything like this, in maintaining its identity. What dispensed them from speculating on its glorified attributes in this case was, that they looked to nothing short of omnipotence to effect its presence: and affirmed, "unus ore," consecration to be the act of the Third Person in the Godhead.

It only remains to be shown that, in the opinion of the Fathers, to receive the Eucharist without proper dispositions, was to receive the sign without the thing signified: and to room damnation in so receiving. (Art. EXCOMMUNICATION.) There was no place for the "onus operatur," as it is called, in the system. The words of two writers of the 7th and 8th centuries respectively—whose works consist of passages from the Fathers dovetailed—are sufficient to attest this. St. Hildegardus says: "Post regenerationem nativitatis spirituale, post gratiam coelestis uctionis . . . convenit jam per venire ad participationem coelestis refectionis." Eorum enim est diocere, Pater noster, Qui est in coelis, qui jam Patre tali regenerati sunt et aqua et spiritu, ut confidenter petant dicere, Paternum quominus illum meum hic possum Christum dari nobis quotidie petimus, ut qui in Christo manemus et vivimus, a sanctificatione et corpore Christi non recedamus . . . Hoc enim et manducare illam escam, et illum bibere potass, in Christo manere, et illum manentem in se habere. Ac per hoc, qui non manet in Christo et in quo non manet Christus, procul dubio sec manducat Eius carmen, nescibit Eius sauginem: etiamtati teae sacramentum ad judicium sibi maiusculert et habuit" (De Cps. Bapt. c. 136). And Leidrad, still more explicitly: "et illum est: et illum est in Christo, ut illum sit in virtute sacramenti. Salus autem et vita aeterna non est ex terris in sacramentum: nam hoc etiam infeudes sumere possint: sed interius sumon potest in virtute sacramenti, quae non sumitur nisi ab his qui veraciter sunt pi et fideis: et imitatores Dei, sicut filii carissimi, et ambulant in dilectione, aut et Christus dilexit eos . . . Quod autem interius sit in virtute sacramenti, quare invisibilis praestat ablationem, sanctificationem, et vitam—sicut aqua baptismatis, uctio christmatis, et corpus ac saugus Domini—nullus utique fidelinor ignorat . . . Proper quot aula esse secures debet de perceptione sacramentorum, nisi virtutem invisibilitatem tenet et custodit. Haec igitur omnia ideo tali modo diciunt. Quo nisi sumus exponem opusculo plebeo dominus nobis commissam." (De Sacram. Bapt. c. 16)

This is as outspoken as it is true.

Works on the Eucharist illustrative of the teaching of this period are not as easily named as might be supposed. Learned, but not always impartial or exact exponents of its dogmas, are not to be found in Marchedd, Concord. Patr.; Kep, Tertullian; Bingham, Hist. xiii.-xv.; Assenini, Diss. ad Cod. Liturg. vol. iv.; Renaudot, Diss. ad Liturg. Orient. vol. i.; Le Brun, Diss. in Explic. de la Messes, vol. iii.; Mabillon, de Liturg. Gall.; Muratorii, Diss. in Liturg. Rom. vol. i.; Gour, Euchol. Illustrat.; Palmer, Diss. in Orig. Liturg. vol. i. and vol. ii. c. iv.; and Neile, Eastern Ch. Introd. bk. iii. To another class belong the Schoolmen on Bk. iv. Diss. 8-13 of the Sentences, or extracts from the Fathers, of Peter Lombard. Tracts of Bessarion and others at the time of the Council of Florence in Renaudot, Gennadii et al. Opusc.; De la Bigue, Bibl. Pat. vol. iii. and the Libriepistul. of the Euchologion, &c., in Greek and Latin, Paris, 1560. To a 3rd, Albertin, de Euchar. Sacram.; Tottet, Diss. ad S. Cyril. ii. 9-12; Sausaux, Panop. Socor. ii. 1.; Suicer, Thesaur. a. v. "Synaxis," Pfaff, Diss. ad S. Iren. Praem. vol. i. and ii.; Mede, Christian Sacrifice; Hicks, Christian Priesthood; Wurder, A. Br. de De Sacri. Conc. N. C. tr. of the S. opus. by M. de Smet, an execution course, &c.; Lake, Sermon on St. Matt. xxvi. 26-8; Johnson, Unbloody Sacrifice, and Willerforce, Doctrine of the Holy Eucharist. [E. S. H.]}
EUCHARIUS (Eucharius), bishop of Valerina c. A.D. 492. He was deprived by Gelsius I. for maladministration of the revenues of his diocese. Ammianus and Ugelhi suppose him to have been deprived by Gelsius II. and consequently to have lived a.D. 1119. Cappelletti gives reasons for considering this an error. (Sulpicio Ammiano, Vercorin di P. v.; Valerina, Ec. p. 91; Ugelhi, Itat. Sacr. i. 349; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xviii. 213.) [R. S. G.]

EUCHARIUS (1), brother of Ephrius, and martyred at the same time [Euphlius], is said to have been a bishop, about a.d. 362, and by some is considered founder of the church of Treves. In the legend of Maternus, bishop of Cologne, the see of Treves was founded in the 1st century, and Maternus, Eucharius, and Valerias were the first bishops. (Greg. Tur. Vit. Pat. cap. 17, § 4, p. 1237; Gall. Chef. xiii. p. 371; Ozanam, La Cie. Cn. chez les Francs, c. 20, 21.) [J. G.]

EUCHARIUS (2), the head of the clerical body of Constantinople after the deposition of Nestorius. He is addressed as "Iliustri-simus" by the council of Ephesus in 431 on the day when sentence was passed on Nestorius, and enjoined, along with the presbyters, the deacon, and the rest of the clergy, to take charge of every thing pertaining to the church of Constantinople, and render an account to whoever should be appointed in the room of Nestorius. (Mansi, Concil. iv. p. 1226.) [C. H.]

EUCHARIUS (3), bishop of Durrbachium (Durnes) in Epirus. Present at the council of Ephesus, a.d. 431. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 240; Mansi, iv. 1153.) [J. de S.]

EUCHARIUS (4), Eucharius, 17th bishop of Tongres (afflata Linea), following Quirinus. The Sammaritani place his accession about a.d. 487, while others say 527 or 535. He is believed to have been the brother of his successor Falco, (Ital. Christ. iii. 817.) [C. H.]

EUCHARIUS (5) II. appears in the Gallis Christianis (iii. 818). 19th bishop of Tongres, succeeding Falco and followed by Dominianus, consecrated in a.d. 512. Though an anonymous catalogue asserts that he was a son of a count of Flanders and a princess of England, and that after an episcopate of three years he died and was buried at Utrecht, such a statement is of course absurd; nothing certain is known of him, and the Series of Gams (p. 248) does not recognise his existence. His name, however, is found in Herigerus in the order above given, and Agitius accompanies some rather vague praise with the statement that he was believed to have died Feb. 27. (See Chapeaule, qui Gesta Pontificium, fol. om. p. 37.) [S. A. B.]

EUCHARIUS (6), fifteenth in the list of the bishops of Châlons-sur-Marne, succeeding Papius and followed by Tattinodus, about the middle of the 6th century. (Gall. Christ. ix. 862; Le Comte, Ann. Eccl. Franc. a. 580 n. iii. tom. ii. 197; Gams, Series Episc. 554.) [S. A. B.]

EUCHERIA, wife of Dynamius Patricius, according to an ancient epiphany. (Duchesne, Hist. Franc. Scriptores, i. 518.) [C. H.]

EUCHERIUS (1), St., bishop of Lyons in the 5th century. The date of birth is uncertain, but it most probably falls within the last quarter of the 4th century. He became bishop about a.d. 434, and may perhaps be considered as the most distinguished occupant of the see of Lyons, St. Irmenius alone excepted. He died in a.d. 440 or 450.

Name.—Eucherius is a Latinized form of the Greek ëxuchêos (skilled-of-hand), which, in its earlier shape ëxûros, first appears in legendary narratives, as a fitting name for an artist (cf. Sophocles, Oed. Col. 472, árphs ëxûros têxên) and was subsequently assigned to real persons. The feminine form, Eucheria, is also found.

Authorities.—Sidonius Apollinaris, Epist. Lib. iii. 8. St. Ildorius, de Ecclesiastica Scriptoribus, cap. xv. Genadius, de Illustriis Ecclesiis Scriptoribus, cap. lixiIII. Cassianus, some of whose Collationes (xi.—xviii.) are addressed to Eucherius and Honoratus. [CASSIANUS.] Also notices in the works of mm. Claudianus, St. Dodocus of Nola, and others; the acknowledged writings of Eucherius (see below) and the acts of the first council of Orange (Concil. Aroacum) in a.d. 441. (Labe, Concil. tom. i. p. 1783, ed. Parisii, 1715.) Alone, among the fourteen prelates signing the acts of this council, Eucherius adds, after the word subscrit, "sanctorum sacrodocum commovit super his expectaturus assensuum;" thus apparently claiming the rights of a metropolitan, inasmuch as the term sacerdotes here seems from the context to mean bishops.

Life.—Eucherius was born in a high social position, and it seems probable that either his father, Valerianus, or else a cousin of the same name, was nearly connected with Avitus, who in a.d. 455 exchanged the comparatively safe position of a noble among the Arverni (Auvergne) for the more precarious one of an emperor of the West, at Rome, from which he was deposed in the following year. Eucherius married a lady of his own station, named Galla. The issue of this marriage was a family of four children; two daughters, Consortia and Volusia, and two sons, Salonius and Veranius. The sons received an ecclesiastical education in the monastery of Lerinum under St. Honoratus and Salvianus; and both were consecrated to the title of the bishop of the monastery on the Books of Kings falsely ascribed to Eucherius, to have been raised, during the lifetime of their father, to the episcopal dignity.

The civic duties of Eucherius (we do not know their exact nature) appear to have been discharged conscientiously and vigorously. Sidonius Apollinaris is loud in the praise of his friend as a layman, and compares him (Epist. viii.) to the Brutus and Torquati of old. But the world, certainly at that date in a very turbulent and unsettled condition, palled upon Eucherius, and he became desirous of some tranquil retreat from its cares and temptations. Accordingly, while in the vigour of life, he retired to the island of Lerinum, the smaller of the two islands now known as the Lérins, off Antibes, in the modern French department of Var; and subsequently to the larger one of Lero, now called Sainte-Mar-
EUCHERIUS OF LYONS

quam amoena sunt quereantibus Christum illa secretae, quae longe latique, naturali excelsae, prorecta sunt. Silent omnia. Tunc in Deum suum laeta mens quisquidam silentii stimulis excitatur, tunc inefabilibus vegetatur excelsibus. It seems possible, that some real love of nature is here combined with religious transport.

2. Epistola paraenetica ad Valentinum aquatum. "De contemptu mundi et vacuaria philosophia." The tone of this letter much more resembles that which would be adopted towards a kinsmen than a parent. Moreover the parental relationship would have been given in the title. Its date is probably about A.D. 492. Eucherius evidently intends to induce his highly-placed and wealthy kinsman to resign his station and riches, and follow him in retirement from the world. Valerian is reminded of the many saintly doctors of the church who had once occupied an exalted secular position; such as Clement of Rome, Gregory Thaumaturgus, Gregory Nazianzen, Athanasius Basilius, and others. The Latin of this epistle is flowing and even elegant. Despite a certain amount of rhetorical redundancy, characteristic of the age, it was the approbation of the slightly fastidious Ermias, who published an edition of it, accompanied by Scholia, at Basle, A.D. 1520.

3. De orator spirituallis intellectu [al formis spirituallis intellectu] ad Veranum filium. This work has been sometimes mistakenly ascribed to Bede, who frequently quotes it. It is a defence of the lawfulness of the allegorical sense of Scripture, pleading on its behalf the testimony of Scripture itself; as e.g. Ps. cxix. [cxvii. A.V.] 2, and the use of such phrases as "the land of God," "the eyes of the Lord," etc. which cannot be taken ad literam. However, the literal sense has its place for history, as well as the moral, and allegorical. This treatise occupies nearly seventeen folio pages. It certainly does display a very extensive acquaintance with the Bible and anticipates many favorite sages eresults of modern commentaries. It is known by the term amagoge (traversy) for the application of scripture to the heavenly Jerusalem, identification of the digites Dei with the Holy Spirit (St. Luke xi. 20, with St. Matt. xii. 28) and the like.

4. Instructionum Libri duo ad Salomonem filiam. Of this treatise a book discoursing in allegories in the Old and New Testament, the latter of Hebrew names. In lib. i. the author discusses the scriptural evidence for the doctrine of the Holy Trinity; the permission of polygamy to the patriarchs; the existence of evil, which (with many other divines) he makes simply the privation of good, &c. The second book does not seem to display any very deep and mystic acquaintance with Hebrew, but it was something to denote any study to a language known to few of the fathers except Origen and Jerome. Eucherius quotes with much respect the version of the O.T. by Aquila.

5. Homiliae. These are given at the end of the second Oecesiastic of Theodosius Vitalis in an edition published by Livinus at Antwerp a.d. 1602.

6. Epitome Operum Cassianiem. This is ascribed to our author by some; but it is lost, so that we have no internal evidence to guide us. The respect entertained for Cassian by Eucherius makes such a compilation on the part of the latter by no means improbable.

8. Historia Passiones S. Maurici et Sociorum Martyrum Lejionis Felicia Theobalds Agaunensis. There is no cognate internal evidence in favour of the ascription of this narrative to Eucherius, and hence it is reckoned by some as doubtful. But there does not seem to be sufficient ground for impugning the traditional belief concerning the authorship. For a discussion of its contents see MAURICIUS.

9. De Statu Animae. This is assigned to our author by Claudianus Mamertus, bishop of Vienne.

Other treatises and homilies are extant, which must, however, be decidedly abjured from Eucherius; such are the following.

1. Commentarius in Genesis. 2. Commentarium in Libros Regum Libri IV. 3. Sacrorum Capitula Scripturam. These works are all composed in a style very different from that of the works of Lyons. That one of the books of Kings contains an eulogy (lib. iii. cap. 18) on the senator Cassidorus, who was not born until some twenty years after the death of Eucherius. Moreover St. Gregory the Great is cited, who was born about 540, nearly a century after the same event. In the same category must be ranked 4. Epistola ad Paulum; 5. Epistola ad Piiatium; 6. Regula duplex ad Monachos. 7. Homiliarum Collectio, a set of sermons which is variously ascribed to Eusebius of Emesa, or to Gallicanus.

Editions.—There is no complete edition of the writings of Eucherius. For this article recourse has been had to the Bibliotheca Patrum Latinorum (Lugduni, A.D. 1677 (tom. vi. p. 822), for Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4: with which may be compared the Bibliotheca Patrum (Colom. A.D. 1618, tom. v. p. 1) of an edition by Brasius (Basill. A.D. 1551); the Chronologia et Fastae Lejonesis by Vincentius Barnalis (Lugduni, A.D. 1613) and the list of Eucherius contained in their continuation, which was begun in his Biblioth. Patr. Lat. tom. ii. cap. v. § 36. The account of St. Maurice (No. 5 in the above list) was edited in an inconsistent and indefinite shape by L. Surius, and in a not much better condition by Mommitzus. At length Father Chifflet, S. J., found a copy in a celebrated monastery of the Jura, and his copy has been adopted by Ruinart, who has given it, with copious notes, in his Acta Martyrum (2nd ed. Amstelodami, A.D. 1713).

Some confusion has arisen from the existence of a second Eucherius, who must have flourished a century later. [EUCHERIUS (4).] Some have maintained that Lyonnais was also the see of this Eucherius. But of this there is no trustworthy evidence. It has been made the subject of a dissertation by Jos. Antelmius Assertio pro unico S. Eucherio Lugdunensi episcopo (Paris, 1728).

[J. G. C.]

EUCHERIUS (2), ST., placed first in the series of the bishops of Viviers by Gams, and fourth by the authors of the Gallia Christiana, succeeding St. Maupicius, and followed by St. Firminus, but his position in the list is a matter of conjecture, and his date is unknown. Gams dates the fifth bishop A.D. 432. (Gall. Christ. rrr. 542; Gams, Series Episc. 556.) [S. A. B.]

CHRETIEN ECOLE—VOL. II.
EUCHERIUS—LAYMEN

later elevated to a position of honour by France, bishop of Liège. He is commemorated Feb. 20.
(Gall. Christ. viii. 1417; Baron. A. E. an. 741.
i. Sigeib. Gmbhac. Chron. in Bouquet. iii. 346.)

[S. A. B.]

EUCHERIUS (9) (LEXICIARUS), twenty-eighth in the very untrustworthy lists of the bishops of Geneva, succeeding Huportonus, and followed by Gubertus, in the last half of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 384; Gams, Series Episc. 277.)

[S. A. B.]

EUCHERIUS (9) FLAVIUS, consul, with Flavius Evagrius, when Gregory Nazianzen made his will. (Greg. Naz. Test.)

[E. V.]

EUCHERIUS (10), eldest son of Stilicho by Serena. His birth, which took place at Rome in 389, is celebrated by Claudian (de Laud. Stil. iii. 176 foll.). Orosius (Hist. vii. 37, 38) and Philostratus (Hist. xii. 2) accuse Stilicho of having designs upon the empire for his son (cf. Soz. Hist. vi. 46). Zosimus (v. 39) represents Eucherius, son of Stilicho, as the charge as a lamb of Olympius. Eucherius, who, according to Orosius (vii. 38), was from his early years an enemy of the Christian faith and bent on persecuting it, in order to please the barbarians restore the heathen temples and destroyed Christian churches. When his father was seized at Ravenna (A.D. 408), Eucherius fled to Rome, and took refuge in a temple. Orders arrived from Honorius to put him to death, and they were executed by the eunuchs Arscarius and Terentius, just before the arrival of Alaric (Philost. xii. 3; Zosim. v. 34).

[M. F. A.]

EUCHERIUS (11), addressed by Sidonius Apollinaris (Eppl. iii. 8), who describes him as exercising the virtues of the old Roman statesman with slight reward from the degenerate times. He was probably the senator whose death by the treachery of duke Victorinus, the officer of Eutric the Visigoth, is related by Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. ii. 20).

[E. R. S.]

[J. G.]

EUCHITES. Doctrines and Practices.—At the beginning of the last quarter or 4th century or a little earlier, fanatics made their appearance in Syria, whose manner of life was said to have been introduced from Mesopotamia, and who were known by the Syriac name of Messalians or Messalians (τῆς Μεσσαλίας, praying people, Ἡρακλ. οὖσα τῆς Βαλδαίς. found in the Chaldee (Daniel vii. 11, Ezra vi. 10). Epiphanius, whose account of these people is the last article (80) of his work on heresies, translates the name (ἐβύθριος, but in the next generation the Messalians had obtained a technical name in Greek also, and were known as Euchites (ἐβύθριος or ἑβύθριος). Their chief characteristic was that they professed to give themselves entirely to prayer, refusing to do any work, and living by begging; in this differing from the Christian monks of the time, who supported themselves by the labour of their hands. A further difference was that they were of both sexes, who went about together; nay, in summer weather lying down and sleeping in the streets, men and women promiscuously, as persons who had renounced the world, and had no possession or habitation of their own. Epiphanius willing to believe that much impurity resulted from this practice, but does not pretend to have any knowledge of this as a fact. Epiphanius dates the commencement of this sect from the reign of Constantius, who died A.D. 361. Theodoret, who speaks of it (Hy. E. iv. 11; Haer. Fab. iv. 13), places its beginning a few years later under Valentinian. There does not seem to be any real foundation for the charge that the Euchites were derived from the Manichees. Epiphaniusconnects them with the heathen devotees whom he calls Euphemites, and who it seems had also been known as Messalians, and it is quite possible that before the Christian Euchites, sages had gone about in these regions, unconnected with Christianity, who under pretence of devotion lived an idle life. The Euchites appear never to have made any entrance into the West, but in the East, though probably at no time very numerous, they are heard of for centuries; and when the Bogomiles of the 12th century appeared, the name Messalian still survived, and the new heretics were supposed, and perhaps with truth, to be descendants of the ancient sect.

In the time of Epiphanius the Messalians would seem to be scarcely entitled to be called a sect. He describes them as having no settled system and no recognised leader; and he does not impute to them no error of doctrine, but only criticizes their manner of life. He tells, for instance, that they had no regard for the church times of fasting, and no fixed times for eating, but, when after their prayers they were hungry, they ate and drank such food as they could get, no matter what the hour or season might be. Epiphanius states also that one of these people would claim to be any person you might name to him: name our Blessed Lord Himself, or any angel, prophet, or patriarch, and he would say that that was himself.

Two accounts of Euchite doctrine are apparently of greater antiquity than the authors who preserve them. One is given by Timotheus (de Exceptione Haer. in Coteller's Mon. Eccl. Gr. iii. 400). This writer was a presbyter of the church of Constantinople, and his date cannot be more closely assigned than as of the 6th century. The coincidences of his account with the notices of Theodoret are too numerous to be well explained except on the supposition that both used common sources. These sources probably were the acts of the councils of Antioch and Side, presently to be mentioned, which contained summaries of Messalian doctrine. Theodoret may possibly also have used a Messalian cook called Asceticus, the doctrines of which, Photius tells us, had been exposed and anathematized at the council of Ephesus 431. But in any case it is likely that the same book furnished the heads of the ignoble doctrine of the Messalians taken from their own book," which are given by Ioannes Damascenus (de Haer. ap. Coteler, Mon. Eccl. Gr. L. 302, and Opp. Le Quen. l. 95), but which would seem also (see Wolf, Hist. Bogomil. p. 11) to have been separately preserved in two MSS. at Leipzig (Acta Eruditorum, 1696, p. 299; 1699, p. 157; and in the Bodleian, Cod. Baroc. 185). From these sources we derive either the theory in which the Euchite practices originated, or else one which was soon devised to justify them.
EUCHITES

They held then that in consequence of Adam's sin every one had from his birth a demon, substantially united to his soul, which incited him to sin. For the expulsion of this demon baptism was ineffectual. Dealing only with past sin it did but shear off the surface growth, and did not touch the root of the evil. The true remedy was intense, concentrated prayer, continued till it produced the restitution and the volitions banished (καταδίωκε). In this the soul felt as sensible a consciousness of union with its heavenly bridegroom as an earthly bride in the embraces of her husband. Then the demon went out in the spirit or in the mucus of the nose, or was seen to depart in smoke or in dust, and there was in like manner sensible evidence of the entrance of the Holy Spirit. St. Augustine (Haer. 57), who here had some sources of information independent of Ephphanius, whom in this part of his work he has been abridging, ascribes to them a fancy that the Holy Spirit might be seen to enter in the appearance of innocuous fire, and the demon to pass out of the man's mouth in the form of a sow with her farrow. Possibly language intended by them metaphorically was misunderstood; for they described the soul of him who had not Christ in him as the abode of serpents and venomous beasts. They further thought he who was possessed and passioned in a demoniacal state could see the Holy Trinity with his bodily eye; that the three hypostases of the Trinität coalesced into one, which united itself with worthy souls. This doctrine no doubt furnishes the key to the account given by Ephphanius of the effacement of the sense of distinct personality in members of this sect. They held that in the passionless state at which they aimed a man might attain a perfection in which sin was impossible to him; he needed neither instruction for his soul nor fasting to discipline his body, for delicate food and luxurious living, which might be a temptation to others, could stir no evil desire in him. It is probably a misconception of their doctrine to suppose that they held his privileges extended to being guilty of licentious conduct without falling from his perfection. The soul of him who was "spiritual," for such they boasted themselves to be, was changed into the divine nature; he could see things invisible to others. It is not improbable of them used to dance by way of trampling on the demons which they saw, a practice from which they were called Choreutes. It is not wonderful to read that, absorbed in their mystic contemplation, they used to sleep great part of their time away; but the things they saw in their dreams, they took for realities, and boasted that they then acquired a knowledge of future events, that they saw the right road to the departed souls, and that they could read men's hearts. Both sexes might partake of this divine illumination, and they had female teachers, whom they honoured not only more than ordinary laymen, but more than the clergy. The use of the Lord's Supper they looked on as a thing indifferent; it could neither benefit the worthy nor harm the unworthy receiver; but there was no reason for separating from the church by refusing to partake of it. Indeed, so little did they wish to break with the church that they were said to have no scruple about denying and anathematizing their doctrines, a charge which seems to have been founded on the behaviour of the first convicted heretics of this sect, concerning which we shall speak presently. It has been already said that they refused manual labour, and lured by begging; and they disregarded all the ordinary forms of Christian charity in comparison of the merit of bestowing alms on one of their number. They had anything to say about our Lord's humanity, of which the most intelligible is that the body which He assumed had been full of demons, which it was necessary for Him to expel.

History.—The first whom we read of as a leader of the sect is Adelphius, and Adelphians was one of the many names which were known. He was neither priest nor monk, but an ordinary layman, and was of Mesopotamia. Ephphanius speaks of the Messalians of his time as not having any recognized leader, but he mentions that they came from Mesopotamia. Theodoret tells us that Flavian bishop of Antioch, having learned that Messalian doctrine was being propagated at Edessa (probably from the statement of Messalians in his own diocese that they had there been taught), sent a body of monks to bring the false teachers to Antioch. There they denied their doctrines, and charged their accusers with calumny. Flavian then used an artifice to have the accused by Adelphian means in the case of the Bogomiles. He affected to take the part of the accused, treated Adelphius, who was an old man, with great respect, and led him to believe that he would find in an aged bishop one able to understand and sympathize with views, which younger men rejected only from want of experience. Adelphius, having been thus enticed into a full disclosure of his sentiments, was rebuked in the words addressed by Daniel to the wicked elder (Susanna, 52) and punished as convicted out of his own mouth. He and his party were beaten, excommunicated and banished, and were not allowed, as they wished, the alternative of recantation, insomuch as no confidence was felt in their sincerity, especially because they were found communicating by writing in friendly terms with Messalians whom they had anathematized. We consider that it was on this occasion Flavian held a synod against the Messalians (Photius, 52) attended by three other bishops, namely of Seleucia, of Mesopotamian bishop, Martines, described by Photius as bishop of the Sulpicians, and Samus), and by about thirty priests and deacons. Besides Adelphius there were condemned on this occasion two persons named
EUCHITES

Sabas, one of them a monk and a synuchus, Eustathius of Edessa, Dadoes, Herman, Symeon, and others. Flavian wrote to the bishops of Edessa and its neighbourhood, acquainting them with what had been done, and received from them an approving reply. The Messalianists who had been banished from Syria went to Pamphylia, and there met new antagonists. They were again condemned by a council of twenty-five bishops held at Side and presided over by the celebrated Amphiloctius of Iconium. The council sent a synodical letter to Flavian, informing him of their proceedings, and in the Acts Amphiloctius gave a full statement of the Messalian tenets expressed in their own words. It is possible that the substance of this statement is preserved for us in the work of Timothy already referred to. Photius represents the synod at Antioch just mentioned as having been called in consequence of the synodical letter from Side, but this is more than doubtful. On comparing Photius with Theodoret, it seems plain that both narratives contain truth and falsehood. Amphiloctius and Theodoret mentions only one set of proceedings at Antioch, viz., that which ended in the banishment of the Euchites to Pamphylia. It is unlikely that after their expulsion they would or could have returned to Antioch to receive a new condemnation; and the synodical acts at Antioch contain no letter to Photius giving the council’s approval of anything done at Side, but only a letter to Edessa, as might be expected if the occasion of the council was that which we have assigned to it. We regard, therefore, Photius as misled by finding in the volume which he used the acts of the synod at Side coming before those of that at Antioch; and it is remarkable that Theodoret also, in his Eccl. Hist., mentions the proceedings in Pamphylia before mentioning those which resulted in the banishment of the Messalianists to Pamphylia. We cannot pretend to fix the year of these proceedings, but a date somewhere about 390 will not be very far wrong.

Other measures were taken against the Messalianists in Armenia also. Lecius bishop of Melitene by letter asked and obtained information from Flavian as to the proceedings against them in Antioch. Finding some monasteries in his diocese infected by this heresy, he set fire to these dens of robbers, and hunted the wolves from his sheepfold. A less zealous Armenian bishop was rebuked by Flavian for favour shown to these heretics. In Pamphylia the contest with them lasted for several years. The leaders on the orthodox side were another Amphiloctius, bishop of Side, and Verininus bishop of Perga. They were stimulated to their task by energetic letters from Atticus bishop of Constantinople, and later, in a.d. 426, from the Great Synod of Sisinius, the successor of Atticus, in which Theodotus of Antioch and another bishop named Neon are mentioned by Photius as having taken active parts. Messalianism had probably at that time given some trouble in Constantinople itself. Nilius (de Vol. Pap. ad Magnan, 21) complained to the bishop of Morina, Mesopotamia, Alexander, who polluted Constantinople with like teaching, and against whom he contends that the idleness they inculcated, instead of being an aid to devotion, gave scope to evil thoughts and evil passions, and was inimical to the true spirit of prayer. Tillemont has conjectured that this was the Alexander who about this time founded the order of the ademéte (see Dict. Christ. Anti.), but the identification is far from certain. There is no corroborative evidence that the latter was a heretic save that his name has not been honoured with the prefix of saint; and it is not likely that his institutions would have met with the success it did, if it could be represented as a scheme devised by a notorious Messalian to carry out the notions of his sect as to the duty of incessant prayer.

During the interval between the accession of Sisinius and the council of Ephesus in 431, John of Antioch wrote to Nestorius about the Messalianists, and Theodosius legislated against them (xxvi. Cod. Theod. de Haer., vol. vi. p. 187). At Ephesus Valerian of Iconium, and Amphiloctius of Side, in the name of the bishops of Lycaonia and Pamphylia, obtained from the council a confirmation of the decrees made against the Euchites at Constantinople in 428. They also desired the bishops of the Galatian church to read the Messalian book called Ascetics, passages from which Valerian laid before the synod. (Mansi, iv. 1477.) Fabricius names Agapius, and Walch Adelphius as the author of this book, but the writer is really unknown. These proceedings at Ephesus were unknown to Gregory the Great (Ep. ad Alex., ad. Norsem., ad. Nysa, c. 361), but are mentioned by Photius, and the decree was read at the second council of Nicæa. (Mansi, xii. 1025.) The cause of Gregory’s oversight may have been that his correspondent cited to him as Ephesine the acts of the council of Antioch, and that Gregory searched the Ephesian acts in vain for the names of Adelphius and Sabas. We learn from the Ephesian decree that Messalianism had also been condemned at Alexandria, and Timotheus mentions Cyril as an antagonist of these heretics. There is a passage (Pp. ad Caloryrium, prefixed to the tract Ad. Anthymop., vii. 363) in which Cyril rebukes certain monks who refused to work, and made picture for licence, but it is not even sure that these monks were Euchites. The articles of the Ascetics were the subject of twenty-four anathemas by Archelaus (who occupied the see of Cæsarea in Cappadocia some time between the two Ephesine synods of 431 and 440, being at the latter date a different bishop in that see) and of two letters by Hippolytus of Nysa, who also may be placed about 440. The next Euchite leader of whom we read is Lampetius. He was so prominent that his followers were called after him Lampetians, and he is said to have been the first of the sect who attained the dignity of the priesthood. He had been ordained by Alypius, whom we know, from a correspondence as being the bishop of Cæsarea, the successor of the first bishop of Cæsarea (Cappadocia) in 458. He was accused to Alypius by the presbyter Gerontius, superior of the monks at Gilitis, on the charge of undue familiarity with women, of unseemly language on the subject, of scoffing at those who took part in the musical services of the church, and of being a melos when they ought to make melody only in their hearts, and of other Euchite doctrines and practices. The examination of the charge was delegated by Alypius to Hermias, bishop of Comana, and the result was that Lampetius was deemed and degraded from the priesthood.
EUROBERRY

He wrote a work called the Testament, to which an answer was written by the Monophysite Severus, who afterwards became bishop of Antioch. A fragment of this answer is preserved in a catena belonging to New College, Oxford. (Wolf, Ascendota Graecos, iii. 182.) It insists on the duty of praising God, not with the heart only, but with the voice also.
The same catena contains an extract from another work of Severus against the Euchites, an epistle to a bishop Solomon. This extract accounts for the cessation of miracles in the Christian church.
Photius tells that in Rhinocorura two persons named Alpheus, one of them a bishop, defended the orthodoxy of this Lampeitus, and were in consequence deposed. He learned this from a letter written by Photias, another bishop of the same district, to Timotheus of Alexandria.
There have been at Alexandria several bishops of that name, but it is likely that the Timotheus intended is he who was contemporary with Lampeitus, and who died from 460 to 482.
The next Messalian leader of which we read (ju Timotheus) is a money-changer named Marian, who lived in the middle of the 6th century, and from whom these sectaries came to be called by the somewhat confusing name of Marcionites. The correspondence of Gregory the Great, already referred to, arose out of the controversy which used this term. The See was tr建立 in the West, in 595, of one John, a presbyter of Chalcedon. He appealed to the pope, who pronounced him orthodox, complaining that he had not even been able to make out from his accusers what the heresy of Marcionism was.

In the 7th century Maximus, in his scholia on the Pseudo Dionysius (II. 89), charges those whom he describes by the various equivalent names of Lampetianus, Messalianus, Apollonis, and Marcianis, with writing but three years to ascetic life, and abandoning the rest of their life to all manner of debauchery. Assemani (Bibl. Or.
vel. ill. pt. 2, p. 170), in his account of the schisms, states that the Syrian Nestorians fleeing from Oriental sources several notices, reaching from the year 577 to 694, of the attempts of the Nestorians to put down Messalianism, in which mention is made of the averse of these heretics to the use of the Lord's Supper, to fasting, and to church psalmody. The article in Photius on anti-Messalian literature, already cited, implies that the sect was, in his time, not yet extinct.

We hear no more of the Messalians till the breaking out of the Bogomil heresy in the 12th century. The history of that controversy lies out of the period embraced by this dic-tionary. What was asserted by the writers of the period concerning the early history of the sect may be conveniently consulted in Tellius (Joseph Itin. Ital.), where is found the work on the Messalians of Euthymius Zigabenus, with extracts relating to these heretics from Con-tantine Harnopolus, and Michael Psellus.
Euthymius, for instance, ascribes the origin of the sect to a certain Peter, or Wolf, Peter, so called because the spectators, assembled to witness the fulfillment of his promise that after three days he would rise again, saw only the demon in the form of a wolf escaping from the cairn under which he lay; and he speaks of a certain Tychicus, his disciple, who corrupted and misinterpreted the Scriptures, especially the Gospel according to St. Matthew. Harnopolus complies of their abominating the cross, holding the Virgin and John the Baptist in no honour, breaking marriages, and allowing those who would to mutilate themselves, and he ascribes certain immoral teaching to one Eleutherus, a Paphlogian. Psellus circumstantially tells of these heretics the old stories of "Oedipodean intercourse" and "Thyestean banquets." All these things, for which no early authority can be cited, may safely be set aside. A later revival of Messalian ideas took place in the mysteries of Mount Athos of the 14th century.

To the various names already mentioned by which the Euchites were known may be added that of "Enthusiasts," given by Theodoret, which is used in some of the decrees against them; and "Eustathians," given by Timotheus. There was a Messalian Eustathius of Edessa, but this name was probably derived from the better known Eustathius of Sebaste. The name Psalliani only originated in a transcriber's error. We have already referred to the corruption of this article by the principal ancient writers who speak of the Messalians. We have only to add references to Ephrem Syrus (Opp. Syr.-Lat. ii. 485). A passage quoted from his Testament is proved by the Syriac to have been an interpolation in the Greek text (Opp. Gr.-Lat. ii. 242, 403; Assemani, Bibl. Or. i. 145). There is also reference in Jerome most usefully be consulted are Tillemont, viii.
530; Walch, Hist. der Ketz. iii. 418; and Neander, Ch. Hist. iii. 323.

[ G. S. ]

EURODOLIS (EURODOLIS, ASCIALIZUS, ACHOSlius), a man at Constantinople sobemared to assassinate the Patriarch Macedonius. The attempt failed, and Macedonius showed a questionable kindness by ordering gifts to be presented to him.
xxxvi. part i. 576; Thoph. Chronicon. 108.)

[W. M. C.]

EUROSOCIA (Eurosocia), wife of the orator and poet Delphius, described as a noble matron of Bordeaux. After the rescript of Gratian, 381, against the Priscillians, when Priscillian, accompanied by Instantius and Salvianus, undertook a journey through Gaul to Italy to clear themselves and their party before pope Damasus of the charges against them, after being repelled by the bishop of Bordeaux, Delphius, they found a refuge on the lands of Eurosocia. There they successfully sowed the seeds of their heresy.
They went on thence to Milan and Rome, accompanied by Eurosocius and her daughter Procula.
A crowd of others, women especially, accompanied them. Injured calumniations were vigorously circumvented against mother and daughter by their religious opponents. Eurosocius was beheaded at Trevires, 386, with Priscillian and his chief associates (Sulp. Sev. ii. 45, 51; L. Pac.
Drep. in Panayrici Vetere, xii. 29; Prosperi Chronicon, s. a.; Ausonius, de Profess. Burdeogal.
Carm. vi.).

[M. B. C.]

EURODULIS [EUCONIUS]

EUROCRATUS, bishop, who consults Cyprian as to the Christian lawfulness of the calling of a EUDAEMON

stage-tutor (Cyp. Ep. 2); probably the same as Eucratius bishop of Thess, a seaport in the Byzacene province (Sant. Epiph. 29 in Concil. Carth. sub Cyp. de Bapt. 3. Cf. August. de Bapt. vi. 36). [E. W. B.]

EUDAEMON (1), bishop of Smyrna, who was prevailed upon to offer sacrifice during the persecution of Decius. A.D. 250. He was standing by when Pionius the martyr refused to sacrifice. (Euseb. vi. 15; Act. Synod. Feb. 1, 40). [T. W. D.]

EUDAEMON (8) (Eibadaur, Eusthemon), a Mysian bishop, who with others was sent by his party to the emperor Constantine, with frivolous charges against Athanasius, A.D. 328 (Socrates, H. E. i. 27; Athanasius, Apol. § 60; Baronius, s. a. 329, 1; Pagi, Crit. in loc. and s. a. 327, v.). He was bishop of Tania in the province of Augustana Prima (Le Quien, Oriens Christ., ii. 355), and was one of those who withdrew from the council of Sardica, A.D. 347, and met at Philippopolis. He also signed the synodal letter of that assembly (Mansi, iii. 139). In the Acta his name appears as Eusthemon. [T. W. D.]

EUDAEMON (3), A.D. 389, presbyter at Constantinople, who prevailed on Nectarius the metropolitan to abolish the office of Pententary Presbyter, an example followed almost throughout the Eastern church. The office had lasted rather more than 130 years, when about 389 a noble lady who had confessed to the pententary and received disciplinary advice came back shortly to confess that she had since committed adultery with a deacon. Great popular excitement arose, and Eudaemon represented to Nectarius that the only way to save the church from obloquy was to abolish the office altogether and leave participation in communion to be decided by the individual conscience. Socrates the historian received this account from Eudaemon himself. Socrates appears to have been conservative in the matter, for he said to Eudaemon, "Whether, O presbyter, your counsel has been profitable to the church or otherwise, God will make it known. But I see that it takes away the means of rebuking another one's faults, and prevents our acting upon that precept of the apostle, Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reproue them." (Socr. Eccl. Hist. v. 19; Sozom. Eccl. Hist. vii. 16; Bingham, xviii. 3, vol. p. 138.) [W. M. S.]

EUDAEMON (5), bishop of Lampacus, a confessor for images, commemorated by the Greeks on March 14 (Basil. Menol. 5. Baron. ad ann. 375, iii.). Baronius, who places him under Leo the Isaurian, writes the name Eudama, but his name appears to be more correctly Eusebium. There is a letter to him (num. 298) among the Epistolae Frederici A.D. 316. Theodore Studite (Patr. Gr. xxix, 1671). The Basilian Menology places him under the Iconoclasts generally. Le Quien (Or. Chr. i. 774) under Theophilus. [C. H.]

EUDO

EUDEM, clerical witness to the grant of the village of Bertus by King Ithael to the see of Llandaff in the time of bishop Berghewy, is the end of the 5th or early in the 6th century (Lid. Land. by Rees, 440-41). [J. G.]

EUDEMUS I, bishop of Patar in Lycia, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 977; Mansi, ii. 695.) [L. D.]

EUDEMUS II, bishop of Patar, one of the Lycian bishops who in A.D. 375 were reported to Basil as holding orthodox views and as desiring to enter communion with him. (Basil. Epist. 218 [405]). Eudemus of Patar was present at the council of Constantinople in A.D. 381. [E. V.]

EUDO, duke of Aquitaine at the beginning of the 8th century. Aquitaine, which in 530 had been brought directly under Frankish rule by Dagobert, in the confusion of the ensuing century became practically, though not technically, independent. The date of Eudo's accession and his origin are unknown. The supposition that he was a Merovingian, and a grandson of Charibert, on whose death in 530 Dagobert had annexed Aquitaine, has been disproved by Rabanus (Les Mérovingiens d'Aquitaine et la Chartre d'Aston, 1856, quoted by Richter and Breysig), who has shown that the document on which the theory rests is spurious.

In 719, Chilperic II. and his mayor Ragnfred made an alliance with Eudo against Charles Martel, and one of the conditions of the alliance was the recognition of the independence of Aquitaine ("Regnum et munera tradunt," Cont. Cont. 105, ap. Breysig, Jahrbücher des fränkischen Reichs, 714-741; Die Zeit Karl Martels, 1909, quoted by the same author, p. 50). The intended combined attack on Charles was unsuccessful [Charles Martel]. Eudo apparently retiring without fighting ("Eudo territus quod resistere ne valeret auffuit," Cont. Fred. 107; ap. Breysig, Karl. Mart., i. 31, note 10). Chilperic returned to Paris and was defeated at Soissons, took refuge with Eudo beyond the Loire (Gesta Fr. 58). The next year, 720, Cлотaire IV. having died, an arrangement was concluded between Charles and Eudo, by which Chilperic returned to Paris and was recognised by Charles as king of the Franks. What the position of Aquitaine was under the compact is obscure. Fauriel looks upon the treaty as a partition of the Merovingian kingdom between Charles and Eudo (Histoire de la Gaule méridionale, iii. p. 105); anyhow Eudo was to all intents and purposes independent. In the year 721, the Saracens crossed the Pyrenees, conquered Narbonne, and laid siege to Toulouse. Eudo at first defended the city, and when his leader El Samah, and drove them out of Aquitaine. (Chron. Meroving. s. a.)

There is some obscurity with regard to Eudo's connexion with the great Saracen invasion of Aquitaine ten years later, but the facts, as interpreted by Breysig, pp. 83 sqq., Fauriel, i. 115 sqq., and Drav Richter, Annalen der Geschicthe im Mittelalter sub anno, appear to be these. In the year 731 Eudo renounced his alliance with Charles, having given his daughter in marriage to Othman (Munusa), a military chief of the Saracens. (Ibid. ap. Bouquet, ii. pp. 270, 721.) Charles crossed the Loire twice during EUDOCETUS, where she spent the few remaining years of her life in emulating the piety of her grandmother [EUDOCIA (4)], whose name she bore, and beside whom she lived. Meanwhile, however, Othman had risen against Abderrahman, and had been defeated and slain. In the following year, 732, Abderrahman made the grand Saracenic invasion, not in alliance with Eudo. On the contrary, Eudo met the invaders on the Garonne, was defeated and fled to Charles (Chron. Moissac, v. 7.) Eudo fought with Charles at the battle of Tours (Paul. Disc. Hist. Lang. vi. 45), where Abderrahman was shortly after defeated and slain. All the Frankish chronicles, except the Chron. Moissac, make Eudo the ally of Abderrahman (knowing nothing of Othman), and omit all mention of Eudo’s resistance to the invaders, or his fighting at Tours on the Frankish side (Breyssig, p. 65, note 5). Eudo was reinstated in Aquitaine, but compelled to own allegiance to Charles (Ann. Mett. 732, Breyssig, 69). In 735 Eudo died, and Charles immediately invaded Aquitaine, and brought it into direct subjection. Eventually he allowed Eudo’s son Camoul or Huimold to be duke, on condition of recognising the superiority of the Frankish king. (Cont. Fred. 109 and Ann. Mett. s. a. 742.)

EUDOCETUS. For the account given by a section of the Valentiniens why this name was given to the Saviour see Irenaeus (I. vi. 4, p. 58).

EUDOCHELIA, a lady to whom, along with two others, Euchelia and Dominica, pope Gregory the Great sends greetings through Narses Patricius, A.D. 590. (Greg. Mag. Ep. lib. i. ind. ix. ep. 6. Patr. Lat. Lxxvii. 450.) In another letter of 597 to Narses, here called "religious" (ib. vii. ind. xv. ep. 50), he salutes her again with Dominics, "gloriosa filiae moans," Euchelia being then dead (Patr. Lat. 880).

EUDOCIA (1), martyr, Mar. 1, born at Samaria during the reign of Trajan. In her early days she lived an immoral life, but upon hearing a report of the repentance from a tomb named Germanus she resolved to live differently, went to Theodotus the bishop, and was baptized by him. Her former admirers giving information against her, she was arrested and brought before the emperor Aurelian (? Aurelius), and as she refused to relinquish her faith she was tortured and put to death. (Men. Bas.)

EUDOCIA (2), Aug. 4; called in Rom. Mart. i. She was seized at Bethabara (Bezasbaba) with 9000 others in a raid which Saper II. made into the Roman territory in 360. She was tortured and put to death. (Assem. Mart. Orient. i. 133; Bas. Menot.; Rom. Mart.)

EUDOCIA (3) (Eucodia), eldest daughter of Valentinian III. and Eudoxia. She was carried off to Africa by Genesius with her mother and sister, and given in marriage to his son Huneric. (frag. H. E. ii. 7; Priscus, de Leg. Gent. ch. xiv.; Nicoph. H. E. xvi. 11.) She lived sixteen years with her husband, and bore him a son, Hilderic, who afterwards succeeded to the throne. At the end of this period, hounding the society of an Arian consort, she escaped to Jerusalem, where she spent the few remaining years of her life in emulating the piety of her grandmother [EUDOCIA (4)], whose name she bore, and beside whom she lived. Meanwhile, however, Othman had risen against Abderrahman, and had been defeated and slain. In the following year, 732, Abderrahman made the grand Saracenic invasion, not in alliance with Eudo. On the contrary, Eudo met the invaders on the Garonne, was defeated and fled to Charles (Chron. Moissac, v. 7.) Eudo fought with Charles at the battle of Tours (Paul. Disc. Hist. Lang. vi. 45), where Abderrahman was shortly after defeated and slain. All the Frankish chronicles, except the Chron. Moissac, make Eudo the ally of Abderrahman (knowing nothing of Othman), and omit all mention of Eudo’s resistance to the invaders, or his fighting at Tours on the Frankish side (Breyssig, p. 65, note 5). Eudo was reinstated in Aquitaine, but compelled to own allegiance to Charles (Ann. Mett. 732, Breyssig, 69). In 735 Eudo died, and Charles immediately invaded Aquitaine, and brought it into direct subjection. Eventually he allowed Eudo’s son Camoul or Huimold to be duke, on condition of recognising the superiority of the Frankish king. (Cont. Fred. 109 and Ann. Mett. s. a. 742.)

EUDOCIA (2), AELIA, empress, wife of Theodoricus II. Marcellinus in his Chronicle calls her Achiva, and places her marriage in 421.

EUDOCIA (4), AELIA, empress, wife of Theodosius II. Marcellinus in his Chronicle calls her Achiva, and places her marriage in 421.

EUDOCIA (4), AELIA, empress, wife of Theodosius II. Marcellinus in his Chronicle calls her Achiva, and places her marriage in 421.

EUDOCIA (4), AELIA, empress, wife of Theodosius II. Marcellinus in his Chronicle calls her Achiva, and places her marriage in 421.

EUDOCIA (4), AELIA, empress, wife of Theodosius II. Marcellinus in his Chronicle calls her Achiva, and places her marriage in 421.
of each, Evagrius (H. E. i. 20, 22) tells us that she restored the walls of the city and many churches, including that of St. Stephen.

Hitherto her life had been happy, but her last years were overclouded by a misunderstanding between herself and her husband, the precise cause for which it is not easy to discover. Sovereign Marcellinus tells us (sub anno 444) that during a second visit of the emperor to Jerusalem (cf. Evag. i. 20, εξ Ιωαννο- λίμας δια δεμενίαν), Theodosius sent Saturninus with orders to put to death Severus the presbyter and John the deacon, who were in attendance on Eudocia, and that she, in her indignation at this act, had Saturninus also put to death. Marcellinus assigns no cause for this. The Chron. Pasch., Nicoporous, Zonaras, &c., give a different story. They say that the emperor having been presented by a peasant with a remarkably large apple, sent it to the empress. She gave it to Paulinus, the master of the palace, who was laid up with an attack of gout. Paulinus, not knowing its provisoratory, gave it to the emperor. This roused his suspicions, and he sent for his wife, and asked her what she had done with the apple. She protested that she had eaten it; and the consequence was that Paulinus was put to death and the empress divorced. Since this account is not given by the ancient historians, it seems fair to assume that it has been exaggerated, and we may exonerate the empress, of whom all the old authorities speak so highly, from blame. Still, there was apparently some misunderstanding between her and the emperor, which led to her second visit to Jerusalem. There it was that she died. She was buried in the church of St. Stephen at Jerusalem. (Evag. H. E. i. 22) Evagrius says that there is a doubt whether this was before or after the death of Theodosius, i.e. 450, but Nicoporous (H. E. xiv. 50) places her death in 460, the fourth year of the emperor Leo, which date is accepted by Gibbon. Nicoporous further tells us that she fell for a time into the Eutychian heresy, but finally returned to the orthodox faith, on the entreaty of Pulcheria, and after consultation with Euthymius (H. E. xv. 13). This temporary lapse does not alter the general judgment of the historians, who unite in lauding her piety and manifold benefactions to the church. (See also Du Cange, Fam. August. ii. 52, 58.)

EUDOCIA (5), FABIA (FLAVIA, Isid. Pacensis, Chron. ser. 649 in Pat. Lat. xxvi. 1253 a), empress, first wife of the emperor Heraclius. She was the daughter of Rogatus, an African noble, and was already betrothed to Heraclius when he revolted against Phocas in 606. At that date she was at Constantinople with Euphania the mother of Heraclius, and Phocas, on hearing of the revolt seized them both and imprisoned them in the monastery of the New Repentance. They seem however to have escaped further violence. On Oct. 3, 610, Heraclius arrived at Constantinople, and on Oct. 6 he and Eudocia were married and crowned. Both ceremonies took place according to Theophanes in the oratory of St. Stephen in the palace, but according to the Chronicon Paschale it was at St. Sophia. Sergius the patriarch officiated. Her daughter Euphania (also called Eudocia) was born July 7, 611, her son Heraclius Junior on May 3, 612. She herself died of epilepsy on Aug. 13, or as others say, Aug. 14, 612, and was buried in the Church of the Apostles. (Chron. Pasch. ann. 610, 611, 612, 624, in Migne, Patr. Gr. cxxi. 981, 985, 1002; Theoph. Chronog. A.D. 6102, 6104, in Migne, cxxxvi. 628, 639; Du Cange, Fam. August. Byzant. 100, ed. Venice.) [T. W. D.]

EUDOCIA (6), empress, third wife of Constantine Copronymus. She is said (Du Cange, u. inf.) to have been related to the Melissian family. The date of her marriage with the emperor is not mentioned; but her predecessor Maria died in 750 and Eudocia's third see by Constantine was born in 784. At her coronation on Saturday, Apr. 1, 769, the emperor declared her Augusta, and on Apr. 3, which was Easter Day, her two elder sons Christopher and Nicoporous were by the emperor declared Caesars, and Nicetasia her youngest son Nobilissimus. All three were invested with the robes and coronets of their respective ranks, and the patriarch said the prayers. On each day the ceremony was performed in the splendid Christmas banqueting hall of the palace known as the Tribunalia or Tribunal of the Nineteen Couches, i.e. Nicetasia (cf. Du Cange, Gloss. s. v. accebiut: s. d. Constantii Episcopi Constantinopolitani, Chron. Pasch. sec. 5, p. 107, ed. Venice, 1729; p. 135, ed. Paris). Subsequently to her coronation Eudocia gave birth to a fourth son, Eudocius or Eudosius. (Theoph. Chronog. A.D. 6200, 6208, in Patr. Gr. cxxxvi. 985, 988; Du Cange, Fam. August. Byzant. p. 105, ed. Venice.) [C. H.]

EUDOCIA. See also EUDOXIA.

EUDOCIMUS (Theoph. Chronog. 395, Patr. Gr. cxxxvi. 12, ed. cxxix. 1350 a), son of Constantine Copronymus. [EUDOXIA (14)].

EUDOCIUS, a youthful member of a monastic community at Caesarea, who, having quarrelled with the superior, Sacerdos, laid complaints against him before Heliodius, Basil's successor in the episcopate, which led to Sacerdos being deprived of his office. Gregory Nazianzen wrote three letters to Eudocius on this subject, rebuking him for his ill-feeling towards his superior, and calling upon him to become reconciled to one who still retained his old affection for him. To persevere in a quarrel was to admit the devil into the heart. Gregory expresses a readiness to receive a visit from Eudocius if the winter did not hinder him. (Greg. Naz. Epist. 224, 235, 236.)

EUDOLIUS, bishop of Toul. [EUDULUS].

EUDOXIA (1), martyr at Alexandria with Athanasia her mother, and two sisters, in the reign of Diocletian. Commemorated Jan. 31. (AA. SS. Jan. ii. 1081.)

EUDOXIA (2), wife of the emperor Arcadius, and mother of Eudoxia, Pulcheria, Arcadius, Theodosius II. and Marinus. She was a daughter of Bauto (Βαύτω) the Frankish general of Gratias (Philostorg. xi. 6; Zosim. v. 33), but was brought up in the house of one of the sons of the general Promotus (Zosim. v. 3). Her marriage with the emperor was arranged by the eunuch Eutropius.
EUDOXIA

(Εὐδοξια. ad loc.). Philostorgius tells us that she inherited the qualities of her nation (εὐδοξοί θεωρόμενοι ἀνδρὶς γενέσθαι τὸν ἀνόητον). If we may trust George of Alexandria in his Life of St. Chrysostom, her parents were Christians, for the bishop is represented as appealing to their well-known piety (Vit. Chrys. ch. 41). Philostorgius attributes the degradation and subsequent execution of Eutropius to Eudoxia's emnity against him. Sozomen and Socrates, however, do not assign any particular cause for it. After the death of Eutropius, she succeeded to his influence in the state, and by her overbearing conduct made the lives of all moderate men intolerable (Sozim. v. 24). In the year 400 she received the title of Augusta (Chrom. Pasch.). During the latter years of her life she comes into notice especially as the enemy and persecutor of St. Chrysostom, and for this period Sozomen is the chief authority. At first indeed we find her supporting him in his efforts to quell the Arian heresy (viii. 8, 4), but a short time afterwards her hatred for the matter of Severianus (viii. 10, 6). Shortly afterwards, some denunciations of the bishop against women in general were represented as being directed in reality against the empress, and she begged that the council might be summoned (ch. 16), by which he was subsequently deposed. The shame which this elicited compelled her to intercede with the emperor for his recall (18, § 5). The next cause of offence was a sermon which the bishop delivered against the honour paid to a statue of the empress which she had set up near the great church (Soz. vi. 18, § 1; Soz. viii. 20). She again tried to summon a council, and St. Chrysostom inveighed against her with the words, πάλιν ἡμῶν μαῖης, πάλιν δραχύει, πάλιν ἱδανὼν τὴν κεφαλὰν οὕτως σωκεῖσθαι λαβών. Her death, which occurred on Oct. 4, 404, soon after the second banishment of the bishop, was regarded by the people as a judgment of heaven (Soz. vi. 19). Some, however, and those most clearly represented by these historians as dying before St. Chrysostom, the letter attributed to Innocent I. communicating her and her husband after the death of the bishop must be regarded as spurious. (See also Du Cange, Fam. August. 66.)

EUDOXIA (3), LICINIA, empress, wife of Valentinian III., daughter of the emperor Theodosius II. and Eudoxia. She is described by Procopius as exceedingly beautiful. Marcellinus (Chron.) places her birth in 423, one year after the marriage of her parents according to his reckoning. She was the only one of their children who lived to mature age. In 424 she was betrothed to Valentinian, upon his assumption of the title of Caesar, she being two years old, and her future husband five. The marriage took place in 437 (Marcelli). The first arrangement was that it should be solemnized at Thessalonica, as midway between the two divisions of the empire, but Valentinian in his gallantry insisted upon coming the whole way to Constantinople (Soz. vii. 44). The day of the marriage in the Chronicon Paschale is Oct. 29. Whether she had two or three children is uncertain. The Chronic. Pasch. in one place (sub ann. 457) gives the names Eudocia and Placidia, and in another (sub ann. 455) Placidia and Honorina. Tillemont supposes that Honorina and Eudocia are different names of the same child. After the death of Valentinian in 455 Maximus espoused her by force, and also married her daughter to his son Palladius. (Idatius, Chron.; Prosper. Chron.) Preferring any danger to this disgrace, she sent to Generici, and promised to betray the capital into his hands. The plot succeeded, and Maximus was put to death. Eudocia and her daughters were carried off to Africa by Generici, who married the eldest, Eudocia, to his son Hunneric. The other daughter he sent with her mother to the emperor Michael at Byzantium. (Evag. H. E. ii. 7.) This is the account of Evagrius, but the truth seems to be that she remained in Generici's hands until the reign of Leo, and that the real year of her release was 462 as it is given in Idatius's chronicle. (Cf. Priscus, Hist. Goth. c. 7.) Procopius (De Bell. Vand. i. 5) leaves the matter doubtful, since he does not give the name of the emperor. This is the last known of Eudocia, in which he appears. She then passed the rest of her life quietly at court. Her second daughter was married to a senator, Olybrius. (Evag. ad loc. &c.; Du Cange, Fam. August. 59.)

[M. F. A.]

EUDOXIA. See also EUDOCIA.

EUDOXIANI, party of Eudoxius bishop of Constantinople. [EUDOXIUS (2).]

EUDOXIUS (1), bishop of Antioch in Pisidia, mentioned in the monographies (June 23) as baptizing and ordaining St. Eustochius during the reign of the emperor Maximian, c. A.D. 290. (Basil. Hist. c. 141; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1055.)

EUDOXIUS (2), eighth bishop of Constantinople (380-370), previously bishop of Germanicia and of Antioch, one of the most influential of all the Ariums. In 311 was martyred, at Antioch, and, according to Sophronius, he was one of those whom the Roman emperors were manifestly prepared to put to death. Eudocius was one of the chief men in the Church, who showed nobler elements in his death. This was his father. The son is said to have been of a mild and agreeable disposition, talented and clever but extremely timid, and given up to pleasure. Between 324 and 331 St. Eustathius presided over the see of Antioch. Eudocius came to him seeking holy orders. Eustathius found his doctrine unsound and refused him. But in 331 Eustathius was deposed. The Ariums or Eusebians then had everything their own way, and not only admitted Eudocius to orders, but made him bishop of Germanicia, on the confines of Syria, Cilicia, and Cappadocia. This bishopric he must have held at least seventeen years, the dark period of the principal intrigues against Athanasius, and of the reigns of the sons of Constantine.

In the year 341 was held, at Antioch, the Council of the Dedication or Eucenasia, under Placillus. Eudocius of Germanicia attended. He was an Arian pure and simple, a disciple of Arius, a friend of Ennomus, and subsequently the leader of the Anomoeans party, who held that the Son was necessarily unlike the Father, not only in substance but in will. The council produced four creeds, in which the Eusebian party succeeded in making their doctrine as plausible as might be, and the second of three became known as the "Creed of the Dedication." Athanasius says that Eudoxius was sent with Martyrius and Macedonius to take the new creed of Antioch to Italy. This new creed may, however, have been the Macrostich, or Long Formula, drawn up a few years later at another Council of Antioch. On 26 or 347 the rival councils of Sardica and Philippopolis were held. At the latter was drawn up a creed more Ariant than those of Antioch, and it was signed by Eudoxius. At the end of 347 Eudoxius was in attendance on the emperor in the West, when news came of the death of Leonius of Antioch. Exonerating himself on the plea that the affairs of Germania required his presence, he hastened to Antioch, and represented himself as nominated by the emperor to the vacant chair. Regardless of the rights of George of Laodicea, Mark of Antioch, and others who should have taken part in the election, he got himself made bishop; the matter would come to the ears of Constantius, and to preoccupy the ground, Eudoxius immediately sent off a presbyter of Antioch, named Asphalus, to make the best of the case at court. Asphalus obtained a letter from Constantius in favour of Eudoxius, and was thinking of returning to Antioch, when there arrived the deputation of the Council of Ancyrax, with sixty bishops present, who were not to be mocked. They obtained silence, and offered this explanation. "The Father is ἄνεμος, the Son is ἄνεμος." But although for twenty years Constantius had been accustomed to Eusebius of Nicomedia and Macedonius, it was not prepared for such a wretched travesty of theology. A great tumult of indignation arose on all sides in St. Sophia. The orator who was not least abashed. He obtained silence, and offered this explanation: "The Father is ἄνεμος because He honours nobody; the Son is ἄνεμος because He honours the Father." This was too much even for the resentment of the congregation, and the new cathedral re-echoed with peals of uncontrolable laughter. It is thus, says Sozomen (ii. 40), that these heretics threw to the church pieces by their captious subtilities.

The next occupation of Eudoxius must have been highly agreeable to him, the consecration of his friend Eunomius to the see of Cyrrhus. Warned by Eudoxius to conceal his opinions before so orthodox a population as that of Cyrrhus, Eunomius, before the assembly, protested that such complaints were brought to the emperor that he ordered Eudoxius to depose him. Eudoxius, terrified by menaces, wrote to Eunomius and persuaded him quietly to retire from his see.

In 356 an attack was made on Eudoxius by the Semi-Arians, who had adopted the name of his predecessor (now dead), and were called Macedonians. From Valens they got leave to hold a meeting at Lampascus. Here they signed the "Creed of the Dedication," cited Eudoxius and his party before them, and as they did set come sentenced them to deprivation; but Valens refused to confirm the proceedings. In 356, Valens, as he was setting out for the Gothic war, was induced by his wife to receive baptism from Eudoxius. In the same year he issued, doubtless under the advice of Eudoxius, an order that such bishops as had been banished by Constantius and had returned under Julian should again be exiled. Athanasius was saved only from a fifth excommunication, through the representations of the people of Alexandria.

The years during which Eudoxius and Valens acted together were troubled by portents, which many attributed to the anger of Heaven at the cruelty of Valens in banishing bishops who would not admit Eudoxius to their communities. Eudoxius died in 358. He well deserves the character which is given him by Eunomius, "the worst of all the Arians." Soc. H. E. i. 26; Socr. H. E. ii. 19, 37, 40, 43; Theoph. Chronog. § 38; Nicæph. Callist. H. E. xi. 4; Theodoret, H. E. ii. 25; Haeret. Fadh. iv. 3; Epiphanius, de Haeres. lxxiii. 2; Athanas. Ad Sörm. in
EUDOXIUS—BISHOPS

Pater Gr. xxvi. 572, 219, 589, 274, 580, 713, 601; Hilarius, de Synod. Patr. Lat. x. 471, &c.; Liber cont. Const. Imp. §§ 685, 686, 575, &c. This Eudoxius is identical in Kollar's edition of Lambeius, Comment. de Biblioth. Casen. (1776, tom. iii. p. 418) with the author of an Oratio de Incorruptione Verbi, some excerpts of which Kollar enumerates among the MSS. of the imperial library of Vienna. [W. M. S.]

EUDOXIUS (3), a bishop in the reign of Constantius addressed in a letter by Serapion bishop of Thmusis. The letter is published by Cardinal Mai in his Classici Auctores (vol. v. p. 364), and likewise in the Patrologia Graeca (vol. xii. p. 923). The Eudoxius of this letter was a confessor who had fallen ill under the hardships he had endured, and Serapion exhorts him not to give way to despondency. (Celllier, iv. 336.) [T. W. D.]

EUDOXIUS (4), bishop of the Cimmerian Bosporus, present at the synod of Constantinople, A.D. 446 (Mansi, vi. 760); also at the second council of Ephesus, also in the list of bishops of the same council, A.D. 449 (Mansi, vii. 612). His name is also subscribed to the synodal decrees of Gennadius of Constantinople against simoniacal ordinations, 459. (Mansi, vii. 917; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1377.) [L. D.]

EUDOXIUS (5), bishop of Etenna (Tissena) in Pamphylia, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1004; Mansi, vii. 161.) In the list of bishops said to have been present at the fifth Roman synod under Symmachus, A.D. 503, occurs "Eudoxius Ille bicennis," who is said to be the same (Mansi, viii. 301 b and note). [L. D.]

EUDOXIUS (6), bishop of Choma in Lycia, present at the council of Ephesus in A.D. 431 (Mansi, iv. 1123 c), and at Chalcedon in 451 (ibid. vii. 162 b). His name appears (Leo. Mag. Ep. 98, 1105, Migne) among the bishops subscribing the synodical letters of this latter council to Leo I. (Le Quien, Ori. Christ. i. 983.) His name appears also in the list of bishops deciding the council at Rome in 503 (Mansi, viii. 301 b). But this list certainly belongs to some earlier council. (Baron. ann. 503, ix.) [C. G.]

EUDOXIUS (7), count, who had during the reign of Trajan the command of some soldiers in Gaul. An officer named Romulus suggested to Trajan to send persons to compel the soldiers to offer sacrifice, and when they refused to comply with this command, they were banished to Melitinas in Armenia. Romulus himself afterwards became a Christian, and was beheaded. The soldiers at Melitinas, including Eudoxius their commander, were shortly after put to death. Commemorated Sept. 6. (Men. Bas.) [T. S. B.]

EUDOXIUS (8), martyr with Atticus and Agapius at Sebastae during the time of the emperor Licinius. Commemorated Nov. 2. (Men. Bas.) [T. S. B.]

EUDOXIUS (9), a professional rhetorician of Cappadocia, a friend of Gregory Nazianzen, who wrote in his favour to Sophronius the prefect of Constantinople, A.D. 369 (Epist. 183, p. 580), and to Saturninus the consul, A.D. 383 (Epist. 132, p. 862), as well as toThemistius, the sophist (Epist. 139, p. 865). In all, Gregory speaks of Eudoxius in terms of warm affection, and highly commends his "learning and his natural gifts." Eudoxius wishes to gain reputation by his discourses, in order to get his living out of them. We have also a long letter from Gregory to Eudoxius himself (Epist. 63, p. 819), urging him to give up the pursuit of human knowledge and betake himself to the study of divine philosophy; and another (Epist. 39, 297) depicting, as to an intimate friend, the loss of Basil and of Caesarius; his personal trials of old age and sickness; the unfaithfulness of friends, and the storms which threaten to overwhelm the church. [E. V.]

EUDOXIUS (10), the son of the preceding; also a rhetorician by profession, to whom was entrusted the education of Gregory Nazianzen's great-nephews, Nicobulus and his brothers, the sons of Alypians, Gorgonia's daughter. Gregory manifested the interest he felt in them, especially Nicobulus, by his frequent letters to Eudoxius on the subject of their training, c. A.D. 383. (Epist. 115-117, 119-121, 139.) [E. V.]

EUDOXIUS (11), monk, probably abbait, of a monastery in the island of Caparria (Capraia), to whom St. Augustine wrote in affectionate terms, exhorting the brethren not to make their monastic retirement an excuse for declining active service in the church, but to be strenuous at all times in discharging their conventual duties, and to remember their liability to temptation even within their peaceful abode. Augustine mentions a visit paid to him by two of the brothers, Andreas and Eustathius, during which it seems that the latter had died. (Aug. Ep. 48.) [H. W. P.]

EUDOXIUS (12), consul, A.D. 442, with Dioscorus, in the 18th year of Valentinian III. He had been prefect of the praetorians under Theodosius in 427. (S. Prop. Aquitan. Chronicon, 748, Patrol. Lat. ii. 599; Baron. ad ann. 442, Pagi, note.) [W. M. S.]

EUDOXIUS (13), a gentleman twice greeted by pope Gregory the Great, who styles him "glorious," through Ruspiciana Patricia. (Greg. Mag. Ep. lii. ind. x. ep. 27, lib. viii. ind. i. ep. 22, Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 503, 924.) [C. H.]

EUDOXIUS (14) (Eudocimus), son of the emperor Constantine Copronymus by his third wife Eudocia. He was created "nobilissimus" by his brother Leo IV. On the death of Leo, the empress Irene his widow had Eudoxius seized and tonsured, in order to disqualify him for the succession, and on Christmas Day, 780, he was forced to administer publicly the sacrament of the Eucharist. In August, 787, he and his brothers Christophorus and Nicetas had their tongues cut out by order of Irene's son Constantine on the plea that they were implicated in a conspiracy against him. (Theophanes, Chronogr. in Migne, Patr. Gr. crviii. p. 952; Du Cange, Fam. Aug. 106.) [T. W. D.]

EUDOXIUS (15), philosopher, frequently cited in the Catena in Danielom, edited by Mai in his Scriptores Vetores (tom. i. In Daniel, pp. 166, 169, 170, 171, 188, 192, 199, 201, 215). Mai observes (p. xxxv.) that he is similarly cited in Corderius on the Psalms and in Zephyrus on the Pentateuch. He is to be identified according to Mai (ibid.) with Eudoxius the Ariban bishop of Constantinople (3).

EUDOXIUS—MISCELL. 267

[T. W. D.]

EUDOXIUS (18), physician at Bagauda (St. Maur des Fosses) on the Marne, about seven miles from Paris. In the 25th year of Theodorus II. (i.e. A.D. 432) he was implicated in a local sedition, and on being informed against fled to the Huns (Tiron. Prosper. Chron. sub ann. 335. Theodot.). The period was eighteen years before Attila invaded Gaul, and it must have been beyond the Rhine that Eudoxius fled, and there he would doubtless report the disaffected condition of part of Gaul. He is described as "pravi sed exercitati ingenii." [T. W. D.]

EULALIUS, a layman of Laranda in Lycaonia, whose permission to preach to the congregation by Neon, the bishop of that city, is mentioned in the letter of Alexander of Jerusalem and thecistius of Caesarea to Demetrius of Alexandria, without reference to the preaching of Neon. (Euseb. H. E. vi. 19.)

[E. V.]

EULALIUS, according to the acts of Justin Martyr, one of the emperor's slaves, who suffered martyrdom at the same time with Justin. He is represented as a native of Cappadocia, and as the son of Christian parents.

[G. S.]

EULALIUS, a choristerscopus, who subscribed for Florentius of Lesbos (q. v.) at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451.

[C. G.]

EUMERUS of Treves. (EVMERUS.)

EUVENTUS, a presbyter, martyred at Rome with pope Alexander under Hadrian (A.D. 117). He is commemorated May 3. (Marti. Hier., Us., Wand.)

[T. S. B.]

EUVENTUS, martyr. [SARACOSSA, MARTYRS OF]

EUROTIUS. (EORTUS.)

EUETHIUS. See also EVETHIUS.

EUFIMIA, wife of Sergius, archbishop of Ravenna, c. 750. When, having been a lacon, he suddenly became archbishop, he consecrated Eufimia as a deaconess. (Agnell. Liber Pontificalis Eccli. Rom. cap. 154.) [A. H. D.]

EUFORUS bishop of Cordova. (EUFORUS.)

EUFРОSIUS (1), said to have been sent, along with six others, by the apostles to preach in Spain, and to have died at Liturgis (Andujar). He was commemorated May 15. (Marti. Usuard.) [CAECILIUS (4).]

[T. S. B.]

EUFРОSIUS (8), ST., thirteenth of, according to Gregory of Tours, twelfth bishop of Clermont in Auvergne. He was represented at the council of Agde (506) by Paulinus, a priest, and was present in person at the first council of Orleans (511). He entertained St. Quintus, the bishop of Rhodes, who had been forced to flee from his see to save his life from the Goths. Two letters of Ruricius (Ep. xlii. and xi.iii. Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 101, 106) are addressed to him, and he may possibly be the recipient of the thirty-eighth letter of Avitus. (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxii. 254.) According to Gregory he was bishop twenty-five years, and lived four years after the death of Clovis. This brings his death down to A.D. 515. He is commemorated Jan. 14. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iii. 3; Vit. Patr. c. iv. Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxi. 242, 1023; Mansi, viii. 337, 356; Gall. Christ. ii. 235.)

[S. A. B.]

EUFРОSIUS (8) (EUFРАSIUS), presbyter of Auvergne, son of an ex-senator Eodusius, Eudovius, or Eudius. On the death of Catus bishop of Clermont in Auvergne, A.D. 372, when many were seeking to obtain the appointment by gifts and promises, Eufrasius sent to the king, by the hand of his kinsman Berengnius, a large sum of money, which he had procured from the Jews. The attempt failed, and archdeacon Avitus was elected by the clergy and people. Eufrasius is described as elegant in conversation, but more given to feasting barbarians than feeding the poor. (Greg. Tur. H. F. iv. 36, p. 176; Gall. Chr. ii. 242.)

[E. B.]

EUFРОSIUS. (EUFРАSIUS.)

EUFЕIАTES, a presbyter to whom, together with Saturninus, St. Augustine wrote to congratulate them on their return from Donatism to Catholic unity, setting forth the universality of the church, and exhorting them to continue in the faith, and to discharge zealously their ministerial duties. (Aug. Ep. 142.)

[H. W. F.]

EUFРИDIUS, deacon of Toledo (Baronius, s. a. 507, xlii.; Hildes. de Vit. Illust. praef. 6). [LEONTIUS, deacon of Toledo.] [T. W. D.]

EUFРОNIUS(1), fifth bishop of Nevers, succeeding St. Aegius, and followed by St. Aelius, flourished about A.D. 560. He subscribed a charter of St. Germanus of Paris in favour of the church of the Holy Cross and St. Vincent, a m.
EUFRONIUS

known as St. Germain des Prés, Paris. He was also present at its dedication. (Migne, Patr. Lat. ixiii. 84; Vita S. Ducchonii, Bouquet, iii. 437; Gall. Christ. xii. 296.) [S. A. B.]

EUFRONIUS (2), eighteenth bishop of Tours. Upon the death of Guntram, the seventeenth of the series, king Clotaire named as his successor Catia, a priest of Clermont. But Catia's desires were fixed upon the see of his own city, and he declined. After the bishopric had stood vacant ten months, the clergy and people elected Eufronius, a priest of senatorial rank, grandson of St. Gregory of Langres, and, according to Gregory of Tours, "vir egregiae sanctitatis." Clotaire, upon learning the circumstances, confirmed their choice (a.d. 555 or 556). In 557 Eufronius took part in the council of Paris. In the civil wars of this period a great part of Tours, with its churches, was burnt to the ground. Two of these he rebuilt at his own charge. The famous church of St. Martin also owed its reconstruction on a nobler scale to him. The neighbouring districts, too, were enriched by him within many new churches, the names of which are given by Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. x. 31). Like his successor, he was the champion of the citizens against the rapacity of the count of Tours, at this time Gaiso, who tried to enforce the taxes which Clotaire had remitted. He successfully resisted the attempt, but not with-out appealing to king Charlesbert. In 562 he refused to subscribe the decree of the council of Santes, which deposed Emerius from that see, foreseeing, no doubt, the scandal which occurred. [EMERIUS (2).] In 567 he presided over the second council of Tours, and in the same year, together with several other bishops, he subscribed a letter to queen Radegundis, who had late-ly founded and retired to the monastery of the Holy Cross at Poitiers. It was on the subject of those nuns who after entering the monastery desired to quit it again for the world and marriage. Against them and their wishes, the bishops by the strength of their anthems were determined. This letter (to be found in the Hist. Franc. ix. 30) was read by Gregory, by way of admonition, to Chrodegildis, when she, with fifty other nuns, seceded from the same monastery, and arrived on foot at Tours to claim the protection of the bishop, but with-out effect. [CHRODEGILDIS.] About the same time Eufronius joined three bishops of his province in a sort of circular letter addressed to his flock, speaking of a "cladis gravissimae necessitatis," which seemed to be overhanging the province, and which he exhorted them to seek to avert by deferring their intended marriages, paying their tithes, and breaking off all incesstuous connexions (Gall. Christ. xiv. Instruments, 3). The impending disaster may possibly have been the civil war between Sigebert and Chilperic (Cf. rivet de la Grange, Hist. Let. de la France, iii. 290). It was at the request of the former prince that he officiated at the solemn reception of the messengers of queen Radegundis on their return from the East with a piece of the true cross and other relics for her monastery of the Holy Cross. From Sigebert too he obtained the restoration of those church lands of which Charlesbert had deprived the see. In 568 he was present at the dedication of a church at Nantes, as we learn from the verses of his friend and eulogist, Venantius Fortunatus. He died in 572 or 573, in the seventeenth year of his age and the eighteenth of his episcopate, and was buried in the church of St. Martin. He was commemorated Aug. 4. His successor was Gregory the historian, and it is noteworthy that, contemporaries though they were, the latter relates his miracles with the same gravity as undoubted historical facts. [Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ix. 30, 39, 40, x. 31; de Harr. Confess. xviii.; de Mor. S. Martinii, i. 50; Vita S. Radegundis, 19; Man. Acta SS. Ord. S. Benedict., ii. 331, ed. Paris, 1668–1701; Venant. Fort. Misc. i. 2, 3, 6; Man. Actx. 747, 805; Gall. Christ. xiv. 21.) [S. A. B.]

EUFRO;—see also EUPHR.

EUGAIN. [EUGAIN.]

EUGENDUS (1), Carthaginian. [AUGEN-DUS.]

EUGENDUS (2), ST., abbot of the monas-terium Condatiscone or (as written by Gregory of Tours) Condatiscenone, subsequently called after him St. Oyan, and finally after St. Claudius of Besançon. It was one of three built by St. Romanaus in the Jura. Eugendus was born at Lasnordor in the same district. At seven years he entered the monastery, which he never afterwards quitted. The abbott Minasius, or Nennasius, named him as his coadjutor during life and successor after death. But the choice was not agreeable to the monastery generally, and the dissensions between the two monks by envy, advanced even to the extent of a partial secession. During his rule, the monastery, which was of wood, was totally destroyed by fire, and built up again on a grander scale. He was remarkable for the humility of his demeanour, and, as his biographer especially notes, he did not desert the common table. He was severe too in enforcing the community of goods. Feeling the approach of death, he called that one of the brethren on whom he had enjoined the duty of anointing the sick, and bade him touch his breast with oil. This has been cited as an early instance of the rite of extreme unction. He died about the year 510, and was commemorated Jan. 1. The authority for this account is a life by an anonymous disciple and monk, to be found in Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. S. Benedict. aec. i. 570, ed. Paris, 1668–1701, and Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 49 (Cf. rivet de la Grange, Hist. Let. de la France, iii. 60–2; and Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs sacres, x. 610–2). [S. A. B.]

EUGENIA (1), a daughter of Philippus, who was appointed by Commodus governor of Alexandria. There she became acquainted with Christian literature, and chiefly through having read the epistles of St. Paul she was led to embrace Christianity. She disguised herself in male attire, and went to a monastery; but in course of time she was found out, and sent back to her father. It is said that she induced all her family to become Christians, and that her father was shortly after made a bishop. Eugenia was martyred subsequently, and was commemorated Dec. 24. (Cal. Byzand., Mon. Bas.) [T. S. B.]
EUGENIA

EUGENIA (3), a virgin, martyred at Rome with Agape. (Marti. Rom. Vet.; Mart. Hier., Bedae, Us.) Fortunatus (de Virginibus lib. viii. cap. 4) celebrates her in the following extraordinary verses, where the strange treatment of the names may probably have arisen from some confusion between accent and quantity.

"illo Euphemia, pariter quoque plrandit Agatha,
Et Justina simul, conseconate Thelia,
Et Paulina, Agnese, Restituta, Eugenia regnans, Et quasamque sacer vestis ad stara pudor."

Baronius describes this Eugenia as a daughter of an imperial prefect in Egypt, and as having suffered under Gallienus. She is commemorated in the Roman Martyrology on Dec. 25, and in the Byzantine Calendar on Dec. 24. [J. G. C.]

EUGENIA (5), martyr. [Nicomedia, Mar-tyres of.]

EUGENIA (4), a niece of Gregory Nazianzen, one of the three daughters of his sister Gorgonia. She was brought up most carefully by her grandmother, who had encouraged her to expect a considerable share of her property, but at her death left her only a small legacy, some of which she was in danger of having wrested from her. Her uncle consequently wrote to Theodorus bishop of Tyana to request his aid for her (Greg. Naz. Epist. 85). Eugenia's conduct proved far from pleasing to Gregory, who mentioned her, together with her sister Nonnus, with severe reprehension in his will. (Greg. Testam.) [E. V.]

EUGENIA (5), virgin, daughter of Adalbert duke of Alasht, and niece of St. Odiilla. She became abbess of Hohenburg in the diocese of Straubing, and died in A.D. 735. (Acta SS. 16 Sept. v. 322.) [I. G. S.]

EUGENIANUS, a martyr, commemorated Jan. 8 (Murt. Usuard., Wandalh.). No other ancient writer seems to be acquainted with a martyr of this name. The Bollandist conjectures that he has been confused with Hegemonius bishop of Autus in the 4th century (A.A. SS. Jan. 1. 473). The Sammarthani (Gall. Christ. iv. 334) do not admit that there are any grounds for supposing Eugenianus to have been this bishop. [T. S. B.]

EUGENIUS (1), bishop of Rome during the breach between Rome and Constantinople in consequence of the Monothelite controversy; consecrated Aug. 10, 654, buried June 3, 657 (Jaffé, Reg. Pont. p. 164). The emperor Constans having issued a declaration known as 'the Type', in which the use of either of the phrases contended for, either the Single or Double Will in Christ, was forbidden for the future, and pope Martin I. (who had in council denounced this Type, and excommunicated Paul the Eastern patriarch) having been seized in 653 and removed from Rome by the emperor's order, the clergy of Rome were ordered by the latter to elect a new pope. The order was not obeyed till the 8th of September in the following year, when Eugenius, a native of Rome, was chosen and consecrated (who had protested by letter from Constantinople against a new election) being still alive. The ultimate, though tardy, compliance with the imperial will was probably due to a fear lest the emperor himself should interfere and intrude a heretic into the see. Martin lived in exile until September A.D. 655, and thus during the first year of his pontificate Eugenius was canonically an intruder and antipope, though reckoned a lawful bishop after Martin's death in virtue of his acceptance by the Roman church. After his election he sent messengers to Constantinople to announce it to the emperor. These were induced by Peter, who about this time became patriarch of Constantinople, to assent to a declaration of faith in order to reconcile the disputants, in which the curious compromise was adopted of acknowledging One Will in Christ, and also two (unam super duas); one, which was called the Substantial Will, and two besides, called Natural Will. Having on such terms of union publicly communicated with the patriarch, they returned to Rome carrying from him to pope Eugenius a confession of faith expressed (according to Anastasius) in very obscure terms. From the circumstance, mentioned also by Anastasius, that, when the patriarch's letter was read at Rome in the church of St. Mary ad Prenese (now Santa Maria Maggiore), it was the clergy and people that tore up the document, and refused to permit the pope to celebrate mass till he had pledged himself to repudiate it, it would seem that the pastor was less resolute in orthodoxy than his flock, and disposed to accept the compromise. There is in fact no evidence of his having anything of the orthodox zeal or spirit of his predecessor Martin. The latter, during the last years of his life, was an agent in exile, conversations with this latter in extant letters of being neglected by his former friends, especially by the clergy of Rome, who, though having it in their power to relieve him, had left him destitute of even the necessaries of life. Eugenius, as the head of the Roman clergy, though not named, must be considered as involved in this reproach. Nor is it inconsistent with the apostacy and readiness to accept compromise, of which evidence has been given, that he is described kind, gentle, affable, and charitable to the poor. (Anastas. and Platina.) He held the see, from the date of his election, 2 years, 8 months, and 24 days. Notwithstanding the absence of any recorded acts or characteristics to entitle him to the character of a saint, he is commemorated as such by the Roman Church on the 2nd of June. No writings, genuine or spurious, attributed to him, remain. (Anastas. Biblioth. de Vit. Rom. Pont. num. lxxvii. § 134 in Pat. Lat. cxxviii. 763; Platina, de Vit. Pontif. p. 85.) [J. B.-r.]

EUGENIUS—BISHOPS

EUGENIUS (3), an early bishop of Toledo, said by Spanish antiquaries to have been sent as a missionary by St. Dionysius the Areopagite [Dionysius the Areopagita (4)] and Dionysius (2), and to have suffered as a martyr in one of the persecutions of the early church; the breviary of Toledo names that carried on under Domitian. It is, however, admitted by Flores (España Sagrada, tomo v.) that by the time of Ileodorus the memory of this Eugenius had entirely perished. But his tomb is reported to have been found at Paris in 1148 by Raymond archbishop of Toledo, and his remains transferred to Spain by king Philip II. in 1565. Flores appeals to the abbot Ildinus and to St. Gerard for his existence, and he is commemorated, in some lists, on Nov. 11. Rainart (Acta Martyrum, Amsterdam, 1713) gives, in an appendix, a Kalendarium Carthaginense (the old province of Carthage used to include Toledo and some other sees in Spain) with the entry: "Nonas Jan. deposito B. Deogratia et Eugenii episcoporum." [J. G. C.]

EUGENIUS (4), bishop of the Tauroc Chersonese, mentioned with Eripidius and other bishops of the see in the Menology of Basil, March 8. These bishops lived before the reign ofConstantine the Great, 306-337. (Migne, Patrol. Graec. cviii. 9; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1329.)

EUGENIUS (8), bishop of Laodicea, the metropolis of the province of Phrygia Pacatiana, c. A.D. 300-324. He was originally in the army, and had married the daughter of a senator, but during the Maximian persecution was deprived of his military rank owing to the constancy of his faith, and fled to Laodicea, where he became bishop. He entirely built the church and adorned it with vestibules and porticoes. An inscription has been found at Laodicea having reference to this bishop. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 784.)

EUGENIUS (6), bishop of Ecarpius, in the province of Phrygia Salutaris; one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 845; Mansi, ii. 695.)

EUGENIUS (7). Among the subscriptions to the letter of the Eusebian seceders to Philipopolis from the council of Sardica, A.D. 347, there occurs Eugenius de Lysiatis, intended, as Le Quien thinks, for Eugenius bishop of Lyons in Pampylia Secunda. In the same list there is another bishop Eugenius, the name of the see being lost. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1029; Mansi, iii. 138, 140.)

EUGENIUS (8), bishop of Nicea, one of the thirty bishops who met in synod at Antioch A.D. 355. (Soz. H. E. iv. 8; Till. Mscr. Eccl. vi. 594.)

EUGENIUS (9), bishop of Paphos in Paphlagonia, present at the ecumenical council of Constantinople, A.D. 381. (Mansi, iii. 570; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1057.)

EUGENIUS (10), bishop of Heraclea, the metropolis of Thrace. He was originally a presbyter of Constantinople, one of Chrysostom's bitterest enemies, and was deposed, together with Isaac the anchorite, by the Council of the Oecumenical Council of Constantinople. The summons to appear before them. For his services on this and other occasions Eugenius was rewarded with the see of Heraclea, from which Serapion had been deposed. (Pallad. Vit. Chrysost., in Migne, Patr. Gr. xlvii. 29; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1108.)

EUGENIUS (14), bishop of Hermopolis Magna, in the Thebais. Gennadius, who precedes him in the list, is dated A.D. 449. He is mentioned by Joannes Musaeus (Proton Spiritu, § 182, Patr. Gr. lixxxvii. 3053) as having formerly been the abbât of the monastery of St. Sergius called Neronion near Bithynia. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 609.)

EUGENIUS (15), bishop of Barcinum, a town in Lyconia whose position and exact name is uncertain. His name was subscribed in his absence by his metropolitan, Onesiphorus of Iconium, to the definition of the faith that was read before the emperor Marcian at the sixth session of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 165; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1079.)

EUGENIUS (18), supposed bishop of Nisibis, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1084; Mansi, vii. 157.)

EUGENIUS (17), bishop of Cotena in Pamphylia, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1010; Mansi, viii. 164.)

EUGENIUS (18), bishop of Nisibis, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1084; Mansi, vii. 157.)

EUGENIUS (17), bishop of Cotena in Pamphylia, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1010; Mansi, viii. 164.)
EUGENIUS—Bishops

EUGENIUS (19), bishop of Ercoua in Vetus Epirus, signed the synodical letter of that province to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 619 B; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 145.)

[ L. D. ]

EUGENIUS (20), bishop of Nicopolis, in Vetus Epirus. The emperor Leo I., hearing of the murder of Proterius, bishop of Alexandria A.D. 457, commanded him to assemble a synod of the bishops under his jurisdiction to consider the matter. He obeyed, and the synod wrote a letter to the emperor, which was signed by Eugenius and eight others (Mansi, vii. 619 A; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 134). Hermisdas, bishop of Rome, in his letter of 516 to the synod of Vetus Epirus, greatly praises his conduct on that occasion. (Horn. Ep. 8 in Migne, Patr. Gr. lxii. 391 and in Mansi, vii. 405.)

[ T. W. D. ]

EUGENIUS (21), bishop of Siniandus in Pisidia, signed a synodical letter to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 571; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1055.)

[ L. D. ]

EUGENIUS (22), bishop of Carthage in the 5th century. He was elected to the see A.D. 479 (see Morrelli, Africa Christ. iii. 191, but Cave gives the following year), with the approval of the Arian Hunneric, but after five years was exiled to the deserts of Tripoli (Victor Vitensis, de Persec. Vandal. ii. 2-13, Patr. Lat. lxi. 203). On the accession of Gundamund, in the following year, he was recalled (Victor Tunnunensi, Chronic. Patr. Lat. lixii. 940). During the reign of this prince the orthodox party was not molested, but upon his death, in the year 496, his successor Thrasimund renewed the earlier persecutions (Procop. Bell. Vandal. i. 8). Eugenius was banished to Gaul, and settled near the town of Vienne, where he founded a monastery in honour of St. Amaranthus. He died there in the year 505. Eugenius left a creed, drawn up for presentation to Hunneric, which is printed in the 58th volume of Migne's Patr. Lat. (see also Gennadius, de Script. Eccl. cap. 97, ibid. p. 1118; Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. ii. 3, p. 46).

[ J. de S. ]

EUGENIUS (23), bishop of Tium on the Black Sea in the province of Honorias, present at the council held at Constantinople, A.D. 536. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 575; Mansi, viii. 971.)

[ L. D. ]

EUGENIUS (24), a Cilician tritheite bishop in the second half of the 6th century, who supported Conon of Tarsus in disseminating that heresy. John of Ephesus, who states that Eugenius was a bishop in Cilicia, assigns him no definite locality in that region, but according to Bar-Hebraeus (Assemani, Bibl. Or. ii. 325) his see was Seleucia in Isauria, and his period contemporary with the Jacobite patriarch Sergius Telenis (539-541). It was at this early period perhaps that they began to declare their views and to call them heretical and finally deposed by their fellow bishops. Retiring to Constantinople, they found a zealous patron in Athanasius, a grandson of the empress Theodora; and supported by his fortune they established an active propaganda. Three bishops were requisite, according to the canons, for episcopal ordinations, and they found a third to act with them in Theonas, a deposed provincial bishop who had wandered to the capital. By this means they sent out in every direction numerous episcopal emissaries, who gathered congregations in Rome, in Corinth, in Athens, and in Africa. The public disputation held with Cilicia, and for this they were admonished by direction of the emperor Justin II. is noticed under Conon. The tritheite leaders were condemned and banished to Palestine; but this had no effect on the activity of their agents, who travelling through Syria, Cilicia, Isauria, Cappadocia, ordained priests and deacons in churches and monasteries, cities and villages, bringing over whole districts to their views. Eventually Eugenius and Conon visited Pamphylia, where Eugenius in the earlier days of his orthodoxy had zealously laboured for the conversion of the Arians, who had colonised that province in large numbers. Here Eugenius died, and Conon once more retired to Constantinople; particulars are gathered from the Ecclesiastical History of John of Ephesus (lib. i. 31, v. 1-8), which has been translated from the Syriac into English by Dr. Payne Smith, and into German by Dr. Schöpfelder, the latter of whom appeals to a dissertation on the tritheite controversy. (Joannes Philoponus; Tarnanensis; Agatho-Catalani, i. 385.)

[ M. A. W. ]

EUGENIUS (25), bishop of Egara, subscribing the acts of the fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633, under Sisinian (Esp. Esp. xii. 195; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 385).

EUGENIUS (26) I., bishop of Toledo, in Spain, and metropolitan, between the years 636 and 646 or 647. Date of birth unknown. His life ended with his episcopate.

Name.—A Latin translation of ἄγιος into Bona-natus occurs as a proper name in the title of the 6th century (as e.g. in Cyrillic's life of Cassianus of Arles, where a man so named is stated to have acted unworthily of his name). Few names have remained more popular in both the masculine and feminine forms in modern Europe than Eugenio, Eugène, Eugénie.

Authorities.—St. Isidoreus, bishop of Toledo, De Vitaeum Illustrum Scriptorii (capp. xii. xiii.). This series of short biographies, apparently suggested by the similar one of St. Jerome, is printed at the end of some editions of the works of St. Isidore of Seville; as for example, in appendix I. to tom. vii. of the edition of Arevalus (Romae A.D. 1803): Acts of the fifth, sixth, and seventh councils of Toledo, held respectively A.D. 636, 638, 646 (Labb, tom. iii. Pp. 597, 601, 613, ed. Paris, 1714).

Life.—This Eugenius was a fellow-student of Justus, his predecessor in the see of Toledo. He was trained as a monk from infancy. His superior, Heliodorus, has the merit of bringing forward both him and Justus, when he himself became a bishop. Eugenius was a man of dignified demeanour, and not only versed in sacred learning, but also, we are assured, so skilled in astronomy as to astonish his auditors, whom he allured, through the influence thus gained, to the reception of religious doctrine. His signature to the fifth council of Toledo stands as follows: "Ego Eugenius, Dei micena-
EUGENIUS—BISHOP

The above council of Toledo, over which the two prelates, Eugenius I. and II., presided, in which they took a leading part, deserve attention in connexion with—(1) the confessions of faith which they set forth; (2) the relative position of the monarchy; (3) the occasional subscription of laymen; (4) the treatment of the Jews living in Spain. A few words must be said upon each of these points.

1. Some profession of faith appears to have been recognized as almost a necessary and normal preface to the canons passed by each successive council. In some cases, however, it amounts to little more than a statement of the doctrines of the Holy Trinity and the incarnation, or to a recital of the Apostles' Creed. But in others it is more ample, especially in the sixth council, summoned in A.D. 638, in the reign of Chintila, and attended by fifty-two bishops, where the articles of the creed drawn up deserve comparison with those proclaimed in the earlier third council of Toledo held in A.D. 586 under the first Catholic Bishops, Bernardo and Redo. The creed before us, in language of much dignity, and with a tenuity of statement which resembles the better features of the scholastic terminology of a later day, proclaims not only the truths insisted on in the Nicene Creed as enlarged at Chalcedon, but is even more distinct on the doctrine of the Trinity or the Personæ Patris, and also includes a recognition of the double procession, and of the doctrine of original sin. We subjoin a few sentences by way of evidence, italicizing phrases illustrative of these remarks. "Illocre credimus et professuram sacramissimam et omnipotentissimam Trinitatem, Patrem et Filium, et Spiritum sanctum, unum Deum, solum non solidarium; unius essentiae, virtutis, potestatis, uniusque naturae; discretam inseparabiliter personis; indiscernabilis essentiae substantiam deitatis, creaturam omnium creaturarum; Patrem ingenium, incertum, fontem et originem totius divinitatis; Filium a Patre in temporalibus et in angelicis creaturis, esse initio genitum non creatum. . . . Spiritum vero sanctum, neque genitum neque creatum, act de Patre Filioque procedentem uniusque esse Spiritum. . . . Ex iis igitur tribus divinitatis personis solum Filium fatemur ad redemptionem humani generis, propier culpam nostra (quia per inconditionem Adam originatus, et nostrum librum contentum creaveramus) resolvens a secreto Patris arcanoque proprion, et hominum sin peccato de sancta semper Virgine Mariæ assumptiæ, ut idem Filius Dei Patris esset filius homini; Deus perfectus et homo perfectus, ut homo Deus esset unus Christus naturis in duas in personam unius; ne quateretaea Trinitatem acceadis, si in Christo persona geminata esset."

2. The king is evidently at this period in close and intimate relation with the Spanish church, sanctioning its councils, giving coactive force to its canons, and even anticipating its desires. The church in turn gives honour and support to the throne. But the notion of an indefeasible hereditary claim to the monarchy is unknown; as in truth it was unknown to the early and even to the later medieval church. It never thrived in Spain, though we may find it prevalent in the France of Louis XIV., and the England of the Tudors and the Stuarts. That the crown should rest in certain families, so long as they flourished, was indeed an admitted principle, but that was all. Thus in the fifth council of Toledo, A.D. 658, the third canon treats: "De reprobatione personarum, quae probavit ad se adipsi regnum," and excommunication is threatened against the man, "qui talis meditatus fuerit, quem nec electo eos nominat, nec Gothicae gens nobilitas ad hono honoris apicem trahit." This canon is of the greatest importance, and not without reason of note. That the monarchy was still in a rather unsettled condition appears from the succeeding canon of the same council directed against those who attempt to find out, by divination, the time when the reigning sovereign will die, with a view to their own acquisition of the throne. With these fourth and fifth canons of the fifth council should be compared the cognate ones (the 16th and 17th, and 18th) of the sixth council of Toledo, to which reference has been made above.
EUGENIUS—Bishop

3. The rights of the laity to appoint incumbents to churches which they have built or restored, are guarded with much strictness (council ix. canons 8 and 9). In fact, the prescriptive regulations are censured (counsel x. canon 3). The canons of the 8th council, held in A.D. 655, are signed by fifty-five bishops, thirteen abbots, ten archdeacons, and sixteen counts. This admission of the signatures of laymen had occurred also in the earlier council, the third, held under Recared, where we find not only a royal edict in confirmation of its acts, but likewise the participation of all the senators (five leading names being given) in its anathemas against Ariusism, and the other heresies condemned by the first four oecumenical councils. The same feature occurs again at a later date, in the twelfth council of Toledo, held in A.D. 689 (Labbe, vii supra, p. 2115), where fifteen counts palatine sign after the bishops, abbots, and archdeacons.

Bishop Jeremy Taylor has called attention to this circumstance in one of his controversial works. He calls these councils the fourth, sixth, and eighth of Toledo. Either bishop Taylor numbers the councils in a way differing from that of Labbe, or he has made a mistake, as the fourth has not any laic signatures appended, beyond those obtained in the sanction given by king Chintila. Compare the case of the second council of Orange held under Caesarius of Arles.

EUGENIUS (28), bishop of Trappeolis in Phrygia, subscribed the canons of the synod called Trulliana, or Quinisexta, held at Constantinople, A.D. 692. (Le Quien, Oriens Christi. i. 810; Mansi, xi. 1001.)

EUGENIUS (29), bishop of Forum Cornelli (Imola), A.D. 801. He was a native of that city, and his episcopal see was "vir magnaneutus" (UgHELLi, Ital. Sac. ii. 624; Manzoni, Euseb. Conciliarum. 44.)

EUGENIUS (30), martyr at Tibur with Symphorosa his mother, and six brothers.

EUGENIUS (31), martyr at Paris; commemorated on Nov. 15. (Mart. Us., Wadd.)

EUGENIUS (33), martyr with Valerians during the Diocletian persecution, commemorated Jan. 20. (Men. Bas.)

EUGENIUS (34), a presbyter of Antioch, martyred with Macarius during the reign of Julian. He appeared before the emperor and reproached him for his idolatry. The emperor, enraged at this, banished him to Mauritania, where he was beheaded. Commemorated Dec. 20. (Men. Bas.; Baron, Annal. 992, 90, 91.)

EUGENIUS (35), martyr with six others in Africa during the Vandal persecution at the close of the 5th century, commemorated Jan. 4. (Mart. Alon.) In Usuard, Netker, and the Mart. Hier. the name appears as Eugenius.
EUGENIUS—Martyrs

EUGENIUS (38), martyr at Cherson, together with Euplatus [ELPIDIUS (3)]. Commemorated March 8. [Men. Bas.] [T. S. B.]

EUGENIUS (40), a deacon; one of the four legates sent by Sylvester bishop of Rome to the Council of Arles, a.D. 314. [Labbe and Casserat, i. 1453.] [T. W. D.]

EUGENIUS (41), a monk by whose Basil wrote to the Catholics of Alexandria, in a.D. 373, to encourage them under the persecutions and sufferings which followed the death of Athanasius. [Basil. Epist. 139 [711].] [E. V.]

EUGENIUS (42), deacon of Ancyra, sent by his bishop Marcellus cir. a.D. 347 to Athanasius with a confession of faith of the church of Ancyra. [Eugen. Diacon. Legat. ad S. Athanas. in Patr. Gr. xviii. 1302; Ceillier, iv. 308.] [T. W. D.]

EUGENIUS (44), deacon, addressed by pope Gregory the Great, who empowered and requiring him to transfer some of the land of the Roman church to the monastery of Bleri or Bielda, a town near Sutrium and Viterbo. [Greg. Mag. Ep. lib. xii. ind. v. ep. 45, Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 1250.] [C. H.]

EUGENIUS (45) (Eugenius), common Latinized form of the Irish Eoghan. [Eoghan.] A person called Eugenius is said to have been one of the seven hermits from the island in the Tiber, who accompanied St. Regulus (Legend of St. Andrew, in Sven's Chron. Picts and Scots, 187; J. Forbes, Kol. Scatt. Santa, 335). [Mart. Tuathach (Kelly, Col. Ir. SS. xxxix.)] commemorates a Eugenius Peregrius on December 26, and Mar. O'Gorman on the same day has "Eugan mór an nara," Eugan or Eugenius, the mariner or traveller (Mart. Doug. by Todd and Reeves, 346 n. 6). [J. G.]

EUGENIUS (46) HERMOGENIANUS, a praeconian prefect, at whose instance Maximian is said to have issued a rescript for the persecution of Christians, c. A.D. 301, and under whom many afterwards suffered death (Boll. Act. Sanct. 29 Mai. vii. 11). [T. W. D.]

EUGENIUS (47), a usurper in the reign of Diocletian, a.D. 303. Libanios tells us that the 500 soldiers whom he was commanding in Seleucia, being indignant at the amount of work which was expected of them, thought to better their condition by proclaiming Eugenius emperor. They marched to Antioch, plundering as they went. At Antioch, however, the whole population, including even the women, rose against them, and the usurpation of Eugenius ended on the same day on which it began. [Libanios, Gr. xiii. xiv. xv.] [M. F. A.]

EUGENIUS (48), "magister officiorum" under Constans. He was present when Athanasius had an interview with that emperor at Milan, a.D. 343. [Athanasius, Vol. ii. 190; Athanas. Apol. ad Const. sec. 3, p. 255.] [T. W. D.]

EUGENIUS (49), a wealthy eunuch of Constantinople, who had been expelled from court because of his disaffection to the emperor Jovian. He befriended Procopius with money and otherwise during his rebellion, a.D. 362-366. [Zosim. iv. 5; Procopius, Hist. Gr. et Rom. [piagi, 538.] [T. W. D.]

EUGENIUS (50), procurator under Theodosius and Valentinian II. a.D. 434. The princess Honorina, sister of the emperor Valentinian, had a child by him, and was consequently expelled from the palace and sent from Italy to Theodosius. [Marcellin. Comit. Chronicon, a.D. 434; Patrol. Lat. ii. p. 926; Baronius ad an. 455, xxvii. Pagi, note.] [W. M. S.]

EUGENIUS (51), a notary addressed along with the subdeacon Felix and others by pope Gregory the Great, who desires them to see the regulations carried out by which bishops or clerics are prohibited from having women residing with them. [Greg. Mag. Ep. lib. ix. ind. ii. ep. 60; Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 998.] [C. H.]

EUGENIUS, martyr. [Eugenius (35)].

EUGIPPUS (1), ST. (EVIPPUS), abbot of Lucullanum, born at Carthage about the middle of the 5th century, and at the age of twelve sent by his parents to Rome (Patrol. Lat. lxii. 580), where he was educated and afterwards ordained. He was with St. Severinus when the latter was proclaimed Bishop of Noricum (Austria) and entered his monastery near Favianum (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. 8). It was near Vienna according to Mabillon (Annales O. S. B. i. 85, "Monasterium Favianense"). Here St. Severinus died in a.D. 482, and in 488 Eujippus accompanied his body when it was transferred to the villa of Lucullus between Puteoli (Pozzuoli) and Naples, where a monastery ("Monasterium Lucullanum," Mabili. 53) was founded in honour of, and called by the name of, the saint. Of this monastery, which belonged to the Benedictine order and was under the rule of Monte Cassino, Marcianus was the first abbot, and Eugippus the second (Ceillier, xi. 85). Here he wrote many theological treatises, which are printed in the Patrologia, tom. lxxii., and in a.D. 511 he composed the life of St. Severinus (Potthast, Biblioth. p. 887). He was addressed by St. Fulgentius, who wrote to him a letter on "Charity" and was author of another monastic rule, not extant. There has been some controversy as to whether there was a second writer of the name of Eugippus, and called the African. Sigerbit says that "Eugippus" was author of a collection from the writings of St. Augustine, about 580, from which date it would follow that he was a different person from the Eugippus who was with St. Severinus at his death in 482, and who wrote the life of the saint in 511. But it is evident that he makes a mistake, for Cassiodorus had seen the Eugippius, author of the "Collection" to which Sigebert refers, and Cassiodorus died at the age of ninety-three before the year 567. (Ceillier, xi. 88.)

T 2
276: EUGIPIUS—BISHOP

We may add that both the Bollandists and Cave treat of only one Eugippius, and the Patrol.
Lat. places the Vita S. S. Geremi among the works of Eugippius Africanus. Upon the whole it would seem to be proved that Eugippius abbot of Lucullanum and Eugippius the African were the same person. (Acta SS. Jan. i. 483; Migne, Patrolog. Lat. xiii. 550, &c.; Ceillier, Histoire des Auteurs ecclési. xi. 85, &c.; Cave, Histo.
Litter. i. 498; Surius, de Prob. Sancta Historia, Jan. 8.)

T. G. S.

EUGIPIUS (3), a priest to whom Dionysius Exiguus dedicated his Latin translation of Gregory of Nyssa's work De Conditione seu Opipublico hominis. The translator's preface letter states that his task was undertaken at the request of Eugippius. (Patrol. Lat.
iv. 346; Ceillier, xi. 124.)

T. W. D.

EUGNOMON, a bishop of Asia, one of those who presented a complaint against Chrysostom at the Council of the Oak, for having unjustly deposed him from his see. (Photius, Cod. 59, p.
60.)

E. V.

EUGNOMONIUS (EUGNOMON) appears among the Euchthians, who as Ékùxiuoi éph maupbrpofal, made an appeal to Marcian the emperor for a general council in A.D. 451 (Lalle, iv. 524 a). The orthodox archimandrites, however, at the council of Chalcedon, refused to recognize him as archimandrite or anything else,
"We do not know Eugnomonius" (Lalle, iv.
522 a).

C. G.

EUGRAPHIA (1), a rich widow of Constantinople, an intimate associate of the empress Eudoxia, and a leading member of the female cabal for the destruction of Chrysostom, who had aroused their enmity by his unsparking de-motions and his excesses, and extravagant.

Her house was the meeting-place of all, both clergy and laity, who were disaffected to Chrysostom. (Palai. Æcli. p. 35.)

E. V.

EUGRAPHIA (2), a lady to whom Theodoret expresses himself as under great obligations, and whom on the death of her husband he addressed in a long and beautiful letter, offering her various grounds of consolation. (Theod. Epist. 69.)

E. V.

EUGRAPHUS, a martyr at Alexandria with Menas and Hermogenes, under Maximin; commemorated Dec. 10. (Men. Bas.; Baron.
Annal. 307, 38); Dec. 3 (Col. Armen.).

T. S. B.

EUGYPIUS, abbat. [EUGIPIUS.]

EUHEL (EOIL), commemorated November 14 with F町hina of Cill-tomna, and Gabhran, his two companions. They are called the three sons of Dubhthach, in the Irish calendars, and in the Drummond Missal there is commemoration made "trium trium trium Gabran, Eoil et F町hine."

One of this name, "Euhel de Ros-coenech" is said to have been a pupil at Lorch Eriuchne.
St. Barry (September 25) of Cork (Col.).
Acta SS. 607; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Sants, 28).

J. G. E.

EUIN, duke of Trent (Tridentum), one of the dukes who ruled Italy for ten years after the death of Magnus, when there was no legitimate king. During this time he repelled an invasion made upon his duchy by the Franks. He had charge of an army sent by king Autharius, c. 598, to Istria, and was sent by king Agilulf, c. 591, to make peace with the Franks. He died c. 595.
(Paulus Diaconus, ii. 32; iii. 9, 27; iv. 10, who derives this local information probably from Secondus of Trent.)

A. H. D. A.

EUPIPIUS, a bishop of long standing, holding Arianizing doctrines from whom, though there was much reason for his being united to him, Basil felt it due to the cause of truth to separate altogether (Bas. Epist. 57 [56], ad Melitianum, 128 [265]). Eustathius of Sebastie, in A.D. 360 violently denounced against Euippus as not deserving the name of bishop, being one of those by whom Eustathius had been deposed, yet in A.D. 376 Eustathius united himself to Euippus, and recognized the bishops and presbyters he had ordained. (Epist. 225 [73], 239 [10], 344 [82], 251 [72]).

E. V.

EULALIDUS (EULALITUS), placed by the diptychs of the church of Arles as bishop between Patroclus and St. Honoratus (Mabille, Vet. Anecdot. p. 220, nov. edit. 1723). Tillemond (Mén. ii. 481) argues that his episcopate could have occupied only a brief period in 426.
He is not recognized in the Gallia Christiana
(i. 526).

C. H.

EULALIDUS, bishop of Bourges. [EULIDUS.

EULALIDUS, ST., said to have been the first bishop of Nevers. In the twenty-fifth year of his reign (506) Clovis sent for St. Severinus, abbot of St. Maur (Agaunum), who performed miraculous cures were then noised abroad. On his way to Paris, the saint came to Nevers, and asking for the bishop found Eulalidus lying dead and dumb. He straightway healed him by the sound of his voice. Coquelle (Hist. du Nièvre, Paris, 1812, sub fin.) apparently identifies him with Oesidius or Eleodius, whom he places seventh, others sixth, in the list of the Nevers bishops. He is commemorated Aug. 26. (Vita im 589, Paris, 1669-1701; Gall. Christ. xii. 626.)

S. A. B.

EULALLA (1), virgin martyr, born in the 4th century, of noble parents, at Merida (St.
Emerita) in Spain. At the age of twelve, during the persecution of Diocletian, she was offered to the idols. After she had been burnt to death, it is said that her soul came forth like a white dove and hovered over her body till snow fell and EULALIA

covered it. (Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs ecclés. iii. 39; Baron. Amable. Ecles. a.d. 594, 158.) She is commemorated Dec. 10 (Mart. Rom. Vot., Ad., U. 11, Wund.) Prudentius has a hymn in her honour (Peristep. hymn. iii.). Bede in his hymn on Etheldreds gives her the following line:

"Eulalia et perfect ignibususta ferat."

(H. E. iv. 20.)

[I. G. S.]

EULALIA (2), saint of Barcelona. The very existence of this famous saint, to whom the cathedral of Barcelona is dedicated, has been disputed, and is, indeed, extremely doubtful. The story of her martyrdom is almost identical with that of St. Eulalia of Merida. Both saints are represented as living with their parents in the country. Both hurry to the neighbouring city when the news of the Diocletian persecution reaches them, both seek out the Præses, and both see the gods, both are tortured and burnt over a slow fire. On the bodies of both after death snow descends, and covers them from sight. From the mouths of both a white dove ascends to heaven at the moment of death, and both are visited after death by a certain Felix who had been converted by their example. The points of difference are, (1) Eulalia of Merida is represented by Prudentius as twelve years old, Eulalia of Barcelona is fourteen; (2) in the case of the Barcelona saint the Præses is the famous Ducián, in the case of Eulalia of Merida, Calisperian; (3) in the Acta of Eulalia of Barcelona the dead face smiles miraculously at Felix, in the Acta of Eulalia of Barcelona the smile is not there. It is extremely difficult to fix the date of the earliest mention of Eulalia of Barcelona. In the Mozarabic Liturgy each saint has a complete office, and a complete Mass. The feast of Eulalia of Merida falls on the 10th of December, that of Eulalia of Barcelona on the 12th of February. The timeliness of this Mozarabic liturgical veneration, in honour of Eulalia of Barcelona, by Quiçirius, bishop of Barcelona, and which Gams dates about 630, is doubted by Arevalo (see his edition of Prudentius, Migne, L. 339). We may consider the cult of this saint however to have been established by the seventh century, and to have been connected with the Mozarabic liturgy, in which Eulalia of Merida is emulated. Bede, in common with various later authors, says that she was beheaded, a variation from the Acta, which must surely have been a conscious or unconscious attempt to distinguish between the two Eulalias. It seems scarcely possible to doubt that the one story is a reflection of the other. Nevertheless, opinion has been always greatly divided, and Gams, the latest ecclesiastical historian of Spain (Kirchengeschichte, vol. i. p. 306), has succeeded in persuading himself of the existence of the two Eulalias. The silence of Prudentius, who devotes an entire hymn to Eulalia of Merida, and who might so easily have introduced the name of Eulalia of Barcelona into his mention of that city when he speaks of the martyr Cecufa (Prudentius, Peristep. hymn 4, 33), together with the similarity of the stories and the lateness of the Acta, has seemed conclusive to many hagiographers against the existence of Eulalia of Barcelona. The cult of the saint is, however, one of the most famous in Spain, and her supposed relics rest in a subterranean chapel of the cathedral of Barcelona, which was consecrated in 1339, and whither they were transferred from the older fabric of 1058, built in its turn upon the site of the still earlier church into which, in 878, bishop Frodo of Barcelona is said to have transferred the remains from the church of St. Mary without the walls (Bell. A.D. 1122, Feb. ii. 376).

Tillemont, Mem. v. 713; Eulogius, Mem. Sanct. i. 24; Tamayo de Salazar, Martyr. Hisp. i. 102; Flores, Esp. Sag. xxii. 287; Vide, martirio y grandezas de santa Eulalia, hija, patrona y basilar de Barcelona, Ponsich y Campo, 1770.)

[E. A. W.]

EULALIA (3), wife of Probus, and cousin of Sidonius Apollinaris, who addresses her husband in terms of great affection, recalling the early days when Probus was his teacher. (Sid. Apoll. Epv. iv. 1.)

[R. T. S.]

EULALIA (4), lady at the court of Charlemagne, addressed by Alcuin. (Gundrada.)

EULALIA (5), an antipope, elected and ordained as bishop of Rome after the death of Zosimus at the close of the year 416, in opposition to Boniface I, who was finally established. In the see, Eulalius being expelled from Rome, by the emperor Honorius in the April of the following year. The official letters which passed have been preserved in the Vatican, and are quoted at length by Baronius (A. E. ann. 416, lxxix. 419, 12—xxiii.). A summary of their contents, and of the facts deducible from them is here subjoined, since they throw light on the conflicts attending the election of bishops, and on the powers exercised by the emperors in connexion with such elections. First we have a letter (Dec. 29, 418) to Honorius at Ravenna from Symmachus the Praefectus Uribis, who had entered on his duties as such only a few weeks before the death of Zosimus. He states that, after he had warned the people to proceed to a new election without disturbance, Eulalius the archdeacon had been taken to the Lateran church by the clergy and people, duly elected, and ordained; that in the meantime certain presbyters, accompanied by the bishop, went to him in the name of the presbytery, to the church of Theodora, and, though warned by himself to do nothing rashly, had persisted in ordaining him in the church of S. Marcellus, and thence proceeded with him to St. Peter's basilica. He concludes by requesting the instructions of the emperor, with whom, he says, it rests to give judgment in such a case.

Honorius, taking for granted the correctness of this ex parte statement, replies (Jan. 3, 419) by ordering Boniface to be expelled from the city, and the authors of the sedition in his favour punished; the reason given for such order being that Eulalius had been duly appointed according to the rule of Catholic discipline (completes numerus ordinantium, solemnitas temporis, loci quae qualitas), the election of his rival being deficient in these respects. Symmachus replies (Jan. 5) that he has carried out the emperor's order, though not with resistance on the part of Boniface; that the latter had caused a messenger, sent to summon him and to forbid a procession which he was about to commence, to be beaten by the people; had proceeded with the procession in spite of the prohibition; had entered the city again by violence, though the gates were guarded to keep him out; but had been since again expelled by an opposing mob; and that Eulalius had in the meantime celebrated divine service in the basilica of St. Peter amid the acclamations and approval of almost the whole city.

In the meantime the Roman presbyters who supported Boniface had sent the emperor a different account of things from that given by Symmachus. They had been unable, they say, to assemble for a new election in the customary place, namely, the Lateran church, because of its being taken possession of by Eulalius with a very small number of presbyters and an excited mob; they had been compelled therefore to assemble elsewhere, representing themselves as the great majority of the clergy of Rome, and as supported by the better part of the laity; that amid general acclamation of the people they had elected Boniface who, in addition to other merits, was in his unwearied efforts to accept the dignity offered him; that seventy priests and nine bishops of provinces had concurred in his ordination, whereas his rival had the support of but a small number of clergy, the bishop of Ostia, a sick old man almost at the point of death, having been brought against his will to assist in the ordination. They then petitioned the emperor to revoke his former edict, issued under false information, and to summon Eulalius and his abettors to his presence, promising on their side the attendance of Boniface with as many of the presbyters of his party as might be required, for the settlement of the dispute.

Having received this counterstatement, Honorius writes to Symmachus (Jan. 15), revoking his former edict; bidding him command the attendance at Ravenna on a prescribed day (Feb 8) of Boniface and Eulalius, with their respective supporters, prepared to support their cases by reference to ecclesiastical precedent before a synod which was being summoned from various parts of Italy to hear the case. In the meantime the matter in dispute was to be considered entirely open and awaiting judgment, with the proviso that the non-appearance of either claimant would be construed as fatal to his claim. Symmachus in reply (Jan. 25), while he repeats in curtly phrase his diligent execution of the imperial commands, no longer writes as the supporter of Eulalius, being anxious to represent himself as entirely impartial, and accuses both parties (whom he had forbidden to resort together to the same church from fear of conflict) of endeavouuring to support their positions by calumnies and lies.

There appears next a communiement of the emperor to the bishop summoned by him to hear the case, in which any who had taken part in the election or ordination of either claimant are forbidden to be either judges or witnesses, and in which the rest are warned to approach the question without prejudice, and decide after full examination under the guidance of the Holy Ghost.

It appears from the documents that follow that the members of the synod thus summoned were divided in sympathy or opinion and unable to come to a decision before Easter (Mar. 30), when custom required the presence of a bishop in Rome to celebrate the solemnities of the season. Honorius therefore decided on deferring the consideration of the case till after Easter, when he proposed to refer it to a fuller synod, and in the meantime commissioned Achilles bishop of Seleto to celebrate Easter in Rome after the usual manner, forbidding both claimants to the see to appear there for the present. In the letters addressed by the emperor to Symmachus, to Achilles, to the senate, and to the people generally, on this occasion, considerable apprehension of disregard of his injunctions and of disturbance is evident. While on the one hand he takes pains to justify his prorogation of the question, on the ground of its importance, the number of new points that had arisen for consideration, and the duty of the emperor to see that episcopal synods decided nothing in haste, though not to arrogate the function of decision; on the other hand he exacts obedience to his orders in a high tone of authority, and threatens with summary punishment all disturbers of the peace of the city.

Having thus, as he hoped, provided for the peaceable celebration of Easter, he lost no time in summoning bishops from far and wide for the intended full synod to be held at Spoleto on the 13th of June. To this end he sent private letters to several of the more important prelates, such as Paulinus bishop of Nola, whose influence had prevented his attendance at the previous synod, Augustine, and Aurelius bishop of Carthage, together with circular letters to the bishops of Africa and of Gaul. The proposed assembly however never took place. Eulalius and his party, disregarding the imperial orders, entered Rome at mid-day, Mar. 15, came into violent collision with Achilles and his supporters, so that a fray ensued, during which Symmachus and the Vicarius Urbis, interposing, narrowly escaped with their lives. On hearing of this the emperor ordered (Mar. 25) Eulalius to be immediately expelled from the city, declaring that his refusal to go would be fatal to his claim to the see, as well as injure him in future consequences. Having not only refused to comply, but also taken violent possession of the Lateran church, he was eventually dislodged thence and from Rome; and his expulsion was followed by an imperial edict (Ap. 3), excluding him from the see and confirming Boniface as bishop of Rome. Accordingly the latter was forthwith conducted into the city, and accepted as bishop, being welcomed (if Symmachus is to be believed) by the whole population with joy, and gratitude to the emperor for his celestial edict. An imperial rescript (Ap. 7) to the proconsul Largus countermanded the summons sent to the bishops of Africa and Gaul, speaking of the question at issue being now finally settled by imperial authority.

Eulalius seems to have acquiesced in this decision. At first he retired to Antium, near Rome, expecting the death of Boniface, who fell sick after his accession, but, this hope failing, he made no further attempt to recover the see, though invited to do so by his partisans in Rome on the death of Boniface in 423. According to the Liber Pontificalis he afterwards became bishop of Nepete. Honorius in a letter to Boniface after his establishment in the see endeavoured to provide against future scandals by forbidding all canvassing for the bishopric, and ordering that
In any future case of a double election neither of the candidates should be accepted, but a new election made with general consent.

From the account given above, extracted from authentic contemporary documents, the following facts are evident. First, that the ancient custom, prevalent at the time, of election of a new bishop by the clergy, with the assent of the laity, and confirmation by provincial bishops, was allowed in this case, with no desire apparent on the part of the civil power to interfere with it. Secondly, that elections had come to be conducted in an irregular and tumultuous manner, the claims of rival candidates giving rise (as had been also the case on the election of Damasus) to violent party conflicts, attended with bloodshed in the churches as well as in the streets. Thirdly, that it was the necessity of restoring order, and adjudicating between rival claims, that called forth the interference of the emperor in such church affairs. Fourthly, that in this case the emperor at first claimed no right to decide on the validity of either of the two elections on his own mere authority, or without first submitting the question to an episcopal synod; though, on the other hand, he assumed the power of selecting the members of such synod, directing its proceedings, and dissolving it at his pleasure, as well as coercing authoritatively the clergy of Rome penitentibus, and commissioning whom he chose to supply the place of the Roman bishop for the time. Fifthly, that eventually he settled the whole question on his own mere authority, without either the sanction of a synod, or regard to the canonicity of the original election of the candidate whom he established in the see. A statement, contained in the Liber Pontificalis, that Eulalius was deposited by a synod of 252 bishops, is entirely inconsistent with the evidence of the contemporary documents above referred to, and, as such, cannot give it up. It is true that in the letters in which Honorius announces his final decision that Eulalius had already held without result, as well as himself, had decided that such an attempt as Eulalius had made should involve the deposition of either claimant; but in one letter (that to the procopius Largus) he speaks of this doubtfully.—"Id quod nostrae sententiae ordinavert, et quod statuisse synodi sententiu videbat,"—and elsewhere he takes the whole responsibility on himself; and the letters of Symmachus and Largus refer the entire decision to him; nor is there evidence of such exercise of power being on this occasion challenged.

With regard to the real claims of the two rivals on the ground of canonical election, it is generally taken for granted, and probably with truth, that the letter of the Roman presbyters who supported Boniface gives a correct account of things, and hence that his claim was the valid one. Still it should be remembered that the previous letter of Symmachus gave a different account, that the synod summoned to consider the question was unable to come to a decision, and that the imperial verdict in favour of Boniface was irrespective of the original merits of the case.

EULALIUS (2), reputed to have been the fourth bishop of Syracuse, succeeding Chrestus II. c. A.D. 90, and followed by Epinnus. (P'irrii, Sicilia Sacra, i. 630.)

EULALIUS (3). A bishop of this name is said by Socrates (H. E. ii. 43) and Sozomen (H. E. iv. 24) to have presided over Caesarea in Cappadocia, in the early part of the 4th century, and, to have had as son the notorious Eustathius of Schesina, whom he deposed from holy ordination for adopting a dress unsuitable to his office. As no bishop of the name is found at Caesarea at this time, it is probable that these not over-accurate historians have fallen into an error. (Tillemont, Mem. Eccl. ix. note 24, S. Basilic.)

EULALIUS (4), a presbyter, otherwise unknown, chosen by the Ariana party of Antioch, as bishop after the deposition of Eustathius, c. A.D. 322. He died a few months after his consecration. The only act recorded of his episcopate is the banishment of Aetius the Anomoosan from Antioch (Theod. H. E. i. 22; Hieron. Chron. sub ann. 3234; Philostorg. H. E. iii. 15). There is considerable uncertainty as to the succession and dates of the intruded bishops of Antioch at this period. According to Socrates (H. E. i. 24) the see was vacant for eight years after the deposition of Eustathius, and was then filled by Euphranius. Sozomen also (H. E. ii. 19) makes Euphranius the next successor to Eustathius. Philostorgius, on the other hand, states that Paulinus, bishop of Tyre, was translated to the vacant see, and, having occupied it only six months, was succeeded by Eulalius of Ephesus. Condr. Marcell. c. 4; Valesius in Euseb. H. E. x. 1; in Socr. H. E. i. 24; Kaye, Council of Nicea, p. 60, note 4). [EUSTATHIUS (3) OF SCHESINIA. EUSEBIUS (23) FAMPUELI, p. 315, lxxi.] (E. V.)

EULALIUS (5), bishop of Iconium, the metropolis of Lycaonia, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1068; Manci, ii. 695.)

EULALIUS (6), bishop of Sebasto, the metropolis of Lesser Armenia, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. In some MSS. the name is written Astrino (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 421; Gumm. Series Episc. 440; Manci, ii. 694.)

EULALIUS (7), bishop of Antamnia in Epirus, A.D. 343. (Farlati, Ilyr. Sacr. vii. 394.) One of the Eusebian party who attended the synod of Philippopolis, A.D. 347, and signed the manifesto to the African church. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 267.)

EULALIUS (8), bishop of Doara in Cappadocia Secunda. Shortly before his appointment the church at Doara had suffered severe persecution from the Arians. The orthodox party, however, succeeded in expelling the Ariana prelate and electing Eulalius in his room, A.D. 375. Gregory Nazianzen delivered the sermon at his enthronement, in which he commends him highly (Greg. Naz. Orat. 30). Three years later, A.D. 378, the deposed bishop, of whom Basil gives the lowest character, speaking of him as a runaway slave, the paramour of a powerful matron of the place, recovered his see. (Basil, Ep. 231, 208 [385, 103].)
EULALIUS—BISHOPS

EULALIUS (9), bishop of Amasea in Pontus, banished by Valens and restored by Gratian (A.D. 378). His love of peace and fear of schism led him to prefer that the intruded Arian bishops should retain their posts rather than that the catholics by the assertion of their own just claims should rend the church. Eulalius on his restoration proposed to the bishop whom he found occupying his throne to share the government with him, giving him the precedence. His proposition was refused by the Arian bishop, who soon lost to the orthodox party the small following he had. (Soz. H. E. vii. 2.) [E. V.]

EULALIUS (10), bishop of Nazianzus, a cousin of Gregory Nazianzen (Ep. 195 [182]), the brother of Heliandus, sons of a mother worthy of such offspring (Carm. 48). The two brothers embraced a solitary life, and purchased a farm on which they might live apart from the world. The field was surrounded by a broad ditch. The seller proved a knave, and their neighbours so unneighbourly, that after the brothers had expended a considerable sum on the estate, they were fain to beg to be allowed to resign it at the original price (Ep. 105). Gregory was much attached to his cousin, as is shown in their joint letter to Caesenna, bishop of Constantinople (ibid.) and to Lollani (Ep. 182). Heliandus died before A.D. 372, leaving the care of his sick mother to Eulalius alone (p. 108, Carm. 48). Eulalius subsequently became a presbyter and choriposicus, and was deputed by Gregory, in conjunction with Celestius, to apprise Theodorus of Cyrrha of the doings of the Apostatists (Ep. 88; cf. Tillemont, i. p. 722; “St. Greg. Naz.” note liv.). In A.D. 382 Eulalius was living with other solitary lambs at Lamia. Gregory visited him during the Lent of that year, which season Gregory had vowed to pass in absolute silence. His sights and gestures were so correctly interpreted by Eulalius that the visit was one of great mutual edification. When Lent was over Gregory wrote condemning Eulalius for the excessive severity of his self-denial, and proposing to visit him again, now that he could once more hold converse with him (Ep. 98–102). Tillemont reasonably identifies him with Eulalius, Gregory’s successor in the see of Nazianzus, 383, who was consecrated by the bishops of Cappadocia Secunda (Ep. 228). Gregory commended him warmly to his namesake of Nyssa, as one in whose arms he would be glad to die. He must not credit the tale that Eulalius’s consecration had been in defiance of his wishes; on the contrary, he had repeatedly begged the bishop of his province to relieve him of his episcopate and appoint a successor. (Ep. 42.) [E. V.]

EULALIUS, bishop of Nepete, previously autopope (No. 1).

EULALIUS (11), one of the bishops of Armenia, to whom and to his brother bishops during the terrible persecution of the Christians by the Persians, e. A.D. 420, described by him in his “Ecclesiastical History” (Theod. H. E. v. 38), Theodoret writes letters exhorting them to courage and endurance; reminding them that the bishops, some of whom were evidently waverers, ought to be the leaders and champions of their flocks, and not to desert them like hirelings; and exhorting them to exercise tender watchfulness over the weaker members, raising the fallen, and bringing back the straying, and at the same time exercising a strict and faithful discipline to deepen their repentance and ensure their recovery. Theodoret assures them that he does not write as one possessed of authority over them, but as a friendly counsellor. The letter was written in reply to a paper which Theodoret had brought Theodoret the news of the persecution. (Theod. Epist. 77.) [E. V.]

EULALIUS (12), bishop of Chalcodon, a contemporary of Nestorius, 430, ministering in the life of St. Hypatius the hegumen [Herranz (19)]. His lukewarmness is contrasted with the zeal of Hypatius, in refusing to break with Nestorius before his condemnation, in not resisting Leontius and the Olympic games, in expelling Alexander and his monks. The Bollandist, however, throws doubts on his existence, his name not appearing at the council of Ephesus, 431, nor at the Latrocinium, 449. At the council of Chalcodon, 451, Eleutherius was bishop. (A.A. SS. Boll. 17 Jun. iii. 331, 337; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 601.) [G. H.]

EULALIUS (13), bishop of Ponia in Myus, present at the oecumenical council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 780; Mansi, vii. 152.) [L. D.]

EULALIUS (14), bishop of Silbium in Phrygia, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 809; Mansi, vii. 156.) [L. D.]

EULALIUS (15), supposed bishop of Viviers. The name without a see appears at the second and fourth councils of Arles, A.D. 452 and 453 (Sirmont, Conc. Gall. i. 102, 129). It has been contended that Viviers was his bishopric. An undecipherable name in an ancient MS. list of bishops of Viviers is thus supplied. This view involves a correction of the chronology of Tillemont (Med. xvi. 106), who believes Aemilius to have filled the see of Viviers up to A.D. 464. (Gall. Christ. vi. 544; Gams, Ser. Ep. 36.) [R. T. S.]

EULALIUS (16), bishop of Syraeae, c. 500. He is mentioned by the writer of the life of St. Fulgentius bishop of Ruspe prefixed to the works of that author. (Migne, Patrol. Lat. lxxv.) [Fulgentius (53.)] Smitten with the love of the monastic life, Fulgentius had sailed from Carthage with the intention of proceeding to the Thebaid. The vessel touched at Syracuse, and the biographer gives a very pleasing picture of the Syracusan bishop, who was greatly impressed by the young traveller. Eulalius held the monastic life in the highest esteem, but dissuaded Fulgentius from going to a country not in communion with the see of St. Peter. Eulalius told him that as a youth he himself had entertained the intention of going as a monk to these very regions, but had been deterred by this difficulty. He entertained Fulgentius for several weeks, finding him in lodgings and supplying all his wants (Migne, vi. sup. pp. 128–130). In the letters of Eunodius (lib. iii. 18), we have two to a Eulalius, which were probably addressed to this bishop. Eulalius was present at the fourth synod of Rome.
EULALIUS, a heathen Phrygian philosopher of the 6th century, who in company with Damascius a Syrian, Friscianus a Lydian, Hermias and Diogenes, Phoenicians, Isidorus of Gaza, Simplicius a Sicilian, all of them the most eminent of their time, withdrew into Persia, hoping to enjoy greater liberty and meet with more general sympathy under King Chrorses than under the Byzantine Christian emperors. They soon found themselves disappointed, and were glad to return. (Agathias, Hist. ii. 30, ed. Dürrer. 1828, p. 131.) [T. W. D.]

EULAMPIA (1), a martyr together with Eulampius her brother. They were natives of Nicomedia. When the Diocletian persecution broke out, they left their home and retired to a mountain where a number of Christians had taken refuge. One day, however, Eulampius went into the city to purchase provisions; he was recognized as a Christian, arrested, and tortured. As soon as Eulampius received intelligence of this, she came down to the city, threw herself at the side of her brother, and confessed that she was one with him in his faith. They were then both beheaded. They are commemorated Oct. 10. (Men. Bas.) [T. S. B.]

EULAMPIA (2), mother of the historian Philippus, and known to us through a slight mention preserved of her by Photius in his abridgment of the ecclesiastical history of her son. As Philippus was born about A.D. 364, we may consider her as belonging to the middle of the 4th century. It would appear that she was the only surviving daughter of an orthodox neophyte of the name of Anyius, who lived at Dorissus, a village of Cappadocia, and had likewise four sons. Eulamia, we may be sure, was brought up in the orthodox faith, at that time safely tried by the prevalence of the Ariam or Semi-Arian heresy. But Eulamia did not continue orthodox. She married one Cartherius belonging to the sect of the Eunomians, the keenest and most zealous inheritors of the now condemned Arianism, and whose attachment to the faith which they had inherited was strengthened rather than weakened by the cruel persecutions which they had to endure in maintaining it. Eulamia must have been a woman of ardent dispositions, for she embraced her new faith with great warmth and earnestness. We are told that she gave over to it first her brothers, then her father, and lastly, by degrees, the remainder of her relatives. What is of more consequence, however, is that she brought up her son Philippus in the same principles. The notice of her to which we have referred is contained in Philostorgius (lib. ix. c. 9). [W. M.]

EULAMPIUS, martyr. [Eulamia (1).]

EULANCIUS, a friend of Basil, residing at Neocaesarea. Basil wrote to him, A.D. 375, complaining of his unwonted silence, and expressing his fear that he was beginning to look coldly upon him on account of his unpopularity with the Neocaesareans. (Bas. Ep. 208 [281].) [E. V.]

EULODIUS (EULADIUS), fourteenth bishop of Bourges, was father of St. Simplicius, his successor, as we learn from the oration of Sid. Apollinaris upon the election of the latter. (Gall. Christ. ii. 8; Gams, Ser. Ep. 522.) [R. T. S.]

EULOGIUS (1), bishop of Sebaste. [Eulalius.]

EULOGIUS (2), bishop of Ambianiun (Amiens), at the council of Sardica, 347 (Athana.
treating some of the bishops and presbyters who were banished to Palestine for their adherence to Chrysostom's cause (Pallad. Dialoq. p. 290). Two bishops of Gaul, Heros of Arles, and Lazare of Aix, having brought an accusation of false doctrine against Pelagius during his residence in Palestine, before Eulogius, as metropolitan, he was summoned to Dionysius the ancient Lydias, in December, A.D. 415. Fourteen bishops assembled under the presidency of Eulogius. The accusers failing to appear under plea of sickness, Pelagius was left to defend himself unopposed, and succeeded in clearing himself of the errors with which he had been charged to the satisfaction of the synod, the members of which were but little acquainted with the subtle questions involved in the controversy. Jerome, as was natural, speaks of this synod with the utmost contempt—in illa miserabili synode Diospolitano " (Hieron. Ep. 79). Augustine, who gives its Acts, is more favourable to it. (Asc. Refutat. ii. 47; Contra Julian. i. 5; Labbe, ii. 1552.) Eulogius is identified by Mén. Eccl. xi. 518] with the bishop of Caesarea, who deposed Eustathius, a reader of that church, on the false charge of corrupting the virgins of a presbyter (Pallad. Hist. Lec. c. 141). He died c. 417. [K. V.]

EULOGIUS, (5), bishop of Trinithis, Ternuthia, Taranin, in the second province of the Thebaïs. He was present at the third general council at Ephesus, A.D. 431. (Mansi, iv. 1117; Le Quen, Or. Christ. ii. 613.) [J. de S.]

EULOGIUS, (7), bishop of Athribis in the Egyptian Delta. He was present at the fourth general council at Chalcedon, A.D. 451, where, together with Dioscorus of Alexandria, and the other Egyptian bishops, he mainly opposed the influence of Leo. (Mansi, vii. 51; Le Quen, Or. Christ. ii. 555.) [J. de S.]

EULOGIUS, (8), bishop of Philadelphia, is Coele Syria, who signed the acts of the council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451) as metropolitan of Arabia. (Labbe, iv. 83, 329, 454, &c.; Le Quen, Or. Christ. ii. 861.) [K. V.]

EULOGIUS, (9), bishop of Eporedia (IVOKE). Present at the council held under Euchius of Milan in A.D. 451; appears as subscribing the synodical letter of the council to Leo I., by the hand of Photius, a presbyter, because the sanctity was too great to allow him to sign with his own hand. (Leo. Mag. Ep. 98, 1063, Migne.) [G. C.]

EULOGIUS, (10), a bishop mentioned by Photius (Cod. 130, p. 285; Patr. Gr. ceii. 1086) as presiding in a council in the seventh year of the emperor Marcian (i.e. A.D. 457), and issuing a Decree against the Samaritans. Photius appears to confuse him with the patriarch of Alexandria (No. 14), who lived much later. Tillemont (xxv. 762) and Ceillier (ai. 552) suggest the possibility of his being the bishop of Philadelphia (No. 8). [C. H.]

EULOGIUS, (11), bishop of Melitene, the metropolis of the Greater Armenia, signed the letter of the synod of Constantinople to pope Hormidas concerning the ordination of archbishop Epiphanius, A.D. 520. (Le Quen, Greci Christ. i. 413; Mansi, viii. 493.) [L. D.]
EULOGIUS—BISHOPS

EULOGIUS (12), bishop of Perga, the metropolitan of the second Pamphilus, present at the fifth general council, A.D. 553, at Constantinople. (Le Quien, Orisae Christ. i. 1015; Mansi, ix. 380.) [L. D.]

EULOGIUS (13), bishop of Danaba in Phœnicia Secunda, west of Palmyra. He was present at the fifth general council held at Constantinople, A.D. 553. (Mansi, ix. 384; Le Quien, Orisae Christ. ii. 848.) [J. de S.]

EULOGIUS (14), forty sixth bishop of Alexandria and patriarch, between John I. and Theodorus Scribo, 579–607. He was originally a priest and head of the monastery of the Deipara at Antioch. Some time about 582–584 he had become acquainted with Gregory, afterwards pope Gregory the Great, at Constantinople, from whose letters and from Photius's Bibliotheca the best account of his life and writings can be drawn. He adhered to the Catholic faith, passing his life in struggles with the various forms assumed by the Manichæan and other heresies, and as a saint both by the Greeks and Latins, being commemorated by the former on Feb. 13 (Basil. Mem.) and by the latter on Sept. 13 (Mart. Rom.; Bull. AA. SS. Sept. iv. 85). The principal modern accounts of him are those of Stilling the Bollandist (ut sup.), Le Quien and Neale (ut infra), and of Eulogius and that of John the Almoner who followed him soon afterwards, shed a partial lustre on the Alexandrian church before the Saracen invasion came and overwhelmed it. The bishops of the Jacobites with whom Eulogius had to contend were Danianus and Anastasius Apozygarius; but the Alexandrian Jacobites were then in a dejected state and found a powerful antagonist in the learned and energetic patriarch.

It was a matter of dispute whether in 588 Eulogius held a synod at Alexandria to settle a dispute among the Sunnarians concerning the term “a prophet like unto me” (Deut. xviii. 15), which some of them referred to Josiah, some to David, and others to John the Baptist. The latter were right (Photius, Cod. 230; Mansi, ix. 1021). As Photius, the authority for this synod, says it was held in the reign of Marcian, either its president was a different Eulogius or Marcian was not the emperor. Those who adopt the latter view, Stilling among them, conclude that Photius wrote Marcian by mistake for Maurice. For another solution of the difficulty see Eulogius (10). Photius gives a detailed account of the writings and orations of Eulogius against Narsus a Novatian (Codd. 182, 208); against Severus and Timothenus, heretics; against Theodorus and Gaius, the orontian; also the extant orations of Eulogius (Cod. 250); and a work against the Novatians divided into five books (Cod. 280). The extant correspondence between Eulogius and Gregory, who were united to one another by a very warm friendship, ranges from 583 to 600, but only Gregory's letters are preserved. In 588 Eulogius is urged to offer strenuous opposition to the title of Universal Bishop assumed by the patriarch John the Faster of Constantinople (Greg. Epp. lib. v. ind. xiii. ep. 43). In 596 Gregory dwells upon the intimate union there should naturally exist between the sees of Alexandria and Rome on account of St. Mark having been placed over the former by St. Peter (lib. vi. ind. xiv. ep. 60). In 597 Eulogius on the vigil of St. Francis displays his conflict with heresy (lib. vii. ind. xv. ep. 40). In 598 he is inquiring for a work on the gesta martyrum by Eusebius distinct from that historian's account of the martyrs in his extant works. (Eusebius (23), p. 321.) Gregory, who can find no such book either in the archives of the Roman church or in the libraries of the city, takes occasion to send him some interesting information as to how the martyr festivals were then observed at Rome. Gregory is at that time sending him a cargo of timber, but the timber is too small for Eulogius, and no ship will carry no little share of the timber requires (lib. viii. ind. i. ep. 29). It might be surmised that the timber was for a new church. The most interesting letter of all the series is that which Eulogius received in 598, written in June according to the computation of Jaffé (Regest. Pontif. p. 125). He is congratulated on the ground he is gaining on the heretics, that he is a bishop of the Catholic Church and he often goes to Jerusalem, and that he is a great lover of the Roman Catholic Church and on their growth in numbers. Gregory can gladden his heart by a narrative of similar prosperity in another quarter. The race of the Angli, placed in an angle of the world, hitherto the victims of a perverse belief and an idolatrous worship, are at length yielding to the gospel. The month of April is now a bishop and doing marvels. News has come that at the preceding Christmas more than ten thousand Angli had been baptized. Eulogius then may show his Alexandrians how much can be effected at the farthest extremity of the earth by prayer (lib. viii. ind. ii. ep. 30). Gregory's expressions in one passage seem to attribute to Eulogius the right of giving himself as a new bishop and doing marvels. News has come that at the preceding Christmas more than ten thousand Angli had been baptized. Eulogius then may show his Alexandrians how much can be effected at the farthest extremity of the earth by prayer (lib. viii. ind. ii. ep. 78); perhaps the titular encroachment concerned Alexandria less than it did Rome. Larger timber has now been procured, but as only a small trunk has been brought in, what would Eulogius have had to do? The latest letters received from Gregory were two in the year 600 on the subject of the Agnæae (lib. x. ind. iii. ep. 35, 39). From Photius (Cod. 230) it appears that Gregory found fault with a synodal letter received from Eulogius, because it did not make definite mention of the four councils, of Leo's tome, and of the phrase "in two natures"—that test of the true faith; whereupon Eulogius wrote back defending and explaining his orthodoxy. The death of Eulogius is placed by Le Quien in 607; by Stilling about 605 or 606 (Le Quien, Orisae Christ. ii. 442; Neale, Patriarch Alex. ii. 46–52). [L. D. & C. H.]

EULOGIUS (16), martyr at Constantinople during the Arian persecution in the reign of Valens. He is commemorated July 3. (Mart. Rom. Vét., Hier., Adj., Us., Wand.) [T. S. B.]

EULOGIUS (17). An Egyptian monk and presbyter of the 4th century, renowned for his wonderful insight and strictness of discipline, which often made him repel men from the communion, on account of evil thoughts which he had detected in them. (Rufinus, Hist. Mon. cap. 14; Sozomen, vi. 28; Niceph. Call. H. E. xi. 34; Cassiod. Hist. Trip. viii. 1, p. 523, in Pat. Lat. ixx. 1107 n.) [W. H. F.]

EULOGIUS (18), a monk to whom St. Ephrem Syrus addressed his 47th Paraenesis, which consists of counsels and exhortations chiefly relating to the monastic life. (Ephr. Syr. Opp. ii. 170, ed. Rom. 1745; Ceillier, Hist. des Autres ecclés. vii. 94.) [T. W. D.]

EULOGIUS (19), a presbyter of Constantinople, and an adherent of Cyril, who wrote to inform him of what had occurred at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. (Cyrill. ep. 23, Migne, al. 21, p. 84, Patr. Gr. Ixxvii. 132.) [G. H.]

EULOGIUS (20), a monk to whom St. Nilus addressed one of his treatises on the ascetic life. (Nil. Opp. in Patr. Gr. ixxxix. 1094; Ceillier, Hist. des Autres ecclés. viii. 317.) [I. G. S.]

EULOGIUS (21), deacon of the church of Constantinople, A.D. 449. On the appointment of the imperial commission to investigate the charges against Ibas of Edessa, consisting of Eustathius of Berytus, Photius of Tyre, and Eunaius of Himera, Eulogius, as the deacon of Flavian, communicated the necessary letters of authority from the bishop to the commissioners (Labbe, Concil. iv. 627). He accompanied the commission to Berytus, and was present during the investigation, as well as at the further proceedings which were held at Tyre, and at the signing of the concordat between Ibas and his accusers (Ibid. 635). [E. V.]

EULOGIUS (22), ecclesiarch of the church at Constantinople, who had himself contended for the orthodox faith, to whom Theodoret wrote A.D. 449, when Dioscorus and others were clamouring for his deposition as a heretic, calling upon Eulogius, as being well acquainted with his teaching, to bear witness to the soundness of his belief, and stop the mouths of his calumniators. (Theod. Epist. 105.) [E. V.]

EULOGIUS (23), a tribune, one of the two imperial commissioners deputed by Theodosius II. to the "Robbers' Synod" of Ephesus in A.D. 449. (Epiphan. (42).) [E. V.]

EULOGIUS (24), an officer of rank carrying despatches from the Byzantine court to Pope Honorius in the year 519. He is designated "vir sublimis (Manus, vii. 447), vir spectabilis et magistrius (482), vir strenuus (484), vir sublimis (485), vir sublimis tribunus et notarius (516). The letters are undated, but they are assigned by Jaffé (Reg. Pont. 69 sq.) and Baronius (ann. 519, sciv.) to the above year. [C. H.]

EULYSIS, bishop of Apamea in Bithynia, one of Chrysostom's most loyal adherents. He was one of the leading members of the body of forty bishops who gathered around Chrysostom in the dining-hall of the episcopal palace when the Synod of the Oak was holding its session. On his remarkable reply to Chrysostom's counsel "not to abandon their sees in case of his being deposed," that "it would be necessary for them if they retained their dioceses to communicate with his enemies and to subscribe to his condemnation," Chrysostom answered that "it would certainly be desirable to communicate with them to avoid rending the unity of the church, but that they should refuse to subscribe, as that would be to allow the Justianists' deposition." (Pallad. Dial. p. 70.) Eulysius was one of the deputation of five, "all men of sanctity and high repute," entrusted with the remonstrance of the assembled bishops against the lawless proceedings of Theophilus, and with Chrysostom's reply to his summons. He shared in the personal indignities and ill-treatment with which the enemies of the saint vieded their disappointment at his refusal to appear. (Ibid. pp. 71, 74.) When Chrysostom was finally expelled from Constantinople, Eulysius accompanied him in the vessel which conveyed him to the Bithynian coast, where, with his companion Cyriacus, bishop of Surnada, he was apprehended and detailed in chains on suspicion of complicity in the privy to the confiscation which succeeded Chrysostom's departure. The two bishops were carried back to Chalcedon, and after examination were dismissed as innocent. (Ibid. p. 93.) In A.D. 405 Eulysius was bearer of letters from fifteen of the forty friendly bishops to pope Innocent, representing the troubles caused to the church by the violent proceedings of Atticus and his adherents, together with one from Anysius bishop of Thermoponcia. (Ibid. p. 26.) Chrysostom addressed a letter from Cucusius in 406 to Eulysius and the bishops who were with him, expressing a high sense of the labours and trials they had undergone for the sake of the church, which could not fail to procure for them a divine blessing. (Chrysost. Epist. 148.) In A.D. 406 Eulysius and the eastern bishops accompanied the western deputation to Constantinople, and shared their maltreatment. (Pallad. Dial. p. 81.) On the disastrous termination of the embassy, Eulysius and his companions disappeared, and it is not known that they had been taken out to sea and drowned. It proved, however, that they had really been deported to remote places of exile. That selected for Eulysius was the fortress of Misphas (Mizpah), three days' journey beyond Bostra or Bozrah in Arabia, where he probably died. (Ibid. p. 194.) [K. V.]

EUMACHIUS, 7th bishop of Vivières, about the beginning of the 5th century, succeeded by Auctorius. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 546.) [R. T. S.]

EUMENES (HYEMENEXUS), bishop of Alexandria. According to the chronicle of Eusebius, he succeeded Justus in A.D. 130, and occupied the see for thirteen years. (Patrolo Gr. xiv. 557; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 389.) [J. de S.]

EUMENIA, servant of Afa the converted courier of Augsburg, and martyred there with EUMENIUS

Afra's mother Hilaria under Diocletian. Commemorated Aug. 12. ([Mart. Aedon., Usuard., Notker; Bas. Men.], Mart. Or. et Chro. ii. 225.) She is by some writers called Kunenia. (Baron. A. E. ann. 303, cxxv.; Celli. iii. 80.)

T. S. B.

EUMENIUS (1), ST. Thaumaturgus, bishop of Gortyna, in Crete, holding the see after the Diocletian persecution, during which his predecessor Cyrilus suffered martyrdom. He is stated to have passed the later part of his life in the Thebaid, and to have died at Thebes in Boiotia. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 258, and see Memora for September, ed. Constantinople, 1843, p. 141.) Basil's Menol. (Sept. 18) states that he held the see for many years, and performed miracles.

L. de S.

EUMENIUS (2), bishop of Aphrodisias (Stauropolis), the metropolitan sec of Caria, present at the council of Constantinople, A.D. 381; some MSS. of the acts of the councils read Eudoxius. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 899; Mansi, iii. 571.)

L. D.

EUMENIUS (3), a bishop mentioned with another, Maximianus, by pope Innocent I. in a letter to Rufus and other bishops of Macedonia, in the year of Emacrius, Pat. Lat. xx. 538 and notes.) From the name of Maximianus being followed by that of Eumenius in Ep. 17, as likewise in Chrysost. Ep. 163, both of these epistles being addressed to Macedonian bishops, it has been conjectured that Eumenius in Ep. 18 is the transmitter's error for Eudoxius.

C. H.

EUMENIUS (1) (EUMERIUS, EUMELIUS), bishop of Nates at the council of Valence, A.D. 374. (Cell. i. 600; Gall. Christ. xiv. 798; Tillmont, Mem. viii. 554; Bruns, Can. ii. 111; Mansi, iii. 491, 493.)

R. T. S.

EUMENIUS (2) (FUMERIUS, FUMARIUS, THUMERIUS), according to old catalogues seventh bishop of Angers, succeeding Tulasius and followed by Eustochius (cir. A.D. 477). (Gall. Christ. xiv. 547; Gams, Series Episc. 488.)

C. S. A. B.

EUMENIUS (3), a priest, was the bearer of the letter of pope Anastasius to Clovis, on the Frankish king's conversion. (Thiel. Ep. Rom. Pont. p. 624; Bouquet, iv. 50.)

T. R. B.

EUMENIUS (4) (EUMELIUS, EMERIUS, EUMERIUS), fifteenth bishop of Nantes, succeeded Epiphanius, and followed by St. Felix. He was present at the second council of Orleans (A.D. 533). At the third, in 538, he was represented by a priest, Marcellianus. At the fourth, in 541, he was again present in person (Mansi, viii. 538; lx. 21, 121). A letter addressed to him is extant, from Trojanus bishop of Saintes, in answer to one of his as to a boy who did not know whether he had been baptized or not (Patr. Lat. xlvii. 995). There is said to be another from Ruricius, of Limoges, but it is not in the collection of that bishop's letters in the Patrologia Latina. We learn from some eulogistic lines of Venantius Fortunatus (Miscell. iv. 1, in Patr. Lat. lxxviii. 151) that he built a church at Nantes. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 798.)

S. A. B.

EUMORPHIUS, the son of a Roman widow named Galla. She resided near Gregory the Great while he was yet a layman. Eumorphius, being at the point of death, sent his servant to an old friend of his, a certain Stephanus, desiring him to come daintily as there was a vessel ready to take them both to Sicily. The servant thought his master mad, but Eumorphius insisted, and he went. On the road he met Stephanus's own servant, who told him his master had just died. Returning to Eumorphius, the servant found him dead likewise: both, indeed, had died simultaneously. The story was told by Gregory to show that the dying are sometimes allowed to know who are their equals in good or evil, and in whose society they are to pass eternity. A similar story is told of another dying man. (JOANES, monk of Spoleto.) (Greg. Mag. Dal. iv. 35; Patr. Lat. xlvii. 376.)

C. H.

EUNAPIUS. The biographer of many of the Neoplatonist philosophers. Born at Sardis in A.D. 346 or 347, he received his earliest instruction from the philosopher Chrysanthus, to whose wife he was related. In his sixteenth year he took a voyage to Athens to attend the lectures of Proserenus; in an interesting passage, he describes a dangerous fever with which he was seized during his voyage (so that on his landing he was unconscious) and the hospitality with which he was received by Proserenus and others at Athens. On his return from Athens, where he remained five years, he was again treated with paternal care and affection by Chrysanthus, from whom he used to receive instruction in the afternoon, while he himself gave lectures to others in the morning. It would appear that he depended on his professorial art for his livelihood; for he had himself intended to study in Egypt on leaving Athens, had not his parents (of whom no report) recalled him to Lydia to pursue this occupation. He was also skilled in medicine. Of the latter part of his life little is known; he lived, at any rate, till the year A.D. 414 (cf. Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography, art. EUNAPIUS). Besides his biographies, which are extant, Eunapius wrote a continuation of the history, by Dexippus, of the Roman empire. This continuation was in fourteen books, and extended, according to Photius, from A.D. 270 to A.D. 404. Only a few fragments of this latter work are extant; the principal is that known as de Legationibus. The best edition of Eunapius is that by Boissonade (Amsterdam, 1822, 2 vols. 8vo.).

Photius represents Eunapius as a reckless calumnator of the Christians of the imperial court, and especially of Constantine himself (Διαβάων κατάλεγε Σταυρός, Photius says). This may probably be true; but to speak of Eunapius, as is sometimes done, as a systematic and bitter assailant of Christianity can hardly be correct. Of his two teachers, Chrysanthus, as we learn from Eunapius himself, was but a negligent follower of heathenism (though appointed by Julian high priest of Lydda) and tolerant towards Christianity (of which he was a member of the office); while Proserenus was actually a Christian. Nowhere in his extant works is Eunapius bitter against the Christians, except, indeed, where he mentions the monks; of these he says that their manner of life was piggish, and their behaviour in public indecent. But with the story of Hypatia before us, it can hardly be said that the monks did not lay themselves open to still worse charges than these. Eunapius was not a Lucian or a Celsus; the attitude of extravagant admiration towards his teachers was the one into which his mind naturally fell; he was the credulous, subservient disciple of a decaying mysticism. He relates, with apparent belief, how the statues of Hecate visibly laughed under the conjuration of the philosopher Maximus; and how the philosopher Jamblichus called out of two wells two boys, called Eros and Anteros, who embraced him, and were then replaced by him in their watery abodes. He intimates, indeed, a very slight doubt as to the truth of this latter story. This credulity is worth noticing for two reasons. First, it shews the disposition of the age to believe in marvels, and the absence of the critical spirit. Secondly, it can hardly be doubted that these and similar marvels were invented as a counterpoise to the Christian miracles. Certain it is, that Greek and Roman philosophers took to themselves a number of practices till Christianity became a power in the world; and that from the moment Christianity did become such a power, these trances are plentiful. For the rest, notwithstanding the mediocrity of ability of Eunapius, his writings are not quite unworthy of perusal for the sake of the information they contain as to the general views of the Neoplatonist writers and their relation to the world at large.
EUNICIUS

[J. R. M.]

EUNIUS, bishop. [Ennius.]

EURO, in the system of the Peratae, one of the heavenly powers, the ruler of the day, and identified by them with that which ignorance had called Isis (Hippol. Ref. v. 14). [G. S.]

EUROCUS is spoken of by Demster as a disciple of St. Columbanus (November 2), and a Scot, who wrote Gesta Columbani Magistri, flourished a.d. 606, and was venerated as a saint on October 2 (Demster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 253; Tanner, Bibl. 271). [J. G.]

EUROCIUS, martyr. [Segaste, Forty Martyrs of.]

EUNIOBIUS, bishop of Mitylene, in the island of Lesbos, subscribed the synodal decree of Gennadius of Constantinople against the Simeoniaci, a.d. 459. In his subscription Mitylene is called a metropolis, but other subscriptions of bishops of this see do not confirm him. (Le Quen, Oriens Christ. i. 955; Mansi, viii. 917.) [L. B.]

EUNOMIA, martyr. [Eumenia.]

EUROMIEUTYCHIANI (Ἑρωμιεύτυχιανοι, Soc. v. 24), one of the sects into which the Eunomians of Constantinople became divided after the banishment of Eunomius. [Eunomius (6).] Theology of Euthychius a layman, in controversy which arose among the Eunomians as to the foreknowledge of our Lord, and especially as to the meaning of Matth. xxiv. 37 and Mark xiii. 32, maintained that, as he had "absolutely received all things of the Father," he had also received that foreknowledge, and therefore that those passages must be interpreted accordingly. Finding that his opinions were strongly opposed, Eutychius went to Cappadocia to submit them to Eunomius, who approved them. The controversy still continued however, and after the death of Eunomius Eutychius was expelled from the community. He and his followers formed themselves into a separate party. They also differed from the main body of the Eunomians as to the formula which should be employed in the administration of baptism. The question which thus divided the Eunomians afterwards caused a similar schism among the Monophysites. (Sozom. H. E. vi. 26; vii. 17; Cassiod. Hist. Tripart. ix. 40; Theodoret, Hist. Fab. iv. 3; Agnostae, Vol. i. 62 b, l.) [T. W. D.]

EUNOMIOEUPSYCHIANI, an Eunomian sect, called from their founder Eupychus (Nicesph. Call. H. E. xii. 30). They seem to be the Eunomioeuchian (cf. Sozomen, H. E. vii. 17; and note 33 of Volatus). Eupychus being apparently a variant of Eutychius. [T. W. D.]

EUROMIOTHEOPHORIANI (Ἑυρομιο- θεοφόριανοι, Nicesph. Call. xii. 30), one of the sects into which the Eunomians became divided on a question raised by Theophorus, a Cappado- cian, as to the Divine omniscience. They also differed from other sections of the body on the subject of baptism. (Soz. H. E. v. 24, vii. 17; Cassiod. Hist. Tripart. ix. 40; Philostorg. H. E. x. 4; Agnostae, Vol. i. 62 b, l.) [T. W. D.]

EUNOMIUS (2), a bishop, of what see does not appear. He was sent with Olympius to Africa by Constantine, after the decision of the Roman council, a.d. 315, to make further inquiries as to the heresies of Caesarian. The two commissioners spent forty days at Carthage, and concluded that the council's decision must be maintained. (Opt. i. 25; Dict. i. 367.) [H. W. P.]

EUNOMIUS (3) of Cappadocia, bishop of Cyzicus (360–364) after the exposition of Eusebius. He was the pupil and secretary of Aetius. He completed and formulated his master's heretical system with a preciseness and logical consistency which stamped the name of Eunomius on the Anomoean heretics instead of the name of Aetius, to whom the party owed its existence. Eunomius stands conspicuous among the controversial leaders of the 4th century for the neatness with which he pursued and urged his own theological convictions, free from the taint of self-interest which characterized others, especially the Arian court party, as well as for the purity of his life, and the high tone of his personal character. He appears to have been a thoroughly honest man, with a "fierce disdain of compromises and dissimulation" (Newman, Eccl. Hist. v. 4 § 4), never shrinking from following his dogmatic conclusions to their legitimate issues and declaring them with all boldness, careless of the horror with which the orthodox were filled by what appeared to them such open blasphemies.
EUNOMIUS—ARIAN

His mind was cast in a rigid Aristotelian mould, and was written to a philosophy of dogmatic enunciation, to his doctrine demanding of every process. He was distinguished by a faculty of subtle disputations, and hard mechanical reasoning, (Newman, ibid.), which subjected the Christian verities to strict logical processes, and rejected every doctrine that could not be shewn to be consistent with human reason. Neander describes him as characterized by a doctrinal tenacity which narrowly confined itself within the province of the understanding, and regarded all truth in an outward mechanical way, with a strong opposition to the contemplative and mystical element, and looking on religious feeling as a despotic weakness; the decided enemy of asceticism, as well as of the growing disposition to the worship of saints and relics—in fact, the "Rationalist" of the 4th century. (Neander, Ch. Hist. vol. iv. p. 78, Clark's translation.) His uncompromising honesty, resolute boldness, and freedom from all vacillation and self-seeking, attracted attention, and to a certain extent secured respect. (Newman, ibid.) "It is always respectable, and if it be allowable to speak with a sort of moral catachresis, the Anomoeans merited on this account, as well as secured, a success which a false conclusion must not hope to obtain." (ib. p. 350).

In our ignorance of the minor geography of Asia Minor, we shall content ourselves with the birth-place of Eunomius precisely. The name is given as Daciae by Sozomen and Philostorgius, and as Olatatype by Gregory Nyssen. It is probable that the former was his small paternal estate, and the latter the village to which it belonged. Sozomen describes it as situated under the slopes of Mount Argeus, not far from Caesarea, but Gregory Nyssen is certainly correct in placing it on the confines of Cappadocia and Galatia. (Soz. H. E. vii. 17; Philost. H. C. E. x. 6; xi. 5.) Eunomius was proud of his Cappadocian birth, and resented it as an insult when Basil called him a Galatian. Basil's brother says in excuse that Olificate was too small to bear the name, and Gregory Nyssen remembers on which side it was. (Basil, in Eunom. lib. i. p. 396; Greg. Nyss. in Eunom. lib. i. p. 307.) Eunomius came of an honest, industrious stock. His grandfather, Priscus, had been a slave, who had purchased his freedom, as well as a small farm, with his savings. His father was an unpretending, hard-working man, supporting his family by the produce of his land, and the teaching of a few of the neighbours' children in the winter evenings. (Greg. Nyss. ibid. p. 291.) Eunomius inherited his father's and grandfather's independent, earnest spirit. Determined to rise, he got himself taught shorthand writing, and learning his paternal farm himself became enamoured to a kinsman, and tutor to his children. The restlessness of an ardent, youthful spirit soon rendered the country distasteful to him, and he repaired to Constantinople, where he hoped to satisfy his desire of studying rhetoric. Gregory Nyssen, who makes it his object to blacken his character as much as possible, hints that Eunomius's life at Constantinople was not very easy. (ib.) He specifies no charges. It was reported that at one time he worked as a tailor, making clothes and girdles. Before very long he returned to Cappadocia.

The fame of Aetius, who was then residing as a teacher at Alexandria, reached Eunomius; he conceived an ardent desire to attach himself to him as a pupil, and after a most animated colloquy with Severus the Arian bishop of Ptolemais, who was intimately acquainted with Aetius, went to Alexandria, about A.D. 356, and placed himself under Aetius's instruction, acting at the same time as his amanuensis (Socr. H. E. ii. 35, iv. 7; Soz. H. E. vi. 27; Philost. H. E. iii. 20; Greg. Nyss. in Eunom. i. p. 299). After two years of study at Alexandria, Eunomius accompanied Aetius to Antioch at the beginning of A.D. 358, to attend the Arian council summoned by Eudoxius, who had through court favour succeeded to the see of Antioch on the death of Leontius the year before.

The bold front which was displayed by the pure Arian party at this council, and the favour shewn to the flagrant blasphemies of Aetius and Eunomius, who did not scruple to assert the absolute unlikeliness (ἀνομοίως) of the Son to the Father, excited the violent opposition of the semi-Arian party, of which George of Laodicea, Basil of Ancyra, and Eustathius, the Constantinopolitan, were the highly respectable leaders. Under colour of the dedication of a church a council was speedily held by them at Ancyra, in which the Anomoean doctrines and their authors were condemned. A synodical letter was sent by them to the emperor, denouncing the blasphemous teaching of Eunomius and his master, and charging the latter with being privy to the conspiracy of Gallus. (Philost. H. E. iv. 8.) Intelligence of these proceedings struck dismay into the Arian clique at Antioch. It was felt essential that an able advocate should be despatched to Constantinople to defend them; and Eunomius, who, having previously declined Eudoxius's offer to ordain him because he had not sufficiently broken with the semi-Arian party, had now been ordained deacon, was selected as their advocate. But on his journey through Asia Minor he was apprehended by some imperial officers (indismissively designated by the Arian Philostorgius, emissaries of Basil) and banished by the emperor. Of his residence in Phrygia, Aetius was at the same time banished to Pepusa, while Eudoxius found it prudent to retire to his native Armenia, till the storm of the weak Constantius's wrath had blown over. (Greg. Nyss. ibid. p. 291.) Eudoxius soon found means to restate himself in the emperor's favour, and on the deposition of Macedonius by the council of Constantinople at the close of A.D. 359 he was chosen as his successor in the imperial see. Constantius had the utmost abhorrence of the Anomoeans and their teaching. Aetius was therefore sacrificed by the Arians as a scapegoat, while Eunomius was reluctantly persuaded to separate himself from his old master, at least to conceal his heterodoxy, that by thus accommodating himself to the times he might secure a position of influence, where he might secretly disseminate his views. Eudoxius procured for him from the emperor the bishopric of Cyzicus, which was vacant by the deposition of the semi-Arian Eleuthius (Eleutherus). In compliance with Eudoxius's advice, Eunomius at first maintained a discreet reserve on the points of controversy between the Anomoeans and the orthodox, but, weary of a dissimulation alien from his straightforward nature he soon began to propound his doctrines, at first privately, and then in public assemblies. Complaints of his heterodoxy were Laid before Eudoxius, who, vexed with Eunomius for having paid so little regard to his counsel, put the informers off with a promise to investigate these complaints, a promise he never intended to fulfil. The people of Cyzicus, weary of delay, applied to the emperor himself, who sent an order to Eudoxius to summon Eunomius to answer the complaints, and Eunomius, not satisfied with this, adopted the same policy of delay, until Constantius indignantly threatened that unless he attended to his commands he would banish them both. Eudoxius was now compelled to act. He summoned Eunomius to appear before a council of bishops at Constantinople, at the same time sending him a secret message to warn him of his danger, and counselling flight. Eunomius, not appearing, was condemned in his absence, and was deposed both from his see and his episcopal office, and banished. (Theod. Hist. Fab. iv. 3; H. E. ii. 29; Philost. H. E. vi. 1.) Eunomius on this broke altogether with those with whom he had a certain correspondence, and made himself a traitor to Eusebius, and became the head of a party of his own, called after him Eunomians, professing the extreme Anomoean doctrines of the general comprehensiveness of the Divine Essence, and the absolute unlikeness of the Son to the Father. The accession of Julian in A.D. 361 recalled Eunomius and a few of his followers, who had been banished by Constantius. They both settled in Constantinople, where they continued preaching during the reign of Julian, and that of his successor Jovian. (Philost. H. E. vi. 7, vii. 6.) The growing popularity of Eunomianism at Constantinople was a cause of jealousy to Eudoxius, who took advantage of the commotions caused by the rebellion of Procopius against the government of Acrabates in A.D. 364, to expel both Eunomius and Aetius from the city. Eunomius retired to his country house near Chalcedon. Procopius having also taken refuge there in Eunomius's absence, Eunomius was accused of favouring his designs, and was in danger of being capitally condemned. ACod. Theodosii, the prefect of the Praetorian guards, was actually passed upon him, A.D. 367. But on his way thither, passing through Mursa, the Arian bishop, Valens, interested himself greatly in his cause, and by personal application to the emperor Valens obtained the release of his sentence. (Philost. H. E. ix. 4–8.) He was again sentenced to banishment in the same year by Modestus, the prefect of the Praetorian guards, as a disturber of the public peace. (Philost. H. E. ix. 11.) But he was again at Constantinople, or at least at Chalcedon, at the beginning of the reign of Theodosius, A.D. 379, to whom in A.D. 383, he, in common with the other bishops summoned by him, presented a confession of faith, which was approved by the emperor.
EUNOMIUS—ARIAN

Theodosius, finding some of the officers of the court infected with Eunomian views, expelled them from the palace, and having seized Eunomius himself at his house at Chalcedon, banished him to Halmyris, a town of Moeonia, on the Danube. This place having been captured by the Goths who had crossed the frozen river, Eunomius was transported to Caesarea in Cappadocia.

The fact that he had attacked their late venerated bishop, Basil the Great, in his writings, rendered him so unpopular there that his life was hardly safe. He was therefore permitted to retire to his paternal estate at Dacora, where he died in extreme old age soon after A.D. 392, when according to Jerome (Vit. Illust. c. 129) he was still living, and writing much against the church. He was buried at Dacora, whence his body was transferred to Tyana, by the order of Eutropius, c. 396, and there carefully guarded by the monks, to prevent its being carried over into Galatia by adherents of Caesarius against the wish of his master Aetius, to whom he had himself given a splendid funeral. (Soz. H. E. vi. 17; Philost. H. E. ix. 6, xi. 5.)

The portrait drawn by Philostorgius (H. E. vi. 6), though that of an ardent admirer who extolled his defects as beauties, is by no means flattering. Though he speaks of his face, body, and limbs as full of grace and dignity, when he proceeds to describe the white scrobicular blains, "which marked his face as it were with brands and scars," as adding to the majesty of his person, and his lips as increasing the attractiveness of his speech, we know what weight to give to his words. According to Eusebius, his constitution was poisoned with jaundice within and without ("interius externusque morbo regio corruptus").

Eunomianism, as a cold, logical system, wanted the elements of vitality, and notwithstanding its wide popularity at its commencement, did not make much headway. In the following century, when Theodoret wrote, the body had dwindled to a scanty remnant, compelled by the hatred their blasphemies had excited to conceal themselves, and holding their meetings in such obscure corners that they had gained the name of "Troglydites" (Theod. Hist. Fab. iv. 3). St. Augustine remarked that the time the few Eunomians existing were all to be found in the East, and that there were none of the sect in Africa (Aug. de Past. Car. c. 8, p. 278).

The efforts of Eunomius as a religious teacher were directed to the formal development of Arianism as a doctrinal system. He starts with the concept of God the Father as alone God, Being, of whom neither self-communion nor generation can be predicated. His essence is in this, that He is what He is of Himself alone, undervived, unbegotten—and as being the only unbegotten One, the Father, in the strict sense of Deity, is alone God. And as He is unbegotten, inas much as begotten necessarily involves the division and imputation of being, so it is impossible for Him to beget. If also, that which was begotten shared in the Œkōmos of the Deity, God would not be the absolute unbegotten One, but would be divided into a begotten and an unbegotten God. A communion of the essence of God, such as that involved in the ideas of eternity, would transfer to the Absolute Deity the notions of time and sense. An eternal generation was to Eunomius a thing absolutely inconceivable. A begetting, a bringing forth, could not be imagined as without beginning and end. The generation of the Son of God must therefore have had its beginning, as it must have had its termination, at a definite point of time, therefore, incompatible with the predicate of eternity. If that can be rightly asserted of the Son, He must equally, with the Father, be unbegotten. This denial of the eternal generation of the Son involved also the denial of the likeness of His essence to that of the Father, from which the designation of the party, "Anomoian" (ἀνομοιαν) was derived. That which is begotten, he asserted, cannot possibly resemble the essence of that which is unbegotten. The unbegotten continues ever unbegotten, and the begotten begotten as long, therefore, as the two essences are what they are, the notion of equality of essence, "Homousian," or even similarity of essence, "Homoiousian," is plainly untenable. Were the begotten to resemble the unbegotten in its essence, it must cease to be begotten. Were the Father and the Son equal, the Son must also be unbegotten, a consequence utterly destructive of the fundamental doctrine of generation and subordination. Such generation, moreover, Eunomius held to be essentially impossible. For what could the unbegotten Absolute One take out of His essence to impart to the begotten One, but that which is unbegotten? If it be objected, according to the teaching of the church, the Son, who is begotten, were of the same essence as the Father who begets, there must be both an unbegotten and a begotten element in God. The essence of the Father and of the Son must therefore be absolutely dissimilar in the same way as it is in the soul, so also is it in their knowledge of themselves different. Each knows Himself as He is, and not as the other. The one knows Himself as unbegotten, the other as begotten. Since, therefore, the Son did not share in any way in the essence of the Father, what is His relation to God, and to what does He owe His origin? Eunomius's answer to this question lay in a distinction between the essence (σωφία) and the energy (ἐνεργεία) of God. Neither movement nor self-communication being predicable of the Divine Essence, it is to the divine energy, conceived as separable from the Μορφή that we must ascribe the calling into existence out of nothing of all that is. It is in virtue of this ἐνεργεία alone that God can be called Father, as it is by this that all that is, besides Himself, has come into being. Of these creations of the divine energy the Son or Logos holds the first place, as the instrumental creator of the world. And in this relation likeness to the Father is that of the Son. In fact, the Son may be in this sense regarded as the express image and likeness of the ἐνεργεία of the Father, inasmuch as He had conferred on Him divine dignity in the power of creation. This was the ground of the immeasurable difference between the Son and all other created beings. He was produced by the Father, as an alone Being, the first or most perfect of all Beings, to be, by His will, His instrument in the creation of all other existences. God called Him into being immediately, but all other creatures mediatel) through Him. This teaching introduced a dualism into the essence of God Himself, when it drew a distinction between His Essence and His will—the one being infinite and absolute, and the other relative and limited to finite objects. On the ground of this dualism He is charged by Gregory Nyssen with Manichaeism. Eunomius regarded the Paraclete as sharing in the Divine nature in a still more secondary and derivative form, which seems more or less the highest and noblest production of the Only-begotten Son, given to be the source of all light and sanctification.

CHRIST. BISH.—VOL. II.

The entire want of spiritual depth and life which characterized Eunomius is evidenced by his maintaining that the Divine nature is perfectly comprehensible by the human intellect, and charging those who denied this with an utter ignorance of the first principles of Christianity. He accused them of preaching an unknown God, and even denied their right to be called Christians at all, since without knowledge of God there could be no Christianity; while he repudiated the claim of those who did not hold the same views as himself as to the nature of God and the generation of the Son of God, to the possession of any true knowledge of the Divine Being. He held that Christ had been sent to lead other creatures up to God, the primal source of all existence, as a Being external to Himself, and that believers should not stop at the generation of the Son of God, but having followed Him as far as He was able to lead them, should seek above Him, as above all created beings whether material or spiritual, to God Himself, the One Absolute Being, as their final aim, that in the knowledge of Him they might obtain eternal life. It is evident how poor and low Eunomius's idea of the knowledge of God placed on man. It was, placed in him and in his understanding, and a theoretical knowledge of God and spiritual truth, instead of that fellowship with God as made known to us in Christ, and that knowledge which comes from love, which the church has ever held to be the true life of the soul. In harmony with this formal, intellectual idea of knowledge as the source of Christian life, Eunomius assigned a lower place to the sacraments than to the teaching of the word, depreciating the liturgical element of Christianity as compared with its doctrinal element. As quoted by Gregory Nyssen, he asserted that "the essence of Christianity did not depend for its ratification on sacred terms, on the special virtue of customs and mystic symbols, but on accuracy of doctrine." (Greg. Nyss. in Eunom. p. 704). For fuller statements of the doctrinal system of Eunomius, see Dorner, Doctrine of the Person of Christ, Div. i. vol. ii. p. 204 ff., Clark's translation; Neander, xxvi. 326 ff., xxvii. 308 ff., Clark's translation; Herzog, Real-Encycl., "Eunomius und Eunomianer" (from which works the foregoing account has been derived); Klose, Geschichte und Lehre des Eunomius, 1833; Bauer, Dreieinigkeit, i. pp. 365-387; Meyer, Trinitateslehre, pp. 175 ff.; Lange, Arianaus in seiner weiteren Entwicklung.

Eunomius, as a writer, was more copious than elegant. Photius exhausts a whole vocabulary of vituperation upon the style of his Refutation of St. Basil (Cod. 198, p. 314), which he asserts to be so far removed from all grace and elegance that he seems not even to know these words. His meaning is very hard to arrive at, as by a studied obscurity he seeks to conceal the jejuneness of his thoughts, and the weakness of his arguments. Photius speaks very deprecatingly of his logical power. He says that he took up logic late in life, never fully comprehended it, and often used it erroneously. He despises, eneans ground without more than the highest and noblest production of the Only-begotten Son, given to be the source of all light and sanctification.
EUNOMIUS—ARIAN

no easy task to read his interminable periods. Socrates estimates Eunomius's style no less unfavourably. He accuses him of perpetual repetitions, of heaping up words without ever advancing a step, and evidencing weakness both in conception and in argument (Socr. H. E. iv. 7). Notwithstanding these alleged defects, his writings, which Bahiæus states were very numerous and directed against the Christian faith (Hist. Eccl. i. 25) were in much esteem among his followers, who, according to Jerome, valued their authority more highly than that of the Gospels, and believed that the very light of truth resided in Eunomius (Hieron. adv. Figul. tom. ii. p. 129). The bold blasphemies contained in these books were the cause of their destruction. Successive imperial edicts, one of Arcadius, dated not more than four years after his death A.D. 398 (Cod. Theod. tom. vi. p. 152; Lib. xvi. 34), commanded that his books should be burnt, and made the possession of any of his works a matter of capital crime. Little, however, of his has come down to us save some few fragments preserved in the works of his theological adversaries. His Exposition of Faith and his Apologeticus are the only pieces extant of any length.

The works ascribed to him are (1) A Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, in seven books. It represents the views of Henry of cent. A.D. 200, and is a work of capital crime. Little, however, of his has come down to us save some few fragments preserved in the works of his theological adversaries. His Exposition of Faith and his Apologeticus are the only pieces extant of any length.

The works ascribed to him are (1) A Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, in seven books. It represents the views of Henry of cent. A.D. 200, and is a work of capital crime. Little, however, of his has come down to us save some few fragments preserved in the works of his theological adversaries. His Exposition of Faith and his Apologeticus are the only pieces extant of any length.

(2) Epistles, of which Photius states he had read as many as forty, and found in them the same affectation of subtility compared with shallowness and a disgraceful ignorance of the laws of epistolary composition (Cod. u. s.).

(3) Euseius adversus, Fidei libellus. A confession of faith presented to Theodosius, A.D. 383 (Socr. H. E. vii. 12). This was first printed by Valerius in his notes to Socrates, and afterwards by Baluze in Concilia. Nov. Collect. i. 89. It is now found in the Bibliothèque Nationale and Fabricius, lib. v. c. 23. Valerius says of it, "etsi totam Eunomii impietatem complicitur, quaedam tamen habet minime spemenda."

(4) Apologeticus, in twenty-eight sections. This is his most famous work, in which, with much subtility, he seeks to refute the Nicene doctrine of the Trinity, especially the co-eternal and consubstantial divinity of Christ. Basil the Great thought the book worthy of an elaborate refutation, which we possess in his five books, Adversus Eunomium. A considerable portion of the Apologeticus was written by Cave from a MS. in the possession of archbishop Tenison, with a Latin translation from the Greek of Henry Wharton (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 220 sq.), and the whole is given by Fabricius, with a Latin translation (Bibl. Græc. lib. v. c. 23, ed. Hamburg, 1717). It has been also published by Canisius (Lect. Ant. ed. Basnage, i. p. 181), and more recently by Thilo (Bibl. Doctr. ii. p. 180, and Migne, Pat. Gr. xxi. 358). An English translation of it was published by Wharton in his Eunomianismus Restitutus, London, 1711, 8vo.

(5) Απολογίας ἀπολογίας. A defence of the preceding work from the attack made on it by St. Basil. Philostorgius absurdly states that Basil died of despair after reading this work, feeling himself incapable of answering it (Philost. H. E. viii. 12). Photius, on the other hand, tells us that, after Eunomius had devoted many years of close study to the composition of the reply, conscious of its inadequacy, he was afraid that Basil should see it, and kept it unpublished till after his death, and even then put it into the hands of his friends and adherents alone. On the other hand, the most recent critics, as others, however, got hold of it, and treated the wretched thing with the contempt it deserved (Phot. Cod. 138).

EUNOMIUS (4), a bishop intruded by the Arians into the see of Samosata, on the deposition of Eusebius Samosatensis by Valens in A.D. 374. His episcopate was short and unhappy. The people of Samosata resented the loss of their bishop so keenly that they all, from the highest to the lowest, refused to hold any intercourse with Eunomius. No one visited him, or exchanged a word with him. He officiated in an empty church. When he entered the public baths no one would bathe with him, nor even use the water contaminated by a heretic. Thinking it useless to remain where he was, he became the object of general aversion, Eunomius resided his episcopal and left the city. He was succeeded by Lucius. (Theod. H. E. iv. 15.) [E. V.]

EUNOMIUS (5), bishop of Berol in Thracia, an Apollinarian. His period was somewhere between Danophilus, A.D. 370, and Sebastianus, A.D. 451. (Le Quen, Orient. Chr. i. 1167.) [J. de S.]

EUNOMIUS (6), bishop of Marazana, or Marazana, in Byzas, who was present at the Carthagian conference A.D. 411. (Nov. Vit. de Don. Hist. Obscurth, p. 425.) [H. W. P.]

EUNOMIUS (7), bishop of Raecina (Theodosiopolis) in Syria, whose city was besieged by Varanes king of Persia, in the reign of Theodosius II., c. A.D. 420. The bishop vigorously opposed the Persian attacks, desiring the threets of burning down the church, and ultimately killed one of the kings present in the besieging army by a stone shot from a ballista inscribed with the name of the apostle St. Thomas, the supposed founder of the Edessean church, whereupon the siege was abandoned. (Thedorch, H. E. v. 36 al. 37; Le Quen, Orient. Chr. ii. 978.) [L. D.]

EUNOMIUS (8), bishop of Nicomedia, 451.

The thirteenth session of the council of Chalcedon was taken up with a dispute between Eunomius and the metropolis of Nicomedia and Anastasius bishop of Nicæa, with regard to jurisdiction over the see of Basiliopolis. It is an instance of an appeal, in a purely ecclesiastical matter, to the secular authority of the emperors Valentinian and Marcian. A prominent part in the proceedings was taken by the judges, who were the commander-in-chief Anastarius, the prefect of the Praetorians Palladius, and the master of the offices Vincentius. Anastasius had excommunicated the clergy of Basiliopolis, claiming that city as belonging to his province. Eunomius, quoted Valentinian, Anastasius Julianus and Valens. The magistrates and synod declared Nicomedia to be metropolis of all Bitinia, setting aside a claim proposed by Athanas archdeacon of Constantionpoul, to the effect that that see had the right of consecrating for Basilinopoul (Mansi, Concil. vii. 302; Cellier, r. 695).
EUNOMIUS

[W. M. S.]

EUNOMIUS (9), bishop of Amida (now Durbekir), on the Tigris, the metropolis of the province of Mesopotamia, consecrated A.D. 546. (Assemanii, Bibl. Orient. ii. 48 n.; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 984.)

[L. D.]

EUNOMIUS (10) appointed count of Tours in the place of Leudastes, who was deposed for oppression of the people and persecution of Gregory, A.D. 580. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. v. 48, 50, viii. 23.)

[S. A. B.]

EUNUS, Feb. 27, the surname of a martyr named Cronio, who together with Julian was carried through Alexandria on a camel, scourged, and afterwards burned, during the Decian persecution. (Euseb. vi. 41; Mart. Usuard., Rom. Vit., Adon.)

[T. S. B.]

EUNUTIUS (Evunidus), ST., bishop of Nosa. In the majority of the catalogues after the name of Huanutus, the twenty-seventh bishop, is found that of Guido, and next to him that of Eunutius, but some have “Guido cum Eutici sancto.” This has puzzled the commentators, and several explanations have been attempted. It has been suggested (1) that Eunutius was a priest only, (2) that he was a sort of suffragan bishop, who performed the duties of the office for Eunutius, (3) that one was bishop of Nosa, and the other of Tournay. Le Coite again rejects all these views, and believes that at the synod of Soissons (A.D. 744), either because Guido had become too old to discharge the duties of the episcopate, or for some other good reason, Eunutius was consecrated bishop, while the other was yet living. The dates are an objection to this theory, as there is an extant letter of pope Zacharias to Eunisius, the successor of Eunutius, which is ascribed to the year following the council, while by some of the catalogues six years are allotted to the joint reign of the two bishops. He is commemorated Sept. 10. (Le Coite, Auct. Franc. a. 475, n. xii. tom. v. p. 121; Gall. Christ. iii. 985; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. iii. 616.)

[S. A. B.]

EUO.- [See under Evo-]

EUPARDO was a bishop of Autun, and is placed by the compilers of the Galica Christiana (iv. 345) seventeenth on the list, between St. Nectarius and Remigius or Benignus, about A.D. 550. This position, however, is matter of conjecture, some putting him rather earlier, while others place him about forty years later. (Le Coite, Auct. Franc. a. 500, n. v.; Gams, Series Episc. 499.)

[S. A. B.]

EUPATERIUS, a layman who, together with his daughter, had written to Basil requesting that he would declare his faith. Basil replies that he adheres strictly to the Nicene creed, but that the false teaching of others with respect to the Holy Spirit had rendered some addition to it necessary. For his part he would communicate with no one who asserted that the Holy Spirit was a created Being. (Basil, Ep. 159 (387)).

[EV.]

EUPATERIUS (8), AELIA MARCIA, empress, wife of the emperor Justinus. Her original name was Lupicina, and she was first

EUPATERIUS (9), EUPHANES, EUPHRAIUS, EUPHILUS, bishop of Naples. Ughelli states that his date cannot be positively ascertained, there being no extant narrative of his life. Baronius, following Paulus Regius, states him to have died A.D. 713. Others placed him much earlier. Joannes Diaconus calls him the eighth bishop of Naples, and successor to St. Eutapia, who was "S. Agrippino subrogatus" c. A.D. 180, but the date of whose death is uncertain. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. vi. 37; Boll. Acta SS. Mai. v. 238.)

[R. S. G.]

EUPHENDRIUS (9), Aelia, in the time of Sardianus, a woman who had been a slave of the imperial household. She was seized and imprisoned by the soldiers of Otho, and was afterwards burned to death. Her relics were venerated as early as the middle of the 3d century. (Mansi, Concil. iv. 236.)

H. U. B.]

EUPHENA (9), ST., a virgin who died at Chalcédon under Galerius, A.D. 307, and celebrated over the east and west. She was arrested by order of the proconsul Priscus, and after various tortures was killed by wild beasts. For the circumstances of her martyrdom we have very early evidence. Asterius [Asterius], bishop of Amasea, A.D. 400, tells us that he saw the sufferings of the martyr depicted on a tablet in the great church of Chalcédon, which was built over her tomb. In the same church the council of Chalcédon met A.D. 451, and the fathers attributed the success of their efforts against Eutychianism to her prayers, a circumstance commemorated afterwards on July 11 (Col. Byzant. and Neale’s note). Her relics were transferred to the church of St. Sophia in Constantinople, where amid the struggles of the Iconoclastic controversies she has been regarded as a special friend of the aspalled cultus. Constantine Copronymus, therefore, sought to sling them into the sea about A.D. 766, but they were rescued by the opposite party. There was a church at Rome dedicated to her as early as the time of Gregory the Great, while Codinus tells us that there were no less than seven churches dedicated to her in Constantinople, the most splendid of which was built in her honour by Constantine the Great, and, after the lapse of 450 years, profaned and turned into a public stable by Constantine Copronymus, but restored and beautified afterwards by the empress Irene (Codinus, de Orig. Constant. § 81; Du Cange, Opera. Christ. lib. iv. pp. 100-102). Her acts are contained in Symeon Metaphrastes; Surius; Ruinart. The work of Asterius treating of her will be found in Mansi incorporated with the acts of the seventh general council, A.D. 787. Venantius Fortunatus in his poem De Virginiate (Miscell. lib. viii. carm. 6) represents himself as an attendant on the blessed Virgin in the character of patroness of Chalcédon. (Mart. Hieron., Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi; Cartthag. Kalender; Sacramentar. Greg. Mag.)

[G. T. S.]

EUPHORIA (8), AELIA MARCIA, empress, wife of the emperor Justinus. Her original name was Lupicina, and she was first called Euphemia by the acclamations of the populace at her coronation. Her praenomen Aelia is known from her coins. She died in her husband's lifetime, not long after his accession, and was buried in the church of St. Euphemia. (Victor. Tununens. Chron. in Patr. Lat. lxvii. 552 b; Theoph. ann. 501, p. 141, in Patr. Gr. xviii. 358 a; Du Cange, Fam. Asg. p. 78.)

U 2

[C. H.]

EUPHEMITAE, also known as MESSALIANS, "praying people," and therefore reckoned by Epiphanius (Haer. 80) as predecessors of the Christian sect so called. Epiphanius, who is our sole informant about them, tells us that they were neither Christians, Jews, nor Samaritans, but were heathen, believing in a plurality of gods, but offering worship only to one whom they called the Almighty; that they built for themselves oratories, which in some places were made completely to resemble Christian churches; that in these they used to meet at evening and at early morning, with great abundance of lights, to join in hymns and prayer. We learn from him next with some surmise that some of the magistrates put several of these people to death for their perversion of the truth and unwarranted imitation of church customs, and that in particular LUPICIANUS having thus punished some of them gave occasion to a new error; for that they buried the bodies of those who had been thus executed, held meetings for their dead, and served at the spot, and called themselves MARTYRIANS. In fine Epiphanius charges a section of the Euphemites with calling themselves SATANIANS, and with worshiping Satan under the idea that by such service they might disarm the hostility of a being confessedly of great strength and of immense power to harm. It does not appear that Epiphanius means to assert that the Christian Euchites were historically derived from these heathen Euphemites, but merely that there was a general resemblance of practices between the two. It has been conjectured (Tilletmont, viii. 529) that the Euphemites of Epiphanius may be identical with the HYSANARIS of Greg. Naz., and less probably with the CONGOLIAE OF AFRICA. [Evanchester]

[G. S.]

EUPHEMIUS (1), bearer of a letter from Ascholius bishop of Thessalonica, A.D. 373, to Basil, who speaks in warm terms of him, and also of his wife, whom he calls κοινωνότρι. (Basil, Ep. 154 [397].)

[E. V.]

EUPHEMIUS (2), the owner of a farm at Apenianus, wrongfully occupied by Meletius, brother-in-law of Gregory Nazianzen. Gregory in his will declared that the farm was the property of Euphemius, whom he had often reproached for his want of proper spirit in abstaining from claiming it. (Greg. Naz. Testam.)

[E. V.]

EUPHEMIUS (3), bishop of Sophene, a district in the province of Mesopotamia; his name is found in the Latin list of the subscriptions to the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 1001; Mansi, vii. 103.)

[L. D.]

EUPHEMIUS (4), 3rd patriarch of Constantinople, succeeding Fravitta and followed by Macedonius II. He ruled six years and three months A.D. 489-496, and died in 515. Theophanes calls him Euthymius. Euphemius was a presbyter of Constantinople, administrator of a hospital for the poor at Neapolis, untiring with any suspicion of Eutychian leanings, and is described as learned and very virtuous. Finding that Peter Mongus, the patriarch of Alexandria, anathematised the council of Chalcedon for being so indigent that before he took his seat on the patriarchal throne, he solemnly separated from all communion with him, and with his own hands effaced his name from the diphychs, placing in its stead that of Felix III. of Rome. For a year the war raged strongly between Mongus and Euphemius. Each summits which was against the other: Euphemius even thought of persuading a council to depose Mongus; but at the end of October, 490, Mongus died.

To pope Felix the patriarch sent letters, as was usual, to announce his election. Great must have been his indignation when he received the reply that he might be admitted as a private member of the church Catholic, but could not be received in communion as a bishop, because he had not removed from the diphychs the names of his predecessors, Acacius and Fravitta.

Soon after his accession two interesting scenes occurred. One was at the death (probably in 489) of Diodor of the Styliite on the pillar where he had lived for thirty-three years. Euphemius came with others to the foot of the pillar to attend his last moments, as a tribute of respect to so renowned a personage. The other scene was in Constantinople. Anastasius, the future emperor, then an aged officer of the emperor Zeno, was an adherent of Eutychian opinions, and according to Zosimus, formed a sect, which met in some church of Constantinople. The patriarch appeared before the conventicle with menacing gestures and drove them from the spot. "If you must frequent the church," he exclaimed, "agree with her! or else no more enter into her gates to pervert men more simple than yourself. Do otherwise, and I will put your head, and lead you in triumph with the people." Henceforth, says the annalist, Anastasius kept quiet, for the sake of the glory that he coveted. As the emperor Zeno died in 491, this must have occurred within two years after the consecration of Euphemius, and it witnesses alike to his intrepidity and his influence.

After the death of Zeno, the empress Ariadne procured the election of Anastasius, on the understanding that he was to marry her. The patriarch openly called him a heretic and unworthy of reigning over Christians. Vain at first were the entreaties of the empress and the senate that he would consent to crown him. At length Euphemius came to terms; Anastasius capitulated on all points; he must give a written profession of his creed, promise under his hand to keep the Catholic faith intact, without making any attempt upon it after he should have become emperor, make no innovation in the church, and follow as his rule of belief the decrees of Chalcedon. These were severe conditions for Anastasius; but he gave the promise under the most solemn oaths, and Euphemius put it into the hands of the saintly Macedonius, chancellor and treasurer of the church of Constantinople, to be stored in the archives of the cathedral. (Evagr. iii. 52.)
At the end of 491, or on Feb. 25, 492, pope Felix died. His successor Gelasius immediately announced his elevation to the emperor Anastasius, but took no notice of Euphemius. Euphemius, in his ardent way, had written to him at once to express his joy on his appointment, and his desire for peace and for the reunion of the churches. Not to be chilled even by obtaining no answer, he wrote a second letter, and sent it by the deacon Synceleius. Neither letter remains; it appears however from the reply of Gelasius that Euphemius had congratulated the Roman church on having a pontiff who needed no instruction from any one, but was able to judge with his own eyes all that was necessary for the reunion of the churches; adding that, for himself, he was not sufficiently his own master to do what he wished; that the people of Constantinople would never agree to disgrace the memory of their late patriarch Acacius; that if that measure were necessary, the pope had better write to the people about it himself, and send somebody to try and persuade them. Gelasius, however, had never anything to say against the faith, and that if he was in communion with Mognus, it was when Mognus had given a satisfactory account of his creed. Euphemius subjoined his own confession, rejecting Eutyches and accepting Chalcedon. It seems also that Euphemius spoke of those who had been baptized and ordained by Acacius, and was by Gelasius accused of having submitted to the sentence pronounced against him at Rome, and pointed out how embarrassing it would be if the memory of Acacius must be condemned.

(Cullier, x. 486.)

Replying to these temperate counsels, Gelasius allows that in other circumstances he would have written to announce his election, but early observes that the custom existed only among those bishops who were united in communion, and was not to be extended to those who, like Euphemius, preferred a strange alliance to that of St. Peter. He allows the necessity of平原ness and tenderness, but remarks that those who refused to throw yourself into the ditch when you are helping others out. As a mark ofCodecension he willingly grants the canonical remedy to all who had been baptized and ordained by Acacius. Can Euphemius possibly wish him to allow to be recited in the sacred diplchy the names of condemned heretics and their successors? Euphemius professed to reject Eutyches; let him reject also those who have communicated with the successors of Eutyches. Acacius had not advanced anything against the truth; was it not even worse, then, for him to know the truth and communicate with its enemies? Euphemius asked when Acacius was condemned? No condemnation was needed! It was per facto according to the decrees of ancient councils. If Peter Mognus did purge himself, why did not Euphemius send proofs, instead of contenting himself with asserting the fact? He is much vexed with Euphemius for saying that he is constrained to do things which he does not wish; he could talk so about that truth, for which he ought to lay down his life. He refuses to send a mission to Constantinople, on the ground that it is the pastor's duty to converse his own flock. At the tribunal of Jesus Christ it will be seen which of the two is bitter and hard. The high spirit of the orthodox patriarch was fired by this dictatorial interference. He even thought of summoning the pope himself to account. And as it is certain that Gelasius was even more suspicious of the emperor Anastasius, who was, in spite of the recantation which Euphemius had enforced, a real Eutychian at heart, so it is very likely that, as Baroinus asserts, the patriarch did not attempt to conceal the pope's antipathy to the emperor.

Meanwhile nothing cooled the zeal of Euphemius for the council of Chalcedon. Anastasius harboured designs against its supporters; to thwart him the patriarch gathered together the bishops who were at Constantinople, and invited them to confirm its decrees. According to Theophanes and Victor of Tarsus this occurred in 492 (Vict. Tarn. Chron. p. 5); but in Mansi (vii. 1180) the event is placed at the beginning of the patriarchate of Euphemius, and the decrees are said to have been sent by the bishops to pope Felix III.

Various jars showed the continued rupture with Rome. Theodoric had become master of Italy, and in 493 sent an envoy to the emperor Anastasius to ask for peace. During their sojourn at Constantinople the envoys received complaints from the Greeks against the Roman church, which they reported to the pope. As was likely, Anastasius and Euphemius had much to say on the subject, the chief point of the patriarchate being that the emperor could not have been condemned by one prelate only, but that to excommunicate a metropolitan of Constantinople nothing less was needed than a general council. On this Gelasius observed that it had been done in virtue of Chalcedon, according to the custom with all heresies; pope Felix had only put in force an old decree, and had invented nothing new; the same could be done by any bishop, not by a pope only. Gelasius also accused Euphemius of hindering the peace with Theodoric, not for faith's sake, but only to strengthen his own party. (Mansi, viii. 165.) At that time it occurred that imprudence of Euphemius which unhappily cost him his throne. The emperor Anastasius, tired of his war against the Isaurians, was looking about for an honourable way of stopping it. He spoke confidentially to Euphemius about it; asking him to beg the bishops at Constantinople (there were always bishops coming and going to and from the metropolis) to pray for peace, that he might be thus furnished with an opportunity of entering on negotiations. Euphemius betrayed the secret to John the patriarch, father-in-law of Athenodorus, one of the chiefs of the Isaurians. John hurried to the emperor to inform him of the patriarch's indiscretion. Anastasius was deeply offended, and from that time forth never ceased to persecute his old opponent. He accused him of helping the Isaurians against him, and of corresponding with them. On one occasion when he had gained an advantage over them, he sent Eusebius, his Master of the Offices, to the patriarch with the taunting message, "Your Grace's prayers have covered your friends with confusion." (ταυς φιλαγας σου ἡμιώνας, Theoph. Chron. a.d. 488.)

At another time an assassin, either by Anastasius's own order, or to gain his favour, drew his sword on Euphemius at the door of the EUPHRANOR

EUPHRIUS (5) (Baron. Annal. xxxvi. 537, xiv.), bishop of Antioch. [Ephraim (6)].

EUPHIUS (6), bishop of Toledo from c. A.D. 574 to c. 590. He signed the acts of the third council of Toledo, 589, as "Metropolitanae Ecclesiae Catholicae Toletanae Provinciae Carpentaniae." His signature is remarkable for the use of the word "Catholic," which also appears in the signatures of three other Metropolitanas at the same council: Merida, Braga, and Sevilla, and refers, no doubt, to the existence of Arian bishops in those sees before the council. It is worthy of notice that, although in the case of certain suffragan bishops, Tortosa, Oporto, Tuy, Grancas, and Lugo, the Arian bishop is allowed after conversion to keep the episcopal dignity, so that each of these sees appears with two bishops at the council, there is no trace of this indulgence in the case of the Metropolitan sees, which no doubt were felt to be too important to be allowed to run any risk. The title Metropolitanae Provinciae Carpentaniae is the title of the position of the church of Toledo at the time (and which reappears after the Moorish conquest; see Acts of the Synod of Cordova in 839, Exp. Sgr. x. 525), led either to the assembling of the synod of Carthaginian bishops at Toledo in 610, or to the later forgery of its supposed acts, and of the Decretum Gelasianum. [Guthinmar]. In the same third council the well-known Peter of Ercauvica, signs as Arcavensis Celtiberiae Ecclesiae Episcopus. Ercauvica lay on the boundary between Carpetania and Celtiberia, and Peter therefore seems by his signature to have meant to imply his exemption from the jurisdiction of the "Metropolitan of Carpetania" (Gum, K. G. ii. 2, 68-77). In the Decretum Gelasianum Euphrius is said to have styled himself Metropolitan of Carpetania through ignorance; "sec ejusdem ignorantiae sententiam corrigimus;" while Flores, whose views on the primacy of Toledo are now in great measure superseded, supposed it to have sprung from modesty or unwisdom. For a discussion of the question of the primacy of Toledo to the older bishops of Carthaginiae, and of the growth of the primacy, see Guthinmar and Julian (Exp. Sgr. vi. 330, 333; v. 251, Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 238).

EUPHORUS (Euphorus, Phosphorus) signs the acts of the eighth Council of Toledo, an. 653, as bishop of Cordova. His name stands thirty-eighth on the list. [Exp. Sgr. x. 236; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 448; Gomez Bravo, Cat. de los Obispos de Cordova, p. 77.]

EUPHRANON, according to "Pradestinatus," i. 24, a bishop of Rhodes, who opposed the Severini.

EUPHRANOB, a Libyan bishop, c. A.D. 263. He was inclined to Sabellianism, on which account Dionysius bishop of Alexandria wrote him a letter afterwards quoted and commented on by Athanasius. [Ath. de Sentent. Dionys. §§ 10, 12, 13 in Pat. Gr. xxv. 494, 498, 499; Cellier, ii. 399].
EUPHRASIA

EUPHRASIA (1)—Jan. 19. Virgin and martyr at Nicomedia under Maximian, a.D. 309. Being condemned to violation, she ingeniously contrived to preserve her virginity and to secure martyrdom by pretending to the character of a sorceress. (Bas. Menol.; Nicephorus, lib. 7, c. 13; Bar. Annal. 309, 35.) [G. T. S.]

EUPHRASIA (2)—May 18. One of the seven virgin martyrs at Anchra. [Faina.] [G. T. S.]

EUPHRASIA (3), virgin. [Euphraxia.]

EUPHRASIA (4), wife of Naamatus, or Naamatus, bishop of Vienne (ob. 567). Like her husband she was of noble birth, and after his death she devoted herself and her property to "the exile, the widow, the captive, and the poor." Fortunatus wrote an epitaph in her praise. (Venand. Fort. Opp. pt. i. lib. iv. cap. 27; Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 176; Gall. Chr. xvi. 27; Baron. A. E. ann. 582, xivii.) [T. W. D.]

EUPHRASIA (5). [Euphrosyna (1).]

EUPHRASIUS (1), bishop of Andujar or Illitargi. [Euphrasius (1).]

EUPHRASIUS (2), bishop of Colonia or Tarasa in Cappadocia, one of the Nicene fathers, a.D. 325. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 413; Manii, ii. 694.) [L. D.]

EUPHRASIUS (3), bishop of Calanis. [Euphrasius.]

EUPHRASIUS (4), bishop of Nicomedia, present at the council of CONSTANTINOPEL, A.D. 381 (Manii, iii. 379). He seems to have died shortly afterwards. (Greg. Nyss. ep. 17; Patr. Gr. xlvii. 1056; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 587.) [T. W. D.]

EUPHRASIUS (5), subdeacon of Edessa, who took an active part in the persecution of his bishop, signing the "Instructio et Depravatio" against him and afterwards appearing in person at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, as one of his accusers. (Manii, vii. 209, 258.) [T. W. D.]

EUPHRASIUS (6), bishop of Lugania, in the province of Galatia Prima. He took part in the council of Constantinople, A.D. 449. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 488; Acta Conc. Chalc. act. i. ii. iii. vi. xv. xvi.) [T. W. D.]

EUPHRASIUS (7), a martyr at Alexandria in Africa at the beginning of the 6th century. He was commemorated on Jan. 14. (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 992.) [I. G. S.]

EUPHRASIUS (8), bishop of Antioch, A.D. 521-529. He was a native of Jerusalem. At the commencement of his episcopate he strongly opposed the council of Chalcedon, going so far as to erase the names of the fathers of that assembly, as well as that of Leo bishop of Rome, from the diptychs. He afterwards repented of this, and was excommunicated (Theoph. A. M. 6013, Patr. Gr. viii. 1186), and according to Joannes Malalas he became a violent persecutor of those whose cause he had espoused (Joan, Mal. Chronogr. lib. xvii. ed. Dindorf. p. 416). Euphrasius perished in the great earthquake which laid the city of Antioch in ruins, A.D. 629 (Theoph. A. M. 6019; Evagrius, Hist. Eccl. iv. 4, 5; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 733.) [T. W. D.]

EUPHRATAS (9), said to be the first-known bishop of PARENSANUM (Parensanum), c. 521 (Gaim, Socr. Eppic. 739; Cappelletti, Acta d'Italia, viii. 781). He is said to have lapsed into schism after one year's episcopate. Pelagius I. c. 556, in a letter (Jaffe, Kosest. Pont. 678) to Narses, speaks of a certain "Euphratas schismaticus." Cappellotti gives an inscription in which his name is recorded. [A. H. D. A.]

EUPHRATAS (10), bishop of Calahorra, signs by deputy the acts of the thirteenth council of Toledo, 683 (Esp. Sagra. xxxii. 159; Aguirre-Catalan, iv. 287). [M. A. W.]

EUPHRATAS (11), bishop of Lugo from about 681 to 688, signs the acts of twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth councils of Toledo (Esp. Sagra. al. 84; Aguirre-Catalan, iv. 270, 287, 313). [Agrestius.] [M. A. W.]

EUPHRATAS. See also Euphrasius.

EUPHRATAS (1), bishop of Cologne, 343, said to have been deposed for Photianism by a synod at Cologne, 346 (Manii, ii. 1379) and noted by Binius, 1375). But the acts of this assembly are spurious or have been falsified; for in 347 Euphratias attended the council of Sardica, and not only subscribed its decrees, but was one of those deputed to ask of Constantinian the restoration of the churches to Athanasius and his friends. On this mission he proceeded to Antioch, and Theodoret (lib. ii. c. 9) and Athanasius (Hist. Arian. ad Mon. 281) relate a detestable trick played on him by Stephen of Antioch for the purpose of ruining his reputation. (Poll. Christ. iii. 622; Tillemont, Mem. vi. 332, and viii. 119.) [R. T. S.]

EUPHRATAS (2), bishop of Chersonesus (Chersonesus), in Crete. Signed in A.D. 458 the synodical epistle of the Cretan bishops to the emperor Leo. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 271.) [J. de S.]

EUPHRATAS (3), presbyter of Constantinople in 454. In a letter to Anatolius, bishop of Constantinople, pope Leo the Great, whose intercourse in the affairs of the East was systematic, allows Euphratas to be ordained presbyter if he promises to abjure the Eutychian and Nestorian heresies, although he had spoken ill of the late bishop of Constantinople, Flavianus, of blessed memory. (Leo Mag. Epist. cxxvii.; Patr. Lat. liv. 1278; Ceillier, x. 227.) [W. M. S.]

EUPHRATAS (4), eunuch under Justinian, by race one of the Abasgi, a people of the Caucasus. In A.D. 529 he was sent by Justinian on a mission to the Abasgi. A great number of eunuchs came from that race, and Justinian determined to put a stop to the practice of castration. He issued a law to forbid it in general, and despatched Euphratas to warn his countrymen in particular. Justinian also built a church amongst them, and supplied them with missionaries. The tribe was converted to Christianity. (Evagr. Lib. iv. cap. 25; Procop. de Bell. ii. 572, 15; Dindorf, 1838, ed. Baronon. add. ann. 536, 537; Justinian, Novell. 142.) [W. M. S.]

EUPHRATAS (5), bishop of Tyana (Euasia, Christopolis), metropolis of the second Cappadocia, present at the fifth general council, A.D.
EUPHRATES

553; at the fifth session he quoted the diphtychs of his own church to prove that Theodosius, to whom Gregory Nazianzen had written some letters, had been bishop of Tyana, not of Mopsuestia. (Le Quien, Orientis Christ. i. 400; Mansi, ix. 258, 390.)

EUPHRATES (1). [PERATAE.] Origen (contra Celsum, vi. 28) states that the Ophites boasted of one Euphrates as the introducer of their impious doctrines. And Hippolytus (Ref. iv. 2, v. 13, x. 10), followed by Theodoret (Haer. Fab. i. 17), speaks of the Ophite sect called Peratae as founded by Euphrates the "Peratic," and Aschem the Carysian. There is certainly a case for suspicion that this Euphrates the Peratic, the supposed founder of the sect of Peraticas, may be as mythical a personage as Ebiaz, the eponymous founder of the Ebianites. We do not read elsewhere of any Euphrates but the Stoic philosopher, who lived in the reign of Alexander the Great (see Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography, s. v.), whom we cannot suppose to have been a teacher of Ophite doctrine.

The name of the river Euphrates was largely used among the Peratae with a mystical significance; and it is conceivable that members of the sect, knowing the name to be held in honour among them, and knowing also that there had been eminent teachers called, may have been led to claim him as their founder. On the other hand, it is plain that the Peratic treatise of which Hippolytus gives an abstract, and which may have been also seen by Origen, contained the name of Euphrates coupled with that of Aschem the Carysian, a personage whom the Ophite sect, so called, may have identified with this Euphrates, the prophet of the Old Testament, in order to demonstrate that there is nothing incredible in the supposition that these are the names of real Ophite teachers, though obscure to leave any record of their existence, outside their own sect.

The title "Peratic," as applied to the sect, is explained by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vii. 176, etc.) to denote the "water." This sense may have taken its origin from the phrase σφυρας και ωραπας (Gen. xiv. 13, LXX), which was understood to mean one who came from the other side of the Euphrates (see Julius Africanus, ix. in Routh's Reliquiae, ii. 244). Pliny (Hist. Nat. xii. 19), speaking of a certain gum which came from Arabia, India, Media, and Babylon, adds that that which came from Media was called by some Peratic (Harvey, Ireneus, i. 1xxvii.). This seems to be the same as the Peratic frankincense spoken of by Arrian (Peripitus Maris Erythr. p. 148, Amst. 1663). It is probably a mere corruption of Sophronius of Jerusalem (Hodousin, Concil. iii. 1287) speaks of Sophronius of Persia, for he must have got the name from Theodoret; yet the corruption may have originated in the change of an unfamiliar word into a supposed equivalent. On the whole, we may conclude that this Euphrates, if he existed, came from the extreme east, and we may safely reject Bunsen's idea that this designation can only mean "the Euphrates," for this is contrary to the facts that Aschems, with whom Euphrates is coupled, came from Euboia, and that Euboia is sometimes spoken of as ώραπας, the other side. But this does not prove that the name "Peratic" would ever have been understood as equivalent to "Euboican;" it is nowhere stated that Euphrates and Aschems were fellow-countrymen, and if they were, it is not likely that the one would have been designated after the other generally after the island.

Moshimuel, in his work on the Ophites (Geschichte der Schlangenbrüder) quoted by Matter (Gnomenme., i. 180), counts Euphrates as the first Gnost, on the grounds that he was the founder of the Ophites, and that this sect was anterior to Christianity. But his reasons for the latter opinion have not been found convincing. One of the strongest, viz. that Philaster counts Cainites, Sethites, and Ophites among pre-Christian sects (Cainites) loses all its weight when we find reason to believe that Philaster did not follow an arbitrary deviation from the authority he was following (see Lipsius, Quellenkritis des Ephrianos).

EUPHRATES (3), chamberlain of Constantine the Great. According to Codinus he had a great share in Constantine's conversion, but is not mentioned by the earlier authors. See Col. Orig. Constantinopol. p. 10 c. [M. F. A.]

EUPHRATES (3), presbyter. [Euphrates.] EUPHRATES (4) (Euphratias), bishop of Eleuthera in Crete; present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, viii. 404; Or. Christ. ii. 270.) [3. de S.]

EUPHRATION, bishop of Balaæas (on the Syrian coast, at the mouth of the river Eleutherus), present at the Nicene council, A.D. 325 (Mansi, ii. 693, 698). Athanasius (de Symmach. § 17, p. 584) states that Eusebius of Caesarea, in Palestine, who wrote to Euphration did not feel it necessary to repeat openly that Christ was not very God. A charge of writing to Euphratian in blasphemous terms on the same subject is made against Eusebius in the acts of the second council of Nicaea (Mansi, xii. 701 D). He was banished from his see by the Arians at the same time as Eustathius of Antioch (see also Eustathius, § 20, p. 254). In Athanasius (Hist. Arian. ad Monach. § 5) the see of Euphration is written Καλαεας, which has caused him sometimes to be called bishop of Calanis; but as the Benedictine editor there observes, the true name is Καλαεας, which occurs in Apol. de Pug. § 3. [E. V.]

EUPHRONIUS (1), bishop of Antioch, one of the prelates intruded by the Arian party after the deposition of Eustathius, c. 382. He had previously been a presbyter of the Cappadocian Caesarea. For the difficulties connected with the succession of prelates of this see, the letter of Antioch see EULALIUS (4). The see being again vacant by the premature death of Eulalius, the dominant party desired to establish their position by retaining Eusebius of Caesarea, who was then at Antioch as a leading member of the council by whom Eustathius had been deposed, and applied to the emperor Constantine to resume the appointment. Eusebius, however, wrote to the emperor to decline the proffered dignity, such translation being a violation of the Nicene canons (Can. 19). Constantine on this wrote three letters, preserved by Eusebius (de Fil. Const. iii. 60, 61, 62), one to Eusebius, highly commending his refusal of the see, a second EUPHRONIUS, bishop of Antioch, bidding them not to erect the bishop of other cities, and a third to the ordaining prelates recommending Euphranius of Cosaeus and George of Arethusa. The choice fell on Euphranius. He added another to the list of short-lived intruded prelates, dying within less than two years of his election. (Socer. H. E. i. 24; Soc. H. E. ii. 19; Theod. H. E. ii. 27; Kaye, Council of Nicea, p. 60, note 4.)

[EUSEBIUS (29) p. 315, note.]

EUPHRONIUS (2), bishop of Colon in Armenia; afterwards metropolitan of Nicopolis (Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 428, 429). While he was at Colon, A.D. 375, Basil wrote to him apologizing for the rarity of his letters, caused by the distance and the difficulty of finding letter carriers, and asking his prayers (Basil, Epist. 195 [312]). The same year, on the death of Theodotus, the sensitive orthodox metropolitan of Nicopolis, Fronto was ordained as his successor by the party of Eustathius of Sebaste. The metropolitan of Nicopolis refused to communicate with their new bishop, and held their worship in the open air. Fronto's measures of repression only exasperated the schism. To heal the wound Poemenius, bishop of Satala, with the hearty approval of all the bishops of the province and the sanction of the civil authorities, promptly sent Euphranius to occupy the episcopal seat at Nicopolis. The people of Colon, being very indignant at the loss of their bishop, and threatening to bring the matter before the tribunals, Basil wrote to calm them (Ep. 227 [282]). He begs them to postpone their private feelings to the general good of the church. They could not be affected by the religious condition of Nicopolis, their metropolis. Euphranius had promised not to give up his superintendence of his old flock. He would have more labour, but they would have as much care. Basil wrote a similar letter to the magistrates of Colon (Ep. 228 [280]), assuring them that he would not be answerable because of the decision of the bishops. Not content with this, Basil at the same time wrote to the clergy of Nicopolis apologizing for the irritated feeling of the people of Colon at which they must not take umbrage (Ep. 229 [193]); and to the magistrates of the city, exhorting them to heartily recognize their new bishop, and do all they could to strengthen the feeling in his favour among the people of the rural districts. (Ep. 230 [194].)

EUPHRONIUS (3), Bishop of Anemurium in Lusuria. He signed the synodal letter of the Lusurian bishops to the emperor Leo, A.D. 436. (Mansi, vii. 565: Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 1017.)

EUPHRONIUS (4), Bishop of Hierapetra, in Crete, A.D. 458; signed in that year the synodal letter of the Cretan church addressed to the emperor Leo. (Or. Christ. ii. 267.)

EUPHRONIUS (5), St., ninth bishop of Autun, successor of Leonius. Before his elevation to the bishopric he had built the church of St. Symphorian, the martyr of Autun. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ii. 15; Migne, Patr. Lat. lixxi. 214.) The date of his consecration is not quite certain, but it was probably not long before A.D. 452. That year was rendered memorable by an eclipse of the moon, a comet, and some portentous signs in the sky, following close upon Easter. With reference to the last, Hilarus (Chronicon, Migne, Patr. Lat. lii. 853) relates that Euphranius, now a bishop, addressed a letter to Count Agrippinus, which has not, however, survived. The following year, in conjunction with St. Lupus of Troyes, he wrote an epistle, which is still extant, to Talius, bishop of Angers, in answer to questions put to them on the subject of church ritual, and the discipline of the inferior clergy in the matter of marriage. (Migne, Patr. Lat. livii. 66; cf. Ceillier, Histoire des Auteurs sacrés, x. 357.) The middle years of his episcopate are bare of recorded facts, but we know that he was on intimate terms with Sidonius Apollinaris. (See the two letters expressive of friendship and esteem, lib. vii. Ep. 8 and lib. ix. Ep. 2, Migne, Patr. Lat. livii. 574, 617.) About A.D. 470 he assisted at the consecration of John I. to the see of Chalons, of which a curious account is given by Sidonius. (Sidon. Apoll. Epist. iv. 25 in Patr. Lat. livii. 331.) In 474 or 475, he is said to have been present at the council of Arles and Lyons and to have condemned the Pelagian views of the priest Lucadius (Mansi, vii. 1007). The name also appears among the signatures to a comminatory letter of Faustus bishop of Riez to the same Lucadius, the doctrine in which is said to be semi-Pelagian. The authors of the Gallia Christiana (iv. 340) refuse to admit the identity of this heretic subscriber with the bishop, and they are supported by the fact that no see is appended to the signature. (Cf. Tillemont, xvi. 423.)

In the will of St. Perpetua of Tours (to be found in Migne, Patr. Lat. lvii. 754) there is a legacy of a silver reliquary and a missal to his "consacerdos" Euphranius. This may quite possibly have been the bishop, who had a certain connexion with Tours, since Gregory (ut supra) tells us that he sent marble for the top of St. Martin's tomb there. Upon his death, the date of which we are not informed, he was buried in the church of the vicarous. He was buried in his own church of St. Symphorian, and is commemorated on Aug. 3.

S. A. B.

EUPHRONIUS. [Euphranius.]

EUPHROSIUS, Bishop of Rhodes, the metropolitan of the Cyclades, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 924; Mansi, ii. 695.)

EPHROSYNA (1). Euphresia, a virgin, of Alexandria, daughter of Papthnius born in the beginning of the 5th century. She was betrothed by her parents, but in order to escape marriage, fled disguised as a monk to a neighbouring monastery, and describing herself as Smaragdus an eunuch who had escaped from the palace, was received as a monk by the abbot. She was eventually allowed a separate cell, and lived for thirty-eight years without her sex being discovered. Her father in his grief at her loss came to the abbot, who recommended him to take his sorrow to Smaragdus. The father and daughter had a long interview—he known to her, she unknown to him—in which she instructed him in religion, but allowed him to go without betraying herself. In later years, feeling death near, she sent for him, revealed herself, and died. Her father embraced monastic life in the same monastery, and died there. She is commemorated by the Roman church on Feb. 11, by the Greek on Sept. 25. (Basil. Menol.; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 537; Bailleit, Vie des Saints, Feb. 11.) [I. G. S.]
EUPHROSYNA

EUPHROSYNA (3)—Jan. 1. Martyr at Alexandria. (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi.)

EUPHROSYNA (3)—May 7. A female slave of Flavia Domitilla, with whom she suffered. [G. T. S.]

EUPITHIUS, bishop of Stratonicia (Hadrianopolis) in Caria, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 411; Mansi, vili. 156.) [L. D.]

EUPILIUS—Aug. 12. Deacon and martyr at Catana in Sicily in the Diocletian persecution. He was one of those who then voluntarily sought martyrdom. His acts, which are, however, very corrupt, tell us that one day he came to the tent of the praetor and proclaimed outside, "I am a Christian, and for the name of Christ I am willing to die." Upon this he was tortured and beheaded. In Basil's Menology he is noted on Aug. 11. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuard.; Kol. Frontonii; Sniuris, Ruinart; Baron. Annal. ann. 305, calviii.) [G. T. S.]

EULIUS (1), a member of the Ephesian church, sent by that church to meet Ignatius at Smyrna on his way to Rome. (Ignot. Ep. ad Eph. 3.) [G. S.]

EULIUS (2), son of Eusausius bishop of Agrientum. Eusausius died intestate, and Eupilius solicited from pope Gregory the Great that both his father's property and his mother's jointure may be made over to him. Gregory writes to Nazianzus bishop of Syracuse, enjoining compliance with this request. (Greg. Mag. Epp. iv. ind. xii. ep. 37; Patr. Lat. Ixxvii. 711.) [C. H.]

EUNIPUS, a magistrate addressed by Firmus bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, who pleaded for justice to be done to the bearer of his letter. (Firm. Caes. ep. 40 in Pat. Gr. lxvii. 1510.) [T. W. D.]

EUPORUS (1)—Dec. 23. Martyr in Crete during the Decian persecution, with Evarustus, Euniceus and seven others. The magistrate handed him to the populace, who tortured him for thirty days and then beheaded him. (Bas. Men.) [G. T. S.]

EUPORUS (2), bishop of Hypaepa in the province of Asia, on the road between Ephesus and Sardis, present at the council of Ephesus A.D. 431. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 695; Mansi, Concil. iv. 1216.) [L. D.]

EUPRAXIA—July 25. Daughter of a senator, Antigonus, and cousin of the emperor Theodosius, A.D. 390. Having been espoused to a senator, he died before they were married, whereupon she retired with her mother into a monastery at Thebes in Egypt, where she died. (Bas. Men.) [G. T. S.]

EUPRAXIAS (1), a slave of Gregory Nazianzen, brother of Theophilus, manumitted in his will, and bequeathed a legacy of five gold pieces. (Greg. Naz. Testam.) [E. V.]

EUPRAXIAS (2), a disciple and intimate friend of Eusebius of Samosata. While Eusebius was in exile in Thrace, A.D. 374, a letter was carried to him by Eupraxias congratulating him on his good confession, and written either by Basil or Gregory Nazianzen, Tillament inclining to think to the latter (Mem. Eccl. ix. 230). (Basil. Ep. 166 [251]; Greg. Naz. ep. 65 al. 30.) [E. V.]

EUPREPIA, A.D. 587, the sister of Euprepius bishop of Pavia. Among the 297 letters of Eunadius we have several addressed to Euprepias, and one which is probably from her (Eun. Epp. lib. iv. 4). She lived in the Gallic province of Narbonne or Arles, and seems at one time to have contemplated changing her abode. In one of the letters Eunadius sends her one of his poems, an epitaph on the wife of his friend and correspondent Faustus. He gives her advice and admonition, and frequently makes mention of her son Lupicinus. He alludes to her in other letters. [F. A.]

EUPREPIUS (1), first recorded bishop of Verona, imagined to have been one of the Seventy, and to have sat A.D. 60-72; commemorated Aug. 21. St. Cricinus follows him. Other bishops of Verona bearing this name in the list of Gams are not recognised by Ughelli. (Ug. Ital. Sac. v. 677; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iv. 400; Mart. Rom. Aug. 1.) [C. H.]

EUPREPIUS (2)—Oct. 17 and Sept. 27. Martyr under Lysias at Aegae in Cilicia with Anthimus and Leonitus, his brothers. They were three physicians, of the class known as ἀργυρούπον, practising without fees, after the example of Cosmas and Damianus, with whom they suffered. (Cosmas (1) and Damianus (3)) (Mart. Usuardi., Sept. 27; Bas. Men. Oct. 17; Menologia Gr. Oct. 17, ed. Constantiu. 1843, Oct. p. 123; Ferrarius, Catal. Gen. Sanct. 407.) It would seem to have been in his honour that the monastery to which Nestorius is said to have wished to retire after his deposition was erected. It was situated in the suburbs of Antioch. Nestorius had been a monk there. (Evagrius, H. E. i. 7; Marius Mercator. pt. ii. pass. Garzet. in Migne, Patrolog. xliii. 702.) [T. W. D.]

EUPREPIUS (3) (ECTOTRYPHE), bishop of Adrianopoli in Thrace, deposed by the Eastern council of Constantinople, A.D. 336, according to the Libellus Synodi of the council (Mansi, ii. 1170); but as Pagi (ann. 336. vi. in Baron.) points out, Anthanaisus names this bishop Euprius, mentioning him in terms of high praise, both for his orthodoxy and the fortitude with which he endured the trials of persecution and exile. (Athanas. Epist. de Fug. § 3, in Pat. Gr. xxix. 644; Id. Hist. Arian. ad Monach. § 5, vi. 699.) [T. W. D.]

EUPREPIUS (b), bishop of Bisra in Thrace; one of the sixty-eight bishops who demanded that the council of Ephesus should be postponed until the arrival of John of Antioch. He signed on this occasion also for Fritillus bishop of Hieraclea (Synod. adv. Tragord. cap. 7, in Theodoret. Opp. t. v. in Pat. Gr. i.xxxiv. 591). He nevertheless attended the council when it was opened, signed the sentence against Nectarius and the “decretum de Æde” (Mansi, iv. 1325 c, 1364 e). But Euprepius is chiefly of interest from the memorial termed “supplex libellus,” which he and Cyril bishop of Ctesae in the same province jointly addressed to the fathers of the council (Bod. 1478). In this document they stated that by an ancient custom in the European provinces a bishop sometimes had one or more bishops besides his own under his charge; that Euprepius was at that time administering the see of Arcadiopolis in addition to that of Bisra, while Cyril was acting similarly. The council was requested to rule that this custom might not continue, and that the titular bishop of Hieraclea might be forbidden to appoint bishops in those cities of Thrace which were then without bishops of their own. The prayer was granted, and it was decreed that the custom of the cities in question should be respected. (Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1139, 1194.) [E. V.]

EUPREPIUS (5), one of the monks under Eutyches at Constantinople who addressed the Latrocinium of Ephesus in 449 against their bishop Flavinus. (Mansi, vii. 892.) [T. W. D.]

EUPREPIUS (6), bishop of Cyzicus, the metropolis of the Bosphoritus province, succeeded Eusebius, who was killed by the orders of John bishop of Ilium signed the decrees of the fifth general council, a. d. 553, in behalf of Euprepius his metropolitan. (Le Quien, Orins Christ. i. 754; Mansi, ii. 389.) [L. D.]

EUPREPIUS (7), confessor in the reign of Constantia II. He and his brother Theodorus, sons of Plutinos who held a lucrative public post at Constantinople, were zealous maintainers of the Catholic opinions against the Monothelites, being disciples of Anastasius the presbyter and apocrisarius of the Roman church, and the warm supporter of St. Maximus. Anastasius was banished to Trasaeus, and the brothers refusing like him to accept the Typus [Constantinop. IV.] endeavored to effect their escape to Rome, but were seized at Abydus and sent into exile to Cherson, where Euprepius sank under his hardships on Oct. 26 in the fourteenth indiction (i.e. a. d. 671). They are mentioned in the Hypomnesticon de Gestis S. Maximini. (Anastas. Biblioth. Collectanea, in Patr. Lat. cxxiv. 684.) See also Boll. Acta SS. 15 Aug. iii. 114. [T. W. D.]

EUPROBUS (Ectropius), April 30. Bishop and martyr at Saintes, whither he had been sent to preach the gospel. He died in the 3rd century. Palladius, bishop of the same see, built a church in his honour in the 6th century, the consecration of which is described by Gregory of Tours. (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi; Greg. Tur. de Glor. Mart. cap. 56.) [U. T. S.]

EUPSYCHIUS (1), martyr, who suffered in the reign of Hadrian. He was discharged after his first arrest, when he gave away all his possessions to the poor, and to those who had harbored against him before the magistrates. He afterwards suffered excruciating tortures, his sides being torn with iron hooks before he was dispatched with the sword. (Boll. Acta SS. Sept. 7.) [H. R. K.]

EUPSYCHIUS (2) (Eutychius), saint and martyr, first bishop of Melitene, the metropolis of the second Armenia. In the Menaea he is commemorated on May 28th (A.A. SS. Bolland. Mai. vi. 734), and is said to have learned Christianity from the apostles, but his martyrdom is generally referred to the time of the emperor Gordian III., c. a. d. 238. Le Quien (Orins Christ. i. 439) identifies him with the martyr of Basil’s epitaph [Euprepius (6)]. [L. D.]

EUPSYCHIUS (3), martyr. [Nicomedia, Martyrs.] [T. W. D.]

EUPSYCHIUS (4), bishop of Tyana (Eusebia, Christopolis), metropolis of the second Cappadocia, one of the Nicene fathers, a. d. 325, and a speaker in the council; his name was recorded first on the diphytis of that church, as we learn from the speech of Euphratas at the fifth council. (Le Quien, Orins Christ. i. 395; Mansi, ii. 694.) He is no doubt the Cappadocian bishop mentioned with twenty-seven others as a type and standard of orthodoxy by Athanasius, a. d. 356, in his letter to the bishops of Egypt and Libya. (Athanas. Opp. pars 1, p. 220, § 8 in Patr. Græc. xxi. 557.) [L. D.]

EUPSYCHIUS (5), whose name appears in the Roman Calendar, and whose martyrdom is celebrated on April 9 (Boll. Acta SS. April 9, i. 822), suffered from the rashness which induced him in the reign of Julian to use force in the demolition of a temple to Fortune, which had remained undisturbed in the city of Caesarea in Cappadocia. “All the actors in this transaction were condemned, some to death and others to banishment” (Sozomen, H. E. v. 11). Caesarea was struck from the roll of cities and the order was issued that henceforth it should use its earlier name Maeonia. Among the objects of the emperor’s special indignation were Damos and Eupyschius. The latter was a notary who had recently married. He was made a special example of, and after cruel torment beheaded. Julian gave orders that the temple should be rebuilt, the order was never obeyed, on the contrary, a church was erected on the spot, dedicated to the memory of Eupyschius. To the festival of the dedication of this church Basil summoned the bishops of Pontus, by a letter which is still extant. (Bas. Opp. Paris ed. Ep. ccl.) Moreover, we find Basil eagerly entreating Eusebius of Samosata to be present at the festival of Eupyschius Sept. 7, in the year 372. (Bas. Ep. c.; Gregor. Naz. Opp. Epp. xxvi. 777; Cellier, vol. v. p. 252.) [H. R. K.]

EUPSYCHIUS (6), a person deputed by Tranquillus, a bishop, to convey tidings to Chrysostom at Cucusus concerning his health and other matters by Basil, who failed to fill the commission. (Chrys. Epist. 37.) [E. V.]
EUPSYCHIUS (7), circ. 423, addressed by Atticus, archbishop of Constantinople, in a letter arguing for the union of two natures in Jesus Christ, each keeping its own essence. A fragment of the letter is cited in the third part of the Acts of the council of Chalcedon, among testimonies of the fathers establishing the two natures. (Mansi, vii. 471; Cellier, viii. 15). [W. M. S.]

EUPSYCHIUS (8), bearer, about 449, of a letter from pope Leo the Great to Flavianus, bishop of Constantinople (Leo Mag. Epist. xxxix.; Patr. Lat. liv. 889; Cellier, x. 214). [W. M. S.]

EUREDUS (EUSENDUS), bishop of Lerida; signs the acts of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and sixteenth councils of Toledo, A.D. 683, 688, and 693. He is the last bishop of the Gothic period. (Esp. Sapr. xlv. 108; Aguirre-Catalana, iv. 287, 304, 313). [M. A. W.]

EURUSIUS, a bishop of a civil diocese of Asia denounced as a heretic by an edict of the emperor Arcadius, addressed to Aurelian the proconsul, Sept. 5, A.D. 395 (Cod. Theod. xvi. v. 26); the edict extols the definition of heresies, so as to include all who "vel levi argumento a judicio Catholicae religionis et tramite detecti fuerint deviæ" (Cod. Justin. I. v. 2, § 1); and it was under that definition that Euresius was charged with heresy, and forbidden to be regarded as "of the number of the most holy bishops." Baronius, quoting the edict, marks Euresius with an asterisk, to indicate that the name is suspicious (Ann. Eccles. s. a. 395). Gothofred identifies him with the Luciferian bishop Ephesius who is mentioned in the "libellus" presented by Faustinus and Marcellinus to the emperors Valentinianus II., Theodosius, and Arcadius, a.d. 386 (Pat. L. xiii. 90), as having been cruelly persecuted by Damascus bishop of Rome, A.D. 386-384; and Pagi accepts the identification (Crit. s. a. 395, v. vi.). It would appear that after his persecution in the West, Euresius fled to the East, and that after Theodosius issued the rescript addressed to Cynegius (ob. 388, Zosim. iv. 45) granting toleration to the Lucifarians (Pat. L. u. s. 107) he peacefully exercised the episcopate until Arcadius published this edict. [EPHESIUS; FAUSTINUS.]

[EURFYL (ERVUL), ST., a Welsh saint of the 7th century after whom Llanerfyll (Llanerfyl, Llanervul) in Montgomeryshire is named; commemorated on July 6 (K. Rees, Welsh Saints, 307).]

EURGAIN (ECOGAN, EBGMIN), the foundress of Llanerugain or Norhop, Flintshire, and wife of Eilde Mwynaev (the courteous), a Lanca- shire chieftain, is given in the Pedigree of the Saints as daughter of Maighed Gwynedd, son of Cadwallawn Llawhir, son of Elion Yrth, son of Cunedda Wledig, and Rees places her among the Welsh saints of the middle of the 6th century. (Myn. Arch. ii. 7, 25, 40; Prof. Rees, Welsh Saints, iii. 261, 535; Rev. W. J. Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 593, 597). [G. U.]

EURIC (1) (EVARIUS, EIVRICH, EUTHO- RIK, EYARIX), king of the Visigothic kingdom of Toulouse from 466 to 484, and from 477 onwards master of almost the whole of Spain. Under him the Visigoth power reached its highest point. In the reign of his successor it was curtailed by the Franks, while in that of his father, Theodoric or Theodored I. (d. 451), and his brothers, Thorismund and Theodoric II., the country occupied by the Goths had still been reckoned as an integral part of the empire ("auxiliares reipublicae"); says Astulf to the Goths before the battle of Chalons, "cajus membrum tenetis," (Jord. c. 35), while the Gothic state had found it necessary to submit again and again to the foedus with Rome. But under Euric it took a fresh departure. "Euric, therefore, king of the Visgoths," says Jord. c. 45, "seeing the frequent changes of the Roman princes" (and the weakness of the Roman king- dom, "Romani regni vacillationem," as he says in c. 46), "attempted to occupy the Gauls in its own right, suo jure." And again, "totas Hispanias Galliaeque sibi jam proprio jure tenes." Thus the presence of the foedus was finally set aside, and in the interval between the fall of the Western Empire and the rise of the Ostrogoths and Franks, Euric appears as the most powerful sovereign of the West (Dahm, v. 100).

The facts of his reign are briefly these. In 466, the year of his accession, Euric sent legates to the Eastern emperor Leo, perhaps with a last thought of renewing the foedus. The negotiations, however, came to nothing, and in 467 the Goths and Vandals made a defensive league against Leo, Anthemius and Rikimer, who were about to attack Genesic. Beside his Vandal auxiliaries in Gaul Euric also had the support of a certain party among the provincials themselves, as is shown by the evidence of the trial of Arvandil, prefect of the Gauls, for treasonable correspondence with the Goths (Sidon. Apoll. i. 7), and in 468 he attacked the new made Western emperor Anthemius simultaneously in Gaul and Spain. In Spain the Gothic army took Merida and Lisbon from the Suevi, while in Gaul, the Bretons under Riotimith, the faithful allies of Euric, were defeated at Denou, where the Visigoths were defeated, and Bourges was captured (470 ?). Between 472 and 474 the state of affairs at Rome prevented any help being sent to the Burgundians and Breton allies, and all over the country south of the Loire, the enfeebled Roman garrisons were no longer able to make any resistance to the Gothic attacks. By 474 the Gothic dominions in Gaul would have extended from the Atlantic to the Rhone and Mediterranean, and from the Pyrenees to the Loire, but for one obstacle—the vigorous defence of Auvergne by Eudicius, son of the emperor Avitus, and the famous bishop of Clermont, Sidonius Apollinaris (Sid. Apoll. vii. 1). The history of this dramatic struggle, preserved for us in the letters of Sidonius, is valuable light on the whole state of politics in the 5th century. It is the last desperate effort of the provincial nobility to avoid barbarian masters, and it is a fight, too, of Catholicism against Arianism. But it was an unsuccessful struggle. After besieging Clermont in 474, Euric withdrew into the western quarters of Gaul, between Sidonius and Eudicius, in the midst of a devastated country, organized fresh resistance. But with the spring diplomacy intervened. Glyceries, fearful for Italy, and hoping to purchase a renewal of the foedus, had in 473 formally ceded the country to Euric, a compact rejected by Eudicius.
and Sidonius, and now Nepos, for the same reasons, sent legates to Euric, amongst them the famous Ambassadors of Faventia (Gaulod. Vite S. Eppis. A.A. SS. Jan. ii. p. 392), to treat for peace. Euric persisted in the demand for Avarogna, and accordingly, in return for a renewal of the foodus ("fidelibus animis foederante", Sid. Apoll. iv. 5), Ecdicius and Sidonius were ordered to submit, and the district was given over to the revenge of the Goths. Ecdicius fled to the Burgundians, while Sidonius (see Ep. vii. 7, for his invectives against the peace—"Padest vos hujus foederis, nec utilis nec decori"!), after having in vain attempted to make favourable terms for the Catholics with Euric, was banished to Livia, near Nubronno (Sid. Apoll. viii. 9). By the influence, however, of Euric's minister, Leo, he was set at liberty after a year's imprisonment, and appeared at the Gothic court at Bordeaux, where, during a stay of two months, he succeeded in obtaining only one audience of the king, so great was the crowd of小事 and of business awaiting for the decision of Euric and his minister. In Ep. viii. 9, Sidonius has left us a brilliant picture of the Gothic kingdom, surrounded by barbarian envoys, Roman legates, and even Persian ambassadors. It is little to be wondered at, he says, that his own business was passed by—"Neg multum domino vacat vel tpsi. Dam responsum petit subscripta ordine."!

The Gothic territory in Gaul was now bounded by the Loire, the Rhone, and the two seas, while in Spain a great many towns—which, is not quite clear—were already held by Gothic garrisons. From these starting-points Euric's troops easily overran the whole country when the time for the next great forward step arrived. In 475 came the fall of Nepos and Augustulus, and the suspension of the empire of the West. The news startled all the barbarian races in Gaul and Spain into a movement. Euric, with an energetic and well-reasoned policy of Gothic reinforcement under Widimer, crossed the Pyrenees in 477, took Pamphelona and Saragossa, and anathematised the resistance of the Roman nobility in Tarraconensis. By 478 the whole peninsula had fallen to the Goths with the exception of a mountainous strip in the north-west, relinquished probably by treaty to the Suevi. Since 461 no Roman army had been available for the protection of Spain, while sometimes, as the allies of Rome and under the shelter of the foodus, sometimes as the enemies both of Rome and the Suevi, the Goths had gradually possessed themselves of numerous important points. Their conquest of the peninsula was now complete, and thus, says Dahn, "a place of refuge was provided for the Goths . . . . destined in the following generation to fall back before the young and all-seducing power of the Franks, called to a greater work than they" (Chron. der Germanen, v. 98). Fresh successes in Gaul followed close upon the Spanish campaign. Arles was taken, 480, Marseilles, 481, and ultimately the whole of Provence up to the Maritime Alps (Proc. b. G. i. 1, quoted by Dahn, l. c.). Resistance on the part of the provincials was impossible, and the exiled Nepos, indeed, seems to have formally surrendered almost the whole of southern Roman Gaul to Euric. Euric was now sovereign from the Loire to the Straits of Gibraltar, and appears also as the protector of the neighboring barbarian races against the approaching Franks (Cass. Vor. iii. 3), taking the same position towards them as Theodoric the Great took later in the reign of Euric's son Alaric, Theodoric's son-in-law. Euric survived the accession of Chlodwig three years, dying before September, 485.

Euric's Personal Character, and his Persecutions of the Catholics.—That Euric was a ruler of commanding gifts and personality cannot be doubted. Even his bitterest enemy, Sidonius, speaks of his courage and capacity in terms of unwilling admiration. "Pre-eminent in war, of fiery courage and vigorous youth," says Sidonius ("armas potens, acer anima, alscer anna," Ep. vii. 6), "he makes but one mistake—that of supposing that his successes are due to the correctness of his religion, when he owes them rather to a stroke of earthly good fortune." He was much interested in religious matters, and was a passionate Augustinian, not without apparent political motives, though his persecution of the Catholic bishops was dictated by sufficient political reasons. The letter of Sidonius quoted above throws great light upon Euric's relation to the Catholic church, and upon the state of the church under his government. "It must be confessed," he says, "that although this king of the Goths is terrible because of his power, I fear his attacks upon the Christian laws more than I dread his blows for the Roman walls. The mere name of Catholic, they say, curdles his countenance and heart like vinegar, so that you might almost doubt whether he was more the king of his people or of his sect. Lose no time," he adds, addressing his correspondent Basilius, bishop of Aix, "in ascertaining the hidden weakness of the Catholic state, that you may be able to apply prompt and public remedy. Bordeaux, Perigueux, Rodез, Limoges, Gébuls, Emusa, Béziers, Comminges, Auch, and many other towns, where death has reigned for a number of years, families of men, monasteries, and places of worship, have been given to the Goths. I urge you to send to Rome as speedily as possible the body of Alaric, express Christian and Roman in the hands of the church, and give no help to this new generation of wretched Christians in the hope of obtaining for the Catholics from the Gothic government, at least the right of ordaining bishops, that "so we may keep our hold upon the people of the Gauls, if not ex foedere, at least ex fide." Gregory of Tours in the following century echoed and exaggerated the account of Sidonius, and all succeeding Catholic writers have accused Euric of the same intolerant persecution of the church. It is, however, certain that the persecution must be looked upon as to a great extent political. The Catholic bishops and the provincial nobility were the natural leaders of the Romanized populations. The ecclesiastical organization made the bishops especially formidable. (See Dahn's remarks on the Vandal king Huneric's persecutions, Könige der Germanen, i. 250.) Their intrigues and their opposition threatened the work of Euric's life, and did, in fact, back the arms of the orthodox Franks, destroy it in the reign of his successor. But whether the persecution was more religious or more political, it has a special interest as one of the earliest instances of that oppression in the name of religion, of which the later history of the Goths and of the Spain they conquered, is everywhere full (Dahn, v. 101).

It is certain, however, that Euric by no means oppressed the Romans as such. His minister Leo was of an illustrious Roman family (Sid. Apoll. viii. 3), and so also was the count Victor whom he trusted the government of Auvergne after its surrender (Sid. Apoll. vii. 17; Greg. Tur. ii. 35). It was probably by Leo's help that Euric drew up the code of laws by which Isidore and others speak. "Sub hoc regi Gothi legum statuta in scriptis habere coepertum. Nam ante tantum moribus et consuetudine tenebatur." (Hist. Goth. apud Exp. Supr. vi. 486.)

[M. A. W.]

EUBRIELA, Breton saint of the 7th cent., daughter of king Hoel III. (otherwise called Judicael) and sister of St. Josse. Lobineau mentions a parish church dedicated to her in the diocese of Dol, not far from Dinan. She was commemorated on Oct. 1. (Lobineau, Saints de BreTAGUE, vol. ii. p. 117, ed. 1839; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. 1, 198.)

[CH.]

EUROLDUS (Curoldus, Conradus) is given as twenty-fourth bishop of Besançon, between Wandelbertus and Aurelius, about the middle of the eighth century. He is said to have died in the twelfth year of his episcopate (Gall. Christ. xv. 19).

[S. A. B.]

EUSEBIA, virgin martyr at Jacoa, a town in Spain by the river Aragon, under the Saracens in the 8th century; commemorated June 25. (Boll. Acta SS. June v. 88.)

[C. H.]

EURYLY (Euppyly.)

EURYN was one of the sons of Helig Poel, who was descended from Caradog Fraichfras, and chieftain of a district which was overflowed, and is now known as the Laman Sands in Beaumaris Bay, Carmarthen-ness. Like his father and brothers, he is included among the saints, but has no feast or church dedication (Rer. Vot. Saints, 103, 298, 301-2; Williams, Emun. Welch, 148).

[J. G.]

EUSANIUS (1), martyr under Maximian in the Samnite town of Purganum, and is commemorated July 9. (Bull. Acta SS. Jul. ii. 601.)

EUSANIUS (2), bishop of Agrigentum. His son Euplus in 354 is to receive a fair share of the goods which belonged to Eusanius before he became bishop; so directs Gregory the Great (lib. iv. Indict. xii. Ep. 37, Migne, lxvii. 711; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. p. 109.)

[A. H. D. A.]

EUSEBIA (1), empress, wife of Constantian. We learn from Julian that she was born at Thessalonica, and was the daughter of a consul. (Or. iii. §§ 107, 108.) She had two brothers, Eusebius and Hypatius, consuls. (Amm. xxi. 6. 4.) Her marriage with the emperor took place apparently in 352 or 353. (Tillemont, Exp. iv. 26.) Her affection for her is shown by the fact that he called a new province of the empire, comprising Bithynia, &c., after her name. (Amm. xlvii. 7. 6.) In 354 she was instrumental in saving the life of Julia, whose firm friend she continued to be, and whose image on her is still preserved, being numbered as his third oration. (Cf. exp. §§ 118, 121 and Ad Ath. § 273.) It was greatly owing to her influence that he received the title of Caesar in 355, and also the hand of Helena. (Zosim. iii. 1; Jul. Ad Ath. § 274 and Trübner ed..) In 366, during her husband's expedition across the Danube, she paid a visit to Rome, where she was received with great honour. (Jul. Or. iii. § 129.) In the following year apparently she persuaded Constantius to make Julia governor of the nations beyond the Alps. (Zosim. iii. 1.) Her death is only alluded to incidentally. (Amm. xxi. 6. 4.) She never had any children, and one serious charge is brought against her of Ammianus (xxi. 10. 18), namely, that through jealousy she several times induced Helena the wife of Julian to take drugs, which produced abortion. With the exception of this, all authorities speak of her with high praise. Julian of course lavishses upon her the most fulsome compliments, but besides that, Zosim (l. c.) speaks of her as highly educated and endowed with discernment extraordinary for her sex, and Ammianus (xxi. 6. 4) describes her as excelling in the accomplishment of her mind and in beauty of person.

It is possible that St. Chrysostom alludes to her (In Epist. ad Phil. Hon. xv.) where he speaks of an emperor whose death was the result of unlawful efforts to procure by drugs the fruitsness which God had seen fit to withhold from her. Of her attitude towards the church we have not much information. Theodoret (H. E. ii. 16. 28) states that Liberius in exile rejected her presents, as he did those of the emperor, from which he should gather that she belonged to the Ariam party, and this is probable on other grounds. Suidas (sub nom. Leontius) relates a story of Leontius bishop of Tripolis in Lydia failing to pay her the adulation which the other bishops displayed, and her anger on account of it. Leontius is called an Ariam by
EUSEBIA
Philostorgius. Baronius appears to go beyond the authorities when he speaks of her as the instigator of all her husband’s attacks upon the Catholic faith. (Baron. A. E. an. 356 cxxvi.)

EUSEBIA (2), pretended virgin of the Manicheans, mentioned by Augustine (De Haeres. cap. 40).

EUSEBIA (3), a deaconess of the Macedonian sect at Constantinople. She was an intimate friend of Caesarius, who built a church in that city in honor of St. Thyrus. [Caesarius (6).] Eusebia had a house and grounds in the suburbs of the city, where she had concealed relics of the forty martyrs who suffered at Sebaste. When on her death-bed, she charged the Macedonian monks of Constantinople to bury her remains where the relics were deposited, but to keep the fact of their concealment there a secret. They fulfilled both her requests, and built a subterranean oratory around the relics and her remains, and a dwelling house over them (Sozomen, u. s.). Caesarius and his wife agreed that whichever of them died first should bury the other by the side of Eusebia, and he therefore purchased the property for that purpose. His wife died first, and was buried there accordingly. It was on that property that Caesarius built his church, but not until after the buildings erected by the monks had fallen into ruins.

In the meanwhile the monks and left Constantinople, probably after the edict of A.D. 423 directed against the Macedonians (Cod. Theod. XVI. v. 59, 60 = 13), but without communicating the secret about the relics to any one. Not long after the erection of the church, however, they were discovered by means of Polychnorius, a presbyter of the city, who, when a youth, had witnessed the burial of Eusebia. He succeeded in tracing the only survivor of the monks, who was in possession of the secret, and through him it was revealed. The relics having thus been found, they were placed in a splendid reliquary, which had been prepared for them by the empress Pulcheria, and carried in a grand procession into the church of St. Thyrus (Sozomen, u. s.). Sozomen tells us that he was present on the occasion. Baronius relates the story under A.D. 538.

EUSEBIA (4), virgin at Mylassa, in the 5th century. (Boll. Acts SS. 24 Jan. ii. 600.)

EUSEBIA (5), mother of Theodore the Great. [Ereliева.]

EUSEBIA (6), “Patricia,” addressed by Gregory the Great in 603. (Lib. xiii. indict. vi. Epist. 32. Migne, lxvii. 1282.) From this letter it appears that her mind was either so engrossed in riches, or perhaps so occupied by the tumultuous disorders of the imperial city (regnum cristiani) that she could not be diverted to Gregory. He counsels her to turn her thoughts rather towards things spiritual; he prays that she may in this world pass a tranquil life with her most noble husband, and rejoice in the welfare of the lord Strategius, until at some distant day she reaches her eternal reward. Gussani, writing in his letters upon the current attacks upon Gregory, is not wrong in concluding that she is the Eusebia, daughter of Rusticiana Patricia, mentioned in a letter of Gregory in 598, where Strategius is also named, he being probably Eusebius’s son (Lib. viii. indict. i. ep. 22). Rusticiana had once resided at Rome, but had removed to Constantinople.

EUSEBIUS (7), abbesse, was the daughter of noble parents, Adalbrand and St. Rictrude, but was brought up by her grandmother, St. Gertrude, abbesse of Hamay or Hamaigne (Hamaichense), on whose death in 649 Eusebia was chosen as her successor. As, however, she was only twelve years old, her mother, who was abbesse of Marchiennes, on the Scarpe, between Flanders and Hainault, desired her to come and learn to obey before she tried to command others. Eusebia objected, but was obliged to obey an order which her mother obtained from Clovis II., and she came to Marchiennes (Marciana), accompanied by all her nuns. She bore ill her subjection to St. Gertrude, and would often cross secretly at night to Hamay, chant the offices there, and return next day to Marchiennes. Chastised and even seriously injured by her mother, she still remained firm, and she was at length allowed to take back her nuns to Hamay, of which convent she then became abbesse, at the age of thirteen. Here she showed extraordinary wisdom and power of command, and died at the age of twenty-three, about A.D. 660. She is commemorated on March 16. (Acta SS. Mar. ii. 452; Migne, Patrol. Lat. 149, 133; Baillet, Vies des Saints, Mar. 16.)

EUSEBIANL, followers of Eusebius of Nicomedia. [Eusebius (60).]

INDEX TO EUSEBIUS.

EUSEBIUS (1), succeeded Marcellus as bishop of Rome A.D. 309 or 310. He was banished to Sicily by Maxentius, where he died after a pontificate of four months (from April 18 to August 17). His body was brought back to Rome, and buried in the cemetery of Callistus on the Appian Way. The days of the month assigned above to his accession and death are those given in our oldest and most trustworthy authority, the Liberian catalogue (A.D. 354), which however in this case slightly contradicts itself in giving 4 months and 16 days as the duration of his episcopate. It contains no indication of the year, nor any facts. The Liberian Deposito Episcoporum gives Sept. 36 as the date of his burial, the interval between which day and that of his death being easily accounted for by his having died in Sicily and been buried at Rome. Later authorities vary much as to the date and duration of his reign, the Felician catalogue (A.D. 530) gives the latter as 7 years, Dorsenfeld, 3 days, the chronicle of Eusebius (induct. i. Galer., as 7 months. The Felician catalogue describes him as a Greek by birth and the son of a physician, and speaks of the Invention of the Cross during his episcopate, of the baptism of him by Judas Quirinus, and of his interment in the cemetery of Callistus. Judas Quirinus, otherwise Judas Cyricus, was said to have been the finder of the Cross of our Lord, whence its name (Plistia, de Vit. Pontif. art. Eusebii, p. 41). But the authentic accounts of the finding of the supposed true cross by Helena place the event much later than Eusebius, and hence the stories connecting him with it are given up both by the Bollandists and Baronius. Hardly anything indeed was known with any certainty about this bishop till the recent discoveries of De Rossi in the catacombs threw a new light on this page of papal history. It has been already stated that he was known to have been buried in the cemetery of Callistus on the Appian Way, the fact resting on the authority of the Liberian Depos. Episc., as well as on that of the Felician catalogue, whereas his two immediate predecessors, Cyprian and Marcellinus and Marcellus were spoken of as interred elsewhere, in the cemetery of Priscilla. But ancient itineraries, written by persons who had visited those tombs, while still open to view, described his resting-place as not being the papal crypt in the cemetery of Callis-tus, where all the popes (with the two exceptions mentioned) were buried, but a Pontifical crypt, but a separate one at some distance from it. Accordingly, De Rossi sought for this crypt, and found it, and therein discovered, in the years 1852 and 1856, fragments of the inscription placed by pope Damasus over the grave. This inscription was indeed previously known by means of copies taken and preserved before the closing of the catacombs. But it was uncertain whether it referred to Eusebius the pope or to some other Eusebius. Baronius, who quotes it, takes it as referring to the priest Eusebius who suffered in the time of the emperor Constantius in connection with the recall of pope Liberius. Tillemont, and the Bollandists, on the other hand, refer it to the pope. All doubt as to the correctness of the latter view has now been set at rest by the discovery, in the crypt referred to, not only of some forty-six fragments of a slab bearing a copy of the original inscription, but some also of the original slab, identified by some as the well-known peculiar characters of the Damascene inscriptions. The inscription is as follows:—

"Damasus Episcopus fecit. Eusebius vexit lupam peccata dolere Eusebii misero decuit sua criminis flere Scinditur in partes populus gliscentem furere Sedito caesio bellum discordia lies Exeuntia et erunt lumen Integra cum rector servaret secretis pactis Pertulit exilium domino sub Jacto laetus Littore Trinacri mundum vitamque reliquit. Euseblo Episcopo et martyri."

On each side of the verses a single file of letters records the name of the engraver of this as well as of all the other Damascene inscriptions, thus: "Benedictus Iuvenalicius Eusebii scribuit. Damascas pappae cultor atque amator." We thus have revealed to us a state of things at Rome of which no other record has been preserved. It would seem that, on the cessation of the Diocletian persecution, the church there was rent into two parties on the subject of the terms of readmission of the lapsed to communion; that one Her-aclius headed a party who were for readmission without the requirement of the penitential discipline insisted on by Eusebius; that the consequent tumults, accompanied by bloodshed, were such that "the tyrant" Maxentius interposed, and banished the leaders of both factions; and that Eusebius, having died during his exile in Sicily, thus obtained the name of martyr.

It appears further, from the similar Damascene inscription on Marcellus, that the contest had begun at the time of his accession, before the episcopate of Eusebius, and that in his time also the heathen civil power had interposed, banishing Marcellus who, as well as his successor, had required penance from the lapsi, and so caused tumults and sanguinary conflicts. [MARCELLUS] It is possible that the person referred to by the word "alterius" in the inscription on Marcellus in the lines,

"Crimen ob alterius Christum qui in pace negavit Finibus expul sul patrisse est feritas tyrannii," was the same Heraclius who opposed Eusebius. The way in which his name occurs in the inscription on Eusebius suggests the idea that he may have been elected as an antipope by his party. This view is taken by Lipius (Christenung der römischen Bischöfe). However that might be, the whole ground of dispute was essentially the same as what had led to the first election of an antipope, viz. Novatian, after the Decian persecution, some fifty years before; but with these differences; that on the earlier occasion the question was whether the lapsi were to be readmitted to communion at all or not, the schismatic being on the side of severity; as the later occasion the question was only about the conditions of their readmission, the disactients being on the side of laxity. In both instances the church of Rome, as represented by her lawful bishops, seems to have held a resident and judicious course, however adverse to the Christian community the scandals that accompanied the latter contest.

There are three spurious decretal epistles attributed to Eusebius: one to the bishop of Campania and Tuscia, referring to the Invention of the Cross, and ordering the celebration of a festival in his honour, containing a special lecture on the authority of St. Peter, and directions as to the reconciliation of properly baptized heretics by the imposition of hands of bishops. Two others, addressed to the bishops of Gaul and of Egypt, relate mainly to accusations brought against bishops and clergy, the object being to afford them protection and immunity. There are also several decreets attributed to him, allowing betrothed girls to enter monasteries, ordering the Eucharist to be consecrated on white linen only, enjoining the observance of fasts, and regulating the banquets of bishops. None of these documents have any claim to authenticity. There is however a decreet of his which Benedict XIV. published, while allowing the probable spuriousness of the rest, refers to a apostate by Ivo of Chartres, and as genuine, the subject being Extreme Unction (Benedict XIV. de Servorum Det Beatiificatione, i. 32. 31). Matteo also (de Antiquis Ecclesiae Ritibus, c. 7, art. 2) refers to this decree as preserved by Ivo, adducing it as a proof, among many other, that Extreme Unction was anciently administered before the Viaticum, and hence while the patient was unconscious of his inability and not, as in later times, when recovery was expected of: "Jubet enim Eusebius illo decreto ut Secedens circa negrotantem ponsimnetem orattiones dicat, et ungu eum oleo sancto, et Eucharistiam ei doneit."

Baranius, on the authority of the spurious Acta Eusebius, written by Vercellis, states that the pope Eusebius baptized this prelate, and gave him his own name. Tilmont gives no credence to this story, which rests on no good authority.
Eusebius is honored as a saint and confessor on the 28th September in the Roman Calendar.

[J. B.]

EUSEBIUS.—Bishops without See or Country
mentioned or apparent.

EUSEBIUS (2), subscribed the council of Sardica A.D. 347 (Athan. i. 133, Patr. Græc.
xiv. 337).

EUSEBIUS (3), a bishop, deposed by the Senatorial party at the council of Seleucia A.D.
353, together with Acacius (Athan. de Synod.
p. 380, § 12; Soz. H. E. ii. 40).

EUSEBIUS (4), a bishop, brother of Chromatius bishop of Aquileia (q. v.), and closely allied with him (“non plus natura quam morum aequalitate genus”), Jerome, Ep. 8, ad
Nicom., he was present at the baptism of Rufinus, who speaks of him as being, though only a deacon, yet a father to him, and his teacher in the creed and the Christian faith (Kaf. Apol. i. 4). He was one of the earliest friends of St. Jerome, and drew from him some of his letters from the Syrian Desert (Ep. 7, 8, ed. Vall.). He was afterwards a bishop, as known from Rufinus (loc. cit.), but his see is uncertain. The editor of the works of Chromatius (Migne, Patro. xx. 257) identifies him with the bishop of Bologna, whose name occurs as being present at the council held at Aquileia A.D. 381. But this is conjectural. He died A.D. 403, as appears from Jerome’s letter to Heliodorus (Ep. 60, § 19, ed. Vall.).

EUSEBIUS (5), of Alexandria, a writer of sermons, about whom Galland hesitates not to say that “all is uncertain; nothing can be affirmed on good grounds as to his age or as to his bishopric” (Bibl. Patr. viii. p. xxiii.). It is needless to dwell on the attempts to identify him with Eusebius, the Alexandrian deacon, who became bishop of Laodicea in the 3rd century, with Eusebius of Caesarea, with Eusebius of Emesa. The ascetic writer, Nico the younger, of the 11th century, cited some answers of "Macarius, the Alexandrian, to the great Eusebius of Alexandria" (Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. vol.
vi. p. 285; i.e. vol. xi. p. 277, ed. 1801). This Macarius died in 404. "But Nico lived too late to be of any authority" (Pusey, Doct. of Real Presence, p. 449). One of Eusebius’ sermons, which on Almsgiving, was preached, at earliest, some time after the death of "holy Melania," which happened after the taking of Rome by Alaric. On the other hand, he is cited not only by John of Damascus in his Parallels (Dunsc. Op. ii. 316, 331, 391, 393, 422, 425;
CHRIST. BIOL.—VOL. II.

470, 472, 561, 576, 597, 598, 637, 642, 649, 671, 675, 697, 701), but by the author of the Parallels in the Sermone Mundi, who lived a century earlier, in the first year of Heracleius (Le Quien, ò. ii. 279, 749, the quotations are in ò. 777, 783). He cannot therefore be referred (as Le Quien suggested, Or. Christ. ii.
935) to the times of the first Saracen caliphs.
The difficulty is rather increased than abated by A Life of Eusebius, printed by Carol. Mai in his Spicilegium Romanum, i. 703 ff., which gives this account of him: Eusebius was a devout monk, revered for his sanctity, who lived in the mountain country of Egypt while Cyril was patriarch of Alexandria. Cyril paid him a visit, and, when dying, recommended him as his successor. The clergy agreed; a deputation is sent to Eusebius; he deprecates the proposed elevation; his visitors leave him; he resolves to fly by night into the Thebaid; on the way a voice warns him to return: he obeys, and when again invited to Alexandria, proceeds thither, is consecrated by Cyril, who dies that night. Eusebius is enrowned and preacheth every Sunday with great effect: he converts an obstinate sinner of high birth and great wealth, called Alexander; after a seven years’ episcopate, foreseeing his end, he tells Alexander of a visit paid by him in early life to the Cross and the Holy Resurrection at Jerusalem, and of a vision which had assured him of Christ’s benignity even to the negligent among His servants. Wishing to die in his old retreat, he is escorted thither with tarders by the Alexandrian people, after consecrating Alexander as his successor, and on his arrival, he commends his “most sweet children” to the Holy Trinity and to their new pastor, and died “with a smile upon his face.”
The biographer, John the Notary, adds that he had received a book of ascetic maxims, drawn up by Eusebius, from the author’s own hand, had after his death given it into the keeping of Alexander, and when Alexander himself died (20 years after Eusebius) had it translated by the calligrapher Mosseus. This account cannot be received, for it is well known that Diocourus succeeded Cyril in the see of Alexandria, and no place in the list of his occupants can be found for Eusebius. Nor can Eusebius’ bishopric be placed at a Syrian Alexandria.
Mai abandons the problem as hopeless; and it would seem that if Eusebius was a bishop, and a bishop in Egypt, he was either a “vacant” bishop (χωλόδωρος) or consecrated konoriz cae ta, without a see, like the “John, bishop and monk,” in the Life of St. Sozomen, c. 31, or the Lazarus
(we cannot say Bardus and Eulogius [Eulogii (43), cf. Theod. ir. 16, 18) mentioned by Sozomen, vi. 34, not to speak of other instances in the early Irish church. (See Fabricius, Bibl.
Gr. vol. v. p. 275, i.e. vol. viii. p. 295, ed. 1801.)
As to his age, we must content with uncertainty as to whether he belongs to the 5th or 275) says that 18 Homilies of Eusebius were found and cited by Turrinus, and some were known to Holstenius and Allatius. A complete list of these sermons is given by Mai, as follows:
1. On Fasting (in Mai’s Spicilegium Romanum, On Thaumaturgy in Sickness (ib. ix. 622). 5. On Importing Grace to him that lacks it (ib. ix. 659). 6. On Sudden Death, or, those that die by warres (ib. ix. 664). 7. On New Moon, Sabbath, and on not observing the voices of Birds (ib. ix. 666). 8. On Commemoration of Saints (ib. ix. 669). 9. On Meals, at such festivals (ib. ix. 673). 10. On the Nativity (ib. ix. 679). 11. On the Baptism of Christ (ib. x. 793) "What shall we do then? How should we come?" (ib. x. 895). 12. On the Coming of John into Hades, and on the Devil (ib. x. 888). 13. On the Treason of Judas (ib. ix. 693). 14. On the Devil and Hades (ib. x. 866). 15. On the Lord's Day (Galland viii. 292). 17. On the Passion, for the Preparation Day (among "Spuriae in Chrysostom, et Maunardus, ib. xii. 793"). 18. On the Resurrection (ib. x. 778). 19. On the Ascension (ib. xiii. 247). 20. On the Second Advent (Mai. Class. Auct. x. 955). 21. On "Astronomers" (Mai. Patr. Nov. Bbl. i. 522). 22. On Almsgiving, and on the Rich Man and Lazarus (ib. ii. 507). Eusebius adheres simply to the Catholic doctrines of the Trinity and the Incarnation. He uses the ordinary Eastern phrase, "Christ our God!" (S. On Almsgiving), speaks of Him as Maker of the world (ib.), as Master of the creation (On Resurrection), as present from the beginning with the prophets (Ascension), and as the Lord whom Isaiah saw in his vision (On the Baptism). He calls the Holy Spirit "our Advocate who came upon the Son," in the sermon on Almsgiving he calls the Virgin Mother "Ever-virgin" and "Theotocos," and "our undefiled Lady." He insists on free will and responsibility. "God made man capable of free choice.... He saith, 'If you do not choose to hear Me, I do not compel you.' God could not make the good against the will, but what is involuntary is unresolved.... If He wrote it down that I was to commit sin, and I do commit it, why does He judge me?" If a man means to please God, "God holds a hand to him straightforward," &c. "Time is short, eternity is long," is the point which he urges in the sermon on Almsgiving, "Provide for your salvation before the fair (μανπος) is broken up, while yet there are those who buy and sell oil." "If a man keep death ever in mind, he will sin no more." He enforces almsgiving. "Some say, there is time enough: I am like my grandfather, I shall live, long as he did; or I shall have a long illness.... Vain excuse! Remember the man who pulled down his house, &c. Do not say, I must first provide for my children. Death comes like a thief, and shuts you up in a little abode (οἰκεῖον μικρύν) of three cubits." Eusebius is repeatedly severe on Pharisaic formalism. A virginal life, self-control, sleeping on hard beds or on the ground, much fasting, arising early, and wearing a sackcloth in public, let their hair grow long, walk ostentatiously (παραμυθεία) to wish to be thought saints, and to be reverenced (προερχε- ρείσθαι) by all; but God knows their thoughts, their secret aim," &c. Before a man renounces the world (by a monastic vow) let him try himself, know his own soul. He whofasts must fast with "tongue, eyes, hands, feet;" his whole "body, soul, and spirit" must be restrained from all sinful indulgence. "Fast, as the Lord said, in cheerfulness, with sincere love to all men. But when you have done all this, do not think you are better than A or B. Say you are unpro-

Eusebius discourages a fana-stable servants." Eusebius discourages a fanatical rigorism; in Lent, he who is in weak health may take wine and oil. Lent must not be broken for a friend's sake, but the stationfasts on Wednesday and Friday may be so: he who eats not must not blame him who eats (here he even quotes Rom. xiv. 6). People are not to blame who do not eat to excess: nor riches, but the man who administers them ill. Abraham had riches, but they harmed him not, &c. Some sentences shew a true spiritual insight: "What sort of righteousness exceeds the rest? Love, for without it good comes of any other. What sin is worst? All sin is dreadful, but none is worse than cov-

Eusebius is very full on Sunday duties (Serm. On Lord's Day). Work is to be laid aside: it is no charity to assist a poor man working on the day that belongs to God. Sirens are to do no work. Never go forward to Sunday, not simply as a day of rest from labour, but as a day of prayer and Com-

Eusebius is very full on Sunday duties (Serm. On Lord's Day). Work is to be laid aside: it is no charity to assist a poor man working on the day that belongs to God. Sirens are to do no work. Never go forward to Sunday, not simply as a day of rest from labour, but as a day of prayer and Com-

Hosted by Google
EUSEBIUS, bishop of Abida in Phoenicia Secunda. He signed the synodal epistle of the province, addressed to the emperor Leo, referring to the murder of Proterius at Alexandria. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 849; Mansi, vii. 595.)

[The text then continues with various sections on Eusebius, including his role as bishop of Alexandria and his historical contributions.

EUSEBIUS (7), bishop of Alexandria (Scandaret or lakenderum) in Cilicia. The period in which he flourished is very doubtful; he is placed by Gams (Series Episcop. p. 436) in the 7th century. There seems no ground for including him among the possible authors of the famous Homilies, except that the other clients are open to almost equally strong objections [Eusebius (5)].

(See the Homilies with prefaces by Mai and Galland, and the life of Eusebius by Joannes Monachus, in the Patrol. Or. Ixxvi. i. 287, et seq. Also Gradnand, Vir. Illust. c. 35; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 905; Thilo, Uber die Schriften des E. vom A. p. 54 ff.; and the articles in Herzog’s and Ehrlich’s Encyclopaedias by Semisch and Dähne respectively.)

[The text then continues with various sections on Eusebius, including his role as bishop of Alexandria and his historical contributions.

EUSEBIUS (8), bishop of Ancyra, c. A.D. 445, consecrated by Proclus, archbishop of Constantinople (Cellier, viii. 409). He was present at the council of Chaledon, A.D. 451 (Mansi, vi. 555 c.)

[The text then continues with various sections on Eusebius, including his role as bishop of Alexandria and his historical contributions.

EUSEBIUS (9), fifth bishop of Antioch, succeeding Etherius, and followed by Optatus. He subscribed the fifth council of Orleans (A.D. 549) by the hand of a deacon called September. The fifth council of Arles (A.D. 554) is also subscribed by a Eusebius, probably the same bishop, though the name of his see is omitted. (Mansi, ix. 137, 703.) The Bollandists (Acta SS. Jan. ii. 390) give from old MSS. an account of the three Spanish martyrs, Vincentius, Orosius, and Victor, which is conjectured to have been written by this Eusebius. See Etherius, bishop of Antioch. (Gall. Christ. ii. 1148.)

[The text then continues with various sections on Eusebius, including his role as bishop of Alexandria and his historical contributions.

EUSEBIUS (10), II, the tenth bishop of Antioch in the Series of Gams (p. 554), succeeding Optatus, and followed by Juvencus (A.D. 614). He does not appear in the list of the Galia Christiana (iii. 1146).

[The text then continues with various sections on Eusebius, including his role as bishop of Alexandria and his historical contributions.

EUSEBIUS (11), bishop of Antioch by the Macedon in the province of Caria, one of the Niceran fathers, A.D. 325. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 907; Mansi, ii. 695.)

[The text then continues with various sections on Eusebius, including his role as bishop of Alexandria and his historical contributions.

EUSEBIUS (12), last of the three known bishops of Apollonia, in New Epirus near the Axios, between Dyrirachium and Auleon. He was present at the council of Chaledon in 451. (Mansi, vi. 578 c, 947 a, vii. 161 a; Farlati, Njlr. Sacr. vii. 385, 396; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 248.)

[The text then continues with various sections on Eusebius, including his role as bishop of Alexandria and his historical contributions.

EUSEBIUS (13), ninth bishop of Apt, succeeding Praetextatus and followed by Clementius, was in occupation of the see in A.D. 546. An ancient abbey in the diocese which bears his name is said to be called after him. (Gall. Christ. i. 352; Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. 1645 n. vii., tom. i. 703.)

[The text then continues with various sections on Eusebius, including his role as bishop of Alexandria and his historical contributions.

EUSEBIUS (14), bishop of Arles, in Syria Secunda, north of Emess. He signed the synodal epistle of the province to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 501; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 916.)

[The text then continues with various sections on Eusebius, including his role as bishop of Alexandria and his historical contributions.

EUSEBIUS.-Bishops arranged in Alphabetical Order of their Sees or Countries.

EUSEBIUS (6), bishop of Abida in Phoenicia Secunda. He signed the synodal epistle of the province, addressed to the emperor Leo, referring to the murder of Proterius at Alexandria. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 849; Mansi, vii. 559.)
EUSEBIUS (15). One of the leading bishops of Armenia, to whom Theodoret wrote a letter of encouragement during the Persian persecution, c. A.D. 420, described by him (H. E. v. 38). The chief bishop of the district having vacated his post, either by death, or apostasy, or some other unexplained cause, Theodoret exhorts Eusebius, as next in authority, to occupy the place boldly, and to fulfill his duties without apprehension of what it might cost him. He sets forth in very powerful language the duties of pastors as declared in Holy Scripture; but exhorts him not to deal too severely with the lapsed, but to imitate the loving forbearance of God in leading back to repentance and amendment. (Theod. Epist. 76.)

[EUSLALYUS (19)].

EUSEBIUS (16) L, eighth in the list of bishops of Arretium or Arezzo, standing between Maximus and Gaudentius, succeeding to the see A.D. 380. (Ugheb. Ital. Sacr. i. 409; Gams, Ser. Episc. 741.)

EUSEBIUS (17) II, twelfth in the list of bishops of Arretium or Arezzo, between Laurentius and Gallus; succeeded A.D. 444. (Ugheb. Ital. Sacr. i. 410; Gams, Ser. Episc. 741.)

EUSEBIUS (18), bishop of Aspasia, subscribed the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. (Clemens Gener. ed. Rom. 1628, l. p. 343.)

EUSEBIUS (19), bishop of Basi (Bazas), signs the acts of the fourth Council of Toledo, A.D. 633, taking precedence of forty-five other bishops. He may therefore be supposed to have been old at the time. He signs also the fifth (an. 636), and the ninth (an. 638). He died before Oct. 646. (Exp. Sacr. vii. 87; Agnirre-Catalani, iii. 385.)

[ETTUCHIANUS].

EUSEBIUS (20), bishop of Berytus, vid. of Nicomedia. [EUSEBIUS (80)].

EUSEBIUS (21), ST., fifth bishop of Bezacon, succeeding St. Paulinus and followed by St. Hilarius. The authors of the Gallia Christiana (xv. 5) quote an anonymous canon of the monastery of St. Paul to the effect that he was a subdeacon at the church of Rome, whom pope Melchiades (A.D. 311-314) ordained priest and consecrated to the see of Chrysoopolis (i.e. Besançon, Sid. p. 2). He is said to have sat two years and a half only, and was then buried in the church of St. Peter, which he had himself dedicated in the suburbs (cir. A.D. 312). [S. A. B.]

EUSEBIUS (22), bishop of Bologna, who took part in the Council of Agilulfia, over which Ambrose presided, and joined in the condemnation of Palladius and Secundianus for Ariantism. (Ambrose, Opp. iii. pp. 820-843.)

J. LL. D.]

EUSEBIUS (23) OF CAESAREA, also known as EUSEBIUS PAMPILL\. 1. Literature. A Life of Eusebius was written by Aecius (Aecius ii. 1) his pupil and successor in the bishopric of Caesarea (Socr. H. E. ii. 4). This work, from the pen of a personal friend and disciple who inherited his books and papers (Socr. H. E. iii. 2, iv. 23), would have been invaluable; but unfortunately it has perished with leaving a trace behind. Of extant sources, the most important are the scattered notices in writers of the same or immediately succeeding ages, such as Athanasius, Jerome, Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret. At a later date some valuable information is contained in the proceedings of the Second Council of Nicaea (Labbe, Conc. Nicaen. i. p. 1144 sq.), as well as in the Antirhetica of the patriarch Niconphorus (Spal. Solem. i. p. 371 sq.), likewise connected with the Iconoclastic controversy. The primary sources of information however for the career of one who was before all things a literary man must be sought in his own works. The only edition of the works of Eusebius, at completeness is in Migne's Patr. Grec. vols. xix-xiv. Yet even this does not contain the works extant only in Syriac versions, especially the Theophania (Eng. transl. ed. Lee, Cambridge, 1843) and the later edition of the Martyrs of Palestine (ed. Cureton, London, 1861); and even some Greek fragments are occasionally omitted (e.g. the letters to Alexander and Ephraim). But it includes the large accessions to the works of Eusebius which were first discovered and published by Mai, and is indispensable for convenience of reference. Lists of the works of Eusebius are given by Jerome (Vir. Ill. 81), by Nicephorus Callistus (E. vi. 37), by Theodoret (Assemb. Bibliol. Orient. iii. p. 18 sq.), by Suidas (s. v. Eusebius) copies the Greek version of Jerome. Notices of individual works of Eusebius, of which some have perished, appear in Photius, Bibliothec. 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 27, 39, 127.

Among modern sources of information are the standard works of Cave (Hist. Lit. i. p. 175 sq.), Tillemont (Hist. Ecr. ii. pp. 39 sq.), and Hildesheim (Hist. Ecr. vii. pp. 335 sq. ed. Hilds.), and other works. The Life of Eusebius by Index (Byz. Rec. Script. p. 1 sq.), by Valois (de l'Historique Eusebii Diction. prefixed to his edition of the Ecclesiastical History), and most recently by Heinrich in his Eusebiu Script. Hist. i. p. 142 sq. 1888, with notes of his own, and by Stroth (Praef. in loc. with Giessen Eusebii Hr. Gesch. i. p. 15 sqq., Quedinburg, 1979), should be especially mentioned; as to these should be added the Life by Bright, prefixed by way of introduction to the Oriell reprint (1872) of Burton's text of the Euseb. Hist. Valois has appended a very useful collection of testimonia or passages referring to Eusebius in ancient writers. The most complete monograph on the whole subject is Stein's Euseb. Bischof von Caesarea, Würzburg, 1835. Important contributions will also be found in the special monographs on the Ecclesiastical History, of which a list is given in its proper place.

A list of the editions, translations, and works relating to Eusebius, will be found in Hoffmann, Bibliogr. Lessic. s. v. It is very largely up to the time (A.D. 1859) when the volume appeared, but very much has been done since. The principal editions of the several works will be mentioned below under their respective heads.

II. Birth, Parentage, Education, and Early Life. Of the date of his birth we have no precise information, but the references in his own works enable us to fix it approximately. That he mentions Dionysius of Alexandria (H. E. iii. 26), but has occupied the throne in his own time (καθ' ἑαυτάς); and Dionysius was bishop of Alexandria from A.D. 247 or 248 to A.D. 265. So also he speaks of Paul of Samosata (H. E. v. 28) as a contemporary (καθ' ἑαυτάς); and Paul was deposed from his episcopate A.D. 276. In the same way, having occasion to mention the great heresarch of the age (Theoph. iv. 30), he calls him "the bishop of yesterday and of our own times"; while he himself elsewhere (H. E. vii. 31) places Manes during the Roman episcopate of Felix (A.D. 270-274). And, speaking more generally, he draws the line between his own and a previous generation after his account of Dionysius of Alexandria, and before his mention of the accession of Dionysius of Rome (A.D. 259) and the troubles about Paul of Samosata which followed thereupon, declaring at this point that he intends now to relate the history of his own generation for the information of posterity (H. E. vii. 26 τὸν καθ' ἑαυτάς τοῦ πατέραν γεωρκέα, ἐμίσοις λεγόμενον, καθ' ἑαυτάς). The parallels with the previous Augustus the future successor of the faith, then on his progress through Palestine, a tall and handsome prince of right royal mien, who was destined hereafter to exert an unrivalled influence on the future of the Christian Church, and with whom the interests of his own later life were closely bound up (Vit. Const. i. 12). Here he listened to the Biblical expositions of the learned Dorotheus, thoroughly versed in the Hebrew Scriptures and not unacquainted with Greek literature and philosophy, once the superintendent of the emperor's purple factory at Tyre, but now a presbyter in the church of Caesarea (H. E. vii. 32). Here, in due time, he was himself ordained a presbyter, probably by that bishop Acapius whose wise forethought and uniring meekness and open-handed benevolence he himself has recorded (H. E. ii. 44). Here, above all, he contracted with the saintly student Pamphilus that friendship which was the crown and glory of his life, and which mortuary itself could not sever.
EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA

Pamphilus, a native of Phoenicia, had studied in Alexandria, but was now settled in Caesarea, of which church he was a presbyter. He had gathered about him a collection of books which seem to have been unrivaled in Christian circles, and which, supplemented by the excellent library of bishop Alexander at Jerusalem (H. E. vi. 20), enabled Eusebius to indulge to the full his por- tentous appetite for learning. Eusebius himself left a catalogue of the books contained in the library of Pamphilus (H. E. vi. 32). Acacius and Eusebios, the successors of Eusebius in the see of Caesarea, repaired the collection and supplied the ravages of time and wear (Hier. Epist. 34, Op. i. 155). Jerome describes Pamphilus as gathering books together from all parts of the world, thus rivaling in the domain of sacred learning the zeal which Demetrius Phalerus or Paulinus had shown for profane knowledge (I. c.). Origen himself had set the example of a literary society. Aided by the munificence of his friend Ambrosius, he had kept him always a large number of shorthand writers, to whom he dictated, and of calligraphers—women as well as men—who copied out the Scriptures for him (H. E. vi. 29). His example was not thrown away on Pamphilus.
Pamphilus was a devoted admirer of Origen. He possessed the original copy of the Hexapla of Origen, which was afterwards used by Jerome at Caesarea (Hier. Comm. in Tit. iii, Op. vii. 734). He sought out the works of this father before all others (Hier. Op. i. 155; Euseb. H. E. vii. 92b). He even transcribed the greater part of them with his own hand for his library (Hier. Vitr. iii. 75). One long work of Origen in the handwriting of Pamphilus came into the possession of Jerome himself; owning it, he says, he considers that he owns the wealth of Croesus; it is signed, as it were, with the very blood of the martyr (i. c.). Like Origen too, Pamphilus paid great attention to the reproduction of accurate copies of the Scriptures. More than one extant MS has been taken from or collated with some copy which he had transcribed or corrected with his own hand (see Scrivener’s Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament, pp. 51, 59, 158, 223, 228). In this work he was followed by Eusebius (Euseb. H. E. viii. 81). Hence the Palestinian manuscripts of the LXX, which Jerome describes as published by Eusebius and Pamphilus from the text of Origen (c. Rufin. ii. 27, Op. ii. p. 522). A colophon found in an extant Vatican MS, and given in facsimile in Migne’s Euseb. Op. iv. 875 (after Marc. ed. Cureton, vol. ii. 27), gives a lively picture of the common labours of the two friends at this time: “It was transcribed from the editions of the Hexapla, and was corrected from the Tetrapla of Origen himself, which also had been corrected and furnished with scholia in his own handwriting; whence I, Eusebius, added the corrections made by Eusebius and corrected [this copy].” The readings of the “Eusebian” copy (τὸ Εὐσεβίου, τὸ βιβλίον Εὐσεβίου τοῦ Παμφιλίου) are frequently mentioned in the scholia to the Old Testament (Field’s Hexapla, i. p. 229).

Nor was it only in copying and editing that the society gathered about Pamphilus occupied itself; it must have necessarily engaged attention in a city which stood on the border land between the Greek and Syrian languages; and we are especially told of one of his associates, the martyr Procopius, that he translated from Greek into Aramaic (Euseb. Mart. Pal. p. 4, ed. Cureton).

Amidst these and kindred pursuits their friendship ripened. But Eusebius owed far more to Pamphilus than the impulse and direction given to his studies. Pamphilus was no mere student recluse. He was a man of large heart and bountiful hand; he was above all things helpful to his friends (Mart. Pal. 11); he gave freely to all who were in want; he multiplied copies of Scriptures which he distributed gratuitously (Euseb. in Hieron. c. Rufin. i. 9, Op. ii. 465). And to the sympathy of the friend he united the courage of the hero. He had also the power of impressing his own strong convictions on others. Hence, when the great trial of faith came, his house was found to be not only the haven of all who sought its shade, but of all who were martyrs. To one like Eusebius, who owed his strength and his weakness alike to a ready susceptibility of impression from those about him, such a friendship was an inestimable blessing. How else could he express the strength of his devotion to this friend, who was more than a friend, than by adopting his name? He would henceforward be known as “Eusebius of Pamphilus.” “In the midst of all” this glorious company of martyr, writes Eusebius, “shone forth the excellency of my lord Pamphilus; for it is not meet that I should mention the name of that holy and blessed Pamphilus under the title of a slave of my lord” (Mart. Pal. p. 37, ed. Cureton). It was either a blundering literalism or an ignoble sarcasm, which led Photius (Epist. 73, Bailea) to suggest the explanation that he was the slave of Pamphilus. Any man might have been proud to wear the slave’s badge of such a devotion. III. The Persecution. Eusebius was now in middle life when the last and fiercest persecution broke out. For nearly half a century—a longer period than at any other time since its foundation—the Church had enjoyed uninterrupted peace, so far as regards attacks from without. Suddenly and unexpectedly all was changed. The city of Caesarea became a chief centre of persecution. Eusebius tells how he saw with his own eyes the houses of prayer razed to the ground, the holy Scriptures committed to the flames in the midst of the market-places, the pastors of the churches hiding themselves as they were hunted here and there, and shamefully jeered at when they were caught by their persecutors (H. E. vii. 21). For seven years the attacks continued. They were fateful and intermittent. But the suspense and uncertainty must have increased the horror. No governor stayed his hands; no year was without its sufferers. Almost at any moment a devout and zealous Christian might be required to do that which his faith forbade him to do even at the cost of his life. Of some of the terrible scenes which ensued, Eusebius was himself an eye-witness; of all he had the full and exact knowledge which is derived from immediate local and personal contact with the incidents. His written account shows how deeply he was impressed with the constancy and the triumphs of the sufferers; of Procopius, from Seyout, the leader of this glorious band, who had scarcely passed the gates of Caesarea when he was ordered to sacrifice to the gods, and was beheaded for his refusal (Mart. Pal. ed. Cureton, p. 3 sq.); of Alpheus, the reader and exorcist in the church of Caesarea, who, when the emperor’s emissaries were celebrating, held back the people from sacrificing to idols, and was crowned with martyrdom after suffering cruel lacerations and rackings for his reckless audacity (p. 5 sq.); of the blameless ascetic youth Aphthius, not yet twenty years of age, who “resided in the same house with us” (p. 13), having come from Beyroot to Caesarea to be instructed by Pamphilus in the holy Scriptures, who in his edifying garrulity, in his respect for the hand of the governor Urbanus and held him back as he was offering libations, who after...
EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA

And meanwhile, how had Eusebius borne himself in this season of peril? A quarter of a century later, when he was sitting in judgment at the council of Tyre, a grave charge was brought against him, affecting his conduct at this crisis. Potammon, bishop of Heraclea, an Egyptian confessor, started up and addressed the president, “Art thou seated as judge, Eusebius; and dost Athanasius, innocent though he is, await his sentence from thee? Nay, tell me then, wast thou not with me in prison during the persecution? And I lost an eye for the truth, but thou, as we see, hast received no injury in any part of thy body, neither hast thou suffered martyrdom, but remained alive with no mutilation. How wast thou released from prison, unless it be that thou didst promise to those who put upon us the pressure of persecution to do that which is unlawful, or didst actually do it?” Eusebius, we are told, in vexation rose and dismissed the court, saying, “If ye come hither and say such things against us, then do ye this for me, if ye have condemnation in store for me, if ye behave thus tyrannically here, much more do ye in your own country” (Epiphan. Haer. lxxxviii. 8).

On the strength of this charge he is supposed to have escaped martyrdom by offering sacrifice, or at least by some unworthy concession. But what does the evidence amount to? Is it the language of a strong partisan, bitterly hostile to him; and it is after all only a conjectural inference of his accusers. How could Eusebius have been imprisoned for the faith, and escaped from prison, if he had not been untrue to his convictions? It did not occur to the blind hatred of Potammon that possibly Eusebius might have remained in captivity till the proclamation of Galerius opened the prison doors to all alike; or that meanwhile a thousand things might have occurred to earn for him an exceptional favour which might save his life without forfeiting his honour. There is a dignity in Eusebius that even if he bespeaks rather the disdainful innocence that will not condescend to a reply, than the uneasy conscience which shrinks from investigation. Even Athanasius (Apol. c. Arisin. 8. l. p. 163), when referring to this incident, can only say that Eusebius was “accused of sacrificing” by the confessors. He does not dare to affirm that he was guilty. He himself obviously knows nothing of any such crime. He never elsewhere calls Eusebius “the sacrificer” (θυρασας) as he does Asterius. If Eusebius had been guilty, this accusation would have been flung at him again and again, surrounded as he was by angry controversialists, in an age when controversy was not too scrupulous in its personalities. Nor again is such a blot on his past history reconcilable with his appointment by universal consent to the bishopric of his own city of Caesarea, where his character was so well known. Neither would he have ventured, if he were conscious of any such guilt, to refer, as he does again and again, with fearlessness to the shameful defections which had occurred during the persecution.

So far as we have information of his movements at this time, they do not betray any such cowardice. During the long incarceration of his friend, Eusebius must have spent a great part of his time with him. There is no con-more fully below, is a scene of thanksgiving over the resurrection of the Church, of which the splendid building at Tyre was at once the first-fruit and the type. This incident must have taken place not later than A.D. 313. For more than a quarter of a century he presided over the Church of Caesarea, winning, with the respect and affection of all. One attempt was made to translate him to a more important sphere, but it was foiled, as we shall see, by his own refusal. He died bishop of Caesarea.
EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA

V. The Council of Nicea. When the Arian controversy broke out, the sympathies of Eusebius were collected at an early stage on the side of Arius. If his namesake of Nicomedia may be trusted, he was especially zealous on behalf of the Arian doctrine at this time (Euseb. Nicom. in Theod. H. E. i. 5 ἦ γὰρ δικαιόν μοι Εὐσεβίους συναθή ἢ ἢ συμφωνεῖν λόγῳ). But the testimony of a strong partisan, eagerly seeking to place his cause in the best light, may well be suspected; and the attitude of Caesarea throughout suggests that he was influenced rather by personal associations and by the desire to secure liberal treatment for the heresiarch than by any real accordance with his views. But, whatever may have been his motives, he wrote to Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, demonstrating with him for depor-ting Arius, and urging that he had misrepresented the opinions of the latter (Labbe, Conc. viii. 1148, ed. Colet). The cause of Arius was taken up also by two neighbouring bishops, occupying important sees, Theodotus of Lodzech and Paulinus of Tyre. In a letter addressed to his namesake of Constantinople, Alexander of Alexandria complains of three Syrian bishops, "appointed he knows not how" (οἷς δὲ δοθεὶς ἐν Ζυρίῃ χειροτομηθεῖς ἑπεκεῖνοι τριὶς)—doubtless intending Eusebius of Caesarea and his two allies—as having fanned the flame of sedition (Theod. H. E. i. 3) ; while on the other hand Arius himself claims that all the bishops in the East, excepting the two in Caesarea with others, as on his side (Theod. H. E. i. 4). Accordingly, when he was deposed by a synod convened at Alexandria by Alexander, Arius at once appealed to Eusebius and others to interpose. A meeting of Syrian bishops was convened, and decided in favour of his restoration. The decision however was worded cautiously. The synod thought that Arius should be allowed to gather his congregations about him as heretofore; but they added that he must render obedience to Alexander and entreat to be admitted to communion with him (Soz. H. E. i. 15).

Such was the attitude of Eusebius towards the Arian controversy when the council of Nicea assembled (A.D. 325). In this council he took a leading part. His prominence on this occasion he cannot have owed to his bishopric, which, though important, did not rank with the great sees, "the apostolic thrones" (Soz. H. E. i. 17) of Christendom, Rome, Antioch, and Alexandria. But he was the bishop's successor of the most famous living writer in the Church at this time. This fact alone must have secured a hearing for him. Probably however his importance was due even more to his close relations with the great emperor. How this intimacy first grew we do not know, but at this time he enjoyed the entire confidence of his imperial master. "He alone of the Eastern priests could tell what was in the mind of the emperor; he was the interpreter, the chaplain, the con-

(i) The Inaugural Address. It was probably owing to court favour that he occupied the first seat to the right of the emperor (V. C. iii. 11 τὸν εὐτεκοντὸν δὲ τοῦ Βασιλείου τρόφιμον), and delivered the opening address to Constantine when he took his seat in the council-chamber (V. C. i. proem. iii. 11; Sozom. H. E. i. 19). The council was held during the emperor's eumenia; his last rival and bitterest foe, Licinius, had been defeated and slain not long before; and the orator's address naturally took the form of a paean of victory, a hymn of thanksgiving (V. C. i. proem. τὸν καλλίστον, δ. iii. 11; Sozom. l. c., χαράτωρος θανόν). The speech is unfortunately not preserved, but we may form some notion of its probable character from the extracts which Eusebius delivers at the triconclusa of this same sovereign. There can be no doubt from the manner in which Eusebius describes the orator at the council of Nicæa that he is speaking of himself (V. C. iii. 11); and indeed he elsewhere incidentally mentions having delivered a panegyric of the emperor on that occasion (V. C. i. proem.; see Stræth, p. xxvii sq.). Yet this function is assigned by Theodoret (H. E. i. 6) to Eustathius of Antioch, whom he reports to have sat next to Constantine, and "crowned the emperor's head with the flowers of praise." Moreover, the very situation which parquets to have been delivered by Eustathius on this occasion is extant (Fabric. Hist. Græc. i. p. 132 sq.); but it stands self-

(ii) The Creed. When the main subject, for which the council had been assembled, came under discussion, we find Eusebius again taking a promiminate part. He himself has left us an account of his doings at this stage in a letter of explanation which he afterwards wrote to his own church of Caesarea (see below, p. 344). He laid before the council the creed which was in use in the Caesarean church, which had been handed down to him from the bishops who preceded him, which himself had been taught at his baptism, and which, as first as a presbyter and then as a bishop, he had instructed others. The emperor was satisfied with the orthodoxy of this creed, inserting however the single word ὅμοοσιαν. At the same time he gave explanations as to the meaning of the term which set the scruples of Eusebius at rest. The assembled fathers however did not rest here, but taking this as their starting-point (ἐφαμάδεις τοῦ δημοσίου) made other inquiries and alterations. The creed as thus revised is still substantially the "Caesarean creed, but the additions were not unimportant. Moreover, an anathema was appended in which Arian doctrines were directly condemned. Eusebius took time to consider before subscribing to this revised formula. The three expressions which caused difficulty were: (1) "of the substance of the Father" (δυνάμει ὁμοιότητος τοῦ πατρὸς); (2) "begotten, not made" (γεννηθέντα, οὐ ναγ-θέντα); (3) "of the same substance" (ὁμοόσιαν); and of these he demanded explanations. The explanations were so far satisfactory that for the sake of peace he subscribed to the creed. He had the less scruple in assenting to the final anathema, because the Arian expressions which it condemned were not scriptural, and he considered that "almost all the confusion and disturbance of the churches" had arisen from the use of unscriptural phrases. This letter, he says, was read to the council only on the condition that he would resist to the last any vital change in the traditional creed of his church, he had nevertheless subscribed to these alterations, when assured of their innocence, to avoid appearing contentious (ἀφανακενητα). On this subject, see especially Hort's Two Dissertations, p. 55 sq. (iii) The Paschal Cycle. The settlement of the dispute respecting the time of observing Easter was another important work undertaken by the council. In this work also a leading part has been assigned to Eusebius by some modern writers (c. g. Stanley, Eastern Church, p. 182, following Tillemont, H. E. vi. p. 608). The cycle of nineteen years, which ultimately prevailed in the Church under the name of the Golden Number, is supposed to have been fixed by the council; and this work is attributed expressively to Eusebius. This table for determining Easter, it is maintained, "first originated in the council chamber of Nicæa; perhaps in the desire of the emperor to have the mind of his people turned towards the feelings of his favourite counsellor. . . . The council would naturally turn to the most learned of its members to accomplish the work. That member was unquestionably Eusebius of Caesarea. He had paid special attention to chronology. . . . It is creditable to the justice and wisdom of the council that they should not have allowed these recent disputes and wide theological differences to stand in the way of intrusting this delicate task to the man who on general grounds was most fitted to undertake it" (Stanley, l. c.). But the evidence does not justify either of the assumptions involved in this view. (1) There are strong reasons for hesitating to believe that the nineteen years' cycle was adopted at the council of Nicæa. It was the old Metonic cycle (invented about B.C. 432), and it had already been applied to the determination of Easter by Anastasius of Laodicea about A.D. 284 (Euseb. H. E. vii. 32). It did not therefore originate with the council. Still the council might have accorded it an authoritative sanction, and thus secured its currency in the Church at large. This would follow from the language of St. Ambrose (Epist. 23, Op. ii. p. 880 sq.), who says (§ 1) that the Nicæan fathers "congregatis peritiissimis calcullandi, decem et novem annorum collegere rationem," and adds, "hunc circulum enneas-decasterida nuncuparunt." In the next century too Cyril (Epist. 86, Op. x. 383, Migne), writing to Leo (A.D. 444), ascribes the adoption of this cycle to the Nicene council; and the same statement is made by later writers (see Butcher, Ecclesiastical Calendar, Dublin, 1677, Appendix, p.

225), though, neither of these men are explicit, their accuracy is open to grave question.
For first, in the documents relating to the treatment of the Paschal question at Nicaea, not a word is said as to the mode of calculating Easter (Euseb. V. C. ii. 18; Socr. H. E. i. 9); and, secondly, the churches of Rome and the West
continued long to make use of an older cycle (Hefele, Conciliengeschichte, i. p. 315), and they are hardly likely to have disregarded any direct decision of a council which they always treated with the highest respect. (2) But, even if it were more certain that the Nicene council directly sanctioned the cycle of nineteen years, there is no ground for regarding it as especi-elly the work of Eusebius. Jerome indeed (Vir.
III. 91) says that Eusebius "arranged [como-suit] a canon for Easter, which was a cycle of nineteen years, that is, an enneasdekasteris"; and Bede (de Temp. Rat. 44, Op. i. 483, Migne) says the same thing, probably deriving his information from Jerome, though stating more passively that Eusebius was the first to apply this cycle to the Paschal computation, which he certainly was not. But neither writer connects this fact with the council of Nicaea. Eusebius did indeed write a treatise on Easter (V. C. iv.
35), of which a fragment is extant (see below,
p. 342), and in it he may have advocated the method which he actually recommended to Jerome and Bede refer; but it was written many years after the Council of Nicaea, with which it appears not to have had any connexion. The probable inference from the notices seems to be that the calculation of Easter was entrusted to the bishops of Alexandria, and that the nineteen years' choice, being already in use in the Alexandrian custom, obtained the sanction of the the earliest extant authority who mentions this duty as imposed on the Alexandrian bishops is Cyril of Alexandria (A.D. 437), Epist.
87 (Op. x. 383). The expression of Athanasius (Festal Letters, x. p. 67, Oxft. transl.), "the custom which has been delivered to us by the fathers,\(^4\) seems not to refer to any authorization of the Nicene bishops (as it has been interpreted),
but to the traditional practice of the Alexandrian patriarchs, who, at least as early as Dionysius (Euseb. H. E. vii. 20), are found issuing these Pashcal letters. Leo the Great also, writing
A.D. 453, states explicitly (Epist. 121, p. 1228) that "the holy fathers" (of Nicaea) delegated this duty of announcing the time of Easter to the bishop of Alexandria, because the Egyptians were skilled in these computations from ancient times.
The Festal Letters of Athanasius (see the index in the Oxford translation, p. xv sq.) cover the period from A.D. 328 to 373. The nineteen years' cycle is already the basis of the calculation here.
This appears, for instance, from the year 350, when Athanasius places Easter on April 19, whereas, according to the alternative eighty-four years' cycle which obtained at Rome, it would fall on March 22. How long it had prevailed in the Alexandrian church, we are without means of determining. But inasmuch as Anatolius, who certainly advocated it, was himself an Alexandrian, we may conjecture that it was introduced by him. The action of the Nicene council therefore would be altogether indirect in this matter;
and there is no reason for supposing that Eusebius in particular took any prominent part in the decision, though, these things are known to have approved the Alexandrian mode of reckoning.
(iv) Dispute with Philosophers. In the displicate between the bishops and the "philosophers," as related by Gelasius in his account of the Nicene Council, a conspicuous part is assigned to Eusebius of Caesarea (ii. 18, 19).
The philosopher Phaedo is said to have read the favourite Arian text, Prov. viii. 23, where Wisdom says (according to the LXX translation),
"The Lord created (εστηκε) me the beginning of His ways for His works." Wisdom being a synonym for the Logos, the Logos is thus declared to be a created thing (εφησ). Eusebius answers this Aristotelian argument at length, partly by monologue, partly by questioning his opponent. The whole discussion, it need hardly be said, is purely fictitious; but the fiction bears testimony to the prominent position assigned by Eusebius in the council, and it is not a little remarkable that a severely orthodox part is assigned to him. (v) Metropolitans (μητροπολιταί). A more authenti-ic indication of his influence appears in the seventh canon of the council, in which we may perhaps see "a slight passage at arms" between him "and Macarius of Aelia Capitolina, not yet Jerusalem:" As custom and ancient tradition have obtained that the bishop of Aelia should be honor-ted To him now his honor is given. Jerome had gained his point, but (and here we cannot mistake the intervention of his superior, the metropolitan of Caesarea) always saving the rights of the metropolitan" (Stanley, l. c. p. 193). But if so, the victory of Eusebius was more complete than would appear from this translation, for the words, εξω έστηκεν την έκκλησιαν της ταρανης, in this context are naturally translated, "he has the next (second) place in point of honour," not "let him have the honour consequent thereon." \(^4\)

VI. Progress of the Arian Controversy. The hopes which Eusebius with others had built upon the decisions of the Nicene council were soon dashed. The final peace of the Church seemed as far distant as ever. In three severe controversies with three distinguished antagonsists, Eusebius took a more or less prominent part; and his reputation, whether justly or not,
had suffered greatly in consequence.

(i) Synod of Antioch. Eustathius, bishop of Antioch, was a staunch advocate of the Nicene doctrine and a determined foe of the Arians.
Against Eusebius of Caesarea he had already taken up a position of antagonism. He had assailed the tenets of Origen (Socr. H. E. vi. 13), whom Eusebius was an ardent champion. He had attacked Eusebius himself, charging him with faithlessness to the doctrines of Nicæa.

\(^4\) On this canon see Hefele, Concilien geschichte, i. p. 357. The "metropolis" is Caesarea, not Antioch, as some have supposed. The language of this canon is explained by the historical circumstances before and after this date.
and was accused in turn of Sabellianism by Eusebius (Socr. H. E. i. 23; Soz. H. E. ii. 19). To the historian, however, the doctrines of the two antagonists appeared to have so much in common that he was puzzled to conceive how they managed to fall out (οι δ' ους συμφωνουσαι σωματων ουκ εγίνοντα). At all events Eustathius of Antioch and Eusebius of Caesarea were regarded as the two principals in the quarrel (Socr. H. E. ii. 18). A conflict so serious could not be confined to a paper war, and more active steps were taken. A synod of bishops was assembled at Antioch, A.D. 330, to consider the charge of Sabellianism brought against Eustathius. If we are to believe Theodoret (H. E. i. 21), this synod was got together by a vile conspiracy on the part of Eusebius of Nicomedia and Theognis of Nicasa, in which they induced Eusebius of Caesarea and other Palestinian bishops to join; but Theodoret's account condemns itself by its false chronology (Hefele, Conciliaireg. i. p. 434). The character of the bishop of Caesarea is not stated by H. E. i. 25; on the other hand, there is no doubt that the assembly was mainly composed of bishops with Arian or semi-Arian sympathies. The charges brought against Eustathius are described in their proper place. [EUSTATHIUS.] Eustathius was deposed, and the see of Antioch thus became vacant. The assembled bishops put forward Eusebius of Caesarea as his successor, and wrote to the emperor on his behalf. The Christian populace of Antioch was divided. If the representations made by the bishops to Constantine deserve credit, the vast majority at all events of the laity were in favour of Eusebius. Eusebius himself speaks in a somewhat different strain (V. C. iii. 50). However this may be, the Eustathian party was strong, and the peace of the city was in imminent peril from the conflict. The temper in his envious, write Eusebius, "was rending the church of the Antiochenes with tragic woes, so that the whole city was well nigh overthrown from its foundations." It is not probable that such a position would at any time have possessed great attractions for Eusebius, and under the present circumstances it would appear less desirable than ever. He was a man of peace, and here was a prospect of war to the death. He was devoted to literary pursuits, and here it was proposed to tear him away from his Caesarean library and from the comparative leisure of a less important see to the arduous duties of chief pastor in the most turbulent of cities. The splendidous of a great patriarchy would hardly excite the ambition of such a man under these circumstances. At all events, with the letter of the bishops pressing the appointment of Eusebius the emperor received another from Eusebius himself declining the proffered honour. He alleged more especially the rule of the Church, which was regarded as an "apostolic tradition," forbidding translations from one see to another. In consequence of these representations Constantine wrote three letters in reply, which are preserved by Eusebius (V. C. iii. 60, 61, 62). To the people of Antioch he sent a missive enforcing counsels of peace and deprecating their wish to rob another see of its bishop. To Eusebius himself he wrote, highly applauding his decision and complimenting him in the highest terms. To the bishops he issued his injunctions that they should not seek to violate the apostolic rule, but that other fit persons should be put forward for the see of Antioch by whom he mentioned two by name. One of these, Euphronius, was elected. Thus Eusebius remained undisturbed in the see of Caesarea, which he retained till his death. Throughout this matter, if we except the pardonable vanity which leads him to insert the emperor's compliments to himself, there is nothing to the discredit of Eusebius. On the contrary, his renunciation of the honour which was thrust upon him contrasts favourably with the unscrupulous ambition of too many of his contemporaries. Of the previous incidents which led to the vacancy in the see of Antioch, he says not a word; but he intimates that he abstains from giving the emperor's letters denouncing the factions at Antioch, because they inculcate certain persons and he does not wish to revive the memory of wrongdoings in the past. It was by this synod of Antioch also that Asclepas, bishop of Hierapolis, was deposed (Op. ii. p. 554; see Hefele, i. p. 435), and we are especially told that he pleaded his cause in the presence of Eusebius of Caesarea (Athan. Ap. c. Arian. 47, Op. i. p. 130; Hilar. Op. ii. p. 626). (ii) Synods of Caesarea, Tyre, and Jerusalem. The next stage of the Arian controversy exhibits Eusebius in conflict with a greater than Eustathius. The disgraceful intrigues of the Arians and Meletians against Athanasius, which led to his first exile, are related in the biography of that saint [ATHANASIUS. p. 183 sqq.]. It is sufficient to say here that the emperor summoned Athanasius to appear before a gathering of bishops at Caesarea, to meet the charges brought against him. It is stated by Theodoret (H. E. i. 26) that Constantine was induced to name Caesarea by the counsels of the Arian party, who selected this place because the enemies of the accused were in a majority there (ἐν ψυχαῖς διοικούσις). It is equally probable that the emperor would himself have given the preference to Caesarea, since he refused the greatest confidence in the moderation (ἐνεπίταξα) of its bishop. However this may be, Athanasius excused himself from attending. He believed, and he may have so pleaded in reply to the emperor, that there was a conspiracy against him, and that he would not have fair play at such a place (Eutic. Letters, p. xvii, Oxford transl.; Theod. H. E. i. 26; Soz. H. E. ii. 25). This was A.D. 334. Of this synod at Caesarea Athanasius himself is silent in his Apology.

The matter however was not allowed to rest here. In the following year (A.D. 335) Athanasius received a peremptory and angry summons

* Euphronius is represented as the immediate successor of Eustathius by Soz. H. E. ii. 18, Soz. H. E. ii. 24; and this is the natural inference from Constantine's letter (Soz. V. C. iii. 63). On the other hand, Theodoret (H. E. i. 21) says that they appointed Eunalius first, but that he only lived a short time, and they then desired to translate Eusebius of Palestine. Jerome (Chron. L. p. 192, Schoe) gives the names of the Arian bishops who were thronged in a conspiracy to the place of Eusebius as "Eunalius, Eusebius, Ennばかり, Paschalius," &c. Perhaps Eunalius was put forward for the vacant see, like Eusebius, but never actually appointed. The statement attributed to Philostorgius, that Paulinus of Tyre succeeded Eustathius, will be considered below, p. 322.
from Constantine to appear before a synod of bishops, not now at Caesarea, but at Tyre.5 Theodoret (I. c.) conjectures (δες ουσα) that the place of meeting was changed by the emperor out of deference to the fears of Athanasius, who "looked with suspicion on Caesarea on account of its ruler. It is not improbable that Athanasius, or his friends, had taken objection to Eusebius as a partisan in this controversy; for the Egyptian bishops who espoused the cause of Athanasius, addressing the synod of Tyre, allege "the law of God" as forbidding "an enemy to be witness or judge," and shortly afterwards add mysteriously, "ye know why Eusebius of Caesarea has become an enemy since last year" (Athan. Op. c. Ariam. 77, Op. i. p. 153), as if he had taken offence at the objections then raised against him. The scenes at the synod of Tyre form the most picturesque and the most shameful chapter in the Arian controversy. After all allowance made for the exaggerations of the Athanasian party, from whose side of the proceeding, the proceedings will still remain an undying shame to Eusebius of Nicomedia and his fellow intriguers. But there is no reason for supposing that Eusebius of Caesarea took any active part in these plots. Athanasius is generally silent about him, mentioning him rarely, and then without any special blame. "Eusebius" (αὐτοῦ Ἑυσεβίου) are always the adherents of his Nicomedeans nameakes. But, though probably free from any participation in their plots, of which he may have been wholly ignorant, he was certainly used as a tool by the more unscrupulous and violent partisans of Arius, and he must bear the reproach of a too easy compliance with their actions. The proceedings of the bishops assembled at Tyre were cut short by the withdrawal of the accused himself. Athanasius suddenly took ship to Constantinople, and appealed in person to the emperor. The synod saw no other course but to condemn him by default. For a fuller account of its proceedings, the reader is referred to the biography of Eusebius and the accounts of the proceedings connected with it which relate to Eusebius, and which claim a mention here. (1) It was on this occasion that Potammon, the Egyptian confessor, flung the taunt of cowardice and apostasy in the face of Eusebius, as related already (p. 311). Hefele discredit the story altogether (Concilia-thesch. i. p. 446). He supposes it to be another version of an incident related by Rufinus (x. 17; comp. Sozom. H. E. ii. 25) respecting Paphnutius and Maximus of Jerusalem. It seems more probable however that some such taunt was levelled at Eusebius on this occasion. But whether so or not, no stain rests upon his character in consequence of this reckless accusation. (2) It will be remembered that, among the charges brought against Athanasius at this synod, Theodoret and Rufinus (x. 17) mention that he was accused of having seduced a girl, who had a child by him, and that, when con-

5 In the preface to the Festal Letters, p. xvii, it is stated that Athanasius left Alexandria, Epiph 17, A.D. 335; but this must be an error of a year, for a document given by Athanasius, Ap. c. Ariam. 75 (Op. l. p. 159), and written later than this event, is dated Thoet 10 (= Sept. 7), A.D. 335.
EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA

Church. In doing so he was only obeying the Lord's injunction, "Be reconciled to thy brother, and then go and offer thy gift." (Comp. Matt. 5. 25.) This view of the emperor's motive is entirely borne out by Constantine's own letter to the synod at Tyre. It accords moreover with his proceedings on a previous occasion. As the council of Nicaea had been summoned with a view to re-establishing peace in the Church for his approaching ceremonies, so now the bishops were directed to meet at Tyre on their way to Jerusalem to secure a general pacification before the celebration at the close of his next decennium. Eusebius shows by his language that he was greatly impressed by the celebration; but Tiltomast, who manifests a strong prejudice against Eusebius throughout, altogether misstates the case in saying that he "compares or prefers this assembly to the council of Nicaea, striving to extol it as much as he can, for the sake of elevating the glory of that great council," &c. (vi. p. 284). So far from preferring it, he says distinctly that "after that first council" this was the greatest synod assembled by Constantine of all those with which he was acquainted (V. C. iv. 47 ταύτην μεγάλιν δε μην συνόδον διενεργεσθή μετὰ την πρώτην εκείνην κ. ι. λ.). And on the other hand, so far from showing any desire to depreciate the council of Nicaea, he cannot find language magnificent enough to sing its glories (V. C. iii. 6 sq.), when it is the proper theme of his narrative.

But the bishops assembled at Jerusalem did not content themselves with the celebration of the religious festival. They took another highly important step. Arius and Eusebius had presented a confession of faith to the emperor, seeking readmission to the church. The emperor himself was satisfied with the opinions expressed in this document, and persuaded himself that it was in harmony with the faith of Nicaea. It did not perhaps directly crawl up the crests of the Nicaean fathers in any point: it even contained a strong expression respecting the pre-existence of the Son (τὸν Ἐσωτικόν τῶν αἰώνων γεγονότος Θεὸν Λόγον); but after all that had passed, its omission was more eloquent than its admissions. These omissions however were not likely to strike Cæcilianus. Therefore dispossessed Arians and Eusebians to Jerusalem, at the same time requesting the synod to consider their confession of faith, and to restore them to communion. The request was not made in vain. The condemnation of Arians at Tyre was followed by the readmission of Arians and his followers at Jerusalem. Of the bishops who were responsible for this act, some would be instigated mainly by hostility to Arians, desiring thus to complete his defeat; others, taking the emperor's view, would regard it as an act of pacification. Hence either motive would prevail with Eusebius of Caesarea, we can only conjecture; but the stress which he lays on Constantine's desire to secure the peace of the church, on this as on all other occasions, suggests that pacification would be a predominant idea in his own mind, though perhaps not unmixed with other motives. It is strange that throughout his account of these proceedings Eusebius does not name either Athanasius or Arius; that in his allusion to the synod of Tyre he confines himself to vague generalities about the settlement of quarrels; and that in his narrative of the assembly at Jerusalem he does not so much as hint at any synodal action of any kind.

(iii) Synod of Constantinople. The conduct of the emperor at this time was strangely sickle and inconsistent. He had no distinct theological convictions on the great doctrine at issue, and was therefore at the mercy of the last speaker. Athanasius died too soon to Constantinople. Of the principal Constantine desired pacification, but he was not insensible to justice; and the personal pleadings of Athanasius convinced him that justice had been outraged (Ap. c. Ariam. 86). The bishops assembled at the dedication festival had scarcely executed the request, or the command, of the emperor's last letter, when they received another written in a very different temper (Athan. Ap. c. Ariam. 86; Socr. H. E. i. 34; Sozom. H. E. ii. 27). It was addressed "to the bishops that had assembled at Tyre"; it described their proceedings as "tumultuous and stormy" (μετὰ ἀναπλήρωσιν νεκρών καθημέρων). It contended that their judgment had been overruled by a spirit of contentiousness to the perversion of the truth; and it ended by summoning them to present themselves without a moment's delay at Constantinople. The leaders of the Eusebian party alone obeyed; the rest slunk away to their respective homes. Among those who repaired to the imperial city was Eusebius of Caesarea. Of the principal events which marked this occasion, the banishment of Athanasius and the death of Arius, it is unnecessary to speak here. But the proceedings of the synod then held at Constantinople (A. p. 336) have an important bearing on the literary history of Eusebius. The bishop wrote of this synod the condemnation of Marcellus (Марцеллуса), bishop of Ancyra, an uncompromising opponent of the Arians. He had written a book in reply to the Arian Asterius "the sophist," in which his zeal against Arian tenets goaded him into expressions that had a rank savour of Sabellianism. The proceedings against him had commenced in Jerusalem. They were taken up again at Constantinople, where he was condemned of Sabellianism, and deposed from his bishopric (Socr. H. E. i. 36; Socr. H. E. ii. 33). Eusebius is especially mentioned as taking part in this synod (Athan. Ap. c. Ariam. 87; comp. Euseb. c. Marc. ii. 4 p. 115). But the dominant party were not satisfied with this condemnation. Eusebius was urged by his friends to undertake a refutation of the heretic. The two works against Marcellus, of which an account will be given in the proper place, were his response to this request.

Meanwhile Eusebius found more congenial employment during his sojourn at Constantinople. The celebration of the emperor's trini-
318. EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA

Eusebius had not yet ended, and the bishop of Caesarea delivered a panegyric which he afterwards appended to his Life of Constantine. An account of this work, which is extant under the title De Laudibus Constantini, is given below. With complacent vanity the orator records the emperor's satisfaction with his performance. This soirée was doubtless attended attentively, and was like one in an ecstasy of delight (καταφαίωμεν δι' της θείας φιλίας γαρνυμένης ἕκας); he expressed his approval afterwards at a banquet to the bishops who were his guests (V. C. iv. 46). Possibly the delivery of this oration may have been the chief motive which induced Eusebius to accompany the Arian bishops to the imperial city. It must have been during this same visit also, though on an earlier day, that he delivered before the emperor his discourse on the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, which had probably been spoken previously at the dedication itself. On this occasion too the satisfaction of Constantine was not less marked. He stood the whole time, though on the orator's own confession the discourse was lengthy; he refused again and again to be seated; he listened intently throughout, and would not suffer the orator to break off when he desired to do so (V. C. ix. 35, 46). This oration has unfortunately not survived (see p. 348).

VII. His Relations with the Emperor and Imperial Family. It does not appear that Eusebius had any personal interview with Constantine, when as a young man he passed through Caesarea in the retinue of Diocletian (see p. 309). The historian records the incident merely as a sightseer. The first direct communication on record is a letter from the emperor to Eusebius as metropolitan of Caesarea after the restoration of peace, giving orders for the rebuilding of the churches (V. C. ii. 46); but this does not suppose any personal acquaintance. Constantine indeed addresses him on this occasion as his "dearly beloved brother," but nothing can be built upon the expression. At the Council of Nicaea the emperor's favor, as the prominent position there assigned to him shews (p. 312 sq.); and from that time forward there seems to have been no interruption to his cordial relations with his imperial friend. The emperor was wont to enter into familiar conversation with him, relating to him the most remarkable incidents in his career, such as the miraculous appearance of the cross in the skies (V. C. i. 28), and the protection afforded by this same emblem in battle (V. C. ii. 9). He corresponded with him on various subjects. Besides official letters, such as that which has been already mentioned, Constantine wrote to compliment him on his declining the see of Antioch ("Consider thyself happy," he says on this occasion, "forasmuch as by the testimony of the whole world, so to speak, thou hast been judged worthy to be bishop of every church") (V. C. iii. 61). On receiving from Eusebius his treatise on the Paschal festival dedicated to himself, he sent in reply a letter of acknowledgment, expressing his excessive admiration (εὐθυμο- μάνεν) and urging his correspondent to write many more such discourses (V. C. iv. 45). On another occasion again he writes to him, asking him to see to the execution of fifty copies of the Scriptures for his new capital Constantinople, and supplying him with the means necessary for executing the order (V. C. iv. 38; see below, p. 334). But he not only corresponded familiarly with the bishop of Caesarea. It was a still greater mark of respect to listen with patience, and even with delight, to the lengthy and elaborate orations which Eusebius held from time to time to his court. We may well suppose that, beyond his rat learning, the bishop of Caesarea had other qualities which rendered his society attractive to the great emperor. Constantine himself praises his gentleness or moderation (V. C. iii. 60 ἄν καὶ αὐτὸς πανεσεόντες ταῦτα καὶ ἐτελεσθείλεται ὃ τευχεῖται οὕτως πέποιτο ὁ ἐναντίον αὐτοῦ ἠσκοῦσα ἐνεργεία) of the one who in like manner killed and again, τῆς προς αὐτὸν τασσόμενος ἐν ἐνεργείας. Nor would the unsung admiration which Eusebius entertained for his imperial host fail to recommend him to the great man. On the other hand, the bishop praises the frankness and accessibility of the sovereign, which was commendable and unpretentious: a fault, so that the emperor prayed upon his confidence (V. C. iv. 54). Nor was Constantine the only member of the imperial family with whom Eusebius had friendly relations. We find the empress Constantia, the sister of Constantine and wife of Licinius, writing to him on a matter of religious interest. To her Eusebius replies in a letter, of which a great part is still extant. In his reply we are especially struck with the frankness of expectation, almost of rebuke, which he addresses to this high personage (Spicil. Solesm. i. 830). These relations of Eusebius with a lady of the imperial family had a precedent in the life of his great opponent Arius, who was an attentive disciple in Mammee, the mother of the emperor Alexander Severus (Euseb. H. E. vi. 21).

VIII. Latest Years and Death. Within twelve months, or a little more, of the time when he had listened with rapt attention to the orations of the bishop of Caesarea, the great emperor, who the day before had breathed his last (May 22, A.D. 337); and the orator himself soon followed his imperial master. The precise time when Eusebius ended his busy and laborious life is not known, but he was no longer living in 341, for we find his successor Acacius representing Caesarea in the synod held at Antioch that year. From the connexion in which his death is mentioned by the historians, we may infer that it happened not later than the close of A.D. 339 or the beginning of A.D. 340.² In Wright's Ancient Syrian Martyrology, τεκτονήμασιν Ἐουσβίου ὦ κ. θ. In the previous chapter he mentions the intrigues of the Arians which led to the second exile of Athanasius, but says that he will defer the account of this exile till later (μετά τοῦ παρακολουθῆναι Ἰακώβην). In the following chapter he describes the death of the younger Constantine as happening "so long time after" (μετὰ τοῦ πάλιν). The second exile of Athanasius seems to have taken place in March, 346 (Ammianus Marcellinus xix. 4). Constantine was slain in the early months of the same year (Clinton, Past. Rom. i. 402). Socmen (H. E. iii. 1) places the death of Eusebius in exactly the same relations to all these events. It happened therefore, after the transactions which led to the exile of Athanasius had begun, but before the exile itself, and before the death of the younger Constantine.

² Socmen (H. E. ii. 4) writes ἐν δὲ τούτῳ τῇ γενομένῃ

EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA

which cannot date later than half a century after the event, "the commemoration of Eusebius bishop of Pamphylia," is placed on May 30. If this represents the day of his death, then probably it does, he must have died in 339, for the notices will hardly allow so late a date in the following year. His literary activity was unabated to the end. Four years at the most can have elapsed between his last visit to Constantinople and his death. He must have been fast approaching his eightieth year when the end came. Yet at this advanced age, and within this short period, he composed the Panegyric, the Life of Constantine, the treatise Against Marcellinus, and the companion treatise On the Theology of the Church; while probably also he had in hand at the same time other unfinished works, such as the Theophania. There are no signs of failing mental vigour in these latest works. The two doctrinal treatises, which must certainly be assigned to the last four years of his life, are perhaps the most forcible and lucid of his writings. The Panegyric and the Life of Constantine are marred, indeed, by a too luxuriant rhetoric; but in vigour they do not fall behind any of his earlier works. Of his death itself no record is left. He passed away silently, we may suppose, as an old man of regular habits and equable temperament might be expected to pass away. Acacius, his successor, had been his pupil. Though more decidedly Ariana in his bias, he was a devoted admirer of his master (Sosem. H. E. iii. 2). He wrote a life of Eusebius (see p. 308), and seems to have edited some of his works (see p. 326).

IX. Literary Works. The literary remains of Eusebius are a rich and comparatively unexplored mine of study. With the exception of the Chronicle and the Ecclesiastical History, none of his writings have been investigated with proper diligence, and the vast majority remain still with the most meagre annotations, if annotated at all. Even in the excepted cases much remains still to be done. In wandring through this wretched guide, without guides and without tracks, a writer will necessarily go astray; and the following account must therefore be regarded as only tentative. The literary chronology of Eusebius is especially perplexing. He was in the habit of re-editing his books, and, possibly also, of adding references from later works in the earlier, even when he did not re-edit. Hence the apparently contradictory evidence with regard to dates, which meets us again and again in his writings.

His works may be arranged under the following heads: A. Historical; B. Apologetic; C. Critical and Exegetical; D. Doctrinal; E. Orations; F. Letters. The division is of necessity more or less artificial, and in some cases a work might be placed under more than one of these heads. Thus the Defence of Origen is partly historical, partly doctrinal, while in one sense it may be called apologetic; and so again the Letter to the Church of Caesarea is exclusively doctrinal, and the Oration in Praise of Constantine is mainly apologetic. But a rough classification like this is recommended by its obvious convenience.

References are given in brackets [ ] after the titles of the several works, to the edition of Eusebius in the Patrologia Graeca of Migne, whenever the works in question are included in that collection.

A. Historical.

1. Life of Pamphilius. Eusebius (Mart. Pol. 14), speaking of his friend’s martyrdom, refers to this work as follows: “The rest of the triumphs of his virtue, requiring a longer narration, we have already before this given to the world in a separate work in three books, of which his life is the subject.” He also refers to it three times in his History (H. E. vii. 32, viii. 32, viii. 13). In the first of these passages he states that in it he has given a full list of the works of Origen and of the other ecclesiastical writers collected by Pamphilus at Caesarea. Doubtless Jerome’s list of Origen’s works, which was discovered a few years ago (see Bedeppening in Zeitachr. f. hist. Theol. 1851, p. 66 sq.), is borrowed from this source. This Life is several times mentioned by Jerome (Ep. 35, Op. i. p. 154 sq.; Vit. ill. 81; c. Rufin. i. 9). In the last passage he describes it as containing “tres libros elegantissimos,” and gives a short extract from the third book. This appears to be the only remaining fragment, for the account of Pamphilus’ death, published by Papebroch, belongs, as we shall see, not to this work, but to the longer edition of the Martyrs of Palestine. The date of the Life of Pamphilus is uncertain; but it was written before the History (on the v. 1. οἱ ἀνεργοὶ ἀνέγιγγον in H. E. viii. 13, see Hollander, Euseb. 1890, p. 283; the shorter edition of the Martyrs of Palestine (l.c.).

2. On the Martyrs of Palestine (πρὸ τῶν ἐν Παλαιστίνῃ μαρτρώσαντων) (Op. ii. 1457 sq.). This work is extant in two forms, a shorter and a longer.

(i) The shorter form is found attached to the Ecclesiastical History in most MSS of the latter, but not always in the same place. Commonly it stands between the eighth and ninth books, but in one MS at least it is placed in the middle of viii. 13, where in fact Eusebius makes a reference to it; while in some others it is relegated to the end of the tenth book of the latter. Consequently two MSS however, and notably in D. Marc. Venet. 338, perhaps the most important of all, it is wanting; neither has it any place in the Latin of Rufinus, or in the Syriac version of the History. Its fluctuating position in the MSS has a close analogy in the famous pericope (Joh. vii. 53–viii. 11) of the narrative of our Lord’s conversation with the woman of Samaria. Quite another problem, also, is the question of its preservation in the Greek. It appears that Eusebius wrote or helped to write it (Hippolytus lii. p. 217). This is a fuller account of the same incidents which are related in the Mart. Pol. 11 attached to the History. In the matter which the two contain in common they are expressed in the same words, or nearly so. Hence it followed that the one must have been an enlargement or an abridgment of the other. Both Papebroch and Fabricius supposed that the Metaphrast had extracted these Acts from Eusebius’s Life of Pamphilus, but the other hand, Valois mantained that the Meta-phrast must have had a fuller edition of the Martyrs of Palestine than the existing Greek text. He was confirmed in this view by the fact that some anonymous Latin Acts of St. Procopius, which he printed, stood in exactly the same relation to the account of this martyr's death as the Mal lodion. The Latin Acts were evidently translated from some contemporary account, for they contained the words, "primo anno quo adversus nos fuit persecutio."

Recent discovery has established the conjecture of Valois. In A.D. 1861 Cureton published a MS in the British Museum, dated A.D. 153 (the same which also contains the Theophania), an ancient Syriac version of the Martyrs of Palestine. The portions relating to Procopius and to Pamphilus and his companions correspond to the longer forms of their respective Acts as already described. Here then is a translation of the entire work of Eusebius in its longer form.

This discovery moreover throws light on another fact. S. E. Assemani's Acta Martyrum Occidentalia, p. 166 sq. (Rome, 1748), contains accounts of the deaths of several of these Palestinian martyrs in Syriac, published from the Vatican MS Syr. 1. Assemani, starting from the finding that four of his Syriac Acts of Procopius were identical with the Latin Acts already mentioned, inferred that we had in these Syriac Acts portions of the complete work of Eusebius, of which the Greek attached to the History was only an abridgment. So far he was correct in his inference. But he went on to express his opinion that Eusebius himself wrote the Syriac, and that the Acts which he published were in fact the originals of the author. This latter theory is shattered by Cureton's publication. Assemani's Acts (so far as they contain common matter) are another and independent Syriac version of the same Greek as Cureton's. Assemani's Syriac has the following Acts taken from the work of Eusebius: (1) Procopius, p. 166 sq.; (2) Alpheaus, &c., p. 175 sq.; (3) Timotheus, p. 182 sq.; (4) Apollinarius, p. 186 sq.; (5) Aedesius, p. 195 sq.; (6) Agapius, p. 198 sq.; (7) Theodosia, p. 201 sq.; (8) Peter Abalam, p. 206 sq.

Of the genuineness of this longer work there can be no reasonable question. The Syriac MS of the Curetonian version itself was written within little more than seventy years of Eusebius's death. Moreover, it is plainly not the original autograph of the translation. The confusion and transposition of Syriac letters shew that the version has passed through one and probably more stages of transcription after it was made. The Syriac version probably was the first: "Anais into Ais, Peleus into Paulus, &c. (see pp. 58, 61, 64, 69, 78, 84, 85, Cureton). And in other words also, besides proper names, the text has been corrupted (pp. 57, 63, 83). Moreover, the Greek MS from which the Syriac version was made had either been mis-copied or so blurred by time as to be illegible in parts. Hence the name Paulus (a good Egyptian name, like Paspis, Paphnutius, &c. with the meaning "belonging to Isis"; see Tattam s. v. P&H(1)) has become Pasis by a confusion of A & (p. 57), Aedesius has become Aloisius by a confusion of A & (p. 60), &c. Allowing sufficient time for these corruptions, we are carried back to the date of Eusebius himself. Moreover, the historical notices, which this longer account supplements to the shorter narrative, indicate a contemporary and an eye-witness.

Nor again can it reasonably be doubted that the shorter form of the Palestinian Martyrs, attached to the history, is Eusebius's own. Not only does the compiler retain those notices of the longer form in which Eusebius speaks in his own person; but in those passages also, which are peculiar to this shorter form, Eusebius is evidently the speaker. Thus, in his account of Pamphilus (p. 112, where he has written a special work in three books on his martyred friend's life). Again, when recording the death of Silvanus who had had his eyes put out (c. 13), he mentions his own astonishment on one occasion (συνευαγγελίζων μετεκάλεθε ο θεός), when he heard him reading the Scriptures, as he supposed, from a book in church, being told that he was blind and was repeating them by heart. Moreover, other incidental notices, which are inserted from time to time and have no place in the longer form, show the knowledge of a contemporaneous and eyewitness.

Eusebius was in the habit of working up old matter in the form of an edifying work, a kind of book therefore is there no stumbling-block. But it is an interesting problem to inquire the motives in this particular case.

The longer edition seems to be the original form of the book. It is an independent work, and appears to have been written not very long after the events themselves. It betrays no other motive than to provide edifying matter, especially the Christians of Caesarea and Palestine, to whom it is immediately addressed. "Our city of Caesarea" is an expression occurring several times (pp. 4 twice, 25, 30). "This our country," "this our city," are analogous phrases (pp. 8, 15). The martyrs are described as "those of whom all the inhabitants of Palestine and the whole of Syria, for in the midst of this our land also the Saviour of all mankind himself arose" (p. 3). "We also," he writes, when relating a miraculous occurrence, "call as witnesses to you of these things which we have written the whole of the inhabitants of the city of Caesarea, for there was not so much as one of the inhabitants of this city absent from this terrific sight" (p. 17). The beginning and end are hortatory, and suggest a directly didactic purpose in the narrative.

In the shorter form the case is different. The writer does not localize himself in the same way. It is always "the city," never "this city," of Caesarea. The religious descriptions, in recording the miracles is left out (c. 4). The hortatory beginning and ending are omitted; and generally the didactic portions are abridged or excised. For the hortatory opening a chronological notice, and an account of the decree under which the martyrs were condemned, are substituted. The hortatory close in like manner makes room for a brief summary of the sufferings of the martyrs under Diocletian throughout the world, ending with a reference to the palindrome of the persecutors. "We must now," so it concludes, "record the palindrome" (ἀναγραφεῖν ο ωι καὶ τον βαλαμίδα). It would seem then that this shorter form was part of a larger work, in which the sufferings of the martyrs were set off against the deeds of the persecutors. The object of this antithetical treatment would be the vindication of God's righteousness. This idea appears several times elsewhere in the writings of Eusebius, and he may have desired to embody it in a separate treatise. The work is plainly not complete, as we have it. The palinode, which is promised, never comes. Nor is this the only sign of incompleteness. In c. 12 Eusebius refers to something which he has "said at the beginning." To this there is nothing corresponding in the extant work. The preface therefore is wanting, as well as the conclusion. This hypothesis as to the intention of the work, if it be admitted, solves another difficulty. At the end of the eighth book of the History, several MSS (generally the same) contain the Martyrs of Palestine in a short appendix, as contained "in some copies" (ὑπὸ τῶν ἑττητάρχων). This appendix contrasts the miserable deaths of the persecutors with the happy lives of the Christians, crowned by the happy accession of Constantine. It evidently does not belong to the History itself. It is no less obviously a fragment of some larger work; for it refers to an account of the abdication of the two emperors, which has been given in a previous part of the narrative. May we not have here a fragment of the second part of the treatise of which the Martyrs of Palestine in the shorter recension formed the first?

(3) Collection of Ancient Martyrdoms (ἀρχαῖας μαρτυρίας συγκεκριμένης). The title of the work may be regarded as substantially correct, as a comparison of the references in Hist. Eccl. iv. 15, v. praef., 4, 21. Of this work Eusebius was not, as some have supposed, the author, but merely, as the title suggests and as the nature requires, the compiler and editor. The narratives of martyrdoms had a double importance in the eyes of Eusebius: they were not only valuable as history, but they were instructive as lessons (Hist. Eccl. v. praef. οὖν ἱστορεῖν αὐτὸ μάρτυρα, ἄλλα καὶ διδασκαλίαν περιέχουσαν διάγων). Hence he took pains to preserve authentic records of them. He conceived that these must have happened during the last persecution of the Greek Church. They were not only valuable as history, but were interesting as lessons. He himself undertook to record the sufferings of the martyrs of his own country Palestine at this time; while he left it to others in different parts of the world to relate those "qua ipsi miserrima viderunt," declaring that only thus strict accuracy could be attained (see Hist. Eccl. vi. 13, οὖν ἱστορεῖν τῶν εἰς ἡπόταμα παρελθόντων ἡ μὲν γένεσιν, with the whole context). But he was anxious also to preserve the records of past persecutions. Hence this collection of Martyrologies. The epithet "ancient" (ἀρχαῖας) must probably be regarded as only relative. Those martyrdoms were "ancient," which took place prior to the "persecution of his own time" (καὶ ἡμᾶς ἱστοριῶς, according to his favourite expression). He himself refers to this collection for the martyrdom of Polycaur and others at Smyrna under Antoninus Pius A.D. 155 or 156 (iv. 15), for the death of Alexander Episcopius, and for the persecutions of the Galilaeans under M. Aurelius A.D. 177 (v. I sq.), and for the death of Apollinus under Commodus A.D. 180-185.

(4) Chronicle [Op. i. 59 sq.]. This is the subject of a separate article [EUSEBIUS, CHRONICLE]. Little need be said here. The suggestion thrown out, that Eusebius published two different editions of this work (see p. 392), deserves every consideration. It would solve not a few difficulties which we encounter in the literary history of Eusebius. But the fuller account of theBOOK. — VOL. II. (v. 21). But it would probably comprise any martyrdoms which occurred before the long peace that preceded the outbreak of the last persecution under Diocletian.

Out of this simple fact that Eusebius made a collection of the older acts of martyrdom, much legendary matter has grown. It gave rise to a fictitious correspondence between Jerome and others (Hieronym. Op. xxii. Valeriani). Chromatius and Heliodorus, the bishops, write to Jerome asking him to search for the "feriales" in the archives of St. Eusebius at Caesarea, and instruct them that they may observe the saints' days with more regularity. He replies to them, stating how on the occasion of Constantine's visit to Caesarea Eusebius had requested that the judges throughout the Roman empire might be directed to furnish him with copies of any judicial proceedings against the martyrs. Using these materials Eusebius had compiled a narrative giving "omnium martyrum pro- vinciarum omnium Romanarum trophaeas." From this work himself and others drew up the calendar of saints' days, which he sends in answer to his correspondent's request. These letters were afterwards prefixed to the so-called MartYROLOGIUM HIERONYMINUM, which they are intended to recommend. Baronius (Mem. Rom. praef. oc. vii, vii), and E. Assemani (Not. Mart. Occ. p. 39 sq.) have pointed out the historical impossibilities which these letters contain. But though a forgery, they appear to have been in circulation at an early date. There is a reference to them even in Cassiodorus (Inst. Litt. 32, p. 550), if the passage be not interpolated. They seem also to have suggested the statement in the forged Acts of St. Silvester, where this imaginary work of Eusebius is described in similar language, with the additional statement that it contained twenty (v. 11, eleven) books. We may suppose also that directly or indirectly they prompted the inquiry of Eulogius of Alexandria, who wrote to Gregory of Nazianzen to send him this work of Eusebius. Gregory (Ep. viii. 29) says in reply that no such work exists in the archives of the Roman church or in the libraries of Rome, and that he himself had never heard of it, till he got the letter of Eulogius. In the middle ages however rumours of this work appeared at times in the lists of learning hopes of its discovery were excited from time to time. The story is fully investigated by Assemani (1 c.) who shews it to be incredible in itself and irreconcilable alike with the silence and the utterances of Eusebius.

232
of the earlier Roman episcopate in the Armenian differ widely from those given in the History, while Jerome's dates agree with the latter. If there was only one edition, this phenomenon may be explained in one of two ways. Either Jerome reproduces the original Eusebian chronology of the Roman bishops and the Armenian translator (or else Jerome before his time) tampered with the work, and substituted a confusedly erroneous chronology for one substantially correct—a very improbable supposition; or (as assumed by Lipps and commonly) the Armenian may give the proper Eusebian dates, and Jerome may have altered them—a hypothesis which is still less credible, when we remember that Jerome's chronology in the Chronicle agrees substantially with the History, and that Eusebius was engaged on the History at the same time with the Chronicle.

(iii) The references in other works of Eusebius are best explained on the hypothesis of a first edition of the Chronicle before the tenus of Jerome than the copy which fell into Jerome's hands. Thus it is mentioned in the Ecclesiasticus Prophetae, and this latter work was certainly written during the persecution, i.e. at all events before A.D. 313 (see below, p. 339). Again, it is referred to likewise in the Prosaparato Evangelica, and there the student is in no way certain, and not only so, as in the previous case, that the earlier book of the sequel to this work, the Demonstratio Evangelica, were written during and soon after the persecution (see below, p. 329). Tillenmont (H. E. vii. p. 50) was disposed to postulate an earlier edition of the Chronicle, on the sole ground of the reference in the Prosaparato. The publication of the Ecclesiasticus Prophetae, and the discovery of the Armenian version of the Chronicle, have strengthened the position twenty-fold. If this hypothesis be correct, the Armenian must be a mixture of the earlier and later editions, for it also refers to the vicennalia (i. pp. 71, 131, 134). Petermann on entirely independent grounds (i. p. 21) has proposed a revision of this Armenian version (see below, p. 354).

(5) Ecclesiastical History [ονθαναστηκε Ιεροσα] [Op. ii. 10 sq.]. The date of the work is ascertained from the following facts. (1) Eusebius refers to the following works as already written: the Chronicle (i. 1); the Extracts from the Prophets (i. 2, 3); the Collection of Ancient Martyrdoms (iv. 15, v. proseem., 4, 22); the Defence of Origen (vi. 23, 33, 36); the Life of Pamphilus (vi. 32, vii. 32, viii. 13 [7]). On the other hand he expresses his intention of relating the sufferings of the martyrs, of which himself was an eye-witness, in another work (viii. 13), referring apparently to the Martyrs of Pamphilus. (2) His work closes with the death of Constantine and his son Crispus. As Crispus was put to death by his father in the summer A.D. 326, this gives a terminus ad quem, beyond which the publication of the work cannot be placed. (3) The last incident recorded, or alluded to, in the work is the defeat and punishment of Licinius. Licinius was defeated A.D. 325, and put to death A.D. 324 (Clinton, Fast. Rom. i. pp. 376, 378). (4) There is no reference, direct or indirect, to the Council of Nicaea, which met in June, A.D. 325. On the other hand, the theological language of Eusebius (e.g. i. 2, 3) is such as he would hardly have used after he had put his signature to the creed of this council. (5) The last book is dedicated to his friend Paulinus. Here again we have a definite terminus ad quem, for Paulinus died A.D. 324, or 325 at the latest. Those who would postpone the date of the History meet this argument in one of two ways. (1) They suppose that Paulinus was no longer alive when Eusebius wrote these words. This however is an unnatural interpretation, not being suggested by anything in the context. The expression ἐπερατορας has a parallel in the preface to his Onomasticon, where he addresses this same person, when he was certainly living, as ἑγεῖ τού Θεοῦ ἀρσενίως Παύλινον. Even if with Heinichen we interpret the words ἐπερατορας as ας to thee, as if the tenth book had been added at the instigation of Paulinus, it will still imply that he was living. The imperative however and the ἀφάντος of the context seem to point rather to a dedication. (2) They postpone the death of Paulinus to a period later in date. This however seems impossible. Paulinus was bishop first of Tyre and afterwards of Antioch (Euseb. c. Marcell. i. 4). This last see he only held six months before his death (Philostorg. H. E. ii. 15). At the Council of Nicaea however, Zenus is bishop of Tyre and Eustathius and the death of Antioch. His death therefore has already taken place before the summer A.D. 325, when the council met; and Jerome (Euseb. Chron. i. p. 192) is unquestionably right when he represents Paulinus as the immediate predecessor of Eustathius. On the other hand the language of Philostorgius (i.e.), as given by Photius, implies that he succeeded Eustathius when Eustathius was deposed, for it apparently makes him the immediate predecessor of Eulalius. If Philostorgius said this, the facts already adduced show that he was wrong, but possibly the error is due to Photius's mode of abridging.1 Theodoret (H. E. i. 6) overlooks Paulinus's short tenure of office, when he makes Eustathius the immediate successor of Philostorgius. Other passages, cited by Heinichen (e.g. Soz. H. E. ii. 18) prove nothing, for they do not require that Paulinus should be still living at the times of which they speak.

From all these considerations it seems clear that the History was finished some time in A.D. 324 or 325; before midsummer in the latter year, and probably some months earlier. But there are reasons for thinking that the earlier books were written some years before this time. "If we compare the closing sentences of the ninth and tenth books it is evident that, when the ninth book was written, Eusebius was not aware of the rupture between Licinius and Constantine, which happened in 314; and it appears also that he was not perfectly informed of the course of affairs in the west, which led to the decisive victory of Constantine over Maxentius in 312, though he was well acquainted with the eastern campaign, which ended with the death of Maximian in 313. We may therefore suppose that the nine books were composed not long after the edict of Milan in 313, while the tenth book was added in the interval between 323 and the close of the summer of 325. In this case the words “not yet set in diaphragm” (ἔσωμεν ἄνωθεν τὰ), referring to Licinius (ix. 9), must have been a later insertion of the author; and indeed they are altogether out of harmony with the context. This early date of the first nine books will explain the fact that in viii. 13 Eusebius speaks of the Martyrs of Palestine as a projected work. “If this view of the date of the History be true, the book gains an additional interest. It becomes itself the last great literary monument of the period which it describes. It belongs not only in substance, but also in theological character to the ante-Nicene age. It gathers and arranges in a form anterior to the age of dogmatic definition, the experience, the feelings, the hopes of a body which had just accomplished its sovereign success, and was conscious of its inward strength.” [W.]

---

1 The corresponding passage in Suidas (n. Ἀρμον) shows how by a slight change of expression the same statement may be imputed to Eusebius. Nicetas Choniates (Hist. V. 9) says, "Sola vero Philostorgius libro Historiarum secundo Paulinum Tyro Antiochianum translatum est nunc est." This statement is not strictly accurate, for Eusebius himself mentions his translation to Antioch; but Philostorgius, if rightly represented, is alone in placing the incident after the removal of Eustathius. A.D. 330.

The work contains no indications that it was due to any suggestion from without, as some have supposed. If the author had been prompted to it by Constantine he would hardly have been silent about the fact, for he is only too ready elsewhere to parade the flatteries of his imperial patron. Moreover, it was probably written in great measure, or at least the materials for it were collected, before his relations with Constantine began to grow so dangerous as to lead him to seek a new sphere. In this respect it grew out of a previous work, the Chronicile. In his preface he speaks of it as an expansion (παραστάσεις τοῦ έκθέσεως) of the narrative which he had given in epitome in this last-mentioned work. Accordingly, in the opening words, in which he sums up its contents, he places the chronological element in the forefront: “The successions of the holy apostles together with the times which have been accomplished from the days of our Saviour to our own age.” But though the first suggestion of the work may have been derived from the Chronicile, the central conception is entirely different and more concrete. The Jewish priesthood, including a discussion of the Saviour’s genealogy; thus shewing that it came in the fulness of time as a realisation of the prophecies (c. 5–10). Then follows an account of the personalities employed in the announcement of the Kingdom and the foundation of the Christian church, including, on the one hand, the first heralds of the Gospel (c. 11), another to the appointment of the twelve and the seventy (c. 12); a third to the mission sent by Christ Himself to Edessa, as recorded in the archives of that city (c. 13). We are thus brought to the time of the Ascension.

So the first book ends. The second comprises the preaching of the apostles to the destruction of Jerusalem, the writer’s aim being not to repeat the accounts in the New Testament, but to supplement them with notices from external sources. The third book extends to the reign of Trajan and covers the sub-apostolic age, ending with the voluntary retirement of the apostles, Clement of Rome (c. 19).

The fourth and fifth carry us forward to the close of the second century, including the Montanist, Quartodeciman, and Monarchian disputes. The sixth contains the period from the persecution of Severus (A.D. 203) to that of Decius (A.D. 250), the central figure being Origen, of whom a full account is given. The seventh continues the narrative to the outbreak of the great persecution under Diocletian, and is made up in great measure of quotations from Dionysius of Alexandria, as we are warned in the preface (Διονυσίου άθώς φωναίς συνεχομένης). It is significant that the last forty years of this period, though contemporaneous with the history of the church, are but briefly alluded to in a single long chapter. It was a period of very rapid but silent progress, when the Church for the first time was in the happy condition of having no history. The eighth gives the history of the persecution of Diocletian till the “palinode,” the edict of Galerius (A.D. 311). The ninth gives the story of the sufferings of the Christians until the victory over Maxentius at the Milvian bridge in the West, and the death

Y 2
The two points which require consideration are (1) the range and adequacy of his materials; (2) the use made of these materials.

1. The range of materials is astonishing when we consider that Eusebius was a pioneer breaking new ground. Some hundred works, in several cases very lengthy works, are either directly cited or referred to as read. When we remember that in many instances he would read an entire treatise through for the sake of one or two historical notices, while in many others he must have done the same without finding anything which would serve his purpose, we are able to form some conception of the enormous labour involved in the work. That in is strongest point. Yet even here deficiencies may be noted. He very rarely quotes the works of hierarchs themselves, being content to give their opinions through the medium of their opponents' refutations. A still greater defect is his ignorance of Latin literature and of Latin Christendom generally; he had no knowledge of Tertullian's works, except the Apologeticum, which he quotes (ii. 25, iii. 20, 35, v. 5) from a bad Greek translation (e.g. ii. 25, where the translator, being ignorant of the Latin idiom cum maxime, makes shipwreck of the sense). Of Tertullian himself he gives no account. But in his letter to Olympius (vi. 32), he calls himself a Roman, and in this letter he only knows through Tertullian (iii. 33), and is unacquainted with the name of the province which Pliny governed. Of Hippolytus again he has very little information to communicate, and cannot even tell the name of his see (vi. 20, 22). His account of Cyril too is meagre in the extreme (vi. 45, vii. 5), though Cyril was a source of much information. He figures in western Christendom, and died (A.D. 258) not very long before his own birth. He betrays the same ignorance also with regard to the bishops of Rome. His dates here, strangely enough, are widest of the mark in the latter half of the 3rd century, close upon his own time. Thus he assigns to Xystus I. (A.D. 296) 14 years (vii. 37) instead of eleven years; to Eutychianus (+ A.D. 283) ten months (vii. 32) instead of nearly nine years; to Gaius, whom he calls his own contemporary, and who died long after he had arrived at manhood (A.D. 296), “about fifteen years” (vii. 32) instead of twelve. He seems to have had a corrupt list, and he did not possess the knowledge necessary to correct it. With the Latin language indeed he appears to have had no thorough acquaintance, though he sometimes ventured to translate Latin documents (iv. 8, 9; comp. vii. 17). But he must not be held responsible for the blunders in the versions of others, e.g. of Tertullian's Apologeticum.

2. Under the second head the most vital question is the sincerity of Eusebius. Did he tamper with his materials or not? The sarcasm of Gibbon (Decline and Fall, c. xvi) is well known: “The gravest of the ecclesiastical historians. Eusebius himself, indirectly confesses that he has related whatever might redound to the glory, and that he has suppressed all that could tend to the disgrace of religion. Such an acknowledgment will naturally excite a suspicion that a writer who has so openly violated one of the fundamental laws of history, has not paid a very strict regard to the observance of the other. The passages to which he refers (H. E. viii. 3; Mart. Pol. 12) do not bear out this imputation. They are contrary to what he otherwise deprecates. The very terms which they contain, in the most emphatic terms, the evils which disgraced the church, and they represent the persecution under Diocletian as a just retribution for these wrongdoings. The ambitions, the intriguing for office, the factious quarrels, the cowardly denials and shipwrecks of the faith,—"evil piled upon evil" (κακά κακών ἐπισκέψεως)—are denounced in no measured language. But the writer contents himself with condemning these sins and shortcomings of Christians in general terms, without entering into details, and declares his intention of confining his remarks upon the events that he predicts (ὑπὲρ ὁσιολογίας) to his own and future generations. This treatment may be regarded as too great a sacrifice to edification. It may discredit his conception of history; but it leaves no imputation on his honesty. The special charges against his honour as a narrow-minded person. There is no ground whatever for the surmise that Eusebius forged or interpolated the passage from Josephus relating to our Lord, quoted in H. E. i. 11, though Heinichen (iii. p. 623 sqq., Mect. ii.) is disposed to entertain the charge. Inasmuch as this passage is contained in all our extant MSS, and there is sufficient evidence that other interpolations (though not this) were introduced into the text of Josephus long before his time (see Orig. c. Cels. i. 47, Delarue's note), no suspicion can justly attach to Eusebius himself. Another interpolation in the Jewish historian, which he quotes elsewhere (H. E. 29), was certainly known to Origen (l. c.). Doubtless also the omission of the owl in the account of Herod Agrippa's death (H. E. ii. 10) was already in some texts of Josephus (Ant. xix. 8, 2). The manner in which Eusebius deals with his very numerous quotations elsewhere, where we can test his honesty, is a sufficient vindication against this unwarranted charge.

1 It is not the substitution of an angel for an owl, as the case is not uncommonly stated. The result is produced mainly by the omission of some words in the text of Josephus, which runs thus: 'Ἀναγέννησις ἐκείνη ἐν οἴνοις τῆς ἐκείνου κοβαλίας ὑπὲρ-καθέμενον εἶναι άνδράς (καὶ σημαίνεται τυχόν), ἔγειραν τῶν τοῖν οὐκ ἐκ τοῦ κακοῦ σύνετον κακῶν εἶναι τῶν κακῶν τῶν ἁμαρτωλῶν. The words bracketed are omitted and κακῶν is added after σύνετον, so that the sentence runs, εἶναι ἄρα τοῖν τούτον κακῶν ἐκ τοῦ κακοῦ σύνετον κακῶν εἶναι ἀνδράς. This being so, I do not feel at all sure that the change (by whomever made) was dictated by any diabolical motive. A scribe, unacquainted with Latin, would stumble over τὸν βουκάνα which had a wholly different meaning and seems never to be used of an owl in Greek; and he would alter the text in order to extend his verse out of it. In the preceding mention of the bird (Ant. xviii. 6, 7), Josephus or his translator gives it as a Latin name, βουκάνα δὲ οὖν τῶν Σαρακέων τοῦ οἴνου τοῦ κακοῦ. Miller (quoted by Bright, p. xiv) calls this "the one case in which, so far as he recollic, the..." Moreover, Eusebius is generally careful not only to collect the best evidence accessible, but also to distinguish between different kinds of evidence. "Almost every page witnesses to the zeal with which he collected testimonies from writers who lived at the time of the events which he describes. For the sixth and seventh books he evidently rejoices to be able to use for the foundation of his narrative the contemporary letters of Dionysius; 'Dionysius, our great bishop of Alexandria, he writes,' will again help me by his own words in the composition of my seventh book of the history, since he relates in order the events of his own time in the letters which he has left' (vii. praef. †). In accordance with this instinctive desire for original testimony, Eusebius scrupulously distinguishes facts which rest on documentary from those which rest on oral evidence. Some things he relates on the authority of a general' (iii. 11, 36) or old report' (iii. 19, 20) or from tradition (i. 7, ii. 5, vii. 2, 5). In the lists of successions he is careful to notice where written records fail, 'I have not the least idea how any means find the chronology of the bishops of Jerusalem preserved in writing; thus much only I received from written sources, that there were fifteen bishops in succession up to the date of the siege under Hadrian, &c.' (iv. 5). [W.] There is nothing like hearing the actual words of the writer, he says again and again (i. 23, iii. 32, viii. 23; comp. iv. 23), when introducing a quotation.

"The general sincerity and good faith of the historian appear therefore to be assured. But his intellectual qualifications for his task were in many respects defective. His credulity indeed has frequently been much exaggerated. "Undoubtedly he relates many incidents which may seem to us incredible, but, when he does so, he gives the evidence on which they are recommended to him. At one time it is the express testimony of some well-known writer, at another a general tradition, at another an observation by himself (v. 7, vi. 9, vii. 17, 18)" [W.]. The most remarkable passage bearing on the question is one in which he recounts his own experience during the last persecution in Palestine (Mart. Pol. 9). "There can be no doubt about the occurrence which Eusebius here describes, and it does not appear that he can be reproached for adding the interpretation which his countrymen placed upon it. What he voices for we can accept as truth; what he records as a popular comment leaves his historical veracity and judgment unimpaired." [W.] Gibbon (c. xvi) describes the character of Eusebius as "less tainted with credulity, and more practised in the arts of courts, than that of almost any of his contemporaries." A far more serious drawback to his value as a historian is the loose and uncritical spirit in which he sometimes deals with his materials. This shews itself in diverse ways. (c) He is not always to be trusted in his discrimination of genuine and spurious documents. As regards the canon of Scripture indeed he..."
EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA

EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA
takes special pains; he lays down certain principles which shall guide him in the production of testimonies; and on the whole he adheres to these principles with fidelity (see Contemporary Review, Jan. 1875, p. 169 sq.). Yet elsewhere he adduces as genuine the correspondence of Christ and Abgarus (I. 19), though never treating it as canonical Scripture. The unworthy suspicion that Eusebius himself forged this correspondence which he asserted to be a translation of a Syriac original found in the archives of Edessa has been refuted by the discovery and publication of the original Syriac (The Doctrine of Addai the Apostle with an English Translation and Notes by G. Phillips, London, 1876; see Zahn, Götting. Alt. Anz. Feb. 6, 1877, p. 161 sq.; Contemporary Review, May 1877, p. 1157; a portion of this work had been published some time before in Cureton's Ancient Syriac Documents, p. 6 sq., London, 1864). Not his honesty, but his critical discernment was at fault. Yet he cannot be described as a critical historian, maintaining a position which, however untenable, has commended itself to Cave (H. L. i. p. 2) and Grabbe (Spic. Patr. i. p. 1 sq.), and other writers of this stamp, as defensible. This however is the most fragrant instance of misappreciation. On the whole, considering the great mass of spurious documents which were current in his age, we may well admire the discrimination with which he separates the false from the true, e.g. in the case of the numerous Clementine writings (iii. 16, 38), alleging the presence or the absence of external testimony for his decisions. Pearson's eulogy (Vind. Ipn. i. 8) on Eusebius, though exaggerated, is not undeserved. He is generally a safe guide in discriminating between the genuine and the spurious. (b) He is often careless in his manner of quoting. His quotations from Irenæus for instance lose much of their significance, even for his own purpose, by abstraction from their context (v. 8). His quotations from Papias (iii. 22) and from Irenæus (iii. 22, iv. 22) are tautologous by their brevity, for the exact bearing of the words could only have been learnt from the suppressed context. But with the exception of the passages from Josephus (where the blame, as we have seen, must be shifted to other shoulders) the quotations themselves are given with fair accuracy. (c) He draws hasty and unwarranted inferences from his authorities, and altogether he is loose in interpreting their bearing. This is his weakest point as a critical historian. Thus he quotes the passages of Josephus respecting the census of Quirinus and the insurrections of the Thudas and of Judas the Galilean, as if they agreed in all their points and in all their details, and does not notice the chronological difficulties (I. 5, 9; i. 11). He addsuces the Jewish historian as a witness to the assignment of a text to Lyssianas (I. 9), though in fact he says nothing about this Lyssianas in the passage in question, but elsewhere mentions an earlier (I. 21) and more authentic rule of life, which he assigns to a bishop of Antioch, named Athen (Ant. xx. 7. 1; B. J. ii. 11. 5). He represents this same writer as stating that Herod Antipas was banished to Vienne (I. 11), whereas Josephus sends Archelaus to Vienne (B. J. ii. 7. 3) and Herod Antipas to Lyons (Ant. xviii. 7. 2); but in B. J. ii. 5. 6, Spain is given as the place of exile. He quotes Philo's description of the Jewish Therapeutae, as if it related to a body of Christian ascetics (i. 17). He gives, side by side, the contradictory accounts of the death of James the Just in Josephus and Hegesippus, as if the one tallied with the other (i. 23). He entangles himself in a hopeless confusion between the imperial brothers M. Aurelius and L. Verus (v. proem., 4, 5) from a misunderstanding of his documents, though in the Chronicle (p. 170) he is substantially correct with regard to these emperors. And examples of such carelessness in the use of his materials might be largely increased. (d) He is very deficient in his treatment. We have not unfrequently to pick out from various parts of his work the notices bearing on one definite and limited subject. He relates a fact, or quotes an authority bearing upon it, in season or out of season, according as it is recalled to his memory by some accidental connexion. "Nothing can illustrate" is characteristic both of the manner in which he deals with the canons of the New Testament. After mentioning the martyrdoms of St. Peter and St. Paul at Rome, he proceeds at once (iii. 3) without any further preface to enumerate the writings attributed to them respectively, distinguishing those which were generally received among the ancients from those which were disputed. At the same time he adds a notice of the Shepherd, because it had been attributed by some to the Hermas mentioned by St. Paul. After this he resumes his narrative, and then having related the last labours of St. John he gives an account of the writings attributed to him (iii. 24), promising a further discussion of the Apocalypse, which however does not appear. This catalogue is followed by some fragmentary discussions on the Gospels, to which a general classification of all the books claiming to have apostolic authority is added. When this is ended, the history suddenly goes back to a point in the middle of the former book (ii. 15); and he has no notice of an incident for the sake of adding some new detail, yet so as to mar the symmetry of his work." [W.] Examples of this fault occur in the accounts of the first preaching at Edessa (i. 13, ii. 1), of the writings of Clement of Rome (iii. 16, 38; iv. 22, 23, &c.), of the daughters of Philip (iii. 39, 39; comp. v. 17, 24), and in many other cases.

The History of Eusebius was early translated into the two languages which shared with the Greek by far the largest part of the whole area of Christendom. The Syriac version is preserved in great part in two MSS: one at St. Petersburg, dated A.D. 452, and containing books i–iv, viii–x, and xii, and the other in the British Museum (Add. 14,639 described in Wright's Catalogue, p. 1039), belonging to the 6th century and containing books i–v (with some mutilations in the beginning of the first book). As there were among the companions of Pamphilus persons who made it their business to translate the Greek into Syriac (see above, p. 310), and as other works of Eusebius were certainly translated into this latter language very soon after they were written (see pp. 320, 332), we may infer that this Syriac version of the Histor
EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA
dates not many years after the original, and perhaps during the lifetime of the author himself. Dr. Wright is preparing an edition of this version, of which he has given a specimen
(i. 1-4) in Dindorf's præf. p. xviii sq. The old Latin version was made by Rufinus, who, as usual, deals very freely with his original. He abridges and even inserts at pleasure. The work is accompanied by a continuation from his own pen, carrying the history down to the death of Theodosius the Great. The exact date of this translation is uncertain, but the possible limits are narrow. In the preface Rufinus mentions that Chronatius, to whom it is dedicated, imposed the task upon him at a time when Alaric was laying Italy waste. Alaric first invaded Italy A.D. 402, and the version therefore should probably be dated soon after. Chronatius died A.D. 406. The best edition is that of Cociari, Rome, 1740. The work is the subject of an important monograph by Kimmel, de Rufino Eusebi Interpretæ, Gerae, 1538. See also Ebert, Christi Latini. Literatur. p. 310 sq.
(Leipzig, 1874).
The edicto princes of the Greek of Eusebius's History is that of Stephana, Paris, 1544. The following are the principal editors after Stephens.
(1) Yalesius (Paris, 1655), who has contributed more largely than any one else to the criticism and elucidation of Eusebius. (2) Reading (Cambridge, 1720); together with the Ecclesiastical Histories of Socrates, Sozomen, etc. Reprinted reprinted Va-lei's translation and commentary with additions and corrections from this editor's manuscript notes, and supplemented it with materials from other writers. (3) Heinichen (Leipzig, 1827); a very important contribution, but superseded by his later edition, of which an account is given below. (4) Strauh (Halae ad Salam. 1779).
The first volume only appeared, containing books 1-11. (5) Burton (Oxford, 1838); the text, the translation of Valerius, and apparatus criticus, to which was prefixed, some new and important contribtutions. This was followed in A.D. 1842 by two volumes of various notes and excursuses, issued by the Oxford press, containing the labours of Valerius, Heinichen, and others. Burton died before the edition was completed (1838), and it was brought out by anonymous friends. (6) Schaff (New York, 1866). This is a very local apparatus, but no explanatory notes; a connvenient edition with useful indices. (7) Laemmer (Scaphsia, 1862). This is the most important edition for the criticism of the text, the editor having made large additions to the existing materials; but it has no explanatory notes. (8)
The edition of Heinichen in his Eusebius Pam-philus Scripta Historica (Lipsiae, 3 vols., 1868, 1869, 1870), which includes also the Vita Constantini, the Panegyricus (de Laudibus Con-stantinis), and the Constantin ad Sanctorum Coronam Oratio. This is the most complete and useful edition, comprising prolegomena, text, apparatus criticus, explanatory notes, excursuses, and indices. The editor has revised and supplemented his former work, making use of the materials which have accumulated since the appearance of his first edition. To these editions should be added, as the most recent text and convenient for use, that of W. Dindorf in Tragia Series, 3 vols., 240 pp., (Leipzig, 1871).
Monographs on the Ecclesiastical History are very numerous. The following may be mentioned: Müller, de Fide Eusebi in Archi Christiani episcopi. Havn. 1813; Darm, de Eusebi Caesarensi Historiae Ecclesiasticae Scriptore, etc., Jenae, 1815; Keuster, de Eusebi Historiae Ecclesiasticae Compendio Auctoriali, etc., Got-tingae, 1816; Ruterdale, de Fontibus Hist.
Ecclest. Eusebii, Lond. Goth. 1826; Holy, Eusebe de
The writer of the present article has also had the advantage of consulting some manuscript notes of Dr. Westcott, from which extacts have been given above with the initial [W.]. Particular points are more fully treated in special works; e.g. the list of Roman bishops
by Lipsius, Die Papstzeitgeschichte des Eusebius, Kiel, 1866, and Chronologie der Römischen Bisschöfe, Kiel, 1869.

(6) Life of Constantine [Op. ii. 905 sq.], in four books. The date of this work is fixed within narrow limits. It was written after the death of the great emperor who is its subject (May 337) and by his three sons of which declared Augusti (Sept. 337); see iv. 68.
On the other hand, the death of the author himself was not later than A.D. 340 (see above, p. 318).
Gothofred (Philostorg. Eccl. Hist. vii. 3, and elsewhere) denied its genuineness; but this opinion does not deserve serious refutation.
The work is not named indeed by Jerome, but then he himself implies that his catalogue is far from complete (Vit. Ill. 81). On the other hand, it is directly mentioned by Socrates (H. E. i. 1, v.
22) and largely used by writers of the 5th century, and it bears manifest traces of Eusebius's own. Photius also gives an account of it (Bibl.
127), styling it eis Konstantinon tou megan basileia ekklesiastikeuparhion. Eusebius
does not profess to give a complete or general
biography of Constantine. He distinctly states
that he intended to pass over his military exploits
and his legislative enactments, and to confine
himself to the religious life (μην επελθη
ekklesiastikeuparhion. Eusebius
does not profess to give a complete or general
biography of Constantine. He distinctly states
that he intended to pass over his military exploits
and his legislative enactments, and to confine
himself to the religious life (μην επελθη
ekklesiastikeuparhion. Eusebius
does not profess to give a complete or general
biography of Constantine. He distinctly states
that he intended to pass over his military exploits
and his legislative enactments, and to confine
himself to the religious life (μην επελθη
ekklesiastikeuparhion. Eusebius
does not profess to give a complete or general
biography of Constantine. He distinctly states
that he intended to pass over his military exploits
and his legislative enactments, and to confine
himself to the religious life (μην επελθη
ekklesiastikeuparhion. Eusebius
does not profess to give a complete or general
biography of Constantine. He distinctly states
that he intended to pass over his military exploits
and his legislative enactments, and to confine
himself to the religious life (μην επελθη
ekklesiastikeuparhion. Eusebius
does not profess to give a complete or general
biography of Constantine. He distinctly states
that he intended to pass over his military exploits
and his legislative enactments, and to confine
himself to the religious life (μην επελθη
ekklesiastikeuparhion. Eusebius
does not profess to give a complete or general
biography of Constantine. He distinctly states
that he intended to pass over his military exploits
and his legislative enactments, and to confine
himself to the religious life (μην επελθη
ekklesiastikeuparhion. Eusebius
does not profess to give a complete or general
biography of Constantine. He distinctly states
that he intended to pass over his military exploits
and his legislative enactments, and to confine
himself to the religious life (μην επελθη
ekklesiastikeuparhion. Eusebius
does not profess to give a complete or general
biography of Constantine. He distinctly states
that he intended to pass over his military exploits
and his legislative enactments, and to confine
himself to the religious life (μην επελθη
ekklesiastikeuparhion. Eusebius
does not profess to give a complete or general
biography of Constantine. He distinctly states
that he intended to pass over his military exploits
and his legislative enactments, and to confine
himself to the religious life (μην επελθη
ekklesiastikeuparhion. Eusebius
does not profess to give a complete or general
biography of Constantine. He distinctly states
that he intended to pass over his military exploits
and his legislative enactments, and to confine
himself to the religious life (μην επελθη
ekklesiastikeuparhion. Eusebius
does not profess to give a complete or general
biography of Constantine. He distinctly states
that he intended to pass over his military exploits
and his legislative enactments, and to confine
himself to the religious life (μην επελθη
ekklesiastikeuparhion. Eusebius
does not profess to give a complete or general
biography of Constantine. He distinctly states
that he intended to pass over his military exploits
and his legislative enactments, and to confine
himself to the religious life (μην επελθη

quence of language befitting a panegyric, as if he were pronouncing an encomium, than to the accurate narrative of the events which took place." But with all this there is no ground for suspecting him of misrepresenting the facts. Suppression rather than invention is the fault of the work. He has given us no shadow in his portrait, and Constantine's character was marked with some very dark lines. With this important qualification, his biography has the highest value. It is a vivid picture of certain aspects of a great personality, painted by one who was familiarly acquainted with him and had access to important documents. It may be fulsome and maudlin in its fulsome ness; but flattery is a word quite out of place. Flattery cannot pierce the sealed grave; and the language which he uses of the reigning sovereign does not overstep the bounds of the conventional homage expected in those ages from a loyal subject. It may even be set down to the credit of Eusebius that his praises of Constantine are much louder after his death, than they ever were during his lifetime. In this respect he contrasts favourably with the meanness of Seneca in blackening the memory of the very sovereign whom a short time before he had extolled to the skies. Nor shall we do justice to Eusebius if we endeavor to find in his lavish praises which even heathen panegyrist lavished on the great Christian emperor before his face, as an indication of the spirit of the age. But after all excuses made, this indiscriminate praise of Constantine is a reproach from which we should gladly have held Eusebius free.

In his work on the council (he seems to be referring to his other writings, Eusebius has had no scruple in repeating himself. Some chapters are taken from the Ecclesiastical History; others from the Tricon- nial Oration; others again from the Theophania; but by far the greatest part of the work is new. Its most valuable portions are the letters and speeches of Constantine, and the author's personal reminiscences of Marcius. The headings of the chapters occasionally contain information which is not in the chapters themselves (e.g. iv. 44, where the name of Marcius is given). They must therefore have been added by some one acquainted with the facts, and presumably a contemporary. If the reasons given for Valois's doctrine of the inerrancy of Eusebius' tradition (xxxvi. 28) hold, we may naturally attribute them to his successor Acacius, who inherited his papers and may possibly have published the Life of Constantine as a posthumous work.

This work was first printed by Stephens with the Ecclesiastical History (A.D. 1548). It was also published with the same by Valois, and by Reading after Valois. Heinichen's first edition (Lipsiae, 1850) was independent of the Ecclesiastical History; but in his later revision of his work (A.D. 1869) it is included with the latter in the Scripta Historica of Eusebius (see above, p. 327). Various opinions respecting the date of the work exist. Engels (Hist. eccl., xiii. p. 746) attached to his notes (iii. p. 754). Phiotus (Lc.) criticizes it as too florid (ἀφθορίας) and forced (μεθάρμασθα) in style.

B. APOLLOGETIC.

(7) Against Hierocles [Op. iv. 795]. This work is not named by Jerome, but was read by Photius, EBZ 39. Hierocles was governor in Bithynia, and used his power ruthlessly to embitter the persecution which he is thought to have instigated (Lactant. Div. Inst. v. 2; Mort. Pers. 16; see Mason, Persecution of Diocletian, pp. 58, 108). If he was the same Hierocles who in the later years of the persecution ruled in Egypt, Eusebius had himself been an eye-witness of his cruelties (Mort. Pal. p. 18, ed. Cureton; comp. H. E. viii. 9). At all events he alludes in this work to the judicial functions of his adversary (c. Hieroc. 20, p. 524, τὰ δικαίωμα καὶ καθάλων δικαιώματα περιηγούμενος). But Hierocles, not satisfied with assailing the Christians from the tribunal, attacked them also with his pen. The title of his work, which consisted of two books, seems not to have been Ἔλλαθαι ἄριστος, as it is most commonly given after Pearson (p. 584), but Ἔλλαθαι simply, 'The Lover of Truth,' for Eusebius so styles it again and again (§ 1 twice, 4 several times, 14, 17, 25, 34, 36). It is not against his diocletianus [Div. Inst. v. 2, not contra Christiainos [καὶ Ἡρωδεαν], as if he were attacking enemies, but ad Christianos [πρὸς Χριστιανοὺς], as if he were reasoning with friends. Nevertheless it was a ruthless assault on Christianity, written in a biting style. Its main object was to expose the errors of the Christians, through an exaggerated account of the results of standing records. With this main part of the work however Eusebius does not concern himself. He says (§ 1) that it is shamelessly plundered, sometimes even verbatim, from previous assailants of Christianity like Celcus; that when the time comes it may perhaps be met by a special refe-ence of the work (he means to say that he is too busy to treatise against Porphyry, which he had either begun or projected at this time); and that meanwhile it had been virtually refuted by anticipation in Origens work. He therefore confines himself to one point—the comparison of Apollonius, as described in his Life by Philostratus, with our Saviour, to the disparagement of the latter. There is much diversity of opinion whether Philostratus himself intended to set up Apollonius as a rival to the Christ of the Gospels (APOLLONIUS OF TYANA), but Hiero-

cles at all events turned his romance to this use. On this point alone (which, by the way, is brought forward also by the philosopher Porphyry, whom Marcius refutes), does Eusebius credit Hierocles with originality.

Eusebius refutes his opponent with great moderation, and generally with good effect. He allows that Apollonius was a wise and virtuous man, but he refuses to concede the higher claims advanced on his behalf. He shows that the work of Philostratus was not based on satisfactory evidence; that the narrative is full of absurdities and contradictions; and that the moral character of Apollonius as therein portrayed is far from perfect. For this purpose he takes the eight books in succession, fastening on such points as serve his purpose. He maintains that the supernatural incidents, if they actually occurred, might have happened, might have been invented, or invented by men of meaner minds. At the conclusion (§ 46—48) he refutes and denounces the fatalism of Apollonius, as alone sufficient to discredit his character for wisdom. The book begins, "Well then, dear friend, is it not right?" as if it had been attached to something which went before. But this mode of expression is perhaps assumed to give it an air of

EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA

EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA 329

case. The work is correctly described by Photius as "a short treatise in refutation of the arguments of Hierocles in favour of Apollonius of Tyana" (ἀποκαταστάσεως βιβλίαδι πρὸς τὸν ὑπὸ Ἀπολλονίου τοῦ Τύανη Ἱεροκλῆς λόγον), and the titles in the MSS are to the same effect. It was probably one of the earliest works of Eusebius.

This treatise was first published by Alstus (Venet. 1592) with Philostratus's Vida Apollonii. It has been several times printed together with the work of Philostratus. The most convenient of recent editions are those of Gaisford, Eusebii Pamphili contra Hieroclem et Marcilium Libri (Oxon. 1852), and Kayser, Flavii Philostrati Opera, i. p. 369 sq. (Lipsiae, 1870, Teubner). An important aid is Pearson's Prolegomena in Hieroclem, reprinted in his Minor Works, ii. p. 575 sq.

(8) Against Porphyry (κατὰ Πορφύριον), an elaborate work in twenty-five books: Hieron. Epist. 70 ad Magn. 3 (i. p. 427, Vallarsi), Vir. Ill. 61. In the latter passage indeed the printed text is required much by the alteration of η ἀμακενοντικὴν τουτεστάτων πεπερατωμένην," but all Vallarsi's MSS "mio consensu" read "libri viginti quinque," omitting the other words. This accords with the notice in Epist. 70. The vulgar text therefore must be regarded as a later alteration, perhaps due to some confusion with another refutation of Porphyry by Apollinaris, which did contain thirty books and is mentioned elsewhere by Jerome in connexion with Eusebius. The alteration however is earlier than the Greek version of Sophronius, which agrees with the vulgar text. The work of Porphyry, which the treatise undertakes to refute, comprised fifteen books, and was the most formidable of the heathen attacks on the Biblical records: see Eldad, de Vit. et Script. Porph. c. xi. p. 273 sq. (reprinted in Fabric. Bibl. Græcæ. iv. p. 207 sq. c. 1); Tillemont, Empereurs. iv. p. 74 sq.; Fabric. Bibl. Græcæ. v. p. 746 sq. (ed. Harles); Neander, Gesch. der Kirche. (5. ed. p. 530 sq. (Bohn); Kellner in Theod. Quartalschr. xxvii. p. 60 sq. (1865). The ablust part of the work seems to have been the assault on the authenticity of Daniel in the 12th and 13th books, and to this Eusebius replied in the 18th, 19th, and 20th books of his refutation: Hieron. Comm. in Dan. passim. "In the same book," says Eusebius, "he treats of the use of the New Testament." For the correspondence of position in the attack and reply seems to show that Eusebius took the arguments of Porphyry in order from beginning to end.

It is strange that, though Eusebius again and again quotes from this very work against Christianity (H. E. vi. 19; Proph. Ev. i. 9. 20 sq.; v. 2 9 sq.; x. 9. 12), and elsewhere, when referring to other works by Porphyry, describes him as the author of this attack on the Christians (Proph. Ev. iv. 6. 2; v. 5. 4; vi. 36. 5; Den. Ev. iii. 7. 1), yet he never once (so far as I remember) mentions his own refutation. His silence may be explained with Valois by supposing that this refutation was written after these works in which Porphyry is mentioned, i.e. after A. D. 325. On the other hand, we have seen that he was already contemplating some such work at a much earlier date when he wrote his tract against Hierocles. The project would have been long delayed, and meanwhile he may have come to regard Porphyry as a foeman worthier of his steel than Hierocles. At all events there were personal circumstances, irrespective of the importance of Porphyry's work, which would lead Eusebius to notice it. He constantly speaks of Porphyry as a contemporary (δὲ καὶ ἡμῖν, H. E. vi. 19; Proph. Ev. i. 9. 20; iv. 6. 2; v. 2. 9), though he appears to have died in the very earliest years of the century. Porphyry was an Eastern, a native of Batanes, and had studied at Caesarea itself. If Socrates may be believed (H. E. iii. 23), he was at one time a Christian, but having received blows from some Christians, he apostatized in vexation at this treatment. This however is a typical story, which is reproduced in various forms of others, so that no weight attaches to it. On the other hand we have it on Porphyry's own authority (quoted in Euseb. H. E. vi. 19) that when young he had known Origen, and, as we may infer, had been his pupil. His disparagement and misrepresentation of this father, whom Eusebius regarded as the greatest of the ancient philosophers, is a reflection upon an admirer of Origen to refute the work in which the depreciation and misrepresentations occurred (see Euseb. H. E. i. c.).

It is strange that no part of this elaborate refutation has survived. Yet we may form some notion of its contents from the Propratio and Demonstratio Evangelica, in considerable portions of which Eusebius obviously has Porphyry in view, even where he does not mention him by name. To Jerome and Socrates the refutation of Eusebius seemed satisfactory. Philostorgius (H. E. viii. 14) preferred the similar work of Apollinaris to it, as also to the earlier refutation of Methodius. He himself however was induced to add another to these writings against Porphyry (H. E. x. 10). All the four refutations alike have perished, with the work which gave rise to them.

(9) Propratio Evangelica (Προπρατησις Ἐφηκτικας) [Op. iv. 9]. These two treatises in fact are parts of one great work. They are both dedicated to Theodotus, bishop of Lodoleis in Syria (Proph. Ev. i. 1. 1 below εὐαγγελιαν χρησα, an adherent of the Arian party, who held this see for some thirty years.

Various opinions have been held as to the time when these works were written. These have sometimes been based on erroneous data. Thus in Den. Ev. xii. 13. 17, Eusebius has been supposed to refer to his History, but S. Augustin, l. c., there means "my personal investigations." Thus again in two passages in the H. E. i. 3. 6, he has been understood as referring to the Demonstratio; but the first reference is certainly to the Elogia Propheticae, and the second would be satisfied as well by H. E. vii. 7. 34. 45 (p. 149 sq.) as by Den. Ev. viii. 2. Thus it is indeed a direct reference to the Quaestiones ad Stephanus in Dem. Ev. vii. 3. 18; but the difficulties which beset the date of that work and the existence of a cross reference in it to the Demonstratio (see below, p. 338) deprive this notice of any value. All these notices falling us, we have recourse to the allusions to contemporary events. In Dem. Ev. iii. 5. 76 he says that "the confusion of the name of Jesus is wont to inflame the wrath of the rulers," so that they inflict the severest punishments on the Christians though innocent (comp. iv. 16. 22). This passage seems to have been written before the cessation of the persecution (A.D. 312). On the other hand, in v. 3. 11 he speaks of "churches flourishing (ἀρεσκαλουσι) throughout the world" in language which implies that the Christians then enjoyed peace; and in vi. 20. 17 he describes the enemies of the Gospel in Egypt as plotting to extinguish it, but "being scattered (ἀκαίρως καίρως) by God," language which implies that the tyranny of Hierocles was over, and that the cause of the Church had received a most favorable turn. See Tillemont, vii. p. 23 sq. Again, Praxip. xii. 10. 5 alludes to the persecution in language which seems to show that it had not long ceased (εἰσελθεῖν δὲ τὴν σειρά). On the other hand, Praxip. x. 9. 11 contains a direct reference to the Chronicle and this may perhaps be regarded as a reference inserted after the MSS. were published. See the two editions of the Chronicle (see above, p. 322). In the absence of more direct testimony therefore, we may infer that these works were begun during the persecution, but not concluded till some time after.

The Preparation is extant entire and comprises fifteen books. It is introduced by Jerome (l. c.), and by Photius (l. c.), who both give the number of the books. The Demonstratio on the other hand is incomplete. It consisted originally of twenty books (Hieron. l. c., Photius Bobb. 10). Of these, only the first ten are extant in the MSS., but an extract from the fifteenth was discovered and published by Mai (Script. Vet. Nov. Cl. i. 2, p. 173) from a commentary on Daniel; and Jerome, Comm. in Hos. praef. (Op. vi. p. xxiii), refers to the eighteenth. In the older editions the beginning of the first book and the end of the tenth are mutilated. The missing portions of these two books were first supplied by J. A. Fabricius (Delt. Argum. etc. Hamburgi, 1739) from a MS. in the possession of Mourovratoci, prince of Wallachia. Nicephorus Callistus (H. E. vi. 37) gives ten as the number of books, so that it was already mutilated in his time. There is, so far as I am aware, no evidence that these works were translated into Syriac. They are not mentioned in Eusebius, and may be regarded as the most complete version of all the Greek books of the Theophanes, where the apologetic of Eusebius is given in a shorter form, satisfied the demands of the Syrian Church.

The Preparation begins with a preface, which serves as an introduction to the whole work. It sketches briefly what the Gospel is, and then advances to the main subject, that the Christians accept their religion by faith without investigation. The whole work is an answer to this taunt. Taken in conjunction with the opening chapters of the Demonstratio, this introduction conveys an adequate idea of the design of Eusebius. The object of the Preparation is to justify the Christians in transferring their allegiance from the religion and philosophy of the Greeks to the sacred books of the Hebrews. The object of the Demonstratio is to show from those sacred books themselves that they did right in not stopping short at the religious practices and beliefs of the Jews, but adopting a different mode of life. Thus the Preparation is an apology for Christianity as against the Gentiles, while the Demonstratio defends it as against the Jews, and "yet not" he adds, "against the Jews, nay, far from it, but rather for the Jews, if they would learn wisdom" (ὁ ... κατὰ Ἰουδαίους, κατὰ, κατα, τὸ αυτοῦ τούτου νοέως, τὸ νοέως τούτου). Thus the two treatises form one comprehensive work. It is a justification of the anomalous position of the Christians, so unintelligible to the ancient world, with which religion was essentially a matter of nationality and patriotism, and appearing to them as "a novel route through a trackless waste, descrying the paths of Jewish and Greek alike" (Praxip. i. 2. 9). At κατὰ δὲ τὴν ἐκκλησίαν ὑπάγων ἐντὸς τοῦ Ἱουδαίου πολέμου. Accordingly the writer on his part "invokes the aid of the God of all alike, whether Jews or Greeks," in the Saviour's name to assist him in his task (Dem. Ev. i. 1. 19). He claims originality for his comprehensive plan, as contrasted with the partial labors of his predecessors and exegetes (Praxip. Ev. i. 3. 4). It is a challenge thrown down to the whole non-Christian world.

Of the contents of the Preparation a summary is given at the beginning of the last book (v. i. 1–7). In the first, second, and third books he attacks the mythology of the heathen, refutes the absurdity, and refutes the physiological interpretations put upon the myths; in the fourth, fifth, and sixth, he discusses the oracles, and connects therewith the sacrifices to demons and the doctrine of fate; in the seventh, eighth, and ninth, he passes on to "the Hebrew Oracles," explaining their bearing, and reduces the testimony of heathen writers in their favour; in the tenth, eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth, he remarks on the plagiarisms of the Greek philosophers from the Hebrews, dwelling on the priority of the Hebrew Scriptures, and shews how all that is best in Greek teaching and speculation agrees with them; in the fourteenth he directs attention to the contradictions among Greek philosophers, pointing out how those systems which are opposed to Christian belief have been condemned by the wisest Gentile philosophers themselves; and lastly, in the fifteenth, he exposes the falsehoods and errors of the Greek systems of philosophy, more especially the Peripatetics, the Cynics, and the Stoics, and makes the version of all the schools. He thus considers that he has given a complete answer to those who charge the Christians with transferring their allegiance from Hellenism to Hebraism blindly and without knowledge.

In the Demonstratio, the first and second books are against the Jews (Dem. Ev. i. 1. 1. 14–15. In the first a sketch is given of the Gospel teaching, and reasons are alleged why the Christians, while adopting the Hebrew Oracles, should depart from the Jewish mode of life; a distinction being drawn between Hebraism, the religion of all godly men from the beginning, and Judaism, the temporary and special system of the Jews, so that Christianity is a continuation of the former, but a departure from the latter. In the second, testimonies are adduced from the prophets to show that the two great phenomena of the Christian Church had been foretold long ago—the general gathering of the Gentiles and the general falling away of the Jews—so that the Christians "were only laying claim to their own" (Ecclesiasticus 1:1). With the third book begins the main subject of the treatise (σύνοψις τῶν βιβλίων). In this third book he promises to speak of the humanity (φιλικά τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ) of Christ, as corresponding to the predictions of the prophets; but the topics are introduced in a desultory way (e.g., that Christ was not a sorcerer, that the apostles were not deceivers, etc.) without any very obvious connexion with the main theme, though otherwise this is one of the most important books in the treatise. In the fourth and fifth books he passes on to the divinity of Christ, but time of the crucifixion. What topics were comprised in the remaining ten books has no data for determining, but we may conjecture with Stein (p. 102) that they dealt with the burial, resurrection, and ascension, and perhaps also with the foundation of the Christian Church and the Second Advent. The extinct fragment of the eighth book relates to the four kingdoms of Daniel ii. The reference in Jerome (c. c.) to the eighteenth book speaks of the author as there "discussing some matters respecting the prophet Hosea."

This great apologetic work exhibits the same merits and defects which we find elsewhere in Eusebius. There is the same greatness of conception marred by the same inadequacy of execution, the same profusion of learning combined with the same inability to control his materials, which we have seen in his History. The divisions are not kept distinct; the topics start up unexpectedly and out of season. But with all its faults, this is probably the most important apologetic work of the early church. It necessarily lacks the historical interest of the apologetic writings of the 2nd century; it falls far short of the thoughtfulness and penetration which give a permanent value to Origen's treatise against Celsus as a defence of the faith; it lags behind the Latin apologists in rhetorical vigour and expression. But the forcible and true conceptions which it exhibits from time to time, more especially bearing on the theme which may be briefly designated "God in history," arrest our attention now, and must have impressed his contemporaries still more strongly; while in learning and comprehensiveness it is without a rival. The Preparation exhibits the same wide range of acquaintance with the classical writers of Greece which the History exhibits in the domain of Christian literature. The list of writers quoted or referred to is astonishing for its length (see Fabric. Bibl. Gracc. vii. p. 340). Some of these are only known to us even by name through Eusebius, and of several others he has preserved large portions which are not otherwise extant. The range of his quotations from extant writers may be inferred from the fact that he quotes not less than twenty-one works of Plato, and that there are between fifty and sixty quotations from the Laws alone. It was chiefly the impression produced by this mass of learning which led Scaliger to describe it as "divini commentarii," and Cave to call it "opus profecto nobilissimum" (H. L. i. p. 178).

The first editions of the Greek of the Proparapato and Demonstratio were those of Stephens, A.D. 1544 and A.D. 1545 respectively. The Proparapato afterwards edited by Bengas (Viguier), Paris, 1628, who revised the text, translated the work afresh into Latin, and added notes. The most important edition is that of Gaisford (4 vols., Oxon. 1843), who revised the text and gave a full critical apparatus, reprinting the translation and notes of Viguer. In 1846, Seguier published a new translation with notes. These notes are reprinted in Migne (iii. p. 1457 sq.). The Demonstratio also was edited by Gaisford (2 vols., Oxon. 1852), with critical apparatus and translation. The Latin translation was made by Bernardino Donato, 1498. The most recent text of both the Proparapato and Demonstratio is that of W. Diendorf in Teubner's series, 1887. The Proparapato and Demonstratio are the main subject of a monograph of Haenell de Eusebio Caesariensis Religionis Christianae Defensore (Gottingen, 1843).

(11) Proparapato Ecclesiasticus (Ἐξηγησιακὴν Ἀρθραῖον), mentioned by Photius (Bibl. 11), and—

(12) Demonstratio Ecclesiasticus (Ἐξηγησιακὴν Ἀρθραῖον Ἀνθείου), also mentioned by Photius (Bibl. 12).

The first of these works does not appear to be mentioned elsewhere. The second is named in the Jus Gentium-Romanum (i. iv. p. 586, ed. Leunclav.), but the reference conveys no information as to its contents. Photius merely gives, or rather gave, the number of books in each (the numbers have been obliterated), and adds in the case of the Proparapato Ecclesiasticus, that it contained extracts. Thus we are left to conjecture. The names however, combined with the one fact which Photius does mention, suggest that these two works aimed at doing for the society what the Proparapato and Demonstratio Evangelica do for the doctrines of which the society is the depository. If so, there seems to be an allusion to the Demonstratio Ecclesiasticus in the Proparapato Evangelica (i. 3. 11), where Eusebius speaks of having gathered together in a special work (ἐν ὕσσω Συλλογῇ) the sayings of Christ relative to the foundation of His Church and compared them with the events. In this case we may suppose that those portions of the Theophania (book iv) which relate to this subject were adapted from the Demonstratio Ecclesiasticus just as other portions (book v) are adapted from the Demonstratio Evangelica (see below, p. 333).

(13) Two Books of Objection and Defence (Ἐλάγχων καὶ Ἀπολογίας λόγως δύο), mentioned likewise by Photius (Bibl. 13). He adds that he also read "two others which, while they varied from the two former in some passages, were the same in all other respects both in the language and in the sentiments." In other words, they were two different editions of the same work, just as we have two editions of the Martyrion of Palestine. This book again is only known from Photius. He tells us that Eusebius in this work "introduces certain difficulties as alleged by the Greeks against our blameless religion (ἡθωρήματι), and solves them well, though not so in all respects" (καλῶς, εἰ καὶ μη ψυχόμενον, ἐκλεκτῶς). Cæs. (Hist. Lit. i. p. 182) strangely supposes that the purport of this work was a defense of himself against the charge of Arianism. This view is quite inconsistent with the language of Photius, which implies that it was an apology for the Christians against attacks of the heathen. The form is illustrated by a similar apologetic work, the recently discovered Apocritica of Macarius Magnes, where the Gentile philosopher alleges his objections and the Christian apologist answers them. The same is true of Eusebius, which mention here is justified. There is no special reference to the book in question. Having spoken of several works in succession by the same author, he adds at the close some general remarks on the style and opinions of the writer himself. There seems to be no discussion of this work in Exe. Theol. ii. 22 (p. 269, Gaissard).

(14) Divine Manifestation (Θεοφάνεια), in five books (Op. vi. 607 sq.). This work is mentioned in the lists of Jerome (Vet. eccl. ii. 81) and Eusebius (Assem. Bibl. Orient. iii. p. 18). It is quoted sometimes in the Catena as Ἐλάγχων θεοφανεία (πρ. p. 609, 618, 643, 655), but elsewhere as Θεοφάνεια simply. The simpler title accords with Jerome and with the heading of the Syriac version. This work was long supposed to be lost, except by Labbe, who believed that the five books of the Theophania mentioned by Jerome were the five extant books against Marcellus, imagining Θεοφάνεια to be a synonym for Ἐλάγχων. Meanwhile it was noticed that certain Catena in the Vienna and other libraries contained extracts purporting to be taken from the Theophania of Eusebius (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. v. p. 408, ed. Harle). At length fragments of the Greek original were published by Mai from Vatican MSS in his Script. Vet. Non. Cat. xvii. 24 (1836). A year later (A.D. 1842) the work was printed entire in a Syriac version by Dr. S. Lee, who in the following year also published an English translation with introduction and notes (Eusebius, Bishop of Caesarea, on the Theophania, etc., Cambridge, 1845). By the aid of this version, Mai (A.D. 1847) in his Script. Vet. Non. Cat. xvii. 24 (1848) published anew his Greek fragments collected and rearranged, including among them some extracts which he had before erroneously assigned to the commentary on St. Luke. This collection of Greek fragments is reprinted in Migne.

The Syriac MS which has preserved this work is the same which also contains the Martyrion of Palestine, and has been mentioned already (p. 320). As it is dated A.D. 411, and as the Syriac text already contains very many corruptions which point to several stages of transcription (see Lee, p. xiv sq., note, and passim), the version itself was probably contemporaneous, or nearly so, with the original work. The Greek text however had already undergone some few corruptions, as the rendering 'of stone' (= Akrotites) is Theoph. v. 2 (corresponding to ἡλίθος in the parallel passage of the Dem. Ec. iii. 7. 20) shows. The difficulty of rendering the involved and florid sentences of Eusebius into Syriac must have been enormous, and the translator has necessarily used much freedom in unravelling the constructions and reproducing the imagery; but on the whole he has expressed the meaning fairly well. He was not however a complete master of Greek idiom, as e.g. when he renders σαρκα καθαρσαν, said of St. Peter's crucifixion, "after he had died the flesh of Christ, instead of "heads downwards" (v. 31).

The subject of the Theophania is, as its name suggests, the manifestation of God in the incarnation of the Divine Word. The contents of the five books are as follows. (1) An account of the subject and the recipients of the revelation. As against the Nestorians the doctrine of the Incarnation is pressed on the other, the doctrine of the Word of God is insisted upon. His person and working are set forth. The polytheist and the pantheist are alike at fault. The Word is essentially one. His relation to the different grades of creation, and especially to man. The pre-eminence, character, destiny, and work of the Word. Simultaneous with, and necessary to the necessity of the revelation. The human race was degraded by gross idolatry with its accompanying immoralities. The philosophers could not rescue it. Plato had the clearest sense of the truth, and yet even he was greatly at fault. Meanwhile the demons of polytheism had maddened mankind, as we see from the human sacrifices and from the prevalence of wars. The demons too had shown their powerlessness; they could not defend their temples, and they did not force their overthrow. (3) The proof of the revelation. The evidence of its excellency and power as seen in its effects. For this end it was necessary that the Word should be incarnate, and that the earth should again be put to death, and should rise again. The change which has come over mankind in consequence. (4) The proof of the revelation continued. The evidence from the fulfillment of Christ's words—His prophecies respecting the extension of His kingdom, the trials of His Church, the destinies of His servants, and the fate of the Jews. The comparison of the several events of human history; that Christ was a sorcerer and a deceiver, and that He achieved all these results by magic, is discussed and answered.

Eusebius had no hesitation about repeating himself; and the Theophania is a notable example of this freedom from scruple. Large portions of it are treated over again in another work (p. 131, p. 132), and even verbatim in his other works. The coincidences with the Oration on the Triencania of Constantine are perhaps the most striking. Very considerable portions of the first and second books, and some three-fourths of the third book, will be found in this passage. (Comp. Thuc. 1. 2—34 with Lc. 11. § 8—12.) § 16; Theoph. ii. 1 sq. with L. C. 13, § 1 sq.; Theoph. ii. 79—81 with L. C. 9, § 2—7; Theoph. iii. 2—9 with L. C. 16, § 1—17, § 15, § 16—14, § 12; Theoph. iii. 45—60 with L. C. 15, § 1—8; besides other coincidences.) The plagiarisms from the Demonstratio are hardly less. The whole of the fifth book, with the exception of the opening chapter and an occasional paragraph here and there, will be found in Dem. Ev. iii. 3—11—iii. 7, 38, though the order is sometimes changed, and the coincidences are not always verbatim. Nor are these the only parallels between the two works. The Procoparatio also contributes its quota (comp. e.g. Theoph. ii. 53—64 with Prosp. Ev. iv. 15, 8—iv. 16, 15), though here the debt is not so large. It has been conjectured above (p. 331) that great parts of the fourth book were taken in like manner from a lost work, the Demonstratio Ecclesiastica.

The date of the Theophania is a matter of some interest. The place of writing is Caesarea (iv. 18), but it was only written after the triumph of Constantine and the restoration of peace to the Church. The persecution is over, and the persecutors have met with their punishment (iii. 20, v. 52). Polytheism is fast waning, and Christianiit is spreading everywhere (ii. 76, iii. 79). Lee however would place it soon after the restoration of peace, mainly on the ground that "whatever portions of this work are found either in the Procoparatio, the Demonstratio Evangelica, or the Oration of Landibus Constantinii, they there occur in no regular sequence of argument as they do in this work, especially in the latter, into which they have been carried evidently for the purpose of lengthening out a speech" (p. xxi sq.). On the relation of our treatise to these other works of Eusebius with which it has matter in common, the settlement of the date must mainly depend; but Lee appears to have misconceived these relations altogether. (1) As regards the Procoparatio and Demonstratio, the phenomena are occasionally such as can hardly be explained otherwise than by their priority to the Theophania. Thus in Prosp. Ev. iv. 16, 9, 10, we have two quotations from different parts of Porphyry (de Abst. ii. 56, followed by vi. ii. 27) in succession. The words at the joining run thus: "But even at the present hour the Loaves and Fishes are offered in the great city at the feast of Jupiter Latialis? And again he (Porphyry) says: From whence even at the present time not only in Arcadia at the Lycana, but in Carthage they all publicly offer human sacrifices to Cronus."

In the Theophania however (ii. 84), though Porphyry's language is repeated word for word, no indication is given that Eusebius is quoting from any one, and the two quotations are run into each other thus; "... of Jupiter Latialis. For even to the present time not only in Arcadia at the Lycanae, etc. The effect of this is so confusing that Lee has entirely misapprehended the meaning. By "the great city" is meant Rome, as the mention of Jupiter Latialis shews, that the two passages of Porphyry refer to two different human sacrifices in localities far apart. But Lee supposes that "the great city" is Megalopolis in Arcadia, and he boldly translates "et in Carthago," i.e. toux Anavulion) "to Jupiter," thus making one sacrifice of the two...
EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA

(15) On the Numerous Progeny of the Ancients (καὶ τῶν καλών ἀδῶνον πολυγυμνιᾶς). The title of this lost treatise is taken from Prav. Ec. vii. 8. 29, where Eusebius mentions it. It is doubtless the same work to which St. Basil refers (de Spir. Sanct. 29, Op. iii. p. 61) as De progeni in antiquis. The place of this work is (καὶ τῶν ἄρχων πολυγυμνιᾶς). The right place for this treatise would seem to be among the apologetic works, since it appears to have aimed at accounting for the normal type of life among the patriarchs and the Jews generally, as seen in polygamy, purely on the basis of the ancient type, which in his own time was regarded as the true ideal of Christian teaching. This practical contradiction starts up again and again in his extant apologetic writings, as a difficulty to be explained. In the reference in the Praeparatio he speaks of having discussed in this work the question of the patriarchs and "their philosophic endurance and self-discipline" (τῶν φιλοσόφων καρπιάς τε αὐτῶν καὶ αυτοκηθείς), whether by way of direct narrative or of allegorical suggestion. The quotation in Basil does not aid us.

C. CRITICAL AND EXEGETICAL.

Use will be made of all works directed primarily to the criticism and elucidation of the Scriptures. (16) Biblical Texts. We have seen already (p. 310) how in his earlier years Eusebius was occupied in conjunction with his friend Pamphilus in the production of correct texts of Old Testament Scriptures. A notice connected with this is exhibited in a manuscript of a similar work (V. C. iv. 36, 37). The emperor writes to Eusebius, asking him to provide fifty copies of the Scriptures for use in the churches of his new capital Constantinople, where the Christian population had largely multiplied. The manuscripts must be easily legible and handy for use, they must be written on carefully prepared parchment; and they must be transcribed by skilful calligraphers. He has already written, he adds, to the procurator-general (καθολικός) of the district (τῆς διοικήσεως), charging him to furnish Eusebius with the necessary appliances, and has placed at his disposal two public wagons in order to convey the manuscripts, when complete, to the new metropolis. Eusebius executes the commission. The manuscripts were arranged, he tells us, in ternions and quaternions (τριακόντα καὶ τετρακόντα), and were carefully prepared at great cost. The emperor wrote again, expressing his satisfaction at the manner in which the commission had been executed.

It has been a question whether we have not among our extant MSS some of these very copies which Eusebius supplied to the churches of Constantinople. The only two which can possibly fall within the age of Eusebius are the Vaticanus and the Sinaiticus. The former however does not answer to the description, for it is clear that they must be written on quaternions or quires of five sheets (see Scrivener’s Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament, p. 96, ed. 2). The latter does indeed satisfy this condition (see l.c. p. 88), and Dr. Scrivener (Colation of Codex Sinaiticus, p. xxxiv) thinks it "very credible" that we have here one of the copies prepared by Eusebius for Constantinople, but the locality in which it was found is at all events not favourable to the supposition, and the text in many respects differs too widely from the readings found in Eusebius to encourage this opinion (see Burgus, Last Text Verses of St. Mark p. 238). The library of Caesarea however was an especial resort of transcribers and correctors who were anxious to secure accurate texts of the Scriptures; see e.g. a later hand in a copy of the LXX, instanced by Scrivener (Introduction, p. 53); the original corrector of H of St. Paul’s Epistles (2. p. 158); and the Greek text from which the Harleian use of the corrector, was compiled, St. Clement of Rome p. 234, Appendix.

(17) Sections and Canons, with the Letter to Carpinus prefixed [Opera iv. 1273]. Eusebius explains the origin and method of these sections and canons in the preface to the letter. Ammonius of Alexandria (about A.D. 220) had constructed a Harmony or Diatheke of the Gospels. He took St. Matthew as his standard, and placed side by side with the paragraphs in this evangelist the parallel passages in the other three gospels. The work of Ammonius suggested to Eusebius the plan which he adopted. It was however somewhat different in principle. The great innovation of Ammonius was that St. Matthew alone could be read conti-

This shows him that the 141st section of St. Matthew corresponds to the 50th of St. Mark, to the 19th of St. Luke, and to the 50th of St. John; and the number of verses in the gospels, and finds the parallel passages, Mark vi. 1 sq., Luke iv. 22, John vi. 41, 42.

It will be seen from this account that the numbering of the sections was entirely dependent on the arrangement in canons. A section did not necessarily comprise a single subject complete in itself, as a chapter or a paragraph.
might do. Its length was regulated altogether by the matter which it had in common with one or more of the other gospels. Thus the 1st section of St. Luke extends over eighty-five verses (Luke i. 1–ii. 5), comprising the preface at one end and the account of the taxing with the journey to Bethlehem at the other, because the whole of this part has no parallel in the other evangelists. On the other hand, elsewhere a single verse will frequently be bisectioned, because its different parts stand in different relations to the other gospels.

This fact decides a critical question of some importance. It is common to speak of the arrangement which has been described as Ammonius Sections and Eusebian Canons, as though Eusebius had derived the former from Ammonius and had himself only added the latter. This however is not the natural inference from his own language. He does not say that he borrowed anything from Ammonius, but that his general scheme was suggested by the work of that critic of the common gospels to whom Eusebius owed his own __ερωτήσεις, though he himself adopted a different method (καθ' ευρέαν μεθόδον). The foregoing account shows that the canons and sections were intimately connected, and that the latter were determined altogether by the form. The principle of Ammonius was different, and the numbering of the sections, even so far as regards St. Matthew's Gospel, would not be suggested by his plan, or indeed have been compatible with it. The other gospels he would not be required to divide into sections at all. Mill however (Proleg. p. 123 sq.) falls into the error of ascribing the sections to Ammonius, and he is followed by not a few more recent critics.

The case is correctly stated by Wetstein (Proleg. pp. 68, 69 sq.), by Lloyd (Nov. Test. p. viii sq., Oxon. 1829), and by Westcott (Dict. of the Bible, s. v. N.-w Testament, p. 512); and the reasons for this view are more fully given by Burgon, Life of St. Mark, p. 188 sq.

The primary object of this scheme was to lay the basis of a harmony of the Gospels, or at least to furnish materials for the investigation of questions bearing on the mutual relations of the several evangelical narratives. The fact that it was suggested by the Diatessaron of Ammonius shows how that event which such investigations had for Eusebius is evidently moreover from his own __questiones ad Stephanum et ad Marianum. But Eusebius would find, as later harmonists have found, that it is not easy to draw the line between divergent narratives of the same event or discourse, and narratives of similar events or discourses. Hence, the only safe principle which he could lay down for himself was sufficiently close resemblance (τὰ παραπλησία). Any narrower rule would have obliged him to prejudge numberless doubtful cases, and this apparently he had no desire of doing. This principle however, once adopted, obliged him to admit as parallels references to similar incidents or sayings which no one could regard as different representations of the same thing; e.g. corresponding to the mention of the last passover in Matt. xxvi. 1, 2 (§ 274), we have references not only to Mark xiv. 1 (§ 156), Luke xxii. 1 (§ 290), John xi. 55 (§ 98), which are strictly parallel, but to the previous passovers mentioned by St. John, ii. 13 (§ 20) and vi. 4 (§ 48). In such cases the parallels serve very much the same purpose as our marginal references, and good service has been done by calling attention to these phenomena (Burgon, l. c. p. 298 sq.). But it seems to be an entire misconception to suppose that the sections "are only rightly understood when they are regarded as marginal references," and that the system "is nothing else but a clumsy substitute for what is achieved by an ordinary reference Bible." The main object of Eusebius was to exhibit the mutual relations of the four evangelical narratives; the main object of a reference Bible is to furnish illustrations to individual passages from other sources. The arrangement of the several canons was quite superfluous for this latter purpose; and a far less intelligent man than Eusebius might have seen that, by precluding any references to other parts of the same gospel, his system was very ill conceived for the attainment of such an aim. For the purpose which he had in view, it is very fairly adequate, though not perfect, and it has never yet been superseded by anything (§ 48).

Dean Burgon has pointed out (p. 308 sq.) that in the Syriac MSS generally, even in those of ancient date (e.g. the Medicean MS, written A.D. 586), though the principle of the Eusebian sections and canons is preserved, yet the sub-divisions themselves are not the same (e.g. in St. John there are two hundred and seventy-one sections instead of two hundred and thirty-two); and he even raises the question whether this larger number of sections found in the Syriac MSS may not represent the original arrangement of Eusebius (p. 310). For this latter suspicion there is no ground. The Syriac subdivision was doubtless some later, but comparatively early, readjustment of the Eusebian sections. The Latin sections, which must be as old as Jerome's time, and therefore may be traced further back than the Syriac, are the same as the Greek.

In the Coptic MSS also, so far as I have noticed, the sections correspond to those of the Greek.

The letter to Carpianus was translated into most, if not all, languages in which versions of the gospels were anciently made. For the history of the sections and canons in the MSS see Scrivener's _Intro. to the Criticism of the N. T._ p. 54 sq. and passim. The sections and canons there marked as unauthentic may be of the same family as those of Tischendorf and Tregelles.

(18) Under the head of Biblical exegesis may be ranged several topographical works which were undertaken at the instance of Paulinus, bishop of Tyre.

(a) _Interpretation of the ELamonic Terms in the Hebrew Scriptures (τὰ γενεια ἡ εἰσογγορία ἐνη ἐν τὴν Ἐλλάδα φωνή μεταβαλλόν τὰ ἐν τῇ θείᾳ γραφή κυματίζει ἑβραίοις ὑπόμνημα προφητείας)._ This work, on the departure to Rome of the sick, who with the property of Bishop_...
EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA

(d) On the Names of Places in Holy Scripture

(19) On the Nomenclature of the Book of the Prophets (τοῦ τῶν προφητῶν νόμων χρήσεως) entitling the head of Jerome's version of the Septuagint, entitled in the heading of his version of the Septuagint (Σημείωσις τῶν ονομασιών τῶν Σήμεων τῶν εἰς τῇ διαθήκῃ γραμματίσεως) in his catalogue, where he mentions among the writings of Eusebius a book de Figura Mundi, the Greek being mistranslated.

The treatise, On the Names of Places, like the three which preceded it, is written at the instance of Paulinus, to whom it is dedicated. It professes to give alphabetically the "designations of the cities and villages mentioned in Holy Scripture in their original language" (ἑωρᾷς γένεσθαι τοὺς λόγους τῶν μνημείων πόλεως καὶ χωρίων), together with a description of the locality and the modern names in each case. Its arrangement is based on its relation to Paulinus, as well as for other reasons, we may conjecture that it was a somewhat early work. Jerome indeed in his preface says otherwise; he describes it as written "post decem ecclesiasticos historical libros . . . post temporum canones etc."; but his statement is not absurd. The preface contains no statement of any value. Eusebius himself names other works (the topographical treatises already mentioned) which he had written elsewhere, but not the History and the Chronicle. Jerome interpolates these in his manipulation of Eusebius's preface.

The names of the places are not taken from the LXX, but transliterated with various success from the Hebrew. The letters are given in order, A, B, G, etc.; but in each several letter the words are arranged under the successive books in which they occur, so that the order is not strictly alphabetical. The great value of the treatise consists in the acquaintance which Eusebius had with the geography of Palestine in his own day.

This work had already been translated into Latini by some unskilful hand before Jerome's time, "quidam vir imbutus literis . . . ausus est in Latinam linguam non Latine vertere." The result was so unsatisfactory that he himself undertook a new version. Jerome's however was not a mere translation; he omitted some important notices, and he made several changes. His personal knowledge of Palestine enabled him to do this with effect.

The Topica was first edited by Bonnfrère (Paris, 1851), then by Martianay in his edition of Jerome's works (Paris, 1869), among which it is generally included along with his translation (e.g. by Vallarsi, Op. iii. p. 122 sq.). The two most recent and most critical editions are those of Lassow and Parthey (Euseb. Pamph. Episc. Caes. Onomasticon, etc., Berlin, 1892) and of Lagarde (Onomastica Sacra, Berlin, 1892)."
of the site of the Sepulchre may have been made then, and the buildings, which occupied some years in the erection, may have been begun soon after; but the basilica was not dedicated till A.D. 355 (see above, p. 318). The date of this commentary therefore can hardly be placed much earlier than A.D. 330, and may have been some years later.

This work stands in the first rank of patristic commentaries in point of importance, owing to its superior antiquity and its intrinsic merits. The historical bearing of the several psalms is generally treated sensibly; the theological and mystical interpretations betray the extravagance common to patristic exegesis. The value of the work to ourselves is largely increased by the frequent extracts from the Hexaplaric versions and by other occasional notices respecting the text and history of the Psalter. The author had this advantage over most patristic commentators, that he possessed some acquaintance with Hebrew, though not sufficient to prevent him from falling into mistakes. It is not certain however (as Montfaucon assumes) that he is guilty of a gross blunder when on Ps. cx. (ex. 3, ἐκ γυμνᾶς, his present text has ἐκ ἱματίας) he is compared with the name of the Virgin. There is obviously some clerical error in the context, and it is not at all clear that he himself adopts the view here mentioned. Even if he does, we must not hastily assume that he misunderstood the meaning of the Hebrew הַמָּלֶא from the word "womb." In the whole, the work more implies that there was a prophetic suggestion of the Virgin’s name (שֵׁם) in these Hebrew words. It is in accordance with the completed work of a great mind, the style of which is a blend of the Hebrew and the Greek, with a poetic grace that is almost beyond description. Eusebius was a man of wide and varied interests. This commentary has a great reputation. It was translated into Latin within a very few years of its publication by his namesake Eusebius of Vercellae, who however omitted the parts which he considered heretical (Hieron. l. c.; Euseb. Epist. 112, Op. i. p. 754, "Psalmonum quos apud Græcos interpretari sunt multis voluminibus, primum Origenes, secundus Eusebius Cæsariensis"). To him doubtless he was greatly indebted in this work.

This commentary had a great reputation. It was translated into Latin within a very few years of its publication by his namesake Eusebius of Vercellae, who however omitted the parts which he considered heretical (Hieron. l. c.; Euseb. Epist. 112, Op. i. p. 754, "Psalmonum quos apud Græcos interpretari sunt multis voluminibus, primum Origenes, secundus Eusebius Cæsariensis"). To him doubtless he was greatly indebted in this work.

This commentary had a great reputation. It was translated into Latin within a very few years of its publication by his namesake Eusebius of Vercellae, who however omitted the parts which he considered heretical (Hieron. l. c.; Euseb. Epist. 112, Op. i. p. 754, "Psalmonum quos apud Græcos interpretari sunt multis voluminibus, primum Origenes, secundus Eusebius Cæsariensis"). To him doubtless he was greatly indebted in this work.

This commentary had a great reputation. It was translated into Latin within a very few years of its publication by his namesake Eusebius of Vercellae, who however omitted the parts which he considered heretical (Hieron. l. c.; Euseb. Epist. 112, Op. i. p. 754, "Psalmonum quos apud Græcos interpretari sunt multis voluminibus, primum Origenes, secundus Eusebius Cæsariensis"). To him doubtless he was greatly indebted in this work.

This commentary had a great reputation. It was translated into Latin within a very few years of its publication by his namesake Eusebius of Vercellae, who however omitted the parts which he considered heretical (Hieron. l. c.; Euseb. Epist. 112, Op. i. p. 754, "Psalmonum quos apud Græcos interpretari sunt multis voluminibus, primum Origenes, secundus Eusebius Cæsariensis"). To him doubtless he was greatly indebted in this work.
EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA

(22) Commentary on St. Luke’s Gospel (εἰς τὸ κεφ. Λουκᾶν εὐαγγ.Λουκᾶ) [Op. vi. 527 sq.].

(23) Commentary on the First Epistle to the Corinthians. At least such a work seems to be implied by Jerome’s language, Ep. xlix (Op. i. p. 235 “Origines, Dionysius, Hieremi, Eusebius Caesariensis, Didymus, Apollinaris, last series have epistolary interpretation sunt”), though he does not mention it in his Catalogue. One extract alone, on 1 Cor. iv. 5, appears in Cramer’s Catena p. 75 (repeated p. 477).

(24) Commentaries on other Books of Scripture. Extracts are given from, or mention is made of, commentaries on Matthew (Mai, Bibl. Nov. Patr. iv. p. 10 sqq. 75 316, reprinted by Migne, vi. p. 525; Hebrews (Mai, iv. p. 207, reprinted by Migne, vi. p. 605); and several other books of the Old and New Testaments (see Fabric. l. c. p. 389). It is obvious, however, in such cases the extracts (even when genuine) were taken from continuous commentaries or from other exegetical or dogmatical works of Eusebius. In some instances this is certainly so; e.g. in the case of notes on the gospels, which are extracted in many instances from the Quaestiones ad Stephumon and ad Martinum.

(25) On the Discrepancies of the Gospels (εἰς τὸν Διδωκέων Εὐαγγέλων). Jerome, in his Catalogue (c. 81), mentions among the works of Eusebius a book de Evangeliorum Diaphonias, and elsewhere (Comm. in Matth. l. c. 3, Op. vii. p. 11) he refers to Eusebius as discussing a certain question in libris Διαφωνίων Ἐυαγγελίων. Edebeju also in his list mentions “ libros Solutionis Contradictionum quae sunt in Evangelio” (Assem. Bibl. Orient. iii. p. 18). In the 16th century Latino Latinus wrote that there had been found in Sicily “libri tres Eusebei Caesariensis de Evangeliorum diaphonias,” and it is probable that these were published shortly. But from that time to this nothing has been heard of the Sicilian MS. Mai however discovered in a Vatican MS an epitome of the whole work, which he published in Script. Vet. Nov. Coll. i. 1, p. 1 sq. (1825), and again in Bibl. Nov. Patr. iv. p. 217 sq. (1847). He also added large portions of the unabridged work, which was not again published till the time of Strache on St. Luke (Vat. 1611), together with other fragments from other places, including two in Syriac (from the Vatican MS Syr. 104). These last doubtless belonged to the translation with which Edebeju was acquainted. Some criticisms on Mai’s editing of this work will be found in Burgon, Last Twelve Verses of St. Mark, p. 42 sq.

The work consists of two parts, which form separate works, and are quoted as such:

(i) Questions and Solutions on the Genealogy of the Saviour, addressed to Stephano; in two books [Op. iv. 879 sqq. 933 sqq.]. This work is mentioned by Eusebius in the Demonstratio (vii. 3. 18, 40 τῆς εὐαγγελίων τῶν εἰς τὴν γενεαλογίαν τοῦ σωτῆρος ἠκολουθήσεως καὶ λήης, where he refers his readers to it for further information. Its title may be inferred from this reference, combined with the heading in the Epitome (p. 879), where it is described as “addressed to Stephen concerning the Questions and Solutions in the Gospel.” It is mentioned also by Nicephorus Callistus (H. E. vi. 37).

(ii) Questions and Solutions concerning the Passion and Resurrection of the Saviour, addressed to Marinius; in one book [Op. iv. 937 sqq. 986 sqq.]. This is the title in Corder, Catena in Joann. p. 456, where it is quoted (see col. 1005, Migne). More commonly it is cited simply τα εἰς τοὺς Ναπερ (col. 1000, 1009, 1012, 1813).

At the beginning of this second work (col. 957), Eusebius says that, having already written two books (ἐν τοῖς εἰς τα τρίαν τὰν εἰς τὴν γενεαλογίαν τοῦ σωτῆρος ἠκολουθήσεως καὶ λήης, where he refers his readers to it for further information. Its title may be inferred from this reference, combined with the heading in the Epitome (p. 879), where it is described as “addressed to Stephen concerning the Questions and Solutions in the Gospel.” It is mentioned also by Nicephorus Callistus (H. E. vi. 37).

At the beginning of this second work (col. 957), Eusebius says that, having already written two books (ἐν τοῖς εἰς τα τρίαν τὰν εἰς τὴν γενεαλογίαν τοῦ σωτῆρος ἠκολουθήσεως καὶ λήης, where he refers his readers to it for further information. Its title may be inferred from this reference, combined with the heading in the Epitome (p. 879), where it is described as “addressed to Stephen concerning the Questions and Solutions in the Gospel.” It is mentioned also by Nicephorus Callistus (H. E. vi. 37).
EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA

not a mere abridgment; but sentences are occasionally inserted to make the meaning more clear. There is however some difficulty in ascertaining the relation of the two works, owing to the fact that a writer quoting from the larger work will himself sometimes omit sentences which seem alien to his purpose. The Questions ad Stephanum contained two books in its original form, but there is no trace of a division into books in the epitome. It comprises sixteen questions. In the Questions ad Marium there are only four questions in the epitome. Mai believes that he has recovered nearly the whole of this latter work (col. 983); but we may reasonably doubt this. The epitome is entitled "A Selection in Brief" (ἐκάλυψις ἐν ὄρθορρυπί); and it may not only have abridged the solutions but omitted some of the questions. In one quotation we are referred to the thirteenth chapter (col. 1009), and a chapter would naturally correspond to a question.

The work professes to be written in answer to questions asked or in the course of the five fragments by Stephanus and Marinus respectively (e.g. col. 882, 892, 893, 925, 937). Where a question is stated anonymously (e.g. col. 1005 ὑποθέσεις μετῆρας), this may perhaps be a change made by the authority who cites the passage of Eusebius. One writer quotes the second part as "the Epistle to Marinos" (col. 1013), but there is no trace of the epistolary form. Who Stephanus and Marinos were, we have no information. Eusebius addresses the former as "his son Stephanus, the most holy [ἐπετράπατον] and studious [γελοιομακάτον] of men" (col. 936); the latter as "his son Marinos, most pruned by him, and most studious" (col. 937). A certain Stephanus held the see of Antioch for a short time after the expulsion of Eustathius (see above, p. 315), being put forward by the Arián party (Soc. H. E. ii. 20; Socr. H. E. ii. 26; Hieron. Chron. i. 192, Schöne). One Marinos appeas St. Ambrose, and another as bishop of Scæba in Palestine, in the lists of the Nicene council.

This work exhibits the characteristic hesitatio of Eusebius in a somewhat aggravated form. Alternative solutions are frequently offered, and he does not decide between them. But it is supported by full quotations, and, often without acknowledgment. Jerome's letters on certain difficulties in the Gospels (Epist. 59, 120) are largely drawn from it. The unacknowledged obligations of Ambrose on St. Luke and of Jerome on St. Matthew are pointed out in an appendix by Mai (Script. Vet. Nov. Col. i. 1, p. 101 sq.). Hierarchy of Pelusium (Epist. ii. 212, p. 220) plagiarizes whole sentences verbatim (col. 957). And so in like manner later writers.

D. DOCTINAL

This work forms the general part of the Proph. iii. i. (p. 97, Graec, column 95) (p. 236). The Prophecetical Extracts themselves formed the sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth books of it, and Eusebius promises to deal in the tenth with the errors of "the godless heresiarchs" (iv. 35). The purport of this lost tenth book may be gathered from certain passages in the extant Extracts, especially iii. 9 (restored by Selwyn, Journ. of Philol. iv. p. 277), where he speaks of the Marcionites on the one hand, and the Artemonites, Samosatenes, Ebionites, etc., on the other, as being refuted by the prophet's language (comp. iv. 23). It would form a sequel to the Extracts themselves, and in it our author would discuss the false Christology of these heretics, and perhaps also their views of the relation between the Old and New Testaments. Five fragments of this work have been published by Mai (Script. Vet. viii. pp. 95, 100; Bibl. Non. Patr. iv. p. 316), being included in the Res Sacrae of Leontius and Joannes, a collection of extracts. These fragments all profess to be taken from different parts (ἐκ τοῦ α', ἐκ τοῦ β', ἐκ τοῦ γ') τῆς α' εἰσαγωγῆς (ἐκ τοῦ δ' is doubly a scriber's error), and are valuable as showing the form of the Prophecetical Extracts. Mai explains this to mean the first Introduction, and hence concludes that there were two works at least bearing the name. But this is improbable. All the fragments deal with analogous topics, having reference to general principles of ethics, etc., and it is therefore more probable that the "first book of the introduction" is intended, so that ἐκ τοῦ α', etc. will denote the chapters in the book. This work seems to have been a general introduction to the study of the Bible, and, if so, the Vita Prophetae would find a fit place in it.

(27) Prophecetical Extracts (Προφητικά Ἐκλαμβάνα, or more fully, ἀπερι τοῦ Χριστοῦ προφητικά ἐκλαμβάναι). [Op. iv. 1017 sq.]

The date of this work is fixed approximately by the fact that the persecution is mentioned as still raging (i. 8, p. 26). It must therefore have been written before A.D. 313. On the other hand, it contains a distinct reference to the Chronicle (proef. p. 2), but this difficulty may be met by the hypothesis that this valuable extract was taken from a book earlier than the Chronicle (see above, p. 322). Our treatise itself is referred to in the History (i. 2 ὠικεῖος ἀνατόμημα τὰς περὶ τοῦ σωτῆρος Ἱησοῦ Χριστοῦ προφητικὰς ἑλαμαχάς συναγωγεῖν). It contains extracts of prophetic passages from the Old Testament relating to our Lord's person and work, with explanatory comments, and comprises four books, of which the first is devoted to the historical books of the Old Testament, the second to the Psalms, the third to the remaining poetical books and the other prophets, the fourth to Isaiah. The author's main object, as he explains, is to show that the prophets spoke of Jesus Christ as the pre-existent Word, who is a second cause of the universe and God and Lord," and that they predicted His two advents (pp. 4, 5). Thus the personality of the Logos is the leading idea in his treatment of the prophecies in this work. The prophetic word is actually buttressed until it had been perfected; we probably have known more of his design in undertaking it, and of his view of its relations to his other works. It was incorporated in his Elementary Introduction, as we have seen (p. 339).

This work was first published by Gaisford (Oxon. 1842) from a Vienna MS; but before this Lambec had given an account of it in his Com. de Bibl. Cascar. Vindob. III. iii. p. 201 (ed. Kollar; see also Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vii. p. 314 sq.), and had identified the authorship from the reference to the Chronicon in the preface, though the MS is mutilated at the beginning, so that the title is wanting. The MS is mutilated in other parts besides, and there are many obvious misreadings. Several emendations are given by the late Prof. Selwyn, who had some thoughts of preparing a new edition, in the Journal of Philology, iv. p. 275 sq. (1872).

Migne's text is merely a reprint from Gaisford.

(28) Defence of Origen (Ἀπολογία ὑπὲρ Ὄρι-γένους). This was the joint work of Pamphilus and Eusebius. The joint authorship is distinctly attested by Eusebius himself (H. E. vi. 33) and by Eusebius as an anonymous writer of the 6th century who collected the Synodical Epistles (Epist. 198), and by Photius (Bibl. 118; comp. 117). This last writer is explicit as regards the portions executed by the two friends. The work, he tells us, comprised six books, of which the first five were written by Pamphilus and the sixth by Eusebius. The sixth was added by Eusebius to complete the work after the death of Pamphilus. The first five books therefore were written a.d. 307-309, and the sixth probably soon afterwards.

Of the authorship then there can be no doubt. But the matter was overclouded by an ignoble controversy which raged at the close of the 4th century. In the year 397 Rufinus, at the request of Macarius, translated the first book of this Apology (Rufin. adv. Hieron. i. 582). In his translation he entitled it a work of Pamphilus, suppressing the name of Eusebius. It is very possible that he was not acting arbitrarily in this, for the name may have been largely due to the work of Pamphilus that the name of Eusebius was not put forward in it. Perhaps the part of Eusebius in this book was confined to the collection and arrangement of the extracts from Origen. At all events, in the version of Rufinus the name of Pamphilus is prefixed to all the explanations which introduce and connect the passages of Origen, and in the prefatory dedication the writer uses the first person singular, "mihi," "habeo," and so also in the body of the work. When Rufinus quarrelled with Jerome he broke out, this was a main charge brought against him by the latter. Jerome maintained that Rufinus was the real author of the work; and that Rufinus had deliberately substituted the name of the honoured martyr for that of the tainted Arius, so as to conciliate his readers and thus recommend the heresies of Origen; and that he had altered the book in parts and introduced more orthodox expressions; c. Rufin. i. 8 sq. (Op. ii. p. 484 sq., Vallarsi), ii. 15 sq. (Op. i. p. 505 sq., ii. 3), iii. 3 (Op. i. p. 511 sq.), iii. 37 (Op. i. p. 563), Epist. 84 (Op. i. p. 531 sq.), Epist. 133 (ib. p. 1031). In his Catalogus (written a.d. 392) Jerome had supposed that Pamphilus and Eusebius had written two separate works in defence of Origen. Of Pamphilus (§ 75) he there says, "scriptavit, antequam Eusebius Casarensis scriberet, Apologicum pro Origeni," while to Eusebius (§ 81) he attributes "Ἀπολογίας pro Ori- gene libri sex." In his controversy with Rufi- nus he excuses himself for this error, pleading that he was misled by the title of Rufinus's translation, and asserting that he had afterwards made diligent search and found the library at Caesarea a copy of this work, which bore the name of Eusebius (c. Rufin. iii. 12). Jerome's treatment of this matter is a painful exhibition of disingenuousness, self-contradiction, ill-humour, and spite. Indeed he can only be acquitted at direct and conscious dishonesty on the suppo- sition of carelessness so gross as to be criminal under the circumstances. His main points are—

(1) That Rufinus tampered with his author to make him appear more orthodox. Here indeed he has a prima facie case. Rufinus elsewhere shews himself anything but an accurate and conscientious translator, being far more careful about the elegance of the version than the meaning of the original, and having no scruple to alter expressions if the fit was upon him. But we have the negative testimony of Photius, who has a keen scent for heresy and yet makes no complaint of this Apology, that it was in the main orthodox in the original Greek, as it is in Rufinus's translation. (2) That Pamphilus cannot have written the book, because in his Life of Pamphilus says that the martyr "ipse quidem propitius operis nihil omnino scrip- sit, excepta epistolae," etc. (c. Rufin. i. 9). But the existence of a work which consisted mainly of extracts from Origen with comments, and of which even thus he was only joint author, is quite reconcilable with this statement. Indeed the very form of the expression in the original, corresponding to "ipse quidem," "propitius," was probably chosen so as to exclude the work of compilation and partnership. (3) That the copy in the Caesarean library bore the name of Euse- bius. What foundation in fact there has been for this statement, we cannot say; but occurring in the midst of so large a body of disingenuous sophistry, it deserves no credit against the distinct statement of Eusebius him- self (H. E. vi. 33), not to mention other well-informed and careful writers. This avowal of Eusebius, by the way, is entirely ignored by Jerome, though he must have known of it. Nor indeed are Jerome's chronological statements easy to explain. The Catalogus was written a.d. 392; the translation of the Apology for Origen by Rufinus appeared not before a.d. 397. Yet Jerome implies (c. Rufin. ii. 23) that he was misled by Rufinus into ascribing the work to Pamphilus, "Euxæbus, ut sit, et ergo discepter fuerat divulgatum." His memory was very short indeed, for he wrote these words about a.d. 402.

The original of this work has perished, but the first book survives in the translation of Rufinus (printed in Origen, Op. iv. App. p. 17 sq. Delarue). Eusebius (H. E. vi. 3) says that the work was undertaken to refute "ępigraphias et iteramasserit," and that no mention is made of certain "imperitiissimi crini- num obtracatores ejus." The person especially meant was probably Methodius, who had written two works against Origen (Hieron. Vit. Ill. 85; Socr. H. E. vi. 13), and was attacked by name.
EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA

in the sixth book of this Apology (Hieron. c. Rufus. i. 11). It was dedicated, as we have seen (p. 312), to the confessors of Palestine, more especially to Patermuthius (Phot. Bibl. 118) who himself suffered martyrdom the year after Pamphilus (Euseb. Mart. Pol. 13). The first book contains an exposition of Origen's principles generally, and then more especially of his doctrines respecting the Trinity and the Incarnation; after which several charges against him are refuted, relating to the nature of Christ, the resurrection of the dead, the metempsychosis, etc. In one of the later books the doctrine of fatalism was discussed (Rufin. Apol. i. 11, in Hieron. Op. ii. p. 582). Elsewhere also it was shown that Origen in his mystical explanation of Adam and Eve, as referring to Christ and the Church, only followed the traditional interpretation (Socrat. H. E. iii. 3). In the same spirit precedents were quoted from earlier writers for his doctrines of the pre-existence of the soul and the restoration of all things (Apol. cont. Apol. I.c.). This Apology also contained a full account of the life of Origen from first to last (Phot. Bibl. 118). Eusebius himself refers to the second book for accounts of the controversy which arose about his ordination to the priesthood and of his contributions to sacred letters (H. E. vi. 23), and to the sixth book for the letters which Origen wrote to Fabianus and others in defence of his orthodoxy (H. E. 36), besides elsewhere referring to the work generally for the part taken by Origen in the theological controversies of the time (H. E. vi. 35). Socrates (H. E. iv. 27) also states to sacred letters (H. E. vi. 23), and to the sixth book for the letters which Origen wrote to Fabianus and others in defence of his orthodoxy (H. E. 36), besides elsewhere referring to the work generally for the part taken by Origen in the theological controversies of the time (H. E. vi. 35). Socrates (H. E. iv. 27) also states to sacred letters (H. E. vi. 23), and to the sixth book for the letters which Origen wrote to Fabianus and others in defence of his orthodoxy (H. E. 36), besides elsewhere referring to the work generally for the part taken by Origen in the theological controversies of the time (H. E. vi. 35).

The statement of Praedestinatus (Haruc. i. 43; comp. 42), that Pamphilus in his Apology defended Origen on the ground that the errors laid to his charge were not pronounced by him, but by two heretical namensakes, is unworthy of credit. Moreover, as Pamphilus also represents Origen as asserting that Origen's works were interpolated by the heretics (Haruc. i. 22), but here it is probably confusing Pamphilus with Rufinus. Antipater of Bostra wrote a Refutation of this Apology (Αντίφασις της Εὐσεβίου . . . ἐν τῷ Πρεσβύτῳ ἀπολογίας); see Fabric. Bibl. Græc. ed. Labbe, Conc. viii. p. 706 sqq. A passage of this refutation was read at the Second Council of Nicea A.D. 787 (Labbe, Conc. viii. p. 1017, ed. Collet). It treats Eusebius as the author and does not mention Pamphilus; but for this there was a strong motive. The Apology for Origen is mentioned among the works of Eusebius by Eusebius himself and by the Church (Assem. Bibl. Orient. iii. 19). On this work see Delarue, Orig. Op. iv. 2, p. 3 sqq.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vii. p. 301 sqq. (29) Against Marcellus, Bishop of Anycra (καρχαί Μαρκέλλον τοῦ Ὀγγέρας Αὐγάρου), in two books (Op. vi. p. 705 sqq.). The occasion of writing is explained by Eusebius himself (c. Marci. ii. 4, p. 55 sqq.). Marcellus had been condemned of Sabellianism, and deposed by the synod of Constantinople (A.D. 336), which was composed chiefly of the Ariana friends of Eusebius (see above, p. 317). This work was undertaken at the instance of the bishops and people of Anycra, who for this reason justify the decision of the council. Certain persons considered that Marcellus had been unfairly treated, and as he himself was partly responsible for the decision, he felt bound to uphold his justice. This work aims simply at exposing the views of Marcellus. He describes Marcellus as being moved by envy and hatred to write the book against Asterius, which had drawn upon him the condemnation of the synod (i. 1, p. 1; i. 4, p. 56). "Malicious" he writes (i. 4, p. 59), and hence the errors of Marcellus. He accuses him of seasoning his work with fulsome flatteries of Constantine, and thus attempting, though in vain, to poison the imperial ear (ii. 4, p. 115). The indignation of Eusebius is especially aroused by the attacks which Marcellus had made upon the names of the honoured dead, upon his dear friend "the thrice blessed" Paulinus bishop of Tyre, and upon his great hero, the saintly scholar Origen (i. 4, pp. 38 sqq., 43 sqq., 56). He felt bound in honour also to repel the assaults made upon his namesake Nicomedia, the great Eusebius (i. 4, p. 38 sqq.). This treatment of revered names was aggravated by a personal attack upon himself (i. 4, pp. 52, 57). Accordingly he gives instances of the blunders of Marcellus. He adduces examples of false readings and misquotations (i. 2, p. 24 sqq.). He accuses him of miscalling books, as when he speaks of the Proverbs as "prophecies" (ii. p. 27). He is especially and justly severe upon his exegetical blunders; e.g. when in Zech. iii. 1 he confuses Joshua the son of Josedek with Joshua the son of Nun (i. 2, p. 18 sqq.) or when he interprets the expressions of Col. i. 16 as referring to the Incarnation and human life of Christ (ii. 3, p. 88 sqq.) or when he explains Prov. viii. 22 sqq. in the same way, supposing the "abysses" to be the "hearts of the saints," and the "mountains and hills" to be "the apostles and the successors of the apostles" (ii. 3, p. 91 sqq.) or when, with the same motive, in Ps. cix (cix. 3) he interprets "before the morning star" (LXX) as referring to the star which appeared to the magi. These instances show that the exaggeration of Marcellus was hopelessly bad; and yet Eusebius himself is not from faultless in this respect, e.g. when he understands Gal. iii. 19, 20, to refer to Christ as the mediator at the giving of the law, and thus to the Haran, where however it is entitled without any authority, Contra Pamphilii Apologetam. A passage of this refutation was read at the Second Council of Nicaea A.D. 787 (Labbe, Conc. viii. p. 1017, ed. Collet). It treats Eusebius as the author and does not mention Pamphilus; but for this there was a strong motive. The Apology for Origen is mentioned among the works of Eusebius by Eusebius himself and by the Church (Assem. Bibl. Orient. iii. 19). On this work see Delarue, Orig. Op. iv. 2, p. 3 sqq.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vii. p. 301 sqq. (29) Against Marcellus, Bishop of Anycra (καρχαί Μαρκέλλον τοῦ Ὀγγέρας Αὐγάρου), in two books (Op. vi. p. 705 sqq.). The occasion of writing is explained by Eusebius himself (c. Marci. ii. 4, p. 55 sqq.). Marcellus had been condemned of Sabellianism, and deposed by the synod of Constantinople (A.D. 336), which was composed chiefly of the Ariana friends of Eusebius (see above, p. 317). This work was undertaken at the instance of the bishops and people of Anycra, who for this reason justify the decision of the council. Certain persons con-

1) Tillemont however (II. E. vii. p. 48) seems to be in error when he represents Marcellus (c. Marci. i. 4, p. 54 sqq.) as complaining that our Eusebius, when passing through Galatia, had preached heretical doctrine at Anycra. The person intended is Eusebius of Nicomedia, as Zahn (Monumenta Graec. p. 42, note 4) rightly understands the passage.
induced him to write this additional work are explained in a letter to Flaccus, bishop of Antioch, prefixed to it, and in the opening sentences of the work itself. He had thought it sufficient in the first instance merely to expose the opinions of Marcellus, without directly refuting them (Ep. xii. ad Ephesius), thus leaving them to condemn themselves. But on further reflection, fearing lest some might be drawn away "from the theology of the church" by their very length and pretentiousness, he had undertaken to refute them. Just as Marcellus had comprised his prolix work in a single book, as he himself alleged, that it might be a testimony to the unity of God which the Arians impugned, so Eusebius divides his reply into three books, that its very form may be a protest on behalf of the distinct personalities in the Blessed Trinity which Marcellus had confused. He undertakes therefore to shew that not a single Scripture favours the view of Marcellus, but that, according to the approved interpretations, they all are dead against him. Having done this, he will expound the true theology respecting our Saviour, as it has been handed down in the Church from the beginning. Thus, as explained by its author, the aim of this second treatise is refutation with as much facility as possible.

While the first was mainly personal, the second is chiefly dogmatical.

Whatever may be thought of the opinions of Eusebius himself, it can hardly be questioned that he makes good his case against Marcellus. "He shews himself," writes Eusebius (Eccl. Theol. iv. 34), "Jew, "either in the Jew or a Sabellian"; i.e. he is either Ebionite or Monarchian. Accordingly he calls him at one time "a downright Jew" (ib. ii. 2, p. 201), at another "a new Sabellian" (ib. ii. 20, p. 165); and these charges, especially the latter, are flung at him again and again. Though Marcellus himself perhaps did not intend it, his recklessness of language could only be interpreted as maintaining opinions which had a dangerous approximation to these extreme forms of heresy.

The quotations given by Eusebius speak for themselves. At the council of Sardica indeed (about A.D. 344), he was reinstated after making explanations. He had been led into his heretical statements by the arguments of Amphilochius, and the Athenian bishops who were dominant at Sardica would be predisposed to take the most lenient view of one who had suffered in the cause. The synod denounced "the base artifice (κακοτεχνία) of the party of Eusebius"; the statements which Marcellus had made "as an enquirer (A de Γρηγορίου... ὑπακοήν) they had been "accused as if they were "propositions (ἀποκρίσεως) or "teachments (δαβδακληθήσατο)." Athan. Ap. c. Arian. 47 (Op. i. p. 130). Though no direct mention is made of Eusebius of Caesarea (for the person named is, as usual, the bishop of Nicomedia), yet we must suppose that this language was directed, at least in part, against the polemical treatises of the former against Marcellus. But the language of refutation does not meet the facts as they stand out in the extracts of Eusebius; but the bishops of Sardica doubtless read the written treatise by the light of the subsequent personal explanation. When moreover we remember that Basil and Hilary and Chrysostom all condemned Marcellus as heretical, and that Athanasius himself in after years, when questioned on the point by Ephiphanus (Hist. Arm. iv. 4), smiled a significant smile, but said nothing, and is even stated by one authority to have excommunicated him before the more pronounced heresy of his pupil Photinus cast back its light on the teaching of the master (Hilar. Op. ii. p. 639), we shall be the less disposed to allow that Eusebius misread or misinterpreted the extracts which he gives.

Neither of the two works against Marcellus is mentioned by Jerome or by Photius. Socrates (H. E. i. 36, ii. 20, 21) is acquainted with the de Ecclesiastica Theologia, though he does not give it this title, but refers to it as a work in three books "Against Marcellus." Byzant. (H. E. ii. 21) passesages from the first and third books, so that there is no doubt about the identity of the work. Of the previous work Against Marcellus, in two books, he betrays no knowledge; and from his language respecting the other it must be inferred that he was not acquainted with the first two books.

The two treatises were first edited by Bishop R. Montague (Montacutius) with a translation and notes (Paris, 1628) at the end of the Demonstratio, and this edition was reprinted (Lips. 1688). The best edition is that of Gaisford (Oxon. 1852), where they are in the same volume with his "against Photinus." He revised the text and reprinted the translation and notes of Montague. The fragments of Marcellus are collected by Retzbuch (Marcellianus, Götting. 1794). The monographs on Marcellus, especially Zahn's Marcellus von Ancyra (Goths, 1867), are useful aids to the study of these treatises.

(51) On the Paschal Festival [Op. vi. 681]

Eusebius (Vit. Const. iv. 35, 36) states that he addressed to Constantine "a mystical explanation of the significance of the festival" (μεταξύ διάκων τοῦ τῆς λειτουργίας), upon which the emperor wrote in reply, expressing himself greatly delighted, and saying that it was a difficult undertaking, and that it was impossible for him to give a version of the origin of the Paschal festival, as well as its profitable and painful consumption (τῆς τε τῶν πάσχαλ εἰσοδήμως τοῦ ταύτα θεολογίας, where εἰσοδήμως is doubtful correct, though Heinichen prefers εἰσοδήμως,"the controversy"). He added that Eusebius had found no incontestant tradition, nor did he himself, it was impossible for a version to do justice to the original. The work therefore had been already translated into Latin, if we are right in so interpreting the very obscure language of Constantine. This letter was written about A.D. 335. A long fragment of this treatise was discovered by Mai in the Vatican Codex of Hippolytus on St. Luke, containing in a Vatican MS, and published by him not take up this position. He accuses Marcellus of denying the pre-existence, not of the Word of God, but of the Son of God, before the Incarnation; and this distinction between the Word and the Son is the very point of the controversy.
EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA

(see Lib. Nov. Patr. iv. p. 208). From a comparison it appears that some portions of this fragment had been already published by Cordelius in a Latin version of his own in his Catena on this evangelist. There can be no doubt about the identity of this with the work mentioned above, as it corresponds to the description given by Eusebius and Constantine. The recovered fragment contains—(1) A declaration of the figurative character of the Jewish Passover. (2) An account of its institution and of the ceremonial itself. (3) An explanation of the typical significance of the different parts of the ceremonial, with reference to their Christian counterparts. (4) A brief statement of the settlement of the question at Nicaea. (5) An argument showing that Christians are not bound to observe the time of the Jewish festival, mainly on the ground that it was not the Jewish Passover which our Lord Himself kept.

Of this treatise Jerome makes no mention in his list of the works of Eusebius (Vit. Ill. 61); but in another occasion, when speaking of Hippolytus, he states that Eusebius "composed a canon for the Paschal festival, a cycle of nineteen years, that is, an eunachadakia." The bearing of this notice on the transactions of the council of Nicaea has been already discussed (p. 315). Here it is sufficient to say that, though it cannot be claimed that the council of Constantinople itself contained anything of the kind, this cycle is very likely to have found a place in it, either as an appendix or as the body of the work.

E. ORATIONS AND SERMONS.

(32) At the Dedication of the Church of Tyre. This oration is inserted by Eusebius in his History (i. 4). In this way it has been preserved. The oration which it bears in the MSS (whether due to Eusebius himself or not, we cannot say) is, "Panegyric on the Building of the Churches, addressed to Paulinus, Bishop of the Tyrians." The circumstances under which it was delivered has been already mentioned (p. 317). The new basilica of Tyre was one of the most important and splendid buildings which arose after peace was restored to the Church; and Eusebius seizes the occasion to emphasize the greatness of the epoch. He addresses Paulinus as a Bezaleel, a Solomon, a Zerubbabel, as a new Aaron or Melchizedek, the forerunner of the predictions of the Jewish prophets foretelling the rebuilding of the temple and the restoration of the polity. He pours out his thanksgiving for the triumph of Christ, the Word of God, who has proved mightier than the mightiest of kings. This magnificent temple, which has arisen from the ruins of its predecessor, is a token of His power. Then follows an elaborate description of the building itself. This material building, constitutes the orator, is a symbol of the spiritual church of Tyre, of the spiritual Church throughout the world, in its history, its overthrow, its desolation, its re-erection on a more splendid scale, as well as in the arrangement of its several parts. But the spiritual Church on earth is itself only a faint image of the heavenly Zion, where the adoring hosts sing the praises of their King without ceasing.

(33) At the Vicennalia of Constantine (Αβγος τεκαυνανφευδος), A.D. 325. This oration, which is preserved, is mentioned Vit. Const. prom. iii. 11. It seems to have been the opening address at the Council of Nicaea, as stated above, p. 313.

(34) On the Sepulchre of the Saviour, A.D. 335. It is mentioned, Vit. Const. iv. 33, 46 sq. The circumstances under which this oration was delivered are already described, p. 318. Eusebius (V. C. iv. 47) promises to append it to his Life of Constantine; but if he ever fulfilled his promise, it has been discovered and is lost.

(35) At the Tricennalia of Constantine (Αβγος τεκαυνανφευδος), A.D. 335 or 336 [Op. ii. 1315]. This is the work commonly called de Laudibus Constantini. Eusebius promises to append it (with the oration last mentioned) to his Life of Constantine (V. C. iv. 46); and accordingly it is found at the end of the MSS of this work, where it bears the title εις Κωνσταντινον του βασιλεος τεκαυνανφευδος. It is mentioned also in the preface to the same work. The circumstances under which it was delivered have been already given, p. 317 sq. As on other similar occasions, when the orations of the orator were used for the communication of theological teaching, more especially from the apologetic side. Referring to this speech, he describes himself in one passage as "weaving triennial wreaths of words" and "crowning the sacred head" of the emperor therewith (V. C. proem.), in another as "an authenticon of the universal King" (V. C. iv. 46). The two passages combined justly describe the purport and contents of the oration. It falls into two parts, of which the first (§§ 1–10) has a more special reference to the emperor and the festival, while the second (§§ 11–18) is a theological exposition on the person and work of the Logos. There is this difference also, that, whereas in the first part Constantine is spoken of throughout in the third person, in the latter part he is directly addressed. In a MS in the library of Trinity College Cambridge (f. 9, 6), where this oration appears by itself (without the Life of Constantine), the two parts are separated; and the heading is repeated before the second. It is difficult to resist the conclusion that the two parts were delivered at separate times. Though the second part forms no unifor sequel to the first, and was doubtless written with this view, yet each part is complete in itself.

The oration, taking account of the festival, begins to speak of the Almighty Sovereign, and the Divine Word through whom He administers the universe (§ 1). The emperor is a sort of reflection of the Supreme Word. The monarchy on earth is the counterpart of the monarchy in heaven (§§ 2, 3). The Word is the interpreter of the invisible God in all things (§ 4). An emperor who is sensible of his dependence on God, like Constantine, is alone fit to rule (§ 5). Periods and divisions of time are from God, as is all order throughout the universe. The number thirty (3 × 10) has a special significance in the language of symbolism. It reminds us of the kingdom of glory (§ 6). The powers of wickedness, and the sufferings of the saints, were ended by Constantine, the champion and representative of God (§ 7). He waged war against idolatry, prodigality, and superstition (§ 8). What a change has been suddenly wrought! The false gods did not foresee their fate. The emperor, armed with piety, advanced against them, and overthrew them: Churches rise from the ground everywhere (§ 8). The truth is proclaimed far and wide (§ 9).

"Come now (ἕτος ἀλήθεια), most mighty victor Constantine," says the orator, "let me lay before thee the mysteries of sacred doctrines in this royal discourse concerning the Supreme King of the Universe." Accordingly he proceeds to speak of the person and working of the Divine Word, as the mediator in the creation and government of the universe. The error of polytheism is condemned. As God is one, so His Word is one (§§ 11, 12). Humanity, led astray by demons and steeped in ignorance and sin, needed the advent of the Word (§ 13). It was necessary that He should come clothed in a body (§ 14). His death and resurrection also were indispensable, that He might accomplish the redemption of men (§ 15). The power of the Divine Word was evinced by the establishment of the Church and the spread of the gospel (§ 16). It was manifested in our own time by the faith of the martyrs, which triumphed over the opposition, and by the punishment of the persecutors themselves (§ 17). We have evidence of the divine origin of our faith in the prophetic announcements of Christ's coming, and in the fulfillment of His own predictions; more especially in the coincidence in time between the establishment of the Roman empire and the publication of the Gospel (§ 18).

Nearly the whole of the 8th chapter, describing Constantine's suppression of the prodigies of pagan worship, appears word for word in Vit. Const. iii. 54, 55. Eusebius may have been already engaged on his Life of Constantine, where he draws from this source to which this oration was delivered. Again, the theological portion of the speech reappears almost verbatim, though with great differences in the arrangement, in the Theophania. The inference from this fact has been already stated, p. 392 sq.

(36) In Praise of the Martyrs. The catalogue of the Assyrians. (Assem. ii. p. 184) attempted to show that this work was an account of the Eastern (i.e. Persian) martyrs, as the other was of the Western (i.e. Palestinian); but the language of Ebedjesus ("also a History of Constantine; but a speech of their praises") will not admit this interpretation. The question however is set at rest by the discovery of the discourse itself in a Syriac version. It is preserved in the same MS (dated A.D. 411), which contains also the Theophania and Martyrs of Palestine (Wright's Cat. Syr. MSS Brit. Mus. p. 639), where it is inserted in the 5th book. The reference to the martyrdom of Antiochianus (Fabianus), Cyrilus, and Babylas, so that it would seem to have been delivered at Antioch.

(57) On the Failure of Rain, mentioned by Ebedjesus (l.c.), but apparently not elsewhere.

Its theme may have been the incident of 1 Kings xvii, xviii, or perhaps some contemporary event.

F. LETTERS.

(38) To Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, &c. (39) To Theophania (correctly written improve the orthography), bishop of Balanse in Syria, a strong opponent of the Arians (Athana. de Fug. p. 324, Hist. ar. ad Mon. 3, p. 424), who was present at the Council of Nicaea. Theophania refers to this letter as considering it to be true that Christ is not true God (Iren. Synod. 17, p. 483). An extract containing the passage read at the Council of Nicaea is quoted at the Second Council of Nicaea (l.c.). It insists strongly upon the subordination of the Son.

(40) To Constantia Augustae (Op. 23, 1543), the sister of Constantine and the wife of Licinius, who was closely allied with the Arians (Constantia). Two fragments of this letter are preserved in the proceedings of the Second Council of Nicaea, act. viii (Labbe, Conc. viii. p. 324 sq.), and many more in the Anti-Rhetorics of Nicephorus the Patriarch (iv. 3 sq. in Spicil. Solesm. p. 233 sq.), who took an active part against the Iconoclasts. From the quotations in this latter writer we learn of a letter to Constantia which was written together by Boivin in his notes to Niceph. Gregor. Hist. Byz. xii. 3 (see i. p. 1301 sq., ed. Bonn), from which it is reprinted in Spicil. Scolae. i. c., and by Migne, Op. ii. p. 1544. It seems to be nearly complete, wanting little besides the beginning and end. There is no ground for questioning its genuineness, though this is done by Petavius, Theol. Dogm. de hier. xv. 14. 9, and by Lee (Theophania p. 110), who attributes it to Eusebius of Nicomedia. Constantia had asked Eusebius to send her a certain likeness of Christ, of which she had heard. He refused her for making the request, saying that such presence and image are intrinsic to themselves, and tend to idolatry. He states that a foolish woman (μετάληθη) had brought him two likenesses, which might be philosophers, but were alleged by her to represent St. Paul and the Saviour. He did not know how she had come by them; but he had detained them lest they should prove a stumbling-block to her or others. He tells Constantia that the letter declares his intention of "knowing Christ as long as the flesh." This noble letter has done more than any of his writings to injure his reputation. It was adduced by the Iconoclasts in their favour, and their opponents were thus provoked to rake up all the questionable expressions in his writings, and they might blacken his character for orthodoxy.

(41) To the Council of Caesarea (Op. ii. 1535), written from Nicaea (A.D. 325) during or immediately after the council to vindicate his conduct. This letter is preserved by Athanasius as an appendix to the de Deorit. Syn. X. (Op. i. p. 187; comp. § 3, ib. p. 190); in Socrates, H. P.
EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA

EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA 345

18; in Theodoret, H. E. i. 11; in Gelusius Cyz. Hist. Conc. Nic. ii. 34 sq. (Labbe, Conc. ii. 264 sq. ed. Collet); in the Historia Tripartita, ii. 11; and in Nicemonus, H. E. viii. 22. On the question, whether it was appended to his work by Athanasius himself, see Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 179. The occasion and contents of this letter have been discussed already (p. 313). Gelusius (H. C. N. ii. 34 col. 3) says "the original letter". On the other hand Theodoret (l. c.) speaks of it as addressed "to certain persons holding the opinions of Arius." Athanasius (l. c.) however describes it as addressed "to his own church," and so too Socrates, "to the people under him." To the Caesareans doubtless it was written. A passage towards the end of the letter (§9, 10), which savours strongly of Arianism, is wanting in Socrates and in the Historia Tripartita, but appears in the other authorities, and seems certainly to be referred to by Athanasius in two places (De Decr. Syn. Nic. 3, l. c.; de Synod. 13, Op. i. p. 561). It is condemned however by Bull (De Hist. Nic. iii. 9, 3), and by Cave (Dict. Eccl. in Joh. Cleric. p. 58, printed at the end of his Hist. Lit. vol. ii.), as a spurious addition, probably inserted by some Arian. The letter is translated and annotated by Dr. J. H. Newman in Select Treatises of St. Athanasius p. 59 sq. (Oxford, 1853).

In the proceedings of the Second Nicene Council act. vi (Labbe, Conc. viii. 1145), mention is made of "all the letters" of Eusebius, as though a considerable number were then extant. Gelusius of Cyzicus (H. C. N. ii. 1) speaks of a letter which he addressed to the assembly of orthodox bishops in defence of his views; but he is doubtful in error, as no such document is mentioned elsewhere.

In addition to those works of which an account has been given, several other writings are extant, either whole or in part, which claim Eusebius of Caesarea as their author. In 1643 Sirmoul published in Latin fourteen Opuscula ascribed to Eusebius, and they have been many times reprinted (op. vi. 1047, Migne). They are discussed by Tillemon, vii. p. 61 sq.; comp. also Fabric. Bibli. Grav. vii. p. 406 sq. The most important of these are two books, or rather hemiclises, Against Sabellius. Cave (H. L. i. p. 183) prefers assigning them to Eusebius of Caesarea, or rather to Eusebius von Evessa (etc., p. 64 sq.) maintains this position with much force. Tillemon would assign the first to Eusebius of Caesarea and the second to Acacius. The remaining twelve works are sermons on the Resurrection, the Ascension, etc. In the Syriac MS Brt. Mus. Add. 17, 142, belonging to the 8th century (see Wright's Catalogue, p. 1042), is a treatise On the Star which appeared to the Magi, ascribed to our Eusebius. It was published by Wright, Journal of Sacred Literature (1866) ix. p. 117, x. p. 150. The authorship is disputed by Ceriani, Nöldeke, von Gutschmid, and others. From the closer resemblance of the Biblical quotations to the Peshito, than to the LXX, Nöldeke conjectures that it was written originally in Syriac. Epiphanias (Haec. lxi. 21) mentions among other refutations (Harmophies) of the Manicheans one by Eusebius of Caesarea; but no such work is mentioned elsewhere (e.g. in Theod. H. F. i. 26); and it must therefore be supposed that Epiphanias was mistaken or that this refutation was not a separate treatise, but occurred incidentally in some other work. Other writings, attributed to Eusebius, are enumerated as extant, wholly or in part, in manuscript in various libraries by Fabric. Bibli. Grav. vii. pp. 407, 408, Cave, H. L. i. p. 183; and probably several others, not mentioned in these writers, are lying hidden elsewhere. Thus a MS of H. 9. 6 in the library of Trinity College, Cambridge, contains in Latin Sermones Quinque Eusebi Caesareiensis Episcopi de Sancto Stephano.

In reviewing the literary history of Eusebius, we are struck first of all with the range and extent of his labours. His extant works, voluminous as they are, must have formed somewhat less than half of his actual writings. No field of theological learning is untouched. He is historian, apologist, topographer, exegete, critic, preacher, dogmatic writer, in turn. And, if the permanent utility of an author's labours may be taken as a test of literary excellence, Eusebius will hold a very high place indeed. The Ecclesiastical History is absolutely indispensable. The Chronicle is the vast storehouse of information relating to the ancient monachies of the world. The Preparation and Demonstration are the most important contributions to theology in their own province. Even the minor works, such as the Martyrs of Palestine, the Life of Constantine, the Questions addressed to Stephanus and to Marinus, and others, would leave an irreparable blank, if they were obliterated. And the same permanent value attaches also to his more technical treatises. The Canons and Sections have never yet been superseded for their particular purpose. The Topography of Palestine is the most important contribution to our knowledge in its own department. In short, no ancient ecclesiastical writer has laid posterity under heavier obligations.

The explanation of this fact must be sought in some degree in his great erudition. In the field of History, in the choice of his materials, he has preserved for us a vast amount of early literature in three or more spheres, which would otherwise have been irrecoverably lost. But beyond his learning he deserves the highest credit for the intelligent selection of his subjects. No writer has ever shewn a keener insight in the choice of his themes, who would not have had the permanent interest for future generations. He lived on the confines of two epochs, separated from each other by one of those broad lines of demarcation which occur only at intervals of many centuries. He saw the greatness of the crisis; he seized the opportunity; he, and he only, preserved the past in all its phases, in history, in doctrine, in criticism, even in topography, for the instruction of the future.

This is his real title to greatness. As an expositor of facts, or as an abstract thinker, or as a master of style, it would be absurd to compare him with the great names of classical antiquity. His merits and his fruits have been already indicated in the criticisms on his several works (pp. 324 sqq., 331). His gigantic learning was his master rather than his slave. He had great conceptions, which he was unable adequately to carry out. He had valuable detached thoughts, but he failed to continue the line of thought which was most labourable and yet most desultory. He accumulated materials with great diligence; he was loose and perfunctory and uncritical in the use of them when accumulated. His style is especially vicious. At times indeed, when he forgets himself in his subject, as, for instance, in his attack on Marcellus, his language is plain and direct enough; but, when his theme seems to him to demand a loftier flight of rhetoric, as in his Life of Constantine, his language becomes hopelessly turgid and unnatural. These two works are especially instructive as examples, because they were written about the same time. Theodorus Metochita (Miscell. 17) propounds the theory that all writers who were brought up in Egypt, contracted a harsh style (φραγμένον τῷ λέγῳ χρώματι), and he instances Eusebius, who himself states that he had made a long sojourn in that country (τοῦ ἐν Ἀιγύπτῳ πάντων ἁπλῶς συνεφόρητον). But we need not go so far for an explanation. Athanasius, though an Egyptian, can write with point and clarity, perhaps because he handled the connection of Eusebius with Egypt was very slight after all (H. E. viii. 7); and his violent style, so far as it was not inherent in himself, may be ascribed with much greater probability to Syrian and Oriental influences.
EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA

One other point deserves notice. While his writings are so large an area and are so various in character, he is before all things an apologist. His great services in this respect are emphasized by Evagrius (H. E. i. 1 περὶ ὅλου ὅλον τοῦ ἄνυψημάντου πραεσυνεῖ τῷ ἡμέρας); and doubtless his directly apologetic writings were much more effective than at this distance of time they appear. But his position as an apologist does not end with his apologetic works. Whatever subject he touches, his thoughts seem to pour instinctively into this same channel. If he takes up the subject of chronology, a main purpose is to shew the superior antiquity of the Hebrew oracles to the wisdom of the Greeks. If he sets himself to write a history of the Church, he does so because he sees the course of events a vindication of the Divine Word, in whom the faith of the Christian centres. If he selects a theme so purely mundane as the encomium of a sovereign, he soars aloft at once into the region of theology, for he sees in the subject of his panegyric an instrument used by a higher power for the fulfilment of a Divine economy. If he employs himself on a task so essentially technical as the division of the Gospels into sections, his underlying motive is the desire to supply materials for a harmony, and thus to vindicate the essential unity of the evangelical narratives against gain-sayers. This characteristic task was due partly to the epoch in which he lived, and partly to his individual temper and circumstances. To the epoch in which he lived: for his lot was cast in the great crisis of transition; he stood, as it were, on the frontier line between two ages, with one foot in the Hellenism of the past and the other in the sanctity of the future. And by his very position he was constrained to view them face to face, and to discuss their mutual relations. To his individual qualifications: for he was equally learned in the wisdom of the Greeks and in the teaching of the Scriptures, while his breadth of sympathy and moderation of temper fitted him beyond most of his contemporaries for the task of tracing their conflicts and coincidences.

"The grave accusation under which he lies," writes Dr. Newman (Arians, p. 262 sq.), "is that of Arianizing, but of corrupting the simplicity of the Gospel with an eclectic spirit. While he held out the ambiguous language of the schools as a refuge, and the Alexandrian imitation of it as an argument against the pursuit of the orthodox, his conduct gave countenance to the secular maxims that difference in creeds is a matter of inferior moment, and that, provided we confess as far as the very terms of Scripture, we may speculate as philosophers and live as the world." This grave charge of indifference to truth will be dealt with presently. It is sufficient to say here that the characteristic which is thus made the head and front of his offending, was his strong point as a champion of the faith. Like St. Paul on Mars' Hill, he sought out the elements of truth in pre-existing philosophy and theological systems and religion, and his object in obtaining a foothold, he worked onward in his assault upon paganism. The Greek apologists of the 2nd and 3rd centuries all, without exception, took up this position. It was the signal merit of the great Alexandrian fathers that they did not treat as a mere dead letter the precepts of St. John's Gospel, in which the eternal Son identifies the Word, who in the fullness of time became incarnate, with 'the light that lighteth every man.' Eusebius, through his illustrious spiritual ancestors, Origen and Pampilius, had inherited this tradition from Alexandria. It was the only method which could achieve success among the Jews in an age when rationalism as an apostle was a living reality. But his way was to face to face with still powerful forms of heathen worship. It is the only method which can hope for victory now, when once again the Gospel is confronted with the dominant and widespread religions of India and the farther East.

X. Character. If we may judge from the silence of his contemporaries—and silence in this case is an important witness—Eusebius commanded general respect by his personal character. With the single exception of the taunt of Potammon, which has been considered already, not a word of accusation is levelled against him in an age when theological controversy was peculiarly reckless and acrimonious. It is difficult to draw with any confidence the portrait of one of whose private acts so little is known. But we seem to see that his character was marked by amiability and moderation. His relations to Pampilius, more especially, shew a strongly affectionate disposition; and it is more than probable that he was drawn into these public acts from a sense of duty to the demands of the Age. He is considered, by the emperor Constantine, and his speculative opinions, as well as his personal 68 Dr. Newman adds in a note (p. 283). "In this association of the Eusebian with the eclectic temper, it must not be forgotten that Julian the Apostate was the pupil of Eusebius of Nicomedia, his kinsman," etc. It will be ill with us all, if we are held responsible for the opinions of the pupils of our brothers and cousins; but there is no reason for believing that Eusebius of Nicomedia was any relation of Eusebius of Caesarea (see above, p. 289).
EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA acts, bear out this commendation. "He seems," writes Dr. Newman (Arians, p. 262, 4to. ed.) "to have had the faults and the virtues of the mere man of letters; strongly excelled neither to good nor to evil, and careless at once of the cause of truth and the prizes of secular greatness, in comparison of the comforts and decencies of literary ease." If this description had stopped short at the first sentence, it might have been accepted as substantially just; but we may well challenge the fairness of the explanatory clauses. What ground is there for saying that the friend of Pamphilus was not strongly excited to good? How can it be maintained that the laborious apologist of the Gospel, the adversary of Marcellus, was indifferent to the cause of truth? Still less can we accept "the comforts and decencies of literary ease" as the description of a life which was before all things laborious and self-denying. He was not only the most learned and prolific writer of his age; but he administered the affairs of an important diocese, and he took an active part in all the great questions which agitated the Church. Not Athanasius himself was a harder worker in the cause of Christ. From youth to advanced age he laboured with unremitting vigour. The self-sacrifices of the man of letters, if he is true to his calling, are not less in extent than those of the man of action, though they may be different in kind.

The excessive admiration of Eusebius for Constantine will be felt to need some apology. Yet it is not difficult to understand how he was led to this exaggerated estimate. Constantine was unquestionably one of the very greatest of the great emperors of Rome. His commanding personality must have been irresistible; and the impression thence derived would be enhanced by his deference towards the leading Christian bishops. The external circumstances of his reign moreover seemed to stamp it with a peculiar grandeur. He had ruled longer than any other emperor since Augustus, the founder of the Empire, and carried the eminence in the relations between the Church and the State incomparably greater than any which had preceded, or than any which would follow. Eusebius delighted to place these two great sovereigns in juxtaposition. During the one reign the Word had appeared in the flesh; during the other He had triumphed over the world. The one reign was the counterpart and complement of the other.

